Options Backdating Probe Called "Witch Hunt." In a column for the Wall Street Journal (6/21), Holman Jenkins, Jr. writes, "Another business scandal, this one over options 'backdating,' reveals that some CEOs are 'in it' for the money. Tsk, tsk. … There has been outrage aplenty, lawsuits and even a grand jury investigation over a procession of companies accused of committing this violation of the moral code. A few are big names: Home Depot, Microsoft, UnitedHealth Group. But most are midsized tech companies with good reputations in their industries. So far, about 50 (the number grows daily) are suspected of having granted their executives and employees stock options whose issue date was retroactively established to coincide with a recent low in the company's stock price. … Missing, however, has been any cogent explanation of the possible reasons behind a practice apparently so widespread that companies must either have been sharing notes on it or have discovered it independently following some inner logic of corporate life. Also missing is any cogent explanation of why it's wrong." Jenkins adds, "Since Enron, a great deal has been said about corporate governance, most of it useless. The one lesson that should be reinforced is that overseeing CEO incentives is among the most important board responsibilities, and boards should keep control of it and do it clearheadedly. Yet there is nothing categorically corrupt or improper about backdating to justify a conclusion that the boards here weren't doing just that. … The scandal element, instead, arises because ever-shifting accounting, regulatory and tax standards were, by some readings, punitive during the years in question toward choosing a past date to make an options package effective. We wouldn't want the legal bills of UnitedHealth's Bill McGuire -- or Vitesse Semiconductor's Louis Tomasetta, or KLA-Tencor's Ken Levy. In the end, dozens of executives are likely now to find themselves skinned and hung out to dry over a practice that's innocuous and even sensible in its own right."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Former GAO Official Safavian Convicted. ABC World News Tonight (6/20, story 8, :15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Former Bush Administration official David Safavian has been convicted in the first criminal trial stemming from the scandal surrounding Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Safavian was found guilty of lying about his dealings with Abramoff." NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 8, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) noted Safavian "was the Bush Administration's procurement chief." USA Today (6/21, 2.31M) reports Safavian "was convicted of obstructing an investigation into whether he aided Abramoff in efforts to acquire property controlled by the GSA in 2002, when Safavian accompanied the lobbyist on a golfing trip to Scotland." The jury "found Safavian hid details of his relationship with Abramoff from a GSA ethics lawyer, the GSA's inspector general's office and the Senate Indian Affairs Committee. He was acquitted of obstructing a Senate investigation."

The CBS Evening News (6/20, story 6, 0:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported Safavian "could get up to 20 years in prison." Meanwhile, Roll Call (6/21, Bresnahan) reports Safavian "plans to ask a federal judge to vacate portions of the decision and then will most likely appeal the case, his attorney said."

The Washington Post (6/21, Birnbaum) reports, "Safavian, a former chief of staff of the General Services Administration, was convicted in U.S. District Court here of covering up his many efforts to assist Abramoff in acquiring two properties controlled by the GSA, and also of concealing facts about a lavish weeklong golf trip he took with Abramoff to Scotland and London in the summer of 2002. … This was the first Abramoff-related legal action to go to trial and face a jury. Several legal experts said the case could embolden federal prosecutors to seek additional indictments against cronies of Abramoff, who has been cooperating with the Justice Department since pleading guilty in January to corrupting public officials."

The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Schmitt) reports, "Each count carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison, and a $250,000 fine. U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman set sentencing for Oct. 12." The Times adds, "Safavian sat without expression as the guilty verdicts were read. He was cleared of one count of obstructing the Senate Indian Affairs Committee's investigation. … The verdict adds momentum to a Justice Department investigation focusing on a number of members of Congress, including Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), whose former chief of staff was a government witness against Safavian."

The New York Times (6/21, Shenon) reports, "The verdict was hailed by Justice Department officials as a victory in their wide-ranging criminal investigation of the lobbying operations run by Mr. Abramoff, a Republican fundraiser who pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to go bribe public officials, including members of Congress, and is cooperating with prosecutors." The Times adds, "After four days of deliberation, the jury agreed with prosecutors that Mr. Safavian lied to investigators when he insisted there was no ethical conflict in joining Mr. Abramoff's August 2002 golfing trip to Scotland since, Mr. Safavian claimed, the lobbyist did 'no business' with the General Services Administration. Mr. Safavian was then the chief of staff of the G.S.A., which fuctions as the government's real-estate manager." The Times notes, "Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher, the head of the Justice Department's criminal division, said in a statement that 'the message of this verdict is clear: in answering questions posed by Congress and by federal agencies, public officials have the same obligation as does the public for which they serve — to tell the truth.'"

The Financial Times (6/21, Kirchgaessner) reports, "For the Department of Justice, which has stepped up its focus on cases involving influence peddling since the Abramoff case emerged, the courtroom victory suggests that its strategy of working its way up the food chain – by securing guilty pleas from Mr Abramoff's former business associates, former congressional aides, and then from the lobbyist himself – is paying off."

The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Cummings, 2.11M), in a story titled "Probe Becomes Election Issue," says the conviction "is likely to have broad legal and political effects. The guilty verdict, handed down by a federal jury, could pressure more congressional aides to cooperate with the investigation, and complicate the re-election bids of a handful of Republican legislators named during the trial." The verdict also "places at least part of the Abramoff scandal inside the Bush administration, not solely in Congress. It is the first trial victory for the Justice Department's task force investigating Mr. Abramoff."

The Philadelphia Inquirer/Knight Ridder (6/21, Taylor) reports, "During the eight-day trial, prosecutors presented dozens of e-mail exchanges between Safavian and Abramoff that discussed the GSA properties." Knight Ridder continues, "Abramoff contacted Safavian days after his old friend became the GSA's chief of staff to talk to him about the properties, according to federal records. … Abramoff wanted to buy or lease a portion of 600 acres in Silver Spring, Md., and the Old Post Office Building in Washington. At the time, the GSA managed the properties. … Prosecutors said Safavian later advised Abramoff about leasing or buying the properties, gave him internal government documents, and set up a meeting with other GSA officials. … At the time, Safavian had been planning to take the Scotland golf trip with a group that included Abramoff and Ney."

Government Executive (6/21, Mandel) reports, "Safavian faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine for each of the four counts, though his lawyer, Barbara Van Gelder, said she would draw on his clean record in arguing that he serve less than the full 20 years. Sentencing is scheduled for Oct. 12. … Van Gelder said her client will appeal the jury's decision, a process she said could take many years." GE notes, "As possible grounds for appeal, Van Gelder cited concerns with the verdict form, which she said used overly broad language and introduced new wording that had not been defined during the trial. She also described instructions on how the jury was to consider a flood of e-mail traffic between Safavian and Abramoff as confusing and 'hypertechnical,' with some messages to be considered solely for the fact that they were sent, while others could be considered as statements of fact."

The Legal Times (6/21, Schwartz) reports, "Safavian's case was somewhat narrower than those of others targeted in the Abramoff probe. It focused on an August 2002 trip Safavian took to Scotland and London that Abramoff sponsored. Others on the junket included Ohio Republican Rep. Bob Ney and political strategist Ralph Reed, the former head of the Christian Coalition. Attendees played rounds of golf at the Old Course of St. Andrews and stayed at luxury hotels in London and Scotland. … At the time of the trip, Safavian had just been appointed chief of staff to the administrator of the Government Services Administration. But when asking for clearance to go on the trip, Safavian told a GSA ethics officer that Abramoff had no business before the agency because he did all of his work on Capitol Hill. In fact, Abramoff had previously sought assistance from Safavian to secure leases on two GSA-controlled properties."

Bloomberg (6/21, Jensen) reports, "Abramoff, 47, became the subject of a U.S. government task force investigation after a series of articles in the Washington Post in 2004 about his financial dealings with partner Michael Scanlon and their work for American Indian tribes. In January this year, Abramoff pleaded guilty to defrauding the tribes and conspiring to corrupt public officials. … Scanlon and two other former congressional aides, who later worked for Abramoff, have also pleaded guilty to conspiracy. They are cooperating with prosecutors investigating other lobbyists and public officials including U.S. Representative Bob Ney, who traveled with Safavian on an Abramoff-arranged golf trip to Scotland in 2002. Ney has denied all wrongdoing. … 'Prosecutors now have a bigger sword to rattle when they are trying to convince witnesses to cooperate, or individuals to plead guilty,' said Joshua Berman, a former Justice Department lawyer and partner at Sonnenschein, Nath & Rosenthal LLP in Washington. 'The prosecutors can essentially say to a reluctant target or subject, "Look, we're prepared to try these cases. We did it with Safavian and are ready to do it with you."'"

The Washington Times/AP (6/21), Knight Ridder (6/21, Taylor), Los Angeles Times (6/21, Schmidt, 958K) and The Hill (6/21, Tiron) run similar reports.

Nominee To Replace Safavian Promises Effective, Ethical Acquisition System. The Washington Post (6/21, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that Paul A. Denett , the president's choice to head the White House's federal procurement policy office, "promised at his confirmation hearing 'to build a world-class acquisition system that garners the confidence of our taxpayers by consistently delivering efficient, effective and ethical contracting service.'" At the same time, federal jury announced that the man he would replace, David Safavian, "had been found guilty on four of five felony charges tied to a corruption and influence-peddling scandal centered around lobbyist Jack Abramoff ."

Abramoff, Kidan Imprisonment Postponed. The AP (6/21, Yost) reports, "In Miami, meanwhile, a judge granted Abramoff and ex-business partner Adam Kidan another three months before they must begin serving prison sentences for fraud convictions stemming from the purchase of a gambling boat fleet. Abramoff also faces sentencing in Washington on federal charges of conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud. … The delay will give the two more time to cooperate with investigators."

Tribe Seeks Probe Of Former Employee Linked To Abramoff. The AP (6/21, Martin) reports, "The Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe wants the U.S. Department of Justice to investigate one of its former employees and his ties to tainted lobbyist Jack Abramoff." The AP continues, "Former legislative affairs worker Christopher Petras is accused by the tribe of giving 'incorrect and misleading' testimony to the U.S. Senate Affairs Committee in September 2004 during hearings about Abramoff and Abramoff's associate, Michael Scanlon. … Although Petras testified before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee that he didn't recall many of the details about his communications with Abramoff and Scanlon, the tribe says a trail of e-mails and other testimony indicate a stronger relationship than Petras revealed." The AP adds, "Federal prosecutors say Abramoff encouraged the tribe to expand a lobbying contract without disclosing that he would receive about 50 percent of the profits from the tribe's payments. From June 2002 to October 2003, the tribe paid about $3.5 million on the contract, with about $540,000 being kicked back to Abramoff, court documents say. … Abramoff's former employer, Greenberg Traurig LLP, has agreed to repay millions of dollars to the tribe as part of a settlement. The Saginaw Chippewas say they paid about $14 million to Abramoff and Scanlon overall. … Tribal Chief Fred Cantu sent a letter last month requesting the Justice Department investigation to U.S. Sen. John McCain, the Arizona Republican who heads the Senate Indian Affairs Committee. The Senate committee is expected to release its own report this week on its investigation into Abramoff and the tribes."

Libby Supporters Have Raised Over $2 Million For His Defense. The AP (6/21) reports, "Supporters of Vice President Dick Cheney's indicted former chief of staff have raised more than $2 million since late last year for his legal defense in the CIA leak case." Former Cheney spokeswoman Mary Matalin "was hosting a fundraiser at her home Tuesday night to help pay the legal expenses of I. Lewis Libby, who is charged with five counts of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI in the Valerie Plame affair." The $2 million figure "came from Barbara Comstock, a member of Libby's legal team. Among the co-hosts for the event at Matalin's home were former Energy Secretary Spencer Abraham, former Rep. Bob Livingston and oil industry executive and former Commerce Secretary Don Evans." Former Republican Sen. Fred Thompson "hosted a fundraiser at his northern Virginia home last month to raise money for Libby's defense."

Judge Dismisses Fraud Charge Against Chicago Patronage Trial Defendants. The Chicago Tribune (6/21, Bush, O'Connor, 643K) reports, "Mayor Richard Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich and his three co-defendants scored a victory in court Tuesday when a federal judge tossed out a significant fraud charge against all of them in their City Hall corruption trial. U.S. District Judge David Coar's ruling came as prosecutors rested a six-week case that portrayed much of the city's hiring and promotions system as riddled with political favoritism, sham interviews and preselected job applicants. Coar also said Tuesday that he will reserve ruling on whether to dismiss all charges against" codefendants John Sullivan and Patrick Slattery," but "he rejected a defense request to dismiss remaining charges against Sorich and his former aide Timothy McCarthy." The AP (6/21, Reichgott) also reports that Coar's dismissal of the mail fraud charge, "which takes up 13 pages of an 18-page indictment, was a boost" for the defendants. Sorich, McCarthy "and Patrick Slattery still face other charges, including mail fraud," but former streets and sanitation deputy commissioner John Sullivan "now only is charged with lying to the FBI."

Two Ohio Investment Brokers Indicted On Bribery Charges. The Toledo Blade (6/20, Drew, Eder) reported, "The scandal that has gripped state government for 14 months broadened yesterday as two Cleveland-area investment brokers were indicted on charges that they conspired to bribe a high-ranking official of the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation in exchange for getting and keeping a piece of the bureau's business." Michael W. Lewis and Daniel P. O'Neil "worked for three investment firms in the six years they gave Terrence Gasper, the bureau's chief financial officer, use of an oceanfront condominium and a boat slip in the Florida Keys, according to the indictment unsealed…in U.S. District Court" on Monday. US Attorney Gregory White "estimated that the firms for which Mr. Lewis and Mr. O'Neil worked received $5 million to $6 million in brokerage commissions, marketing, and solicitation fees from the bureau." The Columbus Dispatch (6/20, Niquette) noted that an "unprecedented task force of federal, state and county authorities" is "investigating state investment and ethics scandals," and added that Gaspar "pleaded guilty in both federal and state courts June 7 as part of plea agreements that require him to cooperate with the investigation. He admitted accepting free stays at the condominium…a $9,000 college tuition payment for his son and other gifts from former coin dealer Thomas W. Noe, brokers and others." The AP (6/20, Mabin) and Willoughby (OH) News-Herald (6/20, Read) also reported on the indictments.

LAPD, FBI Uncover New Evidence In Insurance Scam-Murder Probe. The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Winton, 958K) reports, "Los Angeles police detectives and FBI agents investigating a pair of women suspected of killing two homeless men have turned their attention to one of those victims after uncovering new evidence that they say links the women to his death. Detectives looking into the case of Helen Golay and Olga Rutterschmidt are now focusing primarily on the death of Kenneth McDavid, who was run over in a Westwood alley last June in a hit-and-run that remains unsolved. Authorities said in a search warrant affidavit that an hour before McDavid's body was discovered, Golay called the Auto Club to have a Mercury Sable towed from an intersection a block from where the 50-year-old was hit. In new court papers obtained by The Times, detectives said they found blood and 'organic matter' on the damaged undercarriage of the Sable." The car's registered owner "told Det. Dennis Kilcoyne and FBI Special Agent Samuel A. Mayrose that she never owned the Sable but that her purse had been stolen around April 2003."

Former Chicago-Area Priest Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Possession. The AP (6/21) reports, "A Roman Catholic priest formerly based in suburban Hoffman Estates pleaded guilty Tuesday to possessing child pornography. The Rev. Daniel Schulte, 53, former chaplain at St. Alexius Medical Center, was accused after federal investigators found still and video sexual images of children on the hard drive of his computer. The images included girls and boys younger than 12 years old and some involved material that portrayed sadistic or masochistic acts, according to the plea agreement." The AP notes that after the ISP notified the assistant provincial of the order, "an attorney for the order contacted the FBI and Schulte was moved to St. Louis where both he and his access to the Internet were supervised."

Two Convicted In Internet Piracy Case. The Bay City News (6/21) reports, "Federal prosecutors announced today that two more people, including a Cupertino (CA) man, have been convicted as part of Operation Copycat, the Justice Department's crackdown on Internet piracy." BCN continues, "Cupertino resident Tom Leung, 53, and Ray Morada, 32, of Washington, D.C., were convicted today of conspiracy and copyright infringement charges for their participation in a 'warez group.' … Warez groups are the source of the majority of pirated movies, music and software distributed and downloaded on the Internet, according to federal prosecutors." BCN adds, "Once a warez release group prepares a stolen work for distribution, the material is distributed in minutes to secure, top-level Internet servers throughout the world. From there, within a matter of hours, the pirated works are distributed globally, filtering down to peer-to-peer and other public file sharing networks accessible to anyone with Internet access, according to authorities. … Federal authorities began cracking down on the groups last year with Operation Copycat. To date 36 people have been charged in connection with Operation Copycat and 30 have been convicted, including Paul Sherman, a film critic for the Boston Herald. Sherman pleaded guilty last month to selling more than 100 pre-release review copies of movies to a known warez supplier between 2002 and 2005."

Hooks Joins Father As Defendant In Tennessee Waltz Probe. The AP (6/21) reports, "Former Memphis school board member Michael Hooks Jr. became the 11th person charged in the Tennessee Waltz corruption scandal when he was indicted Tuesday on embezzlement charges." The AP continues, "Hooks' father, Shelby County Commissioner Michael Hooks Sr., was indicted last year on Tennessee Waltz bribery charges and is awaiting trial." The

AP adds, "Five of the accused in the federal investigation are current or former state lawmakers, two of whom have been convicted. … The Hooks family has long been active in Memphis politics, and Hooks Jr.'s great-uncle, Benjamin Hooks, is a former national director of the NAACP. … Hooks Jr. is charged in a four-count indictment with skimming public money from the Shelby County Juvenile Court." The AP notes, "While Tennessee Waltz focused on an FBI front company called E-Cycle Management that offered bribes statewide for government favors, it grew out of an embezzlement investigation at the juvenile court in Memphis. … Offenses in the indictment against Hooks Jr. carrying a maximum punishment of 40 years in prison and fines totaling $1 million, though federal guidelines would call for a much lighter sentence upon conviction."

Retired FBI Agent Disputes Testimony Probe Targeted William Bulger. The Boston Globe (6/21, Murphy, 484K) reports, "A retired FBI agent, who went undercover in 1983 to offer bribes to officials, yesterday disputed testimony that the Massachusetts Senate president at the time, William M. Bulger, had been a target of the investigation. 'His name never came up,' John 'Jack' Callahan said in a telephone interview with The Boston Globe." The Globe adds, "Yesterday, Robert Fitzpatrick, who was second in command of the FBI's Boston office from 1981 to 1986, acknowledged that the FBI did not have any evidence of wrongdoing by Bulger during the 1983 investigation. But he stood by his testimony on Monday that Bulger was a target of the inquiry. Fitzpatrick said it was one of nine investigations in his tenure in Boston that he believed had been compromised by leaks to informants, including Bulger's gangster brother, James 'Whitey' Bulger, or others outside the agency."

Strangled NYC Investigator Was Seeking Meeting With Mob Murder Witness. The New York Daily News (6/21, Katz, 729K) reports, "When veteran forensic investigator Angela Clemente drove to a remote parking lot in the dead of night last week, she thought she was about to break another big mob case. Her longtime partner, Stephen Dresch, said yesterday that Clemente was hoping to meet an eyewitness to two 1992 mob slayings," but "instead, Clemente was beaten and nearly strangled last Friday -- and then threatened again. 'The threat that came after the attack was far more alarming than the attack itself,' Clemente told a source yesterday. 'I'm in hiding. … I'm not going to do any further investigation.' The case she was probing stemmed from the slayings of reputed Colombo soldiers" John Minerva and Michael Imbergamo. Clemente "has been seeking evidence that would help clear three men convicted of the murders -- and link the crimes instead to the late Colombo capo Greg Scarpa Sr. and his FBI handler, Lindley DeVecchio."

Study Finds One American In 20 Has Been Stalked. Scripps Howard (6/21, Bowman) reports, "Nearly 5 percent of adults in a national survey reported having been stalked at some point, translating to an at-risk pool of more than 7 million women and 2 million men in the United States." Scripps Howard continues, "Most stalkers aren't strangers, according to the study's lead researcher, Kathleen Basile, a behavioral scientist who works in violence prevention at the National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, part of the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention." Scripps Howard adds, "Women, younger adults and those who are single, separated or divorced are most at risk. Younger adults being more likely victims 'goes along with what we know about violence in general,' Basile said. … The results, being published in the American Journal of Preventive Medicine in August, are based on phone interviews done with nearly 10,000 adults between 2001 and 2003, with responses about equally divided between women and men. … According to the researchers, 'Stalking continues to be a public health problem at a magnitude comparable to that measured in the National Violence Against Women Study (done for the Justice Department in 1995-96).'"

Tech Companies Back Efforts To Protect Consumer Privacy On The Internet. The Washington Post (6/21, D3, Hart, 744K) reports, "Several large technology companies, including Google Inc. and eBay Inc., announced support yesterday for stronger federal regulations to protect consumer privacy on the Internet." Twelve companies have formed an advocacy group, the Consumer Privacy Legislative Forum, to push for "greater protection of private information, and several members testified yesterday before a House subcommittee. … The group of companies is seeking federal legislation that would require businesses to notify consumers when collecting personal information, then allow individuals to choose how the information is used and to access data they have provided to cut down on unauthorized use."

AFP (6/21, Chapman) reports, "Google counsel Nicole Wong said Tuesday in a blog posting on the Google website that the company joined a group of 'notable US companies' calling for federal consumer privacy legislation. … There was a 'patchwork quilt' of US state consumer protection laws that varied depending on location and subject, with examples being health, financial, or child-related data, according to Wong. … 'This matrix of laws is complex, incomplete, and sometimes contradictory,' Wong wrote. 'For consumers, the result is a set of privacy protections that are uneven at best.'"

CIVIL RIGHTS:

New York City To Try Measures Aimed At Helping Handicapped Voters. The New York Times (6/21, Chan) reports, "For the first time, New York City residents will be able to vote by 'puffing' and 'sipping' air through a straw, pumping a foot pedal, touching a computer screen or pressing flat plastic shapes — two triangles, a circle and a square — affixed to the four corners of a specially configured keyboard." The Times continues, "These new methods, which represent the biggest innovation in the city's voting technologies since the Shoup mechanical-lever machine was introduced in 1962, are a temporary measure intended to help disabled people vote. … The new voting methods are the product of a lawsuit from the federal government. They will be used in the Sept. 12 primary and the Nov. 7 general election as an interim step to comply with a new federal requirement that voting machines be accessible to the disabled." The Times adds, "The new voting methods can be used on 22 ballot-marking devices that will be available at one site in each of the five boroughs. It is an imperfect compromise: by placing the machines at centrally located offices, the city is essentially requiring some of the least mobile voters to travel the longest distances to vote. And because it can take up to 40 minutes to cast a vote using the new machines, voters may find themselves waiting in long lines. … The devices are not actual voting machines; they cannot record votes, but merely generate a printed ballot on a sheet of white paper. The voter, with help from a poll worker if necessary, would then place the ballot in an envelope. The ballot would then be counted by hand, along with other paper ballots, including absentee ballots, on Election Day or shortly after."

Voting Rights Suit Against Kissimmee, FL, Dropped. The AP (6/21) reports, "Four people want to drop a lawsuit alleging city election procedures unfairly diluted the voting power of Hispanics after they found that the minority group now outnumbers registered white voters." The AP continues, "The class-action complaint was filed last year to challenge the way city commissioners are elected, arguing that each spot should represent a geographic district. Instead, residents citywide are allowed to vote on each race, similar to the U.S. Senate. … Despite comprising about 45 percent of Kissimmee's 52,000 people, no Hispanic has ever been elected to the commission." The AP adds, "Armando Ramirez, one of the four residents behind the lawsuit, originally filed a federal complaint six years ago alleging unfair voting practices. In July, the U.S. Justice Department filed a lawsuit against Osceola County on similar grounds, and Ramirez's group said they wanted to carry that momentum by suing weeks later. … However, the voter registration rolls now show that Hispanic voters outnumber white voters by about 900. … 'The lawsuit is unsustainable,' said Ramirez, who ran unsuccessfully for the Kissimmee City Commission in 2002. 'Instead of waiting for the judge to tell us that, we directed our attorneys to' seek a voluntary dismissal. … The Justice Department case against Osceola County is still pending. A department spokesman declined to comment Tuesday on the request to drop the class-action suit."

WPost Opposes Efforts To Ban Flag Burning. The Washington Post (6/21, A20, 744K) editorializes, "If you haven't noticed a rash of flag-burning incidents sweeping the nation that's because, well, there isn't one. But that doesn't stop Republicans from trotting it out as a more-patriotic-than-thou card. They are, as always, close to having the votes to send it to the states for ratification." The amendment "would soil the First Amendment's command that Congress shall 'make no law...abridging the freedom of speech.' … The amendment's power is in its self-confident sweep: Speech, including expressive acts, will not be censored. Government cannot punish ideas."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Clears McClatchy Purchase Of Knight Ridder. Knight Ridder (6/21, Carey) reports, "The Justice Department has cleared McClatchy to buy Knight Ridder, after McClatchy agreed to sign a guarantee that it will sell the St. Paul Pioneer Press, according to people familiar with the process." Knight Ridder continues, "The Justice Department was concerned about McClatchy's purchase of Knight Ridder because the company would own two papers in the Twin Cities — its own Minneapolis-based Star-Tribune and Knight Ridder's Pioneer Press. … McClatchy already has a buyer lined up for the Pioneer Press: Denver-based MediaNews, which also is buying the San Jose Mercury News, Contra Costa Times and Monterey County Herald, all in California, in a complicated $1 billion deal. That deal is still under antitrust review. McClatchy was asked to guarantee that it would sell the Pioneer Press regardless of whether the sale to MediaNews is approved by regulators." Knight Ridder adds, "All that remains now for the Knight Ridder-McClatchy deal to be complete is to count the shareholder votes on Monday at Knight Ridder's annual meeting in San Jose. Eighty percent of shareholders must approve the deal. The final papers will be signed June 27., at which point Knight Ridder will cease to exist. … The Justice Department is continuing to review MediaNews' $1 billion plan to purchase the four papers, and is specifically looking at overlaps between the Contra Costa Times and MediaNews' Tri-Valley Herald. It is also reviewing the involvement of Hearst in the MediaNews purchase, because Hearst owns the San Francisco Chronicle, which competes with MediaNews in the Bay Area. Hearst is spending $263 million for the Monterey County Herald and the Pioneer Press, but will trade the two papers to MediaNews in exchange for a stake in MediaNews' assets outside the Bay Area." The San Jose Business Journal (6/21) also reports this story.

DOJ, FTC Launch E-Filing System For Pre-Merger Notification Documents. Federal Computer Week (6/21, Hubler) reports, "The Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the Federal Trade Commission announced today an electronic filing system that will allow merging companies to submit pre-merger notification filings, as required by the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act, via the Internet, eliminating the time and expense of duplicating and submitting written documents." FCW continues, "The new system ends the requirement to submit to Justice and the FTC paper copies of the required pre-merger notification form and attachments, according to a DOJ announcement."

The Dow Jones (6/21) reports, "Companies still will be allowed to file paper copies with the FTC and antitrust division, and also will be able to submit merger notification and report forms electronically along with paper copies of documentary attachments. … The electronic filing option will be available upon Federal Registry publication of the notice that makes the necessary changes to the Hart-Scott- Rodino Act's rules."

Gonzales Touts Progress In Intellectual Property Protection. The UPI (6/21) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department said Tuesday it is making progress in the fight against intellectual property piracy." UPI continues, "A new department report said all of the recommendations from an earlier task force report on intellectual property theft have been implemented. … Intellectual property theft includes the trading and online piracy of copyrighted movies, music and video games." UPI adds, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, in prepared remarks to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in Washington, said the department attempted to implement all 31 recommendations, and, 'I am proud to announce that the Department of Justice has achieved this goal.' … Gonzales cited "The 2006 Progress Report' on intellectual property theft. … Among the highlights, Gonzales said, was the fact that the task force increased the number of prosecutors in the field by not only creating the five additional Computer Hacking and Intellectual Property, or CHIP, units recommended in the 2004 report, but also created an additional seven CHIP units."

The IDG News Service (6/21, Gross) reports, "Since the Justice Department's task force made 31 recommendations for protecting intellectual property, the department has launched Computer Hacking and Intellectual Property units in seven more cities than the task force recommended. The department now has 25 CHIP units across the United States. Among the newest 12 are units in Washington, D.C., Baltimore, Denver, Detroit, and Philadelphia. … Gonzales called intellectual property the 'lifeblood' of the U.S. economy during a speech in Washington, D.C. 'We've done a lot,' he said. 'We have to do a lot more.' … The Justice Department, which released a progress report on the initiative today, has also stationed an experienced prosecutor to work on intellectual property enforcement in Southeast Asia, and will add a prosecutor in Eastern Europe. Those prosecutors will help train foreign prosecutors, investigators, and judges about intellectual property investigations, the department said."

Dow Jones (6/21) reports, "The doubling of federal prosecutions was noted in a 72-page progress report on the department's intellectual property task force, which was released this week. … Gonzales said the Justice Department has set up 25 special computer hacking and piracy units around the U.S. in the last two years, boosting the ability of government prosecutors to dismantle international and domestic counterfeiting organizations. The department also has worked with other agencies to, among other things, press China and other countries to do more in combatting illegal counterfeiting." Dow Jones notes, "Gonzales told the room of business representatives that the department has made combatting illegal counterfeiting a top agency priority, not only for artistic works but also for trademarks, trade secrets and patented products, such as pharmaceuticals and medical devices."

Broadcasting & Cable (6/21, Eggerton) reports, "In its 104-page progress report, the Task force on Intellectual Property says it has implemented recommendations made in October 2004, when it issued its initial report about what steps needed to be taken. … Content providers, arguably led by NBC Universal Chairman Bob Wright, have been pushing for stronger copyright protections and stepped-up pursuit of IP pirates, arguing they threaten hundreds of billions of dollars across a host of sectors, from counterfeit drugs to stolen TV shows, and could impede the transition to digital content distribution."

China Coming Under Pressure Over Increased Piracy. The Legal Times (6/21, Nelson) reports, "The entertainment industry hoped the counterfeiting of movies, music, software and books would plummet after China agreed in 2002 to abide by the World Trade Organization's standards for global intellectual property rights. … Instead, the industry says piracy has increased dramatically, leading some American companies to view the Chinese government as unable -- or unwilling -- to curb it. And industry lobbyists are now helping the U.S. government prepare a case that could be brought against China in the WTO's Dispute Settlement Body." The Times continues, "Earlier this month, Assistant U.S. Trade Representative Timothy Stratford told the American Industries U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission that the United States could launch a WTO case if China doesn't crack down on IP offenders. … But experts suggest that while both the industry and the government talk tough when it comes to taking on China, America may be reluctant to actually bring a complaint against the Asian superpower." The Times adds, "Pushing the industry's case is Washington's Smith & Metalitz, a deceptively small lobbying firm specializing in intellectual property. Although the firm employs just four partners, an associate and a consultant, its list of clients reads like an all-star roster of influential entertainment trade groups. The firm's secret: Smith & Metalitz plays Clark Kent to the International Intellectual Property Alliance's Superman."

Florida Officials Consider AT&T-BellSouth Merger. The Miami Herald (6/21) reports, "The Public Service Commission today is slated to consider AT&T's $67 million acquisition of BellSouth, a deal that some opponents claim will lead to reduced competition." The Herald continues, "On Monday, Florida Attorney General Charlie Crist sent a letter to the PSC urging it to ensure that merger doesn't harm competition for basic telephone service. … 'My concern here is that the merged company might squeeze out competition to the detriment of consumers, particularly seniors, and residential and small-business customers,' Crist wrote." The Herald adds, "AT&T would grow to 70 million local phone customers and nearly 10 million broad band subscribers in 22 states if the deal is completed. The merger requires approval from both companies' shareholders, the Federal Communications Commission and the Justice Department. State regulatory agencies, including the PSC, also are weighing in on the deal."

FTC Reportedly Nearing Approval Of Lockheed-Boeing Rocket Deal. The AP (6/21) reports, "Defense contractor Lockheed Martin Corp. has received a copy of a draft consent order proposed by federal antitrust regulators to approve the creation of a joint rocket venture with rival Boeing Co., which has rocket production facilities in Decatur, Ala." The AP continues, "Lockheed received the draft from the Federal Trade Commission about 10 days ago, company spokesman Tom Jurkowsky said Tuesday. He was unaware of the contents or how long Lockheed will review it before sending recommendations back to the FTC." The AP adds, "Boeing Co. has also received a copy, said Dan Beck, a company spokesman in Virginia. Beck did not know when the company would send recommendations back to the FTC. … He also said he didn't know when the FTC would approve or reject the merger announced in May 2005."

Bayer Proceeds With Schering Takeover. The AP (6/21, Rising) reports, "German drug and chemical maker Bayer AG said Tuesday it now controls enough shares of Schering AG for it to go ahead with its nearly 17 billion euros ($21.33 billion) takeover of the rival company. … 'Bayer has gained control of a total of 88.0 percent of Schering's approximately 191 million issued and outstanding shares,' Bayer said in a statement. [The attainment of a three-quarters majority was the last remaining condition of the takeover offer. Both the EU Commission and the U.S. antitrust authorities had already given their unconditional approval.'" The AP continues, "The announcement appeared to mark the final end to a merger battle over Schering between Bayer and fellow German drugmaker Merck KGaA. … Bayer's initial 16.5 billion euros ($20.7 billion) takeover bid for Schering trumped a hostile 14.9 billion euros ($18.69 billion) offer by Merck, which later said it was pulling out. … Merck then started snapping up Schering shares, making it look unlikely that Bayer would get the 75 percent stake it needed in order for the takeover to go through. … But at the last minute, Merck agreed to sell the 21.8 percent stake in Schering that it had accumulated to Bayer at a premium price of 89 euros ($111.66) per share, which bumped the total value of the takeover up to about 16.9 euros billion ($21.2 billion)."

Suits Allege Collusion On Nurses' Pay. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Maher) reports, "Four lawsuits filed in federal courts in four cities allege that hospital systems colluded to keep nurses' pay artificially low despite concerns of a nursing shortage." The Journal continues, "The suits, which seek class-action status, allege the systems shared information on pay practices with an understanding that they wouldn't outbid one another to recruit nurses." The Journal adds, "The lawsuits -- put together with the help of the Service Employees International Union, which represents nurses and others -- were filed yesterday in Chicago, San Antonio, Memphis, Tenn., and Albany, N.Y., against more than 17 hospitals and allege that they violated antitrust laws. … Several thousand nurses in each city could be eligible to participate if class-action status is granted, said Daniel Small, a partner at Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld & Toll PLLC, in Washington, D.C., which brought the suits. The accusations are based on information lawyers gathered from interviews with dozens of former and current system employees, Mr. Small said. The estimated wage losses came from economists, he said."

Studio Sues Man Over Internet Film. The Washington Post (6/21, C1, Weiss) reports, "Chris Moukarbel was intrigued by director Oliver Stone's latest project, a $60 million movie to be released this summer about two police officers rescued from the rubble of the twin towers. … But as a 28-year-old filmmaker, Moukarbel wanted to do more than simply watch Stone's 'World Trade Center.' He decided to create his own version -- using a bootleg copy of the screenplay and Yale University student actors -- and offer it free on the Internet." The Post continues, "Although his film is only 12 minutes long and doesn't have a cast to rival Nicolas Cage and Maria Bello, it has brought the power of Hollywood down on him. … Paramount Pictures is suing Moukarbel in U.S. District Court in Washington, asking the court to prohibit the distribution of his movie. 'He's free to make any World Trade Center movie he wants to make, but not our movie with our script,' said Nancy Kirkpatrick, a Paramount spokeswoman." The Journal adds, "According to its lawsuit, which was filed Friday, the studio is afraid that people will see the student film on the Internet and confuse it with the big-time Hollywood version set to hit 1,500 screens on Aug. 9 and backed up with a $40 million marketing campaign."

Televisa Group Is Early Favorite In Univision Auction. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Berman, Sender, Lyons) reports, "The two groups bidding for Univision Communications Inc. were last night preparing offers near the range of the company's current stock price of $35.40 a share, valuing the broadcasting concern at around $11 billion, people familiar with the matter said." The Journal continues, "As in any auction, the prices offered in the first round can differ substantially from final offers. But bidders are coping with skittish debt markets and banks that have reined in their lending in recent weeks. That has made it harder for buyers to reach the $40-a-share price that Univision, the nation's largest Spanish-language broadcaster by audience, first hoped to reach." The Journal adds, "The group widely viewed as the favorite to win -- consisting of Mexican broadcaster Televisa SA, Venezuela's Venevision Investments LLC and private-equity shops Bain Capital, Blackstone Group, Cascade Investments, and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. -- was last night discussing an offer below Univision's current market price, though that could rise to at or around market at the last moment, these people said. Televisa already owns 11% of Univision. … Another group -- Texas Pacific Group Inc., Thomas H. Lee Partners, Madison Dearborn Partners LLC, Providence Equity Partners Inc. and media mogul Haim Saban -- was preparing an offer in the $35 range, people familiar with the matter said. That is at or below where Univision's class A shares stood yesterday -- at $35.40, down 30 cents for the day -- in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading."

EU Antitrust Head Endorses China's Anti-Monopoly Law. The AP (6/21) reports, "European Union antitrust chief Neelie Kroes said Tuesday that China's move to adopt an anti-monopoly law would help benefit China's economy by attracting more business investors." The AP continues, "The EU Competition Commissioner made the comments after talks with China's Vice Minister of Commerce Ma Xiuhong at EU headquarters. … 'This is an important step toward an effective competition regime,' Kroes said in a statement. 'The Chinese economy will benefit from the implementation of a sound competition policy, as will any company seeking to do business in China.'" The AP adds, "The Chinese Cabinet endorsed a draft anti-monopoly law on June 8 aimed at boosting fair competition after decades of domination by state industry. Foreign business groups, however, have expressed concern that it might be used to restrict or interfere with their investments. … Beijing officials said the proposed legislation would not discriminate between domestic and foreign companies. China began drafting the law in 1994 and a first draft was completed in 2003. … But progress was stymied by controversy over how to carry out enforcement, given the prevalence of state-owned monopolies or semi-monopolies in many industries. The draft law still needs the backing of China's legislature before it can become law."

Former Firefighter Pleads Guilty To Setting Nevada Fires. The AP (6/21) reports, "An ex-firefighter has pleaded guilty to setting three wildfires that burned hundreds of acres of national forest in central Nevada last August, a federal prosecutor said Monday." The AP continues, "Mark E. Morgan worked temporarily with a U.S. Bureau of Land Management crew. Investigators said he started the fires because he was bored and needed the paycheck. … Morgan, 34, faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine, and he could be required to pay restitution, U.S. Attorney Daniel G. Bogden said in a statement. He entered the plea Thursday. Sentencing was set for October." The AP adds, "The fires in the Humboldt-Toiyabe National Forest in Lander County, about 170 miles east of Reno, burned more than 550 acres of timber, brush and grassland. Two miles of fence also burned, but no injuries were reported. … When questioned by investigators, Morgan admitted starting two fires with a cigarette lighter and the third with a flare gun."

Draft National Parks Regs Make Conservation A Priority. Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne has issued new draft guidelines for managing the national parks. According to the Washington Post (6/21, A19, Eilperin, 744K) reports, the draft guidelines "make conservation the top priority -- ahead of recreation and energy development." The Post said the proposed guidelines "pleased environmentalists but angered off-road vehicle users, who said they fear that the Interior Department is modeling its practices after those of the Clinton administration."

Leonhardt Says Government Should Encourage Purchase Of Fuel-Efficient Cars. David Leonhardt writes in the New York Times (6/21, 1.19M) that "since the start of the year, the federal government has been giving generous tax credits to hybrid buyers." The "point of a tax policy like this…is to give people an incentive to change their behavior, and persuading Americans to use less oil certainly sounds like one of Washington's priorities these days." Leonhardt suggests the government should "set up a simple system of rewards and penalties — with the single goal of reducing oil use, regardless of the means — and then let the marketplace work it out. Economists tend to prefer a gas tax, but it's not the only option. … The Big Three have the engineering expertise to build vehicles that can go a long way on a gallon of gas. If Washington would only nudge people to buy cars like that, Detroit would start making them."

Redesign Of Federal Ethanol Incentives Urged. David Morris, vice president of the Institute for Local Self-Reliance, writes in the New York Times (6/21, 1.19M), "Congress is considering several bills to extend the 51-cent-per-gallon tax credit for ethanol producers beyond its 2010 expiration date. But let's hope that our elected representatives don't make their decision in the grips of an ethanol haze. … How might Washington redesign the federal incentive to reflect the realities of an increasingly competitive absentee-owned, large-scale ethanol industry? First, tie incentive levels to an index comprised of the price of a bushel of corn and the wholesale price of a gallon of gasoline. … Second, transform part of the federal incentive from a gas tax exemption for those who market the ethanol into a direct payment to those who produce it."

Eminent Domain Actions Surge In Wake Of Kelo Decision. The Washington Times (6/21, Price, 90K) reports on a 100 page report form the Institute of Justice which says the Supreme Court's ruling last year on eminent domain has "opened the floodgates" to eminent domain actions nationwide. The Times reports, "In the year since the Kelo decision, nearly 6,000 properties nationwide have been threatened or taken under that precedent, more than half the number that had been seized over a previous five-year period," according to the report.

Report Says Government Funding Insufficient For Avian Flu Monitoring. ABC World News Tonight (6/20, story 9, 0:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Agriculture Department's inspector general says the government does not now have adequate measures in place to monitor for the deadly H5N1 strain of the bird flu. That strain has killed 130 people worldwide but has never been detected in North America. Officials in charge of watching out for the virus says they have received more funding to improve surveillance in the future, but it is insufficient right now."

The New York Times (6/21, McNeil, 1.19M) reports the audit found that the department "relied too heavily on voluntary testing by the poultry industry and reports from state agriculture departments." A USDA spokeswoman, Hallie Pickhardt, said that the agency "agreed with everything in the report, and we're either doing it or going to be doing it." The audit "began before Congress passed President Bush's plan for dealing with a pandemic flu outbreak, which gave the department an additional $91 million to fight avian flu," Pickhardt noted. However, she said the agency "had no plans to make the voluntary testing now conducted by the poultry industry mandatory."

Veterans Agency Releases Bird Flu Plan. The AP (6/21, Bridges) reports the Department of Veterans Affairs said Tuesday it would close its national cemeteries in the event of a bird flu pandemic "because of staffing shortages, leaving families to delay burial or seek interment elsewhere." According to a draft plan, the veterans health care system would "continue treating veterans at its hospitals and clinics, and would provide care to active-duty military personnel and civilians if necessary."

US Falls Behind In Livestock Tracking. In a front page article, the Wall Street Journal (6/21, A1, Stecklow, 2.11M) reports that "more than two years" after the US Department of Agriculture "pledged to hasten creation of a national identification system for tracing livestock quickly during a disease outbreak" the US "still has no national ID system." The USDA, which has been spent a decade and $84.7 million to develop it, "now says one will begin operating next year." However, the agency has "abandoned the idea of mandatory participation, leaving critics to cast doubt on that projection." USDA officials "express confidence that market forces, including pressure from big beef buyers and export markets, will help drive cattle owners to register their animals." But the Journal reports that "a number of animal-health experts and several former USDA officials scoff at a voluntary system," saying many ranchers, "fearing legal liability if their animals are found to be diseased, will participate only if the system is mandatory."

Japan Agrees To Lift Ban On US Beef. The AP (6/21, Yamaguchi) reports Japan agreed Wednesday to lift its ban on US beef imports, "pending planned inspections of US meat processing plants," the agriculture ministry said. The AP says the announcement "resolves a thorny, long-running trade dispute between the allies, and gives US ranchers access to what was once their most lucrative export market."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Newly-Released Files Reveal Extensive FBI Surveillance Of Arthur Miller. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/21, Italie) reports on the FBI's files on playwright Arthur Miller, "obtained by The Associated Press through the Freedom of Information Act. … For a decade before his congressional testimony" before HUAC in 1956, "the FBI kept track of the playwright, but ended up making a more convincing case that Miller was a dissenter from the Communist Party rather than a sympathizer. 'Miller became disillusioned with the party because the party did not stimulate in him the ability and inspiration to do creative writing as he had expected when he joined the Party,' one informant told the FBI." The AP notes, "The FBI not only kept records of Miller's political statements, from his opposition to nuclear weapons to his attacks against the anti-communist blacklist, but of his affiliation with such organizations as the American Labor Party ('a communist front') and the 'communist infiltrated' American Civil Liberties Union."

FBI Adds Fugitive Nevada Murder Suspect To Most Wanted List. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/21, Sonner) reports, "The mothers of both the victim and the husband accused of killing her were among some 500 mourners who attended Charla Mack's private funeral service Tuesday as the FBI added Darren Mack to its list of 'Most Wanted' fugitives. … The FBI gave Mack top billing on it's Web site list for 'Most Wanted' fugitives, describing" him "as a bodybuilder and hunter with 'access to all types of weapons. He should be considered 'armed and dangerous,' FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III said." The AP notes, "Authorities said they were uncertain whether Mack had fled the country. Mueller said anyone with information on Mack should contact the FBI or the nearest U.S. Embassy or Consulate." KVBC-TV Las Vegas (6/20) and KLAS-TV Las Vegas (6/20) also report on the FBI's addition of Mack to the Most Wanted fugitive list.

Police Found Explosive Materials In Mack's Apartment. The Reno Gazette-Journal (6/20, Bellisle) reported that a search warrant revealed "Darren Mack had bombmaking materials in his bedroom. The materials, when mixed together and attached to a blasting cap or shot at, will explode, said Washoe County sheriff's Sgt. Lou Gazes…who was at Mack's apartment. … During a search of Mack's apartment after the shooting and stabbing, police also found ammunition, notes and printed material that 'contain allegations that Judge Weller was corrupt and had exhibited favoritism in his rulings,' according to the search warrant affidavit."

Joint Effort Announced To Track Use Of Fentanyl-Laced Heroin. From Philadelphia, the AP (6/20, Loviglio) reports city state and federal law enforcement and public health officials on Tuesday "announced a joint regional effort to track the ongoing deaths attributed to painkiller-laced heroin and identify the suppliers of the drug. The fentanyl-laced heroin has caused about 70 deaths in the Philadelphia metropolitan region and more than 200 overdoses nationwide since it was first spotted in April," according to U.S. Attorney Patrick J. Meehan. "To determine the full scope of the problem in the region, officials representing law enforcement in Philadelphia and Camden County, N.J.; the federal Drug Enforcement Agency and the FBI; and Philadelphia's behavioral health department said they would share information and coordinate their investigations into the spike of fentanyl-related deaths since the spring."

The Gloucester County (NJ)Times (6/20, Mccarthy) reports on the death of a 20-year-old that may be linked to heroin laced with fentanyl.

Reporting Continues On Decline Of Illegal Drug Use Among US Workers. Bloomberg (6/20) reports, "Barry Sample, director of science and technology in Quest's employer solutions division, said he was encouraged by the findings, especially the drop in amphetamine use found among general workforce employees. About 75 percent of these tests are given before employment, and 10 percent are random screenings, he said."

California's Contra Costa Times (6/20) editorializes, "The Bush administration reported Monday that there has been a major decline in the number of meth lab seizures nationwide. … It is possible that the meth lab people are getting smarter and hiding their labs better or that the police don't have the adequate manpower to search for the labs and, therefore, the seizures have dropped. It is also possible that meth users have found ways to get around the drug tests."

Missoula, Montana's New West (6/20) writes, "New federal reports from the Drug Enforcement Administration say that use of methamphetamines is declining in some Western states, but officials in the energy industry in Utah say it's on the rise, so where are we in the fight against this destructive drug?"

Missouri Leads Nation In Meth Lab Seizures. The AP/KWMU (6/20) reports, "Despite a 22% decline from last year, Missouri still leads the nation in police seizures of illegal meth labs. Missouri is one of at least 37 states with laws that restrict the sale of cold medications."

$8 Million To Be Used To Combat Arizona Meth Problems. The Arizona Republic (6/20) writes, "State lawmakers have agreed to pump $8 million toward tackling meth addiction, crafting a plan to beef up law enforcement and provide money for prevention, treatment and education programs. The idea: Disrupt the flow and sale of meth in local communities while teaching children about the evils of meth before they are tempted to try the drug."

US Asks Suriname To Extradite Suspect Wanted On Drug Charges. The AP (6/21) reports a U.S. Embassy spokesman said Tuesday that the U.S. "has asked Suriname to extradite a Guyanese man wanted on drug charges in New York. Shaheed Khan was arrested Thursday by authorities in Suriname. He is accused of leading a criminal network that smuggled arms, ammunition and cocaine from Colombia to Europe and the United States via Guyana and Suriname."

Attorney Pleads Guilty In Virginia Marijuana Case. The Richmond (VA)Times Dispatch (6/21) reports, "A criminal-defense attorney appeared in federal court yesterday as a criminal defendant and pleaded guilty to peddling marijuana. Jeremy Clyde Sharp, 35, faces up to five years in prison…when he is sentenced on Sept. 20…on one count of conspiracy to possess marijuana with the intent to distribute it. … When Sharp's …home was searched in early February, investigators from the Drug Enforcement Administration, Henrico County police and Virginia Commonwealth University police also found the remains of a dismantled marijuana-growing operation."

Selig Against MLB Saving Samples To Deter Use Of Human Growth Hormone. According to the New York Times (6/21, Curry), several scientists, including Dr. Donald H. Catlin, who baseball officials "appointed to research a test for the hormone known as HGH, have said that such a search could be arduous. A possible option to deter HGH use would be to save urine samples already collected by baseball. If players knew there was a possibility they could be punished at a future date for drugs they had used in the past, the frozen samples might be a deterrent." However, the Times says Commissioner Bud Selig has dismissed the notion.

UN: Colombia's Coca Production Has Increased Despite Eradication Efforts. The AP (6/21) reports the United Nations "says production of the plant used to make cocaine has increased by 8 percent in Colombia, despite record drug seizures and spraying of herbicides. A similar report by the U.S. Office of National Drug Control Policy showed Colombia's coca production skyrocketed 26 percent from 2004 to 2005, in part due to a near-doubling of the area surveyed." According to the AP, the two reports "are the strongest evidence yet that a cornerstone of the U.S.-led war on drugs -- the aerial fumigation of coca fields -- is failing to meet its goal of halving coca production in the Andes."

In a similar but longer version of the story, the AP (6/20) writes, "Although production is on the rise in Colombia, the U.N. said it declined in Peru and Bolivia. Coca production in Bolivia fell by 8 percent last year, according to the U.N. The United States, however, is concerned Bolivia's leftist, coca-growing President Evo Morales _ who took office in January _ could relax his country's drug-fighting efforts." There are more than 100 media references to the report on Colombia's increased coca production. The AP story was published by CBS News, FOX News, the New York Times, Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, San Diego Union Tribune, Houston Chronicle, and UK's Guardian.

On its Web site, the BBC (6/20) reports, "The production of coca, the raw material for cocaine, reached 86,000 hectares last year, UNODC found. Despite the rise, it is half of Colombia's cultivation in 2000, which then stood at 163,000 hectares. Colombia needs more international help to find alternative livelihoods for ex-coca farmers, one of the report's authors, Anja Korenblik, said."

Bridgeport, CT, Mayor Admits Using Cocaine. The AP (6/21) reports Bridgeport Mayor John M. Fabrizi publicly "admitted Tuesday that he had abused cocaine while in office. The admission followed the inadvertent court filing of an FBI document in which an alleged drug dealer claimed an associate had a videotape of the mayor using cocaine. In a tearful speech to about 200 city employees in City Council chambers Tuesday, Fabrizi said he had not used drugs in 18 months and had sought help for a drug addiction that he had hoped to handle privately."

The New York Times (6/21, Cowan) reports, "His emotional admission followed months of rumors and the disclosure last week of a court document filed by federal prosecutors suggesting that he had used cocaine with a local Democratic official. The news of his problems was the latest black eye for this troubled city, whose last mayor, Joseph P. Ganim, a Democrat, was convicted on bribery, extortion and other corruption charges and is now serving a nine-year federal prison term."

The Connecticut Post (6/20) writes, "Fabrizi said flatly, 'Over the course of a number of years I abused alcohol and used cocaine occasionally.' Admitting he used cocaine during his time in office as both City Council president and later as mayor, he said he has not used drugs in 18 months."

Texas Prosecutors Seek To Remove Councilman From Office Due To Cocaine Record. The AP (6/20) reports Galveston County prosecutors "have filed a petition to remove a recently elected city council member who was convicted in 2000 on felony cocaine charges. State election law usually prevents someone who has been convicted of a felony from running for or being elected to office. Marc Hoskins, 28, was elected in May and had disclosed his past to the city attorney before the election."

The Houston Chronicle (6/20, Rendon) and Galveston County Daily News (6/20) also reported on efforts to remove Hoskins from office.

West Virginia Attorney Denied Bond On Firearms Violations. The Charleston (WV) Gazette (6/21, Searls) reports, "Evidence shows Charleston lawyer Dante di Trapano could be a danger to the community and regularly violates bond conditions, a federal judge ruled Tuesday in denying di Trapano's bond request." The Gazette continues, "U.S. Magistrate Mary Stanley said di Trapano, 43, had 'demonstrated time and time again that he is not willing to comply' with bond conditions and has 'shown total disrespect for the law' in an order denying him bond." The Gazette adds, "Di Trapano was indicted last week on single counts of being a drug addict in possession of firearms and for allegedly lying on a federal form by stating he was not addicted to drugs when he purchased a gun in February. … Federal agents found eight guns inside di Trapano's South Hills residence in April. Charleston Police Detective Tim Palmer, who is working with federal agents, testified that while the guns were loaded, all were in a gun safe or locked up. … Di Trapano's attorney, Michael Del Giudice, pointed out that none of the prosecutors' witnesses testified di Trapano had been violent, and said his client should be released. … Stanley disagreed and set an Aug. 23 trial date for di Trapano before Chief U.S. District Judge David Faber. Di Trapano is expected to remain in jail until then."

Maryland Man Indicted For Abortion Clinic Bomb Plot. The AP (6/21) reports, "A Maryland man accused of plotting to attack an abortion clinic with a pipe bomb and handgun was indicted Monday on weapons and explosives charges, the U.S. attorney's office said." The AP continues, "A federal grand jury indicted Robert Weiler, 25, on charges of possessing and making an unregistered destructive device, illegally possessing a firearm, and possessing a stolen firearm. … Weiler called the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives on June 8 from a western Maryland highway rest stop to confess to the plan, according to court documents. He told authorities he had built a pipe bomb, stolen a handgun from a friend and planned to attack an abortion clinic in suburban Washington. … That morning, the pipe bomb exploded in a house belonging to a friend of Weiler as a bomb technician tried to defuse it. No one was hurt, but the bomb set fire to the house. … Each count carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison. A preliminary hearing is set for Thursday."

IMMIGRATION:

Political Appointment Of Immigration Judges Comes Under Scrutiny. The Legal Times (6/21, McLure) reports, "It's just after 2 p.m. and Immigration Judge Garry Malphrus is looking at a long afternoon of deporting illegal immigrants. He punches a button on a tape recorder and intones: 'Respondent was scheduled for a master calendar hearing at 9 a.m. It is now 2:20 p.m.' Malphrus notes the immigrant's failure to appear, asks a lone Immigration and Customs Enforcement lawyer if an attempt has been made to contact the government (the inevitable response: 'no'), and then formally orders the immigrant's removal from the United States. Stop tape. … The routine continues for the better part of an hour. Next file. Repeat script. Stop tape." The Times continues, "Watching this tedious exercise, it's hard to imagine that being appointed a federal immigration judge would be considered a political plum. But that's how these career civil service jobs are increasingly treated, say immigration lawyers who practice before the courts. Malphrus, a former White House aide and Republican campaign veteran, had never practiced immigration law when he joined the bench last year. … 'The Bush administration has realized these are great jobs and maybe [it] shouldn't be left up to the civil service to determine who gets a job,' says Charles Kuck, a vice president of the American Immigration Lawyers Association. 'I believe that these folks without prior immigration experience tend not to be good judges.'" The Times adds, "Whether they're great jobs is a matter of opinion. But with the immigration courts under scrutiny by Congress and the attorney general after a series of federal appellate decisions blasting the courts as sloppy and inept, the issue of just who serves in an office with enormous influence over the lives of immigrants has received scant attention. And the practice of appointing judges with no immigration law experience is condemned by lawyers in the field, who say the complexity of immigration laws means judges such as Malphrus do their training on the job."

Hazelton, PA, Poised To Crack Down On Illegal Immigrants. The AP (6/21, Rubinkam) reports, "-With tensions rising and the police department and municipal budget stretched thin, Hazleton (PA) is about to embark on one of the toughest crackdowns on illegal immigrants anywhere in the United States." The AP continues, "Last week the mayor of this former coal town introduced, and the City Council tentatively approved, a measure that would revoke the business licenses of companies that employ illegal immigrants; impose $1,000 fines on landlords who rent to illegal immigrants; and make English the official language of the city. … 'Illegal immigrants are destroying the city,' said Mayor Lou Barletta, a Republican. 'I don't want them here, period.'" The AP adds, "Barletta said he had no choice but to act after two illegal immigrants from the Dominican Republic were charged last month with shooting and killing a 29-year-old man. Other recent incidents involving illegal immigrants have rattled this city 80 miles northwest of Philadelphia, including the arrest of a 14-year-old boy for firing a gun at a playground. … The City Council, which approved the measure in a 4-1 vote, must vote on it twice more before it can become law. The next vote is scheduled for mid-July."

House Hearings On Immigration Bill Seen As "Death Knell" For Bush Reform Plan. The Chicago Tribune (6/21, James, 643K) reports, "In a move that could sound the death knell for immigration-reform legislation in Congress this year, House Republican leaders said Tuesday they plan to hold numerous hearings on the issue this summer and only then start talks with the Senate that might lead to a final bill." The delay "raises the likelihood that Congress will end the year without passing major immigration legislation that President Bush has supported. That would be a signal defeat for the president."

The AP (6/21, Espo) reports, "In a defeat for President Bush, Republican congressional leaders said Tuesday that broad immigration legislation is all but doomed for the year, a victim of election-year concerns in the House and conservatives' implacable opposition to citizenship for millions of illegal immigrants." The AP adds that "in deference to the president," neither Speaker Dennis Hastert "nor any other Republican official in either house said publicly that the president's ambitious plan -- including a guest worker program as well as an opportunity for citizenship for many illegal immigrants -- was dead for the year." But "several Republicans in both houses, speaking on condition of anonymity, were less guarded. 'There will be no path to citizenship,' said one lawmaker who attended a strategy session in Hastert's office."

The Washington Times (6/21, Hurt, 90K) reports, "Aides in both the House and Senate said yesterday the developments mean immigration legislation is essentially dead for the year," and the New York Times (6/21, Hulse, 1.19M) says the hearings puts "an overhaul of immigration laws in serious doubt," adding "a White House spokeswoman said Mr. Bush would press for legislation. 'The president is undeterred in his efforts to pass a comprehensive immigration reform bill,' said the spokeswoman, Dana Perino, who said the White House was 'committed to working with members to see if we can reach a consensus on a bill that will help solve our nation's immigration problems.'"

USA Today (6/21, Kiely, 2.31M) quotes Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean saying, "Before the speaker will appoint conferees, he wants to get to the bottom of the Senate Kennedy bill." Bonjean's "characterization of the Senate bill, identifying it with Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, an icon of Democratic liberalism, reflects the deep divisions in the Republican Party over immigration."

The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Lueck, 2.11M) says the move "clouds the prospects for Congress to complete overhaul legislation before the November elections," while the Washington Post (6/21, A1, Weisman, Murray, 744K) says it "could bury…Bush's high-profile effort to overhaul immigration law until after the midterm elections." The announcement "was the clearest sign yet that House Republicans have largely given up on passing a broad rewrite of the nation's immigration laws this year." Roll Call (6/21, Ben Pershing) runs a similar report under the headline "Immigration Bill Chances Fading." The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Gaouette, 958K) also reports the story.

Dana Milbank in his "Washington Sketch" column in the Washington Post (6/21, A2, 744K) criticizes both parties for engaging in partisan political attacks rather than making serious progress on Iraq, immigration and the minimum wage. In response to Republican claims that Democrats wanted to "Cut and run" on Iraq, On Imus in the morning Sen. John Kerry said "My plan is not cut and run. Their plan is lie and die." Meanwhile on the cable news shows RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman said, "There's a debate going on within the Democratic Party. … Some are saying we need to cut and run, others are saying we need to cut and jog, and still others are saying we need to cut and walk." His "metaphor may have been muddled – 'cut and run' involves anchor cable and sail lashings, not the human leg -- but he had lawmakers' sentiments right. If Democrats were cutting and running from Iraq, Republicans were cutting and running from a minimum-wage increase and immigration legislation."

Gutierrez Makes Case For Reform. The Hill (6/21, O'Connor) reports Bush "has toured the border in recent weeks with congressional Republicans, and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez is touring parts of New Mexico and Texas this week to push the president's comprehensive reform plan. 'We need to have comprehensive reform,' Gutierrez said in a phone interview from Odessa, Texas. 'In order to secure our borders, we need to secure our interior and enforce employers.'" Gutierrez "echoed Bush's contention that border enforcement is the primary goal of any reform measure but that it is impossible to address enforcement realistically without accounting for the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already in this country." The commerce secretary "said it is imperative for Congress to work together in resolving this complicated issue and find a workable solution on which all sides could agree."

Mehlman Says Securing Borders A Priority, But Comprehensive Reform Is Goal. RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman on CNN's The Situation Room (6/20, Blitzer) was asked whether the failure of Republicans to proceed with a conference on the immigration bill was a sign Republicans wanted immigration "as an issue and don't want to compromise." Mehlman replied, "I don't think that's the case. Think of what Congress passed last week. They passed a significant amount of money for more personnel at the border, more technology at the border, and more barriers. The President, the House, Senate and Republicans all agree we need to secure our borders, first. But the President also believes and I think he's right, we want to do more than deal with the immediate problem. We want to fundamentally make sure that the reason we have so much illegal immigration in this country."

Former Illegal Supports Tightening Border. The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Bustillo, 958K) reports on Evaristo Silva, an apple farm owner who came to the US as an illegal immigrant and became a citizen after President Regan's Amnesty. Silva is for tightening the borders and a guest worker program, a "stance…largely based on his own bottom line." He says "if half of Latin America keeps coming…you will reach a point where we don't all fit." Sliva also notes increasing urban problems and a decreasing quality of life.

LATimes Says GOP Politicizing Immigration Debate. The Los Angeles Times (6/21, 958K) editorializes that you can tell "a governing party is running out of steam" if "it controls all branches of government yet abandons even the pretense of addressing an issue most members claim is a 'crisis'," as the GOP-led House did in postponing reconciliation of the immigration bills. "House GOP leaders can barely conceal their preference for divisive politics over sound policy," and are naming "field meetings," which "are nonsense," in order to "deliver maximum demagogic effect." These "Republicans…prefer clinging to the dangerous fantasy that a massive, militarized wall must be approved before discussions can even begin over what to do with the millions of indispensable, but vilified, workers already here," and "If inaction and xenophobia are all the party has left, this could be its last 100 days."

More Commentary. Lawrence Downes writes in the New York Times (6/21, 1.19M), "The arguments made by hard-line critics of immigration reform are depressingly simple, which makes them simply depressing. They boil down to this: the immigration problems we have today, and a vast array of other problems, begin and end with immigrants themselves, the people who have committed the offense of being here illegally -- or just being here, period, in undesirable numbers, with undesirable habits and undesirable effects on the health of the nation. Their presence here is seen as overwhelmingly if not entirely bad, an unpardonable offense for which American citizens are made to suffer. … It will be solved by keeping people out, and kicking people out. … It's no wonder some people compare immigrant workers to locusts, bacteria or an occupying army." Downes remarks on the "disturbing role played by fear" in the debate. Downes concludes, "It's dangerous. It's not rational. But the argument on the restrictionist side isn't about being rational. It's about being afraid."

TAX:

Wyoming Man Pleads Guilty To Colorado Tax Fraud Scheme. The Denver Business Journal (6/21) reports, "A Wyoming businessman has pleaded guilty for his part in a tax fraud scheme that began in Denver." The Journal continues, "Russell J. Brown pleaded guilty in federal court in Seattle to aiding and assisting in the filing of a false tax return for Paul Bekins, the former president and majority owner of a Seattle moving company. … Brown and Bekins were both members of Tower Executive Resources, a Denver-based organization that helped its members evade paying federal income taxes, according to the U.S. Department of Justice. The organization helped its members set up offshore bank accounts and corporations to hide income from the Internal Revenue Service. … Taxpayers paid as much as $50,000 to join Tower, the justice department alleged." The Journal adds, "Bekins previously entered a guilty plea. He was sentenced last year to six months of house arrest, followed by 18 months of supervised release and 300 hours of community service. The Justice Department said Bekins listed his 'other income' in 1999 as $77,515 when it was actually $2.6 million. … The government said Brown helped Bekins avoid paying $1.3 million in federal income taxes. … Brown will be sentenced later this year."

California Man Charged With $20 Million Tax Fraud. The AP (6/21) reports, "A businessman who has donated hundreds of thousands of dollars to local colleges and nonprofits is accused of defrauding the government of more than $20 million in taxes." The AP continues, "Gene Haas, the 54-year-old owner of Oxnard (CA)-based Haas Automation, was arrested Monday for investigation of conspiracy, filing false tax returns and witness intimidation. … Charges filed by the U.S. Attorney's Office accuse him of orchestrating a plan to list $50 million in bogus expenses that could be written off as business costs and save the company $20 million in taxes. Haas, of Camarillo, was being held without bail." The AP adds, "Haas Automation, which makes computerized machine tools, said in a statement that Haas was not guilty and that the tax issues 'revolve around' the company's former financial officer, John Phillips. … Last month, Haas Automation by default won a Ventura County Superior Court lawsuit accusing Phillips of cheating the company out of $27.5 million."

GOP Leaders To Push Compromise Estate Tax Legislation. The Washington Post (6/21, A4, Weisman, 744K) reports, "Republican leaders announced yesterday that the House will vote this week on estate tax legislation that falls short of full repeal, conceding defeat on a philosophical issue that has been central to the GOP economic plank for more than a decade." The bill, introduced by House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas, "marks a major turnaround for congressional Republicans, who for years have made 'Death to the death tax' a political battle cry." The Post adds, "Senior House Republicans conceded that a long-sought permanent repeal of the estate tax is now out of reach. And with the possibility that Republicans will lose Senate seats in the midterm elections in November, GOP tax writers decided to grab the most lucrative deal possible in case Republican power begins to ebb."

The New York Times (6/21, Andrews, 1.19M) reports, "The latest proposal would eliminate the tax for all estates worth less than $5 million -- up to $10 million for couples." That "would cover more than 99.5 percent of estates, according to Congressional estimates. In addition, the compromise would reduce the tax rates on the few estates that would still be subject to a tax." The House proposal" is aimed at giving Senate Republican leaders another chance of passing legislation. Last week, Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, acknowledged that he could not pass a full repeal bill and would wait until the House voted on a new proposal before trying again in the Senate." The House bill "is similar to a compromise that Senate Republicans circulated two weeks ago, without success. But it includes a tax cut that would save timber companies about $900 million over the next three years, a new twist that could win as many as four more Democratic votes in the Senate."

IRS Collects Just Over 10% Of Fines On Preparers. USA Today (6/21, McCoy, 2.31M) reports that the IRS has collected just over 10% of every dollar in fines it has assessed on tax preparers since 2003. During the last three fiscal years, "the IRS fined 528 tax preparers roughly $4.7 million for taking unsubstantiated deductions, cashing clients' tax refunds or other violations of tax laws. But a USA TODAY review found the agency has so far collected about $518,000 of the penalties, or 11%. Roughly half the penalized preparers have paid nothing, while half have paid some or all their fines, according to the IRS."

IRS To Hire Private Debt Collectors. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Herman, 2.11M) reports in its "Tax Report" column that the IRS is resuming plans to hire private debt collection forms to collect large sums of unpaid taxes. The IRS "said this week it received the green light to proceed with the project's first phase -- in which three firms will begin pursuing about 40,000 people -- when the Government Accountability Office, a congressional investigative agency, rejected challenges by companies not awarded IRS contracts." The IRS plans "eventually to hire as many as 10 firms by 2008, when the program will be fully operational." Over the course of 10 years, "the IRS expects the private firms to help it collect an additional $1.4 billion in unpaid taxes."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Passes Pentagon Budget After Rejecting NSA Surveillance Cut. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, A8, Rogers, 2.11M) reports the House voted 407-19 to pass a $427.6 billion Pentagon budget, which includes an additional $50 billion for Iraq operations, "after narrowly rejecting," 219-207, "a bipartisan effort to curb funding" for the NSA's warrantless surveillance program. While Rep. John Murtha said he "now felt 'comfortable there are adequate safeguards,'" and House Intelligence Chairman Peter Hoekstra pledged a summer hearing on "a new legal framework for the program," 23 Republicans still "broke ranks in support" of the amendment, "which directly challenged President Bush by proposing to bar funding" for any domestic electronic surveillance that does not comply with FISA-required court review. The Journal says the "length and emotion of the House debate testified to the continued concern in Congress that the White House has been unilaterally circumventing the need to seek warrants under FISA."

Flake Attempts To Strip Hastert Earmark From Defense Bill. The Hill (6/21, Allen) reports, "Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) escalated his anti-earmark crusade yesterday by attempting to strip a request by Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) out of a defense appropriations bill." Flake "offered an amendment designed to kill a $2.5 million provision intended for a technology organization created by one of Hastert's former aides. The amendment, one of about 10 he offered, was expected to fail miserably as of press time." The earmark "is for the Illinois Technology Transition Center, a program established late last year through a partnership between the Pentagon and a private outfit run by Thomas V. Thornton, a former policy director for Hastert in the early '90s. Neither Thornton nor Hastert's office replied to requests for comment on the earmark."

Senate Panel Approves Bill Designed To Cut Federal Spending. The AP (6/21, Taylor) reports, "In an election-year bid to polish their credentials as fiscal conservatives in an election year, Senate Republicans on Tuesday advanced a bill designed to force cuts in the spiraling growth of federal benefit programs while also reviving the line-item veto." The measure, written by Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg and "approved by that panel by a 12-10 party-line vote, combines several ideas aimed at putting the brakes on spending. Most striking, the bill would force mandatory cuts to the deficit, enforced by across-the-board cuts to benefit programs such as Medicare, Medicaid and unemployment insurance if Congress can't meet deficit targets on its own." Gregg "acknowledged that his bill won't pass the full Senate, and Republicans seem to welcome the prospect of a filibuster by Democrats." That "would allow them to accuse Democrats of being weak on controlling spending while sparing Republican moderates from having to vote on the bill's more controversial elements."

The Washington Times (6/21, Hill, 90K) reports the bill "would reinstate spending disciplines, including caps on non-entitlement programs, that helped balance the budget in the 1980s and 1990s. It would require the White House to order across-the-board spending cuts in every program but Social Security if Congress did not achieve the deficit-reduction goals." The committee "rejected an amendment by Democrats that would have reinstated required offsets to tax cuts and new spending programs, though former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan and other budget analysts said the policy helped Congress take control over the deficit in the 1990s." Roll Call (6/21, Rosenbaum) also reports the story.

GOP Sen. Judd Gregg, chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, writes in a Washington Times op-ed titled "Stop Federal Overspending" (6/21) that "the federal budget process is ailing. In fact, it is on life support. … It is time to get serious about spending restraint and resurrect the budget process to protect future generations and ensure that we hand our children, and our children's children, a government they can afford."

WSJournal Criticizes Democrats' "Pay-As-You-Go" Budgeting. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, 2.11M) editorializes on the Democrats' "ruse" that "goes by the name of 'pay-as-you-go' budgeting, which has the political virtue of sounding as if spending won't be able to exceed revenue." The Democrats' "Web site, HouseDemocrats.gov, claims that pay-as-you-go policy 'means that spending increases, as well as tax cuts, need to be offset by cuts in other areas -- like fewer corporate tax breaks.' A three-card monte dealer in Times Square couldn't have said it better. Paygo rules, to use the Beltway argot, were in place from 1990 until they expired in 2002, so we know how they work. And in practice all they really do is constrain tax cuts, not new spending. … The House Democratic agenda promises 'a new direction for America.' But when it comes to paygo and fiscal policy, the only change is their political marketing."

Senate Panel May Not Hold Paulson Hearing Until June 27. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (6/20, 2.11M) reported, "While the White House is pushing for the Senate to confirm Henry M. Paulson Jr. as Treasury secretary, the Senate Finance Committee may not hold his confirmation hearing until June 27 at the earliest, setting up a tight schedule for the full Senate to vote on his nomination before the July 4 recess."

Hastert Unlikely To Get Lobbying Overhaul By July 4. CQ (6/20, Kady) reported, "With no easy avenues for compromise on stripping unidentifiable earmarks out of bills or clamping down on so-called 527 groups, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert seems unlikely to get the lobbying overhaul he wants completed by July Fourth. … But Hastert, R-Ill., said he was not willing to back down on the provision regarding the '527' groups that run political advertisements but are free from many disclosure requirements, even if relenting would mean a quick agreement on the legislation (S 2349, HR 4975) that was intended to inoculate Republicans against election-year ethics attacks in the wake of multiple corruption scandals."

Regulations For 527s Suggested. Edward Kangas, the retired chairman of Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu and co-chairman of the Committee for Economic Development's subcommittee on campaign finance, and Charles Kolb, president of the Committee for Economic Development, an independent, nonpartisan, Washington-based organization of over 200 business and education leaders, write in The Hill (6/21) that "unregulated political contributions have the potential to undermine voters' confidence and involvement in our participatory democracy. … If we are serious about eliminating soft money in our campaign system, Congress needs to adhere to the following three provisions recommended by the Committee for Economic Development (CED)." All 527s "that spend money to influence federal elections should be required to register as political committees with the FEC. … Second, all Section 527 groups that broadcast advertisements that promote, support, attack or oppose a federal candidate should be required to pay for such ads only with money raised from individuals under federal contribution limits. … Third, if a group maintains both federal and nonfederal campaign accounts to support voter-registration drives and similar activities, at least half of the costs for such activities must be funded with 'hard money' contributions."

Vice Adm. Joseph D. Stewart, the academy's superintendent. … Elated and with his arms still upraised, he turned toward President Bush, who had just delivered the commencement address. Mr. Bush, wearing a quizzical expression, responded by raising his arms as well and moved in for a hug. … 'The president thought the big bear hug was funny,' said Dana M. Perino, a White House spokeswoman. 'He appreciates the terrific enthusiasm of our nation's graduates, and he was honored to be the first president to address the Merchant Marine Academy. It was quite a thrill for everyone.'"

Enzi, Kennedy To Offer Drug Safety Bill. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Mathews, 2.11M) reports that Sen. Mike Enzi, who chairs the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions, and Sen. Edward Kennedy, the panel's ranking Democrat, plan to unveil legislation to substantially change how the FDA reviewed medications. According to the Journal, "The two lawmakers' views are particularly important as Congress prepares to consider legislation next year to renew the industry-user fees that fund many of the FDA's operations." The bill "is keyed to that user-fee renewal, and would likely depend on increases in the fees. Details could change before the final version emerges in the next several weeks."

The New York Times (6/21, Harris, 1.19M) reports that the Senators "still refuse to speak about the proposal, representatives for both said." The Times adds, "In broad terms, the bill would require that drug makers disclose the results of all large human tests of their drugs, known as Phase 3 and Phase 4 trials; create a detailed risk management plan to uncover and control any safety problems that arise after a drug is approved; and pay penalties if they fail to follow through with this plan, according to four experts who were briefed on the proposals."

Gingrey Says Seniors Are Happy With Medicare Drug Plan. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (6/21, 2.11M) Rep. Phil Gingrey, Co-Chair of the Republican Healthcare Public Affairs Team, writes, "Medicare reports that seniors are saving an average of $1,100 a year with prescription-drug coverage, and recent polls have shown that nearly 80% of seniors are happy with their coverage plan. … Seniors are seeing real savings under Medicare Part D. Unlike the Democrats and shadow organizations content to play politics with our seniors' health, Republicans have worked tirelessly to help seniors sign up and save. I firmly believe that come November, seniors will reward the Republican majority for finally delivering on the long-overdue promise of affordable prescription drug coverage."

Surveys Find Drug Prices Rose Sharply In First Quarter. The New York Times (6/21, Freudenheim, 1.19M) reports that separate studies form two large advocacy groups, the AARP and Families USA, have found that prices for the most widely used prescription drugs increased sharply in the first quarter of this year. AARP "said prices charged by drug makers for brand-name pharmaceuticals jumped 3.9 percent, four times the general inflation rate during the first three months of this year and the largest quarterly price increase in six years." Families USA "found similar inflation rates among brand-name drug prices."

Report Finds Expanded Government Contracting Doesn't Save Money. The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Gehlert, 958K) reports that a congressional report released by Rep. Henry A. Waxman found that while "The Bush administration has greatly expanded the use of contracts with private companies to provide public goods and services even as the number of government employees has increased," this "failed to bring promised savings and has been characterized by 'significant waste, fraud, abuse and mismanagement.'" Many of "the types and terms of the contracts have made them ripe for abuse," including cost-plus contracts, no-bid contracts, and monopoly contracts Also, of "particular concern…were contracts related to domestic security, the Iraq war and Hurricane Katrina recovery."

Specter Holds Private Lunches With Supreme Court Justices. The Hill (6/21, Bolton) reports that Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter is hosting a series of one-on-one lunches with members of the Supreme Court. Specter told The Hill that he uses the lunches to "hash out 'matters of concern.'" Specter "said he's already lunched with most of the justices. They have discussed the administration of the courts, their confirmation hearings and one of his pet issues: bringing television cameras into the court chamber. He has also grilled them about instances when the court has struck down laws by questioning what it called Congress's 'method of reasoning.' It was a concern Specter raised during the Supreme Court confirmation hearings he presided over months ago."

Ornstein Says Broadcast Decency Act Is "Just Grandstanding." Norman Ornstein writes in Roll Call (6/21) that last week Congress passed, and the President signed, the Broadcast Decency Enforcement Act." The bill "basically was just grandstanding. It's a poor piece of legislation, and one that reflects yet again the lack of any meaningful deliberation in Congress." Ornstein adds, "Here is what I propose: relieve the broadcasters of their onerous public interest obligations. All of them. In return, charge them fees that amount to a paltry 20 cents on the dollar for what they have been doing (or what they say they have been doing). That would be $2 billion per year. Do so for only seven years, and then leave them free and clear. Put the money into an endowment fund that ultimately would total $14 billion (plus interest) for public broadcasting."

NYTimes Blasts Plans To Have Ethics Panel Approve Junkets. The New York Times (6/21, 1.19M) editorializes, "The House ethics committee, ever wondrous in its irresponsibility, is preparing to set itself up as the arbiter of one-stop, conscience-free junket approval for gadabout lawmakers. … The end product would have the ethics committee — long a still-life study in Capitol dysfunction — snap into action to prejudge junketeering requests." The Times adds, "Clearly, lawmakers are gambling that the scandals nipping at their heels will pale by Election Day."

OTHER NEWS:

Housing Starts Rebound. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Conkey, Corkery, 2.11M) reports, "US home builders stepped up the pace of new construction in May after three months of declines, a sign that the housing market is softening but not collapsing." The Commerce Department "said housing starts rose 5% last month from April to an annual rate of 1.96 million units, but were down 3.8% from a year earlier. Building permits, an indicator of future trends in new residential construction, fell 2.1% last month and were running 8.5% lower than a year earlier." The Journal adds, "The faster pace of new-home building in May is confirmation that the housing market is experiencing what Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke recently described as an 'orderly and moderate' correction following last year's peak." That "bodes well for the economy, though analysts anticipate more weakness in the housing market during the rest of the year."

The New York Times (6/21, Peters, 1.19M), however, says "the increase was not a sign of an upward trend, but more likely a rebound after three months of significant declines, economists said. Many economists had predicted less of a bounce." Stuart G. Hoffman, chief economist of PNC Financial, "said the upturn in May probably 'marks one of the housing market's last hurrahs.'" The Washington Post (6/21, Epstein, 744K) runs a similar report.

Stock Markets Closed Mixed. NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 9, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The Dow was up today more than 32 points [to close at 10,974.84]. NASDAQ was down just over 3 [to close at 2,107.06]." USA Today (6/21, 2.31M) says the Standard & Poor's 500 dipped 0.02 points to 1240.12. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Browning, 2.11M), among other newspapers, also reports the stock numbers.

More Commentary On The Economy. Robert J. Samuelson writes in the Washington Post (6/21, 744K), "If the Federal Reserve raises interest rates at the end of June, as seems probable, it will likely be criticized for making a fetish of inflation and, in the process, risking an American or global recession. There are already signs that the US economy is slowing. Stock markets around the world have declined sharply. Why should the Fed make matters worse by nudging up rates even a tad? This is a sensible-sounding complaint. Based on what we now know, it's also wrong." He adds, "We have an inflation problem that we need to cure before it gets worse."

David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (6/21, A21, 744K), "The financial world has been suffering lately from Post-Greenspan Stress Disorder. The new chairman of the Federal Reserve, Ben Bernanke, has been accident-prone, and some investors have gotten the jitters." They "might be reassured if they paid more attention to the country's second most powerful monetary official, New York Fed President Timothy Geithner." Geithner "watches for the big, scary meltdowns that could threaten the entire financial system. Like his mentor, former Treasury secretary Robert Rubin, he's a worrier -- always looking for the 'systemic risks,' the cascading events that can trigger a panicky rush for the exits. He's in a constant dialogue with the nation's biggest banks and investment firms about how they manage risk."

Democratic Party Committees Tout Edge In Cash On Hand. The DSCC is reporting a $33.5 million to $18.3 million cash on hand advantage over the NRSC, while the DCCC has a $24.5 million to $21.9 million cash on hand advantage over the NRCC. The AP (6/21) describes Democrats as "optimistic about their election-year prospects," but notes that while "the GOP committees trail in cash on hand, it has the advantage of the presidency and the fundraiser in chief as well as majority control of the House and Senate."

The Hill (6/21, Kaplan) says Congressional Democrats "yesterday trumpeted the sums of money they raised in the second quarter of the year." Roll Call (6/21, Whittington) notes "this is the first time in recent memory that House Democrats have banked more than Republicans." Roll Call notes that "the NRCC's heavy spending on the special election in California's 50th district accounted for the cash-on-hand difference." NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said, "We spent what it took in California 50 and we won. … And we will have a resources advantage come fall."

Emanuel Will Not Serve Second Term As DCCC Chairman. The Hill (6/21, Hearn) reports, "Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) will step down from the House Democrats' campaign operation after the November elections to spend more time with his family, he told The Hill yesterday." He "has been a leading strategist, fundraiser, cheerleader and recruiter for House Democrats as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) since the beginning of last year. His uncommon pairing of cunning efficiency and profanity-laced outbursts has won him both plaudits and opprobrium, but nearly all Democrats concede that he deserves substantial credit for their rosy election prospects this year."

President's Dinner Raised $27 Million For Republicans. CNN's The Situation Room (6/20, Crowley) reported, "Some Republicans may not want the President campaigning with them, but all Republicans want him filling up the coffers. … The coffer is $27 million fuller as of last night's President's Dinner, where Bush racked up cash and laid out a campaign blueprint." CNN added, "So far this election cycle he has raised over $150 million, the kind of cash only a President can attract. He gives his party a cumulative edge, $92 million more raised by Republicans than Democrats since the beginning of 2005."

Morris Sees Possibility For Democratic Senate Takeover With Tennessee Win. Political analyst Dick Morris, in his column in The Hill (6/21) , writes that in addition to possible Democratic victories in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Montana Missouri and Rhode Island, a new "Zogby poll indicates that Harold Ford, the Democratic candidate to succeed Majority Leader Bill Frist (R) in Tennessee, is running a surprisingly strong race against his three possible Republican opponents. That could be the sixth seat" Democrats would need to take control of the Senate. The poll shows "Ford tied with former Rep. Ed Bryant, with each winning 42 percent of the vote, and trailing by a small margin, 43-41, against former Rep. Van Hilleary. A third possible candidate, Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker, leads Ford by 46-42." Morris sees the possibility of a Democratic takeover as a sign "that President Bush had better shake himself up and address the gas-price and energy issues that he has so far failed to speak out about, except for one mention in his long-ago State of the Union address. It is only by an ongoing relevance to this nation's key problem that Bush can hope to avert the disaster looming on the horizon."

Democrats Seek To Bolster Lieberman Against Primary Challenger. The possibility that Sen. Joe Lieberman may run as an independent candidate for the Senate in Connecticut if he loses the Democratic primary to Ned Lamont is seen as posing a problem for national Democrats. In response, Roll Call (6/21, Stanton, Duran) reports, "Senate Democrats are making a point of rallying around Lieberman, with many lawmakers expected to travel to the Nutmeg State in the coming weeks. His Senate Democratic colleagues already have donated more than $49,000 since 2004 to his re-election campaign." But "Democrats acknowledge that Lieberman…could force his fellow Senators to choose between backing one of their own and abiding by the wishes of the state's Democratic voters. Lieberman's decision to leave the door open to an Independent run has angered many rank-and-file Democratic activists and has added an unwanted wrinkle to Democrats' long-shot efforts to gain control of the Senate in November."

Lieberman Ad Chides Lamont Supporters. Gov. Lowell Weicker recently endorsed Lieberman's challenger Lamont and the Washington Post (6/21, A6, Goldfarb, 744K) reports, "Lieberman's campaign recently posted a Web ad poking fun at the Weicker-Lamont alliance. 'Remember Lowell Weicker? Well, bears never forget. He's never gotten over losing his Senate race to Joe Lieberman,' says the ad, which features animation of a bear. 'But instead of coming out of hibernation, he's sent his bear cub, instead -- Ned Lamont.'" The Post adds, "Lieberman spokeswoman Marion Steinfels explained the ad as having 'a little fun with the Greenwich billionaires uniting against Senator Lieberman.' Lamont spokesman Liz Dupont-Diehl called the ad 'pathetic.'"

Gore Declines To Endorse Former Running Mate Lieberman. The Washington Post (6/21, A6, Goldfarb, 744K) also notes, "Lieberman has won a string of endorsements from prominent Democrats around the state, including the state party chairman and state Senate majority leader. One endorsement he won't be getting is that of his 2000 running mate, Al Gore. In an interview Sunday with Al Hunt of Bloomberg TV, Gore called Lieberman 'my close friend' but said, 'I typically do not get involved in Democratic primaries.'" But Gore "did endorse former Vermont governor Howard Dean" who opposed the Iraq War "in the 2004 Democratic presidential primaries."

Columnist Accuses Lieberman Of Being Out Of Step With Party On Iraq. Howard Meyerson in his column in the Washington Post (6/21, A21, 744K) says "Lieberman's problem is not that he faces expulsion from a sect but that he has chosen to stand outside what remains a big, messy tent of a party. Moreover, he seems to have reversed the roles that the two parties play when it comes to Iraq."

Obama Urged To Run In 2008 Despite Lack Of Experience. Atlantic Monthly associate editor Ross Douthat in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (6/21, 2.11M) writes that with the 2008 presidential field wide open, running for president could "be the smartest thing" Sen. Barack Obama does. While "young and untested" Obama's "his political stock may never be higher than it is right now, when liberal Democrats and centrists alike project their dreams upon him, undimmed by the disappointments and compromises of a long career. For the moment, he's part Clinton, part Roosevelt, part JFK and MLK; but in eight or 12 or 16 years, he might be John Kerry." Losing in the presidential primaries "didn't hurt Al Gore's long-term prospects; it didn't hurt Ronald Reagan's future chances."

And "Democratic bigwigs -- Mario Cuomo, Sam Nunn, Bill Bradley -- who declined to take on George H.W. Bush in 1992, preferring to wait for a more propitious moment" did not succeed.

Democratic Activists Launch Effort To Encourage Policy Debates. Democratic activists have launched a number of ventures seeking to encourage debates over serious policy issues. The Washington Post (6/21, A19, Balz, 744K) reports, "Those in the middle of these events share a similar conviction, which is that for too long Republicans have been winning the battle of ideas (and often campaign strategy) in American politics, in part because conservatives invested in what is now a well-funded infrastructure of organizations that have produced ideas, thinkers, publications, strategists, and politicians who now control the White House, Congress and increasingly the federal judiciary." The Post adds, "There is also a belief shared at least by some of the participants that Democrats have ridden for too long on what are the fumes of the New Deal and the Great Society, which sustained Democrats for half a century."

Stem Cell Therapy Repairs Spinal Cord Injuries In Rats. ABC World News Tonight (6/20, story 10, 2:00, Potter, 8.78M) reported, "It has been a long-sought and elusive goal. This rat was paralyzed in the hind legs by a virus. In a few months, it was able to move again. Researchers injected their rats with stem cells, plus a mix of chemicals to help the cells grow into nerve tissue. In 11 out of 15 tries, it worked." This is "the first in which stem cells actually created new, healthy nerves, known as motor neurons." But the "stem cells came from mouse embryos, which had to be destroyed when they were removed. So, the moral debate over stem cell research continues."

The CBS Evening News (6/20, story 5, 2:05, Kaledin, 7.66M) reported scientists "say they have done something they have never done before. These lab rats were once unable to move their hind legs. Now after treatment using embryonic stem cell, they can. This is the first time, scientists say, these specialized cells have successfully regrown the delicate circuitry between nerves, spinal cord and muscle, allowing movement where there was none before." Only "a tiny number of embryonic stem cells were needed to restore up to 40% of the rats' mobility."

NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 7, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This is research in rats, but many health officials are calling it a remarkable step in the long road to finding treatments for spinal chord injury and other diseases that cause paralysis. The scientists treated stem cells from mouse embryos with various chemicals so they would form new nerve cells in the spine." There's "a political angle here, and the question is where does this all sit regarding what has been President Bush's position on this issue?" Bazell: "Well, these are experiments in animals, so Bush's position doesn't matter at all, but if these continue to work as well as it have, it could only heat up the argument very much."

Publisher, Bush Appointee Merrill Reportedly Committed Suicide. The Washington Post (6/21, A1, Rich, 744K), in a front-page story, reports Philip Merrill, "the prominent publisher and former diplomat whose body was found floating in the Chesapeake Bay on Monday, suffered from a heart condition and apparently took his own life, his family said last night. Merrill, 72, was found with a shotgun wound to the head and a small anchor tied around one or both ankles, according to a source familiar with the investigation." Merrill "was assistant secretary general to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in the early 1990s and president of the Export-Import Bank of the United States from 2002 until last year. He frequently took time away from his business to pursue diplomatic and intelligence assignments for the government. He served six administrations, mostly in the State and Defense departments."

Former Anchor Rather Departs From CBS News. The CBS Evening News (6/20, story 8, 4:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "It has been rumored for weeks and today Dan Rather and CBS news made it official. Dan is leaving CBS." CBS (Mason) added Rather "interviewed nearly every major international leader, Saddam Hussein exclusively, twice. For '60 Minutes 2', he broke the story of the Abu Ghraib prison abuse scandal, but it was also on '60 minutes 2' that Rather became the center of his own scandal." Rather: "It was a mistake." Mason: "Shortly after admitting errors in the report about President Bush's National Guard record, Rather retired as anchor of the 'Evening News.'" But he "could not come to terms with CBS on new assignments. 'It just isn't in me to sit around doing nothing,' he said in a statement today. 'So, I will do the work I love, elsewhere.'"

ABC World News Tonight (6/20, story 11, :30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Dan Rather and CBS News made it official today. After 44 years at the network, the former anchor is leaving. Rather joined CBS in 1962, reported on all the major stories of our time and anchored the Evening News for 24 years."

NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 11, 0:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Upon the retirement of the iconic Walter Cronkite, Dan took the anchor chair and held it for 24 years. He was forced to resign 15 months ago after what has since been dubbed 'Memogate,' a story about President Bush's National Guard service, for which Rather later apologized."

The Washington Post (6/21, C1, Kurtz, 744K) reports, "CBS officials heaped praise on the longtime anchor, even as they were ushering him out the door yesterday. Rather, for his part, made clear his frustration with the network for refusing to renew his contract or give him an ample workload at 60 Minutes."

The Washington Times (6/21, Harper, 90K) reports, "Recent press reports indicate Mr. Rather may take up a newscasting role with HDNet, a high-definition cable channel currently available in about 3 million homes."

Peter Johnson writes in USA Today (6/21, 2.31M) that 60 Minutes correspondent Steve Kroft "says Rather's CBS career, which came to its official close Tuesday, ended much like those of two other CBS News legends, Edward R. Murrow and Walter Cronkite: CBS wanted to move on and, news icons or not, they had to go." Johnson adds, "Rather's departure from CBS after 44 years — and the way it was handled — was topic No. 1 in news circles Tuesday. Some say Rather was owed a better sendoff; others say he got what he deserved."

Shales Says CBS Treated Rather "Shabbily." Tom Shales writes in the Washington Post (6/21, C1, 744K), "Those who have followed the awkward exit of Rather…often ask a simple question: How could a network for which Rather has done so much and served so loyally treat him so shabbily as the curtain falls?"

Exurbs Are Nation's Fastest Growing Regions. New population estimates from the Census Bureau show that exurbs in the Sun Belt and the Far West are the fastest-growing cities in the US. The New York Times (6/21, Lyman, 1.19M) reports, "The bureau's annual survey of municipalities with at least 100,000 residents shows that from July 1, 2004, to July 1, 2005, four outer suburbs in California, three in Florida, two in Arizona and one in Nevada were the country's most rapidly growing."

Study Finds Big City Schools Have Low Graduation Rates. USA Today (6/21, Toppo, 2.31M) reports on research released yesterday finds that students in some big city schools have a less than 50% chance of graduating from high school with their peers. Fourteen urban school districts "have on-time graduation rates lower than 50%; they include Detroit, Baltimore, New York, Milwaukee, Cleveland, Los Angeles, Miami, Dallas, Denver and Houston. The findings present a bleak picture and are sure to generate controversy as lawmakers and others push to keep U.S. students competitive globally." USA adds, "Among the nation's 50 largest districts, the study finds, three graduate fewer than 40%: Detroit (21.7%), Baltimore (38.5%) and New York City (38.9%)."

Encyclopedia Of Conservatism Published. The New York Times (6/21, Deparle, 1.19M) reports on the release of American Conservatism: An Encyclopedia. According to the Times, the volume, published by ISI Books, a conservative press in Wilmington, Delaware, "omits familiar names like Ann Coulter, Tom DeLay, Grover Norquist, Bill O'Reilly and Karl Rove," but "includes the journals University Bookman, circulation 2,600, and First Things. It gives Willmoore Kendall, a political scientist who died in 1967, three times as much ink as former House Speaker Newt Gingrich."

Lowell Says Link Between Lobbying, Fundraising Must Be Weakened. Abbe D. Lowell, who has represented lawmakers and others in ethics investigations, and who currently represents former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, writes in USA Today (6/21, 2.31M), "Real reform will not occur until the very relationship between lobbyists and public officials is re-examined." Lowell offers several suggestions "to weaken the link between lobbying and fundraising," including: "Require fundraisers to disclose publicly their interest in legislation. Require sponsors of "bundled" contributions (individual contributions arranged together for greater impact) to disclose their roles. Impose further limits on the total amount individuals can give in an election cycle. Provide additional public financing of campaigns. Help candidates pay for access to various media." Lowell concludes that "time has come for the entire process to be under investigation so that a better system can result."

NYTimes Says Emergency Rooms Should Stop Diverting Seriously Ill Patients. The New York Times (6/21, 1.19M) editorializes, "The nation's emergency rooms have been stretched thin for at least a decade or more, but a new analysis suggests that they have reached a breaking point. Their plight underscores how dreadfully unprepared we are to cope with a major disaster like pandemic influenza or mass casualties from a terrorism attack." According to the Institute of Medicine, a unit of the National Academy of Sciences, "Half a million times a year ambulances are diverted from emergency rooms that are full and sent to others farther away. … The most important change would be to stop diverting seriously ill ambulance patients and divert instead the poor patients who clog emergency rooms seeking routine care. That would require extending health coverage to the uninsured and providing more primary care clinics and doctors in poor neighborhoods."

Iran Talks Take Center Stage As Bush Meets With EU Leaders In Vienna. There was no network news coverage of President Bush's trip to Vienna. CNN's

The Situation Room (6/20, Blitzer) reported, "President Bush is in Vienna, Austria, for a one-day stop at the European Union Summit. He and his EU counterparts face a host of international threats and conflicts, including Iran, Iraq, the war on terror." CNN added, "Bush sits down with European Union leaders here in Vienna to highlight what they can agree on rather than focusing on lingering disagreements. He'll be in Vienna for just one day, but for President Bush, the US/EU Summit is a chance to demonstrate that the US and Europe are on the same page when it comes to Iran's nuclear ambitions." CNN added, "After Vienna, the President will visit Budapest, Hungary, to deliver remarks commemorating the 50th anniversary of the Hungarian revolution, when tens of thousands of Hungarians rose up to demand an end to Soviet rule." Bush's comments there "will be likely be listened to closely by Russian President Vladimir Putin. Putin has expressed his displeasure with recent US comments criticizing Moscow for backsliding on democracy."

The Washington Post (6/21, A15, Abramowitz, 744K) reports, "In meetings here Wednesday, Bush and European Union officials are to confer on issues including trade, energy security and their mutual efforts to persuade Iran to halt activities that could lead to the development of nuclear weapons. Officials have dampened expectations of any major announcements, because Iran has yet to respond to a package of inducements and penalties…aimed at ending its enrichment of uranium. Speaking with reporters aboard Air Force One, Bush's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, said Americans and Europeans were strongly committed to having Iran completely shut down its enrichment program."

Bush Not Expected To Address Controversial Aspects Of War On Terror. The Washington Times/AP (6/21, Jahn), in an article titled, "Iraq Threatens Bush Agenda At EU," reports Bush's meetings are "scheduled to focus on Iran's nuclear ambitions and economic concerns, but the United States' conduct of the war on terrorism will be an unspoken theme. National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley has said he doubts Mr. Bush will have much to say about the U.S. prison for terror suspects at U.S. Naval Base, Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, charges of prisoner abuse in Iraq and suspected killings of Iraqi civilians by Marines in Haditha. For millions of Europeans, however, these are the issues that matter -- and their concerns are shared by politicians."

Administration Pressing Donor Countries To Honor Iraq Pledges. The Washington Times (6/21, Dinan, 90K) reports national security adviser Stephen Hadley "said countries have an obligation to fulfill their monetary pledges to help rebuild Iraq, but refused to name the nations that are $10 billion behind their commitments, according to Bush administration calculations.

The Christian Science Monitor (6/21, Grier, 61K) reports, "For nations that in the past have pledged to help Iraq rebuild, the United States has this message: Get out your checkbook. In recent days, administration officials, from President Bush on down, have insisted repeatedly that it is time for others to live up to monetary commitments to Baghdad, most of them made in 2003. … In coming months, non-US donor nations and international institutions should become increasingly important to the reconstruction of Iraq, according to US officials. Money in the main US reconstruction account, the Iraq Relief and Reconstruction Fund, is dwindling." The Monitor notes Bush "has mentioned the issue often in public in recent days. And the administration has sent Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt and State Department counselor Philip Zelikow to visit world capitals and figuratively rattle the tin cup."

Bush's Unpopularity Among European Public Noted. The Washington Post (6/21, A15, Abramowitz, 744K), in an article titled, "Bush's Unpopularity In Europe Hangs Over Summit," reports Bush arrived "at a time when the populace remains generally wary of him despite concerted efforts by political leaders on both sides of the Atlantic to patch up their differences." The Post adds, "if relations at the political level have improved, public opinion has lagged far behind. Bush remains unpopular with the public in many European countries over the war in Iraq and alleged abuse of detainees by U.S. forces at Guantanamo Bay…and other facilities. … Diplomats and experts on Europe say public opinion is a significant drag on Bush's ability to expect much from political leaders here -- for instance, for his renewed effort to secure international assistance for the new Iraqi government."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/21, LaFranchi, 61K) reports Bush will "confront a European public that has such a poor view of America that in some countries, the United States is seen as the biggest threat to global stability today - surpassing Iran. … Indeed, the US image abroad has continued to deteriorate, despite a concerted effort by the Bush administration to turn things around by mending fences with key allies, taking concrete steps to make diplomacy work, and expanding public-diplomacy efforts in the Middle East and other regions."

The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Gerstenzang, Rubin, 958K) reports, "Austrians want their leaders to confront Bush's policies in Iraq, the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and the 'rendition' of suspected terrorists to countries that permit torture. Newspapers and TV talk shows have discussed little else in recent days, with people at both ends of the political spectrum denouncing the treatment of terrorism suspects who have not been charged with crimes.

The Los Angeles Times (6/21, 958K), in an editorial, writes, "President Bush's trip to Europe is being welcomed like an infectious disease. Bush was unpopular in Europe from day one of his presidency, but a charm offensive launched last year — and a more conciliatory approach toward European concerns — was meant to change that, or at least nudge the approval rating up a notch. Instead, recent polls show he is more unpopular than ever across the Atlantic."

The AP (6/21, Hunt) reports Bush "began a quick trip to strengthen ties with European allies unhappy about Iraq. … On his 15th trip to Europe since taking office, Bush and his wife, Laura, were greeted by Austrian Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel. As Bush was driven to his hotel, curious onlookers, most of whom remained motionless and expressionless, gathered along Vienna's streets. One group struggled unsuccessfully to unfurl a 'Go Home' banner from a restaurant balcony in time for it to be seen by occupants of the speeding motorcade."

The Washington Times (6/21, Dinan, 90K) reports, "Anti-Iraq-war protests are scheduled for Mr. Bush's stay in Vienna, but the president will be departing even as the main protest is under way today. … The president has not carved out much time for cultural activities in his two days on the ground in Europe, though he is expected to see the Vienna Boys Choir perform."

US Said To Have Abandoned Hungary During 1956 Uprising. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (6/21, A21, 744K) Johns Hopkins' Charles gati writes, "Bush will be in Budapest tomorrow to visit a good ally -- a member of the coalition of the willing. The first item on his agenda, according to the White House, is to 'celebrate Hungary's historic sacrifices in the name of freedom by commemorating the 50th anniversary of the 1956 Hungarian Revolution.' … The truth is that at a critical juncture in the Cold War, when Hungarians rose against their Soviet oppressors, the United States abandoned them."

Bush Hopes For WTO Breakthrough On Farm Subsidies. AFP (6/21) reports President George W. Bush "hopes European leaders will improve their offer on agricultural trade to help bring about a breakthrough in stalled global trade talks," a White House official said. National security advisor Stephen Hadley told reporters on Air Force One that Bush "sees a deal as possible" this year on the Doha Round of World Trade Organization talks. "We really need to see a response from the Group of 20 countries and from the Europeans that is comparable to this offer," Hadley said, referring to the group of developing nations. "If they can move in this direction, we are going to be in the sight of getting an agreement by the end of the year and I think we will see the president encourage everyone he talks to on this trip not to miss this terrific opportunity to advance trade and advance development and help raise people out of poverty," the spokesman added.

Bush's "Personal" Involvement Said To Show Importance Of Talks. In a Wall Street Journal (6/21, A12, 2.11M) op-ed, professor Bernard Gordon of the University of New Hampshire, says the president's "personal effort to kick-start world trade talks" during his trip to Europe "should end the idea that he was downgrading US trade goals when Rob Portman was transferred from trade chief to budget director." Instead, Gordon says the president "has made clear the US insists on a genuine big deal for world trade—or no deal at all."

Barroso Warns Bush US "Protectionism" Could Inspire Backlash. The Financial Times (6/21, Proissl, Schmid, Dombey) reports José Manuel Barroso, the president of the European Commission, warned, "A rising tide of protectionism could endanger European investment in the US." Barroso said he has talked with President Bush "several times about the risk of introducing new barriers on investment because of worries about globalisation or terrorism." According to the Times, "EU officials believe the failure of Dubai Ports World's attempt to buy US ports this year showed a willingness by Congress to block foreign investment on grounds unrelated to economic criteria."

The AP (6/21, Hunt) reports Bush "planned to press Europe to eliminate agricultural subsidies so that talks for a global free-trade pact can proceed."

US-EU Draft Declaration Addresses Concerns Over Russia's Energy Policies. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, McKinnon, Pulizzi, 2.11M) reports, "A U.S.-European Union draft declaration raises concerns about Russia's energy policy and erosion of political freedoms, just weeks before that country hosts its first meeting of the Group of Eight powers. The draft declaration sets the stage for a tussle over energy policy at the coming G-8 summit, where Russia has made energy security the primary agenda item. The Bush administration believes Russia has been seeking to use its vast energy resources as a political weapon, particularly in Central and Eastern Europe.

Bush, European Leaders Concerned By Chinese Regulatory Regime. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Echikson, 2.11M) reports President Bush and EU leaders "agree on…the need to dissuade China from becoming a third global regulatory power. Businessmen and officials on both sides of the Atlantic said China's desire to set its own regulatory requirements for goods sold there is becoming a big concern, because car makers and other exporters would have to tailor products to meet another set of expensive requirements in order to compete in China's huge market. … So while the U.S. and EU have been slow to harmonize their regulatory regimes, the prospect of China adding another layer of costly rules is fostering greater interest in trans-Atlantic cooperation."

US Activates Missile Defense In Response To North Korea Preparations. North Korea's missile launch preparations were reported on in a full segment by CBS and briefly mentioned by ABC and NBC. The CBS

Evening News (6/20, story 3, 2:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Belligerent as always, the North Koreans declared today they have every right to test long-range missiles, weapons that could reach America's West Coast. And they have one on the launching pad and appear to be fueling it." CBS added, "The missile now on the North Korean launch pad is exactly the missile the American system, a network of radar and interceptor rockets, was designed to defend against. It is still experimental, but it has been activated and could fire in the unlikely event it is needed." CBS noted, "Even under test conditions, their record of hitting a target is only 50/50, so several of them would have to be launched to increase the odds."

ABC World News Tonight (6/20, story 4, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Two senior military officials have told ABC News the Pentagon has activated its missile defense system, and put it on high alert. That, just in case the missile might head this way."

NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 4, 0:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Today, North Korea insisted it has every right to conduct missile tests. That led Japan and South Korea to say they would join the US in trying to stop any such thing from happening."

Fox News' Special Report (6/20, Hume) reported, "There is information that the US has activated the ground-based missile defense system from test mode to operational mode. The purpose is a response to the possible missile launch by North Korea." Fox (Angle) added, "The US deployed the system 18 months ago and it is described as having a modest capability. Tests of the system have produced successes and failures. On the diplomatic front American officials worked feverishly to come up with a worldwide response."

US Officials Won't Confirm Missile Defense Activation Reports. The Washington Times (6/21, Gertz, Dinan, 90K) reports White House officials "would not say what the consequences would be if North Korea tested a missile, and officials at the Pentagon and State Department refused to comment on whether the U.S. ground-based interceptor system was up and running, as The Washington Times reported yesterday. 'There are many options, and we are simply not going to tip our hand as to what the possible response should be,' White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters traveling on Air Force One with the president."

The New York Times (6/21, Cooper, Gordon, 1.19M) reports, "Missile defense proponents said North Korea's missile preparations would strengthen the case for building more robust missile defenses. 'I think the activity by North Korea clearly makes the case that a missile defense is necessary for American security,' said Representative Duncan Hunter, the California Republican who is chairman of the House Armed Service Committee."

Missile Defense Described As "Unproven" And "Rudimentary." The Washington Post (6/21, A15, Ricks, Cho, 744K) reports, "The U.S. military yesterday moved ships into position off the coast of North Korea to detect the launch of any long-range ballistic missiles and prepared its new, unproven missile-interception system to attempt a response if necessary. It was apparently the first time that the U.S. government has readied its rudimentary missile-defense system other than to test it. But officials played down the possibility that the interceptors might be used against a North Korean missile. … Two U.S. Navy ships with sensors that could swiftly detect and track a missile's flight were operating off the North Korean coast yesterday, a Pentagon official said." The post adds, "Pentagon officials said that steps had been taken to ready the U.S. interceptors in much the same way that they would proceed for a test of the system. … But they declined to confirm a Washington Times story yesterday that said the system had recently been activated, and that the Bush administration is considering shooting down the North Korean missile.

USA Today (6/21, Kelley, 2.31M) reports, "the U.S. missile-defense system remains a patchy and unproven shield, government studies and outside experts say. The Pentagon now spends about $8 billion a year toward development of a network of systems designed to destroy enemy missiles, particularly those from Iran and North Korea. One of the most developed parts of that system is the handful of ground-based missile interceptors at Fort Greely in Alaska and Vandenberg Air Force Base in California. … Those interceptors have never been fully tested under real-world conditions, and the past two tests fizzled when the interceptors failed to launch."

South Korea Challenges US Intelligence. The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Demick, 958K) reports, "If anything, North Korea's intentions have become less clear because of a growing controversy over the intelligence data. South Korean officials today challenged the U.S. assertion that North Korea had completed the fueling process, making a launch both inevitable and imminent. The National Intelligence Service told the National Assembly today that only 40 fuel canisters were observed around the launch site at the Musudan-ri missile base, and that the number was far too little to fuel what is said to be a 115-foot long, 65-ton multistage missile. In addition, the South Korean government is questioning whether the missile in question is for military use."

USA Today (6/21, Nichols, 2.31M) reports National security adviser Stephen Hadley "said it was difficult to judge whether North Korea had actually completed fueling a missile in preparation for a test. 'They seem to be moving forward toward a launch, but the intelligence is not conclusive at this point,' he said."

North Korea Claims It Is Not Bound By 1999 Moratorium. The New York Times (6/21, Cooper, Gordon, 1.19M) reports the government of North Korea "said Tuesday that it was not bound by its own moratorium on long-range missile tests, as tension over the country's missile intentions continued to mount." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "said Monday that the United States would regard a missile launching as an 'abrogation of obligations that North Korea undertook in the moratorium that they signed on to in 1999, that they reiterated in 2002.'" However, Charles Kartman, "the United States special envoy who negotiated it with the North Koreans, said the understanding had been worked out on the assumption that the two countries would conduct further talks on an American proposal to ban the testing, production and export of long-range North Korean missiles. But such negotiations have not been held since 2000." Kartman is quoted as saying, "The Bush administration's disinterest in continuing the missile negotiations would have, of course, canceled out the 1999 moratorium."

The Financial Times (6/21, Pilling, Sevastopulo) reports Ri Pyong Dok, a North Korean foreign ministry official, "told Japanese journalists in Pyongyang that a long-range missile test launch 'is not bound by any statement such as the Pyongyang Declaration', Kyodo news reported."

Preemptive Attack On North Korea Considered "Unlikely." The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Demick, 958K) reports, "The Bush administration has limited options to prevent North Korea from test-firing a multistage missile that could reach U.S. interests in the Pacific. In many ways, a missile deployment could constitute grounds for a preemptive attack, such as an airstrike against North Korea. But that is unlikely to be considered a serious option given the U.S. entanglement in Iraq and objections from China."

Concerns Over Iran And North Korea Reanimate Missile Defense Debate. In an op-ed for the Washington Times (6/21, 90K) Peter Huessy, president of GeoStrategic Analysis, writes, "The twin nuclear and missile threats from Iran and North Korea have transformed the missile defense debate. It is no longer 'should we deploy,' but 'how should we deploy?' Policy-makers face a tough decision: How much to invest in some protection now, vs. future, complimentary technologies that offer enhanced protection?"

The Wall Street Journal (6/21, 2.11M) editorializes, "It's possible we'll wake up to the news that Pyongyang has tested the long-range ballistic missile that is fully fueled and which U.S. satellites have monitored for more than a month. If so, we hope we'll also learn that the U.S. responded, as defense officials said late yesterday it might, by testing its newly operational missile defense system and blowing the Korean provocation out of the sky. What better way to discourage would-be nuclear proliferators than to demonstrate that the U.S. is able to destroy their missiles before they hit our allies, or the U.S. homeland. Even a miss would be a useful learning experience all around."

Missile Preparations Seen As Central To Kim's Diplomatic Strategy. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (6/21, 2.11M) former Pentagon official Chuck Downs writes, "Even if the Taepodong rocket is never launched, the next few months will see American interests subjected to significant strains. Pyongyang has created an opportunity to break out of the negotiating deadlock that has stymied the regime for years, dissolve the international consensus on how to deal with the regime's illicit smuggling and counterfeiting activities, and change politics in South Korea and the U.S. And perhaps most importantly, if Kim Jong Il plays his cards right, he will prove to his inner circle that he is the genius he claims to be, renewing his hold on power at a time when he was facing his most severe challenges."

The Los Angeles Times (6/21, 958K) editorializes, "Diplomatic condemnations are easy, of course, and North Korea's plans are worthy of them. But if there is anything good to come of Kim's latest adventure, it will be a renewed sense of urgency among the U.S. and its allies to focus on the peninsula."

White House Mulls Ways To Keep Bolton In UN Post. The Washington Post (6/21, A19, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that the White House "is looking for ways to keep controversial U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton in his post well beyond the expiration of his recess appointment at the end of this year. One possibility is to bring his nomination up for vote in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee next month. Bolton supporters on the Hill first want to pass the defense appropriations bill before they leave for the August recess and say they did everything needed for the troops…before they turned to the nomination. Senate Republicans don't want wait until the fall and risk a potential loss right before the midterm elections."

Iranian Regime's Proscription Against Unconventional Weapons Questioned. The Washington Post (6/21, A15, Vick, 744K) reports, "Iranian officials often assert the peaceful intent of their nuclear program by insisting that the religious law that governs their country expressly prohibits weapons of mass destruction. … Yet interviews with a range of clerics and other students of Islamic teachings indicate that while Grand Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini indeed barred Iranian forces from unconventional weapons during the 1980-88 war with Iraq, the religious underpinning for such a ban is regarded as less than absolute, with ample justification available in scriptures for almost any course except first use." According to the Post, "Those arguing for the loopholes include clerics closely identified with the country's most hard-line conservatives, the most ardent defenders of Iran's theocratic system." The Post goes on to report that after "Iraqi forces used chemical weapons on the battlefield" in their war with Iran, and "also launched rocket attacks on Tehran and other metropolitan areas, pressure for Tehran to retaliate was intense." However, Iran never responded by targeting Iraqi cities because the Ayatollah forbade it.

Administration Reaches Compromise With Congress Over India Nuclear Deal. Roll Call (6/21, Rasmussen) reports the Bush administration "has reached a compromise with Congressional leaders on one of the most prickly aspects of the pending U.S.-India nuclear deal, a provision that had rankled key Congressional Republicans and Democrats who worried about its potential to curb Congressional powers. While much of the public debate over the U.S.-India nuclear deal has revolved around nonproliferation and global security issues, the biggest hang-up for many in Congress was the administration's initial insistence that India be treated as a country in compliance with the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978, which it is not." Roll call goes on to report, "The Bush administration has reached a tentative agreement to only ask Congress to expedite the final approval of the bill by taking an up-or-down vote free of amendments. A public announcement of the procedural agreement is expected from the Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Nick Burns later this week."

Israeli Missile Kills Three Children In Gaza. The Washington Post (6/21, A16, Wilson, 744K) reports, "An Israeli airstrike in the Gaza Strip on Tuesday killed at least three Palestinian children and wounded 14 people, many of them children as well, according to witnesses and Palestinian health officials. Israeli military officials said the target of the strike, which occurred around 7:30 p.m., was a car carrying gunmen from the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, the armed wing of the Fatah party. … But Palestinian witnesses said the men escaped from the Volkswagen Golf station wagon before the missile struck the car, which was passing through a busy commercial district of Gaza City. The scene turned quickly into an angry rally with demonstrators denouncing the attack and vowing to take revenge on Israel." Hospital officials in Gaza confirmed "three children -- Mohammed Roqa, 5; Samia al-Shariff, 5; and Belal al-Hessi, 15 -- suffered fatal wounds in the attack."

The New York Times (6/21, Fisher, 1.19M) reports, "The airstrike was the third this month to kill civilians, infuriating Palestinians and raising an impassioned debate in Israel about its military response to the firing of homemade rockets from Gaza into Israel. On June 9, eight civilians — seven from one family — were killed on a beach in Gaza during an Israeli bombardment. … The Israeli military later denied that its munitions caused the deaths, a contention disputed by Palestinians and human rights officials. Four days later, another strike in Gaza killed at least two militants and another eight civilians."

Effort To Bring Red Cross/Red Crescent To Israel And Palestine Stalls. The Washington Times (6/21, Stuhldreher, 90K) reports, "Last-minute maneuvers may have jeopardized a deal for Israel and the Palestinian territories to enter the International Red Cross and Red Crescent Movement after decades of ostracism, according to officials at a conference in Geneva. The International Conference of the Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies, at a two-day meeting that began yesterday, had been expected to formally endorse the use of a new religiously neutral emblem facilitating the move. … Adoption of the new symbol, a diamond-shaped 'red crystal,' would end the more than 50-year stalemate. But the deal was thrown into doubt when Pakistan and Tunisia unexpectedly introduced a politically charged amendment to the resolution yesterday." Israel "said the suggested rewording, which effectually condemned Israel's occupation of territories, was unacceptable, according to Agence France-Presse."

Al Aksa Establishes College On Site Of Former Jewish Settlement. The New York Times (6/21, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "A Palestinian college is growing from the rubble of an uprooted Israeli settlement. … On nearly 41 acres surrounding what used to be the largest school in what used to be called the Gush Katif bloc, the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, decreed a campus. He granted it to Al Aksa University, affiliated with his Fatah party."

Georgia-Russia Tension Raises Concern Over Potential Armed Conflict. The Washington Times (6/21, Mainville, 90K) reports, "Growing diplomatic tensions, a Russian trade embargo and a massive boost in Georgian arms spending are raising fears of conflict in the volatile Caucasus region along Russia's southern border. Analysts say a meeting last week between Russian President Vladimir Putin and Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili failed to defuse the tension and that Russia's open support for the leaders of Georgia's separatist regions of South Ossetia and Abkhazia is pushing the limits of Georgian patience. The tension is expected to be discussed when Mr. Putin hosts heads of state from the Group of Eight club of wealthy nations in St. Petersburg next month. It also will be discussed in Washington July 5 when Mr. Saakashvili meets with President Bush."

India Rebuffs Some Chinese Firms' Expansion Attempts. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Wonacott, 2.11M) reports that in India, "Just as they have in the U.S. and Europe, some of China's big companies have run smack into security concerns and other delays, say industry executives and lawyers. Protracted government reviews have tripped up Chinese forays in telecommunications and infrastructure -- sectors where India generally welcomes foreign capital and expertise. In part, India's concerns mirror fears in the U.S. and Europe about China's corporate ambitions in the West and Africa, and its growing influence overseas. … But the delays also reflect continuing unease between India and its fast-growing neighbor, as both nations emerge as new economic powers wooing capital and pursuing rapid development."

Security Council Votes To Extend East Timor Mission. The New York Times (6/21, Hoge, 1.19M) reports the U.N. Security Council extended its mission in East Timor "by two months and asked Secretary General Kofi Annan to plan for a 'strengthened presence' of the United Nations there in light of recent violence that killed 30 people. The United States voted for the resolution despite a statement by its ambassador, John R. Bolton, questioning the need for returning peacekeepers."

The Washington Post (6/21, A18, Smith, 744K) reports, "International troops…tightened security across the capital as hundreds of protesters gathered to demand the ouster of Prime Minister Mari Alkatiri, some handing out fliers calling him a terrorist and murderer. … Many East Timorese say Alkatiri's decision to fire 600 disgruntled soldiers in March was to blame for the subsequent clashes and gang warfare that have left at least 30 people dead."

Sudanese President Says UN Troops Will Not Be Allowed In Darfur. USA Today (6/21, 2.31M) reports Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir "said Tuesday that he will never allow United Nations peacekeepers into Darfur. … The U.N. wants to send troops to replace a 7,000-strong African Union force that has been unable to stop the violence."

The New York Times/AFP (6/21) reports Bashir was quoted as saying, "Sudan, which was the first country south of the Sahara to gain independence, cannot now be the first country to be recolonized."

International Community Mulls Deploying Peacekeepers To Somalia. The Christian Science Monitor (6/21, Crilly, 61K) reports, "The rapid rise of Somalia's Islamist militias has prompted a flurry of diplomatic efforts to stabilize the troubled country in the Horn of Africa. Earlier this week, the African Union and Western diplomats decided to send officials to Somalia to assess the possibility of deploying a peacekeeping force to a country ripped apart by 15 years of anarchy. That has the backing of President Abdullahi Yusuf, head of Somalia's virtually impotent transitional government, who flew to Ethiopia Tuesday to demand speedy intervention. Regional powers support intervention out of fear of an Islamic state on their doorsteps, while Western governments are worried the country could become a haven for terrorists."

Liberia's Taylor Arrives In The Netherlands For War Crimes Trial. The New York Times (6/21, Simons, 1.19M) reports the former president of Liberia Charles Taylor "arrived in handcuffs in the Netherlands on Tuesday, and was immediately taken to the jail near The Hague." Taylor "will be tried in the Netherlands by a specially created outpost of the Special Court for Sierra Leone, the United Nations-backed tribunal that has indicted him on charges of crimes against humanity and war crimes."

The Washington Post (6/21, A16, Moore, 744K) reports, "The U.N. Security Council, which approved the move from Freetown to the facilities of the International Criminal Court in The Hague, cited concerns that trying the case in Sierra Leone could destabilize Liberia, Sierra Leone and neighboring countries."

Arrests In Spain And France Disrupt ETA Funding. The New York Times/AP (6/21) reports, "The police in Spain and France arrested 12 people on charges of acting as intermediaries between the armed Basque separatist group ETA and businesses that were forced to pay a 'revolutionary tax,' the Spanish Interior Ministry said."

Latin America Choosing Chinese Or Indian Investment Models. The New York Times' Thomas Friedman (6/21) writes, "I would describe the big question facing Latin Americans this way: Are they going to emulate India or get addicted to China?" China "is almost exclusively focused here on extracting natural resources — timber, iron, soybeans, minerals, gas, fish meal — to feed its voracious appetite and keep jobs and factories humming in China. … But countries that get addicted to selling their natural resources rarely develop their human resources and the educational institutions and innovative companies that go with that." On the other hand, according to Friedman, the "India example…focuses on developing human resources."

WSJournal Decries Mexico's Telecom Monopoly. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/21, 2.11M) says Mexico's telecom monopolist, Carlos Slim's fortune "has come partly at the expense of Mexico's poor and middle class, who have had to suffer more than a decade of monopoly pricing for telecom services under his ownership of Mexico's Telmex. His anti-competitive political machinations are among the biggest obstacles to making Mexico a faster growing and more globally competitive economy." The Journal adds, "There is little debate among development economists about the importance of competition to moving people out of poverty. … But with special interests blocking market reform in most poor countries, introducing economic competition is an uphill climb."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gov't Presses For Dismissal Of Surveillance Suit (BCN)

Bay City News, June 21, 2006

(BCN) SAN FRANCISCO The U.S. Justice Department has told a federal judge in San Francisco that allowing a surveillance lawsuit against AT&T Corp. to proceed "would cause grave harm to the nation's security."

U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker is scheduled to hear arguments on Friday on the government's motion for dismissal of a lawsuit filed against AT&T by the San Francisco-based Electronic Frontier Foundation on behalf of four Californians.

The government contends the case must be dismissed because there is no way it could be litigated without revealing state secrets vital to national security.

In a brief filed with the judge last week, Justice Department lawyers wrote that "the very subject matter of the case is a state secret."

The lawsuit alleges that AT&T has violated communications privacy laws and the plaintiffs' constitutional rights by allegedly giving the National Security Agency records of millions of Americans' telephone and Internet communications.

But the government argues in its brief, "Plaintiffs cannot establish whether or not such cooperation exists because that factual question is itself a state secret."

The brief argues that "the state secrets privilege is solidly rooted" in the president's constitutional authority as commander-in-chief.

The lawsuit was filed only against AT&T, but the government has asked to become a party to the case for purposes of seeking dismissal of the lawsuit.

The Electronic Frontier Foundation has argued that the case against AT&T can proceed without revealing any security secrets.

Fukuyama, Hannah And Zegna (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

Washington

As he launched a progressive journal to ponder big ideas that might help the wretched Democrats stop driving on Ambien and snatch back a little power, Andrei Cherny sought advice from a conservative pundit.

"Who's on your tie?" the pundit asked, explaining that Reaganites had been able to sum up their philosophy in the 80's by wearing Adam Smith and Edmund Burke ties.

Mr. Cherny did not say. (John Stuart Mill?)

So far, Democrats have been more famous for who gave the tie — Monica draped Bill with a Zegna — than who gazed from it.

Besides, Republicans don't own all three branches of government because of little cameo pictures of Adam Smith and Edmund Burke hanging over their blue Oxford button-down shirts. Mr. Smith and Mr. Burke would blanch at the shape W. and Karl Rove have given conservatism — the political muscle of the Christian right, the withering of the social contract, greedy capitalism, fiscal profligacy.

If the Democrats need anything, it's not a new tie. It may not even be big ideas.

The Republicans, after all, got a monopoly while headed by W., a guy who makes Reagan look like Hannah Arendt. "Compassionate conservatism" was an alluring alliteration, not a paradigmatic philosophy.

In politics, big ideas are too often just big slogans and big marketing techniques and big slime campaigns.

Besides, big ideas can backfire. Yesterday, Mr. Cherny and his fellow editor, Kenneth Baer, former Gore speechwriters, introduced their journal, Democracy — it's sort of like Foreign Affairs without the glitz — at a panel at the National Press Club with Francis Fukuyama and Bill Kristol.

Mr. Fukuyama's big idea was The End of History. But a couple of little things like religion and nationalist ideology, not to mention history, got in the way.

Mr. Kristol was a key backer of the neocon push to knock out Saddam and create a model democracy in the Middle East. As he pointed out ruefully yesterday, big ideas cannot survive "contact with politicians, unbruised," and are sometimes "applied inappropriately." That was no doubt a veiled shot at Donald Rumsfeld, whom Mr. Kristol faults for the slide in Iraq.

"And since my relations with conservatives these days are so bad — with Rumsfeld and immigration and other things — I'd just as soon hang out with you guys," the Weekly Standard editor told the room of liberals, bloggers and journalists. "You're less mean."

You'd think that incorrectly predicting history is over would get you banished from the intelligentsia forever, but Mr. Fukuyama proffered another big idea, warning that the pendulum was not making its customary swing left because "values" voters were clutching it.

"There's a guy I buy my barbecue from who says, 'I think we're in a class war and my class is losing,' " he shared. (Is this The End of Barbecue?) In Europe, he said, such brisket purveyors would be voting for the left, but in America, "the values issues have been much more prominent, and so people who for economic reasons ought to be voting on the left are held still in the Republican column precisely because they don't trust the left on all the issues having to deal with family, and identity, and this sort of thing."

Big ideas are not enough, because personalities and circumstances intervene. What matters is the bearer of an idea.

Bill Clinton had big ideas but short-circuited his presidency when he elevated his chaotic, self-regarding and gluttonous personality to a management style. Al Gore had big ideas but was too neutered by political mercenaries and focus groups to make those ideas compelling. Maybe because she had one idea that was way too big, Hillary has been running away from big ideas as though they're poison.

After 9/11, Dick Cheney transposed his desire to expand executive power and his personal paranoia into a national policy. Ron Suskind reports in his new book, "The One Percent Doctrine," that Vice dictated that the war on terror allowed the administration to summarily reject the need for evidence and analysis before action.

Mr. Suskind describes the Cheney doctrine: "Even if there's just a 1 percent chance of the unimaginable coming due, act as if it is a certainty. It's not about 'our analysis,' as Cheney said. It's about 'our response.' ... Justified or not, fact-based or not, 'our response' is what matters. As to 'evidence,' the bar was set so low that the word itself almost didn't apply."

In the hands of the wrong person, big ideas can be terrifying.

Grassley Accuses FBI Of Botched Terror Investigation, Coverup (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

The FBI sought to cover up a "botched" investigation into a terrorist financing scheme by classifying a probe into the case as secret and misleading Congress about how the inquiry was handled, said a senior member of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley said the FBI blocked the full release of an investigative report he sought last year from the Department of Homeland Security and the Justice Department of what he called a "turf fight" between the FBI and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) in a terrorism investigation.

The Iowa Republican, a frequent FBI critic who also serves as chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said the FBI classified as "secret" sections of the report originally marked as "unclassified" during a review process.

Mr. Grassley said an unexplained delay by the FBI in processing a request by ICE investigators for a wiretap in the terrorist probe prevented the interception of communications between a criminal suspect and a person designated as a global terrorist by the Treasury Department.

"The FBI has a leadership role on terrorism financing cases by virtue of a May 2003 memorandum of agreement (MOA) between the Homeland Security and Justice departments, not by any statute or congressional mandate," Mr. Grassley said in a letter to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III.

"The facts established in the [Office of Inspector General] report do not instill confidence in the FBI's ability to lead under the process established by the MOA," he said, adding that it was "a clear conflict of interest" for FBI officials to edit criticisms of their actions.

Mr. Grassley also targeted Mr. Mueller, saying that during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing in May, the director painted "a distorted picture" of findings in the report from the inspectors general at Homeland Security and Justice, reading "selectively" from unclassified portions.

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko said the bureau received Mr. Grassley's letter but that "it would not be appropriate to discuss this letter or the response in the press."

The senator said the FBI initially blamed the delay on the bureau's Houston field office, which failed to transfer the case to the Joint Terrorism Task Force, but Mr. Grassley said evidence showed FBI headquarters raised a number of issues to slow the approval process, none of which related to whether the case had been transferred.

"This raises questions about whether the true motivation for delaying the case may have been to prevent a rival agency from infringing on FBI turf," said Mr. Grassley, adding that several federal agencies agreed there was probable cause for a wiretap.

Mr. Grassley said the MOA giving the FBI's Terrorism Financing Operations Section the lead role in cases involving terrorist financing operations had created "a strong disincentive for those outside the FBI to investigate suspected terrorist financing."

Qaeda Says Man Was To Take Part In 9/11 Attacks (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 20 (AP) — Al Qaeda has identified a would-be 20th hijacker for the Sept. 11 attacks as a Saudi who was killed in a 2004 shootout with his country's security forces.

In a statement accompanying a new video, whose authenticity has not been verified, Al Qaeda's propaganda arm asserts that the Saudi, Fawaz al-Nashimi, also known as Turki bin Fuheid al-Muteiry, would have rounded out a team that ultimately took over United Airlines Flight 93, which crashed in Pennsylvania before reaching its target.

A video featuring Mr. Nashimi was obtained Tuesday by IntelCenter, a United States government contractor based in Virginia. American counterterrorism officials declined to comment on the authenticity of the video and its claims.

The video includes images of Mr. Nashimi justifying attacks against the West. It also contains 27 minutes of audio of a siege in May 2004 on oil facilities in Khobar, Saudi Arabia, in which he took part.

Screeching tires and gunfire are heard. A voice can be heard asking in Arabic, "Where are the Americans?"

In the attack, militants opened fire inside two oil industry office compounds, then moved on to a residential area. Twenty-two people were killed. Mr. Nashimi was killed the next month in a gun battle with Saudi forces.

The video offered no explanation of why Mr. Nashimi did not take part in the 9/11 attacks.

American counterterrorism officials have believed for some time that the original plot included another hijacker on Flight 93, which had only four attackers. The two planes that flew into the World Trade Center and the one that flew into the Pentagon each had five hijackers.

Al-Qaeda Identifies Would-Be 20th Hijacker (WP/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

Al-Qaeda has identified a would-be 20th hijacker for the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks as a Saudi operative who was killed in a 2004 shootout with his country's security forces.

In a statement accompanying a new video, the terrorist network's propaganda arm identified Fawaz al-Nashmi, also known as Turki bin Fuheid al-Muteiry, as the operative who would have joined the four terrorists who took over United Airlines Flight 93, which crashed into a Pennsylvania field.

A 54-minute video featuring al-Nashmi was obtained yesterday by IntelCenter, a U.S. government contractor based in Virginia. U.S. counterterrorism officials declined to comment on the authenticity of the video and its claims.

The video included a screen crediting the al-Sahab media committee with producing the message. While no one is known to have forged the group's work, its statements are often difficult to verify.

The video includes footage of al-Nashmi justifying attacks against the West. It also contains 27 minutes of previously unheard audio of a siege that he took part in on oil facilities in Khobar, Saudi Arabia.

Screeching car tires and gunfire are heard as the terrorist cell moved from building to building. A voice can be heard saying in Arabic: "Where are the Americans? . . . Give me the information."

The demands are punctuated with more gunfire.

DOJ_NMG_0036244

In the May 2004 attack, militants dressed in military-style uniforms opened fire inside two oil industry office compounds and then moved to an upscale residential area. They took 45 to 60 hostages. Saudi security forces stormed the complex, but three of the militants escaped, including al-Nashmi. Twenty-two people were killed in the 25-hour rampage, almost all of them foreigners, including one American.

Al-Nashmi was killed the following month in shootout with Saudi forces.

The Khobar assault was one of a series of attacks against foreigners by al-Qaeda's Saudi branch in 2003 and 2004, aimed at undermining its U.S.-allied royal family.

U.S. counterterrorism officials have believed for some time that the original 9/11 plot included a fifth hijacker for Flight 93.

Federal agents at first thought al-Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui was intended to be on that flight, but they later revised their information.

The Sept. 11 commission identified al-Qaeda member Mohamed al-Kahtani, who was turned away at Orlando International Airport in August 2001, as a possible would-be 20th hijacker.

U. Of Ark. Graduate Cleared In Terror Case (AP)

AP, June 21, 2006

Fayetteville, Ark. (AP) -- A University of Arkansas graduate has been acquitted of attempting to provide material support to a Palestinian terrorist organization but convicted of immigration charges.

Arwah Jaber, 33, faces a maximum of 10 years in prison on each count of obtaining his naturalization unlawfully and making false statements on passport and immigration applications.

The government moved to revoke his citizenship after the jury returned its verdicts Monday.

U.S. District Judge Jimm Larry Hendren on Tuesday gave both sides 10 days to submit written arguments on that issue.

Jaber came to the attention of authorities when he talked openly about joining Palestinian Islamic Jihad, a group the U.S. government considers a terrorist organization. He was arrested last year as he was about to board a flight and maintains he was going to the Middle East to visit relatives. The government says he wanted to join the holy war.

"We don't know what the consequences would have been," said U.S. Attorney Bob Balfe. "We had to take action."

Jaber was born on the West Bank and became a U.S. citizen in 1994. He testified last week he made the statements about Palestinian Islamic Jihad because he was upset at delays in obtaining his degree. He received a doctorate in chemistry from the university last fall.

He admitted using a false Social Security number but said he needed it to obtain credit cards in his Palestinian name, Orwah Houshia. He said he did not include the name Orwah Houshia on immigration papers because he had used Arwah Jaber previously for immigration documents.

Jaber said he now expects to leave the country with his wife, Dawn, and find a teaching position in the Middle East.

"I am not a terrorist. (The jury) knew it," Jaber said after Monday's verdict.

Jaber Retains Citizenship For Now (SPRINGDN)

By Trish Mehaffey, The Morning News

Springdale (AR) Daily News, June 21, 2006

FAYETTEVILLE -- Arwah Jaber retains his American citizenship for now but a motion to revoke it was taken under advisement today by U.S. District Judge Jimm Larry Hendren.

Jaber, a naturalized U.S. citizen born in the West Bank town of Yamoun, was acquitted Monday of providing material support to the recognized terrorist organization, Palestinian Islamic Jihad, but he was convicted on five lesser charges related to immigration and credit card fraud. The convictions will likely be grounds to revoke his citizenship.

U. S. Attorney Wendy Johnson filed a motion Monday to revoke his citizenship.

The motion was argued today during a hearing.

John Wesley Hall, Jr., Jaber's attorney, questioned whether the court has the jurisdiction to order Jaber to be detained for the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency.

Hall also asked the court if the statute mentioned in the revocation request meant conviction as when the jury renders a verdict or after sentencing. Hall asked the court if Jaber's naturalization is revoked and then the defense wins an appeal, would Jaber's naturalization be reinstated.

Hendren said in that specific situation, the higher court would probably vacate any order from the district court.

Hendren said he was unclear on the statute's meaning of "upon conviction." A return of a verdict isn't a conviction and based on some other cases, the revocation wasn't considered until sentencing, he said.

A revocation of naturalization is an important consideration for the court because a person goes through a lengthy process to attain it, Hendren said. He asked the attorneys to provide briefs within 10 days on the motions and he will rule at that time.

Jaber said today he was happy with Hendren's decision regarding his citizenship. It took seven years for him to gain naturalization, and he appreciated the judge's thoughts, he said.

"It (naturalization) really is a sacred thing," Jaber said. "It's difficult to earn citizenship."

Jaber plans to go back home and teach when his legal problems are over. He received his doctorate in chemistry from the University of Arkansas. He said he would like to stay and teach in Arkansas if allowed but realizes that may not be possible.

Jaber still could face jail time on the charges of making false statements to obtain a passport and unlawful procurement of naturalization and credit card fraud.

He will be sentenced within 90 days after a presentencing investigation is completed.

The defense is still considering whether it has grounds for an appeal.

Hendren also ruled to keep Jaber under the same bond and the same orders of wearing an electronic monitor. He has surrendered his passport. The judge asked Jaber to make himself "reasonably available" for his attorneys and the court during the presentencing investigation time.

Jaber said he hadn't left Washington County since his arrest last year. Under his bond, he is suppose to stay in the county and has to get permission to go anywhere else.

Jaber and his wife, Dawn, were pulled out of line by FBI agents at the Northwest Regional Airport on June 14, 2005 on their way to Palestine. Jaber told his doctoral professor and others at the university that he was going to Palestine to "fight for freedom, peace and justice." Jaber testified last week he was frustrated with a professor over delays in graduating and made the statements in an effort to sway the teacher into approving his degree.

He said he didn't mean any of it and recanted the statements under questioning by FBI agents.

Arkansas Man Acquitted Of Terror Charges (NYT)

By Steve Barnes

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

Arwah Jaber, a naturalized United States citizen born in the West Bank, was acquitted of federal charges that he tried to assist the Palestinian Islamic Jihad, which the United States government lists as a terrorist organization.

But Mr. Jaber was convicted of five lesser offenses, including lying to immigration officials. Judge Jimm L. Hendren of Federal District Court in Fayetteville took under advisement the prosecution's petition to strip Mr. Jaber of his citizenship.

Mr. Jaber, 33, acknowledged expressing a wish to join the jihad but said he had merely been frustrated at the time it had taken to graduate from the University of Arkansas.

Judge Orders Disclosure Of Details In Padilla Terror Case (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, June 21, 2006

MIAMI - A federal judge ordered prosecutors Tuesday to turn over more detailed evidence to back up allegations that Jose Padilla and two co-defendants conspired to kill, injure or kidnap people overseas as part of a global Islamic terrorist network.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke said she agreed with many of the claims made by defense attorneys that the federal indictment against Padilla and the others is "very light on facts" that would link the defendants to specific acts of terrorism or victims.

"We are so shooting in the dark," said Jeanne Baker, one of the attorneys representing defendant Adham Amin Hassoun. "The government has to tell us, what are these acts they conspired to commit?"

Hassoun, Padilla and others are charged with being part of a North American terror support cell that provided money, recruits and supplies to al-Qaida and other violent Islamic extremist organizations. All have pleaded not guilty, with trial scheduled for this fall.

Cooke ordered the government to flesh out its charges by providing defense lawyers with names of unindicted co-conspirators, broad descriptions of intended victims of alleged acts of violence and specifics about false statements Hassoun allegedly made about the meaning of phone calls intercepted by the government.

The judge's order came despite arguments from Brian Frazier, an assistant U.S. attorney, that most of the specifics were being turned over already, mainly in the form of more than 225 key phone intercepts. And, he contended, there were 80 specific illegal acts alleged in the indictment.

"What is terrorism but a random act of violence? It means anyone could be a victim at any time," Frazier said.

The complexity of the case, with huge amounts of classified material and some 50,000 intercepted phone calls, led prosecutors and defense lawyers to tell Cooke that it seems unlikely the case will go to trial in early September as scheduled. But Cooke, noting that Hassoun and Padilla have both been in federal custody since 2002, refused for now to order a delay.

"At some point in time, a date has to be set. We have to go forward," she said.

Earlier Tuesday, another federal judge heard arguments from Hassoun's lawyers seeking to suppress evidence seized by the FBI from his Broward County home, saying the FBI "frightened and intimidated" his wife before seizing a handgun and other key evidence such as documents in Arabic and videotapes.

An FBI agent, however, testified Hassoun's wife freely consented in writing to the search of the home in Sunrise after he was arrested on an immigration violation on June 12, 2002.

"She didn't have a problem with that," the agent, Gregory McDermott, told U.S. Magistrate Judge Stephen Brown at a hearing. "It was very professional and friendly."

Brown did not indicate when he would rule on Hassoun's motion to suppress evidence obtained in the 2002 search.

Hassoun's lawyers say his wife, Nahed Wannous, thought that she was being asked to produce only her husband's immigration documents and that she was "frightened and intimidated" by two FBI agents and one immigration agent who appeared at her door that night.

At one point, Wannous indicated she wanted a lawyer, but agreed to sign the FBI search consent form after immigration agent Mary Rodriguez said she told Wannous that she wasn't under arrest. Rodriguez testified there was never a threatening atmosphere in the house.

"It was never any raised voices, never intimidating," Rodriguez said.

The 9mm handgun that was seized from Hassoun's garage resulted in a charge of illegal possession of a weapon by an alien admitted to the United States on a non-immigrant visa. The other seized papers, documents and videotapes are part of the government's claim that Hassoun acted as an al-Qaida recruiter and fundraiser.

Hassoun's lawyers have been trying to arrange Wannous - now living in Beirut, Lebanon, and unwilling to travel to the United States - to give a videotaped statement about the FBI search. But that has not yet happened.

"We have a critical witness who could not be here today," Baker said.

Padilla was designated an "enemy combatant" and held for 3 1/2 years without charge by the Bush administration shortly after his May 2002 arrest at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport. He was accused then of plotting to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major U.S. city.

Padilla was added as a defendant in the Miami terror support cell case last year amid a legal struggle over President Bush's authority to hold him indefinitely. The Miami indictment does not mention the "dirty bomb" allegations.

Man Renews 20-Year Battle For Citizenship (LAT)

By John Spano, Times Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0036247

A man at the center of a long-running immigration legal fight that came to be known as the "L.A. 8" case returned to court Tuesday to renew his two-decade-long quest for citizenship.

Aiad Barakat, 45, walked with a pronounced limp to the witness stand in federal court downtown and in halting English fielded a barrage of questions in a bid to avoid deportation.

Almost 20 years ago, federal officials sought to deport Barakat and seven others because of their association with causes promoting Palestinian statehood, such as the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine.

The eight were never accused of an act of terrorism or of any other crime.

Rather, they were targeted for deportation on the grounds that they allegedly had raised money for the Popular Front, a group the government suspected of terrorist activities.

The group won a victory in 1989 when a judge struck down as unconstitutional portions of a federal law that allowed deportation to be based on political affiliation and advocacy. The charges against the L.A. 8 have been reworked at least three times since, reflecting changes in immigration and anti-terrorism laws, some of which were tailored to be applied retroactively to this case.

Constitutional questions are not at issue in the current case. The only question in court Tuesday was whether Barakat should be denied citizenship for allegedly lying about his association with Palestinian advocate Ali Kased when he sought U.S. citizenship.

The government plans to introduce an FBI surveillance videotape of a meeting Barakat attended with Kased, described as a prominent Palestinian activist, in 1985 outside of Los Angeles. The meeting purportedly lasted two hours and dealt with Palestinian causes and fundraising.

"Mr. Barakat gave false testimony to obtain an immigration benefit, and thus he is not a person of good moral character," the government asserted in court papers.

Barakat's lawyers insist he had a right to engage in political activity and said he may not have remembered the meeting when questioned by immigration officials. U.S. District Judge Steven V. Wilson is presiding over the case, which is scheduled to continue today.

Wanted: A System Of Justice (WP)

SEPT. 11 MASTERMINDS Khalid Sheik Mohammed and Ramzi Binalshibh, along with numerous other infamous al-Qaeda figures, have been in American custody for years. So has Mohamed Qatani, who was allegedly to be the 20th hijacker. None has faced trial for his crimes. Nor have any of the hundreds of lesser foreign detainees captured in the war on terrorism. Nearly five years after the Sept. 11 attacks, the Bush administration's plans for bringing the enemy to justice are a shambles. This failure has been one of the most easily avoidable blunders in the war on terrorism.

In the next few days the Supreme Court is expected to pass judgment on the administration's effort to establish military commissions -- a long-dormant trial system the executive branch seeks to revive in order to try al-Qaeda terrorists. But even if the court lets the commissions stand, the administration should go back to the drawing board, to create a fairer system for trying alleged war criminals in which this country can have confidence.

Not every detainee can be put on trial. But those who plan, assist or participate in acts of terrorism can face charges under the laws of war. Where trials are possible, criminal convictions provide a more legitimate basis for long-term incarceration than any kind of detention without charge. Trials also provide public accountability for unspeakable crimes and plots -- that is, they provide a measure of justice.

The administration is correct that U.S. federal courts often will not be the right venue for such trials. Evidence collected in the rough and tumble of a shooting war doesn't always meet the rigorous standards that courts here rightly demand. The government may have good reason to withhold witnesses or classified information. Given that foreigners abroad do not have full constitutional rights, the administration's impulse to create an alternative trial mechanism with some flexibility was reasonable. Had it gone to Congress and sought authorization to use a variation of military courts-martial, with clear rules and a codification of the offenses such tribunals were to judge, it might today have a vibrant system of justice at Guantanamo Bay.

Instead, the administration sought to rewrite the rules from scratch and revive a system of trial not seen since the World War II era. The reason for this fateful error was largely ideological: The White House wished not merely to conduct trials but also to emphasize the president's power to do it on his own. Consequently, the executive branch alone has defined the offenses to be tried by commission and it alone has written the trial rules, which have shifted repeatedly. The legality of the system has been in doubt from its inception. And while the rules have improved over time, they still permit unfairness. The result: a system that inspires little confidence here or abroad and that in five years has yet to produce one trial.

Even if the Supreme Court erases the cloud of legal uncertainty in the coming days, it makes no sense to proceed in this fashion. Instead, Congress should write a law clarifying that courts-martial will try these cases and modifying the model if necessary. The military uses this system to try its own personnel every day. More than the commissions, courts-martial would guarantee due process to detainees: the right to challenge evidence, a full appeal to the federal courts. Trials by court-martial are accepted around the world as fair.

At the same time, the system could be modified to take into account the government's needs in a continuing war. These might give prosecutors more leeway to use hearsay evidence in some cases, or to protect intelligence secrets. There may be circumstances when the accused will need to be excluded from proceedings and have his interests represented by counsel cleared to handle sensitive information. But such departures from traditional trial rules should be narrowly drawn. They should be the product of a deliberative legislative process, not a fiat from the executive branch; written into law, not existing as rules the Pentagon can change whenever convenient.

The conflict with Islamic extremists will not be over soon. The nation needs now, and will continue to need, a means to try some of the most fateful criminals of all time according to fair rules that bear the stamp of democratic approval: legislative enactment. Only the administration's rigidly ideological approach to this problem prevents its timely resolution.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Police Skirt Privacy Laws By Using Data Brokers (AP)

By Ted Bridis And John Solomon, Associated Press

AP, June 21, 2006

Buying records is quicker than subpoenas but raises concerns

WASHINGTON – Federal and local police across the country have been gathering Americans' phone records from private data brokers without subpoenas or warrants.

These brokers, many of whom market aggressively on the Internet, have broken into customer accounts online, tricked phone companies into revealing information and sometimes acknowledged that their practices violate laws, according to documents obtained by The Associated Press.

Legal experts and privacy advocates said police reliance on private vendors who commit such acts raises civil liberties questions.

Those using data brokers include agencies of the Homeland Security and Justice departments – including the FBI and U.S. Marshals Service – and municipal police departments in California, Florida, Georgia and Utah. Experts believe hundreds of other departments frequently use such services.

"We are requesting any and all information you have regarding the above cell phone account and the account holder ... including account activity and the account holder's address," Ana Bueno, a police investigator in Redwood City, Calif., wrote in October to PDJ Investigations of Granbury, southwest of Fort Worth.

An agent in Denver for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Anna Wells, sent a similar request on March 31 on Homeland Security stationery: "I am looking for all available subscriber information for the following phone number," Ms. Wells wrote to a corporate alias used by PDJ.

Congressional investigators estimated the U.S. government spent $30 million last year buying personal data from private brokers. But that number probably understates the breadth of transactions, since brokers said they rarely charge law enforcement agencies.

A lawmaker who has investigated the industry said Monday he was concerned about data brokers.

"There's a good chance there are some laws being broken, but it's not really clear precisely which laws, said Rep. Ed Whitfield, R-Ky., head of the House Energy and Commerce investigations subcommittee that plans to begin hearings today.

Documents gathered by Mr. Whitfield's committee show that data brokers use trickery, impersonation and technology to gather phone records. "They can basically obtain any information about anybody on any subject," Mr. Whitfield said.

James Bearden, a Texas lawyer who represents four such data brokers, likened the companies' activities to the National Security Agency, which has also surreptitiously compiled the phone records of some Americans.

"The government is doing exactly what these people are accused of doing," Mr. Bearden said. "These people are being demonized. These are people who are partners with law enforcement on a regular basis."

Larry Slade, PDJ's lawyer, said no one at the company violated laws, but he added, "I'm not sure that every law enforcement agency in the country would agree with that analysis."

PDJ always provided help to police for free. "Agencies from all across the country took advantage of it," Mr. Slade said.

The police agencies told The Associated Press they used the data brokers because it was quicker and easier than subpoenas, and their lawyers believe their actions did not violate the Fourth Amendment's guarantee against unlawful search and seizure.

None of the police agencies interviewed by AP said they researched their data brokers to determine how they gathered sensitive personal information. Privacy advocates bristled over data brokers gathering records for police without subpoenas.

"This is pernicious, an end run around the Fourth Amendment," said Marc Rotenberg, head of the Washington-based Electronic Privacy Information Center, which advocates tougher regulation of data brokers. "The government is encouraging unlawful conduct; it's not smart on the law enforcement side to be making use of information obtained improperly."

Legal experts said law enforcement agencies would be permitted to use illegally obtained information from private parties without violating the Fourth Amendment as long as police did not encourage crimes to be committed.

"If law enforcement is encouraging people in the private sector to commit a crime in getting these records, that would be problematic," said Mark Levin, a former top Justice Department official under President Reagan.

Congress Investigates Methods Of Data Sellers (USAT)

By Peter Eisler

USA Today, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Congress begins hearings today on the techniques used by private data-collection companies to obtain phone records and other information.

Law enforcement agencies often go to such companies for information. They do so to save time and avoid seeking subpoenas or warrants for the information, even though the data brokers do not always obtain their information legitimately, according to an investigation by the House Energy and Commerce investigations subcommittee. Agencies using data from these companies include the FBI, Justice Department and Department of Homeland Security and state and municipal police departments from Florida to California.

“Most of these data brokers procure the records and information, either themselves or through third-party vendors, by the use of pretext — that is, the use of ruse, lies and deception to gain access to information that is not publicly available and which they do not have the consent of the ‘target' to procure,” subcommittee spokesman Kevin Schweers says. “Many documents … show that the data brokers are completely aware that the phone records and other information is largely acquired through pretext.”

The subcommittee, chaired by Rep. Ed Whitfield, R-Ky., will hold a series of hearings on the matter. Details of the investigation's findings were first reported by the Associated Press.

The subcommittee's investigation found that law enforcement agencies often turn to data brokers for phone records, such as unlisted numbers and information on calls made and received by suspects in an investigation. In many cases, officers would have to get a warrant or subpoena to get the same information from phone companies.

This spring, the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, reported that federal law enforcement agencies spent about $30 million last year to buy information from data brokers. That figure, however, only includes money paid to legitimate data-collection companies, Schweers says. Smaller, less scrupulous firms often do not charge law enforcement agencies for data, he says, so gauging how often federal, state and local authorities use them is difficult.

TSA Delays Registered Traveler Program (AP)

WASHINGTON -- A program to let frequent flyers breeze through airports has been delayed as the government and private businesses grapple with ways to ensure retention of tough security standards.

The Registered Traveler program, which has been tested at Orlando International Airport and four other airports, was supposed to be rolled out gradually starting Tuesday. But Transportation Security Administration spokeswoman Yolanda Clark said the agency was still working with private firms running the program to make certain that it "does not decrease security in any way."

Registered Traveler would have allowed certain airline passengers to quickly go through a separate airport security lane if they paid a fee, passed a government background check and submitted fingerprints. The TSA wants private contractors to run the program, but said that travelers must be able to use the pass at every airport that offers it.

Clark said the contractors must also make sure the program doesn't hold up travelers who aren't enrolled for the fast security clearance.

She could not immediately estimate when the program might be ready.

Government Orders Anthrax Drug (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

The Department of Health and Human Services has placed a $165 million order for 20,000 doses of a new anthrax drug that it hopes to put in a biodefense stockpile starting in 2009.

The drug, Abthrax, neutralizes the deadly toxin that anthrax bacteria produce, which accounted for the majority of deaths in the 2001 anthrax attacks, said Dr. Gerald Parker, acting assistant secretary for public health emergency preparedness.

Lower-Cost Plan For 9/11 Memorial Is Proposed (WSJ)

By Alex Frangos

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

A simpler plan for the World Trade Center memorial will include several cost-saving design changes, while aiming to preserve the overall look and feel of the project.

In a report commissioned by New York Gov. George Pataki and New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, real-estate developer Frank Sciame suggested modifications that would bring the cost of the memorial and an adjacent museum to $510 million, plus another $150 million for underground infrastructure. (See the updated renderings.)

New York State would spend an additional $80 million on a visitors center. A cost estimate in May showed the project, minus the visitors center, approaching $1 billion.

The basic design remains similar to architect Michael Arad's original "Reflecting Absence" plan -- including a street-level plaza with two square openings, the Twin Towers' footprints. Waterfalls will cascade from the edges of the footprints into below-ground reflecting pools.

The changes Mr. Sciame announced include moving the carved-in-stone names of 9/11 victims to ground level and reducing the size of underground galleries. Under the new plan, visitors would ponder the names amid an open-air, tree-lined park, rather than underground, as proposed by Mr. Arad.

Mr. Arad was rankled by the adjustments to his design but struck a conciliatory tone. "While I am disappointed by this change, I recognize the imperative to move forward and begin construction of the memorial as soon as possible," he said.

Other modifications include doing away with an entry pavilion and combining that function with the visitors center on Greenwich Street, wedged between the two footprints. An underground museum that would document the attacks and their aftermath will be reduced in size.

The board of the Lower Manhattan Development Corp., a state-city agency that guides the rebuilding, will vote on the changes at its meeting next week. Despite the redesign, Mr. Sciame said the memorial is still scheduled to open on Sept. 11, 2009.

Mr. Sciame also called for the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the site, to build the memorial. Doing so would create "economies of scale," he said, that would reduce the underground-infrastructure cost, since the bistate agency is also building the nearby transit hub and Freedom Tower. The Port Authority has already agreed to pay $100 million toward the memorial's infrastructure, which includes delivery ramps, drainage and air-conditioning equipment.

"We will take responsibility for construction as long as a final design has been established and a firm funding plan is in place," said Port Authority spokesman Steve Coleman.

Even with the changes, the memorial is $130 million short of the $510 million construction budget. That doesn't include operating costs, estimated to be at least $40 million a year. The World Trade Center Memorial Foundation, a publicly chartered, privately run group in charge of fund raising, has brought in $130 million from private sources and has $250 million in federal government money.

"With the expected resolution of cost and finality of design by the end of this month, we plan to launch our national advertising campaign in early July," said Joe Daniels, acting president of the memorial foundation. "This memorial will require the participation of people from across the country and around the world."

New Design For WTC Memorial Cuts Cost In Half (USAT)

By Martha T. Moore

NEW YORK — In a change that pleases many victims' family members, a revised design for a memorial commemorating those who died Sept. 11, 2001, will have the names of the victims inscribed above ground on walls surrounding square sunken pools instead of in subterranean galleries.

The change was announced Tuesday as part of a redesign to cut the project's cost to $500 million from nearly $1 billion. In the original plan for the memorial, the names were to have been below ground, surrounding two pools representing the destroyed twin towers of the World Trade Center. A committee appointed by New York Gov. George Pataki and Mayor Michael Bloomberg spent a month revising the project to cut its cost.

The names of the 2,749 people who died in the attack will now be viewable at all times. Visitors will not have to pass through security into the memorial museum, which is to be largely underground.

The change trades “the sanctity and the quietude” of the underground galleries for greater access, says Rick Bell, who is executive director of the New York chapter of the American Institute of Architects and a consultant to the committee that made the budget-driven revisions.

The redesign, which focused on changes with big impacts on the budget, did not address how the unidentified remains of those who died would be stored or where to locate a planned private viewing area for family members.

Some family groups had pressed for the names to be above ground. “We are very anxious to … help build it when it's right,” says Anthony Gardner, head of the World Trade Center United Family Group. “This is a step in that direction.” His organization wants victims to be listed in related groups according to where they worked. The memorial design calls for the names to be listed randomly.

9/11 Memorial's Design Revised To Save $285 Million (WP)

By Sara Kugler

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

NEW YORK, June 20 -- A somewhat scaled-down design for the Sept. 11 memorial that retains the central elements of the original -- including reflecting pools and the inscribed names of the victims -- was unveiled Tuesday after the project was sent back to the drawing board because the cost was pushing $1 billion.

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R) and Gov. George E. Pataki (R) signed off on the more modest proposal, more than a month after asking developer Frank Sciame to find ways to reduce the cost to $500 million.

Sciame managed to cut the cost by more than $285 million by shrinking the size of the memorial museum, removing portions of the galleries around the pools where the names were to be listed, and consolidating all entrances into a visitors center. The new design will also raise the victims' names to street level.

The reflecting pools and waterfalls envisioned by architects Michael Arad and Peter Walker for the site where the World Trade Center stood were retained.

In a report, Sciame said he had considered eliminating the waterfalls but decided they were too important to the "contemplative nature" of the design -- particularly because they will drown out the sounds of the city and allow viewers to get lost in the power and emotion of the memorial.

Tuesday's announcement marked the beginning of a seven-day public comment period. The Lower Manhattan Development Corp., which oversees the rebuilding of the site, will adopt a final design by the end of the month, officials said.

The memorial is set to open by the eighth anniversary of the attacks, in 2009.

The governor praised Sciame for conducting a "thoughtful and thorough process." He said the redesigned landmark "honors our heroes' lives, mourns their passing, provides solace to their loved ones and tells their story to the world."

House Bill Raises Disaster Fraud Penalties (AP)

By Jim Abrams

WASHINGTON -- Scammers hoping to finance tropical vacations or season tickets to football games with federal disaster funds may have second thoughts with House passage of legislation imposing sentences of up to 30 years for fraud related to disaster relief.

The legislation, approved by a voice vote Tuesday, was brought to the House floor a week after congressional investigators concluded that the Federal Emergency Management Agency was defrauded of up to $1.4 billion as it rushed to provide relief after last year's hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Congress provided more than $68 billion in relief to the Gulf Coast after those two storms, said House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis. "With such vast resources put into the pipeline so quickly, fraudsters and scam artists went into high gear in an effort to take advantage of these government programs."

The Government Accountability Office study that came out last week cited such examples as FEMA paying an individual $2,358 in rental assistance at the same time it was paying about $8,000 for the same person to stay 70 nights in a Hawaii hotel.

It said FEMA ended up paying for season pro football tickets, a one-week Caribbean vacation and a sex change procedure.

The legislation, which now goes to the Senate, imposes a fine of up to $1 million and prison terms of up to 30 years for wire, radio, television or mail fraud in connection with a presidentially declared major disaster or emergency. While current statutes on mail and wire fraud carry similar penalties, the maximum prison term for making false statement to the government is five years.

Sensenbrenner noted that since the formation of the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force, established by the attorney general last September, 261 people have been charged in 218 cases, with 44 guilty pleas or convictions.

"Despite these efforts, it is clear that current criminal penalties are insufficient to deter disaster fraud," he said.

Among those sentenced so far are a Galveston man given a year in prison for bilking FEMA of $2,000 by falsely claiming he had a home damaged in Louisiana and a Florida man given a 21-month sentence for falsely claiming he was flying relief missions to Louisiana and soliciting charitable donations.

Courts in Florida have also been trying cases related to an estimated $31 million in possible fraud arising from Hurricane Frances in 2004. Last year two Miami women pleaded guilty to fraud charges for collecting disaster aid for a storm that hit 100 miles to the north of them. One woman, who received nearly $25,000 for a sewer backup that occurred weeks before the hurricane, was given two months' house arrest, three years' probation and ordered to repay the government for the claim.

National Guard Arrives In New Orleans (AP)

By Cain Burdeau

The AP, June 21, 2006

NEW ORLEANS - Nine months after they rode to the rescue in the desperate aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, National Guardsmen carrying M-16s returned to the city Tuesday to reinforce a depleted police department and battle a surge in violence.

The 100 or so soldiers will patrol the streets in ravaged neighborhoods left deserted by Katrina, freeing up police officers to concentrate on more heavily populated sections.

"We're just trying to give a hand to the city of New Orleans," said Lt. Melvin Edwards, 32, a member of 239th Military Police Company.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco sent in the National Guard at the mayor's request after a bloody weekend in which six people were killed.

"Criminals, hear me loud, hear me clearly: There is law and order in New Orleans," she said. "We will not let the criminals take root as our families return."

The troops, dressed in full camouflage fatigues, carried M-16s, handguns and belt clips of ammunition as they arrived in a convoy of 75 vehicles. They parked their Humvees and tanker trucks in formation in front of the Convention Center, drawing waves and thumbs-up from onlookers.

Up to 200 more Guardsmen will be sent in later, bringing the total in the city to 300. In addition, 60 state police officers were sent to help keep the peace.

As the soldiers arrived, New Orleans police were investigating another slaying, that of a 22-year-old man. The killing brought this year's murder toll to 54. That number is still less than the 81 recorded during the first four months of 2005. But New Orleans' population these days is less than half of what it was before Katrina.

The bloodshed has raised fears that violence is back on the rise in a city that was plagued by crime before Katrina drove out half its population of 465,000.

Community leaders are afraid the violence will discourage people from returning.

King Milling, a New Orleans banker, said he was "just delighted" by the troops' arrival. "The powers-that-be recognize that this is an issue that we must deal with," he said.

Many of the soldiers that arrived Tuesday were sent to New Orleans during Katrina, but they had not seen the city since those desperate days.

Sgt. Alfred Glasper of Baton Rouge looked for signs of appreciation as he steered a tan Humvee down Interstate 10 into the heart of the city.

"There you go," he said, pointing to a man stopped on the side of the highway and waving. "People down here didn't want us to leave - they felt very safe."

Later, the troops marched to an office building at the port of New Orleans, where they were briefed on their mission.

Guard Lt. Col. Pete Schneider said that patrols started later than scheduled because of a communications glitch, but that troops were on the ground as of Tuesday night.

"We were running late. We were a little anxious in getting out there," Schneider said.

Mayor Ray Nagin had asked for help from the National Guard and state police on Monday after five teenagers in an SUV were gunned down Saturday in the city's deadliest attack in at least 11 years. Police said it was apparently motivated by drugs or revenge. In a separate attack, a man was stabbed to death Sunday.

Capt. Alfred Travis, the company commander, said the Guard's mission was "still part of Katrina."

"We're in the disaster phase, and I think we may be in the disaster phase for a while, until the neighborhoods are built up again," Travis said.

DOJ_NMG_0036254

The National Guard had as many as 15,000 soldiers in the city in the weeks after Katrina. As many as 2,000 stayed until February.

The police force is down to about 1,375 officers, compared with about 1,750 before Katrina.

"I think people are happy they're doing something," said Nathan Chapman, president of a neighborhood organization. "The most important thing is that we fix the problem, not pretend we don't have one."

But Cherie Kerr, who runs a Santa Ana., Calif., public-relations firm that specializes in crisis, said the move gives the impression that crime is out of hand.

"When you call in the National Guard, you're pretty much saying you're out of control," Kerr said.

Noel Scallan, executive assistant at a luxury French Quarter hotel, said calls poured in from people planning to attend a national library convention moments after it was announced that the National Guard would be sent in.

"They got panicky - 'What's going on? Is it OK?'" Scallan said. But there were no cancellations, he said.

But Bill Walker, general manager of a French-style manor on Bourbon Street, called the move "very positive," saying nothing would panic his guests more "than if the crime were to increase."

New Orleans Police Superintendent Warren J. Riley said Monday he had asked in March to have troops sent in this summer, when the population is expected to increase because FEMA assistance to displaced hurricane refugees ends June 30.

Riley insisted his department is capable of controlling crime, saying: "This is not a situation where anything is out of control."

A Legacy Of The Storm: Depression And Suicide (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

NEW ORLEANS, June 20 — Sgt. Ben Glaudi, the commander of the Police Department's Mobile Crisis Unit here, spends much of each workday on this city's flood-ravaged streets trying to persuade people not to kill themselves.

Last Tuesday in the French Quarter, Sergeant Glaudi's small staff was challenged by a man who strode straight into the roaring currents of the Mississippi River, hoping to drown. As the water threatened to suck him under, the man used the last of his strength to fight the rescuers, refusing to be saved.

"He said he'd lost everything and didn't want to live anymore," Sergeant Glaudi said.

The man was counseled by the crisis unit after being pulled from the river against his will. Others have not been so lucky.

"These things come at me fast and furious," Sergeant Glaudi said. "People are just not able to handle the situation here."

New Orleans is experiencing what appears to be a near epidemic of depression and post-traumatic stress disorders, one that mental health experts say is of an intensity rarely seen in this country. It is contributing to a suicide rate that state and local officials describe as close to triple what it was before Hurricane Katrina struck and the levees broke 10 months ago.

Compounding the challenge, the local mental health system has suffered a near total collapse, heaping a great deal of the work to be done with emotionally disturbed residents onto the Police Department and people like Sergeant Glaudi, who has sharp crisis management skills but no medical background. He says his unit handles 150 to 180 such distress calls a month.

Dr. Jeffrey Rouse, the deputy New Orleans coroner dealing with psychiatric cases, said the suicide rate in the city was less than nine a year per 100,000 residents before the storm and increased to an annualized rate of more than 26 per 100,000 in the four months afterward, to the end of 2005.

While there have been 12 deaths officially classified as suicides so far this year, Dr. Rouse and Dr. Kathleen Crapanzano, director of the Louisiana Office of Mental Health, said the real number was almost certainly far higher, with many self-inflicted deaths remaining officially unclassified or wrongly described as accidents.

Charles G. Curie, the administrator of the federal Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, said the scope of the disaster that the hurricane inflicted had been "unprecedented," and added, "We've had great concerns about the level of substance abuse and mental health needs being at levels we had not seen before."

This is a city where thousands of people are living amid ruins that stretch for miles on end, where the vibrancy of life can be found only along the slivers of land next to the Mississippi. Garbage is piled up, the crime rate has soared, and as of Tuesday the National Guard and the state police were back in the city, patrolling streets that the Police Department has admitted it cannot handle on its own. The reminders of death are everywhere, and the emotional toll is now becoming clear.

Gina Barbe rode out the storm at her mother's house near Lake Pontchartrain, and says she has been crying almost every day since.

"I thought I could weather the storm, and I did — it's the aftermath that's killing me," said Ms. Barbe, who worked in tourism sales before the disaster. "When I'm driving through the city, I have to pull to the side of the street and sob. I can't drive around this city without crying."

Many people who are not at serious risk of suicide are nonetheless seeing their lives eroded by low-grade but persistent feelings of sadness, hopelessness and stress-related illnesses, doctors and researchers say. All this goes beyond the effects of 9/11 and the Oklahoma City bombing, Mr. Curie said. Beyond those of Hurricanes Andrew, Hugo and Ivan.

"We've been engaged much longer and with much more intensity in this disaster than in previous disasters," he said.

At the end of each day, Sergeant Glaudi returns to his own wrecked neighborhood and sleeps in a government-issued trailer outside what used to be home.

"You ride around and all you see is debris, debris, debris," he said.

And that is a major part of the problem, experts agree: the people of New Orleans are traumatized again every time they look around.

"This is a trauma that didn't last 24 hours, then go away," said Dr. Crapanzano, the Louisiana mental health official. "It goes on and on."

"If I could do anything," said Dr. Howard J. Osofsky, the chairman of the psychiatry department at Louisiana State University, "it would be to have a quicker pace of recovery for the community at large. The mental health needs are related to this."

The state estimates that the city has lost more than half its psychiatrists, social workers, psychologists and other mental health workers, many of whom relocated after the storm. And according to the Louisiana Hospital Association, there are little more than 60 hospital beds for psychiatric patients in the seven hospitals that remain open here.

Because of a lack of mental heath clinics and related services, severely disturbed patients end up in hospital emergency rooms, where they often languish. Many poorer patients were dependent on a large public institution, Charity Hospital, but it has been closed since the storm despite the protests of many medical professionals who say the building is in good condition. Big Charity, as the locals called it, had room for 100 psychiatric patients and could have used more capacity.

"When you don't have a place to send that wandering schizophrenic directing traffic, guess what? Law enforcement is going to wind up taking care of that," said Dr. Rouse, the deputy coroner. "When the Police Department is forced to do the job of the mental health system, it's a lose-lose situation for everyone."

"When the family comes to see me at the coroner's office," he added, "it's a defeat. The state has a moral obligation to reinstitute this care."

Sergeant Glaudi and others said some people struggling with emotional issues had no prior history of mental illness or depression.

The symptoms cut across economic and racial lines; life in New Orleans is difficult and inconvenient for everyone.

Susan Howell, a political scientist at the University of New Orleans, conducted a recent study with researchers from Louisiana State to see how people were coping with everyday life in the city and neighboring Jefferson Parish. Ms. Howell managed a similar survey in 2003.

"The symptoms of depression have, at minimum, doubled since Katrina," she said. "These are classic post-trauma symptoms. People can't sleep, they're irritable, feeling that everything's an effort and sad."

The new survey was conducted in March and April, and canvassed 470 respondents who were living in houses or apartments. Since they were not living in government-issued trailers, it is likely that they were among the more fortunate.

Jennifer Lindsley, a gallery owner, also feels the sting of missing her friends.

"When you can't get ahold of people you used to know, it leaves you feeling kind of empty," Ms. Lindsley said. "When you try to explain it to people in other cities, they say: 'The whole world is over it, so you've got to get over it. Sorry that happened, but too bad. Move on.' "

Some people have decided to leave solely because of the mood of the city.

"I'm really aware of the air of mild depression that pervades this entire area," said Gayle Falgoust, a retired teacher. "I'm leaving after this month. I worry about living with this level of depression all the time. I worry that it might affect my health. I know the move will improve my mood."

The New York Times (editorial), June 21, 2006

It has been almost 10 months since Hurricane Katrina battered the Gulf Coast, and there is still no redevelopment plan for New Orleans. Congress has passed the emergency relief bill, and President Bush has signed it into law. Billions of dollars are headed the city's way. Leaders in New Orleans and in the state capital of Baton Rouge will have only one chance to get it right. There are no more excuses for local officials, no more pointing toward Washington. It is time for southeastern Louisiana to rebuild itself.

Yet Adam Nossiter reported this week in The Times that it will be six months before a "master planning document" answers the questions foremost in the minds of residents, like which neighborhoods will return, where rebuilding will be encouraged and where returning residents will have to make do without city services. That is totally unacceptable.

In large swaths of the city, houses still sit empty, block after block. In many places, trash and flood-ruined automobiles have yet to be cleared away. These wastelands provide hideouts for criminals, the perfect breeding ground for the kind of violence that erupted over the weekend when five teenagers were shot and killed. If the city's open wounds are left to fester, it will begin to rot from the inside.

The city's police department is close to its prehurricane size, protecting a population that is less than half of what it was before the storm. Yet Mayor Ray Nagin has now felt compelled to request — and the governor has granted — a National Guard force to help keep the peace. This does not bolster our confidence that the city will be able to govern itself.

New Orleans has its own way of doing things and says it doesn't want to be told by outsiders in what size and shape it should be reborn. That is fair enough, but only if local officials are living up to their responsibilities. Right now, the people of the city are being held hostage to whims and foot-dragging, their lives on hold as they wait for their leaders to make decisions — decisions that should have been made months ago.

If there is one individual who needs to step up more than any other, it is Mayor Nagin. His city needs a leader more than a politician in this difficult time. Now that Mr. Nagin has been re-elected, it is time to start spending the political capital his victory earned him. His legacy will not rest on how many people like him, but on the effectiveness of the reconstruction and the safety and well-being of residents in the years to come.

New Orleans needs its mayor to speak difficult truths — like telling the residents of a vulnerable block that they will have to rebuild on safer ground. Right now, people don't know if or where to build their new walls. They deserve answers. They have waited long enough.

WAR NEWS:

Senate Democrats Offer Competing Iraq Proposals (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - Democrats, searching for a unified stance on Iraq, will kick off a Senate debate Wednesday over competing troop-withdrawal proposals that reflect mixed public opinions about the war.

One proposal, offered by Democratic Sens. John Kerry of Massachusetts and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, would set a hard pullout deadline of July 2007. A more broadly backed bill, proposed by Democratic Sens. Carl Levin of Michigan and Jack Reed of Rhode Island, calls for troops to begin moving out of Iraq this year, but sets no timetable for final withdrawal.

Though the measures were designed to distinguish Democrats from Republicans on the dominant issue of the day as November's congressional elections near, they also exposed Democratic divisions on the war. Some top Republicans dismissed both proposals as "cut and run" policies and evidence of Democratic incoherence on Iraq.

Senate Republican leader Bill Frist of Tennessee equated the Democratic proposals to surrender.

"We cannot retreat. We cannot surrender. We cannot go wobbly," he said. "The price is far too high."

But at least one Republican senator praised Levin and Reed.

"Levin-Reed starts to get to the real core of responsible policy-making," Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., said in an interview. "It's a very thoughtful presentation. The Levin-Reed amendment is not a cut-and-run."

Levin said he declined to set a specific time for a pullout because it would be "arbitrary" and "precipitous."

Kerry has argued that the Bush administration needs to set a timetable to prod the Iraqi government to take control. Without deadlines, he's said, Iraq will continue to rely on the U.S. military for security.

Levin downplayed the differences between the Democratic proposals.

"The differences between where most Democrats are and where nearly all Republicans are are much greater than any differences among Democrats," he said.

The competing plans were the subject of the Democrats' regular closed-door Tuesday luncheon in the Capitol, which they described as spirited and earnest.

"It's desirable if we could be unified, but there are strong points of view," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., who's backing Levin's proposal.

The Levin-Reed proposal also has the support of Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada. His spokesman, Jim Manley, predicted that it would draw 37 to 38 Democratic votes and some Republicans as well.

Kerry had earlier proposed a measure to withdraw from Iraq by the end of this year. When Republicans put that idea to a vote last week, it failed 93-6. Kerry said that by extending that deadline six months he'd gained some votes.

The debate comes as a new poll by the Pew Research Center recorded conflicting views from the American public on the war. The poll, conducted June 14-19, found growing optimism, with 53 percent of respondents saying they thought the military effort was going "at least fairly well." That's an improvement over April, when only 47 percent held that view.

At the same time, 52 percent wanted a timetable for withdrawing troops.

Frist Decries Proposals For Withdrawal (USAT)

WASHINGTON — Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist declared Tuesday that “surrendering is not a solution” in Iraq as Democrats embraced a proposal to start troop withdrawals this year, setting up an election-year showdown in the Senate.

“We cannot retreat. We cannot surrender. We cannot go wobbly,” Frist said, suggesting Democrats want to do that.

Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the second-ranking Democrat in the Senate, disputed the characterization of the Democrats' position. “We have to serve notice on the Iraqis that their future has to be in their own hands,” he said.

Democrats prepared to introduce a non-binding resolution on Iraq that calls for redeployments to begin this year but does not set a firm deadline by which all forces must be out of the war zone. The Senate was expected to take up and vote on the resolution today.

The Senate also is to consider a separate proposal by Sens. John Kerry, D-Mass., and Russ Feingold, D-Wis., that would require all combat troops to be withdrawn from Iraq by July 1, 2007.

Troop 'Redeployment' Sought By Democrats (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

Democrats said yesterday that the United States must start "redeploying" troops from Iraq, calling the recovery of the mutilated bodies of two U.S. soldiers a "grim reminder" of why withdrawal should begin soon.

Republican leaders called the proposal for withdrawal a "cut and run" that would embolden terrorists.

The Senate is expected to spend at least five hours today debating two competing Democratic proposals to start pulling U.S. combat troops out of Iraq.

The killings are "a grim reminder of the price we're paying for a failed policy in Iraq," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the Democratic whip. "It's time for Iraqis to stand up. When will this end?"

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said withdrawing troops would be a "dishonor of historic proportions."

"The Iraqi people want us and need us to help them. If we break our promise and cut and run, as some would have us do, the implications could be catastrophic," the Tennessee Republican said. "Surrendering is not a solution. We cannot go wobbly. The price is too high."

Last night, in a speech at the Hyatt Regency Washington to Republican volunteers, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said, "Republicans unite on the need to stay on the offense to confront terrorists; Democrats are having a debate in their party."

He characterized the Democratic debate as some "say we need to cut and run; some people say we need to walk ... and other people say we need to jog."

The comments come as lawmakers embark on a second week of debating Iraq policy, this time in the form of the Senate's defense authorization bill.

Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat and ranking member on the Armed Services Committee, and Sen. Jack Reed, Rhode Island Democrat, have sponsored an amendment that calls for "phased redeployment" to begin by Dec. 31. The nonbinding amendment would require the Bush administration to submit a schedule for continued troop withdrawal.

Democratic Sens. John Kerry of Massachusetts and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin have a binding amendment calling for all combat troops to be redeployed by July 1, 2007. A similar measure offered last week was overwhelmingly defeated in the Senate.

Mr. Kerry and Mr. Feingold -- potential presidential candidates in 2008 -- sent a joint e-mail to Mr. Kerry's 2004 campaign supporters saying that withdrawal will lead to a more effective war on terror.

"Our troops have served valiantly in Iraq," the senators said. "Now, it's time to put the future of Iraq where it belongs: in the hands of the Iraqi people and their leaders."

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid said Democrats agree that there "should be a redeployment starting sooner rather than later," and downplayed the difference between the Levin and Kerry amendments.

"Even though we have at least two positions, I think if you look at them closely, they are both basically the same: that there should be redeployment of troops. It's a question of when," the Nevada Democrat said.

Mr. Levin and Mr. Reed insisted yesterday that their amendment is not "cutting and running," and that it sets no pace or speed for combat troops to leave Iraq.

Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, disagreed. "I don't support it. I strongly believe it's not when we leave, it's how we leave," he said.

Either amendment would need 51 votes to become attached to the defense authorization bill. It is unlikely that enough Republicans will join the about 40 Democrats expected to vote for the Levin amendment. Fewer Democrats are expected to back the Kerry amendment because it fixes a date for complete withdrawal from Iraq.

National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley told reporters on Air Force One yesterday that Iraqis are eager to assume responsibility for their nation's security. "Their concern is that we will move, draw down our forces too quickly, before they're ready," he said.

The Senate last year passed a resolution declaring that 2006 would be a year of "significant transition" in Iraq.

Last week, House lawmakers voted 256-153 to reject a timetable for troop withdrawal and approved a nonbinding resolution that affirms the Bush administration's Iraq policy.

The 10 hours of House debate and expected five hours of Senate debate are the most significant discussion of Iraq policy since the war began in March 2003. More than 2,500 troops have been killed in the war.

The Senate yesterday voted 79-19 to pass a nonbinding amendment saying Iraq should not grant amnesty to terrorists who attack, kill or wound U.S. troops, responding to a newspaper report that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was considering limited pardons for militants who lay down arms. Senators also voted 64-34 to approve a measure saying Congress recognizes Iraq as a sovereign nation.

Democrats Divided On Withdrawal Of Troops (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

While congressional Republicans continued to show almost unanimous support for President Bush's handling of the Iraq war, Democrats struggled for consensus yesterday, reflecting what some of them called the public's mixed feelings about the three-year-old conflict.

After a sometimes heated closed-door meeting, Senate Democrats postponed action on two proposals related to drawdowns of U.S. troops in Iraq. One would direct Bush to bring nearly all the troops home within 13 months. The other would urge him to begin an unspecified withdrawal by the end of this year.

Debate and votes on the two measures are likely to be held today and tomorrow, with Senate Republicans happy to clear the way for Democrats to showcase their divisions. Senators predicted that few, if any, Republicans will embrace the Democrats' proposals, mirroring the nearly unanimous support House Republicans displayed last week for Bush's policies.

The Senate Democrats' weekly closed luncheon was unusually spirited, participants said, because the discussion focused entirely on Iraq, particularly Sen. John F. Kerry's proposal to order Bush to remove the troops by July 31, 2007. When the 90-minute session ended, only a handful of Democrats appeared to be leaning toward supporting Kerry (Mass.), but he vowed to push the amendment today.

Some Democrats said their party's divisions are hardly surprising in light of polls showing that many Americans oppose the war but do not want to leave Iraq amid such chaos that it is a breeding ground for terrorism.

"The American people have mixed feelings about Iraq -- where we are, where we're going there," Sen. Mark Pryor (Ark.) said as he left the meeting. "The American people really understand that it's a complicated situation."

The Democrats' chief alternative to Kerry's proposal is sponsored by Sens. Carl M. Levin (Mich.) and Jack Reed (R.I.). Their nonbinding resolution urges Bush to begin "redeploying" troops from Iraq by Dec. 31, but it sets no deadline for a full withdrawal.

Kerry, Levin and Reed say Iraqis must understand that the U.S. military presence in their country is not open-ended and that Iraqis therefore should step up efforts to train and equip their police and army. Backers of the Levin-Reed plan say that a firm deadline for a full withdrawal could imperil Iraq's government if its security forces are not ready to impose stability.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) said yesterday that he would support both measures. "This war has been a costly, tragic mistake that has not made us more secure," he said. "We need to send the signal to all concerned that it's time for Iraqis to take responsibility for running Iraq and for our troops to come home."

GOP leaders took obvious pleasure in the Democrats' disarray, issuing a stream of press releases with headlines such as, "Democrats Divided On The Meaning Of Their Own Amendments."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), speaking of the Democratic proposals, said: "The Iraqi people want and need us to help them. If we don't -- if we break our promise and cut and run as some would have us do -- the implications could be catastrophic."

Some Democrats, however, said congressional Republicans are misreading the public and the situation in Iraq. "Republicans are unified with Bush in an absolutely disastrous, calamitous policy," Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.) said in an interview. Biden, who has traveled to Iraq several times, said he did not support Kerry's proposal but agrees that the United States must send Baghdad a strong signal to purge sectarian killers from its security forces and bring more Sunnis into the circles of power.

Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) acknowledged his party's divisions over Iraq but played down the significance. "One thing Democrats agree on is this war has taken too long, it's too expensive and costs too many lives and too many soldiers injured," he told reporters. "We all agree there should be a change in the course of the war. We all agree that there should be redeployment starting sooner rather than later."

On Iraq, Kerry Again Leaves Democrats Fuming (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 20 — When Senator John Kerry was their presidential nominee in 2004, Democrats fervently wished he would express himself firmly about the Iraq war.

Mr. Kerry has found his resolve. But it has not made his fellow Democrats any happier. They fear the latest evolution of Mr. Kerry's views on Iraq may now complicate their hopes of taking back a majority in Congress in 2006.

As the Senate prepared for what promises to be a sharp debate starting on Wednesday about whether to begin pulling troops from Iraq, the Democratic leadership wants its members to rally behind a proposal that calls for some troops to move out by the end of this year but does not set a fixed date for complete withdrawal. Mr. Kerry has insisted on setting a date, for American combat troops to pull out in 12 months, saying anything less is too cautious.

In drawing up a schedule for the Wednesday session, the Democratic leadership has arranged for its plan to be debated first, pushing Mr. Kerry and his proposal into the evening, too late for the nightly television news, to starve it of some attention.

Senate Democrats have been loath to express their opinions publicly, determined to emphasize a united front. But interviews suggest a frustration with Mr. Kerry, never popular among the caucus, and still unpopular among many Democrats for failing to defeat a president they considered vulnerable. Privately, some of his Democratic peers complain that he is too focused on the next presidential campaign.

Mr. Kerry now describes the war in Iraq as a mistake, even though he once supported it. His critics say they believe the new stand reflects more politics than principle, and ignores other Democrats' concern that setting a fixed date will leave those in tough re-election fights open to Republican taunts that they are "cutting and running" in Iraq.

The Democrats' exasperation has increased in the last week, as they postponed a vote on Mr. Kerry's amendment to try to fashion a broader consensus among themselves. Democrats up for re-election asked him not to propose a fixed date. But Mr. Kerry, several Democrats said, was unwilling to budge from that idea, even though his co-sponsor, Senator Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, seemed willing to compromise for the sake of consensus. In the end, Mr. Kerry agreed only to extend his deadline, from Dec. 31 of this year to July 2007.

Mr. Kerry's insistence on pushing ahead with his own plan has left the Democrats divided, and open to renewed Republican accusations that they are indecisive and weak — the same ridicule that Republicans heaped on Mr. Kerry in 2004, when his "I was for it before I was against it" statement about a vote on money for the war became a punch line.

"There are certain Democrats who think that this is over, that we've lost or that there's nothing constructive the president is going to do," said Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, who, like Mr. Kerry, is considering running for president and who sat in on the meetings where Democrats searched for consensus. "What it really is, in fairness to them, is a frustration that they see no learning curve on the part of this administration. I can understand that frustration. But setting a date is not a plan."

Stepping into an elevator on Capitol Hill late last week, Mr. Kerry was asked whether he was under pressure in the Democrats' meetings to withdraw his proposal. As he insisted he was not, Senator Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, standing behind him, raised his eyebrows, then winked.

In an interview, Mr. Dodd, who is also considering a presidential run, said one danger in the November election was in making Democrats look indecisive. "If the argument comes down to, Is it one year or 18 months, I think we're going to confuse people," he said. "I'm not sure what the value is; I think it hurts us rather than helps."

Polls suggest many Americans are eager to see American troops come home from Iraq but are uneasy about leaving too soon. The rival Democratic approaches may reflect that tension, with Mr. Kerry appealing to those who regard the war as a mistake, while the Democratic leaders reflect more caution.

Matt Bennett, a spokesman for Third Way, a group of moderate Democrats, said his organization preferred an approach that did not set a date, proposed by Senators Carl Levin of Michigan and Jack Reed of Rhode Island. Of Mr. Kerry's stance, Mr. Bennett said: "He feels like he needs to sharpen his position. But voters can sense when you're being resolute for convenience sake, or for political advantage."

DOJ_NMG_0036261

Some Democrats felt Mr. Kerry allowed Republicans to embarrass them in a vote last week, when the Republicans embraced Mr. Kerry's proposal, certain it would be defeated and allow them to declare themselves the party of unity and strength.

In a telephone interview on Tuesday, Mr. Kerry characterized his statement as the position of strength, and said Democrats had made a mistake not to take a firm stand.

"The Democrats need to be strong and stand up with a clear articulation about how we make the United States stronger," he said. "As far as I'm concerned, we should go right at Karl Rove and his phony tough talk that is calculated purely for the election and not for a successful strategy in Iraq."

"I'm doing what I think is the right thing to do as a policy matter," he said, "for our troops and for the country. Someone else will deal with politics."

Mr. Kerry said he did not want to analyze his campaign mistakes but insisted he had been firm. "What's clear is that I said that it was the wrong war, wrong place, wrong time," he said. "I couldn't have been clearer about the president mishandling the war."

The Democrats tried to minimize their differences. Mr. Levin said differences among Democrats were not as big as the differences between Democrats and Republicans.

"One thing the Democrats agree on is that this war has taken too long, is too expensive and has cost too many lives," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the minority leader.

Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democrats' effort to take control of the Senate, minimized the effect the vote would have in November.

"The public and the voters are looking at how George Bush handles Iraq," he said. "They know that he got us in there, they know he's the commander in chief, and they don't believe he has figured out a strategy that will show light at the end of the tunnel. That is the overriding issue in the election, far more than what Democrats are doing."

Mr. Feingold, Mr. Kerry's co-sponsor, said: "There should be no political considerations, there should be only considerations for the security of the American people. I believe the American people, even in conservative states, are willing to see this end."

He said that a year ago he was the only senator calling for a withdrawal. "This is building," he said. "The American people are actually way ahead of the Senate on this."

Although Mr. Kerry's approach is to be debated last, the Democratic leadership has arranged that it be voted on first, before the Levin-Reed proposal. In the interview, Mr. Kerry said that if his amendment failed, he might consider voting for the alternative "as a means of making some statement." But, he said, "My preference is, we take some strong position that's got a date."

Possible White House Hopefuls Unite On Iraq (AP-Y2)

By Liz Sidoti

Two potential 2008 presidential candidates appealed Tuesday for the Senate to support their call to withdraw U.S. combat troops from Iraq "by a hard and fast deadline," a position putting them at odds with most of their fellow Democrats.

"Our country desperately needs a new vision for strengthening our national security, and it starts by redeploying U.S. forces out of Iraq," Sens. John Kerry of Massachusetts and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin wrote in an e-mail sent to 3 million people nationwide.

"It's time for every member of the Senate to send an important message that we must change course," the senators wrote, imploring recipients to "take a stand against the senseless 'stay the course' Bush policy" and tell their senators to vote with the two Democrats.

In what promises to be a highly partisan election-year showdown Wednesday, the GOP-controlled Senate plans to take up the proposal by Kerry and Feingold that would require the Bush administration to withdraw all combat troops from Iraq by July 1, 2007. Redeployment would begin immediately, under the proposal.

At least six other Democrats have publicly or privately indicated support for that position in recent days. The Senate will vote on the proposal by week's end.

The Senate also will consider, and eventually vote on, a separate nonbinding resolution that has the backing of Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and, his aides say, a majority of Democrats.

It would call for — but not require — the administration to begin "a phased redeployment of U.S. forces" this year, and would not set a firm deadline by which time all forces must be out of the war zone.

Seeking support, Democratic sponsors of both proposals pitched their positions during the party's weekly policy luncheon on Tuesday. However, neither proposal is expected to win enough votes to be attached as an amendment to an annual military measure pending in the Senate.

Both proposals, nonetheless, are drawing ridicule from Republicans, who lumped Democrats into two groups — what they called the "cut and run" crowd backing the Kerry-Feingold position and the "cut and jog" folks supporting the other proposal.

"We cannot retreat. We cannot surrender. We cannot go wobbly. The price is far too high," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said Tuesday, suggesting Democrats want to do just that.

Sen. Carl Levin (news, bio, voting record) of Michigan, the top Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, disputed the GOP characterization of the resolution that would call for U.S. troops to start leaving Iraq this year.

"It's not a cut-and-run strategy. It does not set a fixed timetable or an arbitrary deadline for the redeployment of our troops," he said. "We believe it represents where a majority of our caucus is."

With midterm elections less than five months away, Republicans are working to highlight divisions in the Democratic Party on Iraq as they seek to hang onto control of the House and Senate when polls show the public favoring a power shift to Democrats.

A week ago, the GOP-controlled Senate and House engineered back-to-back votes on Iraq that forced lawmakers in both parties to go on record on the war that polls show most Americans no longer support amid a rising U.S. death toll and a soaring price tag. In the end, both chambers of Congress soundly rejected timetables for pulling U.S. forces out of Iraq.

Across the Capitol on Tuesday, the House easily approved an additional $50 billion for Iraq and Afghanistan as part of a $427 billion measure funding the Pentagon budget for the fiscal year beginning Oct. 1. The money comes on top of $66 billion for Iraq and Afghanistan approved just last week. The vote was 407-19.

Led by Levin, Senate Democrats have spent the past week writing a proposal on Iraq that could get wide support among their rank and file. At the same time, Kerry and Feingold announced they would press their own separate proposals calling for a quick U.S. withdrawal from Iraq.

A somewhat curious pairing, the two joined forces — and offered one amendment — after failing in private meetings to convince fellow Democrats that the so-called "consensus" proposal should include what they call "a date certain" for all U.S. forces to have left Iraq.

Feingold was the first Democratic senator to call for a withdrawal timetable, but his position has been overshadowed by Kerry, who has a stronger national profile because of his status as the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee.

Both are posturing for possible presidential runs in 2008, and their positions on Iraq play well with the liberal wing of the party — the Democratic faithful who will vote for the next Democratic presidential nominee.

Iraq, Unfiltered (NYT)

Bush administration supporters regularly accuse the news media of reporting only bad news from Iraq and filtering out more positive stories. But just hours before American television screens began to be filled with upbeat clips of President Bush's surprise trip to Baghdad last week, the United States Embassy there cabled back a far grimmer picture of the mounting difficulties faced by its Iraqi employees.

The cable, reprinted by The Washington Post, told of embassy employees running a daily gantlet of religious dress-code enforcers and harassment by militia-style security guards — even at checkpoints surrounding the fortified Green Zone, where the embassy is located. When the Iraqi employees return to their homes, they face sweltering neighborhoods without regular electric power, daylong gasoline lines, and families torn by religious and ethnic tensions and mounting fears for the future.

The cable relays a report from an Arab editor that "ethnic cleansing" is going on "in almost every Iraqi" province. The embassy itself suspects that Shiite governmental authorities in Baghdad may be deliberately evicting Kurdish households in response to Kurdish evictions of Arabs in other parts of the country. A Sunni woman employee reports that "most of her family believes that the U.S. — which is widely perceived as fully controlling the country and tolerating the malaise — is punishing populations as Saddam did."

The cable is only a raw snapshot of the daily experiences of embassy employees, not a systematic nationwide survey. Yet embassy employees are in many ways better off than most Iraqis. At least they have jobs and someone to turn to for help. We can only guess what daily life must be like in besieged Sunni cities like Ramadi or the militia-ruled Shiite towns of the Basra area, some now too dangerous for reporters to venture into regularly.

Mr. Bush's six-hour visit to Baghdad was mostly spent inside the Green Zone, where he made much of what he had been able to learn from looking Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki "in the eyes." Now that he's home, Mr. Bush needs to take a hard, unfiltered look at the more disturbing picture relayed by America's embassy.

Pentagon Picks Troops For Iraq, Maintaining Current Contingent (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 20 —The Pentagon announced Tuesday that it planned to send 21,000 troops to Iraq in the next rotation of forces. That would keep the American presence at current levels into next year, unless the security situation improved.

Senior military officials said that the announcement of units to be deployed between August and January could change, depending on conditions in Iraq, and that so-called off ramps for the troops bound for Iraq were still under discussion.

Bryan G. Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman, said after the announcement, "One should not read into this a decision" about long-term troop levels in Iraq.

But at a minimum, the announcement represents a decision that for planning purposes at least, American troops in Iraq would be replaced on a one-for-one basis for now.

This week, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the senior American commander in Iraq, is to brief Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon on his newest thinking about force levels through the end of the year.

Although a discussion of potential troop reductions is certain during General Casey's meeting with Mr. Rumsfeld, the White House and the Pentagon have rejected calls, mostly from Democrats in Congress, for setting formal timetables for withdrawing from Iraq.

President Bush and Mr. Rumsfeld have said repeatedly that troop levels would be based on assessments from military commanders on the strength of the insurgency and on the capability of Iraqi troops to take over the fight.

Even so, White House officials expressed hopes last fall that reductions would come this summer, so that Republicans preparing for mid-term Congressional elections could point to progress in Iraq.

General Casey himself had said he would make recommendations on future troop numbers by the end of spring. Ground commanders in Iraq have argued that a premature decision to reduce American troops could jeopardize the mission in Iraq.

Previous predictions that American troops could drop to 100,000 by the end of the year were based on the expectation that the Iraqis would form a new government by March.

But the new government did not form until May, and important posts, including the top security positions, were not filled until earlier this month.

American troop numbers in Iraq fluctuate almost daily, as soldiers flow in and out of the country.

Troop levels early this month of 132,000 had dropped to 127,000 last week, military officials said.

Even if the number of combat brigades sent to Iraq drops over coming months, the separate requirements for support and service troops — military trainers, intelligence officers and logisticians, for example — may offset some reductions in American combat forces.

Pentagon and military planners said Tuesday's announcement was somewhat of a mechanical requirement, and was an attempt to balance a traditional tension between combat commanders who deploy troops in the field and commanders at home who provide those forces.

Field commanders want maximum flexibility in deciding whether and when to increase or decrease troop levels; commanders at home desire precise, early decisions in order to prepare equipment, troops and family members in advance of a deployment.

Pentagon and military officials predicted that General Casey's visit to Washington this week would include discussions of ways to reduce troop numbers by holding back deployments to Iraq if the situation allowed.

"They are prudently planning as if this would be a rotation in kind," said one Defense Department official who was granted anonymity to describe classified discussions on troop numbers.

"But obviously they've got six months' worth of flexibility in the case of some of these units put in the queue today, since some would not deploy until January and could be off-ramped" before their departure dates.

In its announcement of the planned deployment, the Pentagon said: "The U.S. force rotations may be tailored based upon changes in the security situation. Iraqi security forces continue to develop capability and assume responsibility for security in Iraq."

The units identified for the next rotation to Iraq include the III Corps headquarters, based at Fort Hood, Tex.; the II Marine Expeditionary Force, from Camp Lejeune, N.C.; and the First Cavalry Division headquarters, from Fort Hood.

Other units were the Second and Third Brigades of the First Cavalry Division; the Fourth Brigade of the 25th Infantry Division, based at Fort Richardson, Alaska; and the Second Brigade of the Second Infantry Division, from Fort Carson, Colo.

Australia To Review Iraq Troop Levels (AP)

By Meraiah Foley, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 21, 2006

Australia will review its troop deployment to Iraq by the end of this year, the defense ministry said Wednesday, the first time the government has hinted at a possible timeline for eventual withdrawal.

Australia, a staunch U.S. ally, has around 1,320 troops in Iraq and the Middle East, including 460 troops guarding Japanese reconstruction efforts in Iraq's southern Muthana province.

Earlier this week, the Iraqi government announced that Australian and British forces would soon hand over security in the province to Iraqi forces.

Japan's announced Tuesday that it would immediately start pulling its ground troops from Iraq.

Australia's 460 troops in Muthana province will be transferred to an air base in Tallil, about 60 miles southeast of their current posting in Samawah, when Japan withdraws, Defense Minister Brendan Nelson said.

He said Australia would evaluate the success of the Iraqi forces in protecting Muthana province before reassessing its military presence in Iraq.

"I can assure you that the next six months in al-Muthana is going to be extremely important for our future involvement in Iraq," Nelson told the Channel Seven television network.

"If we can see that the provincial Iraqi government in al-Muthana can successfully manage its own affairs and its own security then I would expect that by the end of this year we would be starting to think about our future deployment."

Australia's conservative Prime Minister John Howard sent around 2,000 troops to Iraq in support of the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, despite widespread public opposition. He has repeatedly said that Australia will remain in Iraq for as long as its troops are needed, or until the Iraqi government asks them to withdraw.

Japan To Pull Ground Troops Out Of Iraq, Koizumi Says (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

TOKYO, June 20 — Japan announced Tuesday that it would start pulling its ground troops out of Iraq, putting an end to the country's most significant military mission since the end of World War II.

DOJ_NMG_0036265

Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi said the force's mission had been "fulfilled," even as he announced an expansion of Japanese air support to American and multinational troops. Japan's air force will start operating regular flights to Baghdad and Erbil, he said.

"The Ground Self-Defense Force has played a considerable role in providing humanitarian reconstruction assistance, and we have decided to withdraw," Mr. Koizumi said in a news conference.

About 600 ground troops have been based in Samawa, the capital of the southern province of Muthanna, since January 2004, providing clean water, medical assistance and repair of roads and buildings. Japanese troops, who have been limited to noncombat duties because of Japan's pacifist Constitution, have depended on other nations for their security.

The announcement came a day after the Iraqi government said British troops would transfer the responsibility for security in the relatively peaceful province to local Iraqi forces. The Japanese withdrawal is expected to take a few weeks.

Mr. Koizumi has been one of President Bush's staunchest backers in Iraq, and the Japanese troops have provided diplomatic support for Mr. Bush as other allies chose not to participate in the Iraqi occupation. The deployment helped strengthen the alliance and deepen military ties.

The country's Constitution allows Japan to possess forces only for self-defense, and imposes strict rules of engagement prohibiting offensive action. But under Mr. Koizumi, the Japanese government passed a special law permitting the deployment of troops to noncombat areas in Iraq — a move that critics called anti-constitutional

The deployment at first sharply divided Japanese public opinion, as the Japanese troops went to Iraq equipped with weapons that they had never carried abroad before, including antitank weapons.

Since the Sept. 11 attacks, Japan's maritime and air forces have supported the United States in its wars in Afghanistan and Iraq. But the deployment of ground troops, with the possibility that they could be embroiled in a situation that would force them to act in a manner against the pacifist Constitution, amounted to one of the riskiest decisions Mr. Koizumi has made as prime minister.

In Samawa, the deteriorating security situation sometimes left Japanese troops unable to leave their base — and open to charges that they were merely a symbolic force.

But with time, Japanese public opinion has grown less resistant. The dispatch has also set the stage for a more assertive Japanese military, including the transformation of its Self-Defense Agency into a ministry.

U.S. Soldiers' Bodies Are Found (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

Baghdad, Iraq — As the mutilated bodies of two American soldiers were flown to the United States in flag-draped coffins Tuesday night, the U.S. military launched a top-level investigation to determine why their vehicle had been traveling alone outside a fortified army camp when they were abducted.

A group affiliated with al-Qaida in Iraq took responsibility for killing the servicemen, whose corpses were found near an electrical plant in Yousifiya, where they had gone missing Friday night.

Iraqi and U.S. military officials said there were signs of torture on the bodies. "They were killed in a barbaric way," said Iraqi Maj. Gen. Abdul-Aziz Mohammed of the Iraqi Defense Ministry.

U.S. Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV confirmed the bodies were believed to be the remains of Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore. Caldwell said the military would conduct a complete autopsy to determine the cause of death and to "do DNA testing to confirm that it is in fact them."

A third soldier, identified as Spc. David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass. died in a firefight that preceded the abduction. All three soldiers were assigned to the 1st Battalion, 502nd Infantry Regiment, 2nd Brigade of the U.S. Army's 101st Airborne Division and were guarding a canal bridge near their military camp.

The circumstances of the initial attack remain mysterious. In a country where military vehicles -- even the most heavily armed and impervious tanks -- rarely leave fortified areas unless they are traveling in pairs, Caldwell confirmed Tuesday that the servicemen were alone.

"We know that there was a single vehicle with three American soldiers when they came under attack," Caldwell said.

The investigation into the circumstances of their capture has been opened by Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, chief of day-to-day military operations in Iraq. The Mujahedeen Shura Council, an al-Qaida-affiliated group posted a message Tuesday on a jihadist Internet site taking responsibility for the killings, but offered no proof of its involvement.

"We have good news coming straight from the battlefield to the nation of Islam," read the statement. "We satisfy your wrath by executing the sentence of God -- which is slaughter -- on those two crusader infidel prisoners."

Caldwell said U.S. troops found the bodies Monday night but did not immediately recover them, fearing that insurgents may have booby-trapped the area with explosives. U.S. troops established a perimeter and kept watch over the bodies until dawn, when they were able to bring in an explosive ordnance team and remove the remains to a military base.

As of Tuesday night, the bodies were on a plane en route to Dover Air Force Base in Delaware -- home of the U.S. military's largest mortuary.

News of the discoveries hit the soldiers' families hard. Manchea's uncle, Ken MacKenzie, went on NBC's "Today" show to blame the U.S. government for reacting too slowly to his nephew's capture and said the military should have agreed to offer $ 100 million and detainees in return for the soldiers' lives. There has been no public demand for any ransom in the case, and U.S. policy prohibits striking deals with hostage takers on the premise that it would encourage more kidnappings.

Kay Fristad, a spokeswoman for the Oregon National Guard, said Tucker's relatives were still waiting for DNA testing.

"The family isn't watching the news reports, so they don't yet know what's been reported about the conditions of the bodies," Fristad said. "That's something they may have to face later."

The U.S. military led a massive three-day search utilizing river boats, unmanned drones and nearly a dozen air assaults on suspected insurgent hideouts. One coalition member died during the search, two suspected insurgents were killed and 78 other alleged rebels were detained.

Caldwell also announced that a U.S. air strike on Friday killed a figure he described as a high-ranking al-Qaida operative in Yousifiya named Mansour Suleiman Mansour Khalifi al-Mashhadani, also known as Sheik Mansour. Caldwell said that Mansour, an Iraqi, was a spiritual leader and recruiter for al-Qaida in Iraq and a close associate of the late insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

Caldwell also held Mansour responsible for the downing of a U.S. helicopter in Yousifiya in May that killed two soldiers.

Mansour, then a member of the insurgent group Ansar al-Sunnah Army, was detained by U.S. forces in 2004 and released in the fall of that year, after which time he joined al-Qaida. Caldwell said that prison officials determined that "he was not deemed a threat to Iraqi citizens or coalition forces."

An Iraqi army officer stationed in Yousifiya said that U.S. forces withdrew from the area on Tuesday and as they departed, set fire to warehouses near the electricity plant where the bodies were discovered. Yousifiya residents extinguished the fires after the Americans left, the officer said.

U.S. and Iraqi forces continued to pressure suspected al-Qaida insurgents north of Baqouba, the same area where al-Zarqawi was killed earlier this month. The U.S. military said that soldiers killed a total of 15 suspected insurgents during a lengthy firefight that moved between at least two buildings.

A helicopter struck utility wires as it was firing on suspected insurgents during the battle and was forced to make an emergency landing. Another U.S. aircraft killed three gunmen as they attempted to attacked the downed helicopter, U.S. officials said. According to a press release, U.S. troops found insurgents hiding among nine women, none of whom were injured.

That account was questioned by the Association of Muslim Scholars in Iraq, a group of leading Sunni Arab clerics, which said that several women and children were among those killed in a U.S. airstrike in northeast Baqouba. The group also said that U.S. troops took four injured civilians with them, including a 10-year-old.

One resident said that a 12-year-old boy was among the dead.

In west Baghdad, a car bomb killed five Iraqis and injured 11 other people. In the predominately Shiite slum in Baghdad, known as Sadr City, another car bomb exploded near a wholesale market, killing four and wounding 16.

Also in Baghdad, two police men were shot to death while driving their patrol car. In the northern oil hub of Kirkuk gunmen in three cars killed three people near a traffic checkpoint.

Missing Soldiers Are Found Dead (WP)

By Jonathan Finer And Joshua Partlow

BAGHDAD, June 20 -- Two U.S. soldiers, missing for three days since their abduction in an insurgent stronghold south of Baghdad, were found dead, a military spokesman said Tuesday, and a top U.S. commander ordered an investigation into why the men were isolated from a larger force in such a dangerous part of Iraq.

The remains of the soldiers -- Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore. -- were recovered near a power plant in the town of Yusufiya, where they had been operating a vehicle checkpoint that came under attack Friday, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell said in a briefing for reporters. A third soldier, Spec. David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass., died in the initial assault.

"Coalition forces have in fact recovered what we believe to be the remains of our two soldiers," Caldwell said. "Our heartfelt prayers go out to both the families and friends of our two soldiers."

Caldwell declined to describe the condition of the soldiers' bodies, saying it would be "inappropriate until I know what the families were told." He said it was clear the soldiers had died of wounds suffered in captivity, rather than at the site of the attack on the checkpoint, but that the cause of death could not be immediately determined.

According to residents of Yusufiya and a relative of one of the victims, the soldiers were beheaded. An Iraqi official said they had been brutally tortured before their death, but provided no further details.

The bodies will be flown to Kuwait and then to Dover Air Force Base in Delaware for full autopsies and DNA testing to ensure they were identified correctly, the military said in a statement.

As 8,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops scoured the region, a tip from a local resident led them to the soldiers' bodies after dark Monday. Because the informant warned that the bodies were booby-trapped, they were not removed until after dawn Tuesday, the military said.

"We went ahead and established a cordon around the area to protect it so it would be undisturbed at daylight this morning and brought the necessary assets like explosive ordnances," Caldwell said. "They did have to dismantle some stuff to get to them."

One U.S. soldier was killed and 12 wounded during the three-day search across a vast area south of Baghdad, while two insurgents were killed and 78 detained, the military said.

The killings of the two privates raised questions about why such low-ranking troops were left alone, backed by a single armored Humvee, in a region Caldwell described Thursday as "an insurgent hotbed" and the most dangerous place in Iraq for U.S. forces after Baghdad and Ramadi. Even in safer areas, U.S. troops generally travel in convoys to provide support in case insurgents attack or a vehicle breaks down.

Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the commander of U.S. ground forces in Iraq, has ordered an investigation into procedures used that night. "They are looking at the entire situation," Caldwell said.

To the consternation of U.S. officials, who are careful to withhold casualty details until the soldiers' families can be notified, the deaths were first reported by an Iraqi defense official. Maj. Gen. Abdul Aziz Muhammed Jassim said in a news conference Tuesday they had been tortured and killed "in a barbaric way."

The Mujaheddin al-Shura Council, a collection of several insurgent groups including al-Qaeda in Iraq, claimed in an Internet statement to have "slaughtered" the two soldiers, suggesting they were beheaded. The group, which had vowed revenge on U.S. forces following the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi this month, claimed on Monday to have abducted the two privates.

Asked Tuesday if the Internet statements were credible, Caldwell responded: "Absolutely not," and added that based on "preliminary analysis" there was "no reason to believe" the group's claims.

In telephone interviews, two Yusufiya residents, Muyasar Ghalib al-Qaraghuli, 19, and a tribal leader who gave his name only as Abu Salam, described a gruesome scene in which insurgents beheaded and dismembered the soldiers after dragging their bodies behind pickup trucks.

"It's something that we are against," Qaraghuli said. "But what could we do? It happened."

Those accounts could not be independently confirmed, though U.S. and Iraqi officials acknowledged privately that the killings had been particularly brutal.

Menchaca's uncle, Mario Vasquez, said military officials told him early Tuesday morning that the two soldiers had been beheaded, according to a report on the Web site of the Houston Chronicle.

The two soldiers were the first to be classified as "duty status and whereabouts unknown," since Sgt. Keith "Matt" Maupin, who disappeared after an attack on his convoy in April 2004. He subsequently appeared in a video made by insurgents, who later released another video purporting to show his execution. The military called the footage inconclusive and continues to classify him as missing. Eleven American civilians, most of them contractors, are also considered to be missing in the country, Caldwell said.

Also Tuesday, U.S. military officials said they had killed a senior member of al-Qaeda in Iraq during an airstrike on Friday in the same area where the two Army privates vanished.

Mansur Sulayman Mansur Khalif al-Mashadani, an Iraqi known as Sheik Mansur, was a "key leader" of al-Qaeda in Iraq with "excellent religious, military and leadership credentials within that organization," said Caldwell. Mashadani, in his mid-thirties, had studied religion in Jordan before rising to be the religious emir for all of al-Qaeda in Iraq, Caldwell said.

"We do think his death will significantly continue to impact on the ability of this organization to regenerate and reorganize itself," Caldwell said.

After tracking Mashadani, U.S. forces moved to capture him, prompting Mashadani and two other people to flee in a vehicle, which was destroyed by a U.S. airstrike, said Caldwell.

Mashadani had been captured by U.S. forces in July 2004 and released that fall, Caldwell said, because he was not considered "a threat to Iraqi citizens or coalition forces." Mashadani joined al-Qaeda in Iraq after his release, he said.

On Tuesday, the U.S. military issued a statement saying it had killed 15 "terrorists" and detained three suspects during simultaneous raids near Baqubah aimed at pursuing a suspected senior member of al-Qaeda in Iraq. After being fired on from a rooftop, U.S. forces shot back and killed nine armed insurgents, and gunfire from supporting aircraft killed two others in a nearby building, the statement said.

The raids yielded 10 AK-47 assault rifles, a shotgun, a pistol and a crate of explosives, military officials said.

A different account of the incident was provided by witnesses, family members of the dead and a Sunni Muslim member of the Iraqi parliament, Mohammed al-Diani, who called the raids a "barbaric bombing" of civilians and children. Diani called on the Iraqi cabinet to investigate.

Hadi al-Azzawi, a press officer for a human rights organization in Baghdad who said he witnessed the incident, said two of the dead were young boys, ages 10 and 12, and a police officer denied any weapons were present at the scene.

When asked about the differing account, Caldwell denied there were any civilian casualties in what he described as "an extremely long firefight."

Violence continued in Baghdad despite efforts to tighten security. Four explosions detonated within an hour Tuesday morning in and around Baghdad, killing 13 people and wounding 39, said Col. Adil Saeed al-Samarai of the Interior Ministry.

In the southern city of Basra, a suicide bomber blew himself up inside a home for the elderly, killing five people and wounding 15, said Samarai.

Soldiers' Bodies Found In Iraq (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The U.S. military yesterday recovered the mutilated bodies of two Army privates kidnapped by terrorists Friday night from a checkpoint south of Baghdad.

The bodies were so horribly disfigured that final identification will require DNA testing. But U.S. military officials in Baghdad said the bodies, found in a booby-trapped area, were thought to be those of Pfc. Thomas Lowell Tucker, 25, and Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, although official confirmation awaited the notification of families.

"With great regret -- they were killed in a barbaric way," Iraqi Maj. Gen. Abdul-Aziz Mohammed told reporters.

The Associated Press in Baghdad reported that a Web site connected to the terror group al Qaeda in Iraq posted a statement, saying the two "crusaders" were "slaughtered" by Abu Ayyub al-Masri. The word "slaughtered" often means the terror victims were beheaded. The U.S. has identified al-Masri as successor to Abu Musab Zarqawi, the al Qaeda in Iraq leader who died June 7 in a strike by the U.S. military.

"We are all very much aware of the atrocities they commit," said Army Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, chief military spokesman in Baghdad, referring to the al Qaeda group. "It pains us what some service members may go through."

The soldiers' remains were being taken to Dover Air Force Base in Delaware, where a forensic laboratory would perform the DNA testing.

The abductions spurred questions inside the U.S. command on security procedures for soldiers on patrol.

Why, commanders are asking, was a small group of junior enlisted soldiers in Humvees left alone to man a checkpoint near Yusufiyah in a particularly dangerous area of Iraq dubbed the Triangle of Death? The area in the Anbar province is a hotbed of Sunni Muslim insurgents and foreign terrorists who constantly attack U.S. forces.

"My first question is: Where were the noncommissioned officers?" said a retired Army general who has spoken to active-duty officers about the incident. "Why were only privates protecting a checkpoint? The assumption you have to make is they were part of a platoon that was broken up to watch numerous checkpoints. This again goes back to the same thing: We don't have enough troops."

Soldiers and Marines in Iraq typically travel in large enough numbers to repel an attack by setting up a defensive perimeter and calling in a quick-reaction force of armored vehicles and combat aircraft as backup.

Supply convoys typically travel under a heavy guard that includes armored Humvees, Bradley fighting vehicles and attack helicopters.

Gen. Caldwell said details of what happened in the ambush at 7:55 p.m. Friday will not be released until the slain soldiers' families are briefed and added that Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the top tactical commander in Iraq, has ordered an investigation into procedures followed that night.

The Associated Press quoted an Iraqi farmer as saying insurgents created a diversion to draw some soldiers away from the checkpoint and then attacked the three remaining troops -- killing one and capturing two. The farmer's account could not be confirmed, the AP said.

Killed in the attack was Spc. David J. Babineau, 25. The three belonged to the 101st Airborne Division from Fort Campbell, Ky.

Security procedures have not always prevented combat deaths, but they have blunted kidnapping attempts. Only one other soldier, Army Reserve Sgt. Keith M. Maupin, has been captured by insurgents since Iraq fell to the allies in April 2003. The Army lists him as missing in action.

The command started an extensive manhunt for the missing soldiers during the weekend, dispatching 8,000 American and Iraqi personnel to comb the Triangle area south of Baghdad.

"We have surged intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance platforms and employed planes, boats, helicopters and [unmanned aerial vehicles] to ensure the most thorough search possible," Gen. Caldwell told reporters on Monday.

He added yesterday, "We basically have turned that area upside down."

But it was an Iraqi civilian, not the military, who first spotted the bodies.

Though insurgents had booby-trapped the area in hopes of killing rescuers, troops cordoned off the area and neutralized the bombs.

"Recovery of the remains was initiated last night and was completed this morning," the U.S. military said. "Coalition forces had to carefully maneuver their way through numerous improvised explosive devices leading up to and around the site."

At a press conference yesterday, Gen. Caldwell said the sweep resulted in the killing of Mansur al Mashhadani, whom he identified as in the top five of the al Qaeda in Iraq's leadership.

"He was a right-hand man to Zarqawi," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0036270

Mashhadani, described as the religious emir for al Qaeda in Iraq, operated in the Yusufiyah area. Before the kidnapping, U.S. forces had him under surveillance. A decision was made to arrest him and troops moved in on his location. He fled in a vehicle and was killed by an air strike, Gen. Caldwell said.

U.S. Says 2 Bodies Retrieved In Iraq Were Brutalized (NYT)

By Dexter Filkins

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 20 — The American military said Tuesday that a search team had found what appeared to be the remains of the two American soldiers captured by insurgents last week during an ambush south of the capital, and a senior Iraqi defense official said the two men had been "brutally tortured."

An American military official in Baghdad, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said that both bodies showed evidence of "severe trauma" and that they could not be positively identified. The search team spotted the bodies on Monday night, but it took 12 hours to get to them because soldiers had to make their way through "numerous" bombs along the road leading to the bodies, and around the bodies themselves, the official said.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the American military spokesman, said "the remains" were found Monday night near a power plant in the vicinity of Yusufiya, about three miles from the site were the Americans had been captured by insurgents.

General Caldwell declined to speak in detail about the physical condition of the bodies, but said the cause of death could not be determined. He said the remains of the men would be sent to the United States for DNA testing to determine their identities definitively.

That seemed to suggest that the two Americans had been wounded or mutilated beyond recognition.

"We couldn't identify them," the American military official in Baghdad said.

Maj. Gen. Abdul Azziz Mohammed Jassim, the chief of operations at the Defense Ministry, said he had seen an official report on the bodies and that he could confirm that the two Americans had been "killed in a very brutal way and tortured."

"There were traces of torture on their bodies, very clear traces," General Jassim said. "It was brutal torture. The torture was something unnatural."

The general said that he was unable to give any more details.

The American military official said that one of the bombs planted on the road leading to the bodies exploded when it was struck by an American vehicle, but that no one was injured.

"They were intentionally targeting the recovery force," the American official said.

The bodies of the two Americans were not damaged by the bombs, the official said.

The identities of the two missing soldiers were released on Monday: Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston, and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore. A third soldier, Specialist David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass., was killed when insurgents attacked the three at a traffic checkpoint.

General Caldwell said the military was investigating how three young, low-ranking soldiers ended up alone on a road in Yusufiya, a town regarded as one of the most hostile in all of Iraq.

According to Iraqis living in the area, the three soldiers, who were manning a traffic checkpoint, became isolated when several of their comrades chased a group of insurgents into the orchards off the roadside. At that point, the Iraqis said, a group of seven or eight masked guerrillas attacked the three, killing Specialist Babineau and capturing Privates Menchaca and Tucker. The Iraqis said they believed that insurgents had intentionally staged the first attack to divert most of the Americans and isolate the three.

"There was a single vehicle there with three Americans soldiers when they came under attack," General Caldwell said. "We do know that the chain of command is looking at the entire situation."

Without going into detail, General Caldwell said it was clear that the two Americans had been killed in a violent way and not from wounds received during the initial battle with the guerrillas.

"Due to the condition of their bodies, we do not believe it was by natural cause of death," he said. "It did not appear that they had been mortally wounded and moved to a location and died."

General Caldwell said the men's families in the United States had been notified that the bodies of their kin had been found. He said the Army hoped that further testing would reveal the causes of death as well.

"It pains us to realize what fellow servicemen go through," General Caldwell said in a briefing here. "Please keep both of these families in your prayers."

The American military did not release information about the identity of those who it believes may have captured the American soldiers.

An Internet statement, posted Tuesday under the name of the Mujahedeen Shura, said the successor to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi had "slaughtered" the two Americans. The Mujahedeen Shura, an umbrella group, claims Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia as a member. The Arabic word used in the posting, "nahr," denoted the cutting of the throat, and it has been used by jihadi groups when they have beheaded their victims.

The authenticity of the statement, like many that are posted on the Internet, could not be verified. The provenance of this one was called into question by SITE, a Washington group that tracks Islamic militant groups.

Rita Katz, the group's director, said she believed that the message was a fake, given the manner and place in which it was posted on the Internet. Indeed, the message disappeared from one jihadi Web site, Al Hesba, shortly after it appeared.

"There is a straightforward way that Al Qaeda posts their messages," Ms. Katz said. "This was not theirs."

On Monday, the Mujahedeen Shura said in a statement posted on the Internet that it had captured the Americans, but it provided no evidence that it had them in its custody. The group said it would provide more news in a few days. Ms. Katz said she believed that message was authentic.

Mr. Zarqawi, the head of al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, was killed in an American strike in a village 35 miles north of here on June 7. His successor, according to the group, is Abu Hamza al-Muhajir, who the Americans say is an Egyptian who has been fighting here since 2003.

A team of 8,000 troops, American and Iraqi, was assigned to search for the missing soldiers.

General Caldwell said they had encountered several bombs during their search, and also several guerrillas. One American soldier was killed and 12 were wounded during the search, he said.

This was not the first time that insurgents had planted bombs intended to explode when Americans came to recover remains, the American military official said. After insurgents shot down an American helicopter earlier this year, a team sent to recover the bodies and wreckage found 19 bombs on the road leading to the site and around the wreckage itself, the American military official in Baghdad said.

The American military goes to extraordinary lengths to ensure that its soldiers are not captured. The only other soldier captured in this war was Pfc. Keith Maupin, who was taken prisoner by insurgents in April 2004. A video showing Specialist Maupin in his army fatigues, and in the captivity of insurgents, surfaced shortly after his capture.

In June 2004, Al Jazeera, the Arabic language TV station, broadcast a video showing a person being shot. Al Jazeera said insurgents claimed the victim was Pfc. Maupin, but the man's face was not visible on the screen. The military says it is still searching for him.

Also Tuesday, the military said it was continuing its assault on the leadership of Al Qaeda, saying it had killed one of its senior leaders, Mansur Sulayman Mansur Khalif al-Mashhadani, an Iraqi, in an airstrike Friday morning near Yusufiya.

American forces had been tracking Mr. Mashhadani for some time, General Caldwell said, and then moved Friday to take him prisoner. When he tried to escape in a car, the general said, the Americans called in an airstrike to kill him.

General Caldwell said the military believed that Mr. Mashhadani, who they said was in his late 30s, was the "religious emir" for all of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia. The general said Mr. Mashhadani had been captured by American forces in July 2004 while serving in a similar capacity for two other insurgent groups, Ansar al-Islam and Ansar Al Sunnah. He was released in the fall of 2004, General Caldwell said, when "he was deemed not to be a threat to Iraqi citizens or coalition forces."

In Ramadi, the contested city west of Baghdad, local Iraqis reported a calm day, three days after Iraqi and American troops set up what they called a "security perimeter" around the city.

In his news conference on Tuesday, General Caldwell said Iraqi and American troops had entered the southern part of the city around the stadium, which has been the site of clashes. The Iraqi and American forces took up positions inside and around the stadium and set up barricades there.

General Caldwell said that the recent military activity did not amount to a full-scale invasion of the city, of the type the Marines undertook of Falluja in November 2004. He described the current operations as more limited, with the goal of allowing the Iraqi police and other security forces to "regain control" of the city. Ramadi has not been under the control of the Iraqi government or American forces for many months, and insurgents roam freely in some areas.

Still, both the American and Iraqi military seemed to leave the door open for stepped-up operations in the future. "There is currently no plan for a large-scale operation in Ramadi," General Jassim said.

Relatives Describe Young Men Determined To Serve Country (NYT)

By Lizette Alvarez

When Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, came home from Iraq to South Texas for three weeks in May, his family was taken aback by his transformation, though they kept their thoughts quiet.

"He was very nervous," said his aunt Maria Vásquez. "He had never smoked, and he had started smoking, chain smoking. He was waking up in the night, very disturbed. He couldn't sleep well. He was very nervous, very jittery."

Private Menchaca, who was a newlywed, told his mother and his aunts that, although he was still glad he had enlisted in the Army, life in Iraq was difficult. They got the feeling that, privately, Private Menchaca, who grew up straddling the border in Brownsville and its two cultures, was dreading having to go back.

Just recently, he said, there had been an attack on members of his unit and he had lost all his clothes. They burned in a fire. He had only the uniform on his back.

"He said, 'Send me things: wipes, soap, Oreo cookies,' " she said. "He loved Oreo cookies."

In Oregon, Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, lived an altogether different life, far from the southern border, in a tiny Oregon farming town called Madras. He had an eye for a good spot to fish, a knack for hunting and a passion for fixing battered pick up trucks.

Private Tucker said in a voice mail message from Iraq, that his mother saved and released to the public, "Just going on a little vacation and I will be back before you know it."

Last Friday, Private Menchaca and Private Tucker were ambushed at a military checkpoint in Yusufiya, an area south of Baghdad riddled with insurgents. The two soldiers, who survived a shootout, were seen being taken away by insurgents. Their relatives, who were visited over the weekend by Army casualty affairs officers with word of the unconfirmed killings, are still awaiting DNA confirmation of the deaths.

If the two soldiers had one thing in common, it was their determination to join the Army and fight in Iraq, believing it to be the right thing to do. It is a message they tried to impress on their families, who worried incessantly about phantom snipers and hidden bombs. "I'm going to defend my country," Private Tucker said in the telephone message. "Be proud of me."

Just recently, Private Tucker told friends and family that he would be going to a more dangerous, remote section of Iraq, where he would be unable to call or send e-mail messages.

Rick Allen, the former mayor of Madras who hired Private Tucker, known as Tommy, as a teenager to work for him at his gas station and convenience store, said there was nothing that Private Tucker liked more than his dirt bikes and his tools. He also played the piano and loved music, his family said. "He was a determined kid," Mr. Allen said. "A tough kid."

Private Tucker's family lives on a stretch of highway just off the town center. On Tuesday, friends and family members sat in front of the house as police officials warned off reporters and onlookers.

Just before enlisting, Private Tucker, who made friends easily, worked in construction, but with his life a little out of focus, he decided to enlist in the Army, joining up last July. He was stationed at Fort Campbell and became a member of the 101st Airborne Division, where he met Private Menchaca.

During his whirlwind visit to Texas, Private Menchaca was matter-of-fact about the difficulties of his mission in Iraq. He talked about how he slept in vacant buildings, without plumbing or electricity, how he and the other soldiers shared batteries to run their electrical equipment. "He was not complaining," said Sylvia Grice, 37, a cousin. "He was not whining. He was just telling it like it is."

Private Menchaca made it a point to carve out time for his extended family on both sides of the border, spending time with his mother, his brother, his cousins, aunts and uncles in Houston, Matamoros and Brownsville. He also spent time with his wife, Christina, 18, whom he married without telling his family last September, one month before shipping out.

A high school dropout who later earned his graduate equivalency diploma, Private Menchaca had been unhappy working in Houston at a gas station. He decided to join the Army, hoping it would lead to a job as an immigration agent, and told his family Christmas Day, 2004 that he planned to enlist; they tried to talk him out of it. Private Menchaca's brother had served in the Army and had not enjoyed it, Mrs. Vásquez said.

But Private Menchaca insisted, and the family came around. He scored so high on his entrance test that he was given the option to bypass the infantry, said his cousin, Gabriela García. He chose not to do that. Instead, he signed up in March 2005 and wound up in the 101st Airborne.

Ms. García said her cousin reveled in the "challenge, the training, the camaraderie, the structure."

"We think of Kristian as a hero," said Ms. Grice. "You know, he didn't have to do this. He believed in what he was doing."

Families 'devastated' By News (USAT)

By Emily Bazar And Tracy Loew

Pfc. Kristian Menchaca's family relished his phone calls from Iraq, but the conversations fed their worries.

In one call to his mother, Menchaca said he had been knocked unconscious by a car bomb, his cousin Juan Manuel Vasquez Jr., 31, said Tuesday.

In another, Menchaca said his unit had been attacked overnight, their supplies and belongings destroyed by flames.

"He barely escaped," Vasquez said. "He called to say he needed clothing and supplies."

Vasquez choked back tears as he spoke, shortly after the family learned that the bodies of Menchaca, 23, of Houston and Pfc. Thomas Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore., had reportedly been recovered in Iraq. The men disappeared Friday when their checkpoint was attacked.

"We did a lot together," Vasquez said of his cousin Kris.

Tucker's parents were "devastated at the news their son may have been killed," a written statement from the family said.

Ten American flags lined the road in front of their home in Madras, a central Oregon town of about 5,600 people.

Sheriff's deputies guarded the entrance but let a FedEx worker deliver a box of yellow ribbons. Similar boxes arrived throughout the community, some sent by the mother of Keith "Matt" Maupin, the only U.S. soldier in the Iraq war still listed as missing.

"Me and a bunch of women are going to put them up all over town," said Trudy Cunningham, who works at the Tiger Mart. "They'll stay up till he gets back home with us."

A memorial of posters and balloons grew on a fence on Fourth Street, the main drag.

Tucker worked at the station in high school. Later he did construction and worked at a sawmill. Cunningham said he was a hard worker who liked to fix cars in his spare time.

The Madras Chamber of Commerce plans to dedicate its Fourth of July Celebration to Tucker.

Holli Van Wert said she and other volunteers are collecting dining coupons and food for the family and a fund has been set up to help with expenses (The Bring Tommy Home Fund, c/o Columbia River Bank, P.O. Box 0, Madras, OR 97741). "It's just the way that we are here. We're all connected on one level," she said.

Tucker joined the Army in July 2005 and had been in Iraq since February.

"He was a good kid," said Tom Brown, who owns Coachworks Collision Repair. "He was a good soldier."

DOJ_NMG_0036274

The family's statement said in part, "Tom has gained a much larger family through this ordeal than he had when he left home to go help the Iraqi people and protect his country from the threat of terrorism."

In Brownsville, Menchaca's family recalled a young man who loved basketball and homemade Mexican food.

He talked of joining the Border Patrol or the customs service after the Army, Vasquez said.

His wedding in September, after a quick courtship, surprised his family, Vasquez said. Soon, he was in Iraq.

When Menchaca was home in the spring, Vasquez said, he noticed a change in his cousin. "He looked a little distant. He had trouble sleeping," he said. "You could see it in his eyes."

Vasquez said Menchaca's death underscores his feelings about the war, which he said doesn't "make any sense."

FBI Pursues Pretenders Masquerading As War Heroes (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, June 21, 2006

The FBI is cracking down on phony war heroes, who often buy medals on the Internet and wear them at public events.

This year, federal agents have launched a dozen investigations against people allegedly masquerading as decorated veterans. At that pace, the FBI would open about twice as many cases as it did last year.

The cases are sometimes difficult to prosecute because the phony heroes have to be caught wearing the medal. And because the crime — unauthorized wearing of military medals and decorations — is a misdemeanor, the penalty is small. Of the 58 cases that were opened by the FBI in the past six years, 20 are pending. Of the other 38, almost 60% ended in convictions.

Support in Congress is growing for the "Stolen Valor Act," which would stiffen penalties for falsely claiming to have received any medal. Since it was introduced last year, the number of co-sponsors has doubled.

The bill would make it a crime to merely claim the medal was earned. It would also increase punishment. Today, only those fraudulently wearing Medals of Honor face up to a year in jail and a $100,000 fine. The bill would increase penalties for wearing other medals to the same level.

Offenders are people who buy Purple Hearts, Bronze Stars or even Medals of Honor on the Internet or at flea markets and play the role of war hero at military funerals, banquets and benefits, says FBI Special Agent Thomas Cottone, a violent crimes investigator who took on phony war hero cases as a personal crusade 10 years ago.

"They do it for the attention. They want to get noticed," Cottone says. "These people, by wearing those medals, are literally stealing the valor and recognition of those who legitimately did the act. And this is absolutely disgraceful."

The most recent conviction: Theodore Bantis, 59, of Dunlap, Ill., who pleaded guilty Tuesday to posing as a Marine Corps officer who had won the Navy Cross, the second-highest Marine valor award. He admitted he never served in the military.

Frauds Put Up A Decorated Front (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

The man cutting a path across the Marine Corps Birthday Ball near Atlantic City last fall wore row upon row of battle ribbons on his chest — silent testament to a history of gallantry and sacrifice.

Among the awards he wore were a Bronze Star, a Silver Star and the Navy Cross, which is second in significance only to the Medal of Honor.

Retired Marine Corps master sergeant Fred Montney III and others turned to admire Gerard Smigel, 52, in his dress blue uniform and wearing the rank of lieutenant colonel. "He was in his element. He enjoyed it," says Montney, who sat at Smigel's table.

As the night wore on, Montney noticed little flaws. Smigel would excuse himself to go to the "latrine." Marines call it the "head." Smigel wore one award, a Combat Action Ribbon, upside down. "When I asked him questions, he would get somewhat fuzzy" about details, Montney recalls. He snapped a photo of Smigel, smiling next to his wife, and later called the FBI.

Smigel pleaded guilty this month in federal court to illegally wearing the uniform and medals. He was sentenced to three years of probation and fined $3,000.

Masquerading as a war hero has become riskier — but more tempting — during this time of war. “Right now, most everybody loves the military, and that's why I'm seeing more and more of these impostors,” says senior FBI agent Thomas Cottone.

The FBI has investigated 58 cases of people allegedly wearing fraudulent military decorations since 2001. Assisted by military researchers and the Internet — where hoaxes can be quickly tracked and exposed — the FBI could end up investigating more cases of medal fraud this year than in any other previous year, Cottone says. He says he gets one tip a week.

“I call them gutless creeps,” Montney says of frauds such as Smigel. According to court documents, Smigel's true military service was as an Air Force plumbing specialist who received a less-than-honorable discharge in 1975.

“The vast majority, it's just low self-esteem,” says B.G. “Jug” Burkett, a retired stockbroker from Dallas who led efforts to unmask frauds with Stolen Valor, a 1998 book he co-wrote.

Burkett says people assume heroic alter egos to offset shortcomings.

“Whenever you make someone a hero, he's not only heroic, he's trustworthy, he's honest, he's loyal, he's sincere. All these other attributes get attached to him,” he says. “And if somehow he has failed in some way, then it's due to that evil war that he was forced to fight. You can take both the good and the bad and it explains everything.”

FBI agent Cottone says the bureau is investigating Richard Thibodeau, 64, of Lawrenceville, Ga., who asserted for years that he was a decorated Marine Corps officer and Navy Cross recipient.

Thibodeau explained himself in a May interview with The Atlanta Journal-Constitution. “In my mind, I wasn't harming anyone because I wasn't capitalizing on it,” he said.

In past decades, laws against impersonating war heroes were enforced only sporadically, Cottone says. That changed in the 1990s, largely because of Mitchell Paige, who received the Medal of Honor for beating back a Japanese assault on Guadalcanal in 1942.

During his retirement, Paige tracked people who falsely claimed to be Medal of Honor recipients. In 1994, he successfully lobbied Congress to pass a law that made selling or falsely wearing the Medal of Honor punishable by up to a year in jail and a $100,000 fine. The punishment for wearing other medals remains six months.

Cottone, who worked with Paige, used that law to investigate H.L.I. Lordship Industries, a company in Hauppauge, N.Y., that held a contract with the Pentagon to produce Medals of Honor. In 1996, Cottone proved the company had illegally sold 300 awards, many of them snapped up by impostors. The firm lost its government contract and paid a $22,500 fine.

In the past several years, military researchers and societies have begun assembling databases that have made it easier to uncover fraud.

The Congressional Medal of Honor Society lists all recipients, living or dead, on its website: www.cmohs.org. Cottone says the number of people claiming to be Medal of Honor recipients has diminished in recent years, but the number pretending to have received other valor awards has increased.

The homeofheroes.com website tracks recipients of the Medal of Honor, the Army's Distinguished Service Cross, the Navy and Marine Corps' Navy Cross and the Air Force Cross. That site was pulled together by Doug Sterner, a business technology teacher from Colorado.

Sterner says plenty of military impostors never get caught.

“I believe in virtually every city in America, no matter how small, there is at least one individual who is touting (himself) as a major combat hero based upon lies.”

Not Playing at a Theater Near You

Hey, kids, let's put on a show ! Alexandria guys Scott Shafer and John Carter did just that in 2004. Shafer scripted a political thriller, Hollywood types took notice, they raised $750,000, and suddenly they were filming "Fatwa" here in D.C., with a solid B-list cast and Carter in his directorial debut.

The indie flick premiered last week at the Atlanta Film Festival and now it's in wide release . . . uh, in video stores across the country. But the newbie auteurs aren't complaining.

"We just wanted to put it into the venue that was most profitable," Shafer says. The 26-year-old notes that they actually turned down a theatrical distribution deal, fearing marketing costs would eat up profits. "There's some creative stigma in going straight to DVD, but I think that's changing. There's a dynamic of people wandering into video stores saying, 'Hey, this looks interesting.' "

No question about that! "Fatwa" stars Lauren Holly ("NCIS," "Picket Fences," "Dumb and Dumber") as a kinda sexy junior senator (beehive 'do, leopard-print stiletto boots) who speaks out against Islamo-fascism and ends up dodging death threats from both a terrorist cabdriver (Roger Guenveur Smith) and her own brother-in-law. Video Business magazine said it "doesn't quite click" but gave it props for nice performances by Lacey Chabert and Mykelti Williamson and more nuance than your average B-movie.

Shafer and Carter are now plotting their next film, a "comic-bookish thriller" about finding Osama . Picking up on a theme? "In the world we live in today," Shafer says, "I can't imagine writing about anything else."For Some People, Nothing Succeeds Like Excess

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Greenberg Sues AIG To Get Board Notes (AP)

By Randall Chase, AP Business Writer

AP, June 21, 2006

Former CEO of AIG, Maurice 'Hank' Greenberg Sues to Get Copies of Board Notes, Minutes

DOVER, Del. (AP) -- The former CEO of American International Group Inc., Maurice "Hank" Greenberg, filed a lawsuit Tuesday seeking records associated with the company's $1.6 billion settlement of allegations that it engaged in deceptive accounting practices.

Starr International Co., a private company led by Greenberg, alleges in the Chancery Court filing that AIG is violating Delaware law by refusing to allow representatives of Starr, which is AIG's largest shareholder, to inspect the company's books and records.

Starr is seeking minutes, notes, transcripts and any other records relating to AIG board and committee meetings dating from Feb. 9, 2005 to the present.

Starr alleges that AIG responded to a June 9 demand letter by offering only heavily redacted "nonprivileged minutes" of board and audit committee meetings relating only to worker's compensation payments made in connection with the settlement announced Feb. 9 of this year.

In the settlement, AIG, one of the world's largest insurance companies, agreed to pay $1.64 billion to settle allegations by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer that the company used deceptive accounting practices to mislead investors and regulatory agencies. The Securities and Exchange Commission filed and settled allegations of accounting fraud with the company simultaneously.

The settlement did not cover Greenberg, who was named in the suit but vowed to fight it in court.

Under the settlement, AIG agreed to pay $800 million for investors allegedly deceived by AIG's accounting tactics, including a $100 million penalty to the SEC. The company also agreed to pay $375 million to policyholders, $344 million to states harmed by practices from 1986 to 1995 involving state workers' compensation funds, and fines of $100 million to the state of New York and $25 million to the U.S. Justice Department.

In the demand letter seeking access to AIG records and in the complaint filed Tuesday, Starr claims that at least three states slated to receive worker's compensation payments have admitted that they are not entitled to receive such payments.

The complaint also alleges that other states have expressed "serious misgivings" about the workers' compensation payments. Minnesota, for example, filed a separate lawsuit against AIG rather than accept a settlement state officials believed to be inadequate.

"The stockholder believes that the above issues may be indicative of other problems with the settlement and corresponding possible mismanagement of the company," the Chancery Court complaint reads.

Greenberg was ousted in March 2005 and says he followed proper accounting procedures during his 38 years leading the company. Through a spokesman, Greenberg declined to comment on Tuesday's court filing.

AIG spokesman Joe Norton did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

U.S. Atty. Subpoenas Delta Petroleum (FINDLAW/AP)

(AP) - DENVER-Delta Petroleum Corp., a natural gas and oil producer, said late Monday it has received a federal subpoena requesting records back to 1996 over its granting of stock options.

The company said it believes the request comes because it was identified May 16 in a "third-party report" as being at-risk for having backdated stock options for executives. On May 22, the Denver company said its board had formed a special committee to review Delta's option granting practices and related accounting.

Delta shares fell 36 cents to close at $14.47 Monday on the Nasdaq Stock Market, before the company announced the subpoena.

The 'Backdating' Witch Hunt (WSJ)

By Holman W. Jenkins, Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

Another business scandal, this one over options "backdating," reveals that some CEOs are "in it" for the money. Tsk, tsk.

There has been outrage aplenty, lawsuits and even a grand jury investigation over a procession of companies accused of committing this violation of the moral code. A few are big names: Home Depot, Microsoft, UnitedHealth Group. But most are midsized tech companies with good reputations in their industries. So far, about 50 (the number grows daily) are suspected of having granted their executives and employees stock options whose issue date was retroactively established to coincide with a recent low in the company's stock price.

Missing, however, has been any cogent explanation of the possible reasons behind a practice apparently so widespread that companies must either have been sharing notes on it or have discovered it independently following some inner logic of corporate life. Also missing is any cogent explanation of why it's wrong.

CEO "greed" seems to be analysis enough for many leading journalistic minds. But even stipulating that CEOs are greedy, companies have not been short of ways to shovel large sums to their top servants. Why adopt this stratagem? And why should it automatically be assumed that backdating means CEOs were garnering more pay than their boards intended or were somehow exploiting a loophole?

A little history of how we came to this "scandal": Anyone who waded through the literature on CEO compensation has long been aware of studies showing that executives reap non-random gains on their stock options. No surprise here: Options are meant to motivate executives to produce non-random gains, and the whole theory of corporate governance is that executives are self-interested and possess inside information, so you'd expect them to negotiate pay deals for themselves from which they'd benefit.

It took Erik Lie, an economist at the University of Iowa, to show that the gains realized by executives at certain companies were conceivable only if option grants had been systematically retroactive to a recent low in the share price. His work was noticed by the Journal, which went about identifying some of the companies that engaged in apparent backdating.

His finding is revealing, but of what? Let's try to remember -- as some of the subsequent scandal coverage hasn't -- that options typically vest over time, and the value of the CEO's pay package is determined by two factors, not one: The net price of the options multiplied by the number of options.

These simple facts make a mockery of two standard assumptions of the media coverage: that backdating automatically means CEOs were "padding" their pay; and that backdating is the equivalent of being allowed to bet on a horse race after it has been run.

Think about it this way: Options packages don't spring out of the ground, but must be designed and agreed upon. A company and its executive both have an interest in simplifying the negotiation as well as an interest in understanding clearly what the package is likely to be worth.

Why would backdating be appealing in this light? Because it lets one parameter be locked in so negotiation can focus efficiently on the other, the size of the grant. It eliminates a perverse incentive to game the stock price during the negotiation. It leaves a valued executive no reason to grump about the issue date or feel there was any invidious message in its selection, yet the company retains full control over the size of the package.

Some companies are also suspected of timing options grants before impending good corporate news. The same considerations apply. It eliminates an incentive to game the stock price. It eliminates a source of ill will on the executive's part over the selection of the issue date. The company still controls the value of the package (and incentive) through the size of the grant.

Don't doubt, nonetheless, that entrepreneurs and executive are "in it" for the money as well as for the other satisfactions that come from building a business. Too, most of the backdating under the microscope today took place amid the stock price gyrations of the Internet bubble, which created unusual challenges for tech companies trying to recruit and keep talent during a business-model land grab.

Yet, all the while, CEO churn surveys have continued to show higher turnover, shorter tenure, more demanding boards in the last several years, even against the background of rising pay. This picture suggests, And large, that high pay is a product not of board cronyism but of a dynamic market for CEOs. Boards are willing to pay a lot of money but they won't put up with poor performance.

Since Enron, a great deal has been said about corporate governance, most of it useless. The one lesson that should be reinforced is that overseeing CEO incentives is among the most important board responsibilities, and boards should keep control of it and do it clearheadedly. Yet there is nothing categorically corrupt or improper about backdating to justify a conclusion that the boards here weren't doing just that.

The scandal element, instead, arises because ever-shifting accounting, regulatory and tax standards were, by some readings, punitive during the years in question toward choosing a past date to make an options package effective. We wouldn't want the legal bills of UnitedHealth's Bill McGuire -- or Vitesse Semiconductor's Louis Tomasetta, or KLA-Tencor's Ken Levy. In the end, dozens of executives are likely now to find themselves skinned and hung out to dry over a practice that's innocuous and even sensible in its own right.

CRIMINAL LAW:

David Safavian, a former General Services Administration chief of staff, was convicted Tuesday in federal court of lying and obstructing justice in the investigation of lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Safavian, a former partner of Abramoff, could face up to 20 years in prison at sentencing Oct. 12. He was convicted of obstructing an investigation into whether he aided Abramoff in efforts to acquire property controlled by the GSA in 2002, when Safavian accompanied the lobbyist on a golfing trip to Scotland.

The jury found Safavian hid details of his relationship with Abramoff from a GSA ethics lawyer, the GSA's inspector general's office and the Senate Indian Affairs Committee. He was acquitted of obstructing a Senate investigation.

Safavian also worked as the chief procurement officer in the White House Office of Management and Budget. This was the first trial in the Abramoff inquiry, though the lobbyist and three former congressional aides have pleaded guilty to a variety of charges.

President Bush and his wife, Laura, arrived in Vienna where the president will meet today with leaders of the 25-nation European Union. Bush arrived for the summit optimistic about trans-Atlantic relations on issues such as trade, Iran and counterterrorism.

"We will strengthen our close and growing partnership with the European Union," Bush said.

The president plans to press the Europeans to eliminate farm subsidies that are a sticking point in free-trade negotiations and to make good on their promises of aid for Iraq.

Bush goes to Budapest tonight for the 50th anniversary of the Hungarian revolution against Soviet domination. He will return to Washington late Thursday.

— David Jackson

People convicted of fraudulently obtaining disaster aid would face up to 30 years in prison and $1 million fines under a bill the House of Representatives passed. The legislation goes to the Senate.

The House approved the bill on a voice vote a week after a Government Accountability Office report found up to $1.4 billion in fraudulent claims to the Federal Emergency Management Agency as it rushed to provide relief after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita last year.

"Fraudsters and scam artists went into high gear" as federal aid poured in, said House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis. He said 261 people have been charged in 218 federal cases and there have been 44 guilty pleas or convictions. The new penalties would affect only future cases.

Safavian May File Appeal (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, June 21, 2006

David Safavian, convicted on Tuesday of lying to federal and Senate investigators and obstructing their investigation into his ties to former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, plans to ask a federal judge to vacate portions of the decision and then will most likely appeal the case, his attorney said.

Safavian was convicted on four of the five felony counts he'd been indicted on last October, including making false statements to investigators and obstructing the Justice Department probe of Abramoff. The jury found him not guilty of obstructing a parallel investigation by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee into Abramoff's business activities.

Senior Justice Department officials hailed the jury's decision, which was announced Tuesday morning after five days of deliberation by the 10 women and two men on the panel.

"Today a jury found David Safavian, a former federal official, guilty of lying to Congress and [General Services Administration] investigators about his dealings with lobbyist Jack Abramoff," said Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher, head of the criminal division, in a statement released by the department. "The message of this verdict is clear: in answering questions posed by Congress and by federal agencies, public officials have the same obligation as does the public for which they serve — to tell the truth. No one is above the law."

Safavian's sentencing is scheduled for Oct. 12, and under the complicated formula used by the federal courts in determining prison sentences for felony convictions, he faces up to 21 months behind bars, said Biz Van Gelder, his lawyer.

Before his sentence is handed down, however, Safavian will ask the presiding judge, District Judge Paul Friedman of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, to vacate some portions of the decision, Van Gelder said. If that effort fails, Van Gelder plans to appeal the case to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

Van Gelder believes that her client has several grounds for appeal, including the decision by Friedman to allow jurors to see hundreds of e-mail exchanges between Abramoff and Safavian. Those e-mails detailed Abramoff's attempts in 2002 to gain control of the Old Post Office building in downtown Washington, D.C., which Abramoff wanted to turn into a luxury hotel. Another GSA property that Abramoff was seeking at that time would have been turned into a school.

Safavian was serving as GSA chief of staff at that time, and he secretly advised Abramoff how to acquire the two GSA properties. Safavian then took part in a luxury golf junket to Scotland in August 2002 that was paid for by Abramoff.

Other participants in that trip included Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio); Neil Volz, Ney's former chief of staff; and Ralph Reed, the one-time Christian Coalition executive who is now running for lieutenant governor of Georgia. Both Abramoff and Volz have already pleaded guilty in the ongoing corruption probe, and Volz testified against Safavian during the trial.

Safavian sought an advisory opinion from the GSA ethics office before the Scotland trip, claiming that Abramoff was not "doing business" with GSA, despite the fact that Safavian knew Abramoff was trying to acquire the two GSA properties.

Van Gelder said that Safavian, who worked at the same lobbying firm as Abramoff in the 1990s, should not have been charged with lying to a GSA ethics officer about his knowledge of Abramoff's dealings with GSA, including whether Abramoff was formally lobbying the agency.

Van Gelder also complained about the verdict form used in the trial, arguing that it was too broad and allowed jurors no discretion in whether to convict her client.

"There are a number of issues for us to appeal on," Van Gelder said. "At the end of the day, David Safavian believed his friend [Abramoff] and still doesn't think he did anything wrong."

Van Gelder did acknowledge that Safavian has spent heavily on his legal defense, and that the total would only rise if Safavian were actually to file an appeal.

"It is very hard for an individual to take on the Justice Department, especially if that individual is paying his own way," Van Gelder said. Van Gelder declined to say how much Safavian had spent.

Safavian has received some financial help from his friends, but those contributions do not come near to covering his legal bills. One source who knows Safavian personally suggested that his legal tab was "far in excess of $500,000." Another GOP insider said Safavian laid out "more than $800,000" on his defense team, with additional bills expected if an appeal is filed.

Several legal experts also said that getting an appeals court to overturn Tuesday's decision would be difficult. Safavian offered extensive challenges to the government's attempts to introduce evidence against him before the trial began, and while Friedman granted his side some victories, the Justice Department won overall.

"Decisions like this one are rarely overturned," said a criminal defense attorney with extensive trial experience. This source said that judges like Friedman — himself a former lawyer in the U.S. attorney's office in the District — are cognizant that any decisions they make prior to and during a criminal trial could end up being reviewed by a higher court.

With the Safavian conviction in hand, and with a number of individuals involved in the probe continuing to cooperate with prosecutors, the question for the Justice Department now becomes where the Abramoff probe goes next, and who will be the next person to agree to a guilty plea or face indictment.

Several individuals directly involved with the investigation believe that Ed Buckham, DeLay's former chief of staff, is the next logical target for federal prosecutors, and one who could help them make a case against any lawmakers tied to Abramoff.

Two former DeLay aides, Michael Scanlon and Tony Rudy, have already pleaded guilty in the case and have agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors. Rudy worked with Buckham at Alexander Strategy Group, a lobbying firm, before it disbanded in January due to the negative publicity surrounding the pair.

Buckham could not be reached for comment on Tuesday, but he has repeatedly denied any wrongdoing in the past.

"I have been waiting for the other shoe to fall" on Buckham, said a source who has been interviewed by federal investigators handling the case. "He would be the right person for them to go after next."

Buckham also has ties to defense contractor Brent Wilkes, who has been implicated in the bribery scandal that brought down former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.). Buckham lobbied for one of Wilkes' companies, Group W, from 2002 to 2005. Wilkes has not been charged in the Cunningham probe.

Ney, another focus for federal prosecutors during the Abramoff investigation, has repeatedly stated he has done nothing improper or illegal in his dealings with Abramoff.

"The Congressman has said consistently from day one that he has never, at any point, engaged in any improper, unethical or illegal activity," Brian Walsh, Ney's spokesman, said.

Ney was forced out of his post as chairman of the House Administration following Rudy's guilty plea, and the Justice Department has subpoenaed any records he possesses regarding contacts with Abramoff. Ney has run up several hundred thousand dollars in legal bills since he was first publicly linked to Abramoff in late 2004, and the Ohio Republican has been forced to establish a legal-defense fund to help offset those costs.

Ney "remains absolutely confident that the lies and deceptions of Jack Abramoff will continue to be revealed and that his name will be cleared fully at the end of the day," Walsh said Tuesday.

Ex-Aide To Bush Found Guilty (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

A federal jury found former White House aide David H. Safavian guilty yesterday of lying and obstructing justice, making him the highest-ranking government official to be convicted in the spreading scandal involving disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Safavian, a former chief of staff of the General Services Administration, was convicted in U.S. District Court here of covering up his many efforts to assist Abramoff in acquiring two properties controlled by the GSA, and also of concealing facts about a lavish weeklong golf trip he took with Abramoff to Scotland and London in the summer of 2002.

This was the first Abramoff-related legal action to go to trial and face a jury. Several legal experts said the case could embolden federal prosecutors to seek additional indictments against cronies of Abramoff, who has been cooperating with the Justice Department since pleading guilty in January to corrupting public officials.

The jury of 10 women and two men came to its decision on its fifth day of deliberations after hearing eight days of testimony. Safavian, 38, sat silently and without expression as U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman read the verdict aloud.

The jury found him guilty of obstructing an inquiry by the inspector general's office of the GSA and of lying to the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, a GSA ethics officer and the GSA inspector general. He was acquitted of obstructing the Senate's probe. He faces up to 20 years in jail and $1 million in fines; sentencing was set for Oct. 12.

Safavian's attorney, Barbara Van Gelder, said she will seek a new trial. Prosecutors "will say how this was a great day in the war on corruption," she said. "I find they made a mountain out of a molehill, and now they're going to plant the flag on top of the molehill."

Safavian is the fifth person to be found guilty in legal actions connected to Abramoff, the once-powerful Republican lobbyist who has pleaded guilty to charges of fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe government officials. Like Abramoff, the other four negotiated plea agreements and did not go to trial. One of those, Neil G. Volz, a congressional aide-turned-lobbyist, testified against Safavian two weeks ago.

Legal observers cited the effectiveness of Volz's testimony as a strong indication that other Abramoff-related indictments or plea agreements are probably imminent. They asserted that Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) is in particular jeopardy because he took part in the Scotland trip and has been mentioned in a veiled way in Abramoff-related guilty pleas, and because Volz, as Ney's former chief of staff, is in a position to testify against him.

Safavian's conviction "bolsters the credibility of Neil Volz as a witness," said Stanley M. Brand, an expert on ethics law. "This is another building block in the case against Ney."

Spokesman Brian J. Walsh said in a statement that Ney faces no greater danger of prosecution than he did before the verdict. "The Safavian case had nothing to do with Congressman Ney," Walsh said. "He is confident that . . . he will be vindicated."

Besides Volz, the Justice Department has gotten guilty pleas from Abramoff associates Michael Scanlon, a public relations executive; Adam Kidan, a partner of Abramoff's in a Florida gambling-boat investment; and lobbyist Tony C. Rudy, once a top aide to former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.).

A federal judge in Miami yesterday granted Abramoff and Kidan three more months of freedom before they must begin prison terms for fraud convictions in a separate case involving the purchase of a cruise-ship line. This will give the two more time to cooperate with investigations into official corruption in Washington and into the 2001 slaying in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., of businessman Konstantinos "Gus" Boulis, who was killed a few months after he sold SunCruz Casinos to the pair.

Days before his arrest in September, Safavian had resigned as the White House's chief procurement policy officer, a job he got after leaving the GSA. He had worked earlier as a lobbyist for Abramoff and also as a congressional aide.

He pleaded not guilty to the charges and, in a surprise move, took the stand in his defense. His wife, Jennifer, also testified. Safavian contended that he was a friend and not a business associate of Abramoff's, that he was forthright with federal investigators, and that Abramoff was not engaged in formal business dealings with the GSA because he was not a contractor with the agency.

But prosecutors Peter Zeidenberg and Nathaniel B. Edmonds introduced dozens of e-mails between Safavian and Abramoff to show the jury that Abramoff sought two government properties Safavian's agency oversaw while offering him favors, including the overseas trip. They did not call Abramoff to testify.

In mid-2002, Safavian joined the GSA, which oversees the purchase and leasing of the federal government's billions of dollars in property around the country. Soon after he arrived at the agency, he and Abramoff began e-mailing each other and exchanging information and strategic advice about how to buy or lease the GSA properties.

One was a parcel of land in Montgomery County, on which Abramoff hoped to situate a Jewish high school he supported. The second was the Old Post Office Pavilion on Pennsylvania Avenue NW. Abramoff wanted to convert the historic but underused structure into a luxury hotel for an Indian tribe client.

At the same time, Safavian and Abramoff kept in constant social contact -- on the local golf links and at Abramoff's Pennsylvania Avenue restaurant, Signatures. Safavian also agreed to attend the junket to St. Andrews in Scotland, the birthplace of golf, which was arranged by Abramoff.

In addition to Volz, Ney and Safavian, the trip, via a chartered Gulfstream II jet, included two Ney aides and former Christian Coalition leader Ralph Reed -- a business associate and longtime friend of Abramoff's.

Before that trip in August 2002, Safavian asked the GSA ethics office whether he could accept the gift of airfare without breaching the agency's ethics code. In an e-mail requesting the ruling, Safavian called Abramoff a friend and a lobbyist "but one that has no business before GSA (he does all of this work on Capitol Hill)."

The office replied that Safavian could accept the airfare. Nonetheless, Safavian wrote Abramoff a check for $3,100 before the journey began, an amount that Safavian contended throughout the trial was enough to cover the entire cost of the trip.

Zeidenberg and Edmonds derided that assertion. They presented evidence that the check barely paid one-fifth of the real expense: Hotel rooms ran between $400 and $500 a night, greens fees for golf at the fabled St. Andrews were $400 per game, and rounds of drinks in Scotland cost $100 each. Chartering the jet, for nine passengers, cost at least $91,000.

Former Bush Official Safavian Convicted (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

A former Bush administration official was convicted today of lying and obstructing justice for concealing his ties to Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

A federal jury found David H. Safavian guilty of three counts of lying or making false statements and one count of obstructing justice in the first trial to emerge from the scandal surrounding the disgraced lobbyist.

Each count carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison, and a $250,000 fine. U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman set sentencing for Oct. 12.

Safavian sat without expression as the guilty verdicts were read. He was cleared of one count of obstructing the Senate Indian Affairs Committee's investigation.

The verdict adds momentum to a Justice Department investigation focusing on a number of members of Congress, including Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), whose former chief of staff was a government witness against Safavian.

Four other Abramoff associates have pleaded guilty.

Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to corrupt public officials, and to steal millions from Indian tribes he represented. Abramoff did not testify at Safavian's trial, but his presence loomed large, through dozens of e-mails the government presented to the jury that showed how he attempted to use Safavian to extend his circle of influence.

Safavian had been a friend of the lobbyist since the two worked together at a Washington law firm in the mid-1990s, when Abramoff was just beginning his rise to power.

Safavian later struck out on his own to form a lobbying firm with conservative activist Grover Norquist, and worked as a congressional aide.

In 2002, he was named chief of staff at the General Services Administration, the federal agency that manages billions of dollars worth of federal real estate.

Prosecutors alleged that Safavian never stopped working for Abramoff despite being on the payroll of a public agency. Soon after arriving at GSA, he began exchanging e-mails with Abramoff about two pieces of GSA property that the lobbyist was interested in developing in the Washington area.

The case boiled down to whether Safavian had misled GSA ethics officers and other investigators about his relationship with Abramoff and the circumstances of a lavish golf junket to Scotland that Abramoff was organizing at the time.

Safavian went on the August 2002 trip, reimbursing Abramoff $3,100. Prosecutors alleged that the sum was a small fraction of the total cost, which included private jet service, luxury hotel accommodations, and $400 worth of golf at the famed Old Course at St. Andrews.

Former White House Aide Convicted In Abramoff Inquiry (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 20 — A former White House aide was convicted today of lying to government investigators about his ties to the disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, in the first trial to result from the influence-peddling inquiry centered on Mr. Abramoff.

The former aide, David H. Safavian, who resigned from the White House budget office days before his arrest last September, was convicted of four counts of lying and obstruction of justice in his statements to investigators about Mr. Abramoff and about a 2002 golf trip to Scotland that the lobbyist arranged for Mr. Safavian and others. Mr. Safavian was acquitted on an additional obstruction charge.

The verdict was hailed by Justice Department officials as a victory in their wide-ranging criminal investigation of the lobbying operations run by Mr. Abramoff, a Republican fundraiser who pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to go bribe public officials, including members of Congress, and is cooperating with prosecutors.

The criminal inquiry has created alarm on Capitol Hill, with several Republican lawmakers facing difficult re-election battles this November because of questions about their ties to Mr. Abramoff. Congressional aides said the influence-peddling scandal was a major factor in the decision of Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader and an ally of Mr. Abramoff, to retire from politics this year.

Mr. Safavian, 38 years old and a member of Mr. Abramoff's lobbying staff before joining the Bush administration, showed little emotion as the guilty verdicts were read in federal district court in Washington. He could be given 20 years in prison on the four counts, although federal sentencing guidelines suggest he will face a much lighter sentence.

After four days of deliberation, the jury agreed with prosecutors that Mr. Safavian lied to investigators when he insisted there was no ethical conflict in joining Mr. Abramoff's August 2002 golfing trip to Scotland since, Mr. Safavian claimed, the lobbyist did "no business" with the General Services Administration. Mr. Safavian was then the chief of staff of the G.S.A., which fuctions as the government's real-estate manager.

The jury saw e-mail traffic from the summer of 2002 in which Mr. Abramoff repeatedly asked Mr. Safavian for help in acquiring two real-estate parcels that were controlled by the G.S.A., including the Old Post Office Building on Pennsylvania Avenue in Washington, close to the White House. Mr. Safavian arranged a meeting at G.S.A. for Mr. Safavian's wife to discuss the properties on the day before he left for Scotland.

According to the prosecution's case, Mr. Safavian's lies were initially told in the summer of 2002 to the G.S.A.'s ethics office and then repeated to investigators for the agency's inspector general office and for the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, which investigated Mr. Abramoff's lobbying contracts with Indian tribe casinos. Mr. Safavian left the G.S.A. in 2004 to join the White House budget office as the director of federal procurement policies.

Although Mr. Safavian was the first person to go to trial as a result of ties to Mr. Abramoff, four other Abramoff associates, including two former top House aides to Mr. DeLay, have pleaded guilty to criminal charges and face prison sentences.

Mr. Safavian's lawyer, Barbara Van Gelder, said he would appeal the conviction. In a meeting with reporters after the verdict, she suggested, as she did in the trial, that Mr. Safavian was a victim of guilt by association with Mr. Abramoff, whose name has become synonymous in Washington with the worst abuses of corporate lobbyists. "I've always been perplexed as to why the Justice Department decided to take out the howitzers against Mr. Safavian," she said.

Defense lawyers representing other subjects of the Abramoff investigation said they were chilled by the verdict against Mr. Safavian, suggesting that it might embolden the Justice Department to bring charges against much more prominent public officials who were close to Mr. Abramoff.

"Safavian was a little fish," said a lawyer for a former government official who has also become entangled in the investigations of Mr. Abramoff. The lawyer, who spoke on condition of anonymity, saying he did not want to bring unnecessary attention to his client, added, "I think this makes it easier for the prosecutors to ask permission at the Justice Department to go for the bigger fish."

Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher, the head of the Justice Department's criminal division, said in a statement that "the message of this verdict is clear: in answering questions posed by Congress and by federal agencies, public officials have the same obligation as does the public for which they serve — to tell the truth."

Among the other lawmakers under close scrutiny by the Justice Department is Representative Bob Ney, an Ohio Republican who joined Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Safavian on the 2002 trip to Scotland, where they played on the fabled course at St. Andrews.

Mr. Ney's former chief of staff, Neil G. Volz, was a government witness against Mr. Safavian and was questioned in detail about the golf trip. He testified as a result of a guilty plea in which Mr. Volz confessed to conspiring with Mr. Abramoff to corrupt public officials, including Mr. Ney.

After learning of Mr. Safavian's conviction, Mr. Ney's office said in a statement today that "the reality" is that Mr. Safavian's trial "had absolutely nothing to do with Congressman Ney" and that the lawmaker "remains absolutely confident that the lies and deception of Jack Abramoff will continue to be revealed."

Probe Becomes Election Issue (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A conviction Tuesday in a Capitol Hill influence-peddling scandal is likely to have broad legal and political effects. The guilty verdict, handed down by a federal jury, could pressure more congressional aides to cooperate with the investigation, and complicate the re-election bids of a handful of Republican legislators named during the trial.

David Safavian, the White House's former top procurement officer, was found guilty on four counts: obstructing the probe of Jack Abramoff's lobbying operations and lying to federal ethics officers and investigators to hide his relationship with Mr. Abramoff.

The verdict -- which followed guilty pleas by Mr. Abramoff and three former congressional aides -- places at least part of the Abramoff scandal inside the Bush administration, not solely in Congress. It is the first trial victory for the Justice Department's task force investigating Mr. Abramoff.

One possible focus of prosecutors is Ohio Republican Rep. Bob Ney, whose role in Abramoff lobbying projects was mentioned in the Safavian trial and the previous guilty-plea agreements. Mr. Ney has denied wrongdoing. His former chief of staff, Neil Volz, is among those who have pleaded guilty; Mr. Volz was the government's star witness in the Safavian trial. (Read about key players1.)

The investigation is factoring into Mr. Ney's re-election campaign, turning a once-safe seat into a battle. Mr. Ney's campaign says that Democrats are trying to make the probe an issue in the campaign, and that it shouldn't be one because he did nothing wrong.

The Safavian trial could complicate the re-election of two other Republicans: Rep. Steven C. LaTourette of Ohio, and Rep. Shelley Moore Capito of West Virginia, says Amy Walter of the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

Until recently, political handicappers such as Ms. Walter expected Mr. LaTourette and Ms. Capito to hold their seats with relative ease. But trial testimony linking the two lawmakers to Mr. Abramoff's lobbying strategy has provided ammunition to opponents. That is a boost for Democrats who need to win 15 seats to take over the House.

Political charges of corruption "become an issue if the incumbent is already perceived as vulnerable," says Ms. Walter. In the cases of Mr. LaTourette and Ms. Capito, both already had weaknesses.

Mr. LaTourette's office didn't return phone calls for comment on whether the investigation would affect his re-election campaign.

Mr. LaTourette's vote in support of the Central American Free Trade Agreement already looms as an issue in his campaign to hold on to the largely blue-collar district. Mr. LaTourette, a 12-year incumbent, had positioned himself as an independent Republican and told constituents he wouldn't support such free-trade deals. A public divorce complicated his 2004 re-election and could resurface in this campaign.

The Abramoff connection, "makes it easier to make the case that Steve LaTourette is not the Steve LaTourette you think he is," Ms. Walter said.

The connection began in 2002, when Mr. Safavian was chief of staff of the General Services Administration, which oversees government property. Mr. Abramoff was seeking, on behalf of his Indian tribal clients, a contract to convert the Old Post Office building in downtown Washington to a hotel.

Mr. Abramoff, working with Mr. Safavian, sought a letter from Capitol Hill to give the tribal clients an edge against competitors for the contract. In September 2002, Mr. LaTourette signed a letter to the GSA invoking a special program for economically distressed communities, urging officials to "consider giving Hubzone businesses an advance opportunity to provide redevelopment proposal that could be given priorities" if they meet all other requirements. Indian tribes were considered Hubzone-qualified businesses.

Mr. Volz testified that the letter wasn't as strong as the Abramoff team had wished. In the end, Mr. Abramoff and his clients didn't bid on or receive a contract to revamp the building. Mr. LaTourette's spokeswoman has said her boss did nothing wrong in sending the letter and that he has always supported advantages for small businesses.

But Jason Huff, a spokesman for Larry Katz, the first-time candidate and college professor challenging Mr. LaTourette, says that is irrelevant. "It's one thing to get caught up in a scandal that helps people in your district, but these were things not even in the district," he said.

As for Ms. Capito, according to testimony at the Safavian trial, Mr. Volz contacted Ms. Capito's then-chief of staff, Mark Johnson, in 2002 and asked if he would contact the GSA and inquire about the status of a Maryland property Mr. Abramoff wanted for a school he had founded.

Mr. Johnson made the call to the GSA, but it had little effect. Mr. Abramoff's team briefly considered asking Ms. Capito's office to send a letter but the idea was quashed because it might make her politically vulnerable. "We can't ask the most vulnerable Republican incumbent member of Congress in the House to put something in writing that can be made public," Mr. Volz wrote in a July 2002 email to Mr. Abramoff that was copied to Mr. Safavian.

In the trial, prosecutors characterized Ms. Capito as an unwitting player in the scandal.

When asked to comment on whether this will affect Ms. Capito's re-election prospects, her spokesman, Jordan Stoick, said West Virginians will see that Ms. Capito wasn't part of the Abramoff scheme.

Mr. Johnson, the former chief of staff, didn't testify at the trial. He said in an interview that he feels "really bad for my boss now that her name is getting dragged through the mud." Still, the tie to the trial could be another burden in a difficult race. Ms. Capito, a six-year veteran, represents a district that leans Democratic and her allegiance to President Bush's agenda -- including the Iraq war -- is out of sync with many constituents. "Those voters have seemed to be somewhat comfortable supporting Republicans, but the political climate is much different than it was" two years ago, said Ms. Walter of the Cook Political Report.

Ms. Capito faces Mike Callaghan, an assistant U.S. attorney during the Clinton administration, who has made ethics a centerpiece of his campaign.

The Safavian case centered on a 2002 golfing trip to Scotland paid for by Mr. Abramoff and his clients. Prosecutors alleged Mr. Safavian lied to GSA ethics officials when, while seeking clearance to take the trip, he said Mr. Abramoff had "no business" before the agency.

Mr. Safavian argued that he was being truthful because Mr. Abramoff hadn't formally submitted or won a bid to do business with the agency. Mr. Safavian's sentencing is scheduled for October. He faces a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison and $1 million in fines.

Ex-GSA Official Safavian Is Convicted (PHI)

By Marisa Taylor

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - A federal jury convicted a former Bush administration official yesterday of lying about his relationship with convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who is at the center of a broadening investigation into influence-peddling on Capitol Hill.

David Safavian, former chief of staff of the General Services Administration, the federal government's procurement agency, was found guilty of four charges of making false statements and misleading investigators who were looking into Abramoff's dealings with other public officials and lobbyists.

Safavian faces up to five years in prison on each of the four counts. Sentencing was set for Oct. 12.

Prosecutors had accused Safavian of lying about helping Abramoff try to buy two GSA-managed properties.

Safavian also did not reveal the extent of his relationship with Abramoff and his plans to take a golfing trip to Scotland with the lobbyist in August 2002, prosecutors said.

The jury acquitted Safavian of a fifth charge, of trying to mislead the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, which later determined that Abramoff had paid for a portion of the trip with tribal money.

Justice Department officials said Safavian's conviction showed that government officials would be held accountable for failing to cooperate with federal investigators.

"Public officials have the same obligation as does the public for which they serve: to tell the truth," Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said.

Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to fraud, tax evasion, and conspiracy to bribe public officials. He did not testify at Safavian's trial but has agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors.

Four other former Abramoff associates, including a former chief of staff to Rep. Bob W. Ney (R., Ohio) and two former aides to former Rep. Tom DeLay (R., Texas), have pleaded guilty in the scandal. Ney and DeLay have denied any wrongdoing.

During the eight-day trial, prosecutors presented dozens of e-mail exchanges between Safavian and Abramoff that discussed the GSA properties.

Abramoff contacted Safavian days after his old friend became the GSA's chief of staff to talk to him about the properties, according to federal records.

Abramoff wanted to buy or lease a portion of 600 acres in Silver Spring, Md., and the Old Post Office Building in Washington. At the time, the GSA managed the properties.

Prosecutors said Safavian later advised Abramoff about leasing or buying the properties, gave him internal government documents, and set up a meeting with other GSA officials.

At the time, Safavian had been planning to take the Scotland golf trip with a group that included Abramoff and Ney.

Safavian sought an opinion from ethics officers about whether he could join the trip, telling them Abramoff was a "lawyer and a lobbyist, but one that has no business before GSA," according to the federal documents.

Ethics officers concluded that Safavian could accept a gift as long as Abramoff was not seeking to do business with the GSA. Safavian e-mailed Abramoff: "It looks like Scotland is a go."

During the trial, defense attorneys argued that Safavian had acted appropriately by seeking advice from the ethics officers and reimbursing Abramoff $3,100 for the trip. Prosecutors contended the amount could not have covered his share of the expenses, which exceeded $130,000 for nine people.

Three-Month Reprieve for Abramoff

Convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff will not have to go to prison in a fraud case in Florida for at least three more months,

a judge in Miami ruled yesterday.

U.S. District Judge Paul Huck in March sentenced Abramoff and former business partner Adam Kidan to five years and 10 months in a case tied to their purchase in 2000 of a casino-boat company. Huck told the pair then to surrender to authorities on June 29 to start their prison terms.

Federal prosecutorsrequested a 90-day extension because Abramoff and Kidan were cooperating with investigations into others, including public officials in Washington. Several government agencies are involved in the probe, and quick access to Abramoff is essential, they said.

"The pending investigations will require further contact between the defendants and government agents, which will best be served by the defendants' continued liberty," prosecutors Lawrence LaVecchio and Paul Schwartz wrote in their request, which defense lawyers joined.

Huck ruled yesterdaythat Abramoff and Kidan need not surrender until Oct. 2.

Safavian Found Guilty On Four Criminal Charges (GOVEXEC)

By Jenny Mandel

Government Executive, June 21, 2006

A federal jury on Tuesday found David Safavian, the former federal procurement chief on trial in connection with his dealings with Jack Abramoff, guilty on four of five charges involving lying and obstructing official investigations.

Safavian was convicted on three counts of making false statements and one count of obstructing an investigation. He was cleared on a fifth charge of obstructing an investigation by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee.

The verdict came early on the fifth day of deliberations, with jurors finding that Safavian made false statements to an ethics official at the General Services Administration, where he worked as chief of staff, both by concealing that he assisted Abramoff with agency activities and by stating that the lobbyist did all his work on Capitol Hill.

The jury also found Safavian had lied to the GSA inspector general's office by concealing his dealings with Abramoff, and to the Senate committee in a letter stating that Abramoff did not have business with the GSA at the time of a 2002 golf trip to Scotland that Safavian took with the lobbyist.

Safavian faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine for each of the four counts, though his lawyer, Barbara Van Gelder, said she would draw on his clean record in arguing that he serve less than the full 20 years. Sentencing is scheduled for Oct. 12.

Van Gelder said her client will appeal the jury's decision, a process she said could take many years.

As possible grounds for appeal, Van Gelder cited concerns with the verdict form, which she said used overly broad language and introduced new wording that had not been defined during the trial. She also described instructions on how the jury was to consider a flood of e-mail traffic between Safavian and Abramoff as confusing and "hypertechnical," with some messages to be considered solely for the fact that they were sent, while others could be considered as statements of fact.

Van Gelder, who spoke with several jurors after the verdict was announced, said, "It's clear the e-mails certainly played ... a maybe more central role than they should have," noting that their sheer volume gave the government's case "heft."

But she said the verdict could not be taken as a clear indication of how others caught up in the Abramoff scandal may fare should they face trial. "Each defendant is a snowflake," she said, noting that others who pleaded guilty had admitted to different charges relating to provision of their "good and honest services."

Van Gelder said the decision could have a chilling effect on government officials considering whether to seek ethics opinions if they feel that might open them up to future charges.

"I've always been perplexed by why the Justice Department took out the howitzers and started aiming them at David Safavian," she said. But she stood by her decision not to subpoena Abramoff during the trial, saying his status as a cooperating government witness would have limited her access to interview him in advance.

After the judge read the verdict and the lawyers, court officials and much of the public had left the room, Safavian continued to sit blank-faced on a bench in the courtroom with his wife, Jennifer, who testified during the trial.

Van Gelder said the past several weeks have been emotional for her client. "This has been a very long road for Mr. Safavian," she said.

Ex-Abramoff Associate Safavian Found Guilty (LAW)

Former White House official faces up to 20 years in prison when sentenced this fall.

Former White House official David Safavian was found guilty Tuesday of obstructing justice and lying to federal investigators about his relationship with ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff. The verdict gives a boost to the government's ongoing probe into the dealings of the one-time Washington power broker.

A federal jury found Safavian, who served as chief procurement officer at the Office of Management and Budget until last September, guilty on three counts of making false statements and one count of obstructing justice. The jury acquitted him on a second count of obstructing justice in connection with an investigation of Abramoff conducted by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee. Safavian faces up to 20 years in prison when sentenced this fall.

The case was a significant victory for the government's expanding public corruption probe. Safavian's was the first, and so far only, Abramoff-related case to make it to trial. Four other targets — Abramoff and his associates Michael Scanlon, Neil Volz, and Tony Rudy — agreed to plead guilty to a variety of charges, including conspiracy to bribe public officials.

"The message of this verdict is clear: In answering questions posed by Congress and by federal agencies, public officials have the same obligation as does the public which they serve — to tell the truth. No one is above the law," said Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher, in a statement released by the Justice Department.

Safavian's case was somewhat narrower than those of others targeted in the Abramoff probe. It focused on an August 2002 trip Safavian took to Scotland and London that Abramoff sponsored. Others on the junket included Ohio Republican Rep. Bob Ney and political strategist Ralph Reed, the former head of the Christian Coalition. Attendees played rounds of golf at the Old Course of St. Andrews and stayed at luxury hotels in London and Scotland.

At the time of the trip, Safavian had just been appointed chief of staff to the administrator of the Government Services Administration. But when asking for clearance to go on the trip, Safavian told a GSA ethics officer that Abramoff had no business before the agency because he did all of his work on Capitol Hill. In fact, Abramoff had previously sought assistance from Safavian to secure leases on two GSA-controlled properties.

During the trial prosecutors disclosed hundreds of e-mails between Safavian and Abramoff that detailed extensive consultations between the two. Safavian actively advised Abramoff, an old friend, on the best way to proceed with his two GSA-related projects. One of those projects involved using a government facility in Silver Spring, Md., to house a Jewish day school Abramoff had helped found. The other project was a bid for the Old Post Office building in downtown Washington, which an Abramoff client wanted to convert into an upscale hotel. Neither proposal ever got off the ground.

Prosecutors argued that even though Safavian paid Abramoff $3,100 to cover the cost of the Scotland trip, which included multiple rounds of golf and expensive dinners, he should have known that the actual cost was far higher.

Safavian took the stand for two days, testifying that he never tried to hide anything about his relationship with Abramoff. While he admitted he had, at times, used poor judgment in some of the e-mails he sent to Abramoff, he maintained he did not believe Abramoff's interests met the technical standards of "doing business" with the agency.

Safavian first came under scrutiny in March 2003, when an anonymous caller to the GSA raised questions about the Scotland trip. Safavian gave an official in the inspector general's office the GSA ethics opinion clearing him to go on the trip, and no further action was taken. Then, in the spring of 2004, he sent the same ethics opinion, which included the false statement about Abramoff's business, to the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, which was also probing the Scotland trip. But it wasn't until May 2005 that federal investigators first approached him. He was arrested in September.

The jury's deliberations in the case were not problem-free. The judge dismissed one juror on the second day, forcing the remaining jurors to start deliberations over again. On Tuesday morning attorneys for both sides were in court again to discuss scheduling problems with three other jurors when the jury came back, after three and a half days, with its decision.

After the verdict was read, Safavian's family and friends seated in the courtroom broke down in tears.

Safavian's attorney, Barbara Van Gelder, vowed to appeal the decision. She called the entire government investigation of her client an attempt to make "a mountain out of a molehill." Though she said she believed the jury had deliberated thoroughly, she argued that the introduction of many of the e-mails into evidence, as well as the language of the jury form, was improper and had prejudiced the outcome of the case.

Safavian Convicted Of Hiding Aid To Lobbyist Abramoff (Update6) (BLOOM)

By Kristin Jensen

Bloomberg, June 21, 2006

June 20 (Bloomberg) -- A federal jury convicted former White House official David Safavian of lying and obstructing justice in the first trial to come out of the influence-peddling investigation of Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Safavian, 38, was found guilty today of three counts of making false statements and one count of obstructing justice. He was acquitted of another obstruction charge. Each count carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

The verdict validates the Justice Department's strategy of relying on e-mail messages to show that Safavian concealed the inside help he gave to Abramoff. Without calling Abramoff to the witness stand, prosecutors Peter Zeidenberg and Nathaniel Edmonds painted Safavian as a public servant led astray by lavish gifts.

Abramoff, 47, became the subject of a U.S. government task force investigation after a series of articles in the Washington Post in 2004 about his financial dealings with partner Michael Scanlon and their work for American Indian tribes. In January this year, Abramoff pleaded guilty to defrauding the tribes and conspiring to corrupt public officials.

`Bigger Sword'

Scanlon and two other former congressional aides, who later worked for Abramoff, have also pleaded guilty to conspiracy. They are cooperating with prosecutors investigating other lobbyists and public officials including U.S. Representative Bob Ney, who traveled with Safavian on an Abramoff-arranged golf trip to Scotland in 2002. Ney has denied all wrongdoing.

``Prosecutors now have a bigger sword to rattle when they are trying to convince witnesses to cooperate, or individuals to plead guilty," said Joshua Berman, a former Justice Department lawyer and partner at Sonnenschein, Nath & Rosenthal LLP in Washington. ``The prosecutors can essentially say to a reluctant target or subject, `Look, we're prepared to try these cases. We did it with Safavian and are ready to do it with you.'"

Van Gelder had fought the introduction of hundreds of e- mails into evidence, arguing that Abramoff should appear on the witness stand to show whether they were valid. The decision by U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman to allow the e-mails into evidence without any testimony by Abramoff will play a role in the fight to overturn the verdict, she said.

Straight Ahead

Safavian looked straight ahead and made no statement as Friedman read the verdict, reached after more than four days of deliberation by the jury. The judge set a sentencing date for Oct. 12 and a court date for Aug. 24 to hear Van Gelder's arguments in an expected bid to throw out the verdict.

``We're still absolutely staunch" that Safavian did nothing wrong, Van Gelder said. ``It is more difficult today than ever before to maintain your innocence and explain your innocence."

The Safavian case stems from the August 2002 trip Abramoff arranged for a group to visit Scotland's famed St. Andrews golf course. Abramoff added on three nights in London, where guests stayed in $500-a-night rooms at the Mandarin Oriental hotel.

Abramoff chartered a private jet at a cost of more than $91,000 for the nine-person outing. Ney, an Ohio Republican, came with two of his aides, Will Heaton and Paul Vinovich. The group also included Abramoff's son, two of his fellow lobbyists and Christian activist Ralph Reed, a longtime friend.

GSA

At the time of the trip, Safavian was chief of staff at the General Services Administration, which oversees government land. Before the trip, he sent an e-mail to a GSA ethics official asking how he should treat the offer from Abramoff of a free ride on the jet. He told the ethics official that Abramoff had ``no business before GSA" and did all his work on Capitol Hill.

Prosecutors said those statements were untrue because Safavian and Abramoff had discussed how to acquire rights to GSA properties in a series of e-mails shown to the jury. Safavian said his statement was true because Abramoff, who worked for Greenberg Traurig LLP, didn't have any GSA contracts or bids and wasn't likely to have any.

Safavian also said he believed he had paid for the trip and his share of airfare with a $3,100 check written to Abramoff, a former colleague and golfing buddy. Prosecutors said Safavian should have known the vacation was far more expensive and contended that he accepted an improper gift.

`Tell the Truth'

When the GSA Inspector General's office and later a Senate committee investigating Abramoff asked Safavian about the trip, prosecutors contended that Safavian lied again. The jury agreed.

``The message of this verdict is clear: In answering questions posed by Congress and by federal agencies, public officials have the same obligation as does the public for which they serve -- to tell the truth," Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher said in a statement. ``No one is above the law."

Safavian left the GSA after getting an appointment from President George W. Bush to the Office of Management and Budget. He served as the government's top procurement officer until September 2005, when he resigned several days before his arrest.

``Even though Safavian is not a major target in the Abramoff investigations, as the first defendant to go to trial, his conviction will generate prosecutorial momentum," said Greg Wallance, a former federal prosecutor and now a lawyer at the New York firm Kaye Scholer. ``The conviction likely will encourage other witnesses -- who until now have been unwilling to cooperate -- to get off the fence and make a deal."

The case is U.S. v. Safavian, 05cr370, U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

Ex-Bush Official Guilty In Lobby Scandal (WT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

ASSOCIATED PRESS

A jury found former Bush administration official David Safavian guilty yesterday of covering up his dealings with Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Safavian was convicted on four of five felony counts of lying and obstruction. He had resigned from his White House post last year as the federal government's chief procurement officer.

The verdict gave a boost to the wide-ranging influence-peddling probe focusing on Abramoff's dealings with Congress.

In the Safavian case, prosecutors highlighted the name of Rep. Bob Ney, Ohio Republican. They introduced a photograph of the congressman and Abramoff standing in front of a private jet that whisked them and other members of a golfing party for a five-day trip to St. Andrews Old Course in Scotland. Safavian went on the trans-Atlantic trip while he was chief of staff at the General Services Administration (GSA).

The trial consumed eight days of testimony about Safavian's assistance to Abramoff regarding government-owned real estate and the excursion to Scotland that the lobbyist organized. The verdict came on the fifth day of jury deliberations.

Safavian showed no expression when the judge announced the guilty verdicts on each of four counts. Sentencing was scheduled for Oct. 12.

"The task force will say how this was a great day in the war on corruption," said Barbara van Gelder, Safavian's attorney, referring to the Justice Department task force investigating the Abramoff scandal. "I find they made a mountain out of a molehill and now they're going to plant the flag on top of the molehill."

This was the first trial to emerge from the scandal surrounding Abramoff, who is a former business partner of Safavian's. Abramoff has pleaded guilty to federal crimes in Washington and in Miami.

A key witness in the case was Neil Volz, a convicted partner of Abramoff's and ex-chief of staff to Mr. Ney. Prosecutors introduced hundreds of e-mails exchanged among Safavian, Abramoff, Volz and others in 2002.

The Justice Department made a case that Safavian provided Abramoff with advice and some inside information about two government properties.

Prosecutors said Abramoff wanted to buy or lease part of the GSA's White Oak property in the Maryland suburbs for use by a Jewish school he had established. They also said he wanted to give an Indian tribe client a leg up on obtaining the contract to redevelop the Old Post Office in downtown Washington as a luxury hotel, near two restaurants Abramoff owned.

Volz testified that the Abramoff team referred to Safavian as one of their "champions" inside government, who could give them insider information they couldn't get elsewhere.

Safavian took the stand for two days in his own defense. He acknowledged some misjudgments and forwarding Abramoff some insider information.

He maintained he simply gave generally available information to an old friend who was inquiring about government property that the GSA had not decided what to do with yet.

Former Bush Official Convicted Of Lying About Ties To Abramoff (KRT)

By Marisa Taylor

WASHINGTON - A federal jury convicted a former Bush administration official Tuesday of lying about his relationship with a high-powered Washington lobbyist who's at the center of a broadening investigation into influence-peddling on Capitol Hill.

David Safavian, former chief of staff of the General Services Administration, the federal government's procurement agency, was found guilty of four charges of making false statements and misleading investigators who were looking into Jack Abramoff's dealings with other public officials and lobbyists.

At his sentencing in October, Safavian faces up to five years in prison on each of the four counts.

Prosecutors had accused Safavian of lying about helping Abramoff attempt to buy two GSA-managed properties in the Washington area.

Safavian also didn't reveal the extent of his relationship with Abramoff and his plans to take a golfing trip to Scotland with the lobbyist in August 2002, prosecutors said.

The jury acquitted Safavian of a fifth charge, of attempting to mislead the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, which later determined that Abramoff had paid for a portion of the trip with tribal money.

Justice Department officials said Safavian's conviction showed that government officials would be held accountable for failing to cooperate with federal investigators.

"Public officials have the same obligation as does the public for which they serve: to tell the truth," Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said.

Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials. He didn't testify in the Safavian case, although he's agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors.

Four other former Abramoff associates, including a former chief of staff for Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, and two former aides to former Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, have pleaded guilty in the scandal. Ney and DeLay have denied any wrongdoing.

Neil Volz, Ney's former chief of staff, pleaded guilty in May to conspiring with Abramoff. Former DeLay aides Michael Scanlon and Tony Rudy have pleaded guilty to committing fraud and violating the federal one-year lobbying ban. Volz testified on behalf of the government during Safavian's trial.

During the eight-day trial, prosecutors presented dozens of e-mails between Safavian and Abramoff discussing the GSA properties.

Abramoff contacted Safavian days after his old friend became GSA's chief of staff to talk to him about the properties, according to federal records.

Abramoff wanted to buy or lease a portion of 600 acres in Silver Spring, Md., and the Old Post Office Building in Washington. At the time, the GSA managed the properties.

Prosecutors said Safavian later gave Abramoff advice about leasing or buying the properties, provided him with internal government documents and set up a meeting with other GSA officials.

At the time, Safavian had been planning to take the golfing trip to Scotland with a group that included Abramoff and Ney.

Safavian sought an opinion from ethics officers about whether he could join the trip, telling them Abramoff was a "lawyer and a lobbyist, but one that has no business before GSA," according to the federal documents.

Ethics officers concluded that Safavian could accept a gift as long as Abramoff wasn't seeking to do business with the GSA.

During the trial, defense attorneys argued that Safavian had acted appropriately by seeking advice from the ethics officers and reimbursing Abramoff $3,100 for the trip. Safavian's attorney Barbara Van Gelder didn't return repeated calls.

Prosecutors countered that the amount couldn't have covered his share of the expenses, which exceeded $130,000 for nine people.

Guilty Verdict For Associate Of Abramoff (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

WASHINGTON — In the first trial arising from the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal, a federal jury on Tuesday found a former Bush administration official guilty of lying and concealing his ties to the disgraced Republican lobbyist.

The case against David H. Safavian, once the government's chief procurement officer, turned on a lavish golf outing to Scotland. His conviction was a milestone for the Justice Department, which is continuing to pursue figures linked to Abramoff. The verdict adds momentum to that probe and is apt to put pressure on Safavian to cooperate with investigators to gain leniency when he is sentenced.

Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to corrupt public officials and to steal millions from Indian tribes he represented; he has agreed to cooperate in the ongoing investigation of his activities. Abramoff did not testify at Safavian's trial, although prosecutors introduced dozens of e-mails to show how he used his friendship with Safavian to learn more about government properties for sale.

Safavian was found guilty on three counts of lying or making false statements and one count of obstructing justice. Each count carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman set sentencing for Oct. 12.

"The message of this verdict is clear: In answering questions posed by Congress and by federal agencies, public officials have the same obligation as does the public for which they serve — to tell the truth. No one is above the law," Alice Fisher, chief of the Justice Department's criminal division, said in a prepared statement.

The verdict comes amid the investigation into whether Abramoff illegally traded campaign contributions and other favors to aid his lobbying clients. Federal agents are focusing on a number of Congress members, including Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), whose former chief of staff was the key government witness against Safavian.

Three other former Abramoff associates have pleaded guilty to crimes related to the scandal.

A lawyer for Safavian said her client had tried to play by the rules but had been swept up in a broader government corruption crackdown.

"The task force will say how this was a great day in the war on corruption," Barbara van Gelder said after the verdict. "I find they made a mountain out of a molehill, and now they're going to plant the flag on top of the molehill."

Legal experts said the verdict would strengthen the government's hand in dealing with others under investigation, and show that the government was serious about pursuing even lesser players caught in the Abramoff web.

"The conviction likely will encourage other witnesses — who until now have been unwilling to cooperate — to get off the fence and make a deal," said Greg Wallance, a former federal prosecutor in Brooklyn who was part of the team that prosecuted members of Congress in the so-called ABSCAM investigation in the 1970s and 1980s.

Democrats, eager to make corruption in Washington an issue at the polls in November, also said the conviction was significant.

The verdict "is another sign that the grip of the Republican culture of corruption and abuses of power in Washington is loosening, but it's just the tip of the iceberg," Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said.

Safavian befriended Abramoff at a Washington lobbying firm in the mid-1990s, when Abramoff was just beginning his rise to power in the capital. Safavian later struck out on his own to form a lobbying firm with conservative activist Grover Norquist. Safavian also worked as a congressional aide.

In 2002, he was named chief of staff at the General Services Administration, the powerful agency that manages billions in federal real estate. President Bush later named him the top procurement official at the Office of Management and Budget. He resigned that post last fall just before he was arrested and charged.

Prosecutors said Safavian never stopped working with Abramoff, even after he was employed by a federal agency. Soon after arriving at GSA, he began exchanging e-mails with Abramoff about two pieces of GSA property that the lobbyist was interested in developing in the Washington area.

The case boiled down to whether Safavian had misled GSA ethics officers and other investigators about his relationship with Abramoff and the circumstances of a lavish golf trip to Scotland that Abramoff was organizing at the time. Safavian went on the August 2002 trip, reimbursing Abramoff $3,100 to cover his share of the costs.

But prosecutors said the sum was a small fraction of the total cost, which included private jet service, luxury hotel accommodations and $400 rounds of golf at the famed Old Course at St. Andrews.

Safavian had requested an opinion from the GSA ethics office about whether he was permitted under agency conflict-of-interest rules to go on the trip. The office approved the trip after Safavian assured officials in an e-mail that Abramoff had "no business before G.S.A."

Prosecutors said the statement was a lie. Using e-mail traffic, they showed that, just weeks before the trip, Safavian was advising Abramoff on how to acquire GSA property in Maryland for a Jewish academy that the lobbyist had founded. Safavian also offered Abramoff tips on being considered for a GSA contract to redevelop the Old Post Office building on Pennsylvania Avenue near the White House.

Abramoff didn't acquire either property.

In addition, the five-count indictment charged Safavian with lying and concealing information from the GSA inspector general — who had been tipped off to the trip by an anonymous call to the agency hot line. Safavian also was charged with lying to the staff of a Senate committee that was investigating Abramoff. He was acquitted of a charge of obstructing the committee's investigation.

Safavian's case was hurt by the testimony of a former congressional staffer, GSA officials — and his own words.

A star witness was Neil Volz, who had gone to work for Abramoff after serving as chief of staff to Ney. He testified that Safavian and Ney were seen as "champions" who could always be counted on to back causes the lobbyists touted. Both Volz — who testified as part of a deal with prosecutors last month in which he pleaded guilty to corruption charges — and Ney were part of the golf trip to Scotland.

GSA and Senate investigators testified that they were kept in the dark about the advice Safavian gave Abramoff, and said the information could have altered their decision to clear the trip.

And Safavian, testifying in his own defense, said that the $3,100 he paid for the golf trip was based on an estimate provided by Abramoff, and that he had no reason to doubt it despite lavish accommodations. He said under cross-examination that he believed the cost of a round of golf at St. Andrews was "comparable" to the $135 he paid to play golf at a good course in the Maryland suburbs. The government estimated that the true cost of his share was more than five times the amount he paid.

"Mr. Safavian tried to serve two masters," Justice Department lawyer Nathaniel Edmonds told the jury last week as the government wrapped up its case. "He was appointed by the president to serve the people of the United States. But he chose to serve Jack Abramoff."

Safavian Found Guilty Of Lying About Abramoff (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, June 21, 2006

A jury yesterday found David Safavian, a former Bush administration official, guilty of lying about his dealings with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

DOJ_NMG_0036295

The former General Services Administration official was convicted on four of five felony counts of lying and obstruction.

The trial revolved around testimony about Safavian's assistance to Abramoff regarding government-owned property and a weeklong trip to a famed golfing course in Scotland and London.

Abramoff did not testify in Safavian's case, but Neil Volz, an Abramoff associate and former chief of staff to embattled Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), testified against Safavian.

Safavian's case was the first to go to trial in the influence-peddling case arising from the Abramoff scandal. A date for Safavian's sentencing has yet to be set.

Procurement Nominee Offers Contrast To Predecessor: Experience (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The contrast between present and past nominees was fairly obvious although never addressed yesterday in the Senate hearing room.

Paul A. Denett , the president's choice to head the White House's federal procurement policy office, was selected primarily because of his deep knowledge of government contracting. His predecessor, David H. Safavian , had come to the job primarily because of his political connections.

Yesterday morning, Denett, 60, promised at his confirmation hearing "to build a world-class acquisition system that garners the confidence of our taxpayers by consistently delivering efficient, effective and ethical contracting service."

A few blocks away, down Capitol Hill, a federal jury announced that Safavian, 38, had been found guilty on four of five felony charges tied to a corruption and influence-peddling scandal centered around lobbyist Jack Abramoff . [Story, A1.]

Safavian's name was not mentioned at the hearing on Denett's nomination to head the Office of Federal Procurement Policy, part of the Office of Management and Budget. Denett was nominated in April to serve as the OFPP administrator, replacing Safavian, who had resigned in September.

But Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), who held the hearing as chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, told Denett that she wanted to see the procurement office play a stronger role in federal contracting, suggesting that the office might want to consider auditing agencies' performance.

"OFPP is often too passive in its role," she said.

Collins said noncompetitive contracts and other lax practices had caused the government to squander more than $1 billion in its response to Hurricane Katrina. The only other committee member to attend the hearing, Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), faulted some Iraq war contract practices and urged Denett to go after contracts that lead to wasteful spending, noting that there "are some real gravy trains out there."

Denett agreed with the senators that there is "vast room for improvement" in federal procurement practices and said agency contracting officers should be held accountable for getting the best price for the taxpayer.

The nominee said he would work to improve training for the federal acquisition workforce, help agencies plan and operate more effectively during emergencies like Katrina, work for greater clarity and transparency in contract management, and ensure that work performed by federal employees is put up for bid "in a reasoned and responsible manner."

Denett served for more than 30 years as a career federal employee in the Navy and Army and the departments of Agriculture, Treasury and Interior. He held senior positions in acquisition operations and policy and started intern programs to recruit and train acquisition specialists.

Since 2003, he has been vice president of contracting programs at ESI International, a training and consulting firm in Arlington.

Aides to Collins said she hopes to soon schedule a committee vote and move the nomination to the Senate for approval.Pension Policy on Hold

Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman has ordered a one-year suspension of a new policy that would shift contract workers to "market-based" retirement and health-care plans to reduce costs.

The policy, announced April 27, was criticized in Congress as an effort to force Energy contractors to abandon guaranteed pensions and cut back medical benefits for new employees. The House Appropriations Committee and some members of Congress had introduced proposals to block the policy.

Energy officials said the policy was aimed at helping rein in growing liabilities. They noted that the department will spend $784 million this year to reimburse contractors for health-care and defined-benefit pension programs.

Bodman said he has directed department personnel to continue talks with interested parties, including members of Congress, during the one-year suspension. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said he was pleased that Bodman "retracted this harmful policy."

Safavian Found Guilty In Lobbyist Trial (AP-Y2)

By Pete Yost

AP2, June 21, 2006

The Justice Department on Tuesday won its first trial in the probe of influence peddler Jack Abramoff, convicting a former Bush administration official in a case that touched on questionable behavior by members of Congress.

A jury found David Safavian had hidden details of his relationship with Abramoff from a General Services Administration ethics lawyer, the GSA's Inspector General's office and the Senate Indian Affairs Committee and had obstructed the IG.

Safavian, the GSA's former chief of staff, could face up to five years in prison on each of those four counts. He was acquitted of obstructing the Senate probe.

The guilty verdict is expected to give a boost to a wide-ranging federal investigation that includes lawmakers, their aides and members of the Bush administration.

"The message of this verdict is clear: In answering questions posed by Congress and by federal agencies, public officials have the same obligation as does the public for which they serve — to tell the truth," said Alice Fisher, the assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's criminal division.

In Miami, meanwhile, a judge granted Abramoff and ex-business partner Adam Kidan another three months before they must begin serving prison sentences for fraud convictions stemming from the purchase of a gambling boat fleet. Abramoff also faces sentencing in Washington on federal charges of conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud.

The delay will give the two more time to cooperate with investigators.

In persuading a jury to convict Safavian, prosecutors introduced a photograph of Rep. Bob Ney (news, bio, voting record), R-Ohio, and Abramoff standing next to a private jet that whisked them and other members of a golfing party to Scotland for five days at the storied St. Andrews Old Course. Safavian was in the photo too, as were two of Ney's aides who also went on the Abramoff-organized junket.

Recent Justice Department court papers say Ney engaged in 16 actions on behalf of Abramoff at the same time the congressman and his staff were accepting gifts from the lobbyist.

In response to Tuesday's verdict, Ney's office blamed Ney's problems on "the lies and deception of Jack Abramoff."

Ney "has never, at any point, engaged in any improper, unethical or illegal activity" and the Safavian case "had absolutely nothing to do with Congressman Ney," his office said.

Prosecutors never called Abramoff to testify, instead relying on e-mail traffic to detail the relationship between the lobbyist and Safavian.

Abramoff, the e-mails showed, showered the GSA chief of staff with the lobbyist's largesse while badgering him for information about two pieces of government-controlled property the lobbyist wanted. One of them was the historic Old Post Office in downtown Washington.

Testifying in his own defense, Safavian said he and Abramoff were longtime friends and that he was trying to do the right thing by seeking a GSA ethics opinion on whether he could go on the Scotland trip.

Safavian sat impassively as U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman read the verdict, showing no emotion when the judge announced the guilty verdicts on each of four counts. Sentencing was scheduled for Oct. 12.

Safavian's attorney, Barbara Van Gelder, said the Justice Department task force investigating the Abramoff scandal will say that "this was a great day in the war on corruption. I find they made a mountain out of a molehill and now they're going to plant the flag on top of the molehill."

Van Gelder said convicting Safavian for not disclosing certain details to the ethics officer will dissuade other government officials from seeking such guidance.

Safavian did not disclose the advice and assistance he gave Abramoff on the two properties, including what Safavian acknowledged on the stand was some inside information about the position of officials in other agencies about the post office redevelopment.

In a bid for a lighter sentence on his own conviction, Neil Volz, Ney's former chief of staff, testified for the prosecution. Volz outlined how the Abramoff team received assistance on the GSA properties from several Republican congressmen or their aides including Ney, Rep. Don Young (news, bio, voting record) of Alaska, Rep. Steven LaTourette (news, bio, voting record) of Ohio and a former top aide to Rep. Shelley Moore Capito (news, bio, voting record) of West Virginia.

Volz told the jury the Abramoff team referred to Safavian and Ney as two of their "champions" who helped with inside information and assistance. Volz said Safavian was the mastermind of some of the strategy for developing congressional pressure or action to sway GSA. Volz said they tried to keep this maneuvering secret.

Ney's office called it "baffling" that Ney could be referred to as a champion for Abramoff "when there is no evidence that he took any official action on any of the issues Neil testified about."

Young's office has said he did not advocate any particular business over another. LaTourette said he was simply advocating special opportunities for small businesses. Capito's office said the congresswoman was unaware of assistance provided by her then-chief of staff.

Saginaw Tribe Wants Former Employee Investigated (AP)

By Tim Martin, Associated Press

AP, June 21, 2006

LANSING, Mich. (AP) -- The Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe wants the U.S. Department of Justice to investigate one of its former employees and his ties to tainted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Former legislative affairs worker Christopher Petras is accused by the tribe of giving "incorrect and misleading" testimony to the U.S. Senate Affairs Committee in September 2004 during hearings about Abramoff and Abramoff's associate, Michael Scanlon.

Abramoff is charged with defrauding the Mount Pleasant tribe while representing its interests in Washington, mainly from late 2001 to late 2003. Both he and Scanlon have pleaded guilty to various crimes dealing with work they did for Indian tribes in Michigan, Louisiana, Mississippi and Texas.

Although Petras testified before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee that he didn't recall many of the details about his communications with Abramoff and Scanlon, the tribe says a trail of e-mails and other testimony indicate a stronger relationship than Petras revealed.

Federal prosecutors say Abramoff encouraged the tribe to expand a lobbying contract without disclosing that he would receive about 50 percent of the profits from the tribe's payments. From June 2002 to October 2003, the tribe paid about $3.5 million on the contract, with about $540,000 being kicked back to Abramoff, court documents say.

Abramoff's former employer, Greenberg Traurig LLP, has agreed to repay millions of dollars to the tribe as part of a settlement. The Saginaw Chippewas say they paid about $14 million to Abramoff and Scanlon overall.

Tribal Chief Fred Cantu sent a letter last month requesting the Justice Department investigation to U.S. Sen. John McCain, the Arizona Republican who heads the Senate Indian Affairs Committee. The Senate committee is expected to release its own report this week on its investigation into Abramoff and the tribes.

Bernie Sprague, a former tribal subchief, is upset Petras did not reveal more at the Senate hearing of his ties to Abramoff.

"He was an employee of the tribe. He was on our payroll," Sprague said. "We expected him to be honest and forthright with us, and he was none of the above."

Tribal representatives say they want to find out what Petras knew about financial dealings concerning Abramoff.

"All that money coming from the tribe to Abramoff and Scanlon ... he had to know about that," Dave Otto, a former tribal subchief, said of Petras. "I think he knew or had to have some idea of what was going on."

Petras has not returned repeated phone messages and e-mails from The Associated Press in recent weeks seeking his side of the story. He worked in the Saginaw Chippewas' legislative affairs office from late 1998 to early 2004, when his job was eliminated by a newly elected tribal council.

E-mails submitted as part of the Senate committee's hearing process give some insight into Abramoff's dealings with Petras.

A May 2000 e-mail from Abramoff appears to indicate that Petras requested a meeting with Abramoff's firm about possible representation for the Saginaw Chippewa tribe.

In his 2004 testimony, Petras said he had no role in hiring Abramoff and that other tribal officials made the decision. However, he also said Abramoff's former firm was one of three for which he lined up interviews when the tribe was trying to expand its influence in Washington.

The Senate Indian Affairs Committee learned in 2004 that Abramoff and Scanlon spent $100,000 to help get eight supporters elected to the Saginaw Chippewas' 12-member council in 2001. Otto said that Petras was involved in that process and arranged a meeting with Scanlon. The new council soon voted to hire Abramoff and Scanlon.

Petras told the Senate panel the lobbyists gave him a digital video camera, a leather briefcase and "some type of slide projection desktop screen" as gifts but otherwise never paid him for that work.

He is listed on Abramoff gift lists as receiving $200 in December 2000 and $100 in December 2001. Tribal representatives say it is possible the gifts Petras acknowledged receiving are the same ones reflected on the lists. Other tribal officials also are named as gift recipients.

Current tribal leaders and Petras differ on how much influence Petras had on the political contributions the tribe made while he worked for them.

Petras testified there were "no efforts on my behalf to push either way any type of political contribution." Tribal leaders say that appears to be contradicted by other documents.

Petras told the Senate Indian Affairs Committee he never assessed how Washington lobbyists were doing. That was left for the council members themselves. In later testimony, Petras said he may have told the council from time to time that Abramoff and Scanlon were doing a good job.

E-mails indicate Abramoff and Petras may have worked to try and regain influence in February 2004 -- after they no longer worked for the tribe -- by getting involved in a recall election of tribal officers.

"They are running out of money for copying, stamps, etc. Petras asked if we could come up with $2500 to help them out," an e-mail from an Abramoff co-worker to Abramoff read. E-mails indicate Abramoff instructed a co-worker to get money from one of his accounts to help the recall effort.

In his Senate testimony, Petras said he did not recall the incident.

Another e-mail indicates Abramoff planned to loan Petras a computer so they could stay in contact after the newly elected tribal council eliminated Petras' job.

More Than $2M Raised For Libby's Defense (AP-Y2)

DOJ_NMG_0036299

Supporters of Vice President Dick Cheney's indicted former chief of staff have raised more than $2 million since late last year for his legal defense in the CIA leak case.

Former Cheney spokeswoman Mary Matalin was hosting a fundraiser at her home Tuesday night to help pay the legal expenses of I. Lewis Libby, who is charged with five counts of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI in the Valerie Plame affair.

The $2 million figure came from Barbara Comstock, a member of Libby's legal team. Among the co-hosts for the event at Matalin's home were former Energy Secretary Spencer Abraham, former Rep. Bob Livingston and oil industry executive and former Commerce Secretary Don Evans.

Former Republican Sen. Fred Thompson hosted a fundraiser at his northern Virginia home last month to raise money for Libby's defense.

Libby is accused of lying to Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald about how the former Cheney aide learned of Plame's CIA identity and what he told reporters about it.

One Count Dropped In Patronage Trial (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, June 21, 2006

Mayor Richard Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich and his three co-defendants scored a victory in court Tuesday when a federal judge tossed out a significant fraud charge against all of them in their City Hall corruption trial.

U.S. District Judge David Coar's ruling came as prosecutors rested a six-week case that portrayed much of the city's hiring and promotions system as riddled with political favoritism, sham interviews and preselected job applicants.

Coar also said Tuesday that he will reserve ruling on whether to dismiss all charges against former Streets and Sanitation officials John Sullivan and Patrick Slattery.

He rejected a defense request to dismiss remaining charges against Sorich and his former aide Timothy McCarthy.

Prosecutors allege in an eight-count indictment that the men schemed to rig hiring and promotion for many blue-collar city jobs in favor of pro-Daley political workers and others with political clout.

Coar tossed out count one of the indictment, a mail fraud charge against all four defendants, after prosecutors conceded they cannot provide evidence that a particular job applicant, Streets and Sanitation employee Joseph Pratl, received a 2004 promotion letter through the mail.

Pratl's promotion was one of hundreds, if not thousands, of city jobs that prosecutors allege were rigged through the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, where Sorich was a top aide.

They used Pratl's promotion, however, to charge all four men with one count of mail fraud.

Defense attorneys for Sorich and his former aide Timothy McCarthy called the ruling a significant stepping stone in their fight against the accusations.

"It's terrific. It's very consistent with my feelings about this case all along," said Sorich's attorney, Thomas Anthony Durkin.

Prosecutors declined to comment.

As the courtroom was turned over to the defense Tuesday, it was revealed in a court filing that Durkin may seek to call Daley's former Chief of Staff Sheila O'Grady and former Intergovernmental Affairs Directors Tim Degnan Sr. and Victor Reyes to testify. In an e-mail to prosecutors Saturday, Durkin suggested he will seek immunity from prosecution to secure their testimony.

Reyes heads the powerful pro-Daley Hispanic Democratic Organization, which prosecutors charge was among the main beneficiaries of the alleged scheme.

As Slattery's attorney Patrick Blegen presented the first defense witness Tuesday afternoon, veteran attorneys said the defendants face an uphill fight despite their victory Tuesday.

Richard Kling, a professor at Chicago-Kent College of Law and a criminal-defense lawyer, thinks the verdict could hinge "on whether the defense that 'I was only following orders' flies with the jury."

Since the trial began in mid-May, Durkin has argued that Sorich was simply forwarding job recommendations from alderman, community leaders and others to city departments.

He has argued the practice was longstanding and widely known in City Hall.

But a series of current and former city employees have testified that Sorich or McCarthy effectively ordered the city's largest departments to hire or promote people selected by the mayor's office.

The trial's first witness, former Water Department Personnel Director Mary Jo Falcon, said that for years she received lists of job applicants from Sorich or McCarthy. She called the lists "blessed" and said she didn't consider the names on them applicants but "hires."

According to testimony, many of the people hired or promoted were culled from armies of political workers.

The government put disgraced city employees Donald Tomczak and Daniel Katalinic on the stand to testify that they operated pro-Daley political organizations largely made up of city workers.

Tomczak, a former first deputy commissioner in the Water Department, and Katalinic, a former deputy commissioner in Streets and Sanitation, have both admitted taking bribes through the city's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program.

They testified that they maintained their political armies by offering jobs and promotions to workers. When they needed jobs, they would go to officials in the mayor's office, including Sorich and McCarthy, they said.

Throughout the case, defense attorneys have hammered at the credibility of government witnesses. Many witnesses received immunity from prosecution for their testimony. Tomczak and Katalinic are expected to receive more lenient sentences.

The prosecution's most prominent witness was City Hall's top lawyer, Mara Georges, who testified about conversations she had with McCarthy and Sorich after federal agents raided their offices in April 2005.

Georges said she was unaware until the 2005 raid that there were "irregularities" with regard to hiring for jobs covered by the Shakman decree, a federal court order prohibiting political-based hiring.

She grudgingly acknowledged on cross-examination that she learned in 2004 about an allegation that the mayor's office was involved in hiring an unqualified 19-year-old building inspector.

The prosecution's last witness, called Tuesday morning, was FBI agent John Hauser, who led the April 2005 raid of City Hall.

He said a sweep of offices at Intergovernmental Affairs yielded only one recommendation letter from an alderman.

But Hauser said searches of the Sorich and McCarthy offices, which had combination locks on the doors, turned up several lists of names connected to people and organizations with political clout.

Testimony from defense witnesses is scheduled to continue Wednesday. Durkin has said he expects the defense case to last about a week.

Judge Dismisses 1 Count Against Chicago Patronage Trial Defendants (AP)

By Megan Reichgott

AP, June 21, 2006

CHICAGO - A federal judge dismissed a mail fraud charge against Mayor Richard Daley's former patronage chief and three other former city officials Tuesday, ruling prosecutors did not have evidence to support the charge.

U.S. District Judge David H. Coar's decision to dismiss the charge, which takes up 13 pages of an 18-page indictment, was a boost for Robert Sorich, former head of the city's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, and the three others accused of covering up the illegal use of clout as the basis for filling city payroll jobs.

"It's a significant ruling, it's very consistent with my feeling about this case all along," defense attorney Thomas Durkin told reporters after the decision.

Sorich, Timothy McCarthy and Patrick Slattery still face other charges, including mail fraud.

McCarthy attorney Patrick E. Deady said the ruling "demonstrates it's not an ironclad case on all of the legal issues."

John Sullivan, former deputy commissioner of streets and sanitation, now only is charged with lying to the FBI. A message seeking comment was left for his attorney Tuesday night.

After prosecutors called their last witness Tuesday, Assistant U.S. Attorney Patrick Collins called a sidebar and asked the judge to dismiss the charge, said attorney's office spokeswoman Kim Nerheim. She declined to comment on the prosecutors' decision because the case is ongoing.

Coar allowed the defense to call its first witness, then formally threw out the charge after the jury went home for the day, Nerheim said. The trial was to continue with the same defense witness Wednesday.

"The next step is to move forward with the other counts against the defendants," Nerheim said.

The men are accused of disguising the use of clout rather than merit in hiring for city jobs despite the long-standing court-ordered Shakman Decree, which sharply curbs the city's traditional patronage system by banning political patronage as a basis for hiring all but about 1,000 of 38,000 city employees.

The charges are a spinoff of the federal government's 18-month investigation of the city's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program. The investigation has penetrated the heart of Daley's political operation and sent shock waves through City Hall, although Daley is not accused of any wrongdoing and has said his administration plans to continue cooperating with the federal government.

City Law Department spokeswoman Jennifer Hoyle did not immediately return a telephone call Tuesday evening after business hours.

2 Indicted For Alleged BWC Bribe; Brokers Accused Of Trading Condo Use For State Deals (TOLB)

By JAMES DREW And STEVE EDER, BLADE STAFF WRITERS

Toledo Blade (OH), June 21, 2006

COLUMBUS — The scandal that has gripped state government for 14 months broadened yesterday as two Cleveland-area investment brokers were indicted on charges that they conspired to bribe a high-ranking official of the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation in exchange for getting and keeping a piece of the bureau's business.

Brokers Michael W. Lewis and Daniel P. O'Neil worked for three investment firms in the six years they gave Terrence Gasper, the bureau's chief financial officer, use of an oceanfront condominium and a boat slip in the Florida Keys, according to the indictment unsealed yesterday in U.S. District Court.

In exchange, Gasper steered business to the firms that Mr. Lewis and Mr. O'Neil worked for — Ferris, Baker Watts for the past six years; Raymond James & Associates in 2000, and Roney & Co. from 1997 through 1999, federal prosecutors allege.

The indictments are the latest in a state and federal investigation of the bureau's investment practices that began last year after The Blade began reporting about problems with the agency's $50 million investment in rare-coin funds managed by former Toledo-area coin dealer and GOP fund-raiser Tom Noe. He has been charged with stealing millions from the funds.

"We are looking at the conduct of these individuals because the business followed them, no matter where they went," said Gregory White, U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Ohio.

Mr. White estimated that the firms for which Mr. Lewis and Mr. O'Neil worked received $5 million to $6 million in brokerage commissions, marketing, and solicitation fees from the bureau, the state agency that pays medical bills and provides monthly checks to Ohio workers injured on the job.

Mr. Lewis, 71, and Mr. O'Neil, 54, pleaded not guilty yesterday to the felony charges during a brief hearing in U.S. District Court in Akron. Mr. Lewis surrendered to FBI officials yesterday and gave his U.S. and Irish passports to authorities.

The four-count indictment returned by a federal grand jury in Cleveland states that in November, 1998, Gasper and his then-girlfriend met with a real estate agent and signed a contract to buy a condo and boat slip at the Coral Harbour Club Condominium in Islamorada, Fla., for $345,000.

But Gasper never had plans to buy the condo and boat slip, federal authorities allege.

Instead, Mr. Lewis contacted the real estate agent, said he was Gasper's partner, and the contract then was assigned to Mr. O'Neil and Mr. Lewis — who at the time worked for Roney & Co.

Condo purchased

In January, 1999, Mr. O'Neil and Mr. Lewis closed on the purchase of the condo and boat slip for $345,000, federal prosecutors allege.

From February, 1999, to his forced resignation in October, 2004, after the state lost $216 million in a Bermuda-based hedge fund, Gasper stayed at the condo and "treated it as if it were his own," allowing his girlfriend, her family members, and her veterinarian to use the condo for free, the indictment states.

Gasper occasionally would make a "token rental payment'" to Mr. Lewis to make it look like his stays there were legitimate, authorities said, but for five years starting in 1999, Mr. Lewis and Mr. O'Neil jointly paid the mortgage and all other fees related to the condo and boat slip.

Mr. Lewis and Mr. O'Neil are charged with violating federal law by conspiring to bribe Gasper, committing mail and wire fraud by arranging to buy the condo for Gasper's use, and making false statements to federal investigators when they claimed that Gasper had no involvement in the Florida Keys condo, Mr. White said.

Mr. Lewis and Mr. O'Neil each face a maximum of 20 years in prison, a $250,000 fine, and three years of probation on the charge of conspiring to bribe Gasper. On the other three counts, they face up to five years in prison, a $250,000 fine, and three years of probation.

Gasper pleaded guilty June 7 in federal and state courts to massive public corruption charges, including money laundering for accepting $25,000 from Noe for an investment that was made in the name of Gasper's then-girlfriend, Betsy Ratcliff.

Gasper made key decisions regarding Noe's $50 million coin funds and the failed hedge fund run by Mark D. Lay of Pittsburgh-based MDL Capital Management.

A marketer, who has not been identified by federal authorities, gave Gasper a $9,000 check made payable to the college that Gasper's son attended.

Big commissions

Gasper, who lives in the Columbus suburb of Worthington, must cooperate with federal and state investigators as part of his plea agreement. An attorney representing Gasper, who has not been sentenced, didn't return a message seeking comment.

Nancy Smeltzer, a bureau spokesman, said brokerage firms that Mr. Lewis and Mr. O'Neil worked for have collected about $3.2 million in commissions from the agency since 1997.

Ms. Smeltzer said it was unclear what percentage of commissions were directed to Mr. Lewis and Mr. O'Neil.

"It is our interest to see this investigation and all this activity brought to a close. We've got business to do. We've got public trust to rebuild. We are eager to see this over with as anybody," Ms. Smeltzer said.

Joan Ellis, a Princeton, N.J., resident who owns the unit next to the one purchased by Mr. Lewis and Mr. O'Neil, said the Coral Harbour Club Condominium complex is "probably the fanciest, nicest, la-de-da place in the Florida Keys — at least from Islamorada up." Ms. Ellis said she has never seen or met the brokers or Gasper.

Ms. Ellis said the complex is situated on the oceanside with a clubhouse, swimming pool, tennis courts, and a man-made lake.

'The best building'

"It has 14 acres of very tropical, posh plantings and with peacocks that wake you up at 4:30 in the morning," she said. "Behind the ocean there's big long dock, and there's a protected marina, and there's some really big boats."

The complex comprises about eight buildings and the brokers own a unit in the "E" building.

"I happen to think the 'E' building is definitely the best building," Ms. Ellis said, adding that the building is "right on the ocean."

Donna Klements, who lives near Mr. Lewis in Willoughby, which is east of Cleveland in Lake County, said she hadn't had much contact with Mr. Lewis.

"I don't even think I could pick him out of a line-up," Ms. Klements said.

Ms. Klements said Mr. Lewis and his wife live in a "regular house." Mr. Lewis purchased the 1,944-square-foot home in Lake County in 1998 for $327,000, according to property records.

"There's nothing extravagant, fancy, ooh la la about it," Ms. Klements said.

DOJ_NMG_0036303

Susan Markley, who lives next door to Mr. O'Neil and his wife in Geauga County, said she has talked to him several times and can't believe the allegations.

"I can see maybe someone trying to set Dan up and pulling him into it," she said.

Brokers Indicted In State Scandals (COLDIS)

By Mark Niquette, THE COLUMBUS DISPATCH

Columbus Dispatch, June 21, 2006

Former BWC official, friend given condo use, counts say

Terrence W. Gasper and his former girlfriend personally picked out the oceanfront condo and boat slip in the Florida Keys that the couple, her family members and her veterinarian would use.

But Gasper knew they wouldn't have to pay for it, authorities say.

The $345,000 tab was picked up by a pair of Ohio brokers in exchange for millions of dollars of business with the state Bureau of Workers' Compensation, where Gasper was chief financial officer, according to a four-count federal indictment of the brokers handed up yesterday.

Michael W. Lewis, 71, of Willoughby Hills, and Daniel P. O'Neil, 54, of Chesterland, both were indicted by a federal grand jury in Cleveland on charges that include lying to federal authorities and conspiring to bribe Gasper, who earlier this month pleaded guilty to corruption charges and is cooperating with authorities.

According to the indictment, Gasper and his former girlfriend selected the Islamorada, Fla., condo in November 1998. But the two brokers actually bought it "in return for favorable treatment" from Gasper in getting business from the bureau's multibillion-dollar portfolio.

The value of that business was about $5 million or $6 million, said U.S. Attorney Greg White of Cleveland. He is part of an unprecedented task force of federal, state and county authorities investigating state investment and ethics scandals.

Lewis and O'Neil are the eighth and ninth people charged in that sweeping probe so far, and authorities said charges against others are expected.

"We still have more work to do," said Inspector General Thomas P. Charles, part of the task force.

Lewis and O'Neil pleaded not guilty to the charges yesterday in U.S. District Court in Akron. Each is free on $50,000 cash bond. An Aug. 28 trial date has been scheduled.

If convicted, each man faces up to 35 years in prison and $1 million in fines.

But William D. Beyer, O'Neil's Cleveland attorney, said O'Neil would fight the charges "to preserve his good name and reputation."

"Dan O'Neil is a good and decent man," Beyer said. Roger Synenberg, Lewis' attorney, could not be reached.

According to the indictment, Lewis, O'Neil and Gasper agreed in 1998 that the brokers would provide Gasper with a condo and boat slip. Gasper and the former girlfriend signed a contract to purchase them and gave a real-estate agent a $500 down payment, the court document says.

But Lewis contacted the agent a few days later saying he was Gasper's partner. Lewis and O'Neil then took over the contract and bought the condo and boat slip. Gasper never had any intention of buying it with his own money, the indictment said.

Gasper occasionally would make a "token rental payment" to Lewis to "make it appear that his stays (at the condo) were legitimate," but Gasper "treated it as if it were his own," according to the filing.

Gasper allowed others to use the condo free from 1999 through 2004, authorities said. Lewis also wrote checks payable to those close to Gasper, including a $2,000 check to his former girlfriend with "consulting" written in the memo line, the indictment said.

The court documents don't name the girlfriend.

The two brokers also provided meals and other gifts to Gasper, among the 150 freebies worth thousands of dollars that Gasper accepted from brokers and others doing business with the bureau, Franklin County Prosecutor Ron O'Brien said.

According to Ohio records, Lewis and O'Neil now work for Ferris, Baker Watts Inc. in the Cleveland area, and both previously worked for Raymond James & Associates and Roney & Co.

Bureau records list payments to firms and not individual brokers, but documents show that those three firms earned more than $2.7 million in commissions during the times the two brokers worked for them.

The records also show that Ferris, Baker Watts didn't start earning commissions from the bureau until the third quarter of 2000, the same quarter that Lewis and O'Neil joined the firm, state documents show. An attorney for the firm has not returned repeated phone calls.

Gasper, the bureau's chief financial officer from 1995 until October 2004, pleaded guilty in both federal and state courts June 7 as part of plea agreements that require him to cooperate with the investigation.

He admitted accepting free stays at the condominium — now valued at $745,000 — a $9,000 college tuition payment for his son and other gifts from former coin dealer Thomas W. Noe, brokers and others.

The probe also has uncovered additional information about potential wrongdoing in some of the state's pension systems, and more than a dozen vendors and as many or more public officials and employees are under scrutiny, The Dispatch has reported.

Brokers Indicted In Stock Scandal (AP)

By Connie Mabin, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 21, 2006

CLEVELAND - Two investment brokers were indicted Monday on federal charges that they bribed a top official at the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation with the use of their Florida Keys condominium in exchange for state business.

A federal grand jury indicted Michael W. Lewis and Daniel P. O'Neil, who managed stock investments for the $15 billion insurance fund for injured workers, on four counts each. The two worked at firms that received hundreds of thousands of dollars in commissions from the agency.

Both pleaded innocent Monday before U.S. District Judge David D. Dowd Jr. in Akron, which is in the Cleveland-based federal court district.

Terrence Gasper, the bureau's former chief financial officer, pleaded guilty in state and federal court earlier this month to accepting stays at the condo, money for his son's tuition and other gifts in exchange for doling out investment business.

Prosecutors promised more charges after Gasper became the first bureau official convicted in a yearlong political scandal that has shaken the state's GOP-dominated government and given Democrats hope of regaining some seats, including governor. The scandal forced the ouster of the longtime workers' comp administrator, the firing of its chief investment officer and an overhaul of the fund's investment operations.

Lewis, 71, of Willoughby, and O'Neil, 54, of Chesterland, also are accused of committing mail and wire fraud to conceal their relationship with Gasper. Two counts charge them with lying to a federal agent about Gasper's involvement with the condo.

Willoughby (OH) News-Herald, June 21, 2006

Two brokers accused in Ohio Bureau of Workers Comp case

Two area investment brokers are the latest businessmen to be charged in the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation investment scandal.

Indicted on federal charges were Michael W. Lewis, 71, of 2358 Dodd Road in Willoughby, and Daniel P. O'Neil, 54, of 11365 Kristine Drive in Chester Township, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced Monday.

The case involves Terrence Gasper, the former OBWC chief financial officer who pleaded guilty in federal court earlier this month to one count of racketeering for accepting a gift for business deals.

Lewis and O'Neil are accused of providing Gasper with a condominium in Islamorada, Fla., and cash and college tuition for his son in exchange for business deals with the bureau's $15 billion investment fund.

A federal grand jury in Cleveland returned a four-count indictment against the suspects, who face up to 35 years in prison each, if convicted.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Benita Pearson stated in a news release on Monday:

"Lewis and O'Neil conspired with Gasper to deprive the citizens of Ohio of their right to Gasper's honest services by using Gasper's position and influence ... to assist Lewis and O'Neil in obtaining and retaining OBWC investment business by committing mail and wire fraud to conceal their illicit relationship with Gasper."

The two brokers also were charged with lying to a federal law enforcement officer about Gasper's involvement with the condominium purchase.

The indictment is part of an ongoing criminal investigation into allegations of misconduct involving millions of dollars in Workers' Compensation investment funds.

The probe is being led by officials with the Inspector General for the state of Ohio, Ohio Highway Patrol, Ohio Ethics Commission and numerous others.

Gasper is the first workers' compensation official to be charged in the scandal.

He said during the hearing he was "more than willing" to help with the investigation, which has shaken the state's Republican-dominated government.

It led to ethics charges against Gov. Bob Taft, who pleaded no contest to charges of failing to report gifts such as golf outings.

The probe also led to the ouster of the bureau's administrator, the firing of its chief investment officer and an overhaul of the fund's investment operations. Gasper's attorney, Terrence Grady, said his client also would plead guilty to related state charges.

Gasper, 59, is also accused of receiving $25,000 from rare-coin dealer Tom Noe, who has pleaded guilty to illegally funneling money to President Bush's re-election campaign.

Noe still faces allegations he embezzled $1 million from a $50 million rare-coin investment he managed for the workers' compensation fund.

Under federal guidelines, Gasper faces a sentence of five years and 10 months to seven years and three months in prison.

U.S. District Judge David D. Dowd Jr. said he will not sentence Gasper until he is through helping with the government investigation. Lewis and O'Neil did not yet have attorneys on record. Their cases had not yet been assigned to a judge.

Ohio has one of the nation's largest workers' compensation funds, with investment assets totaling about $19 billion, according to U.S. attorneys.

Evidence Could Tie Women To Deaths (LAT)

By Richard Winton, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

A Mercury Sable found in Hollywood may link two alleged scammers to the hit-and-run killing of a homeless man.

Los Angeles police detectives and FBI agents investigating a pair of women suspected of killing two homeless men have turned their attention to one of those victims after uncovering new evidence that they say links the women to his death.

Detectives looking into the case of Helen Golay and Olga Rutterschmidt are now focusing primarily on the death of Kenneth McDavid, who was run over in a Westwood alley last June in a hit-and-run that remains unsolved.

Authorities said in a search warrant affidavit that an hour before McDavid's body was discovered, Golay called the Auto Club to have a Mercury Sable towed from an intersection a block from where the 50-year-old was hit.

In new court papers obtained by The Times, detectives said they found blood and "organic matter" on the damaged undercarriage of the Sable.

The car was registered to an Encino woman whose name has been withheld by authorities. The woman told Det. Dennis Kilcoyne and FBI Special Agent Samuel A. Mayrose that she never owned the Sable but that her purse had been stolen around April 2003.

Authorities said in court papers that when they searched Golay's Mercedes-Benz SUV, they found a planner containing the Encino woman's name, a note with the Sable's license plate number and its vehicle identification number.

At Rutterschmidt's Hollywood apartment, authorities discovered photocopies of the Encino woman's driver's license, according to the affidavit. The photocopies were in an envelope marked "Helen sent Pictures," along with the Encino woman's name, address and cellphone number.

Kilcoyne said investigators now believe the Encino woman was the victim of identity theft and was not involved in McDavid's death.

Rutterschmidt, 72, and Golay, 75, were indicted last month on nine charges, including mail fraud, for allegedly collecting more than $2.2 million in life insurance on McDavid and Paul Vados, who was killed in an unsolved hit-and-run on Nov. 8, 1999, in a Hollywood alley.

They have pleaded not guilty. Both women are being held in federal custody and could not be reached for comment. Their attorneys could also not be reached.

Prosecutors allege that the women paid the rent on apartments for Vados and McDavid in order to keep track of the men's whereabouts for two years. In McDavid's case, authorities say Golay approached him at church and offered to get him off the streets in exchange for his signing an application for a $500,000 life insurance policy.

Although authorities said the women had no family relationship to Vados or McDavid, the pair were listed on insurance applications as the men's aunts or cousins or business partners, and Golay as a fiancee.

Neither woman has been charged in the mens' deaths, but police detectives have described them as suspects.

Investigators said they were focusing on McDavid's death because it occurred more recently and because they have tracked down more clues. But they said they are also continuing to pursue Vados' death, as well as that of a 97-year-old Massachusetts man who was hit by a car in Santa Monica.

According to the court papers, investigators believe McDavid was hit and killed by a car traveling at "a fairly low speed." He may have been unconscious because of a combination of alcohol, prescription sleep drugs and prescription painkillers that coroner's officials found in his system, according to prosecutors.

Detectives obtained a warrant to check Golay and Rutterschmidt's homes for possible prescription medicines found in McDavid's system, but police have not said what they found in that search.

Detectives have arranged for DNA tests on the blood found on the Sable but have not received the results.

The Sable has proven to be a key piece of evidence in the case.

A few weeks after McDavid's death, the car was found on a Hollywood side street, less than a mile from Rutterschmidt's apartment, prosecutors said. The vehicle was ticketed three times between July 15 and 20, and records indicate that it was impounded and determined to have been abandoned.

Impound records indicate that the vehicle had "front-end damage," according to the court filing.

The Sable was eventually sold by Hollywood Tow to a person who was unaware of its past.

The Belleville News Democrat, June 21, 2006

CHICAGO - A Roman Catholic priest formerly based in suburban Hoffman Estates pleaded guilty Tuesday to possessing child pornography.

The Rev. Daniel Schulte, 53, former chaplain at St. Alexius Medical Center, was accused after federal investigators found still and video sexual images of children on the hard drive of his computer.

The images included girls and boys younger than 12 years old and some involved material that portrayed sadistic or masochistic acts, according to the plea agreement. The computer held more than 600 images when federal agents seized it, according to the U.S. attorney's office, but the defense disagreed with that number, the plea said.

The Vincentian priest was not accused of engaging in sexual activity with children. Defense attorney Patrick J. Cotter declined to comment Tuesday.

The Rev. Raymond Van Dorpe, assistant provincial of the order, said when Schulte was charged in March that the Internet service provider for Schulte's computer had contacted the order in March 2005 with the suspicion that child pornography had been accessed.

The provincial superior immediately removed Father Schulte from active ministry and placed him on precautionary administrative leave, Dorpe said. An attorney for the order contacted the FBI and Schulte was moved to St. Louis where both he and his access to the Internet were supervised.

Schulte faces up to 10 years in prison and a maximum $250,000 fine when he is sentenced Sept. 14.

Bay City News, June 21, 2006

(BCN) Federal prosecutors announced today that two more people, including a Cupertino man, have been convicted as part of Operation Copycat, the Justice Department's crackdown on Internet piracy.

Cupertino resident Tom Leung, 53, and Ray Morada, 32, of Washington, D.C., were convicted today of conspiracy and copyright infringement charges for their participation in a "warez group."

Warez groups are the source of the majority of pirated movies, music and software distributed and downloaded on the Internet, according to federal prosecutors.

Once a warez release group prepares a stolen work for distribution, the material is distributed in minutes to secure, top-level Internet servers throughout the world. From there, within a matter of hours, the pirated works are distributed globally, filtering down to peer-to-peer and other public file sharing networks accessible to anyone with Internet access, according to authorities.

Federal authorities began cracking down on the groups last year with Operation Copycat. To date 36 people have been charged in connection with Operation Copycat and 30 have been convicted, including Paul Sherman, a film critic for the Boston Herald. Sherman pleaded guilty last month to selling more than 100 pre-release review copies of movies to a known warez supplier between 2002 and 2005.

"Operation Copycat has yielded the conviction of a film critic who sold approximately 117 movies for illegal distribution. In addition, the case has yielded several notable firsts including the first convictions for recording a movie in a theater and uploading a pre-released movie on the Internet. The success of this investigation shows that individuals cannot hide behind advanced technology and the Internet to reproduce and distribute copyrighted works," U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said.

Hooks Jr. Indicted, Joins Father As Defendant In Tenn. Waltz (AP)

MEMPHIS, Tenn. -- Former Memphis school board member Michael Hooks Jr. became the 11th person charged in the Tennessee Waltz corruption scandal when he was indicted Tuesday on embezzlement charges.

Hooks' father, Shelby County Commissioner Michael Hooks Sr., was indicted last year on Tennessee Waltz bribery charges and is awaiting trial.

Five of the accused in the federal investigation are current or former state lawmakers, two of whom have been convicted.

The Hooks family has long been active in Memphis politics, and Hooks Jr.'s great-uncle, Benjamin Hooks, is a former national director of the NAACP.

Hooks Jr. is charged in a four-count indictment with skimming public money from the Shelby County Juvenile Court.

While Tennessee Waltz focused on an FBI front company called E-Cycle Management that offered bribes statewide for government favors, it grew out of an embezzlement investigation at the juvenile court in Memphis.

Offenses in the indictment against Hooks Jr. carrying a maximum punishment of 40 years in prison and fines totaling $1 million, though federal guidelines would call for a much lighter sentence upon conviction.

The indictment says Hooks conspired with former court employee Darrell Catron to get a cut of more than $60,000 paid to former business consultant Tim Willis on bogus work claims.

Catron pleaded guilty to federal embezzlement charges in 2003 and Willis became an FBI informant when caught lying to a grand jury.

A woman who answered the phone at Hooks' office told The Associated Press he would have no comment.

Hooks, 31, announced his resignation from the school board in October, saying he wanted to spend more time with his family and return to college.

Willis was a key witness against former Sen. Roscoe Dixon, D-Memphis, the first state lawmaker facing Tennessee Waltz charges to go to trial. Dixon was convicted earlier this month and is awaiting sentencing.

Witnesses at Dixon's trial said the juvenile court investigation was rolled into Tennessee Waltz when the FBI sting officially began in 2004.

Former Rep. Chris Newton, R-Cleveland, has pleaded guilty to accepting Tennessee Waltz bribes and is serving a one-year prison sentence.

Two bribery "bagmen" also have pleaded guilty and a former county commissioner in Chattanooga was convicted at trial. A former county commission administrator in Memphis is also under indictment.

Sen. Kathryn Bowers, D-Memphis; Sen. Ward Crutchfield, D-Chattanooga; and former Sen. John Ford, D-Memphis, are awaiting trial.

Hooks Jr., an aspiring actor, played a small role as a prison official in "Hustle and Flow," a movie about a small-time Memphis pimp and drug dealer who longs to be a rapper.

Testimony On Bulger Probe Is Disputed (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, June 21, 2006

A retired FBI agent, who went undercover in 1983 to offer bribes to officials, yesterday disputed testimony that the Massachusetts Senate president at the time, William M. Bulger, had been a target of the investigation.

``His name never came up," John ``Jack" Callahan said in a telephone interview with The Boston Globe. ``As far as Bulger being a target of the investigation? Not to my knowledge, and I was the primary and only undercover agent involved in it for four years."

Yesterday, Robert Fitzpatrick, who was second in command of the FBI's Boston office from 1981 to 1986, acknowledged that the FBI did not have any evidence of wrongdoing by Bulger during the 1983 investigation.

But he stood by his testimony on Monday that Bulger was a target of the inquiry.

Fitzpatrick said it was one of nine investigations in his tenure in Boston that he believed had been compromised by leaks to informants, including Bulger's gangster brother, James ``Whitey" Bulger, or others outside the agency.

Fitzpatrick testified Monday in a wrongful-death suit.

The action was brought against the government by the family of a murdered FBI informant who was to ``get" the House majority whip at the time, Vincent Piro ; the House speaker, Thomas W. McGee ; and Bulger.

Piro, a Somerville Democrat, was recorded on tape in 1983 asking Callahan, who was posing as a mall developer, for $25,000 to ensure legislative approval for liquor licenses for the Assembly Square Mall in Somerville. Piro said he needed $5 ,000 up front ``to grease a few guys."

But after accepting $5,000 from the undercover agent, Piro returned it three weeks later, saying that he had never taken money before, and that ``I don't want to start now."

Prosecutors said Piro had been tipped off that Callahan was an FBI agent. Piro argued entrapment at the trial; he was acquitted of conspiracy and extortion charges.

A witness testified that Piro had made reference to ``the speaker," but McGee was never charged, and he denied any involvement with the case. Bulger's name did not surface during the trial.

Yesterday, after Fitzpatrick finished testifying in a civil suit in US District Court, he told a reporter that the FBI was ``getting a lot of information about the flow of the money . . . there were allegations that [Bulger] might get money, that he was part of this chain."

Fitzpatrick said that Bulger was known as someone ``who could make deals go through" at the State House, and that the FBI thought Piro might enlist Bulger's help for the liquor licenses.

Fitzpatrick acknowledged, however, that there was no evidence that Bulger ever got any money from Piro.

DOJ_NMG_0036309

``The investigation ended quite abruptly," Fitzpatrick said.

A Boston lawyer, R. Robert Popeo , who represented Piro in the criminal case and who represented Bulger on unrelated matters in the 1980s, called Fitzpatrick's claims ``preposterous."

He said that Bulger's name had never surfaced during the case and that the government never produced ``a scintilla of evidence" that there was a leak to Piro.

``It's clearly revisionist history," Popeo said, adding: ``They never had evidence then [of a leak], and they don't have it now."

Fitzpatrick said Monday that after Piro returned the money, the FBI launched a leak inquiry.

In the courthouse hallway yesterday, Fitzpatrick said that he and the US attorney at the time, William F. Weld, who became the governor, interviewed a retired FBI agent, Dennis Condon, about whether he had leaked information about the Piro investigation.

Condon had worked in the organized crime squad of the FBI's Boston office and had had dealings with James ``Whitey" Bulger and his sidekick, Stephen ``The Rifleman" Flemmi, both longtime informants. But, Fitzpatrick said, Condon denied having been involved in leaking information.

Condon's lawyer, Michael B. Meyer , said yesterday that Condon retired from the FBI in May 1977, and that he ``therefore was not in a position to leak, and did not leak, anything."

Yesterday was Fitzpatrick's sixth and final day on the stand in a $50 million wrongful death suit filed against the government by the family of John McIntyre, a Quincy fisherman who was murdered on Nov. 30, 1984.

McIntyre's mother, Emily, and brother, Christopher, have asserted that the government had negligently caused McIntyre's death because of the FBI's mishandling of James ``Whitey" Bulger and Flemmi.

Flemmi testified this month that he and Bulger had killed McIntyre because an FBI agent, John J. Connolly Jr., had warned them that McIntyre was cooperating against them.

Beaten P.I. Was Seeking Witness To '92 Mob Slay (NYDN)

By Nancie L. Katz, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, June 21, 2006

When veteran forensic investigator Angela Clemente drove to a remote parking lot in the dead of night last week, she thought she was about to break another big mob case.

Her longtime partner, Stephen Dresch, said yesterday that Clemente was hoping to meet an eyewitness to two 1992 mob slayings - and get enough evidence to possibly overturn the murder convictions of three men.

Instead, Clemente was beaten and nearly strangled last Friday - and then threatened again.

"The threat that came after the attack was far more alarming than the attack itself," Clemente told a source yesterday. "I'm in hiding. I'm very nervous. I'm scared. I'm not going to do any further investigation."

The case she was probing stemmed from the slayings of reputed Colombo soldiers John Minerva, 66, and Michael Imbergamo, 54, on Long Island.

Clemente, 40, has been seeking evidence that would help clear three men convicted of the murders - and link the crimes instead to the late Colombo capo Greg Scarpa Sr. and his FBI handler, Lindley DeVecchio.

Dresch said she hoped to get it from Imbergamo's nephew and bodyguard, a retired NYPD cop who ducked the gunfire that fatal day.

"He dived under the dashboard of his car," said Dresch, a forensic investigator and retired college professor. "He was supposed to have gotten out of the way.

"Presumably, he would have seen something," he added. "Angela. has been trying to find him and had the word out."

Clemente had been getting anonymous notes about the Long Island murder on her car windshield. She thought they could have come from the nephew - the possible breakthrough she was looking for, said Dresch.

"She was hoping he would tell her something. What did he see? Anything she could get. He was there. He was a witness," Dresch said. Nassau County prosecutors are now probing what role Scarpa played in the convictions of rival capos Joseph and Anthony Russo and associate .Joseph Monteleone in those murders.

Dresch and Clemente played an early role in bringing out evidence against DeVecchio that Brooklyn District Attorney Charles Hynes turned into a criminal indictment, charging him in four mob murders.

Scarpa died in 1994. DeVecchio, who has vigorously denied any wrongdoing, is free on bail.

About 1 In 20 Americans Stalked, Study Says (SCRIPPS)

By Lee Bowman, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard, June 21, 2006

Nearly 5 percent of adults in a national survey reported having been stalked at some point, translating to an at-risk pool of more than 7 million women and 2 million men in the United States.

Most stalkers aren't strangers, according to the study's lead researcher, Kathleen Basile, a behavioral scientist who works in violence prevention at the National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, part of the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Women, younger adults and those who are single, separated or divorced are most at risk. Younger adults being more likely victims "goes along with what we know about violence in general," Basile said.

The results, being published in the American Journal of Preventive Medicine in August, are based on phone interviews done with nearly 10,000 adults between 2001 and 2003, with responses about equally divided between women and men.

Stalking was defined as "ever being followed, spied on or communicated with, without consent, at a level perceived to be somewhat more dangerous or life-threatening (not counting commercial exchanges with bill collectors or telemarketers) for more than one month."

According to the researchers, "Stalking continues to be a public health problem at a magnitude comparable to that measured in the National Violence Against Women Study (done for the Justice Department in 1995-96)."

That study concluded that about 8 percent of women and 2 percent of men had been stalked.

Both surveys indicated that women were most likely to be stalked by someone with whom they've had a relationship, while men were more likely to be stalked by acquaintances or strangers.

"Women should be aware of the potential for stalking by an intimate partner, particularly when that intimate partner is physically or sexually violent," Basile said.

The new survey found that blacks have significantly lower odds of being stalked than whites, but Basile said the reasons for this aren't clear and that there may be differences in how people report stalking.

The earlier study found that about two-thirds of all stalking episodes end within a year, but that those involving intimate partners tended to go on longer.

Mindy Mechanic, an associate professor of psychology at California State University-Fullerton who researches intimate-partner violence, agreed that the most dangerous stalker is someone who is - or has been - in a relationship with the victim. "In the majority of homicides involving intimate partners, stalking was another tactic, another tool in the abusive armamentarium of the stalker," she said.

However, she noted, "most stalking does not end in homicide or even violence. The perpetrator is arrested, hospitalized, moves away, gets tired or finds another victim."

The Justice Department survey indicated that about half of victims felt the intrusions had stopped either because they had moved or because the stalker turned to a new relationship.

The duration of stalking seems to mostly depend on the stalker's motivation, according to Mechanic. "A delusional individual, like a celebrity stalker, is different from a socially unskilled, awkward ... individual who thinks that a neighbor who says 'Hi' in the hallways is romantically interested in them."

Firms Seek Federal Privacy Rules (WP)

By Kim Hart

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

Several large technology companies, including Google Inc. and eBay Inc., announced support yesterday for stronger federal regulations to protect consumer privacy on the Internet.

DOJ_NMG_0036311

Twelve companies formed an advocacy group, the Consumer Privacy Legislative Forum, to lobby for greater protection of private information, and several members testified yesterday before a House subcommittee.

For over a decade, consumer groups have pushed for measures to safeguard personal information from identity theft and fraud.

The group of companies is seeking federal legislation that would require businesses to notify consumers when collecting personal information, then allow individuals to choose how the information is used and to access data they have provided to cut down on unauthorized use.

An "uneven patchwork" of state laws aimed at protecting consumer privacy makes it difficult for companies to comply and is confusing for consumers, said Nicole Wong, Google's associate general counsel.

"When you have so many laws all with the same aim but with different definitions, companies aren't able to create protection in a uniform way," Wong said.

Ari Schwartz, deputy director of the District-based Center for Democracy and Technology, said a multitude of industry-specific laws has been ineffective in protecting consumers "across the board."

"We don't want states passing new laws every time a data breach happens," he said.

Meg Whitman, eBay's president and chief executive, is also in favor of a single federal law. Yesterday, she told the House Energy and Commerce Committee's subcommittee on commerce, trade and consumer protection that the Federal Trade Commission should more closely monitor how consumer information is obtained and shared on the Internet. She said Web-based retailers should not be held to a higher standard than other businesses.

Before the group formed in March, a few companies -- among them Hewlett-Packard Co., Microsoft Corp. and Intel Corp. -- actively supported far-reaching legislation, Schwartz said. Now companies such as Eastman Kodak Co., Eli Lilly and Co. and Procter & Gamble Co. have joined the cause.

The involvement of companies that haven't traditionally been big online players indicates the importance of the consumer privacy issue, he said.

Other analysts said that overregulating data gathered online could disrupt the free flow of information that is vital to healthy markets.

Restricting information could reduce competition and prevent new firms from entering the marketplace, said Thomas M. Lenard, senior fellow at the Progress & Freedom Foundation, a nonprofit organization that analyzes public policy relating to digital technology.

"The personal information utilized by firms produces great value for consumers and the economy," Lenard told the subcommittee. Regulation, he said, would have "unintended" consequences, "especially when imposed on a medium like the Internet that is changing so rapidly."

He said companies already have market-induced incentives to protect private data.

The challenge of securing personal information and the reluctance of Congress to pass stronger legislation has frustrated consumer advocates. Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, said state governments have been more responsive than Congress in safeguarding consumer privacy. Pressure from private companies may yield results as long as the new campaign is more than a ploy to improve their image, he said.

"We welcome the participation of industry in the discussion, but it can't simply be an exercise in public relations," Rotenberg said.

Google, Other Tech Giants Call For Law To Protect Consumers (AFP-Y2)

By Glenn Chapman

AFP, June 21, 2006

Fresh from a fight with US officials over the sanctity of online search information, Google joined an alliance of technology firms calling for federal legislation protecting consumer privacy.

DOJ_NMG_0036312

"Today we live in a digital economy where both beneficial and potentially harmful uses of personal information are multiplying," said a statement from the Consumer Privacy Legislative Forum, whose roster includes such technology powerhouses as Microsoft, Intel, Oracle, Sun Microsystems and Hewlett Packard.

"The time has come for a serious process to consider comprehensive harmonized federal privacy legislation to create a simplified, uniform but flexible legal framework" for protecting consumers, it said.

"The legislation should provide protection for consumers from inappropriate collection and misuse of their personal information and also enable legitimate businesses to use information to promote economic and social value."

Google counsel Nicole Wong said Tuesday in a blog posting on the Google website that the company joined a group of "notable US companies" calling for federal consumer privacy legislation.

There was a "patchwork quilt" of US state consumer protection laws that varied depending on location and subject, with examples being health, financial, or child-related data, according to Wong.

"This matrix of laws is complex, incomplete, and sometimes contradictory," Wong wrote. "For consumers, the result is a set of privacy protections that are uneven at best."

The Internet was "beset with spyware, malware, phishing, identity-theft, and other privacy threats" that made protecting privacy an industry-wide challenge and highlighted the lack of a coherent regulatory structure, according to Wong.

A national standard for Internet privacy needed to be "a robust framework" because it would supersede state laws, the forum maintained.

The forum was created late last year and members that signed the statement on Tuesday included Eastman Kodak, eBay, Google, Hewlett-Packard, Intel, Microsoft, Oracle, Sun Microsystems, Symantec, Proctor and Gamble, Eli Lilly and Company, and Hewitt and Associates.

Google's joining the forum came in the wake of its legal standoff earlier this year with US federal government officials who demanded online search records from the company.

The standoff ended in March when US District Judge James Ware ordered Google to turn over only a fraction of the information sought.

Maintaining that the case raised "vital interests", Ware ordered the Mountain View, California-based search engine giant to hand over data on just 50,000 websites.

Ware rejected the Justice Department's attempt to obtain more sensitive data that might disclose the online search habits of web users, noting that that could spark a possible "loss of good will" among Google's users.

Federal prosecutors sought the information as ammunition in a legal fight to revive an overturned 1998 statute making it a crime for websites to allow minors access to adult material online such as pornography.

Wong at the time proclaimed Ware's decision "a clear victory" for the company and Internet users.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

A Chance To Mark The Ballot By Puffing Through A Straw (NYT)

By Sewell Chan

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

For the first time, New York City residents will be able to vote by "puffing" and "sipping" air through a straw, pumping a foot pedal, touching a computer screen or pressing flat plastic shapes — two triangles, a circle and a square — affixed to the four corners of a specially configured keyboard.

These new methods, which represent the biggest innovation in the city's voting technologies since the Shoup mechanical-lever machine was introduced in 1962, are a temporary measure intended to help disabled people vote.

The new voting methods are the product of a lawsuit from the federal government. They will be used in the Sept. 12 primary and the Nov. 7 general election as an interim step to comply with a new federal requirement that voting machines be accessible to the disabled.

The new voting methods can be used on 22 ballot-marking devices that will be available at one site in each of the five boroughs. It is an imperfect compromise: by placing the machines at centrally located offices, the city is essentially requiring some of the least mobile voters to travel the longest distances to vote. And because it can take up to 40 minutes to cast a vote using the new machines, voters may find themselves waiting in long lines.

The devices are not actual voting machines; they cannot record votes, but merely generate a printed ballot on a sheet of white paper. The voter, with help from a poll worker if necessary, would then place the ballot in an envelope. The ballot would then be counted by hand, along with other paper ballots, including absentee ballots, on Election Day or shortly after.

John Ravitz, the executive director of the city's Board of Elections, gave a presentation yesterday on voting reform to members of a mayoral task force on modernizing elections and later oversaw a demonstration of the new devices to members of the board and the public, including several disabled residents.

In March, the Justice Department sued New York State for failing to comply with the federal Help America Vote Act of 2002, which called on the states to overhaul their voting systems. In May, after both sides acknowledged that the state could not overhaul its entire system in time for this year's elections, they agreed on a compliance plan that required each county to provide a limited number of voting machines that are fully accessible to the disabled for this year's elections.

The city bought 27 ballot-marking devices from Avante International Technology of Princeton Junction, N.J. The company is also providing the devices to 32 of the 57 counties in New York State outside New York City.

By next year, the state must have fully accessible voting machines in every polling place statewide — including the 1,369 in New York City. The state Board of Elections, which must approve new voting systems, has not yet done so, and so the city must wait before selecting its new voting technology.

The new ballot-marking devices will be available in each of the board's five borough offices: 5 each in Manhattan, Brooklyn and Queens; 4 in the Bronx; and 3 in Staten Island. (Three devices will be used in demonstrations, and two internally.) Before the September primary, the board will mail information about the devices to the city's 4.3 million registered voters.

Some advocates for the disabled said they were not fully satisfied. "I'm sorry we're having to go ahead with this interim plan," said Alexander Wood, executive director of the Disabilities Network of New York City, which represents people with motor and sensory disabilities. "I would have liked to see us hold out for a solution that accommodates all disenfranchised voters. This is a separate system, not an equal system."

Mr. Wood, a paraplegic who uses a wheelchair, noted that it could take up to 40 minutes for a disabled voter to cast a ballot using the new device. Many disabled voters will have to listen to a long recorded announcement with instructions — and the contents of the ballot — before they can vote.

Terrence C. O'Connor, a Queens Democrat who holds the rotating presidency of the 10-member city Board of Elections, conceded that the new device could be cumbersome. "It's the best it could be under the circumstances," he said.

Hispanics Drop Voter Rights Lawsuit Against Kissimmee (AP)

KISSIMMEE, Fla. -- Four people want to drop a lawsuit alleging city election procedures unfairly diluted the voting power of Hispanics after they found that the minority group now outnumbers registered white voters.

The class-action complaint was filed last year to challenge the way city commissioners are elected, arguing that each spot should represent a geographic district. Instead, residents citywide are allowed to vote on each race, similar to the U.S. Senate.

Despite comprising about 45 percent of Kissimmee's 52,000 people, no Hispanic has ever been elected to the commission.

Armando Ramirez, one of the four residents behind the lawsuit, originally filed a federal complaint six years ago alleging unfair voting practices. In July, the U.S. Justice Department filed a lawsuit against Osceola County on similar grounds, and Ramirez's group said they wanted to carry that momentum by suing weeks later.

However, the voter registration rolls now show that Hispanic voters outnumber white voters by about 900.

"The lawsuit is unsustainable," said Ramirez, who ran unsuccessfully for the Kissimmee City Commission in 2002. "Instead of waiting for the judge to tell us that, we directed our attorneys to" seek a voluntary dismissal.

DOJ_NMG_0036314

The motion must still be approved by a judge, and Hispanics interested in continuing the suit have until June 30 to respond to a legal notice published Monday in the Orlando Sentinel. They would have to object to the motion to dismiss, which could mean hiring an attorney and being responsible for the cost of pursuing the action, according to the advertisement.

Ramirez said Monday the group will focus its efforts on registering people to vote.

The Justice Department case against Osceola County is still pending. A department spokesman declined to comment Tuesday on the request to drop the class-action suit.

Flag Burning Redux (WP)

WITH CONGRESSIONAL elections coming, the Republican leadership has found a pivotal issue. Terrorism? Hardly. Entitlement reform? Don't be silly. We're talking about the grave threat to America known as flag burning. Yes, that election-year favorite is back: the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States allowing Congress to criminally punish the "physical desecration" of the American national banner. If you haven't noticed a rash of flag-burning incidents sweeping the nation that's because, well, there isn't one. But that doesn't stop Republicans from trotting it out as a more-patriotic-than-thou card.

They are, as always, close to having the votes to send it to the states for ratification. The House of Representatives has passed the measure and the vote will be tight in the Senate, where the Judiciary Committee approved the amendment 11 to 7. We hope the amendment will fall short of the needed two-thirds majority on the Senate floor; it's depressing enough that a majority of senators will support it.

The amendment would soil the First Amendment's command that Congress shall "make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech." Flag burning is an odious form of expression. But there are lots of odious forms of expression the First Amendment protects: Holocaust denial and swastikas, racist rants and giant Confederate flags, hammers and sickles. The amendment's power is in its self-confident sweep: Speech, including expressive acts, will not be censored. Government cannot punish ideas. Members of Congress who would protect the flag thus do it far greater damage than a few miscreants with matches.

ANTITRUST:

Knight Ridder Deal OK'd (KRT)

By Pete Carey, Knight Ridder

Knight Ridder, June 21, 2006

The Justice Department has cleared McClatchy to buy Knight Ridder, after McClatchy agreed to sign a guarantee that it will sell the St. Paul Pioneer Press, according to people familiar with the process.

The Justice Department was concerned about McClatchy's purchase of Knight Ridder because the company would own two papers in the Twin Cities — its own Minneapolis-based Star-Tribune and Knight Ridder's Pioneer Press.

McClatchy already has a buyer lined up for the Pioneer Press: Denver-based MediaNews, which also is buying the San Jose Mercury News, Contra Costa Times and Monterey County Herald, all in California, in a complicated $1 billion deal. That deal is still under antitrust review. McClatchy was asked to guarantee that it would sell the Pioneer Press regardless of whether the sale to MediaNews is approved by regulators.

Sacramento, Calif.-based McClatchy declined to comment.

All that remains now for the Knight Ridder-McClatchy deal to be complete is to count the shareholder votes on Monday at Knight Ridder's annual meeting in San Jose. Eighty percent of shareholders must approve the deal. The final papers will be signed June 27., at which point Knight Ridder will cease to exist.

The Justice Department is continuing to review MediaNews' $1 billion plan to purchase the four papers, and is specifically looking at overlaps between the Contra Costa Times and MediaNews' Tri-Valley Herald. It is also reviewing the involvement of Hearst in the MediaNews purchase, because Hearst owns the San Francisco Chronicle, which competes with MediaNews in the Bay Area. Hearst is spending $263 million for the Monterey County Herald and the Pioneer Press, but will trade the two papers to MediaNews in exchange for a stake in MediaNews' assets outside the Bay Area.

McClatchy is buying Knight Ridder and its 32 newspapers for $4.5 billion and assuming $2 billion in Knight Ridder debt. It is selling 12 of the newspapers to help finance the deal.

All but one of the papers being sold has a buyer.

McClatchy Cleared By DOJ To Buy Knight Ridder (SANJBIZ)

San Jose Business Journal, June 21, 2006

The McClatchy Co. has been cleared by the U.S. Department of Justice to buy Knight Ridder Inc. after agreeing to sell the St. Paul Pioneer Press, according to reports.

The Justice Department was concerned about Sacramento-based McClatchy's (NYSE:MNI - News) purchase of San Jose-based Knight Ridder Inc. (NYSE: KRI - News) because of antitrust issues -- McClatchy would then both the Minneapolis Star-Tribune and Knight Ridder's St. Paul Pioneer Press.

According to reports, the Pioneer Press may be bought by Denver-based MediaNews Group Inc., which owns other newspapers in the Bay Area and is also buying the San Jose Mercury News, Contra Costa Times and Monterey County Herald in a complicated $1 billion deal.

That deal is still under antitrust review.

McClatchy is in the process of buying Knight Ridder for about $4.3 billion. The deal involves the sale of 12 Knight-Ridder newspapers that McClatchy views as having low growth prospects.

The Knight Ridder-McClatchy deal must still be approved by shareholders.

Justice, FTC Unveil E-filing For Pre-merger Notification Documents (FCW)

By David Hubler

Federal Computer Week, June 21, 2006

The Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the Federal Trade Commission announced today an electronic filing system that will allow merging companies to submit pre-merger notification filings, as required by the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act, via the Internet, eliminating the time and expense of duplicating and submitting written documents.

The new system ends the requirement to submit to Justice and the FTC paper copies of the required pre-merger notification form and attachments, according to a DOJ announcement.

Under the new system, pre-merger filers now have three options. They can:br>

Complete and submit the form and all attachments in hard copy.

Complete the electronic version of the form and submit it and all attachments electronically.

Complete the electronic version of the form and submit it electronically while submitting all documentary attachments in paper copy.

The Hart-Scott-Rodino Act requires companies planning acquisitions or mergers that meet certain threshold requirements to file a Notification and Report Form with Justice and the FTC in advance. The law also requires the merging parties to observe a mandatory 15- or 30-day waiting period, after which the companies may proceed with the transaction if neither Justice nor the FTC has requested additional information about the transaction.

Because Hart-Scott-Rodino filings are highly confidential, every step of the e-filing process has been designed to ensure the confidentiality and security of submitted information, according to the statement. A valid electronic signature will be required before submission of the package, which will be encrypted and transmitted via the Internet to a secure FTC server.

Justice and the FTC will employ unspecified security measures to protect the information parties submit, according to the statement.

In addition to providing benefits to filers and government agencies, e-filing complies with the Government Paperwork Elimination Act, which requires that federal agencies provide e-filing and signature options to the extent practicable.

Detailed information on e-filing, including an electronic version of the Notification and Report Form, is available at https://www.hsr.gov/.

The e-filing option will be available on the publication of the Federal Register notice announcing necessary Hart-Scott-Rodino Act changes. That notice is available at http://www.ftc.gov/bc/hsr/hsr.htm.

FTC, DOJ To Allow Premerger Notices Filed Via Internet (DOW)

Dow Jones, June 21, 2006

The Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department's antitrust division will allow merging companies to submit premerger filings via the Internet instead of delivering hard copies.

Companies still will be allowed to file paper copies with the FTC and antitrust division, and also will be able to submit merger notification and report forms electronically along with paper copies of documentary attachments.

The electronic filing option will be available upon Federal Registry publication of the notice that makes the necessary changes to the Hart-Scott- Rodino Act's rules.

FTC Secretary Donald Clark told Dow Jones Newswires he expects the notice will be published by the end of the week.

Justice Cites Strides In Copyright Fight (UPI)

UPI, June 21, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department said Tuesday it is making progress in the fight against intellectual property piracy.

A new department report said all of the recommendations from an earlier task force report on intellectual property theft have been implemented.

Intellectual property theft includes the trading and online piracy of copyrighted movies, music and video games.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, in prepared remarks to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in Washington, said the department attempted to implement all 31 recommendations, and, "I am proud to announce that the Department of Justice has achieved this goal."

Gonzales cited "The 2006 Progress Report" on intellectual property theft.

Among the highlights, Gonzales said, was the fact that the task force increased the number of prosecutors in the field by not only creating the five additional Computer Hacking and Intellectual Property, or CHIP, units recommended in the 2004 report, but also created an additional seven CHIP units.

That nearly doubled the number of CHIP units - from 13 to 25 - in less than two years, he said.

Feds Pump Up Intellectual Property Protection Efforts (IDG)

By Grant Gross, IDG News Service

IDG News Service, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, D.C.-- The U.S. Department of Justice has fulfilled or exceeded all recommendations made by an intellectual property task force in October 2004, including new computer crime investigations units in 12 cities, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced Tuesday.

Since the Justice Department's task force made 31 recommendations for protecting intellectual property, the department has launched Computer Hacking and Intellectual Property units in seven more cities than the task force recommended. The department now has 25 CHIP units across the United States. Among the newest 12 are units in Washington, D.C., Baltimore, Denver, Detroit, and Philadelphia.Efforts Abroad

Gonzales called intellectual property the "lifeblood" of the U.S. economy during a speech in Washington, D.C. "We've done a lot," he said. "We have to do a lot more."

The Justice Department, which released a progress report on the initiative today, has also stationed an experienced prosecutor to work on intellectual property enforcement in Southeast Asia, and will add a prosecutor in Eastern Europe. Those prosecutors will help train foreign prosecutors, investigators, and judges about intellectual property investigations, the department said.Goals Accomplished

The report, which will be available at the department's cybercrime page, also notes several other Justice Department efforts during the past two years. Among the task force recommendations the department has met:

Increasing the number of defendants prosecuted for intellectual property offenses by 98 percent between the government's fiscal 2004 and 2005 years

Publishing a nearly 400-page comprehensive resource manual for federal prosecutors on prosecuting intellectual property crimes

Partnering with the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office to dedicate $900,000 over three years to piracy prevention efforts with nonprofit educational institutions

The Business Software Alliance, a trade group representing large software vendors, praised the Justice Department report, saying the agency has made "significant progress" in protecting intellectual property.

Justice Dept: Has Doubled Counterfeiting, Piracy Cases (DOW)

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- The U.S. Justice Department Tuesday said it has doubled prosecutions of counterfeiting and piracy since a task force was set up in 2004 to address intellectual property prosecutions.

"We have increased our capacity to address intellectual property thefts," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told a luncheon in a speech at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "We have done a lot, but we have to do a lot more."

The doubling of federal prosecutions was noted in a 72-page progress report on the department's intellectual property task force, which was released this week.

Gonzales said the Justice Department has set up 25 special computer hacking and piracy units around the U.S. in the last two years, boosting the ability of government prosecutors to dismantle international and domestic counterfeiting organizations. The department also has worked with other agencies to, among other things, press China and other countries to do more in combatting illegal counterfeiting.

Gonzales told the room of business representatives that the department has made combatting illegal counterfeiting a top agency priority, not only for artistic works but also for trademarks, trade secrets and patented products, such as pharmaceuticals and medical devices.

Intellectual Property Prosecutions Double, Says Justice (B&C)

By John Eggerton, Broadcasting & Cable

Broadcasting & Cable, June 21, 2006

The Justice Department Tuesday is issuing a status report on protection of intellectual property in the digital age, saying it has almost doubled the number of defendants prosecuted for intellectual property crimes.

Even Court TV has been part of the solution, according to the department.

In its 104-page progress report, the Task force on Intellectual Property says it has implemented recommendations made in October 2004, when it issued its initial report about what steps needed to be taken.

Among the progress it is reporting:

•Creating an intellectual property educational program for young people (including distributing information on college campuses).

•Increasing the number of defendants prosecuted for intellectual property offenses 98% (from 177 in fiscal year 2004 to 350 in 2005).

•Partnering with the Patent Office to put $900,000 over three years into piracy prevention efforts.

•Teaming with Court TV, which has covered a number of events on intellectual property rights.

Prosecuting the theft of DISH's satellite signal by a man who made over $300,000 selling pirated and re-programmed devices.

Content providers, arguably led by NBC Universal Chairman Bob Wright, have been pushing for stronger copyright protections and stepped-up pursuit of IP pirates, arguing they threaten hundreds of billions of dollars across a host of sectors, from counterfeit drugs to stolen TV shows, and could impede the transition to digital content distribution.

In October 2005, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales added new members to the task force and told it to implement the 2004 recommendations ASAP.

Increased Piracy Puts More Heat On China (LAW)

By Gabe Nelson, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 21, 2006

The entertainment industry hoped the counterfeiting of movies, music, software and books would plummet after China agreed in 2002 to abide by the World Trade Organization's standards for global intellectual property rights.

Instead, the industry says piracy has increased dramatically, leading some American companies to view the Chinese government as unable -- or unwilling -- to curb it. And industry lobbyists are now helping the U.S. government prepare a case that could be brought against China in the WTO's Dispute Settlement Body.

Earlier this month, Assistant U.S. Trade Representative Timothy Stratford told the American Industries U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission that the United States could launch a WTO case if China doesn't crack down on IP offenders.

But experts suggest that while both the industry and the government talk tough when it comes to taking on China, America may be reluctant to actually bring a complaint against the Asian superpower.

Pushing the industry's case is Washington's Smith & Metalitz, a deceptively small lobbying firm specializing in intellectual property. Although the firm employs just four partners, an associate and a consultant, its list of clients reads like an all-star roster of influential entertainment trade groups. The firm's secret: Smith & Metalitz plays Clark Kent to the International Intellectual Property Alliance's Superman.

Both share the same leader, Eric Smith, who serves as both the association's president and Smith & Metalitz's managing partner. In 1995, Smith and intellectual property lawyer Steven Metalitz formed Smith & Metalitz, and today the firm represents all seven of the association's member groups, including the Motion Picture Association of America, the Recording Industry Association of America, the Association of American Publishers, the Business Software Alliance, and the Entertainment Software Association.

Smith & Metalitz recently made it a greater priority to work with the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative to build a case against China, according to lobbying registrations released last month by the Senate Office of Public Records.

Smith declined to comment on the details of the case. "It's a little premature to support a case actively," he says. "We're still in the evidence-gathering stage with USTR." Records also show that Smith & Metalitz received about $400,000 from its clients for 2005.

Also lobbying is the National Association of Manufacturers, the largest industrial trade group in the United States, whose $8.3 million in-house lobbying practice works extensively on Chinese trade issues.

NAM has seen an upswing in piracy across many sectors of industry, says Bill Primosch, the organization's director for international business policy.

"Anything that has a high markup is being counterfeited," Primosch says. "It's all kinds of products: pharmaceuticals, personal-care products, auto parts, medical-testing equipment. And it's starting to flow into the international marketplace."

In 2000, the year before China joined the WTO, the International Intellectual Property Alliance claimed losses of more than $1 billion to Chinese copyright piracy in the film, music, video-game, publishing and business-software industries.

Since then, China's economy has boomed, with an annual increase in gross domestic product of about 10 percent. Piracy industries have grown too. The association has estimated losses of $2.69 billion for 2005. Those figures don't include illegal Internet file sharing, which has increased as more and more Chinese gain access to the Internet.

But the USTR's threat of a WTO suit against China might be little more than saber rattling, experts say.

AN EMPTY THREAT?

DOJ_NMG_0036319

Trade groups remain reluctant to support a WTO case, Primosch says. Many of NAM's member companies fear China's government will identify them as troublemakers and blackball them, he explains. "They don't want to burn their bridges," he explains.

Although trade groups fear becoming foes of the Chinese government, they say they would support a case against China if there were adequate evidence to prove it. "The worst thing that could happen is you lodge a complaint, a WTO panel reviews the material and says, 'Well, you just haven't proven your case,'" Primosch says.

American industry has reason to worry, as experts say it's unclear whether a case against China would be effective. The Chinese government, they say, has already implemented significant legal reforms since joining the WTO.

"The formal legal regime governing [intellectual property rights] protection in China has improved, and that improvement is ongoing," says Kenneth Lieberthal, a professor of political science and international business at the University of Michigan. "The national leadership is gradually developing some institutional capacity, particularly in the eastern cities, to enforce the rules."

Piracy continues, in part, because many Chinese officials protect illegal enterprises to boost their local economy, Lieberthal says. In many cases, a region's economic performance influences whether an official will be promoted, creating a powerful incentive for administrators to ignore the legal status of the industries under their jurisdiction.

That poses a problem for the United States because the WTO can only determine whether a national government is meeting its obligations and has no authority over corrupt officials. In this case the WTO would have to determine whether Chinese law meets the trade body's requirements regarding copyright and patent enforcement. To win a case, the United States would need to prove that Chinese law enables corruption, and given China's recent efforts to improve its copyright laws, that would be a much more difficult case than simply proving the existence of piracy.

"You can't just haul China into court on the basis that there is piracy in China," Lieberthal says.

But some have said problems with the way Chinese law is written could be used to bolster a WTO case.

For example, Chinese copyright law sets the minimum amount of piracy needed for prosecution far too high, according to the U.S. trade representative's 2006 Special 301 Report on China.

"The mandated thresholds remain so high that they make it impossible as a matter of law to prosecute many commercial infringers, especially at the retail level," the report says.

If China doesn't take steps to improve intellectual property protection, America could impose sanctions, which could force the nation to bring its IP enforcement into line. But the United States would be unlikely to impose economic barriers against China because sanctions could damage a U.S. economy increasingly dependent on inexpensive Chinese-manufactured goods, says Marc Busch, an international business professor at Georgetown University.

Busch cites a hypothetical situation: The United States could put a tariff in place if it won a WTO case against the European Union, for example. "We're hurting EU companies so that they'll turn around and ask Brussels to fix the problem," Busch says. "At the same time, we're kind of punishing ourselves by making it harder to buy Fendi bags or Roquefort cheese."

Since the WTO formed in 1995, it has given member countries permission to seek retaliation fewer than 10 times, and half the countries with permission to create sanctions have been too scared of economic backlash to implement them, Busch says.

Financially, American companies have little to gain from a case against China: The WTO's Dispute Settlement Body cannot award compensatory damages, so a decision in the United States' favor wouldn't yield a settlement for companies whose intellectual property has been infringed. "If you want damages, you should be suing in a Chinese court," Busch says.

He adds that companies may be waiting for the possibility of suing for damages in Chinese courts, and their pressure on China's government is meant to hasten that day. Even if the United States has only a tenuous case against China, American criticisms of the Chinese legal system ought to remind China of the importance of IP protection in an innovation-based economy, he says.

And Lieberthal says that to a great degree, China is only hurting itself, since much of the piracy in the nation has victimized Chinese-owned companies. "If China is serious about creating an innovation-based society, then it needs to do a better job of protecting intellectual property," he says.

PSC Considers AT&T-BellSouth Merger (MH)

The Miami Herald, June 21, 2006

The Public Service Commission today is slated to consider AT&T's $67 million acquisition of BellSouth, a deal that some opponents claim will lead to reduced competition.

On Monday, Florida Attorney General Charlie Crist sent a letter to the PSC urging it to ensure that merger doesn't harm competition for basic telephone service.

"My concern here is that the merged company might squeeze out competition to the detriment of consumers, particularly seniors, and residential and small-business customers," Crist wrote.

AT&T would grow to 70 million local phone customers and nearly 10 million broad band subscribers in 22 states if the deal is completed. The merger requires approval from both companies' shareholders, the Federal Communications Commission and the Justice Department. State regulatory agencies, including the PSC, also are weighing in on the deal.

FTC Nearing Approval Of Lockheed-Boeing Rocket Deal (AP)

BETHESDA, Md. - Defense contractor Lockheed Martin Corp. has received a copy of a draft consent order proposed by federal antitrust regulators to approve the creation of a joint rocket venture with rival Boeing Co., which has rocket production facilities in Decatur, Ala.

Lockheed received the draft from the Federal Trade Commission about 10 days ago, company spokesman Tom Jurkowsky said Tuesday. He was unaware of the contents or how long Lockheed will review it before sending recommendations back to the FTC.

Boeing Co. has also received a copy, said Dan Beck, a company spokesman in Virginia. Beck did not know when the company would send recommendations back to the FTC.

He also said he didn't know when the FTC would approve or reject the merger announced in May 2005.

"It's entirely in the hands of the government right now," he said.

Although competitive concerns have prolonged the review, Lockheed is encouraged by the FTC's actions.

"Clearly this is a step in the right direction," said Jurkowsky, whose company earlier this year urged the FTC to complete its review.

A spokesman for the FTC said the agency does not comment on ongoing investigations.

The new venture, United Launch Alliance, is meant to cut costs for the launch of government satellites.

Boeing officials said the Decatur facility, which already produces its Delta rockets, would also produce Lockheed's Atlas rockets, if the merger is completed.

The Decatur facility employs 660 people. Boeing would not comment on how the merger would affect jobs at the plant.

"It certainly means there will be more activity," Beck said.

The merger would also defuse a legal battle between Lockheed and Boeing over charges that Boeing had access to stolen Lockheed documents on its rocket launch plans.

The government stripped $1 billion worth of rocket launches from Boeing and the company later agreed to pay $615 million to end a Justice Department probe of the Lockheed records theft and other infractions.

Germany's Bayer Says It Has Enough Shares To Proceed With Takeover Of Schering AG (AP)

By David Rising, Associated Press Writer

BERLIN (AP) German drug and chemical maker Bayer AG said Tuesday it now controls enough shares of Schering AG for it to go ahead with its nearly 17 billion euros ($21.33 billion) takeover of the rival company.

``Bayer has gained control of a total of 88.0 percent of Schering's approximately 191 million issued and outstanding shares," Bayer said in a statement. ``The attainment of a three-quarters majority was the last remaining condition of the takeover offer. Both the EU Commission and the U.S. antitrust authorities had already given their unconditional approval."

The announcement appeared to mark the final end to a merger battle over Schering between Bayer and fellow German drugmaker Merck KGaA.

Bayer's initial 16.5 billion euros ($20.7 billion) takeover bid for Schering trumped a hostile 14.9 billion euros ($18.69 billion) offer by Merck, which later said it was pulling out.

Merck then started snapping up Schering shares, making it look unlikely that Bayer would get the 75 percent stake it needed in order for the takeover to go through.

But at the last minute, Merck agreed to sell the 21.8 percent stake in Schering that it had accumulated to Bayer at a premium price of 89 euros ($111.66) per share, which bumped the total value of the takeover up to about 16.9 euros billion ($21.2 billion).

``We're pleased to have received such broad-based support from the stockholders," said Bayer Management Board Chairman Werner Wenning. ``We also invite the remaining Schering stockholders to accept our attractive offer of 89 euros ($111.66) per share," he said, adding the additional acceptance period runs from June 23 until July 6.

Bayer said it continues to pursue its goal of wholly acquiring Schering.

Further details were expected to be released Wednesday in a news conference at Schering headquarters in Berlin.

The takeover gives Bayer access to Schering's lineup of best-selling multiple sclerosis treatments as well as Yasmin, a birth control product that has helped make Schering the world's biggest producer of oral contraceptives. Bayer is known for its Aspirin and prescription medication like the antibiotic Cipro and Levitra, which is used to treat erectile dysfunction.

Bayer, which posted sales of 27.4 billion euros in 2005, hopes to combine Schering's portfolio into its lineup of over-the-counter drugs, pesticides and industrial polymers.

Founded in 1863, Bayer invented Aspirin in 1897 and has since gone on to make everything from vitamins to agricultural chemicals. Its best known products include Alka-Seltzer and One-A-Day vitamins. The company employs some 93,700 workers.

Schering, founded in 1851 as a pharmacy, has since grown to a corporation that employs 24,500 people worldwide. Schering's connection to its former U.S. subsidiary, Kenilworth, N.J.-based Schering-Plough, was broken during World War II and the companies are no longer related.

Merck, also founded as a pharmacy in 1668, is the oldest pharmaceutical business in the world. It has been entirely separate from Whitehouse Station, N.J.-based Merck & Co. since the end of World War I.

The announcement came after European markets had closed. Bayer shares ended the day down 0.46 percent at 32.73 euros ($41.06), Schering shares were up 0.79 percent to 89.70 euros ($112.54), while Merck shares were up 0.69 percent to 73.40 euros ($92.09).

Lawsuits Allege Wide Collusion On Nurses' Pay (WSJ)

By Kris Maher

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

Four lawsuits filed in federal courts in four cities allege that hospital systems colluded to keep nurses' pay artificially low despite concerns of a nursing shortage.

The suits, which seek class-action status, allege the systems shared information on pay practices with an understanding that they wouldn't outbid one another to recruit nurses.

The lawsuits -- put together with the help of the Service Employees International Union, which represents nurses and others -- were filed yesterday in Chicago, San Antonio, Memphis, Tenn., and Albany, N.Y., against more than 17 hospitals and allege that they violated antitrust laws.

Several thousand nurses in each city could be eligible to participate if class-action status is granted, said Daniel Small, a partner at Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld & Toll PLLC, in Washington, D.C., which brought the suits. The accusations are based on information lawyers gathered from interviews with dozens of former and current system employees, Mr. Small said. The estimated wage losses came from economists, he said.

Echelle Rutschman, a spokeswoman for Baptist Memorial Health Care Corp., a Memphis regional health-care system named in one lawsuit, said the suit is "completely without merit." She added, "We use industry-standard, legal practices to adjust salaries." Bill Van Slyke, a spokesman for Healthcare Association of New York State, which represents more than 550 nonprofit and public hospitals, called the allegations "outrageous" and added he thought the lawsuits were fueled by SEIU's organizing interests.

Median weekly cash earnings for registered nurses rose to $931 a week last year, up from $781 a week in 2000, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

A union-commissioned study released in March by the Institute for Women's Policy Research found that wages for nurses employed in hospitals fell from 2003 to 2004.

According to the American Hospital Association, U.S. hospitals needed roughly 118,000 registered nurses to fill vacant positions as of December 2005.

Studio Sues Over Internet Film Based On Stone's Script (WP)

By Eric M. Weiss

Chris Moukarbel was intrigued by director Oliver Stone's latest project, a $60 million movie to be released this summer about two police officers rescued from the rubble of the twin towers.

But as a 28-year-old filmmaker, Moukarbel wanted to do more than simply watch Stone's "World Trade Center." He decided to create his own version -- using a bootleg copy of the screenplay and Yale University student actors -- and offer it free on the Internet.

Although his film is only 12 minutes long and doesn't have a cast to rival Nicolas Cage and Maria Bello, it has brought the power of Hollywood down on him.

Paramount Pictures is suing Moukarbel in U.S. District Court in Washington, asking the court to prohibit the distribution of his movie. "He's free to make any World Trade Center movie he wants to make, but not our movie with our script," said Nancy Kirkpatrick, a Paramount spokeswoman.

According to its lawsuit, which was filed Friday, the studio is afraid that people will see the student film on the Internet and confuse it with the big-time Hollywood version set to hit 1,500 screens on Aug. 9 and backed up with a $40 million marketing campaign.

"Large numbers of people will see the Moukarbel Film first for free and determine, based on this poor-quality copy, that they do not want to pay to see the remainder of the WTC Film at a theater when it is released," Paramount's lawsuit said.

Moukarbel, who lives in Dupont Circle and graduated from Yale last month with a master of fine arts degree, could not be located for comment yesterday. On his Web site, his project is described as a "12-minute movie, adapted from a bootleg script for Oliver Stone's soon to be released film World Trade Center." His film has since been taken off the site, replaced with "VIDEO REMOVED AT REQUEST OF PARAMOUNT PICTURES."

According to the Witte de With Center for Contemporary Art in Rotterdam, which has a link to the film on its Web site, "Moukarbel makes site-specific video and installations, often using found media or objects as his sources. His projects explore the idea of memorial, and are concerned with the way in which political events are edified. . . . The video was made entirely in the artist's studio using student actors and then released on the internet, intentionally pre-empting Stone's film release in August 2006."

The lawsuit compares the nearly identical dialogue from the Moukarbel and Stone films, which both document the ordeal of two Port Authority of New York and New Jersey police officers. The Paramount film was made with the cooperation of the two officers, Will Jimeno and John McLoughlin. Paramount's lawsuit said it "owns the rights to the WTC Screenplay, and thus the right to be the first and only entity to tell this important story. The Moukarbel Film deprives Paramount of that valuable right."

Paramount's lawyers have also contacted Web sites that linked to Moukarbel's movie. On the site FilmThreat.com, a message from Paramount's lawyers replaced a link to the film.

Despite Paramount's pan, Moukarbel's movie was getting some good word of mouth, at least among the few who had seen it.

"It may not be Oliver Stone's version, but it actually was pretty good, better than the trailer that they released themselves," wrote "AuntPeru" on Filmthreat.com. "Oh well, hopefully it'll show up on YouTube."

Early Univision Bids Near $11 Billion (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman, Henny Sender And John Lyons

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

The two groups bidding for Univision Communications Inc. were last night preparing offers near the range of the company's current stock price of $35.40 a share, valuing the broadcasting concern at around $11 billion, people familiar with the matter said.

As in any auction, the prices offered in the first round can differ substantially from final offers. But bidders are coping with skittish debt markets and banks that have reined in their lending in recent weeks. That has made it harder for buyers to reach the $40-a-share price that Univision, the nation's largest Spanish-language broadcaster by audience, first hoped to reach.

The group widely viewed as the favorite to win -- consisting of Mexican broadcaster Televisa SA, Venezuela's Venevision Investments LLC and private-equity shops Bain Capital, Blackstone Group, Cascade Investments, and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. -- was last night discussing an offer below Univision's current market price, though that could rise to at or around market at the last moment, these people said. Televisa already owns 11% of Univision.

Another group -- Texas Pacific Group Inc., Thomas H. Lee Partners, Madison Dearborn Partners LLC, Providence Equity Partners Inc. and media mogul Haim Saban -- was preparing an offer in the $35 range, people familiar with the matter said. That is at or below where Univision's class A shares stood yesterday -- at $35.40, down 30 cents for the day -- in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

It is still possible that Univision could pull the auction if it feels prices aren't to its liking. Such moves are rare after a company announces it is for sale and spends months preparing for a new owner.

Jitters in the debt-financing markets over higher interest rates have changed the dynamics for Univision, a Los Angeles conglomerate that operates television and cable networks, television stations, radio stations, a variety of music properties, and an Internet operation, all with Spanish-language content. The bond market for lower-rated credit that would be used to fund a deal has been spooked by the recent stock-market downturn and a heavy supply of new debt issues.

Just weeks ago, lending banks were willing to make loans valued at more than 13 times Univision's operating income, said one person familiar with their activity. That level has sunk recently, while loan prices have ticked up, this person said.

The Washington, D.C., private-equity firm Carlyle Group dropped from the Televisa-led group, a person familiar with the matter said, over concerns about price and governance between all of the private-equity firms and Televisa.

Jockeying between the two camps promises to be intense, as Univision presents complicated regulatory issues. The presence of Televisa in one group, for example, will inevitably raise foreign-ownership concerns, which could take months to resolve and which rivals are sure to prey upon for an advantage.

The Federal Communications Commission will have broad say on approving any transaction. The law generally prevents foreign entities from owning more than 25% of domestic broadcasters. But such reviews also take into account other factors, such as whether a foreign company has substantive control of a company via veto rights over management, board members or strategy decisions.

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- European Union antitrust chief Neelie Kroes said Tuesday that China's move to adopt an anti-monopoly law would help benefit China's economy by attracting more business investors.

The EU Competition Commissioner made the comments after talks with China's Vice Minister of Commerce Ma Xiuhong at EU headquarters.

"This is an important step toward an effective competition regime," Kroes said in a statement. "The Chinese economy will benefit from the implementation of a sound competition policy, as will any company seeking to do business in China."

The Chinese Cabinet endorsed a draft anti-monopoly law on June 8 aimed at boosting fair competition after decades of domination by state industry. Foreign business groups, however, have expressed concern that it might be used to restrict or interfere with their investments.

Beijing officials said the proposed legislation would not discriminate between domestic and foreign companies. China began drafting the law in 1994 and a first draft was completed in 2003.

But progress was stymied by controversy over how to carry out enforcement, given the prevalence of state-owned monopolies or semi-monopolies in many industries. The draft law still needs the backing of China's legislature before it can become law.

Ex-Firefighter Pleads Guilty In Nev. Fires (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, June 21, 2006

(AP) - RENO, Nev.-An ex-firefighter has pleaded guilty to setting three wildfires that burned hundreds of acres of national forest in central Nevada last August, a federal prosecutor said Monday.

Mark E. Morgan worked temporarily with a U.S. Bureau of Land Management crew. Investigators said he started the fires because he was bored and needed the paycheck.

Morgan, 34, faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine, and he could be required to pay restitution, U.S. Attorney Daniel G. Bogden said in a statement. He entered the plea Thursday. Sentencing was set for October.

The fires in the Humboldt-Toiyabe National Forest in Lander County, about 170 miles east of Reno, burned more than 550 acres of timber, brush and grassland. Two miles of fence also burned, but no injuries were reported.

When questioned by investigators, Morgan admitted starting two fires with a cigarette lighter and the third with a flare gun.

Draft Of Park Rules Stresses Conservation (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Bush administration has issued new draft guidelines for managing the national parks that make conservation the top priority -- ahead of recreation and energy development.

The new management rules -- which outline how park supervisors should handle issues including homeland security and whether to allow off-road vehicles to cross nature areas -- pleased environmentalists but angered off-road vehicle users, who said they fear that the Interior Department is modeling its practices after those of the Clinton administration.

In a news conference Monday, Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne said department officials had decided that preserving the country's parks ranks above any other management goal.

"When there is a conflict between conserving resources unimpaired for future generations and the use of those resources, conservation will be predominant," Kempthorne said. "That is the heart of these policies and the lifeblood of our nation's commitment to care for these special places and provide for their enjoyment."

Environmentalists had sharply criticized two earlier drafts of the rules, including one version leaked to the media in August that was written by Paul Hoffman. Hoffman, a political appointee, served as a deputy assistant secretary for fish, wildlife and parks at the time and now holds the same title in the Interior Department's policy, management and budget division.

Park advocates noted that the most recent management draft released in October, which ran more than 200 pages, included language that would have made good visibility in national parks an "associated value" rather than a "highly valued" resource as it stands under current rules. The latest draft restores the current language.

"They made virtually every change we recommended," said Ronald J. Tipton, senior vice president for programs at the National Parks Conservation Association. "The only conclusion you could draw from this is Secretary Kempthorne has taken a keen interest in national parks. This is a priority for him."

Don Amador, the Western representative for the Blue Ribbon Coalition, a group representing park users nationwide, said the administration had gone too far in placating its critics.

"Our concern is we don't want the administration to go back to the Clinton-era policy of putting preservation over recreation," Amador said. "They're both important, and motorized access to national parks, whether it's snowmobiling in Yellowstone or riding a sports-utility vehicle in the desert Southwest, are important ways for people to use and enjoy their parks. We just want to see a balance."

The administration will now take public input on the proposal for 90 days. That it was willing to revisit the matter of how the government manages its parks, Kempthorne said, shows the department's commitment to serving the public.

"The true test of any vibrant organization is that it can examine itself critically and constructively to strengthen its vision and improve its operations," he said. "With these revised policies, the National Park Service has again demonstrated its ability to engage citizens in productive dialogue and benefit from the valuable insights and suggestions of its employees, friends and partners."

U.S. Hybrids Get More Miles Per Congress (NYT)

EVER since the first Prius rolled off the assembly line almost a decade ago at the Takaoka plant not far from Toyota City, hybrid cars have basically been a luxury item. If you owned one, you could feel good about using less gasoline and being a trendsetter, but you couldn't expect the fuel savings to make up for the thousands of extra dollars that the hybrid cost. There was no financial reward for environmental virtue.

But in the last few months, something important has changed. Gas prices have settled in at close to $3 a gallon, which is enough to make a few hybrids almost worth it, if not quite. And since the start of the year, the federal government has been giving generous tax credits to hybrid buyers, pushing the Prius and a couple of other hybrids into bargain territory.

Between the money saved on gas and the tax credit, the Honda Civic Hybrid will cost slightly less over a five-year span than the regular Civic, according to Consumer Reports. The same is true of the sharp-looking new Toyota Camry Hybrid, relative to a regular Camry. If you're deciding between a Prius and a regular Camry, the Prius, which gets a $3,150 credit, will start saving you money in just a few years.

The point of a tax policy like this — the point of a lot of tax policy, in fact — is to give people an incentive to change their behavior, and persuading Americans to use less oil certainly sounds like one of Washington's priorities these days.

Yet, astoundingly, many of the tax credits are about to be taken away. So if you are thinking of buying a Prius or Camry Hybrid, do it soon, as in this month or maybe next. And if you are wondering whether policy makers mean it when they say they're serious about changing our energy policy, join the crowd.

THE first thing to understand about the hybrid tax credit is that it was never really intended to reduce oil imports from the Middle East or slow the effects of global warming. The credit was created to prop up Detroit while giving conservation a nod.

Last summer, when Congress was completing an energy bill, Toyota's and Honda's hybrids were already winning people over in the marketplace, and it was clear that any tax credit would go overwhelmingly to buyers of Japanese cars. So members of Congress, with help from Detroit's lobbyists, came up with an ingenious solution. They created a cap, a maximum number of hybrids that any single manufacturer could sell — 60,000 — before a clock started ticking, causing the credits for that carmaker to begin disappearing two quarters later.

The idea, Mark Kemmer, a G.M. lobbyist, told Automotive News, was to keep any one company from getting "a runaway benefit."

Toyota hit the 60,000 mark last month, less than five months after the Jan. 1 start of the program, and the credits for its hybrid buyers will be cut in half on Oct. 1. (Because there are waiting lists for the Prius and Camry Hybrid, people who buy one in August or September may get their car after Oct. 1.) On April 1, 2007, the credits will be cut in half again. On Oct. 1, 2007, they will vanish. Honda, for its part, will probably hit the cap next year.

And the Big Three? Combined, they have sold fewer than 15,000 eligible vehicles so far, all by Ford, largely because their hybrids have not impressed buyers. Rather than building highly efficient hybrids like the Prius, Detroit has tinkered with gas guzzlers like the Chevrolet Silverado, adding hybrid technology to them so that they get slightly better mileage.

Come next year, then, the government will pay you to buy a Silverado hybrid (which gets about 16 miles per gallon) or a Ford Escape Hybrid (which gets about 26, according to Consumer Reports), but not a Prius (44) or a nonhybrid Corolla (29).

The obvious answer to this bizarre situation is to remove the caps. To their credit, Mr. Bush and a few members of Congress have called for precisely that, although it seems unlikely to happen anytime soon.

But I think there is a larger lesson here. In recent months, there has been a lot of talk in Washington about alternative energy sources, not just hybrids, but ethanol, fuel cells and nuclear power as well. Mr. Bush, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton and others are pitching tax credits and similar financing mechanisms to give these technologies a boost.

The reality, though, is that government isn't particularly good at predicting which alternative will pan out. No single person or group is. "You can spend a lot of money on technologies that don't fit," says Susan M. Cischke, Ford's vice president for environmental and safety engineering. Remember the electric-car fad in California?

What the government can do that nobody else can, however, is set up a simple system of rewards and penalties — with the single goal of reducing oil use, regardless of the means — and then let the marketplace work it out. Economists tend to prefer a gas tax, but it's not the only option.

There is already a gas-guzzler tax written into the law that raises the price of inefficient cars, but not of sport utility vehicles or light trucks, notes Therese Langer of the American Council for an Energy-Efficient Economy. Making the tax universal would have a far bigger effect than a narrow policy aimed at hybrids, and it could be balanced by tax credits for efficient vehicles of any kind. Google has a nice template: it gives $5,000 to employees who buy a car that gets at least 45 m.p.g. in the government's ratings, a threshold that only the Prius and two Honda hybrids now meet.

I know this might sound like one more nail in Detroit's coffin, but it doesn't have to be one. The Big Three have the engineering expertise to build vehicles that can go a long way on a gallon of gas. If Washington would only nudge people to buy cars like that, Detroit would start making them.

An Ear For The Market (NYT)

By David Morris

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

Minneapolis

CONGRESS is considering several bills to extend the 51-cent-per-gallon tax credit for ethanol producers beyond its 2010 expiration date. But let's hope that our elected representatives don't make their decision in the grips of an ethanol haze. The state of the ethanol industry changed so substantially since the last extension, one year ago, that a fundamental and clearheaded redesign is in order.

Sky-high oil prices and a national ethanol mandate have undermined the rationale for incentives. With oil at $60 a barrel, ethanol can compete with gasoline without federal subsidies. For much of 2005, oil prices approached or surpassed the $60 level. In recent months, they've hovered near $70.

Last year, Congress ordered a near doubling of ethanol sales by 2012. Industry has responded so rapidly that the nation may have enough capacity to meet the Congressional goal by 2008. Indeed, Congress is already debating measures to increase mandated levels to 10 billion gallons in 2010 and 30 billion in 2020.

If the current 51-cent-per-gallon tax credit remains in place, these mandates would cost the Treasury Department $5 billion in 2010 and more than $15 billion in 2020. In the face of high oil prices, such subsidy levels are likely to prove politically untenable when there's no need for tax credits to make ethanol competitive.

Moreover, the rapidly changing structure of the ethanol industry argues for an entirely different kind of incentive. In 2003, some 50 percent of all ethanol refineries and perhaps 80 percent of all proposed plants were controlled by farmers, with an average annual output of about 40 million gallons each. But now, around 80 percent of new ethanol production is coming from plants controlled by absentee owners that produce 100 million to 125 million gallons.

As farmer and ethanol refinery have become delinked, so have biofuels policy and agricultural policy. True, the increased demand for ethanol has benefited farmers, but only modestly, raising the price of a bushel of corn by 10 cents to 15 cents. But when the farmer is also an owner in the refinery, he or she receives annual dividends averaging about 50 cents a bushel and more than $1 a bushel in very profitable years. Farmer-owners can also use an ethanol plant as a hedge against a drop in the price of their raw material. If the price of corn falls, so does the production cost of ethanol; all other things being equal, refinery profits and therefore dividends will rise.

How might Washington redesign the federal incentive to reflect the realities of an increasingly competitive absentee-owned, large-scale ethanol industry?

First, tie incentive levels to an index comprised of the price of a bushel of corn and the wholesale price of a gallon of gasoline. (A similar index can be developed for biodiesel or cellulose-derived ethanol.)

Such an incentive would honor the nation's commitment to both farmers and taxpayers. The farmer-producer would be protected if the price of oil plunged or the price of corn (or soybeans or cellulose) jumped. The taxpayer would be protected from having to underwrite handsome subsidies when the biofuels industry no longer needs them.

Second, transform part of the federal incentive from a gas tax exemption for those who market the ethanol into a direct payment to those who produce it. Minnesota did this in the 1980's, turning an incentive for consumption into one for production.

The new federal producer payment should encourage locally owned ethanol plants while not being a continual drain on federal resources. A payment of 15 cents per gallon for the first 20 million gallons produced each year might be offered to an absentee-owned plant with payment increasing to 25 cents a gallon if the majority of a plant's owners were farmers or local residents. No plant should be able to receive payments for more than 10 years.

Drastically changed times call for a drastically changed federal biofuels incentive, one that minimizes the long-term costs to America's taxpayers while maximizing the long-term benefits to our rural communities and farmers.

Eminent Domain Surges After Ruling (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

The Supreme Court's decision last year to allow cities and states to seize property for private development "opened the floodgates" to eminent domain actions nationwide, a report says.

In the year since the Kelo decision, nearly 6,000 properties nationwide have been threatened or taken under that precedent, more than half the number that had been seized over a previous five-year period, said a report released yesterday by the Institute for Justice.

"There has been a huge rise in the number of threats to use eminent domain since Kelo. Cities are wielding eminent domain as a club," said Dana Berliner, a senior counsel with the Institute for Justice and the author of the 100-page report.

People threatened with eminent domain are vulnerable, she said, because they feel compelled to sell or have their home or business seized for a fire-sale price. At the same time, Ms. Berliner said, residents have become more active in trying to thwart land grabs and promoting changes to state law to bar the use of eminent domain.

Since the high court's 5-4 decision in Kelo v. City of New London, Conn., a year ago Friday, 5,783 properties nationwide have been either seized or threatened with seizure under eminent domain.

That number compares with 10,281 examples over the five-year period from 1998 to 2002, said the institute, a public-interest law firm that argued the Kelo case before the Supreme Court. During that period, threats were made to seize 6,560 properties, and 3,721 condemnation filings or authorizations were recorded.

In the past year, 5,429 property seizures have been threatened for economic redevelopment projects, plus 354 condemnation filings or authorizations, the institute said.

In the Kelo case, the institute represented nine Connecticut homeowners who tried unsuccessfully to halt New London's takeover of their properties for economic redevelopment. The court held that private development has a public purpose if it will increase jobs and tax receipts.

Ms. Berliner's report, "Opening the Floodgates: Eminent Domain Abuse in the Post-Kelo World," was one of five released yesterday by the Institute for Justice and its grass-roots activism project, the Castle Coalition.

"The court ruled that the U.S. Constitution allows government to use eminent domain to take and bulldoze existing homes and businesses for new private commercial development, holding that the mere possibility that a different private use could produce more taxes or jobs is enough reason for condemnation," the report said.

"Opening the Floodgates" documents 117 projects in the District and 27 states, including Maryland, that have involved the use or threatened use of eminent domain for private development in the past year.

"The vast majority ... involved the removal of lower-income residents and smaller businesses to attract wealthier people or more prominent businesses," Ms. Berliner wrote.

"Of the 117 projects, nearly half involved taking low-income houses, apartments and mobile home parks to construct upscale condominiums or other upscale residences and new retail development. Cities across America are working hard to drive out the working poor," she said.

She said the city of Baltimore is "on an eminent domain spree" because it intends to seize 75 properties for private development in this year alone.

Agriculture Department Faulted On Bird Flu Efforts (NYT)

By Donald G. McNeil Jr.

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

The Agriculture Department lacks a comprehensive plan for detecting avian flu in poultry and wild birds, its inspector general's office said yesterday.

In an audit, the office found that the department relied too heavily on voluntary testing by the poultry industry and reports from state agriculture departments.

A spokeswoman for the department, Hallie Pickhardt, said that the agency "agreed with everything in the report, and we're either doing it or going to be doing it."

The audit began before Congress passed President Bush's plan for dealing with a pandemic flu outbreak, which gave the department an additional $91 million to fight avian flu, Ms. Pickhardt said.

But she added that the agency had no plans to make the voluntary testing now conducted by the poultry industry mandatory.

"We're confident in the testing procedure they're implementing," Ms. Pickhardt said. "They've been working very closely with us. This is their livelihood, too, and they have no reason not to report the information."

Instead, the department will supplement the voluntary testing with its own checks, she said.

The audit also recommended more testing in live-bird markets (where mild avian flu infections have been found in the past) and at illegal auctions of fighting gamecocks. It also called for a plan to protect workers with vaccines and flu drugs if infected flocks needed to be culled.

In January, the National Chicken Council, an industry trade group, said that its members, which produce more than 90 percent of the country's chickens, would test every flock for influenza two weeks before slaughter.

Yesterday, Stephen Pretanik, the council's science director, said the industry was already sharing those test results with the Agriculture Department.

Mr. Pretanik said all the swabs taken from chickens were sent to state laboratories or to laboratories accredited by the department, which are required to report positive results to the government.

The industry modeled its testing on the department's own proposals "so there will be a seamless transition when their regulations are published," he said.

Poultry experts said in January that if the lethal flu strain arrived in American domestic poultry, complicated tests would not be needed to spot it. Unlike other bird flus, the A(H5N1) strain, which has killed millions of chickens and 130 people since 2003, can wipe out a flock of thousands in 24 hours.

In Canada yesterday, veterinary officials said they had been unable to find enough virus to test in samples from a goose that had tested positive for an H5 virus in a local laboratory. They said they thought it was unlikely that the goose, on Prince Edward Island, would prove to be the first North American case of A(H5N1) flu, but said they needed an additional 12 days to try to culture the virus in eggs so it could be tested.

World Health Organization officials said yesterday that Indonesia had its 39th confirmed death from the virus, a 13-year-old boy from South Jakarta who died on June 14. He became sick on June 9, a week after helping his grandfather slaughter diseased chickens. Other members of the family are apparently healthy.

Flu Plan at Veterans Agency

WASHINGTON, June 20 (AP) — The Department of Veterans Affairs said it would close its national cemeteries in the event of a bird flu pandemic because of staffing shortages, leaving families to delay burial or seek interment elsewhere.

According to a draft plan, the veterans health care system would continue treating veterans at its hospitals and clinics, and would provide care to active-duty military personnel and civilians if necessary.

Bird Flu Could Close Military Cemeteries (AP)

By Andrew Bridges

AP, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Taps could be silenced for veterans who die during a bird flu outbreak.

The Department of Veterans Affairs foresees closing the 120 national cemeteries in a pandemic because of staffing shortages, leaving families the option of delaying burial or seeking interment elsewhere.

The VA buries more than 250 veterans and eligible family members a day - about 93,000 people a year. It operates cemeteries in 39 states and Puerto Rico.

Those cemeteries could be shut and burials put on hold during a pandemic, presumably even as the death toll rises, according to a plan that lays out how the department will cope with an influenza outbreak. The government is preparing for a worst-case scenario of nearly 2 million deaths in the United States in a pandemic.

The VA health care system, the nation's largest, would continue treating veterans at its 150-plus hospitals and hundreds of smaller clinics. The department also would provide back-up care to active duty military, as well as non-veterans if necessary, according to the plan posted on the department's Web site.

If staffing shortages or other issues force cemeteries to close, the plan calls for employees of the VA's National Cemetery Administration to reroute phones and contact funeral homes and next-of-kin to "reschedule" burials. As much as 40 percent of the national work force could be off the job in a pandemic, according to federal estimates.

"They're raising a common concern: Where are the workers going to come from?" said Robert Fells, external chief operating officer and general counsel for the International Cemetery and Funeral Association.

As for the dead, the VA said it may have to store bodies in refrigerated warehouses or trucks outfitted as temporary morgues.

During the 1918 Spanish flu pandemic, the dead were sometimes buried in trenches, Fells said. Should another pandemic strike, it could take days to bury the dead, and perhaps only then in mass or temporary graves, he added.

"Will that be necessary? It may be and we have to be prepared if things get that bad," Fells said.

The VA plan acknowledges that cemeteries will have to plan ways of allocating staff and plots for "significant numbers of burials if closure and rescheduling is not an adequate response."

"If there's truly a catastrophic kind of thing - whether it be a bird flu pandemic or a massive, terrorist-instigated attack that would claim tens or hundreds of thousands of lives - a lot of that, frankly, involves bulldozers," said Mike Duggan, the American Legion's deputy director for national security and a Vietnam veteran.

The VA did not immediately return multiple calls seeking comment.

A lack of workers would stretch thin the funeral business but shouldn't force cemeteries to close, said John Fitch, senior vice president for advocacy at the National Funeral Directors Association.

"We'll cope like any other business. We will have to find ways and means of processing the bodies and conducting funerals," Fitch said. The group has discussed with its members refrigerating or temporarily interring bodies until an outbreak ends. It's even encouraged members to set up networks of potential volunteers to drive hearses and perform other tasks, Fitch said.

Bird flu has killed at least 128 people worldwide since it started ravaging Asian poultry farms in late 2003.

Scientists fear the H5N1 virus will mutate into a highly contagious form that can be passed from human to human. So far, most human cases have been linked to infected birds.

US Falls Behind In Tracking Cattle To Control Disease (WSJ)

By Steve Stecklow

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

When the first U.S. case of mad-cow disease was discovered in December 2003, then-Secretary of Agriculture Ann M. Veneman pledged to hasten creation of a national identification system for tracing livestock quickly during a disease outbreak. She said she asked the U.S. Department of Agriculture's chief information officer "to make it his top priority."

Today, more than two years later, the U.S. still has no national ID system for most farm animals, including chickens and beef cattle.

The USDA, which has been discussing a system for nearly a decade -- and has spent $84.7 million to develop it -- now says one will begin operating next year. Although the agency expects nearly all newborn farm animals to be included in the system by 2009, it has abandoned the idea of mandatory participation, leaving critics to cast doubt on that projection.

As recently as April 2005, the USDA's draft plan for a national ID system called for mandatory participation. But USDA officials insist the agency was never committed to that idea, and that in response to industry feedback they decided to go with a voluntary system. They express confidence that market forces, including pressure from big beef buyers and export markets, will help drive cattle owners to register their animals.

"I believe the industry as a whole does understand and believe that a system is needed and they will participate," says John R. Clifford, the USDA's chief veterinary officer. He says the agency will review making the system mandatory if participation isn't adequate.

An ID system would assign each animal a unique number, and record all its movements as it travels to new ranches, farms or other destinations. This tracking information could prove critical in controlling outbreaks of contagious diseases because it would allow investigators to quickly locate animals that were exposed to ones already known to be infected. The USDA's goal is to be able to trace animals within 48 hours.

But the ID issue has become mired in controversy, with livestock raisers' trade groups pitted against each other and a fast-growing grassroots movement that opposes any tracking system. Many ranchers, meanwhile, worry that animal-rights groups will get hold of the data if the government runs the system. But after considering one type of privatized tracking system, the USDA changed course when a chorus of opposition arose, including complaints from some cattlemen that such a database might be used to manipulate beef prices. Now the agency envisions a voluntary system with multiple private databases.

A number of animal-health experts and several former USDA officials scoff at a voluntary system. They believe many ranchers and farmers, particularly those fearing legal liability if their animals are found to be diseased, will participate only if the system is mandatory. They also warn that a voluntary system will be inadequate for containing potentially devastating diseases like foot-and-mouth that are far more contagious than mad cow.

"If it isn't mandatory, it simply will not work," says Bobby R. Acord, who until April 2004 ran the USDA's Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service. "There are not enough market forces to make it happen." Mr. Acord is now a consultant to the National Pork Producers Council, which favors a mandatory system. There is already one in place for swine in interstate commerce, and the group says it works.

One current economic incentive hasn't convinced many beef sellers that a tracking system pays. McDonald's Corp. offers several cents per pound extra to U.S. producers who can provide information that allows the chain to trace the origin of its beef products. But the company, which supports a mandatory tracking system, has been disappointed with the number of producers taking its offer, according to a person familiar with the situation.

The lack of a national tracking system may already be hurting U.S. beef exports, which suffered after the discovery here of mad cow. Japan, South Korea and China still don't allow U.S. beef -- a ban that has cost domestic producers more than $5 billion in exports over the past two-and-a-half years, according to industry estimates.

Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns recently told a meeting of the National Cattlemen's Beef Association that beef exporters like Australia are "aggressively marketing traceability to gain an advantage," according to the group's newspaper. "Competitors are out there saying, 'We've got I.D. They don't.'"

In recent years, about 40 countries -- including Canada, Britain, Japan and lesser-developed nations like Namibia and Botswana -- have implemented some form of mandatory, national animal-tracking systems covering cattle.

Smaller-scale USDA and state animal ID programs already have helped combat specific diseases. But they're sometimes in place only until the health risk ebbs. In the 1990s, an ID system for cattle played a key role in stemming a disease in domestic herds called brucellosis, which can also spread to humans and cause severe fever, weight loss and other debilitating symptoms. With the disease rate now low, most ranchers are no longer required to tag their animals.

With mad-cow disease, or bovine spongiform encephalopathy, tracking is crucial because the illness is known to spread from cow to cow via contaminated feed. Lacking an effective way to trace cattle, the USDA failed to locate all of the potentially infected cattle linked to the 2003 mad-cow case and two subsequent ones in the U.S.

In the most recent incident -- a red beef cow in Alabama that tested positive in March -- officials, using DNA tests, investigated 36 different farms and five auction houses to try to figure out where it was born and what happened to its herd-mates. They couldn't.

A herd-mate from this animal "could be entering a slaughterhouse tomorrow and we would never know because they don't have that tracking system in place," says Caroline Smith DeWaal, food-safety director of the Center for Science in the Public Interest, a Washington, D.C.-based consumer group. Scientists generally agree that humans can contract the fatal, brain-wasting disorder by eating meat from infected animals. World-wide, more than 150 people have died from the human form of mad-cow, known as variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease, although none of the deaths has been linked to U.S. beef.

Bitter Feuding

A number of past participants in USDA animal-ID planning blame some of the delay in establishing a system on bitter feuding within the livestock industry. Trade associations have argued over who will control the data -- the government or private organizations -- as well as what information will be collected, who can access it and who will pay for the system.

A main concern has been confidentiality. The industry wants to make sure that animal-rights activists can't use the federal Freedom of Information Act to learn the locations of livestock operations, which might make it easier for them to stage protests.

A vocal grassroots movement of small farmers and ranchers who oppose an animal-tracking system has been lobbying state and federal officials, rallying support through the Internet. One Web site, StopAnimalID.org1, warns that under the USDA plan animal owners would be subject "to constant federal and state government surveillance," a claim the agency denies.

Walter Jeffries, a pig farmer in West Topsham, Vt., runs another opposition site, NoNAIS.org2, that he says draws between 7,000 and 13,000 visitors every weekday.

Registration of premises where animals are kept, a first step in a national tracking program, has already begun. But in a number of states, animal ID opponents have been trying to undermine the process. In February, dozens of protesters at a meeting of the Texas Animal Health Commission helped persuade it to postpone implementing regulations that would require such registration.

"This is supposed to be the land of the free, and pretty soon we'll be able to do nothing on our own property without permission from the government," says Ken Kerner, a 47-year-old farmer and auto-body-shop owner from Cedar Creek, Texas, who owns a dozen cows.

Beginning with the branding of cattle more than a century ago, livestock identification in the U.S. has a long history. What's evolved is an ad hoc group of systems, for particular species or in geographic regions. But they aren't linked. "The problem with all those systems is they don't communicate with each other," says Valerie E. Ragan, a former assistant deputy administrator for veterinary services at the USDA. "There's no standardization."

In 1998 the Holstein Association, a group of dairy-cattle breeders, launched a voluntary "National Farm Animal Identification & Records System" program to try to change that. Partly funded by the USDA as a pilot program, it has registered nearly three million animals in 48 states. Still, it doesn't extend much beyond the dairy industry.

Following a foot-and-mouth epidemic in Britain in 2001 that led to the killing of millions of pigs, cattle and sheep, the National Institute for Animal Agriculture, a nonprofit group, set up a U.S. task force with both industry and USDA representatives to kick-start a national animal ID system.

After the U.S.'s first mad-cow case was discovered, the USDA used an NIAA draft plan as a basis for creating a national system that could trace farm animals in a disease outbreak within 48 hours. The NIAA plan envisioned a system by 2006.

By 2003, says Glenn N. Slack, the NIAA's former chief executive, there was a general consensus within the livestock industry that the USDA would oversee the system and would control the data. "Most everyone was on the same page," he says.

But the National Cattlemen's Beef Association, which doesn't belong to the NIAA, began on its own to develop a voluntary, industry-run database for tracking animals. The NCBA represents thousands of cattle ranchers and feedlot operators, as well as meat packers, retailers and restaurants.

"We would prefer that to a government-managed program because we think a private database, first of all, is going to protect producer confidentiality to a much greater degree," says Joe Schuele, a NCBA spokesman. Cattlemen, he says, consider the names of their clients and the size of their herds to be proprietary information. They don't want competitors, or buyers, to have access to such details.

The NIAA's Mr. Slack says the "spirit of cooperation" within the industry "started to unravel" when the NCBA began pursuing its own plan in 2004. Another producers' trade association, the Ranchers-Cattlemen Action Legal Fund, United Stockgrowers of America, or R-Calf, which favors a government-run system, says it didn't trust the NCBA.

The group fears that meat packers who belong to the NCBA might take advantage of the information in the private database -- for example, offering less if the data suggested cattle were in large supply. "It would give them tremendous buying power in the marketplace," says Bill Bullard, R-Calf's chief executive.

The NCBA denies meat packers would have access to the database and dismisses R-Calf's concerns. "They don't like anything we like," says Jay Truitt, the NCBA's vice president for government affairs in Washington.

Another issue is information oversight. Several past participants in the USDA's national animal ID planning program say they always assumed the government would administer the database. But in August, the USDA said it would support a tracking system in which animal-movement data was sent to "a single, privately held animal-tracking repository" that it could access -- the kind of plan the NCBA was advocating.

Allen Bright, the NCBA's animal ID coordinator, says his group believed the database the NCBA was developing would work well and draw industry support, and so "anticipated" that the USDA would choose it as the privately held repository.

Dale Moore, the USDA's chief of staff and a former NCBA chief lobbyist, says the policy change was based on input from more than just the NCBA. Producer groups and some state officials, he says, "felt a private-database approach would get us to our goals more quickly."

'An Uproar'

But Mr. Moore concedes the privatization plan created "an uproar," with many industry groups opposed to a single database and some groups demanding their own. By January, USDA officials were suggesting that the agency would abandon the idea. In April, it formally announced a "metadata system" that would allow the government to access animal movement tracking information from multiple, private, voluntary databases run by various industry groups.

The NCBA is still hoping to play a major role. In January, it helped to launch a nonprofit called the U.S. Animal Identification Organization to create a giant, multispecies private database with animal-tracking information. The NCBA, which has a representative on the nonprofit's board, now says it expects the database to be one of several eventually authorized by the USDA.

Last month, a House appropriations subcommittee voted to withhold nearly all additional funding for a national animal ID system until the USDA better defines the program and its costs. And yesterday, a Senate appropriations subcommittee voted unanimously to ask the Government Accountability Office to review the ID program's progress because "the direction of this system remains unclear." Terri Teuber, the USDA's director of communications, says the agency is confident it can satisfy those queries.

Japan Agrees To Lift Ban On US Beef (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0036333

By Mari Yamaguchi

AP, June 21, 2006

TOKYO — Japan agreed Wednesday to lift its ban on U.S. beef imports, pending planned inspections of U.S. meat processing plants, the agriculture ministry said. The Asian nation imposed the ban over concerns about mad cow disease.

The breakthrough resolves a thorny, long-running trade dispute between the allies, and gives U.S. ranchers access to what was once their most lucrative export market.

"Japan agreed to resume U.S. beef imports on the condition that we find no further problems during onsite inspections," said agriculture ministry official Hiroaki Ogura.

U.S. officials had no immediate comment.

American beef shipments to Japan were halted in January after Japanese officials found a veal shipment that contained backbone, which Asian countries consider at risk for mad cow disease. The cuts are eaten in the United States and other countries, but Japan's rules are stricter.

Kyodo News agency reported that the inspections are meant to ensure that U.S. processing facilities conform with Japanese food safety guidelines. Officials from Japan's health and agriculture ministries will inspect 35 meatpacking plants certified to ship beef to Japan to see if they are complying with export requirements, Kyodo said citing government officials.

Only facilities whose safeguards meet Japanese standards will be authorized to export to Japan, the report said. Japanese officials will also be allowed to accompany U.S. counterparts on spot inspections of U.S. facilities, it added. The accord requires the U.S. side to conduct the spot inspections.

The accord was worked out via a video conference directed by Japanese Agriculture Ministry's consumption safety director, Hiroshi Nakagawa, and his U.S. Agriculture Department counterpart, Chuck Lambert, deputy undersecretary for marketing and regulatory programs.

At stake was a trading relationship worth millions of dollars to the U.S. beef industry. Japan's market was worth $1.4 billion annually when it banned American beef in response to the first U.S. case of mad cow disease in 2003.

The ban had only recently been lifted before Japan halted shipments.

The U.S. Agriculture Department says that New York-based Atlantic Veal & Lamb and a government inspector misunderstood new trade rules when they allowed prohibited veal to be shipped to Japan.

American officials had been impatient for trade to resume, with several U.S. senators saying Tuesday they are introducing a bill that would impose trade sanctions if Japan does not reopen its market to U.S. beef by Aug. 31.

The agreement comes as Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi prepares to visit President Bush at the end of this month. The two leaders are scheduled to meet in Washington on June 29 and travel to Elvis Presley's Graceland home in Memphis, Tenn., the next day.

Mad cow disease is medically known as bovine spongiform encephalopathy, or BSE. In humans, eating meat contaminated with BSE is linked to variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease, a rare and deadly nerve disease.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Shadowed Playwright Arthur Miller (SFC/AP)

By Hillel Italie, Ap National Writer

(06-20) 14:12 PDT NEW YORK, (AP) --

In the summer of 1956, playwright Arthur Miller married screen idol Marilyn Monroe in a Jewish ceremony, an event of high-level gossip for much of the world and of high-level curiosity for the U.S. government.

"An anonymous telephone call" has been placed to the New York Daily News, an FBI report notes at the time. The caller stated that the "religious" wedding — Miller was Jewish and Monroe had converted — was an obvious "cover up" for Miller, who "had been and still was a member of the CP (Communist Party) and was their cultural front man." Monroe also "had drifted into the Communist Party orbit."

The memo is one of many included in Miller's FBI files, obtained by The Associated Press through the Freedom of Information Act. Miller, who died last year at age 89, was a longtime liberal who opposed the Vietnam War, supported civil rights and, in one play, "The Crucible," linked the Cold War pursuit of communists to the Salem witch trials of the 17th century.

His files only became available after his death, but the government's interest in Miller was well established in his lifetime. In 1956, the House Un-American Activities Committee asked him to give names of alleged communist writers with whom he had attended some meetings in the 1940s. Miller refused and was convicted of contempt of Congress, a decision eventually overturned by the U.S. Supreme Court.

For a decade before his congressional testimony, the FBI kept track of the playwright, but ended up making a more convincing case that Miller was a dissenter from the Communist Party rather than a sympathizer.

"Miller became disillusioned with the party because the party did not stimulate in him the ability and inspiration to do creative writing as he had expected when he joined the Party," one informant told the FBI.

According to a 34-page FBI report, compiled in 1951, Miller was identified by an informant as being "under Communist Party discipline" in the 1930s and, as of the mid-1940s, a member.

According to Miller, he had never been "under Communist discipline," although "there were two short periods — one in 1940 and one in 1947 — when I was sufficiently close to Communist Party activities so that someone might honestly have thought that I had become a member."

In an essay published in 1999, Miller recalled that "practically everyone I knew stood within the conventions of the political left of center; one or two were Communist party members ... and most had had a brush with Marxist ideas or organizations.

"I have never been able to believe in the reality of these people being actual or putative traitors any more than I could be," he wrote.

Miller's first Broadway play, "The Man Who Had All the Luck," came out in 1944, around the same time that the earliest FBI files are dated. His professional and personal life were closely watched, usually through newspaper clippings, but also from informants (whose names have been blacked out in the records) and public documents.

The FBI not only kept records of Miller's political statements, from his opposition to nuclear weapons to his attacks against the anti-communist blacklist, but of his affiliation with such organizations as the American Labor Party ("a communist front") and the "communist infiltrated" American Civil Liberties Union.

In vain, the FBI probed for communist influence in the content and in the productions of his plays. One memo cites an "informant" who reported that "several communists" have been turned down for roles in various "Arthur Miller playlets."

Miller's plays, the informant concludes, "although occasionally supported by the Communist Party, do not follow Marxist ideology." A separate file states that "Miller was not looked on with favor by the Communist Party," which regarded him as "`just a civil rights guy.'"

Miller's fame made him a target of the government, but also protected him. For example, a memo from 1955 noted an admiring article by Holiday magazine and concluded that "because of Miller's "limited activity with the CP (Communist Party) and his position in the business world, it is felt that an interview would result in embarrassment for the Bureau."

His files essentially end in 1956, except for a brief reprise in 1993, when a background check was submitted to Bernard Nussbaum, the White House counsel to President Clinton. The occasion was not subversive activity, but the imminent presentation of a National Medal of the Arts.

Although his alleged communist ties were reviewed and he was identified as a "participant in activities calling for an end to the war in Vietnam," no other "pertinent information" turned up and he received his medal.

At the ceremony, Clinton praised Miller as a major playwright of the 20th century, and cited "The Crucible" for its admirable focus on "issues of conscience."

Mack Tops FBI's Most Wanted; Mothers Mourn At Wife's Reno Funeral (AP)

By Scott Sonner, ASSOCIATED PRESS

DOJ_NMG_0036335

RENO, Nev. (AP) - The mothers of both the victim and the husband accused of killing her were among some 500 mourners who attended Charla Mack's private funeral service Tuesday as the FBI added Darren Mack to its list of "Most Wanted" fugitives.

Darren Mack, 45, the wealthy former co-owner of a Reno pawn shop, hasn't been seen since the June 12 stabbing death of his estranged wife and the sniper shooting of Family Court Judge Chuck Weller, who was wounded in the chest.

The FBI gave Mack top billing on it's Web site list for "Most Wanted" fugitives, describing the dark-haired, 5-foot-11, 190-pound man as a bodybuilder and hunter with "access to all types of weapons." He should be considered "armed and dangerous," FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III said.

Bomb materials, ammunition and written allegations of corruption against Weller - who was handling the couple's pending divorce - were found in Mack's town house, police said in court documents.

Scott Freeman, a Reno lawyer, said he had been retained by Darren Mack's family to represent him "when and if he is found." Freeman said he had not heard from Mack since he disappeared.

Charla Mack's mother, Soorya Townley, and the dead woman's brother, Christopher Broughton, accompanied Darren and Charla Mack's 8-year-old daughter, Erica, to the funeral. Also attending were Mack's brother, Landon Mack, 43, and his mother, Joan Mack, with whom Darren Mack shared ownership of the pawn shop until last summer.

"I really think the important thing now is to find Darren but not to have all this vengefulness," Townley told a Reno television station Monday. "I don't think Charla really would have wanted that."

It was not clear if Mack's two teenage children from a previous marriage attended the funeral.

Reporters were kept about 100 yards from the mortuary during the private service, and Charla Mack's family declined any comment, said Wayne N. Reynolds, president of Mountain View Mortuary.

Security workers with walkie-talkies chased TV camera operators off neighboring properties that Reynolds said the mortuary owned. Reporters also were banned from the neighboring cemetery where Charla Mack was buried after a service that lasted more than an hour.

Reynolds said in a statement that family members wanted no media coverage of "their final moments with Charla during the `Celebration of Charla's Life.'"

"This tragic event has deeply traumatized two wonderful families who while experiencing their own grief, are working feverishly to provide the love, nurture, caring and assistance in the grief process of three beautiful children and this `Celebration of Life' needs to protect them from any further trauma of having their private emotions aired on the evening news," Reynolds said.

Weller was shot through the window of his third-floor office in the downtown courthouse. He is under police protection as he recovers.

Authorities said they were uncertain whether Mack had fled the country. Mueller said anyone with information on Mack should contact the FBI or the nearest U.S. Embassy or Consulate.

A search warrant affidavit first disclosed by the Reno Gazette-Journal on Tuesday said officers found several boxes of ammunition and an empty gun case with a receipt for a Bushmaster .223-caliber rifle equipped with a laser sighting device at Mack's town house, where Charla's body was found in the garage in a pool of blood in the hours after Weller was shot.

Officers also found notes and printed material that "contain allegations that Weller was corrupt and had exhibited favoritism in his rulings," the affidavit said.

A witness told police that Mack "discussed hiring him to follow Judge Weller in the hope of proving that he was corrupt."

"That same witness described Mr. Darren Roy Mack as seeming to him to have been 'at the end of his rope' and extremely frustrated and angry with both his estranged wife and Judge Weller," the police affidavit said.

Mack's cousin, Jeff Donner of Moraga, Calif., said last week that Mack called him about 11:19 a.m. June 12. Donner said Mack wanted him to "carry my message of what's been going on in his courtroom if anything happens to me." Weller was shot at about 11:05 a.m.

Mack earned more than $500,000 a year and had a net worth of $9.4 million as recently as 2004, according to court documents.

Darren Mack Put On FBI's Most Wanted List (KVBC-TV)

KVBC-TV, June 21, 2006

Reno pawn shop owner Darren Mack, 45, has been put on the FBI's Most Wanted List.

Since the shooting occurred a week ago, authorities say Mack's whereabouts is still unknown. The FBI says he's considered armed and dangerous.

Custody of the couple's 8 year old daughter was granted to Darren Mack's mother, Joan. Court officials say Charla Mack's family has open visitation rights.

KLAS-TV, June 21, 2006

The FBI added Darren Mack to its list of "Most Wanted" fugitives today as family members paid their last respects at a funeral service for the estranged wife he's accused of killing.

The mothers of both Charla Mack and Darren Mack were among an estimated 500 people who attended the private service Tuesday in west Reno.

The 45-year-old Mack is the wealthy former co-owner of a Reno pawn shop. He hasn't been seen since the June 12th stabbing death of Charla and sniper shooting of Family Court Judge Chuck Weller. He's a suspect in both cases.

Weller, who was wounded in the chest but is recovering, was handling the couple's pending divorce.

The FBI is giving Mack top billing on it's Web site for the "Most Wanted" list. He's described as a five-foot-11, 190-pound, dark-haired man who is a bodybuilder and hunter with "access to all types of weapons."

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller said Mack should be considered "armed and dangerous."

Reno lawyer Scott Freeman says he has been retained by Darren Mack's family to represent Mack "when and if he is found." Freeman says he is cooperating with investigators but has not heard from Mack or anyone who knew him since he disappeared.

Reno Gazette-Journal, June 21, 2006

While murder victim Charla Mack's family met with friends at a mortuary visitation Monday, a review of a search warrant request shows her estranged husband Darren Mack had bombmaking materials in his bedroom.

The materials, when mixed together and attached to a blasting cap or shot at, will explode, said Washoe County sheriff's Sgt. Lou Gazes, head of the Consolidated Bomb Squad for Washoe County, Reno and Sparks and who was at Mack's apartment.

"There were materials that could have made a bomb," Gazes said Monday.

Mack, 45, is wanted in a nationwide manhunt for the stabbing death of his estranged wife, Charla, and in the sniper-style shooting of Family Court Judge Chuck Weller.

Charla Mack, 39, was found fatally stabbed in Darren Mack's garage June 12. The couple's 8-year-old is staying with Darren's mother, Joan Mack, and is spending time with both families.

Weller, shot in the chest while standing in his Reno Justice Court chambers, is recovering in a secure location. On Monday, he began working on some court business for the first time since the shooting, said Jim Denton, the judge's family friend and spokesman.

During a search of Mack's apartment after the shooting and stabbing, police also found ammunition, notes and printed material that "contain allegations that Judge Weller was corrupt and had exhibited favoritism in his rulings," according to the search warrant affidavit.

A witness told police that Mack "discussed hiring him to follow Judge Weller in the hope of proving that he was corrupt," the search warrant affidavit said. "That same witness described Mr. Darren Roy Mack as seeming to him to have been 'at the end of his rope' and extremely frustrated and angry with both his estranged wife and Judge Weller," Detective David Jenkins said in the affidavit.

Charla's family spent Monday at the Mountain View Mortuary in Reno, sharing hugs and stories with friends. Charla's funeral is scheduled for today.

Outside the funeral home, Charla's mother, Soorya Townley, showed friends pictures of her daughter and granddaughter, as Charla's brother, Christopher Broughton, helped her unload their car.

"It's just such a nightmare," Townley said. "I never imagined something like this would be happening."

She held up a framed photograph of Charla and Darren's daughter, dressed in a fairy outfit and kneeling in a magical garden fantasy setting with flowers, butterflies and a small pool.

"This was the fantasy world they had," Townley said. "This is the direct opposite of what Darren has now created for his daughter."

Broughton said their family's only priority is to deal with their pain.

"We're grieving -- that's it," Broughton said.

Mack family waits

Darren Mack's family continued the waiting game Monday, said Landon Mack, 43, Darren's only brother. They had heard no news, he said. The family kept their focus on taking care of the couple's daughter and preparing the child for her mother's funeral.

The family-owned business, Palace Jewelry & Loan Co., released a statement saying the company was under the sole management of Joan Mack since last summer. The company is not in bankruptcy, the statement said, and "will continue to operate as it always has."

"In these difficult times for the Mack family, as well as the Palace and its employees, the Palace appreciates the continued support from its friends, customers, partners, vendors, and the community," the statement said.

Darren Mack filed for Chapter 7 bankruptcy protection in U.S. Bankruptcy Court on Aug. 26, 2005, according to court documents. In his filing, he said he owned half the stock of the company and said it was worth $550,000.

But in a financial statement Mack filed with Wells Fargo Bank on April 28, 2005 to secure his $500,000 line of credit, Mack said his interest in Palace Jewelry was worth $5 million.

Police search Mack's apartment

A review of the search warrant affidavit filed June 14 showed police found the explosive material in Mack's bedroom.

"During the protective sweep of that residence, Sgt. Mike Lessman of the Reno Police Department SWAT Team observed items inside the master bedroom which he recognized and believed to be material commonly used to build an explosive or incendiary device," the affidavit said.

During a search of the courthouse just after the shooting, two police dogs trained to detect explosives "alerted" on Weller's vehicle, parked in the court's basement. But a search found no explosive devices, police said.

When asked if the hit from the dogs could have been connected to the explosive material found in Mack's bedroom, Gazes said: "It's certainly a possibility."

The police search of Mack's apartment also found "several boxes of firearm ammunition, including .223-caliber and .243-caliber rifle ammunition which was strewn about a floor in one of the bedrooms," the document said.

And police found "an empty rifle case which contained a receipt from the purchase of a Bushmaster .223 caliber rifle by Darren Roy Mack." It said the rifle was "equipped with a laser sighting device."

Police also saw a Dell computer in Mack's kitchen, according to the affidavit.

"Near the computer were numerous printed e-mails and other computer generated documents which referenced Judge Weller," the affidavit said.

"Several documents and handwritten notes appeared to have been written by Darren Roy Mack and some of those documents appeared to contain allegations that Judge Weller was corrupt and had exhibited favoritism in his rulings," the affidavit said.

Jenkins told the court in the search warrant affidavit he had interviewed several people who knew Mack and said Mack was "extremely displeased with Judge Weller and that he believed that Judge Weller had made a series of judgments in the pending litigation which were adverse to him."

Detectives also said they obtained Mack's cell phone records.

"That information indicates that Mr. Darren Roy Mack's cellular telephone was in close proximity to downtown Reno and the Washoe County Courthouse at 1 South Sierra Street when Judge Weller was shot," the affidavit said.

Darren Mack's cousin, Jeff Donner of Moraga, Calif., said last week that Mack called him about 11:19 a.m. June 12. Donner said Mack wanted him to "carry my message of what's been going on in his courtroom if anything happens to me."

Weller was shot at about 11:05 a.m.

Officials Announce Joint Effort To Track Tainted Heroin Use (AP)

By Joann Loviglio, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 20, 2006

PHILADELPHIA -- City, state and federal law enforcement and public health officials on Tuesday announced a joint regional effort to track the ongoing deaths attributed to painkiller-laced heroin and identify the suppliers of the drug.

The fentanyl-laced heroin has caused about 70 deaths in the Philadelphia metropolitan region and more than 200 overdoses nationwide since it was first spotted in April, U.S. Attorney Patrick J. Meehan said.

"The problem with fentanyl is that it's deadly," Meehan said. "The push of a syringe is like pulling the trigger."

To determine the full scope of the problem in the region, officials representing law enforcement in Philadelphia and Camden County, N.J.; the federal Drug Enforcement Agency and the FBI; and Philadelphia's behavioral health department said they would share information and coordinate their investigations into the spike of fentanyl-related deaths since the spring.

Fentanyl is a legally produced prescription painkiller that is 40 to 100 times stronger than morphine, said James Kasson, DEA special agent-in-charge. It is commonly used to treat cancer pain; however, the type of fentanyl currently being mixed with heroin is most likely manufactured in clandestine labs like one raided several weeks ago in Mexico, he said.

The drug is also many times stronger than heroin and even OxyContin, another painkiller that has caused overdoses. An overdose can slow breathing to the point of death.

Deaths have been reported over the past month in the cities _ and suburbs _ of Philadelphia, Camden, Chicago and Detroit. Federal authorities are trying to determine whether the cases are related in any of those areas, Kasson said.

Philadelphia District Attorney Lynne Abraham expressed concern that disseminating information about fentanyl-laced heroin would increase awareness among addicts and result in more deaths. However, she said that getting the word out was essential from a public health perspective.

"In the back of our minds we worry ... this may be something that, perverse as it may sound, will encourage drug abusers who are used to the high of heroin to want to seek even a bigger bang for their dollar," she said.

Some dealers are already asking buyers if they want their heroin "with or without," meaning with or without fentanyl, she said. "It's not unlike going to a cheesesteak place and asking, 'With or without,'" she said.

Meehan said that key to the coordination efforts is using a central "fusion center" for investigative agencies, hospitals, public health agencies, drug treatment centers and medical examiners to submit their findings. The federal High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area (HIDTA) program will serve as that point for collecting and distributing information, Meehan said.

The goal is to find out where addicts are getting the tainted heroin, then disrupt and dismantle the supply chain, Abraham said.

Meehan and Abraham also made it clear that third-degree murder charges could be brought in Pennsylvania against drug dealers whose product kills someone.

"Fentanyl-laced heroin is a sure and certain way to death," Abraham said.

'Bad' Heroin Suspected In 20-year-old's Death (GLOUCOTMSNJ)

By Pete Mccarthy, Pmccarthy@sjnewsco.com

Gloucester County Times, June 20, 2006

Angela Doyle doesn't want her 20-year-old son to have died in vain.

The body of Micheal "Percy" Curci III was found Thursday morning in Pittsgrove Township following a lethal dose of heroin.

Curci had been out of jail just two days after serving a 60-day sentence for violating drug court -- a program offered to drug addicts who are facing criminal charges for related offenses.

"He just struggled," a tearful Doyle explained on Monday. "He just couldn't stop doing it."

Salem County authorities were awaiting toxicology reports, but confirmed Curci's death.

"(Curci) had been clean for a period of time, but (the heroin) may have shocked his body," Salem County Prosecutor John T. Lenahan said.

Doyle, who lives in West Deptford Township, said she recently received a letter from her son while he was locked up at Gloucester County Jail.

It said, "I know it's going to take me if I do it again," Doyle recalled Monday, as she prepared to bury her son on Friday.

If addicts learn anything from Curci's death, Doyle said, she wants it to be that they should stay clear of these drugs.

"They think -- they're 18, 19 years old -- they're invincible," Doyle said. "This is not a joke. You really can die from this stuff."

There was a rash of fatal drug reactions in April -- including a Greenwich Township woman -- to heroin purchased in Camden that had been laced with fentanyl.

Curci did purchase a batch of heroin in Camden, Lenahan said, but it was not clear whether his death is related to the latest rash of hospitalizations and deaths in South Jersey from heroin use.

Lenahan said another Pittsgrove man, John Burke, died of a heroin overdose in May.

He said that supply was also purchased in Camden.

Curci is believed to have been one of four individuals to die in the past week after overdosing on heroin purchased in Camden.

Three men -- ages 20, 30 and 31 -- died between Friday and Sunday in Camden County, according to Camden County Prosecutor's Office Spokesman Bill Shralow.

The heroin involved in the most recent overdose -- a 31-year-old Pennsylvania man in Pennsauken -- had the same "Paul Wahl" label stamped on it as heroin found in Glassboro on Saturday.

However, investigators so far believe that heroin was purchased in Philadelphia, according to Shralow.

Two men in Glassboro were treated over the weekend after allegedly injecting heroin.

They have both recovered and were released from Kennedy Memorial Hospital in Washington Township, according to Glassboro Detective Sgt. Robert Highley.

Authorities were still trying to determine where the drugs originated, but were not getting cooperation from the two men.

"I guess it's all involved in that same stuff that's been hitting the streets everywhere else," Highley said.

A counselor at SODAT -- an outpatient drug and alcohol treatment and prevention agency in Woodbury -- said help is available.

But the "physical addiction" causes withdrawal symptoms, which leads to the need for more.

There are several local venues for dealing with drug addiction.

What South Jersey really needs is a long-term inpatient treatment facility, according to Kas Foster, who is with Parent to Parent, a grassroots effort of parents who have lost a child to drugs.

"Instead of treating them, we're burying them at a rapid rate," said Foster, a National Park resident who lost her son to drugs in 1997.

Her agency helps addicts get referrals into treatment facilities, but more facilities are still needed, she said.

"Drugs are a horrible thing," Foster said. "They are killing our youth. They're destroying our families."

Fewer Positive Drug Tests Among Workers (PHI)

By Catherine Larkin

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 20, 2006

A smaller percentage of U.S. workers tested positive for drug use last year than at any time in the 18 years of screening by Quest Diagnostics Inc.

About 4.1 percent of the 7.3 million workplace drug tests performed last year came back positive, compared with 4.5 percent in 2004 and 13.6 percent when Quest started its Drug Testing Index in 1988, Quest said yesterday.

Marijuana accounted for about 53 percent of the positive samples in 2005, the Lyndhurst, N.J., company said.

Barry Sample, director of science and technology in Quest's employer solutions division, said he was encouraged by the findings, especially the drop in amphetamine use found among general workforce employees. About 75 percent of these tests are given before employment, and 10 percent are random screenings, he said.

"There's a lot of data that show that drug testing works simply as a deterrence," Sample said in a telephone interview.

The semiannual report suggests that state policymakers and stores such as Target Corp. may be helping to reduce drug use by limiting access to cold medicines containing pseudoephedrine, a key ingredient used to make methamphetamine illegally, Sample said.

"People can't go in and buy hundreds of boxes at a time," Sample said. "It has greatly restricted the availability."

Preliminary reviews of data from the first five months of this year show that use of amphetamines, a group of stimulants that includes methamphetamine, has dropped to its lowest level among both general employees and workers for whom testing is federally required since they became popular in 2002 and 2003, Sample said.

Battle Against Meth (CCT)

The Contra Costa Times, June 20, 2006

FINALLY, WE HAVE WHAT appears to be good news in the fight against the dangerously addictive drug methamphetamine. But it is clear that the nation should not be celebrating just yet because more difficult work lies ahead.

The Bush administration reported Monday that there has been a major decline in the number of meth lab seizures nationwide. At the same time, a drug-testing company said the number of job applicants and workers who tested positive for meth plunged 31 percent over the first five months of this year.

Of course, White House drug czar John Walters said the two reports are evidence that federal efforts are working and that the "one-two punch" to restrict chemicals and educate the public about the horrors of meth addiction are finally paying off.

We hope that is the reason, but truthfully, no one is yet sure. It is possible that the meth lab people are getting smarter and hiding their labs better or that the police don't have the adequate manpower to search for the labs and, therefore, the seizures have dropped.

It is also possible that meth users have found ways to get around the drug tests.

Rep. Mark Souder, R-Ind., chairman of the House drug policy subcommittee, gives most of the credit for the numbers to state and local governments, saying the decline in meth abuse has come despite the absence of national direction.

He claims the administration has refused to make combating meth a priority. He criticized a White House budget proposal to slash federal spending for state and local law enforcement to fight meth.

But Walters disagreed with such assertions, saying "No one's trying to downplay it. There's no drug worse than meth." But he said his office can't focus too much on a single drug at the expense of other threats like heroin, cocaine, prescription drugs and marijuana.

This kind of talk certainly indicates that there is disagreement among experts about the relative success of the nation's fight against meth. But they do seem to agree that progress has been made; numbers that large are difficult to ignore.

This tiny bit of sunlight in the otherwise bleak national picture on meth abuse should be seen as a ray of hope rather than the dawn of a new day. As we said, there remains much work to be done.

The Up And Down Numbers Of Meth Use In The Rockies (NW)

New West, June 20, 2006

New federal reports from the Drug Enforcement Administration say that use of methamphetamines is declining in some Western states, but officials in the energy industry in Utah say it's on the rise, so where are we in the fight against this destructive drug?

An Associated Press story in todayâ€™s New York Times says that the number of meth lab seizures across the country was down 30 percent, which is attributed to many states and drugstores limiting the availability of some of the ingredients on store shelves while also doing a better job of educating people about the drugâ€™s dangers.

As well, the AP story reports, the number of positive tests for meth use among job seekers was down 31 percent, according to Quest Diagnostics, the nation's largest drug testing company. And the biggest decline in use has come from some western states, where the drug first became prevalent, including Montana, which saw a 66 percent decline in meth lab seizures.

The Office of National Drug Control Policy takes some of the credit for the declines, but at least one influential federal lawmakers attributes the decline to state and local governments, and criticized the Bush administration for its lack of direction on combating meth use.

The anti-meth advertising campaign in Montana has gained much attention for its hard-hitting and graphic ads depicting the downward spiral of young people who become addicted to the drug. The campaign, mostly finaced by technology billionaire Thomas Siebel, has been adopted or copied in other states, and recently Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr. said he wanted to use similar sorts of ads in his state. But one criticism against the ads was that they donâ€™t depict many types of users, especially the occasional user.

One user type that isnâ€™t in the Montana Meth Projects ads, but which is becoming more prevalent in Utah is the energy worker â€" roughnecks working long hours in tough conditions and in remote areas.

A story in Sundayâ€™s Deseret News reports that meth and other drug use is increasing on the rigs, and the industry is taking a mixed stance on it: some are working hard to combat it and have a zero-tolerance policy for use while others say they canâ€™t risk losing employees or are willing to hire former drug offenders or will offer last-chance opportunities for employees who test positive for drug use.

AP/KWMU-TV, June 20, 2006

ST. LOUIS, MO - Despite a 22% decline from last year, Missouri still leads the nation in police seizures of illegal meth labs.

Missouri is one of at least 37 states with laws that restrict the sale of cold medications. The laws are part of an effort to starve meth manufacturers of their key ingredient.

The new federal Combat Meth Act will enforce similar restrictions across the nation by September 30th.

Nationally, police seizures of meth labs fell 30% last year.

Also, the nation's largest drug testing company said the number of job applicants and workers who test positive for meth fell 31% in the first five months of this year.

White House drug czar John Walters said the declines are evidence that the one-two punch to restrict chemicals and educate the public about meth are paying off.

Bill To Pour $8 Mil Into State's Meth Programs (AR)

Arizona Republic, June 20, 2006

State lawmakers have agreed to pump $8 million toward tackling meth addiction, crafting a plan to beef up law enforcement and provide money for prevention, treatment and education programs.

The idea: Disrupt the flow and sale of meth in local communities while teaching children about the evils of meth before they are tempted to try the drug.

Democratic Gov. Janet Napolitano is expected later this week to sign House Bill 2554, which is part of a negotiated $10 billion state budget agreement.

Some experts say that a key part of the solution to meth-related problems is educating children about the danger of the drug. An infusion of $500,000 in state funds will help Boys & Girls Clubs across Arizona expand the "Smart Moves" program to teach more children about the evils of meth.

"We could use the money to increase the number of kids that we can work with on a one-on-one basis," said John Heitel, president of Arizona Alliance of Boys & Girls Clubs. "Meth is so horrible that when they start with meth, then they are hooked on that stuff."

Children were found in the homes involved in about a third of Arizona's 102 meth-lab raids in 2004. The primary ingredient in meth is ephedrine or pseudoephedrine, a common ingredient in over-the-counter cold medicines.

About $3 million of the state dollars would be devoted to counties for drug interdiction, education and prevention efforts. Maricopa County figures to get more than $1.5 million from the state. Some of that could go toward the county's efforts to launch an anti-meth advertising campaign modeled after the Montana Meth Project, which has received national recognition.

While grateful for the funding, Maricopa County Supervisor Don Stapley said he wished the Legislature would take a more leading role in the effort. "At the end of the day, the state's going to wish it had been part of this project because it is so dynamic and effective," he said.

The anti-meth legislation took many twists and turns this year at the Capitol.

Napolitano unveiled a $5 million plan in February to disrupt the flow of the drug from Mexico by having a drug interdiction team. Republican lawmakers countered with a $12 million proposal that included more money for police, prevention and education. The $8 million compromise came after nearly four months of disagreements and delays.

Dr. Marc Matthews, director of the trauma unit at Maricopa Medical Center, doesn't need convincing when it comes to the state's meth problem.

"I see it in my trauma patients every single night," said Mathews, an associate director of the Arizona Burn Center. "It's in our homes, it's in our workplaces, it's in our communities. It's everywhere. It's crippling us."

He called the state's $8 million response "a joke" and added: "Give me $80 million. Now we're serious. With this drug, you're literally fighting for the heart and soul of your community."

Meth produces euphoria, increased alertness and increased physical activity. Users can become paranoid, even violent, and often turn to crime to finance their habits. Meth is cheap and easy to get. It can be manufactured with household chemicals and over-the-counter cold medications.

Authorities believe a lion's share of the meth used in Arizona is produced in labs in Mexico and Southern California and run by organized crime and street gangs.

The remaining supply comes from makeshift meth labs in Arizona.

Rep. Mark Anderson, who has introduced the legislation, said it's a good first step in cracking down on the rampant addiction in Arizona.

"It's comprehensive," said Anderson, R-Mesa. "It has prevention, treatment and interdiction. Without all of those things, it would diminish the other components of our plan. We need all of this to help fix the problem."

Staff reporter Matthew Benson contributed to this story.

related WASHINGTON - Good news in the fight against meth abuse came on two fronts Monday, with reports showing a major drop in methamphetamine lab seizures nationwide and a similar decline in the spread of the drug into the workplace.

Local law enforcement officials say there is still a strong appetite for the highly addictive drug. They warned that meth manufacturers in Mexico and other countries are moving to fill the supply void.

The number of meth-lab busts plummeted more than 30 percent last year as most states enacted laws to restrict the sale of over-the-counter cold medicines used to make meth, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration's El Paso Intelligence Center.

Meanwhile, the nation's largest drug-testing company said Monday that the number of job applicants and workers who tested positive for meth plunged 31 percent over the first five months of this year.

Those figures are based on the results of more than 7 million drug tests in 2005 and about 3 million tests from January to May 2006, conducted by New Jersey-based Quest Diagnostics Inc.

John Walters, the White House drug policy director, called the data an encouraging sign of progress.

"The practices that have been taking place in our states are working, not only on small toxic labs but also what we're trying to do with demand," said Walters, head of the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

Earlier this month, the White House drug policy office set a goal to cut meth use by 15 percent by 2009 and increase seizures of meth labs by 25 percent.

A priority is stemming the flow of meth from superlabs in Mexico, which supply about 80 percent of the drug to the United States.

U.S. Asks Suriname To Extradite Suspect (AP)

AP, June 21, 2006

PARAMARIBO, Suriname — The United States has asked Suriname to extradite a Guyanese man wanted on drug charges in New York, a U.S. Embassy spokesman said Tuesday.

Shaheed Khan was arrested Thursday by authorities in Suriname. He is accused of leading a criminal network that smuggled arms, ammunition and cocaine from Colombia to Europe and the United States via Guyana and Suriname.

The United States filed an extradition request with Suriname's foreign affairs ministry on Monday, said embassy spokesman Cliff Djamin.

Surinamese officials told the U.S. that they need to review the request.

A U.S. grand jury indictment unsealed in April by a judge in New York charged Khan with conspiring to smuggle at least 11 pounds of cocaine into the U.S. since January 2001.

Lawyer Guilty Of Peddling Pot (TD)

By Jim Nolan

Times Dispatch, June 21, 2006

A criminal-defense attorney appeared in federal court yesterday as a criminal defendant and pleaded guilty to peddling marijuana.

Jeremy Clyde Sharp, 35, faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine when he is sentenced on Sept. 20 by U.S. District Judge Henry E. Hudson on one count of conspiracy to possess marijuana with the intent to distribute it.

Sharp's attorney, Craig S. Cooley, declined comment on behalf of his client yesterday.

Prosecutors charged that Sharp "did conspire with others, known and unknown to law enforcement to distribute and possess with the intent to distribute, a mixture and substance containing detectable amounts of marijuana."

Beginning in the fall 2004, Sharp bought between 20 and 40 kilograms of high-grade marijuana from at least two suppliers, one of whom charged him $3,600 per pound, according to the statement of facts in the plea agreement. A kilogram is equal to about 2.2 pounds.

"Sharp progressed from quarter-pound quantities until he regularly bought two to three pounds at a time," according to the documents, which also stated that he purchased seven pounds of marijuana on one occasion.

"Sharp would then break the pound quantities into smaller amounts for redistribution to his customers," the documents state.

The records did not specify the names of Sharp's customers, or of his suppliers.

The U.S. attorney's office declined to comment on the plea agreement, except to say the investigation is continuing. Sharp agreed to cooperate with investigators as part of his plea agreement.

According to the court papers, Sharp used his pickup truck to transport and store the marijuana and the proceeds from his sales.

When Sharp's Floyd Avenue home was searched in early February, investigators from the Drug Enforcement Administration, Henrico County police and Virginia Commonwealth University police also found the remains of a dismantled marijuana-growing operation. Sharp was arrested Feb. 10.

Sharp, a former public defender, was in private practice at the time of his arrest.

Baseball Won't Save Samples For Testing (NYT)

By Jack Curry

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

While Commissioner Bud Selig reiterated that Major League Baseball was eventually hoping to find a urine test to detect human growth hormone, he said he did not envision freezing urine samples from baseball players for future testing.

Several scientists, including Dr. Donald H. Catlin, whom baseball officials appointed to research a test for the hormone known as HGH, have said that such a search could be arduous.

A possible option to deter HGH use would be to save urine samples already collected by baseball. If players knew there was a possibility they could be punished at a future date for drugs they had used in the past, the frozen samples might be a deterrent. Selig dismissed the notion.

"I'm not a doctor, but I've talked to a number of significant experts on that issue," Selig said. "They don't believe it's a viable solution in any shape or form."

Selig declined to be more specific, other than saying experts "talked about it not being stable," referring to frozen samples.

Rob Manfred, baseball's executive vice president for labor relations, said he had had discussions with some experts and "they do not see the freezing of urine as a panacea in regards to HGH." Manfred said there were "practical and scientific issues" involved. He was probably referring to the storage of the more than 10,000 samples baseball collects each year and whether a test from frozen urine would survive legal challenges.

Catlin, who is the director of the Olympic Analytical Laboratory at U.C.L.A., said that freezing urine samples would act "as a very strong and powerful deterrent." But Catlin acknowledged that it would be an expensive and challenging process.

Catlin also agreed that the stability of the samples would be an issue because scientists do not know the stability of human growth hormone.

"It is viable," Catlin said about saving samples. "It's not simple. Nothing in this life involving doping is simple."

Even if Selig wanted to save urine samples, he would have to persuade the players union to agree to it. Urine samples from current tests for steroids and amphetamines are thrown out. Should scientists develop a practical blood test for HGH, the union would still have to accept it, and union officials would surely view it as an invasion of privacy.

Gene Orza, the chief operating officer for the players union, would not say, in an e-mail response, how the union would react to attempts to save urine samples or take blood samples.

The debate about human growth hormone has intensified since federal agents said that Jason Grimsley, a pitcher the Arizona Diamondbacks released earlier this month, said in an affidavit that he had used HGH, steroids and amphetamines. Grimsley named other major leaguers who he said had used the drugs. Those names were blacked out in copies of a document made public.

Dr. Gary I. Wadler, a New York University medical professor and steroid expert, has said that the notion of a urine test for human growth hormone "is a pipe dream."

Catlin, whose research group found previously undetected designer steroids, said he disliked hearing other scientists' commenting on the likelihood of his success.

"It's as if I have no clue what I'm doing," Catlin said. "I do have a clue what I'm doing."

Officials for the World Anti-Doping Agency said a blood test for the hormone that they deemed reliable was used during the Athens Games in 2004. Only several hundred of the tests have been given, the officials said, because antibodies needed for the test are in short supply.

When Catlin was hired, Major League Baseball pledged $450,000 over three years to finance his research. Selig and Manfred have said the contribution has increased to $500,000. That is a modest sum for a $2-billion-a-year industry.

"I'm sure there will be more contributions by M.L.B.," Selig said. "Who knows how much it will take?"

Catlin said the International Olympic Committee, the United States Anti-Doping Agency and the World Anti-Doping Agency had invested millions in trying to develop a test for HGH, and had been unsuccessful.

"We're hoping to get the ball rolling and lead to further advances," Catlin said. "It's not terribly realistic to expect a solution based on the amount of money we're receiving."

Coca Production Up Despite Eradication Efforts (AP)

BOGOTA, Colombia -- The United Nations says production of the plant used to make cocaine has increased by 8 percent in Colombia, despite record drug seizures and spraying of herbicides.

A similar report by the U.S. Office of National Drug Control Policy showed Colombia's coca production skyrocketed 26 percent from 2004 to 2005, in part due to a near-doubling of the area surveyed.

The two reports are the strongest evidence yet that a cornerstone of the U.S.-led war on drugs -- the aerial fumigation of coca fields -- is failing to meet its goal of halving coca production in the Andes.

The results may hamper efforts by President Alvaro Uribe to win additional U.S. backing for Plan Colombia, the anti-drug strategy that has cost American taxpayers $4 billion since 2000.

Coca Production Increases In Colombia (AP)

By Joshua Goodman, Associated Press Writer

BOGOTA, Colombia — A key component of the U.S.-backed war on drugs appears to be failing.

Despite record drug seizures and spraying of herbicides, production of the plant used to make cocaine increased by 8 percent in Colombia, to 330 square miles, the United Nations said Tuesday _ even as authorities sprayed coca fields totaling 25 times the size of Manhattan

The findings come on the heels of a similar report in April by the U.S. Office of National Drug Control Policy, which showed Colombia's coca production skyrocketed 26 percent from 2004 to 2005, in part due to a near-doubling of the area surveyed.

The two reports are the strongest evidence yet that a cornerstone of the U.S.-led war on drugs _ the aerial fumigation of coca fields _ is failing to meet its goal of halving coca production in the Andes.

The results may hamper efforts by President Alvaro Uribe to win additional U.S. backing for Plan Colombia, the anti-drug strategy that has cost American taxpayers $4 billion since 2000.

The report by the U.N. Office of Drugs and Crime said Colombian coca production expanded for the first time in five years, by 23 square miles.

"If this is the start of a return to much higher levels of coca, then it will be a problem," the U.N. agency's executive director Antonio Maria Costa told a news conference in Bogota.

"But I don't think that will happen. The government has every intention to continue its eradication efforts at the same high level as the past few years."

Partially offsetting the rise in Colombian production were declines in the world's two other coca-producing countries, Bolivia and Peru.

Overall, coca production in the Andean region rose 1 percent, to 616 square miles from 2004, according to the U.N.'s Andean coca survey.

In Colombia, the world's largest cocaine producer, the biggest increases were in the lawless, largely uninhabited jungles near its borders with Venezuela and Ecuador.

The spread of the coca frontier eastward toward Venezuela is in line with comments by U.S. anti-drug officials who have alleged that corruption within the government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez may be converting Colombia's neighbor into a major drug route.

Colombia is believed to be the source of 90 percent of the cocaine consumed in the United States.

Last year, the government eradicated a record 656 square miles of coca, mainly through aerial spraying of the herbicide glyphosate, up from 529 square miles in 2004.

But with drug traffickers developing techniques to better camouflage illegal crops and increase yields, Uribe has asked the Bush administration to boost financing for fumigation efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0036346

However, key members of the U.S. Congress and growing numbers of Colombians have suggested it may be time to give up the potentially environmentally harmful practice in favor of alternative economic programs for the poor farmers who grow coca on behalf of the country's cartels.

Currently about a third of the roughly $700 million in annual U.S. aid to Colombia funds economic and social development programs.

Although production is on the rise in Colombia, the U.N. said it declined in Peru and Bolivia.

Coca production in Bolivia fell by 8 percent last year, according to the U.N. The United States, however, is concerned Bolivia's leftist, coca-growing President Evo Morales _ who took office in January _ could relax his country's drug-fighting efforts.

In Peru, the world's second-largest cocaine producer, the coca crop declined by 4 percent.

The apparent declines differ widely from findings by the United States, based more heavily on satellite imagery, which estimated coca plantings grew by 38 percent in Peru and nearly 10 percent in Bolivia last year.

For anti-drug efforts to be successful, Costa said the United States and Europe must curb cocaine consumption and support alternative crop development programs in South America.

"Our aid efforts need to be multiplied at least tenfold in order to reach all impoverished farmers who need support," he said in a statement.

Colombia Sees Rise In Coca Growth (BBC)

BBC, June 20, 2006

The US has backed an aggressive anti-coca drive Coca production in Colombia grew by 8% in 2005 - the first rise in five years, the UN Office of Drugs and Crime says.

The production of coca, the raw material for cocaine, reached 86,000 hectares last year, UNODC found.

Despite the rise, it is half of Colombia's cultivation in 2000, which then stood at 163,000 hectares.

Colombia needs more international help to find alternative livelihoods for ex-coca farmers, one of the report's authors, Anja Korenblik, said.

Since 2000, the United States has spent more than $4bn on the fight against drug-trafficking in Colombia.

This has involved the aerial spraying of herbicides to kill the crops, as well as by law enforcement.

But despite such eradication efforts, the area under coca cultivation in Colombia rose by 6,000 hectares between 2004 and 2005, UNODC found.

Beating the cartels

"In Colombia in 2005, we found 86,000 hectares of coca bush, that is an 8% increase on 2004 when we saw 80,000 hectares," Mrs Korenblik told the BBC's Americas Service.

"That's almost half of the cultivation in the year 2000 when it was more than 160,000 hectares so it's really an impressive decline."

But she said the research showed more economic aid was required for poor farmers who grow coca on behalf of the drug cartels.

"What is needed is for the international community to support Colombia in identifying alternative livelihoods for ex-coca farmers," she said.

"This is not happening enough and that's probably why it's difficult for all the Andean countries to sustain their reductions in coca cultivation that they have seen," she added.

Colombia remains the world's largest producer of cocaine, although its share has dropped to 54% from 74% in 2000.

Coca production in Peru and Bolivia fell by 8% and 4% respectively in 2005, UNODC found.

Bridgeport Mayor Admits Using Cocaine (AP)

AP, June 20, 2006

BRIDGEPORT, Conn. Jun 20, 2006 (AP)— Mayor John M. Fabrizi publicly admitted Tuesday that he had abused cocaine while in office and said he wanted to apologize "to all the people of the city."

DOJ_NMG_0036347

The admission followed the inadvertent court filing of an FBI document in which an alleged drug dealer claimed an associate had a videotape of the mayor using cocaine.

In a tearful speech to about 200 city employees in City Council chambers Tuesday, Fabrizi said he had not used drugs in 18 months and had sought help for a drug addiction that he had hoped to handle privately.

"I thought that these were personal, private matters to me and my family, that I could deal with these issues with my family and myself," Fabrizi said. "I now recognize my actions affected many others, and I want to apologize to my family, my friends, and all of the people of the city of Bridgeport for my actions, my past actions."

Fabrizi, a Democrat who took office after former Mayor Joseph Ganim was convicted of corruption in 2003, said he hopes to move forward and continue running Connecticut's largest city.

Mayor Of Scandal-Weary Bridgeport Admits That He Used Cocaine (NYT)

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

BRIDGEPORT, Conn., — Fighting back tears, John M. Fabrizi, the mayor of Bridgeport, Connecticut's largest city, admitted on Tuesday that he had used cocaine and abused alcohol since he took office in April 2003, but said that it "never, ever affected my job performance" and that he had "put this personal struggle behind me."

His emotional admission followed months of rumors and the disclosure last week of a court document filed by federal prosecutors suggesting that he had used cocaine with a local Democratic official. The news of his problems was the latest black eye for this troubled city, whose last mayor, Joseph P. Ganim, a Democrat, was convicted on bribery, extortion and other corruption charges and is now serving a nine-year federal prison term.

Speaking before a room packed with 200 city employees, residents and reporters Tuesday morning at City Hall, Mr. Fabrizi, 49, expressed the hope that his tenure would not end prematurely.

He also apologized for not having been frank about his failings sooner, and asked the public to permit him to continue serving in a job that he said he loves "heart and soul." A Democrat, he faces re-election next year.

Mr. Fabrizi was the City Council president before becoming mayor when Mr. Ganim resigned, then won election to the office in November 2003. Though he has worked hard to revive his city's downtown, his grip on power began to weaken last week when federal prosecutors filed a document implicating him in a long-running drug investigation that has already resulted in dozens of arrests.

Hours after The Connecticut Post published an article about the document on Friday, United States Attorney Kevin O'Connor asked a judge to seal the document and issued an unusual apology to the mayor for having allowed it to become public. He said Mr. Fabrizi was not a target of the drug investigation.

"I thought that these were personal and private matters to me and my family," said Mr. Fabrizi, choking up as he read his statement, with his wife, Mary, at his side patting his back. "I now recognize my actions affected many others and I want to apologize."

Without going into details, he said that he had sought treatment for his problems and that he had not used drugs since late 2004. He added that he stopped drinking about four months ago. He told The Connecticut Post in an interview on Monday that he initially gave up drinking in 2005 but relapsed during the holidays.

About the time the mayor said he quit using cocaine, federal prosecutors began wiretapping two brothers who have since been charged with running a drug-trafficking organization. One of them, Juan Marrero, who is awaiting trial, told federal agents after his arrest last year that he was asked by Shawn Fardy, then a member of the Democratic Town Committee, for cocaine, because Mr. Fardy told him that Mr. Fabrizi was coming over and "needed a hit." Mr. Fardy has been indicted in the case and last week pleaded not guilty.

Dr. Jay Berkowitz, a psychiatrist who is a friend of the mayor, said that in or around October 2004, he began noticing some "erratic behavior" by the mayor. In particular, he said in an interview, the mayor was unusually loud and boisterous one night at a restaurant.

"He was handling the stress of the job beautifully, but with the job, sometimes you have a lot of social functions and that's where he thought he needed help," said Dr. Berkowitz, who spoke with the mayor's permission.

He said that the mayor initially rebuffed him when he asked if Mr. Fabrizi had a problem that required help, but that Mr. Fabrizi came to him last spring or summer seeking help for substance abuse.

Dr. Berkowitz said he helped get the mayor into an outpatient treatment program and believed Mr. Fabrizi was doing well. He also said he understood that the mayor had been taking Antabuse, a medication that makes a person sick if alcohol is imbibed.

Mr. Fabrizi, a former schoolteacher, said in his remarks that his problems never affected his ability to govern. "The tremendous progress Bridgeport has made over the past three years is a testament to that," he said. "Folks, my record speaks for itself."

He vowed to work hard to "regain the respect and support of the people of the city" and also to make the public "aware that even people in a position like my own can become a victim of drugs or alcohol."

The mayor also added that he was "appalled by some of my recent statements and the lengths to which I was willing to go to keep this issue private. Having put this painful episode behind me well over a year ago, I hope you can all understand why I foolishly wanted to distance myself from this nightmare."

He received a standing ovation when he entered the room and applause as he read his statement. He left without taking questions. Afterward, many spectators said they would continue to support him.

"I think we can all relate to it," said Jill Bruno, director of veterans affairs for the city. "I have some family members with addiction problems, and it hit home. I don't know too many mayors who stand up in front of a crowd and cry and pour their heart out to the city."

Others interviewed in Bridgeport on Tuesday were generally less sympathetic. Several mentioned the harsh penalties that acquaintances had faced when they were caught up in drug problems. They questioned whether the mayor would have come forward if he had not been implicated in the investigation.

Maria Yaylagul, 20, a University of Connecticut student who is taking a summer course at Housatonic Community College in downtown Bridgeport, said, "It was kind of unfair that celebrities and people in power get a get-out-of-jail-free card" when they break the law, but not average citizens. "I don't think it should even be an option for him to run again, a known drug addict."

Her classmate, David Jackson, 21, said he agreed that the mayor ought to be a role model. "Don't they have drug tests for the mayor?" he asked.

Several current and former politicians also said they thought the mayor ought to resign for the good of the city.

"We can't be the town that has the mayor with the drug problem," said Rick Torres, the Republican who lost to Mr. Fabrizi in 2003. "That's for him to deal with, not for us."

Gary Rose, the chairman of the department of government and politics at Sacred Heart University, said he expected the mayor to survive since Bridgeport's residents forgive "practically all forms of misbehavior on the part of their mayors."

Still, he said, "I think the mayor really has to decide sooner rather than later as to whether he has the moral leadership for a city that is really starving for ethical political figures."

Connecticut Post, June 20, 2006

BRIDGEPORT — Amid a few boos and much stronger applause, Mayor John M. Fabrizi on Tuesday stood before more than 200 city employees and residents and admitted he used cocaine in the past.

"I am sorry if I have, in any way, hurt the dignity of this office. I will do everything I can to regain the respect and support of the people of this city," Fabrizi said during an emotional address in which he choked up several times.

Referring specifically to his past drug use, Fabrizi said flatly, "Over the course of a number of years I abused alcohol and used cocaine occasionally."

Admitting he used cocaine during his time in office as both City Council president and later as mayor, he said he has not used drugs in 18 months.

Tears running down his cheeks, Fabrizi said he sought help for a drug addiction and had hoped that he could handle it privately.

Monday with the Connecticut Post editorial board, Fabrizi said he quit using cocaine at the end of 2004, and stopped drinking this year. He was elected in the fall of 2003.

The admission followed the release of FBI documents in which an alleged drug dealer claimed an associate had a videotape of the mayor using cocaine. Fabrizi, a Democrat who took office after Joseph Ganim was convicted of corruption in 2003, said he hopes to move forward and continue running Connecticut's largest city.

Prosecutors Want Councilman With Cocaine Record Removed (AP)

GALVESTON, Texas - Galveston County prosecutors have filed a petition to remove a recently elected city council member who was convicted in 2000 on felony cocaine charges.

State election law usually prevents someone who has been convicted of a felony from running for or being elected to office.

Marc Hoskins, 28, was elected in May and had disclosed his past to the city attorney before the election. He had also mentioned his conviction in a guest newspaper column.

Galveston County District Attorney Kurt Sistrunk filed a five-page petition Monday citing the Texas Election Code, which states that a candidate must not have been convicted of a felony "from which the person has not been pardoned or otherwise released from the resulting disabilities."

Hoskins' attorney, state Rep. Harold Dutton, D-Houston, said he will file a response later this week. Dutton said his client has been "released from the resulting disabilities" after serving six months of a two-year sentence in federal prison.

Hoskins was released under three years' supervision.

"I think the law is probably going to be on Marc's side," Dutton said.

Hoskins was arrested in 1999 while he we was a senior at Lamar University. He pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to with intent to deliver cocaine, according to court records.

Galveston DA Petitions For Councilman's Removal (HC)

Election code bars a convicted felon from office

GALVESTON - District Attorney Kurt Sistrunk filed a petition Monday asking that Councilman Marc Hoskins, who disclosed before the May election he was a convicted felon, be removed from office.

Sistrunk has determined that Hoskins, 28, should be barred from holding an elected office because of his 2000 federal cocaine distribution conspiracy conviction.

Hoskins, who was in attendance at a Juneteenth breakfast Monday morning representing the City Council, was served with papers Monday afternoon, Sistrunk said. He has until July 10 to respond to the five-page petition. A status conference before state District Judge David Garner is scheduled for Sept. 21.

Hoskins was not at his home Monday evening and could not be reached for comment. Hoskins' attorney, state Rep. Harold Dutton, D-Houston, also could not be reached.

In his petition, Sistrunk cites the Texas Election Code, which states that "a person must have not been fully convicted of a felony from which the person has not been pardoned or otherwise released from the resulting disabilities."

Sistrunk said Hoskins "was not eligible to be a candidate for nor was he eligible to be elected" as a Galveston council member. As such, Sistrunk said, "he unlawfully holds and executes the office of Councilmember of District 2, City of Galveston, Texas."

Sistrunk was asked to look into Hoskins' eligibility after receiving a letter from Galveston City Attorney Susie Green.

Hoskins, a consultant and lobbyist, has not tried to keep his conviction a secret, having mentioned his legal woes in a guest column before the election. He even told Green about his criminal past and told her that lawyers had advised him he was eligible to run.

Hoskins was arrested in August 1999, when he was a senior at Lamar University in Beaumont, and pleaded guilty in federal court to one count of conspiracy with intent to distribute cocaine, according to court records.

Hoskins was sentenced to two years but served only six months in a federal prison in Pennsylvania before being released under three years' supervision.

Officials Seek To Remove Galveston City Council Member (KHOU)

By Kelly Hawes

KHOU-TV, June 20, 2006

GALVESTON — The district attorney filed a petition Monday seeking to remove City Councilman Marc Hoskins from office.

The petition, filed in 10th District Court, contends that Hoskins was ineligible to seek office because of a drug-dealing conviction six years ago in federal court.

Hoskins will have until July 10 to file a legal response. A status conference has been scheduled for 10 a.m. Sept. 21.

During a City Council meeting last week, Hoskins said he did not know how the process would work out.

"We live in a country where we have fair and free elections," he said. "I'm here because I was elected to be here, and while I'm here, I will continue to work for you, the residents of District 2."

Hoskins won support during the weekend from the host of a Houston public radio show aimed at prisoners and their families. Ray Hill, host of "The Prison Show" on radio station KPFT, said the Citizenship Restoration Act of 1985 restored all rights of citizenship to convicted felons once they had completed their sentences.

"All of these issues have been vetted for 20 years," he said.

Hill, who became the first Texas felon to register to vote after passage of the law, has since run for office seven times. He twice sought a justice of the peace position and five times ran for a seat on the Houston City Council.

Hill acknowledged that he had never won election and thus hadn't held office, but he insisted that the legislative intent of the measure was clear.

"We talked about that while having hearings on passage of the bill in 1985," he said.

District Attorney Kurt Sistrunk said he was unaware of the law cited by Hill.

"We'll check its application," he said.

Sistrunk later said a quick examination indicated that the law applied only to voting rights.

"I believe that same argument was previously presented to the city, and the restoration of voting rights alone is not a complete removal of the disabilities imposed as a result of a conviction," he said.

Di Trapano's Bond Denied (CHASGAZ)

By Tom Searls, Staff writer

Charleston Gazette, June 21, 2006

Lawyer is a threat and violated bond conditions, judge says

Evidence shows Charleston lawyer Dante di Trapano could be a danger to the community and regularly violates bond conditions, a federal judge ruled Tuesday in denying di Trapano's bond request.

U.S. Magistrate Mary Stanley said di Trapano, 43, had "demonstrated time and time again that he is not willing to comply" with bond conditions and has "shown total disrespect for the law" in an order denying him bond.

Di Trapano was indicted last week on single counts of being a drug addict in possession of firearms and for allegedly lying on a federal form by stating he was not addicted to drugs when he purchased a gun in February.

Federal agents found eight guns inside di Trapano's South Hills residence in April. Charleston Police Detective Tim Palmer, who is working with federal agents, testified that while the guns were loaded, all were in a gun safe or locked up. Di Trapano was not home at the time of the search.

Palmer said agents also found possible drugs in the 1340 Johnson Road house. “It was some suspected cocaine, crack cocaine as well,” he said.

Some other substances were also located in the dwelling, he said, but authorities were waiting to learn from a laboratory what those substances are. Di Trapano has not been charged for those items.

Di Trapano’s attorney, Michael Del Giudice, pointed out that none of the prosecutors’ witnesses testified di Trapano had been violent, and said his client should be released.

Stanley disagreed and set an Aug. 23 trial date for di Trapano before Chief U.S. District Judge David Faber. Di Trapano is expected to remain in jail until then.

Following the hearing, di Trapano’s wife lashed out at National Football League star Randy Moss, whom di Trapano represented until April. Moss, a Rand native and former Marshall University star, plays for the Oakland Raiders and is set to open a smoothie business in Charleston this weekend.

“Anyone want a Randy Moss shirt?” Teri di Trapano said to reporters outside the federal courthouse before tossing the black shirt emblazoned with Moss’ name into a nearby trash can.

Dante and Teri di Trapano were arrested with three others in a Florida hotel in March and charged with possession with intent to deliver crack cocaine. Stanley noted di Trapano failed to report to the rehabilitation center the court sent him to, instead choosing one of his own.

Stanley said di Trapano was arrested in Georgia just weeks after that on charges of felony cocaine and misdemeanor marijuana possession. He was then arrested in the St. Albans area early June 10 on a charge of driving with a suspended license.

When Palmer arrested him last week for the federal charge, di Trapano was also driving with a suspended license, documents show.

- advertisement -

Del Giudice argued that even if convicted of the charges, di Trapano would only serve a year in jail. He asked Stanley to place his client on home confinement, saying locking him up is “highly severe and unnecessary,” and that di Trapano is not a flight risk.

“They have not caught him in any serious charges,” he said.

Prosecutors’ main evidence showing di Trapano is a danger was based on the testimony of police officers who said di Trapano’s father hired an off-duty officer to patrol his law firm to keep his son out. Dante di Trapano has been let go by his former law firm, which is headed by his father, well-known trial lawyer and former state Democratic Party chairman Rudolph DiTrapano.

Charleston Police Sgt. Jason Beckett testified that Rudolph DiTrapano hired an off-duty officer. “He was concerned with his son, Dante di Trapano, possibly coming to the law firm and damaging equipment and for the protection of employees,” Beckett testified.

Under cross-examination, Beckett admitted he filled out a report on the matter at the request of another officer working with federal agents, something not normally done. “It’s just the government creating their case,” Del Giudice said.

Beckett also said Rudolph DiTrapano did not sign the form requesting the officer. Instead, it was a stamped signature.

Patrolman Raymond Coleman, who only worked three days at the firm, said he saw Dante di Trapano pass by one time, but that he did not attempt to enter the law firm. Coleman testified he was not told of any danger to employees.

Del Giudice noted di Trapano is the only means of support for his wife and four children, two of whom are planning to go to college this fall.

“We have nothing to live on except my savings,” Teri di Trapano said outside the courthouse.

Teri di Trapano said her father-in-law is holding her husband’s money in escrow. “They promised him they would take care of his family,” she said, saying she fears losing all the family’s belongings.

Man Accused Of Clinic Bomb Plot Indicted (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, June 21, 2006

(AP) - BALTIMORE-A Maryland man accused of plotting to attack an abortion clinic with a pipe bomb and handgun was indicted Monday on weapons and explosives charges, the U.S. attorney's office said.

A federal grand jury indicted Robert Weiler, 25, on charges of possessing and making an unregistered destructive device, illegally possessing a firearm, and possessing a stolen firearm.

Weiler called the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives on June 8 from a western Maryland highway rest stop to confess to the plan, according to court documents. He told authorities he had built a pipe bomb, stolen a handgun from a friend and planned to attack an abortion clinic in suburban Washington.

That morning, the pipe bomb exploded in a house belonging to a friend of Weiler as a bomb technician tried to defuse it. No one was hurt, but the bomb set fire to the house.

Each count carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison. A preliminary hearing is set for Thursday.

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Bill Would Add New Immigration Judges (LAW)

By Jason McLure, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 21, 2006

At DOJ, getting to be an immigration judge can depend more on political contacts than experience.

It's just after 2 p.m. and Immigration Judge Garry Malphrus is looking at a long afternoon of deporting illegal immigrants. He punches a button on a tape recorder and intones: "Respondent was scheduled for a master calendar hearing at 9 a.m. It is now 2:20 p.m." Malphrus notes the immigrant's failure to appear, asks a lone Immigration and Customs Enforcement lawyer if an attempt has been made to contact the government (the inevitable response: "no"), and then formally orders the immigrant's removal from the United States. Stop tape.

The routine continues for the better part of an hour. Next file. Repeat script. Stop tape.

Watching this tedious exercise, it's hard to imagine that being appointed a federal immigration judge would be considered a political plum. But that's how these career civil service jobs are increasingly treated, say immigration lawyers who practice before the courts. Malphrus, a former White House aide and Republican campaign veteran, had never practiced immigration law when he joined the bench last year.

"The Bush administration has realized these are great jobs and maybe [it] shouldn't be left up to the civil service to determine who gets a job," says Charles Kuck, a vice president of the American Immigration Lawyers Association. "I believe that these folks without prior immigration experience tend not to be good judges."

Whether they're great jobs is a matter of opinion. But with the immigration courts under scrutiny by Congress and the attorney general after a series of federal appellate decisions blasting the courts as sloppy and inept, the issue of just who serves in an office with enormous influence over the lives of immigrants has received scant attention. And the practice of appointing judges with no immigration law experience is condemned by lawyers in the field, who say the complexity of immigration laws means judges such as Malphrus do their training on the job.

Hired in March 2005, Malphrus, 38, is on the front line of America's swamped immigration system. The 200-odd judges in the Justice Department's Executive Office of Immigration Review handle more than 300,000 immigration cases every year, considering matters that range from approving the status of asylum seekers to deporting illegal migrants seeking jobs to signing off on the legal status of those who have married U.S. citizens.

But the process by which the judges are hired is a murky one, often little understood by either immigration lawyers or the judges themselves. Unlike federal district and circuit court judges, who are appointed for life and work for the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, immigration judges are part of the Justice Department's career civil service. As such, the EOIR has a formal application process for immigration judges. Applicants are vetted by the office's chief immigration judge, who conducts interviews and makes formal hiring recommendations.

But according to an immigration-judge hiring policy released by the Justice Department, the attorney general also has the option to pre-empt the formal vetting process and directly hire a judge of his choosing.

This two-track hiring method helps explain why the nation's immigration bench is stocked not only with lawyers who have spent years as trial attorneys for ICE or the military's JAG Corps (who enjoy preference in federal hiring) but with a sprinkling of Republican Party activists and campaign veterans such as Malphrus. Among the 19 immigration judges hired since 2004: Francis Cramer, the former campaign treasurer for New Hampshire Sen. Judd Gregg; James Nugent, the former vice chairman of the Louisiana Republican Party; and Chris Brisack, a former Republican Party county chairman from Texas who had served on the state library commission under then-Gov. George W. Bush.

Malphrus' move was cited last month in a report to Congress by the Government Accountability Office on the subject of the movement of political appointees into the government civil service. That phenomenon, known as "burrowing in" to the government bureaucracy, has been an issue for Democratic and Republican administrations alike. Ultimately, the GAO reported that "it could not be determined whether appropriate authorities and proper procedures were followed" in Malphrus' hiring.

And while a courtroom on the 13th floor of a nondescript office building in Arlington, Va. — where Malphrus presides — may seem to be a million miles from the corridors of power across the Potomac River, the job isn't without its perks. When Malphrus was hired, his salary nearly doubled to $113,904. And unlike his former colleagues at the White House, as a career civil service employee, Malphrus won't be out of work should Republicans lose the White House in 2008.

"It's not a glamorous job," says Joseph Vail, himself a former immigration judge who now works at a legal aid clinic in Houston. "You don't have a whole lot of power . . . but the salary and benefits are good, plus you get to call yourself a judge."

Addressed by a reporter in court, Malphrus said he would be happy to be interviewed for this article with the approval of his Justice Department superiors. But that interview request was denied by Justice's press office in Washington. The Justice Department did not return calls for comment for this article.

Political activism

Malphrus' most public political episode came during the 2000 Florida presidential election recount. He was then a Republican aide to the Senate Judiciary Committee and turned up at the Miami-Dade Elections Department with a group of well-dressed Republican protesters.

In what news reports later dubbed the "Brooks Brothers riot," the protesters, chanting "Stop the fraud," pounded on the windows and doors of the municipal building and demanded that the election board in the heavily Democratic county end its manual recount of thousands of ballots that a scanning machine had determined contained no vote for president. Shortly afterward, in a decision pivotal to the outcome of the election, the board voted unanimously to stop the recount. Months later, Malphrus received a White House appointment to the Domestic Policy Council, where he served for three years.

Last week, Malphrus crossed paths with a former political activist of a different stripe. Seated before him on June 15 was Andrei Brezineu, a soft-spoken young Belarussian dressed in jeans and white high-tops who, according to his lawyer, fled the Eastern European country in 2003 after suffering a series of threats, beatings, and arrests for distributing pamphlets for a political party opposed to President Alexander Lukashenko. Lukashenko's regime has been dubbed the "last dictatorship in Europe" by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, and this winter, Lukashenko was re-elected with 86 percent of the vote in an election observers said was marred by fraud and intimidation. "Belarus is known to be a country where political dissent and human rights are not tolerated," Brezineu's lawyer told Malphrus.

The government trial attorney in the case opposed Brezineu's application for political asylum, questioning whether he would face persecution if he was returned to Belarus and pointing out that Brezineu appeared to have limited knowledge of recent political events in his home country and no documentation of his arrests. Malphrus questioned Brezineu's defense attorney as well, asking whether a series of harassing incidents could rise to the level of political persecution needed to grant Brezineu asylum. When neither Malphrus nor Brezineu's attorney could recall a precedent for this from immigration case law, the judge ordered that the hearing be continued for a month.

The decision reflected a cautious approach to deciding asylum cases that has won Malphrus praise from immigration attorneys. That approach, say a number of lawyers who've practiced before him, is fortunate given the judge's limited knowledge of the country's specialized and oft-changing immigration laws.

"I like Garry Malphrus," says one immigration lawyer in Cleveland who practices before the judge and therefore requested anonymity. "But he has no immigration experience whatsoever, and that comes across."

A native of Jasper County, in a historically Democratic pocket of South Carolina's Low Country, Malphrus became active in Republican politics more than two decades ago. After graduating from the University of South Carolina Law School in 1993, Malphrus spent the next four years clerking for a series of state and federal judges. In 1997 he was hired as an aide to then-Sen. Strom Thurmond (R) and joined the staff of the Senate Judiciary Committee, where he worked on a range of policy issues, including crime, immigration, bankruptcy, and tort reform — issues he would confront later as a White House aide, according to former Senate colleagues. Studious and soft-spoken, Malphrus was known as a strong conservative.

David Brog, a former Judiciary Committee staffer for moderate Republican Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, recalls being teased by Malphrus at party staff meetings. "This is a Republican meeting," Brog recalls Malphrus as saying. "What are you doing here?"

Those who've worked with Malphrus say his experience as a law clerk and policy aide makes him well qualified to sit on the immigration court. "The idea that it was politics and not competence is ludicrous," Brog says of Malphrus' appointment.

Malphrus' departure from the White House for the relative backwater of the Arlington Immigration Court may seem like a step down for an ambitious, young, conservative lawyer. After all, a lawyer with Malphrus' connections could almost certainly have been richly rewarded on K Street. But William O'Neil, a South Carolina trial lawyer and law school classmate of Malphrus', says it's just one more career step for a friend he's always thought was bound for a judgeship in state or federal court.

"He's well connected," he says of Malphrus. "I think he's just working his way up the totem pole. I don't think he's going to be an immigration judge for the rest of his life."

Judicial jobs ahead

Malphrus' entrance to the bench comes at a time of flux for the immigration courts. In an opinion highly critical of the immigration courts and the Board of Immigration Appeals late last year, Judge Richard Posner of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit wrote that "the adjudication of these cases at the administrative level has fallen below the minimum standards of legal justice." Posner's opinion cited a dozen other recent appellate opinions from four circuits that all offered harsh words for the conduct and reasoning of the immigration judiciary.

Additionally, the immigration reform bill that has passed the Senate contains a number of measures aimed at improving the quality of the immigration courts. One provision would increase the number of members on the Board of Immigration Appeals, allowing for closer review of immigration judicial decisions before they make it to the federal appeals courts. The Senate bill would also add at least 20 new immigration judges. Should the House pass those provisions, Malphrus may well be joined by additional political hires who prefer an immigration judge's black robes to a political job in an administration approaching lame-duck status.

"It's usually a pretty secure job," says David Martin, a law professor at the University of Virginia. "If you're not quite in the category to merit an appointment to the federal bench, an immigration-judge job might satisfy some of those instincts. Immigration judges work hard, but they don't have to bill 2,100 hours [a year] or have clients calling them up on the weekend."

Pa. City Poised For Immigration Crackdown (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Rubinkam, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 21, 2006

(AP) - HAZLETON, Pa.-With tensions rising and the police department and municipal budget stretched thin, Hazleton is about to embark on one of the toughest crackdowns on illegal immigrants anywhere in the United States.

Last week the mayor of this former coal town introduced, and the City Council tentatively approved, a measure that would revoke the business licenses of companies that employ illegal immigrants; impose $1,000 fines on landlords who rent to illegal immigrants; and make English the official language of the city.

"Illegal immigrants are destroying the city," said Mayor Lou Barletta, a Republican. "I don't want them here, period."

Barletta said he had no choice but to act after two illegal immigrants from the Dominican Republic were charged last month with shooting and killing a 29-year-old man. Other recent incidents involving illegal immigrants have rattled this city 80 miles northwest of Philadelphia, including the arrest of a 14-year-old boy for firing a gun at a playground.

DOJ_NMG_0036355

"This is crazy," the mayor said. "People are afraid to walk the streets. There's going to be law and order back in Hazleton, and I'm going to use every tool I possibly can."

The City Council, which approved the measure in a 4-1 vote, must vote on it twice more before it can become law. The next vote is scheduled for mid-July.

When Barletta took office in 2000, Hispanics represented about 5 percent of the city's population of 23,000. The population has since shot up to 31,000, with Hispanics now representing 30 percent, lured to Hazleton by cheap housing, a lower cost of living and jobs in nearby plants, factories and farms.

City officials do not know how many of the new arrivals are in the United States illegally, but say they are fueling the drug trade, joining gangs and committing other crimes.

Municipal officials around the nation, frustrated at what they perceive as the federal government's inability to stem illegal immigration, have increasingly taken matters into their own hands.

In San Bernardino, Calif., voters will decide whether to adopt a measure nearly identical to the one in Hazleton. An Idaho county filed a racketeering lawsuit against agricultural companies accused of hiring illegal immigrants. In New Hampshire, a pair of police chiefs began arresting illegal immigrants for trespassing.

"They're being forced to pick up the financial tab for all of this nonsense, and they are doing whatever they can to find ways to combat it at the local level," said Susan Tully, national field director of the Federation for American Immigration Reform , which advocates limits on immigration. "This is a fine example of what I'm talking about."

Flavia Jimenez, an immigrant policy analyst at the National Council of La Raza, predicted the Hazleton crackdown would prompt a civil rights lawsuit.

"Landlords are going to shut their doors to anyone who may look or sound Latino," she said. "On the other hand, landlords may attempt to actually determine whether a person is undocumented or not, and make multiple mistakes because of the complexity of immigration law."

Whites in Hazleton seem to overwhelmingly favor the proposed crackdown. Barletta's office has been flooded with hundreds of approving e-mails and phone calls - from as far as California and Florida - and he got a standing ovation when he walked into a Hazleton diner for lunch.

"It's about time," said Francis X. Tucci, 57, who was born and raised in Hazleton and owns a hair salon in the heart of the Hispanic business district. "We were a nice community. You find bad everywhere, I understand that, but we're talking about here and now."

Some Hispanics approve of the measure, saying they are fed up with crime and graffiti. "If I was mayor, I wouldn't let anyone in who had a criminal record," said Rafael Rovira, 69, a naturalized American citizen from the Dominican Republic.

Others view the proposal as unnecessary, saying that most illegal immigrants obey the law and only want to work. They point to the success of Wyoming Street, a colorful thoroughfare where dozens of businesses have opened in the past few years.

Jose Lechuga, 42, came to the United States illegally in 1982, received amnesty in 1986 and now operates a grocery store and restaurant in Hazleton. He said the mayor is "confusing illegal people with criminals."

Immigration Bill Delayed By House (CHIT)

By Frank James

Chicago Tribune, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In a move that could sound the death knell for immigration-reform legislation in Congress this year, House Republican leaders said Tuesday they plan to hold numerous hearings on the issue this summer and only then start talks with the Senate that might lead to a final bill.

The delay raises the likelihood that Congress will end the year without passing major immigration legislation that President Bush has supported. That would be a signal defeat for the president, who has urged Congress to approve comprehensive legislation along the lines of the Senate-passed bill, which included a path to citizenship for many of the estimated 12 million undocumented immigrants already in the U.S. and the creation of a guest-worker program.

Failure to approve final legislation, however, would be an election-year victory for many House Republicans who have fiercely opposed any course that could lead to illegal immigrants gaining citizenship before U.S. borders are secured, a position held by many voters as well.

House Republicans have consistently decried provisions calling for legalization of immigrants as an amnesty, which they find anathema. In addition, they have said the nation's priority should be securing its borders first, especially along the southern perimeter with Mexico, and cracking down on employers who hire illegal immigrants. The House passed enforcement-only legislation in December while the Senate approved its broader bill last month.

"I'm not putting any time line on this thing but I think we need to get this done right," House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) told reporters. "We want to have hearings on this bill. I asked the various [House committee] chairmen to go out and have hearings so we understand what the American people are saying."

The call for hearings was part of a strategy by House Republicans to raise public awareness of various elements in the Senate bill they find objectionable, they said.

One provision of the Senate bill would allow illegal immigrants to collect Social Security for the years when they lacked authorization to work, even when they illegally used Social Security numbers that belonged to U.S. citizens or legal residents in order to obtain jobs.

House critics of the Senate bill also complain it would place unreasonable limits on the information immigration officials could use to decide whether to grant an applicant legal status.

"Once [voters] find out some of things that are in this bill they will be outraged about it," said one House Republican aide who requested anonymity because he wanted to speak more frankly. "And that's the problem. If we just went into a conference [with the Senate] and then passed a bill and sent it to the president and [voters] didn't know all these things were in there, we'd be in a lot of trouble before an election."

Congressional supporters of the Senate's immigration legislation accused House Republicans and some in the Senate of acting in bad faith. "The Republican House wants to defeat the immigration bill," said Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.,) leader of the Senate's Democrats.

"It's obvious that the Republicans in the Senate don't want an immigration bill," Reid said. "…This is a stall.… If there were ever a time for the president to get engaged in this, it would be now. Why can't he, with this power that he has over this Republican-dominated Congress, tell them, 'I want to go to conference on this'?"

Despite the delay in any start of House-Senate negotiations over the legislation, White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said, "The president is undeterred. We are committed and we have been working very hard with members [of Congress] to see if we can reach consensus on an issue the American people have said they want action on."

Hastert press secretary Ron Bonjean said as many as eight committees will holding hearings, including the House Judiciary, Ways and Means and Homeland Security panels. Hearings would be held in July and August with negotiations between the House and Senate on a final measure slated for September.

"If this legislation is ready to pass in September, then we'll pass it," Hastert said. "But we're not going to pass it before it's ready."

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) said Tuesday there was no reason to hold additional hearings on the immigration bill. The decision by House Republians was "the wrong way to go," he said, and seemed to simply delay resolving differences between House and Senate versions of the legislation.

"We have had 2 1/2 years of hearings. We know what the problem is," Kennedy said.

Supporters of a more lenient approach towards illegal immigrants suggested that the House leadership hoped that by pushing negotiations with the Senate closer to the Nov. 7 midterm congressional elections, the likelihood of passing a bill would diminish.

Angela Kelly, deputy director of the National Immigration Forum, a Washington-based organization that favors the Senate bill, said, "I think…the Republican leadership's game is to just run out the clock. I think that they're really uncomfortable, they're squirming with the split in their party over this. And the fact that the stars have aligned so that the president and the Senate are in the same place on this is just something they don't want to contend with" in an election year.

Steven Camarota of the Washington-based Center for Immigration Studies, which opposes the Senate bill, raised an issue critics have aired as another reason why immigration reform might be doomed, at least for this year.

The Senate bill has some revenue-raising provisions that would require illegal workers to pay back taxes. But the Constitution requires revenue-raising measures to originate in the House.

That could force the Senate to go back and strip out those provisions and that might require more debate and votes in a Senate that already had great difficulty producing its legislation.

"The chance that they have an appetite for debate and votes again on this is not that great," he said. "So that technicality actually matters."

Leaders: Broad Immigration Bill Unlikely (AP-Y2)

By David Espo

AP2, June 21, 2006

In a defeat for President Bush, Republican congressional leaders said Tuesday that broad immigration legislation is all but doomed for the year, a victim of election-year concerns in the House and conservatives' implacable opposition to citizenship for millions of illegal immigrants.

"Our number one priority is to secure the border, and right now I haven't heard a lot of pressure to have a path to citizenship," said Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., announcing plans for an unusual series of hearings around the nation to begin in August on Senate-passed immigration legislation.

"I think it is easy to say the first priority of the House is to secure the borders," added Rep. Roy Blunt (news, bio, voting record), the GOP whip.

In deference to the president, neither Hastert nor any other Republican official in either house said publicly that the president's ambitious plan — including a guest worker program as well as an opportunity for citizenship for many illegal immigrants — was dead for the year.

But several Republicans in both houses, speaking on condition of anonymity, were less guarded.

"There will be no path to citizenship," said one lawmaker who attended a strategy session in Hastert's office.

Some officials added that Republicans have begun discussing a pre-election strategy for seizing the political high ground on an issue that so far has served to highlight divisions within the party. Among the possibilities, these officials said, are holding votes in the House or Senate this fall on additional measures to secure the borders, or on legislation that would prevent illegal immigrants from receiving Social Security payments or other government benefits.

"The discussion is how to put the Democrats in a box without attacking the president," said one aide, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Additionally, GOP aides said Rep. Tom Reynolds, chairman of the House campaign committee, has recently been using polling data to persuade fellow members of the leadership that the public would respond poorly to some provisions in the Senate-passed bill.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said after Hastert's announcement of hearings, "The president is undeterred. We are committed and we have been working very hard with members (of Congress) to see if we can reach consensus on an issue the American people have said they want action on."

In the Senate, Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., told reporters he welcomed hearings. "As much examination of the House bill and Senate bill as possible is good," he said.

Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., a principal author of the Senate-passed measure, offered to testify at House hearings. Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record) of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said, "I'm hopeful" of a compromise before the elections.

Hastert announced no schedule for the completion of hearings. He and other members of the leadership sidestepped numerous times when asked whether a House-Senate compromise along the lines of what Bush has sought could come to a vote by year's end. "I am not putting any timetable on this thing, but I think we need to get this thing done right," the speaker told reporters.

The Republican-controlled House passed border security legislation last year, largely along party lines. By contrast, the Senate approved a bipartisan bill calling for tougher border enforcement; penalties against employers who hire illegal immigrants, a new guest worker program and a shot at citizenship for most of the estimated 12 million immigrants in the country illegally.

The measure won the support of only 23 of the Senate's 55 Republicans. Frist, a likely presidential contender for 2008, is under pressure from conservatives not to agree to a compromise bill they oppose. Democrats, on the other hand, are insisting on assurances that any final bill will remain bipartisan.

Hastert told reporters he had conveyed his views on immigration privately to Bush in recent days, and other officials said opinions among House Republicans hardened when Republican Rep. Brian Bilbray won a special election this month in the San Diego area. Bilbray campaigned for tougher immigration measures than Bush favors, and equated the president's approach to amnesty.

Several Republican officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Hastert and the president had expressed differing views at one meeting about the importance of immigration in Bilbray's victory. These officials said Hastert assigned it greater weight than the president. The Republican National Committee ran a 72-hour program in the campaign's final days that many Republicans credit with maximizing the vote for the winner.

Additionally, the RNC conducted a postelection poll of the San Diego-area district that suggests voters take a dim view of citizenship for illegal immigrants.

The poll found that when people were asked if they prefer a comprehensive bill to one that emphasizes border security and imposing criminal penalties on individuals already in the country illegally, the comprehensive approach was favored, 45-32. But when asked if they favor a comprehensive approach or a security-first bill that "under no circumstances" allows for citizenship, 43 percent said they prefer focusing on the border, and 33 percent picked overall reform.

Hastert Doubts Alien Bill In 2006 (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

House leaders cast doubt yesterday on the possibility of passing immigration reform legislation this year and said, in an unusual move, that they will hold hearings across the country to gauge voter concern.

"I'm not putting any timeline ... but I think we need to get this thing done right," House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, told reporters yesterday after meeting with the chairmen of all the committees that oversee immigration-related legislation.

Aides in both the House and Senate said yesterday the developments mean immigration legislation is essentially dead for the year. Pushing something through before the November elections would be too politically unpredictable, they said, and there would be no incentive to do it between the election and year's end.

Asked yesterday if it was realistic to think Congress could still pass immigration legislation before the elections, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio said: "Maybe."

Immigration legislation has been stalled for nearly a month because of deep opposition by House Republicans to the Senate's proposal, which provides a path to citizenship for most of the estimated 12 million illegal aliens in the U.S. The House last year approved a bill to secure the border without dealing with the current illegal alien population or the "guest-worker" program wanted by President Bush.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, who voted for the Senate bill, said yesterday he "strongly supports" Mr. Hastert's decision to delay legislation for additional hearings.

While the issue of immigration divides Republicans, the position that Democrats are fairly unified behind -- granting citizenship rights to illegal aliens -- is highly unpopular among voters, polls show.

"We're ready to go on a comprehensive immigration reform bill, one that deals with security, one that deals with temporary guest-worker program, one, of course, that deals with a pathway to citizenship," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, who accused House Republicans of stalling the legislation because they don't like the Senate bill.

House Republicans went to great efforts yesterday to suggest their differences are not with the Senate, but with Democrats.

Though 17 Republicans supported the Senate's "amnesty" bill, House Republicans are referring to it as the "Kennedy bill." Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, wrote much of the language in the bill that passed the Senate but the slightly modified compromise version that passed was sponsored by two Republicans, Sens. Mel Martinez of Florida and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska.

Once the Senate "amnesty" bill is securely yoked to Democrats, House Republicans will take the issue on the road in the months leading up to the election.

"This is an issue that is on the minds of the American people," Mr. Boehner said. "I think that we clearly want to solve this problem but the House bill is very different than the Senate bill."

But Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds, New York Republican, downplayed the impact immigration will have on congressional races.

"It all depends on every district," he said. "The Number One issue in my district is jobs and taxes."

The "field hearings" will be held across the country mainly during the August recess.

Among the sharpest criticisms of the Senate bill are that it grants Social Security benefits to illegals for work they performed here illegally, it requires illegals to pay just three of five years in back taxes, and it could lead to 100 million new legal immigrants during the next 20 years. Mr. Boehner also noted that the Senate bill would allow illegals to get in-state tuition at colleges and universities where they illegally reside.

While Mr. Hastert gave no indication yesterday that he would try pressing forward with the issue this year, he declined to rule out the possibility.

"We're not going to pass it before it's ready," he said.

House Plans National Hearings Before Changes To Immigration (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 20 — In a decision that puts an overhaul of immigration laws in serious doubt, House Republican leaders said Tuesday that they would hold summer hearings around the nation on the politically volatile subject before trying to compromise with the Senate on a chief domestic priority of President Bush.

"We are going to listen to the American people, and we are going to get a bill that is right," said Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, who said he had informed Mr. Bush of the plan.

The unusual decision to set a new round of hearings on legislation already passed by the House and the Senate places a serious roadblock in the way of Mr. Bush's drive for major changes in immigration policy.

The timing means that formal Congressional negotiations will not begin until September, just as Congressional campaigns are entering their crucial final weeks, when lawmakers typically shy away from difficult issues.

"I don't know how likely that is," Representative Roy Blunt of Missouri, the House Republican whip, said about reaching an agreement before November.

Mr. Blunt suggested that final consideration might have to wait for a lame-duck session after the election. "We clearly are going to be here later in the year," he said.

But advancing significant legislation in lame-duck sessions has proved difficult. If Congress does not act this year, the House and the Senate will have to begin anew in 2007 should lawmakers want to pursue immigration changes.

A White House spokeswoman said Mr. Bush would press for legislation. "The president is undeterred in his efforts to pass a comprehensive immigration reform bill," said the spokeswoman, Dana Perino, who said the White House was "committed to working with members to see if we can reach a consensus on a bill that will help solve our nation's immigration problems."

The leadership decision reflected the deep resistance among House Republicans to the bipartisan approach approved in May by the Senate and generally endorsed by Mr. Bush. That bill combined new border enforcement with a program for temporary guest workers and the ability of illegal immigrants to qualify for citizenship by meeting a series of requirements.

House Republicans passed a party-line bill late last year that focused solely on border enforcement, and they said a majority of the public backed their approach. Many House Republicans consider the Senate bill amnesty for those who have entered the country illegally.

"Our No. 1 priority is to secure the border," Mr. Hastert said, "and right now I haven't heard a lot of pressure to have a path to citizenship."

In a swipe at the Senate version, Representative Deborah Pryce of Ohio, a senior member of the Republican leadership, labeled the legislation the "Kennedy bill" — a dismissive reference to Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, who helped write the measure in cooperation with Republicans including Senators Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and John McCain of Arizona.

Those lawmakers held out hope on Tuesday that a final bill could be completed this year and said they accepted the House position that more scrutiny of the issue was required. "I respect their views," Mr. McCain said, "and I hope that we can still continue discussions, and hopefully we can reach an agreement."

Another Republican proponent, Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, warned that voters might punish Republicans if they were unable to come up with a solution to such a pressing national problem.

"The question is, Is it better to solve the issue before the election, or is it better to make people mad and do nothing?" Mr. Graham said. "I think it is hard to go to the electorate when you have the White House, the Senate and the House and say that you cannot at least go through the effort of trying to get a bill. That would to me be a sign of inability to govern."

Democrats were highly critical of House Republicans, with Mr. Kennedy accusing them of a "cynical effort to delay or kill a comprehensive immigration bill."

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said Republicans were stalling, and he called on Mr. Bush to prod members of his party. "He has complete domination over this Republican Congress," Mr. Reid said. "Let him tell us how much he really wants a bill."

The focus of the summer hearings and the schedule were uncertain Tuesday as Republicans suggested that they would be used both to explore the content of the Senate bill and to survey public opinion on the issue. But it was clear House Republicans intended to use the forums to try to expose what they saw as failings in the Senate bill and to build public opposition to that approach.

"The House bill is very different than the Senate bill, and I think we want to have a clear understanding of what is in that bill," said Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the House majority leader.

The hearings could also help House Republicans rally conservative supporters in advance of the election, particularly given a recent special election in Southern California in which immigration emerged as a dominant issue. But Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, the chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, said Tuesday that the topic's power varied from district to district.

"It is not, in my view, a situation that has the same resonance in each district," Mr. Reynolds said.

Official Opposes Border Wall

TUCSON, June 20 (AP) —The new commissioner of Customs and Border Protection said Tuesday that he did not favor building a huge wall along the Mexican border.

"I don't support, I don't believe the administration supports a wall," the commissioner, W. Ralph Basham, said. "It doesn't make sense; it's not practical."

Fencing, including so-called smart fencing with sensors, vehicle barriers and lighting, will be part of the infrastructure improvements, Mr. Basham said. But a layered approach combining technology and air operations will be necessary, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0036361

Mr. Basham, only two weeks on the job, is touring the Southwest border region to look at the challenges his agency is facing as National Guard troops arrive to begin assisting its efforts.

House Republican Leaders Apply Brakes On Immigration Bill (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

WASHINGTON — Ignoring President Bush's call for speedy enactment of a new immigration bill, House Republican leaders said Tuesday that they'll hold more hearings this summer instead of working out a compromise with the Senate.

Both chambers have passed bills. The House's version emphasizes border security. House leaders object to a provision in the Senate bill that would create a path to citizenship for many illegal immigrants. "Our No. 1 priority is to secure the border, and right now I haven't heard a lot of pressure to have a path to citizenship," House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., told the Associated Press.

Hastert's decision, which jeopardizes final action on a bill this year, came as Bush was traveling to Europe for a summit with leaders there. White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino said the president remains "undeterred in his effort to pass an immigration reform bill." Other Republicans are less optimistic about chances that legislation will pass before Congress adjourns for the fall elections.

"It's going to be difficult," said Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan. House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, agreed. Asked whether he thought immigration legislation would become law this year, he said, "Maybe."

Normally, the next step in the legislative process is for a House-Senate conference committee to reconcile differences between the bills. That won't happen until September at the earliest, according to Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean. "Before the speaker will appoint conferees, he wants to get to the bottom of the Senate Kennedy bill," Bonjean said.

Bonjean's characterization of the Senate bill, identifying it with Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, an icon of Democratic liberalism, reflects the deep divisions in the Republican Party over immigration. In fact, the Senate bill was co-sponsored by a number of prominent Republicans, including Sens. John McCain of Arizona, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Brownback.

Brownback expressed dismay at the news that Hastert will not begin negotiations with the Senate until the fall. "I am OK with hearings, but don't stall the process," he said. "This is a bill that is going to need a lot of conference time."

Bush has been urging Congress to move quickly on immigration. "I don't think this issue can wait," he said in Nebraska this month. "It needs to be addressed now."

He has endorsed the basic outline of the Senate bill, including plans to allow immigrants who have lived in the country illegally since at least 2004 to apply for citizenship. "To me that is a humane, decent way of addressing a very difficult problem," he said at his Nebraska appearance.

Many House Republicans feel differently. House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., has said giving illegal immigrants citizenship amounts to amnesty for lawbreakers.

Further complicating the outlook for the immigration bill: a special election for a Southern California congressional seat that Republican Brian Bilbray won with a campaign that emphasized his opposition to illegal immigration. Angelo Amador, director of immigration policy for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which supports the Senate bill, says the Bilbray election may have given Republicans cold feet about striking a deal on immigration: "They're going back and forth trying to decide what's best for them."

Kennedy called Hastert's decision a "cynical delay tactic."

Immigration Bill May Be Delayed By Public Hearings (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- House Republicans will hold public immigration hearings around the country in August, a move that clouds the prospects for Congress to complete overhaul legislation before the November elections.

The decision effectively throws the issue, on which both the Senate and House have voted, back to the debate stage rather than advancing it with intensive negotiations for the two chambers to try to bridge their vast differences. It also reduces the chance that a compromise will be reached this fall, when campaigning for re-election will become the focal point for many lawmakers.

House leaders said they want more public input on immigration. They also plan to use the hearings as a platform to highlight what they say are the most objectionable policies in the Senate bill, which they have taken to calling the "Kennedy bill" despite substantial support from Republican senators. For example, House members will discuss the Social Security benefits that illegal immigrants would be able to collect under the Senate plan once they become citizens, a House Republican aide said.

Speaker Dennis Hastert said the House is "not putting any timeline" on completing the immigration bill. "I think we need to get this thing done right."

Dozens of hearings are expected later this summer in Washington and in cities around the country. Some lawmakers said the hearings would bolster their argument that the public wants increased border security and enforcement before Congress moves ahead with a Senate-backed plan to expand guest-worker programs and grant citizenship to millions of illegal immigrants in the U.S.

"I haven't heard a lot of pressure to have a path to citizenship" for illegal immigrants, Mr. Hastert said.

Senate Democrats blasted the House for impeding progress on an issue that is near the top of the public's concerns. "We have had 2½ years of hearings. We know what the problem is," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.). "Holding additional hearings ... is the wrong way to go."

Republican senators said the move was unusual, but not necessarily the end of progress. "It could be helpful," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.), a supporter of the Senate legislation. "It depends on what they want to accomplish. ... The jury's still out."

The Senate bill hasn't yet been sent to the House, because of procedural hurdles -- a fact House leaders said was a reason progress has been stalled. Attempts to get around the procedural problems by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) have been stymied by Democrats and Republican opponents of the immigration bill.

Democrats, however, disputed that they remained an obstacle. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) said he and his colleagues "are ready to go into conference."

GOP Plans Hearings On Issue Of Immigrants (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

In a move that could bury President Bush's high-profile effort to overhaul immigration law until after the midterm elections, House GOP leaders yesterday announced a series of field hearings during the August recess, pushing off final negotiations on a bill until fall at the earliest.

The announcement was the clearest sign yet that House Republicans have largely given up on passing a broad rewrite of the nation's immigration laws this year. They believe that their get-tough approach -- including building a wall along the border with Mexico and deporting millions of illegal immigrants -- is far more popular with voters than the approach backed by Bush and the Senate, which would create a guest-worker program and allow many illegal immigrants to apply for U.S. citizenship.

House GOP leaders said yesterday that several committee chairmen will hold field hearings in congressional districts in the Southwest, the South and other areas where the issue of illegal immigration is especially potent. Those hearings will take place before the start of the formal negotiating process between the House and Senate, which could take months to complete given the complexity of the issue and the competing business, labor and social concerns.

"I'm not putting any timeline on this thing, but I think we need this thing done right," Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said after a House leadership strategy session.

Senate negotiators played down the hearings, noting that informal talks had already started between the House and the Senate. "There's a general recognition that we need a bill," said Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), a key backer of the Senate legislation. "We're going to get together. We're going to sit down and try to work it all out."

Asked whether a deal could be struck with the Senate this fall, in the throes of a difficult reelection season, House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) allowed: "I think that's possible. I don't know how likely it is."

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino sought to put the House announcement in a positive light, saying the field hearings could "possibly provide an opportunity to air out issues" that she conceded are "complex." But she added: "The president is undeterred in his efforts to pass comprehensive immigration reform."

Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), who is leading the fight against the Senate plan, said: "Odds were long that any so-called 'compromise bill' would get to the president's desk this year. . . . The nail was already put in the coffin of the Senate's amnesty plan. These hearings probably lowered it into the grave."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), one of the main authors of the Senate plan, called the announcement "a cynical delaying tactic."

The House move was widely viewed as a slap at Bush, who is seeking a comprehensive immigration bill along the lines of the one approved by the Senate on May 25, which would tighten border controls, establish a guest-worker program for future immigrants and offer most of the nation's estimated 12 million illegal residents a chance to become citizens. The announcement came shortly after Bush left on a trip to Europe.

House Republicans have long frowned upon the president's approach. In December, they passed a bill that would tighten border controls, clamp down on employers who hire undocumented workers, and declare illegal immigrants and those who assist them to be felons. Their position was solidified this month after Republican Brian Bilbray defeated Democrat Francine Busby by running against Bush's immigration plan in a hard-fought special election to replace imprisoned former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.).

Since then, House leaders have dragged their feet on naming negotiators to a House-Senate conference to reconcile the chambers' two bills. The field hearings, which will be conducted through Labor Day, will be held at the discretion of the chairmen of the Judiciary Committee, the Homeland Security Committee, the Government Reform Committee and any other House committee that can demonstrate tangential jurisdiction over immigration, GOP leaders said.

GOP aides said the topics could include the Senate's decision to allow undocumented workers to keep Social Security benefits earned while they worked in the country illegally; the Senate requirement that illegal workers be required to pay taxes on three of their last five years of income to become eligible to apply for citizenship; and the assertion that the Senate plan could allow as many as 100 million new immigrants into the country over the next 20 years.

"We clearly want to solve this problem," said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio). "But the House bill is very different than the Senate bill, and I think we want to have a clear understanding of what is in that bill."

The field hearings "will be about forming a credible strategy and a credible plan to secure the borders," said Rep. Eric I. Cantor (R-Va.), the House GOP's chief deputy whip. "That's what the issue is. Once we can accomplish that, we can begin to talk about the rest of the equation, the 12 million illegals here, et cetera."

Hastert added: "Right now, I haven't heard a lot of pressure to have a path to citizenship."

Immigration Bill Chances Fading (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, June 21, 2006

Prospects for a comprehensive immigration bill reaching President Bush's desk this year appeared to dim significantly Tuesday after House GOP leaders announced plans for an unusual set of field hearings on the Senate-passed immigration plan.

Though the details are still being crafted, House Republican Members and aides said they expected a series of hearings to be held in July and August by several different House panels — a timetable that would delay any House-Senate agreement on a conference report into at least September.

No Republican in either chamber would say publicly Tuesday that the immigration bill was dead for the year, but nor could anyone explain how or when a deal might be reached this fall given the looming November elections.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said last week that "if people are serious about doing an immigration bill this year, it really needs to be finished before the August recess."

Asked Tuesday whether a bill could still reach Bush's desk this year given the new plans for field hearings, Boehner said, "Maybe."

House Republican Policy Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.) said he didn't "think anyone has closed the door on a permanent solution, but it's important that the committees get out of Washington and see the border."

Republican leaders expect at least eight committees to hold hearings this summer, both on Capitol Hill and around the country. They include Resources, Government Reform, Homeland Security, Judiciary, Intelligence, Ways and Means, International Relations and House Administration.

"There are policy issues in the Senate bill that stretch across a wide array of committees," Boehner said.

The decision by House Republicans to schedule hearings — an unusual move given that the immigration bill is already in conference — signifies their willingness to run for re-election in November on the strength of the enforcement-focused House bill and their unwillingness to give any ground to President Bush and the Senate, which passed a broader measure that includes a guest-worker program.

"House Republicans want a strong border security bill and will not be pressured into just getting any bill done during an election year," said Ron Bonjean, spokesman for Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.).

Bonjean said Hastert wants committee chairmen to report the results of their hearings to him after the August recess. Then he could "look at appointing conferees in September," Bonjean said.

When they passed their bill last December, House Republicans were convinced that their measure would be popular with the public and have become more convinced in the intervening months, as they review polling data that they say suggests voters are now able to distinguish between the two chambers' approaches.

"Generally speaking, House Members are pretty comfortable with the House position," Putnam said.

House GOP aides said Tuesday that they expected the hearings to serve in part to highlight what they view as the most unpopular elements of the Senate measure. And in an effort to further frame the political debate, House Republicans have recently taken to calling the Senate bill "the Kennedy bill," a reference to the co-author of the Senate measure and favorite conservative villain, Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.).

Reaction to the House move among Kennedy's Senate colleagues was mixed, however.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), who opposed the Senate version and supports a stronger enforcement bill, said the House hearings were welcome news and that he hoped they would help strengthen his position, and ensure that the Senate's bill doesn't emerge as law.

"Obviously it moves the timetable back," Cornyn said. "But that's more important than to pass this bill prematurely, before Senators and Members of Congress understand what exactly is in it."

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), who supported the Senate reform measure, said it is unclear whether the hearings will help or hurt the bill's chances for passage this year, but he hopes they serve as an avenue to answer outstanding questions and improve public understanding.

"I'm cautiously optimistic," Graham said.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) charged that Congressional Republicans aren't interested in advancing a bill at all this year, and called the hearings the latest political tactic to meet that end. "This is a stall," he said.

"Every day the Republicans delay going to conference — they've delayed it for five weeks — it makes it more difficult to get a bill," Reid said.

House GOP supporters of a comprehensive bill, who are outnumbered within their own Conference, reacted to Tuesday's news with dismay.

"Americans don't want more hearings on immigration reform; they want a bill," Rep. Jeff Flake (Ariz.), a leading GOP proponent of a guest-worker plan, said in a statement. "The longer we wait to appoint members to the conference committee, the more difficult it becomes to produce a bill. That may be the aim of some in the House, but that's certainly not the sentiment of most Americans."

Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), who has been pushing his own compromise measure, said that House Members "would do well to expose the Senate bill for what it is."

"I think job one for House Republicans should be to expose and dismantle the amnesty bill proposed by the Senate," Pence said. "I still hope we can have a compromise bill with no amnesty."

GOP's Call For Hearings Puts Immigration Overhaul In Limbo (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

WASHINGTON — President Bush's push for a sweeping overhaul of immigration laws was dealt a major blow Tuesday when House Republican leaders announced they would hold public hearings on the Senate bill that they strongly oppose.

The plan, unveiled almost a month after the Senate measure passed, is the latest sign of reluctance among the GOP House leadership to try to negotiate a compromise bill that would include a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants. Conservatives say that element — a central part of the Senate measure — is the equivalent of amnesty.

House leaders insisted Tuesday that they still hoped to negotiate with the Senate. But the schedule for the hearings, set for July and August across the country, makes it unlikely that the two chambers can reach a final agreement before the November elections.

When Congress reconvenes in September, most lawmakers will be preoccupied with their campaigns; traditionally, little important business gets done at that time.

Failure to produce a bill would be a huge setback for Bush, who has prodded lawmakers to pass immigration legislation that — like the Senate legislation — would toughen border enforcement but also create a guest worker program and offer millions of illegal immigrants a way to gain legal status.

Democrats interpreted the House decision to hold town-hall-style meetings as an effort to stop the Senate legislation.

"The Republican House wants to defeat the immigration bill," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said. "This is a stall."

House Republicans denied the charge, arguing that they needed the time to review the legislation.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) "believes that we should focus on getting a bill done right and not be pressured by some during an election year," said his spokesman, Ron Bonjean.

He added that the House would select negotiators to work on a final bill only "after we go through the Senate … bill with a fine-tooth comb."

House leaders informed Bush of their plan a few days ago, aides said, although Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) had known about it for several weeks.

A spokeswoman for Frist, Carolyn Weyforth, said her boss welcomed the hearings and the desire of House members to have time to catch up on the Senate bill.

When asked whether he thought the call for hearings was an attempt to kill the Senate version, Frist said, "I don't think so."

But in announcing the hearings, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said one purpose would be to discuss "provisions in that bill that I have concerns about."

The move comes as Republicans are seeking to energize their core voters in the months before the midterm elections.

This month, Brian Bilbray, a Republican from Carlsbad in San Diego County, won the House seat vacated by disgraced Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham by campaigning almost entirely on the need to get tough on illegal immigration.

His victory encouraged House conservatives, who say border security and enforcement must come first.

Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), the leader of a 101-member caucus that advocates tough enforcement, interpreted the scheduling of the summer hearings as a sign that House leaders had little desire to try to find common ground with the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0036366

"Odds were long that any so-called compromise bill would get to the president's desk this year," said Tancredo, citing the tight legislative schedule and the distance between the House and Senate approaches to immigration. "The nail was already put in the coffin of the Senate's amnesty plan. These hearings probably lowered it into the grave."

Tancredo added that the hearings were designed to build support for an enforcement-only approach adopted by the House in a bill it passed in December.

"This is an issue that we can run on and win in November," Tancredo said. "By training Americans' focus on the Senate's amnesty pact, we'll create momentum for an enforcement-first bill after November. As more light is shed on the Senate's bill, more and more Americans find reasons to oppose it."

Boehner and his staff said that the hearing dates and locations had not been decided, but that they would involve several House committees that hold jurisdiction over different aspects of the bill.

Some of the hearings are expected to be held in areas in the South and Southwest where the immigration issue has been particularly divisive.

A Boehner spokesman detailed a few of the Senate provisions that might be examined in the hearings. They include a measure that would allow immigrants who gain legal status to receive Social Security benefits for work they did while illegal, and another that would require immigrants eligible for legalization to pay back taxes.

Even before the hearings were announced, progress on a final bill was stymied by a procedural problem that is blocking the Senate from choosing negotiators to work with the House.

Republicans and Democrats blame each other for the delay, which shows no sign of resolution.

Senate Republican aides said Tuesday that they doubted there would be much movement on the issue until the House hearings were completed. And some senators said they thought it was a good idea for the House to take the time to consider the Senate version.

"The problem with the Senate bill is that it is a tremendously important issue that had very little serious thought given to it," said Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.), who voted against the measure. "The House can provide the nation an opportunity to find out what's in the bill."

One architect of the Senate bill said that since the House had only debated enforcement measures, the hearings might offer members a chance to learn about a broader overhaul.

"I realize that the House has not addressed two of the three major aspects of the Senate bill," said Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.), who added that he was optimistic about the Senate's approach.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said some delay might help the chances of getting a bill with a guest worker program and path to legalization through Congress.

"My own view is that Republicans want to use it as a campaign issue," she said. "I think it is a good idea to let this thing settle for a while."

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), a critic of the Senate bill, said some Republicans wanted to put off the discussion until after election day, when Congress will likely hold a lame-duck session. He added that backers of the Senate bill would have to accept some compromise.

"I think it's clear the Senate will have to move closer to the House position to get it resolved," Cornyn said.

But many saw the hearings as an attempt to scuttle the immigration overhaul altogether.

"This is clearly a delay tactic by the House Republicans, who have been dead set against comprehensive reform from the beginning," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), an author of the Senate legislation. "One has to wonder why there are going to be continued hearings … other than just to delay and kill the bill."

It's Time To Cut And Run From 'Cut And Run' (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

Policy wonks of the left and right held a panel discussion at the National Press Club yesterday to ask the question: "Is Politics Brain-Dead?" Up on Capitol Hill, Congress was providing some clues.

Confronted with the tough issues -- Iraq, immigration, the minimum wage -- lawmakers weighed their options and then went with their default position: exchange taunts.

Not quite six minutes after the Senate chaplain prayed yesterday for God to use senators "as agents of your grace," Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) started the sloganeering. "If we break our promise and cut and run, as some would have us do, the implications could be catastrophic," he said. In case anybody missed that, he also said "we can't cut and run" twice on CBS News and issued a follow-up press release titled: "FRIST DENOUNCES DEMOCRATS' PLAN TO CUT AND RUN."

Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) added: "If we cut and run in Iraq, what we will have done is prove what Osama bin Laden said."

Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), an expert windsurfer, had heard quite enough of this nautical term. "Cut and run, cut and run, cut and run, cut and run -- that's their phrase," he told Don Imus. "My plan is not cut and run. Their plan is lie and die."

Fox News was on the story. "John Kerry calls it 'lie and die,' " anchor Bill Hemmer told Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.). "What do you say to that?"

"I think the sound-bite war is not going to be an effective way to fight the war," the sensible senator said.

But Republican Party Chairman Ken Mehlman had a different view. "There's a debate going on within the Democratic Party," he said on CNN. "Some are saying we need to cut and run, others are saying we need to cut and jog, and still others are saying we need to cut and walk."

Mehlman's metaphor may have been muddled -- "cut and run" involves anchor cable and sail lashings, not the human leg -- but he had lawmakers' sentiments right. If Democrats were cutting and running from Iraq, Republicans were cutting and running from a minimum-wage increase and immigration legislation.

First thing yesterday morning, reporters were summoned to House Speaker Dennis Hastert's office, where GOP leaders were huddling. When the lawmakers emerged, they announced that, rather than having a conference with the Senate to negotiate compromise immigration legislation, they would hold another round of hearings.

Reporters pointed out that the delay meant that immigration legislation, so recently a priority for Congress, would probably not happen this year. And the GOP leaders did little to discourage that view. "We're not foreclosing the possibility," was all Rep. Deborah Pryce (Ohio) would promise, adding that this would postpone the issue at least until fall.

Rep. Roy Blunt (Mo.), the majority whip, concurred: "I don't know how likely it is."

Cut and run! "The Republican House wants to defeat the immigration bill," Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid (Nev.) crowed in front of the cameras. "Is this part of the Orwellian message we continually get out of this administration?"

Republicans quickly tried to change the subject from their immigration cut and run to the Democrats' cut and run on Iraq. House Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) held a news conference and declared that Democrats have "no plan at all to confront the real threat of terrorism and to achieve victory in a global war on terror."

But David Rogers, a Wall Street Journal reporter and Vietnam veteran, had prepared an ambush for Boehner. "In Vietnam, they used to put us out in these fire support bases and hope we would get attacked," he said. "Is that what you are doing? You are putting people in Iraq and hoping they get attacked so you can bring out the terrorists?"

"No, no," Boehner protested.

Over on the Senate floor, Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) was trying to insulate the party from the Republicans' cut-and-run charges on Iraq. He proposed a resolution "to express the sense of Congress that the government of Iraq should not grant amnesty to persons known to have attacked, killed or wounded members of the armed forces of the United States."

It was purely symbolic: The Iraqi government says it will not grant amnesty, and the minister who suggested it to The Washington Post last week resigned the next day. But the Iraq debate was all about symbolism, and Nelson's proposal was adopted, 79 to 19.

Next, when Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) introduced a proposal to increase the minimum wage, and Republicans introduced an alternative, Democrats didn't even pretend that legislation might be produced. "Both will fail," Reid spokesman Jim Manley said with confidence. So why bring them up? "It allows both sides to proclaim a modicum of victory."

As evening approached, Sens. Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and Jack Reed (D-R.I.) visited the Senate press gallery to talk about their proposal, to be introduced today, calling for the beginning of a withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq.

The inevitable question arose: Won't this immediately be branded "cut and run"?

"The wording is very clear: It's not a cut-and-run strategy," Levin protested. "Our amendment is not in any sense a cut-and-run amendment."

Added Reed: "Throughout this whole endeavor, there's been more sloganizing than planning." He suggested that Democrats come up with a taunt of their own for Republicans: "I guess their position is 'we're there forever.' "

Before nightfall, Democrats had drafted a new press release. Title: "Bush Republicans Plan to be in Iraq Forever."

House GOP To Hold Hearings On Senate Immigration Bill (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, June 21, 2006

Republican leaders in the House are organizing a series of committee hearings to examine Senate-passed legislation to restructure the country's immigration laws.

The leaders clearly intend these hearings to increase their leverage on the brink of a tense bargaining session with the Senate. A procedural measure has stalled the bill indefinitely, preventing leaders from naming conferees.

Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) convened a meeting in his conference room yesterday morning with most of his elected leadership and nine committee chairmen. None of the leaders or chairmen made an official announcement upon leaving the meeting but confirmed that committee hearings were in the works.

"We want to have hearings on this bill," Hastert told reporters yesterday. "I've asked the various chairmen to go out and have hearings so we understand what the American people are saying."

The immigration issue pits a majority of GOP lawmakers in the House against President Bush and a handful of Republicans in the Senate. Despite an uproar of opposition to the president's guest-worker plan, the administration continues to pressure Republican lawmakers in both chambers to support comprehensive reform.

Bush has toured the border in recent weeks with congressional Republicans, and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez is touring parts of New Mexico and Texas this week to push the president's comprehensive reform plan.

"We need to have comprehensive reform," Gutierrez said in a phone interview from Odessa, Texas. "In order to secure our borders, we need to secure our interior and enforce employers."

Gutierrez echoed Bush's contention that border enforcement is the primary goal of any reform measure but that it is impossible to address enforcement realistically without accounting for the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already in this country.

The commerce secretary said it is imperative for Congress to work together in resolving this complicated issue and find a workable solution on which all sides could agree.

"The fact that it is complicated is not a reason to delay," Gutierrez said. "It needs to be resolved as soon as possible."

The House hearings would begin in July and run through August, members said yesterday. The special sessions would be held both in Washington and throughout the country. House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said one goal of the hearings would be to address specific components of the Senate bill.

"We want to have a very clear idea of what is in the Senate bill and what some people think of some of the provisions in the Senate bill," Boehner told reporters during one of his regular weekly press briefings.

He pointed to language in the Senate bill granting illegal immigrants the benefits of in-state tuition as one example of a Senate provision he objects to. A senior GOP leadership aide in the House said members also oppose provisions in the bill written by Sens. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.) that would allow illegal immigrants to collect some Social Security benefits, as well as a provision that would require the undocumented workers to pay back taxes for just three of the five years leading up to their application for citizenship.

While a spokeswoman for Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) welcomed further inspection of the Senate measure by various House panels, Kennedy was less than enthused that House lawmakers want to inspect the Senate bill any more.

"This is clearly a delay tactic by House Republicans who have been dead set against comprehensive reform from the beginning," Kennedy said in a statement released by his office. "We face an immigration crisis, and we need prompt and comprehensive action to address it — not more hearings."

In addition to Hastert and Boehner, other GOP leaders attending the hour-long meeting included Majority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.); his chief deputy, Rep. Eric Cantor (Va.); Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (Ohio); National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.); and Policy Committee Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.).

Chairmen included the Judiciary Committee's James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.), who is expected to take the lead in the negotiations for Republicans in the House; Homeland Security's Peter King (R-N.Y.); Ways and Means' Bill Thomas (R-Calif.); Government Reform's Tom Davis (R-Va.); Resources' Richard Pombo (R-Calif.); Intelligence's Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.); and Administration's Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.).

Given the breadth of the committees involved in the discussions, neither the chairmen nor the leaders could give any details about which committees would handle the particular details.

"There are policy issues in the Senate bill that stretch across a wide array of committees," Boehner said.

By holding a series of hearings in Washington and elsewhere during the August recess, Republican leaders in the House are hoping to feed dissatisfaction with the bill, which would, in turn, give them more leverage heading into negotiations with the Senate.

Republican leaders would like to pass a bill increasing enforcement along the border and in the workplace before addressing an expansion of the current guest-worker plan, and most GOP lawmakers in the House are adamantly opposed to any provision that would grant eventual citizenship to workers who came to the United States illegally.

"We're feeling pressure from the Senate and the administration, but we don't feel we should pass something that Americans are upset about," Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said. "Our chairmen need to put this under a microscope."

Although the hearings could prevent Congress from moving any bill, Hastert said he remains committed to passing something soon.

"I'm not putting any timeline on this thing, but I think we need to get this thing done right," Hastert said yesterday. "I told that to the president the other day that we need to have that discussion."

Migrating From Farm Hand To Orchard Owner (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo

TIETON, Wash. — His name is Evaristo Silva, but the immigrant farm hands address him with reverence as Don Varo.

He once was one of them — a poor and desperate young man from Mexico who left behind a pregnant wife and three children and risked his life crossing the border on an illegal search for the American Dream. Now he is everything they aspire to be.

The farmworker became a farm owner, saving enough to buy a small apple orchard on the outskirts of Yakima. The illegal immigrant became a United States citizen, benefiting from the amnesty President Reagan offered to his generation of undocumented migrants.

"For me, this really was the land of opportunity," Silva, 62, said as he walked along the tidy rows of his red delicious apple trees. "In Mexico, I would wake up on many days without knowing how I was going to eat. I may not have much here, but I am so much better off than I would have been if I had stayed."

But now that the campesino is a ranchero, and needs illegal immigrants to pick and prune his apple orchard, he has found that they don't need him any more to succeed in America.

Silva now wants to end illegal immigration. He wants an expanded guest worker program so that farm owners like him could still benefit from the cheap labor of Mexican workers. The foreigners could come into the U.S. to work harvests, but would then have to go home.

He feels this way despite understanding that such a radical shift — most fruit pickers are illegal immigrants — would separate fathers from their families every growing season, and guarantee that younger field hands never get the opportunities he had.

"Everything has a limit," Silva said in Spanish, the language he's most comfortable speaking. "People who are working and have been here a long time should be allowed to stay. But if half of Latin America keeps coming — Hondurans, Salvadorans, Mexicans — you will reach a point where we don't all fit."

Silva's new stance on immigration is largely based on his own bottom line. Yakima Valley apple growers are struggling to survive because they face global competition from farmers in China and Chile who undercut their prices.

Silva is having a hard time finding field hands willing to work for $8 to $10 an hour — the most he and other farmers say they can afford — because illegal immigrants can now earn more as year-round construction workers and janitors.

Silva scrounged up a crew last year to harvest his 40 acres, but other farmers were less fortunate: Some of their apples rotted on the trees. Still, low apple prices have so eroded Silva's profits that for the last two years, he has not been able to make payments on his orchard.

Without a guest worker program, the farm hand turned farm owner believes he will lose his land.

As Silva toured his orchard, tugging wayward branches at just about every step, he marveled at how much he had accomplished since sneaking into the U.S. three decades ago.

A small man with evocative brown eyes, graying hair and a bushy mustache, Silva wore a red-check flannel shirt, faded blue jeans and brown work boots. Somewhat jarringly, he also wore a yellow construction helmet, a habit he picked up as a field hand worried that a falling apple might thump him in the head.

His had not been an easy life, he conceded; he was sometimes "treated like another piece of farm equipment" in his years as a farmworker. But as he surveyed his family's homestead amid the gently rolling hills of his apple orchard, he stopped and said, "I have lived a beautiful life."

Silva is a native of Pajacuaran, a poor old farming town in the Mexican state of Michoacan. Generations of men from his town — including Silva's father, Jesus — have illegally entered the U.S. to work the fields. Their wages, often just a few thousand dollars a year, were princely compared with what the same work would pay in Pajacuaran.

Silva started out working the harvests in America and returning home each year. But after he nearly died crossing the desert east of San Diego in 1972, he got scared of crossing back and forth and decided to stay in the U.S.

A devout Roman Catholic and devoted family man, Silva lived away from his children for so long that when two of them unexpectedly showed up on his doorstep one day, he did not recognize them. The memory of it made him cry. "At the time my children needed me most, I was away," Silva said, wiping away tears. Apologizing, he continued: "But it was out of necessity."

The entire family eventually reunited in Washington, where Silva followed in his father's path and found plentiful work as an apple picker. His children also became citizens; his wife, Maria, became a legal resident.

"When my husband first told me he was in Washington — to me, a Mexican, it sounded very cold, like he was at the end of the world," Maria said with a smile. "But we have really done well here as a family. This is our home now."

Don Varo belongs to a generation of migrant field hands that has transformed the Yakima Valley into a postmodern melting pot east of the Cascade Range. Yakima County's population in 1990 was 188,823, and was less than one-fourth Latino. A decade later, its population grew by 34,000, and about 27,000 of the newcomers are Latinos, according to U.S. census figures.

Side by side with the burger joints and rib shacks on Yakima's increasingly urban thoroughfares, restaurants sell authentic antojitos Mexicanos, or Mexican small dishes, and a popular downtown supermarket called La Bodega Yakimex features ethnic delicacies such as nopales, an edible part of the prickly pear cactus.

Although Latino immigrants have been praised for creating a bustling small-business community that has invigorated the Yakima Valley, they have also been blamed for higher crime, as well as overcrowding in some of the city's oldest neighborhoods, where it is common for several immigrant families to share a single worn-out bungalow. Numerous street gangs roam Yakima, and their graffiti brands venerable buildings with crude monikers such as "Original Loko Boyz" and "Can't Stop Mexicans."

"It wouldn't be so bad if migrant laborers did what they used to do: work, pick up and go home. But the current system, where they bring their families and stay, has the potential to bankrupt us," said John Tierney, a former state trooper who is chairman of the Yakima County Republican Party. "If you talk to people who've been here a while, including the legal Latino immigrants, many will tell you we have seen an erosion of quality of life."

Silva's hometown of Tieton, about 15 miles northwest of Yakima, is just a few streets of modest bungalows and a handful of agricultural packinghouses surrounded by family owned orchards. It has not escaped the changes, or the resulting friction. But it is still a sleepy backwater of 1,150 people.

For Silva, it is everything he wanted: He and his wife, the children and their families all live within a few hundred feet of one another amid his apple trees.

At the crest of the road from his old ranch house sit two boxy manufactured homes, with satellite dishes pointing skyward and bicycles and plastic toys strewn where grandchildren had left them. One is the home of his oldest daughter, Maria, who is studying to become a beautician; the other is the home of his only son, Evaristo Jr., who owns a carpet and tile business.

At the bottom of the slope in a weathered gray farm cottage lives Lucia, who runs her own day-care center. Another daughter, Lupe, a church secretary, lives down the road in a large trailer. "I am who I am," she said, "because of the United States."

Adriana, the youngest, who was born in the U.S., is living with her parents while she attends community college to become a dental hygienist.

Silva's children range from 19 to 38 years old. He has 11 grandchildren, with another on the way, and he has high hopes for them all — that they become engineers, doctors or lawyers. His own education, he reminds them, ended after fifth grade so he could help support his family.

Silva's six brothers also sneaked across the border in search of a better life, and all live legally in America now, part of an extended family of more than 250 parents, children and grandchildren. When they all go together, the Silvas fill a Yakima Valley Catholic church. When they gather for Christmas, they rent a conference hall.

By American standards, the Silvas' standard of living remains modest at best. But as Silva's wife, Maria, likes to say, even average Americans "live like the rich of Pajacuaran."

The five varieties of apple trees Silva planted a decade ago are now mature, and they bear beautiful fruit. They grow sweet yellow-specked gala apples, big golden delicious apples, heart-shaped red delicious apples.

But they don't bring Don Varo much money.

The first few years were good — the trees made him a sweet profit. But the market for Washington apples went into a slump, and Silva has fallen more than $40,000 behind on his land payments.

The old farmer he is buying the land from is sympathetic, and patient. Still, Silva wonders how much longer he can continue. He had hoped to leave the land to his children. Now he thinks he may only be able to keep their homes.

"What Evaristo has, that is probably the lowest number of acres you can have and still make a living," said a neighboring farmer, Tony Pottratz, as he stopped his tractor to chat with Silva.

Pottratz didn't mention it, but he was helping the Silvas put Adriana though college by paying $500 toward her tuition every semester. She would be the first in the family with a college education.

Silva had hoped to ease into retirement; instead, to pay his bills he is driving a tractor for a larger grower. His wife still works the early shift at a fruit packing plant.

As he cut through another neighbor's rows of cherry trees on the walk home, Silva ran into a crew of Mexican field hands clipping branches. The younger men were clumsily performing a task Silva had mastered, and he began to give them unsolicited advice, telling them to trim some stems that had grown too close together.

"This man here with me, he is with la migra. He has some questions for you," Silva said in jest. The workers did not laugh.

Silva started talking about illegal immigration. He told them he supported tightening the borders and limiting opportunities to guest programs that required workers like them to return home.

"You all no longer want to do this kind of work, and I understand, because you can hardly pay your bills," Silva said. "But you can go to work for a factory," while farmers have no choice but to find ways around labor shortages.

"Let the Americans come and do this," a laborer chimed in with a grin before going back to work.

Most of the men kept trimming, but one, clad in a soiled Central Washington University sweatshirt and a baseball cap emblazoned with the letters "Mexico," turned around.

"If you want us here to work, you should give us a chance to become citizens," said Jesus Estrada, 50, a father of eight children who lives with his family in Yakima year-round. "Coming here to work and then being forced to go home again — that's not opportunity."

"If it keeps up like this, people won't fit here anymore," Silva said of illegal immigration. "Have you seen the graffiti in Yakima? They are having urban problems there, gang problems. It was never like that before."

"You used to see migrant workers from California, even Texas, up here during the harvest," said Estrada, who has been pruning local apple orchards for 20 years. "But now you owners are paying $7 an hour, $8 an hour, and that is just not enough to live."

"When you are a worker, I know, it does not sound like a lot," Silva said, "but if you are a ranchero like me, believe me, it is a lot."

If farmers like him go broke, Silva said, there will be less work for men such as Estrada.

If workers like him cannot earn enough to pay their bills as field hands, Estrada countered, they will not travel to Yakima as illegal immigrants or legal guest workers, and the labor shortages will only get worse.

As a chilly breeze blew, the two men continued arguing for a few minutes, but it was clear that neither was going to change his mind. The farmer went back to his apple orchard, and the field hand resumed trimming the cherry trees.

The GOP's Immigration Shame (LAT)

HOW CAN YOU TELL WHEN a governing party is running out of steam? When it controls all branches of government yet abandons even the pretense of addressing an issue most members claim is a "crisis."

That's what the GOP-led House did Tuesday in announcing that discussions over reconciling its enforcement-centric immigration bill with the Senate's legalization-focused version will be pushed back to September at the earliest, and only after completing more hearings. Instead of naming negotiators and attempting in good faith to bridge the chasm between the bills, House leaders are busy naming locations for "field meetings" that can deliver maximum demagogic effect in the run-up to the November election.

These meetings are nonsense. Congress held more than a dozen hearings on immigration last year before passing HR 4437. That punitive bill filled the streets with millions of protesters angry that it did little to address the nation's need for a legal supply of labor or the estimated 11 million-plus illegal residents of this country, besides turning them into felons.

The Senate version, a flawed piece of work in its own right after too many compromises, at least offered a system (however torturous) by which millions of underground workers could finally come into the open without fear of immediate incarceration or deportation. Most of the last-minute amendments to the Senate bill brought the legislation closer to the version passed by the House. But Republicans there prefer clinging to the dangerous fantasy that a massive, militarized wall must be approved before discussions can even begin over what to do with the millions of indispensable, but vilified, workers already here.

House GOP leaders can barely conceal their preference for divisive politics over sound policy. Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois has reportedly conveyed to President Bush that hard-line enforcement politics is polling particularly well this season. One Republican congressional aide told the Associated Press: "The discussion is how to put the Democrats in a box without attacking the president." This is what passes for Republican leadership nowadays.

Summer and fall will be gut-check time not just for Bush, who has tried in his vague though periodically eloquent way to make immigration reform his signature domestic accomplishment this year, or for pro-reform GOP senators such as John McCain of Arizona, but for the American people. When the vulnerable party in power chooses to adopt a campaign strategy that demonizes a class of people, how it fares will say much about who we are.

Twelve years ago, Republicans were swept into Congress on a platform bursting with energy and ideas, with many measures enacted within the GOP's first 100 days in power. If inaction and xenophobia are all the party has left, this could be its last 100 days.

The Terrible, Horrible, Urgent National Disaster That Immigration Isn't (NYT)

By Lawrence Downes

DOJ_NMG_0036373

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

Part 1: What's Wrong with "Getting Tough on Immigration"

I. Immigration, Oversimplified

The arguments made by hard-line critics of immigration reform are depressingly simple, which makes them simply depressing.

They boil down to this: the immigration problems we have today, and a vast array of other problems, begin and end with immigrants themselves, the people who have committed the offense of being here illegally — or just being here, period, in undesirable numbers, with undesirable habits and undesirable effects on the health of the nation.

Their presence here is seen as overwhelmingly if not entirely bad, an unpardonable offense for which American citizens are made to suffer.

In this view, the problem is not going to be solved by repairing a complex system of immigration laws and regulations, by tinkering with the economic machinery to find a better fit between labor demand and supply, or by being more diligent about enforcing existing rules about workplaces and hiring. And it certainly won't be solved by being creative or more welcoming and humane toward immigrants in a way that rewards their hard work and desire to participate in the system more fully.

It will be solved by keeping people out, and kicking people out. Do that, the restrictionists insist, and you will help resolve a host of other problems — the invasion of neighborhoods and street corners by Latino men; the upsurge of gangs and drugs; urban congestion and suburban sprawl; human trafficking; the demise of white European culture and values; the strain on jails, hospitals and schools, and the threat to the very stability of the United States.

It's no wonder some people compare immigrant workers to locusts, bacteria or an occupying army. If you could find a 250-year-old American to discuss this, he or she would tell you how familiar this all sounds. Identical arguments were once made about Chinese laborers, Japanese-Americans, Roman Catholics, the Irish, Italians, and the original unloved — though fully documented — outsiders, African-Americans. Let's not even talk about American Indians.

II. The Disturbing Role Played by Fear

Many of those who favor a get-tough approach to immigration do not like having their arguments mocked and their tolerance questioned. They hate being dumped into the loony bin with Colonel Custer, the the Know-Nothings and the the Ku Klux Klan.

That is understandable. But xenophobia is not restricted to a fringe element within the anti-immigration movement. Panicky arguments about the dangers of immigration have been made by supposedly responsible people — including members of the United States House and Senate, and state, county and local officials around the country. United States Representative Tom Tancredo of Colorado may be the best-known xenophobe in Congress. He created an immigration caucus to further his firebrand views. It now has about 100 members and a Web site that is a one-stop shop for fear-stricken anti-immigration arguments.

One member of Mr. Tancredo's caucus is John Culberson of Houston, who issued a "Border Security Alert" last October warning that "Al Qaeda terrorists and Chinese nationals are infiltrating our country virtually anywhere they choose from Brownsville to San Diego." Besides that, he said, "a large number of Islamic individuals have moved into homes in Nuevo Laredo and are being taught Spanish to assimilate with the local culture."

Because of that, Mr. Culberson said, "Full scale war is underway on our southern border, and our entire way of life is at risk if we do not win the battle for Laredo."

The view of America as a nation under siege led the United States House last December to pass an immigration bill, sponsored by James Sensenbrenner of Wisconsin, that sees the problem as entirely an issue of enforcement. It would make it a federal crime to live in the United States illegally, which would turn millions of immigrants into felons, ineligible to win any legal status. It would also make it a crime for churches and social service agencies to shield or offer support to illegal immigrants. The debate in the Senate over immigration reform had its own low moments, including the successful passage of a non-sequitur amendment by Senator James Inhofe of Oklahoma to declare English the country's national language — an undisguised swipe at Latino immigrants and their supposed reluctance to assimilate. A guest-worker program in the Senate bill was sharply scaled back after the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank, issued a report warning that if the bill as written passed, the country could end up swamped with up to 193 million new legal immigrants within 20 years. That number, greater than the populations of Mexico and Central America combined, was hysterically off the charts. The bill was hastily amended and the estimates revised downward to a still unrealistic 66 million, or 47 million if you count only net new arrivals, not people already here who would be legalized.(The Congressional Budget Office, by contrast, projects 8 million net new migrants over the next 10 years under the Senate bill. The National Foundation for American Policy, counting newcomers and immigrants already here, studied the Senate bill and came up with a figure of 28.48 million over 20 years, or 1.42 million a year. That's a lot, but far less than the anti-immigration number masseurs would have you believe.)

If you dig into the widely discussed arguments connecting immigrants to things like rampant overpopulation or the demise the English language, you will discern the influence of any number of hard-line restrictionist immigration organizations. Scratch those groups, and underneath you will usually find a kook. There are usually not many degrees of separation from ostensibly rational, often-quoted organizations like the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which calls itself a nonprofit, nonpartisan organization dedicated to research and policy study, and people like its co-founder John Tanton. The Southern Poverty Law Center, which tracks hate groups, says that Mr. Tanton, a retired Michigan eye doctor, "is widely recognized as the leading figure in the anti-immigration and 'official English' movements in the United States."

A profile on the law center's Web site says: "In addition to FAIR, where he still is a board member, Tanton has been a central player in an array of anti-immigrant, nationalist groups and institutes, including Pro English, U.S. Inc., Center for Immigration Studies (CIS), U.S. English, and Numbers USA."

Who is this Mr. Tanton? He is someone who has depicted Latino immigrants as a horde of alarmingly procreative Roman Catholics of questionable "educability," and who runs a publishing company, Social Contract Press, that sells titles on immigration topics like "The Camp of the Saints," that have been denounced as racist and vile.

The Anti-Defamation League, in a 2000 report on FAIR, traced its nativist roots and offered what it called "a glimpse into how advocacy can cross the line into a divisive and troubling tendency toward scapegoating of the foreign born." It's worth reading.

FAIR and its allies are is hardly the only hard-core immigration foes out there, and their more unprintable opinions would be rejected passionately by great numbers of people in the enforcement-only immigration camp. But their influence is still significant: their arguments mirror the immigration talking points of many leading conservatives. And it shows just how much of the current panic has its source not in people's gray matter, but in their viscera.

III. An Array of Too-Costly Solutions

The restrictionists have a variety of clear-cut solutions. But the reassurance they offer those who worry about immigration is a false one, for a simple reason: their price tags are simply too costly for them to be seriously considered. Anyone who seriously proposes them is engaging in little more than demagoguery.

Take the restrictionists' favorite solution: deporting 'em all. It is a straw man in the debate, because only the most rabid talk-show callers would be willing to pay that price — $200 billion or more, at least double the Department of Homeland Security budget. And that cost does not even count the psychic toll it would take on our nation to rip immigrants out of homes and workplaces and schools and eject them. As unlikely as we would be to pay this cost once, it is even less likely we would be willing to pay it again and again, as we would no doubt have to as new immigrants arrived to replace the ones who were sent home.

Then there is the hard-liners' other favorite solution — fortifying the border, which any restrictionist will tell you is the most urgent priority of immigration reform. Billions have already been lavished at the southern border — California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas — in walls, patrols and technology. Since 1986, the border patrol budget has been raised 10 times, and the number of border patrol agents has gone up eightfold. The House of Representatives, in its disturbingly get-tough immigration bill, wants to erect a 700-mile wall, which will fatten a few powerful contractors' bottom lines by untold millions, and President Bush has already sent in the National Guard.

These price tags will only seem higher when measured against results.

We have already spent a lot on enforcement, and have precious little to show for it. A Wall Street Journal editorial[$] titled "The Border Brigades" noted that "U.S. immigration policy at least since the passage of the Simpson-Mazzoli law in 1986 and certainly since the 1990's has emphasized 'security' above all else." But this has not slowed illegal immigration in the least. The Pew Hispanic Center reports that the population of illegal immigrants has shown "steady growth" in recent years, which is putting it mildly. In 1986, the last time the country was consumed with a debate about immigration reform, the illegal population was estimated at 3 million. Today it's 11 million to 12 million.

Those who are wedded to the iron-fisted approach oppose any immigration reform that would ease pressure at the border by including a temporary-worker program or granting visas to legalize people already here and their relatives waiting to enter. They will not admit, or do not understand, that they are simply insisting on throwing good money after bad.

IV. Local Fear and Loathing

America's approach to immigration has to be worthy of a nation built on immigration, and dedicated to the ideal of equality. Unfortunately, the measures that are being implemented at the local level — where most of the action is occurring — look a whole lot like bullying and bigotry.

Cities and counties in California, Arizona, New York and elsewhere have enacted ordinances cracking down on day laborers, the most visible and vilified members of the immigrant population. That does not mean that illegal immigrants are not being hired. It simply means the government is making their harsh lives harsher. Day laborers have been subject to police harassment and illegal evictions. And that does not include the freelance hostility and abuse directed at them by abusive contractors, regular citizens, protesters and vigilante groups like the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps.

Other places are focusing on ripping immigrants out of the social fabric — passing rules that bar them from being helped by the society they are contributing to. In April, Gov. Sonny Perdue of Georgia signed one of the harshest anti-immigration laws in the country, a package of restrictions that, among other things, requires adults seeking state benefits to prove they are here legally, and state agencies to check every employee's immigration status. Never mind that much of Georgia's economic vitality stems from the immigrants operating its textile mills, picking its peaches, preparing its meals and building and tidying its expansive suburbs.

Some of these outbursts are merely silly. In Danbury, Conn., the mayor has cracked down on volleyball, a favorite pastime of Ecuadoran immigrants. Nashville tried to ban taco trucks but not, tellingly, hot dog stands. Silly, but mean-spirited.

V. Sending In the Police

Others local measures are more serious. The most wrongheaded of the local crackdown impulses may be the one to enlist state and local police to enforce immigration laws. Law-enforcement officials themselves hate it. City councils and police departments around the country are resisting efforts to make them shoulder what is and should remain a federal responsibility.

For example, Minneapolis and St. Paul's mayors and police chiefs have spoken out against a proposal by the Minnesota governor to enlist local police officers in immigration enforcement — and they are speaking for many other mayors and police chiefs who feel the same way. Chief John Harrington of the St. Paul Police Department told the St. Paul Pioneer Press that local cops were already buried in other work — like fighting violent crime — that was more urgent than checking people's immigration papers.

"The City of St. Paul doesn't have enough cops to handle the load of things we already have on the books, the basic city ordinances and statutes and those egregious federal crimes — drug trafficking, kidnapping, bank robbery — that we have now," Chief Harrington said. Checking up on immigrants, he insisted, would take his officers away from tracking down serious criminals, including sex offenders. He also argued that the cost of sending 550 officers for the six months of training that Immigrations and Customs Enforcement officials recommend could better be used fighting crime at home.

There is another way cracking down on immigrants hurts, rather than helps, in the fight against crime. As Chief Harrington and many others have pointed out, local police officers — unlike their federal counterparts — need the help of the community to do their jobs. Illegal immigrants are already a hidden population. Turning local cops against them will drive them further into the shadows. This will hinder investigations — witnesses will vanish, and criminals, uncaught and unpunished, will flourish.

Part 2: The Harder but Better Way

I. A 796-Page Attempt to Do Better

If the hard-liners trying to kill comprehensive immigration reform are a disciplined chorus singing one note, pure and bell-clear, the other side is more like a crowd struggling to pull together the "Messiah" in a stadium sing-along. They are an alliance of the dirt-poor and powerful, of plainspoken Republicans like Senators John McCain and Lindsey Graham and a lion-in-winter liberal, Edward Kennedy. They include business interests, some labor unions, editorial pages like this one and editorial pages not at all like this one. A diffident President Bush has been trying to fit in somewhere.

What unites these motley allies and distinguishes them from the hard-liners is their understanding that bountiful immigration is a blessing — a mixed blessing, but a blessing all the same. Their efforts to solve the problem lack clarity. They grapple with contradictions. Their approach, embodied in a 796-page brick of a Senate immigration bill, is at once punitive and forgiving. It throws money at the border but also includes a path to citizenship for many, though not all, of the illegal immigrants already here. It paves the way for millions more whose hopes of entering the country have been stymied, sometimes for decades, by bureaucratic backlogs.

Critics of the bill have called it unworkable and incomprehensible. They have a point. But flawed as it is, the Senate bill is the only one that acknowledges and seeks to enhance the contributions that immigrants make to this country's economy and culture. It's the only one that tries to enlist immigrants present and future, illegal and otherwise, in the job of making this country better. And therefore it is the only one with any hope of making the excruciatingly difficult and complicated cost-benefit equation of immigration end up in the black.

II. How Badly We Need Them

As a conduit for workers into this country, the existing immigration system is greatly out of balance with demand. The legal path for an unskilled worker to enter the United States is through one of about 5,000 visas issued for such workers each year, which means it is no path at all. The United States economy has adjusted, of course, by hiring temporary workers and illegal workers by the millions. The invisible hand doesn't ask for ID for the roughly 500,000 people who enter illegally each year.

Immigrants — legal and illegal — fill a vital niche in the American economy. They make up 12 percent of the United States population but 14 percent of its workers, according to the Congressional Budget Office. From 1994 to 2004, the agency said in a report last December, the number of foreign-born workers grew to 21 million from 13 million, a rise that accounted for more than half of the growth of the U.S. labor force. According to the American Immigration Lawyers Association, immigrants hold 40 percent of farming, fishing and forestry jobs in the United States, 33 percent of jobs in building and grounds maintenance, 22 percent of food preparation jobs and 22 percent of construction jobs. Tearing the approximately one third of those workers who are illegal away from their livelihoods and families would be ruinous to the economy, particularly the agricultural and tourism industries in states like California.

Throw away the arguments that immigrants are tax leeches. On the contrary. They pay more in taxes than they consume in services. They all pay sales taxes. Illegal immigrants who use fake Social Security numbers to get hired pay income and payroll taxes — but don't collect Social Security and are ineligible for Medicaid. The amount of unclaimed Social Security tax has more than doubled since the 1980's, to roughly $189 billion. Because immigrants tend to be younger and healthier than native born workers, they use government services more sparingly. A comprehensive study of immigration and its economic effects — "The New Americans: Economic, Demographic, and Fiscal Effects of Immigration," by James Smith and Barry Edmonston for the National Research Council in 1997 — summed up its conclusions this way: Because immigrants on average have less education than the native-born, they earn less and pay lower taxes. But immigrants also consume far fewer services. As a result: the average immigrant pays nearly $1,800 more in taxes than he or she costs in benefits, even when you factor in the cost of public education for his or her children.

The report emphasizes that the proper way to understand these expenditures is as an investment in America's future. In a country that absorbs about one million newcomers per year, each yearly cohort of immigrants pays $80 billion more in taxes over the course of a lifetime than it consumes in services. In other words, there is no economic crisis being caused by immigration — but there could be one if it came to a halt.

An open letter to President Bush and Congress made the rounds of the Internet last week. Signed by more than 500 economists in varied fields, including five Nobel Prize winners, it argues that immigration is a net economic gain for America and its citizens and "the greatest anti-poverty program ever devised."

III. Acknowledging the Costs

It would be wrong to argue that tighter enforcement has no place in sensible immigration reform, or that immigration does not bring with it an array of problems. There are all sorts of things that supporters of immigrants should — and do — own up to. It is not only good-hearted immigrant workers with sore feet, blisters and hungry families, for example, who pour across America's borders. Drugs, counterfeit goods and weapons do, too. No terrorists have been known to have entered from Mexico, but it could happen. If there were a realistic way of sealing the borders against all drug dealers, felons, and terrorists, we would certainly want to consider it. But there is not. Law enforcement should focus vigilantly on all of these, but the border is not where those battles will be won.

There is one conundrum of illegal immigration that is very real: the cost it imposes on people who would compete for jobs with undocumented low-skilled immigrants. It stands to reason — how could a job market absorb so many new people and not see wages fall? An often-cited study by two Harvard economists, George J. Borjas and Lawrence F. Katz, found that from 1980 to 2000, a wave of illegal immigration from Mexico had reduced the wages of high school dropouts in the United States by 8.2 percent.

But that study gave only a partial picture. It failed to account for the economic growth that immigrants cause — the many jobs that cheap immigrant labor creates, and the gaping demographic niche it fills. As Eduardo Porter pointed out in The Times in April, "Over the last quarter-century, the number of people without any college education, including high school dropouts, has fallen sharply. This has reduced the pool of workers who are most vulnerable to competition from illegal immigrants."

This is no consolation to the janitor in Los Angeles who has seen his job disappear, or the by-the-book contractor who can't compete with the fly-by-night operation that hires — and underpays and exploits — illegal day laborers by the truckload. Any serious attempt at immigration reform has to grapple with the fact that many Americans — young black men, among others — who have been overlooked and shunned in the job market for generations will likely continue to be overlooked. That is especially true as the economy hums along through the energy of immigrants, many of them illegal. If immigration decreases costs and increases the national prosperity, we need to find a way to make sure that those gains are shared with those on the low rungs of the economic ladder.

IV. Anger on the Ground

Farmingville, a working-class community on Long Island that has been utterly transformed by Latino immigration, is a prime example of the challenges that burgeoning immigration poses and the resentment it inspires. Longtime residents became acutely aware of the presence of dozens of Latino men on street corners and piling up in illegally subdivided rooming houses. This was a clear example of globalization at the local level, and to many in Farmingville the costs were obvious and unacceptable. Young men crowding the 7-Eleven parking lot, intimidating women and girls with sexually aggressive catcalls. Men urinating in the street, loitering and generally creating a nuisance of themselves. You couldn't talk to these people, and you couldn't make them go away.

They were the visible manifestation of broken borders, and some aggrieved people took it on themselves to solve the problem. They beat up workers and firebombed their homes. They held signs and marched. They harassed and heckled day laborers, they wrote letters and had meetings.

The Farmingville conflict is being repeated, in different forms, in communities across the United States. But the anti-immigrant activists in Farmingville accomplished nothing, unless you consider waging a successful battle against the creation of a day-labor hiring site a success. Five years after the furor erupted and became the subject of a well-regarded documentary, Farmingville has as many day laborers as ever. It doesn't have a hiring site.

V. The Cost Abroad

There are many books that document the hardship for Latinos migrating to El Norte. The book "Coyotes" by Ted Conover, a white journalist with a fondness for living his stories, is a good one. In villages where most of the young men go abroad, the result is a a reliable stream of remittances to their hometowns — $25.5 billion in 2003, according to the Congressional Budget Office — which is a vital source of revenue for poor countries.

But it also means that communities, particularly small ones in the south of Mexico and Central America, lose their brightest, best and strongest men and women for months or years at a time. The energy that could be expended in making a community grow or a local business prosper is spent in another country, and while cash is welcome, it is often a poor substitute for having children and spouses at home, as the toll in broken families attests.

VI. Uncertain Possibilities

The current immigration "system," if you can call it that, is broken. It's rich in perversities. So is the effort to fix it.

The House bill is simply noxious. The Senate alternative has some serious flaws. It attempts to divide the population of illegal immigrants into three groups, being relatively gentle on some immigrants and tough on others, depending on how many years they have been here. Millions of newer arrivals will have to volunteer to leave the country — to report to be deported. It's hard to imagine that a significant majority of them will ever do so. But in any case, it seems highly unlikely the full Congress could, in the current climate, pass anything as good as the Senate bill.

A significant number of pro-immigrant groups have already concluded that doing nothing — passing no immigration bill this year — would be better than passing some awkward hybrid of the existing Senate and House bills.

They may be right. With elections looming in November, the get-tough argument may have the upper hand. It is an approach supported by a majority of the House, backed up by thousands of constituents who have been making phone calls and mailing bricks (yes, actual bricks) to their elected representatives to drive the point home. But it's foolish to think that walling off America and reforming immigration through enforcement alone is anything but self-defeating.

It's not only because the costs of security are so high, or because the contributions that legal and illegal immigrants make to this country are so positive. Those who have been working as hard as the hard-liners have been to close this country off to people who came here to seek work and a future have a radically astringent vision of what this country should be. To militarize the border, to turn illegal immigrants into felons, means trying to reverse the polarity on the American magnet, to repel the people who have struggled, dreamed and died to get here.

It means turning this singular country into just another industrial power with a declining birthrate and a self-defeating antagonism to the foreign born. It means defining down what America stands for, no matter what the cost to the American economy, its traditions and values and moral standing.

It's dangerous. It's not rational. But the argument on the restrictionist side isn't about being rational. It's about being afraid.

TAX:

Guilty Plea In Denver Tax Fraud Scheme (DENVERBIZ)

Denver Business Journal, June 21, 2006

A Wyoming businessman has pleaded guilty for his part in a tax fraud scheme that began in Denver.

Russell J. Brown pleaded guilty in federal court in Seattle to aiding and assisting in the filing of a false tax return for Paul Bekins, the former president and majority owner of a Seattle moving company.

Brown and Bekins were both members of Tower Executive Resources, a Denver-based organization that helped its members evade paying federal income taxes, according to the U.S. Department of Justice. The organization helped its members set up offshore bank accounts and corporations to hide income from the Internal Revenue Service.

Taxpayers paid as much as $50,000 to join Tower, the justice department alleged.

Bekins previously entered a guilty plea. He was sentenced last year to six months of house arrest, followed by 18 months of supervised release and 300 hours of community service. The Justice Department said Bekins listed his "other income" in 1999 as $77,515 when it was actually $2.6 million.

The government said Brown helped Bekins avoid paying $1.3 million in federal income taxes.

Brown will be sentenced later this year.

Two promoters of Tower, Paul D. Harris of Elizabeth, and Lester R. Retherford of Cañon City, were convicted after a six-week trial on charges of conspiring to defraud the United States. Harris was sentenced to five and a half years in prison, followed by three years of supervised release. Retherford was sentenced to four years in prison followed by three years of supervised release.

Businessman Charged With $20 Million Tax Fraud (AP)

LOS ANGELES - A businessman who has donated hundreds of thousands of dollars to local colleges and nonprofits is accused of defrauding the government of more than $20 million in taxes.

Gene Haas, the 54-year-old owner of Oxnard-based Haas Automation, was arrested Monday for investigation of conspiracy, filing false tax returns and witness intimidation.

Charges filed by the U.S. Attorney's Office accuse him of orchestrating a plan to list $50 million in bogus expenses that could be written off as business costs and save the company $20 million in taxes. Haas, of Camarillo, was being held without bail.

Haas Automation, which makes computerized machine tools, said in a statement that Haas was not guilty and that the tax issues "revolve around" the company's former financial officer, John Phillips.

Last month, Haas Automation by default won a Ventura County Superior Court lawsuit accusing Phillips of cheating the company out of $27.5 million.

The transactions described in the lawsuit are among those listed in the federal indictment, said Peter Zierhut, a Haas Automation spokesman.

Phillips, who is an unindicted coconspirator, went to the FBI. in April 2001 claiming Haas had ordered him to cheat the government out of more than $8.9 million in taxes, the Justice Department said.

The owner of Supermill Inc., a nonexistent Nevada company that allegedly issued fake bills to Haas Automation, agreed to plead guilty to two tax evasion charges, the Justice Department said.

Haas Automation's former general manager, Denis Dupuis, and a former salesman, Robert Cable, also were indicted in connection with the purported scheme.

The company, formed in 1983, employs 1,000 people and had revenues of more than $500 million last year, said Robert Murray, the firm's general manager.

The New York Times described the firm as the nation's largest computerized machine tool maker.

House GOP Settles For Less Than Full Repeal Of Estate Tax (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

Republican leaders announced yesterday that the House will vote this week on estate tax legislation that falls short of full repeal, conceding defeat on a philosophical issue that has been central to the GOP economic plank for more than a decade.

The bill, introduced by House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (Calif.), marks a major turnaround for congressional Republicans, who for years have made "Death to the death tax" a political battle cry.

Ending the estate tax has also been a priority for President Bush, who in 2001 won passage of legislation that gradually raises the exemption and lowers the tax rate on inheritances until the tax is eliminated in 2010. But when that legislation expires in 2011, the estate tax is scheduled to return to the level it stood at before Bush was elected.

The Senate has blocked any effort to fully repeal the estate tax. Under the House's compromise, which probably will come to a vote tomorrow, estates worth as much as $5 million -- $10 million for couples -- would be exempt from taxation indefinitely.

The tax rate on estates worth more than the exemption level up to $25 million would be set at the same tax rates that apply to capital gains -- now 15 percent but scheduled to rise to 20 percent in 2011. The rate for estates worth more than $25 million would be twice the capital gains rate. The bipartisan Joint Committee on Taxation estimated the estate tax cut would cost the government $279 billion over 10 years.

To lure Democratic senators from Washington state and Arkansas, Thomas included a lucrative tax break for the timber industry, pushing the total cost of the bill to nearly $280 billion.

Senior House Republicans conceded that a long-sought permanent repeal of the estate tax is now out of reach. And with the possibility that Republicans will lose Senate seats in the midterm elections in November, GOP tax writers decided to grab the most lucrative deal possible in case Republican power begins to ebb.

"The sales message is very simple," Thomas said. "Do you want to make a statement, or do you want to make law?"

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) conceded, "We need to do what is reality, what you can get done with the Senate."

Senators set the scramble for compromise in motion earlier this month when they fell three votes short of cutting off debate on legislation to permanently repeal the estate tax. That convinced the groups that have lobbied the issue for decades -- small-business groups, agriculture associations and extremely affluent families -- that the time had come to settle.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) took the unusual step last week of asking Thomas to intervene, hoping House passage of a generous compromise would create the momentum needed to attract 60 votes in the Senate required to cut off debate. Frist has promised a vote on a compromise next week.

But passage is anything but certain. Republicans probably have the votes in the House, but Democrats will use the debate this week to highlight what they see as a flagrant GOP tilt to the rich.

House Democrats plan to offer a minimum-wage increase -- the first since 1997 -- as the alternative to the estate tax bill.

The search for a compromise has pitted affluent small-business owners against the truly rich -- families with estates valued at tens of millions of dollars.

Thomas came down in favor of the business owners. His legislation would ensure that married couples could leave their children estates worth $10 million, untaxed. But the most wealthy families could face estate taxes as high as 40 percent. And to trim the cost of the package, Thomas repealed a provision in the tax code that allows families with large inheritances to deduct the cost of state-levied death taxes from the federal estate tax.

To the powerful families that have bankrolled the estate tax repeal movement, Thomas's compromise may be too much to swallow, suggested Frank A. Blethen, publisher of the family-owned Seattle Times newspaper and a longtime advocate of repealing the estate tax.

"If this bill is what it looks like, a 40 percent tax on larger businesses, that's not much of a deal," Blethen said. "It is a huge disappointment."

Knowing how tight the vote would be, Thomas included a narrowly tailored measure, sought by Washington state's two Democratic senators, to offer strapped timber companies a two-year tax break worth $940 million.

Spokesmen for the senators, Maria Cantwell and Patty Murray, said the legislation is still being studied.

Timber Becomes Tool In Effort To Cut Estate Tax (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 20 — In a new attempt to permanently reduce the estate tax on inherited wealth, House Republican leaders moved on Tuesday to win over crucial Democrats with a tax sweetener for timber companies.

Admitting that Congress would not be able to abolish the estate tax this year, House leaders unveiled a compromise that would stop just short of full repeal and would give the Senate another chance to take up the issue.

The latest proposal would eliminate the tax for all estates worth less than $5 million — up to $10 million for couples. That would cover more than 99.5 percent of estates, according to Congressional estimates. In addition, the compromise would reduce the tax rates on the few estates that would still be subject to a tax.

"We need to do what is reality, what you can get done with the Senate," said Representative J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, the House speaker. "We just want to bring death to the death tax."

The Republican-controlled House has already passed a bill that would permanently abolish the estate tax, which under current law is set to phase out gradually by 2010 and then return in full force in 2011. But in a crucial procedural vote on June 8, Senate Republicans came up 3 votes short of the 60 needed to limit debate and prevent a filibuster by Democrats. That vote forced Republicans to consider a compromise.

The House proposal is aimed at giving Senate Republican leaders another chance of passing legislation. Last week, Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, acknowledged that he could not pass a full repeal bill and would wait until the House voted on a new proposal before trying again in the Senate.

The House bill is similar to a compromise that Senate Republicans circulated two weeks ago, without success. But it includes a tax cut that would save timber companies about $900 million over the next three years, a new twist that could win as many as four more Democratic votes in the Senate.

The provision would reduce the corporate capital gains tax, which is assessed on sales of timber, to about 14 percent from 35 percent. Two of the timber industry's strongest advocates are the Democratic senators from Washington — Patty Murray and Maria Cantwell — who both voted with other Democrats against blocking a filibuster on the estate tax.

The Weyerhaeuser Corporation, the giant paper and forest products company, is based in Federal Way, Wash., and the state is a major timber-producing area.

Other Democratic Senators — Mark Pryor and Blanche Lincoln of Arkansas and Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana — were co-sponsors of a similar timber tax cut last year.

Ms. Lincoln voted with the Republicans to limit debate earlier this month, but Mr. Pryor and Ms. Landrieu refused to cross party lines.

"We are a railroad car attached to the main engine," said W. Henson Moore, president of the American Forest and Paper Association, which has been lobbying for the tax cut for more than a year.

Mr. Moore, a former congressman from Louisiana, said timber companies paid a capital gains tax of 35 percent on their profit from timber — a rate, he said, that is higher than rivals in other countries pay.

"It's extremely important to us," he said. "If something is not done, it could mean that a number of our companies divest their timberlands."

The Joint Committee on Taxation estimated that the new House proposal for reducing the estate tax would lower tax revenue by $280 million in the first five years after it became effective in 2011. Under current law, the estate tax is set to phase out gradually by 2010, but return in full force in 2011.

Though billed as a compromise, the measure would cost about three-quarters as much as full repeal of the estate tax. The timber provision in the measure is set to expire at the end of 2008, but industry executives fully intend it to be renewed regularly.

House Republicans vowed to pass the new bill before the end of this week. Mr. Frist said he wanted to pass a bill before lawmakers headed home for the Fourth of July recess.

But James Manley, a spokesman for Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Senate Democratic leader, said most Democrats would oppose the new compromise as vehemently as the previous proposals.

"If there's a bill that is fiscally responsible and fair to the middle class, then we're for it," Mr. Manley said. "But this bill would cost well over $700 billion in the first 10 years after it takes effect and it would only benefit the wealthiest individuals and households."

IRS Collects Only 11% Of Fines On Tax Preparers (USAT)

USA Today, June 21, 2006

The IRS has collected little more than 10 cents of every dollar in fines it assessed since 2003 on tax preparers who made unsupported claims or egregious mistakes on clients' tax returns, its data show.

During the last three fiscal years, the IRS fined 528 tax preparers roughly $4.7 million for taking unsubstantiated deductions, cashing clients' tax refunds or other violations of tax laws.

But a USA TODAY review found the agency has so far collected about $518,000 of the penalties, or 11%. Roughly half the penalized preparers have paid nothing, while half have paid some or all their fines, according to the IRS.

The penalties largely represent cases the IRS handled administratively without court action.

Evidence of the low dollar collection rate — down slightly from the percentage found by a government review of prior years — surfaces amid concern that tax preparer mistakes, negligence and fraud may be rising as paid preparers complete more than 60% of individual tax returns.

Tax experts say the low rate, and tax law confidentiality restrictions that prevent the IRS from publicly identifying many penalized preparers, undercut the agency's efforts to crack down on problem preparers who cost the government millions of dollars in revenue. They also highlight limited IRS oversight.

"There's no deterrent effect if there's a one-in-10 chance of collecting a penalty," said National Taxpayer Advocate Nina Olson, whose IRS office critiques the agency and helps taxpayers resolve problems. "You can build that into your business model as a cost of doing business."

Congress is weighing legislation that could strengthen IRS oversight of tax preparers, in part by authorizing higher penalties. Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., the lead sponsor of the Senate bill, said "the opportunity for mistakes and abuse increases" as more Americans turn to preparers.

While defending his agency's efforts to stop problem tax preparers, Kevin Brown, commissioner of the IRS Small Business/Self-Employed Division, said, "I suspect we can do more with this, and do it better."

"We have to be more rigorous to make sure we impose and collect fines, where appropriate," he said.

IRS officials say they believe most of the nation's hundreds of thousands of tax preparers are honest and competent. However, a test by the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, found that five of 19 tax preparer offices checked in March by undercover agents produced federal tax returns with nearly $2,000 in unwarranted refunds. In two cases, the offices prepared returns that would have cost a taxpayer client a legitimate $1,500 refund.

Although the GAO cautioned that the results from the limited sampling could not be used to draw general conclusions about the retail tax preparation community, Brown said the findings "gave us pause."

Olson said she doesn't suspect a significant increase in fraud or negligence by preparers. However, she said increasing use of tax software means "that literally anyone can get into the tax preparation business" without learning "anything about tax law," posing a danger to taxpayer clients.

An estimated 600,000 so-called unenrolled tax preparers, who are largely unregulated and have no training requirements, worked in the USA as of 2003, according to an estimate by Olson's office. By law, the IRS has authority to penalize tax preparers who overstate legitimate tax deductions, fail to give clients a copy of their return, fail to sign the return, engage in reckless conduct or commit other tax law offenses. Penalties range from $50 to $1,000 per return, Brown said, depending on the severity of the offense.

The IRS says it is paying more attention to problem preparers, doubling the number of open cases during the last year. The emphasis came after the IRS told federal investigators in 2003 that other problems, such as targeting abusive tax schemes, were a higher priority.

Brown said in a recent interview that the fines in any given investigation may be low because the IRS generally reviews a small sampling of the tax returns produced by a preparer — enough to substantiate a case and enjoin the preparer from additional violations — then moves on to new investigations.

Even in cases when the IRS plans to impose and collect fines, the proposed penalties may be reduced based on evidence submitted by the tax preparer during an appeal process, or through litigation. The IRS may also write off the penalty as uncollectible if the preparer files for bankruptcy or is financially insolvent.

Alvin Brown, a former IRS attorney now in a private tax law practice, said at least some of the penalized preparers are "little guys in hand-to-mouth businesses" who cannot pay large fines without hardship.

A 2003 GAO report argued that "in assessing but not collecting these penalties, IRS may be sending preparers a mixed message about whether poor performance by preparers will be tolerated."

That report showed that the agency assessed approximately $2.4 million in penalties against tax preparers in 2001 and 2002, and collected roughly $291,000, or 12%. USA TODAY's review found that the overall dollar collection rate dipped lower during the ensuing three years, though it increased in 2004.

The percentage of preparers who paid at least some of the penalties rose from 44% for 2001-2002 to 50% for the next three years, the IRS said.

Kevin Brown said the dollar collection rates could rise as pending cases are closed and added to the statistics. Brown also said he plans to improve tracking of fines against tax preparers.

The IRS should take stronger action if it wants to show "they are protecting taxpayers," Olson said. She called on the agency to support proposals in which she and other tax experts have advocated universal registration of tax preparers, mandatory competency tests and a continuing education requirement on tax laws.

"This is an issue where it just makes sense to protect taxpayers at the front end" with stricter government regulation "and have appropriate penalties and collections on the back end," Olson said.

Current tax laws make it difficult for a taxpayer to find out whether a preparer has been penalized by the IRS. The same privacy shield that covers IRS interactions with taxpayers applies to tax preparers, unless IRS investigations escalate into civil or criminal court action. Citing the confidentiality restriction, the IRS declined to release any details of the cases that underlie the 2003-2005 fines.

Cono Namorato, a former head of the IRS Office of Professional Responsibility, said agency officials were often frustrated by confidentiality provisions of the tax code. "The fact that somebody was sanctioned, and we couldn't make that public, was a problem," he said.

The Senate measure would not lift the confidentiality restriction, though Bingaman said he would favor some form of public disclosure to protect taxpayers. The bill would mandate registration and competency testing for preparers, and would raise penalties for violations to as high as $5,000 per return.

Bingaman said he's hopeful that the proposed legislation, which has drawn bipartisan support from Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, and other Republicans, will win Senate approval this year. But the outlook in the House is less certain, he acknowledged.

Government licensing "has the potential to raise the (competency) bar. That's a good thing," Paul Cinquemani, director of government relations for the National Association of Tax Professionals, said of the Senate measure.

Still, he cautioned that licensing would not deter unscrupulous tax preparers.

"If the IRS enforced things better, it would have a chilling effect on some of the screwing around that's going on out there," Cinquemani said.

IRS Plans To Use Private Firms To Pursue Taxpayers This Year (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

Tax deadbeats who owe money to the Internal Revenue Service could be hearing from private debt-collection firms as soon as September.

IRS officials say they're resuming work on controversial plans to hire private firms to help collect large sums of unpaid taxes. The IRS said this week it received the green light to proceed with the project's first phase -- in which three firms will begin pursuing about 40,000 people -- when the Government Accountability Office, a congressional investigative agency, rejected challenges by companies not awarded IRS contracts.

But the program still faces heavy fire in Congress, and its long-term fate remains unclear. The House voted recently to block funding for the program in fiscal 2007, which starts on Oct. 1 of this year. The Senate hasn't yet acted.

Critics fear private debt-collection firms will trample on taxpayer rights and resort to questionable methods to collect unpaid taxes. They also say hiring collectors and paying them a percentage of what they collect will be far more expensive than relying on regular IRS workers. The House vote means "We are one giant step closer to saving hundreds of millions of dollars and safeguarding taxpayers' personal financial information from the grips of private, for-profit collection agencies," says Rep. Steve Rothman, a New Jersey Democrat who led the charge to strip the plan's funding.

IRS officials have promised to protect taxpayer rights. They say private collectors won't be allowed to threaten or intimidate. "Using private collection agencies would bring in extra money and help reduce the deficit," IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson said recently.

While tax collecting may sound like strictly a governmental function, many states have hired private firms over the years to help them collect tax debts, according to the GAO. In the mid-1990s, the IRS itself tried a small-scale pilot program involving private firms. But it dropped the program, partly because collections weren't as high as hoped. Then two years ago, amid growing concern about big budget deficits, Congress authorized the IRS to hire private firms.

A group representing debt collectors says fears about the program are misplaced. The IRS "is committed to hiring collection professionals who comply with a strict code of ethics and adhere to" safeguards in the law, says Rozanne Andersen, general counsel of ACA International, an association based in Edina, Minn., that represents the credit and collection industry. Taxpayers "are treated most fairly when nontaxpayers are encouraged to pay their fair share."

In this first phase of the project, the IRS is hiring three firms to begin pursuing about 40,000 people, each of whom owe the government $25,000 or less, says Nancy Mathis, an IRS spokeswoman. In each case, the person doesn't dispute owing the money, Ms. Mathis says.

The IRS plans eventually to hire as many as 10 firms by 2008, when the program will be fully operational, Ms. Mathis says. Over the course of 10 years, the IRS expects the private firms to help it collect an additional $1.4 billion in unpaid taxes.

Among the most vocal critics of the plan is the National Treasury Employees Union, which represents about 150,000 federal workers. * * *

BRIEFS: Estate- and gift-tax revenues surged to $19.14 billion during the eight months through May from $16.55 billion in the same period a year earlier, the Treasury Department says. ... IRS Commissioner Everson says he is "disappointed" by the overall IRS funding level set recently by the House. He says the bill falls $104.5 million short of the administration's proposed budget and that if it becomes law, would result in personnel reductions.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Approves A Pentagon Budget (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The House approved a $427.6 billion Pentagon budget after narrowly rejecting a bipartisan effort to curb funding for the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program within the U.S.

The amendment, which failed 219-207, touched off the fullest House debate on the secret surveillance since the existence of the program was revealed last fall.

Twenty-three Republicans, including House Government Reform Committee Chairman Tom Davis (R., Va.) broke ranks in support of the proposal, which directly challenged President Bush by proposing to bar funding for any electronic surveillance inside the U.S. that fails to comply with the court review required under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

To quell concerns in Congress, the White House has allowed more lawmakers to be briefed on the details of the surveillance, which the administration says is an effective tool in tracking calls between the U.S. and terrorist suspects overseas.

Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.), a top Democrat on military and intelligence issues, said he now felt "comfortable there are adequate safeguards" and House Intelligence Committee Chairman Peter Hoekstra (R., Mich.) pledged that he would hold a hearing this summer on a new legal framework for the program.

But the length and emotion of the House debate testified to the continued concern in Congress that the White House has been unilaterally circumventing the need to seek warrants under FISA. "I'm not satisfied with an argument that says, 'Trust us, we're from the government,'" said Rep. Adam Schiff (D., Calif.), a lead sponsor. And Rep. Jeff Flake (R., Ariz.) said "the acid test for Republicans on this has to be, would we be comfortable if a Democrat were in the White House using this authority. And I have to say I wouldn't be."

"What isn't allowed?" Mr. Flake asked, referencing administration testimony before the House Judiciary Committee. "If you're not going to use FISA, why not just run amok?"

The underlying defense bill, approved 407-19 last night, includes another $50 billion in emergency funds for military operations in Iraq, and passage comes even as the Senate will begin debate this afternoon on whether Congress should set some timetable to begin to pull American forces out of the country.

No one so far has attempted to actually limit funds, as the NSA amendment in the House proposed. But Democrats are pressing for some statement of policy that the administration should begin "a phased redeployment of U.S. forces."

Meanwhile, among domestic issues, Republicans are trying to shore up their fiscal credentials by moving new legislation to set up procedures at least to try to curb spending.

The House will vote this week on a measure giving the White House greater power to single out appropriations items to be cut. Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R., N.H.) won his panel's approval for a more ambitious agenda that envisions across-the-board cuts even in benefit programs such as Medicare and Medicaid if deficit targets aren't met.

Mr. Gregg's efforts could complicate matters for the administration, which would prefer the narrower focus of the House bill. In meeting with reporters, Mr. Gregg agreed the enhanced power sought by the White House would be a "useful tool for the administration to have," but he saw it as "moving deck chairs around," given the larger problem facing the budget from benefit programs.

Among Democrats, the most immediate domestic priority is the party's drive to force action in Congress before the November election on an increase in the federal minimum wage. Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.) hopes to show at least 50 votes today for a proposed $2.10-an-hour increase spread over three years. And despite continued resistance from their leadership, House Republicans say that the House will also have to vote on the issue before the election.

Flake Strikes At Earmark Of Hastert's (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, June 21, 2006

Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) escalated his anti-earmark crusade yesterday by attempting to strip a request by Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) out of a defense appropriations bill.

Flake offered an amendment designed to kill a $2.5 million provision intended for a technology organization created by one of Hastert's former aides. The amendment, one of about 10 he offered, was expected to fail miserably as of press time.

The earmark is for the Illinois Technology Transition Center, a program established late last year through a partnership between the Pentagon and a private outfit run by Thomas V. Thornton, a former policy director for Hastert in the early '90s. Neither Thornton nor Hastert's office replied to requests for comment on the earmark.

The center was designed to find technology companies in Illinois that could fulfill the needs of the Defense Department's Office of Naval Research (ONR).

"This is a win-win for entrepreneurs and ONR," Thornton said when the center won its initial $1.3 million in funding last October.

Flake said yesterday that he did not realize the earmark was one of Hastert's when he decided to fight it on the floor, but knowing that the top House GOP leader had requested the funding didn't change Flake's plans.

"I don't want to avoid someone just because they're in a leadership position," Flake said yesterday.

Hastert's earmarking record has come under scrutiny in the past week. The Sunlight Foundation and several media outlets reported that Hastert turned a profit of at least $1.5 million on a land deal several miles from a proposed highway he secured more than $200 million for last year.

The amendment demonstrated a new height of boldness on Flake's part, and it served to fan the flames of those determined to crack down on lawmakers' propensity to load bills with millions in federal money directly to their home states and districts for pet projects.

Flake has riled some colleagues this year by forcing recorded votes on appropriations earmarks, but this is the first time he has taken his fight to the top elected leader in the chamber.

Even critics of the amendment conceded that Flake demonstrated devotion to principle by treating Hastert's earmark like any others; yesterday he offered several amendments to prohibit the use of funds for various provisions.

Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), an appropriator who supported Hastert's request on the floor yesterday, said Flake's effort could be characterized as either a "principled approach" or "a strong showing of stupidity."

"I think he's doing it on principle," LaHood said.

He defended the earmark as a necessary link between the Pentagon and local technology companies that would benefit the country's national defense and said the debate would demonstrate that many earmarks are vetted well.

"It shows that these earmarks have value," LaHood said. "It gives an opportunity to justify a program."

Rep. Mike Simpson (R-Idaho), another appropriator, agreed.

"I don't think it's necessarily very smart politically," Simpson remarked.

Earmark defenders, including Hastert, say that lawmakers, not civil servants, should determine where federal funds are spent in their home states and districts.

Some lawmakers and aides were shocked by Flake's decision to go forward with an amendment targeting one of Hastert's earmark requests.

"I've never seen that before," said Rep. John Murtha (Pa.), the senior Democratic defense appropriator and another Flake target. "I can't imagine what he's doing."

Flake's allies praise him for picking earmarks regardless of the sponsor's status. His anti-earmark battle has targeted backbenchers and committee chairmen alike.

"I would be more worried if no leadership earmarks were" targeted, said Keith Ashdown, vice president for policy at Taxpayers for Common Sense, which tracks and often criticizes congressional earmarks.

But some lawmakers said Flake could pay a political price for his earmark-striking crusade, even if he does not suffer direct punishment from GOP leaders.

"The retribution comes not in terms of sanctions," Simpson said. "It comes in terms of your own credibility. People walk in and see 'Flake amendment' and say no. They don't even ask what it is."

But longtime critics of congressional earmarks say Flake is making a courageous stand.

"Representative Flake is doing the Lord's work," Ashdown said. "He's doing what millions of people want."

Lawmakers who oppose Flake's effort pointed out early in the day that he would not be successful.

"It's a dead end. It's not going anywhere," LaHood said. "It's on a collision course with defeat."

As for Hastert, Flake said he would prefer not to know whose earmarks he is targeting.

"I've told my staff, 'Please don't tell me.' It might dissuade me," he said.

Senate Budget Panel Approves Spending Curbs (AP-Y2)

By Andrew Taylor

AP2, June 21, 2006

In an election-year bid to polish their credentials as fiscal conservatives in an election year, Senate Republicans on Tuesday advanced a bill designed to force cuts in the spiraling growth of federal benefit programs while also reviving the line-item veto.

The measure, written by Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, R-N.H., and approved by that panel by a 12-10 party-line vote, combines several ideas aimed at putting the brakes on spending. Most striking, the bill would force mandatory cuts to the deficit, enforced by across-the-board cuts to benefit programs such as Medicare, Medicaid and unemployment insurance if Congress can't meet deficit targets on its own.

"This bill renews and re-energizes the budget process to bring enforceable discipline to federal spending," Gregg said.

Gregg acknowledged that his bill won't pass the full Senate, and Republicans seem to welcome the prospect of a filibuster by Democrats. That would allow them to accuse Democrats of being weak on controlling spending while sparing Republican moderates from having to vote on the bill's more controversial elements.

Democrats criticized the measure as overreaching in its attack on benefit programs. But the measure pleases Republicans' core political supporters, who have been disappointed by the party's performance on spending.

"If it passes, that's wonderful. If we simply have the debate, that's wonderful," said tax-cut activist Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform. "That's the perfect issue."

The bill revives the idea of the line-item veto as requested by President Bush, though in a much weaker form than passed by Congress in 1996 and struck down by the Supreme Court two years later. The new version would allow the president to single out wasteful items contained in bills he signs into law, and it would require Congress to vote on those items again.

Under the proposal, it would take a simple majority in both House and Senate to approve the items over the president's objections. The old line-item veto allowed the president to strike items from appropriations and tax bills and required a two-thirds margin of both House and Senate to override a veto.

The House is slated to vote on a similar line-item veto plan Thursday and GOP leaders were scrambling Tuesday to assemble the votes to pass the bill.

Gregg, however, vowed not to break off his line-item veto plan for a separate vote.

The bill also revives the Gramm-Rudman mechanism of setting hard deficit targets and requiring across-the-board cuts if they are not met. Unlike the Gramm-Rudman law, the across-the-board cuts apply to benefit programs such as Medicare, welfare and unemployment insurance instead of annual budgets of Cabinet agencies such as the Defense Department.

Panel OKs Spending Controls (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

The Senate Budget Committee yesterday voted 12-10 along party lines to approve a stringent spending control bill that would require Congress to achieve a nearly balanced budget by 2012, but Republican leadership aides said the legislation faces a tough uphill battle in the full Senate.

The bill would reinstate spending disciplines, including caps on non-entitlement programs, that helped balance the budget in the 1980s and 1990s. It would require the White House to order across-the-board spending cuts in every program but Social Security if Congress did not achieve the deficit-reduction goals.

The committee rejected an amendment by Democrats that would have reinstated required offsets to tax cuts and new spending programs, though former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan and other budget analysts said the policy helped Congress take control over the deficit in the 1990s.

Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican and author of the bill, acceded to another Democratic proposal to modify a key mechanism designed to force Congress to vote on reforms of fast-growing entitlement programs such as Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security.

The change would require 60 votes in the Senate, rather than a simple majority of 51, for approval of any entitlement reforms recommended by a bipartisan commission to be set up under the legislation. Committee Republicans upheld a requirement that Congress vote on the commission's proposed spending cuts under expedited procedures.

"Congress is not making tough choices because the system is broken," said Sen. Michael D. Crapo, Idaho Republican, noting that Congress fought hard last year to produce a modest entitlement-reform bill with $39 billion in savings -- a fraction of what would be needed to eliminate deficits averaging more than $300 billion a year.

"We'd have the tools to get past the procedural hurdles" that have prevented Republicans in Congress from gaining control over spending, he said. "This bill gives us a chance to have some fiscal restraint."

Democrats said Republicans were abdicating their responsibility to get the budget under control and trying to "outsource" that job to an unelected commission, while trying to jury-rig legislative procedures to ensure passage of unpopular Republican proposals such as the partial privatization of Social Security and deep cuts in health care and veterans programs.

"Republicans have rejected the one device that proved successful at reducing the deficit" between 1991 and 2000, said Sen. Kent Conrad, North Dakota Democrat and author of the Democratic alternative. Meanwhile, they have corrupted a budget process that was designed to reduce deficits in order to pass tax-cutting bills that have added $1.7 trillion to the deficit since 2001, he said.

A Republican aide said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, may have trouble getting agreement to bring up a bill with such broad provisions on the Senate floor next month without raising objections from both Republican and Democratic members of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. Frist may break the bill into smaller increments that have better chances of passing, including one providing the president with authority to veto individual items in tax and spending bills.

Mr. Gregg and Mr. Conrad also said they were working to cobble together a bipartisan bill that would include seven or eight items on which both parties could agree.

Gregg Shifts Formula For Line-Item Veto (RC)

By Robert Rosenbaum

DOJ_NMG_0036388

Roll Call, June 21, 2006

The Senate Budget Committee met Tuesday to mark up the Stop Over-Spending Act of 2006, a package aimed at reining in federal spending proposed by Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.).

The package includes items ranging from discretionary spending caps that would limit emergency spending measures to a line-item veto provision for the president with an expedited rescission process for Congressional response.

Among the most hotly contested issues were a provision to create an Entitlement Solvency Commission, made up of people outside of Congress, and presidential line-item veto power.

In a 12-10 vote along partisan lines, the act passed without any formal amendments. Eight amendments were proposed, most by Democrats.

The line-item veto provision was quite different from one recently proposed by the Bush administration. The new provision is a stronger version than Bush's proposal and requires Congressional affirmation for any rescission proposed by the president.

Gregg made one major concession to Sen. Kent Conrad (N.D.) and his fellow Democrats on the committee, requiring a 60 percent vote in each chamber for any presidential rescission instead of the originally proposed simple majority.

The major changes to the Bush administration's version of the line-item veto provisions include first, that the rescission savings must be used for deficit reduction. Second, the president is allowed only four rescission packages a year (one of which will be with the president's budget and the other three at his discretion). Third, the president can resubmit only one rescission that already was included in a package of rescissions rejected by Congress. And finally, the president may suspend funds from his recommended rescissions for 45 days. If Congress rejects this before the 45-day limit, the president may release the funds earlier.

No official date has been set for a Senate vote on the S.O.S. Act, but Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) has indicated it will likely come before the end of the year.

Stop Federal Overspending (WT)

By Judd Gregg

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

If Capt. Renault stepped into today's Senate instead of Rick's Cafe in 1941 Casablanca, he would feel quite at home. He would observe"I'mshocked, SHOCKED, to find that deficit spending is going on in here!"

Simply put, the federal budget process is ailing. In fact, it is on life support. The Budget Enforcement Act of 1990, which provided real teeth in the budget process, expired in 2002. Furthermore, because of a lack of will to control spending, Congress has failed to adopt a budget resolution for three of the past five years.

Each year, Congress embraces score-keeping gimmicks to get around any limitations. Site-specific earmarks and non-peer-reviewed projects are increasing -- last year's highway bill being a poster child for unrestricted projects.

The part of the budget called "mandatory" spending continues to grow much faster than inflation. Twenty years ago, entitlements comprised 45 percent of the budget; today, they will soon exceed 60 percent. Medicare alone is growing by almost 10 percent per year. Based on forecasted economic growth, demographics and program benefits, just three entitlement programs -- Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security -- if left unchanged will consume 20 percent of the economy in 30 years. That may not sound alarming until one realizes that the entire U.S. government -- including functions ranging from health care to defense to border security -- consumes 20 percent of the gross domestic product.

Some might speculate that this is just business as usual. It is not. Never in U.S. history have we had to face so many claimants for funds and unfunded IOU's. As the Baby Boom generation retires, older Americans will be handing younger Americans their bills. We are recklessly undermining the future of our children and our grandchildren.

Clearly, spending is out of control and Congress needs to regain fiscal discipline over this runaway train.

Last week, I, along with 24 other cosponsors, introduced the Stop Over-Spending Act. This commonsense and fiscally responsible bill proposes tough measures to force Congress and the Bush administration to adhere to a disciplined budget process. It ends the free pass to spend and re-establishes a real, transparent and straightforward budget.

First, the SOS bill reinstates discretionary spending caps in law. If Congress exceeds these limits, then the overage must be offset by an across-the-board reduction.

Second, the SOS bill eliminates "shadow budgets," otherwise knows as emergency spending. It limits the misuse of emergency spending by building in reasonable assumptions of emergency spending into the discretionary caps.

Third, the SOS bill requires the deficit to be measured and considered as its share of economy, the GDP, and requires the deficit to decline from 2.75 percent of GDP next year to .05 percent of GDP by 2012.

What happens if these deficit targets are not achieved? Then congressional committees are required to "reconcile" and write laws to achieve savings. If these committees do not make the tough decisions, then an across-the-board sequester of entitlement programs kicks in.

Sound familiar? It should. SOS is modeled on the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings approach, but it is strengthened and updated to deal with the budget realities of this millennium. It requires entitlement programs that are causing the deficit to be accountable.

Fourth, SOS includes a line-item veto/expedited rescission process to allow the president to identify wasteful spending and to get an up-or-down vote without amendment. Forty-three state governors have line-item veto authority. A Republican Congress gave Bill Clinton this authority in 1996. Unfortunately, the courts negated that action. SOS redrafts this reform in a way to withstand challenges.

Fifth, the SOS bill creates a commission to identify and eliminate agency duplication and programs that have outlived their usefulness, as well as a commission to ensure the solvency of entitlement programs.

No budget process changes can force the president and members of Congress to have the willpower to make tough decisions. But a transparent, tough and honest budget process can help. The Stop Over-Spending Act can take us a long way toward achieving real budgets and effective budget discipline.

It is time to get serious about spending restraint and resurrect the budget process to protect future generations and ensure that we hand our children, and our children's children, a government they can afford.

The 'Pay-As-You-Go' Ruse (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

Democrats in Congress unveiled their 2006 campaign agenda last week, laying claim to the mantle of "fiscal responsibility." The GOP's spendthrifts have handed them this political opening, which makes it all the more disappointing that Democrats are falling back on an old confidence trick.

Their ruse goes by the name of "pay-as-you-go" budgeting, which has the political virtue of sounding as if spending won't be able to exceed revenue. Their Web site, HouseDemocrats.gov, claims that pay-as-you-go policy "means that spending increases, as well as tax cuts, need to be offset by cuts in other areas -- like fewer corporate tax breaks."

A three-card monte dealer in Times Square couldn't have said it better. Paygo rules, to use the Beltway argot, were in place from 1990 until they expired in 2002, so we know how they work. And in practice all they really do is constrain tax cuts, not new spending.

That's because paygo rules apply only to new or expanded entitlement programs, not to those that already exist and grow automatically with user demand. Thus spending for Medicare, growing this year at an astounding 15% annual rate, would continue to run on autopilot. Ditto for Medicaid. So-called "discretionary" programs (education, Defense) that Congress approves each year are also exempt. Democrats somehow forget to disclose that those notorious "earmarks" stuffed into spending bills are also exempt from paygo.

The real game here is to make tax cutting all but impossible. Under paygo, tax cuts must be offset with either other tax increases or entitlement cuts. This usually means pitting tax cuts against cuts in the likes of Medicare, which is a very hard political sale. Paygo rules are one reason the 2001 tax cut was so paltry and phased-in and thus economically ineffective. Had paygo still been in force, the 2003 tax cuts that have done so much to spur growth and increase federal revenues would never have passed.

Another myth is that paygo was crucial to eliminating the budget deficit during the Clinton years. In fact, deficits remained high until the GOP took Congress in 1994 and, for a rare couple of years, actually reduced the growth rate of spending. Defense spending also fell by a full two-percentage-points of GDP during the 1990s. Paygo did little to restrain the appetite for new entitlements, as Democrats began their push for the Medicare prescription drug benefit long before the 2000 election.

The House Democratic agenda promises "a new direction for America." But when it comes to paygo and fiscal policy, the only change is their political marketing.

Time's Running Out For 527 Reform (HILL)

By Edward Kangas And Charles Kolb

Every politician knows money is the mother's milk of politics. However, unregulated political contributions have the potential to undermine voters' confidence and involvement in our participatory democracy. When campaign spending rules favor special interests and the very wealthy, small contributors stop donating, voters stay home and the public loses faith in its elected officials.

With just months remaining before the midterm elections, the House of Representatives passed legislation that would regulate 527 organizations and included the legislation as part of the recently passed lobbying reform package. Now the Senate has an opportunity to show its support for reforming the campaign-finance system and restore public confidence in a system that many perceive to be dysfunctional, polarizing and unfair.

Recent attention has focused on legislators' reactions to the Jack Abramoff scandal and calls for outlawing more favors and gifts. But if Congress is serious about real change, it also needs to regulate 527s and other political funding mechanisms that attempt to corrupt the system.

As most of us learned during the 2004 presidential campaign, a 527 is a tax-exempt organization named after a section of the U.S. tax code. Many of these groups are created to influence the nomination, election, appointment or defeat of candidates for public office. Under current law, however, 527s are not regulated by the Federal Election Commission (FEC). That's a serious problem, not just for November 2006 but, more important, for the 2008 presidential campaigns. The adage "bad money drives out good" is as true in politics as it is in the marketplace.

Enactment of the Bipartisan Campaign Finance Reform Act (BCRA) in 2002 ended the soft-money shakedown of business executives by candidates and party officials, but just when business leaders thought it was safe to leave their wallets at home, 527s formed, raised hundreds of millions of dollars in unregulated donations and became the new recipients of most soft money contributions.

During the 2004 presidential campaign, the lack of oversight allowed Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, Texans for Truth and other partisan political organizations and individuals to spend more than $400 million of unregulated soft money to influence and hijack the election. Fortunately, most corporations had the good sense not to become involved in the 527 game.

The bill regulating 527s that was passed by the House is a big step in the right direction. If we are serious about eliminating soft money in our campaign system, Congress needs to adhere to the following three provisions recommended by the Committee for Economic Development (CED), an independent, business-led research organization that has been instrumental in bringing the voice of business leaders to the debate over campaign-finance reform:

• First, all 527s that spend money to influence federal elections should be required to register as political committees with the FEC. By requiring these 527s to be bound by FEC regulations, Congress will eliminate the current loophole that permits the groups to avoid limits on the sources and amounts of allowable contributions.

• Second, all Section 527 groups that broadcast advertisements that promote, support, attack or oppose a federal candidate should be required to pay for such ads only with money raised from individuals under federal contribution limits. No corporate or labor union contributions should be used for this purpose.

• Third, if a group maintains both federal and nonfederal campaign accounts to support voter-registration drives and similar activities, at least half of the costs for such activities must be funded with "hard money" contributions.

Taken together, these new rules would put an end to many of the offensive and unfair political activities voters were subjected to in 2004.

However, even the best-written rules are only as effective as their enforcement. To realize the full benefits of campaign-finance reform, the FEC needs to be streamlined and strengthened, making it as valuable to the regulation of sound campaign practices as the Securities and Exchange Commission is to the regulation of sound business practices.

It is clear legislation is needed now more than ever. When ordered by a U.S. District Court judge either to set new rules for 527s or explain how 527s will be regulated under current rules, the FEC opted not to set new regulation. This despite a dissenting vote from FEC Chairman Michael Toner, who stated the decision set the stage for "527s to once again spend hundred of millions of dollars in soft money" to affect the midterm elections and the 2008 presidential race.

It's not enough for Congress just to fight for principles of good governance, as it has rightly done in the case of corporate accounting scandals. Congress must live up to those same principles it expects the business community to abide by, transparency and accountability, in how it regulates campaigns.

The bigger prize is the 2008 presidential campaign. New limits on 527s and a stronger FEC will encourage even more individuals to help finance the political campaigns of interest to them. This will lead to not only greater confidence in our political system but also greater diversity and participation. For a democratic republic like ours, there can be no more important endeavor or admirable goal.

Kangas is the retired chairman of Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu and co-chairman of the Committee for Economic Development's subcommittee on campaign finance. Kolb is president of the Committee for Economic Development, an independent, nonpartisan, Washington-based organization of over 200 business and education leaders.

A Graduate So Happy, He Hugged The Speaker (NYT)

By Julia C. Mead

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

Gabriel Whitney says he did not plan to nearly suffocate President Bush in a bear hug. In fact, he did not plan to hug him at all.

But when Mr. Whitney, one of 202 midshipmen to graduate from the United States Merchant Marine Academy in Kings Point, N.Y., on Monday, stepped forward to receive his diploma, it just sort of happened. Call it irrational exuberance. But after six years of undergraduate school and 4,872 demerits, Mr. Whitney, 25, of Nashua, N.H., could hardly restrain himself.

With more reason than most to be overjoyed, the 6-foot-7 midshipman stepped onto the stage to accept his degree and hugged Vice Adm. Joseph D. Stewart, the academy's superintendent. Then he raised both arms in a victorious salute as his classmates roared their approval.

Elated and with his arms still upraised, he turned toward President Bush, who had just delivered the commencement address.

Mr. Bush, wearing a quizzical expression, responded by raising his arms as well and moved in for a hug. The midshipman — almost unwittingly — found himself squeezing the president in his powerful arms. When the president caught his breath, he shook Mr. Whitney's hand.

"I said, 'You're the man! Thank you very much,' " Mr. Whitney said in a telephone interview yesterday.

"The president thought the big bear hug was funny," said Dana M. Perino, a White House spokeswoman. "He appreciates the terrific enthusiasm of our nation's graduates, and he was honored to be the first president to address the Merchant Marine Academy. It was quite a thrill for everyone."

Mr. Whitney's sister, who works in an advertising office, had designed T-shirts for the 15 family members who attended the ceremony. Mr. Whitney's many difficulties in reaching graduation were emblazoned on the front of the shirt: 4,872 demerits ("painful"); four and a half years on academic restriction ("wounding"); two visits to the committee that weighs student expulsions ("agonizing"); two reprieves from the admiral ("necessary"); and six years of school with only an undergraduate degree to show for it ("humbling").

The back of the shirt, which bore a photograph of the midshipman and the American flag, celebrated his crowning achievement: "Passing all licensing exams, first try: Priceless."

DOJ_NMG_0036392

Reached in New Hampshire, his grandmother, Alberta Whitney, said that some of the 4,400 people in the audience took pictures of the T-shirts, front and back.

"We were very happy to pose," she said. "We are so proud of Gabriel. He's a wonderful, wonderful boy."

The day after graduation, Mr. Whitney said he had no immediate plans but one long-term goal: "I plan to achieve greatness someday, though I'm not exactly sure yet how I'm going to do it."

For now, he is relaxing and basking in the attention that his widely publicized hug has garnered.

"I'm trying not to think farther than the next couple of days," he said, adding with a chuckle, "It's been kind of a long trip."

Senators To Propose New Safety Tactics For FDA (WSJ)

By Anna Wilde Mathews

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The leaders of the Senate committee that oversees the Food and Drug Administration plan to unveil legislation that would substantially change how the agency reviews medications.

The bill is being prepared by Michael Enzi, the Wyoming Republican who heads the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions, and its ranking Democrat, Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts. The two lawmakers' views are particularly important as Congress prepares to consider legislation next year to renew the industry-user fees that fund many of the FDA's operations.

The drug-safety bill prepared by Sens. Kennedy and Enzi is keyed to that user-fee renewal, and would likely depend on increases in the fees. Details could change before the final version emerges in the next several weeks. The senators aim to get a vote on the bill this year, but if that doesn't happen in the abbreviated election-year Congress, it could provide a framework for drug-safety provisions in next year's user-fee legislation.

Mr. Enzi said the bill would "raise the bar to ensure that safety is not an afterthought, but a given" and "restore public confidence in the FDA's process of reviewing the benefits and risks of prescription drugs." Mr. Kennedy said the bill would give the agency "a complete set of tools to address the safety of drugs post-approval, including giving the FDA authority to require post-approval labeling changes and safety studies."

Though drug makers may object to aspects of the bill, they are under pressure to back some drug-safety changes. In a statement, the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America said the organization can't fully comment on the bill because it hasn't been formally introduced, but that drugs already are "subject to rigorous safety and effectiveness reviews" by the FDA.

An FDA spokeswoman said it "welcomes additional ideas on improving oversight of drug safety," and the agency has safety initiatives already under way.

Other drug-safety bills also have emerged. Legislation co-sponsored by Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley (R., Iowa) and Sen. Christopher Dodd (D., Conn.) would restructure the agency, creating a FDA center focused on the safety of drugs already on the market and granting the agency substantial new powers.

The latest bill is expected to require the FDA to have a plan for evaluating and mitigating the potential risks of every drug it approves, congressional staff members said. The plan would have to be re-evaluated at least once a year for the first three years a drug is on the market.

The bill also would give the FDA new authority to ensure the safety of drugs, which could be used as part of the risk-mitigation plans. Drug manufacturers would be able to go through an FDA dispute-resolution procedure if they object to the agency's proposed risk-mitigation strategies. The plans could include requirements that drug makers do studies or keep registries after their medicines go on the market; limit direct-to-consumer advertising or impose disclosure requirements on it; and limit use or distribution of a drug.

Currently, the FDA sometimes uses such tactics for drugs seen as risky, but the agency typically has to use the leverage it has over drug approval to negotiate the restrictions with manufacturers. Its authority to impose them isn't clear-cut. The bill would amp up the regulators' power by giving the FDA a new ability to impose fines on companies that don't adhere to the risk-mitigation plans.

The bill also would require drug makers to register their clinical trials in a public government database and make the results of the advanced studies public. It would authorize some resources for an FDA effort to spearhead research on drug evaluation.

Senators Prepare To Unveil New Drug Safety Proposals (NYT)

By Gardiner Harris

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 20 — After more than a year of quiet negotiations, two influential senators are expected within weeks to introduce a legislative proposal that could drastically change how drugs are tested and approved in the United States.

The senators, Michael B. Enzi, Republican of Wyoming and chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, the ranking Democrat on the committee, still refuse to speak about the proposal, representatives for both said.

But committee staff members have for weeks been showing legislative talking points to drug industry representatives, scientists and others on Capitol Hill to help tailor the proposed legislation and build support for it.

In broad terms, the bill would require that drug makers disclose the results of all large human tests of their drugs, known as Phase 3 and Phase 4 trials; create a detailed risk management plan to uncover and control any safety problems that arise after a drug is approved; and pay penalties if they fail to follow through with this plan, according to four experts who were briefed on the proposals.

The experts spoke on condition that their names not be used because they had told members of the senators' staffs that they would not talk publicly about the proposals.

A spokeswoman for the Food and Drug Administration, Susan Bro, said the agency had not yet reviewed the proposed legislation. She said the agency had already undertaken "a number of initiatives" to improve itself.

"We always welcome additional ideas on improving oversight of drug safety," Ms. Bro said.

The senators plan to introduce the bill before Congress recesses in August, those briefed on the proposal said.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa and chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and Senator Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, have offered legislation similar in some respects to the Enzi-Kennedy proposal. But Mr. Enzi presides over the committee that has direct oversight of the drug agency, and Mr. Kennedy has specialized in health legislation for decades. Their imprimatur carries great weight on bills dealing with the agency.

It is unlikely that Congress will act on the proposal before the November election, and any action may be delayed until 2007, when Congress must reauthorize the formula by which the F.D.A. receives tens of millions of dollars in fees from drug makers. The Enzi-Kennedy proposal calls for an increase in those fees to pay for greater oversight of drug safety by the agency, before and after a medicine is approved. How such an increase could be approved apart from next year's reauthorization is unclear.

Daniel E. Troy, a former general counsel of the drug agency who now represents drug companies, said it would be a mistake for Congress to combine the Enzi-Kennedy proposal with next year's negotiations over extending the fees.

"If what we hear is true," Mr. Troy said, "my concern is that these issues are too complex to get mixed up with the reauthorization of the Prescription Drug User Fee Act."

Dr. Sidney M. Wolfe, director of health research for the consumer advocacy group Public Citizen, said he was encouraged by some of the Enzi-Kennedy proposals, particularly one that would exact monetary penalties from drug makers who fail to follow through on their own drug safety promises.

"There really is a crisis at the F.D.A.," Dr. Wolfe said.

The proposals come after a series of drug withdrawals led agency critics and some on Capitol Hill to suggest that the agency was failing in its mission to protect the public from dangerous drugs. Since 2000, pharmaceutical companies have withdrawn 10 drugs after deaths and injuries demonstrated that the medicines were unsafe.

DOJ_NMG_0036394

In addition, the agency has only recently learned that widely prescribed antidepressants can cause some children and teenagers to become suicidal; that hugely popular pain pills are likely to increase the risk of heart attacks; and that commonly used antipsychotic drugs and stimulants may be more dangerous than was previously known.

Just Who Is 'Disgruntled'? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

An article on the congressional midterm elections ("Midterm Tea Leaves Signal Hot Water for Republicans," page one, June 6) makes a false assumption about our seniors. The article states: "In all these [regional] areas, seniors are disgruntled about the new Medicare prescription-drug benefit."

Disgruntled? Medicare reports that seniors are saving an average of $1,100 a year with prescription-drug coverage, and recent polls have shown that nearly 80% of seniors are happy with their coverage plan. Does this sound "disgruntled" to you?

Seniors are seeing real savings under Medicare Part D. Unlike the Democrats and shadow organizations content to play politics with our seniors' health, Republicans have worked tirelessly to help seniors sign up and save. I firmly believe that come November, seniors will reward the Republican majority for finally delivering on the long-overdue promise of affordable prescription drug coverage.

Drug Prices Up Sharply This Year (NYT)

By Milt Freudenheim

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

Prices of the most widely used prescription drugs rose sharply in this year's first quarter, just as the new Medicare drug coverage program was going into effect, according to separate studies issued yesterday by two large consumer advocacy groups.

AARP, which represents older Americans, said prices charged by drug makers for brand-name pharmaceuticals jumped 3.9 percent, four times the general inflation rate during the first three months of this year and the largest quarterly price increase in six years.

Price increases for some of the most popular brand-name drugs were much steeper; the sleeping pill Ambien was up 13.3 percent, and the best-selling cholesterol drug, Lipitor, was up 4.7 to 6.5 percent, depending on dosage.

Over all, AARP said, higher prices mean that the cost of providing brand-name drugs to the typical older American, who takes four prescription medicines daily, rose by nearly $240 on average over the 12-month period that ended on March 31.

"When the manufacturers' wholesale prices increase, it gets passed through the system, regardless of who the final purchaser is," said John Rother, the policy director of AARP. Although the drug industry's main trade association challenged the accuracy of the AARP survey, a separate study, by Families USA, a patient advocacy group, found similar inflation rates among brand-name drug prices. While the higher prices have a general impact on the drug-taking public, consumer advocates said the higher prices have special implications for Medicare, which Congress barred from negotiating prices with drug makers when lawmakers devised the new so-called Part D drug program.

Commercial insurers, which are offering the drug insurance plans under Medicare's auspices, do have negotiating power. And they say that by switching to generic drugs, consumers can avoid most of the price increases.

The surveys measured manufacturers' wholesale prices, which would not necessarily reflect any discounts insurers might be able to negotiate.

But even so, the price increases in the Medicare drug plans since they began were identical in many cases with the jump in wholesale prices, Families USA said.

Some health care economists said the price increases, if they continued, could have a devastating effect on the new Medicare drug program.

"Higher drug prices may lead to higher premiums next year, which may discourage enrollees from joining or staying in the program, and fewer enrollees could drive premiums even higher," said Stephen W. Schondelmeyer, a University of Minnesota economist who specializes in drug industry issues.

Mr. Schondelmeyer said one clear indication of the inflation's impact could be seen among the six million low-income elderly and disabled people who previously received drug coverage through Medicaid but were automatically switched to the Part D program when it began in January.

That shift was a windfall for drug makers, he said. "Medicaid would have paid 25 to 30 percent less under the old system, including rebates from the manufacturers, than the new Medicare Part D program is paying."

Ron Pollock, the executive director of Families USA, offered another way to gauge the federal impact. The federal Department of Veterans Affairs, which is able to negotiate prices with pharmaceutical makers, is paying 46 percent less for the most popular brand-name drugs than the average prices posted by the Medicare plans for the same drugs, Mr. Pollack said.

Peter Ashkenaz, a Medicare spokesman, said enrollees in the Part D program could obtain a broad range of drugs as well as "personalized help in finding less costly drugs." He said many enrollees were in drug plans with "flat co-pays, which protects them from changes in pricing."

The first quarter of the year is typically the time when drug makers make many of their annual price increases. The industry did not comment on this year's increases, other than to question the accuracy of the AARP survey.

The drug industry's trade group, the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers Association, said in a statement that the AARP conclusions were "erroneous," because consumer drug prices had increased less than 2 percent since Jan. 1. The group, though, was citing a federal Bureau of Labor Statistics report that combines prices for brand-name and lower-priced generic drugs, as well as various "medical supplies."

Paul Fitzhenry, a spokesman for Pfizer, which makes Lipitor, pointed the finger at health insurers, which he said were increasing their drug payment charges to members faster than drug makers were raising their prices.

"There has been a huge disconnect between changes to our prices and increases to consumers' out-of-pocket costs for medicines," he said. "Between 2001 and 2005, our compound annual average net price increase was 3.3 percent per year. During that same time, the average co-payment charged by insurers for brand-name pharmaceuticals has increased at an annual rate of 11.1 to 15.5 percent," he said, citing a Kaiser Family Foundation 2005 survey.

Mohit Ghose, a spokesman for the American Association of Health Plans, a insurance trade group, said the insurers were actually reducing drug spending increases by promoting lower-cost generics instead of brand-name drugs.

Mark Green, a spokesman for Sanofi-Aventis, which makes Ambien, said the drug was "priced more competitively than some other products in the sleep category." He added, "We make every effort to price our prices competitively, relative to the value they provide to patients."

Private Contracts Take Beating In Report (LAT)

By Heather Gehlert

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration has greatly expanded the use of contracts with private companies to provide public goods and services even as the number of government employees has increased, a congressional report has found.

But the administration's tilt toward doing business with private companies has failed to bring promised savings and has been characterized by "significant waste, fraud, abuse and mismanagement," according to the report released this week by Rep. Henry A. Waxman of Los Angeles, the top Democrat on the House Government Reform Committee.

Of particular concern, the report said, were contracts related to domestic security, the Iraq war and Hurricane Katrina recovery.

Waxman's report is described as the first comprehensive assessment of contracting under the Bush administration, which had vowed upon taking office in January 2001 to provide services more efficiently while reducing the size of government.

It reveals an 86% increase in contracts with private businesses, from $203 billion in 2000 to $377.5 billion a year in 2005 — a growth rate nearly double that of federal spending as a whole.

At the same time, federal payrolls also have grown: The government now has about 1,874,000 civilian employees, up from 1,738,000 five years ago.

"We've never seen [private] contracting on the scale that we're seeing now," Waxman said. "Nearly 40 cents of every dollar appropriated goes to private contractors, which is a record level."

Yet, Waxman said, his biggest concern is not the growth in contracts, but the abuse of them.

Poor contract planning and weak oversight, the report said, have led to government overspending and corruption by companies that have padded their invoices, charged for services not provided and received award fees for jobs that were completed late.

"Taxpayers should be outraged at the billions of dollars that have been wasted," said Waxman. "And the Bush administration isn't learning from its mistakes, it's repeating them."

In many cases, the report found, the types and terms of the contracts have made them ripe for abuse:

• Spending on cost-plus contracts — under which the government bears the risk of cost overruns — has increased from $62 billion in 2000 to $110 billion in 2005.

• Spending on no-bid contracts — those granted without competition from other companies — rose 110%, to $97.8 billion, during the same period.

• Spending on monopoly contracts, which allow the government to buy goods and services without defining them in advance, nearly doubled, to $15.3 billion.

The report comes as the federal government's handling of contracts is increasingly in question. On Tuesday, the government's onetime chief procurement officer, David H. Safavian, was convicted of making false statements and obstruction of justice for concealing his relationship with disgraced former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff. The jury's decision in Safavian's case, Waxman said, "underscores the findings of the new report."

"The corruption and inappropriate influence of special interests in government contracting has gone virtually unchecked and erodes the public trust in the federal government," he said.

Also on Tuesday, the Senate rejected — for the third time — a proposal to form a special committee to investigate contracting improprieties in war zones.

"It's scandalous that the GOP Senate refuses to look into the hundreds of billions of dollars spent in the war in Iraq to see that the funds are carefully and honestly spent," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said in a written statement after the vote.

Kennedy's comments echoed the concerns outlined in Waxman's report, which also identifies several smaller pieces of $745.5 billion in federal contracts awarded between 2000 and 2005 that the auditors deemed wasteful, fraudulent or mismanaged.

In 2003, for example, the Border Patrol was found to have paid $20 million for security camera systems that malfunctioned or were never installed. That same year, the Transportation Security Administration awarded Boeing Co. $44 million for installing and maintaining airport luggage screening equipment — a job that was never evaluated.

In 2005, the Federal Emergency Management Agency bought $915 million worth of temporary housing and offices for Katrina victims and relief workers. More than a third of them have never been used.

"The lesson of this report is that there's a massive amount of spending, and yet we very clearly aren't spending it smartly," said Peter Singer, an analyst with the Brookings Institution, a centrist public policy center in Washington. "When the overspending is not just in the billions but in the hundreds of billions — that's worrisome."

A spokesman for the White House Office of Management and Budget, which is responsible for overall procurement policy, said it made sense to turn to the private sector for providing security after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and cleaning up after Katrina — two disasters that affected everyone, not just government.

Tapping private-sector expertise allows the government to "bring the full strength of American ingenuity to bear as we seek solutions," said OMB spokesman Scott Milburn.

But, he added, contracting requires constant oversight to make sure "the public's money is spent responsibly."

Specter To The Justices: I'm Hungry, Let's Do Lunch (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, June 21, 2006

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, is hosting a series of one-on-one lunches with members of the Supreme Court.

The senator, whose tenure as chairman began last year amid furious conservative opposition but has included confirmation of two conservative nominees to the high court, is holding his tête-à-têtes in the Senate dining room with strict constructionists and loose constructionists alike.

Specter told The Hill that he lunches with the justices simply because he is hungry. In a more serious vein, he added that he does so to hash out "matters of concern."

Pennsylvania's senior senator said he's already lunched with most of the justices. They have discussed the administration of the courts, their confirmation hearings and one of his pet issues: bringing television cameras into the court chamber.

He has also grilled them about instances when the court has struck down laws by questioning what it called Congress's "method of reasoning." It was a concern Specter raised during the Supreme Court confirmation hearings he presided over months ago.

"It's good to talk on an informal basis," he said.

Specter was spotted Thursday at a table in a corner of the dinning room with conservative Justice Clarence Thomas, chatting long after the server had dropped off the check. As the host, Specter naturally reached over to take care of the bill at the end of the meal.

On Tuesday he had lunch with Justice David Souter, a Republican nominee who, like Specter, has irked the political right with his positions on social issues, particularly abortion.

"He likes long lunches," Specter said, adding, "He had a no-martini lunch."

Souter seemed happy strolling to a blue sedan that picked him up afterward, but he declined to talk about what he and his host had discussed — or even what he ate.

The senator's record of having not voted against any of the sitting justices has presumably spared him from awkward moments during lunch. The same cannot be said of other lawmakers, however.

Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), sitting a few tables away, joked that he was offended that Specter and Thomas didn't stop to greet him but then noted that he voted against Thomas's nomination.

Specter, by contrast, gave Thomas crucial support during his tumultuous and protracted confirmation hearing by asking tough questions of Thomas's chief accuser, Anita Hill.

There is no such thing as a free lunch, but Specter said the justices have not been swiftly swayed; they are not, for example, enthusiastic about his desire to air court proceedings on television.

The chairman and the justices have also chewed over the priorities of court members. Specifically, they have talked about court security and budgets, pay for younger district court judges and the General Services Administration (GSA) practice of charging the courts rent for the buildings they occupy.

The GSA manages federal properties, and Specter and several other senators have introduced legislation that would limit the rent charged of the judicial branch to the costs of operating and maintaining their offices.

Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), who chaired the judiciary panel before Specter, said that he lunched with the justices "from time to time" but that he did not meet with all of them.

Hatch said they talked about "philosophy, great literature and music, "mainly joint interests not related to their cases."

Richard Baker, the Senate historian, said that members of the Senate and the Supreme Court used to have close relationships before the court was moved out of the old Senate chamber to its neoclassical home across 1st Street in 1935.

"The Supreme Court used to be located down the hall until 1935," Baker said. There used to be lots of commingling between the senators and the justices."

Baker said that members of the court "undoubtedly broke bread with the senators" most likely in the old Senate dining room which was located off what is now the modern dining room's waiting area.

DOJ_NMG_0036398

Since the justices moved out of the Capitol, Baker said, little is known about their personal relationships with the Congress. He did not know of a Judiciary Committee chairman ever before making an effort to meet with each justice.

"To systematically do it is something we could not find precedent for," he said.

Here's A Way To Help Broadcasters, PBS And Congress (RC)

By Norman Ornstein

The past couple of weeks have been rough ones for broadcasters. Congress passed, and the president signed, the Broadcast Decency Enforcement Act, which increased by tenfold (to $325,000) the fines on stations that air "indecent" materials outside of late-night hours. The law defines "indecent" as "patently offensive" sexual or excretory content.

Then, on Monday, the Federal Communications Commission withdrew a plan to vote on requiring cable networks to air all the multicast channels broadcasters will have available when they go digital — as many as four to six for each broadcast analog channel now in operation — because Chairman Kevin Martin did not have the votes. The commercial broadcasters desperately want the multicast requirement to make their business model for digital television work.

Not surprisingly, the broadcast indecency bill passed by unanimous consent in the Senate and by a 10-to-1 margin in the House; how could Members pass up an opportunity to take a courageous stand against indecency? But the bill basically was just grandstanding. It's a poor piece of legislation, and one that reflects yet again the lack of any meaningful deliberation in Congress. The fines, if applied to many smaller stations, are prohibitive, and could force some into bankruptcy — for what might be an inadvertent airing of a program that had an action defined by the FCC as indecent.

Unfortunately, the definition of indecency is nowhere near a "bright line" test that broadcasters can rely on. We already have seen regulators struggle to deal with things such as the naked bodies shown in "Schindler's List" as they try to create reasonable and necessary exceptions for material with compelling artistic justification.

But when a PBS station in San Mateo, Calif., aired an episode of "The Blues" directed by Martin Scorsese that included New Orleans musicians using four-letter words —words they use as part of their everyday language — it was socked by the FCC with a $15,000 fine, which is a big-time penalty for a station of that size. How the FCC came to decide that Steven Spielberg's artistic vision was OK but Scorsese's was not is beyond me — and beyond all rationality.

So stations are left with no clear standard, yet with huge new penalties if they guess wrong. The charges against these stations have to be triggered by complaints. Here is a prediction: Some sharks will find ways to generate complaints against small, poorly financed stations to drive them into bankruptcy so they can purchase their spot on the airwaves for their own purposes. Congress considered none of these issues in the blind rush to show moral indignation.

I feel the broadcasters' pain. And I want to find a way to ease their burden. There isn't any readily available remedy now on the indecency or must-carry front. But there is another way, one that came to me when I got a release last week from the National Association of Broadcasters toting up their stations' public interest activities.

According to the NAB, such public-interest efforts add up to more than $10 billion for the year. The figure, the NAB says, is actually an understatement since it includes only direct activities such as public service announcements.

What a load on the broadcasters! All these other problems and a $10 billion burden. Of course, the burden is there because of the compact the public has had with broadcasters since they were first granted portions of the public airwaves — that in return for that use, they would have requirements to fulfill public interest obligations. When I co-chaired a presidential advisory committee in the late 1990s to look at their public interest obligations as we headed toward the digital age, the broadcasters on the panel regularly complained about the difficulty of meeting the obligations that already existed.

My commission proposed an altered set of public-interest obligations for the digital age. The FCC promised several years ago to address the issue. Despite the generous grant of valuable public airwaves for the broadcasters to convert to digital transmissions, the FCC so far has failed to do so. I think it is time to find another model that takes into account the challenges broadcasters face.

Here is what I propose: relieve the broadcasters of their onerous public interest obligations. All of them. In return, charge them fees that amount to a paltry 20 cents on the dollar for what they have been doing (or what they say they have been doing).

That would be $2 billion per year. Do so for only seven years, and then leave them free and clear. Put the money into an endowment fund that ultimately would total $14 billion (plus interest) for public broadcasting. (I am on the board of PBS, which I mention not because I have a conflict of interest — my compensation consists of an occasional PBS windbreaker or DVD — but because I have an abiding interest in the one outlet that exists to serve the public interest and is eager to do so.)

In return for this endowment, public broadcasters would relieve Congress of the burden of annually appropriating money for it. Since Rep. Ralph Regula (Ohio) and other Republicans in Congress have been trying for several years to cut those funds (and indeed have a plan to zero them out by 2009) this will be a big bonus for the lawmakers. They could cut the federal budget without the huge outcry that now comes every year from huge numbers of voters in every district who love PBS.

In the meantime, public broadcasting avidly would take on all the public interest burdens that now beset the commercial broadcasters. It could offer a separate digital channel for public affairs that offered time for candidates to get their messages across, for campaign debates, issue discussion and expanded news analysis. And of course, they would extend these efforts to the Web and other new media.

Public broadcasters could run a separate health channel, going well beyond the commercial ventures to include massive amounts of accessible information on every debilitating disease, and facilitate interactive communications with patients, families, doctors and researchers on them. It could facilitate community service through every individual station, provide readily available digitized archives of materials from museums, schools and other cultural institutions and expand all kinds of educational opportunities.

Here is a win-win-win — for commercial broadcasters now groaning under the weight of a $10 billion annual public-interest burden, for a Congress now grappling with a budget deficit and for public broadcasters now searching for a consistent source of funding to fulfill its mandate. Are you listening, Reps. Fred Upton (R-Mich.) and Ed Markey (D-Mass.), and Sens. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) and John McCain (R-Ariz.)? Any takers?

Razzle-Dazzle 'Em Ethics Reform (NYT)

The House ethics committee, ever wondrous in its irresponsibility, is preparing to set itself up as the arbiter of one-stop, conscience-free junket approval for gadabout lawmakers. Last winter, as the stain of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal spread, Speaker Dennis Hastert impulsively — and properly — called for a total ban on junkets financed by private favor seekers. But lawmakers, globe-trotting at the giddy rate of $10 million a year in free private excursions, rebelled. They killed the ban outright and substituted cosmetic panaceas for their promised ethics reform.

The end product would have the ethics committee — long a still-life study in Capitol dysfunction — snap into action to prejudge junketeering requests. This should be great for the lawmakers, who will be able to wave rubber-stamped in-House visas when faced with constituents' questions about how come their tours of global trouble spots so often hit Paris.

The ethics committee would, at least, have a great deal of expertise in its new duties. It turns out the 10 committee members and their aides have enjoyed 400 privately financed trips worth $1 million in a recent five-year stretch, according to a new accounting by the independent Center for Public Integrity. Leading the beneficiaries with 80 trips worth $245,000 was Representative Howard Berman, a California Democrat, a member of the International Relations Committee and one of the principals in giving a bipartisan patina to this latest evasion.

Clearly, lawmakers are gambling that the scandals nipping at their heels will pale by Election Day. Not so: as the new House rules were being cobbled together, David Safavian, a former White House aide, was found guilty of lying about his ties to Jack Abramoff. No less significant, Mr. Abramoff has reportedly received three additional months' grace before going to prison so that he can cooperate more fully with criminal prosecutors looking into the ethical misbehavior that finds Congress in deep denial.

Softer Housing Sector Is Seen, But Data Don't Point To Collapse (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey And Michael Corkery

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

U.S. home builders stepped up the pace of new construction in May after three months of declines, a sign that the housing market is softening but not collapsing.

The Commerce Department said housing starts rose 5% last month from April to an annual rate of 1.96 million units, but were down 3.8% from a year earlier. Building permits, an indicator of future trends in new residential construction, fell 2.1% last month and were running 8.5% lower than a year earlier.

The faster pace of new-home building in May is confirmation that the housing market is experiencing what Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke recently described as an "orderly and moderate" correction following last year's peak. That bodes well for the economy, though analysts anticipate more weakness in the housing market during the rest of the year.

"Housing starts surprised to the upside, but May's rebound is almost certainly a temporary pause in the downward trend," said Haseeb Ahmed, U.S. economist at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. Other economists were puzzled about why builders would keep ramping up the supply of new homes when demand is on the wane. Daniel Oppenheim, an analyst at Bank of America Securities, said the gap between starts and sales traffic was at the "highest level in at least the past 20 years," a development that would lead to "even higher inventory and more pricing pressure."

There are proliferating signs that builders are responding to widespread expectations that the housing boom is ending. Robert Toll, chief executive of Toll Brothers Inc., the luxury-home builder based in Horsham, Pa., said the industry also faces an increasingly negative psychology among prospective buyers, despite historically low interest rates and a relatively strong economy. He attributes some of that negativity to media reports about the housing slowdown. "If you go to a party and tell people that you bought a new house, people look at you like you are crazy," he said.

Toll Brothers last month reported that orders for new homes fell 32% in the latest quarter. On Monday, KB Home, the big Los Angeles builder, said it had laid off some 7% of its workers.

In May, starts of single-family homes rose 2.1% from April, but were 7.6% lower than a year earlier, with the declines particularly pronounced in the Midwest. The South is the only region where the rate of new-home construction is up from a year earlier.

One bright spot for builders has been the construction of apartment buildings. Housing starts for residential structures with five or more units leapt 25.4% in May and were nearly 15% higher than a year earlier.

Home Building Rebounds After 3 Months Of Decline (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

Construction of new homes rose in May, bouncing back from a disappointing April, the federal government reported yesterday. But the improvement may prove to be a temporary blip, as other numbers in the report pointed to a slowdown in the coming months and a market that is less robust than a year ago.

The Department of Housing and Urban Development said new construction rose 5 percent in May, to a seasonally adjusted annual pace of 1,957,000 homes. Still, that number was 3.8 percent less than in May 2005.

The increase was not a sign of an upward trend, but more likely a rebound after three months of significant declines, economists said.

Many economists had predicted less of a bounce.

"The one we got was larger than expected, but certainly not enough to overturn the idea that housing is in a contraction," a group of economists from Goldman Sachs wrote in a research note.

Stuart G. Hoffman, chief economist of PNC Financial, said the upturn in May probably "marks one of the housing market's last hurrahs."

DOJ_NMG_0036401

In a sign that construction is likely to taper off, the number of building permits declined considerably in May, to its lowest level since 2003. The rate was 2.1 percent lower than in April and down 8.5 percent from a year earlier. The decline in the number of permits usually shows up in the construction numbers within three months.

Taken with other signs of slower growth in housing — like a record number of unsold new homes on the market and a darkening financial outlook among builders — the new construction numbers point to an overall slowdown from the boom of the last few years, economists said.

"I don't think there's anything scary about what's happening in the housing market," Patrick Newport, an economist with Global Insight, said. "It's just a slowdown from record-high numbers. It's just slowing down to a more stable pace."

The government report hurt the stock values of some of the largest home-construction companies.

Shares of Toll Brothers, the largest builder of luxury homes, and D. R. Horton, the largest home building company, both posted losses. Other large home builders — the Centex Corporation, Pulte Homes and the Lennar Corporation — were also down for the day.

The stock values of most major home construction companies have been pummeled over the last year. Since the beginning of the year, the Bloomberg United States home builders index, which includes the largest construction companies, has fallen nearly 30 percent.

The rise in new construction last month was helped by the continuing surge of building in the West, where new construction jumped 15.8 percent from April's levels. The building rate in the South also posted an 8.5 percent gain from April. Housing starts were up only marginally in the Northeast and fell 15.8 percent in the Midwest.

The report also showed strong growth in the construction of apartments, a sign that high interest rates are beginning to affect the housing market.

"As interest rates start to rise, particularly mortgage rates, it becomes more expensive to purchase a home," said Bernard Baumohl, executive director of the Economic Outlook Group in Princeton, N.J.

And as purchases of single-family homes slow, so does the economy, he said. "Does the continued strength in apartment building bode well for real estate and the economy? Not quite."

The government report showed a 25.4 percent increase since April in the construction of structures with five units or more.

Yesterday's housing report was the latest to suggest a slowdown. On Monday, a survey of home builders found their collective view of the current business climate at the lowest level since 1995.

Last week, the Federal Reserve also cautioned that the housing market appeared to be cooling. In its Beige Book report, the Fed said that building had slowed in most regions and that too many homes were being built in some regions.

Housing Starts Rebound From 13-Month Low (WP)

By Victor Epstein

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

U.S. home construction rebounded in May from a 13-month low as builders worked on backlogged orders and used incentives such as free car leases to win new business.

Housing starts rose a greater-than-expected 5 percent, to an annual rate of 1.957 million, the Commerce Department reported yesterday. Building permits, a sign of future construction, fell 2.1 percent, to an annual pace of 1.932 million, the lowest since November 2003.

While the increase in starts does not change the outlook for a cooling housing market, the number may reassure investors and Federal Reserve policymakers that the slowdown will not become a rout.

"The message the Fed's going to take away from this starts report is that the roof's not caving in on housing and they can keep raising interest rates," said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist at PNC Financial Services Group Inc. in Pittsburgh.

The annual rate of housing starts in May is still below the 1.972 million pace recorded in March. Construction has averaged an annual rate of 1.931 million units in the past three months, the lowest since September to November 2004.

Slowing sales have left a record numbers of unsold homes on the market. There were 565,000 new and 3.4 million previously owned residences awaiting purchase in April, according to the National Association of Realtors and the Commerce Department.

Strong Start To Trading Fizzles On Doubt (USAT)

By From Wire Reports

NEW YORK — The Dow made a half-hearted attempt to get back above 11,000 Tuesday but couldn't hang on.

Better-than-expected news on the housing front triggered a rally that had the Dow Jones industrial average up 88 points at 11,030 before interest rate worries prevailed and the Dow closed up just 32.73 points at 10,974.84.

And it was the only one of the three major U.S. indexes to end the day with a gain. The Standard & Poor's 500 dipped 0.02 points to 1240.12, and the Nasdaq composite fell 3.36 points to 2107.06.

Trading got off to a strong start after the Commerce Department said U.S. housing starts rose in May faster than economists had forecast. But the focus soon shifted back to the big uncertainty surrounding the Federal Reserve's meeting next week. Traders say a lack of economic data will likely make investors unsure about buying stocks until the Fed's interest rate decision.

Jay Suskind, head trader at Ryan Beck & Co., says Tuesday was more of a quiet stabilization in the market after Monday's sell-off. "Inflation, stagflation, interest rates — there are all those words out there making this a very tough market," he says.

Although May housing starts were better than expected, a weak June outlook dragged down home builders. D.R. Horton fell 61 cents to $23.40, Hovnanian Enterprises lost 34 cents to $28.65, and Toll Bros. slid 49 cents to $26.05.

•Warner Music Group dropped $1.16 to $26.18, while China Unicom rose 7 cents to $8.66. Warner signed a deal to distribute music to mobile-phone operator China Unicom's wireless customers.

•CFC International jumped $5.11, or 45%, to $16.41 and was the Nasdaq's biggest gainer. Illinois Tool Works is acquiring the holographic and specialty coated film producer for $16.75 a share, or about $90 million. Illinois Tool shares added 17 cents to $47.60.

•Actuant skidded $10.12, or 18%, to $46.58. The industrial manufacturer said its third-quarter profit grew 34% but forecast lower earnings in the fourth quarter.

•Greenhill & Co. climbed $2.37 to $55.08 on news the investment bank agreed to buy Canada-based investment firm Beaufort Partners for an undisclosed amount.

•Golf Galaxy sliced off $2.51 to $12.43. The golf retailer posted a higher first-quarter profit but cut its guidance for the year.

Dow Rises 32.73 After Rate Fears Rein In Gains (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

After initially pushing higher in response to reassuring housing-construction data, stocks ran out of steam yesterday and finished with a sigh.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average clung to a gain, rising 32.73 points, or 0.30%, to 10974.84. It had been up as much as 87.72 points at midday. It remains ahead 2.4% for 2006, but down 5.7% since hitting a six-year high on May 10.

Most stocks finished down. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index edged down 0.02 point, virtually unchanged in percentage terms, to 1240.12, still down 0.7% for the year. Volatile tech stocks were among the harder hit, driving the tech-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index down 0.16%, or 3.36 points, to 2107.06, a decline of 4.5% for the year.

Some economists are starting to predict that the Federal Reserve could raise its target for short-term interest rates three more times this year, starting at the central bank's meeting of policymakers Wednesday and Thursday of next week, to prevent inflation by slowing the economy. If the Fed continues its practice of quarter-point increases each time, it would push the target rate to 5.75%, higher than most investors expected just a few weeks ago. Rising rates crimp corporate profits, and uncertainty about how high they will go makes investors nervous about owning stocks and other securities.

Yesterday, "investors used the opportunity to sell into the rally," which explains the weak finish, said stock trader Larry Peruzzi at Boston Company Asset Management. He said he saw many late-day computer-driven trades, suggesting that some investment pros have decided to use stock gains as an opportunity to pull back until the outlook becomes clearer.

The day started on an upbeat note, with stocks rising after May housing starts came in stronger than expected, even as new building permits fell. The data quieted fears about a sharp housing downturn, suggesting that any real-estate decline is occurring at a moderate rate.

Foreign stocks were little changed on the day, as were oil futures. Gold futures, which have been under fire, rebounded $8.10 to $576.90 a troy ounce.

Outside the U.S., stocks were unchanged in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, remained at 202.37.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed and bond prices fell. The 10-year Treasury note fell 2/32, or 63 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 5.151%. The 30-year bond was down 4/32 to yield 5.189%.

The dollar weakened, to 114.93 yen, down from 115.42; the euro rose to $1.2583 from $1.2577.

Facing Up To Inflation (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

If the Federal Reserve raises interest rates at the end of June, as seems probable, it will likely be criticized for making a fetish of inflation and, in the process, risking an American or global recession. There are already signs that the U.S. economy is slowing. Stock markets around the world have declined sharply. Why should the Fed make matters worse by nudging up rates even a tad? This is a sensible-sounding complaint. Based on what we now know, it's also wrong.

We have an inflation problem that we need to cure before it gets worse. A central lesson of the past half-century is that inflationary psychology, once embedded in price- and wage-setting practices, is stubborn and destructive. It leads to frequent recessions. It stunts the rise in living standards. People detest it. They're frightened by rapid and unpredictable price changes. We learned these lessons the hard way. From 1960 to 1979, inflation rose from 1.4 percent to 13.3 percent. Only the horrific 1980-82 slump (peak monthly unemployment: 10.8 percent) repressed it.

The job of the Federal Reserve is "to take away the punch bowl just when the party gets going," William McChesney Martin Jr., the Fed chairman from 1951 to 1970, once famously said. As business cycles mature, inflationary and speculative pressures build. Demand begins to overtake supply. Companies find it easier to raise prices. Workers find it easier to win bigger wage increases. Greater optimism encourages riskier, often foolhardy, investments. The present economic expansion began in December 2001. It's now showing many telltale danger signs.

Inflation, though nowhere near double digits, is clearly rising. The government last week released the consumer price index (CPI) for May. It was up 4.2 percent from a year earlier. The comparable figures for the past three years were 3.4 percent (2005), 3.3 percent (2004) and 1.9 percent (2003). Even these comparisons may understate the reality. In the past three months, the increase in the CPI on an annualized basis (projected for a year) is 5.7 percent.

The obvious remedy is to slow the economy's growth -- make it harder for companies, workers and landlords to raise prices, wages and rents. But some economists contend that the Fed should discount the latest inflation reports and suspend any further interest rate increases. (The Federal Open Market Committee meets June 28 and 29.) Here's the gist of their argument:

First, the Fed's been raising interest rates since June 2004. The overnight Fed funds rate has gone from 1 percent to 5 percent. Higher interest rates operate on the economy with a delay. Finally, the economy's responding. Home building and consumer spending are weakening. In May industrial production dropped 0.1 percent. Eleven of 17 manufacturing sectors, including autos, declined. Wage increases have been modest. Inflation will subside; it, too, is a lagging indicator.

Second, inflation statistics are misleading and falsely alarming. Oil explains much of the surge. Gasoline prices are up 33.4 percent and home fuel prices 13.5 percent in the past year. Obviously the Fed can't change these. Without them, so-called core inflation (all prices except energy and food) is fairly tame. For the past year, it's 2.4 percent. Even this is skewed by a quirky housing component. The CPI doesn't count home prices directly. Instead, it converts rents into homeownership costs. Because rents are rising, so is homeownership. Weird, say critics.

You should treat these objections skeptically. It's not that they're wrong. But they can all be qualified. Yes, home building is down -- but commercial construction is up. Yes, industrial production dropped in May -- but it increased (0.8 percent) in April. Yes, core inflation is a useful concept if energy and food prices go down after they go up. But if oil prices stay up -- as they are doing -- it's less useful. (Even so, core inflation is outside the Fed's comfort zone of 1 to 2 percent.) Yes, the CPI's housing component is quirky -- but it's not necessarily wrong. Rents are rising partly because home prices have increased so much that more people are forced to rent. If the CPI counted home prices directly, it would have gone up much more in 2004 and 2005.

All these arguments aim to minimize the inflation threat. To anyone who knows the history, this is eerily reminiscent of the 1960s and '70s. Then, economists underestimated inflation. They argued that a bit more wouldn't hurt or that increases reflected "temporary" pressures. In the resulting political and intellectual climate, the Fed pursued easy money and credit policies for too long. It tried to drive economic growth up and unemployment down. The results were perverse: double-digit inflation, four recessions from 1969 to 1982 and higher unemployment.

Since 1982 there have been only two mild recessions. The lesson is that low inflation promotes more stable economic growth. The Fed should heed that. True, it could trip into a recession. But without dramatic evidence of a weakening economy, the greater danger is a renewal of inflationary psychology. It's time for the punch bowl to go.

When Hedging Doesn't Pay Off (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

The financial world has been suffering lately from Post-Greenspan Stress Disorder. The new chairman of the Federal Reserve, Ben Bernanke, has been accident-prone, and some investors have gotten the jitters. They might be reassured if they paid more attention to the country's second most powerful monetary official, New York Fed President Timothy Geithner.

Geithner watches for the big, scary meltdowns that could threaten the entire financial system. Like his mentor, former Treasury secretary Robert Rubin, he's a worrier -- always looking for the "systemic risks," the cascading events that can trigger a panicky rush for the exits. He's in a constant dialogue with the nation's biggest banks and investment firms about how they manage risk.

As with globalization itself, the good news and the bad news in these markets is the same -- greater interdependence. Financial markets appear to be better protected today thanks to complicated products, known as derivatives, that allow different kinds of financial risk to be shared and traded around the world. You can hedge against almost anything these days, from hurricanes to interest rate hikes. The danger is that if this complex protective scaffolding ever failed, it could bring some of the global financial architecture down with it.

The past six weeks have been an interesting period for Geithner and his fellow central bankers. Some of the world's smartest investors, who run the exotic portfolios known as "hedge funds," got caught in a sudden, unexpected downdraft in May. The investments that had proved most profitable -- in emerging markets, commodities and other alternatives to large-cap stocks -- all took nose dives. Investment strategies that supposedly were well hedged, so that losses in one sector would be offset by gains in another, turned out to be "correlated," so that they all went down together.

The hedge fund industry prides itself on its "value at risk" (VAR) models. But last month, traders say, some markets moved "six standard deviations" -- in other words, six times the expected range of volatility. The fancy VAR models, based on past experience, failed to predict the actual damage.

The European Central Bank got so worried that it warned this month that hedge funds were the financial equivalent of bird flu and could pose a "major risk for financial stability." And Raghuram Rajan, the chief economist of the International Monetary Fund, cautioned June 8 that hedge fund managers were all chasing the same investment magic they describe as "alpha." This was driving them like a herd into riskier assets and making them all vulnerable to the same potential reversals.

The new alpha-mania may be the market's latest folly. Ordinary investors make do with what's known as the "beta," which means basic market returns as embodied by the Standard & Poor's 500 composite index of stocks. But the pros want to emulate hedge fund managers in chasing the outsize "alpha" returns. Almost by definition, those will come from more exotic investments -- from the tempting emerging markets in China and India, say, or commodities.

"Portable alpha" is the term investment managers have given to the notion that by moving out of the S&P 500 universe, they can match the performance of George Soros. It's an investment version of Lake Wobegon, where all the children are above average. One factor pushing the market is the wildly outsize reward for alpha performance. For the top 26 hedge fund managers, the average pay last year was a jaw-dropping $363 million, according to a survey by Alpha magazine.

Alas, the portfolio managers can't all be above average. Indeed, as more and more asset managers began chasing the outsize returns, they bid up the prices of their pet alternative assets -- to the peak levels from which they began to plummet last month. Since May 10 emerging markets have fallen by about 25 percent, for example. Hedge funds have taken a smaller but real hit. In May the Credit Suisse/Tremont Hedge Fund Index was down 1.3 percent, the first time since October it has posted a negative monthly return.

Geithner's answer has been to stress the basics. In recent speeches, he has urged financial institutions to invest in better back-office infrastructure, so that they know what's on their books and can trade efficiently even during crises. And he urged senior managers to make sure they understand the real risk they're carrying in their portfolios, by conducting tougher "what if" stress testing.

In the financial world, as in most things, people learn only by making mistakes. That's why it's useful to have little crises, like the one that swept through the hedge fund world in May. Lots of little crises reduce the risk of the big one.

Congressional Democrats Pass GOP In Funds (AP-Y2)

Senate and House Democrats, optimistic about their election-year prospects, have more money in the bank for the midterm contests than their Republican counterparts.

Some four months before the voting, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee has $33.5 million cash on hand compared to $18.3 million for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, the groups said Tuesday. The Democrats raised $4.7 million in May; the Republicans collected $4.3 million in the month.

"Our fundraising success reflects a deep desire for change and recognition that the best way to get things back on track is by electing more Democrats to the Senate," said Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., chairman of the Democratic committee.

Although the GOP committees trail in cash on hand, it has the advantage of the presidency and the fundraiser in chief as well as majority control of the House and Senate.

On Monday, Bush helped Republicans raise $27 million for the fall congressional contests, with $15 million for Senate candidates and $12 million for House candidates. The numbers will be reflected in the next filing. The president used the event to reassure Republicans that they will prevail in November.

"We're going to keep the House and we're going to keep the Senate thanks to all of you here," Bush said.

House Democrats said they had $24.5 million cash on hand after raising $5.5 million last month. House Republicans said they had $21.9 million at the end of May after collecting $5.6 million.

Dems Boast Of Fundraising Totals (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, June 21, 2006

Congressional Democrats yesterday trumpeted the sums of money they raised in the second quarter of the year.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) has raised $64.2 million in the 2006 election cycle; it raised $4.7 million and spent $3.7 million in May, according to spokesman Phil Singer. The DSCC also reported it holds a 2-1 cash-on-hand advantage over the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC).

“Throughout the country, people are saying that we need a new direction and are looking to the Democrats,” said Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), the DSCC chairman. “Our fundraising success reflects a deep desire for change.”

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), led by Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), reported having $24.5 million in the bank and raising $5.5 million in May. The House Democrats' campaign arm started the election cycle with $12 million in debt, which Emanuel said has been reduced to $500,000.

"These new funds are exactly what we need to fight for the new direction that the American people want and deserve," Emanuel said. "While all the Republicans have to offer the American people is two more years just like the last six and a wageless recovery and an endless occupation, Democrats are fighting for change."

The National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) said it had $21.9 million on hand and no debt at the end of May. The committee raised $5.6 million last month.

DCCC Has Cash Edge For Now (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, June 21, 2006

Both House and Senate Democrats ended May with more money in the bank than their GOP counterparts, according to monthly fundraising reports due to be filed Tuesday with the Federal Election Commission.

While the Senate Democrats' campaign arm has consistently shown more available cash than the National Republican Senatorial Committee this cycle, this is the first time in recent memory that House Democrats have banked more than Republicans.

Their financial advantage isn't expected to last long, however.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee ended May with about $2.6 million more in cash than the National Republican Congressional Committee. The NRCC had $21.9 million while the DCCC had $24.5 million.

However, that difference is likely to be erased by the time the committees file their June monthly reports, after the NRCC raised $15 million at the annual President's Dinner fundraiser Monday night. Although that sum is collected over several months' time, Republicans are confident they'll regain the financial edge.

"I would expect this is the last month this occurs," said NRCC Communications Director Carl Forti.

The two committees raised almost even amounts in May, with the DCCC taking in $5.5 million and the NRCC collecting $5.6 million.

But the NRCC's heavy spending on the special election in California's 50th district accounted for the cash-on-hand difference.

"We spent what it took in California 50 and we won," Forti said. "And we will have a resources advantage come fall."

But that didn't stop Democrats from crowing.

"These new funds are exactly what we need to fight for the new direction that the American people want and deserve," said DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.). The DCCC still carries a little more than $1 million in debt.

On the Senate side, Democrats raised $4.7 million in May, bringing their total raised for the cycle to $64.2 million. They have raised more than $23 million more than they had at this same point in the 2004 cycle. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee spent $3.7 million in May, leaving $33.5 million in its bank account at the end of last month.

The NRSC collected $4.3 million in the period and as of May 31 had raised $57.8 million in the 2006 cycle. The committee has raised $22.3 million more in the 2006 cycle than it had at this point in the previous cycle.

While the NRSC banked slightly more than the DSCC did in May, the committee's burn rate has been considerably higher for the cycle and Senate Republicans remain at a substantial cash disadvantage. The NRSC had $18.3 million at the end of May compared to the $33.5 million for the DSCC. The NRSC's take from the President's Dinner is estimated to be about $12 million.

Rahm Nixes Second Term (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, June 21, 2006

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) will step down from the House Democrats' campaign operation after the November elections to spend more time with his family, he told The Hill yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0036407

Emanuel has been a leading strategist, fundraiser, cheerleader and recruiter for House Democrats as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) since the beginning of last year. His uncommon pairing of cunning efficiency and profanity-laced outbursts has won him both plaudits and opprobrium, but nearly all Democrats concede that he deserves substantial credit for their rosy election prospects this year.

"I served one term, and my kids are all at a certain point. They've had it," Emanuel told The Hill. "I'll do whatever the caucus wants in the sense of helping the next chairperson in any capacity, but I will not serve as chairman another cycle." He and his wife, Amy, have three children under 10.

Although most DCCC chairmen serve only a single term, many Democrats welcomed Emanuel's presence and held out hope he would serve a second term.

Emanuel's comments came just as the DCCC was releasing its latest fundraising total. The DCCC raised $5.5 million in May, slightly behind its rival, the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), which raised $5.6 million. The Democrats finished the month with $24.5 million on hand, compared with $21.9 million for the Republicans.

Across the Capitol, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee also beat its counterpart (see related story, Page 6).

Several of Emanuel's colleagues were hopeful that he could be convinced to stay, noting that he had been reluctant to take the position when first offered it by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

"I hope he'll change his mind. We're going to have a battle royal in 2008, and we'll need him." said Rep. Artur Davis (D-Ala.). "He expressed the same concerns about family, about lack of time, the last time around."

Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz (D-Fla.) concurred.

"I bet there are a whole lot of members who are going to beg him not to leave. We're not above groveling!" she quipped. Still, if he is resolved to step down, she called it a "good news, bad news" situation.

"He's a supertough act to follow. It would be daunting for any member to step into his shoes," she said. "But on the other hand he had created a tremendously solid foundation and firm ground to stand on for his successor."

Emanuel has spent much time on the road in the past year, raising money and recruiting candidates. Pelosi joked in a recent interview that she sees more of his children than he does. He typically carries a leather portfolio filled with his children's letters, photos and drawings, an aide said.

While traversing the country, he has been concerned about fundraising decisions in Washington at the Democratic National Committee (DNC). Emanuel reportedly stormed out of a meeting with DNC Chairman Howard Dean several weeks ago, exasperated that the Republican National Committee (RNC) had banked far greater reserves than its Democratic counterpart.

Asked whether Dean is doing a good job, Emanuel did not directly answer the question.

"We have the resources to do what we need to do to help our candidates," he said. "The DCCC will stay competitive. ... This will be first cycle since 1994 that DCCC will be at dollar parity with the NRCC."

At the end of May, the RNC had $43.1 million on hand while the DNC had $10.3 million.

Dean sent an e-mail to supporters yesterday defending his strategy of spending money on party operations in all 50 states rather than hoarding it for congressional races.

"We're in the middle of our campaign to explain the 50-state strategy and answer questions about its purpose," Dean told backers. He referred to a letter from Utah Democratic Party Chairman Wayne Holland Jr. calling the approach the "future of our party here in Utah."

"'Win for today' is not a long-term strategy by itself, and it has left millions of Americans and vast areas of the country without a healthy political dialogue.

On ethics issues, Emanuel voiced support for Pelosi's decision to oust Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) from the Ways and Means Committee while he faces a government corruption investigation, citing the need to chart the high road on ethics.

"There's a clear distinction between the two parties over how a member is supposed to conduct themselves. We threw Bill Jefferson off the committee. They gave [former Rep.] Tom DeLay [R-Texas] a standing ovation on the House floor."

Some of DeLay's former aides have pleaded guilty in a wide-ranging government corruption probe, and DeLay is under indictment in a Texas campaign-finance case.

DOJ_NMG_0036408

Jefferson's removal irked members of the Congressional Black Caucus (CBC), who felt he was being unfairly singled out. The group has criticized Emanuel, saying he failed to hire enough minority consultants and did not seek the caucus's counsel. The Congressional Hispanic Caucus has at times registered similar concerns about Emanuel.

The DCCC chairman acknowledges that he has had a rocky relationship with some colleagues.

"There's no doubt I could change my style and be more patient," he conceded, noting that his wife had suggested they name a fourth child Patience as a "subtle reminder."

But he argues that he does not play favorites.

"I am impatient, [but] I'm impatient with everybody. ... I push the Blue Dogs as hard as I push the New Democrats as hard as I push the CBC. Either you do or don't believe this is a historical election."

He lamented a lack of effort from some of his colleagues.

"I've ruffled feathers with a purpose. There's a sclerosis that's set in. I've ruffled feathers of elder members of caucus with intention of recruiting younger members. I've ruffled of New Democrats and Blue Dogs. I've ruffled feathers, no doubt about it."

Tenn. May Give Dems Sixth Senator They Need (HILL)

By Dick Morris

The Hill, June 21, 2006

For months I have wondered which would be the sixth seat the Democrats could win to capture the Senate.

Because Vice President Dick Cheney would, of course, break any 50-50 tie in favor of the GOP, the Democrats, down 55-45 now, have to gain six seats in the 2006 election to get control.

Five prime Democratic targets have been obvious for some time. According to the latest Rasmussen polls, Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) belongs on the endangered-species list, trailing Bob Casey Jr., his Democratic challenger, by 56-33. Also behind, although by lesser margins, are Sens. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio), who trails Rep. Sherrod Brown by 44-41, and Conrad Burns (R-Mont.), losing to Jon Tester by 48-44.

Burns, handicapped by his association with Jack Abramoff, may be headed to defeat. DeWine, a former client of mine, has manifest campaign skills and could come back, but it doesn't look good.

Ahead of their Democratic challengers but well below 50 percent are Sens. Jim Talent (R-Mo.), who holds a narrow 43-40 lead over Claire McCaskill, and Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), who leads Sheldon Whitehouse by 44-42. Talent is a great candidate and could come back but would probably be defeated in a Democratic trend. Chafee, a prime RINO (Republican in name only), never really has captured the hearts of his state after succeeding his father and could also be a casualty of a GOP landslide in one of the country's most Democratic states.

If all five lose, a fair bet right now, who would be the sixth seat without which the Republicans would remain in charge of the Senate?

Now the Zogby poll indicates that Harold Ford, the Democratic candidate to succeed Majority Leader Bill Frist (R) in Tennessee, is running a surprisingly strong race against his three possible Republican opponents. That could be the sixth seat.

Zogby has Ford tied with former Rep. Ed Bryant, with each winning 42 percent of the vote, and trailing by a small margin, 43-41, against former Rep. Van Hilleary. A third possible candidate, Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker, leads Ford by 46-42.

Ford, one of a new generation of African-American politicians with considerable appeal across party lines, has two defects as he runs for the open seat: He is black in a state with the lowest African-American population in the old Confederacy, and his uncle is facing serious corruption charges. But both of these drawbacks are quite obvious to the voters of Tennessee. If they are insufficient to doom his candidacy, this man may be a winner.

Ford himself is a Southern version of Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), a moderate who has the capacity to attract independent votes. Ford rejects the extreme liberal ideology of many other black Democratic congressmen. He has also, one hopes, absorbed the lessons his ethically challenged family has to teach him about keeping his nose clean. Harold Ford is exactly the kind of black Democrat whom moderates would love to love.

There are other possible problems on the Democratic horizon. The most serious is in New Jersey, where the open seat of former Sen. Jon Corzine (D), now the governor, is contested by Corzine's anointed heir, Democrat Bob Menendez, and Republican Tom Kean Jr., the son of the former governor.

Rasmussen's polling has Kean holding a narrow 40-37 lead. Since Kean is obviously a statewide name and Menendez has been little-known outside of his district, the congressman would seem to have the edge. New Jersey, once a toss-up state, has become a true blue enclave largely because of Hispanic in-migration, a vote that will turn out in droves for Menendez.

Rasmussen also reports that Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) has been falling of late in his polling, so that might be another Republican target. But neither Washington state nor New Jersey can be counted on for the Republican Party.

All of this is to show that President Bush had better shake himself up and address the gas-price and energy issues that he has so far failed to speak out about, except for one mention in his long-ago State of the Union address. It is only by an ongoing relevance to this nation's key problem that Bush can hope to avert the disaster looming on the horizon.

Lieberman Could Put Leaders In Bind (RC)

By John Stanton And Nicole Duran

Roll Call, June 21, 2006

Should Sen. Joe Lieberman (D) opt to run as an Independent for re-election if he is defeated in Connecticut's August Democratic primary by political upstart Ned Lamont, Senate Democratic leaders could find themselves in uncharted political waters in deciding which candidate to back against Republican Alan Schlesinger and whether sanctions would be imposed on Lieberman for leaving the party even temporarily.

Although the Senate has twice before seen incumbents launch Independent re-election bids following a primary defeat — including, ironically, an unsuccessful 1970 run by the late Sen. Thomas Dodd (D-Conn.), the father of Connecticut's other Democratic Senator, Chris Dodd — neither of those instances seems likely to provide a precedent for Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.), according to Associate Senate Historian Don Ritchie.

Publicly, both Lieberman and Senate Democrats insist they are making no plans for a potential bid as an Independent and insist they are confident he will prevail in his party's primary contest.

"He said 'I'm a Democrat, period,'" Lieberman spokeswoman Marion Steinfels said. "Sen. Lieberman has said he always will be a Democrat. This is all speculation. Our campaign is completely 100 percent focused on winning Aug. 8. No one is sitting around strategizing" about an Independent bid.

DSCC spokesman Phil Singer called speculation about a possible Independent run "much ado about nothing: Joe Lieberman is and will remain a candidate in the Democratic primary." Schumer, however, refused to rule out backing Lieberman should he run without the party label when asked about it at a news conference last week.

When pressed on the matter by a reporter, Schumer said: "There are a lot of choices" if Lieberman loses the primary. "You can run as an Independent, you can run as an independent Democrat ... we'll cross that bridge when we come to it."

With Lamont mounting a serious challenge, Senate Democrats are making a point of rallying around Lieberman, with many lawmakers expected to travel to the Nutmeg State in the coming weeks. His Senate Democratic colleagues already have donated more than $49,000 since 2004 to his re-election campaign.

"I disagree with Joe on the war, but there are a lot of things we agree on," one Democratic Senator close to Lieberman said. The lawmaker, who has clashed with Lieberman in the past, nevertheless said that he will travel to Connecticut in the run-up to the primary to campaign for his colleague.

The Senator also argued that Lieberman is the stronger candidate and that a Lamont win could seriously damage the party's ability to take control of the Senate. "Joe Lieberman represents our best chance of taking back the majority. I think that if Ned Lamont wins that primary we're in real danger of losing that seat" in November, the Senator said.

Privately, however, Democrats acknowledge that Lieberman — whose positions on the Iraq war and often close relationship with the Bush administration have rankled many in the party — could force his fellow Senators to choose between backing one of their own and abiding by the wishes of the state's Democratic voters. Lieberman's decision to leave the door open to an Independent run has angered many rank-and-file Democratic activists and has added an unwanted wrinkle to Democrats' long-shot efforts to gain control of the Senate in November.

"Lieberman running as an Independent will do major damage to our party, undoing all the work we have been doing building relationships between Democrats in Washington and the [liberal] base back home," a senior Democratic aide said, warning that "If the DSCC and the establishment support a Lieberman Independent bid, it would send a message to state parties that they don't matter anymore. That would be devastating. Lieberman needs to run in the primary, follow the rules, and work hard for a win. Any other option should be off the table."

Ari Melber, a former Senate staffer and Web logger on Huffingtonpost.com agreed, saying that, "if he loses the primary and bolts the party for his own political agenda, it would reveal that he is more concerned with staying in power than honoring Connecticut's primary process. In the end, Lieberman brought these questions on himself. He says he is proud of being a Democrat, so why won't he commit to supporting the Democratic nominee?"

Melber also argues that the base's unhappiness with the Connecticut lawmaker goes beyond his position on the war, noting that on several key issues Lieberman has broken with the bulk of his party.

"I think it's about much more than Iraq," Melber said, noting that President Bush and Vice President Cheney "cite Lieberman in speeches to attack broader Democratic plans and values" and that angers the base significantly.

Leadership aides said neither Reid nor Schumer is preparing for fallout from a possible Independent run and insisted no discussions have occurred on whether to back an Independent campaign by Lieberman or whether the Caucus would force him to step down as ranking member of the Senate's Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

State party leaders in Connecticut are also hopeful that a three-way race is a dilemma they will not have to face.

"I will be endorsing the Democratic Party candidate, who I anticipate will be Joe Lieberman," said Nancy DiNardo, the state party chairman.

According to Ritchie, an Independent campaign by Lieberman would represent only the third time that an incumbent would have taken such a step in modern Senate history. In the case of Dodd, following his loss to Joseph Duffey in the Democratic primary, he mounted an Independent bid, garnering 24 percent of the popular vote to Duffy's 33 percent, essentially splitting the Democratic vote and allowing GOP challenger Lowell Weicker to win the election. (Lieberman unseated Weicker in 1988, and Weicker would later win election as Connecticut governor running as an Independent.)

However, the Dodd case was significantly different than this year's election. In 1967, Dodd was censured by the Senate for inappropriate personal use of campaign funds, according to Ritchie. Dodd was also neither the chairman nor ranking member of a committee, unlike Lieberman. Lieberman has also not been the subject of any ethics scandals or censure.

Similarly, Lieberman's circumstances are only partially similar to those surrounding the Senate's other example in which former Sen. Jacob Javits (R-N.Y.) ran on the Liberal Party ticket after being defeated in the GOP primary by Alfonse D'Amato. Although Javits was ranking member of the Foreign Relations Committee — and was sworn in as the committee chairman for his last day in the Senate — his 1980 Liberal Party challenge to D'Amato was, according Ritchie, prompted largely out of anger at D'Amato for basing much of his primary challenge on Javits' poor health rather than his record in office.

Lieberman's 'Little Fun' In Animated Ad Rankles Opponent (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

A couple of old hands in Connecticut politics are ganging up on Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D).

George Jepsen, a former chairman of the state Democratic Party and former state Senate majority leader, on Monday endorsed the candidacy of Ned Lamont, a businessman who is closing in on Lieberman in the polls. Lamont's support has come largely from antiwar activists angry with Lieberman's stance on Iraq. Jepsen's endorsement follows one from former senator Lowell P. Weicker Jr., who was defeated by Lieberman in 1988.

DOJ_NMG_0036411

"It's a very difficult decision, because I've known Joe Lieberman for 20-odd years, and I like him and I thought he's sincere in what he believes," Jepsen said. "But it's become increasingly clear on most of the major issues of the day that I don't share his values. . . . I personally believe the war is possibly the worst foreign policy mistake of the post-World War II era, and Joe has been an enabler of that."

Recent polls showed Lieberman holding a lead of 55 percent to 40 percent over Lamont among likely voters in the Aug. 8 Democratic primary.

Lieberman's campaign recently posted a Web ad poking fun at the Weicker-Lamont alliance. "Remember Lowell Weicker? Well, bears never forget. He's never gotten over losing his Senate race to Joe Lieberman," says the ad, which features animation of a bear. "But instead of coming out of hibernation, he's sent his bear cub, instead -- Ned Lamont."

Lieberman spokeswoman Marion Steinfels explained the ad as having "a little fun with the Greenwich billionaires uniting against Senator Lieberman." Lamont spokesman Liz Dupont-Diehl called the ad "pathetic."

Lieberman has won a string of endorsements from prominent Democrats around the state, including the state party chairman and state Senate majority leader. One endorsement he won't be getting is that of his 2000 running mate, Al Gore. In an interview Sunday with Al Hunt of Bloomberg TV, Gore called Lieberman "my close friend" but said, "I typically do not get involved in Democratic primaries."

Gore, who has opposed the Iraq war, did endorse former Vermont governor Howard Dean in the 2004 Democratic presidential primaries.Democrats Cash In

For the first time in recent memory, the Democratic Party's House and Senate campaign committees have more money to spend on races than their Republican counterparts.

Five months before the midterm elections, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee ended May with $24.5 million in the bank, compared with the National Republican Congressional Committee's $21.9 million, according to reports filed with the Federal Election Commission yesterday.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee had $33.5 million at the end of last month and the National Republican Senatorial Committee showed $18.5 million.

Republicans still maintain a wide advantage in one arena. The Republican National Committee ended May with $43 million in the bank; the Democratic National Committee had $10.3 million.Thompson Won't Challenge Kohl

Former governor Tommy Thompson announced Monday that he will not seek the Senate seat in Wisconsin, which leaves Republicans with no major challenger to Democratic Sen. Herb Kohl.

"Governor Thompson will not run for the United States Senate in 2006," Thompson's office said in a statement, according to the Associated Press. "He is enjoying his work in the private sector and decided against a return to public office at this time."

Thompson, 64, announced last month he would not run for governor but left open the possibility of running against Kohl, a three-term incumbent. Once the longest-serving governor in Wisconsin, Thompson resigned in 2001 to become President Bush's first secretary of Health and Human Services.

Lieberman Vs. The Democrats (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

Connecticut Sen. Joseph Lieberman is as seasoned a pol as anyone can find, but he seems to have forgotten the very purpose of elections.

In a remarkable interview he recently gave to The Post's David S. Broder [op-ed, June 18], the Democrats' 2000 vice presidential nominee sounded appalled that his fellow Democrats might, in his state's upcoming August primary, reject his reelection bid because he doesn't think his party should criticize the president on the conduct of the Iraq war. (By most indications, his primary opponent, businessman Ned Lamont, is mounting a strong challenge.)

"I know I'm taking a position that is not popular within the party," Lieberman told Broder, "but that is a challenge for the party -- whether it will accept diversity of opinion or is on a kind of crusade or jihad of its own to have everybody toe the line. No successful political party has ever done that."

That's a rather stunning assertion. If parties were based on the acceptance of diversity of opinion on the most important issues of the day, they would lack the definition to be parties at all. And the conduct and duration of our involvement in Iraq is, by the measure of every single poll, the No. 1 issue in the minds of the American people -- a majority of whom believe that the Bush administration has botched the war about as badly as a war can be botched.

Now, maybe I've had this backward all my life, but I thought that elections were held to enable voters to choose between candidates espousing different points of view on the most important issues. Lieberman seems to believe that elections exist to enable voters not to choose -- indeed, to "accept diversity of opinion." And that if voters have the temerity to go ahead and choose anyway, they have crossed the line between party and sect in their zeal "to have everybody toe the line."

Toe the line? On Iraq? The Democrats? What line would that be? Last week, when the Republican leadership in the House brought forth a resolution that rejected setting a timetable for withdrawing troops and that called the war an integral part of the fight against global terrorism, 42 Democrats voted yes and 149 Democrats voted no. This week two groups of Democratic senators have introduced rival resolutions on Iraq policy in the Senate: one calling for the withdrawal of most ground troops by July 1, 2007, and the other calling on the president to begin phased redeployment of troops by the end of this year.

Whatever the Democrats' flaws, moving in lock step on Iraq isn't one of them. Indeed, the Republicans seem to have concluded that the uniformity of their own message on Iraq -- unpopular though it may be -- plays better than the Democrats' cacophony.

Lieberman's problem is not that he faces expulsion from a sect but that he has chosen to stand outside what remains a big, messy tent of a party. Moreover, he seems to have reversed the roles that the two parties play when it comes to Iraq.

By criticizing the president on the war, he has said, the Democrats are playing partisan politics. His opponent, Lieberman told Broder, criticized him for breaking "Democratic unity. . . . Well, dammit, I wasn't thinking about Democratic unity. It was a moment to put the national interest above partisan interest."

How's that again? To criticize Bush on the war is partisan, while refusing to criticize Bush on the war affirms the national interest? That's taking a rather partisan -- a pro-Bush partisan -- view of the national interest. Lieberman is surely right that one party has exploited the war for partisan gain, but that party is the GOP. From forcing through a resolution authorizing the war on the eve of the 2002 elections to last week's vote in the House, the Republicans have continually used the war to play gotcha with any Democrats from swing states or districts with the guts to dissent from the administration's non-reality-based view of the conflict.

In talking with Broder, Lieberman also expressed a kind of wry nostalgia for the pre-primary days when political bosses could assemble slates of candidates essentially by themselves. But the last stand of the bosses came in 1968, when machine-appointed delegates to the Democratic National Convention nominated Hubert Humphrey for president even though the voters in those states that had held primaries had favored the anti-Vietnam War candidacies of Robert Kennedy and Eugene McCarthy. Thereafter, delegates in every state were selected in primaries and caucuses, as party leaders concluded that voters would demand -- and even deserved -- a say on issues as fundamental as Vietnam. To Joe Lieberman's apparent dismay, Iraq is just such an issue, and the voters of his state are just irresponsible enough to judge him on it.

The Great Democratic Hope (WSJ)

By Ross Douthat

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

Iowa and New Hampshire are still 18 months away, but the 2008 presidential campaign has already entered its Cuomo hour -- the twilight period before a race when the press grows weary of the likely candidates and begins casting about for big names and dark horses. It's a moment when imaginations run wild: Conservative pundits confidently announce that only Rudy can beat Hillary; a glorified PowerPoint presentation is all it takes for Al Gore to be anointed savior of his party; and the fence-sitting politicians who want to run for president someday try to read the tea leaves and figure out if that someday should be now.

History suggests that the answer should be "yes" for almost all of them, potential frontrunners and long shots alike. If Rudy Giuliani ever wants to run, for instance, the case for him to do so in 2008 is practically airtight. The nomination is up for grabs and every rival has a weakness; the GOP will be looking for a white knight to replace a weakened president; and Mr. Giuliani's socially liberal record won't go away with time, whereas his personal appeal will fade as the memory of 9/11 diminishes. A similar calculus holds for Mr. Gore: If he wants to make another run, he's unlikely to have a better foil than Hillary Clinton or a media more likely to rally to his side. * * *

But consider a more difficult case -- Barack Obama, the Great Democratic Hope, who's currently pegged as a frontrunner for 2012, or perhaps 2016 or even 2020. Would it be presumptuous for Illinois's junior senator to run this time around, on the basis of charisma, a compelling personal story and just a few short years in Washington? Of course it would -- but it might also be the smartest thing he ever does.

Yes, Mr. Obama is young and untested; yes, there are older, better-qualified names in line ahead of him. But he's in the Senate, where presidential aspirations go to die, and his political stock may never be higher than it is right now, when liberal Democrats and centrists alike project their dreams upon him, undimmed by the disappointments and compromises of a long career. For the moment, he's part Clinton, part Roosevelt, part JFK and MLK; but in eight or 12 or 16 years, he might be John Kerry.

Would Mr. Obama win in 2008? Probably not -- though he's breaking records as a fund raiser, and sparking more enthusiasm from Democratic audiences than any of the other '08 hopefuls. As the New Republic's Ryan Lizza has pointed out, there will be no incumbents in 2008 to unseat, either in the primaries or the general election, whereas "if he waits until 2012, he will face the historically impossible task of unseating the incumbent president of his own party, or the historically difficult task of unseating the incumbent president of the opposition party." Meanwhile, 2016 and 2020 are eternities away. And as with John Edwards, a good showing in the primaries could make Mr. Obama the presumptive VP nominee -- while unlike Mr. Edwards, he'll have a Senate seat to fall back on if he loses.

The danger, of course, is that he might peak too soon -- the fate of Harold Stassen, for instance, who ran well in the 1948 GOP primaries and badly in eight presidential elections thereafter -- or else get laughed off the stage as an overly ambitious greenhorn. But in presidential politics, it's usually better to run too early than to wait, and wait, for a perfect moment that may not come. Losing the 1988 primaries at age 39 didn't hurt Al Gore's long-term prospects; it didn't hurt Ronald Reagan's future chances that he ran, and lost, against Gerald Ford in 1976; losing to George W. Bush in the 2000 primaries doesn't seem to have damaged John McCain's '08 hopes. Mr. Edwards was mocked as callow in 2004, but his VP slot on the Kerry ticket carried him to the doorstep of the White House. And sometimes you even shock the world and win -- as Bill Clinton did in 1992, like Jimmy Carter and JFK before.

Wait too long, on the other hand, and time can pass you by. Think of the Democratic bigwigs -- Mario Cuomo, Sam Nunn, Bill Bradley -- who declined to take on George H.W. Bush in 1992, preferring to wait for a more propitious moment. More recently, Hillary decided that 2008, not 2004, was the perfect year to make her bid, and while she may yet be proven right, you have to wonder if she might have improved on Mr. Kerry's close-but-no-cigar showing against George W. Bush.

Fence-sitting politicians will always be tempted to take a page from Richard Nixon, the most Machiavellian campaigner of them all, who supposedly bided his time after his defeat in '60, sitting out the 1964 race and letting the moment come to him. But Nixon didn't sit out '64, exactly -- in the months before that year's GOP convention he plotted on the sidelines, lining up chits and calling on donors, ready to seize the nomination if it seemed to be on offer. 1964 was hardly a perfect year for him to run, and it would have been a far harder race than the next election proved to be. But Nixon knew what today's political Hamlets would do well to remember -- that the perfect is the enemy of the best, and that if you want the White House you have to seize the day, because the "next election" doesn't always come.

The Democrats Reassess (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

This is idea week for the Democratic Party.

DOJ_NMG_0036414

On Monday, three veteran party strategists -- William Galston, Stan Greenberg and Ruy Teixeira -- launched a Web site (http://www.thedemocraticstrategist.org) with the goal of generating fact-based, empirically tested theories that might help Democrats resolve their policy differences and win more elections.

Yesterday saw another launch party, this time for Democracy, a quarterly journal that also will be available online (http://www.democracyjournal.org). The magazine will be edited by Andrei Cherny and Kenneth Baer, two younger veterans of recent party wars. Their goal is do for the Democrats what journals such as Public Interest did for conservatives and Republicans decades ago, which is to bring forward big ideas to challenge what they regard as the tired thinking that grips Democratic politicians.

On Thursday, NDN (formerly the New Democrat Network) will convene its annual conference. NDN, founded by Simon Rosenberg, has recently been in the forefront of moving beyond differences between centrists, liberals and the new world of blogs and net-roots activists, all with an eye toward tipping the political balance back in a Democratic direction.

Those in the middle of these events share a similar conviction, which is that for too long Republicans have been winning the battle of ideas (and often campaign strategy) in American politics, in part because conservatives invested in what is now a well-funded infrastructure of organizations that have produced ideas, thinkers, publications, strategists, and politicians who now control the White House, Congress and increasingly the federal judiciary.

There is also a belief shared at least by some of the participants that Democrats have ridden for too long on what are the fumes of the New Deal and the Great Society, which sustained Democrats for half a century. The first issue of Democracy offers articles on rethinking how to finance the health-care system, the economic and security challenges posed by differing birthrates around the world, and alternatives to redistribution to reduce inequality. The Democratic Strategist provides essays on competence as a campaign theme, protecting voting rights and demography's impact on politics.

Doug Hattaway, a Democratic communications consultant who worked for Al Gore's presidential campaign in 2000, recalled a moment of epiphany during a focus group of Democratic operatives and marketing professionals he attended last year. The participants were asked to say what Democratic accomplishments they were most proud of. Their responses filled several pages on a flip chart set up in the focus group facility. "We all realized there was nothing there within the past 30 years," Hattaway said.

Many Democratic politicians are still tied to past glory and what worries some of the progressives trying to generate new ideas is that elected officials are divorced from what is a lively debate-in-the-making on national security and domestic challenges. "Somehow or another this conversation does not really make its way to Democratic politicians very much," said Michael Tomasky, editor of the liberal American Prospect.

The lone exception he cited was Bill Clinton and his presidency.

Baer offered a sharper critique of the politicians, criticizing as poll-driven and uninspired the 2006 campaign agenda issued by congressional Democrats. "You could go through it line by line and write the poll questions that generated each line," he said.

The people in the middle of the Democrats' idea week seem to agree on another point, which is that the two-decade-old battle between party centrists and liberals may have run its course. "I think the old centrist-liberal debate in the party is to some extent dead," Teixeira said. "I think people have lost interest in that."

Galston noted that, while he is a charter member of the centrist movement, he split with many of his friends at the Democratic Leadership Council by opposing the war in Iraq. Rosenberg has been looking for fusion between center and left, between old strategist and new bloggers. On everything from fighting terrorism to assuring economic security in a time of globalization, many of these activists believe, the party will have to put aside left-right battles of the past and come up with fresh ideas.

It was left to some conservatives to offer Democrats comfort. Historian Francis Fukuyama, who has broken with other neo conservatives over Iraq, said the conservative era may be ending. "It does seem to me that the country is way overdue for one of those big pendulum swings back," he said.

William Kristol, editor of the conservative Weekly Standard, also reminded the progressives that internecine battles can be constructive, recalling vicious fights over the years that he said resulted in stronger conservative movement. "It's a big mistake when people lament that, gee, there's too much infighting on our side," he said.

Merrill Apparently Shot Himself On The Bay (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

Philip Merrill, the prominent publisher and former diplomat whose body was found floating in the Chesapeake Bay on Monday, suffered from a heart condition and apparently took his own life, his family said last night.

Merrill, 72, was found with a shotgun wound to the head and a small anchor tied around one or both ankles, according to a source familiar with the investigation.

"Obviously, he took his own life," the source said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the results of an autopsy had not been announced. "This is not an accident."

Merrill, who was famously brash and determined as the leader of a publishing empire that includes Washingtonian magazine and the Capital newspaper of Annapolis, lately had become fatigued and unmotivated, his family said in a statement late yesterday. They said he had undergone heart surgery a year ago and was on several medications as a result.

"Over the past four weeks we've observed that his spirit dimmed," the family said.

"We were concerned for his welfare but never imagined he would consider taking his own life," they said. "Unfortunately, with the same resolve and single-mindedness that made him so effective as an executive he appears to have made his decision to carry out his actions with tragic consequences."

The development was a startling turn in a series of tragic events that began June 10, when his boat was found under sail but empty and drifting in high winds. A massive search that day and for days later yielded nothing. Then, on Monday, a recreational boater found his body close to a shipping lane off Poplar Island, more than 11 miles from where his boat, the Merrilly, had been found.

"To be honest with you, I'm speechless," Tom Marquardt, executive editor of the Capital, said last night. "This ending does not change his accomplishments one iota."

Merrill was assistant secretary general to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in the early 1990s and president of the Export-Import Bank of the United States from 2002 until last year. He frequently took time away from his business to pursue diplomatic and intelligence assignments for the government. He served six administrations, mostly in the State and Defense departments.

His death recalled two other high-profile incidents involving prominent Washington area residents. In 1996, former CIA director William E. Colby died from drowning and exposure after falling from a canoe off Charles County. After his body was recovered more than a week later, authorities said he probably had a stroke or heart attack before the accident.

In 1978, another former high-level CIA employee, John A. Paisley, disappeared while sailing across the Chesapeake Bay. His body was found a week later near Solomons Island with a fatal gunshot wound in an apparent suicide.

Ex-Anchor Adrift After CBS News Cuts His Workload (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

Dan Rather accused CBS executives yesterday of not having "lived up to their obligation to allow me to do substantive work there" as the network announced his departure after a 44-year career.

CBS officials heaped praise on the longtime anchor, even as they were ushering him out the door yesterday. Rather, for his part, made clear his frustration with the network for refusing to renew his contract or give him an ample workload at "60 Minutes."

His departure "represents CBS's final acknowledgement, after a protracted struggle," that the network was making inadequate use of him, Rather said in a statement. "As for their offers of a future with only an office but no assignments, it just isn't in me to sit around doing nothing."

DOJ_NMG_0036416

CBS News President Sean McManus tried to accentuate the positive, likening Rather's career to those of Edward R. Murrow and Walter Cronkite.

"I'm sad this day has come," he said, "but really hope the challenges Dan talked about for him in the future provide the ability to do the great kind of work he wants to do."

Asked why the network is dropping the 74-year-old Rather, McManus said: "We just couldn't come up with an arrangement that had enough work to satisfy both him and CBS. If there had been a scenario that would have provided a workload that made sense for both CBS and Dan, we would have pursued that, but unfortunately that was not the case."

The network says it plans to pay tribute to Rather in a prime-time special this fall and is making a donation to his Texas alma mater, Sam Houston State University. Rather is expected to leave this week, well before the November expiration of his contract.

Rather, who anchored the "CBS Evening News" for 24 years, relinquished the post early last year after apologizing for a 2004 story -- based on documents that could not be authenticated -- that charged President Bush had received favorable treatment from the National Guard three decades ago.

McManus would not address whether the botched Guard story, which prompted the resignations of three senior network executives and the firing of Rather's producer, was a factor in CBS's decision to end Rather's career there. On the advice of company lawyers, McManus never met with Rather.

"It would be silly for me to try to list his enormous accomplishments and the contributions he made to CBS News," McManus said. "As time goes by, people will probably appreciate those more and more. I have nothing but respect and admiration for Dan Rather." CBS chief executive Les Moonves also hailed Rather in a statement for his "singular passion" and "dedication."

The Washington Post reported the decision to drop Rather last week, citing network sources as saying there was no room for him on "60 Minutes," in part because the program must find time for two part-time contributors, incoming anchor Katie Couric and CNN's Anderson Cooper.

"I'm going to miss him, just because he's been part of my life for so long," said Bob Schieffer, who met Rather while covering the Kennedy assassination and served as his interim successor. "I truly believe Dan Rather was a major figure in American journalism in the 20th century. His successes were larger than life, and his mistakes were larger than life."

While some CBS staff members say the network is treating Rather shabbily, many believe that he badly damaged the news division with his mishandling of the Guard story and that his departure is overdue. A number were shaking their heads over his recent comment to the New York Times that, having had little to do lately, he had gone five times to see the George Clooney film about Murrow, "Good Night, and Good Luck," sometimes by himself.

Rather covered wars from Vietnam to Yugoslavia to Iraq, political conventions and plenty of hurricanes in between, landing big interviews along the way. He was the first to interview President Bill Clinton after his impeachment, and the last Western journalist to sit down with Saddam Hussein before the 2003 U.S. invasion.

But Rather was also a lightning rod for conservatives, especially after his confrontational 1988 interview with Vice President George Bush over the Iran-contra scandal.

Mark Cuban, the billionaire owner of the Dallas Mavericks, confirmed on his blog that he is in discussions with Rather about launching a program on HDNet, a high-definition channel that reaches about 3 million homes. "We hope to do a deal where he produces a show that uncovers news. Information with a payoff. . . . I will tell you that there won't be any corporate considerations. No earnings per share issues. No worries about advertisers and what they might think," Cuban wrote.

Rather, who commanded a multimillion-dollar salary as the face of CBS News, maintained yesterday that "too much is made of anchors and their personalities, their ups and downs," as opposed to questions about the role of a free press and the "corporatization" of news.

Michael Wolff, a Vanity Fair columnist, called the CBS executives "a bunch of phony balonies" for praising Rather while dismissing him. "They looked at this with some amount of cold logic," Wolff said. "He's disgraced, he's old and we have a whole new era that's beginning, so let's get rid of him. It has no decency or compassion."

John Hinderaker, a lawyer whose conservative blog raised early questions about the disputed Guard documents, said it was "really indefensible" for Rather to have stood by the story for nearly two weeks. But, he said, "I've got some sympathy for the view that he had a long and distinguished career and that one episode shouldn't negate a lot of years of hard work. I always kind of liked the guy. He was a little quirky, an old-fashioned anchorman."

Rem Rieder, editor of American Journalism Review, said Rather "certainly brought on a lot of his own problems with the National Guard story. But given his long history with CBS and all the work he's done, you just wish there would have been a more graceful way to end this saga. One of the hardest things in life is knowing when it's time to go."

Rather Steps Down From Post At CBS News After 44 Years (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

CBS News veteran Dan Rather will leave his post after 44 years on the job, the network announced yesterday.

Calling Mr. Rather a "reporter's reporter," Sean McManus, president for news and sports coverage, said: "His legacy cannot be replicated."

But Mr. Rather's legacy has turned bitter in the last year, tainted by the network's recent decision not to renew his contract and the ballyhoo over former NBC morning hostess Katie Couric, who arrives to replace Mr. Rather in September.

The newsman, who turns 75 in October, does not plan to simply fade away like an old soldier. He will, in fact, exit on a strident note.

"My departure before the term of my contract represents CBS' final acknowledgment, after a protracted struggle, that they had not lived up to their obligation to allow me to do substantive work," Mr. Rather said yesterday.

"As for their offers of a future with only an office but not assignments, it just isn't in me to sit around doing nothing," he added.

Recent press reports indicate Mr. Rather may take up a newscasting role with HDNet, a high-definition cable channel currently available in about 3 million homes. The folksy Texan is one of the last old-school, authority-figure anchormen -- and not without notoriety. Still, he downplayed celebrity and rued the state of journalism yesterday.

"Too much is made of anchors and their personalities, their ups and downs," Mr. Rather said. "The large issues -- the role of a free press and of honest, real news in a democracy, the role of technology in supporting a free press, the 'corporatization' of news and its effect on news content -- all deserve more attention."

He delivered his final broadcast as prime-time anchorman on March 9, 2005, signing off with the word "courage." The dramatic exit ended months of controversy after a setback for CBS delivered by Mr. Rather himself.

He suffered public loss of credibility after using forged documents in a "60 Minutes II" broadcast in late 2004 that accused President Bush of compromising his Vietnam-era National Guard duty, aired in the pivotal weeks before the presidential election. In the aftermath, Mr. Rather traded his anchor chair for the role of special correspondent, and CBS ceremoniously fired four news executives after completing a lengthy internal review.

"Dan Rather's career ended about two years ago, after the National Guard story," Brent Bozell of the Media Research Center said yesterday. "He made not just a monumental mistake, but a monumental mistake compounded by months of denials. To this day, he claims his innocence in this. And that's what really undid him."

Mr. Rather, who broke into journalism in Texas as a reporter for the Associated Press and later United Press International, took over as anchorman from Walter Cronkite in 1981. In 2002, he broadcast excerpts from journalist Daniel Pearl's videotaped execution by Islamist terrorists, over the objections of the White House and the State Department. He also interviewed Saddam Hussein in 2003, though officials cautioned journalists to be wary of media-savvy terrorists.

Rather's Career Comes To A Sudden End (USAT)

By The Media Mix By Peter Johnson

USA Today, June 21, 2006

Dan Rather's troubles with CBS News began in 2004 with Memogate, the scandal that stemmed from his 60 Minutes report on President Bush's military service.

DOJ_NMG_0036418

But 60 Minutes correspondent Steve Kroft says Rather's CBS career, which came to its official close Tuesday, ended much like those of two other CBS News legends, Edward R. Murrow and Walter Cronkite: CBS wanted to move on and, news icons or not, they had to go.

"The past two years have been extremely difficult for Dan and uncomfortable for everyone at CBS News," Kroft says. "But he has handled the adversity with his customary grace and leaves with his head held high. This has much less to do with the National Guard story than management's decision that it was time to make a change and move in a different direction."

It's no secret that CBS, by hiring former Today star Katie Couric to anchor the Evening News and adding younger correspondents such as Lara Logan and CNN's Anderson Cooper to 60's ranks, is eyeing the next generation of viewers.

Rather and CBS News chief Sean McManus say they were at odds over how many stories Rather would report for 60 Minutes, where he turned after leaving The CBS Evening News in March 2005.

McManus, named president in November, says he didn't talk to Rather about his future because lawyers "got very quickly involved" and he was advised to let them handle it. "If there was an amount of assignments that made sense for Dan and CBS, we would have pursued that, but there was not."

Rather declined to be interviewed. But he said in a statement that leaving "before the term of my contract represents CBS' final acknowledgement, after a protracted struggle, that they had not lived up to their obligation to allow me to do substantive work there. As for their offers of a future with only an office but no assignments, it just isn't in me to sit around doing nothing."

On his website, Mark Cuban, founder of cable's HDNet, wrote that he has been talking to Rather about anchoring a high-definition broadcast "that uncovers news" with "no worries about advertisers and what they might think."

Rather will be the subject of a prime-time special on his career next fall, the network said.

Rather's departure from CBS after 44 years — and the way it was handled — was topic No. 1 in news circles Tuesday. Some say Rather was owed a better sendoff; others say he got what he deserved.

"No one likes to see a run like this end on such a bad note," says NBC Nightly News anchor Brian Williams. "But somewhere in Pennsylvania a father of four with 19 years under his belt came home after getting his notice at the factory today, and he would give anything for one week of Dan's compensation. Dan would be the first to counsel massive amounts of perspective on this story."

"Most people at CBS" thought Rather should have resigned after two of his producers on the National Guard story were fired, says 60 Minutes commentator Andy Rooney. "On the other hand, I feel vaguely bad for him; it's a sad way for him to end his career."

"Even before the scandal, he didn't have the reservoir of good will (at 60) that Walter Cronkite or Bob Schieffer would have had," says Bob Zelnick, a former ABC News correspondent who chairs the journalism school at Boston University. "Could CBS have acted with more grace? Of course."

Says Brent Bozell, head of the Media Research Center, a conservative watchdog group: "The real irony is that Guard story had the potential to destroy George Bush's career, but it ultimately destroyed Dan Rather's."

CBS To Rather: Good Night, And Good Luck (WP)

By Tom Shales

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

Dan Rather is a free man. After an appropriately acrimonious final round of legal wrangling, his 44 years with CBS News came to an end yesterday -- or will come to an end today. Or will end Friday. There's a bit of confusion on that point.

Those who have followed the awkward exit of Rather from his position first as anchor of the "CBS Evening News" last year, then as a CBS News employee this year, often ask a simple question: How could a network for which Rather has done so much and served so loyally treat him so shabbily as the curtain falls?

Some think there is a strange personal grudge against Rather by CBS chief executive Leslie Moonves, who was quoted diplomatically in a CBS news release yesterday as saying of Rather, "The unique mark he has left on his craft is indelible." Others think there is intense pressure on CBS News President Sean McManus to clear Rather and all remnants of him from the premises in preparation for the arrival of Katie Couric, the former "Today" show host who will anchor the "Evening News" this fall and has a growing reputation in the business as the neediest diva on the block.

An explanation from one of Rather's many supporters inside the company: "We're dealing with a bunch of classic idiots."

Reached at his home in New York, Rather did not sound rattled. It is unlikely he will make an appearance at the fly-infested CBS News building on New York's West 57th Street this week; the contents of his office -- including the family Bible that was always opened to a different verse -- have been removed and will be sent to him. As of Friday, officially, Dan Rather and CBS News will no longer be one.

Now that the smoke has cleared from a final skirmish, Rather says he and his wife, Jean, and one or two of their children are headed for a retreat in the Catskills that has been in the family for decades. Then the couple will head to Alaska because Dan loves to fish there, and because the air is so clean. Especially when compared with the air on the Upper West Side.

CBS will pay Rather, either by lump sum or biweekly paychecks, through November, when his contract is officially up. Since he makes $12 million a year, that was worth arguing about, and CBS executives did argue until Monday. As most of those who follow such events know, Rather was removed as anchor of the "CBS Evening News" a year short of his 25th anniversary after the airing of an apparently flawed "60 Minutes II" report on George W. Bush's alleged special treatment while in the Texas National Guard. Rather was the correspondent on that report. One producer lost her job, others are suing.

Don Hewitt, executive producer of "60 Minutes," and Mike Wallace, its most famous correspondent, huffed and puffed and declared that Rather should resign. Dan Rather is not the resigning type. Wallace has since apologized.

Although the CBS farewell statement issued yesterday was mostly bland and laudatory, it was updated later in the day on the CBS Web site after Rather's statement was released; a small blog war ensued. "In response to the [Rather] statement," said the Web site, "a CBS spokeswoman said: 'We value and respect Dan's tremendous career at CBS News. Despite the fact that we couldn't reach an agreement that satisfied everyone, we wish him all future success.' "

Rather was reassigned after the Bush report to join the correspondents on "60 Minutes" and "60 Minutes II," a then-successful spinoff of the original classic news program. If "60 Minutes II" went off the air, the agreement said -- and it did go off the air -- Rather was to join "60 Minutes," where he'd earlier made a major mark as an investigative reporter, full time. But Rather discovered in fairly short order that he was a correspondent in only a token, perfunctory way.

He contributed a mere seven reports to the shows over the past year and a half, Rather said Monday. "From 18 to 22 is the norm."

Some of his detractors claimed this was poetic justice because Rather, on ascending to the anchor chair March 9, 1981, supposedly banished his predecessor, Walter Cronkite, from ever appearing on the program and even from doing other reporting work for CBS News. But one of Rather's supporters said yesterday that, first of all, Rather would hardly have had the authority to "ban" Cronkite from the airwaves and, second, Cronkite hosted a series, "Universe," in prime time on the network.

That his last weeks and days at CBS should be marked by turbulence seems somehow appropriate for Rather, although through the years he has been among the most ferociously loyal of company men where CBS News was concerned. As with such illustrious predecessors as Edward R. Murrow, Rather's in-house enemies were up in the corporate stratosphere, not down in the trenches with the hard-working journalists.

He suffered and squirmed under the disastrous reign of CBS Chairman Laurence Tisch, who slashed the news division budget and, by losing professional football to another network, lost a number of important affiliates, too. Rather's "Evening News," which had been No. 1, eventually fell to third place. In some major markets its lead-in, the local CBS station's news, was paltry, further handicapping the Rather program.

Over the years he endured all kinds of advice and counsel on his delivery of the news. There were plans to do the newscast standing up after Cronkite left, but those were abandoned. For a while, Rather wore a sleeveless sweater under his jacket to try to "warm him up" on the air. Some found his formality too rigid. As the hired entertainment at a Clinton-era press dinner, radio shock jock Don Imus observed, "Dan Rather delivers the news as if he were making a hostage tape."

But all the comments only tend to "underscore," as Rather liked to say, his controversiality on the air, his status as a national lightning rod, a dynamic personality about whom no one seemed to lack an opinion. On the CBS Web site yesterday, former rival

Tom Brokaw spoke in mellow tones of the old three-anchor era that is now history, Brokaw having retired, ABC's Peter Jennings having died and the great Rather having been brought down from his pedestal.

"Dan, Peter and I chased each other around the world a lot," Brokaw recalled. "We made each other better, I think, by being so competitive." It was Rather who was the most competitive of all and whose trips to the news sites of the world forced his fellow anchors to follow. This might be his great contribution: redefining the term anchor to such a degree that "anchor" is an anomaly. An anchor holds a ship in one place, but Rather was always on the go, whether interviewing terrorists in the Mideast or clinging to a tree in the midst of a torrential hurricane.

He was and remains a living legend in the business he loves, and the bumpy years that ended his CBS run cannot change that. One of Rather's former bosses, Sir Howard Stringer (now president of Sony Corp.), used to marvel that when he'd walk down the street with Rather, the anchor had a magnetic effect on people -- real people, who would come up to him to shake his hand or express a grievance or offer words of admiration.

Last night, Bob Schieffer -- Rather's temporary successor -- said on "CBS Evening News": "Dan Rather was one of the great reporters of his time." This followed an affectionate and even stirring report by Anthony Mason that retraced a few of Rather's giant steps.

Rather says that, though 74, he has no intention of leaving broadcast news. But watching the farewell report last night, one couldn't help thinking: We shall not see his like again. Ever. Because the domain he dominated is one of the things he is taking with him.

The world has changed a lot in Rather's 44 years at CBS. Yesterday, it changed a little more.

Surge Of Population In The Exurbs Continues (NYT)

By Rick Lyman

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

Once again, the fastest-growing cities in the United States are some of the far-flung exurbs in the Sun Belt and the Far West, according to fresh population estimates from the Census Bureau.

The bureau's annual survey of municipalities with at least 100,000 residents shows that from July 1, 2004, to July 1, 2005, four outer suburbs in California, three in Florida, two in Arizona and one in Nevada were the country's most rapidly growing.

Leading the list was Elk Grove, Calif., on the Sacramento area's far southern edge, which grew nearly 12 percent in those 12 months, to 112,338. Elk Grove was followed by North Las Vegas, Nev.; Port St. Lucie, Fla.; Gilbert, Ariz.; Cape Coral, Fla.; Moreno Valley, Calif.; Rancho Cucamonga, Calif.; Miramar, Fla.; Chandler, Ariz.; and Irvine, Calif.

Several of those cities were also on the previous year's list — Port St. Lucie was No. 1 then — and the pattern of the last decade has been for an increasing number of these distant exurbs to pace the national rate of population growth.

"As far as we are concerned, this is very good news indeed," said Christine Brainerd, spokeswoman for Elk Grove's city government. "It's a sign that the development strategies the city has put in place are working and that we have become a place where many, many people want to live."

The Census Bureau made the estimates by taking the full 2000 census tally and then using population indicators like building permits to make a guess about subsequent growth. Since the estimates were for July 1 of last year, they do not include any population changes brought about by Hurricane Katrina, which struck on Aug. 29.

The only change in population ranking among the nation's 10 largest cities was that San Antonio supplanted San Diego in seventh place, although Phoenix came within fewer than 2,500 people of taking over fifth place from Philadelphia, as it will almost certainly do in next year's estimates.

In terms of the actual number of additional residents, as opposed to percentage growth, Phoenix attracted the most, its population rising an estimated 44,456, to 1,461,575.

And it was a Phoenix exurb, Gilbert, on the metropolitan area's far southeastern flank, that ranked first in growth in percentage terms from 2000 to 2005, spurting 58 percent, to 173,989 from 110,061.

Big-city Schools Struggle (USAT)

By Greg Toppo

DOJ_NMG_0036421

USA Today, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Students in a handful of big-city school districts have a less than 50-50 chance of graduating from high school with their peers, and a few cities graduate far fewer than half each spring, according to research released on Tuesday.

Fourteen urban school districts have on-time graduation rates lower than 50%; they include Detroit, Baltimore, New York, Milwaukee, Cleveland, Los Angeles, Miami, Dallas, Denver and Houston.

The findings present a bleak picture and are sure to generate controversy as lawmakers and others push to keep U.S. students competitive globally.

While the basic finding that the nation's overall graduation rate is about 70% is not new, the study suggests that graduation rates are much lower than previously reported in many states. It also could bring the dropout debate to the local level, because it allows anyone with Internet access to view with unprecedented detail data on the nation's 12,000 school districts.

Among the nation's 50 largest districts, the study finds, three graduate fewer than 40%: Detroit (21.7%), Baltimore (38.5%) and New York City (38.9%).

The advantage of the new study is that "you could apply it to any and all school districts in the country with the same validity — and the same problems," says Michael Casserly of The Council of the Great City Schools, an advocacy group for large urban districts.

He says it's still unclear whether researcher Christopher Swanson overstates the problem. Swanson's analysis, strictly speaking, is not a calculation of dropout rates but of graduation rates; it estimates the probability that a student in ninth grade will complete high school on time and with a regular diploma.

Adding to the debate: The study is sponsored by the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation, which promotes its own brand of high school reform. Last year, Bill Gates called U.S. high schools "obsolete."

The study, which uses 2002 and 2003 data, the most current available, finds that public schools graduate 69.6% of an estimated 4 million eligible students each spring, meaning about 1.2 million students likely won't graduate this year. That means about 7,000 students drop out per school day, Swanson says.

Researcher Lawrence Mishel of the Economic Policy Institute says Swanson's figures "seriously understate graduation rates, especially for minorities." They say that just 52% of blacks graduate, and 57% of Hispanics.

Mishel says by comparing the number of graduates with the number of ninth-graders, Swanson exaggerates the effects of the "ninth-grade bulge," in which many ninth-graders are held back a year before tackling more advanced work and, often, state-mandated exit exams. Mishel's most recent research puts the overall U.S. graduation rate at 82%.

An A-to-Z Book Of Conservatism Now Weighs In (NYT)

By Jason Deparle

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 20 — It has red states and blond pundits; home schoolers and The Human Life Review; originalists, monetarists, federalists and evangelists; and no shortage of people named Kristol.

Now American conservatism can claim another mark of distinction: an encyclopedia all its own.

It is a big deal, in terms literal — 997 pages — and metaphorical. Few insults have stung the movement's thinkers as much as the barb from Lionel Trilling, the literary critic, who said conservatives had no ideas, "just irritable mental gestures."

A half-century later, 251 contributors have weighed in, not so irritably, with a four-pound response.

"Feel the heft of it," said Lee Edwards, a former aide to Senator Barry Goldwater, who appears in the volume with a byline and an entry. "It's more than a book. It is, if you will, an estimate — it shows the maturation of the conservative movement."

And a timely one, at that. Sixteen years in the making, American Conservatism: An Encyclopedia appears with American conservatism, the political movement, warring over its future direction.

"We've gone from history's adversary to destiny's child, but governing has brought a whole new level of challenge," said Jeffrey O. Nelson, publisher of ISI Books, the conservative press in Wilmington, Del., that produced the encyclopedia. Criticizing what he called the "big education, big spending, big war, big government" conservatism of Republican leaders, Mr. Nelson said he hoped that the book, whose list price is $35, would help the movement return to its small-government roots.

"If conservatism is going to succeed and thrive in the 21st century," he said, "it's got to look more like the conservative tradition as expressed in this book than the conservatism currently practiced in Washington."

Those people toiling in the capital trenches may not recognize the conservatism represented here. The book omits familiar names like Ann Coulter, Tom DeLay, Grover Norquist, Bill O'Reilly and Karl Rove.

It includes the journals University Bookman, circulation 2,600, and First Things. It gives Willmoore Kendall, a political scientist who died in 1967, three times as much ink as former House Speaker Newt Gingrich. Those proportions are appropriate, said a former student of Mr. Kendall, William F. Buckley Jr., the founder of National Review, who called the reference book "terrific."

"Newt came and went rather fast but didn't leave hard fingerprints," Mr. Buckley said. "The quote, unquote conservative politicians have a pretty short lifetime in encyclopedia usage.

"It seems to me that if one were looking for orientation in such a world that the encyclopedia tries to serve that you would be more interested in Burckhardt," he said, a reference to Jacob Burckhardt, a 19th-century Swiss historian of the Renaissance, "than in any of more than 100 conservative senators in the past 50 years."

Garland Publishing started working on the encyclopedia in 1990. ISI Books took over the project 10 years later. ISI Books is part of the Intercollegiate Studies Institute, which, as Page 436 explains, is a nonprofit group founded in 1953 to promote conservative ideas in colleges.

The encyclopedia is being featured by two conservative book clubs, Mr. Nelson said, and has sold nearly 20,000 copies since its release about two months ago. Along with Mr. Nelson, its editors were Bruce P. Frohnen, who teaches at the Ave Maria School of Law in Ann Arbor, Mich., and Jeremy Beer of ISI Books. Given its gestation, the book includes contributions from scholars who are long dead, including Russell Kirk, who in 1953 published a seminal book, "The Conservative Mind." Kirk, who died in 1994, wrote essays on John Adams and moral imagination. Mr. Nelson is his son-in-law.

Some entries wear their conservatism on their sleeve. Goldwater's "loyalties were to duty, honor and country." Ronald Reagan had a "vigorous and principled agenda." Bill Clinton was "corrupt."

Others plumb more obscure topics with no obvious tilt. "Public choice economics" describes a theory of how special interests wield power. Two of its proponents have won Nobel Prizes.

The discussion under "Jewish conservatism" acknowledges a history of anti-Semitism on the right. The entry on Abraham Lincoln explores a conservative split between admirers and those who think he laid the groundwork for "contemporary statist liberalism."

The longest entry belongs to "Straussianism," a school of political theory founded by a professor at the University of Chicago, Leo Strauss, that emphasizes classical texts. Embraced by some leading proponents of the Iraq war, Straussianism is often regarded by those beyond its fold as opaque mumbo jumbo, a reputation that five pages of explanation may not dispel.

If there is a place where the rivers of the right converge, it appears to be the office of William Kristol, a Straussian editor and advocate, whose mother (Gertrude Himmelfarb), father (Irving Kristol), philosophy (neoconservatism) and magazine (The Weekly Standard) all earned separate entries.

Though Mr. Kristol was puzzled to read that he valued "the virtue of a citizenry" more than its prosperity or freedom, he declined to dwell on quibbles, praising the volume for concluding each entry with a short bibliography.

"What I liked most was that it encouraged you to read additional works," Mr. Kristol said.

Some quibbles are edifying. The entry about "God and Man at Yale," Mr. Buckley's most famous book, says it portrayed a campus "conspiracy" against capitalism and Christianity. But Mr. Buckley said his book "made a rather emphatic point to say there was no conspiracy, that people were acting out of their own impulses."

Another entry describes the editorial page of The Wall Street Journal as "pro-business." The page's editor, Paul A. Gigot, said the paper often criticized businesses that sought government favors and won a Pulitzer Prize in 1980 partly for an editorial called "Down With Big Business."

"We believe in capitalism, free markets and free people, not business over labor," Mr. Gigot said.

The volume treads lightly, when it treads at all, on matters of race. It describes the "courtesy and dignity" of Strom Thurmond, who as a South Carolina governor and senator led the South's effort to preserve segregation. It does not mention that Mr. Thurmond had a black daughter whose existence he kept secret.

George C. Wallace, who became governor of Alabama pledging "segregation forever," was "always more complicated than his critics allowed." The discussion of "Southern conservatism" pays tribute to the region's "precious Anglo-American continuity" and says nothing about Jim Crow.

Dan T. Carter of the University of South of Carolina said such entries offered a "pasteurized" view of racial history. "The rise of American conservatism owes, in some part, to racial animosity, and it's uncomfortable for many conservatives to deal with that," said Mr. Carter, a biographer of Wallace who describes his politics as liberal. "You don't have to say that conservatism capitulated to it. But you have to acknowledge it was there."

Mr. Nelson agreed that the encyclopedia's discussion of race was incomplete and said the next edition would include an entry about conservatives' reaction to the civil rights movement.

"Our forebears made a mistake on the issue," he said. "They were just wrong. I don't know how to say it more clearly than that."

The sheer mass of the volume left at least one subject with mixed feelings. Richard A. Viguerie, a founder of Moral Majority, was delighted to find himself portrayed as a "liberal bogeyman." But given the army of thinkers and doers who inhabit the book, Mr. Viguerie said, "we should have achieved more politically than we have."

That, Mr. Kristol said, was not a conservative view. "Conservative thinking," he said, "should teach you not to expect too much from politics, at least in the short run."

Real Reform Must Scrutinize Lobbying And Lawmakers (USAT)

By Abbe D. Lowell

USA Today, June 21, 2006

Amid the allegations of accepting money or gifts from lobbyists and others swirling around former congressman Randall "Duke" Cunningham and Reps. William Jefferson, D-La., and Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., Congress has once again taken up lobbying and ethics reform.

A number of the "reform" measures, such as increased restrictions on accepting gifts or more frequent public disclosures of contacts with lobbyists, are merely cosmetic. Real reform will not occur until the very relationship between lobbyists and public officials is re-examined.

Recent news reports and denials that Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert was "under investigation" for signing a letter in support of a lobbyist's clients shortly after that lobbyist raised large contributions should have, but did not, start this examination.

What hasn't received much scrutiny is the interplay between lobbyists and fundraising. As long as campaign engines need to be fueled, special interests and lobbyists who have the most immediate interest in legislation will have the most incentive to supply the gas. This gives lobbyists an unfair advantage in access and persuasion.

More often than those simply interested in good government, lobbyists will take on the request from a member or a member's staff that: "Gee, I will consider your position of that bill or your client's interests, and, by the way, I am having a fundraiser next week."

So, the same individuals and companies who promote their causes in legislation are also the ones who can get their clients, friends, colleagues and acquaintances to come to the cocktail party or reception with the large contributions that are now needed.

The payback

And what does that interest group or lobbyist get in return? Honest members of Congress do not agree to a position or compromise their principles just because a proponent of the position or principle raised the campaign funds requested. Even so, that member gets to know that advocate's position in a context that average Americans do not enjoy.

DOJ_NMG_0036424

For decades, the Justice Department's practice has been not to consider campaign contributions linked by timing or sequence to official action as illegal bribes. The recent scandals may change this. But lawmakers, not prosecutors reinterpreting policy, should set the stage for change.

Public officials do not need new laws to know they should not accept money or gifts in exchange for public actions or their office.

It should be relatively simple for Congress to declare that if a lobbyist's position has merit, it can be presented in the congressional office and not at a Washington restaurant, a private suite at a sports arena, or on the 15th hole of a country club golf course.

And, as to travel, it is not hard to conclude that a public official's travel is either official business to be paid by the government, campaign business to be paid by the election committee or party, or personal travel to be paid by the public official himself.

Real reform ideas

The more difficult issue is how to weaken the link between lobbying and fundraising. A few ideas:

• Require fundraisers to disclose publicly their interest in legislation.

• Require sponsors of "bundled" contributions (individual contributions arranged together for greater impact) to disclose their roles.

• Impose further limits on the total amount individuals can give in an election cycle.

• Provide additional public financing of campaigns.

• Help candidates pay for access to various media.

No doubt other ideas exist, but in the midst of the current debate about "reform," none of these is being proposed in legislation.

So, it was wrong for someone to leak that Hastert was or should be under investigation. What should have been leaked is that the time has come for the entire process to be under investigation so that a better system can result.

Abbe D. Lowell, a partner at Chadbourne & Parke LLP, served as special ethics counsel to Congress reviewing the conduct of former representative George Hansen. He has also represented lawmakers and others in ethics investigations, including former senator Robert Torricelli and former representative Dan Rostenkowski. He currently representsformer lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Emergency In The Emergency Rooms (NYT)

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

The nation's emergency rooms have been stretched thin for at least a decade or more, but a new analysis suggests that they have reached a breaking point. Their plight underscores how dreadfully unprepared we are to cope with a major disaster like pandemic influenza or mass casualties from a terrorism attack.

The crisis in emergency medical care was laid bare in three reports issued last week by the Institute of Medicine, a unit of the National Academy of Sciences. Half a million times a year ambulances are diverted from emergency rooms that are full and sent to others farther away. Emergency room patients who need admission to the hospital often spend eight hours or more — sometimes even two days or more — on gurneys in the hallways, waiting for a hospital bed to open up.

Some emergency rooms lack the services of key specialists, such as neurosurgeons, who shy away from emergency room duty because many uninsured patients can't pay and their malpractice premiums would skyrocket because of the risky nature of emergency cases. What is not known is how many people die as a result of delays in treatment or inadequate care under chaotic conditions. No measurement system tracks such data.

The emergency room crisis has many causes, none of them easily or cheaply resolved. The number of people seeking treatment in emergency rooms has jumped sharply over the past decade or so, from 90 million in 1993 to 114 million in 2003. Over the same period, cost pressures forced the closing of some 700 hospitals, almost 200,000 hospital beds and 425 emergency departments. The result is severe crowding, exacerbated by a huge influx of poor people seeking routine care who are either uninsured or on Medicaid but unable to find doctors willing to treat them. By law, emergency rooms must accept all patients, whether they have insurance or not.

The institute's experts have many proposals for easing the situation, ranging from new regional systems to improve the flow of patients to the most appropriate and least crowded emergency rooms to an infusion of money to cover unpaid emergency care and to bolster preparedness for large-scale disasters. The most important change would be to stop diverting seriously ill ambulance patients and divert instead the poor patients who clog emergency rooms seeking routine care. That would require extending health coverage to the uninsured and providing more primary care clinics and doctors in poor neighborhoods.

Bush's Unpopularity In Europe Hangs Over Summit (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

VIENNA, June 20 -- President Bush arrived here Tuesday for his 15th visit to Europe since taking office, at a time when the populace remains generally wary of him despite concerted efforts by political leaders on both sides of the Atlantic to patch up their differences.

In meetings here Wednesday, Bush and European Union officials are to confer on issues including trade, energy security and their mutual efforts to persuade Iran to halt activities that could lead to the development of nuclear weapons.

Officials have dampened expectations of any major announcements, because Iran has yet to respond to a package of inducements and penalties -- including the offer of talks with the United States for the first time since the 1979 Islamic revolution -- aimed at ending its enrichment of uranium.

Speaking with reporters aboard Air Force One, Bush's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, said Americans and Europeans were strongly committed to having Iran completely shut down its enrichment program. "The framework is clear," he said. "What is missing is a positive Iranian response. And that's, of course, what we are looking for."

On Thursday, Bush is scheduled to visit Budapest, the Hungarian capital, where he will mark the 50th anniversary of the 1956 uprising against communist rule.

Since his reelection in 2004, Bush and his advisers have tried to rebuild relations with Europe -- deferring to Britain, France and Germany, for example, in handling the diplomatic initiative toward Iran. The White House has been aided by the defeat of Gerhard Schroeder in his bid to remain German chancellor and the weakening influence of French President Jacques Chirac; both had made opposition to the U.S. war effort in Iraq a centerpiece of their administrations.

But if relations at the political level have improved, public opinion has lagged far behind. Bush remains unpopular with the public in many European countries over the war in Iraq and alleged abuse of detainees by U.S. forces at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and other facilities, according to opinion polls and experts on transatlantic relations. A survey released last week by the Pew Research Center found that the United States' image has slipped over the past year in France, Germany and Spain and is down considerably since 2000.

Diplomats and experts on Europe say public opinion is a significant drag on Bush's ability to expect much from political leaders here -- for instance, for his renewed effort to secure international assistance for the new Iraqi government. While countries such as Poland and Britain have contributed substantially to security in Iraq, the European Union as a bloc has done relatively little, officials say, pledging the equivalent of about $250 million in assistance in 2006.

"The scars of Iraq are still very real and run real deep," said Ronald D. Asmus, executive director of the German Marshall Fund's Brussels office. While political leaders may agree that success in Iraq is important, he said, the European public believes "that Americans screwed it up and need to clean up the mess."

Gary J. Schmitt, who specializes in defense and foreign policy issues at the American Enterprise Institute in Washington, said the Bush administration has done a much better job handling Europe in the second term, but questioned whether Europe's leaders will sign on to tough sanctions if Iran rebuffs the recent overtures.

"To their credit," he said, speaking of Bush administration officials, "they have learned that it's better to have the Europeans on board than not. The real question is when it comes to the hard issues, like Iran, whether it will pay off."

DOJ_NMG_0036426

Adding to the public relations problem is continuing anger over allegations of abuse by U.S. forces at Guantanamo Bay and in Iraq, and disclosures about secret CIA prisons in Europe. Bush has been confronted with questions about these matters almost every time he has met a European leader, and a spokeswoman for Austrian Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel, whose country holds the revolving presidency of the E.U., said he would raise the issue again on Wednesday.

At a briefing for reporters last week, Hadley noted Bush's repeated statement of interest in closing the Guantanamo facility and said people would "be held accountable" by the Pentagon if allegations of wrongdoing in Iraq were confirmed. "That's been explained to the Europeans in various forms at various times," he said. "They can raise it -- there's not a lot new to be said on that issue."

Denis MacShane, a British member of Parliament from the ruling Labor Party and a former minister of state for Europe, said that Americans "just have to live" with a reflexive anti-Americanism and that Europeans are coming to share American concern over the threat from radical Islam. But the Bush administration, he added, "has not really thought about managing European public opinion -- they have not had a kind of program of public diplomacy that has been convincing."

John Bruton, a former Irish prime minister who now leads the E.U. mission in Washington, said that U.S. and European politicians both need to do a better job. "Our task really is one of trying to reestablish a sense among Europeans that Americans are their cousins," he said.

Iraq Threatens Bush Agenda At EU (WT/AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

VIENNA, Austria -- President Bush's meeting with European Union leaders today is scheduled to focus on Iran's nuclear ambitions and economic concerns, but the United States' conduct of the war on terrorism will be an unspoken theme.

National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley has said he doubts Mr. Bush will have much to say about the U.S. prison for terror suspects at U.S. Naval Base, Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, charges of prisoner abuse in Iraq and suspected killings of Iraqi civilians by Marines in Haditha.

For millions of Europeans, however, these are the issues that matter -- and their concerns are shared by politicians.

Austrian Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel, whose country holds the rotating EU presidency, plans to urge Mr. Bush to close Guantanamo. Peter Pilz, a senior member of Austria's Green party, says Mr. Schuessel should tell Mr. Bush "that the criminal actions of his government will not be tolerated in Europe."

Mr. Pilz is one of Austria's more outspoken public figures. Still, his sentiments -- that the U.S. is breaking the law in Iraq and in its larger fight against terror -- are shared by many Europeans angry over the Iraq invasion, recent suicides at Guantanamo and the reported existence of secret CIA prisons worldwide.

Newspaper editorials reflect Europe's dismay with a partnership that most here see as has having gone wrong.

"Those who came as liberators, those who wanted to bring the rule of justice ... lost their moral credibility in Iraq," wrote the German weekly Die Zeit. "Not just a few soldiers have 'lost their control' as they like to say. America's entire Iraq policy is out of control."

In France, the newspaper Le Monde wrote of the Guantanamo suicides: "We continue to ask by what heavenly decree America holds itself above the rule of law."

Young people, like Andrej Mantei of Berlin, are even more scathing. "I don't think it's possible that anybody could make worse foreign policy than Bush," he says.

And even many older people are critical, unlike a few decades ago, when they equated America with the war against Nazi Germany, postwar reconstruction and the shield against the Soviet Union.

"I think Bush was wrong, and he should have remorse," said Rosa Sarrocco, 80, of Rome. "The recent events ... have had a further negative impact on my opinion of America."

America's image problems in Europe are reflected by a survey done by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press and released last week. Favorable opinions of the United States ranged from a high of 56 percent in Britain to a low of 23 percent in Spain.

DOJ_NMG_0036427

Pro-U.S. sentiment is stronger in much of formerly communist Eastern Europe, where Washington's contribution to toppling Soviet dominance lingers in many minds. It peaks in Kosovo, whose ethnic Albanian majority gratefully remembers the U.S.-led bombing in 1999 that forced Serb troops from the province.

Bush Seeks Pledge Compliance (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

VIENNA, Austria -- The White House yesterday said countries have an obligation to fulfill their monetary pledges to help rebuild Iraq, but refused to name the nations that are $10 billion behind their commitments, according to Bush administration calculations.

"Some of them have done better than others, and some are clearly lagging," Stephen J. Hadley, the president's national security adviser, told reporters aboard Air Force One as Mr. Bush traveled to Vienna for the annual U.S.-European Union summit.

The president is looking for a show of unity on blocking Iran's nuclear program and plans to push for Europeans to commit to completing the "Doha round" of free-trade talks, while Austrian Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel, who currently holds the six-month rotating EU presidency, is expected to press Mr. Bush on closing the enemy combatant detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

But even as he seeks to build pressure on Iran, Mr. Bush's eye will be on the other two spokes of his "axis of evil" as he tries to block North Korea's burgeoning nuclear and missile programs and tries to shore up international support for the new government in Iraq.

Anti-Iraq-war protests are scheduled for Mr. Bush's stay in Vienna, but the president will be departing even as the main protest is under way today, headed for Budapest to commemorate tomorrow the 50th anniversary of the Hungarian uprising that Soviet troops and tanks brutally smashed.

The president has not carved out much time for cultural activities in his two days on the ground in Europe, though he is expected to see the Vienna Boys Choir perform.

During his visit to Budapest, he will lay a wreath at the eternal flame in Kossuth Square, a memorial to the 1956 revolt against the Soviet bloc, and later will deliver a speech on the uprising and the push for freedom.

U.S. officials have said they don't expect any breakthroughs on trade, nor do they expect major developments on Iran, in part because the principal European leaders involved in Iran aren't here and in part because the burden is now on Iran to respond to a European-led offer.

On Iraq, Mr. Bush has stepped up pressure in the past several weeks to collect on the commitments made at a donor's conference in Madrid in 2003, saying Monday that $13.5 billion has been pledged but only $3.5 billion has been paid.

"It's a critical time for Iraq's young democracy, and assistance from the international community will make an immediate difference," Mr. Bush said. "All nations that have pledged money have a responsibility to keep their pledges, and America and Europe will work together to ensure they do so."

Of the $13.5 billion pledged in 2003, $8 billion was assistance from donors and $5.5 billion was in the form of loans from the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

The money is to be disbursed between 2004 and 2007. But donations appear to have dried up since the total hasn't risen much from September 2005, when the State Department reported that more than $3 billion already had been contributed.

Bush To Partners In Iraq: Pay Up (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON

For nations that in the past have pledged to help Iraq rebuild, the United States has this message: Get out your checkbook.

In recent days, administration officials, from President Bush on down, have insisted repeatedly that it is time for others to live up to monetary commitments to Baghdad, most of them made in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0036428

"The international community has pledged about $13 billion to help this new government. Yet only $3.5 billion has been paid," said Mr. Bush on Monday in a commencement address to the US Merchant Marine Academy.

Iraq's security situation has discouraged many donors from pouring cash into the country. They don't want their aid used to pay for gun-toting guards, or for clinics or courthouses that might get blown up.

But the White House argues that the elimination of insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi shows security is improving. The renewed push for international contributions also comes at a time when it is becoming clear just how expensive rebuilding Iraq will be.

"There's a convergence of events at this point in time leading to this," says Robert Pfaltzgraff, a professor of international security at the Fletcher School at Tufts University.

In coming months, non-US donor nations and international institutions should become increasingly important to the reconstruction of Iraq, according to US officials. Money in the main US reconstruction account, the Iraq Relief and Reconstruction Fund, is dwindling. The new Iraqi government will increasingly take over reconstruction management duties from the US.

The United Nations has already agreed to step up its activity. Earlier this week, Secretary-General Kofi Annan, responding to a plea from Iraqi officials, said he would help organize international economic and political support for Iraq.

Given all this, it's time for nations to make good on promised reconstruction donations, insists the White House. Pledges are fine, and many nations have made generous promises, say US officials. But Iraq now needs the money.

Bush has mentioned the issue often in public in recent days. And the administration has sent Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt and State Department counselor Philip Zelikow to visit world capitals and figuratively rattle the tin cup.

"We need to get these amounts paid in, and then we need to look here in a three- or four-month time ... [at] what additional amounts need to be pledged," said National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley at a briefing for reporters last week.

It's true that the international community could step up its Iraqi aid activity, say experts outside the administration. But the situation is more complicated than the White House is portraying it, they say.

The bulk of aid pledges, $13.6 billion, were made at a donor conference in Madrid in October 2003. Of this, some $4 billion was offered as outright grants. The rest - $9.6 billion - was proffered as loans, not straight handouts.

Of these pledges, about 25 percent, worth $3.5 billion, have been paid, according to the US Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction. In addition, the International Monetary Fund and World Bank have begun providing some of their promised loans. (Later pledges have raised the total amount of money promised by the international community to $14.6 billion.)

Some nations have moved quickly to provide their promised aid. Japan and Britain have been "notably active" in this regard, says a recent Congressional Research Service report.

Japan - the second-largest donor to Iraq after the United States - has spent most of its pledged $1.5 billion in grant aid, and is close to launching the first phase of a $3.5 billion loan, according to CRS. Japanese funds have paid for power-station rehabilitation, water tankers, fire trucks, and irrigation equipment. (Tuesday, Japan announced it would withdraw its 600 troops in Iraq but hoped to increase noncombat air operations there.)

Britain has helped pay for reconstruction of the Iraqi justice system, among other things.

Other nations have moved more slowly. Iraq's neighbors have made generous pledges, for instance, but so far little of the promised money has shown up.

"Kuwait ... has not moved much of its $565 million pledge," says the most recent Special Inspector General quarterly report to Congress. "Similarly, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates are holding off on expenditures."

Lack of security is one big cause of this reluctance. Currently, between 16 and 22 percent of Iraqi reconstruction aid pays for armed guards and other security-related costs. Many non-US nations don't want a large percentage of their donations to be devoted to such items. In general, they have not been eager to rebuild a war zone while the war was still going on.

Iraqi politics has been another concern. Saudi Arabia and other largely Sunni Muslim nations have kept their checkbooks closed while they wait to see how Sunnis will fare in the new Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0036429

"These countries want to see whether a stable political democratic system can be established in Iraq that will include the Sunni Arabs as well as the Shia Arabs and the Kurds," said James Jeffrey, Department of State coordinator for Iraq policy, at a June 8 House hearing.

With the establishment of the new Iraqi government, this criteria has been met, according to Mr. Jeffrey. Other US officials argue that with the death of the terror figure al-Zarqawi, the security situation is improving as well.

Pressing for reconstruction pledges to be made good may thus be an attempt by the Bush administration to help build on the momentum they say has been generated in Iraq in recent weeks - though Al Qaeda in Iraq has named a new leader, and insurgent attacks continue.

"The US has every interest in promoting international contributions to post-conflict stability in Iraq," says professor Pfaltzgraff of the Fletcher School.

US Effort To Rehab Image Falls Short (CSM)

By Howard LaFranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON

In Europe for two days, President Bush will lay out a full agenda on Iran, aid to Iraq, and farm subsidies in world trade. But he'll also confront a European public that has such a poor view of America that in some countries, the United States is seen as the biggest threat to global stability today - surpassing Iran.

Views like this have figured in Helle Maasbol's family. For the three years she has lived in the US, she's not been able to entice her mom back home in Denmark to pay a visit.

"Her image of the States was going downhill for a while, but it was the war in Iraq that was the real blow," says the wife of a World Bank economist and mother of two girls - all of whom are now moving back to Europe. "I told her often about the wonderful people we've met in America, but she said she wouldn't come as long as the president was George Bush."

Indeed, the US image abroad has continued to deteriorate, despite a concerted effort by the Bush administration to turn things around by mending fences with key allies, taking concrete steps to make diplomacy work, and expanding public-diplomacy efforts in the Middle East and other regions.

At the beginning of his second term, Mr. Bush set out to improve America's relations with the world by extending a more diplomatic hand to international partners, taking more multilateral positions on security concerns like Iran, and naming trusted aide Karen Hughes to help fix the US image abroad. But recent surveys show that public opinion about America continues to fall in countries as diverse as Spain, Turkey, Russia, and Indonesia. And the repercussions of the decline are not just touchy-feely image issues, experts say.

Low public esteem for the US makes it more difficult for governments to unabashedly side with the US on international issues, while less attraction to America can mean a smaller slice of the global tourism pie for the US.

"We lose out on jobs when foreigners don't travel here as much. We lose out on billions of dollars in spending, but we also lose the goodwill we know comes from people getting to know Americans," says Roger Dow, president of the Travel Industry Association of America (TIA).

Noting that he discussed that impact recently with Ms. Hughes, Mr. Dow says, "I asked her, 'What would it be worth to you to have 8 million people going home to say, "You know, they're not so bad."' You have to figure that into the diplomacy equation."

Eight million is the number of additional visitors the US would greet if it increased its share of the international travel pie by just 1 percent. In 2002, the US reaped 9 percent of international travel, but today the number is down to 6 percent. Each percentage drop represents 150,000 jobs and $15 billion in spending, according to the TIA.

Of course, anti-Americanism is not the only explanation for falling numbers of foreign visitors - any more than disdain for the Stars and Stripes was invented by Bush. Many experts tie the tourism phenomenon to America's place as the world's only superpower, and the resentment that people have long felt toward the power they believe must be responsible when events turn negative.

But others say that US policy under Bush - from the war in Iraq to rejection of the Kyoto accords on greenhouse gases - is responsible for the new spike in anti-US sentiment. "I don't believe the figures we're seeing will change much so long as this president is in office," says Simon Serfaty, an expert in US-Europe relations at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) in Washington.

Results of a new global attitudes survey by the Washington-based Pew Research Center show that a country's image of Americans is at least several percentage points higher than the same country's image of America as a nation. Bush's numbers are below both of those categories.

Another poll published this week by the Harris group shows that Europeans generally pick the US as the world's biggest threat to global security over Iran. This was true even in Britain, although Germans and Italians rank the US below Iran.

Ms. Maasbol finds this evolution sad and troubling, especially since she remembers as a little girl hearing "only good things" about America and its role in World War II - yes, even from her mom. "People say Iraq has made things worse for everybody in the world, and that it has brought out the bad side in America with things like the prisoner abuse," she says.

When Bush meets Wednesday with European leaders in Austria, he will hear calls for the closing of the Pentagon's detention facility in Guantánamo, Cuba. Bush is attending the annual US-European Union summit. From there he travels to Budapest, Hungary, where he will give a speech Thursday.

Mr. Serfaty of CSIS says the prisoner-abuse issue and the case of Guantánamo are particularly poignant for Europeans because they suggest an America making the same kinds of mistakes that Europe made in its colonial past.

"Europeans are saying, 'Don't use your power to do what we used to do,' " he says, which was to commit widespread rights abuses in African and Asian colonies while claiming to improve the world. He adds, however, that the European perspective "demonstrates how there is no understanding over there of how 9/11 has changed mentalities in this nation."

Particularly troubling for the US may be indications that America is slipping even in places where it is lavishing new attention. Opinion of America dropped 15 points in India compared with last year - despite a Bush visit to India in March and his calling for a new strategic partnership between the two countries.

There are some bright spots for the US. The Pew survey found that America's image improved among French youth, for example. "Feelings about America were bad in 2003 at the start of the war, but you don't see that so much among the young people anymore," says Swann Gros, a 17-year-old Parisian on his first visit to America this summer. Demonstrating an awareness of current events, he says the French know that Bush "is not so popular with Americans now - just as the French don't so much like Jacques Chirac."

Bush's Goals In Austria May Be Overshadowed (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang And Alissa J. Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

VIENNA — President Bush stepped off Air Force One on a warm night Tuesday in the heart of Central Europe, and into the steamy debate over the U.S. war in Iraq and his administration's tactics in countering terrorism.

He began a 21-hour visit to Austria, built around a meeting with the leaders of the European Union, as the United States and its allies await Iran's response to their latest anti-nuclear proposals. Bush also plans a similar quick stop in Hungary tonight and Thursday.

The president arrived with what his national security advisor, Stephen Hadley, said last week were three goals: "Promoting freedom and democracy, enhancing security and pursuing greater global prosperity." The goals draw little debate, but the means for achieving them are tearing at the European political and social fabric.

Though the U.S. agenda with Europe covers global trade negotiations, European farm subsidies and Iran, Austrians want their leaders to confront Bush's policies in Iraq, the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and the "rendition" of suspected terrorists to countries that permit torture. Newspapers and TV talk shows have discussed little else in recent days, with people at both ends of the political spectrum denouncing the treatment of terrorism suspects who have not been charged with crimes.

The visit to this officially neutral country is the first by a U.S. president since Jimmy Carter met Soviet leader Leonid I. Brezhnev here in 1979 to sign an arms control treaty. Bush is meeting with Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel, EU president.

Peter Pilz, a spokesman on security issues for the leftist Green Party, said of Bush's visit: "It is problematic to welcome as guest a politician who wages unconstitutional wars, uses falsified secret … reports as an excuse to do so, is willing to preemptively deploy nuclear weapons, who tolerates kidnappings, torture and illegal detention camps as a means of security policy."

Joerg Haider, former leader of the far-right Freedom Party, said in an interview with the moderately conservative newspaper Die Presse that Bush was turning the Middle East "into a witches' caldron."

"The summit will not change anything," said Haider, who is best-known for anti-Semitic comments and opposition to immigrants when his party was part of the government.

Austria's widely read news magazine Profil featured Bush on its cover this week, under the headline "The Mad World of George Bush."

"What makes the leader of the last superpower tick? Just how fanatical is he?" the magazine asked. In the city of Freud, it drew a deeply unflattering psychological profile of the president, under the headline "Bush on the Couch."

The visit to Budapest, the Hungarian capital, will give Bush an opportunity to commemorate the unsuccessful partisan uprising against Soviet domination in 1956. The revolution foreshadowed the disintegration more than three decades later of communist rule across Central and Eastern Europe, and provides the U.S. leader a metaphor for the broader democracy that he has promoted as the foundation of his Middle East policies.

Noting the division in Europe over the war, Bush said Monday at the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy in Kings Point, N.Y., "Some of the most important support for Iraqis is coming from European democracies with recent memories of tyranny." He cited Poland, Hungary, Romania, Bulgaria, the Czech Republic, Slovakia, Georgia, Ukraine, Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia as examples.

But he acknowledged that "others in Europe have had disagreements with our decisions on Iraq."

Bush is making a renewed push to get those who have promised to help rebuild Iraq to begin paying up. Of the $13.5 billion in assistance that has been pledged, he said Monday, only $3.5 billion has been paid.

Large amounts are due from Iraq's wealthier Persian Gulf neighbors, but Europe also owes money, Hadley said last week.

The meeting with the EU leadership has been long-scheduled, but its timing allows the president to promote a united front in the effort to pressure Iran to suspend enrichment of nuclear fuel, which the Bush administration sees as an immediate and pressing problem.

The five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council — the U.S., Russia, China, France and Britain — and Germany offered a package of incentives early this month to persuade Iran to halt its nuclear program. Since then, Iran has been lobbying hard to soften the terms so it can continue some uranium enrichment as "research and development."

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Friday that the offer was under serious consideration.

In the view of some analysts in Washington, the diplomatic strategy on Iran may allow the U.S. to present a less bellicose image than it has regarding Iraq, potentially softening the impression Bush creates.

Having recently agreed to join other nations in direct negotiations with Iran, "President Bush has improved his standing and support among European leaders," Jon B. Wolfsthal and Jennifer Hamilton wrote in a paper for the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington policy research organization.

And, they said, with the EU's top officials at his side, Bush "can in one step make clear that the offer on the table is the best Iran can hope to receive."

Austria is the 54th country Bush has visited as president; Hungary will be the 55th.

Die Presse, reflecting none of the potentially tempered view of him that Wolfsthal and Hamilton raised, featured a cartoon that suggested Bush might have become confused.

The cartoon showed the president in a pub talking to students, with a thought bubble over his head. It had him thinking, "funny kangaroos" — a jeering suggestion that Bush would mistake Austria for Australia.

An Unpopular Export (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0036432

PRESIDENT BUSH'S TRIP TO EUROPE is being welcomed like an infectious disease. Bush was unpopular in Europe from day one of his presidency, but a charm offensive launched last year — and a more conciliatory approach toward European concerns — was meant to change that, or at least nudge the approval rating up a notch. Instead, recent polls show he is more unpopular than ever across the Atlantic.

Things have gotten so bad, in fact, that Europeans now claim the United States is a greater threat to global stability than Iran, according to a Harris poll. Given that a key goal of Bush's visit is to persuade European leaders to support his efforts to stem Iran's nuclear ambitions, that's a bit of a problem. Though Bush wants to talk about Iran, energy and Europe's failure to live up to its commitments to help pay for Iraq's reconstruction, European leaders will feel obliged to take the president to task over Guantanamo Bay and alleged secret CIA prisons.

European disdain for the United States is nothing new, of course, and the feeling has long seemed a bit contrived. The French grumble about the U.S., but they love McDonald's and Hollywood. Austria, host to the meeting between the U.S. and European leaders, is one of the most fiercely anti-Bush nations in Europe. It prides itself on its neutrality, which is another way of saying it prefers to let the U.S. pay the financial and human costs of policing the world while its intelligentsia get to rail about American excesses in the war on terror. Nonetheless, Bush's disdain for multilateral institutions, environmental protection and international law has earned him a special place in the pantheon of unpopular U.S. political exports.

It is hard for Bush to alter his image at this point in his presidency, but he must do as much as he can to court European public opinion, lest governments on the Continent find it untenable to be associated with any Bush initiative. Bush's recent interview on German television, in which he said he would like to end internments at Guantanamo Bay, was a good start. He could build on it by acknowledging legitimate European concerns over climate change and repudiating the "rendition" of terror suspects.

Maybe the best PR move would be to make a surprise trip to a World Cup game in Germany. With the U.S. seen abroad as an insular nation that doesn't play well with others, a presidential visit to the hugely popular event — indeed, a humble recognition by the former baseball team owner that the World Cup is the biggest sports event on Earth — would carry enormous symbolic value. For security reasons, it would have to be unannounced and last-minute. But if Bush can drop into Baghdad unannounced, as he did last week, surely he can make a visit to Nuremberg.

Bush Travels To Europe To Shore Up Ties (AP-Y2)

By Terence Hunt

AP2, June 20, 2006

President Bush confronted high-stakes nuclear showdowns with North Korea and Iran and grisly news about U.S. war deaths Tuesday as he began a quick trip to strengthen ties with European allies unhappy about Iraq.

A week after Bush made a surprise, celebratory visit to Baghdad, he learned that two U.S. soldiers captured in Iraq had been found slain. They were killed by the new leader of al-Qaida in Iraq, an insurgent umbrella group said in a Web statement that suggested the servicemen had been beheaded.

"It's a reminder that this is a brutal enemy that does not follow any of the rules," National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley told reporters on Air Force One on the way to Europe. White House press secretary Tony Snow said, "We are seeing evidence that the Iraqi people are also sick of this."

More than 2,500 members of the U.S. military have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March, 2003.

On his 15th trip to Europe since taking office, Bush and his wife, Laura, were greeted by Austrian Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel. As Bush was driven to his hotel, curious onlookers, most of whom remained motionless and expressionless, gathered along Vienna's streets. One group struggled unsuccessfully to unfurl a "Go Home" banner from a restaurant balcony in time for it to be seen by occupants of the speeding motorcade.

Anti-Americanism is widespread in Europe where Bush is seen by many as a cowboy president who doesn't care about the concerns of other countries. The abuse of Iraqi prisoners by U.S. soldiers at Abu Ghraib, allegations of a massacre of unarmed civilians by U.S. Marines at Haditha and reports of secret prisons for terror suspects have hurt America's image.

Bush is under political pressure at home, as well. Approval of his handling of Iraq had dropped to 33 percent in an AP-Ipsos poll this month. Hadley took issue with a debate in Congress about Iraq, saying that "there's been sort of a suggestion out there that somehow there's an open-ended commitment by the United States to Iraq."

He repeated Bush's oft-stated promise that as Iraqi troops are capable of defending their country, American forces will leave.

The president will hold several hours of talks Wednesday with leaders of the 25-nation European Union. Wednesday evening he will go to Budapest, Hungary, to mark the 50th anniversary of the 1956 uprising against communist rule. The president returns to Washington Thursday evening.

North Korea was a growing concern because of fears its government was preparing to test-fire a long-range ballistic missile. "They seem to be moving toward a launch, but the intelligence is not conclusive at this point," Hadley said.

He said North Korea seemed to feel that creating a sense of crisis brings attention that is helpful.

"A lot of folks are sending messages to the North Koreans this would be a bad idea, they shouldn't do it," Hadley said. "And a lot of countries are going to have ideas about what we do, should North Korea ignore the advice of the international community and go forward with this launch."

Iran was another problem. The United States, Britain, France, Germany, China and Russia have offered Iran incentives to impose a long-term moratorium on uranium enrichment, a process that can produce material for nuclear generators or bombs. Two weeks after receiving the proposal, Iran has not said yes or no.

Hadley said he was confident the U.S. and its partners were standing united. "If Iran does not accept this offer, then we return to the U.N. Security Council," he said.

Bush planned to press Europe to eliminate agricultural subsidies so that talks for a global free-trade pact can proceed. "If they can move in that direction," Hadley said, "we're going to be in the zone of getting an agreement by the end of the year."

The White House said Bush would prod nations to honor their pledges of reconstruction aid for Iraq. Of $13 billion promised, only $3 billion has been delivered, the administration says.

European leaders have their own concerns, many of them revolving around Iraq and the war on terror.

Schuessel, whose country holds the rotating EU presidency, was expected to urge Bush to close the U.S. detention center at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The White House said Bush wouldn't have anything new to say on that.

Bush has said he would like to close Guantanamo but some of its prisoners are too dangerous to set free and it's unclear what to do with others.

Bush was the first American president in 27 years to visit Austria.

Come Clean In Hungary (WP)

By Charles Gati

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

President Bush will be in Budapest tomorrow to visit a good ally -- a member of the coalition of the willing. The first item on his agenda, according to the White House, is to "celebrate Hungary's historic sacrifices in the name of freedom by commemorating the 50th anniversary of the 1956 Hungarian Revolution." Topics of mutual interest will follow.

The president should indeed join Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcs?ny -- Hungary's Tony Blair -- to celebrate that country's recent achievements. But commemorating 1956 is a different matter.

The truth is that at a critical juncture in the Cold War, when Hungarians rose against their Soviet oppressors, the United States abandoned them. After 13 days of high drama, hope and despair, the mighty Soviet army prevailed. For its part, Washington offered a sad variation on "NATO": no action, talk only. The Eisenhower administration's policy of "liberation" and "rollback" turned out to be a hoax -- hypocrisy mitigated only by self-delusion. The more evident, if unstated, goal was to roll back the Democrats from Capitol Hill rather than liberate Central and Eastern Europe from Soviet tyranny.

Until the Soviet tanks rolled in, the Hungarians believed what Washington had proclaimed. They did not know that the United States was unprepared to help them and that a few high officials even expected some political and foreign policy benefits from a Soviet invasion. Vice President Richard Nixon explained to his colleagues at a top-secret National Security Council meeting in July 1956 that "it wouldn't be an unmixed evil, from the point of view of U.S. interest, if the Soviet iron fist were to come down again on the Soviet bloc."

In a similarly cynical vein, American-run Radio Free Europe in Germany encouraged the hapless insurgents to go all the way against the Kremlin and even broadcast lessons on how to make molotov cocktails.

We now know from Russian archives that the Hungarians did have a chance to gain some of what they sought. For on Oct. 30, one week after the revolt began, members of the Soviet Presidium (as the Politburo was called then) unanimously voted not to use military force. Their decision came in the wake of a series of conciliatory, post-Stalin policies, such as the 1955 Soviet withdrawal from Austria and reconciliation with Yugoslavia -- both of which are neighbors of Hungary -- as well as the first summit with the United States in a decade. In the end, the Kremlin intervened because it feared that the situation would spin out of control both in Hungary and elsewhere in the Soviet bloc. Radio Free Europe's exaggerated rhetoric only amplified these fears.

The United States, according to the usual version of what happened, could not help the Hungarians because any action would have triggered a military confrontation with Moscow. This explanation misses the point: There were actions short of war that Washington might have taken. It could certainly have urged the Hungarians to temporize and pursue limited, evolutionary goals. It could have taken the issue to the United Nations before, and not after, the Soviet crackdown. In an imaginative move toward post-Stalin detente, it could have proposed immediate talks about withdrawing American forces from a small Western European country in exchange for Soviet withdrawal from Hungary.

Instead, Washington offered only hope, no help. "Poor fellows, poor fellows," President Dwight Eisenhower said privately as he campaigned for reelection. "I wish there were some way of helping them."

Washington's hands-off stance had nothing to do with the concurrent Suez crisis either. With Suez or without it, the United States had no means available to aid, let alone "liberate," Hungary. For despite all the talk about "liberation" since 1952, neither the National Security Council nor the State Department had devised plans for diplomatic or any other form of assistance. Nor was the CIA ready. When I received permission to study the agency's operational files for my book "Failed Illusions," to be published in September, I was stunned to learn that the CIA had but one official operating in Hungary in 1956. In Austria, as first reported by Evan Thomas a few years ago, the CIA did not have a single Hungarian-speaking agent. The handful of emigres trained for behind-the-lines activity were let go in 1953.

It is time to come clean.

The president should tell the Hungarians that in the 1950s Congress issued politically inspired "Captive Nations" resolutions and held self-satisfying "prayer breakfasts," while Eisenhower delivered empty promises about "liberation" during presidential campaigns in 1952 and 1956 to please Hungarian (and other Eastern European) ethnics in Ohio and elsewhere -- with no plans to carry them out.

The Hungarians need to hear what happened 50 years ago -- and Americans need to hear that in the future we will not say we seek clearly unattainable goals abroad for political ends at home.

Bush Hopes For WTO Breakthrough On Farm Subsidies (AFP)

AFP, June 21, 2006

US President George W. Bush hopes European leaders will improve their offer on agricultural trade to help bring about a breakthrough in stalled global trade talks, a White House official said.

National security advisor Stephen Hadley told reporters on Air Force One, carrying Bush and other officials to a US-European Union summit, that Bush sees a deal as possible this year on the Doha Round of World Trade Organization talks.

Hadley cited a "bold offer with respect to agricultural subsidies" made by Washington last year, which would slash subsidies by some 60 percent.

"We really need to see a response from the Group of 20 countries and from the Europeans that is comparable to this offer."

The G20 group of developing nations is another key bloc at the WTO talks along with the US and EU.

Hadley said resolving the deadlock on farm subsidies could allow WTO negotiators to strike an overall deal liberalizing trade, which he said offers benefits for all countries.

DOJ_NMG_0036435

"If they can move in this direction we are going to be in the sight of getting an agreement by the end of the year and I think we will see the president encourage everyone he talks to on this trip not to miss this terrific opportunity to advance trade and advance development and help raise people out of poverty," the official added.

Members of the WTO are struggling to meet their deadline of year-end 2006 to complete the current, so-called Doha Development Agenda of trade talks, which is supposed to help poor countries.

The Doha round, which was launched in 2001 in the Qatari capital, was meant to have been completed in 2004. Negotiators also missed their last deadline, April 30, for deciding on the mathematics of the final accord.

WTO ministers are next to meet at the headquarters of the free-trade organization's headquarters on June 29 to try to hammer out out an agreement on the framework for further talks on the key subjects of tariffs on agriculture and industrial products.

Plan B For Plurilateralists (WSJ)

By Bernard K. Gordon

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

The president's trip to Europe this week includes a personal effort to kick-start world trade talks. That should end the idea that he was downgrading U.S. trade goals when Rob Portman was transferred from trade chief to budget director. Instead, the president has made clear the U.S. insists on a genuine big deal for world trade -- or no deal at all. That's in contrast to what some are calling a "modestly ambitious outcome" -- or what Susan Schwab, Mr. Portman's successor as USTR, has rejected as "Doha Lite."

The president laid out what's involved: Europe will "have to make a tough decision on farming," the developing countries will "have to make a tough decision on manufacturing" and the U.S., he said, "is prepared to make a tough decision to go along with them." It's a last-ditch effort, because presidential trade authority expires in a year, and in Congress there's no stomach for half-deals. Indeed Bill Thomas, the powerful chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, has said Washington should end altogether its support for the WTO.

It's the developing nations, led by Brazil and India, which are calling for just a "modest outcome," and it's time to recognize they have too small a stake to make that case. In fact, the world's 50 "least developed" nations account for less than 1% of global trade, and even with India and Brazil added, the total is less than 3%. The economies that are in fact the world's trade leaders are, not surprisingly, in North America, northeast Asia, the EU and the Asia/Pacific region.

If those trade heavyweights cannot close a satisfactory deal this summer, it will be time to start on Plan B, which would be centered on "plurilateral" or less than global-scale trade agreements. These would retain the key elements of the present multilateral system, which means they must exclude all preferences or preferential treatment; be based on full reciprocity; and be open to all who abide by those rules.

Fortunately the two essential elements to do just that are already in place. One building-block is the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade's Article 24, which was initially drafted to allow for the original European Community. It provides legal cover for groups of nations to establish FTAs, so long as "substantially all trade" is included. The second building-block is in the several "free trade" agreements the U.S. already has signed, and the others on its current agenda. Included are Nafta, the recent agreements with Singapore, Australia and Chile, earlier agreements with Jordan and Israel, and the largely completed Cafta. FTA talks recently begun with Korea and Malaysia have produced encouraging signs (those with Thailand are on hold), and further down the road are several FTAs in the Middle East.

The initial step would be to tie together these separate FTAs into a broader group of nations that share America's free trade goals. Some in Europe are in that category: Britain, the Netherlands, several in Scandinavia and very probably Germany. They seem hardly willing to continue supporting the French-EU insistence on the agricultural policies that have stalled the Doha Round. Yes, Peter Mandelson, EU Trade Commissioner, has said Europe would lose "next to nothing" if the WTO's Doha Round fails, and it's time to test that.

One clue of change in Europe's trade winds came two months ago, when several EU nations wrote Mr. Mandelson to warn him not to make further concessions on agriculture. But those that did not sign the letter included most of the EU's trade heavyweights: Britain, Holland, Germany, Sweden and Denmark. In world trade terms, that's quite a club.

Just as with the existing bilateral and regional FTAs, the new plurilateral free trade group would exist alongside, rather than substitute for, the multilateral system at the heart of the present Doha Round, which has evidently come on hard times. The key advantage of plurilateralism would be to continue the widening of trade liberalization, rather than being stymied by the split between what Robert Zoellick called the "can do" and the "won't do" nations.

But to get the ball rolling the U.S. must return to its traditional position of trade leadership. The whole process started when Cordell Hull, FDR's secretary of state, authored the Reciprocal Trade Act of 1934, and now's the time to resume that role.

Brussels Decries US Protectionism (FT)

By Wolfgang Proissl, Fidelius Schmid And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, June 21, 2006

A rising tide of protectionism could endanger European investment in the US, the president of the European Commission said ahead of a European Union-US summit in Vienna on Wednesday.

José Manuel Barroso said he had spoken to George W. Bush, US president, several times about the risk of introducing new barriers on investment because of worries about globalisation or terrorism.

"We want to make sure that the security concerns that we respect can be dealt with in a manner that is not detrimental with our overall political relations, specifically on trade and investment," he told Financial Times Deutschland, the FT's sister paper.

"We deplore all decisions when there is – because of a security concern – the restriction of the free flow of capital . . . It's negative for all of us. We believe it's important to have more cross-border investment."

He said a backlash against globalisation was also stoking "protectionist tendencies" in the US. and elsewhere.

The US and the EU are each other's biggest source of foreign direct investment. With a total bilateral investment stock of €1,500bn ($18,871bn), two-thirds of European and US companies' investment abroad reaches the other side of the Atlantic.

But EU officials believe the failure of Dubai Ports World's attempt to buy US ports this year showed a willingness by Congress to block foreign investment on grounds unrelated to economic criteria.

The topic is just one of a number of sensitive practical issues on which transatlantic ties will be tested at today's summit.

Mr Barroso is also worried about Washington's refusal to grant visa-free access to the US to citizens of "new" EU member states, and the Commission has struggled to meet US demands to provide details of transatlantic air passengers in a way that is compatible with EU law.

But Mr Barroso said that, on broad strategic issues, the Bush administration had moved closer to the EU in recent months.

Mr Barroso said the US's position on the visa-waiver scheme treated people from new member states "as second-class citizens" even though they hailed from countries that were "very pro-American".

He put this in the context of "a great improvement in EU-US relations", shown by the US's greater appetite for a multilateral approach, notably over Iran.

However, he underlined the EU's demand for the US to close its detention centre on Guantanamo Bay. "We believe that the moral ground that we have in fighting terrorism should not be changed by any kind of vacuum or break in the respect of human rights," he said. "We should not lose our soul in our fight against that."

U.S., EU Are Set To Pressure Russia (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon And Henry J. Pulizzi

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

VIENNA -- A U.S.-European Union draft declaration raises concerns about Russia's energy policy and erosion of political freedoms, just weeks before that country hosts its first meeting of the Group of Eight powers.

DOJ_NMG_0036437

The draft declaration sets the stage for a tussle over energy policy at the coming G-8 summit, where Russia has made energy security the primary agenda item. The Bush administration believes Russia has been seeking to use its vast energy resources as a political weapon, particularly in Central and Eastern Europe.

President Bush arrived here late yesterday for a one-day summit with EU leaders. He travels to Budapest tomorrow to deliver a speech commemorating the 50th anniversary of the Hungarian uprising against the Soviet Union and is likely to raise concerns about the deterioration of democracy in Russia.

The draft states that "we are concerned about some recent developments in Russia and the region," adding that the U.S. and EU "will work with Russia to promote energy security, the application of the rule of law, and independent judiciary and full respect for human rights, including free and independent media and a vibrant civil society." It seeks to soften that criticism by noting that "we attach great importance to our relationship with Russia and are pursuing deeper cooperation on a range of issues of common interest."

On energy, the draft broadly emphasizes the need for diversification of energy sources, supplies and transit routes, implicitly underscoring concerns that Russia has too much control over Europe's gas and oil supplies. While encouraging better dialogue between consumer and producer countries, it also calls for "promoting diversification of energy sources and supply routes worldwide, and notably in the Caspian Sea region," as well as the Middle East, Africa and Latin America.

It also appears to criticize a lack of transparency and open access in Russia, saying the EU and U.S. should "promote market-based energy security policies that ensure competition, transparency, respect for contracts and non-discriminatory trade, transit and access." The U.S. and Russia have been locked in a debate over the G-8 declaration on several of those issues. Russia wants more access to Western retail markets for its state-dominated energy companies, while the U.S. is worried that Russia isn't allowing Western private-sector oil companies to compete for development of its best oil fields.

The declaration also shows the U.S. edging closer to European views on pollution and global warming. It calls for creation of an "EU-U.S. High-Level Dialogue" on climate change and alternative fuels.

U.S., EU Unite To Fight China Over Regulations (WSJ)

By William Echikson

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

BRUSSELS -- When President Bush meets with European Union leaders in Vienna today, the two sides will try to sidestep their many disputes over how to regulate global business. One thing they can agree on, though: the need to dissuade China from becoming a third global regulatory power.

Businessmen and officials on both sides of the Atlantic said China's desire to set its own regulatory requirements for goods sold there is becoming a big concern, because car makers and other exporters would have to tailor products to meet another set of expensive requirements in order to compete in China's huge market.

"We need to make sure China stays on board and doesn't create separate standards," said Reinhard Schulte-Braucks, director of the European Commission's car-regulation unit. "The Americans share the same fear, and we must work together."

So while the U.S. and EU have been slow to harmonize their regulatory regimes, the prospect of China adding another layer of costly rules is fostering greater interest in trans-Atlantic cooperation. Mr. Bush and leaders from the EU's main institutions are expected in Vienna to approve a deal to form joint task forces to crack down on counterfeiting and other intellectual-property abuses around the globe. Gregor Kreuzhuber, industry spokesman for the EU, said the agreement was directed in large part at Beijing.

The deal is one of the few concrete results expected to emerge from an annual summit designed mainly to show that the world's two biggest economies are working together on areas ranging from efforts to rein in Iran's nuclear program to improving the security of global energy supplies.

Beijing is demanding a Chinese inscription be put on tires in addition to the present international symbol, which is set along with other global standards by a United Nations agency based in Geneva. For tire makers such as Germany's Continental AG or Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. of the U.S., that would require remaking expensive tire molds.

"We are terribly worried about this Chinese demand and fighting it alongside the Americans, Japanese and everybody else trying to get into the Chinese market," said Fazilet Cinralp, secretary-general of the European Tyre & Rubber Manufacturers' Association. She estimated the annual cost to each major tire company at millions of euros.

Equally worrying is the "distinct possibility" that China will impose its own crash tests to protect its car makers, Mr. Schulte-Braucks said. China currently has stricter sanitary guidelines on food imports and higher capital requirements on banks, among other things.

Still, domestic political hurdles to harmonizing U.S. and European regulations are often large, and for now regulatory tensions appear to be increasing.

Günter Verheugen, the European Commission's industry chief, recalled that at the previous U.S.-EU summit a year ago, he lobbied Mr. Bush to create a "common regulatory space" across the Atlantic Ocean. As an example, Mr. Verheugen suggested safety and environmental standards for cars. "Do it," Mr. Bush told his aides, Mr. Verheugen recalled.

A year later, U.S. and EU car regulations are as far apart as ever. Car manufacturers still have to run different crash tests and make different models for the two markets to meet requirements for safety, emissions and car lights. The variations add at least 20% to the cost of making a car, according to a spokesman for Volkswagen AG.

Mr. Verheugen also is proceeding with a strict European chemical-testing initiative, much to U.S. annoyance. The legislation would mandate sweeping testing and classification of as many as 30,000 chemical substances. American businesses say most of these are harmless, and the measure could cost the U.S. chemicals industry some $17 billion in exports. "Setting the same standards sounds easy to solve, but not if you get down to the nitty gritty," said Mr. Verheugen's spokesman, Mr. Kreuzhuber.

Pyongyang Asserts 'Right' To Test-fire Missiles (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

North Korea declared today that it has a right to carry out long-range missile tests, a day after U.S. officials said the Pentagon has activated a new missile defense system and as several countries called for Pyongyang to refrain from launching a missile.

"It is not right for others to tell us what to do about our sovereign rights," Han Song-ryol, the deputy chief of North Korea's mission to the United Nations, told a South Korean news agency, although he also said his country was open to talks with the U.S. on the issue.

"The United States says it is concerned about our missile test launch. Our position is, 'OK then, let us talk about it,' " Mr. Han told Yonhap.

White House officials would not say what the consequences would be if North Korea tested a missile, and officials at the Pentagon and State Department refused to comment on whether the U.S. ground-based interceptor system was up and running, as The Washington Times reported yesterday.

"There are many options, and we are simply not going to tip our hand as to what the possible response should be," White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters traveling on Air Force One with the president, who landed in Austria yesterday for a meeting with leaders of the European Union today.

National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley said the North Koreans "seem to be moving forward towards a launch, but the intelligence is not conclusive at this point."

He said, however, that the rogue nation's moves have unified key U.S. partners in the region, including Japan, which has indicated it might sponsor a United Nations Security Council resolution on the matter.

"A lot of folks are sending messages to the North Koreans this would be a bad idea," Mr. Hadley said.

Poor weather conditions prevailed yesterday over northeastern North Korea, where U.S. intelligence agencies have been monitoring a long-range Taepodong missile being fueled at a base along the east coast, U.S. officials said.

The missile is thought to be a Taepodong-2 capable of hitting part of U.S. territory. The North also claims to have built nuclear weapons.

Bush administration officials said Monday that the new ground-based interceptor missile defense system is operational and that one option being considered if a missile is launched is to shoot it down with one of 11 interceptors deployed at Fort Greeley, Alaska, or Vandenberg Air Force Base in Southern California.

Amid heightened tensions over the North Korean plans, the U.S. military is conducting its largest war games in decades. Three U.S. aircraft carrier battle groups are exercising near the Pacific island of Guam as part of the maneuvers.

The Pentagon's Missile Defense Agency also has planned a sea-based missile defense test from an Aegis cruiser near Hawaii for today.

The North's declaration prompted Japan and South Korea to pledge cooperation to thwart the test plans.

In China, Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Jiang Yu urged "all parties" to act in ways helpful to peace and stability on the Korean Peninsula, but did not publicly call on North Korea to call off its launch.

"China has taken note of reporting on the possible launch of a missile" by North Korea, she said. "We do not have a complete understanding of the situation. Under the current situation, we hope all sides concerned can put in more effort to do things which are good for calming the situation and good for regional peace and stability."

Yesterday, Japan's Kyodo news quoted North Korean Foreign Ministry official Ri Pyong-dok as saying that North Korea is not bound by the joint declaration at international nuclear disarmament talks last year or a missile-test moratorium agreed to by Tokyo and Pyongyang in 2002. The North had ceased firings since 1999, and leader Kim Jong-il reaffirmed the moratorium in 2004.

But Mr. Han said the moratorium had been respected in times of dialogue with Washington and Japan.

"When we were engaged in hectic dialogue with Washington and Tokyo for rapprochement, we said we would suspend missile test launches for the time when the dialogue was under way in order to help improve the atmosphere," he told Yonhap.

Any launch would be a provocative step and contrary to North Korea's self-imposed ban on missile testing, said U.S. State Department spokesman Adam Ereli. He would not speculate on any consequences of either a launch or a U.S. intercept.

"Our preferred course of action is that there not be a missile launch or a missile test," he said. "And we've made that clear. And we've also made clear that any such action would result in North Korea's further isolation in the international community."

On Capitol Hill, Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said the North Korean plans highlight the need for U.S. missile defenses.

"Communist North Korea's current actions directly underscore the need for the United States to deploy an effective missile defense system capable of defeating these threats," Mr. Hunter said. "We can't wait around idly while our enemies build and test long-range missiles capable of attacking American cities."

North Korea Disavows Its Moratorium On Testing Of Long-Range Missiles (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 20 — North Korea said Tuesday that it was not bound by its own moratorium on long-range missile tests, as tension over the country's missile intentions continued to mount.

In Washington, a senior State Department official challenged the interpretation, saying the United States expected the North Korean government to abide by its commitments.

An official of that government's Foreign Ministry told Japanese reporters that a missile test would not be "bound by any statement such as the Pyongyang declaration," the Japanese news agency Kyodo reported. The agency quoted the official, Ri Pyong Dok, as saying: "This issue concerns our autonomy. Nobody has a right to slander that right."

The declaration was signed in 2002 by the North Korean leader, Kim Jong Il, and the Japanese prime minister, Junichiro Koizumi. In it, North Korea pledged to extend a moratorium on its test launchings of longrange ballistic missiles.

But that agreement is something less than a binding treaty.

The North agreed to the moratorium in 1999. Charles Kartman, the United States special envoy who negotiated it with the North Koreans, said the understanding had been worked out on the assumption that the two countries would conduct further talks on an American proposal to ban the testing, production and export of long-range North Korean missiles. But such negotiations have not been held since 2000.

"The moratorium was to be in effect only so long as the two sides were engaged in missile talks," Mr. Kartman said in an interview. "The Bush administration's disinterest in continuing the missile negotiations would have, of course, canceled out the 1999 moratorium."

The North Koreans later agreed to extend the moratorium on missile tests as part of the separate 2002 understanding with the Japanese. In a joint declaration with Japan, North Korea "expressed its will to extend its moratorium on missile tests beyond 2003 in the spirit of the declaration," according to an English-language translation of the declaration.

The Bush administration has taken the position that both moratoriums are still in effect. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday that the United States would regard a missile launching as an "abrogation of obligations that North Korea undertook in the moratorium that they signed on to in 1999, that they reiterated in 2002."

A senior State Department official said: "A basic tenet of international relations is that when you say you're going to do something, you do it. You abide by your commitments, and if you don't, well, you are judged accordingly."

He insisted that his name not be used because he was not authorized to speak publicly on the issue.

The issue of the moratorium emerged along with reports that the United States has raised the alert status of its ground-based missile defense system. The Pentagon has deployed 11 missile interceptors in a test status in Alaska and California and has not conducted a successful interception test in four years.

Nonetheless, the Pentagon has asserted that the missiles could be activated if international events warranted and noted that several tests in which a target is to be intercepted are scheduled for this year and early next year.

Pentagon officials refused to discuss the current status of the system. "We have a limited missile-defense system," said Eric Ruff, the Pentagon spokesman. "We don't discuss the alert status or the specific capabilities." The Washington Times reported Tuesday that the system had been activated.

Missile defense proponents said North Korea's missile preparations would strengthen the case for building more robust missile defenses. "I think the activity by North Korea clearly makes the case that a missile defense is necessary for American security," said Representative Duncan Hunter, the California Republican who is chairman of the House Armed Service Committee.

Critics asserted that the missile defense was an illusory shield against a threat that had yet to materialize.

"The system being declared operational is no more than a scarecrow, incapable of fooling anyone except perhaps some members of the administration who want to pretend to be defending the country against a North Korean missile attack," said Robert G. Gard, a retired Army lieutenant general and a senior fellow at the Center for Arms Control and Nonproliferation.

Diplomatic efforts to stop North Korea from launching what American officials believe is a two-stage Taepodong 2 missile continued on Tuesday. Secretary General Kofi Annan of the United Nations called for a halt to test preparations. "I hope that the leaders of North Korea will listen to and hear what the world is saying," he said. "We are all worried."

[A top North Korean official has offered talks with the United States on the plans for a missile test, indicating that a launching could be put off, Agence France-Presse reported in Seoul, South Korea, on Wednesday. "The United States says it is concerned about our missile test launch," Han Song Ryol, the deputy chief of North Korea's mission to the United Nations, told the Yonhap news agency, according to A.F.P. "Our position is, O.K., then, let's talk about it."]

There has been some concern in the United States that North Korea might seek to justify the missile firing as part of a civilian space program. But American officials say that even such a launching would violate the 2002 moratorium, since the technology used to put satellites into orbit is easily transferable to intercontinental missiles. The North Koreans described their last significant test in 1998 as an effort to launch a satellite.

U.S. Readies System For Missile Detection (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks And Joohee Cho

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036441

The U.S. military yesterday moved ships into position off the coast of North Korea to detect the launch of any long-range ballistic missiles and prepared its new, unproven missile-interception system to attempt a response if necessary.

It was apparently the first time that the U.S. government has readied its rudimentary missile-defense system other than to test it. But officials played down the possibility that the interceptors might be used against a North Korean missile, and the South Korean government expressed doubt that Pyongyang is even preparing a test launch of its first intercontinental missile. It suggested that the government of Kim Jong Il might only be preparing to send a satellite into space.

Han Song Ryol, North Korea's deputy chief of mission at the United Nations, said that Pyongyang has a right to develop and test missiles, but that it would like to ease tensions over the situation through talks, the Yonhap news agency quoted him as saying. "We know that the U.S. is concerned about our missile test launch," the news services quoted Han as having said in a telephone conversation with Yonhap. "Our position is to solve this situation through discussions."

Two U.S. Navy ships with sensors that could swiftly detect and track a missile's flight were operating off the North Korean coast yesterday, a Pentagon official said. They are the USS Curtis Wilbur and the USS Fitzgerald, both Arleigh Burke-class guided-missile destroyers based at Yokosuka, Japan.

Also, as part of a long-planned exercise, the Navy has three carrier battle groups operating near Guam in the western Pacific for the first time since the Vietnam War, along with dozens of aircraft, including several heavy bombers.

Pentagon officials said that steps had been taken to ready the U.S. interceptors in much the same way that they would proceed for a test of the system -- which is still being built -- because of recent satellite imagery indicating that North Korea might be preparing a test launch.

But they declined to confirm a Washington Times story yesterday that said the system had recently been activated, and that the Bush administration is considering shooting down the North Korean missile.

"The United States has a limited missile-defense system, but I'm not going to discuss status or capabilities," said Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman.

There are nine interceptor missiles based in Alaska and two in California. They are at the core of a complex system that connects launch data from satellites and radars on land and aboard ships, and transmits the data to command-and-control facilities, where senior commanders make decisions about whether to launch interceptors. The system has not successfully intercepted a missile in its current configuration.

U.S. government officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity, played down the likelihood of the new anti-missile system being used in this situation because, they said, it is not yet clear whether North Korea will send a missile aloft -- or if it does, whether it would head anywhere near U.S. territory. Nor would the U.S. government want to risk an embarrassing failure of its system, they said, and it is possible that the missile could carry a satellite into space, rather than arc back to earth.

In Seoul, a South Korean official said his government is skeptical of U.S. intelligence indicating that North Korea is preparing to launch a new, larger version of the Taepodong-2 missile capable of hitting the West Coast of the United States. He said his government is not particularly alarmed by the situation and "doesn't understand why there is such fuss in other countries on this."

He also said it is too early to tell if the North Koreans are trying to launch a satellite or test a missile.

A South Korean parliamentary panel concluded that North Korea "does not seem" to have completed injecting fuel into the missile, citing information from South Korea's National Intelligence Service.

"The NIS reported that it is hard to believe the missiles have been fully fueled already," Rep. Chung Hyung Keun, secretary of the National Assembly's Intelligence Committee, told reporters in Seoul. The lawmaker made the remark after emerging from a briefing by the NIS. "The 40 fuel tanks spotted at the site do not contain enough to launch a missile that needs 65 tons of liquid fuel," the lawmaker said.

National security adviser Stephen J. Hadley appeared to confirm the South Korean account when he told reporters on Air Force One as President Bush flew to Vienna yesterday that "it's hard to tell" if North Korea has fueled the missile.

"They seem to be moving forward towards a launch, but the intelligence is not conclusive at this point," Hadley said.

U.S officials have examined intelligence that suggests Pyongyang may be preparing to test a Taepodong-2 missile from a remote village on North Korea's northeast coast. They have said U.S. satellites have observed liquid-fuel canisters placed near the missile, but officials said there was no confirmation that the missile had been fueled.

Meanwhile, the United States and Japan began negotiations on a draft resolution at the United Nations that would condemn Pyongyang if it conducts a test. The resolution would also demand that Pyongyang observe a 1999 moratorium on missile tests and resume international negotiations over its nuclear weapons program.

U.S. and Japanese diplomats have been laying the groundwork for the resolution in private meetings with members of the Security Council. But council diplomats said that China, which is hosting the stalled six-nation talks over North Korea's nuclear weapons program, has called on the resolution's chief sponsors to water it down. The United States last attempted to take up the issue of North Korea's nuclear weapons program in 2003, but dropped the effort in the face of Chinese opposition.

An expert on ballistic missile proliferation, Henry D. Sokolski, said U.S. diplomatic efforts are too limited because North Korea is hardly being punished for its actions.

"We must make sure that others see that this is not a model to follow," said Sokolski, a former Pentagon official. "I am sure the Iranians are watching this very, very closely."

North Korea Launch Concerns Mount (LAT)

By Barbara Demick

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

Defying international pressure, North Korea today defended its right to test-fire a long-range missile under international law.

In Pyongyang's first public comment on the emerging conflict over the missile launch, a North Korean official visiting Tokyo said that the country did not consider itself bound by a 1999 testing moratorium or other agreements.

"This is a matter of national sovereignty, and no one has the right to criticize it," Lee Byung-du, a director at the North Korean Foreign Ministry, was quoted as telling reporters by Japan's Kyodo News Service.

The North Korean did not elaborate on what was occurring at a remote missile base on his country's East Coast, where intelligence satellites have observed the apparent assembling and fueling of a multistage missile.

If anything, North Korea's intentions have become less clear because of a growing controversy over the intelligence data.

South Korean officials today challenged the U.S. assertion that North Korea had completed the fueling process, making a launch both inevitable and imminent.

The National Intelligence Service told the National Assembly today that only 40 fuel canisters were observed around the launch site at the Musudan-ri missile base, and that the number was far too little to fuel what is said to be a 115-foot long, 65-ton multistage missile.

In addition, the South Korean government is questioning whether the missile in question is for military use.

One government official who had attended a briefing said the nature of the liquid fuel at the site and the way it is being assembled above ground suggested a civilian purpose, such as for launching a satellite.

"We believe it is premature to judge whether this is a missile or a satellite. We are not jumping to conclusions," said the official who asked not to be named.

In 1998, North Korean launched a similar multistage Taepodong I missile over Japan and into the Pacific Ocean. They claimed the missile carried a satellite that was broadcasting North Korean revolutionary hymns, and was contributing to "scientific research for peaceful use of outer space."

The United States and Japan disputed the North Korean assertion.

North Korea signed a missile-testing moratorium in 1999 and renewed the pledge in 2002 during a summit in Pyongyang between North Korean leader Kim Jong Il and Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi. The North Koreans say that the moratorium expired in 2003.

North Korea Asserts Right To Test-fire Missile (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, June 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036443

WASHINGTON — North Korea on Tuesday defended its right to test a long-range missile and rejected international calls to stop launch preparations.

North Korean Foreign Minister Ri Pyong Dok said the right to test-launch a ballistic missile "concerns our autonomy," Japan's Kyodo News agency reported. "Nobody has a right to slander that right," Ri told Japanese media.

Ri, while not confirming or denying that North Korea plans a missile launch, said Pyongyang's actions are not bound by international commitments it has made to a missile moratorium. North Korea has abided by a ban on long-range missile tests since 1999.

Ri's words came amid continuing signs that North Korea is preparing to test-launch a Taepodong-2 missile. The multistage missile has a range of 9,320 miles, according to North Korea, and is capable of reaching the USA.

North Korea may have as many as 13 nuclear weapons, according to the Institute for Science and Security, a Washington think tank. The Taepodong-2 is believed to be capable of carrying a nuclear warhead.

National security adviser Stephen Hadley said it was difficult to judge whether North Korea had actually completed fueling a missile in preparation for a test.

"They seem to be moving forward toward a launch, but the intelligence is not conclusive at this point," he said.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned North Korea on Monday that such a launch would be a "provocative act."

Six-party talks aimed at persuading North Korea to give up its nuclear program have been stalled since November. The United States has refused one-on-one negotiations.

In other developments Tuesday:

•Rice spoke by telephone to South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon, and United Nations Ambassador John Bolton spoke to members of the U.N. Security Council in New York.

U.S. officials would not specify what action might be taken if North Korea conducts a test. "We are simply not going to tip our hand," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

•International opposition to a missile launch deepened, as France and the United Nations called for a stop in test preparations.

"We are all worried," U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said in Paris. French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin said a test by North Korea would prompt a "firm and just" international response.

•Alexander Vershbow, U.S. ambassador to South Korea, said Washington wants to have normal relations with North Korea. He urged Pyongyang not to test a missile and instead return to international nuclear talks.

"We want to achieve a negotiated solution to the nuclear issue," Vershbow said after meeting with former South Korean president Kim Dae Jung, who canceled plans to meet North Korean leader Kim Jong Il next week.

•The Pentagon staged previously scheduled war games near Guam in the Pacific Ocean with 22,000 troops and three aircraft carriers. Cmdr. Mike Brown said the exercises were not aimed at North Korea or "any one nation."

N Korea 'is Not Bound' By Missile Test Ban (FT)

By David Pilling And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, June 21, 2006

North Korea on Tuesday declared that it was not bound by a moratorium on testing long-range missiles, and increasing fears that it would launch an intercontinental ballistic missile.

The North Korean threat follows days of escalating tension prompted by evidence that Pyongyang is preparing to test a long-range Taepodong-2 missile that could reach Japan and parts of the continental US.

Ri Pyong Dok, a North Korean foreign ministry official, told Japanese journalists in Pyongyang that a long-range missile test launch "is not bound by any statement such as the Pyongyang Declaration", Kyodo news reported.

Mr Ri was referring to an agreement signed in 2002 between Kim Jong Il, North Korea's leader, and Junichiro Koizumi, Japan's prime minister, in which Pyongyang promised not to test long-range missiles.

John Bolton, US ambassador to the United Nations, said members of the Security Council had begun "preliminary" discussions on how to respond to any test.

DOJ_NMG_0036444

"We are discussing a range of things that fall within the Security Council's domain given that this launch would constitute a threat to international peace and security," Mr Bolton said in Washington.

US officials said on Tuesday that the US had activated its missile defence system but some analysts questioned whether the system would be capable of hitting an incoming missile.

Bryan Whitman, Pentagon spokesman, said: "The US does have a limited missile defence system but I'm not going to get into specific alert status or capabilities."

Dominique de Villepin, the French prime minister, on Tuesday said the international community should respond to a North Korean test with a "firm and just" response.

A US official on Monday said Washington believed North Korea had fuelled the Taepodong-2 missile, a procedure that is difficult and dangerous to reverse, suggesting that a missile test could be imminent.

But Stephen Hadley, the White House national security adviser, on Tuesday said the evidence was "not conclusive". But he added that North Korea seems "to be moving forward towards a launch". Some media reports have suggested that bad weather over the missile launch site could be delaying the test.

Pyongyang caused an international crisis in 1998 when it fired an earlier version of the Taepodong missile over Japan into the Pacific.

The event was a catalyst for Tokyo's decision to develop a missile defence shield in conjunction with Washington.

Both Mr Koizumi and Shinzo Abe, Japan's chief cabinet secretary who has made his career being tough on North Korea, said this week that Japan would respond sternly to any missile test.

Few Moves Left With N. Korea (LAT)

By Barbara Demick

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

SEOUL — The Bush administration has limited options to prevent North Korea from test-firing a multistage missile that could reach U.S. interests in the Pacific.

In many ways, a missile deployment could constitute grounds for a preemptive attack, such as an airstrike against North Korea. But that is unlikely to be considered a serious option given the U.S. entanglement in Iraq and objections from China.

China and Russia's ties to North Korea also make it unlikely that the United Nations Security Council could inflict meaningful punishment on the regime in Pyongyang. South Korea has signaled it would not go along with efforts to economically isolate its estranged neighbor in retaliation for a launch.

The Bush administration already has measures in place to stanch the flow of illicit money to Pyongyang through offshore banks in Macao and to block North Korean shipping. Yet the North Korean regime continues to thumb its nose at the U.S. campaign against weapons of mass destruction.

Since September, it has boycotted six-party talks aimed at dismantlement of its nuclear program, and the coaxing and threatening from the United States have been to little avail.

"Kim Jong Il is calling the Bush administration's bluff," said Daniel Pinkston, a North Korea specialist with the Center for Nonproliferation Studies in Monterey. "The U.S. is already doing everything it can do in terms of economic pressure."

For weeks, U.S., Japanese and South Korean intelligence satellites have observed trucks delivering missile parts and fuel to the Musudan-ri missile base on North Korea's east coast. The North has made no effort to conceal the activities.

The new missile seems to be a souped-up version of the Taepodong 1, which North Korea tested in 1998. That launch demonstrated that the country, despite its impoverishment, had far more sophisticated technology than anyone thought.

The missile — called the Taepodong 2 — is thought to be capable of reaching U.S. bases in Japan, the U.S. territory of Guam and possibly Alaska or Hawaii.

North Korea's nuclear program has been up and running since 2002, when Pyongyang pulled out of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. The CIA now believes the country has enough fissile material for eight to 10 nuclear weapons.

Although North Korea probably cannot yet mount a nuclear warhead on a missile, most experts believe it is working rapidly to develop such capabilities.

DOJ_NMG_0036445

"If there ever was a case in which preemption would be logical, it would be this moment — but this is not where the political priorities are of the Bush administration right now," said a U.S.-based North Korea analyst who asked not to be quoted by name.

He contrasted the position of the U.S. and Japan in this situation with the airstrikes Israel made in 1981 to destroy an Iraqi nuclear plant under construction.

"If Japan were Israel, you know what would happen," the analyst said.

But when asked whether the United States would shoot down a missile, J. Thomas Schieffer, the U.S. ambassador to Japan, said in Tokyo today, "The U.S. has options available to it that it did not have in the past, and these options are on the table." He did not elaborate.

The U.S. hesitancy has a lot to do with horrific memories of the 1950-53 Korean War, in which China and the U.S. fought over the Korean peninsula at a cost of more than a million deaths and a ravaged land.

South Koreans are particularly fearful, and officials have had little to say publicly other than bland admonishments against a missile test, while privately downplaying the threat.

"If there is a missile test, the South Koreans will carry on business as usual," said Kim Tae-woo, a South Korean analyst at the Korea Institute for Defense Analyses. "They will not participate in any international effort to isolate North Korea."

North Korean officials have reportedly told the South that the missile is a civilian experiment designed to put a satellite into orbit. They made the same claim in 1998 after a test of a Taepodong 1 missile over Japan.

Although the U.S. is unlikely to buy the story, the ambiguity might be enough to muddle the debate over retaliatory action.

Given the limited options, the Bush administration is stuck taking the same tack it has in the wrangling over North Korea's nuclear program — asking China to lean on Pyongyang.

President Bush is believed to have called Chinese President Hu Jintao at least once over the last month because of the missile test. Almost all of North Korea's trade comes through China, making it the only country with real economic clout in this case.

Tokyo also has limited economic leverage over North Korea, leaving it with little to threaten other than asking for U.N. Security Council sanctions.

Most of Japan's actions appear aimed at voters at home, where there is simmering anger over the kidnappings of Japanese citizens in the 1970s and 1980s by North Korean security services. The Japanese government Friday passed a law requiring economic sanctions against Pyongyang if no progress is made on resolving questions about the fate of those abductees still believed to be missing.

After the 1998 missile launch, many threats were voiced against North Korea with little result.

President Clinton circumvented objections from Congress a few months afterward to fund a program to supply North Korea with heavy fuel oil. When Kim Jong Il agreed to a missile-testing moratorium the following year and again in 2002, North Korea received aid from Japan.

Andrei Lankov, a North Korea scholar based in Seoul, notes that North Korea's missile-testing moratorium has since expired and that there may be little in international law to prevent Pyongyang from doing a test launch.

He advises that the Bush administration's best bet in a no-win situation might be to "ignore the North Koreans."

"Too much of a fuss will only make things worse," Lankov said.

U.S. Missile Defense (WT)

By Peter Huessy

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

The twin nuclear and missile threats from Iran and North Korea have transformed the missile defense debate. It is no longer "should we deploy," but "how should we deploy?" Policy-makers face a tough decision: How much to invest in some protection now, vs. future, complimentary technologies that offer enhanced protection?

In missile defense, as in finance, the best way to cover risks is not to "put all your eggs in one basket." Instead, assemble a "balanced, diversified portfolio" of short, medium- and long-term technologies that cover the range of risks. In missile defense, current assets are being fielded, such as the Aegis/Standard Missile-3, initially deployed as an air defense weapon, but now upgraded to be a sea-based missile defense. Another is THAAD, the Terminal High-Altitude Air Defense system capable of providing terminal missile defenses for U.S. forces in a regional conflict. And the Alaska and California-based Ground-based Interceptor system (GBI) provides an initial defense for the continental United States against long range rockets.

Each has limits. The sea-based interceptor is limited by its shipboard launch canister. THAAD will always cover a limited area. And GBI is a fixed-site system that covers chiefly Northeast Asia threats.

Future assets like the Airborne Laser (ABL) and the Kinetic Energy Interceptor (KEI) offer complementary capabilities. ABL, a chemical laser mounted in a 747, requires further technological work to become operational. KEI, a very fast interceptor launched from land or sea, is a solvable engineering challenge. More futuristic capabilities, chiefly in the realm of space-based assets, require engineering successes, and, most of all, a policy commitment to extend interceptors into space.

How "far off" will depend on "when" we decide to move forward. For example, both Polaris and Minuteman intercontinental ballistic missiles were developed in the mid-1950s by the late Air Force Gen. Bernard Schriever in a time frame previously thought undoable. Both technologies have served us well, as the sea- and land-based legs of the U.S. nuclear triad have remained the bed rock upon which U.S. nuclear deterrence rests.

So, today, choosing the right missile defense balance is complicated. Most critics claim only systems that reach perfection should be considered for deployment. For example, many argued that defenses such as the early Patriot and GBI should not be deployed because they have limitations and are not panaceas. (Ironically, these same critics resort repeatedly to reliance on arms control, which does not exactly have a perfect record.)

For example, even as early Patriot action in the 1991 Gulf War resulted in the shootdown of more than 30 percent of all Iraqi Scuds, critics argued the system should not be built. It is true the Patriot deployments were indeed rushed to the Gulf on an emergency basis. In addition, the original technology was not configured for missile intercepts but for airplanes. In part, this was due to congressional prohibitions of missile defense upgrades for the Patriot. Despite these limits, the Patriot was of enormous benefit: It kept the allied coalition together. Today, the currently upgraded Patriot has already protected scores of Americans and coalition forces in the Gulf.

So, too, with missile defenses protecting the American heartland. The GBI systems in California and Alaska, now give some protection from North Korean-launched rockets. But critics charge the system has not been perfected and should be scrapped or delayed. Do they prefer to be naked to possible aggression? Others argue we should have deployed only a system compliant with the ABM treaty (now defunct), which actually prohibited such a defense of the American heartland.

Others argue that the GBI, which intercepts a rocket high above the Earth's surface, is less effective than a boost-phase system -- striking at a rocket in its early stages when it is slow, hot and big. In part this is true, but the systems to get there, such as an upgraded Aegis or KEI or ABL, are not yet in the inventory. There also remains issues of how close to an adversaries's launch area such a system must be.

The Bush administration rightly decided to move quickly to deploy an available shield, even as we seek on an ongoing basis to make it more effective. President Bush concluded leaving the U.S. totally unprotected was simply not an option, although one congressional critic, Rep. Rush Holt, said deploying no defenses at all was the best option.

So, what's the right way to think about missile defenses today? Again the analogy from the world of finance comes in handy. First, you need a long-range "investment strategy" based on a "balanced portfolio" of assets.

Second, you resist the temptation to "unbalance?" your investment strategy by seeing in every test, whether successful or not, a benchmark from which all missile defense decisions should be made. And third, just as in finance, you steer clear of those who tell you, "if there is not a silver bullet, don't buy anything."

As the U.S. now faces imminent threats from North Korean rockets, we should count our lucky stars that we also have an operational missile defense available to protect the American people. To that all I can say is, "Thank you, Mr. President."

Missile Defense Test (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036447

As we went to press in the U.S. last night, morning was breaking at the Musudan-ri launch facility in the remote northeast of North Korea. It's possible we'll wake up to the news that Pyongyang has tested the long-range ballistic missile that is fully fueled and which U.S. satellites have monitored for more than a month.

If so, we hope we'll also learn that the U.S. responded, as defense officials said late yesterday it might, by testing its newly operational missile defense system and blowing the Korean provocation out of the sky. What better way to discourage would-be nuclear proliferators than to demonstrate that the U.S. is able to destroy their missiles before they hit our allies, or the U.S. homeland. Even a miss would be a useful learning experience all around.

Consider what's at stake. We've known for years that North Korea has several nuclear weapons at the very least and is developing the missile technology to threaten America. Pyongyang's test missile is believed to be a Taepodong-2. A two-stage version could reach Alaska, Hawaii or the West Coast, according to a study in March by the Center for Nonproliferation at the Monterey Institute of International Studies, while a three-stage model could reach all of the continental U.S.

North Korea may not yet have the ability to miniaturize a nuclear warhead -- but then again it may. In any event, it's small comfort that the Taepodong-2 is probably inaccurate. If it misses Seattle, that's not necessarily good news for Tacoma or Portland.

The last time North Korea launched a missile that caught the world's attention was in August 1998, when it shot a Taepodong-1 over Japan and into the Pacific. Pyongyang has since tested shorter-range missiles many times, including as recently as March. Its inventory of ballistic missiles totals about 800, including 100-200 Nodongs and Taepodong-1s capable of reaching Japan. North Korea is also developing a land-based mobile missile known as the Taepodong-X, with a range of 4,000 kilometers that could land anywhere in Japan.

Missile exports have also long been a major source of foreign exchange for Pyongyang, with customers in Pakistan (whose "Ghauri" missile is a renamed Nodong) and throughout the Middle East. Its longtime best customer is Iran, which last year was reported to have purchased technology that allowed it to extend the range of its Shahab-3 missile to 3,500 kilometers from 1,500. In the blunt words of the German daily Bild last December, "this means that the 'madmen of Iran' could reach targets in the whole of Germany."

All of which demonstrates once again the need for the missile defenses that the Bush Administration has steadily been developing. The objective of the integrated system -- which U.S. officials stress is "limited" and still under development -- is to provide a "layered" defense, with multiple opportunities to take shots at an incoming missile. The highly complex system depends on swift coordination among elements based on land, at sea, and in the air or space.

On the ground, a key element are the interceptor missiles newly deployed at Fort Greeley, Alaska, and Vandenberg Air Force Base in California. There are also interceptors aboard the Navy's Aegis cruisers, two of which are currently patrolling near North Korea. Sensors are located aboard ships, in space, and at several sophisticated radar stations world-wide.

North Korea clearly intends any launch as an act of intimidation, part of its long-held belief that nuclear threats give it political leverage. Knocking the missile out of the sky, or even trying to, would tell the North that it can't succeed with such tactics. It would also reassure Japan and other U.S. allies that we have the will to protect them from rogue madmen. The demonstration effect would be useful around the world, not least in Iran.

As North Korea weighs a launch, it's a useful moment to recall how we got to this pass: Amid the arms-control era of the Cold War, the U.S. chose to defend itself against attack by plane or ship or ground but not by missile. One reason North Korea -- and Iran -- decided to invest scarce resources into developing nuclear weapons and ballistic-missiles is simply this: The U.S. was vulnerable.

The emerging missile defense system is making that less true, and a North Korean test launch is an ideal time to demonstrate that we are willing and able to defend ourselves.

Right Where He Wants Us (WSJ)

By Chuck Downs

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036448

It is no accident that North Korea has allowed U.S. intelligence to take note of its apparent preparations for firing a newer, longer range missile that might be capable of carrying nuclear warheads to U.S. soil. What we have been allowed to observe -- and our alarmed reactions to what we think we have seen -- are part of a strategy North Korea will play out carefully in the months ahead. Even if the Taepodong rocket is never launched, the next few months will see American interests subjected to significant strains.

Pyongyang has created an opportunity to break out of the negotiating deadlock that has stymied the regime for years, dissolve the international consensus on how to deal with the regime's illicit smuggling and counterfeiting activities, and change politics in South Korea and the U.S. And perhaps most importantly, if Kim Jong Il plays his cards right, he will prove to his inner circle that he is the genius he claims to be, renewing his hold on power at a time when he was facing his most severe challenges. * * *

Kim Jong Il is not in charge of what strategists call a "status-quo state"; he does not take comfort in the way things are. Rather he wants an Asia where the U.S. does not guarantee regional security; where Japan is brought to retribution for its historic transgressions; and where North and South Korea are united under a genuinely Korean leader. And he feels that his personal entitlement to rule the peninsula has been denied by American forces. Unfortunately from his perspective, his efforts to do so have been thwarted by an American administration he loathes. The Bush administration has refused to negotiate with him directly, convincing even his Chinese ally to chair a series of feckless meetings that allow five neighbors to complain about North Korea's violations of its international nuclear commitments.

The North Koreans have begrudgingly attended these sessions when the Chinese paid them enough to make it worthwhile, or when the U.S. seemed genuinely inclined to take military action to halt violations of international controls. But these sessions have been used by the Americans to expand international understanding of the regime's criminal activities and human-rights abuses. Efforts to win financial aid from Japan have backfired in political turmoil over North Korea's abductions of Japanese citizens. Last September, the U.S. took action against banks in Macau that had facilitated Pyongyang's overseas activities, and now the international banking community is hesitant to engage with North Koreans.

The regime feels the pinch. Meanwhile, Pyongyang's inner circles are learning more about the outside world from cell phones and contraband radios; they are beginning to know what they do not have. These difficulties could not come at a worse time, because Kim Jong Il has decided his Western-educated first-born is not fit to replace him, and he keeps everyone guessing whether he's serious that a second son -- seemingly the only soft-hearted member of the clan -- should be his successor. It's enough to make a hungry bureaucrat in Pyongyang quietly doubt whether Kim Jong Il really has the necessary competence.

But Kim Jong Il, in his own mind and propaganda, has both myth and magic. Although he was born in a military camp in Russia, North Korean schoolchildren visit the humble cabin on the side of a mountain considered sacred to all Koreans, where the "Man from Mt. Paektu" destined to unite Korea was officially born. Kim Jong Il is what psychiatrists call a "malignant narcissist," and this means he occasionally has to break out dramatically from the bounds that constrain his egotism, especially when it seems he is on the verge of failure. We are seeing some of this psychology at work now.

The test-firing of a Taepodong over Japanese airspace in 1998 suggests what lies ahead. At the time, the incident revealed how fast North Korea had developed delivery systems for weapons of mass destruction, with three stages to their rocket and a booster capability. This new intercontinental capability put Pyongyang in the global fight-ring as a major contender. The missile could have landed in Japan, causing untold consequences, or killed fishermen when it splashed down in the Pacific, where North Korea did not even issue the routine mariners' warning.

Instead, Japan began to doubt the U.S. security umbrella and invested in independent military and intelligence capabilities. It also decided to risk irritating China by joining in American missile-defense programs. South Korea became fearful of American "overreaction" to North Korean adventures and adopted a more generous and conciliatory approach to Pyongyang. And China began to view North Korea as a more significant regional player that needed to be dealt with, primarily through financial diplomacy. North Korea's interests were advanced, and Kim Jong Il began a series of pogroms and executions to consolidate his control.

In the current phase of the new crisis North Korea has generated, the world has naturally condemned as "provocative" North Korean preparations for a missile launch. And that is just what North Korea wants. Indeed, North Korea's actions are provocative, because they are meant to be. Resolving the tensions he has created can now proceed on terms set by Kim Jong Il himself.

Analysts have, for example, suggested that the possible missile launch calls into question an upcoming trip by former South Korean President Kim Dae Jung to celebrate the anniversary of the historic June 2000 Pyongyang summit. Perhaps. But more likely it affords an opportunity for a dramatic act of legerdemain. What if South Korea's architect of the "sunshine" policy is able to persuade Kim Jong Il to give up, or at least postpone, his provocative launch? What if advocates of a softer line get the reclusive leader to consider a late summer visit to South Korea? Kim Jong Il can always change his mind; but in the meantime that could reverse the political tide in South Korea, where recently soft-liners were overwhelmingly turned out of office by voters in a conservative backlash against the expensive failures of the sunshine policy. It might be just what the government of Roh Moo Hyun, South Korea's embattled president, needs to raise his party's miserable rankings among the electorate.

And if a new spirit of cooperation and problem-solving between Pyongyang and Seoul emerges in the months ahead, North Korea can find opportunities to threaten the U.S. and, at the same time, set Seoul and Washington against each other.

South Korea is naturally more concerned about North Korea's immediate threat to its economy and security than it is to less tangible matters such as international controls on nuclear materials, proliferation and long-range delivery systems. Seoul has lived under the threat of attack for 60 years; a new Taepodong capable of littering Alaska is not necessarily cause for a heightened level of tension on the peninsula. In spite of South Korea's professed support for international standards on errant countries like Iran, Kim Jong Il understands that few South Koreans want to risk hostility over the very same issues closer to home. When Seoul responds to every provocation by calling for a diplomatic resolution, Pyongyang understands the coercive benefits of its threatening weapons. Their threat ensures that our South Korean ally resists most strongly any U.S. action against the regime's adventures.

Moreover, the political consequences of North Korea's break-out extend beyond South Korea. There are upcoming Japanese -- and American -- elections in which Kim Jong Il has also made himself an influence. Already there are candidates in both countries who are saying that North Korea has a sovereign right to test missiles, echoing Pyongyang's position, but urging that rewards be given to the regime for good behavior if it decides not to proceed.

That's a good day's work for a narcissistic dictator on the brink of collapse.

Mr. Downs, a former Pentagon official and congressional adviser, is the author of "Over the Line: North Korea's Negotiating Strategy" (AEI Press, 1999).

Tested By North Korea (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

KIM JONG IL, NORTH KOREA'S dangerously eccentric leader, may succeed where President Bush has not. By stubbornly insisting on its right to test a long-range ballistic missile, North Korea is reinforcing the importance of a unified approach to the crisis on the Korean peninsula.

Images from U.S. intelligence satellites show the North may be preparing to launch a missile with a range of about 9,000 miles, which would be capable of reaching Los Angeles. There is some debate about how ready the missile is, but there is reason to worry. Pyongyang pulled a similar stunt in 1998, sending a missile over Japan and into the Pacific, and a North Korean foreign ministry official said Tuesday that Pyongyang was not bound by a moratorium on testing it signed afterward. There are reports that the U.S. may have activated its missile-defense system.

North Korea's erratic leader, coupled with its nuclear ambitions, have long caused international concern. For the last several years the U.S., China, Japan, Russia and South Korea have participated in intermittent talks with Pyongyang. The basic outlines of a deal are clear: In exchange for food and energy aid, as well as guarantees of its security, the North will give up its nuclear weapons program.

But the rest is a muddle, and not just because Kim and Bush don't get along. North Korea is an unreliable negotiator (in the space of 24 hours last September, North Korea essentially agreed to end its weapons program, then took it back). The Bush administration, meanwhile, has been at times intransigent and bellicose (Bush famously said he "loathes" Kim), and its efforts to convince its allies of North Korea's wickedness have mostly fallen on deaf ears.

So China, given its long border and economic ties to North Korea, has been the primary driver of the discussion, but its view of the North's aims is not as apocalyptic as the Bush administration's. Japan and Russia have typically been reliable supporters of the U.S. position. And South Korea, which views the North as a kind of wayward cousin, has generally been more willing to engage Pyongyang, often to the chagrin of the United States.

One result of these divergent motivations is that talks have been dormant for months. Tuesday's events will not revive them, but they should serve as a bracing reminder of their importance. The five nations have been nearly unanimous in their condemnation of North Korea's plans, while nations such as Australia and France — and U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan — also have expressed concern.

Diplomatic condemnations are easy, of course, and North Korea's plans are worthy of them. But if there is anything good to come of Kim's latest adventure, it will be a renewed sense of urgency among the U.S. and its allies to focus on the peninsula.

Bolton May Turn Into A Pumpkin (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

Rumblings are that the White House is looking for ways to keep controversial U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton in his post well beyond the expiration of his recess appointment at the end of this year.

One possibility is to bring his nomination up for vote in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee next month. Bolton supporters on the Hill first want to pass the defense appropriations bill before they leave for the August recess and say they did everything needed for the troops -- body armor, equipment and such -- before they turned to the nomination. Senate Republicans don't want wait until the fall and risk a potential loss right before the midterm elections.

The White House is said to have sounded out Hill folks, including Sen. George V. Voinovich (Ohio), a key Republican who opposed Bolton last year when the Foreign Relations Committee sent the nomination to the floor without a recommendation.

And how does Voinovich feel now? "The jury remains out, but the senator will continue to monitor the progress made toward critical reform at the U.N.," a spokesman said.

On the other hand, sources on both sides of the aisle say even if Voinovich supports Bolton, it appears most unlikely the nominee would get the 60 votes needed to overcome a Democratic filibuster.

Bolton's recent dust-up with U.N. Deputy Secretary General Mark Malloch Brown , who had criticized the United States for lack of support for the organization, may not have helped the equation. The fight rallied the Senate's conservative base, one source said, but it may have alienated moderates because Malloch Brown is a Brit and a de facto member of the coalition of the willing. Now, if he had been French . . .

The White House can re-recess-appoint Bolton. But federal law would bar him from being paid. He could work for free, though. And some Bolton supporters are taking a hard look to see if there's wiggle room in the federal law, we hear, along with other alternatives. Seems difficult, some observers say, but don't sell the pro-Bolton forces short.

Hey! What if he got a book contract and an advance to write his memoirs, the way some well-known senators do?

Fox and the News Hounds

Seems a lot of news outlets have taken great pride at being the first to interview White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten , who finally did a round of sit-downs with reporters last week.

Here's how some noted this fine scoop:

"Mr. Bolten, in his first interview since taking the job, professed . . ."

-- New York Times, June 19

"In his first interview since becoming White House chief of staff in March, Josh Bolten said . . ."

-- Wall Street Journal, June 17

"We'll talk with the man the president has asked to help save his second term, new White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten, in his first interview . . ."

-- Fox News Sunday, April 30

DOJ_NMG_0036451

Let's see . . . April, May, then June.

Never Having to Say Sorry

Here's what White House press secretary Tony Snow actually meant to say when he was asked Monday about the anticipated resignation of Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick .

"The president told me he was sorry to lose such a talented and dedicated adviser. Bob was, as you all know, a top official in the Bush 41 administration, at Treasury, State and finally as White House deputy chief of staff.

"Bob was an integral part of the 35-day Florida recount battle, which is what ensured President Bush 's victory. He agreed to serve in the first-term Cabinet as our U.S. trade representative and then continued to serve in a non-Cabinet post as deputy secretary of state, where he was the point man in developing our policies in Darfur and China.

"The president told me: 'I will greatly miss his insights and ability to wax eloquently on any subject. Laura and I wish him all the best in his new job in New York.' "

But this is what Snow actually said when a reporter asked if he had any comment on Zoellick's departure.

"No," said Snow. "He's been wanting to pursue options in the private sector for some time, and now he's going to do it."

Much later, near the end of the gaggle, a reporter tried again.

"On Zoellick, is the president sorry to see him go?"

"I'm sure he is," Snow said. "Look, Bob Zoellick is a guy who served -- he's highly competent, served a number of presidents, but you also know that at a certain juncture in the administration some people have worked very hard for a long time and are going to go back and pursue other opportunities."

Yikes! Talk about not letting the door hit you on the way out.

Bush Gives Frist the Nod -- for Reelection

Bush, speaking to Republicans at the gala President's Dinner on Monday night, encouraged the crowd to support GOP candidates this fall. "If you want your taxes low, keep Denny Hastert and Bill Frist as leaders of the House and the Senate."

Bush later said: "I want to thank you for helping make sure that Denny Hastert and Bill Frist remain in their positions in the Senate and the House. . . ."

Of course, Frist is leaving the Senate in six months.

Iran's Gray Area On Nuclear Arms (WP)

By Karl Vick

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

TEHRAN -- Iranian officials often assert the peaceful intent of their nuclear program by insisting that the religious law that governs their country expressly prohibits weapons of mass destruction.

A Turkish diplomat, describing a visit in May by the chief Iranian nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said that Larijani made the religious roots of the proscription clear. "I was in the meeting," said the diplomat, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "He said there is even a fatwa , a religious ruling, since the time of Khomeini, that Iran will not produce any nuclear weapons."

Yet interviews with a range of clerics and other students of Islamic teachings indicate that while Grand Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini indeed barred Iranian forces from unconventional weapons during the 1980-88 war with Iraq, the religious underpinning for such a ban is regarded as less than absolute, with ample justification available in scriptures for almost any course except first use.

"This question is ambiguous," said Grand Ayatollah Jalalodine Taheri, who was a leading figure in the Iranian government before becoming a sharp critic. Taheri, 80, said during an interview at his bedside in the central Iranian city of Isfahan that "taking weapons of mass destruction as a whole, I'm against it." But he added that religious texts might offer avenues that would allow stockpiling such weapons in the name of deterrence or self-defense.

"It's not clear," Taheri said.

Those arguing for the loopholes include clerics closely identified with the country's most hard-line conservatives, the most ardent defenders of Iran's theocratic system.

"Producing and using WMD is forbidden, just as producing deadly poison or harmful drugs," said Mohsen Gharavian, who teaches Islamic philosophy in the holy city of Qom, south of Tehran. "I think there is no ambiguity here. . . . I have not seen any other type of interpretation" among religious scholars.

"But," he continued, "I have got to add something to this: If any other nation has produced this WMD and has used it against a second nation, the second nation in the name of defending itself has the right to have it and to use WMD."

Gharavian serves as spokesman for Ayatollah Mohammad Taqi Mesbah-Yazdi, an archconservative who strongly supports President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and is suspected of providing religious justification for killings allegedly carried out by Iranian intelligence agents in the late 1990s. Gharavian spoke in an hour-long interview at the Imam Khomeini Institute, which has produced tens of thousands of clerics under Mesbah-Yazdi's tutelage. A number are expected to seek election this fall to the Assembly of Experts, the one body in Iran's theocratic system with the power to remove the supreme leader, the cleric who has ultimate authority.

"About nuclear weapons, there is this principle of all or none," Gharavian said. "If a nation arms itself with such weapons, it is quite logical for other nations to think of defending themselves against these kinds of weapons.

"I believe this is the logic of Islamic morals," Gharavian said, professing himself "100 percent sure" that Khomeini and Iran's current supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, "based on Islamic principles, have the same logic: Islam does not allow anyone to initiate harming a human being."

The same bedrock view and the same caveat about self-defense were offered by an influential cleric aligned with Iran's reformers, members of the relatively liberal movement recently sidelined by hard-line conservatives.

"In the time of the prophet, we didn't have nuclear bombs, so there's not a verse about it in the Koran," said Mohsen Kadivar, who like Gharavian is a middle-ranking cleric. "But we have some verses which say we can't kill anyone who hasn't committed a crime. It's very, very clear."

The faith does accept the concept of retaliation, however, so long as it stops short of injuring innocents. Kadivar said that proviso appears to proscribe actual use of weapons of mass destruction, as would scriptures warning against damaging the environment.

But none of that necessarily bars a government from stockpiling such weapons, the clerics say.

"From all I can see, it's not forbidden, but it's hard to say it's allowed. In jurisprudence these terms are different," Kadivar said. "If your enemies have these bombs, it's not forbidden to have them.

"Don't forget that Israel has these bombs," he added, raising a finger. "It's outside the Non-Proliferation Treaty."

Iranian scholars who argue against nuclear weapons point out that these questions are hardly abstract in Iran. The newly minted government faced severe, real-life tests after Saddam Hussein's troops invaded Iran in 1980. The Iraqi forces used chemical weapons on the battlefield; two decades later, badly wounded survivors still populate hospital wards in Iran.

When Iraq also launched rocket attacks on Tehran and other metropolitan areas, pressure for Tehran to retaliate was intense.

"In the eight-year war with Iraq, this was a very hot debate among all the Islamic teachers, because Iranian cities were being bombarded," said Kazem Mosavi Bojnoordi, who sat on the defense committee of Iran's parliament during part of the war. "The conclusion was that it's not allowed. Never during those eight years do we have one example of Iran bombarding cities."

Bojnoordi, now chief editor of Iran's Center for the Great Islamic Encyclopedia, recalled that after the first salvos from Iraq, a senior Iranian commander declared, "Now we will flatten Baghdad." The comment brought an immediate rebuke from Khomeini, whose fatwa closed the matter for the balance of the war.

"According to Islamic teachings, there's the principle that the goals never justify the means," said Bojnoordi, whose father was a grand ayatollah. "It has not been supported in Islam that you can do whatever you want to defend yourself. You are not allowed to gather weapons that are not allowed by Islam, even against your enemies."

DOJ_NMG_0036453

Senior Iranian officials insist their goal is only electrical power, saving their substantial petroleum deposits to export. Leaders also emphasize the role of pride and technological achievement, which inside Iran conveys the impression of economic development that has largely eluded a population that has grown poorer since the 1979 revolution.

"I believe that by getting high tech we will be getting development," Bojnoordi said. "If we improve the standard of living, that will unite the people, and that will bring security."

Said Kadivar: "I hope that science in my country is so progressive! I hope it's true. Every Iranian wants to have this energy. Every party. The difficulty is we don't have a democratic regime. So we should try to democratize."

If Iran is indeed working to produce nuclear weapons, experts say the program would surely be entrusted to the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps. Formed in 1979 by clerics who did not trust Iran's existing army, the Revolutionary Guards have grown into a major force in Iran's economy and political offices. Their insignia, one analyst noted, includes a passage from the Koran that reads, "Prepare any strength you can muster against them, and any cavalry with which you can overawe God's enemy and your own enemy as well, plus others besides them whom you do not know."

Compromise Eases Clash Over Hill Prerogatives (RC)

By Dan Rasmussen

Roll Call, June 21, 2006

The Bush administration has reached a compromise with Congressional leaders on one of the most prickly aspects of the pending U.S.-India nuclear deal, a provision that had rankled key Congressional Republicans and Democrats who worried about its potential to curb Congressional powers.

While much of the public debate over the U.S.-India nuclear deal has revolved around nonproliferation and global security issues, the biggest hang-up for many in Congress was the administration's initial insistence that India be treated as a country in compliance with the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978, which it is not.

Considering India to be in compliance meant that the pact would have gone into force unless Congress passed a joint resolution of disapproval within 90 days. Effectively, that meant that both chambers would have needed veto-proof two-thirds majorities to stop its implementation.

By contrast, such deals with noncomplying states would not have gone into effect unless Congress passed a joint resolution of approval — a process that gives Congress significantly more sway over such foreign agreements.

Frustration over the president's initial proposal surfaced in a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing in April, when Members of both parties sharply questioned Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice about Congressional oversight issues.

However, it emerged this week that a clash between the executive and legislative branches has been averted. The Bush administration has reached a tentative agreement to only ask Congress to expedite the final approval of the bill by taking an up-or-down vote free of amendments. A public announcement of the procedural agreement is expected from the Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Nick Burns later this week.

With markups now tentatively scheduled for next week, analysts say they expect Congress, having forced the administration to back off on its procedural demands, will likely leave the substance of the deal largely intact.

This compromise has appeased some in Congress who feared that they would be giving up too much of their input into the final decision, and it signals that Congress — which has already vigorously asserted itself on the substance of the deal — will continue to play an important role in the ongoing negotiations.

Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Dick Lugar (R-Ind.) endorsed the pact on Friday, after intensively scrutinizing the deal. House International Relations Chairman Henry Hyde (R-Ill.) also backs the bill.

A senior Democratic aide on the Foreign Relations Committee said that the skirmish over the approval procedure could be among the first signs that Congress is ending its five-year pattern of being largely tolerant of the administration's bold moves to act unilaterally, without intensive Congressional oversight.

"The administration has really overreached very badly if its forcing Congress to actually do its job," he said, speaking to the frustration provoked by the president's initial proposal. "The administration tossed this thing over and said, 'Look, Congress, why don't you just vote yourselves out of office?'"

DOJ_NMG_0036454

"From the beginning, the president went to great lengths to keep Congress out of it," added a senior Republican staff member on the House International Relations Committee. "The strategy has backfired. We will reassert our traditional role on these types of agreements."

Congress' recoiling at the initial Bush procedural demand comes as a sharp rebuke to an administration that analysts say was hoping to maximize its leeway in negotiating the final agreement.

Under the terms of the deal, the United States could ship nuclear technology and fuel to India, and in exchange, India would submit its 14 civilian nuclear reactors — though not its eight military facilities — to international inspections and safeguards.

Because India does not meet all the requirements for nuclear trade under the 1978 Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act, any nuclear deal would require Congress to both lay the legal groundwork for the deal under section 123 of the Atomic Energy Act and pass a joint resolution of approval on the final pact.

Bush's language essentially asked Congress to treat India as though it met all of the 1978 act's requirements. In effect, Bush was asking Congress to approve the deal before it had seen the final terms of the two major agreements — one between India and the U.S., and the other between India and the International Atomic Energy Agency.

But now that language has been withdrawn.

The apparent accord came after the House International Relations Committee and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee between them held eight hearings on the issue and requested thousands of pages of documents from the State Department. Lugar alone submitted 82 questions to the department.

In perhaps the most heated exchange of the April committee hearing, Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.) demanded of Rice: "Now, under your proposed legislation, is Congressional action part of the arrangement?" Unsatisfied with Rice's answer, he pressed forward.

"So your solution to that problem is to move Congress out of the decision-making process," he offered. "No, Senator," she replied, before Sarbanes interrupted her. "I mean, except for the one decision right at the outset," he said.

Sens. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) and Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) also expressed their concern over this aspect of the deal. "From us in the Congress, it seems to me we're abdicating a lot of power in these amendments," Chafee said at the hearing.

Rice denied that the bill would strip Congress of prerogative on oversight matters.

"The Congress, of course, has up front — and that's why we're coming to you now — the ability to assess the deal, to look at its upsides and downsides and then to affirm in a vote, yes or no," she said. "We have offered to brief the Congress on where we are in the negotiation of this bilateral deal, which is a technical deal to try and implement the civil nuclear cooperation agreement. So we believe that there is a lot of congressional oversight."

The administration's retreat on the procedural provision suggests that such oversight is not going away. Some senior staff members cast the president's original proposal as an executive power play meant to gut Congressional oversight. They contend that the move has backfired and stirred Congressional leaders to ramp up oversight of the negotiations.

The Senate aide cast the president's proposal as part of a continuing effort to increase executive power at the expense of the legislative branch — a strategy that has worked in the past.

"Instead of just trying to get the deal through, the administration is trying to expand executive prerogative even more," he said. Bush is "really playing hardball on this without looking for something that would actually generate Congressional support."

One business lobbyist said that he still fears that the India deal could go the way of this year's deal for a Dubai-based company to run several U.S. ports — that is, turn into a political firestorm and require a major rewriting before enactment.

"Congress is saying, 'We want to take a look at all the underlying agreements.' They've had eight sets of hearings. All the answers to their questions have required thousands of pages from the State Department," he said. "They're trying to regain prerogative, and I don't think anybody can tell you where the ball is going to roll from here."

Strike In Gaza Kills 3 Children (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036455

JERUSALEM, June 20 -- An Israeli airstrike in the Gaza Strip on Tuesday killed at least three Palestinian children and wounded 14 people, many of them children as well, according to witnesses and Palestinian health officials.

Israeli military officials said the target of the strike, which occurred around 7:30 p.m., was a car carrying gunmen from the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, the armed wing of the Fatah party. Military officials said the men were planning to carry out an unspecified attack, perhaps preparing to fire missiles into southern Israel.

But Palestinian witnesses said the men escaped from the Volkswagen Golf station wagon before the missile struck the car, which was passing through a busy commercial district of Gaza City. The scene turned quickly into an angry rally with demonstrators denouncing the attack and vowing to take revenge on Israel.

Shrapnel from the blast sprayed into a group of bystanders, Palestinian witnesses said. Hospital officials in Gaza said three children -- Mohammed Roqa, 5; Samia al-Shariff, 5; and Belal al-Hessi, 15 -- suffered fatal wounds in the attack.

"If there were civilian casualties as a result of this, the IDF does regret it, as it always does," said a spokesperson for Israel's army, the Israeli Defense Forces. "But the fact is the terrorist organizations operate within these civilian areas, and the Hamas government has done nothing to stop them."

Hours earlier, the Palestinian leader, Mahmoud Abbas, called on the various armed groups at war with Israel to stop the rocket fire that has frightened and infuriated Israeli communities on the periphery of the Gaza Strip. Among the groups is the military wing of Hamas, the radical Islamic movement now running the Palestinian ministries, although two smaller factions are chiefly responsible for the missile fire.

At least three missiles landed in southern Israel on Tuesday before Abbas made his appeal, although there were no reports of injuries. The missiles are highly inaccurate and have not killed any Israelis since Israel evacuated its settlements in Gaza last year. But the attacks have surged recently, and one Israeli man was gravely injured this month.

The southern city of Sderot, the target of many of the missiles, closed schools, streets and the municipal government Tuesday to protest what residents say is the Israeli government's weak response to the rocket fire. The Israeli military has been using intensive artillery fire and airstrikes to little avail.

The airstrike Tuesday came a week after an Israeli missile attack on a minibus in Gaza City killed at least 10 Palestinians, including eight civilians. The minibus was carrying at least one rocket. Also this month, an explosion on a beach in northern Gaza killed eight Palestinian civilians. Palestinian officials and a human-rights group have said an Israeli artillery shell may have caused the blast. Israel has denied involvement.

Israeli Attack Kills 3 Gaza Children (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

JERUSALEM, June 20 — An Israeli aircraft fired Tuesday on a car that officials suspected was carrying armed Palestinian militants in Gaza and killed three children nearby, a 7-year-old girl and two boys, ages 5 and 16, hospital officials and witnesses said.

The airstrike was the third this month to kill civilians, infuriating Palestinians and raising an impassioned debate in Israel about its military response to the firing of homemade rockets from Gaza into Israel.

On June 9, eight civilians — seven from one family — were killed on a beach in Gaza during an Israeli bombardment against militants suspected of launching the rockets, called Qassams. The Israeli military later denied that its munitions caused the deaths, a contention disputed by Palestinians and human rights officials. Four days later, another strike in Gaza killed at least two militants and another eight civilians.

Tuesday's attack, according to an Israeli military official, was aimed at a group affiliated with the Fatah organization of President Mahmoud Abbas that had fired a rocket earlier in the day and was on its way to carry out another attack.

A military spokesman said the missile hit the car, but apparently the militants escaped.

"We are dealing with a cell that was very active in these attacks," said the spokesman, Capt. Jacob Dallal. "While we regret the loss of civilian life, the overall responsibility lies with the Palestinian Authority."

Since the beginning of the month, more than 140 Qassams have been fired from Gaza, seriously injuring one person.

DOJ_NMG_0036456

The issue of the rockets and the military response has strained the government.

Residents of Sderot, the Israeli town hardest hit by the rockets, have complained that the government is not doing enough to protect them. Israeli military officials have spoken of stepping up operations in Gaza.

Many other Israelis have said the Qassams do not represent a serious enough threat for so strong a military response, which has included some 6,000 artillery shells in recent months. "Qassams, Shmassams! So what?" the dovish former prime minister Shimon Peres was quoted as saying in the Israeli press.

Red Cross-Red Crescent Deal Threatened (WT)

By Katie Stuhldreher

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

Last-minute maneuvers may have jeopardized a deal for Israel and the Palestinian territories to enter the International Red Cross and Red Crescent Movement after decades of ostracism, according to officials at a conference in Geneva.

The International Conference of the Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies, at a two-day meeting that began yesterday, had been expected to formally endorse the use of a new religiously neutral emblem facilitating the move.

Israel's national emergency medical service, Magen David Adom (MDA), has never been willing to use either the cross or crescent -- symbolic of Christianity and Islam respectively -- while the movement has been unwilling to allow the use of the Star of David.

Adoption of the new symbol, a diamond-shaped "red crystal," would end the more than 50-year stalemate. But the deal was thrown into doubt when Pakistan and Tunisia unexpectedly introduced a politically charged amendment to the resolution yesterday.

The action set off alarms in the U.S. government, a long-time supporter of MDA Red Cross membership.

A group called American Friends of MDA abruptly called off a celebratory press conference in Washington, saying the State Department had urged Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, to call off her plans to participate.

"They thought any public comments might negatively affect the vote," said Daniel Allen, executive vice president of American Friends for MDA.

State Department deputy spokesman Adam Ereli said at yesterday's briefing that he knew nothing about such a request, and Mrs. Clinton's office failed to respond to repeated phone calls. However, Mr. Ereli said the United States has worked "relentlessly" to help integrate Israel into the international human rights community.

The American Red Cross withheld $42 million in overhead dues over a six-year period to protest MDA's exclusion from the group, according to the American Red Cross.

Agence France-Presse, reporting from Geneva, said the amendment proposed by Pakistan and Tunisia would say the movement's rules applied in "all Arab Territories occupied since 1967, namely the Palestinian Territory including East Jerusalem, the Syrian Golan and the Lebanese Shebaa Farms."

Israel said the suggested rewording, which effectually condemned Israel's occupation of territories, was unacceptable, according to Agence France-Presse.

"This political opposition isn't helping anyone. MDA has a lot to offer the community, with our experience in dealing with mass casualty issues and disasters," Mr. Allen said.

"We don't understand what the problem is with allowing a humanitarian organization to join the family of nations here," he said.

The adoption of the red crystal symbol was approved in principle at a meeting of Red Cross Movement member governments in December, despite strong Syrian opposition, by a vote of 98-27 with 10 abstentions. Two-thirds of the governments meeting today in Geneva must approve for the protocol to become official.

In November 2005, MDA signed a memorandum of understanding with the Palestine Red Crescent, which has been unable to become a member because of the Palestinians' lack of recognized statehood. The memorandum stated that the two organizations would seek joint entry, according to the Red Cross.

DOJ_NMG_0036457

Mr. Allen said that if MDA's entry to the organization was blocked, it might jeopardize the Palestine Red Crescent's chances as well.

Ian Piper of the International Committee of the Red Cross told the Associated Press that he hoped joint entry would result in an acceptable situation for all parties.

"For us, it's a great advantage that they both be recognized simultaneously, that they are both equal, that they both play by the same rules and are accountable to the same group of peers," he said.

Devorah Goldburg of the American Red Cross said, "We still remain hopeful that a consensus can be reached. We just want to remind everyone that this isn't a political organization and the focus should be on humanitarian concerns."

A Campus For 'Scholars, Not Fighters' On A Settlement Site (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

GAZA, June 16 — A Palestinian college is growing from the rubble of an uprooted Israeli settlement.

Nearly a year ago, the Israelis pulled all their 9,000 settlers and military forces out of the Gaza Strip and then took bulldozers and backhoes to what used to be homes, schools, shops and clinics, leaving a few gutted synagogues, a few hundred greenhouses and tons of rubble.

Throughout most of the former settlements, Palestinians have thoroughly mined the debris for metal, wiring, fixtures and almost anything usable or sellable. But despite promises at the time, not an ounce of rubble has been removed or reprocessed, leaving a post-apocalyptic landscape baking in the unforgiving sun.

Except at the site of Neve Dekalim. On nearly 41 acres surrounding what used to be the largest school in what used to be called the Gush Katif bloc, the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, decreed a campus. He granted it to Al Aksa University, affiliated with his Fatah party, which lost elections this year to Hamas.

With seed money of $1.5 million from the sheik of Sharjah, one of the United Arab Emirates, the university hired its own security guards, built its own wall and started clearing and rebuilding.

The first students appeared in March, as construction went on around them, and now some 2,000 men drawn from cramped branches of the overcrowded university all over southern Gaza are taking their exams here. A new classroom building is going up to house 4,000 women, who are taught separately in this conservative society.

Mahmoud al-Shami, the deputy dean of student affairs, said he hoped that the women could be part of the campus by September for at least two days a week as building continued.

Mr. Shami showed off his office, with its satellite Internet connections, new desk, fixtures and fittings. "Now we're focusing on creating scholars, not fighters," he said.

Hosam Abu Zeit, 22, was between exams in the social sciences. "Before, we would be shot if we entered this place," he said of the once heavily guarded settlement. "Now, in less than a year, we've succeeded in studying here. It gives me a sense of pride to be studying in a liberated place."

Previously, he studied in the nearby Khan Yunis refugee camp, less than a mile and a world away across the 15-yard-high cement wall that the Israelis built between the camp and Neve Dekalim.

Al Aksa's campus in Khan Yunis, said Tamim Dheir, the assistant to the president in charge of renovation, was 1.7 acres, about 4 percent of the area of this campus. Classrooms were so scarce that students studied only three days a week, with men alternating days with women.

"We were on top of one another there," Mr. Zeit said, and then, almost giddy, swung his arm in an arc, to indicate a new sense of space. On the walls are a few posters of dead militants considered to be martyrs, like Muhammad Abdel Hadi of the Abu Rish Brigades, but students pass by them this day without a glance.

His friend Wael Balaawi, 21, ran a hand through his gelled hair. "After 38 years of occupation!" he said excitedly.

"We couldn't even come here for a picnic or go to the beach, and we were cramped into the refugee camps, and the settlers had these huge places," he said with some wonder. "Now we can go where we want in a land that's ours."

DOJ_NMG_0036458

In Gaza the Israelis largely built on empty sand dunes, displacing few Palestinians. But the network of walls, checkpoints, military sites and Israeli-only roads made it extremely difficult for Palestinians to travel freely. Now a trip from Gaza City to Rafah, which was often impossible, can be made in less than an hour.

Mr. Dheir, in his own freshly painted office, serving tea in new china cups, took out an architect's rendering of what the campus might look like in the future and displayed it proudly. Some of the nicest features were in red.

"It's only a plan," he finally said. "The red means it's part of the 10-year plan." But the intention is to bring the colleges of education, art and science here in their entirety within the next two years.

He added: "This is one of the symbols of freedom after the humiliation imposed on the Palestinians. It's a national project." But as a state university normally financed by the Palestinian Authority, now led by Hamas, the employees here, like Mr. Dheir, have also not received their salaries for the last four months.

"It's very difficult," he said with a sigh. "The whole situation is difficult. It's a big preoccupation for everyone. No one's paying their bills, and everyone is calling for unity and fearing civil war."

When Hamas supporters in Gaza's Islamic University clashed with Fatah supporters in Al Azhar University, there were some fistfights here, but they were quelled. "It nearly touched us, too, but we managed to stop it," Mr. Dheir said. "We said that this is a presidential place and we must have unity."

Still, Fatah flags fly next to the Palestinian one, and Palestinians still call the area by its former Israeli name, Neve Dekalim.

Walking around the campus, Mr. Dheir explained that there had been much salvaging and looting after the Israelis left, when even many of the trees were cut down. But Mr. Abbas soon ordered Fatah security guards to patrol the area and to stop the seizing of land that had taken place in a number of other former settlements, where some clans, militant groups and business interests had taken over what was supposed to be Palestinian Authority land devoted to the interests of Gazans as a whole.

"After we put up the wall, things became easier," said the registrar, Ahmed al-Mabhouh.

The old Neve Dekalim supermarket is being turned into a two-story cafeteria for students and teachers, and a row of shops nearby, one of which used to offer a serviceable espresso, has been remodeled into one large hall for the registrar. But the campus excludes the former synagogues, mostly gutted and firecharred, which remain on the horizon.

A group of students wandered on the repaved walkways, chatting excitedly after finishing a linguistics exam. Almutaz Abu Sittah, 19, tall and handsome, was proud of the campus but dour about the future.

"There's little optimism," he said. "The world is besieging us. And there's no real government, and no real state to govern."

Does he feel freer? "We've grown up," he said, "with vengeance in our hearts."

Armed Clash With Georgia Feared (WT)

By Michael Mainville

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

MOSCOW -- Growing diplomatic tensions, a Russian trade embargo and a massive boost in Georgian arms spending are raising fears of conflict in the volatile Caucasus region along Russia's southern border.

Analysts say a meeting last week between Russian President Vladimir Putin and Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili failed to defuse the tension and that Russia's open support for the leaders of Georgia's separatist regions of South Ossetia and Abkhazia is pushing the limits of Georgian patience.

The tension is expected to be discussed when Mr. Putin hosts heads of state from the Group of Eight club of wealthy nations in St. Petersburg next month. It also will be discussed in Washington July 5 when Mr. Saakashvili meets with President Bush, who has accused the Kremlin of bullying pro-Western states in the former Soviet Union.

Pavel Felgenhauer, an independent, Moscow-based defense analyst, said Russia and Georgia appear to be laying the groundwork for an armed conflict. "What we've been seeing is an exchange of prewar statements," he said. "We could see military action in the coming weeks and months."

Georgian political analyst Alexander Rondeli agreed by telephone from Tbilisi that Russia-Georgia relations "have become truly bad. ... Russia is treating Georgia as a second- or third-class country through its support of separatist regions."

Mr. Saakashvili has made reunification with Abkhazia and South Ossetia -- which broke away from Tbilisi in the 1990s -- a key goal of his presidency. But Moscow has supported the separatists by installing Russian peacekeeping forces in the region, giving many residents Russian passports and supplementing the regions' budgets.

Georgia tried earlier this month to prevent a fresh rotation of 500 soldiers from entering South Ossetia, saying they were required to have entry visas. But Russia's Foreign Ministry dismissed the demand, saying Georgia had no control over South Ossetia and stressing the region's right to self-determination.

Buoyed by Montenegro's recent independence from Serbia, separatist leaders have stepped up efforts to break away from Georgia. At a meeting last week in the Abkhazian capital Sukhumi, the presidents of Abkhazia, South Ossetia and Moldova's separatist region of Trans-Dniester announced plans to establish a joint security force to defend their independence movements.

Russian officials, meanwhile, accuse Georgia of preparing to retake South Ossetia by force. Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov told reporters on June 13 that a significant increase in Georgian military spending last year caused "unquestionable concern."

In its annual report on global arms buying, released June 12, the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute said Georgian defense spending surged more than 140 percent to $146 million in 2005 -- the biggest increase worldwide last year.

Adding to the tension, Georgian officials on Saturday accused a Russian citizen of plotting to kill an opposition leader in order to discredit Mr. Saakashvili's government. Officials did not blame Russia directly, but accused "foreign secret services" of organizing an attempt on the life of opposition leader Koba Davitashvili.

They said the purported assassin had traveled to Tbilisi through Russian-controlled territory and had fled to Russia when Georgian police uncovered the plot.

Relations between the two countries began deteriorating after Mr. Saakashvili rose to power in Georgia's Rose Revolution, promising to boost relations with the West and to push for Georgian membership in NATO and the European Union.

In a move that critics say was designed to punish Georgia for these aspirations, Russia earlier this year imposed a ban on the country's largest imports, wine and mineral water, citing public health concerns.

Mr. Felgenhauer said Russia's goal is to undermine Mr. Saakashvili's popularity and eventually install a pro-Kremlin leader in Tbilisi.

"They're hoping that if they can destabilize the country it will lead to internal strife and the collapse of the Saakashvili regime," he said.

Amid Competition, India Cools To Expansion By Chinese Firms (WSJ)

By Peter Wonacott

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

BANGALORE, India -- Some of the world's best-known technology companies are investing billions of dollars to build modern campuses in this traffic-choked city. China's Huawei Technologies Co. wanted to join the rush.

Instead, the Chinese telecommunications-equipment maker is stalled in efforts to spend $164 million on new facilities here and has been forced to stuff 750 staffers into a hotel annex with a worn carpet and uneven light. India's government has rebuffed its efforts to obtain a trading license needed to sell directly to the booming domestic market -- rejecting its application at least nine times since early 2003, according to one senior sales executive briefed on the matter. The given reason: national-security concerns.

"We have encountered some problems in India," admits George Huang, who runs Huawei's research facility in Bangalore. India's Foreign Investment Promotion Board, which reviews applications for trade licenses, did not respond to requests for comment.

Just as they have in the U.S. and Europe, some of China's big companies have run smack into security concerns and other delays, say industry executives and lawyers. Protracted government reviews have tripped up Chinese forays in telecommunications and infrastructure -- sectors where India generally welcomes foreign capital and expertise.

In part, India's concerns mirror fears in the U.S. and Europe about China's corporate ambitions in the West and Africa, and its growing influence overseas. A year ago, an $18.5 billion bid for Unocal Corp. by China National Offshore Oil Corp., or Cnooc, stoked a political backlash in the U.S. that helped prompt the Chinese to back down. In Europe, China Mobile Communications Corp. is near a $5.3 billion deal to buy Millicom International Cellular SA of Luxembourg in what would be China's biggest-ever corporate acquisition.

But the delays also reflect continuing unease between India and its fast-growing neighbor, as both nations emerge as new economic powers wooing capital and pursuing rapid development. The two have talked of trying to forge a new economic partnership as a counterweight to ties with the U.S., but bitter feelings linger in India from its humiliating defeat in a 1962 border war with China. That past is part of a sharp debate within India's bureaucracy between those who advocate embracing China and those who remain wary of its involvement in strategic industries.

Moreover, after decades of relative separation, India is experiencing China's economic might firsthand, as Chinese goods from refrigerators to Hindu statues flood the nation's markets. "These two countries are trying to figure out how to deal with each other," says Ashok Gurung, director of the India China Institute at the The New School in New York. "It's going to take a while."

Among other companies facing delays, China's ZTE Corp.'s drive to expand its telecom business in India has run into security roadblocks, say industry executives. The Hong Kong port-operating unit of Hutchison Whampoa Ltd., a conglomerate run by pro-Beijing billionaire Li Ka-shing, also has been unable to win security clearance for investments, according to contents of a closed-door cabinet meeting reported in an Indian newspaper.

Another Chinese company, Shenzhen CIMC-Tianda Airport Support Ltd., was turned away from installing air bridges in several Indian airports because of security concerns, despite an offer that was at least 40% lower than the only other bid, which was from a Spanish company, says a CIMC-Tianda lawyer.

"The Indian government is asking China to come and join hands with us," says Sudhir Sajwan, part of a legal team preparing CIMC-Tianda's case for a hearing before India's Supreme Court. "Then the Chinese companies come and they face these kinds of problems."

CIMC-Tianda executives declined to comment on its case. ZTE executives in India acknowledged delays in obtaining government approvals, but refused to elaborate. A spokesman for Hutchison Port Holdings said the company "has not been rejected from participating in any port projects in India for any reason, and we have in fact taken part in previous bids." The spokesman declined to comment on reports of multiple delays in obtaining a security clearance for a recent bid to modernize the Mumbai port.

The Foreign Investment Promotion Board, the Indian agency under the Ministry of Finance that typically reviews applications for trading licenses, was set up in 1991 to pave the way for capital coming into the country. The board also refers some cases to a cabinet-level committee on national security. Besides officials at the board, neither the National Security Advisor nor the Ministry of Finance responded to requests for interviews or to a list of questions about the reviews of Chinese companies.

The security reviews have begun to draw unusual public criticism from Beijing. In remarks to reporters last week, China's Ministry of Commerce warned India not to freeze out the country's low-cost competitors. A spokesman asked why CIMC-Tianda had been allowed to install air bridges at other Indian airports only to encounter security concerns in subsequent bids.

"We couldn't understand the relevant departments of India who set a ban on this company for security reasons," said the ministry's Chong Quan, according to the government-run Xinhua News Agency. "While India speeds up its infrastructure-facility development, Chinese companies experienced in the construction of airports, roads, bridges, power stations and telecommunications can provide services of better quality on a relatively lower price."

Ironically, Indian firms are expanding aggressively in China and apparently encountering few roadblocks. In June 2005, India's Tata Consultancy Services Ltd., or TCS, announced plans to team with Microsoft Corp. and the National Development and Reforms Commission, a powerful government agency, to help turn China into a major outsourcing hub. Drugmaker Ranbaxy Laboratories Ltd. has been adding to its factory in Guangzhou to sell more generic drugs in China.

Those moves are contributing to broader growth in economic ties. In 2007, two-way trade is expected to hit $20 billion, a year ahead of the original target date, said India's foreign-trade minister, Kamal Nath.

As for Huawei, in some ways the Chinese telecom-equipment maker has enjoyed a warm market reception in India. In 2005, it recorded $120 million in local sales, up about 80% from the year before.

Yet executives say the lack of a trading license has hamstrung its expansion, deterring fresh investment and barring its bids to supply government-backed projects. Lacking security clearance, it recently had to drop an effort to supply wireless network equipment to Bharat Sanchar Nigam Ltd.

Huawei executives say Indian suspicions are misplaced. Although founded by a former soldier of China's People's Liberation Army, Huawei doesn't maintain links to China's military, and today operates as a private company in more than 100 countries, according to Mr. Huang of Huawei Technologies India, its Bangalore-based research arm.

Mr. Huang says he would like to double the 1,500 software engineers he has in India, combining them in a single corporate campus now split between two locations in Bangalore. Instead, he is watching rivals roll out their plans.

In October, Cisco Systems Inc. announced it was investing more than $1 billion in India. The same month, it broke ground for a new research lab here just 10 kilometers from where Huawei wants to build its facility.

U.N. Renews Presence In East Timor (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

The Security Council extended its political mission by two months and asked Secretary General Kofi Annan to plan for a "strengthened presence" of the United Nations there in light of recent violence that killed 30 people. The United States voted for the resolution despite a statement by its ambassador, John R. Bolton, questioning the need for returning peacekeepers.

Premier's Ally Faces Arrest In E. Timor (WP)

By Tanalee Smith

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

DILI, East Timor, June 20 -- East Timorese prosecutors ordered the arrest of the former interior minister Tuesday for supplying weapons to a hit squad tasked with eliminating political opponents of the prime minister, the United Nations said.

International troops, meanwhile, tightened security across the capital as hundreds of protesters gathered to demand the ouster of Prime Minister Mari Alkatiri, some handing out fliers calling him a terrorist and murderer.

Young men mounted a small stage across the street from Alkatiri's office to give speeches criticizing his rule as others chanted, "Step down! Step down!"

"He is a criminal. He divided the Timorese people," said Vidal Gomez, 19.

Many East Timorese say Alkatiri's decision to fire 600 disgruntled soldiers in March was to blame for the subsequent clashes and gang warfare that have left at least 30 people dead. Some also allege he formed a hit squad to kill his political opponents.

"I never provided any weapons to anyone," Alkatiri said in a television interview broadcast nationally Tuesday evening, adding that he welcomed a U.N. investigation into the claims.

But the decision by the country's top prosecutor to issue an arrest warrant for Rogerio Lobato, who resigned as interior minister June 1, added credibility to the allegations.

The indictment accuses Lobato of giving guns to rebel leader Vincente "Railos" da Concecao -- the self-proclaimed leader of a hit squad allegedly commissioned by Alkatiri to silence the opposition -- on at least three occasions in May, according to a U.N. statement.

His alleged aim was to "alter the public order and the democratic rule of law," the statement said.

Lobato, deputy head of Alkatiri's ruling Fretelin party, was at his home in Dili on Tuesday, said Jose Manuel Fernandes, the party's vice secretary general.

Sudan Leader Rejects U.N. Troops In Darfur (USAT)

USA Today, June 21, 2006

Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir said Tuesday that he will never allow United Nations peacekeepers into Darfur, where a U.N. commission has accused the government and its militia allies of human rights violations in suppressing an ethnic minority uprising. “This shall never take place,” al-Bashir said. “We will not accept colonial forces coming into the country.”

DOJ_NMG_0036462

The U.N. wants to send troops to replace a 7,000-strong African Union force that has been unable to stop the violence. About 180,000 people have died, many from hunger and disease, and about 2 million have been displaced since the conflict began in 2003.

A U.N.-chartered plane flew former Liberian president Charles Taylor from Sierra Leone to The Hague, Netherlands, to be tried on charges of war crimes.

Taylor is accused of helping Sierra Leone's Revolutionary United Front rebels, who killed, mutilated and raped civilians during the West African country's civil war from 1991 to 2002. Taylor has been in custody since March. He faces life imprisonment if convicted.

An Israeli missile aimed at suspected Palestinian militants in a car in Gaza killed three children standing nearby. The Israeli military said the car was carrying members of the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, a terrorist group. Killed in the attack in the Jebaliya refugee camp were a 5-year-old boy and two girls, 7 and 16, Jumma Fatah of Shifa Hospital said. An army spokesman, Capt. Jacob Dallal, said terrorists in the car were involved in firing rockets at Israeli neighborhoods. Dallal blamed the Palestinian government for allowing the attacks.

Santa Park in Finnish Lapland has turned a profit for the first time after cost cuts, including firing the last three full-time elves. Wille Rajala, director of the 8-year-old park, credits a change in philosophy. “We are not open every day, but a couple of months in winter and another couple of months during summer.”

Children can take sleigh rides, talk to Santa and feed the reindeer. The park's website reminds visitors that there are only 186 days until Christmas.

Leader Won't Allow U.N. Force In Darfur (NYT/AFP)

By Agence France-Presse

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

President Omar Hassan al-Bashir voiced strong opposition to the deployment of Western troops in Darfur, vowing his country would not be "recolonized," the state news media reported. "I swear that there will not be any international military intervention in Darfur as long as I am in power," Mr. Bashir was quoted as telling a meeting of his party. "Sudan, which was the first country south of the Sahara to gain independence, cannot now be the first country to be recolonized." The United Nations wants to replace an under-equipped contingent of African troops in Darfur with its own peacekeepers.

Foreign Intervention In Somalia? (CSM)

By Rob Crilly

The Christian Science Monitor, June 21, 2006

NAIROBI, KENYA

The rapid rise of Somalia's Islamist militias has prompted a flurry of diplomatic efforts to stabilize the troubled country in the Horn of Africa.

Earlier this week, the African Union and Western diplomats decided to send officials to Somalia to assess the possibility of deploying a peacekeeping force to a country ripped apart by 15 years of anarchy. That has the backing of President Abdullahi Yusuf, head of Somalia's virtually impotent transitional government, who flew to Ethiopia Tuesday to demand speedy intervention.

Regional powers support intervention out of fear of an Islamic state on their doorsteps, while Western governments are worried the country could become a haven for terrorists.

But rather than promote stability, the move could inflame feelings in the newly dominant Islamic courts movement, which has everything to lose by foreign intervention.

Its leaders say there is no need to invite peacekeepers when Islamist militias have succeeded in pacifying Mogadishu, one of the most dangerous cities on the planet.

"Any sort of AU intervention - which would most likely be a cover for Ethiopian intervention - is most likely to be highly divisive and is likely to derail any attempt at peaceful negotiation between the government and the courts," says Sulieman Baldo, Africa program director of the Brussels-based International Crisis Group. "The [Islamist] courts will be very hostile to any sort of Ethiopian intervention in Somalia."

DOJ_NMG_0036463

Ethiopian troops have previously supported President Yusuf in his home state of Puntland where he held off an Islamist challenge during the 1990s. Somalia's neighbor is also thought to have designs on its land.

For the past two weeks, Sheikh Sharif Ahmed, who heads the Islamic Courts Union, has insisted to the watching world that his network of sharia courts - which has imposed strict Islamic law, shut down cinemas, and banned people from celebrating New Year's - has no links to Al Qaeda and has no plans to turn Somalia into an Islamic state.

But at the same time, his militias have swept out of Mogadishu conquering a huge swath of Somalia, imposing sharia law on the strategic town of Jowhar and traveling almost up to the border with Ethiopia.

The courts are the closest thing to a central government the country has seen since President Siad Barre fled in 1991. After his departure, Somalia gradually split into a series of personal fiefdoms administered by a motley combination of gangsters and thugs known as warlords.

But the rise of the Islamic courts and their militias has ousted the warlords from Mogadishu, where they were allegedly receiving cash from the United States to prevent Al Qaeda from making inroads.

Militias loyal to Sheikh Ahmed are now positioned about 40 miles from the town of Baidoa, where the country's transitional government has sat for four months since being formed in neighboring Kenya.

Earlier this month, its parliament voted to endorse Yusuf's call for peacekeepers to guarantee the survival of the government.

That vote was quickly followed by accusations from the Islamic courts that Ethiopia had sent 300 soldiers across the border to bolster its ally, Yusuf. The charges are denied by Ethiopia, although it is well known that small numbers of Ethiopian troops regularly criss-cross the border as part of its own defenses.

For now, the presence of peacekeepers would also violate an arms embargo imposed by the United Nations on all sides.

Lifting it, says Lt. Col. Harjit Kelley, a consultant to the United Nations Monitoring Group on Somalia, would risk enflaming an already volatile situation by legalizing the flow of guns and ammunition into the country.

He adds that the Islamic courts had strong backing from people living in towns under their control, and that the government, which has the support of much of the international community, has no option but to open a dialogue.

However, Yusuf has previously ruled out talks with the Islamic courts' leadership unless they meet three conditions: withdraw their militias to Mogadishu, recognize his government, and disarm.

Colonel Kelley doubts the Islamists will agree to those conditions, and says Yusuf has next to no leverage over the courts.

"The Islamic courts have the infrastructure, the command and control, that has [allowed them to] take the capital and other towns and then, more important, to hold on to them, so they are a big threat to the TFG," says Kelley.

"The TFG's best chance is to offer them commanding positions - with some real responsibility - in the government."

For now, there is peace in Mogadishu, but no one doubts that much work remains to rebuild the failed state.

Earlier this week, the United Nations' World Food Programme and UNICEF warned that the recent fighting and years of drought had pushed Somalis to their limit, creating the highest rates of malnutrition seen in years.

Mahamud Hassan Ali, the mayor of Mogadishu, says the West had already intervened in his city, funding the warlords and exacerbating the conflict.

Now, he says, it is time for the outside world to help rebuild it.

"My appeal is that the taxes of the world are no longer used for destruction, but instead used to make a difference to the lives of our people."

Former Liberian President In The Hague For Trial (NYT)

By Marlise Simons

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

PARIS, June 20 — Charles G. Taylor, the former president of Liberia and one of West Africa's most feared men, arrived in handcuffs in the Netherlands on Tuesday, and was immediately taken to the jail near The Hague where the former Serbian president, Slobodan Milosevic, spent the last five years of his life.

DOJ_NMG_0036464

Mr. Taylor, 58, will be tried in the Netherlands by a specially created outpost of the Special Court for Sierra Leone, the United Nations-backed tribunal that has indicted him on charges of crimes against humanity and war crimes.

The long list of atrocities attributed to Mr. Taylor, a former warlord, includes running a rebel force that killed tens of thousands of civilians and hacked off the limbs of countless others.

A descendant of the returned slaves who founded Liberia, Mr. Taylor became notorious for his use and abuse of children who were pressed into his forces. The children were often brainwashed or drugged into killing their own parents or relatives, prosecutors have said.

Getting Mr. Taylor to The Hague has been a diplomatic headache ever since his capture as he tried to leave Nigeria in March. The Sierra Leone government requested that he be tried outside the country because, it argued, his followers could destabilize the region once again, after more than a decade of war.

Mr. Taylor is accused of financing the rebel force in Sierra Leone.

He will now be tried in The Hague, in a new courtroom at the International Criminal Court. The Dutch government, while agreeing to the trial on its soil, had insisted that Mr. Taylor was not welcome until another nation had committed to taking him into prison if he were convicted.

Britain, the former colonial power in Sierra Leone, whose troops helped end the war there, announced Thursday that Mr. Taylor could serve any sentence he might receive in Britain.

Mr. Taylor will be held in the wing of a Dutch prison, where both the United Nations tribunal for Yugoslavia and the new International Criminal Court have rented a cellblock. He will be tried by judges from the Sierra Leone court, which was created by the United Nations and the local government to try people responsible for atrocities since 1996. The court has nine people in custody.

It may take some months before Mr. Taylor begins his trial in The Hague. After his arrest, he attended a brief hearing at the Sierra Leone court, where he pleaded not guilty to all 11 charges he faces.

He also declared he was partly indigent, saying he could not pay for defense lawyers. Peter Andersen, the Sierra Leone court spokesman, said Mr. Taylor would be assigned a temporary counsel until the court has finished investigating his financial situation.

Mr. Taylor was known for trading diamonds and tropical hardwood for weapons, and is believed to have stolen millions of dollars from Liberia's coffers.

Liberia's Taylor Flown To The Hague To Face War Crimes Charges (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

PARIS, June 20 -- Former Liberian president Charles Taylor -- once one of Africa's most feared warlords -- arrived Tuesday in The Hague to face charges of war crimes and allegations that he destabilized West African countries while amassing a fortune from illegal trade in diamonds, guns and timber.

Taylor's trial was moved from Sierra Leone, where he is accused of mass murder, sexual slavery and conscripting children during his support for a rebel movement that killed thousands of people during that country's 1991-2002 civil war.

The U.N. Security Council, which approved the move from Freetown to the facilities of the International Criminal Court in The Hague, cited concerns that trying the case in Sierra Leone could destabilize Liberia, Sierra Leone and neighboring countries.

Taylor's former wife said he knew he would be transferred from a prison in Freetown to The Hague this week, according to news reports. She said he was eager to respond to the allegations, which he denied in a preliminary court appearance in Freetown after his arrest in March.

"Mr. Taylor is in a very reflective and pensive mood," Jewel Taylor, a member of Liberia's Senate, told the BBC Tuesday. "This is his whole life we're talking about." She added, "There is not basis for the charges that have been levied on Mr. Taylor."

The former president, 58, arrived in the Netherlands on a U.N.-chartered jet and was led from the plane in handcuffs. He then was driven to the International Criminal Court's detention center in the suburbs of The Hague. The proceedings will be held in the courtrooms of the international court, although the trial will be conducted by the Special Court for Sierra Leone.

Taylor is the first former African head of state to be brought before a war crimes tribunal, and his case comes at a time when prosecutors have begun making tentative efforts across the continent to hold political leaders accountable for the corruption, genocide and brutality of African conflicts in the final decades of the last century. He served as president of Liberia from 1997 until 2003, when he was forced to resign.

Taylor is charged with sponsoring and aiding a rebel organization in Sierra Leone that chopped off the limbs of its civilian victims and forced women into sexual slavery and children into combat, among other atrocities. While he was actively working to destabilize the region, Taylor built a massive personal fortune from illegal trading.

He had been living comfortably in exile in Nigeria until this spring, when President Olusegun Obasanjo agreed to turn him over to the Liberian government. Taylor attempted to flee and was nabbed at a border post near Cameroon in March. At a court appearance in Freetown in April, Taylor said he was innocent and described the charges against him as "an attempt to continue to divide and rule the people of Liberia and Sierra Leone."

Taylor will be housed in the same prison where former Yugoslav president Slobodan Milosevic was detained.

12 Held In ETA Racketeering Case (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

The police in Spain and France arrested 12 people on charges of acting as intermediaries between the armed Basque separatist group ETA and businesses that were forced to pay a "revolutionary tax," the Spanish Interior Ministry said. It said that the unit had been operating for the last 20 years and that extortion was how ETA financed its operations. Among those arrested was Julen de Madariaga, 74, one of ETA's founding members.

Latin America's Choice (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

Lima, Peru

There are a lot of ways to describe Latin America's challenge today. Some will tell you it's the age-old question of overcoming the staggering gap here between rich and poor. Some will tell you it's rooting out corruption and misgovernance. But I come at this issue with my own perspective, and I would describe the big question facing Latin Americans this way: Are they going to emulate India or get addicted to China?

This question was, at least implicitly, a subtext of the recent election here in Peru. But it's true throughout this continent, which has always been better at mining its resources than mining its people.

Let me explain by introducing Gabriel Rozman — a Jewish technologist of Hungarian roots who was raised in Uruguay, educated in America and now heads the Latin American operations of India's biggest software/outsourcing company, Tata Consultancy Services of Mumbai.

Mr. Rozman runs Tata's Latin American business out of Montevideo, where 550 Uruguayan programmers, trained and directed by Indians, are writing code and running the computer systems for companies all across this continent. They are backed up by Tata engineers in India, Hungary, China, Brazil, Chile, Mexico and Argentina. India now thinks Latin America is its backyard, too.

And so does China. China, though, is almost exclusively focused here on extracting natural resources — timber, iron, soybeans, minerals, gas, fish meal — to feed its voracious appetite and keep jobs and factories humming in China. There is nothing wrong about that. America and Spain did the same for years — and often rapaciously. Today, China's appetite is helping to fuel a worldwide boom in commodity prices that is enabling a poor, low-industrialized country like Peru to grow at 5 percent.

But countries that get addicted to selling their natural resources rarely develop their human resources and the educational institutions and innovative companies that go with that. So after the ore has been mined, the trees cut and the oil pumped, their people are actually even more behind.

"Why can't Latin America do what India is doing?" Mr. Rozman asked when I spoke with him in Washington last week. It can, he insists, but only if it changes — fast. "Right now I have 500 job openings I can't fill, and the problem is education. The prestige career to follow in India is engineering, and in Latin America it is [still] law or being a notary public."

"We need more computer courses with real standards and starting at an early age," he said. A lot of higher education in Latin America is modeled on the French/European system, which is better at producing philosophers than programmers. Philosophers are important, but not in bulk.

Latin America also has to do a better job of teaching English, he added, and eliminating the red tape that prevents economic integration in Latin America and makes it very cumbersome to start new businesses here.

"To go from Argentina to Montevideo is only a 20-minute flight," Mr. Rozman explained, but in terms of the economic integration demanded today by global firms, they are 10,000 miles apart. In addition, most of the legal systems in Latin America are designed to promote agriculture and light industry, not intellectual property or innovation. "All the laws were made for another type of society," he said. "If we don't get caught up with the next wave, we're in trouble."

That next wave is called "follow the sun," he said. "We like to start a project in Bangalore or Mumbai, then, as the day moves on, move it to our offices in Eastern Europe and then to Latin American." Tata expects its engineers in each place to be equally trained, speak English and have the computing infrastructure to seamlessly receive and hand off projects. This is a global-scale business.

"We have 50,000 employees in India and are going to 100,000," explained Mr. Rozman. Eventually, Tata will grow to 100,000 in China. "But I can't go to 100,000 in any one country in Latin America, so I have to be able to put [the whole continent] together."

Latin Americans may think that their big choice is between two models of Western capitalism — a European welfare state model and a hyper-competitive U.S. model. But before they divide their pie, they need to expand it — and here their most important choice is between an India example that focuses on developing human resources and a China syndrome that focuses on selling natural resources. Since countries tend to do either one or the other, here's hoping that Latin America discovers India before it gets hooked on China.

Slim Pickings (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

The Inter-American Development Bank has been lending money to governments and the private sector in Latin America for almost a half century with little to show for it. So it seems sadly appropriate that one of the main speakers at the bank's anti-poverty conference last week was Mexico's telecom monopolist, Carlos Slim. His topic, believe it or not, was "business models" to help lift majorities out of poverty.

Mr. Slim is the richest man in Latin America and, according to his own resume, one of the 10 richest men in the world. He is also reported to be a generous philanthropist. But Mr. Slim's fortune has come partly at the expense of Mexico's poor and middle class, who have had to suffer more than a decade of monopoly pricing for telecom services under his ownership of Mexico's Telmex. His anti-competitive political machinations are among the biggest obstacles to making Mexico a faster growing and more globally competitive economy.

Mr. Slim bought Telmex as a private monopoly from the government in 1990. After enjoying monopoly rights for the first six years of the privatization as part of the purchase agreement, Mr. Slim grew so rich and powerful that he became known as the "owner" of all of Mexico. When a scheduled deregulation arrived in 1997, he had the resources to fight it off and has continued to do so.

Today the Slim name is synonymous in Mexico with litigation against deregulatory orders and ferocious lobbying to protect the Telmex advantage. The company retains 95% of the fixed-line market, and telephony prices are high relative to markets that have undergone deregulation. Access in rural areas is sketchy.

Mexico's telecommunications minister, a former Telmex district manager, has vetoed efforts to adopt such simple competition tools as number portability, according to a former commissioner at the telecom regulator. Telmex controls almost all data traffic, and there is next to no consumer choice in broadband, Internet and voice-over-Internet. Telmex's domination in fixed-line services has also damaged competition in the wireless market. All of this has raised the cost of doing business in Mexico and has diminished growth, not to mention the burden it has put on the poor, the people the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB) is supposed to care about.

There is little debate among development economists about the importance of competition to moving people out of poverty. Equality under the law -- from which competition, innovation, and efficient capital allocations derive -- is the basis of such progress. But with special interests blocking market reform in most poor countries, introducing economic competition is an uphill climb.

Helping to overcome these political forces would be a good job for the IDB, but the bank has never been a serious place for development work. It busies itself instead with redistributing wealth; since its founding in 1959, the bank has funneled $140 billion into perpetuating bureaucracies. Now it is helping Mr. Slim build a reputation as an anti-poverty expert.

At last week's anti-poverty conference, Mr. Slim followed the Roman Catholic cardinal of Honduras, who spoke on the "moral dimension" of fighting poverty. To the best of our knowledge, Mr. Slim didn't utter the other 'm' word, monopoly, the one that helped to make him rich and continues to keep his fellow Mexicans poorer than they should be.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gov't Presses For Dismissal Of Surveillance Suit (BCN)

Bay City News, June 21, 2006

(BCN) SAN FRANCISCO The U.S. Justice Department has told a federal judge in San Francisco that allowing a surveillance lawsuit against AT&T Corp. to proceed "would cause grave harm to the nation's security."

U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker is scheduled to hear arguments on Friday on the government's motion for dismissal of a lawsuit filed against AT&T by the San Francisco-based Electronic Frontier Foundation on behalf of four Californians.

The government contends the case must be dismissed because there is no way it could be litigated without revealing state secrets vital to national security.

In a brief filed with the judge last week, Justice Department lawyers wrote that "the very subject matter of the case is a state secret."

The lawsuit alleges that AT&T has violated communications privacy laws and the plaintiffs' constitutional rights by allegedly giving the National Security Agency records of millions of Americans' telephone and Internet communications.

But the government argues in its brief, "Plaintiffs cannot establish whether or not such cooperation exists because that factual question is itself a state secret."

The brief argues that "the state secrets privilege is solidly rooted" in the president's constitutional authority as commander-in-chief.

The lawsuit was filed only against AT&T, but the government has asked to become a party to the case for purposes of seeking dismissal of the lawsuit.

The Electronic Frontier Foundation has argued that the case against AT&T can proceed without revealing any security secrets.

Fukuyama, Hannah And Zegna (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

Washington

As he launched a progressive journal to ponder big ideas that might help the wretched Democrats stop driving on Ambien and snatch back a little power, Andrei Cherny sought advice from a conservative pundit.

"Who's on your tie?" the pundit asked, explaining that Reaganites had been able to sum up their philosophy in the 80's by wearing Adam Smith and Edmund Burke ties.

Mr. Cherny did not say. (John Stuart Mill?)

So far, Democrats have been more famous for who gave the tie — Monica draped Bill with a Zegna — than who gazed from it.

Besides, Republicans don't own all three branches of government because of little cameo pictures of Adam Smith and Edmund Burke hanging over their blue Oxford button-down shirts. Mr. Smith and Mr. Burke would blanch at the shape W. and Karl Rove have given conservatism — the political muscle of the Christian right, the withering of the social contract, greedy capitalism, fiscal profligacy.

If the Democrats need anything, it's not a new tie. It may not even be big ideas.

The Republicans, after all, got a monopoly while headed by W., a guy who makes Reagan look like Hannah Arendt. "Compassionate conservatism" was an alluring alliteration, not a paradigmatic philosophy.

In politics, big ideas are too often just big slogans and big marketing techniques and big slime campaigns.

Besides, big ideas can backfire. Yesterday, Mr. Cherny and his fellow editor, Kenneth Baer, former Gore speechwriters, introduced their journal, Democracy — it's sort of like Foreign Affairs without the glitz — at a panel at the National Press Club with Francis Fukuyama and Bill Kristol.

Mr. Fukuyama's big idea was The End of History. But a couple of little things like religion and nationalist ideology, not to mention history, got in the way.

Mr. Kristol was a key backer of the neocon push to knock out Saddam and create a model democracy in the Middle East. As he pointed out ruefully yesterday, big ideas cannot survive "contact with politicians, unbruised," and are sometimes "applied inappropriately." That was no doubt a veiled shot at Donald Rumsfeld, whom Mr. Kristol faults for the slide in Iraq.

"And since my relations with conservatives these days are so bad — with Rumsfeld and immigration and other things — I'd just as soon hang out with you guys," the Weekly Standard editor told the room of liberals, bloggers and journalists. "You're less mean."

You'd think that incorrectly predicting history is over would get you banished from the intelligentsia forever, but Mr. Fukuyama proffered another big idea, warning that the pendulum was not making its customary swing left because "values" voters were clutching it.

"There's a guy I buy my barbecue from who says, 'I think we're in a class war and my class is losing,' " he shared. (Is this The End of Barbecue?) In Europe, he said, such brisket purveyors would be voting for the left, but in America, "the values issues have been much more prominent, and so people who for economic reasons ought to be voting on the left are held still in the Republican column precisely because they don't trust the left on all the issues having to deal with family, and identity, and this sort of thing."

Big ideas are not enough, because personalities and circumstances intervene. What matters is the bearer of an idea.

Bill Clinton had big ideas but short-circuited his presidency when he elevated his chaotic, self-regarding and gluttonous personality to a management style. Al Gore had big ideas but was too neutered by political mercenaries and focus groups to make those ideas compelling. Maybe because she had one idea that was way too big, Hillary has been running away from big ideas as though they're poison.

After 9/11, Dick Cheney transposed his desire to expand executive power and his personal paranoia into a national policy. Ron Suskind reports in his new book, "The One Percent Doctrine," that Vice dictated that the war on terror allowed the administration to summarily reject the need for evidence and analysis before action.

Mr. Suskind describes the Cheney doctrine: "Even if there's just a 1 percent chance of the unimaginable coming due, act as if it is a certainty. It's not about 'our analysis,' as Cheney said. It's about 'our response.' ... Justified or not, fact-based or not, 'our response' is what matters. As to 'evidence,' the bar was set so low that the word itself almost didn't apply."

In the hands of the wrong person, big ideas can be terrifying.

Grassley Accuses FBI Of Botched Terror Investigation, Coverup (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

The FBI sought to cover up a "botched" investigation into a terrorist financing scheme by classifying a probe into the case as secret and misleading Congress about how the inquiry was handled, said a senior member of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley said the FBI blocked the full release of an investigative report he sought last year from the Department of Homeland Security and the Justice Department of what he called a "turf fight" between the FBI and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) in a terrorism investigation.

The Iowa Republican, a frequent FBI critic who also serves as chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said the FBI classified as "secret" sections of the report originally marked as "unclassified" during a review process.

Mr. Grassley said an unexplained delay by the FBI in processing a request by ICE investigators for a wiretap in the terrorist probe prevented the interception of communications between a criminal suspect and a person designated as a global terrorist by the Treasury Department.

"The FBI has a leadership role on terrorism financing cases by virtue of a May 2003 memorandum of agreement (MOA) between the Homeland Security and Justice departments, not by any statute or congressional mandate," Mr. Grassley said in a letter to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III.

"The facts established in the [Office of Inspector General] report do not instill confidence in the FBI's ability to lead under the process established by the MOA," he said, adding that it was "a clear conflict of interest" for FBI officials to edit criticisms of their actions.

Mr. Grassley also targeted Mr. Mueller, saying that during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing in May, the director painted "a distorted picture" of findings in the report from the inspectors general at Homeland Security and Justice, reading "selectively" from unclassified portions.

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko said the bureau received Mr. Grassley's letter but that "it would not be appropriate to discuss this letter or the response in the press."

The senator said the FBI initially blamed the delay on the bureau's Houston field office, which failed to transfer the case to the Joint Terrorism Task Force, but Mr. Grassley said evidence showed FBI headquarters raised a number of issues to slow the approval process, none of which related to whether the case had been transferred.

"This raises questions about whether the true motivation for delaying the case may have been to prevent a rival agency from infringing on FBI turf," said Mr. Grassley, adding that several federal agencies agreed there was probable cause for a wiretap.

Mr. Grassley said the MOA giving the FBI's Terrorism Financing Operations Section the lead role in cases involving terrorist financing operations had created "a strong disincentive for those outside the FBI to investigate suspected terrorist financing."

Qaeda Says Man Was To Take Part In 9/11 Attacks (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 20 (AP) — Al Qaeda has identified a would-be 20th hijacker for the Sept. 11 attacks as a Saudi who was killed in a 2004 shootout with his country's security forces.

In a statement accompanying a new video, whose authenticity has not been verified, Al Qaeda's propaganda arm asserts that the Saudi, Fawaz al-Nashimi, also known as Turki bin Fuheid al-Muteiry, would have rounded out a team that ultimately took over United Airlines Flight 93, which crashed in Pennsylvania before reaching its target.

A video featuring Mr. Nashimi was obtained Tuesday by IntelCenter, a United States government contractor based in Virginia. American counterterrorism officials declined to comment on the authenticity of the video and its claims.

The video includes images of Mr. Nashimi justifying attacks against the West. It also contains 27 minutes of audio of a siege in May 2004 on oil facilities in Khobar, Saudi Arabia, in which he took part.

Screeching tires and gunfire are heard. A voice can be heard asking in Arabic, "Where are the Americans?"

In the attack, militants opened fire inside two oil industry office compounds, then moved on to a residential area. Twenty-two people were killed. Mr. Nashimi was killed the next month in a gun battle with Saudi forces.

The video offered no explanation of why Mr. Nashimi did not take part in the 9/11 attacks.

American counterterrorism officials have believed for some time that the original plot included another hijacker on Flight 93, which had only four attackers. The two planes that flew into the World Trade Center and the one that flew into the Pentagon each had five hijackers.

Al-Qaeda Identifies Would-Be 20th Hijacker (WP/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

Al-Qaeda has identified a would-be 20th hijacker for the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks as a Saudi operative who was killed in a 2004 shootout with his country's security forces.

In a statement accompanying a new video, the terrorist network's propaganda arm identified Fawaz al-Nashmi, also known as Turki bin Fuheid al-Muteiry, as the operative who would have joined the four terrorists who took over United Airlines Flight 93, which crashed into a Pennsylvania field.

A 54-minute video featuring al-Nashmi was obtained yesterday by IntelCenter, a U.S. government contractor based in Virginia. U.S. counterterrorism officials declined to comment on the authenticity of the video and its claims.

The video included a screen crediting the al-Sahab media committee with producing the message. While no one is known to have forged the group's work, its statements are often difficult to verify.

The video includes footage of al-Nashmi justifying attacks against the West. It also contains 27 minutes of previously unheard audio of a siege that he took part in on oil facilities in Khobar, Saudi Arabia.

Screeching car tires and gunfire are heard as the terrorist cell moved from building to building. A voice can be heard saying in Arabic: "Where are the Americans? . . . Give me the information."

The demands are punctuated with more gunfire.

In the May 2004 attack, militants dressed in military-style uniforms opened fire inside two oil industry office compounds and then moved to an upscale residential area. They took 45 to 60 hostages. Saudi security forces stormed the complex, but three of the militants escaped, including al-Nashmi. Twenty-two people were killed in the 25-hour rampage, almost all of them foreigners, including one American.

Al-Nashmi was killed the following month in shootout with Saudi forces.

The Khobar assault was one of a series of attacks against foreigners by al-Qaeda's Saudi branch in 2003 and 2004, aimed at undermining its U.S.-allied royal family.

U.S. counterterrorism officials have believed for some time that the original 9/11 plot included a fifth hijacker for Flight 93.

DOJ_NMG_0036474

Federal agents at first thought al-Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui was intended to be on that flight, but they later revised their information.

The Sept. 11 commission identified al-Qaeda member Mohamed al-Kahtani, who was turned away at Orlando International Airport in August 2001, as a possible would-be 20th hijacker.

U. Of Ark. Graduate Cleared In Terror Case (AP)

AP, June 21, 2006

Fayetteville, Ark. (AP) -- A University of Arkansas graduate has been acquitted of attempting to provide material support to a Palestinian terrorist organization but convicted of immigration charges.

Arwah Jaber, 33, faces a maximum of 10 years in prison on each count of obtaining his naturalization unlawfully and making false statements on passport and immigration applications.

The government moved to revoke his citizenship after the jury returned its verdicts Monday.

U.S. District Judge Jimm Larry Hendren on Tuesday gave both sides 10 days to submit written arguments on that issue.

Jaber came to the attention of authorities when he talked openly about joining Palestinian Islamic Jihad, a group the U.S. government considers a terrorist organization. He was arrested last year as he was about to board a flight and maintains he was going to the Middle East to visit relatives. The government says he wanted to join the holy war.

"We don't know what the consequences would have been," said U.S. Attorney Bob Balfe. "We had to take action."

Jaber was born on the West Bank and became a U.S. citizen in 1994. He testified last week he made the statements about Palestinian Islamic Jihad because he was upset at delays in obtaining his degree. He received a doctorate in chemistry from the university last fall.

He admitted using a false Social Security number but said he needed it to obtain credit cards in his Palestinian name, Orwah Houshia. He said he did not include the name Orwah Houshia on immigration papers because he had used Arwah Jaber previously for immigration documents.

Jaber said he now expects to leave the country with his wife, Dawn, and find a teaching position in the Middle East.

"I am not a terrorist. (The jury) knew it," Jaber said after Monday's verdict.

Jaber Retains Citizenship For Now (SPRINGDN)

By Trish Mehaffey, The Morning News

Springdale (AR) Daily News, June 21, 2006

FAYETTEVILLE -- Arwah Jaber retains his American citizenship for now but a motion to revoke it was taken under advisement today by U.S. District Judge Jimm Larry Hendren.

Jaber, a naturalized U.S. citizen born in the West Bank town of Yamoun, was acquitted Monday of providing material support to the recognized terrorist organization, Palestinian Islamic Jihad, but he was convicted on five lesser charges related to immigration and credit card fraud. The convictions will likely be grounds to revoke his citizenship.

U. S. Attorney Wendy Johnson filed a motion Monday to revoke his citizenship.

The motion was argued today during a hearing.

John Wesley Hall, Jr., Jaber's attorney, questioned whether the court has the jurisdiction to order Jaber to be detained for the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency.

Hall also asked the court if the statute mentioned in the revocation request meant conviction as when the jury renders a verdict or after sentencing. Hall asked the court if Jaber's naturalization is revoked and then the defense wins an appeal, would Jaber's naturalization be reinstated.

Hendren said in that specific situation, the higher court would probably vacate any order from the district court.

Hendren said he was unclear on the statute's meaning of "upon conviction." A return of a verdict isn't a conviction and based on some other cases, the revocation wasn't considered until sentencing, he said.

A revocation of naturalization is an important consideration for the court because a person goes through a lengthy process to attain it, Hendren said. He asked the attorneys to provide briefs within 10 days on the motions and he will rule at that time.

Jaber said today he was happy with Hendren's decision regarding his citizenship. It took seven years for him to gain naturalization, and he appreciated the judge's thoughts, he said.

"It (naturalization) really is a sacred thing," Jaber said. "It's difficult to earn citizenship."

Jaber plans to go back home and teach when his legal problems are over. He received his doctorate in chemistry from the University of Arkansas. He said he would like to stay and teach in Arkansas if allowed but realizes that may not be possible.

Jaber still could face jail time on the charges of making false statements to obtain a passport and unlawful procurement of naturalization and credit card fraud.

He will be sentenced within 90 days after a presentencing investigation is completed.

The defense is still considering whether it has grounds for an appeal.

Hendren also ruled to keep Jaber under the same bond and the same orders of wearing an electronic monitor. He has surrendered his passport. The judge asked Jaber to make himself "reasonably available" for his attorneys and the court during the presentencing investigation time.

Jaber said he hadn't left Washington County since his arrest last year. Under his bond, he is suppose to stay in the county and has to get permission to go anywhere else.

Jaber and his wife, Dawn, were pulled out of line by FBI agents at the Northwest Regional Airport on June 14, 2005 on their way to Palestine. Jaber told his doctoral professor and others at the university that he was going to Palestine to "fight for freedom, peace and justice." Jaber testified last week he was frustrated with a professor over delays in graduating and made the statements in an effort to sway the teacher into approving his degree.

He said he didn't mean any of it and recanted the statements under questioning by FBI agents.

Arkansas Man Acquitted Of Terror Charges (NYT)

By Steve Barnes

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

Arwah Jaber, a naturalized United States citizen born in the West Bank, was acquitted of federal charges that he tried to assist the Palestinian Islamic Jihad, which the United States government lists as a terrorist organization.

But Mr. Jaber was convicted of five lesser offenses, including lying to immigration officials. Judge Jimm L. Hendren of Federal District Court in Fayetteville took under advisement the prosecution's petition to strip Mr. Jaber of his citizenship.

Mr. Jaber, 33, acknowledged expressing a wish to join the jihad but said he had merely been frustrated at the time it had taken to graduate from the University of Arkansas.

Judge Orders Disclosure Of Details In Padilla Terror Case (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, June 21, 2006

MIAMI - A federal judge ordered prosecutors Tuesday to turn over more detailed evidence to back up allegations that Jose Padilla and two co-defendants conspired to kill, injure or kidnap people overseas as part of a global Islamic terrorist network.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke said she agreed with many of the claims made by defense attorneys that the federal indictment against Padilla and the others is "very light on facts" that would link the defendants to specific acts of terrorism or victims.

"We are so shooting in the dark," said Jeanne Baker, one of the attorneys representing defendant Adham Amin Hassoun. "The government has to tell us, what are these acts they conspired to commit?"

Hassoun, Padilla and others are charged with being part of a North American terror support cell that provided money, recruits and supplies to al-Qaida and other violent Islamic extremist organizations. All have pleaded not guilty, with trial scheduled for this fall.

Cooke ordered the government to flesh out its charges by providing defense lawyers with names of unindicted co-conspirators, broad descriptions of intended victims of alleged acts of violence and specifics about false statements Hassoun allegedly made about the meaning of phone calls intercepted by the government.

The judge's order came despite arguments from Brian Frazier, an assistant U.S. attorney, that most of the specifics were being turned over already, mainly in the form of more than 225 key phone intercepts. And, he contended, there were 80 specific illegal acts alleged in the indictment.

"What is terrorism but a random act of violence? It means anyone could be a victim at any time," Frazier said.

The complexity of the case, with huge amounts of classified material and some 50,000 intercepted phone calls, led prosecutors and defense lawyers to tell Cooke that it seems unlikely the case will go to trial in early September as scheduled. But Cooke, noting that Hassoun and Padilla have both been in federal custody since 2002, refused for now to order a delay.

"At some point in time, a date has to be set. We have to go forward," she said.

Earlier Tuesday, another federal judge heard arguments from Hassoun's lawyers seeking to suppress evidence seized by the FBI from his Broward County home, saying the FBI "frightened and intimidated" his wife before seizing a handgun and other key evidence such as documents in Arabic and videotapes.

An FBI agent, however, testified Hassoun's wife freely consented in writing to the search of the home in Sunrise after he was arrested on an immigration violation on June 12, 2002.

"She didn't have a problem with that," the agent, Gregory McDermott, told U.S. Magistrate Judge Stephen Brown at a hearing. "It was very professional and friendly."

Brown did not indicate when he would rule on Hassoun's motion to suppress evidence obtained in the 2002 search.

Hassoun's lawyers say his wife, Nahed Wannous, thought that she was being asked to produce only her husband's immigration documents and that she was "frightened and intimidated" by two FBI agents and one immigration agent who appeared at her door that night.

At one point, Wannous indicated she wanted a lawyer, but agreed to sign the FBI search consent form after immigration agent Mary Rodriguez said she told Wannous that she wasn't under arrest. Rodriguez testified there was never a threatening atmosphere in the house.

"It was never any raised voices, never intimidating," Rodriguez said.

The 9mm handgun that was seized from Hassoun's garage resulted in a charge of illegal possession of a weapon by an alien admitted to the United States on a non-immigrant visa. The other seized papers, documents and videotapes are part of the government's claim that Hassoun acted as an al-Qaida recruiter and fundraiser.

Hassoun's lawyers have been trying to arrange Wannous - now living in Beirut, Lebanon, and unwilling to travel to the United States - to give a videotaped statement about the FBI search. But that has not yet happened.

"We have a critical witness who could not be here today," Baker said.

Padilla was designated an "enemy combatant" and held for 3 1/2 years without charge by the Bush administration shortly after his May 2002 arrest at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport. He was accused then of plotting to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major U.S. city.

Padilla was added as a defendant in the Miami terror support cell case last year amid a legal struggle over President Bush's authority to hold him indefinitely. The Miami indictment does not mention the "dirty bomb" allegations.

Man Renews 20-Year Battle For Citizenship (LAT)

By John Spano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

A man at the center of a long-running immigration legal fight that came to be known as the "L.A. 8" case returned to court Tuesday to renew his two-decade-long quest for citizenship.

Aiad Barakat, 45, walked with a pronounced limp to the witness stand in federal court downtown and in halting English fielded a barrage of questions in a bid to avoid deportation.

Almost 20 years ago, federal officials sought to deport Barakat and seven others because of their association with causes promoting Palestinian statehood, such as the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine.

The eight were never accused of an act of terrorism or of any other crime.

Rather, they were targeted for deportation on the grounds that they allegedly had raised money for the Popular Front, a group the government suspected of terrorist activities.

The group won a victory in 1989 when a judge struck down as unconstitutional portions of a federal law that allowed deportation to be based on political affiliation and advocacy. The charges against the L.A. 8 have been reworked at least three times since, reflecting changes in immigration and anti-terrorism laws, some of which were tailored to be applied retroactively to this case.

Constitutional questions are not at issue in the current case. The only question in court Tuesday was whether Barakat should be denied citizenship for allegedly lying about his association with Palestinian advocate Ali Kased when he sought U.S. citizenship.

The government plans to introduce an FBI surveillance videotape of a meeting Barakat attended with Kased, described as a prominent Palestinian activist, in 1985 outside of Los Angeles. The meeting purportedly lasted two hours and dealt with Palestinian causes and fundraising.

"Mr. Barakat gave false testimony to obtain an immigration benefit, and thus he is not a person of good moral character," the government asserted in court papers.

Barakat's lawyers insist he had a right to engage in political activity and said he may not have remembered the meeting when questioned by immigration officials. U.S. District Judge Steven V. Wilson is presiding over the case, which is scheduled to continue today.

Wanted: A System Of Justice (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0036477

SEPT. 11 MASTERMINDS Khalid Sheik Mohammed and Ramzi Binalshibh, along with numerous other infamous al-Qaeda figures, have been in American custody for years. So has Mohamed Qatani, who was allegedly to be the 20th hijacker. None has faced trial for his crimes. Nor have any of the hundreds of lesser foreign detainees captured in the war on terrorism. Nearly five years after the Sept. 11 attacks, the Bush administration's plans for bringing the enemy to justice are a shambles. This failure has been one of the most easily avoidable blunders in the war on terrorism.

In the next few days the Supreme Court is expected to pass judgment on the administration's effort to establish military commissions -- a long-dormant trial system the executive branch seeks to revive in order to try al-Qaeda terrorists. But even if the court lets the commissions stand, the administration should go back to the drawing board, to create a fairer system for trying alleged war criminals in which this country can have confidence.

Not every detainee can be put on trial. But those who plan, assist or participate in acts of terrorism can face charges under the laws of war. Where trials are possible, criminal convictions provide a more legitimate basis for long-term incarceration than any kind of detention without charge. Trials also provide public accountability for unspeakable crimes and plots -- that is, they provide a measure of justice.

The administration is correct that U.S. federal courts often will not be the right venue for such trials. Evidence collected in the rough and tumble of a shooting war doesn't always meet the rigorous standards that courts here rightly demand. The government may have good reason to withhold witnesses or classified information. Given that foreigners abroad do not have full constitutional rights, the administration's impulse to create an alternative trial mechanism with some flexibility was reasonable. Had it gone to Congress and sought authorization to use a variation of military courts-martial, with clear rules and a codification of the offenses such tribunals were to judge, it might today have a vibrant system of justice at Guantanamo Bay.

Instead, the administration sought to rewrite the rules from scratch and revive a system of trial not seen since the World War II era. The reason for this fateful error was largely ideological: The White House wished not merely to conduct trials but also to emphasize the president's power to do it on his own. Consequently, the executive branch alone has defined the offenses to be tried by commission and it alone has written the trial rules, which have shifted repeatedly. The legality of the system has been in doubt from its inception. And while the rules have improved over time, they still permit unfairness. The result: a system that inspires little confidence here or abroad and that in five years has yet to produce one trial.

Even if the Supreme Court erases the cloud of legal uncertainty in the coming days, it makes no sense to proceed in this fashion. Instead, Congress should write a law clarifying that courts-martial will try these cases and modifying the model if necessary. The military uses this system to try its own personnel every day. More than the commissions, courts-martial would guarantee due process to detainees: the right to challenge evidence, a full appeal to the federal courts. Trials by court-martial are accepted around the world as fair.

At the same time, the system could be modified to take into account the government's needs in a continuing war. These might give prosecutors more leeway to use hearsay evidence in some cases, or to protect intelligence secrets. There may be circumstances when the accused will need to be excluded from proceedings and have his interests represented by counsel cleared to handle sensitive information. But such departures from traditional trial rules should be narrowly drawn. They should be the product of a deliberative legislative process, not a fiat from the executive branch; written into law, not existing as rules the Pentagon can change whenever convenient.

The conflict with Islamic extremists will not be over soon. The nation needs now, and will continue to need, a means to try some of the most fateful criminals of all time according to fair rules that bear the stamp of democratic approval: legislative enactment. Only the administration's rigidly ideological approach to this problem prevents its timely resolution.

This is the fourth in a series of editorials about the Bush administration's detention and treatment of foreign prisoners. The full series will be available athttp://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Police Skirt Privacy Laws By Using Data Brokers (AP)

By Ted Bridis And John Solomon, Associated Press

AP, June 21, 2006

Buying records is quicker than subpoenas but raises concerns

WASHINGTON – Federal and local police across the country have been gathering Americans' phone records from private data brokers without subpoenas or warrants.

DOJ_NMG_0036478

These brokers, many of whom market aggressively on the Internet, have broken into customer accounts online, tricked phone companies into revealing information and sometimes acknowledged that their practices violate laws, according to documents obtained by The Associated Press.

Legal experts and privacy advocates said police reliance on private vendors who commit such acts raises civil liberties questions.

Those using data brokers include agencies of the Homeland Security and Justice departments – including the FBI and U.S. Marshals Service – and municipal police departments in California, Florida, Georgia and Utah. Experts believe hundreds of other departments frequently use such services.

"We are requesting any and all information you have regarding the above cell phone account and the account holder ... including account activity and the account holder's address," Ana Bueno, a police investigator in Redwood City, Calif., wrote in October to PDJ Investigations of Granbury, southwest of Fort Worth.

An agent in Denver for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Anna Wells, sent a similar request on March 31 on Homeland Security stationery: "I am looking for all available subscriber information for the following phone number," Ms. Wells wrote to a corporate alias used by PDJ.

Congressional investigators estimated the U.S. government spent $30 million last year buying personal data from private brokers. But that number probably understates the breadth of transactions, since brokers said they rarely charge law enforcement agencies.

A lawmaker who has investigated the industry said Monday he was concerned about data brokers.

"There's a good chance there are some laws being broken, but it's not really clear precisely which laws, said Rep. Ed Whitfield, R-Ky., head of the House Energy and Commerce investigations subcommittee that plans to begin hearings today.

Documents gathered by Mr. Whitfield's committee show that data brokers use trickery, impersonation and technology to gather phone records. "They can basically obtain any information about anybody on any subject," Mr. Whitfield said.

James Bearden, a Texas lawyer who represents four such data brokers, likened the companies' activities to the National Security Agency, which has also surreptitiously compiled the phone records of some Americans.

"The government is doing exactly what these people are accused of doing," Mr. Bearden said. "These people are being demonized. These are people who are partners with law enforcement on a regular basis."

Larry Slade, PDJ's lawyer, said no one at the company violated laws, but he added, "I'm not sure that every law enforcement agency in the country would agree with that analysis."

PDJ always provided help to police for free. "Agencies from all across the country took advantage of it," Mr. Slade said.

The police agencies told The Associated Press they used the data brokers because it was quicker and easier than subpoenas, and their lawyers believe their actions did not violate the Fourth Amendment's guarantee against unlawful search and seizure.

None of the police agencies interviewed by AP said they researched their data brokers to determine how they gathered sensitive personal information. Privacy advocates bristled over data brokers gathering records for police without subpoenas.

"This is pernicious, an end run around the Fourth Amendment," said Marc Rotenberg, head of the Washington-based Electronic Privacy Information Center, which advocates tougher regulation of data brokers. "The government is encouraging unlawful conduct; it's not smart on the law enforcement side to be making use of information obtained improperly."

Legal experts said law enforcement agencies would be permitted to use illegally obtained information from private parties without violating the Fourth Amendment as long as police did not encourage crimes to be committed.

"If law enforcement is encouraging people in the private sector to commit a crime in getting these records, that would be problematic," said Mark Levin, a former top Justice Department official under President Reagan.

Congress Investigates Methods Of Data Sellers (USAT)

By Peter Eisler

USA Today, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Congress begins hearings today on the techniques used by private data-collection companies to obtain phone records and other information.

Law enforcement agencies often go to such companies for information. They do so to save time and avoid seeking subpoenas or warrants for the information, even though the data brokers do not always obtain their information legitimately, according to an investigation by the House Energy and Commerce investigations subcommittee. Agencies using data from these companies include the FBI, Justice Department and Department of Homeland Security and state and municipal police departments from Florida to California.

DOJ_NMG_0036479

"Most of these data brokers procure the records and information, either themselves or through third-party vendors, by the use of pretext — that is, the use of ruse, lies and deception to gain access to information that is not publicly available and which they do not have the consent of the 'target' to procure," subcommittee spokesman Kevin Schweers says. "Many documents … show that the data brokers are completely aware that the phone records and other information is largely acquired through pretext."

The subcommittee, chaired by Rep. Ed Whitfield, R-Ky., will hold a series of hearings on the matter. Details of the investigation's findings were first reported by the Associated Press.

The subcommittee's investigation found that law enforcement agencies often turn to data brokers for phone records, such as unlisted numbers and information on calls made and received by suspects in an investigation. In many cases, officers would have to get a warrant or subpoena to get the same information from phone companies.

This spring, the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, reported that federal law enforcement agencies spent about $30 million last year to buy information from data brokers. That figure, however, only includes money paid to legitimate data-collection companies, Schweers says. Smaller, less scrupulous firms often do not charge law enforcement agencies for data, he says, so gauging how often federal, state and local authorities use them is difficult.

TSA Delays Registered Traveler Program (AP)

The AP, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A program to let frequent flyers breeze through airports has been delayed as the government and private businesses grapple with ways to ensure retention of tough security standards.

The Registered Traveler program, which has been tested at Orlando International Airport and four other airports, was supposed to be rolled out gradually starting Tuesday. But Transportation Security Administration spokeswoman Yolanda Clark said the agency was still working with private firms running the program to make certain that it "does not decrease security in any way."

Registered Traveler would have allowed certain airline passengers to quickly go through a separate airport security lane if they paid a fee, passed a government background check and submitted fingerprints. The TSA wants private contractors to run the program, but said that travelers must be able to use the pass at every airport that offers it.

Clark said the contractors must also make sure the program doesn't hold up travelers who aren't enrolled for the fast security clearance.

She could not immediately estimate when the program might be ready.

Government Orders Anthrax Drug (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

The Department of Health and Human Services has placed a $165 million order for 20,000 doses of a new anthrax drug that it hopes to put in a biodefense stockpile starting in 2009.

The drug, Abthrax, neutralizes the deadly toxin that anthrax bacteria produce, which accounted for the majority of deaths in the 2001 anthrax attacks, said Dr. Gerald Parker, acting assistant secretary for public health emergency preparedness.

Lower-Cost Plan For 9/11 Memorial Is Proposed (WSJ)

By Alex Frangos

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

A simpler plan for the World Trade Center memorial will include several cost-saving design changes, while aiming to preserve the overall look and feel of the project.

In a report commissioned by New York Gov. George Pataki and New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, real-estate developer Frank Sciame suggested modifications that would bring the cost of the memorial and an adjacent museum to $510 million, plus another $150 million for underground infrastructure. (See the updated renderings.)

New York State would spend an additional $80 million on a visitors center. A cost estimate in May showed the project, minus the visitors center, approaching $1 billion.

The basic design remains similar to architect Michael Arad's original "Reflecting Absence" plan -- including a street-level plaza with two square openings, the Twin Towers' footprints. Waterfalls will cascade from the edges of the footprints into below-ground reflecting pools.

DOJ_NMG_0036480

The changes Mr. Sciame announced include moving the carved-in-stone names of 9/11 victims to ground level and reducing the size of underground galleries. Under the new plan, visitors would ponder the names amid an open-air, tree-lined park, rather than underground, as proposed by Mr. Arad.

Mr. Arad was rankled by the adjustments to his design but struck a conciliatory tone. "While I am disappointed by this change, I recognize the imperative to move forward and begin construction of the memorial as soon as possible," he said.

Other modifications include doing away with an entry pavilion and combining that function with the visitors center on Greenwich Street, wedged between the two footprints. An underground museum that would document the attacks and their aftermath will be reduced in size.

The board of the Lower Manhattan Development Corp., a state-city agency that guides the rebuilding, will vote on the changes at its meeting next week. Despite the redesign, Mr. Sciame said the memorial is still scheduled to open on Sept. 11, 2009.

Mr. Sciame also called for the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the site, to build the memorial. Doing so would create "economies of scale," he said, that would reduce the underground-infrastructure cost, since the bistate agency is also building the nearby transit hub and Freedom Tower. The Port Authority has already agreed to pay $100 million toward the memorial's infrastructure, which includes delivery ramps, drainage and air-conditioning equipment.

"We will take responsibility for construction as long as a final design has been established and a firm funding plan is in place," said Port Authority spokesman Steve Coleman.

Even with the changes, the memorial is $130 million short of the $510 million construction budget. That doesn't include operating costs, estimated to be at least $40 million a year. The World Trade Center Memorial Foundation, a publicly chartered, privately run group in charge of fund raising, has brought in $130 million from private sources and has $250 million in federal government money.

"With the expected resolution of cost and finality of design by the end of this month, we plan to launch our national advertising campaign in early July," said Joe Daniels, acting president of the memorial foundation. "This memorial will require the participation of people from across the country and around the world."

New Design For WTC Memorial Cuts Cost In Half (USAT)

By Martha T. Moore

USA Today, June 21, 2006

NEW YORK — In a change that pleases many victims' family members, a revised design for a memorial commemorating those who died Sept. 11, 2001, will have the names of the victims inscribed above ground on walls surrounding square sunken pools instead of in subterranean galleries.

The change was announced Tuesday as part of a redesign to cut the project's cost to $500 million from nearly $1 billion. In the original plan for the memorial, the names were to have been below ground, surrounding two pools representing the destroyed twin towers of the World Trade Center. A committee appointed by New York Gov. George Pataki and Mayor Michael Bloomberg spent a month revising the project to cut its cost.

The names of the 2,749 people who died in the attack will now be viewable at all times. Visitors will not have to pass through security into the memorial museum, which is to be largely underground.

The change trades “the sanctity and the quietude” of the underground galleries for greater access, says Rick Bell, who is executive director of the New York chapter of the American Institute of Architects and a consultant to the committee that made the budget-driven revisions.

The redesign, which focused on changes with big impacts on the budget, did not address how the unidentified remains of those who died would be stored or where to locate a planned private viewing area for family members.

Some family groups had pressed for the names to be above ground. “We are very anxious to … help build it when it's right,” says Anthony Gardner, head of the World Trade Center United Family Group. “This is a step in that direction.” His organization wants victims to be listed in related groups according to where they worked. The memorial design calls for the names to be listed randomly.

9/11 Memorial's Design Revised To Save $285 Million (WP)

By Sara Kugler

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

NEW YORK, June 20 -- A somewhat scaled-down design for the Sept. 11 memorial that retains the central elements of the original -- including reflecting pools and the inscribed names of the victims -- was unveiled Tuesday after the project was sent back to the drawing board because the cost was pushing $1 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0036481

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R) and Gov. George E. Pataki (R) signed off on the more modest proposal, more than a month after asking developer Frank Sciame to find ways to reduce the cost to $500 million.

Sciame managed to cut the cost by more than $285 million by shrinking the size of the memorial museum, removing portions of the galleries around the pools where the names were to be listed, and consolidating all entrances into a visitors center. The new design will also raise the victims' names to street level.

The reflecting pools and waterfalls envisioned by architects Michael Arad and Peter Walker for the site where the World Trade Center stood were retained.

In a report, Sciame said he had considered eliminating the waterfalls but decided they were too important to the "contemplative nature" of the design -- particularly because they will drown out the sounds of the city and allow viewers to get lost in the power and emotion of the memorial.

Tuesday's announcement marked the beginning of a seven-day public comment period. The Lower Manhattan Development Corp., which oversees the rebuilding of the site, will adopt a final design by the end of the month, officials said.

The memorial is set to open by the eighth anniversary of the attacks, in 2009.

The governor praised Sciame for conducting a "thoughtful and thorough process." He said the redesigned landmark "honors our heroes' lives, mourns their passing, provides solace to their loved ones and tells their story to the world."

House Bill Raises Disaster Fraud Penalties (AP)

By Jim Abrams

The AP, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Scammers hoping to finance tropical vacations or season tickets to football games with federal disaster funds may have second thoughts with House passage of legislation imposing sentences of up to 30 years for fraud related to disaster relief.

The legislation, approved by a voice vote Tuesday, was brought to the House floor a week after congressional investigators concluded that the Federal Emergency Management Agency was defrauded of up to $1.4 billion as it rushed to provide relief after last year's hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Congress provided more than $68 billion in relief to the Gulf Coast after those two storms, said House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis. "With such vast resources put into the pipeline so quickly, fraudsters and scam artists went into high gear in an effort to take advantage of these government programs."

The Government Accountability Office study that came out last week cited such examples as FEMA paying an individual $2,358 in rental assistance at the same time it was paying about $8,000 for the same person to stay 70 nights in a Hawaii hotel.

It said FEMA ended up paying for season pro football tickets, a one-week Caribbean vacation and a sex change procedure.

The legislation, which now goes to the Senate, imposes a fine of up to $1 million and prison terms of up to 30 years for wire, radio, television or mail fraud in connection with a presidentially declared major disaster or emergency. While current statutes on mail and wire fraud carry similar penalties, the maximum prison term for making false statement to the government is five years.

Sensenbrenner noted that since the formation of the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force, established by the attorney general last September, 261 people have been charged in 218 cases, with 44 guilty pleas or convictions.

"Despite these efforts, it is clear that current criminal penalties are insufficient to deter disaster fraud," he said.

Among those sentenced so far are a Galveston man given a year in prison for bilking FEMA of $2,000 by falsely claiming he had a home damaged in Louisiana and a Florida man given a 21-month sentence for falsely claiming he was flying relief missions to Louisiana and soliciting charitable donations.

Courts in Florida have also been trying cases related to an estimated $31 million in possible fraud arising from Hurricane Frances in 2004. Last year two Miami women pleaded guilty to fraud charges for collecting disaster aid for a storm that hit 100 miles to the north of them. One woman, who received nearly $25,000 for a sewer backup that occurred weeks before the hurricane, was given two months' house arrest, three years' probation and ordered to repay the government for the claim.

National Guard Arrives In New Orleans (AP)

By Cain Burdeau

The AP, June 21, 2006

NEW ORLEANS - Nine months after they rode to the rescue in the desperate aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, National Guardsmen carrying M-16s returned to the city Tuesday to reinforce a depleted police department and battle a surge in violence.

DOJ_NMG_0036482

The 100 or so soldiers will patrol the streets in ravaged neighborhoods left deserted by Katrina, freeing up police officers to concentrate on more heavily populated sections.

"We're just trying to give a hand to the city of New Orleans," said Lt. Melvin Edwards, 32, a member of 239th Military Police Company.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco sent in the National Guard at the mayor's request after a bloody weekend in which six people were killed.

"Criminals, hear me loud, hear me clearly: There is law and order in New Orleans," she said. "We will not let the criminals take root as our families return."

The troops, dressed in full camouflage fatigues, carried M-16s, handguns and belt clips of ammunition as they arrived in a convoy of 75 vehicles. They parked their Humvees and tanker trucks in formation in front of the Convention Center, drawing waves and thumbs-up from onlookers.

Up to 200 more Guardsmen will be sent in later, bringing the total in the city to 300. In addition, 60 state police officers were sent to help keep the peace.

As the soldiers arrived, New Orleans police were investigating another slaying, that of a 22-year-old man. The killing brought this year's murder toll to 54. That number is still less than the 81 recorded during the first four months of 2005. But New Orleans' population these days is less than half of what it was before Katrina.

The bloodshed has raised fears that violence is back on the rise in a city that was plagued by crime before Katrina drove out half its population of 465,000.

Community leaders are afraid the violence will discourage people from returning.

King Milling, a New Orleans banker, said he was "just delighted" by the troops' arrival. "The powers-that-be recognize that this is an issue that we must deal with," he said.

Many of the soldiers that arrived Tuesday were sent to New Orleans during Katrina, but they had not seen the city since those desperate days.

Sgt. Alfred Glasper of Baton Rouge looked for signs of appreciation as he steered a tan Humvee down Interstate 10 into the heart of the city.

"There you go," he said, pointing to a man stopped on the side of the highway and waving. "People down here didn't want us to leave - they felt very safe."

Later, the troops marched to an office building at the port of New Orleans, where they were briefed on their mission.

Guard Lt. Col. Pete Schneider said that patrols started later than scheduled because of a communications glitch, but that troops were on the ground as of Tuesday night.

"We were running late. We were a little anxious in getting out there," Schneider said.

Mayor Ray Nagin had asked for help from the National Guard and state police on Monday after five teenagers in an SUV were gunned down Saturday in the city's deadliest attack in at least 11 years. Police said it was apparently motivated by drugs or revenge. In a separate attack, a man was stabbed to death Sunday.

Capt. Alfred Travis, the company commander, said the Guard's mission was "still part of Katrina."

"We're in the disaster phase, and I think we may be in the disaster phase for a while, until the neighborhoods are built up again," Travis said.

The National Guard had as many as 15,000 soldiers in the city in the weeks after Katrina. As many as 2,000 stayed until February.

The police force is down to about 1,375 officers, compared with about 1,750 before Katrina.

"I think people are happy they're doing something," said Nathan Chapman, president of a neighborhood organization. "The most important thing is that we fix the problem, not pretend we don't have one."

But Cherie Kerr, who runs a Santa Ana., Calif., public-relations firm that specializes in crisis, said the move gives the impression that crime is out of hand.

"When you call in the National Guard, you're pretty much saying you're out of control," Kerr said.

Noel Scallan, executive assistant at a luxury French Quarter hotel, said calls poured in from people planning to attend a national library convention moments after it was announced that the National Guard would be sent in.

"They got panicky - 'What's going on? Is it OK?'" Scallan said. But there were no cancellations, he said.

But Bill Walker, general manager of a French-style manor on Bourbon Street, called the move "very positive," saying nothing would panic his guests more "than if the crime were to increase."

New Orleans Police Superintendent Warren J. Riley said Monday he had asked in March to have troops sent in this summer, when the population is expected to increase because FEMA assistance to displaced hurricane refugees ends June 30.

DOJ_NMG_0036483

Riley insisted his department is capable of controlling crime, saying: "This is not a situation where anything is out of control."

A Legacy Of The Storm: Depression And Suicide (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, June 20 — Sgt. Ben Glaudi, the commander of the Police Department's Mobile Crisis Unit here, spends much of each workday on this city's flood-ravaged streets trying to persuade people not to kill themselves.

Last Tuesday in the French Quarter, Sergeant Glaudi's small staff was challenged by a man who strode straight into the roaring currents of the Mississippi River, hoping to drown. As the water threatened to suck him under, the man used the last of his strength to fight the rescuers, refusing to be saved.

"He said he'd lost everything and didn't want to live anymore," Sergeant Glaudi said.

The man was counseled by the crisis unit after being pulled from the river against his will. Others have not been so lucky.

"These things come at me fast and furious," Sergeant Glaudi said. "People are just not able to handle the situation here."

New Orleans is experiencing what appears to be a near epidemic of depression and post-traumatic stress disorders, one that mental health experts say is of an intensity rarely seen in this country. It is contributing to a suicide rate that state and local officials describe as close to triple what it was before Hurricane Katrina struck and the levees broke 10 months ago.

Compounding the challenge, the local mental health system has suffered a near total collapse, heaping a great deal of the work to be done with emotionally disturbed residents onto the Police Department and people like Sergeant Glaudi, who has sharp crisis management skills but no medical background. He says his unit handles 150 to 180 such distress calls a month.

Dr. Jeffrey Rouse, the deputy New Orleans coroner dealing with psychiatric cases, said the suicide rate in the city was less than nine a year per 100,000 residents before the storm and increased to an annualized rate of more than 26 per 100,000 in the four months afterward, to the end of 2005.

While there have been 12 deaths officially classified as suicides so far this year, Dr. Rouse and Dr. Kathleen Crapanzano, director of the Louisiana Office of Mental Health, said the real number was almost certainly far higher, with many self-inflicted deaths remaining officially unclassified or wrongly described as accidents.

Charles G. Curie, the administrator of the federal Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, said the scope of the disaster that the hurricane inflicted had been "unprecedented," and added, "We've had great concerns about the level of substance abuse and mental health needs being at levels we had not seen before."

This is a city where thousands of people are living amid ruins that stretch for miles on end, where the vibrancy of life can be found only along the slivers of land next to the Mississippi. Garbage is piled up, the crime rate has soared, and as of Tuesday the National Guard and the state police were back in the city, patrolling streets that the Police Department has admitted it cannot handle on its own. The reminders of death are everywhere, and the emotional toll is now becoming clear.

Gina Barbe rode out the storm at her mother's house near Lake Pontchartrain, and says she has been crying almost every day since.

"I thought I could weather the storm, and I did — it's the aftermath that's killing me," said Ms. Barbe, who worked in tourism sales before the disaster. "When I'm driving through the city, I have to pull to the side of the street and sob. I can't drive around this city without crying."

Many people who are not at serious risk of suicide are nonetheless seeing their lives eroded by low-grade but persistent feelings of sadness, hopelessness and stress-related illnesses, doctors and researchers say. All this goes beyond the effects of 9/11 and the Oklahoma City bombing, Mr. Curie said. Beyond those of Hurricanes Andrew, Hugo and Ivan.

"We've been engaged much longer and with much more intensity in this disaster than in previous disasters," he said.

At the end of each day, Sergeant Glaudi returns to his own wrecked neighborhood and sleeps in a government-issued trailer outside what used to be home.

"You ride around and all you see is debris, debris, debris," he said.

And that is a major part of the problem, experts agree: the people of New Orleans are traumatized again every time they look around.

"This is a trauma that didn't last 24 hours, then go away," said Dr. Crapanzano, the Louisiana mental health official. "It goes on and on."

"If I could do anything," said Dr. Howard J. Osofsky, the chairman of the psychiatry department at Louisiana State University, "it would be to have a quicker pace of recovery for the community at large. The mental health needs are related to this."

DOJ_NMG_0036484

The state estimates that the city has lost more than half its psychiatrists, social workers, psychologists and other mental health workers, many of whom relocated after the storm. And according to the Louisiana Hospital Association, there are little more than 60 hospital beds for psychiatric patients in the seven hospitals that remain open here.

Because of a lack of mental heath clinics and related services, severely disturbed patients end up in hospital emergency rooms, where they often languish. Many poorer patients were dependent on a large public institution, Charity Hospital, but it has been closed since the storm despite the protests of many medical professionals who say the building is in good condition. Big Charity, as the locals called it, had room for 100 psychiatric patients and could have used more capacity.

"When you don't have a place to send that wandering schizophrenic directing traffic, guess what? Law enforcement is going to wind up taking care of that," said Dr. Rouse, the deputy coroner. "When the Police Department is forced to do the job of the mental health system, it's a lose-lose situation for everyone."

"When the family comes to see me at the coroner's office," he added, "it's a defeat. The state has a moral obligation to reinstitute this care."

Sergeant Glaudi and others said some people struggling with emotional issues had no prior history of mental illness or depression.

The symptoms cut across economic and racial lines; life in New Orleans is difficult and inconvenient for everyone.

Susan Howell, a political scientist at the University of New Orleans, conducted a recent study with researchers from Louisiana State to see how people were coping with everyday life in the city and neighboring Jefferson Parish. Ms. Howell managed a similar survey in 2003.

"The symptoms of depression have, at minimum, doubled since Katrina," she said. "These are classic post-trauma symptoms. People can't sleep, they're irritable, feeling that everything's an effort and sad."

The new survey was conducted in March and April, and canvassed 470 respondents who were living in houses or apartments. Since they were not living in government-issued trailers, it is likely that they were among the more fortunate.

Jennifer Lindsley, a gallery owner, also feels the sting of missing her friends.

"When you can't get ahold of people you used to know, it leaves you feeling kind of empty," Ms. Lindsley said. "When you try to explain it to people in other cities, they say: 'The whole world is over it, so you've got to get over it. Sorry that happened, but too bad. Move on.' "

Some people have decided to leave solely because of the mood of the city.

"I'm really aware of the air of mild depression that pervades this entire area," said Gayle Falgoust, a retired teacher. "I'm leaving after this month. I worry about living with this level of depression all the time. I worry that it might affect my health. I know the move will improve my mood."

The New Orleans Muddle (NYT)

The New York Times (editorial), June 21, 2006

It has been almost 10 months since Hurricane Katrina battered the Gulf Coast, and there is still no redevelopment plan for New Orleans. Congress has passed the emergency relief bill, and President Bush has signed it into law. Billions of dollars are headed the city's way. Leaders in New Orleans and in the state capital of Baton Rouge will have only one chance to get it right. There are no more excuses for local officials, no more pointing toward Washington. It is time for southeastern Louisiana to rebuild itself.

Yet Adam Nossiter reported this week in The Times that it will be six months before a "master planning document" answers the questions foremost in the minds of residents, like which neighborhoods will return, where rebuilding will be encouraged and where returning residents will have to make do without city services. That is totally unacceptable.

In large swaths of the city, houses still sit empty, block after block. In many places, trash and flood-ruined automobiles have yet to be cleared away. These wastelands provide hideouts for criminals, the perfect breeding ground for the kind of violence that erupted over the weekend when five teenagers were shot and killed. If the city's open wounds are left to fester, it will begin to rot from the inside.

The city's police department is close to its prehurricane size, protecting a population that is less than half of what it was before the storm. Yet Mayor Ray Nagin has now felt compelled to request — and the governor has granted — a National Guard force to help keep the peace. This does not bolster our confidence that the city will be able to govern itself.

New Orleans has its own way of doing things and says it doesn't want to be told by outsiders in what size and shape it should be reborn. That is fair enough, but only if local officials are living up to their responsibilities. Right now, the people of the city are being held hostage to whims and foot-dragging, their lives on hold as they wait for their leaders to make decisions — decisions that should have been made months ago.

If there is one individual who needs to step up more than any other, it is Mayor Nagin. His city needs a leader more than a politician in this difficult time. Now that Mr. Nagin has been re-elected, it is time to start spending the political capital his victory earned him. His legacy will not rest on how many people like him, but on the effectiveness of the reconstruction and the safety and well-being of residents in the years to come.

New Orleans needs its mayor to speak difficult truths — like telling the residents of a vulnerable block that they will have to rebuild on safer ground. Right now, people don't know if or where to build their new walls. They deserve answers. They have waited long enough.

WAR NEWS:

Senate Democrats Offer Competing Iraq Proposals (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - Democrats, searching for a unified stance on Iraq, will kick off a Senate debate Wednesday over competing troop-withdrawal proposals that reflect mixed public opinions about the war.

One proposal, offered by Democratic Sens. John Kerry of Massachusetts and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, would set a hard pullout deadline of July 2007. A more broadly backed bill, proposed by Democratic Sens. Carl Levin of Michigan and Jack Reed of Rhode Island, calls for troops to begin moving out of Iraq this year, but sets no timetable for final withdrawal.

Though the measures were designed to distinguish Democrats from Republicans on the dominant issue of the day as November's congressional elections near, they also exposed Democratic divisions on the war. Some top Republicans dismissed both proposals as "cut and run" policies and evidence of Democratic incoherence on Iraq.

Senate Republican leader Bill Frist of Tennessee equated the Democratic proposals to surrender.

"We cannot retreat. We cannot surrender. We cannot go wobbly," he said. "The price is far too high."

But at least one Republican senator praised Levin and Reed.

"Levin-Reed starts to get to the real core of responsible policy-making," Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., said in an interview. "It's a very thoughtful presentation. The Levin-Reed amendment is not a cut-and-run."

Levin said he declined to set a specific time for a pullout because it would be "arbitrary" and "precipitous."

Kerry has argued that the Bush administration needs to set a timetable to prod the Iraqi government to take control. Without deadlines, he's said, Iraq will continue to rely on the U.S. military for security.

Levin downplayed the differences between the Democratic proposals.

"The differences between where most Democrats are and where nearly all Republicans are are much greater than any differences among Democrats," he said.

The competing plans were the subject of the Democrats' regular closed-door Tuesday luncheon in the Capitol, which they described as spirited and earnest.

"It's desirable if we could be unified, but there are strong points of view," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., who's backing Levin's proposal.

The Levin-Reed proposal also has the support of Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada. His spokesman, Jim Manley, predicted that it would draw 37 to 38 Democratic votes and some Republicans as well.

Kerry had earlier proposed a measure to withdraw from Iraq by the end of this year. When Republicans put that idea to a vote last week, it failed 93-6. Kerry said that by extending that deadline six months he'd gained some votes.

The debate comes as a new poll by the Pew Research Center recorded conflicting views from the American public on the war. The poll, conducted June 14-19, found growing optimism, with 53 percent of respondents saying they thought the military effort was going "at least fairly well." That's an improvement over April, when only 47 percent held that view.

At the same time, 52 percent wanted a timetable for withdrawing troops.

Frist Decries Proposals For Withdrawal (USAT)

USA Today, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist declared Tuesday that “surrendering is not a solution” in Iraq as Democrats embraced a proposal to start troop withdrawals this year, setting up an election-year showdown in the Senate.

“We cannot retreat. We cannot surrender. We cannot go wobbly,” Frist said, suggesting Democrats want to do that.

Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the second-ranking Democrat in the Senate, disputed the characterization of the Democrats' position. “We have to serve notice on the Iraqis that their future has to be in their own hands,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0036486

Democrats prepared to introduce a non-binding resolution on Iraq that calls for redeployments to begin this year but does not set a firm deadline by which all forces must be out of the war zone. The Senate was expected to take up and vote on the resolution today.

The Senate also is to consider a separate proposal by Sens. John Kerry, D-Mass., and Russ Feingold, D-Wis., that would require all combat troops to be withdrawn from Iraq by July 1, 2007.

Troop 'Redeployment' Sought By Democrats (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

Democrats said yesterday that the United States must start "redeploying" troops from Iraq, calling the recovery of the mutilated bodies of two U.S. soldiers a "grim reminder" of why withdrawal should begin soon.

Republican leaders called the proposal for withdrawal a "cut and run" that would embolden terrorists.

The Senate is expected to spend at least five hours today debating two competing Democratic proposals to start pulling U.S. combat troops out of Iraq.

The killings are "a grim reminder of the price we're paying for a failed policy in Iraq," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the Democratic whip. "It's time for Iraqis to stand up. When will this end?"

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said withdrawing troops would be a "dishonor of historic proportions."

"The Iraqi people want us and need us to help them. If we break our promise and cut and run, as some would have us do, the implications could be catastrophic," the Tennessee Republican said. "Surrendering is not a solution. We cannot go wobbly. The price is too high."

Last night, in a speech at the Hyatt Regency Washington to Republican volunteers, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said, "Republicans unite on the need to stay on the offense to confront terrorists; Democrats are having a debate in their party."

He characterized the Democratic debate as some "say we need to cut and run; some people say we need to walk ... and other people say we need to jog."

The comments come as lawmakers embark on a second week of debating Iraq policy, this time in the form of the Senate's defense authorization bill.

Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat and ranking member on the Armed Services Committee, and Sen. Jack Reed, Rhode Island Democrat, have sponsored an amendment that calls for "phased redeployment" to begin by Dec. 31. The nonbinding amendment would require the Bush administration to submit a schedule for continued troop withdrawal.

Democratic Sens. John Kerry of Massachusetts and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin have a binding amendment calling for all combat troops to be redeployed by July 1, 2007. A similar measure offered last week was overwhelmingly defeated in the Senate.

Mr. Kerry and Mr. Feingold -- potential presidential candidates in 2008 -- sent a joint e-mail to Mr. Kerry's 2004 campaign supporters saying that withdrawal will lead to a more effective war on terror.

"Our troops have served valiantly in Iraq," the senators said. "Now, it's time to put the future of Iraq where it belongs: in the hands of the Iraqi people and their leaders."

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid said Democrats agree that there "should be a redeployment starting sooner rather than later," and downplayed the difference between the Levin and Kerry amendments.

"Even though we have at least two positions, I think if you look at them closely, they are both basically the same: that there should be redeployment of troops. It's a question of when," the Nevada Democrat said.

Mr. Levin and Mr. Reed insisted yesterday that their amendment is not "cutting and running," and that it sets no pace or speed for combat troops to leave Iraq.

Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, disagreed. "I don't support it. I strongly believe it's not when we leave, it's how we leave," he said.

Either amendment would need 51 votes to become attached to the defense authorization bill. It is unlikely that enough Republicans will join the about 40 Democrats expected to vote for the Levin amendment. Fewer Democrats are expected to back the Kerry amendment because it fixes a date for complete withdrawal from Iraq.

National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley told reporters on Air Force One yesterday that Iraqis are eager to assume responsibility for their nation's security. "Their concern is that we will move, draw down our forces too quickly, before they're ready," he said.

The Senate last year passed a resolution declaring that 2006 would be a year of "significant transition" in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0036487

Last week, House lawmakers voted 256-153 to reject a timetable for troop withdrawal and approved a nonbinding resolution that affirms the Bush administration's Iraq policy.

The 10 hours of House debate and expected five hours of Senate debate are the most significant discussion of Iraq policy since the war began in March 2003. More than 2,500 troops have been killed in the war.

The Senate yesterday voted 79-19 to pass a nonbinding amendment saying Iraq should not grant amnesty to terrorists who attack, kill or wound U.S. troops, responding to a newspaper report that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was considering limited pardons for militants who lay down arms. Senators also voted 64-34 to approve a measure saying Congress recognizes Iraq as a sovereign nation.

Democrats Divided On Withdrawal Of Troops (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

While congressional Republicans continued to show almost unanimous support for President Bush's handling of the Iraq war, Democrats struggled for consensus yesterday, reflecting what some of them called the public's mixed feelings about the three-year-old conflict.

After a sometimes heated closed-door meeting, Senate Democrats postponed action on two proposals related to drawdowns of U.S. troops in Iraq. One would direct Bush to bring nearly all the troops home within 13 months. The other would urge him to begin an unspecified withdrawal by the end of this year.

Debate and votes on the two measures are likely to be held today and tomorrow, with Senate Republicans happy to clear the way for Democrats to showcase their divisions. Senators predicted that few, if any, Republicans will embrace the Democrats' proposals, mirroring the nearly unanimous support House Republicans displayed last week for Bush's policies.

The Senate Democrats' weekly closed luncheon was unusually spirited, participants said, because the discussion focused entirely on Iraq, particularly Sen. John F. Kerry's proposal to order Bush to remove the troops by July 31, 2007. When the 90-minute session ended, only a handful of Democrats appeared to be leaning toward supporting Kerry (Mass.), but he vowed to push the amendment today.

Some Democrats said their party's divisions are hardly surprising in light of polls showing that many Americans oppose the war but do not want to leave Iraq amid such chaos that it is a breeding ground for terrorism.

"The American people have mixed feelings about Iraq -- where we are, where we're going there," Sen. Mark Pryor (Ark.) said as he left the meeting. "The American people really understand that it's a complicated situation."

The Democrats' chief alternative to Kerry's proposal is sponsored by Sens. Carl M. Levin (Mich.) and Jack Reed (R.I.). Their nonbinding resolution urges Bush to begin "redeploying" troops from Iraq by Dec. 31, but it sets no deadline for a full withdrawal.

Kerry, Levin and Reed say Iraqis must understand that the U.S. military presence in their country is not open-ended and that Iraqis therefore should step up efforts to train and equip their police and army. Backers of the Levin-Reed plan say that a firm deadline for a full withdrawal could imperil Iraq's government if its security forces are not ready to impose stability.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) said yesterday that he would support both measures. "This war has been a costly, tragic mistake that has not made us more secure," he said. "We need to send the signal to all concerned that it's time for Iraqis to take responsibility for running Iraq and for our troops to come home."

GOP leaders took obvious pleasure in the Democrats' disarray, issuing a stream of press releases with headlines such as, "Democrats Divided On The Meaning Of Their Own Amendments."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), speaking of the Democratic proposals, said: "The Iraqi people want and need us to help them. If we don't -- if we break our promise and cut and run as some would have us do -- the implications could be catastrophic."

Some Democrats, however, said congressional Republicans are misreading the public and the situation in Iraq. "Republicans are unified with Bush in an absolutely disastrous, calamitous policy," Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.) said in an interview. Biden, who has traveled to Iraq several times, said he did not support Kerry's proposal but agrees that the United States must send Baghdad a strong signal to purge sectarian killers from its security forces and bring more Sunnis into the circles of power.

Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) acknowledged his party's divisions over Iraq but played down the significance. "One thing Democrats agree on is this war has taken too long, it's too expensive and costs too many lives and too many soldiers injured," he told reporters. "We all agree there should be a change in the course of the war. We all agree that there should be redeployment starting sooner rather than later."

On Iraq, Kerry Again Leaves Democrats Fuming (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 20 — When Senator John Kerry was their presidential nominee in 2004, Democrats fervently wished he would express himself firmly about the Iraq war.

Mr. Kerry has found his resolve. But it has not made his fellow Democrats any happier. They fear the latest evolution of Mr. Kerry's views on Iraq may now complicate their hopes of taking back a majority in Congress in 2006.

As the Senate prepared for what promises to be a sharp debate starting on Wednesday about whether to begin pulling troops from Iraq, the Democratic leadership wants its members to rally behind a proposal that calls for some troops to move out by the end of this year but does not set a fixed date for complete withdrawal. Mr. Kerry has insisted on setting a date, for American combat troops to pull out in 12 months, saying anything less is too cautious.

In drawing up a schedule for the Wednesday session, the Democratic leadership has arranged for its plan to be debated first, pushing Mr. Kerry and his proposal into the evening, too late for the nightly television news, to starve it of some attention.

Senate Democrats have been loath to express their opinions publicly, determined to emphasize a united front. But interviews suggest a frustration with Mr. Kerry, never popular among the caucus, and still unpopular among many Democrats for failing to defeat a president they considered vulnerable. Privately, some of his Democratic peers complain that he is too focused on the next presidential campaign.

Mr. Kerry now describes the war in Iraq as a mistake, even though he once supported it. His critics say they believe the new stand reflects more politics than principle, and ignores other Democrats' concern that setting a fixed date will leave those in tough re-election fights open to Republican taunts that they are "cutting and running" in Iraq.

The Democrats' exasperation has increased in the last week, as they postponed a vote on Mr. Kerry's amendment to try to fashion a broader consensus among themselves. Democrats up for re-election asked him not to propose a fixed date. But Mr. Kerry, several Democrats said, was unwilling to budge from that idea, even though his co-sponsor, Senator Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, seemed willing to compromise for the sake of consensus. In the end, Mr. Kerry agreed only to extend his deadline, from Dec. 31 of this year to July 2007.

Mr. Kerry's insistence on pushing ahead with his own plan has left the Democrats divided, and open to renewed Republican accusations that they are indecisive and weak — the same ridicule that Republicans heaped on Mr. Kerry in 2004, when his "I was for it before I was against it" statement about a vote on money for the war became a punch line.

"There are certain Democrats who think that this is over, that we've lost or that there's nothing constructive the president is going to do," said Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, who, like Mr. Kerry, is considering running for president and who sat in on the meetings where Democrats searched for consensus. "What it really is, in fairness to them, is a frustration that they see no learning curve on the part of this administration. I can understand that frustration. But setting a date is not a plan."

Stepping into an elevator on Capitol Hill late last week, Mr. Kerry was asked whether he was under pressure in the Democrats' meetings to withdraw his proposal. As he insisted he was not, Senator Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, standing behind him, raised his eyebrows, then winked.

In an interview, Mr. Dodd, who is also considering a presidential run, said one danger in the November election was in making Democrats look indecisive. "If the argument comes down to, Is it one year or 18 months, I think we're going to confuse people," he said. "I'm not sure what the value is; I think it hurts us rather than helps."

Polls suggest many Americans are eager to see American troops come home from Iraq but are uneasy about leaving too soon. The rival Democratic approaches may reflect that tension, with Mr. Kerry appealing to those who regard the war as a mistake, while the Democratic leaders reflect more caution.

Matt Bennett, a spokesman for Third Way, a group of moderate Democrats, said his organization preferred an approach that did not set a date, proposed by Senators Carl Levin of Michigan and Jack Reed of Rhode Island. Of Mr. Kerry's stance, Mr. Bennett said: "He feels like he needs to sharpen his position. But voters can sense when you're being resolute for convenience sake, or for political advantage."

Some Democrats felt Mr. Kerry allowed Republicans to embarrass them in a vote last week, when the Republicans embraced Mr. Kerry's proposal, certain it would be defeated and allow them to declare themselves the party of unity and strength.

In a telephone interview on Tuesday, Mr. Kerry characterized his statement as the position of strength, and said Democrats had made a mistake not to take a firm stand.

DOJ_NMG_0036489

"The Democrats need to be strong and stand up with a clear articulation about how we make the United States stronger," he said. "As far as I'm concerned, we should go right at Karl Rove and his phony tough talk that is calculated purely for the election and not for a successful strategy in Iraq."

"I'm doing what I think is the right thing to do as a policy matter," he said, "for our troops and for the country. Someone else will deal with politics."

Mr. Kerry said he did not want to analyze his campaign mistakes but insisted he had been firm. "What's clear is that I said that it was the wrong war, wrong place, wrong time," he said. "I couldn't have been clearer about the president mishandling the war."

The Democrats tried to minimize their differences. Mr. Levin said differences among Democrats were not as big as the differences between Democrats and Republicans.

"One thing the Democrats agree on is that this war has taken too long, is too expensive and has cost too many lives," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the minority leader.

Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democrats' effort to take control of the Senate, minimized the effect the vote would have in November.

"The public and the voters are looking at how George Bush handles Iraq," he said. "They know that he got us in there, they know he's the commander in chief, and they don't believe he has figured out a strategy that will show light at the end of the tunnel. That is the overriding issue in the election, far more than what Democrats are doing."

Mr. Feingold, Mr. Kerry's co-sponsor, said: "There should be no political considerations, there should be only considerations for the security of the American people. I believe the American people, even in conservative states, are willing to see this end."

He said that a year ago he was the only senator calling for a withdrawal. "This is building," he said. "The American people are actually way ahead of the Senate on this."

Although Mr. Kerry's approach is to be debated last, the Democratic leadership has arranged that it be voted on first, before the Levin-Reed proposal. In the interview, Mr. Kerry said that if his amendment failed, he might consider voting for the alternative "as a means of making some statement." But, he said, "My preference is, we take some strong position that's got a date."

Possible White House Hopefuls Unite On Iraq (AP-Y2)

By Liz Sidoti

AP2, June 21, 2006

Two potential 2008 presidential candidates appealed Tuesday for the Senate to support their call to withdraw U.S. combat troops from Iraq "by a hard and fast deadline," a position putting them at odds with most of their fellow Democrats.

"Our country desperately needs a new vision for strengthening our national security, and it starts by redeploying U.S. forces out of Iraq," Sens. John Kerry of Massachusetts and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin wrote in an e-mail sent to 3 million people nationwide.

"It's time for every member of the Senate to send an important message that we must change course," the senators wrote, imploring recipients to "take a stand against the senseless 'stay the course' Bush policy" and tell their senators to vote with the two Democrats.

In what promises to be a highly partisan election-year showdown Wednesday, the GOP-controlled Senate plans to take up the proposal by Kerry and Feingold that would require the Bush administration to withdraw all combat troops from Iraq by July 1, 2007. Redeployment would begin immediately, under the proposal.

At least six other Democrats have publicly or privately indicated support for that position in recent days. The Senate will vote on the proposal by week's end.

The Senate also will consider, and eventually vote on, a separate nonbinding resolution that has the backing of Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and, his aides say, a majority of Democrats.

It would call for — but not require — the administration to begin "a phased redeployment of U.S. forces" this year, and would not set a firm deadline by which time all forces must be out of the war zone.

Seeking support, Democratic sponsors of both proposals pitched their positions during the party's weekly policy luncheon on Tuesday. However, neither proposal is expected to win enough votes to be attached as an amendment to an annual military measure pending in the Senate.

Both proposals, nonetheless, are drawing ridicule from Republicans, who lumped Democrats into two groups — what they called the "cut and run" crowd backing the Kerry-Feingold position and the "cut and jog" folks supporting the other proposal.

DOJ_NMG_0036490

"We cannot retreat. We cannot surrender. We cannot go wobbly. The price is far too high," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said Tuesday, suggesting Democrats want to do just that.

Sen. Carl Levin (news, bio, voting record) of Michigan, the top Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, disputed the GOP characterization of the resolution that would call for U.S. troops to start leaving Iraq this year.

"It's not a cut-and-run strategy. It does not set a fixed timetable or an arbitrary deadline for the redeployment of our troops," he said. "We believe it represents where a majority of our caucus is."

With midterm elections less than five months away, Republicans are working to highlight divisions in the Democratic Party on Iraq as they seek to hang onto control of the House and Senate when polls show the public favoring a power shift to Democrats.

A week ago, the GOP-controlled Senate and House engineered back-to-back votes on Iraq that forced lawmakers in both parties to go on record on the war that polls show most Americans no longer support amid a rising U.S. death toll and a soaring price tag. In the end, both chambers of Congress soundly rejected timetables for pulling U.S. forces out of Iraq.

Across the Capitol on Tuesday, the House easily approved an additional $50 billion for Iraq and Afghanistan as part of a $427 billion measure funding the Pentagon budget for the fiscal year beginning Oct. 1. The money comes on top of $66 billion for Iraq and Afghanistan approved just last week. The vote was 407-19.

Led by Levin, Senate Democrats have spent the past week writing a proposal on Iraq that could get wide support among their rank and file. At the same time, Kerry and Feingold announced they would press their own separate proposals calling for a quick U.S. withdrawal from Iraq.

A somewhat curious pairing, the two joined forces — and offered one amendment — after failing in private meetings to convince fellow Democrats that the so-called "consensus" proposal should include what they call "a date certain" for all U.S. forces to have left Iraq.

Feingold was the first Democratic senator to call for a withdrawal timetable, but his position has been overshadowed by Kerry, who has a stronger national profile because of his status as the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee.

Both are posturing for possible presidential runs in 2008, and their positions on Iraq play well with the liberal wing of the party — the Democratic faithful who will vote for the next Democratic presidential nominee.

Iraq, Unfiltered (NYT)

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

Bush administration supporters regularly accuse the news media of reporting only bad news from Iraq and filtering out more positive stories. But just hours before American television screens began to be filled with upbeat clips of President Bush's surprise trip to Baghdad last week, the United States Embassy there cabled back a far grimmer picture of the mounting difficulties faced by its Iraqi employees.

The cable, reprinted by The Washington Post, told of embassy employees running a daily gantlet of religious dress-code enforcers and harassment by militia-style security guards — even at checkpoints surrounding the fortified Green Zone, where the embassy is located. When the Iraqi employees return to their homes, they face sweltering neighborhoods without regular electric power, daylong gasoline lines, and families torn by religious and ethnic tensions and mounting fears for the future.

The cable relays a report from an Arab editor that "ethnic cleansing" is going on "in almost every Iraqi" province. The embassy itself suspects that Shiite governmental authorities in Baghdad may be deliberately evicting Kurdish households in response to Kurdish evictions of Arabs in other parts of the country. A Sunni woman employee reports that "most of her family believes that the U.S. — which is widely perceived as fully controlling the country and tolerating the malaise — is punishing populations as Saddam did."

The cable is only a raw snapshot of the daily experiences of embassy employees, not a systematic nationwide survey. Yet embassy employees are in many ways better off than most Iraqis. At least they have jobs and someone to turn to for help. We can only guess what daily life must be like in besieged Sunni cities like Ramadi or the militia-ruled Shiite towns of the Basra area, some now too dangerous for reporters to venture into regularly.

Mr. Bush's six-hour visit to Baghdad was mostly spent inside the Green Zone, where he made much of what he had been able to learn from looking Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki "in the eyes." Now that he's home, Mr. Bush needs to take a hard, unfiltered look at the more disturbing picture relayed by America's embassy.

Pentagon Picks Troops For Iraq, Maintaining Current Contingent (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036491

WASHINGTON, June 20 —The Pentagon announced Tuesday that it planned to send 21,000 troops to Iraq in the next rotation of forces. That would keep the American presence at current levels into next year, unless the security situation improved.

Senior military officials said that the announcement of units to be deployed between August and January could change, depending on conditions in Iraq, and that so-called off ramps for the troops bound for Iraq were still under discussion.

Bryan G. Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman, said after the announcement, "One should not read into this a decision" about long-term troop levels in Iraq.

But at a minimum, the announcement represents a decision that for planning purposes at least, American troops in Iraq would be replaced on a one-for-one basis for now.

This week, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the senior American commander in Iraq, is to brief Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon on his newest thinking about force levels through the end of the year.

Although a discussion of potential troop reductions is certain during General Casey's meeting with Mr. Rumsfeld, the White House and the Pentagon have rejected calls, mostly from Democrats in Congress, for setting formal timetables for withdrawing from Iraq.

President Bush and Mr. Rumsfeld have said repeatedly that troop levels would be based on assessments from military commanders on the strength of the insurgency and on the capability of Iraqi troops to take over the fight.

Even so, White House officials expressed hopes last fall that reductions would come this summer, so that Republicans preparing for mid-term Congressional elections could point to progress in Iraq.

General Casey himself had said he would make recommendations on future troop numbers by the end of spring. Ground commanders in Iraq have argued that a premature decision to reduce American troops could jeopardize the mission in Iraq.

Previous predictions that American troops could drop to 100,000 by the end of the year were based on the expectation that the Iraqis would form a new government by March.

But the new government did not form until May, and important posts, including the top security positions, were not filled until earlier this month.

American troop numbers in Iraq fluctuate almost daily, as soldiers flow in and out of the country.

Troop levels early this month of 132,000 had dropped to 127,000 last week, military officials said.

Even if the number of combat brigades sent to Iraq drops over coming months, the separate requirements for support and service troops — military trainers, intelligence officers and logisticians, for example — may offset some reductions in American combat forces.

Pentagon and military planners said Tuesday's announcement was somewhat of a mechanical requirement, and was an attempt to balance a traditional tension between combat commanders who deploy troops in the field and commanders at home who provide those forces.

Field commanders want maximum flexibility in deciding whether and when to increase or decrease troop levels; commanders at home desire precise, early decisions in order to prepare equipment, troops and family members in advance of a deployment.

Pentagon and military officials predicted that General Casey's visit to Washington this week would include discussions of ways to reduce troop numbers by holding back deployments to Iraq if the situation allowed.

"They are prudently planning as if this would be a rotation in kind," said one Defense Department official who was granted anonymity to describe classified discussions on troop numbers.

"But obviously they've got six months' worth of flexibility in the case of some of these units put in the queue today, since some would not deploy until January and could be off-ramped" before their departure dates.

In its announcement of the planned deployment, the Pentagon said: "The U.S. force rotations may be tailored based upon changes in the security situation. Iraqi security forces continue to develop capability and assume responsibility for security in Iraq."

The units identified for the next rotation to Iraq include the III Corps headquarters, based at Fort Hood, Tex.; the II Marine Expeditionary Force, from Camp Lejeune, N.C.; and the First Cavalry Division headquarters, from Fort Hood.

Other units were the Second and Third Brigades of the First Cavalry Division; the Fourth Brigade of the 25th Infantry Division, based at Fort Richardson, Alaska; and the Second Brigade of the Second Infantry Division, from Fort Carson, Colo.

Australia To Review Iraq Troop Levels (AP)

By Meraiah Foley, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 21, 2006

Australia will review its troop deployment to Iraq by the end of this year, the defense ministry said Wednesday, the first time the government has hinted at a possible timeline for eventual withdrawal.

DOJ_NMG_0036492

Australia, a staunch U.S. ally, has around 1,320 troops in Iraq and the Middle East, including 460 troops guarding Japanese reconstruction efforts in Iraq's southern Muthana province.

Earlier this week, the Iraqi government announced that Australian and British forces would soon hand over security in the province to Iraqi forces.

Japan's announced Tuesday that it would immediately start pulling its ground troops from Iraq.

Australia's 460 troops in Muthana province will be transferred to an air base in Tallil, about 60 miles southeast of their current posting in Samawah, when Japan withdraws, Defense Minister Brendan Nelson said.

He said Australia would evaluate the success of the Iraqi forces in protecting Muthana province before reassessing its military presence in Iraq.

"I can assure you that the next six months in al-Muthana is going to be extremely important for our future involvement in Iraq," Nelson told the Channel Seven television network.

"If we can see that the provincial Iraqi government in al-Muthana can successfully manage its own affairs and its own security then I would expect that by the end of this year we would be starting to think about our future deployment."

Australia's conservative Prime Minister John Howard sent around 2,000 troops to Iraq in support of the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, despite widespread public opposition. He has repeatedly said that Australia will remain in Iraq for as long as its troops are needed, or until the Iraqi government asks them to withdraw.

Japan To Pull Ground Troops Out Of Iraq, Koizumi Says (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

TOKYO, June 20 — Japan announced Tuesday that it would start pulling its ground troops out of Iraq, putting an end to the country's most significant military mission since the end of World War II.

Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi said the force's mission had been "fulfilled," even as he announced an expansion of Japanese air support to American and multinational troops. Japan's air force will start operating regular flights to Baghdad and Erbil, he said.

"The Ground Self-Defense Force has played a considerable role in providing humanitarian reconstruction assistance, and we have decided to withdraw," Mr. Koizumi said in a news conference.

About 600 ground troops have been based in Samawa, the capital of the southern province of Muthanna, since January 2004, providing clean water, medical assistance and repair of roads and buildings. Japanese troops, who have been limited to noncombat duties because of Japan's pacifist Constitution, have depended on other nations for their security.

The announcement came a day after the Iraqi government said British troops would transfer the responsibility for security in the relatively peaceful province to local Iraqi forces. The Japanese withdrawal is expected to take a few weeks.

Mr. Koizumi has been one of President Bush's staunchest backers in Iraq, and the Japanese troops have provided diplomatic support for Mr. Bush as other allies chose not to participate in the Iraqi occupation. The deployment helped strengthen the alliance and deepen military ties.

The country's Constitution allows Japan to possess forces only for self-defense, and imposes strict rules of engagement prohibiting offensive action. But under Mr. Koizumi, the Japanese government passed a special law permitting the deployment of troops to noncombat areas in Iraq — a move that critics called anti-constitutional

The deployment at first sharply divided Japanese public opinion, as the Japanese troops went to Iraq equipped with weapons that they had never carried abroad before, including antitank weapons.

Since the Sept. 11 attacks, Japan's maritime and air forces have supported the United States in its wars in Afghanistan and Iraq. But the deployment of ground troops, with the possibility that they could be embroiled in a situation that would force them to act in a manner against the pacifist Constitution, amounted to one of the riskiest decisions Mr. Koizumi has made as prime minister.

In Samawa, the deteriorating security situation sometimes left Japanese troops unable to leave their base — and open to charges that they were merely a symbolic force.

But with time, Japanese public opinion has grown less resistant. The dispatch has also set the stage for a more assertive Japanese military, including the transformation of its Self-Defense Agency into a ministry.

U.S. Soldiers' Bodies Are Found (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036493

Baghdad, Iraq — As the mutilated bodies of two American soldiers were flown to the United States in flag-draped coffins Tuesday night, the U.S. military launched a top-level investigation to determine why their vehicle had been traveling alone outside a fortified army camp when they were abducted.

A group affiliated with al-Qaida in Iraq took responsibility for killing the servicemen, whose corpses were found near an electrical plant in Yousifiya, where they had gone missing Friday night.

Iraqi and U.S. military officials said there were signs of torture on the bodies. "They were killed in a barbaric way," said Iraqi Maj. Gen. Abdul-Aziz Mohammed of the Iraqi Defense Ministry.

U.S. Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV confirmed the bodies were believed to be the remains of Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore. Caldwell said the military would conduct a complete autopsy to determine the cause of death and to "do DNA testing to confirm that it is in fact them."

A third soldier, identified as Spc. David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass. died in a firefight that preceded the abduction. All three soldiers were assigned to the 1st Battalion, 502nd Infantry Regiment, 2nd Brigade of the U.S. Army's 101st Airborne Division and were guarding a canal bridge near their military camp.

The circumstances of the initial attack remain mysterious. In a country where military vehicles -- even the most heavily armed and impervious tanks -- rarely leave fortified areas unless they are traveling in pairs, Caldwell confirmed Tuesday that the servicemen were alone.

"We know that there was a single vehicle with three American soldiers when they came under attack," Caldwell said.

The investigation into the circumstances of their capture has been opened by Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, chief of day-to-day military operations in Iraq. The Mujahedeen Shura Council, an al-Qaida-affiliated group posted a message Tuesday on a jihadist Internet site taking responsibility for the killings, but offered no proof of its involvement.

"We have good news coming straight from the battlefield to the nation of Islam," read the statement. "We satisfy your wrath by executing the sentence of God -- which is slaughter -- on those two crusader infidel prisoners."

Caldwell said U.S. troops found the bodies Monday night but did not immediately recover them, fearing that insurgents may have booby-trapped the area with explosives. U.S. troops established a perimeter and kept watch over the bodies until dawn, when they were able to bring in an explosive ordnance team and remove the remains to a military base.

As of Tuesday night, the bodies were on a plane en route to Dover Air Force Base in Delaware -- home of the U.S. military's largest mortuary.

News of the discoveries hit the soldiers' families hard. Manchea's uncle, Ken MacKenzie, went on NBC's "Today" show to blame the U.S. government for reacting too slowly to his nephew's capture and said the military should have agreed to offer $100 million and detainees in return for the soldiers' lives. There has been no public demand for any ransom in the case, and U.S. policy prohibits striking deals with hostage takers on the premise that it would encourage more kidnappings.

Kay Fristad, a spokeswoman for the Oregon National Guard, said Tucker's relatives were still waiting for DNA testing.

"The family isn't watching the news reports, so they don't yet know what's been reported about the conditions of the bodies," Fristad said. "That's something they may have to face later."

The U.S. military led a massive three-day search utilizing river boats, unmanned drones and nearly a dozen air assaults on suspected insurgent hideouts. One coalition member died during the search, two suspected insurgents were killed and 78 other alleged rebels were detained.

Caldwell also announced that a U.S. air strike on Friday killed a figure he described as a high-ranking al-Qaida operative in Yousifiya named Mansour Suleiman Mansour Khalifi al-Mashhadani, also known as Sheik Mansour. Caldwell said that Mansour, an Iraqi, was a spiritual leader and recruiter for al-Qaida in Iraq and a close associate of the late insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

Caldwell also held Mansour responsible for the downing of a U.S. helicopter in Yousifiya in May that killed two soldiers.

Mansour, then a member of the insurgent group Ansar al-Sunnah Army, was detained by U.S. forces in 2004 and released in the fall of that year, after which time he joined al-Qaida. Caldwell said that prison officials determined that "he was not deemed a threat to Iraqi citizens or coalition forces."

An Iraqi army officer stationed in Yousifiya said that U.S. forces withdrew from the area on Tuesday and as they departed, set fire to warehouses near the electricity plant where the bodies were discovered. Yousifiya residents extinguished the fires after the Americans left, the officer said.

U.S. and Iraqi forces continued to pressure suspected al-Qaida insurgents north of Baqouba, the same area where al-Zarqawi was killed earlier this month. The U.S. military said that soldiers killed a total of 15 suspected insurgents during a lengthy firefight that moved between at least two buildings.

A helicopter struck utility wires as it was firing on suspected insurgents during the battle and was forced to make an emergency landing. Another U.S. aircraft killed three gunmen as they attempted to attacked the downed helicopter, U.S. officials said. According to a press release, U.S. troops found insurgents hiding among nine women, none of whom were injured.

That account was questioned by the Association of Muslim Scholars in Iraq, a group of leading Sunni Arab clerics, which said that several women and children were among those killed in a U.S. airstrike in northeast Baqouba. The group also said that U.S. troops took four injured civilians with them, including a 10-year-old.

One resident said that a 12-year-old boy was among the dead.

In west Baghdad, a car bomb killed five Iraqis and injured 11 other people. In the predominately Shiite slum in Baghdad, known as Sadr City, another car bomb exploded near a wholesale market, killing four and wounding 16.

Also in Baghdad, two police men were shot to death while driving their patrol car. In the northern oil hub of Kirkuk gunmen in three cars killed three people near a traffic checkpoint.

Missing Soldiers Are Found Dead (WP)

By Jonathan Finer And Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, June 20 -- Two U.S. soldiers, missing for three days since their abduction in an insurgent stronghold south of Baghdad, were found dead, a military spokesman said Tuesday, and a top U.S. commander ordered an investigation into why the men were isolated from a larger force in such a dangerous part of Iraq.

The remains of the soldiers -- Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore. -- were recovered near a power plant in the town of Yusufiya, where they had been operating a vehicle checkpoint that came under attack Friday, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell said in a briefing for reporters. A third soldier, Spec. David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass., died in the initial assault.

"Coalition forces have in fact recovered what we believe to be the remains of our two soldiers," Caldwell said. "Our heartfelt prayers go out to both the families and friends of our two soldiers."

Caldwell declined to describe the condition of the soldiers' bodies, saying it would be "inappropriate until I know what the families were told." He said it was clear the soldiers had died of wounds suffered in captivity, rather than at the site of the attack on the checkpoint, but that the cause of death could not be immediately determined.

According to residents of Yusufiya and a relative of one of the victims, the soldiers were beheaded. An Iraqi official said they had been brutally tortured before their death, but provided no further details.

The bodies will be flown to Kuwait and then to Dover Air Force Base in Delaware for full autopsies and DNA testing to ensure they were identified correctly, the military said in a statement.

As 8,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops scoured the region, a tip from a local resident led them to the soldiers' bodies after dark Monday. Because the informant warned that the bodies were booby-trapped, they were not removed until after dawn Tuesday, the military said.

"We went ahead and established a cordon around the area to protect it so it would be undisturbed at daylight this morning and brought the necessary assets like explosive ordnances," Caldwell said. "They did have to dismantle some stuff to get to them."

One U.S. soldier was killed and 12 wounded during the three-day search across a vast area south of Baghdad, while two insurgents were killed and 78 detained, the military said.

The killings of the two privates raised questions about why such low-ranking troops were left alone, backed by a single armored Humvee, in a region Caldwell described Thursday as "an insurgent hotbed" and the most dangerous place in Iraq for U.S. forces after Baghdad and Ramadi. Even in safer areas, U.S. troops generally travel in convoys to provide support in case insurgents attack or a vehicle breaks down.

Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the commander of U.S. ground forces in Iraq, has ordered an investigation into procedures used that night. "They are looking at the entire situation," Caldwell said.

To the consternation of U.S. officials, who are careful to withhold casualty details until the soldiers' families can be notified, the deaths were first reported by an Iraqi defense official. Maj. Gen. Abdul Aziz Muhammed Jassim said in a news conference Tuesday they had been tortured and killed "in a barbaric way."

The Mujaheddin al-Shura Council, a collection of several insurgent groups including al-Qaeda in Iraq, claimed in an Internet statement to have "slaughtered" the two soldiers, suggesting they were beheaded. The group, which had vowed revenge on U.S. forces following the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi this month, claimed on Monday to have abducted the two privates.

DOJ_NMG_0036495

Asked Tuesday if the Internet statements were credible, Caldwell responded: "Absolutely not," and added that based on "preliminary analysis" there was "no reason to believe" the group's claims.

In telephone interviews, two Yusufiya residents, Muyasar Ghalib al-Qaraghuli, 19, and a tribal leader who gave his name only as Abu Salam, described a gruesome scene in which insurgents beheaded and dismembered the soldiers after dragging their bodies behind pickup trucks.

"It's something that we are against," Qaraghuli said. "But what could we do? It happened."

Those accounts could not be independently confirmed, though U.S. and Iraqi officials acknowledged privately that the killings had been particularly brutal.

Menchaca's uncle, Mario Vasquez, said military officials told him early Tuesday morning that the two soldiers had been beheaded, according to a report on the Web site of the Houston Chronicle.

The two soldiers were the first to be classified as "duty status and whereabouts unknown," since Sgt. Keith "Matt" Maupin, who disappeared after an attack on his convoy in April 2004. He subsequently appeared in a video made by insurgents, who later released another video purporting to show his execution. The military called the footage inconclusive and continues to classify him as missing. Eleven American civilians, most of them contractors, are also considered to be missing in the country, Caldwell said.

Also Tuesday, U.S. military officials said they had killed a senior member of al-Qaeda in Iraq during an airstrike on Friday in the same area where the two Army privates vanished.

Mansur Sulayman Mansur Khalif al-Mashadani, an Iraqi known as Sheik Mansur, was a "key leader" of al-Qaeda in Iraq with "excellent religious, military and leadership credentials within that organization," said Caldwell. Mashadani, in his mid-thirties, had studied religion in Jordan before rising to be the religious emir for all of al-Qaeda in Iraq, Caldwell said.

"We do think his death will significantly continue to impact on the ability of this organization to regenerate and reorganize itself," Caldwell said.

After tracking Mashadani, U.S. forces moved to capture him, prompting Mashadani and two other people to flee in a vehicle, which was destroyed by a U.S. airstrike, said Caldwell.

Mashadani had been captured by U.S. forces in July 2004 and released that fall, Caldwell said, because he was not considered "a threat to Iraqi citizens or coalition forces." Mashadani joined al-Qaeda in Iraq after his release, he said.

On Tuesday, the U.S. military issued a statement saying it had killed 15 "terrorists" and detained three suspects during simultaneous raids near Baqubah aimed at pursuing a suspected senior member of al-Qaeda in Iraq. After being fired on from a rooftop, U.S. forces shot back and killed nine armed insurgents, and gunfire from supporting aircraft killed two others in a nearby building, the statement said.

The raids yielded 10 AK-47 assault rifles, a shotgun, a pistol and a crate of explosives, military officials said.

A different account of the incident was provided by witnesses, family members of the dead and a Sunni Muslim member of the Iraqi parliament, Mohammed al-Diani, who called the raids a "barbaric bombing" of civilians and children. Diani called on the Iraqi cabinet to investigate.

Hadi al-Azzawi, a press officer for a human rights organization in Baghdad who said he witnessed the incident, said two of the dead were young boys, ages 10 and 12, and a police officer denied any weapons were present at the scene.

When asked about the differing account, Caldwell denied there were any civilian casualties in what he described as "an extremely long firefight."

Violence continued in Baghdad despite efforts to tighten security. Four explosions detonated within an hour Tuesday morning in and around Baghdad, killing 13 people and wounding 39, said Col. Adil Saeed al-Samarai of the Interior Ministry.

In the southern city of Basra, a suicide bomber blew himself up inside a home for the elderly, killing five people and wounding 15, said Samarai.

Soldiers' Bodies Found In Iraq (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

The U.S. military yesterday recovered the mutilated bodies of two Army privates kidnapped by terrorists Friday night from a checkpoint south of Baghdad.

The bodies were so horribly disfigured that final identification will require DNA testing. But U.S. military officials in Baghdad said the bodies, found in a booby-trapped area, were thought to be those of Pfc. Thomas Lowell Tucker, 25, and Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, although official confirmation awaited the notification of families.

"With great regret -- they were killed in a barbaric way," Iraqi Maj. Gen. Abdul-Aziz Mohammed told reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0036496

The Associated Press in Baghdad reported that a Web site connected to the terror group al Qaeda in Iraq posted a statement, saying the two "crusaders" were "slaughtered" by Abu Ayyub al-Masri. The word "slaughtered" often means the terror victims were beheaded. The U.S. has identified al-Masri as successor to Abu Musab Zarqawi, the al Qaeda in Iraq leader who died June 7 in a strike by the U.S. military.

"We are all very much aware of the atrocities they commit," said Army Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, chief military spokesman in Baghdad, referring to the al Qaeda group. "It pains us what some service members may go through."

The soldiers' remains were being taken to Dover Air Force Base in Delaware, where a forensic laboratory would perform the DNA testing.

The abductions spurred questions inside the U.S. command on security procedures for soldiers on patrol.

Why, commanders are asking, was a small group of junior enlisted soldiers in Humvees left alone to man a checkpoint near Yusufiyah in a particularly dangerous area of Iraq dubbed the Triangle of Death? The area in the Anbar province is a hotbed of Sunni Muslim insurgents and foreign terrorists who constantly attack U.S. forces.

"My first question is: Where were the noncommissioned officers?" said a retired Army general who has spoken to active-duty officers about the incident. "Why were only privates protecting a checkpoint? The assumption you have to make is they were part of a platoon that was broken up to watch numerous checkpoints. This again goes back to the same thing: We don't have enough troops."

Soldiers and Marines in Iraq typically travel in large enough numbers to repel an attack by setting up a defensive perimeter and calling in a quick-reaction force of armored vehicles and combat aircraft as backup.

Supply convoys typically travel under a heavy guard that includes armored Humvees, Bradley fighting vehicles and attack helicopters.

Gen. Caldwell said details of what happened in the ambush at 7:55 p.m. Friday will not be released until the slain soldiers' families are briefed and added that Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the top tactical commander in Iraq, has ordered an investigation into procedures followed that night.

The Associated Press quoted an Iraqi farmer as saying insurgents created a diversion to draw some soldiers away from the checkpoint and then attacked the three remaining troops -- killing one and capturing two. The farmer's account could not be confirmed, the AP said.

Killed in the attack was Spc. David J. Babineau, 25. The three belonged to the 101st Airborne Division from Fort Campbell, Ky.

Security procedures have not always prevented combat deaths, but they have blunted kidnapping attempts. Only one other soldier, Army Reserve Sgt. Keith M. Maupin, has been captured by insurgents since Iraq fell to the allies in April 2003. The Army lists him as missing in action.

The command started an extensive manhunt for the missing soldiers during the weekend, dispatching 8,000 American and Iraqi personnel to comb the Triangle area south of Baghdad.

"We have surged intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance platforms and employed planes, boats, helicopters and [unmanned aerial vehicles] to ensure the most thorough search possible," Gen. Caldwell told reporters on Monday.

He added yesterday, "We basically have turned that area upside down."

But it was an Iraqi civilian, not the military, who first spotted the bodies.

Though insurgents had booby-trapped the area in hopes of killing rescuers, troops cordoned off the area and neutralized the bombs.

"Recovery of the remains was initiated last night and was completed this morning," the U.S. military said. "Coalition forces had to carefully maneuver their way through numerous improvised explosive devices leading up to and around the site."

At a press conference yesterday, Gen. Caldwell said the sweep resulted in the killing of Mansur al Mashhadani, whom he identified as in the top five of the al Qaeda in Iraq's leadership.

"He was a right-hand man to Zarqawi," he said.

Mashhadani, described as the religious emir for al Qaeda in Iraq, operated in the Yusufiyah area. Before the kidnapping, U.S. forces had him under surveillance. A decision was made to arrest him and troops moved in on his location. He fled in a vehicle and was killed by an air strike, Gen. Caldwell said.

U.S. Says 2 Bodies Retrieved In Iraq Were Brutalized (NYT)

By Dexter Filkins

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036497

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 20 — The American military said Tuesday that a search team had found what appeared to be the remains of the two American soldiers captured by insurgents last week during an ambush south of the capital, and a senior Iraqi defense official said the two men had been "brutally tortured."

An American military official in Baghdad, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said that both bodies showed evidence of "severe trauma" and that they could not be positively identified. The search team spotted the bodies on Monday night, but it took 12 hours to get to them because soldiers had to make their way through "numerous" bombs along the road leading to the bodies, and around the bodies themselves, the official said.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the American military spokesman, said "the remains" were found Monday night near a power plant in the vicinity of Yusufiya, about three miles from the site were the Americans had been captured by insurgents.

General Caldwell declined to speak in detail about the physical condition of the bodies, but said the cause of death could not be determined. He said the remains of the men would be sent to the United States for DNA testing to determine their identities definitively.

That seemed to suggest that the two Americans had been wounded or mutilated beyond recognition.

"We couldn't identify them," the American military official in Baghdad said.

Maj. Gen. Abdul Azziz Mohammed Jassim, the chief of operations at the Defense Ministry, said he had seen an official report on the bodies and that he could confirm that the two Americans had been "killed in a very brutal way and tortured."

"There were traces of torture on their bodies, very clear traces," General Jassim said. "It was brutal torture. The torture was something unnatural."

The general said that he was unable to give any more details.

The American military official said that one of the bombs planted on the road leading to the bodies exploded when it was struck by an American vehicle, but that no one was injured.

"They were intentionally targeting the recovery force," the American official said.

The bodies of the two Americans were not damaged by the bombs, the official said.

The identities of the two missing soldiers were released on Monday: Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston, and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore. A third soldier, Specialist David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass., was killed when insurgents attacked the three at a traffic checkpoint.

General Caldwell said the military was investigating how three young, low-ranking soldiers ended up alone on a road in Yusufiya, a town regarded as one of the most hostile in all of Iraq.

According to Iraqis living in the area, the three soldiers, who were manning a traffic checkpoint, became isolated when several of their comrades chased a group of insurgents into the orchards off the roadside. At that point, the Iraqis said, a group of seven or eight masked guerrillas attacked the three, killing Specialist Babineau and capturing Privates Menchaca and Tucker. The Iraqis said they believed that insurgents had intentionally staged the first attack to divert most of the Americans and isolate the three.

"There was a single vehicle there with three Americans soldiers when they came under attack," General Caldwell said. "We do know that the chain of command is looking at the entire situation."

Without going into detail, General Caldwell said it was clear that the two Americans had been killed in a violent way and not from wounds received during the initial battle with the guerrillas.

"Due to the condition of their bodies, we do not believe it was by natural cause of death," he said. "It did not appear that they had been mortally wounded and moved to a location and died."

General Caldwell said the men's families in the United States had been notified that the bodies of their kin had been found. He said the Army hoped that further testing would reveal the causes of death as well.

"It pains us to realize what fellow servicemen go through," General Caldwell said in a briefing here. "Please keep both of these families in your prayers."

The American military did not release information about the identity of those who it believes may have captured the American soldiers.

An Internet statement, posted Tuesday under the name of the Mujahedeen Shura, said the successor to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi had "slaughtered" the two Americans. The Mujahedeen Shura, an umbrella group, claims Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia as a member. The Arabic word used in the posting, "nahr," denoted the cutting of the throat, and it has been used by jihadi groups when they have beheaded their victims.

The authenticity of the statement, like many that are posted on the Internet, could not be verified. The provenance of this one was called into question by SITE, a Washington group that tracks Islamic militant groups.

Rita Katz, the group's director, said she believed that the message was a fake, given the manner and place in which it was posted on the Internet. Indeed, the message disappeared from one jihadi Web site, Al Hesba, shortly after it appeared.

DOJ_NMG_0036498

"There is a straightforward way that Al Qaeda posts their messages," Ms. Katz said. "This was not theirs."

On Monday, the Mujahedeen Shura said in a statement posted on the Internet that it had captured the Americans, but it provided no evidence that it had them in its custody. The group said it would provide more news in a few days. Ms. Katz said she believed that message was authentic.

Mr. Zarqawi, the head of al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, was killed in an American strike in a village 35 miles north of here on June 7. His successor, according to the group, is Abu Hamza al-Muhajir, who the Americans say is an Egyptian who has been fighting here since 2003.

A team of 8,000 troops, American and Iraqi, was assigned to search for the missing soldiers.

General Caldwell said they had encountered several bombs during their search, and also several guerrillas. One American soldier was killed and 12 were wounded during the search, he said.

This was not the first time that insurgents had planted bombs intended to explode when Americans came to recover remains, the American military official said. After insurgents shot down an American helicopter earlier this year, a team sent to recover the bodies and wreckage found 19 bombs on the road leading to the site and around the wreckage itself, the American military official in Baghdad said.

The American military goes to extraordinary lengths to ensure that its soldiers are not captured. The only other soldier captured in this war was Pfc. Keith Maupin, who was taken prisoner by insurgents in April 2004. A video showing Specialist Maupin in his army fatigues, and in the captivity of insurgents, surfaced shortly after his capture.

In June 2004, Al Jazeera, the Arabic language TV station, broadcast a video showing a person being shot. Al Jazeera said insurgents claimed the victim was Pfc. Maupin, but the man's face was not visible on the screen. The military says it is still searching for him.

Also Tuesday, the military said it was continuing its assault on the leadership of Al Qaeda, saying it had killed one of its senior leaders, Mansur Sulayman Mansur Khalif al-Mashhadani, an Iraqi, in an airstrike Friday morning near Yusufiya.

American forces had been tracking Mr. Mashhadani for some time, General Caldwell said, and then moved Friday to take him prisoner. When he tried to escape in a car, the general said, the Americans called in an airstrike to kill him.

General Caldwell said the military believed that Mr. Mashhadani, who they said was in his late 30s, was the "religious emir" for all of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia. The general said Mr. Mashhadani had been captured by American forces in July 2004 while serving in a similar capacity for two other insurgent groups, Ansar al-Islam and Ansar Al Sunnah. He was released in the fall of 2004, General Caldwell said, when "he was deemed not to be a threat to Iraqi citizens or coalition forces."

In Ramadi, the contested city west of Baghdad, local Iraqis reported a calm day, three days after Iraqi and American troops set up what they called a "security perimeter" around the city.

In his news conference on Tuesday, General Caldwell said Iraqi and American troops had entered the southern part of the city around the stadium, which has been the site of clashes. The Iraqi and American forces took up positions inside and around the stadium and set up barricades there.

General Caldwell said that the recent military activity did not amount to a full-scale invasion of the city, of the type the Marines undertook of Falluja in November 2004. He described the current operations as more limited, with the goal of allowing the Iraqi police and other security forces to "regain control" of the city. Ramadi has not been under the control of the Iraqi government or American forces for many months, and insurgents roam freely in some areas.

Still, both the American and Iraqi military seemed to leave the door open for stepped-up operations in the future. "There is currently no plan for a large-scale operation in Ramadi," General Jassim said.

Relatives Describe Young Men Determined To Serve Country (NYT)

By Lizette Alvarez

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

When Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, came home from Iraq to South Texas for three weeks in May, his family was taken aback by his transformation, though they kept their thoughts quiet.

"He was very nervous," said his aunt Maria Vásquez. "He had never smoked, and he had started smoking, chain smoking. He was waking up in the night, very disturbed. He couldn't sleep well. He was very nervous, very jittery."

Private Menchaca, who was a newlywed, told his mother and his aunts that, although he was still glad he had enlisted in the Army, life in Iraq was difficult. They got the feeling that, privately, Private Menchaca, who grew up straddling the border in Brownsville and its two cultures, was dreading having to go back.

Just recently, he said, there had been an attack on members of his unit and he had lost all his clothes. They burned in a fire. He had only the uniform on his back.

"He said, 'Send me things: wipes, soap, Oreo cookies,' " she said. "He loved Oreo cookies."

DOJ_NMG_0036499

In Oregon, Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, lived an altogether different life, far from the southern border, in a tiny Oregon farming town called Madras. He had an eye for a good spot to fish, a knack for hunting and a passion for fixing battered pickup trucks.

Private Tucker said in a voice mail message from Iraq, that his mother saved and released to the public, "Just going on a little vacation and I will be back before you know it."

Last Friday, Private Menchaca and Private Tucker were ambushed at a military checkpoint in Yusufiya, an area south of Baghdad riddled with insurgents. The two soldiers, who survived a shootout, were seen being taken away by insurgents. Their relatives, who were visited over the weekend by Army casualty affairs officers with word of the unconfirmed killings, are still awaiting DNA confirmation of the deaths.

If the two soldiers had one thing in common, it was their determination to join the Army and fight in Iraq, believing it to be the right thing to do. It is a message they tried to impress on their families, who worried incessantly about phantom snipers and hidden bombs. "I'm going to defend my country," Private Tucker said in the telephone message. "Be proud of me."

Just recently, Private Tucker told friends and family that he would be going to a more dangerous, remote section of Iraq, where he would be unable to call or send e-mail messages.

Rick Allen, the former mayor of Madras who hired Private Tucker, known as Tommy, as a teenager to work for him at his gas station and convenience store, said there was nothing that Private Tucker liked more than his dirt bikes and his tools. He also played the piano and loved music, his family said. "He was a determined kid," Mr. Allen said. "A tough kid."

Private Tucker's family lives on a stretch of highway just off the town center. On Tuesday, friends and family members sat in front of the house as police officials warned off reporters and onlookers.

Just before enlisting, Private Tucker, who made friends easily, worked in construction, but with his life a little out of focus, he decided to enlist in the Army, joining up last July. He was stationed at Fort Campbell and became a member of the 101st Airborne Division, where he met Private Menchaca.

During his whirlwind visit to Texas, Private Menchaca was matter-of-fact about the difficulties of his mission in Iraq. He talked about how he slept in vacant buildings, without plumbing or electricity, how he and the other soldiers shared batteries to run their electrical equipment. "He was not complaining," said Sylvia Grice, 37, a cousin. "He was not whining. He was just telling it like it is."

Private Menchaca made it a point to carve out time for his extended family on both sides of the border, spending time with his mother, his brother, his cousins, aunts and uncles in Houston, Matamoros and Brownsville. He also spent time with his wife, Christina, 18, whom he married without telling his family last September, one month before shipping out.

A high school dropout who later earned his graduate equivalency diploma, Private Menchaca had been unhappy working in Houston at a gas station. He decided to join the Army, hoping it would lead to a job as an immigration agent, and told his family Christmas Day, 2004 that he planned to enlist; they tried to talk him out of it. Private Menchaca's brother had served in the Army and had not enjoyed it, Mrs. Vásquez said.

But Private Menchaca insisted, and the family came around. He scored so high on his entrance test that he was given the option to bypass the infantry, said his cousin, Gabriela García. He chose not to do that. Instead, he signed up in March 2005 and wound up in the 101st Airborne.

Ms. García said her cousin reveled in the "challenge, the training, the camaraderie, the structure."

"We think of Kristian as a hero," said Ms. Grice. "You know, he didn't have to do this. He believed in what he was doing."

Families 'devastated' By News (USAT)

By Emily Bazar And Tracy Loew

USA Today, June 21, 2006

Pfc. Kristian Menchaca's family relished his phone calls from Iraq, but the conversations fed their worries.

In one call to his mother, Menchaca said he had been knocked unconscious by a car bomb, his cousin Juan Manuel Vasquez Jr., 31, said Tuesday.

In another, Menchaca said his unit had been attacked overnight, their supplies and belongings destroyed by flames.

"He barely escaped," Vasquez said. "He called to say he needed clothing and supplies."

Vasquez choked back tears as he spoke, shortly after the family learned that the bodies of Menchaca, 23, of Houston and Pfc. Thomas Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore., had reportedly been recovered in Iraq. The men disappeared Friday when their checkpoint was attacked.

"We did a lot together," Vasquez said of his cousin Kris.

Tucker's parents were "devastated at the news their son may have been killed," a written statement from the family said.

Ten American flags lined the road in front of their home in Madras, a central Oregon town of about 5,600 people.

DOJ_NMG_0036500

Sheriff's deputies guarded the entrance but let a FedEx worker deliver a box of yellow ribbons. Similar boxes arrived throughout the community, some sent by the mother of Keith "Matt" Maupin, the only U.S. soldier in the Iraq war still listed as missing.

"Me and a bunch of women are going to put them up all over town," said Trudy Cunningham, who works at the Tiger Mart. "They'll stay up till he gets back home with us."

A memorial of posters and balloons grew on a fence on Fourth Street, the main drag.

Tucker worked at the station in high school. Later he did construction and worked at a sawmill. Cunningham said he was a hard worker who liked to fix cars in his spare time.

The Madras Chamber of Commerce plans to dedicate its Fourth of July Celebration to Tucker.

Holli Van Wert said she and other volunteers are collecting dining coupons and food for the family and a fund has been set up to help with expenses (The Bring Tommy Home Fund, c/o Columbia River Bank, P.O. Box 0, Madras, OR 97741). "It's just the way that we are here. We're all connected on one level," she said.

Tucker joined the Army in July 2005 and had been in Iraq since February.

"He was a good kid," said Tom Brown, who owns Coachworks Collision Repair. "He was a good soldier."

The family's statement said in part, "Tom has gained a much larger family through this ordeal than he had when he left home to go help the Iraqi people and protect his country from the threat of terrorism."

In Brownsville, Menchaca's family recalled a young man who loved basketball and homemade Mexican food.

He talked of joining the Border Patrol or the customs service after the Army, Vasquez said.

His wedding in September, after a quick courtship, surprised his family, Vasquez said. Soon, he was in Iraq.

When Menchaca was home in the spring, Vasquez said, he noticed a change in his cousin. "He looked a little distant. He had trouble sleeping," he said. "You could see it in his eyes."

Vasquez said Menchaca's death underscores his feelings about the war, which he said doesn't "make any sense."

FBI Pursues Pretenders Masquerading As War Heroes (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, June 21, 2006

The FBI is cracking down on phony war heroes, who often buy medals on the Internet and wear them at public events.

This year, federal agents have launched a dozen investigations against people allegedly masquerading as decorated veterans. At that pace, the FBI would open about twice as many cases as it did last year.

The cases are sometimes difficult to prosecute because the phony heroes have to be caught wearing the medal. And because the crime — unauthorized wearing of military medals and decorations — is a misdemeanor, the penalty is small. Of the 58 cases that were opened by the FBI in the past six years, 20 are pending. Of the other 38, almost 60% ended in convictions.

Support in Congress is growing for the "Stolen Valor Act," which would stiffen penalties for falsely claiming to have received any medal. Since it was introduced last year, the number of co-sponsors has doubled.

The bill would make it a crime to merely claim the medal was earned. It would also increase punishment. Today, only those fraudulently wearing Medals of Honor face up to a year in jail and a $100,000 fine. The bill would increase penalties for wearing other medals to the same level.

Offenders are people who buy Purple Hearts, Bronze Stars or even Medals of Honor on the Internet or at flea markets and play the role of war hero at military funerals, banquets and benefits, says FBI Special Agent Thomas Cottone, a violent crimes investigator who took on phony war hero cases as a personal crusade 10 years ago.

"They do it for the attention. They want to get noticed," Cottone says. "These people, by wearing those medals, are literally stealing the valor and recognition of those who legitimately did the act. And this is absolutely disgraceful."

The most recent conviction: Theodore Bantis, 59, of Dunlap, Ill., who pleaded guilty Tuesday to posing as a Marine Corps officer who had won the Navy Cross, the second-highest Marine valor award. He admitted he never served in the military.

Frauds Put Up A Decorated Front (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, June 21, 2006

The man cutting a path across the Marine Corps Birthday Ball near Atlantic City last fall wore row upon row of battle ribbons on his chest — silent testament to a history of gallantry and sacrifice.

Among the awards he wore were a Bronze Star, a Silver Star and the Navy Cross, which is second in significance only to the Medal of Honor.

DOJ_NMG_0036501

Retired Marine Corps master sergeant Fred Montney III and others turned to admire Gerard Smigel, 52, in his dress blue uniform and wearing the rank of lieutenant colonel. “He was in his element. He enjoyed it,” says Montney, who sat at Smigel's table.

As the night wore on, Montney noticed little flaws. Smigel would excuse himself to go to the “latrine.” Marines call it the “head.” Smigel wore one award, a Combat Action Ribbon, upside down. “When I asked him questions, he would get somewhat fuzzy” about details, Montney recalls. He snapped a photo of Smigel, smiling next to his wife, and later called the FBI.

Smigel pleaded guilty this month in federal court to illegally wearing the uniform and medals. He was sentenced to three years of probation and fined $3,000.

Masquerading as a war hero has become riskier — but more tempting — during this time of war. “Right now, most everybody loves the military, and that's why I'm seeing more and more of these impostors,” says senior FBI agent Thomas Cottone.

The FBI has investigated 58 cases of people allegedly wearing fraudulent military decorations since 2001. Assisted by military researchers and the Internet — where hoaxes can be quickly tracked and exposed — the FBI could end up investigating more cases of medal fraud this year than in any other previous year, Cottone says. He says he gets one tip a week.

“I call them gutless creeps,” Montney says of frauds such as Smigel. According to court documents, Smigel's true military service was as an Air Force plumbing specialist who received a less-than-honorable discharge in 1975.

“The vast majority, it's just low self-esteem,” says B.G. “Jug” Burkett, a retired stockbroker from Dallas who led efforts to unmask frauds with Stolen Valor, a 1998 book he co-wrote.

Burkett says people assume heroic alter egos to offset shortcomings.

“Whenever you make someone a hero, he's not only heroic, he's trustworthy, he's honest, he's loyal, he's sincere. All these other attributes get attached to him,” he says. “And if somehow he has failed in some way, then it's due to that evil war that he was forced to fight. You can take both the good and the bad and it explains everything.”

FBI agent Cottone says the bureau is investigating Richard Thibodeau, 64, of Lawrenceville, Ga., who asserted for years that he was a decorated Marine Corps officer and Navy Cross recipient.

Thibodeau explained himself in a May interview with The Atlanta Journal-Constitution. “In my mind, I wasn't harming anyone because I wasn't capitalizing on it,” he said.

In past decades, laws against impersonating war heroes were enforced only sporadically, Cottone says. That changed in the 1990s, largely because of Mitchell Paige, who received the Medal of Honor for beating back a Japanese assault on Guadalcanal in 1942.

During his retirement, Paige tracked people who falsely claimed to be Medal of Honor recipients. In 1994, he successfully lobbied Congress to pass a law that made selling or falsely wearing the Medal of Honor punishable by up to a year in jail and a $100,000 fine. The punishment for wearing other medals remains six months.

Cottone, who worked with Paige, used that law to investigate H.L.I. Lordship Industries, a company in Hauppauge, N.Y., that held a contract with the Pentagon to produce Medals of Honor. In 1996, Cottone proved the company had illegally sold 300 awards, many of them snapped up by impostors. The firm lost its government contract and paid a $22,500 fine.

In the past several years, military researchers and societies have begun assembling databases that have made it easier to uncover fraud.

The Congressional Medal of Honor Society lists all recipients, living or dead, on its website: www.cmohs.org. Cottone says the number of people claiming to be Medal of Honor recipients has diminished in recent years, but the number pretending to have received other valor awards has increased.

The homeofheroes.com website tracks recipients of the Medal of Honor, the Army's Distinguished Service Cross, the Navy and Marine Corps' Navy Cross and the Air Force Cross. That site was pulled together by Doug Sterner, a business technology teacher from Colorado.

Sterner says plenty of military impostors never get caught.

“I believe in virtually every city in America, no matter how small, there is at least one individual who is touting (himself) as a major combat hero based upon lies.”

Not Playing at a Theater Near You

Hey, kids, let's put on a show ! Alexandria guys Scott Shafer and John Carter did just that in 2004. Shafer scripted a political thriller, Hollywood types took notice, they raised $750,000, and suddenly they were filming "Fatwa" here in D.C., with a solid B-list cast and Carter in his directorial debut.

The indie flick premiered last week at the Atlanta Film Festival and now it's in wide release . . . uh, in video stores across the country. But the newbie auteurs aren't complaining.

"We just wanted to put it into the venue that was most profitable," Shafer says. The 26-year-old notes that they actually turned down a theatrical distribution deal, fearing marketing costs would eat up profits. "There's some creative stigma in going straight to DVD, but I think that's changing. There's a dynamic of people wandering into video stores saying, 'Hey, this looks interesting.' "

No question about that! "Fatwa" stars Lauren Holly ("NCIS," "Picket Fences," "Dumb and Dumber") as a kinda sexy junior senator (beehive 'do, leopard-print stiletto boots) who speaks out against Islamo-fascism and ends up dodging death threats from both a terrorist cabdriver (Roger Guenveur Smith) and her own brother-in-law. Video Business magazine said it "doesn't quite click" but gave it props for nice performances by Lacey Chabert and Mykelti Williamson and more nuance than your average B-movie.

Shafer and Carter are now plotting their next film, a "comic-bookish thriller" about finding Osama . Picking up on a theme? "In the world we live in today," Shafer says, "I can't imagine writing about anything else."For Some People, Nothing Succeeds Like Excess

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Greenberg Sues AIG To Get Board Notes (AP)

By Randall Chase, AP Business Writer

DOJ_NMG_0036503

AP, June 21, 2006

Former CEO of AIG, Maurice 'Hank' Greenberg Sues to Get Copies of Board Notes, Minutes

DOVER, Del. (AP) -- The former CEO of American International Group Inc., Maurice "Hank" Greenberg, filed a lawsuit Tuesday seeking records associated with the company's $1.6 billion settlement of allegations that it engaged in deceptive accounting practices.

Starr International Co., a private company led by Greenberg, alleges in the Chancery Court filing that AIG is violating Delaware law by refusing to allow representatives of Starr, which is AIG's largest shareholder, to inspect the company's books and records.

Starr is seeking minutes, notes, transcripts and any other records relating to AIG board and committee meetings dating from Feb. 9, 2005 to the present.

Starr alleges that AIG responded to a June 9 demand letter by offering only heavily redacted "nonprivileged minutes" of board and audit committee meetings relating only to worker's compensation payments made in connection with the settlement announced Feb. 9 of this year.

In the settlement, AIG, one of the world's largest insurance companies, agreed to pay $1.64 billion to settle allegations by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer that the company used deceptive accounting practices to mislead investors and regulatory agencies. The Securities and Exchange Commission filed and settled allegations of accounting fraud with the company simultaneously.

The settlement did not cover Greenberg, who was named in the suit but vowed to fight it in court.

Under the settlement, AIG agreed to pay $800 million for investors allegedly deceived by AIG's accounting tactics, including a $100 million penalty to the SEC. The company also agreed to pay $375 million to policyholders, $344 million to states harmed by practices from 1986 to 1995 involving state workers' compensation funds, and fines of $100 million to the state of New York and $25 million to the U.S. Justice Department.

In the demand letter seeking access to AIG records and in the complaint filed Tuesday, Starr claims that at least three states slated to receive worker's compensation payments have admitted that they are not entitled to receive such payments.

The complaint also alleges that other states have expressed "serious misgivings" about the workers' compensation payments. Minnesota, for example, filed a separate lawsuit against AIG rather than accept a settlement state officials believed to be inadequate.

"The stockholder believes that the above issues may be indicative of other problems with the settlement and corresponding possible mismanagement of the company," the Chancery Court complaint reads.

Greenberg was ousted in March 2005 and says he followed proper accounting procedures during his 38 years leading the company. Through a spokesman, Greenberg declined to comment on Tuesday's court filing.

AIG spokesman Joe Norton did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

U.S. Atty. Subpoenas Delta Petroleum (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, June 21, 2006

(AP) - DENVER-Delta Petroleum Corp., a natural gas and oil producer, said late Monday it has received a federal subpoena requesting records back to 1996 over its granting of stock options.

The company said it believes the request comes because it was identified May 16 in a "third-party report" as being at-risk for having backdated stock options for executives. On May 22, the Denver company said its board had formed a special committee to review Delta's option granting practices and related accounting.

The subpoena is from the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York.

Delta shares fell 36 cents to close at $14.47 Monday on the Nasdaq Stock Market, before the company announced the subpoena.

The 'Backdating' Witch Hunt (WSJ)

By Holman W. Jenkins, Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

Another business scandal, this one over options "backdating," reveals that some CEOs are "in it" for the money. Tsk, tsk.

There has been outrage aplenty, lawsuits and even a grand jury investigation over a procession of companies accused of committing this violation of the moral code. A few are big names: Home Depot, Microsoft, UnitedHealth Group. But most are midsized tech companies with good reputations in their industries. So far, about 50 (the number grows daily) are suspected of having granted their executives and employees stock options whose issue date was retroactively established to coincide with a recent low in the company's stock price.

Missing, however, has been any cogent explanation of the possible reasons behind a practice apparently so widespread that companies must either have been sharing notes on it or have discovered it independently following some inner logic of corporate life. Also missing is any cogent explanation of why it's wrong.

CEO "greed" seems to be analysis enough for many leading journalistic minds. But even stipulating that CEOs are greedy, companies have not been short of ways to shovel large sums to their top servants. Why adopt this stratagem? And why should it automatically be assumed that backdating means CEOs were garnering more pay than their boards intended or were somehow exploiting a loophole?

A little history of how we came to this "scandal": Anyone who waded through the literature on CEO compensation has long been aware of studies showing that executives reap non-random gains on their stock options. No surprise here: Options are meant to motivate executives to produce non-random gains, and the whole theory of corporate governance is that executives are self-interested and possess inside information, so you'd expect them to negotiate pay deals for themselves from which they'd benefit.

It took Erik Lie, an economist at the University of Iowa, to show that the gains realized by executives at certain companies were conceivable only if option grants had been systematically retroactive to a recent low in the share price. His work was noticed by the Journal, which went about identifying some of the companies that engaged in apparent backdating.

His finding is revealing, but of what? Let's try to remember -- as some of the subsequent scandal coverage hasn't -- that options typically vest over time, and the value of the CEO's pay package is determined by two factors, not one: The net price of the options multiplied by the number of options.

These simple facts make a mockery of two standard assumptions of the media coverage: that backdating automatically means CEOs were "padding" their pay; and that backdating is the equivalent of being allowed to bet on a horse race after it has been run.

Think about it this way: Options packages don't spring out of the ground, but must be designed and agreed upon. A company and its executive both have an interest in simplifying the negotiation as well as an interest in understanding clearly what the package is likely to be worth.

Why would backdating be appealing in this light? Because it lets one parameter be locked in so negotiation can focus efficiently on the other, the size of the grant. It eliminates a perverse incentive to game the stock price during the negotiation. It leaves a valued executive no reason to grump about the issue date or feel there was any invidious message in its selection, yet the company retains full control over the size of the package.

Some companies are also suspected of timing options grants before impending good corporate news. The same considerations apply. It eliminates an incentive to game the stock price. It eliminates a source of ill will on the executive's part over the selection of the issue date. The company still controls the value of the package (and incentive) through the size of the grant.

Don't doubt, nonetheless, that entrepreneurs and executive are "in it" for the money as well as for the other satisfactions that come from building a business. Too, most of the backdating under the microscope today took place amid the stock price gyrations of the Internet bubble, which created unusual challenges for tech companies trying to recruit and keep talent during a business-model land grab.

Yet, all the while, CEO churn surveys have continued to show higher turnover, shorter tenure, more demanding boards in the last several years, even against the background of rising pay. This picture suggests, And large, that high pay is a product not of board cronyism but of a dynamic market for CEOs. Boards are willing to pay a lot of money but they won't put up with poor performance.

Since Enron, a great deal has been said about corporate governance, most of it useless. The one lesson that should be reinforced is that overseeing CEO incentives is among the most important board responsibilities, and boards should keep control of it and do it clearheadedly. Yet there is nothing categorically corrupt or improper about backdating to justify a conclusion that the boards here weren't doing just that.

The scandal element, instead, arises because ever-shifting accounting, regulatory and tax standards were, by some readings, punitive during the years in question toward choosing a past date to make an options package effective. We wouldn't want the legal bills of UnitedHealth's Bill McGuire -- or Vitesse Semiconductor's Louis Tomasetta, or KLA-Tencor's Ken Levy. In the end, dozens of executives are likely now to find themselves skinned and hung out to dry over a practice that's innocuous and even sensible in its own right.

CRIMINAL LAW:

1st Trial In Abramoff Probe Gets Conviction (USAT)

USA Today, June 21, 2006

David Safavian, a former General Services Administration chief of staff, was convicted Tuesday in federal court of lying and obstructing justice in the investigation of lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Safavian, a former partner of Abramoff, could face up to 20 years in prison at sentencing Oct. 12. He was convicted of obstructing an investigation into whether he aided Abramoff in efforts to acquire property controlled by the GSA in 2002, when Safavian accompanied the lobbyist on a golfing trip to Scotland.

The jury found Safavian hid details of his relationship with Abramoff from a GSA ethics lawyer, the GSA's inspector general's office and the Senate Indian Affairs Committee. He was acquitted of obstructing a Senate investigation.

Safavian also worked as the chief procurement officer in the White House Office of Management and Budget. This was the first trial in the Abramoff inquiry, though the lobbyist and three former congressional aides have pleaded guilty to a variety of charges.

President Bush and his wife, Laura, arrived in Vienna where the president will meet today with leaders of the 25-nation European Union. Bush arrived for the summit optimistic about trans-Atlantic relations on issues such as trade, Iran and counterterrorism.

"We will strengthen our close and growing partnership with the European Union," Bush said.

The president plans to press the Europeans to eliminate farm subsidies that are a sticking point in free-trade negotiations and to make good on their promises of aid for Iraq.

Bush goes to Budapest tonight for the 50th anniversary of the Hungarian revolution against Soviet domination. He will return to Washington late Thursday.

— David Jackson

People convicted of fraudulently obtaining disaster aid would face up to 30 years in prison and $1 million fines under a bill the House of Representatives passed. The legislation goes to the Senate.

The House approved the bill on a voice vote a week after a Government Accountability Office report found up to $1.4 billion in fraudulent claims to the Federal Emergency Management Agency as it rushed to provide relief after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita last year.

"Fraudsters and scam artists went into high gear" as federal aid poured in, said House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis. He said 261 people have been charged in 218 federal cases and there have been 44 guilty pleas or convictions. The new penalties would affect only future cases.

Safavian May File Appeal (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, June 21, 2006

David Safavian, convicted on Tuesday of lying to federal and Senate investigators and obstructing their investigation into his ties to former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, plans to ask a federal judge to vacate portions of the decision and then will most likely appeal the case, his attorney said.

Safavian was convicted on four of the five felony counts he'd been indicted on last October, including making false statements to investigators and obstructing the Justice Department probe of Abramoff. The jury found him not guilty of obstructing a parallel investigation by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee into Abramoff's business activities.

Senior Justice Department officials hailed the jury's decision, which was announced Tuesday morning after five days of deliberation by the 10 women and two men on the panel.

"Today a jury found David Safavian, a former federal official, guilty of lying to Congress and [General Services Administration] investigators about his dealings with lobbyist Jack Abramoff," said Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher, head of the criminal division, in a statement released by the department. "The message of this verdict is clear: in answering questions posed by Congress and by federal agencies, public officials have the same obligation as does the public for which they serve — to tell the truth. No one is above the law."

Safavian's sentencing is scheduled for Oct. 12, and under the complicated formula used by the federal courts in determining prison sentences for felony convictions, he faces up to 21 months behind bars, said Biz Van Gelder, his lawyer.

DOJ_NMG_0036506

Before his sentence is handed down, however, Safavian will ask the presiding judge, District Judge Paul Friedman of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, to vacate some portions of the decision, Van Gelder said. If that effort fails, Van Gelder plans to appeal the case to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

Van Gelder believes that her client has several grounds for appeal, including the decision by Friedman to allow jurors to see hundreds of e-mail exchanges between Abramoff and Safavian. Those e-mails detailed Abramoff's attempts in 2002 to gain control of the Old Post Office building in downtown Washington, D.C., which Abramoff wanted to turn into a luxury hotel. Another GSA property that Abramoff was seeking at that time would have been turned into a school.

Safavian was serving as GSA chief of staff at that time, and he secretly advised Abramoff how to acquire the two GSA properties. Safavian then took part in a luxury golf junket to Scotland in August 2002 that was paid for by Abramoff.

Other participants in that trip included Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio); Neil Volz, Ney's former chief of staff; and Ralph Reed, the one-time Christian Coalition executive who is now running for lieutenant governor of Georgia. Both Abramoff and Volz have already pleaded guilty in the ongoing corruption probe, and Volz testified against Safavian during the trial.

Safavian sought an advisory opinion from the GSA ethics office before the Scotland trip, claiming that Abramoff was not "doing business" with GSA, despite the fact that Safavian knew Abramoff was trying to acquire the two GSA properties.

Van Gelder said that Safavian, who worked at the same lobbying firm as Abramoff in the 1990s, should not have been charged with lying to a GSA ethics officer about his knowledge of Abramoff's dealings with GSA, including whether Abramoff was formally lobbying the agency.

Van Gelder also complained about the verdict form used in the trial, arguing that it was too broad and allowed jurors no discretion in whether to convict her client.

"There are a number of issues for us to appeal on," Van Gelder said. "At the end of the day, David Safavian believed his friend [Abramoff] and still doesn't think he did anything wrong."

Van Gelder did acknowledge that Safavian has spent heavily on his legal defense, and that the total would only rise if Safavian were actually to file an appeal.

"It is very hard for an individual to take on the Justice Department, especially if that individual is paying his own way," Van Gelder said. Van Gelder declined to say how much Safavian had spent.

Safavian has received some financial help from his friends, but those contributions do not come near to covering his legal bills. One source who knows Safavian personally suggested that his legal tab was "far in excess of $500,000." Another GOP insider said Safavian laid out "more than $800,000" on his defense team, with additional bills expected if an appeal is filed.

Several legal experts also said that getting an appeals court to overturn Tuesday's decision would be difficult. Safavian offered extensive challenges to the government's attempts to introduce evidence against him before the trial began, and while Friedman granted his side some victories, the Justice Department won overall.

"Decisions like this one are rarely overturned," said a criminal defense attorney with extensive trial experience. This source said that judges like Friedman — himself a former lawyer in the U.S. attorney's office in the District — are cognizant that any decisions they make prior to and during a criminal trial could end up being reviewed by a higher court.

With the Safavian conviction in hand, and with a number of individuals involved in the probe continuing to cooperate with prosecutors, the question for the Justice Department now becomes where the Abramoff probe goes next, and who will be the next person to agree to a guilty plea or face indictment.

Several individuals directly involved with the investigation believe that Ed Buckham, DeLay's former chief of staff, is the next logical target for federal prosecutors, and one who could help them make a case against any lawmakers tied to Abramoff.

Two former DeLay aides, Michael Scanlon and Tony Rudy, have already pleaded guilty in the case and have agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors. Rudy worked with Buckham at Alexander Strategy Group, a lobbying firm, before it disbanded in January due to the negative publicity surrounding the pair.

Buckham could not be reached for comment on Tuesday, but he has repeatedly denied any wrongdoing in the past.

"I have been waiting for the other shoe to fall" on Buckham, said a source who has been interviewed by federal investigators handling the case. "He would be the right person for them to go after next."

Buckham also has ties to defense contractor Brent Wilkes, who has been implicated in the bribery scandal that brought down former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.). Buckham lobbied for one of Wilkes' companies, Group W, from 2002 to 2005. Wilkes has not been charged in the Cunningham probe.

Ney, another focus for federal prosecutors during the Abramoff investigation, has repeatedly stated he has done nothing improper or illegal in his dealings with Abramoff.

"The Congressman has said consistently from day one that he has never, at any point, engaged in any improper, unethical or illegal activity," Brian Walsh, Ney's spokesman, said.

DOJ_NMG_0036507

Ney was forced out of his post as chairman of the House Administration following Rudy's guilty plea, and the Justice Department has subpoenaed any records he possesses regarding contacts with Abramoff. Ney has run up several hundred thousand dollars in legal bills since he was first publicly linked to Abramoff in late 2004, and the Ohio Republican has been forced to establish a legal-defense fund to help offset those costs.

Ney "remains absolutely confident that the lies and deceptions of Jack Abramoff will continue to be revealed and that his name will be cleared fully at the end of the day," Walsh said Tuesday.

Ex-Aide To Bush Found Guilty (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

A federal jury found former White House aide David H. Safavian guilty yesterday of lying and obstructing justice, making him the highest-ranking government official to be convicted in the spreading scandal involving disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Safavian, a former chief of staff of the General Services Administration, was convicted in U.S. District Court here of covering up his many efforts to assist Abramoff in acquiring two properties controlled by the GSA, and also of concealing facts about a lavish weeklong golf trip he took with Abramoff to Scotland and London in the summer of 2002.

This was the first Abramoff-related legal action to go to trial and face a jury. Several legal experts said the case could embolden federal prosecutors to seek additional indictments against cronies of Abramoff, who has been cooperating with the Justice Department since pleading guilty in January to corrupting public officials.

The jury of 10 women and two men came to its decision on its fifth day of deliberations after hearing eight days of testimony. Safavian, 38, sat silently and without expression as U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman read the verdict aloud.

The jury found him guilty of obstructing an inquiry by the inspector general's office of the GSA and of lying to the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, a GSA ethics officer and the GSA inspector general. He was acquitted of obstructing the Senate's probe. He faces up to 20 years in jail and $1 million in fines; sentencing was set for Oct. 12.

Safavian's attorney, Barbara Van Gelder, said she will seek a new trial. Prosecutors "will say how this was a great day in the war on corruption," she said. "I find they made a mountain out of a molehill, and now they're going to plant the flag on top of the molehill."

Safavian is the fifth person to be found guilty in legal actions connected to Abramoff, the once-powerful Republican lobbyist who has pleaded guilty to charges of fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe government officials. Like Abramoff, the other four negotiated plea agreements and did not go to trial. One of those, Neil G. Volz, a congressional aide-turned-lobbyist, testified against Safavian two weeks ago.

Legal observers cited the effectiveness of Volz's testimony as a strong indication that other Abramoff-related indictments or plea agreements are probably imminent. They asserted that Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) is in particular jeopardy because he took part in the Scotland trip and has been mentioned in a veiled way in Abramoff-related guilty pleas, and because Volz, as Ney's former chief of staff, is in a position to testify against him.

Safavian's conviction "bolsters the credibility of Neil Volz as a witness," said Stanley M. Brand, an expert on ethics law. "This is another building block in the case against Ney."

Jonathan Turley, a professor at the George Washington University School of Law, added: "This is the type of conviction that tends to loosen tongues."

Spokesman Brian J. Walsh said in a statement that Ney faces no greater danger of prosecution than he did before the verdict. "The Safavian case had nothing to do with Congressman Ney," Walsh said. "He is confident that . . . he will be vindicated."

Besides Volz, the Justice Department has gotten guilty pleas from Abramoff associates Michael Scanlon, a public relations executive; Adam Kidan, a partner of Abramoff's in a Florida gambling-boat investment; and lobbyist Tony C. Rudy, once a top aide to former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.).

A federal judge in Miami yesterday granted Abramoff and Kidan three more months of freedom before they must begin prison terms for fraud convictions in a separate case involving the purchase of a cruise-ship line. This will give the two more time to cooperate with investigations into official corruption in Washington and into the 2001 slaying in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., of businessman Konstantinos "Gus" Boulis, who was killed a few months after he sold SunCruz Casinos to the pair.

Days before his arrest in September, Safavian had resigned as the White House's chief procurement policy officer, a job he got after leaving the GSA. He had worked earlier as a lobbyist for Abramoff and also as a congressional aide.

He pleaded not guilty to the charges and, in a surprise move, took the stand in his defense. His wife, Jennifer, also testified. Safavian contended that he was a friend and not a business associate of Abramoff's, that he was forthright with federal investigators, and that Abramoff was not engaged in formal business dealings with the GSA because he was not a contractor with the agency.

But prosecutors Peter Zeidenberg and Nathaniel B. Edmonds introduced dozens of e-mails between Safavian and Abramoff to show the jury that Abramoff sought two government properties Safavian's agency oversaw while offering him favors, including the overseas trip. They did not call Abramoff to testify.

In mid-2002, Safavian joined the GSA, which oversees the purchase and leasing of the federal government's billions of dollars in property around the country. Soon after he arrived at the agency, he and Abramoff began e-mailing each other and exchanging information and strategic advice about how to buy or lease the GSA properties.

One was a parcel of land in Montgomery County, on which Abramoff hoped to situate a Jewish high school he supported. The second was the Old Post Office Pavilion on Pennsylvania Avenue NW. Abramoff wanted to convert the historic but underused structure into a luxury hotel for an Indian tribe client.

At the same time, Safavian and Abramoff kept in constant social contact -- on the local golf links and at Abramoff's Pennsylvania Avenue restaurant, Signatures. Safavian also agreed to attend the junket to St. Andrews in Scotland, the birthplace of golf, which was arranged by Abramoff.

In addition to Volz, Ney and Safavian, the trip, via a chartered Gulfstream II jet, included two Ney aides and former Christian Coalition leader Ralph Reed -- a business associate and longtime friend of Abramoff's.

Before that trip in August 2002, Safavian asked the GSA ethics office whether he could accept the gift of airfare without breaching the agency's ethics code. In an e-mail requesting the ruling, Safavian called Abramoff a friend and a lobbyist "but one that has no business before GSA (he does all of this work on Capitol Hill)."

The office replied that Safavian could accept the airfare. Nonetheless, Safavian wrote Abramoff a check for $3,100 before the journey began, an amount that Safavian contended throughout the trial was enough to cover the entire cost of the trip.

Zeidenberg and Edmonds derided that assertion. They presented evidence that the check barely paid one-fifth of the real expense: Hotel rooms ran between $400 and $500 a night, greens fees for golf at the fabled St. Andrews were $400 per game, and rounds of drinks in Scotland cost $100 each. Chartering the jet, for nine passengers, cost at least $91,000.

Former Bush Official Safavian Convicted (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

A former Bush administration official was convicted today of lying and obstructing justice for concealing his ties to Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

A federal jury found David H. Safavian guilty of three counts of lying or making false statements and one count of obstructing justice in the first trial to emerge from the scandal surrounding the disgraced lobbyist.

Each count carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison, and a $250,000 fine. U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman set sentencing for Oct. 12.

Safavian sat without expression as the guilty verdicts were read. He was cleared of one count of obstructing the Senate Indian Affairs Committee's investigation.

The verdict adds momentum to a Justice Department investigation focusing on a number of members of Congress, including Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), whose former chief of staff was a government witness against Safavian.

Four other Abramoff associates have pleaded guilty.

Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to corrupt public officials, and to steal millions from Indian tribes he represented. Abramoff did not testify at Safavian's trial, but his presence loomed large, through dozens of e-mails the government presented to the jury that showed how he attempted to use Safavian to extend his circle of influence.

Safavian had been a friend of the lobbyist since the two worked together at a Washington law firm in the mid-1990s, when Abramoff was just beginning his rise to power.

Safavian later struck out on his own to form a lobbying firm with conservative activist Grover Norquist, and worked as a congressional aide.

In 2002, he was named chief of staff at the General Services Administration, the federal agency that manages billions of dollars worth of federal real estate.

Prosecutors alleged that Safavian never stopped working for Abramoff despite being on the payroll of a public agency. Soon after arriving at GSA, he began exchanging e-mails with Abramoff about two pieces of GSA property that the lobbyist was interested in developing in the Washington area.

The case boiled down to whether Safavian had misled GSA ethics officers and other investigators about his relationship with Abramoff and the circumstances of a lavish golf junket to Scotland that Abramoff was organizing at the time.

Safavian went on the August 2002 trip, reimbursing Abramoff $3,100. Prosecutors alleged that the sum was a small fraction of the total cost, which included private jet service, luxury hotel accommodations, and $400 worth of golf at the famed Old Course at St. Andrews.

Former White House Aide Convicted In Abramoff Inquiry (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 20 — A former White House aide was convicted today of lying to government investigators about his ties to the disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, in the first trial to result from the influence-peddling inquiry centered on Mr. Abramoff.

The former aide, David H. Safavian, who resigned from the White House budget office days before his arrest last September, was convicted of four counts of lying and obstruction of justice in his statements to investigators about Mr. Abramoff and about a 2002 golf trip to Scotland that the lobbyist arranged for Mr. Safavian and others. Mr. Safavian was acquitted on an additional obstruction charge.

The verdict was hailed by Justice Department officials as a victory in their wide-ranging criminal investigation of the lobbying operations run by Mr. Abramoff, a Republican fundraiser who pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to go bribe public officials, including members of Congress, and is cooperating with prosecutors.

The criminal inquiry has created alarm on Capitol Hill, with several Republican lawmakers facing difficult re-election battles this November because of questions about their ties to Mr. Abramoff. Congressional aides said the influence-peddling scandal was a major factor in the decision of Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader and an ally of Mr. Abramoff, to retire from politics this year.

Mr. Safavian, 38 years old and a member of Mr. Abramoff's lobbying staff before joining the Bush administration, showed little emotion as the guilty verdicts were read in federal district court in Washington. He could be given 20 years in prison on the four counts, although federal sentencing guidelines suggest he will face a much lighter sentence.

After four days of deliberation, the jury agreed with prosecutors that Mr. Safavian lied to investigators when he insisted there was no ethical conflict in joining Mr. Abramoff's August 2002 golfing trip to Scotland since, Mr. Safavian claimed, the lobbyist did "no business" with the General Services Administration. Mr. Safavian was then the chief of staff of the G.S.A., which fuctions as the government's real-estate manager.

The jury saw e-mail traffic from the summer of 2002 in which Mr. Abramoff repeatedly asked Mr. Safavian for help in acquiring two real-estate parcels that were controlled by the G.S.A., including the Old Post Office Building on Pennsylvania Avenue in Washington, close to the White House. Mr. Safavian arranged a meeting at G.S.A. for Mr. Safavian's wife to discuss the properties on the day before he left for Scotland.

According to the prosecution's case, Mr. Safavian's lies were initially told in the summer of 2002 to the G.S.A.'s ethics office and then repeated to investigators for the agency's inspector general office and for the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, which investigated Mr. Abramoff's lobbying contracts with Indian tribe casinos. Mr. Safavian left the G.S.A. in 2004 to join the White House budget office as the director of federal procurement policies.

Although Mr. Safavian was the first person to go to trial as a result of ties to Mr. Abramoff, four other Abramoff associates, including two former top House aides to Mr. DeLay, have pleaded guilty to criminal charges and face prison sentences.

Mr. Safavian's lawyer, Barbara Van Gelder, said he would appeal the conviction. In a meeting with reporters after the verdict, she suggested, as she did in the trial, that Mr. Safavian was a victim of guilt by association with Mr. Abramoff, whose name has become synonymous in Washington with the worst abuses of corporate lobbyists. "I've always been perplexed as to why the Justice Department decided to take out the howitzers against Mr. Safavian," she said.

Defense lawyers representing other subjects of the Abramoff investigation said they were chilled by the verdict against Mr. Safavian, suggesting that it might embolden the Justice Department to bring charges against much more prominent public officials who were close to Mr. Abramoff.

"Safavian was a little fish," said a lawyer for a former government official who has also become entangled in the investigations of Mr. Abramoff. The lawyer, who spoke on condition of anonymity, saying he did not want to bring unnecessary attention to his client, added, "I think this makes it easier for the prosecutors to ask permission at the Justice Department to go for the bigger fish."

Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher, the head of the Justice Department's criminal division, said in a statement that "the message of this verdict is clear: in answering questions posed by Congress and by federal agencies, public officials have the same obligation as does the public for which they serve — to tell the truth."

DOJ_NMG_0036510

Among the other lawmakers under close scrutiny by the Justice Department is Representative Bob Ney, an Ohio Republican who joined Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Safavian on the 2002 trip to Scotland, where they played on the fabled course at St. Andrews.

Mr. Ney's former chief of staff, Neil G. Volz, was a government witness against Mr. Safavian and was questioned in detail about the golf trip. He testified as a result of a guilty plea in which Mr. Volz confessed to conspiring with Mr. Abramoff to corrupt public officials, including Mr. Ney.

After learning of Mr. Safavian's conviction, Mr. Ney's office said in a statement today that "the reality" is that Mr. Safavian's trial "had absolutely nothing to do with Congressman Ney" and that the lawmaker "remains absolutely confident that the lies and deception of Jack Abramoff will continue to be revealed."

Probe Becomes Election Issue (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A conviction Tuesday in a Capitol Hill influence-peddling scandal is likely to have broad legal and political effects. The guilty verdict, handed down by a federal jury, could pressure more congressional aides to cooperate with the investigation, and complicate the re-election bids of a handful of Republican legislators named during the trial.

David Safavian, the White House's former top procurement officer, was found guilty on four counts: obstructing the probe of Jack Abramoff's lobbying operations and lying to federal ethics officers and investigators to hide his relationship with Mr. Abramoff.

The verdict -- which followed guilty pleas by Mr. Abramoff and three former congressional aides -- places at least part of the Abramoff scandal inside the Bush administration, not solely in Congress. It is the first trial victory for the Justice Department's task force investigating Mr. Abramoff.

One possible focus of prosecutors is Ohio Republican Rep. Bob Ney, whose role in Abramoff lobbying projects was mentioned in the Safavian trial and the previous guilty-plea agreements. Mr. Ney has denied wrongdoing. His former chief of staff, Neil Volz, is among those who have pleaded guilty; Mr. Volz was the government's star witness in the Safavian trial. (Read about key players1.)

The investigation is factoring into Mr. Ney's re-election campaign, turning a once-safe seat into a battle. Mr. Ney's campaign says that Democrats are trying to make the probe an issue in the campaign, and that it shouldn't be one because he did nothing wrong.

The Safavian trial could complicate the re-election of two other Republicans: Rep. Steven C. LaTourette of Ohio, and Rep. Shelley Moore Capito of West Virginia, says Amy Walter of the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

Until recently, political handicappers such as Ms. Walter expected Mr. LaTourette and Ms. Capito to hold their seats with relative ease. But trial testimony linking the two lawmakers to Mr. Abramoff's lobbying strategy has provided ammunition to opponents. That is a boost for Democrats who need to win 15 seats to take over the House.

Political charges of corruption "become an issue if the incumbent is already perceived as vulnerable," says Ms. Walter. In the cases of Mr. LaTourette and Ms. Capito, both already had weaknesses.

Mr. LaTourette's office didn't return phone calls for comment on whether the investigation would affect his re-election campaign.

Mr. LaTourette's vote in support of the Central American Free Trade Agreement already looms as an issue in his campaign to hold on to the largely blue-collar district. Mr. LaTourette, a 12-year incumbent, had positioned himself as an independent Republican and told constituents he wouldn't support such free-trade deals. A public divorce complicated his 2004 re-election and could resurface in this campaign.

The Abramoff connection, "makes it easier to make the case that Steve LaTourette is not the Steve LaTourette you think he is," Ms. Walter said.

The connection began in 2002, when Mr. Safavian was chief of staff of the General Services Administration, which oversees government property. Mr. Abramoff was seeking, on behalf of his Indian tribal clients, a contract to convert the Old Post Office building in downtown Washington to a hotel.

Mr. Abramoff, working with Mr. Safavian, sought a letter from Capitol Hill to give the tribal clients an edge against competitors for the contract. In September 2002, Mr. LaTourette signed a letter to the GSA invoking a special program for economically distressed communities, urging officials to "consider giving Hubzone businesses an advance opportunity to provide redevelopment proposal that could be given priorities" if they meet all other requirements. Indian tribes were considered Hubzone-qualified businesses.

DOJ_NMG_0036511

Mr. Volz testified that the letter wasn't as strong as the Abramoff team had wished. In the end, Mr. Abramoff and his clients didn't bid on or receive a contract to revamp the building. Mr. LaTourette's spokeswoman has said her boss did nothing wrong in sending the letter and that he has always supported advantages for small businesses.

But Jason Huff, a spokesman for Larry Katz, the first-time candidate and college professor challenging Mr. LaTourette, says that is irrelevant. "It's one thing to get caught up in a scandal that helps people in your district, but these were things not even in the district," he said.

As for Ms. Capito, according to testimony at the Safavian trial, Mr. Volz contacted Ms. Capito's then-chief of staff, Mark Johnson, in 2002 and asked if he would contact the GSA and inquire about the status of a Maryland property Mr. Abramoff wanted for a school he had founded.

Mr. Johnson made the call to the GSA, but it had little effect. Mr. Abramoff's team briefly considered asking Ms. Capito's office to send a letter but the idea was quashed because it might make her politically vulnerable. "We can't ask the most vulnerable Republican incumbent member of Congress in the House to put something in writing that can be made public," Mr. Volz wrote in a July 2002 email to Mr. Abramoff that was copied to Mr. Safavian.

In the trial, prosecutors characterized Ms. Capito as an unwitting player in the scandal.

When asked to comment on whether this will affect Ms. Capito's re-election prospects, her spokesman, Jordan Stoick, said West Virginians will see that Ms. Capito wasn't part of the Abramoff scheme.

Mr. Johnson, the former chief of staff, didn't testify at the trial. He said in an interview that he feels "really bad for my boss now that her name is getting dragged through the mud." Still, the tie to the trial could be another burden in a difficult race. Ms. Capito, a six-year veteran, represents a district that leans Democratic and her allegiance to President Bush's agenda -- including the Iraq war -- is out of sync with many constituents. "Those voters have seemed to be somewhat comfortable supporting Republicans, but the political climate is much different than it was" two years ago, said Ms. Walter of the Cook Political Report.

Ms. Capito faces Mike Callaghan, an assistant U.S. attorney during the Clinton administration, who has made ethics a centerpiece of his campaign.

The Safavian case centered on a 2002 golfing trip to Scotland paid for by Mr. Abramoff and his clients. Prosecutors alleged Mr. Safavian lied to GSA ethics officials when, while seeking clearance to take the trip, he said Mr. Abramoff had "no business" before the agency.

Mr. Safavian argued that he was being truthful because Mr. Abramoff hadn't formally submitted or won a bid to do business with the agency. Mr. Safavian's sentencing is scheduled for October. He faces a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison and $1 million in fines.

Ex-GSA Official Safavian Is Convicted (PHI)

By Marisa Taylor

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - A federal jury convicted a former Bush administration official yesterday of lying about his relationship with convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who is at the center of a broadening investigation into influence-peddling on Capitol Hill.

David Safavian, former chief of staff of the General Services Administration, the federal government's procurement agency, was found guilty of four charges of making false statements and misleading investigators who were looking into Abramoff's dealings with other public officials and lobbyists.

Safavian faces up to five years in prison on each of the four counts. Sentencing was set for Oct. 12.

Prosecutors had accused Safavian of lying about helping Abramoff try to buy two GSA-managed properties.

Safavian also did not reveal the extent of his relationship with Abramoff and his plans to take a golfing trip to Scotland with the lobbyist in August 2002, prosecutors said.

The jury acquitted Safavian of a fifth charge, of trying to mislead the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, which later determined that Abramoff had paid for a portion of the trip with tribal money.

Justice Department officials said Safavian's conviction showed that government officials would be held accountable for failing to cooperate with federal investigators.

"Public officials have the same obligation as does the public for which they serve: to tell the truth," Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said.

Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to fraud, tax evasion, and conspiracy to bribe public officials. He did not testify at Safavian's trial but has agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors.

Four other former Abramoff associates, including a former chief of staff to Rep. Bob W. Ney (R., Ohio) and two former aides to former Rep. Tom DeLay (R., Texas), have pleaded guilty in the scandal. Ney and DeLay have denied any wrongdoing.

DOJ_NMG_0036512

During the eight-day trial, prosecutors presented dozens of e-mail exchanges between Safavian and Abramoff that discussed the GSA properties.

Abramoff contacted Safavian days after his old friend became the GSA's chief of staff to talk to him about the properties, according to federal records.

Abramoff wanted to buy or lease a portion of 600 acres in Silver Spring, Md., and the Old Post Office Building in Washington. At the time, the GSA managed the properties.

Prosecutors said Safavian later advised Abramoff about leasing or buying the properties, gave him internal government documents, and set up a meeting with other GSA officials.

At the time, Safavian had been planning to take the Scotland golf trip with a group that included Abramoff and Ney.

Safavian sought an opinion from ethics officers about whether he could join the trip, telling them Abramoff was a "lawyer and a lobbyist, but one that has no business before GSA," according to the federal documents.

Ethics officers concluded that Safavian could accept a gift as long as Abramoff was not seeking to do business with the GSA. Safavian e-mailed Abramoff: "It looks like Scotland is a go."

During the trial, defense attorneys argued that Safavian had acted appropriately by seeking advice from the ethics officers and reimbursing Abramoff $3,100 for the trip. Prosecutors contended the amount could not have covered his share of the expenses, which exceeded $130,000 for nine people.

Three-Month Reprieve for Abramoff

Convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff will not have to go to prison in a fraud case in Florida for at least three more months,

a judge in Miami ruled yesterday.

U.S. District Judge Paul Huck in March sentenced Abramoff and former business partner Adam Kidan to five years and 10 months in a case tied to their purchase in 2000 of a casino-boat company. Huck told the pair then to surrender to authorities on June 29 to start their prison terms.

Federal prosecutorsrequested a 90-day extension because Abramoff and Kidan were cooperating with investigations into others, including public officials in Washington. Several government agencies are involved in the probe, and quick access to Abramoff is essential, they said.

"The pending investigations will require further contact between the defendants and government agents, which will best be served by the defendants' continued liberty," prosecutors Lawrence LaVecchio and Paul Schwartz wrote in their request, which defense lawyers joined.

Huck ruled yesterdaythat Abramoff and Kidan need not surrender until Oct. 2.

Safavian Found Guilty On Four Criminal Charges (GOVEXEC)

By Jenny Mandel

Government Executive, June 21, 2006

A federal jury on Tuesday found David Safavian, the former federal procurement chief on trial in connection with his dealings with Jack Abramoff, guilty on four of five charges involving lying and obstructing official investigations.

Safavian was convicted on three counts of making false statements and one count of obstructing an investigation. He was cleared on a fifth charge of obstructing an investigation by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee.

The verdict came early on the fifth day of deliberations, with jurors finding that Safavian made false statements to an ethics official at the General Services Administration, where he worked as chief of staff, both by concealing that he assisted Abramoff with agency activities and by stating that the lobbyist did all his work on Capitol Hill.

The jury also found Safavian had lied to the GSA inspector general's office by concealing his dealings with Abramoff, and to the Senate committee in a letter stating that Abramoff did not have business with the GSA at the time of a 2002 golf trip to Scotland that Safavian took with the lobbyist.

Safavian faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine for each of the four counts, though his lawyer, Barbara Van Gelder, said she would draw on his clean record in arguing that he serve less than the full 20 years. Sentencing is scheduled for Oct. 12.

Van Gelder said her client will appeal the jury's decision, a process she said could take many years.

As possible grounds for appeal, Van Gelder cited concerns with the verdict form, which she said used overly broad language and introduced new wording that had not been defined during the trial. She also described instructions on how the jury was to consider a flood of e-mail traffic between Safavian and Abramoff as confusing and "hypertechnical," with some messages to be considered solely for the fact that they were sent, while others could be considered as statements of fact.

Van Gelder, who spoke with several jurors after the verdict was announced, said, "It's clear the e-mails certainly played ... a maybe more central role than they should have," noting that their sheer volume gave the government's case "heft."

But she said the verdict could not be taken as a clear indication of how others caught up in the Abramoff scandal may fare should they face trial. "Each defendant is a snowflake," she said, noting that others who pleaded guilty had admitted to different charges relating to provision of their "good and honest services."

Van Gelder said the decision could have a chilling effect on government officials considering whether to seek ethics opinions if they feel that might open them up to future charges.

"I've always been perplexed by why the Justice Department took out the howitzers and started aiming them at David Safavian," she said. But she stood by her decision not to subpoena Abramoff during the trial, saying his status as a cooperating government witness would have limited her access to interview him in advance.

After the judge read the verdict and the lawyers, court officials and much of the public had left the room, Safavian continued to sit blank-faced on a bench in the courtroom with his wife, Jennifer, who testified during the trial.

Van Gelder said the past several weeks have been emotional for her client. "This has been a very long road for Mr. Safavian," she said.

Ex-Abramoff Associate Safavian Found Guilty (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 21, 2006

Former White House official faces up to 20 years in prison when sentenced this fall.

Former White House official David Safavian was found guilty Tuesday of obstructing justice and lying to federal investigators about his relationship with ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff. The verdict gives a boost to the government's ongoing probe into the dealings of the one-time Washington power broker.

A federal jury found Safavian, who served as chief procurement officer at the Office of Management and Budget until last September, guilty on three counts of making false statements and one count of obstructing justice. The jury acquitted him on a second count of obstructing justice in connection with an investigation of Abramoff conducted by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee. Safavian faces up to 20 years in prison when sentenced this fall.

The case was a significant victory for the government's expanding public corruption probe. Safavian's was the first, and so far only, Abramoff-related case to make it to trial. Four other targets — Abramoff and his associates Michael Scanlon, Neil Volz, and Tony Rudy — agreed to plead guilty to a variety of charges, including conspiracy to bribe public officials.

"The message of this verdict is clear: In answering questions posed by Congress and by federal agencies, public officials have the same obligation as does the public which they serve — to tell the truth. No one is above the law," said Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher, in a statement released by the Justice Department.

Safavian's case was somewhat narrower than those of others targeted in the Abramoff probe. It focused on an August 2002 trip Safavian took to Scotland and London that Abramoff sponsored. Others on the junket included Ohio Republican Rep. Bob Ney and political strategist Ralph Reed, the former head of the Christian Coalition. Attendees played rounds of golf at the Old Course of St. Andrews and stayed at luxury hotels in London and Scotland.

At the time of the trip, Safavian had just been appointed chief of staff to the administrator of the Government Services Administration. But when asking for clearance to go on the trip, Safavian told a GSA ethics officer that Abramoff had no business before the agency because he did all of his work on Capitol Hill. In fact, Abramoff had previously sought assistance from Safavian to secure leases on two GSA-controlled properties.

During the trial prosecutors disclosed hundreds of e-mails between Safavian and Abramoff that detailed extensive consultations between the two. Safavian actively advised Abramoff, an old friend, on the best way to proceed with his two GSA-related projects. One of those projects involved using a government facility in Silver Spring, Md., to house a Jewish day school Abramoff had helped found. The other project was a bid for the Old Post Office building in downtown Washington, which an Abramoff client wanted to convert into an upscale hotel. Neither proposal ever got off the ground.

Prosecutors argued that even though Safavian paid Abramoff $3,100 to cover the cost of the Scotland trip, which included multiple rounds of golf and expensive dinners, he should have known that the actual cost was far higher.

Safavian took the stand for two days, testifying that he never tried to hide anything about his relationship with Abramoff. While he admitted he had, at times, used poor judgment in some of the e-mails he sent to Abramoff, he maintained he did not believe Abramoff's interests met the technical standards of "doing business" with the agency.

Safavian first came under scrutiny in March 2003, when an anonymous caller to the GSA raised questions about the Scotland trip. Safavian gave an official in the inspector general's office the GSA ethics opinion clearing him to go on the trip, and no further action was taken. Then, in the spring of 2004, he sent the same ethics opinion, which included the false statement about Abramoff's business, to the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, which was also probing the Scotland trip. But it wasn't until May 2005 that federal investigators first approached him. He was arrested in September.

The jury's deliberations in the case were not problem-free. The judge dismissed one juror on the second day, forcing the remaining jurors to start deliberations over again. On Tuesday morning attorneys for both sides were in court again to discuss scheduling problems with three other jurors when the jury came back, after three and a half days, with its decision.

After the verdict was read, Safavian's family and friends seated in the courtroom broke down in tears.

Safavian's attorney, Barbara Van Gelder, vowed to appeal the decision. She called the entire government investigation of her client an attempt to make "a mountain out of a molehill." Though she said she believed the jury had deliberated thoroughly, she argued that the introduction of many of the e-mails into evidence, as well as the language of the jury form, was improper and had prejudiced the outcome of the case.

Safavian Convicted Of Hiding Aid To Lobbyist Abramoff (Update6) (BLOOM)

By Kristin Jensen

Bloomberg, June 21, 2006

June 20 (Bloomberg) -- A federal jury convicted former White House official David Safavian of lying and obstructing justice in the first trial to come out of the influence-peddling investigation of Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Safavian, 38, was found guilty today of three counts of making false statements and one count of obstructing justice. He was acquitted of another obstruction charge. Each count carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

The verdict validates the Justice Department's strategy of relying on e-mail messages to show that Safavian concealed the inside help he gave to Abramoff. Without calling Abramoff to the witness stand, prosecutors Peter Zeidenberg and Nathaniel Edmonds painted Safavian as a public servant led astray by lavish gifts.

``The e-mails certainly played a very large, maybe more important, role than they should have in this case," Safavian's attorney, Barbara Van Gelder, told reporters outside the federal courthouse in Washington after the verdict. ``Mr. Abramoff loomed large, and his absence loomed larger than his presence."

Abramoff, 47, became the subject of a U.S. government task force investigation after a series of articles in the Washington Post in 2004 about his financial dealings with partner Michael Scanlon and their work for American Indian tribes. In January this year, Abramoff pleaded guilty to defrauding the tribes and conspiring to corrupt public officials.

`Bigger Sword'

Scanlon and two other former congressional aides, who later worked for Abramoff, have also pleaded guilty to conspiracy. They are cooperating with prosecutors investigating other lobbyists and public officials including U.S. Representative Bob Ney, who traveled with Safavian on an Abramoff-arranged golf trip to Scotland in 2002. Ney has denied all wrongdoing.

``Prosecutors now have a bigger sword to rattle when they are trying to convince witnesses to cooperate, or individuals to plead guilty," said Joshua Berman, a former Justice Department lawyer and partner at Sonnenschein, Nath & Rosenthal LLP in Washington. ``The prosecutors can essentially say to a reluctant target or subject, `Look, we're prepared to try these cases. We did it with Safavian and are ready to do it with you.'"

Van Gelder had fought the introduction of hundreds of e- mails into evidence, arguing that Abramoff should appear on the witness stand to show whether they were valid. The decision by U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman to allow the e-mails into evidence without any testimony by Abramoff will play a role in the fight to overturn the verdict, she said.

Straight Ahead

Safavian looked straight ahead and made no statement as Friedman read the verdict, reached after more than four days of deliberation by the jury. The judge set a sentencing date for Oct. 12 and a court date for Aug. 24 to hear Van Gelder's arguments in an expected bid to throw out the verdict.

``We're still absolutely staunch" that Safavian did nothing wrong, Van Gelder said. ``It is more difficult today than ever before to maintain your innocence and explain your innocence."

The Safavian case stems from the August 2002 trip Abramoff arranged for a group to visit Scotland's famed St. Andrews golf course. Abramoff added on three nights in London, where guests stayed in $500-a-night rooms at the Mandarin Oriental hotel.

Abramoff chartered a private jet at a cost of more than $91,000 for the nine-person outing. Ney, an Ohio Republican, came with two of his aides, Will Heaton and Paul Vinovich. The group also included Abramoff's son, two of his fellow lobbyists and Christian activist Ralph Reed, a longtime friend.

At the time of the trip, Safavian was chief of staff at the General Services Administration, which oversees government land. Before the trip, he sent an e-mail to a GSA ethics official asking how he should treat the offer from Abramoff of a free ride on the jet. He told the ethics official that Abramoff had ``no business before GSA'' and did all his work on Capitol Hill.

Prosecutors said those statements were untrue because Safavian and Abramoff had discussed how to acquire rights to GSA properties in a series of e-mails shown to the jury. Safavian said his statement was true because Abramoff, who worked for Greenberg Traurig LLP, didn't have any GSA contracts or bids and wasn't likely to have any.

Safavian also said he believed he had paid for the trip and his share of airfare with a $3,100 check written to Abramoff, a former colleague and golfing buddy. Prosecutors said Safavian should have known the vacation was far more expensive and contended that he accepted an improper gift.

`Tell the Truth'

When the GSA Inspector General's office and later a Senate committee investigating Abramoff asked Safavian about the trip, prosecutors contended that Safavian lied again. The jury agreed.

``The message of this verdict is clear: In answering questions posed by Congress and by federal agencies, public officials have the same obligation as does the public for which they serve -- to tell the truth,'' Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher said in a statement. ``No one is above the law.''

Safavian left the GSA after getting an appointment from President George W. Bush to the Office of Management and Budget. He served as the government's top procurement officer until September 2005, when he resigned several days before his arrest.

``Even though Safavian is not a major target in the Abramoff investigations, as the first defendant to go to trial, his conviction will generate prosecutorial momentum,'' said Greg Wallance, a former federal prosecutor and now a lawyer at the New York firm Kaye Scholer. ``The conviction likely will encourage other witnesses -- who until now have been unwilling to cooperate -- to get off the fence and make a deal.''

The case is U.S. v. Safavian, 05cr370, U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

Ex-Bush Official Guilty In Lobby Scandal (WT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

ASSOCIATED PRESS

A jury found former Bush administration official David Safavian guilty yesterday of covering up his dealings with Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Safavian was convicted on four of five felony counts of lying and obstruction. He had resigned from his White House post last year as the federal government's chief procurement officer.

The verdict gave a boost to the wide-ranging influence-peddling probe focusing on Abramoff's dealings with Congress.

In the Safavian case, prosecutors highlighted the name of Rep. Bob Ney, Ohio Republican. They introduced a photograph of the congressman and Abramoff standing in front of a private jet that whisked them and other members of a golfing party for a five-day trip to St. Andrews Old Course in Scotland. Safavian went on the trans-Atlantic trip while he was chief of staff at the General Services Administration (GSA).

The trial consumed eight days of testimony about Safavian's assistance to Abramoff regarding government-owned real estate and the excursion to Scotland that the lobbyist organized. The verdict came on the fifth day of jury deliberations.

Safavian showed no expression when the judge announced the guilty verdicts on each of four counts. Sentencing was scheduled for Oct. 12.

"The task force will say how this was a great day in the war on corruption," said Barbara van Gelder, Safavian's attorney, referring to the Justice Department task force investigating the Abramoff scandal. "I find they made a mountain out of a molehill and now they're going to plant the flag on top of the molehill."

This was the first trial to emerge from the scandal surrounding Abramoff, who is a former business partner of Safavian's. Abramoff has pleaded guilty to federal crimes in Washington and in Miami.

A key witness in the case was Neil Volz, a convicted partner of Abramoff's and ex-chief of staff to Mr. Ney. Prosecutors introduced hundreds of e-mails exchanged among Safavian, Abramoff, Volz and others in 2002.

The Justice Department made a case that Safavian provided Abramoff with advice and some inside information about two government properties.

Prosecutors said Abramoff wanted to buy or lease part of the GSA's White Oak property in the Maryland suburbs for use by a Jewish school he had established. They also said he wanted to give an Indian tribe client a leg up on obtaining the contract to redevelop the Old Post Office in downtown Washington as a luxury hotel, near two restaurants Abramoff owned.

DOJ_NMG_0036516

Volz testified that the Abramoff team referred to Safavian as one of their "champions" inside government, who could give them insider information they couldn't get elsewhere.

Safavian took the stand for two days in his own defense. He acknowledged some misjudgments and forwarding Abramoff some insider information.

He maintained he simply gave generally available information to an old friend who was inquiring about government property that the GSA had not decided what to do with yet.

Former Bush Official Convicted Of Lying About Ties To Abramoff (KRT)

By Marisa Taylor

Knight Ridder, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - A federal jury convicted a former Bush administration official Tuesday of lying about his relationship with a high-powered Washington lobbyist who's at the center of a broadening investigation into influence-peddling on Capitol Hill.

David Safavian, former chief of staff of the General Services Administration, the federal government's procurement agency, was found guilty of four charges of making false statements and misleading investigators who were looking into Jack Abramoff's dealings with other public officials and lobbyists.

At his sentencing in October, Safavian faces up to five years in prison on each of the four counts.

Prosecutors had accused Safavian of lying about helping Abramoff attempt to buy two GSA-managed properties in the Washington area.

Safavian also didn't reveal the extent of his relationship with Abramoff and his plans to take a golfing trip to Scotland with the lobbyist in August 2002, prosecutors said.

The jury acquitted Safavian of a fifth charge, of attempting to mislead the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, which later determined that Abramoff had paid for a portion of the trip with tribal money.

Justice Department officials said Safavian's conviction showed that government officials would be held accountable for failing to cooperate with federal investigators.

"Public officials have the same obligation as does the public for which they serve: to tell the truth," Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said.

Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials. He didn't testify in the Safavian case, although he's agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors.

Four other former Abramoff associates, including a former chief of staff for Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, and two former aides to former Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, have pleaded guilty in the scandal. Ney and DeLay have denied any wrongdoing.

Neil Volz, Ney's former chief of staff, pleaded guilty in May to conspiring with Abramoff. Former DeLay aides Michael Scanlon and Tony Rudy have pleaded guilty to committing fraud and violating the federal one-year lobbying ban. Volz testified on behalf of the government during Safavian's trial.

During the eight-day trial, prosecutors presented dozens of e-mails between Safavian and Abramoff discussing the GSA properties.

Abramoff contacted Safavian days after his old friend became GSA's chief of staff to talk to him about the properties, according to federal records.

Abramoff wanted to buy or lease a portion of 600 acres in Silver Spring, Md., and the Old Post Office Building in Washington. At the time, the GSA managed the properties.

Prosecutors said Safavian later gave Abramoff advice about leasing or buying the properties, provided him with internal government documents and set up a meeting with other GSA officials.

At the time, Safavian had been planning to take the golfing trip to Scotland with a group that included Abramoff and Ney.

Safavian sought an opinion from ethics officers about whether he could join the trip, telling them Abramoff was a "lawyer and a lobbyist, but one that has no business before GSA," according to the federal documents.

Ethics officers concluded that Safavian could accept a gift as long as Abramoff wasn't seeking to do business with the GSA.

During the trial, defense attorneys argued that Safavian had acted appropriately by seeking advice from the ethics officers and reimbursing Abramoff $3,100 for the trip. Safavian's attorney Barbara Van Gelder didn't return repeated calls.

Prosecutors countered that the amount couldn't have covered his share of the expenses, which exceeded $130,000 for nine people.

Guilty Verdict For Associate Of Abramoff (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0036517

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — In the first trial arising from the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal, a federal jury on Tuesday found a former Bush administration official guilty of lying and concealing his ties to the disgraced Republican lobbyist.

The case against David H. Safavian, once the government's chief procurement officer, turned on a lavish golf outing to Scotland. His conviction was a milestone for the Justice Department, which is continuing to pursue figures linked to Abramoff. The verdict adds momentum to that probe and is apt to put pressure on Safavian to cooperate with investigators to gain leniency when he is sentenced.

Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to corrupt public officials and to steal millions from Indian tribes he represented; he has agreed to cooperate in the ongoing investigation of his activities. Abramoff did not testify at Safavian's trial, although prosecutors introduced dozens of e-mails to show how he used his friendship with Safavian to learn more about government properties for sale.

Safavian was found guilty on three counts of lying or making false statements and one count of obstructing justice. Each count carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman set sentencing for Oct. 12.

"The message of this verdict is clear: In answering questions posed by Congress and by federal agencies, public officials have the same obligation as does the public for which they serve — to tell the truth. No one is above the law," Alice Fisher, chief of the Justice Department's criminal division, said in a prepared statement.

The verdict comes amid the investigation into whether Abramoff illegally traded campaign contributions and other favors to aid his lobbying clients. Federal agents are focusing on a number of Congress members, including Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), whose former chief of staff was the key government witness against Safavian.

Three other former Abramoff associates have pleaded guilty to crimes related to the scandal.

A lawyer for Safavian said her client had tried to play by the rules but had been swept up in a broader government corruption crackdown.

"The task force will say how this was a great day in the war on corruption," Barbara van Gelder said after the verdict. "I find they made a mountain out of a molehill, and now they're going to plant the flag on top of the molehill."

Legal experts said the verdict would strengthen the government's hand in dealing with others under investigation, and show that the government was serious about pursuing even lesser players caught in the Abramoff web.

"The conviction likely will encourage other witnesses — who until now have been unwilling to cooperate — to get off the fence and make a deal," said Greg Wallance, a former federal prosecutor in Brooklyn who was part of the team that prosecuted members of Congress in the so-called ABSCAM investigation in the 1970s and 1980s.

Democrats, eager to make corruption in Washington an issue at the polls in November, also said the conviction was significant.

The verdict "is another sign that the grip of the Republican culture of corruption and abuses of power in Washington is loosening, but it's just the tip of the iceberg," Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said.

Safavian befriended Abramoff at a Washington lobbying firm in the mid-1990s, when Abramoff was just beginning his rise to power in the capital. Safavian later struck out on his own to form a lobbying firm with conservative activist Grover Norquist. Safavian also worked as a congressional aide.

In 2002, he was named chief of staff at the General Services Administration, the powerful agency that manages billions in federal real estate. President Bush later named him the top procurement official at the Office of Management and Budget. He resigned that post last fall just before he was arrested and charged.

Prosecutors said Safavian never stopped working with Abramoff, even after he was employed by a federal agency. Soon after arriving at GSA, he began exchanging e-mails with Abramoff about two pieces of GSA property that the lobbyist was interested in developing in the Washington area.

The case boiled down to whether Safavian had misled GSA ethics officers and other investigators about his relationship with Abramoff and the circumstances of a lavish golf trip to Scotland that Abramoff was organizing at the time. Safavian went on the August 2002 trip, reimbursing Abramoff $3,100 to cover his share of the costs.

But prosecutors said the sum was a small fraction of the total cost, which included private jet service, luxury hotel accommodations and $400 rounds of golf at the famed Old Course at St. Andrews.

Safavian had requested an opinion from the GSA ethics office about whether he was permitted under agency conflict-of-interest rules to go on the trip. The office approved the trip after Safavian assured officials in an e-mail that Abramoff had "no business before G.S.A."

Prosecutors said the statement was a lie. Using e-mail traffic, they showed that, just weeks before the trip, Safavian was advising Abramoff on how to acquire GSA property in Maryland for a Jewish academy that the lobbyist had founded. Safavian also offered Abramoff tips on being considered for a GSA contract to redevelop the Old Post Office building on Pennsylvania Avenue near the White House.

Abramoff didn't acquire either property.

In addition, the five-count indictment charged Safavian with lying and concealing information from the GSA inspector general — who had been tipped off to the trip by an anonymous call to the agency hot line. Safavian also was charged with lying to the staff of a Senate committee that was investigating Abramoff. He was acquitted of a charge of obstructing the committee's investigation.

Safavian's case was hurt by the testimony of a former congressional staffer, GSA officials — and his own words.

A star witness was Neil Volz, who had gone to work for Abramoff after serving as chief of staff to Ney. He testified that Safavian and Ney were seen as "champions" who could always be counted on to back causes the lobbyists touted. Both Volz — who testified as part of a deal with prosecutors last month in which he pleaded guilty to corruption charges — and Ney were part of the golf trip to Scotland.

GSA and Senate investigators testified that they were kept in the dark about the advice Safavian gave Abramoff, and said the information could have altered their decision to clear the trip.

And Safavian, testifying in his own defense, said that the $3,100 he paid for the golf trip was based on an estimate provided by Abramoff, and that he had no reason to doubt it despite lavish accommodations. He said under cross-examination that he believed the cost of a round of golf at St. Andrews was "comparable" to the $135 he paid to play golf at a good course in the Maryland suburbs. The government estimated that the true cost of his share was more than five times the amount he paid.

"Mr. Safavian tried to serve two masters," Justice Department lawyer Nathaniel Edmonds told the jury last week as the government wrapped up its case. "He was appointed by the president to serve the people of the United States. But he chose to serve Jack Abramoff."

Safavian Found Guilty Of Lying About Abramoff (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, June 21, 2006

A jury yesterday found David Safavian, a former Bush administration official, guilty of lying about his dealings with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The former General Services Administration official was convicted on four of five felony counts of lying and obstruction.

The trial revolved around testimony about Safavian's assistance to Abramoff regarding government-owned property and a weeklong trip to a famed golfing course in Scotland and London.

Abramoff did not testify in Safavian's case, but Neil Volz, an Abramoff associate and former chief of staff to embattled Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), testified against Safavian.

Safavian's case was the first to go to trial in the influence-peddling case arising from the Abramoff scandal. A date for Safavian's sentencing has yet to be set.

Procurement Nominee Offers Contrast To Predecessor: Experience (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

The contrast between present and past nominees was fairly obvious although never addressed yesterday in the Senate hearing room.

Paul A. Denett , the president's choice to head the White House's federal procurement policy office, was selected primarily because of his deep knowledge of government contracting. His predecessor, David H. Safavian , had come to the job primarily because of his political connections.

Yesterday morning, Denett, 60, promised at his confirmation hearing "to build a world-class acquisition system that garners the confidence of our taxpayers by consistently delivering efficient, effective and ethical contracting service."

A few blocks away, down Capitol Hill, a federal jury announced that Safavian, 38, had been found guilty on four of five felony charges tied to a corruption and influence-peddling scandal centered around lobbyist Jack Abramoff . [Story, A1.]

Safavian's name was not mentioned at the hearing on Denett's nomination to head the Office of Federal Procurement Policy, part of the Office of Management and Budget. Denett was nominated in April to serve as the OFPP administrator, replacing Safavian, who had resigned in September.

DOJ_NMG_0036519

But Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), who held the hearing as chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, told Denett that she wanted to see the procurement office play a stronger role in federal contracting, suggesting that the office might want to consider auditing agencies' performance.

"OFPP is often too passive in its role," she said.

These are trying times for the federal contracting community. In addition to the embarrassment caused by the Safavian case, members of Congress are frustrated by recent procurement woes at the departments of Defense and Homeland Security.

Collins said noncompetitive contracts and other lax practices had caused the government to squander more than $1 billion in its response to Hurricane Katrina. The only other committee member to attend the hearing, Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), faulted some Iraq war contract practices and urged Denett to go after contracts that lead to wasteful spending, noting that there "are some real gravy trains out there."

Denett agreed with the senators that there is "vast room for improvement" in federal procurement practices and said agency contracting officers should be held accountable for getting the best price for the taxpayer.

The nominee said he would work to improve training for the federal acquisition workforce, help agencies plan and operate more effectively during emergencies like Katrina, work for greater clarity and transparency in contract management, and ensure that work performed by federal employees is put up for bid "in a reasoned and responsible manner."

Denett served for more than 30 years as a career federal employee in the Navy and Army and the departments of Agriculture, Treasury and Interior. He held senior positions in acquisition operations and policy and started intern programs to recruit and train acquisition specialists.

Since 2003, he has been vice president of contracting programs at ESI International, a training and consulting firm in Arlington.

Aides to Collins said she hopes to soon schedule a committee vote and move the nomination to the Senate for approval.Pension Policy on Hold

Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman has ordered a one-year suspension of a new policy that would shift contract workers to "market-based" retirement and health-care plans to reduce costs.

The policy, announced April 27, was criticized in Congress as an effort to force Energy contractors to abandon guaranteed pensions and cut back medical benefits for new employees. The House Appropriations Committee and some members of Congress had introduced proposals to block the policy.

Energy officials said the policy was aimed at helping rein in growing liabilities. They noted that the department will spend $784 million this year to reimburse contractors for health-care and defined-benefit pension programs.

Bodman said he has directed department personnel to continue talks with interested parties, including members of Congress, during the one-year suspension. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said he was pleased that Bodman "retracted this harmful policy."

Safavian Found Guilty In Lobbyist Trial (AP-Y2)

By Pete Yost

AP2, June 21, 2006

The Justice Department on Tuesday won its first trial in the probe of influence peddler Jack Abramoff, convicting a former Bush administration official in a case that touched on questionable behavior by members of Congress.

A jury found David Safavian had hidden details of his relationship with Abramoff from a General Services Administration ethics lawyer, the GSA's Inspector General's office and the Senate Indian Affairs Committee and had obstructed the IG.

Safavian, the GSA's former chief of staff, could face up to five years in prison on each of those four counts. He was acquitted of obstructing the Senate probe.

The guilty verdict is expected to give a boost to a wide-ranging federal investigation that includes lawmakers, their aides and members of the Bush administration.

"The message of this verdict is clear: In answering questions posed by Congress and by federal agencies, public officials have the same obligation as does the public for which they serve — to tell the truth," said Alice Fisher, the assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's criminal division.

In Miami, meanwhile, a judge granted Abramoff and ex-business partner Adam Kidan another three months before they must begin serving prison sentences for fraud convictions stemming from the purchase of a gambling boat fleet. Abramoff also faces sentencing in Washington on federal charges of conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud.

The delay will give the two more time to cooperate with investigators.

In persuading a jury to convict Safavian, prosecutors introduced a photograph of Rep. Bob Ney (news, bio, voting record), R-Ohio, and Abramoff standing next to a private jet that whisked them and other members of a golfing party to Scotland for five days at the storied St. Andrews Old Course. Safavian was in the photo too, as were two of Ney's aides who also went on the Abramoff-organized junket.

Recent Justice Department court papers say Ney engaged in 16 actions on behalf of Abramoff at the same time the congressman and his staff were accepting gifts from the lobbyist.

In response to Tuesday's verdict, Ney's office blamed Ney's problems on "the lies and deception of Jack Abramoff."

Ney "has never, at any point, engaged in any improper, unethical or illegal activity" and the Safavian case "had absolutely nothing to do with Congressman Ney," his office said.

Prosecutors never called Abramoff to testify, instead relying on e-mail traffic to detail the relationship between the lobbyist and Safavian.

Abramoff, the e-mails showed, showered the GSA chief of staff with the lobbyist's largesse while badgering him for information about two pieces of government-controlled property the lobbyist wanted. One of them was the historic Old Post Office in downtown Washington.

Testifying in his own defense, Safavian said he and Abramoff were longtime friends and that he was trying to do the right thing by seeking a GSA ethics opinion on whether he could go on the Scotland trip.

Safavian sat impassively as U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman read the verdict, showing no emotion when the judge announced the guilty verdicts on each of four counts. Sentencing was scheduled for Oct. 12.

Safavian's attorney, Barbara Van Gelder, said the Justice Department task force investigating the Abramoff scandal will say that "this was a great day in the war on corruption. I find they made a mountain out of a molehill and now they're going to plant the flag on top of the molehill."

Van Gelder said convicting Safavian for not disclosing certain details to the ethics officer will dissuade other government officials from seeking such guidance.

Safavian did not disclose the advice and assistance he gave Abramoff on the two properties, including what Safavian acknowledged on the stand was some inside information about the position of officials in other agencies about the post office redevelopment.

In a bid for a lighter sentence on his own conviction, Neil Volz, Ney's former chief of staff, testified for the prosecution. Volz outlined how the Abramoff team received assistance on the GSA properties from several Republican congressmen or their aides including Ney, Rep. Don Young (news, bio, voting record) of Alaska, Rep. Steven LaTourette (news, bio, voting record) of Ohio and a former top aide to Rep. Shelley Moore Capito (news, bio, voting record) of West Virginia.

Volz told the jury the Abramoff team referred to Safavian and Ney as two of their "champions" who helped with inside information and assistance. Volz said Safavian was the mastermind of some of the strategy for developing congressional pressure or action to sway GSA. Volz said they tried to keep this maneuvering secret.

Ney's office called it "baffling" that Ney could be referred to as a champion for Abramoff "when there is no evidence that he took any official action on any of the issues Neil testified about."

Young's office has said he did not advocate any particular business over another. LaTourette said he was simply advocating special opportunities for small businesses. Capito's office said the congresswoman was unaware of assistance provided by her then-chief of staff.

Saginaw Tribe Wants Former Employee Investigated (AP)

By Tim Martin, Associated Press

AP, June 21, 2006

LANSING, Mich. (AP) -- The Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe wants the U.S. Department of Justice to investigate one of its former employees and his ties to tainted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Former legislative affairs worker Christopher Petras is accused by the tribe of giving "incorrect and misleading" testimony to the U.S. Senate Affairs Committee in September 2004 during hearings about Abramoff and Abramoff's associate, Michael Scanlon.

Abramoff is charged with defrauding the Mount Pleasant tribe while representing its interests in Washington, mainly from late 2001 to late 2003. Both he and Scanlon have pleaded guilty to various crimes dealing with work they did for Indian tribes in Michigan, Louisiana, Mississippi and Texas.

Although Petras testified before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee that he didn't recall many of the details about his communications with Abramoff and Scanlon, the tribe says a trail of e-mails and other testimony indicate a stronger relationship than Petras revealed.

DOJ_NMG_0036521

Federal prosecutors say Abramoff encouraged the tribe to expand a lobbying contract without disclosing that he would receive about 50 percent of the profits from the tribe's payments. From June 2002 to October 2003, the tribe paid about $3.5 million on the contract, with about $540,000 being kicked back to Abramoff, court documents say.

Abramoff's former employer, Greenberg Traurig LLP, has agreed to repay millions of dollars to the tribe as part of a settlement. The Saginaw Chippewas say they paid about $14 million to Abramoff and Scanlon overall.

Tribal Chief Fred Cantu sent a letter last month requesting the Justice Department investigation to U.S. Sen. John McCain, the Arizona Republican who heads the Senate Indian Affairs Committee. The Senate committee is expected to release its own report this week on its investigation into Abramoff and the tribes.

Bernie Sprague, a former tribal subchief, is upset Petras did not reveal more at the Senate hearing of his ties to Abramoff.

"He was an employee of the tribe. He was on our payroll," Sprague said. "We expected him to be honest and forthright with us, and he was none of the above."

Tribal representatives say they want to find out what Petras knew about financial dealings concerning Abramoff.

"All that money coming from the tribe to Abramoff and Scanlon ... he had to know about that," Dave Otto, a former tribal subchief, said of Petras. "I think he knew or had to have some idea of what was going on."

Petras has not returned repeated phone messages and e-mails from The Associated Press in recent weeks seeking his side of the story. He worked in the Saginaw Chippewas' legislative affairs office from late 1998 to early 2004, when his job was eliminated by a newly elected tribal council.

E-mails submitted as part of the Senate committee's hearing process give some insight into Abramoff's dealings with Petras.

A May 2000 e-mail from Abramoff appears to indicate that Petras requested a meeting with Abramoff's firm about possible representation for the Saginaw Chippewa tribe.

In his 2004 testimony, Petras said he had no role in hiring Abramoff and that other tribal officials made the decision. However, he also said Abramoff's former firm was one of three for which he lined up interviews when the tribe was trying to expand its influence in Washington.

The Senate Indian Affairs Committee learned in 2004 that Abramoff and Scanlon spent $100,000 to help get eight supporters elected to the Saginaw Chippewas' 12-member council in 2001. Otto said that Petras was involved in that process and arranged a meeting with Scanlon. The new council soon voted to hire Abramoff and Scanlon.

Petras told the Senate panel the lobbyists gave him a digital video camera, a leather briefcase and "some type of slide projection desktop screen" as gifts but otherwise never paid him for that work.

He is listed on Abramoff gift lists as receiving $200 in December 2000 and $100 in December 2001. Tribal representatives say it is possible the gifts Petras acknowledged receiving are the same ones reflected on the lists. Other tribal officials also are named as gift recipients.

Current tribal leaders and Petras differ on how much influence Petras had on the political contributions the tribe made while he worked for them.

Petras testified there were "no efforts on my behalf to push either way any type of political contribution." Tribal leaders say that appears to be contradicted by other documents.

Petras told the Senate Indian Affairs Committee he never assessed how Washington lobbyists were doing. That was left for the council members themselves. In later testimony, Petras said he may have told the council from time to time that Abramoff and Scanlon were doing a good job.

E-mails indicate Abramoff and Petras may have worked to try and regain influence in February 2004 -- after they no longer worked for the tribe -- by getting involved in a recall election of tribal officers.

"They are running out of money for copying, stamps, etc. Petras asked if we could come up with $2500 to help them out," an e-mail from an Abramoff co-worker to Abramoff read. E-mails indicate Abramoff instructed a co-worker to get money from one of his accounts to help the recall effort.

In his Senate testimony, Petras said he did not recall the incident.

Another e-mail indicates Abramoff planned to loan Petras a computer so they could stay in contact after the newly elected tribal council eliminated Petras' job.

More Than $2M Raised For Libby's Defense (AP-Y2)

AP2, June 21, 2006

Supporters of Vice President Dick Cheney's indicted former chief of staff have raised more than $2 million since late last year for his legal defense in the CIA leak case.

Former Cheney spokeswoman Mary Matalin was hosting a fundraiser at her home Tuesday night to help pay the legal expenses of I. Lewis Libby, who is charged with five counts of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI in the Valerie Plame affair.

The $2 million figure came from Barbara Comstock, a member of Libby's legal team. Among the co-hosts for the event at Matalin's home were former Energy Secretary Spencer Abraham, former Rep. Bob Livingston and oil industry executive and former Commerce Secretary Don Evans.

Former Republican Sen. Fred Thompson hosted a fundraiser at his northern Virginia home last month to raise money for Libby's defense.

Libby is accused of lying to Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald about how the former Cheney aide learned of Plame's CIA identity and what he told reporters about it.

One Count Dropped In Patronage Trial (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush And Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, June 21, 2006

Mayor Richard Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich and his three co-defendants scored a victory in court Tuesday when a federal judge tossed out a significant fraud charge against all of them in their City Hall corruption trial.

U.S. District Judge David Coar's ruling came as prosecutors rested a six-week case that portrayed much of the city's hiring and promotions system as riddled with political favoritism, sham interviews and preselected job applicants.

Coar also said Tuesday that he will reserve ruling on whether to dismiss all charges against former Streets and Sanitation officials John Sullivan and Patrick Slattery.

He rejected a defense request to dismiss remaining charges against Sorich and his former aide Timothy McCarthy.

Prosecutors allege in an eight-count indictment that the men schemed to rig hiring and promotion for many blue-collar city jobs in favor of pro-Daley political workers and others with political clout.

Coar tossed out count one of the indictment, a mail fraud charge against all four defendants, after prosecutors conceded they cannot provide evidence that a particular job applicant, Streets and Sanitation employee Joseph Pratl, received a 2004 promotion letter through the mail.

Pratl's promotion was one of hundreds, if not thousands, of city jobs that prosecutors allege were rigged through the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, where Sorich was a top aide.

They used Pratl's promotion, however, to charge all four men with one count of mail fraud.

Defense attorneys for Sorich and his former aide Timothy McCarthy called the ruling a significant stepping stone in their fight against the accusations.

"It's terrific. It's very consistent with my feelings about this case all along," said Sorich's attorney, Thomas Anthony Durkin.

Prosecutors declined to comment.

As the courtroom was turned over to the defense Tuesday, it was revealed in a court filing that Durkin may seek to call Daley's former Chief of Staff Sheila O'Grady and former Intergovernmental Affairs Directors Tim Degnan Sr. and Victor Reyes to testify. In an e-mail to prosecutors Saturday, Durkin suggested he will seek immunity from prosecution to secure their testimony.

Reyes heads the powerful pro-Daley Hispanic Democratic Organization, which prosecutors charge was among the main beneficiaries of the alleged scheme.

As Slattery's attorney Patrick Blegen presented the first defense witness Tuesday afternoon, veteran attorneys said the defendants face an uphill fight despite their victory Tuesday.

Richard Kling, a professor at Chicago-Kent College of Law and a criminal-defense lawyer, thinks the verdict could hinge "on whether the defense that 'I was only following orders' flies with the jury."

Since the trial began in mid-May, Durkin has argued that Sorich was simply forwarding job recommendations from alderman, community leaders and others to city departments.

He has argued the practice was longstanding and widely known in City Hall.

But a series of current and former city employees have testified that Sorich or McCarthy effectively ordered the city's largest departments to hire or promote people selected by the mayor's office.

The trial's first witness, former Water Department Personnel Director Mary Jo Falcon, said that for years she received lists of job applicants from Sorich or McCarthy. She called the lists "blessed" and said she didn't consider the names on them applicants but "hires."

According to testimony, many of the people hired or promoted were culled from armies of political workers.

DOJ_NMG_0036523

The government put disgraced city employees Donald Tomczak and Daniel Katalinic on the stand to testify that they operated pro-Daley political organizations largely made up of city workers.

Tomczak, a former first deputy commissioner in the Water Department, and Katalinic, a former deputy commissioner in Streets and Sanitation, have both admitted taking bribes through the city's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program.

They testified that they maintained their political armies by offering jobs and promotions to workers. When they needed jobs, they would go to officials in the mayor's office, including Sorich and McCarthy, they said.

Throughout the case, defense attorneys have hammered at the credibility of government witnesses. Many witnesses received immunity from prosecution for their testimony. Tomczak and Katalinic are expected to receive more lenient sentences.

The prosecution's most prominent witness was City Hall's top lawyer, Mara Georges, who testified about conversations she had with McCarthy and Sorich after federal agents raided their offices in April 2005.

Georges said she was unaware until the 2005 raid that there were "irregularities" with regard to hiring for jobs covered by the Shakman decree, a federal court order prohibiting political-based hiring.

She grudgingly acknowledged on cross-examination that she learned in 2004 about an allegation that the mayor's office was involved in hiring an unqualified 19-year-old building inspector.

The prosecution's last witness, called Tuesday morning, was FBI agent John Hauser, who led the April 2005 raid of City Hall.

He said a sweep of offices at Intergovernmental Affairs yielded only one recommendation letter from an alderman.

But Hauser said searches of the Sorich and McCarthy offices, which had combination locks on the doors, turned up several lists of names connected to people and organizations with political clout.

Testimony from defense witnesses is scheduled to continue Wednesday. Durkin has said he expects the defense case to last about a week.

Judge Dismisses 1 Count Against Chicago Patronage Trial Defendants (AP)

By Megan Reichgott
AP, June 21, 2006

CHICAGO - A federal judge dismissed a mail fraud charge against Mayor Richard Daley's former patronage chief and three other former city officials Tuesday, ruling prosecutors did not have evidence to support the charge.

U.S. District Judge David H. Coar's decision to dismiss the charge, which takes up 13 pages of an 18-page indictment, was a boost for Robert Sorich, former head of the city's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, and the three others accused of covering up the illegal use of clout as the basis for filling city payroll jobs.

"It's a significant ruling, it's very consistent with my feeling about this case all along," defense attorney Thomas Durkin told reporters after the decision.

Sorich, Timothy McCarthy and Patrick Slattery still face other charges, including mail fraud.

McCarthy attorney Patrick E. Deady said the ruling "demonstrates it's not an ironclad case on all of the legal issues."

John Sullivan, former deputy commissioner of streets and sanitation, now only is charged with lying to the FBI. A message seeking comment was left for his attorney Tuesday night.

After prosecutors called their last witness Tuesday, Assistant U.S. Attorney Patrick Collins called a sidebar and asked the judge to dismiss the charge, said attorney's office spokeswoman Kim Nerheim. She declined to comment on the prosecutors' decision because the case is ongoing.

Coar allowed the defense to call its first witness, then formally threw out the charge after the jury went home for the day, Nerheim said. The trial was to continue with the same defense witness Wednesday.

"The next step is to move forward with the other counts against the defendants," Nerheim said.

The men are accused of disguising the use of clout rather than merit in hiring for city jobs despite the long-standing court-ordered Shakman Decree, which sharply curbs the city's traditional patronage system by banning political patronage as a basis for hiring all but about 1,000 of 38,000 city employees.

The charges are a spinoff of the federal government's 18-month investigation of the city's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program. The investigation has penetrated the heart of Daley's political operation and sent shock waves through City Hall, although Daley is not accused of any wrongdoing and has said his administration plans to continue cooperating with the federal government.

2 Indicted For Alleged BWC Bribe; Brokers Accused Of Trading Condo Use For State Deals (TOLB)

By JAMES DREW And STEVE EDER, BLADE STAFF WRITERS

Toledo Blade (OH), June 21, 2006

COLUMBUS — The scandal that has gripped state government for 14 months broadened yesterday as two Cleveland-area investment brokers were indicted on charges that they conspired to bribe a high-ranking official of the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation in exchange for getting and keeping a piece of the bureau's business.

Brokers Michael W. Lewis and Daniel P. O'Neil worked for three investment firms in the six years they gave Terrence Gasper, the bureau's chief financial officer, use of an oceanfront condominium and a boat slip in the Florida Keys, according to the indictment unsealed yesterday in U.S. District Court.

In exchange, Gasper steered business to the firms that Mr. Lewis and Mr. O'Neil worked for — Ferris, Baker Watts for the past six years; Raymond James & Associates in 2000, and Roney & Co. from 1997 through 1999, federal prosecutors allege.

The indictments are the latest in a state and federal investigation of the bureau's investment practices that began last year after The Blade began reporting about problems with the agency's $50 million investment in rare-coin funds managed by former Toledo-area coin dealer and GOP fund-raiser Tom Noe. He has been charged with stealing millions from the funds.

"We are looking at the conduct of these individuals because the business followed them, no matter where they went," said Gregory White, U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Ohio.

Mr. White estimated that the firms for which Mr. Lewis and Mr. O'Neil worked received $5 million to $6 million in brokerage commissions, marketing, and solicitation fees from the bureau, the state agency that pays medical bills and provides monthly checks to Ohio workers injured on the job.

Mr. Lewis, 71, and Mr. O'Neil, 54, pleaded not guilty yesterday to the felony charges during a brief hearing in U.S. District Court in Akron. Mr. Lewis surrendered to FBI officials yesterday and gave his U.S. and Irish passports to authorities.

The four-count indictment returned by a federal grand jury in Cleveland states that in November, 1998, Gasper and his then-girlfriend met with a real estate agent and signed a contract to buy a condo and boat slip at the Coral Harbour Club Condominium in Islamorada, Fla., for $345,000.

But Gasper never had plans to buy the condo and boat slip, federal authorities allege.

Instead, Mr. Lewis contacted the real estate agent, said he was Gasper's partner, and the contract then was assigned to Mr. O'Neil and Mr. Lewis — who at the time worked for Roney & Co.

Condo purchased

In January, 1999, Mr. O'Neil and Mr. Lewis closed on the purchase of the condo and boat slip for $345,000, federal prosecutors allege.

From February, 1999, to his forced resignation in October, 2004, after the state lost $216 million in a Bermuda-based hedge fund, Gasper stayed at the condo and "treated it as if it were his own," allowing his girlfriend, her family members, and her veterinarian to use the condo for free, the indictment states.

Gasper occasionally would make a "token rental payment'" to Mr. Lewis to make it look like his stays there were legitimate, authorities said, but for five years starting in 1999, Mr. Lewis and Mr. O'Neil jointly paid the mortgage and all other fees related to the condo and boat slip.

Mr. Lewis and Mr. O'Neil are charged with violating federal law by conspiring to bribe Gasper, committing mail and wire fraud by arranging to buy the condo for Gasper's use, and making false statements to federal investigators when they claimed that Gasper had no involvement in the Florida Keys condo, Mr. White said.

Mr. Lewis and Mr. O'Neil each face a maximum of 20 years in prison, a $250,000 fine, and three years of probation on the charge of conspiring to bribe Gasper. On the other three counts, they face up to five years in prison, a $250,000 fine, and three years of probation.

Gasper pleaded guilty June 7 in federal and state courts to massive public corruption charges, including money laundering for accepting $25,000 from Noe for an investment that was made in the name of Gasper's then-girlfriend, Betsy Ratcliff.

Gasper made key decisions regarding Noe's $50 million coin funds and the failed hedge fund run by Mark D. Lay of Pittsburgh-based MDL Capital Management.

A marketer, who has not been identified by federal authorities, gave Gasper a $9,000 check made payable to the college that Gasper's son attended.

Big commissions

DOJ_NMG_0036525

Gasper, who lives in the Columbus suburb of Worthington, must cooperate with federal and state investigators as part of his plea agreement. An attorney representing Gasper, who has not been sentenced, didn't return a message seeking comment.

Nancy Smeltzer, a bureau spokesman, said brokerage firms that Mr. Lewis and Mr. O'Neil worked for have collected about $3.2 million in commissions from the agency since 1997.

Ms. Smeltzer said it was unclear what percentage of commissions were directed to Mr. Lewis and Mr. O'Neil.

"It is our interest to see this investigation and all this activity brought to a close. We've got business to do. We've got public trust to rebuild. We are eager to see this over with as anybody," Ms. Smeltzer said.

Joan Ellis, a Princeton, N.J., resident who owns the unit next to the one purchased by Mr. Lewis and Mr. O'Neil, said the Coral Harbour Club Condominium complex is "probably the fanciest, nicest, la-de-da place in the Florida Keys — at least from Islamorada up." Ms. Ellis said she has never seen or met the brokers or Gasper.

Ms. Ellis said the complex is situated on the oceanside with a clubhouse, swimming pool, tennis courts, and a man-made lake.

'The best building'

"It has 14 acres of very tropical, posh plantings and with peacocks that wake you up at 4:30 in the morning," she said. "Behind the ocean there's big long dock, and there's a protected marina, and there's some really big boats."

The complex comprises about eight buildings and the brokers own a unit in the "E" building.

"I happen to think the 'E' building is definitely the best building," Ms. Ellis said, adding that the building is "right on the ocean."

Donna Klements, who lives near Mr. Lewis in Willoughby, which is east of Cleveland in Lake County, said she hadn't had much contact with Mr. Lewis.

"I don't even think I could pick him out of a line-up," Ms. Klements said.

Ms. Klements said Mr. Lewis and his wife live in a "regular house." Mr. Lewis purchased the 1,944-square-foot home in Lake County in 1998 for $327,000, according to property records.

"There's nothing extravagant, fancy, ooh la la about it," Ms. Klements said.

Susan Markley, who lives next door to Mr. O'Neil and his wife in Geauga County, said she has talked to him several times and can't believe the allegations.

"I can see maybe someone trying to set Dan up and pulling him into it," she said.

Brokers Indicted In State Scandals (COLDIS)

By Mark Niquette, THE COLUMBUS DISPATCH

Columbus Dispatch, June 21, 2006

Former BWC official, friend given condo use, counts say

Terrence W. Gasper and his former girlfriend personally picked out the oceanfront condo and boat slip in the Florida Keys that the couple, her family members and her veterinarian would use.

But Gasper knew they wouldn't have to pay for it, authorities say.

The $345,000 tab was picked up by a pair of Ohio brokers in exchange for millions of dollars of business with the state Bureau of Workers' Compensation, where Gasper was chief financial officer, according to a four-count federal indictment of the brokers handed up yesterday.

Michael W. Lewis, 71, of Willoughby Hills, and Daniel P. O'Neil, 54, of Chesterland, both were indicted by a federal grand jury in Cleveland on charges that include lying to federal authorities and conspiring to bribe Gasper, who earlier this month pleaded guilty to corruption charges and is cooperating with authorities.

According to the indictment, Gasper and his former girlfriend selected the Islamorada, Fla., condo in November 1998. But the two brokers actually bought it "in return for favorable treatment" from Gasper in getting business from the bureau's multibillion-dollar portfolio.

The value of that business was about $5 million or $6 million, said U.S. Attorney Greg White of Cleveland. He is part of an unprecedented task force of federal, state and county authorities investigating state investment and ethics scandals.

Lewis and O'Neil are the eighth and ninth people charged in that sweeping probe so far, and authorities said charges against others are expected.

"We still have more work to do," said Inspector General Thomas P. Charles, part of the task force.

Lewis and O'Neil pleaded not guilty to the charges yesterday in U.S. District Court in Akron. Each is free on $50,000 cash bond. An Aug. 28 trial date has been scheduled.

If convicted, each man faces up to 35 years in prison and $1 million in fines.

But William D. Beyer, O'Neil's Cleveland attorney, said O'Neil would fight the charges "to preserve his good name and reputation."

"Dan O'Neil is a good and decent man," Beyer said. Roger Synenberg, Lewis' attorney, could not be reached.

According to the indictment, Lewis, O'Neil and Gasper agreed in 1998 that the brokers would provide Gasper with a condo and boat slip. Gasper and the former girlfriend signed a contract to purchase them and gave a real-estate agent a $500 down payment, the court document says.

But Lewis contacted the agent a few days later saying he was Gasper's partner. Lewis and O'Neil then took over the contract and bought the condo and boat slip. Gasper never had any intention of buying it with his own money, the indictment said.

Gasper occasionally would make a "token rental payment" to Lewis to "make it appear that his stays (at the condo) were legitimate," but Gasper "treated it as if it were his own," according to the filing.

Gasper allowed others to use the condo free from 1999 through 2004, authorities said. Lewis also wrote checks payable to those close to Gasper, including a $2,000 check to his former girlfriend with "consulting" written in the memo line, the indictment said.

The court documents don't name the girlfriend.

The two brokers also provided meals and other gifts to Gasper, among the 150 freebies worth thousands of dollars that Gasper accepted from brokers and others doing business with the bureau, Franklin County Prosecutor Ron O'Brien said.

According to Ohio records, Lewis and O'Neil now work for Ferris, Baker Watts Inc. in the Cleveland area, and both previously worked for Raymond James & Associates and Roney & Co.

Bureau records list payments to firms and not individual brokers, but documents show that those three firms earned more than $2.7 million in commissions during the times the two brokers worked for them.

The records also show that Ferris, Baker Watts didn't start earning commissions from the bureau until the third quarter of 2000, the same quarter that Lewis and O'Neil joined the firm, state documents show. An attorney for the firm has not returned repeated phone calls.

Gasper, the bureau's chief financial officer from 1995 until October 2004, pleaded guilty in both federal and state courts June 7 as part of plea agreements that require him to cooperate with the investigation.

He admitted accepting free stays at the condominium — now valued at $745,000 — a $9,000 college tuition payment for his son and other gifts from former coin dealer Thomas W. Noe, brokers and others.

The probe also has uncovered additional information about potential wrongdoing in some of the state's pension systems, and more than a dozen vendors and as many or more public officials and employees are under scrutiny, The Dispatch has reported.

Brokers Indicted In Stock Scandal (AP)

By Connie Mabin, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 21, 2006

CLEVELAND - Two investment brokers were indicted Monday on federal charges that they bribed a top official at the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation with the use of their Florida Keys condominium in exchange for state business.

A federal grand jury indicted Michael W. Lewis and Daniel P. O'Neil, who managed stock investments for the $15 billion insurance fund for injured workers, on four counts each. The two worked at firms that received hundreds of thousands of dollars in commissions from the agency.

Both pleaded innocent Monday before U.S. District Judge David D. Dowd Jr. in Akron, which is in the Cleveland-based federal court district.

Terrence Gasper, the bureau's former chief financial officer, pleaded guilty in state and federal court earlier this month to accepting stays at the condo, money for his son's tuition and other gifts in exchange for doling out investment business.

Prosecutors promised more charges after Gasper became the first bureau official convicted in a yearlong political scandal that has shaken the state's GOP-dominated government and given Democrats hope of regaining some seats, including governor. The scandal forced the ouster of the longtime workers' comp administrator, the firing of its chief investment officer and an overhaul of the fund's investment operations.

Lewis, 71, of Willoughby, and O'Neil, 54, of Chesterland, also are accused of committing mail and wire fraud to conceal their relationship with Gasper. Two counts charge them with lying to a federal agent about Gasper's involvement with the condo.

Area Men Charged In Scandal (WILLNH)

Willoughby (OH) News-Herald, June 21, 2006

Two brokers accused in Ohio Bureau of Workers Comp case

Two area investment brokers are the latest businessmen to be charged in the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation investment scandal.

Indicted on federal charges were Michael W. Lewis, 71, of 2358 Dodd Road in Willoughby, and Daniel P. O'Neil, 54, of 11365 Kristine Drive in Chester Township, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced Monday.

The case involves Terrence Gasper, the former OBWC chief financial officer who pleaded guilty in federal court earlier this month to one count of racketeering for accepting a gift for business deals.

Lewis and O'Neil are accused of providing Gasper with a condominium in Islamorada, Fla., and cash and college tuition for his son in exchange for business deals with the bureau's $15 billion investment fund.

A federal grand jury in Cleveland returned a four-count indictment against the suspects, who face up to 35 years in prison each, if convicted.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Benita Pearson stated in a news release on Monday:

"Lewis and O'Neil conspired with Gasper to deprive the citizens of Ohio of their right to Gasper's honest services by using Gasper's position and influence ... to assist Lewis and O'Neil in obtaining and retaining OBWC investment business by committing mail and wire fraud to conceal their illicit relationship with Gasper."

The two brokers also were charged with lying to a federal law enforcement officer about Gasper's involvement with the condominium purchase.

The indictment is part of an ongoing criminal investigation into allegations of misconduct involving millions of dollars in Workers' Compensation investment funds.

The probe is being led by officials with the Inspector General for the state of Ohio, Ohio Highway Patrol, Ohio Ethics Commission and numerous others.

Gasper is the first workers' compensation official to be charged in the scandal.

He said during the hearing he was "more than willing" to help with the investigation, which has shaken the state's Republican-dominated government.

It led to ethics charges against Gov. Bob Taft, who pleaded no contest to charges of failing to report gifts such as golf outings.

The probe also led to the ouster of the bureau's administrator, the firing of its chief investment officer and an overhaul of the fund's investment operations. Gasper's attorney, Terrence Grady, said his client also would plead guilty to related state charges.

Gasper, 59, is also accused of receiving $25,000 from rare-coin dealer Tom Noe, who has pleaded guilty to illegally funneling money to President Bush's re-election campaign.

Noe still faces allegations he embezzled $1 million from a $50 million rare-coin investment he managed for the workers' compensation fund.

Under federal guidelines, Gasper faces a sentence of five years and 10 months to seven years and three months in prison.

U.S. District Judge David D. Dowd Jr. said he will not sentence Gasper until he is through helping with the government investigation. Lewis and O'Neil did not yet have attorneys on record. Their cases had not yet been assigned to a judge.

Ohio has one of the nation's largest workers' compensation funds, with investment assets totaling about $19 billion, according to U.S. attorneys.

Evidence Could Tie Women To Deaths (LAT)

By Richard Winton, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

A Mercury Sable found in Hollywood may link two alleged scammers to the hit-and-run killing of a homeless man.

Los Angeles police detectives and FBI agents investigating a pair of women suspected of killing two homeless men have turned their attention to one of those victims after uncovering new evidence that they say links the women to his death.

Detectives looking into the case of Helen Golay and Olga Rutterschmidt are now focusing primarily on the death of Kenneth McDavid, who was run over in a Westwood alley last June in a hit-and-run that remains unsolved.

Authorities said in a search warrant affidavit that an hour before McDavid's body was discovered, Golay called the Auto Club to have a Mercury Sable towed from an intersection a block from where the 50-year-old was hit.

In new court papers obtained by The Times, detectives said they found blood and "organic matter" on the damaged undercarriage of the Sable.

DOJ_NMG_0036528

The car was registered to an Encino woman whose name has been withheld by authorities. The woman told Det. Dennis Kilcoyne and FBI Special Agent Samuel A. Mayrose that she never owned the Sable but that her purse had been stolen around April 2003.

Authorities said in court papers that when they searched Golay's Mercedes-Benz SUV, they found a planner containing the Encino woman's name, a note with the Sable's license plate number and its vehicle identification number.

At Rutterschmidt's Hollywood apartment, authorities discovered photocopies of the Encino woman's driver's license, according to the affidavit. The photocopies were in an envelope marked "Helen sent Pictures," along with the Encino woman's name, address and cellphone number.

Kilcoyne said investigators now believe the Encino woman was the victim of identity theft and was not involved in McDavid's death.

Rutterschmidt, 72, and Golay, 75, were indicted last month on nine charges, including mail fraud, for allegedly collecting more than $2.2 million in life insurance on McDavid and Paul Vados, who was killed in an unsolved hit-and-run on Nov. 8, 1999, in a Hollywood alley.

They have pleaded not guilty. Both women are being held in federal custody and could not be reached for comment. Their attorneys could also not be reached.

Prosecutors allege that the women paid the rent on apartments for Vados and McDavid in order to keep track of the men's whereabouts for two years. In McDavid's case, authorities say Golay approached him at church and offered to get him off the streets in exchange for his signing an application for a $500,000 life insurance policy.

Although authorities said the women had no family relationship to Vados or McDavid, the pair were listed on insurance applications as the men's aunts or cousins or business partners, and Golay as a fiancee.

Neither woman has been charged in the mens' deaths, but police detectives have described them as suspects.

Investigators said they were focusing on McDavid's death because it occurred more recently and because they have tracked down more clues. But they said they are also continuing to pursue Vados' death, as well as that of a 97-year-old Massachusetts man who was hit by a car in Santa Monica.

According to the court papers, investigators believe McDavid was hit and killed by a car traveling at "a fairly low speed." He may have been unconscious because of a combination of alcohol, prescription sleep drugs and prescription painkillers that coroner's officials found in his system, according to prosecutors.

Detectives obtained a warrant to check Golay and Rutterschmidt's homes for possible prescription medicines found in McDavid's system, but police have not said what they found in that search.

Detectives have arranged for DNA tests on the blood found on the Sable but have not received the results.

The Sable has proven to be a key piece of evidence in the case.

A few weeks after McDavid's death, the car was found on a Hollywood side street, less than a mile from Rutterschmidt's apartment, prosecutors said. The vehicle was ticketed three times between July 15 and 20, and records indicate that it was impounded and determined to have been abandoned.

Impound records indicate that the vehicle had "front-end damage," according to the court filing.

The Sable was eventually sold by Hollywood Tow to a person who was unaware of its past.

Priest, Formerly Of Chicago Area, Pleads Guilty To Having Child Porn (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, June 21, 2006

CHICAGO - A Roman Catholic priest formerly based in suburban Hoffman Estates pleaded guilty Tuesday to possessing child pornography.

The Rev. Daniel Schulte, 53, former chaplain at St. Alexius Medical Center, was accused after federal investigators found still and video sexual images of children on the hard drive of his computer.

The images included girls and boys younger than 12 years old and some involved material that portrayed sadistic or masochistic acts, according to the plea agreement. The computer held more than 600 images when federal agents seized it, according to the U.S. attorney's office, but the defense disagreed with that number, the plea said.

The Vincentian priest was not accused of engaging in sexual activity with children. Defense attorney Patrick J. Cotter declined to comment Tuesday.

The Rev. Raymond Van Dorpe, assistant provincial of the order, said when Schulte was charged in March that the Internet service provider for Schulte's computer had contacted the order in March 2005 with the suspicion that child pornography had been accessed.

DOJ_NMG_0036529

The provincial superior immediately removed Father Schulte from active ministry and placed him on precautionary administrative leave, Dorpe said. An attorney for the order contacted the FBI and Schulte was moved to St. Louis where both he and his access to the Internet were supervised.

Schulte faces up to 10 years in prison and a maximum $250,000 fine when he is sentenced Sept. 14.

Bay Area Man Convicted In Internet Piracy Case (BCN)

Bay City News, June 21, 2006

(BCN) Federal prosecutors announced today that two more people, including a Cupertino man, have been convicted as part of Operation Copycat, the Justice Department's crackdown on Internet piracy.

Cupertino resident Tom Leung, 53, and Ray Morada, 32, of Washington, D.C., were convicted today of conspiracy and copyright infringement charges for their participation in a "warez group."

Warez groups are the source of the majority of pirated movies, music and software distributed and downloaded on the Internet, according to federal prosecutors.

Once a warez release group prepares a stolen work for distribution, the material is distributed in minutes to secure, top-level Internet servers throughout the world. From there, within a matter of hours, the pirated works are distributed globally, filtering down to peer-to-peer and other public file sharing networks accessible to anyone with Internet access, according to authorities.

Federal authorities began cracking down on the groups last year with Operation Copycat. To date 36 people have been charged in connection with Operation Copycat and 30 have been convicted, including Paul Sherman, a film critic for the Boston Herald. Sherman pleaded guilty last month to selling more than 100 pre-release review copies of movies to a known warez supplier between 2002 and 2005.

"Operation Copycat has yielded the conviction of a film critic who sold approximately 117 movies for illegal distribution. In addition, the case has yielded several notable firsts including the first convictions for recording a movie in a theater and uploading a pre-released movie on the Internet. The success of this investigation shows that individuals cannot hide behind advanced technology and the Internet to reproduce and distribute copyrighted works," U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said.

Hooks Jr. Indicted, Joins Father As Defendant In Tenn. Waltz (AP)

AP, June 21, 2006

MEMPHIS, Tenn. -- Former Memphis school board member Michael Hooks Jr. became the 11th person charged in the Tennessee Waltz corruption scandal when he was indicted Tuesday on embezzlement charges.

Hooks' father, Shelby County Commissioner Michael Hooks Sr., was indicted last year on Tennessee Waltz bribery charges and is awaiting trial.

Five of the accused in the federal investigation are current or former state lawmakers, two of whom have been convicted.

The Hooks family has long been active in Memphis politics, and Hooks Jr.'s great-uncle, Benjamin Hooks, is a former national director of the NAACP.

Hooks Jr. is charged in a four-count indictment with skimming public money from the Shelby County Juvenile Court.

While Tennessee Waltz focused on an FBI front company called E-Cycle Management that offered bribes statewide for government favors, it grew out of an embezzlement investigation at the juvenile court in Memphis.

Offenses in the indictment against Hooks Jr. carrying a maximum punishment of 40 years in prison and fines totaling $1 million, though federal guidelines would call for a much lighter sentence upon conviction.

The indictment says Hooks conspired with former court employee Darrell Catron to get a cut of more than $60,000 paid to former business consultant Tim Willis on bogus work claims.

Catron pleaded guilty to federal embezzlement charges in 2003 and Willis became an FBI informant when caught lying to a grand jury.

A woman who answered the phone at Hooks' office told The Associated Press he would have no comment.

Hooks, 31, announced his resignation from the school board in October, saying he wanted to spend more time with his family and return to college.

Willis was a key witness against former Sen. Roscoe Dixon, D-Memphis, the first state lawmaker facing Tennessee Waltz charges to go to trial. Dixon was convicted earlier this month and is awaiting sentencing.

Witnesses at Dixon's trial said the juvenile court investigation was rolled into Tennessee Waltz when the FBI sting officially began in 2004.

Former Rep. Chris Newton, R-Cleveland, has pleaded guilty to accepting Tennessee Waltz bribes and is serving a one-year prison sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0036530

Two bribery "bagmen" also have pleaded guilty and a former county commissioner in Chattanooga was convicted at trial. A former county commission administrator in Memphis is also under indictment.

Sen. Kathryn Bowers, D-Memphis; Sen. Ward Crutchfield, D-Chattanooga; and former Sen. John Ford, D-Memphis, are awaiting trial.

Hooks Jr., an aspiring actor, played a small role as a prison official in "Hustle and Flow," a movie about a small-time Memphis pimp and drug dealer who longs to be a rapper.

Testimony On Bulger Probe Is Disputed (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, June 21, 2006

A retired FBI agent, who went undercover in 1983 to offer bribes to officials, yesterday disputed testimony that the Massachusetts Senate president at the time, William M. Bulger, had been a target of the investigation.

``His name never came up," John ``Jack" Callahan said in a telephone interview with The Boston Globe. ``As far as Bulger being a target of the investigation? Not to my knowledge, and I was the primary and only undercover agent involved in it for four years."

Yesterday, Robert Fitzpatrick, who was second in command of the FBI's Boston office from 1981 to 1986, acknowledged that the FBI did not have any evidence of wrongdoing by Bulger during the 1983 investigation.

But he stood by his testimony on Monday that Bulger was a target of the inquiry.

Fitzpatrick said it was one of nine investigations in his tenure in Boston that he believed had been compromised by leaks to informants, including Bulger's gangster brother, James ``Whitey" Bulger, or others outside the agency.

Fitzpatrick testified Monday in a wrongful-death suit.

The action was brought against the government by the family of a murdered FBI informant who was to ``get" the House majority whip at the time, Vincent Piro ; the House speaker, Thomas W. McGee ; and Bulger.

Piro, a Somerville Democrat, was recorded on tape in 1983 asking Callahan, who was posing as a mall developer, for $25,000 to ensure legislative approval for liquor licenses for the Assembly Square Mall in Somerville. Piro said he needed $5,000 up front ``to grease a few guys."

But after accepting $5,000 from the undercover agent, Piro returned it three weeks later, saying that he had never taken money before, and that ``I don't want to start now."

Prosecutors said Piro had been tipped off that Callahan was an FBI agent. Piro argued entrapment at the trial; he was acquitted of conspiracy and extortion charges.

A witness testified that Piro had made reference to ``the speaker," but McGee was never charged, and he denied any involvement with the case. Bulger's name did not surface during the trial.

Yesterday, after Fitzpatrick finished testifying in a civil suit in US District Court, he told a reporter that the FBI was ``getting a lot of information about the flow of the money . . . there were allegations that [Bulger] might get money, that he was part of this chain."

Fitzpatrick said that Bulger was known as someone ``who could make deals go through" at the State House, and that the FBI thought Piro might enlist Bulger's help for the liquor licenses.

Fitzpatrick acknowledged, however, that there was no evidence that Bulger ever got any money from Piro.

``The investigation ended quite abruptly," Fitzpatrick said.

A Boston lawyer, R. Robert Popeo , who represented Piro in the criminal case and who represented Bulger on unrelated matters in the 1980s, called Fitzpatrick's claims ``preposterous."

He said that Bulger's name had never surfaced during the case and that the government never produced ``a scintilla of evidence" that there was a leak to Piro.

``It's clearly revisionist history," Popeo said, adding: ``They never had evidence then [of a leak], and they don't have it now."

Fitzpatrick said Monday that after Piro returned the money, the FBI launched a leak inquiry.

In the courthouse hallway yesterday, Fitzpatrick said that he and the US attorney at the time, William F. Weld, who became the governor, interviewed a retired FBI agent, Dennis Condon, about whether he had leaked information about the Piro investigation.

Condon had worked in the organized crime squad of the FBI's Boston office and had had dealings with James ``Whitey" Bulger and his sidekick, Stephen ``The Rifleman" Flemmi, both longtime informants. But, Fitzpatrick said, Condon denied having been involved in leaking information.

Condon's lawyer, Michael B. Meyer , said yesterday that Condon retired from the FBI in May 1977, and that he ``therefore was not in a position to leak, and did not leak, anything."

Yesterday was Fitzpatrick's sixth and final day on the stand in a $50 million wrongful death suit filed against the government by the family of John McIntyre, a Quincy fisherman who was murdered on Nov. 30, 1984.

McIntyre's mother, Emily, and brother, Christopher, have asserted that the government had negligently caused McIntyre's death because of the FBI's mishandling of James ``Whitey" Bulger and Flemmi.

Flemmi testified this month that he and Bulger had killed McIntyre because an FBI agent, John J. Connolly Jr., had warned them that McIntyre was cooperating against them.

Beaten P.I. Was Seeking Witness To '92 Mob Slay (NYDN)

By Nancie L. Katz, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, June 21, 2006

When veteran forensic investigator Angela Clemente drove to a remote parking lot in the dead of night last week, she thought she was about to break another big mob case.

Her longtime partner, Stephen Dresch, said yesterday that Clemente was hoping to meet an eyewitness to two 1992 mob slayings - and get enough evidence to possibly overturn the murder convictions of three men.

Instead, Clemente was beaten and nearly strangled last Friday - and then threatened again.

"The threat that came after the attack was far more alarming than the attack itself," Clemente told a source yesterday. "I'm in hiding. I'm very nervous. I'm scared. I'm not going to do any further investigation."

The case she was probing stemmed from the slayings of reputed Colombo soldiers John Minerva, 66, and Michael Imbergamo, 54, on Long Island.

Clemente, 40, has been seeking evidence that would help clear three men convicted of the murders - and link the crimes instead to the late Colombo capo Greg Scarpa Sr. and his FBI handler, Lindley DeVecchio.

Dresch said she hoped to get it from Imbergamo's nephew and bodyguard, a retired NYPD cop who ducked the gunfire that fatal day.

"He dived under the dashboard of his car," said Dresch, a forensic investigator and retired college professor. "He was supposed to have gotten out of the way.

"Presumably, he would have seen something," he added. "Angela. has been trying to find him and had the word out."

Clemente had been getting anonymous notes about the Long Island murder on her car windshield. She thought they could have come from the nephew - the possible breakthrough she was looking for, said Dresch.

"She was hoping he would tell her something. What did he see? Anything she could get. He was there. He was a witness," Dresch said. Nassau County prosecutors are now probing what role Scarpa played in the convictions of rival capos Joseph and Anthony Russo and associate .Joseph Monteleone in those murders.

Dresch and Clemente played an early role in bringing out evidence against DeVecchio that Brooklyn District Attorney Charles Hynes turned into a criminal indictment, charging him in four mob murders.

Scarpa died in 1994. DeVecchio, who has vigorously denied any wrongdoing, is free on bail.

About 1 In 20 Americans Stalked, Study Says (SCRIPPS)

By Lee Bowman, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard, June 21, 2006

Nearly 5 percent of adults in a national survey reported having been stalked at some point, translating to an at-risk pool of more than 7 million women and 2 million men in the United States.

Most stalkers aren't strangers, according to the study's lead researcher, Kathleen Basile, a behavioral scientist who works in violence prevention at the National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, part of the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Women, younger adults and those who are single, separated or divorced are most at risk. Younger adults being more likely victims "goes along with what we know about violence in general," Basile said.

The results, being published in the American Journal of Preventive Medicine in August, are based on phone interviews done with nearly 10,000 adults between 2001 and 2003, with responses about equally divided between women and men.

Stalking was defined as "ever being followed, spied on or communicated with, without consent, at a level perceived to be somewhat more dangerous or life-threatening (not counting commercial exchanges with bill collectors or telemarketers) for more than one month."

DOJ_NMG_0036532

According to the researchers, "Stalking continues to be a public health problem at a magnitude comparable to that measured in the National Violence Against Women Study (done for the Justice Department in 1995-96)."

That study concluded that about 8 percent of women and 2 percent of men had been stalked.

Both surveys indicated that women were most likely to be stalked by someone with whom they've had a relationship, while men were more likely to be stalked by acquaintances or strangers.

"Women should be aware of the potential for stalking by an intimate partner, particularly when that intimate partner is physically or sexually violent," Basile said.

The new survey found that blacks have significantly lower odds of being stalked than whites, but Basile said the reasons for this aren't clear and that there may be differences in how people report stalking.

The earlier study found that about two-thirds of all stalking episodes end within a year, but that those involving intimate partners tended to go on longer.

Mindy Mechanic, an associate professor of psychology at California State University-Fullerton who researches intimate-partner violence, agreed that the most dangerous stalker is someone who is - or has been - in a relationship with the victim. "In the majority of homicides involving intimate partners, stalking was another tactic, another tool in the abusive armamentarium of the stalker," she said.

However, she noted, "most stalking does not end in homicide or even violence. The perpetrator is arrested, hospitalized, moves away, gets tired or finds another victim."

The Justice Department survey indicated that about half of victims felt the intrusions had stopped either because they had moved or because the stalker turned to a new relationship.

The duration of stalking seems to mostly depend on the stalker's motivation, according to Mechanic. "A delusional individual, like a celebrity stalker, is different from a socially unskilled, awkward ... individual who thinks that a neighbor who says 'Hi' in the hallways is romantically interested in them."

Firms Seek Federal Privacy Rules (WP)

By Kim Hart

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

Several large technology companies, including Google Inc. and eBay Inc., announced support yesterday for stronger federal regulations to protect consumer privacy on the Internet.

Twelve companies formed an advocacy group, the Consumer Privacy Legislative Forum, to lobby for greater protection of private information, and several members testified yesterday before a House subcommittee.

For over a decade, consumer groups have pushed for measures to safeguard personal information from identity theft and fraud.

The group of companies is seeking federal legislation that would require businesses to notify consumers when collecting personal information, then allow individuals to choose how the information is used and to access data they have provided to cut down on unauthorized use.

An "uneven patchwork" of state laws aimed at protecting consumer privacy makes it difficult for companies to comply and is confusing for consumers, said Nicole Wong, Google's associate general counsel.

"When you have so many laws all with the same aim but with different definitions, companies aren't able to create protection in a uniform way," Wong said.

Ari Schwartz, deputy director of the District-based Center for Democracy and Technology, said a multitude of industry-specific laws has been ineffective in protecting consumers "across the board."

"We don't want states passing new laws every time a data breach happens," he said.

Meg Whitman, eBay's president and chief executive, is also in favor of a single federal law. Yesterday, she told the House Energy and Commerce Committee's subcommittee on commerce, trade and consumer protection that the Federal Trade Commission should more closely monitor how consumer information is obtained and shared on the Internet. She said Web-based retailers should not be held to a higher standard than other businesses.

Before the group formed in March, a few companies -- among them Hewlett-Packard Co., Microsoft Corp. and Intel Corp. -- actively supported far-reaching legislation, Schwartz said. Now companies such as Eastman Kodak Co., Eli Lilly and Co. and Procter & Gamble Co. have joined the cause.

The involvement of companies that haven't traditionally been big online players indicates the importance of the consumer privacy issue, he said.

Other analysts said that overregulating data gathered online could disrupt the free flow of information that is vital to healthy markets.

DOJ_NMG_0036533

Restricting information could reduce competition and prevent new firms from entering the marketplace, said Thomas M. Lenard, senior fellow at the Progress & Freedom Foundation, a nonprofit organization that analyzes public policy relating to digital technology.

"The personal information utilized by firms produces great value for consumers and the economy," Lenard told the subcommittee. Regulation, he said, would have "unintended" consequences, "especially when imposed on a medium like the Internet that is changing so rapidly."

He said companies already have market-induced incentives to protect private data.

The challenge of securing personal information and the reluctance of Congress to pass stronger legislation has frustrated consumer advocates. Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, said state governments have been more responsive than Congress in safeguarding consumer privacy. Pressure from private companies may yield results as long as the new campaign is more than a ploy to improve their image, he said.

"We welcome the participation of industry in the discussion, but it can't simply be an exercise in public relations," Rotenberg said.

Google, Other Tech Giants Call For Law To Protect Consumers (AFP-Y2)

By Glenn Chapman

AFP, June 21, 2006

Fresh from a fight with US officials over the sanctity of online search information, Google joined an alliance of technology firms calling for federal legislation protecting consumer privacy.

"Today we live in a digital economy where both beneficial and potentially harmful uses of personal information are multiplying," said a statement from the Consumer Privacy Legislative Forum, whose roster includes such technology powerhouses as Microsoft, Intel, Oracle, Sun Microsystems and Hewlett Packard.

"The time has come for a serious process to consider comprehensive harmonized federal privacy legislation to create a simplified, uniform but flexible legal framework" for protecting consumers, it said.

"The legislation should provide protection for consumers from inappropriate collection and misuse of their personal information and also enable legitimate businesses to use information to promote economic and social value."

Google counsel Nicole Wong said Tuesday in a blog posting on the Google website that the company joined a group of "notable US companies" calling for federal consumer privacy legislation.

There was a "patchwork quilt" of US state consumer protection laws that varied depending on location and subject, with examples being health, financial, or child-related data, according to Wong.

"This matrix of laws is complex, incomplete, and sometimes contradictory," Wong wrote. "For consumers, the result is a set of privacy protections that are uneven at best."

The Internet was "beset with spyware, malware, phishing, identity-theft, and other privacy threats" that made protecting privacy an industry-wide challenge and highlighted the lack of a coherent regulatory structure, according to Wong.

A national standard for Internet privacy needed to be "a robust framework" because it would supersede state laws, the forum maintained.

The forum was created late last year and members that signed the statement on Tuesday included Eastman Kodak, eBay, Google, Hewlett-Packard, Intel, Microsoft, Oracle, Sun Microsystems, Symantec, Proctor and Gamble, Eli Lilly and Company, and Hewitt and Associates.

Google's joining the forum came in the wake of its legal standoff earlier this year with US federal government officials who demanded online search records from the company.

The standoff ended in March when US District Judge James Ware ordered Google to turn over only a fraction of the information sought.

Maintaining that the case raised "vital interests", Ware ordered the Mountain View, California-based search engine giant to hand over data on just 50,000 websites.

Ware rejected the Justice Department's attempt to obtain more sensitive data that might disclose the online search habits of web users, noting that that could spark a possible "loss of good will" among Google's users.

Federal prosecutors sought the information as ammunition in a legal fight to revive an overturned 1998 statute making it a crime for websites to allow minors access to adult material online such as pornography.

Wong at the time proclaimed Ware's decision "a clear victory" for the company and Internet users.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

A Chance To Mark The Ballot By Puffing Through A Straw (NYT)

By Sewell Chan

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

For the first time, New York City residents will be able to vote by "puffing" and "sipping" air through a straw, pumping a foot pedal, touching a computer screen or pressing flat plastic shapes — two triangles, a circle and a square — affixed to the four corners of a specially configured keyboard.

These new methods, which represent the biggest innovation in the city's voting technologies since the Shoup mechanical-lever machine was introduced in 1962, are a temporary measure intended to help disabled people vote.

The new voting methods are the product of a lawsuit from the federal government. They will be used in the Sept. 12 primary and the Nov. 7 general election as an interim step to comply with a new federal requirement that voting machines be accessible to the disabled.

The new voting methods can be used on 22 ballot-marking devices that will be available at one site in each of the five boroughs. It is an imperfect compromise: by placing the machines at centrally located offices, the city is essentially requiring some of the least mobile voters to travel the longest distances to vote. And because it can take up to 40 minutes to cast a vote using the new machines, voters may find themselves waiting in long lines.

The devices are not actual voting machines; they cannot record votes, but merely generate a printed ballot on a sheet of white paper. The voter, with help from a poll worker if necessary, would then place the ballot in an envelope. The ballot would then be counted by hand, along with other paper ballots, including absentee ballots, on Election Day or shortly after.

John Ravitz, the executive director of the city's Board of Elections, gave a presentation yesterday on voting reform to members of a mayoral task force on modernizing elections and later oversaw a demonstration of the new devices to members of the board and the public, including several disabled residents.

In March, the Justice Department sued New York State for failing to comply with the federal Help America Vote Act of 2002, which called on the states to overhaul their voting systems. In May, after both sides acknowledged that the state could not overhaul its entire system in time for this year's elections, they agreed on a compliance plan that required each county to provide a limited number of voting machines that are fully accessible to the disabled for this year's elections.

The city bought 27 ballot-marking devices from Avante International Technology of Princeton Junction, N.J. The company is also providing the devices to 32 of the 57 counties in New York State outside New York City.

By next year, the state must have fully accessible voting machines in every polling place statewide — including the 1,369 in New York City. The state Board of Elections, which must approve new voting systems, has not yet done so, and so the city must wait before selecting its new voting technology.

The new ballot-marking devices will be available in each of the board's five borough offices: 5 each in Manhattan, Brooklyn and Queens; 4 in the Bronx; and 3 in Staten Island. (Three devices will be used in demonstrations, and two internally.) Before the September primary, the board will mail information about the devices to the city's 4.3 million registered voters.

Some advocates for the disabled said they were not fully satisfied. "I'm sorry we're having to go ahead with this interim plan," said Alexander Wood, executive director of the Disabilities Network of New York City, which represents people with motor and sensory disabilities. "I would have liked to see us hold out for a solution that accommodates all disenfranchised voters. This is a separate system, not an equal system."

Mr. Wood, a paraplegic who uses a wheelchair, noted that it could take up to 40 minutes for a disabled voter to cast a ballot using the new device. Many disabled voters will have to listen to a long recorded announcement with instructions — and the contents of the ballot — before they can vote.

Terrence C. O'Connor, a Queens Democrat who holds the rotating presidency of the 10-member city Board of Elections, conceded that the new device could be cumbersome. "It's the best it could be under the circumstances," he said.

Hispanics Drop Voter Rights Lawsuit Against Kissimmee (AP)

AP, June 21, 2006

KISSIMMEE, Fla. -- Four people want to drop a lawsuit alleging city election procedures unfairly diluted the voting power of Hispanics after they found that the minority group now outnumbers registered white voters.

The class-action complaint was filed last year to challenge the way city commissioners are elected, arguing that each spot should represent a geographic district. Instead, residents citywide are allowed to vote on each race, similar to the U.S. Senate.

Despite comprising about 45 percent of Kissimmee's 52,000 people, no Hispanic has ever been elected to the commission.

DOJ_NMG_0036535

Armando Ramirez, one of the four residents behind the lawsuit, originally filed a federal complaint six years ago alleging unfair voting practices. In July, the U.S. Justice Department filed a lawsuit against Osceola County on similar grounds, and Ramirez's group said they wanted to carry that momentum by suing weeks later.

However, the voter registration rolls now show that Hispanic voters outnumber white voters by about 900.

"The lawsuit is unsustainable," said Ramirez, who ran unsuccessfully for the Kissimmee City Commission in 2002. "Instead of waiting for the judge to tell us that, we directed our attorneys to" seek a voluntary dismissal.

The motion must still be approved by a judge, and Hispanics interested in continuing the suit have until June 30 to respond to a legal notice published Monday in the Orlando Sentinel. They would have to object to the motion to dismiss, which could mean hiring an attorney and being responsible for the cost of pursuing the action, according to the advertisement.

Ramirez said Monday the group will focus its efforts on registering people to vote.

The Justice Department case against Osceola County is still pending. A department spokesman declined to comment Tuesday on the request to drop the class-action suit.

Flag Burning Redux (WP)

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

WITH CONGRESSIONAL elections coming, the Republican leadership has found a pivotal issue. Terrorism? Hardly. Entitlement reform? Don't be silly. We're talking about the grave threat to America known as flag burning. Yes, that election-year favorite is back: the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States allowing Congress to criminally punish the "physical desecration" of the American national banner. If you haven't noticed a rash of flag-burning incidents sweeping the nation that's because, well, there isn't one. But that doesn't stop Republicans from trotting it out as a more-patriotic-than-thou card.

They are, as always, close to having the votes to send it to the states for ratification. The House of Representatives has passed the measure and the vote will be tight in the Senate, where the Judiciary Committee approved the amendment 11 to 7. We hope the amendment will fall short of the needed two-thirds majority on the Senate floor; it's depressing enough that a majority of senators will support it.

The amendment would soil the First Amendment's command that Congress shall "make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech." Flag burning is an odious form of expression. But there are lots of odious forms of expression the First Amendment protects: Holocaust denial and swastikas, racist rants and giant Confederate flags, hammers and sickles. The amendment's power is in its self-confident sweep: Speech, including expressive acts, will not be censored. Government cannot punish ideas. Members of Congress who would protect the flag thus do it far greater damage than a few miscreants with matches.

ANTITRUST:

Knight Ridder Deal OK'd (KRT)

By Pete Carey, Knight Ridder

Knight Ridder, June 21, 2006

The Justice Department has cleared McClatchy to buy Knight Ridder, after McClatchy agreed to sign a guarantee that it will sell the St. Paul Pioneer Press, according to people familiar with the process.

The Justice Department was concerned about McClatchy's purchase of Knight Ridder because the company would own two papers in the Twin Cities — its own Minneapolis-based Star-Tribune and Knight Ridder's Pioneer Press.

McClatchy already has a buyer lined up for the Pioneer Press: Denver-based MediaNews, which also is buying the San Jose Mercury News, Contra Costa Times and Monterey County Herald, all in California, in a complicated $1 billion deal. That deal is still under antitrust review. McClatchy was asked to guarantee that it would sell the Pioneer Press regardless of whether the sale to MediaNews is approved by regulators.

Sacramento, Calif.-based McClatchy declined to comment.

All that remains now for the Knight Ridder-McClatchy deal to be complete is to count the shareholder votes on Monday at Knight Ridder's annual meeting in San Jose. Eighty percent of shareholders must approve the deal. The final papers will be signed June 27., at which point Knight Ridder will cease to exist.

The Justice Department is continuing to review MediaNews' $1 billion plan to purchase the four papers, and is specifically looking at overlaps between the Contra Costa Times and MediaNews' Tri-Valley Herald. It is also reviewing the involvement of Hearst in the MediaNews purchase, because Hearst owns the San Francisco Chronicle, which competes with MediaNews in the

Bay Area. Hearst is spending $263 million for the Monterey County Herald and the Pioneer Press, but will trade the two papers to MediaNews in exchange for a stake in MediaNews' assets outside the Bay Area.

McClatchy is buying Knight Ridder and its 32 newspapers for $4.5 billion and assuming $2 billion in Knight Ridder debt. It is selling 12 of the newspapers to help finance the deal.

All but one of the papers being sold has a buyer.

McClatchy Cleared By DOJ To Buy Knight Ridder (SANJBIZ)

San Jose Business Journal, June 21, 2006

The McClatchy Co. has been cleared by the U.S. Department of Justice to buy Knight Ridder Inc. after agreeing to sell the St. Paul Pioneer Press, according to reports.

The Justice Department was concerned about Sacramento-based McClatchy's (NYSE:MNI - News) purchase of San Jose-based Knight Ridder Inc. (NYSE: KRI - News) because of antitrust issues -- McClatchy would then both the Minneapolis Star-Tribune and Knight Ridder's St. Paul Pioneer Press.

According to reports, the Pioneer Press may be bought by Denver-based MediaNews Group Inc., which owns other newspapers in the Bay Area and is also buying the San Jose Mercury News, Contra Costa Times and Monterey County Herald in a complicated $1 billion deal.

That deal is still under antitrust review.

McClatchy is in the process of buying Knight Ridder for about $4.3 billion. The deal involves the sale of 12 Knight-Ridder newspapers that McClatchy views as having low growth prospects.

The Knight Ridder-McClatchy deal must still be approved by shareholders.

Justice, FTC Unveil E-filing For Pre-merger Notification Documents (FCW)

By David Hubler

Federal Computer Week, June 21, 2006

The Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the Federal Trade Commission announced today an electronic filing system that will allow merging companies to submit pre-merger notification filings, as required by the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act, via the Internet, eliminating the time and expense of duplicating and submitting written documents.

The new system ends the requirement to submit to Justice and the FTC paper copies of the required pre-merger notification form and attachments, according to a DOJ announcement.

Under the new system, pre-merger filers now have three options. They can:br>

Complete and submit the form and all attachments in hard copy.

Complete the electronic version of the form and submit it and all attachments electronically.

Complete the electronic version of the form and submit it electronically while submitting all documentary attachments in paper copy.

The Hart-Scott-Rodino Act requires companies planning acquisitions or mergers that meet certain threshold requirements to file a Notification and Report Form with Justice and the FTC in advance. The law also requires the merging parties to observe a mandatory 15- or 30-day waiting period, after which the companies may proceed with the transaction if neither Justice nor the FTC has requested additional information about the transaction.

Because Hart-Scott-Rodino filings are highly confidential, every step of the e-filing process has been designed to ensure the confidentiality and security of submitted information, according to the statement. A valid electronic signature will be required before submission of the package, which will be encrypted and transmitted via the Internet to a secure FTC server.

Justice and the FTC will employ unspecified security measures to protect the information parties submit, according to the statement.

In addition to providing benefits to filers and government agencies, e-filing complies with the Government Paperwork Elimination Act, which requires that federal agencies provide e-filing and signature options to the extent practicable.

Detailed information on e-filing, including an electronic version of the Notification and Report Form, is available at https://www.hsr.gov/.

The e-filing option will be available on the publication of the Federal Register notice announcing necessary Hart-Scott-Rodino Act changes. That notice is available at http://www.ftc.gov/bc/hsr/hsr.htm.

FTC, DOJ To Allow Premerger Notices Filed Via Internet (DOW)

Dow Jones, June 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036537

The Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department's antitrust division will allow merging companies to submit premerger filings via the Internet instead of delivering hard copies.

Companies still will be allowed to file paper copies with the FTC and antitrust division, and also will be able to submit merger notification and report forms electronically along with paper copies of documentary attachments.

The electronic filing option will be available upon Federal Registry publication of the notice that makes the necessary changes to the Hart-Scott- Rodino Act's rules.

FTC Secretary Donald Clark told Dow Jones Newswires he expects the notice will be published by the end of the week.

Justice Cites Strides In Copyright Fight (UPI)

UPI, June 21, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department said Tuesday it is making progress in the fight against intellectual property piracy.

A new department report said all of the recommendations from an earlier task force report on intellectual property theft have been implemented.

Intellectual property theft includes the trading and online piracy of copyrighted movies, music and video games.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, in prepared remarks to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in Washington, said the department attempted to implement all 31 recommendations, and, "I am proud to announce that the Department of Justice has achieved this goal."

Gonzales cited "The 2006 Progress Report" on intellectual property theft.

Among the highlights, Gonzales said, was the fact that the task force increased the number of prosecutors in the field by not only creating the five additional Computer Hacking and Intellectual Property, or CHIP, units recommended in the 2004 report, but also created an additional seven CHIP units.

That nearly doubled the number of CHIP units - from 13 to 25 - in less than two years, he said.

Feds Pump Up Intellectual Property Protection Efforts (IDG)

By Grant Gross, IDG News Service

IDG News Service, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, D.C.-- The U.S. Department of Justice has fulfilled or exceeded all recommendations made by an intellectual property task force in October 2004, including new computer crime investigations units in 12 cities, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced Tuesday.

Since the Justice Department's task force made 31 recommendations for protecting intellectual property, the department has launched Computer Hacking and Intellectual Property units in seven more cities than the task force recommended. The department now has 25 CHIP units across the United States. Among the newest 12 are units in Washington, D.C., Baltimore, Denver, Detroit, and Philadelphia.Efforts Abroad

Gonzales called intellectual property the "lifeblood" of the U.S. economy during a speech in Washington, D.C. "We've done a lot," he said. "We have to do a lot more."

The Justice Department, which released a progress report on the initiative today, has also stationed an experienced prosecutor to work on intellectual property enforcement in Southeast Asia, and will add a prosecutor in Eastern Europe. Those prosecutors will help train foreign prosecutors, investigators, and judges about intellectual property investigations, the department said.Goals Accomplished

The report, which will be available at the department's cybercrime page, also notes several other Justice Department efforts during the past two years. Among the task force recommendations the department has met:

Increasing the number of defendants prosecuted for intellectual property offenses by 98 percent between the government's fiscal 2004 and 2005 years

Publishing a nearly 400-page comprehensive resource manual for federal prosecutors on prosecuting intellectual property crimes

Partnering with the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office to dedicate $900,000 over three years to piracy prevention efforts with nonprofit educational institutions

The Business Software Alliance, a trade group representing large software vendors, praised the Justice Department report, saying the agency has made "significant progress" in protecting intellectual property.

Justice Dept: Has Doubled Counterfeiting, Piracy Cases (DOW)

Dow Jones, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- The U.S. Justice Department Tuesday said it has doubled prosecutions of counterfeiting and piracy since a task force was set up in 2004 to address intellectual property prosecutions.

"We have increased our capacity to address intellectual property thefts," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told a luncheon in a speech at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "We have done a lot, but we have to do a lot more."

The doubling of federal prosecutions was noted in a 72-page progress report on the department's intellectual property task force, which was released this week.

Gonzales said the Justice Department has set up 25 special computer hacking and piracy units around the U.S. in the last two years, boosting the ability of government prosecutors to dismantle international and domestic counterfeiting organizations. The department also has worked with other agencies to, among other things, press China and other countries to do more in combatting illegal counterfeiting.

Gonzales told the room of business representatives that the department has made combatting illegal counterfeiting a top agency priority, not only for artistic works but also for trademarks, trade secrets and patented products, such as pharmaceuticals and medical devices.

Intellectual Property Prosecutions Double, Says Justice (B&C)

By John Eggerton, Broadcasting & Cable

Broadcasting & Cable, June 21, 2006

The Justice Department Tuesday is issuing a status report on protection of intellectual property in the digital age, saying it has almost doubled the number of defendants prosecuted for intellectual property crimes.

Even Court TV has been part of the solution, according to the department.

In its 104-page progress report, the Task force on Intellectual Property says it has implemented recommendations made in October 2004, when it issued its initial report about what steps needed to be taken.

Among the progress it is reporting:

·Boosting the number of prosecutors of intellectual property crimes by a dozen.

·Creating an intellectual property educational program for young people (including distributing information on college campuses).

·Increasing the number of defendants prosecuted for intellectual property offenses 98% (from 177 in fiscal year 2004 to 350 in 2005).

·Training over 2,000 prosecutors in other countries and boosting efforts in Asia and Eastern Europe.

·Partnering with the Patent Office to put $900,000 over three years into piracy prevention efforts.

·Teaming with Court TV, which has covered a number of events on intellectual property rights.

Prosecuting the theft of DISH's satellite signal by a man who made over $300,000 selling pirated and re-programmed devices.

Increased Piracy Puts More Heat On China (LAW)

By Gabe Nelson, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 21, 2006

The entertainment industry hoped the counterfeiting of movies, music, software and books would plummet after China agreed in 2002 to abide by the World Trade Organization's standards for global intellectual property rights.

Instead, the industry says piracy has increased dramatically, leading some American companies to view the Chinese government as unable -- or unwilling -- to curb it. And industry lobbyists are now helping the U.S. government prepare a case that could be brought against China in the WTO's Dispute Settlement Body.

Earlier this month, Assistant U.S. Trade Representative Timothy Stratford told the American Industries U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission that the United States could launch a WTO case if China doesn't crack down on IP offenders.

But experts suggest that while both the industry and the government talk tough when it comes to taking on China, America may be reluctant to actually bring a complaint against the Asian superpower.

Pushing the industry's case is Washington's Smith & Metalitz, a deceptively small lobbying firm specializing in intellectual property. Although the firm employs just four partners, an associate and a consultant, its list of clients reads like an all-star roster of influential entertainment trade groups. The firm's secret: Smith & Metalitz plays Clark Kent to the International Intellectual Property Alliance's Superman.

Both share the same leader, Eric Smith, who serves as both the association's president and Smith & Metalitz's managing partner. In 1995, Smith and intellectual property lawyer Steven Metalitz formed Smith & Metalitz, and today the firm represents all seven of the association's member groups, including the Motion Picture Association of America, the Recording Industry Association of America, the Association of American Publishers, the Business Software Alliance, and the Entertainment Software Association.

Smith & Metalitz recently made it a greater priority to work with the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative to build a case against China, according to lobbying registrations released last month by the Senate Office of Public Records.

Smith declined to comment on the details of the case. "It's a little premature to support a case actively," he says. "We're still in the evidence-gathering stage with USTR." Records also show that Smith & Metalitz received about $400,000 from its clients for 2005.

Also lobbying is the National Association of Manufacturers, the largest industrial trade group in the United States, whose $8.3 million in-house lobbying practice works extensively on Chinese trade issues.

NAM has seen an upswing in piracy across many sectors of industry, says Bill Primosch, the organization's director for international business policy.

"Anything that has a high markup is being counterfeited," Primosch says. "It's all kinds of products: pharmaceuticals, personal-care products, auto parts, medical-testing equipment. And it's starting to flow into the international marketplace."

In 2000, the year before China joined the WTO, the International Intellectual Property Alliance claimed losses of more than $1 billion to Chinese copyright piracy in the film, music, video-game, publishing and business-software industries.

Since then, China's economy has boomed, with an annual increase in gross domestic product of about 10 percent. Piracy industries have grown too. The association has estimated losses of $2.69 billion for 2005. Those figures don't include illegal Internet file sharing, which has increased as more and more Chinese gain access to the Internet.

But the USTR's threat of a WTO suit against China might be little more than saber rattling, experts say.

AN EMPTY THREAT?

Trade groups remain reluctant to support a WTO case, Primosch says. Many of NAM's member companies fear China's government will identify them as troublemakers and blackball them, he explains. "They don't want to burn their bridges," he explains.

Although trade groups fear becoming foes of the Chinese government, they say they would support a case against China if there were adequate evidence to prove it. "The worst thing that could happen is you lodge a complaint, a WTO panel reviews the material and says, 'Well, you just haven't proven your case,'" Primosch says.

American industry has reason to worry, as experts say it's unclear whether a case against China would be effective. The Chinese government, they say, has already implemented significant legal reforms since joining the WTO.

"The formal legal regime governing [intellectual property rights] protection in China has improved, and that improvement is ongoing," says Kenneth Lieberthal, a professor of political science and international business at the University of Michigan. "The national leadership is gradually developing some institutional capacity, particularly in the eastern cities, to enforce the rules."

Piracy continues, in part, because many Chinese officials protect illegal enterprises to boost their local economy, Lieberthal says. In many cases, a region's economic performance influences whether an official will be promoted, creating a powerful incentive for administrators to ignore the legal status of the industries under their jurisdiction.

That poses a problem for the United States because the WTO can only determine whether a national government is meeting its obligations and has no authority over corrupt officials. In this case the WTO would have to determine whether Chinese law meets the trade body's requirements regarding copyright and patent enforcement. To win a case, the United States would need to prove that Chinese law enables corruption, and given China's recent efforts to improve its copyright laws, that would be a much more difficult case than simply proving the existence of piracy.

"You can't just haul China into court on the basis that there is piracy in China," Lieberthal says.

But some have said problems with the way Chinese law is written could be used to bolster a WTO case.

For example, Chinese copyright law sets the minimum amount of piracy needed for prosecution far too high, according to the U.S. trade representative's 2006 Special 301 Report on China.

"The mandated thresholds remain so high that they make it impossible as a matter of law to prosecute many commercial infringers, especially at the retail level," the report says.

DOJ_NMG_0036540

If China doesn't take steps to improve intellectual property protection, America could impose sanctions, which could force the nation to bring its IP enforcement into line. But the United States would be unlikely to impose economic barriers against China because sanctions could damage a U.S. economy increasingly dependent on inexpensive Chinese-manufactured goods, says Marc Busch, an international business professor at Georgetown University.

Busch cites a hypothetical situation: The United States could put a tariff in place if it won a WTO case against the European Union, for example. "We're hurting EU companies so that they'll turn around and ask Brussels to fix the problem," Busch says. "At the same time, we're kind of punishing ourselves by making it harder to buy Fendi bags or Roquefort cheese."

Since the WTO formed in 1995, it has given member countries permission to seek retaliation fewer than 10 times, and half the countries with permission to create sanctions have been too scared of economic backlash to implement them, Busch says.

Financially, American companies have little to gain from a case against China: The WTO's Dispute Settlement Body cannot award compensatory damages, so a decision in the United States' favor wouldn't yield a settlement for companies whose intellectual property has been infringed. "If you want damages, you should be suing in a Chinese court," Busch says.

He adds that companies may be waiting for the possibility of suing for damages in Chinese courts, and their pressure on China's government is meant to hasten that day. Even if the United States has only a tenuous case against China, American criticisms of the Chinese legal system ought to remind China of the importance of IP protection in an innovation-based economy, he says.

And Lieberthal says that to a great degree, China is only hurting itself, since much of the piracy in the nation has victimized Chinese-owned companies. "If China is serious about creating an innovation-based society, then it needs to do a better job of protecting intellectual property," he says.

PSC Considers AT&T-BellSouth Merger (MH)

The Miami Herald, June 21, 2006

The Public Service Commission today is slated to consider AT&T's $67 million acquisition of BellSouth, a deal that some opponents claim will lead to reduced competition.

On Monday, Florida Attorney General Charlie Crist sent a letter to the PSC urging it to ensure that merger doesn't harm competition for basic telephone service.

"My concern here is that the merged company might squeeze out competition to the detriment of consumers, particularly seniors, and residential and small-business customers," Crist wrote.

AT&T would grow to 70 million local phone customers and nearly 10 million broad band subscribers in 22 states if the deal is completed. The merger requires approval from both companies' shareholders, the Federal Communications Commission and the Justice Department. State regulatory agencies, including the PSC, also are weighing in on the deal.

FTC Nearing Approval Of Lockheed-Boeing Rocket Deal (AP)

AP, June 21, 2006

BETHESDA, Md. - Defense contractor Lockheed Martin Corp. has received a copy of a draft consent order proposed by federal antitrust regulators to approve the creation of a joint rocket venture with rival Boeing Co., which has rocket production facilities in Decatur, Ala.

Lockheed received the draft from the Federal Trade Commission about 10 days ago, company spokesman Tom Jurkowsky said Tuesday. He was unaware of the contents or how long Lockheed will review it before sending recommendations back to the FTC.

Boeing Co. has also received a copy, said Dan Beck, a company spokesman in Virginia. Beck did not know when the company would send recommendations back to the FTC.

He also said he didn't know when the FTC would approve or reject the merger announced in May 2005.

"It's entirely in the hands of the government right now," he said.

Although competitive concerns have prolonged the review, Lockheed is encouraged by the FTC's actions.

"Clearly this is a step in the right direction," said Jurkowsky, whose company earlier this year urged the FTC to complete its review.

A spokesman for the FTC said the agency does not comment on ongoing investigations.

The new venture, United Launch Alliance, is meant to cut costs for the launch of government satellites.

Boeing officials said the Decatur facility, which already produces its Delta rockets, would also produce Lockheed's Atlas rockets, if the merger is completed.

The Decatur facility employs 660 people. Boeing would not comment on how the merger would affect jobs at the plant.

"It certainly means there will be more activity," Beck said.

DOJ_NMG_0036541

The merger would also defuse a legal battle between Lockheed and Boeing over charges that Boeing had access to stolen Lockheed documents on its rocket launch plans.

The government stripped $1 billion worth of rocket launches from Boeing and the company later agreed to pay $615 million to end a Justice Department probe of the Lockheed records theft and other infractions.

Germany's Bayer Says It Has Enough Shares To Proceed With Takeover Of Schering AG (AP)

By David Rising, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 21, 2006

BERLIN (AP) German drug and chemical maker Bayer AG said Tuesday it now controls enough shares of Schering AG for it to go ahead with its nearly 17 billion euros ($21.33 billion) takeover of the rival company.

``Bayer has gained control of a total of 88.0 percent of Schering's approximately 191 million issued and outstanding shares," Bayer said in a statement. ``The attainment of a three-quarters majority was the last remaining condition of the takeover offer. Both the EU Commission and the U.S. antitrust authorities had already given their unconditional approval."

The announcement appeared to mark the final end to a merger battle over Schering between Bayer and fellow German drugmaker Merck KGaA.

Bayer's initial 16.5 billion euros ($20.7 billion) takeover bid for Schering trumped a hostile 14.9 billion euros ($18.69 billion) offer by Merck, which later said it was pulling out.

Merck then started snapping up Schering shares, making it look unlikely that Bayer would get the 75 percent stake it needed in order for the takeover to go through.

But at the last minute, Merck agreed to sell the 21.8 percent stake in Schering that it had accumulated to Bayer at a premium price of 89 euros ($111.66) per share, which bumped the total value of the takeover up to about 16.9 euros billion ($21.2 billion).

``We're pleased to have received such broad-based support from the stockholders," said Bayer Management Board Chairman Werner Wenning. ``We also invite the remaining Schering stockholders to accept our attractive offer of 89 euros ($111.66) per share," he said, adding the additional acceptance period runs from June 23 until July 6.

Bayer said it continues to pursue its goal of wholly acquiring Schering.

Further details were expected to be released Wednesday in a news conference at Schering headquarters in Berlin.

The takeover gives Bayer access to Schering's lineup of best-selling multiple sclerosis treatments as well as Yasmin, a birth control product that has helped make Schering the world's biggest producer of oral contraceptives. Bayer is known for its Aspirin and prescription medication like the antibiotic Cipro and Levitra, which is used to treat erectile dysfunction.

Bayer, which posted sales of 27.4 billion euros in 2005, hopes to combine Schering's portfolio into its lineup of over-the-counter drugs, pesticides and industrial polymers.

Founded in 1863, Bayer invented Aspirin in 1897 and has since gone on to make everything from vitamins to agricultural chemicals. Its best known products include Alka-Seltzer and One-A-Day vitamins. The company employs some 93,700 workers.

Schering, founded in 1851 as a pharmacy, has since grown to a corporation that employs 24,500 people worldwide. Schering's connection to its former U.S. subsidiary, Kenilworth, N.J.-based Schering-Plough, was broken during World War II and the companies are no longer related.

Merck, also founded as a pharmacy in 1668, is the oldest pharmaceutical business in the world. It has been entirely separate from Whitehouse Station, N.J.-based Merck & Co. since the end of World War I.

The announcement came after European markets had closed. Bayer shares ended the day down 0.46 percent at 32.73 euros ($41.06), Schering shares were up 0.79 percent to 89.70 euros ($112.54), while Merck shares were up 0.69 percent to 73.40 euros ($92.09).

Lawsuits Allege Wide Collusion On Nurses' Pay (WSJ)

By Kris Maher

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

Four lawsuits filed in federal courts in four cities allege that hospital systems colluded to keep nurses' pay artificially low despite concerns of a nursing shortage.

The suits, which seek class-action status, allege the systems shared information on pay practices with an understanding that they wouldn't outbid one another to recruit nurses.

The lawsuits -- put together with the help of the Service Employees International Union, which represents nurses and others -- were filed yesterday in Chicago, San Antonio, Memphis, Tenn., and Albany, N.Y., against more than 17 hospitals and allege that they violated antitrust laws.

DOJ_NMG_0036542

Several thousand nurses in each city could be eligible to participate if class-action status is granted, said Daniel Small, a partner at Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld & Toll PLLC, in Washington, D.C., which brought the suits. The accusations are based on information lawyers gathered from interviews with dozens of former and current system employees, Mr. Small said. The estimated wage losses came from economists, he said.

Echelle Rutschman, a spokeswoman for Baptist Memorial Health Care Corp., a Memphis regional health-care system named in one lawsuit, said the suit is "completely without merit." She added, "We use industry-standard, legal practices to adjust salaries." Bill Van Slyke, a spokesman for Healthcare Association of New York State, which represents more than 550 nonprofit and public hospitals, called the allegations "outrageous" and added he thought the lawsuits were fueled by SEIU's organizing interests.

Median weekly cash earnings for registered nurses rose to $931 a week last year, up from $781 a week in 2000, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

A union-commissioned study released in March by the Institute for Women's Policy Research found that wages for nurses employed in hospitals fell from 2003 to 2004.

According to the American Hospital Association, U.S. hospitals needed roughly 118,000 registered nurses to fill vacant positions as of December 2005.

Studio Sues Over Internet Film Based On Stone's Script (WP)

By Eric M. Weiss

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

Chris Moukarbel was intrigued by director Oliver Stone's latest project, a $60 million movie to be released this summer about two police officers rescued from the rubble of the twin towers.

But as a 28-year-old filmmaker, Moukarbel wanted to do more than simply watch Stone's "World Trade Center." He decided to create his own version -- using a bootleg copy of the screenplay and Yale University student actors -- and offer it free on the Internet.

Although his film is only 12 minutes long and doesn't have a cast to rival Nicolas Cage and Maria Bello, it has brought the power of Hollywood down on him.

Paramount Pictures is suing Moukarbel in U.S. District Court in Washington, asking the court to prohibit the distribution of his movie. "He's free to make any World Trade Center movie he wants to make, but not our movie with our script," said Nancy Kirkpatrick, a Paramount spokeswoman.

According to its lawsuit, which was filed Friday, the studio is afraid that people will see the student film on the Internet and confuse it with the big-time Hollywood version set to hit 1,500 screens on Aug. 9 and backed up with a $40 million marketing campaign.

"Large numbers of people will see the Moukarbel Film first for free and determine, based on this poor-quality copy, that they do not want to pay to see the remainder of the WTC Film at a theater when it is released," Paramount's lawsuit said.

Moukarbel, who lives in Dupont Circle and graduated from Yale last month with a master of fine arts degree, could not be located for comment yesterday. On his Web site, his project is described as a "12-minute movie, adapted from a bootleg script for Oliver Stone's soon to be released film World Trade Center." His film has since been taken off the site, replaced with "VIDEO REMOVED AT REQUEST OF PARAMOUNT PICTURES."

According to the Witte de With Center for Contemporary Art in Rotterdam, which has a link to the film on its Web site, "Moukarbel makes site-specific video and installations, often using found media or objects as his sources. His projects explore the idea of memorial, and are concerned with the way in which political events are edified. . . . The video was made entirely in the artist's studio using student actors and then released on the internet, intentionally pre-empting Stone's film release in August 2006."

The lawsuit compares the nearly identical dialogue from the Moukarbel and Stone films, which both document the ordeal of two Port Authority of New York and New Jersey police officers. The Paramount film was made with the cooperation of the two officers, Will Jimeno and John McLoughlin. Paramount's lawsuit said it "owns the rights to the WTC Screenplay, and thus the right to be the first and only entity to tell this important story. The Moukarbel Film deprives Paramount of that valuable right."

Paramount's lawyers have also contacted Web sites that linked to Moukarbel's movie. On the site FilmThreat.com, a message from Paramount's lawyers replaced a link to the film.

Despite Paramount's pan, Moukarbel's movie was getting some good word of mouth, at least among the few who had seen it.

"It may not be Oliver Stone's version, but it actually was pretty good, better than the trailer that they released themselves," wrote "AuntPeru" on Filmthreat.com. "Oh well, hopefully it'll show up on YouTube."

Early Univision Bids Near $11 Billion (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman, Henny Sender And John Lyons

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

The two groups bidding for Univision Communications Inc. were last night preparing offers near the range of the company's current stock price of $35.40 a share, valuing the broadcasting concern at around $11 billion, people familiar with the matter said.

As in any auction, the prices offered in the first round can differ substantially from final offers. But bidders are coping with skittish debt markets and banks that have reined in their lending in recent weeks. That has made it harder for buyers to reach the $40-a-share price that Univision, the nation's largest Spanish-language broadcaster by audience, first hoped to reach.

The group widely viewed as the favorite to win -- consisting of Mexican broadcaster Televisa SA, Venezuela's Venevision Investments LLC and private-equity shops Bain Capital, Blackstone Group, Cascade Investments, and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. -- was last night discussing an offer below Univision's current market price, though that could rise to at or around market at the last moment, these people said. Televisa already owns 11% of Univision.

Another group -- Texas Pacific Group Inc., Thomas H. Lee Partners, Madison Dearborn Partners LLC, Providence Equity Partners Inc. and media mogul Haim Saban -- was preparing an offer in the $35 range, people familiar with the matter said. That is at or below where Univision's class A shares stood yesterday -- at $35.40, down 30 cents for the day -- in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

It is still possible that Univision could pull the auction if it feels prices aren't to its liking. Such moves are rare after a company announces it is for sale and spends months preparing for a new owner.

Jitters in the debt-financing markets over higher interest rates have changed the dynamics for Univision, a Los Angeles conglomerate that operates television and cable networks, television stations, radio stations, a variety of music properties, and an Internet operation, all with Spanish-language content. The bond market for lower-rated credit that would be used to fund a deal has been spooked by the recent stock-market downturn and a heavy supply of new debt issues.

Just weeks ago, lending banks were willing to make loans valued at more than 13 times Univision's operating income, said one person familiar with their activity. That level has sunk recently, while loan prices have ticked up, this person said.

The Washington, D.C., private-equity firm Carlyle Group dropped from the Televisa-led group, a person familiar with the matter said, over concerns about price and governance between all of the private-equity firms and Televisa.

Jockeying between the two camps promises to be intense, as Univision presents complicated regulatory issues. The presence of Televisa in one group, for example, will inevitably raise foreign-ownership concerns, which could take months to resolve and which rivals are sure to prey upon for an advantage.

The Federal Communications Commission will have broad say on approving any transaction. The law generally prevents foreign entities from owning more than 25% of domestic broadcasters. But such reviews also take into account other factors, such as whether a foreign company has substantive control of a company via veto rights over management, board members or strategy decisions.

EU Competition Chief Says Anti-Monoply Law Would Help Benefit China's Economy (AP)

AP, June 21, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- European Union antitrust chief Neelie Kroes said Tuesday that China's move to adopt an anti-monopoly law would help benefit China's economy by attracting more business investors.

The EU Competition Commissioner made the comments after talks with China's Vice Minister of Commerce Ma Xiuhong at EU headquarters.

"This is an important step toward an effective competition regime," Kroes said in a statement. "The Chinese economy will benefit from the implementation of a sound competition policy, as will any company seeking to do business in China."

The Chinese Cabinet endorsed a draft anti-monopoly law on June 8 aimed at boosting fair competition after decades of domination by state industry. Foreign business groups, however, have expressed concern that it might be used to restrict or interfere with their investments.

Beijing officials said the proposed legislation would not discriminate between domestic and foreign companies. China began drafting the law in 1994 and a first draft was completed in 2003.

But progress was stymied by controversy over how to carry out enforcement, given the prevalence of state-owned monopolies or semi-monopolies in many industries. The draft law still needs the backing of China's legislature before it can become law.

Ex-Firefighter Pleads Guilty In Nev. Fires (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, June 21, 2006

(AP) - RENO, Nev.-An ex-firefighter has pleaded guilty to setting three wildfires that burned hundreds of acres of national forest in central Nevada last August, a federal prosecutor said Monday.

Mark E. Morgan worked temporarily with a U.S. Bureau of Land Management crew. Investigators said he started the fires because he was bored and needed the paycheck.

Morgan, 34, faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine, and he could be required to pay restitution, U.S. Attorney Daniel G. Bogden said in a statement. He entered the plea Thursday. Sentencing was set for October.

The fires in the Humboldt-Toiyabe National Forest in Lander County, about 170 miles east of Reno, burned more than 550 acres of timber, brush and grassland. Two miles of fence also burned, but no injuries were reported.

When questioned by investigators, Morgan admitted starting two fires with a cigarette lighter and the third with a flare gun.

Draft Of Park Rules Stresses Conservation (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

The Bush administration has issued new draft guidelines for managing the national parks that make conservation the top priority -- ahead of recreation and energy development.

The new management rules -- which outline how park supervisors should handle issues including homeland security and whether to allow off-road vehicles to cross nature areas -- pleased environmentalists but angered off-road vehicle users, who said they fear that the Interior Department is modeling its practices after those of the Clinton administration.

In a news conference Monday, Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne said department officials had decided that preserving the country's parks ranks above any other management goal.

"When there is a conflict between conserving resources unimpaired for future generations and the use of those resources, conservation will be predominant," Kempthorne said. "That is the heart of these policies and the lifeblood of our nation's commitment to care for these special places and provide for their enjoyment."

Environmentalists had sharply criticized two earlier drafts of the rules, including one version leaked to the media in August that was written by Paul Hoffman. Hoffman, a political appointee, served as a deputy assistant secretary for fish, wildlife and parks at the time and now holds the same title in the Interior Department's policy, management and budget division.

Park advocates noted that the most recent management draft released in October, which ran more than 200 pages, included language that would have made good visibility in national parks an "associated value" rather than a "highly valued" resource as it stands under current rules. The latest draft restores the current language.

"They made virtually every change we recommended," said Ronald J. Tipton, senior vice president for programs at the National Parks Conservation Association. "The only conclusion you could draw from this is Secretary Kempthorne has taken a keen interest in national parks. This is a priority for him."

Don Amador, the Western representative for the Blue Ribbon Coalition, a group representing park users nationwide, said the administration had gone too far in placating its critics.

"Our concern is we don't want the administration to go back to the Clinton-era policy of putting preservation over recreation," Amador said. "They're both important, and motorized access to national parks, whether it's snowmobiling in Yellowstone or riding a sports-utility vehicle in the desert Southwest, are important ways for people to use and enjoy their parks. We just want to see a balance."

The administration will now take public input on the proposal for 90 days. That it was willing to revisit the matter of how the government manages its parks, Kempthorne said, shows the department's commitment to serving the public.

"The true test of any vibrant organization is that it can examine itself critically and constructively to strengthen its vision and improve its operations," he said. "With these revised policies, the National Park Service has again demonstrated its ability to engage citizens in productive dialogue and benefit from the valuable insights and suggestions of its employees, friends and partners."

U.S. Hybrids Get More Miles Per Congress (NYT)

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036545

EVER since the first Prius rolled off the assembly line almost a decade ago at the Takaoka plant not far from Toyota City, hybrid cars have basically been a luxury item. If you owned one, you could feel good about using less gasoline and being a trendsetter, but you couldn't expect the fuel savings to make up for the thousands of extra dollars that the hybrid cost. There was no financial reward for environmental virtue.

But in the last few months, something important has changed. Gas prices have settled in at close to $3 a gallon, which is enough to make a few hybrids almost worth it, if not quite. And since the start of the year, the federal government has been giving generous tax credits to hybrid buyers, pushing the Prius and a couple of other hybrids into bargain territory.

Between the money saved on gas and the tax credit, the Honda Civic Hybrid will cost slightly less over a five-year span than the regular Civic, according to Consumer Reports. The same is true of the sharp-looking new Toyota Camry Hybrid, relative to a regular Camry. If you're deciding between a Prius and a regular Camry, the Prius, which gets a $3,150 credit, will start saving you money in just a few years.

The point of a tax policy like this — the point of a lot of tax policy, in fact — is to give people an incentive to change their behavior, and persuading Americans to use less oil certainly sounds like one of Washington's priorities these days.

Yet, astoundingly, many of the tax credits are about to be taken away. So if you are thinking of buying a Prius or Camry Hybrid, do it soon, as in this month or maybe next. And if you are wondering whether policy makers mean it when they say they're serious about changing our energy policy, join the crowd.

THE first thing to understand about the hybrid tax credit is that it was never really intended to reduce oil imports from the Middle East or slow the effects of global warming. The credit was created to prop up Detroit while giving conservation a nod.

Last summer, when Congress was completing an energy bill, Toyota's and Honda's hybrids were already winning people over in the marketplace, and it was clear that any tax credit would go overwhelmingly to buyers of Japanese cars. So members of Congress, with help from Detroit's lobbyists, came up with an ingenious solution. They created a cap, a maximum number of hybrids that any single manufacturer could sell — 60,000 — before a clock started ticking, causing the credits for that carmaker to begin disappearing two quarters later.

The idea, Mark Kemmer, a G.M. lobbyist, told Automotive News, was to keep any one company from getting "a runaway benefit."

Toyota hit the 60,000 mark last month, less than five months after the Jan. 1 start of the program, and the credits for its hybrid buyers will be cut in half on Oct. 1. (Because there are waiting lists for the Prius and Camry Hybrid, people who buy one in August or September may get their car after Oct. 1.) On April 1, 2007, the credits will be cut in half again. On Oct. 1, 2007, they will vanish. Honda, for its part, will probably hit the cap next year.

And the Big Three? Combined, they have sold fewer than 15,000 eligible vehicles so far, all by Ford, largely because their hybrids have not impressed buyers. Rather than building highly efficient hybrids like the Prius, Detroit has tinkered with gas guzzlers like the Chevrolet Silverado, adding hybrid technology to them so that they get slightly better mileage.

Come next year, then, the government will pay you to buy a Silverado hybrid (which gets about 16 miles per gallon) or a Ford Escape Hybrid (which gets about 26, according to Consumer Reports), but not a Prius (44) or a nonhybrid Corolla (29).

The obvious answer to this bizarre situation is to remove the caps. To their credit, Mr. Bush and a few members of Congress have called for precisely that, although it seems unlikely to happen anytime soon.

But I think there is a larger lesson here. In recent months, there has been a lot of talk in Washington about alternative energy sources, not just hybrids, but ethanol, fuel cells and nuclear power as well. Mr. Bush, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton and others are pitching tax credits and similar financing mechanisms to give these technologies a boost.

The reality, though, is that government isn't particularly good at predicting which alternative will pan out. No single person or group is. "You can spend a lot of money on technologies that don't fit," says Susan M. Cischke, Ford's vice president for environmental and safety engineering. Remember the electric-car fad in California?

What the government can do that nobody else can, however, is set up a simple system of rewards and penalties — with the single goal of reducing oil use, regardless of the means — and then let the marketplace work it out. Economists tend to prefer a gas tax, but it's not the only option.

There is already a gas-guzzler tax written into the law that raises the price of inefficient cars, but not of sport utility vehicles or light trucks, notes Therese Langer of the American Council for an Energy-Efficient Economy. Making the tax universal would have a far bigger effect than a narrow policy aimed at hybrids, and it could be balanced by tax credits for efficient vehicles of any kind. Google has a nice template: it gives $5,000 to employees who buy a car that gets at least 45 m.p.g. in the government's ratings, a threshold that only the Prius and two Honda hybrids now meet.

I know this might sound like one more nail in Detroit's coffin, but it doesn't have to be one. The Big Three have the engineering expertise to build vehicles that can go a long way on a gallon of gas. If Washington would only nudge people to buy cars like that, Detroit would start making them.

An Ear For The Market (NYT)

By David Morris

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

CONGRESS is considering several bills to extend the 51-cent-per-gallon tax credit for ethanol producers beyond its 2010 expiration date. But let's hope that our elected representatives don't make their decision in the grips of an ethanol haze. The state of the ethanol industry changed so substantially since the last extension, one year ago, that a fundamental and clearheaded redesign is in order.

Sky-high oil prices and a national ethanol mandate have undermined the rationale for incentives. With oil at $60 a barrel, ethanol can compete with gasoline without federal subsidies. For much of 2005, oil prices approached or surpassed the $60 level. In recent months, they've hovered near $70.

Last year, Congress ordered a near doubling of ethanol sales by 2012. Industry has responded so rapidly that the nation may have enough capacity to meet the Congressional goal by 2008. Indeed, Congress is already debating measures to increase mandated levels to 10 billion gallons in 2010 and 30 billion in 2020.

If the current 51-cent-per-gallon tax credit remains in place, these mandates would cost the Treasury Department $5 billion in 2010 and more than $15 billion in 2020. In the face of high oil prices, such subsidy levels are likely to prove politically untenable when there's no need for tax credits to make ethanol competitive.

Moreover, the rapidly changing structure of the ethanol industry argues for an entirely different kind of incentive. In 2003, some 50 percent of all ethanol refineries and perhaps 80 percent of all proposed plants were controlled by farmers, with an average annual output of about 40 million gallons each. But now, around 80 percent of new ethanol production is coming from plants controlled by absentee owners that produce 100 million to 125 million gallons.

As farmer and ethanol refinery have become delinked, so have biofuels policy and agricultural policy. True, the increased demand for ethanol has benefited farmers, but only modestly, raising the price of a bushel of corn by 10 cents to 15 cents. But when the farmer is also an owner in the refinery, he or she receives annual dividends averaging about 50 cents a bushel and more than $1 a bushel in very profitable years. Farmer-owners can also use an ethanol plant as a hedge against a drop in the price of their raw material. If the price of corn falls, so does the production cost of ethanol; all other things being equal, refinery profits and therefore dividends will rise.

How might Washington redesign the federal incentive to reflect the realities of an increasingly competitive absentee-owned, large-scale ethanol industry?

First, tie incentive levels to an index comprised of the price of a bushel of corn and the wholesale price of a gallon of gasoline. (A similar index can be developed for biodiesel or cellulose-derived ethanol.)

Such an incentive would honor the nation's commitment to both farmers and taxpayers. The farmer-producer would be protected if the price of oil plunged or the price of corn (or soybeans or cellulose) jumped. The taxpayer would be protected from having to underwrite handsome subsidies when the biofuels industry no longer needs them.

Second, transform part of the federal incentive from a gas tax exemption for those who market the ethanol into a direct payment to those who produce it. Minnesota did this in the 1980's, turning an incentive for consumption into one for production.

The new federal producer payment should encourage locally owned ethanol plants while not being a continual drain on federal resources. A payment of 15 cents per gallon for the first 20 million gallons produced each year might be offered to an absentee-owned plant with payment increasing to 25 cents a gallon if the majority of a plant's owners were farmers or local residents. No plant should be able to receive payments for more than 10 years.

Drastically changed times call for a drastically changed federal biofuels incentive, one that minimizes the long-term costs to America's taxpayers while maximizing the long-term benefits to our rural communities and farmers.

Eminent Domain Surges After Ruling (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

The Supreme Court's decision last year to allow cities and states to seize property for private development "opened the floodgates" to eminent domain actions nationwide, a report says.

In the year since the Kelo decision, nearly 6,000 properties nationwide have been threatened or taken under that precedent, more than half the number that had been seized over a previous five-year period, said a report released yesterday by the Institute for Justice.

DOJ_NMG_0036547

"There has been a huge rise in the number of threats to use eminent domain since Kelo. Cities are wielding eminent domain as a club," said Dana Berliner, a senior counsel with the Institute for Justice and the author of the 100-page report.

People threatened with eminent domain are vulnerable, she said, because they feel compelled to sell or have their home or business seized for a fire-sale price. At the same time, Ms. Berliner said, residents have become more active in trying to thwart land grabs and promoting changes to state law to bar the use of eminent domain.

Since the high court's 5-4 decision in Kelo v. City of New London, Conn., a year ago Friday, 5,783 properties nationwide have been either seized or threatened with seizure under eminent domain.

That number compares with 10,281 examples over the five-year period from 1998 to 2002, said the institute, a public-interest law firm that argued the Kelo case before the Supreme Court. During that period, threats were made to seize 6,560 properties, and 3,721 condemnation filings or authorizations were recorded.

In the past year, 5,429 property seizures have been threatened for economic redevelopment projects, plus 354 condemnation filings or authorizations, the institute said.

In the Kelo case, the institute represented nine Connecticut homeowners who tried unsuccessfully to halt New London's takeover of their properties for economic redevelopment. The court held that private development has a public purpose if it will increase jobs and tax receipts.

Ms. Berliner's report, "Opening the Floodgates: Eminent Domain Abuse in the Post-Kelo World," was one of five released yesterday by the Institute for Justice and its grass-roots activism project, the Castle Coalition.

"The court ruled that the U.S. Constitution allows government to use eminent domain to take and bulldoze existing homes and businesses for new private commercial development, holding that the mere possibility that a different private use could produce more taxes or jobs is enough reason for condemnation," the report said.

"Opening the Floodgates" documents 117 projects in the District and 27 states, including Maryland, that have involved the use or threatened use of eminent domain for private development in the past year.

"The vast majority ... involved the removal of lower-income residents and smaller businesses to attract wealthier people or more prominent businesses," Ms. Berliner wrote.

"Of the 117 projects, nearly half involved taking low-income houses, apartments and mobile home parks to construct upscale condominiums or other upscale residences and new retail development. Cities across America are working hard to drive out the working poor," she said.

She said the city of Baltimore is "on an eminent domain spree" because it intends to seize 75 properties for private development in this year alone.

Agriculture Department Faulted On Bird Flu Efforts (NYT)

By Donald G. McNeil Jr.

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

The Agriculture Department lacks a comprehensive plan for detecting avian flu in poultry and wild birds, its inspector general's office said yesterday.

In an audit, the office found that the department relied too heavily on voluntary testing by the poultry industry and reports from state agriculture departments.

A spokeswoman for the department, Hallie Pickhardt, said that the agency "agreed with everything in the report, and we're either doing it or going to be doing it."

The audit began before Congress passed President Bush's plan for dealing with a pandemic flu outbreak, which gave the department an additional $91 million to fight avian flu, Ms. Pickhardt said.

But she added that the agency had no plans to make the voluntary testing now conducted by the poultry industry mandatory.

"We're confident in the testing procedure they're implementing," Ms. Pickhardt said. "They've been working very closely with us. This is their livelihood, too, and they have no reason not to report the information."

Instead, the department will supplement the voluntary testing with its own checks, she said.

The audit also recommended more testing in live-bird markets (where mild avian flu infections have been found in the past) and at illegal auctions of fighting gamecocks. It also called for a plan to protect workers with vaccines and flu drugs if infected flocks needed to be culled.

In January, the National Chicken Council, an industry trade group, said that its members, which produce more than 90 percent of the country's chickens, would test every flock for influenza two weeks before slaughter.

Yesterday, Stephen Pretanik, the council's science director, said the industry was already sharing those test results with the Agriculture Department.

DOJ_NMG_0036548

Mr. Pretanik said all the swabs taken from chickens were sent to state laboratories or to laboratories accredited by the department, which are required to report positive results to the government.

The industry modeled its testing on the department's own proposals "so there will be a seamless transition when their regulations are published," he said.

Poultry experts said in January that if the lethal flu strain arrived in American domestic poultry, complicated tests would not be needed to spot it. Unlike other bird flus, the A(H5N1) strain, which has killed millions of chickens and 130 people since 2003, can wipe out a flock of thousands in 24 hours.

In Canada yesterday, veterinary officials said they had been unable to find enough virus to test in samples from a goose that had tested positive for an H5 virus in a local laboratory. They said they thought it was unlikely that the goose, on Prince Edward Island, would prove to be the first North American case of A(H5N1) flu, but said they needed an additional 12 days to try to culture the virus in eggs so it could be tested.

World Health Organization officials said yesterday that Indonesia had its 39th confirmed death from the virus, a 13-year-old boy from South Jakarta who died on June 14. He became sick on June 9, a week after helping his grandfather slaughter diseased chickens. Other members of the family are apparently healthy.

Flu Plan at Veterans Agency

WASHINGTON, June 20 (AP) — The Department of Veterans Affairs said it would close its national cemeteries in the event of a bird flu pandemic because of staffing shortages, leaving families to delay burial or seek interment elsewhere.

According to a draft plan, the veterans health care system would continue treating veterans at its hospitals and clinics, and would provide care to active-duty military personnel and civilians if necessary.

Bird Flu Could Close Military Cemeteries (AP)

By Andrew Bridges

AP, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Taps could be silenced for veterans who die during a bird flu outbreak.

The Department of Veterans Affairs foresees closing the 120 national cemeteries in a pandemic because of staffing shortages, leaving families the option of delaying burial or seeking interment elsewhere.

The VA buries more than 250 veterans and eligible family members a day - about 93,000 people a year. It operates cemeteries in 39 states and Puerto Rico.

Those cemeteries could be shut and burials put on hold during a pandemic, presumably even as the death toll rises, according to a plan that lays out how the department will cope with an influenza outbreak. The government is preparing for a worst-case scenario of nearly 2 million deaths in the United States in a pandemic.

The VA health care system, the nation's largest, would continue treating veterans at its 150-plus hospitals and hundreds of smaller clinics. The department also would provide back-up care to active duty military, as well as non-veterans if necessary, according to the plan posted on the department's Web site.

If staffing shortages or other issues force cemeteries to close, the plan calls for employees of the VA's National Cemetery Administration to reroute phones and contact funeral homes and next-of-kin to "reschedule" burials. As much as 40 percent of the national work force could be off the job in a pandemic, according to federal estimates.

"They're raising a common concern: Where are the workers going to come from?" said Robert Fells, external chief operating officer and general counsel for the International Cemetery and Funeral Association.

As for the dead, the VA said it may have to store bodies in refrigerated warehouses or trucks outfitted as temporary morgues.

During the 1918 Spanish flu pandemic, the dead were sometimes buried in trenches, Fells said. Should another pandemic strike, it could take days to bury the dead, and perhaps only then in mass or temporary graves, he added.

"Will that be necessary? It may be and we have to be prepared if things get that bad," Fells said.

The VA plan acknowledges that cemeteries will have to plan ways of allocating staff and plots for "significant numbers of burials if closure and rescheduling is not an adequate response."

"If there's truly a catastrophic kind of thing - whether it be a bird flu pandemic or a massive, terrorist-instigated attack that would claim tens or hundreds of thousands of lives - a lot of that, frankly, involves bulldozers," said Mike Duggan, the American Legion's deputy director for national security and a Vietnam veteran.

The VA did not immediately return multiple calls seeking comment.

A lack of workers would stretch thin the funeral business but shouldn't force cemeteries to close, said John Fitch, senior vice president for advocacy at the National Funeral Directors Association.

DOJ_NMG_0036549

"We'll cope like any other business. We will have to find ways and means of processing the bodies and conducting funerals," Fitch said. The group has discussed with its members refrigerating or temporarily interring bodies until an outbreak ends. It's even encouraged members to set up networks of potential volunteers to drive hearses and perform other tasks, Fitch said.

Bird flu has killed at least 128 people worldwide since it started ravaging Asian poultry farms in late 2003.

Scientists fear the H5N1 virus will mutate into a highly contagious form that can be passed from human to human. So far, most human cases have been linked to infected birds.

US Falls Behind In Tracking Cattle To Control Disease (WSJ)

By Steve Stecklow

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

When the first U.S. case of mad-cow disease was discovered in December 2003, then-Secretary of Agriculture Ann M. Veneman pledged to hasten creation of a national identification system for tracing livestock quickly during a disease outbreak. She said she asked the U.S. Department of Agriculture's chief information officer "to make it his top priority."

Today, more than two years later, the U.S. still has no national ID system for most farm animals, including chickens and beef cattle.

The USDA, which has been discussing a system for nearly a decade -- and has spent $84.7 million to develop it -- now says one will begin operating next year. Although the agency expects nearly all newborn farm animals to be included in the system by 2009, it has abandoned the idea of mandatory participation, leaving critics to cast doubt on that projection.

As recently as April 2005, the USDA's draft plan for a national ID system called for mandatory participation. But USDA officials insist the agency was never committed to that idea, and that in response to industry feedback they decided to go with a voluntary system. They express confidence that market forces, including pressure from big beef buyers and export markets, will help drive cattle owners to register their animals.

"I believe the industry as a whole does understand and believe that a system is needed and they will participate," says John R. Clifford, the USDA's chief veterinary officer. He says the agency will review making the system mandatory if participation isn't adequate.

An ID system would assign each animal a unique number, and record all its movements as it travels to new ranches, farms or other destinations. This tracking information could prove critical in controlling outbreaks of contagious diseases because it would allow investigators to quickly locate animals that were exposed to ones already known to be infected. The USDA's goal is to be able to trace animals within 48 hours.

But the ID issue has become mired in controversy, with livestock raisers' trade groups pitted against each other and a fast-growing grassroots movement that opposes any tracking system. Many ranchers, meanwhile, worry that animal-rights groups will get hold of the data if the government runs the system. But after considering one type of privatized tracking system, the USDA changed course when a chorus of opposition arose, including complaints from some cattlemen that such a database might be used to manipulate beef prices. Now the agency envisions a voluntary system with multiple private databases.

A number of animal-health experts and several former USDA officials scoff at a voluntary system. They believe many ranchers and farmers, particularly those fearing legal liability if their animals are found to be diseased, will participate only if the system is mandatory. They also warn that a voluntary system will be inadequate for containing potentially devastating diseases like foot-and-mouth that are far more contagious than mad cow.

"If it isn't mandatory, it simply will not work," says Bobby R. Acord, who until April 2004 ran the USDA's Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service. "There are not enough market forces to make it happen." Mr. Acord is now a consultant to the National Pork Producers Council, which favors a mandatory system. There is already one in place for swine in interstate commerce, and the group says it works.

One current economic incentive hasn't convinced many beef sellers that a tracking system pays. McDonald's Corp. offers several cents per pound extra to U.S. producers who can provide information that allows the chain to trace the origin of its beef products. But the company, which supports a mandatory tracking system, has been disappointed with the number of producers taking its offer, according to a person familiar with the situation.

The lack of a national tracking system may already be hurting U.S. beef exports, which suffered after the discovery here of mad cow. Japan, South Korea and China still don't allow U.S. beef -- a ban that has cost domestic producers more than $5 billion in exports over the past two-and-a-half years, according to industry estimates.

Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns recently told a meeting of the National Cattlemen's Beef Association that beef exporters like Australia are "aggressively marketing traceability to gain an advantage," according to the group's newspaper. "Competitors are out there saying, 'We've got I.D. They don't.'"

In recent years, about 40 countries -- including Canada, Britain, Japan and lesser-developed nations like Namibia and Botswana -- have implemented some form of mandatory, national animal-tracking systems covering cattle.

Smaller-scale USDA and state animal ID programs already have helped combat specific diseases. But they're sometimes in place only until the health risk ebbs. In the 1990s, an ID system for cattle played a key role in stemming a disease in domestic herds called brucellosis, which can also spread to humans and cause severe fever, weight loss and other debilitating symptoms. With the disease rate now low, most ranchers are no longer required to tag their animals.

With mad-cow disease, or bovine spongiform encephalopathy, tracking is crucial because the illness is known to spread from cow to cow via contaminated feed. Lacking an effective way to trace cattle, the USDA failed to locate all of the potentially infected cattle linked to the 2003 mad-cow case and two subsequent ones in the U.S.

In the most recent incident -- a red beef cow in Alabama that tested positive in March -- officials, using DNA tests, investigated 36 different farms and five auction houses to try to figure out where it was born and what happened to its herd-mates. They couldn't.

A herd-mate from this animal "could be entering a slaughterhouse tomorrow and we would never know because they don't have that tracking system in place," says Caroline Smith DeWaal, food-safety director of the Center for Science in the Public Interest, a Washington, D.C.-based consumer group. Scientists generally agree that humans can contract the fatal, brain-wasting disorder by eating meat from infected animals. World-wide, more than 150 people have died from the human form of mad-cow, known as variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease, although none of the deaths has been linked to U.S. beef.

Bitter Feuding

A number of past participants in USDA animal-ID planning blame some of the delay in establishing a system on bitter feuding within the livestock industry. Trade associations have argued over who will control the data -- the government or private organizations -- as well as what information will be collected, who can access it and who will pay for the system.

A main concern has been confidentiality. The industry wants to make sure that animal-rights activists can't use the federal Freedom of Information Act to learn the locations of livestock operations, which might make it easier for them to stage protests.

A vocal grassroots movement of small farmers and ranchers who oppose an animal-tracking system has been lobbying state and federal officials, rallying support through the Internet. One Web site, StopAnimalID.org1, warns that under the USDA plan animal owners would be subject "to constant federal and state government surveillance," a claim the agency denies.

Walter Jeffries, a pig farmer in West Topsham, Vt., runs another opposition site, NoNAIS.org2, that he says draws between 7,000 and 13,000 visitors every weekday.

Registration of premises where animals are kept, a first step in a national tracking program, has already begun. But in a number of states, animal ID opponents have been trying to undermine the process. In February, dozens of protesters at a meeting of the Texas Animal Health Commission helped persuade it to postpone implementing regulations that would require such registration.

"This is supposed to be the land of the free, and pretty soon we'll be able to do nothing on our own property without permission from the government," says Ken Kerner, a 47-year-old farmer and auto-body-shop owner from Cedar Creek, Texas, who owns a dozen cows.

Beginning with the branding of cattle more than a century ago, livestock identification in the U.S. has a long history. What's evolved is an ad hoc group of systems, for particular species or in geographic regions. But they aren't linked. "The problem with all those systems is they don't communicate with each other," says Valerie E. Ragan, a former assistant deputy administrator for veterinary services at the USDA. "There's no standardization."

In 1998 the Holstein Association, a group of dairy-cattle breeders, launched a voluntary "National Farm Animal Identification & Records System" program to try to change that. Partly funded by the USDA as a pilot program, it has registered nearly three million animals in 48 states. Still, it doesn't extend much beyond the dairy industry.

Following a foot-and-mouth epidemic in Britain in 2001 that led to the killing of millions of pigs, cattle and sheep, the National Institute for Animal Agriculture, a nonprofit group, set up a U.S. task force with both industry and USDA representatives to kick-start a national animal ID system.

After the U.S.'s first mad-cow case was discovered, the USDA used an NIAA draft plan as a basis for creating a national system that could trace farm animals in a disease outbreak within 48 hours. The NIAA plan envisioned a system by 2006.

By 2003, says Glenn N. Slack, the NIAA's former chief executive, there was a general consensus within the livestock industry that the USDA would oversee the system and would control the data. "Most everyone was on the same page," he says.

But the National Cattlemen's Beef Association, which doesn't belong to the NIAA, began on its own to develop a voluntary, industry-run database for tracking animals. The NCBA represents thousands of cattle ranchers and feedlot operators, as well as meat packers, retailers and restaurants.

"We would prefer that to a government-managed program because we think a private database, first of all, is going to protect producer confidentiality to a much greater degree," says Joe Schuele, a NCBA spokesman. Cattlemen, he says, consider the names of their clients and the size of their herds to be proprietary information. They don't want competitors, or buyers, to have access to such details.

The NIAA's Mr. Slack says the "spirit of cooperation" within the industry "started to unravel" when the NCBA began pursuing its own plan in 2004. Another producers' trade association, the Ranchers-Cattlemen Action Legal Fund, United Stockgrowers of America, or R-Calf, which favors a government-run system, says it didn't trust the NCBA.

The group fears that meat packers who belong to the NCBA might take advantage of the information in the private database -- for example, offering less if the data suggested cattle were in large supply. "It would give them tremendous buying power in the marketplace," says Bill Bullard, R-Calf's chief executive.

The NCBA denies meat packers would have access to the database and dismisses R-Calf's concerns. "They don't like anything we like," says Jay Truitt, the NCBA's vice president for government affairs in Washington.

Another issue is information oversight. Several past participants in the USDA's national animal ID planning program say they always assumed the government would administer the database. But in August, the USDA said it would support a tracking system in which animal-movement data was sent to "a single, privately held animal-tracking repository" that it could access -- the kind of plan the NCBA was advocating.

Allen Bright, the NCBA's animal ID coordinator, says his group believed the database the NCBA was developing would work well and draw industry support, and so "anticipated" that the USDA would choose it as the privately held repository.

Dale Moore, the USDA's chief of staff and a former NCBA chief lobbyist, says the policy change was based on input from more than just the NCBA. Producer groups and some state officials, he says, "felt a private-database approach would get us to our goals more quickly."

'An Uproar'

But Mr. Moore concedes the privatization plan created "an uproar," with many industry groups opposed to a single database and some groups demanding their own. By January, USDA officials were suggesting that the agency would abandon the idea. In April, it formally announced a "metadata system" that would allow the government to access animal movement tracking information from multiple, private, voluntary databases run by various industry groups.

The NCBA is still hoping to play a major role. In January, it helped to launch a nonprofit called the U.S. Animal Identification Organization to create a giant, multispecies private database with animal-tracking information. The NCBA, which has a representative on the nonprofit's board, now says it expects the database to be one of several eventually authorized by the USDA.

Last month, a House appropriations subcommittee voted to withhold nearly all additional funding for a national animal ID system until the USDA better defines the program and its costs. And yesterday, a Senate appropriations subcommittee voted unanimously to ask the Government Accountability Office to review the ID program's progress because "the direction of this system remains unclear." Terri Teuber, the USDA's director of communications, says the agency is confident it can satisfy those queries.

Japan Agrees To Lift Ban On US Beef (AP)

By Mari Yamaguchi

AP, June 21, 2006

TOKYO — Japan agreed Wednesday to lift its ban on U.S. beef imports, pending planned inspections of U.S. meat processing plants, the agriculture ministry said. The Asian nation imposed the ban over concerns about mad cow disease.

The breakthrough resolves a thorny, long-running trade dispute between the allies, and gives U.S. ranchers access to what was once their most lucrative export market.

"Japan agreed to resume U.S. beef imports on the condition that we find no further problems during onsite inspections," said agriculture ministry official Hiroaki Ogura.

U.S. officials had no immediate comment.

American beef shipments to Japan were halted in January after Japanese officials found a veal shipment that contained backbone, which Asian countries consider at risk for mad cow disease. The cuts are eaten in the United States and other countries, but Japan's rules are stricter.

Kyodo News agency reported that the inspections are meant to ensure that U.S. processing facilities conform with Japanese food safety guidelines. Officials from Japan's health and agriculture ministries will inspect 35 meatpacking plants certified to ship beef to Japan to see if they are complying with export requirements, Kyodo said citing government officials.

DOJ_NMG_0036552

Only facilities whose safeguards meet Japanese standards will be authorized to export to Japan, the report said. Japanese officials will also be allowed to accompany U.S. counterparts on spot inspections of U.S. facilities, it added. The accord requires the U.S. side to conduct the spot inspections.

The accord was worked out via a video conference directed by Japanese Agriculture Ministry's consumption safety director, Hiroshi Nakagawa, and his U.S. Agriculture Department counterpart, Chuck Lambert, deputy undersecretary for marketing and regulatory programs.

At stake was a trading relationship worth millions of dollars to the U.S. beef industry. Japan's market was worth $1.4 billion annually when it banned American beef in response to the first U.S. case of mad cow disease in 2003.

The ban had only recently been lifted before Japan halted shipments.

The U.S. Agriculture Department says that New York-based Atlantic Veal & Lamb and a government inspector misunderstood new trade rules when they allowed prohibited veal to be shipped to Japan.

American officials had been impatient for trade to resume, with several U.S. senators saying Tuesday they are introducing a bill that would impose trade sanctions if Japan does not reopen its market to U.S. beef by Aug. 31.

The agreement comes as Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi prepares to visit President Bush at the end of this month. The two leaders are scheduled to meet in Washington on June 29 and travel to Elvis Presley's Graceland home in Memphis, Tenn., the next day.

Mad cow disease is medically known as bovine spongiform encephalopathy, or BSE. In humans, eating meat contaminated with BSE is linked to variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease, a rare and deadly nerve disease.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Shadowed Playwright Arthur Miller (SFC/AP)

By Hillel Italie, Ap National Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, June 21, 2006

(06-20) 14:12 PDT NEW YORK, (AP) --

In the summer of 1956, playwright Arthur Miller married screen idol Marilyn Monroe in a Jewish ceremony, an event of high-level gossip for much of the world and of high-level curiosity for the U.S. government.

"An anonymous telephone call" has been placed to the New York Daily News, an FBI report notes at the time. The caller stated that the "religious" wedding — Miller was Jewish and Monroe had converted — was an obvious "cover up" for Miller, who "had been and still was a member of the CP (Communist Party) and was their cultural front man." Monroe also "had drifted into the Communist Party orbit."

The memo is one of many included in Miller's FBI files, obtained by The Associated Press through the Freedom of Information Act. Miller, who died last year at age 89, was a longtime liberal who opposed the Vietnam War, supported civil rights and, in one play, "The Crucible," linked the Cold War pursuit of communists to the Salem witch trials of the 17th century.

His files only became available after his death, but the government's interest in Miller was well established in his lifetime. In 1956, the House Un-American Activities Committee asked him to give names of alleged communist writers with whom he had attended some meetings in the 1940s. Miller refused and was convicted of contempt of Congress, a decision eventually overturned by the U.S. Supreme Court.

For a decade before his congressional testimony, the FBI kept track of the playwright, but ended up making a more convincing case that Miller was a dissenter from the Communist Party rather than a sympathizer.

"Miller became disillusioned with the party because the party did not stimulate in him the ability and inspiration to do creative writing as he had expected when he joined the Party," one informant told the FBI.

According to a 34-page FBI report, compiled in 1951, Miller was identified by an informant as being "under Communist Party discipline" in the 1930s and, as of the mid-1940s, a member.

According to Miller, he had never been "under Communist discipline," although "there were two short periods — one in 1940 and one in 1947 — when I was sufficiently close to Communist Party activities so that someone might honestly have thought that I had become a member."

In an essay published in 1999, Miller recalled that "practically everyone I knew stood within the conventions of the political left of center; one or two were Communist party members ... and most had had a brush with Marxist ideas or organizations.

"I have never been able to believe in the reality of these people being actual or putative traitors any more than I could be," he wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0036553

Miller's first Broadway play, "The Man Who Had All the Luck," came out in 1944, around the same time that the earliest FBI files are dated. His professional and personal life were closely watched, usually through newspaper clippings, but also from informants (whose names have been blacked out in the records) and public documents.

The FBI not only kept records of Miller's political statements, from his opposition to nuclear weapons to his attacks against the anti-communist blacklist, but of his affiliation with such organizations as the American Labor Party ("a communist front") and the "communist infiltrated" American Civil Liberties Union.

In vain, the FBI probed for communist influence in the content and in the productions of his plays. One memo cites an "informant" who reported that "several communists" have been turned down for roles in various "Arthur Miller playlets."

Miller's plays, the informant concludes, "although occasionally supported by the Communist Party, do not follow Marxist ideology." A separate file states that "Miller was not looked on with favor by the Communist Party," which regarded him as "`just a civil rights guy.'"

Miller's fame made him a target of the government, but also protected him. For example, a memo from 1955 noted an admiring article by Holiday magazine and concluded that "because of Miller's "limited activity with the CP (Communist Party) and his position in the business world, it is felt that an interview would result in embarrassment for the Bureau."

His files essentially end in 1956, except for a brief reprise in 1993, when a background check was submitted to Bernard Nussbaum, the White House counsel to President Clinton. The occasion was not subversive activity, but the imminent presentation of a National Medal of the Arts.

Although his alleged communist ties were reviewed and he was identified as a "participant in activities calling for an end to the war in Vietnam," no other "pertinent information" turned up and he received his medal.

At the ceremony, Clinton praised Miller as a major playwright of the 20th century, and cited "The Crucible" for its admirable focus on "issues of conscience."

Mack Tops FBI's Most Wanted; Mothers Mourn At Wife's Reno Funeral (AP)

By Scott Sonner, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, June 21, 2006

RENO, Nev. (AP) - The mothers of both the victim and the husband accused of killing her were among some 500 mourners who attended Charla Mack's private funeral service Tuesday as the FBI added Darren Mack to its list of "Most Wanted" fugitives.

Darren Mack, 45, the wealthy former co-owner of a Reno pawn shop, hasn't been seen since the June 12 stabbing death of his estranged wife and the sniper shooting of Family Court Judge Chuck Weller, who was wounded in the chest.

The FBI gave Mack top billing on it's Web site list for "Most Wanted" fugitives, describing the dark-haired, 5-foot-11, 190-pound man as a bodybuilder and hunter with "access to all types of weapons." He should be considered "armed and dangerous," FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III said.

Bomb materials, ammunition and written allegations of corruption against Weller - who was handling the couple's pending divorce - were found in Mack's town house, police said in court documents.

Scott Freeman, a Reno lawyer, said he had been retained by Darren Mack's family to represent him "when and if he is found." Freeman said he had not heard from Mack since he disappeared.

Charla Mack's mother, Soorya Townley, and the dead woman's brother, Christopher Broughton, accompanied Darren and Charla Mack's 8-year-old daughter, Erica, to the funeral. Also attending were Mack's brother, Landon Mack, 43, and his mother, Joan Mack, with whom Darren Mack shared ownership of the pawn shop until last summer.

"I really think the important thing now is to find Darren but not to have all this vengefulness," Townley told a Reno television station Monday. "I don't think Charla really would have wanted that."

It was not clear if Mack's two teenage children from a previous marriage attended the funeral.

Reporters were kept about 100 yards from the mortuary during the private service, and Charla Mack's family declined any comment, said Wayne N. Reynolds, president of Mountain View Mortuary.

Security workers with walkie-talkies chased TV camera operators off neighboring properties that Reynolds said the mortuary owned. Reporters also were banned from the neighboring cemetery where Charla Mack was buried after a service that lasted more than an hour.

Reynolds said in a statement that family members wanted no media coverage of "their final moments with Charla during the `Celebration of Charla's Life.'"

"This tragic event has deeply traumatized two wonderful families who while experiencing their own grief, are working feverishly to provide the love, nurture, caring and assistance in the grief process of three beautiful children and this `Celebration of Life' needs to protect them from any further trauma of having their private emotions aired on the evening news," Reynolds said.

Weller was shot through the window of his third-floor office in the downtown courthouse. He is under police protection as he recovers.

Authorities said they were uncertain whether Mack had fled the country. Mueller said anyone with information on Mack should contact the FBI or the nearest U.S. Embassy or Consulate.

A search warrant affidavit first disclosed by the Reno Gazette-Journal on Tuesday said officers found several boxes of ammunition and an empty gun case with a receipt for a Bushmaster .223-caliber rifle equipped with a laser sighting device at Mack's town house, where Charla's body was found in the garage in a pool of blood in the hours after Weller was shot.

Officers also found notes and printed material that "contain allegations that Weller was corrupt and had exhibited favoritism in his rulings," the affidavit said.

A witness told police that Mack "discussed hiring him to follow Judge Weller in the hope of proving that he was corrupt."

"That same witness described Mr. Darren Roy Mack as seeming to him to have been 'at the end of his rope' and extremely frustrated and angry with both his estranged wife and Judge Weller," the police affidavit said.

Mack's cousin, Jeff Donner of Moraga, Calif., said last week that Mack called him about 11:19 a.m. June 12. Donner said Mack wanted him to "carry my message of what's been going on in his courtroom if anything happens to me." Weller was shot at about 11:05 a.m.

Mack earned more than $500,000 a year and had a net worth of $9.4 million as recently as 2004, according to court documents.

Darren Mack Put On FBI's Most Wanted List (KVBC-TV)

KVBC-TV, June 21, 2006

Reno pawn shop owner Darren Mack, 45, has been put on the FBI's Most Wanted List.

Since the shooting occurred a week ago, authorities say Mack's whereabouts is still unknown. The FBI says he's considered armed and dangerous.

Custody of the couple's 8 year old daughter was granted to Darren Mack's mother, Joan. Court officials say Charla Mack's family has open visitation rights.

Darren Mack On FBI's Most Wanted (KLAS-TV)

KLAS-TV, June 21, 2006

The FBI added Darren Mack to its list of "Most Wanted" fugitives today as family members paid their last respects at a funeral service for the estranged wife he's accused of killing.

The mothers of both Charla Mack and Darren Mack were among an estimated 500 people who attended the private service Tuesday in west Reno.

The 45-year-old Mack is the wealthy former co-owner of a Reno pawn shop. He hasn't been seen since the June 12th stabbing death of Charla and sniper shooting of Family Court Judge Chuck Weller. He's a suspect in both cases.

Weller, who was wounded in the chest but is recovering, was handling the couple's pending divorce.

The FBI is giving Mack top billing on it's Web site for the "Most Wanted" list. He's described as a five-foot-11, 190-pound, dark-haired man who is a bodybuilder and hunter with "access to all types of weapons."

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller said Mack should be considered "armed and dangerous."

Reno lawyer Scott Freeman says he has been retained by Darren Mack's family to represent Mack "when and if he is found." Freeman says he is cooperating with investigators but has not heard from Mack or anyone who knew him since he disappeared.

Charla Mack's mother, Soorya Townley, and Charla's brother, Christopher Broughton, accompanied Darren and Charla's 8-year-old daughter, Erica, to Tuesday's funeral. Also attending were Darren Mack's only brother, 43-year-old Landon Mack, and his mother, Joan Mack.

Mack's Room Held Bomb Parts (RENOGJ)

Reno Gazette-Journal, June 21, 2006

While murder victim Charla Mack's family met with friends at a mortuary visitation Monday, a review of a search warrant request shows her estranged husband Darren Mack had bombmaking materials in his bedroom.

The materials, when mixed together and attached to a blasting cap or shot at, will explode, said Washoe County sheriff's Sgt. Lou Gazes, head of the Consolidated Bomb Squad for Washoe County, Reno and Sparks and who was at Mack's apartment.

"There were materials that could have made a bomb," Gazes said Monday.

Mack, 45, is wanted in a nationwide manhunt for the stabbing death of his estranged wife, Charla, and in the sniper-style shooting of Family Court Judge Chuck Weller.

Charla Mack, 39, was found fatally stabbed in Darren Mack's garage June 12. The couple's 8-year-old is staying with Darren's mother, Joan Mack, and is spending time with both families.

Weller, shot in the chest while standing in his Reno Justice Court chambers, is recovering in a secure location. On Monday, he began working on some court business for the first time since the shooting, said Jim Denton, the judge's family friend and spokesman.

During a search of Mack's apartment after the shooting and stabbing, police also found ammunition, notes and printed material that "contain allegations that Judge Weller was corrupt and had exhibited favoritism in his rulings," according to the search warrant affidavit.

A witness told police that Mack "discussed hiring him to follow Judge Weller in the hope of proving that he was corrupt," the search warrant affidavit said. "That same witness described Mr. Darren Roy Mack as seeming to him to have been 'at the end of his rope' and extremely frustrated and angry with both his estranged wife and Judge Weller," Detective David Jenkins said in the affidavit.

Charla remembered

Charla's family spent Monday at the Mountain View Mortuary in Reno, sharing hugs and stories with friends. Charla's funeral is scheduled for today.

Outside the funeral home, Charla's mother, Soorya Townley, showed friends pictures of her daughter and granddaughter, as Charla's brother, Christopher Broughton, helped her unload their car.

"It's just such a nightmare," Townley said. "I never imagined something like this would be happening."

She held up a framed photograph of Charla and Darren's daughter, dressed in a fairy outfit and kneeling in a magical garden fantasy setting with flowers, butterflies and a small pool.

"This was the fantasy world they had," Townley said. "This is the direct opposite of what Darren has now created for his daughter."

Broughton said their family's only priority is to deal with their pain.

"We're grieving -- that's it," Broughton said.

Mack family waits

Darren Mack's family continued the waiting game Monday, said Landon Mack, 43, Darren's only brother. They had heard no news, he said. The family kept their focus on taking care of the couple's daughter and preparing the child for her mother's funeral.

The family-owned business, Palace Jewelry & Loan Co., released a statement saying the company was under the sole management of Joan Mack since last summer. The company is not in bankruptcy, the statement said, and "will continue to operate as it always has."

"In these difficult times for the Mack family, as well as the Palace and its employees, the Palace appreciates the continued support from its friends, customers, partners, vendors, and the community," the statement said.

Darren Mack filed for Chapter 7 bankruptcy protection in U.S. Bankruptcy Court on Aug. 26, 2005, according to court documents. In his filing, he said he owned half the stock of the company and said it was worth $550,000.

But in a financial statement Mack filed with Wells Fargo Bank on April 28, 2005 to secure his $500,000 line of credit, Mack said his interest in Palace Jewelry was worth $5 million.

Police search Mack's apartment

A review of the search warrant affidavit filed June 14 showed police found the explosive material in Mack's bedroom.

"During the protective sweep of that residence, Sgt. Mike Lessman of the Reno Police Department SWAT Team observed items inside the master bedroom which he recognized and believed to be material commonly used to build an explosive or incendiary device," the affidavit said.

During a search of the courthouse just after the shooting, two police dogs trained to detect explosives "alerted" on Weller's vehicle, parked in the court's basement. But a search found no explosive devices, police said.

When asked if the hit from the dogs could have been connected to the explosive material found in Mack's bedroom, Gazes said: "It's certainly a possibility."

The police search of Mack's apartment also found "several boxes of firearm ammunition, including .223-caliber and .243-caliber rifle ammunition which was strewn about a floor in one of the bedrooms," the document said.

And police found "an empty rifle case which contained a receipt from the purchase of a Bushmaster .223 caliber rifle by Darren Roy Mack." It said the rifle was "equipped with a laser sighting device."

Police also saw a Dell computer in Mack's kitchen, according to the affidavit.

DOJ_NMG_0036556

"Near the computer were numerous printed e-mails and other computer generated documents which referenced Judge Weller," the affidavit said.

"Several documents and handwritten notes appeared to have been written by Darren Roy Mack and some of those documents appeared to contain allegations that Judge Weller was corrupt and had exhibited favoritism in his rulings," the affidavit said.

Jenkins told the court in the search warrant affidavit he had interviewed several people who knew Mack and said Mack was "extremely displeased with Judge Weller and that he believed that Judge Weller had made a series of judgments in the pending litigation which were adverse to him."

Detectives also said they obtained Mack's cell phone records.

"That information indicates that Mr. Darren Roy Mack's cellular telephone was in close proximity to downtown Reno and the Washoe County Courthouse at 1 South Sierra Street when Judge Weller was shot," the affidavit said.

Darren Mack's cousin, Jeff Donner of Moraga, Calif., said last week that Mack called him about 11:19 a.m. June 12. Donner said Mack wanted him to "carry my message of what's been going on in his courtroom if anything happens to me."

Weller was shot at about 11:05 a.m.

Officials Announce Joint Effort To Track Tainted Heroin Use (AP)

By Joann Loviglio, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 20, 2006

PHILADELPHIA -- City, state and federal law enforcement and public health officials on Tuesday announced a joint regional effort to track the ongoing deaths attributed to painkiller-laced heroin and identify the suppliers of the drug.

The fentanyl-laced heroin has caused about 70 deaths in the Philadelphia metropolitan region and more than 200 overdoses nationwide since it was first spotted in April, U.S. Attorney Patrick J. Meehan said.

"The problem with fentanyl is that it's deadly," Meehan said. "The push of a syringe is like pulling the trigger."

To determine the full scope of the problem in the region, officials representing law enforcement in Philadelphia and Camden County, N.J.; the federal Drug Enforcement Agency and the FBI; and Philadelphia's behavioral health department said they would share information and coordinate their investigations into the spike of fentanyl-related deaths since the spring.

Fentanyl is a legally produced prescription painkiller that is 40 to 100 times stronger than morphine, said James Kasson, DEA special agent-in-charge. It is commonly used to treat cancer pain; however, the type of fentanyl currently being mixed with heroin is most likely manufactured in clandestine labs like one raided several weeks ago in Mexico, he said.

The drug is also many times stronger than heroin and even OxyContin, another painkiller that has caused overdoses. An overdose can slow breathing to the point of death.

Deaths have been reported over the past month in the cities _ and suburbs _ of Philadelphia, Camden, Chicago and Detroit. Federal authorities are trying to determine whether the cases are related in any of those areas, Kasson said.

Philadelphia District Attorney Lynne Abraham expressed concern that disseminating information about fentanyl-laced heroin would increase awareness among addicts and result in more deaths. However, she said that getting the word out was essential from a public health perspective.

"In the back of our minds we worry ... this may be something that, perverse as it may sound, will encourage drug abusers who are used to the high of heroin to want to seek even a bigger bang for their dollar," she said.

Some dealers are already asking buyers if they want their heroin "with or without," meaning with or without fentanyl, she said. "It's not unlike going to a cheesesteak place and asking, 'With or without,'" she said.

Meehan said that key to the coordination efforts is using a central "fusion center" for investigative agencies, hospitals, public health agencies, drug treatment centers and medical examiners to submit their findings. The federal High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area (HIDTA) program will serve as that point for collecting and distributing information, Meehan said.

The goal is to find out where addicts are getting the tainted heroin, then disrupt and dismantle the supply chain, Abraham said.

Meehan and Abraham also made it clear that third-degree murder charges could be brought in Pennsylvania against drug dealers whose product kills someone.

"Fentanyl-laced heroin is a sure and certain way to death," Abraham said.

'Bad' Heroin Suspected In 20-year-old's Death (GLOUCOTMSNJ)

DOJ_NMG_0036557

By Pete Mccarthy, Pmccarthy@sjnewsco.com

Gloucester County Times, June 20, 2006

Angela Doyle doesn't want her 20-year-old son to have died in vain.

The body of Micheal "Percy" Curci III was found Thursday morning in Pittsgrove Township following a lethal dose of heroin.

Curci had been out of jail just two days after serving a 60-day sentence for violating drug court -- a program offered to drug addicts who are facing criminal charges for related offenses.

"He just struggled," a tearful Doyle explained on Monday. "He just couldn't stop doing it."

Salem County authorities were awaiting toxicology reports, but confirmed Curci's death.

"(Curci) had been clean for a period of time, but (the heroin) may have shocked his body," Salem County Prosecutor John T. Lenahan said.

Doyle, who lives in West Deptford Township, said she recently received a letter from her son while he was locked up at Gloucester County Jail.

It said, "I know it's going to take me if I do it again," Doyle recalled Monday, as she prepared to bury her son on Friday.

If addicts learn anything from Curci's death, Doyle said, she wants it to be that they should stay clear of these drugs.

"They think -- they're 18, 19 years old -- they're invincible," Doyle said. "This is not a joke. You really can die from this stuff."

There was a rash of fatal drug reactions in April -- including a Greenwich Township woman -- to heroin purchased in Camden that had been laced with fentanyl.

Curci did purchase a batch of heroin in Camden, Lenahan said, but it was not clear whether his death is related to the latest rash of hospitalizations and deaths in South Jersey from heroin use.

Lenahan said another Pittsgrove man, John Burke, died of a heroin overdose in May.

He said that supply was also purchased in Camden.

Curci is believed to have been one of four individuals to die in the past week after overdosing on heroin purchased in Camden.

Three men -- ages 20, 30 and 31 -- died between Friday and Sunday in Camden County, according to Camden County Prosecutor's Office Spokesman Bill Shralow.

The heroin involved in the most recent overdose -- a 31-year-old Pennsylvania man in Pennsauken -- had the same "Paul Wahl" label stamped on it as heroin found in Glassboro on Saturday.

However, investigators so far believe that heroin was purchased in Philadelphia, according to Shralow.

Two men in Glassboro were treated over the weekend after allegedly injecting heroin.

They have both recovered and were released from Kennedy Memorial Hospital in Washington Township, according to Glassboro Detective Sgt. Robert Highley.

Authorities were still trying to determine where the drugs originated, but were not getting cooperation from the two men.

"I guess it's all involved in that same stuff that's been hitting the streets everywhere else," Highley said.

A counselor at SODAT -- an outpatient drug and alcohol treatment and prevention agency in Woodbury -- said help is available.

But the "physical addiction" causes withdrawal symptoms, which leads to the need for more.

There are several local venues for dealing with drug addiction.

What South Jersey really needs is a long-term inpatient treatment facility, according to Kas Foster, who is with Parent to Parent, a grassroots effort of parents who have lost a child to drugs.

"Instead of treating them, we're burying them at a rapid rate," said Foster, a National Park resident who lost her son to drugs in 1997.

Her agency helps addicts get referrals into treatment facilities, but more facilities are still needed, she said.

"Drugs are a horrible thing," Foster said. "They are killing our youth. They're destroying our families."

Fewer Positive Drug Tests Among Workers (PHI)

By Catherine Larkin

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 20, 2006

A smaller percentage of U.S. workers tested positive for drug use last year than at any time in the 18 years of screening by Quest Diagnostics Inc.

About 4.1 percent of the 7.3 million workplace drug tests performed last year came back positive, compared with 4.5 percent in 2004 and 13.6 percent when Quest started its Drug Testing Index in 1988, Quest said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0036558

Marijuana accounted for about 53 percent of the positive samples in 2005, the Lyndhurst, N.J., company said.

Barry Sample, director of science and technology in Quest's employer solutions division, said he was encouraged by the findings, especially the drop in amphetamine use found among general workforce employees. About 75 percent of these tests are given before employment, and 10 percent are random screenings, he said.

"There's a lot of data that show that drug testing works simply as a deterrence," Sample said in a telephone interview.

The semiannual report suggests that state policymakers and stores such as Target Corp. may be helping to reduce drug use by limiting access to cold medicines containing pseudoephedrine, a key ingredient used to make methamphetamine illegally, Sample said.

"People can't go in and buy hundreds of boxes at a time," Sample said. "It has greatly restricted the availability."

Preliminary reviews of data from the first five months of this year show that use of amphetamines, a group of stimulants that includes methamphetamine, has dropped to its lowest level among both general employees and workers for whom testing is federally required since they became popular in 2002 and 2003, Sample said.

Battle Against Meth (CCT)

The Contra Costa Times, June 20, 2006

FINALLY, WE HAVE WHAT appears to be good news in the fight against the dangerously addictive drug methamphetamine. But it is clear that the nation should not be celebrating just yet because more difficult work lies ahead.

The Bush administration reported Monday that there has been a major decline in the number of meth lab seizures nationwide. At the same time, a drug-testing company said the number of job applicants and workers who tested positive for meth plunged 31 percent over the first five months of this year.

Of course, White House drug czar John Walters said the two reports are evidence that federal efforts are working and that the "one-two punch" to restrict chemicals and educate the public about the horrors of meth addiction are finally paying off.

We hope that is the reason, but truthfully, no one is yet sure. It is possible that the meth lab people are getting smarter and hiding their labs better or that the police don't have the adequate manpower to search for the labs and, therefore, the seizures have dropped.

It is also possible that meth users have found ways to get around the drug tests.

Rep. Mark Souder, R-Ind., chairman of the House drug policy subcommittee, gives most of the credit for the numbers to state and local governments, saying the decline in meth abuse has come despite the absence of national direction.

He claims the administration has refused to make combating meth a priority. He criticized a White House budget proposal to slash federal spending for state and local law enforcement to fight meth.

But Walters disagreed with such assertions, saying "No one's trying to downplay it. There's no drug worse than meth." But he said his office can't focus too much on a single drug at the expense of other threats like heroin, cocaine, prescription drugs and marijuana.

This kind of talk certainly indicates that there is disagreement among experts about the relative success of the nation's fight against meth. But they do seem to agree that progress has been made; numbers that large are difficult to ignore.

This tiny bit of sunlight in the otherwise bleak national picture on meth abuse should be seen as a ray of hope rather than the dawn of a new day. As we said, there remains much work to be done.

The Up And Down Numbers Of Meth Use In The Rockies (NW)

New West, June 20, 2006

New federal reports from the Drug Enforcement Administration say that use of methamphetamines is declining in some Western states, but officials in the energy industry in Utah say it's on the rise, so where are we in the fight against this destructive drug?

An Associated Press story in todayâ€™s New York Times says that the number of meth lab seizures across the country was down 30 percent, which is attributed to many states and drugstores limiting the availability of some of the ingredients on store shelves while also doing a better job of educating people about the drugâ€™s dangers.

As well, the AP story reports, the number of positive tests for meth use among job seekers was down 31 percent, according to Quest Diagnostics, the nation's largest drug testing company. And the biggest decline in use has come from some western states, where the drug first became prevalent, including Montana, which saw a 66 percent decline in meth lab seizures.

The Office of National Drug Control Policy takes some of the credit for the declines, but at least one influential federal lawmakers attributes the decline to state and local governments, and criticized the Bush administration for its lack of direction on combating meth use.

The anti-meth advertising campaign in Montana has gained much attention for its hard-hitting and graphic ads depicting the downward spiral of young people who become addicted to the drug. The campaign, mostly finaced by technology billionaire Thomas Siebel, has been adopted or copied in other states, and recently Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr. said he wanted to use similar sorts of ads in his state. But one criticism against the ads was that they donâ€™t depict many types of users, especially the occasional user.

One user type that isnâ€™t in the Montana Meth Projects ads, but which is becoming more prevalent in Utah is the energy worker â€" roughnecks working long hours in tough conditions and in remote areas.

A story in Sundayâ€™s Deseret News reports that meth and other drug use is increasing on the rigs, and the industry is taking a mixed stance on it: some are working hard to combat it and have a zero-tolerance policy for use while others say they canâ€™t risk losing employees or are willing to hire former drug offenders or will offer last-chance opportunities for employees who test positive for drug use.

Missouri Still Leads The Nation In Meth Lab Seizures (AP/KWMU)

AP/KWMU-TV, June 20, 2006

ST. LOUIS, MO - Despite a 22% decline from last year, Missouri still leads the nation in police seizures of illegal meth labs.

Missouri is one of at least 37 states with laws that restrict the sale of cold medications. The laws are part of an effort to starve meth manufacturers of their key ingredient.

The new federal Combat Meth Act will enforce similar restrictions across the nation by September 30th.

Nationally, police seizures of meth labs fell 30% last year.

Also, the nation's largest drug testing company said the number of job applicants and workers who test positive for meth fell 31% in the first five months of this year.

White House drug czar John Walters said the declines are evidence that the one-two punch to restrict chemicals and educate the public about meth are paying off.

Bill To Pour $8 Mil Into State's Meth Programs (AR)

Arizona Republic, June 20, 2006

State lawmakers have agreed to pump $8 million toward tackling meth addiction, crafting a plan to beef up law enforcement and provide money for prevention, treatment and education programs.

The idea: Disrupt the flow and sale of meth in local communities while teaching children about the evils of meth before they are tempted to try the drug.

Democratic Gov. Janet Napolitano is expected later this week to sign House Bill 2554, which is part of a negotiated $10 billion state budget agreement.

advertisement

Some experts say that a key part of the solution to meth-related problems is educating children about the danger of the drug. An infusion of $500,000 in state funds will help Boys & Girls Clubs across Arizona expand the "Smart Moves" program to teach more children about the evils of meth.

"We could use the money to increase the number of kids that we can work with on a one-on-one basis," said John Heitel, president of Arizona Alliance of Boys & Girls Clubs. "Meth is so horrible that when they start with meth, then they are hooked on that stuff."

Children were found in the homes involved in about a third of Arizona's 102 meth-lab raids in 2004. The primary ingredient in meth is ephedrine or pseudoephedrine, a common ingredient in over-the-counter cold medicines.

About $3 million of the state dollars would be devoted to counties for drug interdiction, education and prevention efforts. Maricopa County figures to get more than $1.5 million from the state. Some of that could go toward the county's efforts to launch an anti-meth advertising campaign modeled after the Montana Meth Project, which has received national recognition.

While grateful for the funding, Maricopa County Supervisor Don Stapley said he wished the Legislature would take a more leading role in the effort. "At the end of the day, the state's going to wish it had been part of this project because it is so dynamic and effective," he said.

The anti-meth legislation took many twists and turns this year at the Capitol.

Napolitano unveiled a $5 million plan in February to disrupt the flow of the drug from Mexico by having a drug interdiction team. Republican lawmakers countered with a $12 million proposal that included more money for police, prevention and education. The $8 million compromise came after nearly four months of disagreements and delays.

Dr. Marc Matthews, director of the trauma unit at Maricopa Medical Center, doesn't need convincing when it comes to the state's meth problem.

DOJ_NMG_0036560

"I see it in my trauma patients every single night," said Mathews, an associate director of the Arizona Burn Center. "It's in our homes, it's in our workplaces, it's in our communities. It's everywhere. It's crippling us."

He called the state's $8 million response "a joke" and added: "Give me $80 million. Now we're serious. With this drug, you're literally fighting for the heart and soul of your community."

Meth produces euphoria, increased alertness and increased physical activity. Users can become paranoid, even violent, and often turn to crime to finance their habits. Meth is cheap and easy to get. It can be manufactured with household chemicals and over-the-counter cold medications.

Authorities believe a lion's share of the meth used in Arizona is produced in labs in Mexico and Southern California and run by organized crime and street gangs.

The remaining supply comes from makeshift meth labs in Arizona.

Rep. Mark Anderson, who has introduced the legislation, said it's a good first step in cracking down on the rampant addiction in Arizona.

"It's comprehensive," said Anderson, R-Mesa. "It has prevention, treatment and interdiction. Without all of those things, it would diminish the other components of our plan. We need all of this to help fix the problem."

Staff reporter Matthew Benson contributed to this story.

related WASHINGTON - Good news in the fight against meth abuse came on two fronts Monday, with reports showing a major drop in methamphetamine lab seizures nationwide and a similar decline in the spread of the drug into the workplace.

Local law enforcement officials say there is still a strong appetite for the highly addictive drug. They warned that meth manufacturers in Mexico and other countries are moving to fill the supply void.

The number of meth-lab busts plummeted more than 30 percent last year as most states enacted laws to restrict the sale of over-the-counter cold medicines used to make meth, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration's El Paso Intelligence Center.

Meanwhile, the nation's largest drug-testing company said Monday that the number of job applicants and workers who tested positive for meth plunged 31 percent over the first five months of this year.

Those figures are based on the results of more than 7 million drug tests in 2005 and about 3 million tests from January to May 2006, conducted by New Jersey-based Quest Diagnostics Inc.

John Walters, the White House drug policy director, called the data an encouraging sign of progress.

"The practices that have been taking place in our states are working, not only on small toxic labs but also what we're trying to do with demand," said Walters, head of the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

Earlier this month, the White House drug policy office set a goal to cut meth use by 15 percent by 2009 and increase seizures of meth labs by 25 percent.

A priority is stemming the flow of meth from superlabs in Mexico, which supply about 80 percent of the drug to the United States.

U.S. Asks Suriname To Extradite Suspect (AP)

AP, June 21, 2006

PARAMARIBO, Suriname — The United States has asked Suriname to extradite a Guyanese man wanted on drug charges in New York, a U.S. Embassy spokesman said Tuesday.

Shaheed Khan was arrested Thursday by authorities in Suriname. He is accused of leading a criminal network that smuggled arms, ammunition and cocaine from Colombia to Europe and the United States via Guyana and Suriname.

The United States filed an extradition request with Suriname's foreign affairs ministry on Monday, said embassy spokesman Cliff Djamin.

Surinamese officials told the U.S. that they need to review the request.

A U.S. grand jury indictment unsealed in April by a judge in New York charged Khan with conspiring to smuggle at least 11 pounds of cocaine into the U.S. since January 2001.

Lawyer Guilty Of Peddling Pot (TD)

By Jim Nolan

Times Dispatch, June 21, 2006

A criminal-defense attorney appeared in federal court yesterday as a criminal defendant and pleaded guilty to peddling marijuana.

Jeremy Clyde Sharp, 35, faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine when he is sentenced on Sept. 20 by U.S. District Judge Henry E. Hudson on one count of conspiracy to possess marijuana with the intent to distribute it.

DOJ_NMG_0036561

Sharp's attorney, Craig S. Cooley, declined comment on behalf of his client yesterday.

Prosecutors charged that Sharp "did conspire with others, known and unknown to law enforcement to distribute and possess with the intent to distribute, a mixture and substance containing detectable amounts of marijuana."

Beginning in the fall 2004, Sharp bought between 20 and 40 kilograms of high-grade marijuana from at least two suppliers, one of whom charged him $3,600 per pound, according to the statement of facts in the plea agreement. A kilogram is equal to about 2.2 pounds.

"Sharp progressed from quarter-pound quantities until he regularly bought two to three pounds at a time," according to the documents, which also stated that he purchased seven pounds of marijuana on one occasion.

"Sharp would then break the pound quantities into smaller amounts for redistribution to his customers," the documents state.

The records did not specify the names of Sharp's customers, or of his suppliers.

The U.S. attorney's office declined to comment on the plea agreement, except to say the investigation is continuing. Sharp agreed to cooperate with investigators as part of his plea agreement.

According to the court papers, Sharp used his pickup truck to transport and store the marijuana and the proceeds from his sales.

When Sharp's Floyd Avenue home was searched in early February, investigators from the Drug Enforcement Administration, Henrico County police and Virginia Commonwealth University police also found the remains of a dismantled marijuana-growing operation. Sharp was arrested Feb. 10.

Sharp, a former public defender, was in private practice at the time of his arrest.

Baseball Won't Save Samples For Testing (NYT)

By Jack Curry

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

While Commissioner Bud Selig reiterated that Major League Baseball was eventually hoping to find a urine test to detect human growth hormone, he said he did not envision freezing urine samples from baseball players for future testing.

Several scientists, including Dr. Donald H. Catlin, whom baseball officials appointed to research a test for the hormone known as HGH, have said that such a search could be arduous.

A possible option to deter HGH use would be to save urine samples already collected by baseball. If players knew there was a possibility they could be punished at a future date for drugs they had used in the past, the frozen samples might be a deterrent. Selig dismissed the notion.

"I'm not a doctor, but I've talked to a number of significant experts on that issue," Selig said. "They don't believe it's a viable solution in any shape or form."

Selig declined to be more specific, other than saying experts "talked about it not being stable," referring to frozen samples.

Rob Manfred, baseball's executive vice president for labor relations, said he had had discussions with some experts and "they do not see the freezing of urine as a panacea in regards to HGH." Manfred said there were "practical and scientific issues" involved. He was probably referring to the storage of the more than 10,000 samples baseball collects each year and whether a test from frozen urine would survive legal challenges.

Catlin, who is the director of the Olympic Analytical Laboratory at U.C.L.A., said that freezing urine samples would act "as a very strong and powerful deterrent." But Catlin acknowledged that it would be an expensive and challenging process.

Catlin also agreed that the stability of the samples would be an issue because scientists do not know the stability of human growth hormone.

"It is viable," Catlin said about saving samples. "It's not simple. Nothing in this life involving doping is simple."

Even if Selig wanted to save urine samples, he would have to persuade the players union to agree to it. Urine samples from current tests for steroids and amphetamines are thrown out. Should scientists develop a practical blood test for HGH, the union would still have to accept it, and union officials would surely view it as an invasion of privacy.

Gene Orza, the chief operating officer for the players union, would not say, in an e-mail response, how the union would react to attempts to save urine samples or take blood samples.

The debate about human growth hormone has intensified since federal agents said that Jason Grimsley, a pitcher the Arizona Diamondbacks released earlier this month, said in an affidavit that he had used HGH, steroids and amphetamines. Grimsley named other major leaguers who he said had used the drugs. Those names were blacked out in copies of a document made public.

Dr. Gary I. Wadler, a New York University medical professor and steroid expert, has said that the notion of a urine test for human growth hormone "is a pipe dream."

DOJ_NMG_0036562

Catlin, whose research group found previously undetected designer steroids, said he disliked hearing other scientists' commenting on the likelihood of his success.

"It's as if I have no clue what I'm doing," Catlin said. "I do have a clue what I'm doing."

Officials for the World Anti-Doping Agency said a blood test for the hormone that they deemed reliable was used during the Athens Games in 2004. Only several hundred of the tests have been given, the officials said, because antibodies needed for the test are in short supply.

When Catlin was hired, Major League Baseball pledged $450,000 over three years to finance his research. Selig and Manfred have said the contribution has increased to $500,000. That is a modest sum for a $2-billion-a-year industry.

"I'm sure there will be more contributions by M.L.B.," Selig said. "Who knows how much it will take?"

Catlin said the International Olympic Committee, the United States Anti-Doping Agency and the World Anti-Doping Agency had invested millions in trying to develop a test for HGH, and had been unsuccessful.

"We're hoping to get the ball rolling and lead to further advances," Catlin said. "It's not terribly realistic to expect a solution based on the amount of money we're receiving."

Coca Production Up Despite Eradication Efforts (AP)

AP, June 21, 2006

BOGOTA, Colombia -- The United Nations says production of the plant used to make cocaine has increased by 8 percent in Colombia, despite record drug seizures and spraying of herbicides.

A similar report by the U.S. Office of National Drug Control Policy showed Colombia's coca production skyrocketed 26 percent from 2004 to 2005, in part due to a near-doubling of the area surveyed.

The two reports are the strongest evidence yet that a cornerstone of the U.S.-led war on drugs -- the aerial fumigation of coca fields -- is failing to meet its goal of halving coca production in the Andes.

The results may hamper efforts by President Alvaro Uribe to win additional U.S. backing for Plan Colombia, the anti-drug strategy that has cost American taxpayers $4 billion since 2000.

Coca Production Increases In Colombia (AP)

By Joshua Goodman, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 20, 2006

BOGOTA, Colombia — A key component of the U.S.-backed war on drugs appears to be failing.

Despite record drug seizures and spraying of herbicides, production of the plant used to make cocaine increased by 8 percent in Colombia, to 330 square miles, the United Nations said Tuesday _ even as authorities sprayed coca fields totaling 25 times the size of Manhattan

The findings come on the heels of a similar report in April by the U.S. Office of National Drug Control Policy, which showed Colombia's coca production skyrocketed 26 percent from 2004 to 2005, in part due to a near-doubling of the area surveyed.

The two reports are the strongest evidence yet that a cornerstone of the U.S.-led war on drugs _ the aerial fumigation of coca fields _ is failing to meet its goal of halving coca production in the Andes.

The results may hamper efforts by President Alvaro Uribe to win additional U.S. backing for Plan Colombia, the anti-drug strategy that has cost American taxpayers $4 billion since 2000.

The report by the U.N. Office of Drugs and Crime said Colombian coca production expanded for the first time in five years, by 23 square miles.

"If this is the start of a return to much higher levels of coca, then it will be a problem," the U.N. agency's executive director Antonio Maria Costa told a news conference in Bogota.

"But I don't think that will happen. The government has every intention to continue its eradication efforts at the same high level as the past few years."

Partially offsetting the rise in Colombian production were declines in the world's two other coca-producing countries, Bolivia and Peru.

Overall, coca production in the Andean region rose 1 percent, to 616 square miles from 2004, according to the U.N.'s Andean coca survey.

In Colombia, the world's largest cocaine producer, the biggest increases were in the lawless, largely uninhabited jungles near its borders with Venezuela and Ecuador.

The spread of the coca frontier eastward toward Venezuela is in line with comments by U.S. anti-drug officials who have alleged that corruption within the government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez may be converting Colombia's neighbor into a major drug route.

DOJ_NMG_0036563

Colombia is believed to be the source of 90 percent of the cocaine consumed in the United States.

Last year, the government eradicated a record 656 square miles of coca, mainly through aerial spraying of the herbicide glyphosate, up from 529 square miles in 2004.

But with drug traffickers developing techniques to better camouflage illegal crops and increase yields, Uribe has asked the Bush administration to boost financing for fumigation efforts.

However, key members of the U.S. Congress and growing numbers of Colombians have suggested it may be time to give up the potentially environmentally harmful practice in favor of alternative economic programs for the poor farmers who grow coca on behalf of the country's cartels.

Currently about a third of the roughly $700 million in annual U.S. aid to Colombia funds economic and social development programs.

Although production is on the rise in Colombia, the U.N. said it declined in Peru and Bolivia.

Coca production in Bolivia fell by 8 percent last year, according to the U.N. The United States, however, is concerned Bolivia's leftist, coca-growing President Evo Morales _ who took office in January _ could relax his country's drug-fighting efforts.

In Peru, the world's second-largest cocaine producer, the coca crop declined by 4 percent.

The apparent declines differ widely from findings by the United States, based more heavily on satellite imagery, which estimated coca plantings grew by 38 percent in Peru and nearly 10 percent in Bolivia last year.

For anti-drug efforts to be successful, Costa said the United States and Europe must curb cocaine consumption and support alternative crop development programs in South America.

"Our aid efforts need to be multiplied at least tenfold in order to reach all impoverished farmers who need support," he said in a statement.

Colombia Sees Rise In Coca Growth (BBC)

BBC, June 20, 2006

The US has backed an aggressive anti-coca drive Coca production in Colombia grew by 8% in 2005 - the first rise in five years, the UN Office of Drugs and Crime says.

The production of coca, the raw material for cocaine, reached 86,000 hectares last year, UNODC found.

Despite the rise, it is half of Colombia's cultivation in 2000, which then stood at 163,000 hectares.

Colombia needs more international help to find alternative livelihoods for ex-coca farmers, one of the report's authors, Anja Korenblik, said.

Since 2000, the United States has spent more than $4bn on the fight against drug-trafficking in Colombia.

This has involved the aerial spraying of herbicides to kill the crops, as well as by law enforcement.

But despite such eradication efforts, the area under coca cultivation in Colombia rose by 6,000 hectares between 2004 and 2005, UNODC found.

Beating the cartels

"In Colombia in 2005, we found 86,000 hectares of coca bush, that is an 8% increase on 2004 when we saw 80,000 hectares," Mrs Korenblik told the BBC's Americas Service.

"That's almost half of the cultivation in the year 2000 when it was more than 160,000 hectares so it's really an impressive decline."

But she said the research showed more economic aid was required for poor farmers who grow coca on behalf of the drug cartels.

"What is needed is for the international community to support Colombia in identifying alternative livelihoods for ex-coca farmers," she said.

"This is not happening enough and that's probably why it's difficult for all the Andean countries to sustain their reductions in coca cultivation that they have seen," she added.

Colombia remains the world's largest producer of cocaine, although its share has dropped to 54% from 74% in 2000.

Coca production in Peru and Bolivia fell by 8% and 4% respectively in 2005, UNODC found.

Bridgeport Mayor Admits Using Cocaine (AP)

AP, June 20, 2006

BRIDGEPORT, Conn. Jun 20, 2006 (AP)— Mayor John M. Fabrizi publicly admitted Tuesday that he had abused cocaine while in office and said he wanted to apologize "to all the people of the city."

The admission followed the inadvertent court filing of an FBI document in which an alleged drug dealer claimed an associate had a videotape of the mayor using cocaine.

DOJ_NMG_0036564

In a tearful speech to about 200 city employees in City Council chambers Tuesday, Fabrizi said he had not used drugs in 18 months and had sought help for a drug addiction that he had hoped to handle privately.

"I thought that these were personal, private matters to me and my family, that I could deal with these issues with my family and myself," Fabrizi said. "I now recognize my actions affected many others, and I want to apologize to my family, my friends, and all of the people of the city of Bridgeport for my actions, my past actions."

Fabrizi, a Democrat who took office after former Mayor Joseph Ganim was convicted of corruption in 2003, said he hopes to move forward and continue running Connecticut's largest city.

Mayor Of Scandal-Weary Bridgeport Admits That He Used Cocaine (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

BRIDGEPORT, Conn., — Fighting back tears, John M. Fabrizi, the mayor of Bridgeport, Connecticut's largest city, admitted on Tuesday that he had used cocaine and abused alcohol since he took office in April 2003, but said that it "never, ever affected my job performance" and that he had "put this personal struggle behind me."

His emotional admission followed months of rumors and the disclosure last week of a court document filed by federal prosecutors suggesting that he had used cocaine with a local Democratic official. The news of his problems was the latest black eye for this troubled city, whose last mayor, Joseph P. Ganim, a Democrat, was convicted on bribery, extortion and other corruption charges and is now serving a nine-year federal prison term.

Speaking before a room packed with 200 city employees, residents and reporters Tuesday morning at City Hall, Mr. Fabrizi, 49, expressed the hope that his tenure would not end prematurely.

He also apologized for not having been frank about his failings sooner, and asked the public to permit him to continue serving in a job that he said he loves "heart and soul." A Democrat, he faces re-election next year.

Mr. Fabrizi was the City Council president before becoming mayor when Mr. Ganim resigned, then won election to the office in November 2003. Though he has worked hard to revive his city's downtown, his grip on power began to weaken last week when federal prosecutors filed a document implicating him in a long-running drug investigation that has already resulted in dozens of arrests.

Hours after The Connecticut Post published an article about the document on Friday, United States Attorney Kevin O'Connor asked a judge to seal the document and issued an unusual apology to the mayor for having allowed it to become public. He said Mr. Fabrizi was not a target of the drug investigation.

"I thought that these were personal and private matters to me and my family," said Mr. Fabrizi, choking up as he read his statement, with his wife, Mary, at his side patting his back. "I now recognize my actions affected many others and I want to apologize."

Without going into details, he said that he had sought treatment for his problems and that he had not used drugs since late 2004. He added that he stopped drinking about four months ago. He told The Connecticut Post in an interview on Monday that he initially gave up drinking in 2005 but relapsed during the holidays.

About the time the mayor said he quit using cocaine, federal prosecutors began wiretapping two brothers who have since been charged with running a drug-trafficking organization. One of them, Juan Marrero, who is awaiting trial, told federal agents after his arrest last year that he was asked by Shawn Fardy, then a member of the Democratic Town Committee, for cocaine, because Mr. Fardy told him that Mr. Fabrizi was coming over and "needed a hit." Mr. Fardy has been indicted in the case and last week pleaded not guilty.

Dr. Jay Berkowitz, a psychiatrist who is a friend of the mayor, said that in or around October 2004, he began noticing some "erratic behavior" by the mayor. In particular, he said in an interview, the mayor was unusually loud and boisterous one night at a restaurant.

"He was handling the stress of the job beautifully, but with the job, sometimes you have a lot of social functions and that's where he thought he needed help," said Dr. Berkowitz, who spoke with the mayor's permission.

He said that the mayor initially rebuffed him when he asked if Mr. Fabrizi had a problem that required help, but that Mr. Fabrizi came to him last spring or summer seeking help for substance abuse.

Dr. Berkowitz said he helped get the mayor into an outpatient treatment program and believed Mr. Fabrizi was doing well. He also said he understood that the mayor had been taking Antabuse, a medication that makes a person sick if alcohol is imbibed.

Mr. Fabrizi, a former schoolteacher, said in his remarks that his problems never affected his ability to govern. "The tremendous progress Bridgeport has made over the past three years is a testament to that," he said. "Folks, my record speaks for itself."

He vowed to work hard to "regain the respect and support of the people of the city" and also to make the public "aware that even people in a position like my own can become a victim of drugs or alcohol."

The mayor also added that he was "appalled by some of my recent statements and the lengths to which I was willing to go to keep this issue private. Having put this painful episode behind me well over a year ago, I hope you can all understand why I foolishly wanted to distance myself from this nightmare."

He received a standing ovation when he entered the room and applause as he read his statement. He left without taking questions. Afterward, many spectators said they would continue to support him.

"I think we can all relate to it," said Jill Bruno, director of veterans affairs for the city. "I have some family members with addiction problems, and it hit home. I don't know too many mayors who stand up in front of a crowd and cry and pour their heart out to the city."

Others interviewed in Bridgeport on Tuesday were generally less sympathetic. Several mentioned the harsh penalties that acquaintances had faced when they were caught up in drug problems. They questioned whether the mayor would have come forward if he had not been implicated in the investigation.

Maria Yaylagul, 20, a University of Connecticut student who is taking a summer course at Housatonic Community College in downtown Bridgeport, said, "It was kind of unfair that celebrities and people in power get a get-out-of-jail-free card" when they break the law, but not average citizens. "I don't think it should even be an option for him to run again, a known drug addict."

Her classmate, David Jackson, 21, said he agreed that the mayor ought to be a role model. "Don't they have drug tests for the mayor?" he asked.

Several current and former politicians also said they thought the mayor ought to resign for the good of the city.

"We can't be the town that has the mayor with the drug problem," said Rick Torres, the Republican who lost to Mr. Fabrizi in 2003. "That's for him to deal with, not for us."

Gary Rose, the chairman of the department of government and politics at Sacred Heart University, said he expected the mayor to survive since Bridgeport's residents forgive "practically all forms of misbehavior on the part of their mayors."

Still, he said, "I think the mayor really has to decide sooner rather than later as to whether he has the moral leadership for a city that is really starving for ethical political figures."

Mayor Admits Cocaine Use In Speech To City Employees (CP)

Connecticut Post, June 20, 2006

BRIDGEPORT — Amid a few boos and much stronger applause, Mayor John M. Fabrizi on Tuesday stood before more than 200 city employees and residents and admitted he used cocaine in the past.

"I am sorry if I have, in any way, hurt the dignity of this office. I will do everything I can to regain the respect and support of the people of this city," Fabrizi said during an emotional address in which he choked up several times.

Referring specifically to his past drug use, Fabrizi said flatly, "Over the course of a number of years I abused alcohol and used cocaine occasionally."

Admitting he used cocaine during his time in office as both City Council president and later as mayor, he said he has not used drugs in 18 months.

Tears running down his cheeks, Fabrizi said he sought help for a drug addiction and had hoped that he could handle it privately.

Monday with the Connecticut Post editorial board, Fabrizi said he quit using cocaine at the end of 2004, and stopped drinking this year. He was elected in the fall of 2003.

The admission followed the release of FBI documents in which an alleged drug dealer claimed an associate had a videotape of the mayor using cocaine. Fabrizi, a Democrat who took office after Joseph Ganim was convicted of corruption in 2003, said he hopes to move forward and continue running Connecticut's largest city.

Prosecutors Want Councilman With Cocaine Record Removed (AP)

AP, June 20, 2006

GALVESTON, Texas - Galveston County prosecutors have filed a petition to remove a recently elected city council member who was convicted in 2000 on felony cocaine charges.

State election law usually prevents someone who has been convicted of a felony from running for or being elected to office.

Marc Hoskins, 28, was elected in May and had disclosed his past to the city attorney before the election. He had also mentioned his conviction in a guest newspaper column.

DOJ_NMG_0036566

Galveston County District Attorney Kurt Sistrunk filed a five-page petition Monday citing the Texas Election Code, which states that a candidate must not have been convicted of a felony "from which the person has not been pardoned or otherwise released from the resulting disabilities."

Hoskins' attorney, state Rep. Harold Dutton, D-Houston, said he will file a response later this week. Dutton said his client has been "released from the resulting disabilities" after serving six months of a two-year sentence in federal prison.

Hoskins was released under three years' supervision.

"I think the law is probably going to be on Marc's side," Dutton said.

Hoskins was arrested in 1999 while he we was a senior at Lamar University. He pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to with intent to deliver cocaine, according to court records.

Galveston DA Petitions For Councilman's Removal (HC)

Houston Chronicle, June 20, 2006

Election code bars a convicted felon from office

GALVESTON - District Attorney Kurt Sistrunk filed a petition Monday asking that Councilman Marc Hoskins, who disclosed before the May election he was a convicted felon, be removed from office.

Sistrunk has determined that Hoskins, 28, should be barred from holding an elected office because of his 2000 federal cocaine distribution conspiracy conviction.

Hoskins, who was in attendance at a Juneteenth breakfast Monday morning representing the City Council, was served with papers Monday afternoon, Sistrunk said. He has until July 10 to respond to the five-page petition. A status conference before state District Judge David Garner is scheduled for Sept. 21.

Hoskins was not at his home Monday evening and could not be reached for comment. Hoskins' attorney, state Rep. Harold Dutton, D-Houston, also could not be reached.

In his petition, Sistrunk cites the Texas Election Code, which states that "a person must have not been fully convicted of a felony from which the person has not been pardoned or otherwise released from the resulting disabilities."

Sistrunk said Hoskins "was not eligible to be a candidate for nor was he eligible to be elected" as a Galveston council member. As such, Sistrunk said, "he unlawfully holds and executes the office of Councilmember of District 2, City of Galveston, Texas."

Sistrunk was asked to look into Hoskins' eligibility after receiving a letter from Galveston City Attorney Susie Green.

Hoskins, a consultant and lobbyist, has not tried to keep his conviction a secret, having mentioned his legal woes in a guest column before the election. He even told Green about his criminal past and told her that lawyers had advised him he was eligible to run.

Hoskins was arrested in August 1999, when he was a senior at Lamar University in Beaumont, and pleaded guilty in federal court to one count of conspiracy with intent to distribute cocaine, according to court records.

Hoskins was sentenced to two years but served only six months in a federal prison in Pennsylvania before being released under three years' supervision.

Officials Seek To Remove Galveston City Council Member (KHOU)

By Kelly Hawes

KHOU-TV, June 20, 2006

GALVESTON — The district attorney filed a petition Monday seeking to remove City Councilman Marc Hoskins from office.

The petition, filed in 10th District Court, contends that Hoskins was ineligible to seek office because of a drug-dealing conviction six years ago in federal court.

Hoskins will have until July 10 to file a legal response. A status conference has been scheduled for 10 a.m. Sept. 21.

During a City Council meeting last week, Hoskins said he did not know how the process would work out.

“We live in a country where we have fair and free elections,” he said. “I’m here because I was elected to be here, and while I’m here, I will continue to work for you, the residents of District 2.”

Hoskins won support during the weekend from the host of a Houston public radio show aimed at prisoners and their families. Ray Hill, host of “The Prison Show” on radio station KPFT, said the Citizenship Restoration Act of 1985 restored all rights of citizenship to convicted felons once they had completed their sentences.

“All of these issues have been vetted for 20 years,” he said.

Hill, who became the first Texas felon to register to vote after passage of the law, has since run for office seven times. He twice sought a justice of the peace position and five times ran for a seat on the Houston City Council.

DOJ_NMG_0036567

Hill acknowledged that he had never won election and thus hadn't held office, but he insisted that the legislative intent of the measure was clear.

"We talked about that while having hearings on passage of the bill in 1985," he said.

District Attorney Kurt Sistrunk said he was unaware of the law cited by Hill.

"We'll check its application," he said.

Sistrunk later said a quick examination indicated that the law applied only to voting rights.

"I believe that same argument was previously presented to the city, and the restoration of voting rights alone is not a complete removal of the disabilities imposed as a result of a conviction," he said.

Di Trapano's Bond Denied (CHASGAZ)

By Tom Searls, Staff writer

Charleston Gazette, June 21, 2006

Lawyer is a threat and violated bond conditions, judge says

Evidence shows Charleston lawyer Dante di Trapano could be a danger to the community and regularly violates bond conditions, a federal judge ruled Tuesday in denying di Trapano's bond request.

U.S. Magistrate Mary Stanley said di Trapano, 43, had "demonstrated time and time again that he is not willing to comply" with bond conditions and has "shown total disrespect for the law" in an order denying him bond.

Di Trapano was indicted last week on single counts of being a drug addict in possession of firearms and for allegedly lying on a federal form by stating he was not addicted to drugs when he purchased a gun in February.

- advertisement -

Federal agents found eight guns inside di Trapano's South Hills residence in April. Charleston Police Detective Tim Palmer, who is working with federal agents, testified that while the guns were loaded, all were in a gun safe or locked up. Di Trapano was not home at the time of the search.

Palmer said agents also found possible drugs in the 1340 Johnson Road house. "It was some suspected cocaine, crack cocaine as well," he said.

Some other substances were also located in the dwelling, he said, but authorities were waiting to learn from a laboratory what those substances are. Di Trapano has not been charged for those items.

Di Trapano's attorney, Michael Del Giudice, pointed out that none of the prosecutors' witnesses testified di Trapano had been violent, and said his client should be released.

Stanley disagreed and set an Aug. 23 trial date for di Trapano before Chief U.S. District Judge David Faber. Di Trapano is expected to remain in jail until then.

Following the hearing, di Trapano's wife lashed out at National Football League star Randy Moss, whom di Trapano represented until April. Moss, a Rand native and former Marshall University star, plays for the Oakland Raiders and is set to open a smoothie business in Charleston this weekend.

"Anyone want a Randy Moss shirt?" Teri di Trapano said to reporters outside the federal courthouse before tossing the black shirt emblazoned with Moss' name into a nearby trash can.

Dante and Teri di Trapano were arrested with three others in a Florida hotel in March and charged with possession with intent to deliver crack cocaine. Stanley noted di Trapano failed to report to the rehabilitation center the court sent him to, instead choosing one of his own.

Stanley said di Trapano was arrested in Georgia just weeks after that on charges of felony cocaine and misdemeanor marijuana possession. He was then arrested in the St. Albans area early June 10 on a charge of driving with a suspended license.

When Palmer arrested him last week for the federal charge, di Trapano was also driving with a suspended license, documents show.

- advertisement -

Del Giudice argued that even if convicted of the charges, di Trapano would only serve a year in jail. He asked Stanley to place his client on home confinement, saying locking him up is "highly severe and unnecessary," and that di Trapano is not a flight risk.

"They have not caught him in any serious charges," he said.

Prosecutors' main evidence showing di Trapano is a danger was based on the testimony of police officers who said di Trapano's father hired an off-duty officer to patrol his law firm to keep his son out. Dante di Trapano has been let go by his former law firm, which is headed by his father, well-known trial lawyer and former state Democratic Party chairman Rudolph DiTrapano.

Charleston Police Sgt. Jason Beckett testified that Rudolph DiTrapano hired an off-duty officer. "He was concerned with his son, Dante di Trapano, possibly coming to the law firm and damaging equipment and for the protection of employees," Beckett testified.

Under cross-examination, Beckett admitted he filled out a report on the matter at the request of another officer working with federal agents, something not normally done. "It's just the government creating their case," Del Giudice said.

Beckett also said Rudolph DiTrapano did not sign the form requesting the officer. Instead, it was a stamped signature.

Patrolman Raymond Coleman, who only worked three days at the firm, said he saw Dante di Trapano pass by one time, but that he did not attempt to enter the law firm. Coleman testified he was not told of any danger to employees.

Del Giudice noted di Trapano is the only means of support for his wife and four children, two of whom are planning to go to college this fall.

"We have nothing to live on except my savings," Teri di Trapano said outside the courthouse.

Teri di Trapano said her father-in-law is holding her husband's money in escrow. "They promised him they would take care of his family," she said, saying she fears losing all the family's belongings.

Man Accused Of Clinic Bomb Plot Indicted (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, June 21, 2006

(AP) - BALTIMORE-A Maryland man accused of plotting to attack an abortion clinic with a pipe bomb and handgun was indicted Monday on weapons and explosives charges, the U.S. attorney's office said.

A federal grand jury indicted Robert Weiler, 25, on charges of possessing and making an unregistered destructive device, illegally possessing a firearm, and possessing a stolen firearm.

Weiler called the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives on June 8 from a western Maryland highway rest stop to confess to the plan, according to court documents. He told authorities he had built a pipe bomb, stolen a handgun from a friend and planned to attack an abortion clinic in suburban Washington.

That morning, the pipe bomb exploded in a house belonging to a friend of Weiler as a bomb technician tried to defuse it. No one was hurt, but the bomb set fire to the house.

Each count carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison. A preliminary hearing is set for Thursday.

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Bill Would Add New Immigration Judges (LAW)

By Jason McLure, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 21, 2006

At DOJ, getting to be an immigration judge can depend more on political contacts than experience.

It's just after 2 p.m. and Immigration Judge Garry Malphrus is looking at a long afternoon of deporting illegal immigrants. He punches a button on a tape recorder and intones: "Respondent was scheduled for a master calendar hearing at 9 a.m. It is now 2:20 p.m." Malphrus notes the immigrant's failure to appear, asks a lone Immigration and Customs Enforcement lawyer if an attempt has been made to contact the government (the inevitable response: "no"), and then formally orders the immigrant's removal from the United States. Stop tape.

The routine continues for the better part of an hour. Next file. Repeat script. Stop tape.

Watching this tedious exercise, it's hard to imagine that being appointed a federal immigration judge would be considered a political plum. But that's how these career civil service jobs are increasingly treated, say immigration lawyers who practice before the courts. Malphrus, a former White House aide and Republican campaign veteran, had never practiced immigration law when he joined the bench last year.

"The Bush administration has realized these are great jobs and maybe [it] shouldn't be left up to the civil service to determine who gets a job," says Charles Kuck, a vice president of the American Immigration Lawyers Association. "I believe that these folks without prior immigration experience tend not to be good judges."

Whether they're great jobs is a matter of opinion. But with the immigration courts under scrutiny by Congress and the attorney general after a series of federal appellate decisions blasting the courts as sloppy and inept, the issue of just who serves in an office with enormous influence over the lives of immigrants has received scant attention. And the practice of appointing judges with no immigration law experience is condemned by lawyers in the field, who say the complexity of immigration laws means judges such as Malphrus do their training on the job.

DOJ_NMG_0036569

Hired in March 2005, Malphrus, 38, is on the front line of America's swamped immigration system. The 200-odd judges in the Justice Department's Executive Office of Immigration Review handle more than 300,000 immigration cases every year, considering matters that range from approving the status of asylum seekers to deporting illegal migrants seeking jobs to signing off on the legal status of those who have married U.S. citizens.

But the process by which the judges are hired is a murky one, often little understood by either immigration lawyers or the judges themselves. Unlike federal district and circuit court judges, who are appointed for life and work for the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, immigration judges are part of the Justice Department's career civil service. As such, the EOIR has a formal application process for immigration judges. Applicants are vetted by the office's chief immigration judge, who conducts interviews and makes formal hiring recommendations.

But according to an immigration-judge hiring policy released by the Justice Department, the attorney general also has the option to pre-empt the formal vetting process and directly hire a judge of his choosing.

This two-track hiring method helps explain why the nation's immigration bench is stocked not only with lawyers who have spent years as trial attorneys for ICE or the military's JAG Corps (who enjoy preference in federal hiring) but with a sprinkling of Republican Party activists and campaign veterans such as Malphrus. Among the 19 immigration judges hired since 2004: Francis Cramer, the former campaign treasurer for New Hampshire Sen. Judd Gregg; James Nugent, the former vice chairman of the Louisiana Republican Party; and Chris Brisack, a former Republican Party county chairman from Texas who had served on the state library commission under then-Gov. George W. Bush.

Malphrus' move was cited last month in a report to Congress by the Government Accountability Office on the subject of the movement of political appointees into the government civil service. That phenomenon, known as "burrowing in" to the government bureaucracy, has been an issue for Democratic and Republican administrations alike. Ultimately, the GAO reported that "it could not be determined whether appropriate authorities and proper procedures were followed" in Malphrus' hiring.

And while a courtroom on the 13th floor of a nondescript office building in Arlington, Va. — where Malphrus presides — may seem to be a million miles from the corridors of power across the Potomac River, the job isn't without its perks. When Malphrus was hired, his salary nearly doubled to $113,904. And unlike his former colleagues at the White House, as a career civil service employee, Malphrus won't be out of work should Republicans lose the White House in 2008.

"It's not a glamorous job," says Joseph Vail, himself a former immigration judge who now works at a legal aid clinic in Houston. "You don't have a whole lot of power . . . but the salary and benefits are good, plus you get to call yourself a judge."

Addressed by a reporter in court, Malphrus said he would be happy to be interviewed for this article with the approval of his Justice Department superiors. But that interview request was denied by Justice's press office in Washington. The Justice Department did not return calls for comment for this article.

Political activism

Malphrus' most public political episode came during the 2000 Florida presidential election recount. He was then a Republican aide to the Senate Judiciary Committee and turned up at the Miami-Dade Elections Department with a group of well-dressed Republican protesters.

In what news reports later dubbed the "Brooks Brothers riot," the protesters, chanting "Stop the fraud," pounded on the windows and doors of the municipal building and demanded that the election board in the heavily Democratic county end its manual recount of thousands of ballots that a scanning machine had determined contained no vote for president. Shortly afterward, in a decision pivotal to the outcome of the election, the board voted unanimously to stop the recount. Months later, Malphrus received a White House appointment to the Domestic Policy Council, where he served for three years.

Last week, Malphrus crossed paths with a former political activist of a different stripe. Seated before him on June 15 was Andrei Brezineu, a soft-spoken young Belarussian dressed in jeans and white high-tops who, according to his lawyer, fled the Eastern European country in 2003 after suffering a series of threats, beatings, and arrests for distributing pamphlets for a political party opposed to President Alexander Lukashenko. Lukashenko's regime has been dubbed the "last dictatorship in Europe" by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, and this winter, Lukashenko was re-elected with 86 percent of the vote in an election observers said was marred by fraud and intimidation. "Belarus is known to be a country where political dissent and human rights are not tolerated," Brezineu's lawyer told Malphrus.

The government trial attorney in the case opposed Brezineu's application for political asylum, questioning whether he would face persecution if he was returned to Belarus and pointing out that Brezineu appeared to have limited knowledge of recent political events in his home country and no documentation of his arrests. Malphrus questioned Brezineu's defense attorney as well, asking whether a series of harassing incidents could rise to the level of political persecution needed to grant Brezineu asylum. When neither Malphrus nor Brezineu's attorney could recall a precedent for this from immigration case law, the judge ordered that the hearing be continued for a month.

The decision reflected a cautious approach to deciding asylum cases that has won Malphrus praise from immigration attorneys. That approach, say a number of lawyers who've practiced before him, is fortunate given the judge's limited knowledge of the country's specialized and oft-changing immigration laws.

"I like Garry Malphrus," says one immigration lawyer in Cleveland who practices before the judge and therefore requested anonymity. "But he has no immigration experience whatsoever, and that comes across."

A native of Jasper County, in a historically Democratic pocket of South Carolina's Low Country, Malphrus became active in Republican politics more than two decades ago. After graduating from the University of South Carolina Law School in 1993, Malphrus spent the next four years clerking for a series of state and federal judges. In 1997 he was hired as an aide to then-Sen. Strom Thurmond (R) and joined the staff of the Senate Judiciary Committee, where he worked on a range of policy issues, including crime, immigration, bankruptcy, and tort reform — issues he would confront later as a White House aide, according to former Senate colleagues. Studious and soft-spoken, Malphrus was known as a strong conservative.

David Brog, a former Judiciary Committee staffer for moderate Republican Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, recalls being teased by Malphrus at party staff meetings. "This is a Republican meeting," Brog recalls Malphrus as saying. "What are you doing here?"

Those who've worked with Malphrus say his experience as a law clerk and policy aide makes him well qualified to sit on the immigration court. "The idea that it was politics and not competence is ludicrous," Brog says of Malphrus' appointment.

Malphrus' departure from the White House for the relative backwater of the Arlington Immigration Court may seem like a step down for an ambitious, young, conservative lawyer. After all, a lawyer with Malphrus' connections could almost certainly have been richly rewarded on K Street. But William O'Neil, a South Carolina trial lawyer and law school classmate of Malphrus', says it's just one more career step for a friend he's always thought was bound for a judgeship in state or federal court.

"He's well connected," he says of Malphrus. "I think he's just working his way up the totem pole. I don't think he's going to be an immigration judge for the rest of his life."

Judicial jobs ahead

Malphrus' entrance to the bench comes at a time of flux for the immigration courts. In an opinion highly critical of the immigration courts and the Board of Immigration Appeals late last year, Judge Richard Posner of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit wrote that "the adjudication of these cases at the administrative level has fallen below the minimum standards of legal justice." Posner's opinion cited a dozen other recent appellate opinions from four circuits that all offered harsh words for the conduct and reasoning of the immigration judiciary.

Additionally, the immigration reform bill that has passed the Senate contains a number of measures aimed at improving the quality of the immigration courts. One provision would increase the number of members on the Board of Immigration Appeals, allowing for closer review of immigration judicial decisions before they make it to the federal appeals courts. The Senate bill would also add at least 20 new immigration judges. Should the House pass those provisions, Malphrus may well be joined by additional political hires who prefer an immigration judge's black robes to a political job in an administration approaching lame-duck status.

"It's usually a pretty secure job," says David Martin, a law professor at the University of Virginia. "If you're not quite in the category to merit an appointment to the federal bench, an immigration-judge job might satisfy some of those instincts. Immigration judges work hard, but they don't have to bill 2,100 hours [a year] or have clients calling them up on the weekend."

Pa. City Poised For Immigration Crackdown (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Rubinkam, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 21, 2006

(AP) - HAZLETON, Pa.-With tensions rising and the police department and municipal budget stretched thin, Hazleton is about to embark on one of the toughest crackdowns on illegal immigrants anywhere in the United States.

Last week the mayor of this former coal town introduced, and the City Council tentatively approved, a measure that would revoke the business licenses of companies that employ illegal immigrants; impose $1,000 fines on landlords who rent to illegal immigrants; and make English the official language of the city.

"Illegal immigrants are destroying the city," said Mayor Lou Barletta, a Republican. "I don't want them here, period."

Barletta said he had no choice but to act after two illegal immigrants from the Dominican Republic were charged last month with shooting and killing a 29-year-old man. Other recent incidents involving illegal immigrants have rattled this city 80 miles northwest of Philadelphia, including the arrest of a 14-year-old boy for firing a gun at a playground.

"This is crazy," the mayor said. "People are afraid to walk the streets. There's going to be law and order back in Hazleton, and I'm going to use every tool I possibly can."

DOJ_NMG_0036571

The City Council, which approved the measure in a 4-1 vote, must vote on it twice more before it can become law. The next vote is scheduled for mid-July.

When Barletta took office in 2000, Hispanics represented about 5 percent of the city's population of 23,000. The population has since shot up to 31,000, with Hispanics now representing 30 percent, lured to Hazleton by cheap housing, a lower cost of living and jobs in nearby plants, factories and farms.

City officials do not know how many of the new arrivals are in the United States illegally, but say they are fueling the drug trade, joining gangs and committing other crimes.

Municipal officials around the nation, frustrated at what they perceive as the federal government's inability to stem illegal immigration, have increasingly taken matters into their own hands.

In San Bernardino, Calif., voters will decide whether to adopt a measure nearly identical to the one in Hazleton. An Idaho county filed a racketeering lawsuit against agricultural companies accused of hiring illegal immigrants. In New Hampshire, a pair of police chiefs began arresting illegal immigrants for trespassing.

"They're being forced to pick up the financial tab for all of this nonsense, and they are doing whatever they can to find ways to combat it at the local level," said Susan Tully, national field director of the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which advocates limits on immigration. "This is a fine example of what I'm talking about."

Flavia Jimenez, an immigrant policy analyst at the National Council of La Raza, predicted the Hazleton crackdown would prompt a civil rights lawsuit.

"Landlords are going to shut their doors to anyone who may look or sound Latino," she said. "On the other hand, landlords may attempt to actually determine whether a person is undocumented or not, and make multiple mistakes because of the complexity of immigration law."

Whites in Hazleton seem to overwhelmingly favor the proposed crackdown. Barletta's office has been flooded with hundreds of approving e-mails and phone calls - from as far as California and Florida - and he got a standing ovation when he walked into a Hazleton diner for lunch.

"It's about time," said Francis X. Tucci, 57, who was born and raised in Hazleton and owns a hair salon in the heart of the Hispanic business district. "We were a nice community. You find bad everywhere, I understand that, but we're talking about here and now."

Some Hispanics approve of the measure, saying they are fed up with crime and graffiti. "If I was mayor, I wouldn't let anyone in who had a criminal record," said Rafael Rovira, 69, a naturalized American citizen from the Dominican Republic.

Others view the proposal as unnecessary, saying that most illegal immigrants obey the law and only want to work. They point to the success of Wyoming Street, a colorful thoroughfare where dozens of businesses have opened in the past few years.

Jose Lechuga, 42, came to the United States illegally in 1982, received amnesty in 1986 and now operates a grocery store and restaurant in Hazleton. He said the mayor is "confusing illegal people with criminals."

Immigration Bill Delayed By House (CHIT)

By Frank James

Chicago Tribune, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In a move that could sound the death knell for immigration-reform legislation in Congress this year, House Republican leaders said Tuesday they plan to hold numerous hearings on the issue this summer and only then start talks with the Senate that might lead to a final bill.

The delay raises the likelihood that Congress will end the year without passing major immigration legislation that President Bush has supported. That would be a signal defeat for the president, who has urged Congress to approve comprehensive legislation along the lines of the Senate-passed bill, which included a path to citizenship for many of the estimated 12 million undocumented immigrants already in the U.S. and the creation of a guest-worker program.

Failure to approve final legislation, however, would be an election-year victory for many House Republicans who have fiercely opposed any course that could lead to illegal immigrants gaining citizenship before U.S. borders are secured, a position held by many voters as well.

House Republicans have consistently decried provisions calling for legalization of immigrants as an amnesty, which they find anathema. In addition, they have said the nation's priority should be securing its borders first, especially along the southern perimeter with Mexico, and cracking down on employers who hire illegal immigrants. The House passed enforcement-only legislation in December while the Senate approved its broader bill last month.

"I'm not putting any time line on this thing but I think we need to get this done right," House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) told reporters. "We want to have hearings on this bill. I asked the various [House committee] chairmen to go out and have hearings so we understand what the American people are saying."

The call for hearings was part of a strategy by House Republicans to raise public awareness of various elements in the Senate bill they find objectionable, they said.

One provision of the Senate bill would allow illegal immigrants to collect Social Security for the years when they lacked authorization to work, even when they illegally used Social Security numbers that belonged to U.S. citizens or legal residents in order to obtain jobs.

House critics of the Senate bill also complain it would place unreasonable limits on the information immigration officials could use to decide whether to grant an applicant legal status.

"Once [voters] find out some of things that are in this bill they will be outraged about it," said one House Republican aide who requested anonymity because he wanted to speak more frankly. "And that's the problem. If we just went into a conference [with the Senate] and then passed a bill and sent it to the president and [voters] didn't know all these things were in there, we'd be in a lot of trouble before an election."

Congressional supporters of the Senate's immigration legislation accused House Republicans and some in the Senate of acting in bad faith. "The Republican House wants to defeat the immigration bill," said Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.,) leader of the Senate's Democrats.

"It's obvious that the Republicans in the Senate don't want an immigration bill," Reid said. "…This is a stall.… If there were ever a time for the president to get engaged in this, it would be now. Why can't he, with this power that he has over this Republican-dominated Congress, tell them, 'I want to go to conference on this'?"

Despite the delay in any start of House-Senate negotiations over the legislation, White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said, "The president is undeterred. We are committed and we have been working very hard with members [of Congress] to see if we can reach consensus on an issue the American people have said they want action on."

Hastert press secretary Ron Bonjean said as many as eight committees will holding hearings, including the House Judiciary, Ways and Means and Homeland Security panels. Hearings would be held in July and August with negotiations between the House and Senate on a final measure slated for September.

"If this legislation is ready to pass in September, then we'll pass it," Hastert said. "But we're not going to pass it before it's ready."

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) said Tuesday there was no reason to hold additional hearings on the immigration bill. The decision by House Republians was "the wrong way to go," he said, and seemed to simply delay resolving differences between House and Senate versions of the legislation.

"We have had 2 1/2 years of hearings. We know what the problem is," Kennedy said.

Supporters of a more lenient approach towards illegal immigrants suggested that the House leadership hoped that by pushing negotiations with the Senate closer to the Nov. 7 midterm congressional elections, the likelihood of passing a bill would diminish.

Angela Kelly, deputy director of the National Immigration Forum, a Washington-based organization that favors the Senate bill, said, "I think…the Republican leadership's game is to just run out the clock. I think that they're really uncomfortable, they're squirming with the split in their party over this. And the fact that the stars have aligned so that the president and the Senate are in the same place on this is just something they don't want to contend with" in an election year.

Steven Camarota of the Washington-based Center for Immigration Studies, which opposes the Senate bill, raised an issue critics have aired as another reason why immigration reform might be doomed, at least for this year.

The Senate bill has some revenue-raising provisions that would require illegal workers to pay back taxes. But the Constitution requires revenue-raising measures to originate in the House.

That could force the Senate to go back and strip out those provisions and that might require more debate and votes in a Senate that already had great difficulty producing its legislation.

"The chance that they have an appetite for debate and votes again on this is not that great," he said. "So that technicality actually matters."

Leaders: Broad Immigration Bill Unlikely (AP-Y2)

By David Espo

AP2, June 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036573

In a defeat for President Bush, Republican congressional leaders said Tuesday that broad immigration legislation is all but doomed for the year, a victim of election-year concerns in the House and conservatives' implacable opposition to citizenship for millions of illegal immigrants.

"Our number one priority is to secure the border, and right now I haven't heard a lot of pressure to have a path to citizenship," said Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., announcing plans for an unusual series of hearings around the nation to begin in August on Senate-passed immigration legislation.

"I think it is easy to say the first priority of the House is to secure the borders," added Rep. Roy Blunt (news, bio, voting record), the GOP whip.

In deference to the president, neither Hastert nor any other Republican official in either house said publicly that the president's ambitious plan — including a guest worker program as well as an opportunity for citizenship for many illegal immigrants — was dead for the year.

But several Republicans in both houses, speaking on condition of anonymity, were less guarded.

"There will be no path to citizenship," said one lawmaker who attended a strategy session in Hastert's office.

Some officials added that Republicans have begun discussing a pre-election strategy for seizing the political high ground on an issue that so far has served to highlight divisions within the party. Among the possibilities, these officials said, are holding votes in the House or Senate this fall on additional measures to secure the borders, or on legislation that would prevent illegal immigrants from receiving Social Security payments or other government benefits.

"The discussion is how to put the Democrats in a box without attacking the president," said one aide, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Additionally, GOP aides said Rep. Tom Reynolds, chairman of the House campaign committee, has recently been using polling data to persuade fellow members of the leadership that the public would respond poorly to some provisions in the Senate-passed bill.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said after Hastert's announcement of hearings, "The president is undeterred. We are committed and we have been working very hard with members (of Congress) to see if we can reach consensus on an issue the American people have said they want action on."

In the Senate, Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., told reporters he welcomed hearings. "As much examination of the House bill and Senate bill as possible is good," he said.

Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., a principal author of the Senate-passed measure, offered to testify at House hearings. Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record) of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said, "I'm hopeful" of a compromise before the elections.

Hastert announced no schedule for the completion of hearings. He and other members of the leadership sidestepped numerous times when asked whether a House-Senate compromise along the lines of what Bush has sought could come to a vote by year's end. "I am not putting any timetable on this thing, but I think we need to get this thing done right," the speaker told reporters.

The Republican-controlled House passed border security legislation last year, largely along party lines. By contrast, the Senate approved a bipartisan bill calling for tougher border enforcement; penalties against employers who hire illegal immigrants, a new guest worker program and a shot at citizenship for most of the estimated 12 million immigrants in the country illegally.

The measure won the support of only 23 of the Senate's 55 Republicans. Frist, a likely presidential contender for 2008, is under pressure from conservatives not to agree to a compromise bill they oppose. Democrats, on the other hand, are insisting on assurances that any final bill will remain bipartisan.

Hastert told reporters he had conveyed his views on immigration privately to Bush in recent days, and other officials said opinions among House Republicans hardened when Republican Rep. Brian Bilbray won a special election this month in the San Diego area. Bilbray campaigned for tougher immigration measures than Bush favors, and equated the president's approach to amnesty.

Several Republican officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Hastert and the president had expressed differing views at one meeting about the importance of immigration in Bilbray's victory. These officials said Hastert assigned it greater weight than the president. The Republican National Committee ran a 72-hour program in the campaign's final days that many Republicans credit with maximizing the vote for the winner.

Additionally, the RNC conducted a postelection poll of the San Diego-area district that suggests voters take a dim view of citizenship for illegal immigrants.

The poll found that when people were asked if they prefer a comprehensive bill to one that emphasizes border security and imposing criminal penalties on individuals already in the country illegally, the comprehensive approach was favored, 45-32. But when asked if they favor a comprehensive approach or a security-first bill that "under no circumstances" allows for citizenship, 43 percent said they prefer focusing on the border, and 33 percent picked overall reform.

Hastert Doubts Alien Bill In 2006 (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

House leaders cast doubt yesterday on the possibility of passing immigration reform legislation this year and said, in an unusual move, that they will hold hearings across the country to gauge voter concern.

"I'm not putting any timeline ... but I think we need to get this thing done right," House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, told reporters yesterday after meeting with the chairmen of all the committees that oversee immigration-related legislation.

Aides in both the House and Senate said yesterday the developments mean immigration legislation is essentially dead for the year. Pushing something through before the November elections would be too politically unpredictable, they said, and there would be no incentive to do it between the election and year's end.

Asked yesterday if it was realistic to think Congress could still pass immigration legislation before the elections, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio said: "Maybe."

Immigration legislation has been stalled for nearly a month because of deep opposition by House Republicans to the Senate's proposal, which provides a path to citizenship for most of the estimated 12 million illegal aliens in the U.S. The House last year approved a bill to secure the border without dealing with the current illegal alien population or the "guest-worker" program wanted by President Bush.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, who voted for the Senate bill, said yesterday he "strongly supports" Mr. Hastert's decision to delay legislation for additional hearings.

While the issue of immigration divides Republicans, the position that Democrats are fairly unified behind -- granting citizenship rights to illegal aliens -- is highly unpopular among voters, polls show.

"We're ready to go on a comprehensive immigration reform bill, one that deals with security, one that deals with temporary guest-worker program, one, of course, that deals with a pathway to citizenship," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, who accused House Republicans of stalling the legislation because they don't like the Senate bill.

House Republicans went to great efforts yesterday to suggest their differences are not with the Senate, but with Democrats.

Though 17 Republicans supported the Senate's "amnesty" bill, House Republicans are referring to it as the "Kennedy bill." Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, wrote much of the language in the bill that passed the Senate but the slightly modified compromise version that passed was sponsored by two Republicans, Sens. Mel Martinez of Florida and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska.

Once the Senate "amnesty" bill is securely yoked to Democrats, House Republicans will take the issue on the road in the months leading up to the election.

"This is an issue that is on the minds of the American people," Mr. Boehner said. "I think that we clearly want to solve this problem but the House bill is very different than the Senate bill."

But Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds, New York Republican, downplayed the impact immigration will have on congressional races.

"It all depends on every district," he said. "The Number One issue in my district is jobs and taxes."

The "field hearings" will be held across the country mainly during the August recess.

Among the sharpest criticisms of the Senate bill are that it grants Social Security benefits to illegals for work they performed here illegally, it requires illegals to pay just three of five years in back taxes, and it could lead to 100 million new legal immigrants during the next 20 years. Mr. Boehner also noted that the Senate bill would allow illegals to get in-state tuition at colleges and universities where they illegally reside.

While Mr. Hastert gave no indication yesterday that he would try pressing forward with the issue this year, he declined to rule out the possibility.

"We're not going to pass it before it's ready," he said.

House Plans National Hearings Before Changes To Immigration (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036575

WASHINGTON, June 20 — In a decision that puts an overhaul of immigration laws in serious doubt, House Republican leaders said Tuesday that they would hold summer hearings around the nation on the politically volatile subject before trying to compromise with the Senate on a chief domestic priority of President Bush.

"We are going to listen to the American people, and we are going to get a bill that is right," said Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, who said he had informed Mr. Bush of the plan.

The unusual decision to set a new round of hearings on legislation already passed by the House and the Senate places a serious roadblock in the way of Mr. Bush's drive for major changes in immigration policy.

The timing means that formal Congressional negotiations will not begin until September, just as Congressional campaigns are entering their crucial final weeks, when lawmakers typically shy away from difficult issues.

"I don't know how likely that is," Representative Roy Blunt of Missouri, the House Republican whip, said about reaching an agreement before November.

Mr. Blunt suggested that final consideration might have to wait for a lame-duck session after the election. "We clearly are going to be here later in the year," he said.

But advancing significant legislation in lame-duck sessions has proved difficult. If Congress does not act this year, the House and the Senate will have to begin anew in 2007 should lawmakers want to pursue immigration changes.

A White House spokeswoman said Mr. Bush would press for legislation. "The president is undeterred in his efforts to pass a comprehensive immigration reform bill," said the spokeswoman, Dana Perino, who said the White House was "committed to working with members to see if we can reach a consensus on a bill that will help solve our nation's immigration problems."

The leadership decision reflected the deep resistance among House Republicans to the bipartisan approach approved in May by the Senate and generally endorsed by Mr. Bush. That bill combined new border enforcement with a program for temporary guest workers and the ability of illegal immigrants to qualify for citizenship by meeting a series of requirements.

House Republicans passed a party-line bill late last year that focused solely on border enforcement, and they said a majority of the public backed their approach. Many House Republicans consider the Senate bill amnesty for those who have entered the country illegally.

"Our No. 1 priority is to secure the border," Mr. Hastert said, "and right now I haven't heard a lot of pressure to have a path to citizenship."

In a swipe at the Senate version, Representative Deborah Pryce of Ohio, a senior member of the Republican leadership, labeled the legislation the "Kennedy bill" — a dismissive reference to Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, who helped write the measure in cooperation with Republicans including Senators Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and John McCain of Arizona.

Those lawmakers held out hope on Tuesday that a final bill could be completed this year and said they accepted the House position that more scrutiny of the issue was required. "I respect their views," Mr. McCain said, "and I hope that we can still continue discussions, and hopefully we can reach an agreement."

Another Republican proponent, Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, warned that voters might punish Republicans if they were unable to come up with a solution to such a pressing national problem.

"The question is, Is it better to solve the issue before the election, or is it better to make people mad and do nothing?" Mr. Graham said. "I think it is hard to go to the electorate when you have the White House, the Senate and the House and say that you cannot at least go through the effort of trying to get a bill. That would to me be a sign of inability to govern."

Democrats were highly critical of House Republicans, with Mr. Kennedy accusing them of a "cynical effort to delay or kill a comprehensive immigration bill."

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said Republicans were stalling, and he called on Mr. Bush to prod members of his party. "He has complete domination over this Republican Congress," Mr. Reid said. "Let him tell us how much he really wants a bill."

The focus of the summer hearings and the schedule were uncertain Tuesday as Republicans suggested that they would be used both to explore the content of the Senate bill and to survey public opinion on the issue. But it was clear House Republicans intended to use the forums to try to expose what they saw as failings in the Senate bill and to build public opposition to that approach.

"The House bill is very different than the Senate bill, and I think we want to have a clear understanding of what is in that bill," said Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the House majority leader.

The hearings could also help House Republicans rally conservative supporters in advance of the election, particularly given a recent special election in Southern California in which immigration emerged as a dominant issue. But Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, the chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, said Tuesday that the topic's power varied from district to district.

"It is not, in my view, a situation that has the same resonance in each district," Mr. Reynolds said.

Official Opposes Border Wall

TUCSON, June 20 (AP) —The new commissioner of Customs and Border Protection said Tuesday that he did not favor building a huge wall along the Mexican border.

"I don't support, I don't believe the administration supports a wall," the commissioner, W. Ralph Basham, said. "It doesn't make sense; it's not practical."

Fencing, including so-called smart fencing with sensors, vehicle barriers and lighting, will be part of the infrastructure improvements, Mr. Basham said. But a layered approach combining technology and air operations will be necessary, he said.

Mr. Basham, only two weeks on the job, is touring the Southwest border region to look at the challenges his agency is facing as National Guard troops arrive to begin assisting its efforts.

House Republican Leaders Apply Brakes On Immigration Bill (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Ignoring President Bush's call for speedy enactment of a new immigration bill, House Republican leaders said Tuesday that they'll hold more hearings this summer instead of working out a compromise with the Senate.

Both chambers have passed bills. The House's version emphasizes border security. House leaders object to a provision in the Senate bill that would create a path to citizenship for many illegal immigrants. “Our No. 1 priority is to secure the border, and right now I haven't heard a lot of pressure to have a path to citizenship,” House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., told the Associated Press.

Hastert's decision, which jeopardizes final action on a bill this year, came as Bush was traveling to Europe for a summit with leaders there. White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino said the president remains “undeterred in his effort to pass an immigration reform bill.” Other Republicans are less optimistic about chances that legislation will pass before Congress adjourns for the fall elections.

“It's going to be difficult,” said Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan. House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, agreed. Asked whether he thought immigration legislation would become law this year, he said, “Maybe.”

Normally, the next step in the legislative process is for a House-Senate conference committee to reconcile differences between the bills. That won't happen until September at the earliest, according to Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean. “Before the speaker will appoint conferees, he wants to get to the bottom of the Senate Kennedy bill,” Bonjean said.

Bonjean's characterization of the Senate bill, identifying it with Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, an icon of Democratic liberalism, reflects the deep divisions in the Republican Party over immigration. In fact, the Senate bill was co-sponsored by a number of prominent Republicans, including Sens. John McCain of Arizona, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Brownback.

Brownback expressed dismay at the news that Hastert will not begin negotiations with the Senate until the fall. “I am OK with hearings, but don't stall the process,” he said. “This is a bill that is going to need a lot of conference time.”

Bush has been urging Congress to move quickly on immigration. “I don't think this issue can wait,” he said in Nebraska this month. “It needs to be addressed now.”

He has endorsed the basic outline of the Senate bill, including plans to allow immigrants who have lived in the country illegally since at least 2004 to apply for citizenship. “To me that is a humane, decent way of addressing a very difficult problem,” he said at his Nebraska appearance.

Many House Republicans feel differently. House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., has said giving illegal immigrants citizenship amounts to amnesty for lawbreakers.

Further complicating the outlook for the immigration bill: a special election for a Southern California congressional seat that Republican Brian Bilbray won with a campaign that emphasized his opposition to illegal immigration. Angelo Amador, director of immigration policy for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which supports the Senate bill, says the Bilbray election may have given Republicans cold feet about striking a deal on immigration: “They're going back and forth trying to decide what's best for them.”

Kennedy called Hastert's decision a “cynical delay tactic.”

Immigration Bill May Be Delayed By Public Hearings (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- House Republicans will hold public immigration hearings around the country in August, a move that clouds the prospects for Congress to complete overhaul legislation before the November elections.

DOJ_NMG_0036577

The decision effectively throws the issue, on which both the Senate and House have voted, back to the debate stage rather than advancing it with intensive negotiations for the two chambers to try to bridge their vast differences. It also reduces the chance that a compromise will be reached this fall, when campaigning for re-election will become the focal point for many lawmakers.

House leaders said they want more public input on immigration. They also plan to use the hearings as a platform to highlight what they say are the most objectionable policies in the Senate bill, which they have taken to calling the "Kennedy bill" despite substantial support from Republican senators. For example, House members will discuss the Social Security benefits that illegal immigrants would be able to collect under the Senate plan once they become citizens, a House Republican aide said.

Speaker Dennis Hastert said the House is "not putting any timeline" on completing the immigration bill. "I think we need to get this thing done right."

Dozens of hearings are expected later this summer in Washington and in cities around the country. Some lawmakers said the hearings would bolster their argument that the public wants increased border security and enforcement before Congress moves ahead with a Senate-backed plan to expand guest-worker programs and grant citizenship to millions of illegal immigrants in the U.S.

"I haven't heard a lot of pressure to have a path to citizenship" for illegal immigrants, Mr. Hastert said.

Senate Democrats blasted the House for impeding progress on an issue that is near the top of the public's concerns. "We have had 2½ years of hearings. We know what the problem is," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.). "Holding additional hearings ... is the wrong way to go."

Republican senators said the move was unusual, but not necessarily the end of progress. "It could be helpful," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.), a supporter of the Senate legislation. "It depends on what they want to accomplish. ... The jury's still out."

The Senate bill hasn't yet been sent to the House, because of procedural hurdles -- a fact House leaders said was a reason progress has been stalled. Attempts to get around the procedural problems by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) have been stymied by Democrats and Republican opponents of the immigration bill.

Democrats, however, disputed that they remained an obstacle. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) said he and his colleagues "are ready to go into conference."

GOP Plans Hearings On Issue Of Immigrants (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

In a move that could bury President Bush's high-profile effort to overhaul immigration law until after the midterm elections, House GOP leaders yesterday announced a series of field hearings during the August recess, pushing off final negotiations on a bill until fall at the earliest.

The announcement was the clearest sign yet that House Republicans have largely given up on passing a broad rewrite of the nation's immigration laws this year. They believe that their get-tough approach -- including building a wall along the border with Mexico and deporting millions of illegal immigrants -- is far more popular with voters than the approach backed by Bush and the Senate, which would create a guest-worker program and allow many illegal immigrants to apply for U.S. citizenship.

House GOP leaders said yesterday that several committee chairmen will hold field hearings in congressional districts in the Southwest, the South and other areas where the issue of illegal immigration is especially potent. Those hearings will take place before the start of the formal negotiating process between the House and Senate, which could take months to complete given the complexity of the issue and the competing business, labor and social concerns.

"I'm not putting any timeline on this thing, but I think we need this thing done right," Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said after a House leadership strategy session.

Senate negotiators played down the hearings, noting that informal talks had already started between the House and the Senate. "There's a general recognition that we need a bill," said Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), a key backer of the Senate legislation. "We're going to get together. We're going to sit down and try to work it all out."

Asked whether a deal could be struck with the Senate this fall, in the throes of a difficult reelection season, House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) allowed: "I think that's possible. I don't know how likely it is."

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino sought to put the House announcement in a positive light, saying the field hearings could "possibly provide an opportunity to air out issues" that she conceded are "complex." But she added: "The president is undeterred in his efforts to pass comprehensive immigration reform."

DOJ_NMG_0036578

Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), who is leading the fight against the Senate plan, said: "Odds were long that any so-called 'compromise bill' would get to the president's desk this year. . . . The nail was already put in the coffin of the Senate's amnesty plan. These hearings probably lowered it into the grave."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), one of the main authors of the Senate plan, called the announcement "a cynical delaying tactic."

The House move was widely viewed as a slap at Bush, who is seeking a comprehensive immigration bill along the lines of the one approved by the Senate on May 25, which would tighten border controls, establish a guest-worker program for future immigrants and offer most of the nation's estimated 12 million illegal residents a chance to become citizens. The announcement came shortly after Bush left on a trip to Europe.

House Republicans have long frowned upon the president's approach. In December, they passed a bill that would tighten border controls, clamp down on employers who hire undocumented workers, and declare illegal immigrants and those who assist them to be felons. Their position was solidified this month after Republican Brian Bilbray defeated Democrat Francine Busby by running against Bush's immigration plan in a hard-fought special election to replace imprisoned former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.).

Since then, House leaders have dragged their feet on naming negotiators to a House-Senate conference to reconcile the chambers' two bills. The field hearings, which will be conducted through Labor Day, will be held at the discretion of the chairmen of the Judiciary Committee, the Homeland Security Committee, the Government Reform Committee and any other House committee that can demonstrate tangential jurisdiction over immigration, GOP leaders said.

GOP aides said the topics could include the Senate's decision to allow undocumented workers to keep Social Security benefits earned while they worked in the country illegally; the Senate requirement that illegal workers be required to pay taxes on three of their last five years of income to become eligible to apply for citizenship; and the assertion that the Senate plan could allow as many as 100 million new immigrants into the country over the next 20 years.

"We clearly want to solve this problem," said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio). "But the House bill is very different than the Senate bill, and I think we want to have a clear understanding of what is in that bill."

The field hearings "will be about forming a credible strategy and a credible plan to secure the borders," said Rep. Eric I. Cantor (R-Va.), the House GOP's chief deputy whip. "That's what the issue is. Once we can accomplish that, we can begin to talk about the rest of the equation, the 12 million illegals here, et cetera."

Hastert added: "Right now, I haven't heard a lot of pressure to have a path to citizenship."

Immigration Bill Chances Fading (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, June 21, 2006

Prospects for a comprehensive immigration bill reaching President Bush's desk this year appeared to dim significantly Tuesday after House GOP leaders announced plans for an unusual set of field hearings on the Senate-passed immigration plan.

Though the details are still being crafted, House Republican Members and aides said they expected a series of hearings to be held in July and August by several different House panels — a timetable that would delay any House-Senate agreement on a conference report into at least September.

No Republican in either chamber would say publicly Tuesday that the immigration bill was dead for the year, but nor could anyone explain how or when a deal might be reached this fall given the looming November elections.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said last week that "if people are serious about doing an immigration bill this year, it really needs to be finished before the August recess."

Asked Tuesday whether a bill could still reach Bush's desk this year given the new plans for field hearings, Boehner said, "Maybe."

House Republican Policy Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.) said he didn't "think anyone has closed the door on a permanent solution, but it's important that the committees get out of Washington and see the border."

Republican leaders expect at least eight committees to hold hearings this summer, both on Capitol Hill and around the country. They include Resources, Government Reform, Homeland Security, Judiciary, Intelligence, Ways and Means, International Relations and House Administration.

"There are policy issues in the Senate bill that stretch across a wide array of committees," Boehner said.

The decision by House Republicans to schedule hearings — an unusual move given that the immigration bill is already in conference — signifies their willingness to run for re-election in November on the strength of the enforcement-focused House bill and their unwillingness to give any ground to President Bush and the Senate, which passed a broader measure that includes a guest-worker program.

DOJ_NMG_0036579

"House Republicans want a strong border security bill and will not be pressured into just getting any bill done during an election year," said Ron Bonjean, spokesman for Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.).

Bonjean said Hastert wants committee chairmen to report the results of their hearings to him after the August recess. Then he could "look at appointing conferees in September," Bonjean said.

When they passed their bill last December, House Republicans were convinced that their measure would be popular with the public and have become more convinced in the intervening months, as they review polling data that they say suggests voters are now able to distinguish between the two chambers' approaches.

"Generally speaking, House Members are pretty comfortable with the House position," Putnam said.

House GOP aides said Tuesday that they expected the hearings to serve in part to highlight what they view as the most unpopular elements of the Senate measure. And in an effort to further frame the political debate, House Republicans have recently taken to calling the Senate bill "the Kennedy bill," a reference to the co-author of the Senate measure and favorite conservative villain, Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.).

Reaction to the House move among Kennedy's Senate colleagues was mixed, however.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), who opposed the Senate version and supports a stronger enforcement bill, said the House hearings were welcome news and that he hoped they would help strengthen his position, and ensure that the Senate's bill doesn't emerge as law.

"Obviously it moves the timetable back," Cornyn said. "But that's more important than to pass this bill prematurely, before Senators and Members of Congress understand what exactly is in it."

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), who supported the Senate reform measure, said it is unclear whether the hearings will help or hurt the bill's chances for passage this year, but he hopes they serve as an avenue to answer outstanding questions and improve public understanding.

"I'm cautiously optimistic," Graham said.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) charged that Congressional Republicans aren't interested in advancing a bill at all this year, and called the hearings the latest political tactic to meet that end. "This is a stall," he said.

"Every day the Republicans delay going to conference — they've delayed it for five weeks — it makes it more difficult to get a bill," Reid said.

House GOP supporters of a comprehensive bill, who are outnumbered within their own Conference, reacted to Tuesday's news with dismay.

"Americans don't want more hearings on immigration reform; they want a bill," Rep. Jeff Flake (Ariz.), a leading GOP proponent of a guest-worker plan, said in a statement. "The longer we wait to appoint members to the conference committee, the more difficult it becomes to produce a bill. That may be the aim of some in the House, but that's certainly not the sentiment of most Americans."

Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), who has been pushing his own compromise measure, said that House Members "would do well to expose the Senate bill for what it is."

"I think job one for House Republicans should be to expose and dismantle the amnesty bill proposed by the Senate," Pence said. "I still hope we can have a compromise bill with no amnesty."

GOP's Call For Hearings Puts Immigration Overhaul In Limbo (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush's push for a sweeping overhaul of immigration laws was dealt a major blow Tuesday when House Republican leaders announced they would hold public hearings on the Senate bill that they strongly oppose.

The plan, unveiled almost a month after the Senate measure passed, is the latest sign of reluctance among the GOP House leadership to try to negotiate a compromise bill that would include a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants. Conservatives say that element — a central part of the Senate measure — is the equivalent of amnesty.

House leaders insisted Tuesday that they still hoped to negotiate with the Senate. But the schedule for the hearings, set for July and August across the country, makes it unlikely that the two chambers can reach a final agreement before the November elections.

When Congress reconvenes in September, most lawmakers will be preoccupied with their campaigns; traditionally, little important business gets done at that time.

Failure to produce a bill would be a huge setback for Bush, who has prodded lawmakers to pass immigration legislation that — like the Senate legislation — would toughen border enforcement but also create a guest worker program and offer millions of illegal immigrants a way to gain legal status.

Democrats interpreted the House decision to hold town-hall-style meetings as an effort to stop the Senate legislation.

"The Republican House wants to defeat the immigration bill," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said. "This is a stall."

House Republicans denied the charge, arguing that they needed the time to review the legislation.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) "believes that we should focus on getting a bill done right and not be pressured by some during an election year," said his spokesman, Ron Bonjean.

He added that the House would select negotiators to work on a final bill only "after we go through the Senate … bill with a fine-tooth comb."

House leaders informed Bush of their plan a few days ago, aides said, although Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) had known about it for several weeks.

A spokeswoman for Frist, Carolyn Weyforth, said her boss welcomed the hearings and the desire of House members to have time to catch up on the Senate bill.

When asked whether he thought the call for hearings was an attempt to kill the Senate version, Frist said, "I don't think so."

But in announcing the hearings, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said one purpose would be to discuss "provisions in that bill that I have concerns about."

The move comes as Republicans are seeking to energize their core voters in the months before the midterm elections.

This month, Brian Bilbray, a Republican from Carlsbad in San Diego County, won the House seat vacated by disgraced Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham by campaigning almost entirely on the need to get tough on illegal immigration.

His victory encouraged House conservatives, who say border security and enforcement must come first.

Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), the leader of a 101-member caucus that advocates tough enforcement, interpreted the scheduling of the summer hearings as a sign that House leaders had little desire to try to find common ground with the Senate.

"Odds were long that any so-called compromise bill would get to the president's desk this year," said Tancredo, citing the tight legislative schedule and the distance between the House and Senate approaches to immigration. "The nail was already put in the coffin of the Senate's amnesty plan. These hearings probably lowered it into the grave."

Tancredo added that the hearings were designed to build support for an enforcement-only approach adopted by the House in a bill it passed in December.

"This is an issue that we can run on and win in November," Tancredo said. "By training Americans' focus on the Senate's amnesty pact, we'll create momentum for an enforcement-first bill after November. As more light is shed on the Senate's bill, more and more Americans find reasons to oppose it."

Boehner and his staff said that the hearing dates and locations had not been decided, but that they would involve several House committees that hold jurisdiction over different aspects of the bill.

Some of the hearings are expected to be held in areas in the South and Southwest where the immigration issue has been particularly divisive.

A Boehner spokesman detailed a few of the Senate provisions that might be examined in the hearings. They include a measure that would allow immigrants who gain legal status to receive Social Security benefits for work they did while illegal, and another that would require immigrants eligible for legalization to pay back taxes.

Even before the hearings were announced, progress on a final bill was stymied by a procedural problem that is blocking the Senate from choosing negotiators to work with the House.

Republicans and Democrats blame each other for the delay, which shows no sign of resolution.

Senate Republican aides said Tuesday that they doubted there would be much movement on the issue until the House hearings were completed. And some senators said they thought it was a good idea for the House to take the time to consider the Senate version.

"The problem with the Senate bill is that it is a tremendously important issue that had very little serious thought given to it," said Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.), who voted against the measure. "The House can provide the nation an opportunity to find out what's in the bill."

One architect of the Senate bill said that since the House had only debated enforcement measures, the hearings might offer members a chance to learn about a broader overhaul.

"I realize that the House has not addressed two of the three major aspects of the Senate bill," said Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.), who added that he was optimistic about the Senate's approach.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said some delay might help the chances of getting a bill with a guest worker program and path to legalization through Congress.

"My own view is that Republicans want to use it as a campaign issue," she said. "I think it is a good idea to let this thing settle for a while."

DOJ_NMG_0036581

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), a critic of the Senate bill, said some Republicans wanted to put off the discussion until after election day, when Congress will likely hold a lame-duck session. He added that backers of the Senate bill would have to accept some compromise.

"I think it's clear the Senate will have to move closer to the House position to get it resolved," Cornyn said.

But many saw the hearings as an attempt to scuttle the immigration overhaul altogether.

"This is clearly a delay tactic by the House Republicans, who have been dead set against comprehensive reform from the beginning," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), an author of the Senate legislation. "One has to wonder why there are going to be continued hearings … other than just to delay and kill the bill."

It's Time To Cut And Run From 'Cut And Run' (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

Policy wonks of the left and right held a panel discussion at the National Press Club yesterday to ask the question: "Is Politics Brain-Dead?" Up on Capitol Hill, Congress was providing some clues.

Confronted with the tough issues -- Iraq, immigration, the minimum wage -- lawmakers weighed their options and then went with their default position: exchange taunts.

Not quite six minutes after the Senate chaplain prayed yesterday for God to use senators "as agents of your grace," Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) started the sloganeering. "If we break our promise and cut and run, as some would have us do, the implications could be catastrophic," he said. In case anybody missed that, he also said "we can't cut and run" twice on CBS News and issued a follow-up press release titled: "FRIST DENOUNCES DEMOCRATS' PLAN TO CUT AND RUN."

Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) added: "If we cut and run in Iraq, what we will have done is prove what Osama bin Laden said."

Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), an expert windsurfer, had heard quite enough of this nautical term. "Cut and run, cut and run, cut and run, cut and run -- that's their phrase," he told Don Imus. "My plan is not cut and run. Their plan is lie and die."

Fox News was on the story. "John Kerry calls it 'lie and die,' " anchor Bill Hemmer told Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.). "What do you say to that?"

"I think the sound-bite war is not going to be an effective way to fight the war," the sensible senator said.

But Republican Party Chairman Ken Mehlman had a different view. "There's a debate going on within the Democratic Party," he said on CNN. "Some are saying we need to cut and run, others are saying we need to cut and jog, and still others are saying we need to cut and walk."

Mehlman's metaphor may have been muddled -- "cut and run" involves anchor cable and sail lashings, not the human leg -- but he had lawmakers' sentiments right. If Democrats were cutting and running from Iraq, Republicans were cutting and running from a minimum-wage increase and immigration legislation.

First thing yesterday morning, reporters were summoned to House Speaker Dennis Hastert's office, where GOP leaders were huddling. When the lawmakers emerged, they announced that, rather than having a conference with the Senate to negotiate compromise immigration legislation, they would hold another round of hearings.

Reporters pointed out that the delay meant that immigration legislation, so recently a priority for Congress, would probably not happen this year. And the GOP leaders did little to discourage that view. "We're not foreclosing the possibility," was all Rep. Deborah Pryce (Ohio) would promise, adding that this would postpone the issue at least until fall.

Rep. Roy Blunt (Mo.), the majority whip, concurred: "I don't know how likely it is."

Cut and run! "The Republican House wants to defeat the immigration bill," Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid (Nev.) crowed in front of the cameras. "Is this part of the Orwellian message we continually get out of this administration?"

Republicans quickly tried to change the subject from their immigration cut and run to the Democrats' cut and run on Iraq. House Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) held a news conference and declared that Democrats have "no plan at all to confront the real threat of terrorism and to achieve victory in a global war on terror."

But David Rogers, a Wall Street Journal reporter and Vietnam veteran, had prepared an ambush for Boehner. "In Vietnam, they used to put us out in these fire support bases and hope we would get attacked," he said. "Is that what you are doing? You are putting people in Iraq and hoping they get attacked so you can bring out the terrorists?"

"No, no," Boehner protested.

Over on the Senate floor, Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) was trying to insulate the party from the Republicans' cut-and-run charges on Iraq. He proposed a resolution "to express the sense of Congress that the government of Iraq should not grant amnesty to persons known to have attacked, killed or wounded members of the armed forces of the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0036582

It was purely symbolic: The Iraqi government says it will not grant amnesty, and the minister who suggested it to The Washington Post last week resigned the next day. But the Iraq debate was all about symbolism, and Nelson's proposal was adopted, 79 to 19.

Next, when Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) introduced a proposal to increase the minimum wage, and Republicans introduced an alternative, Democrats didn't even pretend that legislation might be produced. "Both will fail," Reid spokesman Jim Manley said with confidence. So why bring them up? "It allows both sides to proclaim a modicum of victory."

As evening approached, Sens. Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and Jack Reed (D-R.I.) visited the Senate press gallery to talk about their proposal, to be introduced today, calling for the beginning of a withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq.

The inevitable question arose: Won't this immediately be branded "cut and run"?

"The wording is very clear: It's not a cut-and-run strategy," Levin protested. "Our amendment is not in any sense a cut-and-run amendment."

Added Reed: "Throughout this whole endeavor, there's been more sloganizing than planning." He suggested that Democrats come up with a taunt of their own for Republicans: "I guess their position is 'we're there forever.' "

Before nightfall, Democrats had drafted a new press release. Title: "Bush Republicans Plan to be in Iraq Forever."

House GOP To Hold Hearings On Senate Immigration Bill (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, June 21, 2006

Republican leaders in the House are organizing a series of committee hearings to examine Senate-passed legislation to restructure the country's immigration laws.

The leaders clearly intend these hearings to increase their leverage on the brink of a tense bargaining session with the Senate. A procedural measure has stalled the bill indefinitely, preventing leaders from naming conferees.

Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) convened a meeting in his conference room yesterday morning with most of his elected leadership and nine committee chairmen. None of the leaders or chairmen made an official announcement upon leaving the meeting but confirmed that committee hearings were in the works.

"We want to have hearings on this bill," Hastert told reporters yesterday. "I've asked the various chairmen to go out and have hearings so we understand what the American people are saying."

The immigration issue pits a majority of GOP lawmakers in the House against President Bush and a handful of Republicans in the Senate. Despite an uproar of opposition to the president's guest-worker plan, the administration continues to pressure Republican lawmakers in both chambers to support comprehensive reform.

Bush has toured the border in recent weeks with congressional Republicans, and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez is touring parts of New Mexico and Texas this week to push the president's comprehensive reform plan.

"We need to have comprehensive reform," Gutierrez said in a phone interview from Odessa, Texas. "In order to secure our borders, we need to secure our interior and enforce employers."

Gutierrez echoed Bush's contention that border enforcement is the primary goal of any reform measure but that it is impossible to address enforcement realistically without accounting for the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already in this country.

The commerce secretary said it is imperative for Congress to work together in resolving this complicated issue and find a workable solution on which all sides could agree.

"The fact that it is complicated is not a reason to delay," Gutierrez said. "It needs to be resolved as soon as possible."

The House hearings would begin in July and run through August, members said yesterday. The special sessions would be held both in Washington and throughout the country. House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said one goal of the hearings would be to address specific components of the Senate bill.

"We want to have a very clear idea of what is in the Senate bill and what some people think of some of the provisions in the Senate bill," Boehner told reporters during one of his regular weekly press briefings.

He pointed to language in the Senate bill granting illegal immigrants the benefits of in-state tuition as one example of a Senate provision he objects to. A senior GOP leadership aide in the House said members also oppose provisions in the bill written by Sens. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.) that would allow illegal immigrants to collect some Social Security benefits, as well as a provision that would require the undocumented workers to pay back taxes for just three of the five years leading up to their application for citizenship.

While a spokeswoman for Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) welcomed further inspection of the Senate measure by various House panels, Kennedy was less than enthused that House lawmakers want to inspect the Senate bill any more.

"This is clearly a delay tactic by House Republicans who have been dead set against comprehensive reform from the beginning," Kennedy said in a statement released by his office. "We face an immigration crisis, and we need prompt and comprehensive action to address it — not more hearings."

In addition to Hastert and Boehner, other GOP leaders attending the hour-long meeting included Majority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.); his chief deputy, Rep. Eric Cantor (Va.); Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (Ohio); National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.); and Policy Committee Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.).

Chairmen included the Judiciary Committee's James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.), who is expected to take the lead in the negotiations for Republicans in the House; Homeland Security's Peter King (R-N.Y.); Ways and Means' Bill Thomas (R-Calif.); Government Reform's Tom Davis (R-Va.); Resources' Richard Pombo (R-Calif.); Intelligence's Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.); and Administration's Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.).

Given the breadth of the committees involved in the discussions, neither the chairmen nor the leaders could give any details about which committees would handle the particular details.

"There are policy issues in the Senate bill that stretch across a wide array of committees," Boehner said.

By holding a series of hearings in Washington and elsewhere during the August recess, Republican leaders in the House are hoping to feed dissatisfaction with the bill, which would, in turn, give them more leverage heading into negotiations with the Senate.

Republican leaders would like to pass a bill increasing enforcement along the border and in the workplace before addressing an expansion of the current guest-worker plan, and most GOP lawmakers in the House are adamantly opposed to any provision that would grant eventual citizenship to workers who came to the United States illegally.

"We're feeling pressure from the Senate and the administration, but we don't feel we should pass something that Americans are upset about," Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said. "Our chairmen need to put this under a microscope."

Although the hearings could prevent Congress from moving any bill, Hastert said he remains committed to passing something soon.

"I'm not putting any timeline on this thing, but I think we need to get this thing done right," Hastert said yesterday. "I told that to the president the other day that we need to have that discussion."

Migrating From Farm Hand To Orchard Owner (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

TIETON, Wash. — His name is Evaristo Silva, but the immigrant farm hands address him with reverence as Don Varo.

He once was one of them — a poor and desperate young man from Mexico who left behind a pregnant wife and three children and risked his life crossing the border on an illegal search for the American Dream. Now he is everything they aspire to be.

The farmworker became a farm owner, saving enough to buy a small apple orchard on the outskirts of Yakima. The illegal immigrant became a United States citizen, benefiting from the amnesty President Reagan offered to his generation of undocumented migrants.

"For me, this really was the land of opportunity," Silva, 62, said as he walked along the tidy rows of his red delicious apple trees. "In Mexico, I would wake up on many days without knowing how I was going to eat. I may not have much here, but I am so much better off than I would have been if I had stayed."

But now that the campesino is a ranchero, and needs illegal immigrants to pick and prune his apple orchard, he has found that they don't need him any more to succeed in America.

Silva now wants to end illegal immigration. He wants an expanded guest worker program so that farm owners like him could still benefit from the cheap labor of Mexican workers. The foreigners could come into the U.S. to work harvests, but would then have to go home.

He feels this way despite understanding that such a radical shift — most fruit pickers are illegal immigrants — would separate fathers from their families every growing season, and guarantee that younger field hands never get the opportunities he had.

"Everything has a limit," Silva said in Spanish, the language he's most comfortable speaking. "People who are working and have been here a long time should be allowed to stay. But if half of Latin America keeps coming — Hondurans, Salvadorans, Mexicans — you will reach a point where we don't all fit."

Silva's new stance on immigration is largely based on his own bottom line. Yakima Valley apple growers are struggling to survive because they face global competition from farmers in China and Chile who undercut their prices.

DOJ_NMG_0036584

Silva is having a hard time finding field hands willing to work for $8 to $10 an hour — the most he and other farmers say they can afford — because illegal immigrants can now earn more as year-round construction workers and janitors.

Silva scrounged up a crew last year to harvest his 40 acres, but other farmers were less fortunate: Some of their apples rotted on the trees. Still, low apple prices have so eroded Silva's profits that for the last two years, he has not been able to make payments on his orchard.

Without a guest worker program, the farm hand turned farm owner believes he will lose his land.

As Silva toured his orchard, tugging wayward branches at just about every step, he marveled at how much he had accomplished since sneaking into the U.S. three decades ago.

A small man with evocative brown eyes, graying hair and a bushy mustache, Silva wore a red-check flannel shirt, faded blue jeans and brown work boots. Somewhat jarringly, he also wore a yellow construction helmet, a habit he picked up as a field hand worried that a falling apple might thump him in the head.

His had not been an easy life, he conceded; he was sometimes "treated like another piece of farm equipment" in his years as a farmworker. But as he surveyed his family's homestead amid the gently rolling hills of his apple orchard, he stopped and said, "I have lived a beautiful life."

Silva is a native of Pajacuaran, a poor old farming town in the Mexican state of Michoacan. Generations of men from his town — including Silva's father, Jesus — have illegally entered the U.S. to work the fields. Their wages, often just a few thousand dollars a year, were princely compared with what the same work would pay in Pajacuaran.

Silva started out working the harvests in America and returning home each year. But after he nearly died crossing the desert east of San Diego in 1972, he got scared of crossing back and forth and decided to stay in the U.S.

A devout Roman Catholic and devoted family man, Silva lived away from his children for so long that when two of them unexpectedly showed up on his doorstep one day, he did not recognize them. The memory of it made him cry. "At the time my children needed me most, I was away," Silva said, wiping away tears. Apologizing, he continued: "But it was out of necessity."

The entire family eventually reunited in Washington, where Silva followed in his father's path and found plentiful work as an apple picker. His children also became citizens; his wife, Maria, became a legal resident.

"When my husband first told me he was in Washington — to me, a Mexican, it sounded very cold, like he was at the end of the world," Maria said with a smile. "But we have really done well here as a family. This is our home now."

Don Varo belongs to a generation of migrant field hands that has transformed the Yakima Valley into a postmodern melting pot east of the Cascade Range. Yakima County's population in 1990 was 188,823, and was less than one-fourth Latino. A decade later, its population grew by 34,000, and about 27,000 of the newcomers are Latinos, according to U.S. census figures.

Side by side with the burger joints and rib shacks on Yakima's increasingly urban thoroughfares, restaurants sell authentic antojitos Mexicanos, or Mexican small dishes, and a popular downtown supermarket called La Bodega Yakimex features ethnic delicacies such as nopales, an edible part of the prickly pear cactus.

Although Latino immigrants have been praised for creating a bustling small-business community that has invigorated the Yakima Valley, they have also been blamed for higher crime, as well as overcrowding in some of the city's oldest neighborhoods, where it is common for several immigrant families to share a single worn-out bungalow. Numerous street gangs roam Yakima, and their graffiti brands venerable buildings with crude monikers such as "Original Loko Boyz" and "Can't Stop Mexicans."

"It wouldn't be so bad if migrant laborers did what they used to do: work, pick up and go home. But the current system, where they bring their families and stay, has the potential to bankrupt us," said John Tierney, a former state trooper who is chairman of the Yakima County Republican Party. "If you talk to people who've been here a while, including the legal Latino immigrants, many will tell you we have seen an erosion of quality of life."

Silva's hometown of Tieton, about 15 miles northwest of Yakima, is just a few streets of modest bungalows and a handful of agricultural packinghouses surrounded by family owned orchards. It has not escaped the changes, or the resulting friction. But it is still a sleepy backwater of 1,150 people.

For Silva, it is everything he wanted: He and his wife, the children and their families all live within a few hundred feet of one another amid his apple trees.

At the crest of the road from his old ranch house sit two boxy manufactured homes, with satellite dishes pointing skyward and bicycles and plastic toys strewn where grandchildren had left them. One is the home of his oldest daughter, Maria, who is studying to become a beautician; the other is the home of his only son, Evaristo Jr., who owns a carpet and tile business.

At the bottom of the slope in a weathered gray farm cottage lives Lucia, who runs her own day-care center. Another daughter, Lupe, a church secretary, lives down the road in a large trailer. "I am who I am," she said, "because of the United States."

Adriana, the youngest, who was born in the U.S., is living with her parents while she attends community college to become a dental hygienist.

Silva's children range from 19 to 38 years old. He has 11 grandchildren, with another on the way, and he has high hopes for them all — that they become engineers, doctors or lawyers. His own education, he reminds them, ended after fifth grade so he could help support his family.

Silva's six brothers also sneaked across the border in search of a better life, and all live legally in America now, part of an extended family of more than 250 parents, children and grandchildren. When they all go together, the Silvas fill a Yakima Valley Catholic church. When they gather for Christmas, they rent a conference hall.

By American standards, the Silvas' standard of living remains modest at best. But as Silva's wife, Maria, likes to say, even average Americans "live like the rich of Pajacuaran."

The five varieties of apple trees Silva planted a decade ago are now mature, and they bear beautiful fruit. They grow sweet yellow-specked gala apples, big golden delicious apples, heart-shaped red delicious apples.

But they don't bring Don Varo much money.

The first few years were good — the trees made him a sweet profit. But the market for Washington apples went into a slump, and Silva has fallen more than $40,000 behind on his land payments.

The old farmer he is buying the land from is sympathetic, and patient. Still, Silva wonders how much longer he can continue. He had hoped to leave the land to his children. Now he thinks he may only be able to keep their homes.

"What Evaristo has, that is probably the lowest number of acres you can have and still make a living," said a neighboring farmer, Tony Pottratz, as he stopped his tractor to chat with Silva.

Pottratz didn't mention it, but he was helping the Silvas put Adriana though college by paying $500 toward her tuition every semester. She would be the first in the family with a college education.

Silva had hoped to ease into retirement; instead, to pay his bills he is driving a tractor for a larger grower. His wife still works the early shift at a fruit packing plant.

As he cut through another neighbor's rows of cherry trees on the walk home, Silva ran into a crew of Mexican field hands clipping branches. The younger men were clumsily performing a task Silva had mastered, and he began to give them unsolicited advice, telling them to trim some stems that had grown too close together.

"This man here with me, he is with la migra. He has some questions for you," Silva said in jest. The workers did not laugh.

Silva started talking about illegal immigration. He told them he supported tightening the borders and limiting opportunities to guest programs that required workers like them to return home.

"You all no longer want to do this kind of work, and I understand, because you can hardly pay your bills," Silva said. "But you can go to work for a factory," while farmers have no choice but to find ways around labor shortages.

"Let the Americans come and do this," a laborer chimed in with a grin before going back to work.

Most of the men kept trimming, but one, clad in a soiled Central Washington University sweatshirt and a baseball cap emblazoned with the letters "Mexico," turned around.

"If you want us here to work, you should give us a chance to become citizens," said Jesus Estrada, 50, a father of eight children who lives with his family in Yakima year-round. "Coming here to work and then being forced to go home again — that's not opportunity."

"If it keeps up like this, people won't fit here anymore," Silva said of illegal immigration. "Have you seen the graffiti in Yakima? They are having urban problems there, gang problems. It was never like that before."

"You used to see migrant workers from California, even Texas, up here during the harvest," said Estrada, who has been pruning local apple orchards for 20 years. "But now you owners are paying $7 an hour, $8 an hour, and that is just not enough to live."

"When you are a worker, I know, it does not sound like a lot," Silva said, "but if you are a ranchero like me, believe me, it is a lot."

If farmers like him go broke, Silva said, there will be less work for men such as Estrada.

If workers like him cannot earn enough to pay their bills as field hands, Estrada countered, they will not travel to Yakima as illegal immigrants or legal guest workers, and the labor shortages will only get worse.

As a chilly breeze blew, the two men continued arguing for a few minutes, but it was clear that neither was going to change his mind. The farmer went back to his apple orchard, and the field hand resumed trimming the cherry trees.

The GOP's Immigration Shame (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

HOW CAN YOU TELL WHEN a governing party is running out of steam? When it controls all branches of government yet abandons even the pretense of addressing an issue most members claim is a "crisis."

DOJ_NMG_0036586

That's what the GOP-led House did Tuesday in announcing that discussions over reconciling its enforcement-centric immigration bill with the Senate's legalization-focused version will be pushed back to September at the earliest, and only after completing more hearings. Instead of naming negotiators and attempting in good faith to bridge the chasm between the bills, House leaders are busy naming locations for "field meetings" that can deliver maximum demagogic effect in the run-up to the November election.

These meetings are nonsense. Congress held more than a dozen hearings on immigration last year before passing HR 4437. That punitive bill filled the streets with millions of protesters angry that it did little to address the nation's need for a legal supply of labor or the estimated 11 million-plus illegal residents of this country, besides turning them into felons.

The Senate version, a flawed piece of work in its own right after too many compromises, at least offered a system (however torturous) by which millions of underground workers could finally come into the open without fear of immediate incarceration or deportation. Most of the last-minute amendments to the Senate bill brought the legislation closer to the version passed by the House. But Republicans there prefer clinging to the dangerous fantasy that a massive, militarized wall must be approved before discussions can even begin over what to do with the millions of indispensable, but vilified, workers already here.

House GOP leaders can barely conceal their preference for divisive politics over sound policy. Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois has reportedly conveyed to President Bush that hard-line enforcement politics is polling particularly well this season. One Republican congressional aide told the Associated Press: "The discussion is how to put the Democrats in a box without attacking the president." This is what passes for Republican leadership nowadays.

Summer and fall will be gut-check time not just for Bush, who has tried in his vague though periodically eloquent way to make immigration reform his signature domestic accomplishment this year, or for pro-reform GOP senators such as John McCain of Arizona, but for the American people. When the vulnerable party in power chooses to adopt a campaign strategy that demonizes a class of people, how it fares will say much about who we are.

Twelve years ago, Republicans were swept into Congress on a platform bursting with energy and ideas, with many measures enacted within the GOP's first 100 days in power. If inaction and xenophobia are all the party has left, this could be its last 100 days.

The Terrible, Horrible, Urgent National Disaster That Immigration Isn't (NYT)

By Lawrence Downes

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

Part 1: What's Wrong with "Getting Tough on Immigration"

I. Immigration, Oversimplified

The arguments made by hard-line critics of immigration reform are depressingly simple, which makes them simply depressing.

They boil down to this: the immigration problems we have today, and a vast array of other problems, begin and end with immigrants themselves, the people who have committed the offense of being here illegally — or just being here, period, in undesirable numbers, with undesirable habits and undesirable effects on the health of the nation.

Their presence here is seen as overwhelmingly if not entirely bad, an unpardonable offense for which American citizens are made to suffer.

In this view, the problem is not going to be solved by repairing a complex system of immigration laws and regulations, by tinkering with the economic machinery to find a better fit between labor demand and supply, or by being more diligent about enforcing existing rules about workplaces and hiring. And it certainly won't be solved by being creative or more welcoming and humane toward immigrants in a way that rewards their hard work and desire to participate in the system more fully.

It will be solved by keeping people out, and kicking people out. Do that, the restrictionists insist, and you will help resolve a host of other problems — the invasion of neighborhoods and street corners by Latino men; the upsurge of gangs and drugs; urban congestion and suburban sprawl; human trafficking; the demise of white European culture and values; the strain on jails, hospitals and schools, and the threat to the very stability of the United States.

It's no wonder some people compare immigrant workers to locusts, bacteria or an occupying army. If you could find a 250-year-old American to discuss this, he or she would tell you how familiar this all sounds. Identical arguments were once made about Chinese laborers, Japanese-Americans, Roman Catholics, the Irish, Italians, and the original unloved — though fully documented — outsiders, African-Americans. Let's not even talk about American Indians.

II. The Disturbing Role Played by Fear

Many of those who favor a get-tough approach to immigration do not like having their arguments mocked and their tolerance questioned. They hate being dumped into the loony bin with Colonel Custer, the the Know-Nothings and the the Ku Klux Klan.

DOJ_NMG_0036587

That is understandable. But xenophobia is not restricted to a fringe element within the anti-immigration movement. Panicky arguments about the dangers of immigration have been made by supposedly responsible people — including members of the United States House and Senate, and state, county and local officials around the country. United States Representative Tom Tancredo of Colorado may be the best-known xenophobe in Congress. He created an immigration caucus to further his firebrand views. It now has about 100 members and a Web site that is a one-stop shop for fear-stricken anti-immigration arguments.

One member of Mr. Tancredo's caucus is John Culberson of Houston, who issued a "Border Security Alert" last October warning that "Al Qaeda terrorists and Chinese nationals are infiltrating our country virtually anywhere they choose from Brownsville to San Diego." Besides that, he said, "a large number of Islamic individuals have moved into homes in Nuevo Laredo and are being taught Spanish to assimilate with the local culture."

Because of that, Mr. Culberson said, "Full scale war is underway on our southern border, and our entire way of life is at risk if we do not win the battle for Laredo."

The view of America as a nation under siege led the United States House last December to pass an immigration bill, sponsored by James Sensenbrenner of Wisconsin, that sees the problem as entirely an issue of enforcement. It would make it a federal crime to live in the United States illegally, which would turn millions of immigrants into felons, ineligible to win any legal status. It would also make it a crime for churches and social service agencies to shield or offer support to illegal immigrants. The debate in the Senate over immigration reform had its own low moments, including the successful passage of a non-sequitur amendment by Senator James Inhofe of Oklahoma to declare English the country's national language — an undisguised swipe at Latino immigrants and their supposed reluctance to assimilate. A guest-worker program in the Senate bill was sharply scaled back after the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank, issued a report warning that if the bill as written passed, the country could end up swamped with up to 193 million new legal immigrants within 20 years. That number, greater than the populations of Mexico and Central America combined, was hysterically off the charts. The bill was hastily amended and the estimates revised downward to a still unrealistic 66 million, or 47 million if you count only net new arrivals, not people already here who would be legalized.(The Congressional Budget Office, by contrast, projects 8 million net new migrants over the next 10 years under the Senate bill. The National Foundation for American Policy, counting newcomers and immigrants already here, studied the Senate bill and came up with a figure of 28.48 million over 20 years, or 1.42 million a year. That's a lot, but far less than the anti-immigration number masseurs would have you believe.)

If you dig into the widely discussed arguments connecting immigrants to things like rampant overpopulation or the demise the English language, you will discern the influence of any number of hard-line restrictionist immigration organizations. Scratch those groups, and underneath you will usually find a kook. There are usually not many degrees of separation from ostensibly rational, often-quoted organizations like the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which calls itself a nonprofit, nonpartisan organization dedicated to research and policy study, and people like its co-founder John Tanton. The Southern Poverty Law Center, which tracks hate groups, says that Mr. Tanton, a retired Michigan eye doctor, "is widely recognized as the leading figure in the anti-immigration and 'official English' movements in the United States."

A profile on the law center's Web site says: "In addition to FAIR, where he still is a board member, Tanton has been a central player in an array of anti-immigrant, nationalist groups and institutes, including Pro English, U.S. Inc., Center for Immigration Studies (CIS), U.S. English, and Numbers USA."

Who is this Mr. Tanton? He is someone who has depicted Latino immigrants as a horde of alarmingly procreative Roman Catholics of questionable "educability," and who runs a publishing company, Social Contract Press, that sells titles on immigration topics like "The Camp of the Saints," that have been denounced as racist and vile.

The Anti-Defamation League, in a 2000 report on FAIR, traced its nativist roots and offered what it called "a glimpse into how advocacy can cross the line into a divisive and troubling tendency toward scapegoating of the foreign born." It's worth reading.

FAIR and its allies are is hardly the only hard-core immigration foes out there, and their more unprintable opinions would be rejected passionately by great numbers of people in the enforcement-only immigration camp. But their influence is still significant: their arguments mirror the immigration talking points of many leading conservatives. And it shows just how much of the current panic has its source not in people's gray matter, but in their viscera.

III. An Array of Too-Costly Solutions

The restrictionists have a variety of clear-cut solutions. But the reassurance they offer those who worry about immigration is a false one, for a simple reason: their price tags are simply too costly for them to be seriously considered. Anyone who seriously proposes them is engaging in little more than demagoguery.

Take the restrictionists' favorite solution: deporting 'em all. It is a straw man in the debate, because only the most rabid talk-show callers would be willing to pay that price — $200 billion or more, at least double the Department of Homeland Security budget. And that cost does not even count the psychic toll it would take on our nation to rip immigrants out of homes and workplaces and schools and eject them. As unlikely as we would be to pay this cost once, it is even less likely we would be willing to pay it again and again, as we would no doubt have to as new immigrants arrived to replace the ones who were sent home.

Then there is the hard-liners' other favorite solution — fortifying the border, which any restrictionist will tell you is the most urgent priority of immigration reform. Billions have already been lavished at the southern border — California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas — in walls, patrols and technology. Since 1986, the border patrol budget has been raised 10 times, and the number of border patrol agents has gone up eightfold. The House of Representatives, in its disturbingly get-tough immigration bill, wants to erect a 700-mile wall, which will fatten a few powerful contractors' bottom lines by untold millions, and President Bush has already sent in the National Guard.

These price tags will only seem higher when measured against results.

We have already spent a lot on enforcement, and have precious little to show for it. A Wall Street Journal editorial[$] titled "The Border Brigades" noted that "U.S. immigration policy at least since the passage of the Simpson-Mazzoli law in 1986 and certainly since the 1990's has emphasized 'security' above all else." But this has not slowed illegal immigration in the least. The Pew Hispanic Center reports that the population of illegal immigrants has shown "steady growth" in recent years, which is putting it mildly. In 1986, the last time the country was consumed with a debate about immigration reform, the illegal population was estimated at 3 million. Today it's 11 million to 12 million.

Those who are wedded to the iron-fisted approach oppose any immigration reform that would ease pressure at the border by including a temporary-worker program or granting visas to legalize people already here and their relatives waiting to enter. They will not admit, or do not understand, that they are simply insisting on throwing good money after bad.

IV. Local Fear and Loathing

America's approach to immigration has to be worthy of a nation built on immigration, and dedicated to the ideal of equality. Unfortunately, the measures that are being implemented at the local level — where most of the action is occurring — look a whole lot like bullying and bigotry.

Cities and counties in California, Arizona, New York and elsewhere have enacted ordinances cracking down on day laborers, the most visible and vilified members of the immigrant population. That does not mean that illegal immigrants are not being hired. It simply means the government is making their harsh lives harsher. Day laborers have been subject to police harassment and illegal evictions. And that does not include the freelance hostility and abuse directed at them by abusive contractors, regular citizens, protesters and vigilante groups like the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps.

Other places are focusing on ripping immigrants out of the social fabric — passing rules that bar them from being helped by the society they are contributing to. In April, Gov. Sonny Perdue of Georgia signed one of the harshest anti-immigration laws in the country, a package of restrictions that, among other things, requires adults seeking state benefits to prove they are here legally, and state agencies to check every employee's immigration status. Never mind that much of Georgia's economic vitality stems from the immigrants operating its textile mills, picking its peaches, preparing its meals and building and tidying its expansive suburbs.

Some of these outbursts are merely silly. In Danbury, Conn., the mayor has cracked down on volleyball, a favorite pastime of Ecuadoran immigrants. Nashville tried to ban taco trucks but not, tellingly, hot dog stands. Silly, but mean-spirited.

V. Sending In the Police

Others local measures are more serious. The most wrongheaded of the local crackdown impulses may be the one to enlist state and local police to enforce immigration laws. Law-enforcement officials themselves hate it. City councils and police departments around the country are resisting efforts to make them shoulder what is and should remain a federal responsibility.

For example, Minneapolis and St. Paul's mayors and police chiefs have spoken out against a proposal by the Minnesota governor to enlist local police officers in immigration enforcement — and they are speaking for many other mayors and police chiefs who feel the same way. Chief John Harrington of the St. Paul Police Department told the St. Paul Pioneer Press that local cops were already buried in other work — like fighting violent crime — that was more urgent than checking people's immigration papers.

"The City of St. Paul doesn't have enough cops to handle the load of things we already have on the books, the basic city ordinances and statutes and those egregious federal crimes — drug trafficking, kidnapping, bank robbery — that we have now," Chief Harrington said. Checking up on immigrants, he insisted, would take his officers away from tracking down serious criminals, including sex offenders. He also argued that the cost of sending 550 officers for the six months of training that Immigrations and Customs Enforcement officials recommend could better be used fighting crime at home.

There is another way cracking down on immigrants hurts, rather than helps, in the fight against crime. As Chief Harrington and many others have pointed out, local police officers — unlike their federal counterparts — need the help of the community to do their jobs. Illegal immigrants are already a hidden population. Turning local cops against them will drive them further into the shadows. This will hinder investigations — witnesses will vanish, and criminals, uncaught and unpunished, will flourish.

Part 2: The Harder but Better Way

I. A 796-Page Attempt to Do Better

If the hard-liners trying to kill comprehensive immigration reform are a disciplined chorus singing one note, pure and bell-clear, the other side is more like a crowd struggling to pull together the "Messiah" in a stadium sing-along. They are an alliance of the dirt-poor and powerful, of plainspoken Republicans like Senators John McCain and Lindsey Graham and a lion-in-winter liberal, Edward Kennedy. They include business interests, some labor unions, editorial pages like this one and editorial pages not at all like this one. A diffident President Bush has been trying to fit in somewhere.

What unites these motley allies and distinguishes them from the hard-liners is their understanding that bountiful immigration is a blessing — a mixed blessing, but a blessing all the same. Their efforts to solve the problem lack clarity. They grapple with contradictions. Their approach, embodied in a 796-page brick of a Senate immigration bill, is at once punitive and forgiving. It throws money at the border but also includes a path to citizenship for many, though not all, of the illegal immigrants already here. It paves the way for millions more whose hopes of entering the country have been stymied, sometimes for decades, by bureaucratic backlogs.

Critics of the bill have called it unworkable and incomprehensible. They have a point. But flawed as it is, the Senate bill is the only one that acknowledges and seeks to enhance the contributions that immigrants make to this country's economy and culture. It's the only one that tries to enlist immigrants present and future, illegal and otherwise, in the job of making this country better. And therefore it is the only one with any hope of making the excruciatingly difficult and complicated cost-benefit equation of immigration end up in the black.

II. How Badly We Need Them

As a conduit for workers into this country, the existing immigration system is greatly out of balance with demand. The legal path for an unskilled worker to enter the United States is through one of about 5,000 visas issued for such workers each year, which means it is no path at all. The United States economy has adjusted, of course, by hiring temporary workers and illegal workers by the millions. The invisible hand doesn't ask for ID for the roughly 500,000 people who enter illegally each year.

Immigrants — legal and illegal — fill a vital niche in the American economy. They make up 12 percent of the United States population but 14 percent of its workers, according to the Congressional Budget Office. From 1994 to 2004, the agency said in a report last December, the number of foreign-born workers grew to 21 million from 13 million, a rise that accounted for more than half of the growth of the U.S. labor force. According to the American Immigration Lawyers Association, immigrants hold 40 percent of farming, fishing and forestry jobs in the United States, 33 percent of jobs in building and grounds maintenance, 22 percent of food preparation jobs and 22 percent of construction jobs. Tearing the approximately one third of those workers who are illegal away from their livelihoods and families would be ruinous to the economy, particularly the agricultural and tourism industries in states like California.

Throw away the arguments that immigrants are tax leeches. On the contrary. They pay more in taxes than they consume in services. They all pay sales taxes. Illegal immigrants who use fake Social Security numbers to get hired pay income and payroll taxes — but don't collect Social Security and are ineligible for Medicaid. The amount of unclaimed Social Security tax has more than doubled since the 1980's, to roughly $189 billion. Because immigrants tend to be younger and healthier than native born workers, they use government services more sparingly. A comprehensive study of immigration and its economic effects — "The New Americans: Economic, Demographic, and Fiscal Effects of Immigration," by James Smith and Barry Edmonston for the National Research Council in 1997 — summed up its conclusions this way: Because immigrants on average have less education than the native-born, they earn less and pay lower taxes. But immigrants also consume far fewer services. As a result: the average immigrant pays nearly $1,800 more in taxes than he or she costs in benefits, even when you factor in the cost of public education for his or her children.

The report emphasizes that the proper way to understand these expenditures is as an investment in America's future. In a country that absorbs about one million newcomers per year, each yearly cohort of immigrants pays $80 billion more in taxes over the course of a lifetime than it consumes in services. In other words, there is no economic crisis being caused by immigration — but there could be one if it came to a halt.

An open letter to President Bush and Congress made the rounds of the Internet last week. Signed by more than 500 economists in varied fields, including five Nobel Prize winners, it argues that immigration is a net economic gain for America and its citizens and "the greatest anti-poverty program ever devised."

III. Acknowledging the Costs

It would be wrong to argue that tighter enforcement has no place in sensible immigration reform, or that immigration does not bring with it an array of problems. There are all sorts of things that supporters of immigrants should — and do — own up to. It is not only good-hearted immigrant workers with sore feet, blisters and hungry families, for example, who pour across America's borders. Drugs, counterfeit goods and weapons do, too. No terrorists have been known to have entered from Mexico, but it could happen. If there were a realistic way of sealing the borders against all drug dealers, felons, and terrorists, we would certainly want to consider it. But there is not. Law enforcement should focus vigilantly on all of these, but the border is not where those battles will be won.

There is one conundrum of illegal immigration that is very real: the cost it imposes on people who would compete for jobs with undocumented low-skilled immigrants. It stands to reason — how could a job market absorb so many new people and not see wages fall? An often-cited study by two Harvard economists, George J. Borjas and Lawrence F. Katz, found that from 1980 to 2000, a wave of illegal immigration from Mexico had reduced the wages of high school dropouts in the United States by 8.2 percent.

But that study gave only a partial picture. It failed to account for the economic growth that immigrants cause — the many jobs that cheap immigrant labor creates, and the gaping demographic niche it fills. As Eduardo Porter pointed out in The Times in April, "Over the last quarter-century, the number of people without any college education, including high school dropouts, has fallen sharply. This has reduced the pool of workers who are most vulnerable to competition from illegal immigrants."

This is no consolation to the janitor in Los Angeles who has seen his job disappear, or the by-the-book contractor who can't compete with the fly-by-night operation that hires — and underpays and exploits — illegal day laborers by the truckload. Any serious attempt at immigration reform has to grapple with the fact that many Americans — young black men, among others — who have been overlooked and shunned in the job market for generations will likely continue to be overlooked. That is especially true as the economy hums along through the energy of immigrants, many of them illegal. If immigration decreases costs and increases the national prosperity, we need to find a way to make sure that those gains are shared with those on the low rungs of the economic ladder.

IV. Anger on the Ground

Farmingville, a working-class community on Long Island that has been utterly transformed by Latino immigration, is a prime example of the challenges that burgeoning immigration poses and the resentment it inspires. Longtime residents became acutely aware of the presence of dozens of Latino men on street corners and piling up in illegally subdivided rooming houses. This was a clear example of globalization at the local level, and to many in Farmingville the costs were obvious and unacceptable. Young men crowding the 7-Eleven parking lot, intimidating women and girls with sexually aggressive catcalls. Men urinating in the street, loitering and generally creating a nuisance of themselves. You couldn't talk to these people, and you couldn't make them go away.

They were the visible manifestation of broken borders, and some aggrieved people took it on themselves to solve the problem. They beat up workers and firebombed their homes. They held signs and marched. They harassed and heckled day laborers, they wrote letters and had meetings.

The Farmingville conflict is being repeated, in different forms, in communities across the United States. But the anti-immigrant activists in Farmingville accomplished nothing, unless you consider waging a successful battle against the creation of a day-labor hiring site a success. Five years after the furor erupted and became the subject of a well-regarded documentary, Farmingville has as many day laborers as ever. It doesn't have a hiring site.

V. The Cost Abroad

There are many books that document the hardship for Latinos migrating to El Norte. The book "Coyotes" by Ted Conover, a white journalist with a fondness for living his stories, is a good one. In villages where most of the young men go abroad, the result is a a reliable stream of remittances to their hometowns — $25.5 billion in 2003, according to the Congressional Budget Office — which is a vital source of revenue for poor countries.

But it also means that communities, particularly small ones in the south of Mexico and Central America, lose their brightest, best and strongest men and women for months or years at a time. The energy that could be expended in making a community grow or a local business prosper is spent in another country, and while cash is welcome, it is often a poor substitute for having children and spouses at home, as the toll in broken families attests.

VI. Uncertain Possibilities

The current immigration "system," if you can call it that, is broken. It's rich in perversities. So is the effort to fix it.

The House bill is simply noxious. The Senate alternative has some serious flaws. It attempts to divide the population of illegal immigrants into three groups, being relatively gentle on some immigrants and tough on others, depending on how many years they have been here. Millions of newer arrivals will have to volunteer to leave the country — to report to be deported. It's hard to imagine that a significant majority of them will ever do so. But in any case, it seems highly unlikely the full Congress could, in the current climate, pass anything as good as the Senate bill.

DOJ_NMG_0036591

A significant number of pro-immigrant groups have already concluded that doing nothing — passing no immigration bill this year — would be better than passing some awkward hybrid of the existing Senate and House bills.

They may be right. With elections looming in November, the get-tough argument may have the upper hand. It is an approach supported by a majority of the House, backed up by thousands of constituents who have been making phone calls and mailing bricks (yes, actual bricks) to their elected representatives to drive the point home. But it's foolish to think that walling off America and reforming immigration through enforcement alone is anything but self-defeating.

It's not only because the costs of security are so high, or because the contributions that legal and illegal immigrants make to this country are so positive. Those who have been working as hard as the hard-liners have been to close this country off to people who came here to seek work and a future have a radically astringent vision of what this country should be. To militarize the border, to turn illegal immigrants into felons, means trying to reverse the polarity on the American magnet, to repel the people who have struggled, dreamed and died to get here.

It means turning this singular country into just another industrial power with a declining birthrate and a self-defeating antagonism to the foreign born. It means defining down what America stands for, no matter what the cost to the American economy, its traditions and values and moral standing.

It's dangerous. It's not rational. But the argument on the restrictionist side isn't about being rational. It's about being afraid.

TAX:

Guilty Plea In Denver Tax Fraud Scheme (DENVERBIZ)

Denver Business Journal, June 21, 2006

A Wyoming businessman has pleaded guilty for his part in a tax fraud scheme that began in Denver.

Russell J. Brown pleaded guilty in federal court in Seattle to aiding and assisting in the filing of a false tax return for Paul Bekins, the former president and majority owner of a Seattle moving company.

Brown and Bekins were both members of Tower Executive Resources, a Denver-based organization that helped its members evade paying federal income taxes, according to the U.S. Department of Justice. The organization helped its members set up offshore bank accounts and corporations to hide income from the Internal Revenue Service.

Taxpayers paid as much as $50,000 to join Tower, the justice department alleged.

Bekins previously entered a guilty plea. He was sentenced last year to six months of house arrest, followed by 18 months of supervised release and 300 hours of community service. The Justice Department said Bekins listed his "other income" in 1999 as $77,515 when it was actually $2.6 million.

The government said Brown helped Bekins avoid paying $1.3 million in federal income taxes.

Brown will be sentenced later this year.

Two promoters of Tower, Paul D. Harris of Elizabeth, and Lester R. Retherford of Cañon City, were convicted after a six-week trial on charges of conspiring to defraud the United States. Harris was sentenced to five and a half years in prison, followed by three years of supervised release. Retherford was sentenced to four years in prison followed by three years of supervised release.

Businessman Charged With $20 Million Tax Fraud (AP)

AP, June 21, 2006

LOS ANGELES - A businessman who has donated hundreds of thousands of dollars to local colleges and nonprofits is accused of defrauding the government of more than $20 million in taxes.

Gene Haas, the 54-year-old owner of Oxnard-based Haas Automation, was arrested Monday for investigation of conspiracy, filing false tax returns and witness intimidation.

Charges filed by the U.S. Attorney's Office accuse him of orchestrating a plan to list $50 million in bogus expenses that could be written off as business costs and save the company $20 million in taxes. Haas, of Camarillo, was being held without bail.

Haas Automation, which makes computerized machine tools, said in a statement that Haas was not guilty and that the tax issues "revolve around" the company's former financial officer, John Phillips.

Last month, Haas Automation by default won a Ventura County Superior Court lawsuit accusing Phillips of cheating the company out of $27.5 million.

The transactions described in the lawsuit are among those listed in the federal indictment, said Peter Zierhut, a Haas Automation spokesman.

DOJ_NMG_0036592

Phillips, who is an unindicted coconspirator, went to the FBI. in April 2001 claiming Haas had ordered him to cheat the government out of more than $8.9 million in taxes, the Justice Department said.

The owner of Supermill Inc., a nonexistent Nevada company that allegedly issued fake bills to Haas Automation, agreed to plead guilty to two tax evasion charges, the Justice Department said.

Haas Automation's former general manager, Denis Dupuis, and a former salesman, Robert Cable, also were indicted in connection with the purported scheme.

The company, formed in 1983, employs 1,000 people and had revenues of more than $500 million last year, said Robert Murray, the firm's general manager.

The New York Times described the firm as the nation's largest computerized machine tool maker.

House GOP Settles For Less Than Full Repeal Of Estate Tax (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

Republican leaders announced yesterday that the House will vote this week on estate tax legislation that falls short of full repeal, conceding defeat on a philosophical issue that has been central to the GOP economic plank for more than a decade.

The bill, introduced by House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (Calif.), marks a major turnaround for congressional Republicans, who for years have made "Death to the death tax" a political battle cry.

Ending the estate tax has also been a priority for President Bush, who in 2001 won passage of legislation that gradually raises the exemption and lowers the tax rate on inheritances until the tax is eliminated in 2010. But when that legislation expires in 2011, the estate tax is scheduled to return to the level it stood at before Bush was elected.

The Senate has blocked any effort to fully repeal the estate tax. Under the House's compromise, which probably will come to a vote tomorrow, estates worth as much as $5 million -- $10 million for couples -- would be exempt from taxation indefinitely.

The tax rate on estates worth more than the exemption level up to $25 million would be set at the same tax rates that apply to capital gains -- now 15 percent but scheduled to rise to 20 percent in 2011. The rate for estates worth more than $25 million would be twice the capital gains rate. The bipartisan Joint Committee on Taxation estimated the estate tax cut would cost the government $279 billion over 10 years.

To lure Democratic senators from Washington state and Arkansas, Thomas included a lucrative tax break for the timber industry, pushing the total cost of the bill to nearly $280 billion.

Senior House Republicans conceded that a long-sought permanent repeal of the estate tax is now out of reach. And with the possibility that Republicans will lose Senate seats in the midterm elections in November, GOP tax writers decided to grab the most lucrative deal possible in case Republican power begins to ebb.

"The sales message is very simple," Thomas said. "Do you want to make a statement, or do you want to make law?"

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) conceded, "We need to do what is reality, what you can get done with the Senate."

Senators set the scramble for compromise in motion earlier this month when they fell three votes short of cutting off debate on legislation to permanently repeal the estate tax. That convinced the groups that have lobbied the issue for decades -- small-business groups, agriculture associations and extremely affluent families -- that the time had come to settle.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) took the unusual step last week of asking Thomas to intervene, hoping House passage of a generous compromise would create the momentum needed to attract 60 votes in the Senate required to cut off debate. Frist has promised a vote on a compromise next week.

But passage is anything but certain. Republicans probably have the votes in the House, but Democrats will use the debate this week to highlight what they see as a flagrant GOP tilt to the rich.

House Democrats plan to offer a minimum-wage increase -- the first since 1997 -- as the alternative to the estate tax bill.

The search for a compromise has pitted affluent small-business owners against the truly rich -- families with estates valued at tens of millions of dollars.

Thomas came down in favor of the business owners. His legislation would ensure that married couples could leave their children estates worth $10 million, untaxed. But the most wealthy families could face estate taxes as high as 40 percent. And to trim the cost of the package, Thomas repealed a provision in the tax code that allows families with large inheritances to deduct the cost of state-levied death taxes from the federal estate tax.

To the powerful families that have bankrolled the estate tax repeal movement, Thomas's compromise may be too much to swallow, suggested Frank A. Blethen, publisher of the family-owned Seattle Times newspaper and a longtime advocate of repealing the estate tax.

"If this bill is what it looks like, a 40 percent tax on larger businesses, that's not much of a deal," Blethen said. "It is a huge disappointment."

Knowing how tight the vote would be, Thomas included a narrowly tailored measure, sought by Washington state's two Democratic senators, to offer strapped timber companies a two-year tax break worth $940 million.

Spokesmen for the senators, Maria Cantwell and Patty Murray, said the legislation is still being studied.

Timber Becomes Tool In Effort To Cut Estate Tax (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 20 — In a new attempt to permanently reduce the estate tax on inherited wealth, House Republican leaders moved on Tuesday to win over crucial Democrats with a tax sweetener for timber companies.

Admitting that Congress would not be able to abolish the estate tax this year, House leaders unveiled a compromise that would stop just short of full repeal and would give the Senate another chance to take up the issue.

The latest proposal would eliminate the tax for all estates worth less than $5 million — up to $10 million for couples. That would cover more than 99.5 percent of estates, according to Congressional estimates. In addition, the compromise would reduce the tax rates on the few estates that would still be subject to a tax.

"We need to do what is reality, what you can get done with the Senate," said Representative J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, the House speaker. "We just want to bring death to the death tax."

The Republican-controlled House has already passed a bill that would permanently abolish the estate tax, which under current law is set to phase out gradually by 2010 and then return in full force in 2011. But in a crucial procedural vote on June 8, Senate Republicans came up 3 votes short of the 60 needed to limit debate and prevent a filibuster by Democrats. That vote forced Republicans to consider a compromise.

The House proposal is aimed at giving Senate Republican leaders another chance of passing legislation. Last week, Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, acknowledged that he could not pass a full repeal bill and would wait until the House voted on a new proposal before trying again in the Senate.

The House bill is similar to a compromise that Senate Republicans circulated two weeks ago, without success. But it includes a tax cut that would save timber companies about $900 million over the next three years, a new twist that could win as many as four more Democratic votes in the Senate.

The provision would reduce the corporate capital gains tax, which is assessed on sales of timber, to about 14 percent from 35 percent. Two of the timber industry's strongest advocates are the Democratic senators from Washington — Patty Murray and Maria Cantwell — who both voted with other Democrats against blocking a filibuster on the estate tax.

The Weyerhaeuser Corporation, the giant paper and forest products company, is based in Federal Way, Wash., and the state is a major timber-producing area.

Other Democratic Senators — Mark Pryor and Blanche Lincoln of Arkansas and Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana — were co-sponsors of a similar timber tax cut last year.

Ms. Lincoln voted with the Republicans to limit debate earlier this month, but Mr. Pryor and Ms. Landrieu refused to cross party lines.

"We are a railroad car attached to the main engine," said W. Henson Moore, president of the American Forest and Paper Association, which has been lobbying for the tax cut for more than a year.

Mr. Moore, a former congressman from Louisiana, said timber companies paid a capital gains tax of 35 percent on their profit from timber — a rate, he said, that is higher than rivals in other countries pay.

"It's extremely important to us," he said. "If something is not done, it could mean that a number of our companies divest their timberlands."

The Joint Committee on Taxation estimated that the new House proposal for reducing the estate tax would lower tax revenue by $280 million in the first five years after it became effective in 2011. Under current law, the estate tax is set to phase out gradually by 2010, but return in full force in 2011.

Though billed as a compromise, the measure would cost about three-quarters as much as full repeal of the estate tax. The timber provision in the measure is set to expire at the end of 2008, but industry executives fully intend it to be renewed regularly.

House Republicans vowed to pass the new bill before the end of this week. Mr. Frist said he wanted to pass a bill before lawmakers headed home for the Fourth of July recess.

But James Manley, a spokesman for Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Senate Democratic leader, said most Democrats would oppose the new compromise as vehemently as the previous proposals.

DOJ_NMG_0036594

"If there's a bill that is fiscally responsible and fair to the middle class, then we're for it," Mr. Manley said. "But this bill would cost well over $700 billion in the first 10 years after it takes effect and it would only benefit the wealthiest individuals and households."

IRS Collects Only 11% Of Fines On Tax Preparers (USAT)

By Kevin McCoy

USA Today, June 21, 2006

The IRS has collected little more than 10 cents of every dollar in fines it assessed since 2003 on tax preparers who made unsupported claims or egregious mistakes on clients' tax returns, its data show.

During the last three fiscal years, the IRS fined 528 tax preparers roughly $4.7 million for taking unsubstantiated deductions, cashing clients' tax refunds or other violations of tax laws.

But a USA TODAY review found the agency has so far collected about $518,000 of the penalties, or 11%. Roughly half the penalized preparers have paid nothing, while half have paid some or all their fines, according to the IRS.

The penalties largely represent cases the IRS handled administratively without court action.

Evidence of the low dollar collection rate — down slightly from the percentage found by a government review of prior years — surfaces amid concern that tax preparer mistakes, negligence and fraud may be rising as paid preparers complete more than 60% of individual tax returns.

Tax experts say the low rate, and tax law confidentiality restrictions that prevent the IRS from publicly identifying many penalized preparers, undercut the agency's efforts to crack down on problem preparers who cost the government millions of dollars in revenue. They also highlight limited IRS oversight.

“There's no deterrent effect if there's a one-in-10 chance of collecting a penalty,” said National Taxpayer Advocate Nina Olson, whose IRS office critiques the agency and helps taxpayers resolve problems. “You can build that into your business model as a cost of doing business.”

Congress is weighing legislation that could strengthen IRS oversight of tax preparers, in part by authorizing higher penalties. Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., the lead sponsor of the Senate bill, said “the opportunity for mistakes and abuse increases” as more Americans turn to preparers.

While defending his agency's efforts to stop problem tax preparers, Kevin Brown, commissioner of the IRS Small Business/Self-Employed Division, said, “I suspect we can do more with this, and do it better.”

“We have to be more rigorous to make sure we impose and collect fines, where appropriate,” he said.

IRS officials say they believe most of the nation's hundreds of thousands of tax preparers are honest and competent. However, a test by the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, found that five of 19 tax preparer offices checked in March by undercover agents produced federal tax returns with nearly $2,000 in unwarranted refunds. In two cases, the offices prepared returns that would have cost a taxpayer client a legitimate $1,500 refund.

Although the GAO cautioned that the results from the limited sampling could not be used to draw general conclusions about the retail tax preparation community, Brown said the findings “gave us pause.”

Olson said she doesn't suspect a significant increase in fraud or negligence by preparers. However, she said increasing use of tax software means “that literally anyone can get into the tax preparation business” without learning “anything about tax law,” posing a danger to taxpayer clients.

An estimated 600,000 so-called unenrolled tax preparers, who are largely unregulated and have no training requirements, worked in the USA as of 2003, according to an estimate by Olson's office. By law, the IRS has authority to penalize tax preparers who overstate legitimate tax deductions, fail to give clients a copy of their return, fail to sign the return, engage in reckless conduct or commit other tax law offenses. Penalties range from $50 to $1,000 per return, Brown said, depending on the severity of the offense.

The IRS says it is paying more attention to problem preparers, doubling the number of open cases during the last year. The emphasis came after the IRS told federal investigators in 2003 that other problems, such as targeting abusive tax schemes, were a higher priority.

Brown said in a recent interview that the fines in any given investigation may be low because the IRS generally reviews a small sampling of the tax returns produced by a preparer — enough to substantiate a case and enjoin the preparer from additional violations — then moves on to new investigations.

Even in cases when the IRS plans to impose and collect fines, the proposed penalties may be reduced based on evidence submitted by the tax preparer during an appeal process, or through litigation. The IRS may also write off the penalty as uncollectible if the preparer files for bankruptcy or is financially insolvent.

Alvin Brown, a former IRS attorney now in a private tax law practice, said at least some of the penalized preparers are "little guys in hand-to-mouth businesses" who cannot pay large fines without hardship.

A 2003 GAO report argued that "in assessing but not collecting these penalties, IRS may be sending preparers a mixed message about whether poor performance by preparers will be tolerated."

That report showed that the agency assessed approximately $2.4 million in penalties against tax preparers in 2001 and 2002, and collected roughly $291,000, or 12%. USA TODAY's review found that the overall dollar collection rate dipped lower during the ensuing three years, though it increased in 2004.

The percentage of preparers who paid at least some of the penalties rose from 44% for 2001-2002 to 50% for the next three years, the IRS said.

Kevin Brown said the dollar collection rates could rise as pending cases are closed and added to the statistics. Brown also said he plans to improve tracking of fines against tax preparers.

The IRS should take stronger action if it wants to show "they are protecting taxpayers," Olson said. She called on the agency to support proposals in which she and other tax experts have advocated universal registration of tax preparers, mandatory competency tests and a continuing education requirement on tax laws.

"This is an issue where it just makes sense to protect taxpayers at the front end" with stricter government regulation "and have appropriate penalties and collections on the back end," Olson said.

Current tax laws make it difficult for a taxpayer to find out whether a preparer has been penalized by the IRS. The same privacy shield that covers IRS interactions with taxpayers applies to tax preparers, unless IRS investigations escalate into civil or criminal court action. Citing the confidentiality restriction, the IRS declined to release any details of the cases that underlie the 2003-2005 fines.

Cono Namorato, a former head of the IRS Office of Professional Responsibility, said agency officials were often frustrated by confidentiality provisions of the tax code. "The fact that somebody was sanctioned, and we couldn't make that public, was a problem," he said.

The Senate measure would not lift the confidentiality restriction, though Bingaman said he would favor some form of public disclosure to protect taxpayers. The bill would mandate registration and competency testing for preparers, and would raise penalties for violations to as high as $5,000 per return.

Bingaman said he's hopeful that the proposed legislation, which has drawn bipartisan support from Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, and other Republicans, will win Senate approval this year. But the outlook in the House is less certain, he acknowledged.

Government licensing "has the potential to raise the (competency) bar. That's a good thing," Paul Cinquemani, director of government relations for the National Association of Tax Professionals, said of the Senate measure.

Still, he cautioned that licensing would not deter unscrupulous tax preparers.

"If the IRS enforced things better, it would have a chilling effect on some of the screwing around that's going on out there," Cinquemani said.

IRS Plans To Use Private Firms To Pursue Taxpayers This Year (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

Tax deadbeats who owe money to the Internal Revenue Service could be hearing from private debt-collection firms as soon as September.

IRS officials say they're resuming work on controversial plans to hire private firms to help collect large sums of unpaid taxes. The IRS said this week it received the green light to proceed with the project's first phase -- in which three firms will begin pursuing about 40,000 people -- when the Government Accountability Office, a congressional investigative agency, rejected challenges by companies not awarded IRS contracts.

But the program still faces heavy fire in Congress, and its long-term fate remains unclear. The House voted recently to block funding for the program in fiscal 2007, which starts on Oct. 1 of this year. The Senate hasn't yet acted.

Critics fear private debt-collection firms will trample on taxpayer rights and resort to questionable methods to collect unpaid taxes. They also say hiring collectors and paying them a percentage of what they collect will be far more expensive than relying on regular IRS workers. The House vote means "We are one giant step closer to saving hundreds of millions of dollars and safeguarding taxpayers' personal financial information from the grips of private, for-profit collection agencies," says Rep. Steve Rothman, a New Jersey Democrat who led the charge to strip the plan's funding.

IRS officials have promised to protect taxpayer rights. They say private collectors won't be allowed to threaten or intimidate. "Using private collection agencies would bring in extra money and help reduce the deficit," IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson said recently.

While tax collecting may sound like strictly a governmental function, many states have hired private firms over the years to help them collect tax debts, according to the GAO. In the mid-1990s, the IRS itself tried a small-scale pilot program involving private firms. But it dropped the program, partly because collections weren't as high as hoped. Then two years ago, amid growing concern about big budget deficits, Congress authorized the IRS to hire private firms.

A group representing debt collectors says fears about the program are misplaced. The IRS "is committed to hiring collection professionals who comply with a strict code of ethics and adhere to" safeguards in the law, says Rozanne Andersen, general counsel of ACA International, an association based in Edina, Minn., that represents the credit and collection industry. Taxpayers "are treated most fairly when nontaxpayers are encouraged to pay their fair share."

In this first phase of the project, the IRS is hiring three firms to begin pursuing about 40,000 people, each of whom owe the government $25,000 or less, says Nancy Mathis, an IRS spokeswoman. In each case, the person doesn't dispute owing the money, Ms. Mathis says.

The IRS plans eventually to hire as many as 10 firms by 2008, when the program will be fully operational, Ms. Mathis says. Over the course of 10 years, the IRS expects the private firms to help it collect an additional $1.4 billion in unpaid taxes.

Among the most vocal critics of the plan is the National Treasury Employees Union, which represents about 150,000 federal workers. * * *

BRIEFS: Estate- and gift-tax revenues surged to $19.14 billion during the eight months through May from $16.55 billion in the same period a year earlier, the Treasury Department says. ... IRS Commissioner Everson says he is "disappointed" by the overall IRS funding level set recently by the House. He says the bill falls $104.5 million short of the administration's proposed budget and that if it becomes law, would result in personnel reductions.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Approves A Pentagon Budget (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The House approved a $427.6 billion Pentagon budget after narrowly rejecting a bipartisan effort to curb funding for the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program within the U.S.

The amendment, which failed 219-207, touched off the fullest House debate on the secret surveillance since the existence of the program was revealed last fall.

Twenty-three Republicans, including House Government Reform Committee Chairman Tom Davis (R., Va.) broke ranks in support of the proposal, which directly challenged President Bush by proposing to bar funding for any electronic surveillance inside the U.S. that fails to comply with the court review required under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

To quell concerns in Congress, the White House has allowed more lawmakers to be briefed on the details of the surveillance, which the administration says is an effective tool in tracking calls between the U.S. and terrorist suspects overseas.

Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.), a top Democrat on military and intelligence issues, said he now felt "comfortable there are adequate safeguards" and House Intelligence Committee Chairman Peter Hoekstra (R., Mich.) pledged that he would hold a hearing this summer on a new legal framework for the program.

But the length and emotion of the House debate testified to the continued concern in Congress that the White House has been unilaterally circumventing the need to seek warrants under FISA. "I'm not satisfied with an argument that says, 'Trust us, we're from the government,'" said Rep. Adam Schiff (D., Calif.), a lead sponsor. And Rep. Jeff Flake (R., Ariz.) said "the acid test for Republicans on this has to be, would we be comfortable if a Democrat were in the White House using this authority. And I have to say I wouldn't be."

"What isn't allowed?" Mr. Flake asked, referencing administration testimony before the House Judiciary Committee. "If you're not going to use FISA, why not just run amok?"

The underlying defense bill, approved 407-19 last night, includes another $50 billion in emergency funds for military operations in Iraq, and passage comes even as the Senate will begin debate this afternoon on whether Congress should set some timetable to begin to pull American forces out of the country.

No one so far has attempted to actually limit funds, as the NSA amendment in the House proposed. But Democrats are pressing for some statement of policy that the administration should begin "a phased redeployment of U.S. forces."

Meanwhile, among domestic issues, Republicans are trying to shore up their fiscal credentials by moving new legislation to set up procedures at least to try to curb spending.

The House will vote this week on a measure giving the White House greater power to single out appropriations items to be cut. Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R., N.H.) won his panel's approval for a more ambitious agenda that envisions across-the-board cuts even in benefit programs such as Medicare and Medicaid if deficit targets aren't met.

Mr. Gregg's efforts could complicate matters for the administration, which would prefer the narrower focus of the House bill. In meeting with reporters, Mr. Gregg agreed the enhanced power sought by the White House would be a "useful tool for the administration to have," but he saw it as "moving deck chairs around," given the larger problem facing the budget from benefit programs.

Among Democrats, the most immediate domestic priority is the party's drive to force action in Congress before the November election on an increase in the federal minimum wage. Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.) hopes to show at least 50 votes today for a proposed $2.10-an-hour increase spread over three years. And despite continued resistance from their leadership, House Republicans say that the House will also have to vote on the issue before the election.

Flake Strikes At Earmark Of Hastert's (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, June 21, 2006

Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) escalated his anti-earmark crusade yesterday by attempting to strip a request by Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) out of a defense appropriations bill.

Flake offered an amendment designed to kill a $2.5 million provision intended for a technology organization created by one of Hastert's former aides. The amendment, one of about 10 he offered, was expected to fail miserably as of press time.

The earmark is for the Illinois Technology Transition Center, a program established late last year through a partnership between the Pentagon and a private outfit run by Thomas V. Thornton, a former policy director for Hastert in the early '90s. Neither Thornton nor Hastert's office replied to requests for comment on the earmark.

The center was designed to find technology companies in Illinois that could fulfill the needs of the Defense Department's Office of Naval Research (ONR).

"This is a win-win for entrepreneurs and ONR," Thornton said when the center won its initial $1.3 million in funding last October.

Flake said yesterday that he did not realize the earmark was one of Hastert's when he decided to fight it on the floor, but knowing that the top House GOP leader had requested the funding didn't change Flake's plans.

"I don't want to avoid someone just because they're in a leadership position," Flake said yesterday.

Hastert's earmarking record has come under scrutiny in the past week. The Sunlight Foundation and several media outlets reported that Hastert turned a profit of at least $1.5 million on a land deal several miles from a proposed highway he secured more than $200 million for last year.

The amendment demonstrated a new height of boldness on Flake's part, and it served to fan the flames of those determined to crack down on lawmakers' propensity to load bills with millions in federal money directly to their home states and districts for pet projects.

Flake has riled some colleagues this year by forcing recorded votes on appropriations earmarks, but this is the first time he has taken his fight to the top elected leader in the chamber.

Even critics of the amendment conceded that Flake demonstrated devotion to principle by treating Hastert's earmark like any others; yesterday he offered several amendments to prohibit the use of funds for various provisions.

Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), an appropriator who supported Hastert's request on the floor yesterday, said Flake's effort could be characterized as either a "principled approach" or "a strong showing of stupidity."

"I think he's doing it on principle," LaHood said.

He defended the earmark as a necessary link between the Pentagon and local technology companies that would benefit the country's national defense and said the debate would demonstrate that many earmarks are vetted well.

"It shows that these earmarks have value," LaHood said. "It gives an opportunity to justify a program."

Rep. Mike Simpson (R-Idaho), another appropriator, agreed.

"I don't think it's necessarily very smart politically," Simpson remarked.

Earmark defenders, including Hastert, say that lawmakers, not civil servants, should determine where federal funds are spent in their home states and districts.

Some lawmakers and aides were shocked by Flake's decision to go forward with an amendment targeting one of Hastert's earmark requests.

DOJ_NMG_0036598

"I've never seen that before," said Rep. John Murtha (Pa.), the senior Democratic defense appropriator and another Flake target. "I can't imagine what he's doing."

Flake's allies praise him for picking earmarks regardless of the sponsor's status. His anti-earmark battle has targeted backbenchers and committee chairmen alike.

"I would be more worried if no leadership earmarks were" targeted, said Keith Ashdown, vice president for policy at Taxpayers for Common Sense, which tracks and often criticizes congressional earmarks.

But some lawmakers said Flake could pay a political price for his earmark-striking crusade, even if he does not suffer direct punishment from GOP leaders.

"The retribution comes not in terms of sanctions," Simpson said. "It comes in terms of your own credibility. People walk in and see 'Flake amendment' and say no. They don't even ask what it is."

But longtime critics of congressional earmarks say Flake is making a courageous stand.

"Representative Flake is doing the Lord's work," Ashdown said. "He's doing what millions of people want."

Lawmakers who oppose Flake's effort pointed out early in the day that he would not be successful.

"It's a dead end. It's not going anywhere," LaHood said. "It's on a collision course with defeat."

As for Hastert, Flake said he would prefer not to know whose earmarks he is targeting.

"I've told my staff, 'Please don't tell me.' It might dissuade me," he said.

Senate Budget Panel Approves Spending Curbs (AP-Y2)

By Andrew Taylor

AP2, June 21, 2006

In an election-year bid to polish their credentials as fiscal conservatives in an election year, Senate Republicans on Tuesday advanced a bill designed to force cuts in the spiraling growth of federal benefit programs while also reviving the line-item veto.

The measure, written by Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, R-N.H., and approved by that panel by a 12-10 party-line vote, combines several ideas aimed at putting the brakes on spending. Most striking, the bill would force mandatory cuts to the deficit, enforced by across-the-board cuts to benefit programs such as Medicare, Medicaid and unemployment insurance if Congress can't meet deficit targets on its own.

"This bill renews and re-energizes the budget process to bring enforceable discipline to federal spending," Gregg said.

Gregg acknowledged that his bill won't pass the full Senate, and Republicans seem to welcome the prospect of a filibuster by Democrats. That would allow them to accuse Democrats of being weak on controlling spending while sparing Republican moderates from having to vote on the bill's more controversial elements.

Democrats criticized the measure as overreaching in its attack on benefit programs. But the measure pleases Republicans' core political supporters, who have been disappointed by the party's performance on spending.

"If it passes, that's wonderful. If we simply have the debate, that's wonderful," said tax-cut activist Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform. "That's the perfect issue."

The bill revives the idea of the line-item veto as requested by President Bush, though in a much weaker form than passed by Congress in 1996 and struck down by the Supreme Court two years later. The new version would allow the president to single out wasteful items contained in bills he signs into law, and it would require Congress to vote on those items again.

Under the proposal, it would take a simple majority in both House and Senate to approve the items over the president's objections. The old line-item veto allowed the president to strike items from appropriations and tax bills and required a two-thirds margin of both House and Senate to override a veto.

The House is slated to vote on a similar line-item veto plan Thursday and GOP leaders were scrambling Tuesday to assemble the votes to pass the bill.

Gregg, however, vowed not to break off his line-item veto plan for a separate vote.

The bill also revives the Gramm-Rudman mechanism of setting hard deficit targets and requiring across-the-board cuts if they are not met. Unlike the Gramm-Rudman law, the across-the-board cuts apply to benefit programs such as Medicare, welfare and unemployment insurance instead of annual budgets of Cabinet agencies such as the Defense Department.

Panel OKs Spending Controls (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036599

The Senate Budget Committee yesterday voted 12-10 along party lines to approve a stringent spending control bill that would require Congress to achieve a nearly balanced budget by 2012, but Republican leadership aides said the legislation faces a tough uphill battle in the full Senate.

The bill would reinstate spending disciplines, including caps on non-entitlement programs, that helped balance the budget in the 1980s and 1990s. It would require the White House to order across-the-board spending cuts in every program but Social Security if Congress did not achieve the deficit-reduction goals.

The committee rejected an amendment by Democrats that would have reinstated required offsets to tax cuts and new spending programs, though former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan and other budget analysts said the policy helped Congress take control over the deficit in the 1990s.

Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican and author of the bill, acceded to another Democratic proposal to modify a key mechanism designed to force Congress to vote on reforms of fast-growing entitlement programs such as Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security.

The change would require 60 votes in the Senate, rather than a simple majority of 51, for approval of any entitlement reforms recommended by a bipartisan commission to be set up under the legislation. Committee Republicans upheld a requirement that Congress vote on the commission's proposed spending cuts under expedited procedures.

"Congress is not making tough choices because the system is broken," said Sen. Michael D. Crapo, Idaho Republican, noting that Congress fought hard last year to produce a modest entitlement-reform bill with $39 billion in savings -- a fraction of what would be needed to eliminate deficits averaging more than $300 billion a year.

"We'd have the tools to get past the procedural hurdles" that have prevented Republicans in Congress from gaining control over spending, he said. "This bill gives us a chance to have some fiscal restraint."

Democrats said Republicans were abdicating their responsibility to get the budget under control and trying to "outsource" that job to an unelected commission, while trying to jury-rig legislative procedures to ensure passage of unpopular Republican proposals such as the partial privatization of Social Security and deep cuts in health care and veterans programs.

"Republicans have rejected the one device that proved successful at reducing the deficit" between 1991 and 2000, said Sen. Kent Conrad, North Dakota Democrat and author of the Democratic alternative. Meanwhile, they have corrupted a budget process that was designed to reduce deficits in order to pass tax-cutting bills that have added $1.7 trillion to the deficit since 2001, he said.

A Republican aide said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, may have trouble getting agreement to bring up a bill with such broad provisions on the Senate floor next month without raising objections from both Republican and Democratic members of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. Frist may break the bill into smaller increments that have better chances of passing, including one providing the president with authority to veto individual items in tax and spending bills.

Mr. Gregg and Mr. Conrad also said they were working to cobble together a bipartisan bill that would include seven or eight items on which both parties could agree.

Gregg Shifts Formula For Line-Item Veto (RC)

By Robert Rosenbaum

Roll Call, June 21, 2006

The Senate Budget Committee met Tuesday to mark up the Stop Over-Spending Act of 2006, a package aimed at reining in federal spending proposed by Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.).

The package includes items ranging from discretionary spending caps that would limit emergency spending measures to a line-item veto provision for the president with an expedited rescission process for Congressional response.

Among the most hotly contested issues were a provision to create an Entitlement Solvency Commission, made up of people outside of Congress, and presidential line-item veto power.

In a 12-10 vote along partisan lines, the act passed without any formal amendments. Eight amendments were proposed, most by Democrats.

The line-item veto provision was quite different from one recently proposed by the Bush administration. The new provision is a stronger version than Bush's proposal and requires Congressional affirmation for any rescission proposed by the president.

Gregg made one major concession to Sen. Kent Conrad (N.D.) and his fellow Democrats on the committee, requiring a 60 percent vote in each chamber for any presidential rescission instead of the originally proposed simple majority.

The major changes to the Bush administration's version of the line-item veto provisions include first, that the rescission savings must be used for deficit reduction. Second, the president is allowed only four rescission packages a year (one of which will be with the president's budget and the other three at his discretion). Third, the president can resubmit only one rescission that already was included in a package of rescissions rejected by Congress. And finally, the president may suspend funds from his recommended rescissions for 45 days. If Congress rejects this before the 45-day limit, the president may release the funds earlier.

No official date has been set for a Senate vote on the S.O.S. Act, but Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) has indicated it will likely come before the end of the year.

Stop Federal Overspending (WT)

By Judd Gregg

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

If Capt. Renault stepped into today's Senate instead of Rick's Cafe in 1941 Casablanca, he would feel quite at home. He would observe"I'mshocked, SHOCKED, to find that deficit spending is going on in here!"

Simply put, the federal budget process is ailing. In fact, it is on life support. The Budget Enforcement Act of 1990, which provided real teeth in the budget process, expired in 2002. Furthermore, because of a lack of will to control spending, Congress has failed to adopt a budget resolution for three of the past five years.

Each year, Congress embraces score-keeping gimmicks to get around any limitations. Site-specific earmarks and non-peer-reviewed projects are increasing -- last year's highway bill being a poster child for unrestricted projects.

The part of the budget called "mandatory" spending continues to grow much faster than inflation. Twenty years ago, entitlements comprised 45 percent of the budget; today, they will soon exceed 60 percent. Medicare alone is growing by almost 10 percent per year. Based on forecasted economic growth, demographics and program benefits, just three entitlement programs -- Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security -- if left unchanged will consume 20 percent of the economy in 30 years. That may not sound alarming until one realizes that the entire U.S. government -- including functions ranging from health care to defense to border security -- consumes 20 percent of the gross domestic product.

Some might speculate that this is just business as usual. It is not. Never in U.S. history have we had to face so many claimants for funds and unfunded IOU's. As the Baby Boom generation retires, older Americans will be handing younger Americans their bills. We are recklessly undermining the future of our children and our grandchildren.

Clearly, spending is out of control and Congress needs to regain fiscal discipline over this runaway train.

Last week, I, along with 24 other cosponsors, introduced the Stop Over-Spending Act. This commonsense and fiscally responsible bill proposes tough measures to force Congress and the Bush administration to adhere to a disciplined budget process. It ends the free pass to spend and re-establishes a real, transparent and straightforward budget.

First, the SOS bill reinstates discretionary spending caps in law. If Congress exceeds these limits, then the overage must be offset by an across-the-board reduction.

Second, the SOS bill eliminates "shadow budgets," otherwise knows as emergency spending. It limits the misuse of emergency spending by building in reasonable assumptions of emergency spending into the discretionary caps.

Third, the SOS bill requires the deficit to be measured and considered as its share of economy, the GDP, and requires the deficit to decline from 2.75 percent of GDP next year to .05 percent of GDP by 2012.

What happens if these deficit targets are not achieved? Then congressional committees are required to "reconcile" and write laws to achieve savings. If these committees do not make the tough decisions, then an across-the-board sequester of entitlement programs kicks in.

Sound familiar? It should. SOS is modeled on the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings approach, but it is strengthened and updated to deal with the budget realities of this millennium. It requires entitlement programs that are causing the deficit to be accountable.

Fourth, SOS includes a line-item veto/expedited rescission process to allow the president to identify wasteful spending and to get an up-or-down vote without amendment. Forty-three state governors have line-item veto authority. A Republican Congress gave Bill Clinton this authority in 1996. Unfortunately, the courts negated that action. SOS redrafts this reform in a way to withstand challenges.

Fifth, the SOS bill creates a commission to identify and eliminate agency duplication and programs that have outlived their usefulness, as well as a commission to ensure the solvency of entitlement programs.

No budget process changes can force the president and members of Congress to have the willpower to make tough decisions. But a transparent, tough and honest budget process can help. The Stop Over-Spending Act can take us a long way toward achieving real budgets and effective budget discipline.

It is time to get serious about spending restraint and resurrect the budget process to protect future generations and ensure that we hand our children, and our children's children, a government they can afford.

Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican is chairman of the Senate Budget Committee.

The 'Pay-As-You-Go' Ruse (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

Democrats in Congress unveiled their 2006 campaign agenda last week, laying claim to the mantle of "fiscal responsibility." The GOP's spendthrifts have handed them this political opening, which makes it all the more disappointing that Democrats are falling back on an old confidence trick.

Their ruse goes by the name of "pay-as-you-go" budgeting, which has the political virtue of sounding as if spending won't be able to exceed revenue. Their Web site, HouseDemocrats.gov, claims that pay-as-you-go policy "means that spending increases, as well as tax cuts, need to be offset by cuts in other areas -- like fewer corporate tax breaks."

A three-card monte dealer in Times Square couldn't have said it better. Paygo rules, to use the Beltway argot, were in place from 1990 until they expired in 2002, so we know how they work. And in practice all they really do is constrain tax cuts, not new spending.

That's because paygo rules apply only to new or expanded entitlement programs, not to those that already exist and grow automatically with user demand. Thus spending for Medicare, growing this year at an astounding 15% annual rate, would continue to run on autopilot. Ditto for Medicaid. So-called "discretionary" programs (education, Defense) that Congress approves each year are also exempt. Democrats somehow forget to disclose that those notorious "earmarks" stuffed into spending bills are also exempt from paygo.

The real game here is to make tax cutting all but impossible. Under paygo, tax cuts must be offset with either other tax increases or entitlement cuts. This usually means pitting tax cuts against cuts in the likes of Medicare, which is a very hard political sale. Paygo rules are one reason the 2001 tax cut was so paltry and phased-in and thus economically ineffective. Had paygo still been in force, the 2003 tax cuts that have done so much to spur growth and increase federal revenues would never have passed.

Another myth is that paygo was crucial to eliminating the budget deficit during the Clinton years. In fact, deficits remained high until the GOP took Congress in 1994 and, for a rare couple of years, actually reduced the growth rate of spending. Defense spending also fell by a full two-percentage-points of GDP during the 1990s. Paygo did little to restrain the appetite for new entitlements, as Democrats began their push for the Medicare prescription drug benefit long before the 2000 election.

The House Democratic agenda promises "a new direction for America." But when it comes to paygo and fiscal policy, the only change is their political marketing.

Time's Running Out For 527 Reform (HILL)

By Edward Kangas And Charles Kolb

The Hill, June 21, 2006

Every politician knows money is the mother's milk of politics. However, unregulated political contributions have the potential to undermine voters' confidence and involvement in our participatory democracy. When campaign spending rules favor special interests and the very wealthy, small contributors stop donating, voters stay home and the public loses faith in its elected officials.

With just months remaining before the midterm elections, the House of Representatives passed legislation that would regulate 527 organizations and included the legislation as part of the recently passed lobbying reform package. Now the Senate has an opportunity to show its support for reforming the campaign-finance system and restore public confidence in a system that many perceive to be dysfunctional, polarizing and unfair.

Recent attention has focused on legislators' reactions to the Jack Abramoff scandal and calls for outlawing more favors and gifts. But if Congress is serious about real change, it also needs to regulate 527s and other political funding mechanisms that attempt to corrupt the system.

As most of us learned during the 2004 presidential campaign, a 527 is a tax-exempt organization named after a section of the U.S. tax code. Many of these groups are created to influence the nomination, election, appointment or defeat of candidates for public office. Under current law, however, 527s are not regulated by the Federal Election Commission (FEC). That's a serious problem, not just for November 2006 but, more important, for the 2008 presidential campaigns. The adage "bad money drives out good" is as true in politics as it is in the marketplace.

Enactment of the Bipartisan Campaign Finance Reform Act (BCRA) in 2002 ended the soft-money shakedown of business executives by candidates and party officials, but just when business leaders thought it was safe to leave their wallets at home, 527s formed, raised hundreds of millions of dollars in unregulated donations and became the new recipients of most soft money contributions.

During the 2004 presidential campaign, the lack of oversight allowed Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, Texans for Truth and other partisan political organizations and individuals to spend more than $400 million of unregulated soft money to influence and hijack the election. Fortunately, most corporations had the good sense not to become involved in the 527 game.

The bill regulating 527s that was passed by the House is a big step in the right direction. If we are serious about eliminating soft money in our campaign system, Congress needs to adhere to the following three provisions recommended by the Committee for Economic Development (CED), an independent, business-led research organization that has been instrumental in bringing the voice of business leaders to the debate over campaign-finance reform:

· First, all 527s that spend money to influence federal elections should be required to register as political committees with the FEC. By requiring these 527s to be bound by FEC regulations, Congress will eliminate the current loophole that permits the groups to avoid limits on the sources and amounts of allowable contributions.

· Second, all Section 527 groups that broadcast advertisements that promote, support, attack or oppose a federal candidate should be required to pay for such ads only with money raised from individuals under federal contribution limits. No corporate or labor union contributions should be used for this purpose.

· Third, if a group maintains both federal and nonfederal campaign accounts to support voter-registration drives and similar activities, at least half of the costs for such activities must be funded with "hard money" contributions.

Taken together, these new rules would put an end to many of the offensive and unfair political activities voters were subjected to in 2004.

However, even the best-written rules are only as effective as their enforcement. To realize the full benefits of campaign-finance reform, the FEC needs to be streamlined and strengthened, making it as valuable to the regulation of sound campaign practices as the Securities and Exchange Commission is to the regulation of sound business practices.

It is clear legislation is needed now more than ever. When ordered by a U.S. District Court judge either to set new rules for 527s or explain how 527s will be regulated under current rules, the FEC opted not to set new regulation. This despite a dissenting vote from FEC Chairman Michael Toner, who stated the decision set the stage for "527s to once again spend hundred of millions of dollars in soft money" to affect the midterm elections and the 2008 presidential race.

It's not enough for Congress just to fight for principles of good governance, as it has rightly done in the case of corporate accounting scandals. Congress must live up to those same principles it expects the business community to abide by, transparency and accountability, in how it regulates campaigns.

The bigger prize is the 2008 presidential campaign. New limits on 527s and a stronger FEC will encourage even more individuals to help finance the political campaigns of interest to them. This will lead to not only greater confidence in our political system but also greater diversity and participation. For a democratic republic like ours, there can be no more important endeavor or admirable goal.

Kangas is the retired chairman of Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu and co-chairman of the Committee for Economic Development's subcommittee on campaign finance. Kolb is president of the Committee for Economic Development, an independent, nonpartisan, Washington-based organization of over 200 business and education leaders.

A Graduate So Happy, He Hugged The Speaker (NYT)

By Julia C. Mead

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

Gabriel Whitney says he did not plan to nearly suffocate President Bush in a bear hug. In fact, he did not plan to hug him at all.

But when Mr. Whitney, one of 202 midshipmen to graduate from the United States Merchant Marine Academy in Kings Point, N.Y., on Monday, stepped forward to receive his diploma, it just sort of happened. Call it irrational exuberance. But after six years of undergraduate school and 4,872 demerits, Mr. Whitney, 25, of Nashua, N.H., could hardly restrain himself.

With more reason than most to be overjoyed, the 6-foot-7 midshipman stepped onto the stage to accept his degree and hugged Vice Adm. Joseph D. Stewart, the academy's superintendent. Then he raised both arms in a victorious salute as his classmates roared their approval.

Elated and with his arms still upraised, he turned toward President Bush, who had just delivered the commencement address.

Mr. Bush, wearing a quizzical expression, responded by raising his arms as well and moved in for a hug. The midshipman — almost unwittingly — found himself squeezing the president in his powerful arms. When the president caught his breath, he shook Mr. Whitney's hand.

"I said, 'You're the man! Thank you very much,' " Mr. Whitney said in a telephone interview yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0036603

"The president thought the big bear hug was funny," said Dana M. Perino, a White House spokeswoman. "He appreciates the terrific enthusiasm of our nation's graduates, and he was honored to be the first president to address the Merchant Marine Academy. It was quite a thrill for everyone."

Mr. Whitney's sister, who works in an advertising office, had designed T-shirts for the 15 family members who attended the ceremony. Mr. Whitney's many difficulties in reaching graduation were emblazoned on the front of the shirt: 4,872 demerits ("painful"); four and a half years on academic restriction ("wounding"); two visits to the committee that weighs student expulsions ("agonizing"); two reprieves from the admiral ("necessary"); and six years of school with only an undergraduate degree to show for it ("humbling").

The back of the shirt, which bore a photograph of the midshipman and the American flag, celebrated his crowning achievement: "Passing all licensing exams, first try: Priceless."

Reached in New Hampshire, his grandmother, Alberta Whitney, said that some of the 4,400 people in the audience took pictures of the T-shirts, front and back.

"We were very happy to pose," she said. "We are so proud of Gabriel. He's a wonderful, wonderful boy."

The day after graduation, Mr. Whitney said he had no immediate plans but one long-term goal: "I plan to achieve greatness someday, though I'm not exactly sure yet how I'm going to do it."

For now, he is relaxing and basking in the attention that his widely publicized hug has garnered.

"I'm trying not to think farther than the next couple of days," he said, adding with a chuckle, "It's been kind of a long trip."

Senators To Propose New Safety Tactics For FDA (WSJ)

By Anna Wilde Mathews

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The leaders of the Senate committee that oversees the Food and Drug Administration plan to unveil legislation that would substantially change how the agency reviews medications.

The bill is being prepared by Michael Enzi, the Wyoming Republican who heads the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions, and its ranking Democrat, Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts. The two lawmakers' views are particularly important as Congress prepares to consider legislation next year to renew the industry-user fees that fund many of the FDA's operations.

The drug-safety bill prepared by Sens. Kennedy and Enzi is keyed to that user-fee renewal, and would likely depend on increases in the fees. Details could change before the final version emerges in the next several weeks. The senators aim to get a vote on the bill this year, but if that doesn't happen in the abbreviated election-year Congress, it could provide a framework for drug-safety provisions in next year's user-fee legislation.

Mr. Enzi said the bill would "raise the bar to ensure that safety is not an afterthought, but a given" and "restore public confidence in the FDA's process of reviewing the benefits and risks of prescription drugs." Mr. Kennedy said the bill would give the agency "a complete set of tools to address the safety of drugs post-approval, including giving the FDA authority to require post-approval labeling changes and safety studies."

Though drug makers may object to aspects of the bill, they are under pressure to back some drug-safety changes. In a statement, the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America said the organization can't fully comment on the bill because it hasn't been formally introduced, but that drugs already are "subject to rigorous safety and effectiveness reviews" by the FDA.

An FDA spokeswoman said it "welcomes additional ideas on improving oversight of drug safety," and the agency has safety initiatives already under way.

Other drug-safety bills also have emerged. Legislation co-sponsored by Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley (R., Iowa) and Sen. Christopher Dodd (D., Conn.) would restructure the agency, creating a FDA center focused on the safety of drugs already on the market and granting the agency substantial new powers.

The latest bill is expected to require the FDA to have a plan for evaluating and mitigating the potential risks of every drug it approves, congressional staff members said. The plan would have to be re-evaluated at least once a year for the first three years a drug is on the market.

The bill also would give the FDA new authority to ensure the safety of drugs, which could be used as part of the risk-mitigation plans. Drug manufacturers would be able to go through an FDA dispute-resolution procedure if they object to the agency's proposed risk-mitigation strategies. The plans could include requirements that drug makers do studies or keep registries after their medicines go on the market; limit direct-to-consumer advertising or impose disclosure requirements on it; and limit use or distribution of a drug.

Currently, the FDA sometimes uses such tactics for drugs seen as risky, but the agency typically has to use the leverage it has over drug approval to negotiate the restrictions with manufacturers. Its authority to impose them isn't clear-cut. The bill would amp up the regulators' power by giving the FDA a new ability to impose fines on companies that don't adhere to the risk-mitigation plans.

The bill also would require drug makers to register their clinical trials in a public government database and make the results of the advanced studies public. It would authorize some resources for an FDA effort to spearhead research on drug evaluation.

Senators Prepare To Unveil New Drug Safety Proposals (NYT)

By Gardiner Harris

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 20 — After more than a year of quiet negotiations, two influential senators are expected within weeks to introduce a legislative proposal that could drastically change how drugs are tested and approved in the United States.

The senators, Michael B. Enzi, Republican of Wyoming and chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, the ranking Democrat on the committee, still refuse to speak about the proposal, representatives for both said.

But committee staff members have for weeks been showing legislative talking points to drug industry representatives, scientists and others on Capitol Hill to help tailor the proposed legislation and build support for it.

In broad terms, the bill would require that drug makers disclose the results of all large human tests of their drugs, known as Phase 3 and Phase 4 trials; create a detailed risk management plan to uncover and control any safety problems that arise after a drug is approved; and pay penalties if they fail to follow through with this plan, according to four experts who were briefed on the proposals.

The experts spoke on condition that their names not be used because they had told members of the senators' staffs that they would not talk publicly about the proposals.

A spokeswoman for the Food and Drug Administration, Susan Bro, said the agency had not yet reviewed the proposed legislation. She said the agency had already undertaken "a number of initiatives" to improve itself.

"We always welcome additional ideas on improving oversight of drug safety," Ms. Bro said.

The senators plan to introduce the bill before Congress recesses in August, those briefed on the proposal said.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa and chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and Senator Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, have offered legislation similar in some respects to the Enzi-Kennedy proposal. But Mr. Enzi presides over the committee that has direct oversight of the drug agency, and Mr. Kennedy has specialized in health legislation for decades. Their imprimatur carries great weight on bills dealing with the agency.

It is unlikely that Congress will act on the proposal before the November election, and any action may be delayed until 2007, when Congress must reauthorize the formula by which the F.D.A. receives tens of millions of dollars in fees from drug makers. The Enzi-Kennedy proposal calls for an increase in those fees to pay for greater oversight of drug safety by the agency, before and after a medicine is approved. How such an increase could be approved apart from next year's reauthorization is unclear.

Daniel E. Troy, a former general counsel of the drug agency who now represents drug companies, said it would be a mistake for Congress to combine the Enzi-Kennedy proposal with next year's negotiations over extending the fees.

"If what we hear is true," Mr. Troy said, "my concern is that these issues are too complex to get mixed up with the reauthorization of the Prescription Drug User Fee Act."

Dr. Sidney M. Wolfe, director of health research for the consumer advocacy group Public Citizen, said he was encouraged by some of the Enzi-Kennedy proposals, particularly one that would exact monetary penalties from drug makers who fail to follow through on their own drug safety promises.

"There really is a crisis at the F.D.A.," Dr. Wolfe said.

The proposals come after a series of drug withdrawals led agency critics and some on Capitol Hill to suggest that the agency was failing in its mission to protect the public from dangerous drugs. Since 2000, pharmaceutical companies have withdrawn 10 drugs after deaths and injuries demonstrated that the medicines were unsafe.

In addition, the agency has only recently learned that widely prescribed antidepressants can cause some children and teenagers to become suicidal; that hugely popular pain pills are likely to increase the risk of heart attacks; and that commonly used antipsychotic drugs and stimulants may be more dangerous than was previously known.

Just Who Is 'Disgruntled'? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036605

An article on the congressional midterm elections ("Midterm Tea Leaves Signal Hot Water for Republicans," page one, June 6) makes a false assumption about our seniors. The article states: "In all these [regional] areas, seniors are disgruntled about the new Medicare prescription-drug benefit."

Disgruntled? Medicare reports that seniors are saving an average of $1,100 a year with prescription-drug coverage, and recent polls have shown that nearly 80% of seniors are happy with their coverage plan. Does this sound "disgruntled" to you?

Seniors are seeing real savings under Medicare Part D. Unlike the Democrats and shadow organizations content to play politics with our seniors' health, Republicans have worked tirelessly to help seniors sign up and save. I firmly believe that come November, seniors will reward the Republican majority for finally delivering on the long-overdue promise of affordable prescription drug coverage.

Drug Prices Up Sharply This Year (NYT)

By Milt Freudenheim
The New York Times, June 21, 2006

Prices of the most widely used prescription drugs rose sharply in this year's first quarter, just as the new Medicare drug coverage program was going into effect, according to separate studies issued yesterday by two large consumer advocacy groups.

AARP, which represents older Americans, said prices charged by drug makers for brand-name pharmaceuticals jumped 3.9 percent, four times the general inflation rate during the first three months of this year and the largest quarterly price increase in six years.

Price increases for some of the most popular brand-name drugs were much steeper; the sleeping pill Ambien was up 13.3 percent, and the best-selling cholesterol drug, Lipitor, was up 4.7 to 6.5 percent, depending on dosage.

Over all, AARP said, higher prices mean that the cost of providing brand-name drugs to the typical older American, who takes four prescription medicines daily, rose by nearly $240 on average over the 12-month period that ended on March 31.

"When the manufacturers' wholesale prices increase, it gets passed through the system, regardless of who the final purchaser is," said John Rother, the policy director of AARP. Although the drug industry's main trade association challenged the accuracy of the AARP survey, a separate study, by Families USA, a patient advocacy group, found similar inflation rates among brand-name drug prices. While the higher prices have a general impact on the drug-taking public, consumer advocates said the higher prices have special implications for Medicare, which Congress barred from negotiating prices with drug makers when lawmakers devised the new so-called Part D drug program.

Commercial insurers, which are offering the drug insurance plans under Medicare's auspices, do have negotiating power. And they say that by switching to generic drugs, consumers can avoid most of the price increases.

The surveys measured manufacturers' wholesale prices, which would not necessarily reflect any discounts insurers might be able to negotiate.

But even so, the price increases in the Medicare drug plans since they began were identical in many cases with the jump in wholesale prices, Families USA said.

Some health care economists said the price increases, if they continued, could have a devastating effect on the new Medicare drug program.

"Higher drug prices may lead to higher premiums next year, which may discourage enrollees from joining or staying in the program, and fewer enrollees could drive premiums even higher," said Stephen W. Schondelmeyer, a University of Minnesota economist who specializes in drug industry issues.

Mr. Schondelmeyer said one clear indication of the inflation's impact could be seen among the six million low-income elderly and disabled people who previously received drug coverage through Medicaid but were automatically switched to the Part D program when it began in January.

That shift was a windfall for drug makers, he said. "Medicaid would have paid 25 to 30 percent less under the old system, including rebates from the manufacturers, than the new Medicare Part D program is paying."

Ron Pollock, the executive director of Families USA, offered another way to gauge the federal impact. The federal Department of Veterans Affairs, which is able to negotiate prices with pharmaceutical makers, is paying 46 percent less for the most popular brand-name drugs than the average prices posted by the Medicare plans for the same drugs, Mr. Pollack said.

DOJ_NMG_0036606

Peter Ashkenaz, a Medicare spokesman, said enrollees in the Part D program could obtain a broad range of drugs as well as "personalized help in finding less costly drugs." He said many enrollees were in drug plans with "flat co-pays, which protects them from changes in pricing."

The first quarter of the year is typically the time when drug makers make many of their annual price increases. The industry did not comment on this year's increases, other than to question the accuracy of the AARP survey.

The drug industry's trade group, the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers Association, said in a statement that the AARP conclusions were "erroneous," because consumer drug prices had increased less than 2 percent since Jan. 1. The group, though, was citing a federal Bureau of Labor Statistics report that combines prices for brand-name and lower-priced generic drugs, as well as various "medical supplies."

Paul Fitzhenry, a spokesman for Pfizer, which makes Lipitor, pointed the finger at health insurers, which he said were increasing their drug payment charges to members faster than drug makers were raising their prices.

"There has been a huge disconnect between changes to our prices and increases to consumers' out-of-pocket costs for medicines," he said. "Between 2001 and 2005, our compound annual average net price increase was 3.3 percent per year. During that same time, the average co-payment charged by insurers for brand-name pharmaceuticals has increased at an annual rate of 11.1 to 15.5 percent," he said, citing a Kaiser Family Foundation 2005 survey.

Mohit Ghose, a spokesman for the American Association of Health Plans, a insurance trade group, said the insurers were actually reducing drug spending increases by promoting lower-cost generics instead of brand-name drugs.

Mark Green, a spokesman for Sanofi-Aventis, which makes Ambien, said the drug was "priced more competitively than some other products in the sleep category." He added, "We make every effort to price our prices competitively, relative to the value they provide to patients."

Private Contracts Take Beating In Report (LAT)

By Heather Gehlert

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration has greatly expanded the use of contracts with private companies to provide public goods and services even as the number of government employees has increased, a congressional report has found.

But the administration's tilt toward doing business with private companies has failed to bring promised savings and has been characterized by "significant waste, fraud, abuse and mismanagement," according to the report released this week by Rep. Henry A. Waxman of Los Angeles, the top Democrat on the House Government Reform Committee.

Of particular concern, the report said, were contracts related to domestic security, the Iraq war and Hurricane Katrina recovery.

Waxman's report is described as the first comprehensive assessment of contracting under the Bush administration, which had vowed upon taking office in January 2001 to provide services more efficiently while reducing the size of government.

It reveals an 86% increase in contracts with private businesses, from $203 billion in 2000 to $377.5 billion a year in 2005 — a growth rate nearly double that of federal spending as a whole.

At the same time, federal payrolls also have grown: The government now has about 1,874,000 civilian employees, up from 1,738,000 five years ago.

"We've never seen [private] contracting on the scale that we're seeing now," Waxman said. "Nearly 40 cents of every dollar appropriated goes to private contractors, which is a record level."

Yet, Waxman said, his biggest concern is not the growth in contracts, but the abuse of them.

Poor contract planning and weak oversight, the report said, have led to government overspending and corruption by companies that have padded their invoices, charged for services not provided and received award fees for jobs that were completed late.

"Taxpayers should be outraged at the billions of dollars that have been wasted," said Waxman. "And the Bush administration isn't learning from its mistakes, it's repeating them."

In many cases, the report found, the types and terms of the contracts have made them ripe for abuse:

· Spending on cost-plus contracts — under which the government bears the risk of cost overruns — has increased from $62 billion in 2000 to $110 billion in 2005.

· Spending on no-bid contracts — those granted without competition from other companies — rose 110%, to $97.8 billion, during the same period.

· Spending on monopoly contracts, which allow the government to buy goods and services without defining them in advance, nearly doubled, to $15.3 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0036607

The report comes as the federal government's handling of contracts is increasingly in question. On Tuesday, the government's onetime chief procurement officer, David H. Safavian, was convicted of making false statements and obstruction of justice for concealing his relationship with disgraced former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff. The jury's decision in Safavian's case, Waxman said, "underscores the findings of the new report."

"The corruption and inappropriate influence of special interests in government contracting has gone virtually unchecked and erodes the public trust in the federal government," he said.

Also on Tuesday, the Senate rejected — for the third time — a proposal to form a special committee to investigate contracting improprieties in war zones.

"It's scandalous that the GOP Senate refuses to look into the hundreds of billions of dollars spent in the war in Iraq to see that the funds are carefully and honestly spent," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said in a written statement after the vote.

Kennedy's comments echoed the concerns outlined in Waxman's report, which also identifies several smaller pieces of $745.5 billion in federal contracts awarded between 2000 and 2005 that the auditors deemed wasteful, fraudulent or mismanaged.

In 2003, for example, the Border Patrol was found to have paid $20 million for security camera systems that malfunctioned or were never installed. That same year, the Transportation Security Administration awarded Boeing Co. $44 million for installing and maintaining airport luggage screening equipment — a job that was never evaluated.

In 2005, the Federal Emergency Management Agency bought $915 million worth of temporary housing and offices for Katrina victims and relief workers. More than a third of them have never been used.

"The lesson of this report is that there's a massive amount of spending, and yet we very clearly aren't spending it smartly," said Peter Singer, an analyst with the Brookings Institution, a centrist public policy center in Washington. "When the overspending is not just in the billions but in the hundreds of billions — that's worrisome."

A spokesman for the White House Office of Management and Budget, which is responsible for overall procurement policy, said it made sense to turn to the private sector for providing security after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and cleaning up after Katrina — two disasters that affected everyone, not just government.

Tapping private-sector expertise allows the government to "bring the full strength of American ingenuity to bear as we seek solutions," said OMB spokesman Scott Milburn.

But, he added, contracting requires constant oversight to make sure "the public's money is spent responsibly."

Specter To The Justices: I'm Hungry, Let's Do Lunch (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, June 21, 2006

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, is hosting a series of one-on-one lunches with members of the Supreme Court.

The senator, whose tenure as chairman began last year amid furious conservative opposition but has included confirmation of two conservative nominees to the high court, is holding his tête-à-têtes in the Senate dining room with strict constructionists and loose constructionists alike.

Specter told The Hill that he lunches with the justices simply because he is hungry. In a more serious vein, he added that he does so to hash out "matters of concern."

Pennsylvania's senior senator said he's already lunched with most of the justices. They have discussed the administration of the courts, their confirmation hearings and one of his pet issues: bringing television cameras into the court chamber.

He has also grilled them about instances when the court has struck down laws by questioning what it called Congress's "method of reasoning." It was a concern Specter raised during the Supreme Court confirmation hearings he presided over months ago.

"It's good to talk on an informal basis," he said.

Specter was spotted Thursday at a table in a corner of the dinning room with conservative Justice Clarence Thomas, chatting long after the server had dropped off the check. As the host, Specter naturally reached over to take care of the bill at the end of the meal.

On Tuesday he had lunch with Justice David Souter, a Republican nominee who, like Specter, has irked the political right with his positions on social issues, particularly abortion.

"He likes long lunches," Specter said, adding, "He had a no-martini lunch."

Souter seemed happy strolling to a blue sedan that picked him up afterward, but he declined to talk about what he and his host had discussed — or even what he ate.

DOJ_NMG_0036608

The senator's record of having not voted against any of the sitting justices has presumably spared him from awkward moments during lunch. The same cannot be said of other lawmakers, however.

Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), sitting a few tables away, joked that he was offended that Specter and Thomas didn't stop to greet him but then noted that he voted against Thomas's nomination.

Specter, by contrast, gave Thomas crucial support during his tumultuous and protracted confirmation hearing by asking tough questions of Thomas's chief accuser, Anita Hill.

There is no such thing as a free lunch, but Specter said the justices have not been swiftly swayed; they are not, for example, enthusiastic about his desire to air court proceedings on television.

The chairman and the justices have also chewed over the priorities of court members. Specifically, they have talked about court security and budgets, pay for younger district court judges and the General Services Administration (GSA) practice of charging the courts rent for the buildings they occupy.

The GSA manages federal properties, and Specter and several other senators have introduced legislation that would limit the rent charged of the judicial branch to the costs of operating and maintaining their offices.

Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), who chaired the judiciary panel before Specter, said that he lunched with the justices "from time to time" but that he did not meet with all of them.

Hatch said they talked about "philosophy, great literature and music, "mainly joint interests not related to their cases."

Richard Baker, the Senate historian, said that members of the Senate and the Supreme Court used to have close relationships before the court was moved out of the old Senate chamber to its neoclassical home across 1st Street in 1935.

"The Supreme Court used to be located down the hall until 1935," Baker said. There used to be lots of commingling between the senators and the justices."

Baker said that members of the court "undoubtedly broke bread with the senators" most likely in the old Senate dining room which was located off what is now the modern dining room's waiting area.

Since the justices moved out of the Capitol, Baker said, little is known about their personal relationships with the Congress.

He did not know of a Judiciary Committee chairman ever before making an effort to meet with each justice.

"To systematically do it is something we could not find precedent for," he said.

Here's A Way To Help Broadcasters, PBS And Congress (RC)

By Norman Ornstein

Roll Call, June 21, 2006

The past couple of weeks have been rough ones for broadcasters. Congress passed, and the president signed, the Broadcast Decency Enforcement Act, which increased by tenfold (to $325,000) the fines on stations that air "indecent" materials outside of late-night hours. The law defines "indecent" as "patently offensive" sexual or excretory content.

Then, on Monday, the Federal Communications Commission withdrew a plan to vote on requiring cable networks to air all the multicast channels broadcasters will have available when they go digital — as many as four to six for each broadcast analog channel now in operation — because Chairman Kevin Martin did not have the votes. The commercial broadcasters desperately want the multicast requirement to make their business model for digital television work.

Not surprisingly, the broadcast indecency bill passed by unanimous consent in the Senate and by a 10-to-1 margin in the House; how could Members pass up an opportunity to take a courageous stand against indecency? But the bill basically was just grandstanding. It's a poor piece of legislation, and one that reflects yet again the lack of any meaningful deliberation in Congress. The fines, if applied to many smaller stations, are prohibitive, and could force some into bankruptcy — for what might be an inadvertent airing of a program that had an action defined by the FCC as indecent.

Unfortunately, the definition of indecency is nowhere near a "bright line" test that broadcasters can rely on. We already have seen regulators struggle to deal with things such as the naked bodies shown in "Schindler's List" as they try to create reasonable and necessary exceptions for material with compelling artistic justification.

But when a PBS station in San Mateo, Calif., aired an episode of "The Blues" directed by Martin Scorsese that included New Orleans musicians using four-letter words —words they use as part of their everyday language — it was socked by the FCC with a $15,000 fine, which is a big-time penalty for a station of that size. How the FCC came to decide that Steven Spielberg's artistic vision was OK but Scorsese's was not is beyond me — and beyond all rationality.

So stations are left with no clear standard, yet with huge new penalties if they guess wrong. The charges against these stations have to be triggered by complaints. Here is a prediction: Some sharks will find ways to generate complaints against small, poorly financed stations to drive them into bankruptcy so they can purchase their spot on the airwaves for their own purposes. Congress considered none of these issues in the blind rush to show moral indignation.

DOJ_NMG_0036609

I feel the broadcasters' pain. And I want to find a way to ease their burden. There isn't any readily available remedy now on the indecency or must-carry front. But there is another way, one that came to me when I got a release last week from the National Association of Broadcasters toting up their stations' public interest activities.

According to the NAB, such public-interest efforts add up to more than $10 billion for the year. The figure, the NAB says, is actually an understatement since it includes only direct activities such as public service announcements.

What a load on the broadcasters! All these other problems and a $10 billion burden. Of course, the burden is there because of the compact the public has had with broadcasters since they were first granted portions of the public airwaves — that in return for that use, they would have requirements to fulfill public interest obligations. When I co-chaired a presidential advisory committee in the late 1990s to look at their public interest obligations as we headed toward the digital age, the broadcasters on the panel regularly complained about the difficulty of meeting the obligations that already existed.

My commission proposed an altered set of public-interest obligations for the digital age. The FCC promised several years ago to address the issue. Despite the generous grant of valuable public airwaves for the broadcasters to convert to digital transmissions, the FCC so far has failed to do so. I think it is time to find another model that takes into account the challenges broadcasters face.

Here is what I propose: relieve the broadcasters of their onerous public interest obligations. All of them. In return, charge them fees that amount to a paltry 20 cents on the dollar for what they have been doing (or what they say they have been doing). That would be $2 billion per year. Do so for only seven years, and then leave them free and clear. Put the money into an endowment fund that ultimately would total $14 billion (plus interest) for public broadcasting. (I am on the board of PBS, which I mention not because I have a conflict of interest — my compensation consists of an occasional PBS windbreaker or DVD — but because I have an abiding interest in the one outlet that exists to serve the public interest and is eager to do so.)

In return for this endowment, public broadcasters would relieve Congress of the burden of annually appropriating money for it. Since Rep. Ralph Regula (Ohio) and other Republicans in Congress have been trying for several years to cut those funds (and indeed have a plan to zero them out by 2009) this will be a big bonus for the lawmakers. They could cut the federal budget without the huge outcry that now comes every year from huge numbers of voters in every district who love PBS.

In the meantime, public broadcasting avidly would take on all the public interest burdens that now beset the commercial broadcasters. It could offer a separate digital channel for public affairs that offered time for candidates to get their messages across, for campaign debates, issue discussion and expanded news analysis. And of course, they would extend these efforts to the Web and other new media.

Public broadcasters could run a separate health channel, going well beyond the commercial ventures to include massive amounts of accessible information on every debilitating disease, and facilitate interactive communications with patients, families, doctors and researchers on them. It could facilitate community service through every individual station, provide readily available digitized archives of materials from museums, schools and other cultural institutions and expand all kinds of educational opportunities.

Here is a win-win-win — for commercial broadcasters now groaning under the weight of a $10 billion annual public-interest burden, for a Congress now grappling with a budget deficit and for public broadcasters now searching for a consistent source of funding to fulfill its mandate. Are you listening, Reps. Fred Upton (R-Mich.) and Ed Markey (D-Mass.), and Sens. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) and John McCain (R-Ariz.)? Any takers?

Razzle-Dazzle 'Em Ethics Reform (NYT)

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

The House ethics committee, ever wondrous in its irresponsibility, is preparing to set itself up as the arbiter of one-stop, conscience-free junket approval for gadabout lawmakers. Last winter, as the stain of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal spread, Speaker Dennis Hastert impulsively — and properly — called for a total ban on junkets financed by private favor seekers. But lawmakers, globe-trotting at the giddy rate of $10 million a year in free private excursions, rebelled. They killed the ban outright and substituted cosmetic panaceas for their promised ethics reform.

The end product would have the ethics committee — long a still-life study in Capitol dysfunction — snap into action to prejudge junketeering requests. This should be great for the lawmakers, who will be able to wave rubber-stamped in-House visas when faced with constituents' questions about how come their tours of global trouble spots so often hit Paris.

The ethics committee would, at least, have a great deal of expertise in its new duties. It turns out the 10 committee members and their aides have enjoyed 400 privately financed trips worth $1 million in a recent five-year stretch, according to a new accounting by the independent Center for Public Integrity. Leading the beneficiaries with 80 trips worth $245,000 was

Representative Howard Berman, a California Democrat, a member of the International Relations Committee and one of the principals in giving a bipartisan patina to this latest evasion.

Clearly, lawmakers are gambling that the scandals nipping at their heels will pale by Election Day. Not so: as the new House rules were being cobbled together, David Safavian, a former White House aide, was found guilty of lying about his ties to Jack Abramoff. No less significant, Mr. Abramoff has reportedly received three additional months' grace before going to prison so that he can cooperate more fully with criminal prosecutors looking into the ethical misbehavior that finds Congress in deep denial.

Softer Housing Sector Is Seen, But Data Don't Point To Collapse (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey And Michael Corkery

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

U.S. home builders stepped up the pace of new construction in May after three months of declines, a sign that the housing market is softening but not collapsing.

The Commerce Department said housing starts rose 5% last month from April to an annual rate of 1.96 million units, but were down 3.8% from a year earlier. Building permits, an indicator of future trends in new residential construction, fell 2.1% last month and were running 8.5% lower than a year earlier.

The faster pace of new-home building in May is confirmation that the housing market is experiencing what Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke recently described as an "orderly and moderate" correction following last year's peak. That bodes well for the economy, though analysts anticipate more weakness in the housing market during the rest of the year.

"Housing starts surprised to the upside, but May's rebound is almost certainly a temporary pause in the downward trend," said Haseeb Ahmed, U.S. economist at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. Other economists were puzzled about why builders would keep ramping up the supply of new homes when demand is on the wane. Daniel Oppenheim, an analyst at Bank of America Securities, said the gap between starts and sales traffic was at the "highest level in at least the past 20 years," a development that would lead to "even higher inventory and more pricing pressure."

There are proliferating signs that builders are responding to widespread expectations that the housing boom is ending. Robert Toll, chief executive of Toll Brothers Inc., the luxury-home builder based in Horsham, Pa., said the industry also faces an increasingly negative psychology among prospective buyers, despite historically low interest rates and a relatively strong economy. He attributes some of that negativity to media reports about the housing slowdown. "If you go to a party and tell people that you bought a new house, people look at you like you are crazy," he said.

Toll Brothers last month reported that orders for new homes fell 32% in the latest quarter. On Monday, KB Home, the big Los Angeles builder, said it had laid off some 7% of its workers.

In May, starts of single-family homes rose 2.1% from April, but were 7.6% lower than a year earlier, with the declines particularly pronounced in the Midwest. The South is the only region where the rate of new-home construction is up from a year earlier.

One bright spot for builders has been the construction of apartment buildings. Housing starts for residential structures with five or more units leapt 25.4% in May and were nearly 15% higher than a year earlier.

Home Building Rebounds After 3 Months Of Decline (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

Construction of new homes rose in May, bouncing back from a disappointing April, the federal government reported yesterday. But the improvement may prove to be a temporary blip, as other numbers in the report pointed to a slowdown in the coming months and a market that is less robust than a year ago.

The Department of Housing and Urban Development said new construction rose 5 percent in May, to a seasonally adjusted annual pace of 1,957,000 homes. Still, that number was 3.8 percent less than in May 2005.

The increase was not a sign of an upward trend, but more likely a rebound after three months of significant declines, economists said.

Many economists had predicted less of a bounce.

"The one we got was larger than expected, but certainly not enough to overturn the idea that housing is in a contraction," a group of economists from Goldman Sachs wrote in a research note.

DOJ_NMG_0036611

Stuart G. Hoffman, chief economist of PNC Financial, said the upturn in May probably "marks one of the housing market's last hurrahs."

The stock market had little reaction to the report. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was virtually unchanged. The Nasdaq composite fell slightly, while the Dow Jones industrial average rose slightly. [Page C9.]

In a sign that construction is likely to taper off, the number of building permits declined considerably in May, to its lowest level since 2003. The rate was 2.1 percent lower than in April and down 8.5 percent from a year earlier. The decline in the number of permits usually shows up in the construction numbers within three months.

Taken with other signs of slower growth in housing — like a record number of unsold new homes on the market and a darkening financial outlook among builders — the new construction numbers point to an overall slowdown from the boom of the last few years, economists said.

"I don't think there's anything scary about what's happening in the housing market," Patrick Newport, an economist with Global Insight, said. "It's just a slowdown from record-high numbers. It's just slowing down to a more stable pace."

The government report hurt the stock values of some of the largest home-construction companies.

Shares of Toll Brothers, the largest builder of luxury homes, and D. R. Horton, the largest home building company, both posted losses. Other large home builders — the Centex Corporation, Pulte Homes and the Lennar Corporation — were also down for the day.

The stock values of most major home construction companies have been pummeled over the last year. Since the beginning of the year, the Bloomberg United States home builders index, which includes the largest construction companies, has fallen nearly 30 percent.

The rise in new construction last month was helped by the continuing surge of building in the West, where new construction jumped 15.8 percent from April's levels. The building rate in the South also posted an 8.5 percent gain from April. Housing starts were up only marginally in the Northeast and fell 15.8 percent in the Midwest.

The report also showed strong growth in the construction of apartments, a sign that high interest rates are beginning to affect the housing market.

"As interest rates start to rise, particularly mortgage rates, it becomes more expensive to purchase a home," said Bernard Baumohl, executive director of the Economic Outlook Group in Princeton, N.J.

And as purchases of single-family homes slow, so does the economy, he said. "Does the continued strength in apartment building bode well for real estate and the economy? Not quite."

The government report showed a 25.4 percent increase since April in the construction of structures with five units or more.

Yesterday's housing report was the latest to suggest a slowdown. On Monday, a survey of home builders found their collective view of the current business climate at the lowest level since 1995.

Last week, the Federal Reserve also cautioned that the housing market appeared to be cooling. In its Beige Book report, the Fed said that building had slowed in most regions and that too many homes were being built in some regions.

Housing Starts Rebound From 13-Month Low (WP)

By Victor Epstein

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

U.S. home construction rebounded in May from a 13-month low as builders worked on backlogged orders and used incentives such as free car leases to win new business.

Housing starts rose a greater-than-expected 5 percent, to an annual rate of 1.957 million, the Commerce Department reported yesterday. Building permits, a sign of future construction, fell 2.1 percent, to an annual pace of 1.932 million, the lowest since November 2003.

While the increase in starts does not change the outlook for a cooling housing market, the number may reassure investors and Federal Reserve policymakers that the slowdown will not become a rout.

"The message the Fed's going to take away from this starts report is that the roof's not caving in on housing and they can keep raising interest rates," said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist at PNC Financial Services Group Inc. in Pittsburgh.

The annual rate of housing starts in May is still below the 1.972 million pace recorded in March. Construction has averaged an annual rate of 1.931 million units in the past three months, the lowest since September to November 2004.

Slowing sales have left a record numbers of unsold homes on the market. There were 565,000 new and 3.4 million previously owned residences awaiting purchase in April, according to the National Association of Realtors and the Commerce Department.

Strong Start To Trading Fizzles On Doubt (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0036612

By From Wire Reports
USA Today, June 21, 2006

NEW YORK — The Dow made a half-hearted attempt to get back above 11,000 Tuesday but couldn't hang on.

Better-than-expected news on the housing front triggered a rally that had the Dow Jones industrial average up 88 points at 11,030 before interest rate worries prevailed and the Dow closed up just 32.73 points at 10,974.84.

And it was the only one of the three major U.S. indexes to end the day with a gain. The Standard & Poor's 500 dipped 0.02 points to 1240.12, and the Nasdaq composite fell 3.36 points to 2107.06.

Trading got off to a strong start after the Commerce Department said U.S. housing starts rose in May faster than economists had forecast. But the focus soon shifted back to the big uncertainty surrounding the Federal Reserve's meeting next week. Traders say a lack of economic data will likely make investors unsure about buying stocks until the Fed's interest rate decision.

Jay Suskind, head trader at Ryan Beck & Co., says Tuesday was more of a quiet stabilization in the market after Monday's sell-off. “Inflation, stagflation, interest rates — there are all those words out there making this a very tough market,” he says.

Although May housing starts were better than expected, a weak June outlook dragged down home builders. D.R. Horton fell 61 cents to $23.40, Hovnanian Enterprises lost 34 cents to $28.65, and Toll Bros. slid 49 cents to $26.05.

·Warner Music Group dropped $1.16 to $26.18, while China Unicom rose 7 cents to $8.66. Warner signed a deal to distribute music to mobile-phone operator China Unicom's wireless customers.

·CFC International jumped $5.11, or 45%, to $16.41 and was the Nasdaq's biggest gainer. Illinois Tool Works is acquiring the holographic and specialty coated film producer for $16.75 a share, or about $90 million. Illinois Tool shares added 17 cents to $47.60.

·Actuant skidded $10.12, or 18%, to $46.58. The industrial manufacturer said its third-quarter profit grew 34% but forecast lower earnings in the fourth quarter.

·Greenhill & Co. climbed $2.37 to $55.08 on news the investment bank agreed to buy Canada-based investment firm Beaufort Partners for an undisclosed amount.

·Golf Galaxy sliced off $2.51 to $12.43. The golf retailer posted a higher first-quarter profit but cut its guidance for the year.

Dow Rises 32.73 After Rate Fears Rein In Gains (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning
The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

After initially pushing higher in response to reassuring housing-construction data, stocks ran out of steam yesterday and finished with a sigh.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average clung to a gain, rising 32.73 points, or 0.30%, to 10974.84. It had been up as much as 87.72 points at midday. It remains ahead 2.4% for 2006, but down 5.7% since hitting a six-year high on May 10.

Most stocks finished down. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index edged down 0.02 point, virtually unchanged in percentage terms, to 1240.12, still down 0.7% for the year. Volatile tech stocks were among the harder hit, driving the tech-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index down 0.16%, or 3.36 points, to 2107.06, a decline of 4.5% for the year.

Some economists are starting to predict that the Federal Reserve could raise its target for short-term interest rates three more times this year, starting at the central bank's meeting of policymakers Wednesday and Thursday of next week, to prevent inflation by slowing the economy. If the Fed continues its practice of quarter-point increases each time, it would push the target rate to 5.75%, higher than most investors expected just a few weeks ago. Rising rates crimp corporate profits, and uncertainty about how high they will go makes investors nervous about owning stocks and other securities.

Yesterday, "investors used the opportunity to sell into the rally," which explains the weak finish, said stock trader Larry Peruzzi at Boston Company Asset Management. He said he saw many late-day computer-driven trades, suggesting that some investment pros have decided to use stock gains as an opportunity to pull back until the outlook becomes clearer.

The day started on an upbeat note, with stocks rising after May housing starts came in stronger than expected, even as new building permits fell. The data quieted fears about a sharp housing downturn, suggesting that any real-estate decline is occurring at a moderate rate.

Foreign stocks were little changed on the day, as were oil futures. Gold futures, which have been under fire, rebounded $8.10 to $576.90 a troy ounce.

Outside the U.S., stocks were unchanged in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, remained at 202.37.

In major U.S. market action:

DOJ_NMG_0036613

Stocks were mixed and bond prices fell. The 10-year Treasury note fell 2/32, or 63 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 5.151%. The 30-year bond was down 4/32 to yield 5.189%.

The dollar weakened, to 114.93 yen, down from 115.42; the euro rose to $1.2583 from $1.2577.

Facing Up To Inflation (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

If the Federal Reserve raises interest rates at the end of June, as seems probable, it will likely be criticized for making a fetish of inflation and, in the process, risking an American or global recession. There are already signs that the U.S. economy is slowing. Stock markets around the world have declined sharply. Why should the Fed make matters worse by nudging up rates even a tad? This is a sensible-sounding complaint. Based on what we now know, it's also wrong.

We have an inflation problem that we need to cure before it gets worse. A central lesson of the past half-century is that inflationary psychology, once embedded in price- and wage-setting practices, is stubborn and destructive. It leads to frequent recessions. It stunts the rise in living standards. People detest it. They're frightened by rapid and unpredictable price changes. We learned these lessons the hard way. From 1960 to 1979, inflation rose from 1.4 percent to 13.3 percent. Only the horrific 1980-82 slump (peak monthly unemployment: 10.8 percent) repressed it.

The job of the Federal Reserve is "to take away the punch bowl just when the party gets going," William McChesney Martin Jr., the Fed chairman from 1951 to 1970, once famously said. As business cycles mature, inflationary and speculative pressures build. Demand begins to overtake supply. Companies find it easier to raise prices. Workers find it easier to win bigger wage increases. Greater optimism encourages riskier, often foolhardy, investments. The present economic expansion began in December 2001. It's now showing many telltale danger signs.

Inflation, though nowhere near double digits, is clearly rising. The government last week released the consumer price index (CPI) for May. It was up 4.2 percent from a year earlier. The comparable figures for the past three years were 3.4 percent (2005), 3.3 percent (2004) and 1.9 percent (2003). Even these comparisons may understate the reality. In the past three months, the increase in the CPI on an annualized basis (projected for a year) is 5.7 percent.

The obvious remedy is to slow the economy's growth -- make it harder for companies, workers and landlords to raise prices, wages and rents. But some economists contend that the Fed should discount the latest inflation reports and suspend any further interest rate increases. (The Federal Open Market Committee meets June 28 and 29.) Here's the gist of their argument:

First, the Fed's been raising interest rates since June 2004. The overnight Fed funds rate has gone from 1 percent to 5 percent. Higher interest rates operate on the economy with a delay. Finally, the economy's responding. Home building and consumer spending are weakening. In May industrial production dropped 0.1 percent. Eleven of 17 manufacturing sectors, including autos, declined. Wage increases have been modest. Inflation will subside; it, too, is a lagging indicator.

Second, inflation statistics are misleading and falsely alarming. Oil explains much of the surge. Gasoline prices are up 33.4 percent and home fuel prices 13.5 percent in the past year. Obviously the Fed can't change these. Without them, so-called core inflation (all prices except energy and food) is fairly tame. For the past year, it's 2.4 percent. Even this is skewed by a quirky housing component. The CPI doesn't count home prices directly. Instead, it converts rents into homeownership costs. Because rents are rising, so is homeownership. Weird, say critics.

You should treat these objections skeptically. It's not that they're wrong. But they can all be qualified. Yes, home building is down -- but commercial construction is up. Yes, industrial production dropped in May -- but it increased (0.8 percent) in April. Yes, core inflation is a useful concept if energy and food prices go down after they go up. But if oil prices stay up -- as they are doing -- it's less useful. (Even so, core inflation is outside the Fed's comfort zone of 1 to 2 percent.) Yes, the CPI's housing component is quirky -- but it's not necessarily wrong. Rents are rising partly because home prices have increased so much that more people are forced to rent. If the CPI counted home prices directly, it would have gone up much more in 2004 and 2005.

All these arguments aim to minimize the inflation threat. To anyone who knows the history, this is eerily reminiscent of the 1960s and '70s. Then, economists underestimated inflation. They argued that a bit more wouldn't hurt or that increases reflected "temporary" pressures. In the resulting political and intellectual climate, the Fed pursued easy money and credit policies for too long. It tried to drive economic growth up and unemployment down. The results were perverse: double-digit inflation, four recessions from 1969 to 1982 and higher unemployment.

Since 1982 there have been only two mild recessions. The lesson is that low inflation promotes more stable economic growth. The Fed should heed that. True, it could trip into a recession. But without dramatic evidence of a weakening economy, the greater danger is a renewal of inflationary psychology. It's time for the punch bowl to go.

When Hedging Doesn't Pay Off (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0036614

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

The financial world has been suffering lately from Post-Greenspan Stress Disorder. The new chairman of the Federal Reserve, Ben Bernanke, has been accident-prone, and some investors have gotten the jitters. They might be reassured if they paid more attention to the country's second most powerful monetary official, New York Fed President Timothy Geithner.

Geithner watches for the big, scary meltdowns that could threaten the entire financial system. Like his mentor, former Treasury secretary Robert Rubin, he's a worrier -- always looking for the "systemic risks," the cascading events that can trigger a panicky rush for the exits. He's in a constant dialogue with the nation's biggest banks and investment firms about how they manage risk.

As with globalization itself, the good news and the bad news in these markets is the same -- greater interdependence. Financial markets appear to be better protected today thanks to complicated products, known as derivatives, that allow different kinds of financial risk to be shared and traded around the world. You can hedge against almost anything these days, from hurricanes to interest rate hikes. The danger is that if this complex protective scaffolding ever failed, it could bring some of the global financial architecture down with it.

The past six weeks have been an interesting period for Geithner and his fellow central bankers. Some of the world's smartest investors, who run the exotic portfolios known as "hedge funds," got caught in a sudden, unexpected downdraft in May. The investments that had proved most profitable -- in emerging markets, commodities and other alternatives to large-cap stocks -- all took nose dives. Investment strategies that supposedly were well hedged, so that losses in one sector would be offset by gains in another, turned out to be "correlated," so that they all went down together.

The hedge fund industry prides itself on its "value at risk" (VAR) models. But last month, traders say, some markets moved "six standard deviations" -- in other words, six times the expected range of volatility. The fancy VAR models, based on past experience, failed to predict the actual damage.

The European Central Bank got so worried that it warned this month that hedge funds were the financial equivalent of bird flu and could pose a "major risk for financial stability." And Raghuram Rajan, the chief economist of the International Monetary Fund, cautioned June 8 that hedge fund managers were all chasing the same investment magic they describe as "alpha." This was driving them like a herd into riskier assets and making them all vulnerable to the same potential reversals.

The new alpha-mania may be the market's latest folly. Ordinary investors make do with what's known as the "beta," which means basic market returns as embodied by the Standard & Poor's 500 composite index of stocks. But the pros want to emulate hedge fund managers in chasing the outsize "alpha" returns. Almost by definition, those will come from more exotic investments -- from the tempting emerging markets in China and India, say, or commodities.

"Portable alpha" is the term investment managers have given to the notion that by moving out of the S&P 500 universe, they can match the performance of George Soros. It's an investment version of Lake Wobegon, where all the children are above average. One factor pushing the market is the wildly outsize reward for alpha performance. For the top 26 hedge fund managers, the average pay last year was a jaw-dropping $363 million, according to a survey by Alpha magazine.

Alas, the portfolio managers can't all be above average. Indeed, as more and more asset managers began chasing the outsize returns, they bid up the prices of their pet alternative assets -- to the peak levels from which they began to plummet last month. Since May 10 emerging markets have fallen by about 25 percent, for example. Hedge funds have taken a smaller but real hit. In May the Credit Suisse/Tremont Hedge Fund Index was down 1.3 percent, the first time since October it has posted a negative monthly return.

Geithner's answer has been to stress the basics. In recent speeches, he has urged financial institutions to invest in better back-office infrastructure, so that they know what's on their books and can trade efficiently even during crises. And he urged senior managers to make sure they understand the real risk they're carrying in their portfolios, by conducting tougher "what if" stress testing.

In the financial world, as in most things, people learn only by making mistakes. That's why it's useful to have little crises, like the one that swept through the hedge fund world in May. Lots of little crises reduce the risk of the big one.

Congressional Democrats Pass GOP In Funds (AP-Y2)

AP2, June 21, 2006

Senate and House Democrats, optimistic about their election-year prospects, have more money in the bank for the midterm contests than their Republican counterparts.

Some four months before the voting, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee has $33.5 million cash on hand compared to $18.3 million for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, the groups said Tuesday. The Democrats raised $4.7 million in May; the Republicans collected $4.3 million in the month.

DOJ_NMG_0036615

"Our fundraising success reflects a deep desire for change and recognition that the best way to get things back on track is by electing more Democrats to the Senate," said Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., chairman of the Democratic committee.

Although the GOP committees trail in cash on hand, it has the advantage of the presidency and the fundraiser in chief as well as majority control of the House and Senate.

On Monday, Bush helped Republicans raise $27 million for the fall congressional contests, with $15 million for Senate candidates and $12 million for House candidates. The numbers will be reflected in the next filing. The president used the event to reassure Republicans that they will prevail in November.

"We're going to keep the House and we're going to keep the Senate thanks to all of you here," Bush said.

House Democrats said they had $24.5 million cash on hand after raising $5.5 million last month. House Republicans said they had $21.9 million at the end of May after collecting $5.6 million.

Dems Boast Of Fundraising Totals (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, June 21, 2006

Congressional Democrats yesterday trumpeted the sums of money they raised in the second quarter of the year.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) has raised $64.2 million in the 2006 election cycle; it raised $4.7 million and spent $3.7 million in May, according to spokesman Phil Singer. The DSCC also reported it holds a 2-1 cash-on-hand advantage over the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC).

“Throughout the country, people are saying that we need a new direction and are looking to the Democrats,” said Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), the DSCC chairman. “Our fundraising success reflects a deep desire for change.”

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), led by Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), reported having $24.5 million in the bank and raising $5.5 million in May. The House Democrats’ campaign arm started the election cycle with $12 million in debt, which Emanuel said has been reduced to $500,000.

“These new funds are exactly what we need to fight for the new direction that the American people want and deserve,” Emanuel said. “While all the Republicans have to offer the American people is two more years just like the last six and a wageless recovery and an endless occupation, Democrats are fighting for change.”

The National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) said it had $21.9 million on hand and no debt at the end of May. The committee raised $5.6 million last month.

DCCC Has Cash Edge For Now (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, June 21, 2006

Both House and Senate Democrats ended May with more money in the bank than their GOP counterparts, according to monthly fundraising reports due to be filed Tuesday with the Federal Election Commission.

While the Senate Democrats’ campaign arm has consistently shown more available cash than the National Republican Senatorial Committee this cycle, this is the first time in recent memory that House Democrats have banked more than Republicans.

Their financial advantage isn’t expected to last long, however.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee ended May with about $2.6 million more in cash than the National Republican Congressional Committee. The NRCC had $21.9 million while the DCCC had $24.5 million.

However, that difference is likely to be erased by the time the committees file their June monthly reports, after the NRCC raised $15 million at the annual President’s Dinner fundraiser Monday night. Although that sum is collected over several months’ time, Republicans are confident they’ll regain the financial edge.

“I would expect this is the last month this occurs,” said NRCC Communications Director Carl Forti.

The two committees raised almost even amounts in May, with the DCCC taking in $5.5 million and the NRCC collecting $5.6 million.

But the NRCC’s heavy spending on the special election in California’s 50th district accounted for the cash-on-hand difference.

“We spent what it took in California 50 and we won,” Forti said. “And we will have a resources advantage come fall.”

But that didn’t stop Democrats from crowing.

“These new funds are exactly what we need to fight for the new direction that the American people want and deserve,” said DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.). The DCCC still carries a little more than $1 million in debt.

DOJ_NMG_0036616

On the Senate side, Democrats raised $4.7 million in May, bringing their total raised for the cycle to $64.2 million. They have raised more than $23 million more than they had at this same point in the 2004 cycle. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee spent $3.7 million in May, leaving $33.5 million in its bank account at the end of last month.

The NRSC collected $4.3 million in the period and as of May 31 had raised $57.8 million in the 2006 cycle. The committee has raised $22.3 million more in the 2006 cycle than it had at this point in the previous cycle.

While the NRSC banked slightly more than the DSCC did in May, the committee's burn rate has been considerably higher for the cycle and Senate Republicans remain at a substantial cash disadvantage. The NRSC had $18.3 million at the end of May compared to the $33.5 million for the DSCC. The NRSC's take from the President's Dinner is estimated to be about $12 million.

Rahm Nixes Second Term (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, June 21, 2006

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) will step down from the House Democrats' campaign operation after the November elections to spend more time with his family, he told The Hill yesterday.

Emanuel has been a leading strategist, fundraiser, cheerleader and recruiter for House Democrats as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) since the beginning of last year. His uncommon pairing of cunning efficiency and profanity-laced outbursts has won him both plaudits and opprobrium, but nearly all Democrats concede that he deserves substantial credit for their rosy election prospects this year.

"I served one term, and my kids are all at a certain point. They've had it," Emanuel told The Hill. "I'll do whatever the caucus wants in the sense of helping the next chairperson in any capacity, but I will not serve as chairman another cycle." He and his wife, Amy, have three children under 10.

Although most DCCC chairmen serve only a single term, many Democrats welcomed Emanuel's presence and held out hope he would serve a second term.

Emanuel's comments came just as the DCCC was releasing its latest fundraising total. The DCCC raised $5.5 million in May, slightly behind its rival, the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), which raised $5.6 million. The Democrats finished the month with $24.5 million on hand, compared with $21.9 million for the Republicans.

Across the Capitol, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee also beat its counterpart (see related story, Page 6).

Several of Emanuel's colleagues were hopeful that he could be convinced to stay, noting that he had been reluctant to take the position when first offered it by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

"I hope he'll change his mind. We're going to have a battle royal in 2008, and we'll need him." said Rep. Artur Davis (D-Ala.). "He expressed the same concerns about family, about lack of time, the last time around."

Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz (D-Fla.) concurred.

"I bet there are a whole lot of members who are going to beg him not to leave. We're not above groveling!" she quipped. Still, if he is resolved to step down, she called it a "good news, bad news" situation.

"He's a supertough act to follow. It would be daunting for any member to step into his shoes," she said. "But on the other hand he had created a tremendously solid foundation and firm ground to stand on for his successor."

Emanuel has spent much time on the road in the past year, raising money and recruiting candidates. Pelosi joked in a recent interview that she sees more of his children than he does. He typically carries a leather portfolio filled with his children's letters, photos and drawings, an aide said.

While traversing the country, he has been concerned about fundraising decisions in Washington at the Democratic National Committee (DNC). Emanuel reportedly stormed out of a meeting with DNC Chairman Howard Dean several weeks ago, exasperated that the Republican National Committee (RNC) had banked far greater reserves than its Democratic counterpart.

Asked whether Dean is doing a good job, Emanuel did not directly answer the question.

"We have the resources to do what we need to do to help our candidates," he said. "The DCCC will stay competitive. ... This will be first cycle since 1994 that DCCC will be at dollar parity with the NRCC."

At the end of May, the RNC had $43.1 million on hand while the DNC had $10.3 million.

Dean sent an e-mail to supporters yesterday defending his strategy of spending money on party operations in all 50 states rather than hoarding it for congressional races.

"We're in the middle of our campaign to explain the 50-state strategy and answer questions about its purpose," Dean told backers. He referred to a letter from Utah Democratic Party Chairman Wayne Holland Jr. calling the approach the "future of our party here in Utah."

"'Win for today' is not a long-term strategy by itself, and it has left millions of Americans and vast areas of the country without a healthy political dialogue.

DOJ_NMG_0036617

On ethics issues, Emanuel voiced support for Pelosi's decision to oust Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) from the Ways and Means Committee while he faces a government corruption investigation, citing the need to chart the high road on ethics.

"There's a clear distinction between the two parties over how a member is supposed to conduct themselves. We threw Bill Jefferson off the committee. They gave [former Rep.] Tom DeLay [R-Texas] a standing ovation on the House floor."

Some of DeLay's former aides have pleaded guilty in a wide-ranging government corruption probe, and DeLay is under indictment in a Texas campaign-finance case.

Jefferson's removal irked members of the Congressional Black Caucus (CBC), who felt he was being unfairly singled out. The group has criticized Emanuel, saying he failed to hire enough minority consultants and did not seek the caucus's counsel. The Congressional Hispanic Caucus has at times registered similar concerns about Emanuel.

The DCCC chairman acknowledges that he has had a rocky relationship with some colleagues.

"There's no doubt I could change my style and be more patient," he conceded, noting that his wife had suggested they name a fourth child Patience as a "subtle reminder."

But he argues that he does not play favorites.

"I am impatient, [but] I'm impatient with everybody. ... I push the Blue Dogs as hard as I push the New Democrats as hard as I push the CBC. Either you do or don't believe this is a historical election."

He lamented a lack of effort from some of his colleagues.

"I've ruffled feathers with a purpose. There's a sclerosis that's set in. I've ruffled feathers of elder members of caucus with intention of recruiting younger members. I've ruffled of New Democrats and Blue Dogs. I've ruffled feathers, no doubt about it."

Tenn. May Give Dems Sixth Senator They Need (HILL)

By Dick Morris

The Hill, June 21, 2006

For months I have wondered which would be the sixth seat the Democrats could win to capture the Senate.

Because Vice President Dick Cheney would, of course, break any 50-50 tie in favor of the GOP, the Democrats, down 55-45 now, have to gain six seats in the 2006 election to get control.

Five prime Democratic targets have been obvious for some time. According to the latest Rasmussen polls, Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) belongs on the endangered-species list, trailing Bob Casey Jr., his Democratic challenger, by 56-33. Also behind, although by lesser margins, are Sens. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio), who trails Rep. Sherrod Brown by 44-41, and Conrad Burns (R-Mont.), losing to Jon Tester by 48-44.

Burns, handicapped by his association with Jack Abramoff, may be headed to defeat. DeWine, a former client of mine, has manifest campaign skills and could come back, but it doesn't look good.

Ahead of their Democratic challengers but well below 50 percent are Sens. Jim Talent (R-Mo.), who holds a narrow 43-40 lead over Claire McCaskill, and Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), who leads Sheldon Whitehouse by 44-42. Talent is a great candidate and could come back but would probably be defeated in a Democratic trend. Chafee, a prime RINO (Republican in name only), never really has captured the hearts of his state after succeeding his father and could also be a casualty of a GOP landslide in one of the country's most Democratic states.

If all five lose, a fair bet right now, who would be the sixth seat without which the Republicans would remain in charge of the Senate?

Now the Zogby poll indicates that Harold Ford, the Democratic candidate to succeed Majority Leader Bill Frist (R) in Tennessee, is running a surprisingly strong race against his three possible Republican opponents. That could be the sixth seat.

Zogby has Ford tied with former Rep. Ed Bryant, with each winning 42 percent of the vote, and trailing by a small margin, 43-41, against former Rep. Van Hilleary. A third possible candidate, Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker, leads Ford by 46-42.

Ford, one of a new generation of African-American politicians with considerable appeal across party lines, has two defects as he runs for the open seat: He is black in a state with the lowest African-American population in the old Confederacy, and his uncle is facing serious corruption charges. But both of these drawbacks are quite obvious to the voters of Tennessee. If they are insufficient to doom his candidacy, this man may be a winner.

Ford himself is a Southern version of Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), a moderate who has the capacity to attract independent votes. Ford rejects the extreme liberal ideology of many other black Democratic congressmen. He has also, one hopes, absorbed the lessons his ethically challenged family has to teach him about keeping his nose clean. Harold Ford is exactly the kind of black Democrat whom moderates would love to love.

There are other possible problems on the Democratic horizon. The most serious is in New Jersey, where the open seat of former Sen. Jon Corzine (D), now the governor, is contested by Corzine's anointed heir, Democrat Bob Menendez, and Republican Tom Kean Jr., the son of the former governor.

Rasmussen's polling has Kean holding a narrow 40-37 lead. Since Kean is obviously a statewide name and Menendez has been little-known outside of his district, the congressman would seem to have the edge. New Jersey, once a toss-up state, has become a true blue enclave largely because of Hispanic in-migration, a vote that will turn out in droves for Menendez.

Rasmussen also reports that Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) has been falling of late in his polling, so that might be another Republican target. But neither Washington state nor New Jersey can be counted on for the Republican Party.

All of this is to show that President Bush had better shake himself up and address the gas-price and energy issues that he has so far failed to speak out about, except for one mention in his long-ago State of the Union address. It is only by an ongoing relevance to this nation's key problem that Bush can hope to avert the disaster looming on the horizon.

Lieberman Could Put Leaders In Bind (RC)

By John Stanton And Nicole Duran

Roll Call, June 21, 2006

Should Sen. Joe Lieberman (D) opt to run as an Independent for re-election if he is defeated in Connecticut's August Democratic primary by political upstart Ned Lamont, Senate Democratic leaders could find themselves in uncharted political waters in deciding which candidate to back against Republican Alan Schlesinger and whether sanctions would be imposed on Lieberman for leaving the party even temporarily.

Although the Senate has twice before seen incumbents launch Independent re-election bids following a primary defeat — including, ironically, an unsuccessful 1970 run by the late Sen. Thomas Dodd (D-Conn.), the father of Connecticut's other Democratic Senator, Chris Dodd — neither of those instances seems likely to provide a precedent for Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.), according to Associate Senate Historian Don Ritchie.

Publicly, both Lieberman and Senate Democrats insist they are making no plans for a potential bid as an Independent and insist they are confident he will prevail in his party's primary contest.

"He said 'I'm a Democrat, period,'" Lieberman spokeswoman Marion Steinfels said. "Sen. Lieberman has said he always will be a Democrat. This is all speculation. Our campaign is completely 100 percent focused on winning Aug. 8. No one is sitting around strategizing" about an Independent bid.

DSCC spokesman Phil Singer called speculation about a possible Independent run "much ado about nothing: Joe Lieberman is and will remain a candidate in the Democratic primary." Schumer, however, refused to rule out backing Lieberman should he run without the party label when asked about it at a news conference last week.

When pressed on the matter by a reporter, Schumer said: "There are a lot of choices" if Lieberman loses the primary. "You can run as an Independent, you can run as an independent Democrat ... we'll cross that bridge when we come to it."

With Lamont mounting a serious challenge, Senate Democrats are making a point of rallying around Lieberman, with many lawmakers expected to travel to the Nutmeg State in the coming weeks. His Senate Democratic colleagues already have donated more than $49,000 since 2004 to his re-election campaign.

"I disagree with Joe on the war, but there are a lot of things we agree on," one Democratic Senator close to Lieberman said. The lawmaker, who has clashed with Lieberman in the past, nevertheless said that he will travel to Connecticut in the run-up to the primary to campaign for his colleague.

The Senator also argued that Lieberman is the stronger candidate and that a Lamont win could seriously damage the party's ability to take control of the Senate. "Joe Lieberman represents our best chance of taking back the majority. I think that if Ned Lamont wins that primary we're in real danger of losing that seat" in November, the Senator said.

Privately, however, Democrats acknowledge that Lieberman — whose positions on the Iraq war and often close relationship with the Bush administration have rankled many in the party — could force his fellow Senators to choose between backing one of their own and abiding by the wishes of the state's Democratic voters. Lieberman's decision to leave the door open to an Independent run has angered many rank-and-file Democratic activists and has added an unwanted wrinkle to Democrats' long-shot efforts to gain control of the Senate in November.

"Lieberman running as an Independent will do major damage to our party, undoing all the work we have been doing building relationships between Democrats in Washington and the [liberal] base back home," a senior Democratic aide said, warning that "If the DSCC and the establishment support a Lieberman Independent bid, it would send a message to state parties that they don't matter anymore. That would be devastating. Lieberman needs to run in the primary, follow the rules, and work hard for a win. Any other option should be off the table."

Ari Melber, a former Senate staffer and Web logger on Huffingtonpost.com agreed, saying that, "if he loses the primary and bolts the party for his own political agenda, it would reveal that he is more concerned with staying in power than honoring Connecticut's primary process. In the end, Lieberman brought these questions on himself. He says he is proud of being a Democrat, so why won't he commit to supporting the Democratic nominee?"

Melber also argues that the base's unhappiness with the Connecticut lawmaker goes beyond his position on the war, noting that on several key issues Lieberman has broken with the bulk of his party.

"I think it's about much more than Iraq," Melber said, noting that President Bush and Vice President Cheney "cite Lieberman in speeches to attack broader Democratic plans and values" and that angers the base significantly.

Leadership aides said neither Reid nor Schumer is preparing for fallout from a possible Independent run and insisted no discussions have occurred on whether to back an Independent campaign by Lieberman or whether the Caucus would force him to step down as ranking member of the Senate's Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

State party leaders in Connecticut are also hopeful that a three-way race is a dilemma they will not have to face.

"I will be endorsing the Democratic Party candidate, who I anticipate will be Joe Lieberman," said Nancy DiNardo, the state party chairman.

According to Ritchie, an Independent campaign by Lieberman would represent only the third time that an incumbent would have taken such a step in modern Senate history. In the case of Dodd, following his loss to Joseph Duffey in the Democratic primary, he mounted an Independent bid, garnering 24 percent of the popular vote to Duffy's 33 percent, essentially splitting the Democratic vote and allowing GOP challenger Lowell Weicker to win the election. (Lieberman unseated Weicker in 1988, and Weicker would later win election as Connecticut governor running as an Independent.)

However, the Dodd case was significantly different than this year's election. In 1967, Dodd was censured by the Senate for inappropriate personal use of campaign funds, according to Ritchie. Dodd was also neither the chairman nor ranking member of a committee, unlike Lieberman. Lieberman has also not been the subject of any ethics scandals or censure.

Similarly, Lieberman's circumstances are only partially similar to those surrounding the Senate's other example in which former Sen. Jacob Javits (R-N.Y.) ran on the Liberal Party ticket after being defeated in the GOP primary by Alfonse D'Amato. Although Javits was ranking member of the Foreign Relations Committee — and was sworn in as the committee chairman for his last day in the Senate — his 1980 Liberal Party challenge to D'Amato was, according Ritchie, prompted largely out of anger at D'Amato for basing much of his primary challenge on Javits' poor health rather than his record in office.

Lieberman's 'Little Fun' In Animated Ad Rankles Opponent (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

A couple of old hands in Connecticut politics are ganging up on Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D).

George Jepsen, a former chairman of the state Democratic Party and former state Senate majority leader, on Monday endorsed the candidacy of Ned Lamont, a businessman who is closing in on Lieberman in the polls. Lamont's support has come largely from antiwar activists angry with Lieberman's stance on Iraq. Jepsen's endorsement follows one from former senator Lowell P. Weicker Jr., who was defeated by Lieberman in 1988.

"It's a very difficult decision, because I've known Joe Lieberman for 20-odd years, and I like him and I thought he's sincere in what he believes," Jepsen said. "But it's become increasingly clear on most of the major issues of the day that I don't share his values. . . . I personally believe the war is possibly the worst foreign policy mistake of the post-World War II era, and Joe has been an enabler of that."

Recent polls showed Lieberman holding a lead of 55 percent to 40 percent over Lamont among likely voters in the Aug. 8 Democratic primary.

Lieberman's campaign recently posted a Web ad poking fun at the Weicker-Lamont alliance. "Remember Lowell Weicker? Well, bears never forget. He's never gotten over losing his Senate race to Joe Lieberman," says the ad, which features animation of a bear. "But instead of coming out of hibernation, he's sent his bear cub, instead -- Ned Lamont."

Lieberman spokeswoman Marion Steinfels explained the ad as having "a little fun with the Greenwich billionaires uniting against Senator Lieberman." Lamont spokesman Liz Dupont-Diehl called the ad "pathetic."

Lieberman has won a string of endorsements from prominent Democrats around the state, including the state party chairman and state Senate majority leader. One endorsement he won't be getting is that of his 2000 running mate, Al Gore. In an interview Sunday with Al Hunt of Bloomberg TV, Gore called Lieberman "my close friend" but said, "I typically do not get involved in Democratic primaries."

Gore, who has opposed the Iraq war, did endorse former Vermont governor Howard Dean in the 2004 Democratic presidential primaries.Democrats Cash In

For the first time in recent memory, the Democratic Party's House and Senate campaign committees have more money to spend on races than their Republican counterparts.

Five months before the midterm elections, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee ended May with $24.5 million in the bank, compared with the National Republican Congressional Committee's $21.9 million, according to reports filed with the Federal Election Commission yesterday.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee had $33.5 million at the end of last month and the National Republican Senatorial Committee showed $18.5 million.

Republicans still maintain a wide advantage in one arena. The Republican National Committee ended May with $43 million in the bank; the Democratic National Committee had $10.3 million.Thompson Won't Challenge Kohl

Former governor Tommy Thompson announced Monday that he will not seek the Senate seat in Wisconsin, which leaves Republicans with no major challenger to Democratic Sen. Herb Kohl.

"Governor Thompson will not run for the United States Senate in 2006," Thompson's office said in a statement, according to the Associated Press. "He is enjoying his work in the private sector and decided against a return to public office at this time."

Thompson, 64, announced last month he would not run for governor but left open the possibility of running against Kohl, a three-term incumbent. Once the longest-serving governor in Wisconsin, Thompson resigned in 2001 to become President Bush's first secretary of Health and Human Services.

Lieberman Vs. The Democrats (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

Connecticut Sen. Joseph Lieberman is as seasoned a pol as anyone can find, but he seems to have forgotten the very purpose of elections.

In a remarkable interview he recently gave to The Post's David S. Broder [op-ed, June 18], the Democrats' 2000 vice presidential nominee sounded appalled that his fellow Democrats might, in his state's upcoming August primary, reject his reelection bid because he doesn't think his party should criticize the president on the conduct of the Iraq war. (By most indications, his primary opponent, businessman Ned Lamont, is mounting a strong challenge.)

"I know I'm taking a position that is not popular within the party," Lieberman told Broder, "but that is a challenge for the party -- whether it will accept diversity of opinion or is on a kind of crusade or jihad of its own to have everybody toe the line. No successful political party has ever done that."

That's a rather stunning assertion. If parties were based on the acceptance of diversity of opinion on the most important issues of the day, they would lack the definition to be parties at all. And the conduct and duration of our involvement in Iraq is, by the measure of every single poll, the No. 1 issue in the minds of the American people -- a majority of whom believe that the Bush administration has botched the war about as badly as a war can be botched.

Now, maybe I've had this backward all my life, but I thought that elections were held to enable voters to choose between candidates espousing different points of view on the most important issues. Lieberman seems to believe that elections exist to enable voters not to choose -- indeed, to "accept diversity of opinion." And that if voters have the temerity to go ahead and choose anyway, they have crossed the line between party and sect in their zeal "to have everybody toe the line."

Toe the line? On Iraq? The Democrats? What line would that be? Last week, when the Republican leadership in the House brought forth a resolution that rejected setting a timetable for withdrawing troops and that called the war an integral part of the fight against global terrorism, 42 Democrats voted yes and 149 Democrats voted no. This week two groups of Democratic senators have introduced rival resolutions on Iraq policy in the Senate: one calling for the withdrawal of most ground troops by July 1, 2007, and the other calling on the president to begin phased redeployment of troops by the end of this year.

Whatever the Democrats' flaws, moving in lock step on Iraq isn't one of them. Indeed, the Republicans seem to have concluded that the uniformity of their own message on Iraq -- unpopular though it may be -- plays better than the Democrats' cacophony.

Lieberman's problem is not that he faces expulsion from a sect but that he has chosen to stand outside what remains a big, messy tent of a party. Moreover, he seems to have reversed the roles that the two parties play when it comes to Iraq.

By criticizing the president on the war, he has said, the Democrats are playing partisan politics. His opponent, Lieberman told Broder, criticized him for breaking "Democratic unity. . . . Well, dammit, I wasn't thinking about Democratic unity. It was a moment to put the national interest above partisan interest."

How's that again? To criticize Bush on the war is partisan, while refusing to criticize Bush on the war affirms the national interest? That's taking a rather partisan -- a pro-Bush partisan -- view of the national interest. Lieberman is surely right that one party has exploited the war for partisan gain, but that party is the GOP. From forcing through a resolution authorizing the war on the eve of the 2002 elections to last week's vote in the House, the Republicans have continually used the war to play gotcha with any Democrats from swing states or districts with the guts to dissent from the administration's non-reality-based view of the conflict.

In talking with Broder, Lieberman also expressed a kind of wry nostalgia for the pre-primary days when political bosses could assemble slates of candidates essentially by themselves. But the last stand of the bosses came in 1968, when machine-appointed delegates to the Democratic National Convention nominated Hubert Humphrey for president even though the voters in those states that had held primaries had favored the anti-Vietnam War candidacies of Robert Kennedy and Eugene McCarthy. Thereafter, delegates in every state were selected in primaries and caucuses, as party leaders concluded that voters would demand -- and even deserved -- a say on issues as fundamental as Vietnam. To Joe Lieberman's apparent dismay, Iraq is just such an issue, and the voters of his state are just irresponsible enough to judge him on it.

The Great Democratic Hope (WSJ)

By Ross Douthat

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

Iowa and New Hampshire are still 18 months away, but the 2008 presidential campaign has already entered its Cuomo hour -- the twilight period before a race when the press grows weary of the likely candidates and begins casting about for big names and dark horses. It's a moment when imaginations run wild: Conservative pundits confidently announce that only Rudy can beat Hillary; a glorified PowerPoint presentation is all it takes for Al Gore to be anointed savior of his party; and the fence-sitting politicians who want to run for president someday try to read the tea leaves and figure out if that someday should be now.

History suggests that the answer should be "yes" for almost all of them, potential frontrunners and long shots alike. If Rudy Giuliani ever wants to run, for instance, the case for him to do so in 2008 is practically airtight. The nomination is up for grabs and every rival has a weakness; the GOP will be looking for a white knight to replace a weakened president; and Mr. Giuliani's socially liberal record won't go away with time, whereas his personal appeal will fade as the memory of 9/11 diminishes. A similar calculus holds for Mr. Gore: If he wants to make another run, he's unlikely to have a better foil than Hillary Clinton or a media more likely to rally to his side. * * *

But consider a more difficult case -- Barack Obama, the Great Democratic Hope, who's currently pegged as a frontrunner for 2012, or perhaps 2016 or even 2020. Would it be presumptuous for Illinois's junior senator to run this time around, on the basis of charisma, a compelling personal story and just a few short years in Washington? Of course it would -- but it might also be the smartest thing he ever does.

Yes, Mr. Obama is young and untested; yes, there are older, better-qualified names in line ahead of him. But he's in the Senate, where presidential aspirations go to die, and his political stock may never be higher than it is right now, when liberal Democrats and centrists alike project their dreams upon him, undimmed by the disappointments and compromises of a long career. For the moment, he's part Clinton, part Roosevelt, part JFK and MLK; but in eight or 12 or 16 years, he might be John Kerry.

Would Mr. Obama win in 2008? Probably not -- though he's breaking records as a fund raiser, and sparking more enthusiasm from Democratic audiences than any of the other '08 hopefuls. As the New Republic's Ryan Lizza has pointed out, there will be no incumbents in 2008 to unseat, either in the primaries or the general election, whereas "if he waits until 2012, he will face the historically impossible task of unseating the incumbent president of his own party, or the historically difficult task of unseating the incumbent president of the opposition party." Meanwhile, 2016 and 2020 are eternities away. And as with John Edwards, a good showing in the primaries could make Mr. Obama the presumptive VP nominee -- while unlike Mr. Edwards, he'll have a Senate seat to fall back on if he loses.

The danger, of course, is that he might peak too soon -- the fate of Harold Stassen, for instance, who ran well in the 1948 GOP primaries and badly in eight presidential elections thereafter -- or else get laughed off the stage as an overly ambitious greenhorn. But in presidential politics, it's usually better to run too early than to wait, and wait, for a perfect moment that may not come. Losing the 1988 primaries at age 39 didn't hurt Al Gore's long-term prospects; it didn't hurt Ronald Reagan's future chances that he ran, and lost, against Gerald Ford in 1976; losing to George W. Bush in the 2000 primaries doesn't seem to have damaged John McCain's '08 hopes. Mr. Edwards was mocked as callow in 2004, but his VP slot on the Kerry ticket carried him to the doorstep of the White House. And sometimes you even shock the world and win -- as Bill Clinton did in 1992, like Jimmy Carter and JFK before.

Wait too long, on the other hand, and time can pass you by. Think of the Democratic bigwigs -- Mario Cuomo, Sam Nunn, Bill Bradley -- who declined to take on George H.W. Bush in 1992, preferring to wait for a more propitious moment. More recently, Hillary decided that 2008, not 2004, was the perfect year to make her bid, and while she may yet be proven right, you have to wonder if she might have improved on Mr. Kerry's close-but-no-cigar showing against George W. Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0036622

Fence-sitting politicians will always be tempted to take a page from Richard Nixon, the most Machiavellian campaigner of them all, who supposedly bided his time after his defeat in '60, sitting out the 1964 race and letting the moment come to him. But Nixon didn't sit out '64, exactly -- in the months before that year's GOP convention he plotted on the sidelines, lining up chits and calling on donors, ready to seize the nomination if it seemed to be on offer. 1964 was hardly a perfect year for him to run, and it would have been a far harder race than the next election proved to be. But Nixon knew what today's political Hamlets would do well to remember -- that the perfect is the enemy of the best, and that if you want the White House you have to seize the day, because the "next election" doesn't always come.

The Democrats Reassess (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

This is idea week for the Democratic Party.

On Monday, three veteran party strategists -- William Galston, Stan Greenberg and Ruy Teixeira -- launched a Web site (http://www.thedemocraticstrategist.org) with the goal of generating fact-based, empirically tested theories that might help Democrats resolve their policy differences and win more elections.

Yesterday saw another launch party, this time for Democracy, a quarterly journal that also will be available online (http://www.democracyjournal.org). The magazine will be edited by Andrei Cherny and Kenneth Baer, two younger veterans of recent party wars. Their goal is do for the Democrats what journals such as Public Interest did for conservatives and Republicans decades ago, which is to bring forward big ideas to challenge what they regard as the tired thinking that grips Democratic politicians.

On Thursday, NDN (formerly the New Democrat Network) will convene its annual conference. NDN, founded by Simon Rosenberg, has recently been in the forefront of moving beyond differences between centrists, liberals and the new world of blogs and net-roots activists, all with an eye toward tipping the political balance back in a Democratic direction.

Those in the middle of these events share a similar conviction, which is that for too long Republicans have been winning the battle of ideas (and often campaign strategy) in American politics, in part because conservatives invested in what is now a well-funded infrastructure of organizations that have produced ideas, thinkers, publications, strategists, and politicians who now control the White House, Congress and increasingly the federal judiciary.

There is also a belief shared at least by some of the participants that Democrats have ridden for too long on what are the fumes of the New Deal and the Great Society, which sustained Democrats for half a century. The first issue of Democracy offers articles on rethinking how to finance the health-care system, the economic and security challenges posed by differing birthrates around the world, and alternatives to redistribution to reduce inequality. The Democratic Strategist provides essays on competence as a campaign theme, protecting voting rights and demography's impact on politics.

Doug Hattaway, a Democratic communications consultant who worked for Al Gore's presidential campaign in 2000, recalled a moment of epiphany during a focus group of Democratic operatives and marketing professionals he attended last year. The participants were asked to say what Democratic accomplishments they were most proud of. Their responses filled several pages on a flip chart set up in the focus group facility. "We all realized there was nothing there within the past 30 years," Hattaway said.

Many Democratic politicians are still tied to past glory and what worries some of the progressives trying to generate new ideas is that elected officials are divorced from what is a lively debate-in-the-making on national security and domestic challenges. "Somehow or another this conversation does not really make its way to Democratic politicians very much," said Michael Tomasky, editor of the liberal American Prospect.

The lone exception he cited was Bill Clinton and his presidency.

Baer offered a sharper critique of the politicians, criticizing as poll-driven and uninspired the 2006 campaign agenda issued by congressional Democrats. "You could go through it line by line and write the poll questions that generated each line," he said.

The people in the middle of the Democrats' idea week seem to agree on another point, which is that the two-decade-old battle between party centrists and liberals may have run its course. "I think the old centrist-liberal debate in the party is to some extent dead," Teixeira said. "I think people have lost interest in that."

Galston noted that, while he is a charter member of the centrist movement, he split with many of his friends at the Democratic Leadership Council by opposing the war in Iraq. Rosenberg has been looking for fusion between center and left, between old strategist and new bloggers. On everything from fighting terrorism to assuring economic security in a time of globalization, many of these activists believe, the party will have to put aside left-right battles of the past and come up with fresh ideas.

DOJ_NMG_0036623

It was left to some conservatives to offer Democrats comfort. Historian Francis Fukuyama, who has broken with other neo conservatives over Iraq, said the conservative era may be ending. "It does seem to me that the country is way overdue for one of those big pendulum swings back," he said.

William Kristol, editor of the conservative Weekly Standard, also reminded the progressives that internecine battles can be constructive, recalling vicious fights over the years that he said resulted in stronger conservative movement. "It's a big mistake when people lament that, gee, there's too much infighting on our side," he said.

Merrill Apparently Shot Himself On The Bay (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

Philip Merrill, the prominent publisher and former diplomat whose body was found floating in the Chesapeake Bay on Monday, suffered from a heart condition and apparently took his own life, his family said last night.

Merrill, 72, was found with a shotgun wound to the head and a small anchor tied around one or both ankles, according to a source familiar with the investigation.

"Obviously, he took his own life," the source said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the results of an autopsy had not been announced. "This is not an accident."

Merrill, who was famously brash and determined as the leader of a publishing empire that includes Washingtonian magazine and the Capital newspaper of Annapolis, lately had become fatigued and unmotivated, his family said in a statement late yesterday. They said he had undergone heart surgery a year ago and was on several medications as a result.

"Over the past four weeks we've observed that his spirit dimmed," the family said.

"We were concerned for his welfare but never imagined he would consider taking his own life," they said. "Unfortunately, with the same resolve and single-mindedness that made him so effective as an executive he appears to have made his decision to carry out his actions with tragic consequences."

The development was a startling turn in a series of tragic events that began June 10, when his boat was found under sail but empty and drifting in high winds. A massive search that day and for days later yielded nothing. Then, on Monday, a recreational boater found his body close to a shipping lane off Poplar Island, more than 11 miles from where his boat, the Merrilly, had been found.

"To be honest with you, I'm speechless," Tom Marquardt, executive editor of the Capital, said last night. "This ending does not change his accomplishments one iota."

Merrill was assistant secretary general to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in the early 1990s and president of the Export-Import Bank of the United States from 2002 until last year. He frequently took time away from his business to pursue diplomatic and intelligence assignments for the government. He served six administrations, mostly in the State and Defense departments.

His death recalled two other high-profile incidents involving prominent Washington area residents. In 1996, former CIA director William E. Colby died from drowning and exposure after falling from a canoe off Charles County. After his body was recovered more than a week later, authorities said he probably had a stroke or heart attack before the accident.

In 1978, another former high-level CIA employee, John A. Paisley, disappeared while sailing across the Chesapeake Bay. His body was found a week later near Solomons Island with a fatal gunshot wound in an apparent suicide.

Ex-Anchor Adrift After CBS News Cuts His Workload (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

Dan Rather accused CBS executives yesterday of not having "lived up to their obligation to allow me to do substantive work there" as the network announced his departure after a 44-year career.

CBS officials heaped praise on the longtime anchor, even as they were ushering him out the door yesterday. Rather, for his part, made clear his frustration with the network for refusing to renew his contract or give him an ample workload at "60 Minutes."

His departure "represents CBS's final acknowledgement, after a protracted struggle," that the network was making inadequate use of him, Rather said in a statement. "As for their offers of a future with only an office but no assignments, it just isn't in me to sit around doing nothing."

CBS News President Sean McManus tried to accentuate the positive, likening Rather's career to those of Edward R. Murrow and Walter Cronkite.

"I'm sad this day has come," he said, "but really hope the challenges Dan talked about for him in the future provide the ability to do the great kind of work he wants to do."

Asked why the network is dropping the 74-year-old Rather, McManus said: "We just couldn't come up with an arrangement that had enough work to satisfy both him and CBS. If there had been a scenario that would have provided a workload that made sense for both CBS and Dan, we would have pursued that, but unfortunately that was not the case."

The network says it plans to pay tribute to Rather in a prime-time special this fall and is making a donation to his Texas alma mater, Sam Houston State University. Rather is expected to leave this week, well before the November expiration of his contract.

Rather, who anchored the "CBS Evening News" for 24 years, relinquished the post early last year after apologizing for a 2004 story -- based on documents that could not be authenticated -- that charged President Bush had received favorable treatment from the National Guard three decades ago.

McManus would not address whether the botched Guard story, which prompted the resignations of three senior network executives and the firing of Rather's producer, was a factor in CBS's decision to end Rather's career there. On the advice of company lawyers, McManus never met with Rather.

"It would be silly for me to try to list his enormous accomplishments and the contributions he made to CBS News," McManus said. "As time goes by, people will probably appreciate those more and more. I have nothing but respect and admiration for Dan Rather." CBS chief executive Les Moonves also hailed Rather in a statement for his "singular passion" and "dedication."

The Washington Post reported the decision to drop Rather last week, citing network sources as saying there was no room for him on "60 Minutes," in part because the program must find time for two part-time contributors, incoming anchor Katie Couric and CNN's Anderson Cooper.

"I'm going to miss him, just because he's been part of my life for so long," said Bob Schieffer, who met Rather while covering the Kennedy assassination and served as his interim successor. "I truly believe Dan Rather was a major figure in American journalism in the 20th century. His successes were larger than life, and his mistakes were larger than life."

While some CBS staff members say the network is treating Rather shabbily, many believe that he badly damaged the news division with his mishandling of the Guard story and that his departure is overdue. A number were shaking their heads over his recent comment to the New York Times that, having had little to do lately, he had gone five times to see the George Clooney film about Murrow, "Good Night, and Good Luck," sometimes by himself.

Rather covered wars from Vietnam to Yugoslavia to Iraq, political conventions and plenty of hurricanes in between, landing big interviews along the way. He was the first to interview President Bill Clinton after his impeachment, and the last Western journalist to sit down with Saddam Hussein before the 2003 U.S. invasion.

But Rather was also a lightning rod for conservatives, especially after his confrontational 1988 interview with Vice President George Bush over the Iran-contra scandal.

Mark Cuban, the billionaire owner of the Dallas Mavericks, confirmed on his blog that he is in discussions with Rather about launching a program on HDNet, a high-definition channel that reaches about 3 million homes. "We hope to do a deal where he produces a show that uncovers news. Information with a payoff. . . . I will tell you that there won't be any corporate considerations. No earnings per share issues. No worries about advertisers and what they might think," Cuban wrote.

Rather, who commanded a multimillion-dollar salary as the face of CBS News, maintained yesterday that "too much is made of anchors and their personalities, their ups and downs," as opposed to questions about the role of a free press and the "corporatization" of news.

Michael Wolff, a Vanity Fair columnist, called the CBS executives "a bunch of phony balonies" for praising Rather while dismissing him. "They looked at this with some amount of cold logic," Wolff said. "He's disgraced, he's old and we have a whole new era that's beginning, so let's get rid of him. It has no decency or compassion."

John Hinderaker, a lawyer whose conservative blog raised early questions about the disputed Guard documents, said it was "really indefensible" for Rather to have stood by the story for nearly two weeks. But, he said, "I've got some sympathy for the view that he had a long and distinguished career and that one episode shouldn't negate a lot of years of hard work. I always kind of liked the guy. He was a little quirky, an old-fashioned anchorman."

Rem Rieder, editor of American Journalism Review, said Rather "certainly brought on a lot of his own problems with the National Guard story. But given his long history with CBS and all the work he's done, you just wish there would have been a more graceful way to end this saga. One of the hardest things in life is knowing when it's time to go."

Rather Steps Down From Post At CBS News After 44 Years (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

DOJ_NMG_0036625

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

CBS News veteran Dan Rather will leave his post after 44 years on the job, the network announced yesterday.

Calling Mr. Rather a "reporter's reporter," Sean McManus, president for news and sports coverage, said: "His legacy cannot be replicated."

But Mr. Rather's legacy has turned bitter in the last year, tainted by the network's recent decision not to renew his contract and the ballyhoo over former NBC morning hostess Katie Couric, who arrives to replace Mr. Rather in September.

The newsman, who turns 75 in October, does not plan to simply fade away like an old soldier. He will, in fact, exit on a strident note.

"My departure before the term of my contract represents CBS' final acknowledgment, after a protracted struggle, that they had not lived up to their obligation to allow me to do substantive work," Mr. Rather said yesterday.

"As for their offers of a future with only an office but not assignments, it just isn't in me to sit around doing nothing," he added.

Recent press reports indicate Mr. Rather may take up a newscasting role with HDNet, a high-definition cable channel currently available in about 3 million homes. The folksy Texan is one of the last old-school, authority-figure anchormen -- and not without notoriety. Still, he downplayed celebrity and rued the state of journalism yesterday.

"Too much is made of anchors and their personalities, their ups and downs," Mr. Rather said. "The large issues -- the role of a free press and of honest, real news in a democracy, the role of technology in supporting a free press, the 'corporatization' of news and its effect on news content -- all deserve more attention."

He delivered his final broadcast as prime-time anchorman on March 9, 2005, signing off with the word "courage." The dramatic exit ended months of controversy after a setback for CBS delivered by Mr. Rather himself.

He suffered public loss of credibility after using forged documents in a "60 Minutes II" broadcast in late 2004 that accused President Bush of compromising his Vietnam-era National Guard duty, aired in the pivotal weeks before the presidential election. In the aftermath, Mr. Rather traded his anchor chair for the role of special correspondent, and CBS ceremoniously fired four news executives after completing a lengthy internal review.

"Dan Rather's career ended about two years ago, after the National Guard story," Brent Bozell of the Media Research Center said yesterday. "He made not just a monumental mistake, but a monumental mistake compounded by months of denials. To this day, he claims his innocence in this. And that's what really undid him."

Mr. Rather, who broke into journalism in Texas as a reporter for the Associated Press and later United Press International, took over as anchorman from Walter Cronkite in 1981. In 2002, he broadcast excerpts from journalist Daniel Pearl's videotaped execution by Islamist terrorists, over the objections of the White House and the State Department. He also interviewed Saddam Hussein in 2003, though officials cautioned journalists to be wary of media-savvy terrorists.

Rather's Career Comes To A Sudden End (USAT)

By The Media Mix By Peter Johnson

USA Today, June 21, 2006

Dan Rather's troubles with CBS News began in 2004 with Memogate, the scandal that stemmed from his 60 Minutes report on President Bush's military service.

But 60 Minutes correspondent Steve Kroft says Rather's CBS career, which came to its official close Tuesday, ended much like those of two other CBS News legends, Edward R. Murrow and Walter Cronkite: CBS wanted to move on and, news icons or not, they had to go.

“The past two years have been extremely difficult for Dan and uncomfortable for everyone at CBS News,” Kroft says. “But he has handled the adversity with his customary grace and leaves with his head held high. This has much less to do with the National Guard story than management's decision that it was time to make a change and move in a different direction.”

It's no secret that CBS, by hiring former Today star Katie Couric to anchor the Evening News and adding younger correspondents such as Lara Logan and CNN's Anderson Cooper to 60's ranks, is eyeing the next generation of viewers.

Rather and CBS News chief Sean McManus say they were at odds over how many stories Rather would report for 60 Minutes, where he turned after leaving The CBS Evening News in March 2005.

McManus, named president in November, says he didn't talk to Rather about his future because lawyers “got very quickly involved” and he was advised to let them handle it. “If there was an amount of assignments that made sense for Dan and CBS, we would have pursued that, but there was not.”

Rather declined to be interviewed. But he said in a statement that leaving “before the term of my contract represents CBS' final acknowledgement, after a protracted struggle, that they had not lived up to their obligation to allow me to do substantive work there. As for their offers of a future with only an office but no assignments, it just isn't in me to sit around doing nothing.”

DOJ_NMG_0036626

On his website, Mark Cuban, founder of cable's HDNet, wrote that he has been talking to Rather about anchoring a high-definition broadcast “that uncovers news” with “no worries about advertisers and what they might think.”

Rather will be the subject of a prime-time special on his career next fall, the network said.

Rather's departure from CBS after 44 years — and the way it was handled — was topic No. 1 in news circles Tuesday. Some say Rather was owed a better sendoff; others say he got what he deserved.

“No one likes to see a run like this end on such a bad note,” says NBC Nightly News anchor Brian Williams. “But somewhere in Pennsylvania a father of four with 19 years under his belt came home after getting his notice at the factory today, and he would give anything for one week of Dan's compensation. Dan would be the first to counsel massive amounts of perspective on this story.”

“Most people at CBS” thought Rather should have resigned after two of his producers on the National Guard story were fired, says 60 Minutes commentator Andy Rooney. “On the other hand, I feel vaguely bad for him; it's a sad way for him to end his career.”

“Even before the scandal, he didn't have the reservoir of good will (at 60) that Walter Cronkite or Bob Schieffer would have had,” says Bob Zelnick, a former ABC News correspondent who chairs the journalism school at Boston University. “Could CBS have acted with more grace? Of course.”

Says Brent Bozell, head of the Media Research Center, a conservative watchdog group: “The real irony is that Guard story had the potential to destroy George Bush's career, but it ultimately destroyed Dan Rather's.”

CBS To Rather: Good Night, And Good Luck (WP)

By Tom Shales

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

Dan Rather is a free man. After an appropriately acrimonious final round of legal wrangling, his 44 years with CBS News came to an end yesterday -- or will come to an end today. Or will end Friday. There's a bit of confusion on that point.

Those who have followed the awkward exit of Rather from his position first as anchor of the "CBS Evening News" last year, then as a CBS News employee this year, often ask a simple question: How could a network for which Rather has done so much and served so loyally treat him so shabbily as the curtain falls?

Some think there is a strange personal grudge against Rather by CBS chief executive Leslie Moonves, who was quoted diplomatically in a CBS news release yesterday as saying of Rather, "The unique mark he has left on his craft is indelible." Others think there is intense pressure on CBS News President Sean McManus to clear Rather and all remnants of him from the premises in preparation for the arrival of Katie Couric, the former "Today" show host who will anchor the "Evening News" this fall and has a growing reputation in the business as the neediest diva on the block.

An explanation from one of Rather's many supporters inside the company: "We're dealing with a bunch of classic idiots."

Reached at his home in New York, Rather did not sound rattled. It is unlikely he will make an appearance at the fly-infested CBS News building on New York's West 57th Street this week; the contents of his office -- including the family Bible that was always opened to a different verse -- have been removed and will be sent to him. As of Friday, officially, Dan Rather and CBS News will no longer be one.

Now that the smoke has cleared from a final skirmish, Rather says he and his wife, Jean, and one or two of their children are headed for a retreat in the Catskills that has been in the family for decades. Then the couple will head to Alaska because Dan loves to fish there, and because the air is so clean. Especially when compared with the air on the Upper West Side.

CBS will pay Rather, either by lump sum or biweekly paychecks, through November, when his contract is officially up. Since he makes $12 million a year, that was worth arguing about, and CBS executives did argue until Monday. As most of those who follow such events know, Rather was removed as anchor of the "CBS Evening News" a year short of his 25th anniversary after the airing of an apparently flawed "60 Minutes II" report on George W. Bush's alleged special treatment while in the Texas National Guard. Rather was the correspondent on that report. One producer lost her job, others are suing.

Don Hewitt, executive producer of "60 Minutes," and Mike Wallace, its most famous correspondent, huffed and puffed and declared that Rather should resign. Dan Rather is not the resigning type. Wallace has since apologized.

Although the CBS farewell statement issued yesterday was mostly bland and laudatory, it was updated later in the day on the CBS Web site after Rather's statement was released; a small blog war ensued. "In response to the [Rather] statement," said the Web site, "a CBS spokeswoman said: 'We value and respect Dan's tremendous career at CBS News. Despite the fact that we couldn't reach an agreement that satisfied everyone, we wish him all future success.' "

Rather was reassigned after the Bush report to join the correspondents on "60 Minutes" and "60 Minutes II," a then-successful spinoff of the original classic news program. If "60 Minutes II" went off the air, the agreement said -- and it did go off the air -- Rather was to join "60 Minutes," where he'd earlier made a major mark as an investigative reporter, full time. But Rather discovered in fairly short order that he was a correspondent in only a token, perfunctory way.

He contributed a mere seven reports to the shows over the past year and a half, Rather said Monday. "From 18 to 22 is the norm."

Some of his detractors claimed this was poetic justice because Rather, on ascending to the anchor chair March 9, 1981, supposedly banished his predecessor, Walter Cronkite, from ever appearing on the program and even from doing other reporting work for CBS News. But one of Rather's supporters said yesterday that, first of all, Rather would hardly have had the authority to "ban" Cronkite from the airwaves and, second, Cronkite hosted a series, "Universe," in prime time on the network.

That his last weeks and days at CBS should be marked by turbulence seems somehow appropriate for Rather, although through the years he has been among the most ferociously loyal of company men where CBS News was concerned. As with such illustrious predecessors as Edward R. Murrow, Rather's in-house enemies were up in the corporate stratosphere, not down in the trenches with the hard-working journalists.

He suffered and squirmed under the disastrous reign of CBS Chairman Laurence Tisch, who slashed the news division budget and, by losing professional football to another network, lost a number of important affiliates, too. Rather's "Evening News," which had been No. 1, eventually fell to third place. In some major markets its lead-in, the local CBS station's news, was paltry, further handicapping the Rather program.

Over the years he endured all kinds of advice and counsel on his delivery of the news. There were plans to do the newscast standing up after Cronkite left, but those were abandoned. For a while, Rather wore a sleeveless sweater under his jacket to try to "warm him up" on the air. Some found his formality too rigid. As the hired entertainment at a Clinton-era press dinner, radio shock jock Don Imus observed, "Dan Rather delivers the news as if he were making a hostage tape."

But all the comments only tend to "underscore," as Rather liked to say, his controversiality on the air, his status as a national lightning rod, a dynamic personality about whom no one seemed to lack an opinion. On the CBS Web site yesterday, former rival Tom Brokaw spoke in mellow tones of the old three-anchor era that is now history, Brokaw having retired, ABC's Peter Jennings having died and the great Rather having been brought down from his pedestal.

"Dan, Peter and I chased each other around the world a lot," Brokaw recalled. "We made each other better, I think, by being so competitive." It was Rather who was the most competitive of all and whose trips to the news sites of the world forced his fellow anchors to follow. This might be his great contribution: redefining the term anchor to such a degree that "anchor" is an anomaly. An anchor holds a ship in one place, but Rather was always on the go, whether interviewing terrorists in the Mideast or clinging to a tree in the midst of a torrential hurricane.

He was and remains a living legend in the business he loves, and the bumpy years that ended his CBS run cannot change that. One of Rather's former bosses, Sir Howard Stringer (now president of Sony Corp.), used to marvel that when he'd walk down the street with Rather, the anchor had a magnetic effect on people -- real people, who would come up to him to shake his hand or express a grievance or offer words of admiration.

Last night, Bob Schieffer -- Rather's temporary successor -- said on "CBS Evening News": "Dan Rather was one of the great reporters of his time." This followed an affectionate and even stirring report by Anthony Mason that retraced a few of Rather's giant steps.

Rather says that, though 74, he has no intention of leaving broadcast news. But watching the farewell report last night, one couldn't help thinking: We shall not see his like again. Ever. Because the domain he dominated is one of the things he is taking with him.

The world has changed a lot in Rather's 44 years at CBS. Yesterday, it changed a little more.

Surge Of Population In The Exurbs Continues (NYT)

By Rick Lyman

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

Once again, the fastest-growing cities in the United States are some of the far-flung exurbs in the Sun Belt and the Far West, according to fresh population estimates from the Census Bureau.

The bureau's annual survey of municipalities with at least 100,000 residents shows that from July 1, 2004, to July 1, 2005, four outer suburbs in California, three in Florida, two in Arizona and one in Nevada were the country's most rapidly growing.

Leading the list was Elk Grove, Calif., on the Sacramento area's far southern edge, which grew nearly 12 percent in those 12 months, to 112,338. Elk Grove was followed by North Las Vegas, Nev.; Port St. Lucie, Fla.; Gilbert, Ariz.; Cape Coral, Fla.; Moreno Valley, Calif.; Rancho Cucamonga, Calif.; Miramar, Fla.; Chandler, Ariz.; and Irvine, Calif.

Several of those cities were also on the previous year's list — Port St. Lucie was No. 1 then — and the pattern of the last decade has been for an increasing number of these distant exurbs to pace the national rate of population growth.

DOJ_NMG_0036628

"As far as we are concerned, this is very good news indeed," said Christine Brainerd, spokeswoman for Elk Grove's city government. "It's a sign that the development strategies the city has put in place are working and that we have become a place where many, many people want to live."

The Census Bureau made the estimates by taking the full 2000 census tally and then using population indicators like building permits to make a guess about subsequent growth. Since the estimates were for July 1 of last year, they do not include any population changes brought about by Hurricane Katrina, which struck on Aug. 29.

The only change in population ranking among the nation's 10 largest cities was that San Antonio supplanted San Diego in seventh place, although Phoenix came within fewer than 2,500 people of taking over fifth place from Philadelphia, as it will almost certainly do in next year's estimates.

In terms of the actual number of additional residents, as opposed to percentage growth, Phoenix attracted the most, its population rising an estimated 44,456, to 1,461,575.

And it was a Phoenix exurb, Gilbert, on the metropolitan area's far southeastern flank, that ranked first in growth in percentage terms from 2000 to 2005, spurting 58 percent, to 173,989 from 110,061.

Big-city Schools Struggle (USAT)

By Greg Toppo

USA Today, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Students in a handful of big-city school districts have a less than 50-50 chance of graduating from high school with their peers, and a few cities graduate far fewer than half each spring, according to research released on Tuesday.

Fourteen urban school districts have on-time graduation rates lower than 50%; they include Detroit, Baltimore, New York, Milwaukee, Cleveland, Los Angeles, Miami, Dallas, Denver and Houston.

The findings present a bleak picture and are sure to generate controversy as lawmakers and others push to keep U.S. students competitive globally.

While the basic finding that the nation's overall graduation rate is about 70% is not new, the study suggests that graduation rates are much lower than previously reported in many states. It also could bring the dropout debate to the local level, because it allows anyone with Internet access to view with unprecedented detail data on the nation's 12,000 school districts.

Among the nation's 50 largest districts, the study finds, three graduate fewer than 40%: Detroit (21.7%), Baltimore (38.5%) and New York City (38.9%).

The advantage of the new study is that “you could apply it to any and all school districts in the country with the same validity — and the same problems,” says Michael Casserly of The Council of the Great City Schools, an advocacy group for large urban districts.

He says it's still unclear whether researcher Christopher Swanson overstates the problem. Swanson's analysis, strictly speaking, is not a calculation of dropout rates but of graduation rates; it estimates the probability that a student in ninth grade will complete high school on time and with a regular diploma.

Adding to the debate: The study is sponsored by the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation, which promotes its own brand of high school reform. Last year, Bill Gates called U.S. high schools “obsolete.”

The study, which uses 2002 and 2003 data, the most current available, finds that public schools graduate 69.6% of an estimated 4 million eligible students each spring, meaning about 1.2 million students likely won't graduate this year. That means about 7,000 students drop out per school day, Swanson says.

Researcher Lawrence Mishel of the Economic Policy Institute says Swanson's figures “seriously understate graduation rates, especially for minorities.” They say that just 52% of blacks graduate, and 57% of Hispanics.

Mishel says by comparing the number of graduates with the number of ninth-graders, Swanson exaggerates the effects of the “ninth-grade bulge,” in which many ninth-graders are held back a year before tackling more advanced work and, often, state-mandated exit exams. Mishel's most recent research puts the overall U.S. graduation rate at 82%.

An A-to-Z Book Of Conservatism Now Weighs In (NYT)

By Jason Deparle

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 20 — It has red states and blond pundits; home schoolers and The Human Life Review; originalists, monetarists, federalists and evangelists; and no shortage of people named Kristol.

Now American conservatism can claim another mark of distinction: an encyclopedia all its own.

It is a big deal, in terms literal — 997 pages — and metaphorical. Few insults have stung the movement's thinkers as much as the barb from Lionel Trilling, the literary critic, who said conservatives had no ideas, "just irritable mental gestures."

DOJ_NMG_0036629

A half-century later, 251 contributors have weighed in, not so irritably, with a four-pound response.

"Feel the heft of it," said Lee Edwards, a former aide to Senator Barry Goldwater, who appears in the volume with a byline and an entry. "It's more than a book. It is, if you will, an estimate — it shows the maturation of the conservative movement."

And a timely one, at that. Sixteen years in the making, American Conservatism: An Encyclopedia appears with American conservatism, the political movement, warring over its future direction.

"We've gone from history's adversary to destiny's child, but governing has brought a whole new level of challenge," said Jeffrey O. Nelson, publisher of ISI Books, the conservative press in Wilmington, Del., that produced the encyclopedia. Criticizing what he called the "big education, big spending, big war, big government" conservatism of Republican leaders, Mr. Nelson said he hoped that the book, whose list price is $35, would help the movement return to its small-government roots.

"If conservatism is going to succeed and thrive in the 21st century," he said, "it's got to look more like the conservative tradition as expressed in this book than the conservatism currently practiced in Washington."

Those people toiling in the capital trenches may not recognize the conservatism represented here. The book omits familiar names like Ann Coulter, Tom DeLay, Grover Norquist, Bill O'Reilly and Karl Rove.

It includes the journals University Bookman, circulation 2,600, and First Things. It gives Willmoore Kendall, a political scientist who died in 1967, three times as much ink as former House Speaker Newt Gingrich. Those proportions are appropriate, said a former student of Mr. Kendall, William F. Buckley Jr., the founder of National Review, who called the reference book "terrific."

"Newt came and went rather fast but didn't leave hard fingerprints," Mr. Buckley said. "The quote, unquote conservative politicians have a pretty short lifetime in encyclopedia usage.

"It seems to me that if one were looking for orientation in such a world that the encyclopedia tries to serve that you would be more interested in Burckhardt," he said, a reference to Jacob Burckhardt, a 19th-century Swiss historian of the Renaissance, "than in any of more than 100 conservative senators in the past 50 years."

Garland Publishing started working on the encyclopedia in 1990. ISI Books took over the project 10 years later. ISI Books is part of the Intercollegiate Studies Institute, which, as Page 436 explains, is a nonprofit group founded in 1953 to promote conservative ideas in colleges.

The encyclopedia is being featured by two conservative book clubs, Mr. Nelson said, and has sold nearly 20,000 copies since its release about two months ago. Along with Mr. Nelson, its editors were Bruce P. Frohnen, who teaches at the Ave Maria School of Law in Ann Arbor, Mich., and Jeremy Beer of ISI Books. Given its gestation, the book includes contributions from scholars who are long dead, including Russell Kirk, who in 1953 published a seminal book, "The Conservative Mind." Kirk, who died in 1994, wrote essays on John Adams and moral imagination. Mr. Nelson is his son-in-law.

Some entries wear their conservatism on their sleeve. Goldwater's "loyalties were to duty, honor and country." Ronald Reagan had a "vigorous and principled agenda." Bill Clinton was "corrupt."

Others plumb more obscure topics with no obvious tilt. "Public choice economics" describes a theory of how special interests wield power. Two of its proponents have won Nobel Prizes.

The discussion under "Jewish conservatism" acknowledges a history of anti-Semitism on the right. The entry on Abraham Lincoln explores a conservative split between admirers and those who think he laid the groundwork for "contemporary statist liberalism."

The longest entry belongs to "Straussianism," a school of political theory founded by a professor at the University of Chicago, Leo Strauss, that emphasizes classical texts. Embraced by some leading proponents of the Iraq war, Straussianism is often regarded by those beyond its fold as opaque mumbo jumbo, a reputation that five pages of explanation may not dispel.

If there is a place where the rivers of the right converge, it appears to be the office of William Kristol, a Straussian editor and advocate, whose mother (Gertrude Himmelfarb), father (Irving Kristol), philosophy (neoconservatism) and magazine (The Weekly Standard) all earned separate entries.

Though Mr. Kristol was puzzled to read that he valued "the virtue of a citizenry" more than its prosperity or freedom, he declined to dwell on quibbles, praising the volume for concluding each entry with a short bibliography.

"What I liked most was that it encouraged you to read additional works," Mr. Kristol said.

Some quibbles are edifying. The entry about "God and Man at Yale," Mr. Buckley's most famous book, says it portrayed a campus "conspiracy" against capitalism and Christianity. But Mr. Buckley said his book "made a rather emphatic point to say there was no conspiracy, that people were acting out of their own impulses."

Another entry describes the editorial page of The Wall Street Journal as "pro-business." The page's editor, Paul A. Gigot, said the paper often criticized businesses that sought government favors and won a Pulitzer Prize in 1980 partly for an editorial called "Down With Big Business."

"We believe in capitalism, free markets and free people, not business over labor," Mr. Gigot said.

DOJ_NMG_0036630

The volume treads lightly, when it treads at all, on matters of race. It describes the "courtesy and dignity" of Strom Thurmond, who as a South Carolina governor and senator led the South's effort to preserve segregation. It does not mention that Mr. Thurmond had a black daughter whose existence he kept secret.

George C. Wallace, who became governor of Alabama pledging "segregation forever," was "always more complicated than his critics allowed." The discussion of "Southern conservatism" pays tribute to the region's "precious Anglo-American continuity" and says nothing about Jim Crow.

Dan T. Carter of the University of South of Carolina said such entries offered a "pasteurized" view of racial history. "The rise of American conservatism owes, in some part, to racial animosity, and it's uncomfortable for many conservatives to deal with that," said Mr. Carter, a biographer of Wallace who describes his politics as liberal. "You don't have to say that conservatism capitulated to it. But you have to acknowledge it was there."

Mr. Nelson agreed that the encyclopedia's discussion of race was incomplete and said the next edition would include an entry about conservatives' reaction to the civil rights movement.

"Our forebears made a mistake on the issue," he said. "They were just wrong. I don't know how to say it more clearly than that."

The sheer mass of the volume left at least one subject with mixed feelings. Richard A. Viguerie, a founder of Moral Majority, was delighted to find himself portrayed as a "liberal bogeyman." But given the army of thinkers and doers who inhabit the book, Mr. Viguerie said, "we should have achieved more politically than we have."

That, Mr. Kristol said, was not a conservative view. "Conservative thinking," he said, "should teach you not to expect too much from politics, at least in the short run."

Real Reform Must Scrutinize Lobbying And Lawmakers (USAT)

By Abbe D. Lowell

USA Today, June 21, 2006

Amid the allegations of accepting money or gifts from lobbyists and others swirling around former congressman Randall "Duke" Cunningham and Reps. William Jefferson, D-La., and Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., Congress has once again taken up lobbying and ethics reform.

A number of the "reform" measures, such as increased restrictions on accepting gifts or more frequent public disclosures of contacts with lobbyists, are merely cosmetic. Real reform will not occur until the very relationship between lobbyists and public officials is re-examined.

Recent news reports and denials that Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert was "under investigation" for signing a letter in support of a lobbyist's clients shortly after that lobbyist raised large contributions should have, but did not, start this examination.

What hasn't received much scrutiny is the interplay between lobbyists and fundraising. As long as campaign engines need to be fueled, special interests and lobbyists who have the most immediate interest in legislation will have the most incentive to supply the gas. This gives lobbyists an unfair advantage in access and persuasion.

More often than those simply interested in good government, lobbyists will take on the request from a member or a member's staff that: "Gee, I will consider your position of that bill or your client's interests, and, by the way, I am having a fundraiser next week."

So, the same individuals and companies who promote their causes in legislation are also the ones who can get their clients, friends, colleagues and acquaintances to come to the cocktail party or reception with the large contributions that are now needed.

The payback

And what does that interest group or lobbyist get in return? Honest members of Congress do not agree to a position or compromise their principles just because a proponent of the position or principle raised the campaign funds requested. Even so, that member gets to know that advocate's position in a context that average Americans do not enjoy.

For decades, the Justice Department's practice has been not to consider campaign contributions linked by timing or sequence to official action as illegal bribes. The recent scandals may change this. But lawmakers, not prosecutors reinterpreting policy, should set the stage for change.

Public officials do not need new laws to know they should not accept money or gifts in exchange for public actions or their office.

It should be relatively simple for Congress to declare that if a lobbyist's position has merit, it can be presented in the congressional office and not at a Washington restaurant, a private suite at a sports arena, or on the 15th hole of a country club golf course.

DOJ_NMG_0036631

And, as to travel, it is not hard to conclude that a public official's travel is either official business to be paid by the government, campaign business to be paid by the election committee or party, or personal travel to be paid by the public official himself.

Real reform ideas

The more difficult issue is how to weaken the link between lobbying and fundraising. A few ideas:

· Require fundraisers to disclose publicly their interest in legislation.

· Require sponsors of "bundled" contributions (individual contributions arranged together for greater impact) to disclose their roles.

· Impose further limits on the total amount individuals can give in an election cycle.

· Provide additional public financing of campaigns.

· Help candidates pay for access to various media.

No doubt other ideas exist, but in the midst of the current debate about "reform," none of these is being proposed in legislation.

So, it was wrong for someone to leak that Hastert was or should be under investigation. What should have been leaked is that the time has come for the entire process to be under investigation so that a better system can result.

Abbe D. Lowell, a partner at Chadbourne & Parke LLP, served as special ethics counsel to Congress reviewing the conduct of former representative George Hansen. He has also represented lawmakers and others in ethics investigations, including former senator Robert Torricelli and former representative Dan Rostenkowski. He currently representsformer lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Emergency In The Emergency Rooms (NYT)

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

The nation's emergency rooms have been stretched thin for at least a decade or more, but a new analysis suggests that they have reached a breaking point. Their plight underscores how dreadfully unprepared we are to cope with a major disaster like pandemic influenza or mass casualties from a terrorism attack.

The crisis in emergency medical care was laid bare in three reports issued last week by the Institute of Medicine, a unit of the National Academy of Sciences. Half a million times a year ambulances are diverted from emergency rooms that are full and sent to others farther away. Emergency room patients who need admission to the hospital often spend eight hours or more — sometimes even two days or more — on gurneys in the hallways, waiting for a hospital bed to open up.

Some emergency rooms lack the services of key specialists, such as neurosurgeons, who shy away from emergency room duty because many uninsured patients can't pay and their malpractice premiums would skyrocket because of the risky nature of emergency cases. What is not known is how many people die as a result of delays in treatment or inadequate care under chaotic conditions. No measurement system tracks such data.

The emergency room crisis has many causes, none of them easily or cheaply resolved. The number of people seeking treatment in emergency rooms has jumped sharply over the past decade or so, from 90 million in 1993 to 114 million in 2003. Over the same period, cost pressures forced the closing of some 700 hospitals, almost 200,000 hospital beds and 425 emergency departments. The result is severe crowding, exacerbated by a huge influx of poor people seeking routine care who are either uninsured or on Medicaid but unable to find doctors willing to treat them. By law, emergency rooms must accept all patients, whether they have insurance or not.

The institute's experts have many proposals for easing the situation, ranging from new regional systems to improve the flow of patients to the most appropriate and least crowded emergency rooms to an infusion of money to cover unpaid emergency care and to bolster preparedness for large-scale disasters. The most important change would be to stop diverting seriously ill ambulance patients and divert instead the poor patients who clog emergency rooms seeking routine care. That would require extending health coverage to the uninsured and providing more primary care clinics and doctors in poor neighborhoods.

Bush's Unpopularity In Europe Hangs Over Summit (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

VIENNA, June 20 -- President Bush arrived here Tuesday for his 15th visit to Europe since taking office, at a time when the populace remains generally wary of him despite concerted efforts by political leaders on both sides of the Atlantic to patch up their differences.

In meetings here Wednesday, Bush and European Union officials are to confer on issues including trade, energy security and their mutual efforts to persuade Iran to halt activities that could lead to the development of nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0036632

Officials have dampened expectations of any major announcements, because Iran has yet to respond to a package of inducements and penalties -- including the offer of talks with the United States for the first time since the 1979 Islamic revolution -- aimed at ending its enrichment of uranium.

Speaking with reporters aboard Air Force One, Bush's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, said Americans and Europeans were strongly committed to having Iran completely shut down its enrichment program. "The framework is clear," he said. "What is missing is a positive Iranian response. And that's, of course, what we are looking for."

On Thursday, Bush is scheduled to visit Budapest, the Hungarian capital, where he will mark the 50th anniversary of the 1956 uprising against communist rule.

Since his reelection in 2004, Bush and his advisers have tried to rebuild relations with Europe -- deferring to Britain, France and Germany, for example, in handling the diplomatic initiative toward Iran. The White House has been aided by the defeat of Gerhard Schroeder in his bid to remain German chancellor and the weakening influence of French President Jacques Chirac; both had made opposition to the U.S. war effort in Iraq a centerpiece of their administrations.

But if relations at the political level have improved, public opinion has lagged far behind. Bush remains unpopular with the public in many European countries over the war in Iraq and alleged abuse of detainees by U.S. forces at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and other facilities, according to opinion polls and experts on transatlantic relations. A survey released last week by the Pew Research Center found that the United States' image has slipped over the past year in France, Germany and Spain and is down considerably since 2000.

Diplomats and experts on Europe say public opinion is a significant drag on Bush's ability to expect much from political leaders here -- for instance, for his renewed effort to secure international assistance for the new Iraqi government. While countries such as Poland and Britain have contributed substantially to security in Iraq, the European Union as a bloc has done relatively little, officials say, pledging the equivalent of about $250 million in assistance in 2006.

"The scars of Iraq are still very real and run real deep," said Ronald D. Asmus, executive director of the German Marshall Fund's Brussels office. While political leaders may agree that success in Iraq is important, he said, the European public believes "that Americans screwed it up and need to clean up the mess."

Gary J. Schmitt, who specializes in defense and foreign policy issues at the American Enterprise Institute in Washington, said the Bush administration has done a much better job handling Europe in the second term, but questioned whether Europe's leaders will sign on to tough sanctions if Iran rebuffs the recent overtures.

"To their credit," he said, speaking of Bush administration officials, "they have learned that it's better to have the Europeans on board than not. The real question is when it comes to the hard issues, like Iran, whether it will pay off."

Adding to the public relations problem is continuing anger over allegations of abuse by U.S. forces at Guantanamo Bay and in Iraq, and disclosures about secret CIA prisons in Europe. Bush has been confronted with questions about these matters almost every time he has met a European leader, and a spokeswoman for Austrian Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel, whose country holds the revolving presidency of the E.U., said he would raise the issue again on Wednesday.

At a briefing for reporters last week, Hadley noted Bush's repeated statement of interest in closing the Guantanamo facility and said people would "be held accountable" by the Pentagon if allegations of wrongdoing in Iraq were confirmed. "That's been explained to the Europeans in various forms at various times," he said. "They can raise it -- there's not a lot new to be said on that issue."

Denis MacShane, a British member of Parliament from the ruling Labor Party and a former minister of state for Europe, said that Americans "just have to live" with a reflexive anti-Americanism and that Europeans are coming to share American concern over the threat from radical Islam. But the Bush administration, he added, "has not really thought about managing European public opinion -- they have not had a kind of program of public diplomacy that has been convincing."

John Bruton, a former Irish prime minister who now leads the E.U. mission in Washington, said that U.S. and European politicians both need to do a better job. "Our task really is one of trying to reestablish a sense among Europeans that Americans are their cousins," he said.

Iraq Threatens Bush Agenda At EU (WT/AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

VIENNA, Austria -- President Bush's meeting with European Union leaders today is scheduled to focus on Iran's nuclear ambitions and economic concerns, but the United States' conduct of the war on terrorism will be an unspoken theme.

National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley has said he doubts Mr. Bush will have much to say about the U.S. prison for terror suspects at U.S. Naval Base, Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, charges of prisoner abuse in Iraq and suspected killings of Iraqi civilians by Marines in Haditha.

DOJ_NMG_0036633

For millions of Europeans, however, these are the issues that matter -- and their concerns are shared by politicians.

Austrian Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel, whose country holds the rotating EU presidency, plans to urge Mr. Bush to close Guantanamo. Peter Pilz, a senior member of Austria's Green party, says Mr. Schuessel should tell Mr. Bush "that the criminal actions of his government will not be tolerated in Europe."

Mr. Pilz is one of Austria's more outspoken public figures. Still, his sentiments -- that the U.S. is breaking the law in Iraq and in its larger fight against terror -- are shared by many Europeans angry over the Iraq invasion, recent suicides at Guantanamo and the reported existence of secret CIA prisons worldwide.

Newspaper editorials reflect Europe's dismay with a partnership that most here see as has having gone wrong.

"Those who came as liberators, those who wanted to bring the rule of justice ... lost their moral credibility in Iraq," wrote the German weekly Die Zeit. "Not just a few soldiers have 'lost their control' as they like to say. America's entire Iraq policy is out of control."

In France, the newspaper Le Monde wrote of the Guantanamo suicides: "We continue to ask by what heavenly decree America holds itself above the rule of law."

Young people, like Andrej Mantei of Berlin, are even more scathing. "I don't think it's possible that anybody could make worse foreign policy than Bush," he says.

And even many older people are critical, unlike a few decades ago, when they equated America with the war against Nazi Germany, postwar reconstruction and the shield against the Soviet Union.

"I think Bush was wrong, and he should have remorse," said Rosa Sarrocco, 80, of Rome. "The recent events ... have had a further negative impact on my opinion of America."

America's image problems in Europe are reflected by a survey done by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press and released last week. Favorable opinions of the United States ranged from a high of 56 percent in Britain to a low of 23 percent in Spain.

Pro-U.S. sentiment is stronger in much of formerly communist Eastern Europe, where Washington's contribution to toppling Soviet dominance lingers in many minds. It peaks in Kosovo, whose ethnic Albanian majority gratefully remembers the U.S.-led bombing in 1999 that forced Serb troops from the province.

Bush Seeks Pledge Compliance (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

VIENNA, Austria -- The White House yesterday said countries have an obligation to fulfill their monetary pledges to help rebuild Iraq, but refused to name the nations that are $10 billion behind their commitments, according to Bush administration calculations.

"Some of them have done better than others, and some are clearly lagging," Stephen J. Hadley, the president's national security adviser, told reporters aboard Air Force One as Mr. Bush traveled to Vienna for the annual U.S.-European Union summit.

The president is looking for a show of unity on blocking Iran's nuclear program and plans to push for Europeans to commit to completing the "Doha round" of free-trade talks, while Austrian Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel, who currently holds the six-month rotating EU presidency, is expected to press Mr. Bush on closing the enemy combatant detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

But even as he seeks to build pressure on Iran, Mr. Bush's eye will be on the other two spokes of his "axis of evil" as he tries to block North Korea's burgeoning nuclear and missile programs and tries to shore up international support for the new government in Iraq.

Anti-Iraq-war protests are scheduled for Mr. Bush's stay in Vienna, but the president will be departing even as the main protest is under way today, headed for Budapest to commemorate tomorrow the 50th anniversary of the Hungarian uprising that Soviet troops and tanks brutally smashed.

The president has not carved out much time for cultural activities in his two days on the ground in Europe, though he is expected to see the Vienna Boys Choir perform.

During his visit to Budapest, he will lay a wreath at the eternal flame in Kossuth Square, a memorial to the 1956 revolt against the Soviet bloc, and later will deliver a speech on the uprising and the push for freedom.

U.S. officials have said they don't expect any breakthroughs on trade, nor do they expect major developments on Iran, in part because the principal European leaders involved in Iran aren't here and in part because the burden is now on Iran to respond to a European-led offer.

DOJ_NMG_0036634

On Iraq, Mr. Bush has stepped up pressure in the past several weeks to collect on the commitments made at a donor's conference in Madrid in 2003, saying Monday that $13.5 billion has been pledged but only $3.5 billion has been paid.

"It's a critical time for Iraq's young democracy, and assistance from the international community will make an immediate difference," Mr. Bush said. "All nations that have pledged money have a responsibility to keep their pledges, and America and Europe will work together to ensure they do so."

Of the $13.5 billion pledged in 2003, $8 billion was assistance from donors and $5.5 billion was in the form of loans from the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

The money is to be disbursed between 2004 and 2007. But donations appear to have dried up since the total hasn't risen much from September 2005, when the State Department reported that more than $3 billion already had been contributed.

Bush To Partners In Iraq: Pay Up (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON

For nations that in the past have pledged to help Iraq rebuild, the United States has this message: Get out your checkbook.

In recent days, administration officials, from President Bush on down, have insisted repeatedly that it is time for others to live up to monetary commitments to Baghdad, most of them made in 2003.

"The international community has pledged about $13 billion to help this new government. Yet only $3.5 billion has been paid," said Mr. Bush on Monday in a commencement address to the US Merchant Marine Academy.

Iraq's security situation has discouraged many donors from pouring cash into the country. They don't want their aid used to pay for gun-toting guards, or for clinics or courthouses that might get blown up.

But the White House argues that the elimination of insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi shows security is improving. The renewed push for international contributions also comes at a time when it is becoming clear just how expensive rebuilding Iraq will be.

"There's a convergence of events at this point in time leading to this," says Robert Pfaltzgraff, a professor of international security at the Fletcher School at Tufts University.

In coming months, non-US donor nations and international institutions should become increasingly important to the reconstruction of Iraq, according to US officials. Money in the main US reconstruction account, the Iraq Relief and Reconstruction Fund, is dwindling. The new Iraqi government will increasingly take over reconstruction management duties from the US.

The United Nations has already agreed to step up its activity. Earlier this week, Secretary-General Kofi Annan, responding to a plea from Iraqi officials, said he would help organize international economic and political support for Iraq.

Given all this, it's time for nations to make good on promised reconstruction donations, insists the White House. Pledges are fine, and many nations have made generous promises, say US officials. But Iraq now needs the money.

Bush has mentioned the issue often in public in recent days. And the administration has sent Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt and State Department counselor Philip Zelikow to visit world capitals and figuratively rattle the tin cup.

"We need to get these amounts paid in, and then we need to look here in a three- or four-month time ... [at] what additional amounts need to be pledged," said National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley at a briefing for reporters last week.

It's true that the international community could step up its Iraqi aid activity, say experts outside the administration. But the situation is more complicated than the White House is portraying it, they say.

The bulk of aid pledges, $13.6 billion, were made at a donor conference in Madrid in October 2003. Of this, some $4 billion was offered as outright grants. The rest - $9.6 billion - was proffered as loans, not straight handouts.

Of these pledges, about 25 percent, worth $3.5 billion, have been paid, according to the US Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction. In addition, the International Monetary Fund and World Bank have begun providing some of their promised loans. (Later pledges have raised the total amount of money promised by the international community to $14.6 billion.)

Some nations have moved quickly to provide their promised aid. Japan and Britain have been "notably active" in this regard, says a recent Congressional Research Service report.

Japan - the second-largest donor to Iraq after the United States - has spent most of its pledged $1.5 billion in grant aid, and is close to launching the first phase of a $3.5 billion loan, according to CRS. Japanese funds have paid for power-station rehabilitation, water tankers, fire trucks, and irrigation equipment. (Tuesday, Japan announced it would withdraw its 600 troops in Iraq but hoped to increase noncombat air operations there.)

Britain has helped pay for reconstruction of the Iraqi justice system, among other things.

DOJ_NMG_0036635

Other nations have moved more slowly. Iraq's neighbors have made generous pledges, for instance, but so far little of the promised money has shown up.

"Kuwait ... has not moved much of its $565 million pledge," says the most recent Special Inspector General quarterly report to Congress. "Similarly, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates are holding off on expenditures."

Lack of security is one big cause of this reluctance. Currently, between 16 and 22 percent of Iraqi reconstruction aid pays for armed guards and other security-related costs. Many non-US nations don't want a large percentage of their donations to be devoted to such items. In general, they have not been eager to rebuild a war zone while the war was still going on.

Iraqi politics has been another concern. Saudi Arabia and other largely Sunni Muslim nations have kept their checkbooks closed while they wait to see how Sunnis will fare in the new Iraq.

"These countries want to see whether a stable political democratic system can be established in Iraq that will include the Sunni Arabs as well as the Shia Arabs and the Kurds," said James Jeffrey, Department of State coordinator for Iraq policy, at a June 8 House hearing.

With the establishment of the new Iraqi government, this criteria has been met, according to Mr. Jeffrey. Other US officials argue that with the death of the terror figure al-Zarqawi, the security situation is improving as well.

Pressing for reconstruction pledges to be made good may thus be an attempt by the Bush administration to help build on the momentum they say has been generated in Iraq in recent weeks - though Al Qaeda in Iraq has named a new leader, and insurgent attacks continue.

"The US has every interest in promoting international contributions to post-conflict stability in Iraq," says professor Pfaltzgraff of the Fletcher School.

US Effort To Rehab Image Falls Short (CSM)

By Howard LaFranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON

In Europe for two days, President Bush will lay out a full agenda on Iran, aid to Iraq, and farm subsidies in world trade. But he'll also confront a European public that has such a poor view of America that in some countries, the United States is seen as the biggest threat to global stability today - surpassing Iran.

Views like this have figured in Helle Maasbol's family. For the three years she has lived in the US, she's not been able to entice her mom back home in Denmark to pay a visit.

"Her image of the States was going downhill for a while, but it was the war in Iraq that was the real blow," says the wife of a World Bank economist and mother of two girls - all of whom are now moving back to Europe. "I told her often about the wonderful people we've met in America, but she said she wouldn't come as long as the president was George Bush."

Indeed, the US image abroad has continued to deteriorate, despite a concerted effort by the Bush administration to turn things around by mending fences with key allies, taking concrete steps to make diplomacy work, and expanding public-diplomacy efforts in the Middle East and other regions.

At the beginning of his second term, Mr. Bush set out to improve America's relations with the world by extending a more diplomatic hand to international partners, taking more multilateral positions on security concerns like Iran, and naming trusted aide Karen Hughes to help fix the US image abroad. But recent surveys show that public opinion about America continues to fall in countries as diverse as Spain, Turkey, Russia, and Indonesia. And the repercussions of the decline are not just touchy-feely image issues, experts say.

Low public esteem for the US makes it more difficult for governments to unabashedly side with the US on international issues, while less attraction to America can mean a smaller slice of the global tourism pie for the US.

"We lose out on jobs when foreigners don't travel here as much. We lose out on billions of dollars in spending, but we also lose the goodwill we know comes from people getting to know Americans," says Roger Dow, president of the Travel Industry Association of America (TIA).

Noting that he discussed that impact recently with Ms. Hughes, Mr. Dow says, "I asked her, 'What would it be worth to you to have 8 million people going home to say, "You know, they're not so bad." ' You have to figure that into the diplomacy equation."

Eight million is the number of additional visitors the US would greet if it increased its share of the international travel pie by just 1 percent. In 2002, the US reaped 9 percent of international travel, but today the number is down to 6 percent. Each percentage drop represents 150,000 jobs and $15 billion in spending, according to the TIA.

Of course, anti-Americanism is not the only explanation for falling numbers of foreign visitors - any more than disdain for the Stars and Stripes was invented by Bush. Many experts tie the tourism phenomenon to America's place as the world's only superpower, and the resentment that people have long felt toward the power they believe must be responsible when events turn negative.

But others say that US policy under Bush - from the war in Iraq to rejection of the Kyoto accords on greenhouse gases - is responsible for the new spike in anti-US sentiment. "I don't believe the figures we're seeing will change much so long as this president is in office," says Simon Serfaty, an expert in US-Europe relations at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) in Washington.

Results of a new global attitudes survey by the Washington-based Pew Research Center show that a country's image of Americans is at least several percentage points higher than the same country's image of America as a nation. Bush's numbers are below both of those categories.

Another poll published this week by the Harris group shows that Europeans generally pick the US as the world's biggest threat to global security over Iran. This was true even in Britain, although Germans and Italians rank the US below Iran.

Ms. Maasbol finds this evolution sad and troubling, especially since she remembers as a little girl hearing "only good things" about America and its role in World War II - yes, even from her mom. "People say Iraq has made things worse for everybody in the world, and that it has brought out the bad side in America with things like the prisoner abuse," she says.

When Bush meets Wednesday with European leaders in Austria, he will hear calls for the closing of the Pentagon's detention facility in Guantánamo, Cuba. Bush is attending the annual US-European Union summit. From there he travels to Budapest, Hungary, where he will give a speech Thursday.

Mr. Serfaty of CSIS says the prisoner-abuse issue and the case of Guantánamo are particularly poignant for Europeans because they suggest an America making the same kinds of mistakes that Europe made in its colonial past.

"Europeans are saying, 'Don't use your power to do what we used to do,' " he says, which was to commit widespread rights abuses in African and Asian colonies while claiming to improve the world. He adds, however, that the European perspective "demonstrates how there is no understanding over there of how 9/11 has changed mentalities in this nation."

Particularly troubling for the US may be indications that America is slipping even in places where it is lavishing new attention. Opinion of America dropped 15 points in India compared with last year - despite a Bush visit to India in March and his calling for a new strategic partnership between the two countries.

There are some bright spots for the US. The Pew survey found that America's image improved among French youth, for example. "Feelings about America were bad in 2003 at the start of the war, but you don't see that so much among the young people anymore," says Swann Gros, a 17-year-old Parisian on his first visit to America this summer. Demonstrating an awareness of current events, he says the French know that Bush "is not so popular with Americans now - just as the French don't so much like Jacques Chirac."

Bush's Goals In Austria May Be Overshadowed (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang And Alissa J. Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

VIENNA — President Bush stepped off Air Force One on a warm night Tuesday in the heart of Central Europe, and into the steamy debate over the U.S. war in Iraq and his administration's tactics in countering terrorism.

He began a 21-hour visit to Austria, built around a meeting with the leaders of the European Union, as the United States and its allies await Iran's response to their latest anti-nuclear proposals. Bush also plans a similar quick stop in Hungary tonight and Thursday.

The president arrived with what his national security advisor, Stephen Hadley, said last week were three goals: "Promoting freedom and democracy, enhancing security and pursuing greater global prosperity." The goals draw little debate, but the means for achieving them are tearing at the European political and social fabric.

Though the U.S. agenda with Europe covers global trade negotiations, European farm subsidies and Iran, Austrians want their leaders to confront Bush's policies in Iraq, the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and the "rendition" of suspected terrorists to countries that permit torture. Newspapers and TV talk shows have discussed little else in recent days, with people at both ends of the political spectrum denouncing the treatment of terrorism suspects who have not been charged with crimes.

The visit to this officially neutral country is the first by a U.S. president since Jimmy Carter met Soviet leader Leonid I. Brezhnev here in 1979 to sign an arms control treaty. Bush is meeting with Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel, EU president.

Peter Pilz, a spokesman on security issues for the leftist Green Party, said of Bush's visit: "It is problematic to welcome as guest a politician who wages unconstitutional wars, uses falsified secret … reports as an excuse to do so, is willing to preemptively deploy nuclear weapons, who tolerates kidnappings, torture and illegal detention camps as a means of security policy."

DOJ_NMG_0036637

Joerg Haider, former leader of the far-right Freedom Party, said in an interview with the moderately conservative newspaper Die Presse that Bush was turning the Middle East "into a witches' caldron."

"The summit will not change anything," said Haider, who is best-known for anti-Semitic comments and opposition to immigrants when his party was part of the government.

Austria's widely read news magazine Profil featured Bush on its cover this week, under the headline "The Mad World of George Bush."

"What makes the leader of the last superpower tick? Just how fanatical is he?" the magazine asked. In the city of Freud, it drew a deeply unflattering psychological profile of the president, under the headline "Bush on the Couch."

The visit to Budapest, the Hungarian capital, will give Bush an opportunity to commemorate the unsuccessful partisan uprising against Soviet domination in 1956. The revolution foreshadowed the disintegration more than three decades later of communist rule across Central and Eastern Europe, and provides the U.S. leader a metaphor for the broader democracy that he has promoted as the foundation of his Middle East policies.

Noting the division in Europe over the war, Bush said Monday at the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy in Kings Point, N.Y., "Some of the most important support for Iraqis is coming from European democracies with recent memories of tyranny." He cited Poland, Hungary, Romania, Bulgaria, the Czech Republic, Slovakia, Georgia, Ukraine, Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia as examples.

But he acknowledged that "others in Europe have had disagreements with our decisions on Iraq."

Bush is making a renewed push to get those who have promised to help rebuild Iraq to begin paying up. Of the $13.5 billion in assistance that has been pledged, he said Monday, only $3.5 billion has been paid.

Large amounts are due from Iraq's wealthier Persian Gulf neighbors, but Europe also owes money, Hadley said last week.

The meeting with the EU leadership has been long-scheduled, but its timing allows the president to promote a united front in the effort to pressure Iran to suspend enrichment of nuclear fuel, which the Bush administration sees as an immediate and pressing problem.

The five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council — the U.S., Russia, China, France and Britain — and Germany offered a package of incentives early this month to persuade Iran to halt its nuclear program. Since then, Iran has been lobbying hard to soften the terms so it can continue some uranium enrichment as "research and development."

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Friday that the offer was under serious consideration.

In the view of some analysts in Washington, the diplomatic strategy on Iran may allow the U.S. to present a less bellicose image than it has regarding Iraq, potentially softening the impression Bush creates.

Having recently agreed to join other nations in direct negotiations with Iran, "President Bush has improved his standing and support among European leaders," Jon B. Wolfsthal and Jennifer Hamilton wrote in a paper for the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington policy research organization.

And, they said, with the EU's top officials at his side, Bush "can in one step make clear that the offer on the table is the best Iran can hope to receive."

Austria is the 54th country Bush has visited as president; Hungary will be the 55th.

Die Presse, reflecting none of the potentially tempered view of him that Wolfsthal and Hamilton raised, featured a cartoon that suggested Bush might have become confused.

The cartoon showed the president in a pub talking to students, with a thought bubble over his head. It had him thinking, "funny kangaroos" — a jeering suggestion that Bush would mistake Austria for Australia.

An Unpopular Export (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

PRESIDENT BUSH'S TRIP TO EUROPE is being welcomed like an infectious disease. Bush was unpopular in Europe from day one of his presidency, but a charm offensive launched last year — and a more conciliatory approach toward European concerns — was meant to change that, or at least nudge the approval rating up a notch. Instead, recent polls show he is more unpopular than ever across the Atlantic.

Things have gotten so bad, in fact, that Europeans now claim the United States is a greater threat to global stability than Iran, according to a Harris poll. Given that a key goal of Bush's visit is to persuade European leaders to support his efforts to stem Iran's nuclear ambitions, that's a bit of a problem. Though Bush wants to talk about Iran, energy and Europe's failure to live up to its commitments to help pay for Iraq's reconstruction, European leaders will feel obliged to take the president to task over Guantanamo Bay and alleged secret CIA prisons.

European disdain for the United States is nothing new, of course, and the feeling has long seemed a bit contrived. The French grumble about the U.S., but they love McDonald's and Hollywood. Austria, host to the meeting between the U.S. and European leaders, is one of the most fiercely anti-Bush nations in Europe. It prides itself on its neutrality, which is another way of saying it prefers to let the U.S. pay the financial and human costs of policing the world while its intelligentsia get to rail about American excesses in the war on terror. Nonetheless, Bush's disdain for multilateral institutions, environmental protection and international law has earned him a special place in the pantheon of unpopular U.S. political exports.

It is hard for Bush to alter his image at this point in his presidency, but he must do as much as he can to court European public opinion, lest governments on the Continent find it untenable to be associated with any Bush initiative. Bush's recent interview on German television, in which he said he would like to end internments at Guantanamo Bay, was a good start. He could build on it by acknowledging legitimate European concerns over climate change and repudiating the "rendition" of terror suspects.

Maybe the best PR move would be to make a surprise trip to a World Cup game in Germany. With the U.S. seen abroad as an insular nation that doesn't play well with others, a presidential visit to the hugely popular event — indeed, a humble recognition by the former baseball team owner that the World Cup is the biggest sports event on Earth — would carry enormous symbolic value. For security reasons, it would have to be unannounced and last-minute. But if Bush can drop into Baghdad unannounced, as he did last week, surely he can make a visit to Nuremberg.

Bush Travels To Europe To Shore Up Ties (AP-Y2)

By Terence Hunt

AP2, June 20, 2006

President Bush confronted high-stakes nuclear showdowns with North Korea and Iran and grisly news about U.S. war deaths Tuesday as he began a quick trip to strengthen ties with European allies unhappy about Iraq.

A week after Bush made a surprise, celebratory visit to Baghdad, he learned that two U.S. soldiers captured in Iraq had been found slain. They were killed by the new leader of al-Qaida in Iraq, an insurgent umbrella group said in a Web statement that suggested the servicemen had been beheaded.

"It's a reminder that this is a brutal enemy that does not follow any of the rules," National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley told reporters on Air Force One on the way to Europe. White House press secretary Tony Snow said, "We are seeing evidence that the Iraqi people are also sick of this."

More than 2,500 members of the U.S. military have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March, 2003.

On his 15th trip to Europe since taking office, Bush and his wife, Laura, were greeted by Austrian Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel. As Bush was driven to his hotel, curious onlookers, most of whom remained motionless and expressionless, gathered along Vienna's streets. One group struggled unsuccessfully to unfurl a "Go Home" banner from a restaurant balcony in time for it to be seen by occupants of the speeding motorcade.

Anti-Americanism is widespread in Europe where Bush is seen by many as a cowboy president who doesn't care about the concerns of other countries. The abuse of Iraqi prisoners by U.S. soldiers at Abu Ghraib, allegations of a massacre of unarmed civilians by U.S. Marines at Haditha and reports of secret prisons for terror suspects have hurt America's image.

Bush is under political pressure at home, as well. Approval of his handling of Iraq had dropped to 33 percent in an AP-Ipsos poll this month. Hadley took issue with a debate in Congress about Iraq, saying that "there's been sort of a suggestion out there that somehow there's an open-ended commitment by the United States to Iraq."

He repeated Bush's oft-stated promise that as Iraqi troops are capable of defending their country, American forces will leave.

The president will hold several hours of talks Wednesday with leaders of the 25-nation European Union. Wednesday evening he will go to Budapest, Hungary, to mark the 50th anniversary of the 1956 uprising against communist rule. The president returns to Washington Thursday evening.

North Korea was a growing concern because of fears its government was preparing to test-fire a long-range ballistic missile. "They seem to be moving toward a launch, but the intelligence is not conclusive at this point," Hadley said.

He said North Korea seemed to feel that creating a sense of crisis brings attention that is helpful.

"A lot of folks are sending messages to the North Koreans this would be a bad idea, they shouldn't do it," Hadley said. "And a lot of countries are going to have ideas about what we do, should North Korea ignore the advice of the international community and go forward with this launch."

Iran was another problem. The United States, Britain, France, Germany, China and Russia have offered Iran incentives to impose a long-term moratorium on uranium enrichment, a process that can produce material for nuclear generators or bombs. Two weeks after receiving the proposal, Iran has not said yes or no.

Hadley said he was confident the U.S. and its partners were standing united. "If Iran does not accept this offer, then we return to the U.N. Security Council," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0036639

Bush planned to press Europe to eliminate agricultural subsidies so that talks for a global free-trade pact can proceed. "If they can move in that direction," Hadley said, "we're going to be in the zone of getting an agreement by the end of the year."

The White House said Bush would prod nations to honor their pledges of reconstruction aid for Iraq. Of $13 billion promised, only $3 billion has been delivered, the administration says.

European leaders have their own concerns, many of them revolving around Iraq and the war on terror.

Schuessel, whose country holds the rotating EU presidency, was expected to urge Bush to close the U.S. detention center at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The White House said Bush wouldn't have anything new to say on that.

Bush has said he would like to close Guantanamo but some of its prisoners are too dangerous to set free and it's unclear what to do with others.

Bush was the first American president in 27 years to visit Austria.

Come Clean In Hungary (WP)

By Charles Gati

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

President Bush will be in Budapest tomorrow to visit a good ally -- a member of the coalition of the willing. The first item on his agenda, according to the White House, is to "celebrate Hungary's historic sacrifices in the name of freedom by commemorating the 50th anniversary of the 1956 Hungarian Revolution." Topics of mutual interest will follow.

The president should indeed join Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcs?ny -- Hungary's Tony Blair -- to celebrate that country's recent achievements. But commemorating 1956 is a different matter.

The truth is that at a critical juncture in the Cold War, when Hungarians rose against their Soviet oppressors, the United States abandoned them. After 13 days of high drama, hope and despair, the mighty Soviet army prevailed. For its part, Washington offered a sad variation on "NATO": no action, talk only. The Eisenhower administration's policy of "liberation" and "rollback" turned out to be a hoax -- hypocrisy mitigated only by self-delusion. The more evident, if unstated, goal was to roll back the Democrats from Capitol Hill rather than liberate Central and Eastern Europe from Soviet tyranny.

Until the Soviet tanks rolled in, the Hungarians believed what Washington had proclaimed. They did not know that the United States was unprepared to help them and that a few high officials even expected some political and foreign policy benefits from a Soviet invasion. Vice President Richard Nixon explained to his colleagues at a top-secret National Security Council meeting in July 1956 that "it wouldn't be an unmixed evil, from the point of view of U.S. interest, if the Soviet iron fist were to come down again on the Soviet bloc."

In a similarly cynical vein, American-run Radio Free Europe in Germany encouraged the hapless insurgents to go all the way against the Kremlin and even broadcast lessons on how to make molotov cocktails.

We now know from Russian archives that the Hungarians did have a chance to gain some of what they sought. For on Oct. 30, one week after the revolt began, members of the Soviet Presidium (as the Politburo was called then) unanimously voted not to use military force. Their decision came in the wake of a series of conciliatory, post-Stalin policies, such as the 1955 Soviet withdrawal from Austria and reconciliation with Yugoslavia -- both of which are neighbors of Hungary -- as well as the first summit with the United States in a decade. In the end, the Kremlin intervened because it feared that the situation would spin out of control both in Hungary and elsewhere in the Soviet bloc. Radio Free Europe's exaggerated rhetoric only amplified these fears.

The United States, according to the usual version of what happened, could not help the Hungarians because any action would have triggered a military confrontation with Moscow. This explanation misses the point: There were actions short of war that Washington might have taken. It could certainly have urged the Hungarians to temporize and pursue limited, evolutionary goals. It could have taken the issue to the United Nations before, and not after, the Soviet crackdown. In an imaginative move toward post-Stalin detente, it could have proposed immediate talks about withdrawing American forces from a small Western European country in exchange for Soviet withdrawal from Hungary.

Instead, Washington offered only hope, no help. "Poor fellows, poor fellows," President Dwight Eisenhower said privately as he campaigned for reelection. "I wish there were some way of helping them."
