Indeed, the vast majority of Iranians are opposed to the theocratic regime's drive that has pushed their country to the verge of a military confrontation. An internal classified report prepared by a state-run polling center has reportedly concluded that only 31 percent of Iranians consider the nuclear program a "national' project. The report adds that 86 percent of Iranians believe the nuclear energy is not worth entering a war.

More importantly, however, Iranians have paid the highest price to derail the mullahs' nuclear weapons program. While satellite imagery and inspections by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) contributed to getting a sense of the extent of Iran's nuclear drive, it was the Iranian opposition that played the key role in exposing the mullahs' nuclear secrets. The National Council of Resistance of Iran, the major opposition coalition, revealed in August 2002 that Tehran was building two new secret nuclear facilities in the cities of Arak and Natanz. In February 2003, Iran admitted to the existence of two sites, a development that set in motion the IAEA resolution to report Iran to the U.N. Security Council.

It has become increasingly difficult for the mullahs to cast their atomic drive as an "Iranian" program while the Iranian opposition is at the center of the campaign against it. And to hit back at the opposition, mullahs chose their usual route. Several days before the IAEA meeting, prison officials announced that if the nuclear case were ever referred to the Security Council, they would unleash their wrath on political prisoners.

And that threat became a chilling reality just a day after the IAEA vote. Hojjat Zamani, 31, a political prisoner and a member of MEK (an affiliate of the opposition coalition), was snatched from his cell by prison guards and hanged at dawn on Feb. 7, according to Amnesty International. More prisoners are feared to be facing a similar fate.

The Zamini case shows that Iran's drive for nuclear weapons is the flip side of its campaign of suppression at home. This year alone, more than 30 individuals have been executed -- many in public -- or sentenced to death. The daring strike of Tehran transit workers was brutally crushed, as was the peaceful but defiant stand of several thousands Sufi Muslims last week. Meanwhile, Elham Afroten, a 20-year-old female journalist, is reported incarcerated since Jan. 23 and badly mistreated for allegedly placing a satirical article comparing Ayatollah Khomeini to the AIDS virus.

Iran's theocracy will do anything to instill fear; which is why it will do everything to get the nukes. And when it succeeds, one can easily imagine what would a regime that cares so little about its own citizens may do to the citizens of the "infidel" world. For the sake of the world and for the sake of the Iranian people -- the mullahs must not be given that nuclear choice.

Opening With A Trap Door (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

Ask administration hard-liners about Iran's sudden acceptance of the U.S. offer to talk about stability in Iraq and you hear this reaction: It's a booby trap. These hawks are right.

Put the same question to moderates on the Bush team and this is the response: It's an opening in the confrontation and a necessary step toward an exit strategy for Iraq. The remarkable thing is that these doves are right, too.

President Bush must treat the Iranian decision to open discussions in Baghdad as trap and opportunity. It is both. The administration should pursue this small opening in the Iranian wall with discipline and attention to maintaining a united front with its European and Asian partners. They are Iran's immediate targets.

The Iranians will certainly suggest to Europe, Japan and India that the United States is dealing behind its allies' backs to protect its interests in Iraq. The Iranians are masters at playing on others' divisions, often by inviting them to exploit simulated divisions on the Iranian side. Thus the endless arguments over Iran's "moderates."

The Bush team must make the Baghdad talks one insulated part of a coordinated three-pronged approach to Iran. Contacts with Iran must be managed as hard-nosed diplomacy that will go to the brink -- but not be carried over it by bluster and inflexibility.

The White House rightly insists that the Baghdad talks be limited to practical steps for defusing the crisis in Iraq. Discussion in Baghdad of Iran's nuclear ambitions, now under scrutiny in the U.N. Security Council, or other broad topics would undermine the allied unity that has brought the complaint against Iran this far.

The State Department hopes to get a declaration from the Security Council in about two weeks that ostensibly gives the Iranians a final chance to suspend their nuclear enrichment program and return to negotiations with the European Union and Russia.

The statement is in fact a necessary step toward new U.N. negotiations over a resolution imposing sanctions on Iran. "The Europeans need to show their publics that they have jumped through all the hoops" before threatening sanctions, a U.S. official says. Washington is cooperating in this approach.

To reduce the danger that Iran will use the Baghdad talks as a divisive ploy, the United States should now join -- and lead -- the negotiating effort over enrichment. After the move to talk to Iran in Baghdad, the Bush administration cannot remain a silent, outside partner at the top rung of the negotiating ladder. And U.S. direct involvement provides the only hope of getting the Iranians back to the table.

The threat of sanctions has already triggered a counterthreat from Iran to use oil as a weapon. Washington must lead in establishing a credible international emergency energy-sharing program to confront that bad-case scenario. "We have to say to the Iranians together that we will endure a cold winter or two but they will be harmed even more by an oil boycott," says a senior European politician who has studied Iranian negotiating behavior extensively.

U.S. officials recognize that U.N. action might not be sufficient or even forthcoming. They now speak of a "diplomatic coalition of the willing" to pursue sanctions and other measures against Iran if the U.N. effort falters. But that coalition must be forged through diplomatic leadership and the sharing of the negotiating burden.

Such sharing can be reinforced in a third layer of contacts in this policy of engaging Iran, with intense skepticism. The United States should support efforts by the U.N. special representative to Iraq, Ashraf Jehangir Qazi, to establish a contact group of regional states that would meet regularly -- in Baghdad.

Regional "meetings outside Baghdad don't work at this stage," Qazi told U.S. officials he visited this week in Washington in a refreshing burst of candor. Having senior diplomats from Egypt, Syria, Jordan and other Persian Gulf countries -- including Iran -- wrestle concretely with Iraq's daily problems could usefully supplement the U.S.-Iranian talks.

The experts say that Iran is six to nine months away from mastering the centrifuge process of enrichment, the key step in a 5- to 10-year process of building a nuclear bomb. Talking to the Iranians at three interlocking levels is the best way to determine whether there is any realistic hope of deflecting them from enrichment or deterring them if they get the bomb -- and what happens if the answer to both is no.

Bush must reshape Ronald Reagan's attitude toward Mikhail Gorbachev: Don't trust, do verify at every step of the way. First, there must be something to verify.

Bush Presses For India Nuclear Pact (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, March 22, 2006

President Bush urged Congress on Wednesday to approve a landmark plan to share nuclear technology with India — a deal that could be a tough sell to lawmakers.

Bush said India has proven itself over 30 years to be a non-proliferator.

"It's in our interest that India use nuclear power to power their economic growth because ... there's a global connection between demand for fossil fuels elsewhere and price here," Bush said in Wheeling, W.Va., where he gave remarks centered on Iraq and the war on terror.

In Washington, Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns also urged lawmakers to approve the deal. "India can be trusted," he said.

Critics, including former Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., are skeptical of the agreement reached March 2 by Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh of India.

It requires Congress to exempt India from U.S. laws that restrict trade with countries, such as India, that have not submitted to full nuclear inspections.

Among concerns raised by Nunn, who played a leading role on military issues in Congress, were that the agreement would promote a regional arms race with China and Pakistan and make it more difficult for the United States to win support for sanctions against such countries as Iran and North Korea.

Burns said "we take his views very seriously." But, Burns said at a news conference, "we're far better off" having India submit to supervision under the agreement than having the country isolated.

He added that "India is a country that does not proliferate."

"We are going to make a convincing case," Burns said.

Legislation to implement the plan was introduced last week. Burns said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would testify in support of the measure.

Also, two assistant secretaries of state, Richard Boucher and Stephen Rademaker, were sent to Vienna to promote the plan with the Nuclear Suppliers Group, an assembly of 35 nations that export nuclear technology.

"India is accepting international verification," he said. "India is accepting international inspection. Who can argue with that?"

He said the agreement reflects "the emergence of a new global partnership between India and the United States."

Burns said it should cause no problem with Pakistan, traditionally a rival of India, and that the United States maintains good, although different, relations with Pakistan.

Pakistan on Tuesday successfully test-fired a cruise missile that can carry a nuclear warhead and hit targets within a 310-mile range, the army said.

Both Pakistan and India are nuclear-capable nations.

UK Chosen As Possible 'Star Wars' Site (FT)

By Guy Dinmore In Washington

Financial Times, March 23, 2006

Interceptor missiles could be placed in the UK as part of the US "Star Wars" missile defence system, according to plans revealed by the Pentagon.

The moves are likely to attract more unwelcome attention for prime minister Tony Blair's government over the nature of the transatlantic relationship.

Lt Gen Trey Obering, head of the Missile Defense Agency, disclosed at a military conference in Washington this week that the US had formally selected Britain as possible site for the interceptors in Europe.

However, Bryan Whitman, Pentagon spokesman, said on Wednesday that negotiations had not taken place on basing interceptors in the UK. "[There has been] no planning, no approach, no request, and no invitation."

Poland and the Czech Republic were already known as candidates, while Hungary has apparently been dropped. The Bush administration wanted to make a single choice soon, analysts said.

The ballistic missile defence system, which involves putting interceptors in Europe by 2010, is intended to protect the US from missile attack with land, sea, air and space-based assets.

The programme has cost $90bn since 1985 and the Pentagon plans to spend another $58bn in the next six years, according to a recent congressional report, which also highlighted test failures and criticised cost overruns and lack of transparency.

Britain already plays a crucial role in the defence of the US through the early-warning radar system at the Fylingdales base in northern England. The two sides signed a memorandum of understanding on ballistic missile defence in 2003.

Rumours of secret deals to place interceptors in the UK have been around for some time. In October 2004, Geoff Hoon, then UK defence secretary, told parliament any such decision would "be open to scrutiny and debate in the normal way" but that specific parliamentary approval would not be required.

Lt Gen Obering said the mission was to develop an "integrated layered" system that would also protect US allies.

The UK would be the "third site" for interceptors after Fort Greely in Alaska and Vandenberg Air Force Base in California.

Placing interceptors in the UK would raise the risk of Britain itself coming under attack, warns the British American Security Information Council (Basic), an independent defence watchdog.

Ian Davis, executive director of Basic, said it was inconceivable that the US would have announced the UK as a possible location without having discussed the issue with London. He thought eastern Europe was a more likely choice.

There was no immediate comment from UK officials.

Rice Reduces Caribbean Ire, But Falls Short On Aid To Haiti (NYT)

By Joel Brinkley

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

NASSAU, the Bahamas, March 22 — After two days of meetings with Caribbean leaders, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice appeared to have cooled some of their anger toward the United States but failed to persuade them to embrace the new government in Haiti, United States officials said Wednesday.

One goal of her visit here was to persuade the other Caribbean nations to take forceful steps to help the new Haitian government stabilize the country and deal with its crushing problems. What she got was a commitment to readmit Haiti to the Caribbean Community of nations and a vague promise to help Haiti in the future.

"Where do we go in the future?" asked Fred Mitchell, the Bahamian foreign minister and chairman of the Caribbean Community. "We remain engaged" with Haiti "and will continue to review the matter."

Relations between the United States and the Caribbean Community, known as Caricom, have been strained and embittered for two years, in part because of opposition here to the war in Iraq but also because of the role of the United States in Haiti. Many Caribbean leaders contend that the United States forced President Jean-Bertrand Aristide from power in 2004.

Before this visit, Ms. Rice met twice with groups of Caribbean foreign ministers, once during an Organization of American States meeting last spring and again at the United Nations in September, but she and her aides said they realized that she had to come here to begin turning the situation around. "We intend not just to continue our relationship but to deepen and broaden" it, she said Wednesday at a news conference with Mr. Mitchell. Several of the Caribbean foreign ministers listened in the front row as she spoke.

A joint statement said Ms. Rice "agreed to strengthen cooperation with a view to enhancing Caricom-U.S. relations." While language like that is common in such statements, United States officials said they were encouraged by the reception the Caribbean leaders gave Ms. Rice.

One said, "We are now on the same page." There was no indication, however, that the Caribbean leaders had softened their position on the war in Iraq.

The United States officials were less pleased with commitments by Caricom countries to help Haiti.

"I didn't hear them," a senior administration official said.

At the news conference, Ms. Rice reminded the Caribbean leaders that "we all have a tremendous stake in the development of a democratic Haiti that can be self-supporting."

If Haiti falls into chaos once again, she added, "that can have an effect on this region and, in fact, an effect on the United States."

René Préval, who was elected president on Feb. 7, is to form a government this spring.

Schooling China In The American Way (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

BEIJING, March 22 -- Three United States senators came to one of China's most prestigious universities on Wednesday, ostensibly to talk about trade. What they delivered was an expansive, almost evangelical campaign for American values -- one that received pushback from their audience of students and faculty.

The senators talked about an unfair advantage they say Chinese exporters enjoy over American firms because of the low-value currency. They implored China to adopt the norms of global trade. In strikingly moral tones, they pledged Washington's resolve to pressure China to liberalize not only its currency regime but also its political culture, using trade as a wedge for broader reform.

Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) told the Tsinghua University audience that his model of leadership is "a man by the name of Jesus." He later quoted Martin Luther King Jr. as he urged China to do "the right thing" on trade policy.

Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) told the students that, post-9/11, Americans are committed to taking on whatever battles seem imperative -- China's cheap currency, along with al-Qaeda.

"In my country, we're very arrogant, and I admit to it," Graham said. "You have to understand that Americans have for 200 years fought and died not just for our freedom, but for other people's freedoms."

Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat who has led the drive to force China to raise the value of its currency, the yuan, said economic reform leads toward a free society. "I believe it is inevitable that China will have much more freedom," he said.

But when the time came for questions, the reaction from students and faculty -- though polite and reserved -- revealed how the American campaign for a free-floating Chinese currency has backfired in some quarters. Many here resent the specter of the world's lone superpower seemingly attempting to dictate how Beijing should manage its economy and the values that should govern Chinese society.

A 21-year-old architecture student who gave his name as Albert rejected the idea that the civil liberties the senators suggested have universal appeal.

"Have you ever thought that it is probably the freedom of speech that you guys promote that finally resulted in this terrorist attack," he said, calling 9/11 an act of "revenge" for American offenses against Islam. "In China, we have promoted the harmony that would have prevented this kind of attack."

Schumer leapt from his chair. "I don't think you understand the concept of freedom of speech," he said. "It is our American understanding that freedom leads to stability."

Economist Li Daokui, a member of Tsinghua's faculty, told the senators that he lived in the United States for more than 15 years and "loves the country." But he warned them that the senators' pressure for change was provoking a defensive response from those who might otherwise be friendly to reform.

"Democracy, personal liberties and freedom of speech: These are ideals," Li said. "My worry is that if some people press things too quickly, you will undermine the whole process."

He questioned whether a revaluing of China's currency would create any jobs in the United States.

A man in a blue suit demanded to know how many U.S. senators -- now moving toward a vote on a trade bill that could have great consequences here -- have ever visited his country. "Many Americans are not very well informed of the real situation in China," he said.

Schumer, Graham and Coburn are in China for five days for what they say is an examination of the forces at play before they decide whether to proceed with a vote on the bill at the end of the month. With China's President Hu Jintao scheduled to visit the United States in April and a U.S. Treasury Department report in the works that could brand China a currency manipulator, the Schumer-Graham bill has become a key front in an increasingly tense trade relationship between the countries. It would apply 27.5 percent tariffs to all Chinese-made goods if China does not substantially revalue the currency.

The bill has gained momentum as China's trade surplus with the United States has grown, swelling to $200 billion last year. But many economists assert that even a significant revaluation would do little to alter the trade balance, noting that many of the goods China exports, such as clothing and furniture, have not been made in large quantities in the United States for years. Others called the trip political posturing.

But the reception the senators are receiving attests to the gravity of the issue for China's leaders, who are cognizant of the angry mood in Washington. The senators dined Wednesday night with Zhou Xiaochuan, the governor of the People's Bank of China. They were to meet Thursday with Vice Premier Wu Yi.

The senators said they were here to discuss not only the currency but also China's failure to crack down on routine theft of intellectual property (from pirated Hollywood movies to counterfeit pharmaceuticals), as well as barriers to foreign investment here. The currency issue "has become a metaphor for the whole trade relationship," Schumer said.

China has been emphasizing the difficulties it faces in freeing its currencies, particularly the risk that it could slow economic growth. That message has already gained some sympathy from the U.S. visitors.

"I've learned that you've got 700 million people who need employment, that the interior of your country is not developed," Graham told the students. "I've learned in coming here that for you to change your system very quickly would be very hard for your country. I understand that better now."

Schumer and Graham said they were very impressed by assertions by Chinese officials that they have come to see a free-floating currency as being in their own interest, though they will need to move gradually. "We walk away from this meeting seeing that they are not mouthing it," Schumer said. "They believe."

The senators will also walk away with an appreciation for the pageantry that China uses to great effect in winning over visitors -- even those who come with unpleasant business. On Tuesday night, after an official dinner in the Great Hall of the People, the senators buzzed over the experience.

"It was the most awesome room," Graham said.

"It wasn't your typical Chinese food," added Schumer. "It was amazing stuff, not your usual stuff. And they went easy on us. No sea slugs. No jellyfish."

But if China's culinary achievements left a favorable impression, Schumer was less impressed by the political culture. On Wednesday, as he spoke at the university, he asked for a show of hands from those believing that "freedom is the eventual right path for China to be on." Perhaps a dozen of the 50 or so people in the room tentatively raised hands.

How many disagreed? Five hands went up. How many people were unsure? No one raised a hand, leaving a silent majority expressing no sentiment at all.

"It's still a very controlled society," Schumer said as he boarded the bus that would take him past countless new skyscrapers and on to the five-star St. Regis Hotel. "They've got a ways to go."

China Tries To Charm Couple Of Senate Skeptics (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

BEIJING, March 22 — Global Times, a tabloid newspaper in China's capital, usually offers its readers a rich diet of nationalist propaganda on subjects like Japanese war crimes and American hegemony.

So it is telling that it devoted its front page on Tuesday to respectful, even admiring, coverage of the China visit of two United States senators, Charles E. Schumer of New York and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who have attacked Beijing for "illegal currency manipulation," "mercantilism" and "failure to play by the rules."

The senators, the paper said, "have sent a positive signal by coming to China to see for themselves."

"It is not like earlier times when members of Congress relied on hearsay or their own imagination when they criticized China," the article said.

With a banquet in the Great Hall of the People, a roster of top-level meetings and fawning attention in the state-run press, China wants to win over Mr. Schumer and Mr. Graham.

The reason seems clear: At a time of rising economic nationalism in the United States, highlighted by the rejection of the Dubai ports deal, the Beijing leadership fears that a bill drafted by the senators to impose a 27.5 percent tariff on Chinese exports to the United States has a chance to become law. That would upend economic relations between the world's richest nation and its fastest-growing rival.

The bill would impose the tariffs unless Beijing substantially revalued its currency, the yuan, which critics say the government keeps artificially low. It has met firm opposition from some business leaders and economists, who say they fear a trade war, but it garnered 67 votes in a nonbinding tally in the Senate recently and may come up for a formal vote as soon as March 31.

"They know it's for real," Mr. Schumer said before a private dinner with China's central bank governor on Wednesday evening. "Believe me, the people who are seeing us wouldn't be seeing us if they didn't think it's for real."

The bill and the senators' high-level reception are among the signs that Chinese-American economic relations have become fraught with tensions that trade experts and members of Congress say are the most politically volatile since the fight over China's entry to the World Trade Organization in the late 1990's.

The Bush administration has warned China that its big trade surplus with the United States and industrial-scale violations of American trademarks and copyrights threaten the nations' fast-growing trade ties.

Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, who will visit China next week, said that unless steps were taken to address American complaints soon, "the administration and the American people may be forced to reassess our bilateral relationship."

Members of Congress have raised the alarm about China's threat to United States manufacturers and workers many times before. But Bush administration officials say the potential for a sustained protest has grown in tandem with China's rising economic power.

China's trade surplus with the United States hit $201 billion last year, a record for any trading partner and an increase of 24 percent from 2004.

Beijing has controlled its currency within a narrow band around 8 yuan to the dollar, a level that critics say gives it an artificial trade advantage. Despite American pressure, China has allowed its currency to appreciate just 3 percent since it broke a formal, fixed peg to the dollar last July.

China is defending itself against the onslaught, but gingerly. Prime Minister Wen Jiabao, meeting a group of foreign business leaders this week, urged them to convey the message that "it is unfair for the U.S. to scapegoat China for its own structural problems," according to people who attended the meeting.

But Mr. Wen and other top leaders are also trying to improve the atmosphere before President Hu Jintao's first official visit to the United States, scheduled for mid-April. They have promised to tighten enforcement of intellectual property rights and to move steadily toward a more market-driven exchange rate for the yuan, also called the renminbi.

One test of whether Beijing can tame protectionist pressures will be the five-day trip by Mr. Schumer, a Democrat, and Mr. Graham, a Republican, which ends Saturday. The two were joined by Senator Tom Coburn, an Oklahoma Republican, who supports their tariff bill.

The senators declined to say if they had heard anything during their trip to change their minds about the bill. But Mr. Graham said he was "very impressed" with a presentation by a senior economic planner on Wednesday. Mr. Schumer said he had picked up signals "that they are taking the currency where it needs to go, though I'm not sure if they will get there fast enough."

Neither senator has much experience in economic diplomacy. They are lawyers who were not widely noted for their focus on trade, currencies or China before introducing the tariff bill.

Mr. Schumer says his trip to Beijing, Shanghai and Hong Kong is not only the first time he has visited China, but also the first time he has taken an official trip abroad in his 25 years in Congress.

"I'm a homebody," he said. "But somebody has the right to ask, How can you do this if you don't come to China? So we came to China."

Beijing's reaction to their request was cool at first, they said. Mr. Graham joked that of China's 1.3 billion people, "All of them were out of town the week of our visit." Their visas did not come through until shortly before they planned to travel.

But then China laid out a red carpet. They were treated to a banquet in the Hong Kong Room of the Great Hall of the People, the sprawling Stalinist-style meeting hall in Tiananmen Square. They were served dishes that Mr. Schumer, who says his favorite Washington restaurant is Hunan Dynasty on Capitol Hill, pronounced "extraordinary, just extraordinary."

Though they did not get time with Mr. Hu or Mr. Wen, the list of top officials who agreed to meet them is expansive, especially for visitors who do not meet the Chinese leadership's preference for "old friends," or people who have proved sensitive to the Communist Party's interests.

Li Zhaoxing, the foreign minister; Wu Yi, a vice premier and the chief economic troubleshooter; Zhou Xiaochuan, the central bank governor; and Bo Xilai, the commerce minister, are among those on their schedule.

The general sentiment in Beijing is that the threat of the Schumer-Graham tariff can still be headed off. A high tariff would result in "unaccountable losses" to the American economy, because consumers and businesses depend on cheap Chinese imports, said Liu Baocheng, of the Sino-U.S. School of International Management at the University of International Business and Economics in Beijing.

But after the collapse of the Dubai deal, which Mr. Schumer helped bring about, and the failure last summer of a major Chinese energy company's bid to take over the American oil company Unocal, China has grown fearful of surging economic nationalism in the United States.

Mr. Liu said the decision to play host to Mr. Schumer and Mr. Graham took a page from China's courtship of Newt Gingrich, the former House speaker. "He was once an advocate of the China threat, but a visit to China turned him into an opponent of that theory," Mr. Liu told The Beijing Morning News.

Much of what the senators were told by government leaders appears to be a recitation of themes — China's mounting internal social problems, its desire to move toward a fully convertible currency, its plans to stimulate domestic consumption — that officials have repeated many times in recent months. But Mr. Schumer said: "They're not just mouthing it. They really believe it."

On Wednesday they got a presentation on currency reform from Zhu Zhixin, a top official of the National Development and Reform Commission, a central planning body.

Mr. Schumer said he had pressed Mr. Zhu to address the imbalances between the United States, which is thought to consume beyond its means, and China, which is thought to consume too little relative to its rising wealth. The official pulled out a page from China's newly enacted 11th five-year plan that made the same point.

"It was a golden moment for us," Mr. Schumer said. "He said this was the right way to go. They just had to figure out how to get there."

Senators In China For Talks On Currency Exchange Rate (USAT)

By Calum Macleod

USA Today, March 23, 2006

BEIJING — The co-authors of a Senate bill to punish Chinese currency manipulation say they are learning plenty on a fact-finding mission to China, but still seek more progress toward a fairer exchange rate.

"This is a defining moment for Sino-U.S. relations," warned Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., in Beijing on Wednesday. "If we can't solve the currency problem, we'll take a giant step backward."

The stakes are huge. China's trade surplus with the USA passed $200 billion last year. That imbalance costs American jobs and is driven by a deliberately undervalued currency, argue Graham and Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

The two senators are co-authors of a bill that proposes a 27.5% tariff on Chinese imports into the United States unless Beijing revalues its yuan currency at a higher exchange rate to the dollar.

The yuan, formally known as the renminbi, or "people's currency," currently trades at 8.03 to the dollar, a figure some U.S. critics, including Graham and Schumer, believe is below its real value if it were allowed to float freely on global currency markets.

Chairman Mao Zedong still stares out from most Chinese banknotes, though last week, government advisers in Beijing proposed replacing him with Deng Xiaoping, the reformer who ripped up the Maoist textbook and began the economic reforms that have transformed the Chinese economy.

The Chinese have recovered their capitalist instincts so sharply that, "in competition, you'll beat the socks off us," Graham said to an elite group of MBA students at Beijing's prestigious Tsinghua University. "But let's make sure we play by the same rules."

Change to the currency rate "is not a panacea" for the trade imbalance, Schumer said at the same forum, "but we expect a basic fairness … that will make the global system work."

The congressional delegation, which also includes Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., is in the Chinese capital to see how China works and inform its leaders about rising U.S. anger about what the U.S. sees as unfair trade practices.

"China's cultural wealth, history, intellect, family values and work ethic — nothing can stop China," Coburn said. "We are here to avert a problem, not create one."

The meeting with students Wednesday allowed a more relaxed setting to exchange views with China's future business leaders.

"How many of the 67 senators (who passed a preliminary vote on the tariff bill last year) have been to China?" asked Liu Weiping, an MBA student and CEO of an environmental website. "China has a good reputation and does abide by international principles."

Following further meetings with Chinese government officials, the senators will announce whether they will press ahead with the vote on the tariff bill when they return to Washington. The trip concludes with stops in booming Shanghai and Hong Kong.

China's Hu, Bush To Meet On Terrorism, Nuclear Issues April 20 (BLOOM)

By Cassie M. Chew

Bloomberg, March 23, 2006

March 22 -- Chinese President Hu Jintao and U.S. President George W. Bush will discuss the fight against terrorism and halting the spread of nuclear weapons when they meet April 20 in Washington, a Bush spokesman said.

The two leaders will discuss areas of mutual interest and will seek ``to make progress in resolving outstanding differences,'' spokesman Scott McClellan told reporters traveling with the president today to Wheeling, West Virginia.

Hu originally was scheduled to meet with Bush in the U.S. last year. That visit was postponed after Hurricane Katrina devastated the U.S. Gulf Coast.

Democrats and Republicans in Congress are putting pressure on the president to address the trade imbalance between the two nations, which reached a record $201.6 billion last year.

DOJ_NMG_0020455

Senators Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, and Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, are in Beijing to talk with Chinese officials about trade and the valuation of China's currency. The two lawmakers are threatening to introduce legislation that would impose a 27.5 percent tariff on Chinese imports unless the Chinese government loosens its fixed exchange rate and allows its currency to rise.

Graham said at a news conference in Beijing earlier today that he is ``increasingly hopeful'' that China will move toward a market-based currency.

China on July 21 reset the value of the yuan, a denomination of China's currency, the renminbi, at 8.11 to the dollar, a 2.1 percent appreciation from the pegged level where it had been held since 1995, and linked its value to a basket of currencies including the euro and yen.

China's Competitiveness 'on The Decline' (FT)

By Tom Mitchell

Financial Times, March 23, 2006

The competitiveness of China's manufacturing industries has suffered serious erosion over the past year, according to one of the world's largest trade sourcing companies.

Hong Kong-based Li & Fung group, which manages a $7.1bn a year trading business, said price rises crept back into the Sino-US and EU supply chains last year, after at least six years of often "severe deflation".

William Fung, Li & Fung managing director, reported an average 2-3 per cent increase in the once unbeatable China price its US and European clients were willing to pay. He pointed to a "double-digit" rise in Chinese labour costs, the revaluation of the renminbi and higher oil and energy costs for the shift.

"China's costs are all going up," Mr Fung said. "It is no longer the most cost-effective country in the region...Anything [sourced] from China has a higher inflation component than from other places around the world."

Beneficiaries of China's rising prices have included textile and garment manufacturers in India, Bangladesh and Cambodia, which were expected to lose orders to China after the quota regime governing textile production expired in January 2005.

They were saved, however, by a combination of anti-surge "safeguards" imposed by the US and EU on selected Chinese textile exports in the second half of last year, as well as rising cost pressures in China. "[The safeguards] stopped China in its tracks in terms of textiles," Mr Fung said.

"In Bangladesh factories are so overbooked – it's like China used to be," added Bruce Rockowitz, the president of Li & Fung's trading arm, who oversees sourcing operations on four continents.

The inflationary pressure extends to all product categories sourced by Li & Fung, ranging from fashion accessories and furnishings to sporting and travel goods.

Li & Fung, which used to buy 90 per cent of its non-apparel products from China, has seen 25 per cent of this "hardgoods" business migrate to cheaper locations in south and southeast Asia. It sells about 70 per cent of its sourced goods in the US, and another 20 per cent in Europe.

At its results briefing on Wednesday, Li & Fung reported an 18 per cent increase in group turnover to HK$55.6bn ($7.1bn), with net profit up 20 per cent to HK$1.79bn.

The company also recorded a rare up-tick in its "total margin", which represents the difference between what it pays China-based factories and what it charges overseas retailers. The margin rose to 10.7 per cent from 9.6 per cent.

China Raises Taxes To Curb Use Of Energy And Timber (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

HONG KONG, Thursday, March 23 — The Chinese government announced plans on Wednesday to increase existing taxes and impose new ones on April 1 for everything from gas-guzzling vehicles to chopsticks in a move to rein in rising use of energy and timber and the widening gap between rich and poor.

New or higher taxes will fall on vehicles with engines larger than two liters, disposable wooden chopsticks, planks for wood floors, luxury watches, golf clubs, golf balls and certain oil products.

China's finance ministry disclosed the higher taxes Tuesday night in a statement that was reported Wednesday morning by the official New China News Agency. The statement offered another sign that some senior Chinese officials may be having second thoughts about the rapid growth of privately owned family vehicles, whose sales rose to 3.1 million last year from just 640,000 in 2000.

"In recent years, car ownership in China has grown rapidly and fuel consumption has risen considerably, and this highlights the conflict between supply and demand of oil resources," the statement said. "At the same time, pollution caused by motor cars has become the main source of pollution in big and medium-size cities."

The finance ministry is imposing a 5 percent tax on chopsticks and floor planks, citing a need to conserve timber. Environmentalists around the world have been warning that China's voracious demand for wood was contributing to the clear-cutting of many forests, especially in Southeast Asia.

The production of disposable wooden chopsticks consumes two million cubic meters (70.6 million cubic feet) of timber each year, the ministry said. Plastic chopsticks, which can be washed and reused, will not be subject to the new tax.

A new tax of 10 percent on yachts, golf clubs and golf balls, and a 20 percent tax on luxury watches, is squarely aimed at China's emerging elite of wealthy industrialists and well-connected Communist officials.

China's yacht market is still in its infancy, as military restrictions on ocean traffic and commercial restrictions on river traffic have limited yachts to lakes — although a few entrepreneurs have been able to get around the rules to cruise on the Yangtze River near Shanghai.

Chinese officials have periodically assailed golf, especially when villages and farms are demolished with little compensation to make way for new golf courses.

The biggest commercial effect of the new taxes is likely to fall on sport utility vehicles and luxury sedans. China is reducing its tax on vehicles with engines of 1 to 1.5 liters to 3 percent from 5 percent, while leaving the rate unchanged for slightly more powerful engines. The tax rate will rise to 20 percent, from 8 percent now, for vehicles with engines larger than four liters.

The taxes are likely to affect foreign automakers, especially American manufacturers, more than Chinese companies, which tend to make models with smaller engines.

The big question for automakers is how much of the tax to pass on to consumers, since the tax is collected from the manufacturers. With a week and a half remaining until the new tax takes effect, marketing executives scrambled on Wednesday to assess the impact and no automaker immediately raised prices.

"We are doing the calculations and assessing the impact, and on the other hand watching the actions of our competitors," said Kenneth Hsu, a spokesman for the China operations of Ford Motor, which sell everything from compact cars with 1.6-liter engines to Lincoln Navigator full-size S.U.V.'s with 5.4-liter engines.

Trevor Hale, a DaimlerChrysler spokesman, said the company offered fuel-efficient engines; many Mercedes sedans sold in China have considerably smaller engines than models sold in the United States.

Chinese officials considered and rejected a tax system based on gas mileage instead of engine displacement. That approach would have benefited foreign automakers who possess better technology that permits them to squeeze more power out of the same size engine than purely Chinese manufacturers can.

General Motors China welcomed the new taxes on Thursday but voiced a reservation: "While we believe the new measure will be more environmentally friendly and help lower energy consumption in China, we think it would be more reasonable to base the tax rate on the actual fuel consumption of a vehicle instead of the size of its engine displacement, which is a widely accepted practice worldwide."

Yale Zhang, an analyst in the Shanghai office of CSM Worldwide, a big automotive consulting firm based in the Detroit suburbs, said that Chinese automakers had growing influence in policy debates and that the new rules might lead to a proliferation of vehicles with engines a hundredth of a liter below the thresholds for higher taxes.

Chinese regulators have already imposed stringent fuel-economy regulations that take effect for all vehicles sold after July 1, and have said that they are considering a separate gas-guzzler tax for models that do not comply. The finance ministry's statement on the tax increases on April 1 made no mention of such a gas-guzzler tax, however, and finance ministry officials could not be reached for elaboration.

The finance ministry also announced a modest new tax of a penny (0.1 yuan) a liter for aviation fuel and 2 cents (0.2 yuan) a liter for naptha, solvents and lubricants, but said it would not collect the new aviation fuel tax for now and would collect only 30 percent of the new tax on naptha, solvents and lubricants.

Applying taxes on oil products but not collecting them while prices are high could set a precedent for how China handles taxes on gasoline and diesel. Chinese officials have said repeatedly that they would like to raise fuel taxes to encourage conservation, but do not want to act while world oil prices are close to record levels.

On April 1, China will also lower its tax on motorcycles with engines under 250 cubic centimeters to 3 percent from 10 percent, while leaving the tax unchanged at 10 percent for motorcycles with larger engines.

Western manufacturers like Harley-Davidson are trying to break into the Chinese market with powerful bikes, while Chinese manufacturers like Lifan mainly produce less powerful models.

China Can't See Forest For The Chopsticks (WT)

By Richard Spencer, London Daily Telegraph

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

BEIJING -- China's growing environmental consciousness has hit the heart of its culture, with the government yesterday announcing a 5 percent tax on disposable wooden chopsticks.

The Finance Ministry said chopstick production used up China's forests at a rate of 70 million cubic feet a year, a waste that it wanted to discourage.

Chopsticks were not the only targets of the regulations, an early fruit of the government's new five-year plan, which stresses energy conservation, efficient use of resources and an end to the environmental despoliation that has accompanied its rapid growth.

Wooden floor panels, another high consumer of wood, and even yachts, of which there are few in China, also will fall under the consumption tax.

A 10 percent tax on golf balls and clubs, part of a wider assault on luxury items, might seem to be unconnected, but there is growing concern in Beijing that many municipal drives to attract business by building golf courses are sacrificing land, trees and water supplies for what remains a relatively tiny market.

The five-year plan is a major effort by the government to reorder China's priorities after 25 years of dramatic economic growth and spread some of the benefits to ordinary people.

The tax on chopsticks is slated to take effect April 1.

China sells 10 billion boxes of wooden chopsticks a year domestically and exports about 6 billion boxes annually, the China Daily newspaper said.

In an effort to curb the use of bigger cars, automobiles with 2.2-liter engines and larger will be hit with a 9 percent to 20 percent tax, up from the current 8 percent.

Taxes on cars with smaller engines would remain at 3 percent to 5 percent to encourage their use.

Oil-based products also will be taxed to reduce energy use. The tax on solvents and lubricants will be about 2.5 cents per liter, or about 10 cents per gallon.

Companies, however, will have to pay only 30 percent of the tax on the oil products to reduce the impact on industry.

Eight-Step Program For What Ails China (WP)

By Edward Cody

BEIJING -- On bus-stop billboards, newspaper front pages and television news broadcasts, in school classrooms, factory study groups and student counseling sessions, at forums and meetings all across China, the Communist Party propaganda apparatus has been spreading the word from President Hu Jintao: Do good and avoid evil.

Hu's fatherly advice, in the form of eight do's and don'ts, was issued two weeks ago as an antidote to the corruption and cynicism spreading across China, a result of the often raw capitalism that has emerged during 25 years of dramatic economic change. Although his aphorisms may sound simplistic to Western ears -- "Work hard, don't be lazy" and "Be honest, not profit-mongering" -- Chinese analysts said they are a response to a deep-seated desire among people here for a moral compass to guide them through the unsettling transformation.

"There is a feeling that things have been going wrong," said Kang Xiaoguang, a social sciences researcher at the Chinese Academy of Science. "So when I hear him say that, I say, 'Good. It should have been said a long time ago.' "

Many Chinese would agree. The Communist Party's traditional values of egalitarianism and service to the poor have largely faded away, they complain, in favor of a get-rich ideology that blurs the distinction between officials and entrepreneurs. The strait-laced morals of Mao Zedong's time, they note, have relaxed to the point that bribes are part of doing business and prostitution is practiced openly. In addition, the party's reputation for corrupt land seizures has contributed heavily to often violent peasant unrest, making the need to re-burnish the government's legitimacy more urgent.

Since taking over as party leader and president three years ago, Hu has been reaching for the right formula. Under his orders, the party has been engaged in an 18-month retraining program to fire up its 70 million members. Hu has declared that the country must pursue "scientific development," taking environmental and social concerns into account as the economy grows. And he repeatedly has urged China's 1.3 billion people to create a "harmonious society," in which competing interest groups, such as farmers and businessmen, settle differences without conflict.

"It is a step-by-step program," Kang said. "I think he has a blueprint in his heart."

Some party analysts have suggested Hu's preaching is not enough, that the country should slow the pace of economic reforms and reemphasize the benefits that came with socialism, such as health care and guaranteed employment. Hu and his premier, Wen Jiabao, have resisted the calls, which some analysts say have more to do with jockeying for position than genuine policy disagreements. But the two leaders have clearly indicated they believe headlong economic growth should be tempered by greater concern for the people left behind, particularly farmers.

Having risen through the ranks in the Communist Youth League, with its Boy Scout-like code, Hu, 63, seems to have turned naturally toward a campaign appealing for cleaner living as part of the answer to corruption and cynicism. In a speech last year to cadres training at the Central Party School, he suggested that the solution lies in renewing traditional Marxist thought, revisiting the best of Mao Zedong's policies and reviving ancient Chinese culture, including Confucianism. Of the three, Kang said, Hu looks to Chinese culture as the most likely to provide moral values.

So when he sat down with a group of delegates to the National People's Congress on March 4, Hu harked back to a long Chinese tradition that stipulates leaders are supposed to urge moral conduct on their followers. "Love the motherland, do not harm it," he said. "Be disciplined and law-abiding, not chaotic and lawless."

In all, he recited eight such rules, which he called "the eight glories and the eight shames." The official New China News Agency called them "a perfect amalgamation of traditional Chinese values and modern virtues." The People's Political Consultative Conference, the other house in China's bicameral legislature, passed a resolution saying, "Let it be a paragon and common practice of the times."

The official People's Daily newspaper quickly filled with statements from Communist Party cadres describing Hu's ideas as marvelous and saying they were starting programs to teach the eight do's and don'ts through schools, workplace meetings and popular performances.

"The characteristics of the economic and social development of our country in this period made it necessary to set out the socialist view on glories and shames," the People's Daily said in a front-page editorial Saturday. "The dramatic changes in society, rapid economic development and culture clashes have had an effect on people's ideology, living style and value system. The facts prove that without a healthy social conduct and good moral standards the overall national strength will not grow and the people will not be able to stand among other peoples of the world proudly no matter how developed the economy is."

The official China Central Television, playing its part, broadcast daily reports on Hu's meaning and how enthusiastically his ideas were being welcomed across the country. Outdoor advertising also made them available for viewing across the capital; a poster version was printed as well, distributed gratis for those who wanted to see the do's and don'ts on their walls.

Students at Beijing's Fang Cao Di Elementary School were visited by senior officials -- the children called them "Hu Jintao leaders" -- who had them memorize all eight aphorisms. Ren Tanyong, head of the Propaganda Department in Changsha, the Hunan provincial capital, announced that he was setting up a special program so the city's youth would get the message. Several professors and school administrators were quoted as saying Hu's eight lessons were just the thing for China's spoiled young generation.

But Huang Weiting, deputy editor of the party's Seeking Truth magazine, said party officials should be looking at themselves as well. "It's a cadre problem," he said in an interview.

"Eight glories and eight shames are not only a requirement for youth, but also for every citizen," he wrote this week in the party's Discipline Inspection newspaper. "Especially party members and cadres should take the lead."

Despite the noise generated by party propaganda organs, some Chinese questioned whether Hu's preaching would ever reach officials in the small towns and villages where disenchantment with the party is strongest. "It won't even get to provincial capitals," said Kang, the social scientist.

Even in Beijing, a group of recent graduates from prestigious Peking University, all of whom work in government-connected jobs, said they had not heard of the eight aphorisms after more than a week of the campaign. And in Inner Mongolia's distant Tongliao City, Bai Lianhua, a 46-year-old homemaker, said in a telephone conversation that she had no idea what they were.

"I guess it's the same kind of thing as the harmonious society, right?" she said.

Moscow And Beijing Face Tough Talks On Gas Prices (FT)

By Richard McGregor And Neil Buckley

Financial Times, March 23, 2006

Beijing and Moscow face difficult negotiations over prices to realise this week's high-profile announcement of the construction of two pipelines to carry natural gas from Russia to energy-hungry China within five years.

The deal, signed on Tuesday, formed the centrepiece of the state visit by Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, to Beijing, designed to cement strategic energy co-operation between the two countries.

Sergei Lavrov, the Russian foreign minister, on Wednesday said Russia would sell the gas to China at the "market price", calculated according to the same formula linked to oil and diesel prices as for sales to Europe.

But China has balked at signing long-term import gas contracts for the past three years as the price of the resource has risen along with that of oil, outstripping domestic rates which are kept artificially low.

China's failure to import more gas has left a number of newly built gas-fired turbines idle, as power producers have turned to plentiful and cheap coal.

"Coal is going to be the predominantly competing fuel, and this raises the issue of how much gas is going to get used in China," said John Harris, in the Beijing office of Cera, the energy consultancy.

But the cost of pipeline gas should be cheaper than that of liquefied natural gas, where price rises have been highest, leaving industry executives confident a deal can be struck. "The pipeline gas will be competitive," said Victor Vekselberg, the director of gas at TNK-BP, whose field will provide the resource for one of the pipelines.

Despite Chinese frustrations over the difficulty of securing concrete energy deals with Russia, the summit between Mr Putin and Hu Jintao, China's president, their fifth meeting in the last 12 months, has strengthened bilateral ties.

Two-way trade, dominated by Russian sales of arms, oil and logs and Chinese exports of manufactured goods, is rising rapidly and is being complemented by closer political ties.

Mr Putin said Russia wanted to promote co-operation in civil aviation, machinery manufacturing and anti-terrorism, as well as learning from China about how to operate free-trade zones.

But Mr Putin made no firm commitment about one of the projects most sought by China, the construction of an oil pipeline to the Chinese city of Daqing.

"If the project could be implemented, which I have no doubt about, it will help improve [Russia's] oil supply to China," Mr Putin said.

The signing of a number of agreements during the visit by the president and a large business delegation was "encouraging", said Bobo Lo, the head of the Russia and Eurasia programme at Chatham House in London.

"But there is a world of difference between signing agreements and actually proceeding with them," he said.

Russia-based analysts also warned that Beijing and Moscow had signed apparently ambitious energy agreements before, with limited results. They added that, since the texts of this week's agreements had not been published, it was difficult to gauge the level of commitment of each side.

Stephen O'Sullivan, head of research at Deutsche UFG in Moscow, said several factors might prevent or delay the bringing of reserves from both west and east Siberia to China. He said the cost of constructing the pipelines could be burdensome, especially if China drove a hard bargain on gas prices.

Russia has concerns about becoming too dependent on its former cold war rival in Asia. But the agreements could still foreshadow what Dmitry Trenin, a foreign policy specialist at the Carnegie Moscow Centre think-tank, believes will be a much closer relationship between the two countries.

The Kremlin, says Mr Trenin, is growing weary of western criticisms of Russia's clampdown on democracy. China, on the other hand, is unlikely to complain about Mr Putin's authoritarian tendencies.

Moscow Courts Beijing Over Nuclear Power (WSJ)

By Shai Oster

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

BEIJING -- Russia said it wants to play a greater role in developing China's fast-growing nuclear-power industry, in another sign of closer energy cooperation between the two countries.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said yesterday that China welcomes increased Russian participation in its nuclear-power sector, which is undergoing one of its biggest-ever expansions and one of the biggest nuclear rollouts in the industry's history. China has said it plans to build 30 or more nuclear reactors during the next 15 years. Currently, it has nine reactors at two plants.

Mr. Lavrov's comments to reporters came on the final day of a two-day summit between Russian President Vladimir Putin and Chinese President Hu Jintao. On Tuesday, Russia pledged to sharply increase oil and gas exports to China.

Chinese officials couldn't be reached for comment on Mr. Lavrov's remarks, but Russian officials point to participation by Russia's AtomStroyExport -- which operates under the umbrella of Russia's atomic-energy agency -- in the first round of bidding to build four reactors in China valued at $1 billion to $2 billion each. The other two companies short-listed are Westinghouse Electric Co. and France's state-owned Areva. Overall, deals to build China's nuclear plants are potentially worth tens of billions of dollars.

China has decided to dramatically increase the number of its nuclear-power plants as it seeks to reduce its dependence on Middle East oil and diversify its energy sources to sate the demands of its rapidly expanding economy. The country has plenty of its own, cheap coal, but Chinese leaders worry that using high-polluting coal to fire its power plants is coming at too great a cost to the environment. Increasingly, they see nuclear power as a cleaner alternative.

Sergei Kiriyenko, head of Russia's atomic-energy agency, accompanied President Putin on his trip to China. He made a stop at China's newest nuclear-power plant, the Tianwan station, which is north of Shanghai and built jointly with the Russians.

The Russian visit comes just as the country's competitors to build the four Chinese reactors -- which will be located in the eastern province of Zhejiang and the southern province of Guangdong -- appear to have hit snags. China was originally expected to decide on the winning bid in December, but negotiations have dragged on.

Industry observers and analysts say the Chinese government is unhappy about the sale of Westinghouse to Japan-based Toshiba Corp. in February. Relations between China and Japan have grown increasingly tense, and the Chinese are reluctant to have sensitive technology controlled by the Japanese, the observers say. Westinghouse has said it expects a decision from Chinese officials soon.

France's Areva, meanwhile, is resisting Chinese demands to transfer more of its technology, they say. Last week, French Finance Minister Thierry Breton said Areva is still in the race.

Russia's expression of interest in helping build up China's nuclear-power industry comes a day after President Putin said Russia plans to construct two pipelines to bring natural gas to China and another pipeline to bring oil.

China, one of the world's fastest-growing energy consumers, has for years sought more direct supplies from its northern neighbor, which is the world's largest gas producer and second-largest oil producer. But the bulk of Russia's export channels face westward, and Moscow has been slow to turn toward Asian markets. China currently gets no gas and only a small fraction of its oil supplies from Russia.

Tuesday's deals represent a big step forward in Beijing's efforts to secure more energy supplies from Russia, but some questions remain. Some analysts said they doubt Russia has enough oil to supply both China and Japan. China's pipeline would be built as part of a longer pipeline bound for Russia's Pacific coast, from where Moscow could supply Japan.

And Russia and China have yet to reach any agreement over the price for any gas sales. Russian officials say Beijing will pay the same prices as Europe is charged. But those prices are much higher than China can stomach, analysts say. High international prices have recently forced China to delay other plans to import natural gas. Executives working on the deal also point out that major technical challenges lie ahead in building the pipelines, which would eventually carry about half as much gas as Russia currently supplies Europe.

"This agreement is a significant milestone. But the question remains, where do we go next?" asks Alastair Ferguson, deputy executive director of OAO TNK-BP Holding, BP PLC's Russian joint venture.

Ottawa To Buy Russian Natural Gas, Sell It To U.S. (WT)

By Andrea R. Mihailescu

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

Canada is planning to capitalize on shortages of natural gas, exacerbated by last year's hurricanes, by importing vast quantities of liquefied natural gas (LNG) from Russia to be exported to the United States.

The Canadian government recently approved a $1.5 billion joint venture of Petro-Canada and Russian giant Gazprom to build a plant near St. Petersburg in Russia to liquefy the gas and load it into giant tanker ships.

The tankers would be unloaded in Quebec and the liquid converted back into gas that could be pumped through existing pipeline networks to U.S. customers.

"LNG is going to be a big part of the future of the gas market in North America," said Ron Brenneman, president and chief executive officer of Petro-Canada.

"As this project moves forward, we will be in an excellent position to import long-term gas supply, not only from Russia but from other parts of the world as well. We see this agreement as an important part of our overall growth strategy," he said.

The entire project could cost as much as $2 billion.

The United States, a growing natural-gas consumer, saw a decline in production in 2005 by about 4 percent, in large part because of the major disruptions to infrastructure in the Gulf of Mexico from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration (EIA).

The United States looks to secure long-term supplies, but it lacks facilities to import the liquid and convert it back into gas.

"Russia may have questions on the timing and availability of U.S. East Coast regasification facilities to handle imports, and the Canadians have expressed an interest in building a regasification facility in the Northeast that would serve New England markets," said Frank A. Verrastro, senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington think tank.

Unlike oil, which is a globally traded commodity shipped by tanker from producers thousands of miles away to consumers, natural gas has traditionally been a continental market, with suppliers and consumers linked by pipelines crisscrossing North America.

Liquefied natural gas is cooled to minus 300 degrees Fahrenheit to condense it into a liquid state, making it more cost efficient to transport over long distances.

As the third-largest producer after Russia and the United States, Canada exported about 3.5 trillion cubic feet of gas to the United States in 2003.

This accounted for nearly all of Canada's natural-gas exports, but represented just 16 percent of U.S. natural-gas consumption, according to the EIA.

The two companies reached a deal during talks between Alexei Miller, chief executive officer of Gazprom, and Mr. Brenneman of Calgary's Petro-Canada, said Sergei Kupriyanov, Gazprom's spokesman.

For several years now, Gazprom has been looking for a partner to construct an LNG plant in the Baltic port of Ust-Luga in the St. Petersburg region.

But Gazprom will need to secure supplies for its St. Petersburg LNG plant before this project can materialize successfully. The company is exploring a couple suppliers.

Industry analysts fear that Petro-Canada faces several hurdles before it can import natural gas into Canada. It faces regulatory obstacles at its Gros-Cacouna regasification facility in Quebec and long-term supplies need to be secured for the deal to be profitable.

The Baltic plant, which is expected to have an annual processing capacity of between 5 million and 7 million tons, could become operational as early as 2010.

State Dept. Warns Americans Visiting Italy (AP)

AP, March 22, 2006

The State Department warned Americans on Wednesday to take precautions this spring when traveling in Italy, saying next month's parliamentary elections are likely to bring demonstrations in parts of the country.

"Demonstrations may be large, but even peaceful demonstrations have the potential to escalate into violence," the announcement said.

The department said Americans should avoid areas where crowds are expected to gather, take common sense precautions and closely follow media reports.

The U.S. considers Italy to be under a heightened threat by al-Qaida and other Islamic extremists for its participation in wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Basque Fighters Set A Cease-Fire After Four Decades (NYT)

By Renwick McLean

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

SEVILLE, Spain, March 22 — The militant Basque separatist group ETA, which has killed more than 800 people and terrorized Spanish society for nearly 40 years, on Wednesday announced a permanent cease-fire, saying that it would turn its attention to achieving independence for the Basque region of Spain through politics.

A permanent cease-fire, which the group said would take effect on Friday, has been the paramount objective of successive Spanish governments since the establishment of democracy here in 1977.

"This could be the beginning of the end," Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero said in a rare appearance before reporters in Madrid.

But Mr. Zapatero also said it was important to treat the announcement with caution, echoing concerns of victims' groups, who urged politicians to remember what they described as ETA's history of deceit and unfulfilled promises.

"This government will tackle this new situation with prudence, with calm," he said, "fully aware that after so many years of suffering, we have a tough, long, difficult road ahead of us."

The government is expected to begin preparing for negotiations with ETA, which Mr. Zapatero promised in May to open if the group agreed to renounce violence permanently.

The negotiations are expected to focus on Basque demands for more autonomy and on persuading ETA to hand over its weapons and disband. Mr. Zapatero would not say on Wednesday when the talks would begin.

ETA, whose acronym stands for Basque Homeland and Liberty in the Basque language, has called cease-fires before, but never in such categorical terms, explicitly describing the move as permanent.

The group made the announcement in a statement sent to Radio Euskadi, a Basque radio station, on Wednesday morning. Three ETA members later appeared on Basque public television, their heads covered with white veils and black berets, to read the statement to the public.

"The objective of our decision is to advance the democratic process," the statement says. "Overcoming the conflict is possible, here and now. That is the desire and the will of ETA."

Juan Avilés, director of the Institute for the Investigation of National Security, a research and teaching organization in Madrid, said the announcement represented a victory for Mr. Zapatero, who he said had taken a big political risk in declaring that he was willing to negotiate with ETA if it agreed to give up violence.

"But the big question is what did the government offer to get this," he said in a telephone interview. "There surely were contacts of some kind between the government and ETA beforehand."

The government has said repeatedly that it has not made contact with ETA to negotiate a cease-fire.

ETA's statement on Wednesday included a call for all of its members to abandon violence, but Spanish government officials said they could not rule out the possibility that splinter groups might ignore the cease-fire.

But they said that was unlikely, citing the structured and hierarchical nature of ETA. "That is not a serious source of concern right now," said an official in the prime minister's offices who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly about the cease-fire. "The conditions are favorable enough that the possibility of further violence is not being seriously contemplated."

ETA was founded in 1959 with the goal of establishing an independent Basque state encompassing sections of northern Spain and southern France.

After one of its members fatally shot a Civil Guard officer in 1968, the group made attacks that, over the years, killed 817 people, including nearly 350 civilians, according to figures from the Interior Ministry. The attacks have included assassinations of politicians, car bombs placed outside police stations and indiscriminate bombings in parks and shopping centers.

ETA's last fatal attack was in May 2003, and the organization is widely considered to be weaker now than at any point in its history. Scores of arrests over the past two years have thinned its leadership ranks and led some investigators to contend that ETA no longer has the capacity to carry out large attacks.

Investigators had been saying for more than a year that the main question was when ETA would renounce violence, not if.

Speculation that a cease-fire was near grew in recent months, fueled by statements by Spanish officials, in public and private, hinting that a cease-fire was imminent.

Nevertheless, ETA continued to bomb businesses, parks and other public spaces, including three attacks this month, as part of what investigators call an extortion campaign to persuade companies and business executives to give the group money. These bombings, usually preceded by a warning by telephone to local authorities or newspapers, appeared intended to avoid serious injuries.

The group's embrace of violence, investigators said, might also have wavered after the train bombings in Madrid on March 11, 2004. The public outrage after those attacks, which killed 191 people and are thought to have been carried out by Islamic militants, possibly convinced ETA that terrorism was not politically profitable, these investigators say.

Spanish PM Welcomes Eta Ceasefire (FT)

By Leslie Crawford

Financial Times, March 23, 2006

José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero, the Spanish prime minister, on Wednesday heralded the start of a “long and difficult peace process”, after Eta, the violent separatist group, declared a permanent ceasefire in its 38-year war for an independent Basque state.

Eta said the ceasefire would begin on Friday. “The aim of this decision is to drive a democratic process in the Basque country…in which our rights as a people are recognised,” the outlawed group said in a statement.

Eta made no mention of surrendering or laying down arms. Mr Zapatero told parliament his government had greeted Eta’s declaration with caution.

“After so many years of horror and terror, any peace process will be long and difficult,” he said.

“We are all duty-bound to take part and I hope I can count on all political parties in this matter. Where before we were united in the shock of horror, I hope we will now be united in hope.”

Eta has killed 812 people in the course of its long, low-intensity guerrilla war. Many more Basques have lived for years with Eta death threats, while businessmen have suffered extortion in the guise of “revolutionary taxes”.

The plight of the victims of terrorism, as well as Eta’s demands for a political process culminating in a referendum on Basque independence, make peace talks particularly tricky for the Spanish government.

Mr Zapatero, who last month heralded "the beginning of the end of Eta", said he would take his time before deciding whether Eta's statement offered sufficient guarantees to launch peace talks.

In May last year, parliament voted to authorise negotiations should Eta declare an unconditional and permanent end to violence.

While some Socialist leaders interpreted Eta's statement as a farewell to arms, the opposition Popular party, which opposes peace talks with Eta, remained unconvinced.

Mariano Rajoy, Popular party leader, warned the government not to be fooled by a mere "pause in Eta's criminal activities".

Mr Rajoy was Spain's interior minister when Eta declared "an indefinite ceasefire" in 1998. At the time, Mr Rajoy denounced the truce as a trap – a breathing space to allow Eta to regroup and rearm.

Eta resumed killing14 months later after tentative contacts between the Popular party government and Eta collapsed.

Nevertheless, Eta's announcement was greeted with optimism in the Basque country.

"The fact that Eta has announced a permanent ceasefire is good news," said Joseba Arregi, a former member of the Basque regional government and a target of Eta death threats. "I see it as a sign of Eta's weakness: that as a fighting force, it is spent. In a very large measure, peace has already arrived."

In spite of a recent spate of minor bomb attacks, Eta has not killed anyone since May 2003. Close cooperation between Spanish and French security forces, and the infiltration of Eta by Spanish undercover agents, paralysed the separatist group and led to more than 400 arrests in the past three years.

With most of Eta's senior cadres now in jail, the separatist group had come to be regarded as an irritant, rather than as a serious security threat.

Basque Group Declares Cease-Fire With Spain (WSJ)

By Keith Johnson

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

MADRID -- The Basque terrorist group ETA declared a permanent cease-fire, opening the door to what could be a profound change for Spain, much as the 1998 Good Friday agreement ushered in an eventual peace process for Northern Ireland.

For decades, Madrid has struggled to contain separatist aspirations in the Basque Country. Last year, the Spanish Parliament rejected a Basque plan to create a semi-independent state; the region already enjoys more self-rule than almost any other part of Europe.

In contrast, the separatist movement in the northeastern region of Catalonia has been more successful at prying powers away from Madrid over the past quarter-century because it never resorted to terrorism, as the ETA often did. Just this week, after nearly a year of heated negotiations with the national government, Catalonia inked a regional governing charter that gives it an array of new powers.

The Spanish government has promised in the past to enter talks on the political future of the Basque Country if the ETA were to renounce violence. Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero's readiness to negotiate greater autonomy for rebellious regions, including Catalonia and the Basque Country, may have encouraged ETA to lay down its arms, political analysts say.

While welcoming the cease-fire, Gustavo de Aristegui, a Basque Popular Party deputy in Parliament and former Interior Ministry official, said he wanted to know "what concessions the government may have made" to persuade the ETA to declare the truce. In the past, Mr. Zapatero said the government would consider a range of concessions, including partial amnesties for ETA prisoners. Yesterday, government officials said there had been no formal contacts with ETA.

Mr. Zapatero said yesterday he would take his time to decide how to proceed. He said the government has received the ETA's announcement with "caution and prudence" and called the cease-fire "the beginning of the end" to ETA violence.

Still, Mariano Rajoy, leader of Spain's center-right Popular Party, the main opposition party, said ETA's announcement "is a pause, not a disavowal, of violence."

The ETA's declaration, delivered in a filmed statement by three of its operatives, was the group's first-ever promise to permanently lay down arms, after two short cease-fires in the past two decades. ETA said the cease-fire was intended to promote "a democratic process" for the greater Basque Country, which includes a swath of southwestern France as well as other parts of Spain.

During its 45-year campaign for Basque independence, the ETA killed more than 800 people, extorted business owners, silenced debate and dominated small-town politics. But its influence and popular support declined sharply after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on New York and Washington sparked global outrage. The March 11, 2004, train bombings in Madrid, which the conservative government initially blamed on the ETA, further eroded support for its armed struggle. The group's last deadly attack took place almost three years ago.

Spain's problems with Basque terrorism have drawn frequent parallels with the Irish Republican Army's 30-year campaign to drive the British out of Northern Ireland, a conflict that cost more than 3,000 lives.

Yesterday, Spanish Defense Minister José Bono invoked the Irish peace process that began with the IRA's announcement of a complete cease-fire in 1994, but which was undermined by mutual mistrust, further violent attacks and the IRA's refusal to fully disarm.

Last year -- 12 years after the first cease-fire -- the IRA declared its war over and destroyed weapons in earnest, although splinter groups -- and deep distrust between the province's Catholics and Protestants -- remain.

Basque ETA Announces Permanent Cease-Fire (AP)

By Alberto Letona

The Basque militant group ETA ended a decades-long campaign of terror, announcing a permanent cease-fire Wednesday that closes the door on one of Western Europe's last armed separatist movements.

In a videotaped statement, three shrouded ETA members said they were laying down their weapons to promote democracy in the northern Spanish region. The news prompted jubilation across Spain, where ordinary citizens say they can hardly believe the end has come for a group blamed for more than 800 deaths and $15.5 billion in damage since the 1960s.

Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero, who has made granting more rule to Spain's regions a key goal, expressed caution and hope at ETA's statement. He was evasive when asked if he would start negotiating with ETA under an offer he made last year, contingent on the group renouncing violence.

"Any peace process after so many years of horror and terror will be long and difficult," he told parliament. Zapatero said that until now, Spain's political parties had been joined in pain over ETA violence. "Now I trust we will be joined in hope."

The cease-fire was seen as a huge victory for Zapatero, but his critics maintained a hard line, saying they would fight to ensure the government does not give too much away.

"One cannot pay a political price for peace. If we were to do so, terrorism would have won," said Mariano Rajoy, leader of the conservative opposition Popular Party.

ETA, established in the late 1960s, campaigned to carve out an independent Basque homeland in northern Spain and southwest France.

The video showed three people seated at a table in front of an ETA flag, their faces covered by beige masks and all wearing Basque berets. The figure in the middle, a woman, read the statement.

ETA "has decided to declare a permanent cease-fire as of March 24, 2006," the statement said. "The aim of (the cease-fire) is to promote a democratic process in the Basque country and to build a new framework in which our rights as a people will be recognized."

The statement was sent to several Basque media outlets, including the radical Basque newspaper Gara. The newspaper said Wednesday it also was in possession of another, complementary ETA statement, but would not publish it or comment on it until Thursday.

The announcement set off quiet celebrations around the country.

"It's the news we were waiting for many years. It's the best news I have received lately," said Jose Felix Urbano, 52, an administrative worker in Vitoria, capital of the Basque region. "I hope that from here on I can live in a normal country."

Barbara Durkhop, the widow of ETA victim Enrique Casas, killed in 1984, said she was hopeful but nervous.

"The first thing I thought was that now there will be no more deaths," she told Spanish television station Quatro. "This could pave the way, once and for all, to the peace process that we have waited for so long."

In Madrid, there was shock, and a bit of caution.

"It's amazing! I hope to God it's true," said Sandra Dorada, a 29-year-old postal worker. "But they (ETA) have said this before and it wasn't true."

The Bush administration's initial reaction was positive. "Any decisive steps taken by ETA to give up violence should be welcomed," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Speculation about an end to ETA's armed campaign has been building for months, despite a recent wave of small-scale bombings.

The prime minister has offered to hold talks with Basque separatist leaders once ETA agreed to lay down its arms, and parliament backed the move in a resolution passed in May.

Asked Wednesday if ETA's announcement meant the government can now open talks with ETA, Zapatero said: "I will take my time to study the parliamentary resolution. It is essential for proceeding safely."

ETA has announced cease-fires in the past but never one it has called permanent.

Many Spaniards believed that after the March 11, 2004, terrorist attacks in Madrid, carried out by Islamic extremists, ETA had effectively been stymied. The idea is that popular revulsion over terrorism made more deadly violence politically unthinkable.

Over the years, ETA has mostly targeted security force members, although in the 1990s it increasingly began to kill politicians. In 1995, in one of its most audacious plots, it tried to assassinate Jose Maria Aznar, then an opposition leader who would go on to become prime minister. Nobody was seriously injured.

ETA stands for Euskadi Ta Azkatasuna, Basque Homeland and Freedom.

Basque Separatists Announce Ceasefire, Ending Bloody Struggle (AFP)

AFP, March 22, 2006

The armed Basque separatist group ETA announced a permanent ceasefire to meet the Spanish government's key condition for peace talks, nearly four decades after starting an armed conflict that has killed more than 800 people

In a statement on Basque television read out by one of three hooded figures against a backdrop of ETA symbols, the movement said its ceasefire would take effect from Friday.

Spanish Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero welcomed the step and said Spaniards were now "united by hope," while warning that "a long road lies ahead" to cement lasting peace.

"We will react with prudence to reach the end of this historic drama," he added.

ETA's long struggle for an independent Basque homeland, which has cost untold billions of euros in economic damage to the region, was one of Western Europe's last armed internal conflicts, and was often compared to the decades of sectarian unrest in Northern Ireland.

"The aim of this decision is to launch a democratic process in the Basque country," ETA said in its broadcast.

"At the end of this process, Basque citizens will be able to have a voice and the power to decide their future," it went on.

"An end to the conflict is possible today and now. This is the hope and desire of ETA."

ETA is blamed for more than 800 deaths in its campaign to create an independent state covering Spain's northern Basque region and parts of southwestern France.

Spain's first deputy prime minister Maria Teresa Fernandez de la Vega said the Socialist government hoped the ceasefire meant the "beginning of the end" of violence.

"This is good news for all Spaniards," she added, promising the government would "work with all political forces" to achieve peace, while also advising prudence.

Basque regional leader Juan Jose Ibarretxe spoke of an "historic day" and added he was putting out feelers, including to ETA's banned political mouthpiece Batasuna, for roundtable talks on the next stage of the region's development.

"The moment has arrived for Basque society to build its future in peace," Ibarretxe added.

But the main conservative opposition Popular Party was trenchant in its response, while some victims' associations were also sceptical.

Former Spanish prime minister Jose Maria Aznar slammed the government for having what he termed a "defeatist vision" of dealing with terrorists who wanted to bring down democracy, but he did not mention the ceasefire itself.

Previous ceasefires and truces lasted no more than months, and Aznar's successor as PP leader, Mariano Rajoy, said that as ETA had not announced it was disbanding its statement was "not a renunciation of criminal activity."

Francisco Jose Alcaraz, chairman of the conservative Association of Victims of Terrorism (AVT), warned of the possibility of a "trap".

"The ceasefire is not definitive -- ETA placed conditions in its statement such as self-determination through an electoral consultation or referendum," Alcaraz said.

Anti-terrorist judge Baltasar Garzon told Cadena Ser radio he believed that "the government has an obligation to explore all necessary and legal means of achieving peace."

Although ETA's last fatal attack was in May 2003, it has continued to wage low-level violence with car bombs, attacks on public buildings and extortion of businesses.

The organisation has been severely weakened by heightened cooperation between French and Spanish police which resulted in a recent wave of arrests.

Analysts also say the new climate after the March 11, 2004, train bombings in Madrid also helped swing attitudes against violence.

Spain's then conservative government initially blamed ETA for that carnage, which killed 191 people, before evidence emerged that Islamic extremists were responsible.

The parallel with Northern Ireland has long been held up as an example for the Basque region to follow.

There, the Irish Republican Army, which had been fighting against British rule, declared a ceasefire in 1997 that led directly to the Good Friday peace accords the following year which set up a power-sharing government.

The IRA has since renounced violence for good.

Gerry Adams, leader of Sinn Fein, the IRA's political wing, who has often engaged with Basque leaders in recent years, welcomed ETA's move.

"ETA's announcement provides all sides to the conflict with an opportunity of historic proportions," he said in a statement.

Basque Separatist Group Ends Four-Decade War With Spain (LAT)

By Tracy Wilkinson

The Los Angeles Times, March 23, 2006

MADRID — The Basque separatist group ETA declared a "permanent" cease-fire Wednesday and pledged to step away from decades of violence, a major breakthrough that could end one of Europe's last armed conflicts.

The announcement came at a time of military and political weakness for the militant organization that for nearly 40 years has fought for independence from Spain and claimed hundreds of lives in bombings and sabotage.

It follows a fierce crackdown under the previous Spanish government and a period of rumored negotiation, officially denied, with the current one. ETA has also seen its support fade amid public outrage over deadly bombings in Madrid two years ago by Islamic radicals.

"This is very good news for all Spaniards," Vice President Maria Teresa Fernandez de la Vega said as reports of the truce swept the country. Urging "prudence," she added, "We very much hope this is the beginning of the end."

Reactions cleaved along political lines in this bitterly polarized country. The Socialist government of Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero responded with cautious elation, but the conservative opposition noted that the Basque group's move fell short of surrender and claimed that it was nothing more than a ruse.

Ordinary Spaniards were full of tentative hope.

ETA declared the cease-fire, effective Friday, through a videotaped statement released about midday and broadcast on Basque and Spanish television. Unlike two previous cease-fires that collapsed after several months of negotiations, this declaration uses the term "permanent" and sets no conditions.

In the announcement, three members of the guerrilla group, wearing white masks and the black berets typical of the Basque Country, sat at a table with a cloth bearing the words Euskal Herria, or the Basque homeland, and the group's coat of arms. Behind them hung a banner with the ETA insignia of a snake twisted around an ax. The statement was read, unusually, by a woman, who sat in the middle.

The group said its purpose was to "drive the democratic process" in the Basque Country that ensures "the development of all political options."

"ETA has shown its desire and will that the process now begun should reach a conclusion and thus achieve true democracy in the Basque Country, overcoming long years of violence and constructing a peace based on justice," the statement said.

A referendum in 1979 established the Basque Autonomous Community on the Bay of Biscay near the French border, comprising the provinces of Alava, Vizcaya and Guipuzcoa. It has its own police force, education and healthcare system.

Basques, who number about 2.2 million in Spain, are descendants of what may be one of the oldest ethnic groups in Europe. Polls indicate that about half favor a more independent state more loosely associated with Spain. Many who advocate statehood, however, do not support ETA's violent ways.

ETA — an acronym for Euskadi Ta Askatasuna, or Basque Homeland and Freedom in the Basque language — declared cease-fires in 1989 and 1998, but negotiations that followed collapsed.

But this announcement may have a different outcome, analysts say, because of the arrest and imprisonment of senior ETA leaders, the capture of a major arsenal and the banning of its political wing. Polls have shown a widening weariness of violence in the Basque Country and growing rejection of bloodshed.

"There can never be a total guarantee, but what's clear is that [the cease-fire] is a solid base for a peace process," said Gorka Espiau Idoiaga, director of Elkarri, a Basque organization in the city of Bilbao that promotes dialogue. "They are showing a will to disappear and end the violence. It is extraordinary."

Espiau, a senior fellow at the Washington-based U.S. Institute of Peace, noted that the wording of the communique released Wednesday emulated the language of the landmark 1994 statement by the Irish Republican Army.

In addition, it was the first time the Basque separatists had used the word "permanent" in a truce pledge.

ETA, a secretive organization that was founded during the dictatorship of Gen. Francisco Franco, has killed more than 800 people in attacks since 1968, including police officers, mayors and politicians. Hundreds more, among them journalists, justices and intellectuals, have been threatened.

The last ETA attack to cause a death was in May 2003, although more than 100 people have been injured in bombings since. The group had resorted to an intense campaign of blackmail and extorted a fortune from businessmen, bankers and even premier chefs who feared attacks on their property.

Any negotiations with ETA would include numerous difficult issues, such as the disarming of its cadres and the fate of its members held in Spanish prisons.

"Any peace process, after so many years of horror and terror, will be long and difficult," Zapatero, the prime minister, said during a special session of parliament Wednesday afternoon.

He called for unity among all political parties and repeatedly used the words "calm," "caution" and "prudence," language aimed at deflecting critics who suggest he has been too soft on independence-minded factions.

Mariano Rajoy, leader of the main opposition Popular Party, attacked ETA's declaration, noting that it did not renounce all criminal activity or ask for forgiveness from its many victims. Without such gestures, entering into talks with ETA would amount to rewarding terrorism, he said.

At parliament, lawmakers gathered around TV screens to watch the 1 p.m. broadcast of the ETA statement.

In San Sebastian, a major seaside Basque city and scene of much violence, the mayor and city hall officials toasted with the local version of champagne: "For peace and those who are absent." National TV broke into regular programming to provide nonstop coverage, including recapitulations of the years of bloodshed. Gara, a Basque newspaper, published a special edition.

In Madrid, the word on seemingly everyone's lips was Ojalá — "Let's hope."

Juan Jose Ibarretxe, the president of the Basque territory, called the ETA declaration historic.

"ETA has finally listened to Basque society, which demands an end to all criminal activity," said Ibarretxe, a nationalist who advocates separation from Spain through peaceful means.

Families of ETA victims greeted the news with mixed emotion.

"I've got this knot in my stomach that tells me it might not be true, but my first thoughts are maybe, finally, there will be no more dead," Barbara Durkhop, the widow of a Socialist official shot dead in 1984, told Spanish television.

The government that preceded Zapatero's was especially harsh on the separatists. Former Prime Minister Jose Maria Aznar, who early in his career survived an ETA assassination attempt, sent police troops against ETA, outlawed politicians sympathetic to the group, closed its newspaper and deliberately dispersed its jailed members to prisons far from families and support groups.

Aznar maintained that a military crackdown alone would end nationalistic violence, and he succeeded in persuading the Bush administration to officially label ETA a terrorist organization.

With surveillance equipment provided by the CIA, as well as new cooperation with France, Aznar's crackdown succeeded in crippling ETA.

Basque Separatists Declare A 'Permanent Cease-Fire' (WP)

By Pamela Rolfe And Molly Moore

MADRID, March 22 -- The Basque paramilitary group ETA on Wednesday announced a "permanent cease-fire," signaling a possible end to one of Europe's longest-running armed conflicts, four decades of bombings and assassinations aimed at creating an independent Basque homeland on the border of Spain and France.

In a video delivered to a Basque television station, a woman clad in combat fatigues, white face mask and black beret said that ETA was ready to shift from violence to "a democratic process in which our rights as people will be recognized." Flanked by two people in identical masks and dress, the woman said the cease-fire would begin Friday.

"Any peace process after so many years of horror and terror will be long and difficult," Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero told the Spanish parliament in an address carried live on national and international television.

Victims of ETA's violence expressed skepticism that the group would adhere to a cease-fire, noting it had broken past truces. "With the perspective of a memory of 45 years of murders interspersed with announced truces and cease-fires, it's clear that ETA is trying to trick us again," said Daniel Portero, who heads an ETA victims' organization. His father, a regional attorney general, was assassinated by the group in 2002.

For centuries, the scenic mountainous region straddling the borders of northern Spain and southern France has been home to the Basque people, who have a distinct language and culture. Since ancient times they have struggled to preserve their independence.

The ETA name is an abbreviation of Basque language words meaning Basque Homeland and Freedom. The group was founded in the late 1950s as a student movement opposed to the dictatorship of Gen. Francisco Franco. In the 1960s, it switched to increasingly violent tactics.

Under current Spanish law, the Spanish Basque region already has broad autonomy. But the small, secretive ETA has demanded nothing less than full independence.

Rumors of an imminent ETA cease-fire had surfaced in recent weeks. It had been widely reported in Spanish political and media circles that intermediaries for the government and ETA had been conducting secret negotiations to set the stage for the announcement.

"ETA has shown its desire and will that the process now begun should achieve true democracy in the Basque country, overcoming long years of violence and constructing a peace based on justice," the ETA statement said. "Here and now, it is possible to overcome the conflict."

What set this cease-fire announcement apart from those in the past was the use of the term "permanent cease-fire" for the first time.

After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the United States and European Union labeled ETA a terrorist organization. The Spanish government, then led by Prime Minister Jose Maria Aznar, along with neighboring France, launched a major crackdown on ETA leaders and their financing networks, weakening the organization.

Some political observers said ETA's traditional base of support eroded after the March 11, 2004, Madrid train bombings, which killed 191 people. Though investigators concluded that Islamic radicals carried out the attacks, they so horrified the nation that some ETA sympathizers turned against the group because of its use of similar tactics.

ETA has kept up sporadic waves of bombings, including several in the past three weeks. But no one has been killed in an attack since 2003, in part because the group has frequently telephoned warnings and occasionally has written "Danger, Bomb" on explosive devices, according to Spanish news reports.

Previous Spanish governments resisted any efforts to launch a peace process. But the Socialist prime minister, Zapatero, who won election in 2004, has been more open to talks and to allowing more regional autonomy. He has supported, for instance, a measure that would allow the northeastern region of Catalonia greater independence. His supporters say similar legislation for the Basque country could give the separatists a peaceful alternative to violence.

Last year, the Spanish parliament voted to allow talks with ETA if the group agreed to renounce violence and disarm. Wednesday's announcement did not mention laying down arms.

"This announcement was expected and is welcome, but be careful with the wording," said Antonio Elorza, who has studied ETA as a professor of political science at Madrid's Complutense University. " 'Permanent' is not definitive. . . . The congress gave the government permission to negotiate with ETA as long as the goal was disarmament. That is not what this statement says."

Mariano Rajoy, president of the opposition Popular Party, largely dismissed the announcement in comments to parliament Wednesday afternoon.

"This cease-fire now is a pause, not a renouncing of criminal activity," he said. "It means a reaffirmation of a will to continue existing. They don't regret anything and they don't ask forgiveness of the victims of terrorism."

In a rare news conference, the banned Batasuna party -- accused by previous governments of being the political wing of ETA -- urged the Spanish and French governments to "open a new political stage." Pernando Barrena, a leader of the organization, described the cease-fire as "a great opportunity."

Reactions on the streets of Spain were both hopeful and skeptical.

"It's a great thing," said Olatz Herrera, 20, a Basque studying in Madrid. "I hope the government negotiates with them. It's a key opportunity. You have to try everything to end the violence."

"It would be wonderful," said Mari Angeles Gomez, 54. "I hope it's true. But you can't trust ETA."

Basque Separatists Call Cease-fire (CSM)

By Peter Ford

The Christian Science Monitor, March 23, 2006

PARIS - The Basque separatist group ETA's declaration Wednesday of a permanent cease-fire offers the prospect of an end to one of Europe's longest running civil conflicts, and a new constitutional future for Spain that could reshape the country's political map.

But the group's videotaped statement, aired on Spanish TV, marks only the first step toward resolving Madrid's thorniest challenge.

"The government's position is one of caution and prudence," Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero told parliament, responding to ETA's announcement. "Any peace process after so many years of horror and terror will be long and difficult."

The statement from ETA, which has been fighting for 40 years for an independent Basque state, explained the cease-fire - which goes into effect Friday - as a bid to "promote a democratic process in the Basque country ... in which our rights as a people will be recognized." The government, it warned "must recognize the results of this democratic process with no type of limitation."

Politicians had been speculating for weeks that the armed group, which has killed more than 800 people, was about to announce an end to its violent struggle. The government had repeatedly refused to open talks with ETA until it renounced the use of force.

Deputy Prime Minister Maria Teresa Fernandez de la Vega told the Senate Wednesday that the authorities would "work with all political forces" to bring peace to the Basque country, in Spain's Northeast. She said she hoped the cease-fire marked "the beginning of the end" of ETA, which stands for "Basque Homeland and Freedom" in the Basque language.

ETA has demanded that the Spanish government recognize the Basque country's right to declare independence, if a referendum in the region backs such a decision. Though Mr. Zapatero has ruled out such a move, his government has shown more tolerance of regional separatists than previous administrations.

On Tuesday, the Spanish parliament approved a new relationship between the central government and Catalonia, recognizing it as "a nation." Some observers suggested that the vote encouraged ETA to hope for a similar, or better, deal if it renounces violence. Last year, parliament authorized the government to hold talks with ETA, which is listed as a terrorist organization by the European Union and the United States, on the condition the group laid down its arms.

"If I was in ETA I would be optimistic" about the outcome of expected negotiations, says Florentino Portero, an analyst at the Strategic Studies Group, a think tank in Madrid. "Zapatero is a new generation of politician with a radically new way of conceiving of the state" as a confederation of sovereign regions.

On the streets of the Basque city of Bilbao, some citizens welcomed the news of the cease-fire. "I am very happy this has happened," says Inaki Muniain, a hotel receptionist, by phone. "This gives us hope that things will get better and that ETA will disappear or end up as a political party."

Echoing that optimism, Juan Avilés, expert in terrorism and security at the Universidad Nacional a Distancia "It's good news. It could really be the end of ETA's terrorism. You always have to be cautious when talking about terrorists, but I believe that this declaration could be the end of the nightmare that we've lived for almost 40 years."

Others were more cautious. "I don't believe it at all," scoffs Nestor Diez Seisdedos, a quality-control inspector at an electrical appliance factory in Barakaldo, also reached by phone. "It will last a while but it certainly isn't permanent."

Some analysts shared that skepticism. "ETA will maintain the peace as long as they consider it opportune," says Rafael Badarji, a security analyst with the conservative Foundation for Analysis and Social Studies in Madrid. "When it stops serving their aims they will pick up their weapons again."

Mr. Badarji says that ETA declared a cease-fire because "It believes ... its objectives will be better served politically than through force." After the Al Qaeda attack in Madrid on March 11, 2004, political violence such as ETA had used for decades appeared counterproductive. ETA has not launched any fatal attacks since 2003.

The Spanish police, supported by their French colleagues in the Basque regions across the French border, have also enjoyed considerable success in recent years. They have arrested over 750 ETA members, including top leader Mikel Antza, since 2000.

Wednesday's ETA video, showing three people sitting at a table in front of the ETA flag, their faces covered by masks and all wearing Basque berets, made no mention of any weapons handover. Nor did it offer to end the ETA practice of raising "revolutionary taxes" from Basque businessmen who have long complained of extortion.

The statement demanded that the Spanish and French governments "set aside repression," seen as a bid to persuade them to stop hunting ETA members.

One of the trickiest issues in any negotiations that the government opens with ETA will be the fate of the group's prisoners. ETA is expected to follow the example of other rebel military organizations from Northern Ireland to South Africa in demanding freedom for jailed comrades.

Such a move would doubtless be fiercely resisted by relatives of ETA's hundreds of victims, and by the conservative opposition People's Party. Party leader Mariano Rajoy accused Zapatero of "betraying the dead" when the Prime Minister first offered in 2005 to enter talks with ETA if it laid down its arms.

ETA was formed in 1959 in response to Spanish dictator General Franco's suppression of Basque language and culture. When Franco died in 1975, the Basque Country was granted semi-autonomy. ETA wanted full independence.

· Whom does it target?

In its 40-year history, ETA has killed more than 800 people. Most of its attacks have been bombings or shootings, mainly targeting Spanish government institutions and personnel. The group is labeled as a terrorist organization by the United States and the European Union.

· Has it tried political means?

It has a political wing, Batasuna, but the Spanish government banned Batasuna in 2003. Since that year, ETA has not carried out any deadly attacks. It was originally blamed for the 2004 Madrid bombings, but Al Qaeda was found to be responsible.

Colombian Rebels Face Drug Charges (WT)

By Jerry Seper

Fifty leaders of the leftist Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) have been named in a federal grand jury indictment on charges of exporting more than $25 billion worth of cocaine, half the world's illicit supply, in the largest U.S. drug-trafficking case.

"From their jungle hideaway, the FARC uses the drug trade to bankroll terrorism in Colombia, finance attacks on innocent citizens and poison Americans," said U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) chief Karen P. Tandy. "Today's indictment challenges that lawlessness, and the FARC leadership should prepare to face the justice that they have long denied to so many."

Mrs. Tandy said the indictment "addresses and decimates the entire leadership of the FARC."

The one-count indictment, handed up March 1 in U.S. District Court in Washington and unsealed yesterday, "strikes at the very heart of the FARC narcotics operation," said Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, adding that the terrorist-designated organization collected millions of dollars in cocaine proceeds and used the money to purchase weapons for its 42-year-long war against the Colombian government.

FARC "is one of the Justice Department's highest-priority targets in our fight against illegal drug trafficking," Mr. Gonzales said. "For years, this group has controlled the production and distribution of massive amounts of cocaine that ends up in America's communities. Members of the FARC do not want to face American justice."

Three of the charged FARC leaders -- Jorge Enrique Rodriguez Mendieta, Erminso Cuevas Cabrera and Juan Jose Martinez Vega -- are in custody in Colombia, and the U.S. will seek their extradition to face trial in the United States. More than 400 Colombians have been extradited to the United States to face criminal charges, and two accused FARC leaders are awaiting trial in Washington.

Andres Pastrana, Colombia's ambassador to the U.S., said the indictment was based on evidence gathered by American officials who worked "in very close collaboration with Colombian authorities."

"Colombia is one of the main victims of the global war on drugs. Thousands of innocent citizens, journalists, judges, politicians, soldiers and police officers have given their lives to this cause," said Mr. Pastrana, a former Colombian president who was kidnapped by the Medellin drug cartel during his 1988 race for Bogota mayor and later rescued by police. "Colombia has been and remains deeply committed to defeating the drug trade."

FARC has about 17,000 members and controls wide areas of the country, so rounding up the other 47 indicted leaders will be a difficult task. The State Department announced rewards yesterday of $75 million for information leading to the capture of 24 of the leaders still at large, all members of FARC's governing council.

In addition to half the world's supply of cocaine, FARC was responsible for more than 60 percent of the drug that enters the United States every year, Mrs. Tandy said, adding that the organization controlled every aspect of its production and distribution, even setting the prices paid to Colombian farmers for coca paste, the raw material used to produce cocaine.

According to the indictment, the FARC leaders used terrorism and violence to further their cocaine-trafficking activities, ordering the deaths of Colombian farmers who sold coca paste to non-FARC buyers. It said the farmers who violated FARC rules were shot, stabbed or dismembered alive, their bodies cut open, filled with rocks and sunk in nearby rivers.

The indictment also said the FARC leaders also ordered the kidnap and killing of Americans to discourage the U.S. government from disrupting the organization's cocaine-trafficking activities. It also said the FARC leaders authorized their members to shoot down U.S. fumigation planes and plotted to retaliate against U.S. law-enforcement officers conducting investigations into FARC's narcotics activities.

Three U.S. contractors are among 60 hostages being held by FARC.

The indictment said:

·Rodriguez Mendieta, also known as "Ivan Vargas," was a member of the FARC's leadership council and commander of its 24th Front unit. He is accused of directing the purchase of cocaine paste and transmitting billions of Colombian pesos in cocaine profits to FARC officials, and the indictment said he ordered the slayings of eight farmers, including several whom he personally dismembered alive.

·Cuevas Cabrera, who also was called "Mincho," was a FARC associate who managed cocaine laboratories for the organization's 14th Front unit, where he supervised the production and distribution of hundreds of thousands of kilograms of cocaine. He has been in custody since 2004.

·Martinez Vega, also known as "Chiguiro," was a FARC associate who provided large quantities of arms and ammunition to the organization in exchange for thousands of kilograms of cocaine. He was arrested on drug charges in Venezuela and turned over to Colombian authorities in early 2005.

Why UN Reform Effort Could Fizzle (CSM)

By Howard LaFranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, March 23, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y. - This was to be a year of reform of the United Nations. But what some global leaders have called "the opportunity of a generation" - to better match the preeminent global institution with the challenges of the 21st century - risks crumbling into little more than a dashed hope.

Despite President Bush's challenge to the UN to be "relevant," and even after the weaknesses exposed by the oil-for-food scandal, old tugs of war are slowing momentum at a crucial moment in the UN's calendar.

Already, some countries see reform's principal promoter, Secretary-General Kofi Annan, as a lame duck: A new secretary-general will be elected later this year. A bigger impediment still is that even more countries harbor old suspicions about those pressing for reform - in particular the United States. These countries also feel scalded by so-far unsuccessful attempts to reform the powerful Security Council.

"The reforms on the table really get to the meat of the matter, which is changing an institution envisioned for the post-World War II period to work in a very changed world," says Edward Luck, a UN expert at Columbia University in New York. "The challenge now is that after so much attention to expanding the Security Council, this package sounds like leftovers - when it's really the meat and potatoes of reform."

Hopes for the reforms were buoyed by last week's approval of a new human rights council. It replaces the discredited human rights commission - a change world leaders had demanded last fall. General Assembly President Jan Eliasson says that getting the human rights issue done opens the way to focusing on the big management questions.

But even the human rights reform, which is less bold than some powers including the US had advocated, suggests the difficult road ahead on other issues - especially those that the power-jealous General Assembly of 191 countries considers power grabs by dominant members.

South Africa, for example, is already warning of efforts to bypass the Assembly with reforms that would concentrate more power in the secretariat and Security Council, where developed countries dominate. South Africa leads the "Group of 77" developing countries that holds particular sway in the General Assembly. Proposals focus on management

When Mr. Annan unveiled his overhaul package to the General Assembly earlier this month, he outlined 23 initiatives in six areas that he said focus on urgent management reforms.

Under leadership reform, for example, Annan calls for the job of deputy secretary-general to be expanded and elevated to become something like the general manager of the secretariat. Since the oil-for-food scandal, which cast a black cloud over his management skills, Annan has often noted that the "SG" is expected to be both the world's top diplomat and manager of its largest international institution, an almost superhuman task.

Other proposed reforms include:

· Improving and tightening UN procurement of goods and services.

· Making staff mobility a prerequisite for employment and a condition of promotion.

· Relocating and outsourcing some costly services, such as translation.

· Streamlining the budgetary process and expanding the secretary-general's authority to redeploy posts and funds.

What Annan's recommendations do not include is creation of the post of chief financial officer. That was a key recommendation of the independent inquiry committee, headed by former Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker, that investigated where the oil-for-food program set up for Iraq went wrong. Annan says the need for such a post is "obviated" by other financial oversight reforms he proposes.

Still, Annan's package received at least initial encouraging words from the US. And that is good, reform proponents say, because a UN transformation needs strong support from the world's only superpower.

"This set of reforms identifies the big difference between the UN today and [upon its founding] in 1945, because now it's at least as much a doer as it is a convener" of forums and conferences, says Lee Feinstein, an expert on the UN at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington.

Annan notes that the UN has evolved from an organization mainly holding conferences in New York to one focusing on development and health. Moreover, its $10 billion budget goes overwhelmingly to support more than 80,000 peacekeepers currently deployed around the globe. "This reform could strengthen some of these 'doing' activities," Mr. Feinstein adds, "but the truth is that a lot depends on the US and how much it puts into getting this done." Ambivalence toward the US

Yet many countries are ambivalent about the American role in the institution, especially after the US was perceived to bully its way into a war with Iraq that the UN did not want.

"The context for this debate is the huge asymmetry in power in the world between the US and the rest, and it has the potential to bring everything to a standstill," says Mr. Luck of Columbia. "It's a situation that leaves the US between a rock and a hard place," he adds, "because the world wants the US involved but also accuses it of trying to dominate the UN if it is too supportive or changes are too radical."

Suspicions of the US are not limited to developing countries. Kenneth Roth, executive director of Human Rights Watch, says a lack of US engagement in the reform process leads to speculation that some US officials "want to produce a UN failure to demonstrate that the UN can't reform - and thus should be abandoned."

Islamic Activism Sweeps Saudi Arabia (WP)

By Faiza Saleh Ambah

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

JIDDAH, Saudi Arabia -- More than a dozen women in black cloaks, some with colorful head scarves, others with only their eyes visible through slits in black veils, filed into the dining room after sunset prayers. They sat around a long table set up with paper, pencils and thermoses of Arabic coffee, across from a small group of men, including that evening's guest, Sadeg al-Malki.

The women -- homemakers, physicians and college students -- had sought out Malki, a consultant at the Islamic Education Foundation, because they wanted help on a project they were embarking on: how to talk to non-Muslim co-workers and acquaintances about Islam and the prophet Muhammad.

The women, who have since taken several mini-courses with Malki on discussing their religion with non-Muslims, are part of a loosely knit grass-roots movement that has sprung up across the kingdom since January, when anger over cartoons of Muhammad sparked riots in Europe and several Muslim countries. The movement is made up of a diverse cross section of women, students, businessmen, lawyers and clerics, all campaigning under the banner of Nusrat al-Rasool, or Victory for the Prophet.

The activists' campaign includes a continuing economic boycott of Denmark, where the cartoons were first published, and a project to produce television ads about the prophet for broadcast in Europe. College students are attempting to collect 1 million signatures to present to the Danish Embassy, and lawyers are studying ways to make insulting Islam and its prophet illegal. A number of businessmen have launched competitions with prize money of more than $50,000 for the best essays on Muhammad. This month, several clerics and heads of local committees will travel to neighboring Kuwait and Bahrain to brainstorm with Islamic activists there.

Though in its early stages, the grass-roots movement is a demonstration of how, in this region, activism within a religious context is capable of motivating and energizing a wide swath of society in a way that politics cannot. It is also a study of the ways in which deeply felt religious disputes, when not handled by governments, cut their own path, pushing people to take matters into their hands.

Muhammad Kawther, a young activist who heads Youth Together for an Islamic Renaissance, believes the cartoon controversy was a godsend for his group. The activists were just starting out, putting together their first project -- CDs urging young people to perform their five daily prayers -- when anger over the cartoons erupted. Dropping everything else, they decided on a campaign to collect 1 million signatures in support of the prophet.

Inexperienced and a little apprehensive at first, they approached several malls for permission to set up booths there. Sensing the public mood, mall owners not only agreed but gave them free access and advertising. They also allowed them to bring in chanters to sing the praises of the prophet, the first open public performances in this conservative country.

Three weeks into the campaign, Together had gathered 70,000 signatures, dozens of new supporters and, most valuable of all, a ton of practical experience.

"I learned how to deal with the public, with people of different ages and from different social levels," said Rayan al-Khilewi, who emceed the group's children's competition on facts about the prophet. "I learned how to deal with the media, and I actually did a live television feed."

Khilewi, a 20-year-old marketing student and taekwondo aficionado, had been strolling the mall with his family when he heard something he'd never heard at a shopping center before: Islamic songs being broadcast through a loudspeaker. Drawn by the a cappella chants, Khilewi, a religious Muslim, hurriedly followed the tune, which led him to the group's booth. He joined on the spot.

"For years I had been looking for a way to be active, to do something meaningful, and this was the first time I had found it," he said. "I have Denmark to thank for that."

Many who have become involved in activism since the cartoon crisis have echoed Khilewi's sentiment, saying the cartoons have shown them how much they love the prophet and forced them to do something about it.

Malki, the Islamic Education Authority consultant and also co-founder of the Faith in Diversity Institute, based in Owings Mills, Md., says the cartoons have created a new kind of activism. "People don't just want to talk, they want to do something," Malki said. "No state can stop, or think to stop, this activism. It's widespread, it's strong, and because of the love people feel for the prophet, it's also very emotional."

The two-hour lecture Malki gave in a noisy dining room packed mainly with women was winding down when he told the group he wanted to read them something from the Bible. He picked up his leather-bound King James version, well-thumbed with yellow bits of paper sticking out, leafed through it and started to read from the Book of Isaiah: "And the book is delivered to him that is not learned, saying, read this, I pray thee; and he saith, I am not learned."

There was stunned silence in the room, a palpable astonishment as the listeners understood the passage to foreshadow Muhammad, who was illiterate before he became a prophet. A few whispered, "God is great," and several young men and women wiped tears from their eyes.

Sulaiman al-Buthi, a Riyadh-based spokesman for the International Committee for the Defense of the Final Prophet, says this religious but peaceful activism could put an end to violence and drive groups like al-Qaeda out of business. Analysts have long said that a lack of democracy and civic institutions in the Middle East is part of the appeal of extremist groups, which offer one of the only options for disaffected youth.

But Buthi said he was "very optimistic about this movement, this cartoon intifada. It has given people opportunities to take matters into their own hands and do something positive for their religion. It's generating a very potent feeling, and it's capable of destroying the pull and influence of groups like al-Qaeda."

On the other hand, lawyer and writer Bassem Alem says he believes that the cartoons were only a trigger within the context of an already burgeoning region-wide Islamic resurgence. People "look around and they see Islamists winning in Egypt and Palestine and Morocco," he said, referring to elections in those places. "They feel empowered, and this is just one more manifestation of that."

Alem says that people took matters into their own hands because their governments were not doing enough to assuage their anger. He also contends these ad hoc committees will supplant Western-style civic institutions. "The methodologies for setting up civic institutions here failed because they were a Western model," he said. "These indigenous movements will take root because they are based on our beliefs and real needs."

Kawther, back at his father's office, which serves as Together's headquarters, was more reflective. "Islam has gone through many phases, up and down," said the stocky young man with a dark patch on his forehead that comes from regular prayers. "For it to be strong again, for a new Islamic renaissance, the youth have to be involved, and that's why we're doing this."

At the Seirafi mega-mall, where Together had set up signing booths and several computers and helped passersby send more than 5,000 e-mails to Denmark, two 12-year-old boys were handing out brochures that explained the campaign and urged people to follow the example of the prophet by becoming more devout. One of the group's members, law student Abdul-Ilah Bawazir, picked up the microphone to address the hundreds of shoppers, men to one side, veiled women to the other, who had stopped to watch that evening's performance of the Heraa group of Islamic chanters.

"We are all here for one reason," he said to the crowd. "To show solidarity with the prophet. Now that you've enjoyed the show, please take a minute and sign your name in support of the finest of messengers, prophet Muhammad. We want the world to know how much we love our prophet and how much we're willing to sacrifice for him."

Egypt's Opposition Targets Reforms (CSM)

By Sarah Gauch

The Christian Science Monitor, March 23, 2006

CAIRO - During heated parliamentary debates last week on the government's annual policy statement, Hussein Ibrahim, a parliamentarian for the fundamentalist Muslim Brotherhood party, lashed out with an impassioned plea for reform.

"It does not bode well for political life, especially when it comes to advancing freedom of expression, of movement, and freedom to join parties," he said.

He continued to castigate the government's human rights record, pointing to international reports that detail "horror stories about torture in police stations, cases in which prisoners have disappeared from jails and innocent citizens have been forced to admit to crimes they didn't commit."

Mr. Ibrahim is deputy head of an 88-person bloc of Muslim Brotherhood members elected to parliament in elections last November. The largest opposition bloc in this 454-seat parliament since the monarchy's 1952 overthrow, the Brotherhood has put political reform and fighting government corruption on the top of their agenda.

With fundamentalist Islamic movements across the Middle East gaining political influence, including the Iraqi Shiites, Lebanese Hizbullah, and Palestinian Hamas, the spotlight is on the Muslim Brotherhood to see how this group adapts religion to their democratic ambitions.

As an outlawed group, the Brotherhood ran as independents in last fall's elections, campaigning under the slogan "Islam is the Solution." But the Brotherhood's parliamentary activities seem to have gotten under the government's skin in recent weeks. Police have arrested about two dozen members in what the Brotherhood and analysts say is an effort to remind this group who is boss, despite its large parliamentary bloc.

The arrests are also part of a general government backtracking on political reforms. Last year's parliamentary elections were marred by widespread violence, largely instigated by police and government supporters. The government also recently postponed local council elections for two years, to avoid another Muslim Brotherhood election victory, many believe.

Although the Brotherhood is still a minority in a parliament with overwhelming state party control, they are proving to be a strong, outspoken, and unified force, analysts say.

"Already they are making a difference in parliament," says Diaa Rashwan, senior researcher at the Al Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies. "For the first time in years, the [ruling] National Democratic Party is feeling that it is not alone and that there's this dedicated, unified 20-percent bloc in the opposition."

Since the Brotherhood's surprise victory, many have questioned what role this group would play and what difference it could make in a parliament with an overwhelming ruling party majority. Observers also wondered to what extent the Brotherhood's Islamic agenda, which calls for strict application of Islamic law, would take a back seat to more recent calls for political reform.

So far, the speeches and activities of Brotherhood parliamentarians emphasize political reform. Their agenda includes demands widely backed by democratic activists: changing legislation that allows journalists to face prison sentences for libel, granting independence to Egypt's judges, and canceling a 25-year-old emergency law that forbids gatherings of more than five people.

"We need economic reform and development, in education and health, but we can't realize this until we have political reform," says Mohamed el-Katatny, the head of the Muslim Brotherhood's parliamentary bloc. The government, meanwhile, emphasizes economic reform with slower-paced political reform.

Not everyone, however, is convinced of the Brotherhood's commitment to democratic change.

"There is a problem of trust when they speak about democracy," says Mahmoud Abaza, chairman of the opposition Wafd's parliamentary bloc. "For 15 years their credo was application of Islamic law. Just in the last two to three years they joined the demand for democracy."

Muslim Brotherhood members, however, argue that Islam encompasses political change. "There is no contradiction between political reform and Islam," says Brotherhood MP Ibrahim. "Human rights come from Islam. Fighting corruption comes from Islam. All these issues stem from Islam."

Some government officials and analysts also complain that the Brotherhood lacks a concrete political program. "The Muslim Brotherhood did not come up with a position on privatization or subsidies or education or health, on any of the major challenges facing this country, compared to this government, which is committed to a program," said Egyptian Prime Minister Ahmed Nazif, speaking to a group of businesspeople in Cairo last Monday.

The Muslim Brotherhood may have its critics, but still the group has come a long way since its beginnings in 1928, eventually giving rise to dozens of extremist Islamic groups, including Hamas and Al Qaeda. In 1954, the Brotherhood was banned after a string of violent attacks,

The ruling National Democratic Party (NDP), however, still maintains a two-thirds majority, giving it alone the right to pass legislation and change the Constitution. Nevertheless, the Brotherhood, together with the also outspoken secular opposition with 12 seats, can still use the parliament as a forum for their opinions.

In any case the Brotherhood says these arrests merely empower them. "We are used to being arrested," says MP Hassan Hamdy Aly. "This won't stop us. It just makes us stronger."

Where Even Grisly News Can Offer A Kind Of Comfort (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, March 19 — As a military band played a dirge, the coffins that flowed out of Beirut's central military hospital on Saturday morning put some lingering questions to rest, but raised many others.

Inside them lay the skeletons of Lebanon's civil war: the remains of men who had disappeared, only to be uncovered last November in a mass grave on the grounds of the Defense Ministry headquarters, a discovery that confirmed persistent rumors.

The bodies, identified by DNA tests, were handed over to the men's families on Saturday, concluding a wrenching 15-year search for their whereabouts.

For a handful of women like Saide Khawand, Audett Salem and Samia Abdullah, the ceremony was a bittersweet victory, but still not an end to their own search.

They and others like them, the families of more than 600 young men and women who disappeared during and after the war, have held a vigil in a park downtown for almost a year, demanding that the government investigate their cases. To many of them, the ceremony on Saturday was a signal that a door might be opening on one of the darkest chapters of the bloody civil war.

"This was just the tip of the iceberg," said Ghazi Aad, an organizer and director for Support of Lebanese in Detention and Exile, a group known as Solide that is leading the campaign to publicize the issue. "We have documented several mass graves in Lebanon."

In a nation struggling to forget the war among its many religious groups, the Palestinians and regional powers, a war that claimed tens of thousands of lives from 1975 to 1990 and demolished half this city, the women are a reminder of how much remains unresolved.

Last April, shortly before Syria withdrew its soldiers from Lebanon under international pressure, the women pitched a tent in Jibran Khalil Jibran Park near the United Nations offices here, hoping to remind Lebanese and the international community of their plight. These unlikely activists now sit daily in the tent, which is outfitted with beds, a television and a refrigerator, and take turns camping overnight. On any given day, they can be seen playing bridge, preparing meals and finding consolation.

"We've been asking and chasing and kissing hands, but got nothing," Mrs. Khawand said. She has been searching for her brother since he was taken by Syrian security agents in 1992. "We are just asking them to bring him to us, in any condition, just bring him to us."

Most of them are homemakers, many from middle-class families, and represent a cross section of Lebanon's many sects.

Mrs. Khawand last saw her brother, a member of the mostly Maronite Christian Phalangist Party, as he left his house, when he was surrounded by men she believed were Syrian security guards. Mrs. Salem lost both her son, Richard, and daughter, Christine, as they were coming back from the Hamra shopping district one day in 1985; she believes they were kidnapped in an attempt to force the family out of its Beirut apartment. Ms. Abdullah has continued the search for her brother Emad, a member of the Palestine Liberation Organization, who was taken hostage on the way back from a wedding in 1984.

Hope comes in ways small and large for these women, whose faces only hint at the years of pain and despair. Every now and then, they may receive word from released detainees who have seen their relatives in prison.

In 2003, Ms. Abdullah received what she believes was a letter from her brother, written with a matchstick, telling her he was sick. And over the years, some of the women say, they have been able to squeeze details out of officials who would occasionally confirm whether their relatives were alive, but that was all.

The subject of prisoners is a touchy one in a country where some politicians who now speak of democracy were warlords decades ago, with militias that kidnapped people for money or political gain. Many of the prisoners ended up in Syrian custody, the women contend, while others landed in makeshift militia prisons and were never seen again.

"We have thousands of Lebanese who disappeared during the war, many of them at the hands of the militias, and today many of their warlords are in government," said Mr. Aad, the organizer at Solide. "So they don't want to discuss the issue. They have swept the dirt under the rug, but it's still there. And that's why this is something of a Pandora's box."

Of the 10 bodies buried on Saturday, seven were Lebanese Army soldiers led by Gen. Michel Aoun, who fought the last battle of the civil war in 1990 against the Syrian forces that controlled the country until last year. Another 10 bodies found in the mass grave have yet to be identified. Many parents of missing soldiers have given samples for DNA checks in recent weeks, but only reluctantly, possibly fearing what they might learn.

In December, authorities uncovered another mass grave on the grounds of the former Syrian security headquarters in Anjar, where some 28 bodies were found but have yet to be identified. Mr. Aad believes there are numerous other burial sites scattered around the country, left by either Syrian forces, Lebanese militias or Palestinian fighters.

Acting Interior Minister Ahmad Fatfat said the ceremonial burial of the exhumed bodies was "an important signal to the Lebanese people" and "underscores a desire for reconciliation." He added that DNA tests were continuing and that efforts were under way to uncover other such graves. "When the truth comes out, it's far better than denying the reality."

But as the mothers stood in the front row of the funeral procession on Saturday, some seemed to grapple with the likelihood that their own children might be dead too.

"They gave their children the dignity they deserved," Ms. Abdullah said. "And now we want the same for ours."

In 50-Yard Square In Belarus, A Country Within (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

MINSK, Belarus, March 22 — By midnight, as the temperature dropped ever lower and morning twilight was still five hours off, the core of Belarus's public opposition assumed its shape in the darkness.

It was about 300 people, arms interlocked and forming a small, dense square, stomping on the frozen ground under a police cadre's contemptuous gaze. Behind them, inside their human box, another group of demonstrators held their banned flags overhead, a thicket of banners over 20 small tents. At any moment, the demonstrators said, they expected the police to rush forward, beat them with clubs and drag them off to the detention cells. And then their protest would end in blood.

All of them said they were ready. "They may attack and beat us and inflict great trauma," said Stepan Svidersky, 18, a student. "But we have already achieved a result: We have shown our country that we are not afraid to stand against arbitrary rule."

Since a rigged presidential election on March 19, the capital of Belarus has seen a protest like none in 12 years of President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko's autocratic grip. For four consecutive days, protesters have defied warnings of arrest and bloodshed and stood in a corner of October Square to demand a new race.

Their numbers rise to several thousand each evening, as they form a rally and impromptu dance party on the edge of an ice rink, and then dwindle, hour by hour, until midnight, when this core stands through the night, in two lines, to hold the place for the next day.

It is a frigid, risky vigil, given the Belarussian weather and the government's history of reflexive brutality against those who dare to stand and call for better lives than Mr. Lukashenko's island of Soviet nostalgia and corruption has been able, or willing, to provide.

Mostly they are young men in their 20's. A few look too young to shave. But since Tuesday night, when the opposition's leaders began to disagree about how best to proceed in their effort to unseat a president they do not recognize, this all-night core has become an independent force in a quixotic struggle.

Their influence emerged when one of Mr. Lukashenko's two principal challengers, Aleksandr V. Kazulin, urged the protesters to disband Tuesday night and save themselves before the police crackdown.

"There is no sense in keeping them on the square," Mr. Kazulin said. "We should think about our children, protect them, and not keep them in front of us."

The protesters refused to go. And they rejected the label of "children," applied to them by Mr. Kazulin, as well as by Mr. Lukashenko, as they crowded together in the plummeting cold. They formed their two lines, one facing out of the camp, to warn of any advance by the police, the other facing inward, to keep an eye on the behavior of the demonstrators, ensuring that no provocateurs had slipped inside.

After midnight, they occupied a portion of Belarus, a country of 10 million people the size of Kansas, that was no larger than a 50-yard square.

It was a country within. They danced on its cold stone. They handed out tea. They said they would not give it up.

"We consider this camp to be the only means to defend our position," Vitaly Korotysh, 22, one of the coordinators of the rally, said at 3:30 a.m. "If necessary it will stand for years. And if they break it up, I think on the next day the people will be back."

It is too soon to know whether this is foolishness or resolve.

But their position has been supported by Aleksandr Milinkevich, the second-place finisher in the election, with 6 percent of the vote, far behind the incumbent's 82.6 percent, which the protesters see as a cynical fraud.

Mr. Milinkevich has said he will be with the demonstrators until the end, whatever shape events may take. It all could end with a dwindling of interest, he said, or in state violence. But inevitably, he said, the feelings here will grow.

"We live in a country of total fear, and very few people are brave enough to come out like this," he said, standing in front of the ranks at 4 a.m., as the temperature dropped to 10 degrees. "This action destroys fear inside the country because it tells people it is possible to fight for your own destiny."

The protesters see little chance of changes in government anytime soon. To the extent that this is a revolution, Mr. Milinkevich often says, it is a revolution not on the streets but in the mind.

In many ways the students are following in the footsteps of the people's movement that overturned a rigged presidential vote in Ukraine in 2004. How widely the feeling is spreading is unclear, but they have left their camp and posted rallying cries on the Internet. They have sent text messages by mobile phones to their friends. And they venture away a few hours a day — risking arrest when alone or in small groups away from the foreign photographers and news crews here — urging others to join them.

They hope for a large rally on Saturday, a day of celebration of a short-lived Republic of Belarus in 1918 that the government does not recognize and that Mr. Lukashenko despises. Since this year's celebration happens to fall on a Saturday, potential opposition supporters will not be at work.

But their efforts have been squelched so far by the arrests of protesters leaving the square and by state television coverage that has portrayed them as homosexual, drunk and, in the words of one riot police commander, "pathetic."

But ultimately, Mr. Milinkevich said, a message exists here that cannot be missed by Mr. Lukashenko and his security apparatus, which retains the name K.G.B. "We are not cattle anymore," he said.

That sentiment was repeatedly expressed in the darkness, as demonstrators made clear it was not merely the election they protested, but the entire form of government Mr. Lukashenko has built.

They attacked the government's arbitrary detentions and its smothering of political and economic freedoms, including the freedoms of assembly and speech. And they condemned the paired inefficiency and corruption that they said were at the center of the administration. Although some Western countries, including the United States, have aided opposition groups here with training, financing and political support, the demonstrators on the square speak of an organic anger, fueled by the injustice and inequities within Belarus.

"Those who have a higher education understand that Lukashenko is a commodity profiteer," said Maxim Grechkoyedov, 25, an engineer who said that the government accepted natural gas from Moscow at below-market prices, part of Russia's subsidy of the Belarussian state, and then sold a portion at market prices, keeping the difference for the president and the elite.

Mr. Grechkoyedov said the protesters were here because they were part of Belarus's "lost generation," those who have attended universities since the Soviet Union's disintegration, and have languished in low-paying jobs and under repression for their adult lives.

Many have had enough, he said; Europe is not supposed to be like this.

An opposition has been born. It is small, but one sign of its early resolve is that almost everyone who stands until dawn not only gives his or her last name for publication, but also insists that it be written down, knowing then that the authorities will see who they are.

"I am tired of the lies," said Aleksandr Zhukov, 21, a student. "I am no longer afraid."

He stood in the darkness, shifting his weight from one cold foot to the other, waiting for whatever comes next.

German Leader Nears The End Of Her Political Honeymoon (NYT)

By Richard Bernstein

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

BERLIN, March 22 — Call her the emerging star of European politics, but also ask: Will Germany let it last?

With personal approval ratings of about 75 percent at home and expressions of admiration from places as far apart as Washington and Moscow, Chancellor Angela Merkel has clearly made an extremely good impression in the four months since she took office.

Her ratings are especially impressive given that she ran such a lackluster campaign last year that she almost lost a national election she had been expected to win by a large margin. This inauspicious beginning forced her into a coalition with the Social Democrats, the main left-of-center rival of her Christian Democrats.

But Mrs. Merkel, the first woman to serve as chancellor, has used her first months to project an image of good sense and quiet competence, and the mood in Germany is probably better than it has been in several years. Consumer confidence is up, and the conspicuous gloom that afflicted the last months of Ms. Merkel's predecessor, Gerhard Schröder, has been lifting.

Yet there is a strong feeling that Mrs. Merkel's popularity is not so much because she is showing strength and determination as Germany's leader, but rather because of her decision to advance very little in the way of a bold domestic agenda. That may be about to change.

Three German states have elections on Sunday, after which Mrs. Merkel is expected to start her campaign to win major changes, tackling such chronic problems as high unemployment, economic stagnation and government deficits that exceed norms set for Germany's membership in the European Currency Union. That is when the political storm will stir.

"She has done a good job insofar as she hasn't made any mistakes," said Uwe Andersen, a political science professor at Ruhr University in Bochum. "But we'll have to see how she does on the really big reforms after the state elections before we can judge if she is doing well in a positive sense, rather than just not making mistakes."

So far Mrs. Merkel seems to have chosen to make her mark as a sort of super foreign minister, not as a domestic policy chieftain — and in Germany, the foreign minister has always been popular.

"Merkel still acts as if other people are responsible for the country's problems," the weekly magazine Der Spiegel wrote a few days ago. "She still hasn't started to govern," the magazine continued, echoing an opinion widely voiced here.

Reinhard Schlinkert, the chairman of the Institute for Market and Policy Research, citing poll numbers from late February, said, "About two-thirds of Germans say she won't be able to manage unemployment, and two-thirds say she won't manage the country's financial problems. It's a very insecure situation.

"Everybody hopes that the new coalition will do better for Germany, but the people have heard so many times that things will change that now they're sitting back and waiting for results."

Governing in a coalition with her formal rivals, the Social Democrats, is far from what Mrs. Merkel wanted when she campaigned for office last year. But the existence of the coalition and the paramount goal of keeping it strong and stable has protected her, at least in these early stages, from Germany's normal political squabbling.

For one thing, Mrs. Merkel herself, bound by the compromise formulas of her coalition, could not have pressed a maximalist program for change even if she had wanted to. At the same time the Social Democrats, who would lose major parts of their labor union constituency if they supported maximalist changes, have been reluctant to criticize her, lest political infighting weaken the coalition.

All that has given Mrs. Merkel a strong start, one that contrasts with the weakness of her counterparts in other European capitals.

The French are in an uproar, and President Jacques Chirac, in office for 11 years, is seen as a lame duck. The Italians' buccaneering prime minister, Silvio Berlusconi, after five stormy years, is behind in the polls two and a half weeks before national elections. In Britain, Prime Minister Tony Blair has been beset by a long series of political battles and demands for him to cede his office to his colleague and rival in the Labor Party, Gordon Brown.

Ahead of the state elections on Sunday, polls indicate that Mrs. Merkel's Christian Democrats will win two of them. In the third state, Rhineland-Palatinate, Mrs. Merkel is probably hoping to lose to Social Democrats, so they will not be tempted to rebel against their role in the national coalition.

To start addressing perennial German economic problems, Mrs. Merkel will have to turn away from her concentration on foreign policy. In her first months in office, she spent a lot of time announcing herself to foreign partners, visiting Warsaw, Washington, Paris, London, Jerusalem and Moscow.

In addition, only a few weeks after she took office, she played a central role in breaking an acrimonious stalemate over the budget of the European Union, which enhanced her standing at home as a figure to be contended with on the European scene.

As the former Social Democratic Defense Minister Peter Struck said, referring to Mrs. Merkel's return from diplomatic triumph to face domestic reality, "The red carpet time for Mrs. Merkel is over."

Britain Upholds School Ban On A Muslim Gown (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

LONDON, March 22 — Britain's highest court ruled Wednesday that a secondary school was within its rights to bar a female student from wearing a jilbab, a loose, ankle-length gown, instead of the regular school uniform.

Overturning a lower court ruling in favor of the student, Shabina Begum, a five-judge panel in the House of Lords pointed out that the school, Denbigh High School in Luton, had already taken great care to make its uniform acceptable to its students, 79 percent of whom are Muslim.

"The school was entitled to consider that the rules about uniform were necessary for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others," one of the judges, Lord Hoffmann, said in his written opinion.

The issue of what sort of religious dress, if any, is appropriate in state-run schools has become increasingly divisive in Europe, where the wishes of Muslim populations are often at odds with the rules set down by secular governments. In France, the hijab, the head scarf worn by many Muslim girls and women, and other "conspicuous" religious symbols are banned from schools.

In 2005, the European Court of Human Rights ruled that a university in Turkey was within its rights to ban head scarves, saying that it was justified in avoiding giving preference to any one religion.

By such standards, the British policy is comparatively liberal. Girls at Denbigh, for instance, have a wide choice of uniform — a skirt, pants or the shalwar kameez, a flowing pants-and-tunic combination considered acceptable by many Muslims — and they can also wear head scarves. Three nearby schools allow students to wear the jilbab.

But Denbigh, a coeducational school with 1,000 students, had argued that permitting Ms. Begum, now 17, to wear the jilbab could prove divisive, possibly leading to arguments among students about whether it represented a more devout adherence to Islam. In addition, the school said, the jilbab is too constricting and would pose safety risks.

Tahir Alam, the education spokesman for the Muslim Council of Britain, a lobbying group, told Bloomberg News that the safety argument was "an excuse, really."

"You have to ask yourself," he said, "how many people have fallen over and died because they tripped on their jilbab."

In their unanimous ruling, the judges said Denbigh had "taken immense pains to devise a uniform policy that respected Muslim beliefs," laying down rules that "were as far from being mindless as uniform rules could ever be" and that were apparently "acceptable to mainstream Muslim opinion."

Ms. Begum sued the school in 2002 after it insisted that she wear the required uniform, which, she told the BBC on Wednesday, she believed "did not satisfy Islamic clothing." Represented by Cherie Booth, a human rights lawyer and the wife of Prime Minister Tony Blair, she argued that the school had denied her the right to practice her religion.

Speaking of the jilbab, which covers the entire body except for the hands and face, she told the BBC, "I feel that it is an obligation upon Muslim women to wear this, although there are other opinions."

Ms. Begum said she was "saddened and disappointed" by the ruling. "I still don't see why I was told to go home from school when I was just practicing my religion," she said.

As a result of Denbigh's policy, Ms. Begum spent two years out of school. She now attends another school where the jilbab is permitted.

A spokesman for the Department of Education said it welcomed the ruling as reinforcement of its view that schools should be allowed to set their own uniform policies.

Cuba On The West Bank (NYT)

By Gideon Lichfield

Jerusalem

FOR two months, the world has dithered over how to get a Palestinian authority run by Hamas to recognize Israel and renounce violence, and over how much aid and official contact to maintain until it does. The diplomats' refrain was that once Hamas appointed a cabinet, things would be clearer.

Last weekend, Hamas did name a cabinet. But knowing who has which job has not made things clearer, nor will the Israeli election on March 28. The dispute runs too deep.

American and European bans on aiding or communicating with terrorist organizations, if followed strictly, can stop a lot of money from reaching the Palestinians. But there are creative ways around such restrictions. You can relabel some budget support and development assistance "essential humanitarian aid," send it through third parties like the United Nations or World Bank, or pay it directly to contractors and service providers.

In conversations with officials from various countries, two positions, crudely speaking, emerge. The first, predictably more common among American and Israeli policy makers, says that outside powers should strangle Hamas so that it either moderates or dies. The other, which finds more favor with Europeans, says to keep as much aid flowing as possible, perhaps with incentives for good behavior and sanctions for bad.

Sound familiar? It should. The same debate has been raging for decades about another small, impoverished and controversial place: Cuba. The United States doggedly insists that Fidel Castro's repressive regime must be boycotted to make it collapse. Europeans and Canadians prefer encouraging gradual change through "constructive engagement."

The result is that an unrepentant Mr. Castro is enjoying his 48th year in power, using the American boycott as a political prop and the rest of the world as an economic prop. Talk to Cubans and two things soon become clear: the main reason any of them support Mr. Castro is for his heroic stand against the Yanqui bully, and the main reason Cubans don't starve is that tourists and foreign joint-venture businesses pump money into the economy.

Something similar could happen with Hamas. A poll out this week found that 75 percent of Palestinians want Hamas to "engage Israel in peace negotiations." But even the most moderate will rally to defend their democratically elected government if they see countries that profess to love democracy trying to destabilize it. That will reduce domestic pressure on Hamas to pursue peace. And if aid from elsewhere meanwhile props up the Palestinian Authority, Hamas can carry on this way indefinitely, playing countries off against one another.

Is either approach to Hamas the right one? The first looks like a very long shot. Even if all the financial taps were closed, Hamas's popular support might drain away only slowly, and probably toward even more radical extremists, turning Palestinian areas into something more like Iraq. And because Hamas can call on the Muslim world for help, closing all the taps is well-nigh impossible. Any boycott will therefore probably lead to a Cuba-like situation.

An argument for keeping the aid going is that only a stable and strong authority can impose order on the fractious Palestinian clans and militant groups, and such order is essential to fulfilling the Palestinian side of any peace deal. Hamas has given more hints of its willingness to moderate its positions in the past month than Mr. Castro usually gives in a decade. Last week, Ismail Haniya, the authority's prime minister-designate, said that Hamas could hold talks on a Palestinian state confined to the pre-1967 borders if Israel first committed to those borders.

That, however, is not enough of a guarantee for Israel. If Hamas in fact harbors long-term plans to destroy the Jewish state, as some fear, then such statements are ploys to give it time to build up its strength. In that case, unrestricted foreign aid will make it more dangerous.

There is only way to find out whether and how Hamas can change. Outside powers should design a policy that combines carrots and sticks, offering both Hamas and Israel incentives to move gradually in the right direction, but preserving some safeguards in case they fail to do so.

That is easy to say and extremely hard to do. But the main point is that whatever the world does about Hamas, it needs to do it in unison — or face indefinite deadlock, as with Cuba.

Hobbes In Sudan (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0020481

At places like Davos and Harvard, the world's sages rarely stop fretting about the dangers of a too powerful America. Well, if you want to know what the world looks like without U.S. leadership, Exhibit A is Darfur in Sudan.

Today's leading authority on Darfur is the political philosopher Thomas Hobbes, who prophesied a world "nasty, brutish and short." At least 200,000 civilians have been killed in the past three years and two million more have become refugees. The source of the problem is the Arab rulers in Khartoum, who have pursued an ethnic cleansing campaign against black Muslims in western Sudan. They've equipped the Janjaweed Arab tribesmen to do the dirty work, and that militia is now attacking civilians across the border in Chad, creating 20,000 more refugees.

To his credit, Kofi Annan started shouting about the problem two years ago, and former Secretary of State Colin Powell labeled it "genocide" not long after that. The U.N.'s mighty peace-making machinery then started to roll and . . . nothing. The Chinese (who have close commercial ties to Khartoum) and Russians have blocked any serious intervention. Arab members of the Security Council have also opposed any attempt to single out Khartoum.

The Arab League -- so quick to denounce Danish cartoons -- has also stymied any global intervention to stop the murder of their fellow Muslims. Here's League Secretary General Amr Musa earlier this month: "In Sudan, there is a problem related to Darfur. We will listen to the Sudanese state minister to explain to us the developments in the issue of Darfur . . ." The League plans to hold its meeting next week -- in Khartoum.

The African Union has at least sent 7,000 troops to the region, but they are under-funded and under-equipped to enforce a truce that Sudan blatantly flouts. But the African failure is also political. In January the Union held its own summit in Khartoum, and next year it plans to award Sudan its presidency. The rule seems to be never to say a discouraging word about other African leaders, no matter how murderous.

As for Europe, France would be ideal to lead an intervention force. The French have military bases in neighboring Chad and could establish a no-fly zone to stop Janjaweed bombing. However, Paris is already occupied with another intervention in the Ivory Coast, and with its own business interests in Sudan isn't volunteering in any case.

Amid this global abdication, Mr. Annan finally decided last month to call in the American cavalry. He visited the White House and, with media fanfare, all but begged President Bush to do something. Despite U.S. obligations in Afghanistan, Iraq and many other places, Mr. Bush responded by proposing an expanded U.N. peacekeeping force under "NATO stewardship."

But Sudan President Omar al-Beshir quickly played to type and withdrew support for a U.N. force. He also threatened that "Darfur will become the graveyard for the United Nations and foreign intervention." And rather than stand up to such threats, U.N. envoy to Sudan Jan Pronk has wilted. He's now talking up intelligence about al Qaeda terrorists in Khartoum who could retaliate against U.N. peacekeepers. And he's warning against any NATO intervention without Security Council approval -- as if that would be forthcoming. All of this is a repeat of the same feckless U.N. pattern we've seen in Bosnia, Kosovo and Iraq.

So that leaves . . . guess who? The cowboy President, the American unilateralists, the Yankee imperialists -- or, to put it another way, the only nation with the will and wallet to provide order in an otherwise Hobbesian world. However, that will and wallet are being stretched today in Iraq and elsewhere, and Mr. Bush is rightly wary of committing more American blood and treasure to a conflict in Sudan that the rest of the world doesn't seem serious about ending in any event. One lesson of Darfur is that there really are limits to American power, and in its absence the world's savages have freer reign.

From Today's Morning Headlines

In Town Hall Meeting, President Bush Discusses The Importance Of The Mission In Iraq. "President Bush took his campaign to convince Americans that the United States is winning the war in Iraq to a former country music concert hall here on Wednesday and declared to applause, 'If I didn't think we'd succeed, I'd pull our troops out.' <http://www.nytimes.com/2006/03/23/international/middleeast/23prexy.html ?_r=1&pagewanted=print&oref=slogin> Mr. Bush also said he was continuing to press the Iraqis to form a unity government. ... 'I spoke to our ambassador today, and General Casey, via videoconferencing, and we talked about the need to make it clear to the Iraqis: it's time, it's time to get a government in place that can start leading this nation and listening to the will of the people,' Mr. Bush told the crowd." (Elisabeth Bumiller, "Bush Pressing The Iraqis To Build A Governing Coalition Quickly," The New York Times, 3/23/06)

Dan Bartlett Addresses Political Progress In Iraq. BARTLETT: "[W]e are making it very clear here to all factions of the political leadership in Iraq that it's critically important that they come together, form a national unity government to gain the confidence of the Iraqi people.
The Iraqi people have made very clear that their intentions are for a free democratic Iraq. In three different elections last year, they made that crystal clear to the Iraqi leadership. At the same time though David, we do have to put this into proper context. Iraq for the first time in more than 30 years is dealing with things that here in America we take for granted - the very habits of democracy. So on the one hand, we can understand why it's taking them some time. But on the other hand, it's critically important that they move quickly. Because what the enemy is trying to do David, is to sow sectarian violence to try to lose confidence in the Iraqi leadership by these continued horrific acts of violence. It's critically important that we push the Iraqi leadership as quickly as possible. But we also want them to make the right decisions. So it's a delicate balancing act." (NBC's "Today Show," 3/23/06)

From Today's Morning Headlines

In Town Hall Meeting, President Bush Discusses The Importance Of The Mission In Iraq. "President Bush took his campaign to convince Americans that the United States is winning the war in Iraq to a former country music concert hall here on Wednesday and declared to applause, 'If I didn't think we'd succeed, I'd pull our troops out.' Mr. Bush also said he was continuing to press the Iraqis to form a unity government. … 'I spoke to our ambassador today, and General Casey, via videoconferencing, and we talked about the need to make it clear to the Iraqis: it's time, it's time to get a government in place that can start leading this nation and listening to the will of the people,' Mr. Bush told the crowd." (Elisabeth Bumiller, "Bush Pressing The Iraqis To Build A Governing Coalition Quickly," The New York Times, 3/23/06)

Dan Bartlett Addresses Political Progress In Iraq. BARTLETT: "[W]e are making it very clear here to all factions of the political leadership in Iraq that it's critically important that they come together, form a national unity government to gain the confidence of the Iraqi people. The Iraqi people have made very clear that their intentions are for a free democratic Iraq. In three different elections last year, they made that crystal clear to the Iraqi leadership. At the same time though David, we do have to put this into proper context. Iraq for the first time in more than 30 years is dealing with things that here in America we take for granted – the very habits of democracy. So on the one hand, we can understand why it's taking them some time. But on the other hand, it's critically important that they move quickly. Because what the enemy is trying to do David, is to sow sectarian violence to try to lose confidence in the Iraqi leadership by these continued horrific acts of violence. It's critically important that we push the Iraqi leadership as quickly as possible. But we also want them to make the right decisions. So it's a delicate balancing act." (NBC's "Today Show," 3/23/06)

Coalition Forces Free Peace Activists. "A coalition force on Thursday freed three Christian peace activists taken hostage in Iraq, ending a four-month hostage drama in which an American among the group was shot to death and dumped on a Baghdad street. The Iraqi Interior Ministry said the captives were rescued in the joint

U.S.-British operation in rural area northwest of Baghdad, between the towns of Mishahda, 20 miles north of Baghdad, and the western suburb of Abu Ghraib, 12 miles from downtown." (Bassem Mroue, "3 Western Peace Activists Freed In Iraq," The Associated Press, 3/23/06)

The Boston Globe's* Jeff Jacoby Writes About An Iraq Without U.S. Intervention. "The United States may not be able to stop every homicidal fascist on the planet, but that is hardly an argument for stopping none of them. If the Bush administration had listened to Kennedy and to the millions like him the world over who raised their voices against invading Iraq, would the world be a better place today? Leaving Saddam and the Ba'athists in power free to break and butcher their victims, to support international terrorists, to menace other countries would have emboldened murderous dictators everywhere." (Jeff Jacoby, Op-Ed, "The Humanitarian Case For War In Iraq," The Boston Globe, 3/22/06)

Dow Jones Industrial Average Hits Five-Year High. "Stocks rose Wednesday on upbeat news from big companies: a patent settlement by Bristol-Myers Squibb, strong earnings from Morgan Stanley and a cost-cutting deal between General Motors Corp., Delphi Corp. and the United Auto Workers. The gains were enough to push the Dow Jones industrial average to a new five-year high. ... The Dow rose 81.96, or 0.73 percent, to 11,317.43, its highest level since May 21, 2001, when it reached 11,337.92." (Ellen Simon, "Dow Climbs To Finish At New 5-Year High," The Associated Press, 3/22/06)

Secretary Snow Estimates Wage Growth Will Accelerate. "Treasury Secretary John Snow predicted Wednesday that U.S. wage growth would accelerate in coming months, as he tried to combat negative consumer attitudes about the economy and White House policies. In a meeting with reporters, Snow said that as labor markets tighten – with the unemployment rate falling to 4.8% in February from 6.3% in mid-2003 – companies will boost compensation. 'Can (average Americans) expect to have more money in their pockets going forward? I think the answer is unequivocally, "yes,"' Snow said." (Sue Kirchhoff, "Treasury Secretary Expects Wage Growth To Increase," USA Today, 3/23/06)

Rep. Paul Ryan (R-WI) Says Line-Item Veto Authority Would Reduce Wasteful Spending. "U.S. taxpayers deserve to have Congress justify how it spends their money. This is the simple idea behind giving the president a modified, constitutional version of the line-item veto. By shining the light of day on budgeting in Washington and holding members of Congress accountable for spending they insert into legislation, we can reduce wasteful pork-barrel spending." (Rep. Paul Ryan, Op-Ed, "Line-Item Veto Can Cut Pork," USA Today, 3/22/06)

Impact of Detainee Act Debated in Court; Panel to Decide Whether It Has Jurisdiction Over Bids for Freedom

By Josh White
Washington Post Staff Writer

Bush administration lawyers argued yesterday that a new law forces the dismissal of more than 200 lawsuits filed in federal courts on behalf of detainees held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, urging a federal appellate court to instead adopt a far more limited process that still would give the prisoners access to judicial review.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit will decide whether the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 retroactively stripped the court of jurisdiction to hear habeas corpus cases challenging detentions at the military prison in Cuba. Lawyers representing the detainees argued that the new law does not apply to pending cases, while the government has maintained that all cases essentially should be wiped away.

The Detainee Treatment Act was designed to pull what some senators believe are frivolous cases out of U.S. courts and instead grant detainees two other options: access to the federal appeals court to challenge the military determination that they are "enemy combatants" and the right to appeal verdicts reached in future military trials.

The three-judge appellate panel questioned government lawyers about the authority the court actually would have in its limited review role. Judge Judith W. Rogers asked whether the court would have the power to order a detainee's release if it found problems with a detainee's enemy combatant status as determined by a military Combatant Status Review Tribunal.

"Yes, subject to a few qualifications," said Gregory G. Katsas, a Justice Department lawyer. Katsas said the Defense Department would have the option of fixing any flawed process first. "If a CSRT determination is made, and that is that he is not an enemy combatant, that person is turned loose."

Judge A. Raymond Randolph likened the new court review process to a modification of habeas corpus rather than its abolition but said he sees no remedy for detainees in the new law. He said the new law appeared to shift habeas cases from the District Court to the Court of Appeals.

Thomas B. Wilner, who was arguing on behalf of the detainees, said he would not object if the cases were transferred from one court to another.

But he said he worries that the law is unclear and might restrict the court from truly examining the facts of a detainee's combatant status.

Currently, the military is holding 10 detainees at Guantanamo Bay who have been cleared for release, and federal courts have been powerless to order them freed. There are about 490 detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

In a related matter, the Uyghur American Association is planning to file a brief with the the Supreme Court today supporting the release of two countrymen who remain at Guantanamo Bay despite having been cleared of ties to terrorism by the U.S. military. A U.S. District Court judge recently found that there is nothing to support holding the two Chinese Muslims but said he has no authority to order their release.

Attorneys for the Uighurs have taken the unusual step of asking the Supreme Court to rule before the appellate court enters a judgment, arguing that their clients uniquely face indefinite detention even though they are innocent.

In a draft of the brief provided to The Washington Post, the UAA urges the court to allow the Uighur detainees to join the Uighur community in the Washington area, where they would live in a form of parole.

Uighurs have been battling Beijing for a separate homeland in China and face torture or execution if repatriated there, according to the U.S. government. But U.S. officials have been unwilling to release the Uighurs in the United States and have not been able to find another country to accept them.

Also yesterday, Pentagon officials said that they are considering issuing a written instruction to military commissions at Guantanamo Bay that would formally ban the use of evidence obtained from detainees by torture in upcoming trials.

Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman, said prosecutors have agreed not to use such evidence, but officials are developing language to put it in writing.

Arar tells EU investigators of ordeal he suffered under U.S. rendition policy

JAN SLIVA

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) - Maher Arar told an investigative committee of the European Parliament on Thursday that he was kidnapped in New York and deported by U.S. authorities via Rome and Jordan to Syria, where he was tortured for 10 months.

Arar, an Ottawa telecommunications engineer who holds dual Syrian-Canadian citizenship, was travelling on a Canadian passport when he was grabbed at a New York airport in September 2002 during a stopover on his way home to Canada from vacation in Tunisia. He said he was sent to Syria for interrogation on suspicion of being a member of al-Qaida, an allegation he denied.

"I am a victim of extraordinary rendition," Arar told the EU committee. "I am not a terrorist, I don't know anyone from al-Qaida. I have never been to Afghanistan."

Arar testified to an EU parliamentary committee investigating whether CIA agents shipped prisoners through European airports to secret detention centres.

The Italian connection was of particular interest to the committee, which is investigating whether Europe's human rights treaties were violated in the alleged extraordinary renditions by U.S. authorities.

Clandestine detention centres and secret flights via of from Europe to countries where suspects could face torture would breach the continent's human rights conventions.

In Canada, the former Liberal government launched a judicial inquiry into the role Canadian officials may have played in Arar's detention. That report is due before summer.

Arar told the EU committee that FBI agents took his passport, put him in chains on both his wrists and ankles and asked him to voluntarily to go to Syria. He refused and, after several days of being interrogated in New York, he said he was driven to New Jersey and put on a luxurious private jet that stopped over in Rome before landing in Amman, Jordan.

"I overheard them saying they belonged to a special removal unit," he said.

Arar said he could see on the airport's in-flight screen showing the trajectory of the flight that it landed in Rome, adding he overheard officials saying the plane's next stop would be Athens, Greece. He said the plane refuelled in Rome and tall person in a civilian suit guarded it on the tarmac.

Once in Syria, Arar said he was detained in a small cell with no light and was beaten and tortured. He said he also heard other people being tortured.

"I though my heart would go out of my chest,' " he said of the suffering he endured.

Arar said that over time he "became aware" that a German citizen was detained in the same compound in a nearby cell. He said the German had been rendered from Morocco to Syria.

Arar's testimony followed a similar story told by a Kuwaiti-born German citizen who said he was kidnapped in Macedonia and flown to Afghanistan for torturing.

The EU assembly is trying to get first-hand testimony from people who say there were kidnapped by U.S. intelligence agents to get a better picture of the U.S. extraordinary rendition flights.

A group of committee members plans to travel to the United States in early May to speak to U.S. officials about alleged cases of extraordinary rendition, officials said. EU legislators will also go to Macedonia April 27-29 to speak the to authorities there about the case of the Kuwaiti-born German.

Prior to the hearing, Arar said he hoped his trip to Europe, his first abroad since being freed from a Syrian prison in 2003, would help prevent others from suffering a similar fate.

"I am testifying so the world will know that the U.S. government abducted me for no reason in New York and sent me to Syria, where I was tortured and the U.S. government knew this was a common practice," Arar said in a statement released Wednesday by the Center for Constitutional Rights. The New York-based legal and educational group represents Arar in his bid to sue the U.S. government.

"I have always said I do not want anyone else to endure the torture I experienced, and that is why I am testifying, . . . " Arar said.

Under a practice known as extraordinary rendition, U.S. authorities detain people suspected of having terrorist links and send them to other countries for interrogation in the hope of extracting information to support their suspicion. Washington says it does not condone torture, but many countries involved in the rendition process routinely mete out rough treatment to detainees.

Arar's initial attempt to sue the U.S. government was rebuffed by a U.S. court.

However, Maria LaHood, a Center for Constitutional Rights lawyer, said an appeal is planned. "The court gave a green light to the administration to outsource torture in the name of national security," she said. "Mr. Arar will not be silenced."

Macedonia obstructs CIA probe- EU lawmaker

BRUSSELS (Reuters) - Macedonian Interior Minister Ljubomir Mihailovski has refused to meet EU lawmakers investigating allegations of a CIA abduction in his country, a senior EU lawmaker said on Thursday.

Khaled el-Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese origin, alleges he was arrested by CIA agents in Macedonia on December 31, 2003, flown to Afghanistan, held there for months in 2004 as a terrorist suspect, and tortured.

A group of EU lawmakers plan to visit Macedonia on April 27-29 to gather more information on this case, as part of their probe into the allegations made last year by rights groups and newspapers that the CIA abducted prisoners in Europe, flew them to other countries and ran secret prisons in the bloc.

"I have just learnt, to my regret, that the Macedonian Minister of the Interior, Ljubomir Mihailovski, does not want to meet the delegation of the European Parliament's temporary committee," said Claudio Fava, the Italian socialist who is rapporteur to the investigation committee.

"To find the truth about this case and about other likely cases of 'extraordinary rendition' is both a political and a moral obligation -- for our committee or for any European country, without exception," Fava said in a statement.

Nobody at the Macedonian mission to the EU was immediately available for comment.

The European Parliament's committee, created in January to probe the CIA allegations, has no legal or judicial powers and cannot impose any visit or meeting.

El-Masri's hearing before the committee in Strasbourg last week highlighted political tensions among members as lawmakers from the main conservative group of the European Parliament challenged his allegations and said he had no proof.

Fava and other liberal and ecologist deputies accused the conservatives of trying to undermine the work of the committee.

An interim report by a separate investigation by Europe's top rights watchdog the Council of Europe concluded this month that European states need tougher laws to guarantee oversight of foreign agents. But it produced no hard evidence of wrongdoing by the CIA, which Washington has denied.

U.S. files to take over lawsuit against Gabelli

NEW YORK, March 22 (Reuters) - The Justice Department filed an expected motion to take over a lawsuit against investor Mario Gabelli in a case that alleges he obtained ill-gotten gains from the government, the U.S. Attorney's Office said on Wednesday.

The motion, filed March 17 in Manhattan federal court, comes after a prosecutor two weeks ago said the government would move to take over a 5-year-old lawsuit against Gabelli and other defendants, one of Wall Street's best-known money managers, and others.

In a complaint filed on Monday, the U.S. Justice Department said it would bring additional claims against the defendants in a case related to the auction of wireless telephone licenses in the 1990s.

The government accused Gabelli of unjust enrichment, demanded a jury trial and said it would seek damages on three charges, which would be tripled under U.S. law.

Other penalties against the defendants were also demanded, the complaint signed by U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said. The government dismissed 10 defendants from the case.

Judge Paul Crotty, who is presiding over the case, did not immediately rule on the government's request.

The Justice Department said it should be permitted to intervene in the case because of a November ruling that said only the government, and not the lawyer who accused the defendants of fraud, could force the disgorgement of profits.

A memorandum filed in support of its petition also said that the government had new and ample evidence showing that Gabelli set up sham corporations to hide the fact he controlled them. The government also said it learned that Gabelli had charged fees that had never been disclosed to the entities.

Lawyers for Gabelli and other defendants have until April 3 to respond to the motion, and the government has until April 10 to rebut those arguments, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

The suit claims that Gabelli and other defendants, including Gabelli-controlled Lynch Interactive Corp. <LICT.PK>, misled the Federal Communications Commission to gain wireless telephone licenses at a discount during FCC auctions in the 1990s.

Gabelli has vowed to fight the charges and said the case is without merit. Lynch has said it was always compliant with the law and FCC regulations.

GAMCO Investors Inc. <GBL.N>, a money management firm that was formerly named after Gabelli, is not a defendant in the suit. Gabelli is chairman and chief executive of GAMCO.

Book on Chicago housing case a primer for Baltimore

Eric Siegel -- Urban Chronicles

With the second phase of Baltimore's public housing desegregation case set to begin Monday, I spent part of last weekend reading Alexander Polikoff's recently published book, Waiting for Gautreaux.

The book, whose title is a play on words on Samuel Beckett's existential play Waiting for Godot, is an account of Chicago's Gautreaux housing case, the granddaddy of housing desegregation cases. Polikoff was the principal lawyer for public housing residents.

The Gautreaux case looms in the background of the Baltimore case, in which U.S. District Judge Marvin J. Garbis ruled last year that the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development violated fair-housing laws by failing to take a regional approach to the desegregation of public housing in the city and is now holding a bench trial to decide what to do about it.

Filed in 1966, Gautreaux took until 1998 to reach its eventually agreed-upon goal of helping 7,100 Chicago public housing families move to economically and racially integrated areas of the Chicago metropolitan area.

It's not just that Gautreaux led to a 1976 U.S. Supreme Court decision that said metropolitan solutions were permissible in housing discrimination cases.

Lawyers for Baltimore's black public housing residents and for HUD have invoked the Chicago case in their pretrial briefs -- though to different ends.

Public housing residents' lawyers -- who are calling for 6,750 "housing opportunities" to be created over 10 years, mostly in well-off suburban areas -- write: "In straining to argue that no vestiges of prior violations exist, HUD pretends that Gautreaux was never decided."

HUD's lawyers contend that the remedy proposed by the plaintiffs, which include a requirement that half of federal funds go toward the creation of such housing, "far exceed the permissible scope of any remedy contemplated under ... Gautreaux."

Like Gautreaux, the Baltimore public housing case, Carmen Thompson et al v. United States Department of Housing and Urban Development et al, raises policy and legal questions. To wit: Is it better to spend more money housing fewer poor people but dispersing them more widely through more affluent communities where access to better schools and jobs give them a better chance for success? Or is it better to house more people in less expensive areas, thereby perpetuating the concentration of poverty and its attendant ills with which we are all too familiar?

Polikoff's book, which is published by Northwestern University Press and subtitled A Story of Segregation, Housing and the Black Ghetto, provides some insights and answers.

Written from the perspective of a staunch advocate -- he concludes with a call for a nationwide mobility program modeled after that adopted in Gautreaux -- Polikoff's book is hardly a polemic.

Whatever your views on the cases, or the results they seek to achieve, Waiting for Gautreaux works as a memoir of a litigator involved in a high-profile, complex lawsuit and a history of federal housing policy through the prism of a landmark legal case.

Polikoff offers behind-the-scenes accounts of his team's legal strategy over the course of the lawsuit. They range from items as seemingly mundane as the decision to put tenant leader Dorothy Gautreaux's name first on the list of plaintiffs ("a case usually becomes known by the first name on the list of plaintiffs, and we were attracted by the unusual Gautreaux name") to ones as monumental as midcourse adjustments in arguments that needed to be made after the Supreme Court's 1974 ruling that regional approaches could not be used in school desegregation cases. Especially interesting is the rush to craft a final settlement with HUD in the waning days of the Carter administration.

Most fascinating is the narrative of how the case unfolded against the backdrop of changing federal housing policy. It began at the height of the civil rights movement, during the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.'s push for "open housing," and achieved its goal amid the HOPE VI redevelopments that turned public housing high-rises into mixed-income communities. Included is a recounting of the strident opposition of some eastern Baltimore County politicians and residents to the aborted Moving to Opportunity program in 1994 --which has become an infamous footnote to federal housing history.

There are ample lessons for Baltimore in the book. One example: The assistance to Chicago's public housing families came mostly from persuading landlords to accept special vouchers provided by HUD and not the construction of permanent housing units.

Also telling is Polikoff's assessment that the Gautreaux program "could be viewed as a glass half-full or half-empty." He observes that a "non-negligible number" of families were helped to move to better areas, but notes that the number amounted to only a fifth of Chicago's public housing families.

But the most important lesson may be that Gautreaux eventually succeeded in achieving its goal -- though it took 32 years from the time the suit was filed.

Baltimore's Thompson case has been going on for 11 years.

By the measure of Gautreaux, the Baltimore case could have a long way to go.

Google's Privacy Win Could Be Pyrrhic Victory; Google won what will likely be just the first battle in a continuing war over requests for its search information

By Thomas Claburn, InformationWeek

Google scored a partial victory in its battle to keep its search data out of the hands of the government. It may be a costly win.

Federal judge James Ware ruled last week that Google must turn over 50,000 URLs from its index to the government, but not users' search queries. Last August, the Department of Justice sought all the URLs in Google's index and two months worth of search queries.

The government hopes to use Google's data to prove that Internet filters can't effectively shield minors from adult material online. In so doing, it aims to reinstate the 1998 Child Online Protection Act (COPA), which was blocked by the courts when the ACLU and other groups challenged the constitutionality of the law.

In a blog post, Nicole Wong, associate general counsel of Google characterized the decision as "...a clear victory for our users and for our company... Because we resisted the subpoena, the Department of Justice will not receive any search queries and only a small fraction of the URLs it originally requested."

"What Google did here was actually a brave and important thing," says Stephen Ryan, a partner at law firm Manatt Phelps & Phillips in Washington D.C. "They challenged what the government was doing and the government had to cut down, in its negotiations and in the court's ruling, what they had to turn over."

AOL, MSN, and Yahoo have said that they complied with the government's requests in a limited way and did not violate their privacy policies in the process. But staking out the middle ground between spinelessness and sedition hasn't proven to be a public relations coup.

Google's resistance, however, has provided some redemption following the flack it took for cooperating with the Chinese government's censorship requests. "From a branding standpoint, they've done something quite important," says Ryan.

Even so, Ryan says the issues raised in this case are not going to go away. "The Justice Department, under its current management, has an almost insatiable desire for different pieces of information and they're going to continue to seek those under any authority that they have," he observes. "I think Google will pay a tremendous price for having challenged the DoJ... The Department of Justice has a long memory for these things."

Part of that promise likely will be future lawsuits. In his ruling, Ware anticipates that the pornography study the government intends to conduct will be challenged based on the incompleteness of the sample data provided by Google, resulting in discovery efforts by other litigants. He writes, "[T]his Court is concerned that a narrow sample of Google's proprietary index and query log, while in itself not likely to lead to the disclosure of confidential information, may act as the thin blade of the wedge in exposing Google to potential disclosure of its confidential commercial information."

It's a safe bet: As long as search engines have revealing data, lawyers will come. In January, Microsoft acknowledged that it has already complied with a second subpoena from the Department of Justice as well as one from the ACLU about the company's Web filter and parental control product development.

Aden Fine, staff attorney for the ACLU, says he expects that his organization and the other plaintiffs hoping to halt COPA will need more information from the four search companies. "We have already told AOL that it's likely we will need to do that discovery if the government relies on information provided by AOL regarding its search engine," he says. "And we've also so informed Microsoft."

Google had better hope its winning streak continues.

Man facing new charges for Web pharmacy

By STEVE KARNOWSKI
Associated Press Writer

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) - The owner of an Internet pharmacy shut down by the federal government faces serious new charges of conspiring to kill a witness who was expected to testify against him, prosecutors announced Wednesday.

Christopher William Smith was charged with one count of conspiracy to tamper with a witness and one count of endeavoring to obstruct justice, according to a grand jury indictment unsealed Wednesday as Smith made his first court appearance on the new charges, the U.S. attorney's office said in a news release.

According to the indictment, Smith called an acquaintance from jail March 4 and allegedly stated he intended to threaten and intimidate a witness he expected would testify against him in his upcoming trial on drug and other charges. The indictment alleges Smith also said he intended to have the witness or the witness' family killed.

It was one of several calls made by Smith to numbers not linked with his defense attorney that officials at the Sherburne County Jail monitored and recorded, the prosecutors' statement said.

Smith's lawyer, Joe Friedberg, declined comment on the new charges.

Smith, of Prior Lake, a notorious computer spammer known as Rizler, and other co-defendants were already scheduled to go on trial Oct. 2 on a host of charges connected with his Burnsville-based Internet pharmacy business Xpress Pharmacy Direct, which federal authorities shut down last May. He was 25 at the time.

Prosecutors allege his operations generated more than $20 million in illegal sales of the narcotic pain reliever hydrocodone without valid prescriptions.

He was arrested after returning to the United States from the Dominican Republic, where prosecutors say he was trying to set up a new operation in violation of a judge's order. He went free on bail briefly, until he was jailed for violating the conditions of his release. He has pleaded not guilty to the original charges.

The maximum potential penalties on the new charges are life in prison for conspiracy to tamper with a witness, and 20 years for endeavoring to obstruct justice. The actual sentence, if he's convicted on those counts, would be up to the judge and would probably be less.

ACLU Challenges Drugs-Related Ban on U.S. Student Aid

(Bloomberg) -- The American Civil Liberties Union filed suit seeking to overturn a U.S. law that makes students ineligible for federally backed college loans once they have been convicted on a drug charge.

The suit, filed today in U.S. District Court in South Dakota, contends the law enacted in 1998 violates due-process and double-jeopardy provisions of the U.S. Constitution. It names U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings as the defendant. The department has no comment on the case, spokesman Chad Colby said.

The law discriminates against poorer students who rely on federal aid to pay tuition, said South Dakota college senior Kraig Selken, one of three plaintiffs in the case. Selken, who lost his student aid after a marijuana conviction, said students have a harder time improving their lives because of the law.

``The thing that it ends up being aimed at is just to deter education,'' Selken, a 21-year-old history major at Northern State University in Aberdeen, South Dakota, said in an interview. ``It's not about deterring drug use.''

The federal government spends more than $78 billion a year on student financial aid. Nearly two-thirds of the nation's 19 million undergraduate students receive some type of assistance, according to the U.S. Department of Education.

Students Using Drugs

The suit, filed by the New York-based ACLU on behalf of Selken and other students, asks the court to suspend enforcement of the law. The law affects ``thousands'' of students, the ACLU said, without being more specific.

The author of the law, Representative Mark Souder, a Republican of Indiana, said U.S. taxpayers shouldn't subsidize students ``who are frittering away their educations by dealing or using drugs.''

``If students want to pay for their educations themselves and use drugs while doing so, that's one thing,'' Souder said in a written response to a request for comment. ``If they expect to receive taxpayer funds while using drugs, that's something else.''

Former New Mexico Governor Gary Johnson said the law is part of a misguided policy that emphasizes punishment over treatment. The approach produces more violence and drives addicts to lower- cost, dangerous narcotics like methamphetamines, he said.

What Is Dangerous?

``There needs to be an understanding of what is dangerous regarding these drugs, and what is dangerous nine out of 10 times has to do with prohibition,'' Johnson said in an interview. A Republican, he is on the board of Students for Sensible Drug Policy, a Washington-based advocacy group and one of the plaintiffs in the ACLU lawsuit.

Selken, who has a grade-point average better than 3.0, pleaded guilty in October 2005 to a misdemeanor possession charge after police found a ``small amount'' of marijuana in a house he shared with two other students, the ACLU said in its complaint.

He was sentenced to 60 days in jail, with 57 days suspended on condition of treatment, and fined $250 plus $147 in lab costs, Selken said. He was required to attend a drug-treatment course.

The law allows students to resume receiving financial aid if they attend a treatment program that includes two random drug tests. Selken said his court-ordered punishment didn't require the random tests, and he now must pay $2,600 to re-take the course with the random tests, to keep his student loan.

Tuition

Tuition at Northern State University costs about $1,500 a semester, most of which Selken covered with federal aid, supplemented by his job as a restaurant waiter. Losing that aid will delay his plans to become a teacher or a lawyer, he said.

The treatment exemption is of little value to many students, said Wolf, the ACLU's lead attorney in the case.

``Many of them can't even get into such a program because the waiting lists are so long,'' Wolf said.

The law was applied by the Department of Education to cover students with prior convictions. Under that policy, the law affected 35,000 students, Wolf said. Congress last month revised the law, saying it applies only to convictions occurring while the student is in school.

The case is Students For Sensible Drug Policy Foundation v. Spellings, CIV. 06-3007, U.S. District Court for the Northern District of South Dakota.

Librarian Is Still John Doe, Despite Patriot Act Revision

By ALISON LEIGH COWAN

The hotel ballroom was packed as a sensibly dressed, well-read crowd from around the country gathered in San Antonio on Jan. 21 to celebrate one of their own.

Yet, as many expected, the guest of honor was a no-show, despite the $500 intellectual freedom prize that awaited.

Attendees at an American Library Association gathering blamed Washington for the empty chair. Lawmakers may be giving themselves credit for having improved safeguards on civil liberties when they reauthorized the nation's antiterrorism law, otherwise known as the USA Patriot Act, earlier this month.

But many librarians and civil liberties lawyers say the revisions did nothing to enable the guest of honor to take the stage and discuss the Patriot Act without risk of prosecution.

Known as John Doe in court filings, the guest of honor was the Connecticut librarian who was visited by the Federal Bureau of Investigation last year and presented with what is known as a national security letter demanding patron records.

The subpoena, issued as part of a counterterrorism investigation, not only barred him from disclosing the target of the inquiry, but also forbade him and others at his place of work to ever discuss the letter or even to acknowledge its receipt.

Though some 30,000 national security letters are issued a year without arousing public protest, the librarian was reluctant to comply because of professional ethics aimed at keeping library records confidential.

On the advice of the American Civil Liberties Union, his employer went to court to challenge the constitutionality of the subpoena, the provisions of the Patriot Act that broadened the use of national security letters after Sept. 11, 2001, and the order permanently forbidding discussion of the F.B.I.'s demand.

As the Bush administration pushed for the act to be reauthorized, a handful of Democratic and Republican lawmakers argued that it went too far in encroaching on civil liberties. In the end, they persuaded the White House to accept a compromise that placed library records beyond the reach of a national security letter if they were gathered by libraries operating in what many people understand to be their traditional roles.

The final bill also gave recipients of national security letters the explicit right to consult lawyers.

While those concessions have allowed lawmakers to say that new safeguards on civil liberties have been put in place, another powerful provision in the Patriot Act, known as Section 215, remains on the books. It gives law enforcement another confidential way to demand information but has seldom been used because it requires judicial approval. National security letters, in contrast, require merely the signature of an F.B.I. official.

Between Section 215 and the new language governing national security letters, some opponents of the new version of the Patriot Act are skeptical that the revisions will provide much protection against unwanted invasions of privacy or infringements on free speech.

"The revised law provides almost no protection whatsoever for libraries," said Ann Beeson, the civil liberties union lawyer representing the organization that brought the suit in Connecticut. "It's virtually meaningless."

The section of the new law that addresses "privacy protection for library patrons" states that library records are beyond the reach of national security letters so long as the library is not operating as an "electronic communication service." Elsewhere, that term is defined as "any service which provides to users thereof the ability to send or receive wire or electronic communications."

But much of what a modern library does courses through its computers. Patrons can research topics on the Web. They can even reserve books from home. "A national security letter can be used to get any library record that is maintained via an electronic communication service," Ms. Beeson said. "That definitely includes Internet access and e-mail records and can also include patron borrowing records."

The new law does establish the recipient's right to challenge the nondisclosure orders that typically accompany national security letters and Section 215 requests. But the recipient would have to wait a year before raising the question anew if the government continued to assert the need for secrecy.

"If you're a business that has resources to challenge it every year, you can," Ms. Beeson said. But she said a judge would be hard pressed to rule against a government request to keep the information secret for reasons of national security. In the Connecticut John Doe's case, she said, "nothing in the new law permits John Doe to disclose his identity."

Though government lawyers demanded that John Doe's identity be shielded in court filings, the government failed to completely conceal the name in those filings, which revealed the plaintiff to be the Library Connection of Windsor, Conn., a nonprofit organization that provides back-office services to some two dozen libraries in the Hartford area.

Eager to testify publicly about the Patriot Act, the group's officers won the right last summer to identify their organization as the recipient of a national security letter after Judge Janet C. Hall of Federal District Court in Bridgeport found that the government had unjustly imposed a prior restraint on free speech. But her decision was stayed while the government appealed, and the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, in Manhattan, has yet to rule.

"I am rather appalled that our country's laws silence John Doe and require him to remain anonymous for standing by his professional ethics, for standing up for the principle that it is nobody's business what you read, or listen to, or look at in the library but yours," Judith F. Krug, the executive director of the Freedom to Read Foundation, told the crowd in San Antonio, as she accepted the University of Illinois's annual Robert B. Downs Intellectual Freedom Award in John Doe's absence.

Alice S. Knapp, a Stamford librarian who is this year's president of the Connecticut Library Association, said she was there "taking pictures left and right." But the Library Connection's executive director, George Christian, and the vice president of its board, Peter Chase, did not attend. Mr. Chase's absence was especially odd since he was to be the Connecticut Library Association's advocate on intellectual freedom this year.

Without commenting on John Doe's likely identity, Ms. Knapp confirmed that she had assumed many of Mr. Chase's speaking duties this year. For moral support, she has been nominating John Doe for other awards.

"We nominate them for everything we can," Ms. Knapp said. "Never mind the pressure they're under. Just the sheer act of bravery to decide not to comply and to decide to make an issue of it was incredibly huge, and within the library community, there is a lot of respect for them."

Indonesian Christian gets asylum chance

LARRY NEUMEISTER
Associated Press

NEW YORK - A court has given an Indonesian citizen a new chance at asylum after his claim of religious persecution was rejected because his grasp of Christianity seemed shaky.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals resurrected Yose Rizal's claim in a decision Tuesday. During an immigration hearing after his February 2000 appeal for asylum, Rizal told government lawyers that Jesus was crucified in Bethlehem, not Jerusalem, and did not know which disciples wrote the New Testament.

An immigration judge then asked Rizal who prepared the Ten Commandments, but Rizal answered Jesus instead of Moses. Later, Rizal said he had learned "what's good and what's evil" and enjoyed hearing preachers at church.

The appeals court wrote that "history and common sense make amply clear" that people who identify with a religion but lack detailed knowledge about it can still be persecuted for their religious affiliation.

Rizal, 37, of New York City, filed the claim nine months after he came to the United States. He said in an affidavit that he was harassed and discriminated against by Muslims, including friends and relatives.

In the 1990s, a co-worker called Rizal a "dirty Christian" and punched him in the face, and he was beaten by three people and fired by his boss when he refused to become a Muslim, he said.

In August 1998, some Muslim leaders declared that all Christians should convert to Islam or be killed, Rizal said. Three months later, his church was one of 20 in Jakarta burned by Muslims, he said.

The appeals court said the immigration judge in Rizal's case had ignored most of his claims and did not consider relevant evidence.

A spokesperson for government lawyers who handled the case did not immediately return a telephone message Wednesday.

H. Raymond Fasano, Rizal's lawyer, called the appeals decision "far-reaching."

"This case opens the door for people who may not have a sophisticated understanding of their faith," he said.

Fasano said the reopening of the case will likely allow his client to stay in the United States on the grounds that he has since married a U.S. citizen.

The pair, Fasano said, met at church.

Nevada files new federal lawsuit in Yucca Mountain fight

By: KEN RITTER - Associated Press

LAS VEGAS -- Nevada filed a lawsuit Wednesday accusing the federal Energy Department of withholding documents that state officials say will show the planned Yucca Mountain nuclear waste repository can't be built safely.

The complaint, filed in U.S. District Court in Reno, is the fourth federal lawsuit the state has pending against the plan to bury 77,000 tons of the nation's radioactive waste in Nevada.

The suit seeks the release of a 2004 draft application prepared by contractors for a Nuclear Regulatory Commission license to open the repository.

"The federal government is required by law to share its important Yucca information with the host state, and we are entitled to such information under the Freedom of Information Act as well," Nevada Attorney General George Chanos said in a statement. "But DOE has refused to provide Nevada with this most important document."

An Energy Department spokesman in Washington, D.C., said the agency has made public on an Internet network "millions of pages of information" about the Yucca Mountain project, but was under no legal obligation to release its draft license application.

"Once the license application is submitted to the (Nuclear Regulatory Commission), it will be made public," spokesman Craig Stevens said in a statement e-mailed to The Associated Press.

"This department and this administration remain committed to the licensing, construction, and operation of Yucca Mountain as the nation's permanent geologic repository for spent nuclear fuel," Stevens said. "This lawsuit will not deter us."

The state's three-page complaint lists measures that Chanos said Nevada has taken to secure the draft license application, including requests by Gov. Kenny Guinn to the secretary of energy and to President Bush; subpoenaed demands from Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev.; litigation before the Nuclear Regulatory Commission licensing hearing board; a Freedom of Information Act request; and Energy Department administrative appeals.

All those requests were rebuffed, Chanos said.

"What are they trying to hide?" he said. "If the repository is safe, you'd think they'd be anxious to prove it."

Bob Loux, chief of Nevada's Agency for Nuclear Projects and administrator of the state fight against the repository, said the state believes the document will show that the repository cannot meet Environmental Protection Agency radiation safety standards.

The Energy Department had planned to open the repository by 2010. But it missed a self-imposed deadline to apply for a license by the end of 2004, and licensing hearings are expected to take several years.

Last week, the acting director of the Energy Department's Office of Civilian Radioactive Waste Management that oversees the project said the site should open in the next decade.

The process has been stalled by budget shortages, opposition by Nevada lawmakers including Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, a controversy over whether scientists falsified quality assurance data and by a court-ordered rewrite of EPA radiation standards.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, which ordered stricter standards, also heard oral arguments last October and is expected to rule soon on a state claim that the Energy Department overstepped its authority, violated environmental rules and needs to rewrite its plan for shipping nuclear waste to Yucca Mountain.

Nevada also has asked the court to review Nuclear Regulatory Commission rulings, and another lawsuit is pending in U.S. District Court in Las Vegas that would deny state groundwater supplies to the arid desert site, 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Moussaoui Prosecutors Conclude Case With Testimony From FBI Agent. Finishing presentation of their case at the penalty phase of al Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui's trial yesterday, prosecutors called former FBI Special Agent Aaron Zebley, who testified that the FBI could have conducted an investigation that might have led to the 9/11 hijackers, had Moussaoui admitted when he was arrested in August 2001 that he had received wire transfers from al Qaeda.

NBC Nightly News (3/23, story 4, 2:00, Brown) reported that "so far, the trial has exposed new details on how many clues the FBI ignored in the weeks before the 9/11 attacks." NBC (Williams) added Zebley testified that if Moussaoui "had admitted when he was arrested that a man in the United Arab Emirates wired him thousands of dollars," then "finding out who else was wired money from the same person and checking their phone and bank records could have put agents on the trail of 11 of the 19 hijackers." But "tough questioning from Moussaoui's lawyers has raised doubts about how aggressively the FBI would have actually pursued those leads." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "says the government has learned its very painful lessons." Gonzales: "And we obviously are more sensitive today about threats to the United States. And we believe that we have better procedures, better infrastructure to share information."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (3/24, Sniffen) reports, "U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema, who has told the jury it cannot decide Moussaoui's punishment 'on speculation,' barred Zebley from explicitly asserting what the FBI would have accomplished had he confessed," but "Zebley gave prosecutors their strongest testimony in a week when many of their witnesses ended up buttressing the defense." However, on cross-examination, defense lawyer Edward MacMahon "got Zebley to acknowledge that nothing in the confession or in FBI evidence gathered since then shows any contact between Moussaoui and the 9/11 hijackers."

AFP (3/24) adds, "MacMahon later challenged Zebley's assessments, as tempers frayed at the start of his cross-examination asking: 'So the FBI needs a confession from an Al-Qaeda terrorist to launch an investigation?' Brinkema then intervened, telling MacMahon and Zebley, who now works as a prosecutor at the Alexandria, Virginia, courthouse hosting the trial, to take a deep breath, 'calm down' and take a lunch break."

Under the headline "FBI Agent Says 9/11 Plot Was Within Grasp," The Los Angeles Times (3/24, Serrano) notes, "Zebley conceded that FBI does not believe Moussaoui was supposed to have been aboard one of the planes. 'There never was a 20th hijacker,' Zebley said. But he added, 'the plot was to get as many conspirators in the U.S. as possible.'"

The Washington Post (3/24, Markon, Dwyer) reports that as Moussaoui was being led from court after Zebley's testimony, he shouted, "I will testify, whether you want it or not!" although "it was unclear whether he was addressing his attorneys, with whom he does not speak and who have been against his taking the stand. But what was clear was that the case…could take yet another dramatic turn. Moussaoui is known for his courtroom outbursts, and even his attorneys don't know what he will say."

Meanwhile, The New York Times (3/24, Lewis) notes, "The trial, which will resume on Monday, offers the possibility of three dramatic moments in short order. First, the court may hear from Carla J. Martin, the Transportation Security Administration lawyer whose improper coaching of witnesses nearly derailed the trial. Then…the jury is expected to have the extraordinary experience of hearing testimony gathered in the United States' secret overseas detention system," as defense lawyers introduce testimony from al Qaeda terrorists Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, Ramzi bin al-Shibh and Mohammed Al-Qahtani.

Voice of America (3/24, Malone) reports, "Earlier this week, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the government has learned a lot of lessons from the 9/11 attacks, including how to respond more quickly to threat information gathered by agents in the field. … 'I am not going to comment on anything related to the trial,' Gonzales says. 'What I will say is that we obviously are more sensitive today about threats to the United States and we believe that we have better procedures, better infrastructure to share information.'"

Testifying For Defense, Former FBI Agent Recalls CIA Failure To Alert FBI About Hijackers. The AP (3/24, Sniffen) also reports, "The first defense witness, former FBI agent Erik Rigler, summarized a Justice Department inspector general report that criticized the CIA for keeping" intelligence that 9/11 hijackers Nawaf al-Hazmi and Khalid al-Mindhar had entered the US "from the FBI for so long and the FBI for assigning pursuit of the pair to one inexperienced, young agent. It said the pair was on Thailand's watchlist in January, 2000, but not on a U.S. watchlist until August, 2001."

Analyst Denounces Civilian Trials Of Moussaoui, Saddam As "Charades." In a Washington Times (3/24) op-ed, DC-based terrorism analyst and author Eric Leskly writes, "The charades in Alexandria and Baghdad last week are final confirmation that the Bush administration has grievously erred in trying the Zacarias Moussaoui and Saddam Hussein cases in civilian courts instead of military tribunals. By attempting to use the trials as public-relations tools to demonstrate fair judicial process, the administration has disregarded the fact the clear and present danger posed by al Qaeda and the Iraqi insurgency require harsher procedures and penalties than those afforded by traditional criminal prosecution." And as Moussaoui and Saddam "use the trials instead to preach to their followers and sympathizers," the "botched cases may have even strengthened our enemies."

Trial Is Difficult For Victims' Family Members To Watch. The AP (3/24, Lester) reports, "The U.S. government's failure to act on repeated warnings before the Sept. 11 terrorist attack had Geraldine Davie fighting back tears as she talked about her 22-year-old daughter's death in the collapse of the World Trade Center. .. 'They all let us down,' Davie said Wednesday evening, voicing a sentiment shared by many of the victims' family members who are monitoring the sentencing trial of admitted al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui." The AP continues, "Victims' family members also had to watch the federal judge consider scuttling the prosecution's bid for the death penalty after learning last week that a government lawyer improperly coached witnesses. Some prosecution witnesses gave testimony about government missteps that the defense turned to its advantage. … 'Certainly, the case now is not as strong as it could be,' said Bill McGinly, of Vienna, Va., who lost a son in the attack on the World Trade Center. McGinly wants to see Moussaoui get the death penalty." The AP adds, "The court proceedings have been painful for victims' family members like Davie, whose daughter, Amy O'Doherty, was working at an investment firm at the World Trade Center in New York Cit; McGinly, whose son Mark worked at the trade center; and Eleni Kousoulis, whose sister Danielle worked at the same investment firm as O'Doherty. … 'The government knew a lot, if they had just paid more attention,' said Kousoulis of Merion, Pa. Even if government investigators couldn't prevent the attacks altogether, she said, they might have saved some lives."

In NSA Suit, Judge Rules Against Portland FBI Custody Of Classified Document. The AP (3/24, Fought) reports that in the lawsuit filed by the Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation challenging NSA surveillance of the charity's director in Saudi Arabia and two lawyers in the US, US District Judge Garr King ruled this week that "a secret document" about the NSA procedures in the case "will be held in a secure facility in Seattle while the judge and lawyers try to figure out how to keep it under wraps in Portland." King said that the classified documents "shouldn't be held at the local office of the FBI," despite the fact "the FBI office is the only place in Portland that has a facility that meets specifications for what the government calls 'sensitive compartmented information.'" The AP adds, "Anthony Coppolino of the U.S. Justice Department said the document wouldn't be altered if the FBI had it and said King could have it in a closed envelope, perhaps signing the seal to guard against unauthorized opening." But King said in a teleconference with lawyers in the case, "I'm not indicating there would be any problem with them, but they are a defendant so I don't think it's appropriate that they have custody of it."

Judge Denies Request For NSA Surveillance Information In Illegal Money Transfer Case. The AP (3/24, Thompson) reports U.S. District Judge William Skretny in Buffalo has ruled that "the government does not have to tell three men accused of illegally sending $3.5 million to Yemen whether secret wiretaps were used to investigate them, a judge has ruled. Without explanation…Skretny denied the defense request for information in a one-page decision dated Tuesday." The AP notes "Mohamed Albanna, Ali Elbaneh and Ali Albanna are charged with running an unlicensed business that delivered money from Yemeni-Americans in western New York to relatives overseas."

Former Pakistani Police Chief Describes Camps In Terms Similar To Hayat. The AP (3/24, Thompson) reports that at the trial of Umer and Hamid Hayat yesterday, former Pakistani police chief Hassan Abbas, who is now an author living in Massachusetts, "described a terrorist-training camp in Pakistan in an account similar to that given by" Hamid Hayat "during a lengthy interrogation by FBI agents last June." The AP notes, "Prosecutors have no hard evidence that Hamid Hayat actually attended such a camp. By putting Abbas on the stand, they sought to give jurors details about the kinds of training camps they claim Hamid Hayat attended. … Abbas, who was paid about $35,000 for his research and testimony…has been on the stand since Wednesday, testifying about Pakistani culture, religion and politics."

Hayat Attorney Accuses Prosecutors Of Coaching Abbas During Cross-Examination. KXTV-TV Sacramento (3/23, Kobely) reports, "During defense questioning of expert witness Hassan Abbas, attorneys for Umer and Hamid Hayat argued that the wording of prosecution objections to defense questions were actually signals to Abbas about how to answer the question. … Defense attorney Wazhma Mojaddidi suggested that Abbas had worked out a system with prosecutors that if they objected to a line of defense questioning using the terms 'ambiguous' or 'vague,' that it was actually a signal for how Abbas should answer. Judge Garland Burrell immediately demanded attorneys approach the bench but after discussion, let the line of questioning continue."

US May Be Holding Pakistani Journalist. The Los Angeles Times (3/24, Ali, Zaidi, 958K) reports the family of Pakistani journalist Hayatullah Khan, who was "kidnapped in December, said Thursday that they believe he could be in U.S. custody." Khan was "abducted at gunpoint in the volatile North Waziristan tribal region Dec. 5 by armed, masked men whom a witness at the time described as dressed like fighters from the ousted Taliban regime of Afghanistan. But Ihsanullah Khan, the victim's brother, said that senior officials from Pakistan's intelligence agencies had told the family that Hayatullah was now beyond their jurisdiction." Ihsanullah Khan said, "We were told a few days ago that Mr. Khan was no longer in their possession. He might be somewhere in Pakistan or the United States being grilled for his possible links with Al Qaeda."

PATRIOT ACT:

Bush Says He Is Not Bound By Patriot Act Oversight Requirement. The Boston Globe (3/24, Savage) reports, "When President Bush signed the reauthorization of the USA Patriot Act this month, he included an addendum saying that he did not feel obliged to obey requirements that he inform Congress about how the FBI was using the act's expanded police powers." In a signing statement issued after the signing ceremony for the bill, Bush "said that he did not consider himself bound to tell Congress how the Patriot Act powers were being used and that, despite the law's requirements, he could withhold the information if he decided that disclosure would 'impair foreign relations, national security, the deliberative process of the executive, or the performance of the executive's constitutional duties.'"

FBI Confirms Use Of Patriot Act In Nevada Corruption Probe. The Las Vegas Review-Journal (3/23, Packer) reports, "Federal authorities confirmed in court Wednesday that they used the Patriot Act to access bank records while investigating alleged political corruption involving former Clark County commissioners and strip club owner Michael Galardi." The Review-Journal continues, "The Patriot Act, enacted after Sept. 11, 2001, as a tool to fight terrorism, included provisions that allowed authorities to access personal financial records more easily. … During the federal trial against former county Commissioners Mary Kincaid-Chauncey and Dario Herrera, defense attorneys revealed Wednesday that FBI agents had used the Patriot Act to track financial transactions executed by individuals involved in the case. … 'The Patriot Act made it easier for you to identify the bank accounts,' attorney Jerry Bernstein said during cross-examination of former FBI agent Joe Dickey." The Review-Journal adds, "Dickey said the government would have had to subpoena some 10,000 financial institutions nationwide had it not relied on the law. … One portion of the law directed the U.S. Treasury Department to streamline for law enforcement access to financial records. Law enforcement can send a suspect's name to the department and receive back a list of each financial institution that does business with the individual. … 'It simply helped us identify where banks were. It didn't give us information,' Dickey said of the Patriot Act provision. … That was just one tool federal agents used as they pieced together their case against Kincaid-Chauncey, Herrera, Galardi and former Commissioners Lance Malone and Erin Kenny." The AP (3/23) also reports this story.

Indiana Advocacy Groups Angered By FBI Agent's Challenge Of Patriot Act Criticism. The South Bend (IN) Tribune (3/24, Draeger) reports that after reading of negative comments made about the Patriot Act at a recent forum in Three Oaks, Ind., St. Joseph FBI Special Agent Al DiBrito "challenged Chellie Pingree's criticism…and tried to track down the head of the national nonpartisan group Common Cause, to set her straight. … DiBrito reportedly said Pingree was 'way off base' in her comments…and suggested the" League of Women Voters "should've invited the FBI to speak at the March 14 panel." In a March 21 letter to FBI Director Robert Mueller, Pingree and local League of Women Voters president Susan Gilbert wrote, "When the country has far more pressing security and terror concerns, we question the FBI using precious resources hounding leaders of two of the most distinguished citizen advocacy organizations in the country. Is this the kind of behavior citizen activists can expect from the FBI? To us, it smacks of intimidation." However, Michigan FBI Assistant SAC William Kowalski "defended DiBrito's phone call and said it's unfortunate that it was perceived as being threatening. The purpose of the call was to 'offer an opportunity to get out accurate information about the Patriot Act and how it is utilized to combat terrorism,' Kowalski said."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

US Hiring Hong Kong Firm To Run Radiation Detector In US Port. The AP (3/24, Bridis, Solomon) reports, "In the aftermath of the Dubai ports dispute, the Bush administration is hiring a Hong Kong conglomerate to help detect nuclear materials inside cargo passing through the Bahamas to the United States and elsewhere." The Administration "acknowledges the no-bid contract with Hutchison Whampoa Ltd. represents the first time a foreign company will be involved in running a sophisticated U.S. radiation detector at an overseas port without American customs agents present." The Administration "is negotiating a second no-bid contract for a Philippine company to install radiation detectors in its home country, according to documents obtained by The Associated Press."

Israeli Firm Withdraws Offer To Buy US Firm Over Security Questions. The Wall Street Journal/AP (3/24) reports, "Leading Israeli software company Check Point

Software Technologies Ltd. abandoned plans to buy smaller U.S. rival Sourcefire Inc. for $225 million because of security objections raised by the Bush administration." The Israeli firm "formally withdrew its proposal near the conclusion of a rare, full-blown investigation by a U.S. review panel after the Ramat Gan, Israel-based company was told U.S. officials feared the transaction could endanger some of government's most sensitive computer systems."

State Department Criticized For Chinese Computer Deal. The New York Times (3/24, Brasher, 1.19M) reports, "A State Department purchase of more than 15,000 computers built by the Lenovo Group of China is starting to draw criticism in the latest sign of American unease about the role of foreign companies in the American economy." Assistant Secretary McCormack "said at the department's daily media briefing on Wednesday that the computers were intended for unclassified systems and would be serviced by the former I.B.M. division." The Times notes a broad spectrum of US groups oppose the contracts, and says some of these "critics warn that the deal could help China spy on American embassies and American intelligence-gathering activities, using hardware and software planted in the computers."

ICE Teaming With Law-Enforcement In "Tri-Border Area" To Tackle Terror Fundraising. The Washington Times (3/24, Seper, 90K) reports, "US Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents have teamed up with law-enforcement authorities in Argentina, Brazil and Paraguay to combat money laundering and other financial crimes in a remote and lawless region known as the 'Tri-Border Area.' Department of Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Julie L. Myers, who heads ICE, said multigovernment 'trade transparency units' will investigate and prosecute crimes including money laundering, terrorist financing, contraband smuggling and tax evasion." The area is described by US law-enforcement authorities as "a source of fundraising for radical Islamic groups, including Hezbollah, Hamas and al Qaeda, and the US government has worked cooperatively with governments in the region to disrupt fundraising activity."

NYTimes Criticizes Chertoff Over Chemical Plant Security Proposals. Under the headline "Secretary Of Homeland Insecurity," the New York Times (3/24, 1.19M) editorializes, "Sometimes it's hard to understand just how Michael Chertoff understands his title, secretary of homeland security." In speaking to the chemical industry Tuesday, Chertoff "did not chastise the industry for failing to protect chemical plants adequately" and "seemed perfectly content to defer on key security matters to an industry that contributes heavily to Republican campaigns but has proved to be dangerously unwilling to take public safety seriously." The Times states that Chertoff "should be speaking to the American people about his support for strong chemical plant security rules, not speaking to the chemical industry about his support for weak ones."

"Government Fixated On Doomsday" Still Drawing Up New Orders Of Succession. The Washington Post (3/24, A17, Baker, 744K) reports that in what was "at least the fifth time since the start of last year that an executive branch agency has created or revised an order of succession," the President "this week endorsed a new order of succession for the National Archives and Records Administration detailing down to the 10th level who would assume command in a national emergency." The Post adds, "In a government fixated on doomsday scenarios, officials "still busy themselves with the macabre exercise of figuring out who would be on top should the worst happen." The lineup changes sometimes "reflect one official moving up the chart at the expense of colleagues," while others involve "even more brazen power plays intended to put rivals in their places."

Silverstein's Ground Zero Brinkmanship Seen As Frequently Used Strategy. The New York Times (3/24, Bagli, 1.19M) reports on the failed negotiations between developer Larry Silverstein and the Port Authority over the rebuilding of ground zero in lower Manhattan, adding, "A look at Mr. Silverstein's long career in real estate and the negotiating style that has defined it suggests that, when it comes to making deals, it is almost never over. Not surprising, then, despite last week's ugly negotiating episode, Mr. Silverstein's team has been talking through back channels with the other side this week." Silverstein has said "he fully expects to be back at the table within days to sign a deal that preserves his control over a major part of ground zero, a site that many consider sacred ground. State officials hope to resume face-to-face negotiations with him, too, but not until there is a fairly detailed agreement."

Paulison Working To Get FEMA Ready For Upcoming Hurricane Season. Under the headline "Acting Director Gives FEMA Focus," the Washington Times (3/24, Hudson, 90K) reports that acting FEMA Director R. David Paulison's "maligned agency is now planning for the hurricane season that officially begins June 1 as it continues to aid 800,000 families affected by last year's storms that damaged 90,000 square miles." He says, "The major lesson we learned is that FEMA was not ready to handle a catastrophe the size of Katrina, and we now know we have to be ready to respond to a major catastrophe such as an earthquake or terrorist attack, to evacuate hundreds of thousands or millions of people and be able to feed them, house them, and take care of them. We're putting a system in place to do just that." The Times adds that FEMA "faces many challenges, not only in housing, but also in communication, logistics, tracking supplies and learning about problems on the ground."

Louisiana Call Center Tracking Hurricane Victims Who Don't Want To Be Found. The Washington Post (3/24, A3, Ringle, 744K) reports that Louisiana's Find Family National Call Center is finding that "hundreds" of those reported missing after Hurricane Katrina "have used the storm and the nationwide diaspora it triggered to escape a troubled or painful past." The center has also "taken over from the Orleans Parish coroner's office most of the work of identifying the unclaimed dead." The center's deputy director, Henry Yennie "expects both the search for the missing and the identification of the dead to accelerate in the coming weeks because of the recent allocation of funds for obtaining access to a highly specialized LexisNexis online search."

Accusations Of Impropriety Among Volunteers Raise New Questions About Red Cross. The New York Times (3/24, Strom, 1.19M) reports, "The American Red Cross…is investigating wide ranging accusations of impropriety among volunteers after" Hurricane Katrina, including "improper diversion of relief supplies, failure to follow required Red Cross procedures in tracking and distributing supplies, and use of felons as volunteers in the disaster area in violation of Red Cross rules." While the charity "has drawn harsh criticism for failures in responding to Hurricane Katrina and for failing to address longstanding governance problems, the concerns raised by volunteers pose new questions about the organization's ability to prevent fraud and theft and protect its resources amid the chaos of a major disaster."

Barbara Bush Donation To Katrina Fund Raises Eyebrows. The Washington Post (3/24, A17, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that "the Houston Chronicle reports that former first lady Barbara Bush donated a chunk of money -- it's unknown how much -- to the Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund 'with specific instructions that the money be spent with an educational software company owned by her son Neil.'"

WAR NEWS:

Congressional Probe Of Pre-War Iraq Intelligence Likely Issue In 2006. With the congressional investigation into the Bush Administration's use of pre-war Iraq intelligence nearing fruition on several fronts, the conclusions are expected to quickly become a partisan issue in the 2006 midterm elections. If the Democrats are able to flip one of the chambers of Congress, they are expected to use the majority power to subpoena Administration officials. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, A4, Solomon, 2.11M) says the congressional reports "will include topics like predictions before the war on how a post-Saddam Iraq might look and whether the Bush administration was duped by Iraqis with a vested interest in war, like Deputy Prime Minister Ahmed Chalabi." But Republicans "have set no timetable for issuing reports on their probe into what some Democrats consider the most explosive questions: Whether political appointees at the Pentagon deliberately distorted intelligence and subverted analysis by the Central Intelligence Agency to gin up support for the invasion."

Bush Defense Of Iraq Policies Sparks Praise, Criticism. In his Wall Street Journal column (3/24, A10), Daniel Henninger says, "For those of us who've complained for more than two years that this White House was ill-serving the troops in Iraq by not making the public case for Iraq, that changed this week in Wheeling, W.Va." It "was an astounding, bravura performance. In fact, I'll pay him the highest possible compliment: It was Clintonesque." But there are "two obvious questions: Where's this guy been? And, to quote a long-ago factory boss, Is it a day late and a dollar short?"

Meanwhile, in his Washington Post column (3/24, A19), David Ignatius says the "polls suggest that Bush is losing the ability to communicate effectively about the issue that matters most to him. He has a better story on Iraq than many people seem to appreciate: Iraqi politicians are in fact coming together toward a government of national unity; Iraqi troops are improving their performance; substantial reductions in the number of U.S. troops are likely this year." But all the "speeches and rallies and white papers of the past few months have reflected a recognition that the public will support the war so long as it feels there is a coherent strategy for victory. That's why you hear the phrase 'plan for victory' repeated so often, like a mantra to convince the public that American soldiers aren't dying in a lost cause. But it's not working, and the president owes it to the troops, above all, to figure out a better way to communicate."

Also in the Washington Post column (3/24, A19), E.J. Dionne says, "Is President Bush the leader of our government, or is he just a right-wing talk-show host? The question comes to mind after Bush's news conference this week in which he sounded like someone who has no control over the government he is in charge of. His words were those of a pundit inveighing against the evils of bureaucrats." But when "their own government fails," Bush and his fellow Republicans "turn around and use their incompetence to argue that government can never work anyway, so you might as well keep electing conservatives to have less government. It's an ideological Catch-22. Even their failures prove they are right."

Krauthammer Sees Debate Over Iraqi "Civil War" As Spurious. In his Washington Post column (3/24, A19), Charles Krauthammer says, "This whole debate about civil war" in Iraq "is surreal. What is the insurgency if not a war supported by one (minority) part of Iraqi society fighting to prevent the birth of the new Iraqi state supported by another (majority) part of Iraqi society? By definition that is civil war, and there's nothing new about it." Krauthammer adds, "Is it not our entire counterinsurgency strategy to get Iraqis who believe in the new Iraq to fight Iraqis who want to restore Baathism or impose Taliban-like rule?"

US Opinion On Third Anniversary Of Iraq War Examined. USA Today (3/24, 2.31M) ran a sampling of newspaper editorials on the third anniversary of the Iraq war. The San Francisco Bay Guardian said, "(President) Bush's insistence on staying the course is starting to sound like Richard Nixon's secret plan to end the Vietnam War." The Wall Street Journal said, "The desire among so many of our political elites to repudiate Bush and his foreign policy is creating a dangerous public pessimism that could yet lead to defeat -- a defeat whose price would be paid by all Americans, and for years to come."

Rumsfeld Says US Still Plans Troop Reductions. The Washington Times (3/24, Scarborough, 90K) reports Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said "commanders are planning further troop reductions in Iraq despite ongoing violence that has killed hundreds of civilians after the February bombing of the Shi'ite Golden Mosque." Asked about President Bush's remark "that U.S. troops will be in Iraq until at least 2009, the year he leaves office, Mr. Rumsfeld said there could still be Americans training the Iraqi security forces (ISF). It was a clear signal that the defense secretary expects that by that time the United States' combat role will be greatly reduced."

Bush Funding Request For Iraq Bases Raises Questions About Troop Commitments. The Los Angeles Times (3/24, Spiegel, 958K) reports that even as "military planners look to withdraw significant numbers of American troops from Iraq in the coming year, the Bush administration continues to request hundreds of millions of dollars for large bases there, raising concerns over whether they are intended as permanent sites for U.S. forces." Congressional questions "about the future of the bases have been prompted by the new emergency spending bill for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, which overwhelmingly passed the House of Representatives last week with $67.6 billion in funding for the war effort, including the base money." Lawmakers are "demanding that the Pentagon explain its plans for the bases, and they unanimously passed a provision blocking the use of funds for base agreements with the Iraqi government."

Reconstruction Official Says Iraqis Must End Reliance On US Funds. USA Today (3/24, Frank, 2.31M) reports Daniel Speckhard, director of the Iraq Reconstruction Management Office, said "the Iraqi government can no longer count on U.S. funds and must rely on its own money and cash from other Persian Gulf nations to complete the massive undertaking" or rebuilding. While "hundreds of projects have been completed, but the top U.S. auditor for the program has criticized it for cost overruns, corruption, understaffing and bureaucratic infighting."

Three Hostages Rescued In Iraq. Three Christian peace activists were rescued from their captors in Iraq yesterday after a captured insurgent provided intelligence that led coalition troops to their location. The story was covered by each of the networks last night, and was the lead on CBS. The CBS Evening News (3/23, story 1, 3:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Ironically," the peace activists "had gone to Iraq to investigate alleged abuses against Iraqi prisoners and when the body of American Tom Fox was found earlier this month, there was not much hope the others would be found alive. Today, acting on a tip, British and US forces stormed a house and freed them without firing a shot." CBS (Logan) added, "With these hostages safe, thoughts immediately turn to another American hostage, Jill Carroll, who is still missing."

ABC World News Tonight (3/23, story 2, 2:10, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "US General Rick Lynch says a break came last night when coalition forces detained two individuals, one of whom told them where the hostages were in a house west of Baghdad." Of the "19 Americans taken hostage, 6 are still missing, including reporter Jill Carroll." The hostages "who were freed today belong to a Christian peace group which has blamed the kidnapping on what it calls America's illegal occupation of Iraq. Today, a spokesman wasn't even willing to give coalition forces credit for his colleague's rescue."

NBC Nightly News (3/23, story 2, 2:10, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "The freed hostages had new information today about the fate of American Tom Fox. Fox, they said, was separated from them 40 days ago. His tortured body was discovered in Baghdad earlier this month." British hostage Norman Kember, "who had said he didn't want a military rescue operation, tonight admitted, 'It's good to be free.'"

The Washington Post (3/24, Anderson, 744K) reports "circumstances of the rescue operation, which was spearheaded by the British, were being closely held." Doug Pritchard, co-director of Christian Peacemaker Teams, "said in a televised news conference in Toronto that no shots were fired and no captors were present at the time of the rescue. He declined to divulge the source of his information." British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw "later confirmed the absence of gunfire." The New York Times (3/24, Semple, 1.19M) says "Thursday's rescue, by a force that included American and British troops, represented one of the few times that military action in Iraq has played a decisive role in a hostage release." But "within hours, a surge of four car bombings, including a suicide attack, struck Baghdad, killing at least 23 people, wounding at least 48 and tempering the military's euphoria from the morning's success."

The AP (3/23, Mroue) reports "the US ambassador and the top American military spokesman held out hope the operation on the outskirts of Baghdad could lead to a break in the captivity of American reporter Jill Carroll, a freelance writer for The Christian Science Monitor who was abducted Jan. 7." The Christian Science Monitor (3/24, Peterson, 61K) reports "Carroll's family said Thursday that they were 'thrilled' to hear of the CPT members' release. 'Although their case is unrelated to Jill's, their release gives us new hope that Jill, too, will soon be freed. We send our best wishes to these three men and their families, knowing that their reunion will be a joyful one.'" They added that "we are also thinking of the family of Tom Fox at this time and send them our heartfelt sympathy." The Los Angeles Times (3/24, Bodreaux, 958K) runs a similar story.

US Military Trains Soldiers To Prepare For Kidnapping. The CBS Evening News (3/23, story 2, 2:20, MacVicar, 7.66M) reported, "The risk of kidnap is so high that the US military commissioned this training video to be shown to US soldiers. The tape, obtained by CBS News, covers everything from the moment of capture to what could be months of isolation and possible endings. Death is never mentioned." Former hostage, British journalist Phil Sands, said "the kidnap scene was all too familiar."

Bombings Kill 56 Iraqis, One US Soldier. ABC World News Tonight (3/23, story 3, :15, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Insurgents carried out a third attack on a police station in three days there. More than two dozen people were killed in the bombing. But no prisoners escape escaped. In attacks across the country today, 56 Iraqis and one US soldier were killed." The CBS Evening News (3/23, story 3, 0:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "A powerful car bomb hit a market outside the Shiite mosque in Baghdad, killing at least six."

US Military Spokesman Says 75% Of Attacks Occur In Three Provinces. USA Today/AP (3/24) reports, "A US military spokesman in Iraq said Thursday that major violence is largely confined to three of 18 provinces." The US military spokesman, Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, said, "There is not widespread violence across Iraq. There is not. Seventy-five percent of the attacks still take place in Baghdad, al-Anbar or Salah al-Din (provinces). And in the other 15 provinces, they all averaged less than six attacks a day, and 12 of those provinces averaged less than two attacks a day." He said "attacks nationwide were averaging 75 a day."

Respect For Law, Rights Comes Slowly For Iraqi Security Forces. The New York Times (3/24, Wong, 1.19M) reports on the "challenge facing the American military as it tries to train the Iraqi security forces to respect the rule of law." US troops "are no longer simply teaching counterinsurgency techniques; they are trying to school the Iraqis in battling a Sunni-led rebellion without resorting to the tactics of a 'dirty war,' involving abductions, torture and murder." The "legacy of Abu Ghraib hampers the American military. But the need to instill respect for human rights has gained a new urgency as Iraq grapples with the threat of full-scale civil war and continuing sectarian bloodletting."

Iraqi Exiles Divided Over Country's Future. Iraqis who fled Saddam Hussein's regime in the '80's and '90's have more optimistic views of the country's future than those who have sought asylum in the US since the regime's end. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, A1, Dreazen, 2.11M) reports, "Debate over the war in Iraq has erupted in communities of Iraqi exiles across the U.S., dividing families. The conflict is pitting longtime exiles who fled Mr. Hussein's Iraq -- many of whom support the war -- against newer arrivals who have left the country since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003."

Troops' Experience In Iraq Seen As Microcosm Of US Policy. NBC Nightly News (3/23, story 3, 2:45, Boettcher, 9.87M) reported on the experience of the Alpha Company, 2nd Battalion, 4th Infantry Division in Iraq, which "learned a lesson" in its deployment to Iraq. It is "easier getting to an objective than leaving it. It's the same on the grand scale. Invading Iraq was relatively easy. Leaving it is proving more difficult."

US Increases Pressure On Karzai Over Christian Convert's Fate. An Afghan court is considering the case of Abdul Rachman, an Afghan who converted to Christianity 16 years ago and faces death penalty. The Rahman case has the potential to create a rift with the US and other Western nations, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has asked President Hamid Karzai to intervene. However, the Washington Post (3/24, A14, 744K) and Washington Times (3/24, Cooney, 90K) run an AP story reporting "senior Muslim clerics demanded Thursday that an Afghan man on trial for converting from Islam to Christianity be executed, warning that if the government caves in to Western pressure and frees him, they will incite people to 'pull him into pieces.'" Moreover, the New York Times (3/24, Wafa, Rohde, 1.19M) reports "the judge presiding over the prosecution of an Afghan man facing death for converting from Islam to Christianity said Thursday that he would resist any interference, despite mounting international condemnation." Maulavi Muhaiuddin Baloch, "Karzai's adviser on religious affairs, said that the case belonged in the court and that Afghanistan's judiciary was independent."

The story was covered by each of the networks, and was the lead on both ABC and NBC. NBC Nightly News (3/23, lead story, 2:45, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Today, a senior Muslim cleric in Afghanistan said Rahman should be beheaded. The controversy prompted the Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to make a call to Afghanistan's President Hamid Karzai today." Condoleezza Rice, Secretary of State: "There is no more fundamental issue for the United States than freedom of religion and religious conscience." Seigenthaler: "With the deaths of 221 US servicemen and women who fought to oust the Taliban, and 23,000 American troops still on the ground in Afghanistan, the question that many are asking tonight is shouldn't the United States have something to say about whether Rahman is executed?" Tony Perkins, Family Research Council: "I just cannot begin to comprehend that Americans would give up their money and their sons and daughters to a regime that would execute Christians." Seigenthaler: "The Rahman case presents new political problems for President Bush." Larry Sabato, University of Virginia: "This is really President Bush's worst nightmare because it takes his base and divides it at a time when he can least afford it because he's already so low in the polls."

ABC World News Tonight (3/23, lead story, 2:45, Cuomo, 8.78M) reported, "There has been considerable foreign pressure on President Karzai to rectify the situation. And late today, the Canadian Prime Minister announced that Mr. Karzai had given assurances that Rahman will not be executed. But also today, the judge in the case said he would not bow from foreign pressure."

The CBS Evening News (3/23, story 4, 0:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice took the unusual step of phoning Afghan President Karzai and later spoke with reporters at the State Department." Condoleezza Rice, Secretary of State: "People must have a right to conscience and religious conscience. This is a very deeply concerning development in Afghanistan, and we have raised it at the highest levels." AFP (3/24) reports Rice "said she phoned Karzai specifically to hammer home 'in the strongest possible terms' Washington's concern over the proceedings against Abdul Rahman, who was arrested two weeks ago under Islamic Sharia law."

The Los Angeles Times (3/24, Richter, 958K) also reports the story, saying the "is further heightening tensions between the West and the Islamic world." USA Today (3/24, Slavin, 2.31M) reports Gary Bauer, president of American Values, "said US officials have to be 'clear and bold' in talking about the case. 'This whole enterprise is an effort to bring democratic principles to that part of the world. That means more than elections, it means religious pluralism.'" Bauer "sent an e-mail Wednesday to a quarter of a million supporters saying that the execution of the convert, Abdul Rahman, 'would very likely result in a complete collapse in support for the war.'" James Zogby, president of the Arab American Institute in Washington, "worries that the case will intensify tensions between Christians and Muslims."

US Training African Paratroopers To Counter Possible Terror Threats. ABC World News Tonight (3/23, story 7, 2:55, Karl, 8.78M) reported on the US Special Forces effort to train the militaries of African nations in the Sahara region to effectively counter possible terrorist threats. In Niger, US troops are training that country's paratroopers, earning significant good will in the process. The "land-locked, desert nation is short of resources, but full of spirit. The country's pride, its paratroopers." Maradi, Niger's "third-largest city has an airport, but no airplanes. Most of these men haven't parachuted for four years. But on this day, US Special Forces are giving them a chance to jump." A team "of 12 US Army Special Forces, some of America's best-trained soldiers, have spent a couple months here. Part of a Pentagon program to train North African armies to combat terrorism." For "these soldiers, and for the people watching below, it's also quite simply a thrill. If nothing else, the US Special Forces have made some friends in Niger."

General Suggests Conventional ICBMs As Deterrent To Terrorists. The Washington Times (3/24, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "The United States could use a force of intercontinental ballistic missiles with conventional warheads because nuclear weapons may not deter terrorists and rogue states, the general in charge of the U.S. Strategic Command says. Marine Corps Gen. James E. Cartwright told a Pentagon-sponsored missile defense conference on Monday that 'it's very difficult for a nuclear weapon to be a credible deterrent against an extremist.'"

Report Says Defense Department To Run Short Of Missile Scientists. USA Today (3/24, Kelley, 2.31M) reports a study released this week by the Defense Science Board says "the Pentagon risks running out of scientists to operate and upgrade the nation's arsenal of intercontinental nuclear and conventional missiles." The reports says that as "the nation's veteran engineers and scientists retire, the military will lose much of its expertise in long-range missile technology, the report says. That means the Air Force and Navy, which operate most of the 1960s-vintage missiles, will be unable to cope with system failures or develop improved weapons."

Albright Says "Good Vs Evil" Dichotomy "Doesn't Work." In an op-ed in the Financial Times (3/24), former Secretary Albright says the Administration's "newly unveiled national security strategy might well be subtitled 'The Irony of Iran.'" Tehran's "radical government has been vastly strengthened by the invasion of Iraq. This is more tragedy than strategy, and it reflects the Manichean approach this administration has taken to the world." Albright calls the division of the world into good and evil camps "fiction. The administration's penchant for painting its perceived adversaries with the same sweeping brush has led to a series of unintended consequences." She says the Administration "is now divided between those who understand this complexity and those who do not," and suggests the US tackle difficult problems as a way to end tyranny, renounce aggression towards Iran, and address political realities in the Middle East. The Los Angeles Times (3/24, 958K) also runs Albright's op-ed.

Muslim Criticism Of Preemption Doctrine Examined. In a USA Today op-ed (3/24), Yale University fellow Irshad Manji says, "Honesty demands that Muslims in the USA judge the doctrine of pre-emption by a single standard. That requires making a choice. We can accept what the prophet did as necessary and guided by God, in which case we can't be shocked when the president makes a similar case for his policy. Or we can acknowledge that the prophet Mohammed's pre-emptive assaults on Jews were morally wrong, in which case we've got credibility when slamming the Bush doctrine."

DOJ:

Schlozman Named Interim US Attorney For Western Missouri. The Springfield (MO) News-Leader (3/24) reports, "Bradley J. Schlozman was appointed today as interim U.S. attorney for the Western District of Missouri, the Justice Department said. … The interim appointee replaces Todd P. Graves, whose last day is Friday." The News-Leader continues, "Graves announced his resignation earlier this month, after nearly five years of prosecuting federal cases in western Missouri. Graves has said he plans to return to private practice and become more involved in politics. … Schlozman will be there until President Bush appoints a permanent replacement, probably by summer, a U.S. Attorney spokesman said."

The AP (3/24) reports, "Schlozman most recently was principal deputy assistant attorney general for the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice, where he supervised a unit that included more than 700 employees - 356 of them attorneys. … Schlozman has been with the Department of Justice since 2001. He is originally from Overland Park, Kan., and graduated with a degree in history from the University of Pennsylvania."

Flynn Begins Work As Western New York US Attorney. The Buffalo News (3/24) reports, "Terrance P. Flynn began work Wednesday as U.S. attorney for Western New York." The News continues, "The U.S. Justice Department said the Buffalo lawyer was sworn in as U.S. attorney this week, after being confirmed by the U.S. Senate. … President Bush nominated Flynn for the job last December, after Michael A. Battle accepted a Washington position as Justice Department liaison with its U.S. attorneys nationwide."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Defense Attorneys Attack Former Treasurer's Credibility. The New York Times (3/24, Barrionuevo, Bajaj) reports, "Defense lawyers began an aggressive cross-examination of Enron's former treasurer today in attempt to show the tough tactics used by the government to induce cooperative testimony from a lower-level officer against the failed energy company's onetime top executives." The Times continues, "Trying to sow seeds of doubt in the jury's mind about the damaging testimony that the treasurer, Ben F. Glisan Jr. gave against his former bosses, Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay, on Wednesday, a defense lawyer asked him today about his interactions with federal investigators and the time he spent in solitary confinement. The questioning yielded revealing details about how the government conducted its investigation and pursued officials involved in the biggest corporate scandal of the decade so far." The Times adds, "Mr. Glisan presents an interesting challenge for the defense because unlike other witnesses who have been called by the prosecution, he has little incentive to cooperate with the government. Mr. Glisan, 40, does not have a plea deal with prosecutors and is more than halfway through serving a five-year prison sentence after pleading guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud. … He is testifying under a grant of immunity from the judge for other crimes he may have committed at Enron, but Mr. Glisan could face obstruction of justice and perjury charges if he lies on the stand."

The Wall Street Journal (3/24, McWilliams, Davis) reports that Glisan had testified that Skilling and Lay "approved accounting manipulations that allowed Enron to increase earnings and hide losses while telling investors its energy businesses were a success. Under cross-examination, Mr. Glisan backed away from some of his characterizations. Mr. Glisan pleaded guilty to an Enron-related conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud and is serving a five-year prison sentence." The Journal continues, "Wednesday, Mr. Glisan described meetings with the two executives where, he said, they approved the improper use of reserves, misled investors and hid losses. He testified to the use of 'side deals' to insulate an investment partnership run by Andrew Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, from losses in its Enron dealings. … Mr. Glisan said when presented with a plan to create an investment vehicle that relied on Enron shares to hedge investments, Mr. Skilling said he wouldn't routinely approve such a vehicle, except that it allowed the company 'to circumvent accounting rules.' Yesterday, Mr. Glisan backed off from the phrase, saying he wasn't testifying to Mr. Skilling's exact words. Mr. Glisan also admitted recommending Mr. Skilling approve the investment vehicles and said he never told the former president or other executives that the hedges would be improper. … 'You lied all day yesterday, didn't you?' asked Daniel Petrocelli, lead defense attorney for Mr. Skilling. Mr. Glisan said that he told Mr. Skilling the investment vehicle didn't transfer economic risk, a violation of accounting rules, and that it could draw the scrutiny of the Securities and Exchange Commission. Mr. Petrocelli argued that the investment vehicles were approved by the company's outside auditor, attorneys and others. He suggested that while the two executives made optimistic statements in the summer and fall of 2001, they did so in the best interests of Enron stockholders."

The Washington Post (3/24, D1, Johnson) reports that Glisan "insisted that the company's financial problems were mounting even as (Lay) displayed optimism to the public. … 'What we were telling banks, rating agencies and investors was inconsistent with economic reality,' Glisan said." The Post notes, "Discrediting Glisan…is paramount to the defense case. Prosecutors used Glisan to remind the jury of their central allegations and to corroborate testimony by more personally tainted witnesses, including former finance chief Andrew S. Fastow. While Glisan shifted in his seat, repeatedly sought to clarify statements by Petrocelli and sometimes laughed in frustration during cross-examination, he did not lose his composure. However, he did retreat from some of the language he used to describe Lay's and Skilling's actions."

US Indicts Seven In Bank Of Alamo Probe. The Jackson (TN) Sun (3/24) reports, "A federal investigation into the 2002 failure of the Bank of Alamo has led to the indictments of at least seven people, according to a release from the U.S. Justice Department." The Sun continues, "On Wednesday, a federal grand jury returned indictments accusing them of various charges of conspiracy, money laundering and bank fraud, according to the release." The Sun adds, "Those named in the indictment include: Claude M. Conley, director and chairman of the Bank of Alamo Board of Directors; John Sanders, president and chief executive officer of the bank; Lazaria Saveh, William Saveh and George Eivazzadeh. The indictment says the defendants made 'and caused to be made false and fraudulent statements in the books and records of the bank.' … The indictment said the false statements were made to cover up loans made to William Saveh in excess of the bank's legal lending limit and to conceal from the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. and state regulators the true financial condition of the Bank of Alamo."

Some Doubt Need For Third Quattrone Trial. The New York Times (3/24, Creswell) reports, "What do John A. Gotti; Cendant's former chief executive, Walter A. Forbes; and Frank P. Quattrone, the former investment banker, all have in common? … As vastly different as those three cases are, they may all be threepeats, with each facing the prospect of a third trial in federal court." The Times continues, "For Mr. Quattrone, that prospect emerged on Monday after a federal appeals court overturned his 2004 conviction on obstruction of justice charges. … The ruling faulted the judge's instructions to the jury, saying that they had failed to adequately require jurors to establish that Mr. Quattrone intended to thwart a government investigation. But the appeals panel did not reject the quality of the evidence presented in the government's case, which could bolster prosecutors' decision to retry Mr. Quattrone. … 'It was thrown out because of flawed jury instructions, so I don't think we'll see the government walk away from this case,' said Robert A. Mintz, a former prosecutor and now a partner at McCarter & English." The Times notes, "But much has changed since the United States attorney's office in Manhattan began its investigation of Mr. Quattrone in 2001. The prosecutors who brought the original case have left for private practice at prestigious Manhattan law firms. By some estimates, the office has already spent thousands of hours and millions of dollars in two trials to reach a guilty verdict against Mr. Quattrone, the son of a Philadelphia garment worker who rose to become the most powerful banker in Silicon Valley during the height of the dot-com boom. … Because of the passage of time — and in the wake of a number of high-profile white-collar convictions in recent years, including Martha Stewart, Bernard J. Ebbers of WorldCom and John J. Rigas of Adelphia Communications — some lawyers wonder whether there is a need to put Mr. Quattrone's feet to the fire once again."

Judge May Set Trial Date For Former Qwest CEO. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Young) reports, "A U.S. district-court judge in Denver today is expected to set a trial date for Joseph Nacchio, the former Qwest Communications International Inc. chief executive charged with 42 counts of criminal insider trading." The Journal continues, "Judge Edward Nottingham may also rule on defense arguments for dismissal of the charges, which carry a potential prison sentence of 10 years for each count and a financial penalty of more than $100 million. … U.S. Attorney William Leone alleges Mr. Nacchio illegally sold $101 million worth of the Denver-based phone company's stock in 2001 when he knew the company wasn't doing as well as it had led investors to believe. The defense says prosecutors have presented a flimsy and flawed case." The Journal adds, "Attempts to have the charges dismissed are commonplace and carry virtually no risk for defendants, and they are rarely entirely successful, say white-collar-crime attorneys not involved in the case. … Herbert Stern, Mr. Nacchio's attorney, says his client had nothing more than vaguely worded, speculative warnings from other executives that the company might not meet financial targets if business didn't improve. That isn't the same as knowing that the company has actually faltered, according to court filings by the defense. The defense also argues that the information Mr. Nacchio had was, by definition, not significant since the prosecution hasn't claimed that it needed to be disclosed to investors."

SEC Probe Leads To Refco Files. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Mollenkamp, McDonald) reports, "Authorities and some creditors of Refco Inc. want to know more about money the brokerage firm shuttled between some of its business units in the days before it filed for bankrupty protection." The Journal continues, "They may be able to learn some important details from Christopher Sugrue, a New York money manager and past employee of Refco, which imploded just weeks after its August initial public offering when Refco disclosed that its former chief executive, Phillip Bennett, had hidden bad debts." The Journal adds, "U.S. securities regulators have been seeking information regarding such business dealings with Refco. And lawyers working for Refco unsecured creditors have sought information from Mr. Sugrue because of what court filings by those creditors describe as a 'close relationship' between the 35-year-old Long Island native and Refco, where Mr. Sugrue was an executive before he helped launch PlusFunds Group Inc. … After Refco filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy-court protection Oct. 17, the Securities and Exchange Commission visited PlusFunds' Manhattan offices and asked for a battery of records, according to a report attached to a sworn statement by S. David Peress, a crisis consultant hired by PlusFunds."

Sarbanes Defends Sarbanes-Oxley Law. In remarks to the Consumer Federation of America, Sen. Paul Sarbanes offered a defense of the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate governance law and suggested efforts to roll it back are on shay legal ground. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Hughes, 2.11M) reports, "Critics have asserted the law was enacted hastily and created too many burdens for companies. … 'It's asserted by some that the law was enacted in haste,' Mr. Sarbanes said. 'I think this is an affront to the hard work and the common sense of the members of Congress who shaped the legislation, moved it through their respective houses and voted for it. We had an extremely thorough, careful set of hearings.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Launches Probe Of Ryan Juror Over Questionnaire. The Chicago Tribune (3/24, Gibson, O'Connor, Heinzmann) reports, "A federal judge launched an investigation into a juror in the George Ryan trial Thursday hours after the Tribune reported to court officials that public records appear to show the man had hidden a felony DUI conviction from the court during jury selection." The Tribune continues, "The revelation cast a shadow over the historic prosecution of the former governor, and could potentially lead to a motion for a mistrial or form grounds for the juror's dismissal with deliberations already underway. … Court records matching the suburban juror's name and other identifying information show a conviction for aggravated drunken driving-a felony-while Ryan was secretary of state in 1995." The Tribune adds, "In a sworn questionnaire filled out by potential jurors before the trial's start last September, the juror answered 'no' when asked if he, a close friend or relative had ever been charged or accused of a crime. … State records also show that the driving privileges for a man matching the juror's name had been revoked or suspended on numerous occasions during Ryan's term as secretary of state as well. … On the questionnaire, the juror denied having any 'bad experience' with the secretary of state's office and passed on a chance to discuss anything privately with the judge. … The latest twist in the marathon trial came amid indications of dissension in the jury in its second week of deliberations and as the judge warned jurors to treat one another 'with dignity and respect.'" The Chicago Sun-Times (3/24, Korecki) notes that US District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer dismissed jurors yesterday afternoon and said that they will return Monday morning to continue deliberations. The Sun-Times adds that earlier yesterday, "Pallmeyer admonished jurors in a letter to treat one another 'with dignity and respect' and to stop breaking off into smaller groups."

The AP (3/34, Robinson) also reports on the incident and adds, "Los Angeles-based jury consultant Phil Anthony, chief executive officer of DecisionQuest Inc., said in a telephone interview Thursday that based on the turmoil of the last few days 'I suspect that this jury is not going to reach a decision.' But he said that might be prevented if Pallmeyer took strong action to refocus the jury."

Philadelphia Businessman Pleads Guilty To Bribing Mariano. The AP (3/24) reports Reinaldo Pastrana, "a businessman friend" of City Councilman Rick Mariano, "pleaded guilty Thursday to paying the councilman's health-club dues in exchange for help with a city land deal." Pastrana "did not cooperate in the case against…Mariano, who was convicted last week of 18 of 22 bribery and fraud counts. Pastrana paid $5,400 for Mariano's membership fees, while Mariano helped him acquire a city property for $100,000, far below its appraised value." The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/24, Shiffman, 423K) notes, "Last year, after the FBI investigation became public, the councilman gave the developer a backdated check to make it appear as if he had repaid him, prosecutor Kenya Mann said in a court filing. But, she said, Mariano also told Pastrana not to cash the check because he didn't have enough money in his bank account."

Murder Victim's Mother Testifies At "Mafia Cops" Trial, But Does Not Identify Defendants. Newsday (3/24, DeStefano) reports, "Betty Hydell, the murder victim's mother who helped jump-start the investigation into the so-called 'Mafia Cops,' testified Thursday but did not identify the two defendants as the men with badges who came looking for her son the day he disappeared. Hydell, whose son James went missing in September 1986, also didn't testify about how she had reportedly recognized the face of…Louis Eppolito, some years later on a television talk show," as defense lawyers had expected." But The New York Post (3/24, Haberman, 624K) notes, "Hydell was not asked to identify or whether she recognized" Eppolito or Caracappa," although "she said of the two stakeout cops: 'One was the big one, one was the little one.'" The New York Daily News (3/24, Marzulli, 729K) also reports on Hydell's testimony, under the headline "Testimony Against Mafia Cops A Dud."

Meanwhile, The New York Times (3/24, Feuer, 1.19M) reports that earlier yesterday, Steven Corso, "tax cheat, thief and disgraced accountant," was cross examined by Eppolito lawyer Bruce Cutler, after spending "the last two days…telling jurors that the two detectives moved to Las Vegas in the early 1990's and committed a smattering of federal crimes." Cutler "sought to paint the 50-year-old Mr. Corso as a debauched and profligate government pawn: a man, he said, who left $600,000 in 'unpaid lines of credit at various and sundry casinos.'"

Four In New York Arrested On Fraud Charges In Russian Pipeline Sting. Newsday (3/24, Kessler) reports, "The only thing that was real yesterday was the Republic of Buryatia. Four alleged con men believed they were about to collect $3 billion yesterday from a wealthy Nassau County hedge fund operator for the 'construction' of an oil pipeline through that obscure Siberian region, federal officials said. But the four…ended up being arrested on fraud charges by federal agents on Long Island, in Montana and in Georgia." Newsday notes, "The hedge fund operator was an unidentified Long Island man who had pleaded guilty to securities fraud and worked on sting operations for the FBI and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service to get a lighter sentence, according to court documents."

FBI Sting Leads To Indictment Of Michigan Man On Child Porn Charges. The AP (3/24) reports, "U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy on Thursday announced child pornography charges against a Flint man and said he was launching a new initiative to crack down on what he said is a growing Internet trade in such images." Alan Sain "was indicted Wednesday on charges that he enticed, coerced and used a child to engage in sexually explicit conduct and produced pictures of the acts. … In an affidavit that accompanied an initial complaint against Sain filed last week, FBI Special Agent Jennie McGlynn Emmons described posting a profile on several Yahoo! interest groups she said were associated with child exploitation. Emmons said Sain contacted her, chatted online with her and sent her child pornography."

The Detroit News (3/24, Egan) reports, "The U.S. attorney's office will seek maximum penalties for all who abuse or exploit children as part of a new initiative announced Thursday to fight child pornography." The News continues, "U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy said he has assigned seven assistant attorneys, led by Assistant Attorney John O'Brien, to become experts on child exploitation cases. … Murphy's office also will work more closely with other federal, state and local law enforcement agencies and will launch an Internet safety and awareness program in local schools, he said at a news conference in Detroit. … 'If we can't do all we can to protect (children), then we can't do much,' Murphy said. 'We intend to put these sick individuals in jail for as long as we possibly can.'"

Former Georgia Scout Leader Sentenced To Probation For Child Porn Possession. The AP (3/24) reports Samuel J. Port of Ball Ground, Georgia, "who served more than five years as a Boy Scout troop leader"was "sentenced Wednesday in federal court to eight years probation and six months of home confinement for possessing dozens of video clips of child pornography, according to a news release from the U.S. Attorney's office in Atlanta. Port came to the attention of the FBI after he brought in his employer-owned computer for maintenance, according to the release. … The FBI did a forensic scan of Port's computer and discovered more than 100 movie clips containing pornography related to young boys."

Four Charged In Nigeria E-Mail Scam. CNET News (3/23, Broache) reports, "A quartet of suspected e-mail scammers--three of them Nigerian citizens--could face scores of years in prison if convicted on fraud and conspiracy charges, the U.S. Justice Department said Thursday." CNET continues, "A grand jury in Brooklyn, N.Y., on Wednesday charged Nnamdi Chizuba Anisiobi, Anthony Friday Ehis, Kesandu Egwuonwu and another unnamed defendant with one count of conspiracy, eight counts of wire fraud and one count of mail fraud. Anisiobi also faces one count of bank fraud." CNET adds, "According to the Justice Department's charges, New York-based victims of the e-mail scams lost more than $1.2 million to the fraudsters. … Their schemes resembled a popular fraud ploy, sometimes called a 419 scam, or an advance-fee scheme, that has dogged the African nation. Their perpetrators typically send letters and e-mails to thousands of victims, offering a large sum of money and attempt to dupe them into paying fees beforehand. The criminals then pocket the cash and shirk their end of the fake bargain."

US To Seek Death Penalty For New York Drug Kingpin. The AP (3/23, Hays) reports, "The murder conspiracy trial of a notorious crack kingpin with ties to the rap music industry was postponed on Thursday after prosecutors told a judge that the Department of Justice wants him and his four co-defendants to face the death penalty." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Frederic Bloch rescheduled the trial of Kenneth 'Supreme' McGriff, previously set for April 3, for April 17. He said he would rule by April 10 on the government's death penalty request." The AP adds, "At a hearing in federal court in Brooklyn, defense attorney David Ruhnke called the government's request an 11th-hour 'sham' imposed by a pro-death penalty Justice Department and designed to buy prosecutors more time to prepare their case. He argued that the allegations don't meet the federal standards for a capital case. … Seeking death for defendant Nicole Brown — accused of being a lookout in the 2001 retaliation slaying of a rapper known as E-Money Bags — in particular 'is simply absurd,' he said." The AP notes, "Prosecutor Carolyn Pokorny insisted the request was legitimate, saying, 'It's something that got a really close look in Washington.' … McGriff was founder of the Supreme Team, once one of the city's most violent drug crews. Investigators allege that after he finished serving about nine years for drug conspiracy in 1997 he set about reviving his drug-dealing operation."

Oklahoma Doctor Indicted On Medicare Billing Fraud Charges. The Alva (OK) Review-Courier (3/24) reports Alva Dr. Gregory Glase Pinegar was indicted Thursday on charges of "fraudulently billing Medicare for the administration of significantly more medication than was actually given to his patients. … Dr. Pinegar is a family practice physician operating his own medical offices in Alva, Oklahoma, who served approximately 300 Medicare eligible patients. The indictment focuses on two prescription medications: Procrit and Remicade." The Review-Courier notes, "The case is the result of an investigation conducted by the Office of Inspector General for the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services and the Federal Bureau of Investigation."

Internet Sports Wagering Gaining In Popularity. The Las Vegas Sun (3/24, Benston) reports, "Online, or 'offshore' sports books might seem irrelevant in a town with dozens of sports books and more than 35 on the (Las Vegas) Strip alone. … That couldn't be further from the truth." The Sun continues, "Online sports betting sites aren't just flourishing in the rest of the country, where sports books are illegal everywhere except Nevada. Internet sites have found a hot spot in Nevada and especially in Las Vegas, home to one of the biggest concentration of gamblers and a place where bettors come from all over the world to hone their skills. … No one knows how much of this year's estimated $118 billion in online sports book bets will be made by Nevadans. … But experts say it's a large and growing number of people that includes many pros and even more amateurs who follow sports. … Sportingbet, which is headquartered in London and operates its computer servers from the Caribbean island of Antigua, isn't a law-abiding company, according to the Justice Department. Online sports betting also is considered illegal in Nevada, which prevents the transmission and placement of wagers by entities that aren't licensed by the state Gaming Control Board and Nevada Gaming Commission. … The Justice Department says Internet gambling is illegal in the United States based on a law known as the Wire Act. Some legal experts say the law, intended to combat illegal bookmaking by the Mafia in the 1960s, is outdated and doesn't apply to traditional casino games and poker games played online. But they generally agree that sports books are on much shakier legal ground."

FBI Agent Warns NCAA Basketball Players About Gambling. The CBS Evening News (3/23, story 8, 2:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The NCAA men's college basketball tournament is down to the so-called Sweet 16 teams," and "by now, many of the teams have gotten the pep talks from their coaches and another talk from the FBI." CBS (Acosta) added, "Before the West Virginia Mountaineers took to practice court, they had a little sit-down with the FBI." Special Agent Tom Metz: "We have a lot of people out there, whether knowingly or not, who want to be your friends. Unfortunately they want to be your friends for the wrong reasons." Acosta: "Special Agent Tom Metz was invited by the NCAA to explain how gambling on sport, especially on their own team, could ruin their lives." Metz: "What we're trying to say the student athlete is they have a lot to lose." Acosta: "West Virginia coach John Beilein welcomed the FBI's visit." Beilein: "I wished they listened to me that attentively at some of our meetings, because our guys were on the edge of their seats." Metz's meeting with the WVU players was posted yesterday on the Web sites of CBS affiliates across the country, such as KDKA-TV Pittsburgh.

Former Insurance Financier Resentenced To Federal Prison. The AP (3/24, Apuzzo) reports, "A federal judge ordered Martin Frankel on Thursday to serve the same sentence he got in 2004 for stealing $200 million from insurance companies — nearly 17 years in a federal prison." The AP continues, "The former financier was ordered resentenced after a Supreme Court ruling last year gave judges more leeway in their use of sentencing guidelines. … During a brief hearing in U.S. District Court, Judge Ellen B. Burns said she saw no reason to alter the sentence. … 'It seemed to me, that was the appropriate sentence to impose,' she said." The AP adds, "Frankel, 51, wearing baggy brown prison scrubs and large glasses, stroked a long gray beard that he grew in prison as Burns reread the 200-month sentence. He spoke only briefly, asking Burns to note that he is at risk in prison. … Burns said she would. Defense attorney William Koch elaborated after court, saying the highly publicized case, which inspired two books, made Frankel 'particularly vulnerable' to physical assaults in prison. … He will be eligible for release in 2015, according to the U.S. Bureau of Prisons. Frankel is serving his sentence at the federal prison in Otisville, N.Y. … Frankel was convicted of taking over and looting insurance companies in Arkansas, Mississippi, Oklahoma, Missouri and Tennessee."

US Files Charges In Penny-Stock Mob Case. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Bray) reports, "Men the government identifies as members of the reputed Colombo and Luchese organized-crime families were charged with manipulating the market for penny stocks as part of a broader racketeering case in Brooklyn." The Journal continues, "In an indictment unsealed yesterday, the Justice Department's U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn alleged that at least six of 10 men the Federal Bureau of Investigation arrested on racketeering charges secretly controlled at least 15 branch offices of brokerage firms in the New York City boroughs of Brooklyn, Manhattan and Staten Island, through which the men ran a scheme to artificially inflate the price of the stocks." The Journal adds, "Prosecutors said brokers misrepresented prospects of certain stocks to potential investors in exchange for large commissions. They said the defendants then sold their holdings in those stocks at inflated values, costing investors $20 million."

Pennsylvania Woman Says She Was Held Captive For 10 Years. The New York Times (3/24, Urbina) reports, "A girl who vanished more than 10 years ago was reunited yesterday with her mother in a Pittsburgh suburb two days after confiding to a store owner that she was being held captive, the police said." The woman, Tanya Nicole Kach, now 24, "was 14 when she was reported missing on Feb. 10, 1996, after walking out of her father's house, two miles from where she said she had lived in secrecy. … 'We're investigating this further, but I have to tell you there is still a lot we need to figure out,' said Charles Moffatt, superintendent of the Allegheny County Police Department." The Times adds, "Ms. Kach said she had been living against her will with Thomas Hose, 48, a security guard at Cornell Intermediate School in McKeesport, where Ms. Kach was an eighth grader when she was reported missing, Mr. Moffatt said. For the first four years of captivity, she told the police, she was never permitted to leave the two-bedroom house, and Mr. Hose threatened to kill her if she told anyone about her captivity."

USA Today (3/24, Dorell) reports, "Allegheny County Police Superintendent Charles Moffatt said Kach was a runaway and had been living at the home of a security guard from her middle school who held her indoors for four years. He told her she was stupid and unwanted by anyone but him, Kach said. She was just 2 miles from her father's house she had fled in McKeesport, Pa. … Thomas Hose, 48, was suspended from his job Thursday and arrested on charges of statutory sexual assault and involuntary deviate sexual intercourse. His lawyer, James Ecker, said Hose did not hold the girl against her will."

Evidence Of Pellicano's Wiretapping Used In Suit. The New York Times (3/24, Halbfinger, Weiner) reports, "A screenwriter and his lawyer talk on the phone. They are in the heat of legal battle with a big-time producer over the profits from a hit movie. The lawyer says which of their arguments he thinks are strongest and how much he thinks their opponents will agree to pay in a settlement. … Unbeknownst to both of them, Anthony Pellicano is listening in, and taking notes, court filings say." The Times continues, "Mr. Pellicano, the celebrity detective charged with wiretapping and conspiracy in the biggest Hollywood scandal in generations, stands accused of intercepting conversations of scores of unwitting people, many involved in high-profile lawsuits. … But what the federal indictment of Mr. Pellicano failed to spell out was just how he put his wiretaps to use." The Times adds, "Now, the first direct evidence of eavesdropping by Mr. Pellicano has surfaced in newly filed court documents: excerpts of what prosecutors have described as Mr. Pellicano's summaries of conversations he intercepted in 2001 between Vincent Zenga, a screenwriter and producer known as Bo, and his lawyer, Gregory S. Dovel, during their contentious suit against the influential Hollywood executive Brad Grey, now head of Paramount Pictures."

Pentagon Orders Inquiry Into Cunningham Earmarks. Undersecretary of Defense Stephen Carbone has ordered an internal inquiry into how funding earmarked by former Rep. Duke Cunningham resulted in contracts for MZM Inc. to do work for the Pentagon's intelligence agency, the Counterintelligence Field Activity. The Washington Post (3/24, A6, Pincus, 744K) reports that Cunningham pleaded guilty to tax evasion and taking bribes from contractors including the MZM's former president of Mitchell J. Wade, who "pleaded guilty last month to bribery-related charges and to making illegal campaign contributions to Cunningham and other legislators."

Government Raises $94,000 At Auction Of Cunningham Property. The government yesterday auctioned some of Rep. Randy Cunningham's ill-gotten gains yesterday, raising $94,000 to pay for his restitution and back taxes. The story was covered by ABC and NBC late in their newscasts.

ABC World News Tonight (3/23, story 11, 1:30, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Here today in California, the government auctioned off the trappings of luxury that caught Representative Randy Cunningham in the worst corruption scandal Congress has ever known. The eight-term Republican is in prison for accepting $2.5 million in bribes and cheating on his taxes." The government "is also selling Cunningham's yacht and multi-million dollar mansion to pay his back taxes and restitution for his crimes. For the buyers, there was a measure of satisfaction, in seeing the treasures of a tainted politician on the auction bloc."

NBC Nightly News (3/23, story 11, 0:30, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "The loot included Persian rugs marble top antique tables, and ornate furniture, much of it given to Cunningham by defense contractors in exchange for steering business their way. At the end of the day, the auction brought in a modest $94,000."

The New York Times (3/24, Broder, 1.19M) reports that the 35 items "brought the government $94,625, about two-thirds of the $150,000 that the military contractors who gave the items to Mr. Cunningham as bribes reportedly paid for them." Proceeds from the auction "will go to the Internal Revenue Service's criminal investigation division and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, two of the agencies that investigated Mr. Cunningham's crimes."

The Los Angeles Times (3/23, Suarez, Perry, 958K) reported on its web site that the auction "drew little response this morning, despite heavy advance publicity. Few among the hundreds of people who showed up at the regular IRS auction at a cavernous warehouse in Rancho Dominguez were aware that the infamous politician's belongings were available."

Asian Gang Member Convicted Of 2002 Virginia Slaying. The Washington Post (3/24, B1, Jackman) reports, "An Asian gang member who shot and killed a rival gang member in 2002, then fled to Canada for more than two years, was convicted yesterday of first-degree murder by a Fairfax County jury." The Post continues, "The jury then recommended that Henh Ngo, 22, of Springfield be sentenced to 26 years in prison -- 23 years for murder and three years for using a gun during a felony. Fairfax Circuit Court Judge Jane Marum Roush will sentence Ngo on May 25. Under Virginia law, she may not increase but could decrease the jury's recommended sentence." The Post adds, "Prosecutors told the jury that members of a gang called Asian Young and Dangerous, or AYD, jumped and pummeled two members of the gang Asian Dragon Family, or ADF, at Springfield Mall in mid-December 2002. One of the victims in that case was Ngo, then 19 years old and well-known in the gang community as 'Phi Lu,' or 'Fat Guy,' witnesses testified."

DC Development Firm Executive Indicted In Deepening Corruption Probe. The Washington Times (3/24, McElhatton) reports, "The financial officer for one of the District's most prominent development companies has been indicted on conspiracy and federal tax-evasion charges." The Times continues, "The charges against John E. Brownell, chief financial officer for Douglas Development Corp., come months after federal authorities indicted company President Douglas Jemal and two other executives amid an investigation into corruption in the city's Office of Property Management." The Times adds, "Mr. Brownell's attorney, Barry Coburn, said yesterday his client disputes the indictment, which was filed Tuesday. … 'We are very disappointed that the U.S. Attorney's Office has seen fit to indict Mr. Brownell, and we look forward to the opportunity to vindicate him at trial,' he said. … The 18-page indictment states Mr. Brownell received 'secret payments' from the company president and another individual at the company, identified only as 'Conspirator A.' Mr. Jemal is the company president. … Prosecutors said Mr. Brownell failed to file federal income-tax returns from 1994 to 1998 and that he evaded paying income taxes from 1998 to 2003. … A U.S. Attorney's Office spokesman said yesterday the conspiracy and tax-evasion charges against Mr. Brownell each carry a maximum of five years in prison."

Social Security Card Forgery Seen As Increasing Problem. NBC Nightly News (3/23, story 9, 2:30, Lewis, 9.87M) reported, "This undercover video, shot by agents of the Federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement Service, was used to help convict this man of forging Social Security cards and other government IDs, a practice that often victimizes innocent people, like 2-year-old Tyler Lybbert of Draper, Utah." Someone else "was using a Social Security number identical to Tyler's, part of a mushrooming problem in this country involving the making and selling of phony IDs." Kevin Jeffrey, special agent, Immigration and Customs enforcement: "The document vendors themselves, they just make up random numbers." Lewis: "Special Agent Kevin Jeffrey of Immigration and Customs Enforcement says computers make it easy for the forgers. … He says Los Angeles, with its huge population of illegal immigrants, is the counterfeit document capital of America."

Baltimore, DC Cardinals Lobby Against Maryland Sex Abuse Bills. The Washington Post (3/24, B5, Murphy) reports, "Roman Catholic Church officials are putting a full-court press on Maryland legislators to reject bills that would extend the time allowed for victims of childhood sex abuse to file lawsuits against abusers and their employers." The Post continues, "Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick of the Washington archdiocese and Cardinal William H. Keeler of the Baltimore archdiocese have gotten involved, expressing opposition to the bills to House Judiciary Committee members directly or through intermediaries. The archdioceses also have hired a prominent Annapolis lobbying firm, Schwartz & Metz, to supplement the efforts of the Maryland Catholic Conference, their regular lobbying arm. … 'Almost everyone on the committee has acknowledged to me that the church has called them or called their ministers about the bill, and they are meeting with every member of the committee, including me,' said Del. Pauline H. Menes (D-Prince George's), the bills' principal sponsor." The Post notes, "Under Maryland law, lawsuits by childhood abuse victims can be filed until the victim is 25. The two bills would significantly ease that restriction. One would let victims file suit until they are 42; the other would open a two-year window during which victims of any age could sue. … Supporters say the bills are needed because victims typically do not report the abuse until they are in their thirties or forties. Church officials say it would be hard for defendants to present an adequate defense decades after an alleged incident, and they note that Maryland has no time limit on criminal charges against a child abuser."

CIVIL LAW:

Groups Say School Districts Not Complying With Bush Education Law. The Washington Times (3/24, Price, 90K) reports two national groups "promoting education reform have filed complaints against two California public-school systems, charging that they are violating federal law by not telling parents of children in failing schools about transfer options." The "joint complaints of the Alliance for School Choice and the Coalition on Urban Renewal and Education were filed yesterday against the Los Angeles Unified School District -- California's largest -- and the Compton Unified School District." The groups "say the districts are not complying with terms of the No Child Left Behind Act in that they are forcing many students to remain in low-performing schools for years and are not notifying parents that the federal law gives them the right to transfer their children to better-performing public schools."

Spellings Criticized Over Enforcement Of NCLB. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, A10, 2.11M) says in an editorial that "the California districts singled out in the filing aren't the only ones skirting the law. Similar violations have been reported in Baltimore, Chicago, Detroit, New York and elsewhere. A Government Accountability Office report from 2004 found that some three million children in 5,300 schools nationwide were eligible for choice under NCLB, but only about 1% were exercising the option." But the "reason school districts have been able to get away with this behavior is that no one is holding their feet to the fire. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings has chosen to hand out exemptions or look the other way instead of enforcing the law."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Texas Youth Commission Seeks DOJ Help In Prison Probes. The Brownsville (TX) Herald (3/24, Pierson) reports, "The Texas Youth Commission has asked the U.S. Department of Justice for help in assessing the way it reports and investigates abuse against youth in state juvenile prisons." The Herald continues, "If TYC does not turn the tide of abuse, the state may face legal action, an American Civil Liberties Un-ion representative told a Texas House committee on Wednesday." The Herald adds, "Dwight Harris, executive director of TYC, asked the Justice Department on Thursday for help, after a months-long investigation by Rio Grande Valley Freedom Newspapers about the seven-year trend of increasing abuse against youth. … Findings published in The Brownsville Herald on Sunday showed that by 2005, three of every 100 youth in the TYC were being abused physically, a seven-fold increase from 1999. Injuries by youth against officers increased 70 percent in five years."

Judge Orders Federal Monitor For Virgin Islands Prison. The St Thomas (VI) Source (3/24, Probasco) reports, "A U.S. district judge found the V.I. government in contempt Thursday and ordered a federal monitor to fix 'constitutional violations' at the Golden Grove prison in St. Croix." The Source continues, "Judge George W. Cannon Jr. said the Virgin Islands was in violation of a 1986 order to resolve unconstitutional medical, sanitation and safety conditions at the prison, where an inmate Tuesday was stabbed to death and five others were injured in a brawl. … In his 32-page order, Cannon wrote, 'the court concludes that there are continuing and ongoing constitutional violations of the rights of individuals held at Golden Grove Adult Correctional Facility and Detention Center, and (the) defendants are in contempt of the court's orders.'" The Source adds, "Attorneys for the U.S. Justice Department asked Cannon to appoint the federal monitor, called a special master, to resolve lingering problems at the prison, calling conditions there 'deplorable.' … V.I. Attorney General Kerry Drue argued that the prison was improving and a special master was not needed."

Title IX Lawsuit Against University Of Colorado Again Rejected By U.S. Judge. The AP (3/24, Banda) reports, "A federal judge rejected a request to revive the lawsuit at the heart of the University of Colorado recruiting scandal, saying Thursday that two women who claimed they were sexually assaulted by athletes had not proven their claim against the school was valid. Attorneys for the women immediately promised an appeal." The claimants alleged the school violated Title IX by "fostering an atmosphere that led to their alleged assaults at a 2001 off-campus party." U.S. District Judge Robert Blackburn "tossed out the lawsuit a year ago, and said Thursday the women had not changed his mind after arguing there was new evidence showing coaches and trainers were aware of similar problems before the alleged assaults."

Reporting Sex Harassment At Naval Academy Gains Respect. The Washington Post (3/24, B8, Rivera) reports, "Midshipmen who report sexual harassment at the U.S. Naval Academy are increasingly viewed with respect by other midshipmen, and more students believe the campus provides a positive environment for women, a new survey shows." The Post continues, "Academy officials say the responses represent big leaps forward in how male and female students view academy culture. The results also come as reports of sexual assault at the academy have been increasing, in part because of an effort to encourage victims to report incidents, officials say." The Post adds, "About 3,000 midshipmen -- most of the sophomore, junior and senior classes -- responded to the academy's annual quality of life and values survey in October. Asked whether midshipmen at the Annapolis college who report sexual harassment are respected, resented or neither, 65 percent of women said 'respected.' Just 5 percent said 'resented.' … Two years ago, 66 percent of women checked 'resented' to the same question. … Fifty-six percent of men also said 'respected.' It was the first time in at least the last five surveys, the only data available yesterday, in which the majority of both sexes answered positively."

Fairfax County Officer Will Not Be Charged In Fatal Shooting. The Washington Post (3/24, B5, Jackman) reports, "The Fairfax County police officer who shot an unarmed man to death in January will not be charged with a crime, the county's chief prosecutor announced yesterday, and the man's family angrily responded by claiming that a civilian in the same situation would have been arrested." The Post continues, "From the start, Fairfax police declared that the killing of Salvatore J. Culosi, 37, was an accident and that the SWAT officer who fired had done so unintentionally. Fairfax Commonwealth's Attorney Robert F. Horan Jr. said that when a person fires a gun without malice and unintentionally kills someone, 'they do not commit a crime.' … 'I feel for the family of the victim in this case,' Horan said. 'You have to. But I also feel for the police officer. This is a good police officer. Fine record, almost 17 years. He's as shattered by this as any good police officer should be.'" The Post adds, "The officer is Deval V. Bullock, 40, a longtime member of Fairfax's SWAT team, numerous sources familiar with the case said. … Bernard DiMuro, the Culosi family's attorney, said: 'A pointed gun with a finger on the trigger is not an accident. There is no doubt that had the shooter not been a police officer, he would have been charged criminally, and a jury would have decided the issue.' He said Horan could have charged the officer with second-degree murder or manslaughter. … The Culosis also questioned whether the police could fairly investigate themselves and whether Horan had received a complete investigation. The family sent a letter to the Fairfax Board of Supervisors asking it to review the case, and to review police policies on the use of force and the use of SWAT teams as well."

Gay Marriage Issues Advancing In Courts, Legislatures. While gay rights advocates are pushing the legalization of gay marriage in state courts, gay marriage opponents seeking to ban the unions are gaining ground in state legislatures. USA Today (3/24, Biskupic, 2.31M) reports "The contrasting strategies reflect how judges have begun to show a willingness to expand the rights of same-sex couples at a time when many state lawmakers — and most Americans — are cool to the idea." USA adds, "Several key developments are likely soon. The top state courts in Washington state and New Jersey have heard arguments brought by gay men and lesbians. Either court could open the door to a second state joining Massachusetts in allowing same-sex marriages. … Meanwhile, the Alliance for Marriage and other groups against same-sex marriage hope to win legislative ballot initiatives this year in Alabama, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin. The measures would amend state constitutions to ban same-sex marriages."

Lawsuits Challenge Policies Against Same Sex Marriage. A separate story in USA Today (3/24, Biskupic, 2.31M) reports on lawsuits "challenging policies against same-sex marriages. … The lawsuits, sponsored by the American Civil Liberties Union and gay rights groups such as Lambda Legal, utilize carefully selected plaintiffs and locales. They argue that particular state constitutions contain a right to same-sex marriage. The lawsuits were inspired largely by a 2003 ruling by Massachusetts' highest court that led to that state being the first to legalize such unions. … Such lawsuits are awaiting rulings by the top state courts in Washington state and New Jersey. Similar lawsuits are making their way through state courts in California, Connecticut, Iowa, Maryland and New York."

American Muslims Getting More Involved In Civil, Political Life. The 9/11 attacks have had what USA Today (3/24, Lawrence, 2.31M) calls "double-edged impact on the political emergence of American Muslims. They are up against more stereotyping and backlash," and at the same time, the attacks "jolted Muslims into realizing that they needed to make themselves known to their neighbors and heard by their government. They are voting, running for office and getting more involved in civic and political life at every level, from PTAs and school boards to town councils and state legislatures." USA adds, "This large-scale entry of Muslims into public life is not only testing the courage of Muslim candidates and the tolerance of voters. It's also prompting politicians to take notice of a community that has growing clout and is open to appeals from both parties."

Abortion Law Could See Shift With Change In "Undue Burden" Standard. Knight Ridder (3/24, Henderson) reports, "The latest high-profile battle in the abortion wars may prove to be a sideshow to a monumental shift in abortion law that could take place this fall." Knight Ridder continues, "South Dakota legislators enacted a sweeping ban on abortion last month that will retest the strength of Roe v. Wade, the landmark 1973 Supreme Court decision that overturned all state laws banning or restricting abortion. Other states are threatening to follow suit as anti-abortion activists flex what they think is new muscle: two new Supreme Court justices who are thought to be less sympathetic to abortion rights." Knight Ridder adds, "Legal experts say the courts almost certainly will strike down South Dakota's ban in short order. But this fall, when the Supreme Court considers the federal ban on late-term abortions, the justices could make it easier for state legislators to pass stringent restrictions on abortion without much fear that the courts might overturn them. … The high court could force those who challenge abortion restrictions to prove that restrictive laws prevent a significant number of women from getting abortions. Currently, the courts bar restrictions if it's plausible that they could impose burdens on women seeking abortions. … Such a ruling would validate many abortion laws that can't now survive court scrutiny, and in some states it would render abortion all but inaccessible to many women. … All this could happen without the court even touching on the core debate over abortion rights."

Montgomery County Police Chief Urges Closing Of Union's Internet Forum. The Washington Post (3/24, Londoño) reports, "Montgomery County Police Chief J. Thomas Manger called on the department's union yesterday to take down an online message board that some police officers have used as a forum for disparaging, and sometimes racist, remarks about colleagues, supervisors, immigrants and other members of the community." The Post continues, "The union said it would not shut down the board, saying that it serves a legitimate purpose and that doing so would curtail officers' right to free speech. … The offensive messages were roundly condemned by county officials and community leaders." The Post adds, "Some of the messages, copies of which were published in The Washington Post yesterday, refer to Latino immigrants as 'beaners.' Others make sexual references to female officers and disparage some officers as 'racists.'"

Women-Led Hedge Fund Hit With Pregnancy-Bias Suit. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Dugan) reports, "E. Lee Hennessee became one of the most prominent women in the hedge-fund business, building a booming firm counseling rich clients. But how woman-friendly is her firm? … The question was raised by a former employee in a lawsuit filed Wednesday in New York state court against Ms. Hennessee; her husband, Charles Gradante; and their firm, Hennessee Group LLC." The Journal continues, "Leeana Piscopo, a 29-year-old former senior vice president, claims that she was fired in January after revealing she was pregnant. The father: Hennessee's public-relations manager, Alex Smith-Ryland, who is also 29. … The lawsuit was the latest of many pregnancy-related cases against employers. The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, along with state and local agencies, last year received 4,449 complaints from employees complaining of bias after pregnancy -- a jump of 31% from 1992. Last year, EEOC reaped $11.6 million in rewards in pregnancy-related cases. One reason, says the agency: Women are increasingly attempting to juggle career and family at the same time that companies are increasing workloads."

ANTITRUST:

Court Rejects Injunction Against Stolt Antitrust Indictment. The AP (3/24) reports, "Trading of Stolt-Nielsen SA's shares was halted Thursday, after a federal appeals court reversed a lower court injunction blocking the Department of Justice from indicting the chemical transportation company and its officials for alleged antitrust violations." The AP continues, "The injunction stopping the Department of Justice from prosecuting Stolt-Nielsen -- a company that cooperated with the government in criminal antitrust prosecutions in the international carrier industry -- was issued by a District Court judge in January 2005." The AP adds, "That injunction came after a decision by the Department of Justice to kick Stolt-Nielsen out of the government's Corporate Leniency Program for allegedly continuing illegal anticompetitive activity longer than it admitted. … The two-judge panel of the Third Circuit Court of Appeals said that the District Court did not have the authority to enforce an amnesty agreement before an indictment. The appeals court remanded the case back to the lower court and did not address the merits of the company's amnesty defense. … Stolt-Nielsen said it plans to file a petition for a rehearing."

Bayer Makes $19.73 Billion Bid For Schering. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Whalen, Singer, Esterl) reports, "Bayer AG's friendly bid for fellow German drug maker Schering AG, which tops a hostile bid by Merck KGaA, is aimed at creating a pharmaceutical giant capable of competing with U.S. and European rivals, which have eclipsed Germany's once-mighty drug industry." The Journal continues, "Schering said its executive board backed Bayer's offer, valued at €16.34 billion ($19.73 billion), making it unlikely another bidder will emerge. If approved by Schering's shareholders, the two companies plan to combine their prescription-drug businesses into a new firm called Bayer-Schering Pharmaceuticals with anticipated sales of more than €9 billion a year and headquarters in Berlin. … Bayer-Schering Pharmaceuticals' revenue would exceed that of Schering-Plough Corp. of the U.S., which is unrelated to the German Schering. Bayer also has a large over-the-counter drug business and, including Schering's prescription drug operations, Bayer would become one of the world's biggest drug makers."

The New York Times (3/24, Landler) reports, "Schering, based in Berlin, said it would recommend the offer to its shareholders, an indication that Bayer was likely to complete the takeover unless Merck raised its bid or yet another suitor entered the fray. An executive close to Merck said it would assess the offer before deciding how to respond. … For Bayer, the deal is a striking return to its roots. Bayer has struggled in drugs since the recall of its anticholesterol treatment Baycol over safety concerns in 2001, and it tried fruitlessly a few years ago to find a partner for its troubled pharmaceutical business. … Although health care products now account for less than 40 percent of Bayer's annual revenues, which were about $30.5 billion last year, the Schering acquisition could make health care the largest part of Bayer, with projected sales of $18 billion a year."

The Financial Times (3/24, Saigol, Weismann) reports, "The Bayer/Schering deal will not preclude Merck from returning with a higher offer. Although Merck has not ruled out sweetening its terms, Wilhelm Simson, chairman of Merck's supervisory board, has said the company would first wait to see if other bidders came forward. … Merck had planned to finance its bid through a combination of bank debt, cash, a rights issue, and a €1bn investment from the Merck family and has said it is committed to maintaining its investment-grade rating." The Times notes, "Bayer, which, invented aspirin more than 100 years ago, is headed by Werner Wenning, chief executive. During the past 18 months, it has bought the over-the-counter drugs unit of Roche, the Swiss drugs company, and spun off the bulk of its chemicals operations as a new listed entity called Lanxess. … The group has also placed its hopes in bringing to market new home-made patented drugs, with US regulators giving a potential blockbuster anti-cancer drug the green light late last year."

Dow Jones (3/23, McGrath, Schrimpff) reports, "Bayer said the deal would be funded through liquidity of around EUR3 billion and a credit line provided by Credit Suisse and Citigroup, which would later be refinanced through bank loans and debt. The planned equity capital measures will total EUR4 billion, it added. Further financing would be raised through the sale of plastics units H.C. Starck and Wolff Walsrode units."

there are no further antitrust issues to consider in the merger of Salt Lake City-based EnergySolutions with Duratek Inc. Maryland-based Duratek said Thursday that a month-long waiting period mandated by the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act of 1976 -- an antitrust regulation that automatically triggers a 30-day review whenever an investor seeks to acquire either a 15 percent stake, or a stake valued at more than $15 million, in a particular security -- ended this week without any indication the Justice Department wants more time to review the merger, which will create the nation's largest full-service nuclear waste company." Even so, the Tribune notes, the $396 million deal, remains months from approval. "Publicly traded Duratek needs shareholder approval, and a vote has not been scheduled yet, said Diane R. Brown, who leads the company's investor relations."

EU Approves Time Warner-CBS Venture. The AP (3/24) reports, "European Union antitrust regulators cleared the Warner Bros. network's 50-50 joint venture with CBS Corp.'s UPN television network on Thursday, saying there were no competition concerns on the plan for the European market." The AP continues, "The two networks will combine to form a new broadcast network called CW. They decided to join forces after struggling in the U.S. ratings." The AP adds, "The venture was fast-tracked for approval by the EU, meaning it saw no significant antitrust problems and received no complaints from rivals."

Medtronic Patent Dispute Fuels Debate On Guidant Impact. Dow Jones (3/24, Kamp) reports, "Medtronic Inc.'s recent purchase of the rights to certain patents covering stent medical devices could inject the company into the acquisition saga involving rivals Boston Scientific Corp., Guidant Corp. and Abbott Laboratories Inc. … That's because Medtronic believes a key Guidant stent product infringes on those patents, and Guidant's product plays a key role in the company's coming acquisition by Boston Scientific and Abbott. Medtronic and a Citigroup analyst made a case Thursday for the patents' validity." Dow Jones adds, "There is argument, though, about whether the latest patent claims bear watching or simply mix with the chaff in the competitive $5 billion to $6 billion stent business. The sector sees frequent litigation as companies jockey for position, and other analysts who weighed in Thursday suggested the latest Medtronic suit is more of the same. … At issue are stents, tiny tubes that prop open arteries, and Medtronic's purchase in February of patent rights for bare-metal stents from a private Canadian company called Evysio. Medtronic the same month filed in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California claiming, among other things, that Guidant's 'Vision' stent violated the patents."

Boston Scientific Makes Antitrust Pledges To EU. Dow Jones (3/24) reports, "Boston Scientific Corp. said late Thursday it has made certain commitments to the European Commission as part of its antitrust review of Boston Scientific's acquisition of Guidant Corp." Dow Jones adds, "The details of the commitments are confidential, Boston Scientific said, but are not material to the deal and will become public when the EC completes its review and announces its decision. … The commitments extend the normal five-week EC review period to up to seven weeks, meaning that the review will finish no later than April 13."

Lucent In Merger Talks With Alcatel. The New York Times (3/24, Sorkin, Belson) reports, "Lucent Technologies, the phone equipment maker that became a symbol of last decade's boom-and-bust cycle in telecommunications, is in negotiations to be acquired by Alcatel of France for about $12.6 billion, people close to the discussions said last night." The Times continues, "The two companies confirmed the talks last night in a statement, saying they were 'engaged in discussions about a potential merger of equals.'" The Times adds, "After several years of mergers on a huge scale among telephone companies — local, long-distance and wireless — a deal for Lucent would be the first big step toward a shakeout among the companies that make the equipment for the phone service providers. … The prospect of a big trans-Atlantic deal comes at a time when foreign takeovers have been political flashpoints in both Washington and Paris. A Dubai company's acquisition of some United States port terminals created an uproar in Congress, while the French government has sought to thwart cross-border takeovers in energy and pharmaceuticals."

The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Berman, Silver, Latour) reports, "A linkup between the two, anticipated since a deal attempt failed five years ago, could help both realize substantial cost savings and likely would kick off a new round of consolidation among the already-pressured companies that supply equipment to phone companies. … Lucent Technologies Chief Executive Patricia Russo would be the chief executive of the combined company, people familiar with the matter said. And the two firms would have equal representation of a new board of directors, these people add." The Journal adds, "Given the cultural and logistical challenges, moreover, a merger could prove to be among the more complicated recent couplings in the industry. With protectionist sentiment growing in both the U.S. and Europe, a merger could prove a critical test of cross-border cooperation for the French and U.S. governments. … Consolidation pressure has been growing in the equipment business amid a wave of telecom deals and the emergence of more-efficient technologies. That has limited the amount of money that big phone companies have to spend on equipment. The result has been too many equipment makers chasing a limited amount of business."

Christian Group Backs Off Infringement Case Against Parody Blogger. USA Today (3/24, Swartz) reports, "A Christian group that promotes heterosexuality Thursday quietly dropped its beef against a blogger who poked fun at it." USA continues, "Exodus International initially claimed the altered image of one of its billboards by Justin Watt infringed its copyright. But Exodus is no longer pursuing the matter after Watt stopped using its 'watermark' logo, Exodus President Alan Chambers said." USA adds, "Watt, operator of the Justinsomnia blog, says he exercised free speech when he parodied the Exodus billboard, which says, 'Gay? Unhappy? www.exodus.to.' Wyatt re-created the billboard on his site so it read, 'Straight? Unhappy? www.gay.com.'" USA adds, "(Exodus uses '.to' as its domain suffix because '.com' was not available.)" USA notes, "Watt, 26, a Web developer in Northern California who enlisted the aid of the American Civil Liberties Union and high-powered law firm Fenwick & West, has posted his blog for four years. He posted the parody Sept. 19 because he found Exodus' message "offensive." A lawyer representing Exodus sent Watt a cease-and-desist letter on March 2. … The dust-up has made Watt a cause célbre among bloggers. More than 40 other websites now carry the spoof."

Private Equity Firm Set To Bid On 12 Knight Ridder Newspapers. The Washington Post (3/24, D3, Levingston) reports, "The Yucaipa Cos., a Los Angeles-based private equity investment firm, plans to bid Tuesday for the 12 Knight Ridder Inc. newspapers put up for sale by McClatchy Co." The Post continues, "Yucaipa would not say how much it intends to offer for the papers, including the Philadelphia Inquirer, the San Jose Mercury News and the Akron Beacon Journal." The Post adds, "The papers became available after McClatchy last week bought the Knight Ridder chain of 32 papers and announced it would divest itself of 12 dailies in what it said were slower-growth markets. … Robert Hall, a Yucaipa adviser and former publisher of the Inquirer and Philadelphia Daily News, said the firm would make its bid Tuesday, when preliminary offers are due. He added that, if successful, the private fund would take a long-term approach to its investment, freeing the papers from having to meet the pressures of Wall Street. … Other bidders are possible. Analysts expect Gannett Co., the nation's largest newspaper publisher, to submit offers for at least some of the dailies. Gannett would not comment on its plans but its top executives, speaking in New York yesterday, indicated the company was studying the situation."

WPost Says Maryland Lawmakers, Electric Utility Should Level With Public. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/24, A18, 744K) says that Maryland lawmakers and its electric power industry were "reckless" in the state's "current tumult over residential electricity bills." The Post adds that "both the utility and the lawmakers should level with the public by explaining that sharply higher electric bills -- even if they exact their pain gradually rather than all at once -- are a fact of life for the near term. To pretend otherwise is to ignore the market, and reality."

US Charges Utah Refinery With Pollution Violations. The AP (3/24, Hummel) reports, "A Pennsylvania-based metals refinery and two of its managers have been indicted on federal charges of polluting water and conspiring to violate environmental laws, the U.S. Department of Justice said Thursday." The AP continues, "Johnson Matthey Inc. and John David McKelvie, director of gold and silver operations for North America and Europe and former general manager at the West Valley City plant, and Paul Card Greaves, former plant manager, were indicted by a federal grand jury Wednesday night. … They are accused of violating environmental laws by concealing high levels of the chemical element selenium found in waste water from the metals refinery, according to court documents." The AP adds, "Johnson Matthey, based in Wayne, Pa., has a gold and silver refining plant in West Valley City, a suburb of Salt Lake City. … The company is accused of releasing larger amounts of selenium than it was allowed by permit into sewers. The indictment alleges that the company exceeded its monthly limit on selenium discharges 12 times between January 2000 and May 2002. … The waste water from the refinery is processed by a treatment plant that empties water into the Jordan River and the Great Salt Lake, which are part of a shorebird reserve where millions of migratory birds stop each year. … 'The defendants are charged with not only illegally discharging contaminated waste water, but also engaging in a concerted effort to cover it up,' Granta Y. Nakayama, an assistant administrator for the Environmental Protection Agency, said in a statement."

Nevada Files Another Suit In Yucca Fight. The AP (3/24, Ritter) reports, "Nevada sued the federal government Wednesday, accusing it of withholding documents that show the planned Yucca Mountain nuclear dump cannot safely hold the nation's radioactive waste." The AP continues, "The complaint, filed in Reno, is the fourth federal lawsuit the state has pending against the plan to bury 77,000 tons of nuclear waste in the Nevada desert, 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas." The AP adds, "The case seeks the release of a draft application prepared by contractors seeking a Nuclear Regulatory Commission license to open the dump. … 'The federal government is required by law to share its important Yucca information with the host state, and we are entitled to such information under the Freedom of Information Act as well,' Nevada Attorney General George Chanos said in a statement. … An Energy Department spokesman in Washington said the agency has made public on the Internet millions of pages about the project, but was under no legal obligation to release the draft application."

GAO Says Yucca Mountain Questions Have Not Been Put To Rest. A GAO report says the Energy Department's reorganization of the Yucca Mountain nuclear waster dump project has yet to put questions about the quality of scientific and engineering work to rest and may create new issues. The AP (3/23, Werner) reported, "Among the problems cited by the GAO was high turnover of project managers. Nine of 17 key management positions have turned over since 2001, the GAO said, and the director of quality assurance was among them. The report also said that despite substantial time and money spent resolving quality assurance issues, the Energy Department has not developed effective management tools to detect and solve problems. The report recommended strengthening quality guidelines and analysis of problems."

EPA Relaxing Some Diesel Emission Standards. The EPA is relaxing some emission standards for diesel cars in an effort to get more the fuel efficient vehicles on the road. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Meckler, 2.11M) reports, "The EPA said that over time, the new standards will be better for the environment because auto makers that opt for the exemption will be required to engineer their cars to stay clean longer. Diesel manufacturers praised the move, calling it a narrow exception that will give a boost to a promising technology." However, "environmentalists complain that the change allows diesel cars, which produce more pollution than gasoline-powered cars, to spew more smog-causing nitrogen oxide, at least at the beginning. They also argued that the rule change sets a bad precedent by allowing cars that use one particular technology to meet different standards."

Meatpacker Sues USDA Over Mad Cow Testing. A Kansas meatpacker has sued the federal government for refusing to allow it to test for mad cow disease in every animal it slaughters. Creekstone Farms Premium Beef says its Japanese customers want the testing, but the company's lawsuit says the USDA threatened criminal prosecution if the company conducts the tests. The AP (3/23, Quaid) reported, "Private companies certified by the department make screening tests used to detect mad cow disease. The department says it has sole authority over the sale and use of the tests. Department officials say they oppose 100 percent testing because it does not ensure food safety. The disease is difficult to detect in younger animals, which are the source of most beef."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

In Ongoing Feud, Weld Recounts D'Amato's Expletive-Laced Letter About Mueller. The New York Times (3/24, Chan, Roberts, 1.19M) reports that in the ongoing political feud between former Sen. Alfonse D'Amato and New York gubernatorial candidate, and former Massachusetts governor, William Weld, "Yesterday, Mr. Weld struck back in force, telling how their feud dated at least to a 1996 encounter in which Mr. D'Amato gave him $750,000 in donations for his Senate campaign" and included "an expletive-laced warning: that Mr. Weld distance himself from Robert S. Mueller III, who…oversaw a federal fraud investigation of Mr. D'Amato's brother, Armand, in the early 1990's. 'If I ever see that expletive Mueller at an expletive fund-raiser, I'm going to get every expletive dollar of this back out of your hide,' Mr. Weld…quoted Mr. D'Amato as saying." D'Amato "yesterday vigorously denied that the encounter had taken place and said he had not even met Mr. Weld until recently," but "newspaper articles indicate that Mr. D'Amato introduced Mr. Weld at a 1996 Republican fund-raiser."

The New York Daily News (3/24, Saltonstall, 729K) reports on D'Amato's alleged remark about Mueller and notes, "The comment drew a blistering response yesterday from D'Amato, who called Weld's version of events a 'vicious, preposterous story.' 'He must be rather desperate,' D'Amato said." Newsday (3/24, Madore) also reports on the feud and D'Amato's alleged comment about Mueller, under the headline "Weld On D'Amato: There's Bad Blood." The New York Post (3/24, , 624K) notes D'Amato's alleged comment about Mueller at the end of its story on the feud, which focuses on Weld's attack on his opponent in the governor's race, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, comparing Spitzer to Mike Dukakis.

IG Report Finds Meth-Fighting Grants Missing Mark. The AP (3/24, Sherman) reports, "Some states with significant methamphetamine problems have not received their share of federal money because the bulk of a grant program was steered by lawmakers to favored projects in their districts, the Justice Department inspector general said Thursday." The AP continues, "More than $179 million in anti-meth money administered by the department - 84 percent of the grant funds - has been earmarked, as the practice is known, by members of Congress for programs in their states and districts, Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said. … 'As a result of the significant use of congressional earmarks in this program, funding is not always directed to the areas of the country with the most significant meth problem,' Fine said report examining the grant program from 1998 to 2005." The AP adds, "The Bush administration has proposed ending most meth-related earmarks in the budget for 2007. Lawmakers have indicated they are unlikely to go along. … Fine also faulted Justice's Office of Community Oriented Policing Services, or COPS, for its oversight of the program. The audit said there was a lack of coordination between officials in the COPS office, weaknesses in the database used to manage and track grants and insufficient and inconsistent monitoring of recipients of the money." The AP (3/24) includes a sidebar to this story, detailing meth lab seizures by state.

US FARC Indictments Criticized. The UK's Scotsman (3/24) reports the U.S. "has declared judicial war on Colombian rebels, issuing indictments for 50 guerrilla leaders, accusing them of running the world's biggest drug cartel and shipping £14 billion worth of cocaine." The Scotsman adds, "Many believe the U.S. indictment will simply harden guerrilla resolve. 'It is a total closing off of the possibility of negotiations with the FARC,' said Ricardo Vargas of Andean Action, a Bogota-based think tank."

The AP (3/24) reports analysts say the U.S. government's "loudly trumpeted drug indictments against 50 top leaders of Colombia's largest rebel group aren't likely to faze the insurgents…they could even make it harder for Colombia to reach peace. … 'It is a mistake to treat the FARC like a drug cartel because it ignores the fact that the principle goal of the FARC is not to make money from drug-trafficking but to take political power through violence,' said Alfredo Rangel, a respected Colombian military analyst."

32 Charged In Drug Investigation. The Shelbyville (TN) Times-Gazette (3/23) reports federal authorities "charged a total of 32 people, including seven from Shelbyville, with drug trafficking offenses in what is described as a major illicit organization with tentacles stretching from Mexico to Memphis to southern Middle Tennessee. … All were charged with conspiring to distribute five kilograms or more of cocaine and 100 kilograms or more of marijuana from June 2005 through March 2006. … Primary agencies involved in the ongoing investigation include the Drug Enforcement Administration."

Authorities Seek To Seize Tennessee Lottery Winnings Linked To Drug Proceeds. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (3/24) reports, "Rayford Andre Pratcher may have waited too long to spend his $66,666 lottery winnings. Federal authorities who went through a Northeast Memphis apartment last August looking for drugs came up with the check in his name and now argue he must give it up. 'The defendant, One Tennessee Lottery Check #1031779, is traceable to drug proceeds and subject to forfeiture,' Asst. U.S. Atty. Christopher Cotten said in papers filed this week in federal court." The Commercial Appeal says during a search, DEA agents found drug residue on the check made out to Pratcher.

Medical Marijuana Battle Heads Back To Court. The AP (3/23, Kravets) reports, "Each time the U.S. Supreme Court has ruled on medical marijuana, the justices have come down against allowing the sick and dying to use the drug to ease their symptoms and possibly prolong life. But the door has never been fully closed." The AP continues, "This week, a federal appeals court in California will hear arguments in the latest round of legal wrangling over the issue. … The case to be argued before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Monday narrows the matter to the so-called right to life theory: that marijuana should be allowed if it is the only viable option to keep a patient alive or free of excruciating pain.It would apply only to the sickest patients and their suppliers, regardless of whether they live in one of the 11 mostly Western states authorizing medical marijuana. … 'A victory would affect people who are very seriously ill, facing death or great physical suffering,' said Randy Barnett, a Boston University law school professor working on the case." The AP notes, "The case was brought by Angel Raich, a 40-year-old mother of two from Oakland who suffers from scoliosis, a brain tumor, chronic nausea and other ailments. She uses marijuana every couple of hours to ease her pain and bolster a nonexistent appetite. … 'There is no fundamental right to distribute, cultivate or possess marijuana,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark Quinlivan, the government's lead medical marijuana attorney, wrote to the appeals court."

City Council Allows Collectives To Grow Marijuana. The San Mateo County (CA) Times (3/23) reports from South San Francisco that the City Council on Wednesday night approved the first Peninsula measure on marijuana that regulates where it can be grown and how people can get it for medicinal use. On a unanimous vote, the council decided to amend the city code on the cultivation of medical marijuana. The new rules outlaw storefront pot clubs but allow patients to collectively grow cannabis at least 500 feet from residential areas."

New Yorkers Said To Support Legalizing Medical Marijuana. In a story titled, "Reefer Relief," the Long Island Press (3/23) reports, "More than 75 percent of New York voters support legalizing weed to help the seriously ill, provided it's under the supervision of a physician who prescribes it, according to a study conducted last year by the Siena Research Institute at Siena College in Loudonville, N.Y. … After the Supreme Court ruled last June that the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) was within its rights to seize marijuana plants grown for medical use in California, there was a chilling effect on states dabbling with prescription pot."

Maryland US Attorney Launches Anti-Gun Crime Program. The Washington Post (3/24, B4, Castaneda) reports, "Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein announced yesterday the start of a joint federal-local initiative designed to crack down on gun crimes in Prince George's County, where the vast majority of last year's record number of homicides were committed with firearms." The Post continues, "At a news conference at the U.S. District Courthouse in Greenbelt, Rosenstein said that under the program -- Prince George's EXILE -- federal and Prince George's law enforcement officials will collaborate more closely to identify and investigate violent offenders who use firearms, to crack down on illegal gun traffickers and to use the threat of tough federal sentencing laws to pressure defendants to plead guilty to gun crimes in state court. … Similar programs are in place or have been used in other cites, including Baltimore and Richmond. … 'We have too many criminals walking the streets with guns,' said Rosenstein, flanked by more than a dozen local and federal law enforcement officials. 'Our goal is not just to prosecute gun crimes. Our goal is to deter violent crime.'" The Post notes, "To underscore what Rosenstein called an unprecedented level of cooperation in the local initiative between federal and local authorities, the federal prosecutor was joined at the news conference by Prince George's State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey, Police Chief Melvin C. High and representatives from the FBI, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the Drug Enforcement Administration, the office of Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), the state Division of Parole and Probation and other agencies."

Nevada Officials Puzzled By Increase In Youths With Guns. The Las Vegas Sun (3/24, Kihara) reports, "Juvenile justice officials can't seem to explain a recent spike in juveniles arrested on gun-related charges. … In February there were 779 minors charged with gun-related offenses, up from 442 in February 2005, according to the county statistics. … But there's no reason for the 76 percent increase - there hasn't been a corresponding rise in anything that would provide a clear answer. … 'There is no set pattern

- it's across the board,' said District Judge William Voy, who handles juvenile cases. 'You get kids in gangs, and then you get kids with no gang affiliations whatsoever. It almost seems to be some fascination with guns.'" The Sun adds, "The numbers have taken juvenile justice officials by surprise. They've seen minors arrested for shooting off guns in the air to impress their friends, carrying guns to school to show off or for protection, stealing guns and using guns in burglaries or robberies. … Darnell Couthen, spokesman for the Clark County School District police, said that the minors who are arrested for a gun-related offense span all socio-economic backgrounds and areas, from Cheyenne to Green Valley High School. … The Clark County School District also saw an increase in the number of guns officers confiscated. During the 2003-04 school year, the district confiscated 84 guns, up from 72 the year before."

Marshals Arrest Man Sought On Drug, Weapons Charges. The Lexington Herald-Leader (KY) (3/24) reports, "Authorities arrested this morning a 20-year-old Lexington man who escaped from police in January after they allegedly discovered drugs and weapons in a car he was driving." The Herald-Leader continues, "Lexington police and U.S. marshals surrounded Tiquan Anderson's home on Radcliffe Road, off Russell Cave Road, in hopes of capturing the alleged drug dealer, a news release from the U.S. Marshals Service said. Authorities said they arrested Anderson without incident as he left his home through a back door. … He is charged with trafficking in a controlled substance, and fleeing and evading police, the release said."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Urges Support For Guest Worker Program, Urges "Civil" Debate. Following a meeting with representatives of various groups interested in immigration reform, President Bush yesterday highlighted his support for a guest worker program as a counterpart to greater border enforcement. Bush also urged that the debate over immigration reform must be done "in a civil way" that "brings dignity to the process." Fox News' Special Report (3/23, Hume) reported that Bush "tried to head off what he fears may be a bitter battle in Congress over immigration reform by inviting interested parties to the White House and calling for the kind of debate that he thinks might produce a bill he can actually sign." Fox (Cameron) added that Bush "surrounded himself at the White House as diverse as the Salvation Army and US Chamber of Commerce. He urged lawmakers to watch their rhetoric and respect people of all backgrounds." The story received no coverage from the network newscasts.

Media coverage of Bush's remarks highlights GOP divisions on the immigration issue and the high degree of acrimony that appears to surround the debate. Some reports also portray the story as facing the upcoming debate from a politically weak position. For example, in a front-page story titled "Bush Is Facing A Difficult Path On Immigration," the New York Times (3/24, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports Bush "has lost control of his own party on the issue, as many Republicans object to his call for a temporary guest-worker program, insisting instead that the focus be on shutting down the flow of illegal immigrants from Mexico. It is not clear how much help he will get from Democrats in an election year. … In short, Mr. Bush is facing another test of his remaining powers as president." Bush "finds himself caught between two of his most important constituencies: business owners and managers on the one hand, conservatives on the other."

Also on its front page, the Washington Post (3/24, A1, Weisman, VandeHei, 744K) analyzes the political dimension of the debate, and says "Bush's effort to secure lawful employment opportunities for illegal immigrants is evolving into an early battle of the 2008 presidential campaign, as his would-be White House successors jockey for position ahead of next week's immigration showdown in the Senate." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "is threatening to bring a new immigration bill to the Senate floor early next week. It would tighten control of the nation's borders without creating the guest-worker program the president wants." Meanwhile, Sen. John McCain, "is promoting Bush's call for tougher border security and the guest-worker program as he embraces the president to shore up his standing with Republican leaders." And in the House, Rep. Tom Tancredo "is garnering support for a long-shot presidential bid with his fierce anti-immigration rhetoric." In addition, "after weeks of sitting on the sidelines, Sen. Hillary Rodham…jumped into the immigration debate Wednesday. She declared that Republican efforts to criminalize undocumented workers and their support networks 'would literally criminalize the good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself.'" The New York Daily News (3/24, Bazinet, McAuliff, 729K) says Bush's call for a "civil" debate was "an apparent swipe at…Clinton. … A White House official said the President was well aware of Clinton's biblical broadside when he spoke, but Team Bush didn't want to single her out and give her the spotlight."

Moreover, said CNN's The Situation Room (3/23, Henry), Democrats "are doing everything they can to exploit this divide within the Republican Party" over the guest worker proposal. After the President's remarks, Sen. Edward Kennedy "put out a statement applauding the President, a rare move by Kennedy, applauding him for talking about the guest worker provisions." Kennedy said that "if, in fact, there are no guest worker provisions in the final product, this will be hollow reform."

CNN's The Situation Room (3/23, Blitzer) reported that Bush and Congress "are on the verge of a potentially bitter fight over illegal immigration." The Washington Times (3/24, Hurt, Dinan, 90K) says that "even as President Bush called for a 'civil' debate," a "confrontation was brewing on Capitol Hill with some Republicans saying Mr. Bush must stop demonizing them and Democrats vowing to fight the Senate majority leader's bill." Rep. J.D. Hayworth, "a top voice calling for better enforcement, said while he took Mr. Bush at his word, civility is a 'two-way street' and the White House must stop attacking Republicans who disagree with it. 'If I had any advice for my friends at the White House, I think it would be to really reconsider posturing every disagreement as some sort of new political [or] psychological malady,' Mr. Hayworth said."

The Los Angeles Times (3/24, Gerstenzang, Gaouette, 958K) says "the vitriol on immigration far exceeds the language surrounding other significant but less emotional policy controversies, including changes in tax laws and the prescription drug benefit that has been added to Medicare." Bush is quoted saying, "It's important that we have a serious debate, one that discusses the issues. But I urge members of Congress and I urge people who like to comment on this issue to make sure the rhetoric is in accord with our traditions. … When we conduct this debate, it must be done in a civil way. It must be done in a way that brings dignity to the process. It must be done in a way that doesn't pit one group of people against another."

Meanwhile, CQ (3/23, Crowley) reported "sparring over immigration policy legislation intensified…in anticipation of next week's contentious Senate debate on the issue." Although Congress "remains in recess this week, Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., and staffers worked in Washington to hammer out an agreement. 'There's no agreement yet,' a Republican Judiciary Committee aide said. 'Negotiations are continuing.'"

However, the Washington Post (3/24, A18, 744K) editorializes that "the Senate Judiciary Committee, which had been bogged down for several weeks trying to produce an immigration bill, appears to have reached a consensus. The deal doesn't solve all of the problems, but it does at least try to solve the most difficult: the fate of the estimated 12 million people who live in this country illegally." The Post adds, "In its essence, the compromise -- patterned on a proposal by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) -- allows undocumented workers living here to apply for residency permits, on the condition that they prove they are employed and pay a hefty fine for breaking the law. They would then go to the back of the green card line -- behind those applying legally -- and wait for citizenship. … This is, of course, a very fragile sort of agreement. … Still, a breakthrough is a breakthrough, however fragile, and the senators on the Judiciary Committee, led by Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), are to be commended for reaching it."

Bush's remarks received some local TV coverage across the nation, much of it focusing on his call for civility. For example, KVOA-TV Tucson (3/23) reported "Bush called for a 'civil debate' as the illegal immigration dispute heats-up." WCVB-TV Boston (3/23) reported the President is "pushing for enforcement and a plan that matches willing workers with willing employers. The Senate Majority Leader seems to be side-stepping that plan."

WAGA-TV Atlanta (3/23) reported, Bush and Congress are on the verge of a potentially bitter fight over illegal immigration. Today the President met with leaders in the immigration debate and urged them to tone down the rhetoric. The President wants Congress to create a guest worker program that would offer certain working illegal immigrants temporary legal status but many Republicans refuse to endorse it."

Meanwhile, KENS-TV San Antonio (3/23) reported, "The President's pitch today may also be aimed at muting criticism from Mexico that Mr. Bush hasn't tried hard enough to keep his first-term reform pledges. He'll be meeting outgoing Mexican President Fox in Cancun next week."

Clinton's Comments Spark Commentary. Fox News' Special Report (3/23, Hume) reported that Clinton and many of her fellow Democrats are "dead-set against" a bill that has passed the House and a similar bill in the Senate that "would amount to a crackdown on illegal immigration at the border and inside this country. … What the President wants is some of that, but he also wants a guest worker program." Asked whether the President will get what he wants, NPR's Juan Williams said, "I think the President has a good shot here, but the reason is because I think he has is the strong backing of the business community." And referring to Sen. Clinton's statement Wednesday that a provision in the House immigration reform bill "would literally criminalize the Good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself," Bill O'Reilly said on Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (3/23) that Clinton "is opposing the tough law and favors business as usual. Her website says she wants more cooperation with Mexico, more high tech for Border Patrol agents: The usual gibberish, with all due respect."

Thousands Participate In "Day Without Latinos" March In Milwaukee. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (3/24, Johnson, Spice, 266K) reports "a mile-long swath of peaceful protesters marched into" Milwaukee's downtown Thursday in response to the House immigration bill. "Hundreds of students took the day off school; businesses around southeastern Wisconsin closed; and thousands of workers left their jobs in support of the event billed as 'A Day Without Latinos.'" A number of speakers focused on the bill's sponsor, Rep. Jim Sensenbrenner, "for criticism, including Sheila Cochran of the Milwaukee County Labor Council, who called the bill 'wrong-spirited, wrongheaded and just plain wrong.'"

TAX:

Proposed IRS Rule Highlights Vulnerability Of Tax Return Information. The CBS Evening News (3/23, story 7, 2:20, Orr, 7.66M) reported, "Since 1974, tax laws have allowed" tax preparers to "sell your information, but only if you sign one of these, a form giving your permission. That's not a problem for people who intentionally sign the form in an effort to, say, secure a loan or qualify for a mortgage. But critics say shady tax services could trick customers into unwittingly signing away their identities." The issue "is coming to light now because of an IRS effort to improve taxpayer protections. New proposed rules would require permission papers to carry this explicit IRS warning: 'Once your tax return information is disclosed…per your consent…we have no control…' over what happens to the information."

Oregon Taxpayers To Get Refunds As State Services Face Cuts. Oregon's coffers are seeing almost $700 million in unanticipated tax revenue, which under a one-of-a-kind law must be refunded to individual taxpayers and corporations instead of being sent by the state. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Solomon, 2.11M) reports that "residents and companies that do business in Oregon will receive refunds or credits, even as the state struggles to fill a $172 million funding gap for its human-services division and a $57 million shortfall for public schools in Portland, where as many as 14 schools might be shuttered." The situation is prompting cries from labor unions, school officials and "any residents to end the tax 'kicker' for corporations -- and posing a challenge for [Gov. Ted] Kulongoski, a Democrat up for re-election in November. Mr. Kulongoski, whose approval rating hovers at around 38%, faces a primary challenge from two Democrats, both of whom have called for an end to the corporate kicker."

WSJournal Criticizes Spitzer's Treatment Of H&R Block. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/24, 2.11M) criticizes New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer's treatment of H&R Block, saying Spitzer "is once again threatening to use his power to ruin a company before it even steps into a courtroom. Not that his accusations appear to have much to do with the law in any event." The Journal adds that Spitzer's "detachment from the struggles of working people is no excuse for launching a political attack on a law-abiding company."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

7.2 Million Seniors Have Signed Up For Medicare Drug Benefit. USA Today (3/24, 2.31M) reports, "About 1.9 million elderly and disabled people signed up for the new Medicare drug benefit over the past month, meaning 7.2 million have taken steps to enroll since the program began Jan. 1, the program's chief said Thursday. An additional 20 million people have been enrolled automatically because they participate in other government programs, such as Medicaid, or because they have drug coverage through a former employer." Mark McClellan, administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, "said the total is expected to continue rising until the May 15 enrollment deadline."

CQ (3/23, Schuler) reports Health and Human Services Secretary Michael O. Leavitt "said the number of beneficiaries who had signed up individually for the drug plan now totals 7.2 million. 'We are very pleased that more and more people with Medicare are taking advantage of this important benefit. Strong and steady enrollment has continued this month,' Leavitt said."

The AP (3/24, Freking) says "the latest enrollment figures were released as polling showed that older people have mixed views about the program. About 44 percent of those surveyed approve of the new benefit. About 41 percent disapprove and 15 percent are undecided, according to The Pew Research Center for the People and the Press. The margin of error was plus or minus 3 percentage points."

The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Lueck, 2.11M) reports that meanwhile, "congressional Democrats released a report illustrating problems beneficiaries sometimes face when trying to obtain certain medications under the plans. In a survey of the plans available in Rep. Henry Waxman's California district, Democratic staff from the House Committee on Government Reform found that most plans require patients to get prior authorization or try other medications before getting coverage for some commonly prescribed drugs." It also "found that many drug-plan representatives didn't give accurate or full descriptions of the restrictions. It is 'nearly impossible for seniors to learn' the terms of plan restrictions 'until after they have subscribed and been denied drug access,' the report said."

Wealthier Seniors To Pay Larger Share For Doctor Visits. The Washington Times (3/24, Fagan, 90K) reports, "Starting next year, wealthier seniors will have to pay a greater share of the cost of their doctor visits because of a provision in the 2003 Medicare prescription drug legislation." Medicare Part B "covers outpatient services such as doctor visits, physical therapy and X-rays. All seniors who choose the coverage pay 25 percent of their monthly Part B premium, with the government picking up the remaining 75 percent. The seniors' monthly portion was $78.20 last year and rose to $88.50 this year." Beginning next year, "wealthier seniors will have to pay an increasingly higher percent of their Part B premium costs."

Democrats See "Fundamental Constitutional Problem" With Deficit Reduction Bill. The AP (3/24) reports, "House Democrats want President Bush to say whether he knew of what they call a 'fundamental constitutional problem' with the $39 billion deficit reduction package he signed last month." A letter to Bush, signed by House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and Rep. Henry Waxman and "released Thursday, is the latest challenge to a bill that was passed in slightly different forms by the House and Senate before it was sent to Bush." The Democrats wrote, "A bill is not law unless the same version is passed by both the House and the Senate and signed by the president."

Administration Seeks To Revive Domestic Agenda. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Team Bush scrambles to revive domestic agenda. President's acknowledgment of political capital spent on war reflects slipping prospects on other fronts. Senate Finance Chairman Grassley predicts uphill fight for even scaled-down version of expanded health savings accounts." The Journal adds, "A senior Bush adviser sees delay…as best chance for winning immigrant guest-worker program. Both chambers have sidetracked Bush's proposed Medicare savings; extension of dividend and capital-gains tax cuts remains in doubt."

Appeals Court Nominee Asks Bush To Withdraw Nomination. The Washington Post (3/24, A4, News, 744K) reports presidential aide Erin Healy said Henry W. Saad, "one of President Bush's appeals court nominees blocked by Senate Democrats, withdrew his name from consideration." Democrats have "accused Saad, a Michigan appeals court judge, of being hostile to employment-discrimination claims and lawsuits by consumers."

CQ (3/23, Perine) reports, "Michigan's two Democratic senators, Carl Levin and Debbie Stabenow, objected to Saad's nomination, as well as those of three other nominees to the 6th Circuit, because Republicans blocked two of President Bill Clinton's nominees to that court." Saad "contributed to his own problems in 2003, when he sent an e-mail message to Stabenow that criticized her for blocking his nomination. He later apologized and said he had not meant for the senator to receive the e-mail."

Bush Presented Volunteer Service Award In West Virginia. The Wheeling News Register (3/23) reported that upon landing at Wheeling-Ohio County Airport in West Virginia Wednesday, President Bush presented the President's Volunteer Service Award to Kristen Holloway of

Pittsburgh, Pa. Holloway "is the founder and president of Operation Troop Appreciation, a non-profit organization dedicated to supporting deployed troops fighting the War on Terrorism in Iraq, Afghanistan, Kuwait, and Africa."

Bush Has Gone 1,889 Days Without Vetoing Legislation. CNN's The Situation Room (3/23, Blitzer) reported that President Bush has "now gone 1,889 days in office without using his veto power. He's surpassed President James Monroe's vetoless streak by a single day, and he may be going for Thomas Jefferson's record. The third president of the United States never vetoed legislation during his entire two terms. President Bush has had a GOP-led House and Senate for most of his five-plus years in office. That helps account for the fact that he signed all 1,091 bills sent to his desk."

Head Of Pension Agency To Step Down. USA Today (3/24, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) reports, "The head of the federal agency that insures the private pensions of 44 million Americans said Thursday he would step down on May 31, forcing the White House to find a new leader amid a rash of pension plan insolvencies." Bradley Belt, executive director of the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. for the past two years," announced his resignation in a letter to President Bush. He did not indicate what he planned to do after leaving the agency, and PBGC staff said they could not elaborate."

The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Schroeder, 2.11M) says the resignation comes "amid continuing turmoil in the traditional retirement-benefit system." Belt, "a former senior staff member at the Senate Banking Committee and the Securities and Exchange Commission, has been at odds with administration officials on the PBGC's board over his desire to take a larger role in the pension debate, according to people with knowledge of the situation. The board includes the secretaries of Treasury, Commerce and Labor, who have been taking the lead in pressing the administration's pension proposals." CQ (3/23) says Belt announced his departure "as House and Senate lawmakers are negotiating a final version of pension overhaul legislation (HR 2830). Aimed at forcing companies to better fund their pension plans, the legislation would increase funding requirements for pension plans and adjust the way companies evaluate their plan liabilities."

Pension Reform Bill Seen As Undermining Goal Of Strengthening Funds. The Financial Times (3/24, Cohen) reports employers will "be able to slash their contributions to underfunded pension schemes by tens of billions of dollars over the next five years under proposed legislation before Congress that was expected to have the opposite effect." The legislation was "proposed by the White House last year to lessen the risk of a taxpayer bailout of the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation, a federal safety net for pension schemes." But an analysis "prepared this week by the Joint Committee on Taxation" shows "The Pension Security and Transparency Act of 2005 would bring at least $10bn in additional tax revenue as employers reduce pension contributions on which they would have been eligible for tax relief."

OPM Director Considering Pay Changes For IGs, ALJs. The Washington Post (3/24, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that Linda Springer, director of the OPM, has been presented with options on how to address pay inequities faced by some IGs. Springer said efforts are also underway to "rethink the pay rules for administrative law judges," and she expects "to be sorting out compensation proposals for both groups in coming weeks. At issue is a Bush administration principle that job performance should be a factor in setting pay for government employees and whether that principle can be applied to IGs and ALJs without damaging or weakening their independence." Springer said revamping pay practices for both groups "will probably require congressional approval, Springer said."

First Lady Urged To Persuade Bush To Make Changes In His Administration. In the Washington Post (3/24, C1, 744K) Sally Quinn writes a letter to First Lady Laura Bush in which she urges her to tell the President "the truth." Quinn writes, "With three years to go in this presidency, something has to change. You've always been there when he needed you. You got him to stop drinking. You campaigned hard for him at the end of the first campaign. Your own poll numbers are off the charts. You need to persuade him to make changes, and to do it in a way that the people believe he means it. Remember, it's your legacy, too."

Document Details Cheney Travel Needs. The New York Times (3/24, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports the Smoking Gun Website yesterday posted a document titled "Vice Presidential Downtime Requirements" that was "and confirmed as authentic by Mr. Cheney's office. The document listed 13 requirements. Among them were these:

All televisions sets in Mr. Cheney's hotel suite should be tuned to Fox News, all lights should be on, and the thermostat set at 68 degrees."

CNN's The Situation Room (3/23, Blitzer) reported that Cheney's office "had some very specific requests of the advance team, particularly when it comes to the setup of the Vice President's hotel rooms." CNN (Tatton) added, "Diet Sprite and Fox News. Those are two of the requirements, according to this document posted on The Smoking Gun."

The Washington Post (3/24, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "Reliable Source" column that the document includes "No over-the-top demands, just a few specific requests." The Post adds, "And, if the hotel wants to leave a gift in the suite, the bills should be unmarked . . . kidding! Seriously, though, the advance team needs to know about any hotel gift for the vice president."

Republicans Angry, Ambivalent About Party's Performance In Congress. According to Knight Ridder (3/23, Thomma, Kuhnhenn) that many Republicans are angry and ambivalent about their party's job performance as Washington's majority party. Knight Ridder notes, "If enough disgruntled Republicans sit out the midterm elections - when voter turnout typically is low and victory goes to the party whose base is most passionate - Republican incumbents could lose in close contests." Democrats "need to gain only 15 of 435 seats to take control of the U.S. House of Representatives, and six of the 33 that are up this year to take the 100-member Senate. And if they win either house of Congress, President Bush will become the lamest of lame ducks for his final two years in power."

Congress Putting Ethics Reform Proposals On Back Burner. The Christian Science Monitor (3/24, Chaddock, 61K) reports the "prospects for robust ethics reform in the 109th Congress are dimming, even as the criminal probes that prompted it are intensifying. It's a political calculation that could cost lawmakers in this fall's elections, if they misread the degree to which voters care about bribery inside the Beltway." As recently "as January, lobby reform bills were top priorities in both the House and Senate, but now are encountering strong resistance. In the Senate, Republican leaders pulled the lobby bill off the floor over an unrelated amendment on the Dubai ports deal. In the House, GOP leaders are split over how aggressively to restrict lawmaker travel paid for by private entities."

Attorneys For Former Lobbyists Question Espionage Act. The Washington Post (3/24, A6, Pincus, 744K) reports the Federal judge "presiding over the prosecution of two former lobbyists has focused attention on the imprecise nature of the law they are charged with breaking, the 1917 Espionage Act that restricts the dissemination of national defense information that could harm U.S. interests." Today, "attorneys for the former lobbyists, Steve Rosen and Keith Weissman, will argue for dismissal of the indictment based in part on the claim that the Espionage Act was meant to cover spying, not the possession of leaked classified information, particularly leaked information possessed and transmitted by people who are not government employees."

Washington Said To Be Awash With Quasi-Apocalyptic Warnings. The Washington Post (3/24, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports Washington "was about one horseman short of an apocalypse yesterday," noting there were congressional hearings on avian flu, a National Press Club news conference on mad cow disease, and a National Economists Club meeting on global warming. The Post adds, "Have a nice doomsday? Possibly. When President Bush went to Cleveland on Monday, a questioner asked him about a claim 'that members of your administration have reached out to prophetic Christians who see the war in Iraq and the rise of terrorism as signs of the apocalypse. Do you believe this, that the war in Iraq and the rise of terrorism are signs of the apocalypse?'" Bush said, "I haven't really thought of it that way. The first I've heard of that, by the way." The Post adds, "But maybe not the last, if yesterday's collection of end-of-days warnings was any indication."

Krugman Says Snow Should Stop "Repeating Administration Talking Points." Paul Krugman's column in the New York Times (3/24, 1.19M) today is a letter to Treasury Secretary John Snow in which the columnist says, "I'm glad that you've started talking about income inequality, which in recent years has reached levels not seen since before World War II. But if you want to be credible on the subject, you need to make some changes in your approach. … Of course, my suggestions about how to improve your credibility would force you to stop repeating administration talking points. But you're the secretary of the Treasury. Your job is to make economic policy, not to spout propaganda. Oh, wait."

Robinson Expresses "Pity" For Allen. Eugene Robinson writes in the Washington Post (3/24, A19, 744K), "Would it be fair to cheer [Claude] Allen's downfall just because he held a highly visible post in an administration that is reviled by most African Americans? No, but there's more: He made his name in black conservative circles by serving as a top aide to Jesse Helms, the old buzzard from North Carolina. … So, yes, when Allen was arrested on felony theft charges, my first reaction was smug satisfaction. But then I told myself: Don't hate. The proper reaction is pity, on every level."

OTHER NEWS:

Sales Of Existing Homes Unexpectedly High. ABC World News Tonight (3/23, story 8, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "There's a report today that shows new strength in the housing market. Sales of existing homes surged an unexpected 5.2% last month, the biggest gain in two years." USA Today (3/24, Knox, 2.31M) reports "buyers took advantage of warm weather and kicked off the spring home-shopping season early, the National Association of Realtors said Thursday. March, typically a strong month, is also looking good in many regions, boosting the case for a soft landing rather than a sudden plunge." The New York Times (3/24, Bajaj, 1.19M) reports the story under the headline "Defying Trend, An Upturn In Home Sales," and says "analysts, who had expected sales to fall to a pace of 6.5 million, cautioned that the increase could not yet be considered a turning point. Several other real estate gauges, including mortgage applications, interest rates and pending home sales, have indicated that sales are slowing." The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Dunham, 2.11M) runs a similar story.

Stock Markets Close Lower. NBC Nightly News (3/23, story 10, 0:10, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today stocks finished lower. The Dow lost more than 47 points [to close at 11,270.29]. The NASDAQ was down just over 3 points [to close at 2,300.15]." The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Patterson, 2.11M) reports the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slid 3.37 to 1301.67. The New York Times (3/24, News, 1.19M) says stocks fell "after oil prices jumped and an increase in home sales added to concern that the Federal Reserve might keep lifting interest rates."

Bernanke Says Reduced Foreign Investment, Lower Dollar Not Worrisome. Bloomberg (3/24, Lanman) reports Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke "said a possible decline in the dollar because of less foreign investment wouldn't have a 'worrisome' effect on the U.S. economy." In a March 21 letter to Rep. Harold Ford, Bernanke said it "isn't clear that faster economic growth in emerging markets would cause investors to shift capital to those countries and away from the US. Should that happen, 'it might be associated with a decline in the value of the dollar and a narrowing of the US trade deficit.'"

DC Judges Form Rock Band. The Washington Post (3/24, B1, Cauvin) reports, "Stoic stewards of the Constitution by day in D.C. Superior Court, they are by night (or weekend, or whenever they feel the urge) Deaf Dog and the Indictments -- a guitar-heavy group of seven music-loving judges, anchored by the lone civilian among them, a ponytailed shrink on drums." The Post continues, "Strutting onto the stage Saturday afternoon in Blues Brothers-black, Dawgg (aka Judge William Jackson) and the rest of the Indictments had more space than they needed -- 100 or so people were spread out in an auditorium built for lots more." The Post adds, "All they had were a couple of songs and a curious name, hatched in an early rehearsal, when a few of the musicians thought they had found a real fan -- Canan's German shepherd, Chapin, who was never put off by the racket that chased everyone else away. Canan had to break it to his brethren that Chapin was deaf. But he didn't doubt her devotion, and so was born the name, Deaf Dog and the Indictments. … Maybe it was the pangs of middle and not-so-middle age sounding a call to their inner youth. Or perhaps they wanted a break from all the pain and conflict they see in court: the murder cases Canan tried as a judge in criminal court, the dysfunctional lives that Jackson saw as head of the domestic violence courts or just the indignity of having a deranged defendant hurl a trash can into your head, as happened to John Campbell when he was assigned to a criminal court. … Whatever it was, the band lived to play again, starting at D.C. Superior Court, where it was the surprise entertainment for the employee awards ceremony last fall."

Democratic Strategists Believe Conditions Are Perfect For Female Candidates. Democratic strategists believe conditions are "perfect" for female Democratic candidates this year. Democratic women are running campaigns in almost half of the 24 most competitive House races. The New York Times (3/24, Toner,

1.19M) reports that Republicans "dismiss this theory." The Times adds, "By the time it is over, this midterm election may offer some hints on the kind of climate that awaits Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York if she runs for president in 2008."

Minimum Wage Could Be Election Issue. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Minimum wage emerges as election-year flashpoint. Treasury Secretary Snow's remarks on income inequality fuel debate. … Commerce Secretary Gutierrez also signals openness to an increase if Congress pursues the issue 'thoughtfully...and not emotionally.' … Strategist Carville advises Democrats to block pay raise for Congress until average worker's wages rise."

Rendell, Swann Even In Pennsylvania Governor's Race. Pennsylvania's Democratic Gov. Ed Rendell is running even with Republican Challenger, former Pittsburgh Steeler Lynn Swann, according to recent polls. The Washington Times (3/24, Lambro, 90K) reports that Rendell "was expected to have little trouble winning another four years in office, until the charismatic Football Hall of Fame wide receiver and ABC Sports commentator entered the contest in January, sweeping his rivals from the race for the GOP nomination and making the former Philadelphia mayor and national Democratic chairman look suddenly vulnerable." Rendell "has seen his voter-approval scores fall below 50 percent, after his disastrous signing of a legislator pay-raise bill last year that triggered protests from voters and was later rescinded."

Study Examines Effects Of Prayer When Used In Conjunction With Medicine. A front page story in the Washington Post (3/24, A1, Stein, 744K) reports that prayer "is the most common complement to mainstream medicine, far outpacing acupuncture, herbs, vitamins and other alternative remedies. … The outpouring of spiritual healing has inspired a small group of researchers to attempt to use the tools of modern science to test the power of prayer to cure others. The results have been mixed and highly controversial. Skeptics say the work is a deeply flawed and misguided waste of money that irresponsibly attempts to validate the supernatural with science. And some believers say it is pointless to try to divine the workings of God with experiments devised by mortals."

AEI Scholar Says US Poor Are Doing Better. Douglas Besharov, the Jacobs scholar in social welfare studies at the American Enterprise Institute, writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/24, 2.11M), "Each year the Census Bureau calculates the nation's poverty rate, based on the number of people with incomes below the official poverty line, about $20,000 for a family of four in 2004. Since last year's poverty rate of 12.7% was essentially equal to the 1968 rate of 12.8%, it seems that little progress has been made. But many analysts -- on the right and the left -- have pointed out that, by many other measures, poor people's physical and material well-being is considerably better now than in the late '60s. How else to explain why so many poor now have color TV (93%) and air conditioning (50%), and own their own homes (46%)?" Besharov adds that while "about 15 million people are below the poverty line and millions more just above it," millions of low income Americans "are living better lives than they did before."

Isolationists Said To Still Be Minority In US. In a New York Times op-ed (3/24), pollster Andrew Kohut says "recent opinion surveys affirm that isolationist sentiment has increased in recent years," but while "these trends represent significant shifts in attitudes, it would be a mistake to conclude that this country is becoming isolationist. There is no sign that most Americans want the United States to turn its back on the world or that anti-foreign sentiment in this country is rising. Discontent with Mr. Bush's policies, notably on Iraq, has led to widespread public frustration. And while it has also created more isolationists, they remain a minority."

Rice Warns Security Council Holdouts There "Can't Be Any Stalling" On Iran. The AP (3/24, Gearan) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice issued a veiled warning Thursday to holdouts in a diplomatic impasse at the United Nations over Iran's disputed nuclear program. 'There can't be any stalling,' Rice said in response to a question about U.S. efforts to get Russia and China to sign on to a strongly worded rebuke to Tehran." Russia and China "have refused to back a UN Security Council statement proposed by Britain, France and the United States demanding Iran suspend uranium enrichment."

US Officials Worried Iran Closer Than Believed To Nuclear Weapons. Knight Ridder (3/24, Landay, Strobel) reports, "US officials are concerned that Iran may be closer than they previously believed to mastering the process for producing fuel for a nuclear weapon. Their unease stems from a recent briefing at which UN International Atomic Energy Agency experts reported that Iran was close to operating a test network of 164 machines, called centrifuges, that spin uranium hexafluoride gas into enriched uranium, US officials and a foreign diplomat said." Knight Ridder adds, "Depending on its duration, the process produces low enriched uranium for power plants and highly enriched uranium for nuclear weapons."

US Ambassador Accuses Iran Of Interfering In Iraq. The Washington Post (3/24, Finer, Knickermeyer, 744K) reports an interview with US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad in which he said "Iran is publicly professing its support for Iraq's stalemated political process while its military and intelligence services back outlawed militias and insurgent groups." He went to say, "Iranian agents train and arm Shiite Muslim militias such as the Mahdi Army, linked to one of Iraq's most powerful clerics…and also work closely with Sunni Arab-led insurgent forces including Ansar al-Sunna, blamed for dozens of deadly attacks on Iraqi and American soldiers and Shiite civilians." The Post says Khalilzad's "accusations" were made "as the United States and Iran -- two feuding foreign powers with dominant roles in Iraqi affairs -- have expressed willingness to hold talks aimed at stabilizing the beleaguered country."

Olmert Demands Loyalty On Separation Plan Ahead Of Election. The AP (3/23, Federman) reported Acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "sent his strongest signal yet that hard-line parties won't be welcome in the next government if his party wins next week's election." Olmert's remarks indicated "coalition partners must be on board with his plan to withdraw from most of the West Bank." The AP says hard-line Kadima opponents "say the go-it-alone approach, which would involve uprooting dozens of Jewish settlements in the West Bank, amounts to a surrender to Palestinian violence." The AP says, "It appears increasingly likely that [Olmert[will join forces with the dovish Labor and Meretz parties, while leaving the hawkish parties, including Likud, in the opposition."

The Financial Times (3/24, Morris) reports on jockeying for the Finance Minister post. Although Olmert "has declared his intention to keep the treasury for one of his own," a strong showing by Labor "could put pressure on Mr Olmert to surrender the treasury to Amir Peretz, its leader."

Asian Governments Intensifying Watch For North Korean Counterfeit $100 Bills. Governments around Asia are stepping up surveillance for high-quality counterfeit American 4100 bills, which the US alleges are made by North Korea. The Washington Post (3/24, D5, Fairclough, 744K) reports, "The fake $100 bills," dubbed "supernotes," have "turned up in the United States, Philippines, Taiwan and elsewhere over the past two years."

North Korea Condemns US-South Korea Drills. Upcoming joint US-south Korean military exercises will be met with an unspecified "strong measure of self defense," North Korea warned yesterday. The AP (3/24, Kim) reports that North Korea condemned the drill "as saber-rattling for a pre-emptive nuclear attack on the North." In a statement carried on the North's Korean Central News Agency, North Korea's Foreign Ministry said, "Now that the US intention to stifle the DPRK has become very clear, the DPRK will react to it with a strong measure for self-defense." The North "has long claimed the US is bent on invading the country, condemning the annual military drill as a 'rehearsal' for an attack."

Rumsfeld Says US Should Maintain Wartime Command In South Korea. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said yesterday that the US must retain command of South Korea's military unit until the South's forces are strong enough to maintain stability on the peninsula. The AP (3/24, Mann) reports, "In a Pentagon news briefing, Rumsfeld said South Korea has brought up the idea, and 'everyone agrees that 55 years after the war, it's reasonable that the South Korean forces would increasingly take on more and more responsibility.' Asked whether he thought the change in command structure could start this year, Rumsfeld replied: 'No, no, I don't at all.'"

Senators More Optimistic About US-China Trade Relations. USA Today (3/24, MacLeod, 2.31M) reports, "The US senators pushing a bill to punish Chinese currency policies said Thursday they were more optimistic Beijing will revalue the yuan. But they refused to rule out pushing for a vote after they return to Washington to impose tariffs on all Chinese imports into the USA." Sen. Chuck Schumer said, "The jury is still out. … We still need some concrete signs of movement." He also said "there is a real possibility the Chinese government and people see it in their interest to let the yuan float." However, "he got no firm indication of when the currency would be allowed to fluctuate on global markets." Sen. Lindsey Graham said, "The clock is ticking on this currency issue."

The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Dean, 2.11M) headlines its story "US Senators Offer Hope To China On Tariffs," and reports the senators "said they are more optimistic about US-China trade relations after a trip to China's capital." But "the lawmakers stopped short of a commitment to put off a vote on their legislation, scheduled for next week." The Washington Post (3/24, D5, Goodman, 744K) runs a similar report, titled "Senators Hopeful Of Compromise On Yuan," and quotes Schumer saying, "We're feeling better." The Christian Science Monitor (3/24, Marquand, 61K) also reports on the senators' trip, under the headline "On China Visit, US Senators Tone Down Tariff Talk."

Journalist Says China Harvests Inmate Organs For Domestic, Foreign Sale. The Washington Times (3/24, Gertz, 90K) reports, "A Chinese journalist has uncovered a secret detention center in northern China that is being used by a hospital to harvest human organs for sale to domestic and international buyers." Jin Zhong, "a pseudonym for the journalist who fled China recently," also said in an interview that "a failed Chinese intelligence operation led to the 2004 death of a Japanese diplomat who committed suicide rather than give up secrets."

Chinese Official Casts Doubt On Whether Jailed NYTimes Researcher Will Be Released. The New York Times (3/24, Yardley, 1.19M) reports, "The United States on Thursday continued to press China about the status of a jailed researcher for The New York Times, but the uncertainty about his fate deepened as a Chinese government spokesman appeared to cast doubt on whether he would soon be released." The case against Zhao Yan, "a Chinese researcher in the Beijing bureau of The Times, was withdrawn last Friday by a court order." But "the Chinese authorities have since remained silent about the status of Mr. Zhao, and he is still behind bars. Asked on Thursday afternoon about the case, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, Qin Gang, criticized foreign news organizations for making 'irresponsible statements,' and he then offered a cryptic response. … 'From what I have learned, the actual situation is not like what you are talking about.'" In an editorial, the New York Times (3/24, 1.19M) says "it should be clear to the Chinese authorities that American leaders and the international news media are not going to forget this case. Mr. Zhao's plight should remain on the agenda for President Hu Jintao's first official visit to Washington next month."

Japan Suspends Loans To China. The Financial Times (3/24, Pilling) reports, "Japan has suspended decisions on new yen loans to China, blaming its increasingly strained ties with its biggest trading partner and former wartime adversary." The move, although "largely symbolic, marks a fresh low in relations between Asia's two biggest powers, which have been dogged by disputes over territory and natural resources." The Times adds, "Ties have worsened in recent years because of annual visits by Junichiro Koizumi, Japan's prime minister, to Tokyo's Yasukuni shrine, where 14 war criminals are honoured alongside millions of war dead." The Washington Times/AP (3/24, Inagaki) says "criticism is mounting in Japan that China's booming economy no longer needs the handouts."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (3/24, A12, Faiola, 744K) reports that "with Japan seeking to shed a half-century of pacifism and reassert itself in world affairs, and China acquiring vastly larger economic and military might, relations between the two are as tense as they have been at any time since World War II." The Post adds, "Nowhere is their contest more visible than here in Taiwan, which China regards as a renegade province that must be reunified with the mainland, by force if necessary. In recent months, Japan has made a series of unprecedented overtures toward Taiwan, which was a Japanese colony from 1895 to 1945. In Tokyo, leading politicians are increasingly adopting the view that Japan must come to the island's aid in the event of Chinese aggression."

More Commentary On China. Jaushieh Joseph Wu, the Minister of Mainland Affairs in the Council of Taiwan, writes in the Washington Times (3/24, 90K), "During his visit to Japan in November 2005, President George W. Bush said that by embracing freedom at all levels, Taiwan has delivered prosperity to its people and created a free and democratic society. For Taiwanese who lived through the four decades of authoritarianism and martial law under the Chinese Nationalist Party (KMT), Mr. Bush's words were no less an official recognition of what Taiwan has fought hard to achieve over the past few decades." Bush's "comments late last year were an encouragement to Taiwan. Taiwan is now refining its democracy, the better to be a beacon for democracy activists in China to follow, and in this endeavor Taiwan deserves US support."

US Freezes Assets Of Some Lebanese Media Companies. The AP (3/24, Aversa) reports, "The Bush administration moved Thursday to freeze the assets of several Lebanese media outlets, alleging that they helped raised money and recruits for Hezbollah's terrorist network." The Treasury Department's action "is against al Manar, a satellite TV operator, al Nour Radio and their parent company, the Lebanese Media Group. Any assets found in the United States belonging to these three outlets will be frozen and Americans are forbidden from doing business with them." The department alleges that "al Manar and al Nour Radio are the 'media arms' of Hezbollah."

US, Venezuela Agree To Allow Resumption Of Flights. The AP (3/23, Toothaker) reported remarks by US Ambassador William Brownfield that the US "and Venezuela have reached a temporary agreement that will avoid a proposed ban on flights by most U.S. airlines to the South American country." Caracas continues to seek a lifting of the FAA's safety ban on Venezuelan airlines flying to the US.

US Travel Warning Becomes An Issue In Italian Campaign. The New York Times (3/24, Fisher, 1.19M) reports, "An American travel advisory on possible dangers in Italy ballooned on Thursday into an issue in the close national election campaign here, with opposition politicians suggesting that the advisory could be used as ammunition against them." While PM Silvio Berlusconi "immediately seized on the advisory" and blamed it on center-left protesters, Romano Prodi "was concerned enough by the implication that leftist demonstrators constituted a threat that he called the American ambassador, Ronald Spogli, for an explanation."

Anti-Lukashenko Protest Ends With Non-Violent Arrests. The New York Times (3/24, Chivers, 1.19M) reports riot police entered a Minsk, Belarus, square early Friday and arrested "hundreds of antigovernment protesters," who "stood their ground while the officers dismounted and jogged into place in lines, cutting off any chance of escape." There were no reports of violence associated with the arrests. The Times notes the "small encampment had been a potent attraction in a police state that has never tolerated dissent," and goes on to say that Belarus still "operates like a Soviet anachronism." The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Cullison, A4, 2.11M) reports the arrest of "the ragtag symbol of opposition further highlights the obstacles faced by the region's pro-democracy groups, despite the success of such efforts in Ukraine and Georgia." Divergent media reporting was also noted: "Western television had been broadcasting the evening crowds. But here in Belarus, footage beamed to millions of homes by state-run television showed the desolate early morning, when the few protesters…meandered…amid piles of garbage." The Washington Times/AP (3/24, Heintz) also reports the story.

Bush Signs Bill Ending Trade Restrictions On Ukraine. The AP (3/24) reports, "President Bush signed a law Thursday that ended Cold War-era trade restrictions on Ukraine, opening the way for the former Soviet republic to join the World Trade Organization." The measure "frees Ukraine from a 1974 measure called the Jackson-Vanik Amendment, which links trade benefits to the emigration and human rights policies of former or current communist states."

"Soviet-Style Apparatchiks" Poised for Come-Back In Weekend Elections. The Washington Times (3/24, Feduschak, 90K) reports, "Political allies who stood side by side during Ukraine's 2004 'Orange Revolution' are waging war against each other in such a divisive campaign that the Soviet-style apparatchiks they had ousted are poised for a comeback in elections this weekend." Opinion polls "show that the party of Viktor Yanukovych, who won the presidency in an election in 2004 only to lose to Viktor Yushchenko in a court-ordered second vote, will win about a third of the seats Sunday, becoming the biggest single bloc in Ukraine's 450-seat parliament." The New York Times (3/24, Myers, 1.19M) also reports on the situation in the Ukraine, under the headline "Ethnic And Cultural Divisions Haunt Ukraine Before Vote."

De Villepin To Talk To French Unions. The Financial Times (3/24, Arnold) reports, "Dominique de Villepin invited trade unions to talks over his unpopular employment law on Thursday 'with no strings attached', a move cautiously accepted by five unions and widely interpreted as a climbdown by the embattled French premier." The appeal "came as Mr de Villepin faced accusations that his refusal to consider changing the law had provoked an unnecessary crisis, with critics suspecting he had allowed his presidential ambitions to override his political judgment." The New York Times (3/24, Smith, 1.19M) says France's "most powerful labor union federations agreed Thursday to meet…de Villepin on Friday."

NBC Nightly News (3/23, story 5, 0:20, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "In Paris today, and all across France, tens of thousands of students took to the streets, demanding a fair chance at a job and protesting a new law that could make it easier to fire younger workers. Their protests turned violent when a small group set cars on fire, looted stores, and threw chunks of concrete at police." The Washington Post (3/24, A1, Moore, 744K) reports it was "just the scene the French government had been dreading: burning cars seven blocks from the Eiffel Tower, shop windows smashed along one of the capital's toniest streets, and columns of helmeted riot police advancing across the greensward of a prominent tourist venue. … Thursday's violence came at the end of a demonstration by tens of thousands of high school and college students protesting a new job law." The unrest "intensified a political crisis that now threatens to unravel President Jacques Chirac's government -- much the way previous French governments have been felled by strikes and street protests when they attempted even modest reforms of the country's costly welfare state."

Russia Seeks To Secure WTO Membership Before G-8 Summit. Russia is pushing to enter the WTO before it hosts that G-8 summit this summer. The Washington Times (3/24, Zarocostas, 90K) reports, "The talks can certainly "close before the G-8 summit," said Robert Vastine, president of the influential U.S. Coalition of Service Industries, a Washington-based umbrella group that represents major services corporations. But he indicated the ball is squarely in President Vladimir Putin's court."

EU Countries Consider Requiring Immigrants To Sign Contracts. Germany, Britain France, Poland, Spain and Italy, the six largest countries in the European Union, are considering having immigrants sign a contract that would require they learn their adopted country's language and social norms or risk being expelled. The Financial Times (3/24, Williamson) reports, "The so-called integration contract is still to be discussed with the other 19 EU member states. Nicolas Sarkozy, French interior minister, proposed it during a meeting of ministers from the 'G6' countries…in Heiligendamm, a luxury resort on Germany's Baltic coast."

Chirac Storms Out Of EU Summit; Merkel Warns Against Protectionism. The Financial Times (3/24, Parker, Smyth) reports French President Jacques Chirac "stormed out" of an EU summit meeting because a French business leader began speaking in English. "Mr Chirac's boycott reflected the tensions surrounding the two-day economic summit, which comes against a backdrop of French street protests over labour market reform and claims that Paris is engaged in protectionism of its energy market. The French president was not in the room to hear Mr Seillière urging leaders to 'resist national protectionism in order to avoid a negative domino effect.'" The Times notes German Chancellor Angela Merkel "issued a thinly veiled warning to France and Spain to open their energy markets, as the dispute over protectionism overshadowed the start of the summit." She "said Europe needed continent-wide industrial champions, and that attempts" to protect national energy firms "made nonsense of the EU's single market."

US Doctor Volunteering In Chad Profiled. NBC Nightly News (3/23, story 12, 2:30, Curry, 9.87M) profiles Dr. Peter Reynaud, who "volunteers for Doctors Without Borders where few dare to go -- the increasingly dangerous border between Darfur, Sudan, and Chad. Almost daily come new reports of violence against blacks, blamed on the Janjaweed, Arab militias the US says are supported by the government of Sudan." Despite "all the ugliness and violence he's experienced, the horror he's seen, Reynaud says he considers himself fortunate to be in this hospital now." Dr. Reynaud: "I think that these are big problems. But I think coming here and working here, I'm working for the world that I want to live in."

Peru's Humala Called "Openly Hostile" Toward Private Sector. Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/24, 2.11M) that investors are "spooked" because Peruvian presidential candidate Ollanta Humala, who appears likely to win the election two weeks form now, "is openly hostile toward the private sector. … His avowed intent to stick it to the private-sector -- with an emphasis on mineral and natural gas rights -- frightens investors." O'Grady adds that "what is nearly certain, if he makes it to the presidency, is that his tenure will increase property-rights insecurity and damage Peru's recent growth spurt. There can be no doubt that Peruvians face a crucial choice next month and that another Latin country is in danger of succumbing to yet another bout of corporatist authoritarianism."

Democracy Seen As Possible In Non-Western Nations. Amartya Sen, the 1998 Nobel laureate in economics, writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/24, 2.11M), "While it is easy enough to understand the widespread -- and increasing -- doubts about armed intervention allegedly aimed at jump-starting democracy in Iraq through largely foreign and military planning, it would be quite a leap from there to become skeptical of the general possibility of the emergence of democracy in any country that is currently nondemocratic. It is worth remembering that democracy has developed well enough in many countries in Asia, Africa and Latin America, and in the case of some, such as South Africa, even foreign assistance to local democratic movements (for example through economic boycott) has positively helped."

WPost Calls "Serious Peace Force" In Sudan Unlikely. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/24, A18, 744K) says that despite President Bush's words, "the odds of deploying a serious peace force" in Sudan "have receded," because Sudan's government "has threatened violent resistance to a muscular deployment. And Sudan's bluster carries more weight than Mr. Bush's statements. … So Mr. Bush's call for a more serious deployment has been buried for the moment. No peacekeeping force is going to be strong enough to shoot its way into Darfur to establish peace; it will require some form of assent from Sudan's government."

MILITARY-IRAQI VIEW _ 2 p.m. Army Brig. Gen. Anthony Cucolo hosts a media roundtable to discuss a U.S. Joint Forces Command unclassified historical report in book form released today on the Iraqi view of coalition military operations conducted in Iraq. The report was done by by U.S. Joint Forces Command's Joint Center for Operational Analysis, the Iraqi Perspective Project. The Project is a research effort focused on coalition military operations in Iraq from March to May 2003. It focused on the perspectives of the Iraqi civilian and military leadership involved in major combat operations gathered through interviews conducted during the fall and winter of 2003/2004, and an extensive review of Iraqi historical documents done in the months since then. The project is the first such effort by the U.S. government to understand the views of an enemy military force since World War II, when the U.S. government conducted a comprehensive review of recovered German and Japanese documents, along with interviews of key military and civilian leadership. Location: Room 2C554, Pentagon.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Moussaoui Prosecutors Conclude Case With Testimony From FBI Agent. Finishing presentation of their case at the penalty phase of al Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui's trial yesterday, prosecutors called former FBI Special Agent Aaron Zebley, who testified that the FBI could have conducted an investigation that might have led to the 9/11 hijackers, had Moussaoui admitted when he was arrested in August 2001 that he had received wire transfers from al Qaeda.

NBC Nightly News (3/23, story 4, 2:00, Brown) reported that "so far, the trial has exposed new details on how many clues the FBI ignored in the weeks before the 9/11 attacks." NBC (Williams) added Zebley testified that if Moussaoui "had admitted when he was arrested that a man in the United Arab Emirates wired him thousands of dollars," then "finding out who else was wired money from the same person and checking their phone and bank records could have put agents on the trail of 11 of the 19 hijackers." But "tough questioning from Moussaoui's lawyers has raised doubts about how aggressively the FBI would have actually pursued those leads." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "says the government has learned its very painful lessons." Gonzales: "And we obviously are more sensitive today about threats to the United States. And we believe that we have better procedures, better infrastructure to share information."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (3/24, Sniffen) reports, "U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema, who has told the jury it cannot decide Moussaoui's punishment 'on speculation,' barred Zebley from explicitly asserting what the FBI would have accomplished had he confessed," but "Zebley gave prosecutors their strongest testimony in a week when many of their witnesses ended up buttressing the defense." However, on cross-examination, defense lawyer Edward MacMahon "got Zebley to acknowledge that nothing in the confession or in FBI evidence gathered since then shows any contact between Moussaoui and the 9/11 hijackers."

AFP (3/24) adds, "MacMahon later challenged Zebley's assessments, as tempers frayed at the start of his cross-examination asking: 'So the FBI needs a confession from an Al-Qaeda terrorist to launch an investigation?' Brinkema then intervened, telling MacMahon and Zebley, who now works as a prosecutor at the Alexandria, Virginia, courthouse hosting the trial, to take a deep breath, 'calm down' and take a lunch break."

Under the headline "FBI Agent Says 9/11 Plot Was Within Grasp," The Los Angeles Times (3/24, Serrano) notes, "Zebley conceded that FBI does not believe Moussaoui was supposed to have been aboard one of the planes. 'There never was a 20th hijacker,' Zebley said. But he added, 'the plot was to get as many conspirators in the U.S. as possible.'"

The Washington Post (3/24, Markon, Dwyer) reports that as Moussaoui was being led from court after Zebley's testimony, he shouted, "I will testify, whether you want it or not!" although "it was unclear whether he was addressing his attorneys, with whom he does not speak and who have been against his taking the stand. But what was clear was that the case…could take yet another dramatic turn. Moussaoui is known for his courtroom outbursts, and even his attorneys don't know what he will say."

Meanwhile, The New York Times (3/24, Lewis) notes, "The trial, which will resume on Monday, offers the possibility of three dramatic moments in short order. First, the court may hear from Carla J. Martin, the Transportation Security Administration lawyer whose improper coaching of witnesses nearly derailed the trial. Then…the jury is expected to have the extraordinary experience of hearing testimony gathered in the United States' secret overseas detention system," as defense lawyers introduce testimony from al Qaeda terrorists Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, Ramzi bin al-Shibh and Mohammed Al-Qahtani.

Voice of America (3/24, Malone) reports, "Earlier this week, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the government has learned a lot of lessons from the 9/11 attacks, including how to respond more quickly to threat information gathered by agents in the field. … 'I am not going to comment on anything related to the trial,' Gonzales says. 'What I will say is that we obviously are more sensitive today about threats to the United States and we believe that we have better procedures, better infrastructure to share information.'" inspector general report that criticized the CIA for keeping" intelligence that 9/11 hijackers Nawaf al-Hazmi and Khalid al-Mindhar had entered the US "from the FBI for so long and the FBI for assigning pursuit of the pair to one inexperienced, young agent. It said the pair was on Thailand's watchlist in January, 2000, but not on a U.S. watchlist until August, 2001."

Analyst Denounces Civilian Trials Of Moussaoui, Saddam As "Charades." In a Washington Times (3/24) op-ed, DC-based terrorism analyst and author Eric Leskly writes, "The charades in Alexandria and Baghdad last week are final confirmation that the Bush administration has grievously erred in trying the Zacarias Moussaoui and Saddam Hussein cases in civilian courts instead of military tribunals. By attempting to use the trials as public-relations tools to demonstrate fair judicial process, the administration has disregarded the fact the clear and present danger posed by al Qaeda and the Iraqi insurgency require harsher procedures and penalties than those afforded by traditional criminal prosecution." And as Moussaoui and Saddam "use the trials instead to preach to their followers and sympathizers," the "botched cases may have even strengthened our enemies."

Trial Is Difficult For Victims' Family Members To Watch. The AP (3/24, Lester) reports, "The U.S. government's failure to act on repeated warnings before the Sept. 11 terrorist attack had Geraldine Davie fighting back tears as she talked about her 22-year-old daughter's death in the collapse of the World Trade Center. .. 'They all let us down,' Davie said Wednesday evening, voicing a sentiment shared by many of the victims' family members who are monitoring the sentencing trial of admitted al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui." The AP continues, "Victims' family members also had to watch the federal judge consider scuttling the prosecution's bid for the death penalty after learning last week that a government lawyer improperly coached witnesses. Some prosecution witnesses gave testimony about government missteps that the defense turned to its advantage. … 'Certainly, the case now is not as strong as it could be,' said Bill McGinly, of Vienna, Va., who lost a son in the attack on the World Trade Center. McGinly wants to see Moussaoui get the death penalty." The AP adds, "The court proceedings have been painful for victims' family members like Davie, whose daughter, Amy O'Doherty, was working at an investment firm at the World Trade Center in New York Cit; McGinly, whose son Mark worked at the trade center; and Eleni Kousoulis, whose sister Danielle worked at the same investment firm as O'Doherty. … 'The government knew a lot, if they had just paid more attention,' said Kousoulis of Merion, Pa. Even if government investigators couldn't prevent the attacks altogether, she said, they might have saved some lives."

In NSA Suit, Judge Rules Against Portland FBI Custody Of Classified Document. The AP (3/24, Fought) reports that in the lawsuit filed by the Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation challenging NSA surveillance of the charity's director in Saudi Arabia and two lawyers in the US, US District Judge Garr King ruled this week that "a secret document" about the NSA procedures in the case "will be held in a secure facility in Seattle while the judge and lawyers try to figure out how to keep it under wraps in Portland." King said that the classified documents "shouldn't be held at the local office of the FBI," despite the fact "the FBI office is the only place in Portland that has a facility that meets specifications for what the government calls 'sensitive compartmented information.'" The AP adds, "Anthony Coppolino of the U.S. Justice Department said the document wouldn't be altered if the FBI had it and said King could have it in a closed envelope, perhaps signing the seal to guard against unauthorized opening." But King said in a teleconference with lawyers in the case, "I'm not indicating there would be any problem with them, but they are a defendant so I don't think it's appropriate that they have custody of it."

Judge Denies Request For NSA Surveillance Information In Illegal Money Transfer Case. The AP (3/24, Thompson) reports U.S. District Judge William Skretny in Buffalo has ruled that "the government does not have to tell three men accused of illegally sending $3.5 million to Yemen whether secret wiretaps were used to investigate them, a judge has ruled. Without explanation…Skretny denied the defense request for information in a one-page decision dated Tuesday." The AP notes "Mohamed Albanna, Ali Elbaneh and Ali Albanna are charged with running an unlicensed business that delivered money from Yemeni-Americans in western New York to relatives overseas."

Former Pakistani Police Chief Describes Camps In Terms Similar To Hayat. The AP (3/24, Thompson) reports that at the trial of Umer and Hamid Hayat yesterday, former Pakistani police chief Hassan Abbas, who is now an author living in Massachusetts, "described a terrorist-training camp in Pakistan in an account similar to that given by" Hamid Hayat "during a lengthy interrogation by FBI agents last June." The AP notes, "Prosecutors have no hard evidence that Hamid Hayat actually attended such a camp. By putting Abbas on the stand, they sought to give jurors details about the kinds of training camps they claim Hamid Hayat attended. … Abbas, who was paid about $35,000 for his research and testimony…has been on the stand since Wednesday, testifying about Pakistani culture, religion and politics."

(3/23, Kobely) reports, "During defense questioning of expert witness Hassan Abbas, attorneys for Umer and Hamid Hayat argued that the wording of prosecution objections to defense questions were actually signals to Abbas about how to answer the question. … Defense attorney Wazhma Mojaddidi suggested that Abbas had worked out a system with prosecutors that if they objected to a line of defense questioning using the terms 'ambiguous' or 'vague,' that it was actually a signal for how Abbas should answer. Judge Garland Burrell immediately demanded attorneys approach the bench but after discussion, let the line of questioning continue."

US May Be Holding Pakistani Journalist. The Los Angeles Times (3/24, Ali, Zaidi, 958K) reports the family of Pakistani journalist Hayatullah Khan, who was "kidnapped in December, said Thursday that they believe he could be in U.S. custody." Khan was "abducted at gunpoint in the volatile North Waziristan tribal region Dec. 5 by armed, masked men whom a witness at the time described as dressed like fighters from the ousted Taliban regime of Afghanistan. But Ihsanullah Khan, the victim's brother, said that senior officials from Pakistan's intelligence agencies had told the family that Hayatullah was now beyond their jurisdiction." Ihsanullah Khan said, "We were told a few days ago that Mr. Khan was no longer in their possession. He might be somewhere in Pakistan or the United States being grilled for his possible links with Al Qaeda."

PATRIOT ACT:

Bush Says He Is Not Bound By Patriot Act Oversight Requirement. The Boston Globe (3/24, Savage) reports, "When President Bush signed the reauthorization of the USA Patriot Act this month, he included an addendum saying that he did not feel obliged to obey requirements that he inform Congress about how the FBI was using the act's expanded police powers." In a signing statement issued after the signing ceremony for the bill, Bush "said that he did not consider himself bound to tell Congress how the Patriot Act powers were being used and that, despite the law's requirements, he could withhold the information if he decided that disclosure would 'impair foreign relations, national security, the deliberative process of the executive, or the performance of the executive's constitutional duties.'"

FBI Confirms Use Of Patriot Act In Nevada Corruption Probe. The Las Vegas Review-Journal (3/23, Packer) reports, "Federal authorities confirmed in court Wednesday that they used the Patriot Act to access bank records while investigating alleged political corruption involving former Clark County commissioners and strip club owner Michael Galardi." The Review-Journal continues, "The Patriot Act, enacted after Sept. 11, 2001, as a tool to fight terrorism, included provisions that allowed authorities to access personal financial records more easily. … During the federal trial against former county Commissioners Mary Kincaid-Chauncey and Dario Herrera, defense attorneys revealed Wednesday that FBI agents had used the Patriot Act to track financial transactions executed by individuals involved in the case. … 'The Patriot Act made it easier for you to identify the bank accounts,' attorney Jerry Bernstein said during cross-examination of former FBI agent Joe Dickey." The Review-Journal adds, "Dickey said the government would have had to subpoena some 10,000 financial institutions nationwide had it not relied on the law. … One portion of the law directed the U.S. Treasury Department to streamline for law enforcement access to financial records. Law enforcement can send a suspect's name to the department and receive back a list of each financial institution that does business with the individual. … 'It simply helped us identify where banks were. It didn't give us information,' Dickey said of the Patriot Act provision. … That was just one tool federal agents used as they pieced together their case against Kincaid-Chauncey, Herrera, Galardi and former Commissioners Lance Malone and Erin Kenny." The AP (3/23) also reports this story.

Indiana Advocacy Groups Angered By FBI Agent's Challenge Of Patriot Act Criticism. The South Bend (IN) Tribune (3/24, Draeger) reports that after reading of negative comments made about the Patriot Act at a recent forum in Three Oaks, Ind., St. Joseph FBI Special Agent Al DiBrito "challenged Chellie Pingree's criticism…and tried to track down the head of the national nonpartisan group Common Cause, to set her straight. … DiBrito reportedly said Pingree was 'way off base' in her comments…and suggested the" League of Women Voters "should've invited the FBI to speak at the March 14 panel." In a March 21 letter to FBI Director Robert Mueller, Pingree and local League of Women Voters president Susan Gilbert wrote, "When the country has far more pressing security and terror concerns, we question the FBI using precious resources hounding leaders of two of the most distinguished citizen advocacy organizations in the country. Is this the kind of behavior citizen activists can expect from the FBI? To us, it smacks of intimidation." However, Michigan FBI Assistant SAC William Kowalski "defended DiBrito's phone call and said it's unfortunate that it was perceived as being threatening. The purpose of the call was to 'offer an opportunity to get out accurate information about the Patriot Act and how it is utilized to combat terrorism,' Kowalski said."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

US Hiring Hong Kong Firm To Run Radiation Detector In US Port. The AP (3/24, Bridis, Solomon) reports, "In the aftermath of the Dubai ports dispute, the Bush administration is hiring a Hong Kong conglomerate to help detect nuclear materials inside cargo passing through the Bahamas to the United States and elsewhere." The Administration "acknowledges the no-bid contract with Hutchison Whampoa Ltd. represents the first time a foreign company will be involved in running a sophisticated U.S. radiation detector at an overseas port without American customs agents present." The Administration "is negotiating a second no-bid contract for a Philippine company to install radiation detectors in its home country, according to documents obtained by The Associated Press."

Israeli Firm Withdraws Offer To Buy US Firm Over Security Questions. The Wall Street Journal/AP (3/24) reports, "Leading Israeli software company Check Point Software Technologies Ltd. abandoned plans to buy smaller U.S. rival Sourcefire Inc. for $225 million because of security objections raised by the Bush administration." The Israeli firm "formally withdrew its proposal near the conclusion of a rare, full-blown investigation by a U.S. review panel after the Ramat Gan, Israel-based company was told U.S. officials feared the transaction could endanger some of government's most sensitive computer systems."

State Department Criticized For Chinese Computer Deal. The New York Times (3/24, Brasher, 1.19M) reports, "A State Department purchase of more than 15,000 computers built by the Lenovo Group of China is starting to draw criticism in the latest sign of American unease about the role of foreign companies in the American economy." Assistant Secretary McCormack "said at the department's daily media briefing on Wednesday that the computers were intended for unclassified systems and would be serviced by the former I.B.M. division." The Times notes a broad spectrum of US groups oppose the contracts, and says some of these "critics warn that the deal could help China spy on American embassies and American intelligence-gathering activities, using hardware and software planted in the computers."

ICE Teaming With Law-Enforcement In "Tri-Border Area" To Tackle Terror Fundraising. The Washington Times (3/24, Seper, 90K) reports, "US Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents have teamed up with law-enforcement authorities in Argentina, Brazil and Paraguay to combat money laundering and other financial crimes in a remote and lawless region known as the 'Tri-Border Area.' Department of Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Julie L. Myers, who heads ICE, said multigovernment 'trade transparency units' will investigate and prosecute crimes including money laundering, terrorist financing, contraband smuggling and tax evasion." The area is described by US law-enforcement authorities as "a source of fundraising for radical Islamic groups, including Hezbollah, Hamas and al Qaeda, and the US government has worked cooperatively with governments in the region to disrupt fundraising activity."

NYTimes Criticizes Chertoff Over Chemical Plant Security Proposals. Under the headline "Secretary Of Homeland Insecurity," the New York Times (3/24, 1.19M) editorializes, "Sometimes it's hard to understand just how Michael Chertoff understands his title, secretary of homeland security." In speaking to the chemical industry Tuesday, Chertoff "did not chastise the industry for failing to protect chemical plants adequately" and "seemed perfectly content to defer on key security matters to an industry that contributes heavily to Republican campaigns but has proved to be dangerously unwilling to take public safety seriously." The Times states that Chertoff "should be speaking to the American people about his support for strong chemical plant security rules, not speaking to the chemical industry about his support for weak ones."

"Government Fixated On Doomsday" Still Drawing Up New Orders Of Succession. The Washington Post (3/24, A17, Baker, 744K) reports that in what was "at least the fifth time since the start of last year that an executive branch agency has created or revised an order of succession," the President "this week endorsed a new order of succession for the National Archives and Records Administration detailing down to the 10th level who would assume command in a national emergency." The Post adds, "In a government fixated on doomsday scenarios, officials "still busy themselves with the macabre exercise of figuring out who would be on top should the worst happen." The lineup changes sometimes "reflect one official moving up the chart at the expense of colleagues," while others involve "even more brazen power plays intended to put rivals in their places."

Silverstein's Ground Zero Brinkmanship Seen As Frequently Used Strategy. The New York Times (3/24, Bagli, 1.19M) reports on the failed negotiations between developer Larry Silverstein and the Port Authority over the rebuilding of ground zero in lower Manhattan, adding, "A look at Mr. Silverstein's long career in real estate and the negotiating style that has defined it suggests that, when it comes to making deals, it is almost never over. Not surprising, then, despite last week's ugly negotiating episode,

Mr. Silverstein's team has been talking through back channels with the other side this week." Silverstein has said "he fully expects to be back at the table within days to sign a deal that preserves his control over a major part of ground zero, a site that many consider sacred ground. State officials hope to resume face-to-face negotiations with him, too, but not until there is a fairly detailed agreement."

Paulison Working To Get FEMA Ready For Upcoming Hurricane Season. Under the headline "Acting Director Gives FEMA Focus," the Washington Times (3/24, Hudson, 90K) reports that acting FEMA Director R. David Paulison's "maligned agency is now planning for the hurricane season that officially begins June 1 as it continues to aid 800,000 families affected by last year's storms that damaged 90,000 square miles." He says, "The major lesson we learned is that FEMA was not ready to handle a catastrophe the size of Katrina, and we now know we have to be ready to respond to a major catastrophe such as an earthquake or terrorist attack, to evacuate hundreds of thousands or millions of people and be able to feed them, house them, and take care of them. We're putting a system in place to do just that." The Times adds that FEMA "faces many challenges, not only in housing, but also in communication, logistics, tracking supplies and learning about problems on the ground."

Louisiana Call Center Tracking Hurricane Victims Who Don't Want To Be Found. The Washington Post (3/24, A3, Ringle, 744K) reports that Louisiana's Find Family National Call Center is finding that "hundreds" of those reported missing after Hurricane Katrina "have used the storm and the nationwide diaspora it triggered to escape a troubled or painful past." The center has also "taken over from the Orleans Parish coroner's office most of the work of identifying the unclaimed dead." The center's deputy director, Henry Yennie "expects both the search for the missing and the identification of the dead to accelerate in the coming weeks because of the recent allocation of funds for obtaining access to a highly specialized LexisNexis online search."

Accusations Of Impropriety Among Volunteers Raise New Questions About Red Cross. The New York Times (3/24, Strom, 1.19M) reports, "The American Red Cross…is investigating wide ranging accusations of impropriety among volunteers after" Hurricane Katrina, including "improper diversion of relief supplies, failure to follow required Red Cross procedures in tracking and distributing supplies, and use of felons as volunteers in the disaster area in violation of Red Cross rules." While the charity "has drawn harsh criticism for failures in responding to Hurricane Katrina and for failing to address longstanding governance problems, the concerns raised by volunteers pose new questions about the organization's ability to prevent fraud and theft and protect its resources amid the chaos of a major disaster."

Barbara Bush Donation To Katrina Fund Raises Eyebrows. The Washington Post (3/24, A17, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that "the Houston Chronicle reports that former first lady Barbara Bush donated a chunk of money -- it's unknown how much -- to the Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund 'with specific instructions that the money be spent with an educational software company owned by her son Neil.'"

WAR NEWS:

Congressional Probe Of Pre-War Iraq Intelligence Likely Issue In 2006. With the congressional investigation into the Bush Administration's use of pre-war Iraq intelligence nearing fruition on several fronts, the conclusions are expected to quickly become a partisan issue in the 2006 midterm elections. If the Democrats are able to flip one of the chambers of Congress, they are expected to use the majority power to subpoena Administration officials. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, A4, Solomon, 2.11M) says the congressional reports "will include topics like predictions before the war on how a post-Saddam Iraq might look and whether the Bush administration was duped by Iraqis with a vested interest in war, like Deputy Prime Minister Ahmed Chalabi." But Republicans "have set no timetable for issuing reports on their probe into what some Democrats consider the most explosive questions: Whether political appointees at the Pentagon deliberately distorted intelligence and subverted analysis by the Central Intelligence Agency to gin up support for the invasion."

Bush Defense Of Iraq Policies Sparks Praise, Criticism. In his Wall Street Journal column (3/24, A10), Daniel Henninger says, "For those of us who've complained for more than two years that this White House was ill-serving the troops in Iraq by not making the public case for Iraq, that changed this week in Wheeling, W.Va." It "was an astounding, bravura performance. In fact, I'll pay him the highest possible compliment: It was Clintonesque." But there are "two obvious questions: Where's this guy been? And, to quote a long-ago factory boss, Is it a day late and a dollar short?"

Meanwhile, in his Washington Post column (3/24, A19), David Ignatius says the "polls suggest that Bush is losing the ability to communicate effectively about the issue that matters most to him. He has a better story on Iraq than many people seem to appreciate: Iraqi politicians are in fact coming together toward a government of national unity; Iraqi troops are improving their performance; substantial reductions in the number of U.S. troops are likely this year." But all the "speeches and rallies and white papers of the past few months have reflected a recognition that the public will support the war so long as it feels there is a coherent strategy for victory. That's why you hear the phrase 'plan for victory' repeated so often, like a mantra to convince the public that American soldiers aren't dying in a lost cause. But it's not working, and the president owes it to the troops, above all, to figure out a better way to communicate."

Also in the Washington Post column (3/24, A19), E.J. Dionne says, "Is President Bush the leader of our government, or is he just a right-wing talk-show host? The question comes to mind after Bush's news conference this week in which he sounded like someone who has no control over the government he is in charge of. His words were those of a pundit inveighing against the evils of bureaucrats." But when "their own government fails," Bush and his fellow Republicans "turn around and use their incompetence to argue that government can never work anyway, so you might as well keep electing conservatives to have less government. It's an ideological Catch-22. Even their failures prove they are right."

Krauthammer Sees Debate Over Iraqi "Civil War" As Spurious. In his Washington Post column (3/24, A19), Charles Krauthammer says, "This whole debate about civil war" in Iraq "is surreal. What is the insurgency if not a war supported by one (minority) part of Iraqi society fighting to prevent the birth of the new Iraqi state supported by another (majority) part of Iraqi society? By definition that is civil war, and there's nothing new about it." Krauthammer adds, "Is it not our entire counterinsurgency strategy to get Iraqis who believe in the new Iraq to fight Iraqis who want to restore Baathism or impose Taliban-like rule?"

US Opinion On Third Anniversary Of Iraq War Examined. USA Today (3/24, 2.31M) ran a sampling of newspaper editorials on the third anniversary of the Iraq war. The San Francisco Bay Guardian said, "(President) Bush's insistence on staying the course is starting to sound like Richard Nixon's secret plan to end the Vietnam War." The Wall Street Journal said, "The desire among so many of our political elites to repudiate Bush and his foreign policy is creating a dangerous public pessimism that could yet lead to defeat -- a defeat whose price would be paid by all Americans, and for years to come."

Rumsfeld Says US Still Plans Troop Reductions. The Washington Times (3/24, Scarborough, 90K) reports Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said "commanders are planning further troop reductions in Iraq despite ongoing violence that has killed hundreds of civilians after the February bombing of the Shi'ite Golden Mosque." Asked about President Bush's remark "that U.S. troops will be in Iraq until at least 2009, the year he leaves office, Mr. Rumsfeld said there could still be Americans training the Iraqi security forces (ISF). It was a clear signal that the defense secretary expects that by that time the United States' combat role will be greatly reduced."

Bush Funding Request For Iraq Bases Raises Questions About Troop Commitments. The Los Angeles Times (3/24, Spiegel, 958K) reports that even as "military planners look to withdraw significant numbers of American troops from Iraq in the coming year, the Bush administration continues to request hundreds of millions of dollars for large bases there, raising concerns over whether they are intended as permanent sites for U.S. forces." Congressional questions "about the future of the bases have been prompted by the new emergency spending bill for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, which overwhelmingly passed the House of Representatives last week with $67.6 billion in funding for the war effort, including the base money." Lawmakers are "demanding that the Pentagon explain its plans for the bases, and they unanimously passed a provision blocking the use of funds for base agreements with the Iraqi government."

Reconstruction Official Says Iraqis Must End Reliance On US Funds. USA Today (3/24, Frank, 2.31M) reports Daniel Speckhard, director of the Iraq Reconstruction Management Office, said "the Iraqi government can no longer count on U.S. funds and must rely on its own money and cash from other Persian Gulf nations to complete the massive undertaking" or rebuilding. While "hundreds of projects have been completed, but the top U.S. auditor for the program has criticized it for cost overruns, corruption, understaffing and bureaucratic infighting."

Three Hostages Rescued In Iraq. Three Christian peace activists were rescued from their captors in Iraq yesterday after a captured insurgent provided intelligence that led coalition troops to their location. The story was covered by each of the networks last night, and was the lead on CBS. The CBS Evening News (3/23, story 1, 3:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Ironically," the peace activists "had gone to Iraq to investigate alleged abuses against Iraqi prisoners and when the body of American Tom Fox was found earlier this month, there was not much hope the others would be found alive. Today, acting on a tip, British and US forces stormed a house and freed them without firing a shot." CBS (Logan) added, "With these hostages safe, thoughts immediately turn to another American hostage, Jill Carroll, who is still missing."

ABC World News Tonight (3/23, story 2, 2:10, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "US General Rick Lynch says a break came last night when coalition forces detained two individuals, one of whom told them where the hostages were in a house west of Baghdad." Of the "19 Americans taken hostage, 6 are still missing, including reporter Jill Carroll." The hostages "who were freed today belong to a Christian peace group which has blamed the kidnapping on what it calls America's illegal occupation of Iraq. Today, a spokesman wasn't even willing to give coalition forces credit for his colleague's rescue."

NBC Nightly News (3/23, story 2, 2:10, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "The freed hostages had new information today about the fate of American Tom Fox. Fox, they said, was separated from them 40 days ago. His tortured body was discovered in Baghdad earlier this month." British hostage Norman Kember, "who had said he didn't want a military rescue operation, tonight admitted, 'It's good to be free.'"

The Washington Post (3/24, Anderson, 744K) reports "circumstances of the rescue operation, which was spearheaded by the British, were being closely held." Doug Pritchard, co-director of Christian Peacemaker Teams, "said in a televised news conference in Toronto that no shots were fired and no captors were present at the time of the rescue. He declined to divulge the source of his information." British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw "later confirmed the absence of gunfire." The New York Times (3/24, Semple, 1.19M) says "Thursday's rescue, by a force that included American and British troops, represented one of the few times that military action in Iraq has played a decisive role in a hostage release." But "within hours, a surge of four car bombings, including a suicide attack, struck Baghdad, killing at least 23 people, wounding at least 48 and tempering the military's euphoria from the morning's success."

The AP (3/23, Mroue) reports "the US ambassador and the top American military spokesman held out hope the operation on the outskirts of Baghdad could lead to a break in the captivity of American reporter Jill Carroll, a freelance writer for The Christian Science Monitor who was abducted Jan. 7." The Christian Science Monitor (3/24, Peterson, 61K) reports "Carroll's family said Thursday that they were 'thrilled' to hear of the CPT members' release. 'Although their case is unrelated to Jill's, their release gives us new hope that Jill, too, will soon be freed. We send our best wishes to these three men and their families, knowing that their reunion will be a joyful one.'" They added that "we are also thinking of the family of Tom Fox at this time and send them our heartfelt sympathy." The Los Angeles Times (3/24, Bodreaux, 958K) runs a similar story.

US Military Trains Soldiers To Prepare For Kidnapping. The CBS Evening News (3/23, story 2, 2:20, MacVicar, 7.66M) reported, "The risk of kidnap is so high that the US military commissioned this training video to be shown to US soldiers. The tape, obtained by CBS News, covers everything from the moment of capture to what could be months of isolation and possible endings. Death is never mentioned." Former hostage, British journalist Phil Sands, said "the kidnap scene was all too familiar."

Bombings Kill 56 Iraqis, One US Soldier. ABC World News Tonight (3/23, story 3, :15, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Insurgents carried out a third attack on a police station in three days there. More than two dozen people were killed in the bombing. But no prisoners escape escaped. In attacks across the country today, 56 Iraqis and one US soldier were killed." The CBS Evening News (3/23, story 3, 0:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "A powerful car bomb hit a market outside the Shiite mosque in Baghdad, killing at least six."

US Military Spokesman Says 75% Of Attacks Occur In Three Provinces. USA Today/AP (3/24) reports, "A US military spokesman in Iraq said Thursday that major violence is largely confined to three of 18 provinces." The US military spokesman, Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, said, "There is not widespread violence across Iraq. There is not. Seventy-five percent of the attacks still take place in Baghdad, al-Anbar or Salah al-Din (provinces). And in the other 15 provinces, they all averaged less than six attacks a day, and 12 of those provinces averaged less than two attacks a day." He said "attacks nationwide were averaging 75 a day."

Respect For Law, Rights Comes Slowly For Iraqi Security Forces. The New York Times (3/24, Wong, 1.19M) reports on the "challenge facing the American military as it tries to train the Iraqi security forces to respect the rule of law." US troops "are no longer simply teaching counterinsurgency techniques; they are trying to school the Iraqis in battling a Sunni-led rebellion without resorting to the tactics of a 'dirty war,' involving abductions, torture and murder." The "legacy of Abu Ghraib hampers the American military. But the need to instill respect for human rights has gained a new urgency as Iraq grapples with the threat of full-scale civil war and continuing sectarian bloodletting."

Iraqi Exiles Divided Over Country's Future. Iraqis who fled Saddam Hussein's regime in the '80's and '90's have more optimistic views of the country's future than those who have sought asylum in the US since the regime's end. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, A1, Dreazen, 2.11M) reports, "Debate over the war in Iraq has erupted in communities of Iraqi exiles across the U.S., dividing families. The conflict is pitting longtime exiles who fled Mr. Hussein's Iraq -- many of whom support the war -- against newer arrivals who have left the country since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003."

Troops' Experience In Iraq Seen As Microcosm Of US Policy. NBC Nightly News (3/23, story 3, 2:45, Boettcher, 9.87M) reported on the experience of the Alpha Company, 2nd Battalion, 4th Infantry Division in Iraq, which "learned a lesson" in its deployment to Iraq. It is "easier getting to an objective than leaving it. It's the same on the grand scale. Invading Iraq was relatively easy. Leaving it is proving more difficult."

US Increases Pressure On Karzai Over Christian Convert's Fate. An Afghan court is considering the case of Abdul Rachman, an Afghan who converted to Christianity 16 years ago and faces death penalty. The Rahman case has the potential to create a rift with the US and other Western nations, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has asked President Hamid Karzai to intervene. However, the Washington Post (3/24, A14, 744K) and Washington Times (3/24, Cooney, 90K) run an AP story reporting "senior Muslim clerics demanded Thursday that an Afghan man on trial for converting from Islam to Christianity be executed, warning that if the government caves in to Western pressure and frees him, they will incite people to 'pull him into pieces.'" Moreover, the New York Times (3/24, Wafa, Rohde, 1.19M) reports "the judge presiding over the prosecution of an Afghan man facing death for converting from Islam to Christianity said Thursday that he would resist any interference, despite mounting international condemnation." Maulavi Muhaiuddin Baloch, "Karzai's adviser on religious affairs, said that the case belonged in the court and that Afghanistan's judiciary was independent."

The story was covered by each of the networks, and was the lead on both ABC and NBC. NBC Nightly News (3/23, lead story, 2:45, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Today, a senior Muslim cleric in Afghanistan said Rahman should be beheaded. The controversy prompted the Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to make a call to Afghanistan's President Hamid Karzai today." Condoleezza Rice, Secretary of State: "There is no more fundamental issue for the United States than freedom of religion and religious conscience." Seigenthaler: "With the deaths of 221 US servicemen and women who fought to oust the Taliban, and 23,000 American troops still on the ground in Afghanistan, the question that many are asking tonight is shouldn't the United States have something to say about whether Rahman is executed?" Tony Perkins, Family Research Council: "I just cannot begin to comprehend that Americans would give up their money and their sons and daughters to a regime that would execute Christians." Seigenthaler: "The Rahman case presents new political problems for President Bush." Larry Sabato, University of Virginia: "This is really President Bush's worst nightmare because it takes his base and divides it at a time when he can least afford it because he's already so low in the polls."

ABC World News Tonight (3/23, lead story, 2:45, Cuomo, 8.78M) reported, "There has been considerable foreign pressure on President Karzai to rectify the situation. And late today, the Canadian Prime Minister announced that Mr. Karzai had given assurances that Rahman will not be executed. But also today, the judge in the case said he would not bow from foreign pressure."

The CBS Evening News (3/23, story 4, 0:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice took the unusual step of phoning Afghan President Karzai and later spoke with reporters at the State Department." Condoleezza Rice, Secretary of State: "People must have a right to conscience and religious conscience. This is a very deeply concerning development in Afghanistan, and we have raised it at the highest levels." AFP (3/24) reports Rice "said she phoned Karzai specifically to hammer home 'in the strongest possible terms' Washington's concern over the proceedings against Abdul Rahman, who was arrested two weeks ago under Islamic Sharia law."

The Los Angeles Times (3/24, Richter, 958K) also reports the story, saying the "is further heightening tensions between the West and the Islamic world." USA Today (3/24, Slavin, 2.31M) reports Gary Bauer, president of American Values, "said US officials have to be 'clear and bold' in talking about the case. 'This whole enterprise is an effort to bring democratic principles to that part of the world. That means more than elections, it means religious pluralism.'" Bauer "sent an e-mail Wednesday to a quarter of a million supporters saying that the execution of the convert, Abdul Rahman, 'would very likely result in a complete collapse in support for the war.'" James Zogby, president of the Arab American Institute in Washington, "worries that the case will intensify tensions between Christians and Muslims."

US Training African Paratroopers To Counter Possible Terror Threats. ABC World News Tonight (3/23, story 7, 2:55, Karl, 8.78M) reported on the US Special Forces effort to train the militaries of African nations in the Sahara region to effectively counter possible terrorist threats. In Niger, US troops are training that country's paratroopers, earning significant good will in the process. The "land-locked, desert nation is short of resources, but full of spirit. The country's pride, its paratroopers." Maradi, Niger's "third-largest city has an airport, but no airplanes. Most of these men haven't parachuted for four years. But on this day, US Special Forces are giving them a chance to jump." A team "of 12 US Army Special Forces, some of America's best-trained soldiers, have spent a couple months here. Part of a Pentagon program to train North African armies to combat terrorism." For "these soldiers, and for the people watching below, it's also quite simply a thrill. If nothing else, the US Special Forces have made some friends in Niger."

General Suggests Conventional ICBMs As Deterrent To Terrorists. The Washington Times (3/24, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "The United States could use a force of intercontinental ballistic missiles with conventional warheads because nuclear weapons may not deter terrorists and rogue states, the general in charge of the U.S. Strategic Command says. Marine Corps Gen. James E. Cartwright told a Pentagon-sponsored missile defense conference on Monday that 'it's very difficult for a nuclear weapon to be a credible deterrent against an extremist.'"

Report Says Defense Department To Run Short Of Missile Scientists. USA Today (3/24, Kelley, 2.31M) reports a study released this week by the Defense Science Board says "the Pentagon risks running out of scientists to operate and upgrade the nation's arsenal of intercontinental nuclear and conventional missiles." The reports says that as "the nation's veteran engineers and scientists retire, the military will lose much of its expertise in long-range missile technology, the report says. That means the Air Force and Navy, which operate most of the 1960s-vintage missiles, will be unable to cope with system failures or develop improved weapons."

Albright Says "Good Vs Evil" Dichotomy "Doesn't Work." In an op-ed in the Financial Times (3/24), former Secretary Albright says the Administration's "newly unveiled national security strategy might well be subtitled 'The Irony of Iran.'" Tehran's "radical government has been vastly strengthened by the invasion of Iraq. This is more tragedy than strategy, and it reflects the Manichean approach this administration has taken to the world." Albright calls the division of the world into good and evil camps "fiction. The administration's penchant for painting its perceived adversaries with the same sweeping brush has led to a series of unintended consequences." She says the Administration "is now divided between those who understand this complexity and those who do not," and suggests the US tackle difficult problems as a way to end tyranny, renounce aggression towards Iran, and address political realities in the Middle East. The Los Angeles Times (3/24, 958K) also runs Albright's op-ed.

Muslim Criticism Of Preemption Doctrine Examined. In a USA Today op-ed (3/24), Yale University fellow Irshad Manji says, "Honesty demands that Muslims in the USA judge the doctrine of pre-emption by a single standard. That requires making a choice. We can accept what the prophet did as necessary and guided by God, in which case we can't be shocked when the president makes a similar case for his policy. Or we can acknowledge that the prophet Mohammed's pre-emptive assaults on Jews were morally wrong, in which case we've got credibility when slamming the Bush doctrine."

DOJ:

Schlozman Named Interim US Attorney For Western Missouri. The Springfield (MO) News-Leader (3/24) reports, "Bradley J. Schlozman was appointed today as interim U.S. attorney for the Western District of Missouri, the Justice Department said. … The interim appointee replaces Todd P. Graves, whose last day is Friday." The News-Leader continues, "Graves announced his resignation earlier this month, after nearly five years of prosecuting federal cases in western Missouri. Graves has said he plans to return to private practice and become more involved in politics. … Schlozman will be there until President Bush appoints a permanent replacement, probably by summer, a U.S. Attorney spokesman said."

The AP (3/24) reports, "Schlozman most recently was principal deputy assistant attorney general for the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice, where he supervised a unit that included more than 700 employees - 356 of them attorneys. … Schlozman has been with the Department of Justice since 2001. He is originally from Overland Park, Kan., and graduated with a degree in history from the University of Pennsylvania."

Flynn Begins Work As Western New York US Attorney. The Buffalo News (3/24) reports, "Terrance P. Flynn began work Wednesday as U.S. attorney for Western New York." The News continues, "The U.S. Justice Department said the Buffalo lawyer was sworn in as U.S. attorney this week, after being confirmed by the U.S. Senate. … President Bush nominated Flynn for the job last December, after Michael A. Battle accepted a Washington position as Justice Department liaison with its U.S. attorneys nationwide."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Defense Attorneys Attack Former Treasurer's Credibility. The New York Times (3/24, Barrionuevo, Bajaj) reports, "Defense lawyers began an aggressive cross-examination of Enron's former treasurer today in attempt to show the tough tactics used by the government to induce cooperative testimony from a lower-level officer against the failed energy company's onetime top executives." The Times continues, "Trying to sow seeds of doubt in the jury's mind about the damaging testimony that the treasurer, Ben F. Glisan Jr. gave against his former bosses, Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay, on Wednesday, a defense lawyer asked him today about his interactions with federal investigators and the time he spent in solitary confinement. The questioning yielded revealing details about how the government conducted its investigation and pursued officials involved in the biggest corporate scandal of the decade so far." The Times adds, "Mr. Glisan presents an interesting challenge for the defense because unlike other witnesses who have been called by the prosecution, he has little incentive to cooperate with the government. Mr. Glisan, 40, does not have a plea deal with prosecutors and is more than halfway through serving a five-year prison sentence after pleading guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud. … He is testifying under a grant of immunity from the judge for other crimes he may have committed at Enron, but Mr. Glisan could face obstruction of justice and perjury charges if he lies on the stand."

The Wall Street Journal (3/24, McWilliams, Davis) reports that Glisan had testified that Skilling and Lay "approved accounting manipulations that allowed Enron to increase earnings and hide losses while telling investors its energy businesses were a success. Under cross-examination, Mr. Glisan backed away from some of his characterizations. Mr. Glisan pleaded guilty to an Enron-related conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud and is serving a five-year prison sentence." The Journal continues, "Wednesday, Mr. Glisan described meetings with the two executives where, he said, they approved the improper use of reserves, misled investors and hid losses. He testified to the use of 'side deals' to insulate an investment partnership run by Andrew Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, from losses in its Enron dealings. … Mr. Glisan said when presented with a plan to create an investment vehicle that relied on Enron shares to hedge investments, Mr. Skilling said he wouldn't routinely approve such a vehicle, except that it allowed the company 'to circumvent accounting rules.' Yesterday, Mr. Glisan backed off from the phrase, saying he wasn't testifying to Mr. Skilling's exact words. Mr. Glisan also admitted recommending Mr. Skilling approve the investment vehicles and said he never told the former president or other executives that the hedges would be improper. … 'You lied all day yesterday, didn't you?' asked Daniel Petrocelli, lead defense attorney for Mr. Skilling. Mr. Glisan said that he told Mr. Skilling the investment vehicle didn't transfer economic risk, a violation of accounting rules, and that it could draw the scrutiny of the Securities and Exchange Commission. Mr. Petrocelli argued that the investment vehicles were approved by the company's outside auditor, attorneys and others. He suggested that while the two executives made optimistic statements in the summer and fall of 2001, they did so in the best interests of Enron stockholders."

The Washington Post (3/24, D1, Johnson) reports that Glisan "insisted that the company's financial problems were mounting even as (Lay) displayed optimism to the public. … 'What we were telling banks, rating agencies and investors was inconsistent with economic reality,' Glisan said." The Post notes, "Discrediting Glisan…is paramount to the defense case. Prosecutors used Glisan to remind the jury of their central allegations and to corroborate testimony by more personally tainted witnesses, including former finance chief Andrew S. Fastow. While Glisan shifted in his seat, repeatedly sought to clarify statements by Petrocelli and sometimes laughed in frustration during cross-examination, he did not lose his composure. However, he did retreat from some of the language he used to describe Lay's and Skilling's actions."

US Indicts Seven In Bank Of Alamo Probe. The Jackson (TN) Sun (3/24) reports, "A federal investigation into the 2002 failure of the Bank of Alamo has led to the indictments of at least seven people, according to a release from the U.S. Justice Department." The Sun continues, "On Wednesday, a federal grand jury returned indictments accusing them of various charges of conspiracy, money laundering and bank fraud, according to the release." The Sun adds, "Those named in the indictment include: Claude M. Conley, director and chairman of the Bank of Alamo Board of Directors; John Sanders, president and chief executive officer of the bank; Lazaria Saveh, William Saveh and George Eivazzadeh. The indictment says the defendants made 'and caused to be made false and fraudulent statements in the books and records of the bank.' … The indictment said the false statements were made to cover up loans made to William Saveh in excess of the bank's legal lending limit and to conceal from the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. and state regulators the true financial condition of the Bank of Alamo."

Some Doubt Need For Third Quattrone Trial. The New York Times (3/24, Creswell) reports, "What do John A. Gotti; Cendant's former chief executive, Walter A. Forbes; and Frank P. Quattrone, the former investment banker, all have in common? … As vastly different as those three cases are, they may all be threepeats, with each facing the prospect of a third trial in federal court." The Times continues, "For Mr. Quattrone, that prospect emerged on Monday after a federal appeals court overturned his 2004 conviction on obstruction of justice charges. … The ruling faulted the judge's instructions to the jury, saying that they had failed to adequately require jurors to establish that Mr. Quattrone intended to thwart a government investigation. But the appeals panel did not reject the quality of the evidence presented in the government's case, which could bolster prosecutors' decision to retry Mr. Quattrone. … 'It was thrown out because of flawed jury instructions, so I don't think we'll see the government walk away from this case,' said Robert A. Mintz, a former prosecutor and now a partner at McCarter & English." The Times notes, "But much has changed since the United States attorney's office in Manhattan began its investigation of Mr. Quattrone in 2001. The prosecutors who brought the original case have left for private practice at prestigious Manhattan law firms. By some estimates, the office has already spent thousands of hours and millions of dollars in two trials to reach a guilty verdict against Mr. Quattrone, the son of a Philadelphia garment worker who rose to become the most powerful banker in Silicon Valley during the height of the dot-com boom. … Because of the passage of time — and in the wake of a number of high-profile white-collar convictions in recent years, including Martha Stewart, Bernard J. Ebbers of WorldCom and John J. Rigas of Adelphia Communications — some lawyers wonder whether there is a need to put Mr. Quattrone's feet to the fire once again."

Judge May Set Trial Date For Former Qwest CEO. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Young) reports, "A U.S. district-court judge in Denver today is expected to set a trial date for Joseph Nacchio, the former Qwest Communications International Inc. chief executive charged with 42 counts of criminal insider trading." The Journal continues, "Judge Edward Nottingham may also rule on defense arguments for dismissal of the charges, which carry a potential prison sentence of 10 years for each count and a financial penalty of more than $100 million. … U.S. Attorney William Leone alleges Mr. Nacchio illegally sold $101 million worth of the Denver-based phone company's stock in 2001 when he knew the company wasn't doing as well as it had led investors to believe. The defense says prosecutors have presented a flimsy and flawed case." The Journal adds, "Attempts to have the charges dismissed are commonplace and carry virtually no risk for defendants, and they are rarely entirely successful, say white-collar-crime attorneys not involved in the case. … Herbert Stern, Mr. Nacchio's attorney, says his client had nothing more than vaguely worded, speculative warnings from other executives that the company might not meet financial targets if business didn't improve. That isn't the same as knowing that the company has actually faltered, according to court filings by the defense. The defense also argues that the information Mr. Nacchio had was, by definition, not significant since the prosecution hasn't claimed that it needed to be disclosed to investors."

SEC Probe Leads To Refco Files. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Mollenkamp, McDonald) reports, "Authorities and some creditors of Refco Inc. want to know more about money the brokerage firm shuttled between some of its business units in the days before it filed for bankrupty protection." The Journal continues, "They may be able to learn some important details from Christopher Sugrue, a New York money manager and past employee of Refco, which imploded just weeks after its August initial public offering when Refco disclosed that its former chief executive, Phillip Bennett, had hidden bad debts." The Journal adds, "U.S. securities regulators have been seeking information regarding such business dealings with Refco. And lawyers working for Refco unsecured creditors have sought information from Mr. Sugrue because of what court filings by those creditors describe as a 'close relationship' between the 35-year-old Long Island native and Refco, where Mr. Sugrue was an executive before he helped launch PlusFunds Group Inc. … After Refco filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy-court protection Oct. 17, the Securities and Exchange Commission visited PlusFunds' Manhattan offices and asked for a battery of records, according to a report attached to a sworn statement by S. David Peress, a crisis consultant hired by PlusFunds."

Sarbanes Defends Sarbanes-Oxley Law. In remarks to the Consumer Federation of America, Sen. Paul Sarbanes offered a defense of the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate governance law and suggested efforts to roll it back are on shay legal ground. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Hughes, 2.11M) reports, "Critics have asserted the law was enacted hastily and created too many burdens for companies. … 'It's asserted by some that the law was enacted in haste,' Mr. Sarbanes said. 'I think this is an affront to the hard work and the common sense of the members of Congress who shaped the legislation, moved it through their respective houses and voted for it. We had an extremely thorough, careful set of hearings.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Launches Probe Of Ryan Juror Over Questionnaire. The Chicago Tribune (3/24, Gibson, O'Connor, Heinzmann) reports, "A federal judge launched an investigation into a juror in the George Ryan trial Thursday hours after the Tribune reported to court officials that public records appear to show the man had hidden a felony DUI conviction from the court during jury selection." The Tribune continues, "The revelation cast a shadow over the historic prosecution of the former governor, and could potentially lead to a motion for a mistrial or form grounds for the juror's dismissal with deliberations already underway. … Court records matching the suburban juror's name and other identifying information show a conviction for aggravated drunken driving-a felony-while Ryan was secretary of state in 1995." The Tribune adds, "In a sworn questionnaire filled out by potential jurors before the trial's start last September, the juror answered 'no' when asked if he, a close friend or relative had ever been charged or accused of a crime. … State records also show that the driving privileges for a man matching the juror's name had been revoked or suspended on numerous occasions during Ryan's term as secretary of state as well. … On the questionnaire, the juror denied having any 'bad experience' with the secretary of state's office and passed on a chance to discuss anything privately with the judge. … The latest twist in the marathon trial came amid indications of dissension in the jury in its second week of deliberations and as the judge warned jurors to treat one another 'with dignity and respect.'" The Chicago Sun-Times (3/24, Korecki) notes that US District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer dismissed jurors yesterday afternoon and said that they will return Monday morning to continue deliberations. The Sun-Times adds that earlier yesterday, "Pallmeyer admonished jurors in a letter to treat one another 'with dignity and respect' and to stop breaking off into smaller groups."

The AP (3/34, Robinson) also reports on the incident and adds, "Los Angeles-based jury consultant Phil Anthony, chief executive officer of DecisionQuest Inc., said in a telephone interview Thursday that based on the turmoil of the last few days 'I suspect that this jury is not going to reach a decision.' But he said that might be prevented if Pallmeyer took strong action to refocus the jury."

Philadelphia Businessman Pleads Guilty To Bribing Mariano. The AP (3/24) reports Reinaldo Pastrana, "a businessman friend" of City Councilman Rick Mariano, "pleaded guilty Thursday to paying the councilman's health-club dues in exchange for help with a city land deal." Pastrana "did not cooperate in the case against…Mariano, who was convicted last week of 18 of 22 bribery and fraud counts. Pastrana paid $5,400 for Mariano's membership fees, while Mariano helped him acquire a city property for $100,000, far below its appraised value." The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/24, Shiffman, 423K) notes, "Last year, after the FBI investigation became public, the councilman gave the developer a backdated check to make it appear as if he had repaid him, prosecutor Kenya Mann said in a court filing. But, she said, Mariano also told Pastrana not to cash the check because he didn't have enough money in his bank account."

Murder Victim's Mother Testifies At "Mafia Cops" Trial, But Does Not Identify Defendants. Newsday (3/24, DeStefano) reports, "Betty Hydell, the murder victim's mother who helped jump-start the investigation into the so-called 'Mafia Cops,' testified Thursday but did not identify the two defendants as the men with badges who came looking for her son the day he disappeared. Hydell, whose son James went missing in September 1986, also didn't testify about how she had reportedly recognized the face of…Louis Eppolito, some years later on a television talk show," as defense lawyers had expected." But The New York Post (3/24, Haberman, 624K) notes, "Hydell was not asked to identify or whether she recognized" Eppolito or Caracappa," although "she said of the two stakeout cops: 'One was the big one, one was the little one.'" The New York Daily News (3/24, Marzulli, 729K) also reports on Hydell's testimony, under the headline "Testimony Against Mafia Cops A Dud."

Meanwhile, The New York Times (3/24, Feuer, 1.19M) reports that earlier yesterday, Steven Corso, "tax cheat, thief and disgraced accountant," was cross examined by Eppolito lawyer Bruce Cutler, after spending "the last two days…telling jurors that the two detectives moved to Las Vegas in the early 1990's and committed a smattering of federal crimes." Cutler "sought to paint the 50-year-old Mr. Corso as a debauched and profligate government pawn: a man, he said, who left $600,000 in 'unpaid lines of credit at various and sundry casinos.'"

Four In New York Arrested On Fraud Charges In Russian Pipeline Sting. Newsday (3/24, Kessler) reports, "The only thing that was real yesterday was the Republic of Buryatia. Four alleged con men believed they were about to collect $3 billion yesterday from a wealthy Nassau County hedge fund operator for the 'construction' of an oil pipeline through that obscure Siberian region, federal officials said. But the four…ended up being arrested on fraud charges by federal agents on Long Island, in Montana and in Georgia." Newsday notes, "The hedge fund operator was an unidentified Long Island man who had pleaded guilty to securities fraud and worked on sting operations for the FBI and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service to get a lighter sentence, according to court documents."

FBI Sting Leads To Indictment Of Michigan Man On Child Porn Charges. The AP (3/24) reports, "U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy on Thursday announced child pornography charges against a Flint man and said he was launching a new initiative to crack down on what he said is a growing Internet trade in such images." Alan Sain "was indicted Wednesday on charges that he enticed, coerced and used a child to engage in sexually explicit conduct and produced pictures of the acts. … In an affidavit that accompanied an initial complaint against Sain filed last week, FBI Special Agent Jennie McGlynn Emmons described posting a profile on several Yahoo! interest groups she said were associated with child exploitation. Emmons said Sain contacted her, chatted online with her and sent her child pornography."

The Detroit News (3/24, Egan) reports, "The U.S. attorney's office will seek maximum penalties for all who abuse or exploit children as part of a new initiative announced Thursday to fight child pornography." The News continues, "U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy said he has assigned seven assistant attorneys, led by Assistant Attorney John O'Brien, to become experts on child exploitation cases. … Murphy's office also will work more closely with other federal, state and local law enforcement agencies and will launch an Internet safety and awareness program in local schools, he said at a news conference in Detroit. … 'If we can't do all we can to protect (children), then we can't do much,' Murphy said. 'We intend to put these sick individuals in jail for as long as we possibly can.'"

Former Georgia Scout Leader Sentenced To Probation For Child Porn Possession. The AP (3/24) reports Samuel J. Port of Ball Ground, Georgia, "who served more than five years as a Boy Scout troop leader"was "sentenced Wednesday in federal court to eight years probation and six months of home confinement for possessing dozens of video clips of child pornography, according to a news release from the U.S. Attorney's office in Atlanta. Port came to the attention of the FBI after he brought in his employer-owned computer for maintenance, according to the release. … The FBI did a forensic scan of Port's computer and discovered more than 100 movie clips containing pornography related to young boys."

Four Charged In Nigeria E-Mail Scam. CNET News (3/23, Broache) reports, "A quartet of suspected e-mail scammers--three of them Nigerian citizens--could face scores of years in prison if convicted on fraud and conspiracy charges, the U.S. Justice Department said Thursday." CNET continues, "A grand jury in Brooklyn, N.Y., on Wednesday charged Nnamdi Chizuba Anisiobi, Anthony Friday Ehis, Kesandu Egwuonwu and another unnamed defendant with one count of conspiracy, eight counts of wire fraud and one count of mail fraud. Anisiobi also faces one count of bank fraud." CNET adds, "According to the Justice Department's charges, New York-based victims of the e-mail scams lost more than $1.2 million to the fraudsters. … Their schemes resembled a popular fraud ploy, sometimes called a 419 scam, or an advance-fee scheme, that has dogged the African nation. Their perpetrators typically send letters and e-mails to thousands of victims, offering a large sum of money and attempt to dupe them into paying fees beforehand. The criminals then pocket the cash and shirk their end of the fake bargain."

US To Seek Death Penalty For New York Drug Kingpin. The AP (3/23, Hays) reports, "The murder conspiracy trial of a notorious crack kingpin with ties to the rap music industry was postponed on Thursday after prosecutors told a judge that the Department of Justice wants him and his four co-defendants to face the death penalty." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Frederic Bloch rescheduled the trial of Kenneth 'Supreme' McGriff, previously set for April 3, for April 17. He said he would rule by April 10 on the government's death penalty request." The AP adds, "At a hearing in federal court in Brooklyn, defense attorney David Ruhnke called the government's request an 11th-hour 'sham' imposed by a pro-death penalty Justice Department and designed to buy prosecutors more time to prepare their case. He argued that the allegations don't meet the federal standards for a capital case. … Seeking death for defendant Nicole Brown — accused of being a lookout in the 2001 retaliation slaying of a rapper known as E-Money Bags — in particular 'is simply absurd,' he said." The AP notes, "Prosecutor Carolyn Pokorny insisted the request was legitimate, saying, 'It's something that got a really close look in Washington.' … McGriff was founder of the Supreme Team, once one of the city's most violent drug crews. Investigators allege that after he finished serving about nine years for drug conspiracy in 1997 he set about reviving his drug-dealing operation."

Oklahoma Doctor Indicted On Medicare Billing Fraud Charges. The Alva (OK) Review-Courier (3/24) reports Alva Dr. Gregory Glase Pinegar was indicted Thursday on charges of "fraudulently billing Medicare for the administration of significantly more medication than was actually given to his patients. … Dr. Pinegar is a family practice physician operating his own medical offices in Alva, Oklahoma, who served approximately 300 Medicare eligible patients. The indictment focuses on two prescription medications: Procrit and Remicade." The Review-Courier notes, "The case is the result of an investigation conducted by the Office of Inspector General for the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services and the Federal Bureau of Investigation."

Internet Sports Wagering Gaining In Popularity. The Las Vegas Sun (3/24, Benston) reports, "Online, or 'offshore' sports books might seem irrelevant in a town with dozens of sports books and more than 35 on the (Las Vegas) Strip alone. … That couldn't be further from the truth." The Sun continues, "Online sports betting sites aren't just flourishing in the rest of the country, where sports books are illegal everywhere except Nevada. Internet sites have found a hot spot in Nevada and especially in Las Vegas, home to one of the biggest concentration of gamblers and a place where bettors come from all over the world to hone their skills. … No one knows how much of this year's estimated $118 billion in online sports book bets will be made by Nevadans. … But experts say it's a large and growing number of people that includes many pros and even more amateurs who follow sports. … Sportingbet, which is headquartered in London and operates its computer servers from the Caribbean island of Antigua, isn't a law-abiding company, according to the Justice Department. Online sports betting also is considered illegal in Nevada, which prevents the transmission and placement of wagers by entities that aren't licensed by the state Gaming Control Board and Nevada Gaming Commission. … The Justice Department says Internet gambling is illegal in the United States based on a law known as the Wire Act. Some legal experts say the law, intended to combat illegal bookmaking by the Mafia in the 1960s, is outdated and doesn't apply to traditional casino games and poker games played online. But they generally agree that sports books are on much shakier legal ground."

FBI Agent Warns NCAA Basketball Players About Gambling. The CBS Evening News (3/23, story 8, 2:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The NCAA men's college basketball tournament is down to the so-called Sweet 16 teams," and "by now, many of the teams have gotten the pep talks from their coaches and another talk from the FBI." CBS (Acosta) added, "Before the West Virginia Mountaineers took to practice court, they had a little sit-down with the FBI." Special Agent Tom Metz: "We have a lot of people out there, whether knowingly or not, who want to be your friends. Unfortunately they want to be your friends for the wrong reasons." Acosta: "Special Agent Tom Metz was invited by the NCAA to explain how gambling on sport, especially on their own team, could ruin their lives." Metz: "What we're trying to say the student athlete is they have a lot to lose." Acosta: "West Virginia coach John Beilein welcomed the FBI's visit." Beilein: "I wished they listened to me that attentively at some of our meetings, because our guys were on the edge of their seats." Metz's meeting with the WVU players was posted yesterday on the Web sites of CBS affiliates across the country, such as KDKA-TV Pittsburgh.

Former Insurance Financier Resentenced To Federal Prison. The AP (3/24, Apuzzo) reports, "A federal judge ordered Martin Frankel on Thursday to serve the same sentence he got in 2004 for stealing $200 million from insurance companies — nearly 17 years in a federal prison." The AP continues, "The former financier was ordered resentenced after a Supreme Court ruling last year gave judges more leeway in their use of sentencing guidelines. … During a brief hearing in U.S. District Court, Judge Ellen B. Burns said she saw no reason to alter the sentence. … 'It seemed to me, that was the appropriate sentence to impose,' she said." The AP adds, "Frankel, 51, wearing baggy brown prison scrubs and large glasses, stroked a long gray beard that he grew in prison as Burns reread the 200-month sentence. He spoke only briefly, asking Burns to note that he is at risk in prison. … Burns said she would. Defense attorney William Koch elaborated after court, saying the highly publicized case, which inspired two books, made Frankel 'particularly vulnerable' to physical assaults in prison. … He will be eligible for release in 2015, according to the U.S. Bureau of Prisons. Frankel is serving his sentence at the federal prison in Otisville, N.Y. … Frankel was convicted of taking over and looting insurance companies in Arkansas, Mississippi, Oklahoma, Missouri and Tennessee."

US Files Charges In Penny-Stock Mob Case. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Bray) reports, "Men the government identifies as members of the reputed Colombo and Luchese organized-crime families were charged with manipulating the market for penny stocks as part of a broader racketeering case in Brooklyn." The Journal continues, "In an indictment unsealed yesterday, the Justice Department's U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn alleged that at least six of 10 men the Federal Bureau of Investigation arrested on racketeering charges secretly controlled at least 15 branch offices of brokerage firms in the New York City boroughs of Brooklyn, Manhattan and Staten Island, through which the men ran a scheme to artificially inflate the price of the stocks." The Journal adds, "Prosecutors said brokers misrepresented prospects of certain stocks to potential investors in exchange for large commissions. They said the defendants then sold their holdings in those stocks at inflated values, costing investors $20 million."

Pennsylvania Woman Says She Was Held Captive For 10 Years. The New York Times (3/24, Urbina) reports, "A girl who vanished more than 10 years ago was reunited yesterday with her mother in a Pittsburgh suburb two days after confiding to a store owner that she was being held captive, the police said." The woman, Tanya Nicole Kach, now 24, "was 14 when she was reported missing on Feb. 10, 1996, after walking out of her father's house, two miles from where she said she had lived in secrecy. … 'We're investigating this further, but I have to tell you there is still a lot we need to figure out,' said Charles Moffatt, superintendent of the Allegheny County Police Department." The Times adds, "Ms. Kach said she had been living against her will with Thomas Hose, 48, a security guard at Cornell Intermediate School in McKeesport, where Ms. Kach was an eighth grader when she was reported missing, Mr. Moffatt said. For the first four years of captivity, she told the police, she was never permitted to leave the two-bedroom house, and Mr. Hose threatened to kill her if she told anyone about her captivity."

USA Today (3/24, Dorell) reports, "Allegheny County Police Superintendent Charles Moffatt said Kach was a runaway and had been living at the home of a security guard from her middle school who held her indoors for four years. He told her she was stupid and unwanted by anyone but him, Kach said. She was just 2 miles from her father's house she had fled in McKeesport, Pa. … Thomas Hose, 48, was suspended from his job Thursday and arrested on charges of statutory sexual assault and involuntary deviate sexual intercourse. His lawyer, James Ecker, said Hose did not hold the girl against her will."

Evidence Of Pellicano's Wiretapping Used In Suit. The New York Times (3/24, Halbfinger, Weiner) reports, "A screenwriter and his lawyer talk on the phone. They are in the heat of legal battle with a big-time producer over the profits from a hit movie. The lawyer says which of their arguments he thinks are strongest and how much he thinks their opponents will agree to pay in a settlement. … Unbeknownst to both of them, Anthony Pellicano is listening in, and taking notes, court filings say." The Times continues, "Mr. Pellicano, the celebrity detective charged with wiretapping and conspiracy in the biggest Hollywood scandal in generations, stands accused of intercepting conversations of scores of unwitting people, many involved in high-profile lawsuits. … But what the federal indictment of Mr. Pellicano failed to spell out was just how he put his wiretaps to use." The Times adds, "Now, the first direct evidence of eavesdropping by Mr. Pellicano has surfaced in newly filed court documents: excerpts of what prosecutors have described as Mr. Pellicano's summaries of conversations he intercepted in 2001 between Vincent Zenga, a screenwriter and producer known as Bo, and his lawyer, Gregory S. Dovel, during their contentious suit against the influential Hollywood executive Brad Grey, now head of Paramount Pictures."

Pentagon Orders Inquiry Into Cunningham Earmarks. Undersecretary of Defense Stephen Carbone has ordered an internal inquiry into how funding earmarked by former Rep. Duke Cunningham resulted in contracts for MZM Inc. to do work for the Pentagon's intelligence agency, the Counterintelligence Field Activity. The Washington Post (3/24, A6, Pincus, 744K) reports that Cunningham pleaded guilty to tax evasion and taking bribes from contractors including the MZM's former president of Mitchell J. Wade, who "pleaded guilty last month to bribery-related charges and to making illegal campaign contributions to Cunningham and other legislators."

Government Raises $94,000 At Auction Of Cunningham Property. The government yesterday auctioned some of Rep. Randy Cunningham's ill-gotten gains yesterday, raising $94,000 to pay for his restitution and back taxes. The story was covered by ABC and NBC late in their newscasts.

ABC World News Tonight (3/23, story 11, 1:30, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Here today in California, the government auctioned off the trappings of luxury that caught Representative Randy Cunningham in the worst corruption scandal Congress has ever known. The eight-term Republican is in prison for accepting $2.5 million in bribes and cheating on his taxes." The government "is also selling Cunningham's yacht and multi-million dollar mansion to pay his back taxes and restitution for his crimes. For the buyers, there was a measure of satisfaction, in seeing the treasures of a tainted politician on the auction bloc."

NBC Nightly News (3/23, story 11, 0:30, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "The loot included Persian rugs marble top antique tables, and ornate furniture, much of it given to Cunningham by defense contractors in exchange for steering business their way. At the end of the day, the auction brought in a modest $94,000."

The New York Times (3/24, Broder, 1.19M) reports that the 35 items "brought the government $94,625, about two-thirds of the $150,000 that the military contractors who gave the items to Mr. Cunningham as bribes reportedly paid for them." Proceeds from the auction "will go to the Internal Revenue Service's criminal investigation division and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, two of the agencies that investigated Mr. Cunningham's crimes."

The Los Angeles Times (3/23, Suarez, Perry, 958K) reported on its web site that the auction "drew little response this morning, despite heavy advance publicity. Few among the hundreds of people who showed up at the regular IRS auction at a cavernous warehouse in Rancho Dominguez were aware that the infamous politician's belongings were available."

Asian Gang Member Convicted Of 2002 Virginia Slaying. The Washington Post (3/24, B1, Jackman) reports, "An Asian gang member who shot and killed a rival gang member in 2002, then fled to Canada for more than two years, was convicted yesterday of first-degree murder by a Fairfax County jury." The Post continues, "The jury then recommended that Henh Ngo, 22, of Springfield be sentenced to 26 years in prison -- 23 years for murder and three years for using a gun during a felony. Fairfax Circuit Court Judge Jane Marum Roush will sentence Ngo on May 25. Under Virginia law, she may not increase but could decrease the jury's recommended sentence." The Post adds, "Prosecutors told the jury that members of a gang called Asian Young and Dangerous, or AYD, jumped and pummeled two members of the gang Asian Dragon Family, or ADF, at Springfield Mall in mid-December 2002. One of the victims in that case was Ngo, then 19 years old and well-known in the gang community as 'Phi Lu,' or 'Fat Guy,' witnesses testified."

DC Development Firm Executive Indicted In Deepening Corruption Probe. The Washington Times (3/24, McElhatton) reports, "The financial officer for one of the District's most prominent development companies has been indicted on conspiracy and federal tax-evasion charges." The Times continues, "The charges against John E. Brownell, chief financial officer for Douglas Development Corp., come months after federal authorities indicted company President Douglas Jemal and two other executives amid an investigation into corruption in the city's Office of Property Management." The Times adds, "Mr. Brownell's attorney, Barry Coburn, said yesterday his client disputes the indictment, which was filed Tuesday. … 'We are very disappointed that the U.S. Attorney's Office has seen fit to indict Mr. Brownell, and we look forward to the opportunity to vindicate him at trial,' he said. … The 18-page indictment states Mr. Brownell received 'secret payments' from the company president and another individual at the company, identified only as 'Conspirator A.' Mr. Jemal is the company president. … Prosecutors said Mr. Brownell failed to file federal income-tax returns from 1994 to 1998 and that he evaded paying income taxes from 1998 to 2003. … A U.S. Attorney's Office spokesman said yesterday the conspiracy and tax-evasion charges against Mr. Brownell each carry a maximum of five years in prison."

Social Security Card Forgery Seen As Increasing Problem. NBC Nightly News (3/23, story 9, 2:30, Lewis, 9.87M) reported, "This undercover video, shot by agents of the Federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement Service, was used to help convict this man of forging Social Security cards and other government IDs, a practice that often victimizes innocent people, like 2-year-old Tyler Lybbert of Draper, Utah." Someone else "was using a Social Security number identical to Tyler's, part of a mushrooming problem in this country involving the making and selling of phony IDs." Kevin Jeffrey, special agent, Immigration and Customs enforcement: "The document vendors themselves, they just make up random numbers." Lewis: "Special Agent Kevin Jeffrey of Immigration and Customs Enforcement says computers make it easy for the forgers. … He says Los Angeles, with its huge population of illegal immigrants, is the counterfeit document capital of America."

Baltimore, DC Cardinals Lobby Against Maryland Sex Abuse Bills. The Washington Post (3/24, B5, Murphy) reports, "Roman Catholic Church officials are putting a full-court press on Maryland legislators to reject bills that would extend the time allowed for victims of childhood sex abuse to file lawsuits against abusers and their employers." The Post continues, "Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick of the Washington archdiocese and Cardinal William H. Keeler of the Baltimore archdiocese have gotten involved, expressing opposition to the bills to House Judiciary Committee members directly or through intermediaries. The archdioceses also have hired a prominent Annapolis lobbying firm, Schwartz & Metz, to supplement the efforts of the Maryland Catholic Conference, their regular lobbying arm. … 'Almost everyone on the committee has acknowledged to me that the church has called them or called their ministers about the bill, and they are meeting with every member of the committee, including me,' said Del. Pauline H. Menes (D-Prince George's), the bills' principal sponsor." The Post notes, "Under Maryland law, lawsuits by childhood abuse victims can be filed until the victim is 25. The two bills would significantly ease that restriction. One would let victims file suit until they are 42; the other would open a two-year window during which victims of any age could sue. … Supporters say the bills are needed because victims typically do not report the abuse until they are in their thirties or forties. Church officials say it would be hard for defendants to present an adequate defense decades after an alleged incident, and they note that Maryland has no time limit on criminal charges against a child abuser."

CIVIL LAW:

Groups Say School Districts Not Complying With Bush Education Law. The Washington Times (3/24, Price, 90K) reports two national groups "promoting education reform have filed complaints against two California public-school systems, charging that they are violating federal law by not telling parents of children in failing schools about transfer options." The "joint complaints of the Alliance for School Choice and the Coalition on Urban Renewal and Education were filed yesterday against the Los Angeles Unified School District -- California's largest -- and the Compton Unified School District." The groups "say the districts are not complying with terms of the No Child Left Behind Act in that they are forcing many students to remain in low-performing schools for years and are not notifying parents that the federal law gives them the right to transfer their children to better-performing public schools."

Spellings Criticized Over Enforcement Of NCLB. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, A10, 2.11M) says in an editorial that "the California districts singled out in the filing aren't the only ones skirting the law. Similar violations have been reported in Baltimore, Chicago, Detroit, New York and elsewhere. A Government Accountability Office report from 2004 found that some three million children in 5,300 schools nationwide were eligible for choice under NCLB, but only about 1% were exercising the option." But the "reason school districts have been able to get away with this behavior is that no one is holding their feet to the fire. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings has chosen to hand out exemptions or look the other way instead of enforcing the law."

Texas Youth Commission Seeks DOJ Help In Prison Probes. The Brownsville (TX) Herald (3/24, Pierson) reports, "The Texas Youth Commission has asked the U.S. Department of Justice for help in assessing the way it reports and investigates abuse against youth in state juvenile prisons." The Herald continues, "If TYC does not turn the tide of abuse, the state may face legal action, an American Civil Liberties Un-ion representative told a Texas House committee on Wednesday." The Herald adds, "Dwight Harris, executive director of TYC, asked the Justice Department on Thursday for help, after a months-long investigation by Rio Grande Valley Freedom Newspapers about the seven-year trend of increasing abuse against youth. … Findings published in The Brownsville Herald on Sunday showed that by 2005, three of every 100 youth in the TYC were being abused physically, a seven-fold increase from 1999. Injuries by youth against officers increased 70 percent in five years."

Judge Orders Federal Monitor For Virgin Islands Prison. The St Thomas (VI) Source (3/24, Probasco) reports, "A U.S. district judge found the V.I. government in contempt Thursday and ordered a federal monitor to fix 'constitutional violations' at the Golden Grove prison in St. Croix." The Source continues, "Judge George W. Cannon Jr. said the Virgin Islands was in violation of a 1986 order to resolve unconstitutional medical, sanitation and safety conditions at the prison, where an inmate Tuesday was stabbed to death and five others were injured in a brawl. … In his 32-page order, Cannon wrote, 'the court concludes that there are continuing and ongoing constitutional violations of the rights of individuals held at Golden Grove Adult Correctional Facility and Detention Center, and (the) defendants are in contempt of the court's orders.'" The Source adds, "Attorneys for the U.S. Justice Department asked Cannon to appoint the federal monitor, called a special master, to resolve lingering problems at the prison, calling conditions there 'deplorable.' … V.I. Attorney General Kerry Drue argued that the prison was improving and a special master was not needed."

Title IX Lawsuit Against University Of Colorado Again Rejected By U.S. Judge. The AP (3/24, Banda) reports, "A federal judge rejected a request to revive the lawsuit at the heart of the University of Colorado recruiting scandal, saying Thursday that two women who claimed they were sexually assaulted by athletes had not proven their claim against the school was valid. Attorneys for the women immediately promised an appeal." The claimants alleged the school violated Title IX by "fostering an atmosphere that led to their alleged assaults at a 2001 off-campus party." U.S. District Judge Robert Blackburn "tossed out the lawsuit a year ago, and said Thursday the women had not changed his mind after arguing there was new evidence showing coaches and trainers were aware of similar problems before the alleged assaults."

Reporting Sex Harassment At Naval Academy Gains Respect. The Washington Post (3/24, B8, Rivera) reports, "Midshipmen who report sexual harassment at the U.S. Naval Academy are increasingly viewed with respect by other midshipmen, and more students believe the campus provides a positive environment for women, a new survey shows." The Post continues, "Academy officials say the responses represent big leaps forward in how male and female students view academy culture. The results also come as reports of sexual assault at the academy have been increasing, in part because of an effort to encourage victims to report incidents, officials say." The Post adds, "About 3,000 midshipmen -- most of the sophomore, junior and senior classes -- responded to the academy's annual quality of life and values survey in October. Asked whether midshipmen at the Annapolis college who report sexual harassment are respected, resented or neither, 65 percent of women said 'respected.' Just 5 percent said 'resented.' … Two years ago, 66 percent of women checked 'resented' to the same question. … Fifty-six percent of men also said 'respected.' It was the first time in at least the last five surveys, the only data available yesterday, in which the majority of both sexes answered positively."

Fairfax County Officer Will Not Be Charged In Fatal Shooting. The Washington Post (3/24, B5, Jackman) reports, "The Fairfax County police officer who shot an unarmed man to death in January will not be charged with a crime, the county's chief prosecutor announced yesterday, and the man's family angrily responded by claiming that a civilian in the same situation would have been arrested." The Post continues, "From the start, Fairfax police declared that the killing of Salvatore J. Culosi, 37, was an accident and that the SWAT officer who fired had done so unintentionally. Fairfax Commonwealth's Attorney Robert F. Horan Jr. said that when a person fires a gun without malice and unintentionally kills someone, 'they do not commit a crime.' … 'I feel for the family of the victim in this case,' Horan said. 'You have to. But I also feel for the police officer. This is a good police officer. Fine record, almost 17 years. He's as shattered by this as any good police officer should be.'" The Post adds, "The officer is Deval V. Bullock, 40, a longtime member of Fairfax's SWAT team, numerous sources familiar with the case said. … Bernard DiMuro, the Culosi family's attorney, said: 'A pointed gun with a finger on the trigger is not an accident. There is no doubt that had the shooter not been a police officer, he would have been charged criminally, and a jury would have decided the issue.' He said Horan could have charged the officer with second-degree murder or manslaughter. … The Culosis also questioned whether the police could fairly investigate themselves and whether Horan had received a complete investigation. The family sent a letter to the Fairfax Board of Supervisors asking it to review the case, and to review police policies on the use of force and the use of SWAT teams as well."

Gay Marriage Issues Advancing In Courts, Legislatures. While gay rights advocates are pushing the legalization of gay marriage in state courts, gay marriage opponents seeking to ban the unions are gaining ground in state legislatures. USA Today (3/24, Biskupic, 2.31M) reports "The contrasting strategies reflect how judges have begun to show a willingness to expand the rights of same-sex couples at a time when many state lawmakers — and most Americans — are cool to the idea." USA adds, "Several key developments are likely soon. The top state courts in Washington state and New Jersey have heard arguments brought by gay men and lesbians. Either court could open the door to a second state joining Massachusetts in allowing same-sex marriages. … Meanwhile, the Alliance for Marriage and other groups against same-sex marriage hope to win legislative ballot initiatives this year in Alabama, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin. The measures would amend state constitutions to ban same-sex marriages."

Lawsuits Challenge Policies Against Same Sex Marriage. A separate story in USA Today (3/24, Biskupic, 2.31M) reports on lawsuits "challenging policies against same-sex marriages. … The lawsuits, sponsored by the American Civil Liberties Union and gay rights groups such as Lambda Legal, utilize carefully selected plaintiffs and locales. They argue that particular state constitutions contain a right to same-sex marriage. The lawsuits were inspired largely by a 2003 ruling by Massachusetts' highest court that led to that state being the first to legalize such unions. … Such lawsuits are awaiting rulings by the top state courts in Washington state and New Jersey. Similar lawsuits are making their way through state courts in California, Connecticut, Iowa, Maryland and New York."

American Muslims Getting More Involved In Civil, Political Life. The 9/11 attacks have had what USA Today (3/24, Lawrence, 2.31M) calls "double-edged impact on the political emergence of American Muslims. They are up against more stereotyping and backlash," and at the same time, the attacks "jolted Muslims into realizing that they needed to make themselves known to their neighbors and heard by their government. They are voting, running for office and getting more involved in civic and political life at every level, from PTAs and school boards to town councils and state legislatures." USA adds, "This large-scale entry of Muslims into public life is not only testing the courage of Muslim candidates and the tolerance of voters. It's also prompting politicians to take notice of a community that has growing clout and is open to appeals from both parties."

Abortion Law Could See Shift With Change In "Undue Burden" Standard. Knight Ridder (3/24, Henderson) reports, "The latest high-profile battle in the abortion wars may prove to be a sideshow to a monumental shift in abortion law that could take place this fall." Knight Ridder continues, "South Dakota legislators enacted a sweeping ban on abortion last month that will retest the strength of Roe v. Wade, the landmark 1973 Supreme Court decision that overturned all state laws banning or restricting abortion. Other states are threatening to follow suit as anti-abortion activists flex what they think is new muscle: two new Supreme Court justices who are thought to be less sympathetic to abortion rights." Knight Ridder adds, "Legal experts say the courts almost certainly will strike down South Dakota's ban in short order. But this fall, when the Supreme Court considers the federal ban on late-term abortions, the justices could make it easier for state legislators to pass stringent restrictions on abortion without much fear that the courts might overturn them. … The high court could force those who challenge abortion restrictions to prove that restrictive laws prevent a significant number of women from getting abortions. Currently, the courts bar restrictions if it's plausible that they could impose burdens on women seeking abortions. … Such a ruling would validate many abortion laws that can't now survive court scrutiny, and in some states it would render abortion all but inaccessible to many women. … All this could happen without the court even touching on the core debate over abortion rights."

Montgomery County Police Chief Urges Closing Of Union's Internet Forum. The Washington Post (3/24, Londoño) reports, "Montgomery County Police Chief J. Thomas Manger called on the department's union yesterday to take down an online message board that some police officers have used as a forum for disparaging, and sometimes racist, remarks about colleagues, supervisors, immigrants and other members of the community." The Post continues, "The union said it would not shut down the board, saying that it serves a legitimate purpose and that doing so would curtail officers' right to free speech. … The offensive messages were roundly condemned by county officials and community leaders." The Post adds, "Some of the messages, copies of which were published in The Washington Post yesterday, refer to Latino immigrants as 'beaners.' Others make sexual references to female officers and disparage some officers as 'racists.'"

Women-Led Hedge Fund Hit With Pregnancy-Bias Suit. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Dugan) reports,

"E. Lee Hennessee became one of the most prominent women in the hedge-fund business, building a booming firm counseling rich clients. But how woman-friendly is her firm? … The question was raised by a former employee in a lawsuit filed Wednesday in New York state court against Ms. Hennessee; her husband, Charles Gradante; and their firm, Hennessee Group LLC." The Journal continues, "Leeana Piscopo, a 29-year-old former senior vice president, claims that she was fired in January after revealing she was pregnant. The father: Hennessee's public-relations manager, Alex Smith-Ryland, who is also 29. … The lawsuit was the latest of many pregnancy-related cases against employers. The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, along with state and local agencies, last year received 4,449 complaints from employees complaining of bias after pregnancy -- a jump of 31% from 1992. Last year, EEOC reaped $11.6 million in rewards in pregnancy-related cases. One reason, says the agency: Women are increasingly attempting to juggle career and family at the same time that companies are increasing workloads."

Court Rejects Injunction Against Stolt Antitrust Indictment. The AP (3/24) reports, "Trading of Stolt-Nielsen SA's shares was halted Thursday, after a federal appeals court reversed a lower court injunction blocking the Department of Justice from indicting the chemical transportation company and its officials for alleged antitrust violations." The AP continues, "The injunction stopping the Department of Justice from prosecuting Stolt-Nielsen -- a company that cooperated with the government in criminal antitrust prosecutions in the international carrier industry -- was issued by a District Court judge in January 2005." The AP adds, "That injunction came after a decision by the Department of Justice to kick Stolt-Nielsen out of the government's Corporate Leniency Program for allegedly continuing illegal anticompetitive activity longer than it admitted. … The two-judge panel of the Third Circuit Court of Appeals said that the District Court did not have the authority to enforce an amnesty agreement before an indictment. The appeals court remanded the case back to the lower court and did not address the merits of the company's amnesty defense. … Stolt-Nielsen said it plans to file a petition for a rehearing."

Bayer Makes $19.73 Billion Bid For Schering. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Whalen, Singer, Esterl) reports, "Bayer AG's friendly bid for fellow German drug maker Schering AG, which tops a hostile bid by Merck KGaA, is aimed at creating a pharmaceutical giant capable of competing with U.S. and European rivals, which have eclipsed Germany's once-mighty drug industry." The Journal continues, "Schering said its executive board backed Bayer's offer, valued at €16.34 billion ($19.73 billion), making it unlikely another bidder will emerge. If approved by Schering's shareholders, the two companies plan to combine their prescription-drug businesses into a new firm called Bayer-Schering Pharmaceuticals with anticipated sales of more than €9 billion a year and headquarters in Berlin. … Bayer-Schering Pharmaceuticals' revenue would exceed that of Schering-Plough Corp. of the U.S., which is unrelated to the German Schering. Bayer also has a large over-the-counter drug business and, including Schering's prescription drug operations, Bayer would become one of the world's biggest drug makers."

The New York Times (3/24, Landler) reports, "Schering, based in Berlin, said it would recommend the offer to its shareholders, an indication that Bayer was likely to complete the takeover unless Merck raised its bid or yet another suitor entered the fray. An executive close to Merck said it would assess the offer before deciding how to respond. … For Bayer, the deal is a striking return to its roots. Bayer has struggled in drugs since the recall of its anticholesterol treatment Baycol over safety concerns in 2001, and it tried fruitlessly a few years ago to find a partner for its troubled pharmaceutical business. … Although health care products now account for less than 40 percent of Bayer's annual revenues, which were about $30.5 billion last year, the Schering acquisition could make health care the largest part of Bayer, with projected sales of $18 billion a year."

The Financial Times (3/24, Saigol, Weismann) reports, "The Bayer/Schering deal will not preclude Merck from returning with a higher offer. Although Merck has not ruled out sweetening its terms, Wilhelm Simson, chairman of Merck's supervisory board, has said the company would first wait to see if other bidders came forward. … Merck had planned to finance its bid through a combination of bank debt, cash, a rights issue, and a €1bn investment from the Merck family and has said it is committed to maintaining its investment-grade rating." The Times notes, "Bayer, which, invented aspirin more than 100 years ago, is headed by Werner Wenning, chief executive. During the past 18 months, it has bought the over-the-counter drugs unit of Roche, the Swiss drugs company, and spun off the bulk of its chemicals operations as a new listed entity called Lanxess. … The group has also placed its hopes in bringing to market new home-made patented drugs, with US regulators giving a potential blockbuster anti-cancer drug the green light late last year."

Dow Jones (3/23, McGrath, Schrimpff) reports, "Bayer said the deal would be funded through liquidity of around EUR3 billion and a credit line provided by Credit Suisse and Citigroup, which would later be refinanced through bank loans and debt. The planned equity capital measures will total

EUR4 billion, it added. Further financing would be raised through the sale of plastics units H.C. Starck and Wolff Walsrode units."

DOJ Clears EnergySolutions, Duratek Merger To Proceed. The Salt Lake Tribune (3/24, Fahys) reports, "The US Justice Department has decided there are no further antitrust issues to consider in the merger of Salt Lake City-based EnergySolutions with Duratek Inc. Maryland-based Duratek said Thursday that a month-long waiting period mandated by the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act of 1976 -- an antitrust regulation that automatically triggers a 30-day review whenever an investor seeks to acquire either a 15 percent stake, or a stake valued at more than $15 million, in a particular security -- ended this week without any indication the Justice Department wants more time to review the merger, which will create the nation's largest full-service nuclear waste company." Even so, the Tribune notes, the $396 million deal, remains months from approval. "Publicly traded Duratek needs shareholder approval, and a vote has not been scheduled yet, said Diane R. Brown, who leads the company's investor relations."

EU Approves Time Warner-CBS Venture. The AP (3/24) reports, "European Union antitrust regulators cleared the Warner Bros. network's 50-50 joint venture with CBS Corp.'s UPN television network on Thursday, saying there were no competition concerns on the plan for the European market." The AP continues, "The two networks will combine to form a new broadcast network called CW. They decided to join forces after struggling in the U.S. ratings." The AP adds, "The venture was fast-tracked for approval by the EU, meaning it saw no significant antitrust problems and received no complaints from rivals."

Medtronic Patent Dispute Fuels Debate On Guidant Impact. Dow Jones (3/24, Kamp) reports, "Medtronic Inc.'s recent purchase of the rights to certain patents covering stent medical devices could inject the company into the acquisition saga involving rivals Boston Scientific Corp., Guidant Corp. and Abbott Laboratories Inc. … That's because Medtronic believes a key Guidant stent product infringes on those patents, and Guidant's product plays a key role in the company's coming acquisition by Boston Scientific and Abbott. Medtronic and a Citigroup analyst made a case Thursday for the patents' validity." Dow Jones adds, "There is argument, though, about whether the latest patent claims bear watching or simply mix with the chaff in the competitive $5 billion to $6 billion stent business. The sector sees frequent litigation as companies jockey for position, and other analysts who weighed in Thursday suggested the latest Medtronic suit is more of the same. … At issue are stents, tiny tubes that prop open arteries, and Medtronic's purchase in February of patent rights for bare-metal stents from a private Canadian company called Evysio. Medtronic the same month filed in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California claiming, among other things, that Guidant's 'Vision' stent violated the patents."

Boston Scientific Makes Antitrust Pledges To EU. Dow Jones (3/24) reports, "Boston Scientific Corp. said late Thursday it has made certain commitments to the European Commission as part of its antitrust review of Boston Scientific's acquisition of Guidant Corp." Dow Jones adds, "The details of the commitments are confidential, Boston Scientific said, but are not material to the deal and will become public when the EC completes its review and announces its decision. … The commitments extend the normal five-week EC review period to up to seven weeks, meaning that the review will finish no later than April 13."

Lucent In Merger Talks With Alcatel. The New York Times (3/24, Sorkin, Belson) reports, "Lucent Technologies, the phone equipment maker that became a symbol of last decade's boom-and-bust cycle in telecommunications, is in negotiations to be acquired by Alcatel of France for about $12.6 billion, people close to the discussions said last night." The Times continues, "The two companies confirmed the talks last night in a statement, saying they were 'engaged in discussions about a potential merger of equals.'" The Times adds, "After several years of mergers on a huge scale among telephone companies — local, long-distance and wireless — a deal for Lucent would be the first big step toward a shakeout among the companies that make the equipment for the phone service providers. … The prospect of a big trans-Atlantic deal comes at a time when foreign takeovers have been political flashpoints in both Washington and Paris. A Dubai company's acquisition of some United States port terminals created an uproar in Congress, while the French government has sought to thwart cross-border takeovers in energy and pharmaceuticals."

The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Berman, Silver, Latour) reports, "A linkup between the two, anticipated since a deal attempt failed five years ago, could help both realize substantial cost savings and likely would kick off a new round of consolidation among the already-pressured companies that supply equipment to phone companies. … Lucent Technologies Chief Executive Patricia Russo would be the chief executive of the combined company, people familiar with the matter said. And the two firms would have equal representation of a new board of directors, these people add." The Journal adds, "Given the cultural and logistical challenges, moreover, a merger could prove to be among the more complicated recent couplings in the industry. With protectionist sentiment growing in both the U.S. and Europe, a merger could prove a critical test of cross-border cooperation for the French and U.S. governments. …

Consolidation pressure has been growing in the equipment business amid a wave of telecom deals and the emergence of more-efficient technologies. That has limited the amount of money that big phone companies have to spend on equipment. The result has been too many equipment makers chasing a limited amount of business."

Christian Group Backs Off Infringement Case Against Parody Blogger. USA Today (3/24, Swartz) reports, "A Christian group that promotes heterosexuality Thursday quietly dropped its beef against a blogger who poked fun at it." USA continues, "Exodus International initially claimed the altered image of one of its billboards by Justin Watt infringed its copyright. But Exodus is no longer pursuing the matter after Watt stopped using its 'watermark' logo, Exodus President Alan Chambers said." USA adds, "Watt, operator of the Justinsomnia blog, says he exercised free speech when he parodied the Exodus billboard, which says, 'Gay? Unhappy? www.exodus.to.' Wyatt re-created the billboard on his site so it read, 'Straight? Unhappy? www.gay.com.'" USA adds, "(Exodus uses '.to' as its domain suffix because '.com' was not available.)" USA notes, "Watt, 26, a Web developer in Northern California who enlisted the aid of the American Civil Liberties Union and high-powered law firm Fenwick & West, has posted his blog for four years. He posted the parody Sept. 19 because he found Exodus' message "offensive." A lawyer representing Exodus sent Watt a cease-and-desist letter on March 2. … The dust-up has made Watt a cause célbre among bloggers. More than 40 other websites now carry the spoof."

Private Equity Firm Set To Bid On 12 Knight Ridder Newspapers. The Washington Post (3/24, D3, Levingston) reports, "The Yucaipa Cos., a Los Angeles-based private equity investment firm, plans to bid Tuesday for the 12 Knight Ridder Inc. newspapers put up for sale by McClatchy Co." The Post continues, "Yucaipa would not say how much it intends to offer for the papers, including the Philadelphia Inquirer, the San Jose Mercury News and the Akron Beacon Journal." The Post adds, "The papers became available after McClatchy last week bought the Knight Ridder chain of 32 papers and announced it would divest itself of 12 dailies in what it said were slower-growth markets. … Robert Hall, a Yucaipa adviser and former publisher of the Inquirer and Philadelphia Daily News, said the firm would make its bid Tuesday, when preliminary offers are due. He added that, if successful, the private fund would take a long-term approach to its investment, freeing the papers from having to meet the pressures of Wall Street. … Other bidders are possible. Analysts expect Gannett Co., the nation's largest newspaper publisher, to submit offers for at least some of the dailies. Gannett would not comment on its plans but its top executives, speaking in New York yesterday, indicated the company was studying the situation."

WPost Says Maryland Lawmakers, Electric Utility Should Level With Public. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/24, A18, 744K) says that Maryland lawmakers and its electric power industry were "reckless" in the state's "current tumult over residential electricity bills." The Post adds that "both the utility and the lawmakers should level with the public by explaining that sharply higher electric bills -- even if they exact their pain gradually rather than all at once -- are a fact of life for the near term. To pretend otherwise is to ignore the market, and reality."

US Charges Utah Refinery With Pollution Violations. The AP (3/24, Hummel) reports, "A Pennsylvania-based metals refinery and two of its managers have been indicted on federal charges of polluting water and conspiring to violate environmental laws, the U.S. Department of Justice said Thursday." The AP continues, "Johnson Matthey Inc. and John David McKelvie, director of gold and silver operations for North America and Europe and former general manager at the West Valley City plant, and Paul Card Greaves, former plant manager, were indicted by a federal grand jury Wednesday night. … They are accused of violating environmental laws by concealing high levels of the chemical element selenium found in waste water from the metals refinery, according to court documents." The AP adds, "Johnson Matthey, based in Wayne, Pa., has a gold and silver refining plant in West Valley City, a suburb of Salt Lake City. … The company is accused of releasing larger amounts of selenium than it was allowed by permit into sewers. The indictment alleges that the company exceeded its monthly limit on selenium discharges 12 times between January 2000 and May 2002. … The waste water from the refinery is processed by a treatment plant that empties water into the Jordan River and the Great Salt Lake, which are part of a shorebird reserve where millions of migratory birds stop each year. … 'The defendants are charged with not only illegally discharging contaminated waste water, but also engaging in a concerted effort to cover it up,' Granta Y. Nakayama, an assistant administrator for the Environmental Protection Agency, said in a statement."

Nevada Files Another Suit In Yucca Fight. The AP (3/24, Ritter) reports, "Nevada sued the federal government Wednesday, accusing it of withholding documents that show the planned Yucca Mountain nuclear dump cannot safely hold the nation's radioactive waste." The AP continues, "The complaint, filed in Reno, is the fourth federal lawsuit the state has pending against the plan to bury 77,000 tons of nuclear waste in the Nevada desert, 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas." The AP adds, "The case seeks the release of a draft application prepared by contractors seeking a Nuclear Regulatory Commission license to open the dump. … 'The federal government is required by law to share its important Yucca information with the host state, and we are entitled to such information under the Freedom of Information Act as well,' Nevada Attorney General George Chanos said in a statement. … An Energy Department spokesman in Washington said the agency has made public on the Internet millions of pages about the project, but was under no legal obligation to release the draft application."

GAO Says Yucca Mountain Questions Have Not Been Put To Rest. A GAO report says the Energy Department's reorganization of the Yucca Mountain nuclear waster dump project has yet to put questions about the quality of scientific and engineering work to rest and may create new issues. The AP (3/23, Werner) reported, "Among the problems cited by the GAO was high turnover of project managers. Nine of 17 key management positions have turned over since 2001, the GAO said, and the director of quality assurance was among them. The report also said that despite substantial time and money spent resolving quality assurance issues, the Energy Department has not developed effective management tools to detect and solve problems. The report recommended strengthening quality guidelines and analysis of problems."

EPA Relaxing Some Diesel Emission Standards. The EPA is relaxing some emission standards for diesel cars in an effort to get more the fuel efficient vehicles on the road. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Meckler, 2.11M) reports, "The EPA said that over time, the new standards will be better for the environment because auto makers that opt for the exemption will be required to engineer their cars to stay clean longer. Diesel manufacturers praised the move, calling it a narrow exception that will give a boost to a promising technology." However, "environmentalists complain that the change allows diesel cars, which produce more pollution than gasoline-powered cars, to spew more smog-causing nitrogen oxide, at least at the beginning. They also argued that the rule change sets a bad precedent by allowing cars that use one particular technology to meet different standards."

Meatpacker Sues USDA Over Mad Cow Testing. A Kansas meatpacker has sued the federal government for refusing to allow it to test for mad cow disease in every animal it slaughters. Creekstone Farms Premium Beef says its Japanese customers want the testing, but the company's lawsuit says the USDA threatened criminal prosecution if the company conducts the tests. The AP (3/23, Quaid) reported, "Private companies certified by the department make screening tests used to detect mad cow disease. The department says it has sole authority over the sale and use of the tests. Department officials say they oppose 100 percent testing because it does not ensure food safety. The disease is difficult to detect in younger animals, which are the source of most beef."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

In Ongoing Feud, Weld Recounts D'Amato's Expletive-Laced Letter About Mueller. The New York Times (3/24, Chan, Roberts, 1.19M) reports that in the ongoing political feud between former Sen. Alfonse D'Amato and New York gubernatorial candidate, and former Massachusetts governor, William Weld, "Yesterday, Mr. Weld struck back in force, telling how their feud dated at least to a 1996 encounter in which Mr. D'Amato gave him $750,000 in donations for his Senate campaign" and included "an expletive-laced warning: that Mr. Weld distance himself from Robert S. Mueller III, who…oversaw a federal fraud investigation of Mr. D'Amato's brother, Armand, in the early 1990's. 'If I ever see that expletive Mueller at an expletive fund-raiser, I'm going to get every expletive dollar of this back out of your hide,' Mr. Weld…quoted Mr. D'Amato as saying." D'Amato "yesterday vigorously denied that the encounter had taken place and said he had not even met Mr. Weld until recently," but "newspaper articles indicate that Mr. D'Amato introduced Mr. Weld at a 1996 Republican fund-raiser."

The New York Daily News (3/24, Saltonstall, 729K) reports on D'Amato's alleged remark about Mueller and notes, "The comment drew a blistering response yesterday from D'Amato, who called Weld's version of events a 'vicious, preposterous story.' 'He must be rather desperate,' D'Amato said." Newsday (3/24, Madore) also reports on the feud and D'Amato's alleged comment about Mueller, under the headline "Weld On D'Amato: There's Bad Blood." The New York Post (3/24, , 624K) notes D'Amato's alleged comment about Mueller at the end of its story on the feud, which focuses on Weld's attack on his opponent in the governor's race, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, comparing Spitzer to Mike Dukakis.

IG Report Finds Meth-Fighting Grants Missing Mark. The AP (3/24, Sherman) reports, "Some states with significant methamphetamine problems have not received their share of federal money because the bulk of a grant program was steered by lawmakers to favored projects in their districts, the Justice Department inspector general said Thursday." The AP continues, "More than $179 million in anti-meth money administered by the department - 84 percent of the grant funds - has been earmarked, as the practice is known, by members of Congress for programs in their states and districts, Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said. … 'As a result of the significant use of congressional earmarks in this program, funding is not always directed to the areas of the country with the most significant meth problem,' Fine said report examining the grant program from 1998 to 2005." The AP adds, "The Bush administration has proposed ending most meth-related earmarks in the budget for 2007. Lawmakers have indicated they are unlikely to go along. … Fine also faulted Justice's Office of Community Oriented Policing Services, or COPS, for its oversight of the program. The audit said there was a lack of coordination between officials in the COPS office, weaknesses in the database used to manage and track grants and insufficient and inconsistent monitoring of recipients of the money." The AP (3/24) includes a sidebar to this story, detailing meth lab seizures by state.

US FARC Indictments Criticized. The UK's Scotsman (3/24) reports the U.S. "has declared judicial war on Colombian rebels, issuing indictments for 50 guerrilla leaders, accusing them of running the world's biggest drug cartel and shipping £14 billion worth of cocaine." The Scotsman adds, "Many believe the U.S. indictment will simply harden guerrilla resolve. 'It is a total closing off of the possibility of negotiations with the FARC,' said Ricardo Vargas of Andean Action, a Bogota-based think tank."

The AP (3/24) reports analysts say the U.S. government's "loudly trumpeted drug indictments against 50 top leaders of Colombia's largest rebel group aren't likely to faze the insurgents…they could even make it harder for Colombia to reach peace. … 'It is a mistake to treat the FARC like a drug cartel because it ignores the fact that the principle goal of the FARC is not to make money from drug-trafficking but to take political power through violence,' said Alfredo Rangel, a respected Colombian military analyst."

32 Charged In Drug Investigation. The Shelbyville (TN) Times-Gazette (3/23) reports federal authorities "charged a total of 32 people, including seven from Shelbyville, with drug trafficking offenses in what is described as a major illicit organization with tentacles stretching from Mexico to Memphis to southern Middle Tennessee. … All were charged with conspiring to distribute five kilograms or more of cocaine and 100 kilograms or more of marijuana from June 2005 through March 2006. … Primary agencies involved in the ongoing investigation include the Drug Enforcement Administration."

Authorities Seek To Seize Tennessee Lottery Winnings Linked To Drug Proceeds. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (3/24) reports, "Rayford Andre Pratcher may have waited too long to spend his $66,666 lottery winnings. Federal authorities who went through a Northeast Memphis apartment last August looking for drugs came up with the check in his name and now argue he must give it up. 'The defendant, One Tennessee Lottery Check #1031779, is traceable to drug proceeds and subject to forfeiture,' Asst. U.S. Atty. Christopher Cotten said in papers filed this week in federal court." The Commercial Appeal says during a search, DEA agents found drug residue on the check made out to Pratcher.

Medical Marijuana Battle Heads Back To Court. The AP (3/23, Kravets) reports, "Each time the U.S. Supreme Court has ruled on medical marijuana, the justices have come down against allowing the sick and dying to use the drug to ease their symptoms and possibly prolong life. But the door has never been fully closed." The AP continues, "This week, a federal appeals court in California will hear arguments in the latest round of legal wrangling over the issue. … The case to be argued before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Monday narrows the matter to the so-called right to life theory: that marijuana should be allowed if it is the only viable option to keep a patient alive or free of excruciating pain.It would apply only to the sickest patients and their suppliers, regardless of whether they live in one of the 11 mostly Western states authorizing medical marijuana. … 'A victory would affect people who are very seriously ill, facing death or great physical suffering,' said Randy Barnett, a Boston University law school professor working on the case." The AP notes, "The case was brought by Angel Raich, a 40-year-old mother of two from Oakland who suffers from scoliosis, a brain tumor, chronic nausea and other ailments. She uses marijuana every couple of hours to ease her pain and bolster a nonexistent appetite. … 'There is no fundamental right to distribute, cultivate or possess marijuana,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark Quinlivan, the government's lead medical marijuana attorney, wrote to the appeals court."

City Council Allows Collectives To Grow Marijuana. The San Mateo County (CA) Times (3/23) reports from South San Francisco that the City Council on Wednesday night approved the first Peninsula measure on marijuana that regulates where it can be grown and how people can get it for medicinal use. On a unanimous vote, the council decided to amend the city code on the cultivation of medical marijuana. The new rules outlaw storefront pot clubs but allow patients to collectively grow cannabis at least 500 feet from residential areas."

New Yorkers Said To Support Legalizing Medical Marijuana. In a story titled, "Reefer Relief," the Long Island Press (3/23) reports, "More than 75 percent of New York voters support legalizing weed to help the seriously ill, provided it's under the supervision of a physician who prescribes it, according to a study conducted last year by the Siena Research Institute at Siena College in Loudonville, N.Y. … After the Supreme Court ruled last June that the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) was within its rights to seize marijuana plants grown for medical use in California, there was a chilling effect on states dabbling with prescription pot."

Maryland US Attorney Launches Anti-Gun Crime Program. The Washington Post (3/24, B4, Castaneda) reports, "Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein announced yesterday the start of a joint federal-local initiative designed to crack down on gun crimes in Prince George's County, where the vast majority of last year's record number of homicides were committed with firearms." The Post continues, "At a news conference at the U.S. District Courthouse in Greenbelt, Rosenstein said that under the program -- Prince George's EXILE -- federal and Prince George's law enforcement officials will collaborate more closely to identify and investigate violent offenders who use firearms, to crack down on illegal gun traffickers and to use the threat of tough federal sentencing laws to pressure defendants to plead guilty to gun crimes in state court. … Similar programs are in place or have been used in other cites, including Baltimore and Richmond. … 'We have too many criminals walking the streets with guns,' said Rosenstein, flanked by more than a dozen local and federal law enforcement officials. 'Our goal is not just to prosecute gun crimes. Our goal is to deter violent crime.'" The Post notes, "To underscore what Rosenstein called an unprecedented level of cooperation in the local initiative between federal and local authorities, the federal prosecutor was joined at the news conference by Prince George's State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey, Police Chief Melvin C. High and representatives from the FBI, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the Drug Enforcement Administration, the office of Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), the state Division of Parole and Probation and other agencies."

Nevada Officials Puzzled By Increase In Youths With Guns. The Las Vegas Sun (3/24, Kihara) reports, "Juvenile justice officials can't seem to explain a recent spike in juveniles arrested on gun-related charges. … In February there were 779 minors charged with gun-related offenses, up from 442 in February 2005, according to the county statistics. … But there's no reason for the 76 percent increase - there hasn't been a corresponding rise in anything that would provide a clear answer. … 'There is no set pattern - it's across the board,' said District Judge William Voy, who handles juvenile cases. 'You get kids in gangs, and then you get kids with no gang affiliations whatsoever. It almost seems to be some fascination with guns.'" The Sun adds, "The numbers have taken juvenile justice officials by surprise. They've seen minors arrested for shooting off guns in the air to impress their friends, carrying guns to school to show off or for protection, stealing guns and using guns in burglaries or robberies. … Darnell Couthen, spokesman for the Clark County School District police, said that the minors who are arrested for a gun-related offense span all socio-economic backgrounds and areas, from Cheyenne to Green Valley High School. … The Clark County School District also saw an increase in the number of guns officers confiscated. During the 2003-04 school year, the district confiscated 84 guns, up from 72 the year before."

Marshals Arrest Man Sought On Drug, Weapons Charges. The Lexington Herald-Leader (KY) (3/24) reports, "Authorities arrested this morning a 20-year-old Lexington man who escaped from police in January after they allegedly discovered drugs and weapons in a car he was driving." The Herald-Leader continues, "Lexington police and U.S. marshals surrounded Tiquan Anderson's home on Radcliffe Road, off Russell Cave Road, in hopes of capturing the alleged drug dealer, a news release from the U.S. Marshals Service said. Authorities said they arrested Anderson without incident as he left his home through a back door. … He is charged with trafficking in a controlled substance, and fleeing and evading police, the release said."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Urges Support For Guest Worker Program, Urges "Civil" Debate. Following a meeting with representatives of various groups interested in immigration reform, President Bush yesterday highlighted his support for a guest worker program as a counterpart to greater border enforcement. Bush also urged that the debate over immigration reform must be done "in a civil way" that "brings dignity to the process." Fox News' Special Report (3/23, Hume) reported that Bush "tried to head off what he fears may be a bitter battle in Congress over immigration reform by inviting interested parties to the White House and calling for the kind of debate that he thinks might produce a bill he can actually sign." Fox (Cameron) added that Bush "surrounded himself at the White House as diverse as the Salvation Army and US Chamber of Commerce. He urged lawmakers to watch their rhetoric and respect people of all backgrounds." The story received no coverage from the network newscasts.

Media coverage of Bush's remarks highlights GOP divisions on the immigration issue and the high degree of acrimony that appears to surround the debate. Some reports also portray the story as facing the upcoming debate from a politically weak position. For example, in a front-page story titled "Bush Is Facing A Difficult Path On Immigration," the New York Times (3/24, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports Bush "has lost control of his own party on the issue, as many Republicans object to his call for a temporary guest-worker program, insisting instead that the focus be on shutting down the flow of illegal immigrants from Mexico. It is not clear how much help he will get from Democrats in an election year. … In short, Mr. Bush is facing another test of his remaining powers as president." Bush "finds himself caught between two of his most important constituencies: business owners and managers on the one hand, conservatives on the other."

Also on its front page, the Washington Post (3/24, A1, Weisman, VandeHei, 744K) analyzes the political dimension of the debate, and says "Bush's effort to secure lawful employment opportunities for illegal immigrants is evolving into an early battle of the 2008 presidential campaign, as his would-be White House successors jockey for position ahead of next week's immigration showdown in the Senate." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "is threatening to bring a new immigration bill to the Senate floor early next week. It would tighten control of the nation's borders without creating the guest-worker program the president wants." Meanwhile, Sen. John McCain, "is promoting Bush's call for tougher border security and the guest-worker program as he embraces the president to shore up his standing with Republican leaders." And in the House, Rep. Tom Tancredo "is garnering support for a long-shot presidential bid with his fierce anti-immigration rhetoric." In addition, "after weeks of sitting on the sidelines, Sen. Hillary Rodham…jumped into the immigration debate Wednesday. She declared that Republican efforts to criminalize undocumented workers and their support networks 'would literally criminalize the good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself.'" The New York Daily News (3/24, Bazinet, McAuliff, 729K) says Bush's call for a "civil" debate was "an apparent swipe at…Clinton. … A White House official said the President was well aware of Clinton's biblical broadside when he spoke, but Team Bush didn't want to single her out and give her the spotlight."

Moreover, said CNN's The Situation Room (3/23, Henry), Democrats "are doing everything they can to exploit this divide within the Republican Party" over the guest worker proposal. After the President's remarks, Sen. Edward Kennedy "put out a statement applauding the President, a rare move by Kennedy, applauding him for talking about the guest worker provisions." Kennedy said that "if, in fact, there are no guest worker provisions in the final product, this will be hollow reform."

CNN's The Situation Room (3/23, Blitzer) reported that Bush and Congress "are on the verge of a potentially bitter fight over illegal immigration." The Washington Times (3/24, Hurt, Dinan, 90K) says that "even as President Bush called for a 'civil' debate," a "confrontation was brewing on Capitol Hill with some Republicans saying Mr. Bush must stop demonizing them and Democrats vowing to fight the Senate majority leader's bill." Rep. J.D. Hayworth, "a top voice calling for better enforcement, said while he took Mr. Bush at his word, civility is a 'two-way street' and the White House must stop attacking Republicans who disagree with it. 'If I had any advice for my friends at the White House, I think it would be to really reconsider posturing every disagreement as some sort of new political [or] psychological malady,' Mr. Hayworth said."

The Los Angeles Times (3/24, Gerstenzang, Gaouette, 958K) says "the vitriol on immigration far exceeds the language surrounding other significant but less emotional policy controversies, including changes in tax laws and the prescription drug benefit that has been added to Medicare." Bush is quoted saying, "It's important that we have a serious debate, one that discusses the issues. But I urge members of Congress and I urge people who like to comment on this issue to make sure the rhetoric is in accord with our traditions. … When we conduct this debate, it must be done in a civil way. It must be done in a way that brings dignity to the process. It must be done in a way that doesn't pit one group of people against another."

Meanwhile, CQ (3/23, Crowley) reported "sparring over immigration policy legislation intensified…in anticipation of next week's contentious Senate debate on the issue." Although Congress "remains in recess this week, Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., and staffers worked in Washington to hammer out an agreement. 'There's no agreement yet,' a Republican Judiciary Committee aide said. 'Negotiations are continuing.'"

However, the Washington Post (3/24, A18, 744K) editorializes that "the Senate Judiciary Committee, which had been bogged down for several weeks trying to produce an immigration bill, appears to have reached a consensus. The deal doesn't solve all of the problems, but it does at least try to solve the most difficult: the fate of the estimated 12 million people who live in this country illegally." The Post adds, "In its essence, the compromise -- patterned on a proposal by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) -- allows undocumented workers living here to apply for residency permits, on the condition that they prove they are employed and pay a hefty fine for breaking the law. They would then go to the back of the green card line -- behind those applying legally -- and wait for citizenship. … This is, of course, a very fragile sort of agreement. … Still, a breakthrough is a breakthrough, however fragile, and the senators on the Judiciary Committee, led by Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), are to be commended for reaching it."

Bush's remarks received some local TV coverage across the nation, much of it focusing on his call for civility. For example, KVOA-TV Tucson (3/23) reported "Bush called for a 'civil debate' as the illegal immigration dispute heats-up." WCVB-TV Boston (3/23) reported the President is "pushing for enforcement and a plan that matches willing workers with willing employers. The Senate Majority Leader seems to be side-stepping that plan."

WAGA-TV Atlanta (3/23) reported, Bush and Congress are on the verge of a potentially bitter fight over illegal immigration. Today the President met with leaders in the immigration debate and urged them to tone down the rhetoric. The President wants Congress to create a guest worker program that would offer certain working illegal immigrants temporary legal status but many Republicans refuse to endorse it."

Meanwhile, KENS-TV San Antonio (3/23) reported, "The President's pitch today may also be aimed at muting criticism from Mexico that Mr. Bush hasn't tried hard enough to keep his first-term reform pledges. He'll be meeting outgoing Mexican President Fox in Cancun next week."

Clinton's Comments Spark Commentary. Fox News' Special Report (3/23, Hume) reported that Clinton and many of her fellow Democrats are "dead-set against" a bill that has passed the House and a similar bill in the Senate that "would amount to a crackdown on illegal immigration at the border and inside this country. … What the President wants is some of that, but he also wants a guest worker program." Asked whether the President will get what he wants, NPR's Juan Williams said, "I think the President has a good shot here, but the reason is because I think he has is the strong backing of the business community." And referring to Sen. Clinton's statement Wednesday that a provision in the House immigration reform bill "would literally criminalize the Good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself," Bill O'Reilly said on Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (3/23) that Clinton "is opposing the tough law and favors business as usual. Her website says she wants more cooperation with Mexico, more high tech for Border Patrol agents: The usual gibberish, with all due respect."

Thousands Participate In "Day Without Latinos" March In Milwaukee. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (3/24, Johnson, Spice, 266K) reports "a mile-long swath of peaceful protesters marched into" Milwaukee's downtown Thursday in response to the House immigration bill. "Hundreds of students took the day off school; businesses around southeastern Wisconsin closed; and thousands of workers left their jobs in support of the event billed as 'A Day Without Latinos.'" A number of speakers focused on the bill's sponsor, Rep. Jim Sensenbrenner, "for criticism, including Sheila Cochran of the Milwaukee County Labor Council, who called the bill 'wrong-spirited, wrongheaded and just plain wrong.'"

TAX:

Proposed IRS Rule Highlights Vulnerability Of Tax Return Information. The CBS Evening News (3/23, story 7, 2:20, Orr, 7.66M) reported, "Since 1974, tax laws have allowed" tax preparers to "sell your information, but only if you sign one of these, a form giving your permission. That's not a problem for people who intentionally sign the form in an effort to, say, secure a loan or qualify for a mortgage. But critics say shady tax services could trick customers into unwittingly signing away their identities." The issue "is coming to light now because of an IRS effort to improve taxpayer protections. New proposed rules would require permission papers to carry this explicit IRS warning: 'Once your tax return information is disclosed…per your consent…we have no control…' over what happens to the information."

Oregon Taxpayers To Get Refunds As State Services Face Cuts. Oregon's coffers are seeing almost $700 million in unanticipated tax revenue, which under a one-of-a-kind law must be refunded to individual taxpayers and corporations instead of being sent by the state. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Solomon, 2.11M) reports that "residents and companies that do business in Oregon will receive refunds or credits, even as the state struggles to fill a $172 million funding gap for its human-services division and a $57 million shortfall for public schools in Portland, where as many as 14 schools might be shuttered." The situation is prompting cries from labor unions, school officials and "any residents to end the tax 'kicker' for corporations -- and posing a challenge for [Gov. Ted] Kulongoski, a Democrat up for re-election in November. Mr. Kulongoski, whose approval rating hovers at around 38%, faces a primary challenge from two Democrats, both of whom have called for an end to the corporate kicker."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

7.2 Million Seniors Have Signed Up For Medicare Drug Benefit. USA Today (3/24, 2.31M) reports, "About 1.9 million elderly and disabled people signed up for the new Medicare drug benefit over the past month, meaning 7.2 million have taken steps to enroll since the program began Jan. 1, the program's chief said Thursday.

An additional 20 million people have been enrolled automatically because they participate in other government programs, such as Medicaid, or because they have drug coverage through a former employer." Mark McClellan, administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, "said the total is expected to continue rising until the May 15 enrollment deadline."

CQ (3/23, Schuler) reports Health and Human Services Secretary Michael O. Leavitt "said the number of beneficiaries who had signed up individually for the drug plan now totals 7.2 million. 'We are very pleased that more and more people with Medicare are taking advantage of this important benefit. Strong and steady enrollment has continued this month,' Leavitt said."

The AP (3/24, Freking) says "the latest enrollment figures were released as polling showed that older people have mixed views about the program. About 44 percent of those surveyed approve of the new benefit. About 41 percent disapprove and 15 percent are undecided, according to The Pew Research Center for the People and the Press. The margin of error was plus or minus 3 percentage points."

The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Lueck, 2.11M) reports that meanwhile, "congressional Democrats released a report illustrating problems beneficiaries sometimes face when trying to obtain certain medications under the plans. In a survey of the plans available in Rep. Henry Waxman's California district, Democratic staff from the House Committee on Government Reform found that most plans require patients to get prior authorization or try other medications before getting coverage for some commonly prescribed drugs." It also "found that many drug-plan representatives didn't give accurate or full descriptions of the restrictions. It is 'nearly impossible for seniors to learn' the terms of plan restrictions 'until after they have subscribed and been denied drug access,' the report said."

Wealthier Seniors To Pay Larger Share For Doctor Visits. The Washington Times (3/24, Fagan, 90K) reports, "Starting next year, wealthier seniors will have to pay a greater share of the cost of their doctor visits because of a provision in the 2003 Medicare prescription drug legislation." Medicare Part B "covers outpatient services such as doctor visits, physical therapy and X-rays. All seniors who choose the coverage pay 25 percent of their monthly Part B premium, with the government picking up the remaining 75 percent. The seniors' monthly portion was $78.20 last year and rose to $88.50 this year." Beginning next year, "wealthier seniors will have to pay an increasingly higher percent of their Part B premium costs."

Democrats See "Fundamental Constitutional Problem" With Deficit Reduction Bill. The AP (3/24) reports, "House Democrats want President Bush to say whether he knew of what they call a 'fundamental constitutional problem' with the $39 billion deficit reduction package he signed last month." A letter to Bush, signed by House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and Rep. Henry Waxman and "released Thursday, is the latest challenge to a bill that was passed in slightly different forms by the House and Senate before it was sent to Bush." The Democrats wrote, "A bill is not law unless the same version is passed by both the House and the Senate and signed by the president."

Administration Seeks To Revive Domestic Agenda. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Team Bush scrambles to revive domestic agenda. President's acknowledgment of political capital spent on war reflects slipping prospects on other fronts. Senate Finance Chairman Grassley predicts uphill fight for even scaled-down version of expanded health savings accounts." The Journal adds, "A senior Bush adviser sees delay…as best chance for winning immigrant guest-worker program. Both chambers have sidetracked Bush's proposed Medicare savings; extension of dividend and capital-gains tax cuts remains in doubt."

Appeals Court Nominee Asks Bush To Withdraw Nomination. The Washington Post (3/24, A4, News, 744K) reports presidential aide Erin Healy said Henry W. Saad, "one of President Bush's appeals court nominees blocked by Senate Democrats, withdrew his name from consideration." Democrats have "accused Saad, a Michigan appeals court judge, of being hostile to employment-discrimination claims and lawsuits by consumers."

CQ (3/23, Perine) reports, "Michigan's two Democratic senators, Carl Levin and Debbie Stabenow, objected to Saad's nomination, as well as those of three other nominees to the 6th Circuit, because Republicans blocked two of President Bill Clinton's nominees to that court." Saad "contributed to his own problems in 2003, when he sent an e-mail message to Stabenow that criticized her for blocking his nomination. He later apologized and said he had not meant for the senator to receive the e-mail."

Bush Presented Volunteer Service Award In West Virginia. The Wheeling News Register (3/23) reported that upon landing at Wheeling-Ohio County Airport in West Virginia Wednesday, President Bush presented the President's Volunteer Service Award to Kristen Holloway of Pittsburgh, Pa. Holloway "is the founder and president of Operation Troop Appreciation, a non-profit organization dedicated to supporting deployed troops fighting the War on Terrorism in Iraq, Afghanistan, Kuwait, and Africa."

Bush Has Gone 1,889 Days Without Vetoing Legislation. CNN's The Situation Room (3/23, Blitzer) reported that President Bush has "now gone 1,889 days in office without using his veto power. He's surpassed President James Monroe's vetoless streak by a single day, and he may be going for Thomas Jefferson's record. The third president of the United States never vetoed legislation during his entire two terms. President Bush has had a GOP-led House and Senate for most of his five-plus years in office. That helps account for the fact that he signed all 1,091 bills sent to his desk."

Head Of Pension Agency To Step Down. USA Today (3/24, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) reports, "The head of the federal agency that insures the private pensions of 44 million Americans said Thursday he would step down on May 31, forcing the White House to find a new leader amid a rash of pension plan insolvencies." Bradley Belt, executive director of the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. for the past two years," announced his resignation in a letter to President Bush. He did not indicate what he planned to do after leaving the agency, and PBGC staff said they could not elaborate."

The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Schroeder, 2.11M) says the resignation comes "amid continuing turmoil in the traditional retirement-benefit system." Belt, "a former senior staff member at the Senate Banking Committee and the Securities and Exchange Commission, has been at odds with administration officials on the PBGC's board over his desire to take a larger role in the pension debate, according to people with knowledge of the situation. The board includes the secretaries of Treasury, Commerce and Labor, who have been taking the lead in pressing the administration's pension proposals." CQ (3/23) says Belt announced his departure "as House and Senate lawmakers are negotiating a final version of pension overhaul legislation (HR 2830). Aimed at forcing companies to better fund their pension plans, the legislation would increase funding requirements for pension plans and adjust the way companies evaluate their plan liabilities."

Pension Reform Bill Seen As Undermining Goal Of Strengthening Funds. The Financial Times (3/24, Cohen) reports employers will "be able to slash their contributions to underfunded pension schemes by tens of billions of dollars over the next five years under proposed legislation before Congress that was expected to have the opposite effect." The legislation was "proposed by the White House last year to lessen the risk of a taxpayer bailout of the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation, a federal safety net for pension schemes." But an analysis "prepared this week by the Joint Committee on Taxation" shows "The Pension Security and Transparency Act of 2005 would bring at least $10bn in additional tax revenue as employers reduce pension contributions on which they would have been eligible for tax relief."

OPM Director Considering Pay Changes For IGs, ALJs. The Washington Post (3/24, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that Linda Springer, director of the OPM, has been presented with options on how to address pay inequities faced by some IGs. Springer said efforts are also underway to "rethink the pay rules for administrative law judges," and she expects "to be sorting out compensation proposals for both groups in coming weeks. At issue is a Bush administration principle that job performance should be a factor in setting pay for government employees and whether that principle can be applied to IGs and ALJs without damaging or weakening their independence." Springer said revamping pay practices for both groups "will probably require congressional approval, Springer said."

First Lady Urged To Persuade Bush To Make Changes In His Administration. In the Washington Post (3/24, C1, 744K) Sally Quinn writes a letter to First Lady Laura Bush in which she urges her to tell the President "the truth." Quinn writes, "With three years to go in this presidency, something has to change. You've always been there when he needed you. You got him to stop drinking. You campaigned hard for him at the end of the first campaign. Your own poll numbers are off the charts. You need to persuade him to make changes, and to do it in a way that the people believe he means it. Remember, it's your legacy, too."

Document Details Cheney Travel Needs. The New York Times (3/24, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports the Smoking Gun Website yesterday posted a document titled "Vice Presidential Downtime Requirements" that was "and confirmed as authentic by Mr. Cheney's office. The document listed 13 requirements. Among them were these: All televisions sets in Mr. Cheney's hotel suite should be tuned to Fox News, all lights should be on, and the thermostat set at 68 degrees."

CNN's The Situation Room (3/23, Blitzer) reported that Cheney's office "had some very specific requests of the advance team, particularly when it comes to the setup of the Vice President's hotel rooms." CNN (Tatton) added, "Diet Sprite and Fox News. Those are two of the requirements, according to this document posted on The Smoking Gun."

The Washington Post (3/24, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "Reliable Source" column that the document includes "No over-the-top demands, just a few specific requests." The Post adds, "And, if the hotel wants to leave a gift in the suite, the bills should be unmarked . . . kidding! Seriously, though, the advance team needs to know about any hotel gift for the vice president."

Republicans Angry, Ambivalent About Party's Performance In Congress. According to Knight Ridder (3/23, Thomma, Kuhnhenn) that many Republicans are angry and ambivalent about their party's job performance as Washington's majority party. Knight Ridder notes, "If enough disgruntled Republicans sit out the midterm elections - when voter turnout typically is low and victory goes to the party whose base is most passionate - Republican incumbents could lose in close contests." Democrats "need to gain only 15 of 435 seats to take control of the U.S. House of Representatives, and six of the 33 that are up this year to take the 100-member Senate. And if they win either house of Congress, President Bush will become the lamest of lame ducks for his final two years in power."

Congress Putting Ethics Reform Proposals On Back Burner. The Christian Science Monitor (3/24, Chaddock, 61K) reports the "prospects for robust ethics reform in the 109th Congress are dimming, even as the criminal probes that prompted it are intensifying. It's a political calculation that could cost lawmakers in this fall's elections, if they misread the degree to which voters care about bribery inside the Beltway." As recently "as January, lobby reform bills were top priorities in both the House and Senate, but now are encountering strong resistance. In the Senate, Republican leaders pulled the lobby bill off the floor over an unrelated amendment on the Dubai ports deal. In the House, GOP leaders are split over how aggressively to restrict lawmaker travel paid for by private entities."

Attorneys For Former Lobbyists Question Espionage Act. The Washington Post (3/24, A6, Pincus, 744K) reports the Federal judge "presiding over the prosecution of two former lobbyists has focused attention on the imprecise nature of the law they are charged with breaking, the 1917 Espionage Act that restricts the dissemination of national defense information that could harm U.S. interests." Today, "attorneys for the former lobbyists, Steve Rosen and Keith Weissman, will argue for dismissal of the indictment based in part on the claim that the Espionage Act was meant to cover spying, not the possession of leaked classified information, particularly leaked information possessed and transmitted by people who are not government employees."

Washington Said To Be Awash With Quasi-Apocalyptic Warnings. The Washington Post (3/24, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports Washington "was about one horseman short of an apocalypse yesterday," noting there were congressional hearings on avian flu, a National Press Club news conference on mad cow disease, and a National Economists Club meeting on global warming. The Post adds, "Have a nice doomsday? Possibly. When President Bush went to Cleveland on Monday, a questioner asked him about a claim 'that members of your administration have reached out to prophetic Christians who see the war in Iraq and the rise of terrorism as signs of the apocalypse. Do you believe this, that the war in Iraq and the rise of terrorism are signs of the apocalypse?'" Bush said, "I haven't really thought of it that way. The first I've heard of that, by the way." The Post adds, "But maybe not the last, if yesterday's collection of end-of-days warnings was any indication."

Krugman Says Snow Should Stop "Repeating Administration Talking Points." Paul Krugman's column in the New York Times (3/24, 1.19M) today is a letter to Treasury Secretary John Snow in which the columnist says, "I'm glad that you've started talking about income inequality, which in recent years has reached levels not seen since before World War II. But if you want to be credible on the subject, you need to make some changes in your approach. … Of course, my suggestions about how to improve your credibility would force you to stop repeating administration talking points. But you're the secretary of the Treasury. Your job is to make economic policy, not to spout propaganda. Oh, wait."

Robinson Expresses "Pity" For Allen. Eugene Robinson writes in the Washington Post (3/24, A19, 744K), "Would it be fair to cheer [Claude] Allen's downfall just because he held a highly visible post in an administration that is reviled by most African Americans? No, but there's more: He made his name in black conservative circles by serving as a top aide to Jesse Helms, the old buzzard from North Carolina. … So, yes, when Allen was arrested on felony theft charges, my first reaction was smug satisfaction. But then I told myself: Don't hate. The proper reaction is pity, on every level."

Sales Of Existing Homes Unexpectedly High. ABC World News Tonight (3/23, story 8, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "There's a report today that shows new strength in the housing market. Sales of existing homes surged an unexpected 5.2% last month, the biggest gain in two years." USA Today (3/24, Knox, 2.31M) reports "buyers took advantage of warm weather and kicked off the spring home-shopping season early, the National Association of Realtors said Thursday. March, typically a strong month, is also looking good in many regions, boosting the case for a soft landing rather than a sudden plunge." The New York Times (3/24, Bajaj, 1.19M) reports the story under the headline "Defying Trend, An Upturn In Home Sales," and says "analysts, who had expected sales to fall to a pace of 6.5 million, cautioned that the increase could not yet be considered a turning point. Several other real estate gauges, including mortgage applications, interest rates and pending home sales, have indicated that sales are slowing." The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Dunham, 2.11M) runs a similar story.

Stock Markets Close Lower. NBC Nightly News (3/23, story 10, 0:10, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today stocks finished lower. The Dow lost more than 47 points [to close at 11,270.29]. The NASDAQ was down just over 3 points [to close at 2,300.15]." The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Patterson, 2.11M) reports the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slid 3.37 to 1301.67. The New York Times (3/24, News, 1.19M) says stocks fell "after oil prices jumped and an increase in home sales added to concern that the Federal Reserve might keep lifting interest rates."

Bernanke Says Reduced Foreign Investment, Lower Dollar Not Worrisome. Bloomberg (3/24, Lanman) reports Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke "said a possible decline in the dollar because of less foreign investment wouldn't have a 'worrisome' effect on the U.S. economy." In a March 21 letter to Rep. Harold Ford, Bernanke said it "isn't clear that faster economic growth in emerging markets would cause investors to shift capital to those countries and away from the US. Should that happen, 'it might be associated with a decline in the value of the dollar and a narrowing of the US trade deficit.'"

DC Judges Form Rock Band. The Washington Post (3/24, B1, Cauvin) reports, "Stoic stewards of the Constitution by day in D.C. Superior Court, they are by night (or weekend, or whenever they feel the urge) Deaf Dog and the Indictments -- a guitar-heavy group of seven music-loving judges, anchored by the lone civilian among them, a ponytailed shrink on drums." The Post continues, "Strutting onto the stage Saturday afternoon in Blues Brothers-black, Dawgg (aka Judge William Jackson) and the rest of the Indictments had more space than they needed -- 100 or so people were spread out in an auditorium built for lots more." The Post adds, "All they had were a couple of songs and a curious name, hatched in an early rehearsal, when a few of the musicians thought they had found a real fan -- Canan's German shepherd, Chapin, who was never put off by the racket that chased everyone else away. Canan had to break it to his brethren that Chapin was deaf. But he didn't doubt her devotion, and so was born the name, Deaf Dog and the Indictments. … Maybe it was the pangs of middle and not-so-middle age sounding a call to their inner youth. Or perhaps they wanted a break from all the pain and conflict they see in court: the murder cases Canan tried as a judge in criminal court, the dysfunctional lives that Jackson saw as head of the domestic violence courts or just the indignity of having a deranged defendant hurl a trash can into your head, as happened to John Campbell when he was assigned to a criminal court. … Whatever it was, the band lived to play again, starting at D.C. Superior Court, where it was the surprise entertainment for the employee awards ceremony last fall."

Democratic Strategists Believe Conditions Are Perfect For Female Candidates. Democratic strategists believe conditions are "perfect" for female Democratic candidates this year. Democratic women are running campaigns in almost half of the 24 most competitive House races. The New York Times (3/24, Toner, 1.19M) reports that Republicans "dismiss this theory." The Times adds, "By the time it is over, this midterm election may offer some hints on the kind of climate that awaits Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York if she runs for president in 2008."

Minimum Wage Could Be Election Issue. The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Minimum wage emerges as election-year flashpoint. Treasury Secretary Snow's remarks on income inequality fuel debate. … Commerce Secretary Gutierrez also signals openness to an increase if Congress pursues the issue 'thoughtfully...and not emotionally.' … Strategist Carville advises Democrats to block pay raise for Congress until average worker's wages rise."

Rendell, Swann Even In Pennsylvania Governor's Race. Pennsylvania's Democratic Gov. Ed Rendell is running even with Republican Challenger, former Pittsburgh Steeler Lynn Swann, according to recent polls. The Washington Times (3/24, Lambro, 90K) reports that Rendell "was expected to have little trouble winning another four years in office, until the charismatic Football Hall of Fame wide receiver and ABC Sports commentator entered the contest in January, sweeping his rivals from the race for the GOP nomination and making the former Philadelphia mayor and national Democratic chairman look suddenly vulnerable." Rendell "has seen his voter-approval scores fall below 50 percent, after his disastrous signing of a legislator pay-raise bill last year that triggered protests from voters and was later rescinded."

Study Examines Effects Of Prayer When Used In Conjunction With Medicine. A front page story in the Washington Post (3/24, A1, Stein, 744K) reports that prayer "is the most common complement to mainstream medicine, far outpacing acupuncture, herbs, vitamins and other alternative remedies. … The outpouring of spiritual healing has inspired a small group of researchers to attempt to use the tools of modern science to test the power of prayer to cure others. The results have been mixed and highly controversial. Skeptics say the work is a deeply flawed and misguided waste of money that irresponsibly attempts to validate the supernatural with science. And some believers say it is pointless to try to divine the workings of God with experiments devised by mortals."

AEI Scholar Says US Poor Are Doing Better. Douglas Besharov, the Jacobs scholar in social welfare studies at the American Enterprise Institute, writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/24, 2.11M), "Each year the Census Bureau calculates the nation's poverty rate, based on the number of people with incomes below the official poverty line, about $20,000 for a family of four in 2004. Since last year's poverty rate of 12.7% was essentially equal to the 1968 rate of 12.8%, it seems that little progress has been made. But many analysts -- on the right and the left -- have pointed out that, by many other measures, poor people's physical and material well-being is considerably better now than in the late '60s. How else to explain why so many poor now have color TV (93%) and air conditioning (50%), and own their own homes (46%)?" Besharov adds that while "about 15 million people are below the poverty line and millions more just above it," millions of low income Americans "are living better lives than they did before."

Isolationists Said To Still Be Minority In US. In a New York Times op-ed (3/24), pollster Andrew Kohut says "recent opinion surveys affirm that isolationist sentiment has increased in recent years," but while "these trends represent significant shifts in attitudes, it would be a mistake to conclude that this country is becoming isolationist. There is no sign that most Americans want the United States to turn its back on the world or that anti-foreign sentiment in this country is rising. Discontent with Mr. Bush's policies, notably on Iraq, has led to widespread public frustration. And while it has also created more isolationists, they remain a minority."

Rice Warns Security Council Holdouts There "Can't Be Any Stalling" On Iran. The AP (3/24, Gearan) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice issued a veiled warning Thursday to holdouts in a diplomatic impasse at the United Nations over Iran's disputed nuclear program. 'There can't be any stalling,' Rice said in response to a question about U.S. efforts to get Russia and China to sign on to a strongly worded rebuke to Tehran." Russia and China "have refused to back a UN Security Council statement proposed by Britain, France and the United States demanding Iran suspend uranium enrichment."

US Officials Worried Iran Closer Than Believed To Nuclear Weapons. Knight Ridder (3/24, Landay, Strobel) reports, "US officials are concerned that Iran may be closer than they previously believed to mastering the process for producing fuel for a nuclear weapon. Their unease stems from a recent briefing at which UN International Atomic Energy Agency experts reported that Iran was close to operating a test network of 164 machines, called centrifuges, that spin uranium hexafluoride gas into enriched uranium, US officials and a foreign diplomat said." Knight Ridder adds, "Depending on its duration, the process produces low enriched uranium for power plants and highly enriched uranium for nuclear weapons."

US Ambassador Accuses Iran Of Interfering In Iraq. The Washington Post (3/24, Finer, Knickermeyer, 744K) reports an interview with US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad in which he said "Iran is publicly professing its support for Iraq's stalemated political process while its military and intelligence services back outlawed militias and insurgent groups." He went to say, "Iranian agents train and arm Shiite Muslim militias such as the Mahdi Army, linked to one of Iraq's most powerful clerics…and also work closely with Sunni Arab-led insurgent forces including Ansar al-Sunna, blamed for dozens of deadly attacks on Iraqi and American soldiers and Shiite civilians." The Post says Khalilzad's "accusations" were made "as the United States and Iran -- two feuding foreign powers with dominant roles in Iraqi affairs -- have expressed willingness to hold talks aimed at stabilizing the beleaguered country."

Olmert Demands Loyalty On Separation Plan Ahead Of Election. The AP (3/23, Federman) reported Acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "sent his strongest signal yet that hard-line parties won't be welcome in the next government if his party wins next week's election." Olmert's remarks indicated "coalition partners must be on board with his plan to withdraw from most of the West Bank." The AP says hard-line Kadima opponents "say the go-it-alone approach, which would involve uprooting dozens of Jewish settlements in the West Bank, amounts to a surrender to Palestinian violence." The AP says, "It appears increasingly likely that [Olmert[will join forces with the dovish Labor and Meretz parties, while leaving the hawkish parties, including Likud, in the opposition."

The Financial Times (3/24, Morris) reports on jockeying for the Finance Minister post. Although Olmert "has declared his intention to keep the treasury for one of his own," a strong showing by Labor "could put pressure on Mr Olmert to surrender the treasury to Amir Peretz, its leader."

Asian Governments Intensifying Watch For North Korean Counterfeit $100 Bills. Governments around Asia are stepping up surveillance for high-quality counterfeit American 4100 bills, which the US alleges are made by North Korea. The Washington Post (3/24, D5, Fairclough, 744K) reports, "The fake $100 bills," dubbed "supernotes," have "turned up in the United States, Philippines, Taiwan and elsewhere over the past two years."

North Korea Condemns US-South Korea Drills. Upcoming joint US-south Korean military exercises will be met with an unspecified "strong measure of self defense," North Korea warned yesterday. The AP (3/24, Kim) reports that North Korea condemned the drill "as saber-rattling for a pre-emptive nuclear attack on the North." In a statement carried on the North's Korean Central News Agency, North Korea's Foreign Ministry said, "Now that the US intention to stifle the DPRK has become very clear, the DPRK will react to it with a strong measure for self-defense." The North "has long claimed the US is bent on invading the country, condemning the annual military drill as a 'rehearsal' for an attack."

Rumsfeld Says US Should Maintain Wartime Command In South Korea. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said yesterday that the US must retain command of South Korea's military unit until the South's forces are strong enough to maintain stability on the peninsula. The AP (3/24, Mann) reports, "In a Pentagon news briefing, Rumsfeld said South Korea has brought up the idea, and 'everyone agrees that 55 years after the war, it's reasonable that the South Korean forces would increasingly take on more and more responsibility.' Asked whether he thought the change in command structure could start this year, Rumsfeld replied: 'No, no, I don't at all.'"

Senators More Optimistic About US-China Trade Relations. USA Today (3/24, MacLeod, 2.31M) reports, "The US senators pushing a bill to punish Chinese currency policies said Thursday they were more optimistic Beijing will revalue the yuan. But they refused to rule out pushing for a vote after they return to Washington to impose tariffs on all Chinese imports into the USA." Sen. Chuck Schumer said, "The jury is still out. … We still need some concrete signs of movement." He also said "there is a real possibility the Chinese government and people see it in their interest to let the yuan float." However, "he got no firm indication of when the currency would be allowed to fluctuate on global markets." Sen. Lindsey Graham said, "The clock is ticking on this currency issue."

The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Dean, 2.11M) headlines its story "US Senators Offer Hope To China On Tariffs," and reports the senators "said they are more optimistic about US-China trade relations after a trip to China's capital." But "the lawmakers stopped short of a commitment to put off a vote on their legislation, scheduled for next week." The Washington Post (3/24, D5, Goodman, 744K) runs a similar report, titled "Senators Hopeful Of Compromise On Yuan," and quotes Schumer saying, "We're feeling better." The Christian Science Monitor (3/24, Marquand, 61K) also reports on the senators' trip, under the headline "On China Visit, US Senators Tone Down Tariff Talk."

Journalist Says China Harvests Inmate Organs For Domestic, Foreign Sale. The Washington Times (3/24, Gertz, 90K) reports, "A Chinese journalist has uncovered a secret detention center in northern China that is being used by a hospital to harvest human organs for sale to domestic and international buyers." Jin Zhong, "a pseudonym for the journalist who fled China recently," also said in an interview that "a failed Chinese intelligence operation led to the 2004 death of a Japanese diplomat who committed suicide rather than give up secrets."

Chinese Official Casts Doubt On Whether Jailed NYTimes Researcher Will Be Released. The New York Times (3/24, Yardley, 1.19M) reports, "The United States on Thursday continued to press China about the status of a jailed researcher for The New York Times, but the uncertainty about his fate deepened as a Chinese government spokesman appeared to cast doubt on whether he would soon be released." The case against Zhao Yan, "a Chinese researcher in the Beijing bureau of The Times, was withdrawn last Friday by a court order." But "the Chinese authorities have since remained silent about the status of Mr. Zhao, and he is still behind bars. Asked on Thursday afternoon about the case, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, Qin Gang, criticized foreign news organizations for making 'irresponsible statements,' and he then offered a cryptic response. … 'From what I have learned, the actual situation is not like what you are talking about.'" In an editorial, the New York Times (3/24, 1.19M) says "it should be clear to the Chinese authorities that American leaders and the international news media are not going to forget this case. Mr. Zhao's plight should remain on the agenda for President Hu Jintao's first official visit to Washington next month."

Japan Suspends Loans To China. The Financial Times (3/24, Pilling) reports, "Japan has suspended decisions on new yen loans to China, blaming its increasingly strained ties with its biggest trading partner and former wartime adversary." The move, although "largely symbolic, marks a fresh low in relations between Asia's two biggest powers, which have been dogged by disputes over territory and natural resources." The Times adds, "Ties have worsened in recent years because of annual visits by Junichiro Koizumi, Japan's prime minister, to Tokyo's Yasukuni shrine, where 14 war criminals are honoured alongside millions of war dead." The Washington Times/AP (3/24, Inagaki) says "criticism is mounting in Japan that China's booming economy no longer needs the handouts."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (3/24, A12, Faiola, 744K) reports that "with Japan seeking to shed a half-century of pacifism and reassert itself in world affairs, and China acquiring vastly larger economic and military might, relations between the two are as tense as they have been at any time since World War II." The Post adds, "Nowhere is their contest more visible than here in Taiwan, which China regards as a renegade province that must be reunified with the mainland, by force if necessary. In recent months, Japan has made a series of unprecedented overtures toward Taiwan, which was a Japanese colony from 1895 to 1945. In Tokyo, leading politicians are increasingly adopting the view that Japan must come to the island's aid in the event of Chinese aggression."

More Commentary On China. Jaushieh Joseph Wu, the Minister of Mainland Affairs in the Council of Taiwan, writes in the Washington Times (3/24, 90K), "During his visit to Japan in November 2005, President George W. Bush said that by embracing freedom at all levels, Taiwan has delivered prosperity to its people and created a free and democratic society. For Taiwanese who lived through the four decades of authoritarianism and martial law under the Chinese Nationalist Party (KMT), Mr. Bush's words were no less an official recognition of what Taiwan has fought hard to achieve over the past few decades." Bush's "comments late last year were an encouragement to Taiwan. Taiwan is now refining its democracy, the better to be a beacon for democracy activists in China to follow, and in this endeavor Taiwan deserves US support."

US Freezes Assets Of Some Lebanese Media Companies. The AP (3/24, Aversa) reports, "The Bush administration moved Thursday to freeze the assets of several Lebanese media outlets, alleging that they helped raised money and recruits for Hezbollah's terrorist network." The Treasury Department's action "is against al Manar, a satellite TV operator, al Nour Radio and their parent company, the Lebanese Media Group. Any assets found in the United States belonging to these three outlets will be frozen and Americans are forbidden from doing business with them." The department alleges that "al Manar and al Nour Radio are the 'media arms' of Hezbollah."

US, Venezuela Agree To Allow Resumption Of Flights. The AP (3/23, Toothaker) reported remarks by US Ambassador William Brownfield that the US "and Venezuela have reached a temporary agreement that will avoid a proposed ban on flights by most U.S. airlines to the South American country." Caracas continues to seek a lifting of the FAA's safety ban on Venezuelan airlines flying to the US.

US Travel Warning Becomes An Issue In Italian Campaign. The New York Times (3/24, Fisher, 1.19M) reports, "An American travel advisory on possible dangers in Italy ballooned on Thursday into an issue in the close national election campaign here, with opposition politicians suggesting that the advisory could be used as ammunition against them." While PM Silvio Berlusconi "immediately seized on the advisory" and blamed it on center-left protesters, Romano Prodi "was concerned enough by the implication that leftist demonstrators constituted a threat that he called the American ambassador, Ronald Spogli, for an explanation."

Anti-Lukashenko Protest Ends With Non-Violent Arrests. The New York Times (3/24, Chivers, 1.19M) reports riot police entered a Minsk, Belarus, square early Friday and arrested "hundreds of antigovernment protesters," who "stood their ground while the officers dismounted and jogged into place in lines, cutting off any chance of escape." There were no reports of violence associated with the arrests. The Times notes the "small encampment had been a potent attraction in a police state that has never tolerated dissent," and goes on to say that Belarus still "operates like a Soviet anachronism." The Wall Street Journal (3/24, Cullison, A4, 2.11M) reports the arrest of "the ragtag symbol of opposition further highlights the obstacles faced by the region's pro-democracy groups, despite the success of such efforts in Ukraine and Georgia." Divergent media reporting was also noted: "Western television had been broadcasting the evening crowds. But here in Belarus, footage beamed to millions of homes by state-run television showed the desolate early morning, when the few protesters…meandered…amid piles of garbage." The Washington Times/AP (3/24, Heintz) also reports the story.

Bush Signs Bill Ending Trade Restrictions On Ukraine. The AP (3/24) reports, "President Bush signed a law Thursday that ended Cold War-era trade restrictions on Ukraine, opening the way for the former Soviet republic to join the World Trade Organization." The measure "frees Ukraine from a 1974 measure called the Jackson-Vanik Amendment, which links trade benefits to the emigration and human rights policies of former or current communist states."

"Soviet-Style Apparatchiks" Poised for Come-Back In Weekend Elections. The Washington Times (3/24, Feduschak, 90K) reports, "Political allies who stood side by side during Ukraine's 2004 'Orange Revolution' are waging war against each other in such a divisive campaign that the Soviet-style apparatchiks they had ousted are poised for a comeback in elections this weekend." Opinion polls "show that the party of Viktor Yanukovych, who won the presidency in an election in 2004 only to lose to Viktor Yushchenko in a court-ordered second vote, will win about a third of the seats Sunday, becoming the biggest single bloc in Ukraine's 450-seat parliament." The New York Times (3/24, Myers, 1.19M) also reports on the situation in the Ukraine, under the headline "Ethnic And Cultural Divisions Haunt Ukraine Before Vote."

De Villepin To Talk To French Unions. The Financial Times (3/24, Arnold) reports, "Dominique de Villepin invited trade unions to talks over his unpopular employment law on Thursday 'with no strings attached', a move cautiously accepted by five unions and widely interpreted as a climbdown by the embattled French premier." The appeal "came as Mr de Villepin faced accusations that his refusal to consider changing the law had provoked an unnecessary crisis, with critics suspecting he had allowed his presidential ambitions to override his political judgment." The New York Times (3/24, Smith, 1.19M) says France's "most powerful labor union federations agreed Thursday to meet…de Villepin on Friday."

NBC Nightly News (3/23, story 5, 0:20, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "In Paris today, and all across France, tens of thousands of students took to the streets, demanding a fair chance at a job and protesting a new law that could make it easier to fire younger workers. Their protests turned violent when a small group set cars on fire, looted stores, and threw chunks of concrete at police." The Washington Post (3/24, A1, Moore, 744K) reports it was "just the scene the French government had been dreading: burning cars seven blocks from the Eiffel Tower, shop windows smashed along one of the capital's toniest streets, and columns of helmeted riot police advancing across the greensward of a prominent tourist venue. … Thursday's violence came at the end of a demonstration by tens of thousands of high school and college students protesting a new job law." The unrest "intensified a political crisis that now threatens to unravel President Jacques Chirac's government -- much the way previous French governments have been felled by strikes and street protests when they attempted even modest reforms of the country's costly welfare state."

Russia Seeks To Secure WTO Membership Before G-8 Summit. Russia is pushing to enter the WTO before it hosts that G-8 summit this summer. The Washington Times (3/24, Zarocostas, 90K) reports, "The talks can certainly "close before the G-8 summit," said Robert Vastine, president of the influential U.S. Coalition of Service Industries, a Washington-based umbrella group that represents major services corporations. But he indicated the ball is squarely in President Vladimir Putin's court."

EU Countries Consider Requiring Immigrants To Sign Contracts. Germany, Britain France, Poland, Spain and Italy, the six largest countries in the European Union, are considering having immigrants sign a contract that would require they learn their adopted country's language and social norms or risk being expelled. The Financial Times (3/24, Williamson) reports, "The so-called integration contract is still to be discussed with the other 19 EU member states. Nicolas Sarkozy, French interior minister, proposed it during a meeting of ministers from the 'G6' countries…in Heiligendamm, a luxury resort on Germany's Baltic coast."

Chirac Storms Out Of EU Summit; Merkel Warns Against Protectionism. The Financial Times (3/24, Parker, Smyth) reports French President Jacques Chirac "stormed out" of an EU summit meeting because a French business leader began speaking in English. "Mr Chirac's boycott reflected the tensions surrounding the two-day economic summit, which comes against a backdrop of French street protests over labour market reform and claims that Paris is engaged in protectionism of its energy market. The French president was not in the room to hear Mr Seillière urging leaders to 'resist national protectionism in order to avoid a negative domino effect.'" The Times notes German Chancellor Angela Merkel "issued a thinly veiled warning to France and Spain to open their energy markets, as the dispute over protectionism overshadowed the start of the summit." She "said Europe needed continent-wide industrial champions, and that attempts" to protect national energy firms "made nonsense of the EU's single market."

US Doctor Volunteering In Chad Profiled. NBC Nightly News (3/23, story 12, 2:30, Curry, 9.87M) profiles Dr. Peter Reynaud, who "volunteers for Doctors Without Borders where few dare to go -- the increasingly dangerous border between Darfur, Sudan, and Chad. Almost daily come new reports of violence against blacks, blamed on the Janjaweed, Arab militias the US says are supported by the government of Sudan." Despite "all the ugliness and violence he's experienced, the horror he's seen, Reynaud says he considers himself fortunate to be in this hospital now." Dr. Reynaud: "I think that these are big problems. But I think coming here and working here, I'm working for the world that I want to live in."

Peru's Humala Called "Openly Hostile" Toward Private Sector. Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/24, 2.11M) that investors are "spooked" because Peruvian presidential candidate Ollanta Humala, who appears likely to win the election two weeks form now, "is openly hostile toward the private sector. … His avowed intent to stick it to the private-sector -- with an emphasis on mineral and natural gas rights -- frightens investors." O'Grady adds that "what is nearly certain, if he makes it to the presidency, is that his tenure will increase property-rights insecurity and damage Peru's recent growth spurt. There can be no doubt that Peruvians face a crucial choice next month and that another Latin country is in danger of succumbing to yet another bout of corporatist authoritarianism."

Democracy Seen As Possible In Non-Western Nations. Amartya Sen, the 1998 Nobel laureate in economics, writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/24, 2.11M), "While it is easy enough to understand the widespread -- and increasing -- doubts about armed intervention allegedly aimed at jump-starting democracy in Iraq through largely foreign and military planning, it would be quite a leap from there to become skeptical of the general possibility of the emergence of democracy in any country that is currently nondemocratic. It is worth remembering that democracy has developed well enough in many countries in Asia, Africa and Latin America, and in the case of some, such as South Africa, even foreign assistance to local democratic movements (for example through economic boycott) has positively helped."

WPost Calls "Serious Peace Force" In Sudan Unlikely. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/24, A18, 744K) says that despite President Bush's words, "the odds of deploying a serious peace force" in Sudan "have receded," because Sudan's government "has threatened violent resistance to a muscular deployment. And Sudan's bluster carries more weight than Mr. Bush's statements. … So Mr. Bush's call for a more serious deployment has been buried for the moment. No peacekeeping force is going to be strong enough to shoot its way into Darfur to establish peace; it will require some form of assent from Sudan's government."

MILITARY-IRAQI VIEW _ 2 p.m. Army Brig. Gen. Anthony Cucolo hosts a media roundtable to discuss a U.S. Joint Forces Command unclassified historical report in book form released today on the Iraqi view of coalition military operations conducted in Iraq. The report was done by by U.S. Joint Forces Command's Joint Center for Operational Analysis, the Iraqi Perspective Project. The Project is a research effort focused on coalition military operations in Iraq from March to May 2003. It focused on the perspectives of the Iraqi civilian and military leadership involved in major combat operations gathered through interviews conducted during the fall and winter of 2003/2004, and an extensive review of Iraqi historical documents done in the months since then. The project is the first such effort by the U.S. government to understand the views of an enemy military force since World War II, when the U.S. government conducted a comprehensive review of recovered German and Japanese documents, along with interviews of key military and civilian leadership. Location: Room 2C554, Pentagon.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Moussaoui Prosecutors Close With FBI Agent (AP-Y2)

By Michael J. Sniffen

Prosecutors wrapped up their case for executing Zacarias Moussaoui with a former FBI agent's testimony Thursday that the bureau could have identified 11 of the Sept. 11 hijackers if the al-Qaida conspirator had confessed when he was arrested a month before the suicide attacks.

Before court-appointed defense attorneys could begin their case, Moussaoui announced loudly as he left for a recess that he would testify in his own behalf.

"I will testify, Zerkin, whether you want it or not," he said, referring to one of his lawyers, Gerald Zerkin. The 37-year-old Frenchman, who is the only person charged in this country in connection with the 2001 attacks, has refused to cooperate with his lawyers.

Former FBI agent Aaron Zebley testified that Moussaoui's admission, when he pleaded guilty last April, that he received more than $14,000 in wire transfers from a man using the name Ahad Sabet could have allowed the FBI to go through Western Union, cell phone, calling-card and motor vehicle records, as well as leases and other business materials to identify most of the 19 hijackers who flew jetliners into the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and a Pennsylvania field.

U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema, who has told the jury it cannot decide Moussaoui's punishment "on speculation," barred Zebley from explicitly asserting what the FBI would have accomplished had he confessed when arrested Aug. 16, 2001.

But Zebley gave prosecutors their strongest testimony in a week when many of their witnesses ended up buttressing the defense argument that the FBI and Federal Aviation Administration badly bungled better intelligence about 9/11 than Moussaoui had in the summer of 2001.

Zebley implied that Moussaoui's lies when arrested while taking pilot lessons in Minnesota foreclosed several avenues of investigation that might have saved at least one of the nearly 3,000 lives lost on 9/11.

"We could have set about finding the hijackers," Zebley said.

For the first hour of more than two hours on the stand Thursday, Zebley had jurors leaning forward to follow his explanation of how FBI agents moved from the data in records of one money transfer by Western Union, through incoming and outgoing calls to a phone number listed on the Western Union record, to the businesses that were called from all those phone numbers, to home addresses listed on business and bank transaction records, to leases and driver's licenses and other IDs recorded by landlords. He said the identities of 11 of the hijackers were learned by these methods within weeks after the attacks and these records existed in August, 2001.

On cross-examination, defense lawyer Edward MacMahon pointed out that neither Moussaoui's statements after arrest nor anything found in a post-9/11 search of his possessions gave away that he got that money transfer by wire. The defense has argued that under the Fifth Amendment Moussaoui had no obligation to incriminate himself when arrested.

MacMahon asked why the FBI didn't launch a full criminal investigation of Moussaoui in August 2001 based on 70 appeals to Washington by arresting agent Harry Samit who warned that Moussaoui was a terrorist training to hijack an airliner.

"The FBI has to have a confession ... before anybody listens?" MacMahon asked.

Zebley replied that Samit did not know all the details in Moussaoui's 2005 confession.

MacMahon got Zebley to acknowledge that nothing in the confession or in FBI evidence gathered since then shows any contact between Moussaoui and the 9/11 hijackers, who lived, trained and traveled together in small groups. Moussaoui pleaded guilty to conspiring with al-Qaida to fly planes into U.S. buildings. But he says he had nothing to do with 9/11 and was training to fly a 747 jetliner into the White House as part of a possible later attack.

MacMahon brought out that the CIA knew in March 2000 that two of the 9/11 hijackers — Nawaf al-Hazmi and Khalid al-Mindhar — had entered the United States in 2000 after attending a conference with Osama bin Laden associates in Malaysia. He showed that the CIA finally told the FBI on Aug. 23, 2001, that the pair were in the United States, and that the FBI sent a message marked "routine" on Aug. 28 asking its New York office to look for them. On Sept. 10, 2001, the FBI New York office asked the Los Angeles office to check for them in hotels there, according an FBI document MacMahon introduced.

"What could have been done if the U.S. government had tracked al-Hazmi and al-Mindhar in the summer of 2001?" MacMahon asked. "We'll never know, right?"

Zebley conceded that point.

The first defense witness, former FBI agent Erik Rigler, summarized a Justice Department inspector general report that criticized the CIA for keeping the al-Hazmi and al-Mindhar intelligence from the FBI for so long and the FBI for assigning pursuit of the pair to one inexperienced, young agent. It said the pair was on Thailand's watchlist in January, 2000, but not on a U.S. watchlist until August, 2001.

Earlier in the trial, Samit said he spent four weeks warning his bosses about the radical Islamic student pilot. He said "criminal negligence" and bureaucratic resistance by FBI headquarters agents blocked "a serious opportunity to stop the 9/11 attacks."

This sentencing trial will determine whether Moussaoui is executed or imprisoned for life.

Meanwhile, Transportation Security Administration lawyer Carla J. Martin, who improperly coached witnesses in the case, was subpoenaed for a Monday hearing, but her legal advisers were considering trying to block the appearance, according to a lawyer familiar with the case. Brinkema said there might be an early Monday hearing.

Moussaoui Prosecution Rests Case After Key FBI Testimony (AFP-Y2)

AFP, March 23, 2006

US prosecutors rested their death penalty case against Zacarias Moussaoui after their key witness said most of the September 11 hijackers could have been found had Moussaoui confessed his Al-Qaeda links before the attacks.

Former FBI agent Aaron Zebley said he used Moussaoui's guilty plea last year to build a web of telephone records, wire transfers and financial data, linking him to the same Al-Qaeda financiers behind the September 11 suicide crews.

His evidence fleshed out the central point behind the prosecution drive for Moussaoui's execution -- namely that had investigators known in August 2001, what they knew in April 2005, they may have been able to stop the attacks.

"Was that information available to the FBI in August 2001?" prosecutor Robert Spencer asked Zebley, at the climax of his testimony.

"It could have been," Zebley replied, earning an immediate objection from Defense Counsel Edward MacMahon.

"Ultimate issue in the case," MacMahon said, an objection upheld by Judge Leonie Brinkema.

MacMahon later challenged Zebley's assessments, as tempers frayed at the start of his cross-examination asking: "So the FBI needs a confession from an Al-Qaeda terrorist to launch an investigation?"

Brinkema then intervened, telling MacMahon and Zebley, who now works as a prosecutor at the Alexandria, Virginia, courthouse hosting the trial, to take a deep breath, "calm down" and take a lunch break.

Zebley testified that financial wire information found in a notebook owned by Moussaoui, details of his money transactions, phone card information and a listing of flight schools could have helped crack the 9/11 plot.

Investigators did not discover those details until after September 11, because FBI bosses concluded -- despite the fears of one agent that Moussaoui was a terrorist who might hijack a plane -- that his answers while in custody in August 2001, did not merit a warrant to search his belongings.

Agents could have unravelled the puzzle from a 14,000 dollar transfer to Moussaoui from Germany, which left a trail to the United Arab Emirates, and back to the September 11 hijackers training in Florida, Zebley said.

Eleven of the 19 hijackers could have been found, Zebley said, including the presumed ringleader of the four hijacking gangs, Mohammad Atta.

Flight school advertising found in Moussaoui's possession could have led to the discovery of Hani Hanjour, the pilot who slammed a plane into the Pentagon and had been at simulator school in Phoenix, Arizona, he said.

According to Zebley, the 11 hijackers could have been traced because they were using their real names.

"What could you have done with these 11 names?" Spencer asked.

"We would have set about finding them of course," Zebley said, adding that the FBI, US intelligence and federal aviation officials could have been alerted.

The US Secret Service could also have been involved as Moussaoui had threatened to fly a jumbo jet into the White House.

But MacMahon later took aim at the prosecution case that had information been gleaned from Moussaoui, most of the hijackers could have been found, playing down links Zebley testified were evident between Moussaoui and the four suicide gangs.

The defense lawyer established under cross examination that Moussaoui had never called the telephone number in the United Arab Emirates associated with the Al-Qaeda money transfers.

He also got Zebley to say that Moussaoui had never called any of the 9/11 hijackers, did not know any of the prospective targets or the date for any of the attacks.

Moussaoui, a Frenchman of Moroccan descent, pleaded guilty last April to conspiring with Al-Qaeda to fly airliners into US buildings in connection to September 11. But he has said he was not to be part of the September 11 strike, but a follow up attack targeting the White House.

Jurors are being asked to decide whether Moussaoui should be executed or sent to prison for life.

After the prosecution rested its case, the judge immediately took the court into a closed session, not involving the jury, without saying what would be discussed.

As he was led from the court, into another chamber where the closed hearing was to take place, Moussaoui raised his hand and shouted at his court appointed lawyers with whom he has refused to cooperate.

"I will testify Zerkin, whether you like it or not, I will testify," he shouted, referring to Gerald Zerkin, a member of his defense team.

FBI Agent Says 9/11 Plot Was Within Grasp (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, March 24, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — Federal prosecutors completed their case Thursday in the sentencing trial of Zacarias Moussaoui with a former FBI agent who said that if Moussaoui had cooperated after his arrest in August 2001, 11 of the 19 hijackers could have been located fairly quickly and stopped before the terror attacks of Sept. 11.

The testimony set the stage for the French terrorist to take the witness stand in his own defense next week.

"I will testify!" Moussaoui shouted to his lawyers after the government presented its last witness. "Whether you want it or not, I will testify!"

His four court-appointed lawyers have urged him not to take the stand, fearing his volatile temper and oft-expressed hatred for Americans will only encourage the jury to sentence him to death.

The government's final witness was Aaron Zebley, one of the FBI's two chief case agents on the Moussaoui investigation, who now works as an assistant U.S. attorney.

He identified a series of phone calls, Western Union money transfers and other evidence linking Moussaoui to Al Qaeda handlers in Germany and the United Arab Emirates. Those same handlers coordinated the movements of the 19 Sept. 11 hijackers in the U.S.

Zebley said that if Moussaoui had told the FBI about these money transfers, agents could have identified 11 of the hijackers and stopped them before they reached the airports in Boston, Washington and Newark, N.J., on the morning of Sept. 11.

"We could have set about finding them, obviously," Zebley said. "We could have shared this information with our law enforcement partners on the federal, state and local levels. We could have shared this with our intelligence partners too, and the Secret Service."

Moussaoui pleaded guilty in April to having a role in the Sept. 11 conspiracy. He said he was handpicked by Al Qaeda front man Osama bin Laden to come to the U.S., take pilot lessons and eventually fly a jet into the White House.

On Sept. 11, three planes struck the two World Trade Center towers in New York and the Pentagon in Washington. A fourth plane, which went down in a western Pennsylvania field after passengers tried to reclaim the jetliner, is believed to have been headed toward either the White House or the U.S. Capitol.

Zebley also testified that had Moussaoui allowed the FBI to inspect his belongings, agents would have found lists of flight schools, including the jet simulator school he was attending in Eagan, Minn., and other pilot training facilities in south Florida where some of the hijackers learned to fly.

"We could have got to those flight schools and looked for people like the defendant," Zebley said. "Somebody rushing through flight school and onto jet simulators. Someone with a Middle Eastern name. We'd be looking for people who look like the defendant."

But under cross-examination, Zebley admitted that there were key elements of the Sept. 11 plot that appeared completely unknown to Moussaoui.

None of Moussaoui's possessions carried the names of any of the hijackers. All of the flight tickets purchased by the hijackers were bought after Moussaoui was arrested, indicating he did not know the date for the attacks. And there also was no proof that Moussaoui knew which buildings and structures were being targeted.

Zebley conceded that FBI does not believe Moussaoui was supposed to have been aboard one of the planes. "There never was a 20th hijacker," Zebley said. But he added, "the plot was to get as many conspirators in the U.S. as possible."

Zebley concluded a troubled prosecution case in which several other FBI witnesses conceded that the bureau had ignored repeated warnings about a looming terrorist attack. And the government's case was hurt when a federal lawyer improperly coached several prospective witnesses familiar with aviation security.

The lawyer, Carla Martin of the Transportation Security Administration, has been subpoenaed to appear Monday before U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema to explain her conduct. The judge barred the "tainted" witnesses from testifying.

The defense began its case late Thursday by calling Eric Rigler, a former FBI special agent who now runs a criminal justice consulting firm in Texas. Rigler led the jury through the FBI's many "missed opportunities" to detect the plot, as laid out in a report by the Justice Department's inspector general.

The defense is trying to show that even if Moussaoui had cooperated with the FBI, its agents made so many mistakes in the weeks before Sept. 11 that it would be unfair to blame the massive loss of life on the defendant, who was in jail when the attacks occurred.

Moussaoui Shouts His Intention To Take The Stand (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Timothy Dwyer

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Prosecutors concluded their argument yesterday that Zacarias Moussaoui is eligible for the death penalty, and the al-Qaeda operative made it clear in his typically theatrical style that he intends to take the stand.

"I will testify, whether you want it or not!" Moussaoui yelled as he was escorted from the courtroom by federal marshals. "I will testify!"

It was unclear whether he was addressing his attorneys, with whom he does not speak and who have been against his taking the stand. But what was clear was that the case against the only person convicted in the United States on charges stemming from the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks could take yet another dramatic turn. Moussaoui is known for his courtroom outbursts, and even his attorneys don't know what he will say. Sources familiar with the case said Moussaoui is expected to testify, but he has been told he must adhere to courtroom decorum.

The courtroom theatrics came as Moussaoui's lawyers subpoenaed a government lawyer whose misconduct nearly derailed the death penalty trial, sources familiar with the case said yesterday. Carla J. Martin has been told to show up at U.S. District Court in Alexandria on Monday, the sources said.

Martin would risk being found in contempt of court if she ignored the order, but once there she could invoke her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination and refuse to testify. She declined to testify at a hearing last week. Her attorney, Roscoe C. Howard Jr., did not return repeated telephone calls. Defense attorneys would not comment, but legal experts said that it is unlikely they could persuade U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema to allow the jury to hear about what she has called "egregious" conduct by Martin.

The actions of Martin, a Transportation Security Administration lawyer, halted the case last week after she violated a court order by sharing testimony and contacting witnesses. Brinkema initially reacted by barring all aviation witnesses and testimony, an action that severely damaged the prosecution's case. Testimony resumed Monday after Brinkema allowed testimony from aviation witnesses untainted by contact with Martin.

Moussaoui, 37, pleaded guilty last year to conspiring with al-Qaeda in the attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon. His sentencing hearing is divided into two parts. Jurors first must vote on whether Moussaoui is eligible for the death penalty. If they find he is, a second phase would include testimony from family members of Sept. 11 victims. Jurors then would determine whether Moussaoui should be executed.

Prosecutors yesterday concluded their argument that Moussaoui is eligible for the death penalty because, even though he was in jail on Sept. 11, his lies to the FBI prevented agents from stopping the attacks.

The trial has been cloaked in secrecy at times because of extensive classified information, and yesterday was no different. Defense lawyers typically ask the judge to throw out a case when the prosecution completes its evidence, and Moussaoui's lawyers had prepared such a motion. It was not made in open court, however, and when prosecutors rested their case yesterday, Brinkema convened a sealed hearing in a separate courtroom.

Immediately after the hearing ended, the defense began its case. Sources said later that Brinkema had rejected a defense motion that the case not be allowed to go to the jury.

The two sides yesterday waged a battle of dueling PowerPoint presentations through testimony from two former FBI agents. The final prosecution witness, Aaron Zebley, portrayed the government as a precise investigative machine that immediately would have reacted to the knowledge that Moussaoui was a terrorist operative plotting an attack. Moussaoui was arrested in Minnesota in August 2001, and prosecutors say he lied to the FBI about his plan to fly a plane into the White House.

"Could you have done this in August of 2001?" Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert A. Spencer kept asking Zebley, as Zebley tried to demonstrate how a single cellphone number on a Western Union wire transfer to Moussaoui could have led to phone, bank and other records -- which would have enabled investigators to track down at least 11 of the 19 hijackers.

Zebley, who left the FBI last year to become an assistant U.S. attorney, each time answered, "Yes."

The first defense witness, retired FBI agent Eric Rigler, walked jurors through a Justice Department inspector general's report from 2004 that criticized the government for failing to detect two hijackers who entered the United States in 2000. Khalid al-Mihdhar and Nawaf al-Hazmi at one point lived with an FBI informant in San Diego. The inspector general found that the CIA had known the two were in the country and were al-Qaeda operatives but delayed telling the FBI for more than a year.

Prosecution Of Moussaoui Finishes Up (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va., March 23 — Prosecutors on Thursday finished presenting their case that Zacarias Moussaoui should be executed for the deaths that occurred on Sept. 11, 2001, offering evidence linking him to the paymaster of Al Qaeda who provided money to most of the 19 hijackers who died in the plot.

The trial, which will resume on Monday, offers the possibility of three dramatic moments in short order. First, the court may hear from Carla J. Martin, the Transportation Security Administration lawyer whose improper coaching of witnesses nearly derailed the trial.

Then, as Mr. Moussaoui's lawyers pick up the arguments they began Thursday afternoon, the jury is expected to have the extraordinary experience of hearing testimony gathered in the United States' secret overseas detention system.

Defense lawyers plan to have people recite the testimony of some of the most valuable captives, including Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, and Ramzi bin al-Shibh, the operation's paymaster, who are imprisoned under American supervision. There also might be testimony read from Mohammed Al-Qahtani, a prisoner at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, who is believed by many to have been the missing "20th hijacker."

Sometime after the attacks, senior Justice Department officials identified Mr. Moussaoui, a 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan heritage, as the 20th hijacker, surmising that he was to have been aboard the plane that crashed in Pennsylvania with four hijackers aboard. The other three planes each had five hijackers.

Government officials have since dropped that assertion, and prosecutors have argued that Mr. Moussaoui should be executed because he hid what he knew about plots to fly airplanes into buildings when he was arrested, before the attacks, on immigration charges in Minnesota, where he was learning to fly jetliners.

The third dramatic event is the testimony of Mr. Moussaoui himself sometime next week. Judge Leonie M. Brinkema first granted permission for him to represent himself but revoked it after he would not heed her instructions and had outbursts.

Now Mr. Moussaoui does not speak to his lawyers and has reviled them in comments to the court.

Mr. Moussaoui, who has sat quietly through the last two weeks of the trial, usually leaves the courtroom with some shouted slogan praising Osama bin Laden or cursing the United States. On Thursday, he offered a new statement, saying, "I will testify whether you want it or not."

The arrangement to get testimony from the high-level detainees who are Qaeda members came after intense negotiations among the defense, the government and the court.

Prosecutors ended their presentation with the testimony of a former F.B.I. agent, Aaron Zebley. Mr. Zebley, now a federal prosecutor, linked Mr. Moussaoui to the hijackers by way of Mr. bin al-Shibh and money he sent from Germany. He acknowledged in cross-examination by Edward B. MacMahon Jr., a lawyer for Mr. Moussaoui, that there was no evidence that Mr. Moussaoui had telephoned or met with any of the hijackers.

Ex-FBI Agent Says Moussaoui Deception Prevented Probe (VOA)

By Jim Malone

Voice of America, March 24, 2006

Zacarias Moussaoui, foreground, listening to his defense lawyer Edward MacMahon question FBI special agent Harry SamitA former FBI agent testified Thursday that investigators may have been able track down some of the September 11 hijackers if Zacarias Moussaoui had confessed his role with al-Qaida before the 2001 attacks. Moussaoui is the convicted al-Qaida terrorist now on trial for his life in a federal court in Alexandria, Virginia, just outside Washington.

Former FBI agent Aaron Zebley testified that had Moussaoui confessed his links with al-Qaida before the 9/11 attacks, the authorities might have been able to trace money transfers and telephone calls to al-Qaida financiers who were in touch with some of those who hijacked airliners on September 11.

Zebley said it was possible that the FBI could have traced a $14,000 wire transfer to Moussaoui that came from Germany, which might have led to financial backers also in contact with at least five of the 19 hijackers.

Prosecutors argue that Moussaoui should be put to death because he withheld information from investigators after his arrest in Minnesota three weeks before the 9/11 attacks.

Defense lawyers contend the FBI and other U.S. government agencies would not have been able to do much to prevent the attacks even if Moussaoui had admitted earlier that he was an al-Qaida operative.

Earlier this week, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the government has learned a lot of lessons from the 9/11 attacks, including how to respond more quickly to threat information gathered by agents in the field.

"I am not going to comment on anything related to the trial," Gonzales says. "What I will say is that we obviously are more sensitive today about threats to the United States and we believe that we have better procedures, better infrastructure to share information."

Moussaoui pleaded guilty last year to terror and conspiracy charges. He said he was not part of the 9/11 conspiracy but was planning to be part of a second wave of attacks using planes that were to go after other high-profile targets, including the White House.

The jury in the case has two choices. Either sentence Moussaoui to death or send him to prison for life. E-mail This Article

Terror Trials And Poor PR (WT)

By Eric Leskly

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

The charades in Alexandria and Baghdad last week are final confirmation that the Bush administration has grievously erred in trying the Zacarias Moussaoui and Saddam Hussein cases in civilian courts instead of military tribunals. By attempting to use the trials as public-relations tools to demonstrate fair judicial process, the administration has disregarded the fact the clear and present danger posed by al Qaeda and the Iraqi insurgency require harsher procedures and penalties than those afforded by traditional criminal prosecution. Furthermore, both defendants have repeatedly rejected the validity of our judicial process, and use the trials instead to preach to their followers and sympathizers. Thus, instead of enhancing American national security, these botched cases may have even strengthened our enemies.

Does the United States owe due process of civilian law to Moussaoui or Saddam? The answer is clearly and emphatically no. In wartime, a government is not obliged to provide enemy combatants the privileges and protections associated with a civilian criminal trial.

It was a mistake to assume that our commitment to due process -- and our desire to showcase this to the world -- would substitute for the unflinching and uncompromising fortitude necessary to mete justice in these extraordinary situations. While civilian criminal procedure presumes innocence until proven guilty, it also presupposes the defendant's acceptance of the inherent power of the court. As Hobbes observed in Leviathan: "Before the names of Just and Unjust can have place, there must be some coercive power." In current circumstances, that is exactly the logic behind a military tribunal.

There is clear justification for trying Moussaoui and Saddam through military commission. The United States is at war with both al Qaeda and the insurgency in Iraq, a remnant of Saddam's regime. Both defendants were captured in the course of the war and violated the laws of armed conflict: Moussaoui, who is not a US citizen, conspired in the attacks on US civilians; Hussein tortured and used chemical weapons against his own people.

The ineptitude evidenced by the Moussaoui sentencing demonstrates why the judicial system is not equipped to handle terrorists. The current focus on TSA attorney Carla Martin, who in her stupidity violated Judge Leonie Brinkema's order and shared transcripts with key federal witnesses, should not detract from the main issue of whether Moussaoui deserves the death penalty for his confessed role in the September 11 attacks.

In fact, the system had failed much earlier in this trial. Since its outset, Moussaoui repeatedly stated his contempt for the court and said that he was using the trial as means to preach al Qaeda's platform through the media. As early as 2003, Moussaoui made the incredulous demand to call captive al-Qaeda members as witnesses, including September 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed.

We can be thankful only that these events took place after Moussaoui had already confessed: a mistrial would have been almost certain if Miss Martin's behavior occurred during the actual trial. Some legal analysts have already begun to consider the frightening possibility that the government's incompetence could lead to a full acquittal, and that Moussaoui could yet go free.

The farce that has become Saddam's trial is even more disturbing because of its harmful effect on U.S. national security. By empowered the insurgency, the trial has increased the risk to U.S. troops and compromised our mission in Iraq. The court has inadvertedly given Saddam a bully pulpit; the man who was once a captured by U.S. forces at gunpoint in a foxhole now boasts that he is still the president of Iraq and openly praises the insurgency. "Unite and resist the invaders and their backers," he addressed the insurgents last week. "In my eyes, you are the resistance to the American invasion." It is all too clear that Saddam does not see himself as defeated.

Unlike the Nazis at Nuremberg, who had suffered complete and total defeat at the hands of the Allies, Saddam actually believes that he is the legitimate ruler of Iraq who could return to power if the U.S. were to leave. Doubts about the U.S. commitment to Iraq only strengthen this defiance. If he thinks the U.S. might leave Iraq behind with his case before the still incompetent Iraqi judicial system, why should he not continue delaying his trial with these outbursts?

In order to fulfill its vow to bring justice to our enemies, the administration needs to regain the offensive in prosecuting captives in the war on terror and stop trying to use these cases as tools to enhance American image abroad. The Battle Hymn of the Republic alludes to justice as a "terrible swift sword." Our public relations will be better served through this metaphor than by the failed attempts to treat terrorists or despots "fairly." In dealing with our cruelest of adversaries, military justice may be the only sensible course.

Moussaoui Trial Difficult For Victims' Kin (AP)

By Will Lester, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 24, 2006

(AP) - ALEXANDRIA, Va.-The U.S. government's failure to act on repeated warnings before the Sept. 11 terrorist attack had Geraldine Davie fighting back tears as she talked about her 22-year-old daughter's death in the collapse of the World Trade Center.

"They all let us down," Davie said Wednesday evening, voicing a sentiment shared by many of the victims' family members who are monitoring the sentencing trial of admitted al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui.

Davie and other family members of Sept. 11 victims heard the FBI agent who arrested Moussaoui testify early this week that his bosses in Washington failed to heed his warnings that he said would have given the government "a serious opportunity to stop the 9/11 attacks."

Victims' family members also had to watch the federal judge consider scuttling the prosecution's bid for the death penalty after learning last week that a government lawyer improperly coached witnesses. Some prosecution witnesses gave testimony about government missteps that the defense turned to its advantage.

"Certainly, the case now is not as strong as it could be," said Bill McGinly, of Vienna, Va., who lost a son in the attack on the World Trade Center. McGinly wants to see Moussaoui get the death penalty.

"I would be much more comfortable to see him off the face of the earth," said McGinly, who held out hope that federal prosecutors would get their case back on track. "It's not over 'til it's over."

The court proceedings have been painful for victims' family members like Davie, whose daughter, Amy O'Doherty, was working at an investment firm at the World Trade Center in New York Cit; McGinly, whose son Mark worked at the trade center; and Eleni Kousoulis, whose sister Danielle worked at the same investment firm as O'Doherty.

"The government knew a lot, if they had just paid more attention," said Kousoulis of Merion, Pa. Even if government investigators couldn't prevent the attacks altogether, she said, they might have saved some lives.

As for Moussaoui, Kousoulis said she doesn't care if he gets the death penalty or life in prison. "I think him rotting in jail is worse," she said.

Family members like Kousoulis and Davie were less bothered by the prosecution's recent troubles than the government's missteps revealed in testimony this week that, if handled differently, might have saved their loved ones.

What is valuable, Davie said, is "to know the history of the events in detail without political overlays."

"There are facts being presented here without the bluster of politicians getting in the way," she said. "This is what we've needed from the beginning. This is important."

Mystery Document In Wiretap Suit Sent To Seattle For Safekeeping (AP)

By TIM FOUGHT, The Associated Press

AP, March 23, 2006

PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) — A secret document in an Oregon lawsuit challenging President Bush's domestic wiretapping program will be held in a secure facility in Seattle while the judge and lawyers try to figure out how to keep it under wraps in Portland.

U.S. District Judge Garr King decided this week that the document couldn't be held securely in a federal courthouse in Portland, and shouldn't be held at the local office of the FBI, a defendant in the case.

In a telephone conference that offered few clues about the document, King said it would go to a secure facility at the U.S. attorney's office in Seattle, but he hoped it eventually could be edited and held in Oregon as the suit progresses.

A government lawyer said, however, the document would be so black with redactions that it couldn't be understood.

A transcript of the telephone conference was made available to The Associated Press by Steven Goldberg, a civil rights attorney who filed the lawsuit last February.

The lawsuit alleges that the National Security Agency illegally wiretapped electronic communications between a local chapter of the Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation and Wendell Belew and Asim Ghafoor, both attorneys in Washington, D.C.

It contends the NSA did not follow procedures required by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, and failed to obtain a court order authorizing electronic surveillance of the charity and its attorneys. Lawyers for the plaintiffs have said they can't spell out the facts that support their suit because those details are classified.

The conference over the document arose because the FBI office is the only place in Portland that has a facility that meets specifications for what the government calls "sensitive compartmented information," according to the telephone conference transcript.

Such secure rooms, called SCIFs, often are used in trials dealing with classified information. They are overseen by court security officers who monitor lawyers reviewing documents. Lawyers generally aren't allowed to copy anything or take notes out.

Goldberg said it would be inappropriate for the FBI to have custody because "we're dealing with a document that may involve criminal behavior by that defendant."

Anthony Coppolino of the U.S. Justice Department said the document wouldn't be altered if the FBI had it and said King could have it in a closed envelope, perhaps signing the seal to guard against unauthorized opening.

The judge, however, said the FBI wouldn't be a suitable custodian.

"I'm not indicating there would be any problem with them, but they are a defendant so I don't think it's appropriate that they have custody of it," King said.

But the judge also decided against the idea of constructing a special secure facility for the case after Coppolino said "these facilities cost thousands, if not millions, and take months and months to create."

King expressed hope that he and others could consult with security experts and "the originator" of the document "to see if something less secure would be satisfactory."

Coppolino told King that editing the document wouldn't be possible "without redactions of the document to the point where the content wouldn't be — would not be understandable."

In a separate development, The Oregonian newspaper reported Thursday that it had filed suit last week seeking documents in the case.

"If the government is committing crimes against its citizens, the public is entitled to know the nature of the crimes," said the newspaper's attorney, Charles Hinkle.

Government Won't Have To Say Whether Secret Wiretaps Used (AP)

By CAROLYN THOMPSON, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 23, 2006

BUFFALO, N.Y. -- The government doesn't have to tell three men accused of illegally sending $3.5 million to Yemen whether secret wiretaps were used to investigate them, a judge ruled.

Lawyers for Mohamed Albanna, Ali Elbaneh and Ali Albanna requested the information as they defend the men against charges of running an unlicensed business that delivered money from Yemeni-Americans in western New York to relatives overseas.

The defendants already know that investigators used at least six court-approved wiretaps to monitor their telephones, fax machines and cellular phones in 2002 and 2003. But attorneys sought information on whether investigators also eavesdropped on phone and e-mail conversations without a judge's permission following recent disclosures that President Bush allowed such searches in attempts to sniff out terrorist plots.

The Lackawanna men were charged in December 2002 following an investigation by the Joint Terrorism Task Force. None has been accused of having any involvement in terrorism.

U.S. District Judge William Skretny, in an order dated Tuesday, denied the defense request for information without explanation. In his one-page decision, Skretny said he had reviewed the government's classified response to the January request in private.

Defense attorneys did not immediately return calls seeking comment Thursday.

In court documents, a Justice Department official said the Lackawanna men were among "a number of federal criminal defendants in cases across the country (who) have formally requested information concerning the terrorist surveillance program recently described by the President."

The department has lawyers working on the requests on a daily basis, an affidavit said.

The Albannas and Elbaneh were charged on the heels of the arrests of the Lackawanna Six, a group of Yemeni-American men convicted of attending an al-Qaida training camp in Afghanistan in the spring of 2001, and as authorities sought to trace financing of the group's travels.

Albanna, who runs a candy and cigarette wholesale business and is a leader in the American-Muslim community, previously has defended the young men, who are now serving prison sentences ranging from seven to 10 years.

Federal law enacted after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks requires money transmitting businesses like the one allegedly run by Albanna to register with the U.S. Treasury Department and to be licensed by the state in which they do business.

Government Expert In Lodi Terror Case Describes Pakistani Camps (AP)

By Don Thompson

AP, March 24, 2006

SACRAMENTO - A former Pakistani police chief on Thursday described a terrorist-training camp in Pakistan in an account similar to that given by a Lodi man who is standing trial on federal terrorism charges.

Hassan Abbas, now an author and lecturer living in Massachusetts, told jurors about a camp in a mountainous region of Pakistan once operated by Jaish-e-Mohammed, an extremist political party that has been banned.

The camp was in a region near Balakot, a town also mentioned by defendant Hamid Hayat during a lengthy interrogation by FBI agents last June, Abbas said. Hayat, 23, is accused of training at an al-Qaida camp in Pakistan in 2003 and returning to his home in the Central Valley town of Lodi to plot attacks inside the U.S.

His father, Umer Hayat, a 48-year-old ice cream vendor, is accused of knowing his son attended the camp and lying about it. They are being tried at the same time but before separate juries.

Prosecutors have no hard evidence that Hamid Hayat actually attended such a camp. By putting Abbas on the stand, they sought to give jurors details about the kinds of training camps they claim Hamid Hayat attended.

When the trial resumes next week, prosecutors are expected to introduce satellite photos they claim show a terror training camp in Pakistan.

Abbas, who was paid about $35,000 for his research and testimony, worked as a police chief and police administrator in Pakistan from 1996-2001 and has been on the stand since Wednesday, testifying about Pakistani culture, religion and politics.

He said the extremist group trained a large number of people for jihad, or holy war, primarily for the conflict with India over the Kashmir region.

While the Pakistani government says it cracked down on such training camps after the 2001 terror attacks in the U.S., Abbas said "dozens and dozens" of them operated between 2000 and 2005.

They were run by various political and religious organizations that attracted Muslims from around the world, Abbas told jurors. Most trained hundreds of people at a time, sequestering them for weeks and drilling them on the use of weapons, he said.

That conflicts with some of the Hayats' own statements to the FBI, which were captured on videotape. Umer Hayat, for example, said he saw a thousand terrorists training in a huge underground room, and Hamid Hayat said he frequently visited a nearby town after a day of training.

Defense attorneys claim Hamid Hayat intended only to attend a Muslim religious school during his roughly two years in Pakistan.

Abbas said between 5 percent and 15 percent of Pakistan's more than 20,000 religious schools, or madrassahs, serve as recruiting grounds for jihadi training camps.

The Hayats were arrested last June, shortly after Hamid Hayat returned from Pakistan, and have pleaded not guilty.

Hamid Hayat faces up to 39 years in prison if he is convicted of three counts of lying to the FBI and separate charges of providing material support to terrorists. His father faces up to 16 years in prison if convicted of two counts of making false statements to the FBI.

Hayat Defense Accuses Witness Was "Cued" By Prosecutors (KXTV-TV)

KXTV-TV, March 24, 2006

An expert on Pakistani society was accused of being coached by federal prosecutors Thursday during testimony in the trial of two Lodi men accused of lying to federal investigators about ties to terrorism.

During defense questioning of expert witness Hassan Abbas, attorneys for Umer and Hamid Hayat argued that the wording of prosecution objections to defense questions were actually signals to Abbas about how to answer the question. Abbas is an author and Fellow at the Kennedy School of Government in Boston, Massachusetts.

Defense attorney Wazhma Mojaddidi suggested that Abbas had worked out a system with prosecutors that if they objected to a line of defense questioning using the terms "ambiguous" or "vague," that it was actually a signal for how Abbas should answer. Judge Garland Burrell immediately demanded attorneys approach the bench but after discussion, let the line of questioning continue.

Abbas testified that the defense raised the objection over personal notes he had made for himself over proper court conduct, including what to do if he didn't understand a question or needed a question rephrased or repeated. Abbas said prosecutors did offer advice on how to respond to defense questions, although they only advised him to be brief and objective.

Umer Hayat's jury was dismissed after Abbas' testimony, but jurors for Hamid Hayat remained to hear further questioning of chief prosecution witness and FBI informant Nassem Khan. Mojaddidi questioned Khan about his relationship with his FBI handlers, including the dates of his first meetings with the FBI, and when he was first paid for his work as an informant.

Hamid Hayat, 23, is charged with lying to federal investigators about undergoing terrorist training in Pakistan. His father, Umer Hayat, 48, is also charged with lying to FBI agents about his son's training.

The Hayats, both U.S. citizens, have pleaded not guilty.

U.S. May Be Holding Pakistani Journalist (LAT)

By Zulfiqar Ali And Mubashir Zaidi

The Los Angeles Times, March 24, 2006

PESHAWAR, Pakistan — The family of a Pakistani journalist kidnapped in December said Thursday that they believe he could be in U.S. custody.

Hayatullah Khan was abducted at gunpoint in the volatile North Waziristan tribal region Dec. 5 by armed, masked men whom a witness at the time described as dressed like fighters from the ousted Taliban regime of Afghanistan. But Ihsanullah Khan, the victim's brother, said that senior officials from Pakistan's intelligence agencies had told the family that Hayatullah was now beyond their jurisdiction.

"We were told a few days ago that Mr. Khan was no longer in their possession. He might be somewhere in Pakistan or the United States being grilled for his possible links with Al Qaeda," Ihsanullah Khan said, citing information passed to him by unnamed intelligence officials.

"Earlier these [officials] told us that Hayatullah was fine and we should not worry about him. But now they say that Hayatullah might be in U.S. officials' custody," he said.

In Washington, a Pentagon spokesman said the report could not be confirmed.

Hayatullah Khan came to wide public attention when he reported allegations that a suspected Al Qaeda operative and four other people in the town of Asoray, including a 7-year-old boy, had been killed by a U.S. missile attack — not an accidental munitions explosion, as Pakistani officials had asserted.

Khan quoted local tribesmen as saying that the mud-brick compound where Egyptian Abu Hamza Rabia died Dec. 1 had been hit by an air-launched missile. He photographed metal fragments at the compound that appeared to bear markings identifying them as remnants of a U.S. laser-guided Hellfire missile. He was working for the European Pressphoto Agency and two Pakistani newspapers when he was kidnapped in the town of Mir Ali, which, like Asoray, is near the Afghan border.

Pakistani officials insisted that the compound had not been attacked. American counterterrorism operations in Pakistan are a matter of great sensitivity for the government of President Pervez Musharraf, whom some accuse of being too accommodating of U.S. interests.

Authorities say that Khan's abduction was not related to any news report but rather sprang from a personal matter. His family said they have had no contact from his kidnappers.

They also deny that Khan had any connection to Al Qaeda or the Taliban.

Ihsanullah Khan said intelligence officials told him his brother "was being grilled by the U.S. to confirm the death of Hamza Rabia in the missile attack."

Meanwhile, the Pakistani government Thursday lodged a protest with Afghanistan over the killings of 17 Pakistani men near the border town of Spin Buldak, in Afghanistan's Kandahar province, on Wednesday. Afghan authorities described the men as Taliban rebels.

Pakistani Foreign Office spokeswoman Tasneem Aslam said that the Afghan ambassador in Islamabad was summoned to hear an official protest over the incident. "We have asked Afghan authorities to investigate the matter and tell us how these innocent Pakistani civilians were killed by Afghan forces," she said.

Pakistan's interior minister, Aftab Sherpao, said that the 17 Pakistani tribesmen "went to Afghanistan to take part in Nowruz, a religious festival of the Shiites, but were killed by Afghan forces in a fake encounter and were labeled as Taliban."

The bodies were brought back to Chaman and Quetta in Pakistan and buried Thursday.

The incident has further fueled tensions between the neighboring countries following weeks of back-and-forth accusations of border infiltrations.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai last month handed over a list of Taliban leaders who Afghan authorities believed were in Pakistan.

PATRIOT ACT:

Bush Shuns Patriot Act Requirement (BOS)

By Charlie Savage

The Boston Globe, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON -- When President Bush signed the reauthorization of the USA Patriot Act this month, he included an addendum saying that he did not feel obliged to obey requirements that he inform Congress about how the FBI was using the act's expanded police powers.

The bill contained several oversight provisions intended to make sure the FBI did not abuse the special terrorism-related powers to search homes and secretly seize papers. The provisions require Justice Department officials to keep closer track of how often the FBI uses the new powers and in what type of situations. Under the law, the administration would have to provide the information to Congress by certain dates.

Bush signed the bill with fanfare at a White House ceremony March 9, calling it "a piece of legislation that's vital to win the war on terror and to protect the American people." But after the reporters and guests had left, the White House quietly issued a "signing statement," an official document in which a president lays out his interpretation of a new law.

In the statement, Bush said that he did not consider himself bound to tell Congress how the Patriot Act powers were being used and that, despite the law's requirements, he could withhold the information if he decided that disclosure would "impair foreign relations, national security, the deliberative process of the executive, or the performance of the executive's constitutional duties."

Bush wrote: "The executive branch shall construe the provisions . . . that call for furnishing information to entities outside the executive branch . . . in a manner consistent with the president's constitutional authority to supervise the unitary executive branch and to withhold information . . . "

The statement represented the latest in a string of high-profile instances in which Bush has cited his constitutional authority to bypass a law.

After The New York Times disclosed in December that Bush had authorized the military to conduct electronic surveillance of Americans' international phone calls and e-mails without obtaining warrants, as required by law, Bush said his wartime powers gave him the right to ignore the warrant law.

And when Congress passed a law forbidding the torture of any detainee in US custody, Bush signed the bill but issued a signing statement declaring that he could bypass the law if he believed using harsh interrogation techniques was necessary to protect national security.

Past presidents occasionally used such signing statements to describe their interpretations of laws, but Bush has expanded the practice. He has also been more assertive in claiming the authority to override provisions he thinks intrude on his power, legal scholars said.

Bush's expansive claims of the power to bypass laws have provoked increased grumbling in Congress. Members of both parties have pointed out that the Constitution gives the legislative branch the power to write the laws and the executive branch the duty to "faithfully execute" them.

Several senators have proposed bills to bring the warrantless surveillance program under the law. One Democrat, Senator Russell Feingold of Wisconsin, has gone so far as to propose censuring Bush, saying he has broken the wiretapping law.

Bush's signing statement on the USA Patriot Act nearly went unnoticed.

Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, inserted a statement into the record of the Senate Judiciary Committee objecting to Bush's interpretation of the Patriot Act, but neither the signing statement nor Leahy's objection received coverage from in the mainstream news media, Leahy's office said.

Yesterday, Leahy said Bush's assertion that he could ignore the new provisions of the Patriot Act -- provisions that were the subject of intense negotiations in Congress -- represented "nothing short of a radical effort to manipulate the constitutional separation of powers and evade accountability and responsibility for following the law."

"The president's signing statements are not the law, and Congress should not allow them to be the last word," Leahy said in a prepared statement. "The president's constitutional duty is to faithfully execute the laws as written by the Congress, not cherry-pick the laws he decides he wants to follow. It is our duty to ensure, by means of congressional oversight, that he does so."

The White House dismissed Leahy's concerns, saying Bush's signing statement was simply "very standard language" that is "used consistently with provisions like these where legislation is requiring reports from the executive branch or where disclosure of information is going to be required."

"The signing statement makes clear that the president will faithfully execute the law in a manner that is consistent with the Constitution," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino. "The president has welcomed at least seven Inspector General reports on the Patriot Act since it was first passed, and there has not been one verified abuse of civil liberties using the Patriot Act."

David Golove, a New York University law professor who specializes in executive power issues, said the statement may simply be "bluster" and does not necessarily mean that the administration will conceal information about its use of the Patriot Act.

But, he said, the statement illustrates the administration's "mind-bogglingly expansive conception" of executive power, and its low regard for legislative power.

"On the one hand, they deny that Congress even has the authority to pass laws on these subjects like torture and eavesdropping, and in addition to that, they say that Congress is not even entitled to get information about anything to do with the war on terrorism," Golove said.

FBI Confirms Patriot Act's Use In Corruption Probe (LVRJ)

By ADRIENNE PACKER, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, March 23, 2006

Federal authorities confirmed in court Wednesday that they used the Patriot Act to access bank records while investigating alleged political corruption involving former Clark County commissioners and strip club owner Michael Galardi.

The Patriot Act, enacted after Sept. 11, 2001, as a tool to fight terrorism, included provisions that allowed authorities to access personal financial records more easily.

During the federal trial against former county Commissioners Mary Kincaid-Chauncey and Dario Herrera, defense attorneys revealed Wednesday that FBI agents had used the Patriot Act to track financial transactions executed by individuals involved in the case.

"The Patriot Act made it easier for you to identify the bank accounts," attorney Jerry Bernstein said during cross-examination of former FBI agent Joe Dickey.

Dickey said the government would have had to subpoena some 10,000 financial institutions nationwide had it not relied on the law.

One portion of the law directed the U.S. Treasury Department to streamline for law enforcement access to financial records. Law enforcement can send a suspect's name to the department and receive back a list of each financial institution that does business with the individual.

"It simply helped us identify where banks were. It didn't give us information," Dickey said of the Patriot Act provision.

That was just one tool federal agents used as they pieced together their case against Kincaid-Chauncey, Herrera, Galardi and former Commissioners Lance Malone and Erin Kenny.

DOJ_NMG_0020609

After Malone lost a bid for re-election in 2000, Galardi hired him as a lobbyist. Soon, authorities allege, Malone began to deliver cash bribes from Galardi to Herrera, Kincaid-Chauncey and Kenny. In exchange for the money, the three commissioners worked on Galardi's behalf, authorities say.

Kenny and Galardi pleaded guilty to the bribery charges and are government witnesses.

For more than a year, FBI agents took turns sitting in a computer room monitoring intercepted conversations from Malone's and Galardi's phones, which were bugged in June 2001.

The wiretaps and surveillance stakeouts led to a May 2003 federal indictment.

On Wednesday, FBI agents played for jurors nearly 70 intercepted phone calls and two surveillance tapes. The calls focused on a period in 2001 when Malone, Galardi and Kenny frantically worked to push through several issues that county administrators were considering or that were scheduled to go before commissioners.

During several conversations, Malone and Herrera suggested they "hook up." Prosecutors claim the phrase is code for meeting to deliver or accept cash from Galardi. But defense attorneys say it's merely slang for getting together.

The conversations indicated that Malone and Galardi had a tight relationship with Kenny, who consistently acted behind the scenes and during meetings to promote votes that benefited Galardi's two businesses under county jurisdiction, Leopard Lounge and Jaguars.

At one point, Kenny took a call from Malone despite being occupied.

"I'm in the bathroom, to tell you the truth," she said. "Wait a minute, hold it, I had to flush."

During the summer of 2001, Galardi grew increasingly impatient with interim County Building Department Director Ron Lynn. Lynn was slow in responding to a "red tag" that had been placed on Galardi's Jaguars club. The tag meant that the building did not meet county codes and that construction had been stopped.

Malone told Galardi that both Herrera and Kincaid-Chauncey had agreed to help expedite permits for Jaguars. Neither commissioner called Lynn, according to the tapes played.

But in August 2001, Herrera called Malone and asked if they could "hook up." Galardi voiced his displeasure with Herrera because the commissioner had not been active in pushing forward matters important to Galardi.

"He's got some balls, huh ... he's done nothing for us," Galardi told Malone during an Aug. 10, 2001, phone call. "If he did something for us, I wouldn't mind. But he doesn't do shit."

Frustrated by Lynn, Kenny, Malone and Galardi tried to torpedo his bid to become permanent director of the Building Department. Malone and Kenny tried to get Herrera to vote against Lynn's promotion. Commissioner Myrna Williams and Kincaid-Chauncey were already on board, according to Kenny.

"If he (Herrera) tells Mike he's gonna do it, he can't not," Kenny told Malone. "He needs to be told he can't support Ron."

Malone also met with Kincaid-Chauncey that month. FBI agents videotaped them leaving an Applebee's restaurant. The two sat in Kincaid-Chauncey's car for four minutes. During that time, she used Malone's phone to call Galardi and left this message: "Thanks for all your help. I really appreciate it."

Although prosecutors suggested that Kincaid-Chauncey had accepted money from Malone in the car, her attorney, Richard Wright, noted that there was no recording or personal observation of what had happened inside the car.

"We could speculate all day as to what they talked about," Wright said.

In 2001, Galardi was struggling to obtain a liquor license for Jaguars.

Las Vegas police Capt. Daniel Patrick Barry had expressed concerns about Galardi's suitability to hold a privileged license because of past brushes with law enforcement and the fact that strippers at his clubs had been cited for soliciting prostitution.

FBI Agent Christopher Byers testified Wednesday that Barry was directed by the federal government to appear at commission meetings to appeal a Galardi license.

"In essence, it's a technique to spur conversations on the wire," Byers said, referring to the phone calls that federal agents were intercepting.

Meanwhile, Malone worked to gain Herrera's support for Galardi's liquor license.

"I'd like to hook up with you today or early tomorrow," Malone told Herrera on Aug. 28, 2001. Herrera agreed to meet Galardi and Malone at P.F. Chang's China Bistro that night, on the eve of the vote.

After their dinner, Malone called Kenny to say, "Dario will be there to help out."

Herrera broke an ankle playing basketball the morning of the meeting. He did not attend the meeting but participated in the vote over the phone and hung up immediately after Galardi was awarded a temporary license.

After the vote, Malone called Galardi and bragged about securing the license despite concerns voiced by the Police Department.

"So now who's got the most stroke, baby," Malone said.

That night, Galardi called Herrera.

"You're the man, brother. ... Thanks for takin' care of me. Let's hook up tonight," Galardi said.

Dickey said FBI agents took surveillance video of the dinner at P.F. Changs. But Herrera's attorney questioned why a well-known public figure like his client would conduct corrupt business in a busy restaurant.

"Did it appear they were trying to hide the fact they were trying to have dinner together?" Bernstein asked.

In August 2001, Galardi and Malone discovered that Scores, a popular New York topless club, had plans to open a cabaret in a building in Las Vegas that was formerly the Sporting House fitness center.

Galardi mulled ways to prevent Scores from getting a liquor license. He considered buying a nearby bar because county law includes distance requirements for establishments that sell liquor.

"Let's get them denied," Galardi said of the Scores owners. "Let's get Erin on it and Mary and Dario."

In September 2001, Galardi sought a zoning approval for Jaguars, scheduled to be heard Sept. 19 of that year, and an extension for his liquor license at Jaguars, scheduled to be heard that Sept. 25.

"We have to call all of them," Galardi told Malone. "Call Dario up and tell him we need him there on the 19th and 25th. We'll take care of him."

In June and July 2001, Malone and Kenny lobbied commissioners and incoming Clark County Manager Thom Reilly to hire Malone as director of the county's Parks and Recreation Department. Malone told Kenny that Kincaid-Chauncey supported the move, according to phone calls.

But other county staff members, including Barbara Wagner, who was Malone's assistant when he was a commissioner, appeared to be surprised that he would be considered for the position. When Malone told Wagner he might be offered the job, she replied: "Get out ... are you crazy? Why?"

"What's nice about it is it pays pretty well," Malone told Wagner, according to the recorded conversation played in court Wednesday.

Malone, Kenny and Galardi panicked when Herrera contacted a member of the local media and revealed the plan to hire Malone. They feared the media would learn that Malone worked for Galardi and figure out that Kenny also had connections to the strip club owner.

"They're all over the Mike Galardi thing; my name is all over that," Kenny told Malone. She then tried to recall whether her financial records reflected contributions from Galardi. "I don't think they do, I don't think they do."

Malone then backed off from lobbying county officials on the parks position, canceling a meeting with Commissioner Bruce Woodbury.

"We have to hope this thing flippin' dies on the vine," Malone told Galardi during a July 13, 2001, conversation. "I've gotta back out quickly so this thing will die."

FBI agent Byers will remain on the witness stand while prosecutors play about 250 intercepted phone calls, which is the core of their case against the former commissioners.

Feds Used Patriot Act To Investigate Clark County Commissioners (AP)

AP, March 23, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - Federal investigators used the Patriot Act to obtain financial records while probing whether a strip club owner was funneling money and gifts to Clark County commissioners, according to testimony in an ongoing corruption trial.

The act, enacted as a terrorism-fighting tool after Sept. 11, 2001, included provisions that let authorities obtain from the U.S. Treasury Department a list of each financial institution doing business with an individual.

FBI agent Joe Dickey testified Wednesday that the government used the provision to collect evidence against former county commissioners Mary Kincaid-Chauncey and Dario Herrera, who are being tried on corruption charges.

"It simply helped us identify where banks were," Dickey said. "It didn't give us information."

The government would have had to subpoena 10,000 financial institutions nationwide had it not relied on a Patriot Act provision directing the U.S. Treasury Department to give law enforcement greater access to financial records, Dickey said.

Herrera, 32, and Kincaid-Chauncey, 67, have pleaded not guilty in U.S. District Court in Las Vegas to federal charges of conspiracy, wire fraud and extortion under color of official right. Each could face 45 years in prison if convicted.

Government prosecutors allege former commission colleague Lance Malone, who worked as a lobbyist for strip club owner Michael Galardi, bribed Herrera, Kincaid-Chauncey and another former commissioner, Erin Kenny, to support laws favorable to three Galardi clubs in the Las Vegas area.

Kenny and Galardi pleaded guilty to bribery charges and have agreed to testify for the prosecution. Malone has pleaded not guilty. He is due for trial in August.

FBI agents spent more than a year monitoring Malone's and Galardi's phones, which were bugged in June 2001.

On Wednesday, FBI agents played for jurors nearly 70 intercepted phone calls and two surveillance tapes. The calls focused on a period in 2001 when Malone, Galardi and Kenny are accused of voting on matters relating to Galardi's businesses.

During several conversations, Malone and Herrera suggested they "hook up" - a term prosecutors allege was code for meeting to deliver or accept cash from Galardi.

Defense lawyers say it was merely slang for meeting.

Malone also met with Kincaid-Chauncey, who FBI agents videotaped leaving an Applebee's restaurant and sitting in Kincaid-Chauncey's car for four minutes while she used Malone's phone to call Galardi and leave a message.

"Thanks for all your help," she told the club owner. "I really appreciate it."

Although prosecutors suggested that Kincaid-Chauncey accepted money from Malone in the car, her lawyer, Richard Wright, said had no proof had happened inside the car.

Prosecutors planned to play for jurors about 250 intercepted phone calls, which provide the core of their case against the former commissioners.

Citizen Groups Balk At FBI Response To Forum (SOUTHBT)

By CAROL DRAEGER, Tribune Staff Writer

South Bend (IN) Tribune, March 24, 2006

Government agency calls for another debate

THREE OAKS — A recent open meetings forum in Three Oaks was apparently too open for the FBI.

A St. Joseph federal agent challenged Chellie Pingree's criticism of the Patriot Act and tried to track down the head of the national nonpartisan group Common Cause, to set her straight.

After reading Pingree's comments in a local newspaper account, agent Al DiBrito called the League of Women Voters of Berrien and Cass counties, league president Susan Gilbert said.

DiBrito reportedly said Pingree was "way off base" in her comments about the Patriot Act and suggested the league should've invited the FBI to speak at the March 14 panel, Gilbert said.

DiBrito's phone call has infuriated the National League of Women Voters and Common Cause.

"When the country has far more pressing security and terror concerns, we question the FBI using precious resources hounding leaders of two of the most distinguished citizen advocacy organizations in the country," Pingree and Gilbert wrote in a letter this week to FBI Director Robert Mueller.

"Is this the kind of behavior citizen activists can expect from the FBI? To us, it smacks of intimidation," they said in their March 21 letter.

William Kowalski, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI for the state of Michigan, defended DiBrito's phone call and said it's unfortunate that it was perceived as being threatening.

DOJ_NMG_0020612

The purpose of the call was to "offer an opportunity to get out accurate information about the Patriot Act and how it is utilized to combat terrorism," Kowalski said.

It was really an offer for an open debate, Kowalski said, explaining that it's not uncommon for state FBI agents and employees of the U.S. attorney's office to be invited to forums to explain the Patriot Act and how the government uses it.

Pingree's comments were made at a public forum during national Sunshine Week, a time when the media and citizens' groups urge openness in government. Pingree was one of four panelists — including the Michigan editor of The Tribune, a communications professor and a Berrien County prosecutor — who spoke at the event, sponsored by the local League of Women Voters.

During the forum Pingree accused the Bush administration of using the Patriot Act to strip away freedoms in the name of national security.

"Government wants to act in secrecy to invade your privacy," she said, referring to the controversial wiretap measure President George Bush favors.

Pingree, a former school board member and state lawmaker in Maine, said during the Clinton Administration a presumption of openness prevailed.

She credited Clinton's Attorney General, Janet Reno, for the policy.

The Reno philosophy, she said, was starkly different from the nondisclosure directives of former Bush Attorney General John Ashcroft.

Calls to DiBrito's office on Thursday were referred to Kowalski's office in Detroit.

DiBrito also reportedly told Gilbert that an assistant U.S. attorney in Grand Rapids would be in touch with her to give her the real story on the Patriot Act.

Gilbert said it's unclear if DiBrito was simply "personally irritated" by Pingree's comments or whether "he's acting on some order to look for anything subversive to take action on."

Kowalski vehemently denied the subversive allegation.

"That is certainly not the case," he said. "There is plenty of dissent out there and our intent is not to stifle debate."

Kowalski said DiBrito merely acted out of a desire to ensure that both sides of the Patriot Act debate are explained to the public.

Kowalski said it's not the criticism that is at issue; it's the lack of balance at the forum.

"The more debate we have the more people understand what the Department of Justice and the FBI are trying to do to protect their freedom under the Patriot Act," he said.

"We would like to participate in another forum," he added.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

U.S. Hiring Hong Kong Co. To Scan Nukes (AP-Y2)

By Ted Bridis And John Solomon

AP2, March 23, 2006

In the aftermath of the Dubai ports dispute, the Bush administration is hiring a Hong Kong conglomerate to help detect nuclear materials inside cargo passing through the Bahamas to the United States and elsewhere.

The administration acknowledges the no-bid contract with Hutchison Whampoa Ltd. represents the first time a foreign company will be involved in running a sophisticated U.S. radiation detector at an overseas port without American customs agents present.

Freeport in the Bahamas is 65 miles from the U.S. coast, where cargo would be likely to be inspected again. The contract is currently being finalized.

The administration is negotiating a second no-bid contract for a Philippine company to install radiation detectors in its home country, according to documents obtained by The Associated Press. At dozens of other overseas ports, foreign governments are primarily responsible for scanning cargo.

DOJ_NMG_0020613

While President Bush recently reassured Congress that foreigners would not manage security at U.S. ports, the Hutchison deal in the Bahamas illustrates how the administration is relying on foreign companies at overseas ports to safeguard cargo headed to the United States.

Hutchison Whampoa is the world's largest ports operator and among the industry's most-respected companies. It was an early adopter of U.S. anti-terror measures. But its billionaire chairman, Li Ka-Shing, also has substantial business ties to China's government that have raised U.S. concerns over the years.

"Li Ka-Shing is pretty close to a lot of senior leaders of the Chinese government and the Chinese Communist Party," said Larry M. Wortzel, head of a U.S. government commission that studies China security and economic issues. But Wortzel said Hutchison operates independently from Beijing, and he described Li as "a very legitimate international businessman."

"One can conceive legitimate security concerns and would hope either the Homeland Security Department or the intelligence services of the United States work very hard to satisfy those concerns," Wortzel said.

Three years ago, the Bush administration effectively blocked a Hutchison subsidiary from buying part of a bankrupt U.S. telecommunications company, Global Crossing Ltd., on national security grounds.

And a U.S. military intelligence report, once marked "secret," cited Hutchison in 1999 as a potential risk for smuggling arms and other prohibited materials into the United States from the Bahamas.

Hutchison's port operations in the Bahamas and Panama "could provide a conduit for illegal shipments of technology or prohibited items from the West to the PRC (People's Republic of China), or facilitate the movement of arms and other prohibited items into the Americas," the now-declassified assessment said.

The CIA currently has no security concerns about Hutchison's port operations, and the administration believes the pending deal with the foreign company would be safe, officials said.

Supervised by Bahamian customs officials, Hutchison employees will drive the towering, truck-like radiation scanner that moves slowly over large cargo containers and scans them for radiation that might be emitted by plutonium or a radiological weapon.

Any positive reading would set off alarms monitored simultaneously by Bahamian customs inspectors at Freeport and by U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials working at an anti-terrorism center 800 miles away in northern Virginia. Any alarm would prompt a closer inspection of the cargo, and there are multiple layers of security to prevent tampering, officials said.

"The equipment operates itself," said Bryan Wilkes, a spokesman for the U.S. National Nuclear Security Administration, the agency negotiating the contract. "It's not going to be someone standing at the controls pressing buttons and flipping switches."

A lawmaker who helped lead the opposition to the Dubai ports deal isn't so confident. Neither are some security experts. They question whether the U.S. should pay a foreign company with ties to China to keep radioactive material out of the United States.

"Giving a no-bid contract to a foreign company to carry out the most sensitive security screening for radioactive materials at ports abroad raises many questions," said Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), D-N.Y.

A low-paid employee with access to the screening equipment could frustrate international security by studying how the equipment works and which materials set off its alarms, warned a retired U.S. Customs investigator who specialized in smuggling cases.

"Money buys a lot of things," Robert Sheridan said. "The fact that foreign workers would have access to how the United States screens various containers for nuclear material and how this technology scrutinizes the containers — all those things allow someone with a nefarious intention to thwart the screening."

Other experts discounted concerns. They cited Hutchison's reputation as a leading ports company and said the United States inevitably must rely for some security on large commercial operators in the global maritime industry.

"We must not allow an unwarranted fear of foreign ownership or involvement in offshore operations to impair our ability to protect against nuclear weapons being smuggled into this country," said Sen. Norm Coleman (news, bio, voting record), R-Minn., a member of the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs. "We must work with these foreign companies."

DOJ_NMG_0020614

A former Coast Guard commander, Stephen Flynn, said foreign companies sometimes prove more trustworthy — and susceptible to U.S. influence — than governments.

"It's a very fragile system," Flynn said. Foreign companies "recognize the U.S. has the capacity and willingness to exercise a kill switch if something goes wrong."

A spokesman for Hutchison's ports subsidiary, Anthony Tam, said the company "is a strong supporter in port security initiatives."

"In the case of the Bahamas, our local personnel are working alongside with U.S. customs officials to identify and inspect U.S.-bound containers that could be carrying radioactive materials," Tam said.

However, there are no U.S. customs agents checking any cargo containers at the Hutchison port in Freeport. Under the contract, no U.S. officials would be stationed permanently in the Bahamas with the radiation scanner.

The administration is finalizing the contract amid a national debate over maritime security sparked by the furor over now-abandoned plans by Dubai-owned DP World to take over significant operations at major U.S. ports.

Hutchison operates the sprawling Freeport Container Port on Grand Bahama Island. Its subsidiary, Hutchison Port Holdings, has operations in more than 20 countries but none in the United States.

Contract documents, obtained by The Associated Press, indicate Hutchison will be paid roughly $6 million. The contract is for one year with options for three years.

The Energy Department's National Nuclear Security Administration is negotiating the Bahamas contract under a $121 million security program it calls the "second line of defense." Wilkes, the NNSA spokesman, said the Bahamian government dictated that the U.S. give the contract to Hutchison.

"It's their country, their port. The driver of the mobile carrier is the contractor selected by their government. We had no say or no choice," he said. "We are fortunate to have allies who are signing these agreements with us."

Some security experts said that is a weak explanation in the Bahamas, with its close reliance on the United States. The administration could insist that the Bahamas permit U.S. Customs agents to operate at the port, said Albert Santoli, an expert on national security issues in Asia and the Pacific.

"Why would they not accept that?" said Santoli, a former national security aide to Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (news, bio, voting record), R-Calif. "There is an interest in the Bahamas and every other country in the region to make sure the U.S. stays safe and strong. That's how this should be negotiated."

Flynn, the former Coast Guard commander, agreed the Bahamas would readily accept such a proposal but said the U.S. is short of trained customs agents to send overseas.

Contract documents obtained by the AP show at least one other foreign company is involved in the U.S. radiation-detection program.

A separate, no-bid $4 million contract the Bush administration is negotiating would pay a Manila-based company, International Container Terminal Services Inc., to install radiation detectors at the Philippines' largest port.

The U.S. says the Manila company is not being paid to operate the radiation monitors once they are installed. But two International Container executives and a senior official at the government's Philippine Nuclear Research Institute said the company will run the detectors on behalf of the institute and the country's customs bureau. U.S. officials said they will investigate further how the Filipinos plan to use the equipment.

Check Point Software Withdraws Deal Over U.S. Security Concerns (WSJ/AP)

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON -- Leading Israeli software company Check Point Software Technologies Ltd. abandoned plans to buy smaller U.S. rival Sourcefire Inc. for $225 million because of security objections raised by the Bush administration.

Check Point Ltd. formally withdrew its proposal near the conclusion of a rare, full-blown investigation by a U.S. review panel after the Ramat Gan, Israel-based company was told U.S. officials feared the transaction could endanger some of government's most sensitive computer systems.

The investigation was carried out by the same U.S. review panel that approved the now-abandoned ports deal involving Dubai-owned DP World.

Lawyers for Check Point offered to attach conditions to the sale that executives believed were onerous, but were intended to satisfy concerns expressed by the Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States, a person familiar with the process said. But no agreement could be reached.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation and Defense Department objected partly over specialized intrusion detection software known as "Snort," which guards some classified U.S. military and intelligence computers. Snort's author is a senior executive at Sourcefire, which is based in Columbia, Md.

In private meetings between the review panel and Check Point, officials from the FBI and Pentagon objected to permitting any foreign company to acquire sensitive Sourcefire technology for preventing hacker break-ins and monitoring data traffic, an executive familiar with the discussions previously said. This executive spoke on condition of anonymity because government negotiations are supposed to remain confidential.

Under the sale, announced Oct. 6, Check Point would own all Sourcefire patents, source-code blueprints for its software and the expertise of employees.

The review panel privately notified Check Point on Feb. 6 it intended to fully investigate the transaction's security risks, the executive said. That was days before the furor erupted over the Dubai ports deal. Check Point disclosed the news to investors Feb. 13, but the announcement drew little attention despite escalating scrutiny and interest in Washington over such reviews.

Sourcefire's protection and monitoring technology builds on the popularity of Snort, which was created by its chief technology officer and is distributed free.

Unlike Sourcefire's commercial products, Snort's blueprints are open for inspection to assure it works as advertised. This makes it popular inside the U.S. intelligence community, even alongside more mainstream security products from Cisco Systems Inc. or Juniper Networks Inc.

State Department Is Criticized For Purchasing Chinese PC's (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

HONG KONG, March 23 — A State Department purchase of more than 15,000 computers built by the Lenovo Group of China is starting to draw criticism in the latest sign of American unease about the role of foreign companies in the American economy.

The computers, worth more than $13 million, are coming from factories in Raleigh, N.C., and Monterrey, Mexico, that were part of the personal computer division that Lenovo purchased from I.B.M. last May. Sean McCormack, a State Department spokesman, said at the department's daily media briefing on Wednesday that the computers were intended for unclassified systems and would be serviced by the former I.B.M. division.

The computer contracts are drawing heat from a diverse group of liberal and conservative critics who have been warning about China's growing power for years. These critics have been encouraged by the Congressional scrutiny given to a plan by a company controlled by the royal family of Dubai in the United Arab Emirates to acquire operations at six American ports; the company has since agreed to give up those operations.

The critics warn that the deal could help China spy on American embassies and American intelligence-gathering activities, using hardware and software planted in the computers.

"The opportunities for intelligence gains by the Chinese are phenomenal," said Michael R. Wessel, a member of the United States-China Economic and Security Review Commission, which was created by Congress to monitor and report on the bilateral relationship. Larry M. Wortzel, the commission's chairman, said in an interview two weeks ago that while he would not be concerned if Airbus moved an aircraft production line to China, he would be worried if Lenovo ever started to sell computers to American government agencies involved in foreign affairs. Responding on Thursday to the Lenovo deal, he predicted that, "Members of Congress, I think, will react very strongly when they see a deal like this come through."

Lenovo is a publicly traded company controlled by Legend Holdings, which was started with Chinese government backing in 1984; the government-controlled Chinese Academy of Sciences now holds 65 percent of Legend, while Legend's employees own the rest. Lenovo declined on Thursday to comment on the computer sales to the State Department.

Word of the computer deal began to trickle out on Monday when a Lenovo distributor, CDW Government, a wholly owned subsidiary of the CDW Corporation, sent a press release to members of the business news media announcing its contracts to help the State Department modernize its information technology systems. CDW, based in Vernon Hills, Ill., said that it had been carrying out an $11.65 million contract to supply the State Department with more than 15,000 Lenovo ThinkCentre M51 desktop computers, plus a $1.35 million contract to provide nearly 1,000 Lenovo ThinkCentre M51 minitower computers.

Max R. Peterson II, the vice president of federal sales at CDW Government, said in a telephone interview that the State Department had approved a list of specific computer models, including the Lenovo models, and had asked computer systems integrators to bid for contracts to meet the department's needs and make their own choices among approved models. CDW won the contracts and chose to begin delivering 500 Lenovo computers a week starting in November, he said.

Chinese ownership of Lenovo was never discussed with the State Department through the contract process and the computer deliveries, Mr. Peterson said.

He noted that the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States had approved the Lenovo acquisition of the I.B.M. division.

Teams To Target Financial Crimes (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents have teamed up with law-enforcement authorities in Argentina, Brazil and Paraguay to combat money laundering and other financial crimes in a remote and lawless region known as the "Tri-Border Area."

Department of Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Julie L. Myers, who heads ICE, said multigovernment "trade transparency units" will investigate and prosecute crimes including money laundering, terrorist financing, contraband smuggling and tax evasion.

The United States has determined that the Tri-Border Area is a source of fundraising for radical Islamic groups, including Hezbollah, Hamas and al Qaeda, and the U.S. government has worked cooperatively with governments in the region to disrupt fundraising activity.

U.S. law-enforcement authorities describe the Tri-Border Area as South America's busiest contraband and smuggling center, where billions of dollars annually are generated from arms trafficking, drug smuggling, counterfeiting and other crimes.

"The new units will not only help authorities in these nations combat domestic financial crimes, but will also enhance the ability of the United States to target money-laundering rings that operate both in South America and the United States," Mrs. Myers said.

The Tri-Border Area is flanked by the freewheeling cities of Puerto Iguazu in Argentina, Foz do Iguazu in Brazil and Ciudad del Este in Paraguay, where drug dealers and terrorists reportedly meet and where counterterrorism investigators worldwide have intensified their focus since the September 11, 2001, attacks in the United States because of the growing presence of Islamic radicals.

Argentina's Secretariat of State Intelligence first reported in 1999 that members of the al Qaeda terrorist network were in the region to coordinate terrorism training and to plan attacks with Hezbollah against U.S. targets.

U.S. intelligence officials have been concerned that an alliance with Hezbollah would give al Qaeda a new base close to the United States for attacks.

The Treasury Department has described the Tri-Border Area as a "clear example" of where Islamic groups gather to "finance terrorist activities."

The department has said members of al Qaeda, Egypt's Al-Gamaa Islamiya, the Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah have drawn some of their funding from activities in the area.

The FBI sent agents to the region in 2002 after a poster of Iguazu Falls, the area's major tourist attraction, was found inside an al Qaeda bunker in Afghanistan.

Mrs. Myers said earlier efforts by the agency and other foreign governments to combat trade-based money laundering have yielded successful results, including an investigation into a $20 million gold export subsidy scheme in 2004 that led to the prosecution of 20 New York jewelers for money laundering.

Secretary Of Homeland Insecurity (NYT)

Sometimes it's hard to understand just how Michael Chertoff understands his title, secretary of homeland security. Take this week, when Mr. Chertoff appeared before executives of the chemical industry, whose plants remain one of the nation's greatest vulnerabilities more than four years after 9/11. Mr. Chertoff did not chastise the industry for failing to protect chemical plants adequately. He proposed weak federal safety standards. He did not even fully embrace a recently introduced bipartisan Senate bill that would create meaningful standards.

Instead, Mr. Chertoff seemed perfectly content to defer on key security matters to an industry that contributes heavily to Republican campaigns but has proved to be dangerously unwilling to take public safety seriously.

A terrorist attack on a chlorine plant could put hundreds of thousands of lives at risk. Yet, incredibly, the federal government has failed to enact reasonable safety standards for chemical plants. Despite all of the nice things the administration has been saying about the industry lately, it has not taken care of the problem on its own. Many plants lack perimeter fencing, lights and security guards. Too often, they use extremely dangerous chemicals close to high-density populations, when safer substances could be substituted.

It should be obvious to anyone concerned about public safety that the nation needs strong, mandatory government rules to reduce these dangers. Yet in his speech, Mr. Chertoff favored leaving crucial security decisions up to the chemical companies — a formula that puts too much weight on not inconveniencing industry, and too little on protecting the public.

Mr. Chertoff said requiring the industry to use safer chemicals would be "mission creep" — even though that would be precisely the kind of precautionary step that should be a core part of his department's mission. Mr. Chertoff also spoke approvingly of "pre-emption," the notion that if federal chemical plant safety rules are adopted, they should be written in a way that will invalidate tougher rules adopted at the state level. Pre-emption is high on the industry's wish list, but it is not in the public interest.

Senators Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, and Joseph Lieberman, Democrat of Connecticut, have come up with a bill that would direct the Homeland Security Department to develop mandatory safety standards for chemical plants. If the bill becomes law, the plants that do not comply with the government's rules could be shut down. The Collins-Lieberman bill is not perfect, but it would be an important start. It is disheartening that Mr. Chertoff is not fully endorsing the measure and pushing Congress to pass it.

Mr. Chertoff has been heavily criticized for his performance during Hurricane Katrina. We hoped that reaction would at least prompt the department to be more aggressive about eliminating obvious domestic security threats. He should be speaking to the American people about his support for strong chemical plant security rules, not speaking to the chemical industry about his support for weak ones.

Power Plays? Payback Time? Agencies Realign Their Stars (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

If a terrorist attack wiped out the top layer of government, the law has a plan for who would step in: Without the president or vice president, a succession of congressional leaders and Cabinet secretaries stand in line to assume control of the country.

But forget about the presidency. What about the National Archives? Who would take charge of the nation's files in case of a catastrophe?

Fortunately, the White House has an answer. President Bush this week endorsed a new order of succession for the National Archives and Records Administration detailing down to the 10th level who would assume command in a national emergency. If the top nine guys are gone, it turns out, the director of the Jimmy Carter Library and Museum takes over. That's right -- 25 years after leaving office, Carter, in the form of his top librarian, would return to power, of a sort.

In a government fixated on doomsday scenarios, the White House memo issued Wednesday was at least the fifth time since the start of last year that an executive branch agency has created or revised an order of succession. Many departments rushed to draft emergency plans in the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. But nearly four years later, government officials in agencies such as the budget and personnel offices still busy themselves with the macabre exercise of figuring out who would be on top should the worst happen.

"It's kind of a sign of the thinking of government that there are so many high-level people at all these agencies that you need to have an order of succession," said Paul C. Light, a government specialist at New York University. "At the risk of being flip, the question would not be 'Who's in charge at these agencies?' but 'Who cares who's in charge at these agencies?' "

Evidently people at the agencies. Some of the recent lineups reflect one official moving up the chart at the expense of colleagues. Others seem to be even more brazen power plays intended to put rivals in their places. In case there are any doubts, the succession orders make plain which associate director stands above which other associate director in an agency pecking order.

All of this, of course, stems from the serious post-9/11 concern about the government's ability to keep running after an attack using nuclear, chemical or biological weapons. Long before 2001, a single member of the Cabinet was kept away from the U.S. Capitol during the president's State of the Union address to ensure that a senior executive would survive should disaster strike. But Sept. 11 brought home how rudimentary plans for continuity of government really were.

After the attacks, Bush activated a shadow government, dispatching about 100 senior civilian managers to live and work secretly in fortified locations outside Washington on a 24-hour basis. Vice President Cheney famously retreated to "undisclosed locations."

Congress, on the other hand, has debated and debated without coming up with its own plan. The House passed a bill last year, just as it did the year before, requiring states to hold elections within 49 days if 100 or more of the 435 House seats are empty, only to have the idea languish in the Senate, where critics favor immediate temporary appointments.

But at least the National Archives has a plan. Under this week's memo, if the archivist and his deputy are unable to serve, power devolves to the assistant archivist for administration, followed by the assistant archivist for records services and then the assistant archivist for regional records services and so on down the line.

"It's good to know they're taking care of this because, without a Congress, they've got someone to chronicle the abuses of the martial-law state," said Rep. Brian Baird (D-Wash.), who has proposed a constitutional amendment permitting governors to name interim House members in case of mass casualties.

Baird laughed but then added that the archives plan makes sense: "One of the best ways to deter terrorist attack is to be so protected in terms of maintaining government continuity that you could say, 'Go ahead, take your best shot.' What a powerful message it would be to be able to have your government up and going within days."

Others said the White House has more important issues to tackle. "We have huge problems with presidential succession," said Rep. Brad Sherman (D-Calif.), "and knowing who is head of the archives is not my number one concern." Sherman has proposed removing the House speaker and Senate president pro tempore from the presidential succession because putting either in the Oval Office could represent a radical departure from who voters thought they were electing.

The new archives plan supersedes one issued in March 2002, and the main effect seems to be demoting the assistant archivist for information services from third in line of succession to seventh.

A memo issued for the Office of Personnel Management last year bumped the agency's general counsel ahead of the chief of staff and the communications director up to fourth in line from 10th. Now serving as 10th is the associate director for human capital leadership and merit systems accountability.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld rewrote his succession plan in December to put his inner circle closer to the top, placing Undersecretary for Intelligence Stephen A. Cambone right behind Deputy Secretary Gordon R. England, and effectively demoting the secretaries of the Army, Air Force and Navy.

The new national intelligence director, John D. Negroponte, has issued his first succession chart.

In Atlanta, Jay Hakes, director of the Jimmy Carter library, said he figured he was tapped to be part of the archives' succession because he works outside Washington but in a city with a significant federal presence.

He said he has not been mapping out what he would do with his power should the occasion arise. "I don't spend a lot of time thinking about it," Hakes said. "But I think this is a case where being overprepared is better than being underprepared."

Master Of Slow And Deliberate At Ground Zero (NYT)

By Charles V. Bagli

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

A half-hour before a midnight deadline, the developer Larry A. Silverstein strode into the conference room on the 15th floor of the Port Authority's Park Avenue offices, took off his coat and gulped down two cups of coffee, ready for the next round of talks about the future of ground zero.

State officials and Port Authority executives said later that they thought the late-night session on March 14 would complete the grueling negotiations that had dragged on for months, including 18 hours of bargaining earlier that day.

So they were shocked by the proposal Mr. Silverstein delivered. They said he was once again raising issues that the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, the owner of the 16-acre site, had declared off the table. They said Mr. Silverstein was, among other things, seeking tens of millions of dollars in additional financial concessions.

Kenneth J. Ringler, the authority's executive director, stormed into the conference room, telling Mr. Silverstein and his entourage, "It's over."

Over? A look at Mr. Silverstein's long career in real estate and the negotiating style that has defined it suggests that, when it comes to making deals, it is almost never over. Not surprising, then, despite last week's ugly negotiating episode, Mr. Silverstein's team has been talking through back channels with the other side this week.

Mr. Silverstein has said he fully expects to be back at the table within days to sign a deal that preserves his control over a major part of ground zero, a site that many consider sacred ground. State officials hope to resume face-to-face negotiations with him, too, but not until there is a fairly detailed agreement.

Mr. Silverstein, 74, adopted his stubborn "negotiate till they drop" style a half-century ago while working in his father's tiny real estate shop on Lower Broadway. It has caused frustration over the years, but ultimately it has made him a multimillionaire. He got his start as what is known in the trade as a syndicator, someone who rounds up investors to buy a building, operates it for a fee while taking a stake for himself, and puts up little or none of his own money.

What has distinguished him is a penchant for endless negotiations to enhance his position. His partner in the 50's and 60's, Bernard H. Mendik, regaled friends decades later with stories about going to an afternoon closing on the purchase of a building with Mr. Silverstein. "But at midnight, Larry still had two or three issues," several friends recall Mr. Mendik saying, half jokingly. "You could not close a deal."

Those comments might be dismissed as the residue of resentments caused by the end of their partnership, which shattered after Mr. Mendik, who died in May 2001, divorced Mr. Silverstein's sister. Still, even Mr. Silverstein's friends do not describe him much differently.

One of them, Jonathan L. Mechanic, an influential real estate lawyer, represented the Academy of Sciences, which leased space at the developer's recently completed tower at 7 World Trade Center.

"It's wasn't the quickest road to completion," Mr. Mechanic said of the discussions, "but completion did occur. He's a tenacious negotiator. He's also an optimist about his ability to consummate a transaction. But he doesn't give anything away."

Mr. Silverstein very much disagrees with the common take on his negotiating style. "I don't view it that way," he said Wednesday. "I look back on a lifetime of transactions consummated. I learned a long time ago that negotiation is a matter of give and take."

His name never quite made it into the pantheon of New York developers like Durst, Rudin, Resnick and Speyer. His greatest triumph came in July 2001 when, as a dark-horse contestant, he outmaneuvered more powerful developers with more resources to take control of the World Trade Center in one of the biggest real estate deals of all time. Terrorists brought down the towers two months later.

Now at that very site, his negotiating style has state officials making him a scapegoat for failure. Last week, Gov. George E. Pataki, the developer's principal political ally at ground zero, charged that Mr. Silverstein had failed to bargain in good faith. Charles A. Gargano, vice chairman of the Port Authority and the governor's chief economic development official, called him "greedy."

Civic leaders have complained that Mr. Silverstein has treated the complex negotiations like any other deal, ignoring the keen public interest. "Clearly this is not any ordinary development project and this is not any ordinary lease," said Robert D. Yaro, president of the Regional Plan Association. "The public's expectations for this site, the emotions and the global focus here, is unlike any other project. To suggest that this is just another real estate deal misses the point."

Mr. Silverstein heatedly disputed that criticism.

"That's ridiculous," he said. "It's easy to point fingers at somebody who's not at fault. The only motivation here is to rebuild. I believe that's important for the city and the region."

He blames the Port Authority and other government entities for the delays.

"We've been here for five years, and the only thing we have to show for it," he said, "is 7 World Trade Center." He built the original 47-story tower in the 80's. After it was destroyed on Sept. 11, he was tenacious in battling with both his insurer and his landlord to rebuild it. But his stubborn streak also came into play. He insisted on setting rents that were 40 percent higher than the average for the downtown market. A 2002 plan to make the Port Authority the anchor tenant fell apart when he asked for twice the rent it had paid in the old trade center. Today, less than one-fifth of the tower is leased.

Ground zero has been a complex matter involving the sometimes competing interests of the families of victims, insurers, the Port Authority, and state and city officials. At one point or another, Mr. Silverstein has tangled with all of them.

The latest drama was prompted by the scheduled groundbreaking in April for the Freedom Tower, the largest, most symbolic and least economically viable of the five towers planned for the site. In addition, state and city officials and Port Authority executives came to realize that the project would cost more than $7 billion, while there was only $2.9 billion in insurance money available.

Mr. Silverstein insists to this day that he can do the entire job, but he has failed to convince Port Authority executives, the Pataki administration, or Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg. The mayor has raised the possibility that Mr. Silverstein would run out of money in 2009 after building only two towers, default on his lease and walk away from a half-finished project with tens of millions in profit.

Mr. Bloomberg called for a major realignment at ground zero, pointing out that in 2003 Mr. Silverstein and his investors were repaid most if not all the money they had invested in the original deal. The developer himself put up only $14 million in a deal valued at $3.2 billion.

"He's playing with the house's money and, nothing wrong with that, but let's not feel too bad here," Mr. Bloomberg said on his weekly radio show last Friday.

Mr. Silverstein rejected an initial proposal from the authority to split up the site, saying he did not want to surrender the most valuable parcels at ground zero. Five hours before the negotiations came to an impasse on March 14, both sides say they were close to a deal that would have had the authority taking control of the Freedom Tower and another building site, Site 5. More important, there had been progress on a financial arrangement.

After the impasse, Mr. Silverstein submitted a new version of the deal that both sides had nearly adopted, but state and authority officials say it included a new demand: he wanted the authority's second site back.

Mr. Ringler of the authority met Wednesday and yesterday with Mr. Silverstein's lawyer, Martin Lipton, to discuss going back to the original framework. A third session is planned for today.

On Wednesday, Mr. Silverstein was conceding nothing, talking as if his control of the entire site is not in jeopardy.

"Everybody so desperately wants to see this move forward and get it done," he said. "The Freedom Tower is moving forward as we promised."

Acting Director Gives FEMA Focus (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

DOJ_NMG_0020621

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

The Federal Emergency Management Agency is on a mission destined for disaster. Planning, that is.

Acting Director R. David Paulison admits that the agency he inherited after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita was not up to the task of handling the fallout of those storms, let alone an earthquake or terrorist attack.

"It overwhelmed everyone -- the system was not set up to deal with a catastrophe of that size," Mr. Paulison told The Washington Times.

Created 27 years ago, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, or FEMA, was revered for its heroic response to natural disasters such as floods, earthquakes, tornados or hurricanes.

But in the days after Katrina's destruction of New Orleans, FEMA became a four-letter word for the victims and critics in Congress, leading to the sudden dismissal of its embattled director, Michael D. Brown.

The maligned agency is now planning for the hurricane season that officially begins June 1 as it continues to aid 800,000 families affected by last year's storms that damaged 90,000 square miles.

"This was the largest migration in the history of the United States -- larger than the Civil War, larger than the [Depression-era] Dust Bowl. Normally, we house [3,000 to 5,000] disaster victims a year. We went way beyond that, and we had to make up the rules as we went along," Mr. Paulison said.

"The major lesson we learned is that FEMA was not ready to handle a catastrophe the size of Katrina, and we now know we have to be ready to respond to a major catastrophe such as an earthquake or terrorist attack, to evacuate hundreds of thousands or millions of people and be able to feed them, house them, and take care of them. We're putting a system in place to do just that," he said.

Mr. Paulison saw many of the same shortfalls on the national level that he dealt with when 30,000 homes were destroyed by Hurricane Andrew in 1992, which struck Florida just two weeks after he was promoted to fire chief of Miami-Dade County.

FEMA now is hiring 1,500 employees for the ongoing disaster recovery and more first responders and has spent $40 billion so far.

His position as acting director allows him to focus on mammoth preparation plans rather than a potential political battle on Capitol Hill to be formally confirmed as FEMA chief.

When asked whether he wants the job permanently, Mr. Paulison said, "I agreed to take the job after Mike Brown left and agreed to help us get through the next hurricane season, and right now, I just want to get FEMA back on track. I serve at the pleasure of the president."

Mr. Paulison was chief of the U.S. Fire Administration when Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff recommended him for the job.

His first order of business in September was to get victims off cots and out of the Louisiana Superdome and the New Orleans Convention Center. Once 85,000 evacuees were settled into hotel rooms in every state, including Hawaii and Alaska, many did not want to leave, and attempts since December to move evacuees into short-term housing brought more negative publicity.

"It's nice for a couple of weeks, but they've been there six months now, and a hotel room is no place to raise a family," Mr. Paulison said.

With only a few hundred evacuees still in hotels -- most of whom are handicapped, disabled or too destitute to move on -- there is no deadline, and evacuees are being handled on a case-by-case basis.

"These people lost everything -- their home, their job, everything they owned, including their neighborhoods. We wanted to be sensitive to their needs and make concessions," Mr. Paulison said.

The agency faces many challenges, not only in housing, but also in communication, logistics, tracking supplies and learning about problems on the ground.

The Search For Katrina's Victims Finds Some Missing By Choice (WP)

By Ken Ringle

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0020622

NEW ORLEANS -- By Louisiana's latest official count, 1,292 people are known to have died in the state because of Hurricane Katrina.

About 1,280 -- the number changes daily -- remain missing.

Hundreds of people were sucked into the Gulf of Mexico by Katrina's retreating tsunami-like storm surge and will never be found. But the state-run, federally funded Find Family National Call Center is discovering that hundreds of others have used the storm and the nationwide diaspora it triggered to escape a troubled or painful past. They do not want to be found.

The center's 90 or so workers immerse themselves daily in tracking missing wives and fleeing felons, reburying exhumed coffins, prying unknowingly into the dark family secrets of confused parentage and dealing with the anonymous dead whom no one seems able -- or willing -- to claim.

Even now, nearly seven months after Katrina, the Find Family phone bank fields 120 to 150 calls a day about relatives or loved ones who vanished in the storm or its aftermath. The vast majority of those being sought are discovered among the thousands of names in American Red Cross or Federal Emergency Management Agency databases that track the whereabouts around the country of evacuees from the storm. The overall number of people missing has been dropping steadily, if slowly, since the storm. More than 10,000 were originally on the list.

"But every day, too, we get one or two we can't find anywhere -- truly missing people, whose absence has only now been discovered," said Henry Yennie, the former mental health executive who serves as the center's deputy director. There were 21 such names reported between March 6 and March 10.

Why has it taken so long to report them?

It's a function of New Orleans's population "being exploded all over the country," Yennie said in a telephone interview from Baton Rouge. "I don't think any of us can begin to appreciate the extent of this disruption Katrina caused in the lives of these evacuees. You lose your house. You lose your job. You lose your community and the personal networks you used to keep track of your extended family and your friends. And you wind up somewhere like a shelter in Montana."

In such cases, he said, evacuees may have quickly tried to locate members of their immediate family but have taken months to realize that they never asked anyone about a distant cousin or a neighbor they never really knew well.

Then, too, in a large low-income population, which would include many evacuees, Yennie said, "you have a fair number of people who live marginal lives at the edge of society. Often they live alone. Sometimes they're mentally ill. Frequently they have no living relatives. They aren't part of any network."

He added: "There was one deceased fellow we found who was in his fifties. He had lived in the same place for 35 years and once taught at a bartender college. But we couldn't find anyone in his neighborhood who knew anything about him. We eventually identified him through DNA."

Immediately after Katrina, Yennie said, the Find Family center had nearly 150 people fielding calls round the clock. Most were evacuees themselves -- pastors, social workers, funeral directors, mental health workers -- working out of a long-vacant supermarket building in the Gateway Shopping Center in Baton Rouge. As the months have gone by and after more than 9,400 of the missing have been located, the work has eased to 12-hour days. It has also, Yennie said, become more specialized.

"We have a dentist who has done amazing identification with dentistry, working just from pictures people showed him. We have a whole gaggle of volunteer geneticists who help us assemble family trees for DNA matchups. We have technicians who have gathered DNA samples for us from as far away as Afghanistan. And we have mathematicians who help gauge the probabilities that those matchups are accurate."

But the work, he said, has led his workers into disturbing and unexpected areas. "We tracked one parolee to New York, but when we got him on the phone he threatened to kill the person who found him. He didn't want to be found."

The trackers have also learned more than they wanted to know about family relations. More than a few women, he said, have used the opportunity to escape from abusive domestic relationships. "They beg us not to report their whereabouts to the person tracking them. And we don't," Yennie said. "We only promise that, if we find someone, we'll give them the phone number of the person who asked us to look for them."

In the case of fugitives from the law -- people running from alimony or child support payments or other debts -- Yennie said the center gets the advice of law enforcement personnel on its staff.

But the most unexpected challenge, he said, has been in dealing with the wearying complexity of family relationships and with unwanted discoveries about bloodlines. DNA identification, he said, often depends on painstakingly tracking a consistent genetic pattern within a family. In more than a few cases, searchers have been told by family members that all the siblings have the same father, only for the DNA evidence to show otherwise.

Yennie said the staff keeps such information confidential.

"Our purpose is to find people, not to violate their privacy. We don't want to learn this stuff. We just want to find or identify people and move on," he said.

Of those still missing, fewer than 50 are children, Yennie said. Slightly more than half are African American men. Most are more than 50 years old.

In addition to tracking the living, the Find Family center has taken over from the Orleans Parish coroner's office most of the work of identifying the unclaimed dead. Yennie said the center has been unable to find any way to identify 26 bodies. Tentative identification has been established for about 46. About 100 bodies have been positively identified, but the families have no resources to claim them and are awaiting government aid to help with burials.

Yennie expects both the search for the missing and the identification of the dead to accelerate in the coming weeks because of the recent allocation of funds for obtaining access to a highly specialized LexisNexis online search. He also cited the help of more law enforcement personnel experienced in tracking fugitives. Within six months, he said, there should be enough time and manpower to go street by street through New Orleans with census records and to finally nail down Katrina's cost in lives.

In the meantime, he and the call center crew have been given the macabre chore of reburying those exhumed by Katrina from graveyards -- coffins found afloat or broken amid the wreckage of the storm.

The most bizarre such case, he said, came not from New Orleans but from farther west near the coastal town of Cameron, where Hurricane Rita left behind a casket. The dead man was from the Cameron graveyard, where he had been buried in the 1950s. In 1957, Hurricane Audrey had dug up the casket and carried it out of the cemetery. It had been sunk somewhere in a salt marsh east of town until Rita came ashore and resurrected it again.

"He'd been lost there underwater nearly 50 years," Yennie said. "There were barnacles on his coffin."

Red Cross Sifting Internal Charges Over Katrina Aid (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

The American Red Cross, the largest recipient of donations after Hurricane Katrina, is investigating wide ranging accusations of impropriety among volunteers after the disaster.

John F. McGuire, the interim president and chief executive of the Red Cross, and Senator Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said some of the actions might have been criminal.

The accusations include improper diversion of relief supplies, failure to follow required Red Cross procedures in tracking and distributing supplies, and use of felons as volunteers in the disaster area in violation of Red Cross rules.

There are no known official estimates of the cash or the value of supplies that might have been misappropriated, but volunteers who have come forward with accusations said the amount was in the millions of dollars. The Red Cross received roughly 60 percent of the $3.6 billion that Americans donated for hurricane relief. Mr. McGuire said the investigation started "a number of weeks ago" and was continuing.

"We're in the middle of this, and we're looking at a range of possible problems," he said, "from issues between a few people that are really nothing other than bad will, to failure to follow good management principles and Red Cross procedures that have caused a lot of waste, to criminal activity."

He said the organization would do everything in its power to hold wrongdoers accountable. "We need to bring this through to the proper and right conclusion," he said. "We owe that to donors and the people who needed our services."

Among the specific problems identified by volunteers were the disappearance of rented cars, generators and some 3,000 of 9,000 air mattresses donated by a private company, as well as the unauthorized possession of Red Cross computer equipment that could be used to add money to debit cards and manipulate databases.

Mr. McGuire said the investigation was being conducted by a team from the Red Cross ethics and compliance department. Because the inquiry is continuing, he said that he could not respond to specific accusations. When it is completed, he said, any finding of criminal activity will be turned over to the law enforcement authorities.

A telephone call to the attorney general's office in Louisiana was not returned, and there was no response to an e-mail message to an official in the Department of Homeland Security who had been contacted by a volunteer looking into the accusations several months ago at the request of the Red Cross.

In interviews over the last two weeks, more than a dozen Red Cross volunteers from around the country described an organization that had virtually no cost controls, little oversight of its inventory and no mechanism for basic background checks on volunteers given substantial responsibility.

Though there was little direct evidence of criminal activity, the volunteers said the magnitude of the missing goods had convinced them that Red Cross operations were being manipulated for private gain.

"I can't find any other reason for what was going on," said Anne Tolmachoff, a volunteer from Louisiana. "Otherwise, it just didn't make any sense."

While the Red Cross has drawn harsh criticism for failures in responding to Hurricane Katrina and for failing to address longstanding governance problems, the concerns raised by volunteers pose new questions about the organization's ability to prevent fraud and theft and protect its resources amid the chaos of a major disaster.

Senator Grassley has threatened to rewrite or revoke the organization's charter if it does not thoroughly overhaul its operations. This is the second time Mr. Grassley has prodded the Red Cross to get its house in order. He first made demands after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, but his effort sputtered as a result of other pressing matters, like the war in Iraq.

"The allegations from Red Cross volunteers are wide-ranging and include possible criminal misconduct," said Mr. Grassley, who in February demanded to know what the Red Cross was doing to address complaints from volunteers. "The Red Cross needs to change its mind-set so it addresses volunteers' concerns swiftly and appropriately, regardless of whether a Senate committee chairman is asking questions."

In one case cited by volunteers, a kitchen manager swapped 300 prepared meals for parking spaces for Red Cross emergency response vehicles without creating any record of the transaction.

"When a swap takes place, those products become untraceable," said Jerome H. Nickerson Jr., a Maryland lawyer who in mid-November was assigned by the Red Cross, as a volunteer, to look into accusations of theft and fraud in the disaster area. "It's the disaster relief equivalent of money laundering."

Mr. Nickerson and his partner in the inquiry, Michael A. Wolters, a security guard from Wisconsin who uncovered wrongdoing during an earlier three-week tour in Texas shortly after Hurricane Katrina, filed a report on Dec. 5 with the safety and security division at Red Cross headquarters. In it, they cited "a breathtaking systematic failure" by senior managers to enforce inventory control procedures and "outright contempt for well-established internal fiscal controls."

But they said the report had been ignored until a reporter for The New York Times began speaking with other volunteers who had seen similar questionable actions.

Mr. McGuire said the organization had pursued every tip about potential wrongdoing and noted that it had an internal hot line, called Concerned Connection, that volunteers could use.

"The vast majority are misconceptions or cases of 'I don't like somebody, so I'm going to say something,' " he said. "The key for us is to know whether we've got a problem in the Red Cross system and procedures, whether we've got well-intentioned people who just wasted stuff or whether we have a criminal problem."

Still, several volunteers said Red Cross managers in the disaster area had pooh-poohed their concerns and intervened to prevent them from documenting the problems they had encountered.

Willie A. Taylor, a volunteer from Michigan who owns a computer business, said he was part of a team that was asked to use a computer system to track every item from the time it was ordered until it was delivered to the end user.

He said the program revealed that roughly half of the "greenies," the requisition forms used to track supplies as they move through the system, could not be reconciled, meaning the supplies could not be accounted for.

"They asked me to do this," Mr. Taylor said, "we came up with a bulletproof process — and then they squashed it when it showed how big the problem was."

Mr. Taylor and others said they suspected that some volunteers were manipulating the flaws in the distribution system for their own benefit.

The Red Cross had 235,000 volunteers working in the hurricane disaster area, more than five times the previous peak of 40,000, and the sheer number wreaked havoc with the normal vetting process, the volunteers said.

For instance, the Red Cross prohibits anyone with a criminal record from working in a disaster area. "We do background checks on our D.S.H.R. volunteers," Mr. McGuire said, referring to the Disaster Services Human Resources division. "But we did not do them on some of our spontaneous volunteers."

Several of those volunteers had criminal records. For example, a volunteer working in the security unit in Baton Rouge, La., Kathleen Collins-Fowler, reported on Nov. 7 that the authorities in New York had issued an arrest warrant for Joe Tominaro, a volunteer then working in New Orleans, on grand larceny charges. According to New York State Department of Corrections records, Mr. Tominaro has twice served prison time for car theft and possession of stolen goods and is on parole.

Yet he signed on as a Red Cross volunteer and opened a distribution center in Marrero, La., without authorization from the Red Cross logistics division, which is in charge of such matters.

He then rang up a $17,936 bill installing eight industrial fans and an evaporative cooler and moving the cooler a week later to another wall. He was given at least $800 in cash and more than $2,000 was loaded onto his staff debit card, according to records included in Mr. Nickerson's and Mr. Wolters's report. The Red Cross gave him 11 cellphones and two automobiles while he was in the disaster area, even though New York had revoked his license.

Mr. Tominaro did not respond to an e-mail message sent to an address listed on his volunteer records.

On Nov. 2, two volunteers reported their concerns about Mr. Tominaro to Gary Niki, a senior official in the security and safety department at headquarters.

A day later, Ms. Collins-Fowler reported, Mr. Niki ordered that Mr. Tominaro's staff card remain active until further notice. It was suspended, however, on Nov. 7.

Another volunteer falsely passed himself off as a New York City police officer, a criminal offense, and was buying equipment for local law enforcement officials using his staff card, according to the report.

Volunteers said the breadth of the misallocation of supplies made them suspect foul play. Every volunteer interviewed had an example of supplies appearing in places where they were not needed or where the distribution point seemed to be ad hoc.

For instance, Robert M. Cooke, a volunteer serving as bulk distribution manager, was baffled to find industrial-size cans of diced chicken at a middle school in New Orleans.

Mr. Cooke said the school was not an official distribution site and the neighborhood around the school lacked utility service, so the likely recipients of the chicken would have no way to cook it, let alone store such large quantities.

"Those cans were supposed to go to Red Cross kitchens, where they could be properly cooked and prepared," he said.

Mr. Taylor similarly was puzzled by the distribution of supplies in Cameron Parish when he was in charge of bulk distribution. "We were giving out bleach, paper towels and mops, but the houses there were devastated," he said. "We should have been giving out wheelbarrows, hacksaws and other repair equipment."

Moreover, Mr. Taylor said, volunteers at the site did not seem to know who the recipients were. "People were driving up and picking up stuff and driving off, and my question was, how do you know that these people live in this area and need what you're giving them?" he said. "They basically shrugged at me."

Mr. Taylor and Mr. Cooke, who do not know each other, said the scope of the disaster, as well as poor training of the volunteers, explained some but not all of the problems they saw.

"It's a really bad system, of course, because you couldn't account for everything, but there was some funny stuff going on, too," Mr. Taylor said. "People were definitely taking advantage of the huge flaws in accountability."

Mired In Diplo-Gobbledygook (WP)

By Al Kamen

DOJ_NMG_0020626

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

For many of us, diplo-speak is merely jargon-laden, meaningless or gibberish. And that's even when the individual words are actually in English.

But things became worse than usual last week when some Capitol Hill types received a letter from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urging lawmakers to "support . . . legislative changes that would broaden and deepen our emerging strategic partnership with India."

During President Bush 's trip to India, she wrote, the two countries "agreed to work cooperatively in areas as diverse as agriculture, defense, health . . . and enhanced defense cooperation." But the "major achievement" was the "historic agreement on civil nuclear cooperation," she said, attaching a 21-page electronic file explaining the "many benefits for the United States."

The "nukes for mangos" agreement has sparked intense and bipartisan condemnation. For example, former GOP presidential candidate Patrick J. Buchanan said that "the U.S. negotiators capitulated to all of India's demands, lest Bush leave New Delhi with nothing to show for a trip halfway around the world but an agreement to import mangos." (Buchanan apparently is unaware of how incredibly tasty those Indian mangos are.) Former senator Sam Nunn (D-Ga.) said the agreement "certainly does not curb in any way the proliferation of weapons-grade nuclear material." Others claimed the deal undermines the Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Not at all, Rice wrote the lawmakers. "This is a strong net gain for our non-proliferation agenda." Then there was this on Page 20:

Segiphu $lvndgh? Well. Can't argue with that.Win-Win Situation?

The Bush folks have always been keen on family values. Now the Houston Chronicle reports that former first lady Barbara Bush donated a chunk of money -- it's unknown how much -- to the Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund "with specific instructions that the money be spent with an educational software company owned by her son Neil."

"Since then, the Ignite Learning program has been given to eight [Houston] area schools that took in substantial numbers of Hurricane Katrina evacuees," the Chronicle reported Wednesday.

"Mrs. Bush wanted to do something specifically for education and specifically for the thousands of students flooding into the Houston schools," Jean Becker , President George H.W. Bush 's chief of staff, told the paper. She knew that the Houston school district "was using this software program, and she's very excited about this program, so she wanted to make it possible for them to expand the use of this program."

Unclear how the charitable deduction works out on this fine move.Bush Q&Praise

President Bush , who's been touting his Iraq policy across the country this week, "is at his best when he's answering real and difficult questions from a cross section of Americans," White House communications director Nicolle Wallace said a few days ago.

So some congressional Democrats were wondering whether his Q&A on Wednesday in Wheeling, W.Va., must have shown him at his worst.

"I thank God that you're our commander in chief," one questioner began. "You're a man for our times. . . . And I'm a supporter of yours. . . . And God bless you, and I thank you for your service."

Then another hardball from the audience: "Do you like living in the White House?"

Another listener fired: "I want to let you know that every service at our church, you are by name lifted up in prayer -- and you and your staff and all of our leaders. And we believe in you. We are behind you. And we cannot thank you enough for what you've done to shape our country. . . ."

Bush was earning his salary that day.

WAR NEWS:

Battle Looms Over Use Of Prewar Iraq Intelligence (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The long-simmering battle over the Bush administration's use of prewar Iraq intelligence is about to flare again.

Republicans controlling the congressional investigation say they will finish by next week a spate of reports on how the White House used intelligence headed into the March 2003 invasion of Iraq. They will include topics like predictions before the war on how a post-Saddam Iraq might look and whether the Bush administration was duped by Iraqis with a vested interest in war, like Deputy Prime Minister Ahmed Chalabi.

But they have set no timetable for issuing reports on their probe into what some Democrats consider the most explosive questions: Whether political appointees at the Pentagon deliberately distorted intelligence and subverted analysis by the Central Intelligence Agency to gin up support for the invasion.

"There were a lot of mistakes in the lead-up to the war, and if we don't look at all the issues we won't get a complete picture of what happened," says Wendy Morigi, a spokeswoman for the vice chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Democratic Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia. "The role of the former Undersecretary of Defense's office is an area of concern."

Some people familiar with the Senate investigation say politics may overshadow substance on the matter. "I think people will be surprised when these things come out because the buildup has been made that there's some smoking gun," says William Duhnke, Republican staff director of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence. "This has all outstripped the reality."

Last fall, Democrats briefly shut down the Senate amid protests that the majority party was delaying the intelligence investigation. This year, they are gearing up to make it an issue in the November elections -- and an argument for changing control of Congress to bring about tougher oversight of the Bush administration's intelligence activities. Democrats' ability to subpoena current and former Bush administration officials, as well as gain access to many still-classified documents, they say, could significantly change future intelligence investigations.

"There's so much that still needs to come out," says Maurice Hinchey, a Democratic Congressman from New York who has sought for months to force the White House to release documents related to prewar intelligence. "A change in either house could completely change the nature of the game."

Even before U.S. forces toppled Saddam Hussein in March 2003, some critics said the White House tried to justify the invasion by distorting the magnitude of Iraq's weapons programs and alleged ties to the al Qaeda terrorist network. That June, the Senate Intelligence Committee initiated its first review of the U.S. government's pre-Iraq war intelligence activities, with a focus on the "quantity and quality" of the intelligence gathered by U.S. agencies. The report, completed a year later, absolved the White House of seeking to influence or distort information gathering on Iraq.

The Senate Intelligence panel, however, decided to widen the original investigation to focus more on how the White House used the intelligence, rather than just how it was collected. Democrats originally sought to complete the Phase II probe before the 2004 presidential election, but the pace has been slowed by disagreements between the parties over the scope and mechanics of the five-part study.

Democrats have criticized the Intelligence Committee's chairman, Kansas Republican Pat Roberts, who also is being accused of blocking calls for a congressional probe into the White House's domestic-wiretapping program, which President Bush confirmed late last year.

In announcing last week his timetable for completing the next series of reports, Mr. Roberts took some shots at his opponents. "Much has been said over the last few months about the committee's progress on Phase II," he said. "Notwithstanding the minority's public cries of 'delay,' Phase II has been ongoing, ..." he added.

The three near-completed studies, he said, focus on the Bush administration's use of intelligence provided by an Iraqi exile group, Mr. Chalabi's Iraqi National Congress; postwar findings on prewar assessments of Iraq's alleged WMD program and terrorism links; and prewar assessments about postwar Iraq's political and security environment.

Sen. Roberts's office says a fourth section also is imminent, comparing whether statements by President Bush and other senior U.S. officials about Iraq's WMD programs and alleged links to al Qaeda heading into the war were supported by U.S. intelligence.

But Mr. Roberts didn't offer a timetable for completing the fifth and final section of the investigation, which looks into activities before the war by the office of former Undersecretary of Defense for Policy Douglas Feith.

Former Bush administration officials say Mr. Feith's office circulated reports that overstated the links between Mr. Hussein and al Qaeda. Mr. Feith's office also faces questions about whether it subverted proper intelligence-gathering channels by engaging in activities normally conducted by the CIA.

A number of officials who worked on assembling intelligence on Iraq before the war say Mr. Feith's operations at the Pentagon were important in shaping the debate on Iraq. They said the office had strong links to the White House and the Office of the Vice President and that it could set an extremely aggressive tone on the question of whether Mr. Hussein had a relationship with al Qaeda, even if the facts didn't necessarily support the claims.

"What the operation under Feith was doing was trying to collate anything that showed a link" between Baghdad and al Qaeda, says Paul Pillar, who served as the CIA's National Intelligence Officer for the Near East and South Asia during the first Bush term. Mr. Pillar recently accused the White House of skewing intelligence reporting on Iraq to justify the invasion. "They'd disregard everything that came from other sources. It was just a matter of collecting and sifting," he says.

Mr. Feith said yesterday that charges his office had engaged in improper intelligence activities were groundless. "My office did not engage in intelligence collection. ... The intelligence we used came from the intelligence community itself," he said. He added that his office rigorously vetted information that both the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence and a White House-sponsored panel investigating intelligence failures called for.

Democrats have been pushing for the Senate's Intelligence Committee to do an independent study of Mr. Feith's operations; the Pentagon's Inspector General currently is conducting an internal review of them. Sen. Roberts and Republicans have decided to defer to the Pentagon's internal report before further investigation. The Pentagon review began in November, but a spokesman for the Inspector General said he could offer no time frame for its completion.

Communication Breakdown (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Now it gets painful for George W. Bush. Iraq is wrapped around his presidency as tightly as Vietnam was around Lyndon Johnson's. Bush keeps telling the country he has a plan for victory, but the polls suggest the public doesn't believe it. Those big "Plan for Victory" signs at his rally in Wheeling, W.Va., this week read more like an exhortation than a statement of fact.

Bush has lacked the tragic sensibility found in many of our great presidents. He works so hard at his show of easy informality that you rarely sense the inner man and the anguish that must be there. Watching him, you know he's wound tight even as he tries to act loose. The locker-room nicknames and the exaggerated Texas mannerisms are part of the enforced informality. The longer he stays in Washington, the more pronounced his Texas manner of droppin' his g's. It's a kind of camouflage, but it's wearing thin. This is not a president at ease.

When Bush speaks about the struggle of his presidency, it sometimes sounds as if he's talking to the mirror. Take this week's long, thinking-out-loud news conference: "I believe that my job is to go out and explain to people what's on my mind. That's why I'm having this press conference, see? I'm telling you what's on my mind. And what's on my mind is winning the war on terror." He's ready to lead, he insists; he has made a vow to the American people. To whom are these comments directed, if not himself?

The polls suggest that Bush is losing the ability to communicate effectively about the issue that matters most to him. He has a better story on Iraq than many people seem to appreciate: Iraqi politicians are in fact coming together toward a government of national unity; Iraqi troops are improving their performance; substantial reductions in the number of U.S. troops are likely this year. But to many Americans, judging by the polls, Bush's assertions sound like a broken record. His optimism comes across as happy talk.

Bush works hard to disguise it, but one senses the same inner conflict that afflicted Johnson as Vietnam began to go bad. In "The Best and the Brightest," David Halberstam described LBJ's torment: "He was a good enough politician to know what had gone wrong and what he was in for and what it meant to his dreams, but he could not turn back, he could not admit that he had made a mistake. He could not lose and thus he had to plunge forward." But, recalls Halberstam, "instead of leading, he was immobilized, surrounded, seeing critics everywhere."

It's a dangerous situation. If Bush loses his ability to convince the country that his war aims make sense, America may be forced into a hasty withdrawal that will have devastating repercussions. To avoid this outcome and maintain its strategy of a measured handoff to Iraqi forces, the administration must bridge what in Johnson's day was known as the "credibility gap." Bush could shake up his team and add new voices that can speak more convincingly to the public. Or he could reach out to moderate Democrats who support a bipartisan foreign policy, if there are any who haven't been chased off by Karl Rove. Or he could give a larger communications role to the uniformed military. The generals won't like being political frontmen, but they may prefer it to a collapse of support for the war.

On my most recent trip to Iraq, I took along a short book titled "Every War Must End," written in the 1970s by Fred Ikle, who later became a defense official in the Reagan administration. It's a haunting book, whose basic message is that starting wars is far easier than stopping them. "Cutting one's losses, although a common notion in everyday life, appears to be a particularly difficult decision for a government to reach in seeking to end a prolonged and unsuccessful war," Ikle wrote.

Ask senior military commanders what they think about Bush and they will tell you they love his toughness -- but wish the White House could communicate its Iraq strategy better. Bush has tried. All the speeches and rallies and white papers of the past few months have reflected a recognition that the public will support the war so long as it feels there is a coherent strategy for victory. That's why you hear the phrase "plan for victory" repeated so often, like a mantra to convince the public that American soldiers aren't dying in a lost cause.

But it's not working, and the president owes it to the troops, above all, to figure out a better way to communicate.

In Charge, Except They're Not (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Is President Bush the leader of our government, or is he just a right-wing talk-show host?

The question comes to mind after Bush's news conference this week in which he sounded like someone who has no control over the government he is in charge of. His words were those of a pundit inveighing against the evils of bureaucrats.

"Obviously," said the critic in chief, "there are some times when government bureaucracies haven't responded the way we wanted them to, and like citizens, you know, I don't like that at all." Yes, and if you can't do something about it, who can?

Bush went on: "I mean, I think, for example, of the trailers sitting down in Arkansas. Like many citizens, they're wondering why they're down there, you know. How come we've got 11,000?"

Bush was talking about 10,777 mobile homes ordered up to provide housing for the victims of Hurricane Katrina. As Rep. Mike Ross put it in an interview, most of these "brand-new, fully furnished homes are sitting in a hay meadow in Hope, Arkansas," and are "a symbol of what's wrong with this administration and what's wrong with FEMA."

Ross, a Democrat whose district includes that hay meadow, has been running a one-man crusade since December to get the homes moved to where they could actually provide shelter for those left homeless by the storm. The Federal Emergency Management Agency let the homes sit there because its regulations don't permit the use of such structures in a flood plain.

That raises at least two questions: Why did FEMA spend anywhere from $300 million to $430 million -- the numbers are in dispute -- to buy homes that didn't meet its own regulations? Alternatively, why can't it alter its regulations at least temporarily to use the homes where they are desperately needed?

Nearly three months after Ross first complained about the homes sitting in the field -- and nearly six weeks after Fox News reported the story and CNN broadcast an extensive account -- Bush seemed perplexed. He insisted that he was asking Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to get to the bottom of the deal.

"So I've asked Chertoff to find out," Bush said. "What are you going to do with them? I mean, the taxpayers aren't interested in 11,000 trailers just sitting there. Do something with them. And so I share that sense of frustration when a big government is unable to, you know -- sends wrong signals to taxpayers. But our people are good, hardworking people."

Hold on: The president of the United States runs the "big government" he's attacking. This is mysterious. If Bush's "good, hardworking people" aren't responsible for the problem, the villains of the piece must be alien creatures created by some strange beast called Big Government.

Ross reports that 300 of the homes were finally moved last month and that 5,000 are supposed to be moved soon to Katrina victims. That still leaves a lot of homes. FEMA has said they will be stored for future disasters.

This episode is important because it is representative of a corrosive style of politics. Bush and many of his fellow Republicans have done a good business over the years running against the ills of Big Government. They are so much in the habit of trashing government that even when they are in charge of things -- remember, Republicans have controlled the White House and both houses of Congress for all but 18 months since 2001 -- they pretend they are not.

And when their own government fails, they turn around and use their incompetence to argue that government can never work anyway, so you might as well keep electing conservatives to have less government. It's an ideological Catch-22. Even their failures prove they are right.

On the same day Bush was pushing off accountability for the mobile home fiasco, another politician was giving his voters some very bad news -- and taking responsibility for fixing the problem.

Gov. Jon Corzine of New Jersey announced that his state's fiscal situation was a mess, and he proposed a budget that simultaneously raised taxes, cut programs and walked away from some of his own campaign promises. "New Jerseyans believe that telling the truth is always better than hiding from it, even when it hurts," said Corzine, a Democrat. "And boy, does this budget hurt."

I'll leave it to New Jersey's budget experts to parse the details of Corzine's fiscal plan. But it's definitely bracing when a politician skips all the rhetoric about big or small government and just tries to fix the thing.

Of Course It's A Civil War (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Today's big debate over Iraq seems to be: Is there or is there not a civil war? Yes, say the defeatists, citing former prime minister Ayad Allawi, a man with an ax to grind against the current (elected) government, which excluded him.

No, not really, not yet, not quite, say U.S. officials and commanders, as well as Iraq's president, also hardly the most neutral of observers.

This debate appears to be important because the perception that there has been an outbreak of civil war following the Samarra bombing pushed some waverers to jump ship on their support for the war. Most famous of these is William F. Buckley Jr., who after Samarra declared that it is time for "the acknowledgment of defeat." Defeat? Yes, because of the inability of the Iraqi people to "suspend internal divisions" to allow a new democratic order to emerge.

This whole debate about civil war is surreal. What is the insurgency if not a war supported by one (minority) part of Iraqi society fighting to prevent the birth of the new Iraqi state supported by another (majority) part of Iraqi society?

By definition that is civil war, and there's nothing new about it. As I noted here in November 2004: "People keep warning about the danger of civil war. This is absurd. There already is a civil war. It is raging before our eyes. Problem is, only one side" -- the Sunni insurgency -- "is fighting it."

Indeed, until very recently that has been the case: ex-Baathist insurgents (aided by the foreign jihadists) fighting on one side, with the United States fighting back in defense of a new Iraq dominated by Shiites and Kurds.

Now all of a sudden everyone is shocked to find Iraqis going after Iraqis. But is it not our entire counterinsurgency strategy to get Iraqis who believe in the new Iraq to fight Iraqis who want to restore Baathism or impose Taliban-like rule? Does not everyone who wishes us well support the strategy of standing up the Iraqis so we can stand down? And does that not mean getting the Iraqis to fight the civil war themselves?

Hence the gradual transfer of war-making responsibility. Hence the decline of American casualties. Hence the rise of Iraqi casualties.

What we don't want to see is the private militias taking the law into their own hands. The army, by all accounts, has remained cohesive, with relatively good discipline. The problem is the police forces, which have been infiltrated by some of the Mahdi Army and other freelance Shiite vigilantes.

We cannot allow parts of the police apparatus to become instruments of Moqtada al-Sadr or other private interests. And not just because they act viciously and vindictively but also because their insubordination and independence are a threat to the very stability of the new Iraqi state.

But let's put this in perspective. First, this kind of private revenge attack has been going on at a low level since the beginning of the insurgency. Second, it does have the effect of concentrating Sunni minds on the price of their continuing support for the random, large-scale and heretofore unanswered slaughter of Shiites that they either actively or passively support.

And, third, if the private militias are the problem, it is a focused and relatively narrow problem. Creating discipline and central control over the security services is a more manageable issue than all-out Hobbesian conflict.

The principal issue, and measure of our success, is the shaping of disciplined and effective security forces. And that is why the political negotiations that have been dragging on are so critical. It is the political track that must secure leadership for both the defense and interior ministries that is nonsectarian and committed to a unitary force whose members do not answer to private warlords.

Civil wars are not eternal. This war will end not with an Appomattox instrument of surrender. It will end when a critical mass of Sunnis stops supporting the insurgency and throws its lot in with the new Iraq.

How does this happen? The stick is military -- the increased cost in Sunni blood of continuing the fight. But the carrot is political -- a place at the table for those Sunnis, some of whom are represented in parliament, who are prepared to abandon the insurgency for a share of power, a share of oil income, and a sense of security and dignity in the new Iraq.

This is doable. That is not to say it will be done. It is to say that those who have decided that because of "civil war" it cannot be done have been unreasonably panicked by something that has been with us all along.

Iraq A Foolish Act Or Chance For Freedom? (USAT)

What people are saying about third anniversary of Iraq war:

The San Francisco Bay Guardian, in an editorial: "The air of unreality in Washington, D.C., is, well, unreal. ... Vice President Cheney proclaimed that the war in Iraq is going well, that the insurgency had reached 'a stage of desperation' — and that the prediction that Americans would be greeted as liberators was 'basically accurate.' There's no civil war, the administration insists, no catastrophic political failure, no evidence that the war is well on its way to becoming the new Vietnam (War). No, Cheney insists, the problem is just the overcritical news media. For the record, more than 2,300 (U.S.) soldiers are dead. So are as many as 37,000 Iraqis. Countless more have been maimed, lost limbs, seen their lives destroyed. And three years after the invasion, there is no end in sight. ... And (President) Bush's insistence on staying the course is starting to sound like Richard Nixon's secret plan to end the Vietnam War."

The Wall Street Journal, in an editorial: "The third anniversary of U.S. military action to liberate Iraq has brought with it a relentless stream of media and political pessimism that is unwarranted by the facts and threatens to become a self-fulfilling prophesy if it goes unchallenged. ... One doesn't have to be a dreamy-eyed optimist about democracy to recognize that toppling Saddam Hussein was a milestone in slowing the spread of (weapons of mass destruction). ... The Middle East is now undergoing a political evolution in which the clear majority, even if skeptical of U.S. motives, agrees with the goal of more democracy and accountable government. ... But the desire among so many of our political elites to repudiate Bush and his foreign policy is creating a dangerous public pessimism that could yet lead to defeat — a defeat whose price would be paid by all Americans, and for years to come."

Portsmouth (N.H.) Herald, in an editorial: "For Iraq to truly succeed, we need to be committed to full-scale nation-building, but we do not have the resources, troops or finances to make it happen. And there's certainly no political will to do this mission on anything but the cheap. We have in one sense won the military portion of this struggle, but it's a Pyrrhic victory at best — nation-building depends on dealing with deep-seated cultural, political, social and economic tensions, and this administration has proven itself consistently incompetent in dealing with those realities."

Dan Darling, counterterrorism consultant for the Manhattan Institute's Center for Policing Terrorism, writing online for The Weekly Standard magazine: "When the Iraqi regime collapsed in April 2003, few observers saw reason to mourn the loss of Saddam's brutal dictatorship. While a great deal of information about the former Iraqi regime's assorted atrocities has been uncovered since the invasion, newly released documents go even further in demonstrating its manifest depravity. ... It is important that we enumerate the atrocities carried out under Saddam's auspices. Those who died at the hands of his regime deserve nothing less."

The Albuquerque Tribune, in an editorial: "It is time for those symbolic Iraqi purple fingers of democracy to become Iraqi trigger fingers. There simply is no way around the blunt fact that the Iraqi people now must assume responsibility for their own security. What happens from here is up to them, not us. ... We must all agree that the fight for Iraq is no longer ours to win or lose. ... It's not our country. It's theirs. If it is to survive as a democracy, Iraqis will have to fight for their country, their families and themselves. ... If democracy is to be born in the Islamic Middle East, in Iraq, it must be midwifed by the Iraqi people, because they want it — more than anything, more even than life itself for some who, like their American benefactors, surely will have to pay the ultimate price. Freedom is not cheap. Too many Americans already have paid the price for it on behalf of the Iraqi people. We wish the Iraqis well. But it is time to find out if the Iraqi people are willing to pay that price themselves. It is their country to rule by the vote or to lose to tyranny."

Rumsfeld Vows Iraq Drawdown Will Continue (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said yesterday that commanders are planning further troop reductions in Iraq despite ongoing violence that has killed hundreds of civilians after the February bombing of the Shi'ite Golden Mosque.

Asked about President Bush's remark Tuesday that U.S. troops will be in Iraq until at least 2009, the year he leaves office, Mr. Rumsfeld said there could still be Americans training the Iraqi security forces (ISF). It was a clear signal that the defense secretary expects that by that time the United States' combat role will be greatly reduced.

Mr. Bush provided no context for his remark about troops in Iraq in 2009, leaving some with the impression that substantial cuts will not happen, as commanders have promised. And it stirred more complaints from Democrats that the administration is not shifting anti-insurgent responsibilities from Americans to Iraqi combatants fast enough.

Mr. Rumsfeld's careful remarks yesterday seemed designed to reset the debate to an assumption of gradual troop cuts that began in January, if conditions permit.

"I would anticipate, as we've said, that as the Iraqi security forces continue to take over more and more responsibility, we'll continue to reduce down our forces, and that any stress on the force would be eased rather than increased," he told reporters at the Pentagon.

Pressed about the Bush prediction, he said, "We may be helping to train and equip some forces in Iraq in 2009. Are we making plans to do that? We're making plans to assist the Iraqis and the Afghans in training and equipping their forces so that they can take over the responsibility. And as the president said, it's conditions-based. I'm not going to get into speculating about specific numbers or on specific dates."

There are about 133,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, down from 160,000 during the December parliamentary elections. Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq, said in late December that the level should be down to about 130,000 by the end of this month. He is contemplating further cuts this year, depending on the maturation of the Iraqi forces, which stand at about 270,000 personnel.

Mr. Rumsfeld added, "We anticipate that they'll go down. And the reason we anticipate they'll go down is because we think the government will be formed, and it will meet with reasonable acceptance and that the Iraqi security forces will continue to be performing well and that we will continue to pass over battle space, bases and responsibility to the Iraqi security forces."

In Baghdad, Army Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch tried to dispel various reports that stepped-up sectarian violence has plunged Iraq into total chaos.CQ He said al Qaeda in Iraq, led by Jordanian-born Abu Musab Zarqawi, continues to try to provoke a civil war by killing civilians. The Feb. 22 bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra triggered much of the recent killings.

But "there is not widespread violence across Iraq," Gen. Lynch said. "There is not. Seventy-five percent of the attacks still take place in Baghdad, Al Anbar [in the west] or Salahuddin [north of Baghdad]. And in the other 15 provinces, they all average less than six attacks a day, and 12 of those provinces average less than two attacks a day. So the idea that Baghdad is the center of gravity for the enemy's operations is indeed a valid idea, but the concern that all of Iraq is experiencing widespread violence is incorrect."

Mr. Rumsfeld, a member of Mr. Bush's original Cabinet, continues to face questions from the press about whether he will continue in office, despite repeated endorsements from the president. Some Democrats periodically call on him to resign for what they say was botched war planning.

Yesterday, a reporter quoted a column from New York Times pundit Maureen Dowd, who regularly expresses disdain for Mr. Bush. She wrote that Mr. Rumsfeld no longer carries the clout he once did.

"If you believe everything you read in Maureen Dowd, you better get a life," Mr. Rumsfeld responded.

Bush's Requests For Iraqi Base Funding Make Some Wary Of Extended Stay (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — Even as military planners look to withdraw significant numbers of American troops from Iraq in the coming year, the Bush administration continues to request hundreds of millions of dollars for large bases there, raising concerns over whether they are intended as permanent sites for U.S. forces.

Questions on Capitol Hill about the future of the bases have been prompted by the new emergency spending bill for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, which overwhelmingly passed the House of Representatives last week with $67.6 billion in funding for the war effort, including the base money.

Although the House approved the measure, lawmakers are demanding that the Pentagon explain its plans for the bases, and they unanimously passed a provision blocking the use of funds for base agreements with the Iraqi government.

"It's the kind of thing that incites terrorism," Rep. Ron Paul (R-Texas) said of long-term or permanent U.S. bases in countries such as Iraq.

Paul, a critic of the war, is co-sponsoring a bipartisan bill that would make it official policy not to maintain such bases in Iraq. He noted that Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden cited U.S. military bases in Saudi Arabia as grounds for the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

The debate in Congress comes as concerns grow over how long the U.S. intends to keep forces in Iraq, a worry amplified when President Bush earlier this week said that a complete withdrawal of troops from Iraq would not occur during his term.

Long-term U.S. bases in Iraq would also be problematic in the Middle East, where they could lend credence to charges that the U.S. motive for the invasion was to seize land and oil. And they could also feed debate about the appropriate U.S. relationship with Iraq after Baghdad's new government fully assumes control.

State Department and Pentagon officials have insisted that the bases being constructed in Iraq will eventually be handed over to the Iraqi government.

Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador to Baghdad, said on Iraqi television last week that the U.S. had "no goal of establishing permanent bases in Iraq."

And Pentagon spokesman Army Lt. Col. Barry Venable said, "We're building permanent bases in Iraq for Iraqis."

But the seemingly definitive administration statements mask a semantic distinction: Although officials say they are not building permanent U.S. bases, they decline to say whether they will seek a deal with the new Iraqi government to allow long-term troop deployments.

Asked at a congressional hearing last week whether he could "make an unequivocal commitment" that the U.S. officials would not seek to establish permanent bases in Iraq, Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the commander in charge of all U.S. forces in the Middle East and Central Asia, replied, "The policy on long-term presence in Iraq hasn't been formulated." Venable, the Pentagon spokesman, said it was "premature and speculative" to discuss long-term base agreements before the permanent Iraqi government had been put in place.

All told, the United States has set up 110 forward operating bases in Iraq, and the Pentagon says about 34 of them already have been turned over to the Iraqi government, part of an ongoing effort to gradually strengthen Iraqi security forces.

Bush is under political pressure to reduce the number of U.S. troops before midterm congressional elections, and the Pentagon is expected to decide soon whether the next major deployment will reflect a significant reduction in forces.

But despite the potential force reductions and the base handovers, the spending has continued.

Dov Zakheim, who oversaw the Pentagon's emergency spending requests as the department's budget chief until 2004, said critics might be reading too much into the costly emergency spending, needed to protect U.S. forces from insurgent attacks and provide better conditions for deployed troops.

The spending "doesn't necessarily connote permanence," Zakheim said. "God knows it's a tough enough environment anyway."

The bulk of the Pentagon's emergency spending for military construction over the last three years in Iraq has focused on three or four large-scale air and logistics bases that dot the center of the country.

The administration is seeking $348 million for base construction as part of its 2006 emergency war funding bill. The Senate has not yet acted on the request.

By far the most funding has gone to a mammoth facility north of Baghdad in Balad, which includes an air base and a logistics center. The U.S. Central Command said it intended to use the base as the military's primary hub in the region as it gradually hands off Baghdad airport to civilian authorities.

Through the end last year, the administration spent about $230 million in emergency funds on the Balad base, and its new request includes $17.8 million for new roads that can accommodate hulking military vehicles and a 12.4-mile-long, 13-foot-high security fence.

The nonpartisan Congressional Research Service noted in a report last year that many of the funds already spent, including for the facilities at Balad, suggested a longer-term U.S. presence.

Projects at the base include an $18-million aircraft parking ramp and a $15-million airfield lighting system that has allowed commanders to make Balad a strategic air center for the region; a $2.9-million Special Operations compound, isolated from the rest of the base and complete with landing pads for helicopters and airplanes, where classified payloads can be delivered; and a $7-million mail distribution building.

Other bases also are being developed in ways that could lend them to permanent use.

This year's request also includes $110 million for Tallil air base outside the southeastern city of Nasiriya, a sprawling facility in the shadow of the ruins of the biblical city of Ur. Only $11 million has been spent so far, but the administration's new request appears to envision Tallil as another major transportation hub, with new roads, a new dining hall for 6,000 troops — about two Army brigades — and a new center to organize and support large supply convoys.

The administration also has spent $50 million for Camp Taji, an Army base north of Baghdad, and $46.3 million on Al Asad air base in the western desert.

These large bases are being built at the same time that hundreds of millions of dollars are being spent on separate bases for the growing Iraqi military. According to the U.S. Central Command and data obtained from the Army Corps of Engineers, for example, about $165 million has been spent to build an Iraqi base near the southern town of Numaniya and more than $150 million for a northern base at the old Iraqi army's Al Kasik facility.

The big numbers have begun to cause consternation in congressional appropriations committees, which are demanding more accountability from Pentagon officials on military construction in the region.

The House Appropriations Committee approved the president's newest funding bill this month with a strongly worded warning. In a report accompanying the legislation, the committee noted that it had already approved about $1.3 billion in emergency spending for war-related construction, but that the recently declared "long war" on terrorism should allow more oversight of plans for bases in the region.

It "has become clear in recent years that these expeditionary operations can result in substantial military construction expenditures of a magnitude normally associated with permanent bases," the committee reported.

Rep. James T. Walsh (R-N.Y.), chairman of the House subcommittee that oversees military construction, said his panel was concerned that money the Pentagon was ostensibly seeking for short-term emergency needs actually was going to projects that were not urgent but long-term in nature.

Walsh pointed to a $167-million request to build a series of roads in Iraq that bypass major cities, a proposal the administration said was needed to decrease the convoys' exposure to roadside bombs, known as improvised explosive devices, or IEDs. Walsh's subcommittee cut the budget for the project to $60 million. He said the project sounded "more like road construction" than it did a strategy to protect troops from IEDs.

The Appropriations Committee also inserted a ban on spending any of the new money on facilities in Iraq until the U.S. Central Command submitted a master plan for bases in the region. Abizaid, in congressional testimony last week, said such a plan was in the process of getting final Pentagon approval for release to the committee. But he noted: "The master plan is fairly clear on everything except for Iraq and Afghanistan, which I don't have policy guidance for long term."

Without such detail, it might prove impossible for congressional appropriators to get a firm idea of how the administration views the future of the U.S. presence on big bases in Iraq.

In any event, said Zakheim, the former Pentagon budget officer, projects that expand bases' ability to handle American cargo and warplanes will eventually be of use to the Iraqi government.

"Just because the Iraqis don't have an air force now doesn't mean they won't have it several years down the road," he said.

But critics said it was all the more reason for the administration to stop being vague about the future.

"The Iraqis believe we came for their oil and we're going to put bases on top of their oil," said Rep. Tom Allen (D-Maine), a critic of the administration's approach. "As long as the vast majority of Iraqis believe we want to be there indefinitely, those who are opposed to us are going to fight harder and those who are with us are going to be less enthusiastic."

Times staff writer Doug Smith contributed to this report.

On the rise

Here are four of the bases in Iraq for which the Bush administration has planned upgrades. Money spent through 2005 was granted through emergency spending bills since 2003:

1. Al Asad air base

By some accounts the second largest military air center in Iraq and the main supply base for troops in Al Anbar Province, which includes the insurgent strongholds of Fallouja and Ramadi. It houses about 17,000 troops, including a large contingent of Marines.

Spending: Unknown*

Bush 2006 request: $46.3 million

2. Balad air base

The U.S. military's main air transportation and supply hub in Iraq, with two giant runways. Also known as Camp Anaconda, it is the largest support base in the country, with about 22,500 troops and several thousand contractors.

Spending: $228.7 million*

Bush 2006 request: $17.8 million.

3. Camp Taji

One of the largest facilities for U.S. ground forces in Iraq, the base also serves as home to about 15,000 Iraqi security forces. It has the largest military shopping center (PX) in the country.

Spending: $49.6 million*

Bush 2006 request: None

4. Tallil air base

DOJ_NMG_0020636

An increasingly important air and transportation hub, with a growing population of coalition troops and contractors. It has become a key stopping point for supply convoys moving north from Kuwait and is close to one of the Iraqi army's main training facilities.

Spending: $10.8 million*

Bush 2006 request: $110.3 million

Costs To Rebuild Shifting To Iraqis (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, March 24, 2006

BAGHDAD — The head of the U.S. program to rebuild Iraq said Thursday that the Iraqi government can no longer count on U.S. funds and must rely on its own money and cash from other Persian Gulf nations to complete the massive undertaking.

"The Iraqi government needs to build up its capability to do its own capital budget investment," Daniel Speckhard, director of the Iraq Reconstruction Management Office, told reporters.

Speckhard's remarks signal the unwinding of an extensive rebuilding campaign intended to stabilize Iraq and neutralize insurgents after the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. The $21 billion U.S.-funded program set out to fix or build schools, roads, clinics, ports, bridges, government offices, phone networks, power plants and water systems.

The program also was to train Iraqis in accounting, farming, teaching, nursing, banking and other areas.

Hundreds of projects have been completed, but the top U.S. auditor for the program has criticized it for cost overruns, corruption, understaffing and bureaucratic infighting. Stuart Bowen, special inspector general for Iraqi reconstruction, told Congress last month:

•Electrical capacity is below prewar levels.

•Only 49 of 136 planned water projects will be finished.

•300 of 425 electricity projects will be completed.

As much as $5.6 billion for projects was reallocated to tackle "security needs driven by a lethal and persistent insurgency," Bowen said.

U.S. reconstruction officials once aimed to create public-works jobs for 1.5 million Iraqis. The U.S. Agency for International Development said last week that 77,000 have been created.

Anthony Cordesman, a Middle East expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, called the U.S. plan "a dismal failure. It hasn't met any of its goals. It's left a legacy of half-built projects" that Iraq can't maintain.

Funding reconstruction will pose a huge challenge for Iraq. Its main revenue source — oil production — has been hurt by sabotage to key facilities.

Speckhard said "significant challenges remain." He said the rebuilding program sought to "kick-start the economy" and "lay a foundation" Iraq could build on with its own money, private investment and other international aid, particularly from the Gulf region.

Speckhard said per capita income has risen from $500 a year before the war to $1,200 today. He said Iraqis have started 30,000 businesses in the past year.

Iraq's deputy finance minister, Kamal Field al-Basri, said it was "reasonable" for the United States to cut funding for rebuilding after spending $21 billion. "We should be very much dependent on ourselves," al-Basri said in an interview. He said Iraq needs to increase its capacity to produce oil, which generates 93% of government's revenue, to pay for rebuilding.

The Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, a Washington defense-policy research group, said last month that Iraq has little oil revenue left after paying for day-to-day government operations, social services, security and repairs to oil infrastructure.

A Military Raid Frees 3 Hostages Held In Iraq (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 23 — Acting on a tip from a detainee, a multinational military force stormed a house in western Baghdad early Thursday and rescued two Canadians and a Briton who had been held hostage by a shadowy guerrilla group for four months.

James Loney, 41, and Harmeet Singh Sooden, 32, both from Canada, and Norman Kember, 74, from Britain, were discovered bound yet unguarded, officials reported. The three were whisked to the fortified Green Zone and debriefed by the authorities, officials said, but did not address the news media.

The men, all antiwar advocates working for Christian Peacemaker Teams, had been captured Nov. 26 along with an American colleague, Tom Fox, 54, of Clear Brook, Va., whose body was discovered March 9 wrapped in plastic and dumped on a trash pile in western Baghdad. Mr. Fox had been tortured, handcuffed and shot, the police said.

Thursday's rescue, by a force that included American and British troops, represented one of the few times that military action in Iraq has played a decisive role in a hostage release.

But within hours, a surge of four car bombings, including a suicide attack, struck Baghdad, killing at least 23 people, wounding at least 48 and tempering the military's euphoria from the morning's success.

The attacks followed five days in which there had been no incidents in the capital involving car bombs, or suicide bombs, according to a senior American military spokesman, who insisted that the relative lull was a result of expanded security operations.

But the convergence of the devastating attacks, coming in the span of about four hours, suggested that the guerrillas' ability to operate in the capital remained unfettered.

"As you're well aware, today he surged," acknowledged Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, the military spokesman, using his preferred pronoun to describe the amorphous insurgency. "He still has that capability."

Military commanders jealously guarded details of the morning's rescue, saying they did not want to compromise continuing operations.

General Lynch said a detainee captured Wednesday night had provided the authorities with information that guided them to the house where the three hostages were being held. The captives were found unguarded, their kidnappers having vanished, General Lynch said.

Jack Straw, the British foreign secretary, said that Mr. Kember was in "reasonable" condition but that the two Canadians had to be hospitalized.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper of Canada thanked American and British authorities for their "exceptional" role in the rescue. But he refused to confirm reports that Canadians took part in the operation, citing national security concerns despite, a statement by Mr. Straw thanking the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and "other agencies from Canada" for their role in the mission.

The rescue operation, while unusual, was not unprecedented. Last September, responding again to a tip from a detainee, American forces rescued two hostages, an American and an Iraqi, from an isolated farmhouse south of Baghdad. The American, Roy Hallums, had been working as a contractor for a Saudi company when he was kidnapped in 2004.

Last June, Iraqi troops raided a house in Baghdad and freed an Australian hostage, Douglas Wood, from nearly seven weeks of captivity. But according to some officials, the troops stumbled across Mr. Wood while on a routine search operation.

The Rev. Alan Betteridge, president of the Baptist Peace Fellowship and a friend of Mr. Kember's for more than 40 years, told the BBC that "it's tremendously good and so unexpected after the killing of Tom Fox a couple of weeks ago, when we really did fear that each one would be killed eventually."

Christian Peacemaker Teams — which is based in Chicago and Toronto and grew out of a collection of churches, including those of the Mennonites and the Quakers — sends groups of Christians to conflict zones to promote peace and human rights. The four advocates were captured while driving to meet with Sunni Arab leaders in western Baghdad.

The eruption of car bombings on Thursday began about 9 a.m., when a car exploded in Karada, an upscale neighborhood, as a police patrol passed by, an official with the Interior Ministry said. One civilian was wounded.

An hour later, someone set off a charge planted in a vehicle parked in the predominantly Sunni Arab neighborhood of Adhamiya, the official said. The explosion, which apparently was aimed at a passing police patrol, killed three policemen and wounded five others.

Around 11 a.m., a suicide bomber detonated a car packed with explosives at the entrance to the headquarters of the Interior Ministry's major crimes unit in central Baghdad, killing 10 policemen and 5 civilians and wounding 32 others, including policemen and civilians, the ministry official reported.

Five more people were killed and 10 wounded, according to the authorities, when a second car bomb exploded about 1:15 p.m. near an outdoor market and a Shiite mosque in western Baghdad.

U.S., British Forces Rescue Iraq Hostages (AP-Y2)

By Bassem Mroue

Without firing a shot, U.S. and British forces stormed a house Thursday and freed three Christian peace activists who were bound but unguarded, ending a four-month hostage ordeal that saw an American in the group killed and dumped along a railroad track.

The U.S. ambassador and the top American military spokesman held out hope the operation on the outskirts of Baghdad could lead to a break in the captivity of American reporter Jill Carroll, a freelance writer for The Christian Science Monitor who was abducted Jan. 7.

The military spokesman, Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, said the 8 a.m. rescue of the Briton and two Canadians from a "kidnapping cell" was based on information divulged by a man during interrogation only three hours earlier. The man was captured by U.S. forces on Wednesday night.

A senior Iraqi military officer told The Associated Press, however, that the operation had been under way for two days in the Abu Ghraib suburb west of Baghdad, site of the notorious prison. The officer, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of his position, said U.S. and British forces refused to give him other details.

Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper said Canadian forces also took part in the rescue operation, although their precise role was unclear.

But the joyful news was tempered by violence that raged throughout Iraq as the day wore on. Fifty-eight people were killed in execution-style slayings, bombings and gun battles. For the third straight day, Sunni insurgents hit a major police and jail facility — this time with a suicide car bombing that killed 25 in central Baghdad.

Lynch claimed a reinforced U.S. and Iraqi security presence in the capital had prevented car bombings on five recent consecutive days, but acknowledged that attacks "surged today."

No kidnappers were present when the troops broke into the house where the peace activists were discovered with their hands tied.

"They were bound, they were together, there were no kidnappers in the areas," Lynch told a news briefing.

The freed men were Canadians James Loney, 41, and Harmeet Singh Sooden, 32, and Briton Norman Kember, 74. The men — members of the Chicago-based Christian Peacemaker Teams — were kidnapped Nov. 26 along with an American colleague, Tom Fox, 54.

Fox's body was found this month, shot and dumped in western Baghdad.

"We remember with tears Tom Fox," group co-director Doug Pritchard said in Toronto. "We had longed for the day when all four men would be released together. Our gladness today is bittersweet by the fact that Tom is not alive to join his colleagues in the celebration."

The three freed members of Christian Peacemaker Teams were taken to a hospital for observation in Baghdad but were released in good condition, the organization said from the Iraqi capital.

British Embassy spokeswoman Lisa Glover said the men would be flown out of Baghdad in the next few days. She said Kember was in "reasonable condition" and spent the day "relaxing and talking to British authorities."

Kember's wife, Pat, said she had spoken with her husband on the phone.

"He was very, very pleased to be free, but he was very emotional in talking to me. I think he must be very worried about me and the family," she told New Zealand's Radio Live in an interview replayed by the British Broadcasting Corp.

Speaking from her north London home, she said his decision to go to Iraq was "a bit silly," but added "I knew that he felt he must do something and he's getting old, and if he (didn't) do something ... it would be too late."

Loney's brother, Ed, told CBC television that his mother had spoken with James on the phone and that he sounded "fantastic" though "he's lost quite a bit of weight."

"He's alert and he was asking how we were doing and said he was sorry for the whole situation," Ed Loney said. "My mom said, 'Don't worry about it — just get home and we'll talk about all that stuff when you get here.' "

He told CNN that he later spoke directly with his brother, who was "having a lovely chicken dinner with potatoes and a nice soup" and "told me about being rescued and seeing the light of day and smelling the outside air."

Ed Loney also said his brother told him he was well taken care of.

"He was always warm and always fed and things like that. He was more worried about boredom. ... I think that was probably the worst part of it, from what he said."

The Christian Peacemaker Teams volunteers have been in Iraq since October 2002, investigating allegations of abuse against Iraqi detainees by coalition forces. The group says its teams promote peaceful solutions in conflict zones.

Pritchard called for coalition forces to leave the country.

"We believe that the illegal occupation of Iraq by Multinational Forces is the root cause of the insecurity which led to this kidnapping and so much pain and suffering in Iraq," he said.

The kidnapped men were shown as prisoners in several videos, the most recent a silent clip dated Feb. 28 in which Loney, Kember and Sooden appeared without Fox, whose body was found March 10.

The previously unknown Swords of Righteousness Brigades claimed responsibility for the kidnappings.

"As we study who could conduct these kinds of operations there seems to be a kidnapping cell that has been robust over the last several months in conducting these kind of kidnappings," Lynch said.

While many insurgent groups and the al-Qaida in Iraq terrorist organization have kidnapped and often killed foreigners in Iraq, there also is a heavy criminal element involved in such crimes. Thousands of Iraqis have been kidnapped for ransom and some Westerners are believed to have been grabbed by those criminal gangs as well.

Often, it is believed, kidnappers take hostages only for the purposes of selling them into captivity to larger, more organized criminal gangs or insurgent organizations.

The last hostage to be freed in a military operation was Douglas Wood, an Australian rescued in west Baghdad by U.S. and Iraqi forces on June 15, 2005, after 47 days in captivity.

Lynch said there was no new information on Carroll that "I can discuss at this time." But, he said: "There are other operations that continue probably as a result of what we're finding at this time. So you've got to give us the opportunity to work through that."

Carroll has appeared in three videotapes delivered by her kidnappers to Arab television stations, and the deadline her captors set for killing her passed weeks ago without word about her fate.

"My expectation and hope is that the released hostages and the associated activities, in terms of information gathered, could help us bring about her release as well," U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said in an interview with Fox News.

Christian Peacemakers Celebrate Release (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, March 24, 2006

BAGHDAD - An anxious vigil turned to joy for Christian peace activists in Iraq Thursday, as three of their kidnapped colleagues were freed by US, British, and Iraqi forces west of Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0020640

"It's great to be free," Mr. Kember said, according to a British Embassy statement. "I'm looking forward to getting back to the UK."

The hostages' four-month ordeal ended without a shot being fired, as coalition forces pursued intelligence gained from a detainee. The three men - Briton Norman Kember and Canadians James Loney and Harmeet Singh Sooden of the Chicago-based Christian Peacemaker Teams (CPT) - were found alone and unguarded.

Concern for the Peacemakers' fate had mounted after the body of American Tom Fox, kidnapped with the others on Nov. 26 by a group calling itself the Swords of Righteousness Brigade, was found earlier this month.

"It's pretty momentous for us, because after Tom's death we heard nothing at all," says Maxine Nash of CPT in Baghdad. "Until that point, we had been very hopeful. Given who we are, we thought people would respect that and release people. That was our lowest point."

US military spokesman Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch said Thursday that coalition forces had acted within three hours of receiving "actionable intelligence" from a detainee about the hostages' location.

"From the time we found the intelligence to the time we released the hostages, was three hours," General Lynch said. The captives were bound, but "there were no kidnappers in the area."

Wire agencies reported Interior Ministry sources as saying that the captives were found northwest of Baghdad in an area known for insurgent activity.

British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said the operation was conducted after "weeks and weeks of very careful work." Defense chief John Reid said that British units "spearheaded" the operation.

"We had longed for the day when all four men would be released together," the CPT codirector Doug Pritchard said in Toronto. "Our gladness today is bittersweet due to the fact that Tom is not alive to join his colleagues in this celebration."

"They knew that their only protection was in the power of the love of God and of their Iraqi and international co-workers," Mr. Pritchard said. "We believe that the illegal occupation of Iraq by multinational forces is the root cause of the insecurity which led to this kidnapping, and so much pain and suffering in Iraq. The occupation must end."

Insurgents and gangs have kidnapped more than 250 foreigners - among them Jill Carroll, a freelance writer for The Christian Science Monitor, who began her 76th day of captivity Thursday. Thousands of Iraqis have been kidnapped, most for ransom; 40 foreign hostages have been killed.

Ms. Carroll's family said Thursday that they were "thrilled" to hear of the CPT members' release. "Although their case is unrelated to Jill's, their release gives us new hope that Jill, too, will soon be freed. We send our best wishes to these three men and their families, knowing that their reunion will be a joyful one." They added that "we are also thinking of the family of Tom Fox at this time and send them our heartfelt sympathy."

The release came on a violent day in Baghdad, with a string of bombs killing at least 33 people.

The CPT team was kidnapped while planning to visit the Muslim Scholars Association group, run by hard-line Sunni cleric Harith al-Dari. The kidnappers put out a video demanding that all prisoners be released by Dec. 8, or the captives would be killed.

A second video on Jan. 28 warned of a "last chance" and showed the wan hostages. A third video in March raised alarm because Mr. Fox was absent. His body was found three days later.

"When you don't know the 'why,' you start wondering, and that leads to other [negative] thoughts," says Ms. Nash. "So we are just so happy."

The Peacemaker Teams, in Iraq since October 2002, have continued their work during the past four months. All are aware of the risks. "We can't be peacemakers with half a heart," CPT member Cathy Breen told the BBC in Amman, Jordan. "We have to take risks."

Release Of Westerners In Iraq Is Bittersweet (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

DOJ_NMG_0020641

BAGHDAD — Aided by a tip from an Iraqi prisoner, a British-led military operation Thursday rescued three Westerners whose abductors had held them hostage since November, killed their American colleague, and finally left them tied up in an empty house.

No shots were fired and no kidnappers were present when a force of British, U.S. and Canadian troops raided the house on Baghdad's rural outskirts and found the three members of the Christian Peacemaker Teams organization in good condition, said Army Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, a U.S. military spokesman.

The activists — Norman Kember, 74, of Britain, and Canadians James Loney, 41, and Harmeet Singh Sooden, 32 — were seized by gunmen in Baghdad on Nov. 26 along with the American, Tom Fox, 54. The kidnappers demanded the release of all Iraqi prisoners.

Fox's body was found March 9, with multiple bullet wounds in the head and chest. The corpse had been left in a garbage dump near a railway line in a western neighborhood of the capital.

"We had longed for the day when all four men would be released together," said Doug Pritchard, Toronto-based codirector of the Christian Peacemaker Teams group, which describes its mission as reducing violence and protecting human rights in war zones. "Our gladness today is made bittersweet by the fact that Tom is not alive to join his colleagues in the celebration."

The news was also tempered by continuing insurgent bombings and sectarian killings that on Thursday left at least 56 Iraqis dead.

Kidnappings by insurgents and criminal gangs have plagued Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion three years ago to topple Saddam Hussein. At least 430 foreigners, including 41 U.S. citizens, have been taken hostage and seven are still being held, including Jill Carroll, an American freelance writer for the Christian Science Monitor who was abducted Jan. 7.

"We'll work as hard as we can to bring about the release of the remaining hostages," U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad told Fox News television channel.

He said the rescue of the activists, "in terms of information gathered, could help us bring about Miss Carroll's release as well."

The hostage rescue Thursday was the first brought about by a military operation in Iraq since June.

The mission, led by a British Special Air Services team, "follows weeks and weeks of very careful work by military and coalition personnel in Iraq and many civilians as well," British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said in London.

U.S. military spokesman Lynch, speaking to reporters in Baghdad, said the operation was put together in three hours after a prisoner being interrogated by American forces pinpointed the location of the hostages. Iraqi officials said it was a house on the capital's northwestern outskirts.

Lynch said he was reluctant to give details because "there are other operations that continue, probably as a result of what we're finding at this time."

The freed hostages were taken to the Green Zone, Baghdad's fortified administrative center, for hospital checkups followed by debriefings at the British Embassy, where they were expected to stay until leaving Iraq to rejoin their families.

"It's great to be free," Kember told his hosts, embassy spokeswoman Lisa Glover said.

"They looked good and told us they had not been abused or beaten," said Peggy Gish, who visited the men with two fellow Christian Peacemaker Teams activists still working in Iraq. She said the freed captives had lost weight after months of inadequate food.

Gish said the freed hostages told their colleagues Thursday that Fox had been separated from them in early February, about a month before his body was found. They did not learn of their American colleague's death until after their release, she said.

"They're dealing with that blow on top of all the emotion of being free," Gish said. "At this point, they're overwhelmed, trying to absorb what has happened."

She said the men's captors had held them together in a large room and sometimes allowed them to jog inside it for exercise. They were handcuffed and blindfolded part of the time, she said.

Loney's brother Ed said the activist told their mother by phone that he had lost 20 pounds in captivity.

DOJ_NMG_0020642

"She said he sounded fantastic," Ed Loney told CBC Radio. "He was alert and was asking how we were doing. He said he was kind of sorry about the whole situation."

Members of the organization, headquartered in Toronto and Chicago, have traveled to conflict zones across the world over the last 20 years, motivated by a religiously inspired belief in nonviolence.

In Iraq, they work with human rights organizations, investigating allegations of abuse against Iraqi detainees by U.S. and British forces, and help with cleanup and rebuilding efforts in war-torn cities.

Christian Peacemaker Teams has spoken out often against the U.S. and British military presence here. Even after those forces rescued its activists, the organization, in a statement, reiterated its belief that "the illegal occupation of Iraq by Multinational Forces is the root cause of the insecurity which led to this kidnapping and so much pain and suffering in Iraq."

The four men were abducted while driving to their headquarters after visiting Sunni Muslim clerics in Baghdad.

The Swords of Righteousness Brigade, a previously unknown group, announced it was holding the men. Although the kidnappers demanded freedom for prisoners, it was never clear to the authorities whether the group was a criminal gang or part of the anti-government insurgency.

The four men appeared as captives in several videos before the most recent one, a silent clip dated Feb. 28, showed Loney, Kember and Sooden without Fox.

In Thursday's violence, the Interior Ministry said, 15 police officers and 10 civilians were killed when a suicide bomber set off his explosives-laden car at a checkpoint outside its Major Crimes division headquarters in Baghdad.

It was the Sunni-led insurgency's third deadly attack on a police facility in three days.

A second car bomb killed eight people at a market near a Shiite Muslim mosque in Shurta Khamsa, a neighborhood in southwest Baghdad.

Fifty-seven people were reported wounded in the two explosions.

Violence Concentrated In Three Iraqi Provinces, U.S. General Says (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, March 24, 2006

BAGHDAD — A U.S. military spokesman in Iraq said Thursday that major violence is largely confined to three of 18 provinces. Fighting raged on with at least 58 people killed in execution-style slayings, bombings and gunbattles.

For the third straight day, Sunni insurgents hit a major police and jail facility. This time a suicide car bombing killed 25 in central Baghdad. The attacker detonated his explosives at the entrance to the Interior Ministry Major Crimes unit, killing 10 civilians and 15 policemen.

Also Thursday, U.S. and British forces stormed a house west of Baghdad and freed three Christian anti-war activists held hostage since Nov. 26.

The U.S. military spokesman, Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, said the rescue of the Briton and two Canadians was based on information divulged by a man during interrogation three hours earlier. That man was captured by U.S. forces Wednesday night.

The freed men were Canadians James Loney, 41, and Harmeet Singh Sooden, 32, and Briton Norman Kember, 74. The men — members of the Chicago-based Christian Peacemaker Teams — were kidnapped along with an American colleague, Tom Fox, 54.

Fox's body was found this month, shot and dumped in western Baghdad.

The U.S. military announced late Thursday that it was in the second day of an operation with Iraqi soldiers “to disrupt anti-Iraqi forces and to find and destroy terrorist caches … west of Baghdad.”

The military statement said 1,400 personnel were involved in the operation and had captured “two persons of high-value interest and 16 suspected terrorists.” Two large weapons caches also were discovered, the military said.

Lynch hoped the operation could lead to a break in the captivity of American Jill Carroll, a freelance writer for The Christian Science Monitor abducted Jan. 7.

He said there was no new information on Carroll that “I can discuss at this time.” But, he said, “there are other operations that continue probably as a result of what we're finding at this time. So you've got to give us the opportunity to work through that.”

In a rundown of recent military activity, Lynch told reporters that most Iraqi violence was focused in three central provinces, including Baghdad.

"There is not widespread violence across Iraq. There is not. Seventy-five percent of the attacks still take place in Baghdad, al-Anbar or Salah al-Din (provinces). And in the other 15 provinces, they all averaged less than six attacks a day, and 12 of those provinces averaged less than two attacks a day."

He said attacks nationwide were averaging 75 a day.

As Iraqi soldiers and police have begun patrolling more territory, U.S. forces have become less visible and less easy to target. The nature of the violence has shifted from assaults on American troops to battles rooted in conflict between Sunni and Shiite Muslims.

More than 1,000 people have died violently in Iraq, mainly in and around Baghdad, in the month since an important Shiite shrine was destroyed by bombers Feb. 22 in Samarra, a city north of Baghdad in Salah al-Din province.

Besides the attack on the police facility, 33 other deaths were reported, including 15 more bodies found scattered through Baghdad and Fallujah, a former insurgent stronghold in Anbar province, west of the capital.

Also Thursday, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said the military should say when it pays foreign journalists for favorable news, and the Defense Department should review policies that let it secretly pay Iraqi media.

Challenge For U.S.: Iraq's Handling Of Detainees (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

CAMP JUSTICE, Iraq — The blindfolded detainees in the dingy hallway line up in groups of five for their turn to see a judge, like schoolchildren outside the principal's office.

Each meeting lasts a few minutes. The judge rules whether the detainee will go free, face trial or be held longer at this Iraqi base in northern Baghdad. But Firas Sabri Ali, squeezed into a fetid cell just hundreds of yards from the judge's office, has watched the inmates come and go for four months without his name ever being called.

He is jailed, along with two brothers and his father, solely as collateral, he says. The Iraqi forces are hunting another brother, suspected of being an insurgent. The chief American medic here says that he believes Mr. Ali to be innocent but that it is up to the Iraqi police to decide whether to free him. The Iraqis acknowledged that they were holding Mr. Ali until they captured his brother.

"I hope they catch him, because then I'll be released," said Mr. Ali, 38, a soft-spoken man who until his arrest worked for a British security company to support his wife and three sons. "They said, 'You must wait.' I told them: 'There's no law. This is injustice.' "

Such is the challenge facing the American military as it tries to train the Iraqi security forces to respect the rule of law. Three years after the invasion of Iraq, American troops are no longer simply teaching counterinsurgency techniques; they are trying to school the Iraqis in battling a Sunni-led rebellion without resorting to the tactics of a "dirty war," involving abductions, torture and murder.

The legacy of Abu Ghraib hampers the American military. But the need to instill respect for human rights has gained a new urgency as Iraq grapples with the threat of full-scale civil war and continuing sectarian bloodletting. It is not uncommon now for dozens of bodies, with hands bound and gunshot wounds to the heads, to surface across Baghdad on any given day.

The Americans are pushing the Shiite-dominated Iraqi forces to ask judges for arrest warrants, restrain their use of force and ensure detainees' rights.

The Iraqi officers at this base, the headquarters of the Public Order Forces, a police paramilitary division with a history of torture and abuse, are gradually changing their behavior, American military advisers say. Cases of detainee abuse have declined in recent months, they say.

But detainees can still languish for months without any hope of a legal appeal because of a shortage of judges or, in the case of Mr. Ali, an unwillingness by the Iraqi police to allow detainees to see a judge. Overcrowding is chronic, because the Justice Ministry has been slow in building new prisons.

"The tradition in this country of a law enforcement agency that had absolute power over people, we've got to break them of that," said Maj. Andrew Creel, the departing joint operations officer here. "I think it'll take years. You can't change a cultural mind-set overnight."

Control of the Interior Ministry, which oversees the police, has become one of the stumbling blocks in forming the new national government, with Sunni Arab politicians accusing Shiite leaders of running militias and death squads from the ministry.

Last fall the American military raided at least two police prisons where it said detainees had been abused. This year's State Department human rights report noted that the police, especially the paramilitary forces, had been accused of torture and killings.

Those forces number 17,500. This base — in the heart of Kadhimiya, just blocks away from a golden-domed Shiite shrine — serves as the headquarters for one of the two major paramilitary branches, the 7,700-member Public Order Forces. An 11-member American military team began advising the Iraqi commanders here last spring. It moved into the base in October and is now handing over its duties to a new team.

Here, 650 prisoners are packed into four spartan rooms. They complain of a lack of food and regular access to showers and toilets. A foul odor wafts from each holding pen. To cope with the overcrowded conditions, the police converted the dining hall into a cell; the three other areas were originally built as storage rooms.

Camp Justice was never meant to hold prisoners for more than a few weeks. Iraqi law says prisoners to be tried are to be transferred to a Justice Ministry penitentiary after interrogation. But the ministry has been unable to build enough jails to keep pace with arrests. It has 10 centers across Iraq, which hold 7,500 detainees, and an additional 7 are expected to be built, a ministry spokesman said.

So the detainee population at temporary police prisons like the one here, separate from those of the Justice Ministry, has ballooned to more than 10,000 in Baghdad alone, spread across a shadowy network of about 10 centers, an Interior Ministry official said.

That has ignited concerns among American officials. But Col. Gordon Davis Jr., the head of Camp Justice's departing advisory team, praised the Iraqi commander here, Maj. Gen. Mehdi Sabih Hashem al-Garawi, for showing a willingness to embrace human rights. The general has, for instance, assigned the Iraqi division's only medic to look after the detainees.

"I won't say he's gone 180, but he's realized that the best way of getting information is not to beat or abuse detainees," Colonel Davis said as he stood in the operations room, the walls plastered with maps of Baghdad.

"The current generation has been brought up with a certain code and a certain tolerance for abuse," he said in another interview. "They've got to be constantly worked on."

The academy for recruits to the Public Order Forces has increased the time spent on human rights training to 20 hours from about eight last October, the colonel said.

Lt. Col. Dhia al-Shammari, the chief interrogator and a supervisor of detainee operations, said: "Beating or insults, any policeman can do. Professionals don't use them. This is not allowed, and I myself reject it."

Certain Public Order units have had fearsome reputations, and residents of Baghdad and nearby towns have complained of abuse and torture. From April to June of last year, American advisers found prisoners with bruises at the headquarters of the Second Brigade every couple of weeks, Colonel Davis said.

When confronted with incidents of abuse, the colonel said, the Iraqi brigade commander told the Americans, "Are you more worried about our enemies or about us?"

That officer was replaced at the urging of the Americans. So was a commander of the Third Brigade, in Salman Pak. Prisoner abuse has been relatively rare here at the division level, the advisers say, and became even scarcer after the American team moved in last fall. Before that, the advisers had been living at an American base. If the Americans saw a bruised prisoner back then, they often kept quiet for fear of alienating the Iraqi officers, said Master Sgt. Joseph Kaiser, a medic who regularly examines the detainees.

Now the Americans can be more direct, advisers say. The Americans have trained a 32-man guard force. Sergeant Kaiser helps supervise the Iraqi medic who examines the detainees daily.

The Iraqi division's intelligence chief "said we have to treat detainees, since they're subjected to visits by the press and human rights groups," said the medic, Hazem, 32, who declined to give his full name for security reasons. "He said to me, 'Your main job is to treat the patients, not to check if they're terrorists.' If I know they're terrorists and I'm told to kill them, I'd kill them. But I do what my job requires."

Checking on the Detainees

On a balmy afternoon, as Sergeant Kaiser walked up to a holding pen to make one of his daily health checks, a blindfolded man in a brown leather jacket squatted outside the metal door. The man was awaiting interrogation, said several guards with Kalashnikov rifles.

The guards went into the cell and brought out Mr. Ali, the man whose brother is being hunted by the Iraqi police. Dressed in a blue and pink tracksuit and a black ski cap, he shuffled up to the sergeant. Because Mr. Ali speaks English, he serves as an unofficial cellblock leader.

"How are the people inside?" Sergeant Kaiser asked.

"We need to have more food," Mr. Ali said. Mr. Ali said he dreaded the idea of American advisers leaving this base one day. "That's bad," he said, shaking his head. "That's very bad. We need the sergeant or another American officer here. When we see them we say, 'Please stay here.' "

A reporter asked Mr. Ali whether detainees had been abused or tortured. "Don't ask these questions," he said, lowering his voice. "You know that."

Sergeant Kaiser said that since September, when he joined the advisory team, he had found only "a few" cases of abuse. He recalled two that he had written up. Prisoners have been brought in with baton marks, he said, but they might have been resisting arrest.

Sergeant Kaiser and Mr. Ali stepped into the cell. Some sunlight streamed in through three small windows near the roof. Three ceiling fans whirred. The 140 detainees mostly sat up on blankets; there was not enough room for them to lie down without touching each other. By the door, one detainee used an electric hair clipper to shave the head of another. A man with glasses sat reading the Koran.

The detainees complained that family visits occurred only once every couple of months. The sick lay on blankets. Sergeant Kaiser gave medicine for diarrhea to a man in gray robes and tablets for oral fungus to an inmate with yellowing teeth. He poked at the torso of a man with rib pains.

"Some are innocent," said a guard, Sabah Ali, 21, as he looked around the room. "But some have given their confessions and they are guilty. Those who are innocent, we'll release them."

But those detainees sometimes end up waiting months before being freed, because the division prefers to release detainees in large groups.

Prisoners from the division's field units are funneled to this base "so you can exploit intelligence and take any opportunity for abuse out of the field," said Lt. Col. John Shattuck, the deputy commander of the advisory team.

Seeking Arrest Warrants

Since his appointment to Camp Justice in February, Judge Majid has come for several hours almost every day. He is a nervous man dressed in a dark suit who prefers that his full name not be printed.

Detainees are marched from cells in groups of five to see him in an office. The ringing of his cellphone can keep him up at all hours — he is expected to be on call around the clock to approve an arrest warrant if the Iraqi forces suddenly come up someone they want to detain.

Arrest warrants were mandated by Interior Ministry officials starting last July to provide some accountability, especially among the paramilitary forces. It is unclear, though, how closely field units stick to the requirement.

The Iraqi operations officer at Camp Justice says warrants are needed only for apprehending people on the Interior Ministry's wanted list, not for instances in which the police may be responding to a report of suspicious activity.

Colonel Davis says the warrant policy has had some effect. Because of it, and because the Iraqis are improving their intelligence gathering, the Public Order Forces no longer round up hundreds of people on each raid, he said. On a typical operation, he added, they may take in a dozen.

After being brought here, the detainees are fingerprinted and have their retinas scanned. A photograph is taken, partly to record their condition at the time of arrest. The Americans have asked the Iraqis to deliver a daily report accounting for all detainees held throughout the division; one recent printout listed 896.

The law says detainees are entitled to have their cases reviewed by a judge every two weeks, but there are not enough judges, said Colonel Shammari, the chief interrogator.

The main question, one impossible to answer for now, is whether respect for rule of law will become deeply rooted in the Iraqi forces, despite a tradition of tyranny in this country, as the guerrilla war continues to rage.

Outside one of the prison cells, a blue-uniformed guard, Salim Abdul Hassan, 35, watched as his colleagues led blindfolded detainees to a row of outdoor toilets.

He said that the American training had been of great help, but that "it would be much better if the Iraqis worked on their own without the Americans."

"We wouldn't be tied down," he said. "Three-quarters of the terrorists ask for the help of the Americans. They want to be in the care of the Americans, not the Iraqis."

Houses Divided In U.S., Iraqi Exiles Clash Over View Of Nation's Future (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

AURORA, Ill. -- Zaid Alaridh, the scion of a wealthy Shiite family, fled Saddam Hussein's crackdown on Iraq's Shiite population in 1982 and has lived in the U.S. ever since. The 40-year-old Mr. Alaridh hopes one day to return to his native land to open a technical college. He estimates it will be no more than five years before Iraq is safe enough that he can turn that dream into a reality.

His wife's sister, Ula Ibrahim, regularly tells him that he's being naive. Ms. Ibrahim, 25, says she fled to the U.S. last year after Islamic militants threatened to kill her for working with a women's rights group in Baghdad. She has a political-asylum hearing scheduled for next month, but plans to stay away from Iraq regardless of the outcome of her case.

"In five years Iraq will be the same as it is now, maybe worse," she says. "There is no future there."

Debate over the war in Iraq has erupted in communities of Iraqi exiles across the U.S., dividing families. The conflict is pitting longtime exiles who fled Mr. Hussein's Iraq -- many of whom support the war -- against newer arrivals who have left the country since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003.

Iraqi government officials say hundreds of thousands of Iraqis have left over the past three years, to countries such as Australia, Syria, Jordan and Egypt. Thousands of Iraqis have come to the U.S., where an estimated 150,000 Iraqi-Americans live.

In another family, Harith Aziz Mansoor, 53, left Iraq in March 2005 after he says gunmen threatened to kill him for his work as a subcontractor on a U.S.-funded effort to rehabilitate a water-treatment plant. He applied for asylum while on a U.S.-sponsored trip to Las Vegas, received it a few months later, and is now living outside Detroit with his sister and her family. His sister has been in the U.S. for 12 years.

Mr. Mansoor says that many in the Iraqi exile community in Michigan, one of the nation's largest, were surprised by his descriptions of how difficult his life in Iraq had become. "They thought I was exaggerating," he says.

Depending on their history, members of exile families have sharply different assessments of Iraq's present and future. After gunmen broke into his home in Iraq and assaulted his family, mechanical engineer Laik Anis Kamel fled to the U.S. last year with his wife and daughter. They moved in with his brother-in-law, Atheer Karmo, a prosperous dentist in Dearborn, Mich., who left Iraq in 1990.

Mr. Karmo, 47, is a Republican Party donor who was among Iraqi exiles who met with then-Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz in Michigan shortly before the war. He continues to believe the war will eventually result in a democratic, peaceful Iraq. The 30-year-old Mr. Kamel, whose father died after the assault and whose daughter had a gun held to her head, says Iraq is irreparably broken.

"We are trying to forget everything that happened there," Mr. Kamel says.

In the Alaridh family's four-bedroom house in Aurora, a suburb of Chicago, arguments erupt whenever the family watches TV images of Iraq or reads newspaper accounts of the war. Ms. Ibrahim argues that the country can't be saved in the foreseeable future. Her sister and her brother-in-law, Mr. Alaridh, contend the situation will improve.

"I lived everything -- the drama, the war, the occupation," Ms. Ibrahim says. Nodding toward Mr. Alaridh, she says: "He was in the U.S."

Mr. Alaridh grew up in Baghdad, at a time when high oil prices fueled a construction boom that briefly made Iraq among the most modern and developed countries in the Arab world. His father owned factories that made construction materials like plastic and metal piping, and became a wealthy man.

The family had a large, well-furnished house in an upscale neighborhood and always drove modern cars. They spent summers in Europe and drove to northern Iraq every few months for short vacations at resorts there.

All that began to change in 1980 with the outbreak of Iraq's bloody war with Iran. Mr. Hussein, concerned that Iraq's Shiite majority would join forces with Shiite-run Iran, ordered increasingly brutal crackdowns, forcing deportations of thousands of Shiite families. Mr. Alaridh says so many of the family's friends were deported that the men of his family sat around their houses wondering when their time would come, while the women gathered gold and jewels in preparation.

"My parents were always on edge, wondering if they were going to get the ax next," he says.

A Changed Country

By 1982, Iraq was a changed country. Mr. Alaridh's older brother was conscripted into the army and saw heavy fighting. Several of his cousins and an uncle were killed in the war. Desperate to keep him out of the army, his parents enrolled him in a college in Scotland at age 16. The next year, he moved to the U.S., settling with relatives.

Seventeen years passed before Mr. Alaridh returned to Iraq. In 1999, he flew to Baghdad for his sister's wedding. She introduced him to one of her best friends, Sura. He returned to Iraq the following year to marry her.

Mr. Alaridh brought his new wife back to Chicago. He found work as a network-systems engineer at ABN Amro, a Dutch bank, while she took a job elsewhere as a loan analyst.

By late 2002, with war in Iraq looking inevitable, Mr. Alaridh began mentally celebrating what he saw as the imminent liberation of his people. "Iraqis, given the right tools, could flourish, but Saddam had taken the tools away and closed the country off from the world," he says. "I knew they were going to at least get a chance at a better future."

Thousands of miles away in Iraq, his sister-in-law Ms. Ibrahim was also excited about prospects for change in her country. She had just graduated from Baghdad University with a degree in business administration. She hoped the U.S. invasion would result in a country where women could play an equal role.

After U.S. forces toppled Mr. Hussein, Ms. Ibrahim became one of the first employees of the Iraqi Independent Women's Group, founded by Maysoon al-Damluji, who had returned to Iraq after 22 years in exile in the United Kingdom. The group launched a magazine as well as classes about women's rights under Iraq's new constitution. Its weekly meetings attracted Arabs and Kurds, as well as both Muslims and Christians, Ms. Ibrahim says.

Ms. Ibrahim was chosen for a British-sponsored leadership training tour of Canada and England. In the spring of 2005, she and a handful of other Iraqi women spent two months traveling the countries for meetings with lawmakers, government officials, diplomats and academics.

Reaching into her purse during a recent meeting in her lawyer's Chicago office, Ms. Ibrahim removed two cherished artifacts. She opened a manila folder and took out a gold-embossed certificate from the Canadian Institute for Conflict Resolution, a degree she earned on the trip. A color photo in the folder showed her and the other women at a reception in Ottawa with the Iraqi ambassador to Canada.

"Those were the best days of my life," she said.

They were not to last. Religious fundamentalists in Iraq accused the group of collaborating with Western governments to secularize Iraqi women and began targeting members, she says. Two members were shot to death by masked gunmen, she says, and another member was forced to watch as insurgents executed her husband.

Closing In

The violence began to close in on Ms. Ibrahim, who was in the U.S. in late 2005 visiting her sister and brother-in-law. Unknown men who knew specific details of her work, daily routine and overseas travel began calling her father at home in Iraq, threatening to kill her as soon as she returned, the family says. The family says the callers accused her of working for the U.S. and said she deserved death for talking about freedom for women. Still reeling from the kidnapping of his brother, Ms. Ibrahim's father begged her to stay out of the country. She has been in the U.S. since.

Her ties to Iraq are weakening. When the death threats kept coming, her parents and brother closed their businesses in Baghdad, abandoned their houses, and fled. Ms. Ibrahim's father and brother are now in Cairo, Egypt. Her mother, Ahlam, arrived in the U.S. in January and is living with the Alaridhs.

From her vantage point, Ms. Ibrahim sees a broken, blood-soaked Iraq, where she has no intention of ever returning. Mr. Alaridh believes that Ms. Ibrahim is too pessimistic. He says all countries have gone through periods of instability, and believes that Iraq, even if the violence persists for many years, still has a chance at a better future than it did under Mr. Hussein.

"Now there is a lot of chaos, and I see that, but it will change. If not in two years, than in 20 years, and if not in 20 years, than in 50 years," he says. "In my opinion, you have to look at the whole forest and not one tree. There is a bigger picture."

Indeed, Mr. Alaridh regularly thinks of returning to the country Ms. Ibrahim is determined to permanently escape. His elderly father has serious heart trouble, and Mr. Alaridh has gone to Iraq twice since the war to visit him. During his first trip, in August 2003, he says U.S. soldiers approached his car with guns drawn when they saw him videotaping in Baghdad; they put them down when he showed his U.S. passport. Still, he considered selling his home in Chicago and moving to Baghdad with his wife.

When he returned to Iraq in April 2004 for a month-long trip, he says he noticed how much Baghdad had deteriorated. He heard numerous explosions and constantly felt on edge. He was used to leaving his parents' house for long walks alone, but quickly felt that was too dangerous.

But Mr. Alaridh says he hasn't given up on Iraq. He and his wife had a baby in January and he wants to bring his daughter to Baghdad, so his parents can see her. And he continues to dream of opening a private technical college for Iraqis interested in computers or networking. Mr. Alaridh envisions sending talented Iraqis to U.S. high-tech firms for internships, and then bringing them back to Baghdad as teachers.

Still, he acknowledges that his optimism is being tested. One of Mr. Alaridh's brothers just fled to Egypt. His younger sister, who introduced him to his wife, now lives in Syria with her family. While he continues to think Iraq will have a bright future, he says: "It's getting harder and harder to believe."

Rice Presses Karzai On Convert's Life (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 23 -- Senior Muslim clerics demanded Thursday that an Afghan man on trial for converting from Islam to Christianity be executed, warning that if the government caves in to Western pressure and frees him, they will incite people to "pull him into pieces."

In an unusual move, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice telephoned President Hamid Karzai on Thursday seeking what she called a "satisfactory outcome" of the case of Abdul Rahman. The 41-year-old former medical aid worker faces the death penalty under Afghanistan's Islamic laws for becoming a Christian.

His trial has fired passions in this conservative Muslim nation and highlighted a conflict of values between Afghanistan and its Western backers.

"Rejecting Islam is insulting God. We will not allow God to be humiliated. This man must die," said cleric Abdul Raoulf, who is considered a moderate and was jailed three times for opposing the Taliban before the hard-line regime was ousted in 2001.

The trial, which began last week, has caused an international outcry. President Bush has said he is "deeply troubled" by the case and expects the country to "honor the universal principle of freedom."

Rice told reporters in Washington on Thursday the case was "a very deeply concerning development" and she had "raised it in the strongest possible terms" with Karzai. "There is no more fundamental issue for the United States than freedom of religion and religious conscience," she said. "This country was founded on that basis, and it is at the heart of democracy."

German Chancellor Angela Merkel told reporters she had received assurances from Karzai in a telephone call that Rahman would not be sentenced to death.

"I have the impression that he has a firm willingness" to abide by human rights requirements, Merkel said of Karzai as she headed to pre-European Union summit talks. "I hope we will be able to resolve this."

Clerics Insist On Execution Of Convert (WT/AP)

By Daniel Cooney, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- Senior Muslim clerics demanded yesterday that an Afghan man on trial for converting from Islam to Christianity be executed, warning that if the government caves in to Western pressure and frees him, they will incite people to "pull him into pieces."

In an unusual move, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice telephoned President Hamid Karzai yesterday seeking a "favorable resolution" of the case of Abdul Rahman.

The 41-year-old former medical aid worker faces the death penalty under Afghanistan's Islamic laws for becoming a Christian.

His trial has fired passions in this Muslim nation and highlighted a conflict of values between the West and Islam, which forbids those born as Muslims from converting to other religions.

"Rejecting Islam is insulting God. We will not allow God to be humiliated. This man must die," said cleric Abdul Raoulf, who is considered a moderate and was jailed three times for opposing the Taliban before the hard-line regime was ousted in 2001.

The trial, which began last week, has caused an international outcry. President Bush has said he is "deeply troubled" by the case and expects the country to "honor the universal principle of freedom."

Miss Rice's spokesman, Sean McCormack, said she told Mr. Karzai it is important for the Afghan people to know that freedom of religion is observed in their country. But in deference to the country's sovereignty, Miss Rice evidently did not demand specifically that the trial be halted and the defendant released.

"This is clearly an Afghan decision," Mr. McCormack said. "They are a sovereign country."

Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper said yesterday after speaking with Mr. Karzai that the Christian convert will not face the death penalty, Agence France-Presse reported from Ottawa.

"I phoned President Karzai personally yesterday to express our concern. He conveyed to me that we don't have to worry about any such eventual outcome," Mr. Harper told reporters.

Diplomats have said the Afghan government is searching for a way to drop the case. On Wednesday, authorities said Mr. Rahman is suspected of being mentally ill and would undergo psychological examinations to see whether he is fit to stand trial.

But three Sunni preachers and a Shi'ite one interviewed by the Associated Press in four of Kabul's most popular mosques said they do not think Mr. Rahman is insane.

"He is not crazy. He went in front of the media and confessed to being a Christian," said Hamidullah, chief cleric at Haji Yacob Mosque.

"The government is scared of the international community," he said. "But the people will kill him if he is freed."

Mr. Raoulf, who is a member of the country's main Islamic organization, the Afghan Ulama Council, agreed. "The government is playing games. The people will not be fooled."

"Cut off his head," he exclaimed, sitting in a courtyard outside Herati Mosque. "We will call on the people to pull him into pieces so there's nothing left."

He said the only way for Mr. Rahman to survive would be for him to go into exile.

DOJ_NMG_0020650

But Said Mirhossain Nasri, the top cleric at Hossainia Mosque, one of the largest Shi'ite places of worship in Kabul, said Mr. Rahman must not be allowed to leave the country.

"If he is allowed to live in the West, then others will claim to be Christian so they can too," he said. "We must set an example. ... He must be hanged."

Afghanistan's constitution is based on Shariah law, which is interpreted by many Muslims to require that any Muslim who rejects Islam be sentenced to death.

Hamidullah warned that if the government frees Mr. Rahman, "there will be an uprising" like one against Soviet occupying forces in the 1980s. "The government will lose the support of the people," he said.

Mr. Rahman is thought to have lived in Germany for nine years after converting to Christianity while working as a medical aid worker for an international Christian group helping Afghan refugees in Pakistan. He returned to Kabul in 2002.

Kabul Judge Rejects Calls To End Trial Of Christian Convert (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa And David Rohde

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 23 — The judge presiding over the prosecution of an Afghan man facing death for converting from Islam to Christianity said Thursday that he would resist any interference, despite mounting international condemnation.

A day after President Bush mentioned the case, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan to discuss it "in the strongest possible terms," said the State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack.

"She called specifically on this topic," Mr. McCormack said, "and she urged President Karzai's government to seek a favorable resolution to this case at the earliest possible moment."

But Ansarullah Maulavi Zada, the judge who heads the public security tribunal in Kabul, said, "There is no direct pressure on our court so far, but if it happens we will consider it interference."

He added that he expected to rule in the case in the next several days.

The case involves Abdul Rahman, 41, whose family opposed his attempt to regain custody of his two daughters and apparently told authorities last month that he had converted about 15 years ago. The resulting furor has exposed the unresolved tensions in the Bush administration's effort to meld democracy and conservative Islam in Afghanistan.

It also threatens to become a political liability for both the American and Afghan presidents.

For Mr. Bush, who finds support for his war effort in Iraq waning, the case could further alienate his political base among those in the Christian right, who have already accused the administration of putting too little pressure on Afghan officials.

For Mr. Karzai, the case traps him squarely between his Western backers and Afghanistan's conservative religious council, the Ulema, an important source of domestic support.

"The international community is saying you must stop this," said Barnett R. Rubin, a New York University professor and expert on Afghanistan. "The Ulema is saying, 'Are you an Islamic ruler?' "

The case illustrates a central contradiction of the compromise Constitution that Afghanistan adopted in 2004, which has been cited as an example for other Islamic countries. One passage declares Islam Afghanistan's supreme law, while another states that the country grants its citizens religious freedom.

In an intentional effort to avoid a standoff, the Constitution leaves certain crimes to be handled by religious judges, according to J. Alexander Thier of the Hoover Institution, who was an adviser on the Constitution. One such crime is converting from Islam to another religion.

Under conservative interpretations, a convert can be sentenced to death. Many moderate Muslims reject that interpretation as too severe. Afghanistan's laws are silent on the matter, and the country's criminal code does not specifically declare converting from Islam to Christianity a crime.

After meeting with Afghanistan's foreign minister, Abdullah, earlier this week, Ms. Rice called the minister into a second meeting on Thursday, according to Mr. McCormack, the department spokesman. In a 15-minute meeting, she told Mr. Abdullah (who uses only one name) that the prosecution was "contrary to universal democratic values," which include freedom of religion, Mr. McCormack said.

The same message came from the White House, where President Bush's chief spokesman, Scott McClellan, said the case "clearly violates the universal freedoms that democracies around the world hold dear."

"And we are watching it very closely," he added.

On Wednesday, President Bush said Washington expected Afghan officials to "honor the universal principle of freedom." Germany, Italy, Canada and other countries that have deployed troops in Afghanistan have also issued statements of concern.

To Afghan prosecutors, the case appears equally clear cut. One described Mr. Rahman as a "microbe," said conversion is illegal under Islamic law, and requested the death penalty.

Mr. Rubin, of N.Y.U., said he believed most Afghans did not support putting Mr. Rahman to death.

A friend of Mr. Rahman, who did not want his name published, could only speculate on why Mr. Rahman had converted. The two men worked together at a government radio station during the war against the Moscow-backed Communist government in Afghanistan in the 1990's.

"Abdul Rahman was living in neighboring Pakistan when Afghanistan was governed by a Communist regime," the friend said. "He was working for a foreign aid organization and converted to Christianity in Pakistan, and over this issue his wife got divorced, as she was not happy to follow her husband."

Mr. Rahman recently returned to Afghanistan after failing to gain asylum in Belgium, the friend said. He is a poorly educated laborer, and questions have been raised about his mental competency.

In images broadcast on Afghan television, Mr. Rahman told reporters: "I am not an infidel. I am Christian. I believe in Jesus." Islam considers Jesus one in a line of prophets culminating in Muhammad.

Mr. Rahman's case is only the most prominent of recent years to show how religious conservatives try to exert their influence through Afghanistan's decrepit and corrupt judicial system. Conservative judges, who dominate many courts, have threatened to close Afghan television stations that broadcast material they deemed indecent and have charged journalists with publishing material they declared blasphemous.

This week, Mr. Karzai introduced a new slate of ministers and Supreme Court justices, a step intended to produce a more effective government and less conservative judiciary. The nominations require approval by Parliament, the first in 30 years.

Critics of Mr. Karzai have long accused him of appeasing religious conservatives and warlords. In the past, he has defused clashes with conservative judges by failing to implement their rulings or striking closed-door compromises with them.

But Mr. Rahman's case has attracted far more attention, and comes at a time when Afghans have grown increasingly critical of the international presence in their country, which they say has brought too few benefits and spawned enormous corruption.

"The people feel that they are so weak that they need all these foreigners there," Mr. Rubin said. "They hope they will help them, but they are establishing brothels in Kabul, they are drinking."

In the United States this week, Christian talk shows and advocacy groups rallied their supporters, who flooded the White House and the Afghanistan Embassy with complaints.

At the State Department briefing, Mr. McCormack denied that the administration had been slow to respond to the Rahman case. As soon as the department learned about it, "we stated our concerns immediately with the foreign minister," he said. "After our initial conversation with the Afghan government, we thought it was important that we spoke in the strongest possible terms in public on this issue."

Maulavi Muhaiuddin Baloch, Mr. Karzai's adviser on religious affairs, said that the case belonged in the court and that Afghanistan's judiciary was independent.

Fazil Ahmad Manawi, a former deputy chief justice, said: "It is a dilemma for Afghan courts. The international community's presence in Afghanistan, with military and financial support on one hand and the prestige of Afghan courts and religious people of Afghanistan on another hand, makes the issue very difficult."

If he is convicted, Mr. Rahman will be able to appeal his sentence to two higher courts. Maulavi Zada, the judge overseeing the case, said Thursday that the next court session would be held in several days. It was unclear whether Mr. Rahman would present any defense. To date, no lawyer in Kabul has been willing to represent him.

Moderate Afghan officials are eager to quietly dispose of the case, but the vocal criticism from American and Western officials makes that more difficult, according to Mr. Rubin. One possible compromise would involve the court's declaring Mr. Rahman mentally ill and allowing him to leave the country.

US Steps Up Pressure Over Case Of Afghan Christian (AFP-Y2)

AFP, March 23, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice phoned Afghan President Hamid Karzai to step up US pressure to free an Afghan man facing possible execution for converting from Islam to Christianity.

With the case drawing worldwide attention, the Afghan foreign minister expressed hope for a speedy resolution while Canada's prime minister said Karzai had promised him the man would not be executed.

Rice said she phoned Karzai specifically to hammer home "in the strongest possible terms" Washington's concern over the proceedings against Abdul Rahman, who was arrested two weeks ago under Islamic Sharia law.

"There is no more fundamental issue for the United States than freedom of religion and religious conscience," the chief US diplomat told reporters after talks with Greek Foreign Minister Theodora Bakoyannis.

"We look forward to, hopefully, a resolution of this in the near future," she said.

Rice had summoned visiting Afghan Foreign Minister Abdullah Abdullah to her office Wednesday evening for a 15-minute scolding only hours after President George W. Bush said he was "deeply troubled" by the case.

Rahman, 41, has been a Christian for 16 years. He was turned in by his parents after his return from Germany two weeks ago and faces the death penalty if he refuses to return to Islam.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said Thursday the US administration was in "very close contact" with Kabul "to make sure that people's religious freedoms are protected."

In Ottawa, Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper said he telephoned Karzai on Wednesday to express concerned about a possible execution and "he conveyed to me that we don't have to worry about any such eventual outcome."

Karzai "assured me that what's alarmed most of us will be worked out quickly ... in a way that fully respects religious rights, religious freedoms and human rights," Harper added.

Karzai's government, which replaced the fundamentalist Taliban regime ousted by US-backed forces in 2001, showed indications of moving towards a settlement of Rahman's case.

Abdullah told a Washington university audience Thursday "it is in the national security interest of Afghanistan to find a viable solution" that upheld the country's values without eroding its world support.

He expressed hope for a resolution "very soon," adding, "We are fully aware of the sensitivity of this issue, and we know how important an issue it is for public opinion everywhere, for the friends of Afghanistan."

Afghanistan's Supreme Court and a judge handling the case have hinted at a solution, suggesting Rahman might not be mentally competent to face charges or that he could be given a chance to revert back to Islam.

US officials publicly called only for a "favorable resolution" of the matter without elaborating. But a US State Department official who asked not to be named confirmed Washington was seeking Rahman's outright release.

The Americans also saw the matter as test case for Kabul's post-Taliban government.

"We think that it is important for the Afghan people that this issue of freedom of religion, freedom of expression, which is enshrined in the Afghan constitution, be reaffirmed," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

The religious controversy erupted barely three weeks after Bush made a surprise visit to Afghanistan to hail Karzai and the country's fledgling democracy.

Karzai was elected after US forces helped topple the Taliban in retaliation for harbouring the Al-Qaeda group blamed for the September 11, 2001 attacks on New York and the Pentagon.

Kabul is now a crucial ally in the continuing hunt for terrorist mastermind Osama bin Laden and other Al-Qaeda leaders believed to be holed up along the Afghan-Pakistani border.

Rahman was believed to be the first convert facing punishment under Afghanistan's Islamic Sharia law for refusing to return to Islam since the fall of the Taliban.

The United Nations and NATO members Germany and Italy, which have troops in Afghanistan, have expressed concern over Rahman's trial and warned of a rift with Kabul.

Afghan Christian's Plight Draws U.S. Pressure Rice Calls Karzai As Convert Faces Possible Execution (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, March 24, 2006

The Bush administration Thursday intensified pressure on Afghanistan to spare a Christian convert in a case that has raised outrage among Christians in the USA.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice telephoned Afghan President Hamid Karzai to urge a "favorable resolution to this case at the earliest possible moment," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Gary Bauer, president of American Values, a conservative Christian group, said U.S. officials have to be "clear and bold" in talking about the case. "This whole enterprise is an effort to bring democratic principles to that part of the world. That means more than elections, it means religious pluralism."

Bauer sent an e-mail Wednesday to a quarter of a million supporters saying that the execution of the convert, Abdul Rahman, "would very likely result in a complete collapse in support for the war."

President Bush, who visited Afghanistan on March 1 and praised progress there, on Wednesday called the case "deeply troubling."

The unusual U.S. intervention reflects growing international outrage over the case. Rahman, 41, a former aid worker, was arrested last month and accused of apostasy — abandoning his faith — for converting to Christianity in 1990. Under Afghan Islamic law, he could face the death penalty.

Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper and German Chancellor Angela Merkel each said Thursday that Karzai had assured them that Rahman would not be put to death. Several influential Afghan Muslim clerics continued to insist that Rahman must die.

"We will not allow God to be humiliated," Abdul Raoulf, a member of the Ulama Council, Afghanistan's main clerical organization, told the Associated Press. "We will call on the people to pull him into pieces so there's nothing left."

Barnett Rubin, an expert on Afghanistan at New York University, predicted the case will be "finessed," probably by declaring Rahman mentally unfit for trial. However, it has put Karzai in a difficult position. "He cannot come out and say Islam is subordinate to" the wishes of the United States or the United Nations, Rubin said.

Although Karzai is pro-Western, the Afghan judiciary remains largely in the hands of fundamentalist Muslim clergy.

The Afghan Constitution, written with U.S. assistance, has contradictory provisions. Article 7 promises that Afghanistan will observe the U.N. charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which guarantees freedom of religion. Article 3 says that no law can contradict Islam.

While religious minorities are free to worship in Afghanistan, Muslims are barred from leaving their faith.

Khalid Abou el Fadl, an expert on Islamic law at UCLA, said that "contrary to popular belief" in the West, rejecting Islam is not a capital offense in most Muslim countries. Even where it is, he said, executions of converts have been rare.

He said there have been a half-dozen such executions in Saudi Arabia since the 1990s and a "couple" in Iran. He said the law was used to execute a political opponent of Sudan's leader in the 1980s. Fadl said the Afghan judiciary is using Rahman as a "test case."

The Rahman case has aroused concern among human rights groups. Ted Stahnke, policy director for the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom, an advisory body created by Congress, said that even if Rahman is spared, his arrest will have "a chilling affect on freedom in Afghanistan."

The commission sent Bush a letter urging the administration to "act vigorously on his (Rahman's) behalf." The letter said the arrest "indicates that religious extremists still have significant influence in Kabul, threatening not just the religious freedom of this one man, but the fundamental rights of each and every Afghan citizen."

DOJ_NMG_0020654

U.S.-led forces overthrew Afghanistan's Islamic Taliban regime in 2001 because it harbored al-Qaeda terrorists. Since then, the State Department says, the United States has spent $10.3 billion, not counting military operations, to assist Afghans.

The Pentagon says 221 U.S. military personnel have died in and around Afghanistan.

James Zogby, president of the Arab American Institute in Washington, worries that the case will intensify tensions between Christians and Muslims. It follows controversies over Danish cartoons lampooning the prophet Mohammed and a canceled deal for a Dubai company to take over some U.S. port operations. While it is right to protest the Rahman case, Zogby says, "unfortunately in many areas, Islam feels under attack."

Inside The Ring (WT)

Missile defense

The United States is close to completing a deal that will result in the creation of a third ground-based missile interceptor site in Europe. The candidate nations for the site that will hold 10 high-speed missile interceptors are Poland, the Czech Republic and Britain, a senior defense official tells us.

Negotiations for the site have been under way for some time and more than $100 million is already authorized for the site, which is part of the global U.S. missile defense system now oriented toward Asia.

The system of interceptors and sensors now has eight ground-based interceptors located at two U.S. sites — Fort Greely, Alaska, and Vandenberg Air Force Base, Calif. The European interceptor base will provide defenses against an Iranian missile attack on Europe, or possibly against the United States, if Tehran builds intercontinental missiles in the future.

Russia is expected to oppose the European interceptor base, viewing it as a threat to Moscow's missile force, although defense officials said the 10 interceptors would be no match for Russia's thousands of warheads.

Missile Defense Agency Director Lt. Gen. Henry Obering said during a speech at the fourth annual missile defense conference on Monday that the current limited missile defenses can thwart an attack from North Korea and that up to 12 interceptors will be added this year. "I am confident that if we had to use the system, the system would work," he said.

Conventional ICBMs

The United States could use a force of intercontinental ballistic missiles with conventional warheads because nuclear weapons may not deter terrorists and rogue states, the general in charge of the U.S. Strategic Command says.

Marine Corps Gen. James E. Cartwright told a Pentagon-sponsored missile defense conference on Monday that "it's very difficult for a nuclear weapon to be a credible deterrent against an extremist."

In addition to the "tyranny of distance" that makes it hard for military forces to get to an area of the world very quickly, there is also the problem of the inadequate speed of current conventional systems. Today's bombers need an hour to travel 500 miles, and ships take longer.

An ICBM, however, can cover 6,000 miles in minutes and the technology for adding precision guided, non-nuclear warheads is available now, Gen. Cartwright said. And the warhead does not need to be high-explosive. Just the kinetic impact of a long-range inert warhead can cause tremendous damage because of the high speed. The warheads are accurate enough to land within 12 feet of the target.

The conventional ICBMs are needed for the Pentagon's new "global strike" mission to attack terrorists, or those working on weapons of mass destruction, in addition to any nation states that the United State may confront in the 21st century, like China.

"Do we want a capability that is non-nuclear? That's the heart of the debate," Gen. Cartwright said.

Guitarist missileer

One of stars at the fourth annual missile defense conference held this week was Jeff "Skunk" Baxter, the famed guitarist for the Doobie Brothers and Steely Dan.

Mr. Baxter moonlights as a consultant to the Pentagon's Missile Defense Agency and a number of other federal and state agencies. His specialty is "thinking out of the box," something sorely needed for the U.S. defense and intelligence bureaucracy.

Mr. Baxter describes himself as the "missile defense mascot" and was the moderator at a panel of news reporters at the conference to discuss press coverage of missile defenses.

"To me, missile defense is an imperative because of the incredible amount of blood and treasure that many of America's adversaries are investing in developing offensive ballistic capabilities," Mr. Baxter told us.

Tuesday night he played guitar during a reception sponsored by the Boeing Corp., playing a variety of guitars to highlight the history of the instrument.

At one point, he was joined on stage at the Pavilion Room of the Ronald Reagan International Trade Center building by Air Force Lt. Gen. Henry Obering, director of the Missile Defense Agency.

Salty language

The attorney for Navy Lt. Bryan Black, who is being court-martialed for using foul words in the presence of a female midshipman, has filed the final legal arguments in his bid to get the Naval Academy superintendent removed as the case's overseer.

Lawyer Charles Gittins filed papers with the U.S. Navy-Marine Corps Court of Criminal Appeals, asking it to disqualify Vice Adm. Rodney Rempt as what the military calls the "convening authority."

Mr. Gittins argues that Adm. Rempt is biased and is using the Black case as part of his drive to rid the campus of sexual harassment.

"Stung by official public criticism of his personal performance as the superintendent ... the superintendent made a decision to make an example of petitioner — he intended to conduct a public officer [nonjudicial punishment] hearing in order to reinforce and ramrod his apparently ineffective 'zero tolerance' policy regarding sexual harassment and sexual assault at the Naval Academy," Mr. Gittins said.

The attorney argued that it is highly unusual to hold such proceedings in public, which clearly signaled the admiral planned to convict him.

A Marine Corps officer who conducted an investigation of Lt. Black's behavior recommended he receive counseling and a non-punitive letter of caution. But Adm. Rempt overruled him and moved for nonjudicial punishment. Mr. Gittins said he rejected that option once he learned it would be staged in public and that midshipmen would be invited to watch.

The academy has declined to discuss the case. In a reply brief, the prosecution said, Lt. Black "fails to provide either evidence of any such statements or evidence of any sort that would show the [Adm. Rempt] has anything other than an official interest in [the] case."

Bowen's travels

Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the Bush administration's special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, has been trotting the globe lately.

He made another trip from his Crystal City headquarters to Baghdad in preparation for a new report to Congress next month. He then tried to fit in some vacation time in Paris. But public officials were so eager to hear his views that he spent time briefing the French on reconstruction progress — and setbacks.

His briefings led to speculation in Paris that French companies may one day bid on contracts in Iraq. Iraq, for example, has no land-line telephone communications. Everything is done via cell and satellite phones. It will need a firm one day to rewire the country.

Mr. Bowen goes to Iraq one month out of three, and will return in May.

Report: U.S. Missile Science Slumping (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon risks running out of scientists to operate and upgrade the nation's arsenal of intercontinental nuclear and conventional missiles, according to a report released this week by the Defense Science Board.

As the nation's veteran engineers and scientists retire, the military will lose much of its expertise in long-range missile technology, the report says. That means the Air Force and Navy, which operate most of the 1960s-vintage missiles, will be unable to cope with system failures or develop improved weapons, the report says.

Not only are fewer American engineers and scientists choosing to work on missile technology, there are fewer of them altogether, the report says. Each year, about 70,000 Americans receive undergraduate and graduate science and engineering degrees that are defense related, compared with a combined 200,000 in China and India, the report says.

The government should pay higher salaries and offer other incentives to attract more experts into the strategic missile field, the report says.

A task force of five outside missile experts spent two years preparing the report at the Pentagon's request.

Although the board lacks the power to force the Pentagon to act, Lt. Gen. Frank Klotz, acting head of the Air Force Space Command, told a Senate committee this month that the Pentagon is trying to improve its recruiting and retention of missile experts. Space Command runs the intercontinental ballistic missile system.

The report does not give specifics on the number of experts who are retiring or the numbers needed to replace them, but it says about 20,000 research and development scientists and engineers work in the aerospace industry as a whole, down from more than 140,000 in the mid-1980s.

John Steinbruner, head of the Center for International and Security Studies at the University of Maryland, says few scientists want to work on long-range missiles because "it's not too hard to figure out that American security doesn't depend on this any more."

Instead, Steinbruner says, the Pentagon's priorities have shifted toward fighting terrorism and "low-intensity conflicts," such as the insurgency in Iraq.

The report, he says, sounds like the Pentagon advisory board is "just trying to keep the money flowing" and may be biased toward Cold War-era ballistic missile systems.

The report also questions a Pentagon plan to seek more than $500 million to replace nuclear warheads on some submarine-launched Trident ballistic missiles with conventional warheads. The Pentagon says those missiles could be used to strike fortified targets such as nuclear weapons facilities in rogue nations.

Converting the warheads on these missiles will be difficult, the report says, because the Pentagon lacks the necessary engineering skills. It adds that technical requirements for non-nuclear warheads are much different for long-range missiles from those for shorter-range missiles or nuclear weapons.

Foreign Policy Good Vs Evil Does Not Work (FT)

By Madeleine Albright

The Bush administration's newly unveiled national security strategy might well be subtitled "The Irony of Iran". Three years after the invasion of Iraq and the invention of the phrase "axis of evil", the administration now highlights the threat posed by Iran – whose radical government has been vastly strengthened by the invasion of Iraq. This is more tragedy than strategy, and it reflects the Manichean approach this administration has taken to the world.

It is sometimes convenient, for purposes of rhetorical effect, for national leaders to talk of a globe neatly divided into good and bad. It is quite another, however, to base the policies of the world's most powerful nation upon that fiction. The administration's penchant for painting its perceived adversaries with the same sweeping brush has led to a series of unintended consequences.

For years, the president has acted as if al-Qaeda, Saddam Hussein's followers and Iran's mullahs were parts of the same problem. Yet, in the 1980s, Mr Hussein's Iraq and Iran fought a brutal war. In the 1990s, al-Qaeda's allies murdered a group of Iranian diplomats. For years, Osama bin Laden ridiculed Mr Hussein, who persecuted Sunni and Shia religious leaders alike. When al-Qaeda struck America on September 11 2001, Iran condemned the attacks and later participated constructively in talks on Afghanistan. The top leaders in the new Iraq – chosen in elections that George W. Bush called "a magic moment in the history of liberty" – are friends of Iran. When the president invaded Iraq, he may have thought he was striking a blow for good over evil but the forces unleashed were considerably more complex.

The administration is now divided between those who understand this complexity and those who do not. On one side, there are ideologues, such as the vice-president, who apparently see Iraq as a useful precedent for Iran. Meanwhile, officials on the front lines in Iraq know they cannot succeed in assembling a workable government in that country without the tacit blessing of Iran; hence, last week's long overdue announcement of plans for a US-Iranian dialogue on Iraq – a dialogue that if properly executed might also lead to progress on other issues.

While this is not an administration known for taking advice, I offer three suggestions: the first is to understand that although we all want to "end tyranny in this world", that is a fantasy unless we begin to solve hard problems. Iraq is increasingly a gang war that can be solved in one of two ways: by one side imposing its will or by all the legitimate players having a piece of the power. The US is no longer able to control events in Iraq, but it can still play a useful role as referee.

Second, the US administration should disavow any plan for regime change in Iran; not because the regime should not be changed but because US endorsement of that goal only makes it less likely. In today's warped political environment, nothing strengthens a radical government more than Washington's overt antagonism. It is also common sense to presume that Iran will be less willing to co-operate in Iraq and to compromise on nuclear issues if it is being threatened with destruction. As for Iran's choleric and anti-Semitic new president, he will be swallowed up by internal rivals if he is not unwittingly propped up by external foes.

Third, the US administration must stop playing solitaire while Middle East and Persian Gulf leaders play poker. The president's "march of freedom" is not the big story in the Muslim world, where Shia Muslims suddenly have more power than they have had in 1,000 years; it is not the big story in Lebanon, where Iran is filling the vacuum left by Syria; it is not the story among Palestinians, who voted – in western eyes – freely, and wrongly; it is not even the big story in Iraq, where the top three factions in the recent elections were all supported by decidedly undemocratic militias.

In the long term, the future of the Middle East may well be determined by those in the region dedicated to the hard work of building democracy. I certainly hope so. But hope is not a policy. In the short term, we must recognise that the region will be shaped primarily by fairly ruthless power politics in which the clash between good and evil will be swamped by differences between Sunni and Shia, Arab and Persian, Arab and Kurd, Kurd and Turk, Hashemite and Saudi, secular and religious and, of course, Arab and Jew. This is the world, the president pledges in his national security strategy, that "America must continue to lead". Actually it is the world he must begin to address – before it is too late.

Pre-emption Draws Surprising Consensus (USAT)

By Commentary by Irshad Manji

USA Today, March 24, 2006

Shocked. Appalled. Outraged.

These sentiments have been expressed by many Americans in response to the 2006 national security report. Released last week, the report affirmed President Bush's faith in pre-emptive action against potential threats to the United States.

While I think such faith is misguided, I'm enough of a historian to know that George W. Bush isn't alone in his approach. Other statesmen have shared his belief in pre-emption. Some of them are even lionized by Bush's harshest critics: Muslim-Americans.

Consider the prophet Mohammed himself. According to Muslim history, God's own messenger engaged in pre-emptive action against those whom he suspected of plotting against Islam. There's the well-known example of Jewish tribes who refused to take Mohammed as their prophet. After rumors intensified that these Jews were collaborating with Arab pagans to kill the prophet, Mohammed and his companions struck first. They exiled two of the tribes and later acted on a Muslim arbiter's opinion that a third tribe should be slaughtered.

Self-defense, my fellow Muslims will insist. Bush has said the same about invading Iraq, but I don't see too many Muslims accepting that argument. Ah, but the president never had hard evidence for his claims. Fact is, neither did prophet Mohammed. He went on faith.

In drawing this comparison, I'm bound to be accused of besmirching the reputation of Islam's prophet and thereby joining the Danish cartoonists in infidel hell. But as many Americans believe that dissent is a patriotic duty, so I believe that self-criticism lives up to the best ideals of the Quran, Islam's holy book. One of its most beautiful verses tells us to "bear true witness, even if it be against yourselves, your parents, or your family." In other words, be honest, no matter whose feathers it ruffles.

Honesty demands that Muslims in the USA judge the doctrine of pre-emption by a single standard. That requires making a choice. We can accept what the prophet did as necessary and guided by God, in which case we can't be shocked when the president makes a similar case for his policy. Or we can acknowledge that the prophet Mohammed's pre-emptive assaults on Jews were morally wrong, in which case we've got credibility when slamming the Bush doctrine.

I don't deny that the Bush administration's record on freedom and human rights has been hypocritical. But I refuse to hand Muslim-American leaders any moral triumph as long as they validate for the prophet a sin that they castigate in the president.

Schlozman Appointed As U.S. Attorney In Western Missouri (SPRINGNL)

News-Leader staff and wire reports

Springfield (MO) News-Leader, March 24, 2006

Bradley J. Schlozman was appointed today as interim U.S. attorney for the Western District of Missouri, the Justice Department said.

The interim appointee replaces Todd P. Graves, whose last day is Friday.

Graves announced his resignation earlier this month, after nearly five years of prosecuting federal cases in western Missouri. Graves has said he plans to return to private practice and become more involved in politics.

Schlozman will be there until President Bush appoints a permanent replacement, probably by summer, a U.S. Attorney spokesman said.

Greene County Prosecuting Attorney Darrell Moore confirmed this week he is one of several people being considered for the job. His name was recommended for the job shortly after he filed to run for a third term as county prosecutor.

Sen. Christopher Bond is in charge of presenting one or several names for Bush¹s consideration, Moore said. The Bush appointee would still undergo a full confirmation process, he said.

Schlozman most recently was principal deputy assistant attorney general for the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice, where he supervised a unit that included more than 700 employees ‹ 356 of them attorneys.

The Civil Rights Division is responsible for enforcing federal civil rights statutes.

Schlozman has been with the Department of Justice since 2001.

He is originally from Overland Park, Kan., and graduated with a degree in history from the University of Pennsylvania.

He earned his law degree at George Washington University, after spending time as an intern at the U.S. attorney¹s office in western Missouri.

He has been in Washington, D.C., since 1999.

News-Leader reporter Kathleen O'Dell and the Associated Press contributed to this report.

Flynn Begins Tenure As Local U.S. Attorney (BUFFNEWS)

Buffalo News, March 24, 2006

Terrance P. Flynn began work Wednesday as U.S. attorney for Western New York.

The U.S. Justice Department said the Buffalo lawyer was sworn in as U.S. attorney this week, after being confirmed by the U.S. Senate.

President Bush nominated Flynn for the job last December, after Michael A. Battle accepted a Washington position as Justice Department liaison with its U.S. attorneys nationwide.

Flynn, 42, is an alumnus of the University of Notre Dame and the University at Buffalo Law School. Before his appointment, he was a Buffalo trial attorney specializing in medical malpractice, products liability and other civil matters.

"It is truly an honor to be selected by President Bush to serve the citizens of this 17-county district," Flynn said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Defense Tries To Raise Doubts About Enron's Ex-Treasurer (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo And Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

HOUSTON, March 23 — Defense lawyers began an aggressive cross-examination of Enron's former treasurer today in attempt to show the tough tactics used by the government to induce cooperative testimony from a lower-level officer against the failed energy company's onetime top executives.

Trying to sow seeds of doubt in the jury's mind about the damaging testimony that the treasurer, Ben F. Glisan Jr. gave against his former bosses, Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay, on Wednesday, a defense lawyer asked him today about his interactions with federal investigators and the time he spent in solitary confinement. The questioning yielded revealing details about how the government conducted its investigation and pursued officials involved in the biggest corporate scandal of the decade so far.

Mr. Glisan presents an interesting challenge for the defense because unlike other witnesses who have been called by the prosecution, he has little incentive to cooperate with the government. Mr. Glisan, 40, does not have a plea deal with prosecutors and is more than halfway through serving a five-year prison sentence after pleading guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud.

He is testifying under a grant of immunity from the judge for other crimes he may have committed at Enron, but Mr. Glisan could face obstruction of justice and perjury charges if he lies on the stand.

Instead of questioning Mr. Glisan's ability to provide testimony unbiased by a deal with the government, as the defense has done with other prosecution witnesses, Mr. Skilling's lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli, sought to portray him as someone cowed by investigators.

Mr. Petrocelli asked him about an encounter between Mr. Glisan and Mr. Skilling on Feb. 14, 2004 at the federal courthouse here. Mr. Glisan, who had already started serving his sentence, was being escorted in shackles to testify before a grand jury, and Mr. Skilling was being brought in handcuffs to be indicted. They both found themselves on the same elevator in an awkward silence.

"Do you believe for one second, sir, that that was a coincidence?" Mr. Petrocelli asked.

"I didn't believe that," Mr. Glisan said.

Under questioning, Mr. Glisan also said he was shocked to find himself assigned to a low-security prison, when his crime qualified him for a more-lenient minimum-security facility. He spent 10 to 11 days in solitary confinement, after which he was put in an 8-foot by 12-foot cell with two other inmates.

"It must have had an impact on you?" Mr. Petrocelli asked about the days in solitary confinement.

"It had an enormous impact," Mr. Glisan responded.

Mr. Glisan recounted how he had sought to strike a deal with the government soon after investigators started looking into Enron in late 2001. He met secretly with officials from the F.B.I, the Justice Department, the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Internal Revenue Service in Washington.

But investigators did not trust him and did not offer him a deal initially, and Mr. Glisan acknowledged that he lied to minimize his own involvement in the fraudulent financial transactions that moved liabilities off of Enron's books into questionable partnerships.

He had another chance to make a deal with the government about six months later, but he did not want to plead guilty to the fraud charges that investigators offered to him. Mr. Glisan ended up pleading guilty to one narrow crime and started serving his sentence in September 2003.

"They did not think I was credible at the time," he said today. "And I wanted to be done with my time so I wanted to get started" on a prison sentence.

On Wednesday, Mr. Glisan testified that Mr. Lay, who was Enron's chairman, and Mr. Skilling, a former chief executive, were aware of huge financial problems and irregularities, lied about them to outsiders, and urged managers to use aggressive accounting tactics to make the company look more prosperous than it really was.

Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling, who are charged with fraud and conspiracy among other crimes, contend that the fraud at Enron was committed by a small group of finance executives and that the company perished because investors lost confidence in it.

A Former Treasurer Is Grilled Over His Testimony On Enron (WSJ)

By Gary McWilliams And Ann Davis

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

HOUSTON – A defense attorney for former Enron Corp. President Jeffrey Skilling painted a prosecution witness as a "snitch" who won a transfer to a minimum-security prison camp and received furloughs after agreeing to aid prosecutors.

The witness, former Enron Treasurer Ben Glisan Jr., had testified Mr. Skilling and former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay approved accounting manipulations that allowed Enron to increase earnings and hide losses while telling investors its energy businesses were a success. Under cross-examination, Mr. Glisan backed away from some of his characterizations.

The witness, former Enron Treasurer Ben Glisan Jr., had testified Mr. Skilling and former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay approved accounting manipulations that allowed Enron to increase earnings and hide losses while telling investors its energy businesses were a success. Under cross-examination, Mr. Glisan backed away from some of his characterizations. Mr. Glisan pleaded guilty to an Enron-related conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud and is serving a five-year prison sentence. Messrs. Skilling and Lay are in the eighth week of their trial in U.S. District Court for alleged criminal conspiracy and fraud stemming from Enron's collapse.

Wednesday, Mr. Glisan described meetings with the two executives where, he said, they approved the improper use of reserves, misled investors and hid losses. He testified to the use of "side deals" to insulate an investment partnership run by Andrew Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, from losses in its Enron dealings.

Mr. Glisan said when presented with a plan to create an investment vehicle that relied on Enron shares to hedge investments, Mr. Skilling said he wouldn't routinely approve such a vehicle, except that it allowed the company "to circumvent accounting rules." Yesterday, Mr. Glisan backed off from the phrase, saying he wasn't testifying to Mr. Skilling's exact words. Mr.

Glisan also admitted recommending Mr. Skilling approve the investment vehicles and said he never told the former president or other executives that the hedges would be improper.

"You lied all day yesterday, didn't you?" asked Daniel Petrocelli, lead defense attorney for Mr. Skilling. Mr. Glisan said that he told Mr. Skilling the investment vehicle didn't transfer economic risk, a violation of accounting rules, and that it could draw the scrutiny of the Securities and Exchange Commission. Mr. Petrocelli argued that the investment vehicles were approved by the company's outside auditor, attorneys and others. He suggested that while the two executives made optimistic statements in the summer and fall of 2001, they did so in the best interests of Enron stockholders.

Lawyers for the two executives contend Enron was in good shape and collapsed not because of any fraud, but because of a loss of investor confidence. "If Enron hadn't gone bankrupt, we wouldn't be here, would we?" asked Mr. Petrocelli. Mr. Glisan responded: "That's hard to know."

Under questioning by Bruce Collins, an attorney for Mr. Lay, Mr. Glisan said he lacked notes to corroborate certain meetings he claimed to have had with Mr. Lay where they discussed steps to disguise finances. Mr. Collins said about 10 pages of more than 500 pages of notes by Mr. Glisan entered into evidence cited Mr. Lay. The defense has said many of the government's witnesses are testifying in the hopes of obtaining leniency. When imprisoned, Mr. Glisan said he was placed in solitary confinement at a "low-security" prison. He said that he worried about his "physical well-being" there and applied for a transfer but was denied. After testifying for the government, he applied again. He insisted there have been no deals struck to influence his testimony.

Defense Hits Enron Witness's Credibility (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

HOUSTON, March 23 -- The prosecution's last major witness in the fraud trial of Enron Corp.'s former leaders endured six hours of hostile cross-examination Thursday, but former treasurer Ben F. Glisan Jr. insisted that the company's financial problems were mounting even as then-Chairman Kenneth L. Lay displayed optimism to the public.

"What we were telling banks, rating agencies and investors was inconsistent with economic reality," Glisan said.

Glisan, 40, provided some of the most compelling evidence to date against Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling in a confident turn on the witness stand under questioning by Assistant U.S. Attorney Kathryn H. Ruemmler. On Wednesday, he vividly described a company so unsettled by billions of dollars in losses that one executive said during a bleak September 2001 meeting that "he was glad he didn't have a gun, or he would shoot himself."

Lay discussed the company's "dire" financial condition internally but misrepresented its troubles to shareholders and employees, whom he told the company was "fundamentally strong" weeks after that meeting, Glisan testified. He claimed Skilling knowingly worked to circumvent accounting rules in a May 2000 deal and that Lay "giggled . . . in delight" at the approach.

Discrediting Glisan, described as the "cleanup hitter" and "closer" by Skilling lawyer Daniel M. Petrocelli, is paramount to the defense case. Prosecutors used Glisan to remind the jury of their central allegations and to corroborate testimony by more personally tainted witnesses, including former finance chief Andrew S. Fastow. While Glisan shifted in his seat, repeatedly sought to clarify statements by Petrocelli and sometimes laughed in frustration during cross-examination, he did not lose his composure. However, he did retreat from some of the language he used to describe Lay's and Skilling's actions.

The former Enron executive already has endured much worse than a combative cross-examination. He pleaded guilty to a single conspiracy charge in September 2003 and moved directly into prison, where he has spent 2 1/2 years. In some of the starkest testimony in this eight-week-long trial, Glisan talked about the two weeks he spent in solitary confinement and of his fears of being branded a "snitch" and facing physical threats from other prisoners. He will be eligible for release into home confinement in September.

Petrocelli hammered away Thursday at the central themes of the defense case. He accused Glisan of shading his testimony to win perks from the government, including half a dozen furloughs that allow him to spend time with his wife and two children. He pointed out that Glisan had no explicit notes or recordings implicating Skilling or Lay, just his own recollections. And he noted that Glisan had failed to win a deal with the government earlier because prosecutors doubted his credibility. Glisan previously acknowledged that during his tenure at Enron, he had improperly accepted $1 million on a fraudulent deal in which he invested less than $6,000.

In one passionate exchange, Petrocelli accused the witness of "criminalizing" remarks Skilling made about the accounting benefits of a business partnership in 2000. Defense lawyers told the eight-woman, four-man jury in opening statements that Enron was essentially a healthy business that collapsed amid a market panic fed by vindictive media and short sellers.

"I don't know that he used the word 'circumvent' but the take- away was . . . the only reason to do it was an accounting benefit," Glisan said.

"He didn't say that in front of anybody," the defense lawyer said.

"He didn't say it in that way," Glisan replied.

"I'm asking the questions," Petrocelli shot back.

The Associated Press reported that Lay lawyer Bruce Collins briefly cross-examined Glisan and was to continue Monday. He started off by challenging the former treasurer's assertion that Lay "giggled . . . in delight" after then-Chief Accounting Officer Richard A. Causey explained that a particular approach carried "accounting risk," but outside auditors had approved it. "I've gotten to know Mr. Lay pretty well. He may chuckle, but he doesn't giggle," Collins said. "I concede chuckle as opposed to giggle," Glisan said.

Testimony by Glisan, who had been known inside Enron as a "boy scout," merely underscored the importance of two crucial witnesses to come. Both Lay and Skilling are preparing to make their own case to the jury sometime after the defense case begins next week.

"You're going to see 'em early and you're going to see 'em often and you're going to see 'em for a long time on the stand," Lay's lawyer, Michael W. Ramsey, said outside the courthouse Wednesday.

Feds Indict 8 In Bank Of Alamo Case (JACKSUN)

Jackson (TN) Sun, March 24, 2006

Numerous loans went over bank's legal limit before its failure in 2002

A federal investigation into the 2002 failure of the Bank of Alamo has led to the indictments of at least seven people, according to a release from the U.S. Justice Department.

On Wednesday, a federal grand jury returned indictments accusing them of various charges of conspiracy, money laundering and bank fraud, according to the release.

Those named in the indictment include: Claude M. Conley, director and chairman of the Bank of Alamo Board of Directors; John Sanders, president and chief executive officer of the bank; Lazaria Saveh, William Saveh and George Eivazzadeh. The indictment says the defendants made "and caused to be made false and fraudulent statements in the books and records of the bank."

The indictment said the false statements were made to cover up loans made to William Saveh in excess of the bank's legal lending limit and to conceal from the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. and state regulators the true financial condition of the Bank of Alamo.

Books and records of the bank reflected that loans made to Lazaria Saveh and George Eivazzadeh were actually loans made "at the direction of and for the use and benefit of" William Saveh, according to the release.

A separate indictment accuses William Saveh, Peggy Hooper, William Paul Maddox and William Vincent Maddox of bank fraud.

The Bank of Alamo was closed in 2002 and its assets seized by the FDIC.

About 200 accounts with the Bank of Alamo had an estimated $6 million of a total $55.3 million in the bank's deposits. The bank held $69.4 million in assets.

The FDIC insures up to $100,000 in bank accounts, but those 200 accounts all exceeded the limit.

When the FDIC ordered the bank's closing, FDIC spokesman Frank Gresock said the failure was caused by insolvency that was caused by a "high level of problem loans."

Conley could not be reached for comment Wednesday.

To Some, Need For Third Trial Of Ex-Banker Isn't Evident (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

What do John A. Gotti; Cendant's former chief executive, Walter A. Forbes; and Frank P. Quattrone, the former investment banker, all have in common?

As vastly different as those three cases are, they may all be threepeats, with each facing the prospect of a third trial in federal court.

For Mr. Quattrone, that prospect emerged on Monday after a federal appeals court overturned his 2004 conviction on obstruction of justice charges.

The ruling faulted the judge's instructions to the jury, saying that they had failed to adequately require jurors to establish that Mr. Quattrone intended to thwart a government investigation. But the appeals panel did not reject the quality of the evidence presented in the government's case, which could bolster prosecutors' decision to retry Mr. Quattrone.

"It was thrown out because of flawed jury instructions, so I don't think we'll see the government walk away from this case," said Robert A. Mintz, a former prosecutor and now a partner at McCarter & English.

But much has changed since the United States attorney's office in Manhattan began its investigation of Mr. Quattrone in 2001. The prosecutors who brought the original case have left for private practice at prestigious Manhattan law firms. By some estimates, the office has already spent thousands of hours and millions of dollars in two trials to reach a guilty verdict against Mr. Quattrone, the son of a Philadelphia garment worker who rose to become the most powerful banker in Silicon Valley during the height of the dot-com boom.

Because of the passage of time — and in the wake of a number of high-profile white-collar convictions in recent years, including Martha Stewart, Bernard J. Ebbers of WorldCom and John J. Rigas of Adelphia Communications — some lawyers wonder whether there is a need to put Mr. Quattrone's feet to the fire once again.

"Since his original indictment, the government and that office has notched up a number of victories," said Roman E. Darmer II, a former assistant United States attorney who worked in the Manhattan office until 1999. "I wonder if the moment has passed." And then there are others who wonder if the crime that Mr. Quattrone is accused of is worthy of the time, money and energy involved in a third trial.

"There are situations that demand retrial," said John K. Carroll, a former federal prosecutor now with the law firm Clifford Chance. "If the guy was the head of a crime family, or committed a crime where there are a lot of victims, or if the defendant is likely to commit the crime again, it is very hard for the government to walk away from those," he said. "In other circumstances where the individual is unlikely to commit the crime again or the alleged crime might be victimless, there isn't a self-evident need to pursue it once again."

Still, Mr. Carroll and other lawyers say they believe prosecutors will probably put Mr. Quattrone in front of a jury a third time because they believe their case remains strong and because they worry their tough stance on white-collar crime will be eroded if they allow Mr. Quattrone to walk away unscathed.

The United States attorney's office is saying only that it is considering its options. One of the most compelling factors behind the prosecutors' decision is which judge will take over the case. If the next judge is viewed as "pro-defense," that could affect the government's decision to pursue the case, said some former federal prosecutors.

"I can think of a couple of judges who would make it very difficult for the state," Mr. Darmer, the former assistant United States attorney, said.

Other lawyers say there is a possibility of a plea bargain with Mr. Quattrone.

A lawyer for Mr. Quattrone declined to comment.

Whatever happens, it will in the hands of Michael J. Garcia, who took office as the United States attorney for Manhattan last fall. Mr. Garcia spent a number of years prosecuting terrorism cases before joining the Commerce Department in 2001.

Later he took over the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, where he was criticized for a budget shortfall and low morale in the division.

The office he now runs is the front line of the government's battle against white-collar crime. As such, it has a long history as a launching pad for ambitious lawyers who go on to careers in politics or at the leading law firms and corporations. Former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, for example, first came to prominence in the 1980's as he chased a number of insider-trading cases.

Mr. Garcia's predecessor, David N. Kelley, is now a senior litigating partner at Cahill Gordon & Reindel. Before him was James B. Comey, who is general counsel of Lockheed Martin. One of the lead prosecutors in the Quattrone case, David B. Anders, a former assistant United States attorney, joined the litigation group at Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz late last year.

In his second trial (the first ended in a mistrial), Mr. Quattrone was convicted of two counts of obstruction and one count of witness-tampering after he forwarded a colleague's e-mail message in December 2000 urging employees to "clean up" their files after he was made aware of a government investigation involving his firm, Credit Suisse First Boston. Mr. Quattrone, 50, had faced 18 months in prison; he remained free pending the outcome of the appeal.

At the time, the Justice Department was investigating whether the investment bank was soliciting kickbacks from preferred investors for hot initial public offerings. Those investigations never resulted in charges against Mr. Quattrone. Credit Suisse First Boston agreed to pay $100 million to settle regulatory accusations that it had mishandled the allocation of stock offerings during the technology boom.

Prosecutors sought to portray Mr. Quattrone as a symbol of the excesses and greed that ran rampant on Wall Street in the late 1990's as executives and other insiders cashed in on the stock market's surge, often at the expense of Main Street shareholders.

Mr. Quattrone, who earned $120 million in 2000, is still a wealthy man. And his legal bills are still being paid by Credit Suisse, said a person briefed on the matter who is not authorized to speak publicly about the case. This person would not say how much has been spent to defend Mr. Quattrone so far, but added that what portion of those bills Mr. Quattrone would have to repay would be determined after the case was concluded.

As a result, prosecutors may be worried about the message they will send if they walk away from the case, some lawyers said.

C. Evan Stewart, a lawyer at Zuckerman Spaeder, who represented a former securities broker acquitted last summer of charges brought against him by Eliot Spitzer, the New York attorney general, wondered, "What message would be sent if the government washed its hands and said, 'Two times is it'? "

Nacchio Judge May Set Trial Date, Rule On Dismissal Request Today (WSJ)

By Shawn Young

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

A U.S. district-court judge in Denver today is expected to set a trial date for Joseph Nacchio, the former Qwest Communications International Inc. chief executive charged with 42 counts of criminal insider trading.

Judge Edward Nottingham may also rule on defense arguments for dismissal of the charges, which carry a potential prison sentence of 10 years for each count and a financial penalty of more than $100 million.

U.S. Attorney William Leone alleges Mr. Nacchio illegally sold $101 million worth of the Denver-based phone company's stock in 2001 when he knew the company wasn't doing as well as it had led investors to believe. The defense says prosecutors have presented a flimsy and flawed case.

Attempts to have the charges dismissed are commonplace and carry virtually no risk for defendants, and they are rarely entirely successful, say white-collar-crime attorneys not involved in the case.

Herbert Stern, Mr. Nacchio's attorney, says his client had nothing more than vaguely worded, speculative warnings from other executives that the company might not meet financial targets if business didn't improve. That isn't the same as knowing that the company has actually faltered, according to court filings by the defense. The defense also argues that the information Mr. Nacchio had was, by definition, not significant since the prosecution hasn't claimed that it needed to be disclosed to investors.

"It's a pretty good argument to say the information wasn't material if it didn't need to be disclosed. It's an argument that has a lot of logical appeal," says Matt Jacobs, a partner at McDermott Will & Emery, a law firm based in Palo Alto, Calif., that isn't involved in the case.

But some other attorneys also not involved in the matter say they doubt the defense will persuade the judge to drop the case. "It's too cute by half," says Joseph Allerhand, a partner at Weil, Gotshal & Manges LLP in New York. Companies and executives aren't required to disclose every material fact in real time, says Mr. Allerhand. Such a requirement would make it impossible to run a business.

In its filings, the prosecution has argued that insiders can have material information they don't have to disclose, but if they do, they may not trade on it. Mr. Allerhand says a key issue at the trial is likely to be whether Mr. Nacchio knowingly violated rules that barred him from trading.

Qwest restated $2.5 billion in revenue and $2.2 billion in earnings for 2000 and 2001. Mr. Nacchio isn't accused of falsifying the company's books.

SEC Plumbs Money Firm's Files (WSJ)

By Carrick Mollenkamp And Ian McDonald

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

Authorities and some creditors of Refco Inc. want to know more about money the brokerage firm shuttled between some of its business units in the days before it filed for bankrupty protection.

They may be able to learn some important details from Christopher Sugrue, a New York money manager and past employee of Refco, which imploded just weeks after its August initial public offering when Refco disclosed that its former chief executive, Phillip Bennett, had hidden bad debts.

U.S. securities regulators have been seeking information regarding such business dealings with Refco. And lawyers working for Refco unsecured creditors have sought information from Mr. Sugrue because of what court filings by those creditors describe as a "close relationship" between the 35-year-old Long Island native and Refco, where Mr. Sugrue was an executive before he helped launch PlusFunds Group Inc.

After Refco filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy-court protection Oct. 17, the Securities and Exchange Commission visited PlusFunds' Manhattan offices and asked for a battery of records, according to a report attached to a sworn statement by S. David Peress, a crisis consultant hired by PlusFunds.

In an interview, Mr. Peress said the firm is cooperating with "a compliance examination." Lawyers for Refco unsecured creditors also have asked for documents related to PlusFunds and Mr. Sugrue, according to court filings. A spokesman for the SEC declined to comment, but the court document that references the SEC request says: "The SEC has not made any suggestion that any action is contemplated involving [PlusFunds]."

Mr. Sugrue's own firm filed for bankruptcy-court protection earlier this month, after a wave of PlusFunds clients demanded their money when some of their cash transferred from Refco accounts was frozen. A portion of the money and trades Mr. Sugrue helped oversee for PlusFunds clients often processed through Refco's sprawling brokerage firm. Mr. Sugrue initially was able to prevent that money from being frozen by persuading Refco to transfer the funds from unregulated offshore accounts to regulated, onshore accounts.

Now PlusFunds is up for sale. Speaking by phone from Florida, where he was vacationing with his family at Disney World, Mr. Sugrue stressed that he did nothing wrong in the Refco matter. "I'll say that unequivocally," he said. Mr. Sugrue said his business "got caught up in a drive-by shooting."

Court filings by Refco creditors seeking to recover the money Mr. Sugrue had transferred to the onshore accounts cite ties between the money manager and Refco, including loans the brokerage firm provided last year to entities affiliated with Mr. Sugrue. Those loans were secured by equity in PlusFunds.

Before starting PlusFunds in 1998, Mr. Sugrue was a senior executive at Refco for more than five years, according to a biography in court papers. In addition to working with hedge funds on the firm's behalf, Mr. Sugrue helped negotiate the sale of 10% in Refco to Austrian bank Bawag P.S.K. in 1999. During that time, Refco was chaired by Thomas Dittmer, who later was listed on a register of PlusFunds shareholders. Mr. Dittmer couldn't be reached for comment. Mr. Sugrue's knowledge of the inner workings of Refco were demonstrated in a tense exchange last October. Six days before Refco began bankruptcy proceedings, Mr. Sugrue burst into Refco's Manhattan office demanding that the brokerage firm move more than $300 million of PlusFunds' client money "to seg funds," according to a sworn statement by Refco Treasurer Matthew Hreben.

Specifically, Mr. Sugrue wanted his clients' money moved from Refco's unregulated Bermuda account, where it was mingled with Refco's money, to segregated, or "seg," accounts, where it presumably would be less vulnerable to Refco creditors. The money was moved the next day and soon sent to accounts at Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., according to court papers and sworn statements by Refco employees.

Stanley S. Arkin, a lawyer for Mr. Sugrue, said his client should be given a "silver star" for looking out for his clients. Mr. Sugrue said his investors told him: "Thank God you went and got it. That's what you are supposed to do."

Yet Refco creditors got a federal court to freeze the money in the Lehman accounts, alleging in court papers that Mr. Sugrue was given preferential treatment. Those frozen accounts triggered the redemptions by PlusFunds' clients -- and the subsequent bankruptcy-court filing. The clients yanked more than $1 billion from the firms' funds -- about half their assets -- in the first two months of this year.

It is a quick reversal of fortune for Mr. Sugrue. Still on the board at PlusFunds, he is no longer an employee. "It feels like you got thrown out of the house you built," Mr. Sugrue said in the phone interview.

PlusFunds mainly offered funds designed to mimic the performance of Standard & Poor's hedge-fund indexes. The controversial money transferred from Refco was invested there to track 15 funds in S&P's Managed Futures index. PlusFunds' assets stood at more than $2.5 billion last summer.

After Mr. Sugrue started his fund firm, he continued to work closely with his old employer. Refco served as a clearing broker for several portfolios overseen by PlusFunds, according to court papers filed by Refco's creditors. And in 2003, Refco hired PlusFunds to manage a futures fund that did much of its trading through accounts at Refco, according to court filings by Refco creditors.

But the relationship extended beyond trading. Last spring, Refco Capital lent $158 million to Suffolk LLC, an entity affiliated with Mr. Sugrue, according to court papers filed by Refco creditors. Mr. Sugrue used the money to buy out minority shareholders of PlusFunds, the creditors say in court papers, adding that since then, Refco units lent another $50 million to entities related to Mr. Sugrue and other PlusFunds shareholders. Of that, $19.4 million went to an entity in which Mr. Sugrue is the sole member, court documents claim.

Several potential acquirers have emerged for PlusFunds, which will be auctioned off in April, according to public disclosures.

Separately, the federal bankruptcy judge overseeing Refco's bankruptcy proceedings ruled yesterday that Refco creditors investigating the brokerage firm's meltdown are entitled to documents from the underwriters of Refco's IPO. The judge also said former Refco directors, including private-equity investor Thomas H. Lee, should be allowed to collect on an insurance policy to cover legal expenses they incur in shareholder suits related to Refco's collapse.

A judge in a criminal case against Mr. Bennett, the former Refco CEO, set two trial dates yesterday -- Oct. 16, with a backup date of March 12, 2007. Mr. Bennett is fighting securities and fraud charges related to the Refco matter. The backup trial date was provided to accommodate Mr. Bennett's lawyer, Gary Naftalis.

Sarbanes-Oxley Sponsor Defends Measure, Attacks Rollback Effort (WSJ)

By Siobhan Hughes

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Paul Sarbanes offered a sweeping defense of the landmark corporate-governance law he co-authored and suggested that efforts to roll it back are on shaky legal footing.

"We need to remind those who complain that Congress overreacted or overreached in passing Sarbanes-Oxley of several crucial points," the Maryland Democrat said in remarks to the Consumer Federation of America.

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 created the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, bringing the accounting industry under regulation for the first time. It also required public companies to hire outside auditors to monitor their processes for assuring the integrity of financial statements. The law followed accounting scandals that led Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc., now part of Verizon Communications Inc., to file for the largest bankruptcy reorganizations in U.S. history.

Critics have asserted the law was enacted hastily and created too many burdens for companies. A conservative group has filed a civil lawsuit seeking to abolish the PCAOB. An advisory panel created by the Securities and Exchange Commission is calling for the exemption of the smallest 80% of public companies from a key internal-controls requirement of the law.

"It's asserted by some that the law was enacted in haste," Mr. Sarbanes said. "I think this is an affront to the hard work and the common sense of the members of Congress who shaped the legislation, moved it through their respective houses and voted for it. We had an extremely thorough, careful set of hearings."

Mr. Sarbanes -- who was chairman of the Senate Banking Committee when the law was enacted -- took particular exception to a lawsuit filed by the Free Enterprise Fund, a Washington, D.C., nonprofit group, that seeks to have the PCAOB declared unconstitutional.

"The structure was reviewed by the American law division of the Congressional Research Service and several distinguished professors of constitutional law," Mr. Sarbanes said, and "all approved of the structure."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Investigating Ryan Trial Juror (CHIT)

By Ray Gibson, Matt O'connor And David Heinzmann, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, March 24, 2006

A federal judge launched an investigation into a juror in the George Ryan trial Thursday hours after the Tribune reported to court officials that public records appear to show the man had hidden a felony DUI conviction from the court during jury selection.

The revelation cast a shadow over the historic prosecution of the former governor, and could potentially lead to a motion for a mistrial or form grounds for the juror's dismissal with deliberations already underway.

Court records matching the suburban juror's name and other identifying information show a conviction for aggravated drunken driving-a felony-while Ryan was secretary of state in 1995.

In a sworn questionnaire filled out by potential jurors before the trial's start last September, the juror answered "no" when asked if he, a close friend or relative had ever been charged or accused of a crime.

State records also show that the driving privileges for a man matching the juror's name had been revoked or suspended on numerous occasions during Ryan's term as secretary of state as well.

On the questionnaire, the juror denied having any "bad experience" with the secretary of state's office and passed on a chance to discuss anything privately with the judge.

The Tribune is not naming the juror because it is the newspaper's standard practice not to name a sitting member of a jury. The Tribune did not contact the juror for comment because doing so could violate a court order not to communicate with jurors during a trial.

The latest twist in the marathon trial came amid indications of dissension in the jury in its second week of deliberations and as the judge warned jurors to treat one another "with dignity and respect."

The Tribune uncovered court records matching the juror's name Wednesday night and notified U.S. District Chief Judge Charles Kocoras in a meeting in his chambers Thursday morning. Kocoros then went to meet with U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer, who is presiding over the marathon trial.

By 2 p.m. Thursday, lawyers in the Ryan trial had been summoned to the Pallmeyer's chambers.

Half an hour later, the judge stepped into her courtroom and announced that she had sent jurors home early for the weekend in order to perform "a brief investigation" of a matter unrelated to jurors' recent difficulties in deliberations.

"This relates to another matter," Pallmeyer told reporters. "It does involve a juror. It does involve a personal matter regarding that juror."

Jurors were dispatched an hour and a half early, but deliberations are scheduled to resume Monday morning. Jurors have deliberated for eight days.

Pallmeyer sealed all information about the investigation and a gag order in the case prevents attorneys from discussing it.

Court records that match the juror's name show an arrest for drunken driving on November 7, 1994, in Palatine. There was a guilty plea on July 25, 1995, in that case and a sentence of 60 days in jail and 30 months of probation imposed, according to the records. It was unclear if any time was served in jail.

In February 1996, the same man was charged with possession of a weapon by a convicted felon and with violating probation, records show.

In October 1996, those charges were reduced to misdemeanors-including reckless conduct and possession of a firearm with no Firearm Owners Identification Card-and the judge did not impose a jail term.

Penelope Campbell, a spokeswoman for the secretary of state's office, said a person matching the juror's name first obtained a driver's license in 1979 but never renewed it when it expired in 1982.

Yet that man continued to drive, records show.

While the secretary of state's office shows the man has only one conviction for driving under the influence, court records show at least three arrests for drunk driving.

That man's driving privileges have been revoked or suspended many times over the years, and he is currently under a six-year license revocation set to expire in mid-2007, Campbell said.

Potential jurors had to sign the questionnaires under penalty of perjury that their answers were "true and correct to the best of my knowledge and belief."

Legal experts said that if the juror is dismissed, the judge could bring in an alternate or even continue deliberations with 11 jurors.

The judge can go with 11 only if a juror is dismissed for "good cause," but lying on the jury form would suffice, said Andrew Leipold, law professor at the University of Illinois.

While the issue might seem ripe for appeal, the Supreme Court has ruled in a civil case that a party in the case must prove a juror's failure to disclose information caused an actual bias, experts said.

Defense lawyers could argue that the juror's conduct should lead to a mistrial, but several experts thought it would be an uphill fight. They noted that defense lawyers have approved the alternate jurors, making it hard to complain if one of the alternates steps in.

But Philip K. Anthony, chief executive of jury consulting firm Decision Quest, predicted that the revelation could result in a mistrial. The defense could argue "the entire panel has been contaminated by the views of this individual," he said.

But past cases show trials and verdicts can be salvaged.

One such case involved violinist Rachel Barton, who won a $30 million judgment from commuter rail service Metra after she fell under a train and suffered severe injuries. Metra unsuccessfully sought a new trial because one juror failed to reveal she filed a lawsuit against a retailer after injuring her hand.

"Typically, much of the resolution of issues like this is placed in the sound discretion of the trial judge," said attorney Robert Clifford, who represented Barton.

In Boston, prosecutors perform regular criminal background checks on jurors after fallout from a 2004 murder trial. After a jury acquitted one defendant, prosecutors learned five jurors concealed their criminal backgrounds.

Experienced trial lawyers in Chicago said lawyers typically don't do background checks on jurors in federal criminal cases, instead relying on an honor system. Anthony said it was also rare across the country.

The lawyers in the case have a duty to report any impropriety, such as a juror lying during jury selection, if they become aware of it, said Jean Rosenbluth, a law professor at the University of Southern California and a former federal prosecutor in Los Angeles.

"If [lawyers on the case] they had even a reason to think it, they would have an obligation to say something," Rosenbluth said.

The potential problems with one juror come amid signs the deliberations had broken down in recent days because of personal rancor.

Pallmeyer had spoken of "personal difficulties" in the deliberations and a juror was overheard Tuesday saying that name-calling had to stop.

In a note issued Thursday morning, Pallmeyer urged that jurors treat one another "with dignity and respect."

The judge also warned that deliberations must be conducted in the jury room with all 12 present and not in private discussions outside the jury room by clusters of jurors.

Ryan, 72, and co-defendant Lawrence Warner, 67, are charged with using Ryan's offices as secretary of state and governor to enrich themselves, mainly through corrupt state leases and lobbying contracts doled out to Warner.

Tribune staff reporters Rudolph Bush and Michael Higgins also contributed to this story.

Judge To Ryan Jury: Get Along (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI, Federal Courts Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, March 24, 2006

Jurors deciding former Gov. George Ryan's criminal case were sent home early today as a "brief investigation" is under way relating to a personal jury matter, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer said.

Pallmeyer said the matter had nothing to do with previous jury notes that revealed discord within the 12-member panel. The judge did not reveal the new issue but told reporters in open court that deliberations were suspended as an undisclosed matter related to the jury is investigated.

She said she expects to release details tied to the new matter but for now kept the issue secret and said jurors will return at 9:30 a.m. Monday to continue their talks. They were dismissed at about 2:30 p.m., ending their eighth day of deliberations.

Earlier today, Pallmeyer admonished jurors in a letter to treat one another "with dignity and respect" and to stop breaking off into smaller groups.

The 12 jurors deciding former Gov. George Ryan's fate are having "personal difficulties" as they try to reach a verdict.

That was in response to two notes jurors sent the judge earlier this week in which they complained they were having "personal difficulties" as they deliberated whether Ryan and his codefendant, Lawrence Warner, are guilty of corruption-related charges.

Pallmeyer told jurors they're barred from discussing the case in smaller groups outside of the jury room, saying any such talk among any smaller groups is a violation of their sworn duty.

"Private discussions about this case outside the jury room among any smaller groups is a violation of your sworn duty," Pallmeyer

Today is the eighth day of deliberations. Jurors are only discussing the case Monday through Thursday and leave every day at 4 p.m.

She also told the jurors they had to follow the instructions on the law that she gave them.

Pallmeyer didn't release the contents of the jurors' notes. But her response indicated conflict brewing among the six men and six women.

"You 12 are the jurors selected to decide this case. In your deliberations, I expect you to treat your fellow jurors with dignity and respect," Pallmeyer wrote. "As I understand from your notes, you may be having some difficulties during your deliberations."

Ryan Jurors Urged To Show 'Dignity And Respect;' Judge Launches Fresh Probe (AP)

By Mike Robinson

DOJ_NMG_0020671

CHICAGO - The judge at former Gov. George Ryan's racketeering and fraud trial urged stalled jurors Thursday to treat each other "with dignity and respect" and sent them home, saying she was ordering a fresh investigation of a personal matter involving one of them.

The eighth day of deliberations at the five-month trial was alive with speculation but few hard facts about just what kind of turmoil was going on behind the closed door of the jury room.

"In your deliberations, I expect you to treat your fellow jurors with dignity and respect," U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer said in a note sent to the jury Thursday morning.

The three-paragraph note was a response to two notes sent earlier to Pallmeyer, which she is keeping under seal because they touch on "personal difficulties on the jury."

Her reply seemed to suggest harsh words may have been used among the jurors. It also cautioned them not to break off into separate factions in their search for a verdict.

"I remind you that any deliberations in this case must be conducted only in the jury room among all of you," Pallmeyer said. "Private discussions of this case outside the jury room among any smaller groups is a violation of your sworn duty."

About 2:30 p.m., Pallmeyer sent the jurors home for the weekend. The jurors haven't been meeting on Fridays.

She said the reason for the early quitting time - the jurors have been working until 4 p.m. - was the launching of "a brief investigation" that she said "does involve a juror - it does involve a personal matter regarding that juror."

Pallmeyer said little more except that the investigation "does not relate to the issues that were raised by the jurors in notes to me earlier in the week."

The Chicago Tribune reported on its Web site Thursday night that the investigation came after the newspaper notified court officials of public records that indicate a juror may not have disclosed a felony DUI conviction in 1995, when Ryan was secretary of state.

During jury selection last fall, the juror answered "no" when asked in a sworn questionnaire whether he ever had been charged with or accused of a crime, the newspaper reported. State records show a driver's license matching the juror's name was revoked or suspended multiple times while Ryan was secretary of state, the newspaper said.

The Tribune discovered the records matching the juror's name and other identifying information Wednesday night and met with U.S. District Chief Judge Charles P. Kocoras in his chambers Thursday morning, the newspaper reported. Kocoras then met with Pallmeyer, the paper said.

On top of that, Kocoras on Thursday barred any photos of the jurors within the courthouse - evidently an effort to take more pressure off the jury.

Ryan, 72, and businessman Larry Warner, 67, are charged in a 22-count indictment with racketeering, fraud and other offenses. Ryan is accused of steering big money state leases and contracts to Warner and other insiders when he was secretary of state and later the governor.

He was rewarded with free vacations and gifts, according to the indictment.

Ryan and Warner say nothing they did was illegal.

What happens in a jury room always is supposed to be secret and the secrecy surrounding this case is all the greater since Pallmeyer imposed a gag order.

But the jurors themselves are anything but a random selection of 12 ordinary Americans.

They all were screened and profiled by psychologists working for a consulting firm brought in by Winston & Strawn, the Loop law firm headed by former Gov. James R. Thompson that is defending Ryan free of charge.

Just how any factions have developed is impossible to see from the outside. There is wide diversity on the jury - black and white, male and female, blue collar and middle management.

Los Angeles-based jury consultant Phil Anthony, chief executive officer of DecisionQuest Inc., said in a telephone interview Thursday that based on the turmoil of the last few days "I suspect that this jury is not going to reach a decision."

But he said that might be prevented if Pallmeyer took strong action to refocus the jury.

Anthony said attorneys at a trial such as Ryan's often start by doing something akin to market research to determine if any defense is likely to result in an acquittal.

If the results are discouraging, they sometimes use jury consultants to isolate one juror who might hold out in their favor no matter what transpires, or perhaps find groups of jurors so antagonistic to each other that they would be unable to agree on any verdict.

In doing that, they routinely look at race, social standing, gender and psychological conflicts that have nothing to do with the evidence or testimony from the witness stand.

"The average jury-eligible American cannot separate their own biases, prejudices or filtering mechanisms from the underlying facts of any given case," he said. "It's human nature."

He shrugged off any suggestion such tactics might be at odds with the ideals of justice.

"This is life and death for the governor," he said. "So if you're the governor's lawyer, your charge is to do everything you can within the parameters of the law to win the case."

Businessman Admits Bribing Philadelphia Councilman (SCCD)

The State College Centre Daily, March 24, 2006

PHILADEPHIA - A businessman friend of a convicted city councilman pleaded guilty Thursday to paying the councilman's health-club dues in exchange for help with a city land deal.

Reinaldo Pastrana faces a possible prison sentence of 2 1/2 years to 37 months under federal guidelines after pleading to three bribery counts, Assistant U.S. Attorney Kenya Mann said. Pastrana's sentencing was set for June 22.

Pastrana, 47, of Philadelphia did not cooperate in the case against Councilman Rick Mariano, who was convicted last week of 18 of 22 bribery and fraud counts.

Pastrana paid $5,400 for Mariano's membership fees, while Mariano helped him acquire a city property for $100,000, far below its appraised value.

As part of the plea, Pastrana agreed to sell the property and use the proceeds to pay up to $250,000 in taxes that may be owed by him, his wife and his mother.

Pastrana was on parole for failing to pay state income tax at the time of his indictment and has since been incarcerated for violating probation, defense lawyer Brian McMonagle said.

Mariano Ally Pleads Guilty To Bribery (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 24, 2006

A Philadelphia real estate developer who paid City Councilman Rick Mariano's gym fees for three years in return for help obtaining city land at a huge discount pleaded guilty yesterday to bribery charges.

Reinaldo Pastrana became the fourth person convicted in the case. The councilman was convicted at trial last week. Two other defendants had previously pleaded guilty, and two more are scheduled to be tried next month.

In the Pastrana scheme, Mariano sponsored and voted for legislation that allowed the developer to purchase 1.4 acres of city-owned property at American and Somerset Streets in Fairhill for $100,000 - a quarter of its market value, officials said.

Two weeks after the mayor signed a bill authorizing the sale, Pastrana began to pay Mariano's gym fees at the Sporting Club at the Bellevue. In all, Pastrana paid three years' worth of dues, or about $5,400.

Last year, after the FBI investigation became public, the councilman gave the developer a backdated check to make it appear as if he had repaid him, prosecutor Kenya Mann said in a court filing. But, she said, Mariano also told Pastrana not to cash the check because he didn't have enough money in his bank account.

Pastrana, who admitted his involvement before the grand jury, pleaded guilty because "he now recognizes that what he did was wrong and wants to get on with his life," said his lawyer, Brian McMonagle.

Pastrana believed he had paid a fair price for the property, McMonagle said, and he paid for the councilman's gym membership because Mariano had asked him to do so.

"Mariano called him up and he couldn't say no," McMonagle told reporters after the guilty plea hearing. "Obviously, he knows now that this is considered part of a federal crime."

Pastrana likely faces about three years in prison. As part of his plea agreement, he also agreed to sell another property to help pay an IRS debt of $250,000.

Mariano, meantime, spent his seventh day at the Federal Detention Center yesterday. U.S. District Judge Lawrence F. Stengel revoked bail after his conviction, pending a psychiatric evaluation to determine whether he poses a danger to himself or to others or is a flight risk.

The evaluation took place Wednesday. No date for a bail hearing has been set.

Mariano is scheduled to be sentenced July 6. Pastrana will be sentenced June 22. The two others who pleaded guilty, Vincent DiPentino and Joseph Pellecchia, are scheduled to be sentenced on May 30.

The two remaining defendants, Louis and Philip Chartock, father-and-son operators of Erie Steel Ltd., are scheduled to go to trial April 24.

Victim's Mother Testifies In 'Mob Cops' Case (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 24, 2006

Betty Hydell, the murder victim's mother who helped jump-start the investigation into the so-called "Mafia Cops," testified Thursday but did not identify the two defendants as the men with badges who came looking for her son the day he disappeared.

Hydell, whose son James went missing in September 1986, also didn't testify about how she had reportedly recognized the face of one of the defendants, Louis Eppolito, some years later on a television talk show.

Law enforcement sources have said it was Hydell's recognition of Eppolito's face on an episode of the Sally Jessy Raphael show that helped energize the investigation that ensnared Eppolito and another ex-NYPD detective, Ste- phen Caracappa, on racketeering charges.

Defense attorneys expected Hydell to recount how she reportedly remembered Eppolito's face as one of two men who drove by her Staten Island home looking for her son James the day he went missing. James Hydell, an associate of the mob, was believed to have been killed by former Luchese crime boss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso. Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, are accused of being paid assassins for Casso.

In about 2003, Betty Hydell's call to a Brooklyn detective about the television show helped move the probe of Eppolito and Caracappa into high gear, officials said. Yesterday prosecutors wouldn't comment on their reasons for not questioning Hydell about the incident.

Instead, Hydell, under questioning by assistant U.S. attorney Robert Henoch, described -- but was not asked to identify -- two men who drove to her Staten Island neighborhood looking for James. She testified that she finally drove around the block and caught up with the pair, who were driving a powder blue car and whom she described as being "Italian." Hydell described the driver as being a big man with dark hair and wearing a gold neck chain and the other as dark-haired and thin. Eppolito once had dark hair and did have an affinity for jewelry, photographs show. Caracappa is thin and has dark gray hair.

The driver showed her a badge and Hydell said she told the pair that "you should tell people who you are and what you are doing."

'MOB' MA TURNS UP HEAT (NYPOST)

SAYS COPS LOOK LIKE DUO THERE ON DAY SON VANISHED

The heartbroken mother of a murdered mobster testified yesterday that two detectives staking out her home on the day her son vanished looked like the accused Mafia cops.

Trembling nervously as she spoke, Betty Hydell said the shadowy duo told her they were cops, after their actions prompted her to confront them as they sat in a car on the fateful morning of Oct. 18, 1986.

"I asked who they were," she told jurors in Brooklyn federal court. "The driver pulled out a badge. I said, 'You should let people know who you are and what you are doing.' "

Hydell was not asked to identify or whether she recognized former Detectives Louis Eppolito or Stephen Caracappa. But she said of the two stakeout cops: "One was the big one, one was the little one."

Eppolito is heavyset, while Caracappa is thin.

Prosecutors say Hydell's son, Jimmy, was one of eight victims of the alleged dirty duo, who stand accused of leaking information that led to Mafia murders and even carrying out one killing themselves.

Earlier in their racketeering trial, a witness said the two officers were paid $35,000 to kidnap Jimmy Hydell for Luchese crime-family big Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso, who believed the low-level thug had tried to kill him.

Casso wanted Hydell alive so he could kill him as slowly and painfully as possible, according to the witness, Burton Kaplan.

Betty Hydell's testimony was apparently meant to place the officers outside her Staten Island house - stalking her son - the day he vanished.

"He was going to Brooklyn," she recalled, leaning forward on her elbows and trembling slightly. She said her son didn't use his car for the trip, because his brother, Frankie, needed it.

Moments after Frankie left in the vehicle in the late morning, he noticed he was followed by a car with two men. Betty Hydell said Frankie returned immediately. When she looked out her window, she saw the men idling near the family's house.

She said she concocted a plan to uncover the men's identity. First, she told Frankie to drive off in the car - then she followed close behind in her car to see what would happen.

"I wanted to see if they would follow him," she said.

Sure enough, the men did, she testified. Betty called out to the shady pair when they pulled up next to her, asking who they were. She said their badges didn't phase her, since her son Jimmy was frequently the subject of police interest.

"I checked with [the Department of] Motor Vehicles and the plates did not belong to that car. I just assumed they were undercover cops," Betty Hydell recalled

She said she suspected something was wrong only when Jimmy did not turn up for dinner that night - after he had called to say he would be on time. When he wasn't home the next day, she was really worried.

"He never did that before," she testified. "He always came home."

Earlier in the trial, Kaplan said Jimmy Hydell had been turned over to Casso by mobster Frankie Santoro Jr.

Kaplan said the doomed man was delivered directly to Santoro by Eppolito and Caracappa, who had kidnapped him and stuffed him in the trunk of a car, after pretending to pull him over in a legitimate police stop.

The witness said Casso tortured Hydell, shooting him numerous times in places that would be painful - but not fatal. He said Hydell begged his killer to "dump his body in the street" so his mother could find it and collect insurance. Although Casso agreed to this, Hydell's body has never been found.

It had been expected the bereaved mom would link the two men she saw the day her son vanished to the accused cops by testifying she recognized Eppolito promoting his book, "Mafia Cop," on the Sally Jessy Raphael talk show in the 1990s. But she never mentioned the show. Instead, she abruptly left the stand without pointing out the two cops - and without being cross-examined.

Betty Hydell's recollections about the talk-show appearance were left out because it could not be determined if she saw Eppolito before or after his face started being connected to Casso in the press, sources said.

"I thought she was going to have to point them out," her daughter, Elizabeth Hydell, said outside court.

Eppolito's one-time goumada also the stand as a surprise witness.

Cabrini Cama was eyeballed up and down by Eppolito's wife, Fran, as she walked into the courtroom. Then she testified her Brooklyn home wasn't just where Eppolito committed adultery.

She said the bulging ex-detective once brought Kaplan there for a brief meeting, but did not know the topic of conversation.

Testimony Against Mafia Cops A Dud (NYDN)

By JOHN MARZULLI, DAILY NEWS STAFF WRITER

New York Daily News, March 24, 2006

Victim's ma holds back

The mother of murder victim James Hydell got her shot at the reputed Mafia cops in court yesterday - and fired blanks.

Betty Hydell, 68, was expected to identify Louis Eppolito and Steven Caracappa, her son's alleged killers, as the two men who had cased her Staten Island house on Oct. 18, 1986, the day he disappeared.

Hydell also had told an investigator from the Brooklyn district attorney's office that she recognized Eppolito in 1992 when he was promoting his autobiography on Sally Jesse Raphael's talk show.

But prosecutors apparently decided not to subject Hydell to tough cross-examination over conflicting statements she gave about the incident to the FBI and the Drug Enforcement Administration, because the evidence so far against the defendants appears to be strong.

Hydell, 68, told the jury only that she noticed two men in a blue car making passes by her home. She got in her car and drove up alongside their vehicle.

"I asked who they were," she told the Brooklyn Federal Court jury. "The driver pulled out a badge. I said, 'You should let people know who you are and what you're doing.' "

She described the driver as "the big one" wearing a white shirt and a necklace. The passenger was "the little one." Both appeared to be of Italian descent, she said.

Eppolito is stout, and Caracappa is rail thin. Hydell was not asked to identify them in court.

She went on to describe how the last contact from her son, James, was a collect call he made from a pay phone in Brooklyn about 2:40 p.m.

Authorities contend the cops were looking for James Hydell on orders from Luchese crime family underboss Anthony (Gaspipe) Casso, who had survived an assassination attempt by several gunmen, including Hydell.

Eppolito and Caracappa allegedly found Hydell outside a coin laundry in Brooklyn and turned him over to Casso, who tortured and killed him, officials said. His body has never been found.

Outside court, Betty Hydell's daughter, Liz, said she was "shocked" that her mother's testimony was so brief.

"I have no idea what's going on," she said. "I thought she was going to point him \[Eppolito\] out."

Eppolito's lawyer, Bruce Cutler, said he, too, was expecting the witness to make the connection to his client.

"It surprised me that the government didn't try to adduce that," he said.

Neither Cutler nor Caracappa's lawyer, Edward Hayes, asked her a single question on cross-examination.

Witness In Detectives' Trial Testifies About His Own Crimes (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

Steven Corso — tax cheat, thief and disgraced accountant — has spent the last two days at the racketeering trial of Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa telling jurors that the two detectives moved to Las Vegas in the early 1990's and committed a smattering of federal crimes.

He testified that last year they helped arrange a 2-minute-19-second drug deal, in which Mr. Eppolito's son was secretly recorded selling an ounce of methamphetamine for $900. He also said that a few weeks later Mr. Eppolito, a struggling screenwriter, accepted $14,000 as an investment in a script he was looking to produce — money, the witness said, that supposedly came from a drug deal in Florida.

Today, Mr. Corso, with his pomaded hair and designer suit, underwent a bitter, if quizzical, cross-examination. He acknowledged he was the sort of man who would talk with his mouth full of bruschetta and who had first approached Mr. Eppolito by pretending to be interested in his daughter. He also admitted to stealing $5,329,566 from his former firm — money he said he had spent on a life style of "girlfriends, jewelry and going out."

Mr. Corso, the government's chief witness in the trial's Las Vegas phase, traveled through the city wearing a recorder and acting as an oral historian of its underworld — a sort of Studs Terkel of Las Vegas crime. His testimony — and his tapes — are crucial to the prosecution because they allow the government to argue that the two defendants engaged in a criminal conspiracy that stretched from Brooklyn murder in the 1980's to a Las Vegas drug deal just last year.

Judge Jack B. Weinstein broached the topic of the statute of limitations — five years in a conspiracy case — before Mr. Corso took the stand. As prosecutors begin to wrap up their case, the judge said the issue was "coming to a head."

The first round of cross-examination was by Mr. Eppolito's lawyer, Bruce Cutler, who sought to paint the 50-year-old Mr. Corso as a debauched and profligate government pawn: a man, he said, who left $600,000 in "unpaid lines of credit at various and sundry casinos."

On Wednesday, Mr. Cutler, who has a taste for eloquent aggression, impugned Mr. Corso's professional conduct and patriotism, then lambasted him for having stooped so low as to record Mr. Eppolito while he was recovering from heart surgery in a hospital room.

LI Sting Halts Siberia Scheme (NSDY)

Feds arrest 4 on fraud charges, alleging that they tried to bilk $3 billion from Nassau investor with a promise to build an oil pipeline in Russia

The only thing that was real yesterday was the Republic of Buryatia.

Four alleged con men believed they were about to collect $3 billion yesterday from a wealthy Nassau County hedge fund operator for the "construction" of an oil pipeline through that obscure Siberian region, federal officials said.

But the four - including two alleged bankers from a Georgia Indian tribe - ended up being arrested on fraud charges by federal agents on Long Island, in Montana and in Georgia. The agents were running a sting operation aimed at financial confidence men.

In several months of negotiations on Long Island, the four alleged confidence men claimed that they were the representatives of the Republic of Buryatia, whose government was planning to build a 2,500-mile oil pipeline through Siberia, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney James Miskiewicz and court records.

Initial collateral insuring the financial safety of the project was allegedly $10 billion in American treasury bonds that had been loaned to the republic by the U.S. government in the 1990s, Miskiewicz said. The men claimed the bonds were being used as leverage to get even more money for the "Trans Siberian Oil Pipeline." The hedge fund operator was promised very high rates of interest for his $3 billion, officials said.

Buryatia is an autonomous Russian region in southeastern Siberia with a population of about a million, many of whom are of Mongolian descent living as nomadic herders. But the alleged confidence men had no connection to Buryatia, nor had the U.S. government loaned the land the billions of dollars, officials said.

The hedge fund operator was an unidentified Long Island man who had pleaded guilty to securities fraud and worked on sting operations for the FBI and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service to get a lighter sentence, according to court documents.

During the course of the sting operation, the alleged confidence men produced documents supporting their role in the project and the existence of the $10 billion in various types of U.S. treasury financial instruments, but all of the documents were forged, officials said.

Rodney Sampson was arrested on Long Island yesterday when he came to meet with the hedge fund operator to finalize the $3-billion investment.

Sampson said he was the chief operating officer of the Magnolia International Bank and Trust in Atlanta, officials said. On its Web site, Magnolia identified itself as organized under the laws of the Nu Altamaha Yamassee Indian nation and serving as the central bank for that tribe and other Indian tribes. Officials said the Yamassee are not recognized by the federal government as an Indian tribe, and the bank was actually a one-page Web site with an address of a public housing project.

James Campbell Jr., of Clarinda, Iowa, also was arrested when he came to the Long Island meeting.

In Atlanta yesterday, federal agents arrested Emerson Corsey, the supposed chief financial officer of Magnolia; and in Whitefish, Mont., agents arrested John Juncal, who identified himself as Buryatia's counsel in the United States.

Sampson and Campbell were arraigned before Magistrate Michael Orenstein in U.S. District Court in Central Islip, where they were held without bail as flight risks.

Campbell's attorney, Richard Miller of Islandia, and Sampson's attorney, federal public defender Michael Weil, declined to comment after the arraignment, as did prosecutor Miskiewicz.

Corsey and Juncal were scheduled to have hearings later in the day in Georgia and Montana.

Given the amount of money involved in the alleged fraud, the four face up to 20 years each in prison if convicted.

Flint Man Charged With Producing Child Pornography (AP)

AP, March 24, 2006

Prosecutors Will Seek Maximum Sentences, Avoid Plea Deals

DETROIT -- U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy on Thursday announced child pornography charges against a Flint man and said he was launching a new initiative to crack down on what he said is a growing Internet trade in such images.

Alan Sain, 25, was indicted Wednesday on charges that he enticed, coerced and used a child to engage in sexually explicit conduct and produced pictures of the acts. He is also accused of transporting child pornography in interstate commerce and with possession of child pornography.

Sexual exploitation of children and transportation of child pornography are each punishable by up to 30 years in prison. Possession of child pornography is punishable by up to 10 years in prison.

In an affidavit that accompanied an initial complaint against Sain filed last week, FBI Special Agent Jennie McGlynn Emmons described posting a profile on several Yahoo! interest groups she said were associated with child exploitation. Emmons said Sain contacted her, chatted online with her and sent her child pornography.

Sain claimed he was the adult in the images and as proof offered a picture of what appeared to be the same couch as one visible in the pornographic images, according to Emmons' affidavit.

A message seeking comment was left Thursday for Sain's attorney.

In announcing the charges against Sain, Murphy also unveiled a new Child Protection Initiative out of his office, which covers the eastern district of Michigan.

Under the initiative, prosecutors in Murphy's office will seek the maximum sentences for child exploitation offenses and will not make plea deals. Seven assistant U.S. attorneys will be designated to receive special training on handling child exploitation cases, and an Internet safety program will be offered at local schools.

Murphy said the initiative was in the works before the Sain case and was "prompted by what I have (found) to be a disturbing uptick in the number of these cases that we're seeing."

Nationally, the illicit child pornography trade is estimated to do $3 billion in business annually, he said.

In Michigan, there are about 65 open child exploitation cases "and more in the pipeline from federal agencies." In 2000, when Murphy was an assistant U.S. attorney, the office had fewer than 10 such cases, he said.

"It's totally associated with the Internet," he said, adding that investigation of such crimes had also increased since that time.

U.S. Beefs Up Child Porn Fight (DEN)

Detroit News, March 24, 2006

U.S. Attorney's office will seek maximum penalties, including against a Clio man charged with abuse.

DETROIT -- The U.S. attorney's office will seek maximum penalties for all who abuse or exploit children as part of a new initiative announced Thursday to fight child pornography.

U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy said he has assigned seven assistant attorneys, led by Assistant Attorney John O'Brien, to become experts on child exploitation cases.

Murphy's office also will work more closely with other federal, state and local law enforcement agencies and will launch an Internet safety and awareness program in local schools, he said at a news conference in Detroit.

"If we can't do all we can to protect (children), then we can't do much," Murphy said. "We intend to put these sick individuals in jail for as long as we possibly can."

Murphy also announced a three-count indictment against a Flint-area man on child pornography charges.

Alan Sain, 28, of Clio is charged with enticing a child to engage in sexually explicit conduct, transmitting child pornography and possessing child pornography.

Sain, through e-mail contact with an undercover officer posing as a mother of a young girl, tried to set up a sexual encounter with the girl, officials said. Officials have evidence Sain abused a child or children and produced pornography himself, Murphy said.

But he would not comment on the age of the child or children allegedly involved or whether officials had been able to locate any of the children pictured in images Sain allegedly transmitted.

Sain, who is in custody and is to be arraigned in federal court in Flint on Monday, could not be reached for comment.

Under the policy announced Thursday, Murphy would seek a 30-year prison term on the enticement charge, which carries a minimum penalty of 15 years in prison upon conviction.

Murphy said child pornography is a $3 billion-a-year business and growing, with up to 3,000 child predators using the Internet at any given time. The eastern district of Michigan has 65 child exploitation cases under investigation, he said.

Former Scout Leader Sentenced For Child Porn (AP)

ATLANTA (AP) — A north Georgia man who served more than five years as a Boy Scout troop leader has been sentenced to probation and home confinement for possessing dozens of video clips of child pornography, authorities said.

Samuel J. Port, 35, of Ball Ground, was sentenced Wednesday in federal court to eight years probation and six months of home confinement for possessing dozens of video clips of child pornography, according to a news release from the U.S. Attorney's office in Atlanta.

Port came to the attention of the FBI after he brought in his employer-owned computer for maintenance, according to the release. A service technician spotted the items on PORT's computer and notified authorities.

The FBI did a forensic scan of PORT's computer and discovered more than 100 movie clips containing pornography related to young boys. PORT, who has no children, had been active in a local boy scout troop for over five years, according to the release.

PORT was indicted in July 2005 and pleaded guilty in January to a single count of possessing child pornography. Assistant United States Attorney Robert C.I. McBurney prosecuted the case.

Four Men Charged In Nigeria E-mail Scam (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, March 23, 2006

A quartet of suspected e-mail scammers--three of them Nigerian citizens--could face scores of years in prison if convicted on fraud and conspiracy charges, the U.S. Justice Department said Thursday.

A grand jury in Brooklyn, N.Y., on Wednesday charged Nnamdi Chizuba Anisiobi, Anthony Friday Ehis, Kesandu Egwuonwu and another unnamed defendant with one count of conspiracy, eight counts of wire fraud and one count of mail fraud. Anisiobi also faces one count of bank fraud.

According to the Justice Department's charges, New York-based victims of the e-mail scams lost more than $1.2 million to the fraudsters.

Their schemes resembled a popular fraud ploy, sometimes called a 419 scam, or an advance-fee scheme, that has dogged the African nation. Their perpetrators typically send letters and e-mails to thousands of victims, offering a large sum of money and attempt to dupe them into paying fees beforehand. The criminals then pocket the cash and shirk their end of the fake bargain.

One incident described in the 27-page indictment involved a suspect who posed as a suffering throat-cancer patient native to the Southeast Asian nation of Brunei. He said he was too ill to distribute his cache of $55 million to charity and needed help, promising a 20 percent commission in return. But anyone who fell for the offer encountered a number of bogus "shipment" and processing fees numbering in the tens of thousands of dollars.

Three of the suspects were first arrested in February in Amsterdam, where they were living at the time. They are being held by authorities until their extradition to the United States. The fourth suspect is a fugitive.

If convicted, they could face up to 20 years in prison for mail and wire fraud, 30 years for bank fraud, and five years for the conspiracy charge.

Dutch authorities, which initiated the investigation, are no strangers to dealing with suspected Nigerian scammers. In 2004, their bust of a suspected ring yielded 52 arrests.

Last year, a Nigerian court sentenced a woman to two-and-a-half years in prison after she pleaded guilty to conspiring in what was called the nation's biggest scam case ever--a $242 million fraud incident involving a Brazilian bank. The country has stepped up its focus on the problem in recent months, teaming up with Microsoft and British officials to spread warnings about scammers.

Prosecutors Seek Death Penalty Against Kingpin, Delaying NY Trial (AP)

By TOM HAYS, The Associated Press

AP, March 23, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) — The murder conspiracy trial of a notorious crack kingpin with ties to the rap music industry was postponed on Thursday after prosecutors told a judge that the Department of Justice wants him and his four co-defendants to face the death penalty.

U.S. District Judge Frederic Bloch rescheduled the trial of Kenneth "Supreme" McGriff, previously set for April 3, for April 17. He said he would rule by April 10 on the government's death penalty request.

At a hearing in federal court in Brooklyn, defense attorney David Ruhnke called the government's request an 11th-hour "sham" imposed by a pro-death penalty Justice Department and designed to buy prosecutors more time to prepare their case. He argued that the allegations don't meet the federal standards for a capital case.

Seeking death for defendant Nicole Brown — accused of being a lookout in the 2001 retaliation slaying of a rapper known as E-Money Bags — in particular "is simply absurd," he said.

Prosecutor Carolyn Pokorny insisted the request was legitimate, saying, "It's something that got a really close look in Washington."

McGriff was founder of the Supreme Team, once one of the city's most violent drug crews. Investigators allege that after he finished serving about nine years for drug conspiracy in 1997 he set about reviving his drug-dealing operation.

Cooperating witnesses have told investigators McGriff admitted killing E-Money Bags in Queens. He also allegedly arranged the Baltimore killing a month later of a suspected informant in his drug organization.

McGriff originally was indicted along with his friend Irving Lorenzo, founder of Murder Inc. and the producer of chart-topping acts like Ja Rule and Ashanti. After being granted a separate trial, Lorenzo and his brother Christopher Lorenzo were acquitted late last year of money laundering charges.

Prosecutors had said McGriff funneled more than $1 million in drug proceeds, much of it from Baltimore, through Murder Inc. in return for serving as the Lorenzos' protector and enforcer. A government witness who worked at the label testified he saw a "huge amount" of money delivered in shopping bags and a shoe box in 2000.

In court papers filed Thursday, prosecutors argued that McGriff deserved the death penalty because the killings were premeditated and because he has an extensive criminal record.

"The defendant poses risk of future dangerousness as manifested by a continued pattern of violence" and a "lack of remorse," the papers said.

Alva Doctor Indicted For Health Care Fraud (ALVARC)

Alva (OK) Review-Courier, March 24, 2006

Oklahoma City, Oklahoma — An Alva physician was indicted today for fraudulently billing Medicare for the administration of significantly more medication than was actually given to his patients. DR. GREGORY GLASE PINEGAR, 42, of Alva, Oklahoma, was charged with two counts of health care fraud by a federal grand jury indictment, which also seeks forfeiture of $422,838.57.

Dr. Pinegar is a family practice physician operating his own medical offices in Alva, Oklahoma, who served approximately 300 Medicare eligible patients.

The indictment focuses on two prescription medications: Procrit and Remicade. Procrit is administered by injection and is primarily used to treat anemia in patients with serious kidney disease as well as anemia caused by certain medications, such as some types of chemotherapy and medications to treat HIV. Remicade is administered by intravenous infusions and primarily used to treat patients with moderate to severe Crohn's disease or used to reduce signs and symptoms of rheumatoid arthritis in adults.

The indictment alleges that after Dr. Pinegar or a nurse would give the Procrit injections or supervise the Remicade IV infusions, they would mark the amount of medication given on an office billing form.

Before his office sent the billing information to Medicare the indictment alleges, Dr. Pinegar would fraudulently alter the billing forms to show that his office had administered drugs that were not actually administered or that his office had administered drugs in quantities greater than actually administered.

Specifically, the indictment alleges that from January of 2000 through May of 2005, Dr. Pinegar's office ordered no more than approximately 7,400,000 units of Procrit from suppliers but billed Medicare for approximately 19,750,000 units, totaling $184,502.32.

The indictment also alleges that during that from January of 2003, through May of 2005, Dr. Pinegar's office ordered no more than approximately 49,600 milligrams of Remicade from suppliers but billed Medicare for approximately 112,110 milligrams, totaling $526,160.25.

If convicted, Pinegar faces up to ten years in prison, a fine of up to $250,000, mandatory restitution, and forfeiture of $422,838.57.

The case is the result of an investigation conducted by the Office of Inspector General for the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services and the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

This case is being prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney Scott E. Williams.

The public is reminded that the indictment is merely an accusation and that the defendant is presumed innocent unless and until proven guilty.

Reference is made to the indictment for further information.

Las Vegas Sun, March 24, 2006

Before Steve Fezzik put money on today's Texas-West Virginia game in the national men's college basketball championship, the Las Vegas man did some comparison shopping online.

A quick search of Internet sports books revealed average offers for bets that the total points made during the game would fall under 132. But Fezzik, a handicapper and frequent sports bettor, already knew that a couple of Vegas casinos had better odds.

On Sunday, he bet $2,000 on the game to go under 134 at the Palms and put another $500 to go under 134.5 at the Las Vegas Hilton.

Online, or "offshore" sports books might seem irrelevant in a town with dozens of sports books and more than 35 on the Strip alone.

That couldn't be further from the truth.

Online sports betting sites aren't just flourishing in the rest of the country, where sports books are illegal everywhere except Nevada. Internet sites have found a hot spot in Nevada and especially in Las Vegas, home to one of the biggest concentration of gamblers and a place where bettors come from all over the world to hone their skills.

No one knows how much of this year's estimated $118 billion in online sports book bets will be made by Nevadans.

But experts say it's a large and growing number of people that includes many pros and even more amateurs who follow sports. Analysts expect the NCAA playoffs to attract at least $300 million in online bets, a 20 percent hike from last year. Some say the event is closing the gap on the Super Bowl, the No. 1 betting event in the country, which generated an estimated $500 million in online wagers this year.

"Anyone who really knows what they're doing is going to consider betting offshore as well as in Vegas," Fezzik said.

While pros have largely gravitated online, Internet sports books, like the multitude of online poker sites that have sprung up in recent years, are largely the realm of occasional bettors.

Amateurs come out in force during March Madness, a 65-team, 64-game event that attracts hordes of fans who make sentimental bets that their college team will win - or at least beat the point spread.

"They make their picks for their office pool, and now that they've thought about it, they think Boston College will beat Pacific by eight points," said Alex Czajkowski, marketing director for the U.S. division of Sportingbet, the world's largest online sports book.

Sports books have become brand-conscious giants of Internet commerce. Some of the biggest are traded on the London Stock Exchange, where that country is in the process of legalizing online gambling. There's now a sports book for every taste. Costa Rican site Bodog.com uses ads with leggy models to market to casual sports and poker players, while Pinnacle Sports is heavy on numbers rather than art, attracting regulars or "sharpies."

Like other major Internet companies, Sportingbet has a full-fledged advertising campaign that consists of billboards and television ads in the United States. The company has a billboard in New York's Times Square and in several other major cities, including Las Vegas.

"Vegas is where all our customers go," Czajkowski said. "But you can't just jump on a plane to Vegas every time you want to place a bet."

Sportingbet, which is headquartered in London and operates its computer servers from the Caribbean island of Antigua, isn't a law-abiding company, according to the Justice Department. Online sports betting also is considered illegal in Nevada, which prevents the transmission and placement of wagers by entities that aren't licensed by the state Gaming Control Board and Nevada Gaming Commission.

The Justice Department says Internet gambling is illegal in the United States based on a law known as the Wire Act. Some legal experts say the law, intended to combat illegal bookmaking by the Mafia in the 1960s, is outdated and doesn't apply to traditional casino games and poker games played online. But they generally agree that sports books are on much shakier legal ground.

"I think the law is fairly clear that if you're accepting (sports wagers) from the U.S., you're probably violating the Wire Act," Las Vegas attorney and Internet gambling expert Tony Cabot said.

The law was clarified in 2000 when Jay Cohen became the first person to be convicted for running an offshore gambling operation that accepted bets from Americans. That case determined that the bets occurred both in the United States and Antigua, and that Cohen violated U.S. law.

That hasn't deterred Internet operators, who say they are licensed in foreign countries where the wagers are accepted.

After the Cohen case, the Justice Department began sending out letters to media companies that took Internet gambling ads saying they could be "aiding and abetting" illegal activity. The feds took it one step further with The Sporting News Internet and print publications. In January, the company agreed to a $7.2 million settlement with the government for advertising online gambling sites. The settlement requires the Sporting News to run public service radio ads telling listeners that online gambling is illegal. Those spots have run nationwide, including in Las Vegas.

Sportingbet and other operators have found creative ways to promote their wares in the United States, particularly around events like March Madness. The company has still had difficulty running television ads, even ads for the company's educational sports tips Web site, called sportsbook.net.

"The Department of Justice has scared media owners into submission," Czajkowski said. "That was a few years ago, and every now and then (the DOJ) will send a letter around or make a few calls. Everyone is still pretty jittery about it."

The company's preferred marketing method is billboards, which are grabbing the attention of potential customers while appearing to fall under the government's radar screen.

BetOnSports, another top sports book, also has an aggressive ad campaign that includes billboards as well as taxicab signs, public transit posters and radio spots.

"It's been a struggle" to advertise under the Justice Department's watch, Betonsports.com spokesman Kevin Smith said. The company, also traded on the London Stock Exchange, is based in Costa Rica but is licensed in Antigua, where its computer servers take bets.

Instead of promoting a nongambling ".net" site like other Internet sites have done, the company's radio ads simply mention the "Betonsports" brand and an 800 number where callers can learn sports lingo and betting tips. That number is different from the number customers call to make a bet, Smith said.

Like any maturing industry, online books are aiming to grow by diversifying their businesses beyond just sports. Many now offer other casino games and have been particularly successful capitalizing on poker, which attracts many people who also bet sports.

"There's a great synergy between the two," Czajowski said. "People come online to play poker, and they're comfortable going and making a sports bet on the side."

Last year Sportingbet reconfigured its various Web brands so that customers can jump from one game or bet to another without registering all over again. Within seconds, customers can take their poker winnings and use that to bet on basketball, for example. Sites also are looking to expand beyond the United States, where business is expected to grow more slowly than other parts of the world in the years to come in part because of regulatory uncertainty.

Betonsports.com recently acquired an Asian sports book and is heating up its marketing efforts in Asia, one of the fastest-growing markets for gamblers, Smith said.

Meanwhile, sports fans across the United States are becoming more comfortable with online books in large part because of widespread televised broadcasts of poker tournaments and the mainstream appeal of online poker. Professional gamblers are abandoning longtime relationships with illegal bookies and gravitating online, experts say.

Illegal bookies maintain one key advantage: most accept bets without requiring the cash up front.

While bettors often pride themselves on their in-depth knowledge of a particular sport or even buy recommendations at hefty prices, a successful sports bet often turns on the difference between a point or even a half a point.

For bettors like Fezzik, that means refining their search for the best line - a search that's far easier to do online.

"You can drive around to 10 sports books in town and it'll take you three hours or you can look at 10 sports books online in three minutes," said Ted Sevransky, a local sports handicapper and radio personality known as "Teddy Covers."

Like the search for an undervalued stock, more sports bettors are approaching their bets like investments. Sports bettors now use sophisticated tools such as computer software that can post lines for more than 50 online sports books on one screen, allowing the bettor to find the best offer in seconds.

"The more sports books you visit the more chance you have of finding a game that's slightly misspriced," Sevransky said.

Searching for the best line most often separates the winners from the losers, Fezzik said. Online books will have better lines some of the time but not always, as in the case of the Texas-West Virginia game, he said.

"The most important aspect of sports betting is to get the best number," he said.

There's other advantages to betting online, gamblers say. Besides a shot at better odds, online sports books sometimes offer a reduced vigorish, or the fee bettors pay the casino to place a bet. While Las Vegas casinos typically offer $100 for every winning bet of $110, some Internet sites offer $100 on a $105 bet - a big difference for gamblers wagering hundreds or thousands of dollars at a pop.

Then there are other special offers, like million-dollar contests that are similar to casino contests but may offer bigger prizes because of the greater number of potential customers online promotions can attract.

Las Vegas casinos ultimately will benefit from the growth of online sports books, experts say.

"Ultimately it's good for the casinos," said Anthony Curtis, publisher of the Las Vegas Advisor consumer newsletter. "They'll get more players, more of them will come to Vegas, and when they're in Vegas, they'll make sports bets."

Czajkowski, a frequent visitor to Las Vegas, said online betting will never replace the real thing.

NCAA Gets Proactive On Gambling (KDKA-TV)

KDKA-TV, March 24, 2006

(CBS) ATLANTA Before the West Virginia Mountaineers took the practice court Thursday, the team had a little sit-down — with the FBI.

Special agent Tom Metz was invited by the NCAA to explain to the players how gambling on sports, especially on games involving their own teams, could ruin their lives, reports CBS News correspondent Jim Acosta.

"You have a lot of people out there. They want to be your friends for the wrong reasons," Metz tells the West Virginia players, who face Texas on Thursday night in the Sweet 16 of the tournament.

"We are trying to say to the student-athlete [that] they have a lot to lose," Metz adds.

NCAA gambling official Rachel Newman-Baker told the players, "If it's an NCAA-sponsored sport at either the college or professional level, you would not be allowed to bet on it, OK?"

This year athletic officials expanded their anti-betting program from the tournament's Final Four teams to the Sweet 16. It's an admission that the problem is bigger than the NCAA once thought.

Three years ago, an NCAA survey found 29 percent of its Division I male athletes had bet on sports — and that 2 percent had actually been asked to throw a game. Forget the figures on the scoreboard, those are the numbers that make the NCAA nervous.

The NCAA's biggest fear is "point-shaving," where gamblers manipulate players into missing shots or playing weak defense in order to bring the final score within the "point spread" set by oddsmakers in Las Vegas, where betting on the games is legal. A difference of a couple of points in the final score can mean winning or losing hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Stevin Smith was sent to prison for shaving points at Arizona State University in the early 90s. "I made a hell of a mistake that cost me my NBA career," Smith says.

Smith plays now in Russia. In a rare interview, he told CBS News that the pre-game lectures will make a difference.

"That's something that should have happened a long time ago. I think it would have prevented some things. It would have prevented me from doing what I did ... had I known the consequences," Smith admits.

West Virginia coach John Beilein welcomed the FBI visit.

"I wish they listened to me that attentively in some of our meetings because our guys were on the edge of their seat," Beilein says.

Just in case, the NCAA stays in constant contact with gambling officials in Las Vegas, as well as with the FBI, to get the message across.

Former Financier Resentenced To Prison (AP)

By MATT APUZZO, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 24, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. — A federal judge ordered Martin Frankel on Thursday to serve the same sentence he got in 2004 for stealing $200 million from insurance companies — nearly 17 years in a federal prison.

The former financier was ordered resentenced after a Supreme Court ruling last year gave judges more leeway in their use of sentencing guidelines.

During a brief hearing in U.S. District Court, Judge Ellen B. Burns said she saw no reason to alter the sentence.

"It seemed to me, that was the appropriate sentence to impose," she said.

Frankel, 51, wearing baggy brown prison scrubs and large glasses, stroked a long gray beard that he grew in prison as Burns reread the 200-month sentence. He spoke only briefly, asking Burns to note that he is at risk in prison.

Burns said she would. Defense attorney William Koch elaborated after court, saying the highly publicized case, which inspired two books, made Frankel "particularly vulnerable" to physical assaults in prison.

He will be eligible for release in 2015, according to the U.S. Bureau of Prisons. Frankel is serving his sentence at the federal prison in Otisville, N.Y.

Frankel was convicted of taking over and looting insurance companies in Arkansas, Mississippi, Oklahoma, Missouri and Tennessee.

He bought the insurance companies through a trust set up to hide his involvement, since he was barred from securities trading because of a similar scheme he committed years before in Ohio.

He claimed that he was investing the companies' assets, but instead stole the $200 million to pay for a two-house compound in Greenwich, luxury cars and several girlfriends, some of whom he met through ads for kinky sex.

Prosecutors said Frankel was motivated by greed, sexual desire and a lust for the high life.

Frankel fled the country in May 1999 shortly after a meeting with Mississippi regulators, who questioned his management of several insurance companies.

He was arrested in Germany four months later and pleaded guilty to 24 counts of fraud and racketeering in 2002.

U.S. Files Penny-Stock Mob Case (WSJ)

By Chad Bray

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

NEW YORK -- Men the government identifies as members of the reputed Colombo and Luchese organized-crime families were charged with manipulating the market for penny stocks as part of a broader racketeering case in Brooklyn.

In an indictment unsealed yesterday, the Justice Department's U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn alleged that at least six of 10 men the Federal Bureau of Investigation arrested on racketeering charges secretly controlled at least 15 branch offices of brokerage firms in the New York City boroughs of Brooklyn, Manhattan and Staten Island, through which the men ran a scheme to artificially inflate the price of the stocks.

Prosecutors said brokers misrepresented prospects of certain stocks to potential investors in exchange for large commissions. They said the defendants then sold their holdings in those stocks at inflated values, costing investors $20 million.

Named in the indictment specifically as operating through the branch offices were John Baudanza, 36 years old; Jerry Degerolamo, 34; Arthur Gunning, 40; Craig Leszczak, 31; Craig Marino, 36, and Robert Podlog, 32. Also indicted and arrested were Ronald Giallanzo, 35; Vincent Rossetti, 40; Joseph Baudanza, 61; and Carmine Baudanza, 63. Charges range from racketeering and extortion to conspiracy and securities fraud.

Joel Winograd, a lawyer for Joseph Baudanza, said his client has asserted his innocence and believes the indictment is a "farce." "He awaits his day in court and he will be vindicated at the end of this proceeding," Mr. Winograd said. "He knows as much about stocks as Joseph Stalin."

Michael Rosen, a lawyer for Mr. Podlog, said the indictment is merely an allegation and everyone who is charged with a crime is presumed innocent. "Any federal judge will tell you the indictment is nothing," Mr. Rosen said. "Evidence comes from the witness stand. We have had no witnesses."

A lawyer for Mr. Marino declined to comment; lawyers for the others couldn't be reached for comment.

Prosecutors allege the prices of more than a dozen stocks were artificially manipulated. They included shares of:

Legends Sports Inc., Axxess Inc., HTTP Technology Inc., Learner's World Inc., Rollerball International Inc., SIMS Communications Inc., Flexweight Corp., Rick's Cabaret International Inc., Blini Hut Inc., Orex Gold Mines Corp., Motorsports USA, Evans Systems Inc., Silver Star Foods and America's Hedge Fund.

Many of the stocks, which were allegedly referred to as "house stocks" by the defendants, were traded on the OTC Bulletin Board or the Nasdaq small-cap stock market (later renamed Nasdaq Capital Market), the government said. They were mostly small companies, start-ups or companies that did no business at all, according to the indictment.

Woman, 24, Says Neighbor Held Her Captive For 10 Years (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0020685

A girl who vanished more than 10 years ago was reunited yesterday with her mother in a Pittsburgh suburb two days after confiding to a store owner that she was being held captive, the police said.

"I guess she just chose me to lean on," said Joe Sparico, owner of J. J.'s Deli Mart in McKeesport, Pa., where the young woman, Tanya Nicole Kach, broke into tears on Tuesday while telling him that she was living with a man against her will. "I'm just glad she's happy and home now."

Ms. Kach, now 24, was 14 when she was reported missing on Feb. 10, 1996, after walking out of her father's house, two miles from where she said she had lived in secrecy.

"We're investigating this further, but I have to tell you there is still a lot we need to figure out," said Charles Moffatt, superintendent of the Allegheny County Police Department.

Ms. Kach said she had been living against her will with Thomas Hose, 48, a security guard at Cornell Intermediate School in McKeesport, where Ms. Kach was an eighth grader when she was reported missing, Mr. Moffatt said. For the first four years of captivity, she told the police, she was never permitted to leave the two-bedroom house, and Mr. Hose threatened to kill her if she told anyone about her captivity.

Locked in his bedroom, she was often forced to use a metal can for a toilet, she said, and even though he shared the house with his parents and his 22-year-old son, he forbade anyone to let her out, Ms. Kach told Mr. Sparico. In later years, Ms. Kach said, she was allowed to leave during the day, but she said she never spoke about her situation because she believed Mr. Hose's threats.

"I was so scared that nobody would believe me," Ms. Kach told WTAE-TV on Wednesday from the home of her father, Jerry Kach, in Elizabeth, a Pittsburgh suburb.

Mr. Sparico said, "From the way she was shaking when she told me, I think she really believed he would do it."

On Tuesday, after growing close to Mr. Sparico and his family over eight months, she revealed her secret.

"If you go to a Web site for missing children, you will see a picture of me there," he said she told him.

Mr. Sparico's wife, Janet, said Ms. Kach had told her in recent days that when she was in the eighth grade her parents were going through a contentious divorce and that she was convinced neither parent wanted her, leading her to run away.

At the time, Ms. Kach said, she had a crush on Mr. Hose, and when she confided her plans to leave home, he offered to take her in, Ms. Sparico said. "After that, I guess he never let her go," she added.

It was unclear why Ms. Kach did not seek help sooner, Superintendent Moffatt said, "but in my view, that part doesn't much matter, because you can't be 14 and make an adult decision that you want to be involved with an adult in this way."

Mr. Hose's lawyer, James M. Ecker, said his client was innocent. Mr. Hose has been charged with one count of statutory sexual assault and three counts of involuntary deviate sexual intercourse and released on $200 bail. "I think if the police believed she was being held against her will or that she was physically abused, they would have charged him with kidnapping or abuse," Mr. Ecker said. "But they didn't."

A woman who answered the phone at Mr. Hose's house said she had no comment.

Ms. Sparico said of Ms. Kach, "She was always well put together, like a little Barbie doll, and I never saw any signs of physical abuse."

She added, "But I have spoken with her quite a bit and I think that she was really brainwashed by this guy."

After Ms. Kach told her secret to Mr. Sparico, he said he immediately called his son Shawn, a retired detective with the McKeesport police who had worked on Ms. Kach's case.

Interviewed by WTAE-TV, Ms. Kach's mother, Sherri Koehnke, said, "It's the best ending I could have thought about when I thought about what could have happened to her."

Daughter's Reappearance Answered Mother's Prayers (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

USA Today, March 24, 2006

For 10 years Sherri Koehnke of West Mifflin, Pa., bore the mystery of her daughter's disappearance in near silence. She cried in private, and only a handful of her friends knew that Tanya Kach went missing at age 14, said Koehnke's husband, Craig.

DOJ_NMG_0020686

Then the couple joined a church and, three weeks ago, Sherri Koehnke told the pastor and started praying for her daughter's return.

This week, Kach, now 24, turned up alive and well.

Allegheny County Police Superintendent Charles Moffatt said Kach was a runaway and had been living at the home of a security guard from her middle school who held her indoors for four years. He told her she was stupid and unwanted by anyone but him, Kach said. She was just 2 miles from her father's house she had fled in McKeesport, Pa.

Thomas Hose, 48, was suspended from his job Thursday and arrested on charges of statutory sexual assault and involuntary deviate sexual intercourse. His lawyer, James Ecker, said Hose did not hold the girl against her will.

Kach had been living under a different name, Nikki Allen, and later became a regular customer at J.J.'s Deli Mart in McKeesport, owner Joseph Sparico said.

"She just wanted to have somebody as a friend, somebody to talk to," Sparico said. "You've got to understand, this girl hadn't been in the outside world.

"I'd ask her questions about why she was there and why she was with an older gentleman," Sparico recalled.

On Tuesday, the neatly dressed blonde opened up. "She said 'I just want to find my father,' " Sparico said. " 'If you go on a website, you'll see that I've been missing for 10 years.' "

Sparico contacted the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. Kach and her father, Jerry Kach, were reunited Wednesday. Sherri Koehnke and Tanya had talked with each other but not met as of Thursday evening.

Kach is among 14 missing children found alive after 10 or more years, according to the center.

"The Lord answered our prayers. It's just that simple," Craig Koehnke said.

Evidence Of Wiretaps Used In Suit (NYT)

By David M. Halbfinger and Allison Hope Weiner

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

LOS ANGELES, March 23 — A screenwriter and his lawyer talk on the phone. They are in the heat of legal battle with a big-time producer over the profits from a hit movie. The lawyer says which of their arguments he thinks are strongest and how much he thinks their opponents will agree to pay in a settlement.

A New Account of an Old Bank Account Unbeknownst to both of them, Anthony Pellicano is listening in, and taking notes, court filings say.

Mr. Pellicano, the celebrity detective charged with wiretapping and conspiracy in the biggest Hollywood scandal in generations, stands accused of intercepting conversations of scores of unwitting people, many involved in high-profile lawsuits.

But what the federal indictment of Mr. Pellicano failed to spell out was just how he put his wiretaps to use.

Now, the first direct evidence of eavesdropping by Mr. Pellicano has surfaced in newly filed court documents: excerpts of what prosecutors have described as Mr. Pellicano's summaries of conversations he intercepted in 2001 between Vincent Zenga, a screenwriter and producer known as Bo, and his lawyer, Gregory S. Dovel, during their contentious suit against the influential Hollywood executive Brad Grey, now head of Paramount Pictures.

No victim figures more prominently in the indictment than Mr. Zenga, who has been advised by prosecutors that his phone was wiretapped over three months in early 2001. At a pivotal point in that suit, prosecutors say, Mr. Pellicano obtained personal information illegally on seven people involved in the suit against Mr. Grey — including Mr. Zenga's lawyer, his wife, his brother and a former business partner.

Such information was often used to arrange a wiretap, and prosecutors have told Mr. Dovel and Mr. Zenga that Mr. Pellicano intercepted their calls, including some in which Mr. Dovel tipped his hand on their legal strategy.

Prosecutors, Mr. Dovel said, gave him a sampling of Mr. Pellicano's notes on those intercepts so the lawyer-client privilege could be waived, freeing the government to use the notes against Mr. Pellicano. Mr. Dovel, in turn, has incorporated those notes into an amended complaint, filed Thursday in California Superior Court in Los Angeles.

Mr. Zenga's suit now accuses Mr. Pellicano; his accomplices; Mr. Grey; his company, Brillstein-Grey Entertainment; his lawyer, Bert Fields; and Mr. Fields's law firm, Greenberg Glusker Fields Claman Machtinger & Kinsella, of invasion of privacy, disclosure of confidential information and illegal wiretapping.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Grey, Janet Hill, called the complaint "meritless," saying, "Brad Grey has no knowledge of wiretapping or any other illegal conduct by Mr. Pellicano."

Mr. Fields has denied knowing of any illicit acts by Mr. Pellicano. His lawyer, John W. Keker, could not be reached. The lead prosecutor, Daniel A. Saunders, declined to comment.

"If any wiretapping took place, it was not done at the direction or with the knowledge of Greenberg Glusker or any attorney in that firm," said Brian A. Sun, a lawyer representing the firm. "We believe that like Mr. Zenga's first lawsuit, any claims in this lawsuit against Brillstein-Grey or Greenberg Glusker are wholly lacking in merit."

Steven F. Gruel, Mr. Pellicano's lawyer, said he had not seen the new complaint, but called it "puzzling" that the government had given evidence to Mr. Dovel that had yet to be shared with the criminal defendants.

The government has not presented any evidence that Mr. Pellicano turned his notes over to Mr. Grey or to any of his lawyers, none of whom have been charged.

In addition, any prosecution that relies on Mr. Zenga's credibility may start out at a serious disadvantage: Mr. Zenga was found by a California appeals court to have repeatedly lied — in his business dealings with Mr. Grey's company and under oath in the lawsuit. He asserted his Fifth Amendment right not to incriminate himself in refusing to answer hundreds of questions under oath, and was barred from testifying at trial; his suit against Mr. Grey was thrown out of court for lack of evidence.

The new lawsuit seeks to overturn the trial court's ruling. Mr. Zenga declined to comment for this article.

The dispute between Mr. Zenga and Mr. Grey grew out of Mr. Zenga's contention that he had made an oral agreement with Brillstein-Grey Entertainment to be producing partners in a film project that became the hit 2000 comedy "Scary Movie." In his lawsuit, Mr. Zenga claimed that Mr. Grey cut him out of an equal share of the movie's profits.

A New Account of an Old Bank Account Mr. Grey's lawyers argued that there was no such deal, and that Mr. Zenga had agreed in writing to take less money and misrepresented his credentials to Mr. Grey's company.

In his deposition in September 2000, Mr. Zenga was questioned extensively about his background, including his winning a screenwriting contest held by Hanover Square Productions in 1992. After denying under oath that he knew who ran Hanover Square, Mr. Zenga recanted a day later, saying he had been "overmedicated." Mr. Zenga admitted that he owned the company with a partner, Stacy Codikow, but insisted the contest was her project and that his only role in it was as an entrant.

The damage to Mr. Zenga's credibility was lasting, but the lawsuit continued. On Feb. 1, it was Mr. Zenga's turn to take testimony from Mr. Grey. Over three arduous days of questioning, Mr. Dovel challenged Mr. Grey on his own credentials as a movie producer, got him to acknowledge that he rarely investigated the backgrounds of those with whom he did business, and confronted him with an internal e-mail message in which Mr. Grey had appeared to acknowledge Mr. Zenga's partnership with Mr. Grey's company.

The deposition, which Mr. Grey's lawyers called "a calculated effort to bully" him, ended late on Feb. 5. The next day, prosecutors say, Mr. Pellicano had a police source illegally run background checks on Mr. Zenga and his brother, and on Feb. 13, had an accomplice at the phone company obtain information about Mr. Zenga.

Prosecutors say Mr. Pellicano also ran background checks on others in the Zenga case, including Mr. Dovel. They have not said when the wiretapping of Mr. Zenga's phone began, but Mr. Dovel was given notes, typewritten by Mr. Pellicano, of conversations beginning Feb. 14, 2001.

That day, Ms. Codikow, also represented by Mr. Dovel, was questioned under oath by Charles N. Shephard, a partner at Greenberg Glusker, who repeatedly asked where Hanover Square had done its banking. She said she had no idea. Minutes before her testimony was over, Mr. Shephard asked about another screenwriting competition called the Independent Filmmakers Program. She denied knowledge of it, then claimed she had only been one of its judges.

Mr. Dovel recalled that Ms. Codikow — who did not respond to a telephone message seeking comment — told him immediately afterward that she had lied, and had actually run the latter contest. Mr. Dovel said he urged her to tell the truth, but she refused. That night, Mr. Dovel said, he told Mr. Zenga of Ms. Codikow's admission, and how he would have to drop her as a client if she did not change her testimony.

Mr. Dovel then read aloud from Mr. Pellicano's summary of that conversation: "Bo does not trust Stacy and Greg may have to attack Stacy and if so, he can't represent her."

The rupture between Mr. Dovel and Ms. Codikow, discovered here by Mr. Pellicano, would soon come back to haunt Mr. Zenga.

Mr. Dovel said he and Mr. Zenga also discussed the questions about Hanover Square's bank account. The two men wondered aloud what bank records might show, Mr. Dovel said, and Mr. Zenga volunteered to begin the arduous process of getting old records from his bank.

As Mr. Zenga called his bank and said what he was looking for, Mr. Dovel said, Mr. Pellicano was monitoring his progress, as described in the investigator's summaries.

Mr. Dovel's partner, Julien A. Adams, asserted that through his eavesdropping, Mr. Pellicano had hit upon the key to tracking down the account. "If you sent out a subpoena through normal means, you wouldn't know how to ask for it," he said. "Because it was an old bank that had been bought by a new bank, at a branch that didn't exist anymore."

On Feb. 20, Mr. Grey's lawyers revealed that they had learned all they needed about Mr. Zenga's old account at the defunct branch of a bank that had since changed hands.

Also on Feb. 20, Mr. Dovel informed Ms. Codikow that he could no longer represent her. Six weeks later, Ms. Codikow, with a new lawyer, testified that Mr. Zenga was involved in the contest and that she lied about it only because he had pressured her to and she was afraid of him.

"When Pellicano came in, suddenly it was like a bomb exploded," Mr. Dovel said. "It was like they had access to everything. They were flipping witnesses. If they could take Stacy Codikow, a friend of Bo's, and next thing you know, she's openly lying — what else is he going to be able to accomplish?"

Pentagon Orders Investigation Of Cunningham's MZM Earmark (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Undersecretary of Defense Stephen A. Cambone has ordered an internal study of how funding earmarked in a bill by then-Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) led to contracts for MZM Inc. to do work for the Pentagon's newest intelligence agency, the Counterintelligence Field Activity, a Defense Department spokesman said.

Cunningham pleaded guilty last November to tax evasion and taking bribes from contractors, including the former president of MZM, Mitchell J. Wade. Wade pleaded guilty last month to bribery-related charges and to making illegal campaign contributions to Cunningham and other legislators.

In documents filed in Cunningham's case, prosecutors said that in fiscal 2003 legislation, the congressman, who was a member of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, set aside, or earmarked, $6.3 million for work to be done "to benefit" the Counterintelligence Field Activity (CIFA), created in 2002. Federal prosecutors have been looking into whether Pentagon personnel committed crimes in awarding CIFA contracts to MZM.

Cmdr. Greg Hicks, a Pentagon spokesman, confirmed yesterday that Cambone has ordered an internal inquiry. Hicks said he was "unable to comment on MZM contracts or related matters since they are the subject of ongoing investigations by the appropriate organizations in the department and the U.S. government."

Hicks added that Cambone's request to CIFA focused on the undersecretary's "desire to understand the temporal relationship between the congressional earmark and contract actions taken by the department."

Court documents show that in at least one case Wade drafted the language of an earmark that Cunningham submitted, which later led to a contract for MZM. Wade also hired the son of the Defense Department official who had authority over a contract later given MZM, the documents show.

Meanwhile, new information continues to emerge about MZM and its activities.

In 2004, three MZM employees served as staff consultants to the presidential commission investigating prewar Iraq intelligence, which was run by federal Judge Laurence H. Silberman and former senator Charles S. Robb (D-Va.). One of the three was retired Lt. Gen. James C. King, who then was a senior vice president of MZM for national security. King, who before joining MZM had been director of the National Imagery and Mapping Agency, played a consultant's role in the establishment of CIFA in 2002 before MZM received its first contracts from that agency.

The Silberman-Robb commission report in 2005 recommended that CIFA play a bigger role in the government's counterterrorism activities. In an interview, Silberman said King was not involved in the commission's recommendation that CIFA get more work. "That recommendation was not from King," Silberman said. And the other two MZM employees on the commission staff worked on FBI matters, not Pentagon issues, Silberman said.

Last year, MZM was purchased by the investment firm Veritas Capital, which changed its name to Athena Innovative Solutions Inc., with King as president. A spokesman for Athena said this month that neither King nor the company will comment on MZM or matters under investigation. The fact that MZM employees had worked with the commission has been written about on War and Piece and other Web logs.

Part Of Ex-Congressman's Ruined Life On Auction Block (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

RANCHO DOMINGUEZ, Calif., March 23 — In a final indignity after a stunning fall, pieces of the ruined life of former Representative Randy Cunningham were auctioned off in a government warehouse here on Thursday morning.

A pair of candlesticks, a dozen Oriental rugs, three mirrored armoires, a marble-topped commode and a cedar-lined lingerie cabinet, 35 items in all, went under the auctioneer's gavel. They brought the government $94,625, about two-thirds of the $150,000 that the military contractors who gave the items to Mr. Cunningham as bribes reportedly paid for them.

The items were lined up against the back wall of the chilly warehouse, forlorn and out of place. They had been intended to furnish the California mansion in Rancho Santa Fe, north of San Diego, that Mr. Cunningham's co-conspirators helped him buy in exchange for lucrative Pentagon contracts.

Mr. Cunningham, 64, a Republican who is known as Duke, forfeited the house and furnishings as part of the plea deal he struck with the government in November. He still owes the government $1.85 million — the estimated value of the cash bribes he received — and another $1.8 million in back taxes and penalties.

He also owes the United States the next eight years and four months of his life in federal prison, the harshest sentence ever meted out to a current or former member of Congress. He is at the low-security Federal Correctional Institution in Butner, N.C., for medical evaluation and permanent assignment to a federal prison cell.

It was a woeful end to the sordid tale of a former Navy fighter ace and "Top Gun" instructor who sold his office, his reputation and his honor for a house, a boat, a Rolls-Royce and the items on the auction block on Thursday. Mr. Cunningham disposed of the car and the boat before the government charged him.

Tino and Tatia Metzger, a husband-and-wife team of real estate agents from Temecula, Calif., came to the auction to bid on a 2001 Mercedes-Benz S500 seized by the government in a case unrelated to Mr. Cunningham's. They did not know until they arrived that the notorious congressman's extorted furnishings were also to be sold. The Metzgers bought the lingerie cabinet (said to date from the 1920's) for $2,300 and a king-size cherry wood sleigh bed for $1,750.

Mr. Metzger said he hoped the criminal provenance of the lingerie cabinet brings it added value, or at least cachet as a conversation piece. "Maybe I can resell it on eBay for twice what we paid," he said. "The bed we just liked, and we're going to keep it."

The proceeds of the auction will go to the Internal Revenue Service's criminal investigation division and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, two of the agencies that investigated Mr. Cunningham's crimes.

Britney Sheehan, a spokeswoman for EG&G Technical Services, which conducted the auction, said the company could not vouch for the authenticity or the condition of any of the Cunningham loot on sale. The auction catalog notes that a number of the pieces of furniture have missing handles, cracked marble tops, loose molding and other damage. Some of the rugs are stained.

The auction was held in a warehouse complex in Rancho Dominguez, about 20 miles south of downtown Los Angeles.

A number of pieces sold for less than the government had hoped to get for them, although reserve prices were not published in advance. Some pieces may have fetched more than they were worth, according to some participants.

For example, Emilio Viscomi of Dana Point, Calif., the most aggressive of the bidders, paid $10,000 for a blue-bordered 10-by-13-foot rug described in the catalog as a handmade antique from Iran.

But David Javaheri, a rug dealer at the auction, said the rug was a modern Chinese machine-made piece. "In Iran, a rug dealer would kiss your hand if you paid him $300 and then pay to ship it to you," Mr. Javaheri said. Another rug merchant, Avner Kadosh, said it was not such a bad piece and was worth maybe $3,000. "I buy and sell these things all the time," he said.

Turnout for the auction was relatively strong, Ms. Sheehan said, with more than 500 bidders registered by the 9 a.m. start. She said they were drawn not by the allure or quality of Mr. Cunningham's possessions, but by the 20 cars, the cases of Scotch, the bags of cultured pearls, the gold-crusted Rolex watch and the cartons of contraband cigarettes taken from tax cheats, drug dealers and import-export racketeers.

Prosecutors described Mr. Cunningham's crimes as "a numbing betrayal on an epic scale." His principal co-conspirator in the case, Mitchell Wade, a military contractor, pleaded guilty in federal court to a number of charges, including paying Mr. Cunningham $1 million in bribes.

Phillip L. B. Halpern, an assistant United States attorney who helped prosecute Mr. Cunningham, said the auction was one way the government was trying to collect his debt to society.

"We're trying to ensure that the U.S. taxpayer doesn't have to suffer a loss because of the congressman's crimes," Mr. Halpern said. "The government is attempting to disgorge all of the congressman's ill-gotten gains."

Underwhelming Turnout For Ill-Gotten Booty (LAT)

By Kelly-anne Suarez And Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, March 24, 2006

Randy "Duke" Cunningham has commanded public attention for the last year as he fell from a position of power in Congress to disgrace and federal prison after he admitted taking $2.4 million in bribes.

The fascination appears to be over.

The much-ballyhooed Internal Revenue Service auction of the contents of Cunningham's San Diego County home — acquired largely as the wages of corruption — drew little response this morning, despite heavy advance publicity.

Few among the hundreds of people who showed up at the regular IRS auction at a cavernous warehouse in Rancho Dominguez were aware that the infamous politician's belongings were available. But by the end of the auction this afternoon, all 34 pieces from Cunningham's home had sold, for a total of $94,625.

Among the assets Cunningham forfeited were antique sideboards and French armoires.

The first to go was a Gorham pair of silver candelabras, which sold for $2,000. The buyer declined to comment.

The top Cunningham item was a large oriental rug that went for $10,000. The least expensive were three rattan panels that fetched a total of $225.

A chest of drawers for lingerie brought $2,300, a lamp $850, a nightstand $650, and an armoire $2,750.

Robert Ro of Fullerton said he was not aware that Cunningham's furniture was on sale. He said he came for rugs, but might bid on some of the Cunningham household goods.

"I think he got a better deal when he got those bribes," Ro said. "But hopefully I can get as good, if not better, here."

Billy and Christy Abney came from Bakersfield with their 1-year-old son looking for a car. They were not aware of the Cunningham items, but Christy quickly focused on the former congressman's rugs.

"I have a bad feeling we might be walking away with one of these rugs instead of the car we came for," Billy lamented.

There was lively interest in some of the other items up for auction, such as the diamond-encrusted Rolex and Cartier wristwatches, the 3,988 heating pads, and 156 bottles of Glenfiddich scotch that were not part of the Cunningham loot.

DOJ_NMG_0020691

There was a silver Mercedes-Benz up for bid (alas, the Ferrari Modena has been withdrawn).

The IRS splits the proceeds among the agencies that investigated the cases that led to the forfeitures.

This morning, so many media reporters were present that one auction aficionado said the prices were affected.

James Garofalo of Montebello, who described himself as a regular auction-goer, said he came for a brown leather couch from the Cunningham booty.

Garofalo said he had hoped to pay $300, but with all the hype, he was afraid the price would mushroom to more than $3,000.

"Don't the press have anything better to do with their time?" Garofalo groused.

Man Convicted In Gang Slaying In Annandale In 2002 (WP)

By Tom Jackman

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

An Asian gang member who shot and killed a rival gang member in 2002, then fled to Canada for more than two years, was convicted yesterday of first-degree murder by a Fairfax County jury.

The jury then recommended that Henh Ngo, 22, of Springfield be sentenced to 26 years in prison -- 23 years for murder and three years for using a gun during a felony. Fairfax Circuit Court Judge Jane Marum Roush will sentence Ngo on May 25. Under Virginia law, she may not increase but could decrease the jury's recommended sentence.

Prosecutors told the jury that members of a gang called Asian Young and Dangerous, or AYD, jumped and pummeled two members of the gang Asian Dragon Family, or ADF, at Springfield Mall in mid-December 2002. One of the victims in that case was Ngo, then 19 years old and well-known in the gang community as "Phi Lu," or "Fat Guy," witnesses testified.

The Springfield Mall incident set the stage for a fatal confrontation outside the Happi Billiards & Cafe in Annandale on Dec. 27, 2002. Three members of AYD emerged from the pool hall about 10 p.m., two of them testified this week, and were eyed by members of ADF. The AYD members walked to their car and started to leave.

But the driver, Ngoc Quy Doan Nguyen, 21, stopped the car when he realized he'd left his glasses in the pool hall. While he darted inside, a man walked over and knocked on the car windows, trying to get the two passengers -- Phuc Nguyen and Hoan Le -- to speak to him. They ignored him, they testified.

Ngoc Nguyen then returned to the car. His friends said they watched as Henh Ngo walked around to the driver, asked if he were a member of AYD and fired one shot into Ngoc Nguyen's head. They said Ngo then fired two shots through the front windshield, missing them both, before fleeing.

The two young witnesses acknowledged that their first call was not to 911 but to another member of AYD, "Tiny." After calling police, they then notified another gang member while they waited for the police to arrive. Initially, one officer testified, Phuc Nguyen said he did not know who shot Ngoc Nguyen. The two are not related.

But once away from the crime scene, Assistant Commonwealth's Attorney John R. Murphy pointed out, both Phuc Nguyen and Le identified the shooter as Ngo, and both picked him out of photo lineups.

"They've always said 'Phi Lu' did it," Murphy told the jury, saying that they knew Ngo from previous encounters. "These two witnesses witnessed a horrible crime. They saw a young friend of theirs executed for revenge."

Ngo did not testify in his defense. He was arrested near Toronto in February 2005 by Canadian police, who said they were investigating him as a suspected drug dealer.

One of Ngo's attorneys, Peter D. Greenspun, said the actions of the two witnesses made it seem that they didn't really know who had killed their friend.

"You don't wait" to call police, Greenspun argued. "You don't call Tiny, you don't call Tony. You call 911 and you say, 'My friend was shot and it was Phi Lu. It was Phi Lu.' That's common sense."

The jury deliberated for about 5 1/2 hours before reaching its verdict.

Developer Corruption Probe Deepens (WT)

By Jim McElhatton

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0020692

The financial officer for one of the District's most prominent development companies has been indicted on conspiracy and federal tax-evasion charges.

The charges against John E. Brownell, chief financial officer for Douglas Development Corp., come months after federal authorities indicted company President Douglas Jemal and two other executives amid an investigation into corruption in the city's Office of Property Management.

Mr. Brownell's attorney, Barry Coburn, said yesterday his client disputes the indictment, which was filed Tuesday.

"We are very disappointed that the U.S. Attorney's Office has seen fit to indict Mr. Brownell, and we look forward to the opportunity to vindicate him at trial," he said.

The 18-page indictment states Mr. Brownell received "secret payments" from the company president and another individual at the company, identified only as "Conspirator A." Mr. Jemal is the company president.

Prosecutors said Mr. Brownell failed to file federal income-tax returns from 1994 to 1998 and that he evaded paying income taxes from 1998 to 2003.

According to the indictment, Mr. Brownell understated his income from Douglas Development, reporting standard wages and earnings but failing to report tens of thousands of dollars in income each year.

A U.S. Attorney's Office spokesman said yesterday the conspiracy and tax-evasion charges against Mr. Brownell each carry a maximum of five years in prison.

In October, Mr. Jemal, his son, Norman, and Douglas Development leasing official Blake Esherick pleaded not guilty to charges they gave a D.C. official $25,000 and gifts for favorable leasing deals with the city.

Michael Lorusso, former deputy in the D.C. Office of Property Management, pleaded guilty last year to bribery charges and has been cooperating with prosecutors.

Prosecutors said the bribes included $1,000 for two pairs of cowboy boots, hotel stays in Las Vegas and private box tickets to Washington Wizards and Washington Capitals games.

In exchange, Mr. Lorusso helped arrange for the District to lease properties from Douglas Development, officials said.

Douglas and Norman Jemal each face 40 years in prison, and Mr. Esherick faces 45 years if convicted, prosecutors have said.

Douglas Jemal said that he, his son and Mr. Esherick dispute the charges and look forward to going to trial.

Cardinals In Baltimore, D.C. Lobby Against Sex Abuse Bills (WP)

By Caryle Murphy

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Roman Catholic Church officials are putting a full-court press on Maryland legislators to reject bills that would extend the time allowed for victims of childhood sex abuse to file lawsuits against abusers and their employers.

Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick of the Washington archdiocese and Cardinal William H. Keeler of the Baltimore archdiocese have gotten involved, expressing opposition to the bills to House Judiciary Committee members directly or through intermediaries. The archdioceses also have hired a prominent Annapolis lobbying firm, Schwartz & Metz, to supplement the efforts of the Maryland Catholic Conference, their regular lobbying arm.

"Almost everyone on the committee has acknowledged to me that the church has called them or called their ministers about the bill, and they are meeting with every member of the committee, including me," said Del. Pauline H. Menes (D-Prince George's), the bills' principal sponsor.

Del. Carol S. Petzold (D-Montgomery) described the church's lobbying as "just short of frantic. It appears to be a very high priority with them."

Some lawmakers also reported that Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan had conveyed to them the church's concerns.

Susan Gibbs, spokeswoman for the Washington archdiocese, said that the church's lobbying was not unusual and that "we are doing the same kinds of things we do with any bill" that affects the church.

Under Maryland law, lawsuits by childhood abuse victims can be filed until the victim is 25. The two bills would significantly ease that restriction. One would let victims file suit until they are 42; the other would open a two-year window during which victims of any age could sue.

Supporters say the bills are needed because victims typically do not report the abuse until they are in their thirties or forties. Church officials say it would be hard for defendants to present an adequate defense decades after an alleged incident, and they note that Maryland has no time limit on criminal charges against a child abuser.

Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg (D-Baltimore), a co-sponsor of the bills, said he was contacted by a local rabbi who had received a call from Keeler about the legislation and was relaying the cardinal's concerns. Rosenberg said the rabbi, whom he declined to name, reported that the cardinal was upset that Jewish lawmakers were sponsoring the bills. Rosenberg and Menes are Jewish.

"To make a point of the religion of the sponsor of a bill . . . was beneath contempt," Rosenberg said he told the rabbi.

Keeler is in Rome, and his spokesman said Wednesday and yesterday that he could not be reached for comment.

Del. Luiz R.S. Simmons (D-Montgomery) said Duncan, who is running for governor, telephoned him recently to say that McCarrick was "very concerned about the bills."

Duncan spokesman David Weaver said that McCarrick had spoken about the legislation with Duncan, who is Catholic, but that the cardinal "did not ask Doug to make calls on his behalf."

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, also a candidate for governor, said that church officials "have made me aware of their concerns about this issue" but that neither he nor city officials have become involved.

Committee member Anthony G. Brown (D-Prince George's), who is Catholic, said he and his wife were invited by McCarrick to "a social call" at the cardinal's residence a couple of weeks ago. They discussed several matters, including the bills extending the statue of limitations, said Brown, who is O'Malley's running mate.

CIVIL LAW:

Two Groups Say School Districts Violated U.S. Law (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

Two national groups promoting education reform have filed complaints against two California public-school systems, charging that they are violating federal law by not telling parents of children in failing schools about transfer options.

The joint complaints of the Alliance for School Choice and the Coalition on Urban Renewal and Education were filed yesterday against the Los Angeles Unified School District -- California's largest -- and the Compton Unified School District. Several families with children in failing schools in those districts joined in the complaints.

The groups say the districts are not complying with terms of the No Child Left Behind Act in that they are forcing many students to remain in low-performing schools for years and are not notifying parents that the federal law gives them the right to transfer their children to better-performing public schools.

Noting that the law calls for a cutoff of federal Title 1 education funds for school districts that do not provide students the opportunity to attend effective alternative schools, the organizations sent correspondence to U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings Wednesday, asking that she impose sanctions for noncompliance on both districts.

"The only possible sanction would be a cutoff of Title 1 funds, and that would be a very significant sanction," said Clint Bolick, president and general counsel of the Alliance for School Choice.

The groups concede that the problems that the students and parents are facing in the Los Angeles and Compton school systems are "the tip of a national iceberg."

Mr. Bolick cited a 2004 Government Accountability Office (GAO) report that found that more than 3 million children nationwide were eligible for public-school transfers under education law. But the report found that only about 30,000 students, or 1 percent, were transferred, he said. The law states that children are eligible for transfer to better schools after being in a failing school for two years.

What's more, Mr. Bolick said, the GAO report found that more than 1,000 schools nationwide "have failed for at least six years." Failure is measured by a school's inability to meet the academic standards of the state it is in.

Repeated attempts yesterday to reach Los Angeles and Compton school officials for comment were unsuccessful.

The Alliance for School Choice acknowledges, "In virtually every large urban school district, the number of children eligible for transfers to better-performing public schools exceeds the seats available in such schools."

"As a consequence, even though lack of capacity is no defense, many school districts evade their obligations, thus far with no consequences," as sanctions for noncompliance with the transfer provisions of the No Child Left Behind law "go unused," the group added.

Spellings Test (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

The No Child Left Behind Act has taken its lumps from the education establishment, which loathes its testing and transparency measures. But the latest criticism of the law is more surprising, because it's coming from conservatives who are questioning the Bush Administration's commitment to enforcing its own law.

This week the Alliance for School Choice filed complaints against school districts in Los Angeles and Compton, California, where school officials have neglected to notify parents of their rights under NCLB. These districts have also failed to make transfer options available to kids in underperforming schools.

Under the 2001 law, schools that repeatedly fail to make "adequate yearly progress" as measured by state standards are required to give students the option to attend better schools within the district. To be sure, the California districts singled out in the filing aren't the only ones skirting the law. Similar violations have been reported in Baltimore, Chicago, Detroit, New York and elsewhere. A Government Accountability Office report from 2004 found that some three million children in 5,300 schools nationwide were eligible for choice under NCLB, but only about 1% were exercising the option.

Still, Los Angeles and Compton are among the worst cases of noncompliance, according to the Alliance, which filed the administrative actions with the school districts on behalf of several parents with children stuck in failing schools. In the 2003-04 school year less than two-tenths of one percent of eligible students in the Los Angeles Unified School District exercised their rights and actually transferred schools. In Compton, no students have received transfers.

"That only two out of every thousand families with children in failing schools would seek a better school for their children," says the complaint, "betrays the utter inadequacy of [the L.A. school district's] notification and explanation regarding school choice rights."

The complaint further alleges that these pitifully low transfer numbers are by design. While NCLB specifies when and how parents must be notified of their options, the school districts have deliberately dragged their feet and gone out of their way to confuse and discourage families. Tactics include, among other things, burying transfer notices in other material sent to homes; giving parents a very narrow time-frame -- say, a week -- in which to make up their mind; and forcing transfers to take place in the middle of a school year. This kind of obstructionism fits the pattern of public school officials around the country who are resisting every challenge to their control of school enrollments, curriculum and especially budgets.

The reason school districts have been able to get away with this behavior is that no one is holding their feet to the fire. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings has chosen to hand out exemptions or look the other way instead of enforcing the law. This benign neglect hurts most the very students that NCLB was designed to help. The GAO report found that 80% of children in failing schools were minority and 62% were low-income.

If the districts reject the Alliance complaints, they can be appealed to the state and then federal government. But Secretary Spellings needn't wait for that process and could take action against these recalcitrant districts and impose sanctions if necessary. Under the law, she has the authority to terminate federal funding and compel compliance but so far has been unwilling to use it.

Large urban school districts like the one in Los Angeles respond that the number of students eligible for transfer far exceeds the number of seats available in better schools within the district. But that's not an excuse for noncompliance; that's a reason to let students attend schools outside their public district, including charter schools and private schools.

School districts have little incentive to initiate these reforms on their own, especially when federal enforcement is an empty threat. And if the Bush Administration isn't going to use its funding leverage to ensure that all children have a shot at a decent education, then No Child Left Behind has become yet another illusory reform.

Youth Commission Asks Justice Department For Help (BROWNHER)

By ELIZABETH PIERSON, The Brownsville Herald

Brownsville (TX) Herald, March 24, 2006

AUSTIN — The Texas Youth Commission has asked the U.S. Department of Justice for help in assess-ing the way it reports and investigates abuse against youth in state juvenile prisons.

If TYC does not turn the tide of abuse, the state may face legal action, an American Civil Liberties Un-ion representative told a Texas House committee on Wednesday.

Dwight Harris, executive director of TYC, asked the Justice Department on Thursday for help, after a months-long investigation by Rio Grande Valley Freedom Newspapers about the seven-year trend of increasing abuse against youth.

Findings published in The Brownsville Herald on Sunday showed that by 2005, three of every 100 youth in the TYC were being abused physically, a seven-fold increase from 1999. Injuries by youth against officers increased 70 percent in five years.

Joy Anderson, chief of staff for TYC, said the request to the federal government was not spurred by any single event.

"It wasn't anything in particular," she said. "We just want to make sure that everything is being looked at. We think the more eyes, the more expertise that can look at the issues that are facing us, the better."

In simultaneous hearings on Wednesday, the House committees on juvenile justice and corrections heard from agency officials who said turnover and training problems are contributing to the abuse.

They also heard from juvenile correctional officers, who said agency policies give inmates the upper hand in the high-security facilities, and from parents of incarcerated youth, who said their children have been abused in the agency.

Many employees came from San Saba, the high-security facility in rural Central Texas where there was a 250 percent increase in injuries to staff members because of youth aggression from 2004 to 2005, worker's compensation records show. Youth abuse rates increased, too.

Juvenile Justice Chairman Rep. Harold Dutton, D-Houston, and many who testified cited findings of the Valley Freedom investigation when addressing the committee.

State Rep. Joaquin Castro, D-San Antonio, said he was particularly struck by findings that youth were taken out of view of security cameras before they were abused and that "minor infractions," such as a youth making a face, prompted an attack from an officer.

"I envision possibly a big bill coming out of this next session," Castro said after the hearing.

Many of the cases of abuse are similar to those that spurred by a years-long lawsuit against the TYC in the 1970s and dictated its current structure, said Lisa Graybill, legal director for ACLU of Texas.

It is too soon to say whether the state will face legal action, but the Legislature can prevent the possibil-ity by increasing staffing ratios and taking other actions to prevent abuse, she said.

"We're worried that, despite the good intentions of staff at TYC, the increase in the number of substan-tiated reports may indicate over time the kind of conditions that provoke that litigation," she said.

Harris' request to the DOJ went to its Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. He ex-pects to hear a response within a month, he said.

Judge Orders Federal Monitor To Fix Violations At Golden Grove (STS)

By Mat Probasco

St Thomas (VI) Source, March 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0020696

March 23, 2006 -- A U.S. district judge found the V.I. government in contempt Thursday and ordered a federal monitor to fix "constitutional violations" at the Golden Grove prison in St. Croix.

Judge George W. Cannon Jr. said the Virgin Islands was in violation of a 1986 order to resolve unconstitutional medical, sanitation and safety conditions at the prison, where an inmate Tuesday was stabbed to death and five others were injured in a brawl.

In his 32-page order, Cannon wrote, "the court concludes that there are continuing and ongoing constitutional violations of the rights of individuals held at Golden Grove Adult Correctional Facility and Detention Center, and (the) defendants are in contempt of the court's orders."

Attorneys for the U.S. Justice Department asked Cannon to appoint the federal monitor, called a special master, to resolve lingering problems at the prison, calling conditions there "deplorable."

V.I. Attorney General Kerry Drue argued that the prison was improving and a special master was not needed.

Drue demoted then-Corrections Director Joseph Ponteen after he testified to myriad problems at the prison and described it as a "nightmare." Ponteen said he needed more money and 100 extra guards to improve conditions at the 600-inmate facility.

Neither Drue nor the U.S. Justice Department could be immediately reached for comment on Cannon's ruling.

The special master will report any violations at the prison to the court, where a judge may issue an order to fix them, Cannon said.

The U.S. and territorial governments have 20 days to submit names of five special master candidates. Cannon said they cannot be V.I. government employees.

Only a U.S. district judge can fire the special master, Cannon said.

A judge can dissolve the position if he or she thinks the territory is in compliance with the 1986 agreement and is capable of running the prison itself again.

"Substantial compliance means (the) defendants ... have consistently complied with this order ... and will continue to operate Golden Grove pursuant to this order ...," Cannon said.

He ordered the V.I. government to deposit $100,000 with the court to cover the special master's fees and expenses.

In a separate case, a federal judge in St. Thomas has twice found the V.I. government in contempt for failing to improve prison conditions as mandated by a settlement with the American Civil Liberties Union 11 years ago.

Those violations include imprisoning people found not guilty by reason of insanity or unfit to stand trial at Golden Grove or the Criminal Justice Complex in Charlotte Amalie.

Judge Won't Revive Colo. Title IX Lawsuit (AP)

By P. SOLOMON BANDA

AP, March 24, 2006

DENVER -- A federal judge rejected a request to revive the lawsuit at the heart of the University of Colorado recruiting scandal, saying Thursday that two women who claimed they were sexually assaulted by athletes had not proven their claim against the school was valid.

Attorneys for the women immediately promised an appeal.

The women have argued that the school violated federal Title IX gender equity law by fostering an atmosphere that led to their alleged assaults at a 2001 off-campus party. Police investigated but no sexual assault charges were filed.

U.S. District Judge Robert Blackburn tossed out the lawsuit a year ago, and said Thursday the women had not changed his mind after arguing there was new evidence showing coaches and trainers were aware of similar problems before the alleged assaults.

"There is much about the incidents evidenced in the record of this case that cries out for justice," the judge wrote. "There is no doubt that some of the harassment, abuse and assaults reflected in the record are shameful at best and criminal at worst.

"A cry for justice, however, does not mean that Title IX should be expanded to provide justice simply because the cry for justice has not been answered otherwise."

The women, Blackburn said, had not shown that Title IX would provide them "with the justice they seek."

DOJ_NMG_0020697

The recruiting scandal dominated headlines in Colorado and beyond for months. Gov. Bill Owens at one point appointed the attorney general to lead a grand jury investigation, which resulted in an indictment against a former football recruiting aide for soliciting a prostitute and misusing a school cell phone.

A separate probe, backed by the CU Board of Regents, concluded that drugs, alcohol and sex were used to entice blue chip recruits to the Boulder campus but said none of the activity was knowingly sanctioned by university officials.

The school responded by overhauling oversight of the athletic department and putting some of the most stringent policies in place for any football recruiting program. The fallout included the resignation of university President Elizabeth Hoffman and the departure of athletic director Dick Tharp. Football coach Gary Barnett stepped down last fall.

Pat O'Rourke, an attorney for the university, said the school expected the decision.

"The university is very pleased with Judge Blackburn's ruling holding that the university is committed to a safe and non-discriminatory environment for all its students and faculty," he said.

Attorneys for the women said they would appeal.

"We agree with the court in its conclusion that this is a case that cries out for justice, and we disagree with the court that the evidence that has developed over the past several years should not provide relief to the plaintiffs," attorneys Seth Benezra and Kim Hult said.

Reporting Incidents Of Sex Harassment Gains More Respect (WP)

By Ray Rivera

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Midshipmen who report sexual harassment at the U.S. Naval Academy are increasingly viewed with respect by other midshipmen, and more students believe the campus provides a positive environment for women, a new survey shows.

Academy officials say the responses represent big leaps forward in how male and female students view academy culture. The results also come as reports of sexual assault at the academy have been increasing, in part because of an effort to encourage victims to report incidents, officials say.

About 3,000 midshipmen -- most of the sophomore, junior and senior classes -- responded to the academy's annual quality of life and values survey in October. Asked whether midshipmen at the Annapolis college who report sexual harassment are respected, resented or neither, 65 percent of women said "respected." Just 5 percent said "resented."

Two years ago, 66 percent of women checked "resented" to the same question.

Fifty-six percent of men also said "respected." It was the first time in at least the last five surveys, the only data available yesterday, in which the majority of both sexes answered positively.

Asked whether the Naval Academy provides a positive environment for women, 62 percent of men and 44 percent of women said they agreed, also higher percentages for both than in any of the last five surveys. Twenty percent of women and 12 percent of men disagreed. The rest marked "neither."

Academy officials say they are encouraged by the results but that more work needs to be done. Government studies have repeatedly criticized the school's culture as being hostile to women since it began accepting them in 1976.

Those issues were recently cast in the spotlight again in two court cases. In the first, Lt. Bryan D. Black, an academy instructor, is facing a special court-martial on suspicion of using sexually offensive language in front of male and female midshipmen.

The second case involves Lamar S. Owens Jr., last season's starting quarterback, who is accused of raping a female midshipman in her dorm room in January. Neither case has gone to trial.

No Charges In Shooting Of Unarmed Man (WP)

By Tom Jackman

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

The Fairfax County police officer who shot an unarmed man to death in January will not be charged with a crime, the county's chief prosecutor announced yesterday, and the man's family angrily responded by claiming that a civilian in the same situation would have been arrested.

From the start, Fairfax police declared that the killing of Salvatore J. Culosi, 37, was an accident and that the SWAT officer who fired had done so unintentionally. Fairfax Commonwealth's Attorney Robert F. Horan Jr. said that when a person fires a gun without malice and unintentionally kills someone, "they do not commit a crime."

"I feel for the family of the victim in this case," Horan said. "You have to. But I also feel for the police officer. This is a good police officer. Fine record, almost 17 years. He's as shattered by this as any good police officer should be."

The officer is Deval V. Bullock, 40, a longtime member of Fairfax's SWAT team, numerous sources familiar with the case said. Bullock declined to comment when contacted earlier this week.

"My son is lying in a cemetery," said Anita Culosi, the victim's mother. "His whole life was ahead of him. That man pulled a trigger and shot my son dead. I can't handle that. It's just pathetic that they don't find something wrong with what they did to my boy."

Bernard DiMuro, the Culosi family's attorney, said: "A pointed gun with a finger on the trigger is not an accident. There is no doubt that had the shooter not been a police officer, he would have been charged criminally, and a jury would have decided the issue." He said Horan could have charged the officer with second-degree murder or manslaughter.

The Culosis also questioned whether the police could fairly investigate themselves and whether Horan had received a complete investigation. The family sent a letter to the Fairfax Board of Supervisors asking it to review the case, and to review police policies on the use of force and the use of SWAT teams as well.

Police spokeswoman Mary Ann Jennings said police are continuing to review their policies on the use of force and also on the use of SWAT teams in serving search warrants. Horan said he thought the use of SWAT teams by Fairfax police was appropriate.

Police had been investigating whether Culosi, an optometrist with offices in Manassas and Warrenton, was a sports bookmaker. An undercover officer had been placing bets with Culosi for nearly four months and arrived outside Culosi's townhouse in the Fair Lakes area on Jan. 24 to collect $1,500 in winnings, Horan said.

Culosi was standing next to the officer's car, on the passenger side, when the officer gave the sign for two SWAT officers to move in. They headed toward the car, one to arrest Culosi and one to protect the undercover officer, Horan said.

One officer pulled up in a car behind the undercover officer's. "As the officer came out, he was bringing his weapon up," Horan said. "In the course of bringing his weapon up, it discharged. He has no real explanation how."

Horan said the officer shouted the word "police" at Culosi. "Right after "police,' " Horan said, "it went pow."

Horan said the officer was aware that he should not have had a finger on the trigger and that he should not have had his .45-caliber H&K handgun pointed at anyone. "As he says, you keep your finger straight," Horan said. "He felt his finger was straight . . . but obviously his finger is not straight up. His finger has to be on the trigger."

Horan said the officer's gun was tested and was not at fault. He said the gun had a standard trigger pull and was modified only to add a flashlight on the barrel, but the flashlight was not in use.

Horan's decision not to pursue criminal charges does not affect any civil lawsuit the family might file, and DiMuro said one is likely.

The officer, originally placed on leave with pay, returned to work in an administrative job a couple of days after the shooting, Jennings said. Police said they will resume an internal investigation of the officer; they were prevented from interviewing him while the criminal probe was pending.

Horan said the accident "could have been based on the number of hours the officer was awake that day." He said the officer had started working at 5 a.m., overseeing a managed deer hunt in the Great Falls area aimed at thinning the deer population. Horan said the officer went home at noon that day, then returned to work at 8 p.m. Culosi was shot at 9:35 p.m.

Culosi's family members said they were launching a Web site, http://www.justiceforsal.com , to provide friends and the public with information about the case. "We are not going to sit by and allow this to happen to another citizen of Fairfax County," said Salvatore J. Culosi, the victim's father. "Our family will never understand this. And we will never be the same."

Battles Escalate Over Gay Marriage (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

DOJ_NMG_0020699

USA Today, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — Gay rights advocates are pushing to legalize same-sex marriage with an unprecedented wave of lawsuits in state courts, while those seeking to ban such unions are gaining ground in state legislatures.

The contrasting strategies reflect how judges have begun to show a willingness to expand the rights of same-sex couples at a time when many state lawmakers — and most Americans — are cool to the idea.

Several key developments are likely soon. The top state courts in Washington state and New Jersey have heard arguments brought by gay men and lesbians. Either court could open the door to a second state joining Massachusetts in allowing same-sex marriages.

Other lawsuits backed by the ACLU, Lambda Legal and other gay rights groups are wending their way through courts in California, Connecticut, Iowa, Maryland and New York. The groups want courts to declare that same-sex couples have a right to marry based on state constitutional protections for equality and due process of law. The groups also hope to win legal precedents that could influence the U.S. Supreme Court to endorse a constitutional right to same-sex unions nationwide.

Meanwhile, the Alliance for Marriage and other groups against same-sex marriage hope to win legislative ballot initiatives this year in Alabama, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin. The measures would amend state constitutions to ban same-sex marriages.

Nineteen states have such bans. Most have been adopted since November 2003, when Massachusetts' highest state court said same-sex couples have a right to marry under state law. Massachusetts then became the first state to give marriage licenses to gay and lesbian couples.

The legislative moves against gay marriages aren't limited to the states. In June, the U.S. Senate is scheduled to begin debating a measure intended to lead to a U.S. constitutional amendment banning such marriages. The proposals in legislatures and in Congress partly reflect public-opinion polls, which for five years have indicated that about 60% of Americans oppose legalizing same-sex marriage.

The ACLU and others supporting same-sex marriages hope to turn public opinion by casting the ability to marry one's chosen partner as a basic right. They also are trying to tie their campaign with the efforts against bans on interracial marriage four decades ago.

A few judges, including Manhattan Judge Doris Ling-Cohan, have made such a link in backing same-sex marriages. Her ruling was reversed in December, however, by an appeals court that said the state has “a strong interest in fostering heterosexual marriage.”

Wave Of Lawsuits Targets Bans On Same-sex Marriage (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — Heather McDonnell and Carol Snyder of White Plains, N.Y., have been a couple for 16 years.

When Snyder was in the hospital for breast cancer surgery early in their relationship, McDonnell wanted to be at her side, just as a spouse would. And so McDonnell was — but only after she was first challenged by a nurse who did not think of her as family.

The episode, and others like it, prompted McDonnell, 52, an administrator at Sarah Lawrence College, and Snyder, a 61-year-old special education teacher, to join several other gay and lesbian couples in lawsuits challenging policies against same-sex marriages.

“There is nothing more universal in this country as saying you're married,” McDonnell says. “When you are at your most vulnerable … you need something like that.”

The lawsuits, sponsored by the American Civil Liberties Union and gay rights groups such as Lambda Legal, utilize carefully selected plaintiffs and locales. They argue that particular state constitutions contain a right to same-sex marriage.

The lawsuits were inspired largely by a 2003 ruling by Massachusetts' highest court that led to that state being the first to legalize such unions. David Buckel of Lambda Legal says the lawsuits are focused on states where public attitudes toward same-sex unions seem particularly friendly and where amending the state constitution to counter any ruling for same-sex marriage would be difficult.

Such lawsuits are awaiting rulings by the top state courts in Washington state and New Jersey. Similar lawsuits are making their way through state courts in California, Connecticut, Iowa, Maryland and New York. The lawsuits generally claim that the states' constitutions allow gay couples to marry on the same terms as heterosexuals.

The state-by-state approach is somewhat similar to the strategy gay rights groups used in recent years in a successful fight against laws that made sex between people of the same sex a crime.

However, before the U.S. Supreme Court invalidated such laws in 2003, many legislatures were lifting their bans on sodomy.

Gay marriage does not have that kind of legislative momentum. Nineteen states amended their constitutions to ban such marriages in recent years, and similar ballot initiatives will be before voters this year in seven other states.

Gay-marriage advocates are trying to link their effort with a 1967 U.S. Supreme Court ruling that rejected state bans on interracial marriages. A few state court judges have accepted that comparison.

"It was only less than 40 years ago that the U.S. Supreme Court held that anti-miscegenation statutes … violate the Constitution because they infringed on the freedom to marry a person of one's choice," Manhattan Judge Doris Ling-Cohan wrote last year. "Similarly, this court must so hold in the context of same-sex marriages."

Some courts that have rejected same-sex marriage have said the comparison to racial discrimination is inapt. In December, when a state appeals court in New York overruled Ling-Cohan's decision, it said the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling on interracial marriage arose from the "fundamental right to be free from racial discrimination" — and that there was no similar fundamental right to same-sex marriage.

That sentiment is in line with arguments made by groups that oppose such marriages. "The laws that once limited one's marriage partner on the basis of race were designed to build walls and keep blacks and whites apart," says Peter Sprigg of the Family Research Council. "But preserving the traditional definition of marriage brings men and women together."

Overall, the gay rights groups' strategy seeks to win state court rulings that could help change public attitudes and help prompt the U.S. Supreme Court to guarantee a right to gay marriage.

It's unclear how the court, under new Chief Justice John Roberts and with new Justice Samuel Alito, will view gay rights cases.

Critics of same-sex marriage, cite elected legislatures' moves against same-sex marriage while casting the current lawsuits as an attempt to make an end run around the will of the people.

"It's a race between these lawsuits and the (state constitutional) amendments" against same-sex marriage, says Matt Daniels, president of the Alliance for Marriage. Daniels' group is backing the state initiatives against same-sex marriage as well as a measure in the U.S. Senate that calls for a constitutional ban on such unions.

William Hohengarten, a Washington, D.C., lawyer who was part of the team that argued successfully against anti-sodomy laws at the Supreme Court in 2003, says winning cases in state courts is key for groups backing same-sex marriage. "It's important to have a number of states where same-sex marriage becomes a way of life … to help change public attitudes."

American Muslims Are Gaining A Foothold In Politics (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, March 24, 2006

TEANECK, N.J. — The mayor of nearby Prospect Park is a 30-year-old high school business teacher with a young son. He was a volunteer firefighter at 18 and has been active in his community ever since. But when he sought the mayor's office last fall, voters received anonymous fliers calling him a "betrayer" tied to the 9/11 terrorists.

Why? Because he is a Syrian-born Muslim named Mohamed Khairullah.

"I was worried for my family," Khairullah says. "Any crazy person could have just driven by and done something. But we just had faith and went on doing what we had to do." The result: He got the job, open because the previous mayor had moved away, and now is running to keep it.

The 9/11 attacks have had a curious double-edged impact on the political emergence of American Muslims. They are up against more stereotyping and backlash, which they perceived recently in the furor over a Dubai company's thwarted plan to take over some port operations in several U.S. cities.

At the same time, the 9/11 attacks jolted Muslims into realizing that they needed to make themselves known to their neighbors and heard by their government. They are voting, running for office and getting more involved in civic and political life at every level, from PTAs and school boards to town councils and state legislatures. At least two — Texas Republicans Amir Omar and Ahmad Hassan — are running for U.S. Congress.

The Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), which promotes Muslim political activity, has opened 23 of its 31 U.S. chapters since 9/11. In the 2004 election, two studies found, one in five Muslim voters were first-time voters.

"There was a silver lining. We became more public," says Aref Assaf, president of the New Jersey-based American Arab Forum.

This large-scale entry of Muslims into public life is not only testing the courage of Muslim candidates and the tolerance of voters. It's also prompting politicians to take notice of a community that has growing clout and is open to appeals from both parties.

American Muslims are hard to count. Many immigrants have Muslim names, but African-American Muslims often don't. For example, one of the highest-ranking Muslim officials in the country is North Carolina state Sen. Larry Shaw.

Based on tallies of mosque membership and Muslim names, several national organizations estimate there are 4.5 million to 6 million American Muslims. Most live in a dozen big states, giving them the potential to make a difference in tight races. Aslam Abdullah, editor of the weekly Muslim Observer newspaper, says there are about 15 close races for Congress in districts where Muslims are concentrated and could cast decisive votes.

Mosques, numbering more than 1,200 across the country, are "the grass-roots center of our political empowerment," Assaf says. They hold voter-registration drives and policy discussions. They invite candidates to speak, offering access to large crowds at Friday prayers.

Up to a third of American Muslims are African-Americans who vote mostly for Democrats. The rest come from Pakistan, India, Afghanistan, the Middle East and Africa. Many lived in dictatorships or theocracies and did not participate in politics in their homelands. "It is definitely a new idea," says Mohamed El Filali, outreach director of the Islamic Center of Passaic County in Paterson.

The immigrants are in tune with Republican conservatism on issues such as abortion, gay rights and religion, say analysts such as Georgetown University professor Zahid Bukhari. But they agree with Democrats on civil liberties and government social programs.

At this point, Muslims aren't firmly allied with either party. Bush won backing from Muslim leaders in 2000, before 9/11, and outperformed Democrat Al Gore among Muslim voters, polls and studies found. Four years later, dismayed by the Iraq invasion and what they saw as civil liberties abuses under the USA Patriot Act, the leaders endorsed Democrat John Kerry, and he won a majority of Muslim voters.

Sherine El-Abd, 60, an Egyptian immigrant and prominent Republican who lives in Clifton, N.J., personally tried to persuade a number of Muslims to switch back to Bush. It was, she admits, an uphill battle: "There were more that didn't go."

Analysts say the shift is likely to be temporary. "I wouldn't call it a realignment," CAIR research director Mohamed Nimer says. "What we've seen is just a one-time deal."

Muslims are comparable to Hispanics, a much larger swing voter group, in their diversity and their compatibility with positions of both parties. Analysts say they're also similar to Hispanics in that they are young and likely to wield increasing influence.

Mohamed Elibiary, president of the Freedom and Justice Foundation in Dallas, a statewide Muslim advocacy group, cites a 2002 Cornell University finding that 60% of the U.S. Muslim population is 30 or younger: "You have this huge bulge that over the next 10 years is going to mature politically" and be far more active.

His foundation gave that process a jump-start after 9/11. In June 2002, the group held a candidate forum at Texas Stadium, where the Dallas Cowboys play. It drew 7,000 Muslims and registered 2,000 new voters. "It was a reaction to … feeling like their loyalty to their country was being questioned," Elibiary says. "What could they do? Get politically engaged to prove how mainstream they are."

The ultimate form of involvement is running for office, and by that measure, Muslims are still recovering from 9/11. According to Hazem Kira of the California Civil Rights Alliance, in 2000 there was an "all-time high" of 700 candidates across the country. That plummeted to 70 in 2002 and rose to about 100 in 2004.

There are no statistics yet for 2006. Bukhari, co-director of a project called Muslims in the American Public Square, says grass-roots activity is pushing the trend upward. "Muslims are becoming more involved at the county and state level," he says. He says there are three Democrats running for county council and the state legislature in Montgomery County, Md., in suburban Washington, and "that never happened before."

Muslim immigrants who become candidates tend to be observant but not orthodox, and many have U.S. educations. "They are more Americanized," Assaf says.

Of this year's candidates, at least one — Khairullah — is divorced. At least one is a woman: Democrat Ferial Masry, a teacher making her second run for the California State Assembly from suburban Los Angeles. In Saudi Arabia, where she was born, women cannot vote.

Like Masry, whose district leans Republican, Muslims often run as underdogs. The Dallas Morning News endorsed Omar, son of Iranian and Palestinian immigrants, over two rivals in his GOP congressional primary. If he wins a runoff April 11, he'll face a popular Democratic incumbent in a Democratic district.

Khairullah, a Democrat, was in his second term on the Prospect Park Borough Council when the mayor moved away. The flier that said Khairullah should not be living in "our clean town," that contended he would "poison our thoughts" about America, did not stop his four fellow council members from picking him for the mayoral slot.

"They were disgusted by the letter," Khairullah says. "I've been living in the community the longest out of all the council members. The entire community knows me."

In the months before the 2000 election, Muslim leaders were worried about a law allowing the government to use secret evidence in immigration hearings. Leaders were ignored when they approached Gore, says Boston activist Tahir Ali, but Bush was accessible.

In the second presidential debate, Bush criticized the Secret Evidence Act as a form of racial profiling and said he supported repealing it "to make sure that Arab-Americans are treated with respect."

El-Abd, watching at home, says she cried with happiness when she heard Bush acknowledge her community. Ali, author of a book on the Muslim vote, says "we had to go with him" because he seemed responsive to Muslim concerns.

The euphoria of having helped elect a winner quickly dissipated as Bush invaded Iraq and expanded the government's investigative powers under the Patriot Act. Some Muslims refused to get a library card or register to vote, scared of "anything that will put them on a list (that) is retrievable" by the FBI, says Abdul Waheed, 59, a Pakistani immigrant running for Teaneck City Council.

Others were more angry than fearful. Assaf says he was "a lifelong Republican" who voted for Bush in 2000. Now he accuses Bush of a "post-9/11 frenzied attack on Islam" and "purely anti-Arab, anti-Islam" policies.

Ali is also having buyer's remorse, mostly over a war many Muslims tried to avert with calls to contain or oust Saddam Hussein in ways that wouldn't be so hard on ordinary Iraqis. "I go to a lot of communities, (and) people say, 'You are the reason we voted for Bush, and look at what happened,' " Ali says. "I'm feeling ashamed."

Elibiary stuck with Bush in 2004, mostly because he was lukewarm on Kerry. But he says Bush "is about as popular in the Muslim community as he is in the African-American community. Single digits."

That remains true even as Muslims say Bush was right to defend a Dubai-controlled company's plan to take over some U.S. port operations. "The Arabs are coming, the Arabs are coming," says Paterson councilman Aslon Goow, 47, a Syrian-American, mocking the uproar that killed the deal.

A self-described independent, Goow voted for Bush in 2000 and Kerry in 2004. When he ran for re-election to City Council in 2004, he said rumors spread that "because I was a Muslim, I was a terrorist." He says that may be why he won with fewer votes than the first time.

Waheed, the Teaneck council hopeful, was doing business in a building across from the World Trade Center on 9/11. He saw bodies falling from the towers and escaped in a cab driven by a Sikh.

He'd had the same clients for decades; they knew he was Pakistani. A lot were friendly after 9/11, he says, but "there were a few customers who were not. You can sense certain things. Discomfort." He sighs. "Islam is the most misunderstood religion, and Muslims are the most misunderstood people."

Waheed says he is a Democrat, but "on certain issues, I have been in bed with the Republicans." Collecting signatures for the May 9 town council election outside a supermarket, he talks to voters about education, business development, preserving green space. In his baseball cap, holding his clipboard, he could be any candidate anywhere.

"I am running because I am very conscious of the issues of the town," he explains. "I am not running because I want to represent Muslims."

Change In `undue Burden' Standard Could Shift Abortion Law (KRT)

By Stephen Henderson

Knight Ridder, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON - The latest high-profile battle in the abortion wars may prove to be a sideshow to a monumental shift in abortion law that could take place this fall.

South Dakota legislators enacted a sweeping ban on abortion last month that will retest the strength of Roe v. Wade, the landmark 1973 Supreme Court decision that overturned all state laws banning or restricting abortion. Other states are threatening to follow suit as anti-abortion activists flex what they think is new muscle: two new Supreme Court justices who are thought to be less sympathetic to abortion rights.

Legal experts say the courts almost certainly will strike down South Dakota's ban in short order. But this fall, when the Supreme Court considers the federal ban on late-term abortions, the justices could make it easier for state legislators to pass stringent restrictions on abortion without much fear that the courts might overturn them.

The high court could force those who challenge abortion restrictions to prove that restrictive laws prevent a significant number of women from getting abortions. Currently, the courts bar restrictions if it's plausible that they could impose burdens on women seeking abortions.

Such a ruling would validate many abortion laws that can't now survive court scrutiny, and in some states it would render abortion all but inaccessible to many women.

All this could happen without the court even touching on the core debate over abortion rights.

"Abortion restrictions could be revolutionarily increased without in any way overturning Roe v. Wade," said David Garrow, a professor at Cambridge University whose book on abortion, "Liberty and Sexuality," is considered one of the definitive accounts of how modern abortion law developed. "South Dakota is kindergarten simplistic by comparison, something the courts will just dispose of easily, and no one will be affected. This other issue would have real impact on women's ability to get abortions in states where the legislature doesn't want them to."

Jay Sekulow, the chief counsel to the American Center for Law and Justice in Washington, said the court seems primed to make a change, especially on matters as controversial as late-term abortions. His organization is representing several congressmen who want to preserve the late-term abortion ban. If the court changes the way abortion laws can be challenged, he said, "Increasingly, you'd see that legitimate restrictions would be enforced. It wouldn't be an all-or-nothing proposition."

The shift could happen if the justices endorse the thinking in a lower-court opinion in a partial-birth abortion case, which contains a little-noticed argument that the "undue burden" standard that the Supreme Court has imposed on all abortion laws has gotten out of control.

Now, the courts can strike down newly passed state abortion laws if a challenger can show that any part of the new law could place an "undue burden" on a substantial number of women.

Take, for example, a law that includes a requirement that teens get parental consent before getting abortions. A challenger can get the whole law struck down by arguing that it would make it too difficult for a small number of teens - such as those who are abused or estranged from their parents - to get abortions.

This interpretation of the "undue burden" standard has made it easier for proponents of abortion rights to get the courts to invalidate scores of abortion laws without having to prove they were unconstitutional.

The nation's other laws generally must be challenged according to far more exacting standards that essentially require challengers to show that there's no possibility that the law could be constitutional.

The different standard for abortion laws has long been controversial at the Supreme Court, in lower courts and in legislatures.

Erwin Chemerinsky, a law professor and constitutional expert at Duke University, said the court had good reason to treat abortion laws differently.

Think of a teenager who's pregnant and hemorrhaging, or a pregnant woman in an abusive relationship, he said. "Should they have to go to court to prove they face an undue burden from regulations that require consent?" Chemerinsky asked. "The court is particularly concerned about small numbers of women being affected. They weren't concerned about proving the exact number to get a law enjoined."

A lower-court opinion in a late-term abortion case, however, has opened the door for the high court to reconsider its position.

Chief Judge John M. Walker Jr. of the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals in New York addressed the different standards applied to abortion laws and explained why he thinks they should be changed.

"I can think of no other field of law that has been subject to such sweeping constitutionalization as the field of abortion," Walker wrote. The high court's decisions, he said, have made legislators "all but foreclosed from setting policy regulating the practice; instead, federal courts must give their constitutional blessing to nearly every increment of social regulation that touches upon abortion."

Abortion laws are struck down "based upon a speculative showing" that they might be unconstitutional, Walker said, and the justices have given unclear directions to lower courts in several abortion cases. He invited the high court to reconsider the matter.

That invitation may appeal to the high court's newest members, Chief Justice John G. Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito. Both are believed to be personally opposed to abortion, and both penned memos while working in the Reagan Justice Department urging legal strategies to curb abortions.

But both also have strong records as judges who respect established court precedents, and both suggested at their confirmation hearings that their votes would pose no immediate threat to established abortion laws.

Walker's opinion, however, offers a lawyerly, nonideological approach that could produce a fundamental change in abortion law without directly confronting established rulings. Indeed, Walker's misgivings about how the current scheme weakens legislators echo language that Roberts and Alito used in their Reagan-era memos.

Walker's opinion also may appeal to Justice Anthony Kennedy, who decried the different standards for abortion laws in a 2000 opinion on a Nebraska ban on late-term abortions.

Kennedy has voted to preserve core abortion rights but also has backed a broad array of state restrictions, including the Nebraska ban.

He lost that case because Justice Sandra Day O'Connor provided the winning vote to the opposite side. With O'Connor gone, Kennedy becomes the swing vote on the issue, and he could be attracted to a solution like Walker's, which retreats from the status quo without attacking core abortion rights.

Such a move also would dovetail nicely with a high court decision earlier this term that instructed a lower court to reconsider how to handle a challenge to a New Hampshire abortion restriction. The lower court had struck down the entire law using the lower standards that have applied to abortion laws.

"We had Kennedy on our side then, and I assume we have him now, but it's true that they have to find a way to get there, and this might be that way," said Sekulow of the American Center for Law and Justice. He'll file a brief urging the Supreme Court to uphold the federal late-term abortion ban, and he said that Walker's opinion could influence his efforts.

"That's one of the arguments we're looking closely at," he said.

Chief In Md. Urges Close Of Internet Police Forum (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0020705

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Montgomery County Police Chief J. Thomas Manger called on the department's union yesterday to take down an online message board that some police officers have used as a forum for disparaging, and sometimes racist, remarks about colleagues, supervisors, immigrants and other members of the community.

The union said it would not shut down the board, saying that it serves a legitimate purpose and that doing so would curtail officers' right to free speech.

The offensive messages were roundly condemned by county officials and community leaders.

"Let me be very clear. There is no place in our police department . . . for racism, bigotry and hatred," County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) said. "As public servants, we not only take an oath to uphold the law, but we have a moral obligation to guarantee that the law is applied equally and fairly to everyone in our community."

Duncan said that if the union doesn't disable the message board, access to the site will be restricted from county workplaces.

Some of the messages, copies of which were published in The Washington Post yesterday, refer to Latino immigrants as "beaners." Others make sexual references to female officers and disparage some officers as "racists."

Margo Pave, an attorney for the Montgomery County Fraternal Order of Police, defended the message board and criticized the county's request that it be shut down.

"Certainly, if he wishes to approach us to talk about this, we can," she said, referring to Manger. "I don't think the proper channel for this discussion is through the press. They have our phone number. They can call."

Pave said the excerpts provided to The Post do not reflect the "bread and butter" of the discussions on the board, which she said has given officers, emboldened by anonymity, an opportunity to challenge their leaders and departmental policy.

"We neither censor or endorse what is on there," she said. She criticized the county's threat to block access to the site from county computers, saying that if Duncan "has that dim an opinion of free speech, I guess that's where he stands."

Manger did not respond to an interview request yesterday.

In a brief e-mail, he said yesterday's Post article misled readers because it "did not make it clear, whatsoever, that this is a private chat room, owned and operated by a private business. The reaction from the community demonstrated that they are left with the impression that the Police Dept. is the responsible organization."

Several community leaders and officers said yesterday that although they understand the department has no direct control over the board and its content, the command staff has largely ignored concerns about the messages.

Detective Terry Ridgley, president of the black officers association, said he met with Manger to bring the issue to his attention several months ago. He said Manger was attentive and seemed concerned but didn't ask to see the messages.

Portions of the messages from the password-protected forum -- which may be accessed only by union members -- were turned over to police internal affairs investigators in at least two instances, said Lt. Eric Burnett, a police spokesman. He said he could not disclose the outcome of those cases.

"I heard from a lot of officers who are happy that this finally came out," Ridgley said. He stressed that he doesn't think the offensive messages reflect the values and professionalism of the majority of officers. Many of them feel the vitriolic content has harmed morale and strained trust among officers, Ridgley said.

County Council member Phil Andrews (D-Gaithersburg-Rockville), who heads the council's public safety panel, called on the union to "begin policing themselves. Otherwise the despicable comments will tarnish the reputation of an excellent department."

Black and Latino leaders said they will schedule meetings with Manger to discuss the message board because they say he is responsible for the conduct of the county's officers.

"I'm flabbergasted," said Del. Ana Sol Gutierrez (D-Montgomery). "If there is one agency where Montgomery County cannot tolerate one iota of racism and xenophobia, it is our police department. Chief Manger must take immediate action to remove any police officer who hides behind the anonymity of the Internet to attack the immigrants, the minorities and women they are hired to protect."

Henry Hailstock, president of the Montgomery chapter of the NAACP, said he has met with at least 15 officers who approached him with concerns about some of the board's content. He said he holds Manger primarily responsible for what he described as a lackluster internal response to officers' concerns.

"He is the leader," Hailstock said. "There are some things management can do to let officers responsible for this know that it is not going to be tolerated and that if they're found doing this, they are going to be disciplined."

Kim Propeak, a spokeswoman for Casa of Maryland Inc., a group that has worked with the department to build trust between officers and the county's immigrants, said she is disheartened.

"I read that story, and I thought: We've just been set back 20 years," Propeak said. "I was outraged. I couldn't finish eating breakfast."

Hennessee, A Woman-Led Fund, Is Hit With Pregnancy-Bias Suit (WSJ)

By Ianthe Jeanne Dugan

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

NEW YORK -- E. Lee Hennessee became one of the most prominent women in the hedge-fund business, building a booming firm counseling rich clients. But how woman-friendly is her firm?

The question was raised by a former employee in a lawsuit filed Wednesday in New York state court against Ms. Hennessee; her husband, Charles Gradante; and their firm, Hennessee Group LLC.

Leeana Piscopo, a 29-year-old former senior vice president, claims that she was fired in January after revealing she was pregnant. The father: Hennessee's public-relations manager, Alex Smith-Ryland, who is also 29.

The lawsuit was the latest of many pregnancy-related cases against employers. The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, along with state and local agencies, last year received 4,449 complaints from employees complaining of bias after pregnancy -- a jump of 31% from 1992. Last year, EEOC reaped $11.6 million in rewards in pregnancy-related cases. One reason, says the agency: Women are increasingly attempting to juggle career and family at the same time that companies are increasing workloads.

Ms. Piscopo, who joined Hennessee seven years ago, shortly after graduating from Manhattan College, says she told Mr. Gradante in early December that she was pregnant. He asked to see a doctor's note and changed her flexible schedule, according to Ms. Piscopo, who was the chief rules-compliance officer.

Mr. Gradante calls the charge "ridiculous" and said the company "bent over backward" to accommodate Ms. Piscopo.

"Lee Hennessee has been a role model for women on Wall Street," said Louis Pechman, an attorney for Hennessee Group. "The suggestion that she or Charles Gradante discriminated against Leeana is ridiculous. In fact, the evidence will show that she was treated very well during their seven-year relationship."

Ms. Piscopo claims that Ms. Hennessee screamed that one of the prospective parents had to leave the firm. Ms. Piscopo says she volunteered, because Mr. Smith-Ryland, an Australian citizen, could be deported if he lost his job.

Ms. Piscopo earned $100,000 a year, plus an annual bonus of 1.5% of the company's equity. Last year, that bonus would have been $22,000, but she says she didn't get it. Ms. Piscopo's attorney, Saul Zabell, says they are seeking "hundreds of thousands" in damages.

Trading of Stolt-Nielsen Halted After Appeals Court Undoes Injunction Against Indictment

NEW YORK (AP) -- Trading of Stolt-Nielsen SA's shares was halted Thursday, after a federal appeals court reversed a lower court injunction blocking the Department of Justice from indicting the chemical transportation company and its officials for alleged antitrust violations.

DOJ_NMG_0020707

The injunction stopping the Department of Justice from prosecuting Stolt-Nielsen -- a company that cooperated with the government in criminal antitrust prosecutions in the international carrier industry -- was issued by a District Court judge in January 2005.

That injunction came after a decision by the Department of Justice to kick Stolt-Nielsen out of the government's Corporate Leniency Program for allegedly continuing illegal anticompetitive activity longer than it admitted.

The two-judge panel of the Third Circuit Court of Appeals said that the District Court did not have the authority to enforce an amnesty agreement before an indictment. The appeals court remanded the case back to the lower court and did not address the merits of the company's amnesty defense.

Stolt-Nielsen said it plans to file a petition for a rehearing.

Before being halted in afternoon trading, shares were down 86 cents, or 2.6 percent, to $32.40 on the Nasdaq. After trading resumed, shares were down $1.80 or 5.4 percent at $31.46. The stock has traded between $29.92 and $41.50 over the past year.

Bayer Joins Race To Build German Drug Titan (WSJ)

By Jeanne Whalen And Jason Singer and mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

Bayer AG's friendly bid for fellow German drug maker Schering AG, which tops a hostile bid by Merck KGaA, is aimed at creating a pharmaceutical giant capable of competing with U.S. and European rivals, which have eclipsed Germany's once-mighty drug industry.

Schering said its executive board backed Bayer's offer, valued at €16.34 billion ($19.73 billion), making it unlikely another bidder will emerge. If approved by Schering's shareholders, the two companies plan to combine their prescription-drug businesses into a new firm called Bayer-Schering Pharmaceuticals with anticipated sales of more than €9 billion a year and headquarters in Berlin. (See Schering statement.)

Bayer said it plans to cut 6,000 jobs, or 10% of the work force of the combined operations. "Bayer Healthcare and Schering have a combined work force of around 60,000 people," Bayer Chief Executive Werner Wenning told a telephone press conference Friday. "During the restructuring, of the combined businesses, there will be job cuts of around 6,000 employees in the upcoming years," he added.

Bayer-Schering Pharmaceuticals' revenue would exceed that of Schering-Plough Corp. of the U.S., which is unrelated to the German Schering. Bayer also has a large over-the-counter drug business and, including Schering's prescription drug operations, Bayer would become one of the world's biggest drug makers.

"We are convinced that merging the two companies will create a health-care heavyweight of international standing," Bayer's Mr. Wenning said in a statement late Thursday. "It is also the best way of reasserting the importance of Germany as a pharmaceutical industry base."

A successful bid from Bayer would leave Germany's Merck in a difficult position. The company had been hoping to bulk up its business to better compete in the global marketplace. Jon Baumhauer, a 62-year-old member of the Merck family and its chief representative, told journalists on the sidelines of a recent Merck news conference that Schering has always been Merck's "dream target" for expansion.

Bayer's offer of €86 a share, a 12% premium to Merck's, combined with "several other important commitments, is a good offer," said Hubertus Erlen, chairman of Schering's executive board. In Frankfurt Thursday, Schering's shares closed at €84.97, after rising 2.4% on speculation about a Bayer bid. Bayer's shares rose almost 3% to €34.75. In early trading Friday, Schering surged 4.7% to €89.00, while Bayer was up 1% at €35.10 on the Frankfurt exchange. Merck, meanwhile, was down just over 2% at €78.83.

"After intensive discussion, the management board has come to the assessment that, in view of this offer, it is probably impossible for Schering to maintain its independence," Mr. Erlen said. He said the combination would "together form an even more internationally competitive company."

Germany was one of the birthplaces of the drug industry. Bayer, the inventor of tablet aspirin, traces its roots back to 1863 and Berlin-based Schering says it was founded in 1851. But both Merck and Schering lost their U.S. operations after the two World Wars, leading to the formation of Merck of the U.S. and Schering-Plough.

Germany remains home to several midsize drug companies. But the country's stature has diminished in recent decades as consolidation has created a handful of drug giants in the U.S., United Kingdom, Switzerland and France.

Bayer had total sales of €27.4 billion last year and net profit of €1.6 billion. Schering's sales last year rose 7% to €5.3 billion, while net profit rose 23% to €619 million.

Merck's hostile bid for its German rival, made last week, has enabled Bayer to play a white-knight role. Schering's board last week rejected Merck's bid of €77 a share, or €14.6 billion, as too low. Merck couldn't be reached for comment.

Bayer first approached Schering shortly after Merck made its March 13 offer, Klaus Kuhn, Bayer's chief financial officer, said in a telephone interview. Schering management would take a big role in running the combined pharmaceuticals division, giving them more clout -- and more jobs -- than would have been the case if Merck had acquired Schering, people familiar with the matter said. Still, if the deal goes through, Mr. Kuhn said he expects job cuts of around 6,000 people, or 10% of the combined firm's work force.

Bayer said it expects to achieve cost savings of €700 million annually after three years, 40% more than the annual €500 million Merck projected to save annually by 2009. But Bayer added that the savings will be damped by a €1 billion charge to cover restructuring costs.

Bayer of Leverkusen, Germany, is a big seller of over-the-counter medicines, including Aleve, Bayer aspirin and Alka-Seltzer. Its prescription-drug business is smaller, including Baypress for high blood pressure, Nexavar for renal-cell cancer and the anti-infectives Avalox and Cipro. Buying Schering would bolster Bayer's prescription-drug business, giving it access to contraceptives and a big-selling multiple-sclerosis drug.

Bayer's reputation and profit took a big hit in 2001 when the company was forced to recall its cholesterol drug Baycol after the drug was linked to dozens of deaths in the U.S. Bayer subsequently fought a costly legal battle with U.S. consumers.

Soon after the Baycol debacle the company undertook an extensive restructuring, splitting off part of its chemicals and plastics business and focusing operations on health care; pesticides and seeds; and material science, which includes polyurethanes.

Schering Gets Bid From Bayer (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

In a bid that could help partly restore Germany's historic prominence in the pharmaceutical industry, the drug and chemical giant Bayer yesterday announced a nearly $20 billion offer for its smaller rival, Schering, topping a $17.9 billion offer by Merck of Germany.

Bayer, a 143-year-old company best known as the inventor of aspirin, said it would pay 86 euros ($103) a share in cash for Schering, which last week rebuffed an offer of 77 euros ($92) a share by Merck. Schering and Merck are German companies not related to the American drug giants Schering-Plough and Merck & Company.

Schering, based in Berlin, said it would recommend the offer to its shareholders, an indication that Bayer was likely to complete the takeover unless Merck raised its bid or yet another suitor entered the fray. An executive close to Merck said it would assess the offer before deciding how to respond.

For Bayer, the deal is a striking return to its roots. Bayer has struggled in drugs since the recall of its anticholesterol treatment Baycol over safety concerns in 2001, and it tried fruitlessly a few years ago to find a partner for its troubled pharmaceutical business.

Although health care products now account for less than 40 percent of Bayer's annual revenues, which were about $30.5 billion last year, the Schering acquisition could make health care the largest part of Bayer, with projected sales of $18 billion a year.

Bayer's biggest business now is producing polyurethane, polycarbonates and other manufacturing materials, which accounted for about $13 billion in sales last year.

"We have for some time believed that Schering was the ideal partner for moving into specialty pharmaceuticals," Arthur Higgins, the chief executive of Bayer's health care division, said in a telephone interview. "We have two excellent German companies coming together."

Shares of Bayer rose 1.4 percent in Frankfurt yesterday, after rumors of an offer swirled through the market. That suggested that investors would welcome the combination, which would create the world's 12th- largest pharmaceutical company, and a top 10 producer of specialty drugs.

Schering is the world leader in oral contraceptives and also specializes in cancer drugs, while Bayer has recently focused its pharmaceutical research on cancer and cardiovascular drugs.

In New York, where news of the deal began circulating in midafternoon, Schering's American depository receipts rose nearly 7 percent, to close at $107.20. But Bayer's A.D.R.'s, while ending regular trading up 1.4 percent, to close at $41.69, fell nearly 3 percent in the after-hours market, as investors had time to digest the agreement's details.

Germany's fragmented drug industry is viewed as ripe for consolidation, having missed out on the wave of mergers that created global goliaths like GlaxoSmithKline, Sanofi-Aventis and Pfizer. Bayer, though Germany's largest pharmaceutical company, ranks only 16th globally.

Analysts had predicted a rival bid for Schering after Merck's unsolicited offer last week put the company into play. But few focused on Bayer, speculating instead about the Swiss drug giant Novartis.

Even now, some analysts question the logic of combining a drug specialist like Schering, with Bayer, a conglomerate that sells products as diverse as Alka-Seltzer and One-a-Day vitamins and agricultural chemicals.

"The only overlap they have is in oncology," said Andreas Burckhardt, a drug industry analyst at WestLB. "To justify such a higher bid, they're going to have to make more people redundant than Merck," he said, referring to job cuts.

Bayer said the merger could result in about 6,000 jobs being eliminated, roughly 10 percent of the combined work force. The company, which is based in the Rhine River town of Leverkusen, estimates it will reap 700 million euros ($837 million) in annual savings from the merger by 2009. Among the areas in which a Bayer-Schering combination would be valuable, Mr. Higgins said, was in the marketing of cancer drugs. Bayer recently introduced a kidney cancer drug in Britain, and expected to receive approval to sell it in the United States later this year. Schering has an established sales force for its portfolio of cancer drugs, which Bayer could exploit.

Bayer said it would finance the offer with existing cash and a line of bank credit. It would refinance that with equity, bonds and proceeds from the sale of two chemical units. The bid values Schering at 2.8 times sales and 11.6 times projected 2006 operating income.

"These are reasonable numbers for a pharma transaction," said Klaus Kühn, the chief financial officer of Bayer. "From a financial point of view, it makes sense."

Bayer has been overhauling itself more or less continually over the last several years. In 2004, it bought the over-the-counter drug business of Roche, signaling its intent to focus on health care. Last year, it spun off most of its chemicals business in a new publicly listed company, Lanxess.

To make this deal palatable to Schering employees and local politicians, Bayer said it would base its pharmaceutical division in Berlin, Schering's hometown. But Bayer will maintain its corporate headquarters in Leverkusen.

In a statement issued late yesterday, the chairman of Schering, Hubertus Erlen, said: "Both business are complementary and follow the same strategy. Together they will be even more competitive."

In an interview on Monday, however, Mr. Erlen had disputed the argument that Schering, as a specialty drug company with its own global sales force, would benefit by merging with a competitor.

"There are pharma markets where size and muscle is decisive," he said, "but this is different. This is going to highly specialized doctors. It is not a question of marketing muscle. It is a question of being the expert in that field."

Schering may also face hard questions from its employees, who rallied against the Merck bid on Tuesday. They said they favored staying independent, citing the prospect of job cuts as a danger in a takeover.

Bayer In $20bn Agreed Bid For Schering (FT)

By Lina Saigol And Gerrit Weismann

Financial Times, March 24, 2006

Bayer, the German pharmaceuticals and chemicals company, on Thursday night made an agreed €16.3bn all cash bid for Schering, thwarting a rival hostile offer of €14.6bn from Merck.

The deal would cement Bayer's dominant position as the most powerful German drugs company, but would leave family-controlled Merck and Altana struggling with weak product pipelines.

The maker of aspirin is understood to have approached Schering with a friendly "white knight" bid just days after Merck made its hostile bid, according to people close to the situation.

Merck launched a €77-a-share unsolicited offer for Schering on March 14, which valued its Berlin-based rival at €14.6bn. Shares in Schering rose 2.37 per cent to €84.97 on Thursday. Bayer's bid is for €86 a share.

Schering immediately rejected the bid as too low and hired Morgan Stanley and Dresdner Kleinwort Wasserstein to advise it on other alternatives. Merck is being advised by Deutsche Bank and Goldman Sachs.

The Bayer/Schering deal will not preclude Merck from returning with a higher offer. Although Merck has not ruled out sweetening its terms, Wilhelm Simson, chairman of Merck's supervisory board, has said the company would first wait to see if other bidders came forward.

Merck had planned to finance its bid through a combination of bank debt, cash, a rights issue, and a €1bn investment from the Merck family and has said it is committed to maintaining its investment-grade rating.

Schering is the world's largest maker of birth-control pills. It derives around 16 per cent of its sales from Betaseron, a multiple sclerosis treatment and also makes substances introduced into the body to make organs visible on X-rays.

However, both Bayer and Merck would be particularly interested in Schering's oncology business, which has treatments for breast, prostate and colorectal cancer at different stages. That division accounted for €197m in 2005.

Bayer, which, invented aspirin more than 100 years ago, is headed by Werner Wenning, chief executive. During the past 18 months, it has bought the over-the-counter drugs unit of Roche, the Swiss drugs company, and spun off the bulk of its chemicals operations as a new listed entity called Lanxess.

The group has also placed its hopes in bringing to market new home-made patented drugs, with US regulators giving a potential blockbuster anti-cancer drug the green light late last year.

Bayer rose 2.96 per cent to €34.75. Merck fell 2.85 per cent to €80.49. Schering, Bayer and Merck all declined to comment.

UPDATE: Bayer Launches White Knight Bid For Schering (DOW)

By Steve McGrath and Gangolf Schrimpff, Of DOW JONES NEWSWIRES

Dow Jones, March 23, 2006

LONDON -(Dow Jones)- German pharmaceutical and chemicals company Bayer AG (BAY) (BAY) Thursday confirmed it will make a EUR16.3 billion bid for rival Schering AG (SHR)(SHR), trumping a rival EUR14.6 billion bid by Merck KGaA (MRK.XE).

In a statement, Leverkusen-based Bayer said it would offer EUR86 a share in cash for Schering (SHR), topping Merck's (MRK) EUR77-a-share offer.

In a separate statement, Schering (SHR) said its board would recommend Bayer's offer. Schering (SHR) had rejected Merck's (MRK) approach, saying it didn't reflect its true value.

Schering's (SHR) shares rose more than 2% to EUR84.97 Thursday on speculation about a Bayer bid.

Earlier, the Wall Street Journal had reported, quoting people familiar with the matter, that Bayer would make a white-knight bid for Schering (SHR). Bayer has had an interest in Schering (SHR) for years, but Berlin-based Schering (SHR) had been unwilling to sell itself, the paper quoted the people as saying.

DOJ_NMG_0020711

Merck's (MRK) bid for Schering (SHR) was aimed at creating a German drug company of a scale that could compete with global rivals such as Pfizer Inc. (PFE) (PFE) of the U.S. and GlaxoSmithKline PLC (GSK) (GSK) of the U.K. A combination of Bayer and Schering (SHR) would create an even bigger company by sales.

The Wall Street Journal had said Bayer's bid may be made jointly with Siemens AG (SI) (SI), which is interested in Schering's (SHR) imaging business. However, there was no mention of this in Bayer's statement.

In its statement, Bayer said Schering's (SHR) business would be merged with its own health-care division to create a new listed unit, Bayer-Schering Pharmaceuticals, headquartered in Berlin. The takeover would boost Bayer's total annual sales to more than EUR15 billion and boost earnings, while Bayer-Schering Pharmaceuticals would have sales of more than EUR9 billion. The new unit's earnings before interest, tax, depreciation and amortization margin is targeted at 25%, up from 23% at Bayer's current Healthcare unit.

"The proposed takeover of Schering (SHR) is in line with our strategic objective to further grow our health-care business, especially in the area of pharmaceutical specialty products," Bayer Chief Executive Werner Wenning said in the statement.

Merck (MRK) was unavailable to comment late Thursday.

Bayer said it is targeting annual synergies of EUR700 million by the third year after completion of the deal. However, the deal will also result in one- time acquisition costs of EUR1 billion.

"In the mid term, the new company is expected to grow at least as fast as the market. Over the same period, we anticipate an average double-digit growth rate for underlying EBITDA," Bayer Healthcare Chairman Arthur Higgins said about Bayer-Schering Pharmaceuticals.

Wenning said the company would be a leader in gynecology, multiple sclerosis, hematology and contrast agents treatments.

Bayer said the deal would be funded through liquidity of around EUR3 billion and a credit line provided by Credit Suisse and Citigroup, which would later be refinanced through bank loans and debt. The planned equity capital measures will total EUR4 billion, it added. Further financing would be raised through the sale of plastics units H.C. Starck and Wolff Walsrode units.

Bayer said its offer has a minimum acceptance rate of 75% of Schering's (SHR)capital stock. It expects the deal to complete in the second quarter and to clear antitrust regulators without any problems.

Prior to Bayer's statement, analysts had expressed reservations about a possible Bayer bid for Schering (SHR). Landesbank Baden-Wuerttemberg's Ulle Woerner had said a takeover wouldn't fit Bayer's strategy, while another analyst, who requested anonymity, said there are few overlapping portfolios and therefore no major visible synergies. The unnamed analyst had noted a deal would strengthen Bayer's oncology operations.

Bayer is being advised by Credit Suisse and Greenhill in its bid for Schering (SHR).

Hazardous Waste Firms' Merger To Move Ahead (Salt Lake Tribune)

By Judy Fahys

Salt Lake Tribune, March 24, 2006

Antitrust review: The $396M deal involving EnergySolutions and Duratek does not cause federal antitrust objections

The U.S. Justice Department has decided there are no further antitrust issues to consider in the merger of Salt Lake City-based EnergySolutions with Duratek Inc.

Maryland-based Duratek said Thurs- day that a month-long waiting period mandated by the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act of 1976 - an antitrust regulation that automatically triggers a 30-day review whenever an investor seeks to acquire either a 15 percent stake, or a stake valued at more than $15 million, in a particular security - ended this week without any indication the Justice Department wants more time to review the merger, which will create the nation's largest full-service nuclear waste company.

However, the $396 million deal, announced Feb. 7, is still months from being complete. Publicly traded Duratek needs shareholder approval, and a vote has not been scheduled yet, said Diane R. Brown, who leads the company's investor relations.

In addition, EnergySolutions, formerly called Envirocare of Utah, must complete the bureaucratic process of transferring Duratek's licenses and permits with other states and the federal government into its name. With the merger, EnergySolutions will have more than 2,000 employees and operations in more than 40 states and England.

It will operate the only two low-level radioactive waste facilities available for regulated waste from more than 30 states.

In Utah, EnergySolutions already has done the necessary paperwork, said Dane Finerfrock, director of the state Division of Radiation Control. "All of the licenses and permits EnergySolutions has with the department have already changed over," he said.

The company operates a mile-square radioactive and hazardous waste landfill about 80 miles west of Salt Lake City. A request to the state to double the site's size is pending and faces a lawsuit.

Meanwhile, EnergySolutions has amended its current license to switch equipment planned for the new acreage to the existing site. Another proposed change is to increase the amount of waste that can go into the disposal pits. Under its current license, EnergySolutions can stack waste about 44 feet above ground.

The mounds would be 75 feet off the ground if the amendment is approved, allowing the company to expand its Utah disposal capacity by growing up instead of out.

EU Regulators OK Time Warner-CBS Venture (AP)

AP, March 24, 2006

(AP) - BRUSSELS, Belgium-European Union antitrust regulators cleared the Warner Bros. network's 50-50 joint venture with CBS Corp.'s UPN television network on Thursday, saying there were no competition concerns on the plan for the European market.

The two networks will combine to form a new broadcast network called CW. They decided to join forces after struggling in the U.S. ratings.

The venture was fast-tracked for approval by the EU, meaning it saw no significant antitrust problems and received no complaints from rivals.

The EU has to approve mergers and acquisitions between companies with joint global revenue of more than 5 billion euros ($6 billion) a year or if at least two of the companies involved have more than 250 million euros ($300 million) revenue in Europe.

The UPN and WB networks faced tough competition from U.S. network rivals such as Walt Disney Co.'s ABC and General Electric Co.'s NBC. Time Warner Inc. is the parent of Warner Bros.

UPDATE: Medtronic Patents Fuel Debate On Guidant Impact (DOW)

By Jon Kamp, Of DOW JONES NEWSWIRES

Dow Jones, March 24, 2006

CHICAGO -(Dow Jones)- Medtronic Inc.'s (MDT) (MDT) recent purchase of the rights to certain patents covering stent medical devices could inject the company into the acquisition saga involving rivals Boston Scientific Corp. (BSX) (BSX), Guidant Corp. (GDT) (GDT) and Abbott Laboratories Inc. (ABT).

That's because Medtronic (MDT) believes a key Guidant (GDT) stent product infringes on those patents, and Guidant's (GDT) product plays a key role in the company's coming acquisition by Boston Scientific (BSX) and Abbott. Medtronic (MDT) and a Citigroup analyst made a case Thursday for the patents' validity.

There is argument, though, about whether the latest patent claims bear watching or simply mix with the chaff in the competitive $5 billion to $6 billion stent business. The sector sees frequent litigation as companies jockey for position, and other analysts who weighed in Thursday suggested the latest Medtronic (MDT) suit is more of the same.

"I just see this as a lot of competitive wrangling that's just not going to affect the market place for a very long time," said Phillip Nalbone, an analyst with RBC Capital Markets. He doesn't own shares of any of the companies in question, and his firm doesn't have banking relationships with the companies.

At issue are stents, tiny tubes that prop open arteries, and Medtronic's (MDT)purchase in February of patent rights for bare-metal stents from a private Canadian company called Evysio. Medtronic (MDT) the same month filed in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California claiming, among other things, that Guidant's (GDT) "Vision" stent violated the patents.

Vision is the underpinning for Guidant's (GDT) "Xience" drug-coated stent, which Boston Scientific (BSX) and Abbott plan to jointly sell, and is targeted for introduction in Europe this year. But, according to Citigroup analyst Matthew Dodds, Evysio has already made progress in ongoing litigation against the Vision stent in France, which suggests strength for the Medtronic (MDT)/Evysio case.

Any disruption for Vision could disrupt Xience, and, according to Dodds, Medtronic's (MDT) deep pockets are likely to carry the fight to other countries. A successful fight in Ireland where Vision is manufactured, for example, could put the Xience European launch at risk, Dodds said.

Medtronic (MDT) declined comment on where the case might go next. Scott Ward, president of Medtronic Vascular, said in an interview that Evysio's success to date in France "gives us some confidence" in the strength of its case.

Stent Battle

Dodds suggested in an early Thursday research note that Abbott was overpaying for Guidant's (GDT) cardiovascular business, given the potential for Xience delays, and that Abbott's willingness to overpay might show a lack of optimism in its own stent product. Dodds doesn't own shares of the companies in question.

Abbott closed down 22 cents at $43.88 Thursday, and traded as low as $43.16 early in Thursday's session. The medical device and pharmaceutical company refuted Dodds' suggestions in a statement.

"Abbott has a broad intellectual property portfolio and we are confident we will have freedom to operate in the drug-eluting stent market," spokesman Jonathon Hamilton said, relaying the statement. "In addition, we are working closely with regulatory agencies on our acquisition of Guidant's (GDT) vascular business, and we're confident that Abbott will enjoy the full benefits of the acquisition."

Boston is buying Guidant (GDT) for about $27 billion, or $80 a share for Guidant (GDT)holders. Abbott will play a major roll by buying Guidant's (GDT) vascular intervention and endovascular business for $4.1 billion, and by loaning Boston Scientific (BSX) $ 900 million and buying $1.4 billion in Boston Scientific (BSX) common stock.

Boston Scientific (BSX) wants to close the Guidant (GDT) deal in the first week of April, but said late Thursday the close could be delayed as late as April 13 by a European antitrust review.

Some analysts suggested Medtronic's (MDT) patent moves are really an effort to create bargaining chips to benefit its own stent project. Medtronic (MDT) is marketing a drug-coated stent internationally called Endeavor, and hopes to bring it to the U.S. in 2007. The catch for the company is that it doesn't have access to " rapid exchange," a key delivery system that's now the favored way to install stents.

If Medtronic (MDT) can create a strong case against Guidant's (GDT) product, it can later agree to drop that case in return for access to rapid exchange, said RBC's Nalbone and Larry Biegelsen, an analyst with Prudential Equity Group LLC. "They will seek to use it as a negotiating tool," Nalbone said.

Medtronic's (MDT) Ward declined comment on that assertion and the company's negotiating strategy. He said Medtronic (MDT) always prefers "negotiated settlements", and that it seeks a level playing field in the stent market.

J&J In The Fray

Dodds on Thursday also raised an issue, which he's raised before, concerning Johnson & Johnson's (JNJ) (JNJ) potential to disrupt the closing of the Boston Scientific (BSX)/Guidant (GDT) deal. J&J holds patents for the family of drugs used on the Guidant (GDT) and Abbott stents. The healthcare conglomerate's patents will likely be "strongly considered" by the Federal Trade Commission, "which is likely to make Boston's plan to close the Guidant (GDT) deal by April 3 unrealistic," Dodds said.

A J&J spokesman declined comment on whether the company, which had planned to buy Guidant (GDT) before Boston Scientific (BSX) won a bidding war, is seeking to disrupt the deal. Boston Scientific (BSX) spokesman Paul Donovan said the company doesn't see an impact from either patent issue.

"We have reviewed the intellectual property issues and are comfortable proceeding with the transaction," he said, relaying a company statement.

Boston Scientific (BSX) closed unchanged at $23.47 Thursday. Guidant (GDT) closed down 10 cents at $78.66.

Guidant (GDT) officials didn't comment on the patent issues.

Boston Scientific Makes Antitrust Commitments To EC (DOW)

Dow Jones, March 24, 2006

Boston Scientific Corp. (BSX) (BSX) said late Thursday it has made certain commitments to the European Commission as part of its antitrust review of Boston Scientific's (BSX) acquisition of Guidant Corp (GDT) (GDT).

The details of the commitments are confidential, Boston Scientific (BSX) said, but are not material to the deal and will become public when the EC completes its review and announces its decision.

The commitments extend the normal five-week EC review period to up to seven weeks, meaning that the review will finish no later than April 13.

Boston Scientific (BSX) said its goal is still to close the deal during the first week of April.

Talks For Lucent May Signal End For 90's Symbol (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Ken Belson

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

Lucent Technologies, the phone equipment maker that became a symbol of last decade's boom-and-bust cycle in telecommunications, is in negotiations to be acquired by Alcatel of France for about $12.6 billion, people close to the discussions said last night.

The two companies confirmed the talks last night in a statement, saying they were "engaged in discussions about a potential merger of equals."

After several years of mergers on a huge scale among telephone companies — local, long-distance and wireless — a deal for Lucent would be the first big step toward a shakeout among the companies that make the equipment for the phone service providers.

The prospect of a big trans-Atlantic deal comes at a time when foreign takeovers have been political flashpoints in both Washington and Paris. A Dubai company's acquisition of some United States port terminals created an uproar in Congress, while the French government has sought to thwart cross-border takeovers in energy and pharmaceuticals.

People involved in the talks said the negotiations had advanced in the last week, but cautioned that they could still fall apart. These people said the disclosure of the talks could delay or derail any such deal.

The companies said last night that they would have "no further comment until an agreement is reached or the discussions are terminated."

The talks come nearly five years after the two companies called off what would have been a $22.8 billion merger. That aborted deal had been constructed as a merger of equals but fell apart after the companies could not agree on how much control Alcatel would have.

For Lucent, based in Murray Hill, N.J., a sale would be the last chapter in an extraordinary story of struggle. In 2002, the company was on the brink of collapse, but survived by eliminating thousands of jobs and cutting billions in debt.

Yet as Lucent has returned to profitability, the telecommunications landscape in the United States has radically changed. Lucent has lost many of its largest customers as the regional Bell phone companies gobbled up rivals, steeply reduced investment in their older copper-line networks and spent more on fiber optic equipment that has fallen in price.

Consolidation among the phone companies — this month's $67 billion deal between AT&T and BellSouth being the most recent — has raised expectations that at least some of the equipment makers that serve them will also merge.

Lucent and, to a lesser degree, Nortel Networks in Canada, have been considered the most likely takeover targets because of their depressed stock prices and lukewarm business prospects.

The outlook seemed worse in 2001, when Alcatel and Lucent discussed a merger. The two companies were then roughly equal in size, but were struggling as the collapse in spending on telecommunications equipment dragged down their earnings and stock prices. But Alcatel has emerged as the much stronger company, with a market value of nearly $20 billion.

To Alcatel, Lucent's most valuable asset would be its C.D.M.A. wireless technology used by Verizon Wireless and Sprint Nextel, two of the largest cellphone companies in the United States. Though only about a third of mobile phone subscribers worldwide rely on this technology, Verizon and Sprint have spent heavily to upgrade their networks to provide more next-generation data services.

Lucent's wireless business would complement Alcatel's leadership in broadband equipment, fiber optic networks and Internet television, all of which are growing quickly. Lucent's leading position in the American market would also dovetail with Alcatel's strength in Europe.

Though Alcatel would be eager to obtain Lucent's customers and leading position in the C.D.M.A. market, it could also risk inheriting some of the company's problems. Growth overseas has been uneven. For instance, Lucent sales in the last three months of 2005 fell more than 15 percent, in part because of weaker demand in China.

Lucent's roots go back to the age of the telegraph. It was the equipment-making arm of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, and included the research and development unit Bell Laboratories, an intellectual powerhouse. In 1996, AT&T spun off Lucent in a $3 billion initial public offering. The stock quickly became a Wall Street favorite, rising to more than $63 a share and surpassing AT&T in market value by 1998.

In 2000, the company was caught wrong-footed by a sudden slowdown in demand for communications equipment and reported a series of disappointing quarterly results. Its chairman and chief executive was ousted, and the Securities and Exchange Commission began an inquiry into its accounting practices. The shares — which made up the nest eggs of thousands of Lucent employees — slid to a low of 58 cents in 2002.

Patricia F. Russo was named chief executive that year, and pulled the company back from the brink of collapse. In 2004, Lucent settled the S.E.C. investigation, agreeing to pay $25 million. But the recovery has been anything but robust; Lucent's shares closed yesterday at $2.82.

Alcatel has half its sales in Europe, but has been making a push in Asia and North America. Its chief operating officer and president, Michael Quigley, is an English-born Australian. He is expected to succeed Serge Tchuruk as chief executive when Mr. Tchuruk steps down in May.

Lucent, Alcatel Are Far Along In Merger Talks (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman, Sara Silver And Almar Latour

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

Lucent Technologies Inc. and France's Alcatel SA said they were in advanced talks on a merger that would create a trans-Atlantic equipment supplier with a market value of $33 billion in the rapidly consolidating telecommunications industry.

A linkup between the two, anticipated since a deal attempt failed five years ago, could help both realize substantial cost savings and likely would kick off a new round of consolidation among the already-pressured companies that supply equipment to phone companies.

Lucent Technologies Chief Executive Patricia Russo would be the chief executive of the combined company, people familiar with the matter said. And the two firms would have equal representation of a new board of directors, these people add.

Given the cultural and logistical challenges, moreover, a merger could prove to be among the more complicated recent couplings in the industry. With protectionist sentiment growing in both the U.S. and Europe, a merger could prove a critical test of cross-border cooperation for the French and U.S. governments.

In a joint statement late yesterday, the companies said: "We can confirm that Lucent and Alcatel are engaged in discussion about a merger of equals that is intended to be priced at market. There can be no assurances that any agreement will be reached or that a transaction will be consummated. We will have no further comment until an agreement is reached or the discussions are terminated."

Many details were unclear, including just how the two companies might pull off a "merger of equals" when they have such divergent valuations. Lucent has a market value of $12.6 billion, while Alcatel's market capitalization is $20.2 billion. The disparity suggests a deal may be structured as an acquisition of Lucent by Alcatel.

Consolidation pressure has been growing in the equipment business amid a wave of telecom deals and the emergence of more-efficient technologies. That has limited the amount of money that big phone companies have to spend on equipment. The result has been too many equipment makers chasing a limited amount of business.

The industry's biggest suppliers -- which include such companies as Nokia Corp. and Motorola Inc. -- compete for contracts in nearly every corner of the globe, from Latin America to China. But their primacy in some markets is waning as suppliers from China flood into the developing world offering cut-rate equipment.

At the same time, the technology of transmitting phone calls, Internet data and TV signals often is regarded as a national resource to be protected from foreign meddling, and a Lucent-Alcatel deal could draw close scrutiny.

Lucent's telecom switches, for instance, are in phone hubs around the U.S. -- and are subject to routine wiretapping and monitoring of law enforcement. It also runs Bell Labs, a decades-old institution descended from the old AT&T Corp. that is the force behind some of the most innovative U.S. research into communications.

By merging with Lucent, Alcatel would greatly expand its presence in the U.S. market. Alcatel already is the world's leading seller of "digital subscriber line," or DSL, equipment, which U.S. phone companies have been buying to expand their broadband businesses. Lucent would give it a major share of the U.S. wireless-equipment market as well. Lucent is a leading maker of the technology used by several major carriers including Verizon Wireless, a joint venture between Vodafone Group PLC and Verizon Communications Inc., and Sprint Nextel Corp.

Telecom has seen a massive wave of consolidation during the past two years, with the announced value of U.S. deals alone exceeding $200 billion. Most recently, AT&T Inc. announced plans to buy BellSouth Corp. for $67 billion. Other transactions have included Verizon's acquisition of MCI Inc., and the earlier purchase of AT&T by SBC Communications Inc., which took the AT&T name.

The backdrop is a flood of new technologies and new competitors that have driven down the prices of traditional phone services while introducing a host of new services that are dramatically changing the way consumers and businesses communicate. While phone service over the Internet is taking off, for instance, the cable industry is making a big grab for the traditional residential landline business of telephone companies like Verizon and AT&T. In turn, phone companies are starting to offer television service over upgraded networks.

The changes are creating opportunities for some equipment makers. But they also pose challenges because improved efficiency enables carriers to replace huge switches and other pieces of equipment with computers and software.

There already has been some merger-and-acquisition activity in the equipment business. In October, Telefon AB L.M. Ericsson of Sweden agreed to acquire Marconi Corp., of London. In February, Cisco Systems Inc. completed an acquisition of Scientific-Atlanta, giving it a major beachhead in the cable TV, video-on-demand and emerging Internet television businesses. Motorola has plans to spend up to $1 billion to buy small companies.

Lucent, of Murray Hill, N.J., and Alcatel have come close to merging before. In the spring of 2001, they were on the verge of a $23.5 billion deal, hammered out among executives in a 16th-century castle outside of Paris. But Lucent, which had initiated the conversations, ultimately backed out because its management felt the deal was turning into a takeover rather than a merger of equals.

Shortly after the 2001 merger's collapse, Serge Tchuruk, Alcatel's chairman and chief executive, said the company's goal of becoming a bigger player in the U.S. market remained "absolutely essential." Alcatel has acquired a number of smaller U.S. data-networking players, but an acquisition of Lucent would be by far its largest deal here.

Of late, Alcatel's financial performance has been stronger than that of Lucent. In 2005, Alcatel posted sales of 13.1 billion ($15.8 billion), up from 12.2 billion in 2004, and net income of 930 million, compared with 576 million in 2004. After suffering with other equipment manufacturers from the telecom meltdown, it has been making a steady comeback thanks in part to streamlining, job reductions and asset sales. Mr. Tchuruk also has been trying to broaden the company's client base beyond the telecom industry.

Lucent's Ms. Russo also has been credited with a turnaround after the turmoil of the telecom bust, producing two years of stable growth partly by expanding in emerging markets. But most of the profit Lucent generated actually came from credits in its overfunded pension plans, not from operations. In its first fiscal quarter in 2006, the company booked a net loss of $104 million and a 12% decline in sales. Company officials said an anticipated increase in demand from telecom carriers didn't materialize at the end of last year.

Christian Group Exodus Backs Off Infringement Case Against Blog Parody (USAT)

By Jon Swartz

USA Today, March 24, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — A Christian group that promotes heterosexuality Thursday quietly dropped its beef against a blogger who poked fun at it.

Exodus International initially claimed the altered image of one of its billboards by Justin Watt infringed its copyright. But Exodus is no longer pursuing the matter after Watt stopped using its "watermark" logo, Exodus President Alan Chambers said.

Watt, operator of the Justinsomnia blog, says he exercised free speech when he parodied the Exodus billboard, which says, "Gay? Unhappy? www.exodus.to." Wyatt re-created the billboard on his site so it read, "Straight? Unhappy? www.gay.com."

(Exodus uses ".to" as its domain suffix because ".com" was not available.)

Watt, 26, a Web developer in Northern California who enlisted the aid of the American Civil Liberties Union and high-powered law firm Fenwick & West, has posted his blog for four years. He posted the parody Sept. 19 because he found Exodus' message "offensive." A lawyer representing Exodus sent Watt a cease-and-desist letter on March 2.

The dust-up has made Watt a cause célbre among bloggers. More than 40 other websites now carry the spoof.

Had the dispute escalated, it would have extended the debate over fair use of copyrighted material beyond print and electronic media and to blogs, says copyright attorney Tom Zellerbach.

Companies frequently ask websites to remove images and text out of concern they infringe copyrighted material. But high-profile cases involving bloggers have been rare, Zellerbach and other lawyers say.

The incident gained attention because Watt understood his rights and contacted an attorney, said ACLU lawyer Ann Brick, who represented him. "We don't know how often people get cease-and-desist letters and pull material without knowing their rights," she said.

"Just as the First Amendment allows Exodus to post its billboard, it gives Justin the right to post a parody," Brick said.

Private Equity Firm To Bid On 12 Newspapers (WP)

By Steven Levingston

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

The Yucaipa Cos., a Los Angeles-based private equity investment firm, plans to bid Tuesday for the 12 Knight Ridder Inc. newspapers put up for sale by McClatchy Co.

Yucaipa would not say how much it intends to offer for the papers, including the Philadelphia Inquirer, the San Jose Mercury News and the Akron Beacon Journal.

The papers became available after McClatchy last week bought the Knight Ridder chain of 32 papers and announced it would divest itself of 12 dailies in what it said were slower-growth markets.

Robert Hall, a Yucaipa adviser and former publisher of the Inquirer and Philadelphia Daily News, said the firm would make its bid Tuesday, when preliminary offers are due. He added that, if successful, the private fund would take a long-term approach to its investment, freeing the papers from having to meet the pressures of Wall Street.

"Philosophically, Yucaipa has been a worker-friendly fund, a patient investor that will allow for a lesser return than maybe another investor looking for a five-year flip," Hall said. "It would give the papers the opportunity to reinvent themselves to grow in their markets."

Other bidders are possible. Analysts expect Gannett Co., the nation's largest newspaper publisher, to submit offers for at least some of the dailies. Gannett would not comment on its plans but its top executives, speaking in New York yesterday, indicated the company was studying the situation.

Gannett's president and chief executive, Craig A. Dubow, said in a presentation to a New York gathering of media analysts that the company had taken a hard look at the possibility of bidding for the entire Knight Ridder chain but decided to step back. "The others coming to market, we're going to take a look at those," he said, referring to the 12 papers for sale.

But because of its large number of holdings, Gannett's purchasing plans are complicated by regulatory issues. The company, which owns 91 daily papers and 21 television stations, could be constrained in eight or nine of the 12 markets where the papers are for sale. "There are lots of regulatory issues and no easy solutions," said Douglas H. McCorkindale, Gannett's chairman.

Lauren Rich Fine, an analyst at Merrill Lynch & Co., said in a recent report that she believed Gannett would not be interested in the larger papers in Philadelphia and San Jose but "would add selectively to its holdings at the right price."

Another potential bidder, MediaNews Group Inc., a private Denver-based newspaper chain, had no comment.

Yucaipa, headed by billionaire Ron Burkle, was founded in 1986 and has been involved in more than $30 billion in mergers and acquisitions. Former president Bill Clinton is a senior adviser to the firm.

The fund, which has been in discussions with the Newspaper Guild-CWA, a union that represents employees at most of the 12 papers, said it would encourage employees to take an investment stake in the company that would own the papers under its plan.

"Yucaipa will be the principal owners, and employee ownership is a key part going forward," Hall said. "Clearly, that's the intent."

Populism And Electric Bills (WP)

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

IT'S HARD TO SAY who has been more reckless in Maryland's current tumult over residential electricity bills -- the lawmakers who froze rates six years ago while blithely believing all would end well in the long term or the utility that thought once the rate freeze expired, it could suddenly hoist prices by $734 a year for an average household without triggering political pandemonium. Add to that a passel of politicians competing with each other to sound more populist than thou, plus state utility regulators who give every appearance of being in cahoots with the utilities themselves, and there you have it: hypocrisy wrapped in wishful thinking inside a scandal.

The original sin was not the idea of deregulating Maryland's electric power industry but how the legislation was crafted in 1999. Eager to escape any responsibility for the consequences of their sensible vote to deregulate, the lawmakers locked in prices at 1993 levels -- minus 6.5 percent. That was unwise; world energy prices subsequently soared. But that was not all: The law allowed for the rates charged by the biggest of Maryland's electric utilities, Baltimore Gas and Electric Co., to be unfrozen this summer, right in the middle of an election year.

Some 1.2 million households -- in Baltimore as well as a surrounding chunk of central Maryland, including some in Montgomery County (read: a large portion of Maryland's electorate) -- would get hit by that $734 annual hike, a 72 percent increase. Having ignored the approaching tidal wave, Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) suddenly took notice and announced, "Seventy-two percent will not stand." Democrats and Republicans in the legislature, including many who helped devise the poorly conceived legislation in the first place, shouted, "Hear, hear!"

The utility is correct, of course, that rates must rise to reflect the world energy market. It is also right that it is legally entitled to raise those rates commensurate with costs. But utilities also understand very well that they operate in a political environment. Faced with the nearly unanimous wrath of the Maryland General Assembly, as well as threats to roll back deregulation or block a planned merger with a Florida utility, BGE and its parent, Constellation Energy Group, are trying to come to terms with lawmakers.

Presumably they will strike a deal that defers the pain of higher prices by phasing in the increases over time and perhaps extending the caps for a year or two. Fortunately for all involved, the utility is fairly awash in extra cash these days, and that may help to seal a deal. But this time around, both the utility and the lawmakers should level with the public by explaining that sharply higher electric bills -- even if they exact their pain gradually rather than all at once -- are a fact of life for the near term. To pretend otherwise is to ignore the market, and reality.

Utah Refinery Charged With Violating Environmental Laws (AP)

By Debbie Hummel

DOJ_NMG_0020719

AP, March 24, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY - A Pennsylvania-based metals refinery and two of its managers have been indicted on federal charges of polluting water and conspiring to violate environmental laws, the U.S. Department of Justice said Thursday.

Johnson Matthey Inc. and John David McKelvie, director of gold and silver operations for North America and Europe and former general manager at the West Valley City plant, and Paul Card Greaves, former plant manager, were indicted by a federal grand jury Wednesday night.

They are accused of violating environmental laws by concealing high levels of the chemical element selenium found in waste water from the metals refinery, according to court documents.

Johnson Matthey, based in Wayne, Pa., has a gold and silver refining plant in West Valley City, a suburb of Salt Lake City.

The company is accused of releasing larger amounts of selenium than it was allowed by permit into sewers. The indictment alleges that the company exceeded its monthly limit on selenium discharges 12 times between January 2000 and May 2002.

The waste water from the refinery is processed by a treatment plant that empties water into the Jordan River and the Great Salt Lake, which are part of a shorebird reserve where millions of migratory birds stop each year.

Selenium separated from gold and silver during the refining process. It is known to accumulate in living organisms and can harm people and cause reproductive problems in waterfowl, according to the indictment.

"The defendants are charged with not only illegally discharging contaminated waste water, but also engaging in a concerted effort to cover it up," Granta Y. Nakayama, an assistant administrator for the Environmental Protection Agency, said in a statement.

The indictment alleges that the company did several things to conceal higher pollutant levels including:

_Stopping the discharge of waste water when inspectors from the water treatment plant came to take water samples; submitting water to laboratories for testing and then only giving those with low selenium levels to the water treatment plant; and diluting waste water with fresh water from a hose to comply with its permit.

Attorneys for Johnson Matthey released a statement saying the company has cooperated fully in the government's investigation.

"Johnson Matthey has taken this matter and now takes these charges very seriously," Robert M. Talley, a company executive, said in a statement. "Johnson Matthey is proud of its standing as a leading global environmentally oriented company. It is important to bear in mind these charges are merely allegations."

The case is being prosecuted in U.S. District Court here by the Justice Department's environmental crime section.

Johnson Matthey and Greaves are charged with 12 counts each and McKelvie with 11 counts of discharging pollutants in excess of permit limits, court papers said.

McKelvie also is charged with seven counts of concealing high selenium levels by performing selective sampling. Johnson Matthey and Greaves are charged with 10 counts each of concealment and three counts each of rendering inaccurate a monitoring method by shutting off the waste water flow and diluting the water, court papers said.

Each of the counts carries a penalty of up to five years in prison and fines of $250,000 for individual defendants and $500,000 for corporate defendants.

Johnson Matthey has operations in 34 countries and employs about 7,400 people.

Nev. Files New Federal Suit In Yucca Fight (AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 24, 2006

(AP) - LAS VEGAS-Nevada sued the federal government Wednesday, accusing it of withholding documents that show the planned Yucca Mountain nuclear dump cannot safely hold the nation's radioactive waste.

The complaint, filed in Reno, is the fourth federal lawsuit the state has pending against the plan to bury 77,000 tons of nuclear waste in the Nevada desert, 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas.

DOJ_NMG_0020720

The case seeks the release of a draft application prepared by contractors seeking a Nuclear Regulatory Commission license to open the dump.

"The federal government is required by law to share its important Yucca information with the host state, and we are entitled to such information under the Freedom of Information Act as well," Nevada Attorney General George Chanos said in a statement.

An Energy Department spokesman in Washington said the agency has made public on the Internet millions of pages about the project, but was under no legal obligation to release the draft application.

Spokesman Craig Stevens said in an e-mail that the application would be made public once it is formally submitted to the NRC.

"This department and this administration remain committed to the licensing, construction, and operation of Yucca Mountain as the nation's permanent geologic repository for spent nuclear fuel," Stevens said. "This lawsuit will not deter us."

Bob Loux, chief of Nevada's Agency for Nuclear Projects, said the state believes the document will show the dump cannot meet radiation safety standards set by the Environmental Protection Agency.

The state's three-page complaint lists steps Nevada has taken to secure the draft application, including requests by Gov. Kenny Guinn to the secretary of energy and President Bush; subpoenas from Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev.; litigation before the NRC licensing hearing board; a Freedom of Information Act request; and Energy Department administrative appeals.

All those requests were rebuffed, Chanos said.

"What are they trying to hide?" he said. "If the repository is safe, you'd think they'd be anxious to prove it."

The Energy Department had planned to open Yucca Mountain by 2010. But it missed a self-imposed deadline to apply for a license by the end of 2004, and licensing hearings are expected to take several years.

The process has been stalled by budget shortages, political opposition, a controversy over whether scientists falsified data and by a court-ordered rewrite of EPA radiation standards.

GAO: Quality Assurance Issues Dog Yucca (AP-Y2)

By Erica Werner

AP2, March 23, 2006

Progress toward opening the Yucca Mountain nuclear waste dump is still hindered by questions about the quality of scientific and engineering work, a year after allegations of fraud emerged, congressional investigators said Thursday.

The Energy Department's reorganization of the project has yet to put the problems to rest and may create new issues, said a report by the Government Accountability Office.

That could delay the Energy Department from applying to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission for a license to open the dump 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas, the report said. It's not likely that the dump, approved by Congress in 2002 to store 77,000 tons of the nation's most radioactive nuclear waste, could open before 2012.

"After more than 20 years of project work, DOE is again faced with substantial quality assurance and other challenges to submit a fully defensible license application to NRC," said the report, requested by Rep. Jon Porter (news, bio, voting record), R-Nev., who was releasing it Thursday at a press conference in Las Vegas.

Among the problems cited by the GAO was high turnover of project managers. Nine of 17 key management positions have turned over since 2001, the GAO said, and the director of quality assurance was among them.

The report also said that despite substantial time and money spent resolving quality assurance issues, the Energy Department has not developed effective management tools to detect and solve problems. The report recommended strengthening quality guidelines and analysis of problems.

Energy Department spokesman Craig Stevens said in a statement that the agency had either fixed these issues already, or was working on them.

"This department remains committed to following our obligation under the law to license, construct and operate Yucca Mountain as the nation's permanent repository for spent nuclear fuel," Stevens said.

Last October, DOE announced a "new path forward" to improve Yucca Mountain by, among other things, redesigning waste storage containers to minimize handling of nuclear waste and designating an outside national lab to oversee scientific work. The report said it is too soon to determine whether this new effort has resolved quality assurance issues enough to move toward submitting a license application.

The Energy Department's inspector general is still conducting a criminal investigation into alleged document falsification by U.S. Geological Survey employees between 1998 and 2000. DOE is also still reviewing 14 million e-mails to see if they raise quality assurance concerns, and redoing the scientific work by the USGS hydrologists involved, who were studying the movement of water through the proposed dump site.

Over 50,000 tons of nuclear waste destined for the dump is now waiting at 72 sites around the country, mostly at commercial power plants.

EPA To Relax Diesel Regulations To Encourage Fuel-Efficiency (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Environmental Protection Agency is relaxing certain emission standards for diesel cars in an effort to get more of these fuel-efficient -- but still relatively dirty -- vehicles on the road.

The EPA said that over time, the new standards will be better for the environment because auto makers that opt for the exemption will be required to engineer their cars to stay clean longer. Diesel manufacturers praised the move, calling it a narrow exception that will give a boost to a promising technology.

"It's another option that allows another design on the market, thus increasing the amount of diesels eligible to be in the United States," said EPA spokesman John Millett.

But environmentalists complain that the change allows diesel cars, which produce more pollution than gasoline-powered cars, to spew more smog-causing nitrogen oxide, at least at the beginning. They also argued that the rule change sets a bad precedent by allowing cars that use one particular technology to meet different standards.

Diesel cars are considered promising by policy makers concerned about U.S. dependence on oil because they get significantly better mileage than their gasoline counterparts.

Manufacturers have struggled to develop the emissions-control technology comparable to that long used for gasoline-powered vehicles, a problem made tougher by the high levels of sulfur in diesel fuel. Beginning with the 2007 model year, the EPA will require auto makers to meet tougher emission standards for all vehicles, including diesel-powered ones.

But yesterday, the EPA said it would make it easier for light-duty diesel vehicles, which include cars as well as sport-utility vehicles, to pass its emissions tests for model years 2007 to 2009.

Meatpacker Sues Feds Over Mad Cow Test (AP-Y2)

By Libby Quaid

AP2, March 23, 2006

A Kansas meatpacker sued the government on Thursday for refusing to let the company test for mad cow disease in every animal it slaughters.

Creekstone Farms Premium Beef says it has Japanese customers who want comprehensive testing. The Agriculture Department threatened criminal prosecution if Creekstone did the tests, according to the company's lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court in Washington.

"We're not in any way saying that U.S. beef isn't safe; we believe it's the safest beef supply in the world, but that's not the issue," chief executive John Stewart said at a news conference.

"We're talking about consumers, and consumers want the product tested," Stewart said.

Testing for mad cow disease in the United States is controlled by the department, which tests about 1 percent of the 35 million cattle, or about 350,000, that are slaughtered each year. The department is planning to reduce that level of testing.

DOJ_NMG_0020722

Stewart said he was surprised at the plan to scale back testing. "Given the concerns internationally, I'm not so sure that's the right thing to do."

Private companies certified by the department make screening tests used to detect mad cow disease. The department says it has sole authority over the sale and use of the tests.

Department officials say they oppose 100 percent testing because it does not ensure food safety. The disease is difficult to detect in younger animals, which are the source of most beef.

Larger meatpackers worry that insistence from Japanese buyers would force them to do testing and that a suspect result might scare consumers away from eating beef.

It would cost about $20 per animal to do the tests, adding about 10 cents per pound to the cost of meat, according to Stewart.

Japan tests nearly all its cattle for mad cow disease. While individual companies there may want more testing in the U.S., Japan's government is not asking the U.S. to do the same.

For now, Japan has halted American beef shipments because inspectors in January found cuts of U.S. veal containing backbone, which is banned in Japan even though it's eaten in the U.S.

Japan had only recently lifted a ban on American beef imposed after the first U.S. case of mad cow disease in 2003. Until then, Japan was the top foreign buyer of American beef, accounting for around $1.4 billion in sales in 2003.

Creekstone cut production and laid off about 150 employees at its Arkansas City, Kan., plant because of the ban.

Stewart said Creekstone's customers understand the limitations of the tests. He added that he expects Japan to reopen its market regardless of whether Creekstone is allowed to test its cattle.

The medical name for mad cow disease, a brain-wasting ailment, is bovine spongiform encephalopathy, or BSE. In Humans, eating meat products contaminated with BSE is linked to more than 150 deaths worldwide, mostly in Britain, from a deadly human nerve disorder, variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease.

There have been three cases of mad cow disease in the U.S. The first, in December 2003 in Washington state, was in a cow that had been imported from Canada. The second, last June, was in a Texas-born cow. The third was confirmed last week in an Alabama cow.

Japan has had two dozen cases of BSE.

D'Amato And Weld Locked In G.O.P. Feud (NYT)

By Sewell Chan And Sam Roberts

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

For the last few months, William F. Weld's bid to become governor of New York has had a sharp thorn in its side: the outspoken opposition of the onetime kingmaker of state Republican politics, former Senator Alfonse M. D'Amato, who has said that Mr. Weld is "without any real experience" in New York.

Yesterday, Mr. Weld struck back in force, telling how their feud dated at least to a 1996 encounter in which Mr. D'Amato gave him $750,000 in donations for his Senate campaign that year against John Kerry of Massachusetts. The donations, according to Mr. Weld, came with an expletive-laced warning: that Mr. Weld distance himself from Robert S. Mueller III, who as a Justice Department official oversaw a federal fraud investigation of Mr. D'Amato's brother, Armand, in the early 1990's.

DOJ_NMG_0020723

"If I ever see that expletive Mueller at an expletive fund-raiser, I'm going to get every expletive dollar of this back out of your hide," Mr. Weld, a former Massachusetts governor, quoted Mr. D'Amato as saying. Mr. Mueller, a friend of Mr. Weld's, has been the director of the F.B.I. since 2001.

Mr. D'Amato yesterday vigorously denied that the encounter had taken place and said he had not even met Mr. Weld until recently, at a Feb. 23 fund-raiser for Representative Vito J. Fossella. But newspaper articles indicate that Mr. D'Amato introduced Mr. Weld at a 1996 Republican fund-raiser in Washington.

The clash exposed in the most bare-knuckled form the searing divisions that have afflicted state Republicans as they seek to find credible candidates to run for governor and to challenge Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton in November.

Mr. D'Amato, who in 1994 helped shepherd a little-known George E. Pataki to the governor's mansion, has been openly praising the presumed Democratic front-runner for governor, Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, and yesterday he attacked Mr. Weld's stewardship of Decker College, a financially troubled Kentucky school that is the subject of a federal investigation.

"If he couldn't run Decker College — they had a multimillion-dollar criminal enterprise of swindling these poor kids trying to get an education — and if he didn't know that was taking place — I'm not suggesting he was part of the cabal — then why didn't he?" Mr. D'Amato said. "Does that recommend him to be governor?"A federal investigation about student loan fraud at Decker College, a bankrupt trade school, is continuing.

Mr. D'Amato added, "I don't intend to endorse Eliot Spitzer, but I will say, if asked, he's done a magnificent job as attorney general, better than any I have ever seen," he said.

The matter brought to the forefront once again an episode that haunted the Senate career of Mr. D'Amato, who served from 1981 to 1999: the investigation that resulted in the May 1993 mail fraud conviction of Armand P. D'Amato, the senator's brother, in connection with $120,500 he received from a military contractor to lobby the senator. The conviction was thrown out by an appellate court the following year.

During a breakfast yesterday organized by Crain's New York Business, Mr. Weld, who from 1986 to 1988 was an assistant attorney general in the Justice Department, said that in Washington in 1996, he visited Mr. D'Amato, who was the chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, which raises money for Republican Senate candidates. "Through clenched teeth, he handed me a check for $750,000," Mr. Weld said of Mr. D'Amato.

Mr. Weld's challenge to Mr. Kerry was one of the most hotly contested Senate races that year. Mr. Weld said yesterday that after Mr. D'Amato handed him the check with the warning about Mr. Mueller (he did not specify which expletives Mr. D'Amato used), he began the following exchange:

"Well, why is that, Senator?"

"He investigated my brother, Armand, and prosecuted him."

"Well, but when was that, Senator? I'm not familiar with that."

"Well, it was whatever year it was — 1990-something."

"Well, actually, I left the Justice Department in March of 1988 and, sir — "

"It doesn't matter. He's your guy."

Denying any impropriety in taking the donation, Mr. Weld said he did not interpret it to mean that he would in any way distance himself from Mr. Mueller, to whom he has been close since at least 1982, when Mr. Weld, then the United States attorney in Boston, recruited Mr. Mueller to work for him. Mr. Weld said he came forward with the account yesterday because he remembered it when he was asked about it by a television reporter.

In response to Mr. Weld's account, Mr. D'Amato yesterday called Mr. Weld "a stranger to the truth" and adamantly denied that such an encounter ever occurred. "The conversation never took place," Mr. D'Amato said in a telephone interview. "This is an entire fictional, preposterous story. Not only did I never give Bill Weld a check in any amount, the N.R.S.C. is prohibited from writing a check for more than $17,500 to any individual candidate."

Mr. D'Amato said he did remember taking a phone call in 1996 from Mr. Weld, seeking the campaign committee's support. Craig Engle, who was the committee's general counsel from 1995 to 2000, said yesterday that he, too, could recall only a phone call and not a meeting. He said that under varying state rules, the committee was permitted to pay a campaign's bills and that over time the amounts in the Massachusetts race might have added up to $750,000.

Mr. D'Amato earlier urged Mr. Mueller to recuse himself from the Decker College investigation because of his ties to Mr. Weld, and Mr. Mueller agreed to do so on Jan. 24, "to avoid even the appearance of a conflict" of interest, according to a spokesman for the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Mr. D'Amato suggested that his dislike for Mr. Weld preceded the investigation of his brother and dated from 1988, when Mr. Weld and five other officials resigned to distance themselves from Attorney General Edwin Meese III, who was under investigation. "Weld is a duplicitous guy who stabbed Ed Meese in the back," Mr. D'Amato said.

Mr. Weld said yesterday that the investigations had been "taking their toll on the department." Mr. Meese did not respond to messages left at his office in Washington and his home in McLean, Va.

The feud is the latest embarrassment for a state party that has already seen the implosion of Jeanine F. Pirro's bid to topple Senator Clinton and open Republican challenges to the leadership of Governor Pataki, who is not running for a fourth term.

The dispute with Mr. D'Amato overshadowed Mr. Weld's speech, in which he unfavorably compared the leading Democratic candidate for governor, Mr. Spitzer, to Michael S. Dukakis, Mr. Weld's predecessor in Massachusetts. "Removing the burdens of taxation and removing the cost of doing business empowers our economy and leads to good-paying jobs," he said, adding that Mr. Spitzer and Mr. Dukakis put their "faith in government."

Mr. Spitzer's campaign spokeswoman, Christine L. Anderson, replied, "When the governor of Massachusetts finally gets around to doing his homework, he'll see that the problems we face require real solutions rather than stale political rhetoric."

D'Amato Threatened Me, Sez Weld (NYDN)

By DAVID SALTONSTALL, DAILY NEWS CITY HALL BUREAU CHIEF

New York Daily News, March 24, 2006

The odd feud between fellow Republicans Alfonse D'Amato and William Weld reignited yesterday, with Weld alleging D'Amato once aimed an expletive-laden threat at him during his 1996 Senate run in Massachusetts.

Weld, who is now running for governor of New York, told a business forum yesterday that D'Amato threatened to take $750,000 "out of [Weld's] hide" in 1996 if Weld took money from Weld pal Robert Mueller, now the head of the FBI.

At the time, D'Amato headed the national Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee, and Mueller was the federal prosecutor who helped convict D'Amato's brother, Armand, on mail fraud charges - a conviction the courts later overturned.

"Let me tell you something," Weld quoted D'Amato as saying. "If I ever see that expletive Mueller at an expletive fund-raiser, I am going to get every expletive dollar of this [$750,000 campaign check] back out of your hide."

The comment drew a blistering response yesterday from D'Amato, who called Weld's version of events a "vicious, preposterous story."

"He must be rather desperate," D'Amato said. "When you make up stories about people, it is not very nice."

D'Amato said he never met face-to-face with Weld in 1996 and that it would have been illegal under campaign finance laws for him to give Weld a single check for $750,000.

Weld's comments came after a speech before the Crain's New York Business Breakfast Forum in which the former Massachusetts governor cast himself as a tax-cutting fiscal conservative.

Weld On D'Amato: There's Bad Blood (NSDY)

By James T. Madore, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 24, 2006

Hopeful for GOP nod for governor divulges a 10-year-old conflict since trial of former senator's brother

William Weld, the leading Republican candidate for governor, acknowledged yesterday that "bad blood" exists between him and former Sen. Alfonse D'Amato, who remains a GOP power broker.

In his most detailed comments on the subject so far, Weld recounted an alleged, expletive-laced conversation 10 years ago in which D'Amato accused Weld of backing the federal prosecutor who investigated D'Amato's brother, Armand.

DOJ_NMG_0020725

Armand D'Amato, a prominent lawyer, was convicted in 1993 of mail fraud in connection with money that he received for lobbying the senator on behalf of a military contractor. An appeals court a year later overturned the conviction. The prosecutor was a Weld protege, Robert Mueller, now director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Weld said yesterday that he left the Justice Department's criminal division in 1988, years before Armand D'Amato's prosecution. But Alfonse D'Amato threatened in 1996 to take back $750,000 from the Senate GOP fund given to Weld's failed bid to replace Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), if Mueller was involved in the campaign, according to Weld.

"There is bad blood there," he said at a business breakfast in Manhattan.

Alfonse D'Amato denied the conversation ever took place. "This entire story is fictitious and preposterous. I never gave Bill Weld a check for that amount," D'Amato said, adding that campaign finance rules at the time barred check sums in excess of $17,500 per candidate.

D'Amato has repeatedly criticized Weld's political aspirations in New York State and praised the Democratic front-runner for governor, state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

Weld, in turn, likened Spitzer to former Massachusetts governor Michael Dukakis, also a Democrat. Both men believe more government and higher taxes will fuel economic growth, Weld said. "New York doesn't need more spending; it needs to control spending," said the man who succeeded Dukakis in 1991 and remained the Bay State's leader until mid-1997.

"Clearly, the[former] governor of Massachusetts has a lot of homework to do on the problems facing our state," Spitzer campaign spokeswoman Christine Anderson responded. "When he finally gets around to it, he'll see that the problems we face require real solutions rather than stale political rhetoric."

Weld ended his speech by borrowing slogans from two Democrats, Nassau County Executive Thomas Suozzi and former New York Gov. Alfred E. Smith.

"To coin a phrase, which I think you heard two weeks ago, I know I can do it because I did it," Weld said, modifying a line from Suozzi's stump speech for governor. Suozzi spoke to the group on March 8.

Weld said, "And I would very much like the opportunity to be the happy warrior" - a stock phrase from Smith's successful campaigns in the early 20th century.

Despite efforts to portray the gubernatorial contest as between himself and Spitzer, Weld faced questions about his lack of money and popularity, even within Republican ranks. He refused to discuss the Conservative Party's embrace of rival John Faso, a lobbyist; no GOP candidate has won statewide office recently without receiving the Conservatives' endorsement.

Weld also revealed he is reluctant to campaign with President George W. Bush. "I think that might cause a distraction between the state and national issues," Weld said.

WELD'S 'D' WORD FOR ELIOT: DUKAKIS (NYPOST)

By Maggie Haberman

The New York Post, March 24, 2006

Republican gubernatorial hopeful William Weld lashed out at front-runner Eliot Spitzer yesterday, tagging him as a modern-day Mike Dukakis who likes big government.

"Like my predecessor in Massachusetts, Gov. Michael Dukakis, [Democrat Spitzer] puts his faith in government," Weld, the former Massachusetts governor who wants to face Spitzer in November, told a Crain's breakfast forum. "Mr. Spitzer continues to propose complex government schemes."

Dukakis lost the 1988 presidential election to George H.W. Bush in a landslide and didn't seek another gubernatorial term in 1990.

Spitzer campaign spokeswoman Christine Anderson said Weld "has a lot of homework to do on the problems facing our state."

Weld also ratcheted up his war of words with former Sen. Al D'Amato, who's had a strained relationship with Weld over his supposed role in a federal probe into D'Amato's brother years ago.

Current FBI Director Robert Mueller, a Weld friend and former colleague, also supposedly was involved in the probe.

DOJ_NMG_0020726

Weld told the crowd that in 1996, when he was in Massachusetts running for U.S. Senate, his campaign was given $750,000 from the National Republican Senatorial Committee that D'Amato headed.

But, he claimed, D'Amato added in expletive-laden terms that if he ever saw Mueller at a Weld fund-raiser, "I am going to get every dollar of this back out of your hide [because] he's your guy."

D'Amato yesterday called Weld a liar. "I never met Bill Weld until Feb. 23" this year, at a fund-raiser at Mayor Bloomberg's house, he said.

Anti-meth Grants Sometimes Miss Mark (AP)

By MARK SHERMAN, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Some states with significant methamphetamine problems have not received their share of federal money because the bulk of a grant program was steered by lawmakers to favored projects in their districts, the Justice Department inspector general said Thursday.

Web Extras Justice Department inspector general

More than $179 million in anti-meth money administered by the department - 84 percent of the grant funds - has been earmarked, as the practice is known, by members of Congress for programs in their states and districts, Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said.

"As a result of the significant use of congressional earmarks in this program, funding is not always directed to the areas of the country with the most significant meth problem," Fine said report examining the grant program from 1998 to 2005.

The Bush administration has proposed ending most meth-related earmarks in the budget for 2007. Lawmakers have indicated they are unlikely to go along.

One example cited by Fine: Missouri ranked second, behind California, in seizing 11,859 meth labs between 1998 and 2004. But it was tenth in grants received with $3.7 million.

Texas and Illinois were 10th and 11th in the number of labs seized, but 23rd and 25th, respectively, in money from the meth initiative.

Meanwhile, the Sioux City, Iowa, police department was given $10 million for a training program that Fine said was not focused on meth or any drug. Instead, "classes focused on enhancing general law enforcement skills, such as interviewing and self-defense," he said.

In Vermont, the State Police used more than half of their $2.4 million grant for a task force to combat heroin. In Hawaii, where police seized 76 meth labs over seven years, a nonprofit group used $8.4 million in money targeted at meth for a variety of anti-drug programs.

Fine also faulted Justice's Office of Community Oriented Policing Services, or COPS, for its oversight of the program. The audit said there was a lack of coordination between officials in the COPS office, weaknesses in the database used to manage and track grants and insufficient and inconsistent monitoring of recipients of the money.

In a response to the audit, COPS director Carl Peed said Fine's staff took an overly rigid view of the grant program's standards for awarding money. But Peed agreed that his office needed to improve its monitoring.

"The COPS office rightfully looks to the individual grantee to identify what its most pressing needs are," Peed said.

US Indicts FARC Over £14bn Cocaine Cartel (SCO)

By JEREMY MCDERMOTT

Scotsman, March 24, 2006

THE United States has declared judicial war on Colombian rebels, issuing indictments for 50 guerrilla leaders, accusing them of running the world's biggest drug cartel and shipping £14 billion worth of cocaine.

In an unprecedented legal action Alberto Gonzales, the US Attorney General, listed 50 members of the Revolutionary Armed forces of Colombia (FARC) that would be requested for extradition to face drugs trafficking charges.

"This is the largest narcotics trafficking indictment ever filed in US history, and fuels our hope to reduce narco-violence in Colombia and stem the tide of illegal drugs entering our country. We believe these men are responsible for not only manufacturing and exporting devastating amounts of cocaine, but enforcing their criminal regime with violence," Mr Gonzales said.

The indictment accuses the FARC of exporting 50 per cent of the world's cocaine trade and 60 percent of the cocaine arriving in the US, so far totalling 2,750 tons, which the Attorney General valued at £14 billion. Only three of those listed by the Attorney General are in custody, the remainder are still directing rebel units in the 40 percent of Colombia where the FARC hold sway. Rewards for the capture of the 47 FARC leaders still at large, totalling more than £42 million, were also offered by US authorities.

The Colombian government was elated at the news, which will not only ensure that US aid, currently running at some £400 million a year continues, but that any FARC commanders captured can be shipped directly northwards, avoiding further strains on the shaky Colombian justice system and trembling prison service.

"We see this as recognition of the clear relationship between terrorism and narcotrafficking," said Camilo Ospina, the Colobian defence minister. "This shows that a big decision has been made to carry out the final battle against narcotrafficking and terrorism."

Whilst the US has been deeply involved in Colombia's four-decade civil conflict for many years, matters became personal in February 2003 when the FARC shot down a US intelligence plane with four Americans and a Colombian on board. The Colombian and a wounded American were shot at the crash site and the three remaining US citizens dragged into guerrilla captivity. The rebels have said they will not be released until hundreds of FARC prisoners held in both Colombian and US jails, are freed.

Whilst nobody doubts that the FARC are deeply involved in drugs trafficking, there has been surprise at the extent of the US indictment, and the fact that right-wing paramilitaries, who are in a peace process with the government but are believed to be far more involved in drugs, do not receive a mention. Many observers see political rather than legal pressures behind the FARC indictment, something US authorities deny.

"Make no mistake; they're not just ordinary drug traffickers," said Karen Tandy, the head of the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA). "To call them that would be something akin to calling Al Capone a tax cheat."

Many believe the US indictment will simply harden guerrilla resolve. "It is a total closing off of the possibility of negotiations with the FARC," said Ricardo Vargas of Andean Action, a Bogota-based think tank. "It will deepen the war."

Indictments Won't Faze FARC (AP)

AP, March 24, 2006

BOGOTA (AP) _ The U.S. government's loudly trumpted drug indictments against 50 top leaders of Colombia's largest rebel group aren't likely to faze the insurgents – and analysts said Thursday they could even make it harder for Colombia to reach peace.

DOJ_NMG_0020729

The head of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, Karen Tandy stood beside U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Wednesday to announce the indictments and a combined USUS$77.5 million in reward money.

"Today is the beginning of the end for the FARC,'' Tandy said.

But the 17,000-strong FARC – the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia _ already has been branded a ``terrorist organization'' by both the U.S. State Department and the European Union.

Its leaders already are wanted at home and abroad on dozens of charges including kidnapping, drug trafficking and homicide. Only three of the 50 newly indicted are in Colombian custody, and they are minor figures

And many analysts think its a blunder to overplay the FARC's involvement in the drug trade, at least if officials hope to lure the group into resuming peace talks.

"It is a mistake to treat the FARC like a drug cartel because it ignores the fact that the principle goal of the FARC is not to make money from drug-trafficking but to take political power through violence,'' said Alfredo Rangel, a respected Colombian military analyst.

The FARC has always denied its involvement in drug-trafficking, saying it merely taxes coca-growers as a means to finance its war on the Colombian state.

Seven From Shelbyville Charged In Drug Bust (STG)

By Brian Mosely

Shelbyville Times-Gazette, March 23, 2006

TULLAHOMA--Federal authorities charged a total of 32 people, including seven from Shelbyville, with drug trafficking offenses in what is described as a major illicit organization with tentacles stretching from Mexico to Memphis to southern Middle Tennessee.

Two 47 count indictments were returned by a federal grand jury in Chattanooga on March 14, according to James R. "Russ" Dedrick, acting United States Attorney of the Eastern District of Tennessee.

Those from Shelbyville facing charges are Joel Fernandez-Vargas, 37; Jose Vargas, 55; Ramiro Onofre, 26; Francisco Javier Fernandez, 29; Timothy Harris, 46; Oscar Alejandro Melgoza, 27; and Shannon Prosser, age 28.

All were charged with conspiring to distribute five kilograms or more of cocaine and 100 kilograms or more of marijuana from June 2005 through March 2006.

If convicted, the defendants face a mandatory minimum of 10 years to life on the conspiracy charge. Those charged with distribution face a sentence up to 20 years.

Fernandez-Vargas is charged with distribution of cocaine on two occasions and distributing methamphetamine once, Jose Vargas and Prosser are each charged with distributing cocaine on one occasion, and all of those charged are accused of using a telephone to facilitate the distribution of controlled substances.

The maximum punishment for the offenses involving the telephone is up to four years in jail on each count.

The other indictment involved 18 people primarily from Tullahoma who were also charged with conspiring to distribute five kilograms or more of cocaine and 100 kilograms or more of marijuana from December 2003 through March 2006.

Those arrested on Tuesday are scheduled to appear in United States District Court in Chattanooga today before Magistrate Judge William B. Carter.

Dedrick said he was proud of the cooperation between local, state and federal law enforcement to bring about the successful operation, including the Bedford County Sheriff's Department and the Shelbyville Police Department, who provided support.

The investigation has been ongoing for three years and picked up steam over the last few months, identifying multiple individuals and organizations involved in trafficking drugs in this area, with additional indictments promised. Over 100 officers were involved in the operation.

Dedrick indicated that there were other law enforcement operations ongoing that were rounding up suspects related to this alleged ring on Wednesday.

Authorities seized about 4 pounds of cocaine and 200 pounds of pot, multiple guns, cash in addition to items seized in other parts of the country.

Primary agencies involved in the ongoing investigation include the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), Appalachian High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area (AHIDTA) Southeast Tennessee Task Force, (comprised of members of the Hamilton County Sheriff's Department, Chattanooga Police Department, Tennessee Bureau of Investigations, Tennessee Alcohol Beverage Commission) Tullahoma Police Department, Moore County Sheriff Department and the 17th Judicial District Task Force.

Also involved were a number of Tennessee sheriff and police departments as well as law enforcement from Dalton, Ga., the Tennessee National Guard, the Federal Bureau of Investigations (FBI), Department of Homeland Security, Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms (ATF) and the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Feds Seize Drug Suspect's Lottery Loot (CAP)

By Lawrence Buser

Commercial Appeal, March 24, 2006

Rayford Andre Pratcher may have waited too long to spend his $66,666 lottery winnings.

Federal authorities who went through a Northeast Memphis apartment last August looking for drugs came up with the check in his name and now argue he must give it up.

Advertisement

"The defendant, One Tennessee Lottery Check #1031779, is traceable to drug proceeds and subject to forfeiture," Asst. U.S. Atty. Christopher Cotten said in papers filed this week in federal court.

Pratcher, 32, has a long history of drug offenses and has pending charges involving possession with intent to sell cocaine, marijuana, methamphetamine and Ecstasy.

On Aug. 28 at a gas station on South Perkins, police arrested a man named Jon Oliver, 26, whose front pockets they said were bulging with marijuana and methamphetamines.

When more drugs were found in his black Ford Explorer, Drug Enforcement Administration agents were brought in and the man agreed to a search of his apartment on Vintage Drive near I-40 and Germantown Parkway.

Agents found 56 grams of marijuana, cocaine and methamphetamine residue and the lottery check -- which was in a safe.

It was made payable to Pratcher, and Oliver told authorities he was storing it for him since Pratcher has no address and "jumps from hotel to hotel," court documents say.

He told agents Pratcher was the guy who had gotten out of the Explorer just before Oliver's arrest earlier that day.

Tennessee Lottery officials said Pratcher was issued the five-figure check Aug. 24 after he won an instant game called Emerald Green.

Pratcher's drug case goes before U.S. Dist. Court Judge Samuel Mays today.

No date has been set for the lottery-loot showdown.

Renewed Bid For Medical Marijuana Back In Court (AP)

By DAVID KRAVETS, Associated Press

AP, March 23, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) - Each time the U.S. Supreme Court has ruled on medical marijuana, the justices have come down against allowing the sick and dying to use the drug to ease their symptoms and possibly prolong life. But the door has never been fully closed.

This week, a federal appeals court in California will hear arguments in the latest round of legal wrangling over the issue.

The case to be argued before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Monday narrows the matter to the so-called right to life theory: that marijuana should be allowed if it is the only viable option to keep a patient alive or free of excruciating pain.

It would apply only to the sickest patients and their suppliers, regardless of whether they live in one of the 11 mostly Western states authorizing medical marijuana.

DOJ_NMG_0020731

"A victory would affect people who are very seriously ill, facing death or great physical suffering," said Randy Barnett, a Boston University law school professor working on the case.

The case was brought by Angel Raich, a 40-year-old mother of two from Oakland who suffers from scoliosis, a brain tumor, chronic nausea and other ailments. She uses marijuana every couple of hours to ease her pain and bolster a nonexistent appetite.

"She'd probably be dead without marijuana," said her doctor, Frank Lucido, who has recommended marijuana for some 3,000 patients. "Nothing else works."

The Bush administration says the lawsuit is without merit.

"There is no fundamental right to distribute, cultivate or possess marijuana," Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark Quinlivan, the government's lead medical marijuana attorney, wrote to the appeals court.

Voters in 1996 made California the first state to authorize patients to use marijuana with a doctor's recommendation. Ten other states have since followed suit, but the federal government says there is no medical value to the drug.

In 2001, the Supreme Court ruled that Raich's supplier, the Oakland Cannabis Buyer's Cooperative, could not lawfully dispense marijuana despite California voters approving its medical use.

Two years later, in a small victory for medical marijuana backers, the high court let stand a 9th Circuit decision saying doctors have a First Amendment right to discuss or recommend the drug to patients without the threat of federal sanctions.

But last June, the Supreme Court ruled the federal government could prosecute medical marijuana users and their suppliers.

In some states, federal agents have been sporadically arresting users and raiding so-called pot clubs that dole out the drug to patients.

Still, a footnote by Justice Clarence Thomas in his 2001 ruling left the legal questions surrounding medical marijuana unsettled and helped open the door to Monday's 9th Circuit hearing.

Thomas wrote that important underlying constitutional questions remain unresolved, such as Congress' ability to interfere with states experimenting with their own laws and whether Americans have a fundamental right to marijuana as a vehicle to stay alive and ease pain.

The justices answered the first part of that footnote in June, ruling in another case brought by Raich that patients living in states with medical marijuana laws could be prosecuted because Congress has classified marijuana as an illegal controlled substance.

That prompted Reps. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., and Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y., to propose legislation that would have blocked the Justice Department from prosecuting medical marijuana users in states where it is legal. The House balked at the measure 264-161. A Hinchey spokesman said the congressman will resurrect the proposal this summer.

Raich is back before the 9th Circuit, one step short of the Supreme Court, in a bid to settle the second part of Thomas' footnote.

Her lawyer, Barnett, is arguing the Constitution guarantees the gravely ill a right to available medication to keep them alive and relieve torturous pain.

Even if it is successful, the case would be unlikely to stop the raids on pot clubs or protect most users and suppliers. Raich herself was arrested last week for disorderly conduct after she demonstrated outside the Oakland federal courthouse over a recent raid on a medical marijuana dispensary.

Regardless of the outcome of her case, she said she will continue using marijuana to treat her symptoms, and will keep fighting to do so without the threat or fear of federal prosecution. She expects her case to go to the Supreme Court no matter the outcome.

"I am going to keep doing this until they stop me because this is not a medical cannabis case but a right to life case," she said. "The federal government can say who can live and who can die if I lose in the Supreme Court."

The case is Raich v. Gonzales, 03-15481.

Medical Pot Rules Get City Approval (SMCT)

By Todd R. Brown

San Mateo County (CA) Times, March 23, 2006

South City will ban clubs but allow collectives to grow plants

SOUTH SAN FRANCISCO — To some, it is a recreational intoxicant with milder health side effects than alcohol. To others, it is a moral scourge that Americans should "just say no" to. To still others, it is medicine, and the City Council on Wednesday night approved the first Peninsula measure on marijuana that regulates where it can be grown and how people can get it for medicinal use.

On a unanimous vote, the council decided to amend the city code on the cultivation of medical marijuana. The new rules outlaw storefront pot clubs but allow patients to collectively grow cannabis at least 500 feet from residential areas. The measure defines a caregiver who can provide marijuana to a patient as someone "who has consistently assumed responsibility for the housing, health or safety of that patient," not necessarily a physician. And it limits the number of patients per caregiver to 10.

"Without this, we have no control," said Councilwoman Karyl Matsumoto. "We're doing preventive (work) versus firefighting."

Police Sgt. Alan Normandy spearheaded the idea for the new rules last year after Tariq Alazraie, who runs the cannabis club Mason Street in San Francisco, proposed opening a club across the street from City Hall. In response, the council imposed a moratorium on cannabis clubs that was to expire in May of this year.

"We're putting the compassion back in the Compassionate Use Act by requiring that the caregiver actually care for the patient rather than just being a distributor of a substance," Normandy said earlier Wednesday, adding that Alazraie was helpful in sharing with him how Mason Street works.

The act, approved by 58 percent of California voters as Proposition 215 in 1996, allows doctors to prescribe marijuana to patients and lets caregivers administer the drug without fear of criminal prosecution. It specifies that patients can possess six mature cannabis plants, 12 immature plants and 8 ounces of dried marijuana, but leaves regulation of how to dispense it up to local governments.

The county works with the state through the Medical Marijuana Program, approved by voters as SB 420 in 2004, to provide patients and caregivers with I.D. cards to avoid arrest for drug possession or trafficking.

Chief Deputy District Attorney Steve Wagstaffe said he initially was wary of South City's plan when he thought it would legalize cannabis clubs that state law does not allow. The District Attorney's Office is set to prosecute Belmont resident Robert Simmons April 24 for allegedly running a pot club out of his home.

But Wagstaffe said because California voters support medical marijuana, his office wholly supports people organizing privately to grow the drug.

"We think it's something that the law does provide for," he said. "If South City's ordinance can fit within the law, we're supportive of it."

Federal law still outlaws any possession or use of marijuana, and the Drug Enforcement Agency maintains that illicit traffickers hide behind the California law. The DEA occasionally raids Bay Area pot clubs.

"We're required to comply with state law, not federal law," Normandy said, adding that South City's law is there to prevent pot clubs from taking advantage of the rules while making sure sick and dying patients get the pain relief they need. "It's certainly not designed to be an onerous thing. It keeps the honest people honest."

The Ongoing Battle to Legalize Medical Marijuana

At first glance, it would appear as if there is nothing that could get in the way of Jesse, an intimidating, 6-foot-plus, longhaired Nassau County man one could easily picture on a Harley or using a jackhammer. But since the 41-year-old salesman was diagnosed with multiple sclerosis (MS) in 1999, he has been injecting himself with some powerful drugs to slow the degeneration the incurable disease causes. The pain and side effects of those drugs can wear him down, so, to ease the discomfort while leading an otherwise normal family life with his wife and two kids, he smokes marijuana.

Jesse, who asked that we not use his real name, knows that he is breaking the law, but his doctors have endorsed the practice, and the results are irrefutable—so he takes the risk.

"For some of us, the answer seems so simple," Jesse says from behind light-blue tinted sunglasses. "Over the years it has cured what ails me."

He's not alone. There are an estimated 2,500 diagnosed AIDS patients in Nassau and Suffolk counties, according to the Long Island Association for AIDS Care. There are about 7,000 MS patients for the region, according to the Long Island chapter of the National Multiple Sclerosis Society. Cancer statistics are difficult to track, but about 1 in 3 women and about 1 in 2 men will be diagnosed with cancer before reaching age 85, according to Hewlett-based 1 in 9: The Long Island Breast Cancer Action Coalition.

Many patients suffering from these diseases, other conditions, or the side effects of their treatments, have touted marijuana's medicinal benefits. Medical marijuana speakeasies have surfaced in cities across the country—although sometimes they clash with authorities.

More than 75 percent of New York voters support legalizing weed to help the seriously ill, provided it's under the supervision of a physician who prescribes it, according to a study conducted last year by the Siena Research Institute at Siena College in Loudonville, N.Y. Statewide organizations, such as the New York State Nurses Association, Hospice and Palliative Care Association of New York State and the New York State Association of County Health Officials, have publicly stated their support for a medical marijuana law. Even local groups like 1 in 9 hope for a day when patients in need can toke up.

"If this is something that will ease their pain, then I'm all for it," says Geri Barish, president of 1 in 9. "We need to come out of the dark ages. If there are things out there that can help, we need to be able to take advantage of them."

Two bills currently before the New York State Legislature address the issue. But the ease of lumping the medical marijuana movement in with those who want Dutch-style legalization—in the Netherlands, adult possession and purchase of small amounts of marijuana is allowed—makes the issue difficult for politicians. The Assembly has been fighting over medical marijuana bills for eight years now, without passing a single one. But stories like Jesse's are hard to ignore, and even prostate cancer survivor and Senate Majority Leader Joseph Bruno (R-Brunswick) said last year he would allow the legislation to come before the Senate. Then again, he hasn't pushed it through. In the Senate, the bill has languished.

A marijuana dispensary for prescription pot users in CaliforniaCurrently 11 states allow marijuana for medical use: Alaska, California, Colorado, Hawaii, Maine, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington. Arizona, which has a similar law, has no set program in place to administer marijuana that is prescribed. But last summer, the Supreme Court ruled that the federal right to prosecute marijuana users—even medicinal users in states that permit such use—trumps the states' right to help terminally ill constituents. The clash between federal and states' rights flared up again March 14, when federal agents raided the home of a 53-year-old California man and seized his small marijuana farm. Reports of excessive force prompted small protests in front of federal buildings in 20 cities in 11 Western states, and in Washington, according to the medical marijuana advocacy group Safe Access Now.

The issue is tough to get a consensus on federally. A proposal in the House of Representatives has failed to pass for five years in row. The Hinchey-Rohrabacher Amendment, named for Congressman Maurice Hinchey (D-Kingston), would prohibit the Department of Justice from prosecuting patients who use medical marijuana.

"The federal government should not intrude upon, let alone prosecute, patients who are using the substance in compliance with state law," Hinchey said in a statement.

Smoking in the Bathroom

In the 1980s, when the government first started taking seriously the idea of using pot to help patients, the National Institute on Drug Abuse provided marijuana to the New York State Department of Health for a study. One of the researchers, Dr. Vincent Vinciguerra, is now chief of medical oncology at North Shore University Hospital. His 1988 pilot study found that 78 percent of 56 patients who smoked the state-sponsored marijuana demonstrated control of chemotherapy-induced nausea and appetite loss.

DOJ_NMG_0020734

"It gave them the munchies, and they were actually eating better," Vinciguerra says. One patient that Vinciguerra has been seeing for about four years recently opted for cannabis, after all the other anti-nausea medications were no longer effective. This is a scenario Vinciguerra witnesses with a small percentage of the 80 to 90 patients he sees weekly.

"Most don't need it," he says, "but when it's helpful, it would be nice to be able to provide it."

Dr. Vincent Vinciguerra found proof that medical marijuana works.The silver-haired physician, who has closely followed the progression of relevant legislation, is confounded by his lack of access to this tool, saying, "we owe it to the patients" to be able to provide medical marijuana. "You would think that since the study had positive results that people would right away pick up on it and try to make it available to their patients," he says. "It was an important finding."

But he also acknowledges the deeply rooted fears about the social implications. Vinciguerra notes with a laugh that during the study, the only place to have the patients smoke their medicine was in a hospital bathroom, where the odors wafting under the door made visitors wonder what the doctors were up to.

Ironically, Jesse, who says that Rebif, his MS medicine, feels like "battery acid" in his veins, worries what would happen if the government did regulate the steady supply of marijuana he's found for himself.

"It's easy enough to get it as it is," Jesse says, adding that politicians would just create more red tape for him than it's worth.

Buzzkill

The issue of whether marijuana should be legalized for medicinal purposes is, according to some groups, being exploited by pro-pot organizations as a means of getting cannabis legalized. "I am not saying 'no' to cannabis medicine," says Steven Steiner, president of Dads and Mad Moms Against Drug Dealers (DAMMADD). "I want to see safe cannabis medicine."

Steiner, who spends his time lobbying for strict drug laws and lecturing young people about the dangers of drugs, is a polarizing personality in the war on drugs. The organization was formed after Steiner's son, Stevie, died from an overdose of OxyContin, a powerful pain medication the 19- year-old had obtained illegally. Steiner subsequently obtained funding for DAMMADD from major pharmaceutical companies, including Purdue Pharma, the makers of OxyContin.

Steiner's biggest problem with the movement to legalize medicinal marijuana is groups such as the Drug Policy Alliance (DPA), which calls itself the leading organization in the United States promoting alternatives to the war on drugs. Steiner says that groups like the DPA unfairly use the possible benefits of medical pot to get the drug legalized.

"These groups just want to make it OK to smoke marijuana, so they use people that are sick and use marijuana to make their case," says Steiner. "But they go dark when other alternatives are proposed."

One of the issues Steiner raises, should marijuana be legalized, is quality control. "Who is going to grow this marijuana? Who is responsible?" says Steiner, pointing to the death of well-known medical marijuana advocate Jane Weirick, who died in 2005, possibly from an allergic reaction to a pesticide she used while growing her pot.

"I smoked pot and drank when I was a teenager. So did my friends and brothers," says Steiner. "I am a hypocrite. But, we all learn as we get older. If my parents were privy to what I am privy to, maybe it would have made a difference."

To Steiner, the fact that the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and other governmental agencies have not given the green light to medical marijuana is a telltale sign that smoking pot if you are ill is just not a good idea. "Put it this way," he says, "if you ould smoke pot and cure cancer, it would have been approved by now."

Rolling Legislation

Finding government-sponsored marijuana isn't impossible, it's just a zigzag road. For Assemb. Richard Gottfried (D-Manhattan), this is one of his main issues. His proposal to legalize marijuana for medical purposes drew assemblymen as sponsors, including Thomas Alfano (R-Franklin Square), Bob Sweeny (D-Lindenhurst) and Harvey Weisenberg (D-Long Beach).

After the Supreme Court ruled last June that the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) was within its rights to seize marijuana plants grown for medical use in California, there was a chilling effect on states dabbling with prescription pot. Gottfried is now redrafting his legislation.

New York State Sen. Vincent Liebell (R-Brewster), who sponsored what he calls a "very, very limited and closely controlled" medical marijuana bill in the Senate last year, is waiting to see how Rhode Island—the first state to pass a medical marijuana law since the Supreme Court ruling in June—handles the issue. Liebell feels it's up to Congress to take the lead now.

"Our amendment helps ensure that the humane approach is taken to help people relieve severe pain," Hinchey says. "Medical marijuana users are not criminals, but rather they are patients who are suffering from chronic pain or nausea and have exhausted all other medicines to treat their condition." There was a small glimmer of hope for Hinchey shortly following the Supreme Court decision last year, even though the bill didn't pass. The final count was 161 for and 264 against, which is so far the closest the proposal has come to passage, but still only 10 votes more than two years ago. "Progress on Capitol Hill is often incremental, and we'll continue to push for this amendment each year until it passes," he says.

Some experts fault political shortsightedness. "People don't want to pass this because they don't want to appear soft on crime," says Ruth Liebesman, legal aid director for the New York State chapter of the National Organization for the Reformation of Marijuana Laws (NORML) and a privately practicing criminal defense attorney. She points out that doctors can prescribe variations of cocaine and heroin, describing the inconsistency as "intellectual dishonesty."

So, until any further action is taken on these proposals, medicinal users are forced to maintain a low profile.

Pot Prohibition

As in the bootlegging days of Al Capone, when alcohol was illegal because of prohibition, clashes between DEA agents and medical marijuana advocates have created a culture of speakeasies. In New York City, there are patients who organize and meet to share their medicine, but finding them isn't easy, unless you're a card-carrying member.

For the past decade, Dana Beal, an advocate with Cures Not Wars, which helps organize the annual Marijuana March early each May, has been providing ID cards to suffering patients who are helped by marijuana. The cards aren't sanctioned by any government agency, but are intended to help prevent patients from staying overnight in jail if they're caught with marijuana. The cards give police an option to issue an appearance ticket rather than make an arrest, Beal says.

He adds that "there are patients and they organize themselves and they meet, but we don't want them to end up like the paraplegic in California," referring to a DEA raid in 2002 on a woman paralyzed from the waist down.

While Beal's organization works on the front lines of the medical marijuana issue, the group's stance that marijuana should be fully decriminalized—for recreational as well as medicinal use—is where the line is drawn between groups like theirs and NORML. For this legislation, the advocates maintain it is purely medical marijuana they seek, with organizers from the Marijuana Policy Project (MPP), who support repealing penalties for marijuana possession, but limit their argument for the survival of the bill.

Local MMP lobbyist Vince Marone described significant political progress last year in New York State. He says that there are discussions to reintroduce the legislation, after the budget is passed on April 1 and policy issues can once again be debated. It is not an impossibility: New Jersey has similar pending legislation and Connecticut has come close to passing a bill. although persistence seems key. As of 2004, 13 states had laws allowing therapeutic research programs with federal cooperation, and 10 states, including New York, have symbolic laws, which would allow patients to possess prescription pot if federal law were ever to be changed, according to MMP.

But despite all of the progress, none of the users will be free of the paranoia that they will be charged as common criminals for simply trying to feel better.

New Program Aims To Reduce Gun Crimes (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein announced yesterday the start of a joint federal-local initiative designed to crack down on gun crimes in Prince George's County, where the vast majority of last year's record number of homicides were committed with firearms.

At a news conference at the U.S. District Courthouse in Greenbelt, Rosenstein said that under the program -- Prince George's EXILE -- federal and Prince George's law enforcement officials will collaborate more closely to identify and investigate violent offenders who use firearms, to crack down on illegal gun traffickers and to use the threat of tough federal sentencing laws to pressure defendants to plead guilty to gun crimes in state court.

DOJ_NMG_0020736

Similar programs are in place or have been used in other cites, including Baltimore and Richmond.

"We have too many criminals walking the streets with guns," said Rosenstein, flanked by more than a dozen local and federal law enforcement officials. "Our goal is not just to prosecute gun crimes. Our goal is to deter violent crime."

To underscore what Rosenstein called an unprecedented level of cooperation in the local initiative between federal and local authorities, the federal prosecutor was joined at the news conference by Prince George's State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey, Police Chief Melvin C. High and representatives from the FBI, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the Drug Enforcement Administration, the office of Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), the state Division of Parole and Probation and other agencies.

Ivey said 85 percent of the 173 homicides committed in Prince George's last year involved firearms. High said county police confiscated 1,427 firearms last year and are on pace to match that this year.

The threat of longer federal prison terms for gun offenses will be a key part of the initiative, Rosenstein said.

Federal prosecutors will provide Prince George's prosecutors with a letter informing defendants in gun crimes that they could face federal prosecution for weapons violations. The goal of such letters is to persuade defendants to plead guilty to firearms offenses in state court, where they could be sentenced to five years in prison.

Penalties for such offenses are stiffer in the federal system. Depending on the number of previous felony convictions, a defendant could be sentenced to life in prison for illegal possession of a firearm, Rosenstein said.

There is no parole in the federal system.

Rosenstein also said Prince George's offenders who are released from state prison after serving their sentences or being paroled will be handed brochures informing them that they face severe consequences if they are caught with an illegal firearm.

The initiative went into effect this month, Rosenstein said. He said it was too early to measure the results.

Officials Puzzled By Increase In Youths With Weapons (LVS)

By David Kihara, Las Vegas Sun

Las Vegas Sun, March 24, 2006

Juvenile justice officials can't seem to explain a recent spike in juveniles arrested on gun-related charges.

In February there were 779 minors charged with gun-related offenses, up from 442 in February 2005, according to the county statistics.

But there's no reason for the 76 percent increase - there hasn't been a corresponding rise in anything that would provide a clear answer.

"There is no set pattern - it's across the board," said District Judge William Voy, who handles juvenile cases. "You get kids in gangs, and then you get kids with no gang affiliations whatsoever. It almost seems to be some fascination with guns."

The numbers have taken juvenile justice officials by surprise. They've seen minors arrested for shooting off guns in the air to impress their friends, carrying guns to school to show off or for protection, stealing guns and using guns in burglaries or robberies.

Darnell Couthen, spokesman for the Clark County School District police, said that the minors who are arrested for a gun-related offense span all socio-economic backgrounds and areas, from Cheyenne to Green Valley High School.

"It's kids being stupid," Couthen said. "They act like they're tough."

The Clark County School District also saw an increase in the number of guns officers confiscated. During the 2003-04 school year, the district confiscated 84 guns, up from 72 the year before.

Metro Police referred calls on juveniles possessing guns to the county's Juvenile Justice Services.

Some communities have created programs to curb juvenile gun offenses with alternative sentencing programs. In Birmingham, Ala., for example, a special "gun court" was created in 1995 that sent kids to a boot camp instead of behind bars and required parents to attend a workshop to educate them on the dangers of guns.

Gun-related juvenile offenses declined 38.7 percent in Birmingham after the program began, according to the Justice Department.

Although Clark County authorities can refer youths inappropriately firing off rifles on, say, BLM land to take classes on gun safety, there are no "gun court" programs for urban youths caught with a pistol in their school locker. They are arrested.

"The kids who have weapons in the community - we want to have an appropriate response," said Fritz Reese, assistant director of the Juvenile Justice Services Department. "We want them to know it's not OK to carry them around in the community." David Kihara can be reached at 259-2330 or at davidk@lasvegassun.com.

Police Arrest Man Sought Since Jan. 19 On Drug And Weapons Charges (LEXHL)

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), March 24, 2006

Authorities arrested this morning a 20-year-old Lexington man who escaped from police in January after they allegedly discovered drugs and weapons in a car he was driving.

Lexington police and U.S. marshals surrounded Tiquan Anderson's home on Radcliffe Road, off Russell Cave Road, in hopes of capturing the alleged drug dealer, a news release from the U.S. Marshals Service said. Authorities said they arrested Anderson without incident as he left his home through a back door.

He is charged with trafficking in a controlled substance, and fleeing and evading police, the release said.

Authorities said they have been searching for Anderson since Jan. 19, when he was stopped by a Kentucky Vehicle Enforcement officer on a ramp connecting Interstate 75 and Winchester Road. After the officer discovered "a large amount" of weapons and drugs -- including a fully loaded AK-47 machine gun, cocaine and marijuana -- Anderson took off running, the release said.

He left behind two of his buddies, who were arrested, the release said. They were not identified.

"We are delighted to have Anderson in custody," said John Schickel, U.S. marshal for the Eastern District of Kentucky. "He has a long criminal history and is a dangerous person. Any time you can get someone like that off the street, we feel good."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Is Facing A Difficult Path On Immigration (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 23 — In the days before the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, immigration policy was going to be President Bush's signature issue. It was central to his thinking as the former governor of a border state, key to his relationship with President Vicente Fox of Mexico and essential in attracting new Hispanic voters to the Republican Party.

Five years later, Mr. Bush has at last realized some momentum on immigration policy, but it is probably not the activity he once anticipated.

He has lost control of his own party on the issue, as many Republicans object to his call for a temporary guest-worker program, insisting instead that the focus be on shutting down the flow of illegal immigrants from Mexico. It is not clear how much help he will get from Democrats in an election year.

The issue will come to the floor of the Senate next week, and the debate is shaping up as a free-for-all that will touch on economics, race and national identity.

At the end of next week, Mr. Bush is scheduled to meet with Mr. Fox in Cancún, Mexico. Immigration is likely to be a source of tension in their talks.

In short, Mr. Bush is facing another test of his remaining powers as president.

On Thursday, he called for calm in a White House meeting with groups pressing for changes in American immigration laws.

"I urge members of Congress and I urge people who like to comment on this issue to make sure the rhetoric is in accord with our traditions," the president said.

He added, in a warning to members of Congress, that "the debate must be done in a way that doesn't pit one group of people against another."

DOJ_NMG_0020738

The discussion has intensified as Mr. Bush finds himself caught between two of his most important constituencies: business owners and managers on the one hand, conservatives on the other.

Philosophically, the president, whose own sensibility on the issue was shaped by his experience as governor of Texas, says he is committed to a program that meets the needs of business: the creation of a pool of legal foreign workers for industries that have come to rely on low-wage labor.

Mr. Bush also brings to the debate a stated belief that the country benefits from the immigration of hardworking people and their dreams of becoming Americans. He often talks about the United States as a land of immigrants, and on Monday in Cleveland he said that "my only advice for the Congress and for people in the debate is, understand what made America."

But politically, Mr. Bush must satisfy his most conservative supporters. Many of them view illegal immigration as a strain on schools, the health care system and the economy, and some have warned that in their opinion the nation's cultural identity could be washed away by a flood of low-income Spanish-speaking workers.

For now, Mr. Bush is trying to navigate the storm with a proposal that tries to satisfy both groups: a toughened border enforcement plan coupled with a temporary guest-worker program that would allow some of the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants in the United States to register for legal status and remain here for as long as six years.

"Our government must enforce our borders; we've got plans in place to do so," Mr. Bush said on Thursday. "But part of enforcing our borders is to have a guest-worker program that encourages people to register their presence so that we know who they are, and says to them, if you're doing a job an American won't do, you're welcome here for a period of time to do that job."

Pollsters say the issue is still fluid among voters, although they expect public opinion to solidify during the coming debate in Congress and as Mr. Bush promotes his plan.

"He's got a very strong position with the bully pulpit," said David Winston, a Republican pollster, "but the dynamic of the issue at this point is that there is consensus around border security, but people have not come to a similar consensus about what to do with the 11 million in the country."

Two years ago, a New York Times/CBS News poll found that two-thirds of those surveyed said immigrants who had entered the country illegally should not be allowed to stay and work in the United States for three years, the initial period of stay in Mr. Bush's proposed guest-worker program. There was also little enthusiasm for any increase in immigration, with a plurality saying immigration should be decreased.

The poll was conducted shortly after Mr. Bush made his first major speech on his immigration plan.

"Many of you here today are Americans by choice, and you have followed in the paths of millions," Mr. Bush told a cheering, chanting crowd packed with Hispanic leaders in the East Room of the White House in January 2004. Every generation of immigrants, he added, "has reaffirmed the wisdom of remaining open to the talents and dreams of the world."

But critics said that Mr. Bush's guest-worker program did not go far enough, and that there was deportation, not a green card, at the end of the process. At the same time, his words angered many conservative Republicans, who said the plan amounted to amnesty.

Mr. Bush dropped his immigration proposals as too risky for his 2004 re-election campaign, but took them up again in 2005. By then, in an effort to calm conservatives, he had switched his tactics, emphasizing the national-security part of the plan.

"We're going to get control of our borders," he vowed in the East Room of the White House in October 2005 as he signed a $32 billion domestic security bill that had big increases for the Border Patrol.

This year, Mr. Bush has continued to push the issue and is closely watching what happens on Capitol Hill.

The House has passed an immigration bill that includes border security, not a guest-worker program. The action is now in the Senate, where it will resume next week.

There are a rash of competing immigration proposals on both sides, including one from Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, and another from Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts. The majority leader, Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, has threatened to offer his own border-security-only bill if the Senate cannot come up with legislation on its own.

Immigration Debate Is Shaped By '08 Election (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

President Bush's effort to secure lawful employment opportunities for illegal immigrants is evolving into an early battle of the 2008 presidential campaign, as his would-be White House successors jockey for position ahead of next week's immigration showdown in the Senate.

Bush called on Congress yesterday to tone down the increasingly sharp and divisive rhetoric over immigration, as he renewed his push for a guest-worker plan that would allow millions of illegal immigrants to continue working in the United States. But Bush's political sway is already weakened by public unease about the war in Iraq and by Republican divisions.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), whom Bush helped elect as party leader, is threatening to bring a new immigration bill to the Senate floor early next week. It would tighten control of the nation's borders without creating the guest-worker program the president wants.

Meanwhile, Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), a rival of Frist's for the Republican nomination, is promoting Bush's call for tougher border security and the guest-worker program as he embraces the president to shore up his standing with Republican leaders. In the House, Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.) is garnering support for a long-shot presidential bid with his fierce anti-immigration rhetoric.

And after weeks of sitting on the sidelines, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) jumped into the immigration debate Wednesday. She declared that Republican efforts to criminalize undocumented workers and their support networks "would literally criminalize the good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself."

Presidential politics "makes it that much more difficult, of course," said Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), a strong Bush ally on the issue. "You would hope three years out that we could tamp that out and focus on the policy questions at stake, but maybe that's not possible."

For Republican presidential candidates, immigration offers up a difficult choice: Appeal to conservatives eager to clamp down on illegal immigration who could buoy your position in the primaries, or take a moderate stand to win independents and the growing Latino vote, which could be vital to winning the general election.

"The short-term politics of this are pretty clear. The long-term politics are pretty clear. And they're both at odds," said Mike Buttry, a spokesman for Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.), another potential GOP presidential candidate.

Senators had hoped to avoid such acrimony when the Judiciary Committee began drafting its immigration bill early this month. Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) had vowed to write a bipartisan proposal that would bridge conservative demands for much tougher border enforcement with calls from both parties for a guest-worker program to meet the demand for unskilled labor and to address the 12 million illegal immigrants living in the United States.

But after progress slowed, Frist short-circuited the process. He announced that the Senate will take up border security and immigration enforcement measures on Tuesday -- without a guest-worker component -- if Specter cannot produce a bill by Monday.

Frist has not ruled out a guest-worker program. But conservatives' grumbling about the president's program found a Senate voice yesterday when Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.) announced that he will not accept such a program until "we have proven without a doubt that our borders are sealed and secure."

At the same time, Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) promised this week to filibuster Frist's enforcement-only bill.

"If the majority leader is . . . going to bring his own bill to the floor, dealing with only one of the problems we have with immigration, then I will use every procedural means at my disposal to stop that," Reid said on CNN.

The fight next week will test Republican unity on an issue with social, political and national security implications. Adding to the tumult will be House Republican leaders, who muscled through an immigration enforcement bill in December and plan a series of events in the coming days to trumpet border security.

The debate will also serve as a test of Bush's ability to sway an increasingly restive Republican Congress on an issue he has championed since his first term. In recent months, under pressure from GOP lawmakers, Bush has retreated from focusing mostly on the guest-worker program to giving equal billing to border security.

"But part of enforcing our borders is to have a guest-worker program that encourages people to register their presence so that we know who they are, and says to them, 'If you're doing a job an American won't do, you're welcome here for a period of time to do that job,' " Bush said after meeting with groups involved in the immigration fight.

The leading bills all seek to bolster border enforcement with more police on the frontier and more technology tracking illegal crossings. But a bill co-sponsored by McCain and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) breaks with Specter's proposal by offering an easier road to citizenship for illegal immigrants already in the country.

Specter also goes further to exact punishment on illegal immigrants who seek to obtain a guest-worker permit, and his measure could punish those who help illegal immigrants, even church groups that offer shelter. Frist has taken the border security and immigration enforcement provisions from Specter's bill, while leaving behind his guest-worker program.

Guest-worker proposals would allow businesses to offer special work visas to illegal immigrants already in the country if they can show that U.S. workers will not take the positions. The visas would last for up to six years under the leading Senate proposals, but senators are divided over whether workers would have to return to their home countries for a year before qualifying for a renewal.

White House aides said Bush remains deeply committed to the guest-worker program, despite resistance from conservatives, and is certain it will help expand the party's support in Florida and in the Southwest, which is emerging as a key battleground in national elections.

Former congressman Timothy J. Roemer (D-Ind.) said the debate over welfare reform in the 1990s should serve as the model for compromise on immigration today.

"The middle of the Republican Party and the Democratic Party have a responsibility to tackle and solve this issue," he said.

Kolbe said it is increasingly unlikely Congress will reach an agreement that could make it to the president's desk.

"I don't think this fire is easily extinguished," he said. "Rarely have I seen an issue that divides people so clearly, with so little possibility of seeking a middle ground."

W Chides Hil, Saying Be Nice On Immig Bill (NYDN)

By Kenneth R. Bazinet And Michael McAuliff

New York Daily News, March 24, 2006

President Bush took an apparent swipe at Sen. Hillary Clinton yesterday as he called for a civil debate over a controversial immigration reform bill.

The President's comments came a day after Clinton (D-N.Y.) said GOP immigration reform would make a criminal out of "Jesus himself."

"When we conduct this debate, it must be done in a civil way," Bush said after meeting with business and religious advocates on the issue yesterday.

"It must be done in a way that brings dignity to the process. It must be done in a way that doesn't pit one group of people against another," he said.

A White House official said the President was well aware of Clinton's biblical broadside when he spoke, but Team Bush didn't want to single her out and give her the spotlight.

Later in the day, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said: "I don't think he was trying to single anybody out. I think what he was trying to say is that he recognizes there are a lot of strong feelings on this issue, but that we need to find a way to move forward by working together."

Clinton's spokesman said her remarks have been civil.

A number of competing bills are floating around on Capitol Hill, and the Senate is set to begin the bruising political debate next week over the biggest proposed overhaul of immigration laws in two decades.

Clinton took particular aim at a measure sponsored by Reps. Pete King (R-L.I.) and James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) that currently would brand undocumented immigrants as felons, although the lawmakers insist that charge will only be a misdemeanor in the final law.

DOJ_NMG_0020741

Among the louder critics of the GOP proposals has been the Catholic Church, with Roger Cardinal Mahony of Los Angeles vowing his diocese wouldn't obey any laws that criminalize illegal aliens or the social service providers who help them. Brooklyn Bishop Nicholas DiMarzio has made similar comments.

King, a Catholic, slammed his own church yesterday as "un-Christian" for baselessly scaring the clergy and immigrants with doomsday scenarios.

"The Catholic Church is being totally fraudulent on this. If Cardinal Mahony spent as much time turning over information on pedophile priests as telling priests to violate the law on this, California would be a lot better than it is today," he told the Daily News Editorial Board.

"They're being totally un-Christian because they're talking about this being an evil bill, a meanspirited bill, that we're doing all this as subterfuge to lock them up," he said. "Now, we could lock them up for other reasons - with what they did with pedophilia and what they did to abuse kids in Catholic schools, we could have locked them up years ago."

Bush Seeks 'Civil' Immigration Debate (WT)

By Charles Hurt And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

Even as President Bush called for a "civil" debate on immigration yesterday, a confrontation was brewing on Capitol Hill with some Republicans saying Mr. Bush must stop demonizing them and Democrats vowing to fight the Senate majority leader's bill.

"When we conduct this debate it must be done in a civil way," Mr. Bush said after meeting with groups that support legalizing illegal aliens. "It must be done in a way that doesn't pit one group of people against another."

The president's spokesman said Mr. Bush wasn't singling out any group or person. But Rep. J.D. Hayworth, a top voice calling for better enforcement, said while he took Mr. Bush at his word, civility is a "two-way street" and the White House must stop attacking Republicans who disagree with it.

"If I had any advice for my friends at the White House, I think it would be to really reconsider posturing every disagreement as some sort of new political [or] psychological malady," Mr. Hayworth said.

He pointed to when Republican leaders said conservative opponents to Supreme Court nominee Harriet Miers were sexist, labeled opponents of the Dubai ports deal as Islamophobes and called members of the Minuteman Project that guarded the southern border "vigilantes."

Meanwhile, the Senate debate is turning pointed, with Republicans warning Senate Democrats that they will pay a political price if they block efforts to pass immigration legislation this year.

"It's discouraging that before the debate has even begun in the full Senate, the Democrat leadership is threatening to filibuster any legislation that doesn't include amnesty," said Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican who has offered immigration legislation. "This is not the way to improve our national security and keep Americans safe."

Earlier this week, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid stood near the U.S.-Mexico border and threatened to "use every procedural means at my disposal" -- including a filibuster -- to thwart the border security legislation Majority Leader Bill Frist plans to begin debating Monday.

Mr. Reid said he's opposed to the bill because Mr. Frist is introducing it directly to the full Senate, bypassing the Senate Judiciary Committee.

"What we're bringing to the floor is a border security bill to secure the borders and protect people," Frist spokesman Bob Stevenson said. "To suggest that he would filibuster such a measure only weakens our position at a time when we're fighting a war on terror. It just fits into the Democrat strategy of delay and obstruct."

Also this week, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton promised to block any legislation that would make being in the U.S. illegally a felony, rather than the current civil offense. Such a move would be "mean-spirited," she said, and not in keeping with Republicans' professed belief in religious values.

"It is certainly not in keeping with my understanding of the Scriptures, because this bill would literally criminalize the Good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself," she told a crowd in New York on Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0020742

Mr. Frist's Securing America's Borders Act, which he introduced late last week, would criminalize illegals, fund hundreds more border agents and build limited fencing. Though the bill does not include a guest-worker program, Mr. Frist has said he expects one to eventually be included through amendments on the floor.

Meanwhile, the Senate Judiciary Committee will continue wrangling over guest-worker proposals but few Senate observers are optimistic that they will agree on one.

Mr. Bush has called for a bill that includes both enforcement and a guest-worker program, though he has said new workers would be temporary and current illegal aliens would not get "automatic citizenship."

In his meeting with the lobby groups yesterday, Mr. Bush did not stake out a new position or clarify what "automatic citizenship" means, according to participants. But they said the president made it clear he will continue to highlight the issue and expects to play a major role when the House and Senate go to conference on immigration legislation.

After the meeting he made his plea for a measured debate.

"I urge members of Congress and I urge people who like to comment on this issue to make sure the rhetoric is in accord with our traditions," he said.

Groups on both sides of the debate said they interpreted the remarks as aimed at those who want better enforcement and oppose a guest-worker plan.

"Sadly, if he's talking to people who want to enforce immigration laws he's talking to the majority of Americans," said Rikki Horton, government relations associate at the Federation for American Immigration Reform.

Mr. Hayworth, at home while Congress is on recess, said what he sees at town-hall meetings in his Arizona district isn't "anger directed at a person or an ethnic group," but rather frustration at the federal government's failure to control the border and enforce the law.

Bush Calls For Civil Debate On Immigration Proposals (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang And Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush on Thursday urged all sides in the immigration debate to tone down their rhetoric and engage in civil, respectful discussion as Congress nears action on an issue that has sharply divided the nation and the Republican Party.

The Senate is expected next week to consider legislative proposals to overhaul the nation's immigration laws, and key provisions — particularly those that would permit foreigners to work temporarily in the United States — have become the focus of disagreement on Capitol Hill, on conservative talk shows and at political meetings.

The vitriol on immigration far exceeds the language surrounding other significant but less emotional policy controversies, including changes in tax laws and the prescription drug benefit that has been added to Medicare.

"It's important that we have a serious debate, one that discusses the issues. But I urge members of Congress and I urge people who like to comment on this issue to make sure the rhetoric is in accord with our traditions," Bush said after meeting with supporters of his immigration proposal.

"When we conduct this debate, it must be done in a civil way. It must be done in a way that brings dignity to the process. It must be done in a way that doesn't pit one group of people against another."

The issue is politically sensitive for Bush and his fellow Republicans.

Increasing the Republican share of the Latino vote has been a key objective for Bush's chief political advisor, Karl Rove, as part of his strategy to solidify GOP control of the presidency and Congress.

Through the 2004 election, it appeared that Bush and Rove were succeeding.

In that contest, Bush picked up 45% of the Latino vote, according to Los Angeles Times exit polls, a gain of 7 percentage points from 2000. But a harsh debate over immigration could erase GOP gains among Latinos, give the party an anti-immigrant cast and prompt a backlash.

Perhaps the loudest congressional voice in the campaign to restrict immigration has been that of Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.).

DOJ_NMG_0020743

Reflecting the divisions within their party over immigration, Tancredo and Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas — who on nearly all other issues wins strong support from conservatives — have taken opposite positions on allowing undocumented workers to remain in the United States while pursuing legalization of their status. Tancredo opposes it; Brownback favors it.

Asked about the president's request for civility, Tancredo's spokesman, Will Adams, offered no apology for his boss' views.

The congressman, Adams said, has "devoted his political career to immigration because he thinks it's essential to our national security and our economic security, and to who we are as Americans. Occasionally, the debate does get uncivil, but this is a product of it being so important."

But even the president's request that participants in the debate control their language drew finger-pointing.

Adams quoted his boss as saying: "With respect to the call to cool it down, Hillary Clinton said yesterday that the House bill would criminalize Jesus, so I assume the president is referring to her."

In a brief news conference Wednesday, Clinton (D-N.Y.) said that a bill the House approved in December "would literally criminalize not only every nondocumented immigrant in our country but every person who helped, assisted, reached out [or] otherwise responded in a humanitarian way to the needs of immigrants.

"It is certainly not in keeping with my understanding of the Scripture, because this bill would literally criminalize the good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself," she said.

Her spokesman, Philippe Reines, said of the president's request Thursday: "Since Sen. Clinton has always discussed this important issue in a serious, civil and dignified manner, we assume that his admonition was directed elsewhere."

White House spokesman Scott McClellan offered no hints to suggest at whom the president was pointing — but there is no shortage of potential targets.

Anti-immigration activist Juan Mann, whose calls for stronger law enforcement appear on The Immigration Blog website, has written that Michael Chertoff, the secretary of Homeland Security, "has been dutifully peddling the Bush administration's ongoing promotion of the Big Lie that a 'guest worker program' is not an illegal-alien amnesty."

Chris Simcox, president of the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps, said Thursday in a news release that "America's national security is being held hostage by Democrat Party leaders who have placed the interests of millions of lawbreakers before secure borders and the expressed will of the American people. Our southern border is a virtual war zone."

The House version of immigration legislation focuses solely on border security and enforcement and does not address the guest worker program Bush favors.

It includes a provision that would bar health-care workers, educators and others to provide assistance to undocumented workers.

At a conference at the Capitol on Thursday, Anna Burger, chairwoman of Change to Win, a coalition that favors increased rights for immigrant workers, described the House measure as "an evil bill. It criminalizes children, all of us, those who are immigrants and those who help immigrants."

The Senate is scheduled to begin debating broader immigration legislation Monday. Republicans are deeply divided over whether the overhaul should address enforcement issues first, or whether to take a comprehensive approach and include a guest worker program and a way to deal with the estimated 12 million undocumented immigrants living and working in the United States.

One Step Forward (WP)

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

"BREAKTHROUGH" is a word that should always be used with extreme care, at least when discussing immigration reform. Nevertheless, it may be warranted: The Senate Judiciary Committee, which had been bogged down for several weeks trying to produce an immigration bill, appears to have reached a consensus. The deal doesn't solve all of the problems, but it does at least try to solve the most difficult: the fate of the estimated 12 million people who live in this country illegally.

In its essence, the compromise -- patterned on a proposal by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) -- allows undocumented workers living here to apply for residency permits, on the condition that they prove they are employed and pay a hefty fine for breaking the law. They would then go to the back of the green card line -- behind those applying legally -- and wait for citizenship. President Bush has always said he would endorse such a solution as long as it doesn't look like an "amnesty" that rewards lawbreakers. During a news conference this week, he seemed to say that the Senate solution might be precisely that: "People who have been here need to get in line, like everybody else," he confirmed.

This is, of course, a very fragile sort of agreement. It hasn't been voted on, or even properly written down. It doesn't get to the issue of what to do about temporary workers who want to come here in the future, and it doesn't solve the border control issues either. Amazingly, some in the Senate and the House are still pushing to build a wall along the 2,000-mile U.S.-Mexico border, a project that -- aside from its unpleasant symbolism -- would cost billions of dollars (a 14-mile wall near San Diego cost $70 million alone), would deal with only part of the problem (40 percent of the undocumented are thought to have arrived in other ways), and would not prevent people from using tunnels and ladders to get across, as they do now.

Even more worrying are the complicated politics of making any immigration deal stick. Already, the immigration debate has become a forum for 2008 campaign jockeying, as possible presidential contender Sen. Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) tries to distance himself from possible presidential contender Mr. McCain, largely by sounding a much harder line on enforcement. Since the House doesn't seem to be in a mood to talk about anything but enforcement either, that bodes ill for anyone who wants a realistic solution to the problem of the undocumented. Still, a breakthrough is a breakthrough, however fragile, and the senators on the Judiciary Committee, led by Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), are to be commended for reaching it.

Thousands March For Immigrants (MJS)

By Mark Johnson And Linda Spice

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, March 24, 2006

In one of Milwaukee's largest demonstrations in recent years, a mile-long swath of peaceful protesters marched into the city's downtown Thursday chanting, "¡Sí, se puede!" ("Yes, we can!"), carrying Mexican and American flags and signs condemning what they called "anti-immigrant" legislation.

Hundreds of students took the day off school; businesses around southeastern Wisconsin closed; and thousands of workers left their jobs in support of the event billed as "A Day Without Latinos."

Although march organizers put the crowd at 30,000, Milwaukee police estimated that there were between 10,000 and 15,000 marchers, said spokeswoman Anne E. Schwartz. She said there were no arrests.

The march, which culminated in a 90-minute rally in Zeidler Park, followed a similar event two weeks ago in Chicago that drew a crowd of up to 100,000 people.

"This is a historic day," declared Christine Neumann-Ortiz, executive director of Voces de la Frontera, an organization devoted to immigrant and worker rights issues.

"We have people from all walks of life. We have teachers. We have doctors. We have professionals. And, best of all, children. We wanted to recognize the workers who left their jobs today. There has been a strong show of solidarity," she said.

The event underscored both the growing political muscle of Latinos, America's fastest-growing minority, and the divisiveness of immigration issues in the post-9-11era.

One of the targets of Thursday's protest was a sweeping federal bill sponsored by U.S. Rep. Jim Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) that would keep illegal immigrants in jail until they are processed for deportation, increase penalties for improper entry into the United States, and provide mandatory minimum sentences for illegal immigrants convicted of re-entering the U.S.

Several of the speakers Thursday singled out Sensenbrenner for criticism, including Sheila Cochran of the Milwaukee County Labor Council, who called the bill "wrong-spirited, wrongheaded and just plain wrong."

Xavier Marquez, president of the Racine group Students United for Immigrant Rights, called Sensenbrenner's bill "racist and divisive."

In a statement released later in the day, Sensenbrenner said, "The illegal alien rally held in Milwaukee today was an impressive show of force. But I do not believe that illegal aliens should receive legal government documents such as driver's licenses."

DOJ_NMG_0020745

He said many people "have tried to confuse the difference between legal and illegal immigration," and added that putting illegal immigrants on a path toward citizenship "would be a slap in the face to all those who have followed the law and have come to America legally."

As the marchers were gathering, the Milwaukee Common Council voted 11-1 to oppose Sensenbrenner's bill. Instead, they called on Congress to approve an immigration reform bill that would help illegal immigrants attain legal status, expand temporary work visas and tighten border security.

The House passed Sensenbrenner's bill. Both that measure and competing legislation sponsored by U.S. Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.) are awaiting Senate action.

Two Wisconsin measures also drew the ire of speakers at the rally, including a law signed two weeks ago by Gov. Jim Doyle that forces applicants for state driver's licenses to present proof of legal residency. The second measure, if approved and signed by the governor, would deny undocumented immigrants access to school lunches for their children, public medical services and public defenders in court.

A community coalition

The march and rally stitched together a coalition of political leaders, including Mayor Tom Barrett, U.S. Rep. Gwen Moore (D-Wis.) and state Rep. Pedro Colón (D-Milwaukee), as well as labor unions, business groups and religious leaders.

"I am a third-generation Mexican-American. I am not an undocumented immigrant, but I strongly support my undocumented immigrant brothers and sisters in their struggle for justice and their equal rights," said Marquez, the leader of Students United for Immigrant Rights.

"On the Statue of Liberty it says, 'Give me your tired, your hungry, your poor yearning for liberty,' and that's why we're here," said Michael Rosen, president of the local union representing teachers at Milwaukee Area Technical College.

He vowed, "We will not allow George Bush, we will not allow Congressman Sensenbrenner to pit one part of the working class against another part of the working class."

Milwaukee School Board member Jennifer Morales called on all members of the school community "to oppose any law that makes criminals of children." She encouraged school employees to continue to provide services children need, such as food, health care and education.

The march and rally drew many families.

Angel Silva, 13, missed classes at Bruce Guadalupe Middle School to attend the rally with his family, saying, "We're only students. We're not terrorists. We want to get our education and go on to be a good person and live our life well."

His younger brother, Marc Anthony DeLeon, 9, said he opposes the bill "that any immigrant children they can't have lunch at the schools. And we don't think that's right."

The boys' mother, Magdalena DeLeon, 33, of Milwaukee, is a fifth-generation Mexican-American whose family originally immigrated from Jalisco, Mexico. She said she discussed with her children the U.S. Constitution and Declaration of Independence.

"The United States of America was built and established for the freedom of people," she said. "We have to be united as one, liberty and justice for all mankind."

The signs the marchers carried drew heavily on emotion and appealed to values enshrined in the Declaration of Independence and the inscription on the Statue of Liberty.

A large cloth banner said, "Open the doors to citizenship. Immigration is an American experience." A sign showed a photograph of a child wearing a red graduation cap and gown, with the caption, "I'm not a criminal." Another sign said, "You let us fight and die for the country, but we're still not called American."

Several of the speakers were children, including Samantha Pastrana, who led the crowd in the Pledge of Allegiance.

TAX:

Oregon's Coffers Bulge But Services Suffer (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

DOJ_NMG_0020746

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

Earlier this month, Oregon Gov. Ted Kulongoski got some good news: The state's coffers were bulging with almost $700 million in unanticipated tax revenue.

But like a dieter in a pastry shop, Mr. Kulongoski can only dream about what he'd do with the extra cash. Under a one-of-a-kind Oregon law, the money must be refunded to individual taxpayers and corporations instead of going to the state.

As a result, residents and companies that do business in Oregon will receive refunds or credits, even as the state struggles to fill a $172 million funding gap for its human-services division and a $57 million shortfall for public schools in Portland, where as many as 14 schools might be shuttered.

The situation is roiling Oregon, prompting cries from labor unions, school officials and many residents to end the tax "kicker" for corporations -- and posing a challenge for Mr. Kulongoski, a Democrat up for re-election in November. Mr. Kulongoski, whose approval rating hovers at around 38%, faces a primary challenge from two Democrats, both of whom have called for an end to the corporate kicker. In a pair of setbacks, a large labor union endorsed one of his opponents, and the Oregon Education Association declined to back a candidate in the May primary.

The governor also says that the corporate kicker no longer makes sense for Oregon, and that the money should be redirected to the state to help pay for things like education and health care. He has been lobbying business to go along with the move, but faces opposition from state legislators, particularly Republicans who control the House, as well as from some business interests opposed to the idea.

"The dilemma for us is that we should be using those resources to rebuild what we lost in 2001-2003," when the state's revenue fell 20% below projections, Mr. Kulongoski said in an interview. "I wish we could call a timeout on both the corporate and individual kicker ... and give us the chance to rebuild what we've lost."

Like many states, Oregon is dealing with economic extremes, veering between a comfortable surplus and a dearth of cash while being required to balance its budget. States are coming off their worst fiscal crisis in decades, in which they slashed spending and borrowed money, and are seeing surpluses aided by the stronger economy.

Oregon is not the only state wrestling with a spending limit. Last year, Colorado voters agreed to temporarily suspend the state's spending cap after they were persuaded it was artificially depressing the state's economy. The Colorado Taxpayer Bill of Rights was more severe than Oregon's, because its cap on state spending allows for only inflation and population growth.

Oregon's situation has arisen from a spurt in corporate profits and an influx of jobs. The state, which has no sales tax, gets more than 90% of its general fund revenue from individual and corporate income taxes.

But the state's fiscal situation is complicated by the fact that voters have sought to limit spending. In 1979, Oregon voters approved a law stipulating that if the state's general-fund revenue exceeded budget estimates by 2% or more, the excess had to go back to taxpayers. The idea was to curb state spending by keeping excess money from falling into the hands of politicians. In 2000, the state's constitution was amended to include the kicker. Overall spending in the state has increased about 17% in the past five years, including more money for education and human services.

Because Oregon operates on a two-year budget, tax-revenue estimates can vary widely from the amount ultimately collected. When the current 2005-2007 budget was being prepared, Oregon -- like most states -- was coming off a severe economic downturn, leading to overly conservative revenue estimates. As a result, 2005-2007 revenues appear to be well ahead of estimates, fueled by higher corporate profits and more jobs in the state. The state estimates that $205 million in tax credits will go to corporations, while $450 million in refunds will go to individuals, and the amounts could grow before the end of fiscal 2007.

The situation was reversed in the 2001-2003 budget period, when collections fell below estimates, forcing the state to cut programs, including education. To help cover the shortfall, the state imposed a cigarette tax, tapped an education stability fund and borrowed money to help balance the budget.

"The kicker is just insane tax policy," says state Senate Majority Leader Kate Brown, a Democrat. "I know it hurts us at a national level in terms of our bond rating and in terms of being able to fund programs to stability."

Still, legislators aren't eager to tackle the issue during an election year. Mr. Kulongoski says he wants the Legislature to refer the issue to voters on the November ballot, but the Legislature isn't scheduled to meet again until January 2007. While members may hold a special session in May to address the health and education funding shortfalls, Republicans have indicated no interest in discussing the corporate kicker. Many Republicans in the state have taken a no-tax pledge and see rescinding the kicker as a de facto tax increase on business.

At the same time, business isn't united on the issue. While some business groups say they would agree to end the kicker, they don't agree on how the state should use the money. Some want it placed in a rainy-day fund, some want a simultaneous cut in capital-gains taxes, and others want the individual kicker abolished as part of any plan.

Jim Schweinhart, fiscal-policy lobbyist for Associated Oregon Industries, said the business community isn't interested in just handing the kicker back to the state's general fund. "The primary reason the kicker was voted on and put in the constitution was that it's a way to control spending," said Mr. Schweinhart, whose group represents mainly small businesses. "One of the problems we have here in Oregon is that in the '90s, the politicians took the money we got in the good times and spent, spent, spent."

J.L. Wilson, director of the National Federation of Independent Business-Oregon, said there is "no impetus from the business community to deal with this in a special session, and I think the Senate and House leadership respects that."

That could pose problems for Mr. Kulongoski's re-election campaign. "I think the governor is going to be forced to make this an issue," says Sen. Brown. Mr. Kulongoski said he would end the kicker "if I were king and I could just stop something right now." But he's limited in what he can do, and said he wants to work with the business community to make sure any repeal of the kicker is done correctly and enjoys broad support.

"I think that the business community understands why they should invest more in education, but there is a debate within the business community about what they should do with the money," he said. "My view is that in a global economy that's driven by technology, and where change and innovation is the order of the day, if you don't invest in education and skills training, you're going to be a second-rate state."

The Spitzer Savings Plan (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer has been struggling to counter the public perception that he has a "temperament" problem. If his recent treatment of H&R Block is anything to go by, he needs a few more anger management sessions.

Mr. Spitzer blew a gasket last Friday after Block CEO Mark Ernst had the temerity to deny, in an op-ed in this newspaper, the AG's charges that his company had fraudulently sold retirement savings plans. His Lord High Executioner threatened Block with "vast fines" for refusing to roll over. And he further warned that he might now find it more difficult to keep H&R Block "alive and viable" (read: corporate indictment), and promised to "dig deeper" into its affairs.

So rather than let a jury evaluate his charges, Mr. Spitzer is once again threatening to use his power to ruin a company before it even steps into a courtroom. Not that his accusations appear to have much to do with the law in any event. It has escaped no one that this is tax season, and, lo, Mr. Spitzer's target happens to be the nation's largest tax preparation firm. H&R Block has had a string of bad news -- including miscalculating its own state income taxes -- and may have seemed vulnerable to a hit-and-run settlement. Mr. Spitzer was clearly eager for such a painless victory, offering to settle for less than $30 million before filing his $250 million suit.

Block is resolutely defending its Express IRAs, and on the public record so far rightly so. Nearly 600,000 Block customers have used this product, which encourages low-income individuals to divert a portion of their tax refunds into Individual Retirement Accounts. Because Express IRAs have a minimum deposit requirement ($300) far below that of most competitors, and because the money is put into safe (albeit low-interest bearing) money market accounts, Mr. Spitzer claims most users are paying more in fees than they receive in interest and have thus been defrauded.

That must be news to the many Democrats and liberal think tanks plumping for precisely such accounts. As academic studies have long shown, savings tend to rise with income. Only about one in eight Americans in the bottom 20% of income levels have retirement accounts. Many don't work for companies that offer retirement plans, while the idea of making regular contributions can be daunting to households that survive paycheck to paycheck.

One popular response has been to let workers funnel tax refunds directly into private retirement accounts. Low- and moderate-income families receive large tax refunds (in 2001, they saw checks totaling some $78 billion, or $1,500 per family), and many of them view refunds as "extra" money to be put aside. Supporters include the Brookings Institution, the Pew Charitable Trusts, and House Democrats Rahm Emanuel and Jim Cooper -- who have sponsored legislation to require the IRS to set up direct-deposit procedures. Does Mr. Spitzer plan to subpoena all of them?

It was against this background that Block introduced its Express IRA in 2001. The company also hoped to exploit another Congressional initiative -- this one part of the Bush tax cuts -- called the Saver's Tax Credit. Anyone who earns up to $50,000 a year, pays taxes and contributes to a retirement plan gets a "match" from the government of up to 50%. Block has helped nearly half of its Express IRA clients claim this savings subsidy.

The company says its average Express IRA customer earns just $30,000 a year, 42% had previously never opened a savings account, and 20% lacked even a checking account. Yet even after Block's fees, 78% of accounts opened between 2001 and 2005 have had positive net tax savings and interest earnings. Express IRA accounts have accumulated some $360 million. They have also inspired more thrift. Roughly 23% of clients who made an initial refund contribution have since recontributed -- often at a higher amount. Some 40,000 clients are depositing an average of about $50 a month. And some 27,000 have accumulated enough to graduate to a brokerage account.

None of these facts made it into the Spitzer complaint, which cherrypicks data to paint a one-sided picture. While H&R Block has been selling its Express IRA for four years, Mr. Spitzer focused on accounts opened in 2002. That year marked the beginning of the nationwide Express IRA program -- before some clients could build up balances -- and was a time of very low interest rates. It was also the year before the Saver's Tax Credit kicked in, which has sent some $50 million in additional tax benefits to Express IRA users.

Thus Mr. Spitzer was able to claim that 79% of Express IRA customers had lost money. To reach this figure the AG also had to include clients who initially contributed a low amount and soon withdrew their money -- incurring a substantial federal tax penalty. In our book this is called consumer choice, and was to be expected given that many users were new savers under financial pressure. As for Block's fees, they remain among the lowest for IRA operators, which explains why the company says it is still losing money on this product.

All of this might be difficult to grasp for Mr. Spitzer, who can afford to invest in hedge funds to finance his comfortable lifestyle and retirement. But his detachment from the struggles of working people is no excuse for launching a political attack on a law-abiding company, the main benefit of which would be to foreclose a promising avenue for low-income savers.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Medicare Drug Plan Enrollment Tops 27M (USAT)

USA Today, March 24, 2006

About 1.9 million elderly and disabled people signed up for the new Medicare drug benefit over the past month, meaning 7.2 million have taken steps to enroll since the program began Jan. 1, the program's chief said Thursday. An additional 20 million people have been enrolled automatically because they participate in other government programs, such as Medicaid, or because they have drug coverage through a former employer. Those employers are getting a tax subsidy to continue providing the coverage. About 43 million people are eligible for the benefit.

Mark McClellan, administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said the total is expected to continue rising until the May 15 enrollment deadline. People who sign up after that date will probably have to pay higher premiums. Some members of Congress have proposed extending the deadline.

President Bush signed legislation that ends Cold War-era trade restrictions on Ukraine, opening the way for the former Soviet republic to join the World Trade Organization. The measure frees Ukraine from a 1974 law that links trade benefits to the emigration and human rights policies of former or current communist states.

The deal will “strengthen our ties with our good friend Ukraine and create new economic opportunities for our two countries,” Bush said at a White House ceremony. He said the United States supports Ukraine's goal of joining the 148-nation WTO this year and will help it resolve issues standing in the way of its entry. Removal of the U.S. trade restrictions was a necessary step to gain entry. “Ukraine is committed to economic freedom, democratic progress and open trade,” Bush said.

Ukrainian President Viktor Yushchenko called the legislation “evidence of strategic partnership between the countries.” U.S. exports to Ukraine, including poultry and agriculture machinery, totaled $531.7 million in 2005. Imports from Ukraine, including steel and coke, totaled $1.1 billion.

Progress toward opening the Yucca Mountain nuclear waste dump in Nevada has been hindered by questions about the quality of scientific and engineering work, congressional investigators said. The Energy Department's reorganization of the project has not eliminated the problems and may create new issues, a report by the Government Accountability Office said.

The site, 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas, was approved by Congress in 2002 to store 77,000 tons of the nation's most radioactive nuclear waste. It's not likely to open before 2012. Energy Department spokesman Craig Stevens said the agency either has fixed the problems raised by the report or is working on them.

Feds Say 1.9M More Sign For Drug Benefit (AP-Y2)

By Kevin Freking

AP2, March 23, 2006

About 1.9 million elderly and disabled people signed up for the new Medicare drug benefit over the past month, meaning 7.2 million have taken steps to enroll since the program began Jan. 1. The number should keep rising, the program's chief says.

An additional 20 million people have been enrolled automatically because they participate in other government programs, such as Medicaid, or because they have drug coverage through their former employer. Those employers are getting a tax subsidy to continue providing the coverage.

About 43 million people are eligible for the benefit.

"Since January, we've seen a steady, increasing rate of enrollment, and we expect to continue seeing that until May 15," Mark McClellan, administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said Thursday.

That is the deadline for enrolling. People who sign up later probably will have to pay higher premiums; many members of Congress have proposed extending the deadline past May 15.

Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt gave no indication that he agreed with that idea. Indeed, he said people should not wait until just before the deadline to enroll.

"We're reaching out to seniors to suggest there will be a surge at the end. Human nature tells you that," Leavitt said. "What that means is we'll likely see a lot of people trying to sign up at the same time. They can avoid that rush by signing up now."

The latest enrollment figures were released as polling showed that older people have mixed views about the program.

About 44 percent of those surveyed approve of the new benefit. About 41 percent disapprove and 15 percent are undecided, according to The Pew Research Center for the People and the Press. The margin of error was plus or minus 3 percentage points.

While political supporters of the benefit can take solace in that more people like the benefit than dislike it, the numbers represent a dwindling of support since December.

It would appear that many of the people who were undecided before the benefit kicked in now have a negative view of the program. In the December survey, 45 percent approved, 34 percent disapproved and 21 percent were undecided.

Groups urging an overhaul of the program said Thursday that thousands of elderly and disabled people are continuing to call hot lines to complain. The organizations, part of a group called the Americans United Coalition, said the public will support politicians who promise major changes to the program.

Defending the program as it is now "looks to be a losing political proposition in 2006," Democratic pollster Guy Molyneux said.

Young people are most supportive of the program, according to the Pew Research Center's survey. Among those age 18 to 29, about 64 percent approve and 22 percent disapprove.

The least supportive are people 50 to 65; some 40 percent approved and 44 percent disapproved.

McClellan said polling from other groups also shows that a majority of older people who do sign up are glad they did.

DOJ_NMG_0020750

The elderly and disabled are eligible to enroll in a private drug plan or in a managed care plan, called Medicare Advantage, that will cover a portion of their drug costs. The government has estimated that the average participant will save about $1,100; the amount of savings varies depending upon a beneficiary's drug needs, income and the type of plan that they choose.

The updated enrollment figures failed to change the political debate about the program in Congress.

"While House Republicans are encouraging seniors to sign up for a program that would lower their drug cost, I'm disappointed that the Democrat leadership would demagogue the program and have seniors pay higher prescription drug prices," said House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill.

Democratic Sen. Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia said the Bush administration's effort "to equate numbers with success means that they are overlooking the crises of individuals still struggling to get the prescription drugs they need at an affordable price."

Medicare Nears Its Enrollee Goal For Drug Benefit (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Nearly two million people signed up for Medicare's new drug coverage in the past month, bringing the total number of people who have enrolled individually to 7.2 million. In all, more than 27 million Medicare beneficiaries now have drug coverage.

But more than 40 million people are eligible for the drug coverage, and many of those who have yet to sign up are in a low-income bracket and would qualify for generous federal subsidies. Government officials said they are making an aggressive final push to get people to sign up by the May 15 deadline. Those who sign up afterward must pay higher premiums.

President Bush has defended the prescription-drug benefit as good for seniors and taxpayers, even if it has had start-up problems. To draw national attention to the enrollment effort, Mr. Bush and top health officials are expected to visit several cities. The administration is "well on the way" to reaching its stated goal of 28 million to 30 million enrollees, said Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt.

Meanwhile, congressional Democrats released a report illustrating problems beneficiaries sometimes face when trying to obtain certain medications under the plans. In a survey of the plans available in Rep. Henry Waxman's California district, Democratic staff from the House Committee on Government Reform found that most plans require patients to get prior authorization or try other medications before getting coverage for some commonly prescribed drugs.

It also found that many drug-plan representatives didn't give accurate or full descriptions of the restrictions. It is "nearly impossible for seniors to learn" the terms of plan restrictions "until after they have subscribed and been denied drug access," the report said.

The issue is particularly significant this month, when many people who have been able to get medications without restriction under 90-day transition policies now must switch drugs or get the plan's approval for their current medications.

Mark McClellan, head of the agency that runs Medicare, said many of the restrictions highlighted in the report are common methods used by private-sector insurers to steer customers to medications for which they have negotiated a better price. He said his agency hasn't yet received a large number of complaints about plans failing to provide information about prior authorization and other restrictions, but it would "act promptly" if that happens.

Part B To Cost Wealthy More (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

Starting next year, wealthier seniors will have to pay a greater share of the cost of their doctor visits because of a provision in the 2003 Medicare prescription drug legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0020751

"It's a change from traditional social insurance, there's no question about that," said Robert Moffitt, a health care policy analyst at the Heritage Foundation.

Medicare Part B covers outpatient services such as doctor visits, physical therapy and X-rays. All seniors who choose the coverage pay 25 percent of their monthly Part B premium, with the government picking up the remaining 75 percent. The seniors' monthly portion was $78.20 last year and rose to $88.50 this year.

Beginning next year, wealthier seniors will have to pay an increasingly higher percent of their Part B premium costs. Singles with annual incomes of $80,000 to $100,000 and couples with annual incomes of $160,000 to $200 ,000 will have to pick up 28 percent of the monthly premium cost. That share will rise to 35 percent by 2009. Singles with annual incomes more than $200,000 and couples with annual incomes more than $400,000 will pay 43 percent of the cost next year and 80 percent in 2009.

Supporters of the change say it is a matter of economics: Rising health care costs and retirements of baby boomers will strain the Medicare and Social Security systems, and it doesn't make sense for the government to pay the tab of the wealthy.

"The financial pressures facing Medicare are so severe that we cannot afford to treat everyone the same," Mr. Moffitt said.

The government now picks up the same tab for a retired librarian and billionaire developer Donald Trump, and there is simply "no way we can do that anymore," he said.

Some seniors groups oppose the change.

"Now that it has been legitimized, Medicare means-testing thresholds could be lowered by future Congresses, affecting a growing number of beneficiaries," said the National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association.

"It would significantly alter a founding principle of the program -- equality in Medicare benefits," said Sharon Benton, executive director of the Retired Enlisted Association's Senior Citizens League. "[It] opens the door for more means testing and much higher premium costs for retirees in the future."

Brookings Institution economist Gary Burtless said it will be difficult for the government to calculate seniors' annual incomes and that American workers pay taxes into Medicare based on how much they earn. Discovering upon retirement that they must pay a greater share for their doctor visits "may seem to a lot of people as sort of a double whammy," he said.

Mr. Burtless noted that a backlash of anger forced Congress to repeal a program created during the Reagan administration that provided catastrophic health coverage for seniors but applied means testing for wealthier Americans.

Part B means testing originally was to be phased in over five years, but Congress approved a budget-trimming bill late last year that expedited the plan.

Democrats Say Bush Violated Constitution (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 23, 2006

House Democrats want President Bush to say whether he knew of what they call a "fundamental constitutional problem" with the $39 billion deficit reduction package he signed last month.

A letter to Bush, signed by House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and Rep. Henry Waxman (news, bio, voting record) of California and released Thursday, is the latest challenge to a bill that was passed in slightly different forms by the House and Senate before it was sent to Bush.

"A bill is not law unless the same version is passed by both the House and the Senate and signed by the president," top Democrats wrote to Bush. He signed it on Feb. 8.

The Senate version of the bill said Medicare can pay to rent some types of medical equipment for 13 months, as intended by congressional negotiators. A clerk erroneously wrote down 36 months before the bill was sent back to the House for a final vote, and that's what the House approved Feb. 1.

By the time the bill was shipped to Bush, the number was back to 13 months as passed by the Senate.

Recognizing the problem, the Senate passed a resolution hours after Bush signed the bill confirming that the measure transmitted to the president was "deemed the true enrollment reflecting the intention of the Congress." The White House considers the matter settled.

DOJ_NMG_0020752

Others do not. A liberal watchdog group, Public Citizen, filed a lawsuit Tuesday asking a federal court to throw the budget bill out. A Republican activist also has sued in federal court in Alabama.

Minimum Wage Emerges As Election Issue (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

MINIMUM WAGE EMERGES as election-year flashpoint.

Treasury Secretary Snow's remarks on income inequality fuel debate. "We'll engage with" advocates of an increase, he says, while cautioning against pricing some workers out of labor market. The wage remains $5.15 an hour, a level set in 1997; relative to average wages, it's at its lowest point since 1949.

Commerce Secretary Gutierrez also signals openness to an increase if Congress pursues the issue "thoughtfully...and not emotionally." With Bush and Republicans politically weakened, Democratic Sen. Kennedy plans push for floor vote this spring on an increase to $7.25.

TEAM BUSH SCRAMBLES to revive domestic agenda.

President's acknowledgment of political capital spent on war reflects slipping prospects on other fronts. Senate Finance Chairman Grassley predicts uphill fight for even scaled-down version of expanded health savings accounts.

A senior Bush adviser sees delay -- pushing House-Senate conference until after midterm elections -- as best chance for winning immigrant guest-worker program. Both chambers have sidetracked Bush's proposed Medicare savings; extension of dividend and capital-gains tax cuts remains in doubt. Moderate Republicans, complains Heritage Foundation's Michael Franc, are "completely untethered" from party leaders.

REPUBLICANS MANEUVER to dodge political potholes.

Senate candidates DeWine of Ohio, Kennedy of Minnesota and Steele of Maryland avoid appearances with Bush. A top Republican legislator in Montana launches Senate bid, raising pressure on troubled incumbent Burns to retire.

"Most observers still believe the Senate will stay in GOP hands," says online exchange Intrade.com, but "traders may be ready to jump ship." Senate Democrats' campaign arm amasses twice the campaign cash of Republicans, but faces incumbents in six of seven most competitive races. On Web site FancyFord.com, Republicans mock Democrats' Tennessee candidate as an elitist playboy.

Nominee For Appeals Court Withdraws (WP/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Henry W. Saad, one of President Bush's appeals court nominees blocked by Senate Democrats, withdrew his name from consideration, a presidential aide said yesterday.

Democrats have accused Saad, a Michigan appeals court judge, of being hostile to employment-discrimination claims and lawsuits by consumers.

"Judge Saad asked to have his nomination withdrawn, and we intend to honor that request," Bush spokeswoman Erin Healy said.

Saad's nomination to the Cincinnati-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 6th Circuit was submitted to the Senate in January 2003, and he was renominated last year. His nomination was one of 10 blocked by Democrats, who used the filibuster, which allows unlimited debate, to prevent a Senate vote.

He was not included in a bipartisan agreement by 14 senators last year to avert a Senate showdown over the use of filibusters to block judicial nominees. The agreement allowed three of the 10 nominees to go to a vote.

Saad was rated "well qualified" by a "substantial" majority of the American Bar Association's committee that rates judicial nominees. Under Senate rules, Saad's nomination cannot be withdrawn until Congress returns Monday from its recess.

Bush Arrives, Defends Iraq War (IWNR)

The Intelligencer & Wheeling (WV) News-Regist, March 23, 2006

WHEELING — President George W. Bush's first official act upon touching down at the Wheeling-Ohio County Airport just before noon today was to present the President's Volunteer Service Award to Kristen Holloway of Pittsburgh, Pa.

The President and his entourage of Secret Service, White House staff and media, then traveled by motorcade south on W.Va. 2 into downtown Wheeling, where at press time President Bush was entering a town hall meeting on the the War on Terror.

Holloway is the founder and president of Operation Troop Appreciation.

To thank them for making a difference in the lives of others, President Bush has met with more than 480 individuals around the country, like Holloway, since March 2002.

Holloway is the founder and president of Operation Troop Appreciation, a non-profit organization dedicated to supporting deployed troops fighting the War on Terrorism in Iraq, Afghanistan, Kuwait, and Africa.

Since its inception in 2004, OTA has reached more than 10,000 troops with care packages tailored to meet each unit's specific requests.

Through fund-raising and in-kind donations, OTA volunteers have collected and sent DVDs, phone cards and sports equipment. All care packages also include a letter of thanks to each soldier in the unit.

In 2005, OTA received a request for musical instruments from the 463d Engineer Combat Battalion from Wheeling.

Operation Troop Appreciation sent 12 instruments, including acoustic guitars, a keyboard and drums that were used by troops at the Morale, Welfare and Recreation tent and chapel services at Camp Anaconda in Iraq.

In his January 2002 State of the Union Address, President Bush called on all Americans to make a difference in their communities through volunteer service.

He created USA Freedom Corps, an Office of the White House, to strengthen and expand volunteer service.

Americans are responding to the President's Call to Service. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, more than 65.4 million Americans volunteered in 2005. Go to www.volunteer.gov or call (877) 872-2677 to find an existing volunteer service opportunity in your area or to find more information about service programs, including national service programs such as the Peace Corps, AmeriCorps, Senior Corps, and Citizen Corps. USA Freedom Corps is also highlighting youth volunteer service. Visit www.volunteerkids.gov for games and ideas designed to show how America's youth are making a difference.

The President's Volunteer Service Award was created at the President's direction by the President's Council on Service and Civic Participation. The Award is available to youth ages 14 and under who have completed 50 or more hours of volunteer service; to individuals 15 and older who have completed 100 or more hours; and to families or groups who have completed 200 or more hours. Pension Chief Tells Bush He's Resigning (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — The head of the federal agency that insures the private pensions of 44 million Americans said Thursday he would step down on May 31, forcing the White House to find a new leader amid a rash of pension plan insolvencies.

Bradley Belt, executive director of the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. for the past two years, announced his resignation in a letter to President Bush. He did not indicate what he planned to do after leaving the agency, and PBGC staff said they could not elaborate.

"This past two years has been a particularly tumultuous period for the PBGC, which has had to confront unprecedented operational, financial and policy challenges," Belt wrote.

The PBGC is funded through insurance premiums levied on companies that sponsor traditional pension plans, not by tax revenue.

As industries such as steel, retailing and airlines have tumbled into bankruptcy or been unable to meet pension obligations, the PBGC has had to take over their plans.

Defined-benefit pension plans are now underfunded by more than $400 billion. Congress is debating bills to restructure pension financing, including imposing higher premiums on companies that offer defined-benefit plans.

The bills would also shore up the PBGC. But the bills include controversial provisions, such as proposals to give airlines more time to increase funding their pension plans.

In a speech this month to the National Association of Business Economists, Belt warned that pension accounting rules allowed companies to defer or ignore costs too long, leading to problems.

Referring to current pension rules, Belt said it was as though "we have followed Alice down the White Rabbit's hole into a looking-glass world that is disconnected from economic reality."

The PBGC has only limited authority, given that it does not set pension pricing or accounting rules. Douglas Elliott, president of the Center on Federal Financial Institutions, which analyzes pension and other programs, says within those confines Belt was "an excellent administrator."

Pension Agency's Director Resigns (WSJ)

By Miichael Schroeder

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Amid continuing turmoil in the traditional retirement-benefit system, the director of the federal agency that insures company pensions announced plans to step down.

The unexpected announcement came as members of a House-Senate conference committee continue efforts to iron out differences on a pension overhaul bill. So many significant issues remain that the committee may not complete the final legislation by the April 7 deadline set by its chairman, Sen. Mike Enzi, a Wyoming Republican.

In a letter to President Bush, Bradley Belt said he would leave the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. at the end of May to pursue other opportunities. "The last two years have been a particularly tumultuous period for the PBGC, which has had to confront unprecedented operational, financial, and policy challenges," Mr. Belt said. (See the letter.)

Mr. Belt, a former senior staff member at the Senate Banking Committee and the Securities and Exchange Commission, has been at odds with administration officials on the PBGC's board over his desire to take a larger role in the pension debate, according to people with knowledge of the situation. The board includes the secretaries of Treasury, Commerce and Labor, who have been taking the lead in pressing the administration's pension proposals.

Mr. Belt is expected to be in demand for jobs in the private sector because of his two-year tenure during major upheaval in the pension system. While his departure may coincide with the completion of the pension bill, it still comes at a time when the administration may have difficulty recruiting a candidate to lead the agency.

With a growing number of steel, airline and automotive companies recently dumping their underfunded pension plans on the PBGC as part of the bankruptcy-court process, the agency's deficit ballooned to $22.8 billion last year. The PBGC's finances come from premiums paid by insured companies and assets it acquires from companies that terminate their pension plans. The agency doesn't use taxpayer funds.

In an attempt to head off a taxpayer bailout of the agency, the administration and Congress have pushed legislation that would shore up the PBGC's finances and require companies to fully fund their pension obligations.

The measures have numerous key provisions that conferees are having a difficult time reconciling in a final bill. One particular sticking point is whether to require companies that have junk-rated bonds to accelerate contributions into underfunded pensions.

Critics argue that this provision, and others, would cause more companies to freeze their traditional defined-benefit pension plans, in which participants are paid set amounts each month based on compensation and years of service, and replace them with defined-contribution plans such as 401(k) savings accounts..

Backlash Over New Pensions Legislation (FT)

By Norma Cohen

Financial Times, March 24, 2006

Employers will be able to slash their contributions to underfunded pension schemes by tens of billions of dollars over the next five years under proposed legislation before Congress that was expected to have the opposite effect.

The legislation was proposed by the White House last year to lessen the risk of a taxpayer bailout of the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation, a federal safety net for pension schemes.

According to an analysis prepared this week by the Joint Committee on Taxation, which does bipartisan technical work on legislation for Congress, The Pension Security and Transparency Act of 2005 would bring at least $10bn in additional tax revenue as employers reduce pension contributions on which they would have been eligible for tax relief.

Assuming an average corporate tax rate of 35 per cent, the data suggest a temporary but significant drop in employer payments into pension schemes over the next few years.

The analysis shows tax revenues will rise by $10.2bn under the House version of the bill, and by $12bn under the Senate's, between 2006-11 as a result of the weakened contribution requirements. Funding of pension schemes would reach a low ebb in 2008 under both versions, while tax relief for increased contributions would not begin to rise until 2011.

The PBGC saw its deficit widen to $22bn at the end of its last fiscal year. According to the Center on Federal Financial Institutions, a private think-tank, current and future losses caused by the underfunded schemes of insolvent employers could lead to a bailout of around $92bn in today's money.

Separately, Bradley Belt, executive director of the PBGC, announced on Thursday he intends to step down at the end of May "to pursue other opportunities". A spokesman for the PBGC declined to comment on Mr Belt's departure beyond the resignation letter.

In a speech two weeks ago, Mr Belt called for both congressional bills to be strengthened and warned that if "the end-product...is a bill that fails to improve on the current law, the president's senior advisers have said they will recommend a veto".

Both bills fall far short of the goals set out for legislation proposed last year by the White House, which had formally threatened a veto unless certain measures in either bill are altered.

Of particular note are provisions in the Senate version of the bill which allow the airline industry up to 20 years to fully fund its pension deficits and also give it much wider leeway in the assumptions it uses to determine whether or not company schemes are fully funded. According to Coffi, many of the congressman who passed the House bill did so on the understanding that special relief for the troubled airlines industry would be included in the final version that emerges from the Conference Committee.

So far, the PBGC has sustained losses of about $10bn arising from the pension schemes at US Airways and United Airways. Delta and Northwest Airlines, currently in bankruptcy, will add a further $11.2bn.

Coffi has said that offering relief to airlines is likely to spark pleas for similar relief from other hard-pressed industries. The PBGC has estimated that the entire US auto manufacturing industry - including tyre and rubber companies and auto parts suppliers - has has aggregate liabilities of $55bn to $60bn.

Meanwhile, other provisions have also strayed far from administration proposals aimed at limiting losses on the PBGC. In particular, both significantly ease the financing requirements for employers with the weakest credit ratings, the category of employer most likely to present a claim for pension benefits to the PBGC.

Suggested Changes To Pay Rules Raise Concerns About Fairness, Conflict Of Interest (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

The president's chief adviser on the civil service has been presented with options on how to address pay inequities faced by some inspectors general, and efforts also are underway to rethink the pay rules for administrative law judges.

Linda M. Springer , director of the Office of Personnel Management, said she expects to be sorting out compensation proposals for both groups in coming weeks. At issue is a Bush administration principle that job performance should be a factor in setting pay for government employees and whether that principle can be applied to IGs and ALJs without damaging or weakening their independence.

Revamping pay practices for both groups will probably require congressional approval, Springer said. "We've got to make sure we consider all the options carefully," she said, because any change "has got to stand up to the scrutiny that is given to a legislative proposal."

Pay has become a concern for inspectors general, particularly those who came to their jobs from the career civil service, because of a recent law that increased Senior Executive Service pay scales. The fiscal 2004 law also made SES annual pay raises dependent on performance evaluations and eliminated an annual, geographic-based adjustment.

The suggestion that salaries for inspectors general could hinge on a performance evaluation from their agency heads has raised issues of fairness and possible conflicts of interest, Springer said. IGs investigate their agencies for waste, fraud and mismanagement and report their findings to Congress. IG jobs are supposed to be viewed as independent and above partisan politics.

Inspectors general who came into their jobs from the career civil service and IGs who are presidential appointees but not career SES members are paid $143,000. In many cases, they supervise SES staffers who are eligible to earn salaries of up to $165,200. (There are 57 IGs whose jobs are established in law, and there are more than 6,000 career SES members.)

Salary levels were not adjusted for administrative law judges in the 2004 law, and their pay is capped at $152,000, including geographic-based adjustments. At the end of last year, congressional aides estimated that more than 1,000 of the 1,400 ALJs had hit the pay cap.

House members, such as Reps. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and Jon Porter (R-Nev.), have expressed interest in raising ALJ pay scale to foster recruitment and retention of judges and to relieve "pay compression."

The Bush administration has suggested that a new ALJ pay system include a method for measuring judges' job performance, but Springer said current law prohibits evaluations of ALJ performance. Administrative law judges hear disputes that involve decisions made by their agencies and seek to avoid creating perceptions that external pressures can sway their rulings.

Given the obstacles to making performance a key element in IG and ALJ pay decisions, Springer said, OPM will be open to alternatives that allow salaries to keep pace with adjustments provided to the SES.

Gregory H. Friedman , inspector general at the Energy Department, has worked with other IGs and has presented OPM with options for changing IG pay practices, Springer said. A meeting will be held soon with Friedman and officials at the Office of Management and Budget to discuss the options, she said. "Everyone agrees there is a problem and wants a solution," she added.

Springer said she had met with representatives for administrative law judges and had asked them to "come up with some options that will address the problem. When they do, we will have a meeting with them, and see where it will take us."Talk Shows

Bob Leins , a tax expert at the National Institute of Transition Planning, will be the guest on "Fedtalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://www.federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

David Wyld , professor of management at Southeastern Louisiana University; Paul Brinkley , deputy undersecretary of defense for business transformation; and Alan Estevez , assistant deputy undersecretary of defense for supply chain integration, will discuss radio frequency identification technology on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

From Her Lips To His Ear (WP)

By Sally Quinn

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Dear Laura,

It's time for you to act. Nancy Reagan did it. You can, too.

Things are falling apart. They always do in the second term. And when they do, there's only one person who can change things: the wife. You are the only one who can tell him the truth. You are smart, astute; you're not afraid of him and you love him.

I see you're going on Larry King tonight, and that's a good way to show your support and share your popularity. But your real work is behind the scenes.

The president's poll numbers have tanked. They are among the lowest of any president in history at this point in his term. So think back to Ronald Reagan's second term. He was mired in Iran-contra, his staff was exhausted, and their reaction to criticism was to dig in. Nancy managed to clean house, bring the White House back in touch with the outside world and, in doing so, allowed Reagan to clear his head, end the Cold War and "tear down that wall, Mr. Gorbachev." His polls skyrocketed, from a low of 42 to 68 percent when he left office.

Because of the nature of the Monica Lewinsky scandal, Hillary Clinton was unable to carry off the same trick. But you are perfectly positioned.

The biggest problem your husband has now is that so many top Republicans have turned against him. Without the support of his own party, it's pretty much impossible for him to run the country. After the way they went after him over the Dubai ports deal, you can imagine what they are saying about him privately.

Incompetent, unrealistic and insincere were a few of the words circulating at a private dinner recently. Referring to the president's refusal to seek advice on anything -- the war, the economy, foreign policy -- one of the most prominent Republicans in Washington called the situation so dire that he feared "the country would fall apart with another three years of this."

"They don't listen to anybody," said another prominent Republican who was close to the first President Bush.

To a person, every Republican and Democrat I talked to compared your husband to his father. W didn't come out on the winning end. "A real gent," "gracious," "responsive," "inclusive," "conciliatory" were words used to describe the senior Bush. Democrats told how he always returned their phone calls, sometimes at 2 a.m.

Now even Dad's former friends and advisers can't get through. "All of his father's old boys are out in the wilderness together," lamented one of them.

Here are some of the things you can do, collected from half a dozen senior Republicans:

· Make sure your husband hears outside opinions. The Iraq war is consuming his presidency and nobody has a good solution. This requires getting the best minds in the country together and listening to them. The recent photo op of the president with all the secretaries of state received much derision because, his critics say, the president didn't really want to hear what they had to say; he just wanted to look as if he did.

· Form an alliance with Karl Rove. Senior Republicans say he's interested in change. He takes the long view, and midterm elections are around the corner.

DOJ_NMG_0020758

· Convince the president that polls do matter. As former White House counselor David Gergen (the only person who would go on the record) put it: "Without the support of the people, you can't make the tough call on Iran or Iraq or any tough calls." And during an election year, members of Congress listen to their constituents.

· Tell him to throw out the Kool-Aid. "The White House is not a cult," said one high-ranking former White House staffer. "Everybody vibrates in harmony over there," complained another.

· Stress the importance of new blood. Nancy persuaded the president to get rid of Donald Regan and bring in Howard Baker, Frank Carlucci and Ken Duberstein. This doesn't have to be seen as a vote of no confidence in the staff as much as a reprieve. Chief of Staff Andy Card is one of the most well-liked people in Washington. But he has been on an inhuman schedule for five years, and he reportedly covets the job of Treasury secretary. "He is a wonderful, decent, nice guy, but you need an SOB in that job now," said one Republican who served in the Reagan administration.

"You don't need a kibitzer," said another. "You need somebody with credibility, integrity, someone known on the Hill and in the press with management capability."

· Tell George to listen to his Cabinet officers. Except for those in State and Defense, they are chopped liver, out of the loop, no seat at the table, John Snow in particular. Why have a secretary of the Treasury if you're not going to listen to him?

· Because the war is going so badly, a number of Republicans think it's time for Donald Rumsfeld to go. Even those who like him say that as the architect of the war, he is not the one to turn it around. Some suggest a conservative-leaning Democrat like Sam Nunn or Joe Lieberman would be a smart move. Whether it's the secretary of defense or some other job, perhaps you could persuade the president to bring in a Democrat. "That would give you protection against Democratic attacks and restore bipartisan spirit," said Gergen.

· And remind your husband to pay some attention to Congress. Republicans on the Hill feel excluded from the decision-making process. "Listen to Democrats, too," said a Republican. "They don't have horns."

Last week, Howard Baker suggested bringing in former senator Fred Thompson as a liaison to Congress, but many felt that wouldn't make a difference because it wasn't getting rid of anybody. "Anybody who really knows this crowd wouldn't take the job," said one former White House adviser.

· Tell him to take responsibility for his actions. In his news conference Tuesday, he gave different explanations for the war in Iraq, but never mentioned WMD. Even if he still believes invading Iraq was the right thing, he could still acknowledge that one of the reasons his administration gave at the time was wrong. That would go a long way toward clearing the air.

With three years to go in this presidency, something has to change. You've always been there when he needed you. You got him to stop drinking. You campaigned hard for him at the end of the first campaign. Your own poll numbers are off the charts. You need to persuade him to make changes, and to do it in a way that the people believe he means it.

Remember, it's your legacy, too.

Cheney's Needs On The Road: What, No NPR? (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 23 — Vice President Dick Cheney may be a rock star only to his most ardent Republican supporters, but he has on-the-road demands just like the Rolling Stones. Still, Mr. Cheney appears easier to please than Mick Jagger or Keith Richards.

At least that was the evidence from "Vice Presidential Downtime Requirements," the heading of a document posted Thursday on the Smoking Gun Web site and confirmed as authentic by Mr. Cheney's office.

The document listed 13 requirements. Among them were these: All televisions sets in Mr. Cheney's hotel suite should be tuned to Fox News, all lights should be on, and the thermostat set at 68 degrees. Mr. Cheney should have a queen- or king-size bed, a desk with a chair, a private bathroom, a container for ice, a microwave oven and a coffee pot, with decaf brewed before arrival.

DOJ_NMG_0020759

The vice president should also have four cans of caffeine-free Diet Sprite and four to six bottles of water. He must have the hotel restaurant menu, with a copy faxed ahead to his advance office. If his wife is with him, she should have two bottles of sparkling water, either Calistoga or Perrier.

For his reading material, Mr. Cheney should have The New York Times, USA Today, The Wall Street Journal and the local newspaper.

"The vice president maintains an active schedule, which requires regular travel throughout the United States and at times involves a hotel stay," said Jenny Mayfield, a spokeswoman for Mr. Cheney. "Our advance office provides guidelines for our volunteers in the field. This is just a routine little check list."

The downtime requirements said nothing about exercise equipment, but aides to Mr. Cheney have been spotted on his travels loading and unloading a stationary bicycle from Air Force Two.

Cheney's Creature Comforts

Like any big rock star, Dick Cheney needs a soothing environment after a long day on the road. Now we know just what he likes waiting in his hotel room.

The "Vice Presidential Downtime Requirements" published yesterday on the Smoking Gun is a list of the veep's home-away-from-home comforts provided to hotels by Cheney's advance team. (The Web site obtained a copy from a hotel employee.) No over-the-top demands, just a few specific requests:

· A queen- or king-size bed, desk and chair, and private bathroom.

· All lights turned on and the temperature set at a chilly 68 degrees.

· All televisions tuned to Fox News.

· A fresh pot of decaf, four cans of Caffeine-Free Diet Sprite, four to six bottles of water, and (if Lynne Cheney is traveling with her husband) two bottles of Calistoga or Perrier sparkling water.

· A microwave and hotel restaurant menu.

· The New York Times, USA Today, Wall Street Journal, a local paper and (yes!) The Washington Post. (The papers were a handwritten addition, so we don't know who put them on the list.)

· And, if the hotel wants to leave a gift in the suite, the bills should be unmarked . . . kidding! Seriously, though, the advance team needs to know about any hotel gift for the vice president.

Cheney's office confirmed that . . . well, he stays in hotels. "The vice president maintains an active schedule which requires regular travel throughout the United States and, at times, involves a hotel stay," said spokeswoman Jennifer Mayfield.Star Rises, and Al Falls Down

Can't put a price tag on infamy? Sure you can -- $94,625! That was the haul from yesterday's Los Angeles auction of disgraced ex-representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham's forfeited collection of furniture, rugs and other knickknacks he got as bribes from defense contractors. Some 1,300 gawkers turned out, more than 700 of whom registered to bid. The highest price, $10,000, was fetched by an Iranian "Mahi" design rug; the lowest, $225, went to a ratty-looking rattan screen, reports our colleague William Booth. In between were a leather couch ($2,100), a 32-foot Oriental carpet runner ($4,750) and a French Provincial armoire ($7,100). Proceeds go to the FBI and the IRS's criminal investigation branch.

Republican Fatigue Could Hurt The Party's Chances In November (TSSC/KRT)

By Steven Thomma And James Kuhnhenn, Knight Ridder

The State (SC), March 23, 2006

GOLDEN, Colo. - Brian Wareing has been a Republican all his life. But ask him how his party has done running the federal government and his complaints pile up: Immigration. Spending. Trade. He's had enough.

He won't vote for a Democrat in November's congressional elections. But he might vote for a third-party candidate - or he might not vote at all. "At this point, I couldn't vote for the Republican," the house painter from this Denver suburb said, with regret.

DOJ_NMG_0020760

Across the country this spring, many Republicans alternate between anger and ambivalence five years after their party seized power over the federal government and seven months before a pivotal election for control of Congress.

If enough disgruntled Republicans sit out the midterm elections - when voter turnout typically is low and victory goes to the party whose base is most passionate - Republican incumbents could lose in close contests such as the one in Golden.

Democrats need to gain only 15 of 435 seats to take control of the U.S. House of Representatives, and six of the 33 that are up this year to take the 100-member Senate. And if they win either house of Congress, President Bush will become the lamest of lame ducks for his final two years in power.

National trends suggest that's possible. Solid majorities of adults disapprove of Bush, the war in Iraq, the leadership of Congress and the direction of the country, according to a series of polls. Increasingly, the national mood seems to mirror 1994, when voters turned sour on President Clinton, rejected Democratic lawmakers and installed a Republican majority in Congress for the first time in 40 years.

Since Bush's second term started, his approval rating has dropped 16 percentage points among Republicans, 23 points among supporters of the Iraq war and 24 points among those who voted for him in 2004, according to a recent Pew Research Center survey.

The one shred of good news for the Republican Party now: Not many House and Senate contests appear all that competitive yet. Disillusionment with Bush and Iraq don't yet trump voters' local concerns in many states. And the threat of a Democratic Congress still could rally the Republican base.

But it's clear from dozens of interviews in key battlegrounds that Republican voters today lack the passion they brought to the 2002 midterm elections. And that gives Democrats an opportunity.

At a recent breakfast in Golden, one Republican after another put voices behind those numbers, complaining about Washington policies from the war in Iraq and the failure to stop illegal immigration to runaway federal spending. The cumulative effect led several to question whether they or like-minded party loyalists would vote next fall.

"I've been a Republican since I started voting," said John Burdan, a retired Air Force officer from Jefferson County, outside Denver. "Things are going terrible. I won't vote for a Democrat. But I might not vote for the Republican."

"Doesn't Bush know that Republicans are watching?" asked Jefferson County Commissioner Jim Congrove. "We're setting ourselves up for big defeats."

Golden is in Colorado's 7th Congressional District, where Republican Rep. Bob Beauprez is stepping aside to run for governor. When he won the open seat four years ago, it was the closest race in the country. Today Republican Rick O'Donnell faces the same evenly divided district, but with a much more hostile Republican base.

"The frustration I hear is that we have a Republican president and a Republican Congress, how come we can't reduce spending and how come we don't have secure borders," O'Donnell said.

He reminds them of Republican successes, such as the appointment of two Supreme Court justices. Still, he said, "so many Republicans at the base are frustrated. ... I'm spending more time on it than I otherwise would have. The troops are a little depressed."

"There's some fatigue among the average Republican," Denver Republican consultant Katy Atkinson said. "They're tired of it all. They're tired of scandals. They're tired of the White House. They're ready for change."

Said independent Denver pollster Floyd Ciruli: "The party is in trouble here. For their turnout machine to work, it has to have a popular president with key issues. I don't think they have that now."

For all that, Democratic efforts to make the elections a national referendum on Bush and the Republican Congress haven't taken hold. Local issues and personalities still dominate in most parts of the country. In some places, such as Connecticut, that helps Republicans. In others, such as Ohio, it hurts them.

Almost everywhere, it's easy to find Republicans who once were inspired by Bush and the Republican Congress and now seem dispirited.

In Florida, for example, a lukewarm attitude is pervasive in the Palm Beach district where Republican Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr., a 13-term veteran, faces a tough re-election.

DOJ_NMG_0020761

"There are a lot of problems out there," said Republican David Boyer, a hotel employee from Hollywood, Fla. "Can a Republican do it? I doubt it. Can a Democrat do it? I doubt it. Who's to know who's right?"

In Connecticut, some Republicans fear that their party could be hurt by growing opposition to Bush and the Iraq war.

"We've seen some apathy in the Republican ranks," said John Crooks, a Republican alderman from Norwich. "It tends to slow down the Republican turnout."

"If the president is doing really well, I'll do better; if he's not doing really well, I'll do worse," said Rep. Christopher Shays, a nine-term incumbent Republican.

Shays worries that the mood might be similar to 1994, when voters felt they had to send a "wakeup call" to Clinton. "We're on the same path right now," he said.

Yet Connecticut Republicans such as Shays and Rep. Rob Simmons benefit from local issues, such as their success at keeping Groton's submarine base open, the popularity of Republican Gov. M. Jodi Rell, and the lawmakers' reputations for independence from the party's national leadership.

"I don't really understand George Bush," said Anthony Savas, a Republican and tugboat operator out of Norwalk, Conn., who opposes the Iraq war.

What about Shays? "He's not 100 percent Republican," Savas said. "He uses common sense in making his own decisions."

Outside Philadelphia, Republican voters are split over Bush, the war and how they'll vote next fall. They live in a district in which Republican Rep. Jim Gerlach is looking for a third term after two 51-49 percent wins, and a state in which polls show Republican Sen. Rick Santorum trailing in his race for re-election.

"We have hurt ourselves greatly," said Warren Moser, a retired executive from Chester County who opposes the Iraq war. "But this is one Republican who is still behind the president."

For Ken Enochs, a real estate broker from Norristown, Pa., anger over the war fuels his defection from the Republican Party. "It's about what is right," he said. "That goes across party lines."

In Ohio, anger at scandal-plagued Republican Gov. Bob Taft outweighs feelings about Bush or the national party.

"Taft has hurt Republicans," said Brian Kane, an optometrist and the president of the Painesville Rotary Club.

"He's really blown it," agreed Lou Falk, a retiree from Painesville, east of Cleveland. "There's been all kinds of scandals. It's going to have a ripple effect."

Just below the surface, many Ohio Republicans are as down on Sen. Mike DeWine, a Republican facing re-election, as Republican voters elsewhere are on Bush.

"I'm kind of neutral on both DeWine and (Republican Sen. George) Voinovich," said Richard Kretschman, an insurance agent from Concord Township, east of Cleveland. "He doesn't seem to stand out in my mind. I don't have anything negative to say about him. I just don't feel very positive."

Ethics Reform Stalling In Congress (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON - Prospects for robust ethics reform in the 109th Congress are dimming, even as the criminal probes that prompted it are intensifying.

It's a political calculation that could cost lawmakers in this fall's elections, if they misread the degree to which voters care about bribery inside the Beltway.

As recently as January, lobby reform bills were top priorities in both the House and Senate, but now are encountering strong resistance. In the Senate, Republican leaders pulled the lobby bill off the floor over an unrelated amendment on the Dubai ports deal. In the House, GOP leaders are split over how aggressively to restrict lawmaker travel paid for by private entities.

"Some members are pulling the blanket over their heads and hoping the storm will pass. For others, there is also a genuine belief that if you just jump in a spasm of reaction, you could do some things detrimental to a good deliberative process," says Norman Ornstein, a senior fellow at the American Enterprise Institute.

When the last big ethics scandal broke on Capitol Hill in 1992, voter anger helped retire or defeat 77 incumbents with overdrafts on the House bank - and gave insurgent Republicans momentum to win control of the House in 1994.

For many members, kiting checks had been a perk of the job, like cheap haircuts or the franking privilege that allows them to send mail for free through the postal system. To the public, it was a signal that lawmakers didn't play by the rules they required of everyone else.

The stakes in the current corruption scandal run even deeper. At issue is whether lawmakers can be bought: exchanging favors for cash, luxury golf outings, a skybox seat at sporting events, or free meals.

Last week, a federal judge in Florida delayed sentencing former lobbyist Jack Abramoff until June, to give federal prosecutors more time with him to investigate corruption on Capitol Hill.

Mr. Abramoff's plea agreement cited only one lawmaker, Rep. Bob Ney (R) of Ohio - and not by name - as involved in corruption. But others with links to Abramoff are also paying a political price. This week, Sen. Conrad Burns (R) of Montana drew a strong GOP primary challenger, who cited Mr. Burns's ties to Abramoff as a reason for getting into the race. It fuels speculation that Burns will soon announce his retirement.

In another high-profile case, a Texas appeals court heard arguments this week on whether to reinstate a conspiracy charge against Rep. Tom DeLay (R), who resigned as House majority leader after indictment last September on campaign money laundering charges. Mr. DeLay, too, has drawn the strongest reelection challenge of his career. And Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R) of California was recently sentenced to eight years in prison for bribery.

Despite the headlines, reform proposals face an uphill battle in both the House and Senate. In February, the House took a first step by revoking floor and gym privileges for former members who are lobbyists. A pending GOP leadership draft imposes stricter lobbyist disclosure requirements. It also requires committee reports to identify the sponsors of earmarks - a move that makes it harder for lawmakers like former Representative Cunningham to slip favors for, say, defense contractors into spending bills.

But GOP leaders are at odds over proposed limits on privately funded travel. While Speaker Dennis Hastert favored a ban on all privately funded travel, the new majority leader, Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, and many GOP backbenchers opposed it. A draft GOP proposal would suspend such travel until January 2007.

"A lot of members have reacted negatively to the discussion draft, because it's going to result in a hard-to-defend status quo for the next seven months," says Michael Franc, vice president for governmental affairs at the Heritage Foundation. "At the same time, it's going to ban privately funded travel hosted by educational entities - the kind of educationally oriented travel that the average voter thinks is appropriate."

On the Senate side, there's support for more frequent lobbyist disclosure - including, for the first time, electronic disclosure. But many are chafing at blanket travel restrictions.

"Seventy percent of our cities and villages can be accessed only by air - and that very infrequently. Why should taxpayers pay when there is a corporate plane going with an empty seat - as long as it's disclosed," says Sen. Ted Stevens (R) of Alaska.

The key to whatever is passed will be enforcement, public-interest groups say. "In the end, what is going to be judged is whether there is enforcement of the laws. The key is disclosure and transparency," says Larry Noble, outgoing director of the Center for Responsive Politics.

Espionage Law's Merits Tied Into Ex-Lobbyists' Case (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

The federal judge presiding over the prosecution of two former lobbyists has focused attention on the imprecise nature of the law they are charged with breaking, the 1917 Espionage Act that restricts the dissemination of national defense information that could harm U.S. interests.

In January, U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III raised the possibility that the law may not be sensibly written, as he sentenced a former Defense Department employee, Lawrence A. Franklin, to 12 years in prison for giving classified information to the two former lobbyists for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, or AIPAC.

Despite the law's possible shortcomings, Ellis said in an unusual statement from the bench, it is up to Congress, not the court, to decide if the statute needs to be changed.

"The law says what it says," Ellis said. "The merits of the law really are committed to Congress. If it's not sensible, it ought to be changed. But they're . . . the body that changes it, not the judiciary."

Today, attorneys for the former lobbyists, Steve Rosen and Keith Weissman, will argue for dismissal of the indictment based in part on the claim that the Espionage Act was meant to cover spying, not the possession of leaked classified information, particularly leaked information possessed and transmitted by people who are not government employees. As stated in their Jan. 19 motion, attorneys say what Rosen and Weissman are charged with "is what members of the media, members of the Washington policy community, lobbyists and members of congressional staffs do perhaps hundreds of times every day."

The Espionage Act makes it illegal for an unauthorized person to have "unlawful possession" of "information relating to the national defense." As written, it does not require that such information be classified. To break the law, the people involved must also believe the information "could be used to the injury of the United States and to the advantage of any foreign nation." It also makes it illegal for people with such "unlawful possession" to communicate such information if they have "reason to believe" it could injure the United States or aid another country.

In response to the Rosen-Weissman motion, the Justice Department attorneys said in their motion that the defendants have doctorates and "would know that foreign officials, journalists and other persons with no current affiliation with the United States government would not be entitled to receive information related to our national defense."

Last August, in announcing the indictment, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty, then the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia, said there was "a clear line in the law," and "those not authorized to receive classified information must resist the temptation to acquire it, no matter what their motivation may be."

The AIPAC case, which represents the first time nongovernment employees have been prosecuted under the 89-year-old Espionage Act for receiving leaks from a government official, has drawn increasing attention from First Amendment advocates and others concerned that it represents a sharp break from Justice Department practices.

At Franklin's sentencing, Ellis said any debate over the statute and "whether it's a sensible law" was "irrelevant" to Franklin's situation because he had clearly violated it. "That doesn't mean we shouldn't debate whether the law is a good law or not, as a people," he said, adding, "It doesn't mean that Congress shouldn't consider it. It's not for the court to say."

Happy Doomsday To You! (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Washington was about one horseman short of an apocalypse yesterday.

It began with a breakfast meeting in a Senate office building where, over fruit salad and bagels, government and academic experts discussed the coming avian flu pandemic. "Currently it has a fatality rate of 56 percent," reported Nancy Cox, flu expert with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. "An increasing number of countries have reported human cases. The severe cases are really quite severe."

Pointing to slides of some nasty chest X-rays, she added: "Death from this particular pathogen is not a pleasant death."

Next: the mid-morning news conference on mad cow disease at the National Press Club. There, a beef producer explained why he is suing the government for not letting him test his cattle for bovine spongiform encephalopathy, an "invariably fatal, progressive, incurable, neurodegenerative disease" that can be transmitted to people. The feds say the testing is unnecessary, but the rancher, John Stewart, warned that "BSE is not understood enough today to really come to scientific conclusions."

For those who still had an appetite, there was a luncheon meeting of the National Economists Club at the Chinatown Garden restaurant on H Street, where Congressional Budget Office economist Bob Shackleton was explaining the "high-end" global-warming projections, which have Earth's temperature growing by five degrees Celsius -- nine degrees Fahrenheit -- this century.

"That five degrees centigrade is the equivalent of the change that happened since the end of the last glaciation 18,000 years ago to now," he told the economists as they munched on fortune cookies and orange wedges. "Eighteen thousand years ago, there was a mile of ice over New York City and you could walk 100 miles out into the ocean and still be on land."

Have a nice doomsday? Possibly. When President Bush went to Cleveland on Monday, a questioner asked him about a claim "that members of your administration have reached out to prophetic Christians who see the war in Iraq and the rise of terrorism as signs of the apocalypse. Do you believe this, that the war in Iraq and the rise of terrorism are signs of the apocalypse?"

"I haven't really thought of it that way," the president said. "The first I've heard of that, by the way."

But maybe not the last, if yesterday's collection of end-of-days warnings was any indication.

On the fourth floor of the Russell Building on Capitol Hill, public health experts were so perplexed by the bird flu that they had trouble setting up the presentation. The start was delayed for about 15 minutes as organizers debated where best to place the lectern (Q: "Where do you suggest?" A: "Where do you suggest?").

Once underway, the experts, assembled by the Center for Strategic and International Studies, displayed a number of slides, some frightening (675,000 Americans dead from the 1918 flu), some technical ("vestigial esterase E region"), and some merely drawings of ducks, geese, pigs, horses and seals. But the message was, as pathologist Jeffrey Taubenberger of the Armed Forces Institute of Pathology put it, "we really don't understand a lot."

"If we take everything we know about influenza virology now, take everything I know about influenza virology now, and formulate a model of the next pandemic, it would look like this," Taubenberger said as he displayed a large question mark on the screen.

In fact, Taubenberger had evidence that the bird flu might have some difficulty mutating to a human form. But that did not entirely satisfy David Nabarro, the U.N. coordinator for influenza. "It's a very virulent and horrible virus," he said. "It has also moved into 20 countries during the last six weeks and I just checked the reports this morning: Overnight we have reports of it moving into the Gaza Strip and also moving into settlements in the West Bank."

Nabarro spoke of "mounting concern" across the world. "We are very vulnerable," he warned. "Most of us, I think, feel that it's best to be preparing to hunker down."

At the press club, John Stewart of Creekstone Farms Premium Beef was all done hunkering. Explaining his lawsuit against the Agriculture Department, he said the government wasn't testing enough animals for mad cow disease, so he wanted to do it himself. Stewart, just in from Kansas, said he was "surprised" USDA had cut back on testing. Sounding much like the influenza scientists, he said there are "question marks today about the science of this matter," and, besides, "consumers want the beef tested."

It was time for lunch in Chinatown. The CBO's Shackleton stood at a microphone stand in the middle of a room decorated by plastic and cardboard trinkets, as if delivering a toast to the economists assembled at banquet tables. There, the economist said something the Bush administration can't bring itself to say: "The problem of climate change stems mainly from the use of fossil fuels by human beings."

Shackleton said the likely temperature increase this century would be between one and five degrees Celsius, and the average rise in sea levels one to three feet. There is, he continued, "also the possibility of relatively abrupt shifts where the climate system could experience a dramatic shift."

The good news: We "won't be alive when most of the effectsoccur," he said.

The bad news: We all will have succumbed to bird flu and mad cow disease.

Letter To The Secretary (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

Dear John Snow, secretary of the Treasury:

I'm glad that you've started talking about income inequality, which in recent years has reached levels not seen since before World War II. But if you want to be credible on the subject, you need to make some changes in your approach.

DOJ_NMG_0020765

First, you shouldn't claim, as you seemed to earlier this week, that there's anything meaningful about the decline in some measures of inequality between 2000 and 2003. Every economist realizes that, as The Washington Post put it, "much of the decline in inequality during that period reflected the popping of the stock market bubble," which led to a large but temporary fall in the incomes of the richest Americans.

We don't have detailed data for more recent years yet, but the available indicators suggest that after 2003, incomes at the top and the overall level of inequality came roaring back. That surge in inequality explains why, despite your best efforts to talk up the economic numbers, most Americans are unhappy with the Bush economy.

I find it helpful to illustrate what's going on with a hypothetical example: say 10 middle-class guys are sitting in a bar. Then the richest guy leaves, and Bill Gates walks in.

Because the richest guy in the bar is now much richer than before, the average income in the bar soars. But the income of the nine men who aren't Bill Gates hasn't increased, and no amount of repeating "But average income is up!" will convince them that they're better off.

Now think about what happened in 2004 (the figures for 2005 aren't in yet, but it was almost certainly more of the same). The economy grew reasonably fast in 2004, but most families saw little if any improvement in their financial situation.

Instead, a small fraction of the population got much, much richer. For example, Forbes tells us that the compensation of chief executives at the 500 largest corporations rose 54 percent in 2004. In effect, Bill Gates walked into the bar. Average income rose, but only because of rising incomes at the top.

Speaking of executive compensation, Mr. Snow, it hurts your credibility when you say, as you did in a recent interview, that soaring pay for top executives reflects their productivity and that we should "trust the marketplace." Executive pay isn't set in the marketplace; it's set by boards that the executives themselves appoint. And executives' pay often bears little relationship to their performance.

You yourself, as you must know, are often cited as an example. When you were appointed to your present job, Forbes pointed out that the performance of the company you had run, CSX, was "middling at best." Nonetheless, you were "by far the highest-paid chief in the industry."

And the business careers of other prominent members of the administration, including the president and vice president, seem to demonstrate the truth of the adage that it's not what you know, it's who you know. So my advice on the question of executive pay is: don't go there.

Finally, you should stop denying that the Bush tax cuts favor the wealthy. I know that administration number-crunchers have produced calculations purporting to show that the tax cuts were tilted toward the middle class. But using the right measure — the effect of the tax cuts on after-tax income — the bias toward the haves and have-mores is unmistakable.

According to the nonpartisan Tax Policy Center, once the Bush tax cuts are fully phased in, they will raise the after-tax income of middle-income families by 2.3 percent. But they will raise the after-tax income of people like yourself, with incomes of more than $1 million, by 7.3 percent.

And those calculations don't take into account the indirect effects of tax cuts. If the tax cuts are made permanent, they'll eventually have to be offset by large spending cuts. In practical terms, that means cuts where the money is: in Social Security and Medicare benefits. Since middle-income Americans will feel the brunt of these cuts, yet received a relatively small tax break, they'll end up worse off. But the wealthy will be left considerably wealthier.

Of course, my suggestions about how to improve your credibility would force you to stop repeating administration talking points. But you're the secretary of the Treasury. Your job is to make economic policy, not to spout propaganda. Oh, wait.

Analyzing A Downfall (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

I have to admit that when Claude Allen was arrested a couple of weeks ago for allegedly stealing merchandise from discount stores, my first reaction was pure schadenfreude. Until his resignation last month for the standard Washington non-reason -- to spend more time with his family -- Allen had been the highest-ranking African American on the White House staff, the president's top domestic policy adviser. I think it was "Saturday Night Live" that first came out with the obvious joke: Who knew that George W. Bush had a domestic policy adviser?

Would it be fair to cheer Allen's downfall just because he held a highly visible post in an administration that is reviled by most African Americans? No, but there's more: He made his name in black conservative circles by serving as a top aide to Jesse Helms, the old buzzard from North Carolina. I can't say anything else about Helms that's suitable for a family newspaper, so I'll just quote my colleague David S. Broder, who once called him "the last prominent unabashed white racist politician in this country."

Helms, you will recall, railed against a federal holiday for the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. at a time when even old Strom Thurmond had gone over to the other side. Allen later said that was a "difficult" period in his association with Helms, but apparently not too difficult.

As if that weren't enough, during a bitter 1984 campaign Allen was caught spreading smarmy innuendo about Helms's opponent, Gov. James Hunt Jr., whispering to a reporter that Hunt was vulnerable because of links "with the queers."

So, yes, when Allen was arrested on felony theft charges, my first reaction was smug satisfaction. But then I told myself: Don't hate. The proper reaction is pity, on every level.

Police allege that on several occasions, Allen did the following: He went into a Target store near his home in the Maryland suburbs and bought some merchandise, then went to another Target, loaded a Target shopping bag with identical items and used the receipt from the first store to "return" the items for a refund -- in effect, getting a bunch of stuff for nothing.

The most expensive item Allen is alleged to have stolen is a $525 Bose home theater system; mostly, he's charged with taking cheap items such as a $60 jacket and a $25 pair of pants. Police say they have documented 25 instances of theft, and while the total value of the merchandise adds up to more than $5,000 -- and makes the alleged thefts a felony -- we're still talking small potatoes.

If what the police say is true, this graduate of Duke University Law School wasn't much of a criminal mastermind. Hadn't he ever heard of inventory control, or wondered what those ubiquitous bar codes are for? And why would a man who met several times a week with the president of the United States, and who earned $161,000 a year, risk everything to steal an $88 radio?

It sounds like a cry for help, and I have no idea what went so wrong in Allen's life. But I can imagine some of the strains and contradictions he had to live with.

I have respect for principled black conservatives -- I think they're wrong about many things, but I respect their right to be wrong. It's a fact of life, though, that they are isolated from the larger African American community by their political views. At times it must be very lonely.

And since black conservatives with credentials like Claude Allen's are relatively rare, they are in great demand and tend to rise fast. They have to balance their genuine political beliefs against the fact that the Jesse Helmses of the world love to have them around as window dressing so they can say, "Look, I'm not racist; here's this black person on my staff."

You could rationalize working for someone like Helms by telling yourself that you could do more good for the African American community from the inside, next to the seat of power, than from the outside. You could tell yourself you were advancing the interests of black people, even if most black people disagreed. You could ignore racism or pretend it was something else. You could tell yourself that you were making compromises and sacrifices for the greater good.

Finally, you could arrive at the White House, with a big job and regular access to the president. But it might be a White House where all the big decisions were made by just a few people, and you weren't one of them.

Then what?

Existing-home Sales Take Surprising Jump (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, March 24, 2006

Sales of existing homes rose an unexpected 5.2% last month, ending a five-month losing streak, as buyers took advantage of warm weather and kicked off the spring home-shopping season early, the National Association of Realtors said Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0020767

March, typically a strong month, is also looking good in many regions, boosting the case for a soft landing rather than a sudden plunge, in the hottest real estate markets. Early tallies from a dozen major cities across the country signal a buoyant March, though still below the levels of a year ago.

"There may be more demand out there than people who crunched the numbers had expected," said John Karevoll of DataQuick, who analyzed the sales reported so far this month for USA TODAY.

Even in Southern California, where doomsayers have predicted the market will tank, home sales remain healthy.

"What I'm seeing from the trenches is March is looking normal: Inventory has leveled off, and sales are steady," says Phil Romero, CEO of Century 21 Award-Superstars, which has offices in that region. "There are real negotiations on both sides, concessions by both parties."

Nevertheless, economists expect home sales to fall for the year overall, ending a five-year feeding frenzy for housing.

"It's a nice rebound, but we have to discount some of this because of the warm weather, particularly in the Northeast," said David Lereah, the NAR's chief economist. "We may give a little of this back in the next month or two."

Lereah has lowered his sales forecast for the year to a 5.7% drop because mortgage rates are rising faster than expected.

In February, buyers had to pay an average of 6.25% on a conventional 30-year, fixed-rate mortgage, up from 6.15% in January, according to Freddie Mac.

Home sales last month hit a seasonally adjusted annual pace of 6.91 million, down from January's upwardly revised rate of 6.57 million. The sales were red-hot in the Northeast, rising about 19%. In the Midwest, sales jumped 11%, followed by the West with a 5% increase. Only the South saw sales decline, falling nearly 3%.

"It was a little stronger than expected," said Nick Buss of PNC Bank.

The Commerce Department will release February's new-home sales today, and Buss said, "Given what we just saw out of existing-home sales, I wouldn't be surprised to see new-home sales slightly higher than January."

Nationwide, the median home price — half cost more, half less — was $209,000, up nearly 11% from February 2005. The condo market recovered from a dismal January, up about 9%. The median price: $214,300, up nearly 4% from last year.

Defying Trend, An Upturn In Home Sales (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

Sales of existing homes unexpectedly surged in February after falling for five months in a row, the National Association of Realtors reported yesterday, reflecting a lift related to unseasonably warm weather and signaling that the housing market is healthier than some experts had suggested.

Sales climbed 5.2 percent last month, to an annual pace of 6.91 million homes, after falling 8.9 percent in the previous five months. The nationwide median price — the point at which half the homes sold for more and half for less — climbed 10.6 percent from a year earlier, to $209,000.

The number of homes for sale, however, continued to climb, rising by 5.2 percent, to 3.03 million, which at the current pace of sales amounts to a 5.3-month supply of homes.

Analysts, who had expected sales to fall to a pace of 6.5 million, cautioned that the increase could not yet be considered a turning point. Several other real estate gauges, including mortgage applications, interest rates and pending home sales, have indicated that sales are slowing.

An unusually warm January appears to have played some role in the sharp increase in sales. Warmer weather allows more people to venture out, and sellers often use the opportunity to hold open houses. The association counts homes as sold at the closing, which typically happens one to two months after contracts are signed.

Sales jumped 19.2 percent in the Northeast, the biggest monthly increase ever recorded for the region, and 11.1 percent in the Midwest, the largest increase since 1992. Sales in the West climbed a more modest 5.1 percent, and they fell 2.5 percent in the South.

Some analysts say the surge in February could mean home sales will be softer later this spring. Since August, sales of existing homes have fallen 4.2 percent. Mortgage applications for home purchases have fallen by about 16 percent in the last 12 months, according to the Mortgage Bankers Association of America.

Home prices were higher than last year in all regions but were rising at a slower pace than they were last year, especially compared with the peak spring and summer months, when it was not unusual to see increases of 13 percent to 15 percent nationally.

Agents and analysts report that prices have dropped in some hot markets, and that appeared to be attracting some buyers who had been wary of local housing bubbles.

"Before, we had lots of people who were looking, but they said they weren't going to buy because they said prices were going to go down," said Chobee Hoy, an agent in Brookline, Mass., near Boston. "And now we find ourselves in a very healthy market where people are not only looking at properties but making offers."

Others say they expect sales to remain strong in the coming months. "It was quiet, but the last few weeks have been brisk," said Bob Moulton, a mortgage broker on Long Island.

Sales of condominiums and co-ops, which fell more than single-family home sales in the last few months, were up 8.8 percent in February, while sales of single-family homes were up 4.7 percent.

Separately, the Labor Department reported that claims for unemployment insurance fell by 11,000, to 302,000, for the week that ended March 18. The number of outstanding claims for the week that ended on March 11, however, rose by 38,000, to 2.5 million. That was down by 7.5 percent from the comparable week a year earlier.

Home Sales Jump By 5.2%, Helped By Warm Weather (WSJ)

By Kemba J. Dunham

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

Sales of previously occupied homes jumped in February, but economists suspect that the data were distorted by unusually warm weather in some parts of the country.

The National Association of Realtors said sales of existing homes -- including single-family houses, townhouses, condominiums and cooperatives -- increased 5.2% to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.91 million units in February. That is up from an upwardly revised pace of 6.57 million units in January. Sales of existing homes account for about 85% of the residential market.

David Lereah, the Realtors' chief economist, said warm weather in January prompted home buyers to shop in a month of normally scant sales. The Realtors' figures count home sales based on closings; many home sales that closed in February, were initiated in January. "Spring selling season started a little earlier because of the warm weather," Mr. Lereah said, "but I expect the numbers to come down a bit in the next few months."

Existing-home sales rose 19.2% in the Northeast and 11.1% in the Midwest -- areas where weather was unseasonably warm. Sales were up 5.1% in the West and declined 2.5% in the South.

Mortgage applications, an indicator of future home purchases, declined sharply last week, according to the Mortgage Bankers Association. The group's seasonally adjusted index of loan applications for home purchases stood at 393.6 in the week ended March 17, down 26% from the peak in June 2005.

At the same time, inventories of homes on the market continued to rise. The Realtors said there were 3.03 million existing homes available for sale at the end of February, up 5.2% from January. At the current sales pace, it would take 5.3 months to sell all homes available for sale. The last time inventories exceeded 5.1 months of sales was April 2003, when they reached 5.12 months of sales.

According to the Realtors' report, the national median price of an existing home for all housing types was $209,000 in February, up 10.6% from $189,000 a year earlier.

The reason for the sharp year-to-year median-price increase isn't clear. In some cases, it could reflect a changing mix of homes being sold. As mortgage rates rise, some lower-income home buyers may be priced out of the market, lifting average prices. According to Freddie Mac, the average rate on a 30-year conventional fixed-rate mortgage was 6.25% in February, up from 6.15% in January and 5.63% in February 2005.

Some economists note that because Realtors data look at year-to-year price comparisons, it is too early to see more recent price changes.

Separately, the Labor Department said the number of U.S. workers filing first-time applications for unemployment benefits declined 11,000 to 302,000 for the week ended March 18. The previous week's revised figure was 313,000. The four-week moving average was 303,500, an increase of 6,000 from the previous week's revised average of 297,500.

Black Gold Puts Blue Chips In Red (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

Stocks ran up against a familiar foe Thursday: higher interest rates and oil prices.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average slid 47.14 points to 11270.29. The Dow Jones Transportation Average, which has been knocking against all-time highs, shed 2% amid a spike in oil prices. Airline stocks such as AMR, parent of American Airlines, and railroad companies such as Norfolk Southern led the decliners.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slid 3.37 to 1301.67 and the Nasdaq Composite Index fell by 3.20 to 2300.15.

Light, sweet crude surged $2.14 to $63.91 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange after oil traders continued to respond to a Wednesday report by the Energy Department that crude inventories declined last week.

Other factors likely driving energy prices higher were concerns about demand as the summer driving season nears and worries about supply disruptions from the threat of hurricane season, which starts in June.

Treasury bonds declined, sending yields higher, after a report by the National Association of Realtors showed existing-home sales in February rose by 5.2% to an annual rate of 6.91 million, higher than the 6.5-million pace expected.

The report boosted housing stocks, but the strong data raised concerns on Wall Street that the Federal Reserve may keep boosting short-term rates higher than most investors hope. The Philadelphia Housing Sector Index gained 2.1%.

Analysts said investors are becoming increasingly sensitive to interest rates as next week's meeting by the Fed draws closer. The Federal Open Market Committee meets on Monday and Tuesday and will issue the first decision on rates under new Fed chairman, Ben Bernanke.

"The uncertainty level is high ahead of Tuesday's FOMC meeting, so people are prone to more skittishness than normal," said Michael Panzner, head of sales trading at Rabo Securities USA.

Policy makers are widely expected to push up rates by a quarter percentage point to 4.75%, and investors will pay close attention to the accompanying statement for hints about plans for future monetary policy. Most market participants expect the Fed to boost rates one more time to 5% at their next meeting in May, then stop. But with the strong housing data, and the potential for other reports indicating a solid underpinning to the U.S. economy, investors remain uncertain about the potential for even more increases to rates.

"People are just confused, especially with the Fed meeting coming up next week," said Kenneth Tower, chief market strategist at CyberTrader. "The question about how much we have to worry about inflation and how much the Fed has to worry about inflation is the push-pull in the market today."

In another economic report, the Labor Department said that workers filing for unemployment claims fell 11,000 last week, more than expected. The four-week average of jobless claims rose above 300,000 for the first time in 10 weeks, indicating some softness in the labor market.

Meanwhile, shares of Adobe Systems fell nearly 1% after it issued a quarterly financial forecast after the bell yesterday that, at the low end, fell short of analysts' estimates. Shares of Yahoo climbed 3.5% after UBS upgraded the on-line search engine to "buy" from "neutral," citing valuation, the strength of branded advertising and potential to monetize searches.

In major market action:

Stocks declined. On the New York Stock Exchange, where 1.5 billion shares traded, 1,608 stocks rose and 1,681 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2 billion shares traded, 1,607 rose and 1,408 declined.

DOJ_NMG_0020770

Bonds fell. The benchmark 10-year Treasury slid 9/32 point, or $2.81 for every $1,000 invested, to yield 4.741%. The 30-year bond lost 14/32 to yield 4.753%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar advanced. It traded at 117.94 yen, up from 116.90 yen late Wednesday, while the euro fell to $1.1973 from $1.2075.

Shares Slide As Price Of Oil Feeds Fears Of Higher Rates (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

Stocks fell yesterday after oil prices jumped and an increase in home sales added to concern that the Federal Reserve might keep lifting interest rates. The Dow Jones industrial average had its biggest loss in about three weeks.

Transportation shares tumbled amid crude oil's biggest advance this month and a lower profit forecast at YRC Worldwide, one of the largest American truckers.

The Dow fell 47.14 points, or 0.4 percent, to 11,270.29, retreating from the highest level since May 2001. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index lost 3.37 points, or 0.3 percent, to 1,301.67. The Nasdaq composite index slid 3.20 points, or 0.1 percent, to 2,300.15.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note was 4.73 percent, up from 4.70 percent. The price, which moves in the opposite direction, fell 9/32, to 98 5/32.

Remarks by the Fed chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, and a report on producer prices have increased speculation this week that the Fed will keep raising rates. Yesterday's data reinforced that concern.

The National Association of Realtors said sales of existing homes in February rose 5.2 percent, to an annual rate of 6.91 million. New-home sales figures are due today.

A separate report showed that first-time claims for unemployment benefits had dropped for the first time in four weeks, further suggesting economic strength.

Fed policy makers meet next week and may increase rates for a 15th consecutive time. The Fed's benchmark lending rate stands at 4.5 percent.

Crude oil for May delivery surged $2.14, or 3.5 percent, to $63.91 a barrel, its biggest gain this month. The Energy Department said Wednesday that inventories fell unexpectedly.

YRC Worldwide, which changed its name this year from the Yellow Roadway Corporation, plunged $6.73, or 15 percent, to $38.56. The company expects first-quarter profit of 65 cents to 70 cents a share, down from its January forecast of $1 to $1.05, because of a drop in orders from retailers and price competition.

Ryder System, the truck-leasing company, lost $1.35, to $44.56. Norfolk Southern, the railroad, slipped $1.84, to $52.89.

Carnival fell $2.54, or 5.1 percent, to $47.49, for one of the biggest retreats in the S.& P. 500. Carnival, the cruise operator, said first-quarter profit dropped 19 percent and it cut its annual forecast because of higher fuel costs.

KB Home rose $3.23, or 5 percent, to $67.82 for one of the biggest gains in the S.& P. 500. The company said fiscal first-quarter profit was $2.02 a share. Analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial had expected $1.96 for the quarter, which ended in February. KB Home also said orders fell 12 percent as rising mortgage rates cooled demand.

Jabil Circuit rose $4.51, or 12 percent, to $42.75. The company forecast profit this quarter of 43 cents a share on sales of as much as $2.6 billion.

Yahoo and Level 3 Communications rallied after analyst upgrades. Yahoo gained $1.08, to $31.83. Level 3 surged 57 cents, to $4.01.

Adobe Systems, the maker of graphic-design software, fell 29 cents, to $36.33. The company said sales in the fiscal second quarter would be $640 million to $670 million.

The forecast from Adobe followed Microsoft's announcement this week that it would delay the new version of its Windows software program. Microsoft lost 30 cents, or 1.1 percent, to $26.85.

Bernanke Says Dollar Risk From Less Capital Not `Worrisome' (BLOOM)

By Scott Lanman

DOJ_NMG_0020771

Bloomberg, March 24, 2006

March 23 (Bloomberg) -- Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said a possible decline in the dollar because of less foreign investment wouldn't have a ``worrisome'' effect on the U.S. economy.

Bernanke said it isn't clear that faster economic growth in emerging markets would cause investors to shift capital to those countries and away from the U.S. Should that happen, ``it might be associated with a decline in the value of the dollar and a narrowing of the U.S. trade deficit,'' Bernanke wrote in a March 21 letter to Representative Harold Ford Jr., a Tennessee Democrat, which was released today.

Neither of those events, though, ``would be likely to threaten U.S. growth or boost inflation and interest rates to a worrisome extent.''

Overseas investors increased their holdings of U.S. stocks, bonds and other securities by a record $868 billion last year, which was equal to almost 7 percent of the economy, according to the Treasury Department. A decade ago, foreign investment in U.S. securities was a net $133 billion, or 1.8 percent of gross domestic product.

``Regardless of the future evolution of the dollar, the trade deficit, and the global economy, the Federal Reserve will continue to focus its policies on maintaining stable prices and maximum sustainable employment in the United States,'' Bernanke wrote.

The letter is one of a series of responses to lawmakers who requested additional comments from Bernanke after he testified before House and Senate committees Feb. 15-16. Bernanke, a former economics professor, succeeded Alan Greenspan as central bank chief on Feb. 1.

Consumer Loans

In another part of his response to Ford, Bernanke acknowledged that the series of increases in the Fed's benchmark interest rate haven't necessarily made it tougher for consumers and companies to get loans.

``The available evidence suggests that credit standards and a number of non-price lending terms for both households and businesses have eased,'' Bernanke wrote.

Bernanke told another lawmaker this week, Democratic Representative Brad Sherman of California, that the trade deficit needn't cause a ``precipitous decline'' in the dollar's value, though the ``possibility of a future disruptive correction of the U.S. trade deficit cannot be ruled out.''

All Rise, Rock And Roll (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

They look like a bunch of mobsters.

They wear dark suits and darker sunglasses, have nicknames like Trash Can and Top Dog and brag about how they fought the law (and the law won).

The thing is: They are the law.

Stoic stewards of the Constitution by day in D.C. Superior Court, they are by night (or weekend, or whenever they feel the urge) Deaf Dog and the Indictments -- a guitar-heavy group of seven music-loving judges, anchored by the lone civilian among them, a ponytailed shrink on drums.

They aren't picky about where they play. All they ask for is a little space and a little bit of love.

The love might take some work tonight, when the band is to perform at the Fraternal Order of Police lodge -- in front of a crowd of cops, prosecutors and defense lawyers.

But it was in plentiful supply last weekend, when the band played its first show in months -- at the Armed Forces Retirement Home.

Strutting onto the stage Saturday afternoon in Blues Brothers-black, Dawgg (aka Judge William Jackson) and the rest of the Indictments had more space than they needed -- 100 or so people were spread out in an auditorium built for lots more.

"Let the good times roll," Dawgg announced, launching into the classic from B.B. King, as Dennis "Red Dog" Doyle on lead guitar let out a howl of approval.

DOJ_NMG_0020772

It was to be a trip back to the 1950s and '60s, with the music of Wilson Pickett, Ben E. King and, of course, The King himself.

Unsure what to make of their guests, more than a few of the retirement home's residents sat toward the back, as if they were at a Sunday service they feared might go on too long. Dancing in the aisles they were not, but with each song, the restlessness seemed to fade just a little bit.

Even a few fellow judges turned out, eager to see how the band had progressed since its debut last spring during a talent show at the judges' annual retreat.

No one had expected that gag gig in Cumberland, Md., to be the beginning of anything. But then something clicked. Russ "Top Dog" Canan, who had started it all, sent out an e-mail. Did anyone want to keep playing?

All they had were a couple of songs and a curious name, hatched in an early rehearsal, when a few of the musicians thought they had found a real fan -- Canan's German shepherd, Chapin, who was never put off by the racket that chased everyone else away. Canan had to break it to his brethren that Chapin was deaf. But he didn't doubt her devotion, and so was born the name, Deaf Dog and the Indictments.

Maybe it was the pangs of middle and not-so-middle age sounding a call to their inner youth. Or perhaps they wanted a break from all the pain and conflict they see in court: the murder cases Canan tried as a judge in criminal court, the dysfunctional lives that Jackson saw as head of the domestic violence courts or just the indignity of having a deranged defendant hurl a trash can into your head, as happened to John Campbell when he was assigned to a criminal court.

Whatever it was, the band lived to play again, starting at D.C. Superior Court, where it was the surprise entertainment for the employee awards ceremony last fall. It was a home crowd, to be sure, but even so, before long, the judges had hundreds of court employees clapping their hands and tapping their feet -- and asking themselves, "Who are these guys?"

Canan, now in civil court, was on rhythm guitar. So was John "Cartwheel" McCabe, who hears abuse and neglect cases. Doyle, who hears child support claims, was joined on lead guitar by Bill "Blue Dog" Nooter, who hears abuse and neglect cases.

Jackson, who dabbled in song as a college student, was lead vocalist for most of the band's set, pitching in with harmonica and tambourine when he was not singing. "Trash Can" Campbell, who sits in family court as well, was on bass guitar. Frank "Professor" Burgess, who hears probate and tax cases, was behind the keyboard.

And Marc Feldman, aka "Houndog," the ponytailed psychologist, was on drums. An old friend of Canan's from their days in a garage band two decades ago, Feldman was the drummer the group realized it would need if it was going to make a go of this thing.

Very much the producer, Feldman has made his home the band's clubhouse, and on a recent Sunday night the ground floor was a swarm of amplifiers, electrical cords and half-empty pizza boxes.

The beat of Van Morrison's "Brown Eyed Girl" drifted onto the quiet Northwest Washington street. "We knew we had arrived when one of the neighbors complained," joked Jackson, the front man whose fellow band members say has the soul of Otis Redding and the shtick of Jackie Mason.

For the judges, it's about fun. They can't play for money, or even for charity. So they play just to play, wherever they are welcome. The Washington Home, a nursing facility, was one stop on the tour. Children's Hospital was another.

"We all do outreach," Canan said, and that sense of civic obligation is part of it, he said. "And part of it is it's just fun, playing for folks, sharing the music."

Like the night a few months ago when they took the stage at the Grog and Tankard, the Glover Park tavern that is a regular stop for many up-and-coming bands.

For people who have such busy day jobs, they were surprisingly good, said Colin Hoss, the Grog's booking agent. "They had the entire crowd dancing," he said.

But those busy day jobs have a way of slowing down runaway success, and the band took a break for a few months. Emerging from their hiatus, Deaf Dog and the Indictments turned up at the Armed Forces Retirement Home to headline the home's spring break party.

There was Feldman roaring through Elvis's "Blue Suede Shoes," Jackson soulfully rendering Wilson Pickett's "Mustang Sally" and so on through a 12-song set.

James Hart, a 77-year-old retired Air Force administrator, had heard about a bunch of judges claiming they were going to play the blues and some rock-and-roll, and was decidedly skeptical. "I said, 'I got to see this,' " he said.

But by the end, the band had won Hart over.

"They're entertainers," Hart said after telling the judges the same thing. "I told them they can quit their day jobs and go on the road."

Women Wage Key Campaigns For Democrats (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

NARBERTH, Pa. — If the Democrats have their way, the 2006 Congressional elections will be the revenge of the mommy party.

Democratic women are running major campaigns in nearly half of the two dozen most competitive House races where their party hopes to pick up enough Republican seats to regain control of the House. Democratic strategists are betting that the voters' unrest and hunger for change — reflected consistently in public opinion polls — create the perfect conditions for their party's female candidates this year.

"In an environment where people are disgusted with politics in general, who represents clean and change?" asks Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "Women."

Republicans, who have prospered in recent elections by running as the guardians of national security and clearly hope to do so again, dismiss this theory. But it will ultimately be tested in places like this Philadelphia suburb, where Lois Murphy, a 43-year-old lawyer and Democratic activist, lost a Congressional campaign in 2004 by just two percentage points.

This time, as she challenges the same Republican incumbent, Representative Jim Gerlach, Ms. Murphy said in an interview in her campaign headquarters in Narberth, she senses an electorate that is "really, really" ready for change, tired of the ethics scandals, and convinced "that their government has been letting them down."

On whether her sex is a particular asset this year, Ms. Murphy replied, "I leave that to the political experts, which I am not."

But Ms. Murphy said that her agenda — ethics reform, fiscal responsibility, affordable health care, more sensitivity to the environment — was connecting with moderates in both political parties.

In another high-profile race, an open seat in Illinois's Sixth District in the Chicago suburbs, L. Tammy Duckworth, a former Army helicopter pilot who lost both legs in Iraq, locked up the Democratic nomination in a narrow primary victory on Tuesday — over another woman.

"It's about change on so many levels," said Ms. Duckworth of her campaign, which she said would focus heavily on the need to improve and expand health care. "If being a woman underscores that, makes it clear that I'm going to be an effective agent of change, that's great."

By the time it is over, this midterm election may offer some hints on the kind of climate that awaits Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York if she runs for president in 2008. At a time when voters have grown accustomed to women as secretary of state, House minority leader, governor (there are currently eight) and the like, this year's campaign could provide insight into the power of gender stereotypes that have been charted by scholars and political experts over many years.

In the 435-seat House of Representatives, there are 67 women, 43 of them Democrats, 24 Republicans.

The seats for which Democratic women are running this year are among the 24 held by Republicans that are classified by the Cook Political Report, an independent analyst, as either "tossups" or "lean Republican" — a key measure of competitiveness. That is a fluid list this early in the campaign; many candidates have yet to make it through their primaries, and many races are still in a state of flux.

But Amy Walter, who tracks House races for Cook, said, "If you look at the top Republican targets this year, the success of Democratic women candidates will be very important in determining the number of Democratic pickups."

A net shift of 15 seats to Democrats from Republicans would turn over control of the House.

DOJ_NMG_0020774

For all the enthusiasm on the Democratic side, experts say this will not be another 1992-style "year of the woman," the breakthrough year when the number of women in the House and Senate jumped by more than half. There simply are not enough competitive or open seats to make that kind of change likely.

But the Center for American Women and Politics, at Rutgers, says early data suggests an increase in the number of women running for open seats this year, fueled by the Democrats, although several of these women still face contested primaries. It is far easier for challengers to win an open seat than to oust an incumbent.

"It's not about how many women are running," said Ellen Malcolm, the president of Emily's List, the Democratic women's fund-raising organization. "It's about how many women are running where they have real opportunities to win."

Moreover, Democratic strategists hope to frame these midterm races as a classic change-versus-status-quo election — which, they say, makes women, running as outsiders against a "culture of corruption," the perfect messengers.

Celinda Lake, a Democratic pollster working for three female House candidates this year, said, "If you want to communicate change, honesty, cleaning up Washington, not the same old good old boys in Washington, women are very good at communicating that."

Officials at the Democratic campaign committee said that along with Emily's List and other women's groups, they had made a point of encouraging and recruiting women as candidates this year.

"This didn't just happen," Mr. Emanuel said.

Republicans profess to be unworried about the new wave of female candidates for what is often described, sometimes disparagingly, as the "mommy party." (Supposedly, in the shorthand of political positioning, Democrats are more concerned with nurturing, caring and domestic policy, while the Republicans care more about security.)

"I'm as worried about Rahm Emanuel's women as I am about Rahm Emanuel's vets," said Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, referring dismissively to another group of candidates Democrats have focused on this year.

Mr. Forti argued that "in our strategy every race is local, based on local issues," and he added, "It doesn't matter whether the candidate is man, woman, green, purple, orange, red, whatever."

That approach is echoed by Mark Campbell, political director of the Gerlach campaign in Pennsylvania, who said of his race, "It will be a competitive campaign, and Jim Gerlach will ultimately win because his position on important issues more closely reflects the voters of the Sixth District than Ms. Murphy's."

As for her sex, Mr. Campbell said, "I think anyone who would vote for Lois Murphy because she's a woman would vote for her just because she's the Democrat running."

In recent weeks, the Gerlach and the Murphy campaigns have been pushing competing ethics plans and trading accusations over who is truly committed to the cause.

Linda DiVall, a longtime Republican pollster who has worked for many female candidates, also notes that sex stereotypes cut both ways among voters. For example, female candidates are often seen as vulnerable on national security, Ms. DiVall said, which could be a problem in a post-Sept. 11 world. Ms. Lake, the Democratic pollster, said the sex advantages (like honesty) and disadvantages (competence on foreign policy) have grown more marginal.

"They're not as new as they used to be," Ms. Lake said of women in politics.

Republicans have some high-profile women running for Congress this year, notably Martha Rainville, who stepped aside as adjutant general of the Vermont National Guard to seek her state's lone House seat.

But this year's candidates are disproportionately Democrats, part of a longstanding trend, said Kathleen Dolan, political scientist and author of "Voting for Women: How the Public Evaluates Women Candidates."

Among the most closely watched Democratic women this year are Diane Farrell, challenging Representative Christopher Shays in Connecticut; Gabrielle Giffords and Patty Weiss, vying for the Democratic nomination for an open seat representing the Tucson area; Patricia Madrid, the New Mexico attorney general challenging Representative Heather A. Wilson; Ms. Duckworth, the Iraqi war veteran, seeking the open seat outside Chicago; Francine Busby, running for the California seat left vacant by the bribery conviction of former Representative Randy Cunningham, and Ms. Murphy, challenging Mr. Gerlach in Pennsylvania.

DOJ_NMG_0020775

Emily's List, which essentially recommends female candidates who support abortion rights to its 100,000 members, reports a much heavier roster of House races than it carried two years ago. Getting recommended by Emily's List, whose members were responsible for $10 million in donations in 2004, is a major help to a campaign, candidates say.

Swann, Rendell Running Even In Pennsylvania Race (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

Democratic Gov. Edward G. Rendell of Pennsylvania, once considered a shoo-in for a second term, is running dead even against Republican and former Pittsburgh Steelers standout Lynn Swann, according to recent polls.

Mr. Rendell, one of his party's few big state governors, was expected to have little trouble winning another four years in office, until the charismatic Football Hall of Fame wide receiver and ABC Sports commentator entered the contest in January, sweeping his rivals from the race for the GOP nomination and making the former Philadelphia mayor and national Democratic chairman look suddenly vulnerable.

An independent statewide survey last week by Atlanta-based Strategic Vision found the governor and Mr. Swann running neck and neck, drawing 44 percent each, with 10 percent undecided and 2 percent supporting others. Should Mr. Swann win, he would be the first black governor in the state's history.

"What you have in Swann is a celebrity, like Arnold Schwarzenegger had out in California, who doesn't come across as a typical politician. That's helping him quite a bit. People want to like him and he comes across as very likeable," said David E. Johnson, Strategic Vision's pollster.

Mr. Swann exudes the kind of nonpolitical, outsider persona that an increasingly unhappy electorate seems to be looking for, Mr. Johnson said yesterday.

Mr. Rendell has seen his voter-approval scores fall below 50 percent, after his disastrous signing of a legislator pay-raise bill last year that triggered protests from voters and was later rescinded.

No Pennsylvania governor since World War II has been denied a second term, and Mr. Rendell is an effective campaigner who has amassed a $12.5 million war chest, compared with Mr. Swann's $1.2 million. Elections analyst Stuart Rothenberg still gives Mr. Rendell the "narrow advantage for now," but last week, he told his monthly newsletter subscribers that the governor is "more vulnerable."

"No other gubernatorial candidate in the country received the worldwide recognition that Lynn Swann did when his former team, the Pittsburgh Steelers, won the Super Bowl" after Mr. Swann walked out on the field in the pre-game ceremony, Mr. Rothenberg said.

Two big questions about Mr. Swann are how he will perform as a first-time candidate and how much of the heavily Democratic black vote he can draw away from Mr. Rendell.

"Every politician has to motivate his base to win, and Swann's base is the black vote. You can't beat Rendell without breaking into the numbers in Philadelphia and the suburbs, and the obvious way to do that is to take the black vote," said Clay Richards, assistant director of the Quinnipiac University Poll.

Mr. Swann is forming a campaign team that includes political adviser Mark Holman, former chief of staff to Republican Gov. Tom Ridge, and communications strategist Leonardo Alcivar, who worked for former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

Mr. Swann is running on the issue of tax cuts, particularly property taxes that have become a dominant issue in Pennsylvania, but has not laid out his full agenda.

Researchers Look At Prayer And Healing (WP)

By Rob Stein

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

At the Fairfax Community Church in Virginia, the faithful regularly pray for ailing strangers. Same goes at the Adas Israel synagogue in Washington and the Islamic Center of Maryland in Gaithersburg.

In churches, mosques, ashrams, "healing rooms," prayer groups and homes nationwide, millions of Americans offer prayers daily to heal themselves, family, friends, co-workers and even people found through the Internet. Fueled by the upsurge in religious expression in the United States, prayer is the most common complement to mainstream medicine, far outpacing acupuncture, herbs, vitamins and other alternative remedies.

"Judaism, Christianity, Islam, Buddhism -- every religion believes in prayer for healing," said Paul Parker, a professor of theology and religion at Elmhurst College outside Chicago. "Some call it prayer, some call it cleansing the mind. The words or posture may vary. But in times of illness, all religions look towards their source of authority."

The outpouring of spiritual healing has inspired a small group of researchers to attempt to use the tools of modern science to test the power of prayer to cure others. The results have been mixed and highly controversial. Skeptics say the work is a deeply flawed and misguided waste of money that irresponsibly attempts to validate the supernatural with science. And some believers say it is pointless to try to divine the workings of God with experiments devised by mortals.

Proponents, however, maintain the research is valuable, given the large numbers of people who believe in the power of prayer to influence health. Surveys have found that perhaps half of Americans regularly pray for their own health, and at least a quarter have others pray for them.

"It's one of the most prevalent forms of healing. Open-minded scientists have a responsibility to look into this," said Marilyn J. Schlitz of the California Pacific Medical Center in San Francisco.

The contentious enterprise is at something of a crossroads. Two new studies are about to report no benefit of having people pray for the sick, the only study underway is nearing completion, and the largest, best-designed project is being published in two weeks. Its eagerly awaited findings could sound the death knell for the field, breathe new life into such efforts, or create new debate.

"I will guarantee you that study will have a very interesting impact on a lot of people's thinking," said Mitchell W. Krucoff of Duke University, who wrote an editorial that will accompany the closely guarded findings in the American Heart Journal. "But how you interpret the results will probably depend on your point of view."

Many studies done over the years indicate that the devout tend to be healthier. But the reasons remain far from clear. Healthy people may be more likely to join churches. The pious may lead more wholesome lifestyles. Churches, synagogues and mosques may help people take better care of themselves. The quiet meditation and incantations of praying, or the comfort of being prayed for, appears to lower blood pressure, reduce stress hormones, slow the heart rate and have other potentially beneficial effects.

But the most controversial research focuses on "intercessory" or "distant" prayer, which involves people trying to heal others through their intentions, thoughts or prayers, sometimes without the recipients knowing it. The federal government has spent $2.2 million in the past five years on studies of distant healing, which have also drawn support from private foundations.

San Francisco cardiologist Randolph Byrd, for example, conducted an experiment in which he asked born-again Christians to pray for 192 people hospitalized for heart problems, comparing them with 201 not targeted for prayer. No one knew which group they were in. He reported in 1988 that those who were prayed for needed fewer drugs and less help breathing.

William S. Harris of St. Luke's Hospital in Kansas City, Mo., and colleagues published similar results in 1999 from a study involving nearly 1,000 heart patients, about half of whom were prayed for without their knowledge.

But these and other studies have been called deeply flawed. They were, for example, analyzed in the most favorable way possible, looking at so many outcomes that the positive findings could easily have been the result of chance, critics say.

"It's called the sharpshooter's fallacy," said Richard Sloan, a behavioral researcher at Columbia University. "The sharpshooter empties the gun into the side of a barn and then draws the bull's-eye. In science, you have to predict in advance what effect you may have."

Other studies have been even more contentious, such as a 2001 project involving fertility patients that became mired in accusations of fraud.

"I would like to see us stop wasting precious research dollars putting religious practices to the test of science," Sloan said. "It's a waste of money, and it trivializes the religious experience."

Even some advocates of incorporating more prayer and spirituality into medicine agree.

DOJ_NMG_0020777

"I don't see how you could quantify prayer -- either the results of it or the substance of it," said the Rev. Raymond J. Lawrence of New York-Presbyterian Hospital/Columbia University Medical Center. "God is beyond the reach of science. It's absurd to think you could use it to examine God's play."

Perhaps most important, many scientists say, is that there is no rational explanation for how this kind of prayer might work.

"There's nothing we know about the physical universe that could account for how the prayers of someone in Washington, D.C., could influence the health of a group of people in Iowa -- nothing whatsoever," Sloan said.

But supporters say that much about medicine remains murky or is explained only over time. They say, for example, that it was relatively recently that scientists figured out how aspirin works, although it has been in use for centuries.

"Yesterday's science fiction often becomes tomorrow's science," said John A. Astin of the California Pacific Medical Center.

Proponents often cite a phenomenon from quantum physics, in which distant particles can affect each other's behavior in mysterious ways.

"When quantum physics was emerging, Einstein wrote about spooky interactions between particles at a distance," Krucoff said. "That's at least one very theoretical model that might support notions of distant prayer or distant healing."

Krucoff, a cardiologist, published a study last summer involving 748 heart patients at nine hospitals. That study failed overall to show any benefit. But Krucoff said he did find tantalizing hints that warrant follow-up: A subset of patients who had a second group of people praying that the prayers of the first group would be answered may have done better.

That underscores one of the many difficulties that critics and advocates say makes studying prayer problematic: There is no way to quantify the "dose," and no way to know whether people outside the study may be praying for its subjects, diluting the effects.

Two smaller, more recently completed studies illustrate yet another problem. Each involved about 150 patients with brain tumors or AIDS. Only some were targeted by "distant healing" and only some knew they were the recipients. But in addition to traditional prayers, many of the dozens of "healers" used other approaches, such as visualizing patients and sending a "healing intention" or "energy" or "light." Both studies, which will be published later this year, did not show any effect. But neither of the researchers who led them is advocating giving up, saying their studies may have been doomed by including too many healing variations.

The only ongoing study is also testing whether a spectrum of healers can help -- in this case, women who are recovering from reconstructive surgery after breast cancer. Doctors are inserting tiny tubes under the skin of about 90 women to measure the growth of collagen, which is necessary for healing, to see if those targeted by healers accumulate more than those who do not. The study will end this spring.

Krucoff and others say it is also important to study prayer as an adjunct -- not a replacement -- to standard medical care, to make sure it is safe.

"Human physiology is a very delicate equilibrium. When you throw energy you don't understand into this, it would be naive to think you could only do good," he said.

In the hope of shedding light on that and other questions, researchers are awaiting the results of the study led by Herbert Benson of Harvard University, which involved about 1,800 heart-bypass patients at six centers who were divided into three groups. Only some of them knew whether they were receiving prayer.

"What that study finds will help tell us which way to go -- whether there are intriguing findings or the book ought to be closed on this topic," said Harold Koenig of Duke University.

But researchers on both sides, as well as those who believe in prayer, say the results of that and other studies are unlikely to change many minds.

"I don't think it will alter my beliefs one way or the other," said Trish Lankowski, who started a healing room at Immanuel's Church in Silver Spring this past Sunday night. "I believe in the power of prayer wholeheartedly. I know it works."

Poor America (WSJ)

By Douglas Besharov

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0020778

Each year the Census Bureau calculates the nation's poverty rate, based on the number of people with incomes below the official poverty line, about $20,000 for a family of four in 2004. Since last year's poverty rate of 12.7% was essentially equal to the 1968 rate of 12.8%, it seems that little progress has been made. But many analysts -- on the right and the left -- have pointed out that, by many other measures, poor people's physical and material well-being is considerably better now than in the late '60s. How else to explain why so many poor now have color TV (93%) and air conditioning (50%), and own their own homes (46%)?

While many have proposed revising the official poverty measure, getting agreement is about as likely as Bush carrying Manhattan. The poverty line or its multiple is the basis of eligibility for dozens of government antipoverty programs, involving the distributions of hundreds of billions of dollars. Change it -- up or down -- and hundreds of thousands of people gain or lose benefits.

That's what makes a new data series by the Census Bureau, "The Effects of Government Taxes and Transfers on Income and Poverty: 2004," so significant. Developed after nine months of meetings between outside experts and senior government officials from the Census Bureau and other federal agencies, it allows us to get a better view of the resources available to low-income Americans.

First, the series gets a better fix on "market income" poverty -- poverty before taxes and means-tested transfers like cash welfare. (Although the Census Bureau counts it separately, Social Security, like pensions, is included as market income since it is "earned" during one's working years.) Now we can use the correct inflation adjustment, count the income of cohabitors and coresidents, and include the implicit income of home ownership. (The last mostly affects the elderly.) Finally, adding in government estimates of unreported income results in a market income poverty rate of about 7.9%, not the official rate of 12.7%. Second, as suggested by the name of the new data series, government transfer programs also reduce financial need. Taking into account welfare payments, food stamps and housing assistance (noncash benefits are presently not counted) results in a poverty rate of about 5.1% -- and even this excludes the value of Medicaid for the poor, roughly $2,000 per person.

Even with these calculations, about 15 million people are below the poverty line and millions more just above it. But the broader point must not be lost: Millions of low-income Americans are living better lives than they did before. Period.

Mr. Besharov is the Jacobs scholar in social welfare studies at the American Enterprise Institute.

Speak Softly And Carry A Smaller Stick (NYT)

By Andrew Kohut

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

WE shouldn't allow isolationism and protectionism to overwhelm us," said President Bush in his press conference on Tuesday, building on the concerns that he expressed in his State of the Union address about Americans turning inward.

Recent opinion surveys affirm that isolationist sentiment has increased in recent years. Notably, a survey by my center and the Council on Foreign Relations last fall reported that the percentage of the public who said that the United States should "mind its own business internationally and let other countries get along the best they can on their own" rose to levels seen during the mid-1970's, following the Vietnam War, and in the 1990's after the cold war ended. And a companion poll of opinion leaders found that they, too, had become less supportive of the United States playing a world leadership role.

But while these trends represent significant shifts in attitudes, it would be a mistake to conclude that this country is becoming isolationist. There is no sign that most Americans want the United States to turn its back on the world or that anti-foreign sentiment in this country is rising. Discontent with Mr. Bush's policies, notably on Iraq, has led to widespread public frustration. And while it has also created more isolationists, they remain a minority.

The number of Pew respondents agreeing that the United States should mind its own business and let other countries get along as best they can climbed to 42 percent last year from 34 percent in 2004. Agreement with this statement has been roughly this high only twice in the last four decades: in 1976 and in 1995. Now as then, however, most Americans continue to disagree with this sentiment. And huge majorities, including many who express some isolationist sentiments, believe that the United States should consider the views of its allies in making foreign policy, and they acknowledge America's leadership role in the world given its power.

Polls also find no rise in broad-based anti-foreign sentiment. Americans, in fact, rate most countries more favorably than people in other countries rate the United States. For example, a February Gallup survey showed 54 percent of the public holding a favorable view of France and 79 percent a favorable opinion of Germany. In contrast, just 41 percent of the Germans and 43 percent of the French expressed favorable views of the United States in last year's Pew Global Attitudes Survey.

Further, there is no sign of increased alarm about rivals to the United States. Americans are less inclined now than in the past to view China as an adversary, and few express worries about its rising economic might. In addition, Americans favor a stronger European Union and closer relations with Europe. Fully 66 percent of Americans think the United States and Western European partnership on security and diplomatic matters should remain as close it has been the past. But only 26 percent of the French, 39 percent of the German and 42 percent of the British respondents felt the same way in our survey.

Even right after the uproar over the bid by a Dubai-based company to take over facilities in American ports, Americans continue to welcome foreign investment and are much less worried about foreign ownership of American companies than they were at the end of the 1980's. The rejection of the Dubai ports deal appears to reflect not xenophobia but a deep concern about Arab terrorism. While a narrow majority of respondents (53 percent) to a Pew survey last week expressed a negative view of foreign investors owning American companies, 70 percent did so in 1989, when high-profile acquisitions of American businesses by Japanese companies provoked widespread concern.

Moreover, by a 53 percent to 36 percent margin, Americans view foreign companies investing in the United States as a good thing. And more generally, two-thirds of Americans (66 percent) believe free trade is good for the United States. This view is largely unchanged since 2000, even though public concern about the outsourcing of American jobs has risen sharply.

All this shows that America's current mood is less a rejection of the rest of the world than it is a deep concern about terrorism and a growing wariness about America's own assertive foreign policy. In particular, there is little potential support for the use of force against Iran. And more generally, the American experience in Iraq has reduced support for pre-emptive wars. The belief that it is justifiable to use military force against countries that threaten us but have not attacked us fell from 67 percent in May 2003, when the war in Iraq seemed a success, to just 52 percent last fall.

Unfortunately, the uptick in isolationism has the potential for dangerous political consequences. In an election year, politicians in both parties (each of which has significant isolationist minorities) may feel mistakenly compelled to play to strong sentiments that do not reflect the beliefs of the majority, urging the United States to pull back on its global commitments, move away from free trade and close its borders. More dangerously in this age of terrorism, the president may well need to pursue policies that are assertive, if not costly. If he does, and even with the best of intentions, he may not find the requisite support.

Rice Won't Tolerate Stall Tactics On Iran (AP-Y2)

By Anne Gearan

AP2, March 23, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice issued a veiled warning Thursday to holdouts in a diplomatic impasse at the United Nations over Iran's disputed nuclear program.

"There can't be any stalling," Rice said in response to a question about U.S. efforts to get Russia and China to sign on to a strongly worded rebuke to Tehran.

Russia and China have refused to back a U.N. Security Council statement proposed by Britain, France and the United States demanding Iran suspend uranium enrichment.

Talks among the permanent members of the Security Council have bogged down over the statement, which traditional Iranian allies or trade partners see as a prelude to sanctions they do not support.

Rice planned to call her Russian counterpart Friday to try to break the deadlock.

The Security Council statement was intended to be an opening move in what could be lengthy talks at the powerful U.N. body over how to stop Iran from building a nuclear bomb.

The statement was also meant to be an easier pill to swallow for Russia and China than would another option: A tough Security Council resolution.

DOJ_NMG_0020780

A presidential statement requires consensus from the body's 15 members. A resolution would be put to an up-or-down vote, meaning Russia and China would have to approve, abstain or veto action against Iran.

Rice indicated that the United States will not wait long before taking another tack.

"The international community has got to act," Rice said following a first meeting with the new Greek foreign minister, Theodora Bakoyannis.

"People are looking to the international community to show that this can, indeed, be dealt with diplomatically," Rice said. "We are committed to a diplomatic solution, but it has to be dealt with."

Russian deputy U.N. Ambassador Konstantin Dolgov said Russia was still under the assumption that the council was working toward a presidential statement, not a resolution.

"We are continuing negotiations in good faith and we hope that all our partners are doing likewise," Dolgov told The Associated Press.

The Iran nuclear file moved to the Security Council this month, with the support of veto-wielding members Russia and China. That was seen as a diplomatic victory for the United States, which had long sought to place Iran before the U.N. body for possible punishment.

Moscow and Beijing now insist the U.N. nuclear watchdog in Vienna, the International Atomic Energy Agency, play the lead role in clearing up suspicions over Iran's intentions.

"We think there is still an opportunity to get a compromise but a compromise that would send the right signal — endorse the IAEA, and help in the negotiation process which is going on and should go on," Dolgov said.

Iran says it is developing nuclear technology only to produce electricity, but the United States and its allies accuse the clerical regime of using civilian nuclear power as a cover to develop weapons.

"There is an erosion of confidence in Iran on this point, because they lied to the IAEA for 18 years," Rice said, referring to nuclear research and development activities that Iran kept hidden.

Russia and China have raised concerns that pushing Iran too hard could lead to its withdrawal from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and expulsion of IAEA inspectors.

Iran Closer To Producing Nuclear Weapons Fuel, U.S. Officials Worry (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay And Warren P. Strobel

Knight Ridder, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON - U.S. officials are concerned that Iran may be closer than they previously believed to mastering the process for producing fuel for a nuclear weapon.

Their unease stems from a recent briefing at which U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency experts reported that Iran was close to operating a test network of 164 machines, called centrifuges, that spin uranium hexafluoride gas into enriched uranium, U.S. officials and a foreign diplomat said.

Depending on its duration, the process produces low enriched uranium for power plants and highly enriched uranium for nuclear weapons.

The report came amid a deadlock in two-week-old talks among the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China - the U.N. Security Council permanent members - on how to deal with Iran's nuclear program.

The IAEA and several European nations disputed the Bush administration's charges about Iraq's nuclear weapons program, but there's wider international agreement about Iran's nuclear efforts.

Should Iran quickly overcome the numerous technical obstacles to operating the test network, known as a cascade, it could accelerate the installation of an industrial-scale plant and begin producing highly enriched uranium much sooner than currently forecast, the U.S. officials and the diplomat said. They spoke on condition of anonymity because they weren't authorized to discuss the issue.

Based on the IAEA data, U.S. experts have concluded that "Iran could be as little as two to three years away from having nuclear weapons, with all the necessary caveats and assumptions and extrapolations about them overcoming technical hurdles," said one U.S. official. "Admittedly, those are significant assumptions."

DOJ_NMG_0020781

Publicly, the Bush administration estimates that 2011 is the soonest that Iran could produce a nuclear weapon.

"They are moving much quicker than everyone thought," said the diplomat, who didn't offer an estimate on how soon Iran might be able to produce highly enriched uranium.

He said there was evidence that Iran has moved large containers of uranium hexafluoride gas to Natanz, the main enrichment research site in central Iran, from a facility in Isfahan in preparation for starting the test network.

"I think it's fair to say that there's growing concern about what the Iranians may be up to," said a U.S. defense official.

David Albright, a former IAEA inspector who closely follows the issue, said he was skeptical that Iran could produce 25 kilograms (55 pounds) of highly enriched uranium - the quantity required for a warhead - by sometime in 2008.

Albright, the director of the independent Institute for Science and International Security, said his "worst-case scenario" was 2009, due to Iran's lack of experience in operating large numbers of centrifuges, the complexities involved and the potential for numerous problems.

Iran insists that its enrichment program is intended to make fuel for power plants, not for nuclear weapons, but it admits concealing the project for 18 years from IAEA inspectors.

Moreover, Tehran has failed to reveal to the IAEA all aspects of its program, including purchases of weapons-related nuclear know-how from a Pakistani-led smuggling ring that supplied the North Korean and Libyan weapons programs. Ayhan Evrensel, an IAEA spokesman, declined to comment for this article.

A diplomat close to the IAEA confirmed that by the end of last week, Iranian engineers had assembled all 164 centrifuges of the test cascade at Natanz as they'd planned to do. They still had to finish connecting all of the machines and then would need time to conduct tests of the piping and seals, this diplomat said by telephone from Vienna, Austria.

However, the diplomat, who asked to remain anonymous because of the sensitivity of the issue, said the development conformed to the agency's timeline and that IAEA experts didn't view it with alarm.

Britain and France, backed by the United States, have proposed a statement in the Security Council demanding that Iran suspend all uranium enrichment work and setting a 30-day deadline for an IAEA report on Tehran's compliance.

Russia and China, which have major financial stakes in oil-rich Iran, opposed the proposal, contending that it paved the way for the Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran.

The crisis erupted in January when Iran ended a more than two-year suspension of enrichment work in defiance of international objections. The IAEA board of governors voted in February to refer the matter to the Security Council after the agency found that it couldn't confirm the peaceful nature of the program.

According to information Tehran provided to the IAEA, Iranian engineers first fed uranium hexafluoride gas into single centrifuges, followed by cascades of 10 and 20 machines.

It has informed the IAEA that it plans to begin installing the first 3,000 centrifuges of a 50,000-machine industrial-scale plant in underground halls at Natanz in the last quarter of this year.

One U.S. official said that if Iranian engineers successfully operate the 164-machine cascade as quickly as they did the smaller assemblies, they could move up the installation of the first centrifuges of the underground plant to within the next "few months."

If all went smoothly, he continued, those machines could begin operating in 2007 and produce enough highly enriched uranium for one nuclear warhead within about one year.

"The anxiety level has risen significantly," he said. "Iran is closer that we thought they were to mastering the operation of a centrifuge cascade."

Envoy Accuses Iran Of Duplicity On Iraq (WP)

By Jonathan Finer And Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

BAGHDAD, March 23 -- Iran is publicly professing its support for Iraq's stalemated political process while its military and intelligence services back outlawed militias and insurgent groups, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0020782

Iranian agents train and arm Shiite Muslim militias such as the Mahdi Army, linked to one of Iraq's most powerful clerics, Khalilzad said, and also work closely with Sunni Arab-led insurgent forces including Ansar al-Sunna, blamed for dozens of deadly attacks on Iraqi and American soldiers and Shiite civilians.

"Our judgment is that training and supplying, direct or indirect, takes place, and that there is also provision of financial resources to people, to militias, and that there is presence of people associated with Revolutionary Guard and with MOIS," the Afghan-born Khalilzad said, referring to Iran's main military force and its Ministry of Intelligence and Security.

Khalilzad's comments, made in an interview in his spacious office in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone, came as the United States and Iran -- two feuding foreign powers with dominant roles in Iraqi affairs -- have expressed willingness to hold talks aimed at stabilizing the beleaguered country. Iran, which borders Iraq to the east and whose theocratic government retains close ties with Iraq's Shiite political leaders, has repeatedly denied American accusations that it is a force for instability in Iraq. Instead, it has blamed the United States for the unrest.

The calls for dialogue over Iraq coincided with deliberations by the U.N. Security Council, of which the United States is a permanent member, over possible actions against Iran for its controversial nuclear program. Asked if any discussions had begun, Khalilzad said, "There is nothing new on that."

Khalilzad's remarks also coincided with stalled negotiations over the formation of Iraq's next government. Sunni Arab parties, pushing for more prominent ministerial posts from the Shiite religious parties that hold the largest share of the seats in parliament, have accused Iran of complicity in recent attacks on Sunnis by Shiite militias that have pushed the country toward civil war.

"The militias haven't been focused on decisively yet. . . . That will be tough," Khalilzad said. "More Iraqis in Baghdad are dying -- if you look at the recent period of two, three weeks -- from the militia attacks than from the terrorist car bombings."

Khalilzad expressed particular concern over Iran's ties to the Mahdi Army, an armed group loyal to the outspoken Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr that the ambassador said was responsible for many of the recent killings, despite Sadr's public pleas for calm.

Sadr, who was charged by the former U.S. occupation authority with involvement in the killing of a rival religious leader soon after the U.S. invasion three years ago, has recently plunged into politics after waging two armed uprisings against U.S. forces in 2004.

But Khalilzad said the United States has had no face-to-face contact with the cleric, in his early thirties, whose followers hold more than 30 seats in the new parliament. "No, I don't talk to him, because we don't meet with Moqtada Sadr, but I have sent him messages publicly. . . . We engage him whatever way we can," said Khalilzad, who added that he and other embassy officials did meet with Sadr's political allies. "I think that our people advise me against it because there is an indictment against him."

An aide to Sadr, one of the most outspoken critics of the U.S. military presence in Iraq, said Thursday that the cleric would not meet with American officials until foreign troops are withdrawn from Iraq.

With negotiations to form a government deadlocked three months after the Dec. 15 legislative elections and Iraqis growing increasingly impatient, Khalilzad said he was stressing to Iraqi leaders that new authority is needed to quell instability.

"I am the one who's saying, 'The country is bleeding, you need to move,' " he said, adding that recent sessions with political leaders from various sides have brought at least one encouraging sign: The groups are now more willing to directly address each other's concerns without using Americans as intermediaries.

"I have been reduced -- and I am not complaining -- to an observer, which is a good thing," he said, dismissing the widely held belief that he is still the driving force for unity, cajoling rival groups to negotiate. "I think now I say that they are really politically moving toward a self-reliance."

Still, he said, a deep gulf remains between the country's Shiite and Sunni factions.

"Sunnis are concerned about having a say in the decision-making, while the Shia concern is that having a say in the decision-making should not obviate the results of the elections and should not create a situation in which decisions are so difficult to make that nothing happens because everyone needs to speak to everyone before anything is done," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0020783

Sunnis and others have called on Shiites to reconsider their choice -- backed by Sadr -- of the transitional prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jafari, to lead the new government. They also want the Shiites to ensure that the country's security ministries are not put in the hands of politicians tied to militias. The Shiite bloc has so far resisted both demands.

Asked if Shiites, who fell short of winning a parliamentary majority, would ever be willing to share enough power to allow a unified government to be formed, Khalilzad pointed to constitutional provisions that require a two-thirds vote for many of the functions of government to be carried out.

The Shiites "have no alternative" but to compromise, he said.

Israeli Acting PM Cautions Hard-Liners (AP)

By Josef Federman, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 24, 2006

Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert sent his strongest signal yet that hard-line parties won't be welcome in the next government if his party wins next week's election, saying in an interview published Thursday that coalition partners must be on board with his plan to withdraw from most of the West Bank.

Olmert, whose Kadima Party is expected to cruise to victory Tuesday, wants to draw Israel's final borders by 2010 — with or without a deal with the Palestinians. While holding a wide lead in opinion polls, Kadima is expected to still need help from smaller parties to form a majority coalition in the 120-seat parliament.

Olmert says he would prefer to reach a peace settlement with the Palestinians but is ready to take unilateral action if this is impossible. Hard-line opponents say the go-it-alone approach, which would involve uprooting dozens of Jewish settlements in the West Bank, amounts to a surrender to Palestinian violence.

"I want to emphasize, so that no one doubts it: I intend to implement this plan. Anyone who is not interested in seeing this plan implemented will not be in my coalition. I do not intend to compromise on the details of the plan. This is the plan and there is no other," Olmert told the Yediot Ahronot daily in an interview.

The comments gave an indication how Olmert's government would look if he wins the election. It appears increasingly likely that he will join forces with the dovish Labor and Meretz parties, while leaving the hawkish parties, including Likud, in the opposition.

Olmert also appeared to be sending a tough message to Avigdor Lieberman, leader of an increasingly powerful Russian immigrant party. Lieberman, a hard-line Jewish settler, has not ruled out joining an Olmert-led government but said he would not agree to further unilateral pullbacks.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, fed up with hard-line rebels in Likud, left the party last fall to form Kadima. Olmert quickly followed and was thrust into the party leadership when Sharon suffered a massive stroke in January.

Olmert's plan follows the unilateral approach devised by Sharon, who led Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip last summer. With peacemaking frozen after several years of fighting, Sharon said pulling out of Gaza boosted security and helped guarantee a Jewish majority in areas under Israeli control.

The chances of renewing peace talks appear even more remote following the Islamic militant Hamas' victory in Palestinian legislative elections in January. Hamas, which has carried out dozens of suicide bombings in Israel, has refused international calls to renounce violence and recognize the Jewish state.

Veteran politician Shimon Peres, who is running as a Kadima candidate, said Thursday the party would prefer to reach a negotiated settlement with the Palestinians, although Hamas isn't a partner for peace. "Unilateralism is not our ideology or our first priority," Peres told reporters.

Under Olmert's plan, Israel's West Bank separation barrier would serve as the basis for a future border with the Palestinians. The plan would increase West Bank Jewish settlements on the Israeli side of the barrier, and uproot tens of thousands of Israeli settlers living on the eastern side.

The plan falls well short of Palestinian visions for a future state encompassing all of the West Bank and Gaza Strip with east Jerusalem as the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0020784

In a further sign of Olmert's plans, a party official Thursday disclosed details about Kadima's vision for Jerusalem, treading on ground that was taboo for decades — dividing the city in a peace agreement.

Otniel Schneller, a candidate for parliament, said Kadima is prepared to hand over Palestinian villages that have been incorporated into the city.

"If and when a Palestinian entity is established, with Jerusalem as its capital, it will be based on these villages," he said.

The pronouncement had added weight because of its source. Schneller is a former head of the council of West Bank and Gaza settlements, a body that hotly opposes any territorial compromise. Schneller stressed that Israel will not relinquish control of the Old City, home to Jewish, Muslim and Christian holy sites.

Israel captured east Jerusalem, along with the West Bank and Gaza Strip, in the 1967 Mideast war. It annexed the Arab neighborhoods and declaring the entire city its capital. The city's fate has been one of the greatest obstacles to a peace deal.

In violence Thursday, the Israeli army killed two Islamic Jihad militants in Gaza as they were planting a bomb along the fence between Israel and the Gaza Strip, the army and Palestinian security officials said.

Late Showing Puts Labour In Running For Finance Post (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, March 24, 2006

Before a single ballot is cast in next week's Israeli election, politicians and analysts are already speculating on who will secure the finance portfolio in the coalition bargaining that will inevitably follow Tuesday's vote.

At stake is the stewardship of a high-growth economy that has spectacularly pulled itself out of recession since the last election in January 2003 but has so far failed to meet the needs of Israel's growing army of poor.

If, as expected, Ehud Olmert's centrist Kadima party secures the largest number of seats in the 120-member Knesset, the acting prime minister has declared his intention to keep the treasury for one of his own.

However, a strong second place for Labour, enjoying a late spurt in opinion polls in the closing days of the campaign, could put pressure on Mr Olmert to surrender the treasury to Amir Peretz, its leader.

Handing the finance portfolio to the former trade union boss, who put welfare and social issues at the top of his programme, might initially rattle markets that are looking for a continuation of the fiscal reform agenda initiated by Likud's Benjamin Netanyahu.

The Likud leader is bearing the brunt of a popular backlash against the negative effects of welfare cuts and other measures that he took as finance minister and he has failed to lift the former ruling party out of its poor third place in the polls.

However, analysts believe that, even under Mr Peretz, economic policy would stay fundamentally on its present course.

"Everybody understands the importance of maintaining growth," says Yaakov Fisher of Israel's I-Biz consultancy. "That is a lesson that Netanyahu taught, however much people might dislike him."

Under Mr Netanyahu, GDP grew by close to 4 per cent for eight consecutive quarters and the trend continued after he resigned from the cabinet last summer in protest against the Israeli withdrawal from the Gaza Strip. The Israeli economy ended 2005 with the third highest growth rate among members and associate members of the OECD.

Inflation is low, interest rates are steady and even Israel's high unemployment rates have fallen, while levels of participation in the labour force have risen.

Some sectors of society have nevertheless lost out in the overall recovery. Welfare cuts have particularly hurt low-income ultra-Orthodox, Arab and new immigrant communities.

A report published last year by the National Insurance Institute indicated that poverty rates had grown during Mr Netanyahu's tenure to include one in five Israelis, while the Central Bureau of Statistics reported that the gap between rich and poor had widened.

"The problem an incoming finance minister faces is how to deal with these social problems while maintaining growth," says Mr Fisher. "The trickle-down approach that Netanyahu promoted isn't the right one and even he is backing away from it."

While all the main parties support a strong free-market economy, Labour's policy centres on boosting the minimum wage to the equivalent of around $1,000 (€830, £570) a month. The party says the minimum wage pledge is a red line Mr Peretz would not be prepared to cross.

Mr Olmert has been at the helm of the finance ministry since Mr Netanyahu quit. It was the portfolio he wanted when Ariel Sharon, prime minister, lured him back into national politics in 2003.

If he were obliged to surrender one of the senior cabinet posts to a coalition partner, he might opt to drop Shaul Mofaz, Kadima's defence minister, rather than sacrifice the treasury. A likely nominee would be Kadima's Meir Sheetrit, who briefly served as finance minister in 1999.

Mr Netanyahu has so far ruled out joining a coalition led by Mr Olmert, which means there is little prospect of him returning to a post in which he received market approval for the spending cuts and fiscal reforms credited with lifting Israel out of recession.

If the outcome of coalition bargaining meant the ministry going to Labour, Mr Peretz could take the post himself or nominate Avishai Braverman, a former World Bank economist whose entry into politics near the top of the party's electoral list has helped to temper its socialist image.

North Korea Might Be Exporting Fake $100 Bills (WP)

By Gordon Fairclough

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

SHANGHAI -- China's central bank warned its lenders about an influx of high-quality counterfeit American $100 bills -- which the United States alleges are made by North Korea -- as the spread of the forgeries moves toward the center of a standoff between Washington and Pyongyang.

Governments around Asia are stepping up surveillance for the bogus currency, which law-enforcement officials have dubbed supernotes because they are so difficult to distinguish from genuine money.

The fake $100 bills have turned up in the United States, Philippines, Taiwan and elsewhere over the past two years. In January, supernotes were seized from a Chinese American in Hong Kong, according to U.S. officials.

The People's Bank of China said the supernotes "have flowed into our country from overseas" and urged lenders to be on the lookout for efforts to place counterfeit bills into circulation. The letter was sent this month to all commercial banks as well as its own branches.

North Korea, which shares a long border with China, may earn as much as $15 million to $25 million a year from counterfeiting, according to an advance copy of a report to be released Friday by the U.S. Congressional Research Service, which also says at least $45 million in supernotes has have been detected in circulation. That figure would represent a small proportion of the total amount of U.S. currency circulating in the world. But, U.S. officials say, any amount of counterfeiting can undermine confidence in the dollar.

Frustrated by the lack of progress in negotiations aimed at persuading North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons and faced with a lack of international support for economic sanctions against the country, Washington increasingly is turning to law-enforcement actions to deal with Pyongyang.

The focus now is stanching the flow of fake currency and cracking down on other alleged illegal North Korean activities, often by going after the Chinese and Taiwanese organized-crime groups that, U.S. officials say, have become the conduits for Pyongyang's illicit products.

"This is state-sponsored criminal activity, and Washington's policy response is morphing," said Raphael Perl, one of the authors of the Congressional Research Service report. "The administration is moving towards taking on North Korea with laws and prosecutors."

The report, prepared for members of Congress and their staffs, raises the possibility of U.S. legal action against North Korean leader Kim Jong Il. But going after Kim remains unlikely, as the United States continues to pursue diplomatic efforts to curb North Korea's nuclear ambitions. Such a move would face opposition from U.S. ally South Korea, as well as China, both of which fear destabilizing North Korea.

But the United States is going after others linked to North Korea's alleged illegal activities. Seizures of supernotes have grown as the result of better cooperation between U.S. law-enforcement officials and their counterparts in other countries, U.S. officials say.

In September, the U.S. Treasury Department designated a bank in the Chinese enclave of Macau as an institution of "primary money laundering concern," saying that it had helped North Korea launder money from illicit activities and place counterfeit money in circulation. The United States has proposed cutting off the bank, Banco Delta Asia, from contacts with the U.S. financial system, which has encouraged other lenders to sever ties with North Korea to avoid unwanted scrutiny from U.S. regulators. Banco Delta Asia has denied involvement in any illicit activities.

U.S. prosecutors also are moving to seize money in a Hong Kong bank account they say is linked to the sale of supernotes, as well as counterfeit cigarettes made in North Korea. The account is linked to the case of three men of Chinese descent who pleaded guilty in 2004 to conspiring to smuggle fake currency and cigarettes into the United States.

This week, the U.S. Secret Service said that about $15,000 in supernotes had passed through the Philippines last year, brought into the country by Chinese and Taiwanese nationals. A Secret Service official declined to identify the source of the notes, other than to say that they were from a country "the United States cannot go into."

North Korea Bristles At U.S.-South Drills (AP)

By Kwang-tae Kim

AP, March 23, 2006

North Korea warned Thursday it will react to upcoming joint U.S-South Korean joint military exercises with an unspecified "strong measure of self-defense," condemning the drill as saber-rattling for a pre-emptive nuclear attack on the North.

"Now that the U.S. intention to stifle the DPRK has become very clear, the DPRK will react to it with a strong measure for self-defense," a spokesman for the North's Foreign Ministry said in statement carried by the North's official Korean Central News Agency.

DPRK is a commonly used acronym for the North's official name, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea.

The weeklong exercises — dubbed RSOI and Foal Eagle — are scheduled to begin Saturday with 20,000 American troops, along with the aircraft carrier USS Abraham Lincoln, and an undisclosed number of South Korean soldiers.

The communist state has long claimed the U.S. is bent on invading the country, condemning the annual military drill as a "rehearsal" for an attack. The U.S. and South Korea characterize them as purely defensive.

"The U.S. decision to let carrier Abraham Lincoln and its task flotilla participate in the exercises goes to clearly indicate what reckless and dangerous phase the U.S. moves for a pre-emptive attack have reached," the spokesman said.

The spokesman also warned that U.S. sanctions against the North will not make Pyongyang change its stance. He didn't elaborate but the comment appeared to refer to the stalled talks on his country's nuclear weapons program.

The communist country has refused to resume the six-nation nuclear disarmament talks since November, demanding that Washington lift financial restrictions imposed on a Macau bank and North Korean companies for alleged complicity in counterfeiting and money laundering.

Earlier this month, U.S. and North Korean officials met in New York over the U.S. restrictions, but failed to produce any breakthrough. Washington says the financial actions are separate from the nuclear talks.

The North has said that the resumption of the six-party talks and resolution of the nuclear issue depends entirely on the U.S. attitude.

The talks — which involve the two Koreas, the U.S., Japan, China and Russia — produced a breakthrough accord in September when the North agreed to abandon its nuclear programs in exchange for aid and security assurances. But follow-up negotiations have stalled over the North's anger at U.S. sanctions.

Earlier this week, North Korea suggested it had the ability to launch a pre-emptive attack on the United States and said it had built atomic weapons to counter the U.S. nuclear threat.

The spokesman said the U.S.-South Korea drills would also adversely affect inter-Korean relations.

North Korea has put off high-level talks with the South that had been planned in Pyongyang the same week as the March 25-31 exercises.

U.S. Retaining Wartime Command On S. Korea (AP-Y2)

By William C. Mann

AP2, March 23, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Thursday the United States must retain wartime command of South Korea's military until that country's forces are strong enough to maintain stability on the Korean Peninsula.

South Korea's president has said he hopes an agreement to turn over wartime command can be negotiated this year. The effect of any change would be felt only if war should return to the peninsula.

In a Pentagon news briefing, Rumsfeld said South Korea has brought up the idea, and "everyone agrees that 55 years after the war, it's reasonable that the South Korean forces would increasingly take on more and more responsibility."

Asked whether he thought the change in command structure could start this year, Rumsfeld replied: "No, no, I don't at all."

South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun has been talking since January about negotiating a way for homegrown officers to recover wartime command of South Korea's military. He specified in a speech to cadets at the Korea Military Academy this month that he hoped the turnover would come this year.

An American general assumed command of South Korean forces in 1950, when the South Korean forces were subsumed into a U.S.-commanded U.N. force to repel invading North Koreans. A cease-fire in 1953 ended the fighting but not the state of war between North and South Korea. The South's military stayed under American command, although South Korean officers were given command during peacetime in 1994.

"The South Korean government has raised the question as to when might it be appropriate to transfer responsibility to the Korean command, and that is something that gets discussed," Rumsfeld said Thursday.

He said no time has been set for the turnover, but South Korean forces already are taking increasing responsibilities. "They're doing that," he said, "and as they continue to take on more and more responsibility, the United States will be able to reduce its troops."

He said he had not heard that Roh had suggested a 2006 agreement on a turnover, which he said will not happen.

His impression from conversations with Korean officials and cables he has read, Rumsfeld said, "is that they want the subject raised — which we do, too; we think that's just fine — and then we'd set about a path to see that the South Korean military evolves into a position where it would be appropriate for them to have that control."

The vital consideration is not to inject instability into the peninsula, Rumsfeld said. Before the Koreans can assume the responsibility, he said, they must "make investments and increase their capabilities."

Adm. Edmund P. Giambastiani Jr., vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said the U.S. commander in South Korea, Gen. Burwell Bell, is working to carry out the command status to achieve the goals Rumsfeld has set.

The 38th parallel on the Korean Peninsula, the cease-fire line that serves as a border between the communist-led North Korea and capitalist South Korea, has been described as the most militarized border in the world.

Until recently the United States had close to 40,000 troops in the South. That number is down to 29,500 now and is scheduled to decline to 25,000 by 2008.

Senators Optimistic On China Currency, But 'jury Still Out' (USAT)

By Calum Macleod

USA Today, March 24, 2006

BEIJING — The U.S. senators pushing a bill to punish Chinese currency policies said Thursday they were more optimistic Beijing will revalue the yuan. But they refused to rule out pushing for a vote after they return to Washington to impose tariffs on all Chinese imports into the USA.

"The jury is still out," Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said here. "We still need some concrete signs of movement."

After three days of talks with Chinese officials, he said "there is a real possibility the Chinese government and people see it in their interest to let the yuan float." However, he got no firm indication of when the currency would be allowed to fluctuate on global markets. “The clock is ticking on this currency issue,” said Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., and co-author of the bill to put a 27.5% tariff on Chinese imports. “It must be a win-win, but the status quo is unacceptable.”

Graham and Schumer say China's undervalued currency means cheaper exports fuel a Sino-U.S. trade deficit that surpassed $200 billion in 2005. That figure represents “the largest trade imbalance in the history of man,” according to Craig Allen, minister-counselor for commercial affairs at the U.S. Embassy in Beijing.

Currency and trade will be key issues during talks next month between President Bush, whose administration opposes the Graham-Schumer bill, and Chinese President Hu Jintao, who makes his first U.S. visit as Chinese leader in mid-April, the White House announced Wednesday.

Dramatic change in the value of the yuan is unlikely, according to Chinese analysts. On Thursday, China's central bank issued a statement promising to keep the exchange rate basically stable, while pushing forward plans toward future flexibility.

“China's conditions are not ready (to allow the yuan to float),” says professor Li Yushi, deputy director of the Chinese Academy of International Trade and Economic Co-operation, under China's Ministry of Commerce. “Maybe in eight or 10 years' time. … There will only be gradual change before then.”

Exporters such as Yue Chi-hong in Dongguan, southern China's manufacturing powerhouse, are watching developments in Washington closely.

“The 27.5% tariff they propose would be a big blow for our business,” says Yue, senior merchandiser for the Future Company of Hong Kong, which annually sells 1.5 million pairs of shoes, worth $30 million, to the USA, including to Wal-Mart and Payless stores.

“Some 40% (to) 50% of shoes sold in America are made in China,” Yue said. “The American consumer benefits from our low labor costs and skilled workers.”

After stops in Shanghai and Hong Kong this weekend, the senators promised to consult with other senators and officials in Washington before deciding on the future of their bill.

U.S. Senators Offer Hope To China On Tariffs (WSJ)

By Jason Dean

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

BEIJING -- A pair of U.S. senators pushing sweeping tariffs aimed at Chinese imports said they are more optimistic about U.S.-China trade relations after a trip to China's capital. But the lawmakers stopped short of a commitment to put off a vote on their legislation, scheduled for next week.

Yesterday's comments from Sens. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, and Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, could ease concerns about the tariff bill, which some U.S. economists and business leaders have warned could seriously damage trade relations between the U.S. and China. The bill, scheduled for a vote March 31, would impose a 27.5% tariff on all Chinese imports within two years of passage if Beijing fails to sharply revalue its currency, which the lawmakers contend is kept artificially low.

"We are more optimistic that this can be worked out than we were in the past. But whether it will be, we're not certain yet," Mr. Schumer told reporters after three days of meetings with senior Chinese officials, including the central-bank chief and the commerce minister.

The senators said they will confer with colleagues and continue to talk with Chinese leaders by phone before deciding whether to move ahead with the vote.

The senators, along with other U.S. politicians, have argued that Beijing manipulates its currency to keep it undervalued by an estimated 15% to 40%, making Chinese exports artificially inexpensive and enlarging a U.S. trade deficit with China that ballooned to $201.63 billion last year, according to U.S. data. They first proposed their tariff legislation more than two years ago and have put off votes on it several times. Supporters of the bill contend it would pass the Senate and House with a strong enough majority to override any possible veto threat from the White House.

China's government has long said it intends to move toward a more-flexible exchange-rate system, but that the transition needs to be gradual. Last July, under heavy U.S. pressure, Beijing raised the yuan's value by 2.1% against the dollar and unpegged its exchange rate from the U.S. currency. The currency has appreciated by only about 1% more since then, including a slight surge in the days before Messrs. Schumer and Graham arrived.

Several U.S. business leaders have in recent days come out strongly against the legislation, saying it would be bad for U.S. companies and poison relations between the world's first- and fourth-largest economies. On Wednesday, Caterpillar Inc. Chief Executive Jim Owens issued a statement calling on legislators to reject tariff proposals. "Personally, I can think of no faster path to a world-wide recession than for the twin engines of the global economy -- the United States and China -- to turn against one another," he said.

Yesterday, James A. Baker III, a former U.S. secretary at the Treasury and State Department, said it would be advantageous for the yuan to adjust, but not "subject to threats from one of China's major trading partners." Protectionist legislation and sentiment are "a very serious thing today as far as the United States is concerned," Mr. Baker, now a partner in the law firm of Baker Botts, told a gathering of businesspeople in Hong Kong. "And I worry about it." (See related article1.)

This week's trip was the first time Messrs. Schumer and Graham visited mainland China, and both said they learned a great deal. Mr. Schumer said he was convinced Chinese leaders want to boost consumption in China, which has a savings rate many economists say is too high.

Mr. Graham said he was struck by the magnitude of China's problems -- for example, unemployment -- and how those issues weigh against sharp changes in currency policy. "I am more sensitive now than I was before to how hard it will be to move toward a floating currency," Mr. Graham said. But, he added, "I am more committed than ever to make sure that occurs," to ensure "harmony" in U.S.-China relations.

Senators Hopeful Of Compromise On Yuan (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

BEIJING, March 23 -- Two U.S. senators pressing legislation aimed at forcing China to substantially raise the value of its currency said Thursday that three days of meetings with high-level Chinese officials had left them hopeful that a compromise can be struck to avert trade conflict.

"We're feeling better," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), standing alongside Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) at an evening news conference. "We are more optimistic than we were when we came here. We have seen that the Chinese government and the Chinese people actually have a convergence with the American people on currency."

Despite those sentiments, neither senator was willing to postpone a looming vote on their bill, which would impose 27.5 percent tariffs on all Chinese exports to the United States unless China significantly raises the value of its currency, the yuan. Manufacturers in the United States blame an artificially cheap yuan for undercutting the prices of their products on world markets. The bill has gained the support of 67 senators. A formal vote could come as soon as March 31.

"We still need some concrete signs of movement," Schumer said, asserting that China must demonstrate its intent to allow the currency to float with the market "within a discrete and reasonable period of time." He refused to spell out which actions China must take to delay a vote, adding that his ultimate aim was not the passage of the bill but rather a solution negotiated by the Bush administration and the Chinese government.

Still, the senators' positive comments, coming after months of often-bellicose rhetoric, underscored how Chinese officials have at least partially won over their two primary critics in the U.S. Congress.

Tuesday, both senators said they came to Beijing to register the depth of U.S. anger toward China over unfair trading practices. "The currency issue is a defining moment in U.S.-China relations," Graham said.

Both senators pinpointed as a breakthrough assurances from Chinese officials that they intend to eventually allow their money to float freely as part of their continuing transition from communism to capitalism. Chinese officials have made such pledges for two years, while maintaining that it will happen gradually and on their own timetable.

Graham said he had been moved by testaments from Chinese officials that allowing the yuan to float could harm coastal factories, a crucial source of employment at a time of growing rural strife. "I think I'm more patient," Graham said. "It will take us longer than I thought."

DOJ_NMG_0020790

The high-profile reception the senators enjoyed highlights Beijing's adjustment to the realities in Washington, where trade frictions with China have blossomed into a significant political issue along with the bilateral trade balance -- more than $200 billion in China's favor at the end of last year.

China has bristled at charges that it is to blame for unemployment in the United States, asserting that it has been unfairly cast as a scapegoat.

After raising the value of the yuan against the dollar by 2 percent last July, Chinese officials have asserted that "currency stability" is now a primary goal, knocking down suggestions that another increase is in the works. Economists say the yuan is undervalued by 15 to 40 percent.

Analysts said China's welcome reflected a calculation that the bill could stir up anti-Chinese sentiments in the United States while threatening Chinese exports.

"The Chinese government certainly felt pressure from the American side," said Shen Dingli, an international relations expert at Fudan University in Shanghai. "China fears that if punitive tariffs are really imposed or the yuan is substantially revalued to its legitimate market value, then numerous exporters and manufacturers in China would go bankrupt and lay off workers."

Others said China's leaders effectively defanged its congressional critics for little more than the price of saying over the banquet table what they have already said in public. They added that China does not really fear the bill because it would hurt Americans as well as Chinese by jacking up the price of consumer goods on U.S. shelves and perhaps triggering recession.

"Both the Congress and the Bush administration are putting on a performance to please their constituents," said Mei Xinyu, a researcher at the Chinese Ministry of Commerce in Beijing. "Behind the tough stance and the pressure, China is cognizant of the fact that the United States has to pay a price in the worst outcome."

On China Visit, US Senators Tone Down Tariff Talk (CSM)

By Robert Marquand

The Christian Science Monitor, March 24, 2006

BEIJING - They came. They saw. But rather than conquer - they began a "process of careful rumination."

With a deadline looming on one of the US Senate's most drastic tariff proposals ever on China, the authors of the legislation, Charles Schumer (D) of New York and Lindsay Graham (R) of South Carolina, paid a visit to Beijing to talk tough and be aggressive. Until Thursday, when their attitudes seemed to change, they were going head to head with Chinese leaders in a bold bid to change China's currency rate, which they say is undervalued between 15 to 40 percent.

The bill is one of a series of moves in Washington to address the mounting trade deficit with China ahead of President Hu Jintao's visit to the White House April 20. Yet it appears that Senators Schumer and Graham, whose bill would levy a whopping 27.5 percent tariff on Chinese goods, may have blinked after three days of high-level briefings.

"I'm more optimistic that things can be worked out ... than when I came," Schumer said in a press briefing here. "It's been an eye-opening visit," he said, noting that reform in China appears to be both more complex, and further developed, than he realized. "We believe that there is a very real possibility that the Chinese government and the Chinese people see it in their interest to let the currency float ... but the jury is still out."

The two senators agreed that a Chinese offer to change the currency evaluation three percent was far short of their expectations. But the assurances they heard - and the deeper and broader picture of Chinese realities they had painted for them - were causing them to temporize about how hard to push for the upcoming March 31 bill.

That legislation, reflecting frustration on Capitol Hill with an estimated $204 billion trade imbalance with China, is strongly supported by 67 senators. The unlikely pairing of the Northern liberal and Southern conservative typifies sentiment in the Senate on China trade, and the two senators say they have the votes to override what would certainly be a White House veto.

For Chinese officials, the visit by Schumer, Graham, and Sen. Tom Coburn (R) of Oklahoma was itself seen as a small victory, and a chance to educate the American lawmakers on Chinese policies and problems through face-to-face meetings with Wu Yi, the vice premier, and Bo Xilai, the commerce minister.

Chinese economists point out that tens of thousands of small- and medium-sized businesses operate on a 2 percent or less margin, and to massive reevaluate the currency could create economic and social instability. The same argument was made by Mr. Hu to President Bush when the two met last September.

Schumer and Graham said their interlocutors made a convincing case that China is moving gradually toward a floating currency, but top leaders agree that it is in China's long-term interest to adopt an international standard, and that the new 11th five-year plan adopted this month begins to make structural changes to accommodate floating currency.

Graham pointed out that he and Schumer are "not exactly political soulmates," and used their unlikely pairing to illustrate for the Chinese how serious the trade imbalance and currency evaluation question is in the US. "The status quo is not adequate.... If China is doing a better job, fine," said Graham. "But we need real and concrete evidence ... the clock is ticking."

Under the Schumer-Graham proposal, the actual tariff regime would not begin for at least two years, and the senators acknowledged that the 24-month time period was designed to "get something moving" before such strong measures kicked in.

Critics of the drastic tariff measures both in China and in the US say it has arisen too quickly and that its punitive measures are too harsh.

Schumer pointed out that the tariff bill has been under consideration for three years, and that charges it came overnight are incorrect.

"China and America are joined at the hip ... the US is the biggest market, and China is the largest exporter," Schumer said, adding that relations between the two can be positive. "But people are often reluctant to change ... on both sides, so we are creating an incentive to improve."

China Harvesting Inmates' Organs, Journalist Says (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

A Chinese journalist has uncovered a secret detention center in northern China that is being used by a hospital to harvest human organs for sale to domestic and international buyers.

Jin Zhong, a pseudonym for the journalist who fled China recently, also said in an interview that a failed Chinese intelligence operation led to the 2004 death of a Japanese diplomat who committed suicide rather than give up secrets.

On the prisoner abuse, Mr. Jin said he first learned of the harvesting operation between October and December and that the prisoners used were members of the outlawed Falun Gong religious group.

"This is murder, and murder sponsored by a state," said Mr. Jin, who in the past has been a contributor to a Japanese news agency. "It must be stopped."

Mr. Jin said he came across the underground detention center while researching the Chinese government's response to the Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome (SARS).

A Chinese official was the first person to reveal that secret medical work was being done at the Liaoning Provincial Thrombosis Hospital of Integrated Chinese and Western Medicine, in Sujiatun, a suburb of Shenyang, the major city in northeastern China, he said.

Mr. Jin then said he found out that a large underground prison was built beneath the hospital and that members of the outlawed Falun Gong religious group were being held there. As many as 6,000 people are thought to be held prisoner at the underground facility, he said.

The hospital is harvesting the organs of the prisoners, including kidneys, livers, and eye parts, he said. The organs are then sold to people, from both China and abroad, who need medical organ transplants.

One source for Mr. Jin was the wife of a hospital doctor who was involved in the organ harvesting. The doctor suffered psychological problems as a result of the gruesome medical work and disclosed the secret activity. The Chinese woman also has fled to the United States.

Several other hospital workers also revealed details about the prisoner organ harvesting.

Mr. Jin said he had to hide his true identity after being threatened by Chinese government agents. He was arrested twice for his reporting and recently fled to the United States, where he hopes to seek political asylum.

DOJ_NMG_0020792

Mr. Jin said bodies of the prisoners were burned in the boiler room of the hospital and that boiler room workers had taken jewelry and watches from the dead and sold them. He said he has provided information about the organ harvesting to U.S. government officials, including members of Congress.

A Chinese Embassy spokesman could not be reached for comment.

Regarding the Japanese diplomat, Mr. Jin said he first learned of the intelligence operation in December. Japan's government protested the Chinese intelligence operation, which Beijing dismissed as a groundless accusation.

China Adds To Uncertainty Over Jailed Times Aide (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

BEIJING, March 23 — The United States on Thursday continued to press China about the status of a jailed researcher for The New York Times, but the uncertainty about his fate deepened as a Chinese government spokesman appeared to cast doubt on whether he would soon be released.

The case against Zhao Yan, 44, a Chinese researcher in the Beijing bureau of The Times, was withdrawn last Friday by a court order. His lawyer said the withdrawal of the charges against him — one count of fraud, another of disclosing state secrets to The Times — meant that Mr. Zhao would soon be released, possibly on an equivalent of bail.

But the Chinese authorities have since remained silent about the status of Mr. Zhao, and he is still behind bars. Asked on Thursday afternoon about the case, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, Qin Gang, criticized foreign news organizations for making "irresponsible statements," and he then offered a cryptic response.

"You ask if Zhao Yan will soon be released," Mr. Qin said during a regular news briefing for foreign reporters. "From what I have learned, the actual situation is not like what you are talking about."

Pressed for specifics, Mr. Qin refused to elaborate and also declined to identify the source of his information. "I think my information channel will be more authoritative than yours," he said.

The suggestive but vague comments underscored the confusion surrounding a case that has brought international criticism of China. Mr. Zhao has spent 18 months in prison without a hearing. His arrest is directly linked to a Sept. 7, 2004, article in The Times that disclosed an unexpected offer by former President Jiang Zemin to resign his final leadership post as chief of the military.

The article prompted a high-level government investigation to determine who had leaked the information about Mr. Jiang's offer.

Mr. Zhao has denied the charges, and The Times has also denied that he leaked any state secrets to the newspaper.

During the past week, American officials have met with their Chinese counterparts to try to clarify the status of his legal case and to press for his release. On Thursday, the State Department issued a new statement on the case, calling on China to release Mr. Zhao.

"We have repeatedly stated that we believe that Mr. Zhao should be released on the lack of merit of the case against him," the State Department said. "We urge China to honor its constitutional guarantees of freedom of expression."

Mo Shaoping, Mr. Zhao's lawyer, said he filed a second motion with Beijing prosecutors this week asking that his client be freed immediately. Mr. Mo repeated that the decision by prosecutors to withdraw the case meant that Mr. Zhao should be released. He said that prosecutors must introduce new charges based on new evidence if they intended to prosecute him in the future.

Some foreign and Chinese legal experts agree that the rationale used by prosecutors to withdraw the case was unusual. Prosecutors asked for the withdrawal to provide more time to investigate the lesser fraud charge. Such an explanation is usually given when prosecutors want to delay, not withdraw, a case. But legal experts say this unorthodox wording could have been an intentional way to drop the case without prosecutors or state security agents admitting error. It also could potentially allow for Mr. Zhao to be released, but on a restricted basis, akin to bail.

DOJ_NMG_0020793

On Thursday, prosecutors in Beijing told family members of Mr. Zhao that they were awaiting instructions from higher officials. Zhao Kun, an older sister of Mr. Zhao, visited the prosecutors' office on Wednesday and Thursday but was denied an audience with the authorities overseeing the case.

Ms. Zhao said she asked to meet with the chief prosecutor on Saturday, a day when the office schedules meetings between prosecutors and the public. But she said she was told that she would not be eligible for a meeting because the case against her brother had been withdrawn.

Another official in the office told Ms. Zhao that local prosecutors were not authorized to give her any information about the case.

A Chinese Journalist In Jail (NYT)

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

As China moves ahead steadily in the global marketplace, its ultimate success will depend not just on its buying power. Among other things, China must have a free press and a judicial system based on the rule of law rather than political power. One highly public test of both will be whether the Chinese authorities release Zhao Yan, who has been in jail for nearly 18 months on specious charges that he revealed state secrets to The New York Times.

Last week, the authorities appeared to withdraw the charges against Mr. Zhao, who is a researcher for the Times staff in China. But instead of releasing him quickly, as should have been the case, the Chinese government has been sending distressingly mixed signals about the status of Mr. Zhao. And he remains languishing in a Beijing jail.

Mr. Zhao, 44, is a seasoned journalist who was well known for covering rural issues before he joined the Times bureau in April 2004. He was arrested shortly after The Times published an article in September of that year predicting, correctly, that the former president, Jiang Zemin, would retire from his last official post.

The release of such information should not be a reason to jail any journalist anywhere, of course. But in any case, Mr. Zhao has denied that he gave the story to his colleagues, and Times editors have repeatedly assured the Chinese authorities that Mr. Zhao was not a source for the information about Mr. Jiang's retirement.

Mr. Zhao is not the only journalist unjustly jailed in China, and it is fair to say that our concern is heightened by his association with The Times. But his arrest shows how China can too easily use the courts to silence any journalist who crosses some unseen line of behavior and offends some unnamed person in power. It is an example of the government's need for a scapegoat when coverage about high officials or the Communist Party does not turn out as the leadership would have scripted it.

The United States authorities have taken up Mr. Zhao's cause. Most recently, the United States Embassy in Bejing issued a statement reiterating that he was wrongly arrested and indicted.

By now, it should be clear to the Chinese authorities that American leaders and the international news media are not going to forget this case. Mr. Zhao's plight should remain on the agenda for President Hu Jintao's first official visit to Washington next month. A better outcome would be for China to follow up on the withdrawal of the charges against Mr. Zhao and releasing him immediately.

Japan Suspends Loans To China On Strained Ties (FT)

By David Pilling In Tokyo

Financial Times, March 24, 2006

Japan has suspended decisions on new yen loans to China, blaming its increasingly strained ties with its biggest trading partner and former wartime adversary.

The move, although largely symbolic, marks a fresh low in relations between Asia's two biggest powers, which have been dogged by disputes over territory and natural resources.

Ties have worsened in recent years because of annual visits by Junichiro Koizumi, Japan's prime minister, to Tokyo's Yasukuni shrine, where 14 war criminals are honoured alongside millions of war dead.

Shinzo Abe, chief cabinet secretary, said on Thursday that Tokyo would "put off making a decision on yen loans for this fiscal year to China...because of various situations surrounding Sino-Japanese relations".

DOJ_NMG_0020794

However, Mr Abe, the frontrunner to succeed Mr Koizumi as prime minister in September, said the freeze signalled a delay, not a suspension, and that yen loans would continue with the aim of securing "future-oriented Sino-Japanese relations".

Japan announced last year that it was winding down aid to China from 2008, the year of the Beijing Olympics. However, this is the first time that a reduction or freeze in loans has been explicitly linked with politics.

Previously, Tokyo had argued that China no longer needed aid because of its growing economic might – an explanation that succeeded in muting Chinese protests.

Both India and Indonesia get more Japanese aid. Mr Abe is considered a hardliner on China because of his insistence on visiting the Yasukuni shrine and support for revising Japan's pacifist constitution.

Qin Gang, a spokesman for China's foreign ministry, said at a regular briefing in Beijing that the two countries were facing "a complicated situation and severe hardship in our relations".

He conceded that Japanese soft loans to China, which total more than ¥3,000bn ($25.7bn €21.2bn), had been beneficial. Much Chinese infrastructure in the thriving coastal cities has been built with Japanese money.

However, Mr Qin said the loans had also helped Japanese companies, a reference to Japan's practice of tying aid to work undertaken by domestic contractors.

"Such an agreement is mutually beneficial," he said. "It is not charity given by one country to another."

Many Japanese officials say privately that soft loans to China have not been properly recognised by the Chinese authorities. Japan's low-interest loans to China were ¥86bn in 2004, less than half the peak figure reached in 2000.

Meanwhile, Tsuneo Watanabe, chairman of the mass-circulation Yomiuri newspaper, said on Thursday that Japanese leaders had still not apologised properly for wartime atrocities.

Coming from one of Japan's most conservative newspapers, the statement is a reprimand to figures such as Mr Koizumi and Mr Abe for allowing relations with China to deteriorate so far.

"The great blame attaches to Japan for having been involved in a war of invasion," Mr Watanabe said. "It is incumbent on Japan to apologise, and it is unfortunate that our apologies in the past have been half-hearted."

Mr Watanabe said his newspaper could not support Mr Abe as the next prime minister unless he renounced "market fundamentalism", blamed for widening social divisions, and stopped visiting the Yasukuni shrine.

Japan Cuts Off Loans To China; Relations Chill (WT/AP)

By Kana Inagaki, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

TOKYO -- Japan said yesterday it was freezing its loans to China through the end of this month because of worsening relations between the two nations, which increasingly have become economic rivals.

Criticism is mounting in Japan that China's booming economy no longer needs the handouts. The two also are squabbling over natural resources and the bitter legacy of World War II.

Chief Cabinet Secretary Shinzo Abe said Japan won't give any more of the loans to China during the current fiscal year, which ends next Friday. He said the government may release the loans again next month if the situation improves.

"We have decided to waive a plan to provide loans for fiscal 2005, considering the current situation surrounding the Japan-China relations," Mr. Abe said. "We will monitor future development in Japan-China relations while continuing discussion [on the loans] within the government."

China reacted coolly to news of the suspended loans, appealing for dialogue.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Qin Gang said the two countries are facing "a complicated situation, and we have severe hardship in our relations."

"We should have exchanges and consultations over the differences and problems, and properly resolve those issues," he said at a briefing. "On Japan's credit to China, we think this issue should also be resolved in line with this principle."

Ties between Japan and China have deteriorated in the past year as the two feud over maritime gas deposits near disputed islands in the East China Sea, interpretations of World War II history and other issues.

DOJ_NMG_0020795

The United States has expressed concern about the growing tensions between the two Asian powers and urged them to find common ground and overcome their differences for the sake of stability in the region.

"We have encouraged good relations between China and Japan, and even though there are difficulties in that relationship, China and Japan also share a lot of interest and, indeed, a lot of trade and commerce and a lot of economic relations," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said last Friday during a visit to Australia.

China reportedly proposed joint exploration of separate gas deposits, but Japan said it had no intention of jointly developing gas fields near the islands -- called Diaoyu by China and Senkaku by Japan.

Japan-Taiwan Ties Blossom As Regional Rivalry Grows (WP)

By Anthony Faiola

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

TAIPEI, Taiwan -- Early rising seniors have gathered for years to exercise among the yellow lotus blossoms and fuchsia rhododendrons of Chiang Kai-shek Memorial Park, the sprawling gardens in this island's capital. Now local residents stretch their limbs in slow-moving tai chi routines amid a landscape distinctly altered by the addition of 450 cherry trees, a national symbol of Japan.

The trees, set in a park commemorating a leader who fought Japan during World War II, are among the first of more than 10,000 that Japanese and Taiwanese groups intend to plant across Taiwan. They are seen as emblems of the newly blooming relationship between the Pacific neighbors -- a tie that only underscores the competition for regional influence between Japan and China, East Asia's two major powers.

With Japan seeking to shed a half-century of pacifism and reassert itself in world affairs, and China acquiring vastly larger economic and military might, relations between the two are as tense as they have been at any time since World War II.

Nowhere is their contest more visible than here in Taiwan, which China regards as a renegade province that must be reunified with the mainland, by force if necessary. In recent months, Japan has made a series of unprecedented overtures toward Taiwan, which was a Japanese colony from 1895 to 1945. In Tokyo, leading politicians are increasingly adopting the view that Japan must come to the island's aid in the event of Chinese aggression.

Many analysts say they believe Japan's evolving interest in Taiwan could tilt the regional balance of power. The United States, which has diplomatic relations with mainland China, is nonetheless sworn by the Taiwan Relations Act of 1979 to defend the island territory if it is attacked.

"The peace and stability of the Taiwan Strait and security of the Asian Pacific region are the common concerns for not only Taiwan, but also Japan and the United States," Taiwanese President Chen Shui-bian said during an interview last week. Therefore, he said, "Japan has a requirement and an obligation to come to the defense of Taiwan."

Like many countries, Japan severed diplomatic ties with Taiwan in the 1970s in deference to Beijing's "one-China" policy. But lately, Japan has been less particular about its rule of maintaining a careful distance. Twice in the past two months, Japan's foreign minister, Taro Aso, has angered China by publicly referring to Taiwan as "a country." Last year, the Tokyo government dropped visa requirements for visitors from Taiwan. And Japanese and U.S. leaders have for the first time jointly declared protection of the Taiwan Strait a "common strategic objective."

In a less public gesture, Yoichi Nagano, formerly a general in the Japanese Ground Self-Defense Force, the army, is serving as the first military attaché at Tokyo's de facto embassy in Taipei, the Interchange Association. In an interview, Nagano said he conducts meetings with Taiwanese government and military figures and sends regular dispatches to Tokyo.

In 2004, a group of Japanese legislators formed a committee on Taiwanese security. This May, Tokyo is set to allow former president Lee Teng-hui, the Japanese-educated champion of Taiwanese democracy, to visit Japan for the second time in 18 months. So-called Track 2 meetings between Japanese and Taiwanese politicians, academics and retired military officials have intensified, according to officials in Taiwan and Japan.

These moves coincide with the rise to power in Japan of a new crop of hawks in the long-ruling Liberal Democratic Party headed by Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi. During his five years in office, Koizumi has pushed aside rivals in the LDP who had long stressed the importance of maintaining a respectful distance from Taiwan.

DOJ_NMG_0020796

The shift also comes as China's military buildup is causing growing concern in Japan. The Beijing government boosted military spending by 15 percent this year. Tensions were particularly heightened after riots broke out across China last year against Japan's bid for a permanent seat on the U.N. Security Council and the publication in Japan of textbooks allegedly whitewashing the country's militarist past.

The Japanese view a potential Chinese takeover of Taiwan gravely. Such a move would give Beijing a perch for its missiles a mere 66 miles from Japanese territory while helping China to control the shipping lanes that carry the bulk of Middle East oil coming to Japan.

Japan has countered with uncharacteristic assertiveness. In November 2004, Japanese warships chased a Chinese submarine that had entered Japanese waters near Taiwan in what was widely seen as a test of Japan's resolve in defending the strategically sensitive zone.

Koizumi's government is also investing millions of dollars in a joint missile defense system with the United States. Some analysts say Taiwan could eventually become part of the system, turning it into a three-way defense against Chinese missiles.

Japan's pacifist constitution limits the country's ability to deploy its military abroad. But political leaders in both Japan and Taiwan are embracing a broad interpretation of a 1999 law allowing Japan to respond to threats in nearby waters. This, they say, could provide a legal basis for Japan to join the United States in responding to Chinese aggression.

Most of these leaders agree that Japan would be able to contribute rear-guard refueling, transportation and medical services and perhaps conduct search-and-rescue missions inside Taiwan. If Japanese ships or personnel providing such assistance were attacked, "it would mean war," said Tokuichiro Tamazawa, a leading LDP lawmaker long involved in the Taiwan issue.

Tadashi Ikeda, chief representative of the Interchange Association, Japan's unofficial embassy in Taipei, said Tokyo remained strongly in favor of a peaceful solution to the Taiwan issue. But, he added, "there has always been a question of what Japan would do" in the event of Chinese aggression. "Now the Taiwanese can say that both the U.S. and Japan are on their side."

U.S. officials have cautiously welcomed the more assertive Japanese stance. But they have also expressed concern that too sudden a shift could embolden Chen, Taiwan's president, to take steps toward formal independence that could ignite a cross-strait conflict.

China's relations with Japan have nose-dived since Koizumi took office and promptly began paying annual visits to Tokyo's Yasukuni Shrine, which honors Japan's 2.5 million military dead, including World War II criminals. Japan and China have also become embroiled in disputes over territorial claims and oil and gas drilling rights in the East China Sea.

Chen said in the interview last week that relations between Japan and Taiwan were at their closest since the two countries' 1972 diplomatic break. Chen said he hoped it would lead to a three-way "quasi-military alliance" among the United States, Japan and Taiwan.

In contrast with the Chinese and Koreans both North and South, many Taiwanese view the years of Japanese colonial rule in sympathetic terms. Older Taiwanese often delight in speaking Japanese, the official language of their youth. Imperial-era structures, including the elegant Presidential Office Building that was once the seat of the Japanese governor, have been painstakingly preserved and declared national treasures.

Japan and Taiwan are exchanging a record 2.3 million tourists each year, and Japan remains Taiwan's largest trading partner. Large Japanese department stores and fast-food chains dominate the Taipei cityscape.

"The Japanese built universities, roads and other infrastructure. They educated us, they turned us into a more modern society," said Hwang Kuan-hu, a national policy adviser to Chen. "We welcome Japan becoming more involved again with Taiwan."

Not everyone in Taiwan shares that sentiment, particularly members of the opposition Nationalist Party, which favors closer ties with China. Earlier this year, the party took offense when Japanese and Taiwanese groups jointly erected a monument in a Taipei suburb honoring thousands of aboriginal Taiwanese who died fighting for the Japanese Imperial Army in Southeast Asia. A few weeks later, most of the monument was ordered dismantled by local Nationalist Party officials.

DOJ_NMG_0020797

Ma Ying-jeou, the Nationalist Party chief who opinion polls indicate is the favorite to win Taiwan's 2008 presidential election, described the incident as a good example of the emotions that could be unleashed if the embrace of Japan goes too far.

Taiwanese who revel in the Japanese colonial years "are still brainwashed," Ma said. "It was not a just war, and Taiwan could have done better" without the citizens who now recall that period with fondness.

Beijing's Aggression (WT)

By Jaushieh Joseph Wu

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

During his visit to Japan in November 2005, President George W. Bush said that by embracing freedom at all levels, Taiwan has delivered prosperity to its people and created a free and democratic society. For Taiwanese who lived through the four decades of authoritarianism and martial law under the Chinese Nationalist Party (KMT), Mr. Bush's words were no less an official recognition of what Taiwan has fought hard to achieve over the past few decades.

We, the Taiwanese people, understand and appreciate that the U.S. government has contributed significantly to our democratization. As Taiwan has now democratized, some in Washington have shifted their attention to other authoritarian battlegrounds. We've recently seen some of these defenders of liberty challenge giant American enterprises that are helping the Chinese regime. The Taiwanese people applauded this act, just as we cheered Mr. Bush's speech in Japan.

While some writers and other advocates of freedom continue to struggle on inside China, Taiwan is quietly helping by working hard to poke small holes in the "Great Firewall" with the hope that very soon information can freely flow to the Chinese people. Taiwan's own experience tells us that as long as there is outside support, freedom fighters will continue their battle from within against that seemingly invincible enemy, state control. The Taiwanese people stand firm together with members of Congress and these Chinese champions of liberty both in word and in deed.

Ironically, Taiwan, just like any other young democracy, still bears some trappings of the authoritarian dictatorship of the past. The national anthem of Taiwan is that of the KMT, and the emblem of the national flag is the KMT emblem. In addition, corporations such as China Airlines, China Ship Building, China Petroleum, and China Steel are actually Taiwan's state-owned corporations, not China's.

For any other newly democratized country, the issues mentioned above could be easily remedied. Unfortunately for Taiwan, these issues persist because China consistently threatens Taiwan with force when these issues are publicly discussed. But just like in any other democracy, these issues will not be ignored and will be open to public deliberation. Taiwan's government understands the sensitivity of these issues and has handled them with prudence, despite public opinion strongly being in favor of the continuation of political reform. Taiwan is deeply committed to maintaining peace and stability in the region.

In Taiwan today, there is a clear sense of insecurity despite pride in her democratic achievements. China is becoming increasingly more influential internationally and cleverly uses its power to marginalize and suffocate Taiwan. Taiwan cries out for help from time to time, but the results have been extremely disappointing. While Taiwan desires a free trade agreement with the U.S. to counter China's attempt to marginalize Taiwan economically, it has not materialized. While Taiwan worries about China's aggression, its defense budget continues to stall in the legislature. While the world is vulnerable to the spread of avian flu, the World Health Organization still excludes Taiwan.

Almost a year ago, China passed the Anti-Secession Law, which claimed Taiwan to be a part of China and legalized the use of non-peaceful means against Taiwan to enforce that claim. On the advice of the U.S. government, Taiwan offered a muted response to prevent conflict from erupting in the Taiwan Strait. But China's military threat increases, its attempts to suffocate Taiwan internationally grow stronger, and Taiwan becomes increasingly divided and internally weakened in facing China. Regrettably, none of what Taiwan needs to feel secure has been forthcoming.

China again threatened Taiwan when President Chen Shui-bian recently suggested ceasing the function of the National Unification Council (NUC) and its guidelines both remnants of the past regime. The NUC and its guidelines specify that the only course open to a democratic Taiwan is unification with authoritarian China, which goes against a fundamental and guiding democratic principle that the people have the right to determine their own destiny. Ceasing the NUC and the NUG is fully in line with democratic principles.

The Taiwanese government understands the United States' very legitimate concern over whether President Chen's actions constitute a unilateral change of the status quo. The status quo in the Taiwan Strait is that the two sides, China and Taiwan, are fully separate entities, neither having jurisdiction over the other, best exemplified by the democratization of Taiwan, which occurred without regard to what the state of affairs was across the strait. Taiwan fully supports U.S. policy because it is against Taiwan's interests to change what is indeed reality.

President Bush's comments late last year were an encouragement to Taiwan. Taiwan is now refining its democracy, the better to be a beacon for democracy activists in China to follow, and in this endeavor Taiwan deserves U.S. support.

U.S. Freezes Lebanese Media's Assets (AP-Y2)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP2, March 23, 2006

The Bush administration moved Thursday to freeze the assets of several Lebanese media outlets, alleging that they helped raised money and recruits for Hezbollah's terrorist network.

The Treasury Department's action is against al Manar, a satellite TV operator, al Nour Radio and their parent company, the Lebanese Media Group.

Any assets found in the United States belonging to these three outlets will be frozen and Americans are forbidden from doing business with them.

The department alleges that al Manar and al Nour Radio are the "media arms" of Hezbollah, a Lebanon-based group that the United States has designated as a terrorist organization.

"Al Manar and al Nour have supported fundraising and recruitment efforts by Hezbollah," the department said in a release. "Al Manar raised funds for Hezbollah through advertisements broadcast on the network and an accompanying website that requested donations for the terrorist organization."

Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah also allegedly used al Manar and al Nour Radio to publicize an invitation for Lebanese citizens to volunteer for Hezbollah military training, the department said.

"Any entity maintained by a terrorist group — whether masquerading as a charity, a business or a media outlet — is as culpable as the terrorist group itself," said Stuart Levey, the Treasury Department's under secretary for terrorism and financial intelligence.

Al Manar also has provided support to other terrorist groups, including the Palestinian Islamic Jihad and al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, the department alleged.

The department said Nasrallah, along with Hezbollah's executive council, managed and oversaw the budgets of al Manar and al Nour. Moreover, prominent Hezbollah members have been major shareholders in the Lebanese Media Group, the department alleged.

Venezuela, U.S. Reach Airline Agreement (AP)

By Christopher Toothaker, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 24, 2006

The United States and Venezuela have reached a temporary agreement that will avoid a proposed ban on flights by most U.S. airlines to the South American country, the U.S. ambassador said.

William Brownfield said Thursday that officials from both countries agreed to have the U.S. Federal Aviation Administration work with Venezuelan officials to improve local safety standards.

DOJ_NMG_0020799

Venezuelan authorities want the FAA to end safety restrictions that prevent Venezuelan airlines from flying to the United States and had warned that they would decide on March 30 whether to ban U.S. flights.

"I think our two governments have resolved, at least for the moment, the civil aviation problem. We have reached an agreement, the FAA is sending a technical team here to Venezuela," Brownfield told Venezuela's Globovision television channel.

The proposed ban would have prohibited all flights by Houston-based Continental Airlines Inc. and Atlanta-based Delta Air Lines Inc. It would have restricted some by AMR Corp.'s American Airlines, the largest U.S. carrier.

Brownfield had warned last week that Venezuelan flights to the United States would be banned if Venezuela prohibited flights by U.S. airlines.

In 1995, the FAA lowered Venezuela's carriers to category 2, forcing Venezuelan airlines to fly planes rented from U.S. companies or from airlines operating out of category 1 countries, such as neighboring Colombia.

The FAA also said Venezuela must tighten its airline safety procedures and downgraded its civil aviation authority, restricting flights because Venezuela allegedly didn't meet international safety standards.

Despite the restrictions, two Venezuelan lines still serve the United States using rented planes, Aeropostal and Santa Barbara.

Venezuela insists it has long since corrected any safety problems and recently invited FAA officials to inspect its airlines.

Officials at Venezuela's National Aviation Institute could not be immediately reached for comment regarding Brownfield's announcement.

American and Venezuela aviation officials met during an airline security conference in Montreal this week for talks aimed at avoiding the ban.

Assad Kotaite, head of the U.N. International Civil Aviation Organization, said a U.S. mission would visit Caracas early next month to maintain dialogue and assess Venezuela's progress since its last audit.

Thursday's announcement comes amid tense relations between Caracas and Washington.

A U.S. Advisory About Travel In Italy Becomes A Political Issue (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

ROME, March 23 — An American travel advisory on possible dangers in Italy ballooned on Thursday into an issue in the close national election campaign here, with opposition politicians suggesting that the advisory could be used as ammunition against them.

Silvio Berlusconi, the center-right prime minister who is battling to remain in office, immediately seized on the advisory, saying that the "security concerns" addressed in it were caused by demonstrators aligned with the center-left opposition.

"I have the right and the duty to underline the danger of the political left that wishes to bring party leaders to Parliament who want to snuff out our opinions by using violence," Mr. Berlusconi said in Rome.

The travel advisory, issued by the State Department on its Web site this week, warned Americans to avoid large crowds, mentioning specifically a violent demonstration on March 11 in Milan carried out by anti-globalization activists.

The advisory, not as serious as a more formal travel warning, also spoke of "the continuing threat of terrorist attacks" in Italy, and mentioned Al Qaeda specifically.

Romano Prodi, Mr. Berlusconi's main opponent, who is supported by several leftist parties, was concerned enough by the implication that leftist demonstrators constituted a threat that he called the American ambassador, Ronald Spogli, for an explanation on Thursday.

"He explained to me that it is standard practice, but I remain very surprised," Mr. Prodi said on Italian radio on Thursday, referring to Mr. Spogli. "Because a move like this, with the elections so close, can bring with it a sense of anguish and fear, and there is no need for that."

Ben Duffy, a spokesman for the American Embassy, said that while such advisories were not common in Western Europe, Washington had issued 70 such advisories in the past year. A similar one was issued earlier this year as a result of widespread rioting on the outskirts of Paris.

DOJ_NMG_0020800

Mr. Duffy said there was no intention for the embassy to become involved in Italian politics. The election is next month.

"We anticipated this as an issue," he said. "In Italy everything is about the campaign, and in fact this is done by the consular affairs bureau, an independent channel without regard to the political impact."

Belarus Protest Dispersed As Police Arrest Hundreds (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

MINSK, Belarus, Friday, March 24 — Belarussian riot police officers arrested hundreds of antigovernment demonstrators early Friday morning in the central square of Minsk, ending five days of protests with a swift police action.

The police arrived on six large trucks just after 3 a.m., wearing black riot helmets and masks, and surrounded the small encampment in October Square.

The demonstrators, who had been protesting a rigged presidential election last Sunday, stood their ground while the officers dismounted and jogged into place in lines, cutting off any chance of escape.

For a few minutes, as the police awaited the final command, the demonstrators' loudspeaker worked, and one of their leaders ordered the protesters to sit down and hold hands before the police moved in.

They chanted, shouting "The police are with the people!" and "Truth! Truth! Truth!" but offered no resistance visible to journalists, who were ordered by the police to stand about 50 yards away.

The demonstrators were easily outmatched. The police carried away the first few protesters and loaded them onto trucks, and in a few minutes the remainder of the demonstrators, who appeared to be at least 300 strong, left in orderly columns and boarded waiting buses and trucks.

Some raised their fists in defiance as they boarded. The operation was over in less than 25 minutes.

The police sweep came a day after the government of President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko confirmed his overwhelming victory for a third term in office, with the election commission saying his final tally was 83 percent of the vote.

International observers have said the vote was neither free nor fair. The United States has condemned both Mr. Lukashenko and the election and called for a new vote, saying the campaign was conducted by a dictator in a climate of fear.

Mr. Lukashenko's main challenger, Aleksandr Milinkevich, was not in the camp as the police advanced. He denounced the action after visiting the detention center where the demonstrators were taken.

"This authoritarian government has once again shown its beastly face," he said in a telephone interview. "It has never been able to maintain a dialogue with the society. It knows only the language of violence and lies, and this is why its power is bankrupt."

He said he had no reports of beatings or injuries during the arrests, but added, "I do not know what is going on in the jail."

Another candidate, Aleksandr Kazulin, appeared at the square after the last demonstrators were taken away and cleaning crews were sifting through the broken remains of the camp.

He criticized the government's decision to end the peaceful act of civil disobedience, the likes of which had never been seen in Mr. Lukashenko's 12 years of autocratic rule.

Mr. Kazulin confronted a police official at the scene, Deputy Interior Minister Viktor Filistovich, and scolded him for resorting to police action. He then walked away, visibly angry.

"It is a disgrace," he said. "They did this mop-up in a cowardly way, at night."

The small encampment had been a potent attraction in a police state that has never tolerated dissent. Hundreds of protesters had stood all week in the wintry cold, singing songs and defying threats of violence and arrest.

And each evening they had been joined for several hours by other citizens, sometimes numbering in the low thousands.

The demonstrators had made it clear that they did not expect to unseat Mr. Lukashenko, whose presidency they regard as illegitimate, but hoped to inspire others to stand up for their rights in a country often called the last dictatorship in Europe.

Mr. Milinkevich had also said that what had been happening in Belarus was not merely a challenge to an election, but the start of an opposition movement that could eventually bring civil society and human rights to a country that operates like a Soviet anachronism.

The demonstrators had planned a larger rally in the square for Saturday, but with much of their core group now in police custody, the prospects were uncertain.

It was also not clear, however, whether other opposition members were away from the square and eluded capture, just as it was not clear whether the police were rounding them up in the darkness.

At least 200 opposition members had already been arrested during the week, seized as they left the square and tried to reach their homes.

Mr. Milinkevich, who officially received 6.1 percent of the vote, said the protest on Saturday would still be held.

Lukashenko Foes In Minsk Encampment Bid to Rally Support

MINSK, Belarus -- Police in riot gear stormed a tent camp in this capital city early Friday morning, detaining oppositionists in a central square protesting President Alexander Lukashenko's victory in an election they say was rigged.

The arrests came after a half dozen police buses and 75 helmeted riot police with clubs pulled up to Oktyabrskaya Square about 3 a.m.

The police stood around for a few minutes and then barged into the tent camp. They wrestled about 40 to 50 of the demonstrators, who were resisting, into buses. The rest of the approximately 200 people were taken into custody without apparent resistance. By the end of the 10-15 minute operation, all of the protesters had been taken away.

The response by police to remove the ragtag symbol of opposition further highlights the obstacles faced by the region's pro-democracy groups, despite the success of such efforts in Ukraine and Georgia. Thousands of people had been converging on the square throughout the week, but, numbed by the cold, the number of protesters had been dwindling to a ragged ring of a few dozen by the morning.

Western television had been broadcasting the evening crowds. But here in Belarus, footage beamed to millions of homes by state-run television showed the desolate early morning, when the few protesters who had been braving the frosty night meandered near tents amid piles of garbage and beer bottles.

Oppositionists who have lived for 12 years under the authoritarian rule of Mr. Lukashenko are used to rough treatment from the state-controlled media, which had also lately labeled many of the opposition social and sexual deviants on the payroll of Western governments.

But the poor turnout of the defenders, who each night locked their arms and faced riot police, prompted a split in the country's opposition. Some had said the creation of the encampment was a tactical mistake that threatened to discredit their cause, and they wanted the tents dismantled.

They instead saw the nightly meetings held on the square as a better symbol for their movement, and had pinned hopes on a significant protester turnout tomorrow, a national holiday that is a traditional gathering time for opponents of Mr. Lukashenko.

Prior to the raid, Alexander Kozulin, a presidential candidate in the elections held Sunday, had publicly called for the tent city to be abandoned, saying it was an easy target for police. Mr. Kozulin said it was inhumane to ask youths -- the protesters were mostly college-age students -- to remain on their round-the-clock vigil in subfreezing temperatures.

Alexander Milinkevich, another presidential candidate who is considered the leader of the Belarussian opposition, had also said he would have preferred that the demonstrators go home, but he would support them as long as they wanted to stay. "This will end only with the decision of the youths themselves," he said.

Mr. Milinkevich had been making the rounds at the settlement each night, shaking hands with its defenders. Yesterday, before the police action, he said that although the demonstrations had been comparatively small and hadn't succeeded in achieving protesters' demands for new elections, they represented a big step forward. "Nobody had expected what has happened here," he told tent-camp residents.

DOJ_NMG_0020802

At the crux of the debate, the oppositionists said, was whether Belarus's opposition was mature enough to mount a movement like the one that occurred in neighboring Ukraine, in which a tent city on Independence Square in Kiev was a nucleus for demonstrations that reversed rigged presidential elections in 2004.

In Ukraine, the opposition received sustenance from business leaders, and the Kiev city government helped put up portable toilets for the campers.

In Minsk, campers were besieged by riot troops, who searched the bags of anyone heading toward the camp and often arrested those who tried to leave. Yesterday, a United Nations envoy called for the release of protesters. Police had closed down a makeshift latrine concealed under a tent pitched over a manhole cover.

More devastating, however, was that the encampment became an easy target for influential Belarussian government television. In Ukraine, oppositionists had their own television station, which elevated protesters and their leaders to hero status.

In Minsk, state-television coverage homed in on the tent city in its more desolate moments. What's more, television accused protesters of staying out all night because they are on the payrolls of Western governments. Much of the state-run information campaign against the opposition focused on the U.S., which has said it won't recognize the election results.

Prior to the police action, Oleg Manaev, head of an independent think tank in Minsk and a supporter of the opposition, said that at least a third of Belarussians have no access to media outside the government channels. "In smaller towns and villages, these reports are very much believed," he said.

Mr. Manaev said the blitzkrieg of bad publicity was probably one reason why the turnout for the demonstrations hadn't been enough to prompt hope for immediate change. While he supported the tent encampment, he had also hoped the opposition would come up with longer-term goals.

Police Break Up Belarus Protest (WT/AP)

By Jim Heintz, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

MINSK, Belarus -- Police stormed the opposition tent camp in the Belarusian capital of Minsk early today, detaining scores of demonstrators who had spent a fourth night in a central square to protest President Alexander Lukashenko's victory in a disputed election.

The arrests came after a half dozen large police buses and 75 helmeted riot police with clubs pulled up to Oktyabrskaya Square in central Minsk about 3 a.m.

The police stood around for a few minutes and then barged into the tent camp filled with protesters.

An Associated Press reporter on the scene said they wrestled about 40 to 50 of the demonstrators, who were resisting, into buses. The rest of the 200 demonstrators were taken into custody without apparent resistance.

By the end of the 10- to 15-minute operation, all of the protesters had been taken away. All that remained were their tents -- kicked down during the raid -- their gear and garbage.

Police had been detaining opposition supporters and would-be protesters away from the square, but today's arrests marked the first time they had tried to forcefully eject the demonstrators en masse.

Their action followed opposition leader Alexander Milinkevich's warning yesterday that increased persecution would only strengthen protests against the authoritarian government.

This week's protests over the official figures giving a landslide win to Mr. Lukashenko have consistently attracted thousands nightly -- and more than 10,000 at the first one Sunday -- an exceptional number in the tightly controlled former Soviet nation, which has a history of swift, violent police dispersal of small rallies. A core of about 200 has held the square overnight.

But the numbers have been far too small to pose a real threat to the hard-line Belarusian leader's rule.

That has raised increasing questions about what the opposition movement's strategy is, or even if it has one. A rally called for tomorrow -- the anniversary of the declaration of the first independent Belarusian state, and a traditional day for opposition rallies -- is likely to be key in determining how much support the opposition has.

"March 25 will be an important day. ... On that day, we will make known the long-term plans of the opposition," Mr. Milinkevich said.

DOJ_NMG_0020803

Later, speaking to a nighttime crowd of about 3,000, he said, "The 25th will be a day of freedom for thousands and thousands of Belarusians. History has shown that the Belarusian fight for freedom has not gone unnoticed. We have come out into the square."

U.S. Ends Trade Restrictions On Ukraine (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 23, 2006

President Bush signed a law Thursday that ended Cold War-era trade restrictions on Ukraine, opening the way for the former Soviet republic to join the World Trade Organization.

The measure frees Ukraine from a 1974 measure called the Jackson-Vanik Amendment, which links trade benefits to the emigration and human rights policies of former or current communist states.

The new law is "going to strengthen our ties with our good friend Ukraine and create new economic opportunities for our two countries," Bush said at a White House ceremony attended by members of Congress who sponsored the legislation.

He said the bill would open new markets for American products and help Ukraine develop its economy and raise the living standards of its people.

Bush said the United States supports Ukraine's goal of joining the 148-nation WTO this year and will help it resolve issues standing in the way of its entry. Removal of the U.S. trade restrictions was a necessary step to gain entry.

"Ukraine is committed to economic freedom, democratic progress and open trade," he said.

Since 1993, the United States has annually granted Ukraine normal trade relations on a temporary basis.

Ukraine President Viktor Yushchenko, whose pro-Western government was elected in January, has welcomed the U.S. legislation, saying "consistent U.S. steps in support of Ukraine on the way of reform are evidence of strategic partnership between the countries."

U.S. exports to Ukraine, including poultry and agriculture machinery, totaled $531.7 million in 2005. Imports from Ukraine, including steel and coke used in making steel, totaled $1.1 billion.

Sen. Richard Lugar (news, bio, voting record), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said Ukraine has demonstrated a commitment to greater freedom and free market principles.

On Sunday, Ukraine's voters will be choosing from 45 parties to fill the single-chamber parliament. Some 7,605 candidates are running.

Yushchenko's job is not at stake, but those of his prime minister and Cabinet are, as new constitutional reforms come into effect that give Parliament more powers in shaping the government.

The pro-Western path adopted by Yushchenko could be slowed if pro-Russian Viktor Yanukovych makes a comeback Sunday, with goals such as membership in NATO by 2008 dropping off the screen in favor of closer ties with Moscow.

Yanukovych's political future had been written off after he was accused of trying to steal Ukraine's 2004 presidential election.

Infighting May Return Power To Soviet-era Party (WT)

By Natalia A. Feduschak

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

KIEV -- Political allies who stood side by side during Ukraine's 2004 "Orange Revolution" are waging war against each other in such a divisive campaign that the Soviet-style apparatchiks they had ousted are poised for a comeback in elections this weekend.

Opinion polls show that the party of Viktor Yanukovych, who won the presidency in an election in 2004 only to lose to Viktor Yushchenko in a court-ordered second vote, will win about a third of the seats Sunday, becoming the biggest single bloc in Ukraine's 450-seat parliament.

The so-called "Orange coalition," which includes followers of Mr. Yushchenko and those of former Prime Minister Yulia Tymoshenko, has ruptured so badly that its ability to forge a postelection alliance is in doubt.

"We can say that Ukraine's post-Soviet era has decidedly ended with these elections," said Myron Wasylyk, an American who has advised politicians and businessmen in Ukraine for more than a decade. "This is the beginning of the democratic era."

DOJ_NMG_0020804

The vote is the first under constitutional changes adopted earlier this year that reduce presidential powers at the expense of a prime minister, to be elected in parliament.

Forty-four parties are vying for a presence in the legislature. The latest polls show the combined strength of the feuding Yushchenko and Tymoshenko parties at slightly less than that of the Yanukovych party.

Mr. Yushchenko and Mrs. Tymoshenko have been at odds since the president fired her as prime minister in the summer.

Mr. Yushchenko said the dismissal was prompted by infighting that followed the peaceful revolution that ushered in 2005.

The feud between former allies has helped Mr. Yanukovych, who has kept a low profile since his defeat in 2004 and has hired a U.S. public relations firm to advise his campaign. Still, Mr. Yanukovych is not trusted in many regions of Ukraine.

Many politicians and analysts say the forces of the Orange Revolution are fated to work together, even if they can't get along.

Foreign Minister Boris Tarasyuk told the Brookings Institution in Washington earlier this month, "We are confident that the pro-democracy forces will gain a clear majority."

"Despite the fragmentation between the pro-democracy political parties, their combined approval rating has even slightly grown. There should be no doubts that the pro-democracy parties are capable of bridging their differences and restoring the Orange coalition," he said.

Mr. Yushchenko's popularity has fallen since his inauguration last year. Supporters have accused him of weak leadership, mismanagement and failure to investigate crimes by former government officials, widely promised during the presidential campaign.

Still, during his tenure, Ukraine's relationship with the West has improved markedly.

Both the United States and the European Union granted Ukraine market-economy status, important steps in the country's bid to become a member of the World Trade Organization.

In Washington yesterday, President Bush signed legislation that ends Cold War-era trade restrictions on Ukraine. The measure frees Ukraine from a 1974 U.S. law that links trade benefits to the emigration and human rights policies of former or current communist states.

The new law is "going to strengthen our ties with our good friend Ukraine and create new economic opportunities for our two countries," Mr. Bush said at a White House ceremony attended by members of Congress who sponsored the legislation.

As the elections approach, Kiev is awash in the colors of the various parties running not only in parliamentary, but also regional and municipal elections on the same day.

About 3,500 election observers from Europe and the United States have arrived in Ukraine. Thus far, a high-ranking Western observer told journalists, the main problems in the elections have been technical and not political.

Ethnic And Cultural Divisions Haunt Ukraine Before Vote (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

SIMFEROPOL, Ukraine — There are few obstacles to speaking Russian here in Crimea since, after all, practically everyone speaks it at home, at school, at work.

Still there are those who complain that the language is under assault, that the courts issue rulings in Ukrainian, that Russian classics are now taught in schools as "foreign" literature, that a repressive government in the capital, Kiev, is bent on imposing a nationalistic identity on a place that was part of Russia until Nikita S. Khrushchev decreed otherwise in 1954 (and, to some here, should be again).

"Whatever we receive from Kiev is all in Ukrainian!" Yevgeny G. Bubnov, a member of Crimea's regional Parliament, complained in an interview as he explained why he sponsored a proposal to hold a referendum on whether to elevate Russian to official status in a country where, constitutionally, Ukrainian is the language of the land.

The federal government fiercely opposed Mr. Bubnov's proposal and ultimately rejected it. But the constitutional clash it threatened to create highlighted the stark ethnic and cultural divisions that continue to haunt Ukraine with the approach of the March 26 parliamentary elections — the first since the Orange Revolution a little more than a year ago.

DOJ_NMG_0020805

The referendum even raised questions about the status of Crimea itself — a lush peninsula of seaside resorts, vineyards and a largely Russian populace, whose political, economic and cultural affiliations are closer to Moscow than to Kiev.

And that, its critics say, was exactly the point.

"It is playing with the sentiments of the population that is still nostalgic for Soviet times, those who reacted painfully to the breakup of the Soviet Union," said Vladimir B. Shklar, the Crimean leader of Our Ukraine, the political party of the country's president, Viktor A. Yushchenko. The parliamentary elections are the first electoral test of Mr. Yushchenko's policies since he took office in January 2005, after mass protests against a fraudulent presidential election. According to the polls, at least, he is faring badly, with his bloc trailing the party led by the man he defeated, Viktor F. Yanukovich.

As in the presidential race, the main issues revolve around Russia, namely Ukraine's relations to Russia, its larger neighbor. Nowhere are those issues more charged than in Crimea, home not only to a majority of ethnic Russians but also to Russia's Black Sea Fleet, a source of tensions for nearly a decade.

As the election campaign began in earnest in January, a group of young people gathered with shovels on the isthmus that connects Crimea to the mainland to dig a symbolic trench. Few openly call for separatism, which is a federal crime, but several smaller parties and blocs are running on platforms calling for closer cooperation with Russia and even reunification.

One party based in Crimea even calls itself the Party of Putin's Politics. Its billboards show President Vladimir V. Putin's steely eyes fixed on the rugged Crimean landscape, promising a united future.

Mikhail Y. Pushia stood on a square the other day in Sevastopol, the deep-water port city on Crimea's southern bulge, campaigning for Natalia M. Vitrenko, the leader of a fiercely anti-American and anti-European bloc of parties that advocate a new union among the Slavic nations of Russia, Belarus and Ukraine.

With a union, he said, "all the problems would be solved."

The problems between Russia and Ukraine, of course, are considerable, largely because the ties that once united them are now a source of tension.

A New Year's dispute over the price of Russian natural gas, on which Ukraine is heavily dependent, prompted Russia to shut down supplies briefly, infuriating many Ukrainians.

Mr. Yushchenko's deal with Mr. Putin to end the crisis — with a complicated pricing system and a murky trading company — proved equally unpopular, however. Mr. Yanukovich argues that he could have negotiated lower prices because of his friendly relations with Russia.

In the wake of the gas dispute, Ukraine responded with threats to charge higher rent for the base in Sevastopol that houses the Black Sea Fleet's dozens of ships and 14,000 sailors under a lease set to expire in 2017. Russia now pays roughly $98 million a year; some Ukrainian officials have suggested that billions would be more appropriate.

In January, Ukraine occupied one of the fleet's lighthouses in Yalta, saying Russia was using it illegally, provoking a war of words and a new round of negotiations to defuse the confrontation. When student protesters began demonstrating at eight other lighthouses, the fleet bolstered security around them.

Russia's defense minister, Sergei B. Ivanov, warned that revising the terms of the lease would reopen a separate treaty that fixed the borders, which is what many here say they would like to see happen.

"This is a Russian city," said Aleksandr N. Mironov, an ethnic Russian who settled in Sevastopol after serving in the Soviet border troops.

Mr. Yanukovich's Party of Regions does not openly endorse such sentiments, but he has promised to make Russian a second official language and to improve economic and political relations with Russia, which have been strained since Mr. Yushchenko took office.

Mr. Yushchenko's supporters say that the language issue and the tensions over the naval base have been exaggerated with the intent to divide Ukrainians and ethnic Russians, who account for roughly two-thirds of Crimea's nearly two million people, as well as large majorities in the eastern Ukraine regions of Donetsk and Lugansk. Another predominately Russian city, Kharkiv, voted on March 6 to adopt Russian as a second official language in municipal affairs.

Khrushchev's decision to cede Crimea to Ukraine mattered little during Soviet times, but immensely after the Soviet Union collapsed in 1991 and internal administrative borders became international boundaries. It was not until 1997 that Russia and Ukraine reached agreement on how to divide the fleet and to accept the current borders.

Despite impassioned oratory on each side, the prospects of an open conflict appear slight. But Mr. Yushchenko's supporters warn that Russia continues to interfere in Ukrainian politics on the hope that a friendlier government led by Mr. Yanukovich as a newly empowered prime minister could result in better terms for the fleet and for the Russians living here.

"This is not going to be solved until after the election," a Russian naval officer in Sevastopol said in an interview, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment on what has become a diplomatic matter.

Petro O. Poroshenko, a tycoon closely allied with Mr. Yushchenko, complained recently that proponents of the language referendum were trying to turn Crimea into a client state of Russia.

"Look what happened in Abkhazia with Russian support," Mr. Poroshenko said, referring to the Black Sea region in Georgia that became a separatist enclave with Russian help after a bloody war in the early 1990's. "The land is almost as beautiful as the Crimea, and they have hundreds of thousands of refugees. There is no development."

Although the language issue has been defused for now, it has resonated deeply in Crimea, hardening support for Mr. Yanukovich, who won 81 percent of the vote here in the repeated second round of the disputed 2004 presidential race, and fanning resentments against Kiev.

The election, warned Vasily A. Kiselyov, the acting chairman of Crimea's Parliament and a Yanukovich stalwart, could lead to a new wave of large street protests, even tent camps, only this time against Mr. Yushchenko's government.

De Villepin Agrees To Talks With Unions (FT)

By Martin Arnold

Financial Times, March 24, 2006

Dominique de Villepin invited trade unions to talks over his unpopular employment law on Thursday "with no strings attached", a move cautiously accepted by five unions and widely interpreted as a climbdown by the embattled French premier.

The appeal came as Mr de Villepin faced accusations that his refusal to consider changing the law had provoked an unnecessary crisis, with critics suspecting he had allowed his presidential ambitions to override his political judgment.

The meeting could happen on Friday. But the offer for it came only after a long and reportedly heated meeting with President Jacques Chirac, fuelling rumours that the prime minister was ordered to back down.

The new law, which allows companies to fire people aged under 26 in the first two years of their contract without reason, has sparked widespread protests by students and workers which erupted into violence in central Paris yesterday.

Students condemn the "first job" contract, saying it would make them "the Kleenex generation", used and then discarded.

More rallies and strikes are planned for Tuesday.

Unions want the law withdrawn. François Chérèque, leader of the moderate CFDT union, said: "If the prime minister does not respond positively to our demand to withdraw the first job contract, we will end the conversation."

Critics suspect Mr de Villepin has fallen into the same trap as his hero Napoleon Bonaparte, ousted after leading France to military defeat at Waterloo.

Analysts, opposition Socialists and members of his own centre-right UMP party said he had tried to push reform too far, too fast, in pursuit of his personal ambitions.

"President Chirac has told him to back down as he was leading the country to the wall," said Dominique Moisi, a senior adviser at France's Institute for International Relations. "He tried to convince himself he could be France's Margaret Thatcher, but forgot he was only the number two."

Nicolas Sarkozy, the interior minister and Mr de Villepin's main centre-right rival for next year's presidential election, has distanced himself from the premier, suggesting he should have held more talks and sought a "more equitable" law.

Unions Agree To Meet French Leader (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

DOJ_NMG_0020807

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

PARIS, March 23 - France's most powerful labor union federations agreed Thursday to meet Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin on Friday to discuss the country's hotly contested new employment law, even as fires burned in Paris after another demonstration against the law.

Hundreds of thousands of students marched in protest against the new law in cities and towns across France, frequently clashing with the police. In Paris, demonstrators threw chunks of concrete at police officers, while three cars and a shoe store went up in flames in the city's exclusive Seventh Arrondissement. The police fired tear gas and scuffled with demonstrators in Rennes in the northwest and Marseille in the south after protests that drew thousands of marchers in those cities.

By late in the day, riot police forces began using paint guns to shoot vandalism suspects with red or green dye in order to identify them later. Several hundred people were reported arrested.

Mr. de Villepin wrote to French labor union federations early Thursday, appealing for talks on the new law, which the unions have opposed and want rescinded. The law, which the government says was meant to spur hiring, would allow employers to dismiss workers under 26 without cause during their first two years on the job. The law is currently under review by France's Constitutional Council. If approved by the council, it would go into effect next month.

François Bayrou, leader of the small Union for French Democracy, a center-right opposition party, said Mr. de Villepin must remain open to withdrawing the law. "The time has come, if we want to avoid mounting dangers and risks, to make this gesture," Mr. Bayrou said on France's Europe-1 radio.

France's five major union federations had earlier refused to talk to the government as long as the law remained on the books. In a statement released Thursday afternoon they said that in responding to Mr. de Villepin's latest appeal they repeated their demand that he rescind the law. They called a meeting Friday, before the meeting with Mr. de Villepin, of all organizations involved in fighting the new law and repeated their call for strikes and demonstrations next Tuesday.

Protest Turns Violent In Heart Of Paris (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

PARIS, March 23 -- It was just the scene the French government had been dreading: burning cars seven blocks from the Eiffel Tower, shop windows smashed along one of the capital's toniest streets, and columns of helmeted riot police advancing across the greensward of a prominent tourist venue.

Antoil Ethuin, 48, stood outside the shattered windows of his Bike n' Roll rental shop Thursday, stunned by the destruction of the worst violence in two weeks of student protests in Paris and other French cities.

"My country is broken," said Ethuin, gazing at the smoldering automobile carcasses a few yards away and the carpet of glass shards, broken dishes and computer pieces covering the sidewalk in the heart of one of the city's most affluent neighborhoods. "I never imagined I would ever see this in Paris."

Thursday's violence came at the end of a demonstration by tens of thousands of high school and college students protesting a new job law. The unrest intensified a political crisis that now threatens to unravel President Jacques Chirac's government -- much the way previous French governments have been felled by strikes and street protests when they attempted even modest reforms of the country's costly welfare state.

Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin -- author of the contentious law that would make it easier for companies to both hire and fire young workers -- has scheduled an emergency meeting with the country's most influential labor unions Friday in an effort to defuse the crisis.

The demonstrations have underscored the widening divide between the French government and its people at a time when France is losing both economic and political clout on the global stage. Street protests and general strikes, often occurring in the spring, have long been an accepted political ritual in France, and they now have become a symbol of the country's inability to reform a stagnant economy hobbled by inflexible labor laws, high taxes and a corpulent welfare system.

It is a crisis also facing other countries across Europe as governments of the left and the right have similarly attempted to alter their costly systems of generous health, unemployment and welfare benefits; most, like that of former German chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, have failed in the face of widespread resistance to change.

On Thursday afternoon, as a crowd of as many as 140,000 young people and others prepared to end their march in the large park fronting the gold-domed Hotel des Invalides housing Napoleon's tomb, gangs of hooded and masked youths darted out of side streets, setting cars ablaze, flipping others upside down, breaking store windows and throwing rocks and stones at police and firefighters, according to witnesses.

Riot police broke up the groups of rampaging youths with tear gas as acrid, black smoke filled narrow streets and billowed above the city skyline.

Police said 60 people were injured in the clashes, including 27 police officers, and 141 people were arrested.

The shellshocked owner of the Shanghai Restaurant overlooking the Esplanade des Invalides stood outside the jagged glass of his doorway, dejected and slump-shouldered. Broken dishes and pots of white and purple flowers littered the street. Inside, splintered chairs and table settings covered the restaurant floor.

Nearly a dozen stores, restaurants and apartment buildings were attacked and damaged. Firefighters struggled to extinguish the flames of three burned-out cars. Four other vehicles had been overturned or severely battered.

In the park across the street, hundreds of riot police clad in black uniforms and carrying shields advanced toward groups of suspected troublemakers against the backdrop of the Hotel des Invalides, the low-slung Foreign Ministry building and the golden statues standing sentry at the Invalides Bridge traversing the Seine River.

The attacks at the corner of Rue Saint Dominique and Rue Fabert, just a short walk from the Eiffel Tower in Paris's affluent and touristy 7th arrondissement, followed a pattern that has emerged in the last few days of marches.

While the demonstrations have been orderly and peaceful, groups of 200 to 300 youths who police say do not appear to be participating in the organized marches have appeared suddenly during concluding rallies, taunting police and creating havoc.

Police have speculated that the gangs may be from the poor suburban areas that erupted in riots last fall. In those disturbances, youths across France -- many of them immigrants or French-born children of immigrants -- burned thousands of cars and hundreds of public buildings and private businesses to protest government indifference to the joblessness and lack of social services in their communities. Little of that violence spilled over into Paris or other urban centers.

Both the suburban riots and the ongoing student demonstrations have been devastating to Chirac's government and could destroy the presidential aspirations of his party's two leading candidates -- Villepin and his rival, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy.

Sarkozy was blamed for fueling last fall's riots with derogatory and inflammatory comments directed at youths in the suburban housing projects.

Villepin attempted to capitalize on Sarkozy's political misfortunes by pushing a law he said was intended to give companies greater incentive to hire young people. Now, many members of Villepin's party are distancing themselves from the prime minister. French newspapers on Thursday began reporting leaks from anonymous government officials that Chirac is threatening to fire Villepin if he does not resolve the crisis quickly.

The law, scheduled to take effect in April, would allow employers to fire workers under age 26 without cause during their first two years on the job.

Under existing law, it is impossible to fire even the most incompetent workers without huge financial liabilities for companies. College students, other young people and unions say the new law discriminates against the young by denying them the job security that older workers have.

Even as Ethuin, the bike rental shop owner, surveyed the damage along his block Thursday afternoon, he couldn't bring himself to criticize the young people whose demonstration brought the violence to his doorstep.

"They have no jobs," he said. "It's not their fault."

Moscow Presses For WTO Status (WT)

By John Zarocostas

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0020809

GENEVA -- Russia is pressing to wrap up a 13-year bid to join the World Trade Organization before it hosts the Group of Eight summit this summer, subject to a series of U.S. commercial demands, senior diplomats and trade officials say.

The talks can certainly "close before the G-8 summit," said Robert Vastine, president of the influential U.S. Coalition of Service Industries, a Washington-based umbrella group that represents major services corporations.

But he indicated the ball is squarely in President Vladimir Putin's court.

"I see no sign of the U.S. letting down on its demands and I hope they remain firm," said Mr. Vastine, a former senior Treasury official.

One dispute involves financial services, especially insurance, with Washington insisting that foreign-controlled firms be allowed to establish branches in Russia.

Russia's push to enter the WTO follows a furious dispute with Washington this winter over natural gas supplies -- a row that for a brief period threatened to derail the WTO effort as well.

Russia cut off natural gas supplies to Ukraine, prompting Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to accuse Russia of using its energy resources as a political weapon and suggest that Russia was not fit to lead the G-8.

"When you say you want to be ... responsible actor in the international economy, then you play by its rules," Miss Rice said at the time.

Russia's action plunged much of Western Europe into a mid-winter panic: The pipelines extend through Ukraine and gas supplies suddenly plummeted for much of the continent.

Russia quickly backed down, turned the gas back on and settled its differences with Ukraine.

With the entry of China into the WTO in December 2001, and Saudi Arabia last year, Russia is the only major global economic power outside the agency that oversees most world trade in goods and services worth over $11 trillion a year.

Russia's deputy trade minister and chief WTO negotiator, Maxim Medvedkov, is holding talks all this week in Geneva with Dorothy Dwoskin, assistant U.S. trade representative and chief U.S. negotiator.

In the gas dispute, Russia denied U.S. charges that its actions were politically motivated. In negotiations over joining the WTO, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov turned the tables by accusing Washington of holding up talks for political reasons.

Mr. Vastine dismissed Mr. Lavrov's assertion in a telephone interview yesterday.

"That's just not true," he said, noting that the United States has a solid track record of isolating commercial agreements from political considerations.

Even in the aftermath of the September 11 terrorist attacks, Mr. Vastine said, Washington has managed to keep commercial dealings separate from broader political and strategic issues.

According to diplomatic sources close to the Kremlin, the Russians were rattled by the expedited economic and political treatment given recently by the Bush administration to neighboring Ukraine, which is also a candidate to join the 149-member WTO, and is expected to join ahead of Moscow.

The new ambassador from Ukraine is becoming a frequent visitor to the White House, where yesterday he was present as President Bush signed a landmark trade bill lifting Cold War sanctions on the former Soviet republic.

Russia is still subject to those same restrictions, under a law widely known as Jackson-Vanik, meaning it requires a presidential waiver to obtain normal tariff rates.

Issues holding back a U.S.-Russia deal to join the WTO include lack of progress related to intellectual property protection, demands for better market access for certain U.S. agricultural products and civil aircraft, branching rights for U.S. insurance companies and Russian agricultural subsidies.

A senior Russian official said the Kremlin has agreed to increase the maximum stake foreigners can have in the country's banking sector from 12.5 percent up to 50 percent,

Similarly for insurance the maximum stake foreigners can have in the sector, he said, would be increased from 25 percent to 50 percent.

To secure WTO entry, Russia has agreed to bring its average industrial tariffs down to single digits and to lower other trade and investment barriers to many sectors of its economy.

Russia is to host the G-8 summit in St. Petersburg in July. Besides Russia, the group includes the United States, Britain, Canada, France, Germany, Japan and Italy.

EU Ministers Consider Immigrant 'contracts' (FT)

By Hugh Williamson

Financial Times, March 24, 2006

The six largest countries in the European Union are considering having immigrants sign a 'contract' that would require they learn the language of their adopted country and accept its social norms – or risk being expelled.

The so-called integration contract is still to be discussed with the other 19 EU member states. Nicolas Sarkozy, French interior minister, proposed it during a meeting of ministers from the 'G6' countries – Germany, Britain, France, Poland, Spain and Italy -- in Heiligendamm, a luxury resort on Germany's Baltic coast. His idea is based on draft procedures already being debated in France.

The ministers also agreed to form joint anti-terror police and forensic teams that could be dispatched within hours to locations in EU member states where a terrorist attack has occurred.

The contract proposal comes amid controversy in several EU member states over the appropriate steps to ensure foreigners accept local customs and speak the language.

In Holland, hopeful immigrants are being shown a film that includes images of a topless woman on a beach, two men kissing in a park, and ghettos as part of an entrance test covering the language and culture of Holland. And in Germany, two regional states have in recent months proposed starkly different tests to be completed by foreigners wishing to become German citizens.

Wolfgang Schäuble, German interior minister, said agreement was needed on differing forms of integration procedures – ranging from initial immigration to tests for full citizenship – but stressed that this was "a pressing challenge for the whole of the EU that must be addressed".

Spain's interior minister Jose Antonio Alsonso Suarez used the meeting to call on the EU to redraw its strategy towards illegal immigrants, from Africa in particular. He said EU institutions and funds were still geared largely to dealing with migrants from north Africa, while in reality thousands were now coming from other regions, especially in west Africa.

Charles Clarke, British interior minister, told the Financial Times he supported the move towards an integration contract, initially by asking experts from the G6 to review comparable procedures used in member states. He acknowledged that such an agreement could be used as a check that "new immigrants live up to the values of our society", with expulsions a possible consequence if they do not. Previous G6 proposals on migration and anti-terror issues have been endorsed by the entire EU.

On anti-terror measures, Mr Clarke said the joint teams "were unlikely to have a permanent base, but would be networked to respond quickly to an attack". He said that while Britain, for instance, could draw on institutional ties to other police forces after the terror attacks in London last year, other countries did not have such links, so quick response teams "could be very useful".

Tensions Rise As Chirac Walks Out On EU Forum (FT)

By George Parker And Chris Smyth

Financial Times, March 24, 2006

Jacques Chirac, French president, Thursday night stormed out of a European Union summit after a French industrialist began addressing leaders of the bloc in English.

Mr Chirac and two senior French ministers walked out in protest at the decision of Ernest-Antoine Seillière, head of the Unice employers organisation, to make a plea for economic reform in what he called "the language of business".

Mr Chirac's boycott re-flected the tensions surrounding the two-day economic summit, which comes against a backdrop of French street protests over labour market reform and claims that Paris is engaged in protectionism of its energy market. The French president was not in the room to hear Mr Seillière urging leaders to "resist national protectionism in order to avoid a negative domino effect".

DOJ_NMG_0020811

He returned after Mr Seillière had finished speaking. Angela Merkel, Germany's chancellor, on Thursday issued a thinly veiled warning to France and Spain to open their energy markets, as the dispute over protectionism overshadowed the start of the summit.

Ms Merkel said Europe needed continent-wide industrial champions, and that attempts by member states to ringfence their national energy companies made nonsense of the EU's single market. "We can only have an internal market when electricity flows freely and when we accept European champions and don't just think nationally," she said at the start of the meeting.

Ms Merkel's intervention came as the EU's 25 heads of government gathered for their first summit since the row over protectionism in the energy sector erupted earlier this month. She is among those continental leaders who believe a European energy policy is impossible unless member states agree to create a single electricity and gas market with cross-border grids and in-dustrial takeovers. She is annoyed with Spain, which is opposing a takeover of Endesa, the Spanish utility, by Eon of Germany.

Meanwhile Silvio Berlusconi, Italy's prime minister, has accused France of trying to block a takeover by Enel, the Italian utility, of Suez, its Franco-Belgian rival. Paris intervened by merging the state-owned Gaz de France with Suez. Mr Berlusconi said he would not create a row over the issue at the summit and that the matter now rested with the European Commission.

Wolfgang Schüssel, Austria's chancellor and the summit host, said the word "protectionism" did not come up at last night's summit dinner, and the endorsement of an EU energy policy represented an historic de-bate.

Leaders agreed to set up a "strategic energy review", an "energy efficiency action plan" and a "renewable energy road map", but there were disagreements on some of the more contentious aspects of the strategy.

The proposed energy policy, although supported in principle by member states, is already under strain.

Some capitals oppose a new European energy regulator to promote cross-border energy trading. Some also have doubts about the development of an EU emergency gas reserve. The economic summit comes at a time of concern in some European countries about globalisation.

The proposed French changes on Thursday won the backing of Joaquín Almunia, EU monetary affairs commissioner, who said the measure would help to reduce youth unemployment. "The new contract will help young French people get their first job and prove their worth," he said.

Will Peru Choose Another Path? (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

Peruvian labor lawyer Isaac Humala's call, last Friday, for the release of the jailed leader of the Shining Path might be interpreted, in another time and place, as a cheesy publicity stunt by an aged communist.

After all, the 75-year-old Humala would seem to have long ago lost his revolutionary struggle in Peru, where the Shining Path's Maoist terrorism in the 1980s claimed the lives of so many indigenous peasants.

But Mr. Humala is no ordinary communist has-been. He is the father of Ollanta Humala, the candidate now leading in the presidential race that will be decided by voters in two weeks. The son immediately distanced himself from his father's rhetoric, but in the light of the candidate's own extremism, the country's history of left-wing military rule and the current Shining Path resurgence, Papa Humala's plea on behalf of a terrorist leader was disquieting.

Markets recognized the danger Monday after Peruvian opinion pollster Apoyo announced that Ollanta is now likely to place first on April 9 and is in a statistical dead heat with center-right candidate Lourdes Flores in a hypothetical second-round runoff between the two. The "Humala effect" sent the Lima Stock Exchange index down almost 4% and sparked a sell-off in the Peruvian sol as well. This is not the first time in recent months that markets have signaled panic about Ollanta. An earlier Humala surge provoked more than a 6% pullback in Lima's equity market in December.

The reason investors are spooked is simple: The former army officer's economic platform, though void of specifics, is openly hostile toward the private sector. In an interview last month published in Spain's ABC newspaper Ollanta described the aim of his nationalism as an effort to reclaim the country from its "neo-colonial" status. "Our natural resources" he said, "are committed to foreign capital and they do not yield any profit for us."

DOJ_NMG_0020812

His avowed intent to stick it to the private-sector -- with an emphasis on mineral and natural gas rights -- frightens investors. More troubling is the threat of a return to what effectively would be a left-wing military government in one of South America's fastest growing economies. Peru suffered that fate over a quarter-century ago, with disastrous results.

Ollanta didn't burst onto the Peruvian political scene only recently. The former lieutenant colonel has been agitating for power for years and even attempted a coup d'etat against Alberto Fujimori in 2000. We reported on him as a looming menace in June 2003, in a piece titled "Some Peruvians Fear a Return of Comandante Rule."

At that time, we cited observations by Enrique Ghersi, a Lima attorney and co-author of the global best-selling political treatise titled "The Other Path," about Ollanta's political career: "Notwithstanding that he took up arms in the last days of Fujimori, [he] has just been 'rewarded' with the post of military attaché in France. Huge blunder. Three of the last military dictators had the same job. After which they returned to Peru to lead a coup: Oscar R. Benavides, Luis M. Sanchez Cerro and Juan Velasco Alvarado. If history is not mistaken, Ollanta Humala perhaps could be next."

Mr. Ghersi noted that since the coup d'etat is no longer in vogue, the aspiring caudillo would be more likely to follow the example of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, who also engaged in a failed coup attempt, did time briefly in jail and emerged a popular hero. As if to fulfill the Ghersi prophecy, the Chávez-wannabe has already announced that, should he win, he will call for a rewriting of the constitution, a tactic Chávez used to tighten his grip on power.

In his interview with ABC, Ollanta confirmed his admiration for the Venezuelan. "We are both military men, we have risen up against a corrupt regime and we have both suffered imprisonment. I acknowledge that his government is nationalist and patriotic. In that sense, I see that he is on the right track."

This view of the world didn't come about accidentally. Though he is a well-to-do middle-class Limeño, Papa Isaac founded an ethno-nationalist movement whose goal it is to conduct a popular indigenous revolution. It was to this end, presumably, that he enrolled two of his young sons in the Peruvian military school. Ollanta's brother Antauro, a former army major, is now serving time for a 2005 attack on a police station in which four police officers were killed.

Ollanta's popularity, Mr. Ghersi noted in 2003, suggests that Peru may be following a Latin American trend toward "neomilitarism" with a "pronounced populist accent and a generous dose of communist infiltration." He wrote, "Fundamentally it represents the popular discontent that exists against democratic politics in Latin America."

The discontent is understandable. While it is true that the economy grew by 4% to 5% annually from 2002 to 2004 and an estimated 5.5% in 2005, a decade of such returns might be needed to convince voters that their lives are changing.

It is also true that booming mineral and farm prices tend to show up in the pockets of northern Peruvians. Mr. Ghersi noted to me in a phone interview on Monday that the more populated south has not participated as much in the country's economic growth. Moreover, Peruvian public education is controlled by a far-left teachers union that holds private ownership and profits to be almost criminal. With more than half the voters under the age of 25, the poll numbers are not surprising.

With the Shining Path now reportedly beginning to dominate the lucrative coca growing business among the indigenous population -- an important constituency for Ollanta, as it is for Bolivia's Evo Morales -- there is cause for grave concerns about regional stability.

There is still a chance that Ollanta will lose. And even if he wins, he will not have a bonanza as large as the one Chávez derives from high oil prices. But what is nearly certain, if he makes it to the presidency, is that his tenure will increase property-rights insecurity and damage Peru's recent growth spurt. There can be no doubt that Peruvians face a crucial choice next month and that another Latin country is in danger of succumbing to yet another bout of corporatist authoritarianism.

Democracy Isn't 'Western' (WSJ)

By Amartya Sen

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

"The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars, but in ourselves, that we are underlings." Culture too, like our stars, is often blamed for our failures. Attempts to build a better world capsize, it is alleged, in the high sea of cultural resistance. The determinism of culture is increasingly used in contemporary global discussions to generate pessimism about the feasibility of a democratic state, or of a flourishing economy, or of a tolerant society, wherever these conditions do not already obtain.

DOJ_NMG_0020813

Indeed, cultural stereotyping can have great effectiveness in fixing our way of thinking. When there is an accidental correlation between cultural prejudice and social observation (no matter how casual), a theory is born, and it may refuse to die even after the chance correlation has vanished without trace. For example, labored jokes against the Irish, which have had such currency in England, had the superficial appearance of fitting well with the depressing predicament of the Irish economy when it was doing quite badly. But when the Irish economy started growing astonishingly rapidly, for many years faster than any other European economy, the cultural stereotyping and its allegedly profound economic and social relevance were not junked as sheer rubbish. Theories have lives of their own, quite defiantly of the phenomenal world that can be actually observed.

Many have observed that in the '60s South Korea and Ghana had similar income per head, whereas within 30 years the former grew to be 15 times richer than the latter. This comparative history is immensely important to study and causally analyze, but the temptation to put much of the blame on Ghanaian or African culture (as is done by as astute an observer as Samuel Huntington) calls for some resistance. Mr. Huntington closes his contrast with a spectacular formula: "South Koreans valued thrift, investment, hard work, education, organization and discipline. Ghanaians had different values. In short, cultures count." Ghanaians, and perhaps many other Africans, seem doomed to stagnate, according to this analysis.

In fact, that cultural story is extremely deceptive. There were many important differences, other than any differences in cultural predispositions, between Ghana and Korea in the 1960s. First, the class structures in the two countries were quite different, with a very much bigger -- and proactive -- role of business classes in Korea. Second, the politics were very different, too, with the government in South Korea eager to play a prime-moving role in initiating societal reform and economic development in a way that was not true in Ghana. Third, the close relationship between the Korean economy and Japan, on the one hand, and the U.S., on the other, made a big difference, at least in the early stages of Korean economic expansion.

Fourth -- and perhaps most important -- by the 1960s South Korea had acquired a much higher literacy rate and a much more expanded school system than Ghana had. Korean massive progress in school education had been largely brought about in the post-World War II period, mainly through resolute public policy, and it could not be seen just as a reflection of cultural difference. This is not to suggest that cultural factors are irrelevant to the process of development, but they do not work in isolation from social, political and economic influences. Nor are they immutable.

The temptation of founding economic pessimism on cultural resistance is matched by the evident enchantment, even more common today, of basing political pessimism, particularly about democracy, on alleged cultural impossibilities. While it is easy enough to understand the widespread -- and increasing -- doubts about armed intervention allegedly aimed at jump-starting democracy in Iraq through largely foreign and military planning, it would be quite a leap from there to become skeptical of the general possibility of the emergence of democracy in any country that is currently nondemocratic. It is worth remembering that democracy has developed well enough in many countries in Asia, Africa and Latin America, and in the case of some, such as South Africa, even foreign assistance to local democratic movements (for example through economic boycott) has positively helped.

When it is asked whether Western countries can "impose" democracy on the non-Western world, even the language reflects a confusion centering on the idea of "imposition," since it implies a proprietary belief that democracy "belongs" to the West, taking it to be a quintessentially "Western" idea which has originated and flourished exclusively in the West. This is a thoroughly misleading way of understanding the history and the contemporary prospects of democracy.

Democracy, to use the old Millian phrase, is "government by discussion," and voting is only one part of a broader picture (an understanding that has, alas, received little recognition in post-intervention Iraq in the attempt to get straight to polling without the development of broad public reasoning and an independent civil society). There can be no doubt at all that the modern concepts of democracy and of public reasoning have been very deeply influenced by European and American analyses and experiences over the last few centuries (including the contributions of such theorists of democracy as Marquis de Condorcet, Jefferson, Madison and Tocqueville). But to extrapolate backward from these comparatively recent experiences to construct a quintessential and long-run dichotomy between the West and non-West would be deeply misleading. There is a long history of public reasoning across the world, and while it has gone through ups and downs everywhere, the sharp priority of liberal tolerance that has emerged in the West over the past three centuries reflects how social evolution can strengthen and consolidate one tendency to the exclusion -- or near exclusion -- of other tendencies.

The belief in the allegedly "Western" nature of democracy is often linked to the early practice of voting and elections in Greece, especially in Athens. Democracy involves more than balloting, but even in the history of voting there would be a classificatory arbitrariness in defining civilizations in largely racial terms. In this way of looking at civilizational categories, no great difficulty is seen in considering the descendants of, say, Goths and Visigoths as proper inheritors of the Greek tradition ("they are all Europeans," we are told). But there is reluctance in taking note of the Greek intellectual links with other civilizations to the east or south of Greece, despite the greater interest that the Greeks themselves showed in talking to Iranians, or Indians, or Egyptians (rather than in chatting up the Ostrogoths).

Since traditions of public reasoning can be found in nearly all countries, modern democracy can build on the dialogic part of the common human inheritance. In his autobiography, Nelson Mandela describes how influenced he was, as a boy, by seeing the democratic nature of the proceedings of the meetings that were held in his home town: "Everyone who wanted to speak did so. It was democracy in its purest form. There may have been a hierarchy of importance among the speakers, but everyone was heard, chief and subject, warrior and medicine man, shopkeeper and farmer, landowner and laborer." Mr. Mandela could combine his modern ideas about democracy with emphasizing the supportive part of the native tradition, in a way that Gandhi had done in India, and that is the way cultures adapt and develop to respond to modernity. Mr. Mandela's quest for democracy and freedom did not emerge from any Western "imposition."

Similarly, the history of Muslims includes a variety of traditions, not all of which are just religious or "Islamic" in any obvious sense. The work of Arab and Iranian mathematicians, from the eighth century onward reflects a largely nonreligious tradition. Depending on politics, which varied between one Muslim ruler and another, there is also quite a history of tolerance and of public discussion, on which the pursuit of a modern democracy can draw. For example, the emperor Saladin, who fought valiantly for Islam in the Crusades in the 12th century, could offer, without any contradiction, an honored place in his Egyptian royal court to Maimonides, as that distinguished Jewish philosopher fled an intolerant Europe. When, at the turn of the 16th century, the heretic Giordano Bruno was burned at the stake in Campo dei Fiori in Rome, the Great Mughal emperor Akbar (who was born a Muslim and died a Muslim) had just finished, in Agra, his large project of legally codifying minority rights, including religious freedom for all, along with championing regular discussions between followers of Islam, Hinduism, Jainism, Judaism, Zoroastrianism and other beliefs (including atheism).

Cultural dynamics does not have to build something from absolutely nothing, nor need the future be rigidly tied to majoritarian beliefs today or the power of the contemporary orthodoxy. To see Iranian dissidents who want a fully democratic Iran not as Iranian advocates but as "ambassadors of Western values" would be to add insult to injury, aside from neglecting parts of Iranian history (including the practice of democracy in Susa or Shushan in southwest Iran 2,000 years ago). The diversity of the human past and the freedoms of the contemporary world give us much more choice than cultural determinists acknowledge. This is particularly important to emphasize since the illusion of cultural destiny can extract a heavy price in the continued impoverishment of human lives and liberties.

Mr. Sen, the 1998 Nobel laureate in economics, is the author of "Identity and Violence: The Illusion of Destiny," published next week by Norton.

Genocide's Neighbors (WP)

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

AMONTH AGO President Bush called for doubling the peacekeeping force in the Sudanese region of Darfur and expanding the role of NATO countries in bolstering it. Since then, the case for intervention has only grown stronger: There have been fresh reports of death-squad attacks on civilians in Darfur and of violence spilling into neighboring Chad. But the odds of deploying a serious peace force have receded, despite the president's words. The reason is that Sudan's government, the chief sponsor of Sudan's genocide, has threatened violent resistance to a muscular deployment. And Sudan's bluster carries more weight than Mr. Bush's statements.

How can a weak African government get the better of a U.S. president? By persuading fellow governments to believe, or pretend to believe, that replacing the existing African Union troops in Darfur with a larger United Nations peace force would amount to a neocolonialist infringement of Sudanese sovereignty. Needless to say, this is absurd: The United Nations is not an imperialist front. The peacekeepers' purpose would be to save African lives. And the United Nations already has peacekeepers deployed in southern Sudan with the consent of the northern government. But the Sudanese nonetheless persuaded North African members of the African Union, notably Libya, Ethiopia and Egypt, to oppose a beefed-up U.N. force. Sudan's chief negotiator at the desultory Darfur peace talks accused African governments that supported a U.N. deployment of wanting to create "masters in the West and slaves in Africa."

It's a sobering reflection on rich countries' reputation that this sort of clash-of-civilizations broadside can work; it's outrageous that Egypt, a major recipient of U.S. foreign assistance, should lend a sympathetic ear to it. But Sudan's poisonous rhetoric persuaded the African Union to go back on previous indications that it would embrace an early transfer of responsibility from its own peacekeepers. The Africans now say that the earliest possible transfer of authority to the United Nations would be in September.

So Mr. Bush's call for a more serious deployment has been buried for the moment. No peacekeeping force is going to be strong enough to shoot its way into Darfur to establish peace; it will require some form of assent from Sudan's government. The way to get that assent is to put diplomatic pressure on Sudan, above all by achieving a consensus within the African Union in favor of a U.N. deployment. Now that there is no such consensus, the Sudanese feel free to threaten to turn Sudan into a "graveyard" for foreign fighters, and to underline the message by harassing foreign aid workers in Darfur. In the absence of effective peacekeepers, a senior U.N. official recently predicted "massively increased mortality."

Even if a U.N. deployment is off the table until this fall, the United States and its allies have other options. They can press for the enlargement of the existing African Union force and support it with better equipment and logistics. They can enforce a no-fly zone in Darfur, preventing Sudanese government helicopters from supporting ground attacks by the Janjaweed death squads. And they can demand that neighboring countries such as Libya and Egypt support these actions. Don't these Muslim countries care about the genocidal slaughter of Muslims?

TERRORISM NEWS:

Moussaoui Prosecutors Close With FBI Agent (AP-Y2)

By Michael J. Sniffen

AP2, March 23, 2006

Prosecutors wrapped up their case for executing Zacarias Moussaoui with a former FBI agent's testimony Thursday that the bureau could have identified 11 of the Sept. 11 hijackers if the al-Qaida conspirator had confessed when he was arrested a month before the suicide attacks.

Before court-appointed defense attorneys could begin their case, Moussaoui announced loudly as he left for a recess that he would testify in his own behalf.

"I will testify, Zerkin, whether you want it or not," he said, referring to one of his lawyers, Gerald Zerkin. The 37-year-old Frenchman, who is the only person charged in this country in connection with the 2001 attacks, has refused to cooperate with his lawyers.

Former FBI agent Aaron Zebley testified that Moussaoui's admission, when he pleaded guilty last April, that he received more than $14,000 in wire transfers from a man using the name Ahad Sabet could have allowed the FBI to go through Western Union, cell phone, calling-card and motor vehicle records, as well as leases and other business materials to identify most of the 19 hijackers who flew jetliners into the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and a Pennsylvania field.

U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema, who has told the jury it cannot decide Moussaoui's punishment "on speculation," barred Zebley from explicitly asserting what the FBI would have accomplished had he confessed when arrested Aug. 16, 2001.

But Zebley gave prosecutors their strongest testimony in a week when many of their witnesses ended up buttressing the defense argument that the FBI and Federal Aviation Administration badly bungled better intelligence about 9/11 than Moussaoui had in the summer of 2001.

Zebley implied that Moussaoui's lies when arrested while taking pilot lessons in Minnesota foreclosed several avenues of investigation that might have saved at least one of the nearly 3,000 lives lost on 9/11.

"We could have set about finding the hijackers," Zebley said.

For the first hour of more than two hours on the stand Thursday, Zebley had jurors leaning forward to follow his explanation of how FBI agents moved from the data in records of one money transfer by Western Union, through incoming and outgoing calls to a phone number listed on the Western Union record, to the businesses that were called from all those phone numbers, to home addresses listed on business and bank transaction records, to leases and driver's licenses and other IDs recorded by landlords. He said the identities of 11 of the hijackers were learned by these methods within weeks after the attacks and these records existed in August, 2001.

On cross-examination, defense lawyer Edward MacMahon pointed out that neither Moussaoui's statements after arrest nor anything found in a post-9/11 search of his possessions gave away that he got that money transfer by wire. The defense has argued that under the Fifth Amendment Moussaoui had no obligation to incriminate himself when arrested.

MacMahon asked why the FBI didn't launch a full criminal investigation of Moussaoui in August 2001 based on 70 appeals to Washington by arresting agent Harry Samit who warned that Moussaoui was a terrorist training to hijack an airliner.

"The FBI has to have a confession ... before anybody listens?" MacMahon asked.

Zebley replied that Samit did not know all the details in Moussaoui's 2005 confession.

MacMahon got Zebley to acknowledge that nothing in the confession or in FBI evidence gathered since then shows any contact between Moussaoui and the 9/11 hijackers, who lived, trained and traveled together in small groups. Moussaoui pleaded guilty to conspiring with al-Qaida to fly planes into U.S. buildings. But he says he had nothing to do with 9/11 and was training to fly a 747 jetliner into the White House as part of a possible later attack.

MacMahon brought out that the CIA knew in March 2000 that two of the 9/11 hijackers — Nawaf al-Hazmi and Khalid al-Mindhar — had entered the United States in 2000 after attending a conference with Osama bin Laden associates in Malaysia. He showed that the CIA finally told the FBI on Aug. 23, 2001, that the pair were in the United States, and that the FBI sent a message marked "routine" on Aug. 28 asking its New York office to look for them. On Sept. 10, 2001, the FBI New York office asked the Los Angeles office to check for them in hotels there, according an FBI document MacMahon introduced.

"What could have been done if the U.S. government had tracked al-Hazmi and al-Mindhar in the summer of 2001?" MacMahon asked. "We'll never know, right?"

Zebley conceded that point.

The first defense witness, former FBI agent Erik Rigler, summarized a Justice Department inspector general report that criticized the CIA for keeping the al-Hazmi and al-Mindhar intelligence from the FBI for so long and the FBI for assigning pursuit of the pair to one inexperienced, young agent. It said the pair was on Thailand's watchlist in January, 2000, but not on a U.S. watchlist until August, 2001.

Earlier in the trial, Samit said he spent four weeks warning his bosses about the radical Islamic student pilot. He said "criminal negligence" and bureaucratic resistance by FBI headquarters agents blocked "a serious opportunity to stop the 9/11 attacks."

This sentencing trial will determine whether Moussaoui is executed or imprisoned for life.

Meanwhile, Transportation Security Administration lawyer Carla J. Martin, who improperly coached witnesses in the case, was subpoenaed for a Monday hearing, but her legal advisers were considering trying to block the appearance, according to a lawyer familiar with the case. Brinkema said there might be an early Monday hearing.

Moussaoui Prosecution Rests Case After Key FBI Testimony (AFP-Y2)

AFP, March 23, 2006

US prosecutors rested their death penalty case against Zacarias Moussaoui after their key witness said most of the September 11 hijackers could have been found had Moussaoui confessed his Al-Qaeda links before the attacks.

Former FBI agent Aaron Zebley said he used Moussaoui's guilty plea last year to build a web of telephone records, wire transfers and financial data, linking him to the same Al-Qaeda financiers behind the September 11 suicide crews.

His evidence fleshed out the central point behind the prosecution drive for Moussaoui's execution -- namely that had investigators known in August 2001, what they knew in April 2005, they may have been able to stop the attacks.

"Was that information available to the FBI in August 2001?" prosecutor Robert Spencer asked Zebley, at the climax of his testimony.

"It could have been," Zebley replied, earning an immediate objection from Defense Counsel Edward MacMahon.

"Ultimate issue in the case," MacMahon said, an objection upheld by Judge Leonie Brinkema.

MacMahon later challenged Zebley's assessments, as tempers frayed at the start of his cross-examination asking: "So the FBI needs a confession from an Al-Qaeda terrorist to launch an investigation?"

Brinkema then intervened, telling MacMahon and Zebley, who now works as a prosecutor at the Alexandria, Virginia, courthouse hosting the trial, to take a deep breath, "calm down" and take a lunch break.

Zebley testified that financial wire information found in a notebook owned by Moussaoui, details of his money transactions, phone card information and a listing of flight schools could have helped crack the 9/11 plot.

Investigators did not discover those details until after September 11, because FBI bosses concluded -- despite the fears of one agent that Moussaoui was a terrorist who might hijack a plane -- that his answers while in custody in August 2001, did not merit a warrant to search his belongings.

Agents could have unravelled the puzzle from a 14,000 dollar transfer to Moussaoui from Germany, which left a trail to the United Arab Emirates, and back to the September 11 hijackers training in Florida, Zebley said.

Eleven of the 19 hijackers could have been found, Zebley said, including the presumed ringleader of the four hijacking gangs, Mohammad Atta.

Flight school advertising found in Moussaoui's possession could have led to the discovery of Hani Hanjour, the pilot who slammed a plane into the Pentagon and had been at simulator school in Phoenix, Arizona, he said.

According to Zebley, the 11 hijackers could have been traced because they were using their real names.

"What could you have done with these 11 names?" Spencer asked.

"We would have set about finding them of course," Zebley said, adding that the FBI, US intelligence and federal aviation officials could have been alerted.

The US Secret Service could also have been involved as Moussaoui had threatened to fly a jumbo jet into the White House.

But MacMahon later took aim at the prosecution case that had information been gleaned from Moussaoui, most of the hijackers could have been found, playing down links Zebley testified were evident between Moussaoui and the four suicide gangs.

The defense lawyer established under cross examination that Moussaoui had never called the telephone number in the United Arab Emirates associated with the Al-Qaeda money transfers.

He also got Zebley to say that Moussaoui had never called any of the 9/11 hijackers, did not know any of the prospective targets or the date for any of the attacks.

Moussaoui, a Frenchman of Moroccan descent, pleaded guilty last April to conspiring with Al-Qaeda to fly airliners into US buildings in connection to September 11. But he has said he was not to be part of the September 11 strike, but a follow up attack targeting the White House.

Jurors are being asked to decide whether Moussaoui should be executed or sent to prison for life.

After the prosecution rested its case, the judge immediately took the court into a closed session, not involving the jury, without saying what would be discussed.

As he was led from the court, into another chamber where the closed hearing was to take place, Moussaoui raised his hand and shouted at his court appointed lawyers with whom he has refused to cooperate.

"I will testify Zerkin, whether you like it or not, I will testify," he shouted, referring to Gerald Zerkin, a member of his defense team.

FBI Agent Says 9/11 Plot Was Within Grasp (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, March 24, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — Federal prosecutors completed their case Thursday in the sentencing trial of Zacarias Moussaoui with a former FBI agent who said that if Moussaoui had cooperated after his arrest in August 2001, 11 of the 19 hijackers could have been located fairly quickly and stopped before the terror attacks of Sept. 11.

The testimony set the stage for the French terrorist to take the witness stand in his own defense next week.

"I will testify!" Moussaoui shouted to his lawyers after the government presented its last witness. "Whether you want it or not, I will testify!"

His four court-appointed lawyers have urged him not to take the stand, fearing his volatile temper and oft-expressed hatred for Americans will only encourage the jury to sentence him to death.

The government's final witness was Aaron Zebley, one of the FBI's two chief case agents on the Moussaoui investigation, who now works as an assistant U.S. attorney.

He identified a series of phone calls, Western Union money transfers and other evidence linking Moussaoui to Al Qaeda handlers in Germany and the United Arab Emirates. Those same handlers coordinated the movements of the 19 Sept. 11 hijackers in the U.S.

Zebley said that if Moussaoui had told the FBI about these money transfers, agents could have identified 11 of the hijackers and stopped them before they reached the airports in Boston, Washington and Newark, N.J., on the morning of Sept. 11.

"We could have set about finding them, obviously," Zebley said. "We could have shared this information with our law enforcement partners on the federal, state and local levels. We could have shared this with our intelligence partners too, and the Secret Service."

Moussaoui pleaded guilty in April to having a role in the Sept. 11 conspiracy. He said he was handpicked by Al Qaeda front man Osama bin Laden to come to the U.S., take pilot lessons and eventually fly a jet into the White House.

On Sept. 11, three planes struck the two World Trade Center towers in New York and the Pentagon in Washington. A fourth plane, which went down in a western Pennsylvania field after passengers tried to reclaim the jetliner, is believed to have been headed toward either the White House or the U.S. Capitol.

Zebley also testified that had Moussaoui allowed the FBI to inspect his belongings, agents would have found lists of flight schools, including the jet simulator school he was attending in Eagan, Minn., and other pilot training facilities in south Florida where some of the hijackers learned to fly.

"We could have got to those flight schools and looked for people like the defendant," Zebley said. "Somebody rushing through flight school and onto jet simulators. Someone with a Middle Eastern name. We'd be looking for people who look like the defendant."

But under cross-examination, Zebley admitted that there were key elements of the Sept. 11 plot that appeared completely unknown to Moussaoui.

None of Moussaoui's possessions carried the names of any of the hijackers. All of the flight tickets purchased by the hijackers were bought after Moussaoui was arrested, indicating he did not know the date for the attacks. And there also was no proof that Moussaoui knew which buildings and structures were being targeted.

Zebley conceded that FBI does not believe Moussaoui was supposed to have been aboard one of the planes. "There never was a 20th hijacker," Zebley said. But he added, "the plot was to get as many conspirators in the U.S. as possible."

Zebley concluded a troubled prosecution case in which several other FBI witnesses conceded that the bureau had ignored repeated warnings about a looming terrorist attack. And the government's case was hurt when a federal lawyer improperly coached several prospective witnesses familiar with aviation security.

The lawyer, Carla Martin of the Transportation Security Administration, has been subpoenaed to appear Monday before U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema to explain her conduct. The judge barred the "tainted" witnesses from testifying.

DOJ_NMG_0020822

The defense began its case late Thursday by calling Eric Rigler, a former FBI special agent who now runs a criminal justice consulting firm in Texas. Rigler led the jury through the FBI's many "missed opportunities" to detect the plot, as laid out in a report by the Justice Department's inspector general.

The defense is trying to show that even if Moussaoui had cooperated with the FBI, its agents made so many mistakes in the weeks before Sept. 11 that it would be unfair to blame the massive loss of life on the defendant, who was in jail when the attacks occurred.

Moussaoui Shouts His Intention To Take The Stand (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Timothy Dwyer

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Prosecutors concluded their argument yesterday that Zacarias Moussaoui is eligible for the death penalty, and the al-Qaeda operative made it clear in his typically theatrical style that he intends to take the stand.

"I will testify, whether you want it or not!" Moussaoui yelled as he was escorted from the courtroom by federal marshals. "I will testify!"

It was unclear whether he was addressing his attorneys, with whom he does not speak and who have been against his taking the stand. But what was clear was that the case against the only person convicted in the United States on charges stemming from the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks could take yet another dramatic turn. Moussaoui is known for his courtroom outbursts, and even his attorneys don't know what he will say. Sources familiar with the case said Moussaoui is expected to testify, but he has been told he must adhere to courtroom decorum.

The courtroom theatrics came as Moussaoui's lawyers subpoenaed a government lawyer whose misconduct nearly derailed the death penalty trial, sources familiar with the case said yesterday. Carla J. Martin has been told to show up at U.S. District Court in Alexandria on Monday, the sources said.

Martin would risk being found in contempt of court if she ignored the order, but once there she could invoke her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination and refuse to testify. She declined to testify at a hearing last week. Her attorney, Roscoe C. Howard Jr., did not return repeated telephone calls. Defense attorneys would not comment, but legal experts said that it is unlikely they could persuade U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema to allow the jury to hear about what she has called "egregious" conduct by Martin.

The actions of Martin, a Transportation Security Administration lawyer, halted the case last week after she violated a court order by sharing testimony and contacting witnesses. Brinkema initially reacted by barring all aviation witnesses and testimony, an action that severely damaged the prosecution's case. Testimony resumed Monday after Brinkema allowed testimony from aviation witnesses untainted by contact with Martin.

Moussaoui, 37, pleaded guilty last year to conspiring with al-Qaeda in the attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon. His sentencing hearing is divided into two parts. Jurors first must vote on whether Moussaoui is eligible for the death penalty. If they find he is, a second phase would include testimony from family members of Sept. 11 victims. Jurors then would determine whether Moussaoui should be executed.

Prosecutors yesterday concluded their argument that Moussaoui is eligible for the death penalty because, even though he was in jail on Sept. 11, his lies to the FBI prevented agents from stopping the attacks.

The trial has been cloaked in secrecy at times because of extensive classified information, and yesterday was no different. Defense lawyers typically ask the judge to throw out a case when the prosecution completes its evidence, and Moussaoui's lawyers had prepared such a motion. It was not made in open court, however, and when prosecutors rested their case yesterday, Brinkema convened a sealed hearing in a separate courtroom.

Immediately after the hearing ended, the defense began its case. Sources said later that Brinkema had rejected a defense motion that the case not be allowed to go to the jury.

The two sides yesterday waged a battle of dueling PowerPoint presentations through testimony from two former FBI agents. The final prosecution witness, Aaron Zebley, portrayed the government as a precise investigative machine that immediately would have reacted to the knowledge that Moussaoui was a terrorist operative plotting an attack. Moussaoui was arrested in Minnesota in August 2001, and prosecutors say he lied to the FBI about his plan to fly a plane into the White House.

"Could you have done this in August of 2001?" Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert A. Spencer kept asking Zebley, as Zebley tried to demonstrate how a single cellphone number on a Western Union wire transfer to Moussaoui could have led to phone, bank and other records -- which would have enabled investigators to track down at least 11 of the 19 hijackers.

Zebley, who left the FBI last year to become an assistant U.S. attorney, each time answered, "Yes."

The first defense witness, retired FBI agent Eric Rigler, walked jurors through a Justice Department inspector general's report from 2004 that criticized the government for failing to detect two hijackers who entered the United States in 2000. Khalid al-Mihdhar and Nawaf al-Hazmi at one point lived with an FBI informant in San Diego. The inspector general found that the CIA had known the two were in the country and were al-Qaeda operatives but delayed telling the FBI for more than a year.

Prosecution Of Moussaoui Finishes Up (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va., March 23 — Prosecutors on Thursday finished presenting their case that Zacarias Moussaoui should be executed for the deaths that occurred on Sept. 11, 2001, offering evidence linking him to the paymaster of Al Qaeda who provided money to most of the 19 hijackers who died in the plot.

The trial, which will resume on Monday, offers the possibility of three dramatic moments in short order. First, the court may hear from Carla J. Martin, the Transportation Security Administration lawyer whose improper coaching of witnesses nearly derailed the trial.

Then, as Mr. Moussaoui's lawyers pick up the arguments they began Thursday afternoon, the jury is expected to have the extraordinary experience of hearing testimony gathered in the United States' secret overseas detention system.

Defense lawyers plan to have people recite the testimony of some of the most valuable captives, including Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, and Ramzi bin al-Shibh, the operation's paymaster, who are imprisoned under American supervision. There also might be testimony read from Mohammed Al-Qahtani, a prisoner at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, who is believed by many to have been the missing "20th hijacker."

Sometime after the attacks, senior Justice Department officials identified Mr. Moussaoui, a 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan heritage, as the 20th hijacker, surmising that he was to have been aboard the plane that crashed in Pennsylvania with four hijackers aboard. The other three planes each had five hijackers.

Government officials have since dropped that assertion, and prosecutors have argued that Mr. Moussaoui should be executed because he hid what he knew about plots to fly airplanes into buildings when he was arrested, before the attacks, on immigration charges in Minnesota, where he was learning to fly jetliners.

The third dramatic event is the testimony of Mr. Moussaoui himself sometime next week. Judge Leonie M. Brinkema first granted permission for him to represent himself but revoked it after he would not heed her instructions and had outbursts.

Now Mr. Moussaoui does not speak to his lawyers and has reviled them in comments to the court.

Mr. Moussaoui, who has sat quietly through the last two weeks of the trial, usually leaves the courtroom with some shouted slogan praising Osama bin Laden or cursing the United States. On Thursday, he offered a new statement, saying, "I will testify whether you want it or not."

The arrangement to get testimony from the high-level detainees who are Qaeda members came after intense negotiations among the defense, the government and the court.

Prosecutors ended their presentation with the testimony of a former F.B.I. agent, Aaron Zebley. Mr. Zebley, now a federal prosecutor, linked Mr. Moussaoui to the hijackers by way of Mr. bin al-Shibh and money he sent from Germany. He acknowledged in cross-examination by Edward B. MacMahon Jr., a lawyer for Mr. Moussaoui, that there was no evidence that Mr. Moussaoui had telephoned or met with any of the hijackers.

Ex-FBI Agent Says Moussaoui Deception Prevented Probe (VOA)

By Jim Malone

Voice of America, March 24, 2006

Zacarias Moussaoui, foreground, listening to his defense lawyer Edward MacMahon question FBI special agent Harry SamitA former FBI agent testified Thursday that investigators may have been able track down some of the September 11 hijackers if Zacarias Moussaoui had confessed his role with al-Qaida before the 2001 attacks. Moussaoui is the convicted al-Qaida terrorist now on trial for his life in a federal court in Alexandria, Virginia, just outside Washington.

Former FBI agent Aaron Zebley testified that had Moussaoui confessed his links with al-Qaida before the 9/11 attacks, the authorities might have been able to trace money transfers and telephone calls to al-Qaida financiers who were in touch with some of those who hijacked airliners on September 11.

Zebley said it was possible that the FBI could have traced a $14,000 wire transfer to Moussaoui that came from Germany, which might have led to financial backers also in contact with at least five of the 19 hijackers.

Prosecutors argue that Moussaoui should be put to death because he withheld information from investigators after his arrest in Minnesota three weeks before the 9/11 attacks.

Defense lawyers contend the FBI and other U.S. government agencies would not have been able to do much to prevent the attacks even if Moussaoui had admitted earlier that he was an al-Qaida operative.

DOJ_NMG_0020824

Earlier this week, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the government has learned a lot of lessons from the 9/11 attacks, including how to respond more quickly to threat information gathered by agents in the field.

"I am not going to comment on anything related to the trial," Gonzales says. "What I will say is that we obviously are more sensitive today about threats to the United States and we believe that we have better procedures, better infrastructure to share information."

Moussaoui pleaded guilty last year to terror and conspiracy charges. He said he was not part of the 9/11 conspiracy but was planning to be part of a second wave of attacks using planes that were to go after other high-profile targets, including the White House.

The jury in the case has two choices. Either sentence Moussaoui to death or send him to prison for life. E-mail This Article

Terror Trials And Poor PR (WT)

By Eric Leskly

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

The charades in Alexandria and Baghdad last week are final confirmation that the Bush administration has grievously erred in trying the Zacarias Moussaoui and Saddam Hussein cases in civilian courts instead of military tribunals. By attempting to use the trials as public-relations tools to demonstrate fair judicial process, the administration has disregarded the fact the clear and present danger posed by al Qaeda and the Iraqi insurgency require harsher procedures and penalties than those afforded by traditional criminal prosecution. Furthermore, both defendants have repeatedly rejected the validity of our judicial process, and use the trials instead to preach to their followers and sympathizers. Thus, instead of enhancing American national security, these botched cases may have even strengthened our enemies.

Does the United States owe due process of civilian law to Moussaoui or Saddam? The answer is clearly and emphatically no. In wartime, a government is not obliged to provide enemy combatants the privileges and protections associated with a civilian criminal trial.

It was a mistake to assume that our commitment to due process -- and our desire to showcase this to the world -- would substitute for the unflinching and uncompromising fortitude necessary to mete justice in these extraordinary situations. While civilian criminal procedure presumes innocence until proven guilty, it also presupposes the defendant's acceptance of the inherent power of the court. As Hobbes observed in Leviathan: "Before the names of Just and Unjust can have place, there must be some coercive power." In current circumstances, that is exactly the logic behind a military tribunal.

There is clear justification for trying Moussaoui and Saddam through military commission. The United States is at war with both al Qaeda and the insurgency in Iraq, a remnant of Saddam's regime. Both defendants were captured in the course of the war and violated the laws of armed conflict: Moussaoui, who is not a US citizen, conspired in the attacks on US civilians; Hussein tortured and used chemical weapons against his own people.

The ineptitude evidenced by the Moussaoui sentencing demonstrates why the judicial system is not equipped to handle terrorists. The current focus on TSA attorney Carla Martin, who in her stupidity violated Judge Leonie Brinkema's order and shared transcripts with key federal witnesses, should not detract from the main issue of whether Moussaoui deserves the death penalty for his confessed role in the September 11 attacks.

In fact, the system had failed much earlier in this trial. Since its outset, Moussaoui repeatedly stated his contempt for the court and said that he was using the trial as means to preach al Qaeda's platform through the media. As early as 2003, Moussaoui made the incredulous demand to call captive al-Qaeda members as witnesses, including September 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed.

We can be thankful only that these events took place after Moussaoui had already confessed: a mistrial would have been almost certain if Miss Martin's behavior occurred during the actual trial. Some legal analysts have already begun to consider the frightening possibility that the government's incompetence could lead to a full acquittal, and that Moussaoui could yet go free.

The farce that has become Saddam's trial is even more disturbing because of its harmful effect on U.S. national security. By empowered the insurgency, the trial has increased the risk to U.S. troops and compromised our mission in Iraq. The court has inadvertedly given Saddam a bully pulpit; the man who was once a captured by U.S. forces at gunpoint in a foxhole now boasts that he is still the president of Iraq and openly praises the insurgency. "Unite and resist the invaders and their backers," he addressed the insurgents last week. "In my eyes, you are the resistance to the American invasion." It is all too clear that Saddam does not see himself as defeated.

Unlike the Nazis at Nuremberg, who had suffered complete and total defeat at the hands of the Allies, Saddam actually believes that he is the legitimate ruler of Iraq who could return to power if the U.S. were to leave. Doubts about the U.S. commitment to Iraq only strengthen this defiance. If he thinks the U.S. might leave Iraq behind with his case before the still incompetent Iraqi judicial system, why should he not continue delaying his trial with these outbursts?

DOJ_NMG_0020825

In order to fulfill its vow to bring justice to our enemies, the administration needs to regain the offensive in prosecuting captives in the war on terror and stop trying to use these cases as tools to enhance American image abroad. The Battle Hymn of the Republic alludes to justice as a "terrible swift sword." Our public relations will be better served through this metaphor than by the failed attempts to treat terrorists or despots "fairly." In dealing with our cruelest of adversaries, military justice may be the only sensible course.

Moussaoui Trial Difficult For Victims' Kin (AP)

By Will Lester, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 24, 2006

(AP) - ALEXANDRIA, Va.-The U.S. government's failure to act on repeated warnings before the Sept. 11 terrorist attack had Geraldine Davie fighting back tears as she talked about her 22-year-old daughter's death in the collapse of the World Trade Center.

"They all let us down," Davie said Wednesday evening, voicing a sentiment shared by many of the victims' family members who are monitoring the sentencing trial of admitted al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui.

Davie and other family members of Sept. 11 victims heard the FBI agent who arrested Moussaoui testify early this week that his bosses in Washington failed to heed his warnings that he said would have given the government "a serious opportunity to stop the 9/11 attacks."

Victims' family members also had to watch the federal judge consider scuttling the prosecution's bid for the death penalty after learning last week that a government lawyer improperly coached witnesses. Some prosecution witnesses gave testimony about government missteps that the defense turned to its advantage.

"Certainly, the case now is not as strong as it could be," said Bill McGinly, of Vienna, Va., who lost a son in the attack on the World Trade Center. McGinly wants to see Moussaoui get the death penalty.

"I would be much more comfortable to see him off the face of the earth," said McGinly, who held out hope that federal prosecutors would get their case back on track. "It's not over 'til it's over."

The court proceedings have been painful for victims' family members like Davie, whose daughter, Amy O'Doherty, was working at an investment firm at the World Trade Center in New York Cit; McGinly, whose son Mark worked at the trade center; and Eleni Kousoulis, whose sister Danielle worked at the same investment firm as O'Doherty.

"The government knew a lot, if they had just paid more attention," said Kousoulis of Merion, Pa. Even if government investigators couldn't prevent the attacks altogether, she said, they might have saved some lives.

As for Moussaoui, Kousoulis said she doesn't care if he gets the death penalty or life in prison. "I think him rotting in jail is worse," she said.

Family members like Kousoulis and Davie were less bothered by the prosecution's recent troubles than the government's missteps revealed in testimony this week that, if handled differently, might have saved their loved ones.

What is valuable, Davie said, is "to know the history of the events in detail without political overlays."

"There are facts being presented here without the bluster of politicians getting in the way," she said. "This is what we've needed from the beginning. This is important."

Mystery Document In Wiretap Suit Sent To Seattle For Safekeeping (AP)

By TIM FOUGHT, The Associated Press

AP, March 23, 2006

PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) — A secret document in an Oregon lawsuit challenging President Bush's domestic wiretapping program will be held in a secure facility in Seattle while the judge and lawyers try to figure out how to keep it under wraps in Portland.

U.S. District Judge Garr King decided this week that the document couldn't be held securely in a federal courthouse in Portland, and shouldn't be held at the local office of the FBI, a defendant in the case.

In a telephone conference that offered few clues about the document, King said it would go to a secure facility at the U.S. attorney's office in Seattle, but he hoped it eventually could be edited and held in Oregon as the suit progresses.

A government lawyer said, however, the document would be so black with redactions that it couldn't be understood.

A transcript of the telephone conference was made available to The Associated Press by Steven Goldberg, a civil rights attorney who filed the lawsuit last February.

The lawsuit alleges that the National Security Agency illegally wiretapped electronic communications between a local chapter of the Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation and Wendell Belew and Asim Ghafoor, both attorneys in Washington, D.C.

DOJ_NMG_0020826

It contends the NSA did not follow procedures required by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, and failed to obtain a court order authorizing electronic surveillance of the charity and its attorneys. Lawyers for the plaintiffs have said they can't spell out the facts that support their suit because those details are classified.

The conference over the document arose because the FBI office is the only place in Portland that has a facility that meets specifications for what the government calls "sensitive compartmented information," according to the telephone conference transcript.

Such secure rooms, called SCIFs, often are used in trials dealing with classified information. They are overseen by court security officers who monitor lawyers reviewing documents. Lawyers generally aren't allowed to copy anything or take notes out.

Goldberg said it would be inappropriate for the FBI to have custody because "we're dealing with a document that may involve criminal behavior by that defendant."

Anthony Coppolino of the U.S. Justice Department said the document wouldn't be altered if the FBI had it and said King could have it in a closed envelope, perhaps signing the seal to guard against unauthorized opening.

The judge, however, said the FBI wouldn't be a suitable custodian.

"I'm not indicating there would be any problem with them, but they are a defendant so I don't think it's appropriate that they have custody of it," King said.

But the judge also decided against the idea of constructing a special secure facility for the case after Coppolino said "these facilities cost thousands, if not millions, and take months and months to create."

King expressed hope that he and others could consult with security experts and "the originator" of the document "to see if something less secure would be satisfactory."

Coppolino told King that editing the document wouldn't be possible "without redactions of the document to the point where the content wouldn't be — would not be understandable."

In a separate development, The Oregonian newspaper reported Thursday that it had filed suit last week seeking documents in the case.

"If the government is committing crimes against its citizens, the public is entitled to know the nature of the crimes," said the newspaper's attorney, Charles Hinkle.

Government Won't Have To Say Whether Secret Wiretaps Used (AP)

By CAROLYN THOMPSON, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 23, 2006

BUFFALO, N.Y. -- The government doesn't have to tell three men accused of illegally sending $3.5 million to Yemen whether secret wiretaps were used to investigate them, a judge ruled.

Lawyers for Mohamed Albanna, Ali Elbaneh and Ali Albanna requested the information as they defend the men against charges of running an unlicensed business that delivered money from Yemeni-Americans in western New York to relatives overseas.

The defendants already know that investigators used at least six court-approved wiretaps to monitor their telephones, fax machines and cellular phones in 2002 and 2003. But attorneys sought information on whether investigators also eavesdropped on phone and e-mail conversations without a judge's permission following recent disclosures that President Bush allowed such searches in attempts to sniff out terrorist plots.

The Lackawanna men were charged in December 2002 following an investigation by the Joint Terrorism Task Force. None has been accused of having any involvement in terrorism.

U.S. District Judge William Skretny, in an order dated Tuesday, denied the defense request for information without explanation. In his one-page decision, Skretny said he had reviewed the government's classified response to the January request in private.

Defense attorneys did not immediately return calls seeking comment Thursday.

In court documents, a Justice Department official said the Lackawanna men were among "a number of federal criminal defendants in cases across the country (who) have formally requested information concerning the terrorist surveillance program recently described by the President."

The department has lawyers working on the requests on a daily basis, an affidavit said.

The Albannas and Elbaneh were charged on the heels of the arrests of the Lackawanna Six, a group of Yemeni-American men convicted of attending an al-Qaida training camp in Afghanistan in the spring of 2001, and as authorities sought to trace financing of the group's travels.

Albanna, who runs a candy and cigarette wholesale business and is a leader in the American-Muslim community, previously has defended the young men, who are now serving prison sentences ranging from seven to 10 years.

DOJ_NMG_0020827

Federal law enacted after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks requires money transmitting businesses like the one allegedly run by Albanna to register with the U.S. Treasury Department and to be licensed by the state in which they do business.

Government Expert In Lodi Terror Case Describes Pakistani Camps (AP)

By Don Thompson

AP, March 24, 2006

SACRAMENTO - A former Pakistani police chief on Thursday described a terrorist-training camp in Pakistan in an account similar to that given by a Lodi man who is standing trial on federal terrorism charges.

Hassan Abbas, now an author and lecturer living in Massachusetts, told jurors about a camp in a mountainous region of Pakistan once operated by Jaish-e-Mohammed, an extremist political party that has been banned.

The camp was in a region near Balakot, a town also mentioned by defendant Hamid Hayat during a lengthy interrogation by FBI agents last June, Abbas said. Hayat, 23, is accused of training at an al-Qaida camp in Pakistan in 2003 and returning to his home in the Central Valley town of Lodi to plot attacks inside the U.S.

His father, Umer Hayat, a 48-year-old ice cream vendor, is accused of knowing his son attended the camp and lying about it. They are being tried at the same time but before separate juries.

Prosecutors have no hard evidence that Hamid Hayat actually attended such a camp. By putting Abbas on the stand, they sought to give jurors details about the kinds of training camps they claim Hamid Hayat attended.

When the trial resumes next week, prosecutors are expected to introduce satellite photos they claim show a terror training camp in Pakistan.

Abbas, who was paid about $35,000 for his research and testimony, worked as a police chief and police administrator in Pakistan from 1996-2001 and has been on the stand since Wednesday, testifying about Pakistani culture, religion and politics.

He said the extremist group trained a large number of people for jihad, or holy war, primarily for the conflict with India over the Kashmir region.

While the Pakistani government says it cracked down on such training camps after the 2001 terror attacks in the U.S., Abbas said "dozens and dozens" of them operated between 2000 and 2005.

They were run by various political and religious organizations that attracted Muslims from around the world, Abbas told jurors. Most trained hundreds of people at a time, sequestering them for weeks and drilling them on the use of weapons, he said.

That conflicts with some of the Hayats' own statements to the FBI, which were captured on videotape. Umer Hayat, for example, said he saw a thousand terrorists training in a huge underground room, and Hamid Hayat said he frequently visited a nearby town after a day of training.

Defense attorneys claim Hamid Hayat intended only to attend a Muslim religious school during his roughly two years in Pakistan.

Abbas said between 5 percent and 15 percent of Pakistan's more than 20,000 religious schools, or madrassahs, serve as recruiting grounds for jihadi training camps.

The Hayats were arrested last June, shortly after Hamid Hayat returned from Pakistan, and have pleaded not guilty.

Hamid Hayat faces up to 39 years in prison if he is convicted of three counts of lying to the FBI and separate charges of providing material support to terrorists. His father faces up to 16 years in prison if convicted of two counts of making false statements to the FBI.

Hayat Defense Accuses Witness Was "Cued" By Prosecutors (KXTV-TV)

KXTV-TV, March 24, 2006

An expert on Pakistani society was accused of being coached by federal prosecutors Thursday during testimony in the trial of two Lodi men accused of lying to federal investigators about ties to terrorism.

During defense questioning of expert witness Hassan Abbas, attorneys for Umer and Hamid Hayat argued that the wording of prosecution objections to defense questions were actually signals to Abbas about how to answer the question. Abbas is an author and Fellow at the Kennedy School of Government in Boston, Massachusetts.

Defense attorney Wazhma Mojaddidi suggested that Abbas had worked out a system with prosecutors that if they objected to a line of defense questioning using the terms "ambiguous" or "vague," that it was actually a signal for how Abbas should answer. Judge Garland Burrell immediately demanded attorneys approach the bench but after discussion, let the line of questioning continue.

Abbas testified that the defense raised the objection over personal notes he had made for himself over proper court conduct, including what to do if he didn't understand a question or needed a question rephrased or repeated. Abbas said prosecutors did offer advice on how to respond to defense questions, although they only advised him to be brief and objective.

Umer Hayat's jury was dismissed after Abbas' testimony, but jurors for Hamid Hayat remained to hear further questioning of chief prosecution witness and FBI informant Nassem Khan. Mojaddidi questioned Khan about his relationship with his FBI handlers, including the dates of his first meetings with the FBI, and when he was first paid for his work as an informant.

Hamid Hayat, 23, is charged with lying to federal investigators about undergoing terrorist training in Pakistan. His father, Umer Hayat, 48, is also charged with lying to FBI agents about his son's training.

The Hayats, both U.S. citizens, have pleaded not guilty.

U.S. May Be Holding Pakistani Journalist (LAT)

By Zulfiqar Ali And Mubashir Zaidi

The Los Angeles Times, March 24, 2006

PESHAWAR, Pakistan — The family of a Pakistani journalist kidnapped in December said Thursday that they believe he could be in U.S. custody.

Hayatullah Khan was abducted at gunpoint in the volatile North Waziristan tribal region Dec. 5 by armed, masked men whom a witness at the time described as dressed like fighters from the ousted Taliban regime of Afghanistan. But Ihsanullah Khan, the victim's brother, said that senior officials from Pakistan's intelligence agencies had told the family that Hayatullah was now beyond their jurisdiction.

"We were told a few days ago that Mr. Khan was no longer in their possession. He might be somewhere in Pakistan or the United States being grilled for his possible links with Al Qaeda," Ihsanullah Khan said, citing information passed to him by unnamed intelligence officials.

"Earlier these [officials] told us that Hayatullah was fine and we should not worry about him. But now they say that Hayatullah might be in U.S. officials' custody," he said.

In Washington, a Pentagon spokesman said the report could not be confirmed.

Hayatullah Khan came to wide public attention when he reported allegations that a suspected Al Qaeda operative and four other people in the town of Asoray, including a 7-year-old boy, had been killed by a U.S. missile attack — not an accidental munitions explosion, as Pakistani officials had asserted.

Khan quoted local tribesmen as saying that the mud-brick compound where Egyptian Abu Hamza Rabia died Dec. 1 had been hit by an air-launched missile. He photographed metal fragments at the compound that appeared to bear markings identifying them as remnants of a U.S. laser-guided Hellfire missile. He was working for the European Pressphoto Agency and two Pakistani newspapers when he was kidnapped in the town of Mir Ali, which, like Asoray, is near the Afghan border.

Pakistani officials insisted that the compound had not been attacked. American counterterrorism operations in Pakistan are a matter of great sensitivity for the government of President Pervez Musharraf, whom some accuse of being too accommodating of U.S. interests.

Authorities say that Khan's abduction was not related to any news report but rather sprang from a personal matter. His family said they have had no contact from his kidnappers.

They also deny that Khan had any connection to Al Qaeda or the Taliban.

Ihsanullah Khan said intelligence officials told him his brother "was being grilled by the U.S. to confirm the death of Hamza Rabia in the missile attack."

Meanwhile, the Pakistani government Thursday lodged a protest with Afghanistan over the killings of 17 Pakistani men near the border town of Spin Buldak, in Afghanistan's Kandahar province, on Wednesday. Afghan authorities described the men as Taliban rebels.

Pakistani Foreign Office spokeswoman Tasneem Aslam said that the Afghan ambassador in Islamabad was summoned to hear an official protest over the incident. "We have asked Afghan authorities to investigate the matter and tell us how these innocent Pakistani civilians were killed by Afghan forces," she said.

Pakistan's interior minister, Aftab Sherpao, said that the 17 Pakistani tribesmen "went to Afghanistan to take part in Nowruz, a religious festival of the Shiites, but were killed by Afghan forces in a fake encounter and were labeled as Taliban."

The bodies were brought back to Chaman and Quetta in Pakistan and buried Thursday.

The incident has further fueled tensions between the neighboring countries following weeks of back-and-forth accusations of border infiltrations.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai last month handed over a list of Taliban leaders who Afghan authorities believed were in Pakistan.

PATRIOT ACT:

Bush Shuns Patriot Act Requirement (BOS)

By Charlie Savage

The Boston Globe, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON -- When President Bush signed the reauthorization of the USA Patriot Act this month, he included an addendum saying that he did not feel obliged to obey requirements that he inform Congress about how the FBI was using the act's expanded police powers.

The bill contained several oversight provisions intended to make sure the FBI did not abuse the special terrorism-related powers to search homes and secretly seize papers. The provisions require Justice Department officials to keep closer track of how often the FBI uses the new powers and in what type of situations. Under the law, the administration would have to provide the information to Congress by certain dates.

Bush signed the bill with fanfare at a White House ceremony March 9, calling it "a piece of legislation that's vital to win the war on terror and to protect the American people." But after the reporters and guests had left, the White House quietly issued a "signing statement," an official document in which a president lays out his interpretation of a new law.

In the statement, Bush said that he did not consider himself bound to tell Congress how the Patriot Act powers were being used and that, despite the law's requirements, he could withhold the information if he decided that disclosure would "impair foreign relations, national security, the deliberative process of the executive, or the performance of the executive's constitutional duties."

Bush wrote: "The executive branch shall construe the provisions . . . that call for furnishing information to entities outside the executive branch . . . in a manner consistent with the president's constitutional authority to supervise the unitary executive branch and to withhold information . . . "

The statement represented the latest in a string of high-profile instances in which Bush has cited his constitutional authority to bypass a law.

After The New York Times disclosed in December that Bush had authorized the military to conduct electronic surveillance of Americans' international phone calls and e-mails without obtaining warrants, as required by law, Bush said his wartime powers gave him the right to ignore the warrant law.

And when Congress passed a law forbidding the torture of any detainee in US custody, Bush signed the bill but issued a signing statement declaring that he could bypass the law if he believed using harsh interrogation techniques was necessary to protect national security.

Past presidents occasionally used such signing statements to describe their interpretations of laws, but Bush has expanded the practice. He has also been more assertive in claiming the authority to override provisions he thinks intrude on his power, legal scholars said.

Bush's expansive claims of the power to bypass laws have provoked increased grumbling in Congress. Members of both parties have pointed out that the Constitution gives the legislative branch the power to write the laws and the executive branch the duty to "faithfully execute" them.

Several senators have proposed bills to bring the warrantless surveillance program under the law. One Democrat, Senator Russell Feingold of Wisconsin, has gone so far as to propose censuring Bush, saying he has broken the wiretapping law.

Bush's signing statement on the USA Patriot Act nearly went unnoticed.

Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, inserted a statement into the record of the Senate Judiciary Committee objecting to Bush's interpretation of the Patriot Act, but neither the signing statement nor Leahy's objection received coverage from in the mainstream news media, Leahy's office said.

Yesterday, Leahy said Bush's assertion that he could ignore the new provisions of the Patriot Act -- provisions that were the subject of intense negotiations in Congress -- represented "nothing short of a radical effort to manipulate the constitutional separation of powers and evade accountability and responsibility for following the law."

"The president's signing statements are not the law, and Congress should not allow them to be the last word," Leahy said in a prepared statement. "The president's constitutional duty is to faithfully execute the laws as written by the Congress, not cherry-pick the laws he decides he wants to follow. It is our duty to ensure, by means of congressional oversight, that he does so."

The White House dismissed Leahy's concerns, saying Bush's signing statement was simply "very standard language" that is "used consistently with provisions like these where legislation is requiring reports from the executive branch or where disclosure of information is going to be required."

"The signing statement makes clear that the president will faithfully execute the law in a manner that is consistent with the Constitution," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino. "The president has welcomed at least seven Inspector General reports on the Patriot Act since it was first passed, and there has not been one verified abuse of civil liberties using the Patriot Act."

David Golove, a New York University law professor who specializes in executive power issues, said the statement may simply be "bluster" and does not necessarily mean that the administration will conceal information about its use of the Patriot Act.

But, he said, the statement illustrates the administration's "mind-bogglingly expansive conception" of executive power, and its low regard for legislative power.

"On the one hand, they deny that Congress even has the authority to pass laws on these subjects like torture and eavesdropping, and in addition to that, they say that Congress is not even entitled to get information about anything to do with the war on terrorism," Golove said.

FBI Confirms Patriot Act's Use In Corruption Probe (LVRJ)

By ADRIENNE PACKER, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, March 23, 2006

Federal authorities confirmed in court Wednesday that they used the Patriot Act to access bank records while investigating alleged political corruption involving former Clark County commissioners and strip club owner Michael Galardi.

The Patriot Act, enacted after Sept. 11, 2001, as a tool to fight terrorism, included provisions that allowed authorities to access personal financial records more easily.

During the federal trial against former county Commissioners Mary Kincaid-Chauncey and Dario Herrera, defense attorneys revealed Wednesday that FBI agents had used the Patriot Act to track financial transactions executed by individuals involved in the case.

"The Patriot Act made it easier for you to identify the bank accounts," attorney Jerry Bernstein said during cross-examination of former FBI agent Joe Dickey.

Dickey said the government would have had to subpoena some 10,000 financial institutions nationwide had it not relied on the law.

One portion of the law directed the U.S. Treasury Department to streamline for law enforcement access to financial records. Law enforcement can send a suspect's name to the department and receive back a list of each financial institution that does business with the individual.

"It simply helped us identify where banks were. It didn't give us information," Dickey said of the Patriot Act provision.

That was just one tool federal agents used as they pieced together their case against Kincaid-Chauncey, Herrera, Galardi and former Commissioners Lance Malone and Erin Kenny.

After Malone lost a bid for re-election in 2000, Galardi hired him as a lobbyist. Soon, authorities allege, Malone began to deliver cash bribes from Galardi to Herrera, Kincaid-Chauncey and Kenny. In exchange for the money, the three commissioners worked on Galardi's behalf, authorities say.

Kenny and Galardi pleaded guilty to the bribery charges and are government witnesses.

For more than a year, FBI agents took turns sitting in a computer room monitoring intercepted conversations from Malone's and Galardi's phones, which were bugged in June 2001.

The wiretaps and surveillance stakeouts led to a May 2003 federal indictment.

On Wednesday, FBI agents played for jurors nearly 70 intercepted phone calls and two surveillance tapes. The calls focused on a period in 2001 when Malone, Galardi and Kenny frantically worked to push through several issues that county administrators were considering or that were scheduled to go before commissioners.

During several conversations, Malone and Herrera suggested they "hook up." Prosecutors claim the phrase is code for meeting to deliver or accept cash from Galardi. But defense attorneys say it's merely slang for getting together.

The conversations indicated that Malone and Galardi had a tight relationship with Kenny, who consistently acted behind the scenes and during meetings to promote votes that benefited Galardi's two businesses under county jurisdiction, Leopard Lounge and Jaguars.

At one point, Kenny took a call from Malone despite being occupied.

"I'm in the bathroom, to tell you the truth," she said. "Wait a minute, hold it, I had to flush."

DOJ_NMG_0020831

During the summer of 2001, Galardi grew increasingly impatient with interim County Building Department Director Ron Lynn. Lynn was slow in responding to a "red tag" that had been placed on Galardi's Jaguars club. The tag meant that the building did not meet county codes and that construction had been stopped.

Malone told Galardi that both Herrera and Kincaid-Chauncey had agreed to help expedite permits for Jaguars. Neither commissioner called Lynn, according to the tapes played.

But in August 2001, Herrera called Malone and asked if they could "hook up." Galardi voiced his displeasure with Herrera because the commissioner had not been active in pushing forward matters important to Galardi.

"He's got some balls, huh ... he's done nothing for us," Galardi told Malone during an Aug. 10, 2001, phone call. "If he did something for us, I wouldn't mind. But he doesn't do shit."

Frustrated by Lynn, Kenny, Malone and Galardi tried to torpedo his bid to become permanent director of the Building Department. Malone and Kenny tried to get Herrera to vote against Lynn's promotion. Commissioner Myrna Williams and Kincaid-Chauncey were already on board, according to Kenny.

"If he (Herrera) tells Mike he's gonna do it, he can't not," Kenny told Malone. "He needs to be told he can't support Ron."

Malone also met with Kincaid-Chauncey that month. FBI agents videotaped them leaving an Applebee's restaurant. The two sat in Kincaid-Chauncey's car for four minutes. During that time, she used Malone's phone to call Galardi and left this message: "Thanks for all your help. I really appreciate it."

Although prosecutors suggested that Kincaid-Chauncey had accepted money from Malone in the car, her attorney, Richard Wright, noted that there was no recording or personal observation of what had happened inside the car.

"We could speculate all day as to what they talked about," Wright said.

In 2001, Galardi was struggling to obtain a liquor license for Jaguars.

Las Vegas police Capt. Daniel Patrick Barry had expressed concerns about Galardi's suitability to hold a privileged license because of past brushes with law enforcement and the fact that strippers at his clubs had been cited for soliciting prostitution.

FBI Agent Christopher Byers testified Wednesday that Barry was directed by the federal government to appear at commission meetings to appeal a Galardi license.

"In essence, it's a technique to spur conversations on the wire," Byers said, referring to the phone calls that federal agents were intercepting.

Meanwhile, Malone worked to gain Herrera's support for Galardi's liquor license.

"I'd like to hook up with you today or early tomorrow," Malone told Herrera on Aug. 28, 2001. Herrera agreed to meet Galardi and Malone at P.F. Chang's China Bistro that night, on the eve of the vote.

After their dinner, Malone called Kenny to say, "Dario will be there to help out."

Herrera broke an ankle playing basketball the morning of the meeting. He did not attend the meeting but participated in the vote over the phone and hung up immediately after Galardi was awarded a temporary license.

After the vote, Malone called Galardi and bragged about securing the license despite concerns voiced by the Police Department.

"So now who's got the most stroke, baby," Malone said.

That night, Galardi called Herrera.

"You're the man, brother. ... Thanks for takin' care of me. Let's hook up tonight," Galardi said.

Dickey said FBI agents took surveillance video of the dinner at P.F. Changs. But Herrera's attorney questioned why a well-known public figure like his client would conduct corrupt business in a busy restaurant.

"Did it appear they were trying to hide the fact they were trying to have dinner together?" Bernstein asked.

In August 2001, Galardi and Malone discovered that Scores, a popular New York topless club, had plans to open a cabaret in a building in Las Vegas that was formerly the Sporting House fitness center.

Galardi mulled ways to prevent Scores from getting a liquor license. He considered buying a nearby bar because county law includes distance requirements for establishments that sell liquor.

"Let's get them denied," Galardi said of the Scores owners. "Let's get Erin on it and Mary and Dario."

In September 2001, Galardi sought a zoning approval for Jaguars, scheduled to be heard Sept. 19 of that year, and an extension for his liquor license at Jaguars, scheduled to be heard that Sept. 25.

"We have to call all of them," Galardi told Malone. "Call Dario up and tell him we need him there on the 19th and 25th. We'll take care of him."

In June and July 2001, Malone and Kenny lobbied commissioners and incoming Clark County Manager Thom Reilly to hire Malone as director of the county's Parks and Recreation Department. Malone told Kenny that Kincaid-Chauncey supported the move, according to phone calls.

DOJ_NMG_0020832

But other county staff members, including Barbara Wagner, who was Malone's assistant when he was a commissioner, appeared to be surprised that he would be considered for the position. When Malone told Wagner he might be offered the job, she replied: "Get out ... are you crazy? Why?"

"What's nice about it is it pays pretty well," Malone told Wagner, according to the recorded conversation played in court Wednesday.

Malone, Kenny and Galardi panicked when Herrera contacted a member of the local media and revealed the plan to hire Malone. They feared the media would learn that Malone worked for Galardi and figure out that Kenny also had connections to the strip club owner.

"They're all over the Mike Galardi thing; my name is all over that," Kenny told Malone. She then tried to recall whether her financial records reflected contributions from Galardi. "I don't think they do, I don't think they do."

Malone then backed off from lobbying county officials on the parks position, canceling a meeting with Commissioner Bruce Woodbury.

"We have to hope this thing flippin' dies on the vine," Malone told Galardi during a July 13, 2001, conversation. "I've gotta back out quickly so this thing will die."

FBI agent Byers will remain on the witness stand while prosecutors play about 250 intercepted phone calls, which is the core of their case against the former commissioners.

Feds Used Patriot Act To Investigate Clark County Commissioners (AP)

AP, March 23, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - Federal investigators used the Patriot Act to obtain financial records while probing whether a strip club owner was funneling money and gifts to Clark County commissioners, according to testimony in an ongoing corruption trial.

The act, enacted as a terrorism-fighting tool after Sept. 11, 2001, included provisions that let authorities obtain from the U.S. Treasury Department a list of each financial institution doing business with an individual.

FBI agent Joe Dickey testified Wednesday that the government used the provision to collect evidence against former county commissioners Mary Kincaid-Chauncey and Dario Herrera, who are being tried on corruption charges.

"It simply helped us identify where banks were," Dickey said. "It didn't give us information."

The government would have had to subpoena 10,000 financial institutions nationwide had it not relied on a Patriot Act provision directing the U.S. Treasury Department to give law enforcement greater access to financial records, Dickey said.

Herrera, 32, and Kincaid-Chauncey, 67, have pleaded not guilty in U.S. District Court in Las Vegas to federal charges of conspiracy, wire fraud and extortion under color of official right. Each could face 45 years in prison if convicted.

Government prosecutors allege former commission colleague Lance Malone, who worked as a lobbyist for strip club owner Michael Galardi, bribed Herrera, Kincaid-Chauncey and another former commissioner, Erin Kenny, to support laws favorable to three Galardi clubs in the Las Vegas area.

Kenny and Galardi pleaded guilty to bribery charges and have agreed to testify for the prosecution. Malone has pleaded not guilty. He is due for trial in August.

FBI agents spent more than a year monitoring Malone's and Galardi's phones, which were bugged in June 2001.

On Wednesday, FBI agents played for jurors nearly 70 intercepted phone calls and two surveillance tapes. The calls focused on a period in 2001 when Malone, Galardi and Kenny are accused of voting on matters relating to Galardi's businesses.

During several conversations, Malone and Herrera suggested they "hook up" - a term prosecutors allege was code for meeting to deliver or accept cash from Galardi.

Defense lawyers say it was merely slang for meeting.

Malone also met with Kincaid-Chauncey, who FBI agents videotaped leaving an Applebee's restaurant and sitting in Kincaid-Chauncey's car for four minutes while she used Malone's phone to call Galardi and leave a message.

"Thanks for all your help," she told the club owner. "I really appreciate it."

Although prosecutors suggested that Kincaid-Chauncey accepted money from Malone in the car, her lawyer, Richard Wright, said had no proof had happened inside the car.

Prosecutors planned to play for jurors about 250 intercepted phone calls, which provide the core of their case against the former commissioners.

Citizen Groups Balk At FBI Response To Forum (SOUTHBT)

By CAROL DRAEGER, Tribune Staff Writer

South Bend (IN) Tribune, March 24, 2006

Government agency calls for another debate

THREE OAKS — A recent open meetings forum in Three Oaks was apparently too open for the FBI.

A St. Joseph federal agent challenged Chellie Pingree's criticism of the Patriot Act and tried to track down the head of the national nonpartisan group Common Cause, to set her straight.

After reading Pingree's comments in a local newspaper account, agent Al DiBrito called the League of Women Voters of Berrien and Cass counties, league president Susan Gilbert said.

DiBrito reportedly said Pingree was "way off base" in her comments about the Patriot Act and suggested the league should've invited the FBI to speak at the March 14 panel, Gilbert said.

DiBrito's phone call has infuriated the National League of Women Voters and Common Cause.

"When the country has far more pressing security and terror concerns, we question the FBI using precious resources hounding leaders of two of the most distinguished citizen advocacy organizations in the country," Pingree and Gilbert wrote in a letter this week to FBI Director Robert Mueller.

"Is this the kind of behavior citizen activists can expect from the FBI? To us, it smacks of intimidation," they said in their March 21 letter.

William Kowalski, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI for the state of Michigan, defended DiBrito's phone call and said it's unfortunate that it was perceived as being threatening.

The purpose of the call was to "offer an opportunity to get out accurate information about the Patriot Act and how it is utilized to combat terrorism," Kowalski said.

It was really an offer for an open debate, Kowalski said, explaining that it's not uncommon for state FBI agents and employees of the U.S. attorney's office to be invited to forums to explain the Patriot Act and how the government uses it.

Pingree's comments were made at a public forum during national Sunshine Week, a time when the media and citizens' groups urge openness in government. Pingree was one of four panelists — including the Michigan editor of The Tribune, a communications professor and a Berrien County prosecutor — who spoke at the event, sponsored by the local League of Women Voters.

During the forum Pingree accused the Bush administration of using the Patriot Act to strip away freedoms in the name of national security.

"Government wants to act in secrecy to invade your privacy," she said, referring to the controversial wiretap measure President George Bush favors.

Pingree, a former school board member and state lawmaker in Maine, said during the Clinton Administration a presumption of openness prevailed.

She credited Clinton's Attorney General, Janet Reno, for the policy.

The Reno philosophy, she said, was starkly different from the nondisclosure directives of former Bush Attorney General John Ashcroft.

Calls to DiBrito's office on Thursday were referred to Kowalski's office in Detroit.

DiBrito also reportedly told Gilbert that an assistant U.S. attorney in Grand Rapids would be in touch with her to give her the real story on the Patriot Act.

Gilbert said it's unclear if DiBrito was simply "personally irritated" by Pingree's comments or whether "he's acting on some order to look for anything subversive to take action on."

Kowalski vehemently denied the subversive allegation.

"That is certainly not the case," he said. "There is plenty of dissent out there and our intent is not to stifle debate."

Kowalski said DiBrito merely acted out of a desire to ensure that both sides of the Patriot Act debate are explained to the public.

Kowalski said it's not the criticism that is at issue; it's the lack of balance at the forum.

"The more debate we have the more people understand what the Department of Justice and the FBI are trying to do to protect their freedom under the Patriot Act," he said.

"We would like to participate in another forum," he added.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

U.S. Hiring Hong Kong Co. To Scan Nukes (AP-Y2)

By Ted Bridis And John Solomon

AP2, March 23, 2006

In the aftermath of the Dubai ports dispute, the Bush administration is hiring a Hong Kong conglomerate to help detect nuclear materials inside cargo passing through the Bahamas to the United States and elsewhere.

The administration acknowledges the no-bid contract with Hutchison Whampoa Ltd. represents the first time a foreign company will be involved in running a sophisticated U.S. radiation detector at an overseas port without American customs agents present.

Freeport in the Bahamas is 65 miles from the U.S. coast, where cargo would be likely to be inspected again. The contract is currently being finalized.

The administration is negotiating a second no-bid contract for a Philippine company to install radiation detectors in its home country, according to documents obtained by The Associated Press. At dozens of other overseas ports, foreign governments are primarily responsible for scanning cargo.

While President Bush recently reassured Congress that foreigners would not manage security at U.S. ports, the Hutchison deal in the Bahamas illustrates how the administration is relying on foreign companies at overseas ports to safeguard cargo headed to the United States.

Hutchison Whampoa is the world's largest ports operator and among the industry's most-respected companies. It was an early adopter of U.S. anti-terror measures. But its billionaire chairman, Li Ka-Shing, also has substantial business ties to China's government that have raised U.S. concerns over the years.

"Li Ka-Shing is pretty close to a lot of senior leaders of the Chinese government and the Chinese Communist Party," said Larry M. Wortzel, head of a U.S. government commission that studies China security and economic issues. But Wortzel said Hutchison operates independently from Beijing, and he described Li as "a very legitimate international businessman."

"One can conceive legitimate security concerns and would hope either the Homeland Security Department or the intelligence services of the United States work very hard to satisfy those concerns," Wortzel said.

Three years ago, the Bush administration effectively blocked a Hutchison subsidiary from buying part of a bankrupt U.S. telecommunications company, Global Crossing Ltd., on national security grounds.

And a U.S. military intelligence report, once marked "secret," cited Hutchison in 1999 as a potential risk for smuggling arms and other prohibited materials into the United States from the Bahamas.

Hutchison's port operations in the Bahamas and Panama "could provide a conduit for illegal shipments of technology or prohibited items from the West to the PRC (People's Republic of China), or facilitate the movement of arms and other prohibited items into the Americas," the now-declassified assessment said.

The CIA currently has no security concerns about Hutchison's port operations, and the administration believes the pending deal with the foreign company would be safe, officials said.

Supervised by Bahamian customs officials, Hutchison employees will drive the towering, truck-like radiation scanner that moves slowly over large cargo containers and scans them for radiation that might be emitted by plutonium or a radiological weapon.

Any positive reading would set off alarms monitored simultaneously by Bahamian customs inspectors at Freeport and by U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials working at an anti-terrorism center 800 miles away in northern Virginia. Any alarm would prompt a closer inspection of the cargo, and there are multiple layers of security to prevent tampering, officials said.

"The equipment operates itself," said Bryan Wilkes, a spokesman for the U.S. National Nuclear Security Administration, the agency negotiating the contract. "It's not going to be someone standing at the controls pressing buttons and flipping switches."

A lawmaker who helped lead the opposition to the Dubai ports deal isn't so confident. Neither are some security experts. They question whether the U.S. should pay a foreign company with ties to China to keep radioactive material out of the United States.

"Giving a no-bid contract to a foreign company to carry out the most sensitive security screening for radioactive materials at ports abroad raises many questions," said Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), D-N.Y.

A low-paid employee with access to the screening equipment could frustrate international security by studying how the equipment works and which materials set off its alarms, warned a retired U.S. Customs investigator who specialized in smuggling cases.

"Money buys a lot of things," Robert Sheridan said. "The fact that foreign workers would have access to how the United States screens various containers for nuclear material and how this technology scrutinizes the containers — all those things allow someone with a nefarious intention to thwart the screening."

Other experts discounted concerns. They cited Hutchison's reputation as a leading ports company and said the United States inevitably must rely for some security on large commercial operators in the global maritime industry.

"We must not allow an unwarranted fear of foreign ownership or involvement in offshore operations to impair our ability to protect against nuclear weapons being smuggled into this country," said Sen. Norm Coleman (news, bio, voting record), R-Minn.,

a member of the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs. "We must work with these foreign companies."

A former Coast Guard commander, Stephen Flynn, said foreign companies sometimes prove more trustworthy — and susceptible to U.S. influence — than governments.

"It's a very fragile system," Flynn said. Foreign companies "recognize the U.S. has the capacity and willingness to exercise a kill switch if something goes wrong."

A spokesman for Hutchison's ports subsidiary, Anthony Tam, said the company "is a strong supporter in port security initiatives."

"In the case of the Bahamas, our local personnel are working alongside with U.S. customs officials to identify and inspect U.S.-bound containers that could be carrying radioactive materials," Tam said.

However, there are no U.S. customs agents checking any cargo containers at the Hutchison port in Freeport. Under the contract, no U.S. officials would be stationed permanently in the Bahamas with the radiation scanner.

The administration is finalizing the contract amid a national debate over maritime security sparked by the furor over now-abandoned plans by Dubai-owned DP World to take over significant operations at major U.S. ports.

Hutchison operates the sprawling Freeport Container Port on Grand Bahama Island. Its subsidiary, Hutchison Port Holdings, has operations in more than 20 countries but none in the United States.

Contract documents, obtained by The Associated Press, indicate Hutchison will be paid roughly $6 million. The contract is for one year with options for three years.

The Energy Department's National Nuclear Security Administration is negotiating the Bahamas contract under a $121 million security program it calls the "second line of defense." Wilkes, the NNSA spokesman, said the Bahamian government dictated that the U.S. give the contract to Hutchison.

"It's their country, their port. The driver of the mobile carrier is the contractor selected by their government. We had no say or no choice," he said. "We are fortunate to have allies who are signing these agreements with us."

Some security experts said that is a weak explanation in the Bahamas, with its close reliance on the United States. The administration could insist that the Bahamas permit U.S. Customs agents to operate at the port, said Albert Santoli, an expert on national security issues in Asia and the Pacific.

"Why would they not accept that?" said Santoli, a former national security aide to Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (news, bio, voting record), R-Calif. "There is an interest in the Bahamas and every other country in the region to make sure the U.S. stays safe and strong. That's how this should be negotiated."

Flynn, the former Coast Guard commander, agreed the Bahamas would readily accept such a proposal but said the U.S. is short of trained customs agents to send overseas.

Contract documents obtained by the AP show at least one other foreign company is involved in the U.S. radiation-detection program.

A separate, no-bid $4 million contract the Bush administration is negotiating would pay a Manila-based company, International Container Terminal Services Inc., to install radiation detectors at the Philippines' largest port.

The U.S. says the Manila company is not being paid to operate the radiation monitors once they are installed. But two International Container executives and a senior official at the government's Philippine Nuclear Research Institute said the company will run the detectors on behalf of the institute and the country's customs bureau. U.S. officials said they will investigate further how the Filipinos plan to use the equipment.

Check Point Software Withdraws Deal Over U.S. Security Concerns (WSJ/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Leading Israeli software company Check Point Software Technologies Ltd. abandoned plans to buy smaller U.S. rival Sourcefire Inc. for $225 million because of security objections raised by the Bush administration.

Check Point Ltd. formally withdrew its proposal near the conclusion of a rare, full-blown investigation by a U.S. review panel after the Ramat Gan, Israel-based company was told U.S. officials feared the transaction could endanger some of government's most sensitive computer systems.

The investigation was carried out by the same U.S. review panel that approved the now-abandoned ports deal involving Dubai-owned DP World.

Lawyers for Check Point offered to attach conditions to the sale that executives believed were onerous, but were intended to satisfy concerns expressed by the Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States, a person familiar with the process said. But no agreement could be reached.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation and Defense Department objected partly over specialized intrusion detection software known as "Snort," which guards some classified U.S. military and intelligence computers. Snort's author is a senior executive at Sourcefire, which is based in Columbia, Md.

In private meetings between the review panel and Check Point, officials from the FBI and Pentagon objected to permitting any foreign company to acquire sensitive Sourcefire technology for preventing hacker break-ins and monitoring data traffic, an executive familiar with the discussions previously said. This executive spoke on condition of anonymity because government negotiations are supposed to remain confidential.

Under the sale, announced Oct. 6, Check Point would own all Sourcefire patents, source-code blueprints for its software and the expertise of employees.

The review panel privately notified Check Point on Feb. 6 it intended to fully investigate the transaction's security risks, the executive said. That was days before the furor erupted over the Dubai ports deal. Check Point disclosed the news to investors Feb. 13, but the announcement drew little attention despite escalating scrutiny and interest in Washington over such reviews.

Sourcefire's protection and monitoring technology builds on the popularity of Snort, which was created by its chief technology officer and is distributed free.

Unlike Sourcefire's commercial products, Snort's blueprints are open for inspection to assure it works as advertised. This makes it popular inside the U.S. intelligence community, even alongside more mainstream security products from Cisco Systems Inc. or Juniper Networks Inc.

State Department Is Criticized For Purchasing Chinese PC's (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

HONG KONG, March 23 — A State Department purchase of more than 15,000 computers built by the Lenovo Group of China is starting to draw criticism in the latest sign of American unease about the role of foreign companies in the American economy.

The computers, worth more than $13 million, are coming from factories in Raleigh, N.C., and Monterrey, Mexico, that were part of the personal computer division that Lenovo purchased from I.B.M. last May. Sean McCormack, a State Department spokesman, said at the department's daily media briefing on Wednesday that the computers were intended for unclassified systems and would be serviced by the former I.B.M. division.

The computer contracts are drawing heat from a diverse group of liberal and conservative critics who have been warning about China's growing power for years. These critics have been encouraged by the Congressional scrutiny given to a plan by a company controlled by the royal family of Dubai in the United Arab Emirates to acquire operations at six American ports; the company has since agreed to give up those operations.

The critics warn that the deal could help China spy on American embassies and American intelligence-gathering activities, using hardware and software planted in the computers.

"The opportunities for intelligence gains by the Chinese are phenomenal," said Michael R. Wessel, a member of the United States-China Economic and Security Review Commission, which was created by Congress to monitor and report on the bilateral relationship. Larry M. Wortzel, the commission's chairman, said in an interview two weeks ago that while he would not be concerned if Airbus moved an aircraft production line to China, he would be worried if Lenovo ever started to sell computers to American government agencies involved in foreign affairs. Responding on Thursday to the Lenovo deal, he predicted that, "Members of Congress, I think, will react very strongly when they see a deal like this come through."

Lenovo is a publicly traded company controlled by Legend Holdings, which was started with Chinese government backing in 1984; the government-controlled Chinese Academy of Sciences now holds 65 percent of Legend, while Legend's employees own the rest. Lenovo declined on Thursday to comment on the computer sales to the State Department.

Word of the computer deal began to trickle out on Monday when a Lenovo distributor, CDW Government, a wholly owned subsidiary of the CDW Corporation, sent a press release to members of the business news media announcing its contracts to help the State Department modernize its information technology systems. CDW, based in Vernon Hills, Ill., said that it had been carrying out an $11.65 million contract to supply the State Department with more than 15,000 Lenovo ThinkCentre M51 desktop computers, plus a $1.35 million contract to provide nearly 1,000 Lenovo ThinkCentre M51 minitower computers.

Max R. Peterson II, the vice president of federal sales at CDW Government, said in a telephone interview that the State Department had approved a list of specific computer models, including the Lenovo models, and had asked computer systems integrators to bid for contracts to meet the department's needs and make their own choices among approved models. CDW won the contracts and chose to begin delivering 500 Lenovo computers a week starting in November, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0020837

Chinese ownership of Lenovo was never discussed with the State Department through the contract process and the computer deliveries, Mr. Peterson said.

He noted that the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States had approved the Lenovo acquisition of the I.B.M. division.

Teams To Target Financial Crimes (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents have teamed up with law-enforcement authorities in Argentina, Brazil and Paraguay to combat money laundering and other financial crimes in a remote and lawless region known as the "Tri-Border Area."

Department of Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Julie L. Myers, who heads ICE, said multigovernment "trade transparency units" will investigate and prosecute crimes including money laundering, terrorist financing, contraband smuggling and tax evasion.

The United States has determined that the Tri-Border Area is a source of fundraising for radical Islamic groups, including Hezbollah, Hamas and al Qaeda, and the U.S. government has worked cooperatively with governments in the region to disrupt fundraising activity.

U.S. law-enforcement authorities describe the Tri-Border Area as South America's busiest contraband and smuggling center, where billions of dollars annually are generated from arms trafficking, drug smuggling, counterfeiting and other crimes.

"The new units will not only help authorities in these nations combat domestic financial crimes, but will also enhance the ability of the United States to target money-laundering rings that operate both in South America and the United States," Mrs. Myers said.

The Tri-Border Area is flanked by the freewheeling cities of Puerto Iguazu in Argentina, Foz do Iguazu in Brazil and Ciudad del Este in Paraguay, where drug dealers and terrorists reportedly meet and where counterterrorism investigators worldwide have intensified their focus since the September 11, 2001, attacks in the United States because of the growing presence of Islamic radicals.

Argentina's Secretariat of State Intelligence first reported in 1999 that members of the al Qaeda terrorist network were in the region to coordinate terrorism training and to plan attacks with Hezbollah against U.S. targets.

U.S. intelligence officials have been concerned that an alliance with Hezbollah would give al Qaeda a new base close to the United States for attacks.

The Treasury Department has described the Tri-Border Area as a "clear example" of where Islamic groups gather to "finance terrorist activities."

The department has said members of al Qaeda, Egypt's Al-Gamaa Islamiya, the Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah have drawn some of their funding from activities in the area.

The FBI sent agents to the region in 2002 after a poster of Iguazu Falls, the area's major tourist attraction, was found inside an al Qaeda bunker in Afghanistan.

Mrs. Myers said earlier efforts by the agency and other foreign governments to combat trade-based money laundering have yielded successful results, including an investigation into a $20 million gold export subsidy scheme in 2004 that led to the prosecution of 20 New York jewelers for money laundering.

Secretary Of Homeland Insecurity (NYT)

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

Sometimes it's hard to understand just how Michael Chertoff understands his title, secretary of homeland security. Take this week, when Mr. Chertoff appeared before executives of the chemical industry, whose plants remain one of the nation's greatest vulnerabilities more than four years after 9/11. Mr. Chertoff did not chastise the industry for failing to protect chemical plants adequately. He proposed weak federal safety standards. He did not even fully embrace a recently introduced bipartisan Senate bill that would create meaningful standards.

Instead, Mr. Chertoff seemed perfectly content to defer on key security matters to an industry that contributes heavily to Republican campaigns but has proved to be dangerously unwilling to take public safety seriously.

A terrorist attack on a chlorine plant could put hundreds of thousands of lives at risk. Yet, incredibly, the federal government has failed to enact reasonable safety standards for chemical plants. Despite all of the nice things the administration has been saying about the industry lately, it has not taken care of the problem on its own. Many plants lack perimeter fencing, lights and security guards. Too often, they use extremely dangerous chemicals close to high-density populations, when safer substances could be substituted.

It should be obvious to anyone concerned about public safety that the nation needs strong, mandatory government rules to reduce these dangers. Yet in his speech, Mr. Chertoff favored leaving crucial security decisions up to the chemical companies — a formula that puts too much weight on not inconveniencing industry, and too little on protecting the public.

Mr. Chertoff said requiring the industry to use safer chemicals would be "mission creep" — even though that would be precisely the kind of precautionary step that should be a core part of his department's mission. Mr. Chertoff also spoke approvingly of "pre-emption," the notion that if federal chemical plant safety rules are adopted, they should be written in a way that will invalidate tougher rules adopted at the state level. Pre-emption is high on the industry's wish list, but it is not in the public interest.

Senators Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, and Joseph Lieberman, Democrat of Connecticut, have come up with a bill that would direct the Homeland Security Department to develop mandatory safety standards for chemical plants. If the bill becomes law, the plants that do not comply with the government's rules could be shut down. The Collins-Lieberman bill is not perfect, but it would be an important start. It is disheartening that Mr. Chertoff is not fully endorsing the measure and pushing Congress to pass it.

Mr. Chertoff has been heavily criticized for his performance during Hurricane Katrina. We hoped that reaction would at least prompt the department to be more aggressive about eliminating obvious domestic security threats. He should be speaking to the American people about his support for strong chemical plant security rules, not speaking to the chemical industry about his support for weak ones.

Power Plays? Payback Time? Agencies Realign Their Stars (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

If a terrorist attack wiped out the top layer of government, the law has a plan for who would step in: Without the president or vice president, a succession of congressional leaders and Cabinet secretaries stand in line to assume control of the country.

But forget about the presidency. What about the National Archives? Who would take charge of the nation's files in case of a catastrophe?

Fortunately, the White House has an answer. President Bush this week endorsed a new order of succession for the National Archives and Records Administration detailing down to the 10th level who would assume command in a national emergency. If the top nine guys are gone, it turns out, the director of the Jimmy Carter Library and Museum takes over. That's right -- 25 years after leaving office, Carter, in the form of his top librarian, would return to power, of a sort.

In a government fixated on doomsday scenarios, the White House memo issued Wednesday was at least the fifth time since the start of last year that an executive branch agency has created or revised an order of succession. Many departments rushed to draft emergency plans in the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. But nearly four years later, government officials in agencies such as the budget and personnel offices still busy themselves with the macabre exercise of figuring out who would be on top should the worst happen.

"It's kind of a sign of the thinking of government that there are so many high-level people at all these agencies that you need to have an order of succession," said Paul C. Light, a government specialist at New York University. "At the risk of being flip, the question would not be 'Who's in charge at these agencies?' but 'Who cares who's in charge at these agencies?' "

Evidently people at the agencies. Some of the recent lineups reflect one official moving up the chart at the expense of colleagues. Others seem to be even more brazen power plays intended to put rivals in their places. In case there are any doubts, the succession orders make plain which associate director stands above which other associate director in an agency pecking order.

All of this, of course, stems from the serious post-9/11 concern about the government's ability to keep running after an attack using nuclear, chemical or biological weapons. Long before 2001, a single member of the Cabinet was kept away from the U.S. Capitol during the president's State of the Union address to ensure that a senior executive would survive should disaster strike. But Sept. 11 brought home how rudimentary plans for continuity of government really were.

After the attacks, Bush activated a shadow government, dispatching about 100 senior civilian managers to live and work secretly in fortified locations outside Washington on a 24-hour basis. Vice President Cheney famously retreated to "undisclosed locations."

Congress, on the other hand, has debated and debated without coming up with its own plan. The House passed a bill last year, just as it did the year before, requiring states to hold elections within 49 days if 100 or more of the 435 House seats are empty, only to have the idea languish in the Senate, where critics favor immediate temporary appointments.

But at least the National Archives has a plan. Under this week's memo, if the archivist and his deputy are unable to serve, power devolves to the assistant archivist for administration, followed by the assistant archivist for records services and then the assistant archivist for regional records services and so on down the line.

"It's good to know they're taking care of this because, without a Congress, they've got someone to chronicle the abuses of the martial-law state," said Rep. Brian Baird (D-Wash.), who has proposed a constitutional amendment permitting governors to name interim House members in case of mass casualties.

Baird laughed but then added that the archives plan makes sense: "One of the best ways to deter terrorist attack is to be so protected in terms of maintaining government continuity that you could say, 'Go ahead, take your best shot.' What a powerful message it would be to be able to have your government up and going within days."

Others said the White House has more important issues to tackle. "We have huge problems with presidential succession," said Rep. Brad Sherman (D-Calif.), "and knowing who is head of the archives is not my number one concern." Sherman has proposed removing the House speaker and Senate president pro tempore from the presidential succession because putting either in the Oval Office could represent a radical departure from who voters thought they were electing.

The new archives plan supersedes one issued in March 2002, and the main effect seems to be demoting the assistant archivist for information services from third in line of succession to seventh.

A memo issued for the Office of Personnel Management last year bumped the agency's general counsel ahead of the chief of staff and the communications director up to fourth in line from 10th. Now serving as 10th is the associate director for human capital leadership and merit systems accountability.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld rewrote his succession plan in December to put his inner circle closer to the top, placing Undersecretary for Intelligence Stephen A. Cambone right behind Deputy Secretary Gordon R. England, and effectively demoting the secretaries of the Army, Air Force and Navy.

The new national intelligence director, John D. Negroponte, has issued his first succession chart.

In Atlanta, Jay Hakes, director of the Jimmy Carter library, said he figured he was tapped to be part of the archives' succession because he works outside Washington but in a city with a significant federal presence.

He said he has not been mapping out what he would do with his power should the occasion arise. "I don't spend a lot of time thinking about it," Hakes said. "But I think this is a case where being overprepared is better than being underprepared."

Master Of Slow And Deliberate At Ground Zero (NYT)

By Charles V. Bagli

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

A half-hour before a midnight deadline, the developer Larry A. Silverstein strode into the conference room on the 15th floor of the Port Authority's Park Avenue offices, took off his coat and gulped down two cups of coffee, ready for the next round of talks about the future of ground zero.

State officials and Port Authority executives said later that they thought the late-night session on March 14 would complete the grueling negotiations that had dragged on for months, including 18 hours of bargaining earlier that day.

So they were shocked by the proposal Mr. Silverstein delivered. They said he was once again raising issues that the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, the owner of the 16-acre site, had declared off the table. They said Mr. Silverstein was, among other things, seeking tens of millions of dollars in additional financial concessions.

Kenneth J. Ringler, the authority's executive director, stormed into the conference room, telling Mr. Silverstein and his entourage, "It's over."

Over? A look at Mr. Silverstein's long career in real estate and the negotiating style that has defined it suggests that, when it comes to making deals, it is almost never over. Not surprising, then, despite last week's ugly negotiating episode, Mr. Silverstein's team has been talking through back channels with the other side this week.

Mr. Silverstein has said he fully expects to be back at the table within days to sign a deal that preserves his control over a major part of ground zero, a site that many consider sacred ground. State officials hope to resume face-to-face negotiations with him, too, but not until there is a fairly detailed agreement.

Mr. Silverstein, 74, adopted his stubborn "negotiate till they drop" style a half-century ago while working in his father's tiny real estate shop on Lower Broadway. It has caused frustration over the years, but ultimately it has made him a multimillionaire. He got his start as what is known in the trade as a syndicator, someone who rounds up investors to buy a building, operates it for a fee while taking a stake for himself, and puts up little or none of his own money.

What has distinguished him is a penchant for endless negotiations to enhance his position. His partner in the 50's and 60's, Bernard H. Mendik, regaled friends decades later with stories about going to an afternoon closing on the purchase of a building with Mr. Silverstein. "But at midnight, Larry still had two or three issues," several friends recall Mr. Mendik saying, half jokingly. "You could not close a deal."

Those comments might be dismissed as the residue of resentments caused by the end of their partnership, which shattered after Mr. Mendik, who died in May 2001, divorced Mr. Silverstein's sister. Still, even Mr. Silverstein's friends do not describe him much differently.

One of them, Jonathan L. Mechanic, an influential real estate lawyer, represented the Academy of Sciences, which leased space at the developer's recently completed tower at 7 World Trade Center.

"It's wasn't the quickest road to completion," Mr. Mechanic said of the discussions, "but completion did occur. He's a tenacious negotiator. He's also an optimist about his ability to consummate a transaction. But he doesn't give anything away."

Mr. Silverstein very much disagrees with the common take on his negotiating style. "I don't view it that way," he said Wednesday. "I look back on a lifetime of transactions consummated. I learned a long time ago that negotiation is a matter of give and take."

His name never quite made it into the pantheon of New York developers like Durst, Rudin, Resnick and Speyer. His greatest triumph came in July 2001 when, as a dark-horse contestant, he outmaneuvered more powerful developers with more resources to take control of the World Trade Center in one of the biggest real estate deals of all time. Terrorists brought down the towers two months later.

Now at that very site, his negotiating style has state officials making him a scapegoat for failure. Last week, Gov. George E. Pataki, the developer's principal political ally at ground zero, charged that Mr. Silverstein had failed to bargain in good faith. Charles A. Gargano, vice chairman of the Port Authority and the governor's chief economic development official, called him "greedy."

Civic leaders have complained that Mr. Silverstein has treated the complex negotiations like any other deal, ignoring the keen public interest. "Clearly this is not any ordinary development project and this is not any ordinary lease," said Robert D. Yaro, president of the Regional Plan Association. "The public's expectations for this site, the emotions and the global focus here, is unlike any other project. To suggest that this is just another real estate deal misses the point."

Mr. Silverstein heatedly disputed that criticism.

"That's ridiculous," he said. "It's easy to point fingers at somebody who's not at fault. The only motivation here is to rebuild. I believe that's important for the city and the region."

He blames the Port Authority and other government entities for the delays.

"We've been here for five years, and the only thing we have to show for it," he said, "is 7 World Trade Center." He built the original 47-story tower in the 80's. After it was destroyed on Sept. 11, he was tenacious in battling with both his insurer and his landlord to rebuild it. But his stubborn streak also came into play. He insisted on setting rents that were 40 percent higher than the average for the downtown market. A 2002 plan to make the Port Authority the anchor tenant fell apart when he asked for twice the rent it had paid in the old trade center. Today, less than one-fifth of the tower is leased.

Ground zero has been a complex matter involving the sometimes competing interests of the families of victims, insurers, the Port Authority, and state and city officials. At one point or another, Mr. Silverstein has tangled with all of them.

The latest drama was prompted by the scheduled groundbreaking in April for the Freedom Tower, the largest, most symbolic and least economically viable of the five towers planned for the site. In addition, state and city officials and Port Authority executives came to realize that the project would cost more than $7 billion, while there was only $2.9 billion in insurance money available.

Mr. Silverstein insists to this day that he can do the entire job, but he has failed to convince Port Authority executives, the Pataki administration, or Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg. The mayor has raised the possibility that Mr. Silverstein would run out of money in 2009 after building only two towers, default on his lease and walk away from a half-finished project with tens of millions in profit.

Mr. Bloomberg called for a major realignment at ground zero, pointing out that in 2003 Mr. Silverstein and his investors were repaid most if not all the money they had invested in the original deal. The developer himself put up only $14 million in a deal valued at $3.2 billion.

"He's playing with the house's money and, nothing wrong with that, but let's not feel too bad here," Mr. Bloomberg said on his weekly radio show last Friday.

Mr. Silverstein rejected an initial proposal from the authority to split up the site, saying he did not want to surrender the most valuable parcels at ground zero. Five hours before the negotiations came to an impasse on March 14, both sides say they were close to a deal that would have had the authority taking control of the Freedom Tower and another building site, Site 5. More important, there had been progress on a financial arrangement.

DOJ_NMG_0020841

After the impasse, Mr. Silverstein submitted a new version of the deal that both sides had nearly adopted, but state and authority officials say it included a new demand: he wanted the authority's second site back.

Mr. Ringler of the authority met Wednesday and yesterday with Mr. Silverstein's lawyer, Martin Lipton, to discuss going back to the original framework. A third session is planned for today.

On Wednesday, Mr. Silverstein was conceding nothing, talking as if his control of the entire site is not in jeopardy.

"Everybody so desperately wants to see this move forward and get it done," he said. "The Freedom Tower is moving forward as we promised."

Acting Director Gives FEMA Focus (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

The Federal Emergency Management Agency is on a mission destined for disaster. Planning, that is.

Acting Director R. David Paulison admits that the agency he inherited after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita was not up to the task of handling the fallout of those storms, let alone an earthquake or terrorist attack.

"It overwhelmed everyone -- the system was not set up to deal with a catastrophe of that size," Mr. Paulison told The Washington Times.

Created 27 years ago, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, or FEMA, was revered for its heroic response to natural disasters such as floods, earthquakes, tornados or hurricanes.

But in the days after Katrina's destruction of New Orleans, FEMA became a four-letter word for the victims and critics in Congress, leading to the sudden dismissal of its embattled director, Michael D. Brown.

The maligned agency is now planning for the hurricane season that officially begins June 1 as it continues to aid 800,000 families affected by last year's storms that damaged 90,000 square miles.

"This was the largest migration in the history of the United States -- larger than the Civil War, larger than the [Depression-era] Dust Bowl. Normally, we house [3,000 to 5,000] disaster victims a year. We went way beyond that, and we had to make up the rules as we went along," Mr. Paulison said.

"The major lesson we learned is that FEMA was not ready to handle a catastrophe the size of Katrina, and we now know we have to be ready to respond to a major catastrophe such as an earthquake or terrorist attack, to evacuate hundreds of thousands or millions of people and be able to feed them, house them, and take care of them. We're putting a system in place to do just that," he said.

Mr. Paulison saw many of the same shortfalls on the national level that he dealt with when 30,000 homes were destroyed by Hurricane Andrew in 1992, which struck Florida just two weeks after he was promoted to fire chief of Miami-Dade County.

FEMA now is hiring 1,500 employees for the ongoing disaster recovery and more first responders and has spent $40 billion so far.

His position as acting director allows him to focus on mammoth preparation plans rather than a potential political battle on Capitol Hill to be formally confirmed as FEMA chief.

When asked whether he wants the job permanently, Mr. Paulison said, "I agreed to take the job after Mike Brown left and agreed to help us get through the next hurricane season, and right now, I just want to get FEMA back on track. I serve at the pleasure of the president."

Mr. Paulison was chief of the U.S. Fire Administration when Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff recommended him for the job.

His first order of business in September was to get victims off cots and out of the Louisiana Superdome and the New Orleans Convention Center. Once 85,000 evacuees were settled into hotel rooms in every state, including Hawaii and Alaska, many did not want to leave, and attempts since December to move evacuees into short-term housing brought more negative publicity.

"It's nice for a couple of weeks, but they've been there six months now, and a hotel room is no place to raise a family," Mr. Paulison said.

With only a few hundred evacuees still in hotels -- most of whom are handicapped, disabled or too destitute to move on -- there is no deadline, and evacuees are being handled on a case-by-case basis.

"These people lost everything -- their home, their job, everything they owned, including their neighborhoods. We wanted to be sensitive to their needs and make concessions," Mr. Paulison said.

The agency faces many challenges, not only in housing, but also in communication, logistics, tracking supplies and learning about problems on the ground.

The Search For Katrina's Victims Finds Some Missing By Choice (WP)

By Ken Ringle

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- By Louisiana's latest official count, 1,292 people are known to have died in the state because of Hurricane Katrina.

About 1,280 -- the number changes daily -- remain missing.

Hundreds of people were sucked into the Gulf of Mexico by Katrina's retreating tsunami-like storm surge and will never be found. But the state-run, federally funded Find Family National Call Center is discovering that hundreds of others have used the storm and the nationwide diaspora it triggered to escape a troubled or painful past. They do not want to be found.

The center's 90 or so workers immerse themselves daily in tracking missing wives and fleeing felons, reburying exhumed coffins, prying unknowingly into the dark family secrets of confused parentage and dealing with the anonymous dead whom no one seems able -- or willing -- to claim.

Even now, nearly seven months after Katrina, the Find Family phone bank fields 120 to 150 calls a day about relatives or loved ones who vanished in the storm or its aftermath. The vast majority of those being sought are discovered among the thousands of names in American Red Cross or Federal Emergency Management Agency databases that track the whereabouts around the country of evacuees from the storm. The overall number of people missing has been dropping steadily, if slowly, since the storm. More than 10,000 were originally on the list.

"But every day, too, we get one or two we can't find anywhere -- truly missing people, whose absence has only now been discovered," said Henry Yennie, the former mental health executive who serves as the center's deputy director. There were 21 such names reported between March 6 and March 10.

Why has it taken so long to report them?

It's a function of New Orleans's population "being exploded all over the country," Yennie said in a telephone interview from Baton Rouge. "I don't think any of us can begin to appreciate the extent of this disruption Katrina caused in the lives of these evacuees. You lose your house. You lose your job. You lose your community and the personal networks you used to keep track of your extended family and your friends. And you wind up somewhere like a shelter in Montana."

In such cases, he said, evacuees may have quickly tried to locate members of their immediate family but have taken months to realize that they never asked anyone about a distant cousin or a neighbor they never really knew well.

Then, too, in a large low-income population, which would include many evacuees, Yennie said, "you have a fair number of people who live marginal lives at the edge of society. Often they live alone. Sometimes they're mentally ill. Frequently they have no living relatives. They aren't part of any network."

He added: "There was one deceased fellow we found who was in his fifties. He had lived in the same place for 35 years and once taught at a bartender college. But we couldn't find anyone in his neighborhood who knew anything about him. We eventually identified him through DNA."

Immediately after Katrina, Yennie said, the Find Family center had nearly 150 people fielding calls round the clock. Most were evacuees themselves -- pastors, social workers, funeral directors, mental health workers -- working out of a long-vacant supermarket building in the Gateway Shopping Center in Baton Rouge. As the months have gone by and after more than 9,400 of the missing have been located, the work has eased to 12-hour days. It has also, Yennie said, become more specialized.

"We have a dentist who has done amazing identification with dentistry, working just from pictures people showed him. We have a whole gaggle of volunteer geneticists who help us assemble family trees for DNA matchups. We have technicians who have gathered DNA samples for us from as far away as Afghanistan. And we have mathematicians who help gauge the probabilities that those matchups are accurate."

But the work, he said, has led his workers into disturbing and unexpected areas. "We tracked one parolee to New York, but when we got him on the phone he threatened to kill the person who found him. He didn't want to be found."

The trackers have also learned more than they wanted to know about family relations. More than a few women, he said, have used the opportunity to escape from abusive domestic relationships. "They beg us not to report their whereabouts to the person tracking them. And we don't," Yennie said. "We only promise that, if we find someone, we'll give them the phone number of the person who asked us to look for them."

In the case of fugitives from the law -- people running from alimony or child support payments or other debts -- Yennie said the center gets the advice of law enforcement personnel on its staff.

But the most unexpected challenge, he said, has been in dealing with the wearying complexity of family relationships and with unwanted discoveries about bloodlines. DNA identification, he said, often depends on painstakingly tracking a consistent genetic pattern within a family. In more than a few cases, searchers have been told by family members that all the siblings have the same father, only for the DNA evidence to show otherwise.

Yennie said the staff keeps such information confidential.

"Our purpose is to find people, not to violate their privacy. We don't want to learn this stuff. We just want to find or identify people and move on," he said.

Of those still missing, fewer than 50 are children, Yennie said. Slightly more than half are African American men. Most are more than 50 years old.

In addition to tracking the living, the Find Family center has taken over from the Orleans Parish coroner's office most of the work of identifying the unclaimed dead. Yennie said the center has been unable to find any way to identify 26 bodies. Tentative identification has been established for about 46. About 100 bodies have been positively identified, but the families have no resources to claim them and are awaiting government aid to help with burials.

Yennie expects both the search for the missing and the identification of the dead to accelerate in the coming weeks because of the recent allocation of funds for obtaining access to a highly specialized LexisNexis online search. He also cited the help of more law enforcement personnel experienced in tracking fugitives. Within six months, he said, there should be enough time and manpower to go street by street through New Orleans with census records and to finally nail down Katrina's cost in lives.

In the meantime, he and the call center crew have been given the macabre chore of reburying those exhumed by Katrina from graveyards -- coffins found afloat or broken amid the wreckage of the storm.

The most bizarre such case, he said, came not from New Orleans but from farther west near the coastal town of Cameron, where Hurricane Rita left behind a casket. The dead man was from the Cameron graveyard, where he had been buried in the 1950s. In 1957, Hurricane Audrey had dug up the casket and carried it out of the cemetery. It had been sunk somewhere in a salt marsh east of town until Rita came ashore and resurrected it again.

"He'd been lost there underwater nearly 50 years," Yennie said. "There were barnacles on his coffin."

Red Cross Sifting Internal Charges Over Katrina Aid (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

The American Red Cross, the largest recipient of donations after Hurricane Katrina, is investigating wide ranging accusations of impropriety among volunteers after the disaster.

John F. McGuire, the interim president and chief executive of the Red Cross, and Senator Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said some of the actions might have been criminal.

The accusations include improper diversion of relief supplies, failure to follow required Red Cross procedures in tracking and distributing supplies, and use of felons as volunteers in the disaster area in violation of Red Cross rules.

There are no known official estimates of the cash or the value of supplies that might have been misappropriated, but volunteers who have come forward with accusations said the amount was in the millions of dollars. The Red Cross received roughly 60 percent of the $3.6 billion that Americans donated for hurricane relief. Mr. McGuire said the investigation started "a number of weeks ago" and was continuing.

"We're in the middle of this, and we're looking at a range of possible problems," he said, "from issues between a few people that are really nothing other than bad will, to failure to follow good management principles and Red Cross procedures that have caused a lot of waste, to criminal activity."

He said the organization would do everything in its power to hold wrongdoers accountable. "We need to bring this through to the proper and right conclusion," he said. "We owe that to donors and the people who needed our services."

Among the specific problems identified by volunteers were the disappearance of rented cars, generators and some 3,000 of 9,000 air mattresses donated by a private company, as well as the unauthorized possession of Red Cross computer equipment that could be used to add money to debit cards and manipulate databases.

Mr. McGuire said the investigation was being conducted by a team from the Red Cross ethics and compliance department. Because the inquiry is continuing, he said that he could not respond to specific accusations. When it is completed, he said, any finding of criminal activity will be turned over to the law enforcement authorities.

A telephone call to the attorney general's office in Louisiana was not returned, and there was no response to an e-mail message to an official in the Department of Homeland Security who had been contacted by a volunteer looking into the accusations several months ago at the request of the Red Cross.

In interviews over the last two weeks, more than a dozen Red Cross volunteers from around the country described an organization that had virtually no cost controls, little oversight of its inventory and no mechanism for basic background checks on volunteers given substantial responsibility.

Though there was little direct evidence of criminal activity, the volunteers said the magnitude of the missing goods had convinced them that Red Cross operations were being manipulated for private gain.

"I can't find any other reason for what was going on," said Anne Tolmachoff, a volunteer from Louisiana. "Otherwise, it just didn't make any sense."

While the Red Cross has drawn harsh criticism for failures in responding to Hurricane Katrina and for failing to address longstanding governance problems, the concerns raised by volunteers pose new questions about the organization's ability to prevent fraud and theft and protect its resources amid the chaos of a major disaster.

Senator Grassley has threatened to rewrite or revoke the organization's charter if it does not thoroughly overhaul its operations. This is the second time Mr. Grassley has prodded the Red Cross to get its house in order. He first made demands after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, but his effort sputtered as a result of other pressing matters, like the war in Iraq.

"The allegations from Red Cross volunteers are wide-ranging and include possible criminal misconduct," said Mr. Grassley, who in February demanded to know what the Red Cross was doing to address complaints from volunteers. "The Red Cross needs to change its mind-set so it addresses volunteers' concerns swiftly and appropriately, regardless of whether a Senate committee chairman is asking questions."

In one case cited by volunteers, a kitchen manager swapped 300 prepared meals for parking spaces for Red Cross emergency response vehicles without creating any record of the transaction.

"When a swap takes place, those products become untraceable," said Jerome H. Nickerson Jr., a Maryland lawyer who in mid-November was assigned by the Red Cross, as a volunteer, to look into accusations of theft and fraud in the disaster area. "It's the disaster relief equivalent of money laundering."

Mr. Nickerson and his partner in the inquiry, Michael A. Wolters, a security guard from Wisconsin who uncovered wrongdoing during an earlier three-week tour in Texas shortly after Hurricane Katrina, filed a report on Dec. 5 with the safety and security division at Red Cross headquarters. In it, they cited "a breathtaking systematic failure" by senior managers to enforce inventory control procedures and "outright contempt for well-established internal fiscal controls."

But they said the report had been ignored until a reporter for The New York Times began speaking with other volunteers who had seen similar questionable actions.

Mr. McGuire said the organization had pursued every tip about potential wrongdoing and noted that it had an internal hot line, called Concerned Connection, that volunteers could use.

"The vast majority are misconceptions or cases of 'I don't like somebody, so I'm going to say something,' " he said. "The key for us is to know whether we've got a problem in the Red Cross system and procedures, whether we've got well-intentioned people who just wasted stuff or whether we have a criminal problem."

Still, several volunteers said Red Cross managers in the disaster area had pooh-poohed their concerns and intervened to prevent them from documenting the problems they had encountered.

Willie A. Taylor, a volunteer from Michigan who owns a computer business, said he was part of a team that was asked to use a computer system to track every item from the time it was ordered until it was delivered to the end user.

He said the program revealed that roughly half of the "greenies," the requisition forms used to track supplies as they move through the system, could not be reconciled, meaning the supplies could not be accounted for.

"They asked me to do this," Mr. Taylor said, "we came up with a bulletproof process — and then they squashed it when it showed how big the problem was."

Mr. Taylor and others said they suspected that some volunteers were manipulating the flaws in the distribution system for their own benefit.

The Red Cross had 235,000 volunteers working in the hurricane disaster area, more than five times the previous peak of 40,000, and the sheer number wreaked havoc with the normal vetting process, the volunteers said.

For instance, the Red Cross prohibits anyone with a criminal record from working in a disaster area. "We do background checks on our D.S.H.R. volunteers," Mr. McGuire said, referring to the Disaster Services Human Resources division. "But we did not do them on some of our spontaneous volunteers."

Several of those volunteers had criminal records. For example, a volunteer working in the security unit in Baton Rouge, La., Kathleen Collins-Fowler, reported on Nov. 7 that the authorities in New York had issued an arrest warrant for Joe Tominaro, a volunteer then working in New Orleans, on grand larceny charges. According to New York State Department of Corrections records, Mr. Tominaro has twice served prison time for car theft and possession of stolen goods and is on parole.

Yet he signed on as a Red Cross volunteer and opened a distribution center in Marrero, La., without authorization from the Red Cross logistics division, which is in charge of such matters.

He then rang up a $17,936 bill installing eight industrial fans and an evaporative cooler and moving the cooler a week later to another wall. He was given at least $800 in cash and more than $2,000 was loaded onto his staff debit card, according to records included in Mr. Nickerson's and Mr. Wolters's report. The Red Cross gave him 11 cellphones and two automobiles while he was in the disaster area, even though New York had revoked his license.

Mr. Tominaro did not respond to an e-mail message sent to an address listed on his volunteer records.

On Nov. 2, two volunteers reported their concerns about Mr. Tominaro to Gary Niki, a senior official in the security and safety department at headquarters.

A day later, Ms. Collins-Fowler reported, Mr. Niki ordered that Mr. Tominaro's staff card remain active until further notice. It was suspended, however, on Nov. 7.

Another volunteer falsely passed himself off as a New York City police officer, a criminal offense, and was buying equipment for local law enforcement officials using his staff card, according to the report.

Volunteers said the breadth of the misallocation of supplies made them suspect foul play. Every volunteer interviewed had an example of supplies appearing in places where they were not needed or where the distribution point seemed to be ad hoc.

For instance, Robert M. Cooke, a volunteer serving as bulk distribution manager, was baffled to find industrial-size cans of diced chicken at a middle school in New Orleans.

Mr. Cooke said the school was not an official distribution site and the neighborhood around the school lacked utility service, so the likely recipients of the chicken would have no way to cook it, let alone store such large quantities.

"Those cans were supposed to go to Red Cross kitchens, where they could be properly cooked and prepared," he said.

Mr. Taylor similarly was puzzled by the distribution of supplies in Cameron Parish when he was in charge of bulk distribution. "We were giving out bleach, paper towels and mops, but the houses there were devastated," he said. "We should have been giving out wheelbarrows, hacksaws and other repair equipment."

Moreover, Mr. Taylor said, volunteers at the site did not seem to know who the recipients were. "People were driving up and picking up stuff and driving off, and my question was, how do you know that these people live in this area and need what you're giving them?" he said. "They basically shrugged at me."

Mr. Taylor and Mr. Cooke, who do not know each other, said the scope of the disaster, as well as poor training of the volunteers, explained some but not all of the problems they saw.

"It's a really bad system, of course, because you couldn't account for everything, but there was some funny stuff going on, too," Mr. Taylor said. "People were definitely taking advantage of the huge flaws in accountability."

Mired In Diplo-Gobbledygook (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

For many of us, diplo-speak is merely jargon-laden, meaningless or gibberish. And that's even when the individual words are actually in English.

But things became worse than usual last week when some Capitol Hill types received a letter from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urging lawmakers to "support . . . legislative changes that would broaden and deepen our emerging strategic partnership with India."

During President Bush 's trip to India, she wrote, the two countries "agreed to work cooperatively in areas as diverse as agriculture, defense, health . . . and enhanced defense cooperation." But the "major achievement" was the "historic agreement on civil nuclear cooperation," she said, attaching a 21-page electronic file explaining the "many benefits for the United States."

The "nukes for mangos" agreement has sparked intense and bipartisan condemnation. For example, former GOP presidential candidate Patrick J. Buchanan said that "the U.S. negotiators capitulated to all of India's demands, lest Bush leave New Delhi with nothing to show for a trip halfway around the world but an agreement to import mangos." (Buchanan apparently is unaware of how incredibly tasty those Indian mangos are.) Former senator Sam Nunn (D-Ga.) said the agreement "certainly does not curb in any way the proliferation of weapons-grade nuclear material." Others claimed the deal undermines the Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Not at all, Rice wrote the lawmakers. "This is a strong net gain for our non-proliferation agenda." Then there was this on Page 20:

Segiphu $lvndgh? Well. Can't argue with that.Win-Win Situation?

DOJ_NMG_0020846

The Bush folks have always been keen on family values. Now the Houston Chronicle reports that former first lady Barbara Bush donated a chunk of money -- it's unknown how much -- to the Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund "with specific instructions that the money be spent with an educational software company owned by her son Neil."

"Since then, the Ignite Learning program has been given to eight [Houston] area schools that took in substantial numbers of Hurricane Katrina evacuees," the Chronicle reported Wednesday.

"Mrs. Bush wanted to do something specifically for education and specifically for the thousands of students flooding into the Houston schools," Jean Becker , President George H.W. Bush 's chief of staff, told the paper. She knew that the Houston school district "was using this software program, and she's very excited about this program, so she wanted to make it possible for them to expand the use of this program."

Unclear how the charitable deduction works out on this fine move.Bush Q&Praise

President Bush , who's been touting his Iraq policy across the country this week, "is at his best when he's answering real and difficult questions from a cross section of Americans," White House communications director Nicolle Wallace said a few days ago.

So some congressional Democrats were wondering whether his Q&A on Wednesday in Wheeling, W.Va., must have shown him at his worst.

"I thank God that you're our commander in chief," one questioner began. "You're a man for our times. . . . And I'm a supporter of yours. . . . And God bless you, and I thank you for your service."

Then another hardball from the audience: "Do you like living in the White House?"

Another listener fired: "I want to let you know that every service at our church, you are by name lifted up in prayer -- and you and your staff and all of our leaders. And we believe in you. We are behind you. And we cannot thank you enough for what you've done to shape our country. . . ."

Bush was earning his salary that day.

WAR NEWS:

Battle Looms Over Use Of Prewar Iraq Intelligence (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The long-simmering battle over the Bush administration's use of prewar Iraq intelligence is about to flare again.

Republicans controlling the congressional investigation say they will finish by next week a spate of reports on how the White House used intelligence headed into the March 2003 invasion of Iraq. They will include topics like predictions before the war on how a post-Saddam Iraq might look and whether the Bush administration was duped by Iraqis with a vested interest in war, like Deputy Prime Minister Ahmed Chalabi.

But they have set no timetable for issuing reports on their probe into what some Democrats consider the most explosive questions: Whether political appointees at the Pentagon deliberately distorted intelligence and subverted analysis by the Central Intelligence Agency to gin up support for the invasion.

"There were a lot of mistakes in the lead-up to the war, and if we don't look at all the issues we won't get a complete picture of what happened," says Wendy Morigi, a spokeswoman for the vice chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Democratic Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia. "The role of the former Undersecretary of Defense's office is an area of concern."

Some people familiar with the Senate investigation say politics may overshadow substance on the matter. "I think people will be surprised when these things come out because the buildup has been made that there's some smoking gun," says William Duhnke, Republican staff director of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence. "This has all outstripped the reality."

Last fall, Democrats briefly shut down the Senate amid protests that the majority party was delaying the intelligence investigation. This year, they are gearing up to make it an issue in the November elections -- and an argument for changing control of Congress to bring about tougher oversight of the Bush administration's intelligence activities. Democrats' ability to subpoena current and former Bush administration officials, as well as gain access to many still-classified documents, they say, could significantly change future intelligence investigations.

"There's so much that still needs to come out," says Maurice Hinchey, a Democratic Congressman from New York who has sought for months to force the White House to release documents related to prewar intelligence. "A change in either house could completely change the nature of the game."

Even before U.S. forces toppled Saddam Hussein in March 2003, some critics said the White House tried to justify the invasion by distorting the magnitude of Iraq's weapons programs and alleged ties to the al Qaeda terrorist network. That June, the Senate Intelligence Committee initiated its first review of the U.S. government's pre-Iraq war intelligence activities, with a focus on the "quantity and quality" of the intelligence gathered by U.S. agencies. The report, completed a year later, absolved the White House of seeking to influence or distort information gathering on Iraq.

The Senate Intelligence panel, however, decided to widen the original investigation to focus more on how the White House used the intelligence, rather than just how it was collected. Democrats originally sought to complete the Phase II probe before the 2004 presidential election, but the pace has been slowed by disagreements between the parties over the scope and mechanics of the five-part study.

Democrats have criticized the Intelligence Committee's chairman, Kansas Republican Pat Roberts, who also is being accused of blocking calls for a congressional probe into the White House's domestic-wiretapping program, which President Bush confirmed late last year.

In announcing last week his timetable for completing the next series of reports, Mr. Roberts took some shots at his opponents. "Much has been said over the last few months about the committee's progress on Phase II," he said. "Notwithstanding the minority's public cries of 'delay,' Phase II has been ongoing, ..." he added.

The three near-completed studies, he said, focus on the Bush administration's use of intelligence provided by an Iraqi exile group, Mr. Chalabi's Iraqi National Congress; postwar findings on prewar assessments of Iraq's alleged WMD program and terrorism links; and prewar assessments about postwar Iraq's political and security environment.

Sen. Roberts's office says a fourth section also is imminent, comparing whether statements by President Bush and other senior U.S. officials about Iraq's WMD programs and alleged links to al Qaeda heading into the war were supported by U.S. intelligence.

But Mr. Roberts didn't offer a timetable for completing the fifth and final section of the investigation, which looks into activities before the war by the office of former Undersecretary of Defense for Policy Douglas Feith.

Former Bush administration officials say Mr. Feith's office circulated reports that overstated the links between Mr. Hussein and al Qaeda. Mr. Feith's office also faces questions about whether it subverted proper intelligence-gathering channels by engaging in activities normally conducted by the CIA.

A number of officials who worked on assembling intelligence on Iraq before the war say Mr. Feith's operations at the Pentagon were important in shaping the debate on Iraq. They said the office had strong links to the White House and the Office of the Vice President and that it could set an extremely aggressive tone on the question of whether Mr. Hussein had a relationship with al Qaeda, even if the facts didn't necessarily support the claims.

"What the operation under Feith was doing was trying to collate anything that showed a link" between Baghdad and al Qaeda, says Paul Pillar, who served as the CIA's National Intelligence Officer for the Near East and South Asia during the first Bush term. Mr. Pillar recently accused the White House of skewing intelligence reporting on Iraq to justify the invasion. "They'd disregard everything that came from other sources. It was just a matter of collecting and sifting," he says.

Mr. Feith said yesterday that charges his office had engaged in improper intelligence activities were groundless. "My office did not engage in intelligence collection. ... The intelligence we used came from the intelligence community itself," he said. He added that his office rigorously vetted information that both the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence and a White House-sponsored panel investigating intelligence failures called for.

Democrats have been pushing for the Senate's Intelligence Committee to do an independent study of Mr. Feith's operations; the Pentagon's Inspector General currently is conducting an internal review of them. Sen. Roberts and Republicans have decided to defer to the Pentagon's internal report before further investigation. The Pentagon review began in November, but a spokesman for the Inspector General said he could offer no time frame for its completion.

Communication Breakdown (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Now it gets painful for George W. Bush. Iraq is wrapped around his presidency as tightly as Vietnam was around Lyndon Johnson's. Bush keeps telling the country he has a plan for victory, but the polls suggest the public doesn't believe it. Those big "Plan for Victory" signs at his rally in Wheeling, W.Va., this week read more like an exhortation than a statement of fact.

Bush has lacked the tragic sensibility found in many of our great presidents. He works so hard at his show of easy informality that you rarely sense the inner man and the anguish that must be there. Watching him, you know he's wound tight even as he tries to act loose. The locker-room nicknames and the exaggerated Texas mannerisms are part of the enforced informality. The longer he stays in Washington, the more pronounced his Texas manner of droppin' his g's. It's a kind of camouflage, but it's wearing thin. This is not a president at ease.

When Bush speaks about the struggle of his presidency, it sometimes sounds as if he's talking to the mirror. Take this week's long, thinking-out-loud news conference: "I believe that my job is to go out and explain to people what's on my mind. That's why I'm having this press conference, see? I'm telling you what's on my mind. And what's on my mind is winning the war on terror." He's ready to lead, he insists; he has made a vow to the American people. To whom are these comments directed, if not himself?

The polls suggest that Bush is losing the ability to communicate effectively about the issue that matters most to him. He has a better story on Iraq than many people seem to appreciate: Iraqi politicians are in fact coming together toward a government of national unity; Iraqi troops are improving their performance; substantial reductions in the number of U.S. troops are likely this year. But to many Americans, judging by the polls, Bush's assertions sound like a broken record. His optimism comes across as happy talk.

Bush works hard to disguise it, but one senses the same inner conflict that afflicted Johnson as Vietnam began to go bad. In "The Best and the Brightest," David Halberstam described LBJ's torment: "He was a good enough politician to know what had gone wrong and what he was in for and what it meant to his dreams, but he could not turn back, he could not admit that he had made a mistake. He could not lose and thus he had to plunge forward." But, recalls Halberstam, "instead of leading, he was immobilized, surrounded, seeing critics everywhere."

It's a dangerous situation. If Bush loses his ability to convince the country that his war aims make sense, America may be forced into a hasty withdrawal that will have devastating repercussions. To avoid this outcome and maintain its strategy of a measured handoff to Iraqi forces, the administration must bridge what in Johnson's day was known as the "credibility gap." Bush could shake up his team and add new voices that can speak more convincingly to the public. Or he could reach out to moderate Democrats who support a bipartisan foreign policy, if there are any who haven't been chased off by Karl Rove. Or he could give a larger communications role to the uniformed military. The generals won't like being political frontmen, but they may prefer it to a collapse of support for the war.

On my most recent trip to Iraq, I took along a short book titled "Every War Must End," written in the 1970s by Fred Ikle, who later became a defense official in the Reagan administration. It's a haunting book, whose basic message is that starting wars is far easier than stopping them. "Cutting one's losses, although a common notion in everyday life, appears to be a particularly difficult decision for a government to reach in seeking to end a prolonged and unsuccessful war," Ikle wrote.

Ask senior military commanders what they think about Bush and they will tell you they love his toughness -- but wish the White House could communicate its Iraq strategy better. Bush has tried. All the speeches and rallies and white papers of the past few months have reflected a recognition that the public will support the war so long as it feels there is a coherent strategy for victory. That's why you hear the phrase "plan for victory" repeated so often, like a mantra to convince the public that American soldiers aren't dying in a lost cause.

But it's not working, and the president owes it to the troops, above all, to figure out a better way to communicate.

In Charge, Except They're Not (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Is President Bush the leader of our government, or is he just a right-wing talk-show host?

The question comes to mind after Bush's news conference this week in which he sounded like someone who has no control over the government he is in charge of. His words were those of a pundit inveighing against the evils of bureaucrats.

"Obviously," said the critic in chief, "there are some times when government bureaucracies haven't responded the way we wanted them to, and like citizens, you know, I don't like that at all." Yes, and if you can't do something about it, who can?

Bush went on: "I mean, I think, for example, of the trailers sitting down in Arkansas. Like many citizens, they're wondering why they're down there, you know. How come we've got 11,000?"

Bush was talking about 10,777 mobile homes ordered up to provide housing for the victims of Hurricane Katrina. As Rep. Mike Ross put it in an interview, most of these "brand-new, fully furnished homes are sitting in a hay meadow in Hope, Arkansas," and are "a symbol of what's wrong with this administration and what's wrong with FEMA."

Ross, a Democrat whose district includes that hay meadow, has been running a one-man crusade since December to get the homes moved to where they could actually provide shelter for those left homeless by the storm. The Federal Emergency Management Agency let the homes sit there because its regulations don't permit the use of such structures in a flood plain.

That raises at least two questions: Why did FEMA spend anywhere from $300 million to $430 million -- the numbers are in dispute -- to buy homes that didn't meet its own regulations? Alternatively, why can't it alter its regulations at least temporarily to use the homes where they are desperately needed?

Nearly three months after Ross first complained about the homes sitting in the field -- and nearly six weeks after Fox News reported the story and CNN broadcast an extensive account -- Bush seemed perplexed. He insisted that he was asking Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to get to the bottom of the deal.

"So I've asked Chertoff to find out," Bush said. "What are you going to do with them? I mean, the taxpayers aren't interested in 11,000 trailers just sitting there. Do something with them. And so I share that sense of frustration when a big government is unable to, you know -- sends wrong signals to taxpayers. But our people are good, hardworking people."

Hold on: The president of the United States runs the "big government" he's attacking. This is mysterious. If Bush's "good, hardworking people" aren't responsible for the problem, the villains of the piece must be alien creatures created by some strange beast called Big Government.

Ross reports that 300 of the homes were finally moved last month and that 5,000 are supposed to be moved soon to Katrina victims. That still leaves a lot of homes. FEMA has said they will be stored for future disasters.

This episode is important because it is representative of a corrosive style of politics. Bush and many of his fellow Republicans have done a good business over the years running against the ills of Big Government. They are so much in the habit of trashing government that even when they are in charge of things -- remember, Republicans have controlled the White House and both houses of Congress for all but 18 months since 2001 -- they pretend they are not.

And when their own government fails, they turn around and use their incompetence to argue that government can never work anyway, so you might as well keep electing conservatives to have less government. It's an ideological Catch-22. Even their failures prove they are right.

On the same day Bush was pushing off accountability for the mobile home fiasco, another politician was giving his voters some very bad news -- and taking responsibility for fixing the problem.

Gov. Jon Corzine of New Jersey announced that his state's fiscal situation was a mess, and he proposed a budget that simultaneously raised taxes, cut programs and walked away from some of his own campaign promises. "New Jerseyans believe that telling the truth is always better than hiding from it, even when it hurts," said Corzine, a Democrat. "And boy, does this budget hurt."

I'll leave it to New Jersey's budget experts to parse the details of Corzine's fiscal plan. But it's definitely bracing when a politician skips all the rhetoric about big or small government and just tries to fix the thing.

Of Course It's A Civil War (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Today's big debate over Iraq seems to be: Is there or is there not a civil war? Yes, say the defeatists, citing former prime minister Ayad Allawi, a man with an ax to grind against the current (elected) government, which excluded him.

No, not really, not yet, not quite, say U.S. officials and commanders, as well as Iraq's president, also hardly the most neutral of observers.

This debate appears to be important because the perception that there has been an outbreak of civil war following the Samarra bombing pushed some waverers to jump ship on their support for the war. Most famous of these is William F. Buckley Jr., who after Samarra declared that it is time for "the acknowledgment of defeat." Defeat? Yes, because of the inability of the Iraqi people to "suspend internal divisions" to allow a new democratic order to emerge.

This whole debate about civil war is surreal. What is the insurgency if not a war supported by one (minority) part of Iraqi society fighting to prevent the birth of the new Iraqi state supported by another (majority) part of Iraqi society?

By definition that is civil war, and there's nothing new about it. As I noted here in November 2004: "People keep warning about the danger of civil war. This is absurd. There already is a civil war. It is raging before our eyes. Problem is, only one side" -- the Sunni insurgency -- "is fighting it."

Indeed, until very recently that has been the case: ex-Baathist insurgents (aided by the foreign jihadists) fighting on one side, with the United States fighting back in defense of a new Iraq dominated by Shiites and Kurds.

Now all of a sudden everyone is shocked to find Iraqis going after Iraqis. But is it not our entire counterinsurgency strategy to get Iraqis who believe in the new Iraq to fight Iraqis who want to restore Baathism or impose Taliban-like rule? Does not everyone who wishes us well support the strategy of standing up the Iraqis so we can stand down? And does that not mean getting the Iraqis to fight the civil war themselves?

DOJ_NMG_0020850

Hence the gradual transfer of war-making responsibility. Hence the decline of American casualties. Hence the rise of Iraqi casualties.

What we don't want to see is the private militias taking the law into their own hands. The army, by all accounts, has remained cohesive, with relatively good discipline. The problem is the police forces, which have been infiltrated by some of the Mahdi Army and other freelance Shiite vigilantes.

We cannot allow parts of the police apparatus to become instruments of Moqtada al-Sadr or other private interests. And not just because they act viciously and vindictively but also because their insubordination and independence are a threat to the very stability of the new Iraqi state.

But let's put this in perspective. First, this kind of private revenge attack has been going on at a low level since the beginning of the insurgency. Second, it does have the effect of concentrating Sunni minds on the price of their continuing support for the random, large-scale and heretofore unanswered slaughter of Shiites that they either actively or passively support.

And, third, if the private militias are the problem, it is a focused and relatively narrow problem. Creating discipline and central control over the security services is a more manageable issue than all-out Hobbesian conflict.

The principal issue, and measure of our success, is the shaping of disciplined and effective security forces. And that is why the political negotiations that have been dragging on are so critical. It is the political track that must secure leadership for both the defense and interior ministries that is nonsectarian and committed to a unitary force whose members do not answer to private warlords.

Civil wars are not eternal. This war will end not with an Appomattox instrument of surrender. It will end when a critical mass of Sunnis stops supporting the insurgency and throws its lot in with the new Iraq.

How does this happen? The stick is military -- the increased cost in Sunni blood of continuing the fight. But the carrot is political -- a place at the table for those Sunnis, some of whom are represented in parliament, who are prepared to abandon the insurgency for a share of power, a share of oil income, and a sense of security and dignity in the new Iraq.

This is doable. That is not to say it will be done. It is to say that those who have decided that because of "civil war" it cannot be done have been unreasonably panicked by something that has been with us all along.

Iraq A Foolish Act Or Chance For Freedom? (USAT)

USA Today, March 24, 2006

What people are saying about third anniversary of Iraq war:

The San Francisco Bay Guardian, in an editorial: "The air of unreality in Washington, D.C., is, well, unreal. ... Vice President Cheney proclaimed that the war in Iraq is going well, that the insurgency had reached 'a stage of desperation' — and that the prediction that Americans would be greeted as liberators was 'basically accurate.' There's no civil war, the administration insists, no catastrophic political failure, no evidence that the war is well on its way to becoming the new Vietnam (War). No, Cheney insists, the problem is just the overcritical news media. For the record, more than 2,300 (U.S.) soldiers are dead. So are as many as 37,000 Iraqis. Countless more have been maimed, lost limbs, seen their lives destroyed. And three years after the invasion, there is no end in sight. ... And (President) Bush's insistence on staying the course is starting to sound like Richard Nixon's secret plan to end the Vietnam War."

The Wall Street Journal, in an editorial: "The third anniversary of U.S. military action to liberate Iraq has brought with it a relentless stream of media and political pessimism that is unwarranted by the facts and threatens to become a self-fulfilling prophesy if it goes unchallenged. ... One doesn't have to be a dreamy-eyed optimist about democracy to recognize that toppling Saddam Hussein was a milestone in slowing the spread of (weapons of mass destruction). ... The Middle East is now undergoing a political evolution in which the clear majority, even if skeptical of U.S. motives, agrees with the goal of more democracy and accountable government. ... But the desire among so many of our political elites to repudiate Bush and his foreign policy is creating a dangerous public pessimism that could yet lead to defeat — a defeat whose price would be paid by all Americans, and for years to come."

Portsmouth (N.H.) Herald, in an editorial: "For Iraq to truly succeed, we need to be committed to full-scale nation-building, but we do not have the resources, troops or finances to make it happen. And there's certainly no political will to do this mission on anything but the cheap. We have in one sense won the military portion of this struggle, but it's a Pyrrhic victory at best — nation-building depends on dealing with deep-seated cultural, political, social and economic tensions, and this administration has proven itself consistently incompetent in dealing with those realities."

Dan Darling, counterterrorism consultant for the Manhattan Institute's Center for Policing Terrorism, writing online for The Weekly Standard magazine: "When the Iraqi regime collapsed in April 2003, few observers saw reason to mourn the loss of Saddam's brutal dictatorship. While a great deal of information about the former Iraqi regime's assorted atrocities has been uncovered since the invasion, newly released documents go even further in demonstrating its manifest depravity. ... It is important that we enumerate the atrocities carried out under Saddam's auspices. Those who died at the hands of his regime deserve nothing less."

The Albuquerque Tribune, in an editorial: "It is time for those symbolic Iraqi purple fingers of democracy to become Iraqi trigger fingers. There simply is no way around the blunt fact that the Iraqi people now must assume responsibility for their own security. What happens from here is up to them, not us. ... We must all agree that the fight for Iraq is no longer ours to win or lose. ... It's not our country. It's theirs. If it is to survive as a democracy, Iraqis will have to fight for their country, their families and themselves. ... If democracy is to be born in the Islamic Middle East, in Iraq, it must be midwifed by the Iraqi people, because they want it — more than anything, more even than life itself for some who, like their American benefactors, surely will have to pay the ultimate price. Freedom is not cheap. Too many Americans already have paid the price for it on behalf of the Iraqi people. We wish the Iraqis well. But it is time to find out if the Iraqi people are willing to pay that price themselves. It is their country to rule by the vote or to lose to tyranny."

Rumsfeld Vows Iraq Drawdown Will Continue (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said yesterday that commanders are planning further troop reductions in Iraq despite ongoing violence that has killed hundreds of civilians after the February bombing of the Shi'ite Golden Mosque.

Asked about President Bush's remark Tuesday that U.S. troops will be in Iraq until at least 2009, the year he leaves office, Mr. Rumsfeld said there could still be Americans training the Iraqi security forces (ISF). It was a clear signal that the defense secretary expects that by that time the United States' combat role will be greatly reduced.

Mr. Bush provided no context for his remark about troops in Iraq in 2009, leaving some with the impression that substantial cuts will not happen, as commanders have promised. And it stirred more complaints from Democrats that the administration is not shifting anti-insurgent responsibilities from Americans to Iraqi combatants fast enough.

Mr. Rumsfeld's careful remarks yesterday seemed designed to reset the debate to an assumption of gradual troop cuts that began in January, if conditions permit.

"I would anticipate, as we've said, that as the Iraqi security forces continue to take over more and more responsibility, we'll continue to reduce down our forces, and that any stress on the force would be eased rather than increased," he told reporters at the Pentagon.

Pressed about the Bush prediction, he said, "We may be helping to train and equip some forces in Iraq in 2009. Are we making plans to do that? We're making plans to assist the Iraqis and the Afghans in training and equipping their forces so that they can take over the responsibility. And as the president said, it's conditions-based. I'm not going to get into speculating about specific numbers or on specific dates."

There are about 133,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, down from 160,000 during the December parliamentary elections. Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq, said in late December that the level should be down to about 130,000 by the end of this month. He is contemplating further cuts this year, depending on the maturation of the Iraqi forces, which stand at about 270,000 personnel.

Mr. Rumsfeld added, "We anticipate that they'll go down. And the reason we anticipate they'll go down is because we think the government will be formed, and it will meet with reasonable acceptance and that the Iraqi security forces will continue to be performing well and that we will continue to pass over battle space, bases and responsibility to the Iraqi security forces."

In Baghdad, Army Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch tried to dispel various reports that stepped-up sectarian violence has plunged Iraq into total chaos.CQ He said al Qaeda in Iraq, led by Jordanian-born Abu Musab Zarqawi, continues to try to provoke a civil war by killing civilians. The Feb. 22 bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra triggered much of the recent killings.

But "there is not widespread violence across Iraq," Gen. Lynch said. "There is not. Seventy-five percent of the attacks still take place in Baghdad, Al Anbar [in the west] or Salahuddin [north of Baghdad]. And in the other 15 provinces, they all average less than six attacks a day, and 12 of those provinces average less than two attacks a day. So the idea that Baghdad is the center of gravity for the enemy's operations is indeed a valid idea, but the concern that all of Iraq is experiencing widespread violence is incorrect."

Mr. Rumsfeld, a member of Mr. Bush's original Cabinet, continues to face questions from the press about whether he will continue in office, despite repeated endorsements from the president. Some Democrats periodically call on him to resign for what they say was botched war planning.

Yesterday, a reporter quoted a column from New York Times pundit Maureen Dowd, who regularly expresses disdain for Mr. Bush. She wrote that Mr. Rumsfeld no longer carries the clout he once did.

"If you believe everything you read in Maureen Dowd, you better get a life," Mr. Rumsfeld responded.

Bush's Requests For Iraqi Base Funding Make Some Wary Of Extended Stay (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — Even as military planners look to withdraw significant numbers of American troops from Iraq in the coming year, the Bush administration continues to request hundreds of millions of dollars for large bases there, raising concerns over whether they are intended as permanent sites for U.S. forces.

Questions on Capitol Hill about the future of the bases have been prompted by the new emergency spending bill for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, which overwhelmingly passed the House of Representatives last week with $67.6 billion in funding for the war effort, including the base money.

Although the House approved the measure, lawmakers are demanding that the Pentagon explain its plans for the bases, and they unanimously passed a provision blocking the use of funds for base agreements with the Iraqi government.

"It's the kind of thing that incites terrorism," Rep. Ron Paul (R-Texas) said of long-term or permanent U.S. bases in countries such as Iraq.

Paul, a critic of the war, is co-sponsoring a bipartisan bill that would make it official policy not to maintain such bases in Iraq. He noted that Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden cited U.S. military bases in Saudi Arabia as grounds for the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

The debate in Congress comes as concerns grow over how long the U.S. intends to keep forces in Iraq, a worry amplified when President Bush earlier this week said that a complete withdrawal of troops from Iraq would not occur during his term.

Long-term U.S. bases in Iraq would also be problematic in the Middle East, where they could lend credence to charges that the U.S. motive for the invasion was to seize land and oil. And they could also feed debate about the appropriate U.S. relationship with Iraq after Baghdad's new government fully assumes control.

State Department and Pentagon officials have insisted that the bases being constructed in Iraq will eventually be handed over to the Iraqi government.

Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador to Baghdad, said on Iraqi television last week that the U.S. had "no goal of establishing permanent bases in Iraq."

And Pentagon spokesman Army Lt. Col. Barry Venable said, "We're building permanent bases in Iraq for Iraqis."

But the seemingly definitive administration statements mask a semantic distinction: Although officials say they are not building permanent U.S. bases, they decline to say whether they will seek a deal with the new Iraqi government to allow long-term troop deployments.

Asked at a congressional hearing last week whether he could "make an unequivocal commitment" that the U.S. officials would not seek to establish permanent bases in Iraq, Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the commander in charge of all U.S. forces in the Middle East and Central Asia, replied, "The policy on long-term presence in Iraq hasn't been formulated." Venable, the Pentagon spokesman, said it was "premature and speculative" to discuss long-term base agreements before the permanent Iraqi government had been put in place.

All told, the United States has set up 110 forward operating bases in Iraq, and the Pentagon says about 34 of them already have been turned over to the Iraqi government, part of an ongoing effort to gradually strengthen Iraqi security forces.

Bush is under political pressure to reduce the number of U.S. troops before midterm congressional elections, and the Pentagon is expected to decide soon whether the next major deployment will reflect a significant reduction in forces.

But despite the potential force reductions and the base handovers, the spending has continued.

Dov Zakheim, who oversaw the Pentagon's emergency spending requests as the department's budget chief until 2004, said critics might be reading too much into the costly emergency spending, needed to protect U.S. forces from insurgent attacks and provide better conditions for deployed troops.

The spending "doesn't necessarily connote permanence," Zakheim said. "God knows it's a tough enough environment anyway."

The bulk of the Pentagon's emergency spending for military construction over the last three years in Iraq has focused on three or four large-scale air and logistics bases that dot the center of the country.

The administration is seeking $348 million for base construction as part of its 2006 emergency war funding bill. The Senate has not yet acted on the request.

By far the most funding has gone to a mammoth facility north of Baghdad in Balad, which includes an air base and a logistics center. The U.S. Central Command said it intended to use the base as the military's primary hub in the region as it gradually hands off Baghdad airport to civilian authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0020853

Through the end last year, the administration spent about $230 million in emergency funds on the Balad base, and its new request includes $17.8 million for new roads that can accommodate hulking military vehicles and a 12.4-mile-long, 13-foot-high security fence.

The nonpartisan Congressional Research Service noted in a report last year that many of the funds already spent, including for the facilities at Balad, suggested a longer-term U.S. presence.

Projects at the base include an $18-million aircraft parking ramp and a $15-million airfield lighting system that has allowed commanders to make Balad a strategic air center for the region; a $2.9-million Special Operations compound, isolated from the rest of the base and complete with landing pads for helicopters and airplanes, where classified payloads can be delivered; and a $7-million mail distribution building.

Other bases also are being developed in ways that could lend them to permanent use.

This year's request also includes $110 million for Tallil air base outside the southeastern city of Nasiriya, a sprawling facility in the shadow of the ruins of the biblical city of Ur. Only $11 million has been spent so far, but the administration's new request appears to envision Tallil as another major transportation hub, with new roads, a new dining hall for 6,000 troops — about two Army brigades — and a new center to organize and support large supply convoys.

The administration also has spent $50 million for Camp Taji, an Army base north of Baghdad, and $46.3 million on Al Asad air base in the western desert.

These large bases are being built at the same time that hundreds of millions of dollars are being spent on separate bases for the growing Iraqi military. According to the U.S. Central Command and data obtained from the Army Corps of Engineers, for example, about $165 million has been spent to build an Iraqi base near the southern town of Numaniya and more than $150 million for a northern base at the old Iraqi army's Al Kasik facility.

The big numbers have begun to cause consternation in congressional appropriations committees, which are demanding more accountability from Pentagon officials on military construction in the region.

The House Appropriations Committee approved the president's newest funding bill this month with a strongly worded warning. In a report accompanying the legislation, the committee noted that it had already approved about $1.3 billion in emergency spending for war-related construction, but that the recently declared "long war" on terrorism should allow more oversight of plans for bases in the region.

It "has become clear in recent years that these expeditionary operations can result in substantial military construction expenditures of a magnitude normally associated with permanent bases," the committee reported.

Rep. James T. Walsh (R-N.Y.), chairman of the House subcommittee that oversees military construction, said his panel was concerned that money the Pentagon was ostensibly seeking for short-term emergency needs actually was going to projects that were not urgent but long-term in nature.

Walsh pointed to a $167-million request to build a series of roads in Iraq that bypass major cities, a proposal the administration said was needed to decrease the convoys' exposure to roadside bombs, known as improvised explosive devices, or IEDs. Walsh's subcommittee cut the budget for the project to $60 million. He said the project sounded "more like road construction" than it did a strategy to protect troops from IEDs.

The Appropriations Committee also inserted a ban on spending any of the new money on facilities in Iraq until the U.S. Central Command submitted a master plan for bases in the region. Abizaid, in congressional testimony last week, said such a plan was in the process of getting final Pentagon approval for release to the committee. But he noted: "The master plan is fairly clear on everything except for Iraq and Afghanistan, which I don't have policy guidance for long term."

Without such detail, it might prove impossible for congressional appropriators to get a firm idea of how the administration views the future of the U.S. presence on big bases in Iraq.

In any event, said Zakheim, the former Pentagon budget officer, projects that expand bases' ability to handle American cargo and warplanes will eventually be of use to the Iraqi government.

"Just because the Iraqis don't have an air force now doesn't mean they won't have it several years down the road," he said.

But critics said it was all the more reason for the administration to stop being vague about the future.

"The Iraqis believe we came for their oil and we're going to put bases on top of their oil," said Rep. Tom Allen (D-Maine), a critic of the administration's approach. "As long as the vast majority of Iraqis believe we want to be there indefinitely, those who are opposed to us are going to fight harder and those who are with us are going to be less enthusiastic."

Times staff writer Doug Smith contributed to this report.

Here are four of the bases in Iraq for which the Bush administration has planned upgrades. Money spent through 2005 was granted through emergency spending bills since 2003:

1. Al Asad air base

By some accounts the second largest military air center in Iraq and the main supply base for troops in Al Anbar Province, which includes the insurgent strongholds of Fallouja and Ramadi. It houses about 17,000 troops, including a large contingent of Marines.

Spending: Unknown*

Bush 2006 request: $46.3 million

2. Balad air base

The U.S. military's main air transportation and supply hub in Iraq, with two giant runways. Also known as Camp Anaconda, it is the largest support base in the country, with about 22,500 troops and several thousand contractors.

Spending: $228.7 million*

Bush 2006 request: $17.8 million.

3. Camp Taji

One of the largest facilities for U.S. ground forces in Iraq, the base also serves as home to about 15,000 Iraqi security forces. It has the largest military shopping center (PX) in the country.

Spending: $49.6 million*

Bush 2006 request: None

4. Tallil air base

An increasingly important air and transportation hub, with a growing population of coalition troops and contractors. It has become a key stopping point for supply convoys moving north from Kuwait and is close to one of the Iraqi army's main training facilities.

Spending: $10.8 million*

Bush 2006 request: $110.3 million

*Through 2005

Costs To Rebuild Shifting To Iraqis (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, March 24, 2006

BAGHDAD — The head of the U.S. program to rebuild Iraq said Thursday that the Iraqi government can no longer count on U.S. funds and must rely on its own money and cash from other Persian Gulf nations to complete the massive undertaking.

"The Iraqi government needs to build up its capability to do its own capital budget investment," Daniel Speckhard, director of the Iraq Reconstruction Management Office, told reporters.

Speckhard's remarks signal the unwinding of an extensive rebuilding campaign intended to stabilize Iraq and neutralize insurgents after the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. The $21 billion U.S.-funded program set out to fix or build schools, roads, clinics, ports, bridges, government offices, phone networks, power plants and water systems.

The program also was to train Iraqis in accounting, farming, teaching, nursing, banking and other areas.

Hundreds of projects have been completed, but the top U.S. auditor for the program has criticized it for cost overruns, corruption, understaffing and bureaucratic infighting. Stuart Bowen, special inspector general for Iraqi reconstruction, told Congress last month:

·Electrical capacity is below prewar levels.

·Only 49 of 136 planned water projects will be finished.

·300 of 425 electricity projects will be completed.

As much as $5.6 billion for projects was reallocated to tackle "security needs driven by a lethal and persistent insurgency," Bowen said.

U.S. reconstruction officials once aimed to create public-works jobs for 1.5 million Iraqis. The U.S. Agency for International Development said last week that 77,000 have been created.

Anthony Cordesman, a Middle East expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, called the U.S. plan "a dismal failure. It hasn't met any of its goals. It's left a legacy of half-built projects" that Iraq can't maintain.

Funding reconstruction will pose a huge challenge for Iraq. Its main revenue source — oil production — has been hurt by sabotage to key facilities.

DOJ_NMG_0020855

Speckhard said “significant challenges remain.” He said the rebuilding program sought to “kick-start the economy” and “lay a foundation” Iraq could build on with its own money, private investment and other international aid, particularly from the Gulf region.

Speckhard said per capita income has risen from $500 a year before the war to $1,200 today. He said Iraqis have started 30,000 businesses in the past year.

Iraq's deputy finance minister, Kamal Field al-Basri, said it was “reasonable” for the United States to cut funding for rebuilding after spending $21 billion. “We should be very much dependent on ourselves,” al-Basri said in an interview. He said Iraq needs to increase its capacity to produce oil, which generates 93% of government's revenue, to pay for rebuilding.

The Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, a Washington defense-policy research group, said last month that Iraq has little oil revenue left after paying for day-to-day government operations, social services, security and repairs to oil infrastructure.

A Military Raid Frees 3 Hostages Held In Iraq (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 23 — Acting on a tip from a detainee, a multinational military force stormed a house in western Baghdad early Thursday and rescued two Canadians and a Briton who had been held hostage by a shadowy guerrilla group for four months.

James Loney, 41, and Harmeet Singh Sooden, 32, both from Canada, and Norman Kember, 74, from Britain, were discovered bound yet unguarded, officials reported. The three were whisked to the fortified Green Zone and debriefed by the authorities, officials said, but did not address the news media.

The men, all antiwar advocates working for Christian Peacemaker Teams, had been captured Nov. 26 along with an American colleague, Tom Fox, 54, of Clear Brook, Va., whose body was discovered March 9 wrapped in plastic and dumped on a trash pile in western Baghdad. Mr. Fox had been tortured, handcuffed and shot, the police said.

Thursday's rescue, by a force that included American and British troops, represented one of the few times that military action in Iraq has played a decisive role in a hostage release.

But within hours, a surge of four car bombings, including a suicide attack, struck Baghdad, killing at least 23 people, wounding at least 48 and tempering the military's euphoria from the morning's success.

The attacks followed five days in which there had been no incidents in the capital involving car bombs, or suicide bombs, according to a senior American military spokesman, who insisted that the relative lull was a result of expanded security operations.

But the convergence of the devastating attacks, coming in the span of about four hours, suggested that the guerrillas' ability to operate in the capital remained unfettered.

"As you're well aware, today he surged," acknowledged Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, the military spokesman, using his preferred pronoun to describe the amorphous insurgency. "He still has that capability."

Military commanders jealously guarded details of the morning's rescue, saying they did not want to compromise continuing operations.

General Lynch said a detainee captured Wednesday night had provided the authorities with information that guided them to the house where the three hostages were being held. The captives were found unguarded, their kidnappers having vanished, General Lynch said.

Jack Straw, the British foreign secretary, said that Mr. Kember was in "reasonable" condition but that the two Canadians had to be hospitalized.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper of Canada thanked American and British authorities for their "exceptional" role in the rescue. But he refused to confirm reports that Canadians took part in the operation, citing national security concerns despite, a statement by Mr. Straw thanking the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and "other agencies from Canada" for their role in the mission.

The rescue operation, while unusual, was not unprecedented. Last September, responding again to a tip from a detainee, American forces rescued two hostages, an American and an Iraqi, from an isolated farmhouse south of Baghdad. The American, Roy Hallums, had been working as a contractor for a Saudi company when he was kidnapped in 2004.

Last June, Iraqi troops raided a house in Baghdad and freed an Australian hostage, Douglas Wood, from nearly seven weeks of captivity. But according to some officials, the troops stumbled across Mr. Wood while on a routine search operation.

DOJ_NMG_0020856

The Rev. Alan Betteridge, president of the Baptist Peace Fellowship and a friend of Mr. Kember's for more than 40 years, told the BBC that "it's tremendously good and so unexpected after the killing of Tom Fox a couple of weeks ago, when we really did fear that each one would be killed eventually."

Christian Peacemaker Teams — which is based in Chicago and Toronto and grew out of a collection of churches, including those of the Mennonites and the Quakers — sends groups of Christians to conflict zones to promote peace and human rights. The four advocates were captured while driving to meet with Sunni Arab leaders in western Baghdad.

The eruption of car bombings on Thursday began about 9 a.m., when a car exploded in Karada, an upscale neighborhood, as a police patrol passed by, an official with the Interior Ministry said. One civilian was wounded.

An hour later, someone set off a charge planted in a vehicle parked in the predominantly Sunni Arab neighborhood of Adhamiya, the official said. The explosion, which apparently was aimed at a passing police patrol, killed three policemen and wounded five others.

Around 11 a.m., a suicide bomber detonated a car packed with explosives at the entrance to the headquarters of the Interior Ministry's major crimes unit in central Baghdad, killing 10 policemen and 5 civilians and wounding 32 others, including policemen and civilians, the ministry official reported.

Five more people were killed and 10 wounded, according to the authorities, when a second car bomb exploded about 1:15 p.m. near an outdoor market and a Shiite mosque in western Baghdad.

U.S., British Forces Rescue Iraq Hostages (AP-Y2)

By Bassem Mroue

AP2, March 23, 2006

Without firing a shot, U.S. and British forces stormed a house Thursday and freed three Christian peace activists who were bound but unguarded, ending a four-month hostage ordeal that saw an American in the group killed and dumped along a railroad track.

The U.S. ambassador and the top American military spokesman held out hope the operation on the outskirts of Baghdad could lead to a break in the captivity of American reporter Jill Carroll, a freelance writer for The Christian Science Monitor who was abducted Jan. 7.

The military spokesman, Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, said the 8 a.m. rescue of the Briton and two Canadians from a "kidnapping cell" was based on information divulged by a man during interrogation only three hours earlier. The man was captured by U.S. forces on Wednesday night.

A senior Iraqi military officer told The Associated Press, however, that the operation had been under way for two days in the Abu Ghraib suburb west of Baghdad, site of the notorious prison. The officer, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of his position, said U.S. and British forces refused to give him other details.

Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper said Canadian forces also took part in the rescue operation, although their precise role was unclear.

But the joyful news was tempered by violence that raged throughout Iraq as the day wore on. Fifty-eight people were killed in execution-style slayings, bombings and gun battles. For the third straight day, Sunni insurgents hit a major police and jail facility — this time with a suicide car bombing that killed 25 in central Baghdad.

Lynch claimed a reinforced U.S. and Iraqi security presence in the capital had prevented car bombings on five recent consecutive days, but acknowledged that attacks "surged today."

No kidnappers were present when the troops broke into the house where the peace activists were discovered with their hands tied.

"They were bound, they were together, there were no kidnappers in the areas," Lynch told a news briefing.

The freed men were Canadians James Loney, 41, and Harmeet Singh Sooden, 32, and Briton Norman Kember, 74. The men — members of the Chicago-based Christian Peacemaker Teams — were kidnapped Nov. 26 along with an American colleague, Tom Fox, 54.

Fox's body was found this month, shot and dumped in western Baghdad.

"We remember with tears Tom Fox," group co-director Doug Pritchard said in Toronto. "We had longed for the day when all four men would be released together. Our gladness today is bittersweet by the fact that Tom is not alive to join his colleagues in the celebration."

The three freed members of Christian Peacemaker Teams were taken to a hospital for observation in Baghdad but were released in good condition, the organization said from the Iraqi capital.

British Embassy spokeswoman Lisa Glover said the men would be flown out of Baghdad in the next few days. She said Kember was in "reasonable condition" and spent the day "relaxing and talking to British authorities."

DOJ_NMG_0020857

Kember's wife, Pat, said she had spoken with her husband on the phone.

"He was very, very pleased to be free, but he was very emotional in talking to me. I think he must be very worried about me and the family," she told New Zealand's Radio Live in an interview replayed by the British Broadcasting Corp.

Speaking from her north London home, she said his decision to go to Iraq was "a bit silly," but added "I knew that he felt he must do something and he's getting old, and if he (didn't) do something ... it would be too late."

Loney's brother, Ed, told CBC television that his mother had spoken with James on the phone and that he sounded "fantastic" though "he's lost quite a bit of weight."

"He's alert and he was asking how we were doing and said he was sorry for the whole situation," Ed Loney said. "My mom said, 'Don't worry about it — just get home and we'll talk about all that stuff when you get here.' "

He told CNN that he later spoke directly with his brother, who was "having a lovely chicken dinner with potatoes and a nice soup" and "told me about being rescued and seeing the light of day and smelling the outside air."

Ed Loney also said his brother told him he was well taken care of.

"He was always warm and always fed and things like that. He was more worried about boredom. ... I think that was probably the worst part of it, from what he said."

The Christian Peacemaker Teams volunteers have been in Iraq since October 2002, investigating allegations of abuse against Iraqi detainees by coalition forces. The group says its teams promote peaceful solutions in conflict zones.

Pritchard called for coalition forces to leave the country.

"We believe that the illegal occupation of Iraq by Multinational Forces is the root cause of the insecurity which led to this kidnapping and so much pain and suffering in Iraq," he said.

The kidnapped men were shown as prisoners in several videos, the most recent a silent clip dated Feb. 28 in which Loney, Kember and Sooden appeared without Fox, whose body was found March 10.

The previously unknown Swords of Righteousness Brigades claimed responsibility for the kidnappings.

"As we study who could conduct these kinds of operations there seems to be a kidnapping cell that has been robust over the last several months in conducting these kind of kidnappings," Lynch said.

While many insurgent groups and the al-Qaida in Iraq terrorist organization have kidnapped and often killed foreigners in Iraq, there also is a heavy criminal element involved in such crimes. Thousands of Iraqis have been kidnapped for ransom and some Westerners are believed to have been grabbed by those criminal gangs as well.

Often, it is believed, kidnappers take hostages only for the purposes of selling them into captivity to larger, more organized criminal gangs or insurgent organizations.

The last hostage to be freed in a military operation was Douglas Wood, an Australian rescued in west Baghdad by U.S. and Iraqi forces on June 15, 2005, after 47 days in captivity.

Lynch said there was no new information on Carroll that "I can discuss at this time." But, he said: "There are other operations that continue probably as a result of what we're finding at this time. So you've got to give us the opportunity to work through that."

Carroll has appeared in three videotapes delivered by her kidnappers to Arab television stations, and the deadline her captors set for killing her passed weeks ago without word about her fate.

"My expectation and hope is that the released hostages and the associated activities, in terms of information gathered, could help us bring about her release as well," U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said in an interview with Fox News.

Christian Peacemakers Celebrate Release (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, March 24, 2006

BAGHDAD - An anxious vigil turned to joy for Christian peace activists in Iraq Thursday, as three of their kidnapped colleagues were freed by US, British, and Iraqi forces west of Baghdad.

"It's great to be free," Mr. Kember said, according to a British Embassy statement. "I'm looking forward to getting back to the UK."

The hostages' four-month ordeal ended without a shot being fired, as coalition forces pursued intelligence gained from a detainee. The three men - Briton Norman Kember and Canadians James Loney and Harmeet Singh Sooden of the Chicago-based Christian Peacemaker Teams (CPT) - were found alone and unguarded.

DOJ_NMG_0020858

Concern for the Peacemakers' fate had mounted after the body of American Tom Fox, kidnapped with the others on Nov. 26 by a group calling itself the Swords of Righteousness Brigade, was found earlier this month.

"It's pretty momentous for us, because after Tom's death we heard nothing at all," says Maxine Nash of CPT in Baghdad. "Until that point, we had been very hopeful. Given who we are, we thought people would respect that and release people. That was our lowest point."

US military spokesman Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch said Thursday that coalition forces had acted within three hours of receiving "actionable intelligence" from a detainee about the hostages' location.

"From the time we found the intelligence to the time we released the hostages, was three hours," General Lynch said. The captives were bound, but "there were no kidnappers in the area."

Wire agencies reported Interior Ministry sources as saying that the captives were found northwest of Baghdad in an area known for insurgent activity.

British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said the operation was conducted after "weeks and weeks of very careful work." Defense chief John Reid said that British units "spearheaded" the operation.

"We had longed for the day when all four men would be released together," the CPT codirector Doug Pritchard said in Toronto. "Our gladness today is bittersweet due to the fact that Tom is not alive to join his colleagues in this celebration."

"They knew that their only protection was in the power of the love of God and of their Iraqi and international co-workers," Mr. Pritchard said. "We believe that the illegal occupation of Iraq by multinational forces is the root cause of the insecurity which led to this kidnapping, and so much pain and suffering in Iraq. The occupation must end."

Insurgents and gangs have kidnapped more than 250 foreigners - among them Jill Carroll, a freelance writer for The Christian Science Monitor, who began her 76th day of captivity Thursday. Thousands of Iraqis have been kidnapped, most for ransom; 40 foreign hostages have been killed.

Ms. Carroll's family said Thursday that they were "thrilled" to hear of the CPT members' release. "Although their case is unrelated to Jill's, their release gives us new hope that Jill, too, will soon be freed. We send our best wishes to these three men and their families, knowing that their reunion will be a joyful one." They added that "we are also thinking of the family of Tom Fox at this time and send them our heartfelt sympathy."

The release came on a violent day in Baghdad, with a string of bombs killing at least 33 people.

The CPT team was kidnapped while planning to visit the Muslim Scholars Association group, run by hard-line Sunni cleric Harith al-Dari. The kidnappers put out a video demanding that all prisoners be released by Dec. 8, or the captives would be killed.

A second video on Jan. 28 warned of a "last chance" and showed the wan hostages. A third video in March raised alarm because Mr. Fox was absent. His body was found three days later.

"When you don't know the 'why,' you start wondering, and that leads to other [negative] thoughts," says Ms. Nash. "So we are just so happy."

The Peacemaker Teams, in Iraq since October 2002, have continued their work during the past four months. All are aware of the risks. "We can't be peacemakers with half a heart," CPT member Cathy Breen told the BBC in Amman, Jordan. "We have to take risks."

Release Of Westerners In Iraq Is Bittersweet (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, March 24, 2006

BAGHDAD — Aided by a tip from an Iraqi prisoner, a British-led military operation Thursday rescued three Westerners whose abductors had held them hostage since November, killed their American colleague, and finally left them tied up in an empty house.

No shots were fired and no kidnappers were present when a force of British, U.S. and Canadian troops raided the house on Baghdad's rural outskirts and found the three members of the Christian Peacemaker Teams organization in good condition, said Army Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, a U.S. military spokesman.

The activists — Norman Kember, 74, of Britain, and Canadians James Loney, 41, and Harmeet Singh Sooden, 32 — were seized by gunmen in Baghdad on Nov. 26 along with the American, Tom Fox, 54. The kidnappers demanded the release of all Iraqi prisoners.

Fox's body was found March 9, with multiple bullet wounds in the head and chest. The corpse had been left in a garbage dump near a railway line in a western neighborhood of the capital.

"We had longed for the day when all four men would be released together," said Doug Pritchard, Toronto-based codirector of the Christian Peacemaker Teams group, which describes its mission as reducing violence and protecting human rights in war zones. "Our gladness today is made bittersweet by the fact that Tom is not alive to join his colleagues in the celebration."

The news was also tempered by continuing insurgent bombings and sectarian killings that on Thursday left at least 56 Iraqis dead.

Kidnappings by insurgents and criminal gangs have plagued Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion three years ago to topple Saddam Hussein. At least 430 foreigners, including 41 U.S. citizens, have been taken hostage and seven are still being held, including Jill Carroll, an American freelance writer for the Christian Science Monitor who was abducted Jan. 7.

"We'll work as hard as we can to bring about the release of the remaining hostages," U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad told Fox News television channel.

He said the rescue of the activists, "in terms of information gathered, could help us bring about Miss Carroll's release as well."

The hostage rescue Thursday was the first brought about by a military operation in Iraq since June.

The mission, led by a British Special Air Services team, "follows weeks and weeks of very careful work by military and coalition personnel in Iraq and many civilians as well," British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said in London.

U.S. military spokesman Lynch, speaking to reporters in Baghdad, said the operation was put together in three hours after a prisoner being interrogated by American forces pinpointed the location of the hostages. Iraqi officials said it was a house on the capital's northwestern outskirts.

Lynch said he was reluctant to give details because "there are other operations that continue, probably as a result of what we're finding at this time."

The freed hostages were taken to the Green Zone, Baghdad's fortified administrative center, for hospital checkups followed by debriefings at the British Embassy, where they were expected to stay until leaving Iraq to rejoin their families.

"It's great to be free," Kember told his hosts, embassy spokeswoman Lisa Glover said.

"They looked good and told us they had not been abused or beaten," said Peggy Gish, who visited the men with two fellow Christian Peacemaker Teams activists still working in Iraq. She said the freed captives had lost weight after months of inadequate food.

Gish said the freed hostages told their colleagues Thursday that Fox had been separated from them in early February, about a month before his body was found. They did not learn of their American colleague's death until after their release, she said.

"They're dealing with that blow on top of all the emotion of being free," Gish said. "At this point, they're overwhelmed, trying to absorb what has happened."

She said the men's captors had held them together in a large room and sometimes allowed them to jog inside it for exercise. They were handcuffed and blindfolded part of the time, she said.

Loney's brother Ed said the activist told their mother by phone that he had lost 20 pounds in captivity.

"She said he sounded fantastic," Ed Loney told CBC Radio. "He was alert and was asking how we were doing. He said he was kind of sorry about the whole situation."

Members of the organization, headquartered in Toronto and Chicago, have traveled to conflict zones across the world over the last 20 years, motivated by a religiously inspired belief in nonviolence.

In Iraq, they work with human rights organizations, investigating allegations of abuse against Iraqi detainees by U.S. and British forces, and help with cleanup and rebuilding efforts in war-torn cities.

Christian Peacemaker Teams has spoken out often against the U.S. and British military presence here. Even after those forces rescued its activists, the organization, in a statement, reiterated its belief that "the illegal occupation of Iraq by Multinational Forces is the root cause of the insecurity which led to this kidnapping and so much pain and suffering in Iraq."

The four men were abducted while driving to their headquarters after visiting Sunni Muslim clerics in Baghdad.

The Swords of Righteousness Brigade, a previously unknown group, announced it was holding the men. Although the kidnappers demanded freedom for prisoners, it was never clear to the authorities whether the group was a criminal gang or part of the anti-government insurgency.

The four men appeared as captives in several videos before the most recent one, a silent clip dated Feb. 28, showed Loney, Kember and Sooden without Fox.

In Thursday's violence, the Interior Ministry said, 15 police officers and 10 civilians were killed when a suicide bomber set off his explosives-laden car at a checkpoint outside its Major Crimes division headquarters in Baghdad.

It was the Sunni-led insurgency's third deadly attack on a police facility in three days.

A second car bomb killed eight people at a market near a Shiite Muslim mosque in Shurta Khamsa, a neighborhood in southwest Baghdad.

Fifty-seven people were reported wounded in the two explosions.

Violence Concentrated In Three Iraqi Provinces, U.S. General Says (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, March 24, 2006

BAGHDAD — A U.S. military spokesman in Iraq said Thursday that major violence is largely confined to three of 18 provinces. Fighting raged on with at least 58 people killed in execution-style slayings, bombings and gunbattles.

For the third straight day, Sunni insurgents hit a major police and jail facility. This time a suicide car bombing killed 25 in central Baghdad. The attacker detonated his explosives at the entrance to the Interior Ministry Major Crimes unit, killing 10 civilians and 15 policemen.

Also Thursday, U.S. and British forces stormed a house west of Baghdad and freed three Christian anti-war activists held hostage since Nov. 26.

The U.S. military spokesman, Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, said the rescue of the Briton and two Canadians was based on information divulged by a man during interrogation three hours earlier. That man was captured by U.S. forces Wednesday night.

The freed men were Canadians James Loney, 41, and Harmeet Singh Sooden, 32, and Briton Norman Kember, 74. The men — members of the Chicago-based Christian Peacemaker Teams — were kidnapped along with an American colleague, Tom Fox, 54.

Fox's body was found this month, shot and dumped in western Baghdad.

The U.S. military announced late Thursday that it was in the second day of an operation with Iraqi soldiers "to disrupt anti-Iraqi forces and to find and destroy terrorist caches … west of Baghdad."

The military statement said 1,400 personnel were involved in the operation and had captured "two persons of high-value interest and 16 suspected terrorists." Two large weapons caches also were discovered, the military said.

Lynch hoped the operation could lead to a break in the captivity of American Jill Carroll, a freelance writer for The Christian Science Monitor abducted Jan. 7.

He said there was no new information on Carroll that "I can discuss at this time." But, he said, "there are other operations that continue probably as a result of what we're finding at this time. So you've got to give us the opportunity to work through that."

In a rundown of recent military activity, Lynch told reporters that most Iraqi violence was focused in three central provinces, including Baghdad.

"There is not widespread violence across Iraq. There is not. Seventy-five percent of the attacks still take place in Baghdad, al-Anbar or Salah al-Din (provinces). And in the other 15 provinces, they all averaged less than six attacks a day, and 12 of those provinces averaged less than two attacks a day."

He said attacks nationwide were averaging 75 a day.

As Iraqi soldiers and police have begun patrolling more territory, U.S. forces have become less visible and less easy to target. The nature of the violence has shifted from assaults on American troops to battles rooted in conflict between Sunni and Shiite Muslims.

More than 1,000 people have died violently in Iraq, mainly in and around Baghdad, in the month since an important Shiite shrine was destroyed by bombers Feb. 22 in Samarra, a city north of Baghdad in Salah al-Din province.

Besides the attack on the police facility, 33 other deaths were reported, including 15 more bodies found scattered through Baghdad and Fallujah, a former insurgent stronghold in Anbar province, west of the capital.

Also Thursday, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said the military should say when it pays foreign journalists for favorable news, and the Defense Department should review policies that let it secretly pay Iraqi media.

Challenge For U.S.: Iraq's Handling Of Detainees (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

CAMP JUSTICE, Iraq — The blindfolded detainees in the dingy hallway line up in groups of five for their turn to see a judge, like schoolchildren outside the principal's office.

Each meeting lasts a few minutes. The judge rules whether the detainee will go free, face trial or be held longer at this Iraqi base in northern Baghdad. But Firas Sabri Ali, squeezed into a fetid cell just hundreds of yards from the judge's office, has watched the inmates come and go for four months without his name ever being called.

DOJ_NMG_0020861

He is jailed, along with two brothers and his father, solely as collateral, he says. The Iraqi forces are hunting another brother, suspected of being an insurgent. The chief American medic here says that he believes Mr. Ali to be innocent but that it is up to the Iraqi police to decide whether to free him. The Iraqis acknowledged that they were holding Mr. Ali until they captured his brother.

"I hope they catch him, because then I'll be released," said Mr. Ali, 38, a soft-spoken man who until his arrest worked for a British security company to support his wife and three sons. "They said, 'You must wait.' I told them: 'There's no law. This is injustice.' "

Such is the challenge facing the American military as it tries to train the Iraqi security forces to respect the rule of law. Three years after the invasion of Iraq, American troops are no longer simply teaching counterinsurgency techniques; they are trying to school the Iraqis in battling a Sunni-led rebellion without resorting to the tactics of a "dirty war," involving abductions, torture and murder.

The legacy of Abu Ghraib hampers the American military. But the need to instill respect for human rights has gained a new urgency as Iraq grapples with the threat of full-scale civil war and continuing sectarian bloodletting. It is not uncommon now for dozens of bodies, with hands bound and gunshot wounds to the heads, to surface across Baghdad on any given day.

The Americans are pushing the Shiite-dominated Iraqi forces to ask judges for arrest warrants, restrain their use of force and ensure detainees' rights.

The Iraqi officers at this base, the headquarters of the Public Order Forces, a police paramilitary division with a history of torture and abuse, are gradually changing their behavior, American military advisers say. Cases of detainee abuse have declined in recent months, they say.

But detainees can still languish for months without any hope of a legal appeal because of a shortage of judges or, in the case of Mr. Ali, an unwillingness by the Iraqi police to allow detainees to see a judge. Overcrowding is chronic, because the Justice Ministry has been slow in building new prisons.

"The tradition in this country of a law enforcement agency that had absolute power over people, we've got to break them of that," said Maj. Andrew Creel, the departing joint operations officer here. "I think it'll take years. You can't change a cultural mind-set overnight."

Control of the Interior Ministry, which oversees the police, has become one of the stumbling blocks in forming the new national government, with Sunni Arab politicians accusing Shiite leaders of running militias and death squads from the ministry.

Last fall the American military raided at least two police prisons where it said detainees had been abused. This year's State Department human rights report noted that the police, especially the paramilitary forces, had been accused of torture and killings.

Those forces number 17,500. This base — in the heart of Kadhimiya, just blocks away from a golden-domed Shiite shrine — serves as the headquarters for one of the two major paramilitary branches, the 7,700-member Public Order Forces. An 11-member American military team began advising the Iraqi commanders here last spring. It moved into the base in October and is now handing over its duties to a new team.

Here, 650 prisoners are packed into four spartan rooms. They complain of a lack of food and regular access to showers and toilets. A foul odor wafts from each holding pen. To cope with the overcrowded conditions, the police converted the dining hall into a cell; the three other areas were originally built as storage rooms.

Camp Justice was never meant to hold prisoners for more than a few weeks. Iraqi law says prisoners to be tried are to be transferred to a Justice Ministry penitentiary after interrogation. But the ministry has been unable to build enough jails to keep pace with arrests. It has 10 centers across Iraq, which hold 7,500 detainees, and an additional 7 are expected to be built, a ministry spokesman said.

So the detainee population at temporary police prisons like the one here, separate from those of the Justice Ministry, has ballooned to more than 10,000 in Baghdad alone, spread across a shadowy network of about 10 centers, an Interior Ministry official said.

That has ignited concerns among American officials. But Col. Gordon Davis Jr., the head of Camp Justice's departing advisory team, praised the Iraqi commander here, Maj. Gen. Mehdi Sabih Hashem al-Garawi, for showing a willingness to embrace human rights. The general has, for instance, assigned the Iraqi division's only medic to look after the detainees.

"I won't say he's gone 180, but he's realized that the best way of getting information is not to beat or abuse detainees," Colonel Davis said as he stood in the operations room, the walls plastered with maps of Baghdad.

"The current generation has been brought up with a certain code and a certain tolerance for abuse," he said in another interview. "They've got to be constantly worked on."

The academy for recruits to the Public Order Forces has increased the time spent on human rights training to 20 hours from about eight last October, the colonel said.

DOJ_NMG_0020862

Lt. Col. Dhia al-Shammari, the chief interrogator and a supervisor of detainee operations, said: "Beating or insults, any policeman can do. Professionals don't use them. This is not allowed, and I myself reject it."

Certain Public Order units have had fearsome reputations, and residents of Baghdad and nearby towns have complained of abuse and torture. From April to June of last year, American advisers found prisoners with bruises at the headquarters of the Second Brigade every couple of weeks, Colonel Davis said.

When confronted with incidents of abuse, the colonel said, the Iraqi brigade commander told the Americans, "Are you more worried about our enemies or about us?"

That officer was replaced at the urging of the Americans. So was a commander of the Third Brigade, in Salman Pak. Prisoner abuse has been relatively rare here at the division level, the advisers say, and became even scarcer after the American team moved in last fall. Before that, the advisers had been living at an American base. If the Americans saw a bruised prisoner back then, they often kept quiet for fear of alienating the Iraqi officers, said Master Sgt. Joseph Kaiser, a medic who regularly examines the detainees.

Now the Americans can be more direct, advisers say. The Americans have trained a 32-man guard force. Sergeant Kaiser helps supervise the Iraqi medic who examines the detainees daily.

The Iraqi division's intelligence chief "said we have to treat detainees, since they're subjected to visits by the press and human rights groups," said the medic, Hazem, 32, who declined to give his full name for security reasons. "He said to me, 'Your main job is to treat the patients, not to check if they're terrorists.' If I know they're terrorists and I'm told to kill them, I'd kill them. But I do what my job requires."

Checking on the Detainees

On a balmy afternoon, as Sergeant Kaiser walked up to a holding pen to make one of his daily health checks, a blindfolded man in a brown leather jacket squatted outside the metal door. The man was awaiting interrogation, said several guards with Kalashnikov rifles.

The guards went into the cell and brought out Mr. Ali, the man whose brother is being hunted by the Iraqi police. Dressed in a blue and pink tracksuit and a black ski cap, he shuffled up to the sergeant. Because Mr. Ali speaks English, he serves as an unofficial cellblock leader.

"How are the people inside?" Sergeant Kaiser asked.

"We need to have more food," Mr. Ali said. Mr. Ali said he dreaded the idea of American advisers leaving this base one day. "That's bad," he said, shaking his head. "That's very bad. We need the sergeant or another American officer here. When we see them we say, 'Please stay here.' "

A reporter asked Mr. Ali whether detainees had been abused or tortured. "Don't ask these questions," he said, lowering his voice. "You know that."

Sergeant Kaiser said that since September, when he joined the advisory team, he had found only "a few" cases of abuse. He recalled two that he had written up. Prisoners have been brought in with baton marks, he said, but they might have been resisting arrest.

Sergeant Kaiser and Mr. Ali stepped into the cell. Some sunlight streamed in through three small windows near the roof. Three ceiling fans whirred. The 140 detainees mostly sat up on blankets; there was not enough room for them to lie down without touching each other. By the door, one detainee used an electric hair clipper to shave the head of another. A man with glasses sat reading the Koran.

The detainees complained that family visits occurred only once every couple of months. The sick lay on blankets. Sergeant Kaiser gave medicine for diarrhea to a man in gray robes and tablets for oral fungus to an inmate with yellowing teeth. He poked at the torso of a man with rib pains.

"Some are innocent," said a guard, Sabah Ali, 21, as he looked around the room. "But some have given their confessions and they are guilty. Those who are innocent, we'll release them."

But those detainees sometimes end up waiting months before being freed, because the division prefers to release detainees in large groups.

Prisoners from the division's field units are funneled to this base "so you can exploit intelligence and take any opportunity for abuse out of the field," said Lt. Col. John Shattuck, the deputy commander of the advisory team.

Seeking Arrest Warrants

Since his appointment to Camp Justice in February, Judge Majid has come for several hours almost every day. He is a nervous man dressed in a dark suit who prefers that his full name not be printed.

Detainees are marched from cells in groups of five to see him in an office. The ringing of his cellphone can keep him up at all hours — he is expected to be on call around the clock to approve an arrest warrant if the Iraqi forces suddenly come up someone they want to detain.

DOJ_NMG_0020863

Arrest warrants were mandated by Interior Ministry officials starting last July to provide some accountability, especially among the paramilitary forces. It is unclear, though, how closely field units stick to the requirement.

The Iraqi operations officer at Camp Justice says warrants are needed only for apprehending people on the Interior Ministry's wanted list, not for instances in which the police may be responding to a report of suspicious activity.

Colonel Davis says the warrant policy has had some effect. Because of it, and because the Iraqis are improving their intelligence gathering, the Public Order Forces no longer round up hundreds of people on each raid, he said. On a typical operation, he added, they may take in a dozen.

After being brought here, the detainees are fingerprinted and have their retinas scanned. A photograph is taken, partly to record their condition at the time of arrest. The Americans have asked the Iraqis to deliver a daily report accounting for all detainees held throughout the division; one recent printout listed 896.

The law says detainees are entitled to have their cases reviewed by a judge every two weeks, but there are not enough judges, said Colonel Shammari, the chief interrogator.

The main question, one impossible to answer for now, is whether respect for rule of law will become deeply rooted in the Iraqi forces, despite a tradition of tyranny in this country, as the guerrilla war continues to rage.

Outside one of the prison cells, a blue-uniformed guard, Salim Abdul Hassan, 35, watched as his colleagues led blindfolded detainees to a row of outdoor toilets.

He said that the American training had been of great help, but that "it would be much better if the Iraqis worked on their own without the Americans."

"We wouldn't be tied down," he said. "Three-quarters of the terrorists ask for the help of the Americans. They want to be in the care of the Americans, not the Iraqis."

Houses Divided In U.S., Iraqi Exiles Clash Over View Of Nation's Future (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

AURORA, Ill. -- Zaid Alaridh, the scion of a wealthy Shiite family, fled Saddam Hussein's crackdown on Iraq's Shiite population in 1982 and has lived in the U.S. ever since. The 40-year-old Mr. Alaridh hopes one day to return to his native land to open a technical college. He estimates it will be no more than five years before Iraq is safe enough that he can turn that dream into a reality.

His wife's sister, Ula Ibrahim, regularly tells him that he's being naive. Ms. Ibrahim, 25, says she fled to the U.S. last year after Islamic militants threatened to kill her for working with a women's rights group in Baghdad. She has a political-asylum hearing scheduled for next month, but plans to stay away from Iraq regardless of the outcome of her case.

"In five years Iraq will be the same as it is now, maybe worse," she says. "There is no future there."

Debate over the war in Iraq has erupted in communities of Iraqi exiles across the U.S., dividing families. The conflict is pitting longtime exiles who fled Mr. Hussein's Iraq -- many of whom support the war -- against newer arrivals who have left the country since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003.

Iraqi government officials say hundreds of thousands of Iraqis have left over the past three years, to countries such as Australia, Syria, Jordan and Egypt. Thousands of Iraqis have come to the U.S., where an estimated 150,000 Iraqi-Americans live.

In another family, Harith Aziz Mansoor, 53, left Iraq in March 2005 after he says gunmen threatened to kill him for his work as a subcontractor on a U.S.-funded effort to rehabilitate a water-treatment plant. He applied for asylum while on a U.S.-sponsored trip to Las Vegas, received it a few months later, and is now living outside Detroit with his sister and her family. His sister has been in the U.S. for 12 years.

Mr. Mansoor says that many in the Iraqi exile community in Michigan, one of the nation's largest, were surprised by his descriptions of how difficult his life in Iraq had become. "They thought I was exaggerating," he says.

Depending on their history, members of exile families have sharply different assessments of Iraq's present and future. After gunmen broke into his home in Iraq and assaulted his family, mechanical engineer Laik Anis Kamel fled to the U.S. last year with his wife and daughter. They moved in with his brother-in-law, Atheer Karmo, a prosperous dentist in Dearborn, Mich., who left Iraq in 1990.

Mr. Karmo, 47, is a Republican Party donor who was among Iraqi exiles who met with then-Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz in Michigan shortly before the war. He continues to believe the war will eventually result in a democratic, peaceful Iraq. The 30-year-old Mr. Kamel, whose father died after the assault and whose daughter had a gun held to her head, says Iraq is irreparably broken.

"We are trying to forget everything that happened there," Mr. Kamel says.

In the Alaridh family's four-bedroom house in Aurora, a suburb of Chicago, arguments erupt whenever the family watches TV images of Iraq or reads newspaper accounts of the war. Ms. Ibrahim argues that the country can't be saved in the foreseeable future. Her sister and her brother-in-law, Mr. Alaridh, contend the situation will improve.

"I lived everything -- the drama, the war, the occupation," Ms. Ibrahim says. Nodding toward Mr. Alaridh, she says: "He was in the U.S."

Mr. Alaridh grew up in Baghdad, at a time when high oil prices fueled a construction boom that briefly made Iraq among the most modern and developed countries in the Arab world. His father owned factories that made construction materials like plastic and metal piping, and became a wealthy man.

The family had a large, well-furnished house in an upscale neighborhood and always drove modern cars. They spent summers in Europe and drove to northern Iraq every few months for short vacations at resorts there.

All that began to change in 1980 with the outbreak of Iraq's bloody war with Iran. Mr. Hussein, concerned that Iraq's Shiite majority would join forces with Shiite-run Iran, ordered increasingly brutal crackdowns, forcing deportations of thousands of Shiite families. Mr. Alaridh says so many of the family's friends were deported that the men of his family sat around their houses wondering when their time would come, while the women gathered gold and jewels in preparation.

"My parents were always on edge, wondering if they were going to get the ax next," he says.

A Changed Country

By 1982, Iraq was a changed country. Mr. Alaridh's older brother was conscripted into the army and saw heavy fighting. Several of his cousins and an uncle were killed in the war. Desperate to keep him out of the army, his parents enrolled him in a college in Scotland at age 16. The next year, he moved to the U.S., settling with relatives.

Seventeen years passed before Mr. Alaridh returned to Iraq. In 1999, he flew to Baghdad for his sister's wedding. She introduced him to one of her best friends, Sura. He returned to Iraq the following year to marry her.

Mr. Alaridh brought his new wife back to Chicago. He found work as a network-systems engineer at ABN Amro, a Dutch bank, while she took a job elsewhere as a loan analyst.

By late 2002, with war in Iraq looking inevitable, Mr. Alaridh began mentally celebrating what he saw as the imminent liberation of his people. "Iraqis, given the right tools, could flourish, but Saddam had taken the tools away and closed the country off from the world," he says. "I knew they were going to at least get a chance at a better future."

Thousands of miles away in Iraq, his sister-in-law Ms. Ibrahim was also excited about prospects for change in her country. She had just graduated from Baghdad University with a degree in business administration. She hoped the U.S. invasion would result in a country where women could play an equal role.

After U.S. forces toppled Mr. Hussein, Ms. Ibrahim became one of the first employees of the Iraqi Independent Women's Group, founded by Maysoon al-Damluji, who had returned to Iraq after 22 years in exile in the United Kingdom. The group launched a magazine as well as classes about women's rights under Iraq's new constitution. Its weekly meetings attracted Arabs and Kurds, as well as both Muslims and Christians, Ms. Ibrahim says.

Ms. Ibrahim was chosen for a British-sponsored leadership training tour of Canada and England. In the spring of 2005, she and a handful of other Iraqi women spent two months traveling the countries for meetings with lawmakers, government officials, diplomats and academics.

Reaching into her purse during a recent meeting in her lawyer's Chicago office, Ms. Ibrahim removed two cherished artifacts. She opened a manila folder and took out a gold-embossed certificate from the Canadian Institute for Conflict Resolution, a degree she earned on the trip. A color photo in the folder showed her and the other women at a reception in Ottawa with the Iraqi ambassador to Canada.

"Those were the best days of my life," she said.

They were not to last. Religious fundamentalists in Iraq accused the group of collaborating with Western governments to secularize Iraqi women and began targeting members, she says. Two members were shot to death by masked gunmen, she says, and another member was forced to watch as insurgents executed her husband.

Closing In

The violence began to close in on Ms. Ibrahim, who was in the U.S. in late 2005 visiting her sister and brother-in-law. Unknown men who knew specific details of her work, daily routine and overseas travel began calling her father at home in Iraq, threatening to kill her as soon as she returned, the family says. The family says the callers accused her of working for the U.S. and said she deserved death for talking about freedom for women. Still reeling from the kidnapping of his brother, Ms. Ibrahim's father begged her to stay out of the country. She has been in the U.S. since.

Her ties to Iraq are weakening. When the death threats kept coming, her parents and brother closed their businesses in Baghdad, abandoned their houses, and fled. Ms. Ibrahim's father and brother are now in Cairo, Egypt. Her mother, Ahlam, arrived in the U.S. in January and is living with the Alaridhs.

DOJ_NMG_0020865

From her vantage point, Ms. Ibrahim sees a broken, blood-soaked Iraq, where she has no intention of ever returning. Mr. Alaridh believes that Ms. Ibrahim is too pessimistic. He says all countries have gone through periods of instability, and believes that Iraq, even if the violence persists for many years, still has a chance at a better future than it did under Mr. Hussein.

"Now there is a lot of chaos, and I see that, but it will change. If not in two years, than in 20 years, and if not in 20 years, than in 50 years," he says. "In my opinion, you have to look at the whole forest and not one tree. There is a bigger picture."

Indeed, Mr. Alaridh regularly thinks of returning to the country Ms. Ibrahim is determined to permanently escape. His elderly father has serious heart trouble, and Mr. Alaridh has gone to Iraq twice since the war to visit him. During his first trip, in August 2003, he says U.S. soldiers approached his car with guns drawn when they saw him videotaping in Baghdad; they put them down when he showed his U.S. passport. Still, he considered selling his home in Chicago and moving to Baghdad with his wife.

When he returned to Iraq in April 2004 for a month-long trip, he says he noticed how much Baghdad had deteriorated. He heard numerous explosions and constantly felt on edge. He was used to leaving his parents' house for long walks alone, but quickly felt that was too dangerous.

But Mr. Alaridh says he hasn't given up on Iraq. He and his wife had a baby in January and he wants to bring his daughter to Baghdad, so his parents can see her. And he continues to dream of opening a private technical college for Iraqis interested in computers or networking. Mr. Alaridh envisions sending talented Iraqis to U.S. high-tech firms for internships, and then bringing them back to Baghdad as teachers.

Still, he acknowledges that his optimism is being tested. One of Mr. Alaridh's brothers just fled to Egypt. His younger sister, who introduced him to his wife, now lives in Syria with her family. While he continues to think Iraq will have a bright future, he says: "It's getting harder and harder to believe."

Rice Presses Karzai On Convert's Life (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 23 -- Senior Muslim clerics demanded Thursday that an Afghan man on trial for converting from Islam to Christianity be executed, warning that if the government caves in to Western pressure and frees him, they will incite people to "pull him into pieces."

In an unusual move, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice telephoned President Hamid Karzai on Thursday seeking what she called a "satisfactory outcome" of the case of Abdul Rahman. The 41-year-old former medical aid worker faces the death penalty under Afghanistan's Islamic laws for becoming a Christian.

His trial has fired passions in this conservative Muslim nation and highlighted a conflict of values between Afghanistan and its Western backers.

"Rejecting Islam is insulting God. We will not allow God to be humiliated. This man must die," said cleric Abdul Raoulf, who is considered a moderate and was jailed three times for opposing the Taliban before the hard-line regime was ousted in 2001.

The trial, which began last week, has caused an international outcry. President Bush has said he is "deeply troubled" by the case and expects the country to "honor the universal principle of freedom."

Rice told reporters in Washington on Thursday the case was "a very deeply concerning development" and she had "raised it in the strongest possible terms" with Karzai. "There is no more fundamental issue for the United States than freedom of religion and religious conscience," she said. "This country was founded on that basis, and it is at the heart of democracy."

German Chancellor Angela Merkel told reporters she had received assurances from Karzai in a telephone call that Rahman would not be sentenced to death.

"I have the impression that he has a firm willingness" to abide by human rights requirements, Merkel said of Karzai as she headed to pre-European Union summit talks. "I hope we will be able to resolve this."

Clerics Insist On Execution Of Convert (WT/AP)

By Daniel Cooney, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- Senior Muslim clerics demanded yesterday that an Afghan man on trial for converting from Islam to Christianity be executed, warning that if the government caves in to Western pressure and frees him, they will incite people to "pull him into pieces."

In an unusual move, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice telephoned President Hamid Karzai yesterday seeking a "favorable resolution" of the case of Abdul Rahman.

The 41-year-old former medical aid worker faces the death penalty under Afghanistan's Islamic laws for becoming a Christian.

DOJ_NMG_0020866

His trial has fired passions in this Muslim nation and highlighted a conflict of values between the West and Islam, which forbids those born as Muslims from converting to other religions.

"Rejecting Islam is insulting God. We will not allow God to be humiliated. This man must die," said cleric Abdul Raoulf, who is considered a moderate and was jailed three times for opposing the Taliban before the hard-line regime was ousted in 2001.

The trial, which began last week, has caused an international outcry. President Bush has said he is "deeply troubled" by the case and expects the country to "honor the universal principle of freedom."

Miss Rice's spokesman, Sean McCormack, said she told Mr. Karzai it is important for the Afghan people to know that freedom of religion is observed in their country. But in deference to the country's sovereignty, Miss Rice evidently did not demand specifically that the trial be halted and the defendant released.

"This is clearly an Afghan decision," Mr. McCormack said. "They are a sovereign country."

Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper said yesterday after speaking with Mr. Karzai that the Christian convert will not face the death penalty, Agence France-Presse reported from Ottawa.

"I phoned President Karzai personally yesterday to express our concern. He conveyed to me that we don't have to worry about any such eventual outcome," Mr. Harper told reporters.

Diplomats have said the Afghan government is searching for a way to drop the case. On Wednesday, authorities said Mr. Rahman is suspected of being mentally ill and would undergo psychological examinations to see whether he is fit to stand trial.

But three Sunni preachers and a Shi'ite one interviewed by the Associated Press in four of Kabul's most popular mosques said they do not think Mr. Rahman is insane.

"He is not crazy. He went in front of the media and confessed to being a Christian," said Hamidullah, chief cleric at Haji Yacob Mosque.

"The government is scared of the international community," he said. "But the people will kill him if he is freed."

Mr. Raoulf, who is a member of the country's main Islamic organization, the Afghan Ulama Council, agreed. "The government is playing games. The people will not be fooled."

"Cut off his head," he exclaimed, sitting in a courtyard outside Herati Mosque. "We will call on the people to pull him into pieces so there's nothing left."

He said the only way for Mr. Rahman to survive would be for him to go into exile.

But Said Mirhossain Nasri, the top cleric at Hossainia Mosque, one of the largest Shi'ite places of worship in Kabul, said Mr. Rahman must not be allowed to leave the country.

"If he is allowed to live in the West, then others will claim to be Christian so they can too," he said. "We must set an example. ... He must be hanged."

Afghanistan's constitution is based on Shariah law, which is interpreted by many Muslims to require that any Muslim who rejects Islam be sentenced to death.

Hamidullah warned that if the government frees Mr. Rahman, "there will be an uprising" like one against Soviet occupying forces in the 1980s. "The government will lose the support of the people," he said.

Mr. Rahman is thought to have lived in Germany for nine years after converting to Christianity while working as a medical aid worker for an international Christian group helping Afghan refugees in Pakistan. He returned to Kabul in 2002.

Kabul Judge Rejects Calls To End Trial Of Christian Convert (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa And David Rohde

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 23 — The judge presiding over the prosecution of an Afghan man facing death for converting from Islam to Christianity said Thursday that he would resist any interference, despite mounting international condemnation.

A day after President Bush mentioned the case, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan to discuss it "in the strongest possible terms," said the State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack.

"She called specifically on this topic," Mr. McCormack said, "and she urged President Karzai's government to seek a favorable resolution to this case at the earliest possible moment."

But Ansarullah Maulavi Zada, the judge who heads the public security tribunal in Kabul, said, "There is no direct pressure on our court so far, but if it happens we will consider it interference."

He added that he expected to rule in the case in the next several days.

The case involves Abdul Rahman, 41, whose family opposed his attempt to regain custody of his two daughters and apparently told authorities last month that he had converted about 15 years ago. The resulting furor has exposed the unresolved tensions in the Bush administration's effort to meld democracy and conservative Islam in Afghanistan.

It also threatens to become a political liability for both the American and Afghan presidents.

For Mr. Bush, who finds support for his war effort in Iraq waning, the case could further alienate his political base among those in the Christian right, who have already accused the administration of putting too little pressure on Afghan officials.

For Mr. Karzai, the case traps him squarely between his Western backers and Afghanistan's conservative religious council, the Ulema, an important source of domestic support.

"The international community is saying you must stop this," said Barnett R. Rubin, a New York University professor and expert on Afghanistan. "The Ulema is saying, 'Are you an Islamic ruler?' "

The case illustrates a central contradiction of the compromise Constitution that Afghanistan adopted in 2004, which has been cited as an example for other Islamic countries. One passage declares Islam Afghanistan's supreme law, while another states that the country grants its citizens religious freedom.

In an intentional effort to avoid a standoff, the Constitution leaves certain crimes to be handled by religious judges, according to J. Alexander Thier of the Hoover Institution, who was an adviser on the Constitution. One such crime is converting from Islam to another religion.

Under conservative interpretations, a convert can be sentenced to death. Many moderate Muslims reject that interpretation as too severe. Afghanistan's laws are silent on the matter, and the country's criminal code does not specifically declare converting from Islam to Christianity a crime.

After meeting with Afghanistan's foreign minister, Abdullah, earlier this week, Ms. Rice called the minister into a second meeting on Thursday, according to Mr. McCormack, the department spokesman. In a 15-minute meeting, she told Mr. Abdullah (who uses only one name) that the prosecution was "contrary to universal democratic values," which include freedom of religion, Mr. McCormack said.

The same message came from the White House, where President Bush's chief spokesman, Scott McClellan, said the case "clearly violates the universal freedoms that democracies around the world hold dear."

"And we are watching it very closely," he added.

On Wednesday, President Bush said Washington expected Afghan officials to "honor the universal principle of freedom." Germany, Italy, Canada and other countries that have deployed troops in Afghanistan have also issued statements of concern.

To Afghan prosecutors, the case appears equally clear cut. One described Mr. Rahman as a "microbe," said conversion is illegal under Islamic law, and requested the death penalty.

Mr. Rubin, of N.Y.U., said he believed most Afghans did not support putting Mr. Rahman to death.

A friend of Mr. Rahman, who did not want his name published, could only speculate on why Mr. Rahman had converted. The two men worked together at a government radio station during the war against the Moscow-backed Communist government in Afghanistan in the 1990's.

"Abdul Rahman was living in neighboring Pakistan when Afghanistan was governed by a Communist regime," the friend said. "He was working for a foreign aid organization and converted to Christianity in Pakistan, and over this issue his wife got divorced, as she was not happy to follow her husband."

Mr. Rahman recently returned to Afghanistan after failing to gain asylum in Belgium, the friend said. He is a poorly educated laborer, and questions have been raised about his mental competency.

In images broadcast on Afghan television, Mr. Rahman told reporters: "I am not an infidel. I am Christian. I believe in Jesus." Islam considers Jesus one in a line of prophets culminating in Muhammad.

Mr. Rahman's case is only the most prominent of recent years to show how religious conservatives try to exert their influence through Afghanistan's decrepit and corrupt judicial system. Conservative judges, who dominate many courts, have threatened to close Afghan television stations that broadcast material they deemed indecent and have charged journalists with publishing material they declared blasphemous.

This week, Mr. Karzai introduced a new slate of ministers and Supreme Court justices, a step intended to produce a more effective government and less conservative judiciary. The nominations require approval by Parliament, the first in 30 years.

Critics of Mr. Karzai have long accused him of appeasing religious conservatives and warlords. In the past, he has defused clashes with conservative judges by failing to implement their rulings or striking closed-door compromises with them.

But Mr. Rahman's case has attracted far more attention, and comes at a time when Afghans have grown increasingly critical of the international presence in their country, which they say has brought too few benefits and spawned enormous corruption.

"The people feel that they are so weak that they need all these foreigners there," Mr. Rubin said. "They hope they will help them, but they are establishing brothels in Kabul, they are drinking."

In the United States this week, Christian talk shows and advocacy groups rallied their supporters, who flooded the White House and the Afghanistan Embassy with complaints.

DOJ_NMG_0020868

At the State Department briefing, Mr. McCormack denied that the administration had been slow to respond to the Rahman case. As soon as the department learned about it, "we stated our concerns immediately with the foreign minister," he said. "After our initial conversation with the Afghan government, we thought it was important that we spoke in the strongest possible terms in public on this issue."

Maulavi Muhaiuddin Baloch, Mr. Karzai's adviser on religious affairs, said that the case belonged in the court and that Afghanistan's judiciary was independent.

Fazil Ahmad Manawi, a former deputy chief justice, said: "It is a dilemma for Afghan courts. The international community's presence in Afghanistan, with military and financial support on one hand and the prestige of Afghan courts and religious people of Afghanistan on another hand, makes the issue very difficult."

If he is convicted, Mr. Rahman will be able to appeal his sentence to two higher courts. Maulavi Zada, the judge overseeing the case, said Thursday that the next court session would be held in several days. It was unclear whether Mr. Rahman would present any defense. To date, no lawyer in Kabul has been willing to represent him.

Moderate Afghan officials are eager to quietly dispose of the case, but the vocal criticism from American and Western officials makes that more difficult, according to Mr. Rubin. One possible compromise would involve the court's declaring Mr. Rahman mentally ill and allowing him to leave the country.

US Steps Up Pressure Over Case Of Afghan Christian (AFP-Y2)

AFP, March 23, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice phoned Afghan President Hamid Karzai to step up US pressure to free an Afghan man facing possible execution for converting from Islam to Christianity.

With the case drawing worldwide attention, the Afghan foreign minister expressed hope for a speedy resolution while Canada's prime minister said Karzai had promised him the man would not be executed.

Rice said she phoned Karzai specifically to hammer home "in the strongest possible terms" Washington's concern over the proceedings against Abdul Rahman, who was arrested two weeks ago under Islamic Sharia law.

"There is no more fundamental issue for the United States than freedom of religion and religious conscience," the chief US diplomat told reporters after talks with Greek Foreign Minister Theodora Bakoyannis.

"We look forward to, hopefully, a resolution of this in the near future," she said.

Rice had summoned visiting Afghan Foreign Minister Abdullah Abdullah to her office Wednesday evening for a 15-minute scolding only hours after President George W. Bush said he was "deeply troubled" by the case.

Rahman, 41, has been a Christian for 16 years. He was turned in by his parents after his return from Germany two weeks ago and faces the death penalty if he refuses to return to Islam.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said Thursday the US administration was in "very close contact" with Kabul "to make sure that people's religious freedoms are protected."

In Ottawa, Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper said he telephoned Karzai on Wednesday to express concerned about a possible execution and "he conveyed to me that we don't have to worry about any such eventual outcome."

Karzai "assured me that what's alarmed most of us will be worked out quickly ... in a way that fully respects religious rights, religious freedoms and human rights," Harper added.

Karzai's government, which replaced the fundamentalist Taliban regime ousted by US-backed forces in 2001, showed indications of moving towards a settlement of Rahman's case.

Abdullah told a Washington university audience Thursday "it is in the national security interest of Afghanistan to find a viable solution" that upheld the country's values without eroding its world support.

He expressed hope for a resolution "very soon," adding, "We are fully aware of the sensitivity of this issue, and we know how important an issue it is for public opinion everywhere, for the friends of Afghanistan."

Afghanistan's Supreme Court and a judge handling the case have hinted at a solution, suggesting Rahman might not be mentally competent to face charges or that he could be given a chance to revert back to Islam.

US officials publicly called only for a "favorable resolution" of the matter without elaborating. But a US State Department official who asked not to be named confirmed Washington was seeking Rahman's outright release.

The Americans also saw the matter as test case for Kabul's post-Taliban government.

"We think that it is important for the Afghan people that this issue of freedom of religion, freedom of expression, which is enshrined in the Afghan constitution, be reaffirmed," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

The religious controversy erupted barely three weeks after Bush made a surprise visit to Afghanistan to hail Karzai and the country's fledgling democracy.

DOJ_NMG_0020869

Karzai was elected after US forces helped topple the Taliban in retaliation for harbouring the Al-Qaeda group blamed for the September 11, 2001 attacks on New York and the Pentagon.

Kabul is now a crucial ally in the continuing hunt for terrorist mastermind Osama bin Laden and other Al-Qaeda leaders believed to be holed up along the Afghan-Pakistani border.

Rahman was believed to be the first convert facing punishment under Afghanistan's Islamic Sharia law for refusing to return to Islam since the fall of the Taliban.

The United Nations and NATO members Germany and Italy, which have troops in Afghanistan, have expressed concern over Rahman's trial and warned of a rift with Kabul.

Afghan Christian's Plight Draws U.S. Pressure Rice Calls Karzai As Convert Faces Possible Execution (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, March 24, 2006

The Bush administration Thursday intensified pressure on Afghanistan to spare a Christian convert in a case that has raised outrage among Christians in the USA.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice telephoned Afghan President Hamid Karzai to urge a "favorable resolution to this case at the earliest possible moment," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Gary Bauer, president of American Values, a conservative Christian group, said U.S. officials have to be "clear and bold" in talking about the case. "This whole enterprise is an effort to bring democratic principles to that part of the world. That means more than elections, it means religious pluralism."

Bauer sent an e-mail Wednesday to a quarter of a million supporters saying that the execution of the convert, Abdul Rahman, "would very likely result in a complete collapse in support for the war."

President Bush, who visited Afghanistan on March 1 and praised progress there, on Wednesday called the case "deeply troubling."

The unusual U.S. intervention reflects growing international outrage over the case. Rahman, 41, a former aid worker, was arrested last month and accused of apostasy — abandoning his faith — for converting to Christianity in 1990. Under Afghan Islamic law, he could face the death penalty.

Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper and German Chancellor Angela Merkel each said Thursday that Karzai had assured them that Rahman would not be put to death. Several influential Afghan Muslim clerics continued to insist that Rahman must die.

"We will not allow God to be humiliated," Abdul Raoulf, a member of the Ulama Council, Afghanistan's main clerical organization, told the Associated Press. "We will call on the people to pull him into pieces so there's nothing left."

Barnett Rubin, an expert on Afghanistan at New York University, predicted the case will be "finessed," probably by declaring Rahman mentally unfit for trial. However, it has put Karzai in a difficult position. "He cannot come out and say Islam is subordinate to" the wishes of the United States or the United Nations, Rubin said.

Although Karzai is pro-Western, the Afghan judiciary remains largely in the hands of fundamentalist Muslim clergy.

The Afghan Constitution, written with U.S. assistance, has contradictory provisions. Article 7 promises that Afghanistan will observe the U.N. charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which guarantees freedom of religion. Article 3 says that no law can contradict Islam.

While religious minorities are free to worship in Afghanistan, Muslims are barred from leaving their faith.

Khalid Abou el Fadl, an expert on Islamic law at UCLA, said that "contrary to popular belief" in the West, rejecting Islam is not a capital offense in most Muslim countries. Even where it is, he said, executions of converts have been rare.

He said there have been a half-dozen such executions in Saudi Arabia since the 1990s and a "couple" in Iran. He said the law was used to execute a political opponent of Sudan's leader in the 1980s. Fadl said the Afghan judiciary is using Rahman as a "test case."

The Rahman case has aroused concern among human rights groups. Ted Stahnke, policy director for the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom, an advisory body created by Congress, said that even if Rahman is spared, his arrest will have "a chilling affect on freedom in Afghanistan."

The commission sent Bush a letter urging the administration to "act vigorously on his (Rahman's) behalf." The letter said the arrest "indicates that religious extremists still have significant influence in Kabul, threatening not just the religious freedom of this one man, but the fundamental rights of each and every Afghan citizen."

DOJ_NMG_0020870

U.S.-led forces overthrew Afghanistan's Islamic Taliban regime in 2001 because it harbored al-Qaeda terrorists. Since then, the State Department says, the United States has spent $10.3 billion, not counting military operations, to assist Afghans.

The Pentagon says 221 U.S. military personnel have died in and around Afghanistan.

James Zogby, president of the Arab American Institute in Washington, worries that the case will intensify tensions between Christians and Muslims. It follows controversies over Danish cartoons lampooning the prophet Mohammed and a canceled deal for a Dubai company to take over some U.S. port operations. While it is right to protest the Rahman case, Zogby says, "unfortunately in many areas, Islam feels under attack."

Missile defense

The United States is close to completing a deal that will result in the creation of a third ground-based missile interceptor site in Europe. The candidate nations for the site that will hold 10 high-speed missile interceptors are Poland, the Czech Republic and Britain, a senior defense official tells us.

Negotiations for the site have been under way for some time and more than $100 million is already authorized for the site, which is part of the global U.S. missile defense system now oriented toward Asia.

The system of interceptors and sensors now has eight ground-based interceptors located at two U.S. sites — Fort Greely, Alaska, and Vandenberg Air Force Base, Calif. The European interceptor base will provide defenses against an Iranian missile attack on Europe, or possibly against the United States, if Tehran builds intercontinental missiles in the future.

Russia is expected to oppose the European interceptor base, viewing it as a threat to Moscow's missile force, although defense officials said the 10 interceptors would be no match for Russia's thousands of warheads.

Missile Defense Agency Director Lt. Gen. Henry Obering said during a speech at the fourth annual missile defense conference on Monday that the current limited missile defenses can thwart an attack from North Korea and that up to 12 interceptors will be added this year. "I am confident that if we had to use the system, the system would work," he said.

Conventional ICBMs

The United States could use a force of intercontinental ballistic missiles with conventional warheads because nuclear weapons may not deter terrorists and rogue states, the general in charge of the U.S. Strategic Command says.

Marine Corps Gen. James E. Cartwright told a Pentagon-sponsored missile defense conference on Monday that "it's very difficult for a nuclear weapon to be a credible deterrent against an extremist."

In addition to the "tyranny of distance" that makes it hard for military forces to get to an area of the world very quickly, there is also the problem of the inadequate speed of current conventional systems. Today's bombers need an hour to travel 500 miles, and ships take longer.

An ICBM, however, can cover 6,000 miles in minutes and the technology for adding precision guided, non-nuclear warheads is available now, Gen. Cartwright said. And the warhead does not need to be high-explosive. Just the kinetic impact of a long-range inert warhead can cause tremendous damage because of the high speed. The warheads are accurate enough to land within 12 feet of the target.

The conventional ICBMs are needed for the Pentagon's new "global strike" mission to attack terrorists, or those working on weapons of mass destruction, in addition to any nation states that the United State may confront in the 21st century, like China.

"Do we want a capability that is non-nuclear? That's the heart of the debate," Gen. Cartwright said.

Guitarist missileer

One of stars at the fourth annual missile defense conference held this week was Jeff "Skunk" Baxter, the famed guitarist for the Doobie Brothers and Steely Dan.

Mr. Baxter moonlights as a consultant to the Pentagon's Missile Defense Agency and a number of other federal and state agencies. His specialty is "thinking out of the box," something sorely needed for the U.S. defense and intelligence bureaucracy.

Mr. Baxter describes himself as the "missile defense mascot" and was the moderator at a panel of news reporters at the conference to discuss press coverage of missile defenses.

"To me, missile defense is an imperative because of the incredible amount of blood and treasure that many of America's adversaries are investing in developing offensive ballistic capabilities," Mr. Baxter told us.

Tuesday night he played guitar during a reception sponsored by the Boeing Corp., playing a variety of guitars to highlight the history of the instrument.

At one point, he was joined on stage at the Pavilion Room of the Ronald Reagan International Trade Center building by Air Force Lt. Gen. Henry Obering, director of the Missile Defense Agency.

Salty language

The attorney for Navy Lt. Bryan Black, who is being court-martialed for using foul words in the presence of a female midshipman, has filed the final legal arguments in his bid to get the Naval Academy superintendent removed as the case's overseer.

Lawyer Charles Gittins filed papers with the U.S. Navy-Marine Corps Court of Criminal Appeals, asking it to disqualify Vice Adm. Rodney Rempt as what the military calls the "convening authority."

Mr. Gittins argues that Adm. Rempt is biased and is using the Black case as part of his drive to rid the campus of sexual harassment.

"Stung by official public criticism of his personal performance as the superintendent ... the superintendent made a decision to make an example of petitioner — he intended to conduct a public officer [nonjudicial punishment] hearing in order to reinforce and ramrod his apparently ineffective 'zero tolerance' policy regarding sexual harassment and sexual assault at the Naval Academy," Mr. Gittins said.

The attorney argued that it is highly unusual to hold such proceedings in public, which clearly signaled the admiral planned to convict him.

A Marine Corps officer who conducted an investigation of Lt. Black's behavior recommended he receive counseling and a non-punitive letter of caution. But Adm. Rempt overruled him and moved for nonjudicial punishment. Mr. Gittins said he rejected that option once he learned it would be staged in public and that midshipmen would be invited to watch.

The academy has declined to discuss the case. In a reply brief, the prosecution said, Lt. Black "fails to provide either evidence of any such statements or evidence of any sort that would show the [Adm. Rempt] has anything other than an official interest in [the] case."

Bowen's travels

Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the Bush administration's special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, has been trotting the globe lately.

He made another trip from his Crystal City headquarters to Baghdad in preparation for a new report to Congress next month. He then tried to fit in some vacation time in Paris. But public officials were so eager to hear his views that he spent time briefing the French on reconstruction progress — and setbacks.

His briefings led to speculation in Paris that French companies may one day bid on contracts in Iraq. Iraq, for example, has no land-line telephone communications. Everything is done via cell and satellite phones. It will need a firm one day to rewire the country.

Mr. Bowen goes to Iraq one month out of three, and will return in May.

Report: U.S. Missile Science Slumping (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon risks running out of scientists to operate and upgrade the nation's arsenal of intercontinental nuclear and conventional missiles, according to a report released this week by the Defense Science Board.

As the nation's veteran engineers and scientists retire, the military will lose much of its expertise in long-range missile technology, the report says. That means the Air Force and Navy, which operate most of the 1960s-vintage missiles, will be unable to cope with system failures or develop improved weapons, the report says.

Not only are fewer American engineers and scientists choosing to work on missile technology, there are fewer of them altogether, the report says. Each year, about 70,000 Americans receive undergraduate and graduate science and engineering degrees that are defense related, compared with a combined 200,000 in China and India, the report says.

The government should pay higher salaries and offer other incentives to attract more experts into the strategic missile field, the report says.

A task force of five outside missile experts spent two years preparing the report at the Pentagon's request.

Although the board lacks the power to force the Pentagon to act, Lt. Gen. Frank Klotz, acting head of the Air Force Space Command, told a Senate committee this month that the Pentagon is trying to improve its recruiting and retention of missile experts. Space Command runs the intercontinental ballistic missile system.

The report does not give specifics on the number of experts who are retiring or the numbers needed to replace them, but it says about 20,000 research and development scientists and engineers work in the aerospace industry as a whole, down from more than 140,000 in the mid-1980s.

DOJ_NMG_0020872

John Steinbruner, head of the Center for International and Security Studies at the University of Maryland, says few scientists want to work on long-range missiles because "it's not too hard to figure out that American security doesn't depend on this any more."

Instead, Steinbruner says, the Pentagon's priorities have shifted toward fighting terrorism and "low-intensity conflicts," such as the insurgency in Iraq.

The report, he says, sounds like the Pentagon advisory board is "just trying to keep the money flowing" and may be biased toward Cold War-era ballistic missile systems.

The report also questions a Pentagon plan to seek more than $500 million to replace nuclear warheads on some submarine-launched Trident ballistic missiles with conventional warheads. The Pentagon says those missiles could be used to strike fortified targets such as nuclear weapons facilities in rogue nations.

Converting the warheads on these missiles will be difficult, the report says, because the Pentagon lacks the necessary engineering skills. It adds that technical requirements for non-nuclear warheads are much different for long-range missiles from those for shorter-range missiles or nuclear weapons.

Foreign Policy Good Vs Evil Does Not Work (FT)

By Madeleine Albright

Financial Times, March 24, 2006

The Bush administration's newly unveiled national security strategy might well be subtitled "The Irony of Iran". Three years after the invasion of Iraq and the invention of the phrase "axis of evil", the administration now highlights the threat posed by Iran – whose radical government has been vastly strengthened by the invasion of Iraq. This is more tragedy than strategy, and it reflects the Manichean approach this administration has taken to the world.

It is sometimes convenient, for purposes of rhetorical effect, for national leaders to talk of a globe neatly divided into good and bad. It is quite another, however, to base the policies of the world's most powerful nation upon that fiction. The administration's penchant for painting its perceived adversaries with the same sweeping brush has led to a series of unintended consequences.

For years, the president has acted as if al-Qaeda, Saddam Hussein's followers and Iran's mullahs were parts of the same problem. Yet, in the 1980s, Mr Hussein's Iraq and Iran fought a brutal war. In the 1990s, al-Qaeda's allies murdered a group of Iranian diplomats. For years, Osama bin Laden ridiculed Mr Hussein, who persecuted Sunni and Shia religious leaders alike. When al-Qaeda struck America on September 11 2001, Iran condemned the attacks and later participated constructively in talks on Afghanistan. The top leaders in the new Iraq – chosen in elections that George W. Bush called "a magic moment in the history of liberty" – are friends of Iran. When the president invaded Iraq, he may have thought he was striking a blow for good over evil but the forces unleashed were considerably more complex.

The administration is now divided between those who understand this complexity and those who do not. On one side, there are ideologues, such as the vice-president, who apparently see Iraq as a useful precedent for Iran. Meanwhile, officials on the front lines in Iraq know they cannot succeed in assembling a workable government in that country without the tacit blessing of Iran; hence, last week's long overdue announcement of plans for a US-Iranian dialogue on Iraq – a dialogue that if properly executed might also lead to progress on other issues.

While this is not an administration known for taking advice, I offer three suggestions: the first is to understand that although we all want to "end tyranny in this world", that is a fantasy unless we begin to solve hard problems. Iraq is increasingly a gang war that can be solved in one of two ways: by one side imposing its will or by all the legitimate players having a piece of the power. The US is no longer able to control events in Iraq, but it can still play a useful role as referee.

Second, the US administration should disavow any plan for regime change in Iran; not because the regime should not be changed but because US endorsement of that goal only makes it less likely. In today's warped political environment, nothing strengthens a radical government more than Washington's overt antagonism. It is also common sense to presume that Iran will be less willing to co-operate in Iraq and to compromise on nuclear issues if it is being threatened with destruction. As for Iran's choleric and anti-Semitic new president, he will be swallowed up by internal rivals if he is not unwittingly propped up by external foes.

Third, the US administration must stop playing solitaire while Middle East and Persian Gulf leaders play poker. The president's "march of freedom" is not the big story in the Muslim world, where Shia Muslims suddenly have more power than they have had in 1,000 years; it is not the big story in Lebanon, where Iran is filling the vacuum left by Syria; it is not the story among Palestinians, who voted – in western eyes – freely, and wrongly; it is not even the big story in Iraq, where the top three factions in the recent elections were all supported by decidedly undemocratic militias.

In the long term, the future of the Middle East may well be determined by those in the region dedicated to the hard work of building democracy. I certainly hope so. But hope is not a policy. In the short term, we must recognise that the region will be shaped primarily by fairly ruthless power politics in which the clash between good and evil will be swamped by differences between Sunni and Shia, Arab and Persian, Arab and Kurd, Kurd and Turk, Hashemite and Saudi, secular and religious and, of course, Arab and Jew. This is the world, the president pledges in his national security strategy, that “America must continue to lead”. Actually it is the world he must begin to address – before it is too late.

THE BUSH administration's newly unveiled National Security Strategy might well be subtitled "The Irony of Iran." Three years after the invasion of Iraq and the invention of the phrase "axis of evil," the administration now highlights the threat posed by Iran — whose radical government has been vastly strengthened by the invasion of Iraq. This is more tragedy than strategy, and it reflects the Manichean approach this administration has taken to the world.

It is sometimes convenient, for purposes of rhetorical effect, for national leaders to talk of a globe neatly divided into good and bad. It is quite another, however, to base the policies of the world's most powerful nation upon that fiction. The administration's penchant for painting its perceived adversaries with the same sweeping brush has led to a series of unintended consequences.

For years, the president has acted as if Al Qaeda, Saddam Hussein's followers and Iran's mullahs were parts of the same problem. Yet, in the 1980s, Hussein's Iraq and Iran fought a brutal war. In the 1990s, Al Qaeda's allies murdered a group of Iranian diplomats. For years, Osama bin Laden ridiculed Hussein, who persecuted Sunni and Shiite religious leaders alike. When Al Qaeda struck the U.S. on 9/11, Iran condemned the attacks and later participated constructively in talks on Afghanistan. The top leaders in the new Iraq — chosen in elections that George W. Bush called "a magic moment in the history of liberty" — are friends of Iran. When the U.S. invaded Iraq, Bush may have thought he was striking a blow for good over evil, but the forces unleashed were considerably more complex.

The administration is now divided between those who understand this complexity and those who do not. On one side, there are ideologues, such as the vice president, who apparently see Iraq as a useful precedent for Iran. Meanwhile, officials on the front lines in Iraq know they cannot succeed in assembling a workable government in that country without the tacit blessing of Iran; hence, last week's long-overdue announcement of plans for a U.S.-Iranian dialogue on Iraq — a dialogue that if properly executed might also lead to progress on other issues.

Although this is not an administration known for taking advice, I offer three suggestions. The first is to understand that although we all want to "end tyranny in this world," that is a fantasy unless we begin to solve hard problems. Iraq is increasingly a gang war that can be solved in one of two ways: by one side imposing its will or by all the legitimate players having a piece of the power. The U.S. is no longer able to control events in Iraq, but it can be useful as a referee.

Second, the Bush administration should disavow any plan for regime change in Iran — not because the regime should not be changed but because U.S. endorsement of that goal only makes it less likely. In today's warped political environment, nothing strengthens a radical government more than Washington's overt antagonism. It also is common sense to presume that Iran will be less willing to cooperate in Iraq and to compromise on nuclear issues if it is being threatened with destruction. As for Iran's choleric and anti-Semitic new president, he will be swallowed up by internal rivals if he is not unwittingly propped up by external foes.

Third, the administration must stop playing solitaire while Middle East and Persian Gulf leaders play poker. Bush's "march of freedom" is not the big story in the Muslim world, where Shiite Muslims suddenly have more power than they have had in 1,000 years; it is not the big story in Lebanon, where Iran is filling the vacuum left by Syria; it is not the story among Palestinians, who voted — in Western eyes — freely, and wrongly; it is not even the big story in Iraq, where the top three factions in the recent elections were all supported by decidedly undemocratic militias.

In the long term, the future of the Middle East may well be determined by those in the region dedicated to the hard work of building democracy. I certainly hope so. But hope is not a policy. In the short term, we must recognize that the region will be shaped primarily by fairly ruthless power politics in which the clash between good and evil will be swamped by differences between Sunni and Shiite, Arab and Persian, Arab and Kurd, Kurd and Turk, Hashemite and Saudi, secular and religious and, of course, Arab and Jew. This is the world, the president pledges in his National Security Strategy, that "America must continue to lead." Actually, it is the world he must begin to address — before it is too late.

Pre-emption Draws Surprising Consensus (USAT)

By Commentary by Irshad Manji

USA Today, March 24, 2006

Shocked. Appalled. Outraged.

These sentiments have been expressed by many Americans in response to the 2006 national security report. Released last week, the report affirmed President Bush's faith in pre-emptive action against potential threats to the United States.

While I think such faith is misguided, I'm enough of a historian to know that George W. Bush isn't alone in his approach. Other statesmen have shared his belief in pre-emption. Some of them are even lionized by Bush's harshest critics: Muslim-Americans.

Consider the prophet Mohammed himself. According to Muslim history, God's own messenger engaged in pre-emptive action against those whom he suspected of plotting against Islam. There's the well-known example of Jewish tribes who refused to take Mohammed as their prophet. After rumors intensified that these Jews were collaborating with Arab pagans to kill the prophet, Mohammed and his companions struck first. They exiled two of the tribes and later acted on a Muslim arbiter's opinion that a third tribe should be slaughtered.

Self-defense, my fellow Muslims will insist. Bush has said the same about invading Iraq, but I don't see too many Muslims accepting that argument. Ah, but the president never had hard evidence for his claims. Fact is, neither did prophet Mohammed. He went on faith.

In drawing this comparison, I'm bound to be accused of besmirching the reputation of Islam's prophet and thereby joining the Danish cartoonists in infidel hell. But as many Americans believe that dissent is a patriotic duty, so I believe that self-criticism lives up to the best ideals of the Quran, Islam's holy book. One of its most beautiful verses tells us to "bear true witness, even if it be against yourselves, your parents, or your family." In other words, be honest, no matter whose feathers it ruffles.

Honesty demands that Muslims in the USA judge the doctrine of pre-emption by a single standard. That requires making a choice. We can accept what the prophet did as necessary and guided by God, in which case we can't be shocked when the president makes a similar case for his policy. Or we can acknowledge that the prophet Mohammed's pre-emptive assaults on Jews were morally wrong, in which case we've got credibility when slamming the Bush doctrine.

I don't deny that the Bush administration's record on freedom and human rights has been hypocritical. But I refuse to hand Muslim-American leaders any moral triumph as long as they validate for the prophet a sin that they castigate in the president.

Schlozman Appointed As U.S. Attorney In Western Missouri (SPRINGNL)

News-Leader staff and wire reports

Springfield (MO) News-Leader, March 24, 2006

Bradley J. Schlozman was appointed today as interim U.S. attorney for the Western District of Missouri, the Justice Department said.

The interim appointee replaces Todd P. Graves, whose last day is Friday.

Graves announced his resignation earlier this month, after nearly five years of prosecuting federal cases in western Missouri. Graves has said he plans to return to private practice and become more involved in politics.

Schlozman will be there until President Bush appoints a permanent replacement, probably by summer, a U.S. Attorney spokesman said.

Greene County Prosecuting Attorney Darrell Moore confirmed this week he is one of several people being considered for the job. His name was recommended for the job shortly after he filed to run for a third term as county prosecutor.

Sen. Christopher Bond is in charge of presenting one or several names for Bush¹s consideration, Moore said. The Bush appointee would still undergo a full confirmation process, he said.

Schlozman most recently was principal deputy assistant attorney general for the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice, where he supervised a unit that included more than 700 employees ‹ 356 of them attorneys.

The Civil Rights Division is responsible for enforcing federal civil rights statutes.

Schlozman has been with the Department of Justice since 2001.

He is originally from Overland Park, Kan., and graduated with a degree in history from the University of Pennsylvania.

He earned his law degree at George Washington University, after spending time as an intern at the U.S. attorney¹s office in western Missouri.

He has been in Washington, D.C., since 1999.

Flynn Begins Tenure As Local U.S. Attorney (BUFFNEWS)

Buffalo News, March 24, 2006

Terrance P. Flynn began work Wednesday as U.S. attorney for Western New York.

The U.S. Justice Department said the Buffalo lawyer was sworn in as U.S. attorney this week, after being confirmed by the U.S. Senate.

President Bush nominated Flynn for the job last December, after Michael A. Battle accepted a Washington position as Justice Department liaison with its U.S. attorneys nationwide.

Flynn, 42, is an alumnus of the University of Notre Dame and the University at Buffalo Law School. Before his appointment, he was a Buffalo trial attorney specializing in medical malpractice, products liability and other civil matters.

"It is truly an honor to be selected by President Bush to serve the citizens of this 17-county district," Flynn said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Defense Tries To Raise Doubts About Enron's Ex-Treasurer (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo And Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

HOUSTON, March 23 — Defense lawyers began an aggressive cross-examination of Enron's former treasurer today in attempt to show the tough tactics used by the government to induce cooperative testimony from a lower-level officer against the failed energy company's onetime top executives.

Trying to sow seeds of doubt in the jury's mind about the damaging testimony that the treasurer, Ben F. Glisan Jr. gave against his former bosses, Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay, on Wednesday, a defense lawyer asked him today about his interactions with federal investigators and the time he spent in solitary confinement. The questioning yielded revealing details about how the government conducted its investigation and pursued officials involved in the biggest corporate scandal of the decade so far.

Mr. Glisan presents an interesting challenge for the defense because unlike other witnesses who have been called by the prosecution, he has little incentive to cooperate with the government. Mr. Glisan, 40, does not have a plea deal with prosecutors and is more than halfway through serving a five-year prison sentence after pleading guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud.

He is testifying under a grant of immunity from the judge for other crimes he may have committed at Enron, but Mr. Glisan could face obstruction of justice and perjury charges if he lies on the stand.

Instead of questioning Mr. Glisan's ability to provide testimony unbiased by a deal with the government, as the defense has done with other prosecution witnesses, Mr. Skilling's lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli, sought to portray him as someone cowed by investigators.

Mr. Petrocelli asked him about an encounter between Mr. Glisan and Mr. Skilling on Feb. 14, 2004 at the federal courthouse here. Mr. Glisan, who had already started serving his sentence, was being escorted in shackles to testify before a grand jury, and Mr. Skilling was being brought in handcuffs to be indicted. They both found themselves on the same elevator in an awkward silence.

"Do you believe for one second, sir, that that was a coincidence?" Mr. Petrocelli asked.

"I didn't believe that," Mr. Glisan said.

Under questioning, Mr. Glisan also said he was shocked to find himself assigned to a low-security prison, when his crime qualified him for a more-lenient minimum-security facility. He spent 10 to 11 days in solitary confinement, after which he was put in an 8-foot by 12-foot cell with two other inmates.

"It must have had an impact on you?" Mr. Petrocelli asked about the days in solitary confinement.

"It had an enormous impact," Mr. Glisan responded.

Mr. Glisan recounted how he had sought to strike a deal with the government soon after investigators started looking into Enron in late 2001. He met secretly with officials from the F.B.I, the Justice Department, the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Internal Revenue Service in Washington.

But investigators did not trust him and did not offer him a deal initially, and Mr. Glisan acknowledged that he lied to minimize his own involvement in the fraudulent financial transactions that moved liabilities off of Enron's books into questionable partnerships.

He had another chance to make a deal with the government about six months later, but he did not want to plead guilty to the fraud charges that investigators offered to him. Mr. Glisan ended up pleading guilty to one narrow crime and started serving his sentence in September 2003.

"They did not think I was credible at the time," he said today. "And I wanted to be done with my time so I wanted to get started" on a prison sentence.

On Wednesday, Mr. Glisan testified that Mr. Lay, who was Enron's chairman, and Mr. Skilling, a former chief executive, were aware of huge financial problems and irregularities, lied about them to outsiders, and urged managers to use aggressive accounting tactics to make the company look more prosperous than it really was.

Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling, who are charged with fraud and conspiracy among other crimes, contend that the fraud at Enron was committed by a small group of finance executives and that the company perished because investors lost confidence in it.

A Former Treasurer Is Grilled Over His Testimony On Enron (WSJ)

By Gary McWilliams And Ann Davis

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

HOUSTON – A defense attorney for former Enron Corp. President Jeffrey Skilling painted a prosecution witness as a "snitch" who won a transfer to a minimum-security prison camp and received furloughs after agreeing to aid prosecutors.

The witness, former Enron Treasurer Ben Glisan Jr., had testified Mr. Skilling and former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay approved accounting manipulations that allowed Enron to increase earnings and hide losses while telling investors its energy businesses were a success. Under cross-examination, Mr. Glisan backed away from some of his characterizations.

The witness, former Enron Treasurer Ben Glisan Jr., had testified Mr. Skilling and former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay approved accounting manipulations that allowed Enron to increase earnings and hide losses while telling investors its energy businesses were a success. Under cross-examination, Mr. Glisan backed away from some of his characterizations. Mr. Glisan pleaded guilty to an Enron-related conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud and is serving a five-year prison sentence. Messrs. Skilling and Lay are in the eighth week of their trial in U.S. District Court for alleged criminal conspiracy and fraud stemming from Enron's collapse.

Wednesday, Mr. Glisan described meetings with the two executives where, he said, they approved the improper use of reserves, misled investors and hid losses. He testified to the use of "side deals" to insulate an investment partnership run by Andrew Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, from losses in its Enron dealings.

Mr. Glisan said when presented with a plan to create an investment vehicle that relied on Enron shares to hedge investments, Mr. Skilling said he wouldn't routinely approve such a vehicle, except that it allowed the company "to circumvent accounting rules." Yesterday, Mr. Glisan backed off from the phrase, saying he wasn't testifying to Mr. Skilling's exact words. Mr. Glisan also admitted recommending Mr. Skilling approve the investment vehicles and said he never told the former president or other executives that the hedges would be improper.

"You lied all day yesterday, didn't you?" asked Daniel Petrocelli, lead defense attorney for Mr. Skilling. Mr. Glisan said that he told Mr. Skilling the investment vehicle didn't transfer economic risk, a violation of accounting rules, and that it could draw the scrutiny of the Securities and Exchange Commission. Mr. Petrocelli argued that the investment vehicles were approved by the company's outside auditor, attorneys and others. He suggested that while the two executives made optimistic statements in the summer and fall of 2001, they did so in the best interests of Enron stockholders.

Lawyers for the two executives contend Enron was in good shape and collapsed not because of any fraud, but because of a loss of investor confidence. "If Enron hadn't gone bankrupt, we wouldn't be here, would we?" asked Mr. Petrocelli. Mr. Glisan responded: "That's hard to know."

Under questioning by Bruce Collins, an attorney for Mr. Lay, Mr. Glisan said he lacked notes to corroborate certain meetings he claimed to have had with Mr. Lay where they discussed steps to disguise finances. Mr. Collins said about 10 pages of more than 500 pages of notes by Mr. Glisan entered into evidence cited Mr. Lay. The defense has said many of the government's witnesses are testifying in the hopes of obtaining leniency. When imprisoned, Mr. Glisan said he was placed in solitary confinement at a "low-security" prison. He said that he worried about his "physical well-being" there and applied for a transfer but was denied. After testifying for the government, he applied again. He insisted there have been no deals struck to influence his testimony.

Defense Hits Enron Witness's Credibility (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

HOUSTON, March 23 -- The prosecution's last major witness in the fraud trial of Enron Corp.'s former leaders endured six hours of hostile cross-examination Thursday, but former treasurer Ben F. Glisan Jr. insisted that the company's financial problems were mounting even as then-Chairman Kenneth L. Lay displayed optimism to the public.

"What we were telling banks, rating agencies and investors was inconsistent with economic reality," Glisan said.

Glisan, 40, provided some of the most compelling evidence to date against Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling in a confident turn on the witness stand under questioning by Assistant U.S. Attorney Kathryn H. Ruemmler. On Wednesday, he vividly described a company so unsettled by billions of dollars in losses that one executive said during a bleak September 2001 meeting that "he was glad he didn't have a gun, or he would shoot himself."

Lay discussed the company's "dire" financial condition internally but misrepresented its troubles to shareholders and employees, whom he told the company was "fundamentally strong" weeks after that meeting, Glisan testified. He claimed Skilling knowingly worked to circumvent accounting rules in a May 2000 deal and that Lay "giggled . . . in delight" at the approach.

Discrediting Glisan, described as the "cleanup hitter" and "closer" by Skilling lawyer Daniel M. Petrocelli, is paramount to the defense case. Prosecutors used Glisan to remind the jury of their central allegations and to corroborate testimony by more personally tainted witnesses, including former finance chief Andrew S. Fastow. While Glisan shifted in his seat, repeatedly sought to clarify statements by Petrocelli and sometimes laughed in frustration during cross-examination, he did not lose his composure. However, he did retreat from some of the language he used to describe Lay's and Skilling's actions.

The former Enron executive already has endured much worse than a combative cross-examination. He pleaded guilty to a single conspiracy charge in September 2003 and moved directly into prison, where he has spent 2 1/2 years. In some of the starkest testimony in this eight-week-long trial, Glisan talked about the two weeks he spent in solitary confinement and of his fears of being branded a "snitch" and facing physical threats from other prisoners. He will be eligible for release into home confinement in September.

Petrocelli hammered away Thursday at the central themes of the defense case. He accused Glisan of shading his testimony to win perks from the government, including half a dozen furloughs that allow him to spend time with his wife and two children. He pointed out that Glisan had no explicit notes or recordings implicating Skilling or Lay, just his own recollections. And he noted that Glisan had failed to win a deal with the government earlier because prosecutors doubted his credibility. Glisan previously acknowledged that during his tenure at Enron, he had improperly accepted $1 million on a fraudulent deal in which he invested less than $6,000.

In one passionate exchange, Petrocelli accused the witness of "criminalizing" remarks Skilling made about the accounting benefits of a business partnership in 2000. Defense lawyers told the eight-woman, four-man jury in opening statements that Enron was essentially a healthy business that collapsed amid a market panic fed by vindictive media and short sellers.

"I don't know that he used the word 'circumvent' but the take- away was . . . the only reason to do it was an accounting benefit," Glisan said.

"He didn't say that in front of anybody," the defense lawyer said.

"He didn't say it in that way," Glisan replied.

"I'm asking the questions," Petrocelli shot back.

The Associated Press reported that Lay lawyer Bruce Collins briefly cross-examined Glisan and was to continue Monday. He started off by challenging the former treasurer's assertion that Lay "giggled . . . in delight" after then-Chief Accounting Officer Richard A. Causey explained that a particular approach carried "accounting risk," but outside auditors had approved it. "I've gotten to know Mr. Lay pretty well. He may chuckle, but he doesn't giggle," Collins said. "I concede chuckle as opposed to giggle," Glisan said.

Testimony by Glisan, who had been known inside Enron as a "boy scout," merely underscored the importance of two crucial witnesses to come. Both Lay and Skilling are preparing to make their own case to the jury sometime after the defense case begins next week.

"You're going to see 'em early and you're going to see 'em often and you're going to see 'em for a long time on the stand," Lay's lawyer, Michael W. Ramsey, said outside the courthouse Wednesday.

Feds Indict 8 In Bank Of Alamo Case (JACKSUN)

Jackson (TN) Sun, March 24, 2006

Numerous loans went over bank's legal limit before its failure in 2002

A federal investigation into the 2002 failure of the Bank of Alamo has led to the indictments of at least seven people, according to a release from the U.S. Justice Department.

On Wednesday, a federal grand jury returned indictments accusing them of various charges of conspiracy, money laundering and bank fraud, according to the release.

Those named in the indictment include: Claude M. Conley, director and chairman of the Bank of Alamo Board of Directors; John Sanders, president and chief executive officer of the bank; Lazaria Saveh, William Saveh and George Eivazzadeh. The indictment says the defendants made "and caused to be made false and fraudulent statements in the books and records of the bank."

The indictment said the false statements were made to cover up loans made to William Saveh in excess of the bank's legal lending limit and to conceal from the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. and state regulators the true financial condition of the Bank of Alamo.

Books and records of the bank reflected that loans made to Lazaria Saveh and George Eivazzadeh were actually loans made "at the direction of and for the use and benefit of" William Saveh, according to the release.

A separate indictment accuses William Saveh, Peggy Hooper, William Paul Maddox and William Vincent Maddox of bank fraud.

The Bank of Alamo was closed in 2002 and its assets seized by the FDIC.

About 200 accounts with the Bank of Alamo had an estimated $6 million of a total $55.3 million in the bank's deposits. The bank held $69.4 million in assets.

The FDIC insures up to $100,000 in bank accounts, but those 200 accounts all exceeded the limit.

When the FDIC ordered the bank's closing, FDIC spokesman Frank Gresock said the failure was caused by insolvency that was caused by a "high level of problem loans."

Conley could not be reached for comment Wednesday.

To Some, Need For Third Trial Of Ex-Banker Isn't Evident (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

What do John A. Gotti; Cendant's former chief executive, Walter A. Forbes; and Frank P. Quattrone, the former investment banker, all have in common?

As vastly different as those three cases are, they may all be threepeats, with each facing the prospect of a third trial in federal court.

For Mr. Quattrone, that prospect emerged on Monday after a federal appeals court overturned his 2004 conviction on obstruction of justice charges.

The ruling faulted the judge's instructions to the jury, saying that they had failed to adequately require jurors to establish that Mr. Quattrone intended to thwart a government investigation. But the appeals panel did not reject the quality of the evidence presented in the government's case, which could bolster prosecutors' decision to retry Mr. Quattrone.

"It was thrown out because of flawed jury instructions, so I don't think we'll see the government walk away from this case," said Robert A. Mintz, a former prosecutor and now a partner at McCarter & English.

But much has changed since the United States attorney's office in Manhattan began its investigation of Mr. Quattrone in 2001. The prosecutors who brought the original case have left for private practice at prestigious Manhattan law firms. By some estimates, the office has already spent thousands of hours and millions of dollars in two trials to reach a guilty verdict against Mr. Quattrone, the son of a Philadelphia garment worker who rose to become the most powerful banker in Silicon Valley during the height of the dot-com boom.

Because of the passage of time — and in the wake of a number of high-profile white-collar convictions in recent years, including Martha Stewart, Bernard J. Ebbers of WorldCom and John J. Rigas of Adelphia Communications — some lawyers wonder whether there is a need to put Mr. Quattrone's feet to the fire once again.

"Since his original indictment, the government and that office has notched up a number of victories," said Roman E. Darmer II, a former assistant United States attorney who worked in the Manhattan office until 1999. "I wonder if the moment has passed." And then there are others who wonder if the crime that Mr. Quattrone is accused of is worthy of the time, money and energy involved in a third trial.

"There are situations that demand retrial," said John K. Carroll, a former federal prosecutor now with the law firm Clifford Chance. "If the guy was the head of a crime family, or committed a crime where there are a lot of victims, or if the defendant is likely to commit the crime again, it is very hard for the government to walk away from those," he said. "In other circumstances where the individual is unlikely to commit the crime again or the alleged crime might be victimless, there isn't a self-evident need to pursue it once again."

Still, Mr. Carroll and other lawyers say they believe prosecutors will probably put Mr. Quattrone in front of a jury a third time because they believe their case remains strong and because they worry their tough stance on white-collar crime will be eroded if they allow Mr. Quattrone to walk away unscathed.

The United States attorney's office is saying only that it is considering its options. One of the most compelling factors behind the prosecutors' decision is which judge will take over the case. If the next judge is viewed as "pro-defense," that could affect the government's decision to pursue the case, said some former federal prosecutors.

"I can think of a couple of judges who would make it very difficult for the state," Mr. Darmer, the former assistant United States attorney, said.

Other lawyers say there is a possibility of a plea bargain with Mr. Quattrone.

A lawyer for Mr. Quattrone declined to comment.

Whatever happens, it will in the hands of Michael J. Garcia, who took office as the United States attorney for Manhattan last fall. Mr. Garcia spent a number of years prosecuting terrorism cases before joining the Commerce Department in 2001.

Later he took over the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, where he was criticized for a budget shortfall and low morale in the division.

The office he now runs is the front line of the government's battle against white-collar crime. As such, it has a long history as a launching pad for ambitious lawyers who go on to careers in politics or at the leading law firms and corporations. Former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, for example, first came to prominence in the 1980's as he chased a number of insider-trading cases.

Mr. Garcia's predecessor, David N. Kelley, is now a senior litigating partner at Cahill Gordon & Reindel. Before him was James B. Comey, who is general counsel of Lockheed Martin. One of the lead prosecutors in the Quattrone case, David B. Anders, a former assistant United States attorney, joined the litigation group at Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz late last year.

In his second trial (the first ended in a mistrial), Mr. Quattrone was convicted of two counts of obstruction and one count of witness-tampering after he forwarded a colleague's e-mail message in December 2000 urging employees to "clean up" their files after he was made aware of a government investigation involving his firm, Credit Suisse First Boston. Mr. Quattrone, 50, had faced 18 months in prison; he remained free pending the outcome of the appeal.

At the time, the Justice Department was investigating whether the investment bank was soliciting kickbacks from preferred investors for hot initial public offerings. Those investigations never resulted in charges against Mr. Quattrone. Credit Suisse First Boston agreed to pay $100 million to settle regulatory accusations that it had mishandled the allocation of stock offerings during the technology boom.

Prosecutors sought to portray Mr. Quattrone as a symbol of the excesses and greed that ran rampant on Wall Street in the late 1990's as executives and other insiders cashed in on the stock market's surge, often at the expense of Main Street shareholders.

Mr. Quattrone, who earned $120 million in 2000, is still a wealthy man. And his legal bills are still being paid by Credit Suisse, said a person briefed on the matter who is not authorized to speak publicly about the case. This person would not say how much has been spent to defend Mr. Quattrone so far, but added that what portion of those bills Mr. Quattrone would have to repay would be determined after the case was concluded.

As a result, prosecutors may be worried about the message they will send if they walk away from the case, some lawyers said.

C. Evan Stewart, a lawyer at Zuckerman Spaeder, who represented a former securities broker acquitted last summer of charges brought against him by Eliot Spitzer, the New York attorney general, wondered, "What message would be sent if the government washed its hands and said, 'Two times is it'? "

Nacchio Judge May Set Trial Date, Rule On Dismissal Request Today (WSJ)

By Shawn Young

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

A U.S. district-court judge in Denver today is expected to set a trial date for Joseph Nacchio, the former Qwest Communications International Inc. chief executive charged with 42 counts of criminal insider trading.

Judge Edward Nottingham may also rule on defense arguments for dismissal of the charges, which carry a potential prison sentence of 10 years for each count and a financial penalty of more than $100 million.

U.S. Attorney William Leone alleges Mr. Nacchio illegally sold $101 million worth of the Denver-based phone company's stock in 2001 when he knew the company wasn't doing as well as it had led investors to believe. The defense says prosecutors have presented a flimsy and flawed case.

Attempts to have the charges dismissed are commonplace and carry virtually no risk for defendants, and they are rarely entirely successful, say white-collar-crime attorneys not involved in the case.

Herbert Stern, Mr. Nacchio's attorney, says his client had nothing more than vaguely worded, speculative warnings from other executives that the company might not meet financial targets if business didn't improve. That isn't the same as knowing that the company has actually faltered, according to court filings by the defense. The defense also argues that the information Mr. Nacchio had was, by definition, not significant since the prosecution hasn't claimed that it needed to be disclosed to investors.

"It's a pretty good argument to say the information wasn't material if it didn't need to be disclosed. It's an argument that has a lot of logical appeal," says Matt Jacobs, a partner at McDermott Will & Emery, a law firm based in Palo Alto, Calif., that isn't involved in the case.

But some other attorneys also not involved in the matter say they doubt the defense will persuade the judge to drop the case. "It's too cute by half," says Joseph Allerhand, a partner at Weil, Gotshal & Manges LLP in New York. Companies and executives aren't required to disclose every material fact in real time, says Mr. Allerhand. Such a requirement would make it impossible to run a business.

In its filings, the prosecution has argued that insiders can have material information they don't have to disclose, but if they do, they may not trade on it. Mr. Allerhand says a key issue at the trial is likely to be whether Mr. Nacchio knowingly violated rules that barred him from trading.

Qwest restated $2.5 billion in revenue and $2.2 billion in earnings for 2000 and 2001. Mr. Nacchio isn't accused of falsifying the company's books.

SEC Plumbs Money Firm's Files (WSJ)

By Carrick Mollenkamp And Ian McDonald

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

Authorities and some creditors of Refco Inc. want to know more about money the brokerage firm shuttled between some of its business units in the days before it filed for bankrupty protection.

They may be able to learn some important details from Christopher Sugrue, a New York money manager and past employee of Refco, which imploded just weeks after its August initial public offering when Refco disclosed that its former chief executive, Phillip Bennett, had hidden bad debts.

U.S. securities regulators have been seeking information regarding such business dealings with Refco. And lawyers working for Refco unsecured creditors have sought information from Mr. Sugrue because of what court filings by those creditors describe as a "close relationship" between the 35-year-old Long Island native and Refco, where Mr. Sugrue was an executive before he helped launch PlusFunds Group Inc.

After Refco filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy-court protection Oct. 17, the Securities and Exchange Commission visited PlusFunds' Manhattan offices and asked for a battery of records, according to a report attached to a sworn statement by S. David Peress, a crisis consultant hired by PlusFunds.

In an interview, Mr. Peress said the firm is cooperating with "a compliance examination." Lawyers for Refco unsecured creditors also have asked for documents related to PlusFunds and Mr. Sugrue, according to court filings. A spokesman for the

SEC declined to comment, but the court document that references the SEC request says: "The SEC has not made any suggestion that any action is contemplated involving [PlusFunds]."

Mr. Sugrue's own firm filed for bankruptcy-court protection earlier this month, after a wave of PlusFunds clients demanded their money when some of their cash transferred from Refco accounts was frozen. A portion of the money and trades Mr. Sugrue helped oversee for PlusFunds clients often processed through Refco's sprawling brokerage firm. Mr. Sugrue initially was able to prevent that money from being frozen by persuading Refco to transfer the funds from unregulated offshore accounts to regulated, onshore accounts.

Now PlusFunds is up for sale. Speaking by phone from Florida, where he was vacationing with his family at Disney World, Mr. Sugrue stressed that he did nothing wrong in the Refco matter. "I'll say that unequivocally," he said. Mr. Sugrue said his business "got caught up in a drive-by shooting."

Court filings by Refco creditors seeking to recover the money Mr. Sugrue had transferred to the onshore accounts cite ties between the money manager and Refco, including loans the brokerage firm provided last year to entities affiliated with Mr. Sugrue. Those loans were secured by equity in PlusFunds.

Before starting PlusFunds in 1998, Mr. Sugrue was a senior executive at Refco for more than five years, according to a biography in court papers. In addition to working with hedge funds on the firm's behalf, Mr. Sugrue helped negotiate the sale of 10% in Refco to Austrian bank Bawag P.S.K. in 1999. During that time, Refco was chaired by Thomas Dittmer, who later was listed on a register of PlusFunds shareholders. Mr. Dittmer couldn't be reached for comment. Mr. Sugrue's knowledge of the inner workings of Refco were demonstrated in a tense exchange last October. Six days before Refco began bankruptcy proceedings, Mr. Sugrue burst into Refco's Manhattan office demanding that the brokerage firm move more than $300 million of PlusFunds' client money "to seg funds," according to a sworn statement by Refco Treasurer Matthew Hreben.

Specifically, Mr. Sugrue wanted his clients' money moved from Refco's unregulated Bermuda account, where it was mingled with Refco's money, to segregated, or "seg," accounts, where it presumably would be less vulnerable to Refco creditors. The money was moved the next day and soon sent to accounts at Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., according to court papers and sworn statements by Refco employees.

Stanley S. Arkin, a lawyer for Mr. Sugrue, said his client should be given a "silver star" for looking out for his clients. Mr. Sugrue said his investors told him: "Thank God you went and got it. That's what you are supposed to do."

Yet Refco creditors got a federal court to freeze the money in the Lehman accounts, alleging in court papers that Mr. Sugrue was given preferential treatment. Those frozen accounts triggered the redemptions by PlusFunds' clients -- and the subsequent bankruptcy-court filing. The clients yanked more than $1 billion from the firms' funds -- about half their assets -- in the first two months of this year.

It is a quick reversal of fortune for Mr. Sugrue. Still on the board at PlusFunds, he is no longer an employee. "It feels like you got thrown out of the house you built," Mr. Sugrue said in the phone interview.

PlusFunds mainly offered funds designed to mimic the performance of Standard & Poor's hedge-fund indexes. The controversial money transferred from Refco was invested there to track 15 funds in S&P's Managed Futures index. PlusFunds' assets stood at more than $2.5 billion last summer.

After Mr. Sugrue started his fund firm, he continued to work closely with his old employer. Refco served as a clearing broker for several portfolios overseen by PlusFunds, according to court papers filed by Refco's creditors. And in 2003, Refco hired PlusFunds to manage a futures fund that did much of its trading through accounts at Refco, according to court filings by Refco creditors.

But the relationship extended beyond trading. Last spring, Refco Capital lent $158 million to Suffolk LLC, an entity affiliated with Mr. Sugrue, according to court papers filed by Refco creditors. Mr. Sugrue used the money to buy out minority shareholders of PlusFunds, the creditors say in court papers, adding that since then, Refco units lent another $50 million to entities related to Mr. Sugrue and other PlusFunds shareholders. Of that, $19.4 million went to an entity in which Mr. Sugrue is the sole member, court documents claim.

Several potential acquirers have emerged for PlusFunds, which will be auctioned off in April, according to public disclosures.

Separately, the federal bankruptcy judge overseeing Refco's bankruptcy proceedings ruled yesterday that Refco creditors investigating the brokerage firm's meltdown are entitled to documents from the underwriters of Refco's IPO. The judge also said former Refco directors, including private-equity investor Thomas H. Lee, should be allowed to collect on an insurance policy to cover legal expenses they incur in shareholder suits related to Refco's collapse.

A judge in a criminal case against Mr. Bennett, the former Refco CEO, set two trial dates yesterday -- Oct. 16, with a backup date of March 12, 2007. Mr. Bennett is fighting securities and fraud charges related to the Refco matter. The backup trial date was provided to accommodate Mr. Bennett's lawyer, Gary Naftalis.

Sarbanes-Oxley Sponsor Defends Measure, Attacks Rollback Effort (WSJ)

By Siobhan Hughes

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Paul Sarbanes offered a sweeping defense of the landmark corporate-governance law he co-authored and suggested that efforts to roll it back are on shaky legal footing.

"We need to remind those who complain that Congress overreacted or overreached in passing Sarbanes-Oxley of several crucial points," the Maryland Democrat said in remarks to the Consumer Federation of America.

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 created the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, bringing the accounting industry under regulation for the first time. It also required public companies to hire outside auditors to monitor their processes for assuring the integrity of financial statements. The law followed accounting scandals that led Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc., now part of Verizon Communications Inc., to file for the largest bankruptcy reorganizations in U.S. history.

Critics have asserted the law was enacted hastily and created too many burdens for companies. A conservative group has filed a civil lawsuit seeking to abolish the PCAOB. An advisory panel created by the Securities and Exchange Commission is calling for the exemption of the smallest 80% of public companies from a key internal-controls requirement of the law.

"It's asserted by some that the law was enacted in haste," Mr. Sarbanes said. "I think this is an affront to the hard work and the common sense of the members of Congress who shaped the legislation, moved it through their respective houses and voted for it. We had an extremely thorough, careful set of hearings."

Mr. Sarbanes -- who was chairman of the Senate Banking Committee when the law was enacted -- took particular exception to a lawsuit filed by the Free Enterprise Fund, a Washington, D.C., nonprofit group, that seeks to have the PCAOB declared unconstitutional.

"The structure was reviewed by the American law division of the Congressional Research Service and several distinguished professors of constitutional law," Mr. Sarbanes said, and "all approved of the structure."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Investigating Ryan Trial Juror (CHIT)

By Ray Gibson, Matt O'connor And David Heinzmann, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, March 24, 2006

A federal judge launched an investigation into a juror in the George Ryan trial Thursday hours after the Tribune reported to court officials that public records appear to show the man had hidden a felony DUI conviction from the court during jury selection.

The revelation cast a shadow over the historic prosecution of the former governor, and could potentially lead to a motion for a mistrial or form grounds for the juror's dismissal with deliberations already underway.

Court records matching the suburban juror's name and other identifying information show a conviction for aggravated drunken driving-a felony-while Ryan was secretary of state in 1995.

In a sworn questionnaire filled out by potential jurors before the trial's start last September, the juror answered "no" when asked if he, a close friend or relative had ever been charged or accused of a crime.

State records also show that the driving privileges for a man matching the juror's name had been revoked or suspended on numerous occasions during Ryan's term as secretary of state as well.

On the questionnaire, the juror denied having any "bad experience" with the secretary of state's office and passed on a chance to discuss anything privately with the judge.

The Tribune is not naming the juror because it is the newspaper's standard practice not to name a sitting member of a jury. The Tribune did not contact the juror for comment because doing so could violate a court order not to communicate with jurors during a trial.

The latest twist in the marathon trial came amid indications of dissension in the jury in its second week of deliberations and as the judge warned jurors to treat one another "with dignity and respect."

The Tribune uncovered court records matching the juror's name Wednesday night and notified U.S. District Chief Judge Charles Kocoras in a meeting in his chambers Thursday morning. Kocoros then went to meet with U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer, who is presiding over the marathon trial.

By 2 p.m. Thursday, lawyers in the Ryan trial had been summoned to the Pallmeyer's chambers.

Half an hour later, the judge stepped into her courtroom and announced that she had sent jurors home early for the weekend in order to perform "a brief investigation" of a matter unrelated to jurors' recent difficulties in deliberations.

DOJ_NMG_0020883

"This relates to another matter," Pallmeyer told reporters. "It does involve a juror. It does involve a personal matter regarding that juror."

Jurors were dispatched an hour and a half early, but deliberations are scheduled to resume Monday morning. Jurors have deliberated for eight days.

Pallmeyer sealed all information about the investigation and a gag order in the case prevents attorneys from discussing it.

Court records that match the juror's name show an arrest for drunken driving on November 7, 1994, in Palatine. There was a guilty plea on July 25, 1995, in that case and a sentence of 60 days in jail and 30 months of probation imposed, according to the records. It was unclear if any time was served in jail.

In February 1996, the same man was charged with possession of a weapon by a convicted felon and with violating probation, records show.

In October 1996, those charges were reduced to misdemeanors-including reckless conduct and possession of a firearm with no Firearm Owners Identification Card-and the judge did not impose a jail term.

Penelope Campbell, a spokeswoman for the secretary of state's office, said a person matching the juror's name first obtained a driver's license in 1979 but never renewed it when it expired in 1982.

Yet that man continued to drive, records show.

While the secretary of state's office shows the man has only one conviction for driving under the influence, court records show at least three arrests for drunk driving.

That man's driving privileges have been revoked or suspended many times over the years, and he is currently under a six-year license revocation set to expire in mid-2007, Campbell said.

Potential jurors had to sign the questionnaires under penalty of perjury that their answers were "true and correct to the best of my knowledge and belief."

Legal experts said that if the juror is dismissed, the judge could bring in an alternate or even continue deliberations with 11 jurors.

The judge can go with 11 only if a juror is dismissed for "good cause," but lying on the jury form would suffice, said Andrew Leipold, law professor at the University of Illinois.

While the issue might seem ripe for appeal, the Supreme Court has ruled in a civil case that a party in the case must prove a juror's failure to disclose information caused an actual bias, experts said.

Defense lawyers could argue that the juror's conduct should lead to a mistrial, but several experts thought it would be an uphill fight. They noted that defense lawyers have approved the alternate jurors, making it hard to complain if one of the alternates steps in.

But Philip K. Anthony, chief executive of jury consulting firm Decision Quest, predicted that the revelation could result in a mistrial. The defense could argue "the entire panel has been contaminated by the views of this individual," he said.

But past cases show trials and verdicts can be salvaged.

One such case involved violinist Rachel Barton, who won a $30 million judgment from commuter rail service Metra after she fell under a train and suffered severe injuries. Metra unsuccessfully sought a new trial because one juror failed to reveal she filed a lawsuit against a retailer after injuring her hand.

"Typically, much of the resolution of issues like this is placed in the sound discretion of the trial judge," said attorney Robert Clifford, who represented Barton.

In Boston, prosecutors perform regular criminal background checks on jurors after fallout from a 2004 murder trial. After a jury acquitted one defendant, prosecutors learned five jurors concealed their criminal backgrounds.

Experienced trial lawyers in Chicago said lawyers typically don't do background checks on jurors in federal criminal cases, instead relying on an honor system. Anthony said it was also rare across the country.

The lawyers in the case have a duty to report any impropriety, such as a juror lying during jury selection, if they become aware of it, said Jean Rosenbluth, a law professor at the University of Southern California and a former federal prosecutor in Los Angeles.

"If [lawyers on the case] they had even a reason to think it, they would have an obligation to say something," Rosenbluth said.

The potential problems with one juror come amid signs the deliberations had broken down in recent days because of personal rancor.

Pallmeyer had spoken of "personal difficulties" in the deliberations and a juror was overheard Tuesday saying that name-calling had to stop.

In a note issued Thursday morning, Pallmeyer urged that jurors treat one another "with dignity and respect."

DOJ_NMG_0020884

The judge also warned that deliberations must be conducted in the jury room with all 12 present and not in private discussions outside the jury room by clusters of jurors.

Ryan, 72, and co-defendant Lawrence Warner, 67, are charged with using Ryan's offices as secretary of state and governor to enrich themselves, mainly through corrupt state leases and lobbying contracts doled out to Warner.

Tribune staff reporters Rudolph Bush and Michael Higgins also contributed to this story.

Judge To Ryan Jury: Get Along (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI, Federal Courts Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, March 24, 2006

Jurors deciding former Gov. George Ryan's criminal case were sent home early today as a "brief investigation" is under way relating to a personal jury matter, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer said.

Pallmeyer said the matter had nothing to do with previous jury notes that revealed discord within the 12-member panel. The judge did not reveal the new issue but told reporters in open court that deliberations were suspended as an undisclosed matter related to the jury is investigated.

She said she expects to release details tied to the new matter but for now kept the issue secret and said jurors will return at 9:30 a.m. Monday to continue their talks. They were dismissed at about 2:30 p.m., ending their eighth day of deliberations.

Earlier today, Pallmeyer admonished jurors in a letter to treat one another "with dignity and respect" and to stop breaking off into smaller groups.

The 12 jurors deciding former Gov. George Ryan's fate are having "personal difficulties" as they try to reach a verdict.

That was in response to two notes jurors sent the judge earlier this week in which they complained they were having "personal difficulties" as they deliberated whether Ryan and his codefendant, Lawrence Warner, are guilty of corruption-related charges.

Pallmeyer told jurors they're barred from discussing the case in smaller groups outside of the jury room, saying any such talk among any smaller groups is a violation of their sworn duty.

"Private discussions about this case outside the jury room among any smaller groups is a violation of your sworn duty," Pallmeyer

Today is the eighth day of deliberations. Jurors are only discussing the case Monday through Thursday and leave every day at 4 p.m.

She also told the jurors they had to follow the instructions on the law that she gave them.

Pallmeyer didn't release the contents of the jurors' notes. But her response indicated conflict brewing among the six men and six women.

"You 12 are the jurors selected to decide this case. In your deliberations, I expect you to treat your fellow jurors with dignity and respect," Pallmeyer wrote. "As I understand from your notes, you may be having some difficulties during your deliberations."

Ryan Jurors Urged To Show 'Dignity And Respect;' Judge Launches Fresh Probe (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, March 24, 2006

CHICAGO - The judge at former Gov. George Ryan's racketeering and fraud trial urged stalled jurors Thursday to treat each other "with dignity and respect" and sent them home, saying she was ordering a fresh investigation of a personal matter involving one of them.

The eighth day of deliberations at the five-month trial was alive with speculation but few hard facts about just what kind of turmoil was going on behind the closed door of the jury room.

"In your deliberations, I expect you to treat your fellow jurors with dignity and respect," U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer said in a note sent to the jury Thursday morning.

The three-paragraph note was a response to two notes sent earlier to Pallmeyer, which she is keeping under seal because they touch on "personal difficulties on the jury."

Her reply seemed to suggest harsh words may have been used among the jurors. It also cautioned them not to break off into separate factions in their search for a verdict.

"I remind you that any deliberations in this case must be conducted only in the jury room among all of you," Pallmeyer said. "Private discussions of this case outside the jury room among any smaller groups is a violation of your sworn duty."

DOJ_NMG_0020885

About 2:30 p.m., Pallmeyer sent the jurors home for the weekend. The jurors haven't been meeting on Fridays.

She said the reason for the early quitting time - the jurors have been working until 4 p.m. - was the launching of "a brief investigation" that she said "does involve a juror - it does involve a personal matter regarding that juror."

Pallmeyer said little more except that the investigation "does not relate to the issues that were raised by the jurors in notes to me earlier in the week."

The Chicago Tribune reported on its Web site Thursday night that the investigation came after the newspaper notified court officials of public records that indicate a juror may not have disclosed a felony DUI conviction in 1995, when Ryan was secretary of state.

During jury selection last fall, the juror answered "no" when asked in a sworn questionnaire whether he ever had been charged with or accused of a crime, the newspaper reported. State records show a driver's license matching the juror's name was revoked or suspended multiple times while Ryan was secretary of state, the newspaper said.

The Tribune discovered the records matching the juror's name and other identifying information Wednesday night and met with U.S. District Chief Judge Charles P. Kocoras in his chambers Thursday morning, the newspaper reported. Kocoras then met with Pallmeyer, the paper said.

On top of that, Kocoras on Thursday barred any photos of the jurors within the courthouse - evidently an effort to take more pressure off the jury.

Ryan, 72, and businessman Larry Warner, 67, are charged in a 22-count indictment with racketeering, fraud and other offenses. Ryan is accused of steering big money state leases and contracts to Warner and other insiders when he was secretary of state and later the governor.

He was rewarded with free vacations and gifts, according to the indictment.

Ryan and Warner say nothing they did was illegal.

What happens in a jury room always is supposed to be secret and the secrecy surrounding this case is all the greater since Pallmeyer imposed a gag order.

But the jurors themselves are anything but a random selection of 12 ordinary Americans.

They all were screened and profiled by psychologists working for a consulting firm brought in by Winston & Strawn, the Loop law firm headed by former Gov. James R. Thompson that is defending Ryan free of charge.

Just how any factions have developed is impossible to see from the outside. There is wide diversity on the jury - black and white, male and female, blue collar and middle management.

Los Angeles-based jury consultant Phil Anthony, chief executive officer of DecisionQuest Inc., said in a telephone interview Thursday that based on the turmoil of the last few days "I suspect that this jury is not going to reach a decision."

But he said that might be prevented if Pallmeyer took strong action to refocus the jury.

Anthony said attorneys at a trial such as Ryan's often start by doing something akin to market research to determine if any defense is likely to result in an acquittal.

If the results are discouraging, they sometimes use jury consultants to isolate one juror who might hold out in their favor no matter what transpires, or perhaps find groups of jurors so antagonistic to each other that they would be unable to agree on any verdict.

In doing that, they routinely look at race, social standing, gender and psychological conflicts that have nothing to do with the evidence or testimony from the witness stand.

"The average jury-eligible American cannot separate their own biases, prejudices or filtering mechanisms from the underlying facts of any given case," he said. "It's human nature."

He shrugged off any suggestion such tactics might be at odds with the ideals of justice.

"This is life and death for the governor," he said. "So if you're the governor's lawyer, your charge is to do everything you can within the parameters of the law to win the case."

Businessman Admits Bribing Philadelphia Councilman (SCCD)

The State College Centre Daily, March 24, 2006

PHILADEPHIA - A businessman friend of a convicted city councilman pleaded guilty Thursday to paying the councilman's health-club dues in exchange for help with a city land deal.

Reinaldo Pastrana faces a possible prison sentence of 2 1/2 years to 37 months under federal guidelines after pleading to three bribery counts, Assistant U.S. Attorney Kenya Mann said. Pastrana's sentencing was set for June 22.

Pastrana, 47, of Philadelphia did not cooperate in the case against Councilman Rick Mariano, who was convicted last week of 18 of 22 bribery and fraud counts.

DOJ_NMG_0020886

Pastrana paid $5,400 for Mariano's membership fees, while Mariano helped him acquire a city property for $100,000, far below its appraised value.

As part of the plea, Pastrana agreed to sell the property and use the proceeds to pay up to $250,000 in taxes that may be owed by him, his wife and his mother.

Pastrana was on parole for failing to pay state income tax at the time of his indictment and has since been incarcerated for violating probation, defense lawyer Brian McMonagle said.

Mariano Ally Pleads Guilty To Bribery (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 24, 2006

A Philadelphia real estate developer who paid City Councilman Rick Mariano's gym fees for three years in return for help obtaining city land at a huge discount pleaded guilty yesterday to bribery charges.

Reinaldo Pastrana became the fourth person convicted in the case. The councilman was convicted at trial last week. Two other defendants had previously pleaded guilty, and two more are scheduled to be tried next month.

In the Pastrana scheme, Mariano sponsored and voted for legislation that allowed the developer to purchase 1.4 acres of city-owned property at American and Somerset Streets in Fairhill for $100,000 - a quarter of its market value, officials said.

Two weeks after the mayor signed a bill authorizing the sale, Pastrana began to pay Mariano's gym fees at the Sporting Club at the Bellevue. In all, Pastrana paid three years' worth of dues, or about $5,400.

Last year, after the FBI investigation became public, the councilman gave the developer a backdated check to make it appear as if he had repaid him, prosecutor Kenya Mann said in a court filing. But, she said, Mariano also told Pastrana not to cash the check because he didn't have enough money in his bank account.

Pastrana, who admitted his involvement before the grand jury, pleaded guilty because "he now recognizes that what he did was wrong and wants to get on with his life," said his lawyer, Brian McMonagle.

Pastrana believed he had paid a fair price for the property, McMonagle said, and he paid for the councilman's gym membership because Mariano had asked him to do so.

"Mariano called him up and he couldn't say no," McMonagle told reporters after the guilty plea hearing. "Obviously, he knows now that this is considered part of a federal crime."

Pastrana likely faces about three years in prison. As part of his plea agreement, he also agreed to sell another property to help pay an IRS debt of $250,000.

Mariano, meantime, spent his seventh day at the Federal Detention Center yesterday. U.S. District Judge Lawrence F. Stengel revoked bail after his conviction, pending a psychiatric evaluation to determine whether he poses a danger to himself or to others or is a flight risk.

The evaluation took place Wednesday. No date for a bail hearing has been set.

Mariano is scheduled to be sentenced July 6. Pastrana will be sentenced June 22. The two others who pleaded guilty, Vincent DiPentino and Joseph Pellecchia, are scheduled to be sentenced on May 30.

The two remaining defendants, Louis and Philip Chartock, father-and-son operators of Erie Steel Ltd., are scheduled to go to trial April 24.

Victim's Mother Testifies In 'Mob Cops' Case (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 24, 2006

Betty Hydell, the murder victim's mother who helped jump-start the investigation into the so-called "Mafia Cops," testified Thursday but did not identify the two defendants as the men with badges who came looking for her son the day he disappeared.

Hydell, whose son James went missing in September 1986, also didn't testify about how she had reportedly recognized the face of one of the defendants, Louis Eppolito, some years later on a television talk show.

Law enforcement sources have said it was Hydell's recognition of Eppolito's face on an episode of the Sally Jessy Raphael show that helped energize the investigation that ensnared Eppolito and another ex-NYPD detective, Ste- phen Caracappa, on racketeering charges.

Defense attorneys expected Hydell to recount how she reportedly remembered Eppolito's face as one of two men who drove by her Staten Island home looking for her son James the day he went missing. James Hydell, an associate of the mob, was believed to have been killed by former Luchese crime boss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso. Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, are accused of being paid assassins for Casso.

In about 2003, Betty Hydell's call to a Brooklyn detective about the television show helped move the probe of Eppolito and Caracappa into high gear, officials said. Yesterday prosecutors wouldn't comment on their reasons for not questioning Hydell about the incident.

Instead, Hydell, under questioning by assistant U.S. attorney Robert Henoch, described -- but was not asked to identify -- two men who drove to her Staten Island neighborhood looking for James. She testified that she finally drove around the block and caught up with the pair, who were driving a powder blue car and whom she described as being "Italian." Hydell described the driver as being a big man with dark hair and wearing a gold neck chain and the other as dark-haired and thin. Eppolito once had dark hair and did have an affinity for jewelry, photographs show. Caracappa is thin and has dark gray hair.

The driver showed her a badge and Hydell said she told the pair that "you should tell people who you are and what you are doing."

'MOB' MA TURNS UP HEAT (NYPOST)

By Zach Haberman

The New York Post, March 24, 2006

SAYS COPS LOOK LIKE DUO THERE ON DAY SON VANISHED

The heartbroken mother of a murdered mobster testified yesterday that two detectives staking out her home on the day her son vanished looked like the accused Mafia cops.

Trembling nervously as she spoke, Betty Hydell said the shadowy duo told her they were cops, after their actions prompted her to confront them as they sat in a car on the fateful morning of Oct. 18, 1986.

"I asked who they were," she told jurors in Brooklyn federal court. "The driver pulled out a badge. I said, 'You should let people know who you are and what you are doing.' "

Hydell was not asked to identify or whether she recognized former Detectives Louis Eppolito or Stephen Caracappa. But she said of the two stakeout cops: "One was the big one, one was the little one."

Eppolito is heavyset, while Caracappa is thin.

Prosecutors say Hydell's son, Jimmy, was one of eight victims of the alleged dirty duo, who stand accused of leaking information that led to Mafia murders and even carrying out one killing themselves.

Earlier in their racketeering trial, a witness said the two officers were paid $35,000 to kidnap Jimmy Hydell for Luchese crime-family big Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso, who believed the low-level thug had tried to kill him.

Casso wanted Hydell alive so he could kill him as slowly and painfully as possible, according to the witness, Burton Kaplan.

Betty Hydell's testimony was apparently meant to place the officers outside her Staten Island house - stalking her son - the day he vanished.

"He was going to Brooklyn," she recalled, leaning forward on her elbows and trembling slightly. She said her son didn't use his car for the trip, because his brother, Frankie, needed it.

Moments after Frankie left in the vehicle in the late morning, he noticed he was followed by a car with two men. Betty Hydell said Frankie returned immediately. When she looked out her window, she saw the men idling near the family's house.

She said she concocted a plan to uncover the men's identity. First, she told Frankie to drive off in the car - then she followed close behind in her car to see what would happen.

"I wanted to see if they would follow him," she said.

Sure enough, the men did, she testified. Betty called out to the shady pair when they pulled up next to her, asking who they were. She said their badges didn't phase her, since her son Jimmy was frequently the subject of police interest.

"I checked with [the Department of] Motor Vehicles and the plates did not belong to that car. I just assumed they were undercover cops," Betty Hydell recalled

She said she suspected something was wrong only when Jimmy did not turn up for dinner that night - after he had called to say he would be on time. When he wasn't home the next day, she was really worried.

"He never did that before," she testified. "He always came home."

Earlier in the trial, Kaplan said Jimmy Hydell had been turned over to Casso by mobster Frankie Santoro Jr.

Kaplan said the doomed man was delivered directly to Santoro by Eppolito and Caracappa, who had kidnapped him and stuffed him in the trunk of a car, after pretending to pull him over in a legitimate police stop.

The witness said Casso tortured Hydell, shooting him numerous times in places that would be painful - but not fatal. He said Hydell begged his killer to "dump his body in the street" so his mother could find it and collect insurance. Although Casso agreed to this, Hydell's body has never been found.

It had been expected the bereaved mom would link the two men she saw the day her son vanished to the accused cops by testifying she recognized Eppolito promoting his book, "Mafia Cop," on the Sally Jessy Raphael talk show in the 1990s. But she never mentioned the show. Instead, she abruptly left the stand without pointing out the two cops - and without being cross-examined.

Betty Hydell's recollections about the talk-show appearance were left out because it could not be determined if she saw Eppolito before or after his face started being connected to Casso in the press, sources said.

"I thought she was going to have to point them out," her daughter, Elizabeth Hydell, said outside court.

Eppolito's one-time goumada also the stand as a surprise witness.

Cabrini Cama was eyeballed up and down by Eppolito's wife, Fran, as she walked into the courtroom. Then she testified her Brooklyn home wasn't just where Eppolito committed adultery.

She said the bulging ex-detective once brought Kaplan there for a brief meeting, but did not know the topic of conversation.

Testimony Against Mafia Cops A Dud (NYDN)

By JOHN MARZULLI, DAILY NEWS STAFF WRITER

New York Daily News, March 24, 2006

Victim's ma holds back

The mother of murder victim James Hydell got her shot at the reputed Mafia cops in court yesterday - and fired blanks.

Betty Hydell, 68, was expected to identify Louis Eppolito and Steven Caracappa, her son's alleged killers, as the two men who had cased her Staten Island house on Oct. 18, 1986, the day he disappeared.

Hydell also had told an investigator from the Brooklyn district attorney's office that she recognized Eppolito in 1992 when he was promoting his autobiography on Sally Jesse Raphael's talk show.

But prosecutors apparently decided not to subject Hydell to tough cross-examination over conflicting statements she gave about the incident to the FBI and the Drug Enforcement Administration, because the evidence so far against the defendants appears to be strong.

Hydell, 68, told the jury only that she noticed two men in a blue car making passes by her home. She got in her car and drove up alongside their vehicle.

"I asked who they were," she told the Brooklyn Federal Court jury. "The driver pulled out a badge. I said, 'You should let people know who you are and what you're doing.' "

She described the driver as "the big one" wearing a white shirt and a necklace. The passenger was "the little one." Both appeared to be of Italian descent, she said.

Eppolito is stout, and Caracappa is rail thin. Hydell was not asked to identify them in court.

She went on to describe how the last contact from her son, James, was a collect call he made from a pay phone in Brooklyn about 2:40 p.m.

Authorities contend the cops were looking for James Hydell on orders from Luchese crime family underboss Anthony (Gaspipe) Casso, who had survived an assassination attempt by several gunmen, including Hydell.

Eppolito and Caracappa allegedly found Hydell outside a coin laundry in Brooklyn and turned him over to Casso, who tortured and killed him, officials said. His body has never been found.

Outside court, Betty Hydell's daughter, Liz, said she was "shocked" that her mother's testimony was so brief.

"I have no idea what's going on," she said. "I thought she was going to point him \[Eppolito\] out."

Eppolito's lawyer, Bruce Cutler, said he, too, was expecting the witness to make the connection to his client.

"It surprised me that the government didn't try to adduce that," he said.

Neither Cutler nor Caracappa's lawyer, Edward Hayes, asked her a single question on cross-examination.

Witness In Detectives' Trial Testifies About His Own Crimes (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

Steven Corso — tax cheat, thief and disgraced accountant — has spent the last two days at the racketeering trial of Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa telling jurors that the two detectives moved to Las Vegas in the early 1990's and committed a smattering of federal crimes.

He testified that last year they helped arrange a 2-minute-19-second drug deal, in which Mr. Eppolito's son was secretly recorded selling an ounce of methamphetamine for $900. He also said that a few weeks later Mr. Eppolito, a struggling screenwriter, accepted $14,000 as an investment in a script he was looking to produce — money, the witness said, that supposedly came from a drug deal in Florida.

Today, Mr. Corso, with his pomaded hair and designer suit, underwent a bitter, if quizzical, cross-examination. He acknowledged he was the sort of man who would talk with his mouth full of bruschetta and who had first approached Mr. Eppolito by pretending to be interested in his daughter. He also admitted to stealing $5,329,566 from his former firm — money he said he had spent on a life style of "girlfriends, jewelry and going out."

Mr. Corso, the government's chief witness in the trial's Las Vegas phase, traveled through the city wearing a recorder and acting as an oral historian of its underworld — a sort of Studs Terkel of Las Vegas crime. His testimony — and his tapes — are crucial to the prosecution because they allow the government to argue that the two defendants engaged in a criminal conspiracy that stretched from Brooklyn murder in the 1980's to a Las Vegas drug deal just last year.

Judge Jack B. Weinstein broached the topic of the statute of limitations — five years in a conspiracy case — before Mr. Corso took the stand. As prosecutors begin to wrap up their case, the judge said the issue was "coming to a head."

The first round of cross-examination was by Mr. Eppolito's lawyer, Bruce Cutler, who sought to paint the 50-year-old Mr. Corso as a debauched and profligate government pawn: a man, he said, who left $600,000 in "unpaid lines of credit at various and sundry casinos."

On Wednesday, Mr. Cutler, who has a taste for eloquent aggression, impugned Mr. Corso's professional conduct and patriotism, then lambasted him for having stooped so low as to record Mr. Eppolito while he was recovering from heart surgery in a hospital room.

LI Sting Halts Siberia Scheme (NSDY)

By Robert E. Kessler, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 24, 2006

Feds arrest 4 on fraud charges, alleging that they tried to bilk $3 billion from Nassau investor with a promise to build an oil pipeline in Russia

The only thing that was real yesterday was the Republic of Buryatia.

Four alleged con men believed they were about to collect $3 billion yesterday from a wealthy Nassau County hedge fund operator for the "construction" of an oil pipeline through that obscure Siberian region, federal officials said.

But the four - including two alleged bankers from a Georgia Indian tribe - ended up being arrested on fraud charges by federal agents on Long Island, in Montana and in Georgia. The agents were running a sting operation aimed at financial confidence men.

In several months of negotiations on Long Island, the four alleged confidence men claimed that they were the representatives of the Republic of Buryatia, whose government was planning to build a 2,500-mile oil pipeline through Siberia, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney James Miskiewicz and court records.

Initial collateral insuring the financial safety of the project was allegedly $10 billion in American treasury bonds that had been loaned to the republic by the U.S. government in the 1990s, Miskiewicz said. The men claimed the bonds were being used as leverage to get even more money for the "Trans Siberian Oil Pipeline." The hedge fund operator was promised very high rates of interest for his $3 billion, officials said.

Buryatia is an autonomous Russian region in southeastern Siberia with a population of about a million, many of whom are of Mongolian descent living as nomadic herders. But the alleged confidence men had no connection to Buryatia, nor had the U.S. government loaned the land the billions of dollars, officials said.

The hedge fund operator was an unidentified Long Island man who had pleaded guilty to securities fraud and worked on sting operations for the FBI and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service to get a lighter sentence, according to court documents.

During the course of the sting operation, the alleged confidence men produced documents supporting their role in the project and the existence of the $10 billion in various types of U.S. treasury financial instruments, but all of the documents were forged, officials said.

Rodney Sampson was arrested on Long Island yesterday when he came to meet with the hedge fund operator to finalize the $3-billion investment.

Sampson said he was the chief operating officer of the Magnolia International Bank and Trust in Atlanta, officials said. On its Web site, Magnolia identified itself as organized under the laws of the Nu Altamaha Yamassee Indian nation and serving as the central bank for that tribe and other Indian tribes. Officials said the Yamassee are not recognized by the federal government as an Indian tribe, and the bank was actually a one-page Web site with an address of a public housing project.

James Campbell Jr., of Clarinda, Iowa, also was arrested when he came to the Long Island meeting.

In Atlanta yesterday, federal agents arrested Emerson Corsey, the supposed chief financial officer of Magnolia; and in Whitefish, Mont., agents arrested John Juncal, who identified himself as Buryatia's counsel in the United States.

Sampson and Campbell were arraigned before Magistrate Michael Orenstein in U.S. District Court in Central Islip, where they were held without bail as flight risks.

Campbell's attorney, Richard Miller of Islandia, and Sampson's attorney, federal public defender Michael Weil, declined to comment after the arraignment, as did prosecutor Miskiewicz.

Corsey and Juncal were scheduled to have hearings later in the day in Georgia and Montana.

Given the amount of money involved in the alleged fraud, the four face up to 20 years each in prison if convicted.

Flint Man Charged With Producing Child Pornography (AP)

AP, March 24, 2006

Prosecutors Will Seek Maximum Sentences, Avoid Plea Deals

DETROIT -- U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy on Thursday announced child pornography charges against a Flint man and said he was launching a new initiative to crack down on what he said is a growing Internet trade in such images.

Alan Sain, 25, was indicted Wednesday on charges that he enticed, coerced and used a child to engage in sexually explicit conduct and produced pictures of the acts. He is also accused of transporting child pornography in interstate commerce and with possession of child pornography.

Sexual exploitation of children and transportation of child pornography are each punishable by up to 30 years in prison. Possession of child pornography is punishable by up to 10 years in prison.

In an affidavit that accompanied an initial complaint against Sain filed last week, FBI Special Agent Jennie McGlynn Emmons described posting a profile on several Yahoo! interest groups she said were associated with child exploitation. Emmons said Sain contacted her, chatted online with her and sent her child pornography.

Sain claimed he was the adult in the images and as proof offered a picture of what appeared to be the same couch as one visible in the pornographic images, according to Emmons' affidavit.

A message seeking comment was left Thursday for Sain's attorney.

In announcing the charges against Sain, Murphy also unveiled a new Child Protection Initiative out of his office, which covers the eastern district of Michigan.

Under the initiative, prosecutors in Murphy's office will seek the maximum sentences for child exploitation offenses and will not make plea deals. Seven assistant U.S. attorneys will be designated to receive special training on handling child exploitation cases, and an Internet safety program will be offered at local schools.

Murphy said the initiative was in the works before the Sain case and was "prompted by what I have (found) to be a disturbing uptick in the number of these cases that we're seeing."

Nationally, the illicit child pornography trade is estimated to do $3 billion in business annually, he said.

In Michigan, there are about 65 open child exploitation cases "and more in the pipeline from federal agencies." In 2000, when Murphy was an assistant U.S. attorney, the office had fewer than 10 such cases, he said.

"It's totally associated with the Internet," he said, adding that investigation of such crimes had also increased since that time.

U.S. Beefs Up Child Porn Fight (DEN)

Detroit News, March 24, 2006

U.S. Attorney's office will seek maximum penalties, including against a Clio man charged with abuse.

DETROIT -- The U.S. attorney's office will seek maximum penalties for all who abuse or exploit children as part of a new initiative announced Thursday to fight child pornography.

U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy said he has assigned seven assistant attorneys, led by Assistant Attorney John O'Brien, to become experts on child exploitation cases.

Murphy's office also will work more closely with other federal, state and local law enforcement agencies and will launch an Internet safety and awareness program in local schools, he said at a news conference in Detroit.

"If we can't do all we can to protect (children), then we can't do much," Murphy said. "We intend to put these sick individuals in jail for as long as we possibly can."

Murphy also announced a three-count indictment against a Flint-area man on child pornography charges.

Alan Sain, 28, of Clio is charged with enticing a child to engage in sexually explicit conduct, transmitting child pornography and possessing child pornography.

Sain, through e-mail contact with an undercover officer posing as a mother of a young girl, tried to set up a sexual encounter with the girl, officials said. Officials have evidence Sain abused a child or children and produced pornography himself, Murphy said.

But he would not comment on the age of the child or children allegedly involved or whether officials had been able to locate any of the children pictured in images Sain allegedly transmitted.

Sain, who is in custody and is to be arraigned in federal court in Flint on Monday, could not be reached for comment.

Under the policy announced Thursday, Murphy would seek a 30-year prison term on the enticement charge, which carries a minimum penalty of 15 years in prison upon conviction.

Murphy said child pornography is a $3 billion-a-year business and growing, with up to 3,000 child predators using the Internet at any given time. The eastern district of Michigan has 65 child exploitation cases under investigation, he said.

Former Scout Leader Sentenced For Child Porn (AP)

AP, March 24, 2006

ATLANTA (AP) — A north Georgia man who served more than five years as a Boy Scout troop leader has been sentenced to probation and home confinement for possessing dozens of video clips of child pornography, authorities said.

Samuel J. Port, 35, of Ball Ground, was sentenced Wednesday in federal court to eight years probation and six months of home confinement for possessing dozens of video clips of child pornography, according to a news release from the U.S. Attorney's office in Atlanta.

Port came to the attention of the FBI after he brought in his employer-owned computer for maintenance, according to the release. A service technician spotted the items on PORT's computer and notified authorities.

The FBI did a forensic scan of PORT's computer and discovered more than 100 movie clips containing pornography related to young boys. PORT, who has no children, had been active in a local boy scout troop for over five years, according to the release.

PORT was indicted in July 2005 and pleaded guilty in January to a single count of possessing child pornography. Assistant United States Attorney Robert C.I. McBurney prosecuted the case.

Four Men Charged In Nigeria E-mail Scam (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, March 23, 2006

A quartet of suspected e-mail scammers--three of them Nigerian citizens--could face scores of years in prison if convicted on fraud and conspiracy charges, the U.S. Justice Department said Thursday.

A grand jury in Brooklyn, N.Y., on Wednesday charged Nnamdi Chizuba Anisiobi, Anthony Friday Ehis, Kesandu Egwuonwu and another unnamed defendant with one count of conspiracy, eight counts of wire fraud and one count of mail fraud. Anisiobi also faces one count of bank fraud.

According to the Justice Department's charges, New York-based victims of the e-mail scams lost more than $1.2 million to the fraudsters.

Their schemes resembled a popular fraud ploy, sometimes called a 419 scam, or an advance-fee scheme, that has dogged the African nation. Their perpetrators typically send letters and e-mails to thousands of victims, offering a large sum of money and attempt to dupe them into paying fees beforehand. The criminals then pocket the cash and shirk their end of the fake bargain.

One incident described in the 27-page indictment involved a suspect who posed as a suffering throat-cancer patient native to the Southeast Asian nation of Brunei. He said he was too ill to distribute his cache of $55 million to charity and needed help, promising a 20 percent commission in return. But anyone who fell for the offer encountered a number of bogus "shipment" and processing fees numbering in the tens of thousands of dollars.

Three of the suspects were first arrested in February in Amsterdam, where they were living at the time. They are being held by authorities until their extradition to the United States. The fourth suspect is a fugitive.

If convicted, they could face up to 20 years in prison for mail and wire fraud, 30 years for bank fraud, and five years for the conspiracy charge.

Dutch authorities, which initiated the investigation, are no strangers to dealing with suspected Nigerian scammers. In 2004, their bust of a suspected ring yielded 52 arrests.

Last year, a Nigerian court sentenced a woman to two-and-a-half years in prison after she pleaded guilty to conspiring in what was called the nation's biggest scam case ever--a $242 million fraud incident involving a Brazilian bank. The country has stepped up its focus on the problem in recent months, teaming up with Microsoft and British officials to spread warnings about scammers.

Prosecutors Seek Death Penalty Against Kingpin, Delaying NY Trial (AP)

By TOM HAYS, The Associated Press

AP, March 23, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0020892

NEW YORK (AP) — The murder conspiracy trial of a notorious crack kingpin with ties to the rap music industry was postponed on Thursday after prosecutors told a judge that the Department of Justice wants him and his four co-defendants to face the death penalty.

U.S. District Judge Frederic Bloch rescheduled the trial of Kenneth "Supreme" McGriff, previously set for April 3, for April 17. He said he would rule by April 10 on the government's death penalty request.

At a hearing in federal court in Brooklyn, defense attorney David Ruhnke called the government's request an 11th-hour "sham" imposed by a pro-death penalty Justice Department and designed to buy prosecutors more time to prepare their case. He argued that the allegations don't meet the federal standards for a capital case.

Seeking death for defendant Nicole Brown — accused of being a lookout in the 2001 retaliation slaying of a rapper known as E-Money Bags — in particular "is simply absurd," he said.

Prosecutor Carolyn Pokorny insisted the request was legitimate, saying, "It's something that got a really close look in Washington."

McGriff was founder of the Supreme Team, once one of the city's most violent drug crews. Investigators allege that after he finished serving about nine years for drug conspiracy in 1997 he set about reviving his drug-dealing operation.

Cooperating witnesses have told investigators McGriff admitted killing E-Money Bags in Queens. He also allegedly arranged the Baltimore killing a month later of a suspected informant in his drug organization.

McGriff originally was indicted along with his friend Irving Lorenzo, founder of Murder Inc. and the producer of chart-topping acts like Ja Rule and Ashanti. After being granted a separate trial, Lorenzo and his brother Christopher Lorenzo were acquitted late last year of money laundering charges.

Prosecutors had said McGriff funneled more than $1 million in drug proceeds, much of it from Baltimore, through Murder Inc. in return for serving as the Lorenzos' protector and enforcer. A government witness who worked at the label testified he saw a "huge amount" of money delivered in shopping bags and a shoe box in 2000.

In court papers filed Thursday, prosecutors argued that McGriff deserved the death penalty because the killings were premeditated and because he has an extensive criminal record.

"The defendant poses risk of future dangerousness as manifested by a continued pattern of violence" and a "lack of remorse," the papers said.

Alva Doctor Indicted For Health Care Fraud (ALVARC)

Alva (OK) Review-Courier, March 24, 2006

Oklahoma City, Oklahoma — An Alva physician was indicted today for fraudulently billing Medicare for the administration of significantly more medication than was actually given to his patients. DR. GREGORY GLASE PINEGAR, 42, of Alva, Oklahoma, was charged with two counts of health care fraud by a federal grand jury indictment, which also seeks forfeiture of $422,838.57.

Dr. Pinegar is a family practice physician operating his own medical offices in Alva, Oklahoma, who served approximately 300 Medicare eligible patients.

The indictment focuses on two prescription medications: Procrit and Remicade. Procrit is administered by injection and is primarily used to treat anemia in patients with serious kidney disease as well as anemia caused by certain medications, such as some types of chemotherapy and medications to treat HIV. Remicade is administered by intravenous infusions and primarily used to treat patients with moderate to severe Crohn's disease or used to reduce signs and symptoms of rheumatoid arthritis in adults.

The indictment alleges that after Dr. Pinegar or a nurse would give the Procrit injections or supervise the Remicade IV infusions, they would mark the amount of medication given on an office billing form.

Before his office sent the billing information to Medicare the indictment alleges, Dr. Pinegar would fraudulently alter the billing forms to show that his office had administered drugs that were not actually administered or that his office had administered drugs in quantities greater than actually administered.

Specifically, the indictment alleges that from January of 2000 through May of 2005, Dr. Pinegar's office ordered no more than approximately 7,400,000 units of Procrit from suppliers but billed Medicare for approximately 19,750,000 units, totaling $184,502.32.

The indictment also alleges that during that from January of 2003, through May of 2005, Dr. Pinegar's office ordered no more than approximately 49,600 milligrams of Remicade from suppliers but billed Medicare for approximately 112,110 milligrams, totaling $526,160.25.

If convicted, Pinegar faces up to ten years in prison, a fine of up to $250,000, mandatory restitution, and forfeiture of $422,838.57.

DOJ_NMG_0020893

The case is the result of an investigation conducted by the Office of Inspector General for the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services and the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

This case is being prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney Scott E. Williams.

The public is reminded that the indictment is merely an accusation and that the defendant is presumed innocent unless and until proven guilty.

Reference is made to the indictment for further information.

Betting The 'Net Internet Sports Wagering Gaining Popularity With Locals (LVS)

By Liz Benston, Las Vegas Sun

Las Vegas Sun, March 24, 2006

Before Steve Fezzik put money on today's Texas-West Virginia game in the national men's college basketball championship, the Las Vegas man did some comparison shopping online.

A quick search of Internet sports books revealed average offers for bets that the total points made during the game would fall under 132. But Fezzik, a handicapper and frequent sports bettor, already knew that a couple of Vegas casinos had better odds.

On Sunday, he bet $2,000 on the game to go under 134 at the Palms and put another $500 to go under 134.5 at the Las Vegas Hilton.

Online, or "offshore" sports books might seem irrelevant in a town with dozens of sports books and more than 35 on the Strip alone.

That couldn't be further from the truth.

Online sports betting sites aren't just flourishing in the rest of the country, where sports books are illegal everywhere except Nevada. Internet sites have found a hot spot in Nevada and especially in Las Vegas, home to one of the biggest concentration of gamblers and a place where bettors come from all over the world to hone their skills.

No one knows how much of this year's estimated $118 billion in online sports book bets will be made by Nevadans.

But experts say it's a large and growing number of people that includes many pros and even more amateurs who follow sports. Analysts expect the NCAA playoffs to attract at least $300 million in online bets, a 20 percent hike from last year. Some say the event is closing the gap on the Super Bowl, the No. 1 betting event in the country, which generated an estimated $500 million in online wagers this year.

"Anyone who really knows what they're doing is going to consider betting offshore as well as in Vegas," Fezzik said.

While pros have largely gravitated online, Internet sports books, like the multitude of online poker sites that have sprung up in recent years, are largely the realm of occasional bettors.

Amateurs come out in force during March Madness, a 65-team, 64-game event that attracts hordes of fans who make sentimental bets that their college team will win - or at least beat the point spread.

"They make their picks for their office pool, and now that they've thought about it, they think Boston College will beat Pacific by eight points," said Alex Czajkowski, marketing director for the U.S. division of Sportingbet, the world's largest online sports book.

Sports books have become brand-conscious giants of Internet commerce. Some of the biggest are traded on the London Stock Exchange, where that country is in the process of legalizing online gambling. There's now a sports book for every taste. Costa Rican site Bodog.com uses ads with leggy models to market to casual sports and poker players, while Pinnacle Sports is heavy on numbers rather than art, attracting regulars or "sharpies."

Like other major Internet companies, Sportingbet has a full-fledged advertising campaign that consists of billboards and television ads in the United States. The company has a billboard in New York's Times Square and in several other major cities, including Las Vegas.

"Vegas is where all our customers go," Czajkowski said. "But you can't just jump on a plane to Vegas every time you want to place a bet."

Sportingbet, which is headquartered in London and operates its computer servers from the Caribbean island of Antigua, isn't a law-abiding company, according to the Justice Department. Online sports betting also is considered illegal in Nevada, which prevents the transmission and placement of wagers by entities that aren't licensed by the state Gaming Control Board and Nevada Gaming Commission.

The Justice Department says Internet gambling is illegal in the United States based on a law known as the Wire Act. Some legal experts say the law, intended to combat illegal bookmaking by the Mafia in the 1960s, is outdated and doesn't apply to traditional casino games and poker games played online. But they generally agree that sports books are on much shakier legal ground.

"I think the law is fairly clear that if you're accepting (sports wagers) from the U.S., you're probably violating the Wire Act," Las Vegas attorney and Internet gambling expert Tony Cabot said.

The law was clarified in 2000 when Jay Cohen became the first person to be convicted for running an offshore gambling operation that accepted bets from Americans. That case determined that the bets occurred both in the United States and Antigua, and that Cohen violated U.S. law.

That hasn't deterred Internet operators, who say they are licensed in foreign countries where the wagers are accepted.

After the Cohen case, the Justice Department began sending out letters to media companies that took Internet gambling ads saying they could be "aiding and abetting" illegal activity. The feds took it one step further with The Sporting News Internet and print publications. In January, the company agreed to a $7.2 million settlement with the government for advertising online gambling sites. The settlement requires the Sporting News to run public service radio ads telling listeners that online gambling is illegal. Those spots have run nationwide, including in Las Vegas.

Sportingbet and other operators have found creative ways to promote their wares in the United States, particularly around events like March Madness. The company has still had difficulty running television ads, even ads for the company's educational sports tips Web site, called sportsbook.net.

"The Department of Justice has scared media owners into submission," Czajkowski said. "That was a few years ago, and every now and then (the DOJ) will send a letter around or make a few calls. Everyone is still pretty jittery about it."

The company's preferred marketing method is billboards, which are grabbing the attention of potential customers while appearing to fall under the government's radar screen.

BetOnSports, another top sports book, also has an aggressive ad campaign that includes billboards as well as taxicab signs, public transit posters and radio spots.

"It's been a struggle" to advertise under the Justice Department's watch, Betonsports.com spokesman Kevin Smith said. The company, also traded on the London Stock Exchange, is based in Costa Rica but is licensed in Antigua, where its computer servers take bets.

Instead of promoting a nongambling ".net" site like other Internet sites have done, the company's radio ads simply mention the "Betonsports" brand and an 800 number where callers can learn sports lingo and betting tips. That number is different from the number customers call to make a bet, Smith said.

Like any maturing industry, online books are aiming to grow by diversifying their businesses beyond just sports. Many now offer other casino games and have been particularly successful capitalizing on poker, which attracts many people who also bet sports.

"There's a great synergy between the two," Czajowski said. "People come online to play poker, and they're comfortable going and making a sports bet on the side."

Last year Sportingbet reconfigured its various Web brands so that customers can jump from one game or bet to another without registering all over again. Within seconds, customers can take their poker winnings and use that to bet on basketball, for example. Sites also are looking to expand beyond the United States, where business is expected to grow more slowly than other parts of the world in the years to come in part because of regulatory uncertainty.

Betonsports.com recently acquired an Asian sports book and is heating up its marketing efforts in Asia, one of the fastest-growing markets for gamblers, Smith said.

Meanwhile, sports fans across the United States are becoming more comfortable with online books in large part because of widespread televised broadcasts of poker tournaments and the mainstream appeal of online poker. Professional gamblers are abandoning longtime relationships with illegal bookies and gravitating online, experts say.

Illegal bookies maintain one key advantage: most accept bets without requiring the cash up front.

While bettors often pride themselves on their in-depth knowledge of a particular sport or even buy recommendations at hefty prices, a successful sports bet often turns on the difference between a point or even a half a point.

For bettors like Fezzik, that means refining their search for the best line - a search that's far easier to do online.

"You can drive around to 10 sports books in town and it'll take you three hours or you can look at 10 sports books online in three minutes," said Ted Sevransky, a local sports handicapper and radio personality known as "Teddy Covers."

Like the search for an undervalued stock, more sports bettors are approaching their bets like investments. Sports bettors now use sophisticated tools such as computer software that can post lines for more than 50 online sports books on one screen, allowing the bettor to find the best offer in seconds.

"The more sports books you visit the more chance you have of finding a game that's slightly misspriced," Sevransky said.

Searching for the best line most often separates the winners from the losers, Fezzik said. Online books will have better lines some of the time but not always, as in the case of the Texas-West Virginia game, he said.

"The most important aspect of sports betting is to get the best number," he said.

There's other advantages to betting online, gamblers say. Besides a shot at better odds, online sports books sometimes offer a reduced vigorish, or the fee bettors pay the casino to place a bet. While Las Vegas casinos typically offer $100 for every winning bet of $110, some Internet sites offer $100 on a $105 bet - a big difference for gamblers wagering hundreds or thousands of dollars at a pop.

Then there are other special offers, like million-dollar contests that are similar to casino contests but may offer bigger prizes because of the greater number of potential customers online promotions can attract.

Las Vegas casinos ultimately will benefit from the growth of online sports books, experts say.

"Ultimately it's good for the casinos," said Anthony Curtis, publisher of the Las Vegas Advisor consumer newsletter. "They'll get more players, more of them will come to Vegas, and when they're in Vegas, they'll make sports bets."

Czajkowski, a frequent visitor to Las Vegas, said online betting will never replace the real thing.

"Online gamblers love coming to Vegas - you haven't lived until you've been to Vegas." Liz Benston can be reached at 259-4077 or at benston@lasvegassun.com.

NCAA Gets Proactive On Gambling (KDKA-TV)

KDKA-TV, March 24, 2006

(CBS) ATLANTA Before the West Virginia Mountaineers took the practice court Thursday, the team had a little sit-down — with the FBI.

Special agent Tom Metz was invited by the NCAA to explain to the players how gambling on sports, especially on games involving their own teams, could ruin their lives, reports CBS News correspondent Jim Acosta.

"You have a lot of people out there. They want to be your friends for the wrong reasons," Metz tells the West Virginia players, who face Texas on Thursday night in the Sweet 16 of the tournament.

"We are trying to say to the student-athlete [that] they have a lot to lose," Metz adds.

NCAA gambling official Rachel Newman-Baker told the players, "If it's an NCAA-sponsored sport at either the college or professional level, you would not be allowed to bet on it, OK?"

This year athletic officials expanded their anti-betting program from the tournament's Final Four teams to the Sweet 16. It's an admission that the problem is bigger than the NCAA once thought.

Three years ago, an NCAA survey found 29 percent of its Division I male athletes had bet on sports — and that 2 percent had actually been asked to throw a game. Forget the figures on the scoreboard, those are the numbers that make the NCAA nervous.

The NCAA's biggest fear is "point-shaving," where gamblers manipulate players into missing shots or playing weak defense in order to bring the final score within the "point spread" set by oddsmakers in Las Vegas, where betting on the games is legal. A difference of a couple of points in the final score can mean winning or losing hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Stevin Smith was sent to prison for shaving points at Arizona State University in the early 90s. "I made a hell of a mistake that cost me my NBA career," Smith says.

Smith plays now in Russia. In a rare interview, he told CBS News that the pre-game lectures will make a difference.

"That's something that should have happened a long time ago. I think it would have prevented some things. It would have prevented me from doing what I did ... had I known the consequences," Smith admits.

West Virginia coach John Beilein welcomed the FBI visit.

"I wish they listened to me that attentively in some of our meetings because our guys were on the edge of their seat," Beilein says.

Just in case, the NCAA stays in constant contact with gambling officials in Las Vegas, as well as with the FBI, to get the message across.

Former Financier Resentenced To Prison (AP)

By MATT APUZZO, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 24, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. — A federal judge ordered Martin Frankel on Thursday to serve the same sentence he got in 2004 for stealing $200 million from insurance companies — nearly 17 years in a federal prison.

The former financier was ordered resentenced after a Supreme Court ruling last year gave judges more leeway in their use of sentencing guidelines.

During a brief hearing in U.S. District Court, Judge Ellen B. Burns said she saw no reason to alter the sentence.

"It seemed to me, that was the appropriate sentence to impose," she said.

Frankel, 51, wearing baggy brown prison scrubs and large glasses, stroked a long gray beard that he grew in prison as Burns reread the 200-month sentence. He spoke only briefly, asking Burns to note that he is at risk in prison.

Burns said she would. Defense attorney William Koch elaborated after court, saying the highly publicized case, which inspired two books, made Frankel "particularly vulnerable" to physical assaults in prison.

He will be eligible for release in 2015, according to the U.S. Bureau of Prisons. Frankel is serving his sentence at the federal prison in Otisville, N.Y.

Frankel was convicted of taking over and looting insurance companies in Arkansas, Mississippi, Oklahoma, Missouri and Tennessee.

He bought the insurance companies through a trust set up to hide his involvement, since he was barred from securities trading because of a similar scheme he committed years before in Ohio.

He claimed that he was investing the companies' assets, but instead stole the $200 million to pay for a two-house compound in Greenwich, luxury cars and several girlfriends, some of whom he met through ads for kinky sex.

Prosecutors said Frankel was motivated by greed, sexual desire and a lust for the high life.

Frankel fled the country in May 1999 shortly after a meeting with Mississippi regulators, who questioned his management of several insurance companies.

He was arrested in Germany four months later and pleaded guilty to 24 counts of fraud and racketeering in 2002.

U.S. Files Penny-Stock Mob Case (WSJ)

By Chad Bray

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

NEW YORK -- Men the government identifies as members of the reputed Colombo and Luchese organized-crime families were charged with manipulating the market for penny stocks as part of a broader racketeering case in Brooklyn.

In an indictment unsealed yesterday, the Justice Department's U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn alleged that at least six of 10 men the Federal Bureau of Investigation arrested on racketeering charges secretly controlled at least 15 branch offices of brokerage firms in the New York City boroughs of Brooklyn, Manhattan and Staten Island, through which the men ran a scheme to artificially inflate the price of the stocks.

Prosecutors said brokers misrepresented prospects of certain stocks to potential investors in exchange for large commissions. They said the defendants then sold their holdings in those stocks at inflated values, costing investors $20 million.

Named in the indictment specifically as operating through the branch offices were John Baudanza, 36 years old; Jerry Degerolamo, 34; Arthur Gunning, 40; Craig Leszczak, 31; Craig Marino, 36, and Robert Podlog, 32. Also indicted and arrested were Ronald Giallanzo, 35; Vincent Rossetti, 40; Joseph Baudanza, 61; and Carmine Baudanza, 63. Charges range from racketeering and extortion to conspiracy and securities fraud.

Joel Winograd, a lawyer for Joseph Baudanza, said his client has asserted his innocence and believes the indictment is a "farce." "He awaits his day in court and he will be vindicated at the end of this proceeding," Mr. Winograd said. "He knows as much about stocks as Joseph Stalin."

Michael Rosen, a lawyer for Mr. Podlog, said the indictment is merely an allegation and everyone who is charged with a crime is presumed innocent. "Any federal judge will tell you the indictment is nothing," Mr. Rosen said. "Evidence comes from the witness stand. We have had no witnesses."

A lawyer for Mr. Marino declined to comment; lawyers for the others couldn't be reached for comment.

Prosecutors allege the prices of more than a dozen stocks were artificially manipulated. They included shares of:

Legends Sports Inc., Axxess Inc., HTTP Technology Inc., Learner's World Inc., Rollerball International Inc., SIMS Communications Inc., Flexweight Corp., Rick's Cabaret International Inc., Blini Hut Inc., Orex Gold Mines Corp., Motorsports USA, Evans Systems Inc., Silver Star Foods and America's Hedge Fund.

Many of the stocks, which were allegedly referred to as "house stocks" by the defendants, were traded on the OTC Bulletin Board or the Nasdaq small-cap stock market (later renamed Nasdaq Capital Market), the government said. They were mostly small companies, start-ups or companies that did no business at all, according to the indictment.

Woman, 24, Says Neighbor Held Her Captive For 10 Years (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

A girl who vanished more than 10 years ago was reunited yesterday with her mother in a Pittsburgh suburb two days after confiding to a store owner that she was being held captive, the police said.

DOJ_NMG_0020897

"I guess she just chose me to lean on," said Joe Sparico, owner of J. J.'s Deli Mart in McKeesport, Pa., where the young woman, Tanya Nicole Kach, broke into tears on Tuesday while telling him that she was living with a man against her will. "I'm just glad she's happy and home now."

Ms. Kach, now 24, was 14 when she was reported missing on Feb. 10, 1996, after walking out of her father's house, two miles from where she said she had lived in secrecy.

"We're investigating this further, but I have to tell you there is still a lot we need to figure out," said Charles Moffatt, superintendent of the Allegheny County Police Department.

Ms. Kach said she had been living against her will with Thomas Hose, 48, a security guard at Cornell Intermediate School in McKeesport, where Ms. Kach was an eighth grader when she was reported missing, Mr. Moffatt said. For the first four years of captivity, she told the police, she was never permitted to leave the two-bedroom house, and Mr. Hose threatened to kill her if she told anyone about her captivity.

Locked in his bedroom, she was often forced to use a metal can for a toilet, she said, and even though he shared the house with his parents and his 22-year-old son, he forbade anyone to let her out, Ms. Kach told Mr. Sparico. In later years, Ms. Kach said, she was allowed to leave during the day, but she said she never spoke about her situation because she believed Mr. Hose's threats.

"I was so scared that nobody would believe me," Ms. Kach told WTAE-TV on Wednesday from the home of her father, Jerry Kach, in Elizabeth, a Pittsburgh suburb.

Mr. Sparico said, "From the way she was shaking when she told me, I think she really believed he would do it."

On Tuesday, after growing close to Mr. Sparico and his family over eight months, she revealed her secret.

"If you go to a Web site for missing children, you will see a picture of me there," he said she told him.

Mr. Sparico's wife, Janet, said Ms. Kach had told her in recent days that when she was in the eighth grade her parents were going through a contentious divorce and that she was convinced neither parent wanted her, leading her to run away.

At the time, Ms. Kach said, she had a crush on Mr. Hose, and when she confided her plans to leave home, he offered to take her in, Ms. Sparico said. "After that, I guess he never let her go," she added.

It was unclear why Ms. Kach did not seek help sooner, Superintendent Moffatt said, "but in my view, that part doesn't much matter, because you can't be 14 and make an adult decision that you want to be involved with an adult in this way."

Mr. Hose's lawyer, James M. Ecker, said his client was innocent. Mr. Hose has been charged with one count of statutory sexual assault and three counts of involuntary deviate sexual intercourse and released on $200 bail. "I think if the police believed she was being held against her will or that she was physically abused, they would have charged him with kidnapping or abuse," Mr. Ecker said. "But they didn't."

A woman who answered the phone at Mr. Hose's house said she had no comment.

Ms. Sparico said of Ms. Kach, "She was always well put together, like a little Barbie doll, and I never saw any signs of physical abuse."

She added, "But I have spoken with her quite a bit and I think that she was really brainwashed by this guy."

After Ms. Kach told her secret to Mr. Sparico, he said he immediately called his son Shawn, a retired detective with the McKeesport police who had worked on Ms. Kach's case.

Interviewed by WTAE-TV, Ms. Kach's mother, Sherri Koehnke, said, "It's the best ending I could have thought about when I thought about what could have happened to her."

Daughter's Reappearance Answered Mother's Prayers (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

USA Today, March 24, 2006

For 10 years Sherri Koehnke of West Mifflin, Pa., bore the mystery of her daughter's disappearance in near silence. She cried in private, and only a handful of her friends knew that Tanya Kach went missing at age 14, said Koehnke's husband, Craig.

Then the couple joined a church and, three weeks ago, Sherri Koehnke told the pastor and started praying for her daughter's return.

This week, Kach, now 24, turned up alive and well.

Allegheny County Police Superintendent Charles Moffatt said Kach was a runaway and had been living at the home of a security guard from her middle school who held her indoors for four years. He told her she was stupid and unwanted by anyone but him, Kach said. She was just 2 miles from her father's house she had fled in McKeesport, Pa.

Thomas Hose, 48, was suspended from his job Thursday and arrested on charges of statutory sexual assault and involuntary deviate sexual intercourse. His lawyer, James Ecker, said Hose did not hold the girl against her will.

Kach had been living under a different name, Nikki Allen, and later became a regular customer at J.J.'s Deli Mart in McKeesport, owner Joseph Sparico said.

"She just wanted to have somebody as a friend, somebody to talk to," Sparico said. "You've got to understand, this girl hadn't been in the outside world.

"I'd ask her questions about why she was there and why she was with an older gentleman," Sparico recalled.

On Tuesday, the neatly dressed blonde opened up. "She said 'I just want to find my father,' " Sparico said. " 'If you go on a website, you'll see that I've been missing for 10 years.' "

Sparico contacted the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. Kach and her father, Jerry Kach, were reunited Wednesday. Sherri Koehnke and Tanya had talked with each other but not met as of Thursday evening.

Kach is among 14 missing children found alive after 10 or more years, according to the center.

"The Lord answered our prayers. It's just that simple," Craig Koehnke said.

Evidence Of Wiretaps Used In Suit (NYT)

By David M. Halbfinger and Allison Hope Weiner

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

LOS ANGELES, March 23 — A screenwriter and his lawyer talk on the phone. They are in the heat of legal battle with a big-time producer over the profits from a hit movie. The lawyer says which of their arguments he thinks are strongest and how much he thinks their opponents will agree to pay in a settlement.

A New Account of an Old Bank Account Unbeknownst to both of them, Anthony Pellicano is listening in, and taking notes, court filings say.

Mr. Pellicano, the celebrity detective charged with wiretapping and conspiracy in the biggest Hollywood scandal in generations, stands accused of intercepting conversations of scores of unwitting people, many involved in high-profile lawsuits.

But what the federal indictment of Mr. Pellicano failed to spell out was just how he put his wiretaps to use.

Now, the first direct evidence of eavesdropping by Mr. Pellicano has surfaced in newly filed court documents: excerpts of what prosecutors have described as Mr. Pellicano's summaries of conversations he intercepted in 2001 between Vincent Zenga, a screenwriter and producer known as Bo, and his lawyer, Gregory S. Dovel, during their contentious suit against the influential Hollywood executive Brad Grey, now head of Paramount Pictures.

No victim figures more prominently in the indictment than Mr. Zenga, who has been advised by prosecutors that his phone was wiretapped over three months in early 2001. At a pivotal point in that suit, prosecutors say, Mr. Pellicano obtained personal information illegally on seven people involved in the suit against Mr. Grey — including Mr. Zenga's lawyer, his wife, his brother and a former business partner.

Such information was often used to arrange a wiretap, and prosecutors have told Mr. Dovel and Mr. Zenga that Mr. Pellicano intercepted their calls, including some in which Mr. Dovel tipped his hand on their legal strategy.

Prosecutors, Mr. Dovel said, gave him a sampling of Mr. Pellicano's notes on those intercepts so the lawyer-client privilege could be waived, freeing the government to use the notes against Mr. Pellicano. Mr. Dovel, in turn, has incorporated those notes into an amended complaint, filed Thursday in California Superior Court in Los Angeles.

Mr. Zenga's suit now accuses Mr. Pellicano; his accomplices; Mr. Grey; his company, Brillstein-Grey Entertainment; his lawyer, Bert Fields; and Mr. Fields's law firm, Greenberg Glusker Fields Claman Machtinger & Kinsella, of invasion of privacy, disclosure of confidential information and illegal wiretapping.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Grey, Janet Hill, called the complaint "meritless," saying, "Brad Grey has no knowledge of wiretapping or any other illegal conduct by Mr. Pellicano."

Mr. Fields has denied knowing of any illicit acts by Mr. Pellicano. His lawyer, John W. Keker, could not be reached. The lead prosecutor, Daniel A. Saunders, declined to comment.

"If any wiretapping took place, it was not done at the direction or with the knowledge of Greenberg Glusker or any attorney in that firm," said Brian A. Sun, a lawyer representing the firm. "We believe that like Mr. Zenga's first lawsuit, any claims in this lawsuit against Brillstein-Grey or Greenberg Glusker are wholly lacking in merit."

Steven F. Gruel, Mr. Pellicano's lawyer, said he had not seen the new complaint, but called it "puzzling" that the government had given evidence to Mr. Dovel that had yet to be shared with the criminal defendants.

The government has not presented any evidence that Mr. Pellicano turned his notes over to Mr. Grey or to any of his lawyers, none of whom have been charged.

In addition, any prosecution that relies on Mr. Zenga's credibility may start out at a serious disadvantage: Mr. Zenga was found by a California appeals court to have repeatedly lied — in his business dealings with Mr. Grey's company and under oath in the lawsuit. He asserted his Fifth Amendment right not to incriminate himself in refusing to answer hundreds of questions under oath, and was barred from testifying at trial; his suit against Mr. Grey was thrown out of court for lack of evidence.

The new lawsuit seeks to overturn the trial court's ruling. Mr. Zenga declined to comment for this article.

The dispute between Mr. Zenga and Mr. Grey grew out of Mr. Zenga's contention that he had made an oral agreement with Brillstein-Grey Entertainment to be producing partners in a film project that became the hit 2000 comedy "Scary Movie." In his lawsuit, Mr. Zenga claimed that Mr. Grey cut him out of an equal share of the movie's profits.

A New Account of an Old Bank Account Mr. Grey's lawyers argued that there was no such deal, and that Mr. Zenga had agreed in writing to take less money and misrepresented his credentials to Mr. Grey's company.

In his deposition in September 2000, Mr. Zenga was questioned extensively about his background, including his winning a screenwriting contest held by Hanover Square Productions in 1992. After denying under oath that he knew who ran Hanover Square, Mr. Zenga recanted a day later, saying he had been "overmedicated." Mr. Zenga admitted that he owned the company with a partner, Stacy Codikow, but insisted the contest was her project and that his only role in it was as an entrant.
