The expectation is for economic growth to slow from 5 percent in the first quarter to about 3 percent for the rest of the year. Tuesday saw yet another sign of rising interest rates: Existing home sales in May dipped 1.2 percent, the third drop in five months. The Conference Board, a business research group, also predicted Tuesday a slowing economy even as its consumer confidence index has edged up slightly.

If the economic data continues to soften, economists anticipate the Fed will want to pause and try to judge how much the higher cost of borrowing money is crimping economic activity.

"At this point the Fed knows there is enough tightening in the pipeline to arrest inflationary pressures and prevent the situation from getting out of control," says Anthony Chan, a New York-based economist at JP Morgan Private Client Services.

"The only reason the Fed has not stopped is the markets - the new Fed chairman, Ben Bernanke, is the new sheriff in town and has to maintain his reputation as an inflation fighter."

The cost of education illustrates the complex effect of climbing interest rates on consumers' pockets. Sallie Mae changes its student loan interest rates only once a year based on the last Treasury bill auction in May. In the past year, that rate has increased nearly two percentage points.

However, the company also gave students thechance earlier this month to consolidate loans and lock-in lower interest rates. An interest-rate savvy student who consolidated would now be saving thousands of dollars in interest.

"We have seen an extraordinary pace of consolidation," says Pat Scherschel, vice president of loan consolidation in Indianapolis.

"Borrowers are rate-sensitive and know a good deal when they see one."

However, there is no doubt interest-rate increases in the housing market are steadily making it more expensive to buy a house. A year ago, a home-buyer would have paid 5.5 percent for a 30-year fixed-rate mortgage. Today, the rate is 6.67 percent. On a $250,000 loan, that would cost an additional $181 a month.

For an adjustable-rate mortgage, the increase is even more expensive. It now costs $308 more each month than a year ago.

The higher rates are definitely having a negative impact on housing demand, says Jim Svinth, the Irvine, California-based chief economist at LendingTree, an online mortgage loan company.

At the moment, he says, the higher rates affect mostly "folks who are really stretching to qualify for, and pay, their mortgage."

Lower-income folks may feel the rising rates more than most.

For example, Dunn Development says higher interest rates in the future will pressure them to raise rents.

"Market-rate guys can pass it on to their market-rate owners or renters, but for our affordable housing buildings, we have a fixed rent and can't do that," says Ben Kornfeind. "For us, it eats into our building."

Main street business also feels the impact of rising rates fairly quickly. Ty's Toy Box has a line of credit that is pegged to the prime interest rate, which has increased in line with each Federal Reserve hike.

So far, the rate rises have yet to slow down Ty's Toy Box, which has found a niche in online toy marketing, DVDs, and T-shirts of cartoon characters ignored by larger companies.

But, the owner of the company, Ty Simpson, says his rising interest cost comes right out of his bottom line.

"Every percentage makes a difference. We don't operate on huge margins," he says.

So far, Mr. Simpson has been able to avoid passing his higher interest costs to customers. But, he says, the rising rates are something he'll have to watch.

"In August, we'll probably have to look at it," says Simpson.

Wall Street Tumbles Ahead Of Fed Meeting (FT)

By John O'Doherty

Financial Times, June 28, 2006

Wall Street ended lower on Tuesday as investors awaited the outcome of the two-day meeting of the US Federal Reserve's rate-setting body, which starts on Wednesday.

At the close, the S&P 500 was down 0.9 per cent, or 11.36 points, at 1,239.20. The Nasdaq Composite was down 1.6 per cent, or 33.42 points, at 2,100.25. The Dow Jones Industrial Average was down 1.1 per cent, or 120.54 points, at 10,924.74.

The falls followed news that consumer confidence in June rose more than expected while sales of existing homes fell slightly less than forecast.

Ken Tower, chief market strategist at CyberTrader, said the data would add pressure for the Federal Reserve to raise rates. "As long as the economy is stronger than expected, it's an inflation threat," he said.

Univision rose 6.2 per cent to $34.00, after the company's board agreed to sell the Spanish language broadcaster for $12.3bn in cash to a consortium of investors that includes media executive Haim Saban and several private equity groups.

Tribune Group jumped 5.1 per cent to $32.47 after the company said it had completed phase one of its $2bn stock buyback programme.

DOJ_NMG_0037094

Troubled carmaker General Motors tumbled 6.7 per cent to $25.90, its worst day since December, after the company said overall sales for 2006 were likely to come in below 2005 levels.

Chemical maker Dupont fell 2.8 per cent to $40.88. French energy and telecommunications group Vivendi on Tuesday announced it had sold its 1.8 per cent stake in the company.

Crude oil rose to settle just below $72 a barrel, giving a fillip to energy stocks. Marathon Oil added 3.8 per cent to $79.81 and Hess Corporation gained 2.8 per cent to $48.20.

The rising oil price dented airline stocks. United Airlines dropped 5.5 per cent to $30.12, and US Airways lost 3.2 per cent to $48.04.

News that Intel would sell its communications processor business to Marvell Technology to concentrate on its core business dragged down rival Advanced Micro Devices, which fell 1.6 per cent to $24.26. The Philadelphia Stock Exchange Semiconductor index dropped 3.8 per cent.

Nasdaq fell 5.5 per cent to $26.64, even as the company's chief executive said that concerns that companies were choosing to list on foreign rather than domestic exchanges were overstated.

Biomet and Zimmer Holdings, the medical products makers, continued to slide following their announcements on Monday that they had received subpoenas from the Department of Justice in relation to an anti-trust investigation. Biomet fell 6 per cent to $31.19 and Zimmer shed 4.9 per cent to $55.80.

Reports that Google would test its online payment system this week worried investors in Ebay, which owns the Paypal system. Ebay fell 5 per cent to $28.25.

Stocks Sink Ahead Of Fed's Meeting (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, June 28, 2006

Traders dumped stocks Tuesday, not wanting to step in front of a Federal Reserve meeting this week that could bring higher short-term interest rates.

Tech stocks were clobbered as Wall Street braced for Thursday, when the Fed will announce the result of its two-day meeting. The Nasdaq composite fell 33.42 points, or 1.6%, to 2100.25.

It was a dubious occasion for the Nasdaq, because Tuesday marked the 2,000th trading day since the Nasdaq first crossed above 2,000, says Fane Lozman, chairman of Scanshift.com. The Nasdaq is just 100 points above that level first reached nearly eight years ago and remains 58% below its high set in 2000. The index is off 4.8% this year.

A sell-off in already splintered shares of home builders dragged the Standard & Poor's 500 index down 11.36 points, or 0.9%, to 1239.20. Home builders KB Home and Pulte shed 3.5% and 2.2%, respectively, on housing market data showing existing home sales fell again, dropping 1.2% in May (story, 1B). The S&P 500 has lost 0.7% of its value this year. But Tuesday still was the 831st trading day the S&P has gone without a 10% drop, the second-longest streak.

And the Dow Jones industrial average sagged 120.54 points, or 1.1%, to 10,924.74. That was enough to lower the Dow's gain this year to 1.9%.

Joseph Saluzzi, trader at Themis Trading, says there wasn't a single piece of news that sent investors running. It's possible the rise in the Conference Board's measure of consumer confidence worried some investors about inflation, he says. "Everyone is a bear right now; no one wants to step up," he says.

Those worries will pass, says Charles Crane, strategist at Scotsman Capital. "Once traders get past the myopic obsession with every little economic wiggle that could influence inflation, we'll have the luxury of looking at the big picture," he says.

That big picture includes a solid economy, corporate earnings growth and reasonable stock valuations, he says. "Add those together, and you have the recipe for a satisfactory stock market in the second half of the year," he says.

General Motors fell $1.85 to $25.90 after warning 2006 auto sales might miss last year's levels due to higher interest rates and gas prices.

•Universal Compression, a maker of devices that handle natural gas, soared $5.28 to $59.61. The company plans to sell shares of a unit as an initial public offering.

Stocks Tumble In Broad Selling Ahead Of The Fed (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

It was a bad day for companies that make things. Woes at most of the Dow Jones Industrial Average's truly industrial component companies sent the market tumbling more than 120 points.

General Motors shares nosedived 6.7% on worries about the auto makers' second-quarter sales. In particular, GM executives warned that year-over-year sales comparisons would be "brutal," considering that last year's totals were boosted by retail incentives programs.

Other Dow components that fared poorly included Boeing, which announced that it is weighing the future of its troubled communications unit Connexion. And Vivendi SA announced that it is selling a stake in E.I. DuPont de Nemours & Co., commonly known as DuPont, in order to remove a tax liability from its balance sheet. Shares in Boeing and DuPont each fell more than 2%. Also, 3M shares fell 1.9%.

All together, the Dow shed 120.54 points, or 1.1%, to close at 10924.74, up 1.9% this year. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.9%, or 11.36 points, to 1239.20, off 0.7% for the year. And the Nasdaq Composite Index fell 1.6%, or 33.42 points, to 2100.25, off 4.8% for the year.

Two new pieces of economic data defied Wall Street expectations, in turn raising fears of higher interest rates ahead of the two-day meeting of Federal Reserve policymakers that begins today and ends tomorrow.

According to the National Association of Realtors, sales of existing homes fell 1.2% in May, smaller than the 1.8% drop expected by Wall Street. Also, the Conference Board reported that its consumer-confidence index rose to 105.7 in June, contrary to expectations for a dip.

Many investors fear the U.S. central bank will prolong its series of interest-rate increases beyond this summer. The Fed is widely expected to make another quarter-point increase in its key interest rate to 5.25% at this week's meeting. Prices of federal-funds futures on the Chicago Board of Trade yesterday reflected nearly 100% certainty by traders regarding such a move.

"A quarter-point hike, at this point, is entirely consistent with the Fed's desire to fight inflation," said Mickey Levy, chief economist at Bank of America. "In their statement, I think they will also acknowledge there's been upward pressure on inflation recently."

In major U.S. market action:

Bond prices rose. The 10-year Treasury note rose 9/32, or $2.8125 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 5.208%. The 30-year Treasury rose 19/32 to yield 5.237%.

The dollar was mixed. Late in New York, it traded at 116.28 yen, slightly down from 116.29 yen. The euro was unchanged against the greenback, at $1.2581.

As GOP Ties To Corruption Mount, Democrats Differ Over Strategy (AP)

By David Hammer

AP, June 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - Democrats are split over how to attack unfolding corruption scandals involving Republicans: Continue to hammer away at what they call a culture of corruption or focus on their own candidates' ideas.

Democrats believe more than ever that Republican ethical problems in Ohio make the state a key battleground this November's midterm elections. In recent weeks, another former official from Gov. Bob Taft's administration has been charged with ethics law violations, and more details about lobbyists' allegations that Rep. Bob Ney accepted gifts for official acts have emerged in the Justice Department's investigation of congressional corruption.

By and large, state Democrats see corruption as a pervasive and distinctly Republican problem in Ohio that they must exploit in every competitive race, while national Democrats' zeal has been tempered by a bribery investigation against one of their own, Rep. William Jefferson of Louisiana. They fear their challengers in Ohio won't break through against GOP opponents who face no specific corruption allegations by harping on their ties to Taft, Ney or indicted coin dealer and party fundraiser Tom Noe.

Corruption allegations have to be specific to the opposing candidate to be successful, said Craig Smith, a veteran strategist of national Democratic campaigns who also advised Columbus Mayor Michael Coleman on his short-lived run for Ohio governor.

"We've found that if one candidate says all corruption is on the other side, voters will believe that; but if the opponent comes back and says they're all corrupt on that side, too, voters will believe that, too," Smith said.

The national Democrats' issues-first perspective can be seen in one of their most favored challengers - Rep. Sherrod Brown, who is running for Senate against GOP Sen. Mike DeWine. Brown has largely stopped talking about DeWine's time as lieutenant governor in the early 1990s as a way to connect the two-term senator to Taft, who was secretary of state at the time.

"Ohio voters are at best unhappy and at worst angry at Republicans, but that's a peripheral fact," Brown spokeswoman Joanna Kuebler said. "Specific to Mike DeWine, it's got to be more about the issues."

So, Brown has begun to attack DeWine for his support for an overhaul of Medicare, plans to privatize Social Security and free trade agreements with foreign governments.

But the Ohio Democratic Party says Ohio candidates have a unique opportunity to focus on corruption.

"National polls repeatedly indicate that voters paint corruption with a broad brush, but in Ohio, largely because one party has been in control for so long, the public equates corruption with Republicans," state party spokesman Brian Rothenberg said.

Republicans have controlled the governor's office for 16 years and both branches of the Legislature since 1994.

Rothenberg said corruption is a clear theme for Democrat Zack Space in his race against Ney, and will be just as important for Mary Jo Kilroy against Rep. Deborah Pryce and for John Cranley against Rep. Steve Chabot - even though Pryce and Chabot are not connected to scandals by anything more than party.

Although the chairman of their national House campaign organization has said, "Ohio isn't a pretty picture," the GOP is gaining confidence. The party sees as a sign of things to come in Ohio the Democrats' failure to win a special election earlier this month for the San Diego congressional seat vacated by former GOP Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who is in prison on bribery charges.

"That election showed voters are more interested in tangible issues and how each candidate addresses the issues than in name-calling and mudslinging," said Aaron McLear, spokesman for the Republican National Committee.

Even Space is starting to look for other issues with which to attack Ney. So far, Space has focused almost exclusively on Ney's ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. But once he finishes with a fundraising push, he says he'll start to try to distinguish his own positions on health care and labor issues - which will be difficult because Ney has often broken with his party to back his poorer constituents.

Ney has maintained his innocence and repeatedly refused to step down or give up his re-election campaign, even if he were to be indicted before Election Day. Space says he should step down, but intimated that Ney would be easier to beat than almost any replacement in the Republican district.

"There's a difference between what I think he (Ney) ought to do and what I want him to do," Space said with a laugh.

Poll Shows Americans Keeping An Eye On Congress (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — Americans are paying unusually close attention to the congressional elections in November, a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll finds. They are more inclined to deliver significant gains to Democrats than in any year since Republicans won control of the House and Senate in 1994.

Those surveyed are more concerned about national issues than local ones — a situation that favors Democrats hoping to tap discontent over the Iraq war and gasoline prices — and prefer Democrats over Republicans on handling every major issue except terrorism.

President Bush looms as a significant drag: 40% of Americans say they are less likely to vote for a candidate who supports Bush. A fifth say they are more likely.

"At this point, it certainly looks like a significant tilt to the Democrats, but it's still early," says James Campbell, a political scientist at the University of Buffalo and author of The Presidential Pulse of Congressional Elections. He says the Democratic advantage could narrow over the next four months if voters see the election more as a choice between two candidates and less as a referendum on the president.

House Democrats, including Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California, express optimism about prospects they will pick up the 15 seats needed to take control. They are hampered, though, by the limited number of competitive districts. The non-partisan Cook Political Report now ranks 35 GOP-held seats as competitive.

"Things are difficult, and there's a reasonable chance we'll lose some seats in both bodies," says Republican pollster David Winston. "But at the moment the majorities look reasonably solid because Democrats haven't put into play the sort of seats they need to."

The poll of 1,000 adults Friday through Sunday has an error margin of +/-3 percentage points.

Among the findings:

•Americans are interested in the election at levels not usually seen in non-presidential years. More than a third have thought "quite a lot" about the congressional elections. Seven of 10 say they are very motivated to get out and vote this year.

•Democrats are particularly engaged: 56% say they are "more enthusiastic about voting than usual," the highest level recorded since the question was first asked in 1994. Among Republicans, 43% say they are more enthusiastic than usual.

•Americans are increasingly likely to identify themselves as Democrats. Including those who "lean" to one party or the other, 55% call themselves Democrats; 38%, Republicans. That's the biggest edge for Democrats since 1998. By 54%-38%, the registered voters surveyed say they'd vote for a Democratic congressional candidate over a Republican one if the election were held today.

•That said, voters aren't particularly enamored of Democratic officeholders. Congressional Democrats have an approval rating of just 38%, 1 percentage point above Bush and 5 points above congressional Republicans.

•Democrats are preferred by double digits to Republicans on four of the five top-ranked issues: Iraq, government corruption, the economy and health care. Republicans are preferred by 11 percentage points on handling terrorism.

•Only 39% say most members of Congress deserve re-election, but 61% say their own representative does. That disparity is common and no guarantee to incumbents. The numbers were similar in July 1994, the year Democrats lost 54 House seats. Then, 60% said their representative deserved re-election; 41% said most members did.

Lack Of Messenger Bedevils Democrats (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, June 28, 2006

Congressional Democrats have spent more than a year struggling to craft what they hope is a winning message and agenda, but their biggest challenge may be one they can't fix with focus groups and slogans: lack of a singular messenger.

In a perennial problem for a minority, Democrats are denied both the bully pulpit of the White House and the instant credibility of a Speaker or Senate Majority Leader. And many view the top national Democratic leaders as either too polarizing to unify the party or too obscure to command widespread attention.

"It's a major problem," said one senior Democratic Congressional aide. "People already feel that it's not clear what Democrats stand for, and this just exacerbates that because [voters] can't think of any one person and one message" who speaks for all of them.

Democrats have ratcheted up their hopes for major victories this fall with a nationalized campaign message focused on alleged GOP corruption and failed Republican policies ranging from national security to health care and, most recently, the minimum wage.

While emboldened by President Bush's sagging poll numbers and internal GOP divisions on key issues, Democrats also acknowledge they face major challenges in convincing voters to hand them power them without a prominent figure to call their drumbeat.

The Democratic leadership consists of three major players; Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.), a social moderate who prefers to play a behind-the-scenes strategic role than that of spokesman; House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), an outspoken liberal who enjoys the spotlight but is viewed as too far to the left for many in her party; and outspoken Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, arguably the Democrat whom Republicans most love to hate.

Other Democrats share a high public profile, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), John Kerry (Mass.), Edward Kennedy (Mass.) and increasingly newcomer Barack Obama (Ill.), but most have their own separate political ambitions or agendas that so far have kept them from becoming unifying figures.

Reid spokesman Jim Manley said Democrats understand they cannot compete with the built-in message advantage of the White House, and as such they must tap into a variety of leading party voices to articulate their agenda.

He said that, from coordinating national activities and crafting an agenda to setting up a powerful communications "war room," Democrats are doing the best they can as a minority party seeking to oust the party in power.

"Under the leadership of Sen. Reid and Congresswoman Pelosi, we've done a better job than ever before weaving a seamless relationship between all the different Democratic [factions]," Manley said.

"Republicans control the House, Senate and White House," Manley added. "They have the megaphone of the White House, we do not. So, what we need to do get our best people out there to talk about the message, day in and day out. That's what we are doing."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said she doesn't worry about the lack of a singular messenger right now. She said 2006 is no different from other midterm election years when the White House isn't up for grabs and the minority hasn't rallied around its next presidential nominee: "It's the way it always is when we are in between presidential campaigns."

"I don't think it's a concern right now," echoed Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.). "The midterms are about individual races. One has to speak about the issues that that individual is concerned about. Next election, of course" it matters.

Still, Democrats acknowledge there are hurdles to overcome. They argue that without the podium the Republicans enjoy, they must simply work harder and push their ideas more aggressively as a party to articulate their vision for the country.

"We have to speak up," Lautenberg said. "We're not yet speaking with one voice. But hopefully when we become the majority, we will speak with one voice."

"There doesn't have to be one face," added Senate Democratic Caucus Secretary Debbie Stabenow (Mich.). "Every Senators' [face] is the face of their state. Ultimately, I am the voice in Michigan, and ultimately each Member is the voice in their state."

The diversity of opinion within the party probably was never more evident than over the past two weeks when both the House and Senate debated the Iraq war, and Democrats continued to display their differences on how best to conclude the conflict. In both chambers, Democrats failed to agree among themselves on whether or when to withdraw troops — a point Republicans relished in reinforcing.

"There have definitely been efforts to join together on slogans like 'New Direction,' but we've also parted ways, and that's diluted the significance," noted the senior Congressional staffer.

Senate Republican Conference Chairman Rick Santorum (Pa.) said Democrats' problem in appealing to a majority of Americans is twofold: Their message lacks substance and their bench of leaders is thin.

"It's not good for them," Santorum said.

Democrats kicked off 2006 with plans to show the electorate who they are as a party, and where they would take the country if put in charge next year. After months of internal party discussion, Reid and Pelosi launched a campaign platform of anti-corruption, stronger national security and a renewed emphasis on domestic priorities of health care, energy reform, fiscal discipline and economic stability.

That effort came after several cycles of criticism both within the party and from the outside, that Democrats failed to adequately define themselves when victory appeared within their grasp.

A senior House Democratic aide said while the party could certainly use a powerful messenger, the bigger problem may be in the message itself, one this staffer suggested is simply rehash of the same old Democratic positions.

"You need something that Members and candidates want to talk about on the stump, not something that goes from fax machine to trash," this aide said. "The [1994] 'Contract with America' made bold reform pronouncements ... it was bold enough to attract media attention on its own. It was clear that the Republicans, in 1994, were offering something different."

Still, Democrats believe they are more united than they've been in recent memory, and more than ever they agree that Republicans and Bush have taken the country in the wrong direction on most major policies, particularly in Iraq. They argue that while they don't always share the same exact viewpoints, they are together on most major policies, and articulating their positions in the toughest of political environments.

"It's always a challenge for the party in the minority," said Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.). "It's even doubly so for a party with as large a tent as the Democrats have.

"All we can do is speak out as ably as we can."

Emanuel Puts Reynolds In The DCCC's Crosshairs (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, June 28, 2006

Former Rep. George Nethercutt (R-Wash.) was branded a giant-slayer in 1994 when he defeated Speaker Thomas Foley (D-Wash.), adding a finishing kick in the gut to the beating the Democrats took that year.

In this November's midterm elections, Democrats would like nothing better than to make an example of a Republican leader and they have Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), in their crosshairs.

Speaking to reporters last month, Reynolds suggested that he and Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) are like two tennis players and Emanuel has forced Reynolds to raise the level of his game.

Emanuel late last year downplayed any rivalry with Reynolds, saying that they are friends. He also said Reynolds was one of the first to call him after he was appointed to head the DCCC.

But the gentlemanly respect stops there.

Not only has Emanuel recruited multimillionaire Democrat Jack Davis, whom Reynolds defeated in 2004 with 56 percent of the vote, but the two chairmen have spent the past nine months trash-talking while trading allegations of corruption.

Last week, the DCCC prepared a memorandum for The Hill tying President Bush and Reynolds to the economy in western New York and suburban Buffalo.

"I think Bush's performance and his numbers, and most importantly his record, is wholeheartedly rejected in the northeast and Midwest," Emanuel said last week in an interview with The Hill when asked if Reynolds should be worried about his own seat.

During a March interview on C-SPAN, Reynolds touted what he called the "Bush boom" across the country and the need to get the message out.

"Even in upstate N.Y. where jobs are a tough, tough scene and hard to come by, we're seeing production orders, we're seeing other types of things where businesses that are flourishing and there are some success stories," Reynolds said.

Reynolds spokesman L.D. Platt dismissed the DCCC memo, saying, "Rahm should pay more attention to his own district's job losses instead of helping his liberal candidates disguise their support for job-killing tax increases in western New York."

As examples of recent economic growth, Reynolds cited last Saturday's Democrat & Chronicle in Rochester, N.Y., which reported that Reynolds helped secure $30 million in federal money to help a company that produces high-frequency radios for the military reopen a plant.

The paper also reported that area business leaders and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) would announce a campaign intended to "position Rochester as a major player in the push to find alternatives to foreign oil."

Nevertheless, the DCCC's goal is not to make a fair analysis of the regional economy but to weaken Reynolds politically by suggesting that he and Bush are responsible for the economic condition of upstate New York.

"I don't think I've ever seen it in such a visible way. … Clearly there's not been, in my memory, as competitive a personal relationship as there is in this competitive environment," said former Rep. Bill Paxon (R-N.Y.), who chaired the NRCC in 1994.

Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), who is on good terms with both chairmen, said that the rivalry is not personal and that they like one another.

"If you're a politician, you like to watch two great political operators. There's a lot on the line personally and for the country," he said.

Some political observers say Emanuel will seek a leadership bid in the next Congress and others have speculated that Reynolds has his eye on replacing House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) when the Illinois lawmaker retires. November's results will have a significant impact on the leadership aspirations of both men.

In past election cycles, committee chairmen have tried to beat their opponents' leaders, with mixed results. Former Rep. Vic Fazio (D-Calif.), DCCC chairman from 1990 to 1994, spent thousands of dollars in 1992 in a primary that pitted former Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) against Herman Clark. Gingrich barely won.

Then-Rep. Martin Frost (D-Texas) took control of the DCCC for the 1995-'96 cycle and picked up some Democratic seats, but no GOP leaders were defeated. Frost was defeated in the 2004 election after Republicans redrew his district.

The DCCC is also targeting other members of the GOP leadership, including Reps. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) and John Doolittle (R-Calif.). The only member of Democratic leadership that the NRCC is looking to oust this fall is Rep. John Spratt (D-S.C.).

Reynolds taunted Emanuel after the June 6 special election in California's 50th District, saying, "Rahm Emanuel and the Democrats lost big" after they "invested financially and emotionally" in Francine Busby, who lost to Rep. Brian Bilbray (R-Calif.). The DCCC notes that the district is conservative and that Bush easily won it during the 2004 election.

The NRCC paid $1,800 for phone banks to oppose Emanuel in his 5th Congressional District, which extends west from Lake Michigan across Chicago.

However, Reynolds's seat is considered competitive by independent political analysts and Emanuel's is not.

Reynolds last year called Emanuel "Mr. Righteous" for alleging Republican corruption and tried to link Emanuel to corruption in Chicago Mayor Richard Daley's administration.

Emanuel replied that he empathized with Reynolds, adding that he should exercise because "it helps you deal with stress."

Look Who's Missing DeLay (TIME)

By Hilary Hylton

Time, June 28, 2006

His was the face that launched a thousand fundraisers and Democrats miss him so terribly that they are trying to persuade a federal judge to keep former Congressman Tom DeLay's name on the ballot this fall. Allowing the Texas Republican Party to replace DeLay, who says he lives and votes in Virginia, would cause great harm to the Democratic Party, the party's lawyers argued in an Austin federal court Monday. Proving that claim is crucial to their lawsuit so Democrats testified just how much DeLay meant to them. Embarrassing? "Maybe," said Cris Feldman, an attorney for the Democrats, "but necessary."

DeLay, who is facing criminal money laundering charges in a campaign finance probe, has a profound effect not only on Democratic juices, but also impacts the party's "bottom line," Ken Bailey, the Texas Democratic party affairs director testified. "He's kind of like a lightening rod that we use to drum up support," Bailey said. The party has used DeLay's face on numerous flyers and web campaigns in past elections, and organizers say the mention of his name can inspire volunteers from across the state to converge on DeLay's old 22nd congressional district near Houston.

"Mr. DeLay had a profile among contributor Democrats that causes them to be more generous than they are going to be with a candidate who isn't as high profile," longtime Texas Democratic political analyst Dan McClung said in court. DeLay didn't just bring in money, McClung added, but also support from out-of-state Democratic interest groups and resources from the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0037101

Without him, the volunteers are not as inspired and, as one Republican lawyer joked in court, the money from California liberals dries up. In fact, Democrat Nick Lampson, who is seeking the seat, did receive some early support from Hollywood heavyweights Rob Reiner and Barbra Streisand when DeLay was still in the race. DeLay, who had testified earlier Monday about his move to Virginia, was not in the courtroom for the Democratic salute to his potency, but his presence loomed large. "If Mr. DeLay stays on the ballot, it is a lot easier to run against somebody who's been indicted," Bailey said.

One issue facing U.S. District Judge Sam Sparks is whether DeLay contrived to be declared ineligible, opening the door to a replacement candidate, or whether he simply withdrew from the race. Texas law does not allow a withdrawn candidate to be replaced. Another key question before the court is whether the Texas Republican Party can declare a federal candidate ineligible. Sparks is not expected to rule until early July and his decision is sure to appealed.

Meanwhile, Republicans are going forward with plans to name a new nominee, but they expect Sparks' ruling will come before that process is complete. As for DeLay, he said he would be driving back to his Sugarland "house" (not "home") after testifying that he, indeed, had a Virginia driver's license in his wallet.

GOP Offers 'Values Agenda' (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, June 28, 2006

With little fanfare, House Republican leaders on Tuesday unveiled a broad "American Values Agenda," composed of bills designed to appeal to the GOP's political base.

The agenda includes measures on topics such as abortion, cloning, religious freedom, flag burning and gun rights — all issues that resonate with social conservatives, some of whom have expressed misgivings about the party's recent direction.

"The American Values Agenda is a collection of legislative initiatives that speak to the values many American citizens hold dear," Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said in a statement. "Freedom to display the American flag ... freedom of religious expression ... the right to keep and bear arms ... respect for the sanctity of marriage, and the dignity of all human life."

Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said the agenda would help "protect the faith of our people, the sanctity of life and freedoms outlined by our Founding Fathers."

GOP leaders, with the help of Rep. Joe Pitts (R-Pa.), the head of the Values Action Team, began crafting the agenda in May after holding a handful of meetings with prominent social conservative leaders. Tuesday's list is designed to supplement the larger legislative agenda that was released in May, one that did not include many issues important to social conservatives.

The GOP already has begun cycling through the American Values Agenda, as the House passed the Freedom to Display the American Flag Act on Tuesday.

The agenda also includes the Pledge Protection Act; the Public Expression of Religion Act; the federal marriage amendment; the Unborn Child Pain Awareness Act; the Human Cloning Prohibition Act; a measure reforming the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; an Internet gambling ban; and a measure preventing the government from confiscating citizens' guns during emergencies.

Democrats reacted to the GOP's announced agenda by accusing Republicans of playing politics.

"The American people will see through the Republicans' old playbook of distract, distort and divide," said Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). "Pandering to the radical right-wing's wrong priorities does not reflect the American values of opportunity, security and prosperity."

... And Why Lieberman Can't Win His And Shoultn't Try (HILL)

By Dick Morris

The Hill, June 28, 2006

Keeping Joseph Lieberman in the United States Senate is clearly in the national interest. One of the most ethical, sincere, thoughtful and balanced of senators, he stands as a monument to nonpartisan common sense in an increasingly shrill and polarized partisan environment.

But he is in the process of committing suicide. By insisting on running in Connecticut's Democratic primary against anti-war candidate Ned Lamont, he is in a fight he won't win and, in the process, destroying his chances in the general election, which he can win.

As my populist and liberal friend Bill Curry discovered when he defeated the Democratic Party establishment's candidate for governor, Rep. John Larson, in the primary of 1994, primaries in Connecticut are notoriously polarized. The right dominates the GOP nominating process just as surely as the left controls that of the Democrats. This is no place for a centrist to thrive.

If Lieberman simply skips the primary and runs as an independent, forcing a three-way race, he will win overwhelmingly. The larger Connecticut electorate adores him and will happily desert either party to vote for his reelection.

But in an August Democratic primary, with its low turnout and ideologically skewed voters, he faces decapitation. As surely as an American soldier on patrol in Iraq, his very presence in the Democratic primary provides a tempting target for those who want to vent their frustration at American foreign policy.

Those who back Lieberman will stay home in a primary. Those who shine with passionate intensity against him will surely vote.

Scott Rasmussen has Lieberman clinging to a narrow 45-41 lead over Lamont, based largely on his name recognition. Other pollsters give the Senate a larger margin. But the inevitable dynamics of this primary are likely to flow toward the challenger as he picks up money, support and recognition and offers a way to do something there is no other way to do: Vote against the war.

Lieberman's supporters argue that if he loses the primary he can always then run as an independent. Technically that is not true. He would have to file his nominating petitions as an independent before the primary.

But politically it is a failed choice as well. If Lieberman loses the primary, the defeat will empower Lamont and make him a viable candidate in November. Like a parasite, he will thrive on the nutrients in the senator's blood and use them to animate his candidacy. But if Lieberman withdraws from the primary (even if his name has to remain on the ballot), he denies Lamont that victory. Without it, the insurgent can never amass the resources and credibility he would need to run and win in November.

Lieberman speaks of his loyalty to the Democratic Party. Obviously, if he wins as an independent, he will continue to vote with his party in the Senate and will continue to call himself a Democrat. But this misguided party loyalty may help to elect Republican candidate Alan Schlesinger. If Lieberman is so weakened by a primary defeat that he fades as a front-runner in the general election, we will see a three-way race that anyone can win.

Lieberman's ads attacking Lamont are pathetic. His media adviser, Carter Eskew, summons the ghosts of his past success by resurrecting ads that depict former Gov. Lowell Weicker as a bear, now encouraging Lamont to seek to avenge Weicker's 1988 Senate defeat by beating Lieberman, the man who slew him. It's an argument that is far too complex for the average voter and too remote to matter even if they understand it.

One hopes that Lieberman remembers the parable of Jacob Javits, the former New York senator whose tenure was much like Lieberman's. A liberal Republican who never marched to the beat of his party's drummer, Javits faced a primary from Alfonse D'Amato from the right wing of the GOP.

Had Javits simply run as an independent (in New York at the time that meant running on the Liberal Party line), he would easily have been elected. But because he lost in the primary, when he did run as a Liberal Party candidate he ran a poor third. Splitting the progressive vote, he so crippled the Democratic candidate, Rep. Elizabeth Holtzman, that D'Amato won by a hair.

This column is a plea to the senator: Don't let hubris, overconfidence, unfounded optimism or even muddled confusion lead you to your death in the Democratic primary. We need you too much in Washington.

Morris, a former political adviser to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and President Bill Clinton, is the author of Condi vs. Hillary: The Next Great Presidential Race.

A.F.L.-C.I.O. In Connecticut Gives Backing To Lieberman (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037103

NEW HAVEN, June 27 — Connecticut's largest labor union on Tuesday endorsed Senator Joseph I. Lieberman in the Democratic primary, although many union leaders, meeting at their state political convention, complained of his support for the war in Iraq and foreign trade agreements. Many sounded loud "nays" when the voice vote was called.

"He's endorsed," John W. Olsen, the chairman of the state A.F.L.-C.I.O., said after the vote, which followed comments by the several dozen speakers — some passionate, some conflicted — who formed lines at the two floor microphones.

Most of the speakers expressed support, noting the senator's efforts in his three terms to protect workers in industries ranging from clothing to submarine manufacturing. Many said, however, that his challenger, Ned Lamont, a businessman from Greenwich who owns a cable television company, is a fresh face who will better serve their interests and stand up to President Bush on issues like the war and trade.

After the vote, Mr. Olsen was asked whether the "nays," which were not far below the "yeas" in volume, suggested that labor leaders were split over the endorsement, and he noted that no one had challenged the vote after it was completed.

Mr. Olsen, who announced his personal support for the senator several weeks ago, said it was clear from a meeting earlier in the day with leaders of individual unions that the senator had the necessary two-thirds of the approximately 350 convention delegates. He said the senator had "a wide cushion."

He said the delegates represented about 180,000 workers. He noted, however, that labor support would be spread among several races, including tight congressional races in November and the Democratic primary for governor. In that race, the labor federation on Tuesday endorsed Mayor John DeStefano of New Haven, who narrowly lost the state party endorsement last month to Mayor Dannel P. Malloy of Stamford.

The primary is Aug. 8.

Labor backing could be important for Senator Lieberman. A recent poll showed Mr. Lamont gaining support among Democratic voters. In a poll this month by Quinnipiac University, he trailed the senator, 55 to 40, among Democratic voters who said they were likely to vote in the primary. Among all Democrats, the senator led 57 to 32 percent; in May, a Quinnipiac poll found the difference to be 65 to 19.

Mr. Lamont has used the senator's support for the war to galvanize opposition to Mr. Lieberman on other issues, including health care and education policy, and he has gathered other unions' support.

Several delegates noted that Senator Lieberman had an 84 percent score from the federation for his votes on labor issues. Many also complained that he had long supported free trade agreements that cost manufacturing jobs.

Others poked at Mr. Lamont, whom the senator has characterized as a wealthy opportunist trying to buy the election.

"Mr. Lamont owns a communications company," Howard Coling, vice president of Local 1298 of the Communications Workers of America in Seymour, Conn. "And it's nonunion." That prompted sustained hoots of disapproval across the room.

Poll Shows Ehrlich Lagging As He Opens Reelection Run (WP)

By Robert Barnes And Claudia Deane

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. starts his reelection campaign today significantly trailing Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, according to a new Washington Post poll. Although the state's voters give the governor good marks for the job he's done, they also appear inclined to return a Democrat to the governor's mansion.

Ehrlich kicks off his campaign today at his boyhood home in the Baltimore suburb of Arbutus, attempting to become the state's first Republican governor in 50 years to serve a second term. But the poll shows why he is preparing to spend a record amount and why he is considered one of the nation's most endangered Republican governors.

Ehrlich is running in an overwhelmingly Democratic state at a time when voters are not happy with the GOP. Maryland voters are more critical than voters nationally of the Bush administration and more strongly opposed to the war in Iraq. And, unlike earlier in Ehrlich's term, more Marylanders than not believe the state is heading in the wrong direction, the poll shows.

Public education is the top priority of voters statewide, and that is the area in which they give Ehrlich his lowest marks. Among the state's largest jurisdictions, controlling crime ranks a strong second in Prince George's and Baltimore counties; growth and transportation are emerging priorities in Montgomery County.

The poll shows Ehrlich trailing O'Malley by 11 percentage points among registered voters and 16 points among those who say they are "absolutely certain" to vote in the Nov. 7 election. The deficit comes even though a majority of voters find Ehrlich likable, approve of the job he has been doing and believe that the 48-year-old former congressman from Baltimore County has a vision for the state.

The telephone poll was conducted among 902 registered voters June 19 to Sunday and has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points. Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan dropped out of the race the week of the poll, leaving O'Malley as the remaining major Democrat to oppose Ehrlich in the fall.

Ehrlich declined to comment, but aides said they did not believe he trailed by such a large margin; communications director Paul E. Schurick said the campaign's most recent poll, conducted in mid-May, showed O'Malley ahead by 5 points.

"We've always known this was going to be an incredibly difficult and close race," Schurick said. "But there is something in this poll that strikes us as wrong."

O'Malley said the poll showed more than simply Democrats supporting a Democrat.

"There are a number of issues that have defined who our current governor is," O'Malley said. "The choices he's made are not in the best interests of expanding the middle class and helping our working families. . . . People feel that our state is moving in the wrong direction, and they're smart enough to know we need effective leadership."

Reelection campaigns are most often considered referendums on the incumbent, and the poll offers both good and bad news for Ehrlich.

He has lost support among independents, women and voters in the central part of the state where he put together a historic win four years ago. Democrats who took a chance on him then seem ready to return to the fold for O'Malley.

But voters still have a mostly positive view of Ehrlich; large majorities say he is honest and likable. He has only begun to fight, and he is hoping to spend $20 million to convince voters that he deserves another four years.Poor Marks on Education

According to the poll, Ehrlich and O'Malley are about equally popular with the state's independent voters and within their own parties. In most parts of the country, that would signal a very close race. But because more than half of Maryland's registered voters are Democrats, it provides the substantial lead for O'Malley.

In 2002, Ehrlich overcame that advantage with a forceful and fresh-faced campaign against then-Lt. Gov. Kathleen Kennedy Townsend. Exit polls showed that he attracted support from independent voters, people who considered themselves moderates and women who have traditionally backed Democrats. But the new poll shows that the governor has been losing those constituents at this point of the campaign.

Although an Election Day telephone poll showed that Ehrlich got about 55 percent of the independents in 2002, he and O'Malley are tied in the current poll. His support among self-described moderates dropped from 50 percent to 37 percent and among white women from 61 percent to 45 percent.

The new poll asked how much Ehrlich has accomplished in his first term and found that 8 percent said "a lot" and 21 percent said "not much"; 40 percent gave him credit for a "fair amount" and 30 percent for "some."

"I think what you're seeing is voters think he's done an okay job, but they can't really point to any accomplishments," said Democratic pollster Peter Brodnitz, who advised Timothy M. Kaine's successful gubernatorial campaign in Virginia last year and does not have a statewide client in Maryland. "They're not seeing a compelling reason" to reelect.

Ehrlich also won in 2002 by disrupting Democrats' traditional winning strategy of rolling up enough votes in Montgomery and Prince George's and the Baltimore region to offset losses elsewhere. But although Ehrlich got a boost of more than 50,000 votes last time in the region consisting of Baltimore and the counties of Baltimore, Harford and Carroll, the new poll shows him trailing O'Malley there by 12 points. It shows the two running even in the Central Maryland counties of Anne Arundel, Howard and Frederick, where Ehrlich won by more than 85,000 votes against Townsend.

On issues, Ehrlich gets his poorest marks on public education. Even though he says he has spent more money on schools than any other governor -- a state law passed the year before he took office mandates it -- half of the poll respondents said he has done a "not so good" or "poor" job of "putting more state money into the public schools."

Public education was cited by 35 percent of the respondents as the issue that should be the top priority of the next governor, more than any other. Female voters especially were interested in education; 39 percent of them said Ehrlich was doing a good job.

And the poll indicated that some might believe Ehrlich is too close to big business. Two-thirds of the respondents said "large business corporations" had too much influence in the Ehrlich administration, and 77 percent said the legislature was right to force Wal-Mart to pay for health insurance for its employees. Ehrlich vetoed that legislation, as well as an increase in the minimum wage, and was overridden by Democratic lawmakers on both.

Those actions convinced Noelle Joll, a geographer from Anne Arundel, that Ehrlich was not as moderate as he said. "I don't think he's a bad guy," she said. "I just think he's pandering to his base."56% Job Approval Rating

On the other hand: Tom Caulfield, 59, a Republican who owns Chubby's Barbecue restaurant in Frederick, said he is sticking with Ehrlich.

"I think his first term has gone very successfully considering the odds he's had stacked against him," Caulfield said. "He does not have a popular Republican majority. For him to get anything done is amazing."

The poll indicates that many agree. While Ehrlich's favorability ratings have declined since the last Post poll in 2004, nine in 10 of the state's Republicans have a positive view of him, and nearly six in 10 of those who consider themselves independent feel the same way.

Overall, 56 percent approve of the way he handles his job, three in four say he is honest, even more say he is likable and two-thirds say he "has a vision for the state's future." A majority say he has done a good job protecting the Chesapeake Bay, and, despite his highly publicized battles with the Democrat-controlled General Assembly, six in 10 say he is "willing to make reasonable compromises."

More than seven in 10 say he deserves credit for the state's projected budget surplus.

Republican pollster Ed Goeas, who is not advising a candidate in Maryland, said the reason the Ehrlich-O'Malley matchup numbers do not reflect the generally positive views of Ehrlich is mostly because of the state's Democratic majority.

"People go back to their partisan leanings," he said. "What you have to do in a state like Maryland as you get close to the election, you have to get people to put aside their leanings and look at the person."

It is clear already that Ehrlich is trying to restore his moderate credentials and appeal to those he counted on in 2002. His first television advertisement features testimonials from six women, a black man and a man who appears Latino and includes the line: "He doesn't govern from the right or the left but from the middle, where most of us are."

He recently crossed some conservatives by quickly firing a Metro board member who described homosexuals as "persons of sexual deviancy."

And he could look to appeal to women by naming a female running mate to replace Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, who is running for the U.S. Senate. Ehrlich's list of candidates is almost exclusively composed of women, although the list of candidates running for statewide office this year, Democratic and Republican, is almost exclusively male.Differences by Jurisdiction

The top two issues that voters want the next governor to "work hardest on" -- public education and crime -- are two on which Ehrlich has most criticized O'Malley. The state moved to seize control of Baltimore's worst-performing schools before Democratic legislators stopped the move, and a state study is underway to see whether the city is underreporting crimes there.

The poll showed great variance, though, on voters' priorities based on jurisdiction. In Prince George's, nearly as many people listed crime as the top priority as did those who said education. In Montgomery, 20 percent said transportation should be the governor's top priority and 13 percent said growth. That compares with 25 percent who said it should be education.

On other issues, Marylanders showed a liberal streak. Although 56 percent said they would oppose a state law that would allow gay and lesbian couples to marry, respondents were just about evenly split on allowing civil unions.

And those in the poll were very negative about the Bush administration and the war in Iraq, with 63 percent saying the war "was not worth fighting."

More than two-thirds say they disapprove of President Bush's job performance -- 55 percent disapprove "strongly." And 56 percent said the fact that Bush was backing a candidate would make them less likely to vote for the candidate, as opposed to 19 percent who said it would make their support more likely.

Summer Vacations Run On Empty (USAT)

By Barbara De Lollis And Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, June 28, 2006

High gas prices may be stifling the traditional summer vacation.

Only 39.8% of consumers plan to take a vacation within the next six months, a 28-year low, the Conference Board said Tuesday.

That's the fourth consecutive decline measured by the organization, which asks the question every other month.

"It's possible that travel is falling victim to rising gas prices and rising costs overall," says Lynn Franco, director of the firm's Consumer Research Center.

A new USA TODAY/Gallup Poll supports the notion that high gas prices are crimping vacations. One-third of respondents in the survey of 1,000 adults taken Friday through Sunday said they are changing summer vacation plans because of higher gas prices.

Of those changing plans, 37% said they would reduce the number of trips normally taken, while 26% said they're canceling plans or simply can't afford to vacation. Some 23% will take shorter trips.

Gasoline prices have slipped from recent highs but are still far above where they were a year ago. The nationwide average price for a gallon of regular gasoline was $2.86 Tuesday, up 65 cents from a year ago, according to travel club AAA.

Even as many Americans say they are calling off summer travel, hotels are packed and airlines are nearly fully booked this summer. And they're charging higher prices because demand is so high.

Frequent flier Bob McBride of Omaha says high gas prices altered, but didn't snuff out, his travel plans.

For an annual trip with a friend next month, McBride, 56, will use airline and hotel loyalty points to visit Boston. They're staying downtown so they can walk or take public transportation.

More than 40 million Americans are expected to travel 50 miles or more around the July Fourth holiday, according to a report Tuesday from AAA. That's a 1.2% increase from a year ago, less than half the 2.8% jump seen last year.

The decline in vacation plans could also reflect a drop in employees who get paid time off. The percentage of companies giving paid vacation time fell to 82% this year from 91% in 2002, according to the Society for Human Resource Management. SHRM spokesman Frank Scanlan says employees who do not take time off could become burned out and less productive.

"We're all doing more with less," Scanlan says. "You have to give people time away."

Mr. Buffett's Gift (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

Warren Buffett's pledge of more than $30 billion to the Gates Foundation is an act of jaw-dropping generosity, all the more impressive because it represents the lion's share of his Berkshire Hathaway fortune. Now all the nation's two wealthiest men have to prove is that they can be as effective at giving away their money as they have been at making it. This is harder than it sounds.

Bill and Melinda Gates founded their charity just 12 years ago, though what it lacks in experience it more than makes up for in size. The Gates Foundation is already the nation's largest by far, and Mr. Buffett's largesse will allow it to double its annual giving to some $3 billion. To date the foundation, whose mission is "to help reduce inequities in the United States and around the world," has focused primarily on education and public health.

And so far at least, it seems to have avoided the worst pitfalls of many other large, politically correct foundations. James Piereson, the former director of the Olin Foundation, points out that the Gateses are wisely "focusing on problems -- like health in the Third World, AIDS, malaria -- rather than advocacy for government solutions." Too many large foundations -- the Ford Foundation is the classic example -- have wandered away from their donor's wishes and become adjuncts of the welfare state.

On U.S. education, though, the charity's efforts have been somewhat less noteworthy. Mr. Gates has embraced charter schools to some extent, but mainly when union opposition is minimal or nonexistent. And he has shied away from vouchers, which can literally rescue thousands of kids from failed public schools and are favored by other philanthropists like Theodore Forstmann and the late John Walton.

In 2003, the Gates Foundation donated $58 million to build more small schools in New York City. Smaller schools and class sizes are a perennial demand of teachers unions because they means more jobs, but there's little evidence that they significantly improve student performance.

Notwithstanding these growing pains, Mr. Buffett is clearly convinced the Gates Foundation is a worthy beneficiary. No doubt he hopes to avoid the missteps of Henry Ford, Andrew Carnegie, Joseph Pew, John MacArthur and other money men of the past, whose fortunes inevitably wound up in the hands of individuals who didn't know them and spent their money on causes they almost certainly would have opposed. Hence, Mr. Buffett has decided to give away his money before he dies, and he's chosen living donors whom he knows well and trusts. Wisely, his gift is also conditioned on Mr. and Mrs. Gates remaining active in setting policy and administrating the charity.

In explaining his charitable motivations this week, Mr. Buffett also went out of his way to say that he is "not an enthusiast for dynastic wealth." This is fair enough, and is also one of Mr. Buffett's arguments for so vocally defending federal death tax rates of 50% or more. But we can't help but point out that Mr. Buffett's gift will itself be shielded from Uncle Sam because it is going to a foundation. So in practice he is in favor of death taxes only for those whose estates are too small to hide in foundation tax shelters.

We'd also note that the foundations he is donating to may well become "dynasties" in their own right. In addition to his Gates Foundation gift, Mr. Buffett also said he will give major donations well north of $1 billion each to separate foundations run by his three children and another in the name of his late wife. These gifts, too, will be shielded from taxation and will allow his heirs to wield power and influence long after the 75-year-old has gone to his just reward. With their tax-sheltered assets, modern foundations have no expiration date and have become hugely important players in policy debates, the culture and even politics.

Which is all the more reason to watch how well the two men now deploy their gifts. We can't think of two people less in need of our two cents than Messrs. Buffett and Gates. But since giving free advice is our business, we'd suggest that they put at least a smidgen of their money back into strengthening the foundations of the free-market system that has allowed them to become so fabulously rich. There's something to be said for reinvesting in the moral capital of a free society and trying to sustain and export free-enterprise policies.

Capitalism has done very well not just by Mr. Buffett but also by the world's poor, as several hundred million Chinese and Indians might attest. African nations in particular need property rights and a rule of law as badly as they need vaccines. On that score we were encouraged by a report this week that the Gateses thanked Mr. Buffett for his gift by presenting him with a book from their personal library: Adam Smith's "The Wealth of Nations."

Testing Away HIV (WP)

ABOUT A QUARTER of Americans with HIV don't know they have the virus, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. In the District, a city with a well-funded but historically dysfunctional HIV-AIDS program, that number might be even higher.

We say might because the D.C. Administration for HIV Policy and Programs (AHPP) still doesn't reliably track the spread of the virus in the city. Its best estimate, released Monday to the Mayor's Task Force on HIV and AIDS, is that about 25,000 people in the city are infected, but this is just a projection based on national CDC numbers. That's why the city's new drive to test everyone in the District between the ages of 14 and 84, which kicked off yesterday in Freedom Plaza, is long overdue.

The D.C. government wants to distribute 80,000 20-minute testing kits to hospitals, schools and local health organizations before the end of the year, with the goal of making rapid HIV screening a routine part of D.C. life. The tests require only a painless mouth swab. Their distribution will be backed by a marketing campaign, launched yesterday, to encourage District residents to get screened, which may help eliminate the stigma attached to HIV testing.

The doctors, nurses and public health workers who administer the tests will report all positive results back to the Administration for HIV Policy and Programs, which keeps individual testing records strictly confidential. In theory, the AHPP will use the data it accumulates to begin gauging the rate of HIV infection in the city. Then the District can start issuing the kinds of reports on the spread of the virus that have long been standard in cities such as Baltimore and New York -- theirs come out quarterly -- and finally begin targeting its HIV funding effectively.

It's an ambitious plan for the AHPP, a branch of the Department of Health that has so far failed to gather basic information about HIV in the District, even though it spent almost half a billion dollars in local and federal funds over the past eight years. It's also an appropriately bold counterpunch in the city's so-far losing fight with HIV: The District's rate of HIV infection rivals that of AIDS-ridden nations in sub-Saharan Africa.

The city's latest public health campaign won't work, however, if District residents don't take the time to get tested. So if you didn't drop by Freedom Plaza on your lunch break yesterday, find a clinic and get a free HIV screening. It only takes 20 minutes to take charge of your health.

Israeli Troops Move Into Gaza (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

GAZA CITY, June 28 -- Israeli ground troops pushed into the Gaza Strip early Wednesday in a military operation aimed at freeing a captured soldier whose fate has transfixed much of the country. The incursion was the military's first major move into Gaza since the Israeli government withdrew all troops and settlers from the enclave nine months ago.

An undisclosed number of troops reportedly entered the strip at its southern end, near the city of Rafah on the Egyptian border. Hours earlier, Israeli military officials said, military aircraft bombed two bridges in central Gaza to prevent the gunmen who abducted Cpl. Gilad Shalit, 19, during a Sunday attack on an army post at the strip's southeastern edge from moving him around Gaza or into Egypt.

Another airstrike hit Gaza's power station, knocking out electricity throughout the strip and igniting a huge fire that lit the pre-dawn sky. A third bridge was also reported hit.

The violence overshadowed an agreement earlier in the day by leaders of Hamas, the radical Islamic movement that controls the Palestinian government, on a unified political agenda advocated by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to ease the economic sanctions against the government.

According to Palestinian negotiators here, Hamas agreed to establish a national-unity government as part of an accord signed by the largest Palestinian political factions. If formally signed Wednesday as scheduled, the agreement would signal a major shift by Hamas's political leaders, who for the first time would effectively endorse a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

In Washington, a senior U.S. official said that while he was not privy to many details about Israel's intentions, he expected the incursion would be "pretty significant."

"This is in the category of a major operation," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "This isn't just 20 commandos."

The signs of conflict had mounted gradually throughout the day Tuesday. More than 3,000 Israeli soldiers, along with tanks and armored personnel carriers, waited along Gaza's perimeter for orders to move into the strip, which the military abandoned last September after evacuating Israel's settlements here. At the same time, Palestinian gunmen built berms near the borders and assembled sand-bag bunkers along routes into urban areas.

The Palestinian accord comes as Hamas is confronting internal divisions and international economic sanctions. It would also be a significant political victory for Abbas, a member of the rival Fatah movement who had threatened to place the deal before Palestinian voters next month unless Hamas accepted its key conditions.

"In our view, this is an important step toward a lasting peace," said Walid Awad, a spokesman for Abbas. "The Hamas government has recognized the state of Israel."

As outlined by officials involved in the talks, the agreement calls for a future Palestinian state in the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem, territory Israel occupied in the 1967 Middle East war. Since its founding nearly two decades ago, Hamas has called for creation of an Islamic state across a far larger stretch of land that includes Israel.

It was unclear, however, whether Hamas's armed wing, known as the Izzadeen al-Qassam Brigades, would abide by the terms of the agreement. Hamas gunmen were involved in the attack Sunday on an army post inside Israel that killed two soldiers and wounded four others. So far, members of the group, who participated in the attack along with two smaller armed factions, have refused to release Shalit.

The two-state pact, which was based on an 18-point document announced last month by Fatah and Hamas leaders being held in Israeli prisons, also runs counter to views held by Hamas's hard-line leadership in exile headed by Khaled Mashal, whom Israeli officials say was behind the Sunday attack. Some Hamas leaders in Gaza, along with Abbas and Egyptian interlocutors, have called for Shalit's release.

"The political leadership of Hamas does not have the strength to control the military wing," Issa Ali Nashar, a senior Hamas political leader, said in an interview in the Gaza city of Khan Younis. "All they can say right now is to keep the soldier safe."

In addition, Israeli officials said lifting economic sanctions against the Palestinian government was highly unlikely, since Hamas had not explicitly recognized Israel or renounced violence against the Jewish state.

Mark Regev, a spokesman for Israel's Foreign Ministry, said that while details of the Palestinians' final accord are not yet known, previous versions have fallen short of meeting conditions set by international donors -- that Hamas renounce violence, abide by previously signed agreements and recognize Israel -- in return for a resumption of aid.

Regev said the agreement would likely have a "minimal effect" on Israel's position toward the Palestinian government, and he expressed frustration that Palestinian leaders were discussing the deal rather than focusing on Shalit's release. "There is an immediate crisis," Regev said. "That the Palestinian leadership was putting energy into this document that has no bearing on the most pressing issue is disappointing."

Bush administration officials reacted cautiously, saying they needed more details about the reported accord before making a judgment. They noted conflicting initial reports about what the agreement entailed.

"We're just going to wait to see exactly what the case is," White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters. "What we want to see is something written so that we can understand what their position is."

In addition to laying out the terms of a Palestinian state, the agreement also calls for confining armed operations against Israel to the occupied territories under a unified command, the right of Palestinian refugees to return, and freedom for thousands of prisoners in Israeli jails.

Nashar and other Hamas leaders said the agreement does not commit Hamas to recognizing the Jewish state, which they believe was created illegally on Arab land through a 1947 United Nations resolution. But it does endorse previously signed agreements that do so, as well as the 2002 Arab peace initiative that calls for Israel to withdraw from all territories occupied in the 1967 war in exchange for peace and recognition.

Islamic Jihad, a smaller group responsible for all suicide bombings inside Israel over the past year, refused to sign the new agreement.

While military preparations continued here, Israeli soldiers searched parts of the West Bank for an 18-year-old Israeli settler missing since Sunday. The radical Popular Resistance Committees, an armed group involved in Sunday's kidnapping, claimed to be holding Eliyahu Asheri, who is from the northern West Bank settlement of Itamar. Settlement officials said he was last seen hitchhiking near the French Hill junction in Jerusalem.

"We don't know what happened and we pray he is okay," Moshe Goldschmidt, a leader of the settlement, said in a telephone interview.

On Wednesday, the militant group threatened to kill Asheri if Israel did not halt its incursion, news services reported.

Throughout the day Tuesday, Israeli tanks and troops assembled along Gaza's periphery while Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called for Israel to allow more time for international diplomacy to secure the soldier's release. But a tour of several towns in southern Gaza suggested that the population here supports holding Shalit until Israel releases some of the 8,503 Palestinians being held in Israel.

The groups behind the kidnapping have demanded the release of the 421 Palestinian women and minors in Israeli prisons in exchange for information about Shalit's welfare. Olmert rejected the demand on Monday, threatening instead a "broad and comprehensive" military operation unless Shalit is freed immediately.

Israeli Tanks And Troops Enter Gaza (FT)

By Ferry Biedermann

Financial Times, June 28, 2006

Israeli tanks and troops crossed the border into the southern Gaza Strip early on Wednesday in what the army described as a target operation aimed at freeing a kidnapped soldier.

The army said it did not intend to carry out a prolonged operation. However, the incursion marks the most serious escalation in operations by Israel's ground forces since their withdrawal from the Gaza Strip nearly a year ago.

The move follows the failure of diplomatic efforts to secure the release of the Israeli soldier during an attack on Sunday in which the armed wing of Hamas, the militant Palestinian movement, participated.

The two leading Palestinian factions, Hamas and Fatah, have in effect reached agreement on a unified approach towards Israel and on internal Palestinian issues, officials in the West Bank and Gaza had said on Tuesday.

The agreement was billed as promising an unprecedented implicit recognition of Israel by Hamas.

However, the militant movement that won parliamentary elections earlier this year and now forms the government immediately cast doubt on that agreement. Leaders of the movement in Damascus also said more talks were needed with Fatah.

Word of the deal came amid continuing tensions in Gaza over the kidnapping of the Israeli soldier. One of the other groups that took part said on Tuesday that it was also holding a young Israeli settler on the West Bank.

The 18-year-old soldier's family who lives in the settlement of Itamar near Nablus said he had been missing for two days, but the authorities did not confirm he had been abducted.

On Tuesday night Israel aircraft attacked bridges in central Gaza and a helicopter launched missiles at a power station. Israeli tanks were reported to be moving near the northern end of the Gaza Strip but the army said they had not crossed the border.

The month-long negotiations between the Palestinian factions were based on a document drafted by prisoners from Hamas and Fatah held in Israel. It includes acceptance of a Palestinian state in the Gaza Strip and West Bank, including east Jerusalem.

This was seen as being in accordance with the acceptance by Fatah and the Palestine Liberation Organisation of a two-state solution whereby Israel and a Palestinian state would exist side by side.

The precise details of the agreement had not been made public late Tuesday night. But the document was expected to be approved by the leaders of the two groups – Hamas prime minister Ismail Haniyeh and Mahmoud Abbas, the Fatah president of the Palestinian Authority.

The accord is partly intended to reduce tensions between the rival Palestinian factions that have erupted, frequently in violence, since January's elections. But it is mainly aimed at the international community, particularly the quartet consisting of the US, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations, that has demanded that Hamas recognise Israel, renounce violence and adhere to previously signed internationally binding agreements. Failing that, the quartet has acted to isolate the Hamas-ruled government, choking off financial aid.

Israel has said that it regards the agreement as "an internal Palestinian matter" and falling short of international demands.

Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, said in remarks to the Knesset that he still favoured peace negotiations with the Palestinians. The US was waiting to see if the agreement between the Palestinian factions amounted to a recognition of Israel, said White House spokesman Tony Snow. But he warned that the groups must still renounce violence.

Israeli Troops Move Into Gaza; Bridges Are Hit (NYT)

By Ian Fisher And Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037111

GAZA, Wednesday, June 28 — Israel sent troops into southern Gaza and its planes attacked three bridges and a power station early Wednesday, in an effort to prevent militants from moving a wounded Israeli soldier they abducted Sunday, Israeli Army officials said.

Israeli troops and tanks began to move in force in an effort to rescue the soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, 19, who is believed to be held there.

Witnesses said Israeli troops had taken the old Gaza airport and were heading toward Rafah on the road that marks the border between Gaza and Egypt, as Egyptian troops watched.

Electricity was knocked out through much of Gaza after a complex of electronic transformers, south of Gaza City, was struck by Israeli planes. Witnesses said that the station was hit by numerous missiles and that it was burning brightly against the night sky.

The Israeli Army said the operation was limited to an effort to rescue the corporal and was not an attempt to reoccupy Gaza.

"If we need to, we continue on," said Capt. Noa Meir, an army spokeswoman. "It's all about getting him home."

The airstrikes hit bridges on the coastal and interior roads near the old Israeli settlement of Netzarim, which divides Gaza between north and south, and near Deir al Balah. Israeli tanks and ground forces massed in staging areas along the border fence with Gaza, especially around Kerem Shalom and Nahal Oz.

On Tuesday, as Palestinians tried to block roads with dirt mounds and barbed wire against any Israeli armored assault, their political factions completed a draft agreement aimed at a national unity government that could include an implicit recognition of Israel by Hamas.

The prospect of an invasion, threatened by Israel if Corporal Shalit was not released, seemed to have pushed the Palestinians toward agreement after months of internal fighting.

The draft agreement between the Fatah faction of Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian leader, and the Hamas faction of Prime Minister Ismail Haniya is based on a document outlined by Palestinian prisoners. It is described as containing an implicit recognition of Israel's right to exist, because it calls for the creation of a Palestinian state within pre-1967 borders, presumably next to Israel.

Such an accord would move Hamas closer to recognition of Israel — a significant change — and would raise the possibility of renewed Western aid to the Palestinians, which was severely curtailed after the Hamas victory in January.

If the accord backing what would amount to a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is completed, it will represent a victory for Mr. Abbas, who had threatened to put the issue to a referendum next month. But Saeb Erekat, a senior Fatah official close to Mr. Abbas, said that the document was incomplete, and that Mr. Abbas wanted to review it and consult further.

Israeli officials dismissed the draft agreement as an internal Palestinian matter irrelevant to the current crisis over the fate and return of Corporal Shalit.

"We are at the edge of the cliff, and everyone is asking the Palestinian leadership to help avert this crisis and release our serviceman," said Mark Regev, the spokesman for the Foreign Ministry. "Yet energy and time is being put into this prisoners document, and it's in many ways tragic."

Mushir al-Masri, a Hamas legislator in Gaza, said the current crisis had united Fatah and Hamas to hammer out the accord. "It is natural that Israeli threats will unite Palestinians more and more," he said. "It will push us to put our differences aside and unite against a bigger threat."

Mr. Erekat said Mr. Abbas, known as Abu Mazen, and Mr. Haniya were working together to try to free the Israeli soldier. "Abu Mazen has ordered a house-to-house search for the Israeli soldier," Mr. Erekat said. "If we knew exactly where he was, we would go get him ourselves."

Fatah negotiators like Samir Masharawi were eager to describe the document as a big Hamas concession. "It has recognized a state in the '67 borders," Mr. Masharawi said. "It means indirectly recognizing another state."

DOJ_NMG_0037112

Mr. Masri said in an interview: "They do exist. It's tangible, they exist, we recognize the fact they exist. What we don't recognize is the legitimacy of the occupation."

By the last phrase, Hamas normally means the occupation of historic Palestine by an Israeli state of any kind; the Hamas charter explicitly says that Palestine is Islamic waqf — land given by God to Muslims, who cannot cede it or sell it.

The draft document also contains a clause that supports armed action against Israel, which it says should be "concentrated" in areas occupied by Israel in 1967 but not limited to them.

In Gaza on Tuesday, Palestinians worked to make any arrival of tanks and Israeli soldiers as treacherous as possible. In the town of Jabaliya, big berms of sand were piled up on a main road.

"I believe that against the Israelis, who have tanks and Apaches and all their technological machines, it's not that important," said Abu Raed, 30, a shopkeeper, sitting next to one of the berms. "But the fighters should have something to hide behind."

In anticipation of Israeli military action, the militant group Islamic Jihad called reporters in Gaza on Tuesday to film them, battle-ready, in two fields near the now-abandoned Israeli settlement of Netzarim. At one field, 11 fighters in black masks and camouflage held automatic rifles, rocket-propelled grenades and an antitank mine. Several also held up what they described as inserts for suicide-bombing belts: thin plastic bottles made to hold antiseptics that were filled with ball bearings.

Many in Gaza believed that the Israeli strike had begun shortly before 6 p.m., when a huge explosion tore apart a car in downtown Gaza, not far from the offices of both Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniya. But it turned out to be a car bomb, which heaved half the car, bits of shrapnel and body parts dozens of yards.

While several bystanders were injured, and nearby windows shattered and walls collapsed, the only death appeared to be that of the driver of the car, identified later as Hamza Abu Mukharreb, 21, a member of Hamas's military wing.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Tuesday called on Israel to give diplomacy more time. "There really needs to be an effort now to try and calm the situation, not to let the situation escalate, and to give diplomacy a chance to work to try to get this release," Ms. Rice told reporters during a refueling stop in Scotland en route to Pakistan.

Before the incursion began, Israeli officials on Tuesday had said time for diplomacy would also help their parallel efforts to plan a rescue mission. One intermediate step, an official said, might be to cut off electricity and water to Gaza, which Israel had already sealed from the movement of goods or people, as an effort to increase pressure on those groups holding the corporal.

Those groups are the military wing of Hamas, in particular the Khan Yunis group; the Popular Resistance Committees, made up of militants from various factions; and a new group called the Army of Islam, believed to be close to Hamas. They carried out the raid into Israel on Sunday, emerging from a long tunnel dug for many weeks beneath the border, 300 yards behind Israeli lines. The attack killed two Israeli soldiers and led to the seizure of the corporal, who was said to be slightly wounded.

The Hamas military wing is considered by Fatah and Israel to be under the control of the exiled Hamas political leader, Khaled Meshal, who is in Syria. Even a statement from Mr. Abbas's office on Tuesday, calling for Israeli patience, described "kidnapping the Israeli soldier by forces loyal to Khaled Meshal."

A spokesman for the Popular Resistance Committees, Muhammad Abdel Al, said the corporal was being held "in a secure place that the Zionists cannot reach." The groups have refused to release him, despite efforts by Egyptian, French and other diplomats, and Mr. Haniya, the Hamas prime minister, to end the crisis.

Mr. Al also said his group had kidnapped a Jewish civilian settler in the West Bank. The police said that Eliyahu Asheri, 18, who lives in the settlement of Itamar, near Nablus, had been reported missing since Sunday. They said they were trying to see if there was a connection.

Israeli Attack Could Spark An End To Palestinian Authority's Grip (WSJ)

By Karby Leggett

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Israeli forces crossed into the Gaza Strip early this morning, three days after Palestinian militants kidnapped an Israeli soldier, in a military offensive that could threaten a decade-long effort to build a viable and independent Palestinian government.

DOJ_NMG_0037113

When leaders of the militant Islamic group Hamas took control of the Palestinian government after winning an election this year, many Palestinians expressed new hope for the future. Instead, Hamas has struggled under a cloud of international isolation, failing to pay government wages, overhaul the security forces or restore law and order on Palestinian streets.

Now, the Palestinian Authority government is facing perhaps the biggest crisis in its existence. Despite continuing diplomatic efforts to secure the soldier's release, signs pointed toward a wide-ranging Israeli ground offensive.

Israel sent a force of tanks and armored personnel carriers to the edge of Gaza, and sealed off the territory. Israeli aircraft attacked bridges in central Gaza and hit a power station before tanks and troops were sent into southern Gaza. In Gaza, militants armed with machine guns and rocket-propelled grenades rigged explosive devices along roads. Meanwhile, Israeli politicians said an offensive wouldn't be limited to finding the soldier and his abductors.

A hint of optimism also emerged yesterday. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, of the Fatah party, and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, of Hamas, reached agreement on a document that, if the hostage is released and tensions reduced, could facilitate negotiations with Israel. The document calls for the creation of a Palestinian state alongside Israel. While the agreement appeared to demonstrate a willingness on the part of the two leaders to compromise with Israel, it is unclear if the document has the full support of Hamas, because of a growing split between the group's political leaders and its military wing -- which participated in the soldier's abduction.

For both Israel and the Palestinians, the military campaign in Gaza could create enormous long-term complications. Widespread chaos could result if Palestinian security forces are scattered and infrastructure such as roads and schools are further damaged. Hospitals, already short on many supplies, could be overwhelmed.

Israel has said it could begin targeting Hamas leaders for assassination, including those in the government, if the Israeli soldier isn't released. While Israel has assassinated Hamas figures in the past, it hasn't killed government officials. Should the soldier be killed, "no one is immune," Israeli cabinet minister and former general Benjamin Ben-Eliezer said in an interview on a local radio station.

Some Hamas officials already are in hiding, and others would likely follow in the event of a full-scale invasion. That could leave the Palestinian territories without a functioning government. Daily life in Gaza and the West Bank soon would grind to a halt, as schools, hospitals and other services shut down. Palestinian Authority employees, including tens of thousands of teachers, doctors and policemen who haven't received salaries in three months, would be unlikely to return to work without a functioning government in place.

In the end, Israel would be left with two choices: watching as a humanitarian and security crisis likely worsens, or assuming responsibility for providing basic services to roughly five million Palestinians, as Israel did before the 1990s Oslo peace process that led to the establishment of the Palestinian Authority quasigovernment.

"Israel is facing a very big problem now," says Shalom Harari, a former senior Israeli military official and expert on Hamas. "One year from now, we may have no choice but to conquer Gaza and set up a military government again."

Perhaps the greatest risk is that radical militants increase their ranks, further complicating Israel's security problems. Already, since the Israeli military withdrew from the territory last year, some Palestinian officials say al Qaeda has begun recruiting in Gaza. Hamas and Hezbollah -- the region's best-funded and equipped militia -- have been smuggling in more weapons than before.

Indeed, Mr. Harari says that even if the soldier is released, Israel may again enter Gaza in the months ahead. Pointing to the recent buildup in weapons in Gaza, including a new type of rocket than can hit some major Israeli population centers, he says, "Israel is going to have to hit Gaza and hit it hard."

Israeli Troops And Armor Surge Into Gaza (LAT)

By Laura King And Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

GAZA CITY — Israeli troops and tanks, backed by fierce aerial bombardment, punched their way into the southern Gaza Strip early today, hours after Israel declared that time was running out for Palestinian militants to free an Israeli soldier seized in a cross-border raid.

DOJ_NMG_0037114

The offensive was by far the largest since Israel unilaterally pulled its troops out of the seaside territory more than nine months ago. In the intervening months, Israel has responded to Palestinian militants' rocket attacks with airstrikes and artillery barrages.

But this is the first time since the withdrawal that large concentrations of Israeli forces have entered the restive, densely populated coastal territory.

The attack began late Tuesday when Israeli warplanes blew up a bridge in central Gaza, with loud booms reverberating across Gaza City — a move Israeli military officials said was meant to prevent the captors of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, 19, from moving him.

Later, two other bridges and a power plant were struck, sending billows of white smoke into a night sky lighted by flames and flares.

The air offensive in effect sliced Gaza into three sectors and knocked out power to large swaths, though electricity was restored at least temporarily in Gaza City and other northern areas. There was no immediate word on any Palestinian casualties or the number of Israeli troops that crossed into Gaza.

Military analysts said the incursion was the first phase of an operation that would intensify, possibly to include targeting Hamas leaders, unless Shalit is released.

"We are trying to make it clear to the Palestinian Authority and terrorist organizations that we're very serious about this and about Cpl. Shalit's safety and quick return home," said Capt. Noa Meir, an Israeli military spokeswoman.

Officials said Israel did not want to seize the Gaza Strip, which it occupied for 38 years.

"We have no interest in returning to a place we have left. We seek dialogue, not a bloodbath," Israel's infrastructure minister, Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, said early today. "If they return the soldier, sit down at the negotiating table — we're out. There's nothing for us there."

In the hours before the strike, Palestinians girded for attack, topping bulldozed mounds of sand along urban thoroughfares with barbed wire and laying what appeared to be homemade explosives in the expected path of Israeli tanks massed just across the border.

Against the backdrop of battle preparations by both sides, the Palestinians' ruling Hamas movement and the rival Fatah faction announced Tuesday that they had tentatively agreed on a political platform that could lead to negotiations with Israel.

However, the move appeared to be more of an effort to present a symbolic united front at a time of crisis than to genuinely alter the hard-line stance that has led to the Hamas-dominated government's diplomatic and economic isolation. The Islamist Hamas movement emphasized that it was still not willing to acknowledge Israel's right to exist.

The offensive was sparked by an audacious cross-border raid Sunday in which Palestinian militants captured Shalit and killed two other soldiers. Two of the Palestinian attackers were killed.

The consortium of Hamas-linked groups claiming to hold Shalit warned Tuesday against any attempt to rescue him, saying it would result in failure and bloodshed. That was a chilling and probably deliberate reminder to Israelis that the last time Palestinian militants managed to seize an Israeli soldier, in 1994, he was subsequently killed in an Israeli rescue raid.

"The soldier is in a secure location to which the Zionists' reach does not extend," Mohammed Abdelal, a spokesman for the Popular Resistance Committees, one of three groups thought to have taken part in the raid, told reporters in Gaza City.

The purported captors have demanded the release of Palestinian prisoners who are female or younger than 18 in exchange for information about Shalit, but have provided no proof he is alive.

Israel said no prisoner exchange was being contemplated.

Israeli military sources said they believed Shalit was being held in southern Gaza, a stronghold for militant Palestinian groups that have engaged in abductions of foreigners and Palestinian political rivals.

The Israeli troop incursion was concentrated east of the southern border town of Rafah. But the scale and intended duration of the military push were not clear.

In the initial offensive, Israeli soldiers did not enter Gaza City or its immediate environs, where in some neighborhoods masked militants flooded the streets and mosque loudspeakers called on people to resist.

"Take up your rifles and fight!" a senior leader of Hamas' military wing, Nizar Rayan, said in a broadcast exhortation.

DOJ_NMG_0037115

Complex mediation efforts led by Egypt continued Tuesday. Because Shalit holds dual French-Israeli citizenship, French diplomats were also involved, but they were close-mouthed about their role.

The United States also urged restraint on Israel's part.

"There really needs to be an effort now to try and calm the situation," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told reporters en route to Pakistan.

Seeking to step up the pressure on the Hamas government, Israel closed its border crossings with Gaza on Monday. Combined with a naval blockade, the closure has effectively barred the importation of food, fuel and other goods. Israeli media reported that government leaders also were considering cutting off electricity and water.

Vice Premier Shimon Peres said Israel was asking governments to withhold donations to the Palestinian Authority until the soldier is freed.

Peres also said it appeared that Hamas' political leader, Khaled Meshaal, a hard-liner who is based in Damascus, the Syrian capital, was responsible for Sunday's attack — the most explicit public accusation against Meshaal from a senior Israeli official.

"It's clear that Khaled Meshaal gave the order for this operation, and he wants to destroy prospects for peace," Peres told reporters after visiting Shalit's parents in the Galilee region.

In the streets of Gaza City on Tuesday, the mood was one of anger and defiance, with many saying that Palestinians should not free the Israeli soldier without getting something in return.

Atop makeshift barricades of sand, concrete blocks and debris, young Palestinian boys played with toy rifles. Aerial drones and other aircraft could be heard circling overhead, and Israeli gunships were visible through the heat haze offshore in the Mediterranean.

Adding to the jittery atmosphere, a car exploded Tuesday close to the Gaza City residence of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who was not in the building at the time.

One man, described as a Hamas militant, was killed and several others were wounded. Palestinians called it an assassination by Israel, but the Israeli military denied any involvement.

The announcement of a political agreement by Hamas and Fatah came after weeks of negotiations, and after Abbas said last month that he would put the question of whether to recognize Israel to Palestinian voters in a referendum.

Under the tentative agreement, Abbas would be empowered to hold negotiations with Israel but any agreements reached would require the approval of the Hamas-dominated parliament.

The document appeared to fall far short of international and Israeli demands on Hamas. Israel dismissed the accord as a "diplomatic non-starter."

The negotiations over a Hamas-Fatah political pact and the capture of Shalit have laid bare the divisions within Hamas.

The group's military wing, thought to report primarily to exiled leaders in Damascus, said it took part in the raid that brought about the soldier's capture. The Hamas-led government, meanwhile, urged that the soldier not be harmed.

"We … don't want to reach a situation of bloodshed," government spokesman Ghazi Hamad, who speaks fluent Hebrew, told Israel's Army Radio.

Defense Minister Amir Peretz said during a visit Tuesday to the agricultural community of Kerem Shalom, where the Palestinian attack took place, that Israel had no choice but to respond decisively to a raid on its soil.

Abbas, Hamas Strike A Deal (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

TEL AVIV -- Under mounting pressure to release a kidnapped Israeli soldier held in the Gaza Strip, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh put aside differences in a power-sharing agreement aimed at ending months of internecine fighting between Hamas and Fatah and implicitly recognizing Israel.

The agreement came as a surprise.

With Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert threatening a broad invasion of Gaza and more assassinations in retaliation for the abduction of Cpl. Gilad Shalit and the killings of two other soldiers during a cross-border raid, tensions have been on the rise between the rival Palestinian parties and within the Hamas party itself over how to respond.

Early today, Israeli planes attacked two bridges and a power station, knocking out electricity in most of the Gaza Strip and stepping up the pressure on Palestinian militants holding Cpl. Shalit, 19.

In central Gaza, a bridge was destroyed in a strike launched from an Israeli aircraft.

"People usually unify at times of crisis," said Ghassan Khatib, a former minister in Mr. Abbas' Cabinet. "I think the prime minister, particularly, is in need of the president nowadays, especially given that there seems to be difficulties inside of Hamas."

Mr. Haniyeh is thought to be at odds with Damascus, Syria-based Hamas hard-liner Khaled Meshal over the agreement and the attack. Mr. Abbas also is keen on gaining international legitimacy as Western countries boycott the Hamas-led government for its refusal to recognize Israel.

For Mr. Abbas, considered by some as a lame duck in the wake of Hamas' victory, cajoling Hamas into an agreement that calls for the Islamic militants to join the Fatah-dominated Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) can be a form of a victory.

"The president has always been interested in such an agreement, because this will make him stronger internally and externally," Mr. Khatib said.

The prisoners document calls for Hamas to join the ranks of the PLO, a signatory to peace agreements with Israel. It also calls for a moratorium on attacks within Israel while legitimizing violence in areas still under Israeli control. The document also calls on Hamas and Fatah to join in a national unity government.

It is described as implicitly recognizing Israel because it accepts a Palestinian state limited to Gaza and the West Bank, in effect restricting Israel to its pre-1967 war borders.

Palestinians from Fatah have complained of a "two-headed" government pulling in opposite directions. While Mr. Abbas has called on the newly elected Hamas politicians to join peace talks with Israel, the Islamic militants have remained steadfast in their opposition to recognize the Jewish state or foreswear military attacks on Israel.

After the kidnapping, Mr. Abbas immediately denounced the operation and promised to dispatch troops to find the soldier. But Mr. Haniyeh has remained silent as aides called on militants to treat the captive well.

Fatah politicians hailed the agreement as a Hamas concession on the peace process. But, they acknowledged that the agreement won't be a springboard to talks with Israel because it contains phrases that the Israelis can't accept.

"Our way has prevailed," said Jamal Nazzal, a spokesperson for the Fatah party. "We have called for the recognition of Israel, and now almost 18 years after it, Hamas comes to understand how the world is. Hamas wants to be recognized by the world, but they didn't read the structure of the world. So now, under pressure, they are maturing."

The agreement aims to end weeks of fighting among Palestinian factions that has claimed 20 lives and threatens to mushroom into a civil war. It remains to be seen whether militant field commanders on both sides will observe the accord.

Many have criticized the agreement language as being so vague as to allow radically divergent interpretations. Although saying he supported the agreement, Hamas legislator Wael Husseini insisted that the accord doesn't mark a departure from Hamas' traditional opposition to Israel's existence.

"We will never recognize the legitimacy of Israel inside the 1948 borders," he said, referring to the dimensions of the Jewish state accepted by most of the international community. "That doesn't mean we don't recognize the existence of the Israelis. We recognize the existence of Israel, but not on our land. We don't give Israel anything in return for withdrawal." However, Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniyeh seem to have reached a cohabitation arrangement that benefits both.

"The developments in the last three days weakens the political position and status of Haniyeh" among the Palestinian public, especially in Gaza, said Tel Aviv University professor Shaul Mishal, who authored a book on Hamas. "It's possible that the difficult situation that the government is in might have convinced them to show more willingness to go for this agreement."

Israel Launches Gaza Offensive Over Hostage (USAT)

By From Staff And Wire Reports

DOJ_NMG_0037117

GAZA CITY — Israeli troops entered southern Gaza and planes attacked three bridges and a power station, knocking out electricity in most of the coastal strip early today. The incursion stepped up pressure on Palestinian militants holding captive a 19-year-old Israeli soldier.

The Israeli military said in a statement that the attacks on the bridges late Tuesday and early today were intended "to impair the ability of the terrorists to transfer the kidnapped soldier."

Israeli troops began taking up positions in two locations east of the Gaza town of Rafah under the cover of tank shells, witnesses and Palestinian security officials told the Associated Press. Palestinians dug in behind mounds of dirt, bracing for a major Israeli offensive.

The strikes, the first major incursion since Israel pulled out of Gaza last summer, came amid intensive diplomatic efforts in the Arab world and by the United Nations. U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged Israel to "give diplomacy a chance."

Negotiators from the ruling Hamas movement said Tuesday that they had accepted a document implicitly recognizing Israel. Israel said only freedom for the captive soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, could defuse the crisis, not a political agreement.

Israeli planes fired at least nine missiles at Gaza's only power station, cutting electricity to much of Gaza, Palestinian security officials told AP. The station's three functioning turbines and a gasoline reservoir were engulfed in flames.

Israeli military officials told AP that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert approved a limited operation for southern Gaza, aimed at "terrorist infrastructure." The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to talk to reporters.

In the Shajaiyeh neighborhood of Gaza City, armed militants took up positions across from the headlights of Israeli vehicles, and Israeli attack helicopters hovered overhead.

The militants told residents to leave the area. They piled gasoline-soaked tires in the streets. Earlier, bulldozers blocked some of the main roads with piles of sand and dirt to try to slow down Israeli tanks.

There were no reports of casualties in the Israeli strikes.

The Hamas-linked Popular Resistance Committees, one of the three groups that carried out Sunday's abduction, reported that it also kidnapped a Jewish settler in the West Bank.

Israeli police spokesman Micky Rosenfeld said the report was being taken "very seriously." Shalit's abduction has threatened to turn already devastated relations between Israel and the Hamas-led government into an all-out war. Hamas took over the Palestinian Authority after winning parliamentary elections in January.

On Tuesday, the White House reacted coolly to the Palestinian political agreement that appeared to mark the first time Hamas has endorsed the concept of a Palestinian state existing next to Israel.

The document, as described by Palestinian presidential spokesman Walid Awad and others, stopped short of fully breaking with Hamas' long-held opposition to Israel's right to exist. Israel, the United States and the European Union have demanded that Hamas renounce terrorism and recognize Israel's right to exist if the Hamas government is to be recognized as legitimate.

Hamas spokesman Sami Abu Zuhri said it is sticking to its "agenda of resistance" against Israel.

The pact, which has not been released publicly, accepts a 2002 proposal, endorsed by the Arab League, which offered the possibility of full diplomatic relations with Israel. It also calls for a future Palestinian state in the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said U.S. officials found the pact vague.

TEL AVIV

Under mounting international pressure to free a kidnapped Israeli soldier, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh closed ranks Tuesday by concluding a power-sharing agreement aimed at ending months of violent Hamas-Fatah fighting and laying down principles for talks with Israel.

The pact between Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniyeh serves to prop up the political rivals at a time when a hostage standoff threatens an Israeli army retaliatory invasion of Gaza.

"Now it seems they're in the same boat because they have a serious threat to their political existence," says Shaul Mishal, a Tel Aviv University political science professor who has authored a book on Hamas. "They need badly to maintain their status within the Palestinian public. [Sunday's kidnapping of an Israeli soldier] shows their weakness, and they have no real control. People do what they want, or they listen to someone else - not the government."

Osama Hamdan, a Hamas official in Lebanon close to the organization's hard-line leadership in Damascus, criticized Abbas Tuesday for helping Israel search for the kidnapped Israeli soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, who is believed to be held in southern Gaza, the Associated Press reported. Instead, the official continued, Palestinians should kidnap more Israelis to use as bargaining chips.

Meanwhile, Israel's military is becoming increasingly convinced that an Israeli settler also missing since Sunday has been kidnapped, the Israeli newspaper Haaretz reported Tuesday.

In Gaza City, one Palestinian was killed Tuesday and several others were injured from a missile fired on a car traveling near Abbas's office, Israel Radio reported. Israel's military denied involvement in the attack.

The Abbas-Haniyeh agreement is based on a document drafted by a coalition of jailed Palestinian militant leaders that calls for Hamas's integration into the Fatah-dominated Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO). Because the PLO is the signatory to peace accords with Israel, the bargain is seen as a major departure for Hamas, which has opposed peace negotiations and the idea of Israeli and Palestinian states coexisting alongside one another.

The document also calls for a unity government with Fatah, another concession by the Islamic militants who would be admitting they are unable to govern without the help of their bitter adversaries.

A commitment limiting Palestinian attacks to territories conquered by the Jewish state in the 1967 Arab-Israeli war has been seen as yet another Hamas concession, but in tolerating attacks by Palestinian militia groups it marks a compromise on Abbas's vocal criticism of the militarized uprising.

Haniyeh and Abbas were reported to have been on the verge of concluding the agreement Saturday night just hours before a detachment of Palestinian militants raided Israeli military positions near Gaza by tunneling under the border. Two Israeli soldiers and two Palestinian militants were killed in an attack seen by many as an attempt by Hamas's hard-line leadership to undermine the accord.

Fatah leaders have said that this accord with Hamas isn't far reaching enough to form the foundation for peace talks with Israel, but that it is instead aimed to end weeks of infighting that have claimed the lives of 20 Palestinians and spurred new anarchy in the West Bank and Gaza.

"It is a national program. Palestinians will not negotiate with Israel on this basis," says Jamal Nazzal, a Fatah spokesman. "The advantage of it is that Palestinians will not block the way of each other anymore."

But it remains to be seen whether Hamas and Fatah field commanders will honor the commitment. One commander from the Fatah-affiliated Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade described the agreement as more of a temporary cease-fire postponing an inevitable civil war.

Palestinians from Fatah have complained of a "two-headed" government pulling in opposite directions. While President Abbas has called on the newly elected Hamas politicians to join peace talks with Israel, the Islamic militants have remained steadfast in their opposition to recognize the Jewish state or forswear military attacks on Israel.

The US and the European Union both consider Hamas a terrorist group for its endorsement of suicide bombings against Israel, and have led an international aid boycott of the Palestinian Authority (PA). That has emptied government coffers and compounded economic hardship.

For Hamas's Haniyeh, the agreement with Abbas could potentially bolster his credentials abroad after most governments shunned Hamas. It also props him up amid tension with Hamas hard-liner Khaled Meshal in Damascus.

"People usually unify at the times of crisis," says Ghassan Khatib, a former Labor Minister under Abbas. "I think the prime minister particularly is in need of the president nowadays, especially given that there seems to be difficulties inside of Hamas."

The concessions won by Abbas, on the other hand, gives him ammunition to counter critics who have described him as a lame duck after Hamas's electoral victory, analysts say.

Mr. Khatib continues, "The president has always been interested in such an agreement, because this will make him stronger internally and externally."

Many have criticized the agreement for language so vague as to allow radically divergent interpretations. While saying he supported the agreement, Hamas legislator Wael Husseini insisted that the accord doesn't mark a departure from Hamas's traditional opposition to Israel's existence.

"We will never recognize the legitimacy of Israel inside the 1948 borders," he says, referring to the dimensions of the Jewish state accepted by most of the international community. "That doesn't mean we don't recognize the existence of the Israelis. We recognize the existence of Israel but not on our land. We don't give Israel anything in return for withdrawal."

Meanwhile, the militants holding Corporal Shalit issued their first demands Monday. The groups, which included Hamas's military wing and two offshoots of the Popular Resistance Committees (PRC), said Israel should release all jailed Palestinian women and children under 18 in return for information about Shalit. Officials estimate there are 500 such prisoners.

"The soldier is in a secure place that the Zionists cannot reach," PRC spokesman Mohammed Abdel Al said. It was the first acknowledgment by militants that Shalit was still alive.

About 3,000 Israeli troops, along with tanks and armored vehicles, have massed along Israel's border with Gaza. Commanders said they were awaiting orders.

Stop Terror At Its Source (WSJ)

By Michael Oren

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Dawn broke yesterday over the Israel-Gaza border on a surreal but not unfamiliar scene: Rows of Merkava tanks, armored personnel carriers and Humvees were assembled in preparation for an incursion into the strip. These forces -- when given the green light -- would punch through booby-trapped refugee camps in search of Hamas and Islamic Jihad gunmen, while Israeli jets and helicopters hunt the terrorists from above.

By invading Gaza, Israel hopes to counter increasingly bold Palestinian attacks -- such as the firing of some 1,000 Qassam rockets at Israeli border towns and the kidnapping of an Israeli soldier by Hamas earlier this week. The troops will probably net a large number of terrorists and may rescue the captured soldier. But while the operation may flex its military muscle, it cannot restore Israel's deterrence power or prevent future rocket attacks and kidnappings. Indeed, the attack may well prove Pyrrhic -- inflicting greater injury on Israel than on the Palestinians.

The quandary Israel confronts today originated in the unilateral withdrawal of all Israeli settlers and soldiers from Gaza last August. A sizable majority of Israelis supported disengagement, excruciating as it was, as a means of achieving a national consensus on the country's borders and of preserving its vital Jewish majority.

Yet even those Israelis most in favor of the Gaza pullout understood that many Palestinians would interpret the move as a strategic retreat and a victory for Hamas and al-Aqsa terror. "We shot at the Jews and they fled Gaza," they would say, "so let's keep shooting and they'll abandon Tel Aviv, Haifa and Jerusalem." Israel could have refuted that claim by responding immediately and massively to every infiltration and to every rocket fired, irrespective of whether the attacks caused Israeli casualties. Gaza is now a de facto independent state, Israel should have declared, and like any other state it must bear the consequences of its aggression. * * *

But Israel did none of this. On the contrary, infiltrations and rocket strikes began almost the day after the Gaza disengagement. The primary target was Sderot, a working-class town in the western Negev populated mostly by long-settled immigrants from North Africa and more recent arrivals from Russia. Israel responded with missile attacks aimed at eliminating the Palestinian rocket crews and destroying the Qassam factories. But the crews were too elusive and the factories too readily rebuilt.

The attacks against Sderot and other border towns intensified -- several Qassams struck Askhelon, Israel's major industrial city in the south -- and the Palestinians elected a Hamas government sworn to escalate the violence. Israel retaliated by blasting the Qassam launching areas with artillery fire, but the barrages did little but churn up dirt and accidentally hit civilians. The Jewish state, from a Palestinian perspective, seemed helpless.

Israel's impotence was the product of several factors, firstly Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's reluctance to reoccupy Gaza so soon after evacuating it. Then came Mr. Sharon's stroke and the Israeli elections, during which, traditionally, Israel refrains from staging large-scale operations. Finally, Ehud Olmert succeeded in cobbling together a left-of-center coalition that pledged to proceed with the unilateral disengagement from the territories (or, as it is now called, convergence), but largely abandoned Mr. Sharon's hard-hitting antiterror tactics.

Though himself a resident of Sderot, Minister of Defense Amir Peretz, a Laborite and advocate of renewed talks with the Palestinians, vowed to exercise maximum restraint and to "count the shells" that the Israel Defense Forces fired into Gaza. Indeed, when Qassams were smashing into Sderot last week and Mr. Peretz's neighbors were on a hunger strike in front of his house, the defense minister was in Jerusalem stumping for his candidates in the Jewish Agency elections.

Israel's inaction has provided a bonanza to Hamas. By demonstrating that disengagement impaired rather than enhanced Israeli security, Hamas has dissuaded many Israelis from supporting a similar withdrawal from the West Bank, from where Qassams could be launched at Tel Aviv and the Ben-Gurion airport. By firing the rockets from densely populated neighborhoods, the Palestinians have forced Israel to kill and wound civilian bystanders, sullying its reputation abroad. Indeed, many world leaders and virtually all of the press hastened to condemn Israel for allegedly firing a shell onto a Gaza beach that killed eight Palestinians. That the IDF denied firing the shell and that the Palestinians destroyed exculpatory evidence by gouging shrapnel from the victims' limbs could not repair the damage to Israel's image.

Collateral damage not only hurts Israel's international standing, it also divides the country internally. Many Israelis grieve over the deaths of innocent Palestinians, even those incurred in successful strikes against terrorists. Israel's Supreme Court is now considering two lawsuits against the IDF, both filed by Israelis, for the unintentional deaths of 15 civilians while killing Hamas commander Selah Shahada in 2002.

The deaths of more than a dozen Palestinian civilians by Israeli fire in the last few weeks has further widened these schisms, pinning the government between the leftists who denounce its callousness and the generals who disdain its sheepishness. An Israeli raid into Gaza will almost certainly result in a frightful number of civilian deaths. The press will once again focus on funerals and mourning families and forget the reason for Israel's action. Israelis will once again agonize over whether these casualties were justified or avoidable.

Palestinians will not be the only ones killed. Hundreds of Qassams fell on Sderot but it took the deaths of two soldiers and the kidnapping of a third to move the government to consider major military action. Soldiers are Israel's Everyman -- or rather Everychild -- and Israelis are acutely sensitive to their safety. Yet in retaliating for the rocket attacks and trying to free the hostage, the IDF will almost certainly suffer casualties.

After a few days of heated battles and accusations of Israeli atrocities, the government will be compelled to extract its forces from Gaza, but not all the soldiers will be going home. And the rockets will keep raining on Sderot. Posing as defenders of the land, Hamas will be made more, not less, popular by the Israeli attack, and Abu Mazen will be commensurately weakened. Mr. Olmert will be unable to proceed on convergence and the Israeli right will begin its inexorable return to office.

There is, however, one way to avert a public relations disaster for Israel, to limit casualties, and to restore Israel's deterrence power: Israel must return to the targeted-killing policy that enabled Mr. Sharon to triumph over terrorist organizations. Israel must target those Palestinians who order others to fire rockets from within civilian areas but whose families are located safely away from the firing zones. No Hamas or Islamic Jihad leader should be immune from such reprisals -- neither Prime Minister Ismail Haniya nor Khaled Meshal, who masterminds Hamas from Damascus. Though there is certain to be some international backlash, the damage to Israel's image will likely be temporary. Who today remembers Abdel Aziz Ranitisi and Sheikh Yassin? Those responsible for causing injury and death to both Israelis and Palestinians must pay the ultimate price. Only then can quiet be restored to Israel's borders and progress toward either unilateral or negotiated solutions resumed.

Iran's Leader Sends Mixed Signals On Nuclear Talks (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

DOJ_NMG_0037121

TEHRAN, June 27 — Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei said today that Iran had "no use" to negotiate with the United States. But in a more positive gesture he said that the "the ground was prepared" for talks over Iran's nuclear program.

"Negotiation with the United States has no benefits for us," he said in a meeting with Senegal's President Abdoulaye Wade, the ISNA student news agency reported.

The United States had offered to enter talks with Iran if its leaders agreed to halt the country's nuclear enrichment program. Iran had agreed to negotiate with the Untied States in Iraq to help bring security and Mr. Khamenei had backed those talks publicly. However, those talks never took place.

The United States severed diplomatic ties with Iran in November 1979 when hard-line students attacked the United States embassy in Tehran and took 54 of its diplomats hostage for 444 days.

This is the first that Mr. Khamenei has reacted to the idea of direct talks with the United States since a package of incentives was submitted to Iran on June 6. The package was drafted by Germany and the five permanent members of United Nations Security Council, the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China to convince Iran to end the stand-off over its nuclear program.

Mr. Khamenei also said, "We will not negotiate over our undeniable right of using nuclear technology with anyone. But if they recognize our right, we are willing to negotiate over controls, inspections and international guarantees. The ground for such negotiations has been prepared."

Mr. Khamenei said that Iran's resistance has led to scientific development in the country and Iran's access to nuclear technology is an example of this progress.

In Washington, the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, said he did not consider Mr. Khamenei's comments to be a snub and pointed that various leaders in Iran had offered different reactions to the incentive plan. "At this point, we've heard varying responses from different quarters," he said. "And as a matter of fact, if you take a look at the Ayatollah's remarks today, they are ambiguous."

In a major shift of policy, Mr. Khamenei created a new foreign policy committee on Sunday and appointed former Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi, a moderate politician, to head the committee for five years. The committee has four other members, who are all moderate former ministers.

Mr. Khamenei said in his decree that the committee's mission was to "help major decision-making and search for horizons in Iran's foreign policy," the daily Shargh reported.

Rashid Jalali, a member of Parliament said that one of the major responsibilities of the committee is to give its analysis to the leader about Iran's nuclear policy, the daily Etemad Melli quoted him as saying.

The semi-official Fars News Agency reported that President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is scheduled to visit Iraq in near future and hold talks with Iraqi President Jalal Talibani. This would be the first visit by an Iranian president to Iraq.

Ibrahim Jaffari, Iraq's former prime minister, arrived in Tehran on Sunday, Jomhouri Eslami daily reported on Tuesday. He is expected to meet with senior officials.

Abdul Aziz Hakim, the leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, who had urged Iran and the United States to hold talks over Iraq, also visited Tehran last week.

Iranian Leader: U.S. Nuke Talks Not Needed (AP)

By Nasser Karimi, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 28, 2006

Supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei said Tuesday that Iran does not need negotiations with the United States over its nuclear program, apparently seeking to reassure hard-liners the country will not cave in as it considers a key Western incentives package.

Khamenei, who has the final word on all state matters, did not give his position on the proposals aimed at persuading Iran to impose a long-term moratorium on enriching uranium.

DOJ_NMG_0037122

In Washington, White House press secretary Tony Snow said Khamenei's remarks were "ambiguous" and that the Bush administration has heard varying responses from different quarters in Iran. He said Washington expects a formal response from Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, to European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana.

"We're waiting for a consistent, official response," Snow said.

Iran received the proposals June 6, and President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has said the government will not respond officially until at least mid-August. The United States and Europe are pressing for a quicker reply.

The long period of deliberations suggests internal divisions within Iran's leadership over the proposals, which entail major concessions from Washington and a difficult compromise by Tehran.

At United Nations headquarters in New York, Secretary-General Kofi Annan urged Iran's foreign minister to speed up Tehran's response. Annan met Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki for the second time in less than a week to discuss the nuclear negotiations.

The United States has said it would join direct talks with Iran, which is being asked to suspend uranium enrichment — a program it has vowed to pursue and never give up completely. Enrichment is a process that can produce fuel for nuclear generators or the material for nuclear warheads.

The United States and its allies suspect that Iran's nuclear enrichment activities are a cover for a weapons program. Iran insists its nuclear program is limited to peaceful energy uses.

Hard-liners in Iran's clerical-run leadership have called on the government to reject the proposals and have painted any agreement to talks with Washington as a surrender.

Khamenei's remarks could be aimed at assuaging their fears by showing that talks with the United States are not a major lure for the government and that negotiations with the West will not mean giving up enrichment.

"Negotiations with the United States would have no benefit for us, and we do not need them," state television quoted Khamenei as telling visiting Senegalese President Abdoulaye Wade.

He said Iran was willing to hold talks on its own terms, warning that the West can misuse the negotiating process to bar Tehran from what it considers its right to pursue enrichment.

"We do not negotiate with anybody on achieving and exploiting nuclear technology," Khamenei said. "But if they recognize our nuclear rights, we are ready to negotiate about controls, supervisions and international guarantees."

Earlier this year, Khamenei supported negotiations with Washington over stabilizing neighboring Iraq. In doing so, he overruled hard-liner opposition, though the prospects of U.S.-Iranian talks on Iraq have fallen apart since then.

If Iran accepts the incentives package, the United States has offered to join European nations in multilateral talks with Tehran over a framework that will guarantee its nuclear program cannot produce weapons.

The package also offers the lifting of some U.S. sanctions and other economic incentives, as well as a promise of American and European nuclear technology for Iran.

Washington's offer to join talks was seen as a major concession since the United States lists Iran as a sponsor of international terrorism and there have been no diplomatic relations between the two countries since 1979, when militants stormed the U.S. Embassy in Tehran and took Americans hostage for 444 days.

President Bush has warned Iran that it faces U.N. Security Council action unless it accepts the incentives. German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier warned Iran on Saturday that it faces isolation if it rejects the package.

Iran Builds Support For Right To Nuclear Power (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

VIENNA — The elaborately stuccoed grand hall of the Palais Eschenbach often plays host to nobility and businessmen, concerts and Christmas parties, but last week it was the unlikely forum for a key Iranian official, who came to make the case for Tehran's right to nuclear technology.

At the evening talk, frequently interrupted by applause, Iran's deputy nuclear negotiator asserted that his country's intentions were purely peaceful.

"Today, the power of Iran in the region has put us in the position to help with the security and the stability of the region. If we go after nuclear weapons, this would lead other countries in the region also to go after nuclear weapons," said Javad Vaeidi, who also is a member of Iran's Supreme National Security Council.

"That would be neither in the interest of Iran, nor in the interest of the countries of the region."

Vaeidi's visit was one of dozens around the globe in recent weeks by Iranian officials. High-ranking officials have touched down in Algeria, Tunisia, Yemen, China, Spain and Italy.

In Cairo, one such visit was the highest-level official contact between Egypt and Iran in more than two decades, Middle Eastern diplomats said. There were quiet discussions with Turkey and Saudi Arabia and highly visible ones in Malaysia, which played host to a meeting of the 116 member governments that make up the nonaligned movement.

The travels are part of an extensive international lobbying campaign to build support for Iran's position in talks over the future of its nuclear program. Western countries believe Iran seeks the capability to make a nuclear bomb, whereas Tehran says it wants nuclear technology for peaceful purposes only.

The United States and the other four permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, joined by Germany, have made Iran an offer under which it would receive economic and technological benefits in return for halting sensitive nuclear work. A key aspect of the offer is that the United States would join in face-to-face negotiations — the first in 27 years with Iran.

Iranian leaders have given themselves until the end of August to formally respond to the offer. It is already clear, however, that Iran will fight hard to retain the right to at least some nuclear-related activities rather than agree to completely end its research and development of nuclear technology.

Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, signaled Tuesday that Tehran was cool to the deal in its current form.

"Negotiations with the United States are of no use to us…. We will not negotiate with anyone over the undeniable right of nuclear technology and using it," he said.

Khamenei, however, did not close the door to a deal, adding, "If they recognize this right, we are ready to negotiate over supervision controls."

The Iranian diplomacy has had some successes. In Malaysia, Iran persuaded the conference of nonaligned nations to make a strong statement in support of Tehran's right to pursue the nuclear fuel cycle.

Since then, Iranian diplomats "have been making the rounds," said a U.S. diplomat who has closely followed the negotiations with Iran. "It appears to be a very labor intensive, diplomatic offensive." The diplomat, like others interviewed for this report, spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the talks.

A European diplomat who works on the Iran issue agreed that the statement from the nonaligned nations was "very bad" for the position held by the U.S. and the European Union.

In order to make Tehran's case as strong as possible, Iranian officials are seeking broad international support, especially from outside the West, said diplomats and experts.

Ali Ansari, an Iranian who teaches at the University of St. Andrews in Scotland, described the case Iran was making as stronger than the one being made by the Americans and the European Union.

"The way the West has framed the nuclear debate is pretty unjust.

"From the Third World perspective, it looks like the big powers being unjust to the little powers, saying, 'We can have it, but you can't,' " he said.

The diplomacy is also an attempt to show that Iran has many friends despite Western powers' efforts to rally international support against Tehran.

"The Iranians are anxious to show they are not isolated," Ansari said.

Vaeidi's visit to Austria underscored that. Although they are often believed to share the U.S. wariness of Iran's intentions, European countries diverge considerably in their views of Iran.

Austria, for instance, identifies itself as a neutral country and has long reached out to the Middle East; OPEC has its headquarters in Vienna, and the conservative Freedom Party, which played host to Vaeidi, has had a warm relationship with Middle East powers. And Austrian support for American policy is among the lowest in the European Union.

For different reasons, Italy and Spain are open to listening to Iran. Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki visited Italy this month and traveled to Spain a few days later.

Italian officials have made no secret they are irritated about being left out of negotiations involving the United States, the European Union and Russia regarding Iran. Britain, France and Germany have been the three European Union countries at the table.

Italy wants to either be part of the negotiations or have the talks take place in a forum to which it has access.

"The Iranians go there and say the EU is not the right forum to discuss this," said a European diplomat from one of the countries involved in the negotiations. "And the Italians agree with them."

In the Middle East, Iranian officials are trying to use the nuclear talks as a vehicle for asserting themselves as the preeminent regional power.

"Iran realizes that a threshold has been crossed — the U.S. is willing to come to the table, so it is going around to countries like Egypt and saying, 'Look we brought the U.S. to the table,' " said a senior Middle Eastern diplomat. "Now, of course, other countries in the region have relations with the U.S. too, but Iran is trying to assert itself in a special way."

Most other countries in the region are largely Sunni Muslim, and their leaders are uncomfortable with the untrammeled growth of Iran, whose population is heavily Shiite Muslim. But they also like the idea of Iran standing up to the United States.

After recent discussions in Egypt with the Arab League and the Egyptian foreign minister, Iran's top national security official, Ali Larijani, urged all Muslim countries to pursue nuclear technology, but his message was primarily directed to Egypt and Saudi Arabia, the other two Arab regional powerhouses.

"The nuclear issue affects the future of all Muslim countries," Larijani said. Speaking to reporters, he called on Muslim countries to "choose the path" of nuclear development.

Iranian Minister: WMD Outlawed In Islam (AP)

AP, June 28, 2006

An Iranian minister told Indonesia's vice president Tuesday that his country has no plans to develop nuclear weapons because Islamic law outlaws the development of weapons of mass destruction.

Mohammad Mehdi Zahedi, Iran's minister of science, research and technology said that based on the Islamic principle, Iran must take advantage of all its potential resources including nuclear technology for the prosperity of its people.

Zahedi called on Western countries not to try and prevent developing nations from producing their own nuclear power when it is designed for peaceful purposes.

"Islamic doctrine does not allow us to produce mass destruction weapons or nuclear ones and the Iranian state is based on that principle," Zahedi told a news conference after meeting with Indonesian Vice President Jusuf Kalla.

He questioned why countries that have developed or used nuclear weapons continue to oppose Iran's nuclear research and development.

He called on developing countries to fight hand in hand against what he called "scientific apartheid."

"I would like to say that the usage of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes is the right of every nation. And we, as a sovereign nation, do not allow other nations to interfere our domestic affairs," he said.

The United States and some European countries have accused Iran of seeking to develop nuclear weapons, and have offered a package of incentives for Iran to give up uranium enrichment and resume negotiations over its nuclear ambitions.

Senator Says North Korean Missile Firing May Not Be Imminent (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 27 — The chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee said Tuesday that while North Korea showed clear signs of preparing a missile for a test launching, it remained uncertain whether it was fully fueled for an imminent firing.

DOJ_NMG_0037125

The chairman, Senator John W. Warner, a Virginia Republican, spoke on Capitol Hill after committee members received a closed-door briefing from officials of the Missile Defense Agency, the Defense Intelligence Agency and the defense secretary's office.

The briefing came as American officials said Chinese and South Korean diplomats were putting pressure on North Korea not to launch the missile. But the Americans said they had gotten little indication about what the North Koreans may have said in response.

At the White House on Tuesday, Tony Snow, the president's spokesman, said the Chinese and South Koreans "can assert considerable influence."

"What we are hoping," Mr. Snow said, "is real simple — that they will use it constructively to say to the North Koreans: 'Come on, you don't want to do this. Let's abide by your moratorium. Come back to the six-party talks.' " He added that North Korea had "a lot to gain by coming back to the table."

American intelligence officials say they believe that the missile is a Taepodong 2 and that a three-stage version could strike the United States. One administration official said the missile at the launching pad was a two-stage version.

Details like that have not been clearly spelled out, either because administration officials are uncertain of the facts or because the details are classified. Several officials would discuss recent intelligence reports on the situation only on condition of anonymity, because the situation is diplomatically delicate and the intelligence is secret.

The New York Times reported Monday that North Korea appeared to some officials to have completed fueling the missile, citing American officials who warned that the move greatly increased the probability that the North would go ahead with its first important test launching in eight years.

A senior American official said Sunday that data from satellite photographs suggested that booster rockets had been loaded onto a launching pad, and liquid-fuel tanks fitted to the missile at a site on North Korea's remote east coast.

Roughly 10 days ago, American intelligence agencies reported to the administration that fueling trucks had been spotted around the missile.

On Monday and Tuesday, two officials said the intelligence could, at best, be interpreted as offering only a prudent assumption that the missile was fueled, and that intelligence analysts had described an already fueled missile as a worst-case scenario.

"It is impossible to know for certain whether or how much fuel is moving between a closed container through a closed line to another closed container," one official said.

Citing intelligence gathered by "overhead systems" photographing the missile, Senator Warner said, "We are not certain if it's fueled."

He also said the surveillance images indicated that "certain infrastructure" remained around the missile and would have to be removed in advance of a launching.

"They could be launching a satellite, a weather satellite or any type of satellite that might be launched by this system," Mr. Warner said. But he said the United States must "prepare for the possibility of a hostile strike," though he termed it a "probably remote possibility."

China Urged To Dissuade N. Korea From Test (AP)

By Gillian Wong

AP, June 28, 2006

South Korea's foreign minister urged China to use its influence to dissuade North Korea from testing a long-range missile, but Western diplomats on Tuesday questioned Beijing's influence over the reclusive communist state.

South Korea's Ban Ki-moon and Chinese counterpart Li Zhaoxing met for about an hour, discussing strategies to sway Pyongyang not to test-launch a missile and to resume six-nation talks on its nuclear weapons program.

"We should focus efforts on dissuading North Korea from test-firing a missile," Li said.

Ban urged China to persuade North Korea not to test the missile, the South's Yonhap news agency reported, citing South Korea Foreign Ministry official Lee Hyuck, who attended Tuesday's talks.

DOJ_NMG_0037126

Recent intelligence reports have said North Korea may be fueling a Taepodong-2, one of its most advanced missiles, at a launch site on the country's northeastern coast. A U.S. government estimate puts the range of the Taepodong-2 missile at between 5,000 and 7,500 miles, making it capable of reaching the United States.

President Bush has said a test launch by North Korea would be considered "provocative," and he urged the nation to heed warnings by China and others not to conduct the test.

The flagship of the U.S. Navy's Pacific fleet arrived in Shanghai on Tuesday for a visit that reflects warming ties between the American and Chinese militaries. Although the visit of the USS Blue Ridge was planned long before reports about North Korea's apparent missile test, Capt. Jeffrey S. Bartkoski said it showed the "importance of regional cooperation" to promote "peace and security."

China, a key provider of aid to impoverished North Korea, is believed to be the only country that has considerable leverage with the hard-line regime of Kim Jong Il. But since the crisis over North Korea's nuclear programs emerged in late 2002, China has largely refrained from threats to halt the fuel and food deliveries and bank credits that sustain its neighbor.

Six-nation talks aimed at ridding the North of its nuclear weapons program stalled in November over a dispute surrounding U.S. financial restrictions on the North.

In Beijing, Western diplomats said China had not sent a special envoy to Pyongyang or otherwise intensified its diplomacy over the missile threat. The diplomats spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

China's Li told Ban that getting North Korea back to talks on its nuclear weapons ambitions was a top priority and that efforts should be focused on ensuring Pyongyang avoids firing a missile. Li said Beijing had discussed the reported missile test plans with Pyongyang, Yonhap said without elaborating.

Ban left Beijing Tuesday evening.

North Korea has not completed the steps needed for testing a long-range missile, a leading senator said Tuesday after a private briefing from Defense Department officials.

"There are certain steps that would have to be taken if it were imminently to be launched. And those steps, as yet, have not taken place," said Sen. John Warner (news, bio, voting record), chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

Warner said North Korea would have to "remove certain infrastructure" before a missile could be launched, though he did not specify what he meant. Satellites would detect those steps, he said.

The remarks by Warner seemed to raise more doubts than other U.S. officials have so far expressed. Last week U.S. officials said the missile was apparently fully assembled and fueled, though they later said it was unclear how ready the North Koreans actually were.

Meanwhile, North Korea said Tuesday the United States was to blame for a "new nuclear arms race."

"The U.S. is the principal criminal of the present nuclear arms race, the very one who harasses world peace and security," the North's main newspaper Rodong Sinmun said in a commentary, according to the official Korea Central News Agency.

"The U.S. should give up its wild ambition for nukes, mindful that its nuke modernization and space militarization will be a grave crime of disturbing world peace and security."

Japan's Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi headed Tuesday to the United States for talks with Bush that will include the North Korean missile issue.

The North shocked the world in 1998 by firing a missile that flew over northern Japan and into the Pacific Ocean. It has been under a self-imposed moratorium on long-range missile tests since 1999 but since has test-fired many short-range missiles.

The Washington-based Institute for Science and International Security estimated in a report Monday that North Korea has enough separated plutonium to develop an arsenal of up to 13 nuclear weapons, compared with estimates of one or two nuclear weapons in 2000.

The group says that by 2008, North Korea could have enough plutonium for 17 atomic bombs. It also said North Korea was currently unlikely to be capable of making a nuclear warhead light enough for the Taepodong-2 missile.

The group's assessment was based on an analysis of satellite imagery, media reports and statements by North Korean officials.

US Warns North Korea Against Talks 'Bluff' (AFP-Y2)

AFP, June 27, 2006

The United States warned North Korea against thinking it could use worries over a possible long-range missile to force the United States into direct talks.

"If it's a bluff for direct negotiations, it's not an advisable way to do it," White House spokesman Tony Snow told a press briefing.

Reports that North Korea is about to fire a missile from a sight on the remote northeast coast of the reclusive Stalinist state have caused international concern.

President George W. Bush on Monday urged the North Korean government to disclose its plans.

"The North Koreans should notify the world of their intentions, what they have on top of that vehicle and, you know, what are their intentions," said Bush.

"We have not heard from the North Koreans, so I can't tell you what their intentions are," he told reporters. "That's part of the problem."

US and Asian officials have said North Korea has prepared a Taepodong-2 missile for launch, amid a parallel standoff over the communist state's nuclear program.

North Korea has boycotted talks since November with five other nations, including the United States, over its nuclear weapons programme.

It has regularly demanded direct talks with the United States. The two sides have never formally ended hostilities since the 1950-53 Korean War, which has bedevilled relations ever since.

A prominent lawmaker in Bush's Republican party meanwhile said the White House had ruled out a preemptive strike to knock out North Korea's Taepodong missiles.

"I think that the administration has pretty well put (that) to rest, and I concur with the administration," Senator John Warner said after a closed-door briefing with top Pentagon officials.

"A preemptive strike at this point in time would not be a wise course of action," he said.

Warner, the Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, nevertheless said "prudent steps are being taken by our government to protect us in the ... probably remote possibility that this is a hostile launch."

House Vote Lifts India Nuclear Deal Hopes (FT)

By Caroline Daniel And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, June 28, 2006

The Bush administration scored a key victory in securing congressional support for its historic agreement to allow civil nuclear co-operation with India when the House foreign relations committee voted 37 to five on Tuesday to allow it to proceed with legislation.

The vote came after months of negotiations between administration officials and legislators. The agreement had triggered fears that it could undermine the nuclear non-proliferation pact and had caused discontent that Congress had been side-stepped in the way that Bush officials chose to negotiate the deal with India.

Supporters of the civil nuclear agreement, which has become the symbol of closer strategic ties with India, quickly hailed the strong bipartisan vote during the mark-up hearings in the House and sought to build momentum to put pressure on the Senate, where the bill is expected to face more obstacles during a similar hearing on Wednesday in the Senate foreign relations committee.

Ron Somers, president of the US-India Business Council, said: "This was a tremendous, bipartisan step forward. The vote is a positive step towards a deepening partnership with India . . . US industry is delighted at the outcome."

The agreement would allow US nuclear exports to India for the first time in 30 years in return for India separating its military and civilian nuclear facilities. Congress must pass legislation to change the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 to exempt India from US laws that prohibit providing nuclear technology to countries that have not signed the nuclear nonproliferation treaty.

Administration officials had been concerned that Congress would impose new amendments, such as forcing New Delhi to impose a moratorium on fissile material production, that had threatened to derail the whole deal.

However, that amendment was overwhelmingly defeated.

Although the initial bill expanded from the two-page version submitted by the Bush administration to 30 pages, one aide closely involved in talks, said: "In the operative language of the legislation there were no new conditions added. That's the big story.

"The vote exceeded my expectations."

Some of the language in the bill was, however, rewritten to become more specific, addressing in particular concerns about Congress's role in overseeing the final terms of the agreement with India and the agreement that India strikes with the International Atomic Energy Agency on safeguards on its civilian facilities. "What was added was more reporting requirements [to Congress], such as agreeing to an affirmative vote on the bilateral agreement, the so-called Lantos compromise [a reference to congressman Tom Lantos]," said the aide.

Nevertheless, another congressional aide said lawmakers added some non-legally binding language calling on India to work with the US to deter Iran from pursuing nuclear weapons, which could by exploited the opposition parties in India concerned that India is aligning itself too closely with the US.

Mr Somers predicted that the bill would go to the House for a formal vote in July.

"We hope for the same speedy mark-up in the Senate, without any complications. There are challenges ahead, but this is one step in the ladder, and a very important one."

While the Senate may approve the deal, many observers believe the final stamp of approval will not come before November's elections.

It also still requires approval from the 45-member Nuclear Suppliers Group.

India Nuclear Bill Receives Support (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In a foreign-policy victory for the Bush administration, the House International Relations Committee approved its initiative to share nuclear technologies with India.

The legislation passed by the House panel specifically exempts India from U.S. laws that restrict nuclear trade with countries that haven't submitted to full nuclear inspections. The 37-5 vote was viewed by Democrats and Republicans as a positive indication that the White House's Indian initiative will win support from the full Congress this fall.

India hasn't signed the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and has been sanctioned by Washington in the past for its pursuit of nuclear weapons.

"The measure is an important step in transforming the strategic alliance of two of the oldest and largest democracies, while strengthening international security," said Rep. Henry Hyde (R., Ill.), chairman of the House International Relations Committee. "While the world has known that India possesses nuclear weapons, India has not had a seat at the table of nuclear stakeholders."

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee is scheduled to vote on a similar Indian bill today, and it is expected to pass.

President Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh agreed in March to build a broader strategic relationship between the U.S. and India, with nuclear power being one of the linchpins. Under the terms of the deal, India is required to separate its civilian and military nuclear programs and submit to extensive monitoring of its 14 civilian nuclear power plants by the International Atomic Energy Agency. The U.S. and India must still finalize an agreement detailing the scope and duration of their nuclear energy cooperation agreement.

Republican and Democratic lawmakers expressed initial concerns that the White House hadn't consulted Congress before agreeing to the initiative with New Delhi. The bill that passed the House International Relations Committee yesterday would require the White House to obtain new congressional approval after an agreement on details of the nuclear energy deal with India.

President Bush has made better relations with India a cornerstone of his foreign-policy agenda. The South Asian country is seen as a bulwark against Islamic extremism and China's economic and military might in Asia. And Mr. Bush has heralded India's role as the world's largest democracy by population.

Supporters of the bill said the move by the House International Relations Committee could herald a new age of strategic cooperation between India and the U.S. and provide important opportunities for U.S. businesses. Companies such as General Electric Co., Boeing Co. and Ford Motor Co. are among firms that could benefit from closer U.S.-India relations.

"I think India could end up being the most important foreign policy initiative of the Bush administration," said Ron Somers, president of the U.S.-India Business Council.

The State Department welcomed the House committee's vote.

Nuclear Proposal For India Endorsed (WT/AP)

By Foster Klug, Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

A House panel endorsed a Bush administration plan yesterday to share civilian nuclear technology with India, a first step toward approval of the unprecedented deal between the two countries.

Supporters called it a defining moment in U.S. relations with India, which is emerging as a pivotal Asian ally and economic partner.

A Republican lawmaker, however, said the deal "knifed" the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty designed to limit the spread of nuclear technology, and called it a sad day for efforts to stop the spread of nuclear weapons.

The 37-5 vote in the House International Relations Committee was for legislation to exempt India from U.S. laws that restrict nuclear trade with countries that have not submitted to full nuclear inspections. India developed its nuclear weapons program outside the treaty, which it has refused to sign.

Under the deal, India would allow international inspections and safeguards to 14 nuclear reactors it has designated as civilian; India's eight military facilities would remain off-limits. In return, the U.S. would agree to ship nuclear technology and fuel to India.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee is to consider separate legislation on the deal tomorrow.

Rep. Jim Leach, Iowa Republican, said passage of the Bush administration plan would open the door to a host of countries to press claims for similar nuclear cooperation, including South Korea, Japan, Iran and North Korea.

The nuclear treaty "has been knifed by an executive action," Mr. Leach said. "Anyone who wants to present this as a happy day is making a very serious mistake."

The House measure was based on a bill proposed by the Bush administration. Rep. Henry J. Hyde, Illinois Republican, the committee chairman, said the earlier bill was "profoundly unsatisfactory" because it removed Congress' oversight role.

While the agreement announced March 2 by President Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh determined a crucial part of the plan -- separating India's civilian and military nuclear facilities -- the two countries still must negotiate conditions, duration and scope of the overall cooperation plan.

Mr. Hyde and Rep. Tom Lantos of California, the committee's top Democrat and a supporter of the plan, said yesterday's legislation would strengthen Congress' role by having lawmakers vote only after they had seen a final version of the cooperation plan with India.

"I would caution the administration to pay close attention to congressional concerns," Mr. Hyde said.

Critics say the plan could boost India's nuclear arsenal. Extra nuclear fuel that the deal would provide, they say, could free up India's domestic uranium for use in its weapons program -- a violation of the treaty.

US Congress Committee Backs Nuclear Deal With India (AFP-Y2)

AFP, June 27, 2006

A controversial civilian nuclear energy deal between India and the United States cleared its first major hurdle, easily winning approval by a US Congress committee.

The House of Representatives International Relations Committee voted 37-5 in favor of the agreement.

"This is a defining moment in our relationship with the great nation of India," said Representative Tom Lantos (news, bio, voting record), the panel's top Democrat and a primary sponsor of the bill.

"After decades of disengagement punctuated with hostility, we now have the opportunity to achieve what will be a historic geostrategic realignment of the worlds largest democracy, India, with the worlds oldest democracy, the United States," Lantos told lawmakers in arguing for the legislation.

Democratic and Republican leaders in both Houses of Congress have expressed strong support for the bill, which is due for a vote in the full House next month.

"In terms of the impact of this legislation on the new geostrategic alignment between India and the United States for the balance of the 21st century, the importance of this legislation cannot be overstated," Lantos said of the deal forged last year between US President George W. Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee is expected to take up the legislation next week.

Despite the easy approval, the bill has not been without controversy.

Some lawmakers have expressed doubts about extending civil nuclear technology to India, which is not a member of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT).

Republican representative Jim Leach (news, bio, voting record), lamented what he said was "a sad day in the world of arms control and the rule of law."

"Anyone who wants to present this as a happy day is making a serious mistake," he said, adding that officially sanctioning India's nuclear program "is a foolish direction to go in."

Under the deal, the United States will aid the development of civil nuclear power in India in return for New Delhi placing its civil nuclear facilities under International Atomic Energy Agency inspections.

The US Atomic Energy Act of 1954 currently prevents the United States from trading nuclear technology with nations that have not signed up to the NPT. It has to be amended for the deal to be effective.

India tested nuclear weapons in 1974 and 1998 and is currently banned by the United States and other major powers from buying fuel for atomic reactors and other related equipment as a result.

Still, some legislators opposed to the deal say it would not only make it harder to enforce rules against nuclear renegades Iran and North Korea, but also set a dangerous precedent for other countries with nuclear ambitions.

"We intend to make the case that the purported benefits of this deal are an illusion, and the risks to the international nuclear nonproliferation regime are quite real," said Democratic Representative Ed Markey, one of the chief opponents to the agreement.

Last week, a group of nonproliferation experts from across the political spectrum wrote to Congress arguing that the nuclear deal would put the United States in violation of the NPT by assisting a non-nuclear weapon state in its pursuit of nuclear weapons.

But Vice President Dick Cheney last week warned that Congress would risk squandering a critical opportunity if it held up approval of the landmark civilian nuclear deal with India.

Press Celebrates Reception Plans For Koizumi Visit (WT)

By Takehiko Kambayashi

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

TOKYO -- Japan's protocol-conscious press is crowing that Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi will receive a more elaborate welcome than Chinese President Hu Jintao did when he visits Washington today. But Mr. Koizumi and President Bush also have serious matters to discuss, such as Iraq and the prospects of a North Korean long-range missile launch.

The Tokyo government has taken steps to ensure a successful meeting, agreeing last week to reopen its markets to American beef and announcing Monday that it will deploy advanced U.S. Patriot interceptor missiles on Japanese soil.

Mr. Koizumi arrived in Toronto yesterday, on the first leg of his four-day trip. He will tour Niagara Falls and hold talks with Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper in Ottawa today before traveling to Washington.

Japanese analysts expect Mr. Koizumi and Mr. Bush also will discuss the Iranian nuclear standoff, rising instability in Afghanistan and the threat posed by bird flu as the U.S. and Japan seek to highlight their international cooperation before the Group of Eight summit in St. Petersburg next month.

Tokyo, which was shocked when North Korea tested a long-range missile over Japan's main island in 1998, has been closely aligned with Washington in demanding that Pyongyang not fire a Taepodong-2 missile currently sitting on a launchpad near the country's northeastern coast.

Japan's largest newspaper, Yomiuri Shimbun, which reported that U.S. PAC-3 missiles could be installed in Japan by the end of the year, said it was not clear whether they could shoot down a Taepodong-2, which is thought to be capable of reaching parts of the United States. The PAC-3 missiles are designed to intercept ballistic missiles, cruise missiles or enemy aircraft.

Mr. Koizumi also supports the U.S. policy in Iraq, even though he declared last week that Japan would withdraw its 550 troops engaged in reconstruction and humanitarian work in the Samawah region in that country. He is expected to announce an expansion in operations of the Air Self-Defense Force, which is supporting coalition forces in Iraq.

"It is important to leave a national flag among multinational forces in Iraq," said Toshiyuki Shikata, a law professor at Teikyo University in Tokyo and retired Ground Self-Defense Force general.

Japanese journalists are more focused on the fact that Mr. Koizumi will be treated to a gala White House dinner, a stay at Blair House, a ride aboard Air Force One and a visit to rock legend Elvis Presley's Graceland Mansion in Memphis, Tenn. Mr. Koizumi is a lifelong Elvis fan.

Wary of a rising China, Japanese are sensitive to the contrast with the treatment given to the Chinese president when he visited Washington in April. Mr. Hu "was given only a luncheon" at the White House, noted the conservative daily Sankei Shimbun.

Mr. Shikata said Mr. Koizumi "from the very beginning developed a warm personal relationship with Mr. Bush. They want to display strong bilateral ties, and both of them want to appreciate their close relationship."

He said Yasuhiro Nakasone, prime minister of Japan from 1982 to 1987, also was known for his close relationship with a U.S. president -- Ronald Reagan. But the professor added, "Mr. Koizumi's ties with Mr. Bush are stronger than that."

The Bush administration was particularly grateful for Mr. Koizumi's decision to send troops to Iraq despite strong public opposition and Japan's U.S.-drafted pacifist constitution, Mr. Shikata said.

"A usual Japanese prime minister would have hesitated to do that."

The visit will cap the career of Mr. Koizumi, whose successor will be chosen when the ruling Liberal Democratic Party picks its next president in September. Mr. Koizumi is expected to ask Mr. Bush to give his cooperation to Chief Cabinet Secretary Shinzo Abe, the likely winner.

"Mr. Koizumi does not want to step down with his approval ratings declining. He wants the U.S. president to praise him as a great leader. That is his foremost desire," said Minoru Morita, a prominent Tokyo-based political analyst.

Koizumi Visit Presents A Tougher Japan (CSM)

By Robert Marquand

The Christian Science Monitor, June 28, 2006

TOKYO

Junichiro Koizumi, the silver-maned lion of Japanese politics, is on his last official US visit. Japan's prime minister will step down in September after six years at the helm.

As he visits his No. 1 ally, Mr. Koizumi's legacy as an upstart reformer seems assured back home: He busted up the old power-shogun cliques that ran Japan. He altered the nation's pacifist image, and self-image, by sending troops to Iraq; 100 Japanese planes will provide Iraq air support next month.

The US-Japan military and maritime alliance is melding more tightly - including Patriot missile deployments against North Korea - even as US forces and bases in Okinawa are being downsized and mothballed.

Yet Koizumi's tenure has brought an often troubling new nationalist spirit - seen in his multiple trips to the Yasukuni war shrine in Tokyo and new forms of right-wing racist rhetoric - that angers China and South Korea, nations the White House wants to work with and not alienate.

Currently, neither South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun or President Hu Jintao of China have plans to meet Koizumi before he departs from office.

"The shrine visits are not in the US interest, and as the US-Japan alliance gets stronger, the US should discourage them," says Ezra Vogel, a senior Asia expert at Harvard University. "We need to tell Japan, as a friend, that the way it handles the shrine makes the US job in the region more difficult. We can say that if Japan wants to promote friendship in east Asia, this is not the way to do it."

It is considered axiomatic in Japanese relations that overt or highly public commentary about domestic behavior by foreign politicians can scupper efforts to influence Tokyo.

Yet there is some US fallout over Koizumi's decision not to foreclose an Aug. 15 shrine visit. Instead of an earlier possibility to have Koizumi address Congress, he will join President Bush on a trip to Graceland, home of Elvis Presley, on Air Force One. The Bush-Koizumi relationship is regarded as very close, perhaps rivaled only by the mutuality between Bush and Tony Blair.

Japanese officials are eager to point out they engage in many kinds of dialogue and exchanges with East Asian nations. They have energy talks, cultural exchanges, and many levels of diplomacy; Japan has been a leader in distributing aid in Asia. It is unfair to simply boil relations down to the shrine, they say.

"There are many voices and points of view in Japan, and I think the general trend of Japan's relations with neighbors is upward," says Foreign Ministry press secretary Yoshinori Katori.

But in East Asian capitals, Koizumi's shrine visits are widely seen as a provocative denial of World War II Japanese aggression; a high court in Tokyo in recent days refused to say whether the visits were an unconstitutional abridgement of church and state. The issue will reach another peak this summer if Koizumi visits Yasukuni on Aug. 15, the day Japan surrendered in World War II.

Under the rules of the Liberal Democratic Party (LDP), Koizumi is not eligible for another term. Having won a landslide victory in one of Japan's most colorful elections ever last September, the prime minister nonetheless said he would step down.

Yet he leaves a political climate that has moved so far to the right that the leading successor in the party is Cabinet Secretary Shinzo Abe, whose grandfather was a Cabinet member during World War II and who belongs to a new breed of unapologetic patriots who have openly described China as a "threat."

In recent months, the jockeying has taken an unexpected turn, however. Moderate candidate Yasuo Fukuda is making a run, at least in LDP party circle discussions.

Citing a need for better relations with huge trading partner China, business leaders as well support Mr. Fukuda, a former cabinet secretary. In a recent survey of 31 business leaders, 15 opted for Fukuda, while 12 gave Abe the nod.

Yet Abe is again picking up in popular polls, helped by an unlikely source. By placing a Taepodong 2 long-range missile in launch position in North Korea, Kim Jong Il has created worry in Japan - which parlays into national security fears and a boost for Abe.

"Kim launched the first Taepodong over Japan in 1998," notes a Western diplomat. "That resulted in the beginning of missile defense and the first close military alliance between Japan and the US. Now his second missile is moving to elect Abe. Kim is aiding the Japanese right-wing. How ironic is that?"

US officials regard Tokyo as their most reliable ally in the Pacific. Yet such status requires maintenance, they say, and careful attention to how the relationship plays with other partners.

South Korean diplomats have felt dismay, if not betrayal, for example, at what appears to be US neutrality on Japan's recent claims over the Dokdo islands off Korea. This spring, Korean and Japanese naval vessels came close to a standoff over Dokdo, which Japan calls Takeshima. Seoul has long felt that the US regarded Dokdo as Korean.

Last week, President Roh weighed Seoul's military ability against Japan's, telling coast guard officers that, "It is true Japan is superior in military power, but we have enough military capability to deter Japan's provocations."

As Koizumi arrives in the US, he is bringing the welcome message that Japan has agreed to lift its ban on US beef imports, put in place five months ago over concerns about mad cow disease. The ban came just a month after a previous two-year ban had been lifted. The issue has caused anger in Congress, puzzlement in ranch states, and frustration at the US Embassy over what have been viewed as subjective claims by Japan regarding US regulation of its beef exports.

Then there are new US concerns about Japan's revisionism regarding its history with the US. The Yushukan museum, on the grounds of Yasukuni shrine, suggests that the US, not Japan, was responsible for World War II.

"We have our own history issues with Japan," says Mr. Vogel of Harvard. "The fiction that we forced Japan into World War II, things like that, are getting stronger. It is not in Japan's interest to promote these views, and we need to get a fuller discussion about history. We can be balanced and even-handed, and not one-sided, in Asia."

Ex-officials Hit Foreign Aid Cuts (WT)

By Katie Stuhldreher

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

Former Secretaries of State Colin L. Powell and Madeleine K. Albright warned yesterday that proposed funding cuts for international programs could jeopardize national security.

"I have been arguing this case for 30 years," Mrs. Albright said, speaking at a Washington forum hosted by the U.S. Global Leadership Campaign (USGLC). "The question has always been how to sell this. I think we need to change the name from 'foreign aid' to 'national security support,' because when people hear 'national security,' they immediately salute and with good reason."

President Bush requested $35.11 billion -- up from $31.57 billion enacted last year -- to fund U.S. international affairs in fiscal 2007, accounting for 1.2 percent of total government spending.

But the House Appropriations Committee recently cut Mr. Bush's wish list by nearly $3 billion, to $32.28 billion.

The international affairs budget funds a variety of initiatives, including poverty alleviation, HIV/AIDS programs, land mine removal in former conflict areas, and diplomacy, according to USGLC.

Sen. Thad Cochran, Mississippi Republican and chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, recently announced his plan for cuts as well, which would leave the Senate-approved foreign affairs budget at $32.66 billion.

"This is not the place to cut. You look at the places where Congress is making increases, and you say, 'What are they thinking?' " Mr. Powell said, addressing an auditorium of businessmen and representatives from nongovernmental organizations.

Mr. Powell urged them to "march up to the Hill" to express their concerns over the proposed cuts.

The Senate Appropriations Committee is scheduled to take up the foreign affairs budget tomorrow.

Last month, Sen. Mike DeWine, Ohio Republican; Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat; Sen. Rick Santorum, Pennsylvania Republican; and Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat, sent a letter signed by 52 senators to the Senate Appropriations Committee urging full funding of the requested budget.

"A majority of my colleagues in the Senate agree that it is critical that we continue to fund our U.S. International Affairs Budget. Terrorist networks recruit from the ranks of the millions of hungry, hopeless, and uneducated youth found throughout the developing world," Mrs. Feinstein said.

Supporters of full funding argue that more money spent on international projects would not only increase global security, but also open up business opportunities abroad.

"The world Madeleine and I grew up in was a world of battlefields. But today, I think it's a world of playing fields, with great opportunities. Countries once closed to us, like China and India, are now ready and willing to do business," said Mr. Powell, who was secretary of state from 2001 to 2005, under Mr. Bush.

Mrs. Albright, who served President Clinton from 1997 to 2001, said the proposed budget asks for a small amount of taxpayer money for a very worthy purpose.

"[Warren] Buffet gave that much money away the other day," Mrs. Albright said.

Islamic Militia Accused Of Breaking Truce (AP)

By Salad Duhul

AP, June 27, 2006

Islamic militiamen seized a checkpoint outside Somalia's capital Tuesday in an hourlong battle that killed six people, according to a clan leader who accused the militia of breaking a new cease-fire.

DOJ_NMG_0037134

The checkpoint connecting Mogadishu to the Lower Shabelle region was manned by members of the Habar Gidir clan who had been charging motorists to pass. The fighting killed three clan gunmen and three civilians, clan leader Abdi Kaibdid said.

"The Islamists made a surprise attack on my troops overnight," he told The Associated Press.

The militia took control of Mogadishu and most of the rest of southern Somalia this month. It signed an agreement last week to stop all military action and recognize the country's powerless, U.N.-backed interim government. But militia officials subsequently voted to replace their relatively moderate leader, who also had been reaching out to the West, with a radical cleric whom the U.S. accused of links to al-Qaida.

Salad Ali Jelle, deputy information minister for Somalia's interim government, said the militia's attack on the checkpoint was a clear breach of the cease-fire.

"They should withdraw from the post they captured and go back to their original positions," he said. Members of the Islamic militia could not be reached for comment.

Somalia has been without an effective central government since warlords toppled dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991 and then turned on each other, carving much of the country into armed camps ruled by violence and clan law. Many of the capital's residents applauded the Islamic group for forcing the warlords from Mogadishu, despite concerns the militia may try to remake Somalia into a theocracy akin to Afghanistan under the Taliban.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Monday that the United States has no plans to engage with the group's new leader, Sheikh Hassan Dahir Aweys, who is on the U.S. terrorist watch list as a suspected collaborator with al-Qaida.

Aweys, 71, told the AP Monday that he will honor his more moderate predecessor Sheikh Sharif Sheikh Ahmed's agreement to meet with interim government leaders next month. He said he plans to tell them that Islamic rule is the only option for Somalia, which has a constitution that makes no mention of Islam.

Underlining the apparent tougher line under Aweys' leadership, militia leaders said they will publicly stone to death four suspected rapists if they are convicted Thursday in Jowhar, 55 miles from Mogadishu.

Ted Dagne, an Africa specialist at the Congressional Research Service, said it was too soon to characterize Aweys' leadership.

"Let's be cautious and try to see if there is a trend that clearly shows a move to an extremist agenda," Dagne said.

Washington has long-standing concerns that Somalia will become a refuge for members of bin Laden's terror network, much like Afghanistan did in the late 1990s. The U.S. has accused the Islamic militia of harboring al-Qaida leaders responsible for deadly 1998 bombings at the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. The U.S. backed the warlords in their fight against the Islamic militia.

With Caveats, U.S. Backs Session At U.N. On Curtailing Illegal Arms (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, June 27 — The Bush administration gave its backing on Tuesday to a United Nations conference on curtailing the international flow of illegal arms, but warned delegates against adopting measures that would restrict individual possession of weapons.

"The U.S. Constitution guarantees the rights of our citizens to keep and bear arms, and there will be no infringement of those rights," Robert G. Joseph, under secretary of state for arms control and international security affairs, told the General Assembly. "Many millions of American citizens enjoy hunting and the full range of firearms sports, and our work will not affect their rights," he said.

He also said Washington would object to any steps to establish international regulation of ammunition or to ban governments from selling arms to rebel groups, known in diplomatic jargon as "nonstate actors."

"While we will of course continue to oppose the acquisition of arms by terrorist groups," he said, "we recognize the rights of the oppressed to defend themselves against tyrannical and genocidal regimes and oppose a blanket ban on nonstate actors."

The two-week conference, which began Monday, is intended to improve ways of curbing the $1 billion black market in the manufacture and distribution of small arms and light weapons that supply brutal civil wars and organized crime networks and end up killing an estimated 1,000 people every day worldwide.

Secretary General Kofi Annan reminded the gathering that "these weapons may be small, but they cause mass destruction." He urged member countries to toughen existing laws governing arms deals.

Steps that Mr. Joseph said the United States would support included the marking and tracing of weapons, controls on transfers, certification of the ultimate recipients, effective management of national stockpiles and destruction of illicit and government-declared surplus weapons.

Mr. Annan said the conference was not contemplating a global ban on gun ownership. "Nor do we wish to deny law-abiding citizens their right to bear arms in accordance with their national laws," he said.

He seemed to be referring to a campaign by the National Rifle Association, which has charged in mass mailings that the United Nations is plotting to take away Americans' guns through a treaty banning ownership.

John R. Bolton, the United States ambassador to the United Nations, confirmed that he had received hundreds of the form letters. Asked why all three citizen delegates from the United States to the conference were prominent members of the gun lobby group, he said he made it a practice not to comment on the activities of nongovernmental organizations.

U.S. Rejects Limits On Personal Guns (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

NEW YORK -- The United States will oppose any international effort to limit access of U.S. civilians to legal firearms but supports stronger controls on arms imports and exports, a senior State Department official said yesterday.

"The United States believes it is important for all of us to speak with one voice concerning the grave matter of the international illicit trade in small arms and light weapons," said Robert Joseph, the undersecretary of state for arms control and international security.

Mr. Joseph is heading the U.S. delegation to the small-arms review conference at the United Nations, which continues through next week.

"The U.S. Constitution guarantees the rights of our citizens to keep and bear arms, and there will be no infringement of those rights," Mr. Joseph said. "The United States will not agree to any provisions restricting civilian possession, use or legal trade of firearms inconsistent with our laws and practices."

The international conference has triggered anger among many American gun owners, who have responded to a National Rifle Association campaign suggesting that the United Nations is trying to take their weapons away.

Tens of thousands of letters have poured in to the United Nations from NRA members, prompting reassurances from Secretary-General Kofi Annan and Prasad Kariyawasam, the president of the review conference.

Mr. Joseph stressed that Washington seeks a "positive" engagement with other governments and supports the implementation of a recent agreement to mark weapons and create a registry to trace their whereabouts. The agreement would also:

•Establish more effective controls on the importing and exporting of weapons.

In an effort to focus on "substance, not process," Mr. Joseph said, Washington would not endorse a third review conference, preferring to discuss "actions that are focused, practical and intended to strengthen" illicit arms-control regimes.

Europeans and others are pressing for a formal agreement on transfer controls, to make sure that weapons are not diverted to conflicts or repressive regimes. The United States has refused to discuss a new treaty relating to arms, but Mr. Joseph said yesterday that Washington will consider voluntary principles.

He also warned other delegations to back away from issues that the Bush administration deems too complex or inappropriate for such international conferences, such as the marking of ammunition.

Russia Oil Tempers U.S. Sway (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Alan Cullison

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

The Bush administration is wrestling with a new challenge from abroad: an often strong-willed Russia made all the more assertive by its energy wealth. As if to drive home that point, Russian President Vladimir Putin delivered a hard-hitting speech yesterday, arguing that Russia's economic renaissance makes it an equal among other global powers.

His comments highlight the dilemma facing Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who arrives in Moscow today hoping to win Russia's support on international issues such as curbing Iran's nuclear ambitions, even as the Bush administration has stepped up criticism of Mr. Putin's policies both at home and toward Russia's nearest neighbors.

President Bush is set for his own visit to Russia next month, when he must face a similar bind. Administration officials concede that Moscow's economic boom is fueling a more independent Russian foreign policy, and that U.S. criticism of Russian policies increasingly falls on deaf ears. Mr. Putin, talking to an annual gathering of top diplomats in Moscow, acknowledged that some countries haven't caught up with Russia's new economic strength. "Not everyone was ready for Russia to restore so quickly its economic health and position in the world arena," he said. "Some see us through the prism of the prejudices of the past ... and see a threat in a strong, reborn Russia."

Bush aides say they worry that Russia's economic clout already is leading Moscow to overplay its hand on the diplomatic front. As examples, they cite Moscow's decision in January to cut off gas supplies briefly to Ukraine, and Mr. Putin's outreach in March to top leaders of Hamas soon after the militant group began to run the Palestinian government.

"They are certainly feeling better about themselves than at any time since the breakup of the Soviet Union," says one senior administration official, adding that Russia's energy wealth "has given them the distinct feeling that they are back as a big-time player." Russia's assertiveness has complicated life for an administration already struggling with falling approval ratings at home and the intractable conflict in Iraq.

The big test of U.S.-Russia relations is Iran. So far, Moscow has supported U.S. and European efforts to forge a united front within the United Nations to get Tehran to give up any pursuit of nuclear weapons. But Moscow has said repeatedly that it doesn't support imposing sanctions or harsher measures if Iran doesn't comply, and Mr. Putin made clear that Russia wasn't ready to give ground on this issue. "I repeat again: We do not intend to join all sorts of ultimatums that can only drive the situation to a dead end," he said.

Administration officials say that Ms. Rice, while in Moscow this week, is unlikely to echo the blunt language that Vice President Dick Cheney used last month in Lithuania, when he accused the Putin government of concentrating power at home while using Russia's vast oil and gas reserves as "tools of intimidation or blackmail." Instead, Ms. Rice may meet privately with several leaders of Russian civil society. Mr. Putin yesterday denounced all criticism of his energy policy as "exclusively political."

President Bush, during his trip in July, may also show some sign of support for greater democracy in Russia, though his advisers are debating what gesture to make. Mr. Cheney's public blast in Lithuania, U.S. officials say, was meant to put down a marker in the lead-up to the Russian-hosted summit of the Group of Eight top industrialized countries in St. Petersburg next month. Russia's stewardship of the G8 this year, at a time when the Putin government clamps down on dissent at home, has embarrassed many in Europe and the U.S.

Mr. Cheney's speech, if anything, only appeared to redouble the Kremlin's defiance of Washington, and aroused an argument in the state-run media that is often expressed: The U.S. is using the rhetoric of democracy as a weapon as it installs unfriendly governments on Russia's borders, and supports opposition groups within Russia itself.

Mr. Cheney delivered his broadside against the Kremlin from Lithuania, and then departed to oil-rich Kazakhstan, where he praised the authoritarian leader as a personal friend. "Where is all this pathos about protecting human rights and democracy when it comes to the need to pursue their own interests?" Mr. Putin asked in his annual state-of-the-nation address a week later.

Bush administration officials insist there is no internal feud over Russia policy per se. The administration wants good relations with Russia, they say, on counterterrorism and energy cooperation, but also won't shy away from pointing out Mr. Putin's democratic lapses. "We believe it's possible to do the criticism and the cooperation at the same time," says one official. To keep some focus on the democracy side, the administration plans to send two State Department officials, including the top U.S. diplomat for Europe, Daniel Fried, to a pro-democracy "alternative summit" four days before the G8 gathering.

Still, U.S. officials acknowledge that dealing with an increasingly cocky and robust Russia has complicated interactions with Moscow and made negotiations within the U.N. Security Council, where Russia holds a veto, more tricky.

When Mr. Bush in June 2001 declared Mr. Putin "a man deeply committed to his country," Russia was still severely in debt and struggling to recover from the chaos of the 1990s. Russians were also far more uncertain of Mr. Putin himself.

Moscow now has the third-largest currency reserves in the world, including a special $70 billion domestic "stabilization fund." The Russian economy is growing at faster than 6% a year, driven mainly by its output of oil and gas. And its OAO Gazprom, now one of the world's largest companies, supplies more than a quarter of all of Europe's gas, and is pushing to become a major future supplier to China and the U.S.

A King Of Roadblocks Works To Clear A Path In Presidential Race (WSJ)

By John Lyons

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- In the no-holds-barred arena of Mexico City politics, the heavyweight is El Grandote.

Dubbed the "Big Guy" by Mexican cops who once charged him with murdering a judge, Alejandro López Villanueva heads a militant squatters' organization of 34,000 families who owe him their homes -- and often their jobs -- and who have become his political soldiers. The 40-year-old Mr. López Villanueva, who wears his dark curly hair at shoulder length, can dispatch 10,000 protesters within two hours to block intersections and snarl traffic, which he does to settle scores and seek benefits for his followers.

These days, Mr. López Villanueva has put his troops at the disposal of the leftist presidential candidate Andres Manuel López Obrador, who has a small lead in most opinion polls in Sunday's national election. Street bosses like Mr. López Villanueva have long been a staple of Mexican politics, but their influence was supposed to fade as the country's democracy matured. Instead, their power has expanded because they can provide jobs and housing to thousands of families made desperate by a sluggish economy.

Mr. López Villanueva has arranged to have about 10,000 members of his organization -- the Francisco Villa Popular Front -- trained by federal election officials to be poll watchers for Mr. López Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party, or PRD. On Sunday he will dispatch them to observe the vote in Mexico City. His followers can be counted on to back Mr. López Obrador and other PRD candidates and to encourage their friends and relatives to do likewise. Other parties will have observers at polling stations, too.

Throughout Mr. López Obrador's political career, he has relied on mass protests to get what he wants. He was famous in his home state of Tabasco for surrounding oil refineries to demand payments to local Indians. His critics fear that if he wins the presidency he'll rely on street bosses like Mr. López Villanueva to achieve his aims, and if he loses he'll call on them to shut down cities. Mr. López Obrador denies the accusation.

"Our hope is that López Obrador will be a transition government to a state that looks after the needs of the lower social classes," said Mr. López Villanueva, who says he is inspired by Marxism. "The involvement of our movement will also be critical in making sure that he comes through with his promises to help the poor." Mr. López Villanueva said he has no plans to contest the results of the election if his man loses.

Mr. López Villanueva rose to prominence as a radical student in the late 1980s. He and a group of other students at Mexico City's National Autonomous University invited hundreds of families who had been evicted from homes on a hillside designated as a nature preserve to camp in the university classrooms and hallways. The campus was shut down because of a student strike Mr. López Villanueva helped organize.

Later, he led the families to a marshy patch of unused land. He persuaded dump-truck operators to unload discarded asphalt there, which the families used as foundations for the shanties they made from corrugated aluminum, scrap wood and tarps.

Marches and blockading roads eventually forced authorities to turn over title to the marsh land to the families and provide them with low-cost loans and grants to build proper housing. Today, El Molino is a bustling community with blocks of apartment houses dedicated to Carlos Marx, Federico Engels and other communist luminaries. Residents get school supplies at the Francisco Villa stationery and snack on Italian ice from the Francisco Villa ice cream shop. (The revolutionary leader is commonly known as Pancho Villa.)

Over the years, Mr. López Villanueva has seized dozens of unused plots and abandoned buildings. His followers pay fees to the Francisco Villa organization, which serve as down payments on future apartments. The down payments are held in a general account and are generally not reimbursable, so there is a disincentive to quit.

Mr. López Villanueva's tactics have produced running battles with Mexican authorities, though. In the mid-1990s, shortly after the birth of his two daughters, he spent two years on the lam, dodging authorities who arrested 15 of his associates. In 2000, prosecutors accused him of shooting to death a judge. He denied the charge, which he said was concocted by jealous rivals.

The prosecution was dropped for lack of evidence, but not before Mr. López Villanueva had spent five months in prison and was stuck with his nickname. While his friends call him Alejandro, newspapers regularly refer to him as El Grandote. "In Mexico, the cops always provide a nickname to the papers to make you sound like a delinquent," he said. "It's a way of tarring you so you live under suspicion even though what they charged you with was made up."

His fights with the law didn't frighten away Mr. López Obrador's PRD, which was looking to gain power in Mexico City. In exchange for votes, campaign contributions, and demonstrators willing to pack PRD rallies, the party agreed to let Mr. López Villanueva and other street bosses operate on the fringes of the law in places governed by the PRD. El Grandote's followers were prominent in Mr. López Obrador's successful bid to become mayor of Mexico City in 2000. When Mexico's conservative ruling party of President Vicente Fox launched a campaign to disqualify Mr. López Obrador from running for president, Mr. López Villanueva sent thousands of followers into the streets, paralyzing main thoroughfares. President Fox eventually called off the efforts.

Some of Mr. López Villanueva's associates, who see all of the mainstream political parties as buttresses for an economic system that disenfranchises the poor, called the pact with the PRD a sellout and quit his group. But the link-up deepened his power. Under the López Obrador mayoralty, the city government made numerous low-cost construction loans to the Francisco Villa organization. Mr. López Villanueva also added a 10,000-vehicle fleet of gypsy cabs, which operate unmolested by the city. His brother and brother-in-law have held city council seats.

El Grandote says that his responsibilities have grown so heavy that he is wearying of the burden. These days, he says, he often dreams of leaving the "chaos" of Mexico City for a more tranquil life in the country. He hopes his daughters, now teenagers who giggled over photos on their cellphones as he talked, will find less volatile work. "This city is a monster," he said. "It's so big that you go out and do a blockade and there's barely a reaction. Deliveries get through, people get to work."

For now, there is much work to do. On a rainy Thursday, he inaugurated a new cultural center at one of his settlements to the sound of folk music and rowdy applause. And he must keep his troops fired up. Last week, for instance, he organized rotating shifts of a thousand protesters to block off the main artery connecting Iztapalapa with the city center. His purpose was to pressure the city to provide drinking water and other services to several squatter settlements. The group is now camped in front of the borough hall while it negotiates for concessions.

At the entrance to Dusty Mines, a collection of cinderblock houses that lack running water, a teenage girl thumbed through a thin Karl Marx reader. A resident of this squatter settlement controlled by one of the squatter settlements controlled by Mr. López Villanueva, she was ready to rumble for El Grandote. Blocking roads is "a lot of fun," she said.

Chávez's Image Becomes Tool For Attack In Mexican Presidential Race (WP)

By Manuel Roig-Franzia

DOJ_NMG_0037139

MEXICO CITY, June 27 -- Hugo Chávez is not running for president of Mexico. But some days it's been hard to tell.

The Venezuelan president's face has been all over Mexican television at critical stages in this country's bitter mudfest of a presidential race.

For a while, the party of candidate Felipe Calderón filled its ads with shots of Chávez paired with less-than-flattering images of Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the left-leaning Mexican presidential candidate. Later, a political activist group put Chávez back on the tube, surrounded by machine guns and soldiers, and accompanied by a dire voice-over: "In Mexico, you don't have to die to define your future -- you only have to vote!"

The strategy of López Obrador's opponents has been clear. By linking the candidate to Chávez, they have tried to frighten voters into believing López Obrador will be a carbon copy of the Venezuelan president, who has been accused of crushing dissent and crippling democratic institutions.

Mexican political experts generally agree the tactic has been effective. Calderón shot up in the polls shortly after his party began airing the Chávez spots, even though the Venezuelan leader has not taken a public role in the Mexican campaign.

"In politics it doesn't matter what is, it matters what seems to be," said Jorge Chabat, a Mexico City political analyst.

The Chávez imagery has gotten so intense that Mexico's electoral commission has twice ordered television advertisements featuring the Venezuelan leader off the air -- the latest order coming on Monday.

The Venezuelan president, seen as the heir apparent to Cuban President Fidel Castro as leader of the Latin American left, is an easy tool for smear in Mexico. After gaining an ally with the election of Evo Morales in Bolivia, Chávez was unable to use his influence to get Ollanta Humala elected president of Peru in a race against the eventual winner, Alan García.

"What we saw in Peru and we're seeing in Mexico is that Chávez has been converting into a negative," said Mexican political analyst Juan Pardinas.

Many activist groups have injected Chávez into the presidential race, but Calderón's National Action Party, or PAN, did it first. His aides spoke of Bolivarian circles -- small community groups fostered by Chávez's government -- surreptitiously working on behalf of López Obrador. Then the PAN began filling the airwaves with grainy images of Chávez, alongside images of López Obrador.

What followed was a true stunner. López Obrador, who is known for his combative style, barely responded. The PAN kept pounding him with the Chávez advertisement, but López Obrador and his Democratic Revolution Party let weeks pass before aggressively disavowing a relationship with Chávez, a decision his aides now say was a mistake.

As Calderón rose in the polls, Mexico's electoral commission stepped in, ordering the PAN to remove the advertisements in April. By then, López Obrador's once-commanding lead was gone and the race -- after a brief leap by Calderón into first place in most polls -- has settled into a statistical tie.

Arturo Sarukhan, a top Calderón adviser, said the advertisements "became a crowbar for opening the mind-set of the Mexican electorate to the issues that are disturbing to the public about López Obrador."

Chávez had been heavily criticized here for denouncing Mexican President Vicente Fox -- also a member of the PAN -- as "a lapdog" of the United States. Later, the PAN brought up the Chávez comparison when López Obrador told Fox "to shut up" about the presidential campaign, a comment widely criticized as disrespectful in Mexico.

As the campaign enters its final stage, López Obrador has begun responding more often to the comparisons to Chávez. He said in an interview this week with El Universal, one of Mexico's largest daily newspapers, that "I've grown bored with them comparing [Chávez] to me."

"It's absurd," López Obrador campaign strategist Manuel Camacho Solís said in an interview. "Andrés Manuel López Obrador doesn't know Chávez, nor have they ever spoken."

On Monday, a little-known activist group -- the Center for Leadership and Human Development -- was ordered to yank its advertisement featuring Chávez and the machine guns, which López Obrador's campaign complained was a not-so-thinly disguised attack on its candidate.

López Obrador has hit back with a radio ad of his own, which tries to turn the Chávez controversy into a joke. The ad says "Chávez is for López Obrador," but does not mention a first name. The narrator then runs off a string of common Mexican surnames, such as Gonzalez and Perez, and says they're for López Obrador, too.

Bringing Mexico Closer To God (NYT)

By Enrique Krauze

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

SHOULD Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the front-runner in Mexico's presidential race, emerge victorious on Sunday, it could usher in a form of Latin American leftism as yet unseen: messianic populism. Mexico's fragile democracy could become its first casualty.

Outside of Mexico, people ask which Latin American leader Mr. López Obrador most resembles: Hugo Chávez of Venezuela, Evo Morales of Bolivia or Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva of Brazil. The truth is that he's not like any of them. He does not have the military stamp of Comandante Chávez or the indigenist roots of Mr. Morales. Nor is he a born compromiser like Mr. Lula who, as some Brazilians say, seems to "know the value of 10 percent." Mr. López Obrador is different: he always strives for 100 percent. And he has higher models to emulate.

Earlier this year an interviewer asked him what religion he followed. "I'm Catholic, fundamentally Christian," Mr. López Obrador responded. "The life and work of Jesus fill me with passion. He, too, was persecuted in his time, spied on by the powerful of his era, and he was crucified."

The interviewer was surprised (there is an unwritten rule that Jesus is never mentioned in Mexican politics) and asked him whether he intended some parallelism. "Not at all," he said. "I say it because sometimes it is forgotten."

Many thought his comment was a cynical appeal to win the hearts of the religious Mexican people. Others, including myself, believe, however, that his words were a sincere reflection of the way he sees himself: "I am calling together a movement of consciousness, a spiritual movement," he told a reporter in 2004. "Many people see me, humble people, what they tell me is that they are praying for me .... I am very democratic and very mystic."

Millions of poor Mexicans, particularly in the center and south of the country, see in him what he sees in himself: a bestower of manna who will provide the poor with cash handouts and all the services of a great welfare state. His oratory increasingly blends the theological with the revolutionary: he has repeated that he will "purify national life," inaugurating a new era of "historic transcendence" in which "those on top," "those with money," will no longer oppress "those on the bottom." Believe him: he's a man of his word.

Mr. López Obrador should be strongly commended for placing the fight against poverty at the center of his social platform. But his numbers don't add up. He has said repeatedly, for example, that he will finance his proposal with the more than $9 billion a year to be shaved from the budget by cutting salaries or firing top members of the bureaucracy. However, if the salaries of the 4,000 top officials of the executive branch were cut in half, it would yield scarcely 4 percent of that sum.

Mr. López Obrador has also talked of revising Nafta's agricultural provisions and subsidizing exporters with cheap fuel (a practice prohibited by Nafta). He has declared that he will "allow" private investment, but not national or foreign interest in strategic areas that urgently require it, like oil and gas.

His platform is full of unrealizable initiatives: a microcredit program (a very promising project) but for a whopping eight million people (consider that the successful Grameen Bank of Bangladesh has taken on fewer than six million borrowers since 1976); bullet trains from Mexico City to the northern border (which would not only be expensive, but also face competition from low-cost airlines).

But more troubling than his economics is his political messianism, which could undermine our democracy. As the Mexican writer Gabriel Zaid pointed out last week in the newspaper Reforma, Mr. López Obrador, a former member of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, which ruled Mexico from 1929 to 2000, wants to return to the political structure of the old days. When the P.R.I. held power, the president controlled the country's legislature, judiciary, natural resources, state-run businesses, electoral system, monetary policy and federal budget and could place limits of freedom of expression.

But there would be a disturbing novelty to the process as revived by Mr. López Obrador: his presidency wouldn't be institutional and bureaucratic like the old regime, but instead bound to his personal charisma. One of his most insistent proposals is to amend the Constitution to allow for referendums and plebiscites, so that halfway through his prospective term (in 2009) "the people" would decide whether he goes or stays.

Knowing that he would take the microphone daily to report on his government's progress — as he has said he will — it's easy to imagine the result of such a plebiscite. And after that, who is to stop him from altering the law of the land and being re-elected indefinitely, or remaining the power behind all powers, if "the people" demand it? Redemption won't be achieved in the constitutionally allotted six years. A messiah needs time.

With the uncharismatic P.R.I. candidate, Roberto Madrazo, running third in the polls, Mr. López Obrador's main obstacle for Sunday is Felipe Calderón of the center-right National Action Party. Where Mr. López Obrador is strong, Mr. Calderón is weak: he has failed to convey real concern for Mexico's poor.

But in economic matters he seems more coherent: a young lawyer who studied at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government, Mr. Calderón seeks to reform the remains of the old corporate structures and the country's traditional inward-looking mentality.

His idea is for Mexico to carve out a competitive niche for itself in a globalized world (as has been done, at different times, by other backward Catholic countries like Chile, Ireland and Spain) and thus generate productive jobs and growth. Mr. Calderón has let it be known that if he wins, he'll call for a coalition government with the P.R.I. and even Mr. López Obrador's Party of the Democratic Revolution.

It is not impossible that Mr. Calderón could win — some recent polls have the race too close to call. But even if he does, he'll face great obstacles. While Mr. López Obrador has said publicly that he would acknowledge the official results no matter what, he always hedges such claims with a "but" — such as making it conditional on the voting being without irregularities.

As the race has tightened, he has taken to criticizing the federal electoral institute and has told the crowds that he suspects "intentions of fraud." This raises fears that he will acknowledge defeat only if Mr. Calderón wins by a significant margin, say, greater than 5 percent.

If Mr. López Obrador were to dispute a Calderón victory in the streets and at the tribunal, the P.R.I. would be likely to join him. If the tribunal cannot name a winner to take the oath on Dec. 1, the day President Vicente Fox Quesada must step down, the national legislature has to name an interim president who would have to call a new election. Mexicans would live in a state of political volatility and our electoral institutions would be discredited.

This would be a serious setback for democracy. But would it be worse than a López Obrador victory? "Mexico has yet to console itself for never having been a monarchy," the Nobel Prize-winning poet Octavio Paz told me in his last years, with great sadness. Maybe his words will prove prophetic. In the long run Mexico will find no consolation in a monarchy cloaking itself in the trappings of democracy and harboring messianic ambitions.

Mexico's Missing Prosperity (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

The subtext for the United States' immigration debate is Mexico. Why doesn't its economy grow faster, creating more jobs and higher living standards? That's the question that inevitably confronts the winner of this Sunday's Mexican presidential election, but it is also a critical question for Americans. A more prosperous country would not be sending so many of its poorest citizens north. Since 1990 about 20 to 25 percent of U.S. immigrants have come from Mexico.

Here is an illuminating comparison. In 1970 average incomes in South Korea were about half those in Mexico. By 2004 Korean incomes were more than twice Mexico's. During those decades, reports the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), average Mexican incomes rose 57 percent, to $9,178 (expressed in constant "2000 dollars"); the comparable Korean gain was 574 percent, to $19,148.

It's not that Mexico has made no progress. Its economy was once crisis-prone, inflation-ridden and heavily insulated from foreign trade. Now it has quelled inflation (about 4 percent, down from 17 percent in the late 1990s), controlled government spending and opened up to trade. Before adoption of the North American Free Trade Agreement in 1994, tariffs on covered imports averaged 12 percent (and were much higher in the 1980s); by 2001 they were 2 percent. The last financial crisis -- a collapsing currency, an outflow of money -- occurred in 1994 and 1995. In recent years its economy has grown almost 4 percent annually.

But that growth -- fine for an advanced country such as the United States -- doesn't suffice for a poor country whose population is increasing (as is Mexico's) by more than 1 percent a year. In China, economic growth averages 9 to 10 percent annually; in India, about 6 to 8 percent. Mexico isn't in the same league.

Economies advance through the adoption of better technologies and business methods. Production and efficiency improve. Prices go down or incomes go up. Either way, people can buy more -- more old stuff (say, food or housing); or more new stuff (say, Internet connections or iPods). In Mexico, this process is weak. To simplify slightly: Its economy consists of two vast sectors, each slow to adopt better technology and business practices.

One sector involves large, modern firms in semi-protected markets that limit the pressure to improve efficiency or lower prices. "Mexico's business sector is risk-averse. It's never had to operate in a true competitive environment," says Pamela Starr, an analyst for the Eurasia Group, a consulting firm. "It's operated with monopolies and oligopolies encouraged by the government."

An extreme case in point is Pemex, the state-owned monopoly oil company. Without competitors or complaining shareholders, its operations are lax. In 2004 Pemex had $69 billion in sales and 137,722 employees, according to its Web site; in the same year, Exxon Mobil had $291 billion in revenue and 85,900 employees. Telmex, which dominates the phone market, is often cited as another example. In 2004 Mexico had the sixth-highest phone charges for an average customer of 29 OECD member countries.

The other part of the economy is usually called the "informal sector." It consists of thousands of small firms -- street vendors, stores, repair shops, tiny manufacturers -- that theoretically aren't legal, because they haven't registered with the government and often don't pay taxes or comply with regulations on wages and hiring and firing. Almost two-thirds of Mexico's workers may be employed in the informal sector, according to one rough estimate by the International Monetary Fund.

The sector's size might suggest great entrepreneurial vitality. The trouble is that these firms are virtually compelled to remain small and inefficient. Because they're technically illegal, they can't easily get bank loans and can't grow too large without being forced to pay taxes or comply with government regulations. In Mexico, companies with fewer than 10 workers account for almost two-fifths of all employment. In the United States, such firms represent one-ninth of total jobs.

All this frustrates rapid economic growth -- though the obstacles have diminished as Mexico has opened to foreign trade and investment. The harder question is what created this system. Lawrence Harrison, an economic development expert at Tufts University, blames culture. Latin American values, he says, have resisted change and encouraged "rent-seeking" by business elites -- vying for government favors that provide protected markets. Asian societies, he argues, have been more accepting of change and have achieved the higher savings rates conducive to faster economic growth.

Economist William Easterly of New York University is skeptical of the cultural explanation and argues that de-emphasizing trade protectionism and government intervention requires time. "Advocates of free trade and free markets overpromise what can be accomplished in a short time," he says. Attitudes and institutions change slowly. "The payoff is in the long term," he argues.

On paper, the leading candidates for president advocate different economic policies. Former Mexico City mayor Andr?s Manuel L?pez Obrador of the center-left Democratic Revolution Party urges more government activism. Felipe Calder?n of the center-right National Action Party -- the party of the incumbent, Vicente Fox -- favors "the market." But each might have trouble enacting his agenda without a legislative majority, with the once-dominant Institutional Revolutionary Party controlling swing votes. At best, economic growth might improve slightly; at worst it might decrease.

For Americans, the implications are sobering. Mexico has long regarded immigration as an economic safety valve. Whoever wins, that won't change.

China Discloses $1.1 Billion Bank Fraud (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

DOJ_NMG_0037143

SHANGHAI, June 27 -- The Chinese government disclosed $1.1 billion worth of fraud at one of the country's largest state-owned banks this week, underscoring the risks confronting foreign investors as they seek big stakes in China's precarious banking system.

China's National Audit Office on Monday announced that an examination of records at the Agricultural Bank of China, one of four state-owned giants, uncovered 51 cases of criminal wrongdoing involving 157 people in 2004. The state audit also found evidence of $1.8 billion in improperly handled deposits and $3.5 billion in illegal loans.

The latest details of fraud come as China presses to eradicate the taint of corruption from its state-owned banks as it courts foreign capital in a bid to improve management practices. China's leaders are particularly keen to fix ailing lenders ahead of next year, when foreign banks will be allowed to conduct business inside China in local currency. That could pose a grave challenge to domestic lenders, whose managers have been nurtured by decades of state capital infusions and a system governed more by personal connections than consideration of the bottom line.

The most recent additions to a lengthy roster of bank-fraud cases brings to the fore a basic question about the future of China's financial system: Are the state disclosures a sign that the government is indeed serious about fixing the troubles, or are they just another indication of the extent of the problems in a fundamentally shaky system? Analysts saw a little bit of both. While the state is indeed intent on a fix, the challenges are deep.

"This case that has emerged at the Agricultural Bank of China is just a minor one among the overall problems with China's state-owned banks," said Yi Xianrong, a director at the China Academy of Social Sciences' financial research institute in Beijing. "Lots more such cases are not discovered and will be discovered sooner or later, as the most serious problems involve medium- and long-term loans."

He cited deep institutional problems at the banks, including a lack of internal controls. "More fundamentally, the system appoints bank leaders based on administrative power rather than on market performance," Yi said. "Real changes have yet to come."

For foreign investors, the stakes are high. Last year, Bank of America paid $3 billion for a 9 percent stake in China Construction Bank, and the Royal Bank of Scotland acquired 10 percent of Bank of China. This month, Bank of China raised about $9.7 billion through a stock offering in Hong Kong following a $9.2 billion offering there by China Construction Bank.

Last August, Goldman Sachs Group Inc., American Express Co. and Allianz AG sank $3.8 billion into China's largest lender, the Industrial & Commercial Bank of China, capturing a 10 percent stake. The bank has said it will pursue a stock offering worth about $12 billion in Hong Kong sometime this fall.

Foreign investors are eager to lock up stakes of banks in China's huge, sizzling economy. With stock and bond markets still in their infancy, China's four largest state banks essentially dictate where capital goes in the country. But the foreigners are sinking their money into a financial system that has traditionally functioned more as a cash artery for companies owned by the Communist Party-led government then as a careful arbiter of risk and reward.

Private economists estimate that China's banks are now choked with $500 billion in bad loans, making the system vulnerable to a shock. Those worries have heightened in recent weeks with the release of government data showing a surge in lending in the first five months of the year, despite government caps on investment in red-hot sectors such as real estate and automobile manufacturing.

On Tuesday, the debt-rating agency Standard & Poor's underscored those concerns, declaring that China's banks face "increasing vulnerability" from the widening volume of lending. The agency credited China's banks with some improvements in their governance but stressed that "their developing credit- and risk-management systems are likely to be severely stretched by rapidly changing economic conditions."

The Agricultural Bank has long been seen as the most flawed of the four state-owned giants. Four years ago, the bank announced plans to embrace consumer finance as a way of weaning itself off more politically motivated lending. The bank moved aggressively into the fledgling business of auto finance, seeking to profit as China's growing middle class adopts the family car.

In interviews then, bank managers acknowledged that credit-checking systems were virtually nonexistent in China. They said that so long as would-be borrowers accurately disclosed their addresses and incomes, few applicants would be turned away.

This week's disclosures added to the evidence that the resulting consumer-finance frenzy has turned sour: The state auditors said that among the biggest areas of fraud in the cases it discovered were car loans and home mortgages.

"The banks have been desperately expanding loans, including consumer loans and real estate loans," Yi said. "The problem won't be visible until real estate prices fall dramatically, which will happen sooner or later. The problem with individual consumer loans is serious."

One Riot Breaks Ground In China (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

SANZHOU, China -- For 24 hours, thousands of rampaging farmers here unleashed their rage over confiscated farmland this month -- holding local officials hostage and, clubs and bottles of acid in hand, forcing a band of private security guards to spend the night cowering behind locked doors.

The riot in many ways resembled other uprisings in rural China in recent years. But this one ended with a twist: The villagers won significant concessions.

By dusk on June 14, the villagers had agreed to let everyone go home -- or to the hospital for treatment -- and officials had pledged a high-level review of 750 acres of rice paddies and fish ponds, property that had been confiscated by the village committee and resold for development in what the villagers said was a corrupt transaction.

Moreover, the villagers said, they were promised an explanation of how the 200 private guards, many with buzz cuts and tattoos typical of Chinese gangsters, came to be in Sanzhou protecting a multistory apartment complex built on a prime piece of the confiscated farmland.

The compromise did not settle the land conflict that has embittered this village-turned-suburb 25 miles south of Guangzhou, in the boundless expanse of factories that has blanketed the Pearl River Delta. But it stopped the violence after only a few serious injuries. More broadly, it dramatized the Chinese government's realization that farmers have a point when they complain that their land and their livelihoods are being unfairly swallowed up by relentless economic growth.

President Hu Jintao's government, in an indication of concern about the unrest among suddenly landless farmers, has launched a campaign to preserve the fields and paddies that feed China's 1.3 billion people. In addition, it has allocated $42.5 billion to improving the lives of the 700 million Chinese still attached to the land and filled official propaganda with stories of Communist Party cadres out in the countryside solving problems for grateful farmers.

Despite the two-day riot here, the first signs have emerged that the campaign may be having an effect. Although party censorship makes information in China hard to assess, reports of violent protests in farming villages have declined sharply over the past six months. This marks a significant shift from 2004-05, when clashes between farmers and police escalated dramatically. The Public Security Ministry reported 84,000 violent protests in 2005, more than 200 a day.

The government has also become increasingly frank about the corruption that often accompanies land seizures, outraging farmers and corroding their willingness to abide by official decisions. Sun Wensheng, minister of land and resources, told reporters Friday that more than a third of land confiscations involve illegal action on the part of local party and government officials.

Premier Wen Jiabao's cabinet last week handed down an order -- the latest in a long line -- barring local officials from confiscating farmland without ministry approval and from using proceeds from sales of confiscated land to finance government institutions. Wen did not address the complaint voiced most often by farmers: that local officials pocket the difference between low compensation paid to peasants and the high market price charged to developers. But Sun said his ministry was putting together a new system to monitor seizures to prevent this and other abuses.

The party secretary of surrounding Guangdong province, Zhang Dejiang, has told city, town and village leaders in this region that they cannot use confiscated land until farmers are satisfied with the compensation. In effect, that was the promise reiterated to the farmers of Sanzhou to get them to disperse peacefully.

Guangdong province, China's most industrialized area, has been a hot zone of land conflicts. Police opened fire Dec. 6 on protesting farmers in Dongzhou village, 130 miles east of here, killing several and raising fears that the unrest was about to rise to a higher level of bloodshed.

Zhang, the provincial party secretary and a member of the national Politburo, came under criticism in Beijing for allowing the violence to rise to that level in his province. Since then, three local officials involved in the Dongzhou killings have been fired, according to dissident sources, and 12 villagers have been sentenced to jail terms.

Sanzhou protest leaders, who described what happened here on condition of anonymity because they feared arrest, said busloads of police waited nearby as the riot flared on June 13 and 14. A half-dozen policemen who looked on were not armed, they said.

The villagers said that, although Sanzhou's land confiscations began with decisions made in the mid-1990s, it wasn't until recently that they recognized how much of their land was ticketed for residential and industrial development. In the past few years, a large pond where farmers grew carp has been drained in hopes it can become an industrial park. Municipal food warehouses have been built on former rice paddies. Nearby, a thermos bottle factory has arisen, with an adjacent dormitory for the farmers' children, who make up the workforce.

Farmers seemed most outraged by what they said was use of their compensation by village officials to build a bridge across the fish pond. Needlessly large sums were allocated for the bridge, which is designed as a simple stretch of concrete across a 200-yard bog, they said. "They say they need 10 times what they really need, then they take the difference," a villager said with a sneer.

The head of the Shunde district investigation department, which has jurisdiction over Sanzhou, declined to comment, directing inquiries to the Guangdong provincial propaganda department. Officials there, who according to local reporters have banned reporting on Sanzhou's riot, said they had no information.

Since January, villagers have blocked the bridge-building project, which stands unfinished in the form of two concrete blocks baking under the heavy southern China sun. Many farmers and their wives have sat daily under a tent-like shelter to prevent bulldozers from returning. Banners have been stretched across the tent proclaiming the farmers will not move until they get adequate compensation for their land.

Protest leaders heard earlier this month that a real-estate developer was about to turn over to buyers possession of apartments in a building constructed on another slice of the confiscated land. The developer, they said, sent two dozen private guards in civilian clothes to protect a little sales office on June 11. By June 13, the number had risen to more than 200, they said. Villagers called local police to intervene against the tough-looking outsiders, they said, but got no response.

As the confrontation grew, a number of villagers moved on the apartment building and, threatening to beat them, drove away workers putting on the final touches. The guards counterattacked, and the fight was on. Villagers said they rang gongs, raising the alarm, and by the end of the day 10,000 local farmers and their families were on the scene.

They attacked the sales office, breaking windows and driving away saleswomen. Some used bottles of sulfuric acid to scare off the security guards, they acknowledged, and many swung sticks and threw stones, forcing the guards to take shelter inside the sales office behind locked doors.

Several local officials who showed up to calm the situation were prevented from leaving, the villagers said, and were held all night and into the next afternoon before the bargain was reached.

As part of the deal, the villagers were to negotiate with the developer, who promised to stop construction pending an agreement on compensation. The developer insisted, however, that the level of compensation was a matter between the farmers and the village committee. But the village leadership has refused to meet, protest leaders said, and the local party secretary has dropped out of sight.

"It's been a long time since we saw him," one peasant activist said.

Taiwan's President, Mired In Scandals, Survives Recall Vote (WP)

By Jane Rickards

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

TAIPEI, Taiwan, June 27 -- President Chen Shui-bian easily survived a recall vote in Taiwan's legislature Tuesday but remained mired in scandals that have undermined his leadership and touched off a rancorous political struggle.

The recall motion, brought by the opposition Nationalist Party, was backed by 119 of the legislature's 221 members, well below the two-thirds majority needed to force a referendum.

Unless new irregularities are uncovered, Chen is now expected to remain in power for the last two years of his second four-year term. But he has been weakened by charges that his family and aides were involved in under-the-table deals, and buffeted by the political storm those charges have generated. As a result, Taiwanese politics appeared headed for a period of instability that is likely to overshadow relations with China and perhaps brake Chen's attempts to push the self-ruled island toward formal independence.

James Soong of the opposition People First Party, which is allied with the Nationalists, said after the vote that he intended to pursue the effort to oust Chen with a no-confidence vote against the government, headed by Premier Su Tseng-chang of Chen's Democratic Progressive Party. The Nationalist leader, Ma Ying-jeou, appeared less certain about the effort but did not rule it out.

A no-confidence motion would require only a simple majority, and Tuesday's vote indicated that was within reach. If Su were to lose a no-confidence motion, Chen would be forced to choose between calling new legislative elections or having Su resign. Neither would be appealing to Chen and his partisans, who see Su as a possible presidential candidate.

Chen said in a statement that he would respect the outcome of judicial probes focused on his family. But he urged Taiwanese to put the political conflicts behind them and offered to enter into peace talks with China.

"Aside from deep self-reflection and examination, I hope even more to promote political negotiations domestically and cross-strait peace talks," he said.

China has refused to deal with Chen, an ardent champion of formal independence for Taiwan, and Chen did not say what he would do to change that. As for healing the political rifts within Taiwan, opposition leaders appeared intent instead on making Chen pay the full price for the alleged irregularities by his family and aides, particularly with presidential elections on the horizon in 2008.

Ma, the likely Nationalist Party candidate in 2008, acknowledged that the recall had failed but claimed a small victory, saying no one cast a vote against the motion. The 88 legislators from Chen's Democratic Progressive Party boycotted the proceedings, which were held as 5,000 police officers and hundreds of soldiers manned barricades outside the legislature to prevent violence among opposing camps of demonstrators.

The motion to oust Chen was launched after his son-in-law, Chao Chien-ming, was arrested on suspicion of insider trading last month. Prosecutors also have begun an investigation into allegations that Chen's wife, Wu Shu-chen, accepted millions of Taiwan dollars in gift vouchers in exchange for using her influence in a department store takeover. Also, a top presidential aide, Chen Tse-nan, was arrested in connection with financial irregularities in construction of a high-speed railway.

The charges deepened political divisions in Taiwan and added to accusations that Chen's leadership was erratic and unnecessarily provocative to Beijing. In particular, Nationalists sharply criticized his decision in February to abolish the National Unification Council, established in 1990 as a display of willingness to eventually reunite with the mainland.

President Chen Shui-bian easily survived a recall motion brought by the opposition Nationalist Party over corruption allegations involving his family. Just 119 lawmakers in the 221-member legislature voted for the measure — more than half but well below the two-thirds majority, or 148 votes, needed to pass the motion and put the recall question to the electorate in a referendum. Mr. Chen's Democratic Progressive Party boycotted the vote.

Groups Promise Big Fight Over Oman Trade Deal (RC)

By Kate Ackley

Roll Call, June 28, 2006

Groups for and against a Bush administration free-trade agreement with the Persian Gulf nation of Oman are stepping up their lobbying efforts, promising to fight just as hard as they did in last summer's bitter battle over the Central American Free Trade Agreement.

The Senate Finance Committee today will consider legislation to approve the deal crafted by the Bush administration. On Thursday, Ways and Means will do the same.

Both sides say the stakes are higher than they ordinarily might be because this is an election year.

Larry Weiss, executive director for the Citizens Trade Campaign, helped organize a Capitol Hill event Tuesday at which House Democrats blasted the agreement with Oman. Citizens Trade Campaign, whose members include unions and environmentalists, has been working to scuttle the pact, which can only be approved or rejected, not changed, by Congress.

"We have a field operation going across much of the country," Weiss said. "Many organizations are calling, writing and otherwise talking to their Members of Congress." The event Tuesday, he said, was "to show Congress the breadth of the opposition."

Weiss said the administration and business interests that favor the Oman agreement had expected it to sail through Congress, in part because Oman is such a small country and thus accounts for a tiny fraction of U.S. imports, and in part because of fatigue over last year's CAFTA fight.

"In the wake of the CAFTA vote, a lot of Members and organizations are just standing up and saying, 'Until you change the model of NAFTA/CAFTA, we are going to oppose these things," said Peter Chandler, chief of staff to Rep. Mike Michaud (D-Maine). Michaud took part in the Tuesday gathering, at which Citizens Trade Campaign released a letter signed by more than 400 groups that oppose the agreement with Oman.

Opponents of the pact say Oman's labor and environmental standards are abysmal.

Chuck Dittrich, vice president of regional trade initiatives for the National Foreign Trade Council, helps manage the U.S. Middle East Free Trade Coalition, a group of businesses that wants the Oman agreement to pass.

"As far as free-trade agreements go, this one is high quality," he said. The Omani government has made great strides in labor laws, he said.

"If this Congress sends a message that Oman — which has come so far in integrating into the global economy through this free-trade agreement process — is not supported, then I think all of our trading partners are going to look at this very seriously. And it's going to send a chill through the bilateral process and also the Doha round," Dittrich said.

Nicole Venable, director of international trade and global competitiveness at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, said her side is urging Members to stand back and look at the strategic role that Oman plays in the Gulf region and, in particular, the fight against terrorism.

"Members have to recognize that other Gulf countries are looking at this process," she said.

But while the pro-agreement side argues that Oman is a key strategic Middle East ally, especially in the war on terror, opponents counter that the trade agreement could hinder Congressional intervention when it comes to potential national security matters.

Weiss said that if the United States had made a similar agreement with the United Arab Emirates when the Dubai ports controversy emerged earlier this year, then Congress would have had a much harder time killing the deal.

"Congress could not have simply called that deal off," Weiss said. "So if something similar could happen with an Omani company, we are ill-served security-wise by the provisions of this deal."

Thea Lee, policy director at the AFL-CIO, said Oman does not have a history or tradition of free association or labor organizing. Lee said even though Oman's government has reformed its labor laws, "this is really a very primitive step along the way. This is the country with the worst labor laws of any country we're negotiating a free-trade agreement."

DOJ_NMG_0037148

Added Weiss: “It’s going to be like CAFTA all over again, and closer to an election. There’s an awful lot of districts where Members took votes in favor of CAFTA that they did not want to take. Do Members really want to tell people in their districts, ‘Yep, we voted to send more jobs away’?”

Failure Of Geneva Talks Would Not Scupper WTO Round: US (AFP)

By Charlotte Raab

AFP, June 28, 2006

The United States voiced optimism that struggling global trade negotiations would eventually succeed, even if a crucial WTO meeting in Switzerland this week fails.

"We're going to try to get this done as soon as we can, rather than say if we don't get it done by the weekend it won't happen," US Trade Representative Susan Schwab said several hours before her departure for Geneva, after a meeting with US lawmakers.

"We can't be stampeded into an agreement just for a deadline," she said at a news briefing.

"We want to stick to deadlines, deadlines are important, but deadlines in and of themselves are not going to create a good agreement," she said.

"We need to negotiate a good agreement."

The World Trade Organization opens a meeting Thursday to try to save four and a half years of negotiations aimed at liberalizing trade in a way to help developing countries.

WTO Director General Pascal Lamy has set an end-of-June deadline for countries meeting in Geneva to agree on basic formulas for cutting farm subsidies and reducing agricultural and manufacturing tariffs.

Many observers see the meeting as a last-ditch attempt to revitalize the stalled Doha Development Round, which was supposed to have been completed two years ago.

The WTO's 149 divided members, who have repeatedly missed their targets for a deal, are under mounting pressure to complete the round by a December 2006 deadline fixed during a conference in Hong Kong last year.

The United States may hold the key to achieving a global trade accord but appears unwilling to make concessions, amid pressure from skeptical lawmakers and powerful farm lobbies.

Adding to the pressures on trade negotiators is the expiration of a special US trade tool a year from now.

On July 1, 2007, the government of the world's most powerful trading nation is due to lose its special authority from lawmakers to fast-track trade deals, which could hamper the WTO negotiations if they overrun the year-end deadline.

Under fast track, the US Congress is entitled to approve or reject trade deals but cannot amend them.

"There's no US trade representative who'd ever tell you that he or she doesn't want" the fast-track authority, Schwab said. But, "would you bet a whole deal on it? No."

"We are eager for a comprehensive agreement, and determined to craft an agreement that is good for American workers and manufacturers, good for the service provider, and good for our farmers and ranchers," she said.

Republican lawmaker Bob Goodlatte said it was important to continue fast-track authority, "whether we reach an agreement or not."

Schwab reiterated the US trade position, recalling an October offer to cut direct aid to agriculture by 60 percent was still available, on condition US trading partners further opened their markets and lower their customs tariffs on US exports.

US farm aid amounted to 150 billion dollars between 1995 and 2005.

"We made it clear last fall that our proposal was not a take-it-or-leave-it offer, however it was contingent on receiving meaningful offers from our trading partners that match our level of ambition on agricultural market access," she said.

"We have yet to receive such offers."

US Lawmakers Prefer No Deal To Bad Deal In Trade Talks (AP)

AP, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP)--U.S. lawmakers said Tuesday they would rather have no deal than a bad deal when global trade talks commence this week in Geneva.

DOJ_NMG_0037149

Congress won't support concessions beyond the existing offer from the U.S. to cut farm subsidies, said the House Agriculture Committee chairman, Rep. Bob Goodlatte, R-Va.

"No other country has introduced a proposal that even comes close to the U.S. proposal," Goodlatte said. "Now, we are being called on to give even more and receive less."

He and other lawmakers appeared at a news conference with U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab and Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, two senior negotiators in the World Trade Organization talks.

"We have no intention of settling for something less," Schwab said.

Schwab and Johanns are headed to Geneva, where negotiations begin Thursday on trade in goods from farms and factories. Countries then face an end-of-July deadline to agree on a framework for a new global trade treaty.

Without a breakthrough on the complex agriculture and manufacturing issues, it will be difficult to address other important issues, such as services, Schwab said.

The Cry Of The Wild (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

Puerto MALDONADO, Peru

The most memorable thing about the Amazonian rain forest isn't the sights. It's the sounds.

Lying awake at night inside a mosquito net at the Tambopata Research Center in the Peruvian Amazon, you hear a symphony playing in the rain forest outside. It sounds like one of those dissonant pieces of modern music: a cacophony of birds, red howler monkeys, wild pigs, frogs, macaws and insects making bizarre clicks, snorts, croaks, chirps, wails and whistles that sound like car alarms, strange doorbell chimes and an orchestral wind section that has lost its music but is playing on anyway. Occasionally, this symphony gets punctuated by the shrill, desperate scream of a human species, who has just encountered a spider in her toilet.

This Amazon rain forest in southeastern Peru is a largely uninhabited wilderness that is home to some of the planet's most endangered wildlife, and one of the world's largest macaw clay licks — a cliff of red clay, where blue, red and gold macaws flock for a dirt breakfast every morning.

Look down in the rain forest and you might see a hunting wasp stinging a caterpillar and depositing its eggs inside. Or, look up in the verdant canopy and you see the hanging nest of Oro Pendula weaver birds. You will notice, though, that the Oro Pendula have located their nest on a branch right next to a large white wasp's nest. Why? So if any predators try to attack the birds they will also rile the wasps — an ingenious natural security system.

But today it's all endangered by what Tim Killeen, a senior biologist and researcher at Conservation International, identifies as three converging forces: rising commodity prices driven by rapid growth in China, plans by leaders in South America to integrate their infrastructure and highways to create a continental economy — which will spark human migration into areas that are important for biodiversity — and some new climate models that predict that global warming could make the Amazon so hot and dry that within a century it could mutate from a rain forest into a savannah.

If all of these trends converge, argues Dr. Killeen, it will create a "perfect storm of environmental destruction that will degrade one of the last great tropical wilderness areas of the planet."

The danger signs abound: Sailing here up the Rio Tambopata on our riverboat, we saw gold miners using big motorized barges and mercury to dredge and sift — and destroy — riverbanks in search of gold. With global gold prices soaring, the incentives to dredge the Tambopata are enormous. Some of the miners clear forests for camps and hunt rare animals for food.

Meanwhile, the Interoceanic Highway, running from the Atlantic coast of Brazil to the Pacific coast of Peru, appears to be heading for completion. More roads lead to more agriculture, logging, mining and oil and gas extraction, which converts more forests to cropland, which releases more climate-changing greenhouse gases.

"The Peruvian government has good policies, but it doesn't have the means to enforce them, and there is huge corruption," explained Diego Shoobridge, director of ParksWatch Peru. The road from Brazil through Peru already exists, "but now they are going to pave it," he added. "Once it is paved, all kinds of vehicles will come with Andean people, and they don't know the forests."

But protests by do-gooders will not stop these forces. It requires a grand strategy.

"We need to put in place a green infrastructure — a system of parks, territories controlled by indigenous communities, land-use regulations, carbon credits for forest protection and green businesses, like eco-tourism — that will create a powerful green economic counterweight to the global economic forces driving deforestation," argued Glenn Prickett, a senior vice president at Conservation International and one of my traveling companions. (My wife is on the C.I. board.)

Indeed, just as the Oro Pendula learned to leverage the wasps' nest to naturally preserve their home, environmentalists have to leverage the riches of the rain forest to naturally preserve the rain forest. That means creating ways for the locals to thrive off it while also protecting it. But that's hard. It is easy to clear-cut a forest for roads or an oil well. It's hard to develop shade-grown coffee or eco-tourism or a Brazil nut factory or a palm tree oil business. But without profitable eco-friendly business alternatives — to counter the eco-hostile ones — the economic predators of this rain forest will eventually have their day.

TERRORISM NEWS:

US A-G Warns Of 'home-grown Terror' (JERP)

By Dan Izenberg

The Jerusalem Post, June 28, 2006

US Attorney-General Alberto Gonzales on Tuesday warned that the war against terrorism was evolving and that a new threat was in the making from homegrown terrorism, which was sometimes harder to defend against than international terrorism.

"They [home-grown terrorists] are much more difficult to find because they exist in our communities," said Gonzales in a speech at Tel Aviv University's Jaffe Center for Strategic Studies, during a short visit to Israel which was due to end Wednesday. "This is presenting additional challenges for us that we are now beginning to focus on."

Asked whether he thought the war against terrorism was succeeding, Gonzales replied, "The US and other countries, like Israel are safer today. [But] we are not safe."

Gonzales singled out US-Israel collaboration in combatting terrorism. "We are working closing in the war on terror," he said.

Gonzales that the improvement in US security was due to the establishment of the Homeland Security Department, new legislation such as the Patriot Act, the war against terrorism in Afghanistan and Iraq and strong international cooperation among law enforcement agencies, which he described as "fantastic."

Still, he said, he constantly reads intelligence reports about terrorist threats to the US and other countries, including Israel. "I sometimes wonder when it this ever going to stop," he added. "And it may not stop for a while."

Gonzales refused to say whether or not the Bush administration was seriously considering closing the prison facility at Guantanamo Bay. In the meantime, the US government is awaiting a Supreme Court ruling on a petition challenging the commissions established by the government to try some of the detainees imprisoned at the US facility.

Gonzales said the US had already released more than 300 detainees arrested since January 2002. He added that one of the problems preventing more detainees from being set free was that no country wanted to take them, and they would be in danger if they returned to their native countries. He gave an example of 16 Chinese detainees that the US did not want to repatriate for fear they would be tortured by Chinese authorities.

Human rights groups in the US have charged that many of the detainees at Guantanamo have been tortured or treated in a cruel, inhumane and degrading manner and in violation of international human rights law.

According to Gonzales, prisoners at Guantanamo receive "top-notch medical care, they receive good food, and good facilities."

Gonzales was also asked why the US refused to join the International Criminal Court, which was established to try alleged war criminals. He replied that the US had more at stake than other countries because it had more troops serving around the world and therefore the risk of indictments against US personnel was greater.

"No country would enter into an agreement that is contrary to their interests," he said. "Why would a country do that?"

Gonzales devoted the formal part of his address to the need for international cooperation in the fight against other transnational crimes in addition to terrorism, such as cyber crimes, drug trafficking, trafficking in humans and child pornography.

GOP Bill Targets NY Times (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor And Jonathan Allen

The Hill, June 28, 2006

House Republican leaders are expected to introduce a resolution today condemning The New York Times for publishing a story last week that exposed government monitoring of banking records.

The resolution is expected to condemn the leak and publication of classified documents, said one Republican aide with knowledge of the impending legislation.

The resolution comes as Republicans from the president on down condemn media organizations for reporting on the secret government program that tracked financial records overseas through the Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunications (SWIFT), an international banking cooperative.

Rep. J.D. Hayworth (R-Ariz.), working independently from his leadership, began circulating a letter to House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) during a late series of votes yesterday asking his leaders to revoke the Times's congressional press credentials.

The Standing Committee decides which organizations and reporters can be accredited, according to the rules of both the House and Senate press galleries. Members of that committee are elected by accredited members of those galleries.

"Under no circumstances would we revoke anyone's credentials simply because a government official is unhappy with what that correspondent's newspaper has written," said Susan Milligan, a reporter for the Boston Globe, which is owned by the Times, who also serves the standing chairwoman of the Standing Committee of Correspondents. "The rules say nothing about the stories a newspaper chooses to pursue, or the reaction those stories provoke. The Times clearly meets our standards for credentials."

The Times, the Los Angeles Times and the Wall Street Journal all reported the existence of the program on their websites last Thursday.

President Bush criticized the reports during a press event Monday, calling the disclosure "disgraceful" and a "great harm" to national security. Vice President Dick Cheney, who voiced support for the program over the weekend, followed Bush's criticism with harsh words of his own.

In an open letter responding to these criticisms, Times Executive Editor Bill Keller wrote that a free press was the key check on government's abuse of power.

GOP Measure Slams NYT For Bank Story (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, June 28, 2006

The House will vote today on a hastily written resolution that is expected to criticize The New York Times for its recent disclosure of the government's secret use of information from a massive international finance network to fight terrorism.

At press time Tuesday, the resolution was still being drafted by a handful of different committees under the direction of Majority Leader John Boehner's (R-Ohio) office. Republican sources said they expected the finished product would condemn both the leaking of the law enforcement program and its publication by the Times and a handful of other newspapers.

A House vote would mark only the latest Republican offensive against last week's story, which detailed the Treasury Department's use of information from the Brussels-based Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication.

The White House lobbied the Times and other newspapers not to publish their stories, and the administration has been vocal in its criticism since they appeared in print.

President Bush himself said Monday that the disclosure "makes it harder to win this war on terror," and Vice President Cheney also joined the chorus of complaints.

House Homeland Security Chairman Peter King (R-N.Y.) has called for an "investigation and prosecution" of the Times, and other Republicans have used similarly harsh language, making it likely that the vast majority of Republicans will vote for today's resolution.

What is less clear is how House Democrats will react. Both Democratic leaders and rank-and-file lawmakers have complained in the past about the administration's conduct of the war on terrorism, particularly after The New York Times disclosed last year that the National Security Agency was listening to some domestic phone calls without a warrant.

But in the case of the SWIFT story, most Democratic leaders have been noticeably silent. The administration even enlisted some Democrats, reportedly including Rep. John Murtha (Pa.) and ex-Rep. Lee Hamilton (Ind.), to try to lobby the Times not to publish its piece.

Senator Calls For Review Of Leaks Damage (AP-Y2)

The government should conduct an inquiry into damage done by the recent disclosures of intelligence programs aimed at stopping terrorists, the Senate Intelligence Committee chairman said Tuesday.

"We cannot continue to operate in a system where the government takes steps to counter terrorism while the media actively works to disclose those operations without any regard for protection of lives, sources and legal methods," said Sen. Pat Roberts (news, bio, voting record), R-Kan., who as intelligence chairman has been briefed extensively on the efforts.

In a letter, Roberts asked National Intelligence Director John Negroponte to order an assessment of damage caused by the disclosure of the government's most classified programs. He said he was particularly interested in the impact of stories on the Bush administration's warrantless surveillance program and its program to monitor terror finances.

Administration officials have publicly confirmed both programs.

In December, President Bush acknowledged the National Security Agency's program to monitor the international communications of people on U.S. soil when terrorism was suspected. In a departure from past practice, no court approval was deemed necessary.

Last week, senior administration officials also confirmed that the Treasury Department and CIA were using administrative subpoenas to pull information from an extensive financial database, called Swift. The Brussels, Belgium-based system captures information on money moved in more than 200 countries.

The New York Times broke the NSA story and was one of three newspapers to lead the coverage on the terror-financing program. Said Roberts: "The New York Times has the right to print what it sees fit to print. But, just because you can, doesn't mean you should."

Damage Study Urged On Surveillance Reports (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 27 — Senator Pat Roberts, the chairman of the Senate intelligence committee, asked the director of national intelligence on Tuesday to assess any damage to American counterterrorism efforts caused by the disclosure of secret programs to monitor telephone calls and financial transactions.

Mr. Roberts, Republican of Kansas, singled out The New York Times for an article last week that reported that the government was tracking money transfers handled by a banking consortium based in Belgium. The targeting of the financial data, which includes some Americans' transactions, was also reported Thursday by The Los Angeles Times and The Wall Street Journal.

In his letter to John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence, Mr. Roberts wrote that "we have been unable to persuade the media to act responsibly and to protect the means by which we protect this nation."

He asked for a formal evaluation of damage to intelligence collection resulting from the revelation of the secret financial monitoring as well as The Times's disclosure in December of the National Security Agency's monitoring of phone calls and e-mail messages of Americans suspected of having links to Al Qaeda.

In London, meanwhile, a human rights group said Tuesday that it had filed complaints in 32 countries alleging that the banking consortium, known as Swift, violated European and Asian privacy laws by giving the United States access to its data.

Simon Davies, director of the group, Privacy International, said the scale of the American monitoring, involving millions of records, "places this disclosure in the realm of a fishing exercise rather than a legally authorized investigation."

The Belgian prime minister, Guy Verhofstadt, has asked the Justice Ministry to investigate whether Swift violated Belgian law by allowing the United States government access to its data.

The American Civil Liberties Union has condemned the program, and a Chicago lawyer, Steven E. Schwarz, filed a federal class-action lawsuit against Swift on Friday alleging that it had violated United States financial privacy statutes.

President Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, Treasury Secretary John W. Snow and numerous Republicans in Congress have vigorously defended the financial tracking program as legal and valuable and condemned its public disclosure. They have suggested that the articles might tip off terrorists that their money transfers could be detected. Representative J. D. Hayworth, Republican of Arizona, circulated a letter to colleagues on Tuesday asking that The Times's Congressional press credentials be suspended.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said any effort to measure damage to intelligence collection would take some time.

"It's not as if the terrorists are going to say, 'Oops! Going to stop doing that,' " Mr. Snow said at a briefing. "But I think it is safe to say that once you provide a piece of intelligence, people on the other side act on it."

The electronic messaging system operated by Swift, the Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication, routes nearly $6 trillion a day in transfers among nearly 8,000 financial institutions.

At a confirmation hearing on Tuesday for Henry M. Paulson Jr., the nominee for Treasury secretary, Senator Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana, asked whether the monitoring might violate the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable searches. "I think you'll agree that we could fight terrorism properly and adequately without having a police state in America," Mr. Baucus said.

Mr. Paulson did not express an opinion on the propriety of the Swift monitoring but pledged to study it. "I am going to, if confirmed, be all over it, make sure I learn everything there is to learn, make sure I understand the law thoroughly," he said.

Democratic staff members said they had pressed Treasury officials in recent days for a fuller accounting of which members of Congress were briefed on the program and whether notification requirements under the International Economic Emergency Powers Act, invoked by President Bush days after Sept. 11, were met.

Treasury officials have told Congressional staff members that they briefed the full intelligence committees of both houses about a month ago, after inquiries by The Times, according to one Democratic aide who spoke on condition of anonymity. Some members were told of the program several years ago, but the Treasury Department has not provided a list of who was informed when, the aide said.

Democrats said they hoped to get a clearer idea of the legal foundations for the program, how it was monitored, and how long it will be allowed to continue under the president's invocation of emergency powers.

Representative Carolyn B. Maloney, a New York Democrat who serves on the House financial services committee, said Tuesday: "The administration is basing its actions on a 1970's law that never envisioned a state of perpetual emergency. It wasn't meant to become the status quo. That is why Congress needs to look at its current use."

Victor Comras, a former State Department official who served on a United Nations counterterrorism advisory group, pointed out on The Counterterrorism Blog that a 2002 United Nations report had noted with approval that the United States was monitoring international financial systems.

While providing no details, the report mentioned Swift and similar organizations, saying "the United States has begun to apply new monitoring techniques to spot and verify suspicious transactions."

Inquiry Sought Into News Reports (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee on Tuesday asked for a formal investigation into whether national security had been damaged by recent news reports unearthing details of two controversial Bush administration anti-terrorism programs.

"Numerous recent unauthorized disclosures of sensitive intelligence programs have directly threatened important efforts in the war against terrorism," Sen. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) wrote in a letter to National Intelligence Director John D. Negroponte.

Roberts said he was particularly concerned with disclosures that the administration was monitoring phone calls and Internet traffic without a warrant and accessing an international database of bank transactions. "We have been unable to persuade the media to act responsibly and protect the means by which we protect this nation," he wrote.

The Los Angeles Times, the New York Times and the Wall Street Journal were the first to report last week on the banking program in which the Treasury Department has acquired a vast database of personal financial information from a little-known Brussels-based industry cooperative to track possible terrorist activity.

The warrantless surveillance program run by the National Security Agency was disclosed by the New York Times in December and has generated concern because it involves the tracking of international communications where one of the parties involved was in the United States.

Administration officials have confirmed the existence of both programs but have said the media disclosures have aided terrorist groups. President Bush and Vice President Cheney have criticized the revelations as disgraceful.

In an op-ed article Tuesday, Los Angeles Times Editor Dean Baquet wrote that the newspaper "very seriously" weighed the national security concerns, but decided to publish because "there is an intense and ongoing public debate about whether surveillance programs like these pose a serious threat to civil liberties."

Roberts has proposed tougher criminal penalties on those who disclose classified information. But the Kansas Republican — who worked as a reporter and editor for several Arizona newspapers after serving in the Marine Corps — said Tuesday that he did not think journalists should be prosecuted for publishing the information.

The administration indicated in a recent court case that journalists could be prosecuted for publishing classified information under espionage laws.

Negroponte's office said in a prepared statement that Roberts' request was being "reviewed."

"The Intelligence community takes extremely seriously any unauthorized disclosure of classified information," the statement said.

Negroponte has previously condemned such disclosures. He said in a speech in April that "any public disclosure of intelligence-related information is going to hurt us in one way or another."

The harm such revelations pose, he said, includes disclosing sources and methods of intelligence-gathering, and "prejudicing … very important liaison relationships that we have with other intelligence services around the world."

Civil Liberties Group Files Complaint In 17 Countries Against U.S. Mining Of Banking Data For Anti-terrorism Investigation (FINDLAW/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0037159

(AP) - LONDON-A civil liberties group on Wednesday asked governments around the world to block the release of confidential financial records to U.S. authorities as part of American anti-terrorist probes.

London-based watchdog Privacy International said it had filed complaints with data protection and privacy regulators in 17 countries, arguing that disclosures of financial transactions "were made without any legal basis or authority whatsoever."

The complaint, sent to regulators in 13 European countries as well as Canada, Australia, New Zealand and Hong Kong, asks authorities to "intervene to seek the immediate suspension of the disclosure program pending legal review."

The U.S. Treasury acknowledged on Friday that since the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks on the U.S., it has tracked millions of financial transactions handled by the Belgium-based Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication, or SWIFT.

SWIFT oversees about 11 million financial transactions a day among banks and financial institutions worldwide, recording customers' names, account numbers and other identifying information.

Privacy International's director, Simon Davies, said the secret CIA-Treasury program "shows yet again how the U.S. willfully disregards the privacy rights not only of its own citizens, but also the rights of foreign nationals."

U.S. President George W. Bush has condemned newspapers that broke the story of the program, saying the reports made it "harder to win the war on terror."

The European Union's executive branch, the European Commission, has said it has no powers to investigate whether privacy laws have been violated in the transfer of the records.

It said it was for individual national authorities to decide whether the searches were legal.

Patriotism And The Press (NYT)

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

Over the last year, The New York Times has twice published reports about secret antiterrorism programs being run by the Bush administration. Both times, critics have claimed that the paper was being unpatriotic or even aiding the terrorists. Some have even suggested that it should be indicted under the Espionage Act. There have been a handful of times in American history when the government has indeed tried to prosecute journalists for publishing things it preferred to keep quiet. None of them turned out well — from the Sedition Act of 1798 to the time when the government tried to enjoin The Times and The Washington Post from publishing the Pentagon Papers.

As most of our readers know, there is a large wall between the news and opinion operations of this paper, and we were not part of the news side's debates about whether to publish the latest story under contention — a report about how the government tracks international financial transfers through a banking consortium known as Swift in an effort to pinpoint terrorists. Bill Keller, the executive editor, spoke for the newsroom very clearly. Our own judgments about the uproar that has ensued would be no different if the other papers that published the story, including The Los Angeles Times and The Wall Street Journal, had acted alone.

The Swift story bears no resemblance to security breaches, like disclosure of troop locations, that would clearly compromise the immediate safety of specific individuals. Terrorist groups would have had to be fairly credulous not to suspect that they would be subject to scrutiny if they moved money around through international wire transfers. In fact, a United Nations group set up to monitor Al Qaeda and the Taliban after Sept. 11 recommended in 2002 that other countries should follow the United States' lead in monitoring suspicious transactions handled by Swift. The report is public and available on the United Nations Web site.

But any argument by the government that a story is too dangerous to publish has to be taken seriously. There have been times in this paper's history when editors have decided not to print something they knew. In some cases, like the Kennedy administration's plans for the disastrous Bay of Pigs invasion, it seems in hindsight that the editors were over-cautious. (Certainly President Kennedy thought so.) Most recently, The Times held its reporting about the government's secret antiterror wiretapping program for more than a year while it weighed administration objections.

Our news colleagues work under the assumption that they should let the people know anything important that the reporters learn, unless there is some grave and overriding reason for withholding the information. They try hard not to base those decisions on political calculations, like whether a story would help or hurt the administration. It is certainly unlikely that anyone who wanted to hurt the Bush administration politically would try to do so by writing about the government's extensive efforts to make it difficult for terrorists to wire large sums of money.

From our side of the news-opinion wall, the Swift story looks like part of an alarming pattern. Ever since Sept. 11, the Bush administration has taken the necessity of heightened vigilance against terrorism and turned it into a rationale for an extraordinarily powerful executive branch, exempt from the normal checks and balances of our system of government. It has created powerful new tools of surveillance and refused, almost as a matter of principle, to use normal procedures that would acknowledge that either Congress or the courts have an oversight role.

The Swift program, like the wiretapping program, has been under way for years with no restrictions except those that the executive branch chooses to impose on itself — or, in the case of Swift, that the banks themselves are able to demand. This seems to us very much the sort of thing the other branches of government, and the public, should be nervously aware of. We would have been very happy if Congressman Peter King, the Long Island Republican who has been so vocal in citing the Espionage Act, had been as aggressive in encouraging his colleagues to do the oversight job they were elected to do.

The United States will soon be marking the fifth anniversary of the war on terror. The country is in this for the long haul, and the fight has to be coupled with a commitment to individual liberties that define America's side in the battle. A half-century ago, the country endured a long period of amorphous, global vigilance against an enemy who was suspected of boring from within, and history suggests that under those conditions, it is easy to err on the side of security and secrecy. The free press has a central place in the Constitution because it can provide information the public needs to make things right again. Even if it runs the risk of being labeled unpatriotic in the process.

Suspect In Miami Terror Case Makes First Court Appearance (AP)

MIAMI - Stanley Grant Phanor, one of seven men suspected of seeking to blow up the Sears Tower and with help from al-Qaida, made his first appearance in court Tuesday but did not enter a plea.

Phanor and five other co-defendants will return to federal court before U.S. Magistrate Judge Ted Bandstra Friday in downtown Miami for a hearing on whether the men should remain in custody prior to trial, the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

The seventh man, Lyglenson Lemorin, was scheduled to appear Thursday in federal court in Atlanta.

Attorney Roderick Vereen was appointed to represent Phanor. A phone message left by The Associated Press for Vereen at his office Tuesday afternoon was not immediately returned.

The group of men were arrested June 22 when authorities busted their alleged hide-out in a Miami warehouse. They had no explosives and lacked adequate funding. Their only link to al-Qaida was through an FBI informant fronting as a member of the terrorist group, authorities said.

Federal prosecutors said the men took an oath to al-Qaida and plotted to create an "Islamic Army" bent on violence against the United States.

The five other men made their initial court appearance on Friday, but Phanor was being held in a county detention center on an unrelated charge and was not among them.

Phanor was being held on violation of probation, said Alicia Valle, a spokeswoman for the U.S Attorney's Office in Miami.

Court records show that Phanor was convicted of carrying a concealed firearm in 2002 and sentenced to two years' probation.

Relatives have described the defendants as deeply religious people who studied the Bible and took classes in Islam.

Phanor's father Joseph said his son went to classes on Islam with a friend but that he read the Bible at his father's house.

Phanor's brother Michael said his brother and the other men they were trying to do community service in the area where they grew up, studying martial arts to keep in shape and setting a good example for neighborhood kids.

Sears Tower May Not Have Been Terror Plot's Only Chicago Target (WLS-TV)

By Chuck Goudie

WLS-TV, June 28, 2006

June 27, 2006 - Seven people were arrested last week for allegedly plotting to blow up the Sears Tower in Chicago. ABC7's Investigative Team learned there was another Chicago target.

The Chicago native accused of plotting to wage Jihad on his home town wasn't going to stop at the Sears Tower, according to newly released federal documents obtained by the I-Team.

Authorities now say that Narseal "Brother Naz" Batiste was interested in taking down the tower and taking out federal agents who would investigate such an attack.

What Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez failed to mention last week was that government buildings outside south Florida were also in the group's gunsights.

Until federal court records obtained Tuesday revealed it, the Sears Tower appeared to be the only Chicago target of the accused terrorists.

But the nation's tallest building wasn't alone. The FBI in Chicago was also on the terrorists' hit list.

The second Chicago target is identified in this motion to deny bond for the accused terrorists. Federal prosecutors say they men planned to use explosives to destroy the offices of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Chicago and three other cities.

DOJ_NMG_0037161

Had the bombing plot actually been carried out in Chicago, the alleged terrorists might well have attacked the wrong building. For years the FBI's Chicago headquarters was located in the Dirksen Federal Building. It was in this South Dearborn Street highrise at the time the bomb plot was allegedly being engineered last winter.

The current FBI center in Chicago is on the west side as a standalone building that just began full operations three weeks ago with very little fanfare.

Authorities believe the Miami terror suspects-had their plan been executed-would have tried to attack the offices that are now empty in the Dirksen Building but will one day house federal prosecutors and US District court rooms.

Federal investigators said Tuesday night that Chicago terror suspect Narseal Batiste tried to recruit someone to travel to the Middle East on an Al Qaeda fundraising mission.

The newly released court documents reveal that Batiste wanted the emmissary to lobby Islamic extremists for money to fund the Sears Tower attack, the assault on the Chicago FBI and the other bombings.

According to prosecutors, that person did not go to the Middle East for Batiste but did go to the FBI about him.

Editorial: Sears Tower Threat Shows Terrorism A Serious Concern (ROCKRS)

Rockford (IL) Register Star, June 28, 2006

Did you hear the one about the terrorists who wanted to blow up the Sears Tower in Chicago but didn't think to ask the person they thought was their al-Qaida contact for explosives?

It's no joke. It happened and it shows that almost five years after the attacks of 9/11, efforts to combat terrorism must be taken seriously.

Some of our hearts skipped a beat when we heard seven men — five of them U.S. citizens — were arrested in Miami and charged with conspiracy to destroy the nation's tallest building and other buildings with the help of al-Qaida. It was frightening that terrorism could hit so close to home, about 90 miles east of Rockford.

Fortunately, the man the wannabe terrorists thought was from al-Qaida was a FBI informant.

"This group was more aspirational than operational," FBI Deputy Director John Pistole said.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales described the group as "homegrown terrorists" who "came to view their home country as the enemy" and said there was no immediate threat because the group failed to get explosives.

Perhaps the attorney general and the FBI downplayed the threat to keep Americans calm or perhaps the seven men were truly the bunglers they've been portrayed as, but they could have caused plenty of damage with the machine guns they did ask for.

Are the five citizens in that group much different than Timothy McVeigh or Terry Nichols, other "homegrown terrorists?" McVeigh and Nichols succeeded in their Oklahoma City bomb plot. If the seven wannabes had stumbled upon a real al-Qaida representative, the story may have ended differently.

Remember hijackers brought down the Twin Towers in New York with weapons no more sophisticated than box cutters.

People have dismissed the threat on Chicago because the seven men are perceived as goofballs who spent their time lifting weights and sharpening their martial-arts skills.

We need to remember that it doesn't take many men or women, or much brainpower, to destroy and kill.

The law-enforcement system prevented tragedy this time.

This episode, and the more than 400 arrests for domestic terrorism since 2001, show that the government is paying attention to threats real and perceived.

We should be thankful for that.

Big Talk, No Bullets (MH)

By Michael Putney

The Miami Herald, June 28, 2006

As Butch said to Sundance, "Who are these guys?" He was talking about the relentless posse that was able to track the romantic bank robbers through the Badlands. The relentless posse in our latest terrorism drama was made up of FBI agents, aided by local police, who tracked seven homegrown "terrorists" to a nondescript warehouse in the badlands of Liberty City.

The FBI acted on information provided by a confidential informant (CI) who, judging by the guarded comments of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Miami U.S. Attorney Alex Acosta, contacted the agency after hearing Narseal Batiste, the alleged ringleader, make admiring remarks about al Qaeda and violent ones about the U.S. government.

Until this is sorted out it's a good thing these guys are behind bars. People who reportedly swear allegiance to al Qaeda, vow to "levy war against the United States" and produce attacks "as good or greater than 9/11," as the indictment quotes them as saying, shouldn't be walking the streets. Or gathering late at night to do jumping jacks, push-ups and learn martial arts, as warehouse neighbors say they did.

But I can't help wondering if the Feds swooped in too soon and merely gathered up some "pathetic wannabes," as the editorial page of this paper called them. The Liberty City Seven may have said violent things, but they didn't commit violent acts. They pledged allegiance to al Qaeda (reportedly recorded on videotape), but I bet only to get the goodies and money the CI promised to supply. Because these guys had bupkus.

All the meetings between the mysterious CI and Batiste are apparently on audio or videotape. Defense attorneys will be chafing to hear and see them to determine if the CI was driving the conspiracy or just along for the ride. Either way they'll mount an entrapment defense, although those tapes will make it hard to prove that Batiste and the others weren't predisposed to commit the crimes they're accused of. Like blowing up the Miami Police Department building, some Metrorail stations, the FBI office in North Miami and the Sears Tower in Chicago.

Big talk, but these guys had no money, guns, bullets, bombs or explosives. They hadn't trained at al Qaeda camps in Afghanistan like the Buffalo Six, Yemenis who have pleaded guilty. Our guys were counting on the CI for cash, guns, boots, uniforms, bullet-proof vests, rental vans and, perhaps, motivation. By late May (the plot began last November), the indictment says, Batiste admitted his group was disorganized. The CI evidently pressed him to continue.

The group's plans were, as the attorney general conceded, "more aspirational than operational." The group members may have talked about violent acts, but never committed any. Their crime, if there was one, was conspiring to do so.

Enough for The Wall Street Journal to editorialize the day after the arrests that they should "serve as another wake-up call to the presence of a domestic threat from Islamic terror." True, that threat is real, but it's not clear that anyone but Narseal Batiste had read the Koran. And he reportedly belongs to a curious sect that embraces aspects of Christianity, Judaism and Islam. None of the conspirators, as far as we know, is an orthodox Muslim.

The indictment speaks of a plot to "kill all the devils we can." If those devils are white then it sounds more like racism than terrorism. These guys appear to be six poor, uneducated and disaffected day laborers who came under the spell of a forceful leader who also happened to sign their paychecks.

Ironically, on the day the Liberty City Seven were arrested, South Florida was celebrating the NBA champion Miami Heat, a team composed almost entirely of black men. Extremely talented and disciplined black men who earn unimaginable amounts of money for what they do. And yet neither money nor race mattered as our community turned out en masse to thank them and celebrate their victory.

My daily commute takes me home past a basketball court where black youths play. As the Heat moved through the playoffs and into the finals, the number of players kept growing. So, too, did kids making moves toward the basket that emulated Dwyane Wade. And you've no doubt noticed the number of white kids and adults around town wearing Heat jerseys with Wade's name and number. The Heat's "15 Strong" bring us together. The Liberty City Seven push us apart.

Anonymous Jury Sought For Trial Of Man Accused Of Funding Hamas (KCS)

By Jeff Coen

The Kansas City Star, June 28, 2006

CHICAGO - Federal prosecutors have asked a judge to seat an anonymous jury to hear the case of a Bridgeview, Ill., man accused of funding Palestinian terrorists.

Muhammad Salah and a co-defendant are to be tried this fall for allegedly taking part in a conspiracy to fund Hamas, which raises concerns for prospective jurors, the court filing states.

"The nature of the charges and the evidence supporting the charges are such as to place jurors in reasonable apprehension for their safety," the motion reads. The fact that the case has been highly publicized also could mean "the focus and work of the jurors may be interrupted by external influences or impeded by the specter of them," the document states.

The parties in the Salah case are expected to appear for a status hearing Wednesday before U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve. The judge already has indicated she might want thorough criminal background checks performed on each prospective juror.

A lawyer for Salah could not immediately be reached for comment Tuesday.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Reid Schar said the government believes having an anonymous panel is the best way to handle the case given the charges.

The motion calls for only the general area of residence of any juror to be made public, such as a Chicago neighborhood.

Anonymous juries are not unheard of in the federal system. In the 1990s, anonymous juries considered the fates of El Rukn gang members and mob boss Ernest Rocco Infelice. Around the country they have been used in cases related to terrorism as well, including that of Zacarias Moussaoui and those convicted in the 1998 embassy bombings in Africa.

An anonymous panel was chosen to hear the case against Unabomber Theodore Kaczynski before he eventually pleaded guilty.

Salah is expected to be tried in October.

High-profile Terror Arrests Yield Small Sentences (NBC)

NBC News, June 28, 2006

Average sentence for more than 200 convictions is just one year

June 27: Dozens have been arrested in the U.S., suspected of terrorist ties, but the offenses are typically small and the sentences short. Is the government crackdown working? NBC's Pete Williams reports.

WASHINGTON - It was a high-profile arrest after a big raid in Dec. 2001: A Chicago man accused of helping Osama bin Laden himself.

"It is chilling that the origins of al-Qaida were discovered in a charity claiming to do good," said former Attorney General John Ashcroft when the arrest was announced.

Story continues below ? advertisement

"[He was] accused of running a charity to raise money for terrorists, including al-Qaida," reported NBC's Ann Curry.

But what Enaam Arnaout eventually pleaded guilty to two years ago was a single charge of providing boots and uniforms to fighters in Bosnia and Chechnya.

Some legal experts accuse the Justice Department overselling the arrests cases as terrorism arrests, generating dramatic headlines that actually end very differently.

"Our approach tends to be, I think, prosecutions by press conferences," says Juliette Kayyem, an NBC terrorism analyst and a professor at Harvard University. "A lot is promised at the front end, and then when you actually get to the facts of the case, it tends to fall apart."

Sensitive to that criticism, the government is now defending its record.

Just last week, the Justice Department said 261 people have been convicted in terror-related prosecutions since 2001. Many were solid wins — Iyman Faris, who plotted to attack the Brooklyn Bridge, for example. Would-be shoe bomber Richard Reid, and Mohammed Babar, who admitted providing support for al-Qaida operations overseas.

But of the total 261 convictions, the average sentence is only around a year, from plea agreements, to charges like immigration or document fraud. And sometimes the threat may seem remote, as with the Lackawanna Six, the group in Buffalo, N.Y., convicted of getting terror training but never charged with planning any specific attack.

Even so, in a recent speech, the deputy attorney general said all are examples of a new approach — prevention through prosecution.

"We could await further action by these men and then arrest and prosecute them," says Paul McNulty, U.S. deputy attorney general, "or we could prosecute at the moment our investigation reveals both a risk to our national security and a violation of our nation's laws,"

And the government cites one other statistic: Since Sept. 11, 2001, no further terror attacks in the U.S.

Guantanamo Officials Say They Can't Stop All Suicides (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

GUANTANAMO BAY, Cuba — In the sharpening debate about whether suicides among detainees here are political statements or the actions of hopelessly depressed individuals, officials at the federal detention center outlined sweeping efforts to prevent them — but admitted nothing could stop the most determined prisoners.

Contraband sweeps and a security overhaul have turned up evidence of prisoners trying to open their veins with the metal mesh walls of their cells, hoarding prescription medicine — one prisoner stored 16 painkillers in his artificial leg — and waging hunger strikes.

Twenty detainees considered most likely to try suicide have been outfitted in bulky quilted "suicide smocks" to prevent hangings.

But some of the top officials at the detention center said that despite extensive effort, they could do little to stop detainees from doing themselves harm.

"It is not possible to make a detention facility or a prison suicide-proof if you have detainees or prisoners bent on suicide," said Navy Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris Jr., commander of the prison and its interrogations operation.

Harris and the top two healthcare professionals at the prison complex separately met with a handful of journalists spending the week in Guantanamo. Their accessibility reflected Harris' view of public scrutiny, which is more liberal than that of previous prison administrations.

The interviews, rare until the new administration arrived earlier this year, also seemed aimed at preparing the American public for continued detention and interrogation operations no matter what ruling is handed down by the U.S. Supreme Court on the legitimacy of a war-crimes tribunal set to begin prosecuting 10 prisoners charged with conspiracy.

In command here for less than three months, Harris has been confronted with two incidents of detainees overdosing on hoarded prescription medicines, an uprising at the communal-living camp for the most compliant prisoners, a hunger strike involving almost 90 men, and the apparently coordinated suicides on June 10 of two Saudis and a Yemeni prisoner.

Harris stood by his characterization of the suicides as acts of "asymmetrical warfare" by hardened holy warriors, a comment that provoked accusations of insensitivity by human rights advocates and civilian lawyers who say depression is widespread among the 450 detainees.

Harris suggested the prison guards and administrators had been lulled into believing many of the men had come to terms with their circumstances. Most prisoners had managed to get into the two most lenient detention sites, the barracks-like Camp 4 where detainees can congregate and play sports most of the day, and Camp 1, where more "comfort items" are available.

But it was at Camp 4 that detainees ambushed guards on May 18, setting off a clash that pitted prisoners armed with fan blades and broken light fixtures against soldiers who had to retreat and return with riot gear to quell the uprising. Two prisoners at Camp 1 had overdosed earlier that day, and three detainees there committed suicide a few weeks later.

"The campaign against us, the operations against us, are less about the length of their detention than about the effect they think they'll have," Harris said of recent incidents, rejecting the notion of Guantanamo critics that despair over indefinite detention was driving detainees to harm themselves.

President Bush and other administration officials have lately acknowledged the international diplomatic disaster created by the detentions and court operations here.

Bush told European allies at a summit in Vienna last week that he was waiting for the high court ruling, which could come as soon as today, to guide his decisions about the prison.

U.S. allies now understand that Washington is not resisting their calls for closing Guantanamo, said John Bellinger, State Department legal advisor, upon return from two weeks of meetings in Europe.

"We want to get out of the Guantanamo business while continuing to protect our interests," he said Monday. Those interests include preventing any released or transferred detainees from threatening U.S. security as well as ensuring the prisoners are not subjected to torture, abuse or execution in their home countries.

The suicide attempts and other acts of protest are seen by prison commanders as an effort to intensify outside pressure for Guantanamo's closure.

The Navy captain in charge of the prison hospital said everything that could have been done to identify potential suicides had been done. The three prisoners who hanged themselves had been through medical and psychological evaluations in the two weeks before their deaths because they had taken part in a hunger strike that began in late May. None showed signs of psychological distress — including the Saudi who had just ended a 180-day hunger strike during which he was repeatedly force-fed through a nasal tube.

"If you ask my opinion, I agree with the admiral that this was somewhat of a political statement," said the prison hospital commander, who under military policy cannot be further identified. Noting that it is impossible to know when a suicide bomber will be moved to act, he said, "I don't know if there's a medical way to pick up on that."

To avert future misuse of drugs, the prison medics have cut back significantly on the pills given out to detainees and stepped up monitoring of those medications still being issued, said the senior medical officer, a Navy commander.

A guard now accompanies each hospital corpsman on his medication rounds, twice checking detainees' hands and mouths to ensure that the pills have been swallowed, the commander said. The more potent medications are being administered in crushed or liquid form.

Several hoards of drugs have been found nonetheless, including the 16 painkillers discovered in the artificial leg.

Other measures imposed to deter suicides have included daily collection of bedsheets after the eight-hour sleep period and removal of clothing from any prisoner who shows signs of trying to shred it to make ligatures for hanging.

At least 20 detainees have been outfitted in the quilted suicide smocks that fasten at the sides and shoulders with Velcro hook and loop fasteners and are made of a tightly woven, ripstop vinyl. New mattresses covered in sturdier, plastic-coated fabric that can't be torn or used to hide pills or weapons also have been put in the cells.

Official: Gitmo Prisoners Waging "Jihad" (AP)

By Stevenson Jacobs
AP, June 28, 2006

Guantanamo Bay detainees are staging suicide attempts and hunger strikes to undermine American policy in the war on terror, a senior U.S. military official said, calling the acts a "jihad" against the United States.

"The detainees view this as a struggle. They view this as a jihad ... They're trying to figure out ways that they can continue the fight," Navy Rear Adm. Harry Harris, the commander of the U.S. prison on Cuba's southeastern tip. "They do that with hunger strikes, overdosing on medicines. And now they've succeeded in killing themselves."

Three detainees — two Saudis and a Yemeni — committed suicide in their cells on June 10. The U.S. military said the men hanged themselves by fashioning nooses from bed sheets. Harris said the deaths and other suicide attempts were coordinated acts of resistance — not acts of desperation prompted by their indefinite detention.

"I think it is less about the length of their detention ... It's less about that and it's more that they continue to fight their fight," Harris told reporters, adding that defiance in the prison was widespread. "I think the vast majority of detainees are resisting us."

President Bush has said he wants to close the detention center but is seeking guidance from the nation's top court on the matter. The U.S. Supreme Court could rule as early as Wednesday on the legitimacy of military tribunals ordered by Bush, the first such trials since World War II.

Harris, who took over command at Guantanamo on March 31, said he believed a ruling by the court wouldn't affect operations at the prison, which he said served a vital role in the U.S.-led war on terror.

"Given the battle that we're fighting as a nation, I believe there is a need for places like Guantanamo," Harris said.

The suicides of the three detainees prompted renewed calls from European countries and human rights groups to close Guantanamo, which holds about 450 men on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

A spokesman for Boston-based Physicians for Human Rights said that whether the suicides were a political act or the product of desperation does not change "the fact that U.S. detention and interrogation practices have violated basic tenets" of the Geneva Conventions and the McCain Amendment, which prohibits torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of prisoners.

"Regardless of the motivation that caused the three detainees at Guantanamo to commit suicide, those being held without charge are still entitled to due process and to receive treatment that is in accordance with basic human rights standards," said spokesman Nathaniel A. Raymond from Boston.

A military doctor at the prison said the three detainees received psychological exams only days prior to their suicides and showed no signs of being depressed. He spoke on condition of anonymity to protect his personal safety.

The doctor suggested the exams, performed by mental health professionals one to two weeks before the suicides, supported assertions by military officials that the prisoners killed themselves as a political act — not because they were despondent about their prolonged detention.

"None had showed any signs of being depressed or having a mental condition," said the doctor, who is the medical officer in charge of the prison. He said medical personnel examined the detainees some 10 minutes after they were found and "did everything we could" to revive them, including using defibrillators.

Since the deaths, the military has implemented strict measures to guard against future suicides, including only giving out bed sheets and blankets during sleeping hours and monitoring detainees in their cells every three minutes.

Officials have also lowered the threshold to determine when a detainee is at risk of being suicidal, the doctor said. Now, any detainee thought to be a suicide risk is placed in a tear-proof anti-suicide smock — which can't be fashioned into a makeshift noose — for 72 hours and given a psychological exam, he said.

There are currently about 20 detainees in green anti-suicide smocks, the doctor said.

The doctor said there have been no suicide attempts since the June 10 suicides, but there have been several incidents of detainees harming themselves, such as cutting themselves with paint chips or beating their heads against walls.

Associated Press writer David McFadden contributed to this report from San Juan, Puerto Rico.

EU Official: Suspects Were Handed To U.S. (USAT)

USA Today, June 28, 2006

Terrorism suspects have been transferred to U.S. intelligence agents in Europe, but it's not clear whether the moves were illegal, the European Union's top justice official said Tuesday. Justice and Home Affairs Commissioner Franco Frattini said it also isn't clear whether governments knew about or cooperated in the transfers.

Frattini spoke after Europe's leading human rights watchdog, the Council of Europe, voted to continue its inquiry into alleged CIA flights and secret prisons in Europe. The council's lead investigator, Dick Marty of Switzerland, has complained that European governments weren't eager to help him establish the facts.

Pakistani Foreign Minister Khursheed Kasuri challenged Afghanistan to identify terrorist hide-outs that Afghan President Hamid Karzai alleges are in Pakistan.

"We promise to investigate and take action," Kasuri told U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in Islamabad at a meeting with President Pervez Musharraf. Rice meets today with Karzai. "We have two good friends and two fierce fighters in the war on terror," she said.

Nine people were convicted in Denmark of murder or of being accessories in the "honor killing" Sept. 23 of a woman shot by her brother because her Pakistani family disapproved of her husband. Ghazala Khan, 19, was killed in Slagelse two days after her wedding. Her husband, Emal Khan, was shot twice but survived. Akthar Abbas was convicted of murder. His father, Ghulum Abbas, was convicted of incitement to murder and masterminding the plot. They face 16 years in prison. The others, all relatives or friends, face lesser terms.

Three decades after the communist north won the Vietnam War and unified the country, reformers from the more open and industrious south were named prime minister and president.

The National Assembly elected Nguyen Tan Dung, 56, as the youngest prime minister since reunification in 1975. Nguyen Minh Triet, 63, the Communist Party chief of Ho Chi Minh City, formerly Saigon, was elected president. Both were unopposed. Vietnam moved toward a market economy in the mid-1980s, and foreign investment and trade have exploded recently.

Three British bankers lost their last chance to avoid extradition to the USA on wire-fraud charges in the collapse of energy giant Enron.

The European Court of Human Rights rejected the appeal of David Bermingham, Gary Mulgrew and Giles Darby. The three former executives at Greenwich NatWest, part of Royal Bank of Scotland Group, have until July 17 to leave Britain for Texas, where Enron is based. They've said any trial should be in Britain because that's where most of the offenses allegedly occurred.

Britain: 2 More Terrorism Arrests (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

The police arrested two people under terrorism legislation in Bolton, outside of Manchester, in the latest in a series of antiterrorism raids — some linked, some independent — across England in the last few weeks. The two suspects, who have not been formally charged, were taken into custody in the aftermath of a search of eight properties in order to target "individuals suspected of possession of information that could be used for a terrorism purpose," a police spokesman said. The spokesman said the operation was not linked to other antiterrorism investigations in London and elsewhere.

State Dept. Urges Libya To Pay Families (AP)

AP, June 27, 2006

The State Department urged Libya on Tuesday to provide fair compensation to the families of victims in the 1988 bombing of a Pan Am flight over Scotland.

"Obviously, we support justice for the Pan Am 103 families, and we support their efforts to receive due compensation," deputy spokesman Adam Ereli said.

According to published reports, Libya has concluded it no longer has a legal obligation to make final payments of $2 million to each of the families of those killed in the attack.

Libya has accepted repsonsibility for the bombing and agreed to pay compensation to the families of the 270 victims. Part of the $2.7 billion has been paid. A final $2 million installment to each family is outstanding.

On Wednesday, Libya is due to be removed formally from the State Department's list of countries that sponsor terror. The payments arrangement and Libya's renunciation of weapons programs spurred good relations with the United States.

"We are actively involved in encouraging the Libyan government to extend escrow arrangements made under the settlement so that the final payment can be effected," Ereli said.

"In this matter, we want to see it resolved fairly," the U.S. official said.

Libya Says It Needn't Finish Payments To Flight 103 Victims' Families (WP)

By Bradley Graham

The Washington Post, June 27, 2006

Libya declared yesterday that it no longer has a legal obligation to make final payments of $2 million to each of the families of those killed in the bombing of a Pan Am flight in 1988, saying the agreement calling for the payments had expired. But it left open the possibility that it still might turn over the money.

DOJ_NMG_0037167

Under international pressure, Libya took responsibility four years ago for the attack on Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, and agreed to pay as much as $10 million in three installments to each of the families of the 270 dead. The payments were linked to a series of conditions aimed at easing restrictions on the government of Moammar Gaddafi.

The first installment of $4 million came when the United Nations ended its sanctions, and a second $4 million followed the lifting of some U.S. sanctions. A third and final payment was due if the United States removed Libya from the list of nations sponsoring terrorism -- a move decided last month and scheduled to take effect Thursday.

But in a statement yesterday, the Libyan legal team handling the case said the deadline in the original agreement for dropping Libya from the list had passed at the end of 2004, after several extensions. Consequently, the statement said, the escrow account set up to hold the money for the final payments was dissolved early last year and the funds returned.

At the same time, the statement created a measure of ambiguity about Libya's intentions by stopping short of saying that Tripoli would refuse to make the last payments.

In recent talks with lawyers representing the victims' families, the Libyan legal team indicated that opposition to making the final payments exists within the Gaddafi government. But James P. Kreindler, a lead U.S. lawyer in the case, said the absence of an explicit rejection in yesterday's statement leaves the door open for Libya to meet its initial financial commitment, a view shared by some State Department officials who are following the case.

"I believe that Libya will do the right thing and make the last payment," Kreindler said in a telephone interview. "But we haven't gotten confirmation of that."

Speculation about Libya's motives in issuing yesterday's statement centered on the possibility that the government simply wanted to assert its legal rights and rebut allegations that it has not acted in good faith in the settlement.

U.S. lawyers have argued that Libya remains obligated to pay the third installment, regardless of whether the escrow account expired. But Libyan authorities have insisted they are no longer bound by the original agreement.

Apart from the legal arguments, U.S. representatives have urged the Libyans to follow through on their initial commitment as a matter of smart politics. Libya has been enjoying an end to two decades of international isolation as a result of its willingness to accept responsibility for the plane attack and its subsequent decision in 2003 to abandon its nuclear, chemical and biological weapons programs after secret negotiations with U.S. and British officials.

Calls to Libyan officials in Washington yesterday were not returned.

In the event no further payments are forthcoming after Thursday, Kreindler said, the victims' families would probably take legal action against Libya in federal court in New York.

"We would argue there's been a breach of the good-faith provision," he said. "But letting this drag out for another two or three years is not good for anyone. "

Reflecting strong congressional sentiment to compel the final payments, some House members are backing a proposed amendment to the State Department's appropriations bill that would block funds for restoring diplomatic relations with Libya until it honors its financial commitments to the families.

"How can the U.S. possibly be expected to trust Libya when they are depending on a legal technicality to absolve them from their promise to pay restitution to the families?" Rep. John E. Sweeney (R-N.Y.), the amendment's sponsor, asked in a statement yesterday. "Libya must follow through as a show of good faith to the world that they regret past actions by making full and immediate reparations to the families."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Nation's Ports Remain At Risk, Study Shows (KRT)

By John Simerman

Knight Ridder, June 28, 2006

WALNUT CREEK, Calif. - The nation's seaports remain vulnerable to attack and a lack of coordination among agencies could worsen the economic aftermath of a terrorist attack, a leading policy group says.

Inadequate federal funding and staffing has slowed or stalled a raft of security initiatives that lawmakers scurried to create after the threat to the nation's 361 ports came into focus following the Sept. 11 attacks, according to the study by the Public Policy Institute of California.

The federal push for better port security has also failed to recognize the importance of minimizing the economic impact of a terrorist strike.

"The only reason terrorists would attack a port is the impact on the economy," said Jon Haveman, co-editor of the report. "But if you can reduce the economic damage, the less likely they are to attack."

The report adds to a growing chorus of criticism over the federal response to the threat of nuclear, radiological, biological or chemical weapons being smuggled inside one of the millions of containers that flow into U.S. ports each year. About five percent of them are opened and inspected.

According to U.S. Coast Guard estimates, it would take about $7.3 billion over a decade for the ports to meet the demands of the maritime security law passed in 2002. So far, a little more than $700 million has been awarded in five rounds of port security grants.

The Inspector General of the Department of Homeland Security last year found that almost 80 percent of the grant money wasn't being spent. Some projects that received funding appeared to have little security benefit, the office reported.

A follow-up report this year found improvement, but also said "it is not clear that (Homeland Security) knows how much actual risk reduction has been achieved."

California's largest seaports, in Los Angeles, Long Beach and Oakland - three of the nation's four busiest - have received just 19 percent of federal port security grant funds, though they handle 40 percent of all containers coming through U.S. ports, the PPIC study found.

The Port of Oakland, the fourth busiest, has received a little more than $11 million. It has a backlog of $89 million in unfunded security projects, said Mike O'Brien, head of security for the port.

"We've gotten a pretty good chunk of change," said O'Brien. "We still need more."

The federal agency this year moved to a "risk-based" formula designed to grant homeland security money based more on the threat than politics.

That helps bigger ports such as Los Angeles, Long Beach and Oakland, but may leave smaller ones more vulnerable, said Susan Monteverde, vice president of government relations for the American Association of Port Authorities. It represents 86 large public ports.

"Because of limited money, they only focused on the big guys," Monteverde said. "But they are all international borders. We don't want to have a soft underbelly."

The Bush administration has placed more than 1,200 radiation detectors in the nation's ports, and ports have used federal grant money to physically secure their entries. Customs officials inspect and boards ships at dozens of foreign ports, and the government has a "trusted shipper" program that allows it to focus on high-risk ships.

But a plan for background checks and identification cards for millions of port and transportation workers is far behind schedule.

Physically inspecting every container would bring commerce to a crawl, experts say. Instead, the checks on most containers rely on documentation that can be manipulated or falsified. That makes a focus on response vital, said Jon Haveman, co-editor of the report.

An attack on the ports of Los Angeles and Long Beach could cost as much as $45 billion to the economy, the report estimates. "That's really an upper bound," said Haveman. "But there are a lot of things that . . . can mitigate the damage."

Haveman said the federal port security program has largely ignored critical funding and planning to quickly recover from a port attack that can not be prevented.

One obstacle is a lack of a clear line of authority for emergency response. In areas like Los Angeles, as many as 15 different agencies may have jurisdiction, the study found.

O'Brien, security chief at the Port of Oakland, said local, state and federal agencies work together on drills and exercises, and that the FBI has been designated as the lead agency if the port is attacked.

"We're talking about what-ifs and sorting out those jurisdictional issues," said O'Brien.

A House bill authored by two Californians would dedicate $400 million a year to the port security grant program and require the Department of Homeland Security to develop specific policies and strategies for reopening ports after an attack.

One of the House members said Congress' lack of focus on recovery could lead to other ports being shut down as a precaution.

"A lot of what we did after 9/11 was to think of how we stop another attack," said Rep. Dan Lungren, R-Calif. "We're significantly less vulnerable today than we were five years ago, but nowhere near where we need to be . . . we can't ignore the possibility there could be a successful terrorist attack."

The money would come from customs fees on shippers. The bill cleared the House on a 421 to 2 vote in May. A similar bill is being held up in the Senate.

Court Says Personnel Rules Harm Bargaining (NYT)

The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit upheld a lower court decision that overturned personnel rules at the Homeland Security Department, saying they failed to ensure employees' right to bargain collectively. "The regulations effectively eliminate all meaningful bargaining over fundamental working conditions," the ruling said. The department set up the system in January 2005, saying it would allow salaries to be based on performance. A department spokesman said officials were considering what to do about the ruling.

Appeals Court Vetoes Bush Plan To Alter U.S. Personnel Rules (WP)

By Eric M. Weiss

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

A federal appeals court delivered another legal blow to the Bush administration's broad plan to overhaul the federal employee personnel system, ruling yesterday that the proposed changes would illegally limit the scope of collective bargaining.

The opinion by a panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit said new Department of Homeland Security personnel rules that deal with working conditions and employee appeals were illegal. The court upheld two rulings by a federal district judge that found the government had overstepped the authority given by Congress to rewrite personnel rules when it created the department in 2002.

Elated union leaders said the decision could scuttle the broader attempt to replace the 15-grade General Schedule pay system with one that has wide salary ranges known as pay bands, and to more strongly tie annual raises to performance evaluations. The administration hopes to expand the proposed DHS system throughout the government.

"I think the whole pay system is up in the air," said Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union, which led a group of five unions that sued DHS. "Time is running out with this administration."

Kelley said she will ask Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to meet and discuss reworking the personnel plans with more union input.

The new system is the product of more than three years of work. It could dramatically change the way many of the department's 180,000 workers are paid, promoted, deployed and disciplined. A similar system being developed at the Defense Department would affect 746,000 workers and has been challenged in a separate lawsuit filed by labor unions.

Bush administration officials have argued that such changes are necessary to make the federal bureaucracy more nimble and responsive in the fight against terrorism and, more generally, to improve government efficiency.

"DHS will be discussing the impact of today's ruling and potential next steps with the Department of Justice and the Office of Personnel Management," said Larry Orluskie, a DHS spokesman. "Meanwhile, DHS is moving forward with implementing a key element of MAX-HR, performance management, for most non-bargaining unit employees."

Last August, U.S. District Judge Rosemary M. Collyer found that Homeland Security's new personnel system falls short of guaranteeing collective bargaining rights because the department can override any provision in a labor agreement by issuing a department-wide directive.

Collyer faulted the department's plan to limit the ability of the independent Merit Systems Protection Board to mitigate punishment handed out to employees who have successfully appealed firings and demotions to the board. And she ruled that the plan would go too far in altering the role of the independent Federal Labor Relations Authority, many of whose duties would be taken over by an internal labor relations board.

Yesterday's opinion, written by Judge Harry T. Edwards on behalf of a three-judge panel, agreed with Collyer's findings on the DHS appeals process and on the proposed ability to unilaterally break negotiated contracts, which it called "plainly unlawful."

But the appeals court went further, saying the DHS plan, by limiting collective bargaining to employee-specific personnel matters, leaves most decisions on working conditions up to management only.

"In no sense can such a limited scope of bargaining be viewed as consistent with the Act's mandate that DHS 'ensure' collective bargaining rights for its employees," the court said.

The administration could still decide to ask the full D.C. Circuit for review or could appeal to the Supreme Court.

"Today's ruling once more demonstrates the shortsightedness of this administration in developing personnel systems that ignore the rights of federal workers -- especially collective-bargaining rights," said Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii), one of nine senators to vote against the creation of DHS, in part because of concerns about the personnel system. "Now is the time for the department to sit down with the federal employee unions to work out a personnel system that is fair, contemporary, flexible, and has the support of employees and the department's leadership."

Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), a supporter of the new personnel system, said: "In light of today's ruling by the court, I encourage the department to renew discussion with its employees over the sections of the regulations enjoined by the court."

DHS Ruling Deals Administration A Setback (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0037170

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

A federal appeals court left no doubt yesterday that the Bush administration overreached in fashioning new workplace rules for the Department of Homeland Security.

The department's regulation "renders 'collective bargaining' meaningless; and it is utterly unreasonable and thus impermissible, because it makes no sense on its own terms," the three-judge panel found.

The judges, at another point in a 50-page opinion, said, "The government's position not only defies the well-understood meaning of collective bargaining, it also defies common sense."

To imagine that a contract is not binding on both parties, as the Bush administration contended, "is simply bizarre," the judges wrote.

For three years, Bush administration officials have defended their plans for new workplace rules at Homeland Security and the Defense Department, contending that managers should not feel any hesitation to respond to emergencies or terrorist threats because of a union agreement. Unions responded that their contracts already contained emergency clauses that gave managers ample flexibility, and they filed lawsuits against the new rules.

Yesterday, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, said the Homeland Security rules failed to ensure that employees could bargain collectively and went too far in limiting the topics that could be put on the negotiating table. [Story, Page A23.]

"The obvious problem," the ruling said, "is that very few 'conditions of employment' are subject to meaningful bargaining, and the few conditions over which the parties can negotiate may be unilaterally abrogated by management. A system of this sort does not even give an illusion of collective bargaining."

The opinion, written by Judge Harry T. Edwards and joined by Judge A. Raymond Randolph and Judge Thomas B. Griffith , leaves the White House with a tough decision to make -- file for a review at the Supreme Court or go back to the drawing board.

Administration officials, who spoke only on condition that they not be identified, acknowledged that the ruling was a heavy blow. One official said the new Homeland Security personnel system was "dead in the water" and added: "There is no leadership on this."

Clearly, much is at stake. The Pentagon lost on similar grounds in U.S. District Court, and its appeal will be handled by the federal appeals court here. Additional adverse rulings could jeopardize other administration efforts as well, most notably the push to retool the federal pay system to include more performance-based standards.

Two senators who oversee federal workforce issues urged the Bush administration officials and labor leaders to meet and discuss their differences.

"In light of today's ruling by the court, I encourage the department to renew discussions with its employees over sections of the regulations enjoined by the court," Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) said.

Sen. Daniel K . Akaka (D-Hawaii) said, "Now is the time for the department to sit down with the federal employee unions to work out a personnel system that is fair, contemporary, flexible, and has the support of employees and the department's leadership."

The National Treasury Employees Union argued the case in court and union president Colleen M. Kelley yesterday called the appeals court ruling "a sweeping legal victory."

She said she would ask Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff for a meeting to "work out a system that can be supported and will allow employees to do their jobs."

But Kelley also suggested she was not certain a deal could be reached between unions and the administration. "They have been pretty tireless in their efforts to impose change, whether legal or not. . . . Now we will see what they do."

NTEU President Kelley will take your questions about the appeals court ruling at noon today on Federal Diary Live athttp://washingtonpost.com. My e-mail address isbarrs@washpost.com.

Appeals Court Upholds Rejection Of Homeland Security Personnel System (FEDTIMES)

By Stephen Losey

Federal Times, June 28, 2006

The Homeland Security Department's new personnel system violates laws guaranteeing workers the right to collectively bargain with their employers over workplace matters, a federal appeals court ruled June 27.

The ruling likely will force the department to rewrite the labor relations sections of its new personnel rules, some observers say.

DOJ_NMG_0037171

As part of its new rulebook for hiring, paying, appraising and managing employees, Homeland Security sought to include rules that would allow department managers to overturn agreements with employee unions — which the court called "plainly unlawful" — and to limit what unions can bargain over.

The ruling of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit backs up an October ruling by U.S. District Court Judge Rosemary Collyer, which also struck down the employee relations portions of the department's personnel system. This latest ruling came after the department appealed that earlier ruling.

The appeals court also broadened the earlier decision by ruling that the department cannot restrict negotiations to "employee-specific" matters. Such limitations would be unprecedented and would "effectively eliminate all meaningful bargaining over fundamental working conditions, thereby committing the bulk of decisions concerning conditions of employment to the department's exclusive discretion," the court ruled.

The National Treasury Employees Union, which was lead plaintiff in the case, said the appeals court decision effectively settles the matter and strikes down what it calls "a regressive personnel system." NTEU president Colleen Kelley said she hopes to soon meet with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to begin crafting new regulations that uphold collective bargaining rights.

Homeland Security spokesman Larry Orluskie said the department will soon discuss the impact of the ruling with the Justice Department and Office of Personnel Management and decide what their next steps will be.

Orluskie said Homeland Security continues to move forward with its pay-for-performance plan for most nonbargaining unit employees as part of its new human resources system, called MAXHR. Orluskie said the department is putting supervisors and managers through performance leadership training to prepare them for this transition.

"The human capital flexibilities contained in MAXHR remain critical to DHS mission accomplishment and our goal of creating a 21st century department," Orluskie said.

In other union news, the Federal Labor Relations Authority on June 27 began counting votes from Customs and Border Protection employees to determine once and for all whether NTEU or the American Federation of Government Employees will represent them. Kelley said a final vote tally should be finished by the morning of June 28.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Jogs With Wounded Soldier (AP-Y2)

By Jennifer Loven

AP2, June 27, 2006

President Bush took a jog Tuesday with a soldier who lost part of both legs in Iraq, following through on a bedside promise even the president had doubts about at the time.

Despite a slight drizzle, Bush and Staff Sgt. Christian Bagge took a slow jog around a spongy track that circles the White House's South Lawn. About halfway through their approximately half-mile run, Bush and Bagge paused briefly for reporters.

"He ran the president into the ground, I might add," Bush said, as the two gripped hands in an emotional, lengthy shake. "But I'm proud of you. I'm proud of your strength, proud of your character."

The president met the soldier on a New Year's Day visit to Brooke Army Medical Center in San Antonio, where Bagge had been recuperating from his injuries for months. Bagge, now 23 and a native of Eugene, Ore., was in a convoy hit by roadside bombs a year ago in the remote Iraq desert south of Kirkuk.

He told Bush during their January visit that he wanted to run with him. Bush was an avid runner who had mostly traded the activity for mountain biking in the last couple of years because of knee problems.

"I looked at him, like, you know, there's an optimistic person," Bush said. "It's an amazing sight for me to be running with a guy who, last time I saw him, was in bed wondering whether or not — I was wondering whether or not he'd ever get out of bed."

But, the president added, in tribute to the hard work Bagge did to realize this goal, "There was no doubt in his mind that he would."

"It's a privilege," commented Bagge, who had changed in the Oval Office into a special set of prosthetic legs that he uses to jog.

And then the pair took off for the remainder of their run.

Amputee Iraq Vet Fulfills Wish, Jogs With Bush (USAT)

By Richard Benedetto

USA Today, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — Shortly after Army Staff Sgt. Christian Bagge lost parts of both legs in Iraq when a roadside bomb tore through his Humvee last June, he vowed to not let the injury prevent him from doing things he could do before he was wounded.

"I want to run. I want to swim. I want to mountain bike. The biggest goal of all is just to do what I did before," Bagge, 23, told CNN in an interview last month.

On Tuesday, he did one of those things. He ran side-by-side with President Bush on the spongy black jogging track that rings the South Lawn of the White House.

"And he ran the president into the ground, I might add," Bush said after jogging about a quarter-mile.

While Bush spoke with reporters, Bagge, in an Army T-shirt and black shorts, stood next to the president, resting his hand on Bush's shoulder.

The run, under drizzly gray skies in the rain-drenched capital, was the fulfillment of a request Bagge made when Bush visited him and 50 other wounded soldiers last New Year's Day at the Brooke Army Medical Center at Fort Sam Houston in San Antonio.

Lying in a hospital bed, Bagge told his commander in chief that he wanted to run with him sometime. Of course, Bush said, admitting now that he was skeptical that the young soldier would ever be able to do it. The payoff came less than six months later, thanks to two prosthetic legs and a lot of determination on Bagge's part.

Bagge's left leg was amputated below the knee, his right leg just above the knee. He put on his special running legs — each a springy, C-shaped device that takes the place of the foot and lower leg — in the Oval Office.

Bush, 59, who swapped his once-manic running regimen for mountain biking due to pain in his knees, said he was inspired by Bagge's courage.

"It's an amazing sight for me to be running with a guy who, last time I saw him, was in bed," Bush said. "I was wondering whether or not he'd ever get out of bed. There was no doubt in his mind that he would." As they stood before reporters Tuesday, Bush thanked Bagge, a member of the Oregon National Guard, for his service: "Good man. God bless you."

"It's a privilege," Bagge said.

Then Bush waved reporters away. "We're not through running yet," he said. "Get out of the way." They ran another quarter-mile and retired to the White House.

He Came A Long Way For That White House Jog (LAT)

By Heather Gehlert

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — One year and 14 surgeries after Army Staff Sgt. Christian Bagge lost both legs during a roadside bomb explosion in Iraq, he is out of a wheelchair and back on his feet — and jogging at the White House.

"He ran the president into the ground," President Bush told reporters Tuesday afternoon as the two men took a break from a turn around the nearly quarter-mile track on the South Lawn.

They first met in January at Brooke Army Medical Center in Texas. Bagge was bedridden.

"He said, 'I want to run with you,' " Bush said. "I looked at him, like, you know, there's an optimistic person. But I could tell in his eyes that he meant it.

"It's an amazing sight for me to be running with a guy who, last time I saw him … I was wondering whether or not he'd ever get out of bed," the president said. "There was no doubt in his mind that he would."

Because Bagge cannot feel his feet hitting the ground, he has had to relearn the mechanics of jogging, relying on the energy return from carbon fibers in his prosthetic limbs, instead of his own calf and ankle muscles, to propel him forward.

"It's very strange to get used to … you learn to feel the vibration of the prosthetic in your limb," Bagge, 24, said in an interview the night before the presidential jog. "The prosthetic becomes an extension of you."

His father, Doug, described his son as so agile that "many times, if you didn't look down at his feet, you'd never know he doesn't have them."

Bagge, a member of an Oregon National Guard unit, and nine other soldiers were injured last June in the blast near Kirkuk.

He was trapped in the Humvee for about 45 minutes — aware of his blood-soaked body, the left boot that was pointed in the wrong direction and the pain. After being pulled from the vehicle, he waited another 45 minutes for a helicopter.

"At first, I thought that I may have been dead because my driver wasn't calling my name, and he was calling other people's names," he said. "I thought maybe for a minute I was hearing things outside my body."

Bagge's right leg was amputated above the knee, his left leg just below the knee. For many months, he said, he needed narcotics for the severe phantom pain and post-surgical agony.

"To see him in the early days, having to scoot around on his bottom or falling out of his wheelchair — that was hard," said Bagge's father. "But he's an overcomer."

Bagge has four sets of limbs: one for walking, one for running, one for swimming and one as a backup. And he's not ashamed of his injuries: When he was awarded a Purple Heart last year, Bagge wore shorts to the ceremony.

"I'm very proud of what I've done for this country," he said. "I'm proud of my wounds."

The hardest part of his recovery, he noted, has been mental.

"Even today, a year later, I find myself self-conscious on this trip [to Washington]," he said. "I get funny looks all the time…. Obviously people are shocked to see somebody with two fake legs walking around. Some people will drop their jaw and watch you walk away. And sometimes it's just extremely rude.

"It can be very easy on certain days for me to get down and depressed," Bagge continued. "But if I could ask an Iraqi who was oppressed by Saddam: 'Hey, is this worth the loss of two legs of an American soldier?' I think they would say, 'Yes.' "

Kerry And Feingold Form Alliance On Iraq (AP-Y2)

By Frederic J. Frommer

AP2, June 27, 2006

One epitomizes the Washington political establishment as the Democratic Party's most recent presidential nominee. The other is the quintessential Democratic outsider, proud to be the only senator to vote against the USA Patriot Act.

Notwithstanding their different histories, Sens. John Kerry and Russ Feingold joined forces last week to push a proposal that would have required troops to leave Iraq by July of next year. And they may soon have something else in common: Both are considering presidential races in 2008.

"It seems to be a marriage of convenience," said Democratic consultant Dan Payne, a former Kerry Senate campaign strategist. "Feingold wants to be considered of presidential stature, and Kerry wants to look like he can work with others to reach a compromise."

Both Kerry, D-Mass., and Feingold, D-Wis., insist that politics has nothing to do with it.

"Not on subjects of war and peace," Kerry said in a telephone interview. "Not on subjects that involve young Americans in uniform in harm's way. As far as I'm concerned, the only consideration is what's the best policy, how do you advance the security of our country, and what do we do to do it?"

Feingold, who voted against the Iraq war resolution in 2002, last year became the first senator to call for a troop withdrawal timetable. He said he didn't mind that many news stories referred to the "Kerry" proposal.

"I'm not in this game for ego, and I'm not in this game for trying to figure out who should go first and who should go second," Feingold said in a separate telephone interview. "This is a matter of life and death. This is a matter of our national security. And I was proud to join with another senator whom I respect to do this."

Ann Marie Hauser, a spokeswoman for the Republican National Committee, mocked the coupling.

"Whether it's John Kerry's indecisiveness or Russ Feingold's extremism, Democrats across the board support an approach that results in surrendering to our enemy," Hauser said. "But as 2008 looms, it is interesting to watch these two senators trip over each other as they rush to the far left of their party."

While the Senate defeated, on a 60-39 vote, a nonbinding resolution that would have urged the administration to start withdrawing troops by year's end, the Feingold-Kerry proposal went down on an 86-13 vote. By Feingold's standard, that was progress.

"You know, I was the only one in this position a year ago," he said. "Now you have 13 senators, including our presidential standard-bearer, John Kerry."

Feingold certainly doesn't mind standing alone. In 2001, he cast the only vote in the Senate against the Patriot Act, the post-Sept. 11 federal law that greatly expanded the government's authority to investigate terrorism suspects at the cost, according to its critics, of some civil liberties. His proposal to censure President Bush for a warrantless surveillance program has attracted only three co-sponsors — one of them Kerry.

Those positions have made Feingold popular among liberal anti-Bush activists.

Feingold has been openly critical of Democrats who voted to authorize the Iraq war, even those who have since said that vote was a mistake — a group that includes Kerry.

But Feingold said that was one reason he was so encouraged to work with Kerry.

"Let's face it — he was our standard-bearer, he had voted for the war," Feingold said. "And yet, I was able to bring him together with me to do exactly what I've believed all along, that this wasn't a good idea, and that we needed to reverse course."

Kerry reiterated his position, dating back to the 2004 presidential election, that he would not have gone to war had he been president — "wrong war, wrong place and wrong time."

But he added: "Russ made the right vote, I made the wrong vote, it's that simple."

Feingold said the two men started working together on the issue when they both staked a position in meetings with fellow Democrats calling for a timetable to bring the troops back. Neither could persuade the group to go along.

"So we just decided to cooperate in order to strengthen our hand, and not just be operating on our own," Feingold recalled.

"We've worked together on a lot of things," Kerry said. "We share a lot of strong beliefs about how badly the system needs to be reformed, and how screwed up Washington is."

Payne, the former Kerry strategist, said the alliance poses risks for Feingold and Kerry.

"It's a trick for both of them because there's the potential that Kerry can look like he's backtracking, and Feingold has to be careful not to appear to be co-opted or bought off," he said.

Democrats Attack GOP On Iraq Bills (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

Senate Democrats yesterday accused Republicans of using a "Karl Rove playbook" to make the minority party seem weak on defense and to defeat a Democratic plan to begin withdrawing troops from Iraq.

They called Senate Republicans a "rubber stamp" for the White House.

Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan called Republicans hypocritical for opposing his "phased redeployment" plan because top military officials have announced there is likely to be some troop withdrawal this year.

Republicans "tried and failed" to put the Democrats on the defensive during last week's heated debate, said Mr. Levin, the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services Committee.

"The public wants a debate on Iraq," he said. "The Republicans looked like they are rubber-stamping whatever the White House wants and using a play out of the campaign playbook of Karl Rove to attack your opponents as being weak on defense instead of talking about policy pros and cons."

Mr. Levin and Sen. Jack Reed, Rhode Island Democrat, last week sponsored a nonbinding resolution that called for starting a phased withdrawal of troops from Iraq by Dec. 31. It was rejected Thursday on a nearly party-line vote of 60-39, with Republicans accusing Democrats of trying to "surrender" or "cut-and-run" in Iraq.

On the same day, the Senate voted 86-13 to reject a separate proposal to withdraw combat troops by July 2007.

Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. military commander in Iraq, said last week that more Iraqi forces are prepared to take the lead, showing "great progress."

"I'm confident that we'll be able to continue to take reductions over the course of this year," he said shortly after the Senate votes, adding that the first U.S. troop reductions in Iraq could begin in September.

"Within two hours [of Thursday´s votes,] our commander on the ground is saying he still believes fairly substantial reductions can take place over the course of this year," Mr. Levin said, adding that Democrats are "very much in sync with General Casey."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee said yesterday that he "wholeheartedly disagrees." Mr. Frist said Gen. Casey is qualified to craft plans for troop withdrawals, but senators are not.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Gen. Casey has offered several options and warned reporters against focusing on the withdrawal plan. "Certainly that's under consideration," Mr. Snow said.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner said those who support "prematurely withdrawing" troops clearly were defeated in the Senate and in the House earlier this month.

When asked about Gen. Casey's plan, the Ohio Republican said the commander and President Bush should make the decision based on conditions on the ground.

"It should not be left to the Congress to set some arbitrary timetable for the draw-down of the troops," Mr. Boehner said. "The [generals] are the people on the ground. They're there, charged with making those decisions. And they will make those decisions, not us."

"We were not calling for some arbitrary deadline; we were asking the president to initiate withdrawal of forces this year," Mr. Reed said. "Frankly, that's what General Casey suggested rather strongly."

Democratic leaders will hold a press conference today on Iraq policy, during which several Democratic senators "will call on Bush Republicans to put aside their failed policies and join Democrats, Gen. Casey and the Iraqis in working to change course in Iraq," according to an announcement.

Staying On Message -- Nixon's Message (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

DOJ_NMG_0037175

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

Let's give credit where credit is due: Nobody knows how to take the worst political hand imaginable -- responsibility for a failing war -- and turn it to their own advantage like the Republicans. That was the defining political accomplishment of Richard Nixon in Vietnam. It may yet be the defining political achievement of George W. Bush in Iraq.

Nixon, of course, had an easier time of it. When he took office in 1969, he inherited a war that his Democratic predecessors had made and that had long since descended into a blood-drenched, stalemated disaster. He could have opted to end the war early in his term, particularly since neither he nor his national security adviser, Henry Kissinger, believed it was winnable. But by continuing the conflict, and even expanding it into Cambodia, he enraged the 40 percent of the nation that wanted us out of Vietnam. Millions of demonstrators took to the streets; some of the student movement embraced a wacky, self-marginalizing anti-Americanism; and mainstream Democrats grew steadily more antiwar.

And by nurturing such deep divisions in the body politic, Nixon created the very kind of political landscape on which he was a master at maneuvering. Just 10 months into his presidency, Nixon was championing what he termed the "silent majority" of his countrymen against the protesting hordes. Democrats railed against the war in Vietnam; Nixon railed against the demonstrators and Democrats, whom he gleefully conflated, at home. It was an asymmetric conflict, and Nixon won it going away, defeating George McGovern in 1972 by more than 20 percentage points.

Today Republicans in general and Karl Rove in particular have resurrected the Nixon game plan. They are not mounting a point-by-point defense of the administration's plan for Iraq, not least because the administration doesn't really have a plan for Iraq. When Senate Democrats brought two resolutions to the floor last week, each calling for a change in our policy, the Republicans defeated them both, but they pointedly failed to introduce a resolution of their own affirming the administration's conduct of the war. That, they understood, would have been a loser in the court of public opinion. Instead, they walked a tightrope: not really defending the war per se but attacking the Democrats for seeking to end it. This was Nixonism of the highest order.

But Bush Republicans face a tougher challenge than their Nixonian forebears. There aren't really demonstrators in the streets. No one is being rude or disorderly. Most congressional Democrats advocate nothing more than a phased redeployment of our troops, though polling shows the public is split on the more radical alternative of setting a hard deadline for withdrawal.

In the face of such raging moderation, the Republicans have nonetheless opened a two-pronged attack on the Democrats. First, they argue, the Dems are defeatists, calling for a withdrawal of our forces that would dishonor the men and women in the military who've given their lives in the course of the war. But the selectivity with which Republicans invoke this equation of withdrawal with dishonor undermines the equation altogether. After all, who among them argues that Ronald Reagan's withdrawal of our forces from Lebanon, or Nixon's withdrawal from Vietnam, disgraced our dead?

The more serious, and innovative, Republican claim isn't that Democrats are defeatists, however; it's that the Democrats are ditherers. "I believe [the Democrats'] real challenge is that they have no common unified position on Iraq as a party," Oklahoma Republican Rep. Tom Cole said recently. "Whether we are right or wrong on our side of the aisle, we do have a common position."

Repeatedly, Republicans have accused the Democrats of having what the president termed an "interesting internal debate" on the war. The implication is that the Democrats are all talk (or, worse, all thought) but no action, and in a post-Sept. 11 world, what really matters is resolve. That the president's war of choice has created a disaster in Iraq so profound that no course of action is likely to result in a safe, livable nation, then, may perversely work in the president's favor. Of course, the Democrats are conflicted about what to do in Iraq. They think about it (at least, some of them do) and can't totally agree on how best to mitigate the catastrophe.

The Democrats think too much, say the Republicans; such men are dangerous. Vote for us; we're dumb but tough. This may not be a surefire prescription for electoral success, but given the hole the Republicans have dug themselves into, I think Nixon would be proud.

Turning To The U.N., Again (WP)

By Richard Holbrooke

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

In a little-noticed announcement in President Bush's news conference on June 14, the day he returned from Iraq, he said that he would send two personal emissaries to New York to consult with U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan on the political and economic future of Iraq. The next day, still with remarkably little public attention, Philip Zelikow, the counselor of the State Department, and Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt met with Annan and his deputy, Mark Malloch Brown, at the secretary general's Sutton Place residence. There was no one else present.

The two presidential envoys asked Annan to use his unique "convening powers" to help organize international meetings that would lead (by this fall, the Americans hope) to the unveiling of a new "Iraq Compact" -- an agreement between the Iraqi government and major international donors that would commit Baghdad to a series of political and economic reforms in return for substantially more international aid. (Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki called Annan the same day to make an identical request.)

This is a good idea -- and quite similar to suggestions from many administration critics. With the battle for Baghdad raging, it remains to be seen whether an Iraq Compact will work -- or even get off the ground -- but it is certainly an important step in the right direction for Iraq and for American policy.

For Annan and the United Nations, Bush's request poses an ironic and difficult challenge. On the one hand, the administration is asking for help on the worst problem it faces, acknowledging, however belatedly and reluctantly, that once again, the United Nations is not only relevant but at times indispensable to the United States. On the other hand, the resentment among the majority of U.N. member states over the way the institution has been treated recently, especially by Washington's current U.N. ambassador, makes any effort to get the United Nations to help the United States far more difficult.

How to treat the United Nations has been a particular dilemma for President Bush, since opponents of the organization form an important part of the administration's core constituency. Internal disagreements over the past five years about whether to support it or abandon it, to use it or bypass it, have both weakened the organization and led to reduced U.S. influence even as more and more intractable issues are thrown into its hands.

The United Nations is facing major budgetary problems caused primarily by American insistence on a six-month budget cycle instead of the normal two-year cycle. It must deal with growing shortfalls in the U.S. contribution to peacekeeping funding, despite Washington's calls for more peacekeepers in Darfur and elsewhere. And it is confronted by a deadlock over rebuilding the headquarters complex in New York -- a deadlock whose main cause is the administration's failure to push Congress for proper funding. (This is particularly difficult to understand, since the U.N. signature building, its 38-story East River office tower -- built in 1950 and never subject to modern safety codes -- is widely acknowledged to be the major building in New York most vulnerable to a terrorist attack. For example, when the president visits it, the Secret Service closes down FDR Drive beneath it -- but what about the rest of the time?)

Still, even though Annan and the world body have been diminished by Washington, he and his colleagues simply cannot refuse to help on the Iraq matter; it is their responsibility as international civil servants to go where the problems are worst and then to do their best. And, on the basis of private talks with Annan, Malloch Brown and administration officials, I have no doubt that they intend to do just that. In fact, Malloch Brown has already agreed to travel to Baghdad very soon for preliminary meetings that the United Nations and the United States hope will culminate later this year in a high-level conference in the region. As Annan moves into his last six months as secretary general, this would be the right way to end a turbulent decade in that office -- with a genuine contribution to the cause of peace in Iraq.

It is, however, impossible not to note the irony and the implications of what has happened in the past two weeks between Washington and the United Nations. Once again, an administration that has underfunded, undersupported and undermined the United Nations has turned to it, almost in desperation, for help.

The lesson should be clear: Despite the enormously self-destructive actions of many other member states, especially the group of developing nations called the G-77, the United Nations still serves U.S. foreign policy interests in many important ways. Not only Iraq but also Iran, Darfur, Afghanistan and the difficult negotiations just started over Kosovo's final status -- all issues of vital importance to the United States -- have now ended up in the United Nations. To weaken this institution further, as has happened in recent years, serves no clear American national security interest. To strengthen it would make it more valuable to the United States and to every nation that seeks conflict resolution, stability and economic progress. With the maneuvering over the selection of Annan's successor underway, it is time for Washington -- and this must include Congress -- to put behind it a sorry period of confusion and offer the United Nations more support, both financial and political, in return for the things it needs in Iraq and elsewhere.

20 Held In U.S. Soldiers' Slaying (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

The U.S. military has detained 20 persons with knowledge of the brutal deaths of two American soldiers south of Baghdad and thinks al Qaeda in Iraq was responsible, an Army general said yesterday.

Maj. Gen. James Thurman, who commands U.S. operations in and around Baghdad, said at a press conference that more than 8,000 Americans and Iraqis searched for the soldiers after their traffic checkpoint was attacked on June 16.

The bodies of Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, and Pfc. Thomas Tucker, 25 were found three days later in a village in the "Triangle of Death," so called because of the large presence of insurgents. The troops' bodies had been booby-trapped with improvised explosive devices, and it took demolition teams half a day to clear a path to the bodies. Another soldier, Spc. David J. Babineau, 25, was found killed near the checkpoint.

Asked who was suspected in the killings, Gen. Thurman said, "This is a terrorist and foreign fighter area where al Qaeda operates. And I will tell you I believe al Qaeda is associated with the majority of the attacks in south Baghdad, and in and around the area where we found the soldiers ... I think we've hurt them very bad down there, and I'll tell you that. I believe we have."

The general said investigators are still piecing together what happened on June 16. He declined to say why three junior-rank soldiers were left alone, in one armored Humvee, to man a checkpoint in one of Iraq's most violent neighborhoods.

He also did not reveal whether the soldiers were killed at the scene and their bodies mutilated or whether they were tortured to death, as an Iraq general has said.

"That's why we're investigating it," Gen. Thurman said. "We go through intensive efforts to look at DNA, to look at autopsies and things like that to make sure that we can determine the cause of death and that sort of business."

He said searchers captured 36 suspected insurgents, 20 of whom had "direct or indirect links to the attack."

At the Pentagon, Army Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, the man in charge of training and equipping the growing Iraqi security forces (ISF), said that newly minted army battalions are still not able to operate independently of U.S. forces but that they continue to make progress. The ability of the ISF to fight is the key to President Bush being able to order home large number of U.S. troops.

"They are not independent at this point in time," Gen. Dempsey said. "They will become independent as we see the new government take on some of the issues related to things like national reconciliation, which has the potential to reduce the threat, which then could over time allow them to become more independent in terms of military operations."

He said the Iraqi army not only has to learn how to fight, but also how to administer to a fighting force with such support activities as pay, promotions, procurement and budgeting.

"If we were having this conversation 18 months ago, there were still U.S. personnel helping Iraq figure out how to pay its soldiers and policemen," he said. "That entire process has been transitioned over to Iraqis. We have no part in their pay process right now."

U.S. Tells Of Hunt For Kidnapped GIs (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — The U.S. military released a timeline Tuesday that detailed its response to the abduction of two American soldiers south of the capital and the discovery of their mutilated and booby-trapped bodies more than a week ago.

But the briefing failed to explain why Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston; Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore.; and a third soldier, who was killed at the site of the kidnapping, Spc. David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass.; were outside their base camp with a single armored Humvee on the night of June 16, a Friday.

Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman declined to answer questions about possible procedural lapses that would have allowed the soldiers to leave their camp unaccompanied, saying the inquiry was continuing. U.S. military vehicles in Iraq almost always travel in groups of two or more.

U.S. and Iraqi forces staged a massive 8,000-troop, three-day search for the missing servicemen through at least a dozen villages in the Yousifiya area south of Baghdad, described by Thurman as a "hot bed of terrorist and foreign fighter activity."

He said U.S. forces had entered the area only intermittently before October 2005 and had since established six patrol bases, counted 2,296 attacks and encountered 1,630 hidden bombs.

By the time the search for the missing troops concluded, Thurman said, U.S. and Iraqi forces had detained 36 people, 20 believed to have had links to the attack on the American soldiers. Two alleged insurgent leaders were killed during the operations, he said, and troops found 29 hidden bombs, documents and a global positioning system. Thurman said the documents and the detainees had provided useful intelligence.

On the evening of the abduction, Thurman said, U.S. soldiers stationed near Yousifiya heard gunshots and rocket blasts coming from an observation post overlooking a canal that joins the Euphrates River.

Fifteen minutes later, U.S. soldiers arrived at the site and found Babineau's body. Five minutes later, military officials stopped traffic in the area, and by 8:29, just more than half an hour after they heard the initial gunfire, they had launched an unmanned aerial drone and helicopters to search for the two missing soldiers.

U.S. and Iraqi special operations forces, along with dive teams, began scouring the area and searching the Euphrates for the GIs.

By early Saturday, shortly after midnight, 400 U.S. soldiers had cordoned off and searched areas north and south of the observation post. Helicopters dropped off Iraqi special operations forces at the Yousifiya power plant, an abandoned square kilometer of storage tanks, generators, towers, tunnels and other structures.

After daybreak, U.S. soldiers found a trail of evidence that led them into the power plant complex.

By Sunday morning, as search teams continued to sweep along the west bank of the Euphrates, troops started finding bombs, and a blast wounded a soldier shortly before 8.

At 6 a.m. Monday, a detainee told U.S. soldiers that the remains of the missing GIs were near a village called Mufaraji, north of the Yousifiya power plant. About four hours later the bodies were spotted.

U.S. officials said the bodies were badly mutilated, and efforts to recover the remains were delayed by six bombs planted to kill anyone who attempted to approach the corpses.

A group linked to Al Qaeda has claimed to have abducted and killed the two soldiers. Thurman declined to name groups he believed might be responsible, but pledged that the military would "be relentless in pursuing the perpetrators of this event."

Crackdown In Baghdad Going Slowly, U.S. Says (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, June 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — The U.S. military issued a sober assessment Tuesday of the Baghdad security crackdown, saying violence had decreased only slightly in the two weeks since 75,000 American-backed Iraqi soldiers flooded the capital.

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, spokesman for U.S. forces in Iraq, said the overwhelming security operation launched two weeks ago to rein in violence was moving slower than hoped.

“It's going to take some time. We do not see an upward trend. We … see a slight decrease (in violence) but not of the degree we would like to see at this point,” he said at a news conference in the heavily fortified Green Zone.

Meanwhile, an influential Sunni Arab cleric endorsed the reconciliation plan of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite. Ahmed Abdul Ghafour al-Samaraie said he saw some cause for optimism and called on the government to implement it quickly.

Al-Samaraie, the head of the Sunni Endowment, the state agency responsible for Sunni mosques and shrines, threw his support behind al-Maliki's 24-point reconciliation plan, which was presented to the parliament Sunday.

He urged the government to provide details and said the plan should include the disbanding of Shiite militias, as well as the release of all prisoners who have not been charged with a crime.

“We see a glimmer of hope in this plan, but at the same time, we are noticing that some people are pushing the armed groups to attack some areas in Baghdad, spreading terror and chaos in the city in order to make this plan a failure,” the cleric said.

Deputy Prime Minister Salam Zikam Ali al-Zubaie said he met secretly in Jordan with exiled Sunni tribal leaders to win their support for al-Maliki's plan.

Al-Zubaie said he also met and discussed the security situation with tribal leaders from volatile Anbar province, an insurgent stronghold, before al-Maliki unveiled the plan Sunday.

“We have reached positive results so that they (can try to) convince members of the honorable resistance to join the political process,” he told the Associated Press in a telephone interview. Many Iraqis refer to those who have only attacked foreign troops in Iraq as the “honorable resistance” because they do not target Iraqis.

“There is no dialogue with those who targeted Iraqis,” said al-Zubaie, a member of the influential Sunni Arab Zubaa tribe.

In other Iraq news Tuesday:

·The U.S. military announced the deaths of a Marine and three soldiers, and police reported 18 more Iraqis fell victim to sectarian and insurgent violence, including five people whose bodies were found dumped in the capital.

·The Iraqi High Tribunal said Saddam Hussein and six members of his ousted regime will stand trial Aug. 21 in connection with the 1980s Anfal campaign that killed an estimated 100,000 Kurds and saw thousands of their villages razed. The Anfal trial will be the second for Saddam. His first trial is in recess until July 10.

·The United Nations said 150,000 Iraqis have been displaced by sectarian violence sparked by the bombing of a 1,200-year-old Shiite shrine Feb. 22. The U.N. now estimates that 1.3 million people are displaced in Iraq. That's about 5% of the country's population.

Fear And Posing In Baghdad (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037179

BAGHDAD — You don't want to draw attention, so you keep a battered car even if you can afford a fancier model. You don't wash it; better to let dust smear the windows. Night falls, curfew clamps down, and all those dirty old cars wend their way back to the homes of the capital. The eyes of neighbors slide after them.

Where are the drivers coming from? Some work for the government. Some fight with insurgents or death squads. Some are employed by Americans. No one asks, and no one tells; nobody knows who's who.

Bloodshed has turned Iraq into a country defined by disguise and bluff. Violence in the streets has begun to defy logic, and this is part of the fallout: A lively city where people used to butt gleefully into one another's business has degenerated into a labyrinth of disguises, a place where neighbors brush silently past one another like dancers in a macabre costume ball.

"Everything is hidden among Iraqis; people are very suspicious of one another," said 66-year-old Hayawi Mahdi Abaasi, a successful lawyer who says he won't repair his tumble-down house or replace his 1982 Toyota for fear the wrong people would notice.

"Why should I call the attention of terrorists to me? I try to be very common like everyone else," he said.

Rich people hide their jewelry and dig frayed clothes from the back of their closets to evade ransom-seeking kidnappers. Muslims claim to be Sunni or Shiite, depending on circumstance. Christians pose as Muslims. Lying about employment is de rigueur. Street police wrap their faces in masks so nobody will recognize them.

Everybody, it seems, is pretending to be somebody else, adopting a fake identity in the terrified hope of staying safe. Baghdad residents reason that no matter who you are, you're probably on somebody's hit list.

"It's not a matter of lying or not lying," said Ali Abdullah. "It's a matter of life or death."

Abdullah is a 31-year-old Sunni with dark skin, a strapping build and a bushy strip of mustache. Like most people in Baghdad, he is a man of secrets.

He was trained as an engineer in Saddam Hussein's Iraq but now works for an American nonprofit organization. His life has been threatened and his wife begs him to quit, but he says he can't — the money is too good, and they have a 3-year-old son to think about.

Abdullah takes a taxi to work so his car won't be recognized. He uses different streets each time and changes his telephone number every few months.

He splurged on a $100 Swatch watch in neighboring Jordan, but now he's afraid to wear it in public. When people ask about his job, he lies and says he owns a computer shop.

Rule No. 1, he says: Never, under any circumstance, intimate to the neighbors on his predominantly Sunni street that he's sold out to the foreigners.

"This is a killer, if my neighbors find out where I work," he said. "This is the first thing that must be maintained, that my neighbors can't know what I do."

For Abdullah and his family, that has meant isolation. He shrinks from possible conversations, taking care not to linger in his doorway, make eye contact or trade small talk. When he caught sight of an old college friend across a crowded restaurant recently, he turned on his heels and rushed away to avoid conversation.

When they talk about the loss of intimacy, many Iraqis are mournful. Like members of most Middle Eastern societies, Iraqis have traditionally prized warmth and valued social interchange over what Westerners might regard as personal privacy. In the old Iraq, it was better to err on the side of nosiness than to appear cold or distant. It was perfectly normal to grill strangers on their marital status and the price of their possessions.

Little by little, that warmth has been bled away by war. Tension pulls on the city now. The atmosphere is thick with intrigue; it feels film noir, cloak-and-dagger. Except it is real — and deadly.

"Behavior has changed from rational behavior into instinctive, animalistic behavior," said Ehsan Mohammed Hassan, one of Iraq's leading sociologists and a professor at Baghdad University. "The individual is not safe from the others. He has to hide. He doesn't want people to see him because he thinks the people are evil."

Amid the fear and loathing, a long-standing tribal tradition has disappeared. Etiquette used to require men to ask one another about their jobs; it was a way of showing concern for a friend's livelihood and to demonstrate willingness to help a man if he had fallen on hard times.

These days, though, to ask about jobs is impolite — perhaps even dangerous. Instead, men find themselves throwing out other questions: How are you? What are you doing here?

"A lot of people are killed for no reason. So what do you think they'll do if you work for the Americans?" Abdullah asked. "That's it. You're a traitor."

Working for the Iraqi government is no better — everybody from university professors to national athletes to traffic police has been slaughtered by insurgents determined to bludgeon civic and social life to a standstill.

Iraq may be the only country in the world where militia members and anti-government insurgents walk the streets with bare faces while government workers, soldiers and cops cower behind masks.

"I wear a mask because I don't want people to know I'm working for the police," a 34-year-old officer named Ahmed Ali said on a recent afternoon. It was lunch hour, and he and some of his colleagues had driven across Baghdad through the 110-degree heat to gobble down lamb kebabs in a neighborhood where they knew fewer people.

The men are stationed in the volatile Dora area, south of downtown and one of Baghdad's bloodiest sectarian battlefields. Clad in matching blue button-downs and navy trousers, their pistols holstered on their waists, they said they didn't dare bring their badges or uniforms home, not even to launder them.

They described slipping from the house in civilian clothes, creeping into the station and changing hurriedly into their uniforms.

"In Dora, I'm well known," Ali said. "I have to wear a mask and sunglasses." Gunfire rattled a few blocks away as he spoke, but none of the police officers so much as glanced in that direction.

Amid the fear, some profit. The document forger, for one.

Assad Kheldoun, a 29-year-old who operates out of the religiously mixed neighborhood of Shaab, grinds out fake identity cards for about $30 apiece. "Exactly like the original," he boasts. But with one difference: a false name.

He's not selling to hustlers or mischief makers. Most of his clients are bus drivers, highway workers or car repairmen — people forced to make their living in Iraq's mean streets.

Last names are sectarian giveaways in Iraq, often deriving from tribes commonly known to be either Sunni or Shiite. Jaabour or Dulaimi, for instance, mean "Sunni" to Iraqis; so does the first name Omar.

Bayati is a popular surname for Iraqis looking to hide behind an adopted handle. So are Obeidi and Saadi. Those names are deliberately ambiguous, common to both Sunnis and Shiites. With a name that can go either way, Iraqis hedge their bets.

"People are getting killed because of their names," Kheldoun said. "In the past few months, everybody is asking for a false identity card. It's a phenomenon now. The people are scared."

At the nearly deserted Abu Tariq car dealership, the owners loitered wearily among their polished models on a recent afternoon. Business is grinding along slowly for the car salesmen — even those Iraqis reaping enough cash to treat themselves to new wheels are terrified of conspicuous consumption.

"A car like this could mark the end of your life," said the owner of the dealership, 60-year-old Abu Tariq.

His partner, 48-year-old Faiq Ubaidi, pointed a finger toward a $19,000 Toyota Avalon and an $11,000 Super Saloon Toyota. The pair have been gathering dust for the last year without a single inquiry, he griped.

"People say if they buy a car like this today, they'll be killed tomorrow," he said. "I myself would like to drive it downtown with my family and enjoy the air conditioning, but I wouldn't dare."

Fear gets fundamental in today's Baghdad: The Christian woman in an Islamic headdress won't give her name for fear of getting killed. She is 33, lives with her parents on a street dominated by Muslims and risks her life after breakfast every morning by slipping into the Green Zone for work.

She is terrified that word of her job will leak out to neighbors — even her cousins don't know that she works in the heart of the U.S.-backed Iraqi government.

"I deny everything," she said.

But religious isolation has been the most painful of all. She and her family no longer dare attend church on Sundays. And she has been forced to hide her identity with Islamic dress — a head scarf, or hijab, and robe, or abaya.

"It scares me: There are people who believe that all Christians are with the Americans," she said. "We can't trust each other now. I have to keep all my secrets and everything to myself, because I don't know the people in front of me."

Haircut, Shave Can Mean Life Or Death In Baghdad (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

BAGHDAD -- In a country where people are killed because their names mark them as Shi'ites or Sunnis, having the wrong haircut can be lethal, too. So for barber Abu Saif, staying in business requires keeping up with the latest religious edicts.

"Being completely clean-shaven is not right," Mr. Saif explains as he draws his razor down a customer's cheek, then sweeps it back up toward his upper lip. He takes time over the cut -- a perfect upside-down question mark shave around the cheek that is most popular with Baghdad's religious Shi'ites.

"The 'Marine' cut, or shaven head, is forbidden. It is considered to be something of the foreigners," said Mr. Saif, 52, who has been cutting hair and shaving beards in his small Mansour barber shop since he was a boy of 12.

DOJ_NMG_0037181

Above all, he said, Iraqi barbers have given up "threading" -- a practice common in the Middle East and Asia that involves removing facial hair with two threads tied together, rather than with a razor.

For some, the punishment for doing so was death.

"I put a poster in the window of my shop, that I apologized for threading and I said we were not doing that anymore," Mr. Saif said. "This is terrorism. One day they attack bakers, the next day they attack barbers."

The shape of a beard or haircut often marks its wearer as Shi'ite or Sunni, ensuring support in some neighborhoods but putting him at risk in others.

Religious Sunnis, for example, do not remove any neck hair, and fundamental Wahhabis never shave or trim their beards, but will cut down their mustaches to almost nothing -- "zero to one" on the razor notch, Mr. Saif said.

The customer in his chair, a Shi'ite named Abu Sara, wears his hair short and has his beard trimmed every three weeks to a tight one-week growth.

A few people have changed their cuts to match ethnicities or religious leanings other than their own, he said. Mr. Saif dismisses them as cowards: "I know some are doing that, but as Shi'ites we don't need that 1 percent."

Young men who are not religiously minded have their own models.

"They get their ideas from actors on television, or some famous Iraqi singers or Brazilian soccer players," said Mr. Saif, who has about 20 customers a day. "Some cut most of their hair short then leave it long in front. Others wear their hair long but slicked back with a lot of gel."

Even boys come into the barber shop asking for specific cuts, he said, sometimes adding gel and perfume.

Weddings are big days at the local barber shops. A "wedding cut" includes a facial massage, eyebrow thinning, a good haircut, an extra-fine trimming of the beard and removal of unsightly ear hair.

"When I got married, I had curly hair, so I used a heating iron to straighten it out. After the wedding, my hair went back to normal and my wife was so surprised," Mr. Saif said with a laugh.

But the war and constant conflict have taken a toll on the typical barber-shop banter, he said. Customers still comment on social and political matters, and still ask for marriage advice, but politics have become a dangerous topic.

Mr. Saif recalls an argument with one of his customers over Saddam Hussein's trial, and said one of his clients took offense to another's comments after one of Baghdad's daily bombings.

"One of the customers informed on him, and then one of his friends came over and warned him not to speak like that anymore," he said.

Shi'ite Iraqi Militia Regroups Into 'Gang Of Thugs' (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

Prominent Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, a foe of the U.S. military presence in Iraq, has lost control of his Mahdi Army, which has embarked on a wide range of criminal activity, defense officials said.

The officials said the Mahdi Army, which once confined most of its activities to protecting the firebrand cleric's religious turf and trying to dominate towns in Shi'ite southern Iraq, has become a criminal organization that commits homicides, kidnappings and robberies in the Baghdad area.

"They are killing Sunnis. Looting," said a defense official briefed on the Mahdi Army's growing violence. "It has become a gang of thugs. Sadr has lost control."

Sources said Army Gen. George Casey, during his trip to Washington last week for talks with President Bush and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, raised the Mahdi Army as a growing obstacle to peace.

Gen. Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, gave no indication that U.S. forces will move against the thousands of Mahdi Army militiamen. But it was clear to those who heard Gen. Casey's talks that the new government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki will have to confront the militia with force if he is to carry out his goal of reducing violence in Baghdad.

Officials said they think the Mahdi Army is responsible for many of the execution-style killings of Sunni Muslims, whose bodies are found regularly dumped in the city and its suburbs.

The Mahdi Army is backed financially by Shi'ite-dominated Iran, which has poured agents and cash into southern Iraq since the fall of Saddam Hussein in 2003.

"Iran is encouraging lawlessness," the defense source said.

In a press conference Thursday, Gen. Casey listed "illegal armed groups" as one of four major security challenges in Iraq, along with meddling from Iran, the Sunni insurgency and al Qaeda in Iraq. He did not mention the Mahdi Army by name, but officials said he considers it an illegally armed group.

"These illegal armed groups are operating outside the rule of law," he said. "They need to be dealt with through a combination of political influence and security forces, and they will be. The government has stepped up to the challenge, has issued instructions for enforcing weapons bans in and around Baghdad and is committed to dealing with the illegal armed groups issue to protect their citizens."

Sheik al-Sadr created the militia shortly after U.S. forces ousted Saddam. U.S. intelligence sources said it has grown from a few hundred to perhaps 10,000, armed with AK-47s, mortars and explosives.

Twice in 2004, the U.S. Army launched successful offensive operations when the militia gained control of towns and villages. American soldiers, backed by Abrams main battle tanks, killed hundreds of Sheik al-Sadr's armed followers.

But the Mahdi Army has risen again, capitalizing on the withdrawal of some U.S. forces from the south and its ability to infiltrate the Iraqi police force and army.

Iran backs the army through training and money, defense officials said. Tehran's meddling has reached the point where Gen. Casey singled out the regime for criticism.

"We are quite confident that the Iranians, through their covert special operations forces, are providing weapons, [improvised explosive device] technology and training to Shi'a extremist groups in Iraq," Gen. Casey said.

U.S. Military Expects To Meet Training Goal For Iraqi Security Forces (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

U.S. military commanders expect to meet their goal of training and equipping more than 325,000 members of the new Iraqi security forces by the end of this year, an important step in developing Iraq's self-defense, Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, who leads the training effort, said yesterday.

Top officials remain optimistic that they will meet targets that call for training 137,000 troops for the Iraqi military and 188,000 people for Interior ministry units such as local police and the border patrol. But they warned that there is a long way to go before the Iraqis will be able to independently fight the insurgents.

"It's just not appropriate yet to be thinking in terms of independent anything in Iraq," Dempsey said. "This, remember, is a nation at war, and although they have taken responsibility for battle space, and large swaths of it . . . they are not independent at this point in time."

Dempsey, speaking to reporters at the Pentagon yesterday, said that Iraqi army troops are becoming increasingly capable as time goes on and that they share combat efforts with U.S. and coalition forces. Still, the Iraqi forces are not yet able to operate on their own, and the fact that they are learning while facing combat has created hurdles.

The development of Iraqi security forces is the cornerstone of the U.S. plan to give the new Iraqi government control of the war-torn nation. Even if the desired number of troops becomes available in six months, Dempsey said, they will need time to develop before they can take control from U.S. forces, especially in the contested areas of Baghdad and Anbar province to the west.

Nor are U.S. military leaders saying that a trained Iraqi military means that U.S. forces can leave Iraq soon.

"It's my belief . . . that we're going to be in Iraq for a long time," Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, told the House Armed Services Committee yesterday. "It's open-ended."

Dempsey said major progress has been made in the development of the Iraqi police, which number more than 100,000. He said officials expect 24,000 of 25,000 members of the border police will be trained and equipped by the end of July. And U.S. officials plan to provide nearly 2,800 armored Humvees to Iraqi forces to fight the insurgency.

Dempsey said the training effort's biggest challenge is finding capable leaders. In an effort to find 2,500 officers, trainers recalled about 3,800 who were in Saddam Hussein's military. After screenings and a six-week training program, 1,800 remained. But Dempsey said three military academy classes have produced 2,500 newly minted officers.

U.S. General Says Iraqi Army Will Be Built By End Of The Year (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 27 — The American general in charge of training Iraqi security forces said Tuesday that the new army would be formed and at full strength by the end of the year. But he cautioned that the new military in Iraq still faced a shortage of qualified officers and the infrastructure required to carry out independent operations.

The officer, Lt. Gen. Martin E. Dempsey, said the threat of armed militias could be resolved only by negotiations with religious leaders commanding those illegal groups, and by taking away their foot soldiers by offering them the choice of a role within government-controlled security services, an opportunity to disarm — or punishment.

And in a statement of battlefield realism rarely heard from a lecturn in Washington, General Dempsey said it was certain that a national reconciliation plan offered by the new Baghdad government would include amnesty for at least some who had engaged in insurgent acts.

"Isn't there some sense of inevitability about that?" General Dempsey said. But he quickly noted that Iraqi and United States officials would discuss in private how best to "establish the white lines" that would deny amnesty or pardon to those who had killed any Iraqis or troops from the American-led forces.

Political figures in Washington have loudly criticized members of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki's government for even considering an amnesty that would include insurgent fighters. In Baghdad on Tuesday, Mr. Maliki clarified his plans for amnesty, assuring that it would not be given to anyone who killed troops or Iraqi civilians.

General Dempsey said that without a national reconciliation plan that reaches out simultaneously to Sunni insurgents and Shiite militia members, neither side would disarm out of fear of the other.

The general's training efforts are the foundation of the Bush administration's plans for withdrawing troops as indigenous security forces grow in number and competence, and he spoke as Washington was boiling with debate over timetables for American troop reductions in Iraq.

"The Iraqi Army will be built by the end of this calendar year," General Dempsey declared at a Pentagon news conference.

General Dempsey said that by the end of the year, the army would be "fully capable of recruiting, vetting, inducting, training, forming into units, putting them in barracks, sending them out the gate to perform their missions."

But he expressed concerns about the ability of the Iraqi ministries to carry out military operations independent of American support, and about "leader development."

While military and police cadets "come out of a training base at a very high level of motivation," General Dempsey said, "we then turn them over to a police chief who maybe has bad habits from former times or a midgrade army officer who believes that leadership is an entitlement, not a responsibility."

Amnesty To Exclude Killers Of Gls, Iraqis (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Bassam Sebti

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, June 27 -- Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki vowed Tuesday that no one who has killed Americans or Iraqis would be pardoned under his government's national reconciliation plan.

"The fighter who did not kill anyone will be included in the amnesty, but the fighter who killed someone will not be," Maliki said in his first interview with Western print reporters since he became prime minister last month. "This is an international commitment, an ethical commitment: Whoever kills is not included in amnesty."

Sitting at the head of a polished wood conference table, beneath a framed Koranic verse -- "Consult with others and when you reach a decision, trust in God" -- Maliki spoke for nearly an hour about the need to build up the Iraqi army before U.S. and other foreign forces could withdraw, his desire to disband violent militias and the terms of his two-day-old reconciliation plan.

The question of who should receive amnesty has been fiercely debated, and the issue was not settled with the vague terms first offered on Sunday, when the plan was brought before parliament. Some politicians argue that only a broader amnesty has any real chance of bringing the violent Sunni Arab insurgency into the Iraqi political process in a peaceful way. But Maliki, a Shiite Muslim who heads a government led by Shiite religious parties, said the Iraqi and American families who have lost loved ones in the three-year war would not stand for such pardons.

"We have people who have confessed to killing 10, 20, 50, sometimes 100 Iraqis or Americans," he said. "And I think if a general amnesty was announced, it would have a very negative reaction."

Maliki said lesser offenses, such as minor acts of sabotage or participation in former president Saddam Hussein's Baath Party could be forgiven.

Maliki spoke on a day when the U.S. military announced that three American soldiers and a Marine had been killed in Iraq. Two of the soldiers and the Marine died over the past two days from fighting in the embattled western province of Anbar. The third soldier was killed by a roadside bomb Tuesday while on a foot patrol south of Baghdad.

During the interview, Maliki refused to set a date for when he wanted U.S. troops to withdraw. "As the readiness of Iraqi troops goes up," he said, "the need for American or international troops goes down."

"I would also say that all the Iraqis are looking forward to the day when all foreign troops" are gone, he said.

In the two days since Maliki set forth the outline of his reconciliation plan during a speech in parliament, response from Iraq's Sunni Arab minority has been disparate. Some elder Sunni politicians, such as Adnan al-Dulaimi, as well as the Sunni Endowment, the government body that oversees Sunni mosques and religious affairs, have endorsed the plan.

DOJ_NMG_0037184

In addition, Maliki said, seven insurgent groups have expressed through a third party their desire to enter in discussions with the government. Maliki declined to name the groups.

To further the reconciliation, government employees who had been detained and then released would be reinstated in their jobs with no detrimental effect on their bonuses or chance at promotion, the Council of Ministers said in a statement Tuesday. Students who spent time in prison would not be failed for missing class and could make up final exams.

The Mujaheddin al-Shura Council, an umbrella group of insurgents including al-Qaeda in Iraq, derided the reconciliation plan in an online statement, saying that "there will be no reconciliation with the apostates, nor will our swords be put in their sheaths."

A member of the Islamic Army of Iraq, an insurgent group, said this week that violent attacks would continue until all American troops left Iraq.

Adnan Thiyab al-Jubouri, a Sunni member of parliament, has already decided negotiations with insurgents are over.

"We worked hard trying to make one of the resistance armed groups accept the reconciliation project but we failed," he said. "We've been in direct contact with most of them, except al-Qaeda. They said it is impossible for the Iraqi armed resistance to stop. They insist that this is their right to get rid of the occupation."

Another Sunni in parliament, Hussein Shukr al-Falluji, said it is too soon to say whether insurgent groups will embrace Maliki's proposal but described the reconciliation plan as "born crippled."

"This thing is not as easy as some people have said. I think it follows an American ideology, not an Iraqi one," he said. "If it is not agreed that the foreign forces in Iraq are occupiers and the people fighting them are resistance, then there is no way of thinking of reconciliation, never."

The violence targeted by the government's olive branch has shown no sign of abating. Bombings killed scores of Iraqis over the past two days, including a suicide car bomb that exploded Tuesday at a gas station in the northern city of Kirkuk, killing at least three people and wounding 14.

Also Tuesday, the Iraqi tribunal prosecuting Hussein for crimes against humanity said a second trial, in the killings of tens of thousands of Iraqi Kurds in 1988, will begin on Aug. 21. Hussein and six of his aides, including Ali Hassan al-Majeed, known as "Chemical Ali" for his alleged use of chemical weapons against the Kurds, will be tried.

Prosecutors have recommended the death penalty for Hussein in the first trial, on charges of ordering the killing of 148 Shiites from the village of Dujail after an assassination attempt against him there in 1982.

Iraqi Says Attacks On U.S. Won't Be Pardoned (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise And John F. Burns

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 27 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki said publicly on Tuesday for the first time that attacks on American soldiers would not be pardoned under the rules of a new Iraqi amnesty plan.

In his first meeting with Western journalists since he became prime minister a month ago, Mr. Maliki sought to allay concerns raised by many in the United States that the plan, which he unveiled Sunday as part of a broad effort to reduce insurgent violence, could lead to pardons for some who had killed American soldiers and spur attacks on American units.

Americans, he said, came to Iraq to help make it free. "Therefore, out of respect for their contribution to Iraq," no pardon will be offered to their killers, or to insurgents who have killed Iraqi soldiers and police officers, he said.

It was the most unequivocal statement by any Iraqi official about the amnesty, which had caused confusion among Iraqi political leaders as well as American officials since it was announced in broad terms on Sunday.

The amnesty is part of a "national reconciliation" program that Mr. Maliki, a Shiite, offered in an effort to find a political solution to the violence that continues to kill dozens of people a day, a vast majority of them Iraqi civilians. Iraq now has an elected government with a four-year term, but it has failed to improve security here in the battered capital, where Sunni and Shiite militias continue to kill with impunity, and some neighborhoods have sunk into conditions resembling anarchy.

Insurgent violence on Tuesday claimed the lives of 21 Iraqis and 2 American servicemen, and wounded an additional 41 people. The American military also announced the deaths of 2 service members killed Monday in fighting in Anbar Province.

Mr. Maliki was at pains on Tuesday to explain his reconciliation plan, which emerged from long consultations with the competing political blocs in his national unity government, but drew criticism for the vagueness of its amnesty provisions. They reflected the deep divisions in the government.

Religious Shiites strongly opposed amnesty for Sunni insurgents, while Sunni Arabs said it would be meaningless without provisions to encourage insurgents to disarm. The Americans strongly favored reaching out to the insurgents, but opposed anything amounting to a pardon for rebels who participated in killing Americans, more than 2,500 of whom have died in the three-year war.

Despite the vagueness of the amnesty terms, Mr. Maliki said the plan had drawn widespread interest from groups important to its success, including members of political militias, tribal groups, religious leaders and insurgent groups. He would not identify the insurgent groups.

Asked to identify the sort of groups and individuals who would be eligible, he cited Iraqis who had carried out "sabotage" against the government, though only "minor" acts, as well as to those who had joined the insurgency out of hostility for the American-sponsored political process but had not killed anyone. He said it also would apply to members of the Baath Party of Saddam Hussein who renounced that allegiance. Insurgents who face trial over attacks would be eligible for pardons if they were found not guilty of any killings.

"Whoever can prove himself innocent of murder in the judicial process will be allowed to join the political process," he said.

Allies of Mr. Maliki have said that the amnesty, presented by American officials and the prime minister's aides among many initiatives that would give momentum to the new government, reflected his relative political weakness.

"Maliki's intentions are good, but he is not free to do as he likes," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish member of Parliament. "He is part of this Shiite bloc, and they don't believe in this initiative to begin with."

Also on Tuesday, American military commanders released new details about three American servicemen killed by insurgents last week near Yusufiya. Maj. Gen. James Thurman, the commander of American forces in Baghdad, said 8,000 American and Iraqi troops followed a trail of "evidence," in a power plant, in a pickup truck there and on a canal road that helped lead to the bodies of two of the soldiers who had disappeared after an attack on June 16. The third soldier, who was killed in the initial attack, was found in the canal, he said.

"We did not know the demise of the two soldiers at that point," he said. Also on Tuesday, the Iranian Fars News Agency reported that President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran would visit Iraq to meet President Jalal Talabani. A spokesman for Mr. Talabani, Kameran Qaradaghi, said he had no details about the visit.

Iraq Leader Cites Rebel Interest In Amnesty (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — The Iraqi government has had contact with several insurgent organizations through intermediaries since the announcement of a partial amnesty plan, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki said Tuesday.

Under Maliki's proposal, amnesty would be offered to insurgents who have not killed anyone, in return for their disarming and submitting to Iraqi law.

"Many people contacted me on the day I announced the reconciliation plan, and there is a lot of support even from militias and … armed [insurgent] groups," Maliki said during a rare interview with six Western and Iraqi journalists. "We welcome their assistance, but we are still waiting until we can meet directly with these groups and talk to them in a civilized way in order to bring them into the political process. These groups contacted us indirectly through mediators."

Maliki declined to identify the groups.

The ambitious reconciliation plan announced Sunday comes on the heels of security clampdowns in Baghdad and Basra. Maliki is also developing economic and reconstruction proposals meant to present his government as strong and decisive, focused on national rather than sectarian concerns.

Although many have criticized the amnesty plan as not ambitious enough, vague or too conciliatory toward insurgents, Iraq's disparate political groups appear to be giving Maliki a great deal of political leeway on the basis of his reputation as a pragmatic and objective leader.

"Since his first days in office, he's shown a great understanding and support of the national project," said Ammar Wajih of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the main Sunni Arab parliamentary coalition.

"He is the first elected Iraqi prime minister who addressed the issue of reconciliation matched with a security plan," the lawmaker said. "The reconciliation is an official recognition of the existence of the resistance … as distinguished from the terrorist groups."

Abbas Bayati, a Shiite lawmaker, said Maliki's efforts showed that he was willing to take a tack different from that of his predecessors.

"Maliki … wants to send a message to the neighboring countries and the U.S. that he will not only use force to handle the security" issue.

Maliki also "would like to give space for policy and dialogue with the resistance," Bayati said. "He would like to use the policy of stick and carrot."

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, at a news conference Sunday, said there had been "a lot more dynamism and activity" by Maliki than his predecessor, fellow Islamic Dawa Party member Ibrahim Jafari.

"Quite a lot has already been done in terms of considering issues and deciding on them," Khalilzad said.

Despite Maliki's nonsectarian reputation among Iraq's political elite, he has been constrained by members of his Shiite bloc who are wary of any plan that might appear to appease the Sunni-led insurgents.

Maliki insisted that "amnesty doesn't include those who have killed Iraqis or even coalition forces, because those soldiers came to Iraq under international agreements to help Iraq."

"The fighter who did not kill anyone will be included in the amnesty," he said. "But the fighter who killed someone will not be included."

It was not immediately clear how the program would go about categorizing each fighter.

Maliki said that extending amnesty to violent insurgents was impossible.

"There are demands for general amnesty, but in my opinion this is wrong," he said. "We have people we have detained who have confessed to killing 10, 20, 50, 100 Iraqis and Americans.

"It would result in a very bad reaction among Iraqis whose family members have been killed by those people, or even Americans with families who have been killed by those people."

Shiites are not alone in opposing a general amnesty. A bipartisan group of U.S. lawmakers strongly condemned any move that would pardon insurgents who had attacked American soldiers.

Asked to specify who would be eligible for amnesty, Maliki said it would apply to those who had not committed violent acts.

"We divide crimes into two parts," he said. "One is related to blood and killing and the other is related to opposing the government and sabotaging government institutions."

Also eligible would be "those involved with illegitimate parties, like the Baathists, who want to come back into the political process but not under their old ideology."

The reconciliation plan concerns Mahmoud Othman, a prominent Kurdish lawmaker, who said that a peace process that excludes the violent insurgents will fail.

"Insurgents in general have spilled blood," Othman said. "If you just reconcile with people who haven't caused any violence, then the violence will continue."

Othman said that Maliki probably would prefer to offer more concessions to insurgent groups but that he must be careful not to appear to be soft on terrorism.

"He's not free to do what he wants, so when he talks publicly he talks that way to avoid pressure here and there, but in his mind he wants to go further," Othman said. "I know him — he's realistic and he wants to be serious."

Othman said Maliki's recent contact with insurgents proved his willingness to go further than his comments might indicate. The lawmaker said the rebel groups had been put in contact with Maliki by Sunni tribal figures, American officials and even President Jalal Talabani, who has been holding his own talks with insurgent sympathizers.

"Some of these moderators are living in Amman [Jordan], some in Anbar, some in Syria," Othman said. "They have contacts with the other side and with us."

During the interview, Maliki appeared relaxed and eager to answer journalists' questions. The session took place in a conference room at his presidential complex as assistants served fruit juice and tea. A framed verse of the Koran in florid script read, "Take counsel with others and when you have reached a decision together, put your faith in Allah."

Maliki, a member of the Shiite opposition during the reign of Saddam Hussein, led Dawa Party guerrilla operations while in exile in Syria and Lebanon. Upon his return to Iraq in 2003, he served on the De-Baathification Committee formed to purge members of the former regime and sat on the national constitution-drafting committee.

Since he was chosen prime minister in April, Maliki's precarious position between so many competing agendas has engendered sympathy even from prominent Sunni leaders such as Ahmed Abdel Ghafour Samaraie, head of the Sunni Waqf endowment, the government agency that maintains Sunni houses of worship. The influential group endorsed Maliki's plan Tuesday.

Hassan Sunayed, a Dawa Party member and acquaintance of Maliki's for 25 years, said the prime minister's deliberate style was necessary in Iraq's fractious political environment.

"He is wise and open and never rushes things," Sunayed said. "He is strict and forceful when it comes to the law…. I lived with him a long time and lived under the same roof with his family. He consults about everything — even his tie!"

Samaraie acknowledged Sunni discontent with some aspects of Maliki's proposal and his cautious pace but said he trusted his intentions and understood his limitations.

"He's the proper man for this period and we hope he can succeed," Samaraie said. "Actually, whatever his successes, it is not just his gain, it is for all of Iraq. This is why we are now supporting him."

A Road Map Home (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

"Every war must end," says Zalmay Khalilzad, America's ambassador to Baghdad. And while termination of the brutal conflict in Iraq is hard to imagine right now, top U.S. officials are sketching a road map to begin stabilizing the conflict and withdrawing American troops.

Khalilzad outlined the Bush administration's current thinking about Iraq in a telephone interview from Baghdad on Monday. The items on his agenda include a joint U.S.-Iraqi committee to discuss the details for a gradual withdrawal of American troops over the next several years, a conditional amnesty for Iraqi insurgents as part of a broader reconciliation effort, and negotiations with insurgent groups about terms and conditions for ending the fighting.

What was clear in Khalilzad's comments (but is rarely so in the partisan Washington debate about Iraq) is how badly the Bush administration wants to find a way out of the Iraq morass. Last week was an example of this disconnect, with Republican legislators blasting Democrats for advocating phased troop withdrawals, even as Gen. George Casey, the U.S. military commander in Iraq, was quietly discussing just such a withdrawal timetable at the Pentagon. As is usually the case with Iraq, the Baghdad version of what's going on is far more useful than the Washington version, so it's worth paying careful attention to Khalilzad's account.

Reconciliation sounds fine in principle, but in practice it can be agonizing. I asked Khalilzad how he would answer members of Congress who are indignant that insurgents who opposed the U.S. occupation might be pardoned by the Iraqi government. "They need to understand that we want this conflict to end," he said, and stressed that Iraqi and American hopes of reducing U.S. forces can be achieved only if the insurgents agree to stop fighting and recognize the Iraqi government's authority. "The biggest thing we can do to honor those who sacrificed here is to achieve the cause they fought for" by creating a peaceful and democratic Iraq, he said.

"Ending a war is as difficult as fighting a war," Khalilzad went on. He noted that many conflicts in American history have ended with a general or partial amnesty -- from the Whiskey Rebellion to the Civil War to the U.S. Army's battle against insurgents in the Philippines. "To end a war, you must balance the requirements of reconciliation with the requirements of justice," he explained. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki seemed to be trying to strike such a balance yesterday when he said any amnesty shouldn't apply to insurgents who had actually killed Americans or Iraqis.

A key part of the Bush administration's strategy is to involve Maliki's government in discussions about withdrawal of U.S. troops. Gen. Casey briefed the Pentagon last week on his hopes to cut the number of U.S. combat brigades in Iraq by more than half by the end of 2007, according to a story in Sunday's New York Times. Casey will soon meet with Maliki to form the joint U.S.-Iraqi committee that can oversee the buildup of Iraqi security forces and the corresponding drawdown of U.S. troops.

"When we establish that committee," Khalilzad explained, "the subject will be the withdrawal of U.S. forces, and the conditions related to a road map for an ultimate withdrawal of U.S. troops." He stressed, however, that there was no automatic timetable for withdrawal and that he expected Maliki "will be on the cautious side."

The political-military strategy embraced by Khalilzad and Casey over the past year has combined aggressive military operations against die-hard insurgent groups with outreach to elements of the Sunni insurgency that (in theory) can be co-opted. After killing the worst of the worst, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, U.S. and Iraqi forces have pushed hard on both fronts -- taking down Zarqawi's networks and simultaneously talking with Sunni groups. Khalilzad said Monday that this outreach effort had made significant progress in the past few days.

"Contacts have been made with the Iraqi government and the coalition, by people who say they are associated with the insurgency, about reaching an agreement," he said. Among the issues under discussion, he said, is whether some of the Sunni insurgent groups can be melded into the Iraqi security forces, as is being done with Shiite and Kurdish militias. "I would not rule it out," Khalilzad said.

Listening to America's ultra-realist ambassador, it's obvious that the buzzwords of the Washington political debate -- "cut and run," "troops out now" -- don't have much relevance for what the generals and diplomats are trying to achieve. This messy war won't end with a victory parade but with a process that is messy itself -- slow, precarious, ambiguous. But the alternative is an open-ended U.S. military occupation of Iraq that nobody wants. As Khalilzad put it: "If you don't want reconciliation, it means you must fight on."

Talking With Iraqi Insurgents (NYT)

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

It is a measure of how far Washington has scaled down its expectations on Iraq that this week's most encouraging news consisted of some highly tentative feelers for direct talks between the armed Shiite parties that dominate Iraq's government and some of the armed Sunni insurgent groups that have been fighting it.

Don't get us wrong. We, too, are encouraged that Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki has announced a promising, though not fully spelled out, national reconciliation program aimed at attracting wider support from the restive Sunni Arab minority. We are even more encouraged that several Sunni insurgent groups have reportedly approached the government with the idea of beginning negotiations.

If these approaches lead to successful talks with important elements of the insurgency, it would be a crucial breakthrough. Productive negotiations could help transform the newly formed Maliki cabinet into a true government of national unity, not just a symbolic parceling out of cabinet jobs among Shiite, Kurdish and Sunni politicians.

An agreement with major insurgent groups would also be an important step toward eventually enabling the Iraqi government to stand on its own, without having to rely indefinitely on tens of thousands of American troops to hold down the Sunni western provinces. Such an agreement could stabilize some areas enough to allow the kind of infrastructure repair and economic reconstruction that could generate genuine support from ordinary Iraqis.

Nobody should underestimate the obstacles. But if Mr. Maliki is prepared to be a strong national leader, rather than a captive of the Shiite parties that put him in power, there is a chance that they can be overcome.

One big issue is amnesty. Insurgent groups are unlikely to agree to lay down their arms without some assurances of amnesty for their fighters. Yet the Iraqi government talks about denying amnesty to insurgents who have killed other Iraqis, and Washington has insisted on excluding those who have killed Americans. That is understandable on both counts, but it would seem to leave few, if any, real insurgents eligible for any amnesty.

There is also the question of dropping employment restrictions and other penalties against all but the highest echelons of former Baath Party members — those with direct responsibility for the major crimes of the Saddam Hussein era. For most of the rest, party membership was often a condition for employment, promotion and, in some cases, survival. But many Shiites and Kurds, who suffered systematic discrimination under Baath rule, want to penalize even lower-level Baathists.

Any reconciliation broad enough to matter will require embracing unsavory people and forgiving unsavory deeds. That won't be pretty or popular. But it is Iraq's best remaining hope for peace, reconstruction and national survival.

U.S. Urged To Press Kurds In Iraq (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

The United States' Kurdish allies in northern Iraq have provided arms, shelter and equipment to a violent Kurdish separatist movement in Turkey, and the U.S. government should do more to disrupt the links, Turkey's ambassador to Washington said yesterday.

Ambassador Nabi Sensoy said Ankara has evidence that as many as 3,000 fighters from the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), considered a terrorist organization by the U.S. government, recently had moved from positions in northern Iraq to the Turkish border to carry out operations inside Turkey.

The PKK units, Mr. Sensoy said, have received arms, safe passage and other logistical help from the two leading Iraqi Kurdish parties -- both of which are strongly allied with Washington.

"The United States is on record saying it is an enemy of terrorism wherever it is in the world," Mr. Sensoy told editors and reporters at The Washington Times yesterday. "We take the United States at its word."

Turkey long has feared that the emergence of an independent Kurdish state on its border after the breakup of Iraq could revive the bloody separatist strife that has killed an estimated 35,000 people since 1984.

Mr. Sensoy said his government understands that U.S. forces face grave security challenges in other parts of Iraq and that an armed intervention against the PKK was unlikely. He said the United States also had helped disrupt Kurdish funding links in Western Europe.

But he said Washington should use its influence on its Iraqi Kurdish allies to end their links to the PKK, and to disrupt the militants' command-and-control networks.

"You have great influence over these people," he said, adding that average Turks were increasingly frustrated by the apparent inability to contain the PKK threat from Iraq.

On Cyprus, Mr. Sensoy said he thought the Bush administration was close to revealing a series of measures to ease the isolation of Turkish Cypriots after the April 2004 vote on a United Nations-endorsed plan to reunify the long-divided Mediterranean island state.

The Turkish enclave, which is recognized only by Ankara and protected by Turkish troops, voted in support of the plan, while the majority Greek Cypriots overwhelmingly rejected it.

"The United States is very much aware of what happened," Mr. Sensoy said, adding that ending the U.S. ban on direct flights to the Turkish enclave "is a very good bet."

He said eventual membership in the European Union is a central pillar of Turkey's foreign policy, but no Turkish government could make concessions on Cyprus when the European Union membership talks barely have begun.

Turkey remains central to U.S. foreign policy on a variety of fronts, including Iran's nuclear program, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and relations with the Islamic world. Mr. Sensoy said Turkey, an overwhelmingly Muslim nation with a rigorously secular democratic government, was a key to avoiding a "clash of civilizations" in the post-September 11 world.

"The success of Turkey's secular state is a very important project for the Islamic world and for the world at large," he said. "We are a litmus test. We have to succeed."

Hussein To Face Genocide Charges In Anfal Trial (LAT)

By J. Michael Kennedy

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — Saddam Hussein and six high-ranking members of his regime will be indicted on charges of genocide this summer in the mass killings of Iraqi Kurds during a seven-month operation in 1988, the court trying the former Iraqi president announced Tuesday.

The defendants, including Hussein's cousin, Ali Hassan Majid, also known as Chemical Ali because of his alleged role in gas attacks on the Kurds, are scheduled to appear before the court Aug. 21.

"We will hear the reading of the accusations against the defendants, some testimony and other procedural matters," said Jaafar Mousawi, a prosecutor serving in the Iraqi High Tribunal.

Iraq's minority Kurds, who inhabit the northern portion of the country, have long sought justice for the Anfal campaign, in which at least 2,000 villages were destroyed and tens of thousands of people were arrested, deported, tortured and killed, often in remote desert camps.

Anfal, which means "the spoils," is taken from a Koranic verse calling for the striking of fear in nonbelievers. Iraqis use the term to refer to the campaign between Feb. 23 and Sept. 6, 1988, when an entire swath of the Kurdish population was eradicated. The Iraqi army used mustard gas and nerve agents to wipe out Kurdish villages during that period.

The announcement of the Anfal trial came as a current trial of Hussein and seven others winds down. The former Iraqi leader and his codefendants are being tried in the killings of 148 Shiite Muslim residents from the town of Dujayl in 1982. Final defense arguments in the case are scheduled for July 10, and a verdict is expected in September. Prosecutors are seeking the death penalty for Hussein and at least two other defendants in the case.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, has said that Hussein will be tried for all his alleged crimes before any of the sentences are carried out. Under Iraqi criminal law, the second trial will begin with a detailed indictment of the charges against the former Iraqi military commanders, including Hussein.

Besides the former president, the best known of those who will go on trial in August is Majid, who is accused of playing a leading role in the Anfal killings.

He has been accused of directing a gas attack against the Kurdish village of Halabja in March 1988, killing an estimated 5,000 people. The alleged perpetrators will be tried separately, even though that attack took place in the same period as Anfal.

The other five defendants in the Anfal case were identified by the Associated Press as former Defense Minister Sultan Hashim Ahmad Jabburi Tai; former intelligence chief Sabir Abdel-Aziz Douri; former Republican Guard commander Hussein Tikriti; former Nineveh provincial Gov. Taher Tawfiq Ani; and former top military commander Farhan Mutlaq Jubouri.

Many of the Anfal victims are believed to have been buried in mass graves. Those burial sites are being systematically investigated and the findings are expected to be presented as evidence at the trial.

Rice Strives To Close Afghan-Pakistani Rift (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, June 27 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice sought Tuesday to heal a rift between Pakistan and Afghanistan, two Muslim allies of the United States, but tensions spilled over during a news conference in which Pakistani Foreign Minister Khursheed Kasuri angrily accused the Afghan government of making false charges.

Rice smiled tightly during Kasuri's emotional, five-minute outburst, which was prompted by a question about Afghan claims that Pakistan is allowing its largely lawless border areas to shelter insurgents who are mounting their biggest offensive in Afghanistan since the Taliban was ousted in 2001.

With close to 10,000 international troops conducting sweeps in rugged southern Afghanistan, Rice's trip here was organized on short notice in an effort to end feuding that many analysts say is undermining efforts to stabilize the government of President Hamid Karzai.

Kasuri said Pakistan would add 10,000 troops to the 80,000 now operating in areas bordering Afghanistan. He noted that already "we have 650-plus martyred soldiers." Officials offered few other details of the content of the talks.

Rice flew Wednesday to Kabul to meet with Karzai, who is facing mounting international criticism over his performance. As she traveled to Islamabad on Monday, Rice hailed Karzai as "an extraordinary leader" and said the United States would "back him fully."

Rice's visit comes as Karzai is straining to hold his country together but is losing popular support because of increasing violence, corruption, drug trafficking and an inability to demonstrate tangible progress since the fall of the Taliban. A failure of the Karzai government would undermine Bush administration claims that Afghanistan has become a symbol of rising freedom and democracy in the world.

It is a sensitive time in Pakistan, too. With elections scheduled for next year, there are signs that Gen. Pervez Musharraf -- whose military efforts in the border areas are not popular in Pakistan -- is maneuvering to extend his presidential term. He seized power in a bloodless coup nearly seven years ago, and Rice reiterated her belief that the 2007 elections would be "free and fair."

But U.S. officials have been wary about pressing Musharraf too hard, seeking to balance demands for action against extremist groups with tangible U.S. rewards, such as sales of F-16 fighter jets, many analysts say.

In the news conference, Kasuri said he had recently met with Afghan Foreign Minister Rangin Dadfar Spanta. They had pledged not to debate each other through the media, he said, but he told reporters he could not remain silent. He said he told Spanta, "Excellency, brother, you are a scholar and professor, give me a motive why we would willingly destabilize you."

Kasuri pointedly said Pakistan could not be blamed for recent riots in Kabul, which were sparked when a U.S. military truck crashed into a crowd. He said that Afghanistan, for all its complaints about terrorists taking sanctuary in Pakistan, has provided little intelligence that was useful.

"Tell me, brother, have you ever given us actionable intelligence?" he said he asked Spanta, noting that intelligence that Karzai personally gave President Bush was later deemed "out of date" by the CIA.

"Tell us where they are hiding," Kasuri demanded. "We promise to investigate and take action."

Pakistan is eager for oil and gas deals and greater trade with Central Asia, which would be dependent on a secure Afghanistan, Kasuri said, asking, "Which country has a greater stake in peace and stability in Afghanistan?"

After Kasuri's statement, Rice minimized the dispute, saying that "our view is that we have two good friends and two fierce fighters in the war on terror." She said the key to success was greater unity, not division.

"We, Afghanistan and Pakistan are going to unify all our efforts, as we have done over the last several years, towards the goal of eliminating the threat of al-Qaeda and the Taliban," Rice said.

Rice Gently Prods Pakistan To Have Democratic Elections (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, June 27 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice sought Tuesday to prop up two troubled leaders whose success is crucial to the administration on two fronts: the fight against terrorism and relations with the Muslim world.

Arriving here on Tuesday evening, Ms. Rice met with President Pervez Musharraf, whom she prodded, gently, to allow democratic elections. "We've had a discussion about the role of continuing democratization," Ms. Rice said after the meeting. "It's a good start to talk about a good and moderate Pakistan."

Ms. Rice refrained from wading into the continuing fight between Pakistan and Afghanistan over who is doing more to root out terrorism on the lawless border between the countries amid surging Taliban attacks.

She had strong words of praise for the besieged Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, whom she will see Wednesday morning in Kabul.

"This is an extraordinary leader and we're going to back him, and back him fully," Ms. Rice said. "And when he has problems, we're going to sit with him and we're going to find ways to resolve those problems."

State Department officials did not announce that Ms. Rice was going to Pakistan until a few hours before she boarded the flight to Islamabad. In Pakistan, Ms. Rice had to play referee in the bickering between Afghanistan and Pakistan. Afghan officials, including Mr. Karzai, have accused the Pakistanis of failing to do enough to rein in the recent spate of Taliban-fueled violence.

That subject is clearly a touchy one with the Pakistanis, and on Tuesday, when a reporter asked the Pakistani foreign minister, Khurshid Mahmood Kasuri, about the Afghan complaints, he became very animated.

With Ms. Rice standing next to him looking straight ahead, Mr. Kasuri went through a lengthy list of all he said Pakistan had given to fighting terrorism. He said Pakistan has deployed 80,000 troops on the border, and would add 10,000 shortly.

"We have had 650 martyred soldiers" since the border effort began, he said. "We have more troops than Afghanistan and the U.S. put together."

DOJ_NMG_0037191

The United States has about 25,000 troops in Afghanistan, but is in the process of turning over control of some areas to NATO forces. A springtime offensive by Taliban fighters has turned into the strongest show of force since American forces chased the Taliban from power in late 2001, and Afghan and foreign officials and local villagers blame a lack of United States-led coalition forces on the ground for the resurgence.

Pakistani officials also had criticism on Tuesday for the American nuclear deal with India. The deal, which needs Congressional approval, would allow the United States to share civilian nuclear technology with India despite Delhi's refusal to sign the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. Pakistan, which also has not signed the treaty and, like India, has tested nuclear weapons, wants the same deal.

Bush administration officials say they will not get it, in part because the architect of Pakistan's nuclear program, Abdul Qadeer Khan, is believed to have shared nuclear knowledge and material with North Korea, Iran and other countries.

Waiting outside the hall at the presidential palace while Ms. Rice was meeting with Mr. Musharraf, Tasnim Aslam, the spokeswoman for the Foreign Ministry, got almost as riled up as her boss did when a reporter mentioned Mr. Khan's proliferation activities as the stumbling block to Pakistan getting a similar deal.

"Who has not proliferated?" she said. "What about all those U.S. scientists who proliferated? Where do you think the Manhattan Project comes from?"

She said Pakistanis believed that Mr. Khan's house arrest was punishment enough.

Rice Seeks To Ease Neighbors' Tensions (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice began a brief visit to Pakistan and Afghanistan yesterday aimed at easing recent tensions between the two neighbors over fighting remnants of the Taliban militia along their common border.

Miss Rice thrust herself into the middle of the squabble, standing beside Pakistani Foreign Minister Khursheed Kasuri at a press conference and smiling tightly while he rejected Afghan accusations that Pakistan is sending terrorists across the border in an emotional monologue.

As she urged the two countries to trust each other more, the secretary also said the U.S. military would step up joint efforts with both of them to quell the resurgence of Taliban activity along the frontier, which she called "a very difficult and somewhat stubborn problem."

"The piece we need to work harder on is the cooperation that is U.S.-Afghan-Pakistani in that region," Miss Rice told reporters traveling with her. "Our military people have had discussions with the Pakistanis about what more can be done."

Violence in Afghanistan, particularly in the south, is at its worst since the Taliban was driven from power after the September 11 attacks. More than 1,100 people have been killed so far this year.

Pakistan says it has deployed about 80,000 troops in the lawless tribal region of North Waziristan, and that they have killed about 300 militants in the past year.

But last week, Afghan President Hamid Karzai accused Islamabad of sheltering Taliban militants and, in effect, sending them to kill Afghan civilians. He also said the U.S.-led coalition forces were not doing enough to protect his citizens.

Mr. Kasuri, who hosted Afghan Foreign Minister Rangin Spanta last week, said they agreed not to resolve their differences through the press. Nevertheless, he said he felt an obligation to respond to the accusations, insisting that Pakistan had no reason to destabilize its neighbor.

"Who can understand Afghanistan better than Pakistan?" he asked rhetorically. "Which country has a greater stake in peace and stability in Afghanistan?"

He said Pakistan wants cross-border oil and gas pipelines, more trade and investment that could not take place until Afghanistan stabilizes.

Mr. Kasuri challenged the Afghan government to substantiate its claims that militants are hiding out in the Pakistani city of Quetta by providing "actionable intelligence" -- a phrase widely used by the Bush administration in its argument that the September 11 attacks could not have been anticipated.

"Tell us where they are hiding," the minister said. "We promise to investigate and take action."

Miss Rice, who flies to Kabul, Afghanistan, early this morning, discouraged Mr. Karzai from his intention to use tribal militias to provide security in parts of Afghanistan that security forces cannot reach.

"He's always talked about trying to do things in the context of moving toward regular police and army forces, because he is the one who initiated, after all, the demobilization of militias, and I don't think he wants to take a step backwards," she said.

Condoleezza Rice Visits Pakistan (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — A top Pakistani official delivered a muscular defense Tuesday of his nation's effort to track down Al Qaeda and Taliban insurgents in its territory and to help ease warfare in neighboring Afghanistan.

Foreign Minister Mian Khursheed Mehmood Kasuri's response to suggestions that Pakistan had not done enough to rein in the militants came after he and the country's leader, President Pervez Musharraf, met with U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Rice in turn offered praise to Pakistan and Afghanistan, saying they were united in their efforts to counter the threat posed by Al Qaeda and the Taliban.

The secretary was beginning a two-day visit to the South Asian nations to shore up anti-terrorism efforts, promote democracy and demonstrate anew U.S. support for Afghan President Hamid Karzai. She is scheduled to meet today with Karzai during a roughly five-hour visit to Afghanistan.

Her trip, which will also include Russia, encapsulates major goals of the Bush administration's foreign policy: seeking to promote democratic growth as a weapon against terrorism and to undercut potential nuclear proliferation.

Visits by senior U.S. officials to Pakistan regularly revolve around questions of how devoted Musharraf, an army general who has refused to give up his military post, is to pushing his country toward democracy and how quickly he will move. Those issues drew attention during President Bush's visit here in March.

On the final two days of the trip, Rice will meet in Moscow with foreign ministers of the Group of 8 industrialized nations, which consist of the United States, Russia, Britain, Canada, France, Germany, Italy and Japan. The conference is expected to focus largely on efforts to restrain what the officials see as Iran's efforts to develop a nuclear weapon.

The question of PakistaniAfghan cooperation to fight militant groups along their shared border has drawn renewed interest recently as insurgent attacks have intensified in the Kandahar region of southern Afghanistan.

Kasuri, growing animated, said he recently met with his Afghan counterpart, addressing him as "brother." He insisted that no country was more interested than Pakistan in seeing Afghanistan become a stable democracy, given the latter's potential role in helping ship energy supplies from Central Asia to market.

He spoke at a news conference with Rice, and was responding to a questioner who cited Karzai's often-voiced complaint that Pakistan had not done enough to root out insurgents hiding in what is widely referred to as its ungoverned tribal area along the border.

Pakistan, he said, had given refuge to 4 million people from Afghanistan who fled during a decade of Soviet control, a period followed by chaos and the eventual rise of the Taliban regime. The radical Islamic group was routed in the U.S.-led invasion in 2001 that followed the Sept. 11 attacks.

Kasuri said Pakistan had dispatched 80,000 troops to the border region.

Referring to a Pakistani city that is believed to be a refuge for Afghan insurgents, Kasuri said his government was trying to support the building of stable institutions in Afghanistan and that "saying so-and-so is hiding in Quetta will get you nowhere."

His energetic response suggested that Pakistan, which walks a line between Islamic fundamentalism and more moderate politics, is sensitive to having its commitment to fighting terrorism challenged.

Rice said the U.S., Pakistan and Afghanistan were working "toward the goal of eliminating the threat" posed by Al Qaeda and the Taliban.

Bomb Kills 2 Boys And Fighting Claims 2 Britons In Afghanistan (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, June 27 — Two British soldiers were killed Tuesday in fighting in southern Afghanistan against combatants suspected of being Taliban members, and a suicide bomber detonated his car next to German peacekeepers in northern Afghanistan, killing two boys.

The violence occurred a day before Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's visit to Afghanistan. The increase in activity by the Taliban-led insurgency in southern Afghanistan and of bomb attacks in the north appeared to be an effort by Islamic militants to unsettle NATO forces as they take over command from American forces in the south, military officials here said. British, Canadian and Dutch soldiers have clashed daily with insurgents in southern Afghanistan while mounting a large offensive against them, and attacks in more peaceful northern Afghanistan have increased in recent weeks.

The British military said from its news media office in Helmand Province in the south that British forces "were caught in an incident" in the Sangin district of Helmand. The BBC reported that the soldiers had been hit by a rocket-propelled grenade as they returned from a planned operation, then had fought off a group of Taliban until air support arrived.

Besides the two British soldiers killed, one was wounded and four enemy fighters were killed in the subsequent airstrikes, a statement from the American-led force in Afghanistan said. Two Afghan soldiers were killed in the area in a clash earlier this week.

Muhammad Omar, the governor of Kunduz Province, said the two boys, ages 12 or 13, who had been killed in the suicide bombing, near the German peacekeepers' convoy in Kunduz city, were bystanders. Nine civilians were wounded in the blast, three of them critically, he said.

The governor blamed "Al Qaeda and terrorists" for the attacks. "Most of the suicide attacks are by those foreigners, and they are the enemies of Afghanistan," he said. Investigators had found the car license plate and the cellphone of the bomber and hoped to discover his origins, the governor said.

Fifty-three soldiers of the multinational force in Afghanistan have been killed this year, most of them Americans. At current rates the total could easily surpass the 86 soldiers killed in Afghanistan in 2005, which was the highest annual casualty total since American-led forces routed the Taliban in 2001.

Italy to Withdraw 400 Soldiers

ROME, June 27 (AP) — Italy's governing coalition agreed Tuesday to withdraw as many as 400 soldiers from its 1,400-member force in Afghanistan, Italian news agencies reported Tuesday. The coalition has already committed to removing all its troops from Iraq by year's end.

The remaining soldiers in Afghanistan will focus on civil duties, Giovanni Russo Spena, a Communist Refoundation Party member, said after lawmakers met with Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema and other officials, the ANSA and Apcom news agencies reported.

Afghans Tell Troops: 'No Security, No Help' (CSM)

By Brian Calvert

The Christian Science Monitor, June 28, 2006

SARKONI DISTRICT, AFGHANISTAN

Capt. Floy Rodriguez, leader of a US Marine advisory team to the Afghan National Army (ANA), was listening to Johnny Cash at a forward operating base deep in the arid mountains of northeast Afghanistan when the group of about 30 insurgent fighters attacked last month with rocket-propelled grenades and machine-guns. The base, called Lumberyard, had been established in early May, as a foothold for Afghan and US troops pushing north into Kunar and Nuristan Provinces.

The attack, and the killing of a local informant whose information could have prevented it, typify the difficulties faced by US and Afghan forces as they push farther into this rugged corner of Afghanistan, often mentioned as a possible hiding place of top Al Qaeda figures. As coalition forces move into remote insurgent havens, but they have been unable to provide security locals say they need in order to help oust insurgents completely. Villagers who do help coalition forces suffer, or die, for it.

"Whoever shows up with guns on that day, [the villagers] are that guy's friend," says Rodriguez, who spent more than a month patrolling the area with Afghan soldiers and meeting with villagers both inside and outside Lumberyard. Those patrols were too short and too spread out to secure the valley, which remains full of "bad guys," he says.

The inability to provide security for villagers in these areas hampers the long-term effectiveness of operations, such as Mountain Thrust, a large-scale coalition offensive launched recently in southern Afghanistan following an upswing in insurgent activity there. Insurgents hold sway in parts of the countryside surrounding operating bases in the southern provinces.

In lieu of securing whole areas like those in the southern deserts or northeastern mountains, the US has set up bases like Lumberyard, from which they conduct patrols, meet with village elders, and constantly travel the roads in search of bombs. And while coalition soldiers are able to glean some intelligence from locals in their areas, many are hesitant to give up information for fear of retribution by insurgents.

Kunar Province remains one of the most dangerous regions in the country. One US soldier was killed June 13 in Kunar, and two US soldiers were killed three days later when the all-terrain vehicle they were driving hit a roadside bomb, according to Pentagon statements. On Sunday, another coalition soldier was fatally wounded.

Afghan commanders say they are fighting Taliban and Al Qaeda remnants who have safe zones in Pakistan and are able to cross easily into Kunar. They are also fighting followers of Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, a powerful warlord who has refused to join Afghanistan's nascent government. There are also locals who once gave up the gun when economic development seemed likely, but who are now picking up the fight again.

Some US officials say troop strength is enough in these areas but that more development will bring stability where soldiers cannot. Meanwhile, they continue to push north. Last week, four US soldiers were killed "while conducting security operations to interdict enemy movement through northern Nuristan," the province north of Kunar, according to a Pentagon statement.

Staff Sergeant Shawn Nedari, a National Guard adviser to the Afghan Army who grew up in Manhattan and whose parents are Afghan, fought and patrolled in the mountains of Kunar during a recent coalition push into the area. Villagers told him that they would be unable to provide information without security.

"The problem is, we don't stay there long enough to keep [the insurgents] out," he says. "We don't have enough bodies."

Brigadier General Zemari, who commands the brigade of the Afghan Army operating in Kunar, has been wounded 15 times in battle and knows how hard it can be to fight insurgents in the mountains without the help of locals.

"The problem is not knowing, not having exact intelligence reports and no indication of the enemy from the people," he says. "[Without intelligence], we cannot separate the enemy from the locals. So if we do something, we will bring damage to the locals, and the people will not get along with the army and will not be happy with the army."

Building schools, roads, and clinics is more important than putting more troops on the ground, Zemari says, a statement echoed by US officials.

"As the Afghan government builds the capacity to extend their reach, security will improve even more," coalition spokesman Paul Fitzpatrick wrote in an e-mail. "This is not about US troop levels in Kunar or anywhere else. The solution lies within the Afghan government and its people."

Development, meanwhile, is practically impossible without security from insurgents who target aid efforts - not to mention the rugged terrain that has hindered progress even in years of peace.

Websites Connecting Americans' Generosity, Servicemembers' Needs (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

USA Today, June 28, 2006

'There's definitely more support than there ever was'

— and the Internet offers new ways to demonstrate it

Americans are increasingly turning to high-tech methods to send gifts and supplies to U.S. troops serving in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Veterans say today's care packages are more numerous and creative — and get to servicemembers much faster — than those of the past.

In previous wars, letters from home were sometimes accompanied by cigarettes or magazines. Today, several websites designed specifically for supporting the troops overseas allow anyone with a credit card to order cellphone minutes, snacks, books — even armor and sniper accessories.

Air Force Senior Airman Hollis Vernetti went through the website Any Soldier (anysoldier.com) to request hair conditioner and other items for herself and 21 other women in her group while they were stationed in Afghanistan last year.

"Sometimes, the PX, they do the best they can, but the high-priority items, like laundry soap and coffee, go fast," says Vernetti, who is now stationed at Al Asad Air Base in Iraq. She says she was deeply moved by the messages people included with their gifts. "The letters and the cards, they made me cry."

Allison Barber, a deputy assistant secretary of Defense, says: "In today's environment, people like to customize everything they do. Back in the good old days you'd just write a letter to any servicemember. Now you have 225 choices." That's how many non-profit support organizations the Defense Department lists on the website of America Supports You (americasupportsyou.mil), a program created to spread the word about such efforts.

"There's definitely more support now than there ever was," says Judith Young, national president of American Gold Star Mothers, an organization of women who have had children die in military action. Young's son, Jeffrey, was a Marine who died in an attack on his barracks in Beirut in 1983.

"I think technology is the main difference," Young says. "These moms and the troops that are over there now, they get to talk to them every day. … I was lucky if I talked to him once or twice a month."

Among websites offering support:

·Soldiers' Angels (soldiersangels.org). This site, started by the mother of an Iraq war veteran, takes donations for Kevlar blankets that can protect Humvee crews from roadside bombs and sniper fire. It also provides troops with "cool scarves" — fabric filled with polymer crystals that can provide up to 15 hours of relief from the heat after a 15-minute soaking in cold water.

·Operation Uplink (operationuplink.org). This Veterans of Foreign Wars program solicits online donations to provide servicemembers with prepaid phone cards to call home.

·AmericanSnipers.org. A group of police and military sharpshooters created the "Adopt a Sniper" program. Donors help provide supplies such as spotting scopes, holsters and ammunition wallets to snipers deployed in combat zones around the world.

·Freedom Calls Foundation (freedomcalls.org). This non-profit uses donations to provide free videoconferences between soldiers and their families. Marine Sgt. Mitch Selco, stationed in Fallujah, Iraq, got to see his daughter by teleconference after she was born in Denver. Another Marine in Iraq, Cpl. Terrence Lambert, saw his daughter's birth in Jacksonville, Ala., via satellite on Fathers Day.

Marty Horn, a Vietnam-era military policeman, founded Any Soldier in 2003 when his son, Brian, went to Afghanistan with the Army. Horn has 3,000 contacts in the military who post messages on his site about what their buddies need. Goods are distributed to 92,000 troops in 11 countries and at sea.

"These have to be the best-supported troops in history," Horn says.

Tom Clarkson, a Vietnam War veteran working in public relations for the Army Corps of Engineers in Iraq, says that what the troops receive now is "completely different" from the packages servicemembers received in Vietnam. Those care packages typically came from family members and contained items like Kool-Aid, socks and popcorn.

"I can't recall anyone getting boxes and boxes of stuff," Clarkson says.

Robert Houston, a civilian working at Fort Monroe in Virginia, says the only package he received during his time in Vietnam were some cookies from his mother. "They were stale and broken up by the time I received them," he says.

Horn says there can be problems associated with being able to send almost anything anywhere. He says many troops ask for synthetic Under Armour T-shirts because they're more comfortable than Army-issue cotton — even though the Marine Corps banned synthetic materials this spring for Marines outside their operating bases. A Marine was badly burned when his synthetic T-shirt melted on his skin in a roadside bomb attack near Ramadi in Iraq.

Sometimes technology cannot improve on the old ways. Sgt. Brian Horn, 26, who recently returned from leading a sniper team in Iraq and Afghanistan, said the thing that's most appreciated is still an old-fashioned letter. "(There are) always smiles and some disbelief, and some teared up a little bit," Horn says in describing how troops react to a letter.

"It's kind of hard to explain," he says. "You have to go out for a week and get shot at a bunch and not hear from anyone, from your family, and (you) come back and it's there — a letter from someone who's (in the USA) right now — and it's positive energy, it's 'thank you,' and it's real."

DOJ:

Justice Dept., Archives And IRS To Stay Shuttered Rest Of Week (WP)

By Paul Schwartzman And Megan Greenwell

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

The downtown D.C. headquarters of the Justice Department, Internal Revenue Service and National Archives will remain closed for the rest of the week because of damage wrought by Sunday's torrential downpour, officials said yesterday.

As emergency workers braced for more rain and pumped out flooded basements, the archives brought in industrial-size dehumidifiers to protect its historical documents and papers from page-curling mildew.

"There's no damage," said Susan Cooper, an archives spokesman. The Constitution, Bill of Rights and Declaration of Independence, which are in protective cases, were never at risk, she said.

Nearly two days after the region's first deluge, at least four government offices in the Federal Triangle remained shut, including the Old Post Office building and the Ariel Rios Federal Building. The Commerce Department, at 15th Street NW and Pennsylvania Avenue NW, reopened yesterday after closing Monday.

Even with the closures, most of the federal government's Washington offices were open yesterday, officials said.

"The bottom line is that there are more federal employees in town working than have been told not to come in because of various problems," said Mike Orenstein, a spokesman for the Office of Personnel Management.

At Justice Department headquarters, at Ninth Street NW and Pennsylvania Avenue NW, crews pumped water from the subbasement and parking garage and worked to repair the seven-story building's electrical and air-conditioning systems.

Officials plan to keep the building shut for the next three days and possibly as many as seven, according to an e-mail sent to reporters by the General Services Administration late yesterday.

The nearly 2,000 employees assigned to the building were scattered elsewhere, some at offices a few blocks away. Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice spokesman, declined to specify the location for security reasons.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzalez is in the Middle East for the rest of the week on a scheduled trip. "The Department of Justice is fully operational and able to carry out its essential functions," Roehrkasse said.

The rain flooded the basement and subbasement at the IRS, at 11th Street NW and Constitution Avenue NW, damaging the building's air-conditioning and electrical systems.

Terry Lemons, the agency's chief spokesman, declined to set a date for the building's reopening, saying, "We'll continue assessing the situation.

"We have not had a situation like this in 20 years," he said, speaking from his home in Northern Virginia. "The building sustained significant damage in the basement. Before we can open, we need to have our electrical system and air conditioning working."

Lemons said he did not know how many of the 2,400 employees assigned to the building were working. But he said: "We're continuing our tax administration work. The tax system continues to operate."

At the National Archives, crews worked to repair a subbasement transformer that had been submerged in eight feet of water, knocking out the electricity and air conditioning. Officials plan to keep the building, on Pennsylvania Avenue NW, closed through Monday. The archives will host its annual Fourth of July ceremony on the front steps, but the public will not be allowed inside.

Yesterday, dozens of tourists arriving at the archives were turned away by a handwritten sign taped to a garbage can telling them that flooding had closed the building.

Justin James, 10, of Frankfort, Ky., had hoped for a peek at the Constitution.

"I was going to show pictures to my friends. Now, they're not going to believe I saw it," he told his mom before heading to the International Spy Museum, which was open and dry.

Mid-Atlantic Region Braces For More Rain (AP-Y2)

By Stephen Manning, Associated Press Writer

AP2, June 28, 2006

Workers pumped water from the IRS headquarters' flooded basement Tuesday and mopped up at other government buildings Monday after heavy rain swamped the nation's capital.

A brief break from the two-day deluge gave crews a chance to reopen commuter routes and set up sandbags to prevent more water from getting inside buildings.

More than 7 inches of rain fell on the nation's capital in a 24-hour period Sunday and Monday, shutting down several federal buildings and closing some of the city's busiest tourist attractions just days before the Fourth of July weekend.

Forecasters warned that more rain is likely every day this week.

States of emergency were declared for Sussex County, Del., and the District of Columbia.

In downtown Washington, the Justice Department, the IRS and the National Archives — where the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution were safe under glass — were among several buildings still closed because of flooding or other storm-related problems. Some streets also were shut down because water from the flooded buildings was being pumped into the city sewers.

None of the flooded buildings had structural damage, but water in the basements damaged air-conditioning, wiring and other building systems, said Mike McGill, a spokesman for the General Services Administration, which manages federal buildings.

Officials at the Justice Department said it could take a week to clean up and reopen the building.

The storm also toppled a 100-year-old elm tree on the White House lawn Monday. Claudia Dickens, a spokeswoman for the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, said the elm might be one of the trees depicted on the back of the $20 bill.

But she said it is also possible that the artist and the engraver took artistic license in depicting the greenery at the White House.

Commuters and tourists slogged through the muddy aftermath. With the continuing threat of flash flooding, government employees were given the option of taking a personal day.

Flood warnings and watches remained in effect Tuesday along the Sastern Seaboard, and the National Weather Service warned that some places could get up to 8 inches rain. That could be dangerous for soaked communities that already absorbed as much as 10 inches of rain Sunday and Monday.

In Laurel, just outside Washington, some residents voluntarily evacuated their homes as the local water utility opened floodgates on a reservoir dam, sending water gushing into the Patuxent River. By midday Tuesday, nearly 60 people who left homes downstream in the middle of the night had gathered at two shelters.

In Pennsylvania, countless small streams and creeks overflowed their banks. The weather service predicted severe flooding along the Philadelphia area's Schuylkill River by Wednesday afternoon.

In Alexandria, Va., officials urged residents and businesses to prepare for high water on the Potomac River. Rescuers searched for an 8-year-old girl swept away by floodwaters in Alleghany County.

Eastern States Preparing For More Rain And Floods (NYT)

By Gary Gately

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

BALTIMORE, June 27 — Relentless rain continued drenching the East Coast on Tuesday as the region braced for overnight downpours that prompted evacuations of homes and businesses, knocked out power to tens of thousands, shut down government office buildings and led to flash flood warnings from upstate New York to North Carolina.

Heightening anxieties, the National Weather Service said a tropical storm forming near Cape Fear in North Carolina would bring more precipitation and heavy winds up the Atlantic coast to the lowlands of eastern Maryland and Northern Virginia, which in the past few days have been battered by storms and flooding.

The flooding was blamed for car crashes that killed two people in Maryland and New Jersey and for the disappearance of an 8-year-old girl swept away by rushing floodwaters Tuesday afternoon in southwestern Virginia.

On Tuesday evening, the National Weather Service called for four to six inches of additional rain in the Washington area, where more than seven inches fell Sunday and Monday. The deluge sent residents to emergency shelters in Maryland and Pennsylvania. Rescuers pulled stranded motorists and pedestrians from floodwaters, and workers heaved sandbags in front of office buildings in the nation's capital.

"This has probably been the most intense rainfall in a 24-hour period in the history of Washington," said Michael McGill, a spokesman for the General Services Administration, which oversees buildings closed because of flooding, including the headquarters for the Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service. Both are expected to stay closed through at least Friday, he said, mostly because of basement flooding and damage to electrical systems.

"We're still in the process of evaluating the damage to those systems," Mr. McGill said. Because of flooding and power failures, popular attractions like the National Museum of Natural History and National Museum of American History remained closed Tuesday.

In Maryland, the flooding heavily damaged dozens of roads, the authorities said, and the forecast made highway officials anxious. "We're spread so thin already, getting another three, four, five inches of rain Tuesday night would be devastating," said David Buck, a spokesman for the State Highway Administration.

Flooding, Mr. Buck said, closed at least 35 Maryland roads, many on the Eastern Shore, and in some cases, torrents washed away huge chunks of asphalt and created a hole that closed lanes on I-95 and flooded Route 29 in suburban Washington.

In Annapolis, the county executive of Anne Arundel County, Janet S. Owens, urged several dozen residents of low-lying areas to leave their homes after officials opened seven floodgates of the Howard Duckett Dam on the Patuxent River. "I am asking these residents to be proactive and leave as early as possible," she said.

Ms. Owens said the county had shelters ready to take in at least 200 more people if necessary, and officials in other Maryland counties also prepared shelters.

Tides, she said, are expected to be two to three feet above normal with winds of 20 to 30 knots. Like other wary government officials in the region, Ms. Owens said the National Hurricane Center was closely monitoring the conditions that could lead to a tropical storm off the coast of North Carolina.

In Pennsylvania, Gov. Edward G. Rendell said the state was preparing to respond quickly to possible flooding in areas along several rivers, including the Schuylkill and the Susquehanna River. Some residents had been evacuated.

Based on forecasts, Mr. Rendell said, "Moderate to major flooding will likely affect parts of the commonwealth overnight and through Thursday."

In Scranton, The Associated Press reported, the American Red Cross set up an evacuation center at Green Ridge Assembly of God church, and other towns throughout eastern Pennsylvania reported flooding.

DOJ_NMG_0037198

In southwestern Virginia, disabled children in Craig County, some in wheelchairs, waited for their parents at a high school after being evacuated from an Easter Seals camp Monday night. Nearby, officials continued searching for an 8-year-old girl swept away in Alleghany County.

Outside Washington, in Prince George's County, about 70 Maryland residents who had been evacuated, some by rescue boats, returned to their homes Tuesday, said Mark Brady, a Prince George's County fire and rescue spokesman. "We're just keeping our eye on the sky and hoping for the best," Mr. Brady said.

Flooding also occurred in Delaware and New Jersey.

Federal Agencies Still Recovering From Flooding (GOVEXEC)

By Jonathan Marino

Government Executive, June 28, 2006

More government building closings were announced late Monday and early Tuesday as federal agencies prepared for what forecasters warned could be a continuation of heavy rains that have pounded the capital region.

The Justice Department's Robert F. Kennedy headquarters building will be closed for the next three to seven days as repairs are made to its flooded basement and lost power is restored.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a statement that fewer than 2,400 workers were affected by the weather-related damage, but that he remains unsure of when the headquarters will open.

IRS headquarters will be closed until Friday, according to the General Services Administration, which manages many of the federal government's buildings. Flooding in the basement is delaying clean-up, GSA said. Offices in the Old Post Office, which uses the same power source as the IRS, also are closed, but shops in the building remain open.

The Environmental Protection Agency released a statement saying its Ariel Rios north and south buildings at its headquarters would remain closed Tuesday and that employees working in the facility's east and west basements would remain on administrative leave due to flooding.

The National Archives' Washington building also remained closed Tuesday, and an early-afternoon statement said it would stay that way at least through Wednesday. The archives reported no damage to original records at the rotunda and stack areas.

The heavy rains also caused several Crystal City buildings leased by GSA to lose power and some Federal Technology Service employees lost e-mail access when the e-mail server went down.

But the Commerce Department, closed Monday, said its facilities were fully repaired and operational by Tuesday afternoon.

A statement posted late Monday night by the Office of Personnel Management said federal agencies would be open under an unscheduled leave policy, meaning that taking the day off requires taking leave time. Emergency workers are expected to show up.

U.S. Attorney In Brooklyn Is Said To Be Choice For Federal Bench (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

The United States attorney in Brooklyn, Roslynn R. Mauskopf, has been selected to serve as a federal judge, according to several people briefed on the matter. The move will open up one of the most important law enforcement posts in New York City.

While Ms. Mauskopf has not yet been formally nominated, the people briefed on the matter said that she had already been interviewed by the White House and that the required F.B.I. background investigation had begun.

Such investigations are not undertaken until the selection is made, several of the people said. When the investigation is complete, the people said, the White House will formally submit the nomination to the Senate.

Ms. Mauskopf, 49, who oversees the prosecution of federal crimes in Brooklyn and Queens and on Staten Island and Long Island, was selected for the judgeship by Gov. George E. Pataki, several of the people said. She served him for six years as the state inspector general, a post in which she was responsible for investigating corruption, fraud and abuse in state government.

Before that, she served for 13 years as an assistant prosecutor in the office of the Manhattan district attorney, Robert M. Morgenthau.

Mr. Pataki, who had also backed her for the prosecutor's post, to which she was nominated in 2002, will lose his authority to make such selections when he leaves office next year.

Ms. Mauskopf, through a spokesman, declined to comment yesterday.

When President Bush nominated her to the prosecutor's post — one of the busiest in the country, commanding an office of nearly 150 lawyers — some Democrats questioned her qualifications, noting that she had never worked as a federal prosecutor.

During her tenure in Albany, critics raised questions about whether she had been aggressive enough in investigating state officials.

A spokesman for Mr. Pataki, Michael E. Marr, said, "Roz Mauskopf has been an outstanding law enforcement professional at the local, state and federal levels, and we are confident that if she were nominated and confirmed, she would also make an excellent federal judge."

Ms. Mauskopf will be appointed to the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York, according to the people briefed on the matter. She will fill a position that was opened up when Judge David G. Trager, himself a former United States attorney in Brooklyn, recently moved to senior status.

During her tenure, prosecutors in her office conducted several high-profile prosecutions, winning convictions against a Yemeni cleric for financing terrorism, and decimating the ranks of the Bonanno crime family. There have also been losses, including the acquittals of a hip-hop producer and his brother on money-laundering charges and of two waterfront union officials on fraud and other charges.

Several people said a possible successor to Ms. Mauskopf was Chauncey G. Parker, the director of the State Division of Criminal Justice Services and a former federal prosecutor in Manhattan.

VeriSign Gets Grand Jury Subpoena Over Stock Options Grants; Shares Fall

MOUNTAIN VIEW, Calif. (AP) -- VeriSign Inc., a provider of infrastructure services for Internet and telecom networks, said Tuesday it received a grand jury subpoena from the U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of California asking for documents relating to its stock option grants.

VeriSign said it also received a similar request from Securities and Exchange Commission as part of an informal inquiry.

The company said it intends to cooperate fully with both the SEC and the U.S. Attorney's office, and added that its board had already began an internal investigation prior to the two requests.

About 48 companies in addition to VeriSign are being questioned by the SEC or Justice Department about their stock-option granting practices. At issue is whether executives backdated stock options grants to time them at low points of the stock price, thus boosting the payouts.

Shares fell $1.16, or 5.1 percent, to $21.62 in afternoon trading on the Nasdaq. In the past 52 weeks, the stock has changed hands between $19.01 and $30.99.

Rambus Warns Stock Option Trouble May Wipe Out Some Past Profits (AP)

By Michael Liedtke, AP Business Writer

AP, June 28, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- Computer chip supplier Rambus Inc. on Tuesday warned some of its previously reported profits might evaporate because the timing of stock options granted to its employees wasn't properly recorded - a problem that could haunt scores of other companies as they review their past compensation practices.

The news, which caused Rambus's stock price to drop by more than 5 percent in extended trading, was the latest jolt in a budding scandal that threatens once again to shake investor confidence just as corporate America recovers from the accounting fiascos exposed after the fall of Enron Corp. nearly five years.

Like dozens of other companies, Los Altos, Calif.-based Rambus has been scrutinizing stock options distributed years ago to determine whether company insiders rigged the system to increase the likelihood that management would reap huge windfalls.

Under the practice, the options are backdated to an ebb in a company's stock price instead of pegging the exercise price to the prevailing market value at the time of the award.

Stock options become more valuable as the market price rises above the exercise price, so backdating fattens the recipient's profit.

At least 44 companies have launched their own internal inquiries into possible stock option abuses or have become targets of government investigations into the practice. Some companies already have gone so far as to fire some of their top executives after learning about the manipulation of past stock options.

DOJ_NMG_0037200

The number of companies responding to government inquiries continued to expand Tuesday. Cnet Networks Inc., VeriSign Inc., Foundry Networks Inc. and Cyberonics Inc. all disclosed they had received subpoenas seeking more information about their stock option awards from the U.S. Justice Department.

The Silicon Valley has become a focal point in the brewing tempest over stock options because the region's high-tech companies relied heavily on the awards to attract and motivate employees.

Backdating stock options isn't necessarily illegal, but it can cause a company to improperly deduct employee compensation expenses - a misstep that could exaggerate profits and result in an underpayment of taxes.

Without providing specifics, Rambus said its audit committee had uncovered discrepancies between the dates that some stock options went on the books and the dates that they should have been recorded under accounting rules.

If the committee's continuing investigation determines the company has to absorb substantial charges to correct the error, Rambus said it may have wipe out some of its past profits. The potential restatements aren't expected to affect Rambus's revenue.

Rambus said it hadn't yet determined whether the accounting trouble will force it to amend its taxes.

The news, released after the stock market closed, agitated investors. Rambus shares fell 71 cents to close at $23.13 Tuesday on the Nasdaq Stock Market, then dropped $1.23, or 5.3 percent, in extended trading.

Rambus's results during the past decade have been a mixed bag - ranging from a $33.7 million profit last year to a $106.1 million loss in 2000.

Rambus Stock-Options Errors May Require Restatements (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

Rambus Inc. said a preliminary board review found improperly dated stock-option grants that may lead to a restatement of prior financial results.

The Los Altos, Calif., designer of memory-chip technology provided little detail about the results of the review in its news release, but the language of the release -- and the indication that the company may take an accounting charge -- implies the grants were wrongly timed in a manner that benefited insiders by giving them a lower exercise price.

The disclosure raises the question of whether Rambus's grants were deliberately backdated from their real date of approval to a day when the company's stock was trading lower. That would make the grants more valuable to recipients.

Separately, six other companies -- VeriSign Inc., CNET Networks Inc., Foundry Networks Inc., Applied Micro Circuits Corp., Cyberonics Inc. and Progress Software Corp. -- announced new federal inquiries into their options practices.

Rambus's board "has reached a preliminary conclusion that the actual measurement dates for certain stock option grants issued in prior years differ from the recorded grant dates for such awards," the company said.

It didn't specify who the recipients were, how many grants were at issue or when the suspect grants occurred. A Rambus spokeswoman declined to elaborate. She said the Securities and Exchange Commission has been "apprised" of the review.

Rambus said it isn't sure whether any charge would be material and thus require restatement. It also says the board hasn't evaluated whether it will face a tax impact.

About 50 companies are being examined by federal regulators and prosecutors in a wide-ranging probe of option-granting practices that is focusing on possible backdating and other forms of manipulation.

Backdating could lead to fraud charges for executives, particularly if they conducted the practice behind the backs of directors in order to enhance their potential profit from option grants. Granting options discounts via backdating or other means can violate federal securities laws when not disclosed to shareholders. It can also lead to accounting problems and tax bills for companies.

VeriSign, of Mountain View, Calif.; CNET, of San Francisco; and Foundry Networks, of San Jose, all said they received options-related subpoenas from the U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California. The companies said they are cooperating. VeriSign, which provides infrastructure services for the Internet, and Foundry, a network-equipment maker, both said they are subjects of informal SEC inquiries. CNET, a Web site operator, previously disclosed an SEC probe.

Applied Micro, of Sunnyvale, Calif., said it received an options-related subpoena from the U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California. The semiconductor company also said the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of California has opened its own investigation of the company's stock-option practices. Applied Micro noted that a self-initiated review of stock option grant practices is continuing.

Cyberonics said it received an options-related subpoena from the U.S. attorney's Office for the Southern District of New York. The Houston medical-device maker previously disclosed that it is the subject of an informal SEC probe. A securities analyst earlier this month raised questions over a grant made just ahead of good news from a federal regulatory panel for a Cyberonics product. The company says it is cooperating and has hired outside counsel.

Progress Software, of Bedford, Mass., said in a securities filing that it is the subject of an SEC probe relating to options. The business-software company had earlier said it was conducting its own review.

UPDATE: Cyberonics Subpoenaed By U.S. Justice Department (DOW)

Dow Jones, June 28, 2006

BOSTON (Dow Jones) -- Shares of Cyberonics moved lower Tuesday, the day after it reported it has been subpoenaed by the Department of Justice over stock- options practices.

Shares of Cyberonics (CYBX) were down 4% at $20.40 in midday trades.

According to a regulatory filing Monday, the U.S. attorney's office for the Southern District of New York issued a subpoena for documents related to its stock-option grants. Cyberonics said it is cooperating with the request.

"In furtherance of such cooperation, the audit committee of the company's board of directors will retain independent counsel to assist it in reviewing the company's stock option grants, procedures, and practices, including compliance with Generally Accepted Accounting Principles and all applicable statutes, rules, and regulations," wrote Cyberonics in the filing.

"Given the ongoing nature of these matters, the company is not in a position to comment further at this time," Cyberonics added.

Earlier this month, Cyberonics said it was the focus of an informal investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission into stock options.

European Court Refuses To Halt Extradition Of Bankers (Update3) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, June 28, 2006

June 27 (Bloomberg) -- Three British bankers will be sent to the U.S. to face Enron Corp.-related fraud charges within three weeks after a European court refused to block their extradition, their final forum for an appeal.

David Bermingham, Giles Darby and Gary Mulgrew are wanted in Texas for allegedly bilking their former employer, Royal Bank of Scotland Group Plc's Greenwich NatWest unit, out of millions from the sale of an Enron off-the-books partnership. The European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg, France today declined to suspend their extradition, six days after Britain's highest court also rejected their appeal.

The case has been at the forefront of calls from Britain's business and legal community to scrap its ``fast-track" extradition arrangements with the U.S. Lobbying groups claim the legislation, introduced in 2004 mainly to clamp down on terrorism, is instead being used to target white-collar offences, unfairly increasing the risks for executives.

``I urge U.K. Prime Minister Tony Blair to intervene to defend the human rights of British citizens that are being abused by a country which is supposedly our greatest ally," Digby Jones, director general of the Confederation of British Industry, said in a statement. The bankers ``represent no threat to society, yet they will still be banged up in a U.S. prison with rapists and drug addicts."

The European Court of Human Rights said that while it would review the merits of the men's appeal, the court wouldn't intervene to suspend extradition proceedings, according to a letter sent to the bankers' lawyers.

July Deadline

Bermingham, Darby and Mulgrew, who each face more than 20 years of prison if convicted on all counts, must now be extradited to the U.S. by July 17, their lawyers said. They may be detained for as long as two years in a high-security U.S. prison awaiting trial, U.K. courts have been told.

The three men were charged with seven counts of wire fraud in 2002 for allegedly skimming $7.3 million by duping Greenwich Natwest over the value of an Enron partnership known as ``Swap Sub." The indictments were the first criminal fraud charges to emerge from the U.S. Justice Department's probe into the energy trader's collapse.

Texas Trial

The bankers claim that as British citizens, accused of defrauding a British bank, any charges against them should have been brought in the U.K. They have also argued that they won't get a fair trial in Texas, where Enron was based, due to public animosity toward the company and its senior officers.

DOJ_NMG_0037202

Former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay and ex-Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Skilling were convicted last month of fraud and conspiracy in connection with Enron's 2001 implosion, which wiped out thousands of jobs and more than $1 billion in retirement funds virtually overnight. They each face at least 25 years in prison.

``We have now done everything possible to establish the rights of three U.K. citizens to be investigated and, if appropriate, prosecuted in the U.K.," Mark Spragg, a lawyer for Bermingham, Mulgrew and Darby, said in a statement. ``All we have established is that U.K. citizens have no such rights against an extradition request made by the U.S."

Under the fast-track legislation, known as the Extradition Act 2003, the U.S. was added to a list of countries that no longer have to provide evidence of a crime when seeking to extradite a U.K. citizen. The U.K. must still show ``probable cause" that an offence has been committed when requesting a U.S. citizen, as prescribed by the U.S. Constitution.

Demonstration

Around 200 U.K. businesspeople are expected to participate in a demonstration against those rules, led by Internet entrepreneur Karl Watkin, in London later this week, according to the event's organizers.

``The feeling is that it's a very unbalanced, one-sided piece of law," Colin Passmore, the head of litigation at London-based Simmons & Simmons, said in an interview. ``There are no escape routes, as this case has shown."

The European Court of Human Rights didn't provide specific reasons for refusing the three bankers' application for a temporary stay in the letter sent to Spragg's law firm, Jeffrey Green Russell. The court said it will review the merits of the men's appeal in ``due course," the letter says.

Britain's Home Office, which is responsible for extradition requests, had agreed to suspend proceedings pending the outcome of the men's application to the Strasbourg court. The department said today that extradition arrangements are now being considered, but that it isn't in a position to comment on how and when the extraditions will take place.

Lawyers specializing in extradition said it was likely the men would be removed within days.

The European Court of Human Rights confirmed that the request for interim measures had been rejected.

Enron Bankers' Extradition Moves Forward (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jane Wardell, Ap Business Writer

AP, June 28, 2006

(AP) - LONDON-The European Court of Human Rights on Tuesday refused to halt extradition proceedings against three British bankers wanted in the United States on Enron-related fraud charges.

David Bermingham, Gary Mulgrew and Giles Darby, former executives at Greenwich NatWest, a unit of Royal Bank of Scotland Group PLC, had asked the European court to freeze a British court ruling for their deportation ahead of a fuller appeal.

However, the European court said in a letter to London law firm Jeffrey Green Russell on Tuesday that it saw no immediate cause to overturn the decision of the British courts to send the trio to face trial in the United States.

A court official wrote that it had been decided "in the circumstances, not to indicate to the government of the United Kingdom ... the interim measure you are seeking."

It added that the "remaining issues, namely the merits of the application, will be examined in due course."

"However ... any such examination of the remaining legal issues will not stop the applicants' proposed removal," it said.

The so-called Bermingham Three have been fighting against their extradition since a High Court ruling in February. They ran out of British avenues of appeal last week when the House of Lords said it would not hear the case.

The three men have consistently argued that most of the alleged offenses took place in Britain and that any trial should be held here. Being forced to stand trial in Enron's home state of Texas would be unjust and incompatible with European human rights law, the men argued.

"We have now done everything possible to establish the rights of three U.K. citizens to be investigated and, if appropriate, prosecuted in the U.K. but all we have established is that U.K. citizens have no such rights against an extradition request made by the U.S.," said the men's lawyer, Mark Spragg.

Spragg said that all the witnesses and documents for the defense case would now be sent to Houston for the trial "which could, and should, take place in the U.K."

The trio, all British citizens, were charged in the United States in 2002 with bilking National Westminster Bank of $7.3 million and each face seven counts of wire fraud.

They allegedly advised NatWest in 2000 to sell part of an Enron business it owned for less than the stake was worth, in a scheme allegedly devised with Andrew Fastow, former finance chief of the collapsed energy trader Enron Corp., and his colleague, managing director Michael Kopper.

The three men then left NatWest, bought into the firm themselves and sold it off for a much higher fee, each pocketing about $2.6 million in the process, according to prosecutors.

Enron filed for bankruptcy in 2001 after revealing that it inflated its profits and filed false accounts to hide debts.

Barred Broker, Partner Get Prison For $14 Million Commodities Fraud (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jeffrey Gold, Ap Business Writer

AP, June 28, 2006

(AP) - NEWARK, New Jersey-A man barred from selling leveraged commodities and his partner in an illicit operation have been sentenced to prison for cheating about 1,000 investors out of $14 million (â‚¬11 million).

The barred broker, Charles Paul Hoffecker, who owned Amitex Investment Services Ltd., and his partner, Charles Edward Myers, told clients that Amitex would buy gold, silver and other commodities for them. But evidence at their trial showed that no purchases were made, federal prosecutors said Tuesday.

Hoffecker, 53, was sentenced June 19 to 17 1/2 years in prison, while Myers, 65, was sentenced Monday to nine years. They were ordered to pay a total of $2.67 million (â‚¬2.12 million) in restitution by U.S. District Judge Katharine S. Hayden.

The restitution figure was smaller than the total losses since not all victims have been found, mostly due to incomplete records at Amitex, Assistant U.S. Attorney Bohdan Vitvitsky said.

Hoffecker and Myers, who were convicted in March, were charged in 2003 after a sting operation in which investigators used an undercover business to infiltrate fraudulent telemarketing investment schemes.

Amitex told would-be clients that their money would be used to buy commodities and that Amitex would finance up to 80 percent of the purchases at 12 percent interest, the indictment said. However, Amitex did not buy any commodities and charged investors for loans that were never made, the indictment said.

Even before this case, Hoffecker had been barred in 1991 from selling or offering to sell precious metal on a financed basis. That resulted from a lawsuit brought by the Federal Trade Commission.

Amitex was incorporated in Nassau, Bahamas, and the indictment alleged that Hoffecker and Myers claimed that their transactions were not regulated by U.S. authorities.

Did Hilfiger Corp. Get Special Treatment From DOJ? (LAW)

By Sue Reisinger, Corporate Counsel

Corporate Counsel, June 28, 2006

Did Tommy Hilfiger Corp. get special treatment when it negotiated a nonprosecution agreement with the U.S. Department of Justice last summer? The question has come to light in recent weeks as the now-private company defends itself against a class action shareholders' suit.

Typically, when the government completes a deferred or nonprosecution agreement, it makes the deal public. The Manhattan U.S. Attorney's Office departed from this practice with Hilfiger, however.

On Aug. 10, 2005, then-U.S. Attorney David Kelley announced that his office had reached an agreement with the retailer's American subsidiary. While Kelley's press release outlined the general features of the pact, it wasn't accompanied by an actual copy of the deal. Ten months later, neither Hilfiger nor the government has made the agreement public. (Hilfiger was represented in the nearly year-long tax evasion investigation by one of Kelley's former colleagues -- Mary Jo White -- a former Manhattan U.S. Attorney who is now a partner at Debevoise & Plimpton.)

The secret agreement is a problem for the shareholders who filed suit against Hilfiger after the government started investigating the company in 2004. In most deferred and nonprosecution agreements, the corporate defendant admits the government's criminal allegations. Without access to the details of the Hilfiger deal, the company's shareholders say that they don't know how the retailer responded.

Hilfiger has moved to dismiss the suit, in part, because prosecutors didn't file charges against the clothing chain. The company, which was acquired this spring by Apax Partners Worldwide, a private equity fund, is being defended in the shareholders' litigation by Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz. Hilfiger supports its position by citing Kelley's August 2005 press release, which it says doesn't confirm any wrongdoing at the retailer.

According to a transcript of a May hearing, Wachtell's John Savarese told Manhattan federal district court Judge Richard Owen that the release is "far from confirming that there was some basis to the initially announced U.S. Attorney investigation or that some great liability would emerge for the company from that, or some criminal case." But Savarese cited only the government's press release in his argument, and not the nonprosecution agreement itself. Savarese did not return calls for comment for this article.

The shareholders' lead attorney, Samuel Rudman, says that he finds it unusual that the agreement was not made public, given that the government "always make them public." It's especially unusual, Rudman adds, "when [Hilfiger's] lawyers are in court arguing what the agreement says." Rudman is a partner with Lerach, Coughlin, Stoia, Geller, Rudman & Robbins. Rudman's observation is supported by Corporate Counsel research. Corporate Counsel completed an extensive review of the Justice Department's and many U.S. Attorneys' Web sites and found that 14 deferred and nonprosecution agreements were completed in the past 12 months. Of these 14 deals, only the Hilfiger agreement was not made public.

A spokesperson for the Manhattan U.S. Attorney's Office declined to comment when asked why Hilfiger was treated differently. Former U.S. Attorney Kelley, now a partner at Cahill Gordon & Reindel in New York, also declined to comment. A Justice Department spokesperson in Washington, D.C., would only say that the publication of agreements "is within the discretion of individual U.S. attorney's offices."

A Hilfiger spokesperson says that the company won't make the agreement public "because it has no obligation to." Debevoise's White did not return calls for comment.

What is known from Kelley's press release is that the nonprosecution agreement ended an investigation into two related areas. One was whether Hilfiger paid inflated service commissions to its overseas subsidiaries in an effort to lighten its U.S. tax burden. The other was whether some, or all, of the services were actually performed in Hong Kong, but with the commission payments sent elsewhere in an effort to avoid paying Hong Kong taxes.

Under the deal, according to the press release, Hilfiger agreed to implement new ethics and compliance programs, to cooperate with the U.S. Attorney's Office for the next three years, and to amend four years' worth of U.S. tax returns from 2001 to 2004 to reflect a lower rate of commissions. Hilfiger also agreed to pay the IRS about $18.1 million in additional taxes and interest, and to cooperate fully with the Hong Kong tax authorities.

Subject to the company fulfilling its part of the deal, the government agreed to close the U.S. tax case but left open the Hong Kong part of the case. If Hilfiger cooperates with Hong Kong authorities, the government agreed not to prosecute for activities "which may constitute mail fraud or wire fraud on the Hong Kong taxing authorities," according to the press release. Hilfiger, which was still a public company at the time of the deal, disclosed in various filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission that it had reached a nonprosecution agreement. But the company did not furnish a copy of the pact with its quarterly filing in December 2005. Hilfiger's spokesperson says that the clothing chain believes it is not required to file a copy with the SEC.

Asked whether businesses are required to file copies of nonprosecution agreements, an SEC spokesperson cited regulation S-K 229.601, which requires a public company to include with its quarterly and annual reports a complete copy of "any material contract" made outside "the ordinary course of business." The spokesperson wouldn't comment on any specific case, or on whether the SEC considers a nonprosecution agreement to be a "material contract."

Hedge Funds Sharpen Their Political Game (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell And Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Amid increased scrutiny by lawmakers and regulators, hedge funds are stepping up their defenses in the nation's capital.

A small group of fund managers are behind a campaign to head off new regulations from Congress and the Securities and Exchange Commission. In the past year, funds have boosted political contributions, hired a string of new lobbyists and established a second trade association to make their case in Washington.

A hearing by the Senate Judiciary Committee today will focus on industry tactics such as short-selling and allegations of collusion between independent research firms and hedge funds to manipulate stocks. (See related article on page C1.)

Separately, the Senate Banking Committee and some House lawmakers are examining whether the hedge-fund industry should face new regulations.

Employees of the 25 largest hedge funds and the Managed Funds Association, the industry's main trade group, have contributed a combined $1.2 million to congressional candidates and the Republican and Democratic parties so far in the 2005-2006 campaign. While that figure goes only through March 31 of this year, it represents nearly a 50% jump over donations made by the same organizations for the entire 2001-2002 election cycle, the last midterm election year, according to the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics.

For the 2003-2004 campaign, a presidential cycle, which tends to draw bigger campaign spending, the same funds contributed $1.9 million.

Hedge funds have hired more than a dozen lobbying groups since early 2005, according to PoliticalMoneyLine, a nonpartisan organization. In 2005, the industry paid $1.5 million for Washington lobbyists, up from $1.2 million in 2004 and $565,000 in 2003.

"Hedge funds have come of age as a capital-market force. There's no denying it," said Jack Gaines, president of the MFA, which represents more than 1,000 individual members with $500 billion in assets. The MFA hopes to double its staff over the next year and recently hired a lobbyist to help communicate with lawmakers and help with fund raising.

Meanwhile, James Chanos, a hedge-fund manager and well-known short-seller, in March started his own alliance of 16 hedge funds as a rival to the MFA. He has argued the industry needs to take a more aggressive stance in Washington. To lobby for the Coalition of Private Investment Companies, Mr. Chanos hired former aides to Senate Banking Committee Chairman Richard Shelby (R., Ala.) and committee member Sen. Chris Dodd (D., Conn.), who will become the panel's top Democrat next year.

In the days after Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) announced today's hedge-fund hearing, the lobbyists met with half the members of the Judiciary panel.

Hedge funds still devote fewer resources to Washington than Wall Street firms. Citigroup Inc. and its employees have made just about as many campaign donations so far this election cycle as the entire hedge-fund industry, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, and spent nearly five times as much on lobbyists in 2005.

The emerging hedge-fund lobby parallels the growth of the high-tech lobby in the late 1990s. Like the hedge-fund industry, high-tech companies paid scant attention to Washington during their early growth years. That changed when policy makers began looking closer at regulations, and one of the industry's biggest players, Microsoft Corp., became the target of a Justice Department antitrust investigation.

Hedge funds haven't yet faced a similar threat. But they may: The SEC is investigating one independent research firm for possible market manipulation and has subpoenaed documents and correspondence from a well-known hedge fund as part of the probe. The SEC also has an investigation into improper trading in the private-issuer market, which has resulted in charges against several hedge-fund managers.

Hedge funds also are coming under attack from mostly small corporations that accuse fund managers of manipulating stock prices by betting that stocks will decline, and then spreading negative information about the companies.

The SEC estimates hedge-fund advisers manage now more than $2.4 trillion in assets, up from an estimated $870 million in 2004. By comparison, mutual funds manage now roughly $8 trillion.

Hedge funds manage large pools of capital for wealthy individual investors, pension plans and endowments. They typically invest in ways traditional money managers can't, such as by placing bets that stocks will drop and profiting by the decline, a practice known as selling short; investing in currency arbitrage; and taking stakes in credit default swaps, a type of insurance play.

Historically, hedge funds were passive short-term traders, yet they are now buying large stakes in corporations and influencing board decisions about companies' strategic directions. They have also had their share of high-profile scandals from abusive trading of mutual funds to fund managers running away with hundreds of millions of dollars in investor money.

For years hedge funds were mainly regulated, lightly, by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, which has oversight of the futures markets. In 2004, a divided SEC moved to impose its own rules, requiring hedge-fund advisers to register with that agency and opening them up to compliance and inspection measures. That rule was thrown out by a federal appeals court last week and the SEC is re-evaluating its approach to hedge-fund activity.

As hedge funds have increased their political activities, some have become more bipartisan, giving more to the Republicans in power. Like many young high-tech companies, newly formed hedge funds tended to give largely to Democrats. From 1990 to 2005, for example, employees of Mr. Chanos's Kynikos Associates made about $200,000 in political contributions to candidates for Congress and the White House. All but a $500 check to President George Bush in 2003, went to Democratic candidates.

So far this year, employees of the fund have given all of their $15,360 in donations to Republicans. Most of that, $15,000, has been directed in three checks to Mr. Shelby, the Senate Banking Committee chairman who will have enormous influence over possible regulations for the industry.

UPDATE: Senators To Scrutinize Hedge Funds (DOW)

By Robert Schroeder

WASHINGTON (Dow Jones) -- Washington and Wall Street may get a rare public look at how securities regulators track hedge funds' behavior on Wednesday, when a former Securities and Exchange Commission lawyer goes before a Senate panel probing the industry.

Attorney Gary Aguirre told Congress that he was running the SEC's investigation into whether prominent hedge fund Pequot Capital Management engaged in insider trading. Aguirre said that he was fired in September after he sought the testimony of a Wall Street executive, reported to be John Mack, chief executive of Morgan Stanley (MS) .

The SEC won't confirm or deny it's investigating Pequot. But the hearing in the Senate Judiciary Committee may shed light on the methods regulators use to catch potential cases of wrongdoing involving hedge funds -- the big, lightly regulated pools of money serving mostly wealthy investors.

The hearing will focus on the relationships between hedge funds and independent analysts.

"Everyone is very concerned about conflicts of interest," said Darren Sherman, a former SEC official and chief executive of Regulatory Advisory Services.

But the Wall Street-policing agency itself may come in for a drubbing over the dismissal of former lawyer Aguirre, for allegedly getting too close to a big- time executive who happens to be a major fund-raiser for President Bush.

Revelations of Aguirre's inquiry -- first reported Friday by the New York Times -- come as the agency's ability to oversee funds like Pequot is facing a major challenge. On Friday, a federal court threw out a rule requiring hedge- fund advisers to register with regulators as investment advisers. The agency must now go back to the drawing board and redesign new oversight guidelines.

Pequot probe

The committee, chaired by Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., will likely grill Aguirre about his motives for seeking Mack's testimony, and about what evidence he has concerning possible insider trading at Pequot. The firm hasn't been charged and denies wrongdoing.

Aguirre stated in a letter dated Sept. 2, 2005, his last day on the job, that Pequot received insider information from a source believed to be John Mack, who at the time was chief executive of Credit Suisse First Boston. Aguirre told Congress that stock exchange officials referred cases involving suspicious trades by Pequot to the SEC 18 times.

While exchanges and regulators have systems in place to catch insider trading, the volume of trades makes it difficult to catch improper activity without a tip-off, according to analysts.

"If the technology were good enough to detect this on a regular basis, there'd be no insider trading at all," said Octavio Marenzi, chief executive of Celent, a consultancy for financial institutions.

Daniel Strachman, managing partner of A&C Advisors, said that people knowledgeable about the trades in question may have alerted exchange officials and regulators.

"Somebody dropped a dime on them," he said about Pequot.

Two top law-enforcement officials also are scheduled to testify at the Senate hearing Wednesday. They are Matt Friedrich, the Justice Department's principal deputy assistant attorney general for crime, and Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal.

Heightened scrutiny

The hedge-fund industry has grown rapidly in recent years, with the total number of funds climbing to about 8,000 and overseeing more than $1 trillion in assets. The SEC has brought more than 50 cases against the industry since 2000. The court's rejection of the SEC rule notwithstanding, analysts predict regulators will step up efforts to scrutinize the investment pools.

Meanwhile, the Senate Banking Committee and Senate Finance Committee are investigating Aguirre's firing.

The Judiciary Committee's hearing is scheduled to begin at 9:30 a.m. on Wednesday.

Morgan Stanley Paying $10M Fine To Settle SEC Charges On Safeguarding Information (LAW/AP)

The Associated Press

AP, June 28, 2006

Wall Street powerhouse Morgan Stanley on Tuesday agreed to pay a $10 million civil fine to settle federal regulators' charges that it failed to maintain safeguards to prevent the misuse of inside information.

The Securities and Exchange Commission also censured Morgan Stanley under the settlement. The investment house neither admitted nor denied the SEC's allegations but did agree to refrain from future violations of the securities laws.

Morgan Stanley, the third-largest U.S. securities firm by market value, also agreed to hire an independent consultant to review its policies and practices for preventing misuse of confidential company information.

In a civil lawsuit, the SEC said Morgan Stanley for years failed to adequately maintain and enforce procedures to prevent the misuse of inside information regarding companies whose securities are held in hundreds of thousands of employee and employee-related accounts. The agency did not say whether any illegal insider trading or other improprieties had occurred using inside information as a result of the alleged lapses.

From at least 2000 to 2004, Morgan Stanley failed to conduct needed surveillance of hundreds of thousands of employee and employee-related accounts to detect possible insider trading, the SEC alleged.

"We are pleased to have resolved this matter with the SEC," New York-based Morgan Stanley said in a statement. "We have implemented substantial compliance system and process enhancements, and will continue to strengthen these as part of our ongoing commitment to having a best-in-class compliance culture."

It was the second SEC fine against the firm within a few weeks. On May 10, Morgan Stanley agreed to pay $15 million to settle the regulators' charges that it repeatedly failed to provide tens of thousands of e-mails which they sought in major investigations over several years.

Morgan Stanley Settles With SEC On Systems Issue (WSJ)

By Judith Burns

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Morgan Stanley will pay $10 million to settle allegations of a massive breakdown in systems to prevent misuse of inside information, the Securities and Exchange Commission said.

Morgan Stanley settled without admitting or denying the SEC's claims that for years it lacked adequate policies and procedures to safeguard against misuse of nonpublic information, even though it was legally required to have them.

"Due to a systemic breakdown in this critical compliance function, Morgan Stanley failed to conduct any surveillance" of trading in a massive number of employee accounts held at the firm, the SEC said. As a result, it said, "Morgan Stanley may have failed to detect illegal insider trading" by the firm, its employees or their relatives.

While the New York securities firm put stocks on a "Watch List" when its bankers had inside information on a company, the SEC said that over a four-year period it failed to scrutinize employee trading in most or all of the Watch List shares. The omission went "virtually undetected and uncorrected" for years, the SEC added.

"We are pleased to have resolved this matter with the SEC," said Morgan Stanley spokesman John Franklin. "We have implemented substantial compliance system and process enhancements and will continue to strengthen these as part of our ongoing commitment to having a best-in-class compliance culture."

In addition to the $10 million fine, Morgan Stanley was censured and agreed to cease and desist from future violations. The settlement also requires it to hire an outside consultant to conduct a comprehensive review of its policies and procedures, including a plan to make up for the scrutiny it didn't do in the past with a "retrospective surveillance" of all trading and accounts it should have examined over the four-year period.

Any evidence of insider trading uncovered in the course of the retrospective surveillance must be turned over to the SEC staff "promptly," the agency said. Under the settlement, Morgan Stanley has as many as 22 months to complete the retrospective surveillance.

Richard Grime, SEC assistant enforcement director, said he would be surprised if other Wall Street firms had similar-size problems in tracking potential insider trading, and declined to comment on why Morgan Stanley's compliance failures weren't detected in the course of routine SEC inspections.

According to the SEC, from at least 1999 to 2003, Morgan Stanley put more than 3,000 stocks on its Watch List, but didn't conduct any surveillance of them. The firm didn't track trading in certain derivative securities, single-stock futures and stock options of Watch List shares until 2004, the SEC added.

Regulators said at least 434,000 employee and employee-related accounts escaped scrutiny from mid-2000 to April 2004 because Morgan Stanley's compliance staffers didn't realize the reports they received tracked trading only by a smaller group of employees who were most likely to have access to inside information.

About 900 employee accounts held outside the firm and about 30,000 employee accounts that weren't flagged as such also didn't undergo any surveillance, the SEC added.

Once the surveillance problems were discovered, the SEC said Morgan Stanley reviewed its processes and began taking steps to correct the problems it identified. It said Morgan Stanley cooperated with the SEC staff investigating the matter and was quick to report its findings as additional surveillance issues were identified.

Morgan Stanley Fined Over Insider Accounts (USAT)

By Elliot Blair Smith

USA Today, June 28, 2006

Morgan Stanley was ordered Tuesday to pay a $10 million fine and to scrutinize employee trading records for the last four years after the Securities and Exchange Commission discovered a "systemic breakdown" in how the Wall Street firm controlled inside information.

It is the latest black eye for Morgan Stanley, which has paid $155 million since 2003 to settle regulatory investigations into alleged wrongdoing involving its analysts' research, mutual fund fees and allocations of initial public offerings. In addition, the firm paid $54 million in 2004 to settle a U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission lawsuit on behalf of many of its female employees.

Richard Grime, the SEC's assistant director of enforcement, said Morgan Stanley "failed to conduct any surveillance of a massive number" of its employee accounts until the agency discovered recordkeeping gaps during a routine investigation of potential inside trading.

"Once we scratched the surface, we found this problem," Grime said. Many of the recordkeeping deficiencies arose as a result of the firm's failure to fully integrate employees' records after its 1997 merger with Dean Witter Reynolds, the agency said, but investigators also found that the firm's compliance department had failed to update and enforce many of its surveillance procedures.

The SEC says internal auditors at the firm lost track of 251,000 employee and related accounts from mid-2000 to April 2004, because of a change in how they reviewed surveillance reports. During that same period, the firm allegedly mislabeled 183,082 employee accounts because of a computer coding error. From 1997 to 2004, it allegedly failed to monitor 900 employee accounts at other brokerages.

"As a result of these systemic failures, Morgan Stanley may have failed to detect illegal insider trading," the SEC said in a cease-and-desist order that required no admission of wrongdoing. Under the order, Morgan Stanley is required to hire an independent consultant to review its surveillance procedures, and to audit employee and related accounts that should have been monitored previously.

Morgan Stanley has 22 months to finish its review. But, Grime said, "If they find anything that looks suspicious, they shall promptly notify us, which is within 10 days."

The statute of limitations related to securities laws is five years.

Morgan Stanley spokeswoman Jennifer Mooney said, "We are pleased to have resolved this matter with the SEC. We have implemented substantial compliance system and process enhancements, and will continue to strengthen these as part of our ongoing commitment to having a 'best-in-class' compliance culture."

The recordkeeping fine is small relative to previous penalties imposed on Morgan Stanley but is the largest ever related to a firm's failure to safeguard material non-public information, Grime said.

David Callahan, author of The Cheating Culture, said, "What Morgan Stanley has received in the past is a relative slap on the wrist. … If you have no individuals who are ever held responsible for wrongdoing at these large financial companies, and if you have the financial penalties being relatively minor, given how large these organizations are, that's not a great deterrent."

CA To Add Shareholder Proposal After Court Refuses To Rule (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

NEW YORK -- CA Inc. said it will add to its July proxy a shareholder proposal that seeks to change the company's bylaws after a Delaware court refused to rule on the company's original decision to reject the proposal.

CA shareholders will be able to vote on the resolution, which seeks to limit the company's poison-pill provisions, at the shareholders' annual meeting, which is scheduled for late August.

The Islandia, N.Y., technology company originally denied a request to add the proposal to its upcoming proxy statement, claiming the proposal was a violation of Delaware law. The rejection resulted in a court challenge by the drafter of the resolution, Harvard professor and shareholder rights activist Lucian Bebchuk.

Last week, a Delaware judge refused to rule on the legality of CA's decision to reject the proposal, saying the issue wasn't "ripe" for a decision.

A ruling by the court would have shed light on the currently murky issue of whether shareholders have the power to decide bylaw issues, which are normally governed by directors. A company's bylaws are the official rules that govern its management.

CRIMINAL LAW:

The Disaster Without End (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0037209

The New York Times (opinion), June 28, 2006

It turns out that thieves and wastrels feasting in the wake of Hurricane Katrina have been doing a heck of a job too — pushing the tote in government loot toward $2 billion and counting. Government investigators have found fraud and waste consuming more than 1 in every 10 dollars of the $19 billion spent so far on Katrina and Hurricane Rita — double the usual rate after a disaster. Thousands of criminal investigations are under way, with hundreds of people already charged with price-gouging and fraud. Even frontline workers with the Red Cross and the Federal Emergency Management Agency are being charged with profiteering.

The most graphic evidence of FEMA mismanagement is the 10,000 mobile homes, costing $34,500 each, that proved useless in post-storm Louisiana and now sit empty at an Arkansas airfield at a storage cost of $250,000 a month. Meanwhile, contractors billed taxpayers for phantom hotel guests, phantom emergency meals and phantom caravans of storm debris. Even prison inmates allegedly gamed the system for housing aid. As much as 21 percent of the $6.3 billion sent directly to victims was improperly distributed, according to a detailed report by The Times's Eric Lipton.

The widespread fraud, waste and bungling was abetted by FEMA' s failure to put a high priority on existing tools for catching schemers and thieves, according to the Government Accountability Office. FEMA officials, wary at the advent of a new hurricane season, insist that tougher accountability precautions are now in place. But there's been no credible evidence of the top-to-bottom revamping that FEMA needs.

Venerable Church Burns In New Orleans (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, June 27 — Newly burned-out lots pockmark the city, evidence of a fearsome new challenge as firefighters here say they are confronting a tough post-Hurricane Katrina landscape of abandoned buildings, water mains cracked by the storm and fire engines with smaller crews.

Historic structures are burning to the ground — the latest was the Coliseum Place Baptist Church, a venerable red brick church that until Friday had towered over Coliseum Square in the Lower Garden District since 1855. Preservationists here described the loss as heartbreaking; it followed a February fire that destroyed a cherished World War I-era theater in the same square.

The newest threat to New Orleans is a direct outcropping of the storm, in many respects. Vagrants, squatting in empty buildings, lighting candles and cooking without electricity, are setting fires, the authorities say. Pipes broken during Hurricane Katrina have been leaking 85 million gallons of water a day. Manpower in the Fire Department is down by a third, on a good day. And inadequate flood insurance has been an inducement to arson, officials say.

"We have more fires, burning hotter and burning faster, and we have reduced water pressure," said Capt. Nick Felton, president of the New Orleans Firefighters Association, Local 632. "We've got a recipe for disaster. We've really got our back against the wall."

Staircases leading to nowhere amid charred, twisted building fragments can be found here and there on desolate lots in the Uptown neighborhood. In the Lower Garden District, one of the city's oldest, leafiest neighborhoods, at least six significant structures have been lost to fire since the hurricane. In May, two 100-year-old wooden wharves on the Mississippi River burned, sending a column of smoke high above the Central Business District.

The Fire Department's spokesman, Chief Norman Woodridge, agreed that the volume and size of fires appeared to have increased.

"We've got many large fires," Chief Woodridge said. "We're going out two, three, four times a week. That's unusual." Meanwhile, the department worries that it will soon lose two firefighting helicopters, on temporary loan from the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Water pressure is down to 20 pounds per square inch, from 90, in some areas because of the leaks, Captain Felton said. It is yet another legacy of the storm: trees, blown down by Hurricane Katrina, uprooted water mains, cracking them.

Adding to the fire problems, a drought described by climatologists as severe has settled over the region, drying up vegetation. Fires, more common in winter here, are particularly unwelcome with the mercury stuck in the mid-90's. Working conditions are as bad as they have ever been, firefighters say.

"It's very hot and it's very tiring," said one firefighter, Pekitha West. "Very stressful. We're at more fires, by us having to cross over districts."

A vacant apartment complex, struck by lightning, burned to the ground in eastern New Orleans earlier this month. Firefighters had battled more than two dozen large blazes previously in June.

DOJ_NMG_0037210

In many ways, Hurricane Katrina created an ideal landscape for unchecked blazes. Gutted structures, stripped of sheetrock, leave room and air for fire to spread, Captain Felton said. Rising rents mean people are crowding into closer quarters. And armies of demolition workers are breaking into empty houses to sleep on undamaged second floors.

The result: "We're makin' a whole lot of fires," Captain Felton said, using a local idiom that translates roughly as "the firefighters are busy."

The blaze at the Coliseum Place Baptist Church, the oldest Baptist church in New Orleans, was a heavy psychological blow to the struggling city. The deep red of its Gothic brick tower made an arresting counterpoint to the pastel Greek Revival houses and dark green foliage on the square. The austere church was said to have sheltered troops on both sides during the Civil War.

The cause of the fire was under investigation. The building had been vacant for quite some time, and largely unused; residents reported chasing off vagrants. The remnants of its congregation had previously sought to tear it down, but the Historic District Landmarks Commission had refused the request.

Friday, in front of the smoldering ruins — the spire was intact, though badly damaged — distraught residents milled about the square, trying to head off the wrecking crew. An engineer brought in by local residents said parts of the church could be saved. But the report was to no avail; demolition went ahead after a nearly daylong standoff.

"I've got a role here, to protect the public," said the city's director of safety and permits, Mike Centineo. Patricia Gay of the Preservation Resource Center called it "a terrible architectural and historical loss," a sentiment echoed by other preservationists.

The square's residents, meanwhile, spoke as if their neighborhood's heart had been ripped out. "No tourists are going to want to come here if we lose all of our historic buildings," said Rene Padilla, who lived next door to the church.

Picture connects congressman to tribe that was an Abramoff client

WASHINGTON - The Tigua of El Paso, an Indian tribe and former client of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, released a photo Tuesday of a meeting that members had with Ohio Republican Rep Bob Ney — a meeting the congressman told Senate investigators he did not remember having.

The photo, which was taken on Aug. 14, 2002, in a House hearing room, shows the Tigua tribe's Lt. Gov. Carlos Hisa and tribal council member Raul Gutierrez with Ney. Less than a week earlier, Ney had returned from an expenses-paid golf junket to Scotland with Abramoff, Ralph Reed, David Safavian, Neil Volz and others.

On Nov. 12, 2004, in an interview with Senate investigators, Ney said that "he was not familiar with the Tigua." But the report quotes tribal representatives as testifying that they met with Ney for about two hours and he assured them he could help with legislation.

Ney told the investigators that he "could not recall ever meeting with any member of the Tigua." Ney's lawyer later said the congressman's schedule for that day showed a half-hour meeting with the "Taqua." A spokesman for Ney, Brian Walsh, said the congressman simply could not recall that the tribe was also known by another name, the Ysleta del Sur Pueblo Indian Tribe of El Paso, Texas.

Hisa said in a telephone interview that Ney "had a terrible sunburn. He was red like a lobster from that Scotland trip." Hisa said his tribe was asked to pay $50,000 for the trip, but they refused — other tribal clients of Abramoff's paid more than $100,000 to cover the expenses.

Hisa also said it was "strange" that Ney told Senate Indian Affairs Committee investigators that he didn't remember meeting with the Tigua.

Accepts money from tribe

Ney accepted $32,000 from the tribe and had agreed to put legislative language in a bill to reopen a closed gambling casino it owned. The measure never became law because it lacked Senate support. E-mails released by the committee show that Abramoff and Ney knew in July 2002 that the Tigua's provision in the Election Reform Bill was dead in the Senate but didn't tell the tribe until that October.

Ney's comments to the committee could complicate his problems with the Justice Department.

Ney told the committee he never knew that tribal money financed the golf trip. He said he thought the costs were covered by a private foundation. The report said: "Congressman Ney said the purpose of the trip was to raise money for underprivileged kids in Scotland and Washington, D.C. The itinerary consisted of golfing, meeting two parliamentarians, and watching the Marine Band."

The meetings with Scottish parliamentarians never took place. And according to testimony by Ney's former chief of staff Neil Volz, the trip amounted to $100 rounds of drinks, $400 rounds of golf and expensive hotel rooms.

Volz, Reed, Ney, Abramoff and David Safavian — who was convicted of four counts of lying and obstruction — were all part of the golf party to Scotland and London in 2002.

Walsh, Ney's spokesman, has said the Senate report merely shows just how far Abramoff and his conspirators, who "have pleaded guilty to deceiving their clients, employers and members of Congress, would go to further their own greed."

Five people have pleaded guilty or been convicted of influence peddling — Volz, Abramoff and two former aides to former Texas Republican Rep. Tom DeLay, Tony Rudy and Michael Scanlon. Safavian has been the only person caught up in the Abramoff scandal to be convicted at trial.

The Justice Department's investigation is continuing.

AP2, June 27, 2006

An Indian tribe that was a client of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff has released a photograph of tribal leaders meeting with Rep. Bob Ney (news, bio, voting record), who had told investigators he wasn't familiar with the tribe.

The photo shows the Tigua tribe's Lt. Gov. Carlos Hisa and tribal council member Raul Gutierrez with Ney in a House hearing room on Aug. 14, 2002, less than a week after Ney finished an expenses-paid golf trip to Scotland with Abramoff and others.

On Nov. 12, 2004, while being interviewed by Senate investigators, Ney said he could not recall meeting with the Tigua.

After the interview, Ney's lawyer said the congressman's calendar did list a half-hour meeting with the "Taqua." Ney's spokesman Brian Walsh now says Ney may not have recognized the name "Tigua" because of the tribe's formal name, the Ysleta del Sur Pueblo.

"Ney takes literally thousands of pictures with people visiting D.C. every year and he is supposed to remember every one of them?" Walsh said.

According to testimony by Hisa and tribal spokesman Marc Schwartz, Ney met for 1 1/2 hours with Hisa, Gutierrez, Schwartz and Abramoff, and assured them that he was working to put a provision in an election-reform bill that would allow the tribe to reopen its shuttered casino. Ney also praised Abramoff as "the man to work with for changes in Washington," Hisa said. The Tigua provision did not make it into the final legislation.

Lawmakers Tackle Online Child Porn (AP-Y2)

By Erica Werner, Associated Press Writer

AP2, June 28, 2006

Internet providers told Congress on Tuesday they're doing all they can to combat online child pornography, but they were told to expect legislation.

Several voiced skepticism about creating new laws that would force them to retain data about their users' online activity.

Any such measure would be costly and easily circumvented and would "fall far short of its intended goal," America Online chief counsel John Ryan told a House Energy and Commerce subcommittee hearing.

The focus should be on improving existing child porn laws — not "new mandates," said Verizon Online general counsel Thomas Dailey.

Lawmakers, however, said more must be done to stop the availability of child porn on the Web and chart rooms where pedophiles troll for young victims.

"The parents of America and I think the Congress is tired of just talking about it. I think we're ready to take action," Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton, R-Texas, told a panel of executives from seven companies including Yahoo Inc. (Nasdaq:YHOO - news), Google Inc. and Microsoft Corp.

Barton said that after hearings by his committee's investigative subcommittee wrap up Wednesday he plans to develop a comprehensive anti-porn bill. He didn't offer details, but getting companies to maintain customer records was a focus Tuesday.

Top Justice Department officials including Attorney General Alberto Gonzales have met recently with Internet executives to discuss the issue. There's currently no legal requirement for companies to hang onto records of their customers' activities, and according to testimony Tuesday, industry practices vary dramatically.

EarthLink Inc. archives customer records for seven years; Comcast Corp. now keeps it only for 31 days, but plans to implement a 180-day policy by Sept. 1.

The lack of uniformity "is seriously hindering investigations," said Rep. Diana DeGette (news, bio, voting record), D-Colo., who is writing a bill to require certain customer-identifying records to be kept for one year.

Companies already are adjusting their practices in response to the attention from Congress and the Justice Department.

Five companies — Time Warner Inc.'s AOL, Yahoo, Microsoft, Earthlink and United Online Inc. — announced Tuesday they will jointly build a database of child-pornography images and develop other tools to help prevent distribution of the images. The companies pledged $1 million and will work with the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

Google came under the most criticism Tuesday, with lawmakers brandishing printouts of a search using the terms "pre-teen," "sex" and "video" that yielded 2.9 million hits on the massive search site.

Nicole Wong, Google's associate general counsel and chief privacy officer, said that search was an aberration based on the company's failure to flag the word "pre-teen" when it's hyphenated, but that it's been corrected. She said the company's policy was to block access to child porn sites as soon as they're detected.

"We do the best we can," Wong said.

Senators Adopt Web Labeling Requirement (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh And Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, June 28, 2006

Web site operators posting sexually explicit information must slap warning labels on their pages or face prison terms of up to 15 years, according to a proposal adopted by a U.S. Senate committee on Tuesday.

During a day of debate on a wide-ranging communications bill, the Senate Commerce Committee approved an amendment backed by the Bush administration that proponents claim would help clean up the Internet and protect children online.

It says that commercial Web sites must not place "sexually explicit material" on their home pages upon pain of felony prosecution--and, in addition, they must rate "each page or screen of the website that does contain sexually explicit material" with a system to be devised by the Federal Trade Commission.

"This will protect children from accidentally typing in the wrong address and immediately viewing indecent material," said Sen. Conrad Burns, a Montana Republican who is the co-founder of the Congressional Internet Caucus.

Burns said that politicians "have to take a bold step in this world of danger to our kids, and there are some people out there who prey on young children and they use the Internet and other methods to feed their sickness."

Civil libertarians have opposed the mandatory labeling proposal, saying it violates the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of speech. Also, courts have taken a dim view of mandatory rating systems: In a 1968 case called Interstate Circuit v. Dallas, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that Dallas' ordinance requiring that movies be rated was unconstitutional because the criteria for rating were unclear and vague.

Burns' seven-page amendment is virtually identical to a standalone bill introduced earlier this month by Sen. Jon Kyl, an Arizona Republican. Both proposals follow from a speech in April during which Attorney General Alberto Gonzales called on Congress to "promptly" enact such a law.

Sen. John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat, had planned to offer a "very similar" amendment and Senate aides would combine the two before a floor vote, said Ted Stevens, the Alaska Republican who serves as the committee chairman.

Stevens also postponed discussion of what has proven one of the thorniest provisions of the massive telecommunications bill: Net neutrality. Senators plan to begin debate on that topic on Wednesday at 10 a.m. ET, with votes on a number of amendments expected.

The entire communications bill won't become law unless it receives final approval by the committee and, later, the full Senate. It must also be reconciled with a House of Representatives version that differs in many respects, including having no Internet labeling requirements.

Senate committee says that sexually explicit Web sites must be labeled as such--or their operators will go to jail.

Defense Says South Korean Businessman Was No Iraqi Agent (NSDY/AP)

By David B. Caruso, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, June 28, 2006

NEW YORK -- A South Korean businessman accused of secretly lobbying the United Nations on behalf of Saddam Hussein's government was "simply a middleman" who didn't intend to break any U.S. laws, his attorney told a federal jury Tuesday.

Tongsun Park, 71, is charged with acting as an unregistered agent for Iraq in the mid-1990s at a time when the country was trying to influence the design of the U.N. oil-for-food program.

DOJ_NMG_0037213

Prosecutors said Park _ already infamous in the United States for his role in a 1970s influence-peddling scandal known as "Koreagate" _ was no ordinary lobbyist.

In his opening statement Tuesday, Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Farbiarz told jurors that Park was promised millions of dollars by Iraq for his help influencing top U.N. officials, including former Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali.

Being an agent of a foreign government isn't itself illegal, but prosecutors said Park failed to follow U.S. laws requiring such lobbyists to disclose their relationships.

"There's a right way and a wrong way," Farbiarz said. "He hid his relationship with Iraq."

Park's attorney, Michael Kim, acknowledged that the case was "full of intrigue."

"It almost sounded like a Tom Clancy novel," he said of Farbiarz's opening statement, which described secret meetings in cafes and cash being smuggled out of Iraq through the desert.

But he insisted that Park committed no illegal acts, and urged jurors to ignore the sensational elements of the case.

"He is not charged with taking money from a foreign government. ... He is not charged with intelligence gathering or spying," Kim said. "He is not charged with selling his access to the United Nations."

Kim repeatedly described Park as "a middleman, a facilitator" who was little different from other people who had an interest in the final design of the oil-for-food program, including several big American companies.

He also asked jurors not to convict him simply because he dealt with the government of Saddam Hussein.

"The question is not, 'Do you like the Iraqi government?'" Kim said.

From 1996 to 2003, the oil-for-food program allowed Iraq to sell oil on the condition that most of the money go toward humanitarian supplies.

Authorities say the program was horribly corrupted, and that it allowed Hussein to evade U.N. sanctions and collect huge kickbacks from thousands of international companies. By some estimates, $1.8 billion was looted from the program.

Park, a citizen of South Korea, was indicted last year. If convicted, he could face more than 12 years in prison.

In the mid-1970s, Park was heavily involved in the Koreagate scandal, in which he was accused of helping intelligence services in his native South Korea funnel bribes and favors to U.S. politicians.

Park was granted immunity in exchange for his cooperation with prosecutors, and testified that he doled out $850,000 worth of bribes.

The trial in the oil-for-food case began Tuesday with testimony from the government's star witness, Samir A. Vincent, who has already pleaded guilty to being an illegal lobbyist for Iraq.

Vincent, an Iraqi-born American businessman, testified that he worked for years to influence U.S. and U.N. officials over the design of the oil-for-food program, partly because companies he was affiliated with were poised to get a percentage of the revenue generated by the plan.

He testified that his lobbying efforts had largely stalled until he was introduced to Park, who quickly arranged meetings with high U.N. officials.

The trial was to resume Wednesday.

Saddam Gave Bizman 2.5M : Feds (NYDN)

By Paul H.b. Shin, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, June 28, 2006

A South Korean businessman pocketed at least $2.5 million from Saddam Hussein in a cloak-and-dagger scheme to siphon off Iraq's oil profits, federal prosecutors said yesterday.

Using cash-stuffed envelopes and back-channel talks under cover of night, Tongsun Park secretly lobbied UN officials to rig the oil-for-food program to fatten Saddam's regime, Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Farbiarz told a Manhattan jury in opening statements of the first trial linked to the scandal-ridden program.

"Iraq wanted to buy Tongsun Park's United Nations contacts and for millions of dollars, Tongsun Park was willing to sell it," Farbiarz said.

Park, who was at the center of the Capitol Hill influence-peddling scandal dubbed Koreagate during the 1970s, is charged with acting as an unregistered agent for Iraq in the mid-1990s.

But Park did nothing illegal, said his attorney Michael Kim, who likened the prosecution's descriptions of clandestine meetings to "a Tom Clancy novel."

Park was "simply a middleman, a facilitator, just like almost everyone else involved in the oil-for-food program," Kim said, accusing the prosecution of trying to arouse the jury's passions by repeating the name of Saddam Hussein.

The oil-for-food program was established in 1996 to ease the economic strain of sanctions imposed in the wake of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait. It was intended to allow Iraq to use oil profits to buy food and medicines under UN supervision. But investigators later revealed the $64billion program was rife with corruption, with nearly 2,400 firms paying $1.8billion in kickbacks to Saddam's regime.

If convicted, Park faces a maximum of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Park, 71, has been in jail since January, when he was nabbed in Mexico while traveling from Canada to Panama. At the time, he was carrying $45,000 in cash, FBI officials said. Despite his age and failing health, he has been denied bail repeatedly because judges have deemed him likely to flee the country.

The U.S. Justice Department has charged Park and six others, including Texas oil tycoon Oscar Wyatt, with illegally doing business with Iraq while UN sanctions were in place. Wyatt has been charged with paying bribes to Saddam's regime in exchange for millions of barrels of Iraqi oil on the cheap.

Feds Tell Jury: Say 'Enough' To Political Hiring (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush And Dan Mihalopoulos, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, June 28, 2006

Federal prosecutors urged jurors in the City Hall corruption trial Tuesday to end the illegal political hiring that they say has pervaded Mayor Richard Daley's administration.

"This machine doesn't have any brakes. That's you," Assistant U.S. Atty. Philip Guentert told jurors. "It's time to say enough."

Defense lawyers for three former city officials argued that prosecutors brought insufficient and misleading evidence against Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich and three co-defendants.

The lead attorney for Timothy McCarthy, who worked with Sorich in the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, told jurors that prosecutors want them to "speculate and guess" that the defendants are guilty.

"You didn't always hear the whole story," said McCarthy's lawyer, Patrick Deady.

Prosecutors have alleged that Intergovernmental Affairs was the hub of a widespread scheme to fix jobs and promotions in favor of politically connected candidates.

Guentert had the last word Tuesday, and he used it to sound a warning to co-schemers who have not yet been charged as members of the "corrupt clout machine."

"For those who are out there and are responsible for this scheme, there's another day," he said.

Guentert acknowledged that Sorich did not invent the scheme to steer jobs to workers in pro-Daley campaign groups. But he said Sorich and the other defendants played important roles in an illegal process involving many others.

"City Hall is chock-full of the schemers," he said.

Although Guentert did not specifically name other alleged co-schemers, prosecutors in the trial have referred repeatedly to the involvement of former top Daley aide Victor Reyes and retired Streets and Sanitation Commissioner Al Sanchez. Reyes and Sanchez are leaders of the powerful Hispanic Democratic Organization.

The mayor's patronage office illegally handed out 5,000 jobs to applicants with political clout, Guentert said.

To emphasize the significance of the hiring investigation, he said the alleged scheme helped candidates for local, state and federal offices: "It affected the course of how people in this city were governed."

Sorich, McCarthy and former Streets and Sanitation Department official Patrick Slattery face fraud charges. A fourth defendant, former high-ranking city official John Sullivan, is charged with lying to federal agents.

U.S. District Judge David Coar is expected to instruct the jury on the law Wednesday morning, and deliberations will begin once that is complete.

Deady, McCarthy's attorney, argued Tuesday that the evidence regarding his client's actions in Intergovernmental Affairs shows he was never part of any scheme.

The prosecution alleged that McCarthy ordered the hiring of 19-year-old Andrew Ryan as a building inspector in 2004 because he was the son of a powerful union leader, even though Ryan was unqualified for the job.

"If it was really a scheme to conceal, the last person you would want to hire is a 19-year-old kid," Deady said.

He argued that the testimony of Christopher Kozicki, a former managing deputy commissioner in the Buildings Department, proves that it was Buildings Commissioner Stan Kaderbek—and not McCarthy—who ordered Ryan's hiring.

Kaderbek wanted to appease Ryan's father, a union official, Deady said.

He said that Sorich and McCarthy recommended job applicants to city departments but never ordered the hiring of anyone.

Deady highlighted Kozicki's testimony that the Buildings Department hired only two of 10 people referred by McCarthy on one occasion.

If the department had failed to accept orders from the mayor's office, Deady said, then "one of two things should have happened. Mr. Kozicki should have been called on the carpet, or his boss should have been fired."

Deady also argued that McCarthy had nothing to gain from the alleged scheme.

"Why is it he would engage in this scheme at all?" Deady asked. "He's not getting any money."

In his rebuttal argument, Guentert answered that the city handsomely compensated Sorich and McCarthy. Until they were charged and fired a year ago, Sorich was paid $101,100 a year, and McCarthy's annual salary was $90,564.

"That was their job," Guentert said. "They were in charge of patronage. It's more than insult to injury that the city had to pay these guys to do it."

After Deady's closing argument, Sullivan's lawyer said he should be acquitted. Prosecutors allege that Sullivan, who was the managing deputy in Streets and Sanitation, misled investigators about his knowledge of two political groups that helped campaign workers get jobs in his department.

Cynthia Giacchetti, Sullivan's lawyer, noted that FBI agent John Hauser waited more than five months to transcribe one of two face-to-face interviews with Sullivan. She also pointed out that Hauser did not take verbatim notes of the interviews.

She contrasted that to federal prosecutors' interview of Daley last year, which was transcribed word-for-word.

"John Sullivan is not as powerful as the mayor ... but he is certainly deserving of the same protection and rights," Giacchetti said.

Sullivan had been accused of participating in the fraud scheme, but that charge was dropped last week.

An attorney for Slattery argued his client was charged in the case because he is a close friend of Sorich.

"This is a squeeze job on a childhood friend," said Patrick Blegen, Slattery's lawyer.

Blegen also said the key witness against Slattery, Streets and Sanitation lawyer Catharine Hennessy, could not be believed. He reminded jurors of testimony from a union official who called Hennessy's honesty into question.

Prosecutors: 'The Fix Was In' (CHIST)

By Natasha Korecki And Steve Warmbir, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, June 28, 2006

Mayor Daley's patronage chief and three others ran "a corrupt clout machine" greased with political workers who stole city jobs from deserving candidates, prosecutors charged Monday.

"All of this was a charade, ladies and gentlemen," federal prosecutor Julie Ruder said of a scheme to falsify job tests and hold bogus interviews so that hundreds of jobs went to predetermined, clout-backed winners. "The fix was in."

In the first day of closing arguments to cap the six-week City Hall hiring trial, prosecutors said four former city workers scammed taxpayers and qualified applicants who thought the city hiring was legitimate.

"They put their trust in a corrupt clout machine," Ruder said.

The scheme continued because Robert Sorich ordered computer tapes to be erased and city documents destroyed and one of his co-defendants, John Sullivan, lied repeatedly to the FBI, prosecutors said. "Concealment was part of the scheme from day one," Assistant U.S. Attorney Barry Miller said.

Defense rips 'pig Tomczak'

Pacing with his hands in his pockets, Sorich attorney Tom Durkin went on his own attack. He called prosecutors "intellectually dishonest" for bringing such a weak case.

"Sometimes people with good intentions go too far. That time has come today," Durkin said.

The verbal sallies came as the federal courtroom was packed to overflowing, including about 25 relatives and supporters of the four defendants.

Sorich, patronage chief and top official in Daley's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, and three others are accused of cheating the system to ensure jobs or promotions went to campaign workers.

"It was not about qualifications. It was not about merit," Ruder said. "It was about politics. It was about clout. It was about who you knew and whose palm you were greasing."

Not with money, she said but a currency more valuable: "bodies." Ruder said jobs went to those who donated their labor to political groups by ringing doorbells, distributing flyers and making calls for candidates backed by the mayor.

Durkin said IGA took job recommendations from politicians and tracked city jobs by race, but never made guarantees. He blasted the prosecution's top witnesses, including Daniel Katalinic and Donald Tomczak, who admitted in plea deals to taking bribes, unlike Sorich.

Durkin ended his argument at the lectern staring right at the jury. His voice rising, he vouched for Sorich's credibility, causing several of the defendant's family members to dab tears from their eyes. Durkin's voice cracked as he pleaded with jurors not to see Sorich as an orchestrator of some complicated fraud scheme. He said his client had no criminal intent, and asked for a motive.

"Which was what? To be a big shot?" Durkin asked, noting there was no testimony Sorich took money or boasted about his connections. "That pig Tomczak did," Durkin said. To use Tomczak's name in the same sentence as Sorich "sickens me," he said.

'Don't try to run Daley out'

Durkin attacked City Corporation Counsel Mara Georges for saying she was unaware of IGA's role in hiring. He pointed to computer evidence the city turned over to federal prosecutors in 1997 that included IGA job lists.

"Was the stench worse from her testimony or was the stench worse that they tried to get you to believe her testimony?" Durkin asked.

Durkin, who did not put on witnesses, asked why the prosecution never brought in someone to explain the 1983 Shakman decree, which prohibits political influence from factoring into job hires and what prosecutors say the four men flouted. Durkin, who has suggested IGA's role in hiring went on before Sorich was hired, urged jurors not to convict if only they were displeased with the mayor.

"Don't try to run Daley out of office by voting to convict these guys," Durkin said.

Fighting over holes

Ruder worked to show there were victims to the scheme by spotlighting an experienced plumber, Laura Miller, who was edged out of a promotion despite being more qualified, the only union candidate and African-American. She used Miller's experience to attack the notion that IGA was trying to diversify the workforce.

She said the scheme endured because of years of concealment.

"Deny Deny Deny," Ruder said, referencing a supervisor's testimony that she was told to always hide IGA involvement in hiring. "That is what she learned her first day of work, just like a child learns ABCs on the first day of kindergarten," drawing a loud sigh from a Sorich supporter.

Durkin tried to portray Sorich as a trusted, well-liked city employee who helped people, including one city worker who agreed Sorich literally helped get him out of working in a hole, with a promotion.

Ruder, though, asked about all the other workers in low-level, back-breaking jobs, who didn't do political work.

"Mr. Sorich didn't get them out," Ruder said, her voice ringing with outrage. Unless a person did political work, Ruder said: "you were stuck in that hole for good."

Tech Pair Indicted On Charges They Deleted E-mails In Fumo Probe (AP)

By Maryclaire Dale, The Associated Press

AP, June 28, 2006

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — Weeks after their arrest, a pair of computer technicians assigned to state Sen. Vincent Fumo were indicted on charges of obstructing a federal investigation by deleting years worth of Fumo's e-mails.

The 34-count indictment returned Tuesday charges Leonard P. Luchko, 50, of Collingdale, and Mark C. Eister, 36, of Camp Hill, with conspiracy, destroying evidence and obstruction.

Federal authorities are investigating whether Fumo extorted millions in corporate donations for a South Philadelphia nonprofit, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, and used the nonprofit for political purposes. Fumo has not been charged in the case.

The FBI last month arrested Luchko and Eister in pre-dawn raids on their homes, although defense lawyers complained that their clients had been willing to surrender.

An FBI affidavit filed previously cites e-mails from staffers depicting Fumo as increasingly worried about leaving an electronic trail and allegedly ordering his large staff to delete his e-mails along with any relating to the nonprofit.

U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan has said that the three-year investigation is far from over, but defense lawyers noted that Tuesday's indictment did not name any new defendants.

"It suggests that the government is not ready to indict others," said lawyer William A. DeStefano, a former federal prosecutor.

Luchko was charged Tuesday with 30 criminal counts and Eister with five counts.

Neither their lawyers nor Fumo's lawyer, Richard Sprague, immediately returned phone messages seeking comment Tuesday afternoon.

2 Computer Aides To Sen. Fumo Charged Formally (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 28, 2006

A federal grand jury yesterday indicted two former state Senate aides, accusing them of deleting e-mails to thwart a federal corruption and extortion investigation of State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo.

The 34-count indictment is considered a formality. The aides were arrested May 31, and prosecutors had a month to bring the case before the grand jury. Yesterday's indictment did not offer any new charges. It simply repeated FBI allegations that computer technicians Leonard P. Luchko and Mark C. Eister deleted files at Fumo's direction.

The indictment, however, did trigger the random selection of a judge for the case: Senior U.S. District Judge William H. Yohn Jr. If others are indicted in this case, Yohn would preside over their trial as well.

Yohn, a former state representative and Montgomery County Court judge, was appointed to the federal bench by President George H.W. Bush in 1991. He is a Republican and a graduate of Princeton University and Yale Law School. He has presided over several high-profile corruption cases, including this year's trial of former Norristown Mayor Ted LeBlanc.

"He's one of the brightest judges in the courthouse and not afraid to take a stand," said J. Michael Farrell, a defense lawyer who represented Mumia Abu-Jamal before Yohn in 2001. In a controversial decision, Yohn affirmed Abu-Jamal's conviction but overturned his death sentence, ordering a new hearing.

Lawyers involved in the Fumo aides' case said yesterday it would be inappropriate to comment on Yohn's selection.

No one else has been charged in the case, but Fumo and his former deputy chief of staff, Ruth Arnao, remain targets of the investigation. Until this month, Arnao was executive director of Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, the charity at the center of the probe.

Fumo and Arnao are not mentioned by name in yesterday's indictment. The 70-page document refers to them by job title numerous times, beginning on Page 1.

The indictment says that authorities are trying to determine whether Fumo engaged in extortion by soliciting contributions for the South Philadelphia charity and whether any contributions were used improperly to benefit Fumo politically or personally.

The investigation, which began in early 2003, began focusing on the corporate donations after The Inquirer reported in late 2003 that Peco Energy Co. - engaged in negotiations with Fumo about deregulating electricity rates - had secretly given $17 million to Citizens' Alliance.

On Jan. 25, 2004, after The Inquirer reported the federal probe was under way, Luchko sent a mass e-mail to Fumo and his staff saying Fumo had ordered tighter computer security.

"The FBI probe into the senator has really set him off," Luchko wrote in another e-mail that night. "He wants us to start doing a number of security checks starting tomorrow... He wants all of the Blackberries wiped... S- has hit the fan."

In a statement yesterday, prosecutors John Pease and Robert Zauzmer said that Luchko and Eister and others "succeeded in deleting and destroying substantial amounts of electronic evidence relevant to the investigation."

Deleted files included all e-mail sent or received before 2005 by Fumo or Arnao, prosecutors said. All e-mail about Citizens' Alliance was deleted from Fumo's computers, the prosecutors said.

Fumo's attorney, Richard A. Sprague, has said the two technicians were "unfortunate victims" of a campaign to bring down the powerful Philadelphia Democrat. Sprague's office declined to comment yesterday.

Luchko and Eister resigned their Senate jobs after their arrests. Their lawyers, who were unavailable for comment yesterday, have said they would fight the charges at trial.

The indictment charges Luchko with 30 counts - including 19 counts of destroying evidence and nine counts of persuading others to destroy evidence. If convicted, the 50-year-old Collingdale resident could face about three years in prison under the advisory federal sentencing guidelines.

Eister, who is 36 and lives in Camp Hill, Pa., is charged with five similar counts. If convicted, he likely also faces three to four years.

2 Ex-computer Aides Of Fumo Indicted (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 28, 2006

Two former computer aides of state Sen. Vince Fumo were indicted yesterday by a federal grand jury on charges of obstructing justice.

Leonard Luchko, 49, and Mark Eister, 36, were arrested at their homes on May 31 and charged in a criminal complaint accompanied by a 65-page affidavit from an FBI agent.

Yesterday's 70-page, 34-count indictment was basically a formality, and there were no new bombshells in the charging papers.

A federal grand jury charged that Luchko and Eister, who resigned their Senate jobs last month, conspired to delete and destroy e-mails between November 2003 and October 2005 to foil a federal criminal probe of Fumo and a Fumo-backed community group, the Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods Inc.

The feds are investigating whether Fumo used his office to extort donations for the group and whether those donations improperly benefitted him personally or politically.

Fumo has not been charged with any wrongdoing, and his attorney, Richard A. Sprague, has said that Luchko and Eister are "victims" of a process that is attempting "to get" Fumo.

Ruth Arnao, the community group's former executive director and a one-time top aide to Fumo, has been informed by federal prosecutors that she is a target of the investigation.

The indictment, which identifies only Luchko and Eister by name, alleges that the two men:

· Systematically destroyed e- mails sent to or received from Fumo and Arnao;

· Created and implemented schedules to run computer programs that erased any trace of deleted electronic files from computer hard drives;

· Instructed Fumo's employees not to save any e-mails sent to or received from Fumo;

· Logged in to e-mail accounts of Fumo's employees to scan their e-mail to see if they were saving any Fumo-related e-mail; and · Deleted and wiped other electronic devices, such as BlackBerries, used by Fumo and Arnao, among others.

The indictment also alleges that Luchko and Eister, as well as their unindicted co-conspirators, succeeded in permanently erasing virtually all such e-mails before 2005.

If convicted, Luchko and Eister could face up to four years in prison under federal sentencing guidelines.

James C. Schwartzman, Luchko's attorney, and Brian J. McMonagle, Eister's attorney, could not be reached for comment yesterday.

They have said that both Luchko and Eister intend to contest the charges at trial.

FBI Was Slow To Check Pellicano's Audio Lab (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian And Andrew Blankstein, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

Agents waited almost two months to seize the taping equipment, court documents show.

Court documents released Tuesday show that FBI agents did not examine private investigator Anthony Pellicano's sophisticated audio lab during their initial November 2002 search of his Sunset Strip offices, raising new questions about the handling of the probe.

After the November search, the court documents show, FBI agents waited almost two months to seize computers and other items from the lab.

With prosecutors publicly acknowledging that they have only one allegedly wiretapped conversation on tape, the time lapse between searches raises the possibility that Pellicano or others could have removed audio files or potential evidence in the case from computers in the lab.

In recent court proceedings, federal prosecutors said they had seized 1,300 audio recordings from Pellicano's offices, nearly 300 of which remain encrypted.

The newly released documents also show that Anita Busch, a former Los Angeles Times reporter who was allegedly threatened at Pellicano's behest in June 2002, also told authorities that someone had hacked into her personal computer and tapped her telephone.

So far, Pellicano and 13 others have been charged in the federal probe of wiretapping, racketeering, witness tampering and other crimes. Seven of Pellicano's co-defendants already have pleaded guilty to charges ranging from lying to the FBI to hiring Pellicano to engage in illegal wiretapping.

He and his remaining co-defendants have pleaded not guilty to charges that they used wiretaps and illegal background checks to obtain "confidential, embarrassing or incriminating" information, typically to help attorneys and other clients gain an advantage in civil or criminal litigation.

They are scheduled to go on trial in October.

The court papers released Tuesday relate to three of six searches conducted by authorities in their investigation of Pellicano, which began after he was allegedly linked to the threat against Busch.

DOJ_NMG_0037219

Investigating the threat, the FBI first raided Pellicano's offices in November 2002 and hauled away computers, data storage devices and other items, according to the search warrant documents, including affidavits, signed by the lead agent in the case, Stanley Ornellas.

In a January 2003 affidavit, Ornellas said he had spoken to an agent who had participated in the earlier search and was told that nothing was taken from the audio lab at Pellicano's offices.

"Moreover," Ornellas wrote, "a number of computers located within the audio lab were not searched or seized, as the searching agents in their discretion determined that the items to be seized pursuant to the initial warrant … were unlikely to be found in that portion of the premises."

The FBI and U.S. attorney's office declined to comment Tuesday about the handling of the searches.

Former federal prosecutor Orin Kerr said it was not clear if the searches should have been handled differently. "The bottom line is it's hard to tell whether this was a missed opportunity or poor judgment," said the cybercrimes specialist and George Washington University law professor.

"The problem with computers is that you don't know what is in them until you look at them. So when [authorities] enter a business with dozens of computers, they need to decide: do they take every one or be more selective … it's a classic problem with digital evidence."

The threat that triggered the Pellicano probe was made to look like a mafia warning. Busch, then a Times reporter who has since left the paper, found a note that said "Stop" and a dead fish with a rose in its mouth on the windshield of her car.

A few days later, she reported that someone had hacked into her computer and stolen e-mails from two online accounts, according to the newly released documents.

Over the next two months, she also found her computer hard drive had been infected with a virus that intercepted passwords and document files and sent information through e-mail to an unknown location. She deleted the virus, and her hard drive crashed.

After detecting problems with her telephone answering machine, she contacted a technician at Pacific Bell in November 2002.

The technician told Busch that he had "never seen a problem like hers." Busch contacted Pacific Bell a second time and was told by an employee that a "half tap" — or wiretap — had been placed on her second home phone line.

The court papers also included additional details about the involvement of Alexander Proctor, an ex-convict who was arrested for allegedly placing the note and dead fish on Busch's windshield.

According to the search warrant affidavits, Proctor told a government informant in August that he owed Pellicano $14,000 and claimed that actor Steven Seagal had hired Pellicano to threaten a reporter who was preparing an article on the actor.

Authorities have since said they found no convincing evidence that the actor was involved.

Proctor said Pellicano had agreed to pay him $10,000 "for the job involving the reporter," but was so pleased with Proctor's work that Pellicano wiped out the debt and told him they were even, the affidavit said.

Proctor told the informant a week later that he was waiting to hear from the private eye about "other jobs," but that Pellicano was waiting for up-front payments from those clients. For one of the jobs, Pellicano allegedly said he would pay Proctor $100,000 to get a wanted Israeli murder suspect out of the U.S.

Judge Declines To Release Galante, For Now (DANNT)

By Karen Ali, THE NEWS-TIMES

Danbury News-Times, June 28, 2006

NEW HAVEN — A federal judge is open to the idea of releasing Danbury trash kingpin James Galante from federal detention and putting him under some type of house arrest while his racketeering case is pending.

At a lengthy hearing on Tuesday, U.S. District Court Judge Ellen Bree Burns said she wants more information from Galante's defense lawyer, Hugh Keefe, on how such an arrangement would work before letting Galante out of jail.

While she is "amenable" to such an arrangement, she won't allow Galante to go back to work at the helm of Automated Waste Disposal in Danbury, Burns told Keefe.

"Don't suggest to me he go to work because that would put him in contact with witnesses," Burns said. She said "there is a danger with him tampering with witnesses."

Several of the co-defendants are Galante's employees.

Earlier in the hearing, Keefe asked Burns to let Galante go back to work if she released him from custody.

Keefe asked the judge to place Galante under "house arrest," to wear an ankle bracelet and to have a home monitoring system.

Burns wants more specifics, however, and in writing. So, Burns continued the case for 72 hours, which is also the amount of time it takes for electronic monitoring to be set up, she said.

Burns said she understood the issue Keefe raised at the hearing, which is that Keefe is having difficulty communicating with his client because his client, for most of the 18 days since his indictment, has been jailed in a federal prison in Rhode Island. Keefe told Burns it would be much easier for him to communicate with his client if he was living in Danbury.

Judge Declines To Release Indicted Trash Magnate, For Now (AP)

Associated Press

AP, June 28, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- A federal judge on Tuesday declined to release a Danbury businessman imprisoned in an investigation of the mob's influence on the trash industry, after federal prosecutors alleged a pattern of witness tampering.

U.S. District Judge Ellen Bree Burns, however, gave the lawyer for businessman James Galante 72 hours to come up with conditions for his proposed release that would guard against witness tampering.

Hugh Keefe, Galante's attorney, questioned why Galante is being detained while other suspects in the investigation have been released on bond. He also said it has been difficult to communicate with Galante in the Rhode Island federal detention center where he is being held.

Burns said she understood Keefe's concerns.

"At the same time, however, I am persuaded there is a danger that there may be some tampering with witnesses," Burns said. "I can't permit that."

The judge's comments came after a lengthy hearing Tuesday in which prosecutors played tapes of intercepted phone calls and cited other evidence of what they said were attempts to influence witnesses.

Galante, whose businesses handle about 80 percent of southwestern Connecticut's garbage, was arrested earlier this month in a Mafia case and ordered held without bail. He has been charged with racketeering, extortion and witness tampering.

Federal prosecutors say Galante carved out exclusive routes for his companies and paid Genovese crime family boss Matthew "Matty the Horse" Ianniello $120,000 a year for mob muscle to enforce his territories. That meant higher prices for businesses and homeowners, authorities said.

Most of the other defendants in the investigation were arraigned Monday. Former Waterbury Mayor Joseph Santopietro pleaded not guilty Monday to charges he participated in the scheme.

Keefe argued that Galante is being treated unfairly. He is the only person among 29 charged being held without bail, his family's bank accounts are frozen and his multimillion-dollar trash conglomerate is being run by federal marshals.

Keefe questioned why Galante is being held when Ianniello has been released on bond.

"I think what they want to do is deprive him of effective assistance of counsel," Keefe said. "All I want for you, here, is to even the playing field."

Prosecutors said they were concerned Galante would try to influence witnesses, but Keefe said that was speculative.

Prosecutors cited telephone conversations recorded by the FBI in which Galante at times talks menacingly about his competitors.

"What I have to do, tell him, is hurt you," Galante was recorded instructing a subordinate during a 2005 dispute with a rival company.

Most of the threats played in court, however, were delivered by subordinates who were released on bail.

Gotti Says He'll Leave NY If Cleared (SFC/AP)

San Francisco Chronicle, June 28, 2006

(06-27) 06:44 PDT New York (AP) --

Facing his third trial on racketeering charges, the son of the late mob boss John Gotti says he will leave New York this time if he's exonerated.

"I can't stay in New York," John "Junior" Gotti, whose father died in prison, told the Daily News. "I'm alone in this world. I'm a man without an island."

Gotti, 42, is scheduled to go on trial again in August after two previous juries deadlocked on charges alleging he arranged the beating of Guardian Angels founder and radio host Curtis Sliwa.

Gotti's lawyers have argued that he gave up all mob activities after he pleaded guilty in another racketeering case in 1999.

"There are men dying in prison for that life," Gotti said. "It's like a religion. But it's their religion, not my religion."

He said his father — "the consummate tough guy" — didn't understand why he pleaded guilty in the 1999 case.

"I told him I got children. I got a son named John Gotti Jr. What can he expect to be in this life?" he told the Daily News. He said his father eventually understood his obligations to his family.

"To this day, my father is a god to me," Gotti said.

GOTTI IS TRYING TO BURY MURDER EVIDENCE (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornel

The New York Post, June 28, 2006

Faced with an onslaught of new charges, John "Junior" Gotti is fighting to keep damaging evidence of his alleged role in a double murder and a money-laundering scheme away from jurors at his upcoming racketeering trial.

In a strange twist of logic, Gotti's lawyers conceded that the government has "ample evidence" to show that the former mob leader was involved in "murders or violence" - and therefore don't need to touch on the slayings of Thomas and Rosemary Uva.

Prosecutors are seeking to show how Gotti put the wheels in motion for the 1992 double hit on the husband and wife robbery team, who raised the ire of the Gambino crime family by targeting Mafia social clubs.

Gotti is not charged with the Uva murders, but the feds are seeking to show the killings were among many crimes that he had a hand in as a powerful member of an ongoing criminal enterprise.

Ex-FBI Agent Testifies On Disputed Bulger Visit (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, June 28, 2006

A retired FBI agent testified yesterday that he had just finished having dinner with informants James ``Whitey" Bulger and Stephen ``The Rifleman" Flemmi at a South Boston home in 1983 when Bulger's brother, then-Massachusetts Senate President William Bulger , showed up unexpectedly.

``He had some photographs from a recent trip to Ireland," said James Ring , recounting how William Bulger stayed for about 10 minutes at Flemmi's parents' home, showing off photos.

Ring's testimony was a repeat of his statements during federal court hearings in 1998 about William Bulger's appearance at a meeting of his brother with FBI agents. William Bulger, testifying three years ago before a congressional committee investigating his brother's relationship with the FBI, said he had no memory of any such dinner.

Then-FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr., who was later convicted of racketeering for his handling of James Bulger and Flemmi, had arranged the dinner and was present, Ring said yesterday. Ring said he was surprised by William Bulger's arrival and said Connolly told him later that the politician lived next door to Flemmi's elderly parents and that the Bulgers ``somewhat looked after" Flemmi's folks.

Ring, who supervised the organized crime squad in the FBI's Boston office from January 1983 through 1990, testified for the government, which is facing a $50 million wrongful death suit over its handling of Bulger and Flemmi. The suit has been brought by the family of John McIntyre, which blames the government for the Quincy fisherman's murder. Flemmi has testified he and Bulger killed McIntyre, 32, on Nov. 30, 1984, because Connolly had warned them that McIntyre was cooperating against them in their unsuccessful effort to ship guns to the Irish Republican Army.

Flemmi, who is serving a life sentence for 10 murders, also has testified that he and Bulger gave money or gifts to FBI agents, including Ring. He said that they gave Ring an expensive meerschaum pipe and alleged that Ring telephoned him at his mother's house in 1980 to warn him that an associate's telephone was tapped.

Ring, who joined the FBI's Boston office in 1983, testified yesterday that he never warned Flemmi of the wiretap and had never called Flemmi's mother's house. He also said he had never received any gifts from Bulger and Flemmi. Ring acknowledged that he has two meerschaum pipes -- one given to him by his ex-wife's grandfather in 1960, and another, cheaper version he bought for $10.

As for the Bulger dinner, US District Judge Reginald C. Lindsay asked Ring whether he thought it inappropriate to share dinner with informants.

``I didn't think it was inappropriate at the time," said Ring, who said there was ``a certain amount of bonding with informants" and ``many good reasons" to sit and share a meal with them.

Ring is expected to retake the stand today.

Hunt For Bulger Lands In Chicago (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, June 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037222

The hunt for fugitive gangster James ``Whitey" Bulger has led to Chicago, where investigators from Boston delivered subpoenas to two labor union officials last week and seized a Palm Pilot from one of them, lawyers involved in the investigation said.

The PDA was taken Thursday during a search of the union office of Charles Dunn, a business representative for Chicago's Local 134 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, said Chicago attorney Patrick Deady, a partner in the law firm Hogan Marren, which represents the union.

The Bulger Task Force is seeking to question Dunn and Michael Caddigan, the office manager of Local 134, as part of its investigation, Deady said.

``We're unaware of any contact between these two guys and Whitey Bulger," said Deady, adding that authorities told the union the FBI was following up on a lead in its hunt for Bulger. He was unaware what that lead was.

Robert Krekorian, chief of staff for US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan, said last night that he could ``not confirm or deny any specific investigative activity."

The search for Bulger, 76, has led investigators to Chicago in the past. Bulger's former associate, Kevin J. Weeks, has told investigators that he delivered phony identification to Bulger in Chicago in August 1996.

A statement released by Hogan Marren last night said the union ``is not a target of any federal investigation" and had cooperated with federal agents who came to the Union Hall to discuss ``an ongoing investigation of a case in Boston totally unrelated to IBEW, Local 134."

Neither Caddigan nor Dunn could be reached for comment last night.

Bulger, who fled Boston just before his January 1995 federal racketeering indictment, is one of the FBI's 10 Most Wanted. After he fled, he was outed as a longtime FBI informant and charged in a new indictment with 19 murders.

His former handler, retired FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr., was convicted in 2002 of racketeering for protecting Bulger and warning him to flee in advance of his indictment. Connolly is serving 10 years in prison.

Jury In Aryan Brotherhood Trial In U.S. Must Decide Whether To Believe Killers (FINDLAW/AP)

By Gillian Flaccus, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 28, 2006

(AP) - SANTA ANA, California-Convicted murderers, gang members and jailhouse informants have paraded past jurors for nearly four months in the U.S. federal government's racketeering case against the notorious Aryan Brotherhood prison gang.

Now, with the trial about to enter its final weeks, the jury will soon have to decide who to believe: the government, whose case rests on the testimony of admitted killers, or attorneys for the white supremacists accused of plotting and ordering many of those murders from behind bars.

Even the defense team, which has chided the U.S. Attorney's Office for its reliance on jailhouse snitches, plans to present testimony this week from a rival gang member and other inmates in a trial peppered with tales of violence and racial strife.

Attorneys on both sides are "using and choosing from the best of the worst," said Melissa Carr, an Anti-Defamation League special projects investigator monitoring the trial.

"There were a couple instances where I caught jurors rolling their eyes and looking around for confirmation, like 'Did I just hear that? Did he say what I thought he said?'"

The trial is set to resume Tuesday after a break of nearly three weeks. Closing arguments are expected early next month.

The four defendants are alleged Aryan Brotherhood leaders implicated in many of the 32 murders and attempted murders detailed in the federal indictment against the white supremacist gang.

Of the 40 men initially charged, as many as 16 could face the death penalty in a series of trials that together make up one of the biggest federal death penalty cases in U.S. history.

On trial in Santa Ana are Barry "The Baron" Mills, Tyler "The Hulk" Bingham, Edgar "The Snail" Hevle and Christopher Overton Gibson. Among other things, Mills and Bingham are accused of ordering a 1997 race war at a prison in Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, that led to the deaths of two black inmates.

From the beginning, the testimony has been disturbing.

Jurors have heard graphic descriptions of dozens of murders and attempted murders, including one in which the attacker licked the dead man's blood from his hands while laughing hysterically.

Nearly all of the witnesses have been former members of the Aryan Brotherhood. In their testimony, they described schemes to transmit messages in invisible ink made from urine and the use of "runners" - usually inmates' female friends - who hid knives and drugs in their rectums or genitals when they visited.

The government's first witness, Clifford Smith, took the stand wearing an eye patch and casually admitted killing 21 people, including a man whom he said he stabbed 37 times for calling him a "punk" in front of his daughter.

Smith also admitted - under vigorous cross-examination by the defense - that he had perjured himself while testifying for the government in a death penalty case involving the Hells Angels.

"I would stick with the script that we had wrote and try to sell whatever we was trying to sell," Smith said. "You caught me - what can I do?"

Trial-watchers said the government had little choice about using the witnesses but wonder if the jury will buy their testimony. The U.S. Attorney's Office declined to comment.

Defense lawyers have portrayed their clients as aging inmates who were forced to join a gang to survive. The men arrive in court each day wearing tortoise-shell eyeglasses and shirts with button-down collars. All have graying handlebar mustaches.

Charges Call Doctor A Fraud With Patients, Immigrants (FREEP)

By Naomi R. Patton, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, June 28, 2006

A Dearborn-based physician was indicted Friday in federal court on 39 counts of fraud in health care and immigration.

The indictment accuses Dr. Ali S. Makki, 46, of boosting his reimbursement payments by billing Medicare for:

Seeing patients when he was not in his Greenfield Road office and for office visits that never occurred.

Reporting services, tests and procedures that were not performed.

Ordering tests and procedures that were medically unnecessary.

Selling prescriptions for painkillers to people he did not regularly see as patients.

Harold Gurewitz, Makki's attorney, waived a reading of the indictment, preventing testimony from a government witness.

U.S. Magistrate Mona Majzoub entered a plea of not guilty.

According to the indictment, Makki ordered dozens of unnecessary diagnostic tests for new Medicare patients, including blood tests, x-rays and echocardiograms.

He falsely certified giving medical examinations and vaccinations, such as tuberculosis skin tests, the indictment says.

Between May 2003 and July 2004, the indictment says, Makki charged more than 500 patients $150 each in cash -- a total of more than $76,000 -- to complete medical forms for green card applications.

The indictment says Makki also charged immigrants $300-$400 for a separate INS form, saying a "mental or medical condition" prevented the applicants from taking and passing both English and civics tests required for U.S. citizenship.

If convicted, Makki would be forced to forfeit at least $75,980 seized from his home in July 2004. He could lose his medical license. He would also face a maximum 10-year prison sentence and a $250,000 fine.

Makki is in the Wayne County Jail pending a detention-bond hearing scheduled for Monday afternoon. He was arrested Friday afternoon at Detroit Metro Airport, returning from an extended trip to Lebanon.

Assistant U.S. Attorney James Mitzelfeld requested that Makki be detained as a potential flight risk.

Gurewitz said he didn't see the basis for detaining Makki.

"He obviously has substantial ties to the community," Gurewitz said.

Majzoub said she agreed, but added a detention hearing was necessary.

Dearborn Physician Held On Fraud Charges (DEN)

Detroit News, June 28, 2006

U.S. attorney's 40-page indictment alleges doctor billed Medicare for tests he never gave to patients.

DETROIT -- Federal officials arrested a Dearborn physician on health care fraud charges Friday.

An indictment alleges the doctor billed for office visits while away on a Caribbean cruise and other vacations and certified 512 immigrant patients as tuberculosis-free when he had not given them the skin tests for which he billed Medicare.

Dr. Ali Makki, 46, is accused of defrauding the federal government of more than $500,000. If convicted, he faces loss of his medical license and up to 10 years in prison on each fraud count.

Makki also provided two immigrants who tested positive for syphilis with "negative" test results, because he signed the paperwork before the test results were available, the U.S. attorney's office alleges in a 40-count indictment unsealed Friday.

Agents arrested Makki at Detroit Metropolitan Airport when he returned on a flight from Lebanon by way of Paris.

Makki pleaded not guilty at his arraignment in U.S. District Court late Friday afternoon and was ordered held until Monday for a detention hearing.

The indictment also alleges Makki billed Medicare for complicated medical procedures he did not perform. He also was said to have ordered and billed for thousands of unnecessary medical tests, and dispensed controlled drugs without a legitimate medical purpose.

One patient paid $55 to $60 cash for each of his 246 visits to Makki during a 19-month period to get the painkiller Vicodin, the indictment alleges.

"Railroad Killer" Executed In Texas Death (AP)

By Michael Graczyk, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, June 28, 2006

HUNTSVILLE, Texas -- The last ride for infamous train-hopping serial killer Angel Maturino Resendiz was in a Texas prison van, from death row to the death house.

Resendiz, 46, received lethal injection Tuesday evening for the fatal stabbing and beating of a Houston-area physician 7 1/2 years ago. He had roamed the country by jumping aboard freight trains and was linked to at least 15 indiscriminate murders near railroad tracks around the nation, earning him the nickname the "Railroad Killer" and a spot on the FBI's Most Wanted list.

The Mexican drifter, speaking from the death chamber gurney, asked for forgiveness from God and from relatives of some of his victims watching through a glass a few feet away. He then was executed for the slaying of Claudia Benton, 39, at her West University Place home during a deadly spree in 1998 and 1999.

"You did not deserve this," he said, looking at them, his feet nervously tapping under a white sheet. "I deserve what I am getting."

Seven minutes later, he was pronounced dead.

Benton's husband, George, was among those watching him die.

"It was very hollow," Benton said of Resendiz's final comments. "He never experienced any sense of remorse or sense of guilt in the past. He was very manipulative. He was a very smart man, he knew how to manipulate society. He knew how to manipulate our system, so I found it very shallow."

The punishment, the 13th this year in the nation's busiest death penalty state, was delayed for two hours while multiple appeals were considered by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Benton was stabbed with a kitchen knife, beaten 19 times with a 2-foot-tall bronze statue and raped in her home eight days before Christmas in 1998 in the Houston enclave, just down the street from a railroad track.

Her death was among eight in Texas linked to Resendiz. Two more were tied to him in both Illinois and Florida, and one each in Kentucky, California and Georgia.

At midday Tuesday, Resendiz, handcuffed and shackled, was put aboard a van at death row at a prison near Livingston and transferred to the death chamber at the Texas Department of Criminal Justice Huntsville Unit, about 45 miles to the west.

"He was very polite and listened silently as the warden talked," prison spokesman Michelle Lyons said of Resendiz's arrival in Huntsville. "He wanted to make phone calls to some of his family."

Appeals that delayed the punishment focused on his competency, the constitutionality of the lethal injection procedure and a lower court's ruling that barred additional appeals because an earlier court-appointed lawyer missed legal deadlines for appeals. Another appeal claimed the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, a Washington-based international group that investigates human rights violations, should have had time to review Resendiz's case. The Mexican government filed an appeal of a lower court ruling that said Mexico could not be party to the Resendiz case.

Resendiz's lead appeals lawyer, Jack Zimmermann, of Houston, argued Resendiz believed he was half-man and half-angel and told psychiatrists he couldn't be executed because he didn't believe he could die. Federal courts have ruled inmates are ineligible for execution if they don't understand they will be put to death, when they are being put to death and why they are being put to death.

"I thought the evidence was overwhelming in our favor," Zimmermann said.

Late Tuesday afternoon, several people from the Mexican consulate in Houston were in Huntsville but did not see Resendiz. Capital punishment is not allowed in Mexico.

"The execution was carried out despite the existence of medical evidence of severe mental problems that, in principle, should have excluded the application of this penalty," Mexico's Foreign Relations Department said in a statement.

George Benton said Mexican citizens "who have come to pursue a better life through hard work and sacrifice should be ashamed and embarrassed of the Mexican government's financial support for the death penalty appeals of this killer."

"And I would be every bit as ashamed in my government if they were supporting a U.S. citizen who had gone into Mexico and killed random Mexican citizens without cause," Benton added.

The Border Patrol picked up Resendiz for illegal entry in June 1999 near El Paso and released him back into Mexico, saying they were unaware Resendiz - who used some 30 aliases - was on the FBI's Most Wanted list. He committed four slayings after his release.

DOJ_NMG_0037225

Resendiz's killings began with a murder in San Antonio in 1986. Benton was among 13 people killed over a 16-month period that ended in June 1999 with a double slaying in Illinois.

A month later, Resendiz walked across the international bridge at El Paso and surrendered to a Texas Ranger as part of a deal arranged by his sister in New Mexico.

The sister, Manuela Karkiewicz, was among six people Resendiz selected to watch him die.

Resendiz initially was tied to more than one slaying through DNA matches from the Benton killing and the slayings 4 1/2 months later of Weimar church pastor Norman "Skip" Sirnic, and his wife, Karen.

The couple was fatally beaten May 2, 1999, with a sledgehammer as they slept in their house adjacent to their church and across the street from a railroad track that runs through the heart of their small town about 100 miles west of Houston. Like Benton, Karen Sirnic was raped.

In an interview with The Associated Press shortly after arriving on death row in 2000, Resendiz said he remembered each of his attacks and compared them to watching something through a tunnel.

"Everything you see is in a distance," he said. "Everything is slow and silent."

He said some murders were in response to the deaths of the Branch Davidians in Waco, others on Serbian atrocities. Others he blamed on his anti-abortion beliefs or because he believed the victims may have been homosexual.

Texas Executes The 'Railway Killer' (NYT)

By Steve Barnes

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

Ángel Maturino Resendiz, a Mexican known as the railway killer who was convicted of one murder and linked by the authorities to at least 12 others, was executed last night by injection at the Huntsville, Tex., prison. Repeated appeals to state and federal courts ended when the United States Supreme Court declined to intervene, and a protest by the Mexican government was unavailing.

A jury sentenced Mr. Resendiz, 46, to death for the rape and murder in 1998 of Dr. Claudia Benton, a medical researcher, at her house in Houston. Investigators said forensic evidence and, in some cases, Mr. Resendiz's statements implicated him in two years of killings in California, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Kentucky and Texas that ended in 1999, when his half-sister helped arrange his surrender.

Catching Mr. Resendiz was made more difficult, detectives said, by his 30 aliases and a nomadic style of life, in which he hopped freight trains. Many of his suspected victims were found near rail lines and buildings.

Defense lawyers insisted that Mr. Resendiz was a paranoid schizophrenic, unable before or after Dr. Benton's murder to know right from wrong. A succession of judges found that Mr. Resendiz met the Supreme Court standard of sanity. He was pronounced dead at 9:05 Eastern time. "Lord forgive me," Mr. Resendiz said on the gurney in the death chamber. Turning to his victims' relatives in the observation room, he said, "I deserve what I am getting."

One appeal had argued that the drugs used in his execution could produce a silent but agonizing death in defiance of the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment.

Tennessee Holds 1st Execution In 45 Years (AP)

By Rose French, Associated Press

AP, June 28, 2006

NASHVILLE, Tenn. -- The state carried out only its second execution in 45 years early Wednesday after a federal appeals court panel lifted a stay of execution granted by one of its own judges.

Sedley Alley's execution had been scheduled to take place within hours of another, but a federal judge issued a stay late Tuesday afternoon for the other condemned man.

Alley, 50, was pronounced dead at 3:12 a.m. EDT Wednesday. He had confessed to killing 19-year-old Marine Suzanne Collins in 1985 while she jogged near a Navy base north of Memphis.

Alley claimed at trial that he was not responsible for the murder because he had multiple personalities. But in 2004, he recanted his confession, argued he was innocent and said DNA testing could prove it.

Judge Gilbert S. Merritt on the 6th Circuit Court of Appeals had issued a stay for Alley after a last-minute appeal was delivered to his home in Nashville.

But his colleagues on the appeals court -- Chief Judge Danny J. Boggs and Judge James L. Ryan -- overruled the order. A third judge on the panel was unavailable to participate in the decision.

The judges suggested it was improper for a single judge to "take under consideration a matter for which the district courts and the court of appeals are competent to consider."

DOJ_NMG_0037226

Gov. Phil Bredesen and the U.S. Supreme Court had already rejected all requests for a stay Tuesday.

Alley's stay came only hours after federal Judge Todd Campbell halted the scheduled execution of another inmate, Paul Dennis Reid.

Campbell's stay was to give time to determine whether Reid was mentally competent to drop his appeals of seven death sentences tied to a string of 1997 murders in the Clarksville area.

Tennessee Attorney General Paul Summers appealed both stays.

Alley was scheduled to die May 17, but got a reprieve to seek court permission for the DNA testing. His defense team, led by Barry Scheck of the nonprofit legal clinic Innocence Project, failed to persuade the state courts to release crime-scene evidence for testing.

Reid, 48, a former Texas drifter with music ambitions, was convicted of murdering seven people at three Tennessee restaurants in 1997 after he was fired from his job as a dishwasher. He came within hours of execution in 2003 before he was talked into resuming his appeals and got a stay.

Reid and Alley have been on death watch since the weekend at Riverbend Maximum Security Institution in Nashville.

The last Tennessee inmate executed was a convicted child rapist and murderer put to death in 2000. Before that, the last execution was by electric chair in 1960.

Tennessee has 103 inmates on death row.

Only four states -- Arkansas, Illinois, South Carolina and Texas -- have conducted double executions since the death penalty was reinstated in 1976, according to the Death Penalty Information Center in Washington.

Associated Press writers Kristin M. Hall and Lucas L. Johnson II in Nashville contributed to this report.

US Justice Department Asked To Submit Brief In Oklahoma Case (AP)

AP, June 28, 2006

OKLAHOMA CITY (AP) _ The US Supreme Court is asking the Justice Department to file a brief in an appeal filed by an Oklahoma death row inmate.

Attorneys for Patrick Murphy are asking for a new trial on the grounds that Murphy and the victim are Indians, the crime took place on tribal land and the case should've been prosecuted in federal court instead of state court.

Murphy was convicted and sentenced to die for killing George Jacobs in 1999 in McIntosh County.

A state appeals court has rejected Murphy's appeal and now the Supreme Court is asking the US solicitor general for an opinion on whether a new trial is deserved.

Federal Judge Orders Missouri To Stop All Executions (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

A federal judge in Missouri has ordered a halt to all executions carried out by that state until it changes its lethal-injection procedures.

The current system, U.S. District Judge Fernando J. Gaitan Jr. said in a Monday ruling, creates an unnecessary risk that an inmate could be subjected to "unconstitutional pain and suffering when the lethal-injection drugs are administered." He gave corrections officials until July 15 to come up with new procedures.

In a related development, a federal judge in Little Rock, Ark., on Monday stayed an execution on grounds that if the condemned inmate "remains or becomes conscious during the execution, he will suffer intense pain that will never be rectified." Judge Susan Webber Wright postponed the execution until there could be a full hearing on the issue, which could be months away.

The U.S. Supreme Court in May ruled that inmates could challenge lethal-injection procedures. The two rulings this week, said Fordham University law professor Deborah W. Denno, show that "courts are taking this seriously, and there will be more challenges."

In recent years, lethal injection has become the dominant mode of execution in the U.S. The 38 states that have capital punishment laws, including California, use a three-stage procedure that masks pain during an execution, rather than preventing it.

The first drug administered, the sedative sodium thiopental, is meant to deaden pain; the second, pancuronium bromide, is a paralytic that immobilizes the prisoner; the third agent, potassium chloride, stops the heart.

Sedative dosages at times have been inadequate to anesthetize inmates, according to testimony in cases asserting that lethal-injection procedures violate the 8th Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment.

DOJ_NMG_0037227

U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel in San Jose has scheduled a two-day hearing in September to review California's procedure. Earlier this year, Fogel raised questions about the lethal-injection protocol, which prompted the state in February to call off the execution of Michael A. Morales.

In Missouri, the challenge was raised by Michael Taylor, who was sentenced to death for the 1989 murder of a 15-year-old girl. Missouri has executed 66 people by lethal injection, the fourth highest total in the nation.

Gaitan said he was particularly troubled that the doctor — identified only as John Doe 1 — who mixes the three-drug cocktail used in Missouri executions is dyslexic and admitted during a hearing that he has difficulty reading numbers.

"The court … is gravely concerned that a physician who is solely responsible for directly mixing the drugs which will be responsible for humanely ending the life of condemned inmates has a condition which causes him confusion with regard to numbers," Gaitan wrote in his 15-page ruling.

In addition, Gaitan said, Missouri does not have a formal written protocol for how lethal injections are to be administered. John Doe 1, in a recent deposition, said that he had administered only 2.5 grams of the sodium thiopental, rather than the normal 5 grams, in several executions.

Dr. Mark Heath, an assistant professor of clinical anesthesiology at Columbia University in New York who has testified in numerous lethal-injection challenges, testified that he believed Missouri was the only state without a written protocol.

Gaitan said he wanted the Missouri Department of Corrections to require that a board-certified anesthesiologist mix the drugs; institute better monitoring so that adequate anesthetic is given to the inmate; and formulate a contingency plan in the event a problem develops during the execution.

John Fougere, a spokesman for Missouri Atty. Gen. Jay Nixon, said his office would work with corrections officials to comply with Gaitan's order.

"We want to make sure execution in Missouri is predictable, humane and efficient," Fougere said.

Research Center Created To Study Evolving Threats Of Identity Fraud (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A group of government agencies, corporations and universities are launching a research center dedicated to studying the evolving threat of identity fraud.

The Secret Service and Federal Bureau of Investigation today will join with International Business Machines Corp. and information-services firm LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Group PLC, to announce the Center for Identity Management and Information Protection, or CIMIP, at Utica College in New York. The center, initially funded with a combination of grants and corporate donations totaling about $500,000, aims to integrate various public and private efforts to study the national-security implications and other threats posed by identity fraud.

"We looked around and said, 'Who's taking a leadership role in pulling together the various stakeholders?' " said Norm Willox, chief executive of special services at LexisNexis, the company's unit that provides risk-management tools to government agencies. "There was a void."

CIMIP will be led by Gary Gordon, a professor of economic crime management at Utica College, who has long ties to federal agencies like the Secret Service, which investigates financial crimes. Brian Nagel, deputy director of the Secret Service, said the agency's criminal division will share its case files with CIMIP so it can identify criminal patterns, something that is hard for agents immersed in individual cases to do.

Identity fraud is a broad term referring to the illegal use of another's personal data, from common "transactional" crimes involving credit and debit cards to more pernicious activities such as opening new accounts and taking over existing ones. Recent data security breaches at the Department of Veterans Affairs and other agencies have heightened concerns, and Congress is weighing proposals to combat identity crimes. Studies have shown that identity fraud costs businesses $50 billion annually and that roughly 4% of the adult population is affected each year.

Aside from causing personal harm to victims and added costs to businesses, identity fraud can also make it harder for the government to track or stop potential terrorists. "They can hide in plain sight," said Mr. Willox of LexisNexis. "It's a big problem for us."

Identity theft has "potentially disastrous effects on U.S. national security," said James H. Burrus, acting assistant director of the FBI's criminal investigative division in a statement. "The FBI looks forward to the opportunity to apply CIMIP research to more effective law enforcement and protection against threats to national security."

Judge Won't Release Hoffa Search Affidavit (FINDLAW/AP)

(AP) - DETROIT-A U.S. district judge refused to order the release of an affidavit the FBI used to get a search warrant to dig for Jimmy Hoffa's remains at a southeastern Michigan horse farm.

"Granting public access to sensitive information in a sealed affidavit would not play a significant, positive role in the investigation," Judge Marianne Battani wrote Monday in response to a request by the Detroit Free Press to release the document.

Battani said the affidavit included "the details of a threat made to a witness" and other information that should not become public.

The FBI spent two weeks last month searching the Hidden Dreams Farm, 30 miles northwest of Detroit in Oakland County's Milford Township. Officials said they found no evidence of Hoffa's remains.

The former Teamsters union president was last seen July 30, 1975, the day he was supposed to meet a New Jersey Teamsters boss and a Detroit Mafia captain at a restaurant about 20 miles from the farm. Both of those men are now dead.

The newspaper had argued that the estimated $250,000 cost of the search gave the public an interest in the contents of the affidavit.

"Judge Battani didn't engage in a critical analysis of the government's claims," said Free Press lawyer Herschel Fink. He said editors would decide whether to appeal.

Jury Finds Serial Killer Guilty Of 4 Murders (LAT)

By Maeve Reston

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

Serial killer Wayne Adam Ford was found guilty of four counts of first-degree murder today, making the former long-haul trucker eligible for the death penalty for the grisly slayings of four women across California.

A San Bernardino County jury delivered the verdict in the afternoon after deliberating for just over a week.

Ford, 44, walked into a Humboldt County sheriff's station in November 1998 with a woman's severed breast in a plastic bag in his pocket, and confessed to the sayings.

The Arcata trucker claimed the deaths were accidental, and had occurred during rough sex play. However, San Bernardino County Deputy Dist. Atty. J. David Mazurek told jurors that Ford preyed on young women to "satisfy his sexually sadistic appetite", and "got off" on their suffering when he tortured them.

Between 1997 and 1998, Ford allegedly picked up the women — prostitutes or hitchhikers — and bound, strangled, raped and, at times, beat them before dumping their bodies in waterways, Mazurek said.

The victims were found in Humboldt, Kern, San Joaquin and San Bernardino counties. Some of the bodies were dismembered.

Ford's attorney, Deputy Public Defender Joseph D. Canty, tried to convince the jury to find Ford guilty of a lesser charge — second-degree murder or manslaughter — that would have spared him from California's death row.

Canty said Ford realized that "something was wrong with him," and showed he was remorseful when he turned himself in. Canty argued that Ford, a retired U.S. Marine, was mired in depression, angry at his former wife — who he claimed was preventing him from seeing his young son — and struggling with other psychological problems, including borderline personality disorder.

The body of Ford's first victim was so mutilated that she has not been identified, and is known as Humboldt County Jane Doe. Ford is also charged in the deaths of prostitutes Patricia Ann Tamez, 29, of Hesperia; Tina Renee Gibbs, 26, of Las Vegas; and Lanett Deyon White, 25, of Fontana.

The cases were consolidated, and the San Bernardino County district attorney's office is prosecuting Ford for all the slayings. Ford's sentencing hearing is pending.

Reasonable Doubt At Duke (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

At the start, I presumed they were guilty. The rape charges against three members of the Duke lacrosse team sounded like a plausible case of Jocks Gone Wild. It wasn't hard to imagine that a bunch of rowdy, hard-drinking players could have crossed the line from watching a paid dancer to sexually assaulting her.

After all, these were students who had plunked down $800 for a pair of strippers and were angry that their cash had bought only a few minutes of bare flesh. The show was called off when one player asked about sex toys and "said he would use the broomstick on us," according to the second dancer.

DOJ_NMG_0037229

As the two women drove off, a neighbor reported hearing one of the partygoers yell a racial insult at the African American dancers: "Hey . . . thank your grandpa for my nice cotton shirt." Later that night, another teammate wrote a disgusting e-mail about plans to kill and skin "some strippers." One of the accused, Collin Finnerty, is to stand trial here next month in an incident in which he and two high school lacrosse buddies allegedly taunted a man, saying he was gay, and then beat him.

These don't sound like young men you'd want your daughter to date.

But the more evidence that has emerged in the case, the more it appears that there is way more than reasonable doubt that the three accused committed rape.

The paucity of physical evidence; the accuser's prior unsubstantiated rape charge; her changing stories that night; sloppy and unreliable identification procedures -- any of these alone, and certainly all of them together, make it hard to understand why the prosecution is going forward and impossible to imagine that it could win a conviction.

True, much of the evidence that's emerged so far has been selectively released by defense lawyers. But after a review of court filings and other material, here's what makes me doubtful:

? There's almost no physical evidence. Two rounds of DNA testing failed to produce any evidence of semen from Duke players -- as might have been expected, given the accusation that the woman was orally, vaginally and anally penetrated, along with being choked, beaten and kicked. (DNA from one of the students, David Evans, may match material taken from the accuser's fake fingernail.) Indeed, although the prosecutor claimed the medical report found injuries consistent with sexual assault, the nurse-in-training who examined the woman found only swelling of the vaginal walls -- something that might be explained by the fact that the woman reported using a vibrator as she performed for a couple hours earlier.

? The second dancer told police that the rape charges were a "crock" and that she and the accuser had been apart for only five minutes at the party.

? The accuser made an earlier, seemingly unsubstantiated allegation of being the victim of a gang rape. She said she was attacked by three men in 1993, when she was 14, but didn't file a police report until three years later. The matter was dropped after she failed to provide a statement to the investigating officer.

? She gave six different accounts of what happened the night of the incident: She did not originally mention rape to the police when they found her in a car outside a grocery store; raised the rape allegation after being taken to a substance abuse facility; later said that "no one forced her to have sex"; and gave accounts of the alleged incident that differed in various ways, including the number of attackers and the type of assault.

? It's true, and totally understandable, that rape victims often provide inconsistent accounts. But even if a sexual assault did occur in this case, there's ample reason to question whether the right students were charged. The accuser said her attackers were named "Bret, Adam and Matt"; the indicted students are Reade, Collin and David.

Reade Seligmann's lawyer has presented evidence that during the post-midnight time frame in which the attack allegedly occurred, Seligmann called his girlfriend six times and another person twice (12:05 to 12:14); was picked up by a cab (12:19); used an ATM (12:24) and returned to his dorm (12:45). The lawyer tried to present this evidence to the prosecutor before the indictment but was rebuffed.

? In contravention of accepted practice, the photographs shown to the accuser included only members of the lacrosse team, no similar-looking "fillers." According to papers filed by David Evans's lawyer, the accuser failed to identify him in a photo lineup eight days after the party. In another test, three weeks after the incident, she selected his photo, telling investigators, "He looks like one of the guys who assaulted me, sort of." She said that she was "about 90 percent" certain but that the attacker had a mustache; Evans's lawyer says he's never had a mustache.

Perhaps there are facts yet to emerge to support Durham County District Attorney Mike Nifong's continuing certitude that a rape occurred -- though the confluence of Nifong's political interests and the prosecution is itself another reason for discomfort. He brought the first charges just before a primary in which the black vote played a key role.

In an odd way, I hope Nifong's proved right, because the alternative -- that he began with a dubious case and stuck with it as it became shakier -- is so troubling. As it stands now, the case isn't expected to go to trial until spring 2007. That seems like an awfully long time to wait to find out.

Coast Guard Cadet To Ask For Leniency (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, June 28, 2006

NEW LONDON, Conn. -- A Coast Guard Academy cadet was acquitted of rape charges but convicted on other sex-related charges in the institution's first-ever court-martial of a student.

Webster M. Smith was expected to ask the military jury for leniency at a sentencing hearing scheduled Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0037230

Jurors on Tuesday deliberated eight hours before finding Smith, 23, of Houston, guilty of indecent assault, extortion, sodomy, failure to obey an order and absent without leave.

Smith, the first student in the school's 130-year history to be court-martialed, was stoic as the verdict was read, but wept afterward with his parents and lawyers by his side.

"This is an extraordinarily emotional time for him right now," said his attorney, Merle Smith, who is not related to the cadet. "There's so much emotion right now, both relief and also disappointment."

Smith faces up to 13 1/2 years in prison, but his attorney said he would argue for little or no jail time.

Prosecutors, who declined to comment after the verdict, said Smith was a predator who took advantage of women when they were vulnerable.

The allegations were brought by four female cadets. The jury acquitted him of sexual misconduct charges involving three of the female cadets.

The rape case involved Smith's on-again, off-again girlfriend, who said she drank two bottles of wine at a party in Annapolis, Md., last summer and can't remember anything. She said she learned the next morning that they had had sex.

Smith testified Monday that the sex was consensual. He said the woman had been drinking but wasn't drunk when they had sex in his car outside a bar. Prosecutors say the sex happened much later that night, when she was passed out.

The indecent assault, extortion and sodomy charges stemmed from allegations by one of the other women.

That woman described a night in which she and Smith had a series of sexual encounters in her dorm room. The woman said she never protested because she was relying on Smith to keep a secret involving a crime that could have jeopardized her career.

Prosecutors said Smith held that secret over her, extorting her for sexual favors.

Smith said he never mentioned the secret and that the two had consensual oral sex.

Smith was not allowed to graduate with his class this spring and almost certainly will be kicked out of school and the Coast Guard.

CIVIL LAW:

State To Pay $8.3 Million To Settle Technology Fraud Claims (AP)

AP, June 28, 2006

INDIANAPOLIS - The state has agreed to pay nearly $8.3 million to settle allegations that an agency violated federal rules by not seeking competitive bids on Internet services and charging inflated prices.

The U.S. Department of Justice and the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Indiana announced the settlement in a news release Tuesday.

The settlement covers allegations that the Intelenet Commission, which has been disbanded, failed false claims to the Federal Communications Commission's E-rate program, which provided money for Internet technology in schools and libraries.

The federal government claimed the state charged inflated prices for services provided to Indiana schools and libraries, falsified invoices, disregarded the requirement that schools and libraries make co-payments for expenses and failed to seek competitive bids.

The state cooperated with the investigation, the Justice Department said.

"The E-Rate Program makes federally mandated funds available to the poorest schools in the nation for Internet access and wiring," Peter D. Keisler, Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Division, said in the release. "False claims to this very important federal program will not be tolerated."

The Intelenet Commission has since been replaced by a new Office of Technology created by Gov. Mitch Daniels.

U.S. Asks Judge To Dismiss Budget Lawsuit (AP)

By KEN THOMAS, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Justice Department on Tuesday asked a federal judge to dismiss a lawsuit filed by House Democrats trying to stop a $39 billion deficit-reducing bill because the House and Senate failed to approve identical versions.

Lawyers for the government said the 11 House members lacked standing because they are not renters of medical equipment covered by the section of the bill or are in "any way personally affected or injured" by other provisions in the measure.

House Democrats have accused GOP leaders of abusing the legislative process and contend they were denied their right to vote on legislation signed into law by President Bush.

Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., the ranking member of the House Judiciary Committee and lead plaintiff, called the government's response "legally tenuous."

"In terms of standing, there is no more fundamental right in Congress than the right to vote, yet the administration would not only take this right away, but prevent duly elected members from asserting that right after it is taken away," he said.

The Senate version of the bill said Medicare can pay to rent some types of medical equipment for 13 months, as congressional negotiators had sought. A clerk erroneously wrote down 36 months before the bill was sent back to the House for a final vote, and the language was approved by the House on Feb. 1.

When the bill was sent to Bush for his signature, the number was back to 13 months as approved by the Senate.

The White House and Republican leaders in Congress have said the matter is settled because the mistake was technical and top House and Senate leaders certified the bill before transmitting it to the White House.

Conyers and 10 Democrats sued in late April in U.S. District Court in Detroit, asking a judge to declare that the act is not law and provide a temporary restraining order to bar its implementation.

Similar lawsuits have been filed in other states by an Alabama attorney and a Florida-based student loan consulting firm.

Brian Kennedy, a Justice Department attorney, wrote in the motion to U.S. District Judge Nancy Edmunds that the discrepancy would not have made a difference to the lawmakers' votes.

"They were opposed to the bill in either event," he wrote.

AT&T To Settle Fraud Case For $2.9M (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, June 28, 2006

A unit of AT&T, the largest U.S. phone company, agreed to pay $2.9 million to resolve allegations that it defrauded the federal government.

The civil suit against AT&T Communications East, brought by a whistleblower and joined by the government, said the company defrauded the General Services Administration from 1998 to 2001 by passing on to government customers certain costs and fees in violation of its contract.

The U.S. Justice Department announced the settlement Tuesday in Washington.

The charges, known as Presubscribed Interexchange Carrier Charges, are a fee that long-distance companies pay to local phone companies to recover part of the cost for linking customers to the telephone network.

A spokesman for San Antonio-based AT&T didn't immediately return a call seeking comment.

Charities Tied To Doctors Get Drug Industry Gifts (NYT)

By Reed Abelson

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

As she presented research results indicating that a new medical device was "an important breakthrough," the doctor's enthusiasm was clear. Less evident were some of the financial links between the researchers and the device's maker.

Dr. Maria Rosa Costanzo, making her presentation at a March conference of cardiologists, said the study found that a $14,000 blood filtering device was better than intravenous diuretic drugs at removing excess fluid from patients with heart failure.

Although outside researchers raised questions about the study's conclusions, the doctor betrayed little doubt. "We believe these results challenge current medical practice and recommendations," said Dr. Costanzo, who predicted many patients might benefit.

Dr. Costanzo did disclose to the audience that she was a paid consultant with stock in the device's maker, a Minnesota company called CHF Solutions. But she omitted another potentially important detail: CHF Solutions was also one of the largest donors to the nonprofit research foundation that had overseen the study. The company contributed about $180,000 in 2004, according to the foundation's federal filings.

Nor did she note that the nonprofit entity, the Midwest Heart Foundation, was in turn an arm of the thriving for-profit medical group outside of Chicago where Dr. Costanzo and more than 50 of her fellow doctors treat heart patients — in many cases using products and drugs made by CHF Solutions and other big donors to their charity. Although the CHF Solutions device has generally been slow to catch on, physicians at Dr. Costanzo's medical group have treated many patients with the company's filtration system.

The Midwest Heart Foundation, and the way it has become quietly interwoven into its doctors' professional lives, is far from unique. Around the country, doctors in private practice have set up tax-exempt charities into which drug companies and medical device makers are, with little fanfare, pouring donations — money that adds up to millions of dollars a year. And some medical experts see that as a big problem.

The charities are typically set up to engage in medical research or education, and the doctors involved defend those efforts as legitimate charitable activities that benefit the public. But because they operate mainly under the radar, the tax-exempt organizations represent what some other doctors, as well as regulators and industry consultants, say is a growing conduit for industry money. The payments, they say, can bias the treatment decisions of physicians, may lead to suspect research findings and at times may even risk running afoul of anti-kickback laws.

Federal officials are starting to take notice of such tax-exempt charities, which critics say are becoming increasingly popular as other forms of industry support to physicians — like lucrative consulting agreements that involve little actual work — have come under scrutiny from regulators and others worried about the potential conflicts.

The potential for abuse by these charities is clear, critics say. "It obviously sets a fertile ground for conflict of interest and misuse of funds," said Dr. Robert M. Califf, vice chancellor for clinical research at Duke University Medical Center.

The charities at issue are not philanthropies like the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation that dispense grants for medical research but remain independent of any one group of doctors or medical practice. Instead, the charities drawing scrutiny are set up by doctors in private practice and are closely linked to those doctors' for-profit medical groups.

The Midwest Heart Foundation, which has received millions of dollars from medical industry donors, including the drug makers Amgen and AstraZeneca, and the Cordis and Scios units of Johnson & Johnson, says it stands behind its charitable work, which currently involves about 30 studies and dozens of doctor-education lectures each year.

Dr. Mark Goodwin, a managing partner for the Midwest Heart for-profit practice, said the foundation was created to help prevent potential conflicts by keeping the industry money separate from the doctors' private practice. Companies contribute to the foundation, he said, because they can rely on its research and the doctors involved can enroll large numbers of patients in studies. "We are able to deliver excellent research to our community in a timely fashion," Dr. Goodwin said, "and we are proud of it."

But some of its research has drawn criticism from federal regulators. Earlier this year, moreover, the foundation received a Justice Department subpoena as part of an investigation into the marketing activities of one of its big contributors, Scios.

Experts aware of the various doctor-run charities say that even if much of the donated money is spent on legitimate medical research or education, the funds can also go toward studies that while lending prestige to the doctors and luster to the companies, may do little to advance scientific understanding. The tax-exempt money also sometimes flows to the for-profit medical groups affiliated with the charities, sometimes covering business expenses or even paying parts of the salaries of doctors.

Too often, the critics contend, the industry donations amount to a form of "relationship funding" — to use one skeptical doctor's term — in which companies hope to sell more drugs and devices by currying favor with the doctors. That skeptic, Dr. John Cherf, is a knee surgeon at the Neurologic and Orthopedic Institute of Chicago who also consults for a market research firm specializing in health care topics. He says the donor arrangements are fraught with potential conflicts of interest and are likely to come under greater scrutiny as the costs of devices and drugs rise.

"There's undoubtedly corruption in the system," Dr. Cherf said. "We need healthy relationships between physicians and industry. Both parties have been too aggressive."

Number of Charities Is Unknown

No one knows precisely how many of these doctor-run charities exist. Although each one files with the federal government as a tax-exempt entity, they are hard to discern among other health-related charities. And because in many cases each has no more than a few hundred thousand dollars in annual revenue, they tend to escape the attention of the federal and state regulators who oversee charities.

"The reality of it is that these are small organizations that are off the radar screen," said Douglas M. Mancino, a lawyer at McDermott Will & Emery in Los Angeles who specializes in health care law and nonprofit groups.

As long as the activities being financed benefit the public rather than the doctors or companies involved, they are legitimate charities, according to lawyers who specialize in nonprofits.

But concerns can arise when a corporate donation appears to be helping pay the salary of an additional doctor at a for-profit medical practice — through a fellowship, for example — that brings in additional revenue to the practice. Another problem area, they say, would be when donations go toward expenditures that would normally be part of the practice's business cost.

Lawyers say that determining whether a charity's activities are legitimate tax-exempt activities would typically require a close look at the facts in each case.

"If they're really underwriting normal business expenses to the group, then I think you have a problem," Mr. Mancino said.

As a group, these relatively obscure charities are attracting sizable amounts of corporate money. And many of their activities focus on the companies that have made the donations or the doctors' medical groups.

DOJ_NMG_0037233

Consider the Arizona Orthopedic Education Foundation, which was created by a surgeon in Phoenix and which in 2003 received a $200,000 donation from a unit of the orthopedic device company Stryker. Most of the charity's efforts are devoted to public education, according to the founder, Dr. Anthony K. Hedley. But its activities also include teaching other doctors how to use Stryker products.

Stryker said this training was "critical" for surgeons.

Dr. Hedley says the fact that he mainly uses Stryker devices with his own patients may account for Stryker's contributions. "That was probably why I was able to leverage support," Dr. Hedley said.

Another charity is the Blue Ridge Bone and Joint Research Foundation, run by Dr. Joseph T. Moskal, an orthopedic surgeon in Roanoke, Va. It received a $75,000 contribution from the DePuy Orthopaedics unit of Johnson & Johnson in the year ended July 31, 2004, according to federal filings. The Blue Ridge foundation appears to have paid $30,000 of that money to the for-profit Roanoke Orthopaedic Center, where Dr. Moskal practices, to defray the costs of a fellowship program there.

Dr. Moskal did not return repeated phone calls seeking comment. DePuy, in a brief response to questions, said in part, "Fellowships are vital to advance the education and training of orthopaedic surgeons."

Corporate donors are also major contributors to the Vascular Specialists Education Foundation, which is led by a vascular surgeon in Norfolk, Va., Dr. Marc H. Glickman. The foundation spent $30,000 in 2003 to pay for the further medical education of doctors in his for-profit practice.

Although the public filings offer few details about the charity's activities, Dr. Glickman said such expenditures are part of the foundation's mandate, which includes offering fellowships to doctors being trained and paying for continuing medical education for those doctors. One of Vascular Specialists' two big donors, the device maker Guidant, now part of Boston Scientific, said it contributed $25,000 in 2003 and $40,000 the next year, through its own foundation. The company says the money was given with the understanding that it would go to finance the group's fellowship program.

The other big donor, the device maker Medtronic, says it gave Dr. Glickman's charity $80,000 last year to help pay for the group's fellowship program. "Dr. Glickman and his colleagues have trained hundreds of physicians and fellows on life-saving procedures associated with vascular disease — a notable accomplishment," Medtronic said in a written statement.

Donors have been so generous to Dr. Glickman's foundation that he says it is currently sitting on $100,000 he has not yet decided how to spend. "I'm very cautious with what I do," he said.

Whatever the issues of tax-exempt status among the various charities, federal regulators say the groups could find themselves in trouble in another way — in violation of federal anti-kickback laws — if donations appear to be little more than a way for companies to funnel money to doctors.

If the contributions amount to payments or gifts to doctors who then use or recommend a certain drug or device, companies could be breaking the law, said Vicki Robinson, a top lawyer in the Office of Inspector General at the federal Health and Human Services Department.

"From a legal perspective, it's really no different," Ms. Robinson said.

Patrick L. Meehan, the United States attorney in Philadelphia, whose office has a long history of prosecuting health care fraud, said the doctors' charities could warrant scrutiny. "What we would be concerned about are end runs around the system," Mr. Meehan said. "We want to be sure there is independent and fully informed medical judgment at the heart of the physician-patient relationship."

For their part, Midwest Heart officials defend the activities of their foundation. Contributions to the charity, which was created in 1988, have more than doubled in the last few years — to $1.7 million in 2004, the most recent period for which federal filings are available.

In a written statement, the foundation said it had "strict internal controls and systems in place to ensure the independence and integrity of all research and education activities."

Questions About Research

Outside researchers have questioned some of the foundation's work. Some doctors say the study of the CHF Solutions filtration device that Dr. Costanzo presented in March may have been flawed, for example, because heart failure patients who were given conventional diuretic drugs may not have received enough medicine to provide meaningful comparisons.

One heart doctor critical of those findings was Dr. JoAnn Lindenfeld, who was quoted in a cardiology publication, Heartwire, in March as saying, "I wouldn't view these data as persuasive enough to use it full-scale in a million patients a year with acute decompensated heart failure." Dr. Lindenfeld did not dispute the accuracy of that quote but declined to comment further.

Through the Midwest Heart Foundation, Dr. Costanzo declined to comment. Both CHF Solutions and the foundation say she no longer has stock or stock options in the company.

CHF Solutions said that most of its contributions to the Midwest Heart Foundation covered the cost of conducting the research project that Dr. Costanzo led and the company helped design.

John L. Erb, CHF's chief executive, said "we were very careful" in designing the research, but he conceded that it was "not the perfect study where we could answer all the questions."

Dr. Goodwin, at the foundation, said the research was only a starting point. "We fully agree that further investigation is needed to validate the findings and carry them forward to a larger number of patients," he said.

Some of Midwest Heart's research has also fallen short of federal rules governing clinical studies. In August 2004, the Food and Drug Administration sent the foundation a warning letter about a study of a new carotid stent — a device designed to open up a major artery in the head and neck.

The F.D.A. said Midwest Heart had failed to get necessary approval before beginning its research, which involved different types of stents and 168 patient procedures. The regulators also found that some patients were not properly informed and that the foundation was too slow in reporting serious complications. The results of the study were never published, although the foundation says they were submitted to the F.D.A.

The shortcomings were simply "record keeping" issues, said Wendy Landow, the chief executive of the Midwest Heart Foundation, who said her organization had in fact received the necessary approval to do the study but had poorly documented it. The issue has been resolved, she said, adding that the foundation had adopted tighter procedures to avoid future lapses.

A separate controversy surrounds the heart failure drug Natrecor made by Scios, which gave the Midwest Heart Foundation a total of more than $300,000 for the years 2003 and 2004, according to federal filings. The Justice Department, which is investigating whether Scios improperly marketed Natrecor, has issued a subpoena to the foundation.

Scios said that most of its Midwest Heart contributions went toward educational programs that Scios had no influence over. It said it could not comment on the Justice Department investigation. Midwest Heart said it was cooperating with federal officials and had been told it was not a target of the investigation.

Natrecor was approved by the F.D.A. in 2001 for use in hospitals for patients only in an extreme, or decompensated, stage of heart failure. But it also became heavily used by doctors who administered it intravenously in outpatient clinics for periodic patient "tune-ups," as they were sometimes known. Natrecor's enthusiasts included some Midwest Heart doctors, who participated in studies of the drug and also used it in outpatient settings.

While doctors can use federally approved drugs for any purpose they see fit, a pharmaceutical company is prohibited from actively encouraging such off-label uses.

A Debate Over Drug's Merits

In mid-2005, after researchers elsewhere published an article in a scholarly medical journal raising concerns that Natrecor could seriously impair kidney function, one of Midwest Heart's cardiologists, Dr. Mitchell T. Saltzberg, continued to staunchly defend the drug. Dr. Saltzberg, who has also been a paid Scios consultant, wrote to Medicare officials in July 2005 to argue that the drug was being "unfairly targeted."

Dr. Saltzberg's letter cited a study of Natrecor's outpatient use — a study for which the foundation had provided some work — saying that this research and "the body of anecdotal experience" indicated the drug posed no kidney risks.

His comments to Medicare, though, came a few days after Scios itself sent a safety alert to doctors warning against the outpatient use of Natrecor. The Scios alert, issued in consultation with the F.D.A., relied on the findings of an expert panel that the company had asked to look into issues involving the drug's safety.

The Scios alert referred to the very study Dr. Saltzberg had cited and found it lacking. That study "was not powered to adequately assess the effectiveness or safety of serial infusions of Natrecor," the alert said. "The size of the study, its design and its findings provide an inadequate basis to recommend the use of intermittent, serial or scheduled repetitive infusions of Natrecor." Through the foundation, Dr. Saltzberg declined to comment. Foundation officials, though, said they agreed with the Scios panel's findings.

Outpatient use of Natrecor around the country has fallen precipitously. Scios has said it plans to conduct further research into the drug's safety.

The Midwest Heart Foundation said that only one of its patients, who is part of a study, is still being given the drug as an outpatient. But while the foundation says it believes more research is needed, Dr. Goodwin also said that he believes that many doctors had positive results with the drug and that he had seen it keep patients out of the hospital.

"It worked great," he said.

FEC Unleashes Its Lawyers (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, June 28, 2006

The Federal Election Commission (FEC) is being accused of attempting to intimidate soft-money donors to 527s by targeting the donors for questioning.

The agency, which is tasked with policing national and congressional political campaigns, is targeting some of the wealthiest Republican and Democratic donors.

Typically such people have escaped tough scrutiny unless suspected of deliberately evading contribution limits through the use of straw donors or other tactics. But recently the FEC appears to have aimed at donors even though it is the 527s that are suspected of evading campaign-finance law.

One prominent GOP strategist has charged that the new tactic is intended to scare big donors away from giving to 527s, which Congress and the White House have struggled to curb.

This is happening despite the FEC decision last month not to implement new regulations for 527s this election cycle. That was widely interpreted as a green light for 527s to act without restriction, as groups such as America Coming Together and Swift Boat Veterans for Truth did during the 2004 election. This was expected to mean such groups would spend even more money this year and in 2008.

But the FEC has not left the same rules in place that allowed 527s to spend $400 million in the 2004 cycle. Late that year, it subtly modified its rules, which would apparently bolster investigations of 527s in response to a series of complaints filed against the groups in 2004.

The new regulation, which took effect in January 2005, stated that 527s would be subject to regulation if, when seeking money, they "indicated" to donors that the money would be spent to support or oppose a federal candidate.

Election-agency commissioners such as Ellen Weintraub and Hans A. von Spakovsky declined to discuss the investigations. But strategists close to the 527s say donors are being targeted.

"I know for a fact that the FEC has subpoenaed donors who may have contributed to 527s in past election cycles and believe that technique is more rooted in preventing future donation to other 527s than anything else," said Chris LaCivita, a former senior adviser to Swift Boat Veterans for Truth and former head of Progress for America, both right-wing groups.

Another strategist connected with a prominent conservative 527 group, the Club for Growth, confirmed that the FEC is targeting donors.

"I've heard that lots of other groups have gotten subpoenas and requests for depositions of donors," said David Keating, the executive director of the Club for Growth, which is tied up in litigation with the FEC. Keating said he was not talking about donors to his group.

"If you look in the 2004 cycle, complaints were filed against virtually every group out there," Keating said. "None of these matters under review have been dismissed."

In 2004, a coalition of pro-campaign-finance-regulation groups including Democracy 21, the Center for Responsive Politics and the Campaign Legal Center filed at least five complaints against the major 527s: America Coming Together, the Media Fund, the Leadership Forum, Progress for America Voter Fund, Swift Boat Veterans for Truth and Texans for Truth.

Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, said that he believes all of his group's complaints are pending but that he had no further knowledge of the probes.

Because the complaints, which are 2 years old, have not been dismissed it is assumed that the FEC has given its lawyers the go-ahead to investigate them.

One Democratic lawyer said the FEC general counsel's office is asking donors to recall the specifics of their conversations and other interactions with 527s to determine whether those groups indicated that donations would be used to support or oppose federal candidates such as President Bush and Sen. John Kerry (Mass.), the Democrats' presidential nominee.

"They're asking a lot of questions of donors about what they were told when they were asked to contribute," the lawyer said. "Who knows what the six-member commission will do with whatever is presented them? There's little doubt that the general counsel's office feels responsibility to show evidence of a violation and this is the route to get there."

Once the general counsel presents his case to the commission, its members must vote on whether there is probable cause to believe the law was broken. It is not known if the commissioners specifically approved subjecting donors to subpoenas and depositions.

"Their attorneys have been let loose to look into whether … the entities violated the law," the Democratic lawyer said. "They're out there trying to gather the evidence. You don't have the FEC as a six-person office approving these inquiries."

Former FEC Chairman Scott Thomas, who retired last year, declined to comment on an ongoing investigation but said scrutinizing donors would fit the legal approach that the FEC has adopted in regulating 527s. Citing the newly enacted Section 100.57, Thomas said commissioners agreed in 2004 that 527s could be policed most effectively case by case by looking at how they solicited donors.

Thomas said solicitation is a key element in the FEC's litigation against the Club for Growth. He said FEC investigators are likely to look at "whether there was some indication given to donors in the solicitation process that the funds would be used to support or oppose federal candidates. The focus is what was said when the money was coming in."

Thomas said past enforcement actions focused on what groups communicated to voters to determine whether they should have political-committee status, a designation that would subject them to contribution limits. Thomas said that approach created gridlock.

Thomas said the regulation change in January 2005 could be used to prosecute groups for activity in 2004. He said it would not apply retroactively in the technical sense but could be held up as a point of consensus among the FEC commissioners about how the laws on the books before 2004 should be interpreted.

"It's going to be arguing that the same analytical concept can be applied for figuring out what happened in '04 cycle," Thomas said in response to claims that the general counsel is focusing on conversations with donors. "That's probably why the FEC was digging for this information, because four commissioners agreed that concept was the best way to analyze these political-committee cases."

Court Rules Correctly On Clean Money (LAT)

BY RAPPING THE KNUCKLES of some over-exuberant political reformers in Vermont, the U.S. Supreme Court has sent a welcome signal that it will continue to scrutinize well-intentioned efforts to limit the role of money in politics with at least one eye on the 1st Amendment.

With Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. joining the lead opinion by Clinton appointee Justice Stephen G. Breyer, the court this week told Ben & Jerry's home state that it went too far when it imposed strict limits on what candidates for public office could spend and on what citizens could donate to political campaigns. The ruling suggests that a landmark 1976 campaign-finance decision is still good law.

In that decision, Buckley vs. Valeo, the high court upheld a post-Watergate law's restrictions on what individuals could contribute to candidates for federal office, but it struck down on 1st Amendment grounds the law's limits on how much a candidate could spend. Drawing a distinction that remains controversial 30 years later, the court explained that although spending limits and contribution limits raise 1st Amendment concerns, a Congress worried about corruption could put reasonable limits on how much an individual donates to a candidate, because the viewpoint conveyed by a $1,000 donation is the same "general expression of support" that would be conveyed by a larger gift.

By contrast, the Buckley ruling said, a candidate spending his own money is entitled to greater 1st Amendment protection because he is espousing his own views. The same point holds of truly independent expenditures by a candidate's supporters.

It's easy to mock this distinction. After all, both campaign contributions and campaign expenditures represent the use of money to produce political results. But Buckley's two-tier approach makes sense. It was a pragmatic attempt to balance a need for elections uncontaminated by large special-interest contributions with the guarantees of the 1st Amendment, which above all protects political speech.

In striking down Vermont's expenditure limits, the Roberts court clearly is being faithful to Buckley vs. Valeo. But what about its decision to invalidate Vermont's limits on contributions? Breyer argued in his opinion that there is no inconsistency because the court in Buckley said that even contribution limits must be "closely drawn" and must not be so low that they prevent candidates from "amassing the resources necessary for effective advocacy."

Whether Breyer is right about Vermont's limits, Congress and the states can still impose reasonable limits on contributions. But limitations on spending — unless candidates voluntarily accept them, in exchange for public financing — remain off-limits. Buckley's distinction between expenditures and contributions is still the law of the land. That's good news for both clean elections and free speech.

Justice Agrees To Indiana Plan To Purge Voter Rolls (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, June 28, 2006

The Justice Department agreed Tuesday to an Indiana plan designed to eliminate the names of people who have died and those who are listed more than once from the state's voter registration rolls.

DOJ_NMG_0037237

Indiana Secretary of State Todd Rokita last week announced the plan to purge the rolls, following negotiations between state Republicans and Democrats. It would also target convicted felons and voters who no longer live in Indiana or in the county of their registration.

"We're very pleased to be able to do this and get our voter roll cleanup under way," Rokita's chief of staff, Paul Okeson, said Tuesday.

"Last night, we started printing the first mailer (to registered voters) and started getting them ready to be sent out this week. I imagine as early as the end of this week, the first pieces of mail will begin to drop in voters' mailboxes," Okeson said.

The letters will be sent to every registered voter in the state. Any that cannot be delivered will be flagged as potential mistakes, and the state will then send follow-up mailers to those addresses.

If any of those are also returned, the voters would be placed on inactive status.

Inactive voters could still cast ballots this year, but their files would be flagged. If they did not vote in the 2006, 2007 or 2008 elections, their names could be removed by the end of 2008.

The agreement, designed to bring Indiana into compliance with the National Voter Registration Act, followed a Justice Department investigation that found the state had hundreds of thousands of ineligible voters on its registration lists, including possibly 29,000 who were deceased, and 290,000 duplicates.

The agreement still must be approved by the U.S. District Court in Indianapolis, but Okeson said that is likely only a formality.

"All parties are on the same page," he said. "So the District Court will simply say, `We see there's an agreement that has been reached; we'll watch to see if that agreement is kept.'" >

U.S. Probing Woodmere Officers' Firings (CLPD)

By Tasha Flournoy, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, June 28, 2006

Woodmere -- The U.S. Justice Department has launched an investigation of village officials for suspending a police chief and refusing to reinstate two police officers who contend they were fired because they are white.

Mayor Yolanda Broadie and Law Director Janet Beck acknowledged the investigation Tuesday, but provided no details. Justice Department officials were not available for comment.

The investigation comes a year after the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission ruled that the village violated the civil rights of Chief Lamont Lockhart and officers Amy Mengay and Timothy Ellis.

Mengay and Ellis told the EEOC that Broadie, who is black, unfairly fired them and allowed black officers with similar or more serious infractions to keep their jobs.

Broadie later suspended Lockhart for what she called "failure to properly lead and supervise the Police Department." Lockhart in turn filed his own complaint with the EEOC, which found that the suspension was retaliation for his support of the two officers. Lockhart has since resigned.

The commission ordered the village to attempt a settlement, reinstate the officers and give them back pay. But village officials refused. So, the commission referred the case to the U.S. Justice Department.

Avery Friedman, who represents Ellis, Lockhart and Mengay, said federal attorneys interviewed village officials and gathered public records this week.

He said the village could either agree to settle with the officers or face a federal lawsuit. He called it a unique discrimination case.

"It is an unusual case because you have a black mayor telling a black chief, Get rid of the white ones,' " said Friedman. "The truth is the village of Woodmere is in a world of trouble."

Friedman said Ellis is now an officer in Sagamore Hills Township, Lockhart serves as deputy police chief for the Greater Cleveland Regional Transit Authority, and Mengay is an officer in Newburgh Heights.

Longtime Councilman James Jordan said Tuesday that he still honors the village's decision not to settle with the fired officers.

"Our opinion is the village isn't wrong," he said. "We haven't done anything wrong."

Agreement Would Make Public Buildings More Handicapped Accessible (KTBS-TV)

By Jim Roberts

KTBS-TV, ABC 3, Shreveport, LA, June 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037238

The city of Shreveport could have to spend up to $4 million over the next three years to bring all city buildings into compliance with the Americans with Disabilities Act.

Mayor Keith Hightower this afternoon offered a proposed agreement with the U.S. Justice Department to make the upgrades. It would need City Council approval.

A Justice Department task force came to town, looked at public buildings and made hundreds of "suggested" improvements.

Dwayne Ebarb's home has been modified due to his handicap. Much of what the federal government wants the city to do can be easily accomplished, he said.

"Most of the stuff they brought up was minor," Ebarb said. "It was stuff like 'grab bars.' They were an inch too high, an inch too low."

The list of improvements the government wants is several hundred pages long.

One building that needs work, the government said, is the old City Hall Annex. It was built in the 1950s and hasn't been modified much since then. Another is the old Civic Theater and the Municipal Auditorium, circa 1920 -- both built before the ADA was passed.

But Ebarb said some of the government's recommendations don't make sense.

"They wanted to renovate the Elvis Presley bathroom (at Municipal Auditorium)," he said. "They wanted to make the shower (handicapped) accessible. Nobody even uses the shower."

Hightower said Washington is a lot like city hall: You can't fight it.

"When the Justice Department comes and says you must do these things, sooner or later you've got to get them done," he said.

It will be up to the City Council and the Hightower administration to find the money.

The expenditure comes just a few weeks after the council cut the money from a $10 million sales tax windfall that would have gone to work making Shreveport ADA compliant.

The city has three years from the time the agreement is signed to make improvements to the buildings. The timetable for individual projects ranges from a few days to several years, depending on size, cost and need.

If the projects aren't done in the three years, the Justice Department could file suit against the city to get them done.

Senator Wants IRS To Chase After Pimps (USAT)

USA Today, June 28, 2006

Pimps and sex traffickers could soon find themselves being chased by tax collectors, not just the vice squad.

Sen. Charles Grassley, chairman of the tax-writing Senate Finance Committee, wants the Internal Revenue Service to chase after pimps and sex traffickers with the same fervor it stalked gangster Al Capone for tax evasion.

Grassley, R-Iowa, would hit pimps with fines and lengthy prison sentences for failing to file employment forms and withhold taxes for the women and girls under their command.

The proposal would make certain tax crimes a felony when the money comes from a criminal activity. A one-year prison sentence and $25,000 fine would become a 10-year sentence and $50,000 fine for each employment form that a pimp or sex trafficker fails to file.

Grassley planned to propose the penalties when his panel meets Wednesday.

"The thugs who run these trafficking rings are exploiting society's poorest girls and women for personal gain," Grassley said. "The IRS goes after drug traffickers. It can go after sex traffickers."

Michael Horowitz, a senior fellow at the Hudson Institute, said the change has the potential to put pimps out of business without difficult trials that require women to testify to abuse and mistreatment.

"We need to simply treat the pimps and massage parlor operators the way we would treat anybody who takes the proceeds of a customer transaction from somebody and then gives a fraction of it back," he said.

Under tax law, that relationship makes the pimp an employer, requiring the filing of a wage statement and the withholding of payroll taxes, including Social Security.

Grassley envisions creating an office inside the Internal Revenue Service to prosecute sex traffickers for violating tax laws. The office would get $2 million to get started, and it would be allowed to keep a portion of the taxes it collects.

The IRS work is intended to build on efforts underway to curb worldwide trafficking. The Justice Department, collaborating with U.S. attorneys offices nationwide, would identify pimps and sex traffickers and refer them to the IRS.

Grassley also wants to change the IRS whistle-blower program to allow the girls and women to participate.

If the IRS goes after pimps and sex traffickers for tax offenses now, it conducts lengthy audits of their lifestyles in order to estimate their incomes from illegal activities and determine taxes due.

In Senate, It's Déjà Vu All Over Again On Voting Rights Act Extension (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, June 28, 2006

An extension of the Voting Rights Act is running into some of the same objections in the Senate that it faces in the House, where the bill was pulled from the floor schedule last week after rank-and-file Republicans rebelled against their leadership.

Southern Senate conservatives are raising concerns about reauthorizing Section 5 of the law, which requires jurisdictions with a history of racial discrimination to pre-clear voting-law changes with the Justice Department. Some Southerners argue that the requirement is unnecessarily onerous and that their states should not be singled out in perpetuity.

"Our part of the country, no matter how good we do, we're going to be treated differently than the rest of the country," said Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.).

Lott, one of two current senators who cast a vote against the 1982 extension of the original 1965 law, said he would most likely support the bill but did not commit to doing so.

"I want to see what it is first," said Lott, who was House Republican whip when he voted against the last reauthorization.

"I haven't focused on it," said Sen. Richard Shelby (R-Ala.), who also voted against the initial House version of the 1982 bill before the House cleared the Senate's measure by voice vote.

Shelby referred questions to fellow Alabama Republican Jeff Sessions, who is a member of the Judiciary Committee. That panel is expected to include its voting-rights legislation, which is identical to the House bill, on its markup agenda for tomorrow. The bill was placed on last week's agenda, but the committee was unable to muster a quorum for consideration.

More than half of the committee's 18 members are co-sponsors of the legislation, but it is not clear whether senators who dislike certain provisions could cobble together enough votes to alter it.

"I think it needs to be studied, and I think there are certainly some improvements that can be made," Sessions said. "I think we may improve it and pass it."

Sessions declined to say which parts he would change or how he would change them.

Many of the law's provisions are permanent, but several are due to expire next year. Democrats and some centrist Republicans are eager to win reauthorization of those provisions before GOP term limits force Sensenbrenner to hand his gavel to a more conservative lawmaker.

Lawmakers and aides say privately that the political sensitivity of the landmark civil-rights law makes it difficult for them to challenge its composition for fear of being branded racist.

Lott, who is considering a leadership bid, was pushed out of the majority leader's job in late 2002 after he suggested the country would have been better off had Sen. Strom Thurmond (S.C.) won his 1948 segregationist bid for the presidency.

"I think the Voting Rights Act is the most important civil-rights bill in history," said Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), a Judiciary Committee member who is not a co-sponsor of the legislation. But, he said, "There are some real questions about whether we're being fair to some states."

In the House, a bloc of Georgia and Texas Republicans banded together with lawmakers opposed to provisions allowing for multilingual ballots to avert a floor vote last week. House Republican leaders have yet to reschedule it.

"We are continuing to have conversations with members … about some provisions in the bill, and those conversations will continue this week," House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said yesterday.

Leaders in both parties and members of the Congressional Black Caucus have signed off on the Sensenbrenner-Specter bill. But Reps. Lynn Westmoreland and Charlie Norwood, both Georgia Republicans, wanted to amend Section 5.

The Norwood amendment would expand its requirements to the entire country, and Westmoreland's amendment would have created an expedited procedure for states to get off of the pre-clearance list.

Section 5 covers Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arizona and parts of several other states, including California, New York and North Carolina.

Rep. Steve King (R-Iowa) and dozens of others objected to language reauthorizing multilingual ballots.

Many of the same concerns are being echoed, if softly, on the Senate side, where an effort to control expectations is beginning to take shape.

"It has a year to go, and clearly the Democrats are trying to make it an election-year issue," Hatch said.

Rank And File Cut Out Of VRA Talks (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, June 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037240

Even while Republican House leaders work to quell internal divides that derailed consideration of the Voting Rights Act last week, some rank-and-file Members complained Tuesday that they remain shut out of discussions regarding the law's reauthorization.

"We are continuing to have conversations with Members, and [with] lawyers, about some provisions in the bill; and those conversations will continue this week," Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) said during a Tuesday press conference.

But several rank-and-file Republicans said House leaders remain unwilling to discuss any aspect of reauthorization of the landmark 1965 law.

One among those Members, Rep. Steve King (R-Iowa), asserted that his efforts to meet with GOP leadership in recent days have yet to elicit any response.

"It's not due to lack of effort on my part," said King, who is seeking consideration of an amendment that would end mandates under the VRA that require jurisdictions to provide multilingual ballots to voters.

The exclusion of King's proposal, as well as a half-dozen other amendments targeting language provisions in the law, from consideration on the House floor sparked an internal revolt that prompted leaders to pull the measure from last Wednesday's schedule.

"I care about the policy," King added, stating that he is seeking not only debate on his amendment, but also support from leadership. "It would not satisfy me to [only] have an opportunity to speak my piece on the floor and get a vote in the record."

Rep. Lynn Westmoreland (R-Ga.) said he similarly has received little feedback from House leaders in recent days as he has sought support for the language amendments.

"I don't know who's been talking, but it's not us," he said.

Georgia Republicans earlier won concessions from House leaders to allow consideration of amendments to the voting rights law — GOP leadership initially had hoped to pass the bill under suspension, which would have prohibited amendments and severely limited debate on the measure — and the Rules Committee approved consideration of two measures last week.

Both of those amendments, sponsored by Westmoreland and Rep. Charlie Norwood (R-Ga.), are directed at the VRA's Section 5, which requires the Justice Department to approve any changes to voting practices in states with a documented history of discrimination.

Norwood's amendment would modify the formula used to apply that section of the law, known as pre-clearance, which some Southern lawmakers have argued is outdated.

The Westmoreland proposal would address a related section of the VRA that provides a mechanism for jurisdictions to "bailout" or be relieved from those regulations if officials can prove no discriminatory voting practices have occurred in a 10-year period.

Under that amendment the Justice Department would be required to assemble a list of those jurisdictions eligible for the bailout and then issue notifications to those groups.

Despite the lack of communication, Westmoreland said he does not expect today's weekly Republican Conference meeting to be as contentious as last week's, during which some lawmakers chanted for the legislation to be dropped from the schedule.

Norwood said he expects any decision will be delayed until after a Supreme Court ruling is issued in the Texas redistricting case. "We'll look at it again," he said.

Plaintiffs in the Texas lawsuit, League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, are challenging the Texas map put into place in 2003 by arguing not only that it was devised to maximize GOP gains but also that it diluted minority voting power and violated the principle of "one person, one vote" by revising districts mid-decade.

A senior GOP leadership aide said leaders are "hopeful" that the measure could be cleared the week after the July Fourth recess and that they were enlisting ex-Rep. J.C. Watts (R-Okla.) to help allay lawmakers' concerns about the bill.

"Having him around is going to be helpful," the aide said.

Osceola To Take Hispanic Voting Rights Issue To Court (ORS)

The Orlando Sentinel, June 28, 2006

KISSIMMEE -- A day after a federal judge put county commission elections on hold, Osceola County said it will not settle a case filed by the Justice Department over Hispanic voting rights.

"The county intends to proceed with the defense of this case. As publicly elected officials, the board must uphold and defend the last expression of the voters in 1996 -- that every precinct voted to return to at-large elections," read Vincent Fontana, the county's attorney, this afternoon. "Also the 2003-2004 charter review advisory commission -- that reflected the entire ethnic makeup of the county -- voted not to recommend that the board put the issue on the ballot again."

DOJ_NMG_0037241

Commissioners met with Fontana for about an hour and a half to review Judge Gregory A. Prensell's order stopping this fall's elections.

"It is important for the citizens to have direct political access to all public officials who have the power to tax their homes and property. This is among the many rights and freedoms for which our armed forces continue to fight," Fontana concluded.

It is not clear what the next step will be. Presnell, a judge in the Middle District in Orlando, wanted a status report on July 12 and scheduled a trial for July 18.

The county could appeal the injunction.

Two county commissioners contacted would not comment on the decision.

A Single Person Could Swing An Election (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

To determine what it would take to hack a U.S. election, a team of cybersecurity experts turned to a fictional battleground state called Pennasota and a fictional gubernatorial race between Tom Jefferson and Johnny Adams. It's the year 2007, and the state uses electronic voting machines.

Jefferson was forecast to win the race by about 80,000 votes, or 2.3 percent of the vote. Adams's conspirators thought, "How easily can we manipulate the election results?"

The experts thought about all the ways to do it. And they concluded in a report issued yesterday that it would take only one person, with a sophisticated technical knowledge and timely access to the software that runs the voting machines, to change the outcome.

The report, which was unveiled at a Capitol Hill news conference by New York University's Brennan Center for Justice and billed as the most authoritative to date, tackles some of the most contentious questions about the security of electronic voting.

The report concluded that the three major electronic voting systems in use have significant security and reliability vulnerabilities. But it added that most of these vulnerabilities can be overcome by auditing printed voting records to spot irregularities. And while 26 states require paper records of votes, fewer than half of those require regular audits.

"With electronic voting systems, there are certain attacks that can reach enough voting machines . . . that you could affect the outcome of the statewide election," said Lawrence D. Norden, associate counsel of the Brennan Center.

With billions of dollars of support from the federal government, states have replaced outdated voting machines in recent years with optical scan ballot and touch-screen machines. Activists, including prominent computer scientists, have complained for years that these machines are not secure against tampering. But electronic voting machines are also much easier to use for disabled people and those who do not speak English.

Voting machine vendors have dismissed many of the concerns, saying they are theoretical and do not reflect the real-life experience of running elections, such as how machines are kept in a secure environment.

"It just isn't the piece of equipment," said David Bear, a spokesman for Diebold Election Systems, one of the country's largest vendors. "It's all the elements of an election environment that make for a secure election."

"This report is based on speculation rather than an examination of the record. To date, voting systems have not been successfully attacked in a live election," said Bob Cohen, a spokesman for the Election Technology Council, a voting machine vendors' trade group. "The purported vulnerabilities presented in this study, while interesting in theory, would be extremely difficult to exploit."

At yesterday's news conference, the push for more secure electronic voting machines, which has been popular largely on the left side of the political spectrum since the contested outcome of the 2000 presidential election in Florida, picked up some high-profile support from the other side.

Republican Reps. Tom Cole (Okla.) and Thomas M. Davis III (Va.), chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, joined Rep. Rush D. Holt (D-N.J.) in calling for a law that would set strict requirements for electronic voting machines. Howard Schmidt, former chief of security at Microsoft and President Bush's former cybersecurity adviser, also endorsed the Brennan report.

"It's not a question of 'if,' it's a question of 'when,' " Davis said of an attempt to manipulate election results.

Appeals Court Upholds Little Rock Order (FINDLAW/AP)

By Noah Trister, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 28, 2006

(AP) - LITTLE ROCK, Ark.-A federal appeals court on Monday upheld a decision keeping the Little Rock School District under federal desegregation monitoring, which has been in effect since 1965.

DOJ_NMG_0037242

A three-member panel of the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals at St. Louis agreed with a 2004 ruling by U.S. District William R. Wilson in the long-running desegregation case involving the Little Rock district, the North Little Rock District and the Pulaski County Special School District.

Wilson had ruled that the Little Rock district did not successfully evaluate its academic programs for how well they helped black students. Otherwise, the district would have been released from the remaining desegregation monitoring it has faced since 1965.

The district had been released in 2002 from all aspects of its monitoring except those relating to program evaluations.

In his opinion, Wilson said the district would remain under court order through the 2005-06 school year. Wilson said the district must hire outside experts and design a program assessment process.

While upholding Wilson's decision, the appeals court also signaled its willingness to review the case again if the federal monitoring is not lifted in October.

The court said it was concerned about the "ever-heightened requirements that the district is being asked to satisfy."

Chris Heller, a lawyer for the Little Rock district, called the ruling "a great disappointment." But he also said he was encouraged by the court's willingness to look at the case again if federal monitoring remains in place after this year.

"Perhaps part of the rationale was that the case should be almost over anyway," Heller said of the ruling.

Senate Bars Constitutional Amendment On Flag Burning (Update1) (BLOOM)

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, June 28, 2006

June 27 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Senate rejected a proposed constitutional amendment to empower Congress to outlaw flag burning, falling one vote short of the two-thirds majority required to send the measure to the states for ratification.

The vote was 66-34 in favor of the amendment. Sixty-seven votes are required to approve a constitutional amendment.

To become part of the Constitution, an amendment must also be ratified by 38 state legislatures. Republicans argued that 48 states had outlawed flag desecration before a Supreme Court decision in 1989 invalidated a Texas law. They noted that all 50 state legislatures have passed resolutions urging Congress to approve a constitutional amendment.

Democrats accused the Republicans of ignoring more pressing issues, such as spiraling health-care costs, to score election- year points over flag burning. Democrats made the same charge earlier this month when Senate Republicans unsuccessfully sought a vote on a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage.

``Why are we here? Because the White House and the congressional Republican leadership are nervous about the upcoming election," Dick Durbin of Illinois, the Senate's No. 2 Democrat, said during today's debate in Washington. ``We are not setting out to protect Old Glory. We are setting out to protect old politicians."

Republicans said the issue is above politics, citing bipartisan support in the House of Representatives, which has passed a flag-burning amendment six times in the last 12 years.

``Bringing it up at this time is certainly not an election- year ploy," said Utah Republican Orrin Hatch, the measure's prime sponsor. ``We have Democrats and Republicans who feel deeply about this."

Vote Breakdown

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada and 13 other Democrats voted in favor of the proposed amendment.

Kentucky Senator Mitch McConnell, the deputy Republican leader, voted against the amendment. McConnell has said he favors upholding First Amendment values. Two other Republicans, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Robert Bennett of Utah, also opposed the amendment.

Proponents argued that the amendment was needed to reverse the 5-4 Supreme Court ruling that they argued usurped legislative powers to outlaw flag burning. Hatch called the proposal ``a simple little constitutional amendment" to restore that power. ``Who could be against that?"

Democratic Proposal

Earlier, the Senate defeated narrower legislation proposed by Durbin. His measure would outlaw flag burning with the intent of inciting violence or desecration or theft of a flag on U.S. government property. Durbin said his bill would protect the flag ``without defiling our Constitution."

West Virginia Senator Robert Byrd, acknowledging that many voters in his home state where he is seeking re-election will disagree with him, said amending the Constitution to protect the flag would undermine the charter of democracy.

``Old Glory lives because the Constitution lives," he said. ``We love that flag, but we love the guarantees of the Constitution more."

The Senate last voted in 2000 on the proposed amendment when supporters fell four votes short of the required two-thirds support.

Flag Amendment Narrowly Fails In Senate Vote (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 27 — A proposed Constitutional amendment to allow Congress to prohibit desecration of the flag fell a single vote short of approval by the Senate on Tuesday, an excruciatingly close vote that left unresolved a long-running debate over whether the flag is a unique national symbol deserving of special legal standing.

The 66-to-34 vote on the amendment was one vote short of the 67 required to send the amendment to the states for potential ratification as the 28th Amendment. It was the closest proponents of the initiative have come in four Senate votes since the Supreme Court first ruled in 1989 that flag burning was a protected form of free speech.

The opponents — 30 Democrats, 3 Republicans and an independent — asserted that the amendment would amount to tampering with the Bill of Rights in an effort to eliminate relatively rare incidents of burning the flag. They said it violated the very freedoms guaranteed by the symbolism of the flag.

"This objectionable expression is obscene, it is painful, it is unpatriotic," said Senator Daniel Inouye, a Hawaii Democrat who won the Medal of Honor for his service in World War II. "But I believe Americans gave their lives in many wars to make certain all Americans have a right to express themselves, even those who harbor hateful thoughts."

Proponents of the amendment, which was backed by 52 Republicans and 14 Democrats, disputed the assertion that burning the flag was a form of speech. They said the amendment was simply an effort to reassert Congressional authority after a misguided court ruling. They said it was particularly appropriate to act now when American troops are at risk.

"Old Glory lost today," said Senator Bill Frist, the majority leader, who scheduled the debate and vote in the week before Congress broke for its Fourth of July recess.

The full text of the proposed amendment is, "The Congress shall have power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag of the United States."

The vote is likely to be an issue in the Congressional elections in November, and Senator Orrin G. Hatch, the Utah Republican who was the chief sponsor of the amendment, predicted the minority who opposed it would be held accountable by the voters.

"I think this is getting to where they are not going to be able to escape the wrath of the voters," Mr. Hatch said.

Eleven senators facing re-election this year opposed the amendment and several are facing potentially difficult races, including Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, a Republican, and the Democrats Daniel K. Akaka of Hawaii, Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, Maria Cantwell of Washington and Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut.

The leader of the Citizens Flag Alliance, which had been running newspaper advertisements on the issue in selected states, said it would continue to press the issue and make sure voters know where their senators stand on the amendment.

"I think this is the right thing to do, and I am going to keep at it until we run out of money or they tell me to stop," said Daniel S. Wheeler, an American Legion official who leads the advocacy group.

Prior to the vote on the amendment itself, the Senate voted 64 to 36 against a proposed bill that would have criminalized flag desecration. Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the second ranking Senate Democrat, said his plan had been written to avoid Supreme Court objections, but backers of the constitutional approach dismissed that idea.

President Bush, whose father was president when the flag fight initially erupted in the aftermath of two high court rulings, said he was disappointed in the outcome. "I commend the senators from both parties who voted to allow the amendment ratification process to protect our flag to go forward, and continue to believe that the American people deserve the opportunity to express their views on this important issue."

The House has routinely approved the flag amendment on bipartisan votes and did so last year. Had the Senate passed the amendment, it would have been likely to win ratification from the required 38 states since, supporters say, all states have endorsed the amendment in some form.

While the amendment gained three votes since it was last considered in 2000, its future prospects are uncertain. Senator Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky, is in line to become the Republican leader in the next Congress, and he opposes the initiative on free speech grounds. In addition, most analysts expect Republicans to lose Senate seats in the November election.

"This would have been the easiest time to get it through," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, who opposed it.

The vote, which came after the Senate earlier this month defeated a proposed constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage, will not be the last ideologically charged vote in the run-up to the midterm elections. The House Republican leadership announced Tuesday that it plans votes this summer on social issues, including a same-sex marriage amendment, abortion rights, Internet gambling, property rights and the Pledge of Allegiance.

DOJ_NMG_0037244

"The American Values Agenda will defend America's founding principles," Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said. "Through this agenda, we will work to protect the faith of our people, the sanctity of life and freedoms outlined by our founding fathers."

And the House on Tuesday approved on a voice vote a proposal that would prohibit condominium associations and other homeowner groups from preventing residents from displaying the flag.

The American Civil Liberties Union, which has been deeply involved in opposing the amendment for years, credited the senators who took a potentially politically tough vote to block it.

"The Senate came close to torching our Constitution, but luckily it came through unscathed," said Caroline Fredrickson, director of the organization's Washington legislative office. "We applaud those brave senators who stood up for the First Amendment and rejected this damaging and needless amendment."

Besides senators up for re-election, the issue also divided lawmakers considered possible presidential candidates in 2008. Those voting yes included Mr. Frist, George Allen of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona, Sam Brownback of Kansas and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, all Republicans, and Evan Bayh of Indiana, a Democrat. Voting no on the Democratic side were Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin and John Kerry of Massachusetts.

Flag-Burning Amendment Fails In Senate By 1 Vote (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Senate narrowly failed to approve a proposed constitutional amendment to ban burning the American flag, as supporters fell just one vote short of the 67 needed for passage.

Fourteen Democrats were among the 66 senators voting for the proposal, which would have been a crucial step toward giving Congress the authority to prohibit "physical desecration" of the flag, just before the Fourth of July recess, when many lawmakers will return home to campaign for re-election. Three Republicans and 31 Democrats voted against it.

Opponents said they didn't want to change the Constitution to prevent an action that rarely occurs. They proposed a substitute, a statute that would have prohibited damaging the flag in narrow circumstances, such as when it belongs to the federal government or is destroyed on federal land or to incite violence. "There are ways we can deal with this" without an amendment, said Sen. Richard Durbin (D., Ill.). "We feel we should not desecrate the Constitution."

Supporters said they wanted to protect an important symbol. "Destroying the very emblem of that freedom is just plain wrong," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.).

Daniel Wheeler, the president of the Citizens Flag Alliance, a coalition led by the American Legion that has been lobbying hard to win Senate passage, said he was disappointed by the vote.

Underscoring the politics behind the measure, Mr. Wheeler said his group will work to publicize the votes of amendment opponents. The coalition plans to highlight the "no" votes of Democratic Sens. Kent Conrad and Byron Dorgan, both of North Dakota, as well as Maria Cantwell of Washington, among others. Mr. Wheeler said Sen. Mitch McConnell, the Kentucky Republican and majority whip who voted against the amendment, also would be a target.

Flag Amendment Rejected By One Vote In Senate (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman And Faye Fiore

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate today rejected by only one vote a constitutional amendment that would have given Congress the power to ban flag burning.

The tally was a blow to supporters who thought their time had come after 16 years of trying to overcome a Supreme Court ruling that held that legislative bans on flag burning violated the Constitution's free speech provisions.

"It's not a question of if, but when," said Marty Justis, executive director of the Citizens Flag Alliance, a coalition of 147 organizations, including the American Legion, that has spent about $25 million since 1989 to back an amendment. "We will be back."

The vote capped two days of debate, during which opponents charged that the push for an amendment was driven more by politics than patriotism. They argued that the main aim of Republican sponsors was to rally conservatives in an election year even if that meant trampling on the Constitution to do it.

In addition to urging that the flag be protected, proponents argued that the Supreme Court in its 5-4 ruling had usurped the will of the people.

More than a dozen Democrats supported the amendment, disputing charges that it would trample on free speech rights. In an emotional speech, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) talked about picking up a newspaper in February 1945 to see Joe Rosenthal's iconic photograph of U.S. Marines struggling to raise the flag on Iwo Jima.

"For me, at that time as a 12-year-old, and for the nation, the photo was a bolt of electricity that boosted morale," Feinstein said. "Its symbolism of everything courageous about my country was etched into my mind for all time."

She said that "protecting the flag will not prevent anyone from expressing his or her point of view."

Opponents countered that amending the Constitution to ban the desecration of the flag would violate the principle of free speech that allows protesters to burn or stomp on the flag as part of their demonstration.

"We must also defend the right of all Americans to express their views about their government, however hateful or spiteful or disrespectful those views may be," Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) said. "America is not simply a nation of symbols, it is a nation of principles."

Proponents argued that the Supreme Court had overreached.

"Who gets the final word -- five Justices on the Supreme Court or we the people?" asked Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas). "The flag is the symbol of our freedom. Why in the world would we refuse to protect it?"

Countering arguments that the constitutional amendment would amend the Bill of Rights and curb free speech, Cornyn added: "This is not about speech, it's about behavior."

Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), chief sponsor of the effort, blasted those who suggested, as Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) had, that the flag amendment would for the first time amend the Bill of Rights.

"This doesn't have anything about the Bill of Rights in it," he said. "All it says is we're going to give power back to the people."

Critics argued that the effort to amend the Constitution was a solution in search of a problem because an unofficial collection of desecrations posted on the Citizens Flag Alliance website lists four events this year and about 50 in the past five years.

Unlike flag burning in the 1960s -- a powerful symbol of opposition to the Vietnam War -- these days flag burners are prosecuted for other crimes, such as public drunkenness, theft, vandalism or setting a dangerous fire.

"What is amazing is that even in a time of war and discontent, patriotism and great respect for the flag exists without a constitutional amendment. We don't need to force Americans to love the flag, they just do," said Terri Ann Schroeder, senior lobbyist for the American Civil Liberties Union, which worked against the amendment.

If the constitutional amendment eventually passes Congress, it would be sent to the states for ratification. At least 38 states would have to ratify the language within seven years before it would become the 28th amendment to the Constitution.

A recent CNN poll showed 56% of Americans favor a flag-burning amendment, and all 50 states have asked Congress to send them the amendment for ratification.

Senate Rejects Flag Desecration Amendment (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

The Senate rejected by a single vote yesterday an effort to amend the Constitution to allow Congress to ban desecration of the American flag, after a two-day debate freighted with political calculations and sharp disputes over the limits of free speech.

The 66 to 34 vote fell just short of the two-thirds majority required to approve a constitutional amendment and submit it to the states for ratification. It marked the latest setback for congressional attempts to supersede Supreme Court decisions in 1989 and 1990. Justices narrowly ruled that burning and other desecrations of the flag are protected as free speech under the First Amendment.

As expected, three Republicans -- Robert F. Bennett (Utah), Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.) and Mitch McConnell (Ky.) -- voted against the amendment. Fourteen Democrats voted for it. The House approved the measure 286 to 130 last year.

GOP congressional leaders have offered up several measures in recent weeks that are important to their conservative political base -- including an amendment banning same-sex marriage and further cuts in the estate tax -- culminating with yesterday's vote on flag burning.

Polls show that most Americans want flag desecration outlawed, and the amendment's proponents said they were trying to stop justices from thwarting the public's will. They said that burning a U.S. flag in public -- while rare these days -- is a reprehensible insult to the nation's founders and a dishonor to the Americans who died fighting tyranny.

The amendment's opponents agreed that flag burning is repugnant, but argued that U.S. troops died to preserve freedoms that include controversial political statements.

DOJ_NMG_0037246

Flag burning "is obscene, painful and unpatriotic," Sen. Daniel K. Inouye (D-Hawaii), who lost an arm in World War II, said in a floor speech yesterday. "But I believe Americans gave their lives in the many wars to make certain that all Americans have a right to express themselves -- even those who harbor hateful thoughts."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) summarized the proponents' views. The flag's special symbolic status, she said, makes its desecration different from holding a sign denouncing the president. Burning an American flag in anger, she said, is "conduct, not speech" because the flag is "the symbol of our democracy, our shared values, our commitment to justice, our remembrance to those who have sacrificed to defend these principles."

Behind the constitutional rhetoric were cold political considerations. Republicans are eager to energize conservative voters this fall, and the flag initiative -- even if doomed to fail -- is seen as a sure-fire way to inspire them, especially a week before Independence Day.

The vote is the closest that advocates have come to banning flag desecration in many years of trying. In 2000, the Senate fell four votes short, and supporters had hoped the GOP's 55 to 44 majority -- there is one independent, James M. Jeffords (Vt.) -- would put them over the top this year.

The GOP-controlled House has repeatedly approved the amendment by wide margins, and advocates say they could have handily obtained ratification by three-quarters of the states if the Senate had followed suit.

The debate divided senators along unusual lines. Opposing the amendment was McConnell, the Senate's second-ranking GOP leader, and Bennett, a quiet, mainstream Republican. Democratic supporters included Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) and Sen. Evan Bayh (Ind.), a presidential hopeful. Maryland's Democratic senators voted against the amendment and Virginia's Republican senators voted for it.

The amendment's chief sponsor, Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah), disputed assertions that the measure was politically motivated and was an unwise use of the Senate's time in the face of war in Iraq, high gasoline prices and a growing federal deficit.

"Fifty state legislatures have called on us to pass this amendment," Hatch told colleagues.

He and his allies had tried for days to pick up one more vote. But virtually all senators had stated their positions publicly, making efforts at negotiation or persuasion fruitless.

The Constitution was last amended -- for the 27th time -- in 1992, when the states belatedly ratified a 1789 bid by Congress to regulate lawmakers' pay increases.

Overturning a Texas law in 1989, the Supreme Court ruled 5 to 4 that burning an American flag in protest is a form of political speech protected under the First Amendment. Congress later passed a federal anti-flag-desecration law, and the high court invalidated it on the same grounds.

Ever since, lawmakers have debated whether flag burning is an unsavory cost of political freedom or something more akin to intolerable hate speech or monument defacement.

"All rights enshrined in the Constitution have certain limits," said Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.). "There is no such thing as unlimited rights. Although we treasure and value our right of free speech . . . we protect our national monuments," including the flag.

But Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) said Congress must "defend the right of all Americans to express their views about their government, however hateful or spiteful or disrespectful those views may be."

The proposed amendment said simply: "The Congress shall have power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag of the United States."

Before the final tally, the Senate voted 64 to 36 to reject an alternative measure designed to provide political cover for those who opposed Hatch's legislation. The measure -- a proposed statute, rather than constitutional amendment -- was offered by Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) and was strongly endorsed by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), a possible presidential candidate who has sought a middle ground in the flag-burning debate.

The proposal would have outlawed flag desecration if the perpetrators were also damaging federal property, trying to incite violence or trying to intimidate someone. Opponents called Durbin's measure a political fig leaf that the Supreme Court would rule unconstitutional.

Hours before the votes were taken, Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) thrust the issue into his reelection campaign. Noting that Democratic challenger James Webb had said he opposed the amendment, Allen's campaign issued a press release linking Webb to Sens. John F. Kerry and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, who voted against the amendment. The release said Webb is "totally beholden to the liberal Washington senators" who backed him in this month's primary.

Senate Rejects Flag Desecration Amendment (AP-Y2)

By Laurie Kellman

DOJ_NMG_0037247

AP2, June 27, 2006

A constitutional amendment to ban flag desecration died in a Senate cliffhanger Tuesday, a single vote short of the support needed to send it to the states for ratification and four months before voters elect a new Congress.

The 66-34 tally in favor of the amendment was one less than the two-thirds required. The House surpassed that threshold last year, 286-130.

The proposed amendment, sponsored by Sen. Orrin Hatch (news, bio, voting record), R-Utah, read: "The Congress shall have power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag of the United States."

It represented Congress' response to Supreme Court rulings in 1989 and 1990 that burning and other desecrations of the flag are protected as free speech by the First Amendment to the Constitution.

Senate supporters said the flag amounts to a national monument in cloth that represents freedom and the sacrifice of American troops.

"Countless men and women have died defending that flag," said Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., closing two days of debate. "It is but a small humble act for us to defend it."

Opponents said the amendment would violate the First Amendment right to free speech. And some Democrats complained that majority Republicans were exploiting people's patriotism for political advantage in the midterm elections.

"Our country's unique because our dissidents have a voice," said Sen. Daniel Inouye (news, bio, voting record), D-Hawaii, a World War II veteran who lost an arm in the war and was decorated with the Medal of Honor.

"While I take offense at disrespect to the flag," he said, "I nonetheless believe it is my continued duty as a veteran, as an American citizen, and as a United States senator to defend the constitutional right of protesters to use the flag in nonviolent speech."

Among possible presidential contenders in 2008, six voted yes: Democrat Evan Bayh of Indiana and Republicans George Allen of Virginia, Sam Brownback of Kansas, Frist, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, and John McCain of Arizona. Five, all Democrats, voted no: Joseph Biden of Delaware, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, Russell Feingold of Wisconsin, John Kerry of Massachusetts.

The Senate also rejected an alternative put forward by assistant Democratic leader Dick Durbin of Illinois. It would have made it against the law to damage the flag on federal land or with the intent of breaching the peace or intimidation. It also would have prohibited unapproved demonstrations at military funerals.

The last time the Senate considered the amendment, in 2000, it fell four votes short of what was needed. Both sides predicted rightly before Tuesday's vote that it would get more support.

The last proposed constitutional amendment that Congress sent to the states for ratification was the Equal Rights Amendment in 1972. The normal seven-year deadline for state ratification was extended to 1982, but the ERA couldn't muster the approval of more than 35 state legislatures, three short of the three-fourths of states required under the Constitution.

The 26th Amendment, guaranteeing 18-year-olds the right to vote, was approved by Congress in March 1971 and was ratified by the states less than four months later.

The 27th Amendment, ratified in 1992, was first proposed in 1789. It says pay raises that Congress votes for itself can't take effect until after the next election for members of the House.

The House also got into the July Fourth spirit Tuesday by passing on a voice vote a measure that would bar condominium and homeowner associations from restricting how the flag can be displayed.

Sponsored by Rep. Roscoe Bartlett (news, bio, voting record), R-Md., the resolution would prohibit those groups from preventing residents from displaying an American flag on their own property. The Senate is considering whether to bring up the measure this year.

Senate Nixes Old Glory Amendment (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, June 28, 2006

The Senate last night rejected a constitutional amendment that would allow Congress to ban flag desecration. The 66-34 tally fell one vote short of the two-thirds support necessary to send the measure to the states.

Just before the vote, the Senate also defeated, 36-64, a substitute amendment combining a statutory desecration ban and a bill that would prohibit demonstrations at military funerals.

DOJ_NMG_0037248

Invoking the American flag that flew over Iwo Jima during World War II and the one raised at the site of the World Trade Center after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said the stars and stripes inspire acts of heroism, courage and strength in the name of freedom.

"Destroying the very emblem of that freedom is just flat wrong," Frist said.

Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), like Frist a possible 2008 presidential candidate, argued that free expression is more important than a symbol of that freedom.

"America is not simply a nation of symbols; it is a nation of principles," Feingold said. "And the most important principle of all, the principle that has made this country a beacon of hope and inspiration for oppressed people throughout the world, is the right of free expression."

All but three Republicans, Sens. Mitch McConnell (Ky.), Bob Bennett (Utah) and Lincoln Chafee (R.I.), voted for the constitutional amendment, and 14 Democrats supported it. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and freshman Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.) voted for both proposals.

Amendment supporters, including sponsor Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), said a change to the Constitution is necessary because the courts have invalidated statutory flag-desecration bans. The amendment, they noted, would not actually prohibit flag desecration.

"Why wouldn't we want to restore power back to the people?" Hatch said.

California Democrat Sen. Dianne Feinstein took a similar tack.

"In honor of this emblem of America, I ask that this body permit us to give the American people the opportunity to decide if the Constitution should be amended," Feinstein said. "It is time to let the people decide."

Critics argued that few American flags are burned, that an amendment to the Constitution would be the wrong fix for such a problem and that the nation has more pressing business.

"I completely agree that flag burning is a contemptible act, calculated to outrage rather than persuade. But even if there was a nationwide epidemic of flag burning, it would not begin to rival the problems we have faced without amending the Bill of Rights," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.).

Proponents sought to draw a distinction between speech and physical acts.

"This amendment seeks to prevent the physical abuse of a symbol that has served our country in many valuable ways through its history," said Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.). "It does not do so by restricting anyone's speech, but by addressing their physical conduct."

Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.) brought a picture of singer Kid Rock to the floor of the Senate to argue that one man's act of patriotism is another man's act of desecration.

"Here he is, Kid Rock, with his head through the flag. Is that a desecration? It was such a desecration that he was invited to address the Republican convention, and they partied with him and they loved him," Lautenberg said.

The two sides bantered all day over the urgency and propriety of the amendment.

"The timing of this consideration, four months before the mid-term election, raises concerns, again, that the Constitution is being misused for partisan purposes," said Vermont Sen. Patrick Leahy, the leading Democrat on the Judiciary Committee. "That is wrong."

Even some who supported the amendment suggested it was not the most pressing business before the Senate.

"It's not a burning issue in the grand scheme of things" said Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.).

Not Quite The Banner Day One Might Have Hoped For (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

As the Senate's flag-desecration debate heated up yesterday and the sparks began to fly -- but before the smoke cleared -- the amendment's backers were asked a burning question: Is this the most important issue facing the nation?

The senators rushed to extinguish the very thought.

"I don't think anybody would say it's the most important," said Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.).

"No, no, not even close," said Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.), who, like Lott and 57 other senators, nevertheless signed on as a co-sponsor of the amendment.

"Ha, ha, ha," Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Tex.), another co-sponsor, replied, before disappearing through an unmarked doorway.

In fact, when the question was put to 19 Senate supporters of the amendment yesterday in the Capitol corridors off of the Senate chamber, only one -- amendment author Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) -- asserted that this was indeed the nation's No. 1 priority. And that was only after some serious goading.

So why is the Senate, which came within one vote of approving the amendment yesterday, giving the matter such prominence?

Backers of the flag amendment had planned to make the issue the highlight of their last week in town before the July 4 recess. But by midday yesterday, they were flagging. Originally planning to spend as many as four days of debate on the amendment, they decided to get rid of it before sunset. "This is the day we're dealing with it," Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) vowed as he made his way to the chamber.

Out on a lethargic Senate floor, both sides were struggling to find speakers to fill the time for debate. Starting at 11 a.m., the lawmakers killed time with five quorum calls as they hunted for somebody to take the floor; one quorum call ended only when the senators decided it was time for lunch.

After a two-hour party lunch, Republican senators went to the microphone to talk about national security, not flag security. By late afternoon, Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) gave up the flag talk entirely and gave a speech instead about a judicial nominee.

"It's not a burning issue," a wry Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) told The Hill newspaper's Jonathan Allen off the Senate floor. Smith, a backer of the amendment, betrayed no hint that his wordplay was intentional.

Nearby, Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.) was practically running from the debate. Would he take a question about flag burning? "Uh, no," he said. He paused to reconsider, then walked away briskly. "No, sorry," he reaffirmed.

If wrapping oneself in the flag were a form of desecration, senators on both sides of the issue would have been in some trouble yesterday. Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) called a midday news conference outside his office with two colleagues. They stood in front of three gold-trimmed flags, eagles atop each.

"The American flag represents everything this country stands for," Sen. Jim Bunning (R-Ky.) told the assembled. "I am ready to go on this amendment!"

But is this the most important issue facing the nation? Frist was uneasy. "You know, it's interesting, in terms of the question of why, why, why now," he began, then decided to rephrase the question. "Is it important?" he asked. "You bet it's important."

Fortunately for Frist, his Democratic counterpart was struggling on another flag-bedecked stage. "I think we have some misplaced priorities," Sen. Harry Reid (Nev.) said, condemning the amendment at a news conference. "I don't think it's the right time to bring up the issue." Reid seemed a bit sheepish as he acknowledged, "I'll vote for it."

So if he thinks bringing it up is such a bad idea, why is he voting for it? "I'm confident it won't pass," Reid explained.

Hatch alone seemed unburdened of doubt. "This sends a message to the [Supreme] Court like it's never been sent before!" he said. "In my opinion, there's nothing that would supersede this in importance."

Nobody would join Hatch in assigning the "most important" label.

"I know how y'all use those questions," said a suspicious George Allen (R-Va.).

"I'm not going to put it 'the most important,' " said Norm Coleman (R-Minn.).

"I wouldn't call it the most pressing," demurred John Cornyn (R-Tex.) How about top 10? "I can't give you a top 10," Cornyn again dodged.

Out on the floor, the debate was getting sloppy. Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), a supporter, displayed a poster of Iwo Jima. Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.), an opponent, countered with a poster of Kid Rock wearing a flag.

Was this any way to amend the Constitution? Hatch went to the floor to steel the chamber's resolve. "I was asked this afternoon by a large body of media: Is this the most important thing the Senate could be doing at this time?" he told his colleagues, answering the question, "I can tell you: You're darned right it is."

An hour later, Hatch fell a vote short of his goal. But there was no time to wallow: Oregon's Smith was already on the floor, hailing Oregon State University's college baseball World Series victory.

"Mr. President," Smith announced with an enthusiasm that eluded him during the flag-burning debate, "I stand before you a Beaver believer."

US Senate Turns Down Constitutional Ban On Flag Burning (AFP)

AFP, June 27, 2006

The Republican majority in the US Senate failed by just one vote Tuesday to amend the US Constitution to ban desecration of the American flag.

The motion, backed by 66 votes, fell one vote short of the two-thirds majority needed to pass a constitutional amendment. Thirty-four senators voted against it.

Backed by President George W. Bush, the measure had been promoted by the Republican majority as it tries to rally its conservative base ahead of key congressional elections in November.

DOJ_NMG_0037250

Opponents of the measure said flag burning is an expression of free speech that is guaranteed by the US Bill of Rights, and which must be protected.

But the leader of Senate Republicans, Bill Frist, said the vote was a defeat for the US flag itself and the patriotic American spirit it represents.

"'Old Glory' lost today," Frist said after the vote.

And like other supporters of the amendment, he said especially at a time of war, it was important to protect the flag as a symbol of freedom and national unity.

"At a time when our armed services are defending America's freedom in the war on terror, it's unfortunate that a minority of my colleagues blocked this amendment," he said.

The Republican leader also suggested that a future vote on a similar amendment could be in the offing.

"I hope the amendment's support in the Senate will continue to grow," he said. "In the meantime, I hope America rededicates itself to respecting the flag, our symbol of national unity, especially when our troops are wearing that flag as they risk their lives for this great country every day."

Votes on outlawing desecration of the flag have become a perennial feature of the Republican-led Congress, with each succeeding vote getting a little closer to passage.

The measure voted on Tuesday, a one sentence bill, read simply: "The Congress shall have the power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag of the United States."

Had the measure prevailed, the vote could have been an initial step in what would have been the first congressionally mandated change to the Constitution in 35 years.

In order to change the Constitution, at least 38 of 50 states would have to accept a proposed amendment within seven years of the congressional vote.

Over the past decade and a half, since the US Supreme Court ruled that flag desecration, including burning, was a protected form of speech, Congress repeatedly has attempted to approve a ban on flag desecration.

Those bills have been approved various times in the House of Representatives, only to go down in defeat in the Senate. The House most recently passed an effort to insert a flag burning ban into the Constitution last year.

Some lawmakers, including US Senator Hillary Clinton and the Senate's Deputy Democratic leader, Richard Durbin, took a middle ground on the measure, saying they are opposed to flag desecration, but also against revising the Constitution.

They co-authored a separate bill, which was also defeated Tuesday, which would have made flag desecration a crime, but without amending the Constitution.

Flag Amendment Fails In Senate (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

The Senate last night fell one vote shy of passing a constitutional amendment against flag burning, with supporters calling the vote a blow to the American flag.

"Old Glory lost today," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican. "Protecting the symbol of our nation's freedom is important, and I hope the amendment's support in the Senate will continue to grow."

The American Civil Liberties Union countered by calling the vote a "victory for the First Amendment."

Senators voted 66-34 in favor of the amendment, an increase of three lawmakers since the last Senate vote in March 2000 but short of the 67 needed. Senate leaders were not certain up to the last minute whether the measure would pass. They initially thought they would fall a vote short, but they hoped to persuade a final senator.

The amendment would have granted Congress the authority to write laws banning the physical desecration of the American flag.

Over two days of debate, supporters argued that the American flag must be protected because it "represents everything this country stands for," said Sen. Jim Bunning, Kentucky Republican.

They said the amendment would "send a message to the Supreme Court," which struck down state flag-protection laws in 1989 and a federal law intended to reverse that ruling.

"The Supreme Court should not be deciding difficult social issues," said Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican.

President Bush last night issued a statement saying that he thinks respect for the flag shows "reverence for the ideals that guide our nation."

"The American people deserve the opportunity to express their views on this important issue," he said.

Supporters noted that all 50 state legislatures have supported flag protection, and said the House of Representatives has passed such an amendment six times.

DOJ_NMG_0037251

Opponents agreed that desecrating the flag is "disgusting," "abhorrent" and "offensive," but said changing the Constitution would be a violation of free speech.

"I love the flag; we all love the flag and all that it represents," said Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, clutching a copy of the Constitution.

"While I agree that desecration of the flag is abhorrent, repugnant, amending the Constitution flies in the very face of the First Amendment right of freedom of speech," he said.

Burning a flag is "obscene, painful, unpatriotic," said Sen. Daniel K. Inouye, Hawaii Democrat and a World War II veteran. "But I believe Americans gave their lives in many wars to make sure that all Americans have the right to express themselves, even those who express painful thoughts."

Opponents of the amendment also argued that the concept of "desecration" was vague. They showed images of Mr. Bush using a marker to autograph a U.S. flag and of musician Kid Rock wearing a shirt made out of the flag.

They noted that only a few incidents of flag burning have occurred since the Supreme Court decision, and said the Senate has more important issues to debate before the weeklong Independence Day recess.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat, said Republicans had "turned the flag into a partisan political weapon."

However, 14 Democrats joined all but three of the chamber's 55 Republicans in favor of the amendment.

Meanwhile yesterday, the House unanimously passed by voice vote a bill that said condominium associations cannot prohibit residents from flying the American flag at their homes.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, praised his chamber's resolution, calling the flag the nation's "most vivid and sacred symbol of freedom."

Senate Rejects Flag Bill By 1 Vote (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate fell one vote short Tuesday of passing a constitutional amendment that would have allowed Congress to ban desecration of the U.S. flag.

Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, and other supporters vowed to try again next year, after a new Congress is elected in November. Since 1990, the measure has failed five times in the Senate to get the two-thirds vote needed to move to the states for ratification. The House of Representatives has approved the amendment seven times, most recently last year.

Hatch says the measure is needed to protect a symbol of freedom and counteract U.S. Supreme Court decisions in 1989 and 1990 that struck down state and federal laws. He cites polls showing public support and non-binding resolutions by 50 state legislatures endorsing the amendment.

“This is a setback, but it's not a final defeat,” he said. “For protecting the Stars and Stripes, I will not give up.”

Opponents said the measure would have curtailed First Amendment rights on speech for the first time since the Bill of Rights was adopted in 1791.

“While I take offense at disrespect to the flag,” said Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, “I nonetheless believe it is my continued duty as a veteran, as an American citizen and as a United States senator to defend the constitutional right of protesters to use the flag in non-violent speech.”

The amendment reads, “The Congress shall have power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag of the United States.” According to the pro-amendment Citizens Flag Alliance, there were four cases of flag desecration in 2006.

The vote came a week before Independence Day and about five months before the fall elections, prompting both sides to charge the other with playing election-year politics. It was the second time this month the Senate failed to pass a constitutional amendment. The other was a ban on gay marriage.

“The Constitution has survived yet another round of election-year politicking,” said Terri Ann Schroeder of the ACLU, which opposed the flag amendment.

Still, supporters were encouraged. In 2000, the Senate came up four votes short.

Senators also rejected a statute to ban flag desecration. The narrowly worded legislation would have made it a crime to desecrate the flag under certain circumstances, such as when trying to incite violence.

Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., called it a “reasonable alternative that would protect the flag without infringing on our Bill of Rights.” Hatch said the statute was an attempt by some “to cover their backsides.”

Senator Clinton And Liberals Split Over Flag Desecration (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 27 — Perhaps even more than her stance on the war in Iraq, it is Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's position on flag desecration that has drawn the scorn of the liberal Democratic base.

When Mrs. Clinton took a stand on the matter last year — co-sponsoring legislation that would have criminalized the desecration of the American flag even as she opposed a constitutional amendment that sought to achieve the same end — she was pilloried from the left. Editorial boards criticized her for political maneuvering, the political commentator Arianna Huffington attacked her for "stars, stripes and triangulation" and even some of her supporters quietly wondered why she had gone out on a limb on such a controversial issue.

On Tuesday, Mrs. Clinton played a leading role in the flag-burning debate once again, co-sponsoring a measure similar to her previous one as an alternative to the constitutional amendment that was about to come up for a vote in the Senate.

"Fortunately, we have an opportunity to protect our flag in a bipartisan and constitutional way," Mrs. Clinton said in her floor speech.

The measure, brought to the floor by Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois, failed, 64 to 36, minutes before the proposed amendment fell short of the 67 votes it needed.

With more than half of Democrats supporting the measure, the outcome suggested that Mrs. Clinton's approach had plenty of adherents within her party, and that while she might have tried the patience of her core liberal supporters, she remained within the Democratic fold as she prepared for a possible presidential race.

The divergent views of her position reflect a broader rift in the Democratic Party over whether the key to electoral success rests in winning over centrists or by drawing clear distinctions with Republicans by staking out unapologetically liberal positions.

"What's politically pragmatic isn't always what's pleasing to the left," said Steve McMahon, a Democratic consultant. "But pragmatism is what wins elections for Democrats."

Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts, gave Mrs. Clinton credit for trying to give Democrats a viable alternative to amending the Constitution to ban flag desecration.

"This is an effort to try to take into account the people on the left by narrowing" the proposal, Mr. Frank said. "I still disagree with it. But it's clearly a move away from the constitutional amendment, rather than toward it."

Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts and a former presidential nominee, voted for the measure, which closely resembled past efforts to pre-empt an amendment to the Constitution. Democrats who voted for the measure in effect bought themselves the right to claim that they had voted against flag desecration, potentially inoculating themselves against possible charges of lacking patriotism in a general election campaign. The broader measure to amend the Constitution failed by a single vote, 66 to 34.

Ms. Huffington was not mollified.

"It seems in line with her stance on so many issues — trying to strike right in the middle and triangulate, by not supporting the amendment because that would upset the base too much and at the same time supporting a legislative proposal that will appeal to the center," she said of Mrs. Clinton. "It's a truly tragic way of leading."

Arresting Prison Reform (LAT)

GOV. ARNOLD SCHWARZENEGGER'S collapse on prison reform is one of the most disappointing failures of his tenure. Soon after taking office in 2003, he embraced initiatives to reduce the inmate population. The extent of his retreat in the face of opposition from the guards union is evident in his new four-part plan for the prisons.

The centerpiece of the governor's plan is a bill by Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles) to build two prisons using lease revenue bonds, which are advantageous for politicians because they don't require voter approval. The downside is that they are horribly expensive, with higher interest rates than voter-approved bonds. The two prisons, which would cost at least $500 million each to build, could end up costing taxpayers a total of at least $2 billion.

The expense might be worth it if building new prisons were the solution to California's correctional problems. It is not, which is why voters refuse to back them. New prisons are much like new freeways, in that they don't do much to solve overcrowding problems — as soon as you build them, they fill up. Further, although overcrowding is a serious issue, the state's corrections system also is plagued by ineffective management and a dangerous shortage of guards; building more prisons alone would only exacerbate the latter two problems while doing little to solve the former.

The governor also wants to use lease revenue bonds to build "parole reentry facilities" — secure detention centers in communities where male inmates would be released and where those near the end of their sentences could be sent for mental health counseling and job training. It's a fine idea, though politically impractical — if there is a community in California that would welcome the construction of a small prison, we'd like to see it. The costs of these facilities are unknown, but the funding mechanism guarantees that they would be steep.

Equally problematic is the governor's proposal to shift 4,500 nonviolent female inmates to community rehab centers near their homes. This might work if there were enough existing centers to house the inmates or guards to staff them, but there aren't. That means building even more expensive mini-prisons in communities that don't want them.

The governor's plan does nothing to address the concerns of a federal judge investigating abuses of inmates by guards. It doesn't address the shortage of guards nor the management problems that make California's prisons a national embarrassment. Though ostensibly aimed at overcrowding, it doesn't even propose genuine solutions to that problem, such as reforms in sentencing laws and a major boost in rehabilitation programs. If the Legislature, which met in special session Tuesday night to discuss the governor's proposals, wants to set things right, a radical shift in approach is required.

Complain Without Fear (WP)

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

HAVING LAWS against workplace discrimination isn't much help if employees fear that they'll be punished for filing a claim. So from the start the federal employment discrimination law has offered protection against retaliation to workers who claim discrimination. What's been unclear, however, and a matter of disagreement among the lower federal courts, is precisely what treatment constitutes illegal retaliation. Specifically, is it limited to on-the-job activity or could it involve other actions outside the workplace? And if the retaliation occurs on the job, how serious must it be?

The Supreme Court resolved this issue last week in a decision that was remarkable for both its real-world sensibility and its unanimity. (All nine justices agreed that illegal retaliation had occurred in the case before the court, and all but one, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., agreed on a single standard to govern such cases.) The court found that illegal retaliation can take place on or off the job and that it applies to situations in which the employer's actions are "harmful to the point that they could well dissuade a reasonable worker from making or supporting a charge of discrimination." This is a sensible middle ground between extremes that had been adopted by some of the federal appeals courts that considered the issue.

The case involved Sheila White, a forklift operator and the only woman working in the "maintenance of way" department at Burlington Northern & Santa Fe Railway's Tennessee Yard in Memphis. Ms. White complained to officials that her immediate supervisor had repeatedly told her that women shouldn't be working in the department and had made insulting and inappropriate remarks to her.

While the supervisor was disciplined, Ms. White was transferred from forklift duty to the more onerous task of track laborer. In the course of a dispute over her new duties, Ms. White was suspended without pay for 37 days for insubordination. The company ultimately overturned the suspension and awarded Ms. White back pay for that period.

Writing for the eight-justice majority, Justice Stephen G. Breyer emphasized that "petty slights or minor annoyances" wouldn't rise to the level of retaliation, and that the conduct had to be objectively problematic -- enough to dissuade a "reasonable" employee. But as Justice Breyer wisely noted, "Context matters. . . . A change in an employee's work schedule may make little difference to many workers, but may matter enormously to a young mother with school age children."

Thus, in Ms. White's case, while both her forklift driving and her track-clearing duties fell within the same job description, as Justice Breyer wrote, "Common sense suggests that one good way to discourage an employee such as White from bringing discrimination charges would be to insist that she spend more time performing the more arduous duties and less time performing those that are easier or more agreeable."

Similarly, Ms. White's suspension without pay could have been unlawful retaliation even if she was eventually compensated for the time off. "Many reasonable employees would find a month without a paycheck to be a serious hardship," and take that into account before filing a complaint, Justice Breyer noted.

For a court sometimes characterized by ivory-tower jurisprudence, this ruling was a welcome instance of common-sense judging.

PSC Considers BellSouth-AT&T Merger (AP)

By Holbrook Mohr

AP, June 28, 2006

JACKSON, Miss. - A proposed merger between AT&T and BellSouth Corp. has no provisions that would immediately cut jobs in Mississippi, but some opponents fear smaller competitors here could suffer if they are not protected.

DOJ_NMG_0037254

The $67 billion plan met opposition during a hearing before the Mississippi Public Service Commission on Tuesday from a workers' union and telecommunication companies that are concerned the massive acquisition could lead to monopolization of the market.

The Mississippi commission, the Justice Department, the Federal Communications Commission and several other states would have to sign off on the deal, which was announced in March.

Those testifying on behalf of the two companies on Tuesday played down the competition between AT&T and BellSouth, saying the companies target different customers. However, in a February filing with the Security and Exchange Commission, BellSouth said one of its most significant local competitors is AT&T Corp.

Mike Walker, a BellSouth spokesman, told The Associated Press that the February filing is related to all the states where BellSouth operates.

"But specifically when you get to Mississippi, AT&T is not a local competitor for this state," Walker said.

Joseph Gillan, testifying on behalf of NuVox Communications and Time Warner Telecom Inc., asked the commission to put a cap on rates that BellSouth would be able to charge other companies for use of its network.

"The primary concern is that this is going to form a massive incumbent monopoly," Gillan told The Associated Press.

Nationwide, the plan would call for downsizing by about 10,000 employees over three years, said James Kahan, AT&T's senior executive vice president of corporate development.

BellSouth employs about 2,500 people in Mississippi and its subsidiary, Cingular Wireless, has about 1,500 employees in the state.

Kahan said there are "no plans to reduce force (and) no plans to close facilities" in Mississippi.

But he rejected requests by the Communications Workers Association to make retention of jobs a condition of the merger.

"We're not willing to commit to not reducing employees in Mississippi even though we don't have any plans," Kahan said. "Putting conditions on one company and not the others is not pro-competetive."

Paul Kimble, an attorney representing the Communication Workers Association, suggested that about half the savings AT&T was hoping for would come from cutting jobs.

Kahan responded that the larger proportion of the jobs that would be lost are management positions. He said some jobs would be cut initially but the hope is that the combined company would ultimately grow.

And he said most of the savings would come through reduced advertising costs and restructuring the companies' assets, including Atlanta-based Cingular Wireless. AT&T owns 60 percent of the company and BellSouth holds the remainder.

BellSouth President John McCullogh praised the plan.

"I'm excited about the merger, it's in the public interest," he said.

AT&T officials said the merger would bring new technology to Mississippi and help protect against the major communications failures the state experienced in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

Chris Rice, AT&T's executive vice president of network planning and engineering, testified that the telecommunication giant has invested millions in storm preparation.

BellSouth also needs to merge with AT&T for both companies to remain competitive in a global market, Kahan said.

The merger would also allow for more research and development by spreading the cost to more customers, Kahan testified.

A hearing was set for Tuesday in Tennessee.

McClatchy Closes Deal For Knight Ridder (AP)

By Seth Sutel, AP Business Writer

AP, June 28, 2006

McClatchy Closes Deal for Knight Ridder to Become Second-Largest Newspaper Publisher in U.S.

NEW YORK (AP) -- McClatchy Co. said Tuesday it had completed its acquisition of Knight Ridder Inc., making it the second-largest newspaper publisher in the country in terms of circulation.

The news came a day after Knight Ridder shareholders overwhelmingly approved the transaction in an emotional shareholders meeting in San Jose, Calif., where the company was based.

The company has received notice of regulatory approval for the deal on the condition that it completes its previously announced sale of the St. Paul Pioneer Press. McClatchy already owns the Star Tribune in neighboring Minneapolis, and owning both would have raised antitrust concerns.

McClatchy also announced Tuesday that it had completed the previously announced sales of four Knight Ridder newspapers: the Duluth News Tribune in Minnesota; the Grand Forks Herald in North Dakota; the Aberdeen American News in South Dakota; and the Ft. Wayne News-Sentinel in Indiana and a 75 percent interest in the Fort Wayne Joint Operating Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0037255

In all, McClatchy has reached deals to sell 12 of Knight Ridder's 32 papers, which it has said previously it wanted to sell largely because they did not fit McClatchy's criteria of being located in rapidly growing markets.

McClatchy plans to use the roughly $2.1 billion in proceeds from the divestitures to reduce debt taken on to complete the acquisition.

McClatchy already owned 12 newspapers, so with the 20 it is keeping from Knight Ridder it will now have 32. The company said Tuesday that it would have a combined circulation of 3.3 million.

As a result of the closing of the deal, Knight Ridder's stock will no longer be traded. Under the previously announced terms of the transaction, the shares will be converted into the right to receive $40 in cash and .5118 of a Class A McClatchy share.

In trading on the New York Stock Exchange Tuesday, Knight Ridder's shares ended down 62 cents at $60, while McClatchy's fell $1.42 to $39.03, making the deal worth $59.98 per share of Knight Ridder.

Knight Ridder's Chairman P. Anthony Ridder will join the board of McClatchy. Knight Ridder traced its roots back to 1892, when Ridder's great-grandfather Herman Ridder bought a German-language newspaper in New York.

McClatchy Completes Knight Ridder Purchase (MRKTWTCH)

By David B. Wilkerson, MarketWatch

MarketWatch, June 28, 2006

CHICAGO (MarketWatch) -- McClatchy Co. said after Tuesday's closing bell that it has completed its $6.5 billion purchase of fellow newspaper publisher Knight Ridder Inc.

The close came as expected after a legal formality in which McClatchy said it signed an agreement sought by the U.S. Department of Justice to sell the St. Paul, Minn., Pioneer Press, one of the 32 papers it bought from Knight Ridder.

The department's antitrust division earlier in the day filed a U.S. District Court suit and a proposed consent decree allowing the deal to go forward if McClatchy agreed to sell the Pioneer Press.

McClatchy, which owns the neighboring Minneapolis Star Tribune, previously had announced plans to sell the Pioneer Press to the Hearst Corp. to avoid potential antitrust problems.

McClatchy is selling 11 other Knight Ridder properties to reduce debt.

Following the close of the deal, Knight Ridder shares, which were converted into the right to receive $40 in cash and a fraction of a McClatchy share, will no longer be traded.

McClatchy said it also completed the sales of the Duluth News Tribune; the Grand Forks Herald; the Aberdeen American News; the Ft. Wayne News-Sentinel and a 75% interest in the Fort Wayne Joint Operating Agency.

Along with the proceeds of those sales, McClatchy said it borrowed $3.08 billion under a new bank credit facility to pay for the Knight Ridder purchase.

Last November, Knight Ridder put itself on the block after two of its biggest institutional shareholders demanded that the company pursue a sale to lift its stock price.

McClatchy shares closed Tuesday at $39.03, down $1.42 or 3.51%. David B. Wilkerson is a reporter for MarketWatch in Chicago.

Op-Ed: Are Employees' Statements Their Company's As Well? (LAW)

By Howard E. Heiss And Mark A. Racanelli, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, June 28, 2006

Recent federal case finds employee statements made during proffer sessions with the government can be attributed to employers

In a recent criminal case, the antitrust division of the Department of Justice took the position -- and a federal court agreed -- that statements employees make during proffer sessions with the government can be used against their employer at trial, even though the company was not a party to the proffer agreement and was represented by separate counsel.

The government argued that it was permitted to use employees' statements in this way because they are vicarious admissions by the company itself. As far as the government and the court were concerned in that case, the only facts that mattered were that the employee worked at the company at the time of the proffer and made statements about things he did as part of his job.

Whether an aberration or a sign of new thinking at the Justice Department, the case is a cautionary tale for defense lawyers representing companies whose employees have spoken to the government.

But the case also appears to rest on shaky legal ground. It is one thing to say that an employee speaks for the company when talking to coworkers, competitors or investors in a job-related setting. It is something else entirely when employees make statements in a prosecutor's office in an effort to avoid or deflect criminal liability for their business conduct, and when their interests might conflict with those of the company.

JUSTICE DEPARTMENT POSITION: PROFFER AS VICARIOUS ADMISSION

The case, United States v. Alaska Brokerage Int'l, Inc.,1 filed in January 2006 in the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Washington -- involves an indictment against a company (Alaska Brokerage) and its principal (David Karsch) for bid-rigging in the market for animal pelts sold at auction. Karsch, who was the sole employee and officer of Alaska Brokerage, submitted to an interview with the government in an attempt to avoid indictment.2 He signed a proffer agreement acknowledging that the government could "use your statements to impeach your testimony ... or to rebut evidence offered on your behalf."3 During the proffer, Karsch admitted that, on behalf of the company, he entered into agreements with competitors not to bid, or to bid at certain prices, for products at auction.

Alaska Brokerage had notified Karsch a week before the interview that it was terminating his employment, though the effective date of the termination was after the proffer.4 The company was not represented at Karsch's proffer and did not sign the proffer agreement.5

Before trial, prosecutors filed an in limine motion to permit them to use Karsch's proffer statements against the company. The government relied principally on Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(2)(D), which allows for the admission of statements by a party's agent (1) "concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment," and (2) "made during the existence of the relationship."

The Justice Department maintained that Karsch's statements met both criteria and, thus, should be deemed admissions of the company. The statements concerned a "matter within the scope" of Karsch's employment, the prosecutors argued, because they described actions he took on behalf of the company.6 Ignoring the fact that Karsch had been handed his termination papers at the time of the proffer, the government also took the position that his statements were "made during the existence of the relationship" because Karsch's firing had not yet become effective.7

According to the government, that Karsch's statements were attributable to Alaska Brokerage as corporate admissions also closed the books on any constitutional right the company had to confront him about the statements under Crawford v. Washington.8 As the government pointed out, "a criminal defendant's right to confrontation is ... limited to confronting 'witnesses' against him and does not include the right of a criminal defendant to confront his own admissions."9

The Justice Department gave no real consideration to the possibility that Karsch might have been looking after interests that diverged from, or conflicted with, those of his employer at the time of the proffer. To be sure, those concerns were mitigated in the unique circumstances of that case because Karsch was the sole employee and officer of Alaska Brokerage. But the company reasonably argued that there nonetheless was a conflict: Karsch had been told at the time of the interview that he was being fired, the government issued separate target letters to Karsch and the company, and the company, with its own counsel, was separately pursuing plea negotiations.

Moreover, there was no indication that the prosecutors intended to limit their theory to situations where the employee is the company's alter ego. Indeed, the government's papers drew no distinction between the use of proffer statements made by an employee in a one-person "mom and pop" or a Fortune 500 company. In the government's view, either could constitute a vicarious corporate admission.

In a two-page order, the district court agreed with the government that Karsch's proffer statements could be introduced against the company.10 Both Karsch and the company later pleaded guilty.

RULE 801(D)(2)(D)

The key to the Justice Department's position in Alaska Brokerage is its view of the scope of Rule 801(d)(2)(D). The test for determining whether a statement qualifies as a vicarious admission under that rule is well-established. First, an agency relationship must exist at the time of the statement. "The authority granted in the agency relationship need not include authority to make damaging statements, but simply the authority to take action about which the statements relate."11 Thus, courts have commonly found agency relationships based on the fact that an employee was hired to conduct an aspect of the company's business.12

Second, the statement must concern "a matter within the scope" of the declarant's employment. Statements made about matters beyond an employee's job responsibilities are not admissible under 801(d)(2)(D).13But statements arising out of an employee's official duties -- including, most typically, statements about a job while doing that job -- have been deemed vicarious admissions.14 An easy case would be a CEO's statements during an analyst conference call about the company's earnings.

BEYOND THE RULE'S LIMITS

The prosecutors in Alaska Brokerage stretched each of these elements of Rule 801(d)(2)(D) beyond recognized limits. With regard to the first prong, it is difficult to imagine how an employee can be said to be truly acting for the company when he or she is handed a termination notice a week before the proffer, regardless of whether as a matter of pure formality the person is still an employee during the interview. Courts have held that what is important is not whether the employee is technically still on the company's payroll, but whether the facts show that the employee is really speaking as an employee.

In Young v. Green Mgmt, Inc., for instance, the 7th Circuit refused to admit as an agency statement an employee's resignation letter which complained of discriminatory practices by the company. Although the employee still worked for the company when he sent the letter, the circumstances demonstrated the employee was really acting as the company's adversary; thus "the justification for Rule 801(d)(2)(D) does not exist because [the employee] was no longer 'inhibited by his relationship with the principal from making erroneous or underhanded comments which could harm the principal.'"15

The government's analysis of the second prong of the 801(d)(2)(D) test is also faulty. The prosecutors argued that an employee's description of something he or she did on the job -- no matter the circumstances in which the statement was made and to whom -- necessarily concerns "matters within the scope" of the employment. But that position strips of all meaning the setting of the employee's statement. And the setting is important.

There is a world of difference between statements made by an employee at an analyst conference call and statements made to a room full of federal agents and prosecutors intent on indicting the employee. It hardly follows that an employee is speaking for the company equally when explaining to the public why revenues will meet expectations and when trying to convince a prosecutor -- who may also be investigating other employees or the company itself -- not to press criminal charges.

Let's assume the government is conducting a criminal investigation of a company and its executives for accounting fraud, and prosecutors invite the chief accounting officer in for an interview. Also assume that that employee would say that she saw pervasive fraud at the company and that the CEO and the CFO were in on it. The potential conflict between the accounting officer's interests and those of the corporation is clear. Indeed, under these facts the witness would need separate counsel from the company. But the prosecutors in Alaska Brokerage would say that the employee's proffer statements could be used against the company as long as she was describing things that she saw, heard and did as part of her job.

We have found no case other than Alaska Brokerage where a court has ruled that the government can use an employee's statements made at a government interview against the company under Rule 801(d)(2)(D). Other authority suggests that the government's Alaska Brokerage argument would face an uphill battle at least in the 2nd Circuit.

In SEC v. Geon Indus., Inc.,16 the SEC brought a complaint against a number of defendants for insider trading, including the firm that employed a broker who traded on inside information. The broker invoked his Fifth Amendment rights at trial and the SEC offered against the brokerage firm the broker's testimony to the SEC during the investigation. No authorized representative of the firm was present for the SEC testimony. The district court refused to admit the broker's testimony as a vicarious admission under 801(d)(2)(D), and the 2nd Circuit affirmed.

Judge Henry J. Friendly, writing for the Court, focused on the conflict between the broker's interests and those of his firm as a basis for excluding the statement. The court noted that while the broker was still an employee of the firm at the time of his testimony, he had been placed on suspension. The SEC had not filed a complaint when the broker testified, and both he and the firm were "potential defendants." As the court explained, "it was clear that [the broker and the firm] might have conflicting positions" when the broker appeared before the SEC.17 The court held this conflict alone rendered the statements inadmissible as vicarious admissions, and there was no need to even analyze whether the statements fell within the scope of the broker's agency.18

CONCLUSION

While any attempt by the government to use an employee's proffer statement against a company is legally vulnerable, defense counsel -- whether for the corporation or an individual employee -- should be alert to this issue. Counsel for employees should not assume that proffer statements will not find their way into the government's trial arsenal. And counsel for corporations should be ready to prevent the government from introducing such statements as agency admissions.

Proposal Would Reduce Companies' Civil Damages (BLOOM)

By James Rowley, BLOOMBERG NEWS
Bloomberg News, June 28, 2006
Effort to rein in lawsuits would help Microsoft

A congressionally created commission is considering a proposal to let U.S. judges reduce the billions of dollars in civil damages that companies such as Microsoft Corp. would have to pay victims for thwarting competition.

In some cases, violators would be spared triple damages and only forced to reimburse consumers for actual financial losses.

A companion proposal would give the government a two-thirds share of triple damages and consumers the rest in criminal price-fixing conspiracies such as the government's prosecution of a global vitamin cartel led by Roche Holding AG and BASF AG.

The proposals are the latest effort to rein in suits against corporations and, if approved by the commission and sent to Congress, are sure to stir opposition.

Richard Grossman, a San Francisco lawyer who sued Microsoft on behalf of consumers, says it is vital to retain the threat of triple damages.

"If you rob a bank and you are only required when you are caught to return the money that you obtained in the bank robbery, then there is no economic incentive not to keep trying," he said.

The 12-member federal commission was created at the prodding of Rep. James Sensenbrenner, 63, a Wisconsin Republican who heads the House Judiciary Committee. The commission has asked for public comment on its proposals by July 10 and is due to send a package of recommendations to Congress by April.

Among the commission members is New York antitrust lawyer John Warden, 64, who headed Microsoft's defense team when the government successfully sued the world's largest software company. Federal courts ruled that the Redmond-based company illegally protected its monopoly for the Windows operating software that runs 95 percent of the world's personal computers.

The government's suit spawned 130 consumer class-action claims that Microsoft settled by agreeing to pay more than $2.2 billion, mostly in the form of rebates on future computer or software purchases. It also paid $4.66 billion to resolve competitors' suits, including $1.5 billion to Santa Clara, Calif.-based Sun Microsystems Inc., $850 million to Armonk, N.Y.-based International Business Machines Corp. and $750 million to Time Warner Inc., based in New York City.

The commission is "kind of an apology to Microsoft," said Lloyd Constantine, a plaintiff's attorney at Constantine Cannon in New York. "The deck was really stacked" through the appointments of Warden and Deborah Garza, the commission's chairwoman, a partner at the Fried, Frank law firm in Washington that also represents Microsoft, he said.

Warden defends the commission's work and said his role on the panel isn't representing Microsoft's interests. "I don't know why anyone would pick Microsoft as somebody who would be uniquely benefited" by the proposed changes, he said in an interview, adding that it is "ridiculous" to infer he was appointed to the panel to help Microsoft. "My views are my own," said Warden, a partner in the New York law firm of Sullivan & Cromwell.

Garza, 49, said that, while she did work for Microsoft, she wasn't involved in the government's antitrust case. "I don't talk to anyone at Microsoft about the commission's activity," Garza said. "I don't think that's why I am on the commission."

Microsoft spokesman Jack Evans said in an e-mail that "Microsoft neither lobbied Congress" to create the Antitrust Modernization Commission "nor advocated the appointment of any of its members."

Investor Group Snags Univision; Televisa Fumes (WSJ)

By Miriam Jordan, Dennis K. Berman And John Lyons

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

The chaotic auction of Spanish-language broadcaster Univision Communications Inc. has resulted in an equally tumultuous outcome.

Univision yesterday confirmed its planned sale to a consortium of private-equity investors who will pay $12.3 billion and assume $1.4 billion in debt. But in doing so, Los Angeles-based Univision appears to have further rankled an important business partner it had already been feuding with: Mexico's Grupo Televisa SA, the company that provides much of the popular programming that has made Univision the dominant Spanish-language TV network in the U.S.

Televisa, which already owns 11% of Univision, led a group that made a competing bid for Univision. For weeks, it was expected to win the deal, fulfilling Televisa Chief Executive Emilio Azcarraga Jean's dream of controlling the U.S. media asset. After losing the deal early yesterday, people close to Televisa complained bitterly that Univision and its controlling shareholder -- billionaire A. Jerrold Perenchio -- had ignored its bid, failing to discuss it even though the bid was very close in value to the winning offer.

A person in the Univision camp said that the auction was conducted on a level playing field, and that the board used its business judgment to secure what this person described as the best price and the only reliable offer.

In any event, the result is that Univision's relationship with Televisa -- already badly ruptured because of a series of disagreements over the past year -- may now grow even more difficult. Patching up the frayed partnership will likely be the first and most important item on the agenda of Univision's new owners.

The winning bid came from a private-equity group made up of Texas Pacific Group Inc., Thomas H. Lee Partners, Madison Dearborn Partners LLC, Providence Equity Partners Inc. and media mogul Haim Saban. The private-equity partners are contributing $900 million, with $250 million coming from Mr. Saban, and financing the remainder. The consortium didn't speak publicly about how it plans to operate Univision, which consists not just of the highly rated broadcast network, but also sister network TeleFutura, 73 radio stations and several record labels.

The acquiring group's winning bid of $36.25 per share came after an earlier offer of $35.50 was rejected. Televisa and partners Bain Capital and Cascade Investment late last week offered $35.75, but in a prepared statement Televisa said, "repeated offers to discuss all aspects of our proposal including price" were disregarded.

People close to Univision said the Televisa group was disorganized and that its offer was less desirable because of potentially messy regulatory obstacles involving foreign-ownership limits. As the auction approached its zenith late last week -- and the Televisa bid was jeopardized by various partners that pulled out -- Mr. Azcarraga flew to Germany to watch the Mexican soccer team's World Cup match on Saturday.

The Televisa spokesman called untrue the suggestion that the Televisa team was disorganized.

Televisa backers counter that the winning bidders have regulatory issues of their own, as some members are partial owners of other media assets, such as radio stations and newspapers, that could draw scrutiny. The winning deal includes a breakup fee of around $300 million.

Both offers were well below the $40 per share Mr. Perenchio initially sought when he put the company on the auction block in February. Nonetheless, the press-shy Mr. Perenchio in a written statement characterized it as a "blockbuster transaction." Mr. Perenchio himself stands to reap $1.4 billion in the transaction, a giant windfall from the $33 million he invested in the company 14 years ago.

This blockbuster immediately faces complex problems, however. Televisa said it has "a number of options it is considering." Those could include taking legal action against Univision, presenting a new bid or somehow moving its programming to new broadcasting venues. People close to the matter said the winning bidders left room in their final documents to bring Televisa into the deal, but Televisa was steadfastly opposed.

"We've made a decision, and we're not going to join the winning bidder. We're not going to bail that consortium out of the deal that it made," the Televisa spokesman said.

Univision and Televisa have a fractious history together. Mr. Azcarraga's grandfather, who got his start buying radio stations, started assembling the network of U.S. TV stations that eventually became Univision in the 1970s after being surprised by the almost total lack of Spanish-language programming in the states at the time. Mr. Azcarraga's father, a flamboyant man who went by the nickname El Tigre, was forced to sell the network in the late 1980s after a fight with U.S. regulators who charged that he was in violation of foreign-ownership limits of media companies.

But the Azcarraga family didn't give up easily. In 1992, Televisa teamed with Mr. Perenchio and Gustavo Cisneros to repurchase Univision. The deal was highly criticized by other potential bidders and in news reports as an attempt by the Azcarraga family to retake control of Univision using Mr. Perenchio as a front man to get around U.S. foreign-ownership limits. The structure of the deal was unusual: Mr. Perenchio got 75% control but put up less than 10% of capital to buy Univision. Mr. Perenchio always denied that he was a front man for the Azcarraga family.

The relationship between Mr. Perenchio and the Azcarraga family soured greatly after the death of El Tigre in 1999. Mr. Azcarraga, who inherited the company from his father, quit the board when Mr. Perenchio named one of his protégés, Ray Rodriguez, as president; Mr. Azcarraga wanted an independent search. Televisa is suing Univision over a programming contract that gives Univision exclusive rights to Televisa programming through 2017.

Mr. Rodriguez could become a further lightning rod if the acquiring group retains the current management of the company. People close to the acquiring group say it plans to meet with Univision's management over the next few months to learn about the company and the industry. The acquiring group expects the transaction to close in spring 2007 and will decide about management later.

Televisa and another foreign-owned program supplier, Venezuela's Venevision, both own stakes in Univision that together total 25% -- the maximum foreign ownership allowed under U.S. law. Both companies have board seats and voted against accepting the winning bid at Monday evening's Univision board meeting. The acquiring team needs shareholder approval of 60% for the deal, making it impossible for Televisa and Venevision to derail the deal on their own. Venevision dropped out of Televisa's bidding group last week; it's unclear how closely aligned the two company's interests are.

Credit Suisse Group, Deutsche Bank AG, Bank of America Corp. and Wachovia Corp.'s Wachovia Securities advised the bidding group, with legal advice from Weil Gotshal & Manges and Hogan & Hartson. UBS AG and Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom advised Univision.

Consortium Buys Univision For $12.3bn (FT)

By James Politi

Financial Times, June 28, 2006

A consortium of private equity groups on Tuesday agreed to buy Univision Communications, the US Spanish-language broadcasting company, for $12.3bn in cash, in a buy-out structured with an aggressive financing package and one of the biggest equity cheques on record.

The deal capped a five-month auction for Univision and was seen as a sign of the growth of the Hispanic media market in the US.

However, many of the biggest US media groups – such as Walt Disney and CBS – failed to play meaningful roles in the auction, leaving Mexico's Televisa and a handful of buy-out firms to battle it out in the final bidding.

The deal involves Texas Pacific Group, Thomas H. Lee Partners, Providence Equity Partners, Madison Dearborn Partners and Saban Capital paying $36.25 a share.

The equity portion is worth $3.85bn, making it one of the biggest, while the remaining $8.45bn will be financed by issuing debt valued at about 11.5 times earnings before interest, tax, depreciation and amortisation. This is one of the highest multiples in recent memory, aggressive even for a fast-growing company.

These terms highlight the growing ability of private equity groups to make big acquisitions but will raise questions about the prospects of the businesses they acquire to withstand the rise in interest rates and any downturn in the economic cycle.

Televisa, which was widely seen as the frontrunner to acquire Univision, last week lost an edge in the auction after some of its private equity partners, Carlyle, Blackstone and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, stepped away because of concerns about overpayment.

In the end, Televisa offered $35.75 a share, along with its remaining partners Bain Capital and Cascade, Bill Gates' investment vehicle.

Televisa on Tuesday criticised Univision's good faith in handling the auction. "Notwithstanding our repeated offers to discuss all aspects of our proposal including price, Univision and its advisers refused to enter into any discussions with us," Televisa said in a statement.

Although Televisa has a contract to supply Univision with some of its most valuable content until 2017, relations between the two companies have been sour for several years.

Televisa could still attempt a fresh bid for Univision but it would have to pay an additional break-up fee.

The Mexican group has also been considering a plan to launch its own Spanish-language network in the US to compete with Univision.

DOJ_NMG_0037261

This could involve an alliance with US broadcasters such as Paxson Communications, NBC's Telemundo unit, and McGraw Hill.

In morning trading, Univision shares, which had fallen recently over concerns that the auction would fail, rose 7 per cent to $34.30.

Credit Suisse, Deutsche Bank, Bank of America and Wachovia advised the consortium, along with lawyers at Weil Gotshal and Hogan & Hartson. UBS and Skadden Arps advised Univision.

Univision Agrees To Buyout Offer Of $12.3 Billion (WP)

By Alex Veiga

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

LOS ANGELES, June 27 -- Univision Communications Inc.'s board has agreed to sell the company, the nation's largest Spanish-language broadcaster, for $12.3 billion in cash to a consortium of investors, the parties involved in the sale announced Tuesday.

The figure agreed upon late Monday equals $36.25 a share, a 13 percent premium to Univision's closing stock price on Monday. The group of investors will also assume about $1.4 billion in debt.

The consortium, led by private equity firms Texas Pacific Group and Thomas H. Lee Partners LP, also includes Madison Dearborn Partners LLC, Providence Equity Partners Inc. and billionaire investor Haim Saban.

"Univision is truly a one-of-a-kind property," the acquiring group said in a written statement. "It is an outstanding media brand with exceptional positions in the fastest growing markets in the country, world-class assets, strong management, popular programming and unmatched ratings."

Grupo Televisa SA, a Mexican broadcaster that had led a rival consortium of investors, said it was disappointed with the outcome of the Univision auction.

Univision's bylaws allow Grupo Televisa, which owns an 11 percent stake in Univision and supplies it with much of its programming, to veto a sale of the company, but that could be defeated by a 60 percent approval from Univision shareholders.

The consortium led by the Texas Pacific Group initially bid $35.50 a share, or just under $11 billion, last week. But Univision, which had reportedly been seeking an offer of $40 a share, rejected it.

The investor group's offer remained on the table until Friday, when it expired. Both sides talked over the weekend and came to terms, a person familiar with the deal told the Associated Press.

The deal, if approved by Univision shareholders and regulators, is expected to close in the fourth quarter of this year or first quarter of 2007, according to a news release on the sale.

Univision dominates the U.S. Hispanic media market through its three television networks (Univision, TeleFutura and Galavision), more than two dozen television stations, a recorded music division, an Internet portal and Spanish-language radio stations.

Univision Accepts $12.3B Cash Offer (USAT)

By David Lieberman And Laura Petrecca

USA Today, June 28, 2006

NEW YORK — A consortium of private investors including Mighty Morphin Power Rangers producer Haim Saban is set to become the USA's top Spanish-language broadcaster after Univision agreed Tuesday to accept its $12.3 billion cash offer.

The $36.25-a-share deal with Madison Dearborn Partners, Providence Equity Partners, Texas Pacific Group, Thomas H. Lee Partners and Saban Capital Group sent shares soaring 6.2% to $34.

"The outstanding cash flow multiple our shareholders will receive reflects the extraordinary growth of the Hispanic population, Univision's unique bond with its community and our ability to deliver tremendous audiences to our mainstream advertising partners," Univision CEO A. Jerrold Perenchio said in a statement.

In addition to the Univision network, the company includes broadcast network TeleFutura, cable network Galavision, 62 TV stations in the USA and Puerto Rico, Univision Radio, Univision Music Group and Univision Online.

But the deal left a sour taste with rival bidder Mexico-based Grupo Televisa, which supplies most of Univision's prime-time programming and holds an 11.4% stake.

"Notwithstanding our repeated offers to discuss all aspects of our proposal, including price, Univision and its advisers refused to enter into any discussions with us after we submitted our initial bid," the company said in a statement. It said it will "vigorously pursue" ways "to build its potential in the growing U.S. Hispanic marketplace."

It's unclear what options Televisa has. Federal law bars foreign companies from owning more than a 25% stake in TV stations. To have big U.S. impact, Televisa "can't be on cable, since many Hispanic Americans don't have cable," says Sanders

Morris Harris analyst David Miller. What's more, Univision has a long-term deal that enables it to cherry-pick Televisa's programming. As a result, Miller says, Televisa will be "left with all this junky material that they're going to use to start a new network? No way."

Still, some analysts question whether Univision's buyers can make the big investment pay off.

"Spanish-language broadcast is not immune to the migration of ad dollars from broadcast to the Internet," says Guzman & Co.'s Philip Remek. "While Univision's revenues have continued to grow, the growth rate has really slowed in the last year and a half. I don't expect it to re-accelerate."

Univision's net income fell 26.9% in 2005, to $187 million, on revenue of nearly $2 billion, up 9.3%.

While advertisers are keen to reach the fast-growing Latino population, Univision has struggled to convince Madison Avenue that it appeals to young Latinos, including second-generation immigrants who are comfortable with English.

Judge Clears Way For Adelphia Sale (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

A bankruptcy judge granted permission to Adelphia Communications Corp. to sell its assets to Time Warner Inc. and Comcast Corp. in deal estimated to net about $17 billion.

Judge Robert Gerber of the Southern District of New York said he would approve an order to be submitted later Tuesday that would detach the asset sale from the rest of the company's bankruptcy process. Adelphia sought the separation to bypass creditor disputes that have slowed the company in its filing of a final reorganization plan.

The sale agreement with Time Warner and Comcast had been put in jeopardy because of a July 31 deadline at which the buyers could end their offer. Once complete, it would secure their status as the two biggest cable operators in the nation.

In its motion, filed late last month, Adelphia had said, "Time is running out."

"The sale represents an extraordinary achievement for the debtors, as it includes a substantial control premium, and it promises to translate into significant recoveries for all the debtor's principal stakeholders," the filing read.

Adelphia remains in bankruptcy protection and last week filed an amended version of its restructuring plan. The company, the country's fifth-largest cable operator, filed for bankruptcy protection four years ago, on June 25, 2002.

The acquisition strengthens Time Warner's positions in New York, Texas, California, Ohio and the Carolinas. Comcast boosts its presence in Pennsylvania, Washington, D.C., Florida and Massachusetts.

Comcast is expected to end up with over 23 million subscribers, up from its current 21.7 million, while Time Warner would have a total of over 14 million, up from 11 million. Comcast and Time Warner also would swap certain cable systems to consolidate market positions.

Citizens Banking Buys Midwest Rival For About $1 Billion (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal News Roundup

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

DETROIT -- Citizens Banking Corp. agreed to buy Republic Bancorp Inc. for about $1.05 billion in cash and stock to form a Midwestern regional bank called Citizens Republic Bancorp.

The combined bank would be the 45th-largest headquartered in the U.S., with assets of $13.9 billion and $8.6 billion in deposits, the two Michigan banks said.

Citizens, based in Flint, Mich., expects the purchase to add to earnings per share in 2007, and result in $28 million of annual cost savings by 2008.

In 4 p.m. Nasdaq Stock Market trading yesterday Citizens' shares were down $2.37, or 8.8%, to $24.66, while Republic's shares were up $1.88, or 18%, to $12.45.

Citizens Chief Executive William R. Hartman will be chief executive of the combined company, while Jerry D. Campbell, chairman and founder of Republic, will serve as chairman.

The terms value Republic, based in Owosso, Mich., at $13.86 a share. Shareholders will receive the equivalent of 0.4378 of a Citizens share plus $2.08 in cash for each of their shares. Of the purchase price, 85% will be paid in stock.

The combined bank will operate 275 branches and loan offices in Michigan, Wisconsin, Ohio, Indiana and Iowa.

The companies said they expect to close the deal in the fourth quarter.

Steeled For Growth (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

It finally looks as though Mittal Steel will win its bid for Arcelor. Shareholders still have to reject, this Friday, the merger with Russian steelmaker Severstal that Arcelor management tabled when trying to elude Mittal's grasp -- and then approve the new tie-up with Mittal. So anything can happen. But it's been clear for some time now that something, in the way of consolidation, was due to happen, and not only at the top of this industry.

Assuming the Arcelor-Mittal marriage goes through, it will have far-reaching consequences for the global steel industry. The new company would produce approximately 10% of world-wide output. Its nearest rival would be Nippon Steel, with less than 3% of the market. To gauge the importance of the deal, consider that the nine biggest steelmakers after Arcelor-Mittal would account for just above 20% of the world's supply. The new company is slated to be a giant with production well in excess of 100 million tons per annum -- almost equivalent to the combined U.S. and Canadian output. It will have 60 plants in 27 countries.

It is clear that the global steel industry will remain fragmented even after the Mittal-Arcelor merger goes through. More consolidation is inevitable. Other steelmakers will be frantically looking for partners to counter the new grouping. Moreover, the merged entity will probably maintain its passion for acquisitions.

Consolidation in the future will be more internationally focused. Outside of Arcelor and Mittal, most steelmakers have sought to acquire other firms in their domestic or regional markets. Significant rationalization of the U.S. sector has already taken place -- mainly by Nucor and U.S. Steel. More could follow if Mittal is required to sell off some of its U.S. assets to satisfy antitrust authorities after the new deal.

In Europe, Arcelor was formed by the union of the main steel producers in France, Spain and the Benelux countries. After its privatization, British Steel merged with Dutch company Hoogovens to form Corus in a cross-border deal. Nevertheless, there is room for much more consolidation within Europe.

We should not be surprised if Russian steelmakers play a leading role in steel rationalization on the Continent. Severstal made a bold attempt to join up with Arcelor. Evraz Holding has recently obtained a new large minority shareholder in Roman Abramovich. This cash infusion could spark new deals. Russian enterprises already have steel assets in the U.S., and Eastern and Western Europe.

So far, consolidation in Asia has been sparse. A few years ago, JFE in Japan was formed by the merger of NKK and Kawasaki. There is now the prospect of more deals in that country. Moreover, at the very least we can expect closer cooperation between major producers in Japan, South Korea and Taiwan in the near future.

The rationalization of the Chinese steel industry -- which already produces 30% of world output -- is progressing. Larger companies are merging with smaller ones within their geographic area. This will intensify, particularly since limits on foreign ownership will delay any significant cross-border activity in China. In India, we have seen few moves toward consolidation, a situation that is unlikely to change anytime soon. However, in Latin America, two groups have emerged in the last 12 months: Ternium and Arcelor Brazil. These regional powers are likely to expand in the future.

And why wouldn't large steelmakers go shopping? The prospects for the industry are now better than they have been for a quarter-century. Five years ago the value of world steel production was $280 billion. This year the figure will be close to $1 trillion. In 2002, the MEPS average world steel price for hot rolled coil (the benchmark product) was $230 per ton. It peaked in January 2005 at $653 per ton and, after dropping to $493 in July 2005, is now moving back toward that level.

Part of this increase in value is attributable to an increase in demand. At the start of this decade, global output of crude steel was 848 million tons. This year, the figure will be more than 40% higher: 1.2 billion tons and rising. Demand and production are growing fast in the developing nations as their industries pick up steam and spending on infrastructure and housing soars. Raw material supply is expected to remain tight because investments in new mines take several years to come onstream. This should obviate any serious oversupply in the market over the next few years. * * *

One question being asked is, What will be the impact of the Mittal-Arcelor merger on steel buyers? The proposed link-up of the two majors creates little increase in the concentration of supply to most large consuming sectors. This is because the two enterprises have minimal overlap in the markets they supply. As such, the market power of the new entity would not increase significantly and the impact on prices is likely to be relatively modest.

This feature has been reinforced in both the U.S. and Europe by the fact that a consolidated industry is much more capable of reducing output when the need arises. As inventories in the market start to expand and oversupply begins to develop, the mills are better able to respond quickly by curtailing supplies. This happened in many parts of the world, including Russia and China, when the market turned down last year.

Even with consolidation, cheap steel is a thing of the past. Raw material costs are unlikely to drop significantly in the near term. Energy costs are expected to remain high. Demand from the developing nations of the world will, almost certainly, continue to rise. But higher input costs have not damaged the steel companies. The industry is more profitable now than ever. The limited consolidation so far has been beneficial. Further rationalization can only help.

EU May Fine Microsoft €2 Million A Day (IDG)

By Paul Meller, IDG News Service

IDG News Service, June 28, 2006

The European Commission is about to propose a new fine of up to €460 million ($577 million) against Microsoft for failing to honor the antitrust ruling imposed on the company in 2004, according to people close to the case Tuesday.

The Commission ruled two years ago that Microsoft was abusing its dominant position in the market by denying competitors access to documentation about its Windows operating system.

The imminent threat of a fine comes as Microsoft continues to submit new information to the regulator, with the aim of complying with the ruling. The final instalment of documentation is due on July 18 -- a deadline Microsoft said it agreed with the monitoring trustee in charge of overseeing Microsoft's compliance with the ruling, Neil Barrett.

On Monday the Commission, Europe's top antitrust regulator, will propose a new negative ruling and a new fine against Microsoft to national competition regulators from the 25 countries in the European Union, the people close to the case said.

A final decision could be taken by the Commission as soon as July 12, if the national regulators support the Commission's draft ruling.

Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd declined to comment on the content of the draft decision but confirmed that it was imminent.

"We have said for some time we would decide whether or not to impose daily fines on Microsoft before the end of this month," he said.

If the Commission sets the fine at €2 million a day, as it has threatened to in recent months, the fine would reach €460 million by July 18, the date Microsoft submits the final instalment. The calculation counts all seven days of the week and dates back to December 15 when the Commission found Microsoft in breach of its 2004 antitrust ruling,

This would be nearly as much as the record €497 million fine the Commission imposed on Microsoft in the first place.

"Any fine would be unjustified and unnecessary," said Horacio Gutierrez, associate general counsel of Microsoft Europe in a statement Tuesday.

"The Commission's process calls for an advisory committee meeting, so this comes as no surprise," Gutierrez said.

But he added that Microsoft has committed "massive resources" to providing the technical documentation required in the 2004 ruling.

Microsoft "has already delivered five of seven instalments of technical documentation developed to the agreed specification and according to the agreed work plan," Gutierrez said.

The sixth is due at the end of this month and the final submission will be handed over on July 18, he said.

"Microsoft is working hard to also meet those deadlines," Gutierrez said.

Microsoft could be fined even if the seven instalments of documentation do satisfy the regulator, one person close to the case said. "Even if they change their ways in the future that doesn't get them off the hook for the period starting last December," the person said.

Cartels Face Bigger Fines From Brussels (FT)

By Tobias Buck

Financial Times, June 28, 2006

A huge increase in fines for companies that operate cartels or break European Union competition law will be announced on Wednesday by the European Commission.

Brussels has already imposed some of the toughest fines in recent history, including a record €497m ($626m, £350m) penalty against Microsoft in 2004 and one of €462m against Roche in 2001. Over the past few months the Brussels regulator has again ratcheted up the fines, especially in cartel cases.

Officials believe that only higher fines will deter companies from operating price-fixing cartels or abusing dominant market positions.

They are particularly keen to increase the fines for repeat offenders and large groups with significant financial fire-power.

The new guidelines, which have been seen by the Financial Times, reflect the Commission's belief that the rules are too rigid and lack transparency – a view shared by many competition lawyers and most companies targeted by the Brussels trust-busters.

The new regime will apply to all companies found guilty of participating in a cartel or that abuse their dominant market position. It will almost certainly mean that more companies will be fined the maximum amount allowed under EU law, which is 10 per cent of global annual turnover. Up to now, only a handful of companies have been punished that severely.

The new regime will be especially tough on repeat offenders. At present, fines are usually raised by 50 per cent for companies that have previous convictions for antitrust abuses. Now the Commission can double the punishment in cases where there is one earlier ruling against the group, and may go even higher for "multi-recidivists".

Companies will in future be treated as repeat offenders by the Commission if they have previously been convicted by national competition authorities.

Fines will be calculated by fixing a basic amount – up to 30 per cent of a company's sales of the relevant product in the market where the abuse has taken place – and then multiplying it by the number of years during which the abuse continued. To this may be added an "entrance fee", equivalent to 15-25 per cent of the company's yearly sales of the product in question.

"The mere fact that a company enters into a cartel will cost it at least 15-25 per cent of its yearly turnover," the Commission paper says.

Stephen Kinsella, a Brussels-based partner at law firm Sidley Austin, said changes to the current fining practices would be welcome, especially if they introduced greater predictability and transparency. "At present it is almost impossible to foresee whether a company will be fined €25m or €100m. Greater clarity would also help the Commission, because it would be harder for companies to challenge the fines in court."

The Commission declined to comment. However, Neelie Kroes, the competition commissioner, has made clear in her most recent rulings against cartels that she is keen to intensify the crackdown on abusive companies.

She said earlier this month that she was "shocked" that chemicals groups such as ICI had broken cartel rules repeatedly.

EU Beefs Up Fines On Antitrust Activity (WSJ)

By Mary Jacoby And Adam Cohen

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

BRUSSELS -- European Union regulators will announce new guidelines today to increase fines for antitrust violations, aiming to more severely punish repeat offenders, cartel ringleaders and companies whose deep pockets can cushion them from the impact of fines.

The changes to the 1998 guidelines will be most relevant to price-fixing cases because such investigations most often lead to fines, according to two European Commission officials. They can also be used to increase financial penalties for companies found to have illegally used monopoly power to elbow rivals out of a market.

If the new guidelines had been in effect in 2004, one official said, a €497 million ($625.3 million) fine to Microsoft Corp. would have been much larger. Microsoft was fined for using its dominant Windows computer-operating system to shut out competition in related software markets. Although the Microsoft fine was the largest ever leveled by the commission, it was much less than the $3 billion that the Redmond, Wash., company paid to various rivals to settle antitrust lawsuits against it in the U.S. EU officials see that disparity as evidence that their fine wasn't big enough to have a deterrent effect.

In separate deliberations, antitrust authorities from the EU's 25 member states will meet in Brussels Monday and again July 10 to review EU Antitrust Commissioner Neelie Kroes's proposal to impose additional fines on Microsoft. Ms. Kroes has concluded that Microsoft hasn't moved quickly enough to comply with the commission's 2004 orders to change its business practices, people familiar with the case said.

A second EU fine against Microsoft could total more than €400 million. Ms. Kroes hopes to obtain approval for a fine from the full European Commission in a July 12 meeting, EU officials said.

Horacio Gutierrez, Microsoft's associate general counsel for Europe, said the company has put "massive resources" into helping competitors make Windows-compatible software, as the EU has ordered. "Any fine would be unjustified and unnecessary," he said in a statement.

The guidelines to be announced today, however, will not affect the current Microsoft matter. That is because the new guidelines won't take effect for several months and also because they won't apply to the more narrow question of how to punish a company for flouting EU orders.

Under current EU rules, the most serious antitrust offenses are punished with at least a €20 million fine and up to a maximum of 10% of annual global sales. The new guidelines will give regulators more flexibility to lighten fines on smaller companies that might otherwise go out of business if forced to pay €20 million, while increasing fines on big multinational companies for which only a very large fine would act as a deterrent.

Fines will now be calculated as a percentage of a company's sales -- up to 30% -- in whatever market regulators find was illegally manipulated. The fines will increase for each year anticompetitive behavior took place, and repeat offenders will see steep increases in penalties.

Previously the amount of any fine was set by regulators according to how serious they judged the illegal activity.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Calls Grow Louder In Congress To Revamp US Energy Policy (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, June 28, 2006

Everybody, it seems, is scrambling to remake America's energy policy - proposing ways to reduce US dependence on foreign oil while addressing the environmental aspects of energy production, distribution, and use.

Lawmakers on Capitol Hill, touting a raft of proposals, have declared this to be "energy week." Governors around the country have entered the fray, some with suits against the government for energy-related pollution. The Nuclear Regulatory Commission has just approved what will be the first license for a commercial nuclear facility in 30 years.

But the real push for revamping energy policy - just a year after the US enacted its first major energy bill in more than a decade - is coming from the grass-roots and lobbyists. Citizen groups and special interests are pushing for solutions as fuel prices remain high and turmoil continues in oil-rich parts of the world.

"There's tremendous pressure to do something," says Sierra Club energy specialist Melinda Pierce.

In all, 477 energy-related bills have been introduced in this Congress, according to a New York Times report. But many of those proposals involve increasing domestic energy production rather than the conservation and renewables that environmentalists prefer.

For example: The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee this week is hearing testimony on oil and gas drilling in the Rocky Mountain region and on the permitting process for new refineries.

In the House of Representatives, legislation lifting the 25-year moratorium on off-shore drilling passed the resources committee 29-9 last week, and is expected to face a full House vote Thursday.

"Studies indicate that natural gas from the Outer Continental Shelf [OCS] could provide the US with about 25 years of natural gas supply," says Bob Slaughter, president of the National Petrochemical & Refiners Association.

Environmentalists say the industry already has access to most OCS gas resources. They warn of erosion of state jurisdiction and pollution disasters.

"We're going to do everything we can to stop it," says Ms. Pierce of the Sierra Club.

Other legislation is meant to fill in the blanks or change certain features of the heavily compromised bill enacted last year.

The recently proposed bipartisan "Enhanced Energy Security Act" would speed up the development of new vehicle technologies such as plug-in hybrids; provide loan guarantees and grants to auto and parts manufacturers converting to fuel-efficient vehicles; increase funding for gas stations that sell alternatives such as E85 (which is 85 percent ethanol and 15 percent gasoline); and provide incentives for production of cellulosic ethanol, which is made from agricultural plant waste, sawdust, switch grass, and other substances, rather than corn or other grains.

Other lawmakers are pushing a different kind of energy future.

Sen. John Kerry (D) of Massachusetts outlined in Boston Monday what he called "the three big steps that are imperative to addressing global warming and transitioning to dependence on homegrown sources of energy."

Mr. Kerry's plan includes freezing greenhouse gas emissions in 2010, then reducing those to 65 percent below 2000 levels by 2050; mandatory reductions in US oil consumption by 2.5 million barrels a day by 2015 (the amount currently imported from the Persian Gulf); and "immediately" expanding the production of renewable vehicle fuel.

In the states, some governors are coming up with their own plans, banding together to promote more energy conservation and efficiency than the federal government requires. In the West especially, governors of both parties are pushing wind energy.

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission has granted a license for construction of the $1.5 billion enriched uranium manufacturing facility. It "will mean ... the renaissance of nuclear energy in this country," says Sen. Pete Domenici (R) of New Mexico.

Even the US Supreme Court has jumped on the issue, agreeing this week to consider a case involving greenhouse gases (most of which come from motor vehicles and power plants).

In a way, the story is not new. "As national policy obsessions go, America's oil dependence has been one of our most enduring," Jason Grumet, executive director of the National Commission on Energy Policy, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last month.

How many of those 477 energy-related bills introduced in this Congress get serious consideration is another matter.

"Time is running out in this Congress to take action on energy," Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D) of New Mexico said in introducing the Enhanced Energy Security Act. The summer break looms, then campaigning for the November election.

Ending Energy Dependence (WT)

By Richard W. Pombo

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

When the House of Representatives votes tomorrow on the bipartisan Domestic Ocean Energy Resources (DOER) Act, it will be considering one of the nation's most meaningful energy-policy reforms in history.

Decades of "just say 'no'" energy policy has turned America into a country too dependent on foreign, and often unstable, sources of energy. We send $300 billion a year overseas for energy we can produce at home, a figure that represents one-third of the current trade deficit. We have lost millions of manufacturing jobs over the past two decades because of high energy prices. We should be investing that $300 billion in America to create our own good jobs and provide our own energy security.

The DOER Act does just that. America is the only developed nation that forbids safe energy production on its Outer Continental Shelf (OCS), a fact that puts us at an economic and strategic disadvantage with other countries in a highly competitive global economy.

It just doesn't make any sense.

The DOER Act represents a balanced, commonsense compromise to deliver desperately needed energy supplies to the American people, which in turn will lower prices for consumer wallets and create hundreds of thousands of family-wage jobs. It will spur production of an untapped energy resource and correct federal government policies that have led to our dangerous dependence on foreign energy. And, just as importantly, it champions states' rights by protecting those not interested in producing energy off their shores.

Currently, two federal moratoria prevent energy production beyond state waters or three miles from the coastline, neither of which have the force of permanent law. Many have called for the complete repeal of the moratoria for full access to available resources, of which there are plenty. According to the U.S. Minerals Management Service, America's OCS contains 420 trillion cubic feet of natural gas (America consumes 23 trillion cubic feet per year) and 86 billion barrels of oil (America imports 4.5 billion barrels per year).

But that would leave coastal states without any power over their coastlines beyond three miles, a possibility unacceptable to many states.

Under the DOER Act, states like California and Florida would have the authority to ban energy production up to 100 miles off their shores. States that choose to allow production, however, would benefit from increased revenue from energy royalties -- some of which would also be routed to three separate funds for environmental protection and enhancement, renewable energy development, job training and research. Meanwhile, domestic energy production would be allowed in the deep waters beyond 100 miles.

This innovative and bipartisan compromise -- the result of work between Reps. Neil Abercrombie, Hawaii Democrat; Bobby Jindal, Louisiana Republican; Charlie Melancon, Louisiana Democrat and John Peterson, Pennsylvania Republican -- passed the House Resources Committee with 29-9 support. Labor unions, which appreciate how many jobs the bill would create, fully support it.

Nonetheless, special-interest groups will go to great lengths to block its passage, conjuring images of massive oil spills to scare up opposition. This is pure bunk. Today's advanced ocean energy exploration technologies were given the ultimate test last summer when hurricanes Katrina and Rita roared through nearly 3,000 offshore platforms in the Gulf of Mexico.

Despite the typical fearmongering of so-called environmental groups, no major spills were reported during one of America's worst natural disasters. In fact, according to a National Academies report, 63 percent of the petroleum found in North American waters comes from natural seeps through the ocean floor.

The bottom line is that our domestic energy policy has long stimulated jobs and economies overseas, but not at home. Enough is enough. It's time to put Americans to work for American energy.

Rep. Richard W. Pombo, California Republican, is Chairman of the House Resources Committee.

An Outdated Ban (WP)

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

FOR THE PAST quarter of a century, the federal government has banned oil and gas drilling in most U.S. coastal waters. Efforts to relax the ban have been repelled on environmental grounds, but it is time to revisit this policy. Canada and Norway, two countries that care about the environment, have allowed offshore drilling for years and do not regret it. Offshore oil rigs in the western Gulf of Mexico, one of the exceptions to the ban imposed by Congress, endured Hurricane Katrina without spills. The industry's safety record is impressive, and it's even possible that the drilling ban increases the danger of oil spills in coastal waters: Less local drilling means more incoming traffic from oil tankers, which by some reckonings are riskier. Although balancing energy needs with the environment is always hard, the prohibition on offshore extraction cannot be justified.

The House of Representatives is about to vote on this question, probably tomorrow. A bipartisan bill would maintain a ban on drilling within 50 miles of the shoreline and allow states to extend that to 100 miles. But it would lift the congressional restriction on drilling beyond that perimeter. This compromise would give states that are unwilling to countenance the perceived environmental risks a reasonable measure of control over their coasts. But it would also open the way to more drilling.

The economic benefit of that drilling would be especially pronounced if it were aimed at natural gas extraction. Despite all the rhetoric about energy independence, it doesn't make much difference whether the United States gets its oil from its own coastal waters or whether it buys it on world markets. There is one global price for oil; producing more from U.S. waters will bring down that global price, benefiting all consuming countries rather than just U.S. consumers. But natural gas is traded globally only in small quantities, in liquefied form; nearly all of the gas consumed in the United States is produced domestically or in Canada. So producing more natural gas in U.S. coastal waters would bring down U.S. natural gas prices rather than world prices. Because natural gas is much cleaner than its main alternative, coal, this would have environmental as well as economic benefits.

Unfortunately, the House legislation is flawed. It diverts billions of dollars' worth of oil and gas royalties from the federal government to the states, even though the waters from which the resources will come are federal. The states nearest to the oil rigs may feel they carry most of the perceived environmental risks, and some sharing of revenue may be justified to bring them along, but the House bill leans too far in that direction. We hope the bill passes tomorrow, but we also hope this flaw is fixed before it becomes law.

Domenici Offers Nuclear Waste Proposal (AP-Y2)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP2, June 27, 2006

The government would store civilian nuclear waste for up to 25 years at federal sites across the country under a proposal in the Senate to deal with growing volumes of used reactor fuel at power plants.

The waste sites could be built to accommodate plants in a region or individual state, said Sen. Pete Domenici (news, bio, voting record), R-N.M., who included the provision in a $30.7 billion spending bill that advanced out of his Appropriations subcommittee on Tuesday.

The interim storage approach is aimed at addressing increasing concern about thousands of tons of used reactor fuel accumulating at power plants, waiting to be shipped to an oft-delayed central government repository in Nevada. Industry officials have said the failure to address the waste problem will inhibit investment in new nuclear reactors.

The proposed Yucca Mountain waste site in Nevada — where the used fuel would be kept deep beneath the Earth — has yet to receive a license from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. It is not expected to open, even if a license is approved, before 2018, Energy Department officials have told Domenici's staff.

"I think we've begun to resolve the nuclear waste problem," said Domenici of the interim storage idea. "This is an orderly way to do it."

The Energy Department maintains that it is currently barred from creating temporary storage facilities for civilian reactor waste.

The proposal received the support of Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada, who strongly opposes the Yucca Mountain project in his state and who has said the used reactor fuel should be kept where it is, at power plants in 31 states.

Reid called interim storage on federal land "Yucca neutral" but he also clearly views the Domenici proposal as a way to have the government take the waste — as it is obligated under contracts with utilities — and keep it out of Nevada.

The bill also would include nearly $500 million for the Yucca Mountain project and $270 million for a first installment on a Bush administration proposal for reprocessing nuclear fuel as part of an international program to boost use of nuclear energy.

The House has slashed the reprocessing funds to $120 million, about half of what the administration had sought for the fiscal year beginning in October.

Currently there are more than 50,000 tons of highly radioactive nuclear waste in form of spent reactor fuel rods at nuclear power plants in 31 states. The government under contracts is obligated to take the waste off the utilities' hands, but has not done so because it has no place to put it, pending completion of the Yucca facility.

Domenici's proposal would give the Energy Department authority to build temporary storage facilities on federal land, or purchase private land for such a facility with a license to keep the waste for up to 25 years.

Some utilities already have filed lawsuits — and won favorable rulings in the courts — claiming the government owes them millions of dollars for failing to take the waste by a 1998 deadline.

DOJ_NMG_0037269

Domenici's proposal is likely to be controversial because it would give the Energy Department authority to build a waste facility within a state even if a state or local authorities objected.

The department would only have to consult with a state's governor. It would require a license from the federal Nuclear Regulatory Commission including compliance with various security, safety and environmental regulations.

Under the proposal, any federal land would be eligible except national parks, wilderness areas and wildlife refuges. Or, the government could purchase private land from any willing seller for the facility. A site may not be located in either Nevada, the site of the Yucca project, or Utah, where a private nuclear waste facility is being proposed on the Goshute Indian reservation.

Reactor waste now kept at closed power plants could be kept on site, but waste on any operating reactor sites must be moved, under terms of the proposal, after the government takes title.

Plan For Nuclear-Waste Storage Is Cleared By Senate Subcommittee (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A Senate subcommittee approved a plan to require the U.S. to set up temporary nuclear-waste storage facilities in states or regions that have nuclear-power plants, a move that could renew a 30-year-old fight over where to store radioactive waste.

The committee's action would give the Department of Energy the authority to store waste for as long as 25 years at "consolidation and preparation" sites; from there, the waste would be shipped to Nevada's Yucca Mountain for permanent storage.

The plan is intended to help carry out the Energy Department's contractual obligation to take custody and store the waste. Because of delays in completing and licensing a permanent storage facility in Nevada, federal courts have ruled that the department has breached its contracts with power-plant owners to remove the radioactive waste from power-plant sites.

Energy Department spokesman Craig Stevens said it is studying the measure as part of its effort to work out a solution with Congress on interim storage.

Frank L. Bowman, president of the Nuclear Energy Institute, which represents nuclear-power-plant owners, commended members of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee that passed the measure. "The sooner that the federal government begins meeting its obligations" to take custody of the waste, he said, "the greater the prospects" of nuclear power will be in the U.S.

Under the measure, any site that is owned or can be purchased by the federal government can be designated a temporary waste-storage site, with the exception of national parks, wildlife refuges or wilderness areas. The secretary can designate a site within each of the 31 states that have nuclear plants, or can pick regional sites to be shared by states.

Some utilities have filed lawsuits against the department for its failure to remove the radioactive waste, which is stored at the power-plant sites where it is generated. According to industry estimates, the U.S. could be liable for as much as $50 billion in damages if the wastes aren't moved. If the temporary-storage measure passes, the most likely wastes to be shipped would be in dry concrete casks that can be stored at remote sites for years. Under the proposal, the new federal storage sites would have to be picked in consultation with governors of the states involved.

Pollution In Overdrive (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

When it comes to greenhouse gases, U.S. drivers are getting more of the blame.

Americans represent 5 percent of the world's population but contribute 45 percent of the world's emission of carbon dioxide, the main pollutant that causes global warming, according to a report by the nonprofit group Environmental Defense.

Americans own 30 percent of the world's vehicles, drive farther each year than the international average and burn more fuel per mile, the report says. Additionally, the sport-utility boom of the past decade put vehicles on the road that could be spewing carbon dioxide for years to come.

General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. have long been the targets of environmentalists and other groups concerned with global warming. Vehicles made by GM, the No. 1 U.S. automaker, produced as much carbon dioxide in 2004 as American Electric Power Co., the nation's largest operator of coal-fired power plants, the report says.

Auto industry representatives declined to comment on the report, saying they had yet to see it. Most auto companies have been working to reduce emissions by designing more-efficient engines and vehicles capable of running on alternative fuels.

Automakers, though, have generally resisted government restrictions on carbon dioxide emissions, saying such limits would force extensive design changes and drive up prices for consumers.

DOJ_NMG_0037270

Environmental Defense, which plans to release the report publicly today, attempted to quantify how much carbon dioxide is produced by vehicles sold by various automakers. But the group said auto companies should not be singled out for blame, because consumer choices also play a role.

"What we are trying to do is make the connections for people," said John DeCicco, a senior fellow at Environmental Defense and an author of the report.

He said consumers could buy gas-electric hybrids or cars with smaller engines that burn less fuel and they could be more aware of how much they are driving, no matter the gas mileage of their cars. The report points out, for example, that although SUVs may be known as gas guzzlers, smaller cars cause more pollution because there are many more of them on the road. The authors also suggest that communities reconsider land use policies because Americans are taking more and longer trips, often to shop.

With the report, the group is trying to build support for government policies aiming at curbing greenhouse gases, including a system that would cap carbon dioxide emissions but allow companies and utilities to trade credits, mirroring Clean Air Act rules that govern sulfur dioxide, which causes acid rain. Under such a system, a company would get an allowance for carbon dioxide emissions each year, and if it did not reach that limit, it could sell off the remaining allotment to others.

The group's report is the latest effort by environmentalists to draw attention to global warming. Former vice president Al Gore also addresses the issue in his documentary "An Inconvenient Truth," which presents climate change from global warming as a fact he says is no longer debatable.

For years, though, environmental groups have run into resistance in Washington. The Bush administration has questioned the science behind global warming, and environmentalists complain that congressional leaders are ignoring proposals to raise fuel economy standards while pushing to expand offshore drilling.

On Monday, the Supreme Court agreed to hear arguments on whether the federal government has the authority to regulate carbon dioxide. The Bush administration is seeking to convince the court that the federal government has no obligation to restrict greenhouse gases.

Carbon dioxide is a byproduct of burning gasoline in vehicles. Scientists say the atmosphere can absorb a great deal of it, but many worry that people are adding more than nature can handle. They say the gases are building up around the Earth, trapping heat and raising the planet's temperature.

The report considered national statistics on how long vehicles are used and how far they are driven as they age. New and used vehicles were examined.

Carbon dioxide emissions from vehicles are disproportionately high in the United States for two primary reasons, the report says: U.S. drivers average 11,000 miles per year, 29 percent above the global average, and U.S. autos consume more fuel, emitting 15 percent more carbon dioxide per mile than the average vehicle in the rest of the world.

The Environmental Defense report found that in 2004, U.S. cars and light trucks emitted 314 metric tons of carbon dioxide, the equivalent of a coal train 50,000 miles long.

Greg Martin, a GM spokesman, said the automaker was working to reduce emissions. It will continue to focus on developing technologies to improve fuel efficiency. He said the automaker also plans to build more vehicles capable of burning alternative fuels, as well as more hybrids.

Gore's 'Truth' Largely Factual, Scientists Say (USAT)

Al Gore's documentary on global warming, An Inconvenient Truth, earns five stars for accuracy, according to an Associated Press survey of top climate scientists. The former vice president's movie mostly got the science right, said all 19 climate scientists who had seen the movie or read the book. The AP says it contacted more than 100 top climate researchers, including vocal skeptics of climate change theory. Most had not yet seen the movie or read the book. But those who had had the same general impression: Gore conveyed the science correctly, and the world is getting hotter and is a man-made catastrophe in the making caused by the burning of fossil fuels. One scientist criticized the depiction of the connection between hurricanes and global warming. "I thought the use of imagery from Hurricane Katrina was inappropriate and unnecessary. … There are plenty of disturbing impacts associated with global warming for which there is much greater scientific consensus," said Brian Soden, a University of Miami professor of meteorology and oceanography. And the majority arm of the Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works issued a statement denouncing the AP story as biased.

A pair of whooping cranes has hatched two chicks in central Wisconsin, marking the first young of the species to be hatched in the wild in the eastern USA in more than 100 years. That makes about two dozen young cranes that will be added this year to an effort to establish only the second migratory flock of wild whooping cranes in North America. The flock now numbers about 60 birds. This fall, Operation Migration, the non-profit group coordinating the reintroduction project, will lead its Researchers working in the swamps of Borneo have discovered a venomous species of snake that can change its skin color from reddish-brown to white, the conservation group WWF announced Tuesday. The ability to change skin color is known in some reptiles, such as the chameleon, but scientists have seen it rarely with snakes, the WWF says. Reptiles typically change color to camouflage themselves from predators. The 1.6-foot-long snake was discovered last year in wetlands and swamp forests around the Kapuas River in the Betung Kerihun National Park in the Indonesian part of the island of Borneo.

A drug already sold to treat mild to moderate dementia in Alzheimer's patients won federal approval Tuesday to treat the same condition in Parkinson's patients. It makes Exelon the first drug for the treatment of the chronic loss or impairment of intellectual capacity in Parkinson's disease patients, the Food and Drug Administration said. The drug, also called rivastigmine tartrate, is made by Novartis AG. In a 24-week trial, Parkinson's patients treated with the drug scored higher on a scale that measures mental processes than did those given a placebo, the FDA said. Side effects include gastrointestinal reactions and weight loss.

A Warning On Hazards Of Secondhand Smoke (NYT)

By John O'Neil

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

The evidence is now "indisputable" that secondhand smoke is an "alarming" public health hazard, responsible for tens of thousands of premature deaths among nonsmokers each year, Surgeon General Richard H. Carmona said yesterday.

Dr. Carmona warned that measures like no-smoking sections did not provide adequate protection, adding, "Smoke-free environments are the only approach that protects nonsmokers from the dangers of secondhand smoke."

He did not call for a federal ban on smoking in workplaces, bars or restaurants, a step that has been taken by a growing number of cities and states over the objections of business owners and of groups skeptical about the dangers of secondhand smoke. He said he saw his role as providing the public and Congress with definitive information on the subject.

"I am here to say the debate is over: the science is clear," Dr. Carmona said at a televised news conference, where he released a report updating the original surgeon general's study of secondhand smoke in 1986. Since then, hundreds of studies have indicated that the harm caused by secondhand smoke is far greater than earlier believed, he said. The report includes these findings:

¶There is no safe level of secondhand smoke, and even brief exposure can cause harm, especially for people suffering from heart or respiratory diseases.

¶For nonsmoking adults, exposure raises the risk of heart disease by 25 percent to 30 percent and of cancer by 20 percent to 30 percent. It accounted for 46,000 premature deaths from heart disease and 3,000 premature deaths from cancer last year.

¶Secondhand smoke is a cause of sudden infant death syndrome, or SIDS, accounting for 430 deaths last year. The risk is elevated for children whose mothers were exposed during pregnancy and for children exposed in their homes after birth.

¶The impact on the health and development of children is more severe than previously thought. "Children are especially vulnerable to the poisons in secondhand smoke," Dr. Carmona said.

¶Efforts to minimize the effect of secondhand smoke by separating smokers and nonsmokers are ineffective, as are ventilation systems in a shared space.

¶While exposure has declined, as many as 60 percent of nonsmokers show biological evidence of encountering secondhand smoke, and 22 percent of children are exposed to secondhand smoke in their homes.

Studies conducted by the Centers for Disease Control show that great progress has been made in reducing exposure, Dr. Carmona said. The amount of cotinine — the form nicotine takes after being metabolized — in blood samples fell by 75 percent among adults, according to specimens taken from 1999 to 2002 that were compared with samples taken a decade earlier.

But Dr. Carmona said more needed to be done, particularly to protect children. He urged parents who smoke not only to quit, but also to move their smoking outside while trying to quit. "Make the home a smoke-free environment," he said.

Tobacco companies say the risks of secondhand smoke are unproved and overstated. In a statement on its Web site, R. J. Reynolds says, "It seems unlikely that secondhand smoke presents any significant harm to otherwise healthy nonsmoking adults; and, given the extensive smoking bans and restrictions that have already been enacted, nonsmokers can easily avoid exposure to secondhand smoke."

A spokesman for the company, David Howard, said yesterday, "Bottom line, we believe adults should be able to patronize establishments that permit smoking if they choose to do so," according to The Associated Press.

Dr. Cheryl G. Healton, the president and chief executive of the American Legacy Foundation, a nonprofit group created to use settlement money from tobacco companies to educate young people about the dangers of tobacco, called the surgeon

Sioux Tribal Leaders Plan Beer Blockade (USAT/AP)

By Carson Walker, The Associated Press

USA Today, June 28, 2006

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. — In an effort to fight alcoholism on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, leaders of the Oglala Sioux tribe plan to set up roadblocks today and stop members from bringing in beer bought at four outlying stores.

Alcohol has long been banned on the 16,500-member reservation, where drinking has been a scourge for generations. But four stores in Whiteclay, Neb., a village a few hundred feet outside the reservation, sell about 4 million cans of beer every year, mostly to Indians.

Tribal members say that from now on, they will confiscate beer bought in Whiteclay.

“We are the last line of defense when it comes to protecting our people,” says Duane Martin of the reservation's Strong Heart Civil Rights Movement.

The effects of alcoholism can be seen in nearly every family, in accidents, violence, sexual abuse and suicide, says Terryl Blue-White Eyes, director of the alcohol and drug program for the reservation.

The youth suicide rate on the reservation is the highest in the nation, and most of the suicides involve alcohol, she says.

Shannon County, where most Pine Ridge residents live, is home to less than 2% of South Dakota's population but had 19% of the fatalities caused by drunken driving in 2005 — 14 of the 74 deaths statewide, according to the South Dakota Department of Public Safety.

Beer cans litter reservation roads and the streets of Whiteclay, a village of roughly a dozen people. People loiter outside the stores. Some try to trade tools, electronics and other items for beer.

The stores have been a source of tension for years, and tribal members have tried to stop alcohol sales in Whiteclay through the courts, the county and the state licensing board.

Mark Vasina, president of Nebraskans for Peace, a mostly non-Indian activist group that tried to end alcohol sales in the border town, says the blockade is the only option left.

Lance Lintt, who works at the Jumping Eagle Inn, one of the four stores in Whiteclay, says of the blockade, “I just don't know how it's going to work or how they have any legal grounds to confiscate any beer. I just don't think they'll get anyone to stop for them.”

The plan is to set up checkpoints just inside the reservation's boundaries.

Volunteers in Whiteclay will use radios to tell workers at the checkpoints which vehicles should be stopped and searched.

Tribal police will not enforce the blockade but will maintain order, says Alex White Plume, vice president of the tribal council.

Mistrial Declared In Shooting Of Officer (BOS)

The Boston Globe, June 28, 2006

A Quincy man, accused of shooting a Boston police officer, was convicted of two firearms violations yesterday, but a Norfolk jury deadlocked on charges that he tried to kill the officer, prosecutors said. The judge declared a mistrial on the shooting charges yesterday because the 12-member jury failed to reach a verdict after deliberating for three days , said David Traub, a spokesman for the Norfolk district attorney's office. Traub said a hearing would be held Friday at Norfolk Superior Court to consider whether to retry Horacio Mays in the shooting of officer Scott W. O'Brien in the jaw and the right forearm in 2004. In January 2004, police went to Mays' Quincy home to arrest him on a default warrant for missing a probation surrender hearing. A standoff began after police arrived about 6 a.m., and Mays allegedly shot O'Brien, then 27, as he tried to enter the attic where Mays was hiding, police said.

Former gang leader sentenced to 21 years A former leader of the Latin King gang was sentenced to more than 21 years in federal prison for drug trafficking offenses, the US attorney's office said yesterday. Edwin Serrano, 29, of Lawrence was sentenced Friday after he was found guilty of selling cocaine and crack cocaine to a ``cooperating witness" working with a federal-state task force investigating gang activity throughout the state. Authorities say Serrano, who was minister of defense for the Lawrence chapter of the Almighty Latin King and Queen Nation, also offered to sell the witness a firearm and attempted to recruit the witness to go to New York to kidnap someone. Serrano was sentenced by Chief US District Judge Mark L. Wolf to 21 years and 10 months in prison, followed by 8 years of supervised release.

Barrios ends effort to limit Fluff State Senator Jarrett T. Barrios is abandoning his push to limit the serving of Fluff, the marshmallow concoction, in public schools. Barrios, a Cambridge Democrat, proposed an amendment to a school-nutrition bill last week that sought to restrict the sale of marshmallow spreads to once a week. But the proposal drew scorn from fans of the Fluffernutter, the sandwich made from fluff and peanut butter. After his proposal became national news and the butt of jokes on talk radio, Barrios decided to drop the effort, said spokesman Colin Durrant.

Trial set for accused Bosnian war criminal An alleged Bosnian Serb Army war criminal will go on trial in US District Court in Boston today on charges that he lied on immigration paperwork he used to enter the United States. Marko Boskic, a Croat, has told federal investigators he was forced to participate in the mass killings of 1,200 Muslim men and boys in Srebrenica in 1995 in the former Yugoslavia. The Justice Department earlier this year decided not to prosecute Boskic under American anti torture laws for his alleged role in the mass killings. Boskic, who was living in Peabody when taken into custody by immigration officials in 2004, now will be tried only on immigration charges for saying he had not served in Bosnian military.

Police identify stabbing victim in Roxbury

Police yesterday identified a man found fatally stabbed in a Roxbury home Thursday as Ronald Perry , 37, of Waltham. Police said they discovered Perry about 7 a.m. in a home on Cheney Street after a request from a friend to check on Perry. Police are investigating .

Man struck, killed by MBTA train The MBTA is trying to identify a man killed yesterday when he was struck by an Orange Line train while walking along the tracks south of the Green Street station in Jamaica Plain, said MBTA spokesman Joseph Pesaturo . The man, who Pesaturo said was not carrying identification, apparently walked off the station platform and was struck by a northbound train at about 6 a.m. Orange Line service was shut down for more than two hours and buses shuttled passengers, he said. The operator, as required, is undergoing drug and alcohol testing, Pesaturo said.

NEWTON

Two are indicted in Newton slaying Two men were indicted yesterday in the slaying of Edward Schiller, 39, during the morning of Jan. 13. James Brescia, 46, of Waltham and Scott Foxworth, 52, of Dracut are both charged with murder and conspiracy in Schiller's fatal shooting in a Newton parking garage. Schiller was found in his car with a single gunshot to the head and was pronounced dead on the scene. Authorities believe that Brescia agreed to pay Foxworth to kill Schiller and that Foxworth shot Schiller in the garage. Both men were arraigned on April 4 and pleaded not guilty.

Police: Lethal Drug Fentanyl Hitting Twin Cities Streets (AP)

AP, June 28, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS - A lethal mixture of heroin laced with fentanyl, a synthetic painkiller blamed in the deaths of more than 200 people in Chicago and Detroit, is working its way into the Twin Cities, authorities said.

"It's the beginning of an issue, and how far-reaching it becomes we'll have to see," said Thomas Kelly, agent-in-charge of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration office here.

Fentanyl can kill in tiny doses, either by stopping a user's breathing or making them so unresponsive that they choke on their own vomit, said Matt Morgan, a toxicology fellow at Hennepin County Medical Center.

Three St. Paul men arrested Friday have been charged with conspiring to distribute fentanyl and crack cocaine. Kevin Joseph Fenner and Eric Dion Davis, both 38, and Eric Robert Hargrove are scheduled to appear Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Minneapolis.

According to a criminal complaint, Fenner sold 5 grams of a substance that tested positive for fentanyl to a police informant last week. And Hargrove possessed 6 grams of suspected fentanyl when he and Davis were arrested Friday night while driving to a drug buy set up by an informant.

Davis was identified as a Vice Lord gang member three years ago, said Ron Ryan, commander of the Metro Gang Strike Force.

Officers later recovered 1 1/2 ounces of suspected fentanyl when they searched Hargrove's bedroom in a house on Germain Avenue in St. Paul, where he lived with Fenner, the complaint states.

Authorities in Minneapolis and St. Paul are reviewing heroin-related deaths to determine if fentanyl was involved.

Though he did not have specifics, St. Paul police spokesman Pete Crum said Tuesday that "we're aware of an increase nationwide of heroin overdoses, and that includes the metro region here."

Minneapolis police Capt. Rich Stanek said the department has seized only "very small" amounts of heroin mixed with fentanyl.

DOJ_NMG_0037274

Kelly said one of the three men arrested has connections to Chicago and that drug agents were trying to determine whether that's the source of the fentanyl seized in St. Paul.

Nearly 100 fentanyl-related deaths have been confirmed in the Chicago area this year, according to the Cook County medical examiner's office.

By Guidelines On Health Information

Star News, June 27, 2006

Federal guidelines in place to keep personal health information confidential create a roadblock for police who want to speak with victims of overdoses about the source of the drugs that hospitalized them.

The issue was discussed last week at a meeting of about 30 law enforcement officials and medical community representatives. The task force, formed by New Hanover County District Attorney Ben David, is talking about ways to coordinate the response to a recent surge of suspected heroin overdoses that have claimed at least four lives in Wilmington.

Strides were made to ensure cooperation between the law enforcement and medical communities, David said Monday.

"The goal is to recognize that the interests of medical professionals and those of us in law enforcement are united in determining the source of the illegal drugs," David said. "The goal is to treat patients and catch dealers who are making these patients victims."

Preliminary test results from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration shows the heroin that killed two men earlier this month in Wilmington was high in purity and not cut with the powerful synthetic narcotic fentanyl, as was suspected.

Whatever its composition, the heroin poses a lethal threat to users, Wilmington-based DEA Special Agent Eric Savitts said.

"Generally speaking, if (regular users) find out there is a potent batch out there, they will gravitate towards it," Savitts said.

Further testing will help determine the specific content of the heroin, Savitts said.

Meanwhile, representatives of New Hanover Regional Medical Center and the city of Wilmington are exploring the nuances of the 1996 Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act to see how much wiggle room institutions like hospitals and counseling centers have in providing client information to police.

"We have a lot of common goals, like making sure the community is safe, but at the same time we have a lot of privacy constraints we have to comply with," said Lori Feezor, hospital vice president of legal affairs.

Feezor and city privacy officer William Wolak are exploring ways to cooperate with police while adhering to the HIPAA law.

"We need to be mindful and protect the confidentiality of patient information. That said, we are also mindful of our dual responsibility to the community and the health of all people in the region," Feezor said.

Police Community Affairs Officer Linda Rawley suggested that something has to give for the partnership to be effective.

"The hospital has not released any information to us because of HIPAA. The only way we know about the (overdoses) is from officers who are at the scene," she said.

Investigators "want to be able to begin tracking these cases to look at the pattern," Rawley said.

"At the federal level, it looks like lawmakers and legislators should make some addendums to HIPAA," she said.

Feezor said the hospital can currently provide information to police about a patient if the individual consents to it. Medical officials can also release "aggregate data" reflecting, for instance, the total of suspected overdose victims treated with the drug Narcan over a given time frame, but can not get into specific cases. Narcan is commonly administered to people who overdose on narcotics.

"It is a difficult issue and it is an issue health care providers struggle with nationwide," Feezor said. "Generally, we have tried to collaborate where possible."

Friday's meeting "laid the foundation for examining some of those processes. We are waiting to see more hypotheticals," Feezor said.

Law enforcement and supporting agencies are gearing up for a full-scale assault on the local heroin trade, David said.

"Our primary concern is quickly locating the source of the illegal drugs," he said. "We are stepping up the pressure on drug dealers in this community and this is just one of the phases it is taking."

Man's Death Possibly Linked To Heroin (WOOD)

WOOD-TV, June 27, 2006

PORTAGE -- The Portage Police Department continues to investigate the death of a 34-year-old man.

Officers found the victim dead inside his home Thursday night.

An autopsy could not reveal what caused the man's death.

DOJ_NMG_0037275

Portage police think he died of a mix of heroin and the prescription pain reliever fentanyl. Such a combination is blamed for nearly 200 deaths in the Detroit and Chicago areas.

Investigators hope a toxicology report on the Portage man's body will help their case.

Officials Investigate Limbaugh After Finding Viagra In His Bag (AP)

AP, June 27, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. (AP) — Rush Limbaugh will likely have to wait several days to find out if he violated his deal with prosecutors in a prescription fraud case when authorities found him in possession of a bottle of Viagra that was apparently prescribed to someone else, a spokesman for the state attorney's office said Tuesday.

Limbaugh, 55, was detained for more than three hours Monday at Palm Beach International Airport after he returned on his private plane from a vacation in the Dominican Republic. Customs officials found Viagra in his bag, but his name wasn't on the prescription, Palm Beach County sheriff's spokesman Paul Miller said.

Limbaugh's lawyer, Roy Black, said the prescription was written in his doctor's name "for privacy purposes." The conservative radio host was released without being charged and investigators confiscated the Viagra, which treats erectile dysfunction.

Limbaugh joked about the search on his radio show Tuesday, saying Customs officials didn't believe him when he said he got the pills at the Clinton Library and he was told they were blue M&Ms. He later added, chuckling: "I had a great time in the Dominican Republic. Wish I could tell you about it."

It is generally not illegal under Florida law for a physician to prescribe medication in a third party's name if all parties are aware and the doctor documents it correctly, said Mike Edmondson, a spokesman for the state attorney in Palm Beach County. He would not discuss specifics in the Limbaugh case Tuesday.

The sheriff's office was continuing its investigation and would turn the case over to prosecutors in several days, Edmondson said. The alleged violation could be a second-degree misdemeanor if Limbaugh's doctor doesn't confirm the prescription.

Under last month's deal with prosecutors, authorities will dismiss a "doctor shopping" charge if Limbaugh doesn't get arrested for 18 months, among other terms. Prosecutors had said he illegally deceived multiple doctors to get overlapping painkiller prescriptions. Limbaugh denied the charges but admitted he was addicted to painkillers.

This latest case may simply be dismissed if prosecutors can confirm with Limbaugh's doctor that the prescription was indeed for Limbaugh, said Kendall Coffey, a former U.S. attorney in Florida.

"It's perhaps a little embarrassing but not highly incriminating," Coffey said.

In addition, possession of Viagra is in a "completely different universe than a matter that would involve Schedule Two (controlled) substances such as OxyContin" Coffey added.

According to the Drug Enforcement Administration, Viagra is not considered a controlled substance because "it's not something you can be addicted to," said DEA Investigator Maria Gilbert.

The Food and Drug Administration oversees regulations concerning non-addictive drugs that are not considered controlled substances, Gilbert said. A telephone call to the FDA was not immediately returned Tuesday.

Limbaugh Case Alerts Travelers To Rules For Prescriptions (USAT)

By Kitty Bean Yancey, Usa Today

USA Today, June 28, 2006

Carrying a vial of Viagra without his name on it got talk-show host Rush Limbaugh in hot water with U.S. customs officers Monday.

And his detention at Florida's Palm Beach airport raises questions for U.S. travelers who routinely fly with drugs that they can't show were prescribed to them.

Limbaugh was stopped after flying in from the Dominican Republic on a private jet. In a bag search, customs officers found a bottle of Viagra without his name on it. Limbaugh lawyer Roy Black said in a statement that the erectile-dysfunction drug was "prescribed by Mr. Limbaugh's treating physician but labeled as being issued to the physician rather than Mr. Limbaugh for privacy purposes."

VIDEO: Radio host detained for 3 hours

That violated customs rules, says Jennifer Connors, a U.S. Customs and Border Protection spokeswoman. Names on prescription drug bottles must "match the name on the travel document," she says.

Passengers flying domestically don't have to carry a prescription or have a labeled bottle, although the Transportation Security Administration website encourages labeled medications. Spokesman Darrin Kayser says, "Our focus is security; we're not as enforcement-focused as (customs), looking at 'whose drugs are those?' But it's good to have a prescription label, so it's clear."

Meanwhile, travelers often fly without prescriptions or the containers drugs came in.

Jean Mothena, 59, of Aldie, Va., takes seven pills daily (two prescription) and for ease keeps them in a sectioned pillbox. "I don't carry copies of my prescriptions. I've never thought there might be a problem."

Art Van Bodegraven, 66, of Alpharetta, Ga., flies overseas with unmarked pill containers. "I have never been asked about them."

Ditto, says Leonard Dinnerstein, 72, of Tucson. "I always dump them all in a big ol' Ziploc, throw it into the carry-on and go."

Ken Kushnir, 59, of Healdsburg, Calif., recalls being "hassled" when he lacked prescriptions or the bottles they came in. One customs agent "said he could arrest me on the spot," Kushnir says. He didn't.

Limbaugh, 55, went free after being detained. He was not targeted, Connors says: "We go through most people's bags" on private aircraft coming in from overseas.

The case went to the Palm Beach County Sheriff's Office; its report will go to the state attorney's office. Mike Edmondson, an attorney's office spokesman, says that, generally, if a doctor didn't act fraudulently and a prescription was for the patient, "that wouldn't be a violation of Florida statute."

Two months ago, Limbaugh struck a deal with prosecutors on a charge of fraudulently obtaining painkiller prescriptions. The case was to be dismissed in 18 months if he continued drug treatment and exhibited "model-citizen behavior," he told listeners.

2 More Sentenced For Role In Danbury-area Drug Ring (DNT)

Danbury (CT) News Times, June 27, 2006

Two more Danbury men have been sentenced to prison terms for their involvement in a Danbury-area cocaine and crack distribution ring that was broken up by law enforcement last year, federal authorities said Monday

Edward Toney, 22, of Westville Avenue, Danbury, was sentenced to five years in prison and four years of supervised release for conspiring to distribute 500 grams or more of cocaine, U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor said.

Timothy Eberly, 22, of Davis Street, was sentenced to 27 months behind bars, and six years of supervised release. Eberle faces an additional term of imprisonment for a probation violation stemming from a previous drug-trafficking conviction.

The two were among 24 people from Danbury and New York City who were arrested last year during a crackdown by Danbury police and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration on a drug ring operated by Alex Luna of Danbury. The ring imported large quantities of powdered and crack cocaine into the area for several years, investigators said.

A large quantity of narcotics, along with packaging material, cash, firearms and ammunition, were also seized by police.

Luna, who already has pleaded guilty, and several other defendants are still awaiting sentencing, O'Connor said.

N.F.L. Strengthens Drug Policy (AP)

AP, June 28, 2006

The N.F.L. has toughened its drug policy, adding amphetamines to the list of banned performance-enhancers starting in 2007. Amphetamines were previously listed as a "substance-abuse drug," but are now in the same category as steroids and other enhancers that carry stronger penalties. Next year will serve as a transition year, when a first positive test will bring a warning and put a player into the drug program. But in 2007, testing will cover amphetamines on a regular basis. A first positive will result in a four-game suspension.

NFL Cracking Down On Amphetamines (USAT)

By Skip Wood, Usa Today

USA Today, June 28, 2006

As far as the National Football League is concerned, amphetamines and methamphetamines aren't just harmful drugs but substances that fall under the performance-enhancement category.

Thus, beginning in 2007, positive tests from the drugs will result in the same penalties carried for steroids — sanctions which have recently been increased in an agreement between the league and the union as part of the revamped collective bargaining agreement.

The changes were announced this week at the NFL's annual rookie symposium in San Diego. Players were told of the changes by Harold Henderson, the NFL's executive vice president of labor relations.

For the upcoming 2006 season, the penalty for a second violation for performance-enhancing drugs such as steroids will be increased from six games to eight games. First-time violators will continue to face an automatic suspension of four games. A third positive test still carries a one-year suspension.

According to Henderson, amphetamines and their derivatives have become a growing concern for the NFL, especially since the 2005 Congressional hearings explored performance-enhancing drug use in pro sports and the testing policies the major leagues utilize.

"Until then, we frankly didn't have a strong indication or belief they might be a problem for us," Henderson said. "But when we started talking to people in other sports, and saw what went on on the Hill, we started to re-evaluate our position."

The switch in classification for amphetamines and methamphetamines will not take affect until the 2007 season to make certain all players know of the new rules. A first positive test in 2006 would bring a warning and put a player into the drug program. A positive test next year will initially result in a four-game suspension

"We wanted this year," Henderson said, "to be less punitive and use it as a period of education and awareness."

Amphetamines previously fell under the category of harmful drugs such as cocaine and marijuana; a player wasn't suspended until his third positive test for such substances.

NFL players association president Gene Upshaw was unavailable for comment. Henderson said the union was in full agreement regarding the changes.

Amphetamines and methamphetamines affect the central nervous system and are considered stimulants. They are known to cause euphoric feelings and temporary boosts in energy but can also cause hypertension, among other health problems. Both drugs are addictive. Methamphetamines are considered stronger than amphetamines.

"We don't think they necessarily present the same types of competitive issues as steroids but there are serious health issues," Henderson said.

"But (we) realized the possibility that some players would use it for a gameday edge," he told the Associated Press in a phone interview. "The union quickly agreed with us."

"We were all working together during the Congressional investigation," Henderson said. "We learned about it, we wondered with each other whether this was an issue to be concerned about. In the abundance of caution, we probably should be. We all understood we needed to do something here."

Major League Baseball didn't begin testing for amphetamines until this season. An initial positive test results in evaluation and follow-up testing. Further positive tests result in suspensions of 25 games, 80 games and then a lifetime ban.

The NFL rookie symposium, which began Sunday and ends Wednesday, is a mandatory affair at which rookies are prepped on off-field issues in the league — including behavior and the importance of staying out of trouble and avoiding risky activities.

Several 2006 draft picks already have run afoul of the law, a fact Henderson acknowledges concerns him.

"It does," he said, "and that's one of the things we've been talking about here."

Henderson added there has been preliminary talk about holding the symposium either in late May or early June.

Bonds Says He Hasn't Heard From Mitchell (AP)

AP, June 27, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Barry Bonds said Tuesday he hasn't heard yet from former Sen. George Mitchell in his independent investigation of steroids in baseball.

Mitchell, the former Senate majority leader, was appointed in March by commissioner Bud Selig to head the league's investigation into steroids. He has already contacted some members of the San Francisco Giants' coaching staff.

Bonds, who has always denied using performance-enhancing drugs to fuel his home run chase, said he is determined to stay upbeat despite his decreased production this season, a sore, tired body, and his off-the-field issues.

"I'm doing good, ain't I? I'm going to be a positive person no matter what," Bonds said. "As long as my health is good and my family's happy, I'm going to be happy."

Bonds returned to the Giants' lineup for Tuesday night's interleague series opener against the Texas Rangers after he left Sunday's game against the Oakland Athletics following the second inning with irritation in his left knee.

Bonds, who turns 42 on July 24, is batting .252 with 11 home runs and 34 RBIs this season and has drawn 62 walks -- 26 intentional. With 719 career homers, he is second on the career list behind Hank Aaron (755).

"I'm loving life," Bonds said. "I'm just going to roll with it and have fun."

What is he struggling with?

"Everything," Bonds said, chuckling. "But I'm happy. I'm enjoying myself. I wave to the people outside, cheery."

DOJ_NMG_0037278

Bonds said he hurt his left knee -- he had three operations on the right one in 2005 -- stealing a base Friday night for the first time in nearly two years after team broadcaster Mike Krukow challenged the seven-time NL MVP's speed. Bonds acknowledged his competitive nature took over and he might have pushed his body too hard to prove Krukow wrong.

"I can only do it once. I need a break after that," Bonds said. "I'm not slow. I've played like this most of my career."

Bonds also reiterated that he doesn't plan to be in Pittsburgh for next month's All-Star game. He wants ace Jason Schmidt, another former Pirates player, to represent the Giants.

"Been there, done that," he said of returning to the city where he started his career. "Schmitty deserves it. He should represent this team. He's pitched well all year."

While Bonds was ready to play again, right fielder Moises Alou missed another day after receiving a cortisone injection in his troublesome lower back on Monday's off day. He has missed eight games with back spasms.

Bonds and Alou have played only 30 games together dating to last season, and the Giants are 13-8 with both of them in the lineup this year.

"Me and Mo are just trying to figure out what somebody has with us being on the field at the same time," Bonds said. "Somebody has a hex on us. We need to figure out what it is and kill it."

Armstrong Goes On The Offensive To State His Case (LAT)

By Alan Abrahamson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 27, 2006

In numerous television interviews, he challenges the testimony by an ex-teammate's wife that he admitted using drugs to aid his performance.

Lance Armstrong mounted a public-relations offensive Monday, seeking to discount sworn testimony alleging that he had, nearly 10 years ago in an Indiana hospital room, acknowledged use of an array of performance-enhancing substances.

Appearing on a number of shows on ABC or ESPN, Armstrong sought to undercut testimony offered by Betsy Andreu, a former teammate's wife. She testified Armstrong was asked by doctors on Oct. 27, 1996, if he had used performance-enhancing drugs and said, "EPO, growth hormone, cortisone, steroid, testosterone."

"... The proof is in the pudding," Armstrong, appearing on ESPN's "Outside the Lines," said. "The pudding's not a bunch of people that are bitter and angry. The proof of the results, not just the race results but the drug-testing results, the investigations, the inquiries, the court cases — haven't lost one of them."

Andreu's testimony, corroborated by her husband, Frankie, a former Armstrong teammate who rode in the first two of Armstrong's history-making Tour de France wins from 1999 through 2005, came in a confidential arbitration. The case ended in February with a $7.5-million settlement in Armstrong's favor.

The Times reported Saturday about Betsy Andreu's testimony. The French newspaper Le Monde on Friday had printed portions of her testimony.

Armstrong said Monday on "The View," on ABC: "... The things they don't report is what happened under cross-examination when the person who made the accusation couldn't remember anything about the room. Couldn't remember if the doctor was a man or a woman, couldn't remember if they had a lab coat on or not, couldn't remember if they had a clipboard, couldn't remember anything.

"No facts, no figures, no evidence — just a mouth," one of the hosts, Star Jones, interjected.

Barbara Walters, another host, chimed in to ask Armstrong, "Aren't you sick of it?"

Under cross-examination, Betsy Andreu testified Jan. 17 that two doctors came into the room with white coats; one was tall with brown hair and glasses, she said. She further testified that there was a bathroom on the left, a big table on the right, a television against the wall, Armstrong was sitting in a chair by the table, a football game was on TV and one of the others who was there — Armstrong's then-girlfriend — was studying.

Betsy and Frankie Andreu issued a statement Monday through their attorney that said, "My clients remain steadfast in the truthfulness of their testimony."

Hamilton Faces New Doping Allegations (LAT)

By Alan Abrahamson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 27, 2006

Report details billing for performance-enhancing treatment U.S. cyclist is said to have received.

A Spanish newspaper reported Monday that U.S. cyclist Tyler Hamilton, an Olympic gold medalist serving a two-year suspension for blood doping, was billed by a doctor for treatment that allegedly included blood transfusions and banned performance-enhancing drugs, including steroids, human growth hormone and the synthetic blood booster EPO.

DOJ_NMG_0037279

Hamilton, in a statement issued by his attorney, Howard Jacobs of Los Angeles, said, "I have not done what the article alleges."

The report in El Pais, a national circulation paper published in Madrid, is part of a series sparked by a review of confidential judicial documents tied to a raid in May by police in Madrid. El Pais said Sunday that 58 riders in recent years might have received blood and banned substances.

Monday, the paper reported that among the documents it had reviewed was a fax, allegedly sent to Hamilton's wife, detailing a doctor bill for 43,040 euros, about $53,850 at Monday's exchange rate. The report said Hamilton also had been sent two pages of doctors' files purportedly detailing calendars noted with medications to be taken in advance of the 2003 season.

For instance, the paper reported, EPO was to be taken daily from Dec. 21 until Christmas Eve, and then on alternate days until Jan. 9. On Jan. 14, blood was to be withdrawn. On Jan. 24, anabolic steroids were to be started. Then in March, growth hormone and insulin were to be taken, as well as HMG, a hormone used by menopausal women, to mask anabolic steroid use, the paper said.

In the final lead-up to the Tour de France, cycling's premiere event, more growth hormone was to be taken and blood was to be reinfused, according to El Pais. Hamilton took fourth in the 2003 Tour despite breaking a collarbone in the first stage.

Hamilton won gold at the 2004 Athens Olympics in the time trial, then failed a test for blood doping. The backup test proved inconclusive, authorities acknowledging that the sample had mistakenly been frozen, and Hamilton kept his medal.

The month after the Olympics, in September 2004, Hamilton tested positive again for blood doping.

The test turned up markers for someone else's blood in his system.

In February, the Swiss-based Court of Arbitration for Sport, rejected Hamilton's appeal and barred him from competition through Sept. 22, 2006.

U.S. Cyclist Hamilton Keeps Gold Medal (AP)

AP, June 28, 2006

LAUSANNE, Switzerland (AP) -- American cyclist Tyler Hamilton will keep his gold medal from the 2004 Athens Olympics.

The Court of Arbitration for Sport rejected an appeal Tuesday by the Russian Olympic Committee to strip Hamilton of his time-trial gold medal due to a doping controversy and give it to silver medalist Vyacheslav Ekimov.

Hamilton currently is serving a two-year ban for testing positive for blood doping at the Spanish Vuelta in September 2004. CAS, world sport's highest tribunal, upheld the two-year ban in February.

That ban came into effect one month after an initial doping test in Athens in August 2004 led to suspicions Hamilton had used a blood transfusion to boost his endurance.

But the International Olympic Committee abandoned its probe because the American's backup specimen was mistakenly frozen, leaving too few red blood cells to analyze.

"Tyler Hamilton can retain the gold medal he won at the time-trial event in Athens and the ranking of this race is definitively confirmed," CAS said in its ruling Tuesday.

On Monday, Spanish daily El Pais reported that Hamilton was a client of Dr. Eufemiano Fuentes, one of the doctors arrested and charged in connection with the blood-doping scandal in Spain.

El Pais reported that Civil Guard investigations -- called "Operation Door" in Spanish -- show that Hamilton was among 58 pro cyclists who may have received prohibited substances and blood transfusions in recent years.

The article showed a copy of a fax, allegedly sent to Hamilton's wife -- Haven Parchinski -- detailing a doctor's bill for $54,060. The report said Hamilton had also had been sent two pages of doctors' files detailing calendars with medications to be taken in advance of the 2003 season.

Hamilton was not only engaged in banned blood transfusion practices, but also used EPO, anabolic steroids and human growth hormones during his treatment by Fuentes, the El Pais article said.

"I was very upset to read the accusations against me and to see my name associated with the 'Operacion Puerto' investigation in Spain," Hamilton said Monday in an e-mail message sent by his foundation. "I have not been treated by Dr. Fuentes. I have not done what the article alleges.

"In addition, I have never been contacted by authorities in Spain regarding these allegations. Therefore, it is impossible to comment on a situation I have no knowledge of."

Amid Doping Scandal, Ullrich Is Cleared To Ride In Tour De France (NYT)

By Nathaniel Vinton

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037280

The Tour de France has been enveloped by the turmoil of a doping investigation less than a week before it is scheduled to begin. Race officials asked the team of a top contender to withdraw Monday, and yesterday they cleared another contender, Jan Ullrich of Germany, after a Spanish newspaper linked him to the blood-doping inquiry that has shaken cycling for the past month.

Tour officials asked the Astana-Würth team to withdraw after deciding it was implicated too heavily in the scandal. Alexander Vinokourov of Kazakhstan, who finished fifth in last year's Tour and third in 2003, rides for Astana-Würth.

The team appealed to the Court of Arbitration for Sport, and a ruling was expected as early as today.

"We expect to receive a request for formal arbitration tonight or tomorrow early," Matthieu Reeb, the secretary general for the C.A.S., said in a telephone interview from the court's headquarters in Lausanne, Switzerland. "We are ready to conduct an expedited procedure, to make sure that a final decision can be made before the Tour de France begins on Saturday."

Reeb said he expected the case to be considered by one court-appointed arbiter.

While the court is deliberating, uncertainty hangs over the Tour de France; teams are expected to arrive today in Strasbourg, where the competition will begin with a 7.1-kilometer prologue race (about 4.4 miles).

Astana-Würth has been involved in the doping investigation since last month, when the Guardia Civil, a military and civilian police force in Spain, raided several apartments in Madrid and seized steroids, hormones, the endurance-boosting hormone EPO, nearly 100 bags of frozen blood and equipment for treating blood. The evidence was said to have implicated dozens of cyclists and other athletes.

At the time, the team was named Liberty Seguros-Würth, but Liberty Seguros (part of Liberty Mutual, an insurance company based in Boston) demanded that its name be removed from the team's uniforms and vehicles. Astana is a collection of Kazakh businesses that came together in support of Vinokourov.

The Spanish newspaper El País reported that Ullrich, the Tour champion in 1997 and one of the favorites this year, could be implicated in the investigation. No riders have been charged in the investigation, and Ullrich has denied the accusations.

Tour de France officials said yesterday that Ullrich had been cleared to race. "For the Tour de France, for now, there is no problem with Ullrich," the race spokesman Philippe Sudres told The Associated Press.

Ullrich's team, T-Mobile, contacted the Spanish authorities yesterday and requested to see the secret evidence that El País cited in its report. But the Guardia Civil said no to the request, according to the team's spokesman, Luuc Eisenga.

Ullrich was not available for comment yesterday; he and his coach denied the blood-doping allegations Monday on the team's Web site. Ullrich, a favorite to challenge Ivan Basso of Italy for the Tour title this season, has been training in Switzerland, where he has a home.

"Obviously, we as a team cannot let Jan get stuck at home because there is a speculation in a newspaper," Eisenga said. "We have requested more information from the Guardia Civil, but they told us this information is top secret."

Eisenga said that he had spoken with the two top officials of the Tour — Christian Prudhomme, the race director, and Jean-Marie Leblanc, the deputy director — and that they were also pressing the Guardia Civil to share evidence obtained in its investigation.

"We share the same interests, and that is in having more information in order so we can make a decision," Eisenga said. "What we need for all decisions is proof, or evidence. There is no evidence. There is only speculation."

Details of the substances and documents gathered in the raid have been leaked to Spanish newspapers over the past month, creating an air of paranoia around the sport. Last week, Ullrich won the Tour de Suisse, a nine-stage race considered an indicator for Tour de France success.

RULING ALLOWS HAMILTON TO KEEP MEDAL Tyler Hamilton of the United States will keep his gold medal from the 2004 Athens Olympics. The Court of Arbitration for Sport rejected an appeal yesterday by the Russian Olympic Committee to strip Hamilton of his gold medal in the time trial because of a doping controversy and give it to the silver medalist, Vyacheslav Ekimov. Cycling Suffers Toll For Role In Drug Testing (USAT)

USA Today, June 28, 2006

The Super Bowl of cycling starts this weekend in France, sans Lance. Even without the presence of the American legend named Armstrong, the famous two-wheel marathon of mystery and misery is enough to bring a smile and a grimace to the face of one of his former teammates.

As the same clouds of suspicion gather overhead regarding new allegations of illegal doping by some of the world's top cyclists, Jonathan Vaughters is in Boulder, Colo., trying to teach the next generation of young riders a better way — the right way — to spare them from confronting a moral dilemma.

That would be the drug-free way.

DOJ_NMG_0037281

The French way.

"In some ways, this pain (of scandal) is good," he says. "These kids never will have to face the decision of whether to do drugs and win or be mediocre and be able to sleep at night. Everyone in my generation faced it; it's what I went through. What a horrible choice. I don't want my guys to walk through a store and someone say, 'There goes a professional cyclist — he's a doper.' "

He insists it can be done as older riders, accustomed to the benefits of pharmacological cheating, fade. The climb up an Alps-high mountain of skepticism is long and steep. The sport is badly stigmatized because doping has been the fire under the seat for many cyclists for years. You can argue the merits of cyclists using alcohol, cocaine and amphetamines in decades past, but you cannot debate the effectiveness of EPO, a synthetic hormone that stimulates production of red blood cells and increases endurance.

Cycling is paying a hefty price because of its leadership in testing, even as most pro sports fly under the drug performance-enhancement radar because of union dissent regarding perimeters for testing.

"Cycling clearly is the divorced family," says Vaughters, 33, now retired and CEO of Slipstream Sports. "The furniture is in the front yard, the dog is running around without a leash — everyone in the neighborhood knows what's going on. Neighbors are looking out their windows and down their noses while at the same time lining up dates for the weekend on their spouses.

"Obviously, cycling has a problem with doping. But it is reduced. It was much worse in the '90s. It shows up on the radar often because the sport chose to pursue the problem. Any major team sport — baseball, the NFL, NHL — would come up with a whole lot more stuff than they did in the Spanish police raid (implicating former Tour winner Jan Ullrich). Fifteen years ago, cycling was where baseball is today."

If Vaughters is right, hold your breath regarding drugs and sports. Tuesday, the NFL toughened penalties for amphetamines. But when was the last time a pro football star not named Bill Romanowski tested positive for steroids and you heard about it? (Hint: Begins with "never.")

"The next 10 years is going to be one of the cleanest ever in professional cycling — and it will be one of the most painful eras for a lot of pro sports," Vaughters says.

Cycling remains synonymous with deception. Every day there seems to be a different allegation or re-cycling of news and old, festering personal wounds. In the case of Armstrong and adversaries such as international drug czar Dick Pound and former cyclist Greg LeMond, the rehashing of rumored treachery by the seven-time Tour kingpin is as tawdry as it is useless.

Last week it was revealed that a former Armstrong teammate, and the man's wife, swore under oath the inspirational cancer survivor admitted to a doctor (in their presence) that he doped.

Tyler Hamilton, the U.S. Olympic gold medalist suspended two years for doping, denied a report this week that a doctor billed him for blood-boosting work, including allegations he used steroids.

"Lance is extremely talented. Whether he doped or not, I have no idea," Vaughters says. "Here is a guy who, if everyone showed up clean, would win. I could've turned myself into a human chemistry lab and I still would not have been as good as Lance Armstrong."

Because the French were disgraced by a major doping scandal on their soil in the late 1990s, their attitude toward the sport was profoundly modified (some might suggest decades of not winning their own race made a difference, too). Testing of French cyclists is far more stringent, "10 times more than whatever I was subjected to when I was on the U.S. Postal Service team," says Vaughters, who also competed for a French contingent during his career.

It was in France where he culled the mandate he gives to young U.S. cyclists: "Do your best — don't take it beyond. We'd rather have you lose clean than win dirty."

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Warms To 'Border First' (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

Key backers of the Senate immigration bill said yesterday they are willing to consider a compromise that would delay the guest-worker program and "amnesty" portions until the borders have been secured.

The proposal was floated by Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter in an interview Monday with editors and reporters at The Washington Times.

"I think it's worth discussing," said Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican. "Many of us have said we could work on border enforcement and, at the same time, work on other aspects that would take more time."

DOJ_NMG_0037282

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, said a delay will occur anyway because it will take a few years to set up the guest-worker program and the structure to process millions of illegal aliens onto a pathway to citizenship.

"We've always understood that," he said, adding that the final bill must be "comprehensive" and include all provisions.

"That's the key," he said, after he, Mr. McCain and others hosted a broad coalition of outside groups demanding a comprehensive bill.

Reaction at the other end of the Capitol was more muted, with at least one key House leader continuing yesterday to point out flaws in the Senate bill.

The House and Senate approved very different immigration bills, with the House focusing on building 700 miles of fence on the U.S.-Mexico border, boosting enforcement and requiring employers to verify that their workers are here legally. The Senate bill boosts enforcement, too, but also creates a program for future immigrant workers and a path to citizenship for many current illegal aliens.

On Monday, Mr. Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who will lead House and Senate negotiators in the conference committee, told The Times that border security should be the top priority in the final bill and that he is open to a compromise that would make the guest-worker program and path to citizenship for illegal aliens contingent on first ensuring a secure border and improved interior enforcement.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican and key backer of the Senate bill, said yesterday he could see that as a possibility.

"I'm open to the idea that you'd have ... border-security benchmarks, interior-enforcement benchmarks, and once that's fulfilled, you start assimilating people," he said.

But just a month ago, many of these same senators -- including Mr. Specter, Mr. Graham and Mr. Kennedy -- voted against a proposal that would have set out a similar timeline requiring border security and improved enforcement before the rest of the Senate bill could proceed.

Mr. McCain, who wasn't present for the vote last month, said that approach was different from Mr. Specter's because it would have required the government to certify the border is "sealed" before the rest of the Senate bill could go forward -- a standard that he said could "never" be met.

While Mr. Specter's idea was received in the Senate with cautious optimism, House Republican leaders remained entrenched in their opposition to the Senate bill and stuck by their plans to hold hearings next month pointing out its shortfalls.

The office of House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican -- a staunch critic of the Senate bill -- had no comment yesterday on Mr. Specter's statements.

Meanwhile, the office of House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, pointed out yet another flaw in the Senate bill, saying it would actually weaken enforcement of immigration law by only permitting local law enforcement to assist federal agents in enforcing criminal violations of immigration law, not civil violations.

Many lawmakers say a final bill including any form of "amnesty" would never pass the House, whether those provisions are delayed or not.

"I don't think the House will go for anything that puts citizenship in the bill," said Sen. John Ensign, Nevada Republican, who thinks a compromise bill with a guest-worker program could work, as long as it didn't include citizenship for the millions of illegals already here, as the Senate bill would do.

In his comments Monday, Mr. Specter said that the Senate would insist that the final bill include a guest-worker program and a path to citizenship for many illegal aliens, but that he is also open to setting goals for border and interior enforcement ahead of those provisions.

Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican, said it's a "very big deal" that Mr. Specter is willing to put border security first in the final bill. He also said he has a bill that may bridge the "amnesty" divide between the two chambers because he thinks many House Republicans could accept a guest-worker program that requires illegal aliens to return to their home country before they can apply for it.

He has a proposal that would set up a privately run system to do this, and he thinks this "no-amnesty guest-worker" program could work.

"I think the majority of House conservatives would be open to a no-amnesty guest-worker program," he said.

His bill also would set up a time frame, dedicating two years exclusively to border security before progressing to the rest of the bill.

Mr. Specter told The Times on Monday that his staff is reviewing Mr. Pence's proposal.

Mr. Pence said the Senate bill's citizenship approach is a "non-starter" in the House because it would let illegal aliens remain in the U.S. and eventually become legal, which most Republicans reject as amnesty.

DOJ_NMG_0037283

Mr. McCain, Mr. Kennedy and others insist that it's not amnesty because the illegal aliens would have to fulfill a long list of demands and pay a fine before they can get in line for citizenship.

Meanwhile, Sen. Jeff Sessions, Alabama Republican, said that although he is "encouraged" by Mr. Specter's recent comments, he is concerned that such a compromise could allow "amnesty" without truly ensuring the borders are secure and immigration law is being properly enforced.

He said lawmakers shouldn't accept the Senate's contentious proposals "with nothing more than a promise for enforcement."

Senate May Budge On Immigration (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — With the House and Senate stalemated over how to overhaul immigration law, the contours of one potential path to an agreement have begun to emerge.

The House has approved a bill that focuses on improving border security and cracking down on illegal hiring. Many of the conservative Republicans who are dominant in the House have said that these security measures must be firmly in place before the House begins discussions about elements of a Senate-passed bill that would create a guest worker program and offer steps to citizenship for most illegal immigrants now in the U.S.

Now some Republican senators are suggesting — though gingerly — that they would be willing to agree to some kind of timetable in which goals related to border security and law enforcement must be met before the guest worker and citizenship programs that the senators favor could begin.

"The idea that we'll look at some sort of trigger before we implement everything else is worth some discussion," said Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.), who wrote part of the Senate plan that would offer legal status to many illegal immigrants.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), an architect of the Senate legislation, said that the Senate bill, in practice, would put border security ahead of other new immigration measures.

"Interior enforcement and border enforcement will go first…. It's going to take 18 months to two years to put the infrastructure in place to deal with guest workers," McCain said. He added that the same was true of the proposed Senate program to create a path to citizenship for most of the nation's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants.

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), who would lead any negotiations with the House, was quoted even more directly by the Washington Times newspaper on the idea of putting in place border security and law enforcement measures before other elements of an immigration package.

"It may be down the line that we will come to some terms on a timetable, with border security first and employment verification first," Specter was quoted as saying in the newspaper's Tuesday editions. Specter, who is chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, could not be reached for comment Tuesday.

Left unclear in the still-emerging conversation is whether senators would agree that specific border security and law enforcement goals or targets would have to be met before a guest worker or legalization program could begin.

It is also unclear whether the House would accept a step-by-step approach. Many House members say they oppose any citizenship program as an unwelcome "amnesty" for people who broke the law by crossing the border. Others say that guest worker programs undermine wages and job availability for native workers.

Still, some senators appealed Tuesday for House members to join them in negotiations to resolve the significant differences in the House and Senate visions of immigration policy. Those negotiations were expected to begin, but the House said last week that it wanted to hold a new round of hearings across the country on immigration before starting talks with the Senate.

"We are willing to negotiate with those who have specific disagreements with the Senate bill," McCain said Tuesday.

The senators' appeal to the House came as the Senate Appropriations Committee approved $31.7 billion for the Department of Homeland Security and its efforts to strengthen the borders in the fiscal year starting in October.

The funding is almost 5% more than last year's levels, with border protection allocated $65 million more than President Bush had requested.

"We focused aggressively on border protection," said committee chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.).

As GOP Bickers Over Immigration, Boehner Criticizes Dem 'silence' (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor And Josephine Hearn

The Hill, June 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037284

As Republicans continue to bicker among themselves on immigration reform, House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) ripped congressional Democrats yesterday for refusing to adopt a unified position on the controversial legislation.

The prospects for a bill's being signed into law this year dimmed significantly last week after House Republican leaders announced a series of hearings to examine a comprehensive Senate package that would allow undocumented workers already in this country a path to legal status.

"I think a feeble response from House Democrats on border security makes clear they have no coherent policy on this issue," Boehner said during his regular press briefing yesterday. "The stone silence from them is deafening."

Democratic leaders have spent much of this debate on the sidelines while Republicans in the House have sparred openly with their GOP colleagues in the Senate over the politically perilous question of what to do with those workers already in this country.

Thirty-six Democrats broke with their leadership and voted to approve a House package late last year drafted by Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) that would increase border protection and impose stiffer sanctions on companies that employ illegal immigrants. That included all 10 members of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee's (DCCC) Frontline program for the most vulnerable incumbents.

Boehner voted against the Sensenbrenner bill, saying earlier this year that he saw some of the provisions as an unfunded mandate on employers.

Democratic leaders insist their members remain largely unified on immigration reform.

"Frankly, I think this is not particularly a problem for us Democrats because Democrats are pretty well united," House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.) said during a recent press briefing. Hoyer said Republicans have a problem because GOP lawmakers in the House disagree with the White House while the Senate is somewhere in the middle. Most immigration experts say the Senate version is more to the administration's liking because it calls for a guest-worker program.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) criticized President Bush last week for not intervening more with his fellow Republicans to push "comprehensive bipartisan immigration reform."

"I said all along that it wouldn't happen unless the president used his leadership and intervened into this discussion to reject the Sensenbrenner Republican House bill," Pelosi told reporters during her regular briefing Thursday.

The minority leader said House Democrats would appear at a number of the upcoming field hearings to question Republican lawmakers for failing to protect the border and American workers.

Asked if Democrats would participate in the hearings or if they would hold competing hearings, Pelosi replied, "I'm just saying we won't be missing in the debate."

The issue does not divide easily along partisan lines, but it has become increasingly difficult for the GOP, pitting Republican House leaders against Bush and a large bloc of GOP senators. In fact, Republicans in the House are not universally opposed to the White House-backed Senate plan.

Immigration reform has become a major campaign test for select congressional Republicans, most recently for Utah Rep. Chris Cannon in that state's primary yesterday, which was undecided as of press time.

A political action committee affiliated with Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), who has maintained a long and steady drumbeat opposing illegal immigration or undocumented workers already in this country, has contributed significant funds to Cannon's Republican opponent, John Jacob, a wealthy developer.

Boehner's criticism of Democrats comes as House Republicans are attempting to blame Democrats for the immigration bill that passed in the GOP-led Senate.

In addition to calling the Senate bill the "Reid-Kennedy bill," in a nod to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), Boehner spokesman Kevin Madden is pushing members and staff to criticize Democrats for not taking a harder stance on immigration, leadership aides said.

The Republican Conference office is also expected to make immigration reform a major component of its member-outreach kits for the Fourth of July recess, one leadership aide said. Those kits will include talking points on the House-passed bill as well as the five statements of principle on the reform issue.

A Pelosi aide said immigration reform is crumbling because House Republicans did not work closely with Democrats in the House.

"The Speaker and Congressman Boehner believe in the principle of the majority of the majority," Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said. "They only care about House Democrats when they're in a political box and can't think their way out."

Senate Republicans were able to craft a bipartisan compromise because they worked more closely with the minority party, Crider said. More Democrats than Republicans voted for the Senate bill.

"Had the Republicans approached immigration reform in the way it should be, in a bipartisan, bicameral way … the House Republicans wouldn't be in this position," Crider said.

With the elections approaching, members from both parties are expected to shift the blame to their counterparts in the other party.

"If [Democrats] have to take a position it will rip their party apart," one senior House GOP leadership aide said. "It's going to put them in a position of backing an open border policy and weakened enforcement."

Court Says Prosecutors Pressure White-Collar Defendants Unfairly (WSJ)

By Laurie P. Cohen And Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

In a decision that bolsters white-collar defendants facing criminal investigations, a federal judge said prosecutors can't pressure companies to stop paying legal bills for indicted employees.

The ruling, by a judge overseeing the KPMG LLP accounting fraud case in a New York federal court, concluded that federal prosecutors gain an unfair advantage and violate the due process of indicted employees by pressuring their employers to refuse to pay their legal costs. The decision strikes down a key lever used by the government in several recent criminal investigations. (Read the ruling.1)

Defense lawyers argue that by pressuring companies to withhold fees for their employees' legal costs, the government is really pressuring defendants to plead guilty -- or face enormous legal bills from drawn-out cases. The government denies pressuring companies to halt payments.

In recent years, companies including KPMG and HealthSouth Corp. have refused to pay legal fees for some indicted executives after being warned that payment could be viewed as a sign of non-cooperation, according to lawyers. In March, a federal judge in New Hampshire voiced concern that Enterasys Networks Inc., a maker of wireless products, was wrongly pressured by the government to cut off funding of legal fees for employees charged in an alleged fraud.

"This is a big decision and it affects the broad assault on white-collar crime and accounting fraud," said William McLucas, a defense lawyer and former enforcement chief of the Securities and Exchange Commission who conducts internal investigations for companies facing potential fraud charges.

At issue is a 2003 memorandum that advised U.S. attorneys to "scrutinize the authenticity of a corporation's cooperation" when considering whether to seek criminal charges. Known as the "Thompson memo," for former Deputy Attorney General Larry D. Thompson, its author, the memo stated that prosecutors could take a company's willingness to advance legal fees to employees as a sign of lack of cooperation.

Yesterday's ruling concerned 16 former KPMG executives who face trial later this year for marketing allegedly fraudulent tax shelters. They have refused to cooperate with federal prosecutors and have pleaded not guilty. Though KPMG had said it would pay up to $400,000 in legal fees for employees who cooperated in the fraud case, the accounting firm fired the 16 for refusing to cooperate and denied them any fees.

"KPMG refused to pay because the government held the proverbial gun to its head," wrote U.S. District Judge Lewis A. Kaplan in his 83-page decision. "Had that pressure not been brought to bear, KPMG would have paid these defendants' legal expenses."

While declining to toss out the charges of conspiracy and accounting fraud against the defendants, Judge Kaplan said the 16 can challenge the accounting firm's refusal to pay their legal bills, and gave them two weeks to file civil suits.

A spokesman for KPMG, which wasn't a party to the fee dispute, said the firm is "reviewing the opinion."

The government is expected to appeal. "We are disappointed" by the decision, "which we respectfully believe is unsupported by the factual record and the applicable law," said Michael J. Garcia, U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York, which is overseeing the KPMG prosecution. "The actions of the government were entirely consistent with appropriate Department of Justice policy, and we believe that the prosecutors acted ethically and properly throughout this case."

The dispute has its roots in sentencing guidelines enacted by Congress in 1991, which said companies could get lenient treatment only if they cooperated with investigators. In 1999, the Justice Department advised prosecutors to consider companies' willingness to waive attorney-client privilege and "identify the culprits within the corporation" in judging cooperation. In 2003, the Justice Department codified "cooperation" in white-collar cases with the Thompson memo.

For many defendants, legal fees can play a big role in deciding whether to plead guilty or fight, some lawyers said. "For once, we're getting a judge who realizes how much it costs to defend someone in a white-collar case and that something needs to be done to assist people if there is going to be a presumption of innocence," said Ellen Podgor, a professor at Stetson University's law school.

In the fraud case at Enron Corp., for instance, lawyers for onetime top accountant Richard Causey said their client lacked the estimated $20 million he would need to defend himself. Mr. Causey later pleaded guilty, and some observers said he may have felt that was his best choice given the legal costs.

By contrast, former Enron Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling, who had a sizable personal fortune, pleaded not guilty. In his unsuccessful defense against fraud and conspiracy charges, he ultimately wracked up legal costs of more than $40 million, only $17 million of which was picked up by Enron's insurance.

The government hasn't always invoked the 2003 guidance. For instance, prosecutors didn't challenge the cooperation of Computer Associates in the fraud case there even though it covered the legal costs for some employees charged in the case.

Now, some lawyers said, they expect the government to standardize its approach in all cases. "You'll see a uniform position now with careful documentation," predicts Steven Peikin, a partner at Sullivan & Cromwell in New York and a former federal prosecutor.

People with knowledge of the KPMG case said the company is expected to argue that its own bylaws don't require the covering of legal bills -- or indemnification -- and that any challenge must first be arbitrated. But Judge Kaplan, anticipating that claim, signaled that he likely wouldn't support arbitration in the case.

If the decision stands, "there's no question it will affect future thinking by companies and the government about the whole indemnification issue," said Charles Stillman, an attorney for KPMG. However, he said, "A company has a right to make its own decisions, and the right to indemnification isn't constitutional."

KPMG reached a deferred-prosecution agreement with the government on tax-shelter charges last August, agreeing to pay $456 million. A trial in the case against the former KPMG executives is scheduled for autumn.

Judge Kaplan, himself a former corporate lawyer in Manhattan, took the prosecutors who testified in his courtroom about the fee dispute to task for denying that the government pressured KPMG not to pay employee legal fees.

"The government was economical with the truth in its early responses to this motion," he wrote. "KPMG's decision on payment of attorneys' fees was influenced by its interaction with the" U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan "and thus cannot fairly be said to have been a decision 'made by KPMG alone,' as the government represented."

Judge Blasts Pressure Put On KPMG Over Legal Fees (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, June 28, 2006

NEW YORK — A federal judge ruled Tuesday that the U.S. Attorney's office unfairly pressured the KPMG accounting firm not to pay the legal expenses of former partners who have been charged with selling abusive tax shelters. It marked a stinging rebuke to federal prosecutors here and the Justice Department's approach to corporate prosecutions as a whole.

In a narrow sense, the ruling means that more than a dozen former KPMG partners and employees under indictment can now have their legal costs paid upfront by the accounting firm.

But more broadly, the ruling strikes at the Justice Department's policy for determining whether to bring charges against corporations. That policy, known as the Thompson Memorandum, was written after the indictment and collapse of the Arthur Andersen auditing firm. It sets out the conditions prosecutors should take under advisement when deciding whether to bring criminal charges against a corporation.

In order to avoid prosecution for suspected criminal wrongdoing, the memorandum states, a corporation has to show that it is cooperating fully with the Justice Department's investigation. If the corporation is paying the legal fees of employees under investigation, prosecutors could view that as being less than fully cooperative.

U.S. District Judge Lewis Kaplan blasted that viewpoint in his 83-page decision. Under the Sixth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, he wrote, every employee of a corporation, from hourly workers to top-ranked managers, has the right “to have their employers pay their legal expenses if they are sued as a result of their doing their jobs. This right is as much a part of the bargain between employer and employee as salary or wages.”

Legal experts hailed the ruling as a restoration of balance between the government's interest in prosecuting bad behavior and defendants' rights to adequate counsel:

·“The court is evening the playing field and making the government play fair,” says Jacob Frenkel, an attorney at Shulman Rogers in Rockville, Md. “The constitution still carries more weight than Justice Department guidance.”

·“The government is violating constitutional rights when it pressures corporations not to pay legal expenses,” says John Coffee, an expert in securities law at Columbia University.

·“It's a public smackdown,” says former prosecutor David Gourevitch, a Manhattan attorney.

In response to the ruling, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said he was “disappointed.”

DOJ_NMG_0037287

"The actions of the government were entirely consistent with appropriate Department of Justice policy, and we believe that the prosecutors acted ethically and properly throughout this case," Garcia said.

In August, KPMG admitted selling abusive tax shelters and agreed to pay $456 million in fines.

Policy On Legal Fees Excessive, Judge Says (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

A Justice Department policy that warns companies against paying legal bills for employees under investigation violated the workers' constitutional rights, a federal judge ruled, as he blasted the government for letting "its zeal get in the way of its judgment."

U.S. District Judge Lewis A. Kaplan criticized the federal government for holding "the proverbial gun" to the head of accounting firm KPMG LLP and advising the firm not to pay full fees to lawyers defending more than a dozen former partners on fraud charges.

The policy "interfered" with the executives' ability to fight criminal charges in a case that has been called the largest tax fraud in history, the judge wrote. He said the government "evidenced a desire to minimize the involvement of the defense attorneys" and added that "the government's proper concern is not with obtaining convictions."

Kaplan's harshly worded 83-page decision handed a potent symbolic victory to defense lawyers and business groups, who have for years complained that the government is overreaching in its attempt to weed out fraud after the Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. scandals.

An unusual coalition of trade organizations, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the Securities Industry Association and the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, banded together to fight the policy and submitted court briefs in the KPMG case.

"This decision is a big step in curbing abuse of the significant power that prosecutors enjoy," said Michael J. Madigan, a lawyer at Akin Gump LLP in the District who is defending John Lanning, one of the former KPMG executives. "Hopefully, the decision will be read carefully by U.S. attorneys around the country."

E. Lawrence Barcella Jr., a lawyer at Paul Hastings LLP in the District who represents former KPMG partner Larry DeLap, said he hoped the decision would signal an end to prosecutors using a "litmus test for cooperation that undermined employees' constitutional rights."

Michael J. Garcia, the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York, said he was "disappointed by the ruling . . . which we respectfully believe is unsupported by the factual record and the applicable law."

The prosecutor added, in a prepared statement: "The actions of the Government were entirely consistent with appropriate Department of Justice policy, and we believe that the prosecutors acted ethically and properly throughout this case."

At issue is a three-year-old document known as the Thompson memo, named after former U.S. deputy attorney general Larry D. Thompson. The memo, which binds federal prosecutors across the nation, sets out factors for the government to consider when deciding whether to indict a corporation. Central to the analysis is how much companies have cooperated with prosecutors, including such things as handing over documents, making available witnesses, waiving attorney-client privilege and not aiding employees who are suspected of wrongdoing by paying severance or their legal bills.

Last month, prosecutors in California indicted the law firm Milberg Weiss LLP, in part based on the argument that the firm had failed to waive its legal privilege and help the government investigate payments to third parties in exchange for serving as plaintiffs in securities cases.

The government policy has long vexed defense lawyers, who claim it violates clients' rights to a fair trial and to be represented by attorneys, a position with which Kaplan agreed after holding an unusual three-day hearing where prosecutors testified under oath about their conversations with KPMG.

But the immediate practical implications of the decision are less clear.

The judge rejected outright a bid by defense lawyers to dismiss the criminal charges against their clients. He did, however, invite them to file a related lawsuit against KPMG for the fees within two weeks' time. He also urged KPMG to pay the fees of its own accord and encouraged prosecutors to lean on the accounting firm to do so.

George Ledwith, a spokesman for KPMG, said the firm was reviewing the decision. But in court papers lodged this year, KPMG said the former executives could not sue because they were subject to mandatory arbitration clauses in their partnership agreements. Kaplan said in a footnote to his opinion that if such arguments are raised in front of him, he will consider whether they stand in the face of "public policy."

KPMG of New York already has paid $456 million under an August deal with federal prosecutors that allowed the firm to survive and avoid criminal charges over its sale and marketing of abusive tax shelters in the 1990s. A similar indictment killed rival Arthur Andersen LLP four years ago.

Eager to cooperate with the government and avoid Andersen's fate, KPMG capped lawyer fees at $400,000 per employee and required employees to pick up any additional fees. The firm has advanced more than $10 million in fees for its current and former partners.

The criminal case against the former partners and other advisers, set for trial Sept., 11, could yet be postponed. Kaplan has called for a hearing next month on another defense motion, this one related to a dispute over the exchange of more than 6 million documents in the complex case. In one exhibit, defense lawyers offered a picture of documents nibbled by rats in a Queens, N.Y., warehouse.

Judge Faults U.S. In Tax Case (LAT)

By Kathy M. Kristof And Walter Hamilton, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

Prosecutors erred in forcing KPMG to stop paying employees' legal bills, a ruling says.

In a ruling that could force the government to change its tactics in some corporate fraud cases, a federal judge said Tuesday that the Justice Department violated the rights of 16 former KPMG executives by coercing the accounting firm to cut off funds for their defense.

In a harshly written opinion, U.S. District Judge Lewis Kaplan said the government "let its zeal get in the way of its judgment" and "violated the Constitution it is sworn to defend."

In a statement, U.S. Atty. Michael Garcia countered that "the actions of the government were entirely consistent with appropriate Department of Justice policy, and we believe that the prosecutors acted ethically and properly throughout this case."

At issue was a Justice Department practice in which prosecutors ask companies whether they are paying the legal bills for employees charged with corporate crimes. The tactic derived from a 2003 memo from former Deputy Atty. Gen. Larry Thompson, which said prosecutors may weigh a company's legal defense of its employees in deciding whether the company itself should be prosecuted.

In a hearing on the issue a month ago, Kaplan likened the Thompson memo to "the barrel of a rifle."

KPMG agreed last year to pay $456 million to settle charges that it promoted fraudulent tax shelters to wealthy investors, including Global Crossing Ltd. founder Gary Winnick, Guess Inc. co-Chairmen Paul and Maurice Marciano and former California Republican gubernatorial candidate Bill Simon Jr.

But the firm — unlike the 16 former employees — was not indicted.

In court papers, KPMG acknowledged that it had departed from a longtime policy to pay its employees' legal bills. Instead, the accounting firm decided in the tax fraud case that it would pay bills only for those who cooperated with the government and agreed to a $400,000 cap on fees, and that payments would cease for workers who were criminally charged.

"If those whom the government suspects are culpable in fact are guilty, they should pay the price," Kaplan ruled. "But determination of guilt or innocence must be made fairly — not in a proceeding in which the government has obtained an unfair advantage long before the trial even has begun."

Legal experts said Kaplan's ruling would probably force the government to reexamine its use of the Thompson memo.

"It's going to chill the government's willingness" to use this tactic, said Steven Peikin, a partner at Sullivan & Cromwell in New York and former chief of the securities fraud division at the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan.

The ruling also could affect scores of other corporate fraud cases being prosecuted in cities all over the country, experts said.

"The implications for the criminal defense bar nationwide are huge," said Joseph Price, a partner at law firm Arent Fox in New York. "If this stands up on appeal, it could affect hundreds of cases."

Justice Department officials did not say whether they would appeal.

John Coffee, a Columbia University law professor, said a legal challenge would be risky because an opinion upholding Kaplan could further restrict the ability of prosecutors to apply pressure in white-collar cases.

"I think [the judge] is dead right, and he's going to stop this practice dead in its tracks," Coffee said.

Charles Rettig, a partner at Hochman, Salkin, Rettig, Toscher & Perez in Beverly Hills, speculated that Kaplan's ruling alone might be sufficient to make the government's tactic obsolete.

"It will likely cause the government to back away from any discussion regarding an entity paying defense costs of current or former employees," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0037289

The defendants in the KPMG case include Jeffrey Stein, the firm's former deputy chairman, and Gregg Ritchie, a former tax partner in KPMG's Woodland Hills office.

Business groups including the Securities Industry Assn. and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce had filed friend-of-the-court briefs on behalf of the defense because they were concerned about the Justice Department in effect taking away the employer's discretion to defend workers for "acts committed in the course of employment," Rettig said.

Federal Judge Blasts U.S. Pressure On KPMG Case Fees (LAW)

By Mark Hamblett, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, June 28, 2006

Southern District of New York Judge Lewis Kaplan delivered a harsh rebuke to prosecutors Tuesday for pressuring KPMG to cut off legal fees for employees unwilling to cooperate in the largest tax fraud investigation in the nation's history.

Saying the government "let its zeal get in the way of its judgment" and "violated the Constitution it is sworn to defend," Kaplan in United States v. Stein, S1 05 Crim. 0888, found that prosecutors had violated the Fifth and Sixth amendments by "causing KPMG to cut off legal fees and other defense costs upon indictment."

The decision has been eagerly anticipated by defense groups and business organizations such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Association of Corporate Counsel, who have become increasingly concerned at prosecutorial tactics they believe are eroding defendants' rights to counsel and a fair trial.

Kaplan said KPMG should consider paying the fees of 16 former employees now under indictment. He invited the former partners and employees of the accounting company to sue for fees if need be. And he urged the government to use its influence with the company to persuade it to pay the fees.

For the moment, Kaplan declined defense requests to dismiss the indictments although he held open that possibility.

KPMG had long made it a practice to pay the fees of its employees, the judge found, but it changed its policies in the hopes of obtaining the deferred prosecution agreement it ultimately signed in August 2004.

In an 83-page opinion that was unsparing in its criticism of the government, Kaplan said KPMG was so intent on staving off indictment and surviving as an entity that it told its employees it would no longer pay their fees if they refused to cooperate with the government and that it would cut off fees for those who were indicted.

"KPMG refused to pay because the government held the proverbial gun to its head," the judge said.

David Spears of Richards Spears Kibbe & Orbe, one of the attorneys for lead defendant Jeffrey Stein, said he was "floating on air" after reading the judge's opinion.

"This decision will change the way the government does business in the investigation and prosecution of entities," Spears said.

Southern District U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia issued a statement saying, "We are disappointed in Judge Kaplan's opinion today ... which we respectfully believe is unsupported by the factual record and the applicable law. The actions of the government were entirely consistent with appropriate Department of Justice policy, and we believe that the prosecutors acted ethically and properly throughout this case."

While the judge said that monetary relief against the government for the violations is precluded by sovereign immunity, and KPMG is technically not a party to the case, he said he had ancillary jurisdiction to resolve the issue of whether KPMG can be forced to pay the legal fees and costs of those under indictment. He directed the clerk to open a civil docket number for the claims of defendants against KPMG and gave them 14 days to do so.

But the judge also said dismissal of the indictment ("or other unpalatable relief") is still a possibility if the legal fees of those under indictment are not paid.

"The government has substantial influence and almost certainly, power over KPMG by virtue of the cooperation clauses in the [deferred prosecution agreement]," the judge said. "It may well be in its interest to use that influence or power to cause KPMG to advance the defense costs."

Charles Stillman of Stillman Friedman & Schechtman, who represents KPMG, said the company was reviewing its options.

"If the defendants are going to consider any possibility of action against [KPMG], they will have to pay attention to their contractual relationship with the firm, including whether or not they have the right to go to court or arbitration," Stillman said.

GOVERNMENT PRESSURE

The judge's opinion comes on the heels of a May hearing he held to explore improper government influence over KPMG fee policy and its impact on the due process rights and the right to counsel of the defendants.

DOJ_NMG_0037290

The hearing focused on meetings and communications between prosecutors and KPMG attorneys in early 2004, shortly after it was blistered by a Senate subcommittee investigating tax shelters for the wealthy. The shelters, prosecutors ultimately contended, were nothing but paper transactions that cost the government more than $2 billion in tax revenue.

With the heat on KPMG, the company hired Robert Bennett of Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom to try a fresh approach to dealing with the government. It also dismissed Stein, the firm's deputy chairman, who left with a generous severance agreement that included the advancement of legal fees.

KPMG, Stein's lawyers said, later reneged on the fee obligation because it feared the government would discover the arrangement and indict the firm.

At a Feb. 25 meeting, prosecutors asked Bennett and other representatives of KPMG about the firm's policy on fees for employees under investigation and whether or not the firm had "discretion" to pay the fees.

The question was an important one, given the Thompson Memorandum, a 2003 Justice Department policy statement on measuring the cooperation of entities as a factor in determining whether the government would offer a deferred prosecution agreement.

The Thompson Memo instructs prosecutors to consider several factors in deciding whether to charge a company criminally, including whether it waives the attorney-client privilege, whether it protects culpable employees by letting them keep their jobs and whether it advances them legal fees, and whether they share information about the investigation.

According to the government, the payment, or withholding, of legal fees was not the determining factor in its decision to ultimately reach a deferred prosecution agreement with KPMG. The firm avoided indictment, otherwise known as the corporate death penalty, by pledging cooperation with the government and agreeing to pay $456 million.

But defense lawyers for the 17 former KPMG employees (one pleaded guilty) cried foul, saying that two prosecutors essentially threatened the company to use its fee policy to force employees to cooperate.

At closing argument in May, Assistant U.S. Attorney Marc A. Weinstein insisted that the Thompson Memo could not, "in and of itself," have dictated KPMG's decision to change its fee policy. The issue of fees, Weinstein insisted, is only explored by the government when it suspects a company of "circling the wagons" and offering sham cooperation -- pretending to cooperate in an investigation while shielding individual wrongdoers and offering them support, sometimes through the advancement of legal expenses.

Kaplan shot back on the Thompson Memo.

"If that is true," he said, then the people at the Justice Department were "lousy drafters" and they should "start all over again."

And if that was true, he said, then "that is certainly not what they have said to the defense bar of America."

INTERSECTION OF PRINCIPLES

In Tuesday's opinion, Kaplan said the Stein case and the Thompson Memo presented an intersection of three principles -- the due process guarantee of a fair trial, the Sixth Amendment right to the assistance of competent counsel and a third principle, "not of constitutional dimension" but important nonetheless, "an employer often must reimburse an employee for legal expenses when the employee is sued, or even charged with a crime, as a result of doing his or her job."

The judge explored the 1999 Holder Memorandum, a Justice Department policy statement that said the government might view the advancement of fees to personnel of a business entity under investigation as "protection of culpable individuals."

The Thompson Memo took the fee statement in the Holder Memo one step further by making it mandatory for all federal prosecutors to consider an entity's legal fee policy.

Shirah Neiman, chief counsel to Garcia, was asked at the May hearing whether her reference to "federal guidelines" on corporation cooperation agreements at the February 2004 meeting specifically concerned the fee issue. Neiman pointedly told the KPMG legal team that "misconduct" would not be "rewarded."

She testified that her statement was not a reference to fees but was instead addressed to any severance arrangements between KPMG and other top executives during its attempt to clean house.

But defense lawyers argued that the reference to the Thompson Memo in tandem with a discussion on KPMG's fee policy proved their point -- that the government was trying to muscle the company on fees.

FIRM 'GOT THE MESSAGE'

Kaplan said he found it "unnecessary to decide Neiman's subjective purpose in making the remark because what is more important is how her comment was understood."

KPMG's actions in the aftermath of the February 2004 meeting, he said, made it clear that the company got "the message."

After reviewing the facts, Kaplan found that the government "conducted itself in a manner that evidenced a desire to minimize the involvement of defense attorneys."

DOJ_NMG_0037291

In March 2004, the firm sent out a form letter to employees who might become subjects of the investigation or might otherwise be considered under suspicion. The letter said the firm would pay fees up to $400,000 as long as the individuals cooperated with the government promptly, completely and truthfully and that monies for fees and expenses would cease if the person was charged with criminal wrongdoing.

The firm then drafted an advisory memorandum that urged employees to cooperate but also said they had the right to be represented by counsel, referred to some of the advantages of having counsel, and said KPMG had arranged for independent counsel for employees who wanted to consult with them.

After two government prosecutors expressed disappointment with the "tone" of the letter, Kaplan said, KPMG "capitulated" to their "demand" that new language be added, including one line that advises employees "you may deal directly with government representatives without counsel."

Kaplan said "it is entirely plain that the government's purpose in demanding the supplement was to increase the chances that KPMG employees would agree to interviews without consulting or being represented by counsel."

"From that point forward," he said, "the government took full advantage."

In the end, the judge found that "[a]bsent the Thompson Memorandum and the actions of the U.S. Attorney's Office, KPMG would have paid the legal fees and expenses of all of its partners and employees both prior to and after indictment, without regard to cost."

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT

The judge said those actions diminished the fairness of a criminal proceeding, a principle that "not only prevents the prosecution from interfering actively with the defense, but also from passively hampering the defendant's efforts."

He said the right to fairness in the criminal process is a "fundamental liberty interest entitled to substantive due process protection."

Kaplan said that a defendant's "right to prepare defense resources lawfully available to him or her, free of knowing or reckless government interference" was "basic to our concepts of justice and fair play. It is fundamental."

He concluded that the Thompson Memorandum "is not narrowly tailored to achieve a compelling" governmental objective and therefore fails examination under the strict scrutiny standard.

The government's argument on the Sixth Amendment, that the right to counsel could not have been implicated in many of its actions because the right does not attach until indictment, did not convince the judge.

The KPMG defendants were also not obliged to show that they were prejudiced by the violation, the judge found, because, under the circumstances, "prejudice must be presumed."

He said it was premature to consider the remedy sought by the defendants, dismissal of the indictment, "prior to the exhaustion of all possible courses that could lead to that outcome."

The defendants had argued that, despite sovereign immunity, the judge still had the power to award attorney fees in the form of monetary sanctions for prosecutorial misconduct. The judge rejected the argument, as he did an argument that the Federal Tort Claims Act and the Administrative Procedure Act waived sovereign immunity.

The defendants' complaints against KPMG for fees, he said, may contain a prayer for declaratory relief. The judge promised to grant a speedy hearing on such a request.

The ruling came just three days after the New York State Bar Association passed a resolution condemning what it views as pervasive interference by the federal government into the right to counsel.

"The resolution that we passed states, as a matter of policy, that the government should not, must not, pressure corporations to breach their obligation to indemnify employees and thereby prevent their employees from having counsel," said state bar President Mark H. Alcott of Paul Weiss Rifkind Wharton & Garrison, who welcomed Kaplan's ruling. "It's really a pretty simple concept, but these days the government doesn't seem to get it. People have a right to an attorney, and the government has no business interfering with that."

Judge: U.S. Acted Unconstitutionally In Pressuring KPMG (AP)

By David B. Caruso, Associated Press

AP, June 28, 2006

NEW YORK – A federal judge accused the Justice Department on Tuesday of trying to gain an unfair advantage in white-collar criminal cases by making it tougher for defendants to get a high-priced legal team.

Since at least 2003, federal prosecutors have been warning scandal-plagued companies that the government might consider them “uncooperative” if they pay the legal bills of employees accused of wrongdoing – a serious threat to a company trying to avoid an indictment.

DOJ_NMG_0037292

U.S. District Judge Lewis A. Kaplan ruled Tuesday that federal prosecutors made just such a threat to the accounting firm KPMG in 2004, and as a result, the company cut off legal aid to 16 employees charged with setting up illegal tax shelters.

In a harshly worded opinion, Kaplan said prosecutors had interfered with the defendants' right to a fair trial.

"Justice is not done when the government uses the threat of indictment ... to coerce companies into depriving their present and even former employees of the means of defending themselves against criminal charges in a court of law," he wrote.

"If those whom the government suspects are culpable in fact are guilty, they should pay the price. But the determination of guilt or innocence must be made fairly – not in a proceeding in which the government has obtained an unfair advantage long before the trial even has begun."

U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia said in a written statement that he was disappointed in the opinion, which he called "unsupported by the factual record."

"The actions of the government were entirely consistent with appropriate Department of Justice policy, and we believe that the prosecutors acted ethically and properly throughout this case," he said.

Previously, prosecutors insisted they hadn't intentionally pressured KPMG into any action regarding legal fees. They also said the government would not seek to punish the company if it resumed paying its employees' bills.

Kaplan did not reach a final decision Tuesday on how to remedy things for the KPMG defendants, who are accused of developing questionable tax shelters that allowed some wealthy clients to dodge $2.5 billion in taxes.

He declined a defense motion to immediately dismiss the charges, saying to do so would be extreme.

U.S. law prevents the judge from ordering the government to pay the defendants' legal expenses, so Kaplan suggested that the defendants sue KPMG for the money instead. He ordered a civil docket opened to ease their path if they wish to do so.

It isn't clear what would happen if KPMG were to resist paying those bills, which could amount to hundreds of thousands or even millions of dollars. Kaplan would say in his decision only that the court might step in if "KPMG does not, for one reason or another, advance defense costs."

A spokesman for KPMG, George Ledwith, declined to comment, other than to say that the company was reviewing the opinion.

KPMG LLP has signed a deal admitting its role in the tax shelter scheme. It avoided criminal prosecution by agreeing to pay a $456 million penalty, including $128 million in forfeited fees from sales of the shelters.

Thompson Memo, R.I.P.? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

Something remarkable and salutary happened in a Manhattan courtroom this week: U.S. District Court Judge Lewis A. Kaplan upheld the logic and meaning of the Constitution's Due Process Clause and the Sixth Amendment.

The case involves the Justice Department's prosecution of 16 former KPMG executives, accused of having engineered fraudulent tax shelters for their clients. We have our doubts about just how "fraudulent" those shelters were, seeing that they were never banned by the IRS, their legality was never tested in court, and KPMG stopped marketing them long before the IRS listed them as suspect. The criminal trial will be no slam dunk.

But the real whopper was the decision by KPMG to stop paying the legal fees of its former executives, largely to satisfy the requirements of the so-called Thompson memo. That 2002 document, written by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson amid corporate scandal fever, laid out the measures that companies facing prosecution could take to demonstrate cooperation and thereby avoid firm-wide indictment. Not wishing to share the fate of bankrupted Arthur Andersen, KPMG complied with the Thompson diktat and hung its executives out to dry while negotiating a deferred prosecution accord.

Enter Judge Kaplan, who on Monday delivered a scathing 83-page rebuke of the government's case. Noting that Constitutional rights to a fair trial and competent counsel were at stake here, he went on to limn a third principle, "not of constitutional dimension," but "very much a part of American life." To wit:

"Bus drivers sued for accidents, cops sued for allegedly wrongful arrests, nurses named in malpractice cases, news reporters sued in libel cases, and corporate chieftains embroiled in securities litigation generally have [the right] to have their employers pay their legal expenses." By holding "the proverbial gun to [KPMG's] head" with the threat of a company-wide indictment, the Judge wrote, the government had used the company as a proxy to violate the defendants' rights.

The 16 defendants must still contend with the charges of the indictment. But with KPMG now required to foot their legal bills, at least they don't face the bleak choice between financial ruin or copping a plea. As for the Justice Department, now is the time for Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to reinterpret, or better yet rewrite, those parts of the Thompson memo that his too-zealous prosecutors have been using in violation of defendants' due process rights.

IRS Employees Caught Peeking At Confidential Taxpayer Files (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0037293

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

Confidential taxpayer records may not always be quite as confidential as they're supposed to be.

A new Treasury report says many Internal Revenue Service employees have been caught illegally browsing through taxpayer files in recent years. In some cases, IRS employees have lost their jobs. In other cases, they have even gone to prison.

Treasury agents have investigated more than 3,700 cases of potential violations in the past eight years, resulting in more than 1,600 "adverse personnel actions" by the IRS, including firings and suspensions, the report says. In addition, 126 IRS employees have been criminally prosecuted for such violations.

The Treasury's findings come despite stronger taxpayer-privacy legislation and tighter IRS internal controls since the 1990s, when Congress and IRS officials became deeply concerned about highly publicized reports of unauthorized browsing by IRS workers. Senior IRS officials say they long have taken the problem seriously and have intensified efforts to train workers about the importance of safeguarding taxpayer records. "This is a very high-priority area for us," says Daniel Galik, IRS chief of security services.

Even so, "there has not been a noticeable decrease" in the number of violations over the past eight years, says a report to Congress by the Treasury Inspector General for Tax Administration.

At issue is what's known in Washington jargon as UNAX -- or "unauthorized access to taxpayer information" -- by IRS employees, as well as other federal and state employees and private contractors. Violations can include a wide range of wrongdoing. Some offenders have merely been curious voyeurs about the lives of the rich and famous. Others have been more interested in spying on friends, neighbors and enemies. Some have tried to use illegally gleaned information for financial gain, court records show.

During the six months ended March 31, the Treasury unit says its UNAX program identified and analyzed 247 leads of potential "unauthorized access" and referred 152 criminal cases to agents for investigation. The results included nine criminal prosecutions and 79 "adverse administrative actions" against IRS employees.

Consider the case of Janine Turner, a former IRS official (and not the actress). Just last month, Ms. Turner was sentenced to federal prison for a year and a day. Ironically, her job at the IRS was senior supervisory official in New Jersey responsible for overseeing access to restricted taxpayer information on the IRS's computers.

Ms. Turner admitted to unlawfully tapping into IRS computers on more than 150 occasions, getting confidential information, court records show. Her lawyer, William F. Lang III of Cedar Knolls, N.J., declined to elaborate on the case, as did a federal prosecutor. But Mr. Lang did confirm Ms. Turner has begun serving her sentence.

In another case, a former IRS employee in California agreed to plead guilty to "unauthorized access." She received a year of "supervised probation," was fined $1,000 and ordered to do 75 hours of community service, according to the Treasury report.

IRS officials point out that the number of violations is tiny compared with the total number of tax returns that pour in to the IRS each year and the number of IRS employees. (The IRS has roughly 100,000 workers, a spokesman says.) Moreover, Mr. Galik says the number of cases involving wrongdoing is significantly less than it was in the early to mid-1990s.

Even so, the problem's persistence troubles tax lawyers. "If there is only one violation, that's more than enough to be concerned about" because "the confidentiality of taxpayer information is so important to the proper functioning of the tax system," says Greg Jenner, a former Treasury official and now executive vice president of the American Council of Life Insurers in Washington.

It's unclear whether legislation will ever be able to overcome the foibles of human nature. "So long as income-tax returns are filed, with all the inviting details they provide, some curious people -- and some with worse motives -- are going to try to look at them," says Donald Alexander, a former IRS commissioner and now a lawyer at Akin Gump in Washington. * * *

Paulson vows to continue crackdown on bogus tax shelters.

Henry M. Paulson Jr., President Bush's nominee to be Treasury secretary, told senators yesterday that "I feel very strongly" about the need to continue the Treasury's efforts to combat "abusive" tax shelters.

During Mr. Paulson's confirmation hearing, Senate Finance Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley (R., Iowa) said committee tax staffers had reviewed Mr. Paulson's tax returns. Staffers found that "you did not participate in tax-shelter activities," Sen. Grassley said. Staffers also concluded "that, in your role as a senior executive at Goldman Sachs, you were not active in aggressive tax planning" or shelter activities.

"Let me say, I'm very pleased at that outcome," Sen. Grassley said. * * *

Thousands of people get a chance to sound off on IRS service.

The IRS says it's surveying nearly 50,000 people this month to help it improve taxpayer services. Taxpayers are being chosen at random. The survey doesn't ask for any financial or personal information, "nor should any be divulged," the IRS says.

Individual responses "will remain confidential," the IRS says. * * *

BRIEFS: Rain-damage update: The IRS's headquarters in Washington, will remain closed at least through Friday, a spokesman said. ... The Senate Finance Committee today plans to consider taxpayer-protection legislation that includes expanded regulation of paid tax preparers. Diaz Tax Ordeal Is Over (BSH)

By Anita Lee

Biloxi Sun Herald, June 28, 2006

GULFPORT - A legal nightmare that began almost four years ago for state Supreme Court Justice Oliver Diaz Jr. and his former wife, Jennifer, ended quietly Tuesday after a 10-minute appearance in U.S. District Court, when Jennifer Diaz was sentenced to two years of supervised probation for income tax evasion.

Judge Walter J. Gex III ordered her to pay $58,500 in restitution, but then Assistant U.S. Attorney Don Burkhalter and Diaz's attorney, James Kitchens of Jackson, told Gex the amount should be left blank until the IRS sorts out the figures.

"I promised Jennifer early on that if she cooperated with us, I would do what I could to get her a favorable sentence," Assistant U.S. Attorney Don Burkhalter said after the proceedings. "As far as what I could determine, she told the truth, so I had an obligation to do what I said I would do.

"I don't have any regrets about indicting them on the tax case. I just wish it had turned out better for the government."

The U.S. Justice Department began investigating campaign contributions to judges in 2002, turning up suspicious loans from Coast attorneys to a Biloxi bed and breakfast the Diazes bought while married.

A year later, the investigation turned into judicial bribery and fraud charges against the Diazes, Biloxi attorney Paul Minor and two former trial court judges, John Whitfield and Wes Teel. Headlines played across the pages of Mississippi newspapers for several years as the case wound its way to a three-month trial last summer.

Before the trial started, Jennifer Diaz pleaded guilty to a separate charge of tax evasion. Attorneys had repaid campaign loans for them, which they had failed to report as income.

In exchange for her cooperation, the government dropped all judicial bribery charges against her. Even if a jury convicted her husband, she reasoned at the time, she would be home to raise their two young children.

Prosecutors never called her to testify against her ex-husband during the judicial bribery trial. A jury acquitted him of charges at the trial's conclusion.

A second jury acquitted Oliver Diaz Jr., who had been suspended from the bench after his 2003 indictment, on the tax evasion charges in April. He was reinstated to the Supreme Court bench in May.

"Jennifer thanks her many, many friends for their support and prayers through this long ordeal," said Kitchens. "She will always be remembered by me as a very courageous woman who decided to do what was best for her family."

Family spokesman Gerald Maples said the Diazes are living together with their children in Jackson.

Oliver Diaz Jr. and his parents attended her sentencing. He said they have not discussed marrying again, although Maples said it might happen.

"It's over now," Maples said. "This incredibly difficult experience is finally over for the Diaz family."

Republicans Lack Votes In Senate To Cut Estate Tax (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Senate Republicans pulled back from a vote this week on the federal estate tax, admitting they still lack the needed support for a House-passed measure that would exempt all but the wealthiest Americans.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) pledged to return to the issue after the July Fourth recess, but his announcement captured the increased frustration among Republicans in advancing their legislative agenda before the November elections.

As talks continued last evening, the leadership held out hope for agreement this week on the outlines of major pension legislation but admitted there is no chance of floor action until next month. A long promised lobbying-overhaul bill remains stymied, and instead of the usual rush before the holiday recess, lawmakers settled into a slow pace leading up to the annual Congressional Republican-Democrat baseball game tomorrow night.

Hispanic supporters of a Senate immigration bill announced their own voter registration drive beginning this weekend in hopes of stimulating action in Congress. Even hard-edged conservative activist Grover Norquist had to struggle to control his emotions at a news conference calling for comprehensive legislation, a top priority for President Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0037295

But House Majority Leader John Boehner (R., Ohio) was dry-eyed and cautious. "If we can get a good bill before the election, I'd take it," he said. "But a good bill is a bill that's strong on border security and on enforcing our immigration laws."

Asked if he was still confident he can get a bill before the elections, he said, "I think we can get a bill. I didn't say when."

Given the impasse, a $32.8 billion Homeland Security bill, which won initial approval yesterday in the Senate Appropriations Committee, could become a magnet for immigration-related provisions. The measure also shows the pressures on Republicans as they struggle to deal with border security in the confines of a tight budget.

With the Customs and Border Patrol, more than $225 million is added to the president's budget for improved aircraft and detention facilities. But the committee can't keep pace with Mr. Bush's pressure for more border agents and prison beds, and the bill assumes a $200 million cut from science and technology funds that will be controversial.

Mindful of the Republican troubles, Democrats have sought to ratchet up pressure for their own agenda, including a proposed $2.10-an-hour increase in the federal minimum wage.

The hourly wage has remained at $5.15 for nine years, and breaking with his custom, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) said he and fellow Democrats would now oppose any adjustment in congressional pay until the minimum wage also is increased. He declined to spell out how he will block the next $3,300 increase, due to take effect Jan. 1. But even Mr. Boehner, an opponent of raising the minimum wage, has begun to acknowledge that Republicans must deal with the issue before November.

Democrats also believe they are helped now by the juxtaposition of the minimum wage, for low income workers, with the Republican drive to lower estate taxes, for often wealthy households. The two issues may yet be joined in an election-year deal, but the huge future cost of the proposed estate-tax reductions will make it difficult for Democrats to easily accept.

Republicans, who have long sought outright repeal of the estate tax, have shifted focus to a more incremental approach exempting the first $5 million of any individual's estate, $10 million for a married couple. Above this point, the House bill, for example, would tax as much as $25 million at the current capital gains rate of 15%, which is scheduled to rise to 20% in 2011. Above $25 million, the rate would be double: 30% at first, then 40% if the capital gains rate rises as scheduled.

Conservative Republicans have grumbled about these terms, but the greater focus has been on winning a handful of Democrats to give Mr. Frist the 60 votes he needs to avoid a filibuster. Before passage last week, the House added tax breaks for the timber industry to try to win over Southern and Western Democrats.

A major question is whether Mr. Frist will add more provisions or make side deals as part of a tax package that will be included in the final pension bill. Sen. Mark Pryor (D., Ark.), one of those being courted, acknowledged he has had discussions related to tax legislation he champions to spur investment in poor rural areas. But Mr. Pryor said he was still concerned by the costs of the House package, more than $280 billion over 10 years.

Senate GOP Leader Delays Estate Tax Vote (AP-Y2)

By Mary Dalrymple

AP2, June 27, 2006

Despite a pledge to cut estate taxes by Independence Day, the Senate's Republican leader on Tuesday postponed action on a bill to reduce taxes for heirs.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said he did not yet have enough votes to pass a bill, already approved by the House, that would eliminate taxes on the first $5 million of an individual's estate and cut taxes for others.

Most Republicans support the tax reduction, but they need support from a few more Democrats.

"The vast majority of my Democratic colleagues have so far refused to address this issue," Frist said in a statement. "It's my hope that their constituents will use the upcoming recess to explain the importance of supporting a reasonable and permanent solution to this unfair tax."

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada contended that Frist recognized that "the phony House 'compromise'" would be turned down by senators.

"The Senate has repeatedly rejected repeal of the estate tax because it recognized that giving away hundreds of billions in tax breaks to the wealthiest among us was the wrong priority for America," Reid said in a statement.

Frist lost one vote on the estate tax already this summer when opponents — most Democrats and a pair of Republicans — blocked debate on a bill repealing estate taxes after 2010.

Frist then turned to the House for help, asking GOP leaders for a bill that might attract enough support to pass this year, before a fall election with control of Congress at stake.

House tax-writers responded with a bill eliminating taxes for virtually all inherited estates, those worth up to $5 million for an individual and $10 million for a couple.

DOJ_NMG_0037296

After those exemptions, estates worth up to $25 million would be taxed at rates equal to those on capital gains, currently 15 percent but scheduled to rise to 20 percent in 2011.

The remainder of any larger estates would be taxed at rates twice that of capital gains, or 30 percent at first and 40 percent when the scheduled capital gains tax increase takes effect.

The bill also would cut taxes for companies on certain timber gains.

The estate tax debate is made necessary because of a quirky law that eliminates the levy in 2010 but revives it a year later.

Frist said senators also must decide whether to make changes to the bill passed in the House. The House's most conservative Republicans have already signaled they could not accept any Senate attempt to negotiate for higher estate taxes.

Senate Delays Vote On Estate Tax Reduction, Timber (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Ryan Donmoyer

Bloomberg, June 28, 2006

June 27 (Bloomberg) -- Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist postponed a vote on a measure to exempt most multimillionaires from federal estate taxes after conceding Republicans lack the votes to pass legislation adopted by the House last week.

The delay is the third since Frist began his quest to repeal or reduce the tax last year and the second time this month his ambitions were thwarted by Democrats who say the government needs the revenue generated by the tax. The House passed the legislation 269-156 on June 22 after Frist urged it to act before the Independence Day recess next week.

``The Senate will vote on a permanent reduction to this tax," Frist said in a statement. ``The vast majority of my Democratic colleagues have so far refused to address this issue; it's my hope that their constituents will use the upcoming recess to explain the importance of supporting a reasonable and permanent solution to this unfair tax."

The delay allows Frist to avoid a repeat of a Senate vote on a procedural motion on June 8, when Republicans fell three votes shy of allowing a vote on outright repeal of the tax on estates valued at more than $2 million.

``Obviously, we're trying to make sure we got 60 votes," said Senator Jon Kyl, an Arizona Republican who has sought a compromise with Democrats such as Senator Max Baucus of Montana to reduce the tax instead of repealing it.

Kyl said Senate Republicans are determined to pass the legislation this year, though they want to ensure they have the 60 votes needed to withstand a challenge by Democrats. Republicans control 55 seats in the chamber; 60 votes are required to overcome filibusters, the legislative maneuvers that can kill legislation.

House Measure

The House legislation would spare all but about 2,800 multimillion-dollar estates from federal tax by exempting the first $10 million of a couple's estate from any tax. Estates valued between $10 million and $25 million would be taxed at the capital-gains rate, while estates of more than $25 million would be taxed at top rates of 30 percent to 40 percent.

The measure, which would take effect in 2010, also includes a tax break for timber companies intended to lure Senate Democrats from timber-producing states such as Washington, Arkansas, and Louisiana.

The measure, characterized as a take-it-or-leave-it offer by House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas, a California Republican, has had a lukewarm reception in the Senate.

Timber-State Lawmakers

Some Senate Republicans who favor full repeal of the estate tax said the new version doesn't go far enough to help small-business owners and farmers. Timber-state Democrats such as Maria Cantwell and Patty Murray of Washington, Mark Pryor of Arkansas, and Mary Landrieu of Louisiana haven't said they would back the House legislation after voting against full repeal June 8.

Thomas said today that any modification by the Senate would kill the legislation. ``If they decide to amend it in some small way and send it back to the House, it's over," Thomas said in an interview.

For Frist, it would mark the third significant delay for Senate action on the estate tax. His original plan to hold a vote in July 2005 was scuttled by the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, when Republicans said they were wary of voting on a measure cast by critics as only helping millionaire families after thousands of poor people lost their homes to the storm.

A second vote promised for May was delayed until June as Frist searched for support for full repeal.

The federal estate tax currently assesses rates of up to 46 percent on estates valued at more than $2 million per individual The exemption amount is scheduled to increase under current law to $3.5 million per individual or $7 million per couple by 2009. A top rate of 45 percent would apply to estates exceeding that value at that time.

2,800 Estates

Under current law, 12,600 estates -- or less than 1 percent of all people who die -- will be subject to the tax this year, according to estimates by the Tax Policy Center, a non-partisan research institution in Washington. The center estimated that a plan similar to Thomas's would reduce the number of taxable estates to 2,800 and would cut their tax rate to as low as 15 percent from about 45 percent.

The legislation also repeals a federal deduction for tax payments to the 23 states that retain their own estate or inheritance taxes, including Washington, Tennessee, Ohio, New York, New Jersey and Connecticut. That would subject residents of those states with large estates to double taxation, said Harley Duncan, executive director of the Federation of Tax Administrators, a Washington-based association of state tax officials.

Our Estate Tax Reform Is Fair and Pro-Growth

While the June 22 editorial "Doubting Thomas" misinterprets the intent of my proposed reform of the estate tax, it does elevate this important debate. Though the House has voted five times to permanently repeal the estate tax in recent years, the Senate has been unable to follow through. Faced with this deadlock, Congress has a choice: make yet another political statement or make law.

With a bipartisan vote, last week the House chose the latter -- approving compromise legislation to permanently reform the estate tax.

The House bill is a vast improvement over the only other option -- do nothing and allow the death tax to revert to a punitive 55% top rate in 2011 and beyond. The compromise bill exempts the first $5 million of every estate ($10 million per couple), establishes significantly lower rates for the few families who will still have to pay the tax, and eliminates the estate tax for 99.7% of all Americans on a permanent basis.

This is the opportunity to provide meaningful estate tax reform that is permanent, fair and pro-growth. The House has voted; now it's up to the Senate. It is my hope that the spirit of compromise prevails and permanent estate tax relief can become law in the near future.

Please, Let's Clear the Air About the Bridge in Alaska

In regard to your June 15 editorial "Earmarker in Chief": Knowing Sen. Lisa Murkowski's clear position on the issue of earmarks, I think there is little disagreement over the fact that Congress must take steps to bring earmarks out of the shadows and into the light of public disclosure. However, I take great umbrage at your assertion that somehow the senator is an active participant in what you describe as a connection between the process of earmarking and the "opportunity for corruption." Including her in a list of convicted felons who have sought to use their positions of power for illegal activities, simply because she has openly advocated a longstanding effort to improve the infrastructure of an Alaska community, is more than perplexing.

You state that "one of the major beneficiaries" from an earmark for a bridge in Alaska is one of Sen. Murkowski's relatives. The senator's mother did indeed inherit, in 1965, one-quarter interest in a tract of land that has no structures, road access, power, water, sewer or fire service. And as a matter of factual context, this piece of property is situated on an island that totals 71,932 acres -- of which the senator's mother has roughly 8.25 acres of interest. The current owners have tried repeatedly to sell the property over the years, with no success. A simple comparison of the size of the island vs. the miniscule property interest the senator's mother owns clearly shows that she is far from being a major beneficiary.

The notion that Sen. Murkowski would have sought to advance the prospects of the bridge project, which has been advocated by the community of Ketchikan for 30 years, for some kind of family benefit is preposterous. In fact, at her request, the Senate Select Committee on Ethics reviewed the situation to determine whether her advocacy of the bridge project constituted a conflict of interest. The committee found no conflict.

See the Real Burma

U.S. Undersecretary of State Paula J. Dobriansky's June 19 editorial-page article, "Press for Change in Burma," is based on exaggerated and fabricated reports. It also makes the groundless assertion that, in addition to Aung San Suu Kyi, 50 million people are living without basic freedoms and human rights in Burma.

DOJ_NMG_0037298

I would like to invite Ms. Dobriansky to pay a visit to Myanmar to see the reality of the situation for herself. She will find that, far from suffering in this way, our 50 million people are working hand in hand to develop the country in a harmonious way. She can also see for herself whether or not such violation of human rights and suppression of minority rights are really taking place.

Whether or not to release Ms. Aung San Suu Kyi and other so-called political prisoners is purely a domestic affair of our country, and none of the business of outsiders. Contrary to Ms. Dobriansky's assertions, our internal situation poses no threat to peace and security in the region. Those who make such claims should consider the disastrous situation in Iraq where the U.S. tried to justify its democracy adventure by ignoring the U.N. and taking unilateral military action based on unfounded accusations that Saddam Hussein possessed weapons of mass destruction.

Instead of taking such an aggressive approach and making such provocations, those who truly want to support democracy and prosperity in Myanmar should cooperate with its government to achieve the goal of implementing the Seven-Step Road Map for Democratic Transition in Myanmar.

Our Taxed Expats (WSJ)

By Newt Gingrich And Ken Kies
The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

Suppose you are trying to come up with ways to change U.S. tax law to make American business less competitive in the global economy. Your list of ideas would likely include raising the U.S. corporate tax rate even higher than its current 35% rate, already tops in the OECD. You would try to make sure that U.S. companies are subject to higher taxes than foreign-based competitors when they do business abroad. And of course, you would attempt to change our tax system to discourage the hiring of Americans overseas. Americans working overseas might actually help promote the export of U.S. goods and services abroad.

Sadly, Congress has latched on to this last idea as part of the ironically titled "Tax Increase Prevention and Reconciliation Act," signed into law by President Bush on May 17. A provision inserted in the conference agreement dramatically rewrites the rules under section 911 that limit U.S. taxation of American citizens working abroad. Specifically, the proposal would tax U.S. citizens working overseas at higher marginal rates and subject their housing to higher taxes. Adding insult to injury, these changes were drafted to take effect retroactively, back to the beginning of this year.

Reading the newspapers in the days following the enactment of this legislation would have given you a sense of the shocked, and unhappy, reactions of Americans working overseas. But the larger issue is that section 911 rules are of great importance for American competitiveness, which is why Congress needs to revisit the new law's changes as soon as possible. * * *

The United States is the only major industrialized country in the world that taxes its citizens without regard to where they reside or work. Accordingly, if we are transferred abroad by our employer, we are subject to tax on our salary and on "stranger in a strange land" assistance that our employer may provide (e.g., the cost of sending our kids to an English-speaking school, or airfare for an annual trip home). We are subject not only to U.S. tax on these amounts, but also to taxes imposed by the foreign country.

All things being equal, it is cheaper for our employer to hire a non-American for a foreign position. If our employer moves us, it likely will have to raise our pay to cover these additional tax costs to get us to agree to the assignment. If our employer hires a foreign national, already onsite, it simply pays a base foreign salary.

Section 911 has long helped to mitigate this disincentive to hire Americans. In 2006, the provision allows U.S. citizens to exclude $82,400 from income. Prior to the new legislation, income in excess of that amount was subject to U.S. tax at standard income-tax rates. Also prior to the new legislation, a U.S. citizen could deduct the cost of foreign housing above a base amount; alternatively, if our employer picked up this cost, the benefit was excludable.

The new changes enacted by Congress provide that any income above and beyond the exclusion cap is taxed at rates that "pretend" that the exclusion does not exist. That is, the first dollar of income above the $82,400 cap is taxed at a 25% rate, not at the 10% rate that previously applied. The new legislation also caps the foreign housing deduction/exclusion at $11,536 (or $961 a month). Congress did give Treasury the authority to adjust this amount for high-cost locations, but the extent to which meaningful relief will be provided is uncertain at best.

What is undeniable is that U.S. workers abroad face a massive tax increase -- $2.1 billion over the next 10 years to be precise, according to Congress. U.S. workers in places like Hong Kong or Dubai may see tax increases in the tens of thousands of dollars. In the near term, some employers may respond by raising a worker's pay. If employers do nothing, a worker will be left to pick up the cost. And since the tax applies retroactively back to the beginning of the year, and since employees can't typically move back to the U.S. on a week's notice, this unfortunate person may be stuck with a salary structure he or she would never have agreed to had there been knowledge of the change to section 911.

So, you might say, maybe some U.S. employers pay more and some individuals get hurt. What's the big deal? First, the new tax increases can only mean that there will be fewer "Americans on the ground" in overseas markets going forward. Studies have shown a direct correlation between employment of Americans overseas and U.S. exports. These studies confirm what one might assume -- that Americans are best at selling America. That is, U.S. workers are most likely to specify and purchase U.S. goods and services where opportunities arise in foreign projects. A 1980 study by the Chase Econometrics Group found that a 10% drop in Americans overseas would result in a 5% drop in U.S. exports. A 1995 Price Waterhouse study found that repeal of section 911 would result in an $8.7 billion reduction in U.S. exports, which would translate into the loss of approximately 143,000 U.S.-based jobs.

Second, where U.S. companies bid on overseas projects against foreign companies, they may have to bid, for a variety of reasons, on the assumption that they will employ U.S. citizens. Americans already are more expensive to employ in overseas locales. The added cost of the new section 911 tax increases will only raise the pricing of U.S. bids, and therefore mean U.S. companies get less work.

Third, the section 911 changes will hurt small- and medium-sized businesses. Smaller firms are more likely than larger firms to use U.S. citizens when they first seek penetration of foreign markets. A 1995 study by professors at the Johns Hopkins University of Advanced International Studies found that 82% of surveyed small- and medium-sized businesses said loss of the section 911 exclusion would have a substantial impact on their ability to secure projects or compete overseas. These firms also are far less likely to be able to absorb the cost of adjusting employees' pay to offset the impact of the section 911 tax increases. Thus, the first and harshest effects of the legislation may be felt by these smaller companies.

We hope that a critical mass can drive corrective action. We would propose something radical. Why not follow the lead of our trading partners and exempt foreign-earned income completely? If that is too far-reaching, we should repeal the tax increase, effective back to its January start date, and restore the intended utility of section 911 by increasing the exemption amount to $117,000, which would take into account inflation since the amount was originally set (at $70,000) in 1982.

Either of those approaches would mean more U.S. players out on the field. Global business competition is already fierce enough. We shouldn't sabotage ourselves.

Mr. Gingrich, a senior fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, is former speaker of the House of Representatives. Mr. Kies, a managing director at Clark Consulting, served as chief of staff of the Joint Committee on Taxation 1995-98.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Ignores Laws He Inks, Vexing Congress (AP-Y2)

By Laurie Kellman

AP2, June 27, 2006

The White House on Tuesday defended President Bush's frequent use of special statements that claim authority to limit the effects of bills he signs, saying the statements help him uphold the Constitution and defend national security.

Senators weren't so sure.

"It's a challenge to the plain language of the Constitution," said Arlen Specter, a Republican whose Senate Judiciary Committee opened hearings on the issue. "There is a sense that the president has taken signing statements far beyond the customary purview."

At the White House, Press Secretary Tony Snow said, "There's this notion that the president is committing acts of civil disobedience, and he's not. It's important for the president at least to express reservations about the constitutionality of certain provisions."

The bill-signing statements say Bush reserves a right to revise, interpret or disregard measures on national security and constitutional grounds. Some 110 statements have challenged about 750 statutes passed by Congress, according to numbers combined from White House and the Senate committee. They include documents revising or disregarding parts of legislation to ban torture of detainees and to renew the Patriot Act.

Snow said presidents from Dwight Eisenhower to Bill Clinton have issued such statements.

"The president has done the same thing that his predecessors have," he told reporters. "Presidents generally had the same concerns about defending the presidential prerogatives when it comes to national security."

DOJ_NMG_0037300

In addition to Specter's objections, Democrats called the signing statements an example of the administration trying to expand executive power.

"I believe that this new use of signing statements is a means to undermine and weaken the law," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein (news, bio, voting record) of California. "If the president is going to have the power to nullify all or part of a statute, it should only be through veto authority that the president has authorized and can reject — rather than through a unilateral action taken outside the structures of our democracy."

Defending Bush, a Justice Department lawyer said the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks had made it prudent for the president to protect his powers with signing statements more than did his predecessors.

"Even if there is modest increase, let me just suggest that it be viewed in light of current events and Congress' response to those events," said lawyer Michelle Boardman. "The significance of legislation affecting national security has increased markedly since Sept. 11."

"Congress has been more active, the president has been more active," she added. "The separation of powers is working when we have this kind of dispute."

The exchange came during a midterm election year in which Specter, some fellow Republicans and many Democrats are highlighting concerns about the administration's use of executive power. Specter's personal list includes Bush's warrantless domestic wiretapping program, the administration's checking of phone records and the sending of officials to hearings but saying they cannot answer lawmakers' questions on national security grounds.

The session also was aimed at countering any influence Bush's signing statements may have on court decisions regarding the new laws. Courts can be expected to look to the legislature for intent, not the executive, said Sen. John Cornyn (news, bio, voting record), R-Texas., a former state judge.

"The president is entitled to express his opinion. It's the courts that determine what the law is," he said. "I don't know why the issue of presidents issuing signing statements is controversial at all."

Specter and his allies maintain that Bush is trying an end-run around the veto process. In his presidency's sixth year, Bush has yet to issue a single veto, which could be overridden with a two-thirds majority in each house.

"The president is not required to," Boardman said.

"Of course he's not if he signs the bill," Specter snapped back.

Other presidents have used signing statements for administrative reasons, such as instructing an agency how to put a certain law into effect. They usually are inserted quietly into the federal record.

White House Defends Bush's Limits On Bills (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

The White House yesterday defended President Bush's right to set limits on the scope of congressional bills he signs into law, saying the Constitution grants the executive broad powers and requires the president to uphold the law.

"The president does not, and the administration does not, refuse to carry out the laws that have been passed by Congress and signed into law by the president," White House press secretary Tony Snow said.

"In the context of trying to preserve and protect and defend the Constitution, there will be times, there will be places within signing statements, caveats, where he has reservations about" a bill he is signing into law, he said.

Mr. Snow said it is not unusual for presidents "to list those reservations, if nothing else, as markers, for issues that may later rise to be points of controversy."

Mr. Bush has used the constitutional statements -- about 110 in all, Mr. Snow said -- to interpret bills passed by Congress. The statements have no power in courts, which are the final arbiters on issues that arise between the interpretation offered by Congress and the interpretation of the executive branch.

Shortly after Mr. Snow defended the practice, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter held a hearing on Mr. Bush's use of signing statements.

"There is a sense that the president has taken signing statements far beyond the customary purview," said Mr. Specter, Pennsylvania Republican. "It's a challenge to the plain language of the Constitution."

Democrats at the hearing sought to broaden the issue, complaining that Mr. Bush's signing statements are just the latest example of the administration's expansion of executive power.

"I believe that this new use of signing statements is a means to undermine and weaken the law," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California. "If the president is going to have the power to nullify all or part of a statute, it should only be through veto authority that the president has authorized and can reject -- rather than through a unilateral action taken outside the structures of our democracy."

DOJ_NMG_0037301

But Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican, said courts routinely look to the legislature for its intent, not to the executive branch. "The president is entitled to express his opinion. It's the courts that determine what the law is," he said. "I don't know why the issue of presidents issuing signing statements is controversial at all."

Mr. Snow said yesterday that former President Bill Clinton employed the tactic 105 times during his two terms.

Deputy Assistant Attorney General Michelle Boardman said in yesterday's hearing that "presidents are sworn to 'preserve, protect and defend the Constitution,' and thus are responsible for ensuring that the manner in which they enforce acts of Congress is consistent with America's founding document."

Sometimes, that includes the president telling Congress that a facet of a statute appears unconstitutional and that he will avoid possible constitutional conflicts, she said. In addition, the statements are not attempts to "cherry pick" among the parts of an enacted law that the president will choose to follow, she said.

"Presidential signing statements are, rather, a statement by the president explaining his interpretation of and responsibilities under the law, and they are therefore an essential part of the constitutional dialogue between the branches," Miss Boardman said.

Democrats Accuse Bush Of Power Grab (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, June 28, 2006

The expansion of presidential powers by the Bush administration came under strong criticism on Tuesday from Democratic senators, who during a Senate hearing accused George W. Bush of “making unprecedented claims for unchecked power”.

Senator Arlen Specter, chairman of the Senate judiciary committee, who has been at the forefront of raising questions on presidential power, held hearings on Tuesday for the first time on the use of presidential “signing statements”. These attachments to the bill contain instructions on how the executive branch intends to carry out legislation, and often provide a way for the executive to ignore congressional intent.

The issue has attracted scrutiny following a study by the Boston Globe this year that found that Mr Bush had employed signing statements for more than 750 laws enacted by the Republican Congress. “That’s far more than all the signing statements signed by every single president from George Washington to Bill Clinton, put together,” said Patrick Leahy, a Democratic senator, during the hearing.

Concern has focused on whether Mr Bush has used the low-profile statements to side-step congressional authority, rather than publicly issue a presidential veto of legislation.

Mr Bush has never issued a formal veto. “Basically, the president signs laws enacted by people’s representatives in Congress but he’s crossing his fingers behind his back. And when he says he never had to make a veto, heck, why? He just signs laws saying he is not going to follow them,” Mr Leahy added.

The most controversial use of a signing statement came this year after the Senate voted to pass a prohibition on certain kinds of interrogation procedures. After lengthy negotiations with Senator John McCain agreeing the terms of an amendment, the administration “issued a signing statement which appeared to undercut what had been negotiated”, said Mr Specter.

Mr Leahy also offered the example of how Mr Bush had used a signing statement to narrow a provision protecting corporate whistle-blowers in the Sarbanes-Oxley law. That effort, however, was later overturned after congressional pressure.

Dick Durbin, a Democratic senator for Illinois, said: “I’m afraid this is part of a much larger pattern which we’ve seen in the last several years, at least since 9/11, where this Congress continues to cede its authority and power to the executive branch.” He accused Republicans of being “complicit in ceding this power”.

Senator John Cornyn, a Republican, defended use of the statements, calling them “helpful to understand the rationale of the executive branch”. That point was echoed by Michelle Boardman, the deputy assistant attorney-general, who said that every president since Dwight D. Eisenhower had issued a signing statement.

Democrats have been seeking to make executive power a theme in mid-term elections. Dianne Feinstein, a Democratic senator, said the “calculated expansion of executive power was one of the lasting legacies of this administration, which could have a more lasting impact on this country than any other issue”.

Debate On Hill Over Power Of The President (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON

What should Congress do if the president refuses to enforce a law - or some part of it he deems unconstitutional?

DOJ_NMG_0037302

It's a question that has simmered in the GOP-controlled Congress over issues ranging from post-9/11 national security to the use of torture in the war on terror.

But it resurfaced on Capitol Hill this week, as lawmakers consider giving President Bush line-item veto authority and, behind the scenes, negotiate with the White House over Mr. Bush's claim that he has authority to conduct domestic wiretapping without a warrant, despite a 1978 law that says otherwise.

"The real issue here is whether the president can cherry-pick what he likes," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R) of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, as he opened a hearing Tuesday on presidential signing statements.

Such statements - issued when presidents sign bills into law - are a long White House tradition. Bush has produced a record total - more than 750 of them - that lay out his interpretation of the new law to Congress, the courts, and the public.

"The president hasn't vetoed any bills, but basically he has done a personal veto. He has said which laws he will not follow and ... put himself above the law, even the same law he has signed," said Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary panel.

Not all Republicans are as enthused as chairman Specter and Senate Democrats over this line of questioning, especially as lawmakers head into fall elections that could change control of both houses of Congress.

"This is a fascinating topic, mainly something law students and lawyers can love," said Sen. John Cornyn (R) of Texas, a member of the Judiciary Committee, who notes that the practice of presidents issuing signing statements goes back to 1821.

"As a practical matter, I don't know what impact it has.... It promotes public discourse and discussion about what the roles of the legislative branch and the executive branch are," he added.

Testifying for the Bush administration, Michelle Boardman, deputy assistant attorney general in the Office of Legal Counsel at the US Department of Justice, said that signing statements serve a "legitimate and important function" and are not an abuse of power.

"Congress should not fear signing statements, but welcome the openness they provide," she said. "The president must execute the law faithfully, but the Constitution is the highest law of the land. If the Constitution and the law conflict, the president must choose," she said.

Also testifying before the committee, Nicholas Rosenkranz, a law professor at Georgetown University Law Center in Washington, called the "recent brouhaha" over presidential signing statements "largely unwarranted."

But for Chairman Specter, who helped the White House move new powers under the USA Patriot Act through the Senate, the issue comes down to basic respect for balance of powers - and for the Congress. After personally negotiating with the White House over issues such as the Patriot Act and the torture ban, he questioned why objections would not have been raised at that time.

"Wouldn't it be better as a matter [of] comity for the president to come to the Congress and say: I want these exceptions in the bill," rather than asserting them in a presidential signing statement, Specter asked.

When the question was not answered to his satisfaction, he called for answers in writing. ("My office in the Justice Department is flooded," Ms. Boardman said. "It will take a week.")

For Specter and some other Senate Republicans, what tipped the issue was the president's signing statement of the fiscal 2006 Defense authorization bill, which included a ban on torture that had passed the Senate by a wide margin. That statement claimed the right to make exceptions to that ban.

Pressing the issue, Sen. Edward Kennedy (D) of Massachusetts asked Boardman to provide a list of laws that President Bush has decided not to enforce.

"I cannot give you that list," Boardman said.

"No, then who can? Is there any way for the public to know the president has made a judgment that he is not going to enforce a law?" he asked.

It's an issue that Democrats in both the Senate and House are developing for fall elections. Last week. House Democrats introduced a resolution requiring the president to notify Congress if the president "makes a determination to ignore a duly enacted provision of law."

"For far too long, Congress has stood by and watched while President Bush has slowly expanded the unilateral powers of the presidency at the expense of the rest of the government and the people," said Senator Kennedy at Tuesday's hearing.

"This administration has issued signing statements at an astonishing rate to express the view that it does not have to comply with the laws that Congress has passed," added Sen. Russ Feingold (D) of Wisconsin, who has called for a censure of President Bush. "I believe that is dangerous to our system of government."

However arcane, the debate is "part of a much broader spectrum of issues that has to do with separation of powers," says Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond in Virginia.

The American Civil Liberties Union welcomed the Senate Judiciary Committee's hearing as an opportunity to "highlight this administration's disregard for the law," said Caroline Fredrickson, director of the ACLU Washington Legislative office.

Bush's Challenges Of Laws He Signed Is Criticized (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

A bipartisan group of senators and scholars denounced President Bush yesterday for using scores of "signing statements" to reserve the right to ignore or reinterpret provisions of measures that he has signed into law.

Bush's statements have challenged, for instance, a congressional ban on torture, a request for data on the administration of the USA Patriot Act and even a legislative demand for suggestions on the digital mapping of coastal resources.

The Senate Judiciary Committee's hearing marked the latest effort by Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and panel Democrats to reclaim authority that they say the president has usurped as he has expanded the power of the executive branch. It came on the same day Bush gave a speech pushing for a line-item veto that would allow him to strike spending and tax provisions from legislation without vetoing the bill.

Other presidents have used signing statements to clarify their interpretation of laws, but no president has used such statements instead of ever using the veto authority spelled out in the Constitution, said Harvard University law professor Charles J. Ogletree Jr., who is serving on a new American Bar Association task force examining Bush's signing statements. Bush has never used his veto power in his presidency.

"There is a sense that the president has taken the signing statements far beyond the customary purviews," Specter told the administration's representative, Michelle E. Boardman, deputy assistant attorney general in the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel. "There's a real issue here as to whether the president may, in effect, cherry-pick the provisions he likes and exclude the ones he doesn't like."

Democrats were more blunt, blasting such statements, which are estimated to number more than 750 on 110 laws -- more than all the statements issued by other presidents.

"I've never seen anything like it," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), the committee's ranking Democrat, calling the practice "a grave threat to our constitutional system of checks and balances."

Specter has been more aggressive than any other Republican in challenging Bush's expanding authority. He has pushed the president to reshape his warrantless wiretapping efforts to comply with existing law; threatened to summon telecommunications executives who have given the government access to customer phone records; and challenged the White House's legal arguments for indefinite detentions at the U.S. military base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

But yesterday, Judiciary Committee members appealed to their fellow lawmakers, who Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) said have been "complicit as so many of our precious rights under the Constitution have been ceded away."

Boardman countered that presidents since James Monroe have issued statements of interpretation to accompany laws, and that every president since Dwight D. Eisenhower has issued statements reserving the right not to execute sections of laws that may contradict the Constitution. By her accounting, Bush has issued such statements on 110 laws, compared with 80 from Bill Clinton, as many as 105 from Ronald Reagan and 147 from George H.W. Bush in a single term. But President Bush issued multiple statements on many of those laws for a total of 750, and it is unclear how many statements the other presidents issued.

"Even if there has been a modest increase, let me just suggest that it be viewed in light of current events and Congress's response to those events," she said. "The significance of legislation affecting national security has increased markedly since September 11."

The statements related to national security have caused the most controversy.

Last year, after months of difficult negotiations, Bush withdrew a veto threat and signed a defense policy bill that included a provision by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) banning cruel, inhumane or degrading treatment of prisoners at U.S. detention centers. But Bush's signing statement on Dec. 30, 2005, reserved the right to waive the torture ban if he concluded that some harsh interrogation techniques could advance anti-terrorism efforts.

This year, after Congress reached a hard-fought agreement to extend the USA Patriot Act, expanding the power of federal law enforcement, the president questioned a provision calling for the administration to furnish Congress with detailed audits on the issuance of secret business-record searches and "national security letters."

"He's crossing his fingers behind his back," Leahy said.

White House officials and their allies tried to reassure lawmakers that they have nothing to fear from such statements.

"There's this notion that the president is committing acts of civil disobedience, and he's not," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

Bush's Use Of Authority Riles Senator (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 27 — Senators on the Judiciary Committee accused President Bush of an "unprecedented" and "astonishing" power grab on Tuesday for making use of a device that gave him the authority to revise or ignore more than 750 laws enacted since he became president.

By using what are known as signing statements, memorandums issued with legislation as he signs it, the president has reserved the right to not enforce any laws he thinks violate the Constitution or national security, or that impair foreign relations.

A lawyer for the White House said that Mr. Bush was only doing his duty to uphold the Constitution. But Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania and chairman of the Judiciary Committee, characterized the president's actions as a declaration that he "will do as he pleases," without regard to the laws passed by Congress.

"There's a real issue here as to whether the president may, in effect, cherry-pick the provisions he likes and exclude the ones he doesn't like," Mr. Specter said at a hearing.

"Wouldn't it be better, as a matter of comity," he said, "for the president to have come to the Congress and said, 'I'd like to have this in the bill; I'd like to have these exceptions in the bill,' so that we could have considered that?"

Mr. Specter and others are particularly upset that Mr. Bush reserved the right to interpret the torture ban passed overwhelmingly by Congress, as well as Congressional oversight powers in the renewal of the Patriot Act.

Michelle Boardman, a deputy assistant attorney general, said the statements were "not an abuse of power."

Rather, Ms. Boardman said, the president has the responsibility to make sure the Constitution is upheld. He uses signing statements, she argued, to "save" statutes from being found unconstitutional. And he reserves the right, she said, only to raise questions about a law "that could in some unknown future application" be declared unconstitutional.

"It is often not at all the situation that the president doesn't intend to enact the bill," Ms. Boardman said.

The fight over signing statements is part of a continuing battle between Congress and the White House. Mr. Specter and many Democrats have raised objections to the administration's wiretapping of phones without warrants from the court set up to oversee surveillance.

Last month, Mr. Specter accused Vice President Dick Cheney of going behind his back to avoid the Judiciary Committee's oversight of surveillance programs.

"Where will it end?" asked Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts. "Where does it stop?"

The bills Mr. Bush has reserved the right to revise or ignore include provisions that govern affirmative action programs, protect corporate whistle-blowers, require executive agencies to collect certain statistics, and establish qualifications for executive appointees.

Senators and two law professors before the panel said that if the president objected to a bill, he should use his power to veto it — something he has not done in his six years in office.

Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, said the expansion of executive power would be the "lasting legacy" of the Bush administration. "This new use of signing statements is a means to undermine and weaken the law," she said.

What the president is saying, she added, is "Congress, what you do isn't really important; I'm going to do what I want to do."

Ms. Boardman said the president had inserted 110 statements, which senators said applied to 750 statutes, compared with 30 by President Jimmy Carter. The number has increased, she said, but only marginally, and only because national security concerns have increased since the attacks of Sept. 11 and more laws have been passed. She acknowledged that the increase might be construed as "a lack of good communication" with Congress.

But Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, said the committee was making too much of the statements. "It is precedented," he said, "and it's not new."

Senators said they had been expecting a higher-ranking official from the office of legal policy, and Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the senior Democrat on the committee, chastised the White House for not sending "anybody who would have authority to speak on this."

"But then, considering the fact that they're using basically an extra-constitutional, extra-judicial step to enhance the power of the president, it's not unusual," he said.

Bush Urges Senate To Pass Line-item Veto (AP-Y2)

By Deb Riechmann

AP2, June 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037305

President Bush, urging the Senate to pass the line-item veto, on Tuesday criticized House Democrats who didn't back the measure even though they've called for federal spending restraint.

A line-item veto would allow the president to cut certain provisions in spending bills without vetoing the entire measure. The House passed such legislation last week 247-172. Thirty-five Democrats joined with most Republicans in voting for the bill.

"I was disappointed, frankly, though that more Democrats didn't vote for the bill, especially those that are calling for fiscal discipline in Washington, D.C.," Bush said in a speech to members of the Manhattan Institute, a conservative think tank based in New York. "I mean, you can't call for fiscal discipline on the one hand and then not pass a tool to enhance fiscal discipline on the other hand. You can't have it both ways, it seems like to me."

The bill faces an uncertain future in the Senate. Democrats generally oppose the measure, and not all Republicans are excited about the idea. "We need to set politics aside" and pass a line-item veto, Bush said about the measure that the GOP embraces as a way to demonstrate election-year resolve to rein in federal spending.

Lawmakers from both parties who have reservations about the line-item veto contend it would shift too much power to the president, allowing him to try to cut projects proposed by his political enemies, or to use the threat of cutting projects in exchange for favorable votes on legislation the White House desires.

The bill that passed the House is a watered-down version of a more sweeping law that the Supreme Court struck down in 1998, saying it took too much spending authority away from Congress. Bush said the new legislation would meet the court's constitutional requirements.

The new version would let the president try to kill individual items contained in spending or tax bills that he otherwise signs into law. Congress would be required to vote on those specific items again. A simple majority in both the House and the Senate could override the president's objections.

"When the president sees an earmark or a spending provision that is wasteful or unnecessary, he can send it back to the Congress," Bush said. "And Congress is then required to hold a prompt up-or-down vote on whether to retain the targeted spending. In other words, the Congress is still in the process."

Earlier, Bush met with senators at the White House to discuss the line-item veto. The group included Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., and Sens. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., Thad Cochran, R-Miss., Susan M. Collins, R-Maine, Kit Bond, R-Mo., John McCain, R-Ariz., and Ben Nelson, D-Neb.

Nelson said he told the president that he used the line-item veto to rein in irresponsible spending when he was governor of Nebraska. "It works," said Nelson, governor from 1991 to 1999.

Bush Calls On Senate To Pass Line-Item Veto (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

President Bush pushed the Senate yesterday to give him and his successors the power to strip special projects out of spending bills, part of a broader political effort to assuage disaffected supporters that he really is a fiscal conservative despite the growth of government on his watch.

The president summoned key senators to the White House and later gave a speech promoting a line-item veto to fight earmarks, or spending requests that members of Congress slip into larger bills without going through the normal budget process. The House has passed one version of the proposal and another is waiting for a vote on the Senate floor.

Bush said he needs the power to have more influence over lawmakers as they spend taxpayer money. "I want to be a part of the budgetary process," he said in an address sponsored by the Manhattan Institute for Policy Research. "It's an important part of the president's working with Congress and I'm not going to deal myself out of the budgetary process."

Bush has never vetoed a bill in his 5 1/2 years in office and, while long on record in favor of a line-item veto, he has never made a concerted effort to win such authority from Congress until this year as polls showed increasing conservative anxiety about federal spending. Since he took office, the federal budget has grown nearly 50 percent, from $1.86 trillion to a proposed $2.77 trillion for the coming fiscal year, driven in part by the cost of wars in Afghanistan and Iraq and the rise in entitlement costs.

To demonstrate commitment to fiscal restraint, Bush forced Congress to back down after it tried to load up a $94.5 billion emergency spending bill for war operations and hurricane relief this month. He also has frozen non-security discretionary domestic spending for two years in a row and vowed to cut the deficit in half by 2009.

DOJ_NMG_0037306

In seeking a line-item veto, Bush set sights on the most politically charged form of federal spending, often called pork. The number of earmarks inserted into spending bills has mushroomed from 3,055 in 1996 to 14,211 in 2004, according to the Congressional Research Service, and the overall cost has more than doubled to $52.7 billion.

But even if Bush had a line-item veto and struck every earmark, it would only carve a fraction out of a deficit projected to reach up to $350 billion this year. And as Bush said yesterday, Congress has met every overall spending target he has given it, meaning that the president and lawmakers have agreed on the broad direction of federal spending since he took office.

"This is not a budgetary issue. It's an issue of separation or overlap of power," said Richard Kogan, a senior fellow at the Center for Budget and Policy Priorities, which focuses on issues affecting low-income Americans. "It's primarily or exclusively a question of increasing the president's leverage over legislation."

A president could hold up a highway project in a lawmaker's district to win a vote on another priority, Kogan noted. "His threats and promises will be more forceful than they were in the past."

Some supporters of the president agreed the proposal would do little to fight deficit spending. The "line-item veto is a whiff," Sen. Christopher S. Bond (R-Mo.) told reporters after meeting with Bush yesterday. "You know, all our budgets are within the president's request for appropriated spending -- the discretionary spending. And that's not busting the budget." The real problem, he said, is entitlement spending.

Bush agreed that the government needs to get control over programs such as Social Security and Medicare and he vowed to keep trying as long as he is in office. "If we can't get it done this year, I'm going to try next year," he said. "And if we can't get it done next year, I'm going to try the year after that, because it is the right thing to do."

Yet he emphasized that he would not trim military spending, which has been a large part of the growth of government. "We will not shortchange the people who wear the uniform of the United States military," Bush said.

Congress passed a line-item veto in 1996, but the Supreme Court struck it down as unconstitutional. The new version is constructed in a different way intended to address the court's concerns. While the old version functioned like a traditional veto in requiring two-thirds majorities in both houses to overturn the president's decision, the new version allows Congress to restore targeted spending items on simple majority votes.

The Senate version, crafted by Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), includes other budget process changes not in the House legislation. Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) did not commit yesterday to a date for a floor vote.

President To Press For Line-Item Veto Power (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 27 — With his proposed overhaul of the nation's immigration laws now in legislative limbo, President Bush focused on another priority on Tuesday, to secure Congressional approval of a presidential line-item veto.

Speaking to a conservative group here in the morning, Mr. Bush said he would use a line-item veto to eliminate spending on the pet projects called earmarks that lawmakers attach to spending bills.

"A line-item veto would be a vital tool that a president could use to target spending that lawmakers tack on to the large spending bills," Mr. Bush said before a gathering held by the Manhattan Institute, a conservative group that advocates fiscal restraint.

The president said he very much needed the power to control spending. The number of earmarks each year has grown to 13,000 per budget from 3,000 over the last decade, he said.

Mr. Bush also met on Tuesday at the White House with senators to discuss his proposal, including the majority leader, Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, and the president's 2000 Republican primary rival, Senator John McCain of Arizona. In his address, Mr. Bush also cited a more recent rival from the other side of the aisle, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, the Democratic presidential nominee in 2004, as a supporter of a line-item veto.

"I remember campaigning against him in 2004, and I remember him talking about the line-item veto," Mr. Bush said of Mr. Kerry, "and I appreciate the fact that he's living up to the political promises he made."

Mr. Bush urged Mr. Kerry's Democratic colleagues to approve the veto just as they had done in 1996 for the last Democratic president, Bill Clinton. Mr. Clinton's success in obtaining line-item veto power, delivered with help from Congressional Republicans, was a victory in a decades-long struggle by the executive branch to gain a stronger hand in budget negotiations with Congress.

But the Supreme Court struck that line-item veto down in 1998, ruling that it allowed a president "to effect the repeal of laws, for his own policy reasons."

DOJ_NMG_0037307

Administration officials say the form of the veto sought by Mr. Bush would stand up to constitutional scrutiny by creating a process in which the president proposes items to strike but Congress ultimately decides whether to go along with him in a fast-tracked vote. The House passed a version of the veto with such a process last week.

Mr. Frist has told administration officials he will try to bring a similar version of the bill to a vote in mid-July. But even White House officials acknowledged that the proposal would face a tough fight. Democrats have been reluctant to give the president any sort of victory, and lawmakers in charge of the Senate Appropriations Committee are not eager to cede any control.

Senator Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire and chairman of the Appropriations Committee, is pushing a version of the bill that would allow the president to strike no more than four items in a year. In addition, a core group of lawmakers is highly protective of Congressional power in general, but especially with Mr. Bush in the White House. His office has been open in its efforts to build executive power.

Winning a line-item veto would give Mr. Bush a much-needed Congressional victory. He had been trying to push through new immigration laws, but last week the House decided to have a series of national hearings before taking action. Mr. Bush said Tuesday that he was not giving up on that fight.

But he said that in the meantime he had asked his new budget director, Rob Portman, to make securing the line-item veto a top priority. Mr. Portman, a former Republican congressman with strong ties on Capitol Hill, has discussed the veto with lawmakers in the last week. "It's important that the Republican Party continue to let people know that the Republicans are the party of fiscal discipline," Mr. Portman said, adding that he was also trying to bring along Democrats.

But Jim Manley, a spokesman for Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said his boss was working to gather enough votes to defeat the line-item veto. "It's a significant shift in authority to the executive branch," Mr. Manley said.

Bush Presses For Line-item Veto (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

President Bush yesterday called the line-item veto the next "crucial test" for Congress on spending restraint, and said he was "disappointed" in House Democrats who claimed they were for fiscal discipline but voted against the plan last week.

"You can't call for fiscal discipline on the one hand and then not pass a tool to enhance fiscal discipline on the other hand," he said, referring to the 156 Democrats in the House who voted against a line-item proposal.

Mr. Bush also promised, using the strongest language he's used in months, to take another stab at controlling the growth of Social Security, saying he will try every year for the rest of his administration.

"If we can't get it done this year, I'm going to try next year. And if we can't get it done next year, I'm going to try the year after that," he said at a speech in Washington, sponsored by the Manhattan Institute.

The president claimed a victory by keeping the recent emergency spending bill to $94.5 billion, and said the line-item veto vote in the Senate later this year is the next big test. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist hopes for a vote this summer, according to a spokeswoman.

A line-item veto passed the House last week, 247-172, with 212 Republicans and 35 Democrats supporting it.

Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman, a former member of Congress who is now the administration's point-man on the issue, said at least 60 senators are already on record supporting a line-item veto.

"You start with a base of 50 who supported a much more executive branch-tilted line-item veto [in 1996], and then you add to that the co-sponsors of the legislation now, and you get over 60," Mr. Portman said.

Mr. Bush yesterday said those who supported the 1996 law, later struck down by the Supreme Court, should be on board again.

"It was good enough 10 years ago, it's good enough today, for those who voted for the line-item veto," he said.

This year's bill does have some strong Democratic supporters, including Rep. Mark Udall, Colorado Democrat, who worked hard to win over Democrats. And in the Senate, Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, has taken a prominent public role in pushing for what he said is a "no-brainer" bill.

"With record deficits and bridges being built to nowhere, we've got to stop the incomprehensible waste coming out of Washington," said Mr. Kerry, Mr. Bush's 2004 opponent in the presidential election. Mr. Kerry won special praise from Mr. Bush yesterday for his consistent support.

But Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said Republicans could expect little support from Democrats if the line-item proposal is part of a broader budget package Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican, is working on.

"I can't imagine there would be any support for this," he said, adding that Mr. Bush and Republicans continue to focus on spending cuts without looking at revenue or tax increases as well.

DOJ_NMG_0037308

Unlike the 1996 line-item veto, the new proposal isn't exactly a veto. Called the "legislative line-item veto," it would allow the president to send a new bill back to Congress pointing out projects that should be cut. Congress would then have a set period of time to vote to accept or reject his recommendations.

The Supreme Court deemed the 1996 version unconstitutional, saying Congress did not have the authority to give the president the power to change legislation it had already passed. The court said the president can either sign legislation into law or send it back to Congress.

Mr. Portman said the new version will provide a spotlight to scare off some lawmakers from adding questionable projects, and that could give extra muscle to key subcommittee chairmen looking to keep extraneous spending out of their bills.

Misunderestimated (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

When it comes to tax policy these days, the most powerful branch of government seems to be the unelected computers at the Joint Tax Committee and Congressional Budget Office. Those are the agencies that tell Congress how much tax cuts will "cost" the Treasury in lost revenue. And what's standing in the way of the Senate repealing the death tax this year, for example, is their $600 billion boogeyman estimate of lost federal revenues to the Treasury over 10 years.

But what happens when the computers go haywire? A new study from the American Shareholders Association examined the 10-year forecast for economic growth and federal revenue collections for the period 1997-2006. And over these years, it found, the CBO underestimated tax revenue collections by a cumulative $800 billion. To paraphrase President Bush: That's a pretty severe misunderestimation.

The forecasting faux pas is actually larger because those estimates excluded the impact of at least three major tax cuts (in 1997, 2001 and 2003) that subsequently passed Congress. These tax cuts were estimated by the wizards at Joint Tax to deplete federal tax collections by an additional $1.24 trillion through 2006, according to the Shareholders Association study.

So if you add those together, CBO and JTC have managed to underestimate revenues by $2.04 trillion over the past decade. Here's one way to appreciate how large this error is: It would be as if CBO forgot to count all the federal income tax payments made by every resident of Florida for an entire decade. Tied to their outdated forecasting models, these agencies refuse to acknowledge that there is any Laffer Curve effect from changes in tax rates that help the economy grow and revenues increase. Thus CBO also managed to project a decade ago that the U.S. economy would be $1.3 trillion smaller today than it actually is.

Forecasting future growth is never easy, but that's all the more reason for Members of Congress not to make themselves policy slaves to these estimates. Republicans have promised time and again to fix the models, but they always flinch when the Democrats who first sponsored these models object. So after 12 years of GOP control of Congress, our nation's tax policy is still dominated by computer models that never get it right.

Manhattan: A Call For An Investigation (NYT)

By Jonathan P. Hicks

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

The chairman of the State Democratic Party called on the Federal Election Commission and the Justice Department yesterday to investigate allegations that Representative Vito J. Fossella Jr. violated campaign finance regulations. Mr. Fossella is the only Republican member of Congress from New York City. In a statement, the chairman, Assemblyman Herman D. Farrell Jr., said that the allegations, if true, "would constitute a major breach of the public trust." Mr. Farrell was referring to a report in The Daily News that Mr. Fossella, who represents Staten Island and parts of Brooklyn, took trips with his family to ski resorts and other destinations that were financed by donors and corporate sponsors. Craig Donner, a Fossella spokesman, acknowledged that Mr. Fossella had taken several trips over the years, but he said they violated no laws. "The expenses are legal and allowable under federal regulations," Mr. Donner said.

Paulson Defends Tax Cuts At Hearing (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, June 28, 2006

Hank Paulson made a robust defence of President George W. Bush's tax cuts at the Senate committee overseeing his nomination as US Treasury secretary on Tuesday, and hinted at a possible shift in emphasis in Washington's China policy.

The former chairman and chief executive of Goldman Sachs stressed the importance of US pressure on Beijing to reform and open up its domestic financial system. He told senators this would allow China to move to a market-determined exchange rate.

DOJ_NMG_0037309

Setting out an ambitious agenda for the remainder of Mr Bush's second term in office, Mr Paulson also raised the possibility of a renewed push on reform of entitlement programmes Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security.

The nominee kept up pressure on China to allow greater currency flexibility in the short term, telling senators "we need to encourage them to move quicker there and show more flexibility." But he added that "until they have a fully functioning financial system, a modern financial system which they don't have now, they are not going to be able to have a currency that trades in the competitive marketplace."

The former Goldman Sachs chief, who has visited China more than 70 times since 1990, said Washington should be prepared to push "aggressively" for further finanical sector liberalisation. Mr Paulson's remarks build on, rather than contradict, the stance taken by his predecessor John Snow, who also talked about the importance of banking reform in China.

They suggest that as Treasury Secretary Mr Paulson will put a lot of emphasis on this subject. Speaking more broadly, Mr Paulson also told the Senate finance committee: "If confirmed, I will focus intensely on how the US United States can maintain and strengthen our competitive position."

The nominee said "deficits do matter" and added that he hoped it would be possible to make progress on entitlement reform during the remainder of the Bush second term. On taxation, Mr Paulson said "I watched the role the tax cuts played in getting this economy to where it now is and I think we should all feel very fortunate the economy is growing." He said the tax cuts should be made permanent, saying "tax increases would be counter-productive."

Treasury Nominee Gives Few Specifics On Bush Priorities (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 24 — Henry M. Paulson Jr., President Bush's nominee for Treasury secretary, cautiously avoided any hints on Tuesday about the administration's economic priorities for the remainder of Mr. Bush's term.

Testifying at his confirmation hearing before the Senate Finance Committee, Mr. Paulson reiterated Mr. Bush's general views on the need for low taxes, budget restraint, increased American competitiveness and the use of persuasion rather than threats in dealing with China on economic issues.

But Mr. Paulson, the chairman of Goldman Sachs, carefully avoided specifics on most policy issues or any mention of prospects for reviving some of Mr. Bush's economic goals — like overhauling the income tax — that have languished for the last two years.

"Having good ideas is one thing," Mr. Paulson said in response to questions about a tax overhaul. "Having good ideas that are doable is another thing."

Though lawmakers in both parties said Mr. Paulson was all but assured of being confirmed, perhaps later this week, his tentative performance on Tuesday seemed in contrast with his build-up by administration officials as a major power player in an arena where White House officials have dominated all the crucial decisions.

Administration officials wooed Mr. Paulson, who earned $35 million at Goldman last year, in part with assurances that he would play a more central role than either of his two predecessors — Paul H. O'Neill, who was fired in part for his headstrong attitudes; and John W. Snow, who spent most of his time as a salesman rather than architect of Mr. Bush's policies.

Mr. Paulson, 60, rejected some of the White House's initial overtures to become Treasury secretary. When Mr. Bush announced his choice of Mr. Paulson on May 31, the president described him as his "principal adviser on the broad range of domestic and international economic issues."

But on Tuesday, Mr. Paulson stuck to generalities: keeping taxes low, maintaining flexibility in the capital markets, fighting a "creeping regulatory expansion," addressing an anticipated surge of spending on Social Security and Medicare as the nation's baby boomers enter retirement, and improving competitiveness in world markets.

He also alluded at least twice to the limited time left — two and a half years — in Mr. Bush's presidency.

Much like his predecessor, Mr. Paulson rebuffed calls for trimming some of Mr. Bush's tax cuts to reduce the deficit.

"I think it would be a big mistake to increase taxes," he told Senator Olympia J. Snowe, Republican of Maine, adding that the deficit, which is hovering around $300 billion a year, is "within the realm of historical norms" as a share of the gross domestic product.

Mr. Paulson faced sharp questioning from both Republicans and Democrats about the administration's efforts to stop abusive tax shelters and to reduce the so-called tax gap — as much as $350 billion a year, according to Congressional estimates — in taxes that are owed but not paid.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa and chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, complained that the Internal Revenue Service, which is part of Treasury, had "fallen down on the job" in offering incentives to whistle-blowers who could expose tax cheating.

DOJ_NMG_0037310

Mr. Paulson is reported to have a net worth of about $700 million, including about $470 million in Goldman Sachs shares. He has said he will sell his holdings in Goldman Sachs to comply with the government's conflict-of-interest rules.

Mr. Grassley said his staff, which scrutinized Mr. Paulson's tax returns, had found no evidence that he had used tax shelters.

In response to questions from Senator Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana, Mr. Paulson promised to review a secret program to investigate and track terrorists that relies on an international database that includes Americans' banking transactions.

If confirmed, Mr. Paulson said that he would make sure he thoroughly understood the law covering the program.

One of the few moments of direct personal conflict between lawmakers and Mr. Paulson was not about policy but about Mr. Paulson's role as chairman of the Nature Conservancy, an environmental organization that buys land to prevent it from being developed.

The Nature Conservancy came under heavy criticism several years ago, because some of its deals allowed people to take big tax deductions for contributions of land and yet also allowed significant development projects.

Mr. Paulson pushed through major changes at the Nature Conservancy as well as a settlement of disputes with the Internal Revenue Service.

But on Tuesday, Mr. Grassley complained that the Nature Conservancy had refused to release the details of the I.R.S. settlement.

Mr. Paulson said he was "only one member" of the board, and that the chief executive of the Nature Conservancy wanted to keep the settlement out of the public eye by having the Internal Revenue Service give the Senate Finance Committee details under the cloak of confidentiality.

Paulson Sticks To The Script (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

Treasury secretary-designate Henry M. Paulson Jr. hewed firmly to Bush administration positions at his Senate confirmation hearing yesterday, saying that he "very strongly" opposes tax increases, hopes to begin tackling the long-term obligations of Social Security and Medicare, and wants China to move more quickly toward changing its currency policy.

Appearing before the Senate Finance Committee, Paulson repeatedly praised President Bush's tax cuts and rebuffed suggestions by committee members that tax increases ought to be included in a package of measures to shrink the federal budget deficit.

"Would I like spending to be less? Yes. Would I like the deficit to be less? Yes," said Paulson, who has been chairman and chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group since 1999. "But it's manageable . . . and we can attack it best with a strong and growing economy." Raising taxes, he said, "would be counterproductive" by hurting growth.

Again echoing long-standing views expressed by Bush and other administration officials, Paulson said the nation should put a high priority on reducing the costs of Social Security and Medicare as the baby-boom generation retires. The sooner the retirement and health-care issues are tackled, "the less costly will be the ultimate solution," he said.

But he tacitly acknowledged that, with the administration in its sixth year, political constraints will limit how much he can accomplish.

"It would be naive to think all these things can be solved in a 2 1/2-year period," he said, although he added that he hopes "at least to begin to address" the issues.

Those and other comments indicated that Paulson will continue the approach of the outgoing Treasury secretary, John W. Snow, in faithfully backing the president's policies. Snow suffered from being widely perceived as a cheerleader for the White House, and the appointment of a Wall Street titan was aimed at giving luster to a post that has declined in influence during Bush's presidency.

Paulson was asked deferential questions by senators who lauded his grasp of financial issues, but he skirted several controversial issues by pleading ignorance on technical and legal matters.

When a couple of Democratic senators raised privacy concerns about a recently disclosed program run by the Treasury Department that monitors a large international financial database to track down terrorists, Paulson said he has to "make sure I understand the law thoroughly" before stating an opinion.

On China, he promised to continue the administration's policy of prodding Beijing to let the yuan rise in value. Many U.S. and labor unions accuse China of keeping the yuan fixed at an artificially low exchange rate against the U.S. dollar, giving Chinese businesses an unfair advantage in world markets and costing the United States jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0037311

"I would give the administration and Secretary Snow a lot more credit than they are given by some people" on the China currency issue, Paulson said, noting that China has "moved to accept the principle . . . of a flexible currency. That was a very big step for China," even though the exchange rate of the yuan has barely budged.

But he declined to pass judgment on legislation proposed by Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.) and the Finance Committee chairman, Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), that would make it easier for the Treasury to impose sanctions on China for having a "misaligned" currency. "I need to learn more, and look forward to learning more, about the legal framework," he said.

Such comments were generally praised by committee members, even Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), one of the Senate's sharpest critics of China's policy. Schumer said he had known Paulson for 15 years and indicated that he will cooperate closely with him on the China issue.

At the end of the hearing, Grassley said he hoped that Paulson's nomination could sail through the Senate before the July 4 recess, when Snow has said he plans to leave office. "Our goal is to report the nomination as quickly as possible," he said.

Treasury Nominee Urges Pressing China On Yuan (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's Treasury secretary nominee told a Senate panel that the U.S. has to "fairly aggressively" encourage China to make its currency more flexible and continue to prod the country toward economic overhauls.

Henry M. Paulson Jr., chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., who has visited China about 70 times in the past 15 years, said he hoped to be "quite active" in international issues, including China. Mr. Paulson said while there is a "strong protectionist sentiment in China," the U.S. must encourage Chinese leaders to embrace a competitive marketplace "and encourage them to move quickly."

At a three-hour confirmation hearing before the Senate Finance Committee, Mr. Paulson, who is expected to be confirmed, didn't signal that any major changes in economic policy are on the horizon. He defended the Bush administration's recent tax cuts, saying they were helping to expand the economy. He played down concerns over the budget deficit, saying it was "manageable and within the realm of historic norms."

"Like all of us, I wish our deficit was lower. But I'm actually encouraged that despite the bursting of the [stock market] bubble and the recession and the war on terror...we're in a situation right now where our economy has been growing," he said. Asked whether, given the strong economy, it was time to raise taxes to help deal with the deficit, Mr. Paulson said it "would be a big mistake to increase taxes."

Several senators detailed fiscal problems that Mr. Paulson will have to tackle. Sen. Max Baucus, (D., Mont.), cautioned Mr. Paulson that he "will have much work to do. The government has run $300 billion budget deficits for four years in a row. The balance of trade has been on a roller-coaster ride to extremes. America faces new economic competition from China and India. And the Treasury Department has suffered depressed morale and a diminished policy role. Good luck."

Mr. Paulson told senators he would take steps to simplify taxes and overhaul entitlement programs such as Social Security and Medicare, but said it would be "naive" to think those issues could be "addressed and solved in a two-and-a-half-year period."

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

Treasury Secretary nominee Henry Paulson1 says "it would be a big mistake to increase taxes," in his testimony before the Senate Finance Committee.

A notable omission in Mr. Paulson's remarks was mention of a strong dollar -- nor was he asked about it by the senators. That stands in contrast to departing Secretary John Snow, who backed a strong-dollar policy in his confirmation hearing in 2003.

Under questioning by several senators, including Republican Sen. Charles Grassley of Iowa, chairman of the committee, Mr. Paulson said he would review a newly disclosed Treasury Department program to track suspected terrorists by examining financial transactions. "I am going to, if confirmed, be all over it," he said.

A London-based civil liberties group is asking governments to block the release of confidential financial records to U.S. authorities as part of U.S. antiterrorist probes. Privacy International said it filed complaints with data protection and privacy regulators in 17 countries, arguing that disclosures of financial transactions "were made without any legal basis or authority whatsoever."

Several senators pressed Mr. Paulson about why the Bush administration's economic policies weren't leading to faster wage growth for many Americans. "The average wage-earner is losing purchasing power and they are feeling it mightily. Exactly when do their wages grow?" asked Sen. Olympia Snowe, (R., Maine). Mr. Paulson said he cares "deeply about the economic well-being of the middle class" and said recent job growth and productivity growth "will hopefully be followed by an increase in wage income."

DOJ_NMG_0037312

Mr. Paulson said he wants to be active in targeting those who abuse charitable donations to pay less in taxes. Mr. Paulson said he is concerned about instances where donors make "in kind" gifts to charities, such as art, and "take an inflated appraisal" so they can claim a higher deduction on taxes.

Treasury Nominee Paulson Sounds A Lot Like Outgoing Snow (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — If Treasury Secretary-designate Henry Paulson is going to differ dramatically from outgoing John Snow, there wasn't much evidence of it Tuesday during his Senate confirmation hearing.

President Bush nominated Paulson to become Treasury secretary as part of a second-term shake-up aimed at reinvigorating the president's sagging public approval ratings. The chairman and chief executive of investment banking powerhouse Goldman Sachs brings to the post a reputation for financial acumen as well as deeply held views on issues such as global warming that differ from administration policy.

But under generally friendly questioning by lawmakers, the prospective Treasury boss sounded a lot like the old boss. On issues from taxes to trade with China, Paulson echoed Snow's stance, telling members of the Senate Finance Committee:

·Federal tax cuts slated to expire in coming years should be extended and efforts to cut the deficit limited to spending reductions. “I feel very strongly we should not be increasing taxes,” Paulson said.

·China is moving toward a market-based currency, but the U.S. should urge Beijing to go faster.

·Continued economic growth, which has boosted corporate profits, eventually will pay off for middle-income workers with fatter paychecks.

Paulson also said the current government deficit is “manageable,” but he called for early action on a looming crisis over Medicare and Social Security costs as millions of baby boomers retire.

Lawmakers hope to confirm Paulson before leaving for the July Fourth holiday. The nomination faces no major obstacles, with even committee Democrats praising Paulson as a welcome addition to the administration.

With many members of Congress chafing over administration efforts to strengthen executive power, several lawmakers urged Paulson to keep them better informed. Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., complained that Treasury officials had not briefed the committee on the government's use of international bank records to combat terrorism, which was disclosed by The New York Times.

Paulson promised to personally review the program, which he said he had not yet been briefed on.

Paulson, 60, long has been active in environmental matters and has warned publicly that the time needed to address climate change is running out. But replying to a question from Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., Paulson played down suggestions his views could modify administration policy.

“The president of the United States has nominated me to be secretary of the Treasury. He hasn't nominated me to be secretary of the Interior. He hasn't nominated me to be head of the Environmental Protection Agency.”

Reading The Classifieds (WP)

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

The State Department's Information Systems and Services office reminded everyone last week that putting SBU (Sensitive But Unclassified) on cables and e-mails is useless in terms of actually keeping the information from the public.

Worse yet, the folks at ISS said in a June 22 announcement, putting SBU on a document "DOES NOT by itself" protect the information from release under the dread Freedom of Information Act.

So if you want to keep it from getting to the public, you need to classify it as secret, top secret, eyes only, and so on. (Another problem with using SBU is that passing such information on is not a security violation, so the divulgers can't be punished.)

This useful reminder was issued only five days after The Washington Post published a cable from the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad recounting the daily hardships and dangers confronting Iraqi embassy employees. Every paragraph of that cable was marked SBU.

ISS assures us the new guidance had nothing to do with the publication of that cable, which apparently caused a bit of a fuss at Foggy Bottom. ISS says it periodically reissues such guidance.

We certainly believe them, though we hear no one at the State Department does. The new guidance almost surely means more secrecy.

"From their point of view, SBU is an informal 'we don't want to tell you' designation," said Steven Aftergood , a secrecy specialist at the Federation of American Scientists. The State Department apparently thinks "too much information is getting out."

This just in from Arab News, an English-language daily in the Middle East: "Saudis Offered Scholarships for Aviation Courses in US," says the headline.

"The Ministry of Higher Education and the General Authority of Civil Aviation are offering scholarships to Saudi men and women to study majors related to civil aviation in the United States," according to a bylined article from Jeddah, and application forms are on the ministry's Web site.

"The scholarships are available in majors such as communications, electrical and computer engineering . . . air traffic control, flight safety, and other majors related to the airline transport industry," we're told.

The Saudis are offering scholarships this year for study in Australia, China, India, Japan, Malaysia, New Zealand, Singapore, South Korea and the United States.

Hurry on down. Deadline's July 12.It's Official: Langley Opens a Honey Pot

Great news for the new, leaner and meaner CIA. A Dunkin' Donuts has recently opened at headquarters. Nothing like one of those tasty, glazed beauties each day to keep that waistline under control.

The power outage Thursday morning in parts of McLean also hit the CIA, but we're told backup systems kept essential networks going. Some lights, desktop computers and the like were affected during the three-hour outage, forcing some employees to have doughnuts in the dark.

No connection found between the outage and the reappearance that day at the agency of legendary operative Stephen R. Kappes , who headed the clandestine service but resigned in 2004 during the 18-month reign of director Porter J. Goss .

Kappes hasn't formally come on as the agency's No. 2. He awaits Senate action on the reappointment of the current deputy director, Adm. Albert M. Calland III , to his three-star rank, at which point Calland is to move over to be deputy director of strategic planning of the National Counterterrorism Center.

Kappes, a spokesman said, "has used his time in the building . . . to read in and to reach out to agency personnel."

Speaking of the new old guy, Kappes, what about the old new guys, otherwise known as the Gosslings? The big question is whether the new regime is going to do a wholesale purge or surgical removal.

Some division chiefs and others are said to have put in a good word with new CIA Director Michael V. Hayden for Michael V. Kostiw . Kostiw, who left the agency in 1981 after some unpleasantness involving a package of bacon, was thought to have done well when he returned as Goss's special assistant for operations in Afghanistan and Iraq.An Eye for an Eye -- Belarus Sanctions Bush

Meanwhile, those lovable unreconstructed commies in Belarus have vowed to retaliate for the administration's decision to freeze the U.S. bank accounts of Belarusan President Alexander Lukashenko and other high-ranking officials.

The sanctions, which also bar U.S. citizens from doing business with the Belarusans, were imposed for that government's human rights abuses, general corruption and thuggery, repression, election fraud and the disappearances of four regime critics.

"We'll apply appropriately symmetrical measures to George W. Bush and Condoleezza Rice ," Belarusan Security Council Secretary Viktor Sheiman vowed in a state television interview. "We'll freeze their accounts and seize their assets" in Belarus.

"It's clear to everyone that neither Lukashenko, nor I have or can have any bank accounts in the U.S. The U.S. administration has been looking for these accounts for 10 years now," Sheiman said. He described the U.S. action as "diehard and ugly."

Based on their financial disclosure forms, it does not appear that Bush and Rice have extensive holdings in Belarus.On the Move?

Word is that Jim Wilkinson, formerly at the White House and more recently burnishing Rice's image, will be chief of staff to Henry M. Paulson Jr ., once he's confirmed by the Senate as Treasury secretary.

Bush's Communications Director Leaves (AP-Y2)

AP2, June 27, 2006

President Bush's communications director is stepping down to move to New York City with her husband, the White House announced Tuesday.

Nicolle Wallace has been in a long-distance marriage ever since her husband, Mark, became United Nations ambassador for management and reform this spring. Wallace decided to stay temporarily in Washington, but this Friday she is leaving her job overseeing White House press strategy.

"I've never stopped feeling amazed when the West Wing gate swings open each morning when I show my badge," Wallace said. She said she doesn't have her next job lined up yet.

The couple worked on Bush's 2004 campaign before they married — Mark Wallace as deputy campaign manager and Nicolle Devenish as communications director. She moved to the White House after Bush's re-election, and the couple married in September in Greece. Bush nominated Mark Wallace to be ambassador in January.

W. BENCH PRESS (NYPOST)

The New York Post, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush today will nominate Gov. Pataki's lieutenant governor, Mary Donohue, for a federal judgeship in upstate New York, The Post has learned.

Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.), who serves on the Senate Judiciary Committee which would consider her nomination, has been informed and "is keeping an open mind," aides said.

Donohue is a former state Supreme Court justice who has been seen as a product of New York's Republican political machine with close ties to former Sen. Al D'Amato. Pataki submitted her name to Bush last March.

Connaughton Named To Lead U.S. Maritime Agency (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen And Nikita Stewart

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

Prince William Board of County Supervisors Chairman Sean T. Connaughton, who presided over a period of unprecedented growth in one of the nation's most diverse and dynamic suburban areas, was nominated yesterday by President Bush to be the head of the U.S. Maritime Administration.

If confirmed by the Senate, Connaughton, a maritime lawyer, would resign the post he has held nearly seven years to be the administrator of an agency with an annual budget of more than $500 million and a staff of 1,000, whose primary job is to ensure safe and efficient access for commercial and military ships through U.S. waterways.

"We are a dramatically different county and for the better. . . ," said Connaughton, a moderate Republican whose term as head of the supervisors expires at the end of next year. "We've been able to make growth pay for growth."

Connaughton, 45, said the presidential nomination represents the "highest honor" of his professional career as a maritime lawyer and one that he could not turn down. He is with Troutman Sanders LLP.

His decision leaves in question the leadership of a county that has changed in recent years from a quiet, semi-suburban, semi-rural area into a bona fide part of Northern Virginia, complete with $800,000 homes, fancy golf courses and epic traffic jams.

Depending on the timing of Connaughton's resignation, a special election could be called or a successor could be chosen on Election Day next year -- Nov. 6.

There are many rumored candidates. Supervisor Martin E. Nohe (R-Coles) said that it's premature for him to make a decision but that the new chairman should be "someone who follows Sean's footsteps." Only Supervisor Corey A. Stewart (R-Occoquan) has announced that he'll run.

Connaughton was almost unknown when he ran for county supervisor in 1999 against Democratic incumbent Kathleen K. Seefeldt, whom he accused of failing to foresee the effects of growth -- high taxes, inadequate roads and crowded schools -- and of being too close to developers.

He promised not to stop development but to manage it better, and voters took him up on the pledge, choosing a Republican supervisor for the first time in the county's history. Last year, he lost a bid to be the GOP candidate for lieutenant governor.

When he became a supervisor, the county had 280,000 people, an annual budget of about $400 million and one of the highest tax rates in the region.

He leaves an increasingly diverse county of about 364,000 people, a budget of $857 million and Northern Virginia's lowest tax rate, which he and his board colleagues accomplished by cutting the tax rate as property values soared. The county also earned a AAA bond rating during Connaughton's tenure, a gold star for local governments.

Developers are now paying more in proffers, voluntary funds used to offset the costs of schools, roads and other public services. Rather than wait for state transportation money to trickle down, the county used its money to build hundreds of miles of roads. And Prince William recently became one of a handful of municipalities in the state to propose creating a transportation department.

Since Connaughton took office, the county has built 21 schools and hired several hundred police and fire personnel to keep up with growth.

DOJ_NMG_0037315

And, to the consternation of some longtime residents, he initiated smaller programs aimed at changing the county's good-old-boy image.

For some accustomed to living as they please, Connaughton will be remembered as the man who banished motorboats and RVs from residential streets and who hired a "neighborhood coordinator" to point out property code violations such as derelict cars parked in front yards.

But to Connaughton, those sorts of community maintenance programs, along with the county's new emphasis on historic preservation, represent a turning point for an area once considered where the "real" Virginia began.

As the county has become more tethered to Northern Virginia, the distinction has moved a few exits south.

"I'm extremely proud of what's happened in Prince William in the last seven years," Connaughton said, adding that his nomination is only the "the first step in a long process."

Chief Seeks $160.5M For VA Data Security (USAT)

USA Today, June 28, 2006

Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson told a House Appropriations subcommittee Tuesday that he can turn his agency into a “model for information security” but said he needs at least $160.5 million to do it. The request includes funding for at least one year of government-paid credit monitoring for the 26.5 million veterans and active-duty military personnel whose private personal information was stolen May 3 in a burglary at the home of a VA analyst. There have been no reports of identity theft in connection with the incident. The VA proposes to pay out-of-pocket expenses ranging from $10,000 to $20,000 for those whose identities are stolen. He said more money may be needed to revamp information security at the VA.

Senate Intelligence Chairman Pat Roberts, R-Kan., asked National Intelligence Director John Negroponte to order an assessment of damage caused by the disclosure of secret intelligence programs aimed at stopping terrorists. “We cannot continue to operate in a system where the government takes steps to counter terrorism while the media actively works to disclose those operations without any regard for protection of lives, sources and legal methods,” Roberts said.

The latest disclosures last week reported on a secret financial-monitoring program used to trace terrorists. President Bush on Monday called the disclosures “disgraceful” and said it “does great harm to the United States” by making it “harder to win this war on terror.”

The House International Relations Committee approved President Bush's plan to share civilian nuclear technology with India, a first step toward approval of the unprecedented deal. The vote was 37-5.

India would allow international inspections and safeguards at 14 reactors it has designated as civilian. Eight military facilities would remain off-limits. In return, the United States would ship nuclear technology and fuel to India. Rep. Jim Leach, R-Iowa, said the deal “knifed” the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, which limits the spread of nuclear technology. He called it a sad day for efforts to stop the spread of nuclear arms. India developed its nuclear bombs outside the treaty.

Government-owned land would be used to store nuclear waste temporarily pending completion of a long-delayed permanent facility, under a proposal by Senate Energy and Natural Resources Chairman Pete Domenici, R-N.M. His proposal would give the Energy Department authority to build storage facilities on federal land or purchase private land for storage, for up to 25 years, even if state or local authorities objected. A facility would have to get a license from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and comply with various security, safety and environmental regulations.

Funding was included in a $30.7 billion spending bill an Appropriations subcommittee approved Tuesday. The plan deals with the more than 50,000 tons of used reactor fuel at power plants in 31 states.

The government is obligated to take the waste but has no place to put it because the permanent underground storage site to be built at Yucca Mountain in Nevada cannot open until at least 2018.

$160 Million To Be Sought For VA's Credit-Monitoring Program (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb And Josh White

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson said yesterday that the Bush administration will seek $160.5 million to pay for free credit monitoring for veterans and military personnel whose personal information was stolen last month, and he hinted that more money may be necessary.

"If a year expires, we have a responsibility to determine whether to renew based on what we know at the time," he said.

Congress may face requests for spending to cover potential data losses at other agencies -- such as those that were announced recently at the Agriculture Department, the Pentagon and the Federal Trade Commission.

Meanwhile, Navy officials announced this week that they believe the number of sailors and their family members whose personal data were posted on a civilian Web site was larger than first suspected last week.

DOJ_NMG_0037316

In a news release Monday, the Navy said that the birthdates, Social Security numbers and other personal information of more than 30,618 people were compromised when five spreadsheet files appeared on the Internet. On Friday, it had said that 28,000 people were affected.

Officials said the spreadsheets appeared to have data on personnel who were stationed in areas affected by Hurricane Katrina last year. The Naval Criminal Investigative Service is looking into how the information ended up on a public Web site.

Navy spokesmen said there is no indication that the data have been used illegally, but the service has sent letters to all sailors whose personal data were compromised to encourage them to monitor their financial accounts.

The theft of Department of Veterans Affairs data occurred at a VA data analyst's home in early May and was announced to the public three weeks later, prompting outrage among veterans. Several veterans groups have filed class-action lawsuits in Kentucky and in Washington, D.C., against the federal government, seeking $1,000 in damages per affected veteran.

A judge in Kentucky has scheduled a hearing for Friday to determine whether the VA must offer affected people more expansive services and has prohibited the VA from publicizing the credit monitoring to veterans until then.

The VA plans to send letters to eligible people in August and is receiving bids for the service from potential contractors.

Authorities have said that they do not believe the data, stored on a laptop and an external hard drive, were targeted by the thief. They said there have been no signs that the information has been misused. The data files contained information on 26.5 million people.

Nicholson said that $29 million of the $160.5 million will be taken from VA funds budgeted for 2006 to cover personnel costs at the Veterans Benefits Administration, where hiring planned for this year has been postponed until next. He said the rest will come from other areas of the fiscal 2006 budget.

"It will take some belt tightening. It will not come out of veterans' benefits," he said.

The VA has already budgeted about $25 million to set up a call center for responding to veterans' questions -- which costs about $200,000 per day -- and to send mailings to veterans alerting them about the data loss and the credit-monitoring program.

New Rules Force States To Curb Welfare Rolls (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 27 — The Bush administration plans to issue sweeping new rules on Wednesday that will require states to move much larger numbers of poor people from welfare to work.

The rules, drafted in response to a budget signed into law by President Bush in February, represent the biggest changes in welfare policy since 1996, when Congress abolished the federal guarantee of cash assistance for the nation's poorest children.

Since then, the number of welfare recipients has plunged more than 60 percent, to 4.4 million people, from 12.2 million. Most of the decline occurred in the first years, before the 2001 recession. Federal and state officials say they expect the new rules to speed the decline in welfare rolls, which has slowed in recent years.

The rules are far more than a bureaucratic application of the new law, passed after four years of partisan deadlock. For the first time, they set a uniform definition for permissible work activities and require states to verify and document the number of hours worked by welfare recipients.

Nationally, in 2004, the last year for which official figures are available, about 32 percent of adults on welfare were working. Under the new rules, 50 percent of adult welfare recipients must be engaged in work or training in the fiscal year that starts Oct. 1, or states will face financial penalties. The penalties can reduce a state's federal welfare grant by 5 percent in the first year and by two additional percentage points for each subsequent year of noncompliance, up to a maximum penalty of 21 percent.

Some state officials and antipoverty groups, including many who opposed the 1996 law, say the new work requirements are unrealistic. But Bush administration officials point to Georgia as evidence that the goals are achievable.

Gov. Sonny Perdue of Georgia, a Republican, said 69 percent of his state's adult welfare recipients were either working or in work-training programs, up from 8 percent four years ago. Moreover, Mr. Perdue said, the number of adult welfare cases has declined to 8,100, from 30,590 in 2002. In 32 of Georgia's 159 counties, he said, all the adults on welfare are employed or in training programs.

Members of Congress thought they were setting stringent work requirements when they created the current welfare program, Temporary Assistance for Needy Families, in 1996. But state officials quickly discovered that the requirements were much less onerous than they had thought.

Under the old law, the work requirements were reduced whenever states reduced the number of families on welfare, compared with the 1995 level. In theory, 50 percent of adult welfare recipients were supposed to be working. But if a state's caseload dropped 45 percent, the work requirement was slashed by 45 percentage points, so that only 5 percent of the state's welfare recipients had to be working.

Wade F. Horn, an assistant secretary of health and human services, said this provision of the 1996 law, known as a "caseload reduction credit," had wiped out any meaningful work requirements. Under the new rules, states will receive credit only for future reductions in their welfare rolls. The base year, for the purpose of comparison, will be 2005.

The new requirements may come as a shock to many states. In 2004, all states but Indiana and Mississippi met their work participation requirements, as calculated by the federal government. In 19 states, the required work participation rate — after taking account of steep declines in the welfare rolls — was zero.

The administration has scheduled a news conference for Wednesday to announce the rules, which, under the new law, must be issued by the end of this month.

Crystal A. Robinson, a 26-year-old mother of three in Minneapolis, said she believed that stricter work requirements could be helpful if states provided generous subsidies for child care.

Ms. Robinson received cash assistance from 2000 to 2002 and now receives help with her child care costs.

"I found a job I liked," said Ms. Robinson, who works 40 hours a week at a local hospital. "I'm a very hard worker. But the child care would be unaffordable without assistance from Hennepin County."

Another welfare recipient, Laura L. Kegerreis, 33, receives $497 a month for herself and her three children while she takes job-preparation courses at Harrisburg Area Community College in Pennsylvania. Mr. Kegerreis said the new work requirements could force her to take fewer classes, prolonging her stay on welfare and delaying her ability to get a professional credential.

The new law reauthorizes welfare programs through September 2010. The basic federal block grant remains $16.5 billion a year and is not adjusted for inflation or changes in the number of people on the rolls.

"Welfare" used to mean a monthly check that could be immediately converted to cash. But more than half of the money now goes into child care, education, training and other services — a huge shift since 1996.

Under the new rules, the federal government will spend $150 million a year on programs to help couples form "healthy marriages." Up to $50 million of this amount can be spent on activities promoting "responsible fatherhood." These activities could include seminars on the causes of domestic violence and child abuse.

After President Bill Clinton signed the 1996 welfare law, he gave states a large amount of discretion, saying he trusted them to help families become self-sufficient. The new rules limit the flexibility that states were granted in 1996. They define 12 acceptable types of work activity, including subsidized and unsubsidized employment, community service, on-the-job training, job search (usually limited to six weeks a year) and vocational education training (up to 12 months in a lifetime).

Federal officials said they were adopting uniform standards because the definition of work now varied from state to state, and even from year to year within the same state. As a result, they said, it is difficult to compare states' performance.

Today, as in 1996, many Democrats say the welfare law creates a perverse incentive. A state can comply by putting some people to work and by simply removing others from the rolls, regardless of whether they find jobs.

In an executive order on Friday, Gov. John Lynch of New Hampshire, a Democrat, made clear that he wanted to meet the federal requirements not just by closing cases, but by moving people to "lasting employment and self-sufficiency." Mr. Lynch said he intended to increase child care, transportation, education and other services to help people stay off welfare.

States could avoid many restrictions of the 1996 law by providing assistance entirely with state money, through separate state programs.

Reid Threatens Member COLA (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, June 28, 2006

Seeking to leave town on a political high note, Senate Democratic leaders vowed on Tuesday to block their own annual pay raise unless Republicans also allow for a boost in the federal minimum wage.

Democrats offered few details about how they plan to carry out their promise to stop Congress' scheduled 2 percent pay hike from going into effect next January. But they said they have more than 40 Senate Democrats aligned behind them and will succeed in freezing Members' pay unless Congress approves a minimum wage increase by the end of the 109th.

"They can play all the games they want ... but we're going to do everything to stop the Congressional pay raise being put in — the right way, the wrong way or any way," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

In recent weeks, House and Senate Democrats have been increasingly vocal about raising the minimum wage from its current $5.15 an hour to $7.25 an hour. The wage hike is part of the Democrats' national platform this year, and one of several domestic priorities they plan to tout heading into November.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) already has introduced a bill in the Senate tying a COLA freeze to a minimum wage boost, and in the House, Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) successfully added an amendment to the Labor, Health and Human Services and Education appropriations bill to boost the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour.

DOJ_NMG_0037318

House Republican leaders had planned a floor vote on the Labor spending bill earlier this month but pulled it from the schedule fearing a defeat on the floor. Democrats have accused the GOP of holding the bill hostage over its distaste for the minimum wage amendment.

Hoyer said on Tuesday that "Democrats have made the minimum wage a top priority and will continue to push the issue any way we can."

Reid said it is unfair for Congress to accept a COLA for itself when millions of Americans are struggling to make ends meet. "We've had enough of it, and the American people have, too."

Republicans, however, accused the Democrats of engaging in a "political stunt" in an election year and said the minority won't get far with its latest tactic.

"In a week where the Democrats' main attack against Republicans is that we are putting politics first, it's an awfully interesting move," noted one Senate GOP aide.

Some Republicans support a halt to Congressional pay increases but generally see a minimum wage increase as a burden on small businesses working to make economic headway. The minimum wage has been set at $5.15 an hour since 1997.

Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.), the Senate GOP's policy chairman, said he'd love to have Democrats support in his ongoing efforts to sideline next year's scheduled COLA, but he believes they have a very slim chance at getting the minimum wage increase through.

"If they're still stuck on the provision they've offered, they don't have the votes this year," Kyl said, referring to a proposal by Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) to increase the minimum wage to $7.25.

The Democratic challenge on the minimum wage comes during a week where the minority is trying to put Republicans on the defensive on a host of issues before the Senate breaks for the July Fourth recess. Democrats hope to counter Republicans attempts to frame the debate on Iraq war and immigration reform, while striking a chord of their own on those issues and others such as the minimum wage increase.

Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin (Ill.) said Democrats clearly are trying to start a drumbeat on a long-standing priority.

"We hope that we will not only send a message to the Republican leadership in Congress about these hardworking families, but that the voters will send a message on Nov. 7 that it's time for change," Durbin said.

While the COLA has not yet become a prominent issue in any Senate races this cycle, several Democratic challengers in the House have attempted to link Congressional pay to the minimum wage hike.

Banker Christine Jennings, a Democrat running for the open seat in Florida's 13th district, is one of the latest to do so.

Jennings will hold an event in Sarasota on Tuesday to pledge that, if elected, she will refuse a pay raise until the minimum wage is increased and will sign a copy of a written pledge to that effect.

"As your future Congresswoman, I promise to put the needs of working families ahead of fattening the salaries of members of Congress," she said in a statement.

The COLA would give House and Senate lawmakers an average $3,330 increase in their paychecks beginning in 2007, bringing rank-and-file Members' annual salary to $168,500. Elected members of the leadership are paid slightly more.

That pay raise is automatic unless lawmakers move to block it — typically through the Treasury appropriations bill, which has cleared the House and is scheduled for a Senate markup on July 20. It is unclear when that spending bill will hit the Senate floor.

On the House side, Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said on Tuesday his chamber is "done" with the COLA this year. Rep. Jim Matheson (D-Utah) led efforts to curb the pay increase in that chamber two weeks ago.

Several Senators have long pushed to stop pay raises for Members, including Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), who last week said he once again plans to offer an amendment at some point to ensure a Senate vote on the issue.

Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) said on Tuesday that "if tying the two together is the only way to get the minimum wage, we're all for it.

"Congress shouldn't be lining its pockets while hardworking Americans are struggling just to fill theirs."

Raising Minimum Wage Will Not Hurt Jobs, Dean Says (WT)

By Josh Rutledge

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean yesterday dismissed as economic "mumbo jumbo" the argument that raising the minimum wage would cause unemployment.

The former Vermont governor made his claims during a conference of liberal Christians yesterday at National City Christian Church in Northwest, during which Mr. Dean was introduced to cheers and a standing ovation from a morning-session crowd of more than 600 people along with the Rev. Jim Wallis, the evangelical who founded the liberal religious magazine Sojourners.

DOJ_NMG_0037319

"We believe that overcoming poverty must become a nonpartisan issue. We have called both Democrats and Republicans to address the issue," Mr. Wallis said.

When Mr. Wallis introduced Mr. Dean, the Democratic National Committee Chairman (DNC) chief began by saying he "felt right at home" among people praising Jesus.

"This is a moral nation, so the first thing we must do is convince people that poverty is a moral problem," Mr. Dean said. "It is a moral principle to raise the minimum wage. It is nothing but economist mumbo jumbo to say raising it will hurt jobs."

When Mr. Dean was running for the 2004 presidential nomination, he cause much skepticism about his claims to religious practice by citing Job as his favorite New Testament book and his account of leaving the Episcopal Church because of a dispute over a bike path.

The Dean speech came on the second-day of a three-day conference titled "Building a Covenant for a New America," which takes its title from an article earlier this year in Sojourners. Republican National Committee (RNC) Chairman Ken Mehlman was invited to share the stage with Mr. Dean, but organizers said yesterday that he declined.

The conference's sponsors include Sojourners and Call to Renewal, who say that its purpose is to mobilize support for a religious agenda to end poverty, both domestically and internationally. The conference's banners and handouts described raising the minimum wage as one of its three principal issues, the other two being child poverty in the United States and foreign aid.

Christian Weller, senior economist at the Center for American Progress, said that a minimum wage increase from $5.15 to $7.25 would increase minimum wage earners' share of the nation's overall wealth.

"Profits are at their highest levels, but the purchasing power of the minimum wage is at its lowest since the 1950s. I think it is only fair to take a bit from the top and give it to the bottom," Mr. Weller said.

Adam Taylor, senior director of campaigns and organizing for Sojourners/Call to Renewal, urged his listeners to appeal to their representatives to increase this year's Foreign Operations budget to $5 billion.

After the speakers finished, the crowd gathered in the front of the Church, chanting in unison, "Hey hey, ho ho/poverty's got to go." They then proceeded down the streets, urging stalled drivers to honk if they wanted higher wages and waving signs that read, "Poverty Is Not A Family Value" and "Make Poverty History."

At a later gathering, Upper Senate Park on Capitol Hill, the Rev. Anthony Campolo said that "it's time for people of faith to stand up for what the Bible teaches."

"America will not be judged on how secure we make our people. We will be judged on how we treat the poor," he said.

Tensions Running High (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, June 28, 2006

The exceedingly intense rivalry between Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Charles Schumer (N.Y.) embroiled just about everybody in the Senate Democratic leadership Tuesday, including Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) and his spokeswoman.

Apparently, Clinton and her staff felt snubbed when party leaders organized a news conference in which they vowed to block efforts to give Members of Congress a pay raise until Congress approves an increase in the minimum wage. Clinton has introduced legislation along those lines, but she was not involved in planning the leadership's news conference to trumpet the issue.

Although Clinton, a close adviser of Reid's, was ultimately invited to attend the news conference, she was not told about the event until just hours before it began Tuesday.

While the noon event was hastily arranged — planning for it only began Monday night — a Clinton aide was apparently so furious that the Senator seemed to be left out of the loop that she bawled out ("reamed out" was how one source put it) a spokeswoman for Reid near the entrance to the Senate Radio-Television Gallery.

The Clinton aide, Laurie Rubiner, was overheard saying to Reid spokeswoman Rebecca Kirszner, "You suck" and "How could you do this?"

Sources say Clinton looked "visibly upset" at the news conference. (Paging Ken Mehlman; didn't you label Clinton the "angry" candidate?) She did not stay for the duration of the question-and-answer session.

Whatever thoughts she or her staff may have expressed to Democratic leaders and their aides before the event, Reid did introduce Clinton and single her out as being "on top of this issue."

"And I think it would have been really unfair not to have her here today," Reid said, "as she has had the vision to look down the road on this issue before some of the others."

One reporter who attended the news conference described Reid's comments as "a little weird" and "out of context."

DOJ_NMG_0037320

The Democratic leaders — Reid, plus Schumer, who chairs the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, Minority Whip Dick Durbin (Ill.) and Democratic Caucus Secretary Debbie Stabenow (Mich.) — met Monday night and decided to hold the news conference. First they scheduled it for 2:30 p.m. following the Tuesday Caucus lunches. Then they moved it up to noon.

Because the time switch threw off her schedule and she had other meetings to attend, Clinton had to leave early, her spokesman, Philippe Reines, told HOH.

He also jokingly denied that Rubiner had chewed out Kirszner, saying, "Laurie Rubiner did not say that to Rebecca. She said 'Nice work.' And she meant it."

Of the Senator, he said, "She was just very disappointed, and continues to be, that the federal minimum wage isn't higher."

A Democratic leadership source told HOH that Rubiner later called Kirszner and apologized, and the apology was accepted. "All's well that ends well," the aide said.

Democratic sources also suggested that Clinton may be more irritated at Schumer than Reid.

One aide said that Schumer "had to have known that Hillary had a bill" on the minimum wage-pay raise issue during that planning meeting Monday night, yet he "didn't say a word" and didn't include her.

Phil Singer, Schumer's spokesman at the DSCC, rejected that notion out of hand, saying, "This issue starkly highlights the wrong priorities of Congressional Republicans, and we're all grateful for Sen. Clinton's leadership in bringing this issue to the forefront."

Rush Job. Rumors were swirling around Capitol Hill and beyond Tuesday that Rush Limbaugh is dating actress Mary Lynn Rajskub, who plays Chloe O'Brian on the Fox series "24." Though that still doesn't explain the unauthorized bottle of little blue pills (shhh, Viagra!) that customs agents found in Limbaugh's luggage at Palm Beach International Airport on Monday.

The conservative radio talk show host hinted on his show Tuesday that he went on a boys-only trip with the cast of "24." Chloe is no boy. If you saw the papers over the weekend, including The Washington Post, there were photos of Limbaugh planting a big kiss right on Rajskub's lips during a dog-and-pony event at the Heritage Foundation.

No one at Heritage seemed to know whether Limbaugh and Rajskub were more than photo-op kissing buddies. A spokeswoman for Heritage who asked not to be named told HOH, "Nobody knows. Several people have been asking today. I have no idea."

Our guess is, probably not. Though why would Rush take Viagra on a boys-only trip?

He joked about the incident on-air Tuesday, on 630 WMAL, after getting caught having apparently traded in the hard stuff for the stuff that makes one hard. (Last month Limbaugh reached a deal with prosecutors on charges involving prescription painkillers.)

Limbaugh asked, "How did Bob Dole's luggage get on my plane?" And he said, "I told my doctor I needed help with the ELECTION."

We called Julie Talbott, a spokeswoman for Premiere Radio Network, and asked her whether Rush was dating "Chloe." Shockingly she told us, "No comment."

At least Limbaugh's ex-girlfriend, CNN anchor Daryn Kagan, didn't have to break the Viagra news on air. Tuesday morning's live coverage began, "I'm Tony Harris. Daryn Kagan has the day off."

Whew!!

Here She Comes. Usually David All is earnestly flacking for his boss, House GOP Conference Vice Chairman Jack Kingston (Ga.). But lately, the ambitious young press secretary has been flacking for his No. 1 gal, Branda Napper, who this weekend — drum roll please — will compete for the title of Miss District of Columbia.

Napper, an aide in the public affairs office at the Department of Homeland Security, is slated to be one of 11 finalists vying for the Miss D.C. crown this Saturday at the University of the District of Columbia on Connecticut Avenue Northwest.

All has been rallying his friends far and wide to get out and support the lovely 24-year-old Ms. Napper this weekend. But as he told HOH, "Branda doesn't need my help to win. She could charm the likes of Simon Cowell and can dance better than Shakira. I'm most useful standing behind her and supporting her through it all."

It's a rigorous challenge, but somebody's gotta do it. As her issue, Napper is focusing on heart disease. She'll wear a two-piece in the swim suit competition and an evening gown that her beau has already seen.

Napper noted that last year's Miss D.C. had "80 friends and family in her cheering section; with that kind of support it is not surprise that she won the title and went on to place fifth at Miss America."

So, get on out there, folks! "Bran-da! Bran-da! Bran-da!"

Oh, Deer, This May Not Be the Right House

Bambi has jumped into politics -- well, at least into Dick Cheney's yard. Last week, a fully grown deer was spotted inside the fence of the Naval Observatory grounds in a wooded area near Observatory Circle.

But how? The veep's house is surrounded by a high fence and -- we assume -- a bunch of other top-secret stuff like motion detectors and radar. In this day and age, nothing the size of a deer meanders around the 40-acre property unless the Secret Service gives it special security clearance.

"It's not uncommon for deer to be there," explained Bill Anderson of Naval District Washington. "They do kind of wander in and out the front gate area and they eat their grasses. We aren't stopping them from walking around the property."

The deer do not affect "at all" the vice president or the house, said Anderson. But he added that the Park Service is preparing an environmental impact statement to look at the "options" for dealing with the four-legged trespassers. Uh-oh! Seem to recall that someone on the premises likes to hunt.

Love, Etc.

? Disengaged: It was like a made-for-MTV movie: the congressman's daughter who melted the heart of the gangsta rapper. In March, The Game , 26, was secretly engaged to Valeisha Butterfield , 28, daughter of first-term Rep. G.K. Butterfield (D-N.C.), according to the exclusive interview the two gave to Jamie Foster Brown in the July issue of Sister 2 Sister magazine. (Other details: They didn't sleep together until after he proposed with a 19-carat diamond; Dad "gave him the third degree" when they met.) But media outlets ranging from Allhiphop.com to the Hill newspaper rushed to investigate -- didn't the drug-dealer-turned-platinum-seller just show up at the "Waist Deep" premiere with a different gal? Seems a lot can happen between press time and the newsstand. "After a long friendship and a brief engagement, they decided to continue on as friends," said Rep. Butterfield's spokesman, Ken Willis .Valeisha, who works in NYC for Russell Simmons's Hip-Hop Summit Action Network, returned the ring. What did Dad think about the whole thing? "He didn't pass on much about his meeting, to tell you the truth," said Willis.

Home Sales Sink; Rates, Inventory Rise (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, June 28, 2006

Rising interest rates are making it increasingly hard to buy a home and are putting the brakes on the nation's most expensive housing markets.

The latest evidence came Tuesday from the National Association of Realtors, which said sales of existing homes fell 6% from January to May. The drop was worse for single-family homes, whose sales posted their steepest drop in 11 years. The number of homes for sale, meantime, rose sharply last month, a sign of slackening demand.

“The one thing that's changing my forecast is the Federal Reserve,” said David Lereah, the NAR's chief economist, who said he now expects home sales to fall as much as 8% this year, instead of the 5% drop he projected in January. “The market is expecting several more interest rate hikes from the Fed, and that could harm some of our nation's cooling housing markets.”

The Fed is expected to raise its target for short-term rates later this week for the 17th time in two years. Previous increases are already shutting out some buyers. Last week, the average 30-year, fixed-rate loan was at 6.7%, a four-year high, up from 5.57% a year ago. Someone who borrowed the full $230,000 for a median-priced home would have monthly principal and interest payments of $1,484 vs. $1,316 a year ago.

Rising rates are even more dangerous for people with adjustable-rate mortgages that will later reset to much higher rates. In San Diego, where the median home price is $607,000, 74% of buyers last year took out loans that let them pay only the interest or even less, according to LoanPerformance.

Thirteen major metro areas face a 50% or greater chance of declining prices in the next two years, according to PMI Mortgage Insurance, which released its latest market risk index on Tuesday.

Still, most experts see no sudden collapse of prices. “We're seeing an orderly slowdown,” says Mark Milner of PMI.

DOJ_NMG_0037322

In May, the median price of a single-family home hit $229,700, up 6.4% from a year ago. Existing-home sales fell 1.2% from April. There's now a 6½-month supply, a sign of a balanced market.

Rising prices are scaring away investors in resort and second-home areas. The number of condos for sale in Las Vegas is up 67% from last year. The lack of investors is "the whole story of the (Las Vegas) market," says Dennis Smith of Home Builders Research. "Same in California and Phoenix."

Some areas that never saw frenzied buying still report strong markets. Texas, North Carolina and New Mexico are seeing double-digit gains in home sales. Still, the confidence index of the nation's home builders has fallen to its lowest level since 1995. Monday, Lennar became the fifth home builder in recent weeks to warn investors of lower orders and more cancellations.

Existing-Home Sales Fall 1.2% As Consumer Confidence Rises (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Sales of existing homes fell in May for the seventh time in nine months as interest rates rose, but the mood of the consumer brightened a bit in June.

Sales of existing homes in May were at a 6.67 million annual rate, down 1.2% from April, the National Association of Realtors said. "Although mortgage interest rates remain historically low, the uptrend in interest rates this year is affecting those buyers who are at the margins of affordability," NAR's chief economist, David Lereah, said. The average rate on a 30-year fixed-rate mortgage in May was 6.6%, up from 6.5% in April, according to Freddie Mac.

Meanwhile, the Conference Board said its consumer-confidence index, which had decreased in May, posted a slight increase in June. Consumer attitudes toward the state of the economy deteriorated, but their outlook improved.

The Realtors said the inventory of unsold homes on the market increased to 6.5 months, from April's revised 6.1 months. A rule of thumb in the industry is that there is a buyer's market any time the inventory of unsold homes exceeds six months.

The median home price increased to $230,000, up 3.6% from a revised $222,000 in April and 6% above the May 2005 level of $217,000. The median existing condo price was $229,300 in May, up 1.9% from the year-earlier level.

Sales fell 3.8% in the Midwest and 4.2% in the Northeast, and they rose 0.7% in the West and 0.4% in the South. The report came a day after the government reported that sales of newly built homes rose 4.6% in May.

The Conference Board's consumer-confidence index now stands at 105.7, up from 104.7 in May.

"The slight bounce back in confidence this month was a result of the moderate improvement in consumers' expectations," said Lynn Franco, director of the Conference Board's Consumer Research Center. "Despite the uptick, consumers remain concerned about the short-term outlook. Furthermore, the Present Situation Index lost ground for the second consecutive month, a signal that the economy is shifting into lower gear heading into the second half of this year."

Economists Expect More Rate Increases This Summer (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve policymakers may have a busy summer ahead.

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and his colleagues are widely expected to raise interest rates by a quarter-percentage point for the 17th time in two years at the conclusion of their two-day meeting Thursday.

And in a bid to thwart inflation, a number of economists, including those at UBS, Lehman Bros. and Bank of America, are predicting the Fed will continue raising rates at its meeting on Aug. 8 and perhaps again later in the year.

Such expectations are a big change from just a few weeks ago, when many economists weren't sure if the Fed would raise rates this month, let alone later in the year. But since then, inflation measures have been coming in higher and a number of Fed officials, including Bernanke, have been warning that inflation is outside their comfort zones.

"There's enough of a pickup going on (in inflation) that it's a challenge to the Fed," Lehman Bros. chief U.S. economist Ethan Harris says. He expects U.S. central bankers will raise rates twice after Thursday to send a signal that the Fed is aggressively fighting inflation.

An increase this week would bring the Fed's target for short-term interest rates, which influence borrowing costs for everything from mortgages to car loans, to 5.25%, the highest since January 2001.

Investors and economists will be closely scrutinizing the Fed's post-meeting statement Thursday to get a better idea of what the Fed will do next, Nomura Securities chief economist David Resler says. The Dow Jones industrial average fell 120.54 points Tuesday to 10,924.74 in advance of the Fed meeting.

The median answer of 20 economists surveyed by the Bond Market Association June 12-19 was that the Fed would raise rates by a quarter-percentage point once more before the end of 2006, the group said Tuesday. Some expected rates would hit 5.75%.

DOJ_NMG_0037323

Fed policymakers are facing a tough balancing act, says Robert DiClemente, Citigroup chief U.S. economist and chairman of the Bond Market Association's economic advisory committee.

While the economy has been slowing to a more moderate level, as expected, there has been some “public anxiety” about inflation after reports showing a broad increase in prices in recent months, he said. Fed policymakers must address those concerns to maintain the public's confidence even though price pressures are expected to ease later in the year.

There was some good news on that front Tuesday. Consumers' inflation expectations fell in June after increasing the prior two months, the Conference Board said in a monthly report on consumer confidence.

Higher Rates Begin To Slow Growth (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, June 28, 2006

NEW YORK

Starting next week, Sallie Mae will reset the interest rates on some student loans almost two full percentage points higher than last July. The change will add $5,123 in additional interest to the cost of a college education.

In August, Ty's Toy Box, a small but growing company in northern Kentucky, will renegotiate bank loans - money it needs to finance growth. In the past two years, the interest rate the company pays is already up 1-3/4 percentage points.

As for executives at the Brooklyn-based Dunn Development Corp., which builds affordable housing, they figure it will cost more to borrow money in the future. This will put pressure on the developer to raise rents on their low- and middle-income tenants.

These are just some of the ways past interest-rate increases are rippling through the economy. Economists expect yet another 0.25 percentage point hike Thursday, the Fed's 17th consecutive increase. This will boost short-term interest rates to 5.25 percent, up from 1 percent in April of 2004.

Economists believe the continual rate hikes are finally starting to act as a brake on the economy.

The expectation is for economic growth to slow from 5 percent in the first quarter to about 3 percent for the rest of the year. Tuesday saw yet another sign of rising interest rates: Existing home sales in May dipped 1.2 percent, the third drop in five months. The Conference Board, a business research group, also predicted Tuesday a slowing economy even as its consumer confidence index has edged up slightly.

If the economic data continues to soften, economists anticipate the Fed will want to pause and try to judge how much the higher cost of borrowing money is crimping economic activity.

"At this point the Fed knows there is enough tightening in the pipeline to arrest inflationary pressures and prevent the situation from getting out of control," says Anthony Chan, a New York-based economist at JP Morgan Private Client Services.

"The only reason the Fed has not stopped is the markets - the new Fed chairman, Ben Bernanke, is the new sheriff in town and has to maintain his reputation as an inflation fighter."

The cost of education illustrates the complex effect of climbing interest rates on consumers' pockets. Sallie Mae changes its student loan interest rates only once a year based on the last Treasury bill auction in May. In the past year, that rate has increased nearly two percentage points.

However, the company also gave students thechance earlier this month to consolidate loans and lock-in lower interest rates. An interest-rate savvy student who consolidated would now be saving thousands of dollars in interest.

"We have seen an extraordinary pace of consolidation," says Pat Scherschel, vice president of loan consolidation in Indianapolis.

"Borrowers are rate-sensitive and know a good deal when they see one."

However, there is no doubt interest-rate increases in the housing market are steadily making it more expensive to buy a house. A year ago, a home-buyer would have paid 5.5 percent for a 30-year fixed-rate mortgage. Today, the rate is 6.67 percent. On a $250,000 loan, that would cost an additional $181 a month.

For an adjustable-rate mortgage, the increase is even more expensive. It now costs $308 more each month than a year ago.

The higher rates are definitely having a negative impact on housing demand, says Jim Svinth, the Irvine, California-based chief economist at LendingTree, an online mortgage loan company.

At the moment, he says, the higher rates affect mostly "folks who are really stretching to qualify for, and pay, their mortgage."

Lower-income folks may feel the rising rates more than most.

For example, Dunn Development says higher interest rates in the future will pressure them to raise rents.

DOJ_NMG_0037324

"Market-rate guys can pass it on to their market-rate owners or renters, but for our affordable housing buildings, we have a fixed rent and can't do that," says Ben Kornfeind. "For us, it eats into our building."

Main street business also feels the impact of rising rates fairly quickly. Ty's Toy Box has a line of credit that is pegged to the prime interest rate, which has increased in line with each Federal Reserve hike.

So far, the rate rises have yet to slow down Ty's Toy Box, which has found a niche in online toy marketing, DVDs, and T-shirts of cartoon characters ignored by larger companies.

But, the owner of the company, Ty Simpson, says his rising interest cost comes right out of his bottom line.

"Every percentage makes a difference. We don't operate on huge margins," he says.

So far, Mr. Simpson has been able to avoid passing his higher interest costs to customers. But, he says, the rising rates are something he'll have to watch.

"In August, we'll probably have to look at it," says Simpson.

Wall Street Tumbles Ahead Of Fed Meeting (FT)

By John O'Doherty

Financial Times, June 28, 2006

Wall Street ended lower on Tuesday as investors awaited the outcome of the two-day meeting of the US Federal Reserve's rate-setting body, which starts on Wednesday.

At the close, the S&P 500 was down 0.9 per cent, or 11.36 points, at 1,239.20. The Nasdaq Composite was down 1.6 per cent, or 33.42 points, at 2,100.25. The Dow Jones Industrial Average was down 1.1 per cent, or 120.54 points, at 10,924.74.

The falls followed news that consumer confidence in June rose more than expected while sales of existing homes fell slightly less than forecast.

Ken Tower, chief market strategist at CyberTrader, said the data would add pressure for the Federal Reserve to raise rates. "As long as the economy is stronger than expected, it's an inflation threat," he said.

Univision rose 6.2 per cent to $34.00, after the company's board agreed to sell the Spanish language broadcaster for $12.3bn in cash to a consortium of investors that includes media executive Haim Saban and several private equity groups.

Tribune Group jumped 5.1 per cent to $32.47 after the company said it had completed phase one of its $2bn stock buyback programme.

Troubled carmaker General Motors tumbled 6.7 per cent to $25.90, its worst day since December, after the company said overall sales for 2006 were likely to come in below 2005 levels.

Chemical maker Dupont fell 2.8 per cent to $40.88. French energy and telecommunications group Vivendi on Tuesday announced it had sold its 1.8 per cent stake in the company.

Crude oil rose to settle just below $72 a barrel, giving a fillip to energy stocks. Marathon Oil added 3.8 per cent to $79.81 and Hess Corporation gained 2.8 per cent to $48.20.

The rising oil price dented airline stocks. United Airlines dropped 5.5 per cent to $30.12, and US Airways lost 3.2 per cent to $48.04.

News that Intel would sell its communications processor business to Marvell Technology to concentrate on its core business dragged down rival Advanced Micro Devices, which fell 1.6 per cent to $24.26. The Philadelphia Stock Exchange Semiconductor index dropped 3.8 per cent.

Nasdaq fell 5.5 per cent to $26.64, even as the company's chief executive said that concerns that companies were choosing to list on foreign rather than domestic exchanges were overstated.

Biomet and Zimmer Holdings, the medical products makers, continued to slide following their announcements on Monday that they had received subpoenas from the Department of Justice in relation to an anti-trust investigation. Biomet fell 6 per cent to $31.19 and Zimmer shed 4.9 per cent to $55.80.

Reports that Google would test its online payment system this week worried investors in Ebay, which owns the Paypal system. Ebay fell 5 per cent to $28.25.

Stocks Sink Ahead Of Fed's Meeting (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, June 28, 2006

Traders dumped stocks Tuesday, not wanting to step in front of a Federal Reserve meeting this week that could bring higher short-term interest rates.

Tech stocks were clobbered as Wall Street braced for Thursday, when the Fed will announce the result of its two-day meeting. The Nasdaq composite fell 33.42 points, or 1.6%, to 2100.25.

DOJ_NMG_0037325

It was a dubious occasion for the Nasdaq, because Tuesday marked the 2,000th trading day since the Nasdaq first crossed above 2,000, says Fane Lozman, chairman of Scanshift.com. The Nasdaq is just 100 points above that level first reached nearly eight years ago and remains 58% below its high set in 2000. The index is off 4.8% this year.

A sell-off in already splintered shares of home builders dragged the Standard & Poor's 500 index down 11.36 points, or 0.9%, to 1239.20. Home builders KB Home and Pulte shed 3.5% and 2.2%, respectively, on housing market data showing existing home sales fell again, dropping 1.2% in May (story, 1B). The S&P 500 has lost 0.7% of its value this year. But Tuesday still was the 831st trading day the S&P has gone without a 10% drop, the second-longest streak.

And the Dow Jones industrial average sagged 120.54 points, or 1.1%, to 10,924.74. That was enough to lower the Dow's gain this year to 1.9%.

Joseph Saluzzi, trader at Themis Trading, says there wasn't a single piece of news that sent investors running. It's possible the rise in the Conference Board's measure of consumer confidence worried some investors about inflation, he says. “Everyone is a bear right now; no one wants to step up,” he says.

Those worries will pass, says Charles Crane, strategist at Scotsman Capital. “Once traders get past the myopic obsession with every little economic wiggle that could influence inflation, we'll have the luxury of looking at the big picture,” he says.

That big picture includes a solid economy, corporate earnings growth and reasonable stock valuations, he says. “Add those together, and you have the recipe for a satisfactory stock market in the second half of the year,” he says.

General Motors fell $1.85 to $25.90 after warning 2006 auto sales might miss last year's levels due to higher interest rates and gas prices.

·Universal Compression, a maker of devices that handle natural gas, soared $5.28 to $59.61. The company plans to sell shares of a unit as an initial public offering.

Stocks Tumble In Broad Selling Ahead Of The Fed (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

It was a bad day for companies that make things. Woes at most of the Dow Jones Industrial Average's truly industrial component companies sent the market tumbling more than 120 points.

General Motors shares nosedived 6.7% on worries about the auto makers' second-quarter sales. In particular, GM executives warned that year-over-year sales comparisons would be "brutal," considering that last year's totals were boosted by retail incentives programs.

Other Dow components that fared poorly included Boeing, which announced that it is weighing the future of its troubled communications unit Connexion. And Vivendi SA announced that it is selling a stake in E.I. DuPont de Nemours & Co., commonly known as DuPont, in order to remove a tax liability from its balance sheet. Shares in Boeing and DuPont each fell more than 2%. Also, 3M shares fell 1.9%.

All together, the Dow shed 120.54 points, or 1.1%, to close at 10924.74, up 1.9% this year. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.9%, or 11.36 points, to 1239.20, off 0.7% for the year. And the Nasdaq Composite Index fell 1.6%, or 33.42 points, to 2100.25, off 4.8% for the year.

Two new pieces of economic data defied Wall Street expectations, in turn raising fears of higher interest rates ahead of the two-day meeting of Federal Reserve policymakers that begins today and ends tomorrow.

According to the National Association of Realtors, sales of existing homes fell 1.2% in May, smaller than the 1.8% drop expected by Wall Street. Also, the Conference Board reported that its consumer-confidence index rose to 105.7 in June, contrary to expectations for a dip.

Many investors fear the U.S. central bank will prolong its series of interest-rate increases beyond this summer. The Fed is widely expected to make another quarter-point increase in its key interest rate to 5.25% at this week's meeting. Prices of federal-funds futures on the Chicago Board of Trade yesterday reflected nearly 100% certainty by traders regarding such a move.

"A quarter-point hike, at this point, is entirely consistent with the Fed's desire to fight inflation," said Mickey Levy, chief economist at Bank of America. "In their statement, I think they will also acknowledge there's been upward pressure on inflation recently."

In major U.S. market action:

Bond prices rose. The 10-year Treasury note rose 9/32, or $2.8125 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 5.208%. The 30-year Treasury rose 19/32 to yield 5.237%.

The dollar was mixed. Late in New York, it traded at 116.28 yen, slightly down from 116.29 yen. The euro was unchanged against the greenback, at $1.2581.

As GOP Ties To Corruption Mount, Democrats Differ Over Strategy (AP)

By David Hammer

AP, June 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - Democrats are split over how to attack unfolding corruption scandals involving Republicans: Continue to hammer away at what they call a culture of corruption or focus on their own candidates' ideas.

Democrats believe more than ever that Republican ethical problems in Ohio make the state a key battleground this November's midterm elections. In recent weeks, another former official from Gov. Bob Taft's administration has been charged with ethics law violations, and more details about lobbyists' allegations that Rep. Bob Ney accepted gifts for official acts have emerged in the Justice Department's investigation of congressional corruption.

By and large, state Democrats see corruption as a pervasive and distinctly Republican problem in Ohio that they must exploit in every competitive race, while national Democrats' zeal has been tempered by a bribery investigation against one of their own, Rep. William Jefferson of Louisiana. They fear their challengers in Ohio won't break through against GOP opponents who face no specific corruption allegations by harping on their ties to Taft, Ney or indicted coin dealer and party fundraiser Tom Noe.

Corruption allegations have to be specific to the opposing candidate to be successful, said Craig Smith, a veteran strategist of national Democratic campaigns who also advised Columbus Mayor Michael Coleman on his short-lived run for Ohio governor.

"We've found that if one candidate says all corruption is on the other side, voters will believe that; but if the opponent comes back and says they're all corrupt on that side, too, voters will believe that, too," Smith said.

The national Democrats' issues-first perspective can be seen in one of their most favored challengers - Rep. Sherrod Brown, who is running for Senate against GOP Sen. Mike DeWine. Brown has largely stopped talking about DeWine's time as lieutenant governor in the early 1990s as a way to connect the two-term senator to Taft, who was secretary of state at the time.

"Ohio voters are at best unhappy and at worst angry at Republicans, but that's a peripheral fact," Brown spokeswoman Joanna Kuebler said. "Specific to Mike DeWine, it's got to be more about the issues."

So, Brown has begun to attack DeWine for his support for an overhaul of Medicare, plans to privatize Social Security and free trade agreements with foreign governments.

But the Ohio Democratic Party says Ohio candidates have a unique opportunity to focus on corruption.

"National polls repeatedly indicate that voters paint corruption with a broad brush, but in Ohio, largely because one party has been in control for so long, the public equates corruption with Republicans," state party spokesman Brian Rothenberg said.

Republicans have controlled the governor's office for 16 years and both branches of the Legislature since 1994.

Rothenberg said corruption is a clear theme for Democrat Zack Space in his race against Ney, and will be just as important for Mary Jo Kilroy against Rep. Deborah Pryce and for John Cranley against Rep. Steve Chabot - even though Pryce and Chabot are not connected to scandals by anything more than party.

Although the chairman of their national House campaign organization has said, "Ohio isn't a pretty picture," the GOP is gaining confidence. The party sees as a sign of things to come in Ohio the Democrats' failure to win a special election earlier this month for the San Diego congressional seat vacated by former GOP Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who is in prison on bribery charges.

"That election showed voters are more interested in tangible issues and how each candidate addresses the issues than in name-calling and mudslinging," said Aaron McLear, spokesman for the Republican National Committee.

Even Space is starting to look for other issues with which to attack Ney. So far, Space has focused almost exclusively on Ney's ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. But once he finishes with a fundraising push, he says he'll start to try to distinguish his own positions on health care and labor issues - which will be difficult because Ney has often broken with his party to back his poorer constituents.

Ney has maintained his innocence and repeatedly refused to step down or give up his re-election campaign, even if he were to be indicted before Election Day. Space says he should step down, but intimated that Ney would be easier to beat than almost any replacement in the Republican district.

"There's a difference between what I think he (Ney) ought to do and what I want him to do," Space said with a laugh.

Poll Shows Americans Keeping An Eye On Congress (USAT)

By Susan Page

DOJ_NMG_0037327

USA Today, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — Americans are paying unusually close attention to the congressional elections in November, a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll finds. They are more inclined to deliver significant gains to Democrats than in any year since Republicans won control of the House and Senate in 1994.

Those surveyed are more concerned about national issues than local ones — a situation that favors Democrats hoping to tap discontent over the Iraq war and gasoline prices — and prefer Democrats over Republicans on handling every major issue except terrorism.

President Bush looms as a significant drag: 40% of Americans say they are less likely to vote for a candidate who supports Bush. A fifth say they are more likely.

"At this point, it certainly looks like a significant tilt to the Democrats, but it's still early," says James Campbell, a political scientist at the University of Buffalo and author of The Presidential Pulse of Congressional Elections. He says the Democratic advantage could narrow over the next four months if voters see the election more as a choice between two candidates and less as a referendum on the president.

House Democrats, including Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California, express optimism about prospects they will pick up the 15 seats needed to take control. They are hampered, though, by the limited number of competitive districts. The non-partisan Cook Political Report now ranks 35 GOP-held seats as competitive.

"Things are difficult, and there's a reasonable chance we'll lose some seats in both bodies," says Republican pollster David Winston. "But at the moment the majorities look reasonably solid because Democrats haven't put into play the sort of seats they need to."

The poll of 1,000 adults Friday through Sunday has an error margin of +/-3 percentage points.

Among the findings:

·Americans are interested in the election at levels not usually seen in non-presidential years. More than a third have thought "quite a lot" about the congressional elections. Seven of 10 say they are very motivated to get out and vote this year.

·Democrats are particularly engaged: 56% say they are "more enthusiastic about voting than usual," the highest level recorded since the question was first asked in 1994. Among Republicans, 43% say they are more enthusiastic than usual.

·Americans are increasingly likely to identify themselves as Democrats. Including those who "lean" to one party or the other, 55% call themselves Democrats; 38%, Republicans. That's the biggest edge for Democrats since 1998. By 54%-38%, the registered voters surveyed say they'd vote for a Democratic congressional candidate over a Republican one if the election were held today.

·That said, voters aren't particularly enamored of Democratic officeholders. Congressional Democrats have an approval rating of just 38%, 1 percentage point above Bush and 5 points above congressional Republicans.

·Democrats are preferred by double digits to Republicans on four of the five top-ranked issues: Iraq, government corruption, the economy and health care. Republicans are preferred by 11 percentage points on handling terrorism.

·Only 39% say most members of Congress deserve re-election, but 61% say their own representative does. That disparity is common and no guarantee to incumbents. The numbers were similar in July 1994, the year Democrats lost 54 House seats. Then, 60% said their representative deserved re-election; 41% said most members did.

Lack Of Messenger Bedevils Democrats (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, June 28, 2006

Congressional Democrats have spent more than a year struggling to craft what they hope is a winning message and agenda, but their biggest challenge may be one they can't fix with focus groups and slogans: lack of a singular messenger.

In a perennial problem for a minority, Democrats are denied both the bully pulpit of the White House and the instant credibility of a Speaker or Senate Majority Leader. And many view the top national Democratic leaders as either too polarizing to unify the party or too obscure to command widespread attention.

"It's a major problem," said one senior Democratic Congressional aide. "People already feel that it's not clear what Democrats stand for, and this just exacerbates that because [voters] can't think of any one person and one message" who speaks for all of them.

Democrats have ratcheted up their hopes for major victories this fall with a nationalized campaign message focused on alleged GOP corruption and failed Republican policies ranging from national security to health care and, most recently, the minimum wage.

DOJ_NMG_0037328

While emboldened by President Bush's sagging poll numbers and internal GOP divisions on key issues, Democrats also acknowledge they face major challenges in convincing voters to hand them power them without a prominent figure to call their drumbeat.

The Democratic leadership consists of three major players; Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.), a social moderate who prefers to play a behind-the-scenes strategic role than that of spokesman; House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), an outspoken liberal who enjoys the spotlight but is viewed as too far to the left for many in her party; and outspoken Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, arguably the Democrat whom Republicans most love to hate.

Other Democrats share a high public profile, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), John Kerry (Mass.), Edward Kennedy (Mass.) and increasingly newcomer Barack Obama (Ill.), but most have their own separate political ambitions or agendas that so far have kept them from becoming unifying figures.

Reid spokesman Jim Manley said Democrats understand they cannot compete with the built-in message advantage of the White House, and as such they must tap into a variety of leading party voices to articulate their agenda.

He said that, from coordinating national activities and crafting an agenda to setting up a powerful communications "war room," Democrats are doing the best they can as a minority party seeking to oust the party in power.

"Under the leadership of Sen. Reid and Congresswoman Pelosi, we've done a better job than ever before weaving a seamless relationship between all the different Democratic [factions]," Manley said.

"Republicans control the House, Senate and White House," Manley added. "They have the megaphone of the White House, we do not. So, what we need to do get our best people out there to talk about the message, day in and day out. That's what we are doing."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said she doesn't worry about the lack of a singular messenger right now. She said 2006 is no different from other midterm election years when the White House isn't up for grabs and the minority hasn't rallied around its next presidential nominee: "It's the way it always is when we are in between presidential campaigns."

"I don't think it's a concern right now," echoed Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.). "The midterms are about individual races. One has to speak about the issues that that individual is concerned about. Next election, of course" it matters.

Still, Democrats acknowledge there are hurdles to overcome. They argue that without the podium the Republicans enjoy, they must simply work harder and push their ideas more aggressively as a party to articulate their vision for the country.

"We have to speak up," Lautenberg said. "We're not yet speaking with one voice. But hopefully when we become the majority, we will speak with one voice."

"There doesn't have to be one face," added Senate Democratic Caucus Secretary Debbie Stabenow (Mich.). "Every Senators' [face] is the face of their state. Ultimately, I am the voice in Michigan, and ultimately each Member is the voice in their state."

The diversity of opinion within the party probably was never more evident than over the past two weeks when both the House and Senate debated the Iraq war, and Democrats continued to display their differences on how best to conclude the conflict. In both chambers, Democrats failed to agree among themselves on whether or when to withdraw troops — a point Republicans relished in reinforcing.

"There have definitely been efforts to join together on slogans like 'New Direction,' but we've also parted ways, and that's diluted the significance," noted the senior Congressional staffer.

Senate Republican Conference Chairman Rick Santorum (Pa.) said Democrats' problem in appealing to a majority of Americans is twofold: Their message lacks substance and their bench of leaders is thin.

"It's not good for them," Santorum said.

Democrats kicked off 2006 with plans to show the electorate who they are as a party, and where they would take the country if put in charge next year. After months of internal party discussion, Reid and Pelosi launched a campaign platform of anti-corruption, stronger national security and a renewed emphasis on domestic priorities of health care, energy reform, fiscal discipline and economic stability.

That effort came after several cycles of criticism both within the party and from the outside, that Democrats failed to adequately define themselves when victory appeared within their grasp.

A senior House Democratic aide said while the party could certainly use a powerful messenger, the bigger problem may be in the message itself, one this staffer suggested is simply rehash of the same old Democratic positions.

"You need something that Members and candidates want to talk about on the stump, not something that goes from fax machine to trash," this aide said. "The [1994] 'Contract with America' made bold reform pronouncements ... it was bold enough to attract media attention on its own. It was clear that the Republicans, in 1994, were offering something different."

Still, Democrats believe they are more united than they've been in recent memory, and more than ever they agree that Republicans and Bush have taken the country in the wrong direction on most major policies, particularly in Iraq. They argue that while they don't always share the same exact viewpoints, they are together on most major policies, and articulating their positions in the toughest of political environments.

"It's always a challenge for the party in the minority," said Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.). "It's even doubly so for a party with as large a tent as the Democrats have.

"All we can do is speak out as ably as we can."

Emanuel Puts Reynolds In The DCCC's Crosshairs (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, June 28, 2006

Former Rep. George Nethercutt (R-Wash.) was branded a giant-slayer in 1994 when he defeated Speaker Thomas Foley (D-Wash.), adding a finishing kick in the gut to the beating the Democrats took that year.

In this November's midterm elections, Democrats would like nothing better than to make an example of a Republican leader and they have Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), in their crosshairs.

Speaking to reporters last month, Reynolds suggested that he and Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) are like two tennis players and Emanuel has forced Reynolds to raise the level of his game.

Emanuel late last year downplayed any rivalry with Reynolds, saying that they are friends. He also said Reynolds was one of the first to call him after he was appointed to head the DCCC.

But the gentlemanly respect stops there.

Not only has Emanuel recruited multimillionaire Democrat Jack Davis, whom Reynolds defeated in 2004 with 56 percent of the vote, but the two chairmen have spent the past nine months trash-talking while trading allegations of corruption.

Last week, the DCCC prepared a memorandum for The Hill tying President Bush and Reynolds to the economy in western New York and suburban Buffalo.

"I think Bush's performance and his numbers, and most importantly his record, is wholeheartedly rejected in the northeast and Midwest," Emanuel said last week in an interview with The Hill when asked if Reynolds should be worried about his own seat.

During a March interview on C-SPAN, Reynolds touted what he called the "Bush boom" across the country and the need to get the message out.

"Even in upstate N.Y. where jobs are a tough, tough scene and hard to come by, we're seeing production orders, we're seeing other types of things where businesses that are flourishing and there are some success stories," Reynolds said.

Reynolds spokesman L.D. Platt dismissed the DCCC memo, saying, "Rahm should pay more attention to his own district's job losses instead of helping his liberal candidates disguise their support for job-killing tax increases in western New York."

As examples of recent economic growth, Reynolds cited last Saturday's Democrat & Chronicle in Rochester, N.Y., which reported that Reynolds helped secure $30 million in federal money to help a company that produces high-frequency radios for the military reopen a plant.

The paper also reported that area business leaders and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) would announce a campaign intended to "position Rochester as a major player in the push to find alternatives to foreign oil."

Nevertheless, the DCCC's goal is not to make a fair analysis of the regional economy but to weaken Reynolds politically by suggesting that he and Bush are responsible for the economic condition of upstate New York.

"I don't think I've ever seen it in such a visible way. … Clearly there's not been, in my memory, as competitive a personal relationship as there is in this competitive environment," said former Rep. Bill Paxon (R-N.Y.), who chaired the NRCC in 1994.

Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), who is on good terms with both chairmen, said that the rivalry is not personal and that they like one another.

"If you're a politician, you like to watch two great political operators. There's a lot on the line personally and for the country," he said.

Some political observers say Emanuel will seek a leadership bid in the next Congress and others have speculated that Reynolds has his eye on replacing House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) when the Illinois lawmaker retires. November's results will have a significant impact on the leadership aspirations of both men.

In past election cycles, committee chairmen have tried to beat their opponents' leaders, with mixed results. Former Rep. Vic Fazio (D-Calif.), DCCC chairman from 1990 to 1994, spent thousands of dollars in 1992 in a primary that pitted former Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) against Herman Clark. Gingrich barely won.

DOJ_NMG_0037330

Then-Rep. Martin Frost (D-Texas) took control of the DCCC for the 1995-'96 cycle and picked up some Democratic seats, but no GOP leaders were defeated. Frost was defeated in the 2004 election after Republicans redrew his district.

The DCCC is also targeting other members of the GOP leadership, including Reps. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) and John Doolittle (R-Calif.). The only member of Democratic leadership that the NRCC is looking to oust this fall is Rep. John Spratt (D-S.C.).

Reynolds taunted Emanuel after the June 6 special election in California's 50th District, saying, "Rahm Emanuel and the Democrats lost big" after they "invested financially and emotionally" in Francine Busby, who lost to Rep. Brian Bilbray (R-Calif.). The DCCC notes that the district is conservative and that Bush easily won it during the 2004 election.

The NRCC paid $1,800 for phone banks to oppose Emanuel in his 5th Congressional District, which extends west from Lake Michigan across Chicago.

However, Reynolds's seat is considered competitive by independent political analysts and Emanuel's is not.

Reynolds last year called Emanuel "Mr. Righteous" for alleging Republican corruption and tried to link Emanuel to corruption in Chicago Mayor Richard Daley's administration.

Emanuel replied that he empathized with Reynolds, adding that he should exercise because "it helps you deal with stress."

Look Who's Missing DeLay (TIME)

By Hilary Hylton

Time, June 28, 2006

His was the face that launched a thousand fundraisers and Democrats miss him so terribly that they are trying to persuade a federal judge to keep former Congressman Tom DeLay's name on the ballot this fall. Allowing the Texas Republican Party to replace DeLay, who says he lives and votes in Virginia, would cause great harm to the Democratic Party, the party's lawyers argued in an Austin federal court Monday. Proving that claim is crucial to their lawsuit so Democrats testified just how much DeLay meant to them. Embarrassing? "Maybe," said Cris Feldman, an attorney for the Democrats, "but necessary."

DeLay, who is facing criminal money laundering charges in a campaign finance probe, has a profound effect not only on Democratic juices, but also impacts the party's "bottom line," Ken Bailey, the Texas Democratic party affairs director testified. "He's kind of like a lightening rod that we use to drum up support," Bailey said. The party has used DeLay's face on numerous flyers and web campaigns in past elections, and organizers say the mention of his name can inspire volunteers from across the state to converge on DeLay's old 22nd congressional district near Houston.

"Mr. DeLay had a profile among contributor Democrats that causes them to be more generous than they are going to be with a candidate who isn't as high profile," longtime Texas Democratic political analyst Dan McClung said in court. DeLay didn't just bring in money, McClung added, but also support from out-of-state Democratic interest groups and resources from the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Without him, the volunteers are not as inspired and, as one Republican lawyer joked in court, the money from California liberals dries up. In fact, Democrat Nick Lampson, who is seeking the seat, did receive some early support from Hollywood heavyweights Rob Reiner and Barbra Streisand when DeLay was still in the race. DeLay, who had testified earlier Monday about his move to Virginia, was not in the courtroom for the Democratic salute to his potency, but his presence loomed large. "If Mr. DeLay stays on the ballot, it is a lot easier to run against somebody who's been indicted," Bailey said.

One issue facing U.S. District Judge Sam Sparks is whether DeLay contrived to be declared ineligible, opening the door to a replacement candidate, or whether he simply withdrew from the race. Texas law does not allow a withdrawn candidate to be replaced. Another key question before the court is whether the Texas Republican Party can declare a federal candidate ineligible. Sparks is not expected to rule until early July and his decision is sure to appealed.

Meanwhile, Republicans are going forward with plans to name a new nominee, but they expect Sparks' ruling will come before that process is complete. As for DeLay, he said he would be driving back to his Sugarland "house" (not "home") after testifying that he, indeed, had a Virginia driver's license in his wallet.

GOP Offers 'Values Agenda' (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, June 28, 2006

With little fanfare, House Republican leaders on Tuesday unveiled a broad "American Values Agenda," composed of bills designed to appeal to the GOP's political base.

The agenda includes measures on topics such as abortion, cloning, religious freedom, flag burning and gun rights — all issues that resonate with social conservatives, some of whom have expressed misgivings about the party's recent direction.

DOJ_NMG_0037331

"The American Values Agenda is a collection of legislative initiatives that speak to the values many American citizens hold dear," Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said in a statement. "Freedom to display the American flag ... freedom of religious expression ... the right to keep and bear arms ... respect for the sanctity of marriage, and the dignity of all human life."

Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said the agenda would help "protect the faith of our people, the sanctity of life and freedoms outlined by our Founding Fathers."

GOP leaders, with the help of Rep. Joe Pitts (R-Pa.), the head of the Values Action Team, began crafting the agenda in May after holding a handful of meetings with prominent social conservative leaders. Tuesday's list is designed to supplement the larger legislative agenda that was released in May, one that did not include many issues important to social conservatives.

The GOP already has begun cycling through the American Values Agenda, as the House passed the Freedom to Display the American Flag Act on Tuesday.

The agenda also includes the Pledge Protection Act; the Public Expression of Religion Act; the federal marriage amendment; the Unborn Child Pain Awareness Act; the Human Cloning Prohibition Act; a measure reforming the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; an Internet gambling ban; and a measure preventing the government from confiscating citizens' guns during emergencies.

Democrats reacted to the GOP's announced agenda by accusing Republicans of playing politics.

"The American people will see through the Republicans' old playbook of distract, distort and divide," said Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). "Pandering to the radical right-wing's wrong priorities does not reflect the American values of opportunity, security and prosperity."

... And Why Lieberman Can't Win His And Shoultn't Try (HILL)

By Dick Morris

The Hill, June 28, 2006

Keeping Joseph Lieberman in the United States Senate is clearly in the national interest. One of the most ethical, sincere, thoughtful and balanced of senators, he stands as a monument to nonpartisan common sense in an increasingly shrill and polarized partisan environment.

But he is in the process of committing suicide. By insisting on running in Connecticut's Democratic primary against anti-war candidate Ned Lamont, he is in a fight he won't win and, in the process, destroying his chances in the general election, which he can win.

As my populist and liberal friend Bill Curry discovered when he defeated the Democratic Party establishment's candidate for governor, Rep. John Larson, in the primary of 1994, primaries in Connecticut are notoriously polarized. The right dominates the GOP nominating process just as surely as the left controls that of the Democrats. This is no place for a centrist to thrive.

If Lieberman simply skips the primary and runs as an independent, forcing a three-way race, he will win overwhelmingly. The larger Connecticut electorate adores him and will happily desert either party to vote for his reelection.

But in an August Democratic primary, with its low turnout and ideologically skewed voters, he faces decapitation. As surely as an American soldier on patrol in Iraq, his very presence in the Democratic primary provides a tempting target for those who want to vent their frustration at American foreign policy.

Those who back Lieberman will stay home in a primary. Those who shine with passionate intensity against him will surely vote.

Scott Rasmussen has Lieberman clinging to a narrow 45-41 lead over Lamont, based largely on his name recognition. Other pollsters give the Senate a larger margin. But the inevitable dynamics of this primary are likely to flow toward the challenger as he picks up money, support and recognition and offers a way to do something there is no other way to do: Vote against the war.

Lieberman's supporters argue that if he loses the primary he can always then run as an independent. Technically that is not true. He would have to file his nominating petitions as an independent before the primary.

But politically it is a failed choice as well. If Lieberman loses the primary, the defeat will empower Lamont and make him a viable candidate in November. Like a parasite, he will thrive on the nutrients in the senator's blood and use them to animate his candidacy. But if Lieberman withdraws from the primary (even if his name has to remain on the ballot), he denies Lamont that victory. Without it, the insurgent can never amass the resources and credibility he would need to run and win in November.

Lieberman speaks of his loyalty to the Democratic Party. Obviously, if he wins as an independent, he will continue to vote with his party in the Senate and will continue to call himself a Democrat. But this misguided party loyalty may help to elect Republican candidate Alan Schlesinger. If Lieberman is so weakened by a primary defeat that he fades as a front-runner in the general election, we will see a three-way race that anyone can win.

Lieberman's ads attacking Lamont are pathetic. His media adviser, Carter Eskew, summons the ghosts of his past success by resurrecting ads that depict former Gov. Lowell Weicker as a bear, now encouraging Lamont to seek to avenge Weicker's 1988 Senate defeat by beating Lieberman, the man who slew him. It's an argument that is far too complex for the average voter and too remote to matter even if they understand it.

One hopes that Lieberman remembers the parable of Jacob Javits, the former New York senator whose tenure was much like Lieberman's. A liberal Republican who never marched to the beat of his party's drummer, Javits faced a primary from Alfonse D'Amato from the right wing of the GOP.

Had Javits simply run as an independent (in New York at the time that meant running on the Liberal Party line), he would easily have been elected. But because he lost in the primary, when he did run as a Liberal Party candidate he ran a poor third. Splitting the progressive vote, he so crippled the Democratic candidate, Rep. Elizabeth Holtzman, that D'Amato won by a hair.

This column is a plea to the senator: Don't let hubris, overconfidence, unfounded optimism or even muddled confusion lead you to your death in the Democratic primary. We need you too much in Washington.

A.F.L.-C.I.O. In Connecticut Gives Backing To Lieberman (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

NEW HAVEN, June 27 — Connecticut's largest labor union on Tuesday endorsed Senator Joseph I. Lieberman in the Democratic primary, although many union leaders, meeting at their state political convention, complained of his support for the war in Iraq and foreign trade agreements. Many sounded loud "nays" when the voice vote was called.

"He's endorsed," John W. Olsen, the chairman of the state A.F.L.-C.I.O., said after the vote, which followed comments by the several dozen speakers — some passionate, some conflicted — who formed lines at the two floor microphones.

Most of the speakers expressed support, noting the senator's efforts in his three terms to protect workers in industries ranging from clothing to submarine manufacturing. Many said, however, that his challenger, Ned Lamont, a businessman from Greenwich who owns a cable television company, is a fresh face who will better serve their interests and stand up to President Bush on issues like the war and trade.

After the vote, Mr. Olsen was asked whether the "nays," which were not far below the "yeas" in volume, suggested that labor leaders were split over the endorsement, and he noted that no one had challenged the vote after it was completed.

Mr. Olsen, who announced his personal support for the senator several weeks ago, said it was clear from a meeting earlier in the day with leaders of individual unions that the senator had the necessary two-thirds of the approximately 350 convention delegates. He said the senator had "a wide cushion."

He said the delegates represented about 180,000 workers. He noted, however, that labor support would be spread among several races, including tight congressional races in November and the Democratic primary for governor. In that race, the labor federation on Tuesday endorsed Mayor John DeStefano of New Haven, who narrowly lost the state party endorsement last month to Mayor Dannel P. Malloy of Stamford.

The primary is Aug. 8.

Labor backing could be important for Senator Lieberman. A recent poll showed Mr. Lamont gaining support among Democratic voters. In a poll this month by Quinnipiac University, he trailed the senator, 55 to 40, among Democratic voters who said they were likely to vote in the primary. Among all Democrats, the senator led 57 to 32 percent; in May, a Quinnipiac poll found the difference to be 65 to 19.

Mr. Lamont has used the senator's support for the war to galvanize opposition to Mr. Lieberman on other issues, including health care and education policy, and he has gathered other unions' support.

Several delegates noted that Senator Lieberman had an 84 percent score from the federation for his votes on labor issues. Many also complained that he had long supported free trade agreements that cost manufacturing jobs.

Others poked at Mr. Lamont, whom the senator has characterized as a wealthy opportunist trying to buy the election.

"Mr. Lamont owns a communications company," Howard Coling, vice president of Local 1298 of the Communications Workers of America in Seymour, Conn. "And it's nonunion." That prompted sustained hoots of disapproval across the room.

Poll Shows Ehrlich Lagging As He Opens Reelection Run (WP)

By Robert Barnes And Claudia Deane

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037333

Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. starts his reelection campaign today significantly trailing Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, according to a new Washington Post poll. Although the state's voters give the governor good marks for the job he's done, they also appear inclined to return a Democrat to the governor's mansion.

Ehrlich kicks off his campaign today at his boyhood home in the Baltimore suburb of Arbutus, attempting to become the state's first Republican governor in 50 years to serve a second term. But the poll shows why he is preparing to spend a record amount and why he is considered one of the nation's most endangered Republican governors.

Ehrlich is running in an overwhelmingly Democratic state at a time when voters are not happy with the GOP. Maryland voters are more critical than voters nationally of the Bush administration and more strongly opposed to the war in Iraq. And, unlike earlier in Ehrlich's term, more Marylanders than not believe the state is heading in the wrong direction, the poll shows.

Public education is the top priority of voters statewide, and that is the area in which they give Ehrlich his lowest marks. Among the state's largest jurisdictions, controlling crime ranks a strong second in Prince George's and Baltimore counties; growth and transportation are emerging priorities in Montgomery County.

The poll shows Ehrlich trailing O'Malley by 11 percentage points among registered voters and 16 points among those who say they are "absolutely certain" to vote in the Nov. 7 election. The deficit comes even though a majority of voters find Ehrlich likable, approve of the job he has been doing and believe that the 48-year-old former congressman from Baltimore County has a vision for the state.

The telephone poll was conducted among 902 registered voters June 19 to Sunday and has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points. Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan dropped out of the race the week of the poll, leaving O'Malley as the remaining major Democrat to oppose Ehrlich in the fall.

Ehrlich declined to comment, but aides said they did not believe he trailed by such a large margin; communications director Paul E. Schurick said the campaign's most recent poll, conducted in mid-May, showed O'Malley ahead by 5 points.

"We've always known this was going to be an incredibly difficult and close race," Schurick said. "But there is something in this poll that strikes us as wrong."

O'Malley said the poll showed more than simply Democrats supporting a Democrat.

"There are a number of issues that have defined who our current governor is," O'Malley said. "The choices he's made are not in the best interests of expanding the middle class and helping our working families. . . . People feel that our state is moving in the wrong direction, and they're smart enough to know we need effective leadership."

Reelection campaigns are most often considered referendums on the incumbent, and the poll offers both good and bad news for Ehrlich.

He has lost support among independents, women and voters in the central part of the state where he put together a historic win four years ago. Democrats who took a chance on him then seem ready to return to the fold for O'Malley.

But voters still have a mostly positive view of Ehrlich; large majorities say he is honest and likable. He has only begun to fight, and he is hoping to spend $20 million to convince voters that he deserves another four years.Poor Marks on Education

According to the poll, Ehrlich and O'Malley are about equally popular with the state's independent voters and within their own parties. In most parts of the country, that would signal a very close race. But because more than half of Maryland's registered voters are Democrats, it provides the substantial lead for O'Malley.

In 2002, Ehrlich overcame that advantage with a forceful and fresh-faced campaign against then-Lt. Gov. Kathleen Kennedy Townsend. Exit polls showed that he attracted support from independent voters, people who considered themselves moderates and women who have traditionally backed Democrats. But the new poll shows that the governor has been losing those constituents at this point of the campaign.

Although an Election Day telephone poll showed that Ehrlich got about 55 percent of the independents in 2002, he and O'Malley are tied in the current poll. His support among self-described moderates dropped from 50 percent to 37 percent and among white women from 61 percent to 45 percent.

The new poll asked how much Ehrlich has accomplished in his first term and found that 8 percent said "a lot" and 21 percent said "not much"; 40 percent gave him credit for a "fair amount" and 30 percent for "some."

"I think what you're seeing is voters think he's done an okay job, but they can't really point to any accomplishments," said Democratic pollster Peter Brodnitz, who advised Timothy M. Kaine's successful gubernatorial cam paign in Virginia last year and does not have a statewide client in Maryland. "They're not seeing a compelling reason" to reelect.

Ehrlich also won in 2002 by disrupting Democrats' traditional winning strategy of rolling up enough votes in Montgomery and Prince George's and the Baltimore region to offset losses elsewhere. But although Ehrlich got a boost of more than 50,000 votes last time in the region consisting of Baltimore and the counties of Baltimore, Harford and Carroll, the new poll shows him trailing O'Malley there by 12 points. It shows the two running even in the Central Maryland counties of Anne Arundel, Howard and Frederick, where Ehrlich won by more than 85,000 votes against Townsend.

On issues, Ehrlich gets his poorest marks on public education. Even though he says he has spent more money on schools than any other governor -- a state law passed the year before he took office mandates it -- half of the poll respondents said he has done a "not so good" or "poor" job of "putting more state money into the public schools."

Public education was cited by 35 percent of the respondents as the issue that should be the top priority of the next governor, more than any other. Female voters especially were interested in education; 39 percent of them said Ehrlich was doing a good job.

And the poll indicated that some might believe Ehrlich is too close to big business. Two-thirds of the respondents said "large business corporations" had too much influence in the Ehrlich administration, and 77 percent said the legislature was right to force Wal-Mart to pay for health insurance for its employees. Ehrlich vetoed that legislation, as well as an increase in the minimum wage, and was overridden by Democratic lawmakers on both.

Those actions convinced Noelle Joll, a geographer from Anne Arundel, that Ehrlich was not as moderate as he said. "I don't think he's a bad guy," she said. "I just think he's pandering to his base."56% Job Approval Rating

On the other hand: Tom Caulfield, 59, a Republican who owns Chubby's Barbecue restaurant in Frederick, said he is sticking with Ehrlich.

"I think his first term has gone very successfully considering the odds he's had stacked against him," Caulfield said. "He does not have a popular Republican majority. For him to get anything done is amazing."

The poll indicates that many agree. While Ehrlich's favorability ratings have declined since the last Post poll in 2004, nine in 10 of the state's Republicans have a positive view of him, and nearly six in 10 of those who consider themselves independent feel the same way.

Overall, 56 percent approve of the way he handles his job, three in four say he is honest, even more say he is likable and two-thirds say he "has a vision for the state's future." A majority say he has done a good job protecting the Chesapeake Bay, and, despite his highly publicized battles with the Democrat-controlled General Assembly, six in 10 say he is "willing to make reasonable compromises."

More than seven in 10 say he deserves credit for the state's projected budget surplus.

Republican pollster Ed Goeas, who is not advising a candidate in Maryland, said the reason the Ehrlich-O'Malley matchup numbers do not reflect the generally positive views of Ehrlich is mostly because of the state's Democratic majority.

"People go back to their partisan leanings," he said. "What you have to do in a state like Maryland as you get close to the election, you have to get people to put aside their leanings and look at the person."

It is clear already that Ehrlich is trying to restore his moderate credentials and appeal to those he counted on in 2002. His first television advertisement features testimonials from six women, a black man and a man who appears Latino and includes the line: "He doesn't govern from the right or the left but from the middle, where most of us are."

He recently crossed some conservatives by quickly firing a Metro board member who described homosexuals as "persons of sexual deviancy."

And he could look to appeal to women by naming a female running mate to replace Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, who is running for the U.S. Senate. Ehrlich's list of candidates is almost exclusively composed of women, although the list of candidates running for statewide office this year, Democratic and Republican, is almost exclusively male.Differences by Jurisdiction

The top two issues that voters want the next governor to "work hardest on" -- public education and crime -- are two on which Ehrlich has most criticized O'Malley. The state moved to seize control of Baltimore's worst-performing schools before Democratic legislators stopped the move, and a state study is underway to see whether the city is underreporting crimes there.

The poll showed great variance, though, on voters' priorities based on jurisdiction. In Prince George's, nearly as many people listed crime as the top priority as did those who said education. In Montgomery, 20 percent said transportation should be the governor's top priority and 13 percent said growth. That compares with 25 percent who said it should be education.

On other issues, Marylanders showed a liberal streak. Although 56 percent said they would oppose a state law that would allow gay and lesbian couples to marry, respondents were just about evenly split on allowing civil unions.

And those in the poll were very negative about the Bush administration and the war in Iraq, with 63 percent saying the war "was not worth fighting."

More than two-thirds say they disapprove of President Bush's job performance -- 55 percent disapprove "strongly." And 56 percent said the fact that Bush was backing a candidate would make them less likely to vote for the candidate, as opposed to 19 percent who said it would make their support more likely.

Summer Vacations Run On Empty (USAT)

By Barbara De Lollis And Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, June 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037335

High gas prices may be stifling the traditional summer vacation.

Only 39.8% of consumers plan to take a vacation within the next six months, a 28-year low, the Conference Board said Tuesday.

That's the fourth consecutive decline measured by the organization, which asks the question every other month.

"It's possible that travel is falling victim to rising gas prices and rising costs overall," says Lynn Franco, director of the firm's Consumer Research Center.

A new USA TODAY/Gallup Poll supports the notion that high gas prices are crimping vacations. One-third of respondents in the survey of 1,000 adults taken Friday through Sunday said they are changing summer vacation plans because of higher gas prices.

Of those changing plans, 37% said they would reduce the number of trips normally taken, while 26% said they're canceling plans or simply can't afford to vacation. Some 23% will take shorter trips.

Gasoline prices have slipped from recent highs but are still far above where they were a year ago. The nationwide average price for a gallon of regular gasoline was $2.86 Tuesday, up 65 cents from a year ago, according to travel club AAA.

Even as many Americans say they are calling off summer travel, hotels are packed and airlines are nearly fully booked this summer. And they're charging higher prices because demand is so high.

Frequent flier Bob McBride of Omaha says high gas prices altered, but didn't snuff out, his travel plans.

For an annual trip with a friend next month, McBride, 56, will use airline and hotel loyalty points to visit Boston. They're staying downtown so they can walk or take public transportation.

More than 40 million Americans are expected to travel 50 miles or more around the July Fourth holiday, according to a report Tuesday from AAA. That's a 1.2% increase from a year ago, less than half the 2.8% jump seen last year.

The decline in vacation plans could also reflect a drop in employees who get paid time off. The percentage of companies giving paid vacation time fell to 82% this year from 91% in 2002, according to the Society for Human Resource Management. SHRM spokesman Frank Scanlan says employees who do not take time off could become burned out and less productive.

"We're all doing more with less," Scanlan says. "You have to give people time away."

Mr. Buffett's Gift (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

Warren Buffett's pledge of more than $30 billion to the Gates Foundation is an act of jaw-dropping generosity, all the more impressive because it represents the lion's share of his Berkshire Hathaway fortune. Now all the nation's two wealthiest men have to prove is that they can be as effective at giving away their money as they have been at making it. This is harder than it sounds.

Bill and Melinda Gates founded their charity just 12 years ago, though what it lacks in experience it more than makes up for in size. The Gates Foundation is already the nation's largest by far, and Mr. Buffett's largesse will allow it to double its annual giving to some $3 billion. To date the foundation, whose mission is "to help reduce inequities in the United States and around the world," has focused primarily on education and public health.

And so far at least, it seems to have avoided the worst pitfalls of many other large, politically correct foundations. James Piereson, the former director of the Olin Foundation, points out that the Gateses are wisely "focusing on problems -- like health in the Third World, AIDS, malaria -- rather than advocacy for government solutions." Too many large foundations -- the Ford Foundation is the classic example -- have wandered away from their donor's wishes and become adjuncts of the welfare state.

On U.S. education, though, the charity's efforts have been somewhat less noteworthy. Mr. Gates has embraced charter schools to some extent, but mainly when union opposition is minimal or nonexistent. And he has shied away from vouchers, which can literally rescue thousands of kids from failed public schools and are favored by other philanthropists like Theodore Forstmann and the late John Walton.

In 2003, the Gates Foundation donated $58 million to build more small schools in New York City. Smaller schools and class sizes are a perennial demand of teachers unions because they means more jobs, but there's little evidence that they significantly improve student performance.

Notwithstanding these growing pains, Mr. Buffett is clearly convinced the Gates Foundation is a worthy beneficiary. No doubt he hopes to avoid the missteps of Henry Ford, Andrew Carnegie, Joseph Pew, John MacArthur and other money men of the past, whose fortunes inevitably wound up in the hands of individuals who didn't know them and spent their money on causes they almost certainly would have opposed. Hence, Mr. Buffett has decided to give away his money before he dies, and he's chosen living donors whom he knows well and trusts. Wisely, his gift is also conditioned on Mr. and Mrs. Gates remaining active in setting policy and administrating the charity.

In explaining his charitable motivations this week, Mr. Buffett also went out of his way to say that he is "not an enthusiast for dynastic wealth." This is fair enough, and is also one of Mr. Buffett's arguments for so vocally defending federal death tax rates of 50% or more. But we can't help but point out that Mr. Buffett's gift will itself be shielded from Uncle Sam because it is going to a foundation. So in practice he is in favor of death taxes only for those whose estates are too small to hide in foundation tax shelters.

We'd also note that the foundations he is donating to may well become "dynasties" in their own right. In addition to his Gates Foundation gift, Mr. Buffett also said he will give major donations well north of $1 billion each to separate foundations run by his three children and another in the name of his late wife. These gifts, too, will be shielded from taxation and will allow his heirs to wield power and influence long after the 75-year-old has gone to his just reward. With their tax-sheltered assets, modern foundations have no expiration date and have become hugely important players in policy debates, the culture and even politics.

Which is all the more reason to watch how well the two men now deploy their gifts. We can't think of two people less in need of our two cents than Messrs. Buffett and Gates. But since giving free advice is our business, we'd suggest that they put at least a smidgen of their money back into strengthening the foundations of the free-market system that has allowed them to become so fabulously rich. There's something to be said for reinvesting in the moral capital of a free society and trying to sustain and export free-enterprise policies.

Capitalism has done very well not just by Mr. Buffett but also by the world's poor, as several hundred million Chinese and Indians might attest. African nations in particular need property rights and a rule of law as badly as they need vaccines. On that score we were encouraged by a report this week that the Gateses thanked Mr. Buffett for his gift by presenting him with a book from their personal library: Adam Smith's "The Wealth of Nations."

Testing Away HIV (WP)

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

ABOUT A QUARTER of Americans with HIV don't know they have the virus, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. In the District, a city with a well-funded but historically dysfunctional HIV-AIDS program, that number might be even higher.

We say might because the D.C. Administration for HIV Policy and Programs (AHPP) still doesn't reliably track the spread of the virus in the city. Its best estimate, released Monday to the Mayor's Task Force on HIV and AIDS, is that about 25,000 people in the city are infected, but this is just a projection based on national CDC numbers. That's why the city's new drive to test everyone in the District between the ages of 14 and 84, which kicked off yesterday in Freedom Plaza, is long overdue.

The D.C. government wants to distribute 80,000 20-minute testing kits to hospitals, schools and local health organizations before the end of the year, with the goal of making rapid HIV screening a routine part of D.C. life. The tests require only a painless mouth swab. Their distribution will be backed by a marketing campaign, launched yesterday, to encourage District residents to get screened, which may help eliminate the stigma attached to HIV testing.

The doctors, nurses and public health workers who administer the tests will report all positive results back to the Administration for HIV Policy and Programs, which keeps individual testing records strictly confidential. In theory, the AHPP will use the data it accumulates to begin gauging the rate of HIV infection in the city. Then the District can start issuing the kinds of reports on the spread of the virus that have long been standard in cities such as Baltimore and New York -- theirs come out quarterly -- and finally begin targeting its HIV funding effectively.

It's an ambitious plan for the AHPP, a branch of the Department of Health that has so far failed to gather basic information about HIV in the District, even though it spent almost half a billion dollars in local and federal funds over the past eight years. It's also an appropriately bold counterpunch in the city's so-far losing fight with HIV: The District's rate of HIV infection rivals that of AIDS-ridden nations in sub-Saharan Africa.

The city's latest public health campaign won't work, however, if District residents don't take the time to get tested. So if you didn't drop by Freedom Plaza on your lunch break yesterday, find a clinic and get a free HIV screening. It only takes 20 minutes to take charge of your health.

Israeli Troops Move Into Gaza (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

GAZA CITY, June 28 -- Israeli ground troops pushed into the Gaza Strip early Wednesday in a military operation aimed at freeing a captured soldier whose fate has transfixed much of the country. The incursion was the military's first major move into Gaza since the Israeli government withdrew all troops and settlers from the enclave nine months ago.

DOJ_NMG_0037337

An undisclosed number of troops reportedly entered the strip at its southern end, near the city of Rafah on the Egyptian border. Hours earlier, Israeli military officials said, military aircraft bombed two bridges in central Gaza to prevent the gunmen who abducted Cpl. Gilad Shalit, 19, during a Sunday attack on an army post at the strip's southeastern edge from moving him around Gaza or into Egypt.

Another airstrike hit Gaza's power station, knocking out electricity throughout the strip and igniting a huge fire that lit the pre-dawn sky. A third bridge was also reported hit.

The violence overshadowed an agreement earlier in the day by leaders of Hamas, the radical Islamic movement that controls the Palestinian government, on a unified political agenda advocated by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to ease the economic sanctions against the government.

According to Palestinian negotiators here, Hamas agreed to establish a national-unity government as part of an accord signed by the largest Palestinian political factions. If formally signed Wednesday as scheduled, the agreement would signal a major shift by Hamas's political leaders, who for the first time would effectively endorse a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

In Washington, a senior U.S. official said that while he was not privy to many details about Israel's intentions, he expected the incursion would be "pretty significant."

"This is in the category of a major operation," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "This isn't just 20 commandos."

The signs of conflict had mounted gradually throughout the day Tuesday. More than 3,000 Israeli soldiers, along with tanks and armored personnel carriers, waited along Gaza's perimeter for orders to move into the strip, which the military abandoned last September after evacuating Israel's settlements here. At the same time, Palestinian gunmen built berms near the borders and assembled sand-bag bunkers along routes into urban areas.

The Palestinian accord comes as Hamas is confronting internal divisions and international economic sanctions. It would also be a significant political victory for Abbas, a member of the rival Fatah movement who had threatened to place the deal before Palestinian voters next month unless Hamas accepted its key conditions.

"In our view, this is an important step toward a lasting peace," said Walid Awad, a spokesman for Abbas. "The Hamas government has recognized the state of Israel."

As outlined by officials involved in the talks, the agreement calls for a future Palestinian state in the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem, territory Israel occupied in the 1967 Middle East war. Since its founding nearly two decades ago, Hamas has called for creation of an Islamic state across a far larger stretch of land that includes Israel.

It was unclear, however, whether Hamas's armed wing, known as the Izzadeen al-Qassam Brigades, would abide by the terms of the agreement. Hamas gunmen were involved in the attack Sunday on an army post inside Israel that killed two soldiers and wounded four others. So far, members of the group, who participated in the attack along with two smaller armed factions, have refused to release Shalit.

The two-state pact, which was based on an 18-point document announced last month by Fatah and Hamas leaders being held in Israeli prisons, also runs counter to views held by Hamas's hard-line leadership in exile headed by Khaled Mashal, whom Israeli officials say was behind the Sunday attack. Some Hamas leaders in Gaza, along with Abbas and Egyptian interlocutors, have called for Shalit's release.

"The political leadership of Hamas does not have the strength to control the military wing," Issa Ali Nashar, a senior Hamas political leader, said in an interview in the Gaza city of Khan Younis. "All they can say right now is to keep the soldier safe."

In addition, Israeli officials said lifting economic sanctions against the Palestinian government was highly unlikely, since Hamas had not explicitly recognized Israel or renounced violence against the Jewish state.

Mark Regev, a spokesman for Israel's Foreign Ministry, said that while details of the Palestinians' final accord are not yet known, previous versions have fallen short of meeting conditions set by international donors -- that Hamas renounce violence, abide by previously signed agreements and recognize Israel -- in return for a resumption of aid.

Regev said the agreement would likely have a "minimal effect" on Israel's position toward the Palestinian government, and he expressed frustration that Palestinian leaders were discussing the deal rather than focusing on Shalit's release. "There is an immediate crisis," Regev said. "That the Palestinian leadership was putting energy into this document that has no bearing on the most pressing issue is disappointing."

Bush administration officials reacted cautiously, saying they needed more details about the reported accord before making a judgment. They noted conflicting initial reports about what the agreement entailed.

"We're just going to wait to see exactly what the case is," White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters. "What we want to see is something written so that we can understand what their position is."

DOJ_NMG_0037338

In addition to laying out the terms of a Palestinian state, the agreement also calls for confining armed operations against Israel to the occupied territories under a unified command, the right of Palestinian refugees to return, and freedom for thousands of prisoners in Israeli jails.

Nashar and other Hamas leaders said the agreement does not commit Hamas to recognizing the Jewish state, which they believe was created illegally on Arab land through a 1947 United Nations resolution. But it does endorse previously signed agreements that do so, as well as the 2002 Arab peace initiative that calls for Israel to withdraw from all territories occupied in the 1967 war in exchange for peace and recognition.

Islamic Jihad, a smaller group responsible for all suicide bombings inside Israel over the past year, refused to sign the new agreement.

While military preparations continued here, Israeli soldiers searched parts of the West Bank for an 18-year-old Israeli settler missing since Sunday. The radical Popular Resistance Committees, an armed group involved in Sunday's kidnapping, claimed to be holding Eliyahu Asheri, who is from the northern West Bank settlement of Itamar. Settlement officials said he was last seen hitchhiking near the French Hill junction in Jerusalem.

"We don't know what happened and we pray he is okay," Moshe Goldschmidt, a leader of the settlement, said in a telephone interview.

On Wednesday, the militant group threatened to kill Asheri if Israel did not halt its incursion, news services reported.

Throughout the day Tuesday, Israeli tanks and troops assembled along Gaza's periphery while Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called for Israel to allow more time for international diplomacy to secure the soldier's release. But a tour of several towns in southern Gaza suggested that the population here supports holding Shalit until Israel releases some of the 8,503 Palestinians being held in Israel.

The groups behind the kidnapping have demanded the release of the 421 Palestinian women and minors in Israeli prisons in exchange for information about Shalit's welfare. Olmert rejected the demand on Monday, threatening instead a "broad and comprehensive" military operation unless Shalit is freed immediately.

"What can they do that they haven't done before?" asked Mohanned Abu Nada, a 33-year-old Fatah supporter in Khan Younis.

Israeli Tanks And Troops Enter Gaza (FT)

By Ferry Biedermann

Financial Times, June 28, 2006

Israeli tanks and troops crossed the border into the southern Gaza Strip early on Wednesday in what the army described as a target operation aimed at freeing a kidnapped soldier.

The army said it did not intend to carry out a prolonged operation. However, the incursion marks the most serious escalation in operations by Israel's ground forces since their withdrawal from the Gaza Strip nearly a year ago.

The move follows the failure of diplomatic efforts to secure the release of the Israeli soldier during an attack on Sunday in which the armed wing of Hamas, the militant Palestinian movement, participated.

The two leading Palestinian factions, Hamas and Fatah, have in effect reached agreement on a unified approach towards Israel and on internal Palestinian issues, officials in the West Bank and Gaza had said on Tuesday.

The agreement was billed as promising an unprecedented implicit recognition of Israel by Hamas.

However, the militant movement that won parliamentary elections earlier this year and now forms the government immediately cast doubt on that agreement. Leaders of the movement in Damascus also said more talks were needed with Fatah.

Word of the deal came amid continuing tensions in Gaza over the kidnapping of the Israeli soldier. One of the other groups that took part said on Tuesday that it was also holding a young Israeli settler on the West Bank.

The 18-year-old soldier's family who lives in the settlement of Itamar near Nablus said he had been missing for two days, but the authorities did not confirm he had been abducted.

On Tuesday night Israel aircraft attacked bridges in central Gaza and a helicopter launched missiles at a power station. Israeli tanks were reported to be moving near the northern end of the Gaza Strip but the army said they had not crossed the border.

The month-long negotiations between the Palestinian factions were based on a document drafted by prisoners from Hamas and Fatah held in Israel. It includes acceptance of a Palestinian state in the Gaza Strip and West Bank, including east Jerusalem.

This was seen as being in accordance with the acceptance by Fatah and the Palestine Liberation Organisation of a two-state solution whereby Israel and a Palestinian state would exist side by side.

DOJ_NMG_0037339

The precise details of the agreement had not been made public late Tuesday night. But the document was expected to be approved by the leaders of the two groups – Hamas prime minister Ismail Haniyeh and Mahmoud Abbas, the Fatah president of the Palestinian Authority.

The accord is partly intended to reduce tensions between the rival Palestinian factions that have erupted, frequently in violence, since January's elections. But it is mainly aimed at the international community, particularly the quartet consisting of the US, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations, that has demanded that Hamas recognise Israel, renounce violence and adhere to previously signed internationally binding agreements. Failing that, the quartet has acted to isolate the Hamas-ruled government, choking off financial aid.

Israel has said that it regards the agreement as "an internal Palestinian matter" and falling short of international demands.

Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, said in remarks to the Knesset that he still favoured peace negotiations with the Palestinians. The US was waiting to see if the agreement between the Palestinian factions amounted to a recognition of Israel, said White House spokesman Tony Snow. But he warned that the groups must still renounce violence.

Israeli Troops Move Into Gaza; Bridges Are Hit (NYT)

By Ian Fisher And Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

GAZA, Wednesday, June 28 — Israel sent troops into southern Gaza and its planes attacked three bridges and a power station early Wednesday, in an effort to prevent militants from moving a wounded Israeli soldier they abducted Sunday, Israeli Army officials said.

Israeli troops and tanks began to move in force in an effort to rescue the soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, 19, who is believed to be held there.

Witnesses said Israeli troops had taken the old Gaza airport and were heading toward Rafah on the road that marks the border between Gaza and Egypt, as Egyptian troops watched.

Electricity was knocked out through much of Gaza after a complex of electronic transformers, south of Gaza City, was struck by Israeli planes. Witnesses said that the station was hit by numerous missiles and that it was burning brightly against the night sky.

The Israeli Army said the operation was limited to an effort to rescue the corporal and was not an attempt to reoccupy Gaza.

"If we need to, we continue on," said Capt. Noa Meir, an army spokeswoman. "It's all about getting him home."

The airstrikes hit bridges on the coastal and interior roads near the old Israeli settlement of Netzarim, which divides Gaza between north and south, and near Deir al Balah. Israeli tanks and ground forces massed in staging areas along the border fence with Gaza, especially around Kerem Shalom and Nahal Oz.

On Tuesday, as Palestinians tried to block roads with dirt mounds and barbed wire against any Israeli armored assault, their political factions completed a draft agreement aimed at a national unity government that could include an implicit recognition of Israel by Hamas.

The prospect of an invasion, threatened by Israel if Corporal Shalit was not released, seemed to have pushed the Palestinians toward agreement after months of internal fighting.

The draft agreement between the Fatah faction of Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian leader, and the Hamas faction of Prime Minister Ismail Haniya is based on a document outlined by Palestinian prisoners. It is described as containing an implicit recognition of Israel's right to exist, because it calls for the creation of a Palestinian state within pre-1967 borders, presumably next to Israel.

Such an accord would move Hamas closer to recognition of Israel — a significant change — and would raise the possibility of renewed Western aid to the Palestinians, which was severely curtailed after the Hamas victory in January.

If the accord backing what would amount to a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is completed, it will represent a victory for Mr. Abbas, who had threatened to put the issue to a referendum next month. But Saeb Erekat, a senior Fatah official close to Mr. Abbas, said that the document was incomplete, and that Mr. Abbas wanted to review it and consult further.

Israeli officials dismissed the draft agreement as an internal Palestinian matter irrelevant to the current crisis over the fate and return of Corporal Shalit.

"We are at the edge of the cliff, and everyone is asking the Palestinian leadership to help avert this crisis and release our serviceman," said Mark Regev, the spokesman for the Foreign Ministry. "Yet energy and time is being put into this prisoners document, and it's in many ways tragic."

DOJ_NMG_0037340

Mushir al-Masri, a Hamas legislator in Gaza, said the current crisis had united Fatah and Hamas to hammer out the accord. "It is natural that Israeli threats will unite Palestinians more and more," he said. "It will push us to put our differences aside and unite against a bigger threat."

Mr. Erekat said Mr. Abbas, known as Abu Mazen, and Mr. Haniya were working together to try to free the Israeli soldier. "Abu Mazen has ordered a house-to-house search for the Israeli soldier," Mr. Erekat said. "If we knew exactly where he was, we would go get him ourselves."

Fatah negotiators like Samir Masharawi were eager to describe the document as a big Hamas concession. "It has recognized a state in the '67 borders," Mr. Masharawi said. "It means indirectly recognizing another state."

Mr. Masri said in an interview: "They do exist. It's tangible, they exist, we recognize the fact they exist. What we don't recognize is the legitimacy of the occupation."

By the last phrase, Hamas normally means the occupation of historic Palestine by an Israeli state of any kind; the Hamas charter explicitly says that Palestine is Islamic waqf — land given by God to Muslims, who cannot cede it or sell it.

The draft document also contains a clause that supports armed action against Israel, which it says should be "concentrated" in areas occupied by Israel in 1967 but not limited to them.

In Gaza on Tuesday, Palestinians worked to make any arrival of tanks and Israeli soldiers as treacherous as possible. In the town of Jabaliya, big berms of sand were piled up on a main road.

"I believe that against the Israelis, who have tanks and Apaches and all their technological machines, it's not that important," said Abu Raed, 30, a shopkeeper, sitting next to one of the berms. "But the fighters should have something to hide behind."

In anticipation of Israeli military action, the militant group Islamic Jihad called reporters in Gaza on Tuesday to film them, battle-ready, in two fields near the now-abandoned Israeli settlement of Netzarim. At one field, 11 fighters in black masks and camouflage held automatic rifles, rocket-propelled grenades and an antitank mine. Several also held up what they described as inserts for suicide-bombing belts: thin plastic bottles made to hold antiseptics that were filled with ball bearings.

Many in Gaza believed that the Israeli strike had begun shortly before 6 p.m., when a huge explosion tore apart a car in downtown Gaza, not far from the offices of both Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniya. But it turned out to be a car bomb, which heaved half the car, bits of shrapnel and body parts dozens of yards.

While several bystanders were injured, and nearby windows shattered and walls collapsed, the only death appeared to be that of the driver of the car, identified later as Hamza Abu Mukharreb, 21, a member of Hamas's military wing.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Tuesday called on Israel to give diplomacy more time. "There really needs to be an effort now to try and calm the situation, not to let the situation escalate, and to give diplomacy a chance to work to try to get this release," Ms. Rice told reporters during a refueling stop in Scotland en route to Pakistan.

Before the incursion began, Israeli officials on Tuesday had said time for diplomacy would also help their parallel efforts to plan a rescue mission. One intermediate step, an official said, might be to cut off electricity and water to Gaza, which Israel had already sealed from the movement of goods or people, as an effort to increase pressure on those groups holding the corporal.

Those groups are the military wing of Hamas, in particular the Khan Yunis group; the Popular Resistance Committees, made up of militants from various factions; and a new group called the Army of Islam, believed to be close to Hamas. They carried out the raid into Israel on Sunday, emerging from a long tunnel dug for many weeks beneath the border, 300 yards behind Israeli lines. The attack killed two Israeli soldiers and led to the seizure of the corporal, who was said to be slightly wounded.

The Hamas military wing is considered by Fatah and Israel to be under the control of the exiled Hamas political leader, Khaled Meshal, who is in Syria. Even a statement from Mr. Abbas's office on Tuesday, calling for Israeli patience, described "kidnapping the Israeli soldier by forces loyal to Khaled Meshal."

A spokesman for the Popular Resistance Committees, Muhammad Abdel Al, said the corporal was being held "in a secure place that the Zionists cannot reach." The groups have refused to release him, despite efforts by Egyptian, French and other diplomats, and Mr. Haniya, the Hamas prime minister, to end the crisis.

Mr. Al also said his group had kidnapped a Jewish civilian settler in the West Bank. The police said that Eliyahu Asheri, 18, who lives in the settlement of Itamar, near Nablus, had been reported missing since Sunday. They said they were trying to see if there was a connection.

Israeli Attack Could Spark An End To Palestinian Authority's Grip (WSJ)

By Karby Leggett

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037341

JERUSALEM -- Israeli forces crossed into the Gaza Strip early this morning, three days after Palestinian militants kidnapped an Israeli soldier, in a military offensive that could threaten a decade-long effort to build a viable and independent Palestinian government.

When leaders of the militant Islamic group Hamas took control of the Palestinian government after winning an election this year, many Palestinians expressed new hope for the future. Instead, Hamas has struggled under a cloud of international isolation, failing to pay government wages, overhaul the security forces or restore law and order on Palestinian streets.

Now, the Palestinian Authority government is facing perhaps the biggest crisis in its existence. Despite continuing diplomatic efforts to secure the soldier's release, signs pointed toward a wide-ranging Israeli ground offensive.

Israel sent a force of tanks and armored personnel carriers to the edge of Gaza, and sealed off the territory. Israeli aircraft attacked bridges in central Gaza and hit a power station before tanks and troops were sent into southern Gaza. In Gaza, militants armed with machine guns and rocket-propelled grenades rigged explosive devices along roads. Meanwhile, Israeli politicians said an offensive wouldn't be limited to finding the soldier and his abductors.

A hint of optimism also emerged yesterday. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, of the Fatah party, and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, of Hamas, reached agreement on a document that, if the hostage is released and tensions reduced, could facilitate negotiations with Israel. The document calls for the creation of a Palestinian state alongside Israel. While the agreement appeared to demonstrate a willingness on the part of the two leaders to compromise with Israel, it is unclear if the document has the full support of Hamas, because of a growing split between the group's political leaders and its military wing -- which participated in the soldier's abduction.

For both Israel and the Palestinians, the military campaign in Gaza could create enormous long-term complications. Widespread chaos could result if Palestinian security forces are scattered and infrastructure such as roads and schools are further damaged. Hospitals, already short on many supplies, could be overwhelmed.

Israel has said it could begin targeting Hamas leaders for assassination, including those in the government, if the Israeli soldier isn't released. While Israel has assassinated Hamas figures in the past, it hasn't killed government officials. Should the soldier be killed, "no one is immune," Israeli cabinet minister and former general Benjamin Ben-Eliezer said in an interview on a local radio station.

Some Hamas officials already are in hiding, and others would likely follow in the event of a full-scale invasion. That could leave the Palestinian territories without a functioning government. Daily life in Gaza and the West Bank soon would grind to a halt, as schools, hospitals and other services shut down. Palestinian Authority employees, including tens of thousands of teachers, doctors and policemen who haven't received salaries in three months, would be unlikely to return to work without a functioning government in place.

In the end, Israel would be left with two choices: watching as a humanitarian and security crisis likely worsens, or assuming responsibility for providing basic services to roughly five million Palestinians, as Israel did before the 1990s Oslo peace process that led to the establishment of the Palestinian Authority quasigovernment.

"Israel is facing a very big problem now," says Shalom Harari, a former senior Israeli military official and expert on Hamas. "One year from now, we may have no choice but to conquer Gaza and set up a military government again."

Perhaps the greatest risk is that radical militants increase their ranks, further complicating Israel's security problems. Already, since the Israeli military withdrew from the territory last year, some Palestinian officials say al Qaeda has begun recruiting in Gaza. Hamas and Hezbollah -- the region's best-funded and equipped militia -- have been smuggling in more weapons than before.

Indeed, Mr. Harari says that even if the soldier is released, Israel may again enter Gaza in the months ahead. Pointing to the recent buildup in weapons in Gaza, including a new type of rocket than can hit some major Israeli population centers, he says, "Israel is going to have to hit Gaza and hit it hard."

Israeli Troops And Armor Surge Into Gaza (LAT)

By Laura King And Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

GAZA CITY — Israeli troops and tanks, backed by fierce aerial bombardment, punched their way into the southern Gaza Strip early today, hours after Israel declared that time was running out for Palestinian militants to free an Israeli soldier seized in a cross-border raid.

The offensive was by far the largest since Israel unilaterally pulled its troops out of the seaside territory more than nine months ago. In the intervening months, Israel has responded to Palestinian militants' rocket attacks with airstrikes and artillery barrages.

But this is the first time since the withdrawal that large concentrations of Israeli forces have entered the restive, densely populated coastal territory.

The attack began late Tuesday when Israeli warplanes blew up a bridge in central Gaza, with loud booms reverberating across Gaza City — a move Israeli military officials said was meant to prevent the captors of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, 19, from moving him.

Later, two other bridges and a power plant were struck, sending billows of white smoke into a night sky lighted by flames and flares.

The air offensive in effect sliced Gaza into three sectors and knocked out power to large swaths, though electricity was restored at least temporarily in Gaza City and other northern areas. There was no immediate word on any Palestinian casualties or the number of Israeli troops that crossed into Gaza.

Military analysts said the incursion was the first phase of an operation that would intensify, possibly to include targeting Hamas leaders, unless Shalit is released.

"We are trying to make it clear to the Palestinian Authority and terrorist organizations that we're very serious about this and about Cpl. Shalit's safety and quick return home," said Capt. Noa Meir, an Israeli military spokeswoman.

Officials said Israel did not want to seize the Gaza Strip, which it occupied for 38 years.

"We have no interest in returning to a place we have left. We seek dialogue, not a bloodbath," Israel's infrastructure minister, Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, said early today. "If they return the soldier, sit down at the negotiating table — we're out. There's nothing for us there."

In the hours before the strike, Palestinians girded for attack, topping bulldozed mounds of sand along urban thoroughfares with barbed wire and laying what appeared to be homemade explosives in the expected path of Israeli tanks massed just across the border.

Against the backdrop of battle preparations by both sides, the Palestinians' ruling Hamas movement and the rival Fatah faction announced Tuesday that they had tentatively agreed on a political platform that could lead to negotiations with Israel.

However, the move appeared to be more of an effort to present a symbolic united front at a time of crisis than to genuinely alter the hard-line stance that has led to the Hamas-dominated government's diplomatic and economic isolation. The Islamist Hamas movement emphasized that it was still not willing to acknowledge Israel's right to exist.

The offensive was sparked by an audacious cross-border raid Sunday in which Palestinian militants captured Shalit and killed two other soldiers. Two of the Palestinian attackers were killed.

The consortium of Hamas-linked groups claiming to hold Shalit warned Tuesday against any attempt to rescue him, saying it would result in failure and bloodshed. That was a chilling and probably deliberate reminder to Israelis that the last time Palestinian militants managed to seize an Israeli soldier, in 1994, he was subsequently killed in an Israeli rescue raid.

"The soldier is in a secure location to which the Zionists' reach does not extend," Mohammed Abdelal, a spokesman for the Popular Resistance Committees, one of three groups thought to have taken part in the raid, told reporters in Gaza City.

The purported captors have demanded the release of Palestinian prisoners who are female or younger than 18 in exchange for information about Shalit, but have provided no proof he is alive.

Israel said no prisoner exchange was being contemplated.

Israeli military sources said they believed Shalit was being held in southern Gaza, a stronghold for militant Palestinian groups that have engaged in abductions of foreigners and Palestinian political rivals.

The Israeli troop incursion was concentrated east of the southern border town of Rafah. But the scale and intended duration of the military push were not clear.

In the initial offensive, Israeli soldiers did not enter Gaza City or its immediate environs, where in some neighborhoods masked militants flooded the streets and mosque loudspeakers called on people to resist.

"Take up your rifles and fight!" a senior leader of Hamas' military wing, Nizar Rayan, said in a broadcast exhortation.

Complex mediation efforts led by Egypt continued Tuesday. Because Shalit holds dual French-Israeli citizenship, French diplomats were also involved, but they were close-mouthed about their role.

The United States also urged restraint on Israel's part.

"There really needs to be an effort now to try and calm the situation," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told reporters en route to Pakistan.

Seeking to step up the pressure on the Hamas government, Israel closed its border crossings with Gaza on Monday. Combined with a naval blockade, the closure has effectively barred the importation of food, fuel and other goods. Israeli media reported that government leaders also were considering cutting off electricity and water.

Vice Premier Shimon Peres said Israel was asking governments to withhold donations to the Palestinian Authority until the soldier is freed.

DOJ_NMG_0037343

Peres also said it appeared that Hamas' political leader, Khaled Meshaal, a hard-liner who is based in Damascus, the Syrian capital, was responsible for Sunday's attack — the most explicit public accusation against Meshaal from a senior Israeli official.

"It's clear that Khaled Meshaal gave the order for this operation, and he wants to destroy prospects for peace," Peres told reporters after visiting Shalit's parents in the Galilee region.

In the streets of Gaza City on Tuesday, the mood was one of anger and defiance, with many saying that Palestinians should not free the Israeli soldier without getting something in return.

Atop makeshift barricades of sand, concrete blocks and debris, young Palestinian boys played with toy rifles. Aerial drones and other aircraft could be heard circling overhead, and Israeli gunships were visible through the heat haze offshore in the Mediterranean.

Adding to the jittery atmosphere, a car exploded Tuesday close to the Gaza City residence of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who was not in the building at the time.

One man, described as a Hamas militant, was killed and several others were wounded. Palestinians called it an assassination by Israel, but the Israeli military denied any involvement.

The announcement of a political agreement by Hamas and Fatah came after weeks of negotiations, and after Abbas said last month that he would put the question of whether to recognize Israel to Palestinian voters in a referendum.

Under the tentative agreement, Abbas would be empowered to hold negotiations with Israel but any agreements reached would require the approval of the Hamas-dominated parliament.

The document appeared to fall far short of international and Israeli demands on Hamas. Israel dismissed the accord as a "diplomatic non-starter."

The negotiations over a Hamas-Fatah political pact and the capture of Shalit have laid bare the divisions within Hamas.

The group's military wing, thought to report primarily to exiled leaders in Damascus, said it took part in the raid that brought about the soldier's capture. The Hamas-led government, meanwhile, urged that the soldier not be harmed.

"We … don't want to reach a situation of bloodshed," government spokesman Ghazi Hamad, who speaks fluent Hebrew, told Israel's Army Radio.

Defense Minister Amir Peretz said during a visit Tuesday to the agricultural community of Kerem Shalom, where the Palestinian attack took place, that Israel had no choice but to respond decisively to a raid on its soil.

Abbas, Hamas Strike A Deal (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

TEL AVIV -- Under mounting pressure to release a kidnapped Israeli soldier held in the Gaza Strip, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh put aside differences in a power-sharing agreement aimed at ending months of internecine fighting between Hamas and Fatah and implicitly recognizing Israel.

The agreement came as a surprise.

With Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert threatening a broad invasion of Gaza and more assassinations in retaliation for the abduction of Cpl. Gilad Shalit and the killings of two other soldiers during a cross-border raid, tensions have been on the rise between the rival Palestinian parties and within the Hamas party itself over how to respond.

Early today, Israeli planes attacked two bridges and a power station, knocking out electricity in most of the Gaza Strip and stepping up the pressure on Palestinian militants holding Cpl. Shalit, 19.

In central Gaza, a bridge was destroyed in a strike launched from an Israeli aircraft.

"People usually unify at times of crisis," said Ghassan Khatib, a former minister in Mr. Abbas' Cabinet. "I think the prime minister, particularly, is in need of the president nowadays, especially given that there seems to be difficulties inside of Hamas."

Mr. Haniyeh is thought to be at odds with Damascus, Syria-based Hamas hard-liner Khaled Meshal over the agreement and the attack. Mr. Abbas also is keen on gaining international legitimacy as Western countries boycott the Hamas-led government for its refusal to recognize Israel.

For Mr. Abbas, considered by some as a lame duck in the wake of Hamas' victory, cajoling Hamas into an agreement that calls for the Islamic militants to join the Fatah-dominated Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) can be a form of a victory.

"The president has always been interested in such an agreement, because this will make him stronger internally and externally," Mr. Khatib said.

The prisoners document calls for Hamas to join the ranks of the PLO, a signatory to peace agreements with Israel. It also calls for a moratorium on attacks within Israel while legitimizing violence in areas still under Israeli control. The document also calls on Hamas and Fatah to join in a national unity government.

DOJ_NMG_0037344

It is described as implicitly recognizing Israel because it accepts a Palestinian state limited to Gaza and the West Bank, in effect restricting Israel to its pre-1967 war borders.

Palestinians from Fatah have complained of a "two-headed" government pulling in opposite directions. While Mr. Abbas has called on the newly elected Hamas politicians to join peace talks with Israel, the Islamic militants have remained steadfast in their opposition to recognize the Jewish state or foreswear military attacks on Israel.

After the kidnapping, Mr. Abbas immediately denounced the operation and promised to dispatch troops to find the soldier. But Mr. Haniyeh has remained silent as aides called on militants to treat the captive well.

Fatah politicians hailed the agreement as a Hamas concession on the peace process. But, they acknowledged that the agreement won't be a springboard to talks with Israel because it contains phrases that the Israelis can't accept.

"Our way has prevailed," said Jamal Nazzal, a spokesperson for the Fatah party. "We have called for the recognition of Israel, and now almost 18 years after it, Hamas comes to understand how the world is. Hamas wants to be recognized by the world, but they didn't read the structure of the world. So now, under pressure, they are maturing."

The agreement aims to end weeks of fighting among Palestinian factions that has claimed 20 lives and threatens to mushroom into a civil war. It remains to be seen whether militant field commanders on both sides will observe the accord.

Many have criticized the agreement language as being so vague as to allow radically divergent interpretations. Although saying he supported the agreement, Hamas legislator Wael Husseini insisted that the accord doesn't mark a departure from Hamas' traditional opposition to Israel's existence.

"We will never recognize the legitimacy of Israel inside the 1948 borders," he said, referring to the dimensions of the Jewish state accepted by most of the international community. "That doesn't mean we don't recognize the existence of the Israelis. We recognize the existence of Israel, but not on our land. We don't give Israel anything in return for withdrawal." However, Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniyeh seem to have reached a cohabitation arrangement that benefits both.

"The developments in the last three days weakens the political position and status of Haniyeh" among the Palestinian public, especially in Gaza, said Tel Aviv University professor Shaul Mishal, who authored a book on Hamas. "It's possible that the difficult situation that the government is in might have convinced them to show more willingness to go for this agreement."

Israel Launches Gaza Offensive Over Hostage (USAT)

By From Staff And Wire Reports

USA Today, June 28, 2006

GAZA CITY — Israeli troops entered southern Gaza and planes attacked three bridges and a power station, knocking out electricity in most of the coastal strip early today. The incursion stepped up pressure on Palestinian militants holding captive a 19-year-old Israeli soldier.

The Israeli military said in a statement that the attacks on the bridges late Tuesday and early today were intended “to impair the ability of the terrorists to transfer the kidnapped soldier.”

Israeli troops began taking up positions in two locations east of the Gaza town of Rafah under the cover of tank shells, witnesses and Palestinian security officials told the Associated Press. Palestinians dug in behind mounds of dirt, bracing for a major Israeli offensive.

The strikes, the first major incursion since Israel pulled out of Gaza last summer, came amid intensive diplomatic efforts in the Arab world and by the United Nations. U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged Israel to “give diplomacy a chance.”

Negotiators from the ruling Hamas movement said Tuesday that they had accepted a document implicitly recognizing Israel. Israel said only freedom for the captive soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, could defuse the crisis, not a political agreement.

Israeli planes fired at least nine missiles at Gaza's only power station, cutting electricity to much of Gaza, Palestinian security officials told AP. The station's three functioning turbines and a gasoline reservoir were engulfed in flames.

Israeli military officials told AP that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert approved a limited operation for southern Gaza, aimed at “terrorist infrastructure.” The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to talk to reporters.

In the Shajaiyeh neighborhood of Gaza City, armed militants took up positions across from the headlights of Israeli vehicles, and Israeli attack helicopters hovered overhead.

The militants told residents to leave the area. They piled gasoline-soaked tires in the streets. Earlier, bulldozers blocked some of the main roads with piles of sand and dirt to try to slow down Israeli tanks.

There were no reports of casualties in the Israeli strikes.

The Hamas-linked Popular Resistance Committees, one of the three groups that carried out Sunday's abduction, reported that it also kidnapped a Jewish settler in the West Bank.

DOJ_NMG_0037345

Israeli police spokesman Micky Rosenfeld said the report was being taken “very seriously.” Shalit's abduction has threatened to turn already devastated relations between Israel and the Hamas-led government into an all-out war. Hamas took over the Palestinian Authority after winning parliamentary elections in January.

On Tuesday, the White House reacted coolly to the Palestinian political agreement that appeared to mark the first time Hamas has endorsed the concept of a Palestinian state existing next to Israel.

The document, as described by Palestinian presidential spokesman Walid Awad and others, stopped short of fully breaking with Hamas' long-held opposition to Israel's right to exist. Israel, the United States and the European Union have demanded that Hamas renounce terrorism and recognize Israel's right to exist if the Hamas government is to be recognized as legitimate.

Hamas spokesman Sami Abu Zuhri said it is sticking to its “agenda of resistance” against Israel.

The pact, which has not been released publicly, accepts a 2002 proposal, endorsed by the Arab League, which offered the possibility of full diplomatic relations with Israel. It also calls for a future Palestinian state in the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said U.S. officials found the pact vague.

Israeli Threat Unites Hamas, Fatah (CSM)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Christian Science Monitor, June 28, 2006

TEL AVIV

Under mounting international pressure to free a kidnapped Israeli soldier, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh closed ranks Tuesday by concluding a power-sharing agreement aimed at ending months of violent Hamas-Fatah fighting and laying down principles for talks with Israel.

The pact between Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniyeh serves to prop up the political rivals at a time when a hostage standoff threatens an Israeli army retaliatory invasion of Gaza.

"Now it seems they're in the same boat because they have a serious threat to their political existence," says Shaul Mishal, a Tel Aviv University political science professor who has authored a book on Hamas. "They need badly to maintain their status within the Palestinian public. [Sunday's kidnapping of an Israeli soldier] shows their weakness, and they have no real control. People do what they want, or they listen to someone else - not the government."

Osama Hamdan, a Hamas official in Lebanon close to the organization's hard-line leadership in Damascus, criticized Abbas Tuesday for helping Israel search for the kidnapped Israeli soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, who is believed to be held in southern Gaza, the Associated Press reported. Instead, the official continued, Palestinians should kidnap more Israelis to use as bargaining chips.

Meanwhile, Israel's military is becoming increasingly convinced that an Israeli settler also missing since Sunday has been kidnapped, the Israeli newspaper Haaretz reported Tuesday.

In Gaza City, one Palestinian was killed Tuesday and several others were injured from a missile fired on a car traveling near Abbas's office, Israel Radio reported. Israel's military denied involvement in the attack.

The Abbas-Haniyeh agreement is based on a document drafted by a coalition of jailed Palestinian militant leaders that calls for Hamas's integration into the Fatah-dominated Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO). Because the PLO is the signatory to peace accords with Israel, the bargain is seen as a major departure for Hamas, which has opposed peace negotiations and the idea of Israeli and Palestinian states coexisting alongside one another.

The document also calls for a unity government with Fatah, another concession by the Islamic militants who would be admitting they are unable to govern without the help of their bitter adversaries.

A commitment limiting Palestinian attacks to territories conquered by the Jewish state in the 1967 Arab-Israeli war has been seen as yet another Hamas concession, but in tolerating attacks by Palestinian militia groups it marks a compromise on Abbas's vocal criticism of the militarized uprising.

Haniyeh and Abbas were reported to have been on the verge of concluding the agreement Saturday night just hours before a detachment of Palestinian militants raided Israeli military positions near Gaza by tunneling under the border. Two Israeli soldiers and two Palestinian militants were killed in an attack seen by many as an attempt by Hamas's hard-line leadership to undermine the accord.

Fatah leaders have said that this accord with Hamas isn't far reaching enough to form the foundation for peace talks with Israel, but that it is instead aimed to end weeks of infighting that have claimed the lives of 20 Palestinians and spurred new anarchy in the West Bank and Gaza.

DOJ_NMG_0037346

"It is a national program. Palestinians will not negotiate with Israel on this basis," says Jamal Nazzal, a Fatah spokesman. "The advantage of it is that Palestinians will not block the way of each other anymore."

But it remains to be seen whether Hamas and Fatah field commanders will honor the commitment. One commander from the Fatah-affiliated Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade described the agreement as more of a temporary cease-fire postponing an inevitable civil war.

Palestinians from Fatah have complained of a "two-headed" government pulling in opposite directions. While President Abbas has called on the newly elected Hamas politicians to join peace talks with Israel, the Islamic militants have remained steadfast in their opposition to recognize the Jewish state or forswear military attacks on Israel.

The US and the European Union both consider Hamas a terrorist group for its endorsement of suicide bombings against Israel, and have led an international aid boycott of the Palestinian Authority (PA). That has emptied government coffers and compounded economic hardship.

For Hamas's Haniyeh, the agreement with Abbas could potentially bolster his credentials abroad after most governments shunned Hamas. It also props him up amid tension with Hamas hard-liner Khaled Meshal in Damascus.

"People usually unify at the times of crisis," says Ghassan Khatib, a former Labor Minister under Abbas. "I think the prime minister particularly is in need of the president nowadays, especially given that there seems to be difficulties inside of Hamas."

The concessions won by Abbas, on the other hand, gives him ammunition to counter critics who have described him as a lame duck after Hamas's electoral victory, analysts say.

Mr. Khatib continues, "The president has always been interested in such an agreement, because this will make him stronger internally and externally."

Many have criticized the agreement for language so vague as to allow radically divergent interpretations. While saying he supported the agreement, Hamas legislator Wael Husseini insisted that the accord doesn't mark a departure from Hamas's traditional opposition to Israel's existence.

"We will never recognize the legitimacy of Israel inside the 1948 borders," he says, referring to the dimensions of the Jewish state accepted by most of the international community. "That doesn't mean we don't recognize the existence of the Israelis. We recognize the existence of Israel but not on our land. We don't give Israel anything in return for withdrawal."

Meanwhile, the militants holding Corporal Shalit issued their first demands Monday. The groups, which included Hamas's military wing and two offshoots of the Popular Resistance Committees (PRC), said Israel should release all jailed Palestinian women and children under 18 in return for information about Shalit. Officials estimate there are 500 such prisoners.

"The soldier is in a secure place that the Zionists cannot reach," PRC spokesman Mohammed Abdel Al said. It was the first acknowledgment by militants that Shalit was still alive.

About 3,000 Israeli troops, along with tanks and armored vehicles, have massed along Israel's border with Gaza. Commanders said they were awaiting orders.

Stop Terror At Its Source (WSJ)

By Michael Oren

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Dawn broke yesterday over the Israel-Gaza border on a surreal but not unfamiliar scene: Rows of Merkava tanks, armored personnel carriers and Humvees were assembled in preparation for an incursion into the strip. These forces -- when given the green light -- would punch through booby-trapped refugee camps in search of Hamas and Islamic Jihad gunmen, while Israeli jets and helicopters hunt the terrorists from above.

By invading Gaza, Israel hopes to counter increasingly bold Palestinian attacks -- such as the firing of some 1,000 Qassam rockets at Israeli border towns and the kidnapping of an Israeli soldier by Hamas earlier this week. The troops will probably net a large number of terrorists and may rescue the captured soldier. But while the operation may flex its military muscle, it cannot restore Israel's deterrence power or prevent future rocket attacks and kidnappings. Indeed, the attack may well prove Pyrrhic -- inflicting greater injury on Israel than on the Palestinians.

The quandary Israel confronts today originated in the unilateral withdrawal of all Israeli settlers and soldiers from Gaza last August. A sizable majority of Israelis supported disengagement, excruciating as it was, as a means of achieving a national consensus on the country's borders and of preserving its vital Jewish majority.

Yet even those Israelis most in favor of the Gaza pullout understood that many Palestinians would interpret the move as a strategic retreat and a victory for Hamas and al-Aqsa terror. "We shot at the Jews and they fled Gaza," they would say, "so let's keep shooting and they'll abandon Tel Aviv, Haifa and Jerusalem." Israel could have refuted that claim by responding immediately and massively to every infiltration and to every rocket fired, irrespective of whether the attacks caused Israeli casualties. Gaza is now a de facto independent state, Israel should have declared, and like any other state it must bear the consequences of its aggression. * * *

But Israel did none of this. On the contrary, infiltrations and rocket strikes began almost the day after the Gaza disengagement. The primary target was Sderot, a working-class town in the western Negev populated mostly by long-settled immigrants from North Africa and more recent arrivals from Russia. Israel responded with missile attacks aimed at eliminating the Palestinian rocket crews and destroying the Qassam factories. But the crews were too elusive and the factories too readily rebuilt.

The attacks against Sderot and other border towns intensified -- several Qassams struck Askhelon, Israel's major industrial city in the south -- and the Palestinians elected a Hamas government sworn to escalate the violence. Israel retaliated by blasting the Qassam launching areas with artillery fire, but the barrages did little but churn up dirt and accidentally hit civilians. The Jewish state, from a Palestinian perspective, seemed helpless.

Israel's impotence was the product of several factors, firstly Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's reluctance to reoccupy Gaza so soon after evacuating it. Then came Mr. Sharon's stroke and the Israeli elections, during which, traditionally, Israel refrains from staging large-scale operations. Finally, Ehud Olmert succeeded in cobbling together a left-of-center coalition that pledged to proceed with the unilateral disengagement from the territories (or, as it is now called, convergence), but largely abandoned Mr. Sharon's hard-hitting antiterror tactics.

Though himself a resident of Sderot, Minister of Defense Amir Peretz, a Laborite and advocate of renewed talks with the Palestinians, vowed to exercise maximum restraint and to "count the shells" that the Israel Defense Forces fired into Gaza. Indeed, when Qassams were smashing into Sderot last week and Mr. Peretz's neighbors were on a hunger strike in front of his house, the defense minister was in Jerusalem stumping for his candidates in the Jewish Agency elections.

Israel's inaction has provided a bonanza to Hamas. By demonstrating that disengagement impaired rather than enhanced Israeli security, Hamas has dissuaded many Israelis from supporting a similar withdrawal from the West Bank, from where Qassams could be launched at Tel Aviv and the Ben-Gurion airport. By firing the rockets from densely populated neighborhoods, the Palestinians have forced Israel to kill and wound civilian bystanders, sullying its reputation abroad. Indeed, many world leaders and virtually all of the press hastened to condemn Israel for allegedly firing a shell onto a Gaza beach that killed eight Palestinians. That the IDF denied firing the shell and that the Palestinians destroyed exculpatory evidence by gouging shrapnel from the victims' limbs could not repair the damage to Israel's image.

Collateral damage not only hurts Israel's international standing, it also divides the country internally. Many Israelis grieve over the deaths of innocent Palestinians, even those incurred in successful strikes against terrorists. Israel's Supreme Court is now considering two lawsuits against the IDF, both filed by Israelis, for the unintentional deaths of 15 civilians while killing Hamas commander Selah Shahada in 2002.

The deaths of more than a dozen Palestinian civilians by Israeli fire in the last few weeks has further widened these schisms, pinning the government between the leftists who denounce its callousness and the generals who disdain its sheepishness. An Israeli raid into Gaza will almost certainly result in a frightful number of civilian deaths. The press will once again focus on funerals and mourning families and forget the reason for Israel's action. Israelis will once again agonize over whether these casualties were justified or avoidable.

Palestinians will not be the only ones killed. Hundreds of Qassams fell on Sderot but it took the deaths of two soldiers and the kidnapping of a third to move the government to consider major military action. Soldiers are Israel's Everyman -- or rather Everychild -- and Israelis are acutely sensitive to their safety. Yet in retaliating for the rocket attacks and trying to free the hostage, the IDF will almost certainly suffer casualties.

After a few days of heated battles and accusations of Israeli atrocities, the government will be compelled to extract its forces from Gaza, but not all the soldiers will be going home. And the rockets will keep raining on Sderot. Posing as defenders of the land, Hamas will be made more, not less, popular by the Israeli attack, and Abu Mazen will be commensurately weakened. Mr. Olmert will be unable to proceed on convergence and the Israeli right will begin its inexorable return to office.

There is, however, one way to avert a public relations disaster for Israel, to limit casualties, and to restore Israel's deterrence power: Israel must return to the targeted-killing policy that enabled Mr. Sharon to triumph over terrorist organizations. Israel must target those Palestinians who order others to fire rockets from within civilian areas but whose families are located safely away from the firing zones. No Hamas or Islamic Jihad leader should be immune from such reprisals -- neither Prime Minister Ismail Haniya nor Khaled Meshal, who masterminds Hamas from Damascus. Though there is certain to be some international backlash, the damage to Israel's image will likely be temporary. Who today remembers Abdel Aziz Ranitisi and Sheikh Yassin? Those responsible for causing injury and death to both Israelis and Palestinians must pay the ultimate price. Only then can quiet be restored to Israel's borders and progress toward either unilateral or negotiated solutions resumed.

Iran's Leader Sends Mixed Signals On Nuclear Talks (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

TEHRAN, June 27 — Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei said today that Iran had "no use" to negotiate with the United States. But in a more positive gesture he said that the "the ground was prepared" for talks over Iran's nuclear program.

"Negotiation with the United States has no benefits for us," he said in a meeting with Senegal's President Abdoulaye Wade, the ISNA student news agency reported.

The United States had offered to enter talks with Iran if its leaders agreed to halt the country's nuclear enrichment program. Iran had agreed to negotiate with the Untied States in Iraq to help bring security and Mr. Khamenei had backed those talks publicly. However, those talks never took place.

The United States severed diplomatic ties with Iran in November 1979 when hard-line students attacked the United States embassy in Tehran and took 54 of its diplomats hostage for 444 days.

This is the first that Mr. Khamenei has reacted to the idea of direct talks with the United States since a package of incentives was submitted to Iran on June 6. The package was drafted by Germany and the five permanent members of United Nations Security Council, the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China to convince Iran to end the stand-off over its nuclear program.

Mr. Khamenei also said, "We will not negotiate over our undeniable right of using nuclear technology with anyone. But if they recognize our right, we are willing to negotiate over controls, inspections and international guarantees. The ground for such negotiations has been prepared."

Mr. Khamenei said that Iran's resistance has led to scientific development in the country and Iran's access to nuclear technology is an example of this progress.

In Washington, the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, said he did not consider Mr. Khamenei's comments to be a snub and pointed that various leaders in Iran had offered different reactions to the incentive plan. "At this point, we've heard varying responses from different quarters," he said. "And as a matter of fact, if you take a look at the Ayatollah's remarks today, they are ambiguous."

In a major shift of policy, Mr. Khamenei created a new foreign policy committee on Sunday and appointed former Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi, a moderate politician, to head the committee for five years. The committee has four other members, who are all moderate former ministers.

Mr. Khamenei said in his decree that the committee's mission was to "help major decision-making and search for horizons in Iran's foreign policy," the daily Shargh reported.

Rashid Jalali, a member of Parliament said that one of the major responsibilities of the committee is to give its analysis to the leader about Iran's nuclear policy, the daily Etemad Melli quoted him as saying.

The semi-official Fars News Agency reported that President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is scheduled to visit Iraq in near future and hold talks with Iraqi President Jalal Talibani. This would be the first visit by an Iranian president to Iraq.

Ibrahim Jaffari, Iraq's former prime minister, arrived in Tehran on Sunday, Jomhouri Eslami daily reported on Tuesday. He is expected to meet with senior officials.

Abdul Aziz Hakim, the leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, who had urged Iran and the United States to hold talks over Iraq, also visited Tehran last week.

Iranian Leader: U.S. Nuke Talks Not Needed (AP)

By Nasser Karimi, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 28, 2006

Supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei said Tuesday that Iran does not need negotiations with the United States over its nuclear program, apparently seeking to reassure hard-liners the country will not cave in as it considers a key Western incentives package.

Khamenei, who has the final word on all state matters, did not give his position on the proposals aimed at persuading Iran to impose a long-term moratorium on enriching uranium.

In Washington, White House press secretary Tony Snow said Khamenei's remarks were "ambiguous" and that the Bush administration has heard varying responses from different quarters in Iran. He said Washington expects a formal response from Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, to European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana.

"We're waiting for a consistent, official response," Snow said.

DOJ_NMG_0037349

Iran received the proposals June 6, and President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has said the government will not respond officially until at least mid-August. The United States and Europe are pressing for a quicker reply.

The long period of deliberations suggests internal divisions within Iran's leadership over the proposals, which entail major concessions from Washington and a difficult compromise by Tehran.

At United Nations headquarters in New York, Secretary-General Kofi Annan urged Iran's foreign minister to speed up Tehran's response. Annan met Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki for the second time in less than a week to discuss the nuclear negotiations.

The United States has said it would join direct talks with Iran, which is being asked to suspend uranium enrichment — a program it has vowed to pursue and never give up completely. Enrichment is a process that can produce fuel for nuclear generators or the material for nuclear warheads.

The United States and its allies suspect that Iran's nuclear enrichment activities are a cover for a weapons program. Iran insists its nuclear program is limited to peaceful energy uses.

Hard-liners in Iran's clerical-run leadership have called on the government to reject the proposals and have painted any agreement to talks with Washington as a surrender.

Khamenei's remarks could be aimed at assuaging their fears by showing that talks with the United States are not a major lure for the government and that negotiations with the West will not mean giving up enrichment.

"Negotiations with the United States would have no benefit for us, and we do not need them," state television quoted Khamenei as telling visiting Senegalese President Abdoulaye Wade.

He said Iran was willing to hold talks on its own terms, warning that the West can misuse the negotiating process to bar Tehran from what it considers its right to pursue enrichment.

"We do not negotiate with anybody on achieving and exploiting nuclear technology," Khamenei said. "But if they recognize our nuclear rights, we are ready to negotiate about controls, supervisions and international guarantees."

Earlier this year, Khamenei supported negotiations with Washington over stabilizing neighboring Iraq. In doing so, he overruled hard-liner opposition, though the prospects of U.S.-Iranian talks on Iraq have fallen apart since then.

If Iran accepts the incentives package, the United States has offered to join European nations in multilateral talks with Tehran over a framework that will guarantee its nuclear program cannot produce weapons.

The package also offers the lifting of some U.S. sanctions and other economic incentives, as well as a promise of American and European nuclear technology for Iran.

Washington's offer to join talks was seen as a major concession since the United States lists Iran as a sponsor of international terrorism and there have been no diplomatic relations between the two countries since 1979, when militants stormed the U.S. Embassy in Tehran and took Americans hostage for 444 days.

President Bush has warned Iran that it faces U.N. Security Council action unless it accepts the incentives. German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier warned Iran on Saturday that it faces isolation if it rejects the package.

Iran Builds Support For Right To Nuclear Power (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

VIENNA — The elaborately stuccoed grand hall of the Palais Eschenbach often plays host to nobility and businessmen, concerts and Christmas parties, but last week it was the unlikely forum for a key Iranian official, who came to make the case for Tehran's right to nuclear technology.

At the evening talk, frequently interrupted by applause, Iran's deputy nuclear negotiator asserted that his country's intentions were purely peaceful.

"Today, the power of Iran in the region has put us in the position to help with the security and the stability of the region. If we go after nuclear weapons, this would lead other countries in the region also to go after nuclear weapons," said Javad Vaeidi, who also is a member of Iran's Supreme National Security Council.

"That would be neither in the interest of Iran, nor in the interest of the countries of the region."

Vaeidi's visit was one of dozens around the globe in recent weeks by Iranian officials. High-ranking officials have touched down in Algeria, Tunisia, Yemen, China, Spain and Italy.

In Cairo, one such visit was the highest-level official contact between Egypt and Iran in more than two decades, Middle Eastern diplomats said. There were quiet discussions with Turkey and Saudi Arabia and highly visible ones in Malaysia, which played host to a meeting of the 116 member governments that make up the nonaligned movement.

DOJ_NMG_0037350

The travels are part of an extensive international lobbying campaign to build support for Iran's position in talks over the future of its nuclear program. Western countries believe Iran seeks the capability to make a nuclear bomb, whereas Tehran says it wants nuclear technology for peaceful purposes only.

The United States and the other four permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, joined by Germany, have made Iran an offer under which it would receive economic and technological benefits in return for halting sensitive nuclear work. A key aspect of the offer is that the United States would join in face-to-face negotiations — the first in 27 years with Iran.

Iranian leaders have given themselves until the end of August to formally respond to the offer. It is already clear, however, that Iran will fight hard to retain the right to at least some nuclear-related activities rather than agree to completely end its research and development of nuclear technology.

Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, signaled Tuesday that Tehran was cool to the deal in its current form.

"Negotiations with the United States are of no use to us…. We will not negotiate with anyone over the undeniable right of nuclear technology and using it," he said.

Khamenei, however, did not close the door to a deal, adding, "If they recognize this right, we are ready to negotiate over supervision controls."

The Iranian diplomacy has had some successes. In Malaysia, Iran persuaded the conference of nonaligned nations to make a strong statement in support of Tehran's right to pursue the nuclear fuel cycle.

Since then, Iranian diplomats "have been making the rounds," said a U.S. diplomat who has closely followed the negotiations with Iran. "It appears to be a very labor intensive, diplomatic offensive." The diplomat, like others interviewed for this report, spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the talks.

A European diplomat who works on the Iran issue agreed that the statement from the nonaligned nations was "very bad" for the position held by the U.S. and the European Union.

In order to make Tehran's case as strong as possible, Iranian officials are seeking broad international support, especially from outside the West, said diplomats and experts.

Ali Ansari, an Iranian who teaches at the University of St. Andrews in Scotland, described the case Iran was making as stronger than the one being made by the Americans and the European Union.

"The way the West has framed the nuclear debate is pretty unjust.

"From the Third World perspective, it looks like the big powers being unjust to the little powers, saying, 'We can have it, but you can't,' " he said.

The diplomacy is also an attempt to show that Iran has many friends despite Western powers' efforts to rally international support against Tehran.

"The Iranians are anxious to show they are not isolated," Ansari said.

Vaeidi's visit to Austria underscored that. Although they are often believed to share the U.S. wariness of Iran's intentions, European countries diverge considerably in their views of Iran.

Austria, for instance, identifies itself as a neutral country and has long reached out to the Middle East; OPEC has its headquarters in Vienna, and the conservative Freedom Party, which played host to Vaeidi, has had a warm relationship with Middle East powers. And Austrian support for American policy is among the lowest in the European Union.

For different reasons, Italy and Spain are open to listening to Iran. Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki visited Italy this month and traveled to Spain a few days later.

Italian officials have made no secret they are irritated about being left out of negotiations involving the United States, the European Union and Russia regarding Iran. Britain, France and Germany have been the three European Union countries at the table.

Italy wants to either be part of the negotiations or have the talks take place in a forum to which it has access.

"The Iranians go there and say the EU is not the right forum to discuss this," said a European diplomat from one of the countries involved in the negotiations. "And the Italians agree with them."

In the Middle East, Iranian officials are trying to use the nuclear talks as a vehicle for asserting themselves as the preeminent regional power.

"Iran realizes that a threshold has been crossed — the U.S. is willing to come to the table, so it is going around to countries like Egypt and saying, 'Look we brought the U.S. to the table,' " said a senior Middle Eastern diplomat. "Now, of course, other countries in the region have relations with the U.S. too, but Iran is trying to assert itself in a special way."

Most other countries in the region are largely Sunni Muslim, and their leaders are uncomfortable with the untrammeled growth of Iran, whose population is heavily Shiite Muslim. But they also like the idea of Iran standing up to the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0037351

After recent discussions in Egypt with the Arab League and the Egyptian foreign minister, Iran's top national security official, Ali Larijani, urged all Muslim countries to pursue nuclear technology, but his message was primarily directed to Egypt and Saudi Arabia, the other two Arab regional powerhouses.

"The nuclear issue affects the future of all Muslim countries," Larijani said. Speaking to reporters, he called on Muslim countries to "choose the path" of nuclear development.

Iranian Minister: WMD Outlawed In Islam (AP)

AP, June 28, 2006

An Iranian minister told Indonesia's vice president Tuesday that his country has no plans to develop nuclear weapons because Islamic law outlaws the development of weapons of mass destruction.

Mohammad Mehdi Zahedi, Iran's minister of science, research and technology said that based on the Islamic principle, Iran must take advantage of all its potential resources including nuclear technology for the prosperity of its people.

Zahedi called on Western countries not to try and prevent developing nations from producing their own nuclear power when it is designed for peaceful purposes.

"Islamic doctrine does not allow us to produce mass destruction weapons or nuclear ones and the Iranian state is based on that principle," Zahedi told a news conference after meeting with Indonesian Vice President Jusuf Kalla.

He questioned why countries that have developed or used nuclear weapons continue to oppose Iran's nuclear research and development.

He called on developing countries to fight hand in hand against what he called "scientific apartheid."

"I would like to say that the usage of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes is the right of every nation. And we, as a sovereign nation, do not allow other nations to interfere our domestic affairs," he said.

The United States and some European countries have accused Iran of seeking to develop nuclear weapons, and have offered a package of incentives for Iran to give up uranium enrichment and resume negotiations over its nuclear ambitions.

Senator Says North Korean Missile Firing May Not Be Imminent (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 27 — The chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee said Tuesday that while North Korea showed clear signs of preparing a missile for a test launching, it remained uncertain whether it was fully fueled for an imminent firing.

The chairman, Senator John W. Warner, a Virginia Republican, spoke on Capitol Hill after committee members received a closed-door briefing from officials of the Missile Defense Agency, the Defense Intelligence Agency and the defense secretary's office.

The briefing came as American officials said Chinese and South Korean diplomats were putting pressure on North Korea not to launch the missile. But the Americans said they had gotten little indication about what the North Koreans may have said in response.

At the White House on Tuesday, Tony Snow, the president's spokesman, said the Chinese and South Koreans "can assert considerable influence."

"What we are hoping," Mr. Snow said, "is real simple — that they will use it constructively to say to the North Koreans: 'Come on, you don't want to do this. Let's abide by your moratorium. Come back to the six-party talks.' " He added that North Korea had "a lot to gain by coming back to the table."

American intelligence officials say they believe that the missile is a Taepodong 2 and that a three-stage version could strike the United States. One administration official said the missile at the launching pad was a two-stage version.

Details like that have not been clearly spelled out, either because administration officials are uncertain of the facts or because the details are classified. Several officials would discuss recent intelligence reports on the situation only on condition of anonymity, because the situation is diplomatically delicate and the intelligence is secret.

The New York Times reported Monday that North Korea appeared to some officials to have completed fueling the missile, citing American officials who warned that the move greatly increased the probability that the North would go ahead with its first important test launching in eight years.

A senior American official said Sunday that data from satellite photographs suggested that booster rockets had been loaded onto a launching pad, and liquid-fuel tanks fitted to the missile at a site on North Korea's remote east coast.

Roughly 10 days ago, American intelligence agencies reported to the administration that fueling trucks had been spotted around the missile.

DOJ_NMG_0037352

On Monday and Tuesday, two officials said the intelligence could, at best, be interpreted as offering only a prudent assumption that the missile was fueled, and that intelligence analysts had described an already fueled missile as a worst-case scenario.

"It is impossible to know for certain whether or how much fuel is moving between a closed container through a closed line to another closed container," one official said.

Citing intelligence gathered by "overhead systems" photographing the missile, Senator Warner said, "We are not certain if it's fueled."

He also said the surveillance images indicated that "certain infrastructure" remained around the missile and would have to be removed in advance of a launching.

"They could be launching a satellite, a weather satellite or any type of satellite that might be launched by this system," Mr. Warner said. But he said the United States must "prepare for the possibility of a hostile strike," though he termed it a "probably remote possibility."

China Urged To Dissuade N. Korea From Test (AP)

By Gillian Wong

AP, June 28, 2006

South Korea's foreign minister urged China to use its influence to dissuade North Korea from testing a long-range missile, but Western diplomats on Tuesday questioned Beijing's influence over the reclusive communist state.

South Korea's Ban Ki-moon and Chinese counterpart Li Zhaoxing met for about an hour, discussing strategies to sway Pyongyang not to test-launch a missile and to resume six-nation talks on its nuclear weapons program.

"We should focus efforts on dissuading North Korea from test-firing a missile," Li said.

Ban urged China to persuade North Korea not to test the missile, the South's Yonhap news agency reported, citing South Korea Foreign Ministry official Lee Hyuck, who attended Tuesday's talks.

Recent intelligence reports have said North Korea may be fueling a Taepodong-2, one of its most advanced missiles, at a launch site on the country's northeastern coast. A U.S. government estimate puts the range of the Taepodong-2 missile at between 5,000 and 7,500 miles, making it capable of reaching the United States.

President Bush has said a test launch by North Korea would be considered "provocative," and he urged the nation to heed warnings by China and others not to conduct the test.

The flagship of the U.S. Navy's Pacific fleet arrived in Shanghai on Tuesday for a visit that reflects warming ties between the American and Chinese militaries. Although the visit of the USS Blue Ridge was planned long before reports about North Korea's apparent missile test, Capt. Jeffrey S. Bartkoski said it showed the "importance of regional cooperation" to promote "peace and security."

China, a key provider of aid to impoverished North Korea, is believed to be the only country that has considerable leverage with the hard-line regime of Kim Jong Il. But since the crisis over North Korea's nuclear programs emerged in late 2002, China has largely refrained from threats to halt the fuel and food deliveries and bank credits that sustain its neighbor.

Six-nation talks aimed at ridding the North of its nuclear weapons program stalled in November over a dispute surrounding U.S. financial restrictions on the North.

In Beijing, Western diplomats said China had not sent a special envoy to Pyongyang or otherwise intensified its diplomacy over the missile threat. The diplomats spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

China's Li told Ban that getting North Korea back to talks on its nuclear weapons ambitions was a top priority and that efforts should be focused on ensuring Pyongyang avoids firing a missile. Li said Beijing had discussed the reported missile test plans with Pyongyang, Yonhap said without elaborating.

Ban left Beijing Tuesday evening.

North Korea has not completed the steps needed for testing a long-range missile, a leading senator said Tuesday after a private briefing from Defense Department officials.

"There are certain steps that would have to be taken if it were imminently to be launched. And those steps, as yet, have not taken place," said Sen. John Warner (news, bio, voting record), chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

Warner said North Korea would have to "remove certain infrastructure" before a missile could be launched, though he did not specify what he meant. Satellites would detect those steps, he said.

The remarks by Warner seemed to raise more doubts than other U.S. officials have so far expressed. Last week U.S. officials said the missile was apparently fully assembled and fueled, though they later said it was unclear how ready the North Koreans actually were.

Meanwhile, North Korea said Tuesday the United States was to blame for a "new nuclear arms race."

DOJ_NMG_0037353

"The U.S. is the principal criminal of the present nuclear arms race, the very one who harasses world peace and security," the North's main newspaper Rodong Sinmun said in a commentary, according to the official Korea Central News Agency.

"The U.S. should give up its wild ambition for nukes, mindful that its nuke modernization and space militarization will be a grave crime of disturbing world peace and security."

Japan's Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi headed Tuesday to the United States for talks with Bush that will include the North Korean missile issue.

The North shocked the world in 1998 by firing a missile that flew over northern Japan and into the Pacific Ocean. It has been under a self-imposed moratorium on long-range missile tests since 1999 but since has test-fired many short-range missiles.

The Washington-based Institute for Science and International Security estimated in a report Monday that North Korea has enough separated plutonium to develop an arsenal of up to 13 nuclear weapons, compared with estimates of one or two nuclear weapons in 2000.

The group says that by 2008, North Korea could have enough plutonium for 17 atomic bombs. It also said North Korea was currently unlikely to be capable of making a nuclear warhead light enough for the Taepodong-2 missile.

The group's assessment was based on an analysis of satellite imagery, media reports and statements by North Korean officials.

US Warns North Korea Against Talks 'Bluff' (AFP-Y2)

AFP, June 27, 2006

The United States warned North Korea against thinking it could use worries over a possible long-range missile to force the United States into direct talks.

"If it's a bluff for direct negotiations, it's not an advisable way to do it," White House spokesman Tony Snow told a press briefing.

Reports that North Korea is about to fire a missile from a sight on the remote northeast coast of the reclusive Stalinist state have caused international concern.

President George W. Bush on Monday urged the North Korean government to disclose its plans.

"The North Koreans should notify the world of their intentions, what they have on top of that vehicle and, you know, what are their intentions," said Bush.

"We have not heard from the North Koreans, so I can't tell you what their intentions are," he told reporters. "That's part of the problem."

US and Asian officials have said North Korea has prepared a Taepodong-2 missile for launch, amid a parallel standoff over the communist state's nuclear program.

North Korea has boycotted talks since November with five other nations, including the United States, over its nuclear weapons programme.

It has regularly demanded direct talks with the United States. The two sides have never formally ended hostilities since the 1950-53 Korean War, which has bedevilled relations ever since.

A prominent lawmaker in Bush's Republican party meanwhile said the White House had ruled out a preemptive strike to knock out North Korea's Taepodong missiles.

"I think that the administration has pretty well put (that) to rest, and I concur with the administration," Senator John Warner said after a closed-door briefing with top Pentagon officials.

"A preemptive strike at this point in time would not be a wise course of action," he said.

Warner, the Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, nevertheless said "prudent steps are being taken by our government to protect us in the ... probably remote possibility that this is a hostile launch."

House Vote Lifts India Nuclear Deal Hopes (FT)

By Caroline Daniel And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, June 28, 2006

The Bush administration scored a key victory in securing congressional support for its historic agreement to allow civil nuclear co-operation with India when the House foreign relations committee voted 37 to five on Tuesday to allow it to proceed with legislation.

The vote came after months of negotiations between administration officials and legislators. The agreement had triggered fears that it could undermine the nuclear non-proliferation pact and had caused discontent that Congress had been side-stepped in the way that Bush officials chose to negotiate the deal with India.

DOJ_NMG_0037354

Supporters of the civil nuclear agreement, which has become the symbol of closer strategic ties with India, quickly hailed the strong bipartisan vote during the mark-up hearings in the House and sought to build momentum to put pressure on the Senate, where the bill is expected to face more obstacles during a similar hearing on Wednesday in the Senate foreign relations committee.

Ron Somers, president of the US-India Business Council, said: "This was a tremendous, bipartisan step forward. The vote is a positive step towards a deepening partnership with India . . . US industry is delighted at the outcome."

The agreement would allow US nuclear exports to India for the first time in 30 years in return for India separating its military and civilian nuclear facilities. Congress must pass legislation to change the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 to exempt India from US laws that prohibit providing nuclear technology to countries that have not signed the nuclear nonproliferation treaty.

Administration officials had been concerned that Congress would impose new amendments, such as forcing New Delhi to impose a moratorium on fissile material production, that had threatened to derail the whole deal.

However, that amendment was overwhelmingly defeated.

Although the initial bill expanded from the two-page version submitted by the Bush administration to 30 pages, one aide closely involved in talks, said: "In the operative language of the legislation there were no new conditions added. That's the big story.

"The vote exceeded my expectations."

Some of the language in the bill was, however, rewritten to become more specific, addressing in particular concerns about Congress's role in overseeing the final terms of the agreement with India and the agreement that India strikes with the International Atomic Energy Agency on safeguards on its civilian facilities. "What was added was more reporting requirements [to Congress], such as agreeing to an affirmative vote on the bilateral agreement, the so-called Lantos compromise [a reference to congressman Tom Lantos]," said the aide.

Nevertheless, another congressional aide said lawmakers added some non-legally binding language calling on India to work with the US to deter Iran from pursuing nuclear weapons, which could by exploited the opposition parties in India concerned that India is aligning itself too closely with the US.

Mr Somers predicted that the bill would go to the House for a formal vote in July.

"We hope for the same speedy mark-up in the Senate, without any complications. There are challenges ahead, but this is one step in the ladder, and a very important one."

While the Senate may approve the deal, many observers believe the final stamp of approval will not come before November's elections.

It also still requires approval from the 45-member Nuclear Suppliers Group.

India Nuclear Bill Receives Support (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In a foreign-policy victory for the Bush administration, the House International Relations Committee approved its initiative to share nuclear technologies with India.

The legislation passed by the House panel specifically exempts India from U.S. laws that restrict nuclear trade with countries that haven't submitted to full nuclear inspections. The 37-5 vote was viewed by Democrats and Republicans as a positive indication that the White House's Indian initiative will win support from the full Congress this fall.

India hasn't signed the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and has been sanctioned by Washington in the past for its pursuit of nuclear weapons.

"The measure is an important step in transforming the strategic alliance of two of the oldest and largest democracies, while strengthening international security," said Rep. Henry Hyde (R., Ill.), chairman of the House International Relations Committee. "While the world has known that India possesses nuclear weapons, India has not had a seat at the table of nuclear stakeholders."

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee is scheduled to vote on a similar Indian bill today, and it is expected to pass.

President Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh agreed in March to build a broader strategic relationship between the U.S. and India, with nuclear power being one of the linchpins. Under the terms of the deal, India is required to separate its civilian and military nuclear programs and submit to extensive monitoring of its 14 civilian nuclear power plants by the International Atomic Energy Agency. The U.S. and India must still finalize an agreement detailing the scope and duration of their nuclear energy cooperation agreement.

Republican and Democratic lawmakers expressed initial concerns that the White House hadn't consulted Congress before agreeing to the initiative with New Delhi. The bill that passed the House International Relations Committee yesterday would require the White House to obtain new congressional approval after an agreement on details of the nuclear energy deal with India.

President Bush has made better relations with India a cornerstone of his foreign-policy agenda. The South Asian country is seen as a bulwark against Islamic extremism and China's economic and military might in Asia. And Mr. Bush has heralded India's role as the world's largest democracy by population.

Supporters of the bill said the move by the House International Relations Committee could herald a new age of strategic cooperation between India and the U.S. and provide important opportunities for U.S. businesses. Companies such as General Electric Co., Boeing Co. and Ford Motor Co. are among firms that could benefit from closer U.S.-India relations.

"I think India could end up being the most important foreign policy initiative of the Bush administration," said Ron Somers, president of the U.S.-India Business Council.

The State Department welcomed the House committee's vote.

Nuclear Proposal For India Endorsed (WT/AP)

By Foster Klug, Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

A House panel endorsed a Bush administration plan yesterday to share civilian nuclear technology with India, a first step toward approval of the unprecedented deal between the two countries.

Supporters called it a defining moment in U.S. relations with India, which is emerging as a pivotal Asian ally and economic partner.

A Republican lawmaker, however, said the deal "knifed" the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty designed to limit the spread of nuclear technology, and called it a sad day for efforts to stop the spread of nuclear weapons.

The 37-5 vote in the House International Relations Committee was for legislation to exempt India from U.S. laws that restrict nuclear trade with countries that have not submitted to full nuclear inspections. India developed its nuclear weapons program outside the treaty, which it has refused to sign.

Under the deal, India would allow international inspections and safeguards to 14 nuclear reactors it has designated as civilian; India's eight military facilities would remain off-limits. In return, the U.S. would agree to ship nuclear technology and fuel to India.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee is to consider separate legislation on the deal tomorrow.

Rep. Jim Leach, Iowa Republican, said passage of the Bush administration plan would open the door to a host of countries to press claims for similar nuclear cooperation, including South Korea, Japan, Iran and North Korea.

The nuclear treaty "has been knifed by an executive action," Mr. Leach said. "Anyone who wants to present this as a happy day is making a very serious mistake."

The House measure was based on a bill proposed by the Bush administration. Rep. Henry J. Hyde, Illinois Republican, the committee chairman, said the earlier bill was "profoundly unsatisfactory" because it removed Congress' oversight role.

While the agreement announced March 2 by President Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh determined a crucial part of the plan -- separating India's civilian and military nuclear facilities -- the two countries still must negotiate conditions, duration and scope of the overall cooperation plan.

Mr. Hyde and Rep. Tom Lantos of California, the committee's top Democrat and a supporter of the plan, said yesterday's legislation would strengthen Congress' role by having lawmakers vote only after they had seen a final version of the cooperation plan with India.

"I would caution the administration to pay close attention to congressional concerns," Mr. Hyde said.

Critics say the plan could boost India's nuclear arsenal. Extra nuclear fuel that the deal would provide, they say, could free up India's domestic uranium for use in its weapons program -- a violation of the treaty.

US Congress Committee Backs Nuclear Deal With India (AFP-Y2)

AFP, June 27, 2006

A controversial civilian nuclear energy deal between India and the United States cleared its first major hurdle, easily winning approval by a US Congress committee.

The House of Representatives International Relations Committee voted 37-5 in favor of the agreement.

"This is a defining moment in our relationship with the great nation of India," said Representative Tom Lantos (news, bio, voting record), the panel's top Democrat and a primary sponsor of the bill.

DOJ_NMG_0037356

"After decades of disengagement punctuated with hostility, we now have the opportunity to achieve what will be a historic geostrategic realignment of the worlds largest democracy, India, with the worlds oldest democracy, the United States," Lantos told lawmakers in arguing for the legislation.

Democratic and Republican leaders in both Houses of Congress have expressed strong support for the bill, which is due for a vote in the full House next month.

"In terms of the impact of this legislation on the new geostrategic alignment between India and the United States for the balance of the 21st century, the importance of this legislation cannot be overstated," Lantos said of the deal forged last year between US President George W. Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee is expected to take up the legislation next week.

Despite the easy approval, the bill has not been without controversy.

Some lawmakers have expressed doubts about extending civil nuclear technology to India, which is not a member of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT).

Republican representative Jim Leach (news, bio, voting record), lamented what he said was "a sad day in the world of arms control and the rule of law."

"Anyone who wants to present this as a happy day is making a serious mistake," he said, adding that officially sanctioning India's nuclear program "is a foolish direction to go in."

Under the deal, the United States will aid the development of civil nuclear power in India in return for New Delhi placing its civil nuclear facilities under International Atomic Energy Agency inspections.

The US Atomic Energy Act of 1954 currently prevents the United States from trading nuclear technology with nations that have not signed up to the NPT. It has to be amended for the deal to be effective.

India tested nuclear weapons in 1974 and 1998 and is currently banned by the United States and other major powers from buying fuel for atomic reactors and other related equipment as a result.

Still, some legislators opposed to the deal say it would not only make it harder to enforce rules against nuclear renegades Iran and North Korea, but also set a dangerous precedent for other countries with nuclear ambitions.

"We intend to make the case that the purported benefits of this deal are an illusion, and the risks to the international nuclear nonproliferation regime are quite real," said Democratic Representative Ed Markey, one of the chief opponents to the agreement.

Last week, a group of nonproliferation experts from across the political spectrum wrote to Congress arguing that the nuclear deal would put the United States in violation of the NPT by assisting a non-nuclear weapon state in its pursuit of nuclear weapons.

But Vice President Dick Cheney last week warned that Congress would risk squandering a critical opportunity if it held up approval of the landmark civilian nuclear deal with India.

Press Celebrates Reception Plans For Koizumi Visit (WT)

By Takehiko Kambayashi

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

TOKYO -- Japan's protocol-conscious press is crowing that Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi will receive a more elaborate welcome than Chinese President Hu Jintao did when he visits Washington today. But Mr. Koizumi and President Bush also have serious matters to discuss, such as Iraq and the prospects of a North Korean long-range missile launch.

The Tokyo government has taken steps to ensure a successful meeting, agreeing last week to reopen its markets to American beef and announcing Monday that it will deploy advanced U.S. Patriot interceptor missiles on Japanese soil.

Mr. Koizumi arrived in Toronto yesterday, on the first leg of his four-day trip. He will tour Niagara Falls and hold talks with Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper in Ottawa today before traveling to Washington.

Japanese analysts expect Mr. Koizumi and Mr. Bush also will discuss the Iranian nuclear standoff, rising instability in Afghanistan and the threat posed by bird flu as the U.S. and Japan seek to highlight their international cooperation before the Group of Eight summit in St. Petersburg next month.

Tokyo, which was shocked when North Korea tested a long-range missile over Japan's main island in 1998, has been closely aligned with Washington in demanding that Pyongyang not fire a Taepodong-2 missile currently sitting on a launchpad near the country's northeastern coast.

Japan's largest newspaper, Yomiuri Shimbun, which reported that U.S. PAC-3 missiles could be installed in Japan by the end of the year, said it was not clear whether they could shoot down a Taepodong-2, which is thought to be capable of reaching parts of the United States. The PAC-3 missiles are designed to intercept ballistic missiles, cruise missiles or enemy aircraft.

DOJ_NMG_0037357

Mr. Koizumi also supports the U.S. policy in Iraq, even though he declared last week that Japan would withdraw its 550 troops engaged in reconstruction and humanitarian work in the Samawah region in that country. He is expected to announce an expansion in operations of the Air Self-Defense Force, which is supporting coalition forces in Iraq.

"It is important to leave a national flag among multinational forces in Iraq," said Toshiyuki Shikata, a law professor at Teikyo University in Tokyo and retired Ground Self-Defense Force general.

Japanese journalists are more focused on the fact that Mr. Koizumi will be treated to a gala White House dinner, a stay at Blair House, a ride aboard Air Force One and a visit to rock legend Elvis Presley's Graceland Mansion in Memphis, Tenn. Mr. Koizumi is a lifelong Elvis fan.

Wary of a rising China, Japanese are sensitive to the contrast with the treatment given to the Chinese president when he visited Washington in April. Mr. Hu "was given only a luncheon" at the White House, noted the conservative daily Sankei Shimbun.

Mr. Shikata said Mr. Koizumi "from the very beginning developed a warm personal relationship with Mr. Bush. They want to display strong bilateral ties, and both of them want to appreciate their close relationship."

He said Yasuhiro Nakasone, prime minister of Japan from 1982 to 1987, also was known for his close relationship with a U.S. president -- Ronald Reagan. But the professor added, "Mr. Koizumi's ties with Mr. Bush are stronger than that."

The Bush administration was particularly grateful for Mr. Koizumi's decision to send troops to Iraq despite strong public opposition and Japan's U.S.-drafted pacifist constitution, Mr. Shikata said.

"A usual Japanese prime minister would have hesitated to do that."

The visit will cap the career of Mr. Koizumi, whose successor will be chosen when the ruling Liberal Democratic Party picks its next president in September. Mr. Koizumi is expected to ask Mr. Bush to give his cooperation to Chief Cabinet Secretary Shinzo Abe, the likely winner.

"Mr. Koizumi does not want to step down with his approval ratings declining. He wants the U.S. president to praise him as a great leader. That is his foremost desire," said Minoru Morita, a prominent Tokyo-based political analyst.

Koizumi Visit Presents A Tougher Japan (CSM)

By Robert Marquand

The Christian Science Monitor, June 28, 2006

TOKYO

Junichiro Koizumi, the silver-maned lion of Japanese politics, is on his last official US visit. Japan's prime minister will step down in September after six years at the helm.

As he visits his No. 1 ally, Mr. Koizumi's legacy as an upstart reformer seems assured back home: He busted up the old power-shogun cliques that ran Japan. He altered the nation's pacifist image, and self-image, by sending troops to Iraq; 100 Japanese planes will provide Iraq air support next month.

The US-Japan military and maritime alliance is melding more tightly - including Patriot missile deployments against North Korea - even as US forces and bases in Okinawa are being downsized and mothballed.

Yet Koizumi's tenure has brought an often troubling new nationalist spirit - seen in his multiple trips to the Yasukuni war shrine in Tokyo and new forms of right-wing racist rhetoric - that angers China and South Korea, nations the White House wants to work with and not alienate.

Currently, neither South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun or President Hu Jintao of China have plans to meet Koizumi before he departs from office.

"The shrine visits are not in the US interest, and as the US-Japan alliance gets stronger, the US should discourage them," says Ezra Vogel, a senior Asia expert at Harvard University. "We need to tell Japan, as a friend, that the way it handles the shrine makes the US job in the region more difficult. We can say that if Japan wants to promote friendship in east Asia, this is not the way to do it."

It is considered axiomatic in Japanese relations that overt or highly public commentary about domestic behavior by foreign politicians can scupper efforts to influence Tokyo.

Yet there is some US fallout over Koizumi's decision not to foreclose an Aug. 15 shrine visit. Instead of an earlier possibility to have Koizumi address Congress, he will join President Bush on a trip to Graceland, home of Elvis Presley, on Air Force One. The Bush-Koizumi relationship is regarded as very close, perhaps rivaled only by the mutuality between Bush and Tony Blair.

Japanese officials are eager to point out they engage in many kinds of dialogue and exchanges with East Asian nations. They have energy talks, cultural exchanges, and many levels of diplomacy; Japan has been a leader in distributing aid in Asia. It is unfair to simply boil relations down to the shrine, they say.

DOJ_NMG_0037358

"There are many voices and points of view in Japan, and I think the general trend of Japan's relations with neighbors is upward," says Foreign Ministry press secretary Yoshinori Katori.

But in East Asian capitals, Koizumi's shrine visits are widely seen as a provocative denial of World War II Japanese aggression; a high court in Tokyo in recent days refused to say whether the visits were an unconstitutional abridgement of church and state. The issue will reach another peak this summer if Koizumi visits Yasukuni on Aug. 15, the day Japan surrendered in World War II.

Under the rules of the Liberal Democratic Party (LDP), Koizumi is not eligible for another term. Having won a landslide victory in one of Japan's most colorful elections ever last September, the prime minister nonetheless said he would step down.

Yet he leaves a political climate that has moved so far to the right that the leading successor in the party is Cabinet Secretary Shinzo Abe, whose grandfather was a Cabinet member during World War II and who belongs to a new breed of unapologetic patriots who have openly described China as a "threat."

In recent months, the jockeying has taken an unexpected turn, however. Moderate candidate Yasuo Fukuda is making a run, at least in LDP party circle discussions.

Citing a need for better relations with huge trading partner China, business leaders as well support Mr. Fukuda, a former cabinet secretary. In a recent survey of 31 business leaders, 15 opted for Fukuda, while 12 gave Abe the nod.

Yet Abe is again picking up in popular polls, helped by an unlikely source. By placing a Taepodong 2 long-range missile in launch position in North Korea, Kim Jong Il has created worry in Japan - which parlays into national security fears and a boost for Abe.

"Kim launched the first Taepodong over Japan in 1998," notes a Western diplomat. "That resulted in the beginning of missile defense and the first close military alliance between Japan and the US. Now his second missile is moving to elect Abe. Kim is aiding the Japanese right-wing. How ironic is that?"

US officials regard Tokyo as their most reliable ally in the Pacific. Yet such status requires maintenance, they say, and careful attention to how the relationship plays with other partners.

South Korean diplomats have felt dismay, if not betrayal, for example, at what appears to be US neutrality on Japan's recent claims over the Dokdo islands off Korea. This spring, Korean and Japanese naval vessels came close to a standoff over Dokdo, which Japan calls Takeshima. Seoul has long felt that the US regarded Dokdo as Korean.

Last week, President Roh weighed Seoul's military ability against Japan's, telling coast guard officers that, "It is true Japan is superior in military power, but we have enough military capability to deter Japan's provocations."

As Koizumi arrives in the US, he is bringing the welcome message that Japan has agreed to lift its ban on US beef imports, put in place five months ago over concerns about mad cow disease. The ban came just a month after a previous two-year ban had been lifted. The issue has caused anger in Congress, puzzlement in ranch states, and frustration at the US Embassy over what have been viewed as subjective claims by Japan regarding US regulation of its beef exports.

Then there are new US concerns about Japan's revisionism regarding its history with the US. The Yushukan museum, on the grounds of Yasukuni shrine, suggests that the US, not Japan, was responsible for World War II.

"We have our own history issues with Japan," says Mr. Vogel of Harvard. "The fiction that we forced Japan into World War II, things like that, are getting stronger. It is not in Japan's interest to promote these views, and we need to get a fuller discussion about history. We can be balanced and even-handed, and not one-sided, in Asia."

Ex-officials Hit Foreign Aid Cuts (WT)

By Katie Stuhldreher

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

Former Secretaries of State Colin L. Powell and Madeleine K. Albright warned yesterday that proposed funding cuts for international programs could jeopardize national security.

"I have been arguing this case for 30 years," Mrs. Albright said, speaking at a Washington forum hosted by the U.S. Global Leadership Campaign (USGLC). "The question has always been how to sell this. I think we need to change the name from 'foreign aid' to 'national security support,' because when people hear 'national security,' they immediately salute and with good reason."

President Bush requested $35.11 billion -- up from $31.57 billion enacted last year -- to fund U.S. international affairs in fiscal 2007, accounting for 1.2 percent of total government spending.

But the House Appropriations Committee recently cut Mr. Bush's wish list by nearly $3 billion, to $32.28 billion.

The international affairs budget funds a variety of initiatives, including poverty alleviation, HIV/AIDS programs, land mine removal in former conflict areas, and diplomacy, according to USGLC.

DOJ_NMG_0037359

Sen. Thad Cochran, Mississippi Republican and chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, recently announced his plan for cuts as well, which would leave the Senate-approved foreign affairs budget at $32.66 billion.

"This is not the place to cut. You look at the places where Congress is making increases, and you say, 'What are they thinking?' " Mr. Powell said, addressing an auditorium of businessmen and representatives from nongovernmental organizations.

Mr. Powell urged them to "march up to the Hill" to express their concerns over the proposed cuts.

The Senate Appropriations Committee is scheduled to take up the foreign affairs budget tomorrow.

Last month, Sen. Mike DeWine, Ohio Republican; Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat; Sen. Rick Santorum, Pennsylvania Republican; and Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat, sent a letter signed by 52 senators to the Senate Appropriations Committee urging full funding of the requested budget.

"A majority of my colleagues in the Senate agree that it is critical that we continue to fund our U.S. International Affairs Budget. Terrorist networks recruit from the ranks of the millions of hungry, hopeless, and uneducated youth found throughout the developing world," Mrs. Feinstein said.

Supporters of full funding argue that more money spent on international projects would not only increase global security, but also open up business opportunities abroad.

"The world Madeleine and I grew up in was a world of battlefields. But today, I think it's a world of playing fields, with great opportunities. Countries once closed to us, like China and India, are now ready and willing to do business," said Mr. Powell, who was secretary of state from 2001 to 2005, under Mr. Bush.

Mrs. Albright, who served President Clinton from 1997 to 2001, said the proposed budget asks for a small amount of taxpayer money for a very worthy purpose.

"[Warren] Buffet gave that much money away the other day," Mrs. Albright said.

Islamic Militia Accused Of Breaking Truce (AP)

By Salad Duhul

AP, June 27, 2006

Islamic militiamen seized a checkpoint outside Somalia's capital Tuesday in an hourlong battle that killed six people, according to a clan leader who accused the militia of breaking a new cease-fire.

The checkpoint connecting Mogadishu to the Lower Shabelle region was manned by members of the Habar Gidir clan who had been charging motorists to pass. The fighting killed three clan gunmen and three civilians, clan leader Abdi Kaibdid said.

"The Islamists made a surprise attack on my troops overnight," he told The Associated Press.

The militia took control of Mogadishu and most of the rest of southern Somalia this month. It signed an agreement last week to stop all military action and recognize the country's powerless, U.N.-backed interim government. But militia officials subsequently voted to replace their relatively moderate leader, who also had been reaching out to the West, with a radical cleric whom the U.S. accused of links to al-Qaida.

Salad Ali Jelle, deputy information minister for Somalia's interim government, said the militia's attack on the checkpoint was a clear breach of the cease-fire.

"They should withdraw from the post they captured and go back to their original positions," he said. Members of the Islamic militia could not be reached for comment.

Somalia has been without an effective central government since warlords toppled dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991 and then turned on each other, carving much of the country into armed camps ruled by violence and clan law. Many of the capital's residents applauded the Islamic group for forcing the warlords from Mogadishu, despite concerns the militia may try to remake Somalia into a theocracy akin to Afghanistan under the Taliban.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Monday that the United States has no plans to engage with the group's new leader, Sheikh Hassan Dahir Aweys, who is on the U.S. terrorist watch list as a suspected collaborator with al-Qaida.

Aweys, 71, told the AP Monday that he will honor his more moderate predecessor Sheikh Sharif Sheikh Ahmed's agreement to meet with interim government leaders next month. He said he plans to tell them that Islamic rule is the only option for Somalia, which has a constitution that makes no mention of Islam.

Underlining the apparent tougher line under Aweys' leadership, militia leaders said they will publicly stone to death four suspected rapists if they are convicted Thursday in Jowhar, 55 miles from Mogadishu.

Ted Dagne, an Africa specialist at the Congressional Research Service, said it was too soon to characterize Aweys' leadership.

"Let's be cautious and try to see if there is a trend that clearly shows a move to an extremist agenda," Dagne said.

DOJ_NMG_0037360

Washington has long-standing concerns that Somalia will become a refuge for members of bin Laden's terror network, much like Afghanistan did in the late 1990s. The U.S. has accused the Islamic militia of harboring al-Qaida leaders responsible for deadly 1998 bombings at the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. The U.S. backed the warlords in their fight against the Islamic militia.

With Caveats, U.S. Backs Session At U.N. On Curtailing Illegal Arms (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, June 27 — The Bush administration gave its backing on Tuesday to a United Nations conference on curtailing the international flow of illegal arms, but warned delegates against adopting measures that would restrict individual possession of weapons.

"The U.S. Constitution guarantees the rights of our citizens to keep and bear arms, and there will be no infringement of those rights," Robert G. Joseph, under secretary of state for arms control and international security affairs, told the General Assembly. "Many millions of American citizens enjoy hunting and the full range of firearms sports, and our work will not affect their rights," he said.

He also said Washington would object to any steps to establish international regulation of ammunition or to ban governments from selling arms to rebel groups, known in diplomatic jargon as "nonstate actors."

"While we will of course continue to oppose the acquisition of arms by terrorist groups," he said, "we recognize the rights of the oppressed to defend themselves against tyrannical and genocidal regimes and oppose a blanket ban on nonstate actors."

The two-week conference, which began Monday, is intended to improve ways of curbing the $1 billion black market in the manufacture and distribution of small arms and light weapons that supply brutal civil wars and organized crime networks and end up killing an estimated 1,000 people every day worldwide.

Secretary General Kofi Annan reminded the gathering that "these weapons may be small, but they cause mass destruction." He urged member countries to toughen existing laws governing arms deals.

Steps that Mr. Joseph said the United States would support included the marking and tracing of weapons, controls on transfers, certification of the ultimate recipients, effective management of national stockpiles and destruction of illicit and government-declared surplus weapons.

Mr. Annan said the conference was not contemplating a global ban on gun ownership. "Nor do we wish to deny law-abiding citizens their right to bear arms in accordance with their national laws," he said.

He seemed to be referring to a campaign by the National Rifle Association, which has charged in mass mailings that the United Nations is plotting to take away Americans' guns through a treaty banning ownership.

John R. Bolton, the United States ambassador to the United Nations, confirmed that he had received hundreds of the form letters. Asked why all three citizen delegates from the United States to the conference were prominent members of the gun lobby group, he said he made it a practice not to comment on the activities of nongovernmental organizations.

U.S. Rejects Limits On Personal Guns (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

NEW YORK -- The United States will oppose any international effort to limit access of U.S. civilians to legal firearms but supports stronger controls on arms imports and exports, a senior State Department official said yesterday.

"The United States believes it is important for all of us to speak with one voice concerning the grave matter of the international illicit trade in small arms and light weapons," said Robert Joseph, the undersecretary of state for arms control and international security.

Mr. Joseph is heading the U.S. delegation to the small-arms review conference at the United Nations, which continues through next week.

"The U.S. Constitution guarantees the rights of our citizens to keep and bear arms, and there will be no infringement of those rights," Mr. Joseph said. "The United States will not agree to any provisions restricting civilian possession, use or legal trade of firearms inconsistent with our laws and practices."

The international conference has triggered anger among many American gun owners, who have responded to a National Rifle Association campaign suggesting that the United Nations is trying to take their weapons away.

Tens of thousands of letters have poured in to the United Nations from NRA members, prompting reassurances from Secretary-General Kofi Annan and Prasad Kariyawasam, the president of the review conference.

DOJ_NMG_0037361

Mr. Joseph stressed that Washington seeks a "positive" engagement with other governments and supports the implementation of a recent agreement to mark weapons and create a registry to trace their whereabouts. The agreement would also:

·Establish more effective controls on the importing and exporting of weapons.

·Strengthen controls over international brokers.

·Provide for more effective stockpile management of weapons under state control.

·Provide for the destruction of government-declared surplus and illicit weapons.

In an effort to focus on "substance, not process," Mr. Joseph said, Washington would not endorse a third review conference, preferring to discuss "actions that are focused, practical and intended to strengthen" illicit arms-control regimes.

Europeans and others are pressing for a formal agreement on transfer controls, to make sure that weapons are not diverted to conflicts or repressive regimes. The United States has refused to discuss a new treaty relating to arms, but Mr. Joseph said yesterday that Washington will consider voluntary principles.

He also warned other delegations to back away from issues that the Bush administration deems too complex or inappropriate for such international conferences, such as the marking of ammunition.

Russia Oil Tempers U.S. Sway (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Alan Cullison

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

The Bush administration is wrestling with a new challenge from abroad: an often strong-willed Russia made all the more assertive by its energy wealth. As if to drive home that point, Russian President Vladimir Putin delivered a hard-hitting speech yesterday, arguing that Russia's economic renaissance makes it an equal among other global powers.

His comments highlight the dilemma facing Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who arrives in Moscow today hoping to win Russia's support on international issues such as curbing Iran's nuclear ambitions, even as the Bush administration has stepped up criticism of Mr. Putin's policies both at home and toward Russia's nearest neighbors.

President Bush is set for his own visit to Russia next month, when he must face a similar bind. Administration officials concede that Moscow's economic boom is fueling a more independent Russian foreign policy, and that U.S. criticism of Russian policies increasingly falls on deaf ears. Mr. Putin, talking to an annual gathering of top diplomats in Moscow, acknowledged that some countries haven't caught up with Russia's new economic strength. "Not everyone was ready for Russia to restore so quickly its economic health and position in the world arena," he said. "Some see us through the prism of the prejudices of the past ... and see a threat in a strong, reborn Russia."

Bush aides say they worry that Russia's economic clout already is leading Moscow to overplay its hand on the diplomatic front. As examples, they cite Moscow's decision in January to cut off gas supplies briefly to Ukraine, and Mr. Putin's outreach in March to top leaders of Hamas soon after the militant group began to run the Palestinian government.

"They are certainly feeling better about themselves than at any time since the breakup of the Soviet Union," says one senior administration official, adding that Russia's energy wealth "has given them the distinct feeling that they are back as a big-time player." Russia's assertiveness has complicated life for an administration already struggling with falling approval ratings at home and the intractable conflict in Iraq.

The big test of U.S.-Russia relations is Iran. So far, Moscow has supported U.S. and European efforts to forge a united front within the United Nations to get Tehran to give up any pursuit of nuclear weapons. But Moscow has said repeatedly that it doesn't support imposing sanctions or harsher measures if Iran doesn't comply, and Mr. Putin made clear that Russia wasn't ready to give ground on this issue. "I repeat again: We do not intend to join all sorts of ultimatums that can only drive the situation to a dead end," he said.

Administration officials say that Ms. Rice, while in Moscow this week, is unlikely to echo the blunt language that Vice President Dick Cheney used last month in Lithuania, when he accused the Putin government of concentrating power at home while using Russia's vast oil and gas reserves as "tools of intimidation or blackmail." Instead, Ms. Rice may meet privately with several leaders of Russian civil society. Mr. Putin yesterday denounced all criticism of his energy policy as "exclusively political."

President Bush, during his trip in July, may also show some sign of support for greater democracy in Russia, though his advisers are debating what gesture to make. Mr. Cheney's public blast in Lithuania, U.S. officials say, was meant to put down a marker in the lead-up to the Russian-hosted summit of the Group of Eight top industrialized countries in St. Petersburg next month. Russia's stewardship of the G8 this year, at a time when the Putin government clamps down on dissent at home, has embarrassed many in Europe and the U.S.

Mr. Cheney's speech, if anything, only appeared to redouble the Kremlin's defiance of Washington, and aroused an argument in the state-run media that is often expressed: The U.S. is using the rhetoric of democracy as a weapon as it installs unfriendly governments on Russia's borders, and supports opposition groups within Russia itself.

Mr. Cheney delivered his broadside against the Kremlin from Lithuania, and then departed to oil-rich Kazakhstan, where he praised the authoritarian leader as a personal friend. "Where is all this pathos about protecting human rights and democracy when it comes to the need to pursue their own interests?" Mr. Putin asked in his annual state-of-the-nation address a week later.

Bush administration officials insist there is no internal feud over Russia policy per se. The administration wants good relations with Russia, they say, on counterterrorism and energy cooperation, but also won't shy away from pointing out Mr. Putin's democratic lapses. "We believe it's possible to do the criticism and the cooperation at the same time," says one official. To keep some focus on the democracy side, the administration plans to send two State Department officials, including the top U.S. diplomat for Europe, Daniel Fried, to a pro-democracy "alternative summit" four days before the G8 gathering.

Still, U.S. officials acknowledge that dealing with an increasingly cocky and robust Russia has complicated interactions with Moscow and made negotiations within the U.N. Security Council, where Russia holds a veto, more tricky.

When Mr. Bush in June 2001 declared Mr. Putin "a man deeply committed to his country," Russia was still severely in debt and struggling to recover from the chaos of the 1990s. Russians were also far more uncertain of Mr. Putin himself.

Moscow now has the third-largest currency reserves in the world, including a special $70 billion domestic "stabilization fund." The Russian economy is growing at faster than 6% a year, driven mainly by its output of oil and gas. And its OAO Gazprom, now one of the world's largest companies, supplies more than a quarter of all of Europe's gas, and is pushing to become a major future supplier to China and the U.S.

A King Of Roadblocks Works To Clear A Path In Presidential Race (WSJ)

By John Lyons

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- In the no-holds-barred arena of Mexico City politics, the heavyweight is El Grandote.

Dubbed the "Big Guy" by Mexican cops who once charged him with murdering a judge, Alejandro López Villanueva heads a militant squatters' organization of 34,000 families who owe him their homes -- and often their jobs -- and who have become his political soldiers. The 40-year-old Mr. López Villanueva, who wears his dark curly hair at shoulder length, can dispatch 10,000 protesters within two hours to block intersections and snarl traffic, which he does to settle scores and seek benefits for his followers.

These days, Mr. López Villanueva has put his troops at the disposal of the leftist presidential candidate Andres Manuel López Obrador, who has a small lead in most opinion polls in Sunday's national election. Street bosses like Mr. López Villanueva have long been a staple of Mexican politics, but their influence was supposed to fade as the country's democracy matured. Instead, their power has expanded because they can provide jobs and housing to thousands of families made desperate by a sluggish economy.

Mr. López Villanueva has arranged to have about 10,000 members of his organization -- the Francisco Villa Popular Front -- trained by federal election officials to be poll watchers for Mr. López Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party, or PRD. On Sunday he will dispatch them to observe the vote in Mexico City. His followers can be counted on to back Mr. López Obrador and other PRD candidates and to encourage their friends and relatives to do likewise. Other parties will have observers at polling stations, too.

Throughout Mr. López Obrador's political career, he has relied on mass protests to get what he wants. He was famous in his home state of Tabasco for surrounding oil refineries to demand payments to local Indians. His critics fear that if he wins the presidency he'll rely on street bosses like Mr. López Villanueva to achieve his aims, and if he loses he'll call on them to shut down cities. Mr. López Obrador denies the accusation.

"Our hope is that López Obrador will be a transition government to a state that looks after the needs of the lower social classes," said Mr. López Villanueva, who says he is inspired by Marxism. "The involvement of our movement will also be critical in making sure that he comes through with his promises to help the poor." Mr. López Villanueva said he has no plans to contest the results of the election if his man loses.

Mr. López Villanueva rose to prominence as a radical student in the late 1980s. He and a group of other students at Mexico City's National Autonomous University invited hundreds of families who had been evicted from homes on a hillside designated as a nature preserve to camp in the university classrooms and hallways. The campus was shut down because of a student strike Mr. López Villanueva helped organize.

DOJ_NMG_0037363

Later, he led the families to a marshy patch of unused land. He persuaded dump-truck operators to unload discarded asphalt there, which the families used as foundations for the shanties they made from corrugated aluminum, scrap wood and tarps.

Marches and blockading roads eventually forced authorities to turn over title to the marsh land to the families and provide them with low-cost loans and grants to build proper housing. Today, El Molino is a bustling community with blocks of apartment houses dedicated to Carlos Marx, Federico Engels and other communist luminaries. Residents get school supplies at the Francisco Villa stationery and snack on Italian ice from the Francisco Villa ice cream shop. (The revolutionary leader is commonly known as Pancho Villa.)

Over the years, Mr. López Villanueva has seized dozens of unused plots and abandoned buildings. His followers pay fees to the Francisco Villa organization, which serve as down payments on future apartments. The down payments are held in a general account and are generally not reimbursable, so there is a disincentive to quit.

Mr. López Villanueva's tactics have produced running battles with Mexican authorities, though. In the mid-1990s, shortly after the birth of his two daughters, he spent two years on the lam, dodging authorities who arrested 15 of his associates. In 2000, prosecutors accused him of shooting to death a judge. He denied the charge, which he said was concocted by jealous rivals.

The prosecution was dropped for lack of evidence, but not before Mr. López Villanueva had spent five months in prison and was stuck with his nickname. While his friends call him Alejandro, newspapers regularly refer to him as El Grandote. "In Mexico, the cops always provide a nickname to the papers to make you sound like a delinquent," he said. "It's a way of tarring you so you live under suspicion even though what they charged you with was made up."

His fights with the law didn't frighten away Mr. López Obrador's PRD, which was looking to gain power in Mexico City. In exchange for votes, campaign contributions, and demonstrators willing to pack PRD rallies, the party agreed to let Mr. López Villanueva and other street bosses operate on the fringes of the law in places governed by the PRD. El Grandote's followers were prominent in Mr. López Obrador's successful bid to become mayor of Mexico City in 2000. When Mexico's conservative ruling party of President Vicente Fox launched a campaign to disqualify Mr. López Obrador from running for president, Mr. López Villanueva sent thousands of followers into the streets, paralyzing main thoroughfares. President Fox eventually called off the efforts.

Some of Mr. López Villanueva's associates, who see all of the mainstream political parties as buttresses for an economic system that disenfranchises the poor, called the pact with the PRD a sellout and quit his group. But the link-up deepened his power. Under the López Obrador mayoralty, the city government made numerous low-cost construction loans to the Francisco Villa organization. Mr. López Villanueva also added a 10,000-vehicle fleet of gypsy cabs, which operate unmolested by the city. His brother and brother-in-law have held city council seats.

El Grandote says that his responsibilities have grown so heavy that he is wearying of the burden. These days, he says, he often dreams of leaving the "chaos" of Mexico City for a more tranquil life in the country. He hopes his daughters, now teenagers who giggled over photos on their cellphones as he talked, will find less volatile work. "This city is a monster," he said. "It's so big that you go out and do a blockade and there's barely a reaction. Deliveries get through, people get to work."

For now, there is much work to do. On a rainy Thursday, he inaugurated a new cultural center at one of his settlements to the sound of folk music and rowdy applause. And he must keep his troops fired up. Last week, for instance, he organized rotating shifts of a thousand protesters to block off the main artery connecting Iztapalapa with the city center. His purpose was to pressure the city to provide drinking water and other services to several squatter settlements. The group is now camped in front of the borough hall while it negotiates for concessions.

At the entrance to Dusty Mines, a collection of cinderblock houses that lack running water, a teenage girl thumbed through a thin Karl Marx reader. A resident of this squatter settlement controlled by one of the squatter settlements controlled by Mr. López Villanueva, she was ready to rumble for El Grandote. Blocking roads is "a lot of fun," she said.

Chávez's Image Becomes Tool For Attack In Mexican Presidential Race (WP)

By Manuel Roig-Franzia

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

MEXICO CITY, June 27 -- Hugo Chávez is not running for president of Mexico. But some days it's been hard to tell.

The Venezuelan president's face has been all over Mexican television at critical stages in this country's bitter mudfest of a presidential race.

For a while, the party of candidate Felipe Calderón filled its ads with shots of Chávez paired with less-than-flattering images of Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the left-leaning Mexican presidential candidate. Later, a political activist group put Chávez back on the tube, surrounded by machine guns and soldiers, and accompanied by a dire voice-over: "In Mexico, you don't have to die to define your future -- you only have to vote!"

The strategy of López Obrador's opponents has been clear. By linking the candidate to Chávez, they have tried to frighten voters into believing López Obrador will be a carbon copy of the Venezuelan president, who has been accused of crushing dissent and crippling democratic institutions.

Mexican political experts generally agree the tactic has been effective. Calderón shot up in the polls shortly after his party began airing the Chávez spots, even though the Venezuelan leader has not taken a public role in the Mexican campaign.

"In politics it doesn't matter what is, it matters what seems to be," said Jorge Chabat, a Mexico City political analyst.

The Chávez imagery has gotten so intense that Mexico's electoral commission has twice ordered television advertisements featuring the Venezuelan leader off the air -- the latest order coming on Monday.

The Venezuelan president, seen as the heir apparent to Cuban President Fidel Castro as leader of the Latin American left, is an easy tool for smear in Mexico. After gaining an ally with the election of Evo Morales in Bolivia, Chávez was unable to use his influence to get Ollanta Humala elected president of Peru in a race against the eventual winner, Alan García.

"What we saw in Peru and we're seeing in Mexico is that Chávez has been converting into a negative," said Mexican political analyst Juan Pardinas.

Many activist groups have injected Chávez into the presidential race, but Calderón's National Action Party, or PAN, did it first. His aides spoke of Bolivarian circles -- small community groups fostered by Chávez's government -- surreptitiously working on behalf of López Obrador. Then the PAN began filling the airwaves with grainy images of Chávez, alongside images of López Obrador.

What followed was a true stunner. López Obrador, who is known for his combative style, barely responded. The PAN kept pounding him with the Chávez advertisement, but López Obrador and his Democratic Revolution Party let weeks pass before aggressively disavowing a relationship with Chávez, a decision his aides now say was a mistake.

As Calderón rose in the polls, Mexico's electoral commission stepped in, ordering the PAN to remove the advertisements in April. By then, López Obrador's once-commanding lead was gone and the race -- after a brief leap by Calderón into first place in most polls -- has settled into a statistical tie.

Arturo Sarukhan, a top Calderón adviser, said the advertisements "became a crowbar for opening the mind-set of the Mexican electorate to the issues that are disturbing to the public about López Obrador."

Chávez had been heavily criticized here for denouncing Mexican President Vicente Fox -- also a member of the PAN -- as "a lapdog" of the United States. Later, the PAN brought up the Chávez comparison when López Obrador told Fox "to shut up" about the presidential campaign, a comment widely criticized as disrespectful in Mexico.

As the campaign enters its final stage, López Obrador has begun responding more often to the comparisons to Chávez. He said in an interview this week with El Universal, one of Mexico's largest daily newspapers, that "I've grown bored with them comparing [Chávez] to me."

"It's absurd," López Obrador campaign strategist Manuel Camacho Solís said in an interview. "Andrés Manuel López Obrador doesn't know Chávez, nor have they ever spoken."

On Monday, a little-known activist group -- the Center for Leadership and Human Development -- was ordered to yank its advertisement featuring Chávez and the machine guns, which López Obrador's campaign complained was a not-so-thinly disguised attack on its candidate.

López Obrador has hit back with a radio ad of his own, which tries to turn the Chávez controversy into a joke. The ad says "Chávez is for López Obrador," but does not mention a first name. The narrator then runs off a string of common Mexican surnames, such as Gonzalez and Perez, and says they're for López Obrador, too.

Bringing Mexico Closer To God (NYT)

By Enrique Krauze

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

SHOULD Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the front-runner in Mexico's presidential race, emerge victorious on Sunday, it could usher in a form of Latin American leftism as yet unseen: messianic populism. Mexico's fragile democracy could become its first casualty.

Outside of Mexico, people ask which Latin American leader Mr. López Obrador most resembles: Hugo Chávez of Venezuela, Evo Morales of Bolivia or Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva of Brazil. The truth is that he's not like any of them. He does not have the military stamp of Comandante Chávez or the indigenist roots of Mr. Morales. Nor is he a born compromiser like Mr. Lula who, as some Brazilians say, seems to "know the value of 10 percent." Mr. López Obrador is different: he always strives for 100 percent. And he has higher models to emulate.

DOJ_NMG_0037365

Earlier this year an interviewer asked him what religion he followed. "I'm Catholic, fundamentally Christian," Mr. López Obrador responded. "The life and work of Jesus fill me with passion. He, too, was persecuted in his time, spied on by the powerful of his era, and he was crucified."

The interviewer was surprised (there is an unwritten rule that Jesus is never mentioned in Mexican politics) and asked him whether he intended some parallelism. "Not at all," he said. "I say it because sometimes it is forgotten."

Many thought his comment was a cynical appeal to win the hearts of the religious Mexican people. Others, including myself, believe, however, that his words were a sincere reflection of the way he sees himself: "I am calling together a movement of consciousness, a spiritual movement," he told a reporter in 2004. "Many people see me, humble people, what they tell me is that they are praying for me .... I am very democratic and very mystic."

Millions of poor Mexicans, particularly in the center and south of the country, see in him what he sees in himself: a bestower of manna who will provide the poor with cash handouts and all the services of a great welfare state. His oratory increasingly blends the theological with the revolutionary: he has repeated that he will "purify national life," inaugurating a new era of "historic transcendence" in which "those on top," "those with money," will no longer oppress "those on the bottom." Believe him: he's a man of his word.

Mr. López Obrador should be strongly commended for placing the fight against poverty at the center of his social platform. But his numbers don't add up. He has said repeatedly, for example, that he will finance his proposal with the more than $9 billion a year to be shaved from the budget by cutting salaries or firing top members of the bureaucracy. However, if the salaries of the 4,000 top officials of the executive branch were cut in half, it would yield scarcely 4 percent of that sum.

Mr. López Obrador has also talked of revising Nafta's agricultural provisions and subsidizing exporters with cheap fuel (a practice prohibited by Nafta). He has declared that he will "allow" private investment, but not national or foreign interest in strategic areas that urgently require it, like oil and gas.

His platform is full of unrealizable initiatives: a microcredit program (a very promising project) but for a whopping eight million people (consider that the successful Grameen Bank of Bangladesh has taken on fewer than six million borrowers since 1976); bullet trains from Mexico City to the northern border (which would not only be expensive, but also face competition from low-cost airlines).

But more troubling than his economics is his political messianism, which could undermine our democracy. As the Mexican writer Gabriel Zaid pointed out last week in the newspaper Reforma, Mr. López Obrador, a former member of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, which ruled Mexico from 1929 to 2000, wants to return to the political structure of the old days. When the P.R.I. held power, the president controlled the country's legislature, judiciary, natural resources, state-run businesses, electoral system, monetary policy and federal budget and could place limits of freedom of expression.

But there would be a disturbing novelty to the process as revived by Mr. López Obrador: his presidency wouldn't be institutional and bureaucratic like the old regime, but instead bound to his personal charisma. One of his most insistent proposals is to amend the Constitution to allow for referendums and plebiscites, so that halfway through his prospective term (in 2009) "the people" would decide whether he goes or stays.

Knowing that he would take the microphone daily to report on his government's progress — as he has said he will — it's easy to imagine the result of such a plebiscite. And after that, who is to stop him from altering the law of the land and being re-elected indefinitely, or remaining the power behind all powers, if "the people" demand it? Redemption won't be achieved in the constitutionally allotted six years. A messiah needs time.

With the uncharismatic P.R.I. candidate, Roberto Madrazo, running third in the polls, Mr. López Obrador's main obstacle for Sunday is Felipe Calderón of the center-right National Action Party. Where Mr. López Obrador is strong, Mr. Calderón is weak: he has failed to convey real concern for Mexico's poor.

But in economic matters he seems more coherent: a young lawyer who studied at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government, Mr. Calderón seeks to reform the remains of the old corporate structures and the country's traditional inward-looking mentality.

His idea is for Mexico to carve out a competitive niche for itself in a globalized world (as has been done, at different times, by other backward Catholic countries like Chile, Ireland and Spain) and thus generate productive jobs and growth. Mr. Calderón has let it be known that if he wins, he'll call for a coalition government with the P.R.I. and even Mr. López Obrador's Party of the Democratic Revolution.

It is not impossible that Mr. Calderón could win — some recent polls have the race too close to call. But even if he does, he'll face great obstacles. While Mr. López Obrador has said publicly that he would acknowledge the official results no matter what, he always hedges such claims with a "but" — such as making it conditional on the voting being without irregularities.

DOJ_NMG_0037366

As the race has tightened, he has taken to criticizing the federal electoral institute and has told the crowds that he suspects "intentions of fraud." This raises fears that he will acknowledge defeat only if Mr. Calderón wins by a significant margin, say, greater than 5 percent.

If Mr. López Obrador were to dispute a Calderón victory in the streets and at the tribunal, the P.R.I. would be likely to join him. If the tribunal cannot name a winner to take the oath on Dec. 1, the day President Vicente Fox Quesada must step down, the national legislature has to name an interim president who would have to call a new election. Mexicans would live in a state of political volatility and our electoral institutions would be discredited.

This would be a serious setback for democracy. But would it be worse than a López Obrador victory? "Mexico has yet to console itself for never having been a monarchy," the Nobel Prize-winning poet Octavio Paz told me in his last years, with great sadness. Maybe his words will prove prophetic. In the long run Mexico will find no consolation in a monarchy cloaking itself in the trappings of democracy and harboring messianic ambitions.

Mexico's Missing Prosperity (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

The subtext for the United States' immigration debate is Mexico. Why doesn't its economy grow faster, creating more jobs and higher living standards? That's the question that inevitably confronts the winner of this Sunday's Mexican presidential election, but it is also a critical question for Americans. A more prosperous country would not be sending so many of its poorest citizens north. Since 1990 about 20 to 25 percent of U.S. immigrants have come from Mexico.

Here is an illuminating comparison. In 1970 average incomes in South Korea were about half those in Mexico. By 2004 Korean incomes were more than twice Mexico's. During those decades, reports the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), average Mexican incomes rose 57 percent, to $9,178 (expressed in constant "2000 dollars"); the comparable Korean gain was 574 percent, to $19,148.

It's not that Mexico has made no progress. Its economy was once crisis-prone, inflation-ridden and heavily insulated from foreign trade. Now it has quelled inflation (about 4 percent, down from 17 percent in the late 1990s), controlled government spending and opened up to trade. Before adoption of the North American Free Trade Agreement in 1994, tariffs on covered imports averaged 12 percent (and were much higher in the 1980s); by 2001 they were 2 percent. The last financial crisis -- a collapsing currency, an outflow of money -- occurred in 1994 and 1995. In recent years its economy has grown almost 4 percent annually.

But that growth -- fine for an advanced country such as the United States -- doesn't suffice for a poor country whose population is increasing (as is Mexico's) by more than 1 percent a year. In China, economic growth averages 9 to 10 percent annually; in India, about 6 to 8 percent. Mexico isn't in the same league.

Economies advance through the adoption of better technologies and business methods. Production and efficiency improve. Prices go down or incomes go up. Either way, people can buy more -- more old stuff (say, food or housing); or more new stuff (say, Internet connections or iPods). In Mexico, this process is weak. To simplify slightly: Its economy consists of two vast sectors, each slow to adopt better technology and business practices.

One sector involves large, modern firms in semi-protected markets that limit the pressure to improve efficiency or lower prices. "Mexico's business sector is risk-averse. It's never had to operate in a true competitive environment," says Pamela Starr, an analyst for the Eurasia Group, a consulting firm. "It's operated with monopolies and oligopolies encouraged by the government."

An extreme case in point is Pemex, the state-owned monopoly oil company. Without competitors or complaining shareholders, its operations are lax. In 2004 Pemex had $69 billion in sales and 137,722 employees, according to its Web site; in the same year, Exxon Mobil had $291 billion in revenue and 85,900 employees. Telmex, which dominates the phone market, is often cited as another example. In 2004 Mexico had the sixth-highest phone charges for an average customer of 29 OECD member countries.

The other part of the economy is usually called the "informal sector." It consists of thousands of small firms -- street vendors, stores, repair shops, tiny manufacturers -- that theoretically aren't legal, because they haven't registered with the government and often don't pay taxes or comply with regulations on wages and hiring and firing. Almost two-thirds of Mexico's workers may be employed in the informal sector, according to one rough estimate by the International Monetary Fund.

The sector's size might suggest great entrepreneurial vitality. The trouble is that these firms are virtually compelled to remain small and inefficient. Because they're technically illegal, they can't easily get bank loans and can't grow too large without being forced to pay taxes or comply with government regulations. In Mexico, companies with fewer than 10 workers account for almost two-fifths of all employment. In the United States, such firms represent one-ninth of total jobs.

All this frustrates rapid economic growth -- though the obstacles have diminished as Mexico has opened to foreign trade and investment. The harder question is what created this system. Lawrence Harrison, an economic development expert at Tufts University, blames culture. Latin American values, he says, have resisted change and encouraged "rent-seeking" by business elites -- vying for government favors that provide protected markets. Asian societies, he argues, have been more accepting of change and have achieved the higher savings rates conducive to faster economic growth.

Economist William Easterly of New York University is skeptical of the cultural explanation and argues that de-emphasizing trade protectionism and government intervention requires time. "Advocates of free trade and free markets overpromise what can be accomplished in a short time," he says. Attitudes and institutions change slowly. "The payoff is in the long term," he argues.

On paper, the leading candidates for president advocate different economic policies. Former Mexico City mayor Andr?s Manuel L?pez Obrador of the center-left Democratic Revolution Party urges more government activism. Felipe Calder?n of the center-right National Action Party -- the party of the incumbent, Vicente Fox -- favors "the market." But each might have trouble enacting his agenda without a legislative majority, with the once-dominant Institutional Revolutionary Party controlling swing votes. At best, economic growth might improve slightly; at worst it might decrease.

For Americans, the implications are sobering. Mexico has long regarded immigration as an economic safety valve. Whoever wins, that won't change.

China Discloses $1.1 Billion Bank Fraud (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

SHANGHAI, June 27 -- The Chinese government disclosed $1.1 billion worth of fraud at one of the country's largest state-owned banks this week, underscoring the risks confronting foreign investors as they seek big stakes in China's precarious banking system.

China's National Audit Office on Monday announced that an examination of records at the Agricultural Bank of China, one of four state-owned giants, uncovered 51 cases of criminal wrongdoing involving 157 people in 2004. The state audit also found evidence of $1.8 billion in improperly handled deposits and $3.5 billion in illegal loans.

The latest details of fraud come as China presses to eradicate the taint of corruption from its state-owned banks as it courts foreign capital in a bid to improve management practices. China's leaders are particularly keen to fix ailing lenders ahead of next year, when foreign banks will be allowed to conduct business inside China in local currency. That could pose a grave challenge to domestic lenders, whose managers have been nurtured by decades of state capital infusions and a system governed more by personal connections than consideration of the bottom line.

The most recent additions to a lengthy roster of bank-fraud cases brings to the fore a basic question about the future of China's financial system: Are the state disclosures a sign that the government is indeed serious about fixing the troubles, or are they just another indication of the extent of the problems in a fundamentally shaky system? Analysts saw a little bit of both. While the state is indeed intent on a fix, the challenges are deep.

"This case that has emerged at the Agricultural Bank of China is just a minor one among the overall problems with China's state-owned banks," said Yi Xianrong, a director at the China Academy of Social Sciences' financial research institute in Beijing. "Lots more such cases are not discovered and will be discovered sooner or later, as the most serious problems involve medium- and long-term loans."

He cited deep institutional problems at the banks, including a lack of internal controls. "More fundamentally, the system appoints bank leaders based on administrative power rather than on market performance," Yi said. "Real changes have yet to come."

For foreign investors, the stakes are high. Last year, Bank of America paid $3 billion for a 9 percent stake in China Construction Bank, and the Royal Bank of Scotland acquired 10 percent of Bank of China. This month, Bank of China raised about $9.7 billion through a stock offering in Hong Kong following a $9.2 billion offering there by China Construction Bank.

Last August, Goldman Sachs Group Inc., American Express Co. and Allianz AG sank $3.8 billion into China's largest lender, the Industrial & Commercial Bank of China, capturing a 10 percent stake. The bank has said it will pursue a stock offering worth about $12 billion in Hong Kong sometime this fall.

Foreign investors are eager to lock up stakes of banks in China's huge, sizzling economy. With stock and bond markets still in their infancy, China's four largest state banks essentially dictate where capital goes in the country. But the foreigners are sinking their money into a financial system that has traditionally functioned more as a cash artery for companies owned by the Communist Party-led government then as a careful arbiter of risk and reward.

DOJ_NMG_0037368

Private economists estimate that China's banks are now choked with $500 billion in bad loans, making the system vulnerable to a shock. Those worries have heightened in recent weeks with the release of government data showing a surge in lending in the first five months of the year, despite government caps on investment in red-hot sectors such as real estate and automobile manufacturing.

On Tuesday, the debt-rating agency Standard & Poor's underscored those concerns, declaring that China's banks face "increasing vulnerability" from the widening volume of lending. The agency credited China's banks with some improvements in their governance but stressed that "their developing credit- and risk-management systems are likely to be severely stretched by rapidly changing economic conditions."

The Agricultural Bank has long been seen as the most flawed of the four state-owned giants. Four years ago, the bank announced plans to embrace consumer finance as a way of weaning itself off more politically motivated lending. The bank moved aggressively into the fledgling business of auto finance, seeking to profit as China's growing middle class adopts the family car.

In interviews then, bank managers acknowledged that credit-checking systems were virtually nonexistent in China. They said that so long as would-be borrowers accurately disclosed their addresses and incomes, few applicants would be turned away.

This week's disclosures added to the evidence that the resulting consumer-finance frenzy has turned sour: The state auditors said that among the biggest areas of fraud in the cases it discovered were car loans and home mortgages.

"The banks have been desperately expanding loans, including consumer loans and real estate loans," Yi said. "The problem won't be visible until real estate prices fall dramatically, which will happen sooner or later. The problem with individual consumer loans is serious."

One Riot Breaks Ground In China (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

SANZHOU, China -- For 24 hours, thousands of rampaging farmers here unleashed their rage over confiscated farmland this month -- holding local officials hostage and, clubs and bottles of acid in hand, forcing a band of private security guards to spend the night cowering behind locked doors.

The riot in many ways resembled other uprisings in rural China in recent years. But this one ended with a twist: The villagers won significant concessions.

By dusk on June 14, the villagers had agreed to let everyone go home -- or to the hospital for treatment -- and officials had pledged a high-level review of 750 acres of rice paddies and fish ponds, property that had been confiscated by the village committee and resold for development in what the villagers said was a corrupt transaction.

Moreover, the villagers said, they were promised an explanation of how the 200 private guards, many with buzz cuts and tattoos typical of Chinese gangsters, came to be in Sanzhou protecting a multistory apartment complex built on a prime piece of the confiscated farmland.

The compromise did not settle the land conflict that has embittered this village-turned-suburb 25 miles south of Guangzhou, in the boundless expanse of factories that has blanketed the Pearl River Delta. But it stopped the violence after only a few serious injuries. More broadly, it dramatized the Chinese government's realization that farmers have a point when they complain that their land and their livelihoods are being unfairly swallowed up by relentless economic growth.

President Hu Jintao's government, in an indication of concern about the unrest among suddenly landless farmers, has launched a campaign to preserve the fields and paddies that feed China's 1.3 billion people. In addition, it has allocated $42.5 billion to improving the lives of the 700 million Chinese still attached to the land and filled official propaganda with stories of Communist Party cadres out in the countryside solving problems for grateful farmers.

Despite the two-day riot here, the first signs have emerged that the campaign may be having an effect. Although party censorship makes information in China hard to assess, reports of violent protests in farming villages have declined sharply over the past six months. This marks a significant shift from 2004-05, when clashes between farmers and police escalated dramatically. The Public Security Ministry reported 84,000 violent protests in 2005, more than 200 a day.

The government has also become increasingly frank about the corruption that often accompanies land seizures, outraging farmers and corroding their willingness to abide by official decisions. Sun Wensheng, minister of land and resources, told reporters Friday that more than a third of land confiscations involve illegal action on the part of local party and government officials.

Premier Wen Jiabao's cabinet last week handed down an order -- the latest in a long line -- barring local officials from confiscating farmland without ministry approval and from using proceeds from sales of confiscated land to finance government institutions. Wen did not address the complaint voiced most often by farmers: that local officials pocket the difference between low compensation paid to peasants and the high market price charged to developers. But Sun said his ministry was putting together a new system to monitor seizures to prevent this and other abuses.

The party secretary of surrounding Guangdong province, Zhang Dejiang, has told city, town and village leaders in this region that they cannot use confiscated land until farmers are satisfied with the compensation. In effect, that was the promise reiterated to the farmers of Sanzhou to get them to disperse peacefully.

Guangdong province, China's most industrialized area, has been a hot zone of land conflicts. Police opened fire Dec. 6 on protesting farmers in Dongzhou village, 130 miles east of here, killing several and raising fears that the unrest was about to rise to a higher level of bloodshed.

Zhang, the provincial party secretary and a member of the national Politburo, came under criticism in Beijing for allowing the violence to rise to that level in his province. Since then, three local officials involved in the Dongzhou killings have been fired, according to dissident sources, and 12 villagers have been sentenced to jail terms.

Sanzhou protest leaders, who described what happened here on condition of anonymity because they feared arrest, said busloads of police waited nearby as the riot flared on June 13 and 14. A half-dozen policemen who looked on were not armed, they said.

The villagers said that, although Sanzhou's land confiscations began with decisions made in the mid-1990s, it wasn't until recently that they recognized how much of their land was ticketed for residential and industrial development. In the past few years, a large pond where farmers grew carp has been drained in hopes it can become an industrial park. Municipal food warehouses have been built on former rice paddies. Nearby, a thermos bottle factory has arisen, with an adjacent dormitory for the farmers' children, who make up the workforce.

Farmers seemed most outraged by what they said was use of their compensation by village officials to build a bridge across the fish pond. Needlessly large sums were allocated for the bridge, which is designed as a simple stretch of concrete across a 200-yard bog, they said. "They say they need 10 times what they really need, then they take the difference," a villager said with a sneer.

The head of the Shunde district investigation department, which has jurisdiction over Sanzhou, declined to comment, directing inquiries to the Guangdong provincial propaganda department. Officials there, who according to local reporters have banned reporting on Sanzhou's riot, said they had no information.

Since January, villagers have blocked the bridge-building project, which stands unfinished in the form of two concrete blocks baking under the heavy southern China sun. Many farmers and their wives have sat daily under a tent-like shelter to prevent bulldozers from returning. Banners have been stretched across the tent proclaiming the farmers will not move until they get adequate compensation for their land.

Protest leaders heard earlier this month that a real-estate developer was about to turn over to buyers possession of apartments in a building constructed on another slice of the confiscated land. The developer, they said, sent two dozen private guards in civilian clothes to protect a little sales office on June 11. By June 13, the number had risen to more than 200, they said. Villagers called local police to intervene against the tough-looking outsiders, they said, but got no response.

As the confrontation grew, a number of villagers moved on the apartment building and, threatening to beat them, drove away workers putting on the final touches. The guards counterattacked, and the fight was on. Villagers said they rang gongs, raising the alarm, and by the end of the day 10,000 local farmers and their families were on the scene.

They attacked the sales office, breaking windows and driving away saleswomen. Some used bottles of sulfuric acid to scare off the security guards, they acknowledged, and many swung sticks and threw stones, forcing the guards to take shelter inside the sales office behind locked doors.

Several local officials who showed up to calm the situation were prevented from leaving, the villagers said, and were held all night and into the next afternoon before the bargain was reached.

As part of the deal, the villagers were to negotiate with the developer, who promised to stop construction pending an agreement on compensation. The developer insisted, however, that the level of compensation was a matter between the farmers and the village committee. But the village leadership has refused to meet, protest leaders said, and the local party secretary has dropped out of sight.

"It's been a long time since we saw him," one peasant activist said.

Taiwan's President, Mired In Scandals, Survives Recall Vote (WP)

By Jane Rickards

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037370

TAIPEI, Taiwan, June 27 -- President Chen Shui-bian easily survived a recall vote in Taiwan's legislature Tuesday but remained mired in scandals that have undermined his leadership and touched off a rancorous political struggle.

The recall motion, brought by the opposition Nationalist Party, was backed by 119 of the legislature's 221 members, well below the two-thirds majority needed to force a referendum.

Unless new irregularities are uncovered, Chen is now expected to remain in power for the last two years of his second four-year term. But he has been weakened by charges that his family and aides were involved in under-the-table deals, and buffeted by the political storm those charges have generated. As a result, Taiwanese politics appeared headed for a period of instability that is likely to overshadow relations with China and perhaps brake Chen's attempts to push the self-ruled island toward formal independence.

James Soong of the opposition People First Party, which is allied with the Nationalists, said after the vote that he intended to pursue the effort to oust Chen with a no-confidence vote against the government, headed by Premier Su Tseng-chang of Chen's Democratic Progressive Party. The Nationalist leader, Ma Ying-jeou, appeared less certain about the effort but did not rule it out.

A no-confidence motion would require only a simple majority, and Tuesday's vote indicated that was within reach. If Su were to lose a no-confidence motion, Chen would be forced to choose between calling new legislative elections or having Su resign. Neither would be appealing to Chen and his partisans, who see Su as a possible presidential candidate.

Chen said in a statement that he would respect the outcome of judicial probes focused on his family. But he urged Taiwanese to put the political conflicts behind them and offered to enter into peace talks with China.

"Aside from deep self-reflection and examination, I hope even more to promote political negotiations domestically and cross-strait peace talks," he said.

China has refused to deal with Chen, an ardent champion of formal independence for Taiwan, and Chen did not say what he would do to change that. As for healing the political rifts within Taiwan, opposition leaders appeared intent instead on making Chen pay the full price for the alleged irregularities by his family and aides, particularly with presidential elections on the horizon in 2008.

Ma, the likely Nationalist Party candidate in 2008, acknowledged that the recall had failed but claimed a small victory, saying no one cast a vote against the motion. The 88 legislators from Chen's Democratic Progressive Party boycotted the proceedings, which were held as 5,000 police officers and hundreds of soldiers manned barricades outside the legislature to prevent violence among opposing camps of demonstrators.

The motion to oust Chen was launched after his son-in-law, Chao Chien-ming, was arrested on suspicion of insider trading last month. Prosecutors also have begun an investigation into allegations that Chen's wife, Wu Shu-chen, accepted millions of Taiwan dollars in gift vouchers in exchange for using her influence in a department store takeover. Also, a top presidential aide, Chen Tse-nan, was arrested in connection with financial irregularities in construction of a high-speed railway.

The charges deepened political divisions in Taiwan and added to accusations that Chen's leadership was erratic and unnecessarily provocative to Beijing. In particular, Nationalists sharply criticized his decision in February to abolish the National Unification Council, established in 1990 as a display of willingness to eventually reunite with the mainland.

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

President Chen Shui-bian easily survived a recall motion brought by the opposition Nationalist Party over corruption allegations involving his family. Just 119 lawmakers in the 221-member legislature voted for the measure — more than half but well below the two-thirds majority, or 148 votes, needed to pass the motion and put the recall question to the electorate in a referendum. Mr. Chen's Democratic Progressive Party boycotted the vote.

Groups Promise Big Fight Over Oman Trade Deal (RC)

By Kate Ackley

Roll Call, June 28, 2006

Groups for and against a Bush administration free-trade agreement with the Persian Gulf nation of Oman are stepping up their lobbying efforts, promising to fight just as hard as they did in last summer's bitter battle over the Central American Free Trade Agreement.

The Senate Finance Committee today will consider legislation to approve the deal crafted by the Bush administration. On Thursday, Ways and Means will do the same.

Both sides say the stakes are higher than they ordinarily might be because this is an election year.

DOJ_NMG_0037371

Larry Weiss, executive director for the Citizens Trade Campaign, helped organize a Capitol Hill event Tuesday at which House Democrats blasted the agreement with Oman. Citizens Trade Campaign, whose members include unions and environmentalists, has been working to scuttle the pact, which can only be approved or rejected, not changed, by Congress.

"We have a field operation going across much of the country," Weiss said. "Many organizations are calling, writing and otherwise talking to their Members of Congress." The event Tuesday, he said, was "to show Congress the breadth of the opposition."

Weiss said the administration and business interests that favor the Oman agreement had expected it to sail through Congress, in part because Oman is such a small country and thus accounts for a tiny fraction of U.S. imports, and in part because of fatigue over last year's CAFTA fight.

"In the wake of the CAFTA vote, a lot of Members and organizations are just standing up and saying, 'Until you change the model of NAFTA/CAFTA, we are going to oppose these things," said Peter Chandler, chief of staff to Rep. Mike Michaud (D-Maine). Michaud took part in the Tuesday gathering, at which Citizens Trade Campaign released a letter signed by more than 400 groups that oppose the agreement with Oman.

Opponents of the pact say Oman's labor and environmental standards are abysmal.

Chuck Dittrich, vice president of regional trade initiatives for the National Foreign Trade Council, helps manage the U.S. Middle East Free Trade Coalition, a group of businesses that wants the Oman agreement to pass.

"As far as free-trade agreements go, this one is high quality," he said. The Omani government has made great strides in labor laws, he said.

"If this Congress sends a message that Oman — which has come so far in integrating into the global economy through this free-trade agreement process — is not supported, then I think all of our trading partners are going to look at this very seriously. And it's going to send a chill through the bilateral process and also the Doha round," Dittrich said.

Nicole Venable, director of international trade and global competitiveness at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, said her side is urging Members to stand back and look at the strategic role that Oman plays in the Gulf region and, in particular, the fight against terrorism.

"Members have to recognize that other Gulf countries are looking at this process," she said.

But while the pro-agreement side argues that Oman is a key strategic Middle East ally, especially in the war on terror, opponents counter that the trade agreement could hinder Congressional intervention when it comes to potential national security matters.

Weiss said that if the United States had made a similar agreement with the United Arab Emirates when the Dubai ports controversy emerged earlier this year, then Congress would have had a much harder time killing the deal.

"Congress could not have simply called that deal off," Weiss said. "So if something similar could happen with an Omani company, we are ill-served security-wise by the provisions of this deal."

Thea Lee, policy director at the AFL-CIO, said Oman does not have a history or tradition of free association or labor organizing. Lee said even though Oman's government has reformed its labor laws, "this is really a very primitive step along the way. This is the country with the worst labor laws of any country we're negotiating a free-trade agreement."

Added Weiss: "It's going to be like CAFTA all over again, and closer to an election. There's an awful lot of districts where Members took votes in favor of CAFTA that they did not want to take. Do Members really want to tell people in their districts, 'Yep, we voted to send more jobs away'?"

Failure Of Geneva Talks Would Not Scupper WTO Round: US (AFP)

By Charlotte Raab

AFP, June 28, 2006

The United States voiced optimism that struggling global trade negotiations would eventually succeed, even if a crucial WTO meeting in Switzerland this week fails.

"We're going to try to get this done as soon as we can, rather than say if we don't get it done by the weekend it won't happen," US Trade Representative Susan Schwab said several hours before her departure for Geneva, after a meeting with US lawmakers.

"We can't be stampeded into an agreement just for a deadline," she said at a news briefing.

"We want to stick to deadlines, deadlines are important, but deadlines in and of themselves are not going to create a good agreement," she said.

"We need to negotiate a good agreement."

The World Trade Organization opens a meeting Thursday to try to save four and a half years of negotiations aimed at liberalizing trade in a way to help developing countries.

DOJ_NMG_0037372

WTO Director General Pascal Lamy has set an end-of-June deadline for countries meeting in Geneva to agree on basic formulas for cutting farm subsidies and reducing agricultural and manufacturing tariffs.

Many observers see the meeting as a last-ditch attempt to revitalize the stalled Doha Development Round, which was supposed to have been completed two years ago.

The WTO's 149 divided members, who have repeatedly missed their targets for a deal, are under mounting pressure to complete the round by a December 2006 deadline fixed during a conference in Hong Kong last year.

The United States may hold the key to achieving a global trade accord but appears unwilling to make concessions, amid pressure from skeptical lawmakers and powerful farm lobbies.

Adding to the pressures on trade negotiators is the expiration of a special US trade tool a year from now.

On July 1, 2007, the government of the world's most powerful trading nation is due to lose its special authority from lawmakers to fast-track trade deals, which could hamper the WTO negotiations if they overrun the year-end deadline.

Under fast track, the US Congress is entitled to approve or reject trade deals but cannot amend them.

"There's no US trade representative who'd ever tell you that he or she doesn't want" the fast-track authority, Schwab said. But, "would you bet a whole deal on it? No."

"We are eager for a comprehensive agreement, and determined to craft an agreement that is good for American workers and manufacturers, good for the service provider, and good for our farmers and ranchers," she said.

Republican lawmaker Bob Goodlatte said it was important to continue fast-track authority, "whether we reach an agreement or not."

Schwab reiterated the US trade position, recalling an October offer to cut direct aid to agriculture by 60 percent was still available, on condition US trading partners further opened their markets and lower their customs tariffs on US exports.

US farm aid amounted to 150 billion dollars between 1995 and 2005.

"We made it clear last fall that our proposal was not a take-it-or-leave-it offer, however it was contingent on receiving meaningful offers from our trading partners that match our level of ambition on agricultural market access," she said.

"We have yet to receive such offers."

US Lawmakers Prefer No Deal To Bad Deal In Trade Talks (AP)

AP, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP)--U.S. lawmakers said Tuesday they would rather have no deal than a bad deal when global trade talks commence this week in Geneva.

Congress won't support concessions beyond the existing offer from the U.S. to cut farm subsidies, said the House Agriculture Committee chairman, Rep. Bob Goodlatte, R-Va.

"No other country has introduced a proposal that even comes close to the U.S. proposal," Goodlatte said. "Now, we are being called on to give even more and receive less."

He and other lawmakers appeared at a news conference with U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab and Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, two senior negotiators in the World Trade Organization talks.

"We have no intention of settling for something less," Schwab said.

Schwab and Johanns are headed to Geneva, where negotiations begin Thursday on trade in goods from farms and factories. Countries then face an end-of-July deadline to agree on a framework for a new global trade treaty.

Without a breakthrough on the complex agriculture and manufacturing issues, it will be difficult to address other important issues, such as services, Schwab said.

The Cry Of The Wild (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

Puerto MALDONADO, Peru

The most memorable thing about the Amazonian rain forest isn't the sights. It's the sounds.

Lying awake at night inside a mosquito net at the Tambopata Research Center in the Peruvian Amazon, you hear a symphony playing in the rain forest outside. It sounds like one of those dissonant pieces of modern music: a cacophony of birds, red howler monkeys, wild pigs, frogs, macaws and insects making bizarre clicks, snorts, croaks, chirps, wails and whistles that sound like car alarms, strange doorbell chimes and an orchestral wind section that has lost its music but is playing on anyway. Occasionally, this symphony gets punctuated by the shrill, desperate scream of a human species, who has just encountered a spider in her toilet.

DOJ_NMG_0037373

This Amazon rain forest in southeastern Peru is a largely uninhabited wilderness that is home to some of the planet's most endangered wildlife, and one of the world's largest macaw clay licks — a cliff of red clay, where blue, red and gold macaws flock for a dirt breakfast every morning.

Look down in the rain forest and you might see a hunting wasp stinging a caterpillar and depositing its eggs inside. Or, look up in the verdant canopy and you see the hanging nest of Oro Pendula weaver birds. You will notice, though, that the Oro Pendula have located their nest on a branch right next to a large white wasp's nest. Why? So if any predators try to attack the birds they will also rile the wasps — an ingenious natural security system.

But today it's all endangered by what Tim Killeen, a senior biologist and researcher at Conservation International, identifies as three converging forces: rising commodity prices driven by rapid growth in China, plans by leaders in South America to integrate their infrastructure and highways to create a continental economy — which will spark human migration into areas that are important for biodiversity — and some new climate models that predict that global warming could make the Amazon so hot and dry that within a century it could mutate from a rain forest into a savannah.

If all of these trends converge, argues Dr. Killeen, it will create a "perfect storm of environmental destruction that will degrade one of the last great tropical wilderness areas of the planet."

The danger signs abound: Sailing here up the Rio Tambopata on our riverboat, we saw gold miners using big motorized barges and mercury to dredge and sift — and destroy — riverbanks in search of gold. With global gold prices soaring, the incentives to dredge the Tambopata are enormous. Some of the miners clear forests for camps and hunt rare animals for food.

Meanwhile, the Interoceanic Highway, running from the Atlantic coast of Brazil to the Pacific coast of Peru, appears to be heading for completion. More roads lead to more agriculture, logging, mining and oil and gas extraction, which converts more forests to cropland, which releases more climate-changing greenhouse gases.

"The Peruvian government has good policies, but it doesn't have the means to enforce them, and there is huge corruption," explained Diego Shoobridge, director of ParksWatch Peru. The road from Brazil through Peru already exists, "but now they are going to pave it," he added. "Once it is paved, all kinds of vehicles will come with Andean people, and they don't know the forests."

But protests by do-gooders will not stop these forces. It requires a grand strategy.

"We need to put in place a green infrastructure — a system of parks, territories controlled by indigenous communities, land-use regulations, carbon credits for forest protection and green businesses, like eco-tourism — that will create a powerful green economic counterweight to the global economic forces driving deforestation," argued Glenn Prickett, a senior vice president at Conservation International and one of my traveling companions. (My wife is on the C.I. board.)

Indeed, just as the Oro Pendula learned to leverage the wasps' nest to naturally preserve their home, environmentalists have to leverage the riches of the rain forest to naturally preserve the rain forest. That means creating ways for the locals to thrive off it while also protecting it. But that's hard. It is easy to clear-cut a forest for roads or an oil well. It's hard to develop shade-grown coffee or eco-tourism or a Brazil nut factory or a palm tree oil business. But without profitable eco-friendly business alternatives — to counter the eco-hostile ones — the economic predators of this rain forest will eventually have their day.

TERRORISM NEWS:

In Jerusalem, Gonzales Defends Anti-Terrorism Efforts. The Jerusalem Post (6/29, Keinon, Izenberg) reports, "All countries have the right to protect their citizens and take lawful actions to ensure their national security, US Attorney-General Alberto Gonzales said in an interview with The Jerusalem Post approved for publication on Wednesday. … However, Gonzales, in the country for two days of high-level talks as part of a trip that will also take him to Egypt, was reticent about commenting directly on Israel's war on terrorism and the situation in the south." The Post continues, "The soft-spoken Gonzales, on his first visit to Israel, is more than just the US attorney-general, the most powerful law enforcement position in America. He is also considered one of US President George W. Bush's closest confidants, and he has turned into the lightning rod for criticism from those who think Washington has trampled human rights at the prison in its offshore naval base at Guantanamo Bay, in alleged CIA prisons in Eastern Europe or in the US itself in the name of fighting terrorism." The Post adds, "Gonzales repeatedly refused to comment on questions in which he was asked about how Israel should handle the capture and abduction of Cpl. Gilad Shalit to Gaza. All he would say was that 'we are focusing on getting this resolved as quickly as possible without any further violence. We want the soldier returned to his family.' … Gonzales insisted that all of the measures taken by the US in its battle against al-Qaida were within the limits of US law, including the open-ended incarceration of hundreds of suspected al-Qaida operatives or supporters being held without trial or judicial review at Guantanamo Bay."

Gonzales Lauds US-Israeli Cooperation Against Terror. The AP (6/28) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales on Tuesday commended Israel for its strong cooperation in the war against terror and international crime." The AP continues, "Speaking at Tel Aviv University, Gonzales mentioned Israel's March extradition of suspected Israeli mob boss Zeev Rosenstein to the United States as an action that 'highlights one of the most important ways we cooperate with our international law enforcement partners.' … Rosenstein was extradited for trial on charges of involvement in a drug ring that allegedly distributed more than 1 million Ecstasy pills in Miami and New York." The AP adds, "Gonzales singled out U.S.-Israel collaboration in combatting terrorism. 'We are working closing in the war on terror,' he said. … He spoke primarily about 'global law enforcement in a post 9/11 world,' and of the wide range of cooperation the U.S. had with its allies in combating drug trade, corruption, fraud, bribery and child pornography."

Bush Takes On News Media, Congressional Democrats. The AP (6/29, Pickler) reports President Bush "tried to pump up the Iraq war effort and a Republican Senate candidate Wednesday during a visit to a state he won handily two years ago but has become a trouble spot for the GOP in the midterm elections." In his visit to Missouri, Bush "visited with soldiers who fought in Iraq and Afghanistan at the Veterans of Foreign Wars post 3944, then headlined a fundraiser at the Ritz-Carlton for Sen. Jim Talent." Bush "helped bring in nearly $1 million at the fundraiser Wednesday evening, supported by about 500 donors who gave roughly $750,000 for Talent and another $200,000 for the state Republican Party."

The Washington Post (6/29, A10, Baker, 744K) reports Bush "attacked congressional Democrats and the news media at a Republican fundraiser Wednesday night, accusing the opposition of 'waving the white flag of surrender' in Iraq and declaring that there is 'no excuse' for journalists to write about secret intelligence programs." Bush sharpened "his rhetoric as the midterm congressional campaign season accelerates" and he "offered a robust defense of his decision to invade Iraq even though, ultimately, no weapons of mass destruction were found, and drew standing ovations for his attacks on those who question his leadership of the war or the fight against terrorists." Bush is quoted saying, "There's a group in the opposition party who are willing to retreat before the mission is done. … They're willing to wave the white flag of surrender. And if they succeed, the United States will be worse off, and the world will be worse off."

Much of the coverage portrays the Administration's criticism of the New York Times as an attempt to rally the GOP base with an eye on the November elections. In a discussion of the Administration's criticism, for example, NBC Nightly News (6/28, story 6, 1:05, Russert, 9.87M) said that for some, "the Times personifies the 'elite, liberal media.' The point here…is that this is not new in American politics. If you want to intensify your political base, and that's what you have to do in a midterm election, attacking the media has worked quite well. Remember Vice President Spiro Agnew – 'nattering nabobs of negativism,' the 'effete corps of impudent snobs,' and so look for this to intensify more and more, particularly focused on the Times, try to get the conservative base to see that as the most important issue, which will take off the focus on Social Security, Iraq and other issues."

The Washington Post (6/29, A11, Babington, Abramowitz, 744K), in a story titled "Bush Seeks To Use Media Leaks To His Advantage," reports, "Senior administration officials say the president was outraged by articles in the New York Times and other newspapers about a surveillance program in which the U.S. government has tapped international banking records for information about terrorist financing." But "his comments at a Republican fundraiser in a St. Louis suburb yesterday, combined with new moves by GOP congressional leaders, showed how both are working to fan public anger and reap gains from the controversy during a midterm election year in which polls show they are running against stiff headwinds."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/29, Feldmann, 61K) reports the Times "has come in for an unusual level of vitriol from top officials in the Bush White House, their allies in Congress, and the corps of conservative commentators." While the Administration "has recovered a bit of its momentum," But Bush "and the Republican- controlled Congress still face an uphill climb. … So when The New York Times comes out with the latest exposé on a technique in the war on terror, this is red meat to the president and his supporters. 'The New York Times threw them a life preserver and they grabbed it,' says Mr. Hess."

House To Vote On Resolution Condemning NYTimes Reporting On Anti-Terror Program. CNN's The Situation Room (6/28, Blitzer) reported, "The Bush Administration and members of Congress are pounding away at the New York Times, which last week published details of a secret anti-terror program which sifts through millions of financial transactions. There are now calls for formal investigations and punishment of the newspaper."

The New York Times (6/29, Shane, 1.19M) says that today, "the House is expected to take up a Republican resolution supporting the tracking of financial transactions and condemning the publication of the existence of the program and details of how it works." The resolution says Congress "expects the cooperation of all news media organizations in protecting the lives of Americans and the capability of the government to identify, disrupt and capture terrorists by not disclosing classified intelligence programs." Democrats "are proposing a variant that expresses support for the treasury program but omits the language about the news media." The director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, "has ordered an assessment of any damage to counterterrorism efforts from the disclosures, but the review is expected to take months, and its findings are likely to remain classified."

The Washington Times (6/29, Bellantoni, 90K) reports, "House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said yesterday that the New York Times deserves to receive a formal scolding from Congress for publishing a report on a classified national security program. His comments were the opening salvo in a debate expected today in the House. … Many House Republicans agree with Mr. Hastert's sentiment, and plan to support a symbolic resolution criticizing 'certain media organizations' for revealing details of the Bush administration's counterterrorism programs."

King Says DOJ Should Investigate Government Leakers. Rep. Peter King was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (6/28) if the Justice Department should launch a criminal investigation into the government officials who provided information to the news media. King said, "Absolutely. The government should go all out against those who did the leaking. And one way to get them is to put New York Times reporters in the grand jury and ask them to reveal their sources. And if they don't, find them in contempt and put them in prison."

Snow Says It Is Inappropriate For Bush To Seek Investigation. Last night, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow addressed the controversy over the newspaper disclosures. Snow said on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (6/28), "There are a whole number of options right now, but the Bush Administration, the President is not in a position to ask for investigations. The President's not in a position." Snow added that it would be "entirely improper. …. I'll tell you what the President's done. He's expressed his feelings about it. He described the story as disgraceful."

Olson Defends Shield Law, But Says It Would Not Include National Security Matters. In a piece in the Washington Post (6/29, A27, 744K), Theodore B. Olson, former solicitor general of the United States, writes, "Forty-nine states and the District of Columbia have laws protecting the confidentiality of reporters' sources. The Justice Department has had internal standards providing protection to journalists and their sources for 30 years. Yet no such protection exists in federal law." Olson adds, "The Senate Judiciary Committee will soon take up a bill entitled the Free Flow of Information Act of 2006, sponsored by a bipartisan group of legislators and modeled in large part on the Justice Department guidelines. It does not provide an absolute privilege for confidential sources, but it does require, among other things, that a party seeking information from a journalist be able to demonstrate that the need for that information is real and that it is not available from other sources. Matters involving classified information and national security are treated differently. The current controversy over publications relative to the administration's efforts to deter terrorists does not, therefore, provide any basis for delaying or rejecting this needed legislation. This legislation is long overdue and should be enacted."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (6/29, A26, 744K) editorializes on the New York Times decision to report on the anti-terror program, and says, "We recognize that this was a controversial choice. But that does not excuse the politicians who have responded with press-bashing that scores political points at the expense of constitutional values." Rep. Peter T. King "offered a prime example of this on Fox News on Sunday when he called for criminal prosecution of reporters, editors and the publisher at the New York Times. … The reactions of President Bush and, even more, Vice President Cheney have been only slightly less chilling." The Post adds, "Those who complain about disclosures assert that the war on terrorism has changed the calculus of risk. They would prefer a media meekly obeying official demands for secrecy."

US Sues New Jersey AG Over Phone Records Inquiry. The New Jersey Law Journal (6/28, Gallagher) reports, "The day before five phone companies were to answer Zulima Farber's subpoena over whether they gave caller information to the National Security Agency without a court order, she got a response - but it was hardly the one she had sought. … The state attorney general found herself a defendant in a suit by the federal government, alleging that her inquiry threatened national security and was barred by the state secrets privilege." The Journal continues, "The government, in United States v. Farber, 06-CV-2683, filed in Trenton on June 14, asks for a declaration that the state may not enforce the subpoenas and the companies may not comply with them. … The suit claims that under the U.S. Constitution's Supremacy Clause, any attempt to obtain or disclose the records is pre-empted by the federal government's 'exclusive control over foreign intelligence gathering activities, national security, the conduct of foreign affairs, and the conduct of military affairs.' … That control is manifested in statutes like the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Act of 2004, in executive orders that govern how national security information is handled and in the government's absolute privilege to protect military and state secrets from disclosure, the complaint says." The Journal adds, "The complaint is backed by declarations from NSA Director Keith Alexander and Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte. They describe a Terrorist Surveillance Program, authorized by the president after the Sept. 11 attacks, involving NSA's collection of 'one-end foreign communications where one party is associated with . . . al Qaeda' and state that providing greater detail about the program would disclose classified intelligence. … Named as defendants besides Farber are Deputy Attorney General Cathleen O'Donnell, Consumer Affairs Director Kimberly Ricketts and the phone carriers Farber subpoenaed - AT&T Corp., Verizon Communications, Cingular Wireless, Sprint Nextel Corp. and Qwest Communications International."

Saudis Bury Guantanamo Detainee. The New York Times (6/29, Fattah, 1.19M) reports, "Hundreds of Saudis descended on a suburban cemetery here in the Saudi capital late Wednesday to bury Mani Shaman al-Utaybi, 30, one of three prisoners who committed suicide this month at the American detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba." Utaybi "was laid to rest in a nondescript grave, in keeping with Saudi tradition, at the Nassim Cemetery on the outskirts of Riyadh in a ceremony marked by displays of rare public emotion. The mourners, some of whom expressed anger over the detentions or disputed the Americans' version of the deaths, included some former Guantánamo detainees."

Florida Terror Plot Suspect's Lawyer Expects To Argue Entrapment. MSNBC's The Abrams Report (6/28, Moret) reported, "Last week, the Justice Department announced it had busted a group in Florida with plans to launch a terrorist attack here in the US," but "their attorneys are claiming this is a case of entrapment, and their clients never would have acted without the FBI informant." Albert Levin, Attorney for Patrick Abraham: "It's a little early really to say whether or not it's actually entrapment," but "I would anticipate that an entrapment defense could be utilized, based upon what the tapes reveal, based upon what the government's proof is, which…we don't have yet." Levin added, "You know, FBI agents are human beings. And following policies and procedures, that's, in a perfect world, what happens. But, sometimes, policies and procedures aren't followed. And I anticipate, maybe in this case, that was one of those times."

British Judge Rules Against Tactic Used In Terrorism Cases. The New York Times (6/29, Cowell, 1.19M) reports, "Throwing down a new challenge to the government's tactics against terrorism, a High Court judge ruled Wednesday that so-called control orders -- a form of house arrest without trial -- were incompatible with European human rights laws." The government" is expected to appeal the ruling, issued by Justice Jeremy Sullivan, while civil rights groups depicted it as a victory in a sharpening duel over the state's efforts to amass ever greater powers, ostensibly to combat terrorism. … If the government's appeal fails, the authorities will have to seek some other mechanism to continue holding the six suspects -- a Briton and five Iraqis -- whose cases prompted the ruling."

Swiss Say CIA Planes Landed In Their Country 58 Times In Past Five Years. USA Today (6/29, 2.31M) reports, "CIA planes landed in Switzerland 58 times over the past five years, nearly 10 times more than previously disclosed, the Swiss Federal Office of Civil Aviation said Wednesday." Spokesman Anton Kohler also "said there were 13 aircraft, not three as previously disclosed. Dick Marty, chief investigator for Europe's human rights watchdog, the Council of Europe, reported earlier this month that European flight logs and other evidence showed that 14 European nations colluded with U.S. intelligence in a "spider's web" of human rights abuses to help the CIA spirit terrorism suspects to illegal detention facilities. He didn't name the countries."

Columnist Notes "Terrorism Index" Findings. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (6/29, 1.19M), "After all the sound and fury of the past few years, how is the US doing in its fight against terrorism? Not too well, according to a recent survey of more than 100 highly respected foreign policy and national security experts. The survey, dubbed the 'Terrorism Index,' was conducted by the Center for American Progress and Foreign Policy magazine. The respondents included Republicans and Democrats, moderates, liberals and conservatives." The survey's findings were "striking. A strong, bipartisan consensus emerged on two crucial points: 84 percent of the respondents said the United States was not winning the war on terror, and 86 percent said the world was becoming more -- not less -- dangerous for Americans." Herbert adds, "If the respondents to this survey are correct, the US needs to be moving in an entirely different direction. The war against terror cannot be won by bombing the enemy into submission. The bull in the china shop may be frightening at first, but after a while it's just enraging. We need a better, smarter way."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Southwest Airlines Flight Diverted By Bomb Scare. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/29) reports, "A Southwest Airlines flight en route to Las Vegas was diverted to Ontario International Airport on Wednesday after a threatening note was found on board, authorities said. … The message was found scrawled in pen on at least two tray tables, indicating a bomb was on board, said FBI spokeswoman Laura Eimiller. FBI agents collected evidence and were trying to determine if the message was written during the flight or at a previous location." Southwest spokeswoman Beth Harbin "said no bombs had been found on the plane and the investigation was nearing an end." The Los Angeles Times (6/29, Reitman, 958K) notes Eimiller said that "once the plane reached cruising altitude, a passenger pulled down the seatback tray and saw 'language warning of a bomb.'"

Some Candidates From Areas With Increased Funding Criticize DHS Allocation. The Hill (6/29, Blake) reports that when the "Department of Homeland Security announced its fiscal year 2006 grant allocations," there were "few…places that actually received more grant money than in the past," and it turns out that "the department would be hard-pressed to satisfy even some House members and candidates in those areas," all of whom "have their own ideas for improving the grant-allocation process." While "incumbents are touting their efforts and justifying the gains while stressing room for improvement nationwide," many challengers are "declaring that the money their areas received is insufficient."

University Connections Seen As Conflict Of Interest For Cybersecurity Chief. The Washington Post/AP (6/29, A5) reports DHS National Cyber Security Division acting director Donald "Andy" Purdy "is a contract employee who earns $577,000 under an agreement with a private university that does extensive business with the federal office he manages. … By comparison, the Homeland Security secretary, Michael Chertoff, is paid $175,000 annually. Purdy is on loan from the school to the government, which is paying nearly all his salary. Meanwhile, Purdy's cybersecurity division has paid Carnegie Mellon $19 million in contracts this year, almost one-fifth of the unit's total budget. Purdy said he has not been involved in discussions of his office's business deals with the school." The AP notes Democratic Reps. Bennie Thompson, Loretta Sanchez and Zoe Lofgren wrote in a letter to House Republicans, "Purdy's contract 'raises questions about whether the American people are getting their money's worth."

TSA Aviation Chief Says Lighters Should Be Allowed On Planes. USA Today (6/29, Frank, 2.31M) reports that Transportation Security Administration chief Kip Hawley "says Congress should lift a ban on passengers carrying lighters on airplanes because screeners are spending too much time looking for lighters instead of bombs." He "said he has briefed lawmakers and 'recommended they consider whether that ban needs to stay.'" Lighters are "the only item that Congress has specifically banned." While "lighters are just one of 68 items passengers cannot carry on planes, they represent 80% of the confiscated items," yet, "lighters 'do not represent a particularly effective ignition source for terrorists.'"

Property Rights Dispute Slows Federal Gulf Coast Cleanup. The AP (6/29, Jordan) reports, "The government says it has not removed the Gulf Coast's remaining hurricane wreckage, enough to stack 2 miles high onto a football field, because it must respect private property rights. … Local officials charge the delay could hamper public safety during the current hurricane season." The AP continues, "Ten months after Hurricane Katrina, about one-sixth of the debris that littered the Gulf Coast remains an estimated 20 million cubic yards. Much of the rubble is from damaged homes and businesses that the Federal Emergency Management Agency says it cannot clear away without approval from property owners and insurers. … 'It's a mess and it's dangerous in the storm season,' said Marnie Winter, environmental director in Jefferson Parish, La., which borders New Orleans and extends to the Gulf of Mexico." The AP adds, "The federal agency now is considering whether to continue paying the full cost of removing debris in the disaster area; the program is set to end on Friday. … Officials in cash-strapped New Orleans and surrounding parishes said this week they want the deadline extended. Without the extra aid, Washington will pay for 90 percent of debris removal cost and local governments 10 percent. … FEMA estimates it has paid $3.6 billion for the Army Corps of Engineers and private contractors to remove about 98.6 million cubic yards of debris from Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi and Texas. Most of it has been on streets, sidewalks, curbs and other public property."

In Letter To Bush, Vitter Criticizes Army Corps' Flood Prevention Work. The New York Times (6/29, Schwartz, 1.19M) reports that Louisiana Sen. David Vitter said in a letter to be sent today to President Bush, "New Orleans still faces serious street flooding in coming storms because the Army Corps of Engineers has fallen behind in repairing the city's hurricane protection system," especially in that it has "not provided enough pumping capacity to get water out of the city's drainage canals in heavy storms." Vitter adds that "extensive flooding could occur even in heavy rainstorms…and a hurricane could have enormous consequences for the restoration of New Orleans." While the corps "has acknowledged falling behind in the effort to install enough pumps to get large amounts of water out of the drainage canals," Col. Richard P. Wagenaar, the commander of the New Orleans district says "the corps has committed to increasing the pumping capacity over time." However, "Vitter said that after months of meetings with the corps, 'there's been no adequate improvement or resolution,' and that he had 'sort of reached the breaking point.'"

Thousands Lose FEMA Rent Help At End Of June. USA Today/AP (6/29, Poovey) reports, "Hundreds of hurricane evacuees around the country could be evicted in the coming weeks if they can't pay the rent without help from the Federal Emergency Management Agency." While over "12,600 households nationwide found out in April that they were going to lose their FEMA rent subsidies," according to FEMA spokesman James McIntyre there will not be "large numbers of people…turned out on the street," as "Many have already lined up a place to live or did not need the assistance to begin with."

Former FEMA Division Director Leading Firm's New Orleans Team. Judy Sarasohn writes in her column in the Washington Post (6/29, A25, 744K), "Daniel Craig was director of the Recovery Division at the Federal Emergency Management Agency and…one of the political appointees last year who came under criticism for lack of disaster-preparedness experience." Now he's "joined the D.C. office of Florida-based law firm Akerman Senterfitt and working with the firm's newly pulled-together Disaster Preparedness and Recovery Practice Group," as well as "leading the firm's team working for New Orleans." Another member of that team is "Jim Schumann , former director of emergency preparedness and response at the Department of Homeland Security's Office of Legislative Affairs." Sarashon observes, "Washington is a great place for second acts -- and third and fourth acts, too."

WPost Says Rain Problems Reveal Weak Points In DC Evacuation Plans. The Washington Post (6/29, A26, 744K) editorializes, "The gridlock downtown Monday and Tuesday" during the torrential rains "was a reminder of how vulnerable the District remains to sliding into logistical chaos during a major emergency." Washington area emergency officials "admit that, beyond models and a trial test after last year's Fourth of July celebrations, they don't know how effective" their planned "extend green lights and…more intersection control officers" would be. "District and regional disaster planners should start assuming that D.C. streets will look like they did Tuesday should there be another terrorist attack. That means developing a better plan to communicate traffic and road conditions to tied-up motorists and a more robust regional infrastructure for coordination among emergency planners."

WAR NEWS:

Rice Visits Afghanistan In Effort To Bolster Karzai. The New York Times (6/29, Cooper, 1.19M) reports that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice visited Afghanistan yesterday where she sought "to shore up the country's besieged president, Hamid Karzai, promising that the Taliban forces that have mounted a string of attacks in the country will be defeated."

The Wall Street Journal (6/29, King, 2.11M) reports that the Bush Administration "worries that the good news [in Afghanistan] is fading. … So after trips to Baghdad in recent months, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice came to Kabul to buck up Afghan President Hamid Karzai and tout the country's progress." Rice said Afghanistan's democratic institutions "are getting stronger each day."

The Washington Post (6/29, A20, Kessler, White, 744K) reports that Rice "told Karzai that the administration was considering a boost in reconstruction funding, an aide to Rice said. The additional money -- to be directed especially at troubled areas in the south -- would be accompanied by a shift from big nationwide projects such as roads to smaller community projects." The Post notes, "Rice's itinerary on her third trip here showed how far Afghanistan still has to go. With a surge of violence touching even the capital in recent weeks, she passed her time almost entirely behind the heavily guarded high walls and concrete barriers of the U.S. Embassy and the presidential compound."

The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Gerstenzang, 958K) reported on its web site that Rice promised "additional US financial support, and focusing on small-scale projects drawn up to improve daily life more quickly than long-range and massive reconstruction efforts. She said the country, troubled anew by insurgent attacks and civilian unrest, continued to face 'strong enemies, and they're ruthless.' But she said that militants would 'not succeed in rolling back the democratic gains' achieved since the Taliban was overthrown in 2001."

The Financial Times (6/29, Morarjee) reports that Rice "emphasised Washington's strong support" for Afghan President Hamid Karzai. Rice's "brief visit to the Afghan capital was seen as a valuable boost to Mr Karzai after the toughest weeks of his presidency, during which he faced a barrage of criticism for failing to stem the southern violence or deliver reconstruction in pace with rising expectations." Rice "said the US was in Afghanistan for the long haul. 'I want to say to the Afghan people that that commitment from the international community is very strong. We are not going to tire, we are not going to leave,' she said."

The Washington Times (6/29, Kralev, 90K) reports that Rice's Afghanistan visit comes "amid the worst violence there in nearly five years." The Times adds, "A senior State Department official traveling with Miss Rice said the Kabul visit was kept secret 'out of general prudence,' given the dangerous security situation there."

The AP (6/28) reported that Rice "renewed US support for Afghanistan's embattled president during a brief and heavily guarded visit Wednesday, and said the newly democratic country has come too far to fall back into terrorism and anarchy."

UPI (6/28) said Karzai got "strong backing" from Rice. UPI added, "Rice had discussions Wednesday with top Afghan officials on issues including reconstruction projects designed to boost public morale."

DEA Official Says Afghan Heroin Trade Fueling Violence. DEA Administrator Karen Tandy told House committee yesterday that Afghanistan's production of 82 percent of the world's heroin supply has driven ongoing violence in the country. The Washington Times (6/29, Seper, 90K) reports that Tandy said the country's stability "rises and falls with the drug trade." Tandy "said her agency is making 'great progress' in targeting the drug warlords and the Afghan criminal organizations who control the heroin supply."

Broder Says Afghan, Iraqi Leaders Have "Loose Grip On Power." David Broder writes in the Washington Post (6/29, A27, 744K), "The situation the United States and its allies face in Afghanistan and Iraq is one almost without precedent. In two countries where we used our military might to rout the menacing dictatorial regimes running things, we now find ourselves sponsoring governments with notably shaky holds on popular support. … A huge American investment of money and lives now rests on two men with a loose grip on power."

Insurgents Offer To Stop Attacks If US Troops Leave Within Two Years. CNN's The Situation Room (6/28, Blitzer) reported, "The Associated Press reports that insurgent groups are offering to stop attacking coalition troops, but only if American-led forces leave Iraq within two years." CNN (McIntyre) added that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld "said he hadn't heard about this specific proposal," but "he said there have been other offers like this in the past. He was very cautious, though, about anything that would resemble horse trading with insurgents over a timetable."

ABC World News Tonight (6/28, story 5, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There are reports, today, from Iraq, that 11 Sunni insurgent groups have offered an immediate halt to all attacks, including those on American troops, if the US agrees to withdraw its forces in two years. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was asked about the offer. He says President Bush believes a timetable is not something that is useful."

The CBS Evening News (6/28, story 4, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Iraq's government said today that it has received an offer from 11 Sunni insurgent groups to stop attacking US military forces if President Bush will set a two-year timetable for withdrawing American troops. The Iraqi government did not reject the idea outright but said it is unclear when Iraqi security forces will be ready to take over."

The AP (6/29) reports that Rumsfeld said President Bush's view "remains that a timetable is not something that is useful. It is a signal to the enemies that all you have to do is just wait and it's yours." The Washington Times runs the AP Story this morning.

Official Says Iraqi Al Qaeda Member Led Shrine Bomb Attack. The New York Times (6/29, Wong, 1.19M) reports that Iraqi national security adviser Mowaffak al-Rubaie said an Iraqi affiliated with Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia "led the team that carried out the February bombing of a golden-domed Shiite shrine." The insurgent, Haitham al-Badri, "is in hiding in Iraq and being sought by government forces." Rubaie "said the Iraqi government learned the details of the shrine bombing after the capture a few days ago of Yusri Fakher Muhammad Ali, also known as Abu Qudama, a Tunisian militant who confessed to be a member of Mr. Badri's team."

Admitted Iraqi Agent Testifies About Work With Park On Oil-For-Food Program. The AP (6/29, Caruso) reports, "An Iraqi-American businessman testifying in a trial related to corruption in the United Nations' oil-for-food program spent hours Wednesday describing his efforts to help Saddam Hussein's regime get relief from economic sanctions in the 1990s. Samir A. Vincent, who pleaded guilty last year to being an unregistered agent for Iraq, said he worked for years with South Korean businessman Tongsun Park to persuade U.N. officials to allow Saddam's government to sell oil to pay for humanitarian supplies." The AP notes, "Over two days of testimony in Manhattan federal court, Vincent has described numerous meetings and communications that he said Park arranged with the former U.N. chief," Boutros Boutros-Ghali. "He also identified a series of letters in which he reported the results of those liaisons to top Iraqi officials."

Putin Vows Russian Forces Will Find, Execute Killers Of Four Russians In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (6/28, story 5, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "In Moscow today, president Vladimir Putin vowed revenge for the murders of four Russian embassy workers who were kidnapped in Iraq earlier this month and beheaded. The Kremlin said Putin has ordered Russian special forces to hunt down and destroy the killers, who were thought to be linked to al Qaeda."

The New York Times (6/29, Myers, 1.19M) reports, "The bluntness of the statement reflected the deep shock and anger — much directed at the United States — that have unfolded in Russia after the kidnapping on June 3 in an attack that killed a fifth Russian."

The Washington Times (6/29, Mainville, 90K) reports, "The Kremlin press service said yesterday that Mr. Putin 'has ordered Russia's secret services to take all necessary steps to find and destroy the criminals who committed this evil deed.' It did not say which Russian special forces are in Iraq or under what authority they would be acting in that country."

Marine Featured In Moore Film Killed In Iraq. The AP (6/29) reports, "A Marine and one-time recruiter who appeared in Michael Moore's documentary film 'Fahrenheit 9/11' has died in a roadside bombing in Iraq. Staff Sgt. Raymond J. Plouhar, 30, died Monday of wounds suffered while conducting combat operations in Iraq's volatile Anbar province, the Defense Department said Tuesday." Plouhar "is seen in the 2004 film approaching prospective recruits in a mall parking lot. … Although Plouhar willingly appeared in the movie, which is critical of the Bush administration's actions after Sept. 11, his father said Plouhar didn't realize it would criticize the war."

ABC World News Tonight (6/28, story 6, 1:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that Moore's film depicted Plouhar "as a relentless recruiter."

The CBS Evening News (6/28, story 6, 2:15, Cowan, 7.66M) reported, "The documentary shows Plouhar recruiting high school students at a mall parking lot in Flint, Michigan. Moore, who narrates the film, said Plouhar had gone to this mall because it was in a poor neighborhood where finding recruits was easy. Michael Moore had no comment on Plouhar's death."

NBC Nightly News (6/28, story 11, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Raymond Plouhar had 38 days left on his tour in Iraq when he died. He was 30 years old."

Soldiers Remember Fallen Colleague As Remains Leave Iraq. The New York Times (6/29, Filkins, 1.19M) reports, "Death comes often to the soldiers and marines who are fighting in Anbar Province, which is roughly the size of Louisiana and is the most intractable region in Iraq. … In small ways, the military tries to ensure that individual soldiers…are not forgotten in the plenitude of death. … One way is to say goodbye to the body of a fallen comrade as it leaves for the United States." The Times adds, "Whenever a soldier dies, in Iraq or anywhere else, a wave of uneasiness — fear, revulsion, guilt, sadness — ripples through the survivors."

Bin Laden To Pay Tribute To Zarqawi. CNN's The Situation Room (6/28, Verjee) reported, "CNN's confirmed that there's a message posted on an Islamic Web site that says Osama bin Laden will issue a videotaped message apparently paying tribute to Abu Musab al- Zarqawi. You'll remember the al Qaeda leader that was killed in Iraq recently. The message apparently doesn't say exactly when this video's going to be posted, and it's not even clear if Osama bin Laden himself would actually appear in it."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Specter Presses Administration To Increase Regulation Of Hedge Funds. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Scannell, 2.11M) reports Sen. Arlen Specter is "pressing the Bush administration to review and step up its investigation and enforcement of allegations of improper trading by hedge funds, including short-selling, in the wake of a recent federal appeals-court ruling that left a regulatory void over the fast-growing industry." At a Judiciary Committee hearing "on the relationship between hedge funds and independent research firms," Specter said, "It's very important there be adequate investigation [by the Justice Department and actions by Congress] if we need any new laws." In "urging federal prosecutors to examine their track record in the area, Sen. Specter suggested if they didn't have the right laws or penalties, Congress could write them." The hearing "came in the wake of a federal-appeals court decision throwing out a rule requiring most hedge-fund managers to register with the SEC, reopening the debate as to whether there should be federal oversight of the fast-growing industry."

The Washington Post (6/29, D2, Johnson, 744K) reports Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal (D) "urged Congress yesterday to heighten federal scrutiny of the secretive hedge fund industry or face the prospect of a patchwork group of state authorities stepping in to monitor the rapidly growing investment pools to prevent fraud." Blumenthal, "whose state is the headquarters for scores of hedge funds, told the Senate Judiciary Committee that last week's federal appeals court ruling striking down oversight of the funds by federal regulators left investors 'in a regulatory void, without any disclosure or accountability.'" The Post adds lawmakers "concur that the funds, which account for about 30 percent of trading each day on the New York Stock Exchange, play an important role in the economy. But they appear to disagree on who should oversee them, and how much."

Former SEC Attorney Says Political Pressure Killed Mack Probe. USA Today (6/29, Farrell, 2.31M) reports former Securities and Exchange Commission attorney Gary Aguirre "told a Senate committee Wednesday that he was fired because he tried to investigate whether a prominent Wall Street executive was involved in an inside-trading case." Aguirre said that "he was terminated last year by superiors at the Securities and Exchange Commission after he tried to issue a subpoena to Morgan Stanley CEO John Mack." Aguirre said "that his superiors froze him out of subsequent discussions of the case and that he was fired weeks later, just before completing a full year on the job."

The Hill (6/29, Schor) reports what "could have been a routine oversight hearing became a hot ticket in recent days as the committee added Gary Aguirre, a former Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) lawyer who alleges he was fired for pursuing aggressive enforcement of hedgers, to the witness list. But Aguirre told Specter he had scrapped his original testimony after the SEC informed him of possible penalties for revealing new information." Specter "took umbrage at the SEC's request to silence Aguirre without alerting his panel."

The AP (6/29, Gordon) reports, "The SEC was investigating whether the hedge fund had received a tip about an upcoming merger. … 'By mid-June, growing evidence pointed to one person, the former CEO of a large investment bank,' Aguirre said in written testimony to the Senate Judiciary Committee." The AP notes, "Under questioning by committee members, he identified the executive as John Mack, who is the chairman and chief executive of investment house Morgan Stanley Inc. … Morgan Stanley, one of the largest U.S. securities firms, said Aguirre had provided no evidence for his allegation."

Wall Street Seeking Cut In Regulation. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Smith, Lucchetti, Craig, 2.11M) reports more than "three years after the stock market bottomed out amid a storm of scandal, Wall Street is pushing hard for a reduction in its own regulation." The effort "came to a head in a five-minute encounter between two Wall Street heavyweights at a Swiss resort hotel last winter." The Journal recounts that between sessions "at the World Economic Forum at Davos, New York Stock Exchange chief John Thain ran into Thomas Russo, vice chairman of Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc." Thain said he "was concerned that big Wall Street firms like Lehman might try to delay a merger that would take the Big Board public, according to people familiar with the conversation." In reply, Russo "pressed a top priority of the Securities Industry Association, Wall Street's lobbying arm. He asked Mr. Thain for a commitment to combine some NYSE regulatory functions with another regulator, the National Association of Securities Dealers." The Russo-SIA proposal "would effectively reduce the number of national regulators overseeing and inspecting Wall Street brokerage firms from three to two, dramatically easing Wall Street's regulatory load. Although Mr. Thain agreed and the two men shook hands, the specifics were left open. Since then, the effort appears to have floundered, though the SIA continues to press the issue." The "behind-the-scenes story of Wall Street's new push for regulatory relief reflects the changed climate since the stock-market bubble burst in 2000, and state and federal regulators competed to unearth Wall Street misconduct."

Connecticut AG Urges Federal Oversight Of Hedge Funds. Bloomberg (6/29) reports, "The U.S. government should regulate the $1.2 trillion hedge-fund industry or states will step in and oversee the private investment pools, the attorney general of Connecticut told senators. … 'Right now hedge funds are in a regulatory void without any disclosure or accountability,' Attorney General Richard Blumenthal said today at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing in Washington. 'States will fill the void.'" Bloomberg continues, "Lawmakers are increasing scrutiny of hedge funds after the lightly regulated investment vehicles have more than doubled their assets over the past five years. A federal appeals court in Washington last week struck down U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission rules that required many hedge funds to register with the agency and submit to audits. … 'This is a subject of enormous importance to the United States economy,' said Senator Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican and the committee's chairman." Bloomberg adds, "Specter defended his committee's decision to hold today's hearing, which drew complaints from the Senate Banking Committee. That panel oversees the SEC and generally is charged with handling financial regulation. … Senator Charles Schumer, a member of both committees, said the hearing 'raises a yellow flag of caution' because it treads on the banking committee's turf. The judiciary panel doesn't have the financial and market expertise that the banking committee does, he said."

British Bankers Facing Enron-Related Charges In US Seek Bail In Britain. The AP (6/29, Wardell) reports, "Three British bankers who have been ordered to be extradited to the United States to face Enron-related fraud charges said Wednesday that they are in talks with U.S. authorities about the possibility of returning to Britain on bail." The AP continues, "The trio - David Bermingham, Giles Darby and Gary Mulgrew - said access to documents and witnesses in Britain was crucial to preparing a defense for a trial in Enron's home state of Texas. … The three men lost a last-ditch appeal on Tuesday to the European Court of Human rights against British court rulings that they be extradited for trial. … 'We would love bail conditions that would allow us to come back here and prepare for our defense,' said Bermingham. 'We can't prepare for our defense in Texas.'" The AP adds, "However, Bermingham was not optimistic about securing bail in Britain because they are considered fugitives from justice in the United States and therefore are flight risks. … The men will be held in a maximum-security facility in Houston if they do not receive bail, making it more difficult to prepare their defense against crimes allegedly committed against a British company in Britain."

Morgan Stanley Asks Court To Overturn Perelman Judgment. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Craig) reports, "Last year a court ruled against Morgan Stanley in a case focused on the firm's actions surrounding the sale of a company controlled by billionaire financier Ronald Perelman, to Sunbeam Corp., which was a Morgan Stanley client. The court railed against Morgan Stanley's repeated inability to produce documents and the jury awarded Mr. Perelman $1.58 billion. For each day that passes, Mr. Perelman makes about $300,000 in interest payments on the original award, though the final payment hinges on the outcome of Morgan Stanley's appeal." The Journal adds, "Yesterday Morgan Stanley's lawyer, Bruce Rogow, asked the court to throw out that verdict, saying the punishment far outweighed the firm's misdeeds. Moreover, he argued, the lower-court judge stripped Morgan Stanley of its right to properly defend itself and applied the wrong law to the case, resulting in further damages to the firm." The Journal notes, "The stakes are high for Morgan Stanley, which a year ago installed a new chief executive officer and is trying to move beyond some of its past legal missteps, notably this verdict which has caused it much public embarrassment and put an unfavorable spotlight on its lack of internal controls. The firm has set aside $360 million to cover the award and has made no serious settlement offers, according to people familiar with the matter."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Interior Department Employee Charged In Abramoff Probe. In the ongoing corruption investigation related to lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Interior Department Insular Affairs Office employee Roger G. Stillwell has been charged with filing a false financial disclosure over gifts he received from Abramoff while working as a contract employee for the department.

The Washington Post (6/29, A3, Schmidt, Grimaldi, 744K) reports, "Stillwell is an officer on the desk that handles the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, a U.S. territory whose government hired Abramoff as a lobbyist. … During the 1990s, before Stillwell joined the Interior Department, his communications firm did work for the Marianas government, according to an audit by the island government. Stillwell, a Democrat, said in the interview with The Post that he worked closely with Abramoff when their representation of the island government overlapped beginning in 1995."

Roll Call (6/29, Bresnahan) adds that Stillwell "will plead guilty next month" and "is reportedly cooperating with federal prosecutors in their ongoing corruption probe of Abramoff's activities." Roll Call notes, "Interior Department officials acknowledged that they were aware of the allegation against Stillwell, but they declined to say what steps they would take regarding his future employment at the agency, citing the criminal case against him." The New York Times (6/29, 1.19M) also briefly reports on the charge against Stillwell, under the headline "Misdemeanor Charge For Official Linked To Abramoff."

The Legal Times (6/29, Schwartz) reports, "The charges against Stillwell are the first connected to the Abramoff scandal to touch the Interior Department, and they mark an expansion of the government's ongoing investigation into public corruption involving the convicted lobbyist. So far five people -- Abramoff and former associates Michael Scanlon, Tony Rudy, Neil Volz and Adam Kidan -- have pleaded guilty. Earlier this month, David Safavian, the former top procurement officer at the Office of Management and Budget, was convicted on four charges of making false statements and obstructing justice stemming from his dealings with Abramoff. … Reached at his office, Stillwell referred questions about the charges to his attorney, Justin Murphy of Crowell & Moring. Murphy confirmed that Stillwell, who started working at the Interior Department in 2001, has been cooperating with government officials, but he declined to name the "prohibited source" of the gifts cited in the government filing. A hearing is set for July 21 before U.S. Magistrate Judge Deborah Robinson." The Times notes, "Stillwell told The Washington Post late last year that he accepted free dinners at Abramoff's restaurant, Signatures, and complimentary tickets to Washington Redskins games. But he told the Post that those activities 'occurred while he was a contract employee at Interior, not a federal worker.' … Stillwell told Legal Times Wednesday that the Post misquoted him, but he would not elaborate."

NYTimes Denounces Third-Party Payments To Reed As "Hypocritical." The New York Times (6/29, 1.19M) editorializes, "The grinning, spectral presence of Jack Abramoff…is the last image any Republican candidate needs wafting about this campaign year. But there Mr. Abramoff stands in a photograph from his infamous 2002 golf junket…beaming next to Ralph Reed…who is running hard now for lieutenant governor of Georgia." The Times notes, "Mr. Reed said he had assurances he would not be paid with gambling profits, and indeed Mr. Abramoff was concerned that his associate's choirboy image not seem 'kind of like hypocritical,' according to one tribal witness. So the money was simply laundered through third parties — nonprofit charities and advocacy groups. … Talk about kind of like hypocritical."

FBI Busts Two Major Movie Piracy Rings. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/29, Hays) reports, "The FBI broke up two movie piracy rings Wednesday that authorities said specialized in sneaking digital camcorders into theaters and shooting hit films, then duplicating and distributing millions of bootlegs worldwide. Agents arrested 13 people in raids across" New York City, and "some of the DVD knockoffs included the FBI warning seen at the start of legitimate discs – 'no small irony,' Mark Mershon, head of the FBI's New York office, said at a news conference." The AP notes, "The FBI learned that assistants were used to surround 'cammers,' people who specialize in covertly filming movies, to conceal their filming and prevent people from blocking the view." The New York Times (6/29, Hartocollis, 1.19M) adds Mershon noted that "the rings are two of the largest in the world," and he and MPAA anti-piracy official Michael Robinson "said movies were often recorded at theaters in New York City and its suburbs and then sent over the Internet to distribution hubs in Pakistan, Singapore, Hong Kong and Malaysia. They said that it was hard to estimate how much the operations were worth, but that the economic impact on attendance at theaters and the sale of legitimate videotapes and DVD's was in the billions of dollars."

Newsday (6/29, DeStefano) reports, "FBI agents discovered evidence that the defendants were on the verge of making and distributing counterfeit copies of the new film 'Superman Returns' which opened yesterday. 'This is about thieves, pretty ingenious thieves to be sure, who are technically sophisticated,'" Mershon said. "Dubbed 'Operation Knock Off,' the nearly three-year-long investigation used undercover agents and confidential informants to break up what amounted to two criminal syndicates that pirated movies and fed them into a massive illegal industry selling millions of counterfeit DVDs." Under the headline "Feds Rescue 'Superman,' Nab Pirating Men Of Steal," the New York Daily News (6/29, Zambito, 729K) notes, "Cooperating witnesses, together with undercover agents, helped penetrate the ring's inner workings, revealing a multitiered operation that employed "blockers" to insure a clear shot of the screen and conceal video recording equipment."

The New York Sun (6/29, Solomont) adds Mershon said that "the effects of the operation likely will be seen immediately. The defendants 'are believed to be responsible for 50% of the piracy and the distribution of pirated DVDs worldwide. That is substantial,' he said. 'In the very short term, you may see the disruption in availability in new releases.'" The New York Post (6/29, Bulliet, Cornell, 624K) also notes Mershon said, "We believe it to be the largest video piracy syndicate worldwide," and reports, "The distributors allegedly bought masters for anywhere from $40 to several hundred dollars each and then mass-produced them, selling copies for anywhere from $7 to $10 each. 'We had a camcorder making $400,000 a year just by delivering recordings two to three times a week,' said Scott McGaunn, a special agent with the FBI." BBC News (6/28) and CNET News.com (6/28, Sandoval) also reports on the FBI arrests.

Retired FBI Supervisor Defends Bulger Oversight. The Boston Globe (6/29, Murphy, 484K) reports, "A retired FBI supervisor yesterday defended the bureau's handling of longtime informants James 'Whitey' Bulger and Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi, saying he was unaware the gangsters were involved with murders and had a corrupt relationship with other agents. 'I thought they were involved in gambling, and I assumed they were involved in loan-sharking,' said James Ring, who supervised the organized-crime squad of the FBI's Boston office between 1983 and 1990. But he said he didn't believe they were involved in murder." The Globe adds that Ring "testified that in the 1980s the FBI's organized crime squad was focusing on La Cosa Nostra…as well as members of the Sicilian Mafia, who were entrenched locally. The FBI decimated New England's Patriarca crime family with a wave of successful prosecutions. Though Bulger and Flemmi provided information about local Mafia leaders, Ring described them as 'outsiders, looking in' who weren't as valuable as informants who were 'made' members of the mob."

Defense Lawyers Say KPMG Legal Fee Ruling Could Help In AIPAC Case. The New York Sun (6/29, Gerstein) reports Tuesday's ruling by US District Judge Lewis Kaplan "that the government improperly pressured an accounting firm, KPMG, not to pay for the legal defense of a group of the firm's employees could be a boon to two pro-Israel lobbyists facing trial in Virginia." Although "Kaplan's decision is not binding in other cases," Keith Weissman's lawyer, John Nassikas, told the Sun yesterday, "I'd like to think it's going to be read by the Aipac folks in a way that they're going to see a lot of judicial force behind the idea employees and managers should have their legal fees paid by their organization." Steven Rosen's lawyer, Abbe Lowell, also said that "he was closely reviewing the KPMG decision," but AIPAC spokesman Patrick Dorton "said there is no parallel between the two cases."

MS-13 Member Pleads Guilty To Racketeering Charges In Maryland Murder. The Washington Post (6/29, B4, Klein, 744K) reports, "A member of the Mara Salvatrucha street gang pleaded guilty yesterday in U.S. District Court in Baltimore to racketeering in connection with burning evidence from a homicide scene, among other criminal acts, Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein said." Juan "Diabolico" Lopez "was the first person to plead guilty as a result of an indictment last August involving 19 alleged MS-13 members accused of committing homicides and other violent crimes in the Maryland suburbs." The Post notes, "He pleaded guilty to being involved in a killing on March 26, 2005," which "occurred after Lopez and other MS-13 members confronted members of a rival gang at a strip mall in Prince George's County, according to the plea agreement."

Mack Lawyer Seeking To Bar All Reno Prosecutors, Judges From Case. The AP (Sonner) reports, "A lawyer for the wealthy ex-owner of a Reno pawn shop accused of killing his wife and shooting a Washoe County judge filed an unprecedented motion Wednesday seeking to bar all county prosecutors and judges from any involvement in the case due to alleged conflicts of interest." Darren Mack is scheduled to be arraigned today, and the motions filed yesterday by his attorney, Scott Freeman, "argue the case should be handled by outside prosecutors because Washoe County District Attorney Richard Gammick is a longtime acquaintance of Mack, and that Mack's fate should be determined by judges outside the county partly because the sniper attack on Family Court Judge Chuck Weller, who was handling the couple's divorce, occurred at the courthouse."

Rival Gang Members Testify Aryan Brotherhood Too Weak To Incite Prison Riot. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/29, Flaccus) reports, "Two black prison gang members testified Wednesday that the notorious Aryan Brotherhood was too small and weak to attack a rival black gang behind bars and incite a race war that left two inmates dead. The testimony of the witnesses, members of the Crips and Black Guerrilla Family, came in the final days of a sweeping federal racketeering trial against the white supremacist gang." The AP notes, "The trial was recessed until July 6, when an attorney for the fourth defendant, Christopher Gibson, will begin his defense. Closing arguments are expected to begin July 11."

South Carolina Official Charged With Bribery As FBI Launches Corruption Task Force. The Orangeburg (SC) Times & Democrat (6/29, Crider) reports, "John Rickenbacker has been indicted by a federal grand jury and suspended from public office following allegations the longtime leader of Orangeburg County Council was caught in bribery sting. An indictment unsealed Wednesday alleges Rickenbacker took $50,000 from an FBI officer posing as a consultant for a company wanting to buy The Regional Medical Center. In exchange for the money, he gave the agent an advance copy of a study of hospital finances, along with a promise to use his influence in getting Orangeburg and Calhoun counties to agree to sell the publicly owned hospital, according to the indictment." The Times & Democrat notes, "The indictment was announced during a morning press conference at the Columbia FBI office held by state and federal law enforcement officials announcing the creation of a Public Corruption Task Force." The AP (6/29) adds that US Attorney Reggie Lloyd said, "We believe that an act of public corruption is no less criminal than a violent crime committed on the streets. Abusing an office at the expense of the elector does violence to the public's trust and our very system of government."

The State (6/29, Beam) reports Lloyd announced Rickenbacker's indictment "at a news conference Wednesday morning touting the creation of a public corruption task force. … Brian Lankin, special agent in charge of the Columbia FBI office, said the creation of the task force is not in response to a specific investigation or 'an increase in activity here in South Carolina.' Officials said the task force 'formalizes' the cooperation of state and federal agencies." Lankin and State

DOJ_NMG_0037388

Law Enforcement Division chief Robert Stewart "would not say how many agents have been assigned to work on public corruption cases in South Carolina. However, they did call it a top priority in criminal investigations." WIS-TV Columbia (6/28, Miskewicz, Horne) reports on its Web site from two stories broadcast yesterday, "Corruption is the focus of the new task force that named Rickenbacker as its first suspect." Larkin "talks about the group's mission, 'We bring our collective talent and rich history, pool our assets together to address corruption in communities.' … The FBI says fighting corruption is its number one priority, but that it's been stretched since 9/11 with national security, too. So they say the task force helps."

Jury Begins Deliberations In Chicago Patronage Trial. The Chicago Tribune (6/29, Mihalopoulos, Bush, 643K) reports, "Jurors began deliberating Wednesday in the City Hall corruption trial and chose a 52-year-old professor from the northwest suburbs as their foreman." The Tribune notes, "Shortly after a lunch break, the jurors sent out a note asking for an inventory of evidence because they could not locate interview notes or an official report compiled by John Hauser, the lead FBI agent in the hiring investigation. Coar told jurors that Hauser's notes and the report were not evidence. … Sullivan's attorney, Cynthia Giacchetti, focused on Hauser's notes and report in her closing argument Tuesday. Giacchetti said the documents are not reliable because Hauser did not record exactly what Sullivan told investigators." The AP (6/29) also reports on the start of jury deliberations.

NYPD Officials Doubt Independent DeVecchio Investigator's Beating Claim. The New York Sun (6/29, Capeci) reports in its "Gang Land" column, Angela Clemente has been "hailed in tabloid stories as an amateur sleuth who helped crack one of the FBI's dirtiest secrets: how a top agent helped a mob hit man carry out murders. Today, however, cops are wondering whether…Clemente was spinning tales about a mysterious beating she suffered in the parking lot of a Brooklyn shopping center two weeks ago. They are also investigating possible financial ties" she "may have with associates of the Colombo crime family, Gang Land has learned. There are 'gaping holes' in Ms. Clemente's story, a law enforcement source said. Another said detectives have 'serious doubts' about her account of the beating." The New York Daily News (6/29, Mosconi, 729K) notes Clemente, who is "credited with helping crack the murder case against ex-FBI agent Lindley DeVecchio," twice has "failed to show up twice to meet with a police sketch artist to help nail her alleged attacker, the Daily News has learned. … Although cops and Brooklyn prosecutors are still treating her as a victim, some investigators say they are troubled by a number of other issues surrounding Clemente's claims. She told cops that notes left on her car two days in a row by her mysterious tipster were in an envelope that she saved in the backseat of her car. Police have never found them. … She also gave police varying accounts of what her assailant looked like."

Judge Threatens To Charge Salah Lawyer With Contempt. The AP (6/29, Robinson) reports that in preliminary hearings for the trial of Muhammad Salah, accused of "taking part in a racketeering conspiracy that included funneling cash to Hamas to commit murders, bombings and other violence in Israel," US District Judge Amy St. Eve threatened to charge defense lawyer Michael Deutsch with contempt "Wednesday as fireworks erupted over a government request to keep juror names secret. … Deutsch said he planned to file court papers opposing the government's request but added that 'I know what the outcome will be.' He said that based on St. Eve's rulings over the last two years he saw little difference between the court and the federal prosecutors in the case." The AP adds, "Deutsch told reporters after the hearing that the government's jury secrecy request was guaranteed to prejudice the jurors against the defendants."

Judge Enters Not Guilty Plea For Former Miami Executive Charged With Fraud. The AP (6/29) reports, "A federal judge entered a not guilty plea for a former cable executive accused of defrauding the U.S. government and media companies of more than $18 million because he did not respond during a hearing Wednesday." The AP continues, "Charles C. Hermanowski, who once led the family-owned, Miami-based Americable International Inc., was extradited to the United States from Australia over the weekend. … U.S. Magistrate Judge Ted Bandstra entered the not guilty plea for Hermanowski after the former executive refused to respond during the hearing." The AP adds, "Hermanowski faces 50 counts of attempting to defraud the U.S. Department of Defense by overcharging for cable systems installed on military bases, defrauding cable programmers by underreporting the number of his cable subscribers to avoid paying fees and federal income tax evasion. … He had originally faced 37 additional charges, but the court and Australia refused to extradite him on those counts, his attorney Donald Bierman said. … Bond has not been sought for Hermanowski, who remains in pretrial detention, Bierman said."

Bush Requests $160.5 Million In Emergency Funding To Help VA Pay For ID Theft. The Washington Post/AP (6/29) reports President Bush sent a letter to Speaker Dennis Hastert asking "for $160.5 million in emergency funds to help veterans and military personnel whose personal information was on a laptop computer stolen from a Veterans Affairs employee." He "said he was asking for the additional money to help the VA cover the increased costs caused by the May 3 theft. The money would help provide credit monitoring and fraud watch services for those affected." On Tuesday VA Secretary Jim Nicholson said "the money would cover monitoring for about half of the 17.5 million people whose Social Security numbers were compromised. He said it also would pay for out-of-pocket expenses ranging from $10,000 to $20,000 for those whose identities are stolen."

Democrats Criticize Plan To Shift Funds From Other Programs. The White House has proposed shifting money from other domestic programs to pay for the ID theft, a move criticized by Democratic Sens. Patrick Leahy and Patty Murray. The New York Times (6/29, Zernike, 1.19M) quotes Sen. Leahy saying, "The Bush-Cheney administration has no qualms about coming up here and twisting our arms for funding for Iraq, but when it comes to needs here at home for veterans and other ordinary Americans, it's rob Peter to pay Paul." OMB Director Rob Portman "recommended paying for the monitoring by taking about $130 million from a food stamp employment and training program, a farmers' assistance program, student loans and a program for young people released from prison." But "Murray said the problem was 'a new disaster' and 'deserves new money.' She added, 'This is truly an emergency.'"

Documents Suggest Analyst Had Approval To Work On VA Data From Home. As VA Secretary James Nicholson prepares to testify before a House committee about the data theft Thursday, new documents raise questions about whether the VA employee who was responsible for allowing the theft had actually been authorized to work on the data at home. USA Today/AP (6/29, Yen) reports the VA documents "raise questions as to whether top officials condoned a practice that led to a theft with the potential to affect 26.5 million veterans and active-duty troops." The VA analyst "had approval as early as Sept. 5, 2002, to use special software at home that was designed to manipulate large amounts of data." A second Feb. 5, 2002 agreement "allowed the worker to access Social Security numbers for millions of veterans." And a third, "also issued in 2002, gave the analyst permission to take a laptop computer and accessories for work outside of the VA building." The VA has accused the analyst of being "grossly negligent," but some lawmakers "expressed dismay over the latest disclosure." Rep. Bob Filner, a top Democrat on the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, said, "The gross negligence in this case are the people above him."

NIH Credit Union Hit By Identity Thieves. The Washington Post (6/29, B3, Trejos) reports, "The National Institutes of Health's federal credit union has notified some customers that their personal information has been compromised by an identity theft scheme, officials said yesterday." The Post continues, "Lindsay A. Alexander, chief executive of the credit union, would not disclose how many of the institution's 41,000 customers were affected, but she did say it was a small number. 'They already know who they are, and we know who they are, and we're working with them,' she said." The Post adds, "The Rockville-based credit union's clients include employees of NIH, several biotech companies and hospitals such as Sibley Memorial in Northwest Washington. Students and employees at George Washington University also have accounts there. … Alexander said she was not authorized to disclose many details about the case. She said the theft happened recently, but she would not specify when. She also said she could not reveal what type of information was stolen or how it was stolen. … Local and federal agencies are investigating, she said, but she would not identify which ones."

OMB Orders Security Updates After Laptop Thefts. InformationWeek (6/29, Keizer) reports, "The White House has given federal agencies 45 days to beef up safeguards to prevent citizen identities from being lost or stolen, the latest reaction to the numerous data disclosures suffered by the government in May and June." IW continues, "The Office of Management and Budget (OMB) issued a memorandum last week to all federal departments and agencies reminding administrators of long-standing data security requirements, but also made new recommendations. … Among them: encrypt all data on mobile computers and devices, only allow remote access to government networks using token- or card-based two-factor authentication, and log all instances when data is extracted from federal databases." IW adds, "The government has been embarrassed by several prominent data breaches, including the massive May VA incident, the loss of two Federal Trade Commission (FTC) notebooks, a large disclosure of U.S. Navy personnel identities, and a breach at the Department of Agriculture. … The OMB's timetable means that agencies have until August 7 to comply with the security standards laid out in Deputy Director for Management Clay Johnson's memo."

Federal-Private Coalition Launches ID Theft Research Center. Cox News Service (6/29, Mullin) reports, "LexisNexis and IBM Corp. joined universities and law enforcement agencies Wednesday to announce a new center to study the problem of identity theft. 'This will be a unique alliance of government, law enforcement, corporate enterprise and academia to find solutions for a comprehensive research plan for combating identify theft,' said Gary Gordon, executive director of the new Center for Identity Management and Information Protection. Founding partners of the center, to be housed at Utica College…also include the U.S. Secret Service, the FBI, Carnegie Mellon University, Indiana University and Syracuse University." CNET News.com (6/28, Kawamoto) notes, "The center expects to operate on a budget of nearly $500,000 in its first year, of which half is coming from corporations and the other half from federal grants, Gordon said. … 'Identity theft is a growing problem with significant negative effects on American businesses and individual citizens and potentially disastrous effects on U.S. national security,' James Burns, the acting assistant director of the FBI's criminal investigative division, said in a statement. 'From this threat, the CIMIP was born.'

Federal Computer Week (6/28, Chan) reports, "A collaborative effort would produce better tools for catching cybercriminals, law enforcement officials said at the press briefing. … 'We'd love an opportunity to look at trends,' said Ray Morrow, acting assistant deputy director of the FBI's Criminal Investigation Division. He said he believes law enforcement officials have not been able to see trends in cybercrime. 'It gives us a chance to be proactive,' he added." Government Computer News (6/28, Jackson) adds that CIMIP's "first project will be a study with the Justice Department's Office of Justice Programs of emerging criminal groups engaged in identity theft. Future research will focus on detection and prevention of identity theft; the role of policy, legislation and regulation; improvement of authentication systems; and data protection technology." GCN also notes Morrow said, "It will help us to be proactive rather than reactive, which we haven't been able to do recently."

House Rejects Effort To Undercut SCOTUS "Knock And Announce" Ruling. The AP (6/29, Taylor) reports, "The House rejected a liberal Democrat's bid to undercut a recent Supreme Court decision permitting evidence obtained in violation of the 'knock and announce' rule to be used at trial. … The vote came two weeks after the court ruled that evidence seized by police with a warrant who barge into homes even if they don't knock can be used in court." The AP continues, "By a 310-109 vote, the House rejected an amendment by Rep. Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y., blocking the Justice Department from obtaining evidence in violation of the knock and announce rule. The vote came as the House debated a $59.8 billion measure funding the budget of the Justice Department and other agencies. … 'The knock and announce policy is enshrined in the Constitution in the context of the Fourth Amendment,' Hinchey said. 'It is held up by numerous Supreme Court decisions over the last 100 years.'" The AP adds, "Civil libertarians have predicted that police will now feel free to ignore previous court rulings that officers with search warrants must knock and announce themselves or run afoul of the Constitution's ban on unreasonable searches."

High Court Rejects Foreign Convicts' Appeal. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Ben Winograd, 2.11M) reports, "The Supreme Court denied appeals from two foreign convicts who were arrested in the U.S. but weren't informed of their Vienna Convention right to have their consulates notified, a ruling that parts with two earlier decisions of the International Court of Justice." The 6-3 ruling "vindicated the Bush administration, which argued before the court on behalf of the states of Oregon and Virginia and has bristled at international treaties it sees as impinging on US sovereignty." Written by Chief Justice John Roberts, the opinion" means that prosecutors won't be hindered if law-enforcement officers fail to inform suspects that they can ask police to notify local consulates of their arrest. This is mandated by the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, which the US ratified in 1969."

The New York Times (6/29, Greenhouse, 1.19M) says the decision "left foreign defendants with little practical recourse for violations of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, a treaty the United States ratified in 1969."

The Washington Post (6/29, A4, Lane, 744K) reports, "In dissent, Justice Stephen G. Breyer protested that the court's 'approach leaves States free to deny effective relief for Convention violations, despite America's promise to provide just such relief.'" The opinion, he added, "risks weakening respect abroad for the rights of foreign nationals, a respect that America, in 1969, sought to make effective throughout the world."

he Legal Times (6/29, Mauro) reports, "Foreign nationals who prove violations of the treaty are not entitled to the suppression of evidence obtained during the arrest or any other procedural favors, Roberts wrote. Roberts also said rulings of the International Court of Justice deserve 'respectful consideration' but cannot trump U.S. procedural rules. … But dissenters, led by Justice Stephen Breyer, said the ruling represented an 'unprecedented' repudiation of a valid treaty and of the international court's interpretation of the treaty. Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg joined Breyer in dissent."

Kerik Said To Be Close To Pleading Guilty Over Improper Gifts. The New York Times (6/29, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports that former New York City police commissioner Bernard B. Kerik "is close to reaching an agreement with prosecutors to plead guilty to having accepted improper gifts totaling tens of thousands of dollars while he was a city official in the late 1990's." Although he "will not face jail time," he "is expected to pay a substantial fine." Kerik was nominated by "President Bush… to head the Department of Homeland Security in December 2004. But he was forced to withdraw a week later, citing possible tax problems involving his family's nanny."

Rainbow Family Seeks Larger Courthouse For Trials. The Rocky Mountain News (6/28, Frazier, Lindsay) reports, "Rainbow Family members on trial for camping without a permit and other charges should be tried in a larger public courtroom – not a small, rural firehouse near Steamboat Springs, attorney David Lane said today." The News continues, "In a complaint filed in U.S. District Court in Denver, Lane said the public and some of the attorneys for more than 200 Rainbow Family members facing trial were denied access. … He said the firehouse's limited space effectively turned the trials into 'secret proceedings,' and he has asked for a temporary restraining order to stop the proceedings." The News adds, "An estimated 20,000 members of the Rainbow Family plan to gather next week in the Routt National Forest, but they have been unable to get a permit for the gathering because of the fire danger. About 4,000 members have already arrived. … U.S. Marshals and Forest Service enforcement officers have arrested about 249 members for camping without a permit. Some also face alcohol and drugs charges. … The trials, which started last weekend and were scheduled to resume Friday, were held in the modest firehouse, which had room to seat the judge and 17 defendants and prosecutors. There was limited standing room for the public and the media."

Congress Examines Options To Recoup Lost Oil, Gas Royalties. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Fialka, 2.11M) reports Congress is "weighing its options as lawmakers seek ways to recoup billions of dollars in lost royalties from dozens of oil companies that are paying below-market prices on oil and natural gas from offshore government tracts in the Gulf of Mexico." The House has "passed and the Senate Appropriations Committee is considering a measure that would punish companies that refuse to renegotiate the leases, granted by the Interior Department in 1998 and 1999, by barring them from bidding on new leases." The House is also "to vote today on a measure proposed by Rep. Richard Pombo, a California Republican, that would require companies that won't agree to pay a higher royalty to pay a 'conservation of resources fee' that would add $9 a barrel or $1.25 for each thousand cubic feet of natural gas produced." Meanwhile, Rep. Darrell Issa is promoting an approach that "wouldn't punish the companies but would encourage them to renegotiate the contracts to raise their royalty payments as 'the right thing to do.'"

Firms Compete For DOE Backing For Cellulosic Ethanol Biorefineries. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, A1, Fialka, Kilman, 2.11M) reports in a front page story on "a new U.S. fuel source: Cellulosic ethanol, which can be made from crop residues, wood chips, switchgrass and even municipal garbage." The effort "to make cellulosic ethanol into a full-blown power source to run America's cars is embryonic, and its outcome uncertain. But the fuel has two big things going for it: High oil prices and backing from the Bush administration, which sees it as a potentially important part of future energy supplies and is putting up money to help launch the first 'biorefineries' to make it." Supporters "think it could reduce U.S. dependence on imported oil, cut emissions that cause global warming and shore up the nation's rural economy. Already, the race is attracting big names, with the likes of Archer-Daniels-Midland Co., Royal Dutch Shell Group and Goldman Sachs Group Inc., investing time and seed money." The Energy Department is "staging a competition for its backing to build the nation's first three plants. The department, which has $160 million to spend on the contest, is requiring each candidate to have a pilot plant showing a process that can be successful once it is scaled up. At least 30 companies are in the running for the aid, industry officials say."

Tobacco Firms Accused Of Marketing Flavored Cigarettes To Teens. In a Washington Post op-ed (6/29, A27), Joseph A. Califano Jr., president of the National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse at Columbia University, and Louis W. Sullivan, president emeritus of the Morehouse School of Medicine, say, "Reynolds Tobacco (or RJR), the company that brought us Joe Camel, is up to its old tricks, targeting our children again." RJR is "marketing the sweet smell and taste of flavored cigarettes that mask the harshness of natural tobacco, which can deter some first-time smokers, especially children. These cigarettes are packaged in shiny tins with cool new names, flashy advertising and candy flavors ranging from watermelon ("Beach Breezer") to berry ("Bayou Blast") to pineapple and coconut ("Kauai Kolada")." By "masking the regular tobacco flavor and scent, flavored cigarettes make it even more appealing for a 12- or 13-year-old to take that initial puff and keep smoking until he or she gets hooked."

Will Says Campaign Finance Laws Include Hidden Corruption. In his Washington Post column (6/29, A27), George Will says although many reformers "say 'corruption' is secret, hence they cannot be expected to document it, some serious corruption is hardly hidden. It is in the legislative history of McCain-Feingold. Bob Bauer, a Democratic campaign lawyer, notes that the law, although marketed as a measure for clean government, was an opportunity for incumbents' self-aggrandizement. They exploited the opportunity, enacting special protections against wealthy opponents, and 'blackouts' on much preelection advertising. These they justified as enabling them to control the content of political discourse in election seasons, and enabling them, as Bauer says, to 'avoid the indignity of 'negative' ads directed against them.'"

DOJ Clears Georgia Voter ID Law. The AP (6/29, McCaffrey) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice on Wednesday approved rules governing Georgia's new photo IDs for voters, clearing the way for the State Election Board to decide whether to require them for the July 18 primary." The AP continues, "The rules establish what kinds of documents must be presented to obtain one of the free IDs, as well as where and when they will be distributed. Critics of the law -- which mandates that all voters present a government-issued photo ID to cast a ballot -- are expected to respond by seeking an injunction to block the law." The AP adds, "The Republican-backed law was passed in 2005, but a federal judge blocked enforcement, saying it amounted to an unconstitutional poll tax. The state Legislature amended the law early this year to make the IDs free of charge. … Under rules the Election Board adopted last week by a 3-1 vote, anyone needing a voter ID card must provide one or more documents showing date of birth, evidence of being registered to vote, and proof of name and address."

Hollywood, FL, Continues Mediation Efforts In Synagogue Dispute. The Miami Herald (6/29, Wright) reports, "Hollywood commissioners were poised late tonight to reject a settlement with an Orthodox Jewish synagogue, but after hours of emotional debate decided to give mediation one last try." The Herald continues, "For the first time, officials from the city and Hollywood Community Synagogue Chabad Lubavitch will sit down face to face to try to avoid a federal religious discrimination trial. U.S. Justice Department attorneys plan to attend to help negotiate. … If that fails, the city will again face the possibility of going to court." The Herald notes, "The city could have agreed to pay $2 million to the Hollywood Community Synagogue Chabad Lubavitch and allowed it to operate permanently out of two houses in a residential neighborhood. The congregation would have also been able to expand within the block with little regard for city zoning rules. … In return, the Chabad and the U.S. Justice Department would have dropped their lawsuits against the city and Commissioner Sal Oliveri, effectively ending a five-year dispute."

Justices Uphold Almost All Of Texas Redistricting Engineered By DeLay. The CBS Evening News (6/28, story 7, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The US Supreme Court today upheld most of a Texas redistricting plan engineered by former House Republican Leader Tom DeLay. The plan redrew congressional districts in 2003 in favor of Republicans, who then picked up six seats in 2004. The court said that was all right except in one district where the power of Hispanic voters was diluted." The Houston Chronicle (6/29, Reinert, 581K) notes that by a 5-4 vote, "the court said the 23rd District in southwest Texas, represented by Republican Henry Bonilla, violated the Voting Rights Act because its design trampled the rights of some Hispanic voters. Reshaping the district, a task that apparently now is assigned to federal court in Texas, would force a change in at least one other neighboring district." The Supreme Court also "upheld the right of states to change their congressional district boundaries more frequently than the traditional every 10 years following each US Census." The AP (6/29, Espo) reports "only two justices, John Paul Stevens and Stephen Breyer, said the mid-decade redistricting showed that the Texas lawmakers were guilty of excessive partisanship."

Much of the coverage describes the ruling as a big win for the GOP, and particularly for former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. NBC Nightly News (6/28, story 4, 2:25, P. Williams, 9.87M), for example, reported, "Today's decision is a sweet victory for Tom DeLay, the embattled former congressman and onetime House Republican leader." DeLay said the ruling vindicates his strategy." Tom DeLay, former House Majority Leader: "We used the state legislative system and what came out of that was a fair map that represented the political will of the people of Texas." Williams: "Democrats claim DeLay's tactic was unconstitutional, purely partisan, changing the boundaries in the middle of a decade when the Constitution calls for it only every ten years to adjust for census results. But by a 7-2 vote, the Supreme Court rejected the challenge."

The Chicago Tribune (6/29, Bendavid, 643K) reports the ruling ensures that "the political legacy of former Rep. Tom DeLay will live on despite his downfall." The New York Times (6/29, Greenhouse, 1.19M) says that "in political terms, the ruling was something of a vindication for Mr. DeLay, who stepped down from his leadership post and resigned from Congress this year after being indicted last year in Texas on charges of illegally routing campaign contributions to Texas Republicans." His indictment "was related to his effort to win control of the Texas Legislature in 2002; it was that development that allowed the redistricting to go forward, helping Republicans to win six additional House seats in Texas in 2004."

The Washington Post (6/29, A4, Weisman, 744K) runs a story titled "Effort To Secure Texas Led To Fall Of Tom DeLay," in which it notes "DeLay's dogged quest for a new congressional map for Texas led to a disciplinary slap from the House ethics committee, his indictment on money-laundering charges, his fall from the House leadership ranks and, this month, his resignation from Congress." But "the former House majority leader proclaimed yesterday that the Supreme Court's decision to uphold most of his legislative map affirmed his contention that partisan power is reason enough to muscle through new congressional district lines."

Fox News' Special Report (6/28, Kendall) reported, "It is a major victory for republicans and for Tom DeLay." CNN's The Situation Room (6/28, Crowley) also referred to "a Republican-friendly political map driven and largely written by Tom DeLay."

A number of stories, meanwhile, express concern that the court's decision will lead to other states launching similar redistricting processes, which, says the Dallas Morning News (6/29, Pusey, Gillman), would lead to "to bare-knuckled political fights in statehouses across the nation." As the Christian Science Monitor (6/29, Richey, 61K) reports, "some analysts foresee a flurry of redistricting in states whenever one party or another deems it politically expedient."

The Washington Post (6/29, A1, Lane, Balz, 744K) reports "politicians of both parties said that the ruling leaves the door wide open to attempts to copy the DeLay strategy in other states. 'Every redistricting is a partisan political exercise, but this is going to put it at a level we have never seen,' said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. 'That's the gift that the Supreme Court and Tom DeLay have given us.'" Meanwhile, the Washington Times (6/29, Dinan, 90K) reports "congressional Republicans saw the ruling as a solid victory that ends Democrats' efforts to use the courts to win more seats. 'The decision dismisses the Democrats' arguments that the Texas redistricting was improper or illegal,' said Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds, New York Republican and chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee."

Also analyzing the consequences of the ruling, ABC World News Tonight (6/28, story 3, 2:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the court's decision that states can redraw district lines "whenever they want" has "huge implications for politics in this country." A similar story in NBC Nightly News (6/28, story 5, 1:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This case now comes down to a big question -- will this mean congressional districts will be cut up and redrawn all over this country?" Tim Russert said, "There are 435 congressional districts. About 380 right now are either safe Democratic or safe Republican districts. If you're to have these kind of redistricting plans put in place on a regular basis, you could in fact make these permanent members of Congress, where there'd be no incentive to work across the aisle with the member of another party because you are only trying to protect your own ideological, partisan base."

USA Today (6/29, Biskupic, Kiely, 2.31M) reports, "The ruling opens the possibility of redistricting in other states after fall elections. One-party control of the governorship and legislature could allow for the move in at least five states: Maryland, New York and Michigan for Democrats; Pennsylvania and Indiana for Republicans." However, "the ruling's long-term impact is unclear, in part because partisan redistricting is limited in many states. Six low-population states have only one US House seat, so they aren't involved in redistricting. Eight others have districts drawn by independent commissions, rather than legislatures, and at least five more have various restrictions against redrawing districts between censuses." USA Today (6/29, Kiely, 2.31M) runs a second story on the same topic, headlined "Ruling May Incite Redistricting Battles."

The Los Angeles Times (6/29, Havemann, 958K) also says the ruling "could lead to redistricting attempts every time state legislatures changed hands between the 10-year censuses."

The AP (6/29, Holland) reports, "Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, writing for a 5-4 majority, said Hispanics do not have a chance to elect a candidate of their choosing in south and west Texas under the state's plan. … The plan's 'troubling blend of politics and race - and the resulting vote dilution of a group that was beginning to achieve (the federal law's) goal of overcoming prior electoral discrimination - cannot be sustained,' Kennedy wrote." The AP adds, "Some 100,000 Hispanics had been shifted out of a district represented by a Republican, and foes of the plan had argued it violated the Voting Rights Act which protects minority voting rights. … The court ruled 7-2 that state legislators may draw new congressional maps anytime - not just once a decade as Texas Democrats had claimed and has been traditional nationwide. That means any state's lawmakers can push through new maps anytime there is a power shift in the Legislature."

Knight Ridder distributes a Dallas Morning News article (6/29, Pusey, Gillman) that reports, "By handing Texas Republicans a major victory in their contentious congressional redistricting case, the U.S. Supreme Court may have lowered some of the last obstacles to bare-knuckled political fights in statehouses across the nation, though predictions of political chaos may be premature, experts said Wednesday." The News continues, "In a complex, multi-faceted decision the high court largely upheld a 2003 redistricting plan crafted by the Republican controlled Legislature, though justices invalidated a GOP-held South Texas district. … They also said redistricting can occur at anytime - on multiple occasions, if need be - between each decade's census. They suggested that politically motivated congressional boundaries are a part of the remap process."

The Legal Times (6/29, Mauro) reports, "By a cascading series of mix-and-match majorities, the Supreme Court on Wednesday upheld most of the controversial mid-decade

DOJ_NMG_0037394

Texas Republican redistricting plan spearheaded by former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay." The Times continues, "The ruling could encourage other states whose legislatures are dominated by one party to break from the long tradition of redistricting only after the census every decade." The Times adds, "Texas Democrats and other challengers were consoled by a partial victory Wednesday when the Court struck down Texas District 23, reshaped in 2003 into a narrow district running from the San Antonio area to the edge of El Paso in order to protect an incumbent Republican from a surging Latino population. That shift diluted minority voting power and amounted to a violation of Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, the Court agreed. … 'Justice and fairness is always a goal worth pursuing, and the fact that the Court found the map violated the rights of Latino voters in South Texas shows the fight was worth it,' said J. Gerald Hebert, lawyer for the Texas congressional Democrats." The Times notes, "Despite the verbiage, the justices Wednesday appeared no closer than ever to deciding when a politically motivated redistricting plan crosses a constitutional line and violates either the equal protection clause or the First Amendment. … But whatever line might exist, a mid-decade reapportionment, no matter how politically motivated, does not appear to cross it, said Justice Anthony Kennedy, who wrote the main opinion and summarized it with difficulty before spectators at the Court."

Bonilla Says TX23 Was Drawn With Eye On Future, Not His Own Survival. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Bravin, Cooper, 2.11M) reports that in an interview yesterday, Bonilla "said his district hadn't been drawn specifically for his benefit but rather to preserve Republican control into the future. 'The vision way back was not about me but looking past me,' he said. 'There was a concern long-term, that after I moved on, that they wanted to keep this seat in Republican hands.'" The New York Times (6/29, Blumenthal, Zernike, 1.19M) reports Bonilla, in a telephone interview, "denied his district had been redrawn for his protection and predicted he would beat opponents even if the lines were changed again. 'They can't win in the area I represent,' he said."

The Hill (6/29, Kaplan, O'Connor) reports that whether the ruling on the TX23 district "will boost Democrats' chances in Bonilla's district remains unclear, but his challenger, Democrat Rick Bonanos, sounded confident after receiving phone calls from top Democratic officials, including former Sen. Max Cleland (D-Ga.), pledging help." Bonilla "has more than $2 million in his campaign war chest; Bonanos said he has raised about $20,000."

Roll Call (6/29, Drucker) reports "attorney Nina Perales, southwest regional counsel for the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund and the lawyer who argued this portion of the case before the court in March, said she expects the approximately 120,000 Latinos moved out of Bonilla's district in 2003, and into Rep. Henry Cuellar's (D) 28th district, to be moved back into the 23rd. She also expects the district to lose some Anglo voters who live in its northern hill counties." Perales "speculated that this could put Bonilla in electoral jeopardy, as only 8 percent of Latino voters supported him at the polls in 2002, at that time a historic low for the Latino Republican Congressman."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, 2.11M), in an editorial titled "DeLay's Revenge," says "the former House Majority Leader must take some consolation from yesterday's Supreme Court decision. … As for those of us who want fewer partisan gerrymanders, and thus more competitive elections, the battle now moves to the states themselves. Letting a nonpartisan commission draw the lines has worked well in Iowa, and reformers ought to throw their energy into that idea, rather than to the windmill-tilt of trying to purge money from politics."

The New York Times (6/29, 1.19M) titles its editorial "A Loss For Competitive Elections," and writes, "Instead of standing up for a fair electoral landscape, the court produced a ruling that did little to ensure the vibrancy of American democracy, and that itself had an unfortunate whiff of partisanship." The Times also saus, "In this post-Bush-vs.-Gore era, the court's critics will note that it again split on partisan lines, with the most conservative justices most approving of the Texas lines. That was also true in a 2004 case in which it upheld, by a 5-to-4 vote, a pro-Republican redistricting in Pennsylvania. But that same year the court, disturbingly, affirmed a lower court's ruling striking down a pro-Democratic redistricting in Georgia as unconstitutional. It is disappointing that it could not have come up with a decision yesterday that had a greater appearance of fairness."

William Hamilton, a syndicated columnist and a former executive director of the Nebraska Republican Party, writes in USA Today (6/29, 2.31M), "Americans who favor representative government should be pleased with the U.S. Supreme Court ruling on the Texas redistricting plan. Here's why: The districts were drawn by legislators elected by and answerable to the people."

Justin Levitt, associate counsel in the Democracy Program at New York University's Brennan Center for Justice, and Lisa Sandoval, a student at the Columbia law school, write in The Hill (6/29), "Yesterday the Supreme Court took another step in demoting itself from reluctant referee to irrelevant bystander in the battle by which district lines are drawn and politicians are elected. … Meaningful representative democracy requires more stability. If our representatives could change the rules at any time, politicians would choose their voters, rather than the other way around."

Abigail Thernstrom, Vice-chair of the US Commission on Civil Rights, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/29, 2.11M), "DeLay may be down, but he's not out. Yes, he's out of Congress, but the Texas congressional districting plan for which he is given substantial political credit mostly lives on, thanks to yesterday's Supreme Court decision upholding it."

Senate Remains Barrier To Flag Desecration Amendment. The Christian Science Monitor (6/29, Chaddock, 61K) reports if "every current senator who voted for a flag amendment in the past had done so this week, a constitutional amendment authorizing the Congress to ban desecration of the flag would be on its way to the states for ratification." But Sens. Robert Byrd (D) of West Virginia and Kent Conrad (D) of North Dakota "did not, and the amendment went down, as it has the last three times the Senate has taken it up." But the one vote margin "wasn't as close as it looked, because Democrats were committed to finding the votes needed to fight the amendment. On the eve of the vote, Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, who had voted for an amendment banning flag desecration in 1990, 1995, and 2000, said he would vote for it again, because he was sure 'it would not pass.' Thirteen other Democrats, mainly from states that sent their electoral votes to President Bush in the last election, joined him in supporting the bill." Republicans also "headed into battle without their best vote counter. Majority whip Mitch McConnell (R) of Kentucky opposed the amendment, along with GOP Sens. Robert Bennett of Utah and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island."

House Panel Rejects Resolution To Bar Challenges To Pledge Of Allegiance. CQ (6/28, Stern) reports that in a "surprise defeat for Republicans, the House Judiciary Committee deadlocked Wednesday on legislation that would bar most federal courts, including the Supreme Court, from hearing constitutional challenges to the Pledge of Allegiance." But the setback "could be temporary. Wednesday evening, the Judiciary Committee scheduled a new markup Thursday to vote again." The 15-15 tie vote "meant the court-stripping bill (HR 2389) was not reported favorably. Republican Bob Inglis of South Carolina joined 14 Democrats in voting against the measure." Seven other Republican committee members "did not vote, a sign that Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., R-Wis., did not anticipate such a close tally."

Supreme Court Rules Inmates Can Be Denied Newspapers. The Christian Science Monitor (6/29, Richey, 61K) reports, "Prison inmates do not enjoy a First Amendment right to receive newspapers and magazines in their cells when they are being punished in the highest security section of a prison. In an important decision restricting free speech protections behind bars, the US Supreme Court ruled on Wednesday that Pennsylvania state prison officials did not violate the constitutional rights of their most dangerous inmates by barring access to various news publications." The "key test," says Justice Breyer, is "whether the prison restrictions are reasonably related to legitimate penological interests. The high court said the prison restriction was aimed at creating an incentive for better prison behavior among problematic inmates, and thus satisfied the court's standard."

The AP (6/29, Locy) reports, "The decision reverses a ruling by the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals but validates a dissent by the high court's newest member, Justice Samuel Alito, who sided with Pennsylvania when he served on the appellate court. Alito did not participate in the argument before the Supreme Court. … Breyer said that 'prison officials, relying on their professional judgment, reached an experience-based conclusion that the policies help to further legitimate prison objectives.' … The high court's ruling could have affected prison operations nationwide if justices had required state officials to prove that their policies serve legitimate security and rehabilitative interests. … The Bush administration sided with Pennsylvania, saying the state's policy deserves deference from the courts because it involves maintaining order in prisons."

House Affirms Right To Non-English Ballots. The AP (6/29, Taylor) reports, "The House agreed Wednesday to affirm the right of voters in areas with large populations of non-English-speaking citizens to cast ballots in their native language." The AP continues, "The 254-167 roll call in support of bilingual balloting came just a week after GOP divisions over the issue contributed to the postponement of a House vote to renew the landmark 1965 Voting Rights Act. … 'If you have the good fortune to be able to vote in the United States, then it is not too much to ask that this be accomplished in English,' said Rep. Cliff Stearns, R-Fla. 'I don't think the United States government should be forced to pay for (bilingual) assistance.'" The AP adds, "The bilingual balloting vote came on an amendment by Stearns as the House debated a $59.8 billion measure funding the annual budgets of the departments of Justice, Commerce and State. .. About 500 political subdivisions in 31 states must offer bilingual assistance. Of those states, five — Alaska, Arizona, California, New Mexico and Texas — must provide the assistance statewide. … The issue has become embroiled with a passionate election-year debate to overhaul immigration laws. Conservative Republicans have pushed to make English the official national language. … Supporters of non-English ballots reminded colleagues that only U.S. citizens are able to vote and that even those whose native language is English have difficulty with complex ballot initiatives, much less those who learned the language after coming to this country."

Majority Of Biggest US Companies Offer Gay Partner Benefits. USA Today (6/29, Armour, 2.31M) reports, "A majority of the nation's largest companies now provide health insurance for domestic partners of employees — a historic shift from the 1980s, when benefits for same-sex partners were rare." Data 'on the rise in domestic-partner benefits will be released today by the Washington-based Human Rights Campaign Foundation, the education and outreach arm of HRC, a gay-rights organization." Today, "253 companies from the Fortune 500 provide equal benefits to same-sex couples, according to the report, and 86% have policies that ban discrimination based on employees' sexual orientation."

US Transgender Community Finding More Acceptance. The AP (6/29, Leff) reports, "A clash between police and patrons of an all-night diner in San Francisco 40 years ago was once a forgotten footnote in history. For members of the transgender community, though, it was the start of their slow march toward widespread acceptance." The AP continues, "Sparked by the riot, San Francisco activists started their own civil rights movement - three years before the more famous clashes at New York City's Stonewall Inn. … A dedication this month of a granite anniversary marker at the site of the Compton's Cafeteria riot drew a pair of city supervisors, the district attorney and the police chief. The California Assembly and Mayor Gavin Newsom sent proclamations. … 'Transgender' is an umbrella term that came into common usage a decade ago and covers cross-dressers, transsexuals and others whose outward appearance doesn't match their gender at birth. … While not every city is ready to celebrate their contributions, San Francisco - which in 2001 extended its health insurance to cover sex reassignment surgeries for municipal employees - is no longer alone. Across the United States, one of the nation's most maligned minority groups is quickly winning rights and recognition it began to demand only recently. … In the last two years, New Mexico, Illinois and California have updated their anti-discrimination laws to protect transgender home buyers and renters; colleges in Vermont and Iowa have dedicated "gender neutral" dorm rooms; and corporations have adopted policies for helping employees stay on the job during sex changes."

ANTITRUST:

Biomet CEO Does Not Know Specifics Of DOJ Probe. MarketWatch (6/29, Kamp) reports, "Biomet Inc. doesn't know much about a U.S. Department of Justice probe of the orthopedics sector other than a subpoena it recently received signals an investigation into price and bidding, Biomet's interim chief executive said Wednesday." MarketWatch continues, "Four orthopedics companies - Biomet, Zimmer Holdings Inc., Stryker Corp. and Johnson & Johnson unit DePuy Inc. - have confirmed they've received subpoenas from the Justice Department's antitrust division. The subpoenas are for several years' worth of documents regarding possible federal criminal and antirust-law violations. … 'The subpoena we received is a very broad subpoena,' said Daniel P. Hann, Biomet's interim president and chief executive, speaking during a conference call with financial analysts following the company's fiscal fourth-quarter earnings release. … 'Frankly, we do not know specifically what the investigation is about,' Hann said. 'The subpoena does not signal anything other than an investigation into price and bidding in our industry.' … Hann added that these investigations typically take place 'over a long period of time,' but said he has no insight into the investigation's timing." MarketWatch adds, "He said the company doesn't know whether the investigation might be linked to a prior Justice Department probe of consulting or professional-service agreements between companies and orthopedic surgeons. That issue became public when subpoenas were disclosed in early 2005. … A Justice Department spokeswoman said Friday the agency 'is conducting an antitrust investigation into the possibility of anticompetitive practices in the implant-device industry,' and didn't offer further comment."

CFTC Charges BP Unit With Propane Price Manipulation. The AP (6/29) reports, "Federal investigators said Wednesday that BP energy traders cornered the U.S. propane market in the winter of 2004 and illegally manipulated prices, driving up heating and cooking costs for rural consumers." The AP continues, "The charges come at a time when oil and gas companies are under intense scrutiny from consumers and Congress over soaring energy prices and record profits, and analysts said the entire industry's credibility could be damaged. While BP denied any wrongdoing, a former employee admitted taking part in a conspiracy and agreed to cooperate with criminal prosecutors. … The Commodity Futures Trading Commission said that BP traders -- with the consent of senior management – 'purchased enormous quantities of propane to establish a dominant' position in the market and then withheld fuel from the market in order to drive prices higher."

Bloomberg (6/29) reports, "The commission filed suit today in federal court alleging BP Products North America, a subsidiary of London-based BP, manipulated the market for the heating fuel in February 2004 after trying the same tactic in April 2003. Former BP trader Dennis Abbott pleaded guilty to conspiracy in a separate court filing today by the Justice Department. … 'Cornering a commodity market is more than a threat to market integrity,' Gregory Mocek, director of enforcement for the commission, said in a statement. 'It is an illegal activity that could have repercussions for commercial market participants as well as retail consumers around this country.'" Bloomberg notes, "BP is one of several large oil companies facing increasing scrutiny from the government as energy prices surged. The company has also run afoul of U.S. regulators in the past year over operations at its refineries. … By purchasing 'enormous quantities' of propane, BP caused the price to increase to more than 90 cents a gallon on Feb. 27, 2004, 'a price that would not otherwise have been reached under the normal pressures of supply and demand,' the commission said in a statement. The company at one point owned over 88 percent of all 'TET' propane, fuel that can be delivered anywhere on the Texas Eastern pipeline system. … The strategy was done 'with the knowledge, advice and consent of senior management,' the commission said. BP also tried the strategy in April 2003, as a 'trial run,' according to the market regulator."

The Financial Times (6/29, Grant) called the allegations "serious" and noted the lawsuit "against BP is likely to be one of the biggest cases of alleged energy price manipulation in the US." The dispute is "likely to provoke a political storm as US politicians, already sensitive to high petrol prices, are alert to signs that recent volatility in energy markets could be the result of price manipulation by energy companies."

The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Wilke, Cummins) adds, "The alleged conspiracy is the latest in a series of stumbles by the London-based company's U.S. operations. BP has paid millions of dollars in federal fines over the past few years in connection with a fatal 2005 refinery fire and other alleged safety and regulatory lapses, and remains under investigation by several federal agencies."

But USA Today (6/29, Smith) reports, "BP denied the allegations even as one of its former traders pleaded guilty to a criminal conspiracy charge and agreed to cooperate with investigators." BP Products North America spokesman Ronnie Chappell said, "Market manipulation did not occur, and we are prepared to prove that case in the courts." USA Today notes, "About 7 million U.S. households in rural parts of the country depend on propane as their primary heating fuel. BP…is the largest supplier of natural gas liquids in North America."

Trader Pleads Guilty To Conspiracy. The New York Times (6/29, Mouawad) reports, "Also, the Justice Department said yesterday that one trader named in the lawsuit pleaded guilty to a conspiracy charge in a parallel criminal case. The plea is part of a continuing investigation by the F.B.I. … A former BP trader, Dennis N. Abbott, 34, pleaded guilty to conspiring to manipulate the propane market, the Justice Department said. He faces up to five years in prison and a fine of $250,000, according to Bryan Sierra, a Justice Department spokesman."

Dow Jones (6/29) reports, "According to the Justice Department, Abbott said he 'understood that the scheme was approved by senior executives at BP, and that steps were taken to avoid detection by market participants and others.'"

AFP (6/29) reports, "Abbott, 34, entered his plea to a conspiracy charge in US District Court in Washington before Judge James Robertson. Under the terms of a plea agreement, Abbott faces up to five years in prison, a fine of 250,000 dollars, and supervised release following any incarceration. … Abbott agreed to cooperate with law enforcement officials in an ongoing investigation, officials said."

Google Launches Online Payment System. The New York Times (6/29, Hansell) reports, "In its quest to 'organize the world's information,' Google now wants to keep track of your credit card number and where you live." The Times continues, "The company is introducing Google Checkout today, a service that will allow users to make purchases from online stores using payment and shipping information they keep on file with Google. … Google's aim, said Eric E. Schmidt, the chief executive, is to make it easier and faster for people to buy products advertised on Google — thus attracting more advertisers. … 'The goal here is to make it be one nanosecond from the time the customer decides to buy to the time the transaction is complete and the product is on the way,' Mr. Schmidt said." The Times adds, "For consumers, this sort of service, often referred to as an online wallet, is hardly new. Microsoft, AOL and Yahoo have offered similar wallets, which proved to have limited appeal. While the PayPal service of eBay has attracted widespread use, it offers additional features like the ability to transfer money from checking accounts. … But for merchants, the service comes with a twist: Google will waive some or all of the transaction fees for companies that buy advertising from it. That may give the service a leg up on competitors like PayPal and several smaller companies that help online merchants accept credit cards. … It will also add another entry to the list of businesses that have been shaken up by Google's innovations, a list that already includes publishing, advertising and desktop software."

EMI, Warner Music Continue Contentious Merger Discussions. USA Today (6/29, Lieberman) reports, "EMI Group and Warner Music Group stepped on each other's feet in their long-running merger dance as each disclosed in dueling press releases Wednesday that it offered to buy the other this week - to no avail." USA continues, "On Tuesday night, Warner rejected a $4.7 billion cash offer from EMI. But in a move that took some analysts by surprise, Warner turned around and bid $4.6 billion in cash for its British rival. … EMI says its board 'unanimously rejected' Warner's offer because the price doesn't account for 'EMI's prospects, the potential synergy benefits of a combination of the two companies and the range of strategic options available to EMI.' … It added that it still believes its proposal to pay $31 a share for Warner 'would be very attractive to both sets of shareholders.' … In response, Warner said it rejected EMI's offer partly because it required Warner first to sell its Warner/Chappell Music publishing unit, which would 'increase execution risk.' Warner said it still believes its offer would be 'value-enhancing to EMI shareholders.'"

The New York Times (6/29, Leeds) reports, "Representatives from both sides are expected to continue negotiating, but the latest moves indicate that the talks are growing contentious, particularly regarding the question of who would manage the combined company." The Times continues, "At the same time, analysts said the rival bids ultimately could push the price of any deal so high that the combined company would be laden with debt or forced to cut executives and reduce the number of artists more than anticipated. … Wall Street analysts who track the companies estimate the combined entity could generate $200 million to $300 million in additional cash flow by laying off employees and reducing the number of artists, among other cuts. But some executives involved in the talks indicated the figure could be closer to $400 million."

The AP (6/29, Barr) reports, "A combination of EMI and New York-based Warner Music would control about 25 percent of the recorded music market, surpassing BMG in the rankings and moving into second place behind Universal, according to the International Federation of the Phonographic Industry. … It would bring together artists on EMI such as Coldplay, Norah Jones, Paul McCartney and the Rolling Stones with Warner's roster that includes Sean 'P. Diddy' Combs and his Bad Boy label, Madonna and Paul Simon."

The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Smith) reports, "Neither company disputes that there are solid strategic reasons they should combine. They are each roughly half the size of the No. 1 and No. 2 music companies, Vivendi Universal SA's Universal Music Group and Sony BMG Music Entertainment, a joint venture of Tokyo-based Sony Corp. and Germany's Bertelsmann AG. And they could save hundreds of millions of dollars by combining back-end and international operations. … But neither company has expressed any interest in the kind of 50-50 merger that created Sony BMG. On the other hand, neither EMI nor Warner has been willing to cede control to the other."

The Financial Times (6/29, Van Duyn, Politi, Terazono) also reports on the negotiations.

Judge Grants Real Estate Antitrust Suits Class-Action Status. Inman News (6/29, Roberts) reports, "A judge for a U.S. District Court in Idaho has granted class-action status to four separate antitrust lawsuits, which allege that four real estate brokerage companies engaged in illegal commission practices." Inman continues, "The four class-action lawsuits were each filed against individual real estate companies -- including Aspen Realty, Holland Realty, Sel-Equity Co. and Park Pointe Realty (doing business as John L. Scott Real Estate) -- and will proceed as separate cases." Inman adds, "The real estate companies allegedly charged a commission for their services that was based on the purchase price of undeveloped land and the actual or estimated price of homes to be built on those undeveloped lots, rather than based solely on the price of the undeveloped lots, according to the lawsuits. … This practice, the lawsuits charge, constitutes a tying arrangement that violates the Sherman Antitrust Act."

Senate Panel Passes Telecom Bill. USA Today (6/29, Davidson, 2.31M) reports, "The Senate Commerce Committee on Wednesday approved sweeping telecommunications reform that would allow phone companies to more easily offer pay TV services, giving consumers a new alternative to cable." But "the measure could face an uphill fight in the Senate after Republicans defeated an amendment to limit the ability of phone and cable giants to charge websites fees for faster services." By a 15-7 vote, the panel "approved a bill that, among other things, would force communities to negotiate a franchise with video providers within 90 days. The process can take much longer now."

The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Schatz, 2.11M) reports the Senate committee "spent roughly two hours arguing about 'net neutrality' before a proposal aimed at setting new protections on Internet access and pricing failed on an 11-11 vote. Without that amendment, however, the committee passed the telecom bill." The Journal adds, "While the action was a loss for those who support net neutrality, it could result in an even bigger defeat for phone companies, which want to see Congress pass legislation opening the way for them to more quickly offer pay-television services in competition with cable companies." The Washington Post (6/29, Hart, Goo, 744K) runs a similar report.

Web Video Sites Face Test In Veoh Copyright Suit. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Delaney) reports, "Adult entertainment company Io Group Inc. last Friday filed a lawsuit against Veoh Networks Inc., an online video-sharing service, in a potential important legal test of Web video companies' liability for copyright infringement claims." The Journal continues, "The complaint, filed in U.S. District Court for California's Northern District, alleges that Veoh, San Diego, was responsible for copyright infringement by allowing videos owned by Io Group to be accessed through Veoh's online service without permission. In the complaint, Io Group, a San Francisco company doing business by the name Titan Media, alleges that consumers viewed its copyrighted works over 40,000 times through Veoh's site between June 1 and June 22." The Journal adds, "The suit has potentially broad ramifications for the exploding consumption of videos online and the companies, including YouTube Inc., Google Inc., Yahoo Inc., that allow consumers to post videos for others to see on the Web. Some of those companies perform varying degrees of automated and human review of the videos consumers submit to their sites. … But some, including YouTube, the most-visited Web video site in the U.S., don't review videos before making them available on their sites and rely on content owners and users to alert them to videos that are uploaded without the copyright holders' permission. The practice of removing videos after formal notification by their owners follows an industry-standard procedure outlined in the Digital Millennium Copyright Act of 1998."

Murdoch Mulls Joining Macquarie Bid For PCCW Assets. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Linebaugh) reports, "A unit of Rupert Murdoch's News Corp. has had discussions about joining Macquarie Bank Ltd.'s bid for the core assets of PCCW Ltd., potentially injecting a media heavyweight with a long history in China into the contentious acquisition battle." The Journal continues, "Star Group, a wholly owned subsidiary of News Corp., has "had some talks with Macquarie" about participating in its bid for the telecommunications and media assets of Hong Kong's dominant phone company, according to a spokeswoman for Star Group, who declined to comment further. The Macquarie bid is worth more than $7 billion, people familiar with the matter have said." The Journal adds, "In an interview today with a News Corp.-owned newspaper, the Australian, Mr. Murdoch confirmed the company had held talks with Macquarie but expressed skepticism about the prospects of Macquarie's bid. A person close to the situation said if News Corp. decides to join the bid, it would take a stake "in the low single digits" in percentage terms. That suggests News Corp.'s contribution could be as little as $100 million."

EU Signals Tough Line On Antitrust Enforcement. The Financial Times (6/29, Buck) reports, "Companies under investigation for anti-competitive behaviour could be fined 30 per cent of their annual turnover under European Union guidelines announced yesterday by Neelie Kroes, competition commissioner." The Times continues, "The new guidelines will apply to all investigations in which the Commission has not yet issued formal charges against a company. This includes the energy companies raided in May - RWE, Eon, Gaz de France and Eni, among others - and the air cargo groups raided in February - British Airways, Lufthansa, Air France-KLM and Cargolux." The Times adds, "Under the Commission's new guidelines, the pain for companies caught by the Brussels trust-buster is set to increase dramatically. As the FT reported yesterday, repeat offenders will be punished particularly severely, as will big companies with a large share of the market in which the abuse took place. … Ms Kroes said the message was clear: 'Don't break the antitrust rules. If you do, stop it as quickly as possible. And once you've stopped, don't do it again. If companies do not pay attention to these signals, they will pay a very high price.'"

The AP (6/29) reports, "These new fine limits will apply to every company charged with antitrust abuse after the new guidelines are published in the next two months. … The commission raised the threshold for maximum fines to 30 percent of a company's annual sales for every year it broke EU law -- up from the current limit of 10 percent of total annual turnover." The AP adds, "EU regulators said part of the fine -- an 'entry fee' may also be charged, no matter how long the company violated EU rules. This fee would be based on 15 percent to 25 percent of yearly sales during the entire time span of the illegal behavior. It will apply to cartels and to other types of antitrust abuse, they said."

Big Media Disregards FCC Ownership Rules. The Washington Post (6/29, Ahrens) reports, "When the government's attempt to relax media ownership rules was defeated in court two years ago, some hailed it as a victory against putting too much power in the hands of too few media lords. … Now, the government is taking up the issue again, but the media landscape is radically different." The Post continues, "Since 2003, the media giants have greatly expanded their presence on the Internet, buying successful Web sites or redoubling their own efforts. The continued rollout of high-speed Internet, the improvement in online content and an explosion of handheld devices have combined to give Big Media much greater reach and potentially greater influence than it would have had, were companies allowed to buy a few more television stations each. … Last week, the Federal Communications Commission voted to re-tackle the sticky issue of media ownership. This time, the agency plans to loosen some rules, allowing big media companies to expand. For instance, a newspaper will -- for the first time since 1975 -- probably be allowed to buy the most popular television station in the same city. .. But the times, technology and media marketplace have changed so much since the FCC began its ownership review last time, in 2002, that some of the same media giants that lobbied for changes before -- such as Tribune Co. -- may take little advantage of changes this time. … In 2002, the media giants had already been burned by the Internet. The newly merged AOL Time Warner Inc. took a $10 billion write-down, thanks to bad deals and falling revenue at America Online. Walt Disney Co. lost millions on its Go.com Internet portal."

India Launches Battle Over Yoga Copyright. USA Today (6/29, Fetterman) reports, "India seems to be willing to go to the mat over yoga. … That's because Bikram Choudhury, the self-proclaimed Hollywood 'yoga teacher to the stars,' incensed his native country by getting a U.S. copyright on his style of yoga four years ago." USA continues, "In response, India has put 100 historians and scientists to work cataloging 1,500 yoga poses recorded in ancient texts written in Sanskrit, Urdu and Persian. India will use the catalogue to try to block anyone from cornering the market on the 5,000-year-old discipline of stretching, breathing and meditating." USA adds, "Bikram, who goes by one name like Bono and Beyoncé, says he sought legal protection for his yoga because 'it's the American way.' … 'You cannot drive the car if you do not have a driver's license,' he explains. 'You cannot do brain surgery if you are not a brain surgeon. You cannot even do a massage if you don't have a license.' And, he says, you shouldn't be able to teach his Bikram Yoga unless you pay him for a license." USA notes, "India's counterattack goes way beyond Bikram. … The government wants to thwart anyone who tries to profit from the nation's so-called 'traditional knowledge,' from yoga to 150,000 ancient medical remedies. India already has successfully challenged one U.S. patent granted to two Indian-born Americans who used the spice turmeric in a wound-healing product. That patent was revoked by the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office."

Sago Mine Explosion Survivor Says Miners Expected Rescue. The AP (6/29, Smith) reports, "As they sat behind a curtain that held back thick smoke but not deadly carbon monoxide, the doomed crew of the Sago Mine talked about the rescue they thought was coming, the sole survivor says." The AP continues, "In a transcript of a June 19 interview with state and federal investigators, Randal McCloy Jr. said he believed a seismographic machine somewhere above them was waiting for a signal from the miners. But they banged on roof bolts in vain: Officials have said such a device was not brought to mine because it wasn't needed. … McCloy also added detail to his contention that some of the miners' air packs didn't work, something officials who have tested the devices dispute. McCloy said he tried all four of the devices that had failed to work, including one that appeared to have a broken valve." The AP adds, "Twelve men died in the Sago mine: one in the Jan. 2 blast and the rest hours later of carbon monoxide poisoning. McCloy survived more than 40 hours in poisoned air _ a feat doctors have never been able to fully explain. … State mine safety officials released the 96-page transcript of McCloy's two-hour testimony on Wednesday. The Associated Press had requested a copy under the Freedom of Information Act."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/29, Roddy, Lash) reports that the miners "began walking out of the mine but turned back after four of them declared that their emergency breathing devices did not work, according to the lone survivor of the disaster. … One miner, Terry Helms, apparently died outright when a methane explosion tore through a wall intended to seal off an abandoned section of the mine. Eleven others slowly died of carbon monoxide poisoning behind a makeshift barricade they hoped would keep out bad air while they awaited rescue." The Post-Gazette adds, "The only miner to survive, Randal McCloy Jr., was interviewed June 19 in Morgantown, W.Va., by a joint state-federal panel investigating the disaster. Mr. McCloy, 27, spent nearly three months in hospitals recovering from exposure to deadly carbon monoxide gas that left him in a coma and caused multiple organ and brain injuries. .. . West Virginia's Office of Miners' Health, Safety and Training released his testimony yesterday. … A state report on the Sago disaster is expected to be released July 19." The Post-Gazette notes, "In his testimony, Mr. McCloy elaborated on details -- including problems with other miners' breathing devices -- that he'd included in a letter sent to families of the dead miners earlier this year. Investigators questioned him repeatedly about the devices and also about his training in their use."

Sierra Club Sues Pentagon For Delaying Wind Farm Construction. The New York Times/AP (6/29) reports the Sierra Club "sued the Defense Department, saying the department has halted construction of wind farms across the country by failing to complete a study on whether they interfere with military radar." The suit "asserted that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and the Pentagon missed a deadline for completing the study, which was ordered by Congress and must be completed before the Federal Aviation Administration can issue safety permits for the projects."

Navy Sued Over Sonar Use. The AP (6/29, McAvoy) reports, "Environmental groups sued the federal government Wednesday to prevent the Navy from using active sonar during drills off Hawaii next month, saying the sound could harm whales and other marine mammals." The AP continues, "The Natural Resources Defense Council asked a federal court in Los Angeles to issue a temporary restraining order unless the Navy takes 'effective measures' to protect marine life when it uses high-intensity, mid-frequency active sonar to hunt submarines in the drills. … 'The military can train but it has to do so consistent with the law and the law requires protection of the marine environment,' said Joel Reynolds, senior attorney for the council." The AP adds, "Navy lawyers haven't seen the lawsuit and couldn't comment. The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration declined to comment, but said the agency was confident the Navy would protect dolphins and whales. … NOAA on Tuesday granted the Navy a permit to use sonar during war games involving more than 40 ships in Hawaii waters. The exercises are scheduled to start next week and last through late July. … The permit comes after NOAA said in April that Navy use of sonar during maritime exercises off Hawaii in 2004 may have contributed to the mass stranding of more than 150 whales. The report, however, did not say definitively that the sonar caused the whales to gather in the bay."

California Ports Unite To Fight Air Pollution. USA Today (6/29, Kasindorf) reports, "The neighboring seaports of Los Angeles and Long Beach announced Wednesday a proposal to crack down on the diesel-powered ships, trucks and trains that are polluting the air over the USA's trade gateway to Asia." USA continues, "Under the proposed five-year cleanup plan, the twin ports would offer $200 million to owners of 16,000 trucks to replace old rigs with cleaner new ones. Ships would have to burn cleaner fuel, cut speed within 40 miles of the harbor and plug into dockside electrical outlets that are being built. Railroads would be required to use cleaner locomotives." USA adds, "The city-owned ports, 20 miles south of downtown Los Angeles, are the nation's largest. Together they handle 40% of U.S. cargo-container imports and account for 600,000 local jobs. They're also a health hazard as Southern California's "largest fixed source of air pollution," the South Coast Air Quality Management District says. … Vessels and vehicles idling at docks spew more smog-forming nitrogen oxides and cancer-causing diesel particulates than the metropolitan area's 6 million cars, the district says. Residents of nearby neighborhoods have high rates of respiratory illness and the region's highest cancer risk, according to the California Air Resources Board. … The cleanup plan aims to reduce diesel particulates nearly 50% and nitrogen oxides 30% by 2011. Arley Baker, spokesman for the Port of Los Angeles, says the regulations could be a pattern for other ports. Houston and Shanghai also are grappling with air pollution problems, says Geraldine Knatz, the Los Angeles port's executive director."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US Arrests 150 On Drug Charges In Virginia. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (6/29) reports, "The U.S Justice Department announced yesterday the arrests of more than 150 people on charges stemming from a methamphetamine and cocaine distribution ring in Carroll and Grayson counties." The Times-Dispatch continues, "The arrests are the result of a more than two-year investigation by federal, state and local law-enforcement agencies of a loose-knit organization that spanned several states. Members of the group imported and resold methamphetamine and cocaine from Mexico, the department said." The Times-Dispatch adds, "Through the investigation, authorities seized more than 50 pounds of methamphetamine, worth more than $2.2 million; about 4 kilograms of cocaine, worth about $89,600; more than 10 pounds of marijuana, worth $20,000; and 200 firearms. … About 100 people are facing state charges and 50 are facing federal charges, including Martin Sandoval Garcia, 43, of Mexico. He is charged with conspiracy to distribute more than 500 grams of methamphetamine to more than 20 other dealers."

FBI, NYPD Arrest 14 In Crack Ring Bust. Newsday (6/29, DeStefano) reports, "FBI agents and city police arrested 14 people yesterday on charges they were part of a crack ring that operated in the area around the Langston Hughes Houses in Bushwick," including "Cameron Spencer Jr. and Jamar Curtis, had prior state robbery convictions officials." Newsday notes, "The suspects, who include men and women, were accused of conspiracy to distribute crack between October 2004 and November 2005. Six of the suspects were also accused of possessing firearms to aid in the drug trafficking, according to the charges filed in federal court. … Investigators said the conspiracy moved about a pound of crack a month."

Michigan Man Charged Following Fentanyl-Related Death. The Detroit News (6/28) reports a disabled veteran "was charged Tuesday with distributing fentanyl and causing death in a case the U.S. Attorney's Office says is unrelated to the recent spike in deaths involving a mixture of the painkiller with heroin. William Lee Sparks…faces a 20-year minimum sentence and up to life in prison if convicted on the fentanyl charge. … Sparks also is charged with providing the same user with other painkillers -- codeine, Vicodin and hydrocodone, between January 2003 and September 2005."

The Detroit Free Press (6/28, Ashenfelter, Schaefer) reports, "In an indictment unsealed Tuesday, William L. Sparks, was charged with distributing fentanyl to a man identified only as J.L.C., who died Sept. 12, 2005. Authorities said he apparently consumed gel from a skin patch containing the drug."

The Flint (MI) Journal (6/29) writes, "Federal investigators allege Sparks distributed fentanyl in September to a naval enlistee who overdosed on the drug Sept. 12."

Three Arrested In Minnesota. On its Web site, KARE-TV, Minneapolis-St. Paul (6/29) writes, "Drug enforcement authorities say fentanyl mixed with heroin has killed hundreds of people in Chicago and Detroit and now the drug combination has made its way to Minnesota. Three men have been arrested in connection to the drug's appearance on Minnesota streets. Kevin Fenner, Eric Davis and Eric Hargrove are all accused of bringing the incredibly dangerous new drug to the streets of Saint Paul. All three were in court Wednesday afternoon."

Fentanyl Found In Detroit Home. On its Web site, WDIV-TV, Detroit (6/28) reports police "have confirmed the drugs found in one Detroit home are tainted. Wayne County sheriff's officials confirmed that 40 grams of the white powder that was found in the home of Darren Reese is 100 percent fentanyl, with no other drug mixed in, according to the Wayne County Sheriff's Department. Another twist in the fentanyl bust is that one of the victims of the deadly drug combination was a former Wayne County Sheriff's deputy, according to police."

Rep. Davis Seeks Funds To Combat Drug-Related Deaths. The Oak Park, Illinois Austin Weekly (6/29) reports Rep. Danny Davis (D-7th) "is calling on the state, local and federal governments to provide financial assistance to fight the recent rash of drug-related deaths connected to tainted heroin sold on the streets. At a press conference Monday, Davis, along with city and state health officials, called for a 'more aggressive program' for treatment on demand. Davis said the recent number of deaths in Cook County associated with heroin laced with fentanyl…is cause for concern and increased awareness."

Fentanyl Seen As A Mystery. The Christian Science Monitor (6/29, Paulson) writes, "Demand for the potent heroin-fentanyl mixture is just one factor complicating officials' efforts to contain, if not eliminate, a street drug that is raising alarms in cities in the upper Midwest and the Northeast. … Also impeding efforts to crack down on the drug is the fact that it remains something of a mystery. Officials acknowledge they have much to learn, including where the fentanyl is made. They also are concerned because, as a synthetic drug made in sophisticated labs, fentanyl may point to a new territorial opening in the war on illegal drugs."

House Backs Federal Prosecution Of Marijuana Users. The AP(6/29) reports the House yesterday "voted to continue to allow federal prosecution of those who smoke marijuana for medical purposes in states with laws that permit it."

In Alabama, Officers Accused Of Shooting Man At Wrong Address During Drug Bust. The Decatur (AL) Daily (6/28) reports officers serving a search warrant were apparently at the wrong home. "The multi-jurisdictional drug bust targeted an alleged Decatur drug trafficker's organization. According to family members, officers shot Kenneth Jamar, a man in his 50s who suffers from gout. U.S. Attorney Alice Martin said the task force did not have an arrest warrant for Jamar, but were searching for 28-year-old Jerome Wallace, who was wanted on federal drug conspiracy charges. Jamar is Wallace's uncle." The Daily goes on to cite the DEA's involvement in the case along with other agencies.

Accused Head Of Drug-Trafficking Organization Arrested. In a separate story, the Decatur (AL) Daily (6/28) reports, "Federal and local authorities say they have dismantled a Decatur man's drug-trafficking organization, which supplied dealers in North Alabama and adjoining states. Twenty-seven of the 29 suspects in the operation are illegal aliens, authorities said. The operation allegedly brought drugs into the U.S. from Mexico." U.S. Attorney Alice Martin "said Oscar Xicotencah Salomon, 34, also known as Javier Hernandez, Jose Delores and 'Lo Lo,' was allegedly the head of the organization that distributed cocaine, methamphetamine/ICE and marijuana."

Alabama's Hunstville Times (6/28) has posted on its Web site the names of 15 people arrested on drug conspiracy charges and writes that the arrests came after a two-year investigation that involved the DEA.

Indiana Man Is Sentenced In Drug Conspiracy Case. Terre Haute's Tribune-Star (6/28) reports a Terre Haute man "has been sentenced by a federal court to more than 24 years in prison for conspiracy to distribute cocaine base. Willie L. Hardiman, 40, was sentenced Monday to 292 months in prison. … His arrest last December came after a month-long investigation by the Drug Enforcement Administration" and others.

Plan Colombia Said To Have Saved Colombia. In the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (6/29), columnist Robert Novak writes, "There are no illusions…about how much Colombians owe to the U.S. government and its Plan Colombia to battle narco-terrorism. 'Plan Colombia saved Colombia,' one anti-terrorist military specialist told me, and I could find nobody here who disagreed. The U.S.-Colombian relationship bears little resemblance to what it was when I visited here 10 years ago. … The Colombian National Police and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration last week collaborated in a drug bust that was unthinkable a decade ago."

Tandy: DEA Efforts Have Increased Drug Seizures In Afghanistan. The Washington Post (6/29, Kessler, White) reports Condoleezza Rice "lavishly praised embattled Afghan President Hamid Karzai on Wednesday, arguing that his leadership shows how far Afghanistan has come since the fall of the Taliban 4 1/2 years ago. … In Washington on Wednesday, Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, who commands coalition forces in Afghanistan, told the House Armed Services Committee that there had been significant progress in the country in recent months but that "enormous obstacles" remain. … Karen P. Tandy…told the committee that opium-related trade in Afghanistan has nearly quadrupled since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001, to an estimated 4,475 metric tons a year, or 92 percent of the illicit global opium supply. Tandy said one sign of progress, however, is that DEA efforts have led to a 700 percent increase in drug seizures in Afghanistan."

The Washington Times (6/29, Seper) reports, "The head of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration yesterday told a House committee that Afghanistan's stability 'rises and falls with the drug trade,' and its production of 92 percent of the world's heroin supply has driven ongoing violence and lawlessness. But DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy said her agency is making 'great progress' in targeting the drug warlords and the Afghan criminal organizations who control the heroin supply."

UPI (6/28) writes, "Heroin smuggling from Afghanistan to Russia has increased from 10 to 25 percent of Afghanistan's illegal output, according to the Drug Enforcement Agency. Tajikistan is the primary trans-shipment country for opiates destined for Russia, according to Karen Tandy, DEA administrator, who testified to the House Armed Services Committee Wednesday. About half the heroin that moves through Tajikistan is consumed in Russia, she said. The rest moves through Russia to Europe."

According to the AP (6/29), "The head of the Drug Enforcement Administration sees the fight against Afghanistan's poppy crop lasting another 20 to 30 years. Karen Tandy told a House committee that while progress is being made, eradicating that crop is a long-term effort."

London Think-Tank Says US Poppy Eradication Policies Failing In Afghanistan. The Canadian Press (6/28) writes, "Canadian troops and Afghan civilians are paying with their lives because of failing U.S. policies that focus on elimination of the opium poppy crop, says a report by a policy think-tank. The poppy eradication campaign has driven rural farmers into such extreme poverty they are shifting their support to the Taliban because the international community and the Afghan government are not doing enough to meet their basic needs, says the report by the London-based Senlis Council."

The CanWest News Service (6/28) reports, "The commander of Canadian combat troops in Afghanistan reacted angrily to a scathing report published today by a European think-tank that says Canada's military mission in South Asia is an impossible task that is doomed to failure. … 'It is completely off, this report, from what I've read,' said Lt.-Col. Ian Hope, commander of the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry battle group. 'It tries to place the blame for the insurgency on those who are here trying to help the Afghans instead of insurgents.'"

The UK's Independent (6/29) writes, "The UK mission in Afghanistan is in danger of failing because of 'misguided' support for American military and drug-eradication policies, an international think-tank has claimed."

Canada's CTV (6/29) also cited the report's criticisms.

Two Sentenced For Gun Thefts From Virginia Warehouse. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (6/29) reports, "U.S. District Judge Richard L. Williams took it easy yesterday on two repentant men who participated in stealing and selling handguns from a state warehouse." The Times-Dispatch continues, "Williams sentenced Antre R. Worthington, 23, to 15 months in federal prison. He gave Larry M. Logan Jr., 25, a year and one day to serve. … Both defendants pleaded guilty March 23 to conspiracy to receive and sell stolen firearms. Both sentences were the shortest recommended to Williams under federal sentencing guidelines, which take into account previous convictions, among other factors." The Times-Dispatch adds, "Two other defendants in the case, Ralphfield C. Sinkler, 26, and Donald M. Cotton, 23, pleaded guilty to the same charge in May. They are scheduled for sentencing by Williams on Aug. 23. All four defendants are from metropolitan Richmond. … Worthington and Sinkler worked at the Virginia Department of General Services surplus goods warehouse in Richmond and teamed up to steal the .38-caliber revolvers a few at a time starting last summer, according to court documents. … Authorities say 55 revolvers were stolen. Some of them have been recovered and others have been turning up at crime scenes or police have taken them off criminals and others not permitted to have firearms. Some may still be on the street."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Judges Come Under Fire For Rulings. McClatchy Newspapers (6/29, Taylor) reports, "After Islamic militants murdered Seemab Shah's father, she said, they came for her. Terrified, Shah left her newborn son in the care of relatives and fled Pakistan for the United States. … She beseeched a U.S. immigration judge to grant her asylum. As proof of the danger to her family, she presented the court with her father's death certificate and newspaper photos of him lying in a pool of blood. … Despite the evidence, Judge Donald Ferlise concluded that Shah's father wasn't dead. Rejecting Shah's story as 'totally incredible,' he denied her request to remain in the United States." McClatchy continues, "But Shah, 33, isn't going home anytime soon. The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia concluded that Ferlise inexplicably had ignored undisputed evidence of her father's death. The court reversed his decision and ordered another judge to hear the case. In May, Ferlise was removed from hearing cases. … Ferlise's ruling and similar decisions by other immigration judges have come under intense scrutiny by federal appeals courts. A review by McClatchy Newspapers has found that appeals courts have sent back dozens of rulings by immigration judges over the last two years, calling many of them biased and unjust. In one recent rebuke, an appeals court panel deemed an asylum decision 'incomprehensible.' Another panel called an immigration ruling 'pure supposition.' … The appeals courts also have singled out judges for what they've called rude and bullying behavior. One appeals court panel reversed a decision because, it said, the judge acted like a 'prosecutor anxious to pick holes' in immigrants' stories instead of an impartial jurist." … The appeals-court judges' unusually sharp tone has prompted calls for an overhaul of the immigration courts, the forum of last resort for many of the world's refugees who flee to the United States from repressive governments that may have tortured and imprisoned them for their beliefs. … Responding to the criticism, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales launched a review of the immigration courts in January. Gonzales, who oversees the immigration judges, is expected to make recommendations in the next few months on how to improve the court system."

At Alleged War Criminal's Immigration Trial, Jurors Told Of Pre-War Balkan History. The Boston Globe (6/29, Tench, 484K) reports, "The trial of Marko Boskic, a Bosnian immigrant and alleged war criminal living as a construction worker in Peabody, resumed yesterday with the testimony of history and US intelligence specialists who gave jurors a lesson on what led up to a 1995 massacre of more than 1,000 Muslims in the war-torn Balkans." Boskic "has been charged with five counts of lying to federal officials and concealing on immigration forms his role" in the Srebrenica massacre, but "defense attorney Max Stern told the jury Tuesday that Boskic…did not lie in the documents and that he was forced to join the 10th Sabotage Detachment…while he was a prisoner at a Serbian concentration camp. If he didn't join he would have been killed, Stern said."

White House Declares Cannon Win A Victory For Bush Immigration Plan. CNN's The Situation Room (628, Blitzer) reported, "He looked to be in danger right up until primary day, but the Utah Republican Congressman Chris Cannon survived a challenge over his support for the President's immigration reform policy." CNN (Henry) added, "The White House is declaring this is a clear victory for the President's comprehensive approach border security plus guest worker program. And the President today immediately tried to pivot off this win and take another run at striking a compromise." Bush "tried to seize the moment by summoning a leading conservative, Indiana Congressman Mike Pence for an Oval Office meeting with the President and Vice President to discuss Pence's compromise legislation that first tightens the US borders and gets illegal immigrants to leave the country temporarily."

The Washington Times (6/29, Hurt, 90K) headlines its story "Bush Carries Cannon To Victory In Utah," and reports, "It was Rep. Chris Cannon's name on the Republican primary ballot here Tuesday, but it was President Bush's resilient popularity in this conservative state that helped him beat back a challenge based almost entirely on his stance on immigration reform." Cannon's "lopsided win -- with 32,306 votes (56 percent) to 25,589 votes (44 percent) for Mr. Jacob -- vindicates the immigration policies of Mr. Bush and Mr. Cannon," challenger John Jacob told the Washington Times.

Roll Call (6/29, Duran) remarks on the "surprisingly strong margin" for Cannon, and the New York Times/AP (6/29) runs a brief report in which Cannon is quoted saying, "I hope what it means is Republicans look at this and realize we don't have to be divided on the issue of illegal immigration."

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (6/29, 2.11M) says Cannon's win "has national significance because he had been targeted for political extinction by immigration restrictionists in his own party and the conservative media. … Republican leaders in the House have convinced themselves that a tough anti-immigration stance is key to holding on to their majority in November. And they cite GOP Representative Brian Bilbray's special election victory earlier this month in California as evidence that demonizing illegal aliens is a political winner." But "Mr. Bilbray didn't even capture 50% of the vote in a safe GOP district against a Democrat, while Mr. Cannon has now survived a single-issue immigration assault from a well-financed fellow Republican. GOP voters are smarter than GOP Members think they are."

Senate Conservatives Seek To Resurrect Isakson Border Security Plan. The Hill (6/29, Allen) reports, "Conservative critics of the Senate's immigration bill are trying to resurrect Sen. Johnny Isakson's plan to predicate immigration reforms on federal certification that border-security measures have been implemented." Isakson "lost a floor vote on his amendment, 40-55, last month, but he says he now has the votes to support the plan and would like it to be the basis for conference negotiations, which have been forestalled by legislative and parliamentary conflicts." The Hill adds, "Several conservatives said yesterday that they are willing to consider a more comprehensive immigration bill if Isakson's trigger is implemented. 'There are lots of ways to get there, but looking the other way on border security is not' one of them, Isakson said." But "there is disagreement among the conservatives over how best to quash Senate provisions that would allow many of the illegal immigrants already here to become citizens."

Roll Call (6/29, Ben Pershing, Billings) reports "Republicans in both the House and Senate said the two chambers appeared to be moving slightly closer toward the possibility of an immigration reform deal." Roll Call terms the Isakson move "an olive branch" from "a handful of leading conservative Senate Republicans offered." Led by Isakson, "a half-dozen Republicans who are taking a hard line of making border security the first priority in any bill said positions are softening in the Senate on the highly charged issue. They argued that as long as border security was at the center of legislation, they would be willing to look at a temporary guest-worker program and potentially other aspects of comprehensive reform to deal with the millions of undocumented immigrants in the country."

Boehner Said To Remain Strongly Opposed To Senate Bill. The Washington Times (6/29, Fagan, Dinan, 90K) reports, "The House majority leader yesterday refused to budge from demanding a strong border-security bill and would not embrace Senate talk of broad legislation that would trigger a guest-worker program and other immigration changes once the borders are secure. 'I'm not going to negotiate this bill -- between the House and Senate -- through the press,' Rep. John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, said after he was asked repeatedly about recent Senate developments." Boehner "said House leaders instead will continue their plan to hold hearings next month to highlight flaws in the Senate-passed immigration bill, which includes citizenship for millions of illegal aliens, and the strengths of the House bill."

Shadegg Measure Would Increase Visas For Skilled Workers. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (6/28, 2.11M) reported, "In a move that high-tech groups predict could break the impasse over immigration legislation, Arizona's John Shadegg, a member of the House leadership, says he'll introduce legislation to increase visas and citizenship opportunities for skilled workers."

DHS Official Says Border Intelligence Strategy In Early Stages. The AP (6/29, Jordan) reports that Homeland Security Department intelligence chief Charles Allen told the House Homeland Security Committee that "years without an intelligence strategy to secure U.S. borders resulted in uncoordinated and sometimes incomplete threat information about immigrants," and "the department is in the early stages of completing a comprehensive border intelligence strategy." He admitted, "we should have done more earlier," and that "only over the past year has the Bush administration begun to develop plans to analyze border security gaps." However, Allen added, "we are now at this vigorously."

Snow Says "Whole Array Of Things" Required To Secure Border. White House Press Secretary Tony Snow was asked on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (6/28) if the 6,000 National Guard troops sent to the Mexican border are enough to secure the border. Snow said, "No, no. As a matter of fact, what you do is you use a whole array of things. In some places you're going to need fences. In some places, you're going to need border patrol agents and some of these God-forsaken places I've been telling you about, technical means." Snow added, "President Bush has actually been beefing up border patrol for a considerable period of time."

Dean Tells LULAC Convention That GOP "Scapegoating" Immigrants. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (6/29, Borowski, 266K) reports Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean "harshly condemned Republicans on the immigration issue Wednesday and called on Hispanic voters to help put his party back in power this fall." In a speech "at the national convention of the League of United Latin American Citizens, meeting this week in downtown Milwaukee, Dean accused Republicans of 'scapegoating' illegal immigrants." Dean said, "They're trying to do to immigrants what they did to gay and lesbian Americans in 2004, and that is wrong. Being an American means standing up for what is right. Immigrant bashing and scapegoating of any American is wrong, and we won't do it." The Journal Sentinel adds the "comments opened a day of politics and fund raising for Dean in Milwaukee. Later, he attended a fund-raiser for the state Democratic Party at the Holiday Inn City Centre expected to draw up to 300 people and raise about $10,000."

TAX:

IRS Locked In $1 Billion Dispute With Symantec. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Drucker) reports, "Symantec Corp., a large U.S. software company, is in a $1 billion court dispute with the Internal Revenue Service involving dealings among two affiliated companies." The Journal continues, "In a petition filed with the U.S. Tax Court on Monday, Symantec said the IRS is seeking more than $757 million in back taxes owed by Veritas Software Corp., a company acquired by Symantec in 2005. The IRS is also seeking $303 million in penalties." The Journal adds, "The fight is over the company's formula for 'transfer pricing' a complex set of rules determining how companies set prices, fees and cost-allocation arrangements between their operations in different tax jurisdictions. … In Symantec's case, the dispute is over the fees and cost-allocation arrangements between Veritas and an Irish subsidiary. The IRS contends that licensing fees paid by the Irish subsidiary to Veritas in the U.S. were too low and that Veritas credited the U.S. business with too much of the cost of developing certain technology, according to the petition. Both of those had the effect of increasing the income of Veritas's subsidiary in Ireland at the expense of income in the U.S., consequently lowering the U.S. tax bills paid by the company in 2000 and 2001. … In its petition, Symantec called the IRS's proposed income allocations 'arbitrary, capricious, and unreasonable.'"

DOJ_NMG_0037406

House Estate Tax Bill Said To Hurt Charities. The New York Times (6/29, Norris, 1.19M) reports, "If the estate tax bill approved last week by the House becomes law, it will benefit wealthy families and cost the government a lot of tax revenue. But there are likely to be other winners and losers as well." Charities "may find it harder to get donations and some heirs may have to wait years or even decades longer to collect inheritances, while surviving wives or husbands receive larger inheritances." States that impose estate taxes "will face new pressures to repeal them, because the federal government will no longer reduce its estate tax bill for those who owe state estate tax." The bill "faces an uncertain fate in the Senate, where a move to cut off debate on a bill to repeal estate taxes fell just three votes short. House leaders, who had wanted a complete repeal, pushed through the bill that was approved in the hope that it would pick up additional Senate votes."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Sends 10 Judicial Nominations To Senate. The Washington Times (6/29, Harper, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "President Bush yesterday sent 10 judicial nominations to the Senate, including names for four seats on the U.S. Court of Appeals, reports Stephen Dinan of The Washington Times. … Democrats and Republicans on Capitol Hill said that none of the nominees appears to be contentious but that they will be vetted thoroughly."

The AP (6/29) reports, "President Bush on Wednesday sent four nominations to the Senate to fill vacancies on federal appeals courts." The AP continues, "Nominated were Kent Jordan of Delaware for the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals; Debra Ann Livingston of New York for the 2nd Circuit; and Raymond Kethledge and Stephen Joseph Murphy III, both of Michigan, for the 6th Circuit." The AP adds, "Murphy, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Michigan, attended Marquette University and earned a law degree from St. Louis University. He has been public arbitrator for the National Association of Securities Dealers, adjunct professor at Ave Maria School of Law and counsel at General Motors Corp. and has worked in the tax division of the Justice Department."

Dole Urges Up-Own-Down Vote For Boyle. Sen. Elizabeth Dole writes in the Washington Times (6/29, 90K), "If you want evidence proving that the judicial confirmation process is in serious need of repair, Exhibit A would be Judge Terrence Boyle of North Carolina. Nearly 15 years ago, Judge Boyle was nominated for a seat on the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals by the first President Bush. President George W. Bush has since renominated Judge Boyle three times for the same seat -- once in 2001, a second time in 2003 and a third time in 2005. Judge Boyle was finally approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee a year ago, yet he continues to patiently await action by the full Senate." Dole says "the hard-core left is opposing the Boyle nomination, despite the fact that the American Bar Association has given him its highest possible rating." Boyle "deserves an up-or-down vote on his nomination. I am confident that the American people will reject this misguided attempt to tarnish his reputation and will wholeheartedly support his nomination."

Paulson Confirmed As New Treasury Secretary. The CBS Evening News (6/28, story 8, 0:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "On Capitol Hill, Senate Republicans and Democrats were unanimous today in confirming President Bush's choice of Henry Paulson as the next Treasury Secretary. Paulson is a Wall Street executive. He replaces John Snow who's held the Treasury post since 2003."

The Washington Post (6/29, A9, Murray, 744K) reports, "Depending on how Republicans fare in the midterm elections, Paulson could help to jump-start several Bush legislative initiatives that have stalled, including tax changes." The Treasury Department" is evaluating recommendations from a tax reform panel convened by Bush, and Paulson said one of his top priorities will be to complete that process and to present to Bush recommendations for 'a fair and simple tax system.'"

The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Wells, Price, 2.11M) says "Paulson, the outgoing chairman and chief executive at Goldman Sachs, broke little new ground in his testimony before the committee Tuesday. His responses on all questions were in line with Bush administration positions previously staked out by John Snow." He "spoke in favor of the 2001 reductions in taxes on dividends and capital gains, crediting them with preventing a more severe US economic retrenchment following the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks."

David Wessel writes his Wall Street Journal column (6/29), "Given the erosion of the Treasury's clout, the partisanship that blocks compromise and the ticking clock on the Bush presidency, Mr. Paulson faces (at least) three big questions. Can he square the deficit circle? … Can he steer anything through Congress? … Can he find the right words to cushion the dollar's fall?" Wessel adds, "Of course, luck helps, and there's an early sign he may be lucky. No senator asked Mr. Paulson (net worth: north of $700 million) to defend repeal of the estate tax."

State-Justice-Commerce Spending Bill Nears House Passage. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Rogers, 2.11M) reports the $62.6 billion State-Justice-Commerce appropriations bill "neared House passage after moderate Republicans joined Democrats in adding money back for legal services to the poor and small-business loan subsidies." Forty Republicans "broke ranks on a 237-185 vote shifting $25 million within accounts to raise the Legal Services Corporation budget to $338.8 million for the new fiscal year that begins Oct. 1." The margin "was much closer in the case of the Small Business Administration funding, but Republican defections were again pivotal as 17 joined Democrats on a 214-207 vote adding $40 million for SBA in hopes of reducing the fees charged on start-up loans under the 7(a) program."

Flake's Effort To Rein In Earmarks Noted. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Rogers, 2.11M) reports conservative Republican Rep. Jeff Flake is "a political guerrilla with a smile, a ringer for actor Owen Wilson who crashes not weddings but his own Republican Party." Since May, Flake has "grabbed the spotlight with the 'Flake Hour' -- a tradition at the end of debate on spending bills, in which he asks colleagues to come to the House floor and explain why taxpayers should pay for pet projects in their districts." Like "no one else, he has taken on the scandal-plagued House Appropriations Committee, a Republican power structure assigned the task of earmarking billions of dollars for home-state projects among members this election year." Flake said, "I don't think our leadership fully appreciates the trouble we are in." He added that Republicans are cutting their throats politically by continuing to sanction earmarks as part of an 'all politics is local' re-election strategy. The approach, he says, sacrifices the party's credibility with voters who want more control of spending."

CQ (6/28, Wolfe) reports the House "found itself in the uncomfortable position of having to fix the 2005 highway law (PL 109-59) that came up short on research funds because of too many earmarks. A vote was expected late Wednesday or Thursday." Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., "who has led the fight this year against earmarks in appropriations bills, criticized lawmakers on the floor Wednesday for what he described as an out-of-control system that allowed an 'over-earmarked' highway bill to pass."

Dubious Military Project Linked To Moran Contributions. NBC Nightly News (6/28, story 8, 2:50, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported in a "Fleecing of America" segment, "It's called 'Project M,' for magnetic levitation, a technology conceived ten years ago to make submarines quieter. It started out as one of thousands of routine research projects in the huge defense budget." So "who wanted it?" Winslow Wheeler, Center for Defense Information: "Certainly the contractor, Vibration And Sound Solutions Limited, and the local congressman, Virginia Democrat Jim Moran, a power on the Appropriations Committee, who kept pushing for it." Mitchell: "But after five years of study, in 2001 the Navy decided it didn't need the high-priced technology." Still, "year after year, it kept popping up. The contractor simply repackaged it to smooth the ride on high-speed boats used by Navy SEALs and all-terrain vehicles for the Marines. What have they produced: Some prototypes of shock-absorbing seats." The "total cost to taxpayers so far, $37 million. Campaign records show that the company's president and his wife contributed $17,000 to Congressman Moran since the project began -- all legal."

Bush Administration Unveils Stricter Welfare Rules. ABC World News Tonight (6/28, story 8, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Today, the Bush Administration announced the biggest changes to Federal welfare rules in ten years. Those changes designed to establish one national standard and cut the welfare rolls. States are going to have to meet stricter definition of what qualifies as job training or work. And keep closer track of welfare recipients."

The Washington Times (6/29, Wetzstein, 90K) reports, "Losing weight, exercising, getting a massage, reading motivational books and shopping with a friend are all 'worthy activities,' but they no longer can count as work under federal welfare regulations released yesterday." Wade F. Horn, Assistant Secretary for Children and Families in the Health and Human Services Department (HHS), says "healthy adults on welfare should expect to spend at least 20 hours a week doing things that the average American thinks of as work -- such as earning a paycheck, going to job interviews and performing supervised community service." A "legal loophole in the landmark 1996 welfare law allowed many states to put only a small portion of their welfare caseloads to work. As a result, many adults in the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) program didn't go to work."

USA Today (6/29, Wolf, 2.31M) reports, "Liberals and conservatives agree that new welfare regulations issued by the Bush administration Wednesday will further reduce the nation's welfare rolls. They disagree, however, on whether that's good or bad." Conservatives, "such as Ron Haskins of the Brookings Institution say tough new requirements for many of the 1.9 million families remaining on welfare will force them to get the skills they need to get private-sector jobs." But liberals, "such as Sharon Parrott of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, say the rules are likely to push more families into deep poverty by making welfare harder to get and by encouraging states to cut caseloads further."

The Washington Post (6/29, A2, Fletcher, 744K) reports Administration officials "and other supporters said new rules are necessary if the nation is going to continue reducing welfare rolls, which have shrunk nearly 60 percent in the decade since landmark changes in federal welfare law were enacted in 1996." The 1996 law, "which created the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) program, set what lawmakers thought were tough work rules requiring half of adult welfare recipients in each state to go to work or be enrolled in job training. But the law allowed the percentage to be reduced as states sharply decreased welfare caseloads." The Post adds the proposal "would require 50 percent of adult welfare recipients on the rolls to be working or be in job training programs by October, or states would face financial penalties. State government advocates and social service groups criticized the proposed rules -- which are scheduled to go into effect in October, pending public comment -- calling them inflexible and shortsighted."

Group Alleges Taylor's Bank Ownership Violates House Ethics Rules. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Wilke, 2.11M) reports as the House ethics committee "resumes its work after more than a year of inactivity, partisan and government-reform groups are expected to seek investigations of a number of powerful lawmakers." The nonprofit Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington "charged that Rep. Charles Taylor, chairman of the Appropriations Committee's Interior and Environment Subcommittee, violated congressional rules in his ownership of U.S. and Russian banks." The complaint "against Rep. Taylor alleges that his ownership of Blue Ridge Savings & Loan in North Carolina, and a Russian bank, Commercial Bank of Ivanovo, violates House rules prohibiting members from providing services involving fiduciary relationships. It also asserts that his ownership of the Russian bank since 2003 has amounted to an improper use of his congressional office and charges that he did favors for corporate lobbyists and contributors."

Specter Criticizes Bush Use Of Signing Statements. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter said on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (6/28) that by issuing signing statements, President Bush "is revising the legislation or ignoring the legislation. And part of the duty of the Judiciary Committee is constitutional oversight. And the Constitution provides that the president can veto a bill, and he can come to us and say I'm not going to agree with it unless you put this qualifying language in. But just unilaterally, on his own, after the bill is submitted, passes both Houses to strike certain parts of it and ignore other parts…that is not in conformance with the Constitution." Specter added, "I think it is true that no president has used the signing statements as often or in the same direction that President Bush has. And I believe if he doesn't like provisions of the bill, he ought to tell us what he doesn't like, and then he can veto it."

Gingrich, Johnson Want Legislative Oversight Meeting With Democrats. The Hill (6/29, Cusack) reports after "angering some Republican investigators on Capitol Hill during a contentious meeting this spring, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) and a senior Bush administration official want to hold another forum on legislative oversight. But this time they want to invite Democrats." A bipartisan meeting "focusing on oversight of the executive branch with White House official Clay Johnson present would no doubt lead to partisan fireworks — especially during an election year." Gingrich, who "helped organize the April 7 meeting with GOP staff investigators, acknowledged that letting Democrats in the room could trigger conflict. However, Gingrich suggested that the discussion probably would yield positive results." The Hill adds Capitol Hill officials "predict that a bipartisan meeting would be even testier and would likely deteriorate into a mudslinging confrontation."

Bush Not Getting Credit For Economy. The Los Angeles Times (6/29, McManus, 958K) reports that all year long, "in speeches and briefings and visits to factories and shops, President Bush and his aides have tried to convince Americans that the economy is in good shape — and that the president deserves some credit for that. That effort is not making much headway, a Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll has found." Americans are "closely divided on whether the economy is in good shape, with 50% saying it is doing well and 47% saying it is doing badly, the poll found." And Bush "doesn't get much credit for the economy's relative health, the new survey found. Of respondents, 39% say they approve of the president's handling of the economy and 19% say they think the economy is better because of his policies — numbers that are basically unchanged since the beginning of the year." The Times/Bloomberg poll "interviewed 1,321 adults nationwide between Saturday and Tuesday under the supervision of Times Poll Director Susan Pinkus. The survey's margin of sampling error is plus or minus three percentage points."

Survey Finds Federal Workers Uninformed About Retirement Planning. The Washington Post (6/29, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "More than half of federal employees expect to retire before age 62, with almost four in 10 looking to retire at 59 or earlier, according to a survey conducted for the Office of Personnel Management. But less than half have calculated how much they need to save for a comfortable retirement, and only two in 10 federal employees have a professional financial adviser to help with retirement planning." OPM "commissioned the survey as part of an effort to address concerns in Congress that federal employees too often receive incomplete retirement counseling or start their retirement planning later than recommended. The survey will be used to develop a 'retirement readiness index profile' for government workers that will show them where they stand compared with an age-based group of peers and will help them consider the various factors, including finances, that go into successful retirement planning."

Discovery To Launch Over Objections Of NASA Safety Officer. The Washington Post (6/29, A1, Gugliotta, 744K) reports in a front page story that the space shuttle Discovery "is poised for launch Saturday for what NASA engineers hope will be an uneventful mission, knowing that another mishap, even a minor one, could doom the shuttle program and deflate President Bush's ambitions for future space exploration." The shuttle is "flying without approval by NASA's top safety officer. He voted 'no-go' for the mission at the final flight readiness review because of concerns that unacceptably large pieces of foam insulation could break away from the external fuel tank during launch and damage the orbiter." Still, chief safety officer Bryan O'Connor "and a fellow dissenter, NASA chief engineer Chris Scolese, agreed in the end with the judgment of NASA Administrator Michael D. Griffin that the hazard does not pose an unacceptable risk to the crew -- who, if necessary, could find 'safe haven' on the international space station while awaiting a rescue flight."

LATimes Says NASA Should Scrap Shuttle Program. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (6/29, 958K) says NASA "plans to launch the space shuttle Discovery on Saturday despite warnings that it still hasn't fixed the problem that killed seven astronauts aboard the shuttle Columbia in 2003." Instead of "risking another tragic or humiliating setback Saturday, NASA should abandon the shuttle and focus on more productive missions. The shuttle was intended as a reusable spacecraft that would require only routine maintenance between missions. But NASA has been working on the foam problem for more than three years. It's becoming increasingly clear that the issue with the shuttle isn't age but a design flaw."

55 Faith-Based Community Groups Split $4 Million In Employment Training Funds. The Washington Times (6/29, Hoover, 90K) reports, "Fifty-five faith-based and community organizations -- chosen from 557 applicants -- will split $4 million in grants designated for grass-roots groups to 'help hard-to-serve populations prepare for and succeed in employment opportunities,' the Department of Labor announced yesterday." Because "grass-roots groups know more about local businesses and the problems that specific individuals have in finding jobs, they are able to 'provide that critical personal touch that can make the difference in these individuals' lives,' said Jedd Medefind, the director of the department's Center for Faith-Based and Community Initiatives."

Mineta's Preference For Water Recreation Noted. The Washington Post (6/29, Blumenfeld, 744K) reports that for Treasury Secretary Norman Mineta, "whose office windows do not open, a few hours of river winds revive him. Next week he will step down as the longest-serving transportation secretary in U.S. history, the official charged with the safety of all trucks, buses, trains and planes. When he pilots the Rhode Runner, a 29-foot 1986 Chris-Craft cuddy, he can take off his shirt, clip on his Leatherman knife, and cruise, drop anchor or drift. And one more thing. 'I imagine I'm a pirate,' Norm said. 'Of the Caribbean.'"

Jenna Bush Said To Be Taking Teaching Job In Latin America. The Washington Post (6/29, C1, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column that Jenna Bush "has been quietly making plans over recent months to leave D.C. for a teaching job in Latin America, most likely around the end of summer." The move reflects Bush's "growing seriousness…yet also offers an escape from the Washington spotlight she and sister Barbara always have seemed to resent. Last week marked her final day at the Mount Pleasant charter school where she taught for a year and a half."

Isakson Says Pension Measure Not Bailout For Airline Industry. In a Wall Street Journal (6/29, 2.11M) letter to the editor, Sen. Johnny Isakson says, "I take great exception to the premise of your June 27 editorial 'Pension Crash Landing' that the pension reform Congress is negotiating will result in a taxpayer bailout of the airlines. In fact, this proposed pension reform will protect the American taxpayer." Congress' failure to overhaul pension laws "will almost certainly lead to companies defaulting on their pension obligations and shifting that burden onto taxpayers. You say it's wrong to give airlines with defined-benefit plans additional time to meet their pension obligations. Don't you want those airlines to honor their commitment to their employees?"

Congress Seen As Avoiding Responsibility In Election Year. In a USA Today (6/29, 2.31M) debate, conservative columnist Cal Thomas and liberal Democratic strategist Bob Beckelis debate congressional behavior during election years. Beckelis said, "You would think that with Iraq, a nuclear threat from Iran, $3 a gallon gas, immigration and a deficit out of control, that Congress would be busy. Bless their collective hearts, they're working hard — at getting re-elected. So what did the Senate debate this month? Constitutional amendments against gay marriage and burning the flag, and a pork-laden spending bill. The House? They worked overtime to end estate taxes for people like Paris Hilton. Voters give Congress job ratings below 25%. It's no wonder." Thomas added, "I agree with you on flag burning (most flags are made in China anyway) and on pork projects (though Democrats are equal opportunity porkers). But the politics of same-sex marriage began with those who are asserting a 'right' that violates the dictionary, historical tradition, scripture and common sense."

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Expected To Raise Rates Again Today. The Washington Post (6/29, D1, Henderson, 744K) reports, "The Federal Reserve is on track to lift its benchmark interest rate again today for a 17th consecutive quarter-percentage-point increase over 25 months, making this the longest sustained campaign on record of raising interest rates. So why isn't the economy choking by now?" The Post adds, "The short answer is that money is still pretty cheap, in historical terms. But Americans are finally starting to feel the squeeze, as higher borrowing costs cool the housing market, depress automobile sales and crimp some household spending."

Stocks Up Yesterday. NBC Nightly News (6/28, story 10, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today, stocks gained back some of what they lost yesterday. The Dow was up just under 49 points [to close at 10,973.56]. Nasdaq gained more than 11 points on the day's trading [to close at 2,111.84]." USA Today (6/29, 2.31M) reports the Standard & Poor's 500 index advanced 6.80 points, or 0.5%, to 1246.00. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, McKay, 2.11M), among other newspapers, also reports the stock numbers.

Judge Says New York Must Take Over Administration Of Legal Aid For Poor. The New York Times (6/29, Hakim) reports, "Chief Judge Judith S. Kaye of New York said Wednesday that the state must take over administration of legal services to the poor, citing a crisis in the way county governments and New York City are providing legal aid in criminal cases. Judge Kaye's call came in response to a judicial commission report saying local governments were falling well short of constitutional requirements in providing legal representation to the poor, and recommended that a permanent state commission be created to take over the responsibility. … A state takeover would require legislative approval, and the Legislature has a long history of ignoring reforms proposed by Judge Kaye and the judiciary. The commission report cited such problems as overburdened defenders who, in one county, average 1,000 misdemeanors and 175 felony cases in a year, and 'grossly inadequate' financing. It also cited wide disparities in counties' spending and in the resources available to prosecutors and defenders. The state lacks standards to define what it means to provide adequate indigent defense and has no system for enforcing such standards, the report said."

Ehrlich Launches Reelection Campaign. The Washington Post (6/29, A1, Mosk, Wagner, 744K) reports in a front page story that Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. "returned to his boyhood home yesterday to launch his bid for reelection, and he plans to name his running mate this morning, a 36-year-old female Cabinet secretary who is blind." Ehrlich "made the formal reelection announcement standing on the front steps of his parents' modest brick rowhouse in the Baltimore suburb of Arbutus, telling a sun-drenched crowd that he wants to be Maryland's first Republican governor in 50 years elected to a second term. Today he is expected to embark on that effort with Kristen Cox, his secretary of disabilities, sources close to the governor said." Ehrlich is "more than halfway to his target of raising $20 million and has had a campaign operation that has been moving at full tilt for months. Yesterday, he vowed not only to keep his hold on the governor's mansion but also to realign a state that has been dominated by Democrats for most of the past 100 years." He will "spend the next five months locked in combat with Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, the Democrat who had expected an extended primary fight until his opponent, Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan, withdrew from the race last week."

46% Of Democrats "More Enthusiastic Than Usual" About 2006 Election. The Washington Times (6/29, Harper, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Democrats are already in dress rehearsal for the midterm elections, now less than five months away. According to a Pew Research poll of 1,501 adults released yesterday, 46 percent say they are 'more enthusiastic than usual' about the upcoming races -- compared with 30 percent of the Republicans." But, "only half of the Democrats are happy with their party, compared with 58 percent of Republicans."

Obama Urges Democrats To Embrace Discussions Of Faith. The AP (6/29, Espo) reports, "Sen. Barack Obama chastised fellow Democrats on Wednesday for failing to 'acknowledge the power of faith in the lives of the American people,'" and "said the party must compete for the support of evangelicals and other churchgoing Americans." Said Obama, "Not every mention of God in public is a breach to the wall of separation. Context matters. … It is doubtful that children reciting the Pledge of Allegiance feel oppressed or brainwashed as a consequence of muttering the phrase 'under God.'" USA Today (6/29, 2.31M) reports Obama said Democrats "must compete for the support of 'religious Americans and tell them what we stand for.'"

The Chicago Tribune (6/29, Goldberg, 643K) reports, "Obama spoke Wednesday of progressives' failure to handle religious issues and insisted it is time Democrats find a cure for their spiritual ills." Obama "offered his political and religious observations to a coalition of Christians gathered at the Call to Renewal conference on poverty in America." On the event's final day, Obama "was honored for his work on behalf of society's less fortunate. He said it was his work as a community organizer for Christian churches that acquainted him with his own beliefs and values." Said Obama, "At worst, some liberals dismiss religion in the public square as inherently irrational or intolerant, insisting on a caricature of religious Americans that paints them as fanatical, or thinking that the very word 'Christian' describes one's political opponents, not people of faith. … Over the long haul, I think we make a mistake when we fail to acknowledge the power of faith in the lives of the American people, and join a serious debate about how to reconcile faith with our modern, pluralistic democracy."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/28, Roberts) reported, "At stake is a huge swathe of voters across the Midwest and through the South, white evangelicals. They account for nearly one in four people who voted in 2004. And they went overwhelmingly for President Bush."

Obama Seen As Holding Promise, Peril For Democrats. In his Washington Sketch column in the Washington Post (6/29, 744K), Dana Milbank says Democratic "phenom Barack Obama, the subject of the latest presidential boomlet, was nearing the end of a thoughtful speech about religion in politics yesterday at a church in Thomas Circle when he mentioned the Sermon on the Mount." Obama said, "It's doubtful that our own Defense Department would survive its application." The Post adds, "The audience of left-leaning Christian leaders went nuts, apparently interpreting this as a barb at the Bush administration and the war in Iraq. But Obama was being rhetorical, and was not suggesting the Pentagon should surrender to the meek. Had he said such a thing during a political campaign, the other side could have used it to devastating effect." Therein "lies both the promise and peril Democrats see in the freshman senator from Illinois. Forty-four years old and smart, he is enormously charismatic -- and utterly undefined."

Electability Seen As Key Quality In 2008. In his Roll Call column (6/29), political analyst Stuart Rothenberg says that in the 2008 presidential race, "since both parties are placing an unusually high priority on nominating candidates who can beat the other's nominee, activists in each party are likely to base their decisions to an unusual degree on what the other party seems to be doing." Almost "universally, politically sophisticated Democrats have become so frustrated with their losses in 2000 and 2004 and so angry after six years of George W. Bush as president that they aren't willing to nominate someone they see as destined to lose in '08, even if they like that candidate's message or the symbolism of his or her election." Many Republicans "feel the same way. Even conservatives seem willing to support a nominee with whom they don't entirely agree, such as Arizona Sen. John McCain, if that is the only way to guarantee that New York Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton — and her husband, former President Bill Clinton — don't return to the White House. 'Electability' apparently played a significant role in the race for the 2004 Democratic presidential nomination, especially in Iowa, where Democrats concluded that Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) would make a more formidable nominee than former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean. But it's likely to be an even bigger factor in 2008."

Kondracke Says Nominating Moderates Would Reduce Partisan Warfare. In his Roll Call column (6/29), executive editor Morton Kondracke says, "Probably the best chance America has for escaping from endless partisan warfare and for getting its big problems solved is for both parties to nominate a moderate in 2008 and have them argue over issues, not ideology. Like Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney or Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) on the Republican side, vs. former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner on the Democratic." Romney and McCain "are busy identifying themselves as 'proud conservatives' these days to maintain credibility in the GOP, and Warner, too, told me, 'I desperately try to reject' the terms 'moderate' and 'centrist' because 'they seem weaker rather than stronger on the issues' whereas he wants to be 'bold.'"

Maine Economy Declined Last Year. The New York Times (6/29, Sabar, 1.19M) reports Maine was "the only state besides Louisiana to see a decline in economic activity last year, according to a new Federal Reserve study. The state lost 1,700 manufacturing jobs and 800 financial jobs, said the report, which was posted on the Web site of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston. The losses were partly offset by gains in education, health services, professional and business services, and government." Analysts said while

Maine "has a consistently strong summer tourist industry, the state is struggling to retool its year-round economy after decades of mill closings."

Armstrong Takes On New Role As Cancer Research Lobbyist. USA Today (6/29, A1, Ruibal, 2.31M) reports on the front page that Lance Armstrong's "impact on" the Tour de France "was so great that his absence — and the battle to succeed him — is the biggest story of the 2006 race, which begins Saturday in Strasbourg, France. There are no American heirs apparent, and his Discovery Channel team is a decided underdog." Armstrong's life "has changed dramatically. Unlike his highly regimented Tour-training periods, there is now no typical week for Armstrong, 34. He keeps a busy schedule crammed with visits with his children in Austin, corporate promotions and the occasional mountain bike ride. Most of his time is focused on defeating the disease that almost killed him in 1996." In President Bush's "proposed 2007 budget, the annual budget for the National Cancer Institute would be cut 0.8% ($39.5 million) to $4.75 billion. This would come a year after a $31 million cut in the NCI's budget, and it would mark the first consecutive years of decreased funding since 1981 and '82, the institute says." Armstrong and "the foundation that bears his name support the NCI's effort to seek the $5.89 billion it says it needs to keep its current research programs." Armstrong says "his is a non-partisan crusade. Last year, he rode mountain bikes with Bush at the presidential ranch in Texas and made a pitch for more cancer funds. During the lobbying trip to Washington, he spoke with new White House spokesman Tony Snow — a cancer survivor — on Snow's first day in that job." But his "closest political mentor, however, is John Kerry."

Koizumi Arrives In Washington. The AP (6/29) reports that Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi arrived in Washington Wednesday for meetings with President Bush. Discussions "were expected to focus on the possible launch of a North Korean missile and on efforts to persuade the communist country to abandon its nuclear weapons program. Bush and Koizumi planned to attend a dinner Thursday in honor of the prime minister, whose term ends in September."

Knight Ridder (6/29, Schoof) reports, "Japan and the United States both have suspicious minds about North Korea's nuclear weapons program, both are intent on keeping the peace on the Korean Peninsula and between China and Taiwan, and both want to ensure that Asia isn't all shook up by China's growing prestige and economic power. At the same time, they need to find ways to cooperate on other issues, including curbing Iran's nuclear ambitions."

Bush, Koizumi To Visit Graceland. USA Today (6/29, Jackson, Benedetto, 2.31M) reports that President Bush will take Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi to Graceland Friday. The trip is "a presidential going-away present to the soon-to-retire Koizumi. The self-proclaimed Elvis fan and imitator has been one of Bush's staunchest global supporters in the war on terrorism and Iraq." USA adds, "Today, Koizumi will be treated to a morning arrival ceremony with full military honors on the White House South Lawn. He is the guest of honor at a black-tie dinner tonight."

The New York Times (6/29, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports, "The visit to the Presley manse in Memphis will follow a more sober joint meeting on Thursday in the White House." The Times calls the Graceland visit "a case study of Mr. Bush's own brand of diplomacy, one that relies on personal chemistry and perks."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/29, LaFranchi, 61K) reports that the trip "also suggests how much Bush appreciates Koizumi's support on issues like Iraq and international terrorism."

Strengths Seen In Bush's Personal Diplomacy. Richard Wolffe and Holly Bailey wrote on Newsweek's (6/28) web site that "even more important than the journey to Memphis is what the trip says about Bush's exceptionally personal form of diplomacy. … As trivial as it sounds, there are certain strengths to this kind of one-on-one diplomacy. There's little doubt among Japan analysts that the close relationship between Bush and Koizumi has been critical in improving relations between the United States and Japan."

Draft Foreign Aid Bill Cuts $2.4 Billion From Bush Request. CQ (6/28, Starks) reported, "Senate appropriators on Thursday will consider a draft foreign aid spending bill for fiscal 2007 that would lop off $2.4 billion from President Bush's $33.7 billion discretionary request, reflecting a congressional shift in budget priorities from defense and programs abroad to domestic ones." CQ added, "The biggest victim of that shift is expected to be the Millennium Challenge Account (MCA), President Bush's signature program that aids developing countries that demonstrate good governance and follow free-market principles. … Congressional aides said the remainder of the reductions would be spread across other programs, such as the requested $75 million for the conflict response fund, which assists unstable or 'failed' countries."

Israel Intensifies Gaza Offensive. Israel stepped up its offensive in Gaza Wednesday in an effort to seek the release and safe return of a kidnapped Israel soldier. ABC World News Tonight (6/28, story 4, 2:10, Wright, 8.78M) reported, "Israel's government today promised extreme measures in its effort to rescue the kidnapped soldier. And the Israeli military is making good on that threat. Potentially more troubling -- the conflict is widening. Today, Israeli war planes went all the way to Syria, to buzz the Syrian president's summer home. And the Syrians shot back at them. Bashar Assad actively supports the militant group holding Israel's soldier."

The CBS Evening News (6/28, story 3, 1:45, Simon, 7.66M) reported, "Unless and until that soldier is delivered live back to Israel, it's going to get worse. People in Gaza are going to suffer more. If the soldier turns up dead, everyone in Hamas better hit the ground running because the Israeli assassination teams are going to spring into action, including in Damascus, which is what that overflight signaled today -- that they know where the leaders are."

The CBS Evening News (6/28, story 2, 2:45, MacVicar, 7.66M) reported, "What Israeli forces tried to do last night by cutting bridges and moving ground forces close to the Egyptian border was to contain the militants with their Israeli hostage into one corner of the Gaza Strip, restricting their movement. For the people of Gaza, it has also launched the beginnings of a new humanitarian crisis."

NBC Nightly News (6/28, story 7, 2:25, Fletcher, 9.87M) reported, "Palestinian militants today stepped up the psychological pressure too, claiming they have kidnapped two more Israelis, including a Jewish settler they are threatening to behead if Israeli doesn't leave Gaza. Israel today also took the war of nerves to Syria. Fighter jets caused sonic booms over a palace of the Syrian president, warning him to stop sheltering the Palestinian who ordered the kidnapping of the Israeli soldier.

USA Today (6/29, Gutman, 2.31M) reports, "Palestinian witnesses told the Associated Press that Israeli tanks began moving into northern Gaza early today. Israel's invasion of Gaza started before dawn Wednesday, when Israeli jets knocked out three bridges on key north-south roads and blew up electrical transformers, knocking out electricity to many of Gaza's estimated 1.3 million residents. Israel was hoping those attacks would prevent the kidnappers of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, 19, from moving him to another location."

Knight Ridder (6/29, Nissenbaum) reports, "Israeli forces cut off power throughout much of Gaza, destroyed key bridges and seized the Gaza Strip's defunct airport near the Egyptian border in southern Gaza. Israeli helicopters and artillery kept up a steady rain of fire throughout southern Gaza, and scores of Palestinians fled their homes ahead of the advancing troops. There were indications that Israel planned to open a second front soon in northern Gaza."

The AP (6/29, Gutkin) reports, "No deaths or injuries were reported in the incursion, launched early Wednesday in southern Gaza. But Palestinians filled up on basic supplies after warplanes knocked out electricity, raising the specter of a humanitarian crisis. The Hamas-led government warned of 'epidemics and health disasters' because of damaged water pipes to central Gaza and the lack of power to pump water."

Israeli Forces Detain Hamas Ministers. The New York Times (6/29, Fisher, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "In the West Bank city of Ramallah early on Thursday, Israeli forces detained 8 ministers of the 24-member Hamas-led cabinet and 20 lawmakers, including Deputy Prime Minister Nasser Shaer and Labor Minister Mohammed Barghouti, The Associated Press reported, citing security officials."

The AP (6/29) report this morning says Israeli forces "arrested one-third of the Hamas-led Palestinian Cabinet and 20 lawmakers early Thursday and pressed their incursion into Gaza." The AP adds, "Palestinian witnesses told The Associated Press that Israeli tanks and bulldozers entered northern Gaza before daybreak Thursday, adding a second front to the Israeli action in Gaza that began early Wednesday when thousands of Israeli troops crossed into southern Gaza."

Israeli Warplanes Buzz Assad's Home. A separate AP (6/28, Abu-Nasr) reports, "Israel said its warplanes buzzed the summer residence of President Bashar Assad Wednesday in a bold warning to the country that shelters the political leader of Hamas, the Islamic militant group holding an Israeli soldier captive in the Gaza Strip."

The Washington Times (6/29, Mitnick, 90K) reports that the move was intended "to intimidate the patron of Hamas militants."

Palestinian Militants Claim They Killed Israeli Settler. The Los Angeles Times (6/29, King, Ellingwood, 958K) reports, "Palestinian militants said they had killed a Jewish settler from the West Bank whom they previously claimed to have abducted, and local media reported that a separate armed group said it had kidnapped another Israeli civilian."

US Affirms Israel's "Right To Defend Itself." The AP (6/29, Schweid) reports that the Bush Administration yesterday affirmed "Israel's right to defend itself against acts of terror and called on the president of the Palestinian Authority and Egypt to help resolve a crisis provoked by the abduction of an Israeli soldier. The White House and State Department declined to take a position on Israel's pressure offensive in southern Gaza that has knocked out electricity and water supplies for most of the 1.3 million Palestinians who live in Gaza. But spokesmen again condemned the abduction of an Israeli corporal and said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and U.S. diplomats 'continue to do everything we can...to bring this crisis to a peaceful resolution.'"

NYTimes Says Hamas Responsible For Latest Escalation By Israel. An editorial in the New York Times (6/29, 1.19M) says, "The responsibility for this latest escalation rests squarely with Hamas, whose military wing tunneled into Israel on Sunday, killed two Israeli soldiers and kidnapped another. This was a follow-up to a declaration earlier this month by Hamas's political leadership that the group's 16-month intermittent cease-fire would no longer be observed. Under the circumstances, an Israeli military response was inevitable."

LATimes Urges Israel To Exercise Restraint. The Los Angeles Times (6/29, 958K) editorializes, "The frustration that triggered the Israeli military's incursion into Gaza on Wednesday is understandable." The Times urges Israel to Exercise restraint, noting, "It isn't that the world questions Israelis' right to feel frustrated, or to retaliate. It is simply that we cringe at the sight of a disproportionate response that could undermine prospects of ending the cycle of violence.

US Wants Iran Response By Mid-July. The US and its allies want Iran To respond by mid-July to a proposal designed to ease international tensions over Iran's nuclear programs. The Washington Times (6/29, Sands, 90K) reports, "Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad suggested earlier this month that Tehran would not reply until Aug. 22, but the United States and its close allies say the delay is unacceptable. … Turkish Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul, in a visit to Tehran over the weekend, told Iranian leaders privately that the August date was unacceptable and that Iran should give its answer before the G-8 summit, Nabi Sensoy, Turkish ambassador to the United States, said in an interview at The Washington Times this week."

Iran To Give Revolutionary Guards Lucrative Gas Deal. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Kalantari, Jones, 2.11M) reports, "Iran is about to award a lucrative gas deal to the country's Revolutionary Guards, a senior Iranian oil official said, in the latest sign of turbulence in the nation's huge but underfinanced energy industry. The official said Iranian contractor Ghorb will be awarded a $2.3 billion pact to develop two future phases of Iran's South Pars gas field. Ghorb is an affiliate of the Revolutionary Guards, Iran's elite militia. The official was unable to give the timing of the signing of the deal."

UN Urged To Include Human Rights On Iran Agenda. Hadi Ghaemi, Iran researcher for Human Rights Watch, writes in the New York Times (6/29, 1.19M), "Last week Iranians woke up to a startling piece of news: their government had dispatched Tehran's notorious prosecutor general, Saeed Mortazavi, to Geneva as a member of Iran's delegation to the opening session of the new United Nations Human Rights Council. … Mr. Mortazavi is one of the country's highest profile rights violators." Ghaemi adds that the Security council "should support the appointment of a United Nations special rapporteur on Iran to monitor and report publicly on human rights abuses and to see that the government's present lack of accountability does not translate into an even more extensive crackdown on political dissent and social freedoms. Further, the members of the Security Council and Germany, which are engaged in nuclear negotiations with Iran, should include human rights concerns on their agenda."

Administration Pushes Ahead With RRW Program. The Washington Post (6/29, A15, Pincus, 744K) reports, "The Bush administration is expected to announce today that it has dismantled the last of the most powerful nuclear missile warheads left over from the Cold War. … The National Nuclear Security Administration (NNSA) has increased by 50 percent the rate at which it is dismantling older weapons in the nuclear stockpile, which has about 5,000 weapons. But Congress and the administration are pressing ahead with the Reliable Replacement Warhead (RRW) program, which will guarantee production in the next decade of fewer but more reliable and secure nuclear warheads and bombs."

Measure Would Lift Ban On US Military Contact With Taiwan. CQ (6/28, Hoskinson) reported, "The House on Wednesday adopted by voice vote a measure that would effectively lift restrictions on high-level US military contacts with Taiwan. The amendment to the fiscal 2007 Commerce-Justice-Science spending bill (HR 5672) by Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., would bar any funds in the bill from being used to enforce State Department restrictions on official travel to Taiwan by senior U.S. military officers."

Senate Expected Top Pass Oman Trade Deal Today. CQ (6/28, Van Dongen) reported, "The Senate is expected to pass legislation Thursday that would implement a free-trade agreement with Oman, but Democratic grumbling over the Bush administration's handling of trade negotiations could spell trouble for future pacts. The Finance Committee approved the Oman bill (S 3569) on Wednesday by a 10-3 vote after an angry debate over the administration's decision not to include a provision sought by the panel on forced labor. The skirmish likely presages problems with renewal of fast-track presidential trade negotiating authority, which expires in 2007."

Schwab Says US Remains Committed To Doha Talks. Susan Schwab, the US trade representative, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/29, 2.11M), "The atmosphere is charged with political pressure and historical significance as trade ministers and negotiators representing World Trade Organization members gather this week. With time running out for a successful conclusion of the Doha Development Round, speculation has intensified about what the US and other WTO members will be willing to do to achieve success. I reaffirm here that the US is committed to an ambitious and comprehensive outcome by the end of the year. As President Bush declared last week at the US-EU summit, the Doha Round is too important to fail." The United States "put forward an offer last fall to make meaningful cuts in trade-distorting domestic agricultural supports if other countries would reciprocate with deep cuts in tariffs and trade-distorting domestic support. So far, our trading partners have not matched our ambition -- but it is not too late. … The need for meaningful trade liberalization has never been greater and the potential benefits of expanded trade have never been more compelling."

Negotiations Remain Deadlocked Ahead Of Meeting. The Financial Times (6/29, Beattie, Strauss) reports, "Leading countries in the troubled Doha global trade negotiations remained firmly in entrenched positions on Wednesday ahead of a weekend of high-pressure talks, though the head of the World Trade Organization floated the outline of a possible compromise." Indian trade minister Kamal Nath Wednesday said the US had "isolated itself in the talks with its insistence on deep cuts" in agricultural tariffs. US Trade Representative Susan Schwab responded, saying, "I do not think the US is isolated in terms of wanting an ambitious outcome." For his part, WTO chief Pascal Lamy said he thought a deal could be reached if the US would adopt "a $20 billion ceiling for farm subsidies" and developing countries cut industrial tariffs "to no more than 20 percent."

US To Press EU On Farm Policy. The Washington Times (6/29, Sparshott, 90K) reports, "The Bush administration's top trade officials will push for a breakthrough in World Trade Organization talks starting tomorrow, though continuing disagreements with Europe over farm policies threaten to mire the negotiations." US Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, who will join US Trade Representative Susan Schwab at the talks, said, "I would even go so far as to say that this is a make-or-break stage for us." Before departing, Johanns and Schwab "reiterated that other countries must open their markets to US farm goods before the White House and Congress will pare back agriculture subsidies."

UN Approves 18-Month Budget; Members Lift Spending Caps. The Washington Times (6/29, Pisik, 90K) reports UN member states approved an 18-month budget yesterday despite objections from the United States, which had tried to hold up the package while it pressed for administrative reforms proposed by Secretary-General Kofi Annan. It still is not clear whether Congress, which has strongly advocated sweeping reforms for the world body, will authorize the payment of annual dues later this year."

The AP (6/28) reported, "UN member states lifted a $950 million spending cap on the United Nations budget Wednesday, averting a financial crisis for now but dealing a blow to the US which had pushed for the limits as a lever to pressure for reforms." The AP adds, "The decision to lift the spending cap was a defeat for US Ambassador John Bolton, who played a key role in getting the General Assembly to adopt it last year as a way to increase pressure for reform. … The decision now shifts the spotlight to the US Congress, which has threatened to block US funding for the United Nations if it does not enact serious reform."

The New York Times (6/29, Hoge, 1.19M) reports, "The measure passed by consensus, without a vote, in the 191-nation committee, but the United States, Australia and Japan declared that they were officially 'disassociating' themselves from the decision. The three countries, which together account for 43 percent of the assessed budget of the United Nations, said that not enough reform measures had been put into place to justify removing the restriction."

Russian Official Says US Seeks International Energy Domination. The Los Angeles Times (6/29, Murphy, 958K) reports, "President Vladimir V. Putin's top political advisor Wednesday accused the U.S. of seeking international energy domination under the guise of promoting democracy and insisted that Russia is committed to building its own style of political pluralism without outside interference." Vladislav Y. Surkov, deputy head of the presidential administration, said, "People talk to us about democracy, but they're really thinking about our energy resources." Surkov "noted that during Dick Cheney's recent visit to Kazakhstan, an oil-rich state whose human rights record is often criticized, the American vice president 'harshly criticized Russia's democracy and then praised Kazakhstan's.'"

Mexican Campaign Ends With Polls Too Close To Call. The New York Times (6/29, Mckinley, 1.19M) reports, "Mexico's polarizing presidential campaign ended officially on Wednesday and, with four days to go before the vote, it has come down to a contest between a gritty, charismatic advocate for the poor and a well-educated technocrat." Like many elections, "this one is a struggle between promise and fear and remains too close to call. On one side is Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the former mayor of Mexico City who has traveled little outside Mexico and says he is inspired by Gandhi and Franklin D. Roosevelt. On the other is Felipe Calderón, the former energy minister with a Harvard degree who talks of fitting Mexico into the globalized economy." But "for many voters the choice is complicated because Mexico only emerged six years ago from seven decades of single-party, autocratic rule and there are some who say that what is at stake on Sunday is the survival of still-fragile democratic institutions."

USA Today (6/29, Harman, 2.31M) reports, "A poll in the Reforma newspaper Friday, the last day on which polls could be legally published, showed López Obrador had 36% support and Calderón had 34%. Roberto Madrazo, 53, of the PRI, which led the country for 71 years until 2000, trailed with 25%." The 2.5-percentage-point margin of error "puts the top two vote-getters in a virtual tie. Mexico doesn't require a runoff, so the presidency goes to Sunday's winner even if he takes fewer than 50% of the votes."

The Washington Times (6/29, Sparshott, 90K) notes Lopez Obrador and Felipe Calderon "are running on markedly different economic platforms and plans to create a governing coalition." Calderon's policies "are similar to those of outgoing President Vicente Fox. He has said he would try to open Mexico's energy sector to private investment and abide by rules under the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA). He also wants to make Mexico more competitive with China and other developing nations." Lopez Obrador "has proposed rejecting some parts of NAFTA, providing subsidies for the poor and developing New Deal-style public works to create jobs. He has vowed to keep foreign companies out of the country's rich but underdeveloped oil fields. And he has decried corruption, a corrosive force in Mexico's economy."

The Washington Post (6/29, A1, Roig-Franzia, 744K) reports "their approaches to migration -- the defining issue in U.S.-Mexico relations on Capitol Hill, but only a tangential theme in the Mexican presidential race -- are as starkly divergent as anything in their respective campaign arsenals." Calderón "looks outward, hoping his carefully crafted pro-business image will attract foreign investment that will create jobs and dissuade Mexicans from migrating." López Obrador "looks inward, pledging to slash what he says is wasteful government spending to pay for massive public works projects that would employ millions of Mexicans for years to come."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (6/29, 2.11M) writes, "Mexicans head to the polls on Sunday to elect a new president, and the choice they face is notably stark: Accelerate the pace of modernization that began in the mid-1980s or, because progress has been achieved a little slowly, revert to the economically populist and insular ways of old Mexico. … For Americans, the stakes in this election could hardly be greater. Tom Tancredo and friends may believe that the only thought the US need give its southern neighbor is the height of the wall it plans to raise between them." But "if Mexicans are able to build on the liberalizing trends of the past 20 years, their appetite for El Norte is bound, over time, to diminish. And if they revert to the populist habits of yore, no American wall will be high enough to keep the flood of desperate workers out."

Novak Says Uribe Shrugged Off Bush Request To Challenge Chavez. Writing from Bogota, Colombia, syndicated columnist Robert Novak (6/29) relates, "President Alvaro Uribe returned from his recent overnight visit to Washington in undisclosed disagreement with" President Bush, who "would like the newly re-elected Colombian leader to be 'our man in the Andes,' publicly standing up against Venezuela's leftist strongman President Hugo Chavez. That is not a role Uribe wants to play. Bush was dissatisfied with Uribe's noncommittal reaction in the Oval Office when the U.S. president said he was counting on him to lead the struggle against Chavez. But Uribe has his hands full in…his country's war against narco-guerillas. Nor does he want to exacerbate Colombia's often-turbulent relationship with Venezuela, second only to the United States as a trading partner." Chavez "is taken less seriously in Bogota than in Washington. It is felt here that he has begun blundering and is alienating even left-wing presidents." Although Bush "wants him to confront Chavez, Uribe will concentrate on using his overwhelming mandate (including an immense majority in Congress) to try to finish off the narco-guerillas."

African Company Joins Effort To Fight Malaria. The New York Times (6/29, LaFraniere, 1.19M) reports that one in three employees at Mozambique's international mining company Billiton fell ill with malaria, 6,600 cases in just two years. The result is that "one of the world's biggest aluminum producers joined in an exceptional partnership with the governments of three countries and with other businesses to take on malaria systematically across a broad region. Six years later, the scorecard is in. Amazingly, malaria is losing. … The results are a rare bright spot in fighting a parasitic killer that has thrived in the face of flawed, inadequate programs by African nations and international organizations."

US-India Nuclear Agreement Praised. In a piece in the Wall Street Journal (6/29, 2.11M), Vinod Khosla, co-founder of Sun Microsystems and a partner of Khosla Ventures, writes, "The U.S.-India nuclear agreement before Congress is good for America on five grounds: It enhances safeguards, benefits U.S. geopolitical interests, protects the environment, boosts the American economy and rewards good international citizenship and international compliance." India "is surrounded by two nondemocratic nuclear powers, sometimes unstable, often dictatorial, both having engaged in wars with India. And a cursory knowledge of Indian politics would dictate that there is zero possibility of India submitting all its nuclear reactors to the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) regime without it being recognized as a nuclear power. Democratically elected politicians in India would be committing political suicide were they to do otherwise."

Khosla adds, "We must recognize that India, like Israel, has very good regional and national defense reasons for not signing the current form of the NPT." The US-India "agreement provides an elegant solution to bring important global powers like India within the international framework."

WPost Says Venezuelan Trial Looks Like Suppression Of Dissent. An editorial in the Washington Post (6/29, A26, 744K) says a trial "underway in Caracas is worth watching. It features an allegedly aggrieved Cuban ambassador, a charismatic opponent of [Venezuelan President Hugo] Chavez and a tangled record of justice that looks a lot like the calculated suppression of dissent familiar in Havana." The defendant, Henrique Capriles Radonski is charged with leading an assault on the Cuban embassy. Capriles "spent four months in jail before the charges were thrown out by an appeals court. The case seemed to be over -- but then a few months later, the charges were revived."

NYTimes Decries Lawyer Fees In Holocaust Victims Case. An editorial in the New York Times (6/29, 1.19M) says, "The success of Holocaust survivors in winning a $1.25 billion settlement from Swiss banks, which they accused of helping the Nazis steal Jewish holdings, was a small bright spot in that tragic piece of history." A controversy has arisen over the $4 million bill submitted by attorney Burt Neuborne, who represented the survivors. The Times says the "dollar amounts are troubling, and so are the slipshod hourly records that Mr. Neuborne submitted." The Times adds, "When a lawyer's fee is excessive or inadequately supported, courts should step in. US Magistrate Judge James Orenstein, who is reviewing his fee request, should scrutinize it carefully, and keep the interest of the victims firmly in mind.

TERRORISM NEWS:

In Jerusalem, Gonzales Defends Anti-Terrorism Efforts. The Jerusalem Post (6/29, Keinon, Izenberg) reports, "All countries have the right to protect their citizens and take lawful actions to ensure their national security, US Attorney-General Alberto Gonzales said in an interview with The Jerusalem Post approved for publication on Wednesday. … However, Gonzales, in the country for two days of high-level talks as part of a trip that will also take him to Egypt, was reticent about commenting directly on Israel's war on terrorism and the situation in the south." The Post continues, "The soft-spoken Gonzales, on his first visit to Israel, is more than just the US attorney-general, the most powerful law enforcement position in America. He is also considered one of US President George W. Bush's closest confidants, and he has turned into the lightning rod for criticism from those who think Washington has trampled human rights at the prison in its offshore naval base at Guantanamo Bay, in alleged CIA prisons in Eastern Europe or in the US itself in the name of fighting terrorism." The Post adds, "Gonzales repeatedly refused to comment on questions in which he was asked about how Israel should handle the capture and abduction of Cpl. Gilad Shalit to Gaza. All he would say was that 'we are focusing on getting this resolved as quickly as possible without any further violence. We want the soldier returned to his family.' … Gonzales insisted that all of the measures taken by the US in its battle against al-Qaida were within the limits of US law, including the open-ended incarceration of hundreds of suspected al-Qaida operatives or supporters being held without trial or judicial review at Guantanamo Bay."

Gonzales Lauds US-Israeli Cooperation Against Terror. The AP (6/28) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales on Tuesday commended Israel for its strong cooperation in the war against terror and international crime." The AP continues, "Speaking at Tel Aviv University, Gonzales mentioned Israel's March extradition of suspected Israeli mob boss Zeev Rosenstein to the United States as an action that 'highlights one of the most important ways we cooperate with our international law enforcement partners.' … Rosenstein was extradited for trial on charges of involvement in a drug ring that allegedly distributed more than 1 million Ecstasy pills in Miami and New York." The AP adds, "Gonzales singled out U.S.-Israel collaboration in combatting terrorism. 'We are working closing in the war on terror,' he said. … He spoke primarily about 'global law enforcement in a post 9/11 world,' and of the wide range of cooperation the U.S. had with its allies in combating drug trade, corruption, fraud, bribery and child pornography."

Bush Takes On News Media, Congressional Democrats. The AP (6/29, Pickler) reports President Bush "tried to pump up the Iraq war effort and a Republican Senate candidate Wednesday during a visit to a state he won handily two years ago but has become a trouble spot for the GOP in the midterm elections." In his visit to Missouri, Bush "visited with soldiers who fought in Iraq and Afghanistan at the Veterans of Foreign Wars post 3944, then headlined a fundraiser at the Ritz-Carlton for Sen. Jim Talent." Bush "helped bring in nearly $1 million at the fundraiser Wednesday evening, supported by about 500 donors who gave roughly $750,000 for Talent and another $200,000 for the state Republican Party."

The Washington Post (6/29, A10, Baker, 744K) reports Bush "attacked congressional Democrats and the news media at a Republican fundraiser Wednesday night, accusing the opposition of 'waving the white flag of surrender' in Iraq and declaring that there is 'no excuse' for journalists to write about secret intelligence programs." Bush sharpened "his rhetoric as the midterm congressional campaign season accelerates" and he "offered a robust defense of his decision to invade Iraq even though, ultimately, no weapons of mass destruction were found, and drew standing ovations for his attacks on those who question his leadership of the war or the fight against terrorists." Bush is quoted saying, "There's a group in the opposition party who are willing to retreat before the mission is done. … They're willing to wave the white flag of surrender. And if they succeed, the United States will be worse off, and the world will be worse off."

Much of the coverage portrays the Administration's criticism of the New York Times as an attempt to rally the GOP base with an eye on the November elections. In a discussion of the Administration's criticism, for example, NBC Nightly News (6/28, story 6, 1:05, Russert, 9.87M) said that for some, "the Times personifies the 'elite, liberal media.' The point here…is that this is not new in American politics. If you want to intensify your political base, and that's what you have to do in a midterm election, attacking the media has worked quite well. Remember Vice President Spiro Agnew – 'nattering nabobs of negativism,' the 'effete corps of impudent snobs,' and so look for this to intensify more and more, particularly focused on the Times, try to get the conservative base to see that as the most important issue, which will take off the focus on Social Security, Iraq and other issues."

The Washington Post (6/29, A11, Babington, Abramowitz, 744K), in a story titled "Bush Seeks To Use Media Leaks To His Advantage," reports, "Senior administration officials say the president was outraged by articles in the New York Times and other newspapers about a surveillance program in which the U.S. government has tapped international banking records for information about terrorist financing." But "his comments at a Republican fundraiser in a St. Louis suburb yesterday, combined with new moves by GOP congressional leaders, showed how both are working to fan public anger and reap gains from the controversy during a midterm election year in which polls show they are running against stiff headwinds."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/29, Feldmann, 61K) reports the Times "has come in for an unusual level of vitriol from top officials in the Bush White House, their allies in Congress, and the corps of conservative commentators." While the Administration "has recovered a bit of its momentum," But Bush "and the Republican- controlled Congress still face an uphill climb. … So when The New York Times comes out with the latest exposé on a technique in the war on terror, this is red meat to the president and his supporters. 'The New York Times threw them a life preserver and they grabbed it,' says Mr. Hess."

House To Vote On Resolution Condemning NYTimes Reporting On Anti-Terror Program. CNN's The Situation Room (6/28, Blitzer) reported, "The Bush Administration and members of Congress are pounding away at the New York Times, which last week published details of a secret anti-terror program which sifts through millions of financial transactions. There are now calls for formal investigations and punishment of the newspaper."

The New York Times (6/29, Shane, 1.19M) says that today, "the House is expected to take up a Republican resolution supporting the tracking of financial transactions and condemning the publication of the existence of the program and details of how it works." The resolution says Congress "expects the cooperation of all news media organizations in protecting the lives of Americans and the capability of the government to identify, disrupt and capture terrorists by not disclosing classified intelligence programs." Democrats "are proposing a variant that expresses support for the treasury program but omits the language about the news media." The director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, "has ordered an assessment of any damage to counterterrorism efforts from the disclosures, but the review is expected to take months, and its findings are likely to remain classified."

The Washington Times (6/29, Bellantoni, 90K) reports, "House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said yesterday that the New York Times deserves to receive a formal scolding from Congress for publishing a report on a classified national security program. His comments were the opening salvo in a debate expected today in the House. … Many House Republicans agree with Mr. Hastert's sentiment, and plan to support a symbolic resolution criticizing 'certain media organizations' for revealing details of the Bush administration's counterterrorism programs."

King Says DOJ Should Investigate Government Leakers. Rep. Peter King was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (6/28) if the Justice Department should launch a criminal investigation into the government officials who provided information to the news media. King said, "Absolutely. The government should go all out against those who did the leaking. And one way to get them is to put New York Times reporters in the grand jury and ask them to reveal their sources. And if they don't, find them in contempt and put them in prison."

Snow Says It Is Inappropriate For Bush To Seek Investigation. Last night, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow addressed the controversy over the newspaper disclosures. Snow said on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (6/28), "There are a whole number of options right now, but the Bush Administration, the President is not in a position to ask for investigations. The President's not in a position." Snow added that it would be "entirely improper. …. I'll tell you what the President's done. He's expressed his feelings about it. He described the story as disgraceful."

Olson Defends Shield Law, But Says It Would Not Include National Security Matters. In a piece in the Washington Post (6/29, A27, 744K), Theodore B. Olson, former solicitor general of the United States, writes, "Forty-nine states and the District of Columbia have laws protecting the confidentiality of reporters' sources. The Justice Department has had internal standards providing protection to journalists and their sources for 30 years. Yet no such protection exists in federal law." Olson adds, "The Senate Judiciary Committee will soon take up a bill entitled the Free Flow of Information Act of 2006, sponsored by a bipartisan group of legislators and modeled in large part on the Justice Department guidelines. It does not provide an absolute privilege for confidential sources, but it does require, among other things, that a party seeking information from a journalist be able to demonstrate that the need for that information is real and that it is not available from other sources. Matters involving classified information and national security are treated differently. The current controversy over publications relative to the administration's efforts to deter terrorists does not, therefore, provide any basis for delaying or rejecting this needed legislation. This legislation is long overdue and should be enacted."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (6/29, A26, 744K) editorializes on the New York Times decision to report on the anti-terror program, and says, "We recognize that this was a controversial choice. But that does not excuse the politicians who have responded with press-bashing that scores political points at the expense of constitutional values." Rep. Peter T. King "offered a prime example of this on Fox News on Sunday when he called for criminal prosecution of reporters, editors and the publisher at the New York Times. … The reactions of President Bush and, even more, Vice President Cheney have been only slightly less chilling." The Post adds, "Those who complain about disclosures assert that the war on terrorism has changed the calculus of risk. They would prefer a media meekly obeying official demands for secrecy."

US Sues New Jersey AG Over Phone Records Inquiry. The New Jersey Law Journal (6/28, Gallagher) reports, "The day before five phone companies were to answer Zulima Farber's subpoena over whether they gave caller information to the National Security Agency without a court order, she got a response - but it was hardly the one she had sought. … The state attorney general found herself a defendant in a suit by the federal government, alleging that her inquiry threatened national security and was barred by the state secrets privilege." The Journal continues, "The government, in United States v. Farber, 06-CV-2683, filed in Trenton on June 14, asks for a declaration that the state may not enforce the subpoenas and the companies may not comply with them. … The suit claims that under the U.S. Constitution's Supremacy Clause, any attempt to obtain or disclose the records is pre-empted by the federal government's 'exclusive control over foreign intelligence gathering activities, national security, the conduct of foreign affairs, and the conduct of military affairs.' … That control is manifested in statutes like the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Act of 2004, in executive orders that govern how national security information is handled and in the government's absolute privilege to protect military and state secrets from disclosure, the complaint says." The Journal adds, "The complaint is backed by declarations from NSA Director Keith Alexander and Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte. They describe a Terrorist Surveillance Program, authorized by the president after the Sept. 11 attacks, involving NSA's collection of 'one-end foreign communications where one party is associated with . . . al Qaeda' and state that providing greater detail about the program would disclose classified intelligence. … Named as defendants besides Farber are Deputy Attorney General Cathleen O'Donnell, Consumer Affairs Director Kimberly Ricketts and the phone carriers Farber subpoenaed - AT&T Corp., Verizon Communications, Cingular Wireless, Sprint Nextel Corp. and Qwest Communications International."

Saudis Bury Guantanamo Detainee. The New York Times (6/29, Fattah, 1.19M) reports, "Hundreds of Saudis descended on a suburban cemetery here in the Saudi capital late Wednesday to bury Mani Shaman al-Utaybi, 30, one of three prisoners who committed suicide this month at the American detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba." Utaybi "was laid to rest in a nondescript grave, in keeping with Saudi tradition, at the Nassim Cemetery on the outskirts of Riyadh in a ceremony marked by displays of rare public emotion. The mourners, some of whom expressed anger over the detentions or disputed the Americans' version of the deaths, included some former Guantánamo detainees."

Florida Terror Plot Suspect's Lawyer Expects To Argue Entrapment. MSNBC's The Abrams Report (6/28, Moret) reported, "Last week, the Justice Department announced it had busted a group in Florida with plans to launch a terrorist attack here in the US," but "their attorneys are claiming this is a case of entrapment, and their clients never would have acted without the FBI informant." Albert Levin, Attorney for Patrick Abraham: "It's a little early really to say whether or not it's actually entrapment," but "I would anticipate that an entrapment defense could be utilized, based upon what the tapes reveal, based upon what the government's proof is, which…we don't have yet." Levin added, "You know, FBI agents are human beings. And following policies and procedures, that's, in a perfect world, what happens. But, sometimes, policies and procedures aren't followed. And I anticipate, maybe in this case, that was one of those times."

British Judge Rules Against Tactic Used In Terrorism Cases. The New York Times (6/29, Cowell, 1.19M) reports, "Throwing down a new challenge to the government's tactics against terrorism, a High Court judge ruled Wednesday that so-called control orders -- a form of house arrest without trial -- were incompatible with European human rights laws." The government" is expected to appeal the ruling, issued by Justice Jeremy Sullivan, while civil rights groups depicted it as a victory in a sharpening duel over the state's efforts to amass ever greater powers, ostensibly to combat terrorism. … If the government's appeal fails, the authorities will have to seek some other mechanism to continue holding the six suspects -- a Briton and five Iraqis -- whose cases prompted the ruling."

Swiss Say CIA Planes Landed In Their Country 58 Times In Past Five Years. USA Today (6/29, 2.31M) reports, "CIA planes landed in Switzerland 58 times over the past five years, nearly 10 times more than previously disclosed, the Swiss Federal Office of Civil Aviation said Wednesday." Spokesman Anton Kohler also "said there were 13 aircraft, not three as previously disclosed. Dick Marty, chief investigator for Europe's human rights watchdog, the Council of Europe, reported earlier this month that European flight logs and other evidence showed that 14 European nations colluded with U.S. intelligence in a "spider's web" of human rights abuses to help the CIA spirit terrorism suspects to illegal detention facilities. He didn't name the countries."

Columnist Notes "Terrorism Index" Findings. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (6/29, 1.19M), "After all the sound and fury of the past few years, how is the US doing in its fight against terrorism? Not too well, according to a recent survey of more than 100 highly respected foreign policy and national security experts. The survey, dubbed the 'Terrorism Index,' was conducted by the Center for American Progress and Foreign Policy magazine. The respondents included Republicans and Democrats, moderates, liberals and conservatives." The survey's findings were "striking. A strong, bipartisan consensus emerged on two crucial points: 84 percent of the respondents said the United States was not winning the war on terror, and 86 percent said the world was becoming more -- not less -- dangerous for Americans." Herbert adds, "If the respondents to this survey are correct, the US needs to be moving in an entirely different direction. The war against terror cannot be won by bombing the enemy into submission. The bull in the china shop may be frightening at first, but after a while it's just enraging. We need a better, smarter way."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Southwest Airlines Flight Diverted By Bomb Scare. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/29) reports, "A Southwest Airlines flight en route to Las Vegas was diverted to Ontario International Airport on Wednesday after a threatening note was found on board, authorities said. … The message was found scrawled in pen on at least two tray tables, indicating a bomb was on board, said FBI spokeswoman Laura Eimiller. FBI agents collected evidence and were trying to determine if the message was written during the flight or at a previous location." Southwest spokeswoman Beth Harbin "said no bombs had been found on the plane and the investigation was nearing an end." The Los Angeles Times (6/29, Reitman, 958K) notes Eimiller said that "once the plane reached cruising altitude, a passenger pulled down the seatback tray and saw 'language warning of a bomb.'"

Some Candidates From Areas With Increased Funding Criticize DHS Allocation. The Hill (6/29, Blake) reports that when the "Department of Homeland Security announced its fiscal year 2006 grant allocations," there were "few…places that actually received more grant money than in the past," and it turns out that "the department would be hard-pressed to satisfy even some House members and candidates in those areas," all of whom "have their own ideas for improving the grant-allocation process." While "incumbents are touting their efforts and justifying the gains while stressing room for improvement nationwide," many challengers are "declaring that the money their areas received is insufficient."

University Connections Seen As Conflict Of Interest For Cybersecurity Chief. The Washington Post/AP (6/29, A5) reports DHS National Cyber Security Division acting director Donald "Andy" Purdy "is a contract employee who earns $577,000 under an agreement with a private university that does extensive business with the federal office he manages. … By comparison, the Homeland Security secretary, Michael Chertoff, is paid $175,000 annually. Purdy is on loan from the school to the government, which is paying nearly all his salary. Meanwhile, Purdy's cybersecurity division has paid Carnegie Mellon $19 million in contracts this year, almost one-fifth of the unit's total budget. Purdy said he has not been involved in discussions of his office's business deals with the school." The AP notes Democratic Reps. Bennie Thompson, Loretta Sanchez and Zoe Lofgren wrote in a letter to House Republicans, "Purdy's contract 'raises questions about whether the American people are getting their money's worth."

TSA Aviation Chief Says Lighters Should Be Allowed On Planes. USA Today (6/29, Frank, 2.31M) reports that Transportation Security Administration chief Kip Hawley "says Congress should lift a ban on passengers carrying lighters on airplanes because screeners are spending too much time looking for lighters instead of bombs." He "said he has briefed lawmakers and 'recommended they consider whether that ban needs to stay.'" Lighters are "the only item that Congress has specifically banned." While "lighters are just one of 68 items passengers cannot carry on planes, they represent 80% of the confiscated items," yet, "lighters 'do not represent a particularly effective ignition source for terrorists.'"

Property Rights Dispute Slows Federal Gulf Coast Cleanup. The AP (6/29, Jordan) reports, "The government says it has not removed the Gulf Coast's remaining hurricane wreckage, enough to stack 2 miles high onto a football field, because it must respect private property rights. … Local officials charge the delay could hamper public safety during the current hurricane season." The AP continues, "Ten months after Hurricane Katrina, about one-sixth of the debris that littered the Gulf Coast remains an estimated 20 million cubic yards. Much of the rubble is from damaged homes and businesses that the Federal Emergency Management Agency says it cannot clear away without approval from property owners and insurers. … 'It's a mess and it's dangerous in the storm season,' said Marnie

Winter, environmental director in Jefferson Parish, La., which borders New Orleans and extends to the Gulf of Mexico." The AP adds, "The federal agency now is considering whether to continue paying the full cost of removing debris in the disaster area; the program is set to end on Friday. … Officials in cash-strapped New Orleans and surrounding parishes said this week they want the deadline extended. Without the extra aid, Washington will pay for 90 percent of debris removal cost and local governments 10 percent. … FEMA estimates it has paid $3.6 billion for the Army Corps of Engineers and private contractors to remove about 98.6 million cubic yards of debris from Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi and Texas. Most of it has been on streets, sidewalks, curbs and other public property."

In Letter To Bush, Vitter Criticizes Army Corps' Flood Prevention Work. The New York Times (6/29, Schwartz, 1.19M) reports that Louisiana Sen. David Vitter said in a letter to be sent today to President Bush, "New Orleans still faces serious street flooding in coming storms because the Army Corps of Engineers has fallen behind in repairing the city's hurricane protection system," especially in that it has "not provided enough pumping capacity to get water out of the city's drainage canals in heavy storms." Vitter adds that "extensive flooding could occur even in heavy rainstorms…and a hurricane could have enormous consequences for the restoration of New Orleans." While the corps "has acknowledged falling behind in the effort to install enough pumps to get large amounts of water out of the drainage canals," Col. Richard P. Wagenaar, the commander of the New Orleans district says "the corps has committed to increasing the pumping capacity over time." However, "Vitter said that after months of meetings with the corps, 'there's been no adequate improvement or resolution,' and that he had 'sort of reached the breaking point.'"

Thousands Lose FEMA Rent Help At End Of June. USA Today/AP (6/29, Poovey) reports, "Hundreds of hurricane evacuees around the country could be evicted in the coming weeks if they can't pay the rent without help from the Federal Emergency Management Agency." While over "12,600 households nationwide found out in April that they were going to lose their FEMA rent subsidies," according to FEMA spokesman James McIntyre there will not be "large numbers of people…turned out on the street," as "Many have already lined up a place to live or did not need the assistance to begin with."

Former FEMA Division Director Leading Firm's New Orleans Team. Judy Sarasohn writes in her column in the Washington Post (6/29, A25, 744K), "Daniel Craig was director of the Recovery Division at the Federal Emergency Management Agency and…one of the political appointees last year who came under criticism for lack of disaster-preparedness experience." Now he's "joined the D.C. office of Florida-based law firm Akerman Senterfitt and working with the firm's newly pulled-together Disaster Preparedness and Recovery Practice Group," as well as "leading the firm's team working for New Orleans." Another member of that team is "Jim Schumann , former director of emergency preparedness and response at the Department of Homeland Security's Office of Legislative Affairs." Sarashon observes, "Washington is a great place for second acts -- and third and fourth acts, too."

WPost Says Rain Problems Reveal Weak Points In DC Evacuation Plans. The Washington Post (6/29, A26, 744K) editorializes, "The gridlock downtown Monday and Tuesday" during the torrential rains "was a reminder of how vulnerable the District remains to sliding into logistical chaos during a major emergency." Washington area emergency officials "admit that, beyond models and a trial test after last year's Fourth of July celebrations, they don't know how effective" their planned "extend green lights and…more intersection control officers" would be. "District and regional disaster planners should start assuming that D.C. streets will look like they did Tuesday should there be another terrorist attack. That means developing a better plan to communicate traffic and road conditions to tied-up motorists and a more robust regional infrastructure for coordination among emergency planners."

WAR NEWS:

Rice Visits Afghanistan In Effort To Bolster Karzai. The New York Times (6/29, Cooper, 1.19M) reports that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice visited Afghanistan yesterday where she sought "to shore up the country's besieged president, Hamid Karzai, promising that the Taliban forces that have mounted a string of attacks in the country will be defeated."

The Wall Street Journal (6/29, King, 2.11M) reports that the Bush Administration "worries that the good news [in Afghanistan] is fading. … So after trips to Baghdad in recent months, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice came to Kabul to buck up Afghan President Hamid Karzai and tout the country's progress." Rice said Afghanistan's democratic institutions "are getting stronger each day."

The Washington Post (6/29, A20, Kessler, White, 744K) reports that Rice "told Karzai that the administration was considering a boost in reconstruction funding, an aide to Rice said. The additional money -- to be directed especially at troubled areas in the south -- would be accompanied by a shift from big nationwide projects such as roads to smaller community projects." The Post notes, "Rice's itinerary on her third trip here showed how far Afghanistan still has to go. With a surge of violence touching even the capital in recent weeks, she passed her time almost entirely behind the heavily guarded high walls and concrete barriers of the U.S. Embassy and the presidential compound."

The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Gerstenzang, 958K) reported on its web site that Rice promised "additional US financial support, and focusing on small-scale projects drawn up to improve daily life more quickly than long-range and massive reconstruction efforts. She said the country, troubled anew by insurgent attacks and civilian unrest, continued to face 'strong enemies, and they're ruthless.' But she said that militants would 'not succeed in rolling back the democratic gains' achieved since the Taliban was overthrown in 2001."

The Financial Times (6/29, Morarjee) reports that Rice "emphasised Washington's strong support" for Afghan President Hamid Karzai. Rice's "brief visit to the Afghan capital was seen as a valuable boost to Mr Karzai after the toughest weeks of his presidency, during which he faced a barrage of criticism for failing to stem the southern violence or deliver reconstruction in pace with rising expectations." Rice "said the US was in Afghanistan for the long haul. 'I want to say to the Afghan people that that commitment from the international community is very strong. We are not going to tire, we are not going to leave,' she said."

The Washington Times (6/29, Kralev, 90K) reports that Rice's Afghanistan visit comes "amid the worst violence there in nearly five years." The Times adds, "A senior State Department official traveling with Miss Rice said the Kabul visit was kept secret 'out of general prudence,' given the dangerous security situation there."

The AP (6/28) reported that Rice "renewed US support for Afghanistan's embattled president during a brief and heavily guarded visit Wednesday, and said the newly democratic country has come too far to fall back into terrorism and anarchy."

UPI (6/28) said Karzai got "strong backing" from Rice. UPI added, "Rice had discussions Wednesday with top Afghan officials on issues including reconstruction projects designed to boost public morale."

DEA Official Says Afghan Heroin Trade Fueling Violence. DEA Administrator Karen Tandy told House committee yesterday that Afghanistan's production of 82 percent of the world's heroin supply has driven ongoing violence in the country. The Washington Times (6/29, Seper, 90K) reports that Tandy said the country's stability "rises and falls with the drug trade." Tandy "said her agency is making 'great progress' in targeting the drug warlords and the Afghan criminal organizations who control the heroin supply."

Broder Says Afghan, Iraqi Leaders Have "Loose Grip On Power." David Broder writes in the Washington Post (6/29, A27, 744K), "The situation the United States and its allies face in Afghanistan and Iraq is one almost without precedent. In two countries where we used our military might to rout the menacing dictatorial regimes running things, we now find ourselves sponsoring governments with notably shaky holds on popular support. … A huge American investment of money and lives now rests on two men with a loose grip on power."

Insurgents Offer To Stop Attacks If US Troops Leave Within Two Years. CNN's The Situation Room (6/28, Blitzer) reported, "The Associated Press reports that insurgent groups are offering to stop attacking coalition troops, but only if American-led forces leave Iraq within two years." CNN (McIntyre) added that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld "said he hadn't heard about this specific proposal," but "he said there have been other offers like this in the past. He was very cautious, though, about anything that would resemble horse trading with insurgents over a timetable."

ABC World News Tonight (6/28, story 5, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There are reports, today, from Iraq, that 11 Sunni insurgent groups have offered an immediate halt to all attacks, including those on American troops, if the US agrees to withdraw its forces in two years. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was asked about the offer. He says President Bush believes a timetable is not something that is useful."

The CBS Evening News (6/28, story 4, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Iraq's government said today that it has received an offer from 11 Sunni insurgent groups to stop attacking US military forces if President Bush will set a two-year timetable for withdrawing American troops. The Iraqi government did not reject the idea outright but said it is unclear when Iraqi security forces will be ready to take over."

The AP (6/29) reports that Rumsfeld said President Bush's view "remains that a timetable is not something that is useful. It is a signal to the enemies that all you have to do is just wait and it's yours." The Washington Times runs the AP Story this morning.

Official Says Iraqi Al Qaeda Member Led Shrine Bomb Attack. The New York Times (6/29, Wong, 1.19M) reports that Iraqi national security adviser Mowaffak al-Rubaie said an Iraqi affiliated with Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia "led the team that carried out the February bombing of a golden-domed Shiite shrine." The insurgent, Haitham al-Badri, "is in hiding in Iraq and being sought by government forces." Rubaie "said the Iraqi government learned the details of the shrine bombing after the capture a few days ago of Yusri Fakher Muhammad Ali, also known as Abu Qudama, a Tunisian militant who confessed to be a member of Mr. Badri's team."

Admitted Iraqi Agent Testifies About Work With Park On Oil-For-Food Program. The AP (6/29, Caruso) reports, "An Iraqi-American businessman testifying in a trial related to corruption in the United Nations' oil-for-food program spent hours Wednesday describing his efforts to help Saddam Hussein's regime get relief from economic sanctions in the 1990s. Samir A. Vincent, who pleaded guilty last year to being an unregistered agent for Iraq, said he worked for years with South Korean businessman Tongsun Park to persuade U.N. officials to allow Saddam's government to sell oil to pay for humanitarian supplies." The AP notes, "Over two days of testimony in Manhattan federal court, Vincent has described numerous meetings and communications that he said Park arranged with the former U.N. chief," Boutros Boutros-Ghali. "He also identified a series of letters in which he reported the results of those liaisons to top Iraqi officials."

Putin Vows Russian Forces Will Find, Execute Killers Of Four Russians In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (6/28, story 5, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "In Moscow today, president Vladimir Putin vowed revenge for the murders of four Russian embassy workers who were kidnapped in Iraq earlier this month and beheaded. The Kremlin said Putin has ordered Russian special forces to hunt down and destroy the killers, who were thought to be linked to al Qaeda."

The New York Times (6/29, Myers, 1.19M) reports, "The bluntness of the statement reflected the deep shock and anger — much directed at the United States — that have unfolded in Russia after the kidnapping on June 3 in an attack that killed a fifth Russian."

The Washington Times (6/29, Mainville, 90K) reports, "The Kremlin press service said yesterday that Mr. Putin 'has ordered Russia's secret services to take all necessary steps to find and destroy the criminals who committed this evil deed.' It did not say which Russian special forces are in Iraq or under what authority they would be acting in that country."

Marine Featured In Moore Film Killed In Iraq. The AP (6/29) reports, "A Marine and one-time recruiter who appeared in Michael Moore's documentary film 'Fahrenheit 9/11' has died in a roadside bombing in Iraq. Staff Sgt. Raymond J. Plouhar, 30, died Monday of wounds suffered while conducting combat operations in Iraq's volatile Anbar province, the Defense Department said Tuesday." Plouhar "is seen in the 2004 film approaching prospective recruits in a mall parking lot. … Although Plouhar willingly appeared in the movie, which is critical of the Bush administration's actions after Sept. 11, his father said Plouhar didn't realize it would criticize the war."

ABC World News Tonight (6/28, story 6, 1:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that Moore's film depicted Plouhar "as a relentless recruiter."

The CBS Evening News (6/28, story 6, 2:15, Cowan, 7.66M) reported, "The documentary shows Plouhar recruiting high school students at a mall parking lot in Flint, Michigan. Moore, who narrates the film, said Plouhar had gone to this mall because it was in a poor neighborhood where finding recruits was easy. Michael Moore had no comment on Plouhar's death."

NBC Nightly News (6/28, story 11, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Raymond Plouhar had 38 days left on his tour in Iraq when he died. He was 30 years old."

Soldiers Remember Fallen Colleague As Remains Leave Iraq. The New York Times (6/29, Filkins, 1.19M) reports, "Death comes often to the soldiers and marines who are fighting in Anbar Province, which is roughly the size of Louisiana and is the most intractable region in Iraq. … In small ways, the military tries to ensure that individual soldiers…are not forgotten in the plenitude of death. … One way is to say goodbye to the body of a fallen comrade as it leaves for the United States." The Times adds, "Whenever a soldier dies, in Iraq or anywhere else, a wave of uneasiness — fear, revulsion, guilt, sadness — ripples through the survivors."

Bin Laden To Pay Tribute To Zarqawi. CNN's The Situation Room (6/28, Verjee) reported, "CNN's confirmed that there's a message posted on an Islamic Web site that says Osama bin Laden will issue a videotaped message apparently paying tribute to Abu Musab al- Zarqawi. You'll remember the al Qaeda leader that was killed in Iraq recently. The message apparently doesn't say exactly when this video's going to be posted, and it's not even clear if Osama bin Laden himself would actually appear in it."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Specter Presses Administration To Increase Regulation Of Hedge Funds. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Scannell, 2.11M) reports Sen. Arlen Specter is "pressing the Bush administration to review and step up its investigation and enforcement of allegations of improper trading by hedge funds, including short-selling, in the wake of a recent federal appeals-court ruling that left a regulatory void over the fast-growing industry." At a Judiciary Committee hearing "on the relationship between hedge funds and independent research firms," Specter said, "It's very important there be adequate investigation [by the Justice Department and actions by Congress] if we need any new laws." In "urging federal prosecutors to examine their track record in the area, Sen. Specter suggested if they didn't have the right laws or penalties, Congress could write them." The hearing "came in the wake of a federal-appeals court decision throwing out a rule requiring most hedge-fund managers to register with the SEC, reopening the debate as to whether there should be federal oversight of the fast-growing industry."

The Washington Post (6/29, D2, Johnson, 744K) reports Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal (D) "urged Congress yesterday to heighten federal scrutiny of the secretive hedge fund industry or face the prospect of a patchwork group of state authorities stepping in to monitor the rapidly growing investment pools to prevent fraud." Blumenthal, "whose state is the headquarters for scores of hedge funds, told the Senate Judiciary Committee that last week's federal appeals court ruling striking down oversight of the funds by federal regulators left investors 'in a regulatory void, without any disclosure or accountability.'" The Post adds lawmakers "concur that the funds, which account for about 30 percent of trading each day on the New York Stock Exchange, play an important role in the economy. But they appear to disagree on who should oversee them, and how much."

Former SEC Attorney Says Political Pressure Killed Mack Probe. USA Today (6/29, Farrell, 2.31M) reports former Securities and Exchange Commission attorney Gary Aguirre "told a Senate committee Wednesday that he was fired because he tried to investigate whether a prominent Wall Street executive was involved in an inside-trading case." Aguirre said that "he was terminated last year by superiors at the Securities and Exchange Commission after he tried to issue a subpoena to Morgan Stanley CEO John Mack." Aguirre said "that his superiors froze him out of subsequent discussions of the case and that he was fired weeks later, just before completing a full year on the job."

The Hill (6/29, Schor) reports what "could have been a routine oversight hearing became a hot ticket in recent days as the committee added Gary Aguirre, a former Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) lawyer who alleges he was fired for pursuing aggressive enforcement of hedgers, to the witness list. But Aguirre told Specter he had scrapped his original testimony after the SEC informed him of possible penalties for revealing new information." Specter "took umbrage at the SEC's request to silence Aguirre without alerting his panel."

The AP (6/29, Gordon) reports, "The SEC was investigating whether the hedge fund had received a tip about an upcoming merger. … 'By mid-June, growing evidence pointed to one person, the former CEO of a large investment bank,' Aguirre said in written testimony to the Senate Judiciary Committee." The AP notes, "Under questioning by committee members, he identified the executive as John Mack, who is the chairman and chief executive of investment house Morgan Stanley Inc. … Morgan Stanley, one of the largest U.S. securities firms, said Aguirre had provided no evidence for his allegation."

Wall Street Seeking Cut In Regulation. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Smith, Lucchetti, Craig, 2.11M) reports more than "three years after the stock market bottomed out amid a storm of scandal, Wall Street is pushing hard for a reduction in its own regulation." The effort "came to a head in a five-minute encounter between two Wall Street heavyweights at a Swiss resort hotel last winter." The Journal recounts that between sessions "at the World Economic Forum at Davos, New York Stock Exchange chief John Thain ran into Thomas Russo, vice chairman of Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc." Thain said he "was concerned that big Wall Street firms like Lehman might try to delay a merger that would take the Big Board public, according to people familiar with the conversation." In reply, Russo "pressed a top priority of the Securities Industry Association, Wall Street's lobbying arm. He asked Mr. Thain for a commitment to combine some NYSE regulatory functions with another regulator, the National Association of Securities Dealers." The Russo-SIA proposal "would effectively reduce the number of national regulators overseeing and inspecting Wall Street brokerage firms from three to two, dramatically easing Wall Street's regulatory load. Although Mr. Thain agreed and the two men shook hands, the specifics were left open. Since then, the effort appears to have floundered, though the SIA continues to press the issue." The "behind-the-scenes story of Wall Street's new push for regulatory relief reflects the changed climate since the stock-market bubble burst in 2000, and state and federal regulators competed to unearth Wall Street misconduct."

Connecticut AG Urges Federal Oversight Of Hedge Funds. Bloomberg (6/29) reports, "The U.S. government should regulate the $1.2 trillion hedge-fund industry or states will step in and oversee the private investment pools, the attorney general of Connecticut told senators. … 'Right now hedge funds are in a regulatory void without any disclosure or accountability,' Attorney General Richard Blumenthal said today at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing in Washington. 'States will fill the void.'" Bloomberg continues, "Lawmakers are increasing scrutiny of hedge funds after the lightly regulated investment vehicles have more than doubled their assets over the past five years. A federal appeals court in Washington last week struck down U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission rules that required many hedge funds to register with the agency and submit to audits. … 'This is a subject of enormous importance to the United States economy,' said Senator Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican and the committee's chairman." Bloomberg adds, "Specter defended his committee's decision to hold today's hearing, which drew complaints from the Senate Banking Committee. That panel oversees the SEC and generally is charged with handling financial regulation. … Senator Charles Schumer, a member of both committees, said the hearing 'raises a yellow flag of caution' because it treads on the banking committee's turf. The judiciary panel doesn't have the financial and market expertise that the banking committee does, he said."

British Bankers Facing Enron-Related Charges In US Seek Bail In Britain. The AP (6/29, Wardell) reports, "Three British bankers who have been ordered to be extradited to the United States to face Enron-related fraud charges said Wednesday that they are in talks with U.S. authorities about the possibility of returning to Britain on bail." The AP continues, "The trio - David Bermingham, Giles Darby and Gary Mulgrew - said access to documents and witnesses in Britain was crucial to preparing a defense for a trial in Enron's home state of Texas. … The three men lost a last-ditch appeal on Tuesday to the European Court of Human rights against British court rulings that they be extradited for trial. … 'We would love bail conditions that would allow us to come back here and prepare for our defense,' said Bermingham. 'We can't prepare for our defense in Texas.'" The AP adds, "However, Bermingham was not optimistic about securing bail in Britain because they are considered fugitives from justice in the United States and therefore are flight risks. … The men will be held in a maximum-security facility in Houston if they do not receive bail, making it more difficult to prepare their defense against crimes allegedly committed against a British company in Britain."

Morgan Stanley Asks Court To Overturn Perelman Judgment. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Craig) reports, "Last year a court ruled against Morgan Stanley in a case focused on the firm's actions surrounding the sale of a company controlled by billionaire financier Ronald Perelman, to Sunbeam Corp., which was a Morgan Stanley client. The court railed against Morgan Stanley's repeated inability to produce documents and the jury awarded Mr. Perelman $1.58 billion. For each day that passes, Mr. Perelman makes about $300,000 in interest payments on the original award, though the final payment hinges on the outcome of Morgan Stanley's appeal." The Journal adds, "Yesterday Morgan Stanley's lawyer, Bruce Rogow, asked the court to throw out that verdict, saying the punishment far outweighed the firm's misdeeds. Moreover, he argued, the lower-court judge stripped Morgan Stanley of its right to properly defend itself and applied the wrong law to the case, resulting in further damages to the firm." The Journal notes, "The stakes are high for Morgan Stanley, which a year ago installed a new chief executive officer and is trying to move beyond some of its past legal missteps, notably this verdict which has caused it much public embarrassment and put an unfavorable spotlight on its lack of internal controls. The firm has set aside $360 million to cover the award and has made no serious settlement offers, according to people familiar with the matter."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Interior Department Employee Charged In Abramoff Probe. In the ongoing corruption investigation related to lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Interior Department Insular Affairs Office employee Roger G. Stillwell has been charged with filing a false financial disclosure over gifts he received from Abramoff while working as a contract employee for the department.

The Washington Post (6/29, A3, Schmidt, Grimaldi, 744K) reports, "Stillwell is an officer on the desk that handles the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, a U.S. territory whose government hired Abramoff as a lobbyist. … During the 1990s, before Stillwell joined the Interior Department, his communications firm did work for the Marianas government, according to an audit by the island government. Stillwell, a Democrat, said in the interview with The Post that he worked closely with Abramoff when their representation of the island government overlapped beginning in 1995."

Roll Call (6/29, Bresnahan) adds that Stillwell "will plead guilty next month" and "is reportedly cooperating with federal prosecutors in their ongoing corruption probe of Abramoff's activities." Roll Call notes, "Interior Department officials acknowledged that they were aware of the allegation against Stillwell, but they declined to say what steps they would take regarding his future employment at the agency, citing the criminal case against him." The New York Times (6/29, 1.19M) also briefly reports on the charge against Stillwell, under the headline "Misdemeanor Charge For Official Linked To Abramoff."

The Legal Times (6/29, Schwartz) reports, "The charges against Stillwell are the first connected to the Abramoff scandal to touch the Interior Department, and they mark an expansion of the government's ongoing investigation into public corruption involving the convicted lobbyist. So far five people -- Abramoff and former associates Michael Scanlon, Tony Rudy, Neil Volz and Adam Kidan -- have pleaded guilty. Earlier this month, David Safavian, the former top procurement officer at the Office of Management and Budget, was convicted on four charges of making false statements and obstructing justice stemming from his dealings with Abramoff. … Reached at his office, Stillwell referred questions about the charges to his attorney, Justin Murphy of Crowell & Moring. Murphy confirmed that Stillwell, who started working at the Interior Department in 2001, has been cooperating with government officials, but he declined to name the "prohibited source" of the gifts cited in the government filing. A hearing is set for July 21 before U.S. Magistrate Judge Deborah Robinson." The Times notes, "Stillwell told The Washington Post late last year that he accepted free dinners at Abramoff's restaurant, Signatures, and complimentary tickets to Washington Redskins games. But he told the Post that those activities 'occurred while he was a contract employee at Interior, not a federal worker.' … Stillwell told Legal Times Wednesday that the Post misquoted him, but he would not elaborate."

NYTimes Denounces Third-Party Payments To Reed As "Hypocritical." The New York Times (6/29, 1.19M) editorializes, "The grinning, spectral presence of Jack Abramoff…is the last image any Republican candidate needs wafting about this campaign year. But there Mr. Abramoff stands in a photograph from his infamous 2002 golf junket…beaming next to Ralph Reed…who is running hard now for lieutenant governor of Georgia." The Times notes, "Mr. Reed said he had assurances he would not be paid with gambling profits, and indeed Mr. Abramoff was concerned that his associate's choirboy image not seem 'kind of like hypocritical,' according to one tribal witness. So the money was simply laundered through third parties — nonprofit charities and advocacy groups. … Talk about kind of like hypocritical."

FBI Busts Two Major Movie Piracy Rings. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/29, Hays) reports, "The FBI broke up two movie piracy rings Wednesday that authorities said specialized in sneaking digital camcorders into theaters and shooting hit films, then duplicating and distributing millions of bootlegs worldwide. Agents arrested 13 people in raids across" New York City, and "some of the DVD knockoffs included the FBI warning seen at the start of legitimate discs – 'no small irony,' Mark Mershon, head of the FBI's New York office, said at a news conference." The AP notes, "The FBI learned that assistants were used to surround 'cammers,' people who specialize in covertly filming movies, to conceal their filming and prevent people from blocking the view." The New York Times (6/29, Hartocollis, 1.19M) adds Mershon noted that "the rings are two of the largest in the world," and he and MPAA anti-piracy official Michael Robinson "said movies were often recorded at theaters in New York City and its suburbs and then sent over the Internet to distribution hubs in Pakistan, Singapore, Hong Kong and Malaysia. They said that it was hard to estimate how much the operations were worth, but that the economic impact on attendance at theaters and the sale of legitimate videotapes and DVD's was in the billions of dollars."

Newsday (6/29, DeStefano) reports, "FBI agents discovered evidence that the defendants were on the verge of making and distributing counterfeit copies of the new film 'Superman Returns' which opened yesterday. 'This is about thieves, pretty ingenious thieves to be sure, who are technically sophisticated,'" Mershon said. "Dubbed 'Operation Knock Off,' the nearly three-year-long investigation used undercover agents and confidential informants to break up what amounted to two criminal syndicates that pirated movies and fed them into a massive illegal industry selling millions of counterfeit DVDs." Under the headline "Feds Rescue 'Superman,' Nab Pirating Men Of Steal," the New York Daily News (6/29, Zambito, 729K) notes, "Cooperating witnesses, together with undercover agents, helped penetrate the ring's inner workings, revealing a multitiered operation that employed "blockers" to insure a clear shot of the screen and conceal video recording equipment."

The New York Sun (6/29, Solomont) adds Mershon said that "the effects of the operation likely will be seen immediately. The defendants 'are believed to be responsible for 50% of the piracy and the distribution of pirated DVDs worldwide. That is substantial,' he said. 'In the very short term, you may see the disruption in availability in new releases.'" The New York Post (6/29, Bulliet, Cornell, 624K) also notes Mershon said, "We believe it to be the largest video piracy syndicate worldwide," and reports, "The distributors allegedly bought masters for anywhere from $40 to several hundred dollars each and then mass-produced them, selling copies for anywhere from $7 to $10 each. 'We had a camcorder making $400,000 a year just by delivering recordings two to three times a week,' said Scott McGaunn, a special agent with the FBI." BBC News (6/28) and CNET News.com (6/28, Sandoval) also reports on the FBI arrests.

Retired FBI Supervisor Defends Bulger Oversight. The Boston Globe (6/29, Murphy, 484K) reports, "A retired FBI supervisor yesterday defended the bureau's handling of longtime informants James 'Whitey' Bulger and Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi, saying he was unaware the gangsters were involved with murders and had a corrupt relationship with other agents. 'I thought they were involved in gambling, and I assumed they were involved in loan-sharking,' said James Ring, who supervised the organized-crime squad of the FBI's Boston office between 1983 and 1990. But he said he didn't believe they were involved in murder." The Globe adds that Ring "testified that in the 1980s the FBI's organized crime squad was focusing on La Cosa Nostra…as well as members of the Sicilian Mafia, who were entrenched locally. The FBI decimated New England's Patriarca crime family with a wave of successful prosecutions. Though Bulger and Flemmi provided information about local Mafia leaders, Ring described them as 'outsiders, looking in' who weren't as valuable as informants who were 'made' members of the mob."

Defense Lawyers Say KPMG Legal Fee Ruling Could Help In AIPAC Case. The New York Sun (6/29, Gerstein) reports Tuesday's ruling by US District Judge Lewis Kaplan "that the government improperly pressured an accounting firm, KPMG, not to pay for the legal defense of a group of the firm's employees could be a boon to two pro-Israel lobbyists facing trial in Virginia." Although "Kaplan's decision is not binding in other cases," Keith Weissman's lawyer, John Nassikas, told the Sun yesterday, "I'd like to think it's going to be read by the Aipac folks in a way that they're going to see a lot of judicial force behind the idea employees and managers should have their legal fees paid by their organization." Steven Rosen's lawyer, Abbe Lowell, also said that "he was closely reviewing the KPMG decision," but AIPAC spokesman Patrick Dorton "said there is no parallel between the two cases."

MS-13 Member Pleads Guilty To Racketeering Charges In Maryland Murder. The Washington Post (6/29, B4, Klein, 744K) reports, "A member of the Mara Salvatrucha street gang pleaded guilty yesterday in U.S. District Court in Baltimore to racketeering in connection with burning evidence from a homicide scene, among other criminal acts, Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein said." Juan "Diabolico" Lopez "was the first person to plead guilty as a result of an indictment last August involving 19 alleged MS-13 members accused of committing homicides and other violent crimes in the Maryland suburbs." The Post notes, "He pleaded guilty to being involved in a killing on March 26, 2005," which "occurred after Lopez and other MS-13 members confronted members of a rival gang at a strip mall in Prince George's County, according to the plea agreement."

Mack Lawyer Seeking To Bar All Reno Prosecutors, Judges From Case. The AP (Sonner) reports, "A lawyer for the wealthy ex-owner of a Reno pawn shop accused of killing his wife and shooting a Washoe County judge filed an unprecedented motion Wednesday seeking to bar all county prosecutors and judges from any involvement in the case due to alleged conflicts of interest." Darren Mack is scheduled to be arraigned today, and the motions filed yesterday by his attorney, Scott Freeman, "argue the case should be handled by outside prosecutors because Washoe County District Attorney Richard Gammick is a longtime acquaintance of Mack, and that Mack's fate should be determined by judges outside the county partly because the sniper attack on Family Court Judge Chuck Weller, who was handling the couple's divorce, occurred at the courthouse."

Rival Gang Members Testify Aryan Brotherhood Too Weak To Incite Prison Riot. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/29, Flaccus) reports, "Two black prison gang members testified Wednesday that the notorious Aryan Brotherhood was too small and weak to attack a rival black gang behind bars and incite a race war that left two inmates dead. The testimony of the witnesses, members of the Crips and Black Guerrilla Family, came in the final days of a sweeping federal racketeering trial against the white supremacist gang." The AP notes, "The trial was recessed until July 6, when an attorney for the fourth defendant, Christopher Gibson, will begin his defense. Closing arguments are expected to begin July 11."

South Carolina Official Charged With Bribery As FBI Launches Corruption Task Force. The Orangeburg (SC) Times & Democrat (6/29, Crider) reports, "John Rickenbacker has been indicted by a federal grand jury and suspended from public office following allegations the longtime leader of Orangeburg County Council was caught in bribery sting. An indictment unsealed Wednesday alleges Rickenbacker took $50,000 from an FBI officer posing as a consultant for a company wanting to buy The Regional Medical Center. In exchange for the money, he gave the agent an advance copy of a study of hospital finances, along with a promise to use his influence in getting Orangeburg and Calhoun counties to agree to sell the publicly owned hospital, according to the indictment." The Times & Democrat notes, "The indictment was announced during a morning press conference at the Columbia FBI office held by state and federal law enforcement officials announcing the creation of a Public Corruption Task Force." The AP (6/29) adds that US Attorney Reggie Lloyd said, "We believe that an act of public corruption is no less criminal than a violent crime committed on the streets. Abusing an office at the expense of the elector does violence to the public's trust and our very system of government."

The State (6/29, Beam) reports Lloyd announced Rickenbacker's indictment "at a news conference Wednesday morning touting the creation of a public corruption task force. … Brian Lankin, special agent in charge of the Columbia FBI office, said the creation of the task force is not in response to a specific investigation or 'an increase in activity here in South Carolina.' Officials said the task force 'formalizes' the cooperation of state and federal agencies." Lankin and State Law Enforcement Division chief Robert Stewart "would not say how many agents have been assigned to work on public corruption cases in South Carolina. However, they did call it a top priority in criminal investigations." WIS-TV Columbia (6/28, Miskewicz, Horne) reports on its Web site from two stories broadcast yesterday, "Corruption is the focus of the new task force that named Rickenbacker as its first suspect."

Larkin "talks about the group's mission, 'We bring our collective talent and rich history, pool our assets together to address corruption in communities.' … The FBI says fighting corruption is its number one priority, but that it's been stretched since 9/11 with national security, too. So they say the task force helps."

Jury Begins Deliberations In Chicago Patronage Trial. The Chicago Tribune (6/29, Mihalopoulos, Bush, 643K) reports, "Jurors began deliberating Wednesday in the City Hall corruption trial and chose a 52-year-old professor from the northwest suburbs as their foreman." The Tribune notes, "Shortly after a lunch break, the jurors sent out a note asking for an inventory of evidence because they could not locate interview notes or an official report compiled by John Hauser, the lead FBI agent in the hiring investigation. Coar told jurors that Hauser's notes and the report were not evidence. … Sullivan's attorney, Cynthia Giacchetti, focused on Hauser's notes and report in her closing argument Tuesday. Giacchetti said the documents are not reliable because Hauser did not record exactly what Sullivan told investigators." The AP (6/29) also reports on the start of jury deliberations.

NYPD Officials Doubt Independent DeVecchio Investigator's Beating Claim. The New York Sun (6/29, Capeci) reports in its "Gang Land" column, Angela Clemente has been "hailed in tabloid stories as an amateur sleuth who helped crack one of the FBI's dirtiest secrets: how a top agent helped a mob hit man carry out murders. Today, however, cops are wondering whether…Clemente was spinning tales about a mysterious beating she suffered in the parking lot of a Brooklyn shopping center two weeks ago. They are also investigating possible financial ties" she "may have with associates of the Colombo crime family, Gang Land has learned. There are 'gaping holes' in Ms. Clemente's story, a law enforcement source said. Another said detectives have 'serious doubts' about her account of the beating." The New York Daily News (6/29, Mosconi, 729K) notes Clemente, who is "credited with helping crack the murder case against ex-FBI agent Lindley DeVecchio," twice has "failed to show up twice to meet with a police sketch artist to help nail her alleged attacker, the Daily News has learned. … Although cops and Brooklyn prosecutors are still treating her as a victim, some investigators say they are troubled by a number of other issues surrounding Clemente's claims. She told cops that notes left on her car two days in a row by her mysterious tipster were in an envelope that she saved in the backseat of her car. Police have never found them. … She also gave police varying accounts of what her assailant looked like."

Judge Threatens To Charge Salah Lawyer With Contempt. The AP (6/29, Robinson) reports that in preliminary hearings for the trial of Muhammad Salah, accused of "taking part in a racketeering conspiracy that included funneling cash to Hamas to commit murders, bombings and other violence in Israel," US District Judge Amy St. Eve threatened to charge defense lawyer Michael Deutsch with contempt "Wednesday as fireworks erupted over a government request to keep juror names secret. … Deutsch said he planned to file court papers opposing the government's request but added that 'I know what the outcome will be.' He said that based on St. Eve's rulings over the last two years he saw little difference between the court and the federal prosecutors in the case." The AP adds, "Deutsch told reporters after the hearing that the government's jury secrecy request was guaranteed to prejudice the jurors against the defendants."

Judge Enters Not Guilty Plea For Former Miami Executive Charged With Fraud. The AP (6/29) reports, "A federal judge entered a not guilty plea for a former cable executive accused of defrauding the U.S. government and media companies of more than $18 million because he did not respond during a hearing Wednesday." The AP continues, "Charles C. Hermanowski, who once led the family-owned, Miami-based Americable International Inc., was extradited to the United States from Australia over the weekend. … U.S. Magistrate Judge Ted Bandstra entered the not guilty plea for Hermanowski after the former executive refused to respond during the hearing." The AP adds, "Hermanowski faces 50 counts of attempting to defraud the U.S. Department of Defense by overcharging for cable systems installed on military bases, defrauding cable programmers by underreporting the number of his cable subscribers to avoid paying fees and federal income tax evasion. … He had originally faced 37 additional charges, but the court and Australia refused to extradite him on those counts, his attorney Donald Bierman said. … Bond has not been sought for Hermanowski, who remains in pretrial detention, Bierman said."

Bush Requests $160.5 Million In Emergency Funding To Help VA Pay For ID Theft. The Washington Post/AP (6/29) reports President Bush sent a letter to Speaker Dennis Hastert asking "for $160.5 million in emergency funds to help veterans and military personnel whose personal information was on a laptop computer stolen from a Veterans Affairs employee." He "said he was asking for the additional money to help the VA cover the increased costs caused by the May 3 theft. The money would help provide credit monitoring and fraud watch services for those affected." On Tuesday VA Secretary Jim Nicholson said "the money would cover monitoring for about half of the 17.5 million people whose Social Security numbers were compromised. He said it also would pay for out-of-pocket expenses ranging from $10,000 to $20,000 for those whose identities are stolen."

Democrats Criticize Plan To Shift Funds From Other Programs. The White House has proposed shifting money from other domestic programs to pay for the ID theft, a move criticized by Democratic Sens. Patrick Leahy and Patty Murray. The New York Times (6/29, Zernike, 1.19M) quotes Sen. Leahy saying, "The Bush-Cheney administration has no qualms about coming up here and twisting our arms for funding for Iraq, but when it comes to needs here at home for veterans and other ordinary Americans, it's rob Peter to pay Paul." OMB Director Rob Portman "recommended paying for the monitoring by taking about $130 million from a food stamp employment and training program, a farmers' assistance program, student loans and a program for young people released from prison." But "Murray said the problem was 'a new disaster' and 'deserves new money.' She added, 'This is truly an emergency.'"

Documents Suggest Analyst Had Approval To Work On VA Data From Home. As VA Secretary James Nicholson prepares to testify before a House committee about the data theft Thursday, new documents raise questions about whether the VA employee who was responsible for allowing the theft had actually been authorized to work on the data at home. USA Today/AP (6/29, Yen) reports the VA documents "raise questions as to whether top officials condoned a practice that led to a theft with the potential to affect 26.5 million veterans and active-duty troops." The VA analyst "had approval as early as Sept. 5, 2002, to use special software at home that was designed to manipulate large amounts of data." A second Feb. 5, 2002 agreement "allowed the worker to access Social Security numbers for millions of veterans." And a third, "also issued in 2002, gave the analyst permission to take a laptop computer and accessories for work outside of the VA building." The VA has accused the analyst of being "grossly negligent," but some lawmakers "expressed dismay over the latest disclosure." Rep. Bob Filner, a top Democrat on the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, said, "The gross negligence in this case are the people above him."

NIH Credit Union Hit By Identity Thieves. The Washington Post (6/29, B3, Trejos) reports, "The National Institutes of Health's federal credit union has notified some customers that their personal information has been compromised by an identity theft scheme, officials said yesterday." The Post continues, "Lindsay A. Alexander, chief executive of the credit union, would not disclose how many of the institution's 41,000 customers were affected, but she did say it was a small number. 'They already know who they are, and we know who they are, and we're working with them,' she said." The Post adds, "The Rockville-based credit union's clients include employees of NIH, several biotech companies and hospitals such as Sibley Memorial in Northwest Washington. Students and employees at George Washington University also have accounts there. … Alexander said she was not authorized to disclose many details about the case. She said the theft happened recently, but she would not specify when. She also said she could not reveal what type of information was stolen or how it was stolen. … Local and federal agencies are investigating, she said, but she would not identify which ones."

OMB Orders Security Updates After Laptop Thefts. InformationWeek (6/29, Keizer) reports, "The White House has given federal agencies 45 days to beef up safeguards to prevent citizen identities from being lost or stolen, the latest reaction to the numerous data disclosures suffered by the government in May and June." IW continues, "The Office of Management and Budget (OMB) issued a memorandum last week to all federal departments and agencies reminding administrators of long-standing data security requirements, but also made new recommendations. … Among them: encrypt all data on mobile computers and devices, only allow remote access to government networks using token- or card-based two-factor authentication, and log all instances when data is extracted from federal databases." IW adds, "The government has been embarrassed by several prominent data breaches, including the massive May VA incident, the loss of two Federal Trade Commission (FTC) notebooks, a large disclosure of U.S. Navy personnel identities, and a breach at the Department of Agriculture. … The OMB's timetable means that agencies have until August 7 to comply with the security standards laid out in Deputy Director for Management Clay Johnson's memo."

Federal-Private Coalition Launches ID Theft Research Center. Cox News Service (6/29, Mullin) reports, "LexisNexis and IBM Corp. joined universities and law enforcement agencies Wednesday to announce a new center to study the problem of identity theft. 'This will be a unique alliance of government, law enforcement, corporate enterprise and academia to find solutions for a comprehensive research plan for combating identify theft,' said Gary Gordon, executive director of the new Center for Identity Management and Information Protection. Founding partners of the center, to be housed at Utica College…also include the U.S. Secret Service, the FBI, Carnegie Mellon University, Indiana University and Syracuse University." CNET News.com (6/28, Kawamoto) notes, "The center expects to operate on a budget of nearly $500,000 in its first year, of which half is coming from corporations and the other half from federal grants, Gordon said. … 'Identity theft is a growing problem with significant negative effects on American businesses and individual citizens and potentially disastrous effects on U.S. national security,' James Burns, the acting assistant director of the FBI's criminal investigative division, said in a statement. 'From this threat, the CIMIP was born.'

Federal Computer Week (6/28, Chan) reports, "A collaborative effort would produce better tools for catching cybercriminals, law enforcement officials said at the press briefing. … 'We'd love an opportunity to look at trends,' said Ray Morrow, acting assistant deputy director of the FBI's Criminal Investigation Division. He said he believes law enforcement officials have not been able to see trends in cybercrime. 'It gives us a chance to be proactive,' he added." Government Computer News (6/28, Jackson) adds that CIMIP's "first project will be a study with the Justice Department's Office of Justice Programs of emerging criminal groups engaged in identity theft. Future research will focus on detection and prevention of identity theft; the role of policy, legislation and regulation; improvement of authentication systems; and data protection technology." GCN also notes Morrow said, "It will help us to be proactive rather than reactive, which we haven't been able to do recently."

House Rejects Effort To Undercut SCOTUS "Knock And Announce" Ruling. The AP (6/29, Taylor) reports, "The House rejected a liberal Democrat's bid to undercut a recent Supreme Court decision permitting evidence obtained in violation of the 'knock and announce' rule to be used at trial. … The vote came two weeks after the court ruled that evidence seized by police with a warrant who barge into homes even if they don't knock can be used in court." The AP continues, "By a 310-109 vote, the House rejected an amendment by Rep. Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y., blocking the Justice Department from obtaining evidence in violation of the knock and announce rule. The vote came as the House debated a $59.8 billion measure funding the budget of the Justice Department and other agencies. … 'The knock and announce policy is enshrined in the Constitution in the context of the Fourth Amendment,' Hinchey said. 'It is held up by numerous Supreme Court decisions over the last 100 years.'" The AP adds, "Civil libertarians have predicted that police will now feel free to ignore previous court rulings that officers with search warrants must knock and announce themselves or run afoul of the Constitution's ban on unreasonable searches."

High Court Rejects Foreign Convicts' Appeal. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Ben Winograd, 2.11M) reports, "The Supreme Court denied appeals from two foreign convicts who were arrested in the U.S. but weren't informed of their Vienna Convention right to have their consulates notified, a ruling that parts with two earlier decisions of the International Court of Justice." The 6-3 ruling "vindicated the Bush administration, which argued before the court on behalf of the states of Oregon and Virginia and has bristled at international treaties it sees as impinging on US sovereignty." Written by Chief Justice John Roberts, the opinion" means that prosecutors won't be hindered if law-enforcement officers fail to inform suspects that they can ask police to notify local consulates of their arrest. This is mandated by the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, which the US ratified in 1969."

The New York Times (6/29, Greenhouse, 1.19M) says the decision "left foreign defendants with little practical recourse for violations of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, a treaty the United States ratified in 1969."

The Washington Post (6/29, A4, Lane, 744K) reports, "In dissent, Justice Stephen G. Breyer protested that the court's 'approach leaves States free to deny effective relief for Convention violations, despite America's promise to provide just such relief.'" The opinion, he added, "risks weakening respect abroad for the rights of foreign nationals, a respect that America, in 1969, sought to make effective throughout the world."

he Legal Times (6/29, Mauro) reports, "Foreign nationals who prove violations of the treaty are not entitled to the suppression of evidence obtained during the arrest or any other procedural favors, Roberts wrote. Roberts also said rulings of the International Court of Justice deserve 'respectful consideration' but cannot trump U.S. procedural rules. … But dissenters, led by Justice Stephen Breyer, said the ruling represented an 'unprecedented' repudiation of a valid treaty and of the international court's interpretation of the treaty. Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg joined Breyer in dissent."

Kerik Said To Be Close To Pleading Guilty Over Improper Gifts. The New York Times (6/29, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports that former New York City police commissioner Bernard B. Kerik "is close to reaching an agreement with prosecutors to plead guilty to having accepted improper gifts totaling tens of thousands of dollars while he was a city official in the late 1990's." Although he "will not face jail time," he "is expected to pay a substantial fine." Kerik was nominated by "President Bush… to head the Department of Homeland Security in December 2004. But he was forced to withdraw a week later, citing possible tax problems involving his family's nanny."

Rainbow Family Seeks Larger Courthouse For Trials. The Rocky Mountain News (6/28, Frazier, Lindsay) reports, "Rainbow Family members on trial for camping without a permit and other charges should be tried in a larger public courtroom – not a small, rural firehouse near Steamboat Springs, attorney David Lane said today." The News continues, "In a complaint filed in U.S. District Court in Denver, Lane said the public and some of the attorneys for more than 200 Rainbow Family members facing trial were denied access. … He said the firehouse's limited space effectively turned the trials into 'secret proceedings,' and he has asked for a temporary restraining order to stop the proceedings." The News adds, "An estimated 20,000 members of the Rainbow Family plan to gather next week in the Routt National Forest, but they have been unable to get a permit for the gathering because of the fire danger. About 4,000 members have already arrived. … U.S. Marshals and Forest Service enforcement officers have arrested about 249 members for camping without a permit. Some also face alcohol and drugs charges. … The trials, which started last weekend and were scheduled to resume Friday, were held in the modest firehouse, which had room to seat the judge and 17 defendants and prosecutors. There was limited standing room for the public and the media."

Congress Examines Options To Recoup Lost Oil, Gas Royalties. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Fialka, 2.11M) reports Congress is "weighing its options as lawmakers seek ways to recoup billions of dollars in lost royalties from dozens of oil companies that are paying below-market prices on oil and natural gas from offshore government tracts in the Gulf of Mexico." The House has "passed and the Senate Appropriations Committee is considering a measure that would punish companies that refuse to renegotiate the leases, granted by the Interior Department in 1998 and 1999, by barring them from bidding on new leases." The House is also "to vote today on a measure proposed by Rep. Richard Pombo, a California Republican, that would require companies that won't agree to pay a higher royalty to pay a 'conservation of resources fee' that would add $9 a barrel or $1.25 for each thousand cubic feet of natural gas produced." Meanwhile, Rep. Darrell Issa is promoting an approach that "wouldn't punish the companies but would encourage them to renegotiate the contracts to raise their royalty payments as 'the right thing to do.'"

Firms Compete For DOE Backing For Cellulosic Ethanol Biorefineries. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, A1, Fialka, Kilman, 2.11M) reports in a front page story on "a new U.S. fuel source: Cellulosic ethanol, which can be made from crop residues, wood chips, switchgrass and even municipal garbage." The effort "to make cellulosic ethanol into a full-blown power source to run America's cars is embryonic, and its outcome uncertain. But the fuel has two big things going for it: High oil prices and backing from the Bush administration, which sees it as a potentially important part of future energy supplies and is putting up money to help launch the first 'biorefineries' to make it." Supporters "think it could reduce U.S. dependence on imported oil, cut emissions that cause global warming and shore up the nation's rural economy. Already, the race is attracting big names, with the likes of Archer-Daniels-Midland Co., Royal Dutch Shell Group and Goldman Sachs Group Inc., investing time and seed money." The Energy Department is "staging a competition for its backing to build the nation's first three plants. The department, which has $160 million to spend on the contest, is requiring each candidate to have a pilot plant showing a process that can be successful once it is scaled up. At least 30 companies are in the running for the aid, industry officials say."

Tobacco Firms Accused Of Marketing Flavored Cigarettes To Teens. In a Washington Post op-ed (6/29, A27), Joseph A. Califano Jr., president of the National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse at Columbia University, and Louis W. Sullivan, president emeritus of the Morehouse School of Medicine, say, "Reynolds Tobacco (or RJR), the company that brought us Joe Camel, is up to its old tricks, targeting our children again." RJR is "marketing the sweet smell and taste of flavored cigarettes that mask the harshness of natural tobacco, which can deter some first-time smokers, especially children. These cigarettes are packaged in shiny tins with cool new names, flashy advertising and candy flavors ranging from watermelon ("Beach Breezer") to berry ("Bayou Blast") to pineapple and coconut ("Kauai Kolada")." By "masking the regular tobacco flavor and scent, flavored cigarettes make it even more appealing for a 12- or 13-year-old to take that initial puff and keep smoking until he or she gets hooked."

Will Says Campaign Finance Laws Include Hidden Corruption. In his Washington Post column (6/29, A27), George Will says although many reformers "say 'corruption' is secret, hence they cannot be expected to document it, some serious corruption is hardly hidden. It is in the legislative history of McCain-Feingold. Bob Bauer, a Democratic campaign lawyer, notes that the law, although marketed as a measure for clean government, was an opportunity for incumbents' self-aggrandizement. They exploited the opportunity, enacting special protections against wealthy opponents, and 'blackouts' on much preelection advertising. These they justified as enabling them to control the content of political discourse in election seasons, and enabling them, as Bauer says, to 'avoid the indignity of 'negative' ads directed against them.'"

DOJ Clears Georgia Voter ID Law. The AP (6/29, McCaffrey) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice on Wednesday approved rules governing Georgia's new photo

DOJ_NMG_0037439

IDs for voters, clearing the way for the State Election Board to decide whether to require them for the July 18 primary." The AP continues, "The rules establish what kinds of documents must be presented to obtain one of the free IDs, as well as where and when they will be distributed. Critics of the law -- which mandates that all voters present a government-issued photo ID to cast a ballot -- are expected to respond by seeking an injunction to block the law." The AP adds, "The Republican-backed law was passed in 2005, but a federal judge blocked enforcement, saying it amounted to an unconstitutional poll tax. The state Legislature amended the law early this year to make the IDs free of charge. … Under rules the Election Board adopted last week by a 3-1 vote, anyone needing a voter ID card must provide one or more documents showing date of birth, evidence of being registered to vote, and proof of name and address."

Hollywood, FL, Continues Mediation Efforts In Synagogue Dispute. The Miami Herald (6/29, Wright) reports, "Hollywood commissioners were poised late tonight to reject a settlement with an Orthodox Jewish synagogue, but after hours of emotional debate decided to give mediation one last try." The Herald continues, "For the first time, officials from the city and Hollywood Community Synagogue Chabad Lubavitch will sit down face to face to try to avoid a federal religious discrimination trial. U.S. Justice Department attorneys plan to attend to help negotiate. … If that fails, the city will again face the possibility of going to court." The Herald notes, "The city could have agreed to pay $2 million to the Hollywood Community Synagogue Chabad Lubavitch and allowed it to operate permanently out of two houses in a residential neighborhood. The congregation would have also been able to expand within the block with little regard for city zoning rules. … In return, the Chabad and the U.S. Justice Department would have dropped their lawsuits against the city and Commissioner Sal Oliveri, effectively ending a five-year dispute."

Justices Uphold Almost All Of Texas Redistricting Engineered By DeLay. The CBS Evening News (6/28, story 7, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The US Supreme Court today upheld most of a Texas redistricting plan engineered by former House Republican Leader Tom DeLay. The plan redrew congressional districts in 2003 in favor of Republicans, who then picked up six seats in 2004. The court said that was all right except in one district where the power of Hispanic voters was diluted." The Houston Chronicle (6/29, Reinert, 581K) notes that by a 5-4 vote, "the court said the 23rd District in southwest Texas, represented by Republican Henry Bonilla, violated the Voting Rights Act because its design trampled the rights of some Hispanic voters. Reshaping the district, a task that apparently now is assigned to federal court in Texas, would force a change in at least one other neighboring district." The Supreme Court also "upheld the right of states to change their congressional district boundaries more frequently than the traditional every 10 years following each US Census." The AP (6/29, Espo) reports "only two justices, John Paul Stevens and Stephen Breyer, said the mid-decade redistricting showed that the Texas lawmakers were guilty of excessive partisanship."

Much of the coverage describes the ruling as a big win for the GOP, and particularly for former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. NBC Nightly News (6/28, story 4, 2:25, P. Williams, 9.87M), for example, reported, "Today's decision is a sweet victory for Tom DeLay, the embattled former congressman and onetime House Republican leader." DeLay said the ruling vindicates his strategy." Tom DeLay, former House Majority Leader: "We used the state legislative system and what came out of that was a fair map that represented the political will of the people of Texas." Williams: "Democrats claim DeLay's tactic was unconstitutional, purely partisan, changing the boundaries in the middle of a decade when the Constitution calls for it only every ten years to adjust for census results. But by a 7-2 vote, the Supreme Court rejected the challenge."

The Chicago Tribune (6/29, Bendavid, 643K) reports the ruling ensures that "the political legacy of former Rep. Tom DeLay will live on despite his downfall." The New York Times (6/29, Greenhouse, 1.19M) says that "in political terms, the ruling was something of a vindication for Mr. DeLay, who stepped down from his leadership post and resigned from Congress this year after being indicted last year in Texas on charges of illegally routing campaign contributions to Texas Republicans." His indictment "was related to his effort to win control of the Texas Legislature in 2002; it was that development that allowed the redistricting to go forward, helping Republicans to win six additional House seats in Texas in 2004."

The Washington Post (6/29, A4, Weisman, 744K) runs a story titled "Effort To Secure Texas Led To Fall Of Tom DeLay," in which it notes "DeLay's dogged quest for a new congressional map for Texas led to a disciplinary slap from the House ethics committee, his indictment on money-laundering charges, his fall from the House leadership ranks and, this month, his resignation from Congress." But "the former House majority leader proclaimed yesterday that the Supreme Court's decision to uphold most of his legislative map affirmed his contention that partisan power is reason enough to muscle through new congressional district lines."

Fox News' Special Report (6/28, Kendall) reported, "It is a major victory for republicans and for Tom DeLay." CNN's The Situation Room (6/28, Crowley) also referred to "a Republican-friendly political map driven and largely written by Tom DeLay."

DOJ_NMG_0037440

A number of stories, meanwhile, express concern that the court's decision will lead to other states launching similar redistricting processes, which, says the Dallas Morning News (6/29, Pusey, Gillman), would lead to "to bare-knuckled political fights in statehouses across the nation." As the Christian Science Monitor (6/29, Richey, 61K) reports, "some analysts foresee a flurry of redistricting in states whenever one party or another deems it politically expedient."

The Washington Post (6/29, A1, Lane, Balz, 744K) reports "politicians of both parties said that the ruling leaves the door wide open to attempts to copy the DeLay strategy in other states. 'Every redistricting is a partisan political exercise, but this is going to put it at a level we have never seen,' said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. 'That's the gift that the Supreme Court and Tom DeLay have given us.'" Meanwhile, the Washington Times (6/29, Dinan, 90K) reports "congressional Republicans saw the ruling as a solid victory that ends Democrats' efforts to use the courts to win more seats. 'The decision dismisses the Democrats' arguments that the Texas redistricting was improper or illegal,' said Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds, New York Republican and chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee."

Also analyzing the consequences of the ruling, ABC World News Tonight (6/28, story 3, 2:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the court's decision that states can redraw district lines "whenever they want" has "huge implications for politics in this country." A similar story in NBC Nightly News (6/28, story 5, 1:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This case now comes down to a big question -- will this mean congressional districts will be cut up and redrawn all over this country?" Tim Russert said, "There are 435 congressional districts. About 380 right now are either safe Democratic or safe Republican districts. If you're to have these kind of redistricting plans put in place on a regular basis, you could in fact make these permanent members of Congress, where there'd be no incentive to work across the aisle with the member of another party because you are only trying to protect your own ideological, partisan base."

USA Today (6/29, Biskupic, Kiely, 2.31M) reports, "The ruling opens the possibility of redistricting in other states after fall elections. One-party control of the governorship and legislature could allow for the move in at least five states: Maryland, New York and Michigan for Democrats; Pennsylvania and Indiana for Republicans." However, "the ruling's long-term impact is unclear, in part because partisan redistricting is limited in many states. Six low-population states have only one US House seat, so they aren't involved in redistricting. Eight others have districts drawn by independent commissions, rather than legislatures, and at least five more have various restrictions against redrawing districts between censuses." USA Today (6/29, Kiely, 2.31M) runs a second story on the same topic, headlined "Ruling May Incite Redistricting Battles."

The Los Angeles Times (6/29, Havemann, 958K) also says the ruling "could lead to redistricting attempts every time state legislatures changed hands between the 10-year censuses."

The AP (6/29, Holland) reports, "Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, writing for a 5-4 majority, said Hispanics do not have a chance to elect a candidate of their choosing in south and west Texas under the state's plan. … The plan's 'troubling blend of politics and race - and the resulting vote dilution of a group that was beginning to achieve (the federal law's) goal of overcoming prior electoral discrimination - cannot be sustained,' Kennedy wrote." The AP adds, "Some 100,000 Hispanics had been shifted out of a district represented by a Republican, and foes of the plan had argued it violated the Voting Rights Act which protects minority voting rights. … The court ruled 7-2 that state legislators may draw new congressional maps anytime - not just once a decade as Texas Democrats had claimed and has been traditional nationwide. That means any state's lawmakers can push through new maps anytime there is a power shift in the Legislature."

Knight Ridder distributes a Dallas Morning News article (6/29, Pusey, Gillman) that reports, "By handing Texas Republicans a major victory in their contentious congressional redistricting case, the U.S. Supreme Court may have lowered some of the last obstacles to bare-knuckled political fights in statehouses across the nation, though predictions of political chaos may be premature, experts said Wednesday." The News continues, "In a complex, multi-faceted decision the high court largely upheld a 2003 redistricting plan crafted by the Republican controlled Legislature, though justices invalidated a GOP-held South Texas district. … They also said redistricting can occur at anytime - on multiple occasions, if need be - between each decade's census. They suggested that politically motivated congressional boundaries are a part of the remap process."

The Legal Times (6/29, Mauro) reports, "By a cascading series of mix-and-match majorities, the Supreme Court on Wednesday upheld most of the controversial mid-decade Texas Republican redistricting plan spearheaded by former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay." The Times continues, "The ruling could encourage other states whose legislatures are dominated by one party to break from the long tradition of redistricting only after the census every decade." The Times adds, "Texas Democrats and other challengers were consoled by a partial victory Wednesday when the Court struck down Texas District 23, reshaped in 2003 into a narrow district running from the San Antonio area to the edge of El Paso in order to protect an incumbent Republican from a surging Latino population. That shift diluted minority voting power and amounted to a violation of Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, the Court agreed. … 'Justice and fairness is always a goal worth pursuing, and the fact that the Court found the map violated the rights of Latino voters in South Texas shows the fight was worth it,' said J. Gerald Hebert, lawyer for the Texas congressional Democrats." The Times notes, "Despite the verbiage, the justices Wednesday appeared no closer than ever to deciding when a politically motivated redistricting plan crosses a constitutional line and violates either the equal protection clause or the First Amendment. … But whatever line might exist, a mid-decade reapportionment, no matter how politically motivated, does not appear to cross it, said Justice Anthony Kennedy, who wrote the main opinion and summarized it with difficulty before spectators at the Court."

Bonilla Says TX23 Was Drawn With Eye On Future, Not His Own Survival. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Bravin, Cooper, 2.11M) reports that in an interview yesterday, Bonilla "said his district hadn't been drawn specifically for his benefit but rather to preserve Republican control into the future. 'The vision way back was not about me but looking past me,' he said. 'There was a concern long-term, that after I moved on, that they wanted to keep this seat in Republican hands.'" The New York Times (6/29, Blumenthal, Zernike, 1.19M) reports Bonilla, in a telephone interview, "denied his district had been redrawn for his protection and predicted he would beat opponents even if the lines were changed again. 'They can't win in the area I represent,' he said."

The Hill (6/29, Kaplan, O'Connor) reports that whether the ruling on the TX23 district "will boost Democrats' chances in Bonilla's district remains unclear, but his challenger, Democrat Rick Bonanos, sounded confident after receiving phone calls from top Democratic officials, including former Sen. Max Cleland (D-Ga.), pledging help." Bonilla "has more than $2 million in his campaign war chest; Bonanos said he has raised about $20,000."

Roll Call (6/29, Drucker) reports "attorney Nina Perales, southwest regional counsel for the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund and the lawyer who argued this portion of the case before the court in March, said she expects the approximately 120,000 Latinos moved out of Bonilla's district in 2003, and into Rep. Henry Cuellar's (D) 28th district, to be moved back into the 23rd. She also expects the district to lose some Anglo voters who live in its northern hill counties." Perales "speculated that this could put Bonilla in electoral jeopardy, as only 8 percent of Latino voters supported him at the polls in 2002, at that time a historic low for the Latino Republican Congressman."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, 2.11M), in an editorial titled "DeLay's Revenge," says "the former House Majority Leader must take some consolation from yesterday's Supreme Court decision. … As for those of us who want fewer partisan gerrymanders, and thus more competitive elections, the battle now moves to the states themselves. Letting a nonpartisan commission draw the lines has worked well in Iowa, and reformers ought to throw their energy into that idea, rather than to the windmill-tilt of trying to purge money from politics."

The New York Times (6/29, 1.19M) titles its editorial "A Loss For Competitive Elections," and writes, "Instead of standing up for a fair electoral landscape, the court produced a ruling that did little to ensure the vibrancy of American democracy, and that itself had an unfortunate whiff of partisanship." The Times also saus, "In this post-Bush-vs.-Gore era, the court's critics will note that it again split on partisan lines, with the most conservative justices most approving of the Texas lines. That was also true in a 2004 case in which it upheld, by a 5-to-4 vote, a pro-Republican redistricting in Pennsylvania. But that same year the court, disturbingly, affirmed a lower court's ruling striking down a pro-Democratic redistricting in Georgia as unconstitutional. It is disappointing that it could not have come up with a decision yesterday that had a greater appearance of fairness."

William Hamilton, a syndicated columnist and a former executive director of the Nebraska Republican Party, writes in USA Today (6/29, 2.31M), "Americans who favor representative government should be pleased with the U.S. Supreme Court ruling on the Texas redistricting plan. Here's why: The districts were drawn by legislators elected by and answerable to the people."

Justin Levitt, associate counsel in the Democracy Program at New York University's Brennan Center for Justice, and Lisa Sandoval, a student at the Columbia law school, write in The Hill (6/29), "Yesterday the Supreme Court took another step in demoting itself from reluctant referee to irrelevant bystander in the battle by which district lines are drawn and politicians are elected. … Meaningful representative democracy requires more stability. If our representatives could change the rules at any time, politicians would choose their voters, rather than the other way around."

Abigail Thernstrom, Vice-chair of the US Commission on Civil Rights, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/29, 2.11M), "DeLay may be down, but he's not out. Yes, he's out of Congress, but the Texas congressional districting plan for which he is given substantial political credit mostly lives on, thanks to yesterday's Supreme Court decision upholding it."

Senate Remains Barrier To Flag Desecration Amendment. The Christian Science Monitor (6/29, Chaddock, 61K) reports if "every current senator who voted for a flag amendment in the past had done so this week, a constitutional amendment authorizing the Congress to ban desecration of the flag would be on its way to the states for ratification." But Sens. Robert Byrd (D) of West Virginia and Kent Conrad (D) of North Dakota "did not, and the amendment went down, as it has the last three times the Senate has taken it up." But the one vote margin "wasn't as close as it looked, because Democrats were committed to finding the votes needed to fight the amendment. On the eve of the vote, Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, who had voted for an amendment banning flag desecration in 1990, 1995, and 2000, said he would vote for it again, because he was sure 'it would not pass.' Thirteen other Democrats, mainly from states that sent their electoral votes to President Bush in the last election, joined him in supporting the bill." Republicans also "headed into battle without their best vote counter. Majority whip Mitch McConnell (R) of Kentucky opposed the amendment, along with GOP Sens. Robert Bennett of Utah and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island."

House Panel Rejects Resolution To Bar Challenges To Pledge Of Allegiance. CQ (6/28, Stern) reports that in a "surprise defeat for Republicans, the House Judiciary Committee deadlocked Wednesday on legislation that would bar most federal courts, including the Supreme Court, from hearing constitutional challenges to the Pledge of Allegiance." But the setback "could be temporary. Wednesday evening, the Judiciary Committee scheduled a new markup Thursday to vote again." The 15-15 tie vote "meant the court-stripping bill (HR 2389) was not reported favorably. Republican Bob Inglis of South Carolina joined 14 Democrats in voting against the measure." Seven other Republican committee members "did not vote, a sign that Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., R-Wis., did not anticipate such a close tally."

Supreme Court Rules Inmates Can Be Denied Newspapers. The Christian Science Monitor (6/29, Richey, 61K) reports, "Prison inmates do not enjoy a First Amendment right to receive newspapers and magazines in their cells when they are being punished in the highest security section of a prison. In an important decision restricting free speech protections behind bars, the US Supreme Court ruled on Wednesday that Pennsylvania state prison officials did not violate the constitutional rights of their most dangerous inmates by barring access to various news publications." The "key test," says Justice Breyer, is "whether the prison restrictions are reasonably related to legitimate penological interests. The high court said the prison restriction was aimed at creating an incentive for better prison behavior among problematic inmates, and thus satisfied the court's standard."

The AP (6/29, Locy) reports, "The decision reverses a ruling by the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals but validates a dissent by the high court's newest member, Justice Samuel Alito, who sided with Pennsylvania when he served on the appellate court. Alito did not participate in the argument before the Supreme Court. … Breyer said that 'prison officials, relying on their professional judgment, reached an experience-based conclusion that the policies help to further legitimate prison objectives.' … The high court's ruling could have affected prison operations nationwide if justices had required state officials to prove that their policies serve legitimate security and rehabilitative interests. … The Bush administration sided with Pennsylvania, saying the state's policy deserves deference from the courts because it involves maintaining order in prisons."

House Affirms Right To Non-English Ballots. The AP (6/29, Taylor) reports, "The House agreed Wednesday to affirm the right of voters in areas with large populations of non-English-speaking citizens to cast ballots in their native language." The AP continues, "The 254-167 roll call in support of bilingual balloting came just a week after GOP divisions over the issue contributed to the postponement of a House vote to renew the landmark 1965 Voting Rights Act. … 'If you have the good fortune to be able to vote in the United States, then it is not too much to ask that this be accomplished in English,' said Rep. Cliff Stearns, R-Fla. 'I don't think the United States government should be forced to pay for (bilingual) assistance.'" The AP adds, "The bilingual balloting vote came on an amendment by Stearns as the House debated a $59.8 billion measure funding the annual budgets of the departments of Justice, Commerce and State. .. About 500 political subdivisions in 31 states must offer bilingual assistance. Of those states, five — Alaska, Arizona, California, New Mexico and Texas — must provide the assistance statewide. … The issue has become embroiled with a passionate election-year debate to overhaul immigration laws. Conservative Republicans have pushed to make English the official national language. … Supporters of non-English ballots reminded colleagues that only U.S. citizens are able to vote and that even those whose native language is English have difficulty with complex ballot initiatives, much less those who learned the language after coming to this country."

Majority Of Biggest US Companies Offer Gay Partner Benefits. USA Today (6/29, Armour, 2.31M) reports, "A majority of the nation's largest companies now provide health insurance for domestic partners of employees — a historic shift from the 1980s, when benefits for same-sex partners were rare." Data 'on the rise in domestic-partner benefits will be released today by the Washington-based Human Rights Campaign Foundation, the education and outreach arm of HRC, a gay-rights organization." Today, "253 companies from the Fortune 500 provide equal benefits to same-sex couples, according to the report, and 86% have policies that ban discrimination based on employees' sexual orientation."

US Transgender Community Finding More Acceptance. The AP (6/29, Leff) reports, "A clash between police and patrons of an all-night diner in San Francisco 40 years ago was once a forgotten footnote in history. For members of the transgender community, though, it was the start of their slow march toward widespread acceptance." The AP continues, "Sparked by the riot, San Francisco activists started their own civil rights movement - three years before the more famous clashes at New York City's Stonewall Inn. … A dedication this month of a granite anniversary marker at the site of the Compton's Cafeteria riot drew a pair of city supervisors, the district attorney and the police chief. The California Assembly and Mayor Gavin Newsom sent proclamations. … 'Transgender' is an umbrella term that came into common usage a decade ago and covers cross-dressers, transsexuals and others whose outward appearance doesn't match their gender at birth. … While not every city is ready to celebrate their contributions, San Francisco - which in 2001 extended its health insurance to cover sex reassignment surgeries for municipal employees - is no longer alone. Across the United States, one of the nation's most maligned minority groups is quickly winning rights and recognition it began to demand only recently. … In the last two years, New Mexico, Illinois and California have updated their anti-discrimination laws to protect transgender home buyers and renters; colleges in Vermont and Iowa have dedicated "gender neutral" dorm rooms; and corporations have adopted policies for helping employees stay on the job during sex changes."

ANTITRUST:

Biomet CEO Does Not Know Specifics Of DOJ Probe. MarketWatch (6/29, Kamp) reports, "Biomet Inc. doesn't know much about a U.S. Department of Justice probe of the orthopedics sector other than a subpoena it recently received signals an investigation into price and bidding, Biomet's interim chief executive said Wednesday." MarketWatch continues, "Four orthopedics companies - Biomet, Zimmer Holdings Inc., Stryker Corp. and Johnson & Johnson unit DePuy Inc. - have confirmed they've received subpoenas from the Justice Department's antitrust division. The subpoenas are for several years' worth of documents regarding possible federal criminal and antirust-law violations. … 'The subpoena we received is a very broad subpoena,' said Daniel P. Hann, Biomet's interim president and chief executive, speaking during a conference call with financial analysts following the company's fiscal fourth-quarter earnings release. … 'Frankly, we do not know specifically what the investigation is about,' Hann said. 'The subpoena does not signal anything other than an investigation into price and bidding in our industry.' … Hann added that these investigations typically take place 'over a long period of time,' but said he has no insight into the investigation's timing." MarketWatch adds, "He said the company doesn't know whether the investigation might be linked to a prior Justice Department probe of consulting or professional-service agreements between companies and orthopedic surgeons. That issue became public when subpoenas were disclosed in early 2005. … A Justice Department spokeswoman said Friday the agency 'is conducting an antitrust investigation into the possibility of anticompetitive practices in the implant-device industry,' and didn't offer further comment."

CFTC Charges BP Unit With Propane Price Manipulation. The AP (6/29) reports, "Federal investigators said Wednesday that BP energy traders cornered the U.S. propane market in the winter of 2004 and illegally manipulated prices, driving up heating and cooking costs for rural consumers." The AP continues, "The charges come at a time when oil and gas companies are under intense scrutiny from consumers and Congress over soaring energy prices and record profits, and analysts said the entire industry's credibility could be damaged. While BP denied any wrongdoing, a former employee admitted taking part in a conspiracy and agreed to cooperate with criminal prosecutors. … The Commodity Futures Trading Commission said that BP traders -- with the consent of senior management – 'purchased enormous quantities of propane to establish a dominant' position in the market and then withheld fuel from the market in order to drive prices higher."

Bloomberg (6/29) reports, "The commission filed suit today in federal court alleging BP Products North America, a subsidiary of London-based BP, manipulated the market for the heating fuel in February 2004 after trying the same tactic in April 2003. Former BP trader Dennis Abbott pleaded guilty to conspiracy in a separate court filing today by the Justice Department. … 'Cornering a commodity market is more than a threat to market integrity,' Gregory Mocek, director of enforcement for the commission, said in a statement. 'It is an illegal activity that could have repercussions for commercial market participants as well as retail consumers around this country.'" Bloomberg notes, "BP is one of several large oil companies facing increasing scrutiny from the government as energy prices surged. The company has also run afoul of U.S. regulators in the past year over operations at its refineries. … By purchasing 'enormous quantities' of propane, BP caused the price to increase to more than 90 cents a gallon on Feb. 27, 2004, 'a price that would not otherwise have been reached under the normal pressures of supply and demand,' the commission said in a statement. The company at one point owned over 88 percent of all 'TET' propane, fuel that can be delivered anywhere on the Texas Eastern pipeline system. … The strategy was done 'with the knowledge, advice and consent of senior management,' the commission said. BP also tried the strategy in April 2003, as a 'trial run,' according to the market regulator."

The Financial Times (6/29, Grant) called the allegations "serious" and noted the lawsuit "against BP is likely to be one of the biggest cases of alleged energy price manipulation in the US." The dispute is "likely to provoke a political storm as US politicians, already sensitive to high petrol prices, are alert to signs that recent volatility in energy markets could be the result of price manipulation by energy companies."

The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Wilke, Cummins) adds, "The alleged conspiracy is the latest in a series of stumbles by the London-based company's U.S. operations. BP has paid millions of dollars in federal fines over the past few years in connection with a fatal 2005 refinery fire and other alleged safety and regulatory lapses, and remains under investigation by several federal agencies."

But USA Today (6/29, Smith) reports, "BP denied the allegations even as one of its former traders pleaded guilty to a criminal conspiracy charge and agreed to cooperate with investigators." BP Products North America spokesman Ronnie Chappell said, "Market manipulation did not occur, and we are prepared to prove that case in the courts." USA Today notes, "About 7 million U.S. households in rural parts of the country depend on propane as their primary heating fuel. BP…is the largest supplier of natural gas liquids in North America."

Trader Pleads Guilty To Conspiracy. The New York Times (6/29, Mouawad) reports, "Also, the Justice Department said yesterday that one trader named in the lawsuit pleaded guilty to a conspiracy charge in a parallel criminal case. The plea is part of a continuing investigation by the F.B.I. … A former BP trader, Dennis N. Abbott, 34, pleaded guilty to conspiring to manipulate the propane market, the Justice Department said. He faces up to five years in prison and a fine of $250,000, according to Bryan Sierra, a Justice Department spokesman."

Dow Jones (6/29) reports, "According to the Justice Department, Abbott said he 'understood that the scheme was approved by senior executives at BP, and that steps were taken to avoid detection by market participants and others.'"

AFP (6/29) reports, "Abbott, 34, entered his plea to a conspiracy charge in US District Court in Washington before Judge James Robertson. Under the terms of a plea agreement, Abbott faces up to five years in prison, a fine of 250,000 dollars, and supervised release following any incarceration. … Abbott agreed to cooperate with law enforcement officials in an ongoing investigation, officials said."

Google Launches Online Payment System. The New York Times (6/29, Hansell) reports, "In its quest to 'organize the world's information,' Google now wants to keep track of your credit card number and where you live." The Times continues, "The company is introducing Google Checkout today, a service that will allow users to make purchases from online stores using payment and shipping information they keep on file with Google. … Google's aim, said Eric E. Schmidt, the chief executive, is to make it easier and faster for people to buy products advertised on Google — thus attracting more advertisers. … 'The goal here is to make it be one nanosecond from the time the customer decides to buy to the time the transaction is complete and the product is on the way,' Mr. Schmidt said." The Times adds, "For consumers, this sort of service, often referred to as an online wallet, is hardly new. Microsoft, AOL and Yahoo have offered similar wallets, which proved to have limited appeal. While the PayPal service of eBay has attracted widespread use, it offers additional features like the ability to transfer money from checking accounts. … But for merchants, the service comes with a twist: Google will waive some or all of the transaction fees for companies that buy advertising from it. That may give the service a leg up on competitors like PayPal and several smaller companies that help online merchants accept credit cards. … It will also add another entry to the list of businesses that have been shaken up by Google's innovations, a list that already includes publishing, advertising and desktop software."

EMI, Warner Music Continue Contentious Merger Discussions. USA Today (6/29, Lieberman) reports, "EMI Group and Warner Music Group stepped on each other's feet in their long-running merger dance as each disclosed in dueling press releases Wednesday that it offered to buy the other this week - to no avail." USA continues, "On Tuesday night, Warner rejected a $4.7 billion cash offer from EMI. But in a move that took some analysts by surprise, Warner turned around and bid $4.6 billion in cash for its British rival. … EMI says its board 'unanimously rejected' Warner's offer because the price doesn't account for 'EMI's prospects, the potential synergy benefits of a combination of the two companies and the range of strategic options available to EMI.' … It added that it still believes its proposal to pay $31 a share for Warner 'would be very attractive to both sets of shareholders.' … In response, Warner said it rejected EMI's offer partly because it required Warner first to sell its Warner/Chappell Music publishing unit, which would 'increase execution risk.' Warner said it still believes its offer would be 'value-enhancing to EMI shareholders.'"

The New York Times (6/29, Leeds) reports, "Representatives from both sides are expected to continue negotiating, but the latest moves indicate that the talks are growing contentious, particularly regarding the question of who would manage the combined company." The Times continues, "At the same time, analysts said the rival bids ultimately could push the price of any deal so high that the combined company would be laden with debt or forced to cut executives and reduce the number of artists more than anticipated. … Wall Street analysts who track the companies estimate the combined entity could generate $200 million to $300 million in additional cash flow by laying off employees and reducing the number of artists, among other cuts. But some executives involved in the talks indicated the figure could be closer to $400 million."

The AP (6/29, Barr) reports, "A combination of EMI and New York-based Warner Music would control about 25 percent of the recorded music market, surpassing BMG in the rankings and moving into second place behind Universal, according to the International Federation of the Phonographic Industry. … It would bring together artists on EMI such as Coldplay, Norah Jones, Paul McCartney and the Rolling Stones with Warner's roster that includes Sean 'P. Diddy' Combs and his Bad Boy label, Madonna and Paul Simon."

The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Smith) reports, "Neither company disputes that there are solid strategic reasons they should combine. They are each roughly half the size of the No. 1 and No. 2 music companies, Vivendi Universal SA's Universal Music Group and Sony BMG Music Entertainment, a joint venture of Tokyo-based Sony Corp. and Germany's Bertelsmann AG. And they could save hundreds of millions of dollars by combining back-end and international operations. … But neither company has expressed any interest in the kind of 50-50 merger that created Sony BMG. On the other hand, neither EMI nor Warner has been willing to cede control to the other."

The Financial Times (6/29, Van Duyn, Politi, Terazono) also reports on the negotiations.

Judge Grants Real Estate Antitrust Suits Class-Action Status. Inman News (6/29, Roberts) reports, "A judge for a U.S. District Court in Idaho has granted class-action status to four separate antitrust lawsuits, which allege that four real estate brokerage companies engaged in illegal commission practices." Inman continues, "The four class-action lawsuits were each filed against individual real estate companies -- including Aspen Realty, Holland Realty, Sel-Equity Co. and Park Pointe Realty (doing business as John L. Scott Real Estate) -- and will proceed as separate cases." Inman adds, "The real estate companies allegedly charged a commission for their services that was based on the purchase price of undeveloped land and the actual or estimated price of homes to be built on those undeveloped lots, rather than based solely on the price of the undeveloped lots, according to the lawsuits. … This practice, the lawsuits charge, constitutes a tying arrangement that violates the Sherman Antitrust Act."

Senate Panel Passes Telecom Bill. USA Today (6/29, Davidson, 2.31M) reports, "The Senate Commerce Committee on Wednesday approved sweeping telecommunications reform that would allow phone companies to more easily offer pay TV services, giving consumers a new alternative to cable." But "the measure could face an uphill fight in the Senate after Republicans defeated an amendment to limit the ability of phone and cable giants to charge websites fees for faster services." By a 15-7 vote, the panel "approved a bill that, among other things, would force communities to negotiate a franchise with video providers within 90 days. The process can take much longer now."

The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Schatz, 2.11M) reports the Senate committee "spent roughly two hours arguing about 'net neutrality' before a proposal aimed at setting new protections on Internet access and pricing failed on an 11-11 vote. Without that amendment, however, the committee passed the telecom bill." The Journal adds, "While the action was a loss for those who support net neutrality, it could result in an even bigger defeat for phone companies, which want to see Congress pass legislation opening the way for them to more quickly offer pay-television services in competition with cable companies." The Washington Post (6/29, Hart, Goo, 744K) runs a similar report.

Web Video Sites Face Test In Veoh Copyright Suit. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Delaney) reports, "Adult entertainment company Io Group Inc. last Friday filed a lawsuit against Veoh Networks Inc., an online video-sharing service, in a potential important legal test of Web video companies' liability for copyright infringement claims." The Journal continues, "The complaint, filed in U.S. District Court for California's Northern District, alleges that Veoh, San Diego, was responsible for copyright infringement by allowing videos owned by Io Group to be accessed through Veoh's online service without permission. In the complaint, Io Group, a San Francisco company doing business by the name Titan Media, alleges that consumers viewed its copyrighted works over 40,000 times through Veoh's site between June 1 and June 22." The Journal adds, "The suit has potentially broad ramifications for the exploding consumption of videos online and the companies, including YouTube Inc., Google Inc., Yahoo Inc., that allow consumers to post videos for others to see on the Web. Some of those companies perform varying degrees of automated and human review of the videos consumers submit to their sites. … But some, including YouTube, the most-visited Web video site in the U.S., don't review videos before making them available on their sites and rely on content owners and users to alert them to videos that are uploaded without the copyright holders' permission. The practice of removing videos after formal notification by their owners follows an industry-standard procedure outlined in the Digital Millennium Copyright Act of 1998."

Murdoch Mulls Joining Macquarie Bid For PCCW Assets. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Linebaugh) reports, "A unit of Rupert Murdoch's News Corp. has had discussions about joining Macquarie Bank Ltd.'s bid for the core assets of PCCW Ltd., potentially injecting a media heavyweight with a long history in China into the contentious acquisition battle." The Journal continues, "Star Group, a wholly owned subsidiary of News Corp., has "had some talks with Macquarie" about participating in its bid for the telecommunications and media assets of Hong Kong's dominant phone company, according to a spokeswoman for Star Group, who declined to comment further. The Macquarie bid is worth more than $7 billion, people familiar with the matter have said." The Journal adds, "In an interview today with a News Corp.-owned newspaper, the Australian, Mr. Murdoch confirmed the company had held talks with Macquarie but expressed skepticism about the prospects of Macquarie's bid. A person close to the situation said if News Corp. decides to join the bid, it would take a stake "in the low single digits" in percentage terms. That suggests News Corp.'s contribution could be as little as $100 million."

EU Signals Tough Line On Antitrust Enforcement. The Financial Times (6/29, Buck) reports, "Companies under investigation for anti-competitive behaviour could be fined 30 per cent of their annual turnover under European Union guidelines announced yesterday by Neelie Kroes, competition commissioner." The Times continues, "The new guidelines will apply to all investigations in which the Commission has not yet issued formal charges against a company. This includes the energy companies raided in May - RWE, Eon, Gaz de France and Eni, among others - and the air cargo groups raided in February - British Airways, Lufthansa, Air France-KLM and Cargolux." The Times adds, "Under the Commission's new guidelines, the pain for companies caught by the Brussels trust-buster is set to increase dramatically. As the FT reported yesterday, repeat offenders will be punished particularly severely, as will big companies with a large share of the market in which the abuse took place. … Ms Kroes said the message was clear: 'Don't break the antitrust rules. If you do, stop it as quickly as possible. And once you've stopped, don't do it again. If companies do not pay attention to these signals, they will pay a very high price.'"

The AP (6/29) reports, "These new fine limits will apply to every company charged with antitrust abuse after the new guidelines are published in the next two months. … The commission raised the threshold for maximum fines to 30 percent of a company's annual sales for every year it broke EU law -- up from the current limit of 10 percent of total annual turnover." The AP adds, "EU regulators said part of the fine -- an 'entry fee' may also be charged, no matter how long the company violated EU rules. This fee would be based on 15 percent to 25 percent of yearly sales during the entire time span of the illegal behavior. It will apply to cartels and to other types of antitrust abuse, they said."

Big Media Disregards FCC Ownership Rules. The Washington Post (6/29, Ahrens) reports, "When the government's attempt to relax media ownership rules was defeated in court two years ago, some hailed it as a victory against putting too much power in the hands of too few media lords. … Now, the government is taking up the issue again, but the media landscape is radically different." The Post continues, "Since 2003, the media giants have greatly expanded their presence on the Internet, buying successful Web sites or redoubling their own efforts. The continued rollout of high-speed Internet, the improvement in online content and an explosion of handheld devices have combined to give Big Media much greater reach and potentially greater influence than it would have had, were companies allowed to buy a few more television stations each. … Last week, the Federal Communications Commission voted to re-tackle the sticky issue of media ownership. This time, the agency plans to loosen some rules, allowing big media companies to expand. For instance, a newspaper will -- for the first time since 1975 -- probably be allowed to buy the most popular television station in the same city. .. But the times, technology and media marketplace have changed so much since the FCC began its ownership review last time, in 2002, that some of the same media giants that lobbied for changes before -- such as Tribune Co. -- may take little advantage of changes this time. … In 2002, the media giants had already been burned by the Internet. The newly merged AOL Time Warner Inc. took a $10 billion write-down, thanks to bad deals and falling revenue at America Online. Walt Disney Co. lost millions on its Go.com Internet portal."

India Launches Battle Over Yoga Copyright. USA Today (6/29, Fetterman) reports, "India seems to be willing to go to the mat over yoga. … That's because Bikram Choudhury, the self-proclaimed Hollywood 'yoga teacher to the stars,' incensed his native country by getting a U.S. copyright on his style of yoga four years ago." USA continues, "In response, India has put 100 historians and scientists to work cataloging 1,500 yoga poses recorded in ancient texts written in Sanskrit, Urdu and Persian. India will use the catalogue to try to block anyone from cornering the market on the 5,000-year-old discipline of stretching, breathing and meditating." USA adds, "Bikram, who goes by one name like Bono and Beyoncé, says he sought legal protection for his yoga because 'it's the American way.' … 'You cannot drive the car if you do not have a driver's license,' he explains. 'You cannot do brain surgery if you are not a brain surgeon. You cannot even do a massage if you don't have a license.' And, he says, you shouldn't be able to teach his Bikram Yoga unless you pay him for a license." USA notes, "India's counterattack goes way beyond Bikram. … The government wants to thwart anyone who tries to profit from the nation's so-called 'traditional knowledge,' from yoga to 150,000 ancient medical remedies. India already has successfully challenged one U.S. patent granted to two Indian-born Americans who used the spice turmeric in a wound-healing product. That patent was revoked by the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Sago Mine Explosion Survivor Says Miners Expected Rescue. The AP (6/29, Smith) reports, "As they sat behind a curtain that held back thick smoke but not deadly carbon monoxide, the doomed crew of the Sago Mine talked about the rescue they thought was coming, the sole survivor says." The AP continues, "In a transcript of a June 19 interview with state and federal investigators, Randal McCloy Jr. said he believed a seismographic machine somewhere above them was waiting for a signal from the miners. But they banged on roof bolts in vain: Officials have said such a device was not brought to mine because it wasn't needed. … McCloy also added detail to his contention that some of the miners' air packs didn't work, something officials who have tested the devices dispute. McCloy said he tried all four of the devices that had failed to work, including one that appeared to have a broken valve." The AP adds, "Twelve men died in the Sago mine: one in the Jan. 2 blast and the rest hours later of carbon monoxide poisoning. McCloy survived more than 40 hours in poisoned air _ a feat doctors have never been able to fully explain. … State mine safety officials released the 96-page transcript of McCloy's two-hour testimony on Wednesday. The Associated Press had requested a copy under the Freedom of Information Act."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/29, Roddy, Lash) reports that the miners "began walking out of the mine but turned back after four of them declared that their emergency breathing devices did not work, according to the lone survivor of the disaster. … One miner, Terry Helms, apparently died outright when a methane explosion tore through a wall intended to seal off an abandoned section of the mine. Eleven others slowly died of carbon monoxide poisoning behind a makeshift barricade they hoped would keep out bad air while they awaited rescue." The Post-Gazette adds, "The only miner to survive, Randal McCloy Jr., was interviewed June 19 in Morgantown, W.Va., by a joint state-federal panel investigating the disaster. Mr. McCloy, 27, spent nearly three months in hospitals recovering from exposure to deadly carbon monoxide gas that left him in a coma and caused multiple organ and brain injuries. .. . West Virginia's Office of Miners' Health, Safety and Training released his testimony yesterday. … A state report on the Sago disaster is expected to be released July 19." The Post-Gazette notes, "In his testimony, Mr. McCloy elaborated on details -- including problems with other miners' breathing devices -- that he'd included in a letter sent to families of the dead miners earlier this year. Investigators questioned him repeatedly about the devices and also about his training in their use."

Sierra Club Sues Pentagon For Delaying Wind Farm Construction. The New York Times/AP (6/29) reports the Sierra Club "sued the Defense Department, saying the department has halted construction of wind farms across the country by failing to complete a study on whether they interfere with military radar." The suit "asserted that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and the Pentagon missed a deadline for completing the study, which was ordered by Congress and must be completed before the Federal Aviation Administration can issue safety permits for the projects."

Navy Sued Over Sonar Use. The AP (6/29, McAvoy) reports, "Environmental groups sued the federal government Wednesday to prevent the Navy from using active sonar during drills off Hawaii next month, saying the sound could harm whales and other marine mammals." The AP continues, "The Natural Resources Defense Council asked a federal court in Los Angeles to issue a temporary restraining order unless the Navy takes 'effective measures' to protect marine life when it uses high-intensity, mid-frequency active sonar to hunt submarines in the drills. … 'The military can train but it has to do so consistent with the law and the law requires protection of the marine environment,' said Joel Reynolds, senior attorney for the council." The AP adds, "Navy lawyers haven't seen the lawsuit and couldn't comment. The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration declined to comment, but said the agency was confident the Navy would protect dolphins and whales. … NOAA on Tuesday granted the Navy a permit to use sonar during war games involving more than 40 ships in Hawaii waters. The exercises are scheduled to start next week and last through late July. … The permit comes after NOAA said in April that Navy use of sonar during maritime exercises off Hawaii in 2004 may have contributed to the mass stranding of more than 150 whales. The report, however, did not say definitively that the sonar caused the whales to gather in the bay."

California Ports Unite To Fight Air Pollution. USA Today (6/29, Kasindorf) reports, "The neighboring seaports of Los Angeles and Long Beach announced Wednesday a proposal to crack down on the diesel-powered ships, trucks and trains that are polluting the air over the USA's trade gateway to Asia." USA continues, "Under the proposed five-year cleanup plan, the twin ports would offer $200 million to owners of 16,000 trucks to replace old rigs with cleaner new ones. Ships would have to burn cleaner fuel, cut speed within 40 miles of the harbor and plug into dockside electrical outlets that are being built. Railroads would be required to use cleaner locomotives." USA adds, "The city-owned ports, 20 miles south of downtown Los Angeles, are the nation's largest. Together they handle 40% of U.S. cargo-container imports and account for 600,000 local jobs. They're also a health hazard as Southern California's "largest fixed source of air pollution," the South Coast Air Quality Management District says. … Vessels and vehicles idling at docks spew more smog-forming nitrogen oxides and cancer-causing diesel particulates than the metropolitan area's 6 million cars, the district says. Residents of nearby neighborhoods have high rates of respiratory illness and the region's highest cancer risk, according to the California Air Resources Board. … The cleanup plan aims to reduce diesel particulates nearly 50% and nitrogen oxides 30% by 2011. Arley Baker, spokesman for the Port of Los Angeles, says the regulations could be a pattern for other ports. Houston and Shanghai also are grappling with air pollution problems, says Geraldine Knatz, the Los Angeles port's executive director."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US Arrests 150 On Drug Charges In Virginia. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (6/29) reports, "The U.S Justice Department announced yesterday the arrests of more than 150 people on charges stemming from a methamphetamine and cocaine distribution ring in Carroll and Grayson counties." The Times-Dispatch continues, "The arrests are the result of a more than two-year investigation by federal, state and local law-enforcement agencies of a loose-knit organization that spanned several states. Members of the group imported and resold methamphetamine and cocaine from Mexico, the department said." The Times-Dispatch adds, "Through the investigation, authorities seized more than 50 pounds of methamphetamine, worth more than $2.2 million; about 4 kilograms of cocaine, worth about $89,600; more than 10 pounds of marijuana, worth $20,000; and 200 firearms. … About 100 people are facing state charges and 50 are facing federal charges, including Martin Sandoval Garcia, 43, of Mexico. He is charged with conspiracy to distribute more than 500 grams of methamphetamine to more than 20 other dealers."

FBI, NYPD Arrest 14 In Crack Ring Bust. Newsday (6/29, DeStefano) reports, "FBI agents and city police arrested 14 people yesterday on charges they were part of a crack ring that operated in the area around the Langston Hughes Houses in Bushwick," including "Cameron Spencer Jr. and Jamar Curtis, had prior state robbery convictions officials." Newsday notes, "The suspects, who include men and women, were accused of conspiracy to distribute crack between October 2004 and November 2005. Six of the suspects were also accused of possessing firearms to aid in the drug trafficking, according to the charges filed in federal court. … Investigators said the conspiracy moved about a pound of crack a month."

Michigan Man Charged Following Fentanyl-Related Death. The Detroit News (6/28) reports a disabled veteran "was charged Tuesday with distributing fentanyl and causing death in a case the U.S. Attorney's Office says is unrelated to the recent spike in deaths involving a mixture of the painkiller with heroin. William Lee Sparks…faces a 20-year minimum sentence and up to life in prison if convicted on the fentanyl charge. … Sparks also is charged with providing the same user with other painkillers -- codeine, Vicodin and hydrocodone, between January 2003 and September 2005."

The Detroit Free Press (6/28, Ashenfelter, Schaefer) reports, "In an indictment unsealed Tuesday, William L. Sparks, was charged with distributing fentanyl to a man identified only as J.L.C., who died Sept. 12, 2005. Authorities said he apparently consumed gel from a skin patch containing the drug."

The Flint (MI) Journal (6/29) writes, "Federal investigators allege Sparks distributed fentanyl in September to a naval enlistee who overdosed on the drug Sept. 12."

Three Arrested In Minnesota. On its Web site, KARE-TV, Minneapolis-St. Paul (6/29) writes, "Drug enforcement authorities say fentanyl mixed with heroin has killed hundreds of people in Chicago and Detroit and now the drug combination has made its way to Minnesota. Three men have been arrested in connection to the drug's appearance on Minnesota streets. Kevin Fenner, Eric Davis and Eric Hargrove are all accused of bringing the incredibly dangerous new drug to the streets of Saint Paul. All three were in court Wednesday afternoon."

Fentanyl Found In Detroit Home. On its Web site, WDIV-TV, Detroit (6/28) reports police "have confirmed the drugs found in one Detroit home are tainted. Wayne County sheriff's officials confirmed that 40 grams of the white powder that was found in the home of Darren Reese is 100 percent fentanyl, with no other drug mixed in, according to the Wayne County Sheriff's Department. Another twist in the fentanyl bust is that one of the victims of the deadly drug combination was a former Wayne County Sheriff's deputy, according to police."

Rep. Davis Seeks Funds To Combat Drug-Related Deaths. The Oak Park, Illinois Austin Weekly (6/29) reports

Rep. Danny Davis (D-7th) "is calling on the state, local and federal governments to provide financial assistance to fight the recent rash of drug-related deaths connected to tainted heroin sold on the streets. At a press conference Monday, Davis, along with city and state health officials, called for a 'more aggressive program' for treatment on demand. Davis said the recent number of deaths in Cook County associated with heroin laced with fentanyl…is cause for concern and increased awareness."

Fentanyl Seen As A Mystery. The Christian Science Monitor (6/29, Paulson) writes, "Demand for the potent heroin-fentanyl mixture is just one factor complicating officials' efforts to contain, if not eliminate, a street drug that is raising alarms in cities in the upper Midwest and the Northeast. … Also impeding efforts to crack down on the drug is the fact that it remains something of a mystery. Officials acknowledge they have much to learn, including where the fentanyl is made. They also are concerned because, as a synthetic drug made in sophisticated labs, fentanyl may point to a new territorial opening in the war on illegal drugs."

House Backs Federal Prosecution Of Marijuana Users. The AP(6/29) reports the House yesterday "voted to continue to allow federal prosecution of those who smoke marijuana for medical purposes in states with laws that permit it."

In Alabama, Officers Accused Of Shooting Man At Wrong Address During Drug Bust. The Decatur (AL) Daily (6/28) reports officers serving a search warrant were apparently at the wrong home. "The multi-jurisdictional drug bust targeted an alleged Decatur drug trafficker's organization. According to family members, officers shot Kenneth Jamar, a man in his 50s who suffers from gout. U.S. Attorney Alice Martin said the task force did not have an arrest warrant for Jamar, but were searching for 28-year-old Jerome Wallace, who was wanted on federal drug conspiracy charges. Jamar is Wallace's uncle." The Daily goes on to cite the DEA's involvement in the case along with other agencies.

Accused Head Of Drug-Trafficking Organization Arrested. In a separate story, the Decatur (AL) Daily (6/28) reports, "Federal and local authorities say they have dismantled a Decatur man's drug-trafficking organization, which supplied dealers in North Alabama and adjoining states. Twenty-seven of the 29 suspects in the operation are illegal aliens, authorities said. The operation allegedly brought drugs into the U.S. from Mexico." U.S. Attorney Alice Martin "said Oscar Xicotencah Salomon, 34, also known as Javier Hernandez, Jose Delores and 'Lo Lo,' was allegedly the head of the organization that distributed cocaine, methamphetamine/ICE and marijuana."

Alabama's Hunstville Times (6/28) has posted on its Web site the names of 15 people arrested on drug conspiracy charges and writes that the arrests came after a two-year investigation that involved the DEA.

Indiana Man Is Sentenced In Drug Conspiracy Case. Terre Haute's Tribune-Star (6/28) reports a Terre Haute man "has been sentenced by a federal court to more than 24 years in prison for conspiracy to distribute cocaine base. Willie L. Hardiman, 40, was sentenced Monday to 292 months in prison. … His arrest last December came after a month-long investigation by the Drug Enforcement Administration" and others.

Plan Colombia Said To Have Saved Colombia. In the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (6/29), columnist Robert Novak writes, "There are no illusions…about how much Colombians owe to the U.S. government and its Plan Colombia to battle narco-terrorism. 'Plan Colombia saved Colombia,' one anti-terrorist military specialist told me, and I could find nobody here who disagreed. The U.S.-Colombian relationship bears little resemblance to what it was when I visited here 10 years ago. … The Colombian National Police and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration last week collaborated in a drug bust that was unthinkable a decade ago."

Tandy: DEA Efforts Have Increased Drug Seizures In Afghanistan. The Washington Post (6/29, Kessler, White) reports Condoleezza Rice "lavishly praised embattled Afghan President Hamid Karzai on Wednesday, arguing that his leadership shows how far Afghanistan has come since the fall of the Taliban 4 1/2 years ago. … In Washington on Wednesday, Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, who commands coalition forces in Afghanistan, told the House Armed Services Committee that there had been significant progress in the country in recent months but that "enormous obstacles" remain. … Karen P. Tandy…told the committee that opium-related trade in Afghanistan has nearly quadrupled since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001, to an estimated 4,475 metric tons a year, or 92 percent of the illicit global opium supply. Tandy said one sign of progress, however, is that DEA efforts have led to a 700 percent increase in drug seizures in Afghanistan."

The Washington Times (6/29, Seper) reports, "The head of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration yesterday told a House committee that Afghanistan's stability 'rises and falls with the drug trade,' and its production of 92 percent of the world's heroin supply has driven ongoing violence and lawlessness. But DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy said her agency is making 'great progress' in targeting the drug warlords and the Afghan criminal organizations who control the heroin supply."

DOJ_NMG_0037450

UPI (6/28) writes, "Heroin smuggling from Afghanistan to Russia has increased from 10 to 25 percent of Afghanistan's illegal output, according to the Drug Enforcement Agency. Tajikistan is the primary trans-shipment country for opiates destined for Russia, according to Karen Tandy, DEA administrator, who testified to the House Armed Services Committee Wednesday. About half the heroin that moves through Tajikistan is consumed in Russia, she said. The rest moves through Russia to Europe."

According to the AP (6/29), "The head of the Drug Enforcement Administration sees the fight against Afghanistan's poppy crop lasting another 20 to 30 years. Karen Tandy told a House committee that while progress is being made, eradicating that crop is a long-term effort."

London Think-Tank Says US Poppy Eradication Policies Failing In Afghanistan. The Canadian Press (6/28) writes, "Canadian troops and Afghan civilians are paying with their lives because of failing U.S. policies that focus on elimination of the opium poppy crop, says a report by a policy think-tank. The poppy eradication campaign has driven rural farmers into such extreme poverty they are shifting their support to the Taliban because the international community and the Afghan government are not doing enough to meet their basic needs, says the report by the London-based Senlis Council."

The CanWest News Service (6/28) reports, "The commander of Canadian combat troops in Afghanistan reacted angrily to a scathing report published today by a European think-tank that says Canada's military mission in South Asia is an impossible task that is doomed to failure. … 'It is completely off, this report, from what I've read,' said Lt.-Col. Ian Hope, commander of the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry battle group. 'It tries to place the blame for the insurgency on those who are here trying to help the Afghans instead of insurgents.'"

The UK's Independent (6/29) writes, "The UK mission in Afghanistan is in danger of failing because of 'misguided' support for American military and drug-eradication policies, an international think-tank has claimed."

Canada's CTV (6/29) also cited the report's criticisms.

Two Sentenced For Gun Thefts From Virginia Warehouse. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (6/29) reports, "U.S. District Judge Richard L. Williams took it easy yesterday on two repentant men who participated in stealing and selling handguns from a state warehouse." The Times-Dispatch continues, "Williams sentenced Antre R. Worthington, 23, to 15 months in federal prison. He gave Larry M. Logan Jr., 25, a year and one day to serve. … Both defendants pleaded guilty March 23 to conspiracy to receive and sell stolen firearms. Both sentences were the shortest recommended to Williams under federal sentencing guidelines, which take into account previous convictions, among other factors." The Times-Dispatch adds, "Two other defendants in the case, Ralphfield C. Sinkler, 26, and Donald M. Cotton, 23, pleaded guilty to the same charge in May. They are scheduled for sentencing by Williams on Aug. 23. All four defendants are from metropolitan Richmond. … Worthington and Sinkler worked at the Virginia Department of General Services surplus goods warehouse in Richmond and teamed up to steal the .38-caliber revolvers a few at a time starting last summer, according to court documents. … Authorities say 55 revolvers were stolen. Some of them have been recovered and others have been turning up at crime scenes or police have taken them off criminals and others not permitted to have firearms. Some may still be on the street."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Judges Come Under Fire For Rulings. McClatchy Newspapers (6/29, Taylor) reports, "After Islamic militants murdered Seemab Shah's father, she said, they came for her. Terrified, Shah left her newborn son in the care of relatives and fled Pakistan for the United States. … She beseeched a U.S. immigration judge to grant her asylum. As proof of the danger to her family, she presented the court with her father's death certificate and newspaper photos of him lying in a pool of blood. … Despite the evidence, Judge Donald Ferlise concluded that Shah's father wasn't dead. Rejecting Shah's story as 'totally incredible,' he denied her request to remain in the United States." McClatchy continues, "But Shah, 33, isn't going home anytime soon. The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia concluded that Ferlise inexplicably had ignored undisputed evidence of her father's death. The court reversed his decision and ordered another judge to hear the case. In May, Ferlise was removed from hearing cases. … Ferlise's ruling and similar decisions by other immigration judges have come under intense scrutiny by federal appeals courts. A review by McClatchy Newspapers has found that appeals courts have sent back dozens of rulings by immigration judges over the last two years, calling many of them biased and unjust. In one recent rebuke, an appeals court panel deemed an asylum decision 'incomprehensible.' Another panel called an immigration ruling 'pure supposition.' … The appeals courts also have singled out judges for what they've called rude and bullying behavior. One appeals court panel reversed a decision because, it said, the judge acted like a 'prosecutor anxious to pick holes' in immigrants' stories instead of an impartial jurist." … The appeals-court judges' unusually sharp tone has prompted calls for an overhaul of the immigration courts, the forum of last resort for many of the world's refugees who flee to the United States from repressive governments that may have tortured and imprisoned them for their beliefs. … Responding to the criticism, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales launched a review of the immigration courts in January. Gonzales, who oversees the immigration judges, is expected to make recommendations in the next few months on how to improve the court system."

At Alleged War Criminal's Immigration Trial, Jurors Told Of Pre-War Balkan History. The Boston Globe (6/29, Tench, 484K) reports, "The trial of Marko Boskic, a Bosnian immigrant and alleged war criminal living as a construction worker in Peabody, resumed yesterday with the testimony of history and US intelligence specialists who gave jurors a lesson on what led up to a 1995 massacre of more than 1,000 Muslims in the war-torn Balkans." Boskic "has been charged with five counts of lying to federal officials and concealing on immigration forms his role" in the Srebrenica massacre, but "defense attorney Max Stern told the jury Tuesday that Boskic…did not lie in the documents and that he was forced to join the 10th Sabotage Detachment…while he was a prisoner at a Serbian concentration camp. If he didn't join he would have been killed, Stern said."

White House Declares Cannon Win A Victory For Bush Immigration Plan. CNN's The Situation Room (628, Blitzer) reported, "He looked to be in danger right up until primary day, but the Utah Republican Congressman Chris Cannon survived a challenge over his support for the President's immigration reform policy." CNN (Henry) added, "The White House is declaring this is a clear victory for the President's comprehensive approach border security plus guest worker program. And the President today immediately tried to pivot off this win and take another run at striking a compromise." Bush "tried to seize the moment by summoning a leading conservative, Indiana Congressman Mike Pence for an Oval Office meeting with the President and Vice President to discuss Pence's compromise legislation that first tightens the US borders and gets illegal immigrants to leave the country temporarily."

The Washington Times (6/29, Hurt, 90K) headlines its story "Bush Carries Cannon To Victory In Utah," and reports, "It was Rep. Chris Cannon's name on the Republican primary ballot here Tuesday, but it was President Bush's resilient popularity in this conservative state that helped him beat back a challenge based almost entirely on his stance on immigration reform." Cannon's "lopsided win -- with 32,306 votes (56 percent) to 25,589 votes (44 percent) for Mr. Jacob -- vindicates the immigration policies of Mr. Bush and Mr. Cannon," challenger John Jacob told the Washington Times.

Roll Call (6/29, Duran) remarks on the "surprisingly strong margin" for Cannon, and the New York Times/AP (6/29) runs a brief report in which Cannon is quoted saying, "I hope what it means is Republicans look at this and realize we don't have to be divided on the issue of illegal immigration."

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (6/29, 2.11M) says Cannon's win "has national significance because he had been targeted for political extinction by immigration restrictionists in his own party and the conservative media. … Republican leaders in the House have convinced themselves that a tough anti-immigration stance is key to holding on to their majority in November. And they cite GOP Representative Brian Bilbray's special election victory earlier this month in California as evidence that demonizing illegal aliens is a political winner." But "Mr. Bilbray didn't even capture 50% of the vote in a safe GOP district against a Democrat, while Mr. Cannon has now survived a single-issue immigration assault from a well-financed fellow Republican. GOP voters are smarter than GOP Members think they are."

Senate Conservatives Seek To Resurrect Isakson Border Security Plan. The Hill (6/29, Allen) reports, "Conservative critics of the Senate's immigration bill are trying to resurrect Sen. Johnny Isakson's plan to predicate immigration reforms on federal certification that border-security measures have been implemented." Isakson "lost a floor vote on his amendment, 40-55, last month, but he says he now has the votes to support the plan and would like it to be the basis for conference negotiations, which have been forestalled by legislative and parliamentary conflicts." The Hill adds, "Several conservatives said yesterday that they are willing to consider a more comprehensive immigration bill if Isakson's trigger is implemented. 'There are lots of ways to get there, but looking the other way on border security is not' one of them, Isakson said." But "there is disagreement among the conservatives over how best to quash Senate provisions that would allow many of the illegal immigrants already here to become citizens."

Roll Call (6/29, Ben Pershing, Billings) reports "Republicans in both the House and Senate said the two chambers appeared to be moving slightly closer toward the possibility of an immigration reform deal." Roll Call terms the Isakson move "an olive branch" from "a handful of leading conservative Senate Republicans offered." Led by Isakson, "a half-dozen Republicans who are taking a hard line of making border security the first priority in any bill said positions are softening in the Senate on the highly charged issue. They argued that as long as border security was at the center of legislation, they would be willing to look at a temporary guest-worker program and potentially other aspects of comprehensive reform to deal with the millions of undocumented immigrants in the country."

Boehner Said To Remain Strongly Opposed To Senate Bill. The Washington Times (6/29, Fagan, Dinan, 90K) reports, "The House majority leader yesterday refused to budge from demanding a strong border-security bill and would not embrace Senate talk of broad legislation that would trigger a guest-worker program and other immigration changes once the borders are secure. 'I'm not going to negotiate this bill -- between the House and Senate -- through the press,' Rep. John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, said after he was asked repeatedly about recent Senate developments." Boehner "said House leaders instead will continue their plan to hold hearings next month to highlight flaws in the Senate-passed immigration bill, which includes citizenship for millions of illegal aliens, and the strengths of the House bill."

Shadegg Measure Would Increase Visas For Skilled Workers. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (6/28, 2.11M) reported, "In a move that high-tech groups predict could break the impasse over immigration legislation, Arizona's John Shadegg, a member of the House leadership, says he'll introduce legislation to increase visas and citizenship opportunities for skilled workers."

DHS Official Says Border Intelligence Strategy In Early Stages. The AP (6/29, Jordan) reports that Homeland Security Department intelligence chief Charles Allen told the House Homeland Security Committee that "years without an intelligence strategy to secure U.S. borders resulted in uncoordinated and sometimes incomplete threat information about immigrants," and "the department is in the early stages of completing a comprehensive border intelligence strategy." He admitted, "we should have done more earlier," and that "only over the past year has the Bush administration begun to develop plans to analyze border security gaps." However, Allen added, "we are now at this vigorously."

Snow Says "Whole Array Of Things" Required To Secure Border. White House Press Secretary Tony Snow was asked on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (6/28) if the 6,000 National Guard troops sent to the Mexican border are enough to secure the border. Snow said, "No, no. As a matter of fact, what you do is you use a whole array of things. In some places you're going to need fences. In some places, you're going to need border patrol agents and some of these God-forsaken places I've been telling you about, technical means." Snow added, "President Bush has actually been beefing up border patrol for a considerable period of time."

Dean Tells LULAC Convention That GOP "Scapegoating" Immigrants. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (6/29, Borowski, 266K) reports Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean "harshly condemned Republicans on the immigration issue Wednesday and called on Hispanic voters to help put his party back in power this fall." In a speech "at the national convention of the League of United Latin American Citizens, meeting this week in downtown Milwaukee, Dean accused Republicans of 'scapegoating' illegal immigrants." Dean said, "They're trying to do to immigrants what they did to gay and lesbian Americans in 2004, and that is wrong. Being an American means standing up for what is right. Immigrant bashing and scapegoating of any American is wrong, and we won't do it." The Journal Sentinel adds the "comments opened a day of politics and fund raising for Dean in Milwaukee. Later, he attended a fund-raiser for the state Democratic Party at the Holiday Inn City Centre expected to draw up to 300 people and raise about $10,000."

TAX:

IRS Locked In $1 Billion Dispute With Symantec. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Drucker) reports, "Symantec Corp., a large U.S. software company, is in a $1 billion court dispute with the Internal Revenue Service involving dealings among two affiliated companies." The Journal continues, "In a petition filed with the U.S. Tax Court on Monday, Symantec said the IRS is seeking more than $757 million in back taxes owed by Veritas Software Corp., a company acquired by Symantec in 2005. The IRS is also seeking $303 million in penalties." The Journal adds, "The fight is over the company's formula for 'transfer pricing' a complex set of rules determining how companies set prices, fees and cost-allocation arrangements between their operations in different tax jurisdictions. … In Symantec's case, the dispute is over the fees and cost-allocation arrangements between Veritas and an Irish subsidiary. The IRS contends that licensing fees paid by the Irish subsidiary to Veritas in the U.S. were too low and that Veritas credited the U.S. business with too much of the cost of developing certain technology, according to the petition. Both of those had the effect of increasing the income of Veritas's subsidiary in Ireland at the expense of income in the U.S., consequently lowering the U.S. tax bills paid by the company in 2000 and 2001. … In its petition, Symantec called the IRS's proposed income allocations 'arbitrary, capricious, and unreasonable.'"

House Estate Tax Bill Said To Hurt Charities. The New York Times (6/29, Norris, 1.19M) reports, "If the estate tax bill approved last week by the House becomes law, it will benefit wealthy families and cost the government a lot of tax revenue. But there are likely to be other winners and losers as well." Charities "may find it harder to get donations and some heirs may have to wait years or even decades longer to collect inheritances, while surviving wives or husbands receive larger inheritances." States that impose estate taxes "will face new pressures to repeal them, because the federal government will no longer reduce its estate tax bill for those who owe state estate tax." The bill "faces an uncertain fate in the Senate, where a move to cut off debate on a bill to repeal estate taxes fell just three votes short. House leaders, who had wanted a complete repeal, pushed through the bill that was approved in the hope that it would pick up additional Senate votes."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Sends 10 Judicial Nominations To Senate. The Washington Times (6/29, Harper, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "President Bush yesterday sent 10 judicial nominations to the Senate, including names for four seats on the U.S. Court of Appeals, reports Stephen Dinan of The Washington Times. … Democrats and Republicans on Capitol Hill said that none of the nominees appears to be contentious but that they will be vetted thoroughly."

The AP (6/29) reports, "President Bush on Wednesday sent four nominations to the Senate to fill vacancies on federal appeals courts." The AP continues, "Nominated were Kent Jordan of Delaware for the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals; Debra Ann Livingston of New York for the 2nd Circuit; and Raymond Kethledge and Stephen Joseph Murphy III, both of Michigan, for the 6th Circuit." The AP adds, "Murphy, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Michigan, attended Marquette University and earned a law degree from St. Louis University. He has been public arbitrator for the National Association of Securities Dealers, adjunct professor at Ave Maria School of Law and counsel at General Motors Corp. and has worked in the tax division of the Justice Department."

Dole Urges Up-Own-Down Vote For Boyle. Sen. Elizabeth Dole writes in the Washington Times (6/29, 90K), "If you want evidence proving that the judicial confirmation process is in serious need of repair, Exhibit A would be Judge Terrence Boyle of North Carolina. Nearly 15 years ago, Judge Boyle was nominated for a seat on the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals by the first President Bush. President George W. Bush has since renominated Judge Boyle three times for the same seat -- once in 2001, a second time in 2003 and a third time in 2005. Judge Boyle was finally approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee a year ago, yet he continues to patiently await action by the full Senate." Dole says "the hard-core left is opposing the Boyle nomination, despite the fact that the American Bar Association has given him its highest possible rating." Boyle "deserves an up-or-down vote on his nomination. I am confident that the American people will reject this misguided attempt to tarnish his reputation and will wholeheartedly support his nomination."

Paulson Confirmed As New Treasury Secretary. The CBS Evening News (6/28, story 8, 0:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "On Capitol Hill, Senate Republicans and Democrats were unanimous today in confirming President Bush's choice of Henry Paulson as the next Treasury Secretary. Paulson is a Wall Street executive. He replaces John Snow who's held the Treasury post since 2003."

The Washington Post (6/29, A9, Murray, 744K) reports, "Depending on how Republicans fare in the midterm elections, Paulson could help to jump-start several Bush legislative initiatives that have stalled, including tax changes." The Treasury Department" is evaluating recommendations from a tax reform panel convened by Bush, and Paulson said one of his top priorities will be to complete that process and to present to Bush recommendations for 'a fair and simple tax system.'"

The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Wells, Price, 2.11M) says "Paulson, the outgoing chairman and chief executive at Goldman Sachs, broke little new ground in his testimony before the committee Tuesday. His responses on all questions were in line with Bush administration positions previously staked out by John Snow." He "spoke in favor of the 2001 reductions in taxes on dividends and capital gains, crediting them with preventing a more severe US economic retrenchment following the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks."

David Wessel writes his Wall Street Journal column (6/29), "Given the erosion of the Treasury's clout, the partisanship that blocks compromise and the ticking clock on the Bush presidency, Mr. Paulson faces (at least) three big questions. Can he square the deficit circle? … Can he steer anything through Congress? … Can he find the right words to cushion the dollar's fall?" Wessel adds, "Of course, luck helps, and there's an early sign he may be lucky. No senator asked Mr. Paulson (net worth: north of $700 million) to defend repeal of the estate tax."

State-Justice-Commerce Spending Bill Nears House Passage. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Rogers, 2.11M) reports the $62.6 billion State-Justice-Commerce appropriations bill "neared House passage after moderate Republicans joined Democrats in adding money back for legal services to the poor and small-business loan subsidies." Forty Republicans "broke ranks on a 237-185 vote shifting $25 million within accounts to raise the Legal Services Corporation budget to $338.8 million for the new fiscal year that begins Oct. 1." The margin "was much closer in the case of the Small Business Administration funding, but Republican defections were again pivotal as 17 joined Democrats on a 214-207 vote adding $40 million for SBA in hopes of reducing the fees charged on start-up loans under the 7(a) program."

Flake's Effort To Rein In Earmarks Noted. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Rogers, 2.11M) reports conservative Republican Rep. Jeff Flake is "a political guerrilla with a smile, a ringer for actor Owen Wilson who crashes not weddings but his own Republican Party." Since May, Flake has "grabbed the spotlight with the 'Flake Hour' -- a tradition at the end of debate on spending bills, in which he asks colleagues to come to the House floor and explain why taxpayers should pay for pet projects in their districts." Like "no one else, he has taken on the scandal-plagued House Appropriations Committee, a Republican power structure assigned the task of earmarking billions of dollars for home-state projects among members this election year." Flake said, "I don't think our leadership fully appreciates the trouble we are in." He added that Republicans are cutting their throats politically by continuing to sanction earmarks as part of an 'all politics is local' re-election strategy. The approach, he says, sacrifices the party's credibility with voters who want more control of spending."

CQ (6/28, Wolfe) reports the House "found itself in the uncomfortable position of having to fix the 2005 highway law (PL 109-59) that came up short on research funds because of too many earmarks. A vote was expected late Wednesday or Thursday." Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., "who has led the fight this year against earmarks in appropriations bills, criticized lawmakers on the floor Wednesday for what he described as an out-of-control system that allowed an 'over-earmarked' highway bill to pass."

Dubious Military Project Linked To Moran Contributions. NBC Nightly News (6/28, story 8, 2:50, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported in a "Fleecing of America" segment, "It's called 'Project M,' for magnetic levitation, a technology conceived ten years ago to make submarines quieter. It started out as one of thousands of routine research projects in the huge defense budget." So "who wanted it?" Winslow Wheeler, Center for Defense Information: "Certainly the contractor, Vibration And Sound Solutions Limited, and the local congressman, Virginia Democrat Jim Moran, a power on the Appropriations Committee, who kept pushing for it." Mitchell: "But after five years of study, in 2001 the Navy decided it didn't need the high-priced technology." Still, "year after year, it kept popping up. The contractor simply repackaged it to smooth the ride on high-speed boats used by Navy SEALs and all-terrain vehicles for the Marines. What have they produced: Some prototypes of shock-absorbing seats." The "total cost to taxpayers so far, $37 million. Campaign records show that the company's president and his wife contributed $17,000 to Congressman Moran since the project began -- all legal."

Bush Administration Unveils Stricter Welfare Rules. ABC World News Tonight (6/28, story 8, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Today, the Bush Administration announced the biggest changes to Federal welfare rules in ten years. Those changes designed to establish one national standard and cut the welfare rolls. States are going to have to meet stricter definition of what qualifies as job training or work. And keep closer track of welfare recipients."

The Washington Times (6/29, Wetzstein, 90K) reports, "Losing weight, exercising, getting a massage, reading motivational books and shopping with a friend are all 'worthy activities,' but they no longer can count as work under federal welfare regulations released yesterday." Wade F. Horn, Assistant Secretary for Children and Families in the Health and Human Services Department (HHS), says "healthy adults on welfare should expect to spend at least 20 hours a week doing things that the average American thinks of as work -- such as earning a paycheck, going to job interviews and performing supervised community service." A "legal loophole in the landmark 1996 welfare law allowed many states to put only a small portion of their welfare caseloads to work. As a result, many adults in the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) program didn't go to work."

USA Today (6/29, Wolf, 2.31M) reports, "Liberals and conservatives agree that new welfare regulations issued by the Bush administration Wednesday will further reduce the nation's welfare rolls. They disagree, however, on whether that's good or bad." Conservatives, "such as Ron Haskins of the Brookings Institution say tough new requirements for many of the 1.9 million families remaining on welfare will force them to get the skills they need to get private-sector jobs." But liberals, "such as Sharon Parrott of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, say the rules are likely to push more families into deep poverty by making welfare harder to get and by encouraging states to cut caseloads further."

The Washington Post (6/29, A2, Fletcher, 744K) reports Administration officials "and other supporters said new rules are necessary if the nation is going to continue reducing welfare rolls, which have shrunk nearly 60 percent in the decade since landmark changes in federal welfare law were enacted in 1996." The 1996 law, "which created the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) program, set what lawmakers thought were tough work rules requiring half of adult welfare recipients in each state to go to work or be enrolled in job training. But the law allowed the percentage to be reduced as states sharply decreased welfare caseloads." The Post adds the proposal "would require 50 percent of adult welfare recipients on the rolls to be working or be in job training programs by October, or states would face financial penalties. State government advocates and social service groups criticized the proposed rules -- which are scheduled to go into effect in October, pending public comment -- calling them inflexible and shortsighted."

Group Alleges Taylor's Bank Ownership Violates House Ethics Rules. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Wilke, 2.11M) reports as the House ethics committee "resumes its work after more than a year of inactivity, partisan and government-reform groups are expected to seek investigations of a number of powerful lawmakers." The nonprofit Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington "charged that Rep. Charles Taylor, chairman of the Appropriations Committee's Interior and Environment Subcommittee, violated congressional rules in his ownership of U.S. and Russian banks." The complaint "against Rep. Taylor alleges that his ownership of Blue Ridge Savings & Loan in North Carolina, and a Russian bank, Commercial Bank of Ivanovo, violates House rules prohibiting members from providing services involving fiduciary relationships. It also asserts that his ownership of the Russian bank since 2003 has amounted to an improper use of his congressional office and charges that he did favors for corporate lobbyists and contributors."

Specter Criticizes Bush Use Of Signing Statements. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter said on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (6/28) that by issuing signing statements, President Bush "is revising the legislation or ignoring the legislation. And part of the duty of the Judiciary Committee is constitutional oversight. And the Constitution provides that the president can veto a bill, and he can come to us and say I'm not going to agree with it unless you put this qualifying language in. But just unilaterally, on his own, after the bill is submitted, passes both Houses to strike certain parts of it and ignore other parts…that is not in conformance with the Constitution." Specter added, "I think it is true that no president has used the signing statements as often or in the same direction that President Bush has. And I believe if he doesn't like provisions of the bill, he ought to tell us what he doesn't like, and then he can veto it."

Gingrich, Johnson Want Legislative Oversight Meeting With Democrats. The Hill (6/29, Cusack) reports after "angering some Republican investigators on Capitol Hill during a contentious meeting this spring, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) and a senior Bush administration official want to hold another forum on legislative oversight. But this time they want to invite Democrats." A bipartisan meeting "focusing on oversight of the executive branch with White House official Clay Johnson present would no doubt lead to partisan fireworks — especially during an election year." Gingrich, who "helped organize the April 7 meeting with GOP staff investigators, acknowledged that letting Democrats in the room could trigger conflict. However, Gingrich suggested that the discussion probably would yield positive results." The Hill adds Capitol Hill officials "predict that a bipartisan meeting would be even testier and would likely deteriorate into a mudslinging confrontation."

Bush Not Getting Credit For Economy. The Los Angeles Times (6/29, McManus, 958K) reports that all year long, "in speeches and briefings and visits to factories and shops, President Bush and his aides have tried to convince Americans that the economy is in good shape — and that the president deserves some credit for that. That effort is not making much headway, a Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll has found." Americans are "closely divided on whether the economy is in good shape, with 50% saying it is doing well and 47% saying it is doing badly, the poll found." And Bush "doesn't get much credit for the economy's relative health, the new survey found. Of respondents, 39% say they approve of the president's handling of the economy and 19% say they think the economy is better because of his policies — numbers that are basically unchanged since the beginning of the year." The Times/Bloomberg poll "interviewed 1,321 adults nationwide between Saturday and Tuesday under the supervision of Times Poll Director Susan Pinkus. The survey's margin of sampling error is plus or minus three percentage points."

Survey Finds Federal Workers Uninformed About Retirement Planning. The Washington Post (6/29, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "More than half of federal employees expect to retire before age 62, with almost four in 10 looking to retire at 59 or earlier, according to a survey conducted for the Office of Personnel Management. But less than half have calculated how much they need to save for a comfortable retirement, and only two in 10 federal employees have a professional financial adviser to help with retirement planning." OPM "commissioned the survey as part of an effort to address concerns in Congress that federal employees too often receive incomplete retirement counseling or start their retirement planning later than recommended. The survey will be used to develop a 'retirement readiness index profile' for government workers that will show them where they stand compared with an age-based group of peers and will help them consider the various factors, including finances, that go into successful retirement planning."

Discovery To Launch Over Objections Of NASA Safety Officer. The Washington Post (6/29, A1, Gugliotta, 744K) reports in a front page story that the space shuttle Discovery "is poised for launch Saturday for what NASA engineers hope will be an uneventful mission, knowing that another mishap, even a minor one, could doom the shuttle program and deflate President Bush's ambitions for future space exploration." The shuttle is "flying without approval by NASA's top safety officer. He voted 'no-go' for the mission at the final flight readiness review because of concerns that unacceptably large pieces of foam insulation could break away from the external fuel tank during launch and damage the orbiter." Still, chief safety officer Bryan O'Connor "and a fellow dissenter, NASA chief engineer Chris Scolese, agreed in the end with the judgment of NASA Administrator Michael D. Griffin that the hazard does not pose an unacceptable risk to the crew -- who, if necessary, could find 'safe haven' on the international space station while awaiting a rescue flight."

LATimes Says NASA Should Scrap Shuttle Program. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (6/29, 958K) says NASA "plans to launch the space shuttle Discovery on Saturday despite warnings that it still hasn't fixed the problem that killed seven astronauts aboard the shuttle Columbia in 2003." Instead of "risking another tragic or humiliating setback Saturday, NASA should abandon the shuttle and focus on more productive missions. The shuttle was intended as a reusable spacecraft that would require only routine maintenance between missions. But NASA has been working on the foam problem for more than three years. It's becoming increasingly clear that the issue with the shuttle isn't age but a design flaw."

55 Faith-Based Community Groups Split $4 Million In Employment Training Funds. The Washington Times (6/29, Hoover, 90K) reports, "Fifty-five faith-based and community organizations -- chosen from 557 applicants -- will split $4 million in grants designated for grass-roots groups to 'help hard-to-serve populations prepare for and succeed in employment opportunities,' the Department of Labor announced yesterday." Because "grass-roots groups know more about local businesses and the problems that specific individuals have in finding jobs, they are able to 'provide that critical personal touch that can make the difference in these individuals' lives,' said Jedd Medefind, the director of the department's Center for Faith-Based and Community Initiatives."

Mineta's Preference For Water Recreation Noted. The Washington Post (6/29, Blumenfeld, 744K) reports that for Treasury Secretary Norman Mineta, "whose office windows do not open, a few hours of river winds revive him. Next week he will step down as the longest-serving transportation secretary in U.S. history, the official charged with the safety of all trucks, buses, trains and planes. When he pilots the Rhode Runner, a 29-foot 1986 Chris-Craft cuddy, he can take off his shirt, clip on his Leatherman knife, and cruise, drop anchor or drift. And one more thing. 'I imagine I'm a pirate,' Norm said. 'Of the Caribbean.'"

Jenna Bush Said To Be Taking Teaching Job In Latin America. The Washington Post (6/29, C1, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column that Jenna Bush "has been quietly making plans over recent months to leave D.C. for a teaching job in Latin America, most likely around the end of summer." The move reflects Bush's "growing seriousness…yet also offers an escape from the Washington spotlight she and sister Barbara always have seemed to resent. Last week marked her final day at the Mount Pleasant charter school where she taught for a year and a half."

Isakson Says Pension Measure Not Bailout For Airline Industry. In a Wall Street Journal (6/29, 2.11M) letter to the editor, Sen. Johnny Isakson says, "I take great exception to the premise of your June 27 editorial 'Pension Crash Landing' that the pension reform Congress is negotiating will result in a taxpayer bailout of the airlines. In fact, this proposed pension reform will protect the American taxpayer." Congress' failure to overhaul pension laws "will almost certainly lead to companies defaulting on their pension obligations and shifting that burden onto taxpayers. You say it's wrong to give airlines with defined-benefit plans additional time to meet their pension obligations. Don't you want those airlines to honor their commitment to their employees?"

Congress Seen As Avoiding Responsibility In Election Year. In a USA Today (6/29, 2.31M) debate, conservative columnist Cal Thomas and liberal Democratic strategist Bob Beckelis debate congressional behavior during election years. Beckelis said, "You would think that with Iraq, a nuclear threat from Iran, $3 a gallon gas, immigration and a deficit out of control, that Congress would be busy. Bless their collective hearts, they're working hard — at getting re-elected. So what did the Senate debate this month? Constitutional amendments against gay marriage and burning the flag, and a pork-laden spending bill. The House? They worked overtime to end estate taxes for people like Paris Hilton. Voters give Congress job ratings below 25%. It's no wonder." Thomas added, "I agree with you on flag burning (most flags are made in China anyway) and on pork projects (though Democrats are equal opportunity porkers). But the politics of same-sex marriage began with those who are asserting a 'right' that violates the dictionary, historical tradition, scripture and common sense."

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Expected To Raise Rates Again Today. The Washington Post (6/29, D1, Henderson, 744K) reports, "The Federal Reserve is on track to lift its benchmark interest rate again today for a 17th consecutive quarter-percentage-point increase over 25 months, making this the longest sustained campaign on record of raising interest rates. So why isn't the economy choking by now?" The Post adds, "The short answer is that money is still pretty cheap, in historical terms. But Americans are finally starting to feel the squeeze, as higher borrowing costs cool the housing market, depress automobile sales and crimp some household spending."

Stocks Up Yesterday. NBC Nightly News (6/28, story 10, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today, stocks gained back some of what they lost yesterday. The Dow was up just under 49 points [to close at 10,973.56]. Nasdaq gained more than 11 points on the day's trading [to close at 2,111.84]." USA Today (6/29, 2.31M) reports the Standard & Poor's 500 index advanced 6.80 points, or 0.5%, to 1246.00. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, McKay, 2.11M), among other newspapers, also reports the stock numbers.

Judge Says New York Must Take Over Administration Of Legal Aid For Poor. The New York Times (6/29, Hakim) reports, "Chief Judge Judith S. Kaye of New York said Wednesday that the state must take over administration of legal services to the poor, citing a crisis in the way county governments and New York City are providing legal aid in criminal cases. Judge Kaye's call came in response to a judicial commission report saying local governments were falling well short of constitutional requirements in providing legal representation to the poor, and recommended that a permanent state commission be created to take over the responsibility. … A state takeover would require legislative approval, and the Legislature has a long history of ignoring reforms proposed by Judge Kaye and the judiciary. The commission report cited such problems as overburdened defenders who, in one county, average 1,000 misdemeanors and 175 felony cases in a year, and 'grossly inadequate' financing. It also cited wide disparities in counties' spending and in the resources available to prosecutors and defenders. The state lacks standards to define what it means to provide adequate indigent defense and has no system for enforcing such standards, the report said."

Ehrlich Launches Reelection Campaign. The Washington Post (6/29, A1, Mosk, Wagner, 744K) reports in a front page story that Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. "returned to his boyhood home yesterday to launch his bid for reelection, and he plans to name his running mate this morning, a 36-year-old female Cabinet secretary who is blind." Ehrlich "made the formal reelection announcement standing on the front steps of his parents' modest brick rowhouse in the Baltimore suburb of Arbutus, telling a sun-drenched crowd that he wants to be Maryland's first Republican governor in 50 years elected to a second term. Today he is expected to embark on that effort with Kristen Cox, his secretary of disabilities, sources close to the governor said." Ehrlich is "more than halfway to his target of raising $20 million and has had a campaign operation that has been moving at full tilt for months. Yesterday, he vowed not only to keep his hold on the governor's mansion but also to realign a state that has been dominated by Democrats for most of the past 100 years." He will "spend the next five months locked in combat with Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, the Democrat who had expected an extended primary fight until his opponent, Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan, withdrew from the race last week."

46% Of Democrats "More Enthusiastic Than Usual" About 2006 Election. The Washington Times (6/29, Harper, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Democrats are already in dress rehearsal for the midterm elections, now less than five months away. According to a Pew Research poll of 1,501 adults released yesterday, 46 percent say they are 'more enthusiastic than usual' about the upcoming races -- compared with 30 percent of the Republicans." But, "only half of the Democrats are happy with their party, compared with 58 percent of Republicans."

Obama Urges Democrats To Embrace Discussions Of Faith. The AP (6/29, Espo) reports, "Sen. Barack Obama chastised fellow Democrats on Wednesday for failing to 'acknowledge the power of faith in the lives of the American people,'" and "said the party must compete for the support of evangelicals and other churchgoing Americans." Said Obama, "Not every mention of God in public is a breach to the wall of separation. Context matters. … It is doubtful that children reciting the Pledge of Allegiance feel oppressed or brainwashed as a consequence of muttering the phrase 'under God.'" USA Today (6/29, 2.31M) reports Obama said Democrats "must compete for the support of 'religious Americans and tell them what we stand for.'"

The Chicago Tribune (6/29, Goldberg, 643K) reports, "Obama spoke Wednesday of progressives' failure to handle religious issues and insisted it is time Democrats find a cure for their spiritual ills." Obama "offered his political and religious observations to a coalition of Christians gathered at the Call to Renewal conference on poverty in America." On the event's final day, Obama "was honored for his work on behalf of society's less fortunate. He said it was his work as a community organizer for Christian churches that acquainted him with his own beliefs and values." Said Obama, "At worst, some liberals dismiss religion in the public square as inherently irrational or intolerant, insisting on a caricature of religious Americans that paints them as fanatical, or thinking that the very word 'Christian' describes one's political opponents, not people of faith. … Over the long haul, I think we make a mistake when we fail to acknowledge the power of faith in the lives of the American people, and join a serious debate about how to reconcile faith with our modern, pluralistic democracy."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/28, Roberts) reported, "At stake is a huge swathe of voters across the Midwest and through the South, white evangelicals. They account for nearly one in four people who voted in 2004. And they went overwhelmingly for President Bush."

Obama Seen As Holding Promise, Peril For Democrats. In his Washington Sketch column in the Washington Post (6/29, 744K), Dana Milbank says Democratic "phenom Barack Obama, the subject of the latest presidential boomlet, was nearing the end of a thoughtful speech about religion in politics yesterday at a church in Thomas Circle when he mentioned the Sermon on the Mount." Obama said, "It's doubtful that our own Defense Department would survive its application." The Post adds, "The audience of left-leaning Christian leaders went nuts, apparently interpreting this as a barb at the Bush administration and the war in Iraq. But Obama was being rhetorical, and was not suggesting the Pentagon should surrender to the meek. Had he said such a thing during a political campaign, the other side could have used it to devastating effect." Therein "lies both the promise and peril Democrats see in the freshman senator from Illinois. Forty-four years old and smart, he is enormously charismatic -- and utterly undefined."

Electability Seen As Key Quality In 2008. In his Roll Call column (6/29), political analyst Stuart Rothenberg says that in the 2008 presidential race, "since both parties are placing an unusually high priority on nominating candidates who can beat the other's nominee, activists in each party are likely to base their decisions to an unusual degree on what the other party seems to be doing." Almost "universally, politically sophisticated Democrats have become so frustrated with their losses in 2000 and 2004 and so angry after six years of George W. Bush as president that they aren't willing to nominate someone they see as destined to lose in '08, even if they like that candidate's message or the symbolism of his or her election." Many Republicans "feel the same way. Even conservatives seem willing to support a nominee with whom they don't entirely agree, such as Arizona Sen. John McCain, if that is the only way to guarantee that New York Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton — and her husband, former President Bill Clinton — don't return to the White House. 'Electability' apparently played a significant role in the race for the 2004 Democratic presidential nomination, especially in Iowa, where Democrats concluded that Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) would make a more formidable nominee than former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean. But it's likely to be an even bigger factor in 2008."

Kondracke Says Nominating Moderates Would Reduce Partisan Warfare. In his Roll Call column (6/29), executive editor Morton Kondracke says, "Probably the best chance America has for escaping from endless partisan warfare and for getting its big problems solved is for both parties to nominate a moderate in 2008 and have them argue over issues, not ideology. Like Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney or Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) on the Republican side, vs. former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner on the Democratic." Romney and McCain "are busy identifying themselves as 'proud conservatives' these days to maintain credibility in the GOP, and Warner, too, told me, 'I desperately try to reject' the terms 'moderate' and 'centrist' because 'they seem weaker rather than stronger on the issues' whereas he wants to be 'bold.'"

Maine Economy Declined Last Year. The New York Times (6/29, Sabar, 1.19M) reports Maine was "the only state besides Louisiana to see a decline in economic activity last year, according to a new Federal Reserve study. The state lost 1,700 manufacturing jobs and 800 financial jobs, said the report, which was posted on the Web site of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston. The losses were partly offset by gains in education, health services, professional and business services, and government." Analysts said while Maine "has a consistently strong summer tourist industry, the state is struggling to retool its year-round economy after decades of mill closings."

Armstrong Takes On New Role As Cancer Research Lobbyist. USA Today (6/29, A1, Ruibal, 2.31M) reports on the front page that Lance Armstrong's "impact on" the Tour de France "was so great that his absence — and the battle to succeed him — is the biggest story of the 2006 race, which begins Saturday in Strasbourg, France. There are no American heirs apparent, and his Discovery Channel team is a decided underdog." Armstrong's life "has changed dramatically. Unlike his highly regimented Tour-training periods, there is now no typical week for Armstrong, 34. He keeps a busy schedule crammed with visits with his children in Austin, corporate promotions and the occasional mountain bike ride. Most of his time is focused on defeating the disease that almost killed him in 1996." In President Bush's "proposed 2007 budget, the annual budget for the National Cancer Institute would be cut 0.8% ($39.5 million) to $4.75 billion. This would come a year after a $31 million cut in the NCI's budget, and it would mark the first consecutive years of decreased funding since 1981 and '82, the institute says." Armstrong and "the foundation that bears his name support the NCI's effort to seek the $5.89 billion it says it needs to keep its current research programs." Armstrong says "his is a non-partisan crusade. Last year, he rode mountain bikes with Bush at the presidential ranch in Texas and made a pitch for more cancer funds. During the lobbying trip to Washington, he spoke with new White House spokesman Tony Snow — a cancer survivor — on Snow's first day in that job." But his "closest political mentor, however, is John Kerry."

Koizumi Arrives In Washington. The AP (6/29) reports that Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi arrived in Washington Wednesday for meetings with President Bush. Discussions "were expected to focus on the possible launch of a North Korean missile and on efforts to persuade the communist country to abandon its nuclear weapons program. Bush and Koizumi planned to attend a dinner Thursday in honor of the prime minister, whose term ends in September."

Knight Ridder (6/29, Schoof) reports, "Japan and the United States both have suspicious minds about North Korea's nuclear weapons program, both are intent on keeping the peace on the Korean Peninsula and between China and Taiwan, and both want to ensure that Asia isn't all shook up by China's growing prestige and economic power. At the same time, they need to find ways to cooperate on other issues, including curbing Iran's nuclear ambitions."

Bush, Koizumi To Visit Graceland. USA Today (6/29, Jackson, Benedetto, 2.31M) reports that President Bush will take Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi to Graceland Friday. The trip is "a presidential going-away present to the soon-to-retire Koizumi. The self-proclaimed Elvis fan and imitator has been one of Bush's staunchest global supporters in the war on terrorism and Iraq." USA adds, "Today, Koizumi will be treated to a morning arrival ceremony with full military honors on the White House South Lawn. He is the guest of honor at a black-tie dinner tonight."

The New York Times (6/29, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports, "The visit to the Presley manse in Memphis will follow a more sober joint meeting on Thursday in the White House." The Times calls the Graceland visit "a case study of Mr. Bush's own brand of diplomacy, one that relies on personal chemistry and perks."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/29, LaFranchi, 61K) reports that the trip "also suggests how much Bush appreciates Koizumi's support on issues like Iraq and international terrorism."

Strengths Seen In Bush's Personal Diplomacy. Richard Wolffe and Holly Bailey wrote on Newsweek's (6/28) web site that "even more important than the journey to Memphis is what the trip says about Bush's exceptionally personal form of diplomacy. … As trivial as it sounds, there are certain strengths to this kind of one-on-one diplomacy. There's little doubt among Japan analysts that the close relationship between Bush and Koizumi has been critical in improving relations between the United States and Japan."

Draft Foreign Aid Bill Cuts $2.4 Billion From Bush Request. CQ (6/28, Starks) reported, "Senate appropriators on Thursday will consider a draft foreign aid spending bill for fiscal 2007 that would lop off $2.4 billion from President Bush's $33.7 billion discretionary request, reflecting a congressional shift in budget priorities from defense and programs abroad to domestic ones." CQ added, "The biggest victim of that shift is expected to be the Millennium Challenge Account (MCA), President Bush's signature program that aids developing countries that demonstrate good governance and follow free-market principles. … Congressional aides said the remainder of the reductions would be spread across other programs, such as the requested $75 million for the conflict response fund, which assists unstable or 'failed' countries."

Israel Intensifies Gaza Offensive. Israel stepped up its offensive in Gaza Wednesday in an effort to seek the release and safe return of a kidnapped Israel soldier. ABC World News Tonight (6/28, story 4, 2:10, Wright, 8.78M) reported, "Israel's government today promised extreme measures in its effort to rescue the kidnapped soldier. And the Israeli military is making good on that threat. Potentially more troubling -- the conflict is widening. Today, Israeli war planes went all the way to Syria, to buzz the Syrian president's summer home. And the Syrians shot back at them. Bashar Assad actively supports the militant group holding Israel's soldier."

The CBS Evening News (6/28, story 3, 1:45, Simon, 7.66M) reported, "Unless and until that soldier is delivered live back to Israel, it's going to get worse. People in Gaza are going to suffer more. If the soldier turns up dead, everyone in Hamas better hit the ground running because the Israeli assassination teams are going to spring into action, including in Damascus, which is what that overflight signaled today -- that they know where the leaders are."

The CBS Evening News (6/28, story 2, 2:45, MacVicar, 7.66M) reported, "What Israeli forces tried to do last night by cutting bridges and moving ground forces close to the Egyptian border was to contain the militants with their Israeli hostage into one corner of the Gaza Strip, restricting their movement. For the people of Gaza, it has also launched the beginnings of a new humanitarian crisis."

NBC Nightly News (6/28, story 7, 2:25, Fletcher, 9.87M) reported, "Palestinian militants today stepped up the psychological pressure too, claiming they have kidnapped two more Israelis, including a Jewish settler they are threatening to behead if Israeli doesn't leave Gaza. Israel today also took the war of nerves to Syria. Fighter jets caused sonic booms over a palace of the Syrian president, warning him to stop sheltering the Palestinian who ordered the kidnapping of the Israeli soldier.

USA Today (6/29, Gutman, 2.31M) reports, "Palestinian witnesses told the Associated Press that Israeli tanks began moving into northern Gaza early today. Israel's invasion of Gaza started before dawn Wednesday, when Israeli jets knocked out three bridges on key north-south roads and blew up electrical transformers, knocking out electricity to many of Gaza's estimated 1.3 million residents. Israel was hoping those attacks would prevent the kidnappers of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, 19, from moving him to another location."

Knight Ridder (6/29, Nissenbaum) reports, "Israeli forces cut off power throughout much of Gaza, destroyed key bridges and seized the Gaza Strip's defunct airport near the Egyptian border in southern Gaza. Israeli helicopters and artillery kept up a steady rain of fire throughout southern Gaza, and scores of Palestinians fled their homes ahead of the advancing troops. There were indications that Israel planned to open a second front soon in northern Gaza."

The AP (6/29, Gutkin) reports, "No deaths or injuries were reported in the incursion, launched early Wednesday in southern Gaza. But Palestinians filled up on basic supplies after warplanes knocked out electricity, raising the specter of a humanitarian crisis. The Hamas-led government warned of 'epidemics and health disasters' because of damaged water pipes to central Gaza and the lack of power to pump water."

Israeli Forces Detain Hamas Ministers. The New York Times (6/29, Fisher, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "In the West Bank city of Ramallah early on Thursday, Israeli forces detained 8 ministers of the 24-member Hamas-led cabinet and 20 lawmakers, including Deputy Prime Minister Nasser Shaer and Labor Minister Mohammed Barghouti, The Associated Press reported, citing security officials."

The AP (6/29) report this morning says Israeli forces "arrested one-third of the Hamas-led Palestinian Cabinet and 20 lawmakers early Thursday and pressed their incursion into Gaza." The AP adds, "Palestinian witnesses told The Associated Press that Israeli tanks and bulldozers entered northern Gaza before daybreak Thursday, adding a second front to the Israeli action in Gaza that began early Wednesday when thousands of Israeli troops crossed into southern Gaza."

Israeli Warplanes Buzz Assad's Home. A separate AP (6/28, Abu-Nasr) reports, "Israel said its warplanes buzzed the summer residence of President Bashar Assad Wednesday in a bold warning to the country that shelters the political leader of Hamas, the Islamic militant group holding an Israeli soldier captive in the Gaza Strip."

The Washington Times (6/29, Mitnick, 90K) reports that the move was intended "to intimidate the patron of Hamas militants."

Palestinian Militants Claim They Killed Israeli Settler. The Los Angeles Times (6/29, King, Ellingwood, 958K) reports, "Palestinian militants said they had killed a Jewish settler from the West Bank whom they previously claimed to have abducted, and local media reported that a separate armed group said it had kidnapped another Israeli civilian."

US Affirms Israel's "Right To Defend Itself." The AP (6/29, Schweid) reports that the Bush Administration yesterday affirmed "Israel's right to defend itself against acts of terror and called on the president of the Palestinian Authority and Egypt to help resolve a crisis provoked by the abduction of an Israeli soldier. The White House and State Department declined to take a position on Israel's pressure offensive in southern Gaza that has knocked out electricity and water supplies for most of the 1.3 million Palestinians who live in Gaza. But spokesmen again condemned the abduction of an Israeli corporal and said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and U.S. diplomats 'continue to do everything we can...to bring this crisis to a peaceful resolution.'"

NYTimes Says Hamas Responsible For Latest Escalation By Israel. An editorial in the New York Times (6/29, 1.19M) says, "The responsibility for this latest escalation rests squarely with Hamas, whose military wing tunneled into Israel on Sunday, killed two Israeli soldiers and kidnapped another. This was a follow-up to a declaration earlier this month by Hamas's political leadership that the group's 16-month intermittent cease-fire would no longer be observed. Under the circumstances, an Israeli military response was inevitable."

LATimes Urges Israel To Exercise Restraint. The Los Angeles Times (6/29, 958K) editorializes, "The frustration that triggered the Israeli military's incursion into Gaza on Wednesday is understandable." The Times urges Israel to Exercise restraint, noting, "It isn't that the world questions Israelis' right to feel frustrated, or to retaliate. It is simply that we cringe at the sight of a disproportionate response that could undermine prospects of ending the cycle of violence.

US Wants Iran Response By Mid-July. The US and its allies want Iran To respond by mid-July to a proposal designed to ease international tensions over Iran's nuclear programs. The Washington Times (6/29, Sands, 90K) reports, "Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad suggested earlier this month that Tehran would not reply until Aug. 22, but the United States and its close allies say the delay is unacceptable. … Turkish Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul, in a visit to Tehran over the weekend, told Iranian leaders privately that the August date was unacceptable and that Iran should give its answer before the G-8 summit, Nabi Sensoy, Turkish ambassador to the United States, said in an interview at The Washington Times this week."

Iran To Give Revolutionary Guards Lucrative Gas Deal. The Wall Street Journal (6/29, Kalantari, Jones, 2.11M) reports, "Iran is about to award a lucrative gas deal to the country's Revolutionary Guards, a senior Iranian oil official said, in the latest sign of turbulence in the nation's huge but underfinanced energy industry. The official said Iranian contractor Ghorb will be awarded a $2.3 billion pact to develop two future phases of Iran's South Pars gas field. Ghorb is an affiliate of the Revolutionary Guards, Iran's elite militia. The official was unable to give the timing of the signing of the deal."

UN Urged To Include Human Rights On Iran Agenda. Hadi Ghaemi, Iran researcher for Human Rights Watch, writes in the New York Times (6/29, 1.19M), "Last week Iranians woke up to a startling piece of news: their government had dispatched Tehran's notorious prosecutor general, Saeed Mortazavi, to Geneva as a member of Iran's delegation to the opening session of the new United Nations Human Rights Council. … Mr. Mortazavi is one of the country's highest profile rights violators." Ghaemi adds that the Security council "should support the appointment of a United Nations special rapporteur on Iran to monitor and report publicly on human rights abuses and to see that the government's present lack of accountability does not translate into an even more extensive crackdown on political dissent and social freedoms. Further, the members of the Security Council and Germany, which are engaged in nuclear negotiations with Iran, should include human rights concerns on their agenda."

Administration Pushes Ahead With RRW Program. The Washington Post (6/29, A15, Pincus, 744K) reports, "The Bush administration is expected to announce today that it has dismantled the last of the most powerful nuclear missile warheads left over from the Cold War. … The National Nuclear Security Administration (NNSA) has increased by 50 percent the rate at which it is dismantling older weapons in the nuclear stockpile, which has about 5,000 weapons. But Congress and the administration are pressing ahead with the Reliable Replacement Warhead (RRW) program, which will guarantee production in the next decade of fewer but more reliable and secure nuclear warheads and bombs."

Measure Would Lift Ban On US Military Contact With Taiwan. CQ (6/28, Hoskinson) reported, "The House on Wednesday adopted by voice vote a measure that would effectively lift restrictions on high-level US military contacts with Taiwan. The amendment to the fiscal 2007 Commerce-Justice-Science spending bill (HR 5672) by Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., would bar any funds in the bill from being used to enforce State Department restrictions on official travel to Taiwan by senior U.S. military officers."

Senate Expected Top Pass Oman Trade Deal Today. CQ (6/28, Van Dongen) reported, "The Senate is expected to pass legislation Thursday that would implement a free-trade agreement with Oman, but Democratic grumbling over the Bush administration's handling of trade negotiations could spell trouble for future pacts. The Finance Committee approved the Oman bill (S 3569) on Wednesday by a 10-3 vote after an angry debate over the administration's decision not to include a provision sought by the panel on forced labor. The skirmish likely presages problems with renewal of fast-track presidential trade negotiating authority, which expires in 2007."

Schwab Says US Remains Committed To Doha Talks. Susan Schwab, the US trade representative, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/29, 2.11M), "The atmosphere is charged with political pressure and historical significance as trade ministers and negotiators representing World Trade Organization members gather this week. With time running out for a successful conclusion of the Doha Development Round, speculation has intensified about what the US and other WTO members will be willing to do to achieve success. I reaffirm here that the US is committed to an ambitious and comprehensive outcome by the end of the year. As President Bush declared last week at the US-EU summit, the Doha Round is too important to fail." The United States "put forward an offer last fall to make meaningful cuts in trade-distorting domestic agricultural supports if other countries would reciprocate with deep cuts in tariffs and trade-distorting domestic support. So far, our trading partners have not matched our ambition -- but it is not too late. … The need for meaningful trade liberalization has never been greater and the potential benefits of expanded trade have never been more compelling."

Negotiations Remain Deadlocked Ahead Of Meeting. The Financial Times (6/29, Beattie, Strauss) reports, "Leading countries in the troubled Doha global trade negotiations remained firmly in entrenched positions on Wednesday ahead of a weekend of high-pressure talks, though the head of the World Trade Organization floated the outline of a possible compromise." Indian trade minister Kamal Nath Wednesday said the US had "isolated itself in the talks with its insistence on deep cuts" in agricultural tariffs. US Trade Representative Susan Schwab responded, saying, "I do not think the US is isolated in terms of wanting an ambitious outcome." For his part, WTO chief Pascal Lamy said he thought a deal could be reached if the US would adopt "a $20 billion ceiling for farm subsidies" and developing countries cut industrial tariffs "to no more than 20 percent."

US To Press EU On Farm Policy. The Washington Times (6/29, Sparshott, 90K) reports, "The Bush administration's top trade officials will push for a breakthrough in World Trade Organization talks starting tomorrow, though continuing disagreements with Europe over farm policies threaten to mire the negotiations." US Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, who will join US Trade Representative Susan Schwab at the talks, said, "I would even go so far as to say that this is a make-or-break stage for us." Before departing, Johanns and Schwab "reiterated that other countries must open their markets to US farm goods before the White House and Congress will pare back agriculture subsidies."

UN Approves 18-Month Budget; Members Lift Spending Caps. The Washington Times (6/29, Pisik, 90K) reports UN member states approved an 18-month budget yesterday despite objections from the United States, which had tried to hold up the package while it pressed for administrative reforms proposed by Secretary-General Kofi Annan. It still is not clear whether Congress, which has strongly advocated sweeping reforms for the world body, will authorize the payment of annual dues later this year."

The AP (6/28) reported, "UN member states lifted a $950 million spending cap on the United Nations budget Wednesday, averting a financial crisis for now but dealing a blow to the US which had pushed for the limits as a lever to pressure for reforms." The AP adds, "The decision to lift the spending cap was a defeat for US Ambassador John Bolton, who played a key role in getting the General Assembly to adopt it last year as a way to increase pressure for reform. … The decision now shifts the spotlight to the US Congress, which has threatened to block US funding for the United Nations if it does not enact serious reform."

The New York Times (6/29, Hoge, 1.19M) reports, "The measure passed by consensus, without a vote, in the 191-nation committee, but the United States, Australia and Japan declared that they were officially 'disassociating' themselves from the decision. The three countries, which together account for 43 percent of the assessed budget of the United Nations, said that not enough reform measures had been put into place to justify removing the restriction."

Russian Official Says US Seeks International Energy Domination. The Los Angeles Times (6/29, Murphy, 958K) reports, "President Vladimir V. Putin's top political advisor Wednesday accused the U.S. of seeking international energy domination under the guise of promoting democracy and insisted that Russia is committed to building its own style of political pluralism without outside interference." Vladislav Y. Surkov, deputy head of the presidential administration, said, "People talk to us about democracy, but they're really thinking about our energy resources." Surkov "noted that during Dick Cheney's recent visit to Kazakhstan, an oil-rich state whose human rights record is often criticized, the American vice president 'harshly criticized Russia's democracy and then praised Kazakhstan's.'"

Mexican Campaign Ends With Polls Too Close To Call. The New York Times (6/29, Mckinley, 1.19M) reports, "Mexico's polarizing presidential campaign ended officially on Wednesday and, with four days to go before the vote, it has come down to a contest between a gritty, charismatic advocate for the poor and a well-educated technocrat." Like many elections, "this one is a struggle between promise and fear and remains too close to call. On one side is Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the former mayor of Mexico City who has traveled little outside Mexico and says he is inspired by Gandhi and Franklin D. Roosevelt. On the other is Felipe Calderón, the former energy minister with a Harvard degree who talks of fitting Mexico into the globalized economy." But "for many voters the choice is complicated because Mexico only emerged six years ago from seven decades of single-party, autocratic rule and there are some who say that what is at stake on Sunday is the survival of still-fragile democratic institutions."

USA Today (6/29, Harman, 2.31M) reports, "A poll in the Reforma newspaper Friday, the last day on which polls could be legally published, showed López Obrador had 36% support and Calderón had 34%. Roberto Madrazo, 53, of the PRI, which led the country for 71 years until 2000, trailed with 25%." The 2.5-percentage-point margin of error "puts the top two vote-getters in a virtual tie. Mexico doesn't require a runoff, so the presidency goes to Sunday's winner even if he takes fewer than 50% of the votes."

The Washington Times (6/29, Sparshott, 90K) notes Lopez Obrador and Felipe Calderon "are running on markedly different economic platforms and plans to create a governing coalition." Calderon's policies "are similar to those of outgoing President Vicente Fox. He has said he would try to open Mexico's energy sector to private investment and abide by rules under the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA). He also wants to make Mexico more competitive with China and other developing nations." Lopez Obrador "has proposed rejecting some parts of NAFTA, providing subsidies for the poor and developing New Deal-style public works to create jobs. He has vowed to keep foreign companies out of the country's rich but underdeveloped oil fields. And he has decried corruption, a corrosive force in Mexico's economy."

The Washington Post (6/29, A1, Roig-Franzia, 744K) reports "their approaches to migration -- the defining issue in U.S.-Mexico relations on Capitol Hill, but only a tangential theme in the Mexican presidential race -- are as starkly divergent as anything in their respective campaign arsenals." Calderón "looks outward, hoping his carefully crafted pro-business image will attract foreign investment that will create jobs and dissuade Mexicans from migrating." López Obrador "looks inward, pledging to slash what he says is wasteful government spending to pay for massive public works projects that would employ millions of Mexicans for years to come."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (6/29, 2.11M) writes, "Mexicans head to the polls on Sunday to elect a new president, and the choice they face is notably stark: Accelerate the pace of modernization that began in the mid-1980s or, because progress has been achieved a little slowly, revert to the economically populist and insular ways of old Mexico. … For Americans, the stakes in this election could hardly be greater. Tom Tancredo and friends may believe that the only thought the US need give its southern neighbor is the height of the wall it plans to raise between them." But "if Mexicans are able to build on the liberalizing trends of the past 20 years, their appetite for El Norte is bound, over time, to diminish. And if they revert to the populist habits of yore, no American wall will be high enough to keep the flood of desperate workers out."

Novak Says Uribe Shrugged Off Bush Request To Challenge Chavez. Writing from Bogota, Colombia, syndicated columnist Robert Novak (6/29) relates, "President Alvaro Uribe returned from his recent overnight visit to Washington in undisclosed disagreement with" President Bush, who "would like the newly re-elected Colombian leader to be 'our man in the Andes,' publicly standing up against Venezuela's leftist strongman President Hugo Chavez. That is not a role Uribe wants to play. Bush was dissatisfied with Uribe's noncommittal reaction in the Oval Office when the U.S. president said he was counting on him to lead the struggle against Chavez. But Uribe has his hands full in…his country's war against narco-guerillas. Nor does he want to exacerbate Colombia's often-turbulent relationship with Venezuela, second only to the United States as a trading partner." Chavez "is taken less seriously in Bogota than in Washington. It is felt here that he has begun blundering and is alienating even left-wing presidents." Although Bush "wants him to confront Chavez, Uribe will concentrate on using his overwhelming mandate (including an immense majority in Congress) to try to finish off the narco-guerillas."

African Company Joins Effort To Fight Malaria. The New York Times (6/29, LaFraniere, 1.19M) reports that one in three employees at Mozambique's international mining company Billiton fell ill with malaria, 6,600 cases in just two years. The result is that "one of the world's biggest aluminum producers joined in an exceptional partnership with the governments of three countries and with other businesses to take on malaria systematically across a broad region. Six years later, the scorecard is in. Amazingly, malaria is losing. … The results are a rare bright spot in fighting a parasitic killer that has thrived in the face of flawed, inadequate programs by African nations and international organizations."

US-India Nuclear Agreement Praised. In a piece in the Wall Street Journal (6/29, 2.11M), Vinod Khosla, co-founder of Sun Microsystems and a partner of Khosla Ventures, writes, "The U.S.-India nuclear agreement before Congress is good for America on five grounds: It enhances safeguards, benefits U.S. geopolitical interests, protects the environment, boosts the American economy and rewards good international citizenship and international compliance." India "is surrounded by two nondemocratic nuclear powers, sometimes unstable, often dictatorial, both having engaged in wars with India. And a cursory knowledge of Indian politics would dictate that there is zero possibility of India submitting all its nuclear reactors to the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) regime without it being recognized as a nuclear power. Democratically elected politicians in India would be committing political suicide were they to do otherwise." Khosla adds, "We must recognize that India, like Israel, has very good regional and national defense reasons for not signing the current form of the NPT." The US-India "agreement provides an elegant solution to bring important global powers like India within the international framework."

WPost Says Venezuelan Trial Looks Like Suppression Of Dissent. An editorial in the Washington Post (6/29, A26, 744K) says a trial "underway in Caracas is worth watching. It features an allegedly aggrieved Cuban ambassador, a charismatic opponent of [Venezuelan President Hugo] Chavez and a tangled record of justice that looks a lot like the calculated suppression of dissent familiar in Havana." The defendant, Henrique Capriles Radonski is charged with leading an assault on the Cuban embassy. Capriles "spent four months in jail before the charges were thrown out by an appeals court. The case seemed to be over -- but then a few months later, the charges were revived."

NYTimes Decries Lawyer Fees In Holocaust Victims Case. An editorial in the New York Times (6/29, 1.19M) says, "The success of Holocaust survivors in winning a $1.25 billion settlement from Swiss banks, which they accused of helping the Nazis steal Jewish holdings, was a small bright spot in that tragic piece of history." A controversy has arisen over the $4 million bill submitted by attorney Burt Neuborne, who represented the survivors. The Times says the "dollar amounts are troubling, and so are the slipshod hourly records that Mr. Neuborne submitted." The Times adds, "When a lawyer's fee is excessive or inadequately supported, courts should step in. US Magistrate Judge James Orenstein, who is reviewing his fee request, should scrutinize it carefully, and keep the interest of the victims firmly in mind.

Senators Graham, Kyl Statement on Hamdan Ruling

WASHINGTON, D.C. - U.S. Senators Lindsey Graham (R-SC) and Jon Kyl (R-AZ) today issued the following statement on the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling on the Hamdan case:

"We are disappointed with the Supreme Court's decision. However, we believe the problems cited by the Court can and should be fixed.

"It is inappropriate to try terrorists in civilian courts. It threatens our national security and places the safety of jurors in danger. For those reasons and others, we believe terrorists should be tried before military commissions.

"In his opinion, Justice Breyer set forth the path to a solution of this problem. He wrote, 'Nothing prevents the president from returning to Congress to seek the authority he believes necessary.'

"We intend to pursue legislation in the Senate granting the Executive Branch the authority to ensure that terrorists can be tried by competent military commissions. Working together, Congress and the administration can draft a fair, suitable, and constitutionally permissible tribunal statute."

Amy - Brief to the SecDef on Treatment of Enemy Combatants [No Bates Stamps]
These are slides from a presentation to the Secretary of Defense in May 2004. A review ordered by SecDef revealed "no evidence or suspicion of serious or systemic problems," although "minor infractions" had been reported. One problem reported at GTMO was that detainees in maximum security block were required to wear short pants, which is inconsistent with Islamic practice. At Charleston, 1 detainee had Koran, mattress and pillow removed removed from his cell as part of JFCOM-approved interrogation plan, although this technique will no longer be used. Infractions included spraying detainee with hose after detainee threw unidentified foul liquid on MP, use of pepper spray against a detainee who was about to throw unidentified liquid, striking a detainee who had been restrained after assaulting an MP, use of sexually suggestive comments and body movements by female interrogator, use of overly harsh "fear-up/harsh" interrogation technique resulting in superficial bruising to detainee's knees, engaging in inappropriately casual conversation with a detainee, and unusual haircuts by the camp barber intended to frustrate detainee requests for similar haircuts as a sign of unity. In each instance but one, there was some sort of reprimand or punishment. In the instance of the use of pepper spray, the MP was acquitted in a special court martial. The issues requiring resolution at GTMO were the lack of formal process for detainees to make complaints, that detainees do not receive packages for security reasons, and that short pants on the maximum security block conflict with religious observance. Issues requiring resolution at Charleston include that the limited population could constitute isolation, and that the Christian chaplain used to provide socialization could be perceived as forced proselytization.

Amy - Formica Annex Review (pp 1-199)
This is part of the appendix to an investigation by BG Richard Formica of allegations of detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib and possibly other places. It includes the May 2004 memorandum authorizing the investigation, a chronology of the investigation, reports of detainee abuse, sworn witness statements, and other documents relevant to the investigation. The statements generally deny having seen or been involved in any torture or interrogation with dogs. One witness statement reports that a soldier was charged for removing the shirt of a female detainee, and that he witnessed a female MP searching male detainees in what he thought was an inappropriate manner. The same witness alleged that detainees would often arrive at Abu Ghraib beaten up and would claim that they were tortured with cigarette burns and electric shocks. Some of them blamed Iraqis for the torture, including one rape. One witness described a detainee's report that Iraqi police had raped her child and murdered her older brother. One detainee had reported that he was stripped naked, given a cold shower and put on sleep patterns prior to interrogation. Several witnesses reported receiving no or only limited training on dealing with detainees. One interrogator admitted hearing about a detainee being shot with a rubber bullet, another one being forced to wear women's underwear, and about a detainee who was made to roll on the sand and skip like a chicken until he almost passed out. This witness reported tension between military intelligence and military police.

There are several sworn statements by detainees. A statement by a detainee who claimed to be an Iraqi general alleges that he was interrogated, sometimes roughly, at Abu Ghraib, but that he was beaten by an American and an Iraqi before being taken to Abu Ghraib, where he was also beaten and hit and tied to a window. 15 days after he arrived, he told an American interrogator about the abuse and it stopped. One detainee stated that the only bad thing that happened at Abu Ghraib was when an interrogator cussed at him and threatened to make him wear female clothes. Two detainees stated that, prior to their arrival at Abu Ghraib, they were not allowed to sleep for 4 days and their father was denied his heart medication.

There are also orders describing proper reasons, procedures, and review procedures for detaining people and efforts to ensure proper detainee treatment. A witness statement explains that an outdated interrogation policy was once circulated. Sign-in rosters indicate that all guards and interrogators at a temporary holding facility were required to understand the policy and the SOPs. The Interrogation and Counter-Resistance Policy dated March 23, 2004 includes the incomprehensible line "Proper clothing and any relevant medication will taken off target with the detainees." Most interrogation procedures and all detainee lists are redacted. Various file memoranda address reporting requirements for detention facilities, time-frames for transfer of detainees to the coalition holding facility, ongoing investigations. One investigation found no physical evidence to support the detainee's allegations of recent torture, another found that a man claiming to have been kept in a 4' crate without food or water was also "obvious[ly]" beaten. A memorandum on Detainees Basic Tenant Rights IAW Geneva Convention and Army Regulations requires food, water, medical treatment and humane treatment for civilian detainees, but also states that "securing detainees in a cement cell with dimensions of 4 feet long, 3.1 feet high, and 1.5 feet wide secured by a sliding metal door is acceptable for a short duration not to exceed 24 hours" even without "good ventilation, lighting or observation by guard force." (P145).

An agent's investigation report records that a servicemember died after his vehicle detonated an unknown explosive device. The report describes a witness's information about a sale of an explosive device that resulted in this attack and several witness statements are included, including a confession. The confession was later retracted, the detainee claiming that it was "beaten out of him." (P.161) A female detainee claimed that the Iraqi Police had beaten her and tortured and killed her brother in an attempt to extort money from her family. She claimed that another detainee was beaten and forced to accuse her of involvement. One detainee claimed that Iraqi Police at the palace beat and tortured him, deprived him of sleep, and food, sodomized him, and squeezed his testicles with pliers. There are at least two detainees who retracted statements that they claimed were given after being tortured at the palace, perhaps by Iraqi police but while Americans were present. One of the men is handicapped and suffers from a bone deficiency. Several servicemembers denied abusing detainees or being present during abuse. One volunteered that there was a lawyer in Baghdad encouraging detainees to fabricate abuse stories. The investigation found no medical evidence to support the accusation of abuse at the palace. There was corroborating evidence of the original crime and the abuse story changed over time. The accusing detainees were charged with making false official statements. After this incident, the commanding officer ordered that detainees be transferred immediately to a conventional coalition facility and that interrogations be recorded. One officer states that his team has never used a dog in their interrogations "but to be perfectly honest, a dog barking 50 feet away, if that's going to convince an Iraqi to give up another one of his IED making friends, then personally I don't see a problem with it." He also stated that "the acceptable minimum standard [for food and water] would certainly be water, three bottles a day, as far as food, something to keep them alive. I'm aware of what [REDACTION] was fed and I don't think it was particularly adequate. I should have been checking on those guys . . . ." One service member stated that, for a time, the detainees were all blindfolded. The detainees at the facility in question shower by being hosed down. One guard stated that there is a lot of diarrhea among the detainees, maybe due to unfamiliar food. One detainee claimed he was kicked by a guard when the lights went out. One guard heard a rumor that a detainee died after being turned over to Coalition forces, and was found dead with a sock in his mouth. An interrogator describes some of his typical interrogation techniques, including yelling and making the detainee believe that he can improve his position by cooperating. Also, without threatening torture, he would mention Abu Ghraib and "their own imaginations will generally be more effective." This particular interrogator was outraged by the use of sleep deprivation and stress positions as interrogation techniques because he had been taught that it was illegal, and he personally refused to take part.

Hannah - Formica Report Annex ("FRA") 54-75
201-204 FRA 55 - statement from intelligence analyst for interrogators, pre and post briefs interrogators, characterized as a subject matter expert on the types of intelligence sought, but has limited contact with the detainee. statement about a particular detainee's complaint. Detainee came in from "Adamiya Palace" where they were harsh on him. analyst was suspicious of the documents that came with the detainee. Much of the statement concerns him backtracking from a prior statement in which he told military investigators that he had heard of "this happening" meaning detainee abuse. "That statement is completely hearsay that I can't confirm or deny" [201]. The statement as a whole is confusing. He speaks a great deal of detainee abuse that appears to have gone on at Adamiya palace, but it is unclear from his statement whether he believed an allied forces unit, special forces, or other type of unit was operating from there, or whether it was former members of the Republican guard. See 203.
Also, there is a confusing discussion at the end referring to gaps of time in which detainees are brought to an unknown interrogation facility, leaving gaps in the time between the date of their arrest, and the date of their arrival at the affiant's location. [204]
Potentially problematic statements :
" . . . I can't say that they're not using another interrogator to do their dirty work." "The interrogator who's conducting for that group is SF. He's an operator but he's prior CI and just talking to him about his knowledge of interrogations, nothing that they were doing seemed out of the ordinary He told me that the detainee basically gave the information and when the detainee felt he was going down the road of being imprisoned he basically retracted the whole thing saying 'I didn't say that, and I'm not going to sign anything.' The accusations of a detainee bleeding from the ears is hearsay information." [202]

"Whether it's fueled by hear say [sic] or otherwise, I do have a way to sense that some units may generally treat detainees better than others. When I was working at Abu, detainees would come up with wounds on them. If that happened in the field or during an interrogation I don't know" [202]
204 " [redacted] is definitely running an interrogation facility somewhere. I have no idea where it is located. They can't be reached by SIPR, NIPR, or DNVT. It's definitely off of a telephone. "
205-06 FRA 56 - statement by someone "working the interrogation side of the house" at abu ghraib describing his beliefs about abuse at abu. Implies there was abuse. Potentially problematic statements:"On one particular individual, his wrist wounds were so severe that they were cut down through the forth and fifth layers of flesh. It was scabbed over, but it was obvious those things had been on and a lot of pressure was exerted on those plastic cuffs, or metal cuffs, whichever ones were used. I haven't sen this but I've been told about the impaling of the rectum with a bottle. You saw prisoners that were walking kind of funny, and you knew something was wrong with them, what, I don't know. From my lifetime and experience, human beings don't act that way unless there's something with them. I've seen prisoners hat have injured themselves with flex cuffs but not to the degree that I've seen on some prisoners, there's just no way." [205]207-08 FRA 57 - statement of individual present during interrogation of detainee describing abuse at Adamiya palace. Affiant says he disbelieved the accounts of a detainee who said that at Adamiya palace he was stripped, burned by a cigarette, had a bag placed over his head, and had electrical wires attached to his testicles, penis, head, and body parts. Confusing because affiant thinks the detainee's credibility was shot after seeing two Americans come in to say contradictory evidence, who the affiant thinks the detainee recognized, though his story about Adamiya palace was that he never saw Americans or heard American voices. The two soldiers confronted him and the detainee fell silent. Afterwards the detainee faked a heart attack. The affiant's conclusions are inconsistent with the evidence described. This narrative, contrary to the affiant's assertions, seems to suggest that the detainee had been tortured by Americans.
Problematic statements: the whole of page 207.
209-211 FRA 58 -statement of detainee at Adamiya and Taji, detailing abuse ranging from beatings, electricity wires, bleeding from the ear, soap and water placed in his mouth, and use of a dog to scare and scratch him. Implication that there were Americans present.
Problematic statements: the whole of page 209
212-214 FRA 59 - questions and answers of someone at Abu Ghraib. Respondent describes detainees alleging abuse at Adamiya palace.
Problematic statements:
"Q: Do you know if a US military unit worked with the Iraqi police at Adamya palace? A: According to detainees yes."[213]
"Q: have detainees mentioned seeing or hearing Americans at the al adamiya palace. A: yes. Q: are there any allegations of abuse committed by Americans at the al adamiya palace. A: no."
215-16 FRA 60 - statement by screener at Abu Ghraib describing what she's heard from detainees, who told of bad treatment at Adamiya palace and by US coalition forces at the airport.

DOJ_NMG_0037480

217-18 FRA 61 - statement by screener at Abu Ghraib discounting detainee accounts of abuse by Mohammed Sadaam (rape with a bottle). Occasionally sees prisoners with facial abuse, but not the norm.
Potentially problematic statement: "The only trend associated with that abuse would be with SF detainees."[217]
219-222 FRA 62 - statement by detainee describing abuse of family members and self at Adamiya palace. "Any time when Coalition forces captured someone they took them to Adamiya palace" [219] Describes American soldiers taking affiant to the palace and others present in the palace concurrently while affiant and his family are being abused by an Iraqi. The affiant describes seeing his brother raped with a bottle by an Iraqi.
222-24 FRA 63 -statement by female detainee in same family describing her account of being held and abused in Adamiya palace, after being taken there by Americans. Describes an American soldier trying to scare her by putting electric wires all around her and beating her up. Affiant states that "while I was at Adamiya, I was interrogated by an American who wanted me to admit that my sister [redacted] and my brothers sponsored terrorists". [223]. Says that she saw an interrogator put bottles in several people's rectums, describes seeing American soldiers there with the linguist.
225-26 FRA 64 - another detainee describing abuse at Adamiya, including being hung on a nail while handcuffed and blindfolded without food for two and a half days, being beaten, and having a "stick of iron in my rectum" [225]. Describes interrogator as working with the Americans. "I was taken to a room where there was Mohammed Sadaam, one American soldier, and two other people behind me that kicked me. The American had yellowish, very thin hair, and had no mustache." [225]
228-229 FRA 65 - detainee describing abuse at Adamiya palace after being taken there by Coalition forces. Describes American officers at Adamiya saying "we'll interrogate you tomorrow" then leaving the detainee with two Iraqis who beat him. Later, an American officer "took the bag from my head with respect and began to interrogate me". The officer left, and then the linguist came in and "put a stick in my bottom".
230-31 FRA 66 - statement of supervisor of operations at Radwaniyah palace Complex. Says only SF guard the detainees, and their Lebanese interpreter (who people in Adamiya think was shot, and whose death caused celebration) is never alone in a room with a detainee. Agrees that the detainees are fed bread and water, but they "get as much bread as they can eat." [230] describes a police dog they have as a distraction for the soldiers as a pet. "I think there's some reg saying you could use him but we don't use him" [231]
232-33 FRA 67 - statement of CPT _____ a commander in charge of offensive operations at Adamiyah palace. "The first thing we'd do after detaining a target would be to deliver them to this facility." [232]. Denies abuse as described above ever occurred. Agrees that one prisoner was transported in the trunk of a car, but that was for the safety of the prisoner, since there were numerous phony checkpoints killing people. Denies using dogs in interrogation, though agrees there is a pet dog at the team house. 234-35 FRA 68- describing intelligence secured by detainee, specifically several attack detainee was involved in.
236-37 FRA69 - member of resistance confessing to participation in various attacks
238-40 FRA 69 - statement by American interrogator describing interrogation techniques. Denying electrocution or use of a broomstick, or detention for more than a few days. Agrees that detainees used to be hooded but are now blind folded. Agrees that they are fed bread and water. Agrees that dog Coji is on the site, but denies ever using the dog in interrogations.

241-43 FRA 70 - Statement of American interrogator at Adamiyah palace. details interrogation procedures and denies abuse ever took place.
244-46 FRA 71 - Statement by Iraqi working in Habamiyah palace with Americans, describing the threats to his family, and family brought in for interrogations. denies participating in interrogations or using the stick on detainees.
247-49 FRA 72 - statement of interpreter working with charlie battery interpreting interrogations. denies ever participating in, witnessing, or conducting abuse.
250-52 FRA 74 - statement by commander of first brigade. His division brought prisoners to Adhamiya palace, but denies abuse ever taking place, or that prisoners were held more than 48 hours. Says interpreter accused by detainees of abuse was never left alone with the prisoners.
256-58 FRA 75 Statement by American Captain denying abusive interrogations ever took place, describing problems with "category one translators" Thinks that there are signs of fabrication in the detainee abuse statements.
Potentially problematic statement: "We've had problems with Category one translators before , , , the battalion commander's personal category one was involved in numerous cases of blackmail, and extortion. I passed this information on to CID for investigation [redacted] He was kind of a thug figure during the old regime , , , " [256].
259-61 FRA 76 - statement of commander of C battery, that was not stationed at Adamiya, but located at the Seven apples water plant. States that he never conducted detention at Adamiya, but detained some people and brought them there. Describes the physical layout of Adamyia, including a description of holding areas made of plywood and chain link. Describes an individual identified as a former commissioner in the iraqi police during the regime. He's not paid but worked as a "battalion asset." His role was to "find[] the guys we were looking for". [259]. describes detention of female detainee under suspicion of being chief financier of the FR. Denies hearing stories of abuse, and states that the Colonel wouldn't allow it.
262–65 FRA 77 - statement of assistant detachment commander, appears to be stationed adjacent to the Adamiya Palace. Describes holding of detainees, and where interrogations took place. Describes local Iraqi national providing information, and while unsure of original motivation to help, describes his motivation hardening after local resistance fighters threatened his family. His primary role was to identify targets, but was also present for some detainee interrogations. describes interrogations as extremely professional and states that he never had unaccompanied access to detainees. "although I cannot say with absolute certainty that he never had unaccompanied access ... I highly doubt it." [263] Denies that detainees were ever threatened or physically abused. discounts allegations as attempts to leave detention. describes camp as tight ship. Describes interrogation techniques used: good cop bad cop, sleep management, but never authorized "stress positions", never caused artificial cooling of their bodies, never used dogs during interrogation, never deprived detainees of food or water. says he would not have a problem using a chain to secure detainees to the floor, as long as they could stand, sleep, use the latrine, etc.

270-72 FRA 80 brief statement about information derived from interrogation of suspected resistance member suspected of financing resistance in Azimiya. Also summary of how she became to be detained.
274-75 FRA 82 - statement by intelligence sergeant describing interrogations in 2-3 facility. was one of the interrogators of the individuals alleging abuse, and denies abuse ever occurred. Notes that he heard one detainee had physical problems, including urinating on himself. Describes local Iraqi national and states that he does not see how the Iraqi could have unrestricted access, and affiant states he never implied to detainees that he would allow the iraqi to do things us soldiers were prohibited from doing. describes interpreter. concludes detainees are lying about abuse allegations.
"We used a variety of interrogation techniques. My primary technique was to be the nice guy or use a "soft sell". I would appeal to their family and their pride. I would also use the fear up/down technique. I never used stress positions. We did have them kneel during interrogations, but never used a push-up or modified push-up position. Detainees were also put up against a wall, but not for long periods of time." [274]
276-77 FRA 83 - statement by member of task force at DCO with authority over detention operations. "I'm satisfied with the procedures, although there were a couple of blips, not with Paul's folks, but with the previous team." [276] describes some incidents where knees were skinned, and the kneeling on gravel was discontinued. another incident where there was blackened toe nails and burned skin, but it turned out that he had a chronic skin condition. potentially problematic statements: "the only issue I have is the elevated techniques. Aree you using the correct IROE. Until last month we were using the September IROE from CITF-7. We found that the one that came out in October was substantially more restrictive. We asked "are you guys using the right one" and they went back up their chain. . . .We were using a brigadier general approved elevated and they were using the O-5." 276
A council member would walk into our detention facility and talk to a detainee that had been [redacted] he would allege abuse and say "I was iced down, dleep deprivation, in stress positions" and we knew we had not been doing those things so it was apparent that the detainee was speaking about the tactical interrogation center" 276
"I don't think the chain of approval is authorized. We did everything necessary to make sure everybody was aware of what's going on at least in legal channels when people know this is happening. "the way we enter a room on target, breaching the door and flooding the room, the aggressive speed, they are off kilter from the beginning. 99 percent of the time if there was an injury it happened at the objective."
281-82 FRA 85. Statement by LCDR. describes tactical interrogation facility, and no holding of detainees for longer than 72 hours, feeding schedule potentially problematic statement: " I have not talked about what techniques could and couldn't be used. I asked him about techniques and he said "sir it's 90% about stress positions for the most part" so I assume the main techniques involved are putting an individual in stress positions. I have to assume that Gunnery Sergeant [redacted] by his position and training, can authorize stress positions. I know its okay with me." [282]

283-85 FRA 86. Statement by Master of Arms, which is the equivalent of a military police officer in the Army. Describes training for support personnel handling detainees. Says he never saw anything he'd consider a breach of the code of conduct or the UCMJ and never saw abuse.
286-88 FRA 87. Written transcripts of answers in discussion between SEAL officer and Brigadier General Formica. describes numbers of detainees he encountered, and bulk of statement is redacted.
289-91 FRA 88 . statement by assistant platoon commander, with duties of maintaining the temporary holding facility and provision of over-watch for tactical information. states that no detainee is held for greater than 72 hours. describes sleep management techniques. "They must get four hours of sleep for every 24 hours, but it doesn't have to be in a single block. 48 hours is the longest we've ever done sleep management. . . . All the stress positions are directed by the interrogator." [290]

299-301 FRA 92. redacted report of commander of 2-3 FA, which was at one point located at Adamiya palace. mostly illegible.
302-04 FRA 93. statement by individual responsible for paperwork at 2-3 FA. denies ever seeing evidence of abuse, never heard anyone screaming in pain from the interrogation room. Thinks allegations of probes, electrocutions, etc were not possible because he was present every time.
305-07 FRA 94 Assistant at 2-3 FA. Responsibilities included verifying paperwork, ensuring detainees were fed, watered, and able to visit the latrine. Describes presence of the Haf'ts in the center, and the Iraqi informant.
308-10 FRA 95. Statement by S-2 NCO, who had the night shift at Adamiya palace. Partially illegible. He was never present during interrogations. "From my understanding, we don't do interrogation. We're not trained to interrogation. We might do tactical questioning." [308]

This packet of material has a lot of information about the abuse and death of Iraqi detainees in United States custody. Much of the language, particularly the descriptions from detainees, is very graphic. It appears that most of the detainees were held in the vicinity of Tikrit Detainees were beaten, sodomized, suffocated, electrocuted, starved, and stripped. Elevated interrogation techniques were approved in general and not on a case by case basis in some instances. At least two detainees died in custody. There were women detainees. The documents are reports, sworn statements, and documents from investigations. The following is a summary followed by numerous full quotations since the material is very graphic and will probably be reproduced in the press.

One large part of the documents at the beginning describe the Detainee Holding Facility in the Adamiya Palace area. Detainees were removed from the main detention areas for prolonged periods of time (30-45 minutes) for questioning. Although most of the detainees were men, there were at least women detainees. There is an indication that a woman was considered a terrorist mastermind who worked with former Saddam commandos and fedayeen. The brother of the two women died apparently while detained. Mohammad Saddam, an Iraqi policeman, may have been involved in interrogations. A detainee was bruised up but he may have come in that way. Among the most graphic descriptions:

– A Marine describes an interview with a detainee: the detainee was beaten on abdomen and left flank and punched on legs, side of neck, causing "external and internal bleeding. States he was hung by a nail from the wall with his hands bound behind his back with ligature. States he was lain upon the floor on his stomach with his hands bound and sodimized (sic) with a metal "penis" that they "sexed (sic) together." He also states that his interrogators grabbed his testicles with a plier (?) which caused localized pain and bloody discharge from his penis for more than a week. After being sodomized (sic), he reports his underwear had blood everywhere, and he has had very painful defecations (sic) ever since. This detainee's exam is notable for left side adbominal and flank tenderness and some tenderness of the left testicle. The only physical findings were obvious ligature scars on his wrists consistent with his history. He also has some anal pain and 'fear' with a pale case of breakdown of the skin of the anus and changes consistent with an anal tissue at the 6-oclock position. Internal exam is not possible." P. 338.

– The same Marine describes an interview with a second detainee, an ex-Iraqi Army Engineer/Major. Detained 16 days. The detainee states he was "beaten with a stick on the bottoms of his feet and burned with lit cigarettes on the [illegible] of both feet. He was also beaten on his left forearm and punched in right eye and left ear. He also states that they attempted to sodimize (sic) him but stopped [illegible] to significant entry to his anus (?). Exam reveals scar of ligature & some scar on right shoulder & his feet but rectum (?) and other areas are normal."

– A service member who had been stationed in Tikrit, Iraq, describes the following: "interrogation techniques approved by CJSOTF-AP. These techniques included, baseline, direct, emotional fulfillment, and knowledge. Additionally, there were other techniques that had to be approved by a higher headquarters, 05 or 06 level. Some of the other techniques include Mutt/Jeff, incentive, fear up, pride down, loud music, working dogs . . . We initially asked for authorization to use the higher-level interrogation tactics and were given blanket approval to use them, to the best of my knowledge . . . That is why I believe we had a standing authority to use the elevated techniques and thus I did not feel a need to request it in each individual case . . . We used music to segregate detainees and for force protection. . . Sleep management was an authorized technique that we used. We could reduce the sleep to the minimum requirement of 4 hours of sleep per every 24 hours but this could not be continued for more than 72 hours." Some detainees were held for more than 72 hours.

– An American service member and interrogator described Iraqi forces also being rough with detainees. An insurgent was fighting with Iraqi police, an Iraqi policeman "busted in with a pistol and beat [the individual] with the pistol to the point where his head was split open in a number of different directions, like a starfish on his head . . . As soon as we put him in the truck he started banging his head on the window . . . so I dragged him to the center of the back seat and sat him in there and held his head down to calm him down . . . He also had ligature marks on his wrists."

– The same interrogator describes taping detainees' eyes and sitting on a resistant detainee. He also captured a detainee and could have shot him in the head when the detainee grabbed his rifle barrel but did not because the detainee's pregnant wife was there.

– One of the detainees described his experience. Soldiers came to his house in Tikrit, took him into custody, and locked him in a small room where he could not stand up. They put duct tape on his mouth and nose and kept him from breathing and then resuscitated him. They beat him repeatedly. They hit him with a big stick on his foot until his feet were blue. They hit him in the eye and it was all blue for forty days. "The Kurdish guy threatened me and said he was going to fuck me and bring my two wives and fuck them in front of my eyes." He was shocked with electricity and had water thrown on him but was not given water to drink. For five days he had no food or water. For seven days he was naked. Loud music was played with someone telling somebody else in weak Arabic that "I'm going to cut your head off." "They beat me bad here, and I was urinating blood for seven days."

– Another detainee reports that he was captured near Tikrit, kept in a cell with other people, where loud music was played. He started yelling "Please kill me." The music also sounded like someone was trying to kill someone, trying to cut their heads off. He was interrogated by a man wearing a mask and the interrogator stood behind him with a piece of pipe or metal in his hands and beat his neck. The translator was Kurdish and wore a mask. The interrogator wanted to know why he was attacking Americans. It appears he may have informed on a neighbor as being a member of the fedayeen. In the next interrogation the interrogator took of his mask and said he was his friend. He was not hit this time. When he was transferred to a different detention facility another detainee had wounds on both of his shoulders from where they were "pulling him on the ground and he had some head injuries from where they beat him with a pistol in the back of his head." He says that someone likes to exaggerate.

– An additional detainee states that he was detained by Special Forces near Tikrit. "The ICDC told me that the CIA picked me up after two days." He was held for three days without food or water and load music was played and the ceiling was hit so he couldn't sleep. "I said what do you want from me, I'll tell you anything." He was hit in the eyes and head by a Kurd and some Americans. He was hit with a pistol in the head. He was blindfolded. He was kept naked for two days. He was treated humanely by the interrogator. He was beaten the last two days he was there (which makes it seem like he was beaten by the CIA). He was given cake and water. He seemed to possibly know one of the people there, either a detainee or a captor. "There was another guy who might be dead by now from all the torture, he refused to tell me his name." "The ICDC guys knew that this center belonged to the CIA."

– A Commander of the 3rd Battalion whose headquarters had been based in Mosul stated: "I have found no clear guidance on detention facility requirements. There is very clear guidance on how they are to be treated and how they are to be maintained and processing procedures, but I have seen no guidance on the facility requirements themselves." He also talks about elevated interrogation techniques similar to the ones discussed above.

There is also an investigation of the death of a detainee in custody. Findings were that detainee was intoxicated, - appeared mentally challenged, repeatedly took off his clothes and defecated on himself on two occasions; he was often seen with his pants around his ankles. Aide station determined detainee had "low body temperature, shallow respiration, and weak cardio rhythms; had little response to stimuli and was moaning to himself." The next day he was airlifted to [blank] where he died due to "total cardio failure." Conclusion: "There was no evidence of misconduct or maltreatment. . . [detainee] did have some healing abrasions on his shin and bruises on his shoulders and knees." The report says the abrasions and bruises did not appear recent but the doctor's statement simply notes the abrasions and bruises and is silent as to when these injuries occurred. In other documents his death is reported as due to pneumonia. He had been placed in a heated bus when it was cold. When Brigade requested to speak to the detainee they were told he was useless for intelligence purposes because of his mental state and they recommended his release, but because he was the brother of someone he continued to be held.

Another detainee who died in custody was captured with 6 Improvised Explosive Devices and other explosive materials and grenades. He exhibited "signs of intense distress and extremely unusual behavior during his captivity, likely based on the stress of detainment and the fact that this very committed . . . member had provided actionable intelligence during his detainment." He subsequently died of cardiac arrest. "According to LTC . . . there have been a surprising number of cardiac problems, including the recent full cardiac arrest of an Iraqi citizen in his mid-30s, which have occurred in the vicinity of Mosul."

Alex - "Formica annex Review 420-484" (the annexes listed are 121-185)
These documents include memoranda and appointment letters related to specific abuse allegations, records for proceedings under Article 15 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice, summaries of investigations, detention review authority documents (for 72-hour reviews of detainees) and detainee tracking forms and tags, sworn statements, medical records, reports of decisions from Article 78 proceedings for detainees and photos. There is nothing overly disturbing in the documents that would be particularly newsworthy.
The specific allegations of abuse include claims that (i) five or six SEALs kicked a detainee who was on the ground resulting in large bruises to the detainee (420 & 421); (ii) a detainee died of injuries sustained during an escape attempt (where he had been struck and hog-tied earlier and suffered substantial bruising (428, 431, 432); (iii) a SPC (who may have been suffering from personal problems) struck a detainee for no reason, but that this was stopped immediately and reported (435); (iv) water poured into mouth while flex cuffed and being intentionally placed in fire to be burned (448 & 449) [Note that the investigation finds no support for these two allegations although the interrogators admitted being rough with that detainee]. None of these are particularly shocking in comparison to the other allegations that have been made public.

Short Summary

The Unprivileged Combatants Act of 2006 is a follow-up to the Military Commissions Procedures Act of 2002 (S. 1937, 107th Congress) which you cosponsored with Senator Durbin in February 2002. The goal of this bill is to balance the need for national security (interrogations and detention of combatants) with the need to afford detainees with sufficient due process so that nations such as Great Britain and Australia will not place undue pressure on the United States to release their citizens from Guantanamo Bay. This bill addresses only those combatants currently held at Guantanamo Bay. The Act clarifies the procedures used in Combatant Status Review Tribunals and establishes procedures for the trial of detainees. These procedures constitute "a meaningful opportunity to contest the factual basis for that detention before a neutral decision-maker." (Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507, O'Connor, J.) This bill does not address the issue of unprivileged combatants contesting their detentions through habeas appeals. Although the Graham-Kyl-Levin amendment to the 2005 DoD appropriations bill has addressed this issue, a forthcoming Supreme Court decision (Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 04-5393) will probably require additional legislation on this matter.

Section by Section of your bill

- Section 301: Findings: This title is in direct response to the United State Supreme Court's ruling in Rasul v. Bush.
- Section 302: Definition Section: Definition section of the bill which defines primary terms such as field tribunal, classification tribunal, military commission, and unprivileged combatant.
- Section 303: Authorizing Military Commissions: The President is authorized to establish military commissions for the trial of individuals for offenses as provided in this title.
- Section 304: Jurisdiction Over Unprivileged Combatants: This title establishes exclusive jurisdiction to hear any matter involving an unprivileged combatant who has been detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. These detainees may be tried via laws of war or pursuant to the Department of Defense's Military Commission Instruction Number Two.
- Section 305: Appellate Jurisdiction: The U.S. Courts of Military Appeals shall have exclusive jurisdiction over appeals from all final decisions of a classification tribunal board or military commission under this title. These decisions are then subject to review by the Supreme Court by writ of certiorari.
- Section 306: Military Commission: The Commissions shall consist of three military officers, at least one of whom is a Judge Advocate General. These Commissions shall decide the guilt or innocence of detainees charged under section 304 of this Act. This is basically what happens now.
- Section 307: Persons in Custody: Not more than 60 days after the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense is required to develop a list of all persons who are being detained at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and whom the government wishes to continue to detain as an unprivileged combatant. The Act requires that the original list and subsequent lists, updated at least once every 60 days, be submitted to the appropriate House and Senate committees.

- Section 308: Field Tribunals: Not more than 30 days after a suspected unprivileged combatant has been detained by United States forces, the Department of Defense shall conduct a field tribunal ("FT") in order to determine whether the detainee is an unprivileged combatant and whether the detainee is entitled to the rights afforded under the Geneva Convention. The procedures governing a field tribunal shall be promulgated by the Department of Defense.
- Section 309: Classification Tribunals: A Classification Tribunal ("CT") is very similar to the current Combatant Status Review Tribunal. The CT shall be composed of three military officers, one of whom shall be an attorney. Pursuant to a hearing before a CT, a designee shall be released and repatriated to an appropriate country unless a CT finds by a preponderance of the evidence that—(1) the detainee is a threat to the national security interest of the United States; or (2) there are reasonable grounds to believe that if released the person would take up arms against the United States. Decisions of the CT shall be repeated every six months. Detainees may be released only when the CT or the Administrative Board determines the detainee is no longer a threat to national security. This section also expressly states that a detainee who is also a United States citizen may not be held or tried under this act.
- Section 310: Classification Tribunal Procedures: Procedures for CT's are the same as those of Combatant Status Review Tribunals except detainees shall be represented by counsel and are permitted to view unclassified discovery that the prosecution plans to present before the tribunal.
- Section 311: Continuance of Classification Tribunals: Classification tribunals may be continued in order for the government to continue their interrogation of a detainee. Upon a motion from the Government, the classification tribunal board may grant a continuance for up to a 6-month period, if the classification tribunal board determines that: 1) the individual being detained is a high level individual in the planning or financing of terrorist activities, or 2) the individual possesses information vital to the safety of the United States or its citizens. The Government may obtain more than one continuance if it demonstrates that such continuances are necessary for information gathering purposes as it relates to national security. Said applications for Continuances shall be made ex parte and before a detainee is given an attorney. Accordingly, a detainee is only given an attorney once the tribunal is informed that the interrogation efforts have been exhausted.
- Section 312 & 313: Criminal Prosecution Procedures: Military Commission procedures will be the same as the current procedures afforded detainees under the current system.
- Section 314: Communication with Persons in Custody: Limits communications by any detainee indicted or convicted under this Act to the individual's interpreter, assigned counsel, prison personnel, and any other individual(s) approved by the Secretary of Defense.

- Section 315: Commission Counsel: Provides the following criteria for persons to be admitted to practice before a commission: 1) US Citizen, 2) has been admitted to practice law in a State, district, territory or possession of the United States or before Federal Court, 3) has not been disciplined by any court, bar or other competent governmental authority for misconduct, 4) maintains a minimum of "secret" clearance and 5) signs a written agreement to comply with all applicable regulations and instructions for counsel during the course of proceedings. It further provides persons admitted to practice will not confer with any colleague who does not have at least a "secret" clearance. This section provides that individuals seeking to practice before a commission will be expedited in consideration for obtaining the necessary security clearance. The decision of the Secretary of Defense regarding the granting or not of the security clearance is final and is not eligible for appeal or review. Finally, this section provides that persons practicing before the commission are eligible to have their travel expenses reimbursed.

2D SESSION

S. _____

To provide comprehensive procedures for the adjudication of cases involving unprivileged combatants.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

_____ introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on _____

A BILL

To provide comprehensive procedures for the adjudication of cases involving unprivileged combatants.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE; AUTHORITY; FINDINGS.

(a) SHORT TITLE.—This Act may be cited as the ''Unprivileged Combatant Act of 2006''.

(b) AUTHORITY.—The requirements, conditions, and restrictions established by this Act are made under the authority of Congress under clauses 1, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 18 of article I, section 8 of the Constitution of the United States.

(c) FINDINGS.—Congress finds the following:

(1) Article I, section 8, of the Constitution provides that the Congress has the power to ''constitute Tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court; ... define and punish ... Offenses against the Law of Nations; ... make Rules concerning Captures on Land and Water; ... make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof''.

(2) The Supreme Court has repeatedly recognized military tribunals, as stated in Madsen v. Kinsella 343 U.S. 341, 1952, ''[s]ince our nation's earliest days, such tribunals have been constitutionally recognized agencies for meeting many urgent governmental responsibilities related to war....They have taken many forms and borne many names. Neither their procedure nor their jurisdiction has been prescribed by statute. It has been adapted in each instance to the need that called it forth.'' Madsen, citing In re Yamashita, 327 U.S. 1 (1946).

(3) The President has inherent authority to convene military tribunals arising from his role as Commander and Chief of the Armed Forces under article II of the Constitution and from title 10 of the United States Code. Due to the extraordinary circumstances of the ongoing war on terrorism, it is appropriate for Congress to provide additional and explicit authorization of and procedures for military tribunals to adjudicate and punish offenses relating to the war on terrorism.

(4) This Act is in direct response to the United State Supreme Court's ruling in Rasul v. Bush. With the passage of this Act, the 109th Congress will have addressed the concerns of the Supreme Court's Rasul majority, and therefore alien enemy combatants detained or prosecuted under this Act may not challenge their detentions in the Federal courts of the United States via the habeas or any other statute.

SEC. 2. DEFINITIONS.

As used in this Act, the following definitions apply:

(1) CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNAL.—The term ''classification tribunal'' means any tribunal conducted under section 9 or any related proceeding.

(2) CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNAL BOARD.—The term ''classification tribunal board'' means a board established pursuant to section 9(d).

(3) CLASSIFIED INFORMATION.—The term ''classified information'' has the meaning given that term in section 1(a) of the Classified Information Procedures Act (18 U.S.C. App.).

2 United States military judge designated by the Sec-
3 retary of Defense to hear cases under this Act.
4 (9) PROTECTED INFORMATION.—The term
5 ''protected information'' means information—
6 (A) that is classified information;
7 (B) protected by law or rule from unau-
8 thorized disclosure;
9 (C) the disclosure of which may endanger
10 the physical safety of participants in Commis-
11 sion proceedings, including prospective wit-
12 nesses;
13 (D) concerning intelligence and law en-
14 forcement sources, methods, or activities; or 15 (E) the disclosure of which would other-
16 wise jeopardize national security interests.
17 (10) UNITED STATES PERSON.—The term
18 ''United States person'' has the meaning given that
19 term in section 101 of the Foreign Intelligence Sur-
20 veillance Act of 1978 (50 U.S.C. 1801).
21 (11) UNPRIVILEGED COMBATANT.—The term
22 ''unprivileged combatant'' means an individual—
23 (A) who has been designated as an enemy
24 combatant by a Combatant Status Review Tri-
25 bunal prior to the enactment of this Act; or

(B) who a Field Tribunal conducted by the United States military as provided in this Act determines—

(i) is not entitled to the protections set out in the Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, done at Geneva, August 12, 1948 (6 UST 3516) (referred to in this Act as the ''Geneva Convention''); and

(ii) has—

(I) knowingly assisted, conspired with, or solicited for a group or an individual hostile to the United States;

(II) knowingly attempted to assist others in taking up arms against the United States;

(III) conspired with or solicited others to take up arms against the United States; or the Committee on Armed Services of the Senate and the Committee on the Judiciary and the Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives.

SEC. 3. AUTHORIZING MILITARY COMMISSIONS.

The President is authorized to establish military commissions for the trial of individuals for offenses as provided in this Act.

SEC. 4. JURISDICTION.

(a) UNPRIVILEGED COMBATANTS.—This Act establishes exclusive jurisdiction to hear any matter involving an unprivileged combatant who has been detained by the Department of Defense for not less than 180 consecutive days at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

(b) OFFENSES.—

(1) CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS.—A commission shall have jurisdiction to hear any criminal prosecution involving international terrorism, including any offense under chapter 113B of title 18, United States Code.

(2) OFFENSES AGAINST THE LAWS OF WAR.—A commission shall have exclusive jurisdiction over violations of the laws of war committed by unprivileged combatants.

(3) OTHER OFFENSES.—A commission shall have jurisdiction over other offenses traditionally tri-able by military commissions or pursuant to the Department of Defense's Military Commission Instruction Number Two.

SEC. 5. APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

(a) FINAL DECISIONS.—The United States Court of Military Appeals shall have exclusive jurisdiction of appeals from all final decisions of a classification tribunal board or commission under this Act.

(b) REVIEW BY SUPREME COURT.—

(1) CERTIORARI.—The decisions of the United States Court of Military Appeals are subject to review by the Supreme Court by writ of certiorari.

(2) EXEMPTION FROM CERTAIN PETITION REQUIREMENTS.—A person who files a petition for a writ of certiorari under paragraph (1) shall not be required to submit—

(A) prepayment of any fees and costs or security therefor; or

(B) the affidavit required by section 1915(a) of title 28, United States Code.

(c) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Section 1005 of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 (10 U.S.C. 801 note) is amended—

(A) in subsection (e), by striking paragraphs (2) through (4); and

(B) by striking subsection (h) and inserting the following:

''(h) EFFECTIVE DATE.—This section shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.''.

(2) HABEAS.—Section 2241(e) of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(A) in the matter preceding paragraph (1), by striking ''section 1005 of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005'' and inserting ''the Unprivileged Combatant Act of 2006'';

(B) by striking paragraph (2)(B) and inserting the following:

''(B) has been determined by a classification tribunal to meet the requirements of paragraph (1) or (2) of section 9(a) of the Unprivileged Combatant Act of 2006.''.

SEC. 6. COMMISSION.

(a) COMMISSION PERSONNEL.—

(1) MEMBERS.—

(A) APPOINTMENT.—The Secretary of Defense shall designate no less than 12 United States military judges to serve as members of

1 a commission and to assume other duties as-
2 signed in this Act.
3 (B) NUMBER OF MEMBERS.—Each com-
4 mission shall consist of at least 3 military offi-
5 cers, at least one of whom shall be a military
6 judge.
7 (C) ALTERNATE MEMBERS.—For each
8 such commission, there shall also be 1 or 2 al-
9 ternate members. The alternate member or
10 members shall attend all sessions of the com-
11 mission. In case of incapacity, resignation, or
12 removal of any member, an alternate member
13 shall take the place of that member.
14 (D) QUALIFICATIONS.—Each member and
15 alternate member of the commission shall be a
16 military officer.
17 (E) PRESIDING OFFICER.—
18 (i) IN GENERAL.—From among the
19 members of the commission, the Secretary
20 of Defense shall designate a presiding offi-
21 cer who is a military judge to preside over
22 the proceedings of that commission.
23 (ii) DUTIES.—The duties of the pre-
24 siding officer shall be as follows:

1 (I) The presiding officer shall
2 admit or exclude evidence at trial in
3 accordance with the rules of this Act.
4 The presiding officer shall have au-
5 thority to close proceedings or por-
6 tions of proceedings in accordance
7 with this Act or for any other reason
8 necessary for the conduct of a full and
9 fair trial.
10 (II) The presiding officer shall
11 ensure that the discipline, dignity, and
12 decorum of the proceedings are main-
13 tained, shall exercise control over the
14 proceedings to ensure proper imple-
15 mentation of the President's Military
16 Order and this Act, and shall have au-
17 thority to act upon any contempt or
18 breach of commission rules and proce-
19 dures. Any attorney authorized to ap-
20 pear before a commission who is
21 thereafter found not to satisfy the re-
22 quirements for eligibility or who fails
23 to comply with laws, rules, regula-
24 tions, or other orders applicable to the 25 commission proceedings or any other individual who violates such laws, rules, regulations, or orders may be disciplined as the presiding officer deems appropriate, including revocation of eligibility to appear before that commission. The Court may further revoke that attorney's or any other person's eligibility to appear before any other commission convened under this Act.

(III) The presiding officer shall ensure the expeditious conduct of the trial. In no circumstance shall accommodation of counsel be allowed to delay proceedings unreasonably.

(IV) The presiding officer may certify interlocutory questions to the Military Commission Review Panel for the Armed Forces as the presiding officer deems appropriate.

(b) POWERS OF A COMMISSION.—A commission shall have the following powers:

(1) To summon witnesses to the trial and to require their attendance and testimony and to put questions to them.

1 (2) To require the production of documents and
2 other evidentiary material.
3 (3) To administer oaths to witnesses.
4 (4) To appoint officers for the carrying out of 5 any task designated by the commission, including
6 the power to have evidence taken.

7 SEC. 7. PERSONS IN CUSTODY.

8 (a) IN GENERAL.—Not later than 60 days after the 9 date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense
10 shall develop—
11 (1) a complete listing of all persons who—
12 (A) are being detained by the Department
13 of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba; and
14 (B) the Government wishes to continue to 15 detain as an unprivileged combatant; and 16 (2) a detailed summary of the evidence upon
17 which the determination to keep a person described
18 in paragraph (1) in custody was made.
19 (b) CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT.—Not later than 10
20 days after developing the list described in subsection (a),
21 the Secretary of Defense shall submit an unclassified
22 version of that list to the appropriate committees of Con-
23 gress. A classified, unredacted version of that list shall 24 also be submitted to the appropriate committees of Con-
25 gress for review.

1 (c) UPDATED LIST.—The Secretary of Defense shall
2 update the list of the persons described in subsection (a)
3 not less than once every 60 days after the date the list
4 described in subsection (a) is completed.

5 (d) CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT.—Not later than 10
6 days after updating the list of persons under subsection
7 (c), the Secretary of Defense shall submit that updated
8 list to the appropriate committees of Congress in both un-
9 classified and unredacted, classified form.

10 SEC. 8. FIELD TRIBUNALS.

11 (a) IN GENERAL.—Not more than 30 days after a
12 suspected unprivileged combatant has been detained by
13 United States forces, the Department of Defense shall 14 conduct a field tribunal in order to determine whether the
15 detainee is an unprivileged combatant and whether the de-
16 tainee is entitled to the rights afforded under the Geneva
17 Convention.

18 (b) PROCEDURES.—The procedures governing a field
19 tribunal shall be promulgated by the Department of De-
20 fense

21 SEC. 9. CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNALS.

22 (a) IN GENERAL.—A detainee shall be released and
23 repatriated to an appropriate country unless a classifica-
24 tion tribunal board finds by a preponderance of the evi-
25 dence that—

1 (1) the detainee is a threat to the national secu-
2 rity interest of the United States; or
3 (2) there are reasonable grounds to believe that
4 if released the detainee would take up arms against
5 the United States.
6 (b) COMPLIANCE WITH GENEVA CONVENTIONS.—If
7 a detainee is found to be a privileged combatant entitled
8 to provisions under the Convention Relative to the Treat-
9 ment of Prisoners of War, done at Geneva, August 12,
10 1948 (6 UST 3516), then the detainee must be treated
11 in accordance with that convention.
12 (c) CITIZEN OF THE UNITED STATES.—If a detainee
13 is found to be a citizen of the United States of America,
14 the detainee shall not be held or tried under this Act.
15 (d) CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNAL BOARD.—A classi-
16 fication tribunal shall be conducted by a board appointed
17 by the Secretary of Defense and consist solely of line offi-
18 cers, one of whom shall be an attorney.
19 (e) DETERMINATION.—
20 (1) IN GENERAL.—If a classification tribunal
21 board finds that a detainee meets the requirements
22 of subsection (a), the classification tribunal board
23 shall order that the detainee shall continue to be de-
24 tained by the Department of Defense, subject to
25 periodic review under subsection (h).

1 (2) TIME PERIOD.—The time period for the de-
2 tention of a detainee under paragraph (1) may not
3 exceed the time period that United States forces are
4 engaged in combat operations as defined by the De-
5 partment of Defense in the nation or theater where
6 the detainee was captured so long as the detainee is
7 found to be a privileged combatant.
8 (3) CONCLUSION OF COMBAT.—At the conclu-
9 sion of combat operations within a given theater or 10 nation—
11 (A) a privileged combatant that was cap-
12 tured in that area shall be either indicted under
13 this Act or repatriated to the appropriate coun-
14 try; and
15 (B) an unprivileged combatant may con-
16 tinue to be detained pursuant to subsection (a).
17 (f) CONSIDERATIONS.—
18 (1) IN GENERAL.—In making a determination
19 under subsection (a), a classification tribunal board
20 shall consider any information brought to its atten-
21 tion regarding the need for continued detention, in-
22 cluding—
23 (A) the detainee's alleged position or rank
24 in any hostile organization;

1 (B) the activities of that hostile organiza-
2 tion;
3 (C) any statements made by the detainee
4 in response to interrogation; and
5 (D) the detainee's history of violence or
6 terrorist activity.
7 (2) PRIMA FACIE EVIDENCE.—If the Govern-
8 ment represents that a detainee was captured during
9 a military engagement while taking up arms against,
10 or supporting military operations against, the Armed
11 Forces of the United States or its allies, there shall
12 be prima facie evidence that, if released, the detainee
13 would take up arms against the United States.
14 (g) TIMING.—A detainee shall be afforded a classi-
15 fication tribunal as soon as is reasonably practicable but
16 not later than 180 days after the detainee's capture and
17 not later than 30 days after the detainee is listed under 18 section 7, unless continued.
19 (h) PERIODIC REVIEW.—
20 (1) IN GENERAL.—
21 (A) SEMIANNUAL REVIEW.—The classifica-
22 tion tribunal shall conduct a classification hear-
23 ing for each detainee not less frequently than
24 every 180 days, in accordance with the proce-

1 dures established under this section and section
2 10.
3 (B) ACTION PERIOD.—A detainee appre-
4 hended during a military engagement while tak-
5 ing up arms against, or supporting military op-
6 erations against, the Armed Forces of the
7 United States or its allies may be detained until
8 the cessation of armed hostilities in the nation
9 or region in which they were captured.
10 (2) ARGUMENT.—The Government and the de-
11 tainee may be heard regarding the review under
12 paragraph (1).
13 SEC. 10. CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNAL PROCEDURES.
14 (a) DETAINEES.—
15 (1) IN GENERAL.—A detainee shall not be re-
16 quired to testify or present any evidence at a classi-
17 fication tribunal.
18 (2) PRESENCE.—A detainee shall be entitled to
19 be present at the classification tribunal, unless the
20 head of the tribunal has decided to admit classified
21 information.
22 (b) COUNSEL.—
23 (1) IN GENERAL.—A detainee is entitled to the
24 assistance of counsel admitted to practice under this
25 Act at every stage of the classification tribunal, in-

1 cluding the periodic review of orders under sub-
2 section (e).
3 (2) RIGHT TO APPOINTED COUNSEL.—A de-
4 tainee who is unable to obtain counsel is entitled to
5 have counsel admitted to practice before a commis-
6 sion under this Act.
7 (3) REFUSAL OF COUNSEL.—A detainee may
8 waive counsel but shall not be entitled to protected
9 information.
10 (c) DISCOVERY.—
11 (1) GOVERNMENT'S DISCLOSURE.—Not later
12 than 3 days prior to the classification tribunal, the
13 Government shall make available for inspection by
14 counsel for the detainee any affidavit or affirmation
15 the Government intends to offer in support of con-
16 tinuing to detain the detainee. A classification tri-
17 bunal board shall maintain a copy of any submis-
18 sions made by the Government for inspection by the 19 detainee and for transmittal, if necessary, to that 20 tribunal.
21 (2) DETAINEE'S DISCLOSURE.—If the detainee
22 chooses to submit any evidence, such evidence, in-
23 cluding a list of any witnesses the detainee intends
24 to call, shall be made available to the Government

1 for inspection not later than 3 days prior to the clas-
2 sification tribunal.
3 (d) EVIDENCE.—
4 (1) IN GENERAL.—The Federal Rules of Evi-
5 dence shall not apply to a classification tribunal.
6 (2) ADMISSIBILITY STANDARD.—Evidence shall
7 be admitted if the classification tribunal board deter-
8 mines the evidence would have probative value to a
9 reasonable person.
10 (3) AFFIDAVIT OR AFFIRMATION.—The Govern-
11 ment may proceed by proffer and submit any rel-
12 evant information by affidavit or affirmation, unless
13 decided unreliable by the members of the classifica-
14 tion tribunal board.
15 (4) CROSS-EXAMINATION.—
16 (A) GOVERNMENT WITNESSES.—If a Gov-
17 ernment chooses to call witnesses, the detainee
18 may cross-examine those witnesses on all rel-
19 evant facts.
20 (B) DETAINEE WITNESSES.—If a detainee
21 calls any witnesses, they shall be subject to
22 cross examination.
23 (C) DETAINEE.—If the detainee chooses to
24 testify, the detainee shall be subject to cross-ex-
25 amination.

1 (e) DEFENSES.—A detainee may challenge whether
2 the detainee satisfies the elements required under sub-
3 section (a).
4 (f) PROCEEDINGS.—
5 (1) IN GENERAL.—A classification tribunal
6 shall be closed to the public.
7 (2) SECURITY CLEARANCES.—Each person
8 present at a classification tribunal, other than the
9 detainee, shall possess a security clearance appro-
10 priate to the level of any classified information being
11 presented.
12 (3) PUBLIC INFORMATION REGARDING PRO-
13 CEEDINGS.—After the classification tribunal board
14 rules in the classification tribunal, the parties shall
15 propose a nonclassified summary to that board. The 16 board shall publicly release a summary, containing
17 any information generated at the tribunal which can
18 be disclosed in a manner consistent with the Classi-
19 fied Information Procedures Act (18 U.S.C. App.)
20 and the national security of the United States.
21 (g) REINSTITUTING CLASSIFICATION PRO-
22 CEEDINGS.—
23 (1) IN GENERAL.—If a matter involving the
24 classification tribunal of a detainee is dismissed
25 without prejudice by the classification tribunal or

withdrawn by the Government at, or prior to, the classification tribunal, the Government may reinstitute the matter with the tribunal board that dismissed or permitted the withdrawal of the matter.

(2) TIME LIMIT.—A complaint reinstituting proceedings under paragraph (1) shall be filed not later than 10 days after the dismissal or withdrawal of the matter.

(3) NUMBER.—The Government may reinstitute proceedings under paragraph (1) not more than twice and only if approved by the ranking member on the classification tribunal board.

SEC. 11. CONTINUANCE OF CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNALS.

(a) CONTINUANCES.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—A classification tribunal board may, for cause shown, grant a continuance of a classification tribunal.

(2) CONTINUANCE.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—Upon motion of the Government, the classification tribunal board may grant a continuance for as long as necessary, but no longer than a 6-month period, under paragraph (1) if the classification tribunal board determines that the detainee is a high level individual in the planning or financ-

1 ing of terrorist activities or the individual pos-
2 sess information vital to the safety of the
3 United States or its citizens.
4 (B) SUBSEQUENT CONTINUANCES.—The
5 Government may obtain subsequent continu-
6 ances for additional 6-month periods so long as
7 the classification tribunal board finds such con-
8 tinuances are necessary to the informational
9 gathering purposes as it related to the national
10 security of the United States.
11 (3) EX PARTE APPLICATIONS.—
12 (A) IN GENERAL.—The Government may
13 move for a continuance under paragraph (1) ex
14 parte.
15 (B) DETAINEE RIGHTS.—A detainee—
16 (i) is not entitled to representation by
17 counsel in connection with any such ex
18 parte motion; and
19 (ii) shall not be given notice of the re-
20 quest for a hearing prior to the ruling of
21 the classification tribunal board on the
22 Government's request for a continuance
23 pursuant to paragraph (2).

1 (b) GRANT OF CONTINUANCE.—For each continu-
2 ance granted under subsection (a), the classification tri-
3 bunal board shall note on the record of the proceedings—
4 (1) the grounds for granting each such continu-
5 ance;
6 (2) the identity of the party requesting the con-
7 tinuance;
8 (3) the new date and time for the tribunal hear-
9 ing; and
10 (4) the reasons that the date under paragraph
11 (3) was chosen.

12 SEC. 12. CRIMINAL PROSECUTION PROCEDURES GEN-
13 ERALLY.

14 (a) COUNSEL.—
15 (1) IN GENERAL.—A defendant in a criminal
16 proceeding under this Act has a right to be rep-
17 resented by counsel admitted to practice before a
18 commission under this Act.
19 (2) APPOINTED COUNSEL.—
20 (A) IN GENERAL.—A defendant who is un-
21 able to obtain counsel is entitled to have counsel
22 appointed and to be represented by such coun-
23 sel at every stage of the proceeding subsequent
24 to being indicted.

1 (B) APPOINTMENT PROCEDURE.—The
2 Secretary of Defense shall determine the rules
3 for appointing counsel to practice before the
4 commission.
5 (b) DISCOVERY.—
6 (1) CLASSIFIED DOCUMENTS AND OBJECTS.—
7 The Government shall provide the defense with ac-
8 cess to evidence the Government intends to intro-
9 duce at trial and with access to evidence known to
10 the Government or which should be known to the 11 Government that tends to exculpate the accused. In-
12 formation disclosed to the defense may not be dis-
13 closed to the defendant if it is classified as defined
14 by this Act. The defense may submit classified infor-
15 mation for review under section 12(b)(2).
16 (2) SEPARATE COMMISSION CONCERNING CLAS-
17 SIFIED INFORMATION.—The Secretary of Defense
18 shall appoint a commission to conduct a thorough
19 review of the classification system for national secu-
20 rity information, including the policy, procedures,
21 and practices of the system. The Secretary of De-
22 fense shall determine what level of security clearance
23 is necessary to conduct the review under this para-
24 graph. No person shall be appointed as a member of
25 the commission who does not have a security clear-

1 ance at or above the level of clearance so designated
2 by the Secretary. The commission shall make rec-
3 ommendations to the Secretary of Defense as to the
4 declassification of information relevant to the trial of
5 detainees.
6 (3) REGULATING DISCOVERY.—
7 (A) IN GENERAL.—A commission may, for
8 good cause, deny, restrict, or defer discovery or
9 inspection, or grant other appropriate relief.
10 (B) EX PARTE REQUEST.—A party may
11 make an ex parte request in writing that a com-
12 mission deny, restrict, or defer discovery or in-
13 spection under subparagraph (A). If the a com-
14 mission grants a request under this subpara-
15 graph, the Commission shall preserve the entire
16 text of the party's request under seal.
17 (C) FAILURE TO COMPLY.—If a party fails
18 to comply with the rules of discovery applicable
19 to a commission, the commission may—
20 (i) order that party to permit the dis-
21 covery or inspection, specify its time, place,
22 and manner, and prescribe other just
23 terms and conditions; or
24 (ii) grant a continuance.
25 (c) OPEN PROCEEDINGS.—

1 (1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in para-
2 graphs (2) and (3), a proceeding before a commis-
3 sion shall be open to the public.
4 (2) CLASSIFIED INFORMATION.—
5 (A) IN GENERAL.—Upon motion by the
6 Government, a proceeding before a commission
7 shall be closed to the public if necessary to
8 avoid disclosure of classified information.
9 (B) NONDISCLOSURE.—A priority under
10 subparagraph (A) shall not disclose any infor-
11 mation presented during a closed session to in-
12 dividuals excluded from such proceeding or part
13 thereof including the defendant.
14 (3) OTHER BASES.—A commission may order
15 that a hearing be held, in whole or in part, in cam-
16 era, if the commission determines—
17 (A) it is appropriate for the security of a
18 witness or a Government employee or to protect
19 public safety; or
20 (B) that an open hearing would deter a
21 witness from testifying freely or prevent the
22 witness from testifying at all.
23 (4) EXTRAJUDICIAL STATEMENTS.—At the dis-
24 cretion of a commission, the commission may issue

1 an order limiting extrajudicial statements by the
2 parties.
3 (d) PROTECTED INFORMATION.—
4 (1) IN GENERAL.—A commission may issue
5 protective orders as necessary to safeguard protected
6 information in a proceeding before that commission.
7 (2) NOTIFICATION.—As soon as practicable, a
8 party shall notify a commission of any intent to offer
9 evidence including protected information .
10 (3) TRIAL RECORD.—
11 (A) IN GENERAL.—All exhibits admitted as
12 evidence but containing protected information
13 shall be sealed and annexed to the record of 14 trial.
15 (B) PROTECTED INFORMATION NOT AD-
16 MITTED.—Any protected information not admit-
17 ted as evidence, but reviewed by a commission
18 in camera and withheld from the defendant's
19 counsel over objection shall be sealed and an-
20 nexed to the record of the trial, with any associ-
21 ated motions and responses and any materials
22 submitted in support thereof, as additional ex-
23 hibits.
24 (e) RECORD OF TRIAL.—

1 (1) REQUIREMENT FOR RECORD.—A record of
2 each proceeding by a commission shall be prepared
3 promptly after the conclusion of the trial.
4 (2) VERBATIM TRANSCRIPT.—The record of
5 trial shall include a verbatim written transcript of all
6 sessions of the trial.
7 (3) EXHIBITS AND OTHER EVIDENCE.—The
8 record of trial shall also include all exhibits and
9 other real or demonstrative evidence, except that
10 photographs may be substituted for any large writ-
11 ten or graphic exhibits and any other real or demon-
12 strative evidence. If a photograph is substituted for
13 an exhibit or other evidence, the Government shall 14 retain the original exhibit or other evidence, respec-
15 tively, until no further appeal of the results of the 16 trial is authorized.
17 (4) CLASSIFIED INFORMATION.—In the case of
18 a conviction of a charge on which classified informa-
19 tion is admitted as evidence by a commission, the
20 copy of the record of trial submitted to the commis-
21 sion shall include the classified information.

22 SEC. 13. TRIAL PROCEDURES FOR UNPRIVILEGED COMBAT-
23 ANTS.

24 (a) SPECIALIZED PROCEDURES.—

1 (1) STANDARD OF PROOF.—All 3 members of a
2 commission shall agree that the defendant is guilty
3 beyond a reasonable doubt for a defendant to be
4 found guilty.
5 (2) RULES OF PROCEDURE.—
6 (A) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in
7 subparagraph (B), the Secretary of Defense
8 shall draft supplementary rules to govern all
9 proceedings under this section.
10 (B) STANDARD.—Evidence is admissible if
11 the Secretary of Defense determines that the
12 evidence would have probative value to a rea-
13 sonable person.
14 (3) FORM OF TRIAL.—Any trial under this sub-
15 section shall take place before 2 military officers or
16 attorneys and at least one military judge.
17 (4) BAD ACTS.—Other bad acts may be consid-
18 ered if they would have fallen within the definition
19 under this Act of either terrorism or terrorist activ-
20 ity and they are deemed to be relevant by a commis-
21 sion including propensity.
22 (b) CUSTODY.—The Department of Defense shall re-
23 tain custody of any person determined by a commission
24 to be unprivileged combatants after the person has been
25 either convicted or sentenced in accordance with this Act,

1 unless the Department of Defense deems otherwise. Deci-
2 sions made by a commission in regards to a detainee's
3 guilt or innocence may be considered by a tribunal when
4 assessing the need to continue the detention of a detainee.

5 SEC. 14. COMMUNICATION WITH PERSONS IN CUSTODY.

6 An individual detained, indicted, or convicted under
7 this Act shall only be permitted to communicate with the
8 interpreter assigned to the individual, the counsel rep-
9 resenting the individual, prison personnel, and any other
10 individual approved by the Secretary of Defense.

11 SEC. 15. COMMISSION COUNSEL.

12 (a) IN GENERAL.—A person shall be admitted to 13 practice before a commission if the person—

14 (1) is a United States citizen;

15 (2) has been admitted to the practice of law in 16 a State, district, territory, or possession of the
17 United States, or before a Federal court;

18 (3) has not been sanctioned or otherwise the
19 subject of disciplinary action by any court, bar, or 20 other competent governmental authority for mis-
21 conduct;

22 (4) is eligible for access to information classi-
23 fied at the level of secret as defined by the Depart-
24 ment of Defense; and

1 (5) signs a written agreement to comply with
2 all applicable regulations or instructions for counsel,
3 including any rules of court for conduct during the
4 course of proceedings.
5 (b) CONSULTATION WITH COLLEAGUES.—Any per-
6 son admitted under subsection (a) shall not confer with
7 any colleague who does not have the appropriate clearance.
8 (c) SECURITY CLEARANCE.—
9 (1) EXPEDITED CONSIDERATION.—The Sec-
10 retary of Defense shall ensure that a person seeking
11 to be admitted under subsection (a) is timely proc-
12 essed for the security clearance required for access
13 to materials necessary for providing a defendant
14 with effective assistance of counsel.
15 (2) COUNSEL INELIGIBLE FOR CLEARANCE.—If
16 the Secretary of Defense determines a person is not
17 eligible for the necessary security clearance, the per-
18 son shall not be permitted to represent an individual
19 in any proceeding before the Commission. The deter-
20 mination of the Secretary of Defense shall be final
21 and is not subject to appeal to, or other review by,
22 any court of the United States.
23 (d) TRAVEL EXPENSES.—The Secretary of Defense
24 shall reimburse any person not employed by the Govern-
25 ment who is representing an individual before the Com-

1 mission for travel away from the home or regular place
2 of business of the person in connection with such represen-
3 tation. The rates for the payment of travel expenses under
4 this subsection shall be those authorized for employees of
5 agencies under subchapter I of chapter 57 of title 5,
6 United States Code.

Short Summary

The Unprivileged Combatants Act of 2006 is a follow-up to the Military Commissions Procedures Act of 2002 (S. 1937, 107th Congress) which you cosponsored with Senator Durbin in February 2002. The goal of this bill is to balance the need for national security (interrogations and detention of combatants) with the need to afford detainees with sufficient due process so that nations such as Great Britain and Australia will not place undue pressure on the United States to release their citizens from Guantanamo Bay. This bill addresses only those combatants currently held at Guantanamo Bay. The Act clarifies the procedures used in Combatant Status Review Tribunals and establishes procedures for the trial of detainees. These procedures constitute "a meaningful opportunity to contest the factual basis for that detention before a neutral decision-maker." (Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507, O'Connor, J.) This bill does not address the issue of unprivileged combatants contesting their detentions through habeas appeals. Although the Graham-Kyl-Levin amendment to the 2005 DoD appropriations bill has addressed this issue, a forthcoming Supreme Court decision (Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 04-5393) will probably require additional legislation on this matter.

Section by Section of your bill

- Section 301: Findings: This title is in direct response to the United State Supreme Court's ruling in Rasul v. Bush.
- Section 302: Definition Section: Definition section of the bill which defines primary terms such as field tribunal, classification tribunal, military commission, and unprivileged combatant.
- Section 303: Authorizing Military Commissions: The President is authorized to establish military commissions for the trial of individuals for offenses as provided in this title.
- Section 304: Jurisdiction Over Unprivileged Combatants: This title establishes exclusive jurisdiction to hear any matter involving an unprivileged combatant who has been detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. These detainees may be tried via laws of war or pursuant to the Department of Defense's Military Commission Instruction Number Two.
- Section 305: Appellate Jurisdiction: The U.S. Courts of Military Appeals shall have exclusive jurisdiction over appeals from all final decisions of a classification tribunal board or military commission under this title. These decisions are then subject to review by the Supreme Court by writ of certiorari.
- Section 306: Military Commission: The Commissions shall consist of three military officers, at least one of whom is a Judge Advocate General. These Commissions shall decide the guilt or innocence of detainees charged under section 304 of this Act. This is basically what happens now.
- Section 307: Persons in Custody: Not more than 60 days after the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense is required to develop a list of all persons who are being detained at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and whom the government wishes to continue to detain as an unprivileged combatant. The Act requires that the original list and subsequent lists, updated at least once every 60 days, be submitted to the appropriate House and Senate committees.

- Section 308: Field Tribunals: Not more than 30 days after a suspected unprivileged combatant has been detained by United States forces, the Department of Defense shall conduct a field tribunal ("FT") in order to determine whether the detainee is an unprivileged combatant and whether the detainee is entitled to the rights afforded under the Geneva Convention. The procedures governing a field tribunal shall be promulgated by the Department of Defense.
- Section 309: Classification Tribunals: A Classification Tribunal ("CT") is very similar to the current Combatant Status Review Tribunal. The CT shall be composed of three military officers, one of whom shall be an attorney. Pursuant to a hearing before a CT, a designee shall be released and repatriated to an appropriate country unless a CT finds by a preponderance of the evidence that—(1) the detainee is a threat to the national security interest of the United States; or (2) there are reasonable grounds to believe that if released the person would take up arms against the United States. Decisions of the CT shall be repeated every six months. Detainees may be released only when the CT or the Administrative Board determines the detainee is no longer a threat to national security. This section also expressly states that a detainee who is also a United States citizen may not be held or tried under this act.
- Section 310: Classification Tribunal Procedures: Procedures for CT's are the same as those of Combatant Status Review Tribunals except detainees shall be represented by counsel and are permitted to view unclassified discovery that the prosecution plans to present before the tribunal.
- Section 311: Continuance of Classification Tribunals: Classification tribunals may be continued in order for the government to continue their interrogation of a detainee. Upon a motion from the Government, the classification tribunal board may grant a continuance for up to a 6-month period, if the classification tribunal board determines that: 1) the individual being detained is a high level individual in the planning or financing of terrorist activities, or 2) the individual possesses information vital to the safety of the United States or its citizens. The Government may obtain more than one continuance if it demonstrates that such continuances are necessary for information gathering purposes as it relates to national security. Said applications for Continuances shall be made ex parte and before a detainee is given an attorney. Accordingly, a detainee is only given an attorney once the tribunal is informed that the interrogation efforts have been exhausted.
- Section 312 & 313: Criminal Prosecution Procedures: Military Commission procedures will be the same as the current procedures afforded detainees under the current system.
- Section 314: Communication with Persons in Custody: Limits communications by any detainee indicted or convicted under this Act to the individual's interpreter, assigned counsel, prison personnel, and any other individual(s) approved by the Secretary of Defense.

- Section 315: Commission Counsel: Provides the following criteria for persons to be admitted to practice before a commission: 1) US Citizen, 2) has been admitted to practice law in a State, district, territory or possession of the United States or before Federal Court, 3) has not been disciplined by any court, bar or other competent governmental authority for misconduct, 4) maintains a minimum of "secret" clearance and 5) signs a written agreement to comply with all applicable regulations and instructions for counsel during the course of proceedings. It further provides persons admitted to practice will not confer with any colleague who does not have at least a "secret" clearance. This section provides that individuals seeking to practice before a commission will be expedited in consideration for obtaining the necessary security clearance. The decision of the Secretary of Defense regarding the granting or not of the security clearance is final and is not eligible for appeal or review. Finally, this section provides that persons practicing before the commission are eligible to have their travel expenses reimbursed.

2D SESSION

S. _____

To provide comprehensive procedures for the adjudication of cases involving unprivileged combatants.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

_____ introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on _____

A BILL

To provide comprehensive procedures for the adjudication of cases involving unprivileged combatants.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE; AUTHORITY; FINDINGS.

(a) SHORT TITLE.—This Act may be cited as the ''Unprivileged Combatant Act of 2006''.

(b) AUTHORITY.—The requirements, conditions, and restrictions established by this Act are made under the authority of Congress under clauses 1, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 18 of article I, section 8 of the Constitution of the United States.

(c) FINDINGS.—Congress finds the following:

(1) Article I, section 8, of the Constitution provides that the Congress has the power to ''constitute Tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court; ... define and punish ... Offenses against the Law of Nations; ... make Rules concerning Captures on Land and Water; ... make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof''.

(2) The Supreme Court has repeatedly recognized military tribunals, as stated in Madsen v. Kinsella 343 U.S. 341, 1952, ''[s]ince our nation's earliest days, such tribunals have been constitutionally recognized agencies for meeting many urgent governmental responsibilities related to war....They have taken many forms and borne many names. Neither their procedure nor their jurisdiction has been prescribed by statute. It has been adapted in each instance to the need that called it forth.'' Madsen, citing In re Yamashita, 327 U.S. 1 (1946).

(3) The President has inherent authority to convene military tribunals arising from his role as Commander and Chief of the Armed Forces under article II of the Constitution and from title 10 of the United States Code. Due to the extraordinary circumstances of the ongoing war on terrorism, it is appropriate for Congress to provide additional and explicit authorization of and procedures for military tribunals to adjudicate and punish offenses relating to the war on terrorism.

(4) This Act is in direct response to the United State Supreme Court's ruling in Rasul v. Bush. With the passage of this Act, the 109th Congress will have addressed the concerns of the Supreme Court's Rasul majority, and therefore alien enemy combatants detained or prosecuted under this Act may not challenge their detentions in the Federal courts of the United States via the habeas or any other statute.

SEC. 2. DEFINITIONS.

As used in this Act, the following definitions apply:

(1) CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNAL.—The term ''classification tribunal'' means any tribunal conducted under section 9 or any related proceeding.

(2) CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNAL BOARD.—The term ''classification tribunal board'' means a board established pursuant to section 9(d).

the Committee on Armed Services of the Senate and the Committee on the Judiciary and the Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives.

SEC. 3. AUTHORIZING MILITARY COMMISSIONS.

The President is authorized to establish military commissions for the trial of individuals for offenses as provided in this Act.

SEC. 4. JURISDICTION.

(a) UNPRIVILEGED COMBATANTS.—This Act establishes exclusive jurisdiction to hear any matter involving an unprivileged combatant who has been detained by the Department of Defense for not less than 180 consecutive days at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

(b) OFFENSES.—

(1) CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS.—A commission shall have jurisdiction to hear any criminal prosecution involving international terrorism, including any offense under chapter 113B of title 18, United States Code.

(2) OFFENSES AGAINST THE LAWS OF WAR.—A commission shall have exclusive jurisdiction over violations of the laws of war committed by unprivileged combatants.

(3) OTHER OFFENSES.—A commission shall have jurisdiction over other offenses traditionally tri-

able by military commissions or pursuant to the Department of Defense's Military Commission Instruction Number Two.

SEC. 5. APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

(a) FINAL DECISIONS.—The United States Court of Military Appeals shall have exclusive jurisdiction of appeals from all final decisions of a classification tribunal board or commission under this Act.

(b) REVIEW BY SUPREME COURT.—

(1) CERTIORARI.—The decisions of the United States Court of Military Appeals are subject to review by the Supreme Court by writ of certiorari.

(2) EXEMPTION FROM CERTAIN PETITION REQUIREMENTS.—A person who files a petition for a writ of certiorari under paragraph (1) shall not be required to submit—

(A) prepayment of any fees and costs or security therefor; or

(B) the affidavit required by section 1915(a) of title 28, United States Code.

(c) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Section 1005 of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 (10 U.S.C. 801 note) is amended—

(A) in subsection (e), by striking paragraphs (2) through (4); and

(B) by striking subsection (h) and inserting the following:

''(h) EFFECTIVE DATE.—This section shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.''.

(2) HABEAS.—Section 2241(e) of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(A) in the matter preceding paragraph (1), by striking ''section 1005 of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005'' and inserting ''the Unprivileged Combatant Act of 2006'';

(B) by striking paragraph (2)(B) and inserting the following:

''(B) has been determined by a classification tribunal to meet the requirements of paragraph (1) or (2) of section 9(a) of the Unprivileged Combatant Act of 2006.''.

SEC. 6. COMMISSION.

(a) COMMISSION PERSONNEL.—

(1) MEMBERS.—

(A) APPOINTMENT.—The Secretary of Defense shall designate no less than 12 United States military judges to serve as members of

1 a commission and to assume other duties as-
2 signed in this Act.
3 (B) NUMBER OF MEMBERS.—Each com-
4 mission shall consist of at least 3 military offi-
5 cers, at least one of whom shall be a military
6 judge.
7 (C) ALTERNATE MEMBERS.—For each
8 such commission, there shall also be 1 or 2 al-
9 ternate members. The alternate member or
10 members shall attend all sessions of the com-
11 mission. In case of incapacity, resignation, or
12 removal of any member, an alternate member
13 shall take the place of that member.
14 (D) QUALIFICATIONS.—Each member and
15 alternate member of the commission shall be a
16 military officer.
17 (E) PRESIDING OFFICER.—
18 (i) IN GENERAL.—From among the
19 members of the commission, the Secretary
20 of Defense shall designate a presiding offi-
21 cer who is a military judge to preside over
22 the proceedings of that commission.
23 (ii) DUTIES.—The duties of the pre-
24 siding officer shall be as follows:

1 (I) The presiding officer shall
2 admit or exclude evidence at trial in
3 accordance with the rules of this Act.
4 The presiding officer shall have au-
5 thority to close proceedings or por-
6 tions of proceedings in accordance
7 with this Act or for any other reason
8 necessary for the conduct of a full and
9 fair trial.
10 (II) The presiding officer shall
11 ensure that the discipline, dignity, and
12 decorum of the proceedings are main-
13 tained, shall exercise control over the
14 proceedings to ensure proper imple-
15 mentation of the President's Military
16 Order and this Act, and shall have au-
17 thority to act upon any contempt or
18 breach of commission rules and proce-
19 dures. Any attorney authorized to ap-
20 pear before a commission who is
21 thereafter found not to satisfy the re-
22 quirements for eligibility or who fails
23 to comply with laws, rules, regula-
24 tions, or other orders applicable to the
25 commission proceedings or any other

1 individual who violates such laws,
2 rules, regulations, or orders may be
3 disciplined as the presiding officer
4 deems appropriate, including revoca-
5 tion of eligibility to appear before that
6 commission. The Court may further
7 revoke that attorney's or any other
8 person's eligibility to appear before
9 any other commission convened under 10 this Act.
11 (III) The presiding officer shall 12 ensure the expeditious conduct of the 13 trial. In no circumstance shall accom-
14 modation of counsel be allowed to 15 delay proceedings unreasonably.
16 (IV) The presiding officer may 17 certify interlocutory questions to the 18 Military Commission Review Panel for 19 the Armed Forces as the presiding of-
20 ficer deems appropriate.
21 (b) POWERS OF A COMMISSION.—A commission shall 22 have the following powers:
23 (1) To summon witnesses to the trial and to re-
24 quire their attendance and testimony and to put 25 questions to them.

(2) To require the production of documents and other evidentiary material.

(3) To administer oaths to witnesses.

(4) To appoint officers for the carrying out of any task designated by the commission, including the power to have evidence taken.

SEC. 7. PERSONS IN CUSTODY.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Not later than 60 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense shall develop—

(1) a complete listing of all persons who—

(A) are being detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba; and

(B) the Government wishes to continue to detain as an unprivileged combatant; and

(2) a detailed summary of the evidence upon which the determination to keep a person described in paragraph (1) in custody was made.

(b) CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT.—Not later than 10 days after developing the list described in subsection (a), the Secretary of Defense shall submit an unclassified version of that list to the appropriate committees of Congress. A classified, unredacted version of that list shall also be submitted to the appropriate committees of Congress for review.

1 (c) UPDATED LIST.—The Secretary of Defense shall
2 update the list of the persons described in subsection (a)
3 not less than once every 60 days after the date the list
4 described in subsection (a) is completed.

5 (d) CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT.—Not later than 10
6 days after updating the list of persons under subsection
7 (c), the Secretary of Defense shall submit that updated
8 list to the appropriate committees of Congress in both un-
9 classified and unredacted, classified form.

10 SEC. 8. FIELD TRIBUNALS.

11 (a) IN GENERAL.—Not more than 30 days after a
12 suspected unprivileged combatant has been detained by
13 United States forces, the Department of Defense shall 14 conduct a field tribunal in order to determine whether the
15 detainee is an unprivileged combatant and whether the de-
16 tainee is entitled to the rights afforded under the Geneva
17 Convention.

18 (b) PROCEDURES.—The procedures governing a field
19 tribunal shall be promulgated by the Department of De-
20 fense

21 SEC. 9. CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNALS.

22 (a) IN GENERAL.—A detainee shall be released and
23 repatriated to an appropriate country unless a classifica-
24 tion tribunal board finds by a preponderance of the evi-
25 dence that—

1 (1) the detainee is a threat to the national secu-
2 rity interest of the United States; or
3 (2) there are reasonable grounds to believe that
4 if released the detainee would take up arms against
5 the United States.
6 (b) COMPLIANCE WITH GENEVA CONVENTIONS.—If
7 a detainee is found to be a privileged combatant entitled
8 to provisions under the Convention Relative to the Treat-
9 ment of Prisoners of War, done at Geneva, August 12,
10 1948 (6 UST 3516), then the detainee must be treated
11 in accordance with that convention.
12 (c) CITIZEN OF THE UNITED STATES.—If a detainee
13 is found to be a citizen of the United States of America,
14 the detainee shall not be held or tried under this Act.
15 (d) CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNAL BOARD.—A classi-
16 fication tribunal shall be conducted by a board appointed
17 by the Secretary of Defense and consist solely of line offi-
18 cers, one of whom shall be an attorney.
19 (e) DETERMINATION.—
20 (1) IN GENERAL.—If a classification tribunal
21 board finds that a detainee meets the requirements
22 of subsection (a), the classification tribunal board
23 shall order that the detainee shall continue to be de-
24 tained by the Department of Defense, subject to
25 periodic review under subsection (h).

1 (2) TIME PERIOD.—The time period for the de-
2 tention of a detainee under paragraph (1) may not
3 exceed the time period that United States forces are
4 engaged in combat operations as defined by the De-
5 partment of Defense in the nation or theater where
6 the detainee was captured so long as the detainee is
7 found to be a privileged combatant.
8 (3) CONCLUSION OF COMBAT.—At the conclu-
9 sion of combat operations within a given theater or
10 nation—
11 (A) a privileged combatant that was cap-
12 tured in that area shall be either indicted under
13 this Act or repatriated to the appropriate coun-
14 try; and
15 (B) an unprivileged combatant may con-
16 tinue to be detained pursuant to subsection (a).
17 (f) CONSIDERATIONS.—
18 (1) IN GENERAL.—In making a determination
19 under subsection (a), a classification tribunal board
20 shall consider any information brought to its atten-
21 tion regarding the need for continued detention, in-
22 cluding—
23 (A) the detainee's alleged position or rank
24 in any hostile organization;

1 (B) the activities of that hostile organiza-
2 tion;
3 (C) any statements made by the detainee
4 in response to interrogation; and
5 (D) the detainee's history of violence or
6 terrorist activity.
7 (2) PRIMA FACIE EVIDENCE.—If the Govern-
8 ment represents that a detainee was captured during
9 a military engagement while taking up arms against,
10 or supporting military operations against, the Armed
11 Forces of the United States or its allies, there shall
12 be prima facie evidence that, if released, the detainee
13 would take up arms against the United States.
14 (g) TIMING.—A detainee shall be afforded a classi-
15 fication tribunal as soon as is reasonably practicable but
16 not later than 180 days after the detainee's capture and
17 not later than 30 days after the detainee is listed under 18 section 7, unless continued.
19 (h) PERIODIC REVIEW.—
20 (1) IN GENERAL.—
21 (A) SEMIANNUAL REVIEW.—The classifica-
22 tion tribunal shall conduct a classification hear-
23 ing for each detainee not less frequently than
24 every 180 days, in accordance with the proce-

1 dures established under this section and section
2 10.
3 (B) ACTION PERIOD.—A detainee appre-
4 hended during a military engagement while tak-
5 ing up arms against, or supporting military op-
6 erations against, the Armed Forces of the
7 United States or its allies may be detained until
8 the cessation of armed hostilities in the nation
9 or region in which they were captured.
10 (2) ARGUMENT.—The Government and the de-
11 tainee may be heard regarding the review under
12 paragraph (1).
13 SEC. 10. CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNAL PROCEDURES.
14 (a) DETAINEES.—
15 (1) IN GENERAL.—A detainee shall not be re-
16 quired to testify or present any evidence at a classi-
17 fication tribunal.
18 (2) PRESENCE.—A detainee shall be entitled to
19 be present at the classification tribunal, unless the
20 head of the tribunal has decided to admit classified
21 information.
22 (b) COUNSEL.—
23 (1) IN GENERAL.—A detainee is entitled to the
24 assistance of counsel admitted to practice under this
25 Act at every stage of the classification tribunal, in-

1 cluding the periodic review of orders under sub-
2 section (e).
3 (2) RIGHT TO APPOINTED COUNSEL.—A de-
4 tainee who is unable to obtain counsel is entitled to
5 have counsel admitted to practice before a commis-
6 sion under this Act.
7 (3) REFUSAL OF COUNSEL.—A detainee may
8 waive counsel but shall not be entitled to protected
9 information.
10 (c) DISCOVERY.—
11 (1) GOVERNMENT'S DISCLOSURE.—Not later
12 than 3 days prior to the classification tribunal, the
13 Government shall make available for inspection by
14 counsel for the detainee any affidavit or affirmation
15 the Government intends to offer in support of con-
16 tinuing to detain the detainee. A classification tri-
17 bunal board shall maintain a copy of any submis-
18 sions made by the Government for inspection by the 19 detainee and for transmittal, if necessary, to that
20 tribunal.
21 (2) DETAINEE'S DISCLOSURE.—If the detainee
22 chooses to submit any evidence, such evidence, in-
23 cluding a list of any witnesses the detainee intends
24 to call, shall be made available to the Government

1 for inspection not later than 3 days prior to the clas-
2 sification tribunal.
3 (d) EVIDENCE.—
4 (1) IN GENERAL.—The Federal Rules of Evi-
5 dence shall not apply to a classification tribunal.
6 (2) ADMISSIBILITY STANDARD.—Evidence shall
7 be admitted if the classification tribunal board deter-
8 mines the evidence would have probative value to a
9 reasonable person.
10 (3) AFFIDAVIT OR AFFIRMATION.—The Govern-
11 ment may proceed by proffer and submit any rel-
12 evant information by affidavit or affirmation, unless
13 decided unreliable by the members of the classifica-
14 tion tribunal board.
15 (4) CROSS-EXAMINATION.—
16 (A) GOVERNMENT WITNESSES.—If a Gov-
17 ernment chooses to call witnesses, the detainee
18 may cross-examine those witnesses on all rel-
19 evant facts.
20 (B) DETAINEE WITNESSES.—If a detainee
21 calls any witnesses, they shall be subject to
22 cross examination.
23 (C) DETAINEE.—If the detainee chooses to
24 testify, the detainee shall be subject to cross-ex-
25 amination.

1 (e) DEFENSES.—A detainee may challenge whether
2 the detainee satisfies the elements required under sub-
3 section (a).
4 (f) PROCEEDINGS.—
5 (1) IN GENERAL.—A classification tribunal
6 shall be closed to the public.
7 (2) SECURITY CLEARANCES.—Each person
8 present at a classification tribunal, other than the
9 detainee, shall possess a security clearance appro-
10 priate to the level of any classified information being
11 presented.
12 (3) PUBLIC INFORMATION REGARDING PRO-
13 CEEDINGS.—After the classification tribunal board
14 rules in the classification tribunal, the parties shall
15 propose a nonclassified summary to that board. The
16 board shall publicly release a summary, containing
17 any information generated at the tribunal which can
18 be disclosed in a manner consistent with the Classi-
19 fied Information Procedures Act (18 U.S.C. App.)
20 and the national security of the United States.
21 (g) REINSTITUTING CLASSIFICATION PRO-
22 CEEDINGS.—
23 (1) IN GENERAL.—If a matter involving the
24 classification tribunal of a detainee is dismissed
25 without prejudice by the classification tribunal or

withdrawn by the Government at, or prior to, the classification tribunal, the Government may reinstitute the matter with the tribunal board that dismissed or permitted the withdrawal of the matter.

(2) TIME LIMIT.—A complaint reinstituting proceedings under paragraph (1) shall be filed not later than 10 days after the dismissal or withdrawal of the matter.

(3) NUMBER.—The Government may reinstitute proceedings under paragraph (1) not more than twice and only if approved by the ranking member on the classification tribunal board.

SEC. 11. CONTINUANCE OF CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNALS.

(a) CONTINUANCES.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—A classification tribunal board may, for cause shown, grant a continuance of a classification tribunal.

(2) CONTINUANCE.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—Upon motion of the Government, the classification tribunal board may grant a continuance for as long as necessary, but no longer than a 6-month period, under paragraph (1) if the classification tribunal board determines that the detainee is a high level individual in the planning or financ-

1 ing of terrorist activities or the individual pos-
2 sess information vital to the safety of the
3 United States or its citizens.
4 (B) SUBSEQUENT CONTINUANCES.—The
5 Government may obtain subsequent continu-
6 ances for additional 6-month periods so long as
7 the classification tribunal board finds such con-
8 tinuances are necessary to the informational
9 gathering purposes as it related to the national
10 security of the United States.
11 (3) EX PARTE APPLICATIONS.—
12 (A) IN GENERAL.—The Government may
13 move for a continuance under paragraph (1) ex
14 parte.
15 (B) DETAINEE RIGHTS.—A detainee—
16 (i) is not entitled to representation by
17 counsel in connection with any such ex
18 parte motion; and
19 (ii) shall not be given notice of the re-
20 quest for a hearing prior to the ruling of
21 the classification tribunal board on the
22 Government's request for a continuance
23 pursuant to paragraph (2).

1 (b) GRANT OF CONTINUANCE.—For each continu-
2 ance granted under subsection (a), the classification tri-
3 bunal board shall note on the record of the proceedings—
4 (1) the grounds for granting each such continu-
5 ance;
6 (2) the identity of the party requesting the con-
7 tinuance;
8 (3) the new date and time for the tribunal hear-
9 ing; and
10 (4) the reasons that the date under paragraph
11 (3) was chosen.

12 SEC. 12. CRIMINAL PROSECUTION PROCEDURES GEN-
13 ERALLY.

14 (a) COUNSEL.—
15 (1) IN GENERAL.—A defendant in a criminal
16 proceeding under this Act has a right to be rep-
17 resented by counsel admitted to practice before a
18 commission under this Act.
19 (2) APPOINTED COUNSEL.—
20 (A) IN GENERAL.—A defendant who is un-
21 able to obtain counsel is entitled to have counsel
22 appointed and to be represented by such coun-
23 sel at every stage of the proceeding subsequent
24 to being indicted.

1 (B) APPOINTMENT PROCEDURE.—The
2 Secretary of Defense shall determine the rules
3 for appointing counsel to practice before the
4 commission.
5 (b) DISCOVERY.—
6 (1) CLASSIFIED DOCUMENTS AND OBJECTS.—
7 The Government shall provide the defense with ac-
8 cess to evidence the Government intends to intro-
9 duce at trial and with access to evidence known to
10 the Government or which should be known to the 11 Government that tends to exculpate the accused. In-
12 formation disclosed to the defense may not be dis-
13 closed to the defendant if it is classified as defined
14 by this Act. The defense may submit classified infor-
15 mation for review under section 12(b)(2).
16 (2) SEPARATE COMMISSION CONCERNING CLAS-
17 SIFIED INFORMATION.—The Secretary of Defense
18 shall appoint a commission to conduct a thorough
19 review of the classification system for national secu-
20 rity information, including the policy, procedures,
21 and practices of the system. The Secretary of De-
22 fense shall determine what level of security clearance
23 is necessary to conduct the review under this para-
24 graph. No person shall be appointed as a member of
25 the commission who does not have a security clear-

1 ance at or above the level of clearance so designated
2 by the Secretary. The commission shall make rec-
3 ommendations to the Secretary of Defense as to the
4 declassification of information relevant to the trial of
5 detainees.
6 (3) REGULATING DISCOVERY.—
7 (A) IN GENERAL.—A commission may, for
8 good cause, deny, restrict, or defer discovery or
9 inspection, or grant other appropriate relief.
10 (B) EX PARTE REQUEST.—A party may
11 make an ex parte request in writing that a com-
12 mission deny, restrict, or defer discovery or in-
13 spection under subparagraph (A). If the a com-
14 mission grants a request under this subpara-
15 graph, the Commission shall preserve the entire
16 text of the party's request under seal.
17 (C) FAILURE TO COMPLY.—If a party fails
18 to comply with the rules of discovery applicable
19 to a commission, the commission may—
20 (i) order that party to permit the dis-
21 covery or inspection, specify its time, place,
22 and manner, and prescribe other just
23 terms and conditions; or
24 (ii) grant a continuance.
25 (c) OPEN PROCEEDINGS.—

1 (1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in para-
2 graphs (2) and (3), a proceeding before a commis-
3 sion shall be open to the public.
4 (2) CLASSIFIED INFORMATION.—
5 (A) IN GENERAL.—Upon motion by the
6 Government, a proceeding before a commission
7 shall be closed to the public if necessary to
8 avoid disclosure of classified information.
9 (B) NONDISCLOSURE.—A priority under
10 subparagraph (A) shall not disclose any infor-
11 mation presented during a closed session to in-
12 dividuals excluded from such proceeding or part
13 thereof including the defendant.
14 (3) OTHER BASES.—A commission may order
15 that a hearing be held, in whole or in part, in cam-
16 era, if the commission determines—
17 (A) it is appropriate for the security of a
18 witness or a Government employee or to protect
19 public safety; or
20 (B) that an open hearing would deter a
21 witness from testifying freely or prevent the
22 witness from testifying at all.
23 (4) EXTRAJUDICIAL STATEMENTS.—At the dis-
24 cretion of a commission, the commission may issue

1 an order limiting extrajudicial statements by the
2 parties.
3 (d) PROTECTED INFORMATION.—
4 (1) IN GENERAL.—A commission may issue
5 protective orders as necessary to safeguard protected
6 information in a proceeding before that commission.
7 (2) NOTIFICATION.—As soon as practicable, a
8 party shall notify a commission of any intent to offer
9 evidence including protected information .
10 (3) TRIAL RECORD.—
11 (A) IN GENERAL.—All exhibits admitted as
12 evidence but containing protected information
13 shall be sealed and annexed to the record of 14 trial.
15 (B) PROTECTED INFORMATION NOT AD-
16 MITTED.—Any protected information not admit-
17 ted as evidence, but reviewed by a commission
18 in camera and withheld from the defendant's
19 counsel over objection shall be sealed and an-
20 nexed to the record of the trial, with any associ-
21 ated motions and responses and any materials
22 submitted in support thereof, as additional ex-
23 hibits.
24 (e) RECORD OF TRIAL.—

1 (1) REQUIREMENT FOR RECORD.—A record of
2 each proceeding by a commission shall be prepared
3 promptly after the conclusion of the trial.
4 (2) VERBATIM TRANSCRIPT.—The record of
5 trial shall include a verbatim written transcript of all
6 sessions of the trial.
7 (3) EXHIBITS AND OTHER EVIDENCE.—The
8 record of trial shall also include all exhibits and
9 other real or demonstrative evidence, except that
10 photographs may be substituted for any large writ-
11 ten or graphic exhibits and any other real or demon-
12 strative evidence. If a photograph is substituted for
13 an exhibit or other evidence, the Government shall 14 retain the original exhibit or other evidence, respec-
15 tively, until no further appeal of the results of the 16 trial is authorized.
17 (4) CLASSIFIED INFORMATION.—In the case of
18 a conviction of a charge on which classified informa-
19 tion is admitted as evidence by a commission, the
20 copy of the record of trial submitted to the commis-
21 sion shall include the classified information.

22 SEC. 13. TRIAL PROCEDURES FOR UNPRIVILEGED COMBAT-
23 ANTS.

24 (a) SPECIALIZED PROCEDURES.—

1 (1) STANDARD OF PROOF.—All 3 members of a
2 commission shall agree that the defendant is guilty
3 beyond a reasonable doubt for a defendant to be
4 found guilty.
5 (2) RULES OF PROCEDURE.—
6 (A) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in
7 subparagraph (B), the Secretary of Defense
8 shall draft supplementary rules to govern all
9 proceedings under this section.
10 (B) STANDARD.—Evidence is admissible if
11 the Secretary of Defense determines that the
12 evidence would have probative value to a rea-
13 sonable person.
14 (3) FORM OF TRIAL.—Any trial under this sub-
15 section shall take place before 2 military officers or
16 attorneys and at least one military judge.
17 (4) BAD ACTS.—Other bad acts may be consid-
18 ered if they would have fallen within the definition
19 under this Act of either terrorism or terrorist activ-
20 ity and they are deemed to be relevant by a commis-
21 sion including propensity.
22 (b) CUSTODY.—The Department of Defense shall re-
23 tain custody of any person determined by a commission
24 to be unprivileged combatants after the person has been
25 either convicted or sentenced in accordance with this Act,

1 unless the Department of Defense deems otherwise. Deci-
2 sions made by a commission in regards to a detainee's
3 guilt or innocence may be considered by a tribunal when
4 assessing the need to continue the detention of a detainee.

5 SEC. 14. COMMUNICATION WITH PERSONS IN CUSTODY.

6 An individual detained, indicted, or convicted under
7 this Act shall only be permitted to communicate with the
8 interpreter assigned to the individual, the counsel rep-
9 resenting the individual, prison personnel, and any other
10 individual approved by the Secretary of Defense.

11 SEC. 15. COMMISSION COUNSEL.

12 (a) IN GENERAL.—A person shall be admitted to
13 practice before a commission if the person—

14 (1) is a United States citizen;

15 (2) has been admitted to the practice of law in
16 a State, district, territory, or possession of the
17 United States, or before a Federal court;

18 (3) has not been sanctioned or otherwise the
19 subject of disciplinary action by any court, bar, or 20 other competent governmental authority for mis-
21 conduct;

22 (4) is eligible for access to information classi-
23 fied at the level of secret as defined by the Depart-
24 ment of Defense; and

1 (5) signs a written agreement to comply with
2 all applicable regulations or instructions for counsel,
3 including any rules of court for conduct during the
4 course of proceedings.
5 (b) CONSULTATION WITH COLLEAGUES.—Any per-
6 son admitted under subsection (a) shall not confer with
7 any colleague who does not have the appropriate clearance.
8 (c) SECURITY CLEARANCE.—
9 (1) EXPEDITED CONSIDERATION.—The Sec-
10 retary of Defense shall ensure that a person seeking
11 to be admitted under subsection (a) is timely proc-
12 essed for the security clearance required for access
13 to materials necessary for providing a defendant
14 with effective assistance of counsel.
15 (2) COUNSEL INELIGIBLE FOR CLEARANCE.—If
16 the Secretary of Defense determines a person is not
17 eligible for the necessary security clearance, the per-
18 son shall not be permitted to represent an individual
19 in any proceeding before the Commission. The deter-
20 mination of the Secretary of Defense shall be final
21 and is not subject to appeal to, or other review by,
22 any court of the United States.
23 (d) TRAVEL EXPENSES.—The Secretary of Defense
24 shall reimburse any person not employed by the Govern-
25 ment who is representing an individual before the Com-

1 mission for travel away from the home or regular place
2 of business of the person in connection with such represen-
3 tation. The rates for the payment of travel expenses under
4 this subsection shall be those authorized for employees of
5 agencies under subchapter I of chapter 57 of title 5,
6 United States Code.

PUBLIC AFFAIRS DAILY NEWS WRAP
June 29, 2006

Contact: Brian Roehrkasse, Deputy Director, Office of Public Affairs (202) 514-2007

TOMORROW'S EXPECTED NEWS STORIES:

Hamdan v. Rumsfeld Decision (OPA)
Today, the Supreme Court handed down its 5-3 ruling in the case of Hamdan v. Rumsfeld ruling that military commissions, as constituted by the Department of Defense, are not consistent with current congressional statutes: Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) and Geneva Convention treaty provisions (Art. 3).

Talking Points:

- Nothing in today's holding affects the authority of the President in wartime to detain enemy combatants through the duration of hostilities, authority previously recognized by the Supreme Court in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld. Nothing in the holding affects the status of Guantanamo Bay or the continued detention of enemy combatants there one way or the other.

- The holding does not reject the President's authority to try accused war criminals like these by military commission, something done throughout our history. Instead, the holding says simply that the military commissions as constituted by the Department of Defense, while robust and affording enemy combatants more due process than this or any other country has ever afforded enemy combatants in history, are not consistent with current congressional statutes: UCMJ and treaty provisions (Art. 3)

- The Court didn't find any Constitutional impediment to the President working with Congress in establishing military commissions. The Court emphasized that these problems can be cured and invited the President and Congress to do just that. For example, Justice Breyer said, "Nothing prevents the President from returning to Congress to seek the authority he believes necessary."

- We respect the Court's decision and will work with the Congress to establish procedures for trying enemy combatants that comply with the Court's ruling and will allow us to proceed with trials as soon as possible so as to ensure that enemy combatants charged with war crimes can be brought to justice and that the American people are protected against their release, consistent with the Supreme Court's guidance.

Tenet Settlement (Civil)

Tenet Healthcare Corporation, operator of the nation's second largest hospital chain, has agreed to pay the United States more than $900 million for alleged unlawful billing practices. Under the agreement, Tenet will pay a total of $900 million over a four-year period, plus interest, to resolve various types of civil allegations involving Tenet's billings to Medicare and other federal health care programs.

Talking Points:

- The Tenet settlement is the second largest health care fraud settlement in U.S. history. The largest was HCA, which was settled for a toal of $1.7 billion.

- Of the $900 million settlement amount, the agreement requires Tenet to pay more than $788 million to resolve claims arising from Tenet's receipt of excessive "outlier" payments (payments that are intended to be limited to situations involving extraordinarily costly episodes of care) resulting from the hospitals' inflating their charges substantially in excess of any increase in the costs associated with patient care and billing for services and supplies not provided to patients;

- More than $47 million to resolve claims that Tenet paid kickbacks to physicians to get Medicare patients referred to its facilities, and that Tenet billed Medicare for services that were ordered or referred by physicians with whom Tenet had an improper financial relationship; and,

- More than $46 million to resolve claims that Tenet engaged in "upcoding," which refers to situations where diagnosis codes that Tenet is unable to support or that were otherwise improper were assigned to patient records in order to increase reimbursement to Tenet hospitals.

- The $900 million settlement amount was based on the company's ability to pay.

Former Alabama Governor and HealthSouth CEO Convicted (Criminal)
A jury in Montgomery, Alabama today convicted former Alabama Governor Don Eugene Siegelman and former HealthSouth Chief Executive Officer Richard Scrushy, of conspiracy, bribery, fraud, and other crimes. Siegelman was convicted on 10 of the 33 counts against him. Scrushy, 53, was convicted on all of the six counts with which he was charged: one count of bribery, one count of conspiracy, and four counts of honest services mail fraud.

Man Sentence to 15 Years for Child Pornography Offense (Criminal)
A former Dracut, Mass. man was sentenced yesterday for transportation, receipt and possession of child pornography. In federal court in Boston,Darren Wilder, 36, was sentenced to 15 years in a federal correction facility after a jury found him guilty on March 21, 2006 of the distribution, receipt and possession of child pornography. After completion of his sentence, Wilder will be placed on supervised release for five years. Wilder was required to receive a sentence of no less than 15 years due to a previous child pornography conviction.

U.S. Ship Manager to Plead Guilty to Deliberate Pollution (ENRD)
An American-based ship operator, Pacific-Gulf Marine, Inc. (PGM), has agreed to plead guilty to criminal charges that it engaged in deliberate acts of pollution involving a fleet of four ships in violation of the Act to Prevent Pollution from Ships, the Justice Department announced today. As part of the plea agreement, PGM will pay a $1 million criminal fine and $500,000 for community service, if approved by the court. In a related case, a federal grand jury returned an indictment late yesterday, charging two former Chief Engineers of the M/V Tanabata (one of the ships in the fleet), with various environmental crimes.

Trust Promoters Sentenced to Prison for Tax Fraud (Tax)
Five persons associated with Innovative Financial Consultants (IFC) were sentenced to lengthy prison terms for promoting a tax evasion scheme using so-called "pure trust organizations," the Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service (IRS) announced today. U.S. District Judge Mary Murguia found the tax fraud scheme caused, at a minimum, a loss to the federal Treasury of between three to seven million dollars. The judge sentenced the five individuals to serve between 16 to 84 months imprisonment and sentenced two of those indiduals to pay fines of $100,000 and $175,000 after being convicted on charges of willful failure to file tax returns.

Laptop Containing VA Data Found (FBI)
William D. Chase, Special Agent in Charge of the Baltimore Division of the Federal Bureau of Investigation participated in a press availability announcing the recovery of the stolen laptop computer containing the personal data of more than 26 million American veterans. Chase issued a brief statement of facts, and answered limited questions.

Talking Points:

- The electronic equipment contained sensitive information concerning over 26 million veterans, and the recovery of the data has been of paramount concern.

- The protection of the sensitive data, and well being of those potentially effected, have made this investigation the number one priority for the investigating agencies.

- A preliminary review of the equipment by computer forensic teams has determined that the data base remains intact and has not been accessed since it was stolen. A thorough forensic examination is underway, and the results will be shared as soon as possible. The investigation is ongoing.

THURSDAY'S EXPECTED EVENTS/RELEASES:

No events scheduled.

The Civil Division will tentatively issue a press release on a settlement (Miller)

Brian,

We are having our July 11th hearing on Hamdan at 9:30. We are inviting one representative each from DOJ and DOD. We believe that Steve Bradbury is the DOJ official most qualified to testify before the committee on the Administration's position on detainees in light of the Hamdan decision. We are also inviting Brigadier General Hemingway, Legal Adviser to the Appointing Authority in the Department of Defense Office of Military Commissions. Please let me know asap if Mr. Bradbury will be available for the hearing. Thanks.

Short Summary

The Unprivileged Combatants Act of 2006 is a follow-up to the Military Commissions Procedures Act of 2002 (S. 1937, 107th Congress) which you cosponsored with Senator Durbin in February 2002. The goal of this bill is to balance the need for national security (interrogations and detention of combatants) with the need to afford detainees with sufficient due process so that nations such as Great Britain and Australia will not place undue pressure on the United States to release their citizens from Guantanamo Bay. This bill addresses only those combatants currently held at Guantanamo Bay. The Act clarifies the procedures used in Combatant Status Review Tribunals and establishes procedures for the trial of detainees. These procedures constitute "a meaningful opportunity to contest the factual basis for that detention before a neutral decision-maker." (Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507, O'Connor, J.) This bill does not address the issue of unprivileged combatants contesting their detentions through habeas appeals. Although the Graham-Kyl-Levin amendment to the 2005 DoD appropriations bill has addressed this issue, a forthcoming Supreme Court decision (Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 04-5393) will probably require additional legislation on this matter.

Section by Section of your bill

- Section 301: Findings: This title is in direct response to the United State Supreme Court's ruling in Rasul v. Bush.
- Section 302: Definition Section: Definition section of the bill which defines primary terms such as field tribunal, classification tribunal, military commission, and unprivileged combatant.
- Section 303: Authorizing Military Commissions: The President is authorized to establish military commissions for the trial of individuals for offenses as provided in this title.
- Section 304: Jurisdiction Over Unprivileged Combatants: This title establishes exclusive jurisdiction to hear any matter involving an unprivileged combatant who has been detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. These detainees may be tried via laws of war or pursuant to the Department of Defense's Military Commission Instruction Number Two.
- Section 305: Appellate Jurisdiction: The U.S. Courts of Military Appeals shall have exclusive jurisdiction over appeals from all final decisions of a classification tribunal board or military commission under this title. These decisions are then subject to review by the Supreme Court by writ of certiorari.
- Section 306: Military Commission: The Commissions shall consist of three military officers, at least one of whom is a Judge Advocate General. These Commissions shall decide the guilt or innocence of detainees charged under section 304 of this Act. This is basically what happens now.
- Section 307: Persons in Custody: Not more than 60 days after the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense is required to develop a list of all persons who are being detained at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and whom the government wishes to continue to detain as an unprivileged combatant. The Act requires that the original list and subsequent lists, updated at least once every 60 days, be submitted to the appropriate House and Senate committees.

- Section 308: Field Tribunals: Not more than 30 days after a suspected unprivileged combatant has been detained by United States forces, the Department of Defense shall conduct a field tribunal ("FT") in order to determine whether the detainee is an unprivileged combatant and whether the detainee is entitled to the rights afforded under the Geneva Convention. The procedures governing a field tribunal shall be promulgated by the Department of Defense.
- Section 309: Classification Tribunals: A Classification Tribunal ("CT") is very similar to the current Combatant Status Review Tribunal. The CT shall be composed of three military officers, one of whom shall be an attorney. Pursuant to a hearing before a CT, a designee shall be released and repatriated to an appropriate country unless a CT finds by a preponderance of the evidence that—(1) the detainee is a threat to the national security interest of the United States; or (2) there are reasonable grounds to believe that if released the person would take up arms against the United States. Decisions of the CT shall be repeated every six months. Detainees may be released only when the CT or the Administrative Board determines the detainee is no longer a threat to national security. This section also expressly states that a detainee who is also a United States citizen may not be held or tried under this act.
- Section 310: Classification Tribunal Procedures: Procedures for CT's are the same as those of Combatant Status Review Tribunals except detainees shall be represented by counsel and are permitted to view unclassified discovery that the prosecution plans to present before the tribunal.
- Section 311: Continuance of Classification Tribunals: Classification tribunals may be continued in order for the government to continue their interrogation of a detainee. Upon a motion from the Government, the classification tribunal board may grant a continuance for up to a 6-month period, if the classification tribunal board determines that: 1) the individual being detained is a high level individual in the planning or financing of terrorist activities, or 2) the individual possesses information vital to the safety of the United States or its citizens. The Government may obtain more than one continuance if it demonstrates that such continuances are necessary for information gathering purposes as it relates to national security. Said applications for Continuances shall be made ex parte and before a detainee is given an attorney. Accordingly, a detainee is only given an attorney once the tribunal is informed that the interrogation efforts have been exhausted.
- Section 312 & 313: Criminal Prosecution Procedures: Military Commission procedures will be the same as the current procedures afforded detainees under the current system.
- Section 314: Communication with Persons in Custody: Limits communications by any detainee indicted or convicted under this Act to the individual's interpreter, assigned counsel, prison personnel, and any other individual(s) approved by the Secretary of Defense.

- Section 315: Commission Counsel: Provides the following criteria for persons to be admitted to practice before a commission: 1) US Citizen, 2) has been admitted to practice law in a State, district, territory or possession of the United States or before Federal Court, 3) has not been disciplined by any court, bar or other competent governmental authority for misconduct, 4) maintains a minimum of "secret" clearance and 5) signs a written agreement to comply with all applicable regulations and instructions for counsel during the course of proceedings. It further provides persons admitted to practice will not confer with any colleague who does not have at least a "secret" clearance. This section provides that individuals seeking to practice before a commission will be expedited in consideration for obtaining the necessary security clearance. The decision of the Secretary of Defense regarding the granting or not of the security clearance is final and is not eligible for appeal or review. Finally, this section provides that persons practicing before the commission are eligible to have their travel expenses reimbursed.
