(1) Article I, section 8, of the Constitution provides that the Congress has the power to ''constitute Tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court; ... define and punish ... Offenses against the Law of Nations; ... make Rules concerning Captures on Land and Water; ... make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof''.

(2) The Supreme Court has repeatedly recognized military tribunals, as stated in Madsen v. Kinsella 343 U.S. 341, 1952, ''[s]ince our nation's earliest days, such tribunals have been constitutionally recognized agencies for meeting many urgent governmental responsibilities related to war....They have taken many forms and borne many names. Neither their procedure nor their jurisdiction has been prescribed by statute. It has been adapted in each instance to the need that called it forth.'' Madsen, citing In re Yamashita, 327 U.S. 1 (1946).

(3) The President has inherent authority to convene military tribunals arising from his role as Commander and Chief of the Armed Forces under article II of the Constitution and from title 10 of the United States Code. Due to the extraordinary circumstances of the ongoing war on terrorism, it is appropriate for Congress to provide additional and explicit authorization of and procedures for military tribunals to adjudicate and punish offenses relating to the war on terrorism.

(4) This Act is in direct response to the United State Supreme Court's ruling in Rasul v. Bush. With the passage of this Act, the 109th Congress will have addressed the concerns of the Supreme Court's Rasul majority, and therefore alien enemy combatants detained or prosecuted under this Act may not challenge their detentions in the Federal courts of the United States via the habeas or any other statute.

SEC. 2. DEFINITIONS.

As used in this Act, the following definitions apply:

the Committee on Armed Services of the Senate and the Committee on the Judiciary and the Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives.

SEC. 3. AUTHORIZING MILITARY COMMISSIONS.

The President is authorized to establish military commissions for the trial of individuals for offenses as provided in this Act.

SEC. 4. JURISDICTION.

(a) UNPRIVILEGED COMBATANTS.—This Act establishes exclusive jurisdiction to hear any matter involving an unprivileged combatant who has been detained by the Department of Defense for not less than 180 consecutive days at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

(b) OFFENSES.—

(1) CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS.—A commission shall have jurisdiction to hear any criminal prosecution involving international terrorism, including any offense under chapter 113B of title 18, United States Code.

(2) OFFENSES AGAINST THE LAWS OF WAR.—A commission shall have exclusive jurisdiction over violations of the laws of war committed by unprivileged combatants.

(3) OTHER OFFENSES.—A commission shall have jurisdiction over other offenses traditionally tri-able by military commissions or pursuant to the Department of Defense's Military Commission Instruction Number Two.

SEC. 5. APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

(a) FINAL DECISIONS.—The United States Court of Military Appeals shall have exclusive jurisdiction of appeals from all final decisions of a classification tribunal board or commission under this Act.

(b) REVIEW BY SUPREME COURT.—

(1) CERTIORARI.—The decisions of the United States Court of Military Appeals are subject to review by the Supreme Court by writ of certiorari.

(2) EXEMPTION FROM CERTAIN PETITION REQUIREMENTS.—A person who files a petition for a writ of certiorari under paragraph (1) shall not be required to submit—

(A) prepayment of any fees and costs or security therefor; or

(B) the affidavit required by section 1915(a) of title 28, United States Code.

(c) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Section 1005 of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 (10 U.S.C. 801 note) is amended—

(A) in subsection (e), by striking paragraphs (2) through (4); and

(B) by striking subsection (h) and inserting the following:

''(h) EFFECTIVE DATE.—This section shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.''.

(2) HABEAS.—Section 2241(e) of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(A) in the matter preceding paragraph (1), by striking ''section 1005 of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005'' and inserting ''the Unprivileged Combatant Act of 2006'';

(B) by striking paragraph (2)(B) and inserting the following:

''(B) has been determined by a classification tribunal to meet the requirements of paragraph (1) or (2) of section 9(a) of the Unprivileged Combatant Act of 2006.''.

SEC. 6. COMMISSION.

(a) COMMISSION PERSONNEL.—

(1) MEMBERS.—

(A) APPOINTMENT.—The Secretary of Defense shall designate no less than 12 United States military judges to serve as members of

1 a commission and to assume other duties as-
2 signed in this Act.
3 (B) NUMBER OF MEMBERS.—Each com-
4 mission shall consist of at least 3 military offi-
5 cers, at least one of whom shall be a military
6 judge.
7 (C) ALTERNATE MEMBERS.—For each
8 such commission, there shall also be 1 or 2 al-
9 ternate members. The alternate member or 10 members shall attend all sessions of the com-
11 mission. In case of incapacity, resignation, or 12 removal of any member, an alternate member
13 shall take the place of that member.
14 (D) QUALIFICATIONS.—Each member and
15 alternate member of the commission shall be a
16 military officer.
17 (E) PRESIDING OFFICER.—
18 (i) IN GENERAL.—From among the
19 members of the commission, the Secretary
20 of Defense shall designate a presiding offi-
21 cer who is a military judge to preside over
22 the proceedings of that commission.
23 (ii) DUTIES.—The duties of the pre-
24 siding officer shall be as follows:

1 (I) The presiding officer shall
2 admit or exclude evidence at trial in
3 accordance with the rules of this Act.
4 The presiding officer shall have au-
5 thority to close proceedings or por-
6 tions of proceedings in accordance
7 with this Act or for any other reason
8 necessary for the conduct of a full and 9 fair trial.
10 (II) The presiding officer shall 11 ensure that the discipline, dignity, and 12 decorum of the proceedings are main-
13 tained, shall exercise control over the 14 proceedings to ensure proper imple-
15 mentation of the President's Military
16 Order and this Act, and shall have au-
17 thority to act upon any contempt or
18 breach of commission rules and proce-
19 dures. Any attorney authorized to ap-
20 pear before a commission who is
21 thereafter found not to satisfy the re-
22 quirements for eligibility or who fails
23 to comply with laws, rules, regula-
24 tions, or other orders applicable to the 25 commission proceedings or any other

1 individual who violates such laws,
2 rules, regulations, or orders may be
3 disciplined as the presiding officer
4 deems appropriate, including revoca-
5 tion of eligibility to appear before that
6 commission. The Court may further
7 revoke that attorney's or any other
8 person's eligibility to appear before
9 any other commission convened under 10 this Act.
11 (III) The presiding officer shall 12 ensure the expeditious conduct of the 13 trial. In no circumstance shall accom-
14 modation of counsel be allowed to 15 delay proceedings unreasonably.
16 (IV) The presiding officer may 17 certify interlocutory questions to the 18 Military Commission Review Panel for 19 the Armed Forces as the presiding of-
20 ficer deems appropriate.
21 (b) POWERS OF A COMMISSION.—A commission shall 22 have the following powers:
23 (1) To summon witnesses to the trial and to re-
24 quire their attendance and testimony and to put 25 questions to them.

1 (2) To require the production of documents and
2 other evidentiary material.
3 (3) To administer oaths to witnesses.
4 (4) To appoint officers for the carrying out of 5 any task designated by the commission, including
6 the power to have evidence taken.

7 SEC. 7. PERSONS IN CUSTODY.

8 (a) IN GENERAL.—Not later than 60 days after the 9 date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense
10 shall develop—
11 (1) a complete listing of all persons who—
12 (A) are being detained by the Department
13 of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba; and 14 (B) the Government wishes to continue to 15 detain as an unprivileged combatant; and 16 (2) a detailed summary of the evidence upon
17 which the determination to keep a person described
18 in paragraph (1) in custody was made.
19 (b) CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT.—Not later than 10
20 days after developing the list described in subsection (a),
21 the Secretary of Defense shall submit an unclassified
22 version of that list to the appropriate committees of Con-
23 gress. A classified, unredacted version of that list shall 24 also be submitted to the appropriate committees of Con-
25 gress for review.

1 (c) UPDATED LIST.—The Secretary of Defense shall
2 update the list of the persons described in subsection (a)
3 not less than once every 60 days after the date the list
4 described in subsection (a) is completed.

5 (d) CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT.—Not later than 10
6 days after updating the list of persons under subsection
7 (c), the Secretary of Defense shall submit that updated
8 list to the appropriate committees of Congress in both un-
9 classified and unredacted, classified form.

10 SEC. 8. FIELD TRIBUNALS.

11 (a) IN GENERAL.—Not more than 30 days after a 12 suspected unprivileged combatant has been detained by 13 United States forces, the Department of Defense shall 14 conduct a field tribunal in order to determine whether the 15 detainee is an unprivileged combatant and whether the de-
16 tainee is entitled to the rights afforded under the Geneva
17 Convention.

18 (b) PROCEDURES.—The procedures governing a field
19 tribunal shall be promulgated by the Department of De-
20 fense

21 SEC. 9. CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNALS.

22 (a) IN GENERAL.—A detainee shall be released and 23 repatriated to an appropriate country unless a classifica-
24 tion tribunal board finds by a preponderance of the evi-
25 dence that—

(1) the detainee is a threat to the national security interest of the United States; or

(2) there are reasonable grounds to believe that if released the detainee would take up arms against the United States.

(b) COMPLIANCE WITH GENEVA CONVENTIONS.—If a detainee is found to be a privileged combatant entitled to provisions under the Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, done at Geneva, August 12, 1948 (6 UST 3516), then the detainee must be treated in accordance with that convention.

(c) CITIZEN OF THE UNITED STATES.—If a detainee is found to be a citizen of the United States of America, the detainee shall not be held or tried under this Act.

(d) CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNAL BOARD.—A classification tribunal shall be conducted by a board appointed by the Secretary of Defense and consist solely of line officers, one of whom shall be an attorney.

(1) IN GENERAL.—If a classification tribunal board finds that a detainee meets the requirements of subsection (a), the classification tribunal board shall order that the detainee shall continue to be detained by the Department of Defense, subject to periodic review under subsection (h).

1 (2) TIME PERIOD.—The time period for the de-
2 tention of a detainee under paragraph (1) may not
3 exceed the time period that United States forces are 4 engaged in combat operations as defined by the De-
5 partment of Defense in the nation or theater where 6 the detainee was captured so long as the detainee is 7 found to be a privileged combatant.
8 (3) CONCLUSION OF COMBAT.—At the conclu-
9 sion of combat operations within a given theater or 10 nation—
11 (A) a privileged combatant that was cap-
12 tured in that area shall be either indicted under 13 this Act or repatriated to the appropriate coun-
14 try; and
15 (B) an unprivileged combatant may con-
16 tinue to be detained pursuant to subsection (a).
17 (f) CONSIDERATIONS.—
18 (1) IN GENERAL.—In making a determination
19 under subsection (a), a classification tribunal board
20 shall consider any information brought to its atten-
21 tion regarding the need for continued detention, in-
22 cluding—
23 (A) the detainee's alleged position or rank
24 in any hostile organization;

1 (B) the activities of that hostile organiza-
2 tion;
3 (C) any statements made by the detainee
4 in response to interrogation; and
5 (D) the detainee's history of violence or 6 terrorist activity.
7 (2) PRIMA FACIE EVIDENCE.—If the Govern-
8 ment represents that a detainee was captured during 9 a military engagement while taking up arms against,
10 or supporting military operations against, the Armed 11 Forces of the United States or its allies, there shall 12 be prima facie evidence that, if released, the detainee
13 would take up arms against the United States.
14 (g) TIMING.—A detainee shall be afforded a classi-
15 fication tribunal as soon as is reasonably practicable but 16 not later than 180 days after the detainee's capture and 17 not later than 30 days after the detainee is listed under
19 (h) PERIODIC REVIEW.—
20 (1) IN GENERAL.—
21 (A) SEMIANNUAL REVIEW.—The classifica-
22 tion tribunal shall conduct a classification hear-
23 ing for each detainee not less frequently than 24 every 180 days, in accordance with the proce-

1 dures established under this section and section
3 (B) ACTION PERIOD.—A detainee appre-
4 hended during a military engagement while tak-
5 ing up arms against, or supporting military op-
6 erations against, the Armed Forces of the 7 United States or its allies may be detained until 8 the cessation of armed hostilities in the nation
9 or region in which they were captured.
10 (2) ARGUMENT.—The Government and the de-
11 tainee may be heard regarding the review under 12 paragraph (1).
13 SEC. 10. CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNAL PROCEDURES.
14 (a) DETAINEES.—
15 (1) IN GENERAL.—A detainee shall not be re-
16 quired to testify or present any evidence at a classi-
17 fication tribunal.
18 (2) PRESENCE.—A detainee shall be entitled to 19 be present at the classification tribunal, unless the 20 head of the tribunal has decided to admit classified
21 information.
22 (b) COUNSEL.—
23 (1) IN GENERAL.—A detainee is entitled to the 24 assistance of counsel admitted to practice under this 25 Act at every stage of the classification tribunal, in-

1 cluding the periodic review of orders under sub-
2 section (e).
3 (2) RIGHT TO APPOINTED COUNSEL.—A de-
4 tainee who is unable to obtain counsel is entitled to 5 have counsel admitted to practice before a commis-
6 sion under this Act.
7 (3) REFUSAL OF COUNSEL.—A detainee may
8 waive counsel but shall not be entitled to protected
9 information.
10 (c) DISCOVERY.—
11 (1) GOVERNMENT'S DISCLOSURE.—Not later
12 than 3 days prior to the classification tribunal, the 13 Government shall make available for inspection by 14 counsel for the detainee any affidavit or affirmation
15 the Government intends to offer in support of con-
16 tinuing to detain the detainee. A classification tri-
17 bunal board shall maintain a copy of any submis-
18 sions made by the Government for inspection by the 19 detainee and for transmittal, if necessary, to that 20 tribunal.
21 (2) DETAINEE'S DISCLOSURE.—If the detainee
22 chooses to submit any evidence, such evidence, in-
23 cluding a list of any witnesses the detainee intends
24 to call, shall be made available to the Government

1 for inspection not later than 3 days prior to the clas-
2 sification tribunal.
3 (d) EVIDENCE.—
4 (1) IN GENERAL.—The Federal Rules of Evi-
5 dence shall not apply to a classification tribunal.
6 (2) ADMISSIBILITY STANDARD.—Evidence shall
7 be admitted if the classification tribunal board deter-
8 mines the evidence would have probative value to a
9 reasonable person.
10 (3) AFFIDAVIT OR AFFIRMATION.—The Govern-
11 ment may proceed by proffer and submit any rel-
12 evant information by affidavit or affirmation, unless 13 decided unreliable by the members of the classifica-
14 tion tribunal board.
15 (4) CROSS-EXAMINATION.—
16 (A) GOVERNMENT WITNESSES.—If a Gov-
17 ernment chooses to call witnesses, the detainee
18 may cross-examine those witnesses on all rel-
19 evant facts.
20 (B) DETAINEE WITNESSES.—If a detainee
21 calls any witnesses, they shall be subject to
22 cross examination.
23 (C) DETAINEE.—If the detainee chooses to 24 testify, the detainee shall be subject to cross-ex-
25 amination.

1 (e) DEFENSES.—A detainee may challenge whether
2 the detainee satisfies the elements required under sub-
3 section (a).
4 (f) PROCEEDINGS.—
5 (1) IN GENERAL.—A classification tribunal
6 shall be closed to the public.
7 (2) SECURITY CLEARANCES.—Each person
8 present at a classification tribunal, other than the 9 detainee, shall possess a security clearance appro-
10 priate to the level of any classified information being 11 presented.
12 (3) PUBLIC INFORMATION REGARDING PRO-
13 CEEDINGS.—After the classification tribunal board
14 rules in the classification tribunal, the parties shall 15 propose a nonclassified summary to that board. The 16 board shall publicly release a summary, containing 17 any information generated at the tribunal which can
18 be disclosed in a manner consistent with the Classi-
19 fied Information Procedures Act (18 U.S.C. App.)
20 and the national security of the United States.
21 (g) REINSTITUTING CLASSIFICATION PRO-
22 CEEDINGS.—
23 (1) IN GENERAL.—If a matter involving the 24 classification tribunal of a detainee is dismissed
25 without prejudice by the classification tribunal or withdrawn by the Government at, or prior to, the classification tribunal, the Government may reinstitute the matter with the tribunal board that dismissed or permitted the withdrawal of the matter.

(2) TIME LIMIT.—A complaint reinstituting proceedings under paragraph (1) shall be filed not later than 10 days after the dismissal or withdrawal of the matter.

(3) NUMBER.—The Government may reinstitute proceedings under paragraph (1) not more than twice and only if approved by the ranking member on the classification tribunal board.

SEC. 11. CONTINUANCE OF CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNALS.

(a) CONTINUANCES.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—A classification tribunal board may, for cause shown, grant a continuance of a classification tribunal.

(2) CONTINUANCE.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—Upon motion of the Government, the classification tribunal board may grant a continuance for as long as necessary, but no longer than a 6-month period, under paragraph (1) if the classification tribunal board determines that the detainee is a high level individual in the planning or financ-

1 ing of terrorist activities or the individual pos-
2 sess information vital to the safety of the
3 United States or its citizens.
4 (B) SUBSEQUENT CONTINUANCES.—The
5 Government may obtain subsequent continu-
6 ances for additional 6-month periods so long as
7 the classification tribunal board finds such con-
8 tinuances are necessary to the informational
9 gathering purposes as it related to the national 10 security of the United States.
11 (3) EX PARTE APPLICATIONS.—
12 (A) IN GENERAL.—The Government may 13 move for a continuance under paragraph (1) ex
14 parte.
15 (B) DETAINEE RIGHTS.—A detainee—
16 (i) is not entitled to representation by
17 counsel in connection with any such ex
18 parte motion; and
19 (ii) shall not be given notice of the re-
20 quest for a hearing prior to the ruling of 21 the classification tribunal board on the 22 Government's request for a continuance
23 pursuant to paragraph (2).

1 (b) GRANT OF CONTINUANCE.—For each continu-
2 ance granted under subsection (a), the classification tri-
3 bunal board shall note on the record of the proceedings—
4 (1) the grounds for granting each such continu-
5 ance;
6 (2) the identity of the party requesting the con-
7 tinuance;
8 (3) the new date and time for the tribunal hear-
9 ing; and
10 (4) the reasons that the date under paragraph
11 (3) was chosen.

12 SEC. 12. CRIMINAL PROSECUTION PROCEDURES GEN-
13 ERALLY.

14 (a) COUNSEL.—
15 (1) IN GENERAL.—A defendant in a criminal
16 proceeding under this Act has a right to be rep-
17 resented by counsel admitted to practice before a
18 commission under this Act.
19 (2) APPOINTED COUNSEL.—
20 (A) IN GENERAL.—A defendant who is un-
21 able to obtain counsel is entitled to have counsel
22 appointed and to be represented by such coun-
23 sel at every stage of the proceeding subsequent 24 to being indicted.

1 (B) APPOINTMENT PROCEDURE.—The
2 Secretary of Defense shall determine the rules
3 for appointing counsel to practice before the 4 commission.
5 (b) DISCOVERY.—
6 (1) CLASSIFIED DOCUMENTS AND OBJECTS.—
7 The Government shall provide the defense with ac-
8 cess to evidence the Government intends to intro-
9 duce at trial and with access to evidence known to 10 the Government or which should be known to the 11 Government that tends to exculpate the accused. In-
12 formation disclosed to the defense may not be dis-
13 closed to the defendant if it is classified as defined
14 by this Act. The defense may submit classified infor-
15 mation for review under section 12(b)(2).
16 (2) SEPARATE COMMISSION CONCERNING CLAS-
17 SIFIED INFORMATION.—The Secretary of Defense
18 shall appoint a commission to conduct a thorough
19 review of the classification system for national secu-
20 rity information, including the policy, procedures,
21 and practices of the system. The Secretary of De-
22 fense shall determine what level of security clearance
23 is necessary to conduct the review under this para-
24 graph. No person shall be appointed as a member of 25 the commission who does not have a security clear-

1 ance at or above the level of clearance so designated
2 by the Secretary. The commission shall make rec-
3 ommendations to the Secretary of Defense as to the 4 declassification of information relevant to the trial of 5 detainees.
6 (3) REGULATING DISCOVERY.—
7 (A) IN GENERAL.—A commission may, for
8 good cause, deny, restrict, or defer discovery or 9 inspection, or grant other appropriate relief.
10 (B) EX PARTE REQUEST.—A party may 11 make an ex parte request in writing that a com-
12 mission deny, restrict, or defer discovery or in-
13 spection under subparagraph (A). If the a com-
14 mission grants a request under this subpara-
15 graph, the Commission shall preserve the entire 16 text of the party's request under seal.
17 (C) FAILURE TO COMPLY.—If a party fails
18 to comply with the rules of discovery applicable
19 to a commission, the commission may—
20 (i) order that party to permit the dis-
21 covery or inspection, specify its time, place,
22 and manner, and prescribe other just
23 terms and conditions; or
24 (ii) grant a continuance.
25 (c) OPEN PROCEEDINGS.—

1 (1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in para-
2 graphs (2) and (3), a proceeding before a commis-
3 sion shall be open to the public.
4 (2) CLASSIFIED INFORMATION.—
5 (A) IN GENERAL.—Upon motion by the
6 Government, a proceeding before a commission
7 shall be closed to the public if necessary to 8 avoid disclosure of classified information.
9 (B) NONDISCLOSURE.—A priority under
10 subparagraph (A) shall not disclose any infor-
11 mation presented during a closed session to in-
12 dividuals excluded from such proceeding or part
13 thereof including the defendant.
14 (3) OTHER BASES.—A commission may order
15 that a hearing be held, in whole or in part, in cam-
16 era, if the commission determines—
17 (A) it is appropriate for the security of a
18 witness or a Government employee or to protect 19 public safety; or
20 (B) that an open hearing would deter a 21 witness from testifying freely or prevent the 22 witness from testifying at all.
23 (4) EXTRAJUDICIAL STATEMENTS.—At the dis-
24 cretion of a commission, the commission may issue

1 an order limiting extrajudicial statements by the
2 parties.
3 (d) PROTECTED INFORMATION.—
4 (1) IN GENERAL.—A commission may issue
5 protective orders as necessary to safeguard protected
6 information in a proceeding before that commission.
7 (2) NOTIFICATION.—As soon as practicable, a
8 party shall notify a commission of any intent to offer
9 evidence including protected information .
10 (3) TRIAL RECORD.—
11 (A) IN GENERAL.—All exhibits admitted as
12 evidence but containing protected information
13 shall be sealed and annexed to the record of 14 trial.
15 (B) PROTECTED INFORMATION NOT AD-
16 MITTED.—Any protected information not admit-
17 ted as evidence, but reviewed by a commission
18 in camera and withheld from the defendant's
19 counsel over objection shall be sealed and an-
20 nexed to the record of the trial, with any associ-
21 ated motions and responses and any materials
22 submitted in support thereof, as additional ex-
23 hibits.
24 (e) RECORD OF TRIAL.—

1 (1) REQUIREMENT FOR RECORD.—A record of
2 each proceeding by a commission shall be prepared
3 promptly after the conclusion of the trial.
4 (2) VERBATIM TRANSCRIPT.—The record of
5 trial shall include a verbatim written transcript of all
6 sessions of the trial.
7 (3) EXHIBITS AND OTHER EVIDENCE.—The
8 record of trial shall also include all exhibits and 9 other real or demonstrative evidence, except that 10 photographs may be substituted for any large writ-
11 ten or graphic exhibits and any other real or demon-
12 strative evidence. If a photograph is substituted for 13 an exhibit or other evidence, the Government shall 14 retain the original exhibit or other evidence, respec-
15 tively, until no further appeal of the results of the 16 trial is authorized.
17 (4) CLASSIFIED INFORMATION.—In the case of 18 a conviction of a charge on which classified informa-
19 tion is admitted as evidence by a commission, the 20 copy of the record of trial submitted to the commis-
21 sion shall include the classified information.

22 SEC. 13. TRIAL PROCEDURES FOR UNPRIVILEGED COMBAT-
23 ANTS.

24 (a) SPECIALIZED PROCEDURES.—

1 (1) STANDARD OF PROOF.—All 3 members of a
2 commission shall agree that the defendant is guilty
3 beyond a reasonable doubt for a defendant to be
4 found guilty.
5 (2) RULES OF PROCEDURE.—
6 (A) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in
7 subparagraph (B), the Secretary of Defense
8 shall draft supplementary rules to govern all
9 proceedings under this section.
10 (B) STANDARD.—Evidence is admissible if 11 the Secretary of Defense determines that the 12 evidence would have probative value to a rea-
13 sonable person.
14 (3) FORM OF TRIAL.—Any trial under this sub-
15 section shall take place before 2 military officers or 16 attorneys and at least one military judge.
17 (4) BAD ACTS.—Other bad acts may be consid-
18 ered if they would have fallen within the definition
19 under this Act of either terrorism or terrorist activ-
20 ity and they are deemed to be relevant by a commis-
21 sion including propensity.
22 (b) CUSTODY.—The Department of Defense shall re-
23 tain custody of any person determined by a commission
24 to be unprivileged combatants after the person has been 25 either convicted or sentenced in accordance with this Act, unless the Department of Defense deems otherwise. Decisions made by a commission in regards to a detainee's guilt or innocence may be considered by a tribunal when assessing the need to continue the detention of a detainee.

SEC. 14. COMMUNICATION WITH PERSONS IN CUSTODY.

An individual detained, indicted, or convicted under this Act shall only be permitted to communicate with the interpreter assigned to the individual, the counsel representing the individual, prison personnel, and any other individual approved by the Secretary of Defense.

SEC. 15. COMMISSION COUNSEL.

(a) IN GENERAL.—A person shall be admitted to practice before a commission if the person—

(1) is a United States citizen;

(2) has been admitted to the practice of law in a State, district, territory, or possession of the United States, or before a Federal court;

(3) has not been sanctioned or otherwise the subject of disciplinary action by any court, bar, or other competent governmental authority for misconduct;

(4) is eligible for access to information classified at the level of secret as defined by the Department of Defense; and

1 (5) signs a written agreement to comply with
2 all applicable regulations or instructions for counsel,
3 including any rules of court for conduct during the 4 course of proceedings.
5 (b) CONSULTATION WITH COLLEAGUES.—Any per-
6 son admitted under subsection (a) shall not confer with 7 any colleague who does not have the appropriate clearance.
8 (c) SECURITY CLEARANCE.—
9 (1) EXPEDITED CONSIDERATION.—The Sec-
10 retary of Defense shall ensure that a person seeking 11 to be admitted under subsection (a) is timely proc-
12 essed for the security clearance required for access
13 to materials necessary for providing a defendant
14 with effective assistance of counsel.
15 (2) COUNSEL INELIGIBLE FOR CLEARANCE.—If
16 the Secretary of Defense determines a person is not 17 eligible for the necessary security clearance, the per-
18 son shall not be permitted to represent an individual
19 in any proceeding before the Commission. The deter-
20 mination of the Secretary of Defense shall be final 21 and is not subject to appeal to, or other review by,
22 any court of the United States.
23 (d) TRAVEL EXPENSES.—The Secretary of Defense
24 shall reimburse any person not employed by the Govern-
25 ment who is representing an individual before the Com-

1 mission for travel away from the home or regular place
2 of business of the person in connection with such represen-
3 tation. The rates for the payment of travel expenses under 4 this subsection shall be those authorized for employees of
5 agencies under subchapter I of chapter 57 of title 5,
6 United States Code.

The legal mind behind the White House's war on terror.

On December 18th, Colin Powell, the former Secretary of State, joined other prominent Washington figures at FedEx Field, the Redskins' stadium, in a skybox belonging to the team's owner. During the game, between the Redskins and the Dallas Cowboys, Powell spoke of a recent report in the Times which revealed that President Bush, in his pursuit of terrorists, had secretly authorized the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on American citizens without first obtaining a warrant from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, as required by federal law. This requirement, which was instituted by Congress in 1978, after the Watergate scandal, was designed to protect civil liberties and curb abuses of executive power, such as Nixon's secret monitoring of political opponents and the F.B.I.'s eavesdropping on Martin Luther King, Jr. Nixon had claimed that as President he had the "inherent authority" to spy on people his Administration deemed enemies, such as the anti-Vietnam War activist Daniel Ellsberg. Both Nixon and the institution of the Presidency had paid a high price for this assumption. But, according to the Times, since 2002 the legal checks that Congress constructed to insure that no President would repeat Nixon's actions had been secretly ignored.

According to someone who knows Powell, his comment about the article was terse. "It's Addington," he said. "He doesn't care about the Constitution." Powell was referring to David S. Addington, Vice-President Cheney's chief of staff and his longtime principal legal adviser. Powell's office says that he does not recall making the statement. But his former top aide, Lawrence Wilkerson, confirms that he and Powell shared this opinion of Addington.

Most Americans, even those who follow politics closely, have probably never heard of Addington. But current and former Administration officials say that he has played a central role in shaping the Administration's legal strategy for the war on terror. Known as the New Paradigm, this strategy rests on a reading of the Constitution that few legal scholars share—namely, that the President, as Commander-in-Chief, has the authority to disregard virtually all previously known legal boundaries, if national security demands it. Under this framework, statutes prohibiting torture, secret detention, and warrantless surveillance have been set aside. A former high-ranking Administration lawyer who worked extensively on national-security issues said that the Administration's legal positions were, to a remarkable degree, "all Addington." Another lawyer, Richard L. Shiffrin, who until 2003 was the Pentagon's deputy general counsel for intelligence, said that Addington was "an unopposable force."

The overarching intent of the New Paradigm, which was put in place after the attacks of September 11th, was to allow the Pentagon to bring terrorists to justice as swiftly as possible. Criminal courts and military courts, with their exacting standards of evidence and emphasis on protecting defendants' rights, were deemed too cumbersome. Instead, the President authorized a system of detention and interrogation that operated outside the international standards for the treatment of prisoners of war established by the 1949 Geneva Conventions. Terror suspects would be tried in a system of military commissions, in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, devised by the executive branch. The Administration designated these suspects not as criminals or as prisoners of war but as "illegal enemy combatants," whose treatment would be ultimately decided by the President. By emphasizing interrogation over due process, the government intended to preëmpt future attacks before they materialized. In November, 2001, Cheney said of the military commissions, "We think it guarantees that we'll have the kind of treatment of these individuals that we believe they deserve."

Yet, almost five years later, this improvised military model, which Addington was instrumental in creating, has achieved very limited results. Not a single terror suspect has been tried before a military commission. Only ten of the more than seven hundred men who have been imprisoned at Guantánamo have been formally charged with any wrongdoing. Earlier this month, three detainees committed suicide in the camp. Germany and Denmark, along with the European Union and the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, have called for the prison to be closed, accusing the United States of violating internationally accepted standards for humane treatment and due process. The New Paradigm has also come under serious challenge from the judicial branch. Two years ago, in Rasul v. Bush, the Supreme Court ruled against the Administration's contention that the Guantánamo prisoners were beyond the reach of the U.S. court system and could not challenge their detention. And this week the Court is expected to deliver a decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, a case that questions the legality of the military commissions.

For years, Addington has carried a copy of the U.S. Constitution in his pocket; taped onto the back are photocopies of extra statutes that detail the legal procedures for Presidential succession in times of national emergency. Many constitutional experts, however, question his interpretation of the document, especially his views on Presidential power. Scott Horton, a professor at Columbia Law School, and the head of the New York Bar Association's International Law committee, said that Addington and a small group of Administration lawyers who share his views had attempted to "overturn two centuries of jurisprudence defining the limits of the executive branch. They've made war a matter of dictatorial power." The historian Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., who defined Nixon as the extreme example of Presidential overreaching in his book "The Imperial Presidency" (1973), said he believes that Bush "is more grandiose than Nixon." As for the Administration's legal defense of torture, which Addington played a central role in formulating, Schlesinger said, "No position taken has done more damage to the American reputation in the world—ever."

Bruce Fein, a Republican legal activist, who voted for Bush in both Presidential elections, and who served as associate deputy attorney general in the Reagan Justice Department, said that Addington and other Presidential legal advisers had "staked out powers that are a universe beyond any other Administration. This President has made claims that are really quite alarming. He's said that there are no restraints on his ability, as he sees it, to collect intelligence, to open mail, to commit torture, and to use electronic surveillance. If you used the President's reasoning, you could shut down Congress for leaking too much. His war powers allow him to declare anyone an illegal combatant. All the world's a battlefield—according to this view, he could kill someone in Lafayette Park if he wants! It's got the sense of Louis XIV: 'I am the State.' " Richard A. Epstein, a prominent libertarian law professor at the University of Chicago, said, "The President doesn't have the power of a king, or even that of state governors. He's subject to the laws of Congress! The Administration's lawyers are nuts on this issue." He warned of an impending "constitutional crisis," because "their talk of the inherent power of the Presidency seems to be saying that the courts can't stop them, and neither can Congress."

The former high-ranking lawyer for the Administration, who worked closely with Addington, and who shares his political conservatism, said that, in the aftermath of September 11th, "Addington was more like Cheney's agent than like a lawyer. A lawyer sometimes says no." He noted, "Addington never said, 'There is a line you can't cross.' " Although the lawyer supported the President, he felt that his Administration had been led astray. “George W. Bush has been damaged by incredibly bad legal advice,” he said.

David Addington is a tall, bespectacled man of forty-nine, who has a thickening middle, a thatch of gray hair, and a trim gray beard, which gives him the look of a sea captain. He is extremely private; he keeps the door of his office locked at all times, colleagues say, because of the national-security documents in his files. He has left almost no public paper trail, and he does not speak to the press or allow photographs to be taken for news stories. (He declined repeated requests to be interviewed for this article.)

In many ways, his influence in Washington defies conventional patterns. Addington doesn’t serve the President directly. He has never run for elected office. Although he has been a government lawyer for his entire career, he has never worked in the Justice Department. He is a hawk on defense issues, but he has never served in the military.

There are various plausible explanations for Addington’s power, including the force of his intellect and his personality, and his closeness to Cheney, whose political views he clearly shares. Addington has been an ally of Cheney’s since the nineteen-eighties, and has been referred to as “Cheney’s Cheney,” or, less charitably, as “Cheney’s hit man.” Addington’s talent for bureaucratic infighting is such that some of his supporters tend to invoke, with admiration, metaphors involving knives. Juleanna Glover Weiss, Cheney’s former press secretary, said, “David is efficient, discreet, loyal, sublimely brilliant, and, as anyone who works with him knows, someone who, in a knife fight, you want covering your back.” Bradford Berenson, a former White House lawyer, said, “He’s powerful because people know he speaks for the Vice-President, and because he’s an extremely smart, creative, and aggressive public official. Some engage in bureaucratic infighting using slaps. Some use knives. David falls into the latter category. You could make the argument that there are some costs. It introduces a little fear into the policymaking process. Views might be more candidly expressed without that fear. But David is like the Marines. No better friend—no worse enemy.” People who have sparred with him agree. “He’s utterly ruthless,” Lawrence Wilkerson said. A former top national-security lawyer said, “He takes a political litmus test of everyone. If you’re not sufficiently ideological, he would cut the ground out from under you.”

Another reason for Addington’s singular role after September 11th is that he offered legal certitude at a moment of great political and legal confusion, in an Administration in which neither the President, the Vice-President, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of State, nor the national-security adviser was a lawyer. (In the Clinton Administration, all these posts, except for the Vice-Presidency, were held by lawyers at some point.) Neither the Attorney General, John Ashcroft, nor the White House counsel, Alberto Gonzales, had anything like Addington’s familiarity with national-security law. Moreover, Ashcroft’s relations with the White House were strained, and he was left out of the inner circle that decided the most radical legal strategies in the war on terror. Gonzales had more influence, because of his longtime ties to the President, but, as an Administration lawyer put it, “he was an empty suit. He was weak. And he doesn’t know shit about the Geneva Conventions.” Participants in meetings in the White House counsel’s office, in the days immediately after September 11th, have described Gonzales sitting in a wingback chair, asking questions, while Addington sat directly across from him and held forth. “Gonzales would call the meetings,” the former high-ranking lawyer recalled. “But Addington was always the force in the room.” Bruce Fein said that the Bush legal team was strikingly unsophisticated. “There is no one of legal stature, certainly no one like Bork, or Scalia, or Elliot Richardson, or Archibald Cox,” he said. “It’s frightening. No one knows the Constitution—certainly not Cheney.”

Conventional wisdom holds that September 11th changed everything, including the thinking of Cheney and Addington. Brent Scowcroft, the former national-security adviser, has said of Cheney that he barely recognizes the reasonable politician he knew in the past. But a close look at the twenty-year collaboration between Cheney and Addington suggests that in fact their ideology has not changed much. It seems clear that Addington was able to promote vast executive powers after September 11th in part because he and Cheney had been laying the political groundwork for years. “This preceded 9/11,” Fein, who has known both men professionally for decades, said. “I’m not saying that warrantless surveillance did. But the idea of reducing Congress to a cipher was already in play. It was Cheney and Addington's political agenda."

Addington's admirers see him as a selfless patriot, a workaholic defender of a purist interpretation of Presidential power—the necessary answer to threatening times. In 1983, Steve Berry, a Republican lawyer and lobbyist in Washington, hired Addington to work with him as the legislative counsel to the House Intelligence Committee; he has been a career patron and close friend ever since. He said, "I know him well, and I know that if there's a threat he will do everything in his power, within the law, to protect the United States." Berry added that Addington is acutely aware of the legal tensions between liberty and security. "We fought ourselves every day about it," he recalled. But, he said, they concluded that a "strong national security and defense" was the first priority, and that "without a strong defense, there's not much expectation or hope of having other freedoms." He said that there is no better defender of the country than Addington: "I've got a lot of respect for the guy. He's probably the foremost expert on intelligence and national-security law in the nation right now." Berry has a daughter who works in New York City, and he said that when he thinks of her safety he appreciates the efforts that Addington has made to strengthen the country's security. He said, "For Dave, protecting America isn't just a virtue. It's a personal mission. I feel safer just knowing he's where he is."

Berry said of his friend, "He's methodical, conscientious, analytical, and logical. And he's as straight an arrow as they come." He noted that Addington refuses to let Berry treat him to a hamburger because it might raise issues of influence-buying—instead, they split the check. Addington, he went on, has a dazzling ability to recall the past twenty-five years' worth of intelligence and national-security legislation. For many years, he kept a vast collection of legal documents in a library in his modest brick-and-clapboard home, in Alexandria, Virginia. One evening several years ago, lightning struck a nearby power line and the house caught fire; much of the archive burned. The fire started at around nine in the evening, and Addington, typically, was still in his office. His wife, Cynthia, and their three daughters were fine, but the loss of his extraordinary collection of papers and political memorabilia, Berry said, "was very hard for him to accept. All you get in this work is memorabilia. There is no cash. But he's the type of guy who gets psychic benefit from going to work every day, making a difference."

Though few people doubt Addington's knowledge of national-security law, even his admirers question his political instincts. "The only time I've seen him wrong is on his political judgment," a former colleague said. "He has a tin ear for political issues. Sometimes the law says one thing, but you have to at least listen to the other side. He will cite case history, case after case. David doesn't see why you have to compromise." Even Berry offered a gentle criticism: "His political skills can be overshadowed by his pursuit of what he feels is legally correct."

Addington has been a hawk on national defense since he was a teen-ager. Leonard Napolitano, an engineer who was one of Addington's close childhood friends, and whose political leanings are more like those of his sister, Janet Napolitano, the Democratic governor of Arizona, joked, "I don't think that in high school David was a believer in the divine right of kings." But, he said, Addington was "always conservative."

The Addingtons were a traditional Catholic military family. They moved frequently; David's father, Jerry, an electrical engineer in the Army, was assigned to a variety of posts, including Saudi Arabia and Washington, D.C., where he worked with the Joint Chiefs of Staff. As a teen-ager, Addington told a friend that he hoped to live in Washington himself when he grew up. Jerry Addington, a 1940 graduate of West Point who won a Bronze Star during the Second World War, also served in Korea and at the North American Air Defense Command, in Colorado; he reached the rank of brigadier general before he retired, in 1970, when David was thirteen. David attended public high school in Albuquerque, New Mexico, and his father began a second career, teaching middle-school math. His mother, Eleanore, was a housewife; the family lived in a ranch house in a middle-class subdivision. She still lives there; Jerry died in 1994. "We are an extremely close family," one of Addington's three older sisters, Linda, recalled recently. "Discipline was very important for us, and faith was very important. It was about being ethical—the right thing to do whether anyone else does it or not. I see that in Dave." She was reluctant to say more. "Dave is most deliberate about his privacy," she added.

Socially, Napolitano recalled, he and Addington were "the brains, or nerds." Addington stood out for wearing black socks with shorts. He and his friends were not particularly athletic, and they liked to play poker all night on weekends, stopping early in the morning for breakfast. Their circle included some girls, until the boys found them "too distracting to our interest in cards," Napolitano recalled.

When he and Addington were in high school, Napolitano said, the Vietnam War was in its final stages, and "there was a certain amount of 'Challenge authority' and alcohol and drugs, but they weren't issues in our group." Addington's high-school history teacher, Irwin Hoffman, whom Napolitano recalled as wonderful, exacting, and "a flaming liberal," said that Addington felt strongly that America "should have stayed and won the Vietnam War, despite the fact that we were losing." Hoffman, who is retired, added, "The boy seemed terribly, terribly bright. He wrote well, and he was very verbal, not at all reluctant to express his opinions. He was pleasant and quite handsome. He also had a very strong sarcastic streak. He was scornful of anyone who said anything that was naïve, or less than bright. His sneers were almost palpable."

Addington graduated in 1974, the year that Nixon resigned. In the aftermath of Watergate, liberal Democratic reformers imposed tighter restraints on the President and reined in the C.I.A., whose excesses were critiqued in congressional hearings, led by Senator Frank Church and Representative Otis Pike, that exposed details of assassination plots, coup attempts, mind-control experiments, and domestic spying. Congress passed a series of measures aimed at reinvigorating the system of checks and balances, including an expanded Freedom of Information Act and the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, the law requiring judicial review before foreign suspects inside the country could be wiretapped. It also created the House and Senate Intelligence Committees, which oversee all covert C.I.A. activities.

After high school, Addington pursued an ambition that he had had for years: to join the military. Rather than attending West Point, as his father had, he enrolled in the U.S. Naval Academy, in Annapolis. But he dropped out before the end of his freshman year. He went home and, according to Napolitano, worked in a Long John Silver's restaurant. "The academy wasn't academically challenging enough for him," Napolitano said.

Addington went to Georgetown University, graduating summa cum laude, in 1978, from the school of foreign service; he went on to earn honors at Duke Law School. After graduating, in 1981, he married Linda Werling, a graduate student in pharmacology. The marriage ended in divorce. His current wife, Cynthia, takes care of their three girls full-time.

Soon after leaving Duke, Addington started his first job, in the general counsel's office at the C.I.A. A former top agency lawyer who later worked with Addington said that Addington strongly opposed the reform movements that followed Vietnam and Watergate. "Addington was too young to be fully affected by the Vietnam War," the lawyer said. "He was shaped by the postwar, post-Watergate years instead. He thought the Presidency was too weakened. He's a believer that in foreign policy the executive is meant to be quite powerful."

These views were shared by Dick Cheney, who served as chief of staff in the Ford Administration. "On a range of executive-power issues, Cheney thought that Presidents from Nixon onward yielded too quickly," Michael J. Malbin, a political scientist who has advised Cheney on the issue of executive power, said. Kenneth Adelman, who was a high-ranking Pentagon official under Ford, said that the fall of Saigon, in 1975, was "very painful for Dick. He believed that Vietnam could have been saved—maybe—if Congress hadn't cut off funding. He was against that kind of interference."

Jane Harman, the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, who has spent considerable time working with Cheney and Addington in recent years, believes that they are still fighting Watergate. "They're focussed on restoring the Nixon Presidency," she said. "They've persuaded themselves that, following Nixon, things went all wrong." She said that in meetings Addington is always courtly and pleasant. But when it comes to accommodating Congress “his answer is always no.”

In a revealing interview that Cheney gave last December to reporters travelling with him to Oman, he explained, “I do have the view that over the years there had been an erosion of Presidential power and authority. . . . A lot of the things around Watergate and Vietnam both, in the seventies, served to erode the authority I think the President needs.” Further, Cheney explained, it was his express aim to restore the balance of power. The President needed to be able to act as Alexander Hamilton had described it in the Federalist Papers, with “secrecy” and “despatch”—especially, Cheney said, “in the day and age we live in . . . with the threats we face.” He added, “I believe in a strong, robust executive authority, and I think the world we live in demands it.”

At the C.I.A., where Addington spent two years, he focussed on curtailing the ability of Congress to interfere in intelligence gathering. “He was a rookie, plenty bright,” Frederick Hitz, another C.I.A. lawyer, who later became Inspector General, recalled. After the Church and Pike hearings, legislators came up with hundreds of pages of oversight recommendations, he said. “Addington was very pro-agency. He was trying to figure out how to comply with government oversight without getting hog-tied.” Addington viewed the public airings of the C.I.A.’s covert activities as “an absolute disaster,” Berry recalled. “We both felt that Congress did great harm by flinging open the doors to operational secrets.”

When Addington joined the C.I.A., it was directed by William J. Casey, who also regarded congressional constraints on the agency as impediments to be circumvented. His sentiment about congressional overseers was best captured during a hearing about covert actions in Central America, when he responded to tough questioning by muttering the word “assholes.” After Reagan’s election in 1980, the executive branch was dominated by conservative Republicans, while the House was governed by liberal Democrats. The two parties fought intensely over Central America; the Reagan Administration was determined to overthrow the leftist Sandinista government in Nicaragua. Using their constitutional authority over appropriations, the Democrats in Congress forbade the C.I.A. to spend federal funds to support the Contras, a rightist rebel group. But Casey’s attitude, as Berry recalled it, was “We’re gonna fund these freedom fighters whether Congress wants us to or not.” Berry, then the staff director for the Republicans on the House Intelligence Committee, asked Casey for help in fighting the Democrats. Soon afterward, Addington joined Berry on Capitol Hill.

When the Iran-Contra scandal broke, in 1986, it exposed White House arms deals and foreign fund-raising designed to help the anti-Sandinista forces in Nicaragua. Members of Congress were furious. Summoned to Capitol Hill, Casey lied, denying that funds for the Contras had been solicited from any foreign governments, although he knew that the Saudis, among others, had agreed to give millions of dollars to the Contras, at the request of the White House. Even within the Reagan Administration, the foreign funding was controversial. Secretary of State George Shultz had warned Reagan that he might be committing an impeachable offense. But, under Casey’s guidance, the White House went ahead with the plan; Shultz, having expressed misgivings, was not told. It was a bureaucratic tactic that Addington reprised after September 11th, when Powell was left out of key deliberations about the treatment of detainees. Lawrence Wilkerson, Powell’s aide, said that he was aware of Addington’s general strategy: “We had heard that, behind our backs, he was saying that Powell was ‘soft, but easy to get around.’ ”

The Iran-Contra scandal substantially weakened Reagan’s popularity and, eventually, seven people were convicted of seventeen felonies. Cheney, who was then a Republican congressman from Wyoming, worried that the scandal would further undercut Presidential authority. In late 1986, he became the ranking Republican on a House select committee that was investigating the scandal, and he commissioned a report on Reagan’s support of the Contras. Addington, who had become an expert in intelligence law, contributed legal research. The scholarly-sounding but politically outlandish Minority Report, released in 1987, argued that Congress—not the President—had overstepped its authority, by encroaching on the President’s foreign-policy powers. The President, the report said, had been driven by “a legitimate frustration with abuses of power and irresolution by the legislative branch.” The Minority Report sanctioned the President’s actions to a surprising degree, considering the number of criminal charges that resulted from the scandal. The report also defended the legality of ignoring congressional intelligence oversight, arguing that “the President has the Constitutional and statutory authority to withhold notifying Congress of covert actions under rare conditions." And it condemned "legislative hostage taking," noting that "Congress must realize . . . that the power of the purse does not make it supreme" in matters of war. In his December interview with reporters, Cheney proudly cited this document. "If you want reference to an obscure text, go look at the minority views that were filed in the Iran-Contra committee, the Iran-Contra report, in about 1987," he said. "Part of the argument was whether the President had the authority to do what was done in the Reagan years."

Addington and Cheney became a formidable team, but it was soon clear that Addington would not join Cheney as a politician. Adelman recalled Addington's personality as "dour," adding that, "unlike with Dick, I never saw much of a sense of humor. Cheney can be witty and funny. David is sober. I didn't see him at social events much." But, he added, "Dick wasn't looking for friends at work. He was looking for performance. And David delivers. He's efficient and dedicated. He's a doer." He went on, "Cheney's not a lawyer, so he would defer to David on the law."

In 1989, President George H. W. Bush appointed Cheney Secretary of Defense. Cheney hired Addington first as his special assistant and, later, as the Pentagon's general counsel. At the Pentagon, Addington became widely known as Cheney's gatekeeper—a stickler for process who controlled the flow of documents to his boss. Using a red felt-tipped pen, he covered his colleagues' memos with comments before returning them for rewrites. His editing invariably made arguments sharper, smarter, and more firm in their defense of Cheney's executive powers, a former military official who worked with him said.

At the Pentagon, Addington took a particular interest in the covert actions of the Special Forces. A former colleague recalled that, after attending a demonstration by Special Forces officers, he mocked the C.I.A., which was constrained by oversight laws. "This is how real covert operations are done," he said. (After September 11th, the Pentagon greatly expanded its covert intelligence operations; these programs have less congressional oversight than those of the C.I.A.) Cheney, throughout his tenure as Defense Secretary, shared with Addington a pessimistic view of the Soviet Union. Both remained skeptical of Gorbachev long after the State Department, the national-security adviser, and the C.I.A. had concluded that he was a reformer. "They were always, like, 'Whoa—beware the Bear!' " Wilkerson recalled. They immersed themselves in "continuity of government exercises"—studying with unusual intensity how the government might survive a nuclear attack. According to "Rise of the Vulcans," a history of the period by James Mann, Cheney, more than once, spent the night in an underground bunker.

A decade later, when hijacked planes slammed into the Twin Towers and the Pentagon, Addington, perhaps more than anyone else in the U.S. government, was ready to act. During the Clinton Presidency, he had worked as a lawyer for various business interests, such as the American Trucking Associations, and in 1994 he had led an exploratory Presidential campaign for Cheney, who decided against running. Once Cheney became Vice-President, Addington helped oversee the transition, setting up the most powerful Vice-Presidency in America's history. Addington's high-school friend Leonard Napolitano said Addington told him that he and Cheney were merging the Vice-President's office with the President's into a single "Executive Office," instead of having "two different camps." Napolitano added, "David said that Cheney saw the Vice-President as the executive and implementer of the President." Addington created a system to insure that virtually all important documents relating to national-security matters were seen by the Vice-President's office. The former high-ranking Administration lawyer said that Addington regularly attended White House legal meetings with the C.I.A. and the National Security Agency. He received copies of all National Security Council documents, including internal memos from the staff. And, as a former top official in the Defense Department, he exerted influence over the legal office at the Pentagon, helping his protégé William J. Haynes secure the position of general counsel. A former national-security lawyer, speaking of the Pentagon's legal office, said, "It's obvious that Addington runs the whole operation."

In the days after September 11th, a half-dozen White House lawyers had heated discussions about how to frame the Administration's legal response to the attacks. Bradford Berenson, one of the participants, recalled how "raw" feelings were at the time: "There were thousands of bereaved American families.

Everyone was expecting additional attacks. The only planes in the air were military. At a moment like that, there's an intense focus on responsibility and accountability. Preventing another attack should always be within the law. But if you have to err on the side of being too aggressive or not aggressive enough, you'd err by being too aggressive."

Berry said that Addington felt this keenly. "I've talked to David about this a little. Psychologically, it's really taxing to read every day not about one or two but about a dozen, or two dozen, legitimate reports about efforts to take out U.S. citizens. . . . There's a little bit of a bunker mentality that set in among some of the national-security-policy officials after 9/11."

Almost immediately, other Administration lawyers noticed that Addington dominated the internal debates. His assumption, shared by other hard-line lawyers in the White House counsel's office and in the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel, was that the criminal-justice system was insufficient to handle the threat from terrorism. The matter was settled without debate, Berenson recalled: "There was a consensus that we had to move from retribution and punishment to preëmption and prevention. Only a warfare model allows that approach."

Richard Shiffrin, the former Pentagon lawyer, said that during a tense White House meeting held in the Situation Room just a few days after September 11th "all of us felt under a great deal of pressure to be willing to consider even the most extraordinary proposals. The C.I.A., the N.S.C., the State Department, the Pentagon, and the Justice Department all had people there. Addington was particularly strident. He'd sit, listen, and then say, 'No, that's not right.' He was particularly doctrinaire and ideological. He didn't recognize the wisdom of the other lawyers. He was always right. He didn't listen. He knew the answers." The details of the discussion are classified, Shiffrin said, but he left with the impression that Addington "doesn't believe there should be co-equal branches." Another participant recalled, "If you favored international law, you were in danger of being called 'soft on terrorism' by Addington." He added that Addington's manner in meetings was "very insistent and very loud." Yet another participant said that, whenever he cautioned against executive-branch overreaching, Addington would respond brusquely, "There you go again, giving away the President's power."

Some of the protests from Democrats about the Administration's legal arguments and some of the declarations of high principle from Republicans are mere partisan gestures. Both sides have changed their views about the need for a strong President, depending on whether they were in power. "It's a matter of degree," the liberal Princeton historian Sean Wilentz said. "War always expands the powers of the Presidency. And Presidents always overreach." Lincoln infamously suspended habeas-corpus rights during the Civil War, locking up thousands of Confederate sympathizers without due process, and Franklin D. Roosevelt interned more than a hundred thousand innocent Japanese-Americans. "Someone said that this Administration is monarchical," Wilentz added. "That's just rhetoric. We're not a dictatorship. At the same time, this White House has assumed powers for itself that no previous Administration has done." Bush's defenders frequently cite the example of Lincoln as a justification for placing national security above the rule of law. But Schlesinger, in his book "War and the American Presidency" (2004), points out that Lincoln never "claimed an inherent and routine right to do what [he] did." The Bush White House, he told me, has seized on these historical aberrations and turned them into a doctrine of Presidential prerogative.

On September 25th, the Office of Legal Counsel issued a memo declaring that the President had inherent constitutional authority to take whatever military action he deemed necessary, not just in response to the September 11th attacks but also in the prevention of any future attacks from terrorist groups, whether they were linked to Al Qaeda or not. The memo's broad definition of the enemy went beyond that of Congress, which, on September 14th, had passed legislation authorizing the President to use military force against "nations, organizations, or persons" directly linked to the attacks. The memo was written by John Yoo, a lawyer in the Office of Legal Counsel who worked closely with Addington, and said, in part, "The power of the President is at its zenith under the Constitution when the President is directing military operations of the armed forces, because the power of the Commander-in-Chief is assigned solely to the President." The memo acknowledged that Article I of the Constitution gives Congress the power to declare war, but argued that it was a misreading to assume that the article gives Congress the lead role in making war. Instead, the memo said, “it is beyond question that the President has the plenary Constitutional power to take such military actions as he deems necessary and appropriate to respond to the terrorist attacks upon the United States on September 11, 2001.” It concluded, “These decisions, under our Constitution, are for the President alone to make.”

Another memo sanctioned torture when the President deems it necessary; yet another claimed that there were virtually no valid legal prohibitions against the inhumane treatment of foreign prisoners held by the C.I.A. outside the U.S. Most of these decisions, according to many Administration officials who were involved in the process, were made in secrecy, and the customary interagency debate and vetting procedures were sidestepped. Addington either drafted the memos himself or advised those who were drafting them. “Addington’s fingerprints were all over these policies,” said Wilkerson, who, as Powell’s top aide, later assembled for the Secretary a dossier of internal memos detailing the decision-making process.

On November 13, 2001, an executive order setting up the military commissions was issued under Bush’s signature. The decision stunned Powell; the national-security adviser, Condoleezza Rice; the highest-ranking lawyer at the C.I.A.; and many judge advocate generals, or JAGs, the top lawyers in the military services. None of them had been consulted. Michael Chertoff, the head of the Justice Department’s criminal division, who had argued for trying terror suspects in the U.S. courts, was also bypassed. And the order surprised John Bellinger III, the National Security Council legal adviser and deputy White House counsel, who had been formally asked to help create a legal method for trying foreign terror suspects. According to multiple sources, Addington secretly usurped the process. He and a few hand-picked associates, including Bradford Berenson and Timothy Flanigan, a lawyer in the White House counsel’s office, wrote the executive order creating the commissions. Moreover, Addington did not show drafts of the order to Powell or Rice, who, the senior Administration lawyer said, was incensed when she learned about her exclusion.

The order proclaimed a state of “extraordinary emergency,” and announced that the rules for the military commissions would be dictated by the Secretary of Defense, without review by Congress or the courts. The commissions could try any foreign person the President or his representatives deemed to have “engaged in” or “abetted” or “conspired to commit” terrorism, without offering the right to seek an appeal from anyone but the President or the Secretary of Defense. Detainees would be treated “humanely,” and would be given “full and fair trials,” the order said. Yet the order continued that “it is not practicable” to apply “the principles of law and the rules of evidence generally recognized in the trial of criminal cases in the United States district courts.” The death penalty, for example, could be imposed even if there was a split verdict. Moreover, in December, 2001, the Department of Defense circulated internal memos suggesting that, in the commission system, defendants would have only limited rights to confront their accusers, see all the evidence against them, or be present during their trials. There would be no right to remain silent, and hearsay evidence would be admissible, as would evidence obtained through physical coercion. Guilt did not need to be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. The order firmly established that terrorism would henceforth be approached on a war footing, endowing the President with enhanced powers.

The precedent for the order was an arcane 1942 case, ex parte Quirin, in which Franklin Roosevelt created a military commission to try eight Nazi saboteurs who had infiltrated the United States via submarines. The Supreme Court upheld the case, 8–0, but even the conservative Justice Antonin Scalia has called it “not this Court’s finest hour.” Roosevelt was later criticized for creating a sham process. Moreover, while he used military commissions to try a handful of suspects who had already admitted their guilt, the Bush White House was proposing expanding the process to cover thousands of “enemy combatants.” It was also ignoring the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which, having codified procedures for courts-martial in 1951, had rendered Quirin out of date.

Berenson said, “The legal foundation was very strong. F.D.R.’s order establishing military commissions had been upheld by the Supreme Court. This was almost identical. What we underestimated was the extent to which the culture had shifted beneath us since World War Two.” Concerns about civil liberties and human rights, and anger over Vietnam and Watergate, he said, had turned public opinion against a strong executive branch: “But Addington thought military commissions had to be a tool at the President’s disposal.”

Rear Admiral Donald Guter, who was the Navy’s chief JAG until June, 2002, said that he and the other JAGs, who were experts in the laws of war, tried unsuccessfully to amend parts of the military-commission plan when they learned of it, days before the order was formally signed by the President. “But we were marginalized,” he said. “We were warning them that we had this long tradition of military justice, and we didn’t want to tarnish it. The treatment of detainees was a huge issue. They didn’t want to hear it.” In a 2004 report in the Times, Guter said that when he and the other JAGs told Haynes that they needed more information, Haynes replied, “No, you don’t.” (Haynes’s office offered no comment.)

At the Defense Department, Shiffrin, the deputy general counsel for intelligence, and a career lawyer rather than a political appointee, was taken aback when Haynes showed him the order. Earlier in Shiffrin’s career, at the Justice Department, his office had been in the same room where the Nazi defendants were tried, and he had become interested in the case, which he said he regarded as “one of the worst Supreme Court cases ever.” He recalled informing Haynes that he was skeptical of the Administration’s invocation of Quirin. “Gee, this is problematic,” Shiffrin told him.

Marine Major Dan Mori, the uniformed lawyer who has been assigned to defend David Hicks, one of the ten terror suspects in Guantánamo who have been charged, said of the commissions, “It was a political stunt. The Administration clearly didn’t know anything about military law or the laws of war. I think they were clueless that there even was a U.C.M.J. and a Manual for Courts-Martial! The fundamental problem is that the rules were constructed by people with a vested interest in conviction.”

Mori said that the charges against the detainees reflected a profound legal confusion. “A military commission can try only violations of the laws of war,” he said. “But the Administration’s lawyers didn’t understand this.” Under federal criminal statutes, for example, conspiring to commit terrorist acts is a crime. But, as the Nuremburg trials that followed the Second World War established, under the laws of war it is not, since all soldiers could be charged with conspiring to fight for their side. Yet, Mori said, a charge of conspiracy “is the only thing there is in many cases at Guantánamo—guilt by association. So you’ve got this big problem.” He added, “I hope that nobody confuses military justice with these ‘military commissions.’ This is a political process, set up by the civilian leadership. It’s inept, incompetent, and improper.”

Under attack from defense lawyers like Mori, the military commissions have been tied up in the courts almost since the order was issued. Bellinger and others fought to make the commissions fairer, so that they could withstand court challenges, and the Pentagon gradually softened its rules. But Administration lawyers involved in the process said that Addington resisted at every turn. He insisted, for instance, on maintaining the admissibility of statements obtained through coercion, or even torture. In meetings, he argued that officials in charge of the military commissions should be given maximum flexibility to decide whether to include such evidence. “Torture isn’t important to Addington as a scientific matter, good or bad, or whether it works or not,” the Administration lawyer, who is familiar with these debates, said. “It’s more about his philosophy of Presidential power. He thinks that if the President wants torture he should get torture. He always argued for ‘maximum flexibility.’ ”

Last month, Addington lost this internal battle. The Administration rescinded the provision allowing coerced testimony, after even the military officials overseeing the commissions supported the reform. According to a senior Administration legal adviser who participated in discussions about the commissions, Addington remained opposed to the change. “He wanted no changes,” the lawyer said. “He said the rules were good, right from the start.” Addington accused officials who were trying to reform the rules of “giving away the President’s prerogatives.”

President Bush has blamed the legal challenges for the delays in prosecuting Guantánamo detainees. But many lawyers, even some inside the Administration, believe that the challenges were inevitable, considering the dubious constitutionality of the commissions. The Supreme Court’s ruling in the Hamdan case is expected to establish whether the commissions meet basic standards of due process. The Administration lawyer isn't sanguine about the outcome. "It shows again that Addington overreached," he said.

Meanwhile, Addington has fought tirelessly to stem reform of other controversial aspects of the New Paradigm, such as the detention and interrogation of terror suspects. Last year, he and Cheney led an unsuccessful campaign to defeat an amendment, proposed by Senator John McCain, to ban the abusive treatment of detainees held by the military or the C.I.A. Government officials who have worked closely with Addington say he insists that legal flexibility is necessary, because of the iniquity of the enemy; moreover, he does not believe that the legal positions taken by the Bush Administration in the war on terror have damaged the country's international reputation. "He's a very smart guy, but he gives no credibility to those who say these policies are hurting us around the world," the senior Administration legal adviser said. "His feeling is that there are no costs. He'll say people are just whining. He thinks most of them would be against us no matter what." In Addington's view, critics of the Administration's aggressive legal policies are just political enemies of the President.

Yet, from the start, some of the sharpest critics of detainee-treatment policies have been military and law-enforcement officials inside the Bush Administration; people close to it, like McCain; and our foreign allies. Just a few months after the Guantánamo detention centers were established, members of the Administration began receiving reports that questioned whether all the prisoners there were really, as Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld had labelled them, "the worst of the worst." Guter said that the Pentagon had originally planned to screen the suspects individually on the battlefields in Afghanistan; such "Article 5 hearings" are a provision of the Geneva Conventions. But the White House cancelled the hearings, which had been standard protocol during the previous fifty years, including in the first Gulf War. In a January 25, 2002, legal memorandum, Administration lawyers dismissed the Geneva Conventions as "obsolete," "quaint," and irrelevant to the war on terror. The memo was signed by Gonzales, but the Administration lawyer said he believed that "Addington and Flanigan were behind it." The memo argued that all Taliban and Al Qaeda detainees were illegal enemy combatants, which eliminated "any argument regarding the need for case-by-case determination of P.O.W. status." Critics claim that the lack of a careful screening process led some innocent detainees to be imprisoned. "Article 5 hearings would have cost them nothing," the Administration lawyer, who was involved in the process, said. "They just wanted to make a point on executive power—that the President can designate them all enemy combatants if he wants to."

Guter, the Navy JAG, said that, before long, he and other military experts began to wonder whether the reason they weren't getting much useful intelligence from Guantánamo was that, as he puts it, "it wasn't there." Guter, who was in the Pentagon on September 11th, said, "I don't have a sympathetic bone in my body for the terrorists. But I just wanted to make sure we were getting the right people—the real terrorists. And I wanted to make sure we were doing it in a way consistent with our values."

While the JAGs' questions about the treatment of detainees went largely unheeded, he said, the C.I.A. was simultaneously raising similar concerns. In the summer of 2002, the agency had sent an Arabic-speaking analyst to Guantánamo to find out why more intelligence wasn't being collected, and, after interviewing several dozen prisoners, he had come back with bad news: more than half the detainees, he believed, didn't belong there. He wrote a devastating classified report, which reached General John Gordon, the deputy national-security adviser for combatting terrorism. In a series of meetings at the White House, Gordon, Bellinger, and other officials warned Addington and Gonzales that potentially innocent people had been locked up in Guantánamo and would be indefinitely. "This is a violation of basic notions of American fairness," Gordon and Bellinger argued. "Isn't that what we're about as a country?" Addington's response, sources familiar with the meetings said, was "These are 'enemy combatants.' Please use that term. They've all been through a screening process. We don't have anything to talk about."

possibility that one or more people were locked up who shouldn't be? There were old people, sick people—why do we want to keep them?" At the meeting, Gordon and Bellinger argued, "The American public understands that wars are confusing and exceptional things happen. But the American public will expect some due process."

Addington and Gonzales dismissed this concern. The former Administration official recalled that Addington was "the dominant voice. It was a non-debate, in his view." The confrontation made clear, though, that Addington had been informed early that there were problems at Guantánamo. "There wasn't a lack of knowledge or understanding," the former official said.

Addington has proved deft at outmaneuvering his critics. Documents embarrassing to Addington's opponents have been leaked to the press, if not necessarily by him. A top-secret N.S.C. memo describing Powell's request to reconsider the suspension of the Geneva Conventions appeared in the Washington Times the day after it was circulated to the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, and the Vice-President; the article cited unnamed sources who accused Powell of "bowing to pressure from the political left." The Administration lawyer said, "The way Addington works, he controls the flow of information very tightly." Addington chastised a Justice Department official who showed a legal opinion on the treatment of detainees to the State Department. He repeatedly directed Gonzales, the White House counsel, to keep Bellinger, the N.S.C. lawyer, out of meetings about national-security issues. "Lip-lock" is the word Addington's old Pentagon colleague Sean O'Keefe, now the chancellor of Louisiana State University, used to describe his discretion. "He's like Cheney," O'Keefe said. "You can't get anything out of him with a crowbar." The Administration lawyer said, "He's a bully, pure and simple." Several talented top lawyers who challenged Addington on important legal matters concerning the war on terror, including Patrick Philbin, James Comey, and Jack Goldsmith, left the Administration under stressful circumstances. Other reform-minded government lawyers who clashed with Addington, including Bellinger and Matthew Waxman, both of whom were at the N.S.C. during Bush's first term, have moved to the State Department.

Waxman, a young lawyer who headed the Pentagon's office of detainee affairs, departed soon after he had a major confrontation with Addington over the issue of clarifying military rules for the treatment of prisoners. Waxman believed that international standards for the humane treatment of detainees should be followed, and argued for reforms in the Army Field Manual. He hoped to reinstate the basic standards that are specified in the Geneva Conventions. This meant the prohibition of torture, overt acts of violence, and "outrages on personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment." Although the Vice-President's office is not part of the military chain of command, last September Addington summoned Waxman to his office and berated him. Waxman declined to comment on the incident, but a former colleague in the Pentagon, in whom Waxman confided, said that Addington accused Waxman of wanting to fight the war on terror his own way, rather than the President's way. The Army Field Manual still hasn't been revised, and, according to those involved, Addington and his protégé Haynes remain the major obstacles.

Last fall, Richard Shiffrin, the Pentagon lawyer who was left out of the Administration's initial discussions of the military commissions, learned from the Times about the Administration's decision to sanction warrantless domestic electronic surveillance by the National Security Agency. This was remarkable, because Shiffrin was the Pentagon lawyer in charge of supervising the N.S.A.'s legal advisers. "It was exceptional that I didn't know about it—extraordinary," Shiffrin said. "In the prior Administration, on anything involving N.S.A. legal issues I'd have been made aware. And I should have been in this one."

Shortly after September 11th, Addington and Cheney, without alerting Shiffrin, held meetings with top N.S.A. lawyers in the Vice-President's office and told them that the President, as Commander-in-Chief, had the authority to override the FISA statutes and not seek warrants from the special court. According to the Times, Addington and Cheney pushed the N.S.A. to engage in practices that the agency thought were illegal, such as the warrantless wiretapping of American suspects making domestic calls. General Michael Hayden, the former head of the N.S.A., who was recently confirmed as director of the C.I.A., has denied being pressured. Shiffrin, however, doubted that the N.S.A. lawyers were expert enough in Article II of the Constitution, which defines the President's powers, to argue back. He described the Administration's legal arguments on wiretapping as "close calls."

Others are more critical. Fourteen prominent constitutional scholars, representing a range of political views, recently wrote an open letter to Congress, claiming that the N.S.A. surveillance program "appears on its face to violate existing law." The scholars noted that Bush had made no effort to amend the FISA law to suit national-security needs—he simply ignored it. The Republican legal activist Bruce Fein said, "What makes this so sinister is that the members of this Administration have unchecked power. They don't care if the wiretapping is legal or not." But the former high-ranking Administration lawyer suggested that the situation is more serious than an intentional infraction of the law. "It's not that they think they're skirting the law," he said. "They think that this is the law."

Fein suggested that the only way Congress will be able to reassert its power is by cutting off funds to the executive branch for programs that it thinks are illegal. But this approach has been tried, and here, too, Addington has had the last word. John Murtha, the ranking Democrat on the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense, put a provision in the Pentagon's appropriations bills for 2005 and 2006 forbidding the use of federal funds for any intelligence-gathering that violates the Fourth Amendment, which protects the privacy of American citizens. The White House, however, took exception to Congress's effort to cut off funds. When President Bush signed the appropriations bills into law, he appended "signing statements" asserting that the Commander-in-Chief had the right to collect intelligence in any way he deemed necessary. The signing statement for the 2005 budget, for instance, noted that the executive branch would "construe" the spending limit only "in a manner consistent with the President's constitutional authority as Commander-in-Chief, including for the conduct of intelligence operations."

According to the Boston Globe, Addington has been the "leading architect" of these signing statements, which have been added to more than seven hundred and fifty laws. He reportedly scrutinizes every bill before President Bush signs it, searching for any language that might impinge on Presidential power. These wars of words are yet another battlefront between Addington and Congress, and some constitutional scholars find them troubling. Few of the signing statements were noticed until one of them was slipped into Bush's signing of the McCain amendment. The language was legal boilerplate, reserving the right to construe the legislation only as it was consistent with the Constitution. But, considering that Cheney's office had waged, and lost, a public fight to defeat the McCain amendment democratically—the vote in the Senate was 90–9—the signing statement seemed sneaky and subversive.

Earlier this month, the American Bar Association voted to investigate whether President Bush had exceeded his constitutional authority by reserving the right to ignore portions of laws that he has signed. Richard Epstein, the University of Chicago law professor, said, "What's frightening to me is that this Administration is always willing to push the conventions to the limits—and beyond. With his signing statements, I think the President just goes too far. If you sign these things with a caveat, do the inferior officers follow the law or the caveat?"

Bruce Fein argues that Addington's signing statements are "unconstitutional as a strategy," because the Founding Fathers wanted Presidents to veto legislation openly if they thought the bills were unconstitutional. Bush has not vetoed a single bill since taking office. "It's part of the balancing process," Fein said. "It's about accountability. If you veto something, everyone knows where you stand. But this President wants to do it sotto voce. He wants to give the image that he's accommodating on torture, and then reserves the right to torture anyway."

David Addington is a satisfactory lawyer, Fein said, but a less than satisfactory student of American history, which, for a public servant of his influence, matters more. "If you read the Federalist Papers, you can see how rich in history they are," he said. "The Founders really understood the history of what people did with power, going back to Greek and Roman and Biblical times. Our political heritage is to be skeptical of executive power, because, in particular, there was skepticism of King George III. But Cheney and Addington are not students of history. If they were, they'd know that the Founding Fathers would be shocked by what they've done."

The legal mind behind the White House's war on terror.

On December 18th, Colin Powell, the former Secretary of State, joined other prominent Washington figures at FedEx Field, the Redskins' stadium, in a skybox belonging to the team's owner. During the game, between the Redskins and the Dallas Cowboys, Powell spoke of a recent report in the Times which revealed that President Bush, in his pursuit of terrorists, had secretly authorized the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on American citizens without first obtaining a warrant from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, as required by federal law. This requirement, which was instituted by Congress in 1978, after the Watergate scandal, was designed to protect civil liberties and curb abuses of executive power, such as Nixon's secret monitoring of political opponents and the F.B.I.'s eavesdropping on Martin Luther King, Jr. Nixon had claimed that as President he had the "inherent authority" to spy on people his Administration deemed enemies, such as the anti-Vietnam War activist Daniel Ellsberg. Both Nixon and the institution of the Presidency had paid a high price for this assumption. But, according to the Times, since 2002 the legal checks that Congress constructed to insure that no President would repeat Nixon's actions had been secretly ignored.

According to someone who knows Powell, his comment about the article was terse. "It's Addington," he said. "He doesn't care about the Constitution." Powell was referring to David S. Addington, Vice-President Cheney's chief of staff and his longtime principal legal adviser. Powell's office says that he does not recall making the statement. But his former top aide, Lawrence Wilkerson, confirms that he and Powell shared this opinion of Addington.

Most Americans, even those who follow politics closely, have probably never heard of Addington. But current and former Administration officials say that he has played a central role in shaping the Administration's legal strategy for the war on terror. Known as the New Paradigm, this strategy rests on a reading of the Constitution that few legal scholars share—namely, that the President, as Commander-in-Chief, has the authority to disregard virtually all previously known legal boundaries, if national security demands it. Under this framework, statutes prohibiting torture, secret detention, and warrantless surveillance have been set aside. A former high-ranking Administration lawyer who worked extensively on national-security issues said that the Administration's legal positions were, to a remarkable degree, "all Addington." Another lawyer, Richard L. Shiffrin, who until 2003 was the Pentagon's deputy general counsel for intelligence, said that Addington was "an unopposable force."

The overarching intent of the New Paradigm, which was put in place after the attacks of September 11th, was to allow the Pentagon to bring terrorists to justice as swiftly as possible. Criminal courts and military courts, with their exacting standards of evidence and emphasis on protecting defendants' rights, were deemed too cumbersome. Instead, the President authorized a system of detention and interrogation that operated outside the international standards for the treatment of prisoners of war established by the 1949 Geneva Conventions. Terror suspects would be tried in a system of military commissions, in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, devised by the executive branch. The Administration designated these suspects not as criminals or as prisoners of war but as "illegal enemy combatants," whose treatment would be ultimately decided by the President. By emphasizing interrogation over due process, the government intended to preëmpt future attacks before they materialized. In November, 2001, Cheney said of the military commissions, "We think it guarantees that we'll have the kind of treatment of these individuals that we believe they deserve."

Yet, almost five years later, this improvised military model, which Addington was instrumental in creating, has achieved very limited results. Not a single terror suspect has been tried before a military commission. Only ten of the more than seven hundred men who have been imprisoned at Guantánamo have been formally charged with any wrongdoing. Earlier this month, three detainees committed suicide in the camp. Germany and Denmark, along with the European Union and the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, have called for the prison to be closed, accusing the United States of violating internationally accepted standards for humane treatment and due process. The New Paradigm has also come under serious challenge from the judicial branch. Two years ago, in Rasul v. Bush, the Supreme Court ruled against the Administration's contention that the Guantánamo prisoners were beyond the reach of the U.S. court system and could not challenge their detention. And this week the Court is expected to deliver a decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, a case that questions the legality of the military commissions.

For years, Addington has carried a copy of the U.S. Constitution in his pocket; taped onto the back are photocopies of extra statutes that detail the legal procedures for Presidential succession in times of national emergency. Many constitutional experts, however, question his interpretation of the document, especially his views on Presidential power. Scott Horton, a professor at Columbia Law School, and the head of the New York Bar Association's International Law committee, said that Addington and a small group of Administration lawyers who share his views had attempted to "overturn two centuries of jurisprudence defining the limits of the executive branch. They've made war a matter of dictatorial power." The historian Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., who defined Nixon as the extreme example of Presidential overreaching in his book "The Imperial Presidency" (1973), said he believes that Bush "is more grandiose than Nixon." As for the Administration's legal defense of torture, which Addington played a central role in formulating, Schlesinger said, "No position taken has done more damage to the American reputation in the world—ever."

Bruce Fein, a Republican legal activist, who voted for Bush in both Presidential elections, and who served as associate deputy attorney general in the Reagan Justice Department, said that Addington and other Presidential legal advisers had "staked out powers that are a universe beyond any other Administration. This President has made claims that are really quite alarming. He's said that there are no restraints on his ability, as he sees it, to collect intelligence, to open mail, to commit torture, and to use electronic surveillance. If you used the President's reasoning, you could shut down Congress for leaking too much. His war powers allow him to declare anyone an illegal combatant. All the world's a battlefield—according to this view, he could kill someone in Lafayette Park if he wants! It's got the sense of Louis XIV: 'I am the State.' " Richard A. Epstein, a prominent libertarian law professor at the University of Chicago, said, "The President doesn't have the power of a king, or even that of state governors. He's subject to the laws of Congress! The Administration's lawyers are nuts on this issue." He warned of an impending

The former high-ranking lawyer for the Administration, who worked closely with Addington, and who shares his political conservatism, said that, in the aftermath of September 11th, “Addington was more like Cheney’s agent than like a lawyer. A lawyer sometimes says no.” He noted, “Addington never said, ‘There is a line you can’t cross.’ ” Although the lawyer supported the President, he felt that his Administration had been led astray. “George W. Bush has been damaged by incredibly bad legal advice,” he said.

David Addington is a tall, bespectacled man of forty-nine, who has a thickening middle, a thatch of gray hair, and a trim gray beard, which gives him the look of a sea captain. He is extremely private; he keeps the door of his office locked at all times, colleagues say, because of the national-security documents in his files. He has left almost no public paper trail, and he does not speak to the press or allow photographs to be taken for news stories. (He declined repeated requests to be interviewed for this article.)

In many ways, his influence in Washington defies conventional patterns. Addington doesn’t serve the President directly. He has never run for elected office. Although he has been a government lawyer for his entire career, he has never worked in the Justice Department. He is a hawk on defense issues, but he has never served in the military.

There are various plausible explanations for Addington’s power, including the force of his intellect and his personality, and his closeness to Cheney, whose political views he clearly shares. Addington has been an ally of Cheney’s since the nineteen-eighties, and has been referred to as “Cheney’s Cheney,” or, less charitably, as “Cheney’s hit man.” Addington’s talent for bureaucratic infighting is such that some of his supporters tend to invoke, with admiration, metaphors involving knives. Juleanna Glover Weiss, Cheney’s former press secretary, said, “David is efficient, discreet, loyal, sublimely brilliant, and, as anyone who works with him knows, someone who, in a knife fight, you want covering your back.” Bradford Berenson, a former White House lawyer, said, “He’s powerful because people know he speaks for the Vice-President, and because he’s an extremely smart, creative, and aggressive public official. Some engage in bureaucratic infighting using slaps. Some use knives. David falls into the latter category. You could make the argument that there are some costs. It introduces a little fear into the policymaking process. Views might be more candidly expressed without that fear. But David is like the Marines. No better friend—no worse enemy.” People who have sparred with him agree. “He’s utterly ruthless,” Lawrence Wilkerson said. A former top national-security lawyer said, “He takes a political litmus test of everyone. If you’re not sufficiently ideological, he would cut the ground out from under you.”

Another reason for Addington’s singular role after September 11th is that he offered legal certitude at a moment of great political and legal confusion, in an Administration in which neither the President, the Vice-President, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of State, nor the national-security adviser was a lawyer. (In the Clinton Administration, all these posts, except for the Vice-Presidency, were held by lawyers at some point.) Neither the Attorney General, John Ashcroft, nor the White House counsel, Alberto Gonzales, had anything like Addington’s familiarity with national-security law. Moreover, Ashcroft’s relations with the White House were strained, and he was left out of the inner circle that decided the most radical legal strategies in the war on terror. Gonzales had more influence, because of his longtime ties to the President, but, as an Administration lawyer put it, “he was an empty suit. He was weak. And he doesn’t know shit about the Geneva Conventions.” Participants in meetings in the White House counsel’s office, in the days immediately after September 11th, have described Gonzales sitting in a wingback chair, asking questions, while Addington sat directly across from him and held forth. “Gonzales would call the meetings,” the former high-ranking lawyer recalled. “But Addington was always the force in the room.” Bruce Fein said that the Bush legal team was strikingly unsophisticated. “There is no one of legal stature, certainly no one like Bork, or Scalia, or Elliot Richardson, or Archibald Cox,” he said. “It’s frightening. No one knows the Constitution—certainly not Cheney.”

Conventional wisdom holds that September 11th changed everything, including the thinking of Cheney and Addington. Brent Scowcroft, the former national-security adviser, has said of Cheney that he barely recognizes the reasonable politician he knew in the past. But a close look at the twenty-year collaboration between Cheney and Addington suggests that in fact their ideology has not changed much. It seems clear that Addington was able to promote vast executive powers after September 11th in part because he and Cheney had been laying the political groundwork for years. "This preceded 9/11," Fein, who has known both men professionally for decades, said. "I'm not saying that warrantless surveillance did. But the idea of reducing Congress to a cipher was already in play. It was Cheney and Addington's political agenda."

Addington's admirers see him as a selfless patriot, a workaholic defender of a purist interpretation of Presidential power—the necessary answer to threatening times. In 1983, Steve Berry, a Republican lawyer and lobbyist in Washington, hired Addington to work with him as the legislative counsel to the House Intelligence Committee; he has been a career patron and close friend ever since. He said, "I know him well, and I know that if there's a threat he will do everything in his power, within the law, to protect the United States." Berry added that Addington is acutely aware of the legal tensions between liberty and security. "We fought ourselves every day about it," he recalled. But, he said, they concluded that a "strong national security and defense" was the first priority, and that "without a strong defense, there's not much expectation or hope of having other freedoms." He said that there is no better defender of the country than Addington: "I've got a lot of respect for the guy. He's probably the foremost expert on intelligence and national-security law in the nation right now." Berry has a daughter who works in New York City, and he said that when he thinks of her safety he appreciates the efforts that Addington has made to strengthen the country's security. He said, "For Dave, protecting America isn't just a virtue. It's a personal mission. I feel safer just knowing he's where he is."

Berry said of his friend, "He's methodical, conscientious, analytical, and logical. And he's as straight an arrow as they come." He noted that Addington refuses to let Berry treat him to a hamburger because it might raise issues of influence-buying—instead, they split the check. Addington, he went on, has a dazzling ability to recall the past twenty-five years' worth of intelligence and national-security legislation. For many years, he kept a vast collection of legal documents in a library in his modest brick-and-clapboard home, in Alexandria, Virginia. One evening several years ago, lightning struck a nearby power line and the house caught fire; much of the archive burned. The fire started at around nine in the evening, and Addington, typically, was still in his office. His wife, Cynthia, and their three daughters were fine, but the loss of his extraordinary collection of papers and political memorabilia, Berry said, "was very hard for him to accept. All you get in this work is memorabilia. There is no cash. But he's the type of guy who gets psychic benefit from going to work every day, making a difference."

Though few people doubt Addington's knowledge of national-security law, even his admirers question his political instincts. "The only time I've seen him wrong is on his political judgment," a former colleague said. "He has a tin ear for political issues. Sometimes the law says one thing, but you have to at least listen to the other side. He will cite case history, case after case. David doesn't see why you have to compromise." Even Berry offered a gentle criticism: "His political skills can be overshadowed by his pursuit of what he feels is legally correct."

Addington has been a hawk on national defense since he was a teen-ager. Leonard Napolitano, an engineer who was one of Addington's close childhood friends, and whose political leanings are more like those of his sister, Janet Napolitano, the Democratic governor of Arizona, joked, "I don't think that in high school David was a believer in the divine right of kings." But, he said, Addington was "always conservative."

The Addingtons were a traditional Catholic military family. They moved frequently; David's father, Jerry, an electrical engineer in the Army, was assigned to a variety of posts, including Saudi Arabia and Washington, D.C., where he worked with the Joint Chiefs of Staff. As a teen-ager, Addington told a friend that he hoped to live in Washington himself when he grew up. Jerry Addington, a 1940 graduate of West Point who won a Bronze Star during the Second World War, also served in Korea and at the North American Air Defense Command, in Colorado; he reached the rank of brigadier general before he retired, in 1970, when David was thirteen. David attended public high school in Albuquerque, New Mexico, and his father began a second career, teaching middle-school math. His mother, Eleanore, was a housewife; the family lived in a ranch house in a middle-class subdivision. She still lives there; Jerry died in 1994. "We are an extremely close family," one of Addington's three older sisters, Linda, recalled recently. "Discipline was very important for us, and faith was very important. It was about being ethical—the right thing to do whether anyone else does it or not. I see that in Dave." She was reluctant to say more. "Dave is most deliberate about his privacy," she added.

Socially, Napolitano recalled, he and Addington were "the brains, or nerds." Addington stood out for wearing black socks with shorts. He and his friends were not particularly athletic, and they liked to play poker all night on weekends, stopping early in the morning for breakfast. Their circle included some girls, until the boys found them "too distracting to our interest in cards," Napolitano recalled.

When he and Addington were in high school, Napolitano said, the Vietnam War was in its final stages, and "there was a certain amount of 'Challenge authority' and alcohol and drugs, but they weren't issues in our group." Addington's high-school history teacher, Irwin Hoffman, whom Napolitano recalled as wonderful, exacting, and "a flaming liberal," said that Addington felt strongly that America "should have stayed and won the Vietnam War, despite the fact that we were losing." Hoffman, who is retired, added, "The boy seemed terribly, terribly bright. He wrote well, and he was very verbal, not at all reluctant to express his opinions. He was pleasant and quite handsome. He also had a very strong sarcastic streak. He was scornful of anyone who said anything that was naïve, or less than bright. His sneers were almost palpable."

Addington graduated in 1974, the year that Nixon resigned. In the aftermath of Watergate, liberal Democratic reformers imposed tighter restraints on the President and reined in the C.I.A., whose excesses were critiqued in congressional hearings, led by Senator Frank Church and Representative Otis Pike, that exposed details of assassination plots, coup attempts, mind-control experiments, and domestic spying. Congress passed a series of measures aimed at reinvigorating the system of checks and balances, including an expanded Freedom of Information Act and the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, the law requiring judicial review before foreign suspects inside the country could be wiretapped. It also created the House and Senate Intelligence Committees, which oversee all covert C.I.A. activities.

After high school, Addington pursued an ambition that he had had for years: to join the military. Rather than attending West Point, as his father had, he enrolled in the U.S. Naval Academy, in Annapolis. But he dropped out before the end of his freshman year. He went home and, according to Napolitano, worked in a Long John Silver's restaurant. "The academy wasn't academically challenging enough for him," Napolitano said.

Addington went to Georgetown University, graduating summa cum laude, in 1978, from the school of foreign service; he went on to earn honors at Duke Law School. After graduating, in 1981, he married Linda Werling, a graduate student in pharmacology. The marriage ended in divorce. His current wife, Cynthia, takes care of their three girls full-time.

Soon after leaving Duke, Addington started his first job, in the general counsel's office at the C.I.A. A former top agency lawyer who later worked with Addington said that Addington strongly opposed the reform movements that followed Vietnam and Watergate. "Addington was too young to be fully affected by the Vietnam War," the lawyer said. "He was shaped by the postwar, post-Watergate years instead. He thought the Presidency was too weakened. He's a believer that in foreign policy the executive is meant to be quite powerful."

These views were shared by Dick Cheney, who served as chief of staff in the Ford Administration. "On a range of executive-power issues, Cheney thought that Presidents from Nixon onward yielded too quickly," Michael J. Malbin, a political scientist who has advised Cheney on the issue of executive power, said. Kenneth Adelman, who was a high-ranking Pentagon official under Ford, said that the fall of Saigon, in 1975, was “very painful for Dick. He believed that Vietnam could have been saved—maybe—if Congress hadn’t cut off funding. He was against that kind of interference.”

Jane Harman, the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, who has spent considerable time working with Cheney and Addington in recent years, believes that they are still fighting Watergate. “They’re focussed on restoring the Nixon Presidency,” she said. “They’ve persuaded themselves that, following Nixon, things went all wrong.” She said that in meetings Addington is always courtly and pleasant. But when it comes to accommodating Congress “his answer is always no.”

In a revealing interview that Cheney gave last December to reporters travelling with him to Oman, he explained, “I do have the view that over the years there had been an erosion of Presidential power and authority. . . . A lot of the things around Watergate and Vietnam both, in the seventies, served to erode the authority I think the President needs.” Further, Cheney explained, it was his express aim to restore the balance of power. The President needed to be able to act as Alexander Hamilton had described it in the Federalist Papers, with “secrecy” and “despatch”—especially, Cheney said, “in the day and age we live in . . . with the threats we face.” He added, “I believe in a strong, robust executive authority, and I think the world we live in demands it.”

At the C.I.A., where Addington spent two years, he focussed on curtailing the ability of Congress to interfere in intelligence gathering. “He was a rookie, plenty bright,” Frederick Hitz, another C.I.A. lawyer, who later became Inspector General, recalled. After the Church and Pike hearings, legislators came up with hundreds of pages of oversight recommendations, he said. “Addington was very pro-agency. He was trying to figure out how to comply with government oversight without getting hog-tied.” Addington viewed the public airings of the C.I.A.’s covert activities as “an absolute disaster,” Berry recalled. “We both felt that Congress did great harm by flinging open the doors to operational secrets.”

When Addington joined the C.I.A., it was directed by William J. Casey, who also regarded congressional constraints on the agency as impediments to be circumvented. His sentiment about congressional overseers was best captured during a hearing about covert actions in Central America, when he responded to tough questioning by muttering the word “assholes.” After Reagan’s election in 1980, the executive branch was dominated by conservative Republicans, while the House was governed by liberal Democrats. The two parties fought intensely over Central America; the Reagan Administration was determined to overthrow the leftist Sandinista government in Nicaragua. Using their constitutional authority over appropriations, the Democrats in Congress forbade the C.I.A. to spend federal funds to support the Contras, a rightist rebel group. But Casey’s attitude, as Berry recalled it, was “We’re gonna fund these freedom fighters whether Congress wants us to or not.” Berry, then the staff director for the Republicans on the House Intelligence Committee, asked Casey for help in fighting the Democrats. Soon afterward, Addington joined Berry on Capitol Hill.

When the Iran-Contra scandal broke, in 1986, it exposed White House arms deals and foreign fund-raising designed to help the anti-Sandinista forces in Nicaragua. Members of Congress were furious. Summoned to Capitol Hill, Casey lied, denying that funds for the Contras had been solicited from any foreign governments, although he knew that the Saudis, among others, had agreed to give millions of dollars to the Contras, at the request of the White House. Even within the Reagan Administration, the foreign funding was controversial. Secretary of State George Shultz had warned Reagan that he might be committing an impeachable offense. But, under Casey’s guidance, the White House went ahead with the plan; Shultz, having expressed misgivings, was not told. It was a bureaucratic tactic that Addington reprised after September 11th, when Powell was left out of key deliberations about the treatment of detainees. Lawrence Wilkerson, Powell’s aide, said that he was aware of Addington’s general strategy: “We had heard that, behind our backs, he was saying that Powell was ‘soft, but easy to get around.’ ”

The Iran-Contra scandal substantially weakened Reagan’s popularity and, eventually, seven people were convicted of seventeen felonies. Cheney, who was then a Republican congressman from Wyoming, worried that the scandal would further undercut Presidential authority. In late 1986, he became the ranking Republican on a House select committee that was investigating the scandal, and he commissioned a report on Reagan’s support of the Contras. Addington, who had become an expert in intelligence law, contributed legal research. The scholarly-sounding but politically outlandish Minority Report, released in 1987, argued that Congress—not the President—had overstepped its authority, by encroaching on the President's foreign-policy powers. The President, the report said, had been driven by "a legitimate frustration with abuses of power and irresolution by the legislative branch." The Minority Report sanctioned the President's actions to a surprising degree, considering the number of criminal charges that resulted from the scandal. The report also defended the legality of ignoring congressional intelligence oversight, arguing that "the President has the Constitutional and statutory authority to withhold notifying Congress of covert actions under rare conditions." And it condemned "legislative hostage taking," noting that "Congress must realize . . . that the power of the purse does not make it supreme" in matters of war. In his December interview with reporters, Cheney proudly cited this document. "If you want reference to an obscure text, go look at the minority views that were filed in the Iran-Contra committee, the Iran-Contra report, in about 1987," he said. "Part of the argument was whether the President had the authority to do what was done in the Reagan years."

Addington and Cheney became a formidable team, but it was soon clear that Addington would not join Cheney as a politician. Adelman recalled Addington's personality as "dour," adding that, "unlike with Dick, I never saw much of a sense of humor. Cheney can be witty and funny. David is sober. I didn't see him at social events much." But, he added, "Dick wasn't looking for friends at work. He was looking for performance. And David delivers. He's efficient and dedicated. He's a doer." He went on, "Cheney's not a lawyer, so he would defer to David on the law."

In 1989, President George H. W. Bush appointed Cheney Secretary of Defense. Cheney hired Addington first as his special assistant and, later, as the Pentagon's general counsel. At the Pentagon, Addington became widely known as Cheney's gatekeeper—a stickler for process who controlled the flow of documents to his boss. Using a red felt-tipped pen, he covered his colleagues' memos with comments before returning them for rewrites. His editing invariably made arguments sharper, smarter, and more firm in their defense of Cheney's executive powers, a former military official who worked with him said.

At the Pentagon, Addington took a particular interest in the covert actions of the Special Forces. A former colleague recalled that, after attending a demonstration by Special Forces officers, he mocked the C.I.A., which was constrained by oversight laws. "This is how real covert operations are done," he said. (After September 11th, the Pentagon greatly expanded its covert intelligence operations; these programs have less congressional oversight than those of the C.I.A.) Cheney, throughout his tenure as Defense Secretary, shared with Addington a pessimistic view of the Soviet Union. Both remained skeptical of Gorbachev long after the State Department, the national-security adviser, and the C.I.A. had concluded that he was a reformer. "They were always, like, 'Whoa—beware the Bear!' " Wilkerson recalled. They immersed themselves in "continuity of government exercises"—studying with unusual intensity how the government might survive a nuclear attack. According to "Rise of the Vulcans," a history of the period by James Mann, Cheney, more than once, spent the night in an underground bunker.

A decade later, when hijacked planes slammed into the Twin Towers and the Pentagon, Addington, perhaps more than anyone else in the U.S. government, was ready to act. During the Clinton Presidency, he had worked as a lawyer for various business interests, such as the American Trucking Associations, and in 1994 he had led an exploratory Presidential campaign for Cheney, who decided against running. Once Cheney became Vice-President, Addington helped oversee the transition, setting up the most powerful Vice-Presidency in America's history. Addington's high-school friend Leonard Napolitano said Addington told him that he and Cheney were merging the Vice-President's office with the President's into a single "Executive Office," instead of having "two different camps." Napolitano added, "David said that Cheney saw the Vice-President as the executive and implementer of the President." Addington created a system to insure that virtually all important documents relating to national-security matters were seen by the Vice-President's office. The former high-ranking Administration lawyer said that Addington regularly attended White House legal meetings with the C.I.A. and the National Security Agency. He received copies of all National Security Council documents, including internal memos from the staff. And, as a former top official in the Defense Department, he exerted influence over the legal office at the Pentagon, helping his protégé William J. Haynes secure the position of general counsel. A former national-security lawyer, speaking of the Pentagon's legal office, said, "It's obvious that Addington runs the whole

In the days after September 11th, a half-dozen White House lawyers had heated discussions about how to frame the Administration's legal response to the attacks. Bradford Berenson, one of the participants, recalled how "raw" feelings were at the time: "There were thousands of bereaved American families. Everyone was expecting additional attacks. The only planes in the air were military. At a moment like that, there's an intense focus on responsibility and accountability. Preventing another attack should always be within the law. But if you have to err on the side of being too aggressive or not aggressive enough, you'd err by being too aggressive."

Berry said that Addington felt this keenly. "I've talked to David about this a little. Psychologically, it's really taxing to read every day not about one or two but about a dozen, or two dozen, legitimate reports about efforts to take out U.S. citizens. . . . There's a little bit of a bunker mentality that set in among some of the national-security-policy officials after 9/11."

Almost immediately, other Administration lawyers noticed that Addington dominated the internal debates. His assumption, shared by other hard-line lawyers in the White House counsel's office and in the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel, was that the criminal-justice system was insufficient to handle the threat from terrorism. The matter was settled without debate, Berenson recalled: "There was a consensus that we had to move from retribution and punishment to preëmption and prevention. Only a warfare model allows that approach."

Richard Shiffrin, the former Pentagon lawyer, said that during a tense White House meeting held in the Situation Room just a few days after September 11th "all of us felt under a great deal of pressure to be willing to consider even the most extraordinary proposals. The C.I.A., the N.S.C., the State Department, the Pentagon, and the Justice Department all had people there. Addington was particularly strident. He'd sit, listen, and then say, 'No, that's not right.' He was particularly doctrinaire and ideological. He didn't recognize the wisdom of the other lawyers. He was always right. He didn't listen. He knew the answers." The details of the discussion are classified, Shiffrin said, but he left with the impression that Addington "doesn't believe there should be co-equal branches." Another participant recalled, "If you favored international law, you were in danger of being called 'soft on terrorism' by Addington." He added that Addington's manner in meetings was "very insistent and very loud." Yet another participant said that, whenever he cautioned against executive-branch overreaching, Addington would respond brusquely, "There you go again, giving away the President's power."

Some of the protests from Democrats about the Administration's legal arguments and some of the declarations of high principle from Republicans are mere partisan gestures. Both sides have changed their views about the need for a strong President, depending on whether they were in power. "It's a matter of degree," the liberal Princeton historian Sean Wilentz said. "War always expands the powers of the Presidency. And Presidents always overreach." Lincoln infamously suspended habeas-corpus rights during the Civil War, locking up thousands of Confederate sympathizers without due process, and Franklin D. Roosevelt interned more than a hundred thousand innocent Japanese-Americans. "Someone said that this Administration is monarchical," Wilentz added. "That's just rhetoric. We're not a dictatorship. At the same time, this White House has assumed powers for itself that no previous Administration has done." Bush's defenders frequently cite the example of Lincoln as a justification for placing national security above the rule of law. But Schlesinger, in his book "War and the American Presidency" (2004), points out that Lincoln never "claimed an inherent and routine right to do what [he] did." The Bush White House, he told me, has seized on these historical aberrations and turned them into a doctrine of Presidential prerogative.

On September 25th, the Office of Legal Counsel issued a memo declaring that the President had inherent constitutional authority to take whatever military action he deemed necessary, not just in response to the September 11th attacks but also in the prevention of any future attacks from terrorist groups, whether they were linked to Al Qaeda or not. The memo's broad definition of the enemy went beyond that of Congress, which, on September 14th, had passed legislation authorizing the President to use military force against "nations, organizations, or persons" directly linked to the attacks. The memo was written by John Yoo, a lawyer in the Office of Legal Counsel who worked closely with Addington, and said, in part, "The power of the President is at its zenith under the Constitution when the President is directing military operations of the armed forces, because the power of the Commander-in-Chief is assigned solely to the President." The memo acknowledged that Article I of the Constitution gives Congress the power to declare war, but argued that it was a misreading to assume that the article gives Congress the lead role in making war. Instead, the memo said, "it is beyond question that the President has the plenary Constitutional power to take such military actions as he deems necessary and appropriate to respond to the terrorist attacks upon the United States on September 11, 2001." It concluded, "These decisions, under our Constitution, are for the President alone to make."

Another memo sanctioned torture when the President deems it necessary; yet another claimed that there were virtually no valid legal prohibitions against the inhumane treatment of foreign prisoners held by the C.I.A. outside the U.S. Most of these decisions, according to many Administration officials who were involved in the process, were made in secrecy, and the customary interagency debate and vetting procedures were sidestepped. Addington either drafted the memos himself or advised those who were drafting them. "Addington's fingerprints were all over these policies," said Wilkerson, who, as Powell's top aide, later assembled for the Secretary a dossier of internal memos detailing the decision-making process.

On November 13, 2001, an executive order setting up the military commissions was issued under Bush's signature. The decision stunned Powell; the national-security adviser, Condoleezza Rice; the highest-ranking lawyer at the C.I.A.; and many judge advocate generals, or JAGs, the top lawyers in the military services. None of them had been consulted. Michael Chertoff, the head of the Justice Department's criminal division, who had argued for trying terror suspects in the U.S. courts, was also bypassed. And the order surprised John Bellinger III, the National Security Council legal adviser and deputy White House counsel, who had been formally asked to help create a legal method for trying foreign terror suspects. According to multiple sources, Addington secretly usurped the process. He and a few hand-picked associates, including Bradford Berenson and Timothy Flanigan, a lawyer in the White House counsel's office, wrote the executive order creating the commissions. Moreover, Addington did not show drafts of the order to Powell or Rice, who, the senior Administration lawyer said, was incensed when she learned about her exclusion.

The order proclaimed a state of "extraordinary emergency," and announced that the rules for the military commissions would be dictated by the Secretary of Defense, without review by Congress or the courts. The commissions could try any foreign person the President or his representatives deemed to have "engaged in" or "abetted" or "conspired to commit" terrorism, without offering the right to seek an appeal from anyone but the President or the Secretary of Defense. Detainees would be treated "humanely," and would be given "full and fair trials," the order said. Yet the order continued that "it is not practicable" to apply "the principles of law and the rules of evidence generally recognized in the trial of criminal cases in the United States district courts." The death penalty, for example, could be imposed even if there was a split verdict. Moreover, in December, 2001, the Department of Defense circulated internal memos suggesting that, in the commission system, defendants would have only limited rights to confront their accusers, see all the evidence against them, or be present during their trials. There would be no right to remain silent, and hearsay evidence would be admissible, as would evidence obtained through physical coercion. Guilt did not need to be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. The order firmly established that terrorism would henceforth be approached on a war footing, endowing the President with enhanced powers.

The precedent for the order was an arcane 1942 case, ex parte Quirin, in which Franklin Roosevelt created a military commission to try eight Nazi saboteurs who had infiltrated the United States via submarines. The Supreme Court upheld the case, 8–0, but even the conservative Justice Antonin Scalia has called it "not this Court's finest hour." Roosevelt was later criticized for creating a sham process. Moreover, while he used military commissions to try a handful of suspects who had already admitted their guilt, the Bush White House was proposing expanding the process to cover thousands of "enemy combatants." It was also ignoring the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which, having codified procedures for courts-martial in 1951, had rendered Quirin out of date.

Berenson said, "The legal foundation was very strong. F.D.R.'s order establishing military commissions had been upheld by the Supreme Court. This was almost identical. What we underestimated was the extent to which the culture had shifted beneath us since World War Two." Concerns about civil liberties and human rights, and anger over Vietnam and Watergate, he said, had turned public opinion against a strong executive branch: "But Addington thought military commissions had to be a tool at the President's disposal."

Rear Admiral Donald Guter, who was the Navy's chief JAG until June, 2002, said that he and the other JAGs, who were experts in the laws of war, tried unsuccessfully to amend parts of the military-commission plan when they learned of it, days before the order was formally signed by the President. "But we were marginalized," he said. "We were warning them that we had this long tradition of military justice, and we didn't want to tarnish it. The treatment of detainees was a huge issue. They didn't want to hear it." In a 2004 report in the Times, Guter said that when he and the other JAGs told Haynes that they needed more information, Haynes replied, "No, you don't." (Haynes's office offered no comment.)

At the Defense Department, Shiffrin, the deputy general counsel for intelligence, and a career lawyer rather than a political appointee, was taken aback when Haynes showed him the order. Earlier in Shiffrin's career, at the Justice Department, his office had been in the same room where the Nazi defendants were tried, and he had become interested in the case, which he said he regarded as "one of the worst Supreme Court cases ever." He recalled informing Haynes that he was skeptical of the Administration's invocation of Quirin. "Gee, this is problematic," Shiffrin told him.

Marine Major Dan Mori, the uniformed lawyer who has been assigned to defend David Hicks, one of the ten terror suspects in Guantánamo who have been charged, said of the commissions, "It was a political stunt. The Administration clearly didn't know anything about military law or the laws of war. I think they were clueless that there even was a U.C.M.J. and a Manual for Courts-Martial! The fundamental problem is that the rules were constructed by people with a vested interest in conviction."

Mori said that the charges against the detainees reflected a profound legal confusion. "A military commission can try only violations of the laws of war," he said. "But the Administration's lawyers didn't understand this." Under federal criminal statutes, for example, conspiring to commit terrorist acts is a crime. But, as the Nuremburg trials that followed the Second World War established, under the laws of war it is not, since all soldiers could be charged with conspiring to fight for their side. Yet, Mori said, a charge of conspiracy "is the only thing there is in many cases at Guantánamo—guilt by association. So you've got this big problem." He added, "I hope that nobody confuses military justice with these 'military commissions.' This is a political process, set up by the civilian leadership. It's inept, incompetent, and improper."

Under attack from defense lawyers like Mori, the military commissions have been tied up in the courts almost since the order was issued. Bellinger and others fought to make the commissions fairer, so that they could withstand court challenges, and the Pentagon gradually softened its rules. But Administration lawyers involved in the process said that Addington resisted at every turn. He insisted, for instance, on maintaining the admissibility of statements obtained through coercion, or even torture. In meetings, he argued that officials in charge of the military commissions should be given maximum flexibility to decide whether to include such evidence. "Torture isn't important to Addington as a scientific matter, good or bad, or whether it works or not," the Administration lawyer, who is familiar with these debates, said. "It's more about his philosophy of Presidential power. He thinks that if the President wants torture he should get torture. He always argued for 'maximum flexibility.' "

Last month, Addington lost this internal battle. The Administration rescinded the provision allowing coerced testimony, after even the military officials overseeing the commissions supported the reform. According to a senior Administration legal adviser who participated in discussions about the commissions,

Addington remained opposed to the change. “He wanted no changes,” the lawyer said. “He said the rules were good, right from the start.” Addington accused officials who were trying to reform the rules of “giving away the President’s prerogatives.”

President Bush has blamed the legal challenges for the delays in prosecuting Guantánamo detainees. But many lawyers, even some inside the Administration, believe that the challenges were inevitable, considering the dubious constitutionality of the commissions. The Supreme Court’s ruling in the Hamdan case is expected to establish whether the commissions meet basic standards of due process. The Administration lawyer isn’t sanguine about the outcome. “It shows again that Addington overreached,” he said.

Meanwhile, Addington has fought tirelessly to stem reform of other controversial aspects of the New Paradigm, such as the detention and interrogation of terror suspects. Last year, he and Cheney led an unsuccessful campaign to defeat an amendment, proposed by Senator John McCain, to ban the abusive treatment of detainees held by the military or the C.I.A. Government officials who have worked closely with Addington say he insists that legal flexibility is necessary, because of the iniquity of the enemy; moreover, he does not believe that the legal positions taken by the Bush Administration in the war on terror have damaged the country’s international reputation. “He’s a very smart guy, but he gives no credibility to those who say these policies are hurting us around the world,” the senior Administration legal adviser said. “His feeling is that there are no costs. He’ll say people are just whining. He thinks most of them would be against us no matter what.” In Addington’s view, critics of the Administration’s aggressive legal policies are just political enemies of the President.

Yet, from the start, some of the sharpest critics of detainee-treatment policies have been military and law-enforcement officials inside the Bush Administration; people close to it, like McCain; and our foreign allies. Just a few months after the Guantánamo detention centers were established, members of the Administration began receiving reports that questioned whether all the prisoners there were really, as Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld had labelled them, “the worst of the worst.” Guter said that the Pentagon had originally planned to screen the suspects individually on the battlefields in Afghanistan; such “Article 5 hearings” are a provision of the Geneva Conventions. But the White House cancelled the hearings, which had been standard protocol during the previous fifty years, including in the first Gulf War. In a January 25, 2002, legal memorandum, Administration lawyers dismissed the Geneva Conventions as “obsolete,” “quaint,” and irrelevant to the war on terror. The memo was signed by Gonzales, but the Administration lawyer said he believed that “Addington and Flanigan were behind it.” The memo argued that all Taliban and Al Qaeda detainees were illegal enemy combatants, which eliminated “any argument regarding the need for case-by-case determination of P.O.W. status.” Critics claim that the lack of a careful screening process led some innocent detainees to be imprisoned. “Article 5 hearings would have cost them nothing,” the Administration lawyer, who was involved in the process, said. “They just wanted to make a point on executive power—that the President can designate them all enemy combatants if he wants to.”

Guter, the Navy JAG, said that, before long, he and other military experts began to wonder whether the reason they weren’t getting much useful intelligence from Guantánamo was that, as he puts it, “it wasn’t there.” Guter, who was in the Pentagon on September 11th, said, “I don’t have a sympathetic bone in my body for the terrorists. But I just wanted to make sure we were getting the right people—the real terrorists. And I wanted to make sure we were doing it in a way consistent with our values.”

While the JAGs’ questions about the treatment of detainees went largely unheeded, he said, the C.I.A. was simultaneously raising similar concerns. In the summer of 2002, the agency had sent an Arabic-speaking analyst to Guantánamo to find out why more intelligence wasn’t being collected, and, after interviewing several dozen prisoners, he had come back with bad news: more than half the detainees, he believed, didn’t belong there. He wrote a devastating classified report, which reached General John Gordon, the deputy national-security adviser for combatting terrorism. In a series of meetings at the White House, Gordon, Bellinger, and other officials warned Addington and Gonzales that potentially innocent people had been locked up in Guantánamo and would be indefinitely. "This is a violation of basic notions of American fairness," Gordon and Bellinger argued. "Isn't that what we're about as a country?" Addington's response, sources familiar with the meetings said, was "These are 'enemy combatants.' Please use that term. They've all been through a screening process. We don't have anything to talk about."

A former Administration official said of Addington's response, "It seemed illogical. How could you deny the possibility that one or more people were locked up who shouldn't be? There were old people, sick people—why do we want to keep them?" At the meeting, Gordon and Bellinger argued, "The American public understands that wars are confusing and exceptional things happen. But the American public will expect some due process."

Addington and Gonzales dismissed this concern. The former Administration official recalled that Addington was "the dominant voice. It was a non-debate, in his view." The confrontation made clear, though, that Addington had been informed early that there were problems at Guantánamo. "There wasn't a lack of knowledge or understanding," the former official said.

Addington has proved deft at outmaneuvering his critics. Documents embarrassing to Addington's opponents have been leaked to the press, if not necessarily by him. A top-secret N.S.C. memo describing Powell's request to reconsider the suspension of the Geneva Conventions appeared in the Washington Times the day after it was circulated to the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, and the Vice-President; the article cited unnamed sources who accused Powell of "bowing to pressure from the political left." The Administration lawyer said, "The way Addington works, he controls the flow of information very tightly." Addington chastised a Justice Department official who showed a legal opinion on the treatment of detainees to the State Department. He repeatedly directed Gonzales, the White House counsel, to keep Bellinger, the N.S.C. lawyer, out of meetings about national-security issues. "Lip-lock" is the word Addington's old Pentagon colleague Sean O'Keefe, now the chancellor of Louisiana State University, used to describe his discretion. "He's like Cheney," O'Keefe said. "You can't get anything out of him with a crowbar." The Administration lawyer said, "He's a bully, pure and simple." Several talented top lawyers who challenged Addington on important legal matters concerning the war on terror, including Patrick Philbin, James Comey, and Jack Goldsmith, left the Administration under stressful circumstances. Other reform-minded government lawyers who clashed with Addington, including Bellinger and Matthew Waxman, both of whom were at the N.S.C. during Bush's first term, have moved to the State Department.

Waxman, a young lawyer who headed the Pentagon's office of detainee affairs, departed soon after he had a major confrontation with Addington over the issue of clarifying military rules for the treatment of prisoners. Waxman believed that international standards for the humane treatment of detainees should be followed, and argued for reforms in the Army Field Manual. He hoped to reinstate the basic standards that are specified in the Geneva Conventions. This meant the prohibition of torture, overt acts of violence, and "outrages on personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment." Although the Vice-President's office is not part of the military chain of command, last September Addington summoned Waxman to his office and berated him. Waxman declined to comment on the incident, but a former colleague in the Pentagon, in whom Waxman confided, said that Addington accused Waxman of wanting to fight the war on terror his own way, rather than the President's way. The Army Field Manual still hasn't been revised, and, according to those involved, Addington and his protégé Haynes remain the major obstacles.

Last fall, Richard Shiffrin, the Pentagon lawyer who was left out of the Administration's initial discussions of the military commissions, learned from the Times about the Administration's decision to sanction warrantless domestic electronic surveillance by the National Security Agency. This was remarkable, because Shiffrin was the Pentagon lawyer in charge of supervising the N.S.A.'s legal advisers. "It was exceptional that I didn't know about it—extraordinary," Shiffrin said. "In the prior Administration, on anything involving N.S.A. legal issues I'd have been made aware. And I should have been in this one."

Shortly after September 11th, Addington and Cheney, without alerting Shiffrin, held meetings with top N.S.A. lawyers in the Vice-President's office and told them that the President, as Commander-in-Chief, had the authority to override the FISA statutes and not seek warrants from the special court. According to the Times, Addington and Cheney pushed the N.S.A. to engage in practices that the agency thought were illegal, such as the warrantless wiretapping of American suspects making domestic calls. General Michael Hayden, the former head of the N.S.A., who was recently confirmed as director of the C.I.A., has denied being pressured. Shiffrin, however, doubted that the N.S.A. lawyers were expert enough in Article II of the Constitution, which defines the President's powers, to argue back. He described the Administration's legal arguments on wiretapping as "close calls."

Others are more critical. Fourteen prominent constitutional scholars, representing a range of political views, recently wrote an open letter to Congress, claiming that the N.S.A. surveillance program "appears on its face to violate existing law." The scholars noted that Bush had made no effort to amend the FISA law to suit national-security needs—he simply ignored it. The Republican legal activist Bruce Fein said, "What makes this so sinister is that the members of this Administration have unchecked power. They don't care if the wiretapping is legal or not." But the former high-ranking Administration lawyer suggested that the situation is more serious than an intentional infraction of the law. "It's not that they think they're skirting the law," he said. "They think that this is the law."

Fein suggested that the only way Congress will be able to reassert its power is by cutting off funds to the executive branch for programs that it thinks are illegal. But this approach has been tried, and here, too, Addington has had the last word. John Murtha, the ranking Democrat on the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense, put a provision in the Pentagon's appropriations bills for 2005 and 2006 forbidding the use of federal funds for any intelligence-gathering that violates the Fourth Amendment, which protects the privacy of American citizens. The White House, however, took exception to Congress's effort to cut off funds. When President Bush signed the appropriations bills into law, he appended "signing statements" asserting that the Commander-in-Chief had the right to collect intelligence in any way he deemed necessary. The signing statement for the 2005 budget, for instance, noted that the executive branch would "construe" the spending limit only "in a manner consistent with the President's constitutional authority as Commander-in-Chief, including for the conduct of intelligence operations."

According to the Boston Globe, Addington has been the "leading architect" of these signing statements, which have been added to more than seven hundred and fifty laws. He reportedly scrutinizes every bill before President Bush signs it, searching for any language that might impinge on Presidential power. These wars of words are yet another battlefront between Addington and Congress, and some constitutional scholars find them troubling. Few of the signing statements were noticed until one of them was slipped into Bush's signing of the McCain amendment. The language was legal boilerplate, reserving the right to construe the legislation only as it was consistent with the Constitution. But, considering that Cheney's office had waged, and lost, a public fight to defeat the McCain amendment democratically—the vote in the Senate was 90–9—the signing statement seemed sneaky and subversive.

Earlier this month, the American Bar Association voted to investigate whether President Bush had exceeded his constitutional authority by reserving the right to ignore portions of laws that he has signed. Richard Epstein, the University of Chicago law professor, said, "What's frightening to me is that this Administration is always willing to push the conventions to the limits—and beyond. With his signing statements, I think the President just goes too far. If you sign these things with a caveat, do the inferior officers follow the law or the caveat?"

Bruce Fein argues that Addington's signing statements are "unconstitutional as a strategy," because the Founding Fathers wanted Presidents to veto legislation openly if they thought the bills were unconstitutional. Bush has not vetoed a single bill since taking office. "It's part of the balancing process," Fein said. "It's about accountability. If you veto something, everyone knows where you stand. But this President wants to do it sotto voce. He wants to give the image that he's accommodating on torture, and then reserves the right to torture anyway."

David Addington is a satisfactory lawyer, Fein said, but a less than satisfactory student of American history, which, for a public servant of his influence, matters more. “If you read the Federalist Papers, you can see how rich in history they are,” he said. “The Founders really understood the history of what people did with power, going back to Greek and Roman and Biblical times. Our political heritage is to be skeptical of executive power, because, in particular, there was skepticism of King George III. But Cheney and Addington are not students of history. If they were, they’d know that the Founding Fathers would be shocked by what they’ve done.”

This is what didn't make it through to Matt, but I reckon he's well familiar with it. Has Mr. Addington a special program targeted at email about his flattering press?

THE HIDDEN POWER
by JANE MAYER
The legal mind behind the White House's war on terror.

On December 18th, Colin Powell, the former Secretary of State, joined other prominent Washington figures at FedEx Field, the Redskins' stadium, in a skybox belonging to the team's owner. During the game, between the Redskins and the Dallas Cowboys, Powell spoke of a recent report in the Times which revealed that President Bush, in his pursuit of terrorists, had secretly authorized the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on American citizens without first obtaining a warrant from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, as required by federal law. This requirement, which was instituted by Congress in 1978, after the Watergate scandal, was designed to protect civil liberties and curb abuses of executive power, such as Nixon's secret monitoring of political opponents and the F.B.I.'s eavesdropping on Martin Luther King, Jr. Nixon had claimed that as President he had the "inherent authority" to spy on people his Administration deemed enemies, such as the anti-Vietnam War activist Daniel Ellsberg. Both Nixon and the institution of the Presidency had paid a high price for this assumption. But, according to the Times, since 2002 the legal checks that Congress constructed to insure that no President would repeat Nixon's actions had been secretly ignored.

According to someone who knows Powell, his comment about the article was terse. "It's Addington," he said. "He doesn't care about the Constitution." Powell was referring to David S. Addington, Vice-President

Cheney's chief of staff and his longtime principal legal adviser. Powell's office says that he does not recall making the statement. But his former top aide, Lawrence Wilkerson, confirms that he and Powell shared this opinion of Addington.

Most Americans, even those who follow politics closely, have probably never heard of Addington. But current and former Administration officials say that he has played a central role in shaping the Administration's legal strategy for the war on terror. Known as the New Paradigm, this strategy rests on a reading of the Constitution that few legal scholars share—namely, that the President, as Commander-in-Chief, has the authority to disregard virtually all previously known legal boundaries, if national security demands it. Under this framework, statutes prohibiting torture, secret detention, and warrantless surveillance have been set aside. A former high-ranking Administration lawyer who worked extensively on national-security issues said that the Administration's legal positions were, to a remarkable degree, "all Addington." Another lawyer, Richard L. Shiffrin, who until 2003 was the Pentagon's deputy general counsel for intelligence, said that Addington was "an unopposable force."

The overarching intent of the New Paradigm, which was put in place after the attacks of September 11th, was to allow the Pentagon to bring terrorists to justice as swiftly as possible. Criminal courts and military courts, with their exacting standards of evidence and emphasis on protecting defendants' rights, were deemed too cumbersome. Instead, the President authorized a system of detention and interrogation that operated outside the international standards for the treatment of prisoners of war established by the 1949 Geneva Conventions. Terror suspects would be tried in a system of military commissions, in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, devised by the executive branch. The Administration designated these suspects not as criminals or as prisoners of war but as "illegal enemy combatants," whose treatment would be ultimately decided by the President. By emphasizing interrogation over due process, the government intended to preëmpt future attacks before they materialized. In November, 2001, Cheney said of the military commissions, "We think it guarantees that we'll have the kind of treatment of these individuals that we believe they deserve."

Yet, almost five years later, this improvised military model, which Addington was instrumental in creating, has achieved very limited results. Not a single terror suspect has been tried before a military commission. Only ten of the more than seven hundred men who have been imprisoned at Guantánamo have been formally charged with any wrongdoing. Earlier this month, three detainees committed suicide in the camp. Germany and Denmark, along with the European Union and the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, have called for the prison to be closed, accusing the United States of violating internationally accepted standards for humane treatment and due process. The New Paradigm has also come under serious challenge from the judicial branch. Two years ago, in Rasul v. Bush, the Supreme Court ruled against the Administration's contention that the Guantánamo prisoners were beyond the reach of the U.S. court system and could not challenge their detention. And this week the Court is expected to deliver a decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, a case that questions the legality of the military commissions.

For years, Addington has carried a copy of the U.S. Constitution in his pocket; taped onto the back are photocopies of extra statutes that detail the legal procedures for Presidential succession in times of national emergency. Many constitutional experts, however, question his interpretation of the document, especially his views on Presidential power. Scott Horton, a professor at Columbia Law School, and the head of the New York Bar Association's International Law committee, said that Addington and a small group of Administration lawyers who share his views had attempted to "overturn two centuries of jurisprudence defining the limits of the executive branch. They've made war a matter of dictatorial power." The historian Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., who defined Nixon as the extreme example of Presidential overreaching in his book "The Imperial Presidency" (1973), said he believes that Bush "is more grandiose than Nixon." As for the Administration's legal defense of torture, which Addington played a central role in formulating, Schlesinger said, "No position taken has done more damage to the American reputation in the world—ever."

Bruce Fein, a Republican legal activist, who voted for Bush in both Presidential elections, and who served as associate deputy attorney general in the Reagan Justice Department, said that Addington and other Presidential legal advisers had "staked out powers that are a universe beyond any other Administration.

This President has made claims that are really quite alarming. He's said that there are no restraints on his ability, as he sees it, to collect intelligence, to open mail, to commit torture, and to use electronic surveillance. If you used the President's reasoning, you could shut down Congress for leaking too much. His war powers allow him to declare anyone an illegal combatant. All the world's a battlefield—according to this view, he could kill someone in Lafayette Park if he wants! It's got the sense of Louis XIV: 'I am the State.' " Richard A. Epstein, a prominent libertarian law professor at the University of Chicago, said, "The President doesn't have the power of a king, or even that of state governors. He's subject to the laws of Congress! The Administration's lawyers are nuts on this issue." He warned of an impending "constitutional crisis," because "their talk of the inherent power of the Presidency seems to be saying that the courts can't stop them, and neither can Congress."

The former high-ranking lawyer for the Administration, who worked closely with Addington, and who shares his political conservatism, said that, in the aftermath of September 11th, "Addington was more like Cheney's agent than like a lawyer. A lawyer sometimes says no." He noted, "Addington never said, 'There is a line you can't cross.' " Although the lawyer supported the President, he felt that his Administration had been led astray. "George W. Bush has been damaged by incredibly bad legal advice," he said.

David Addington is a tall, bespectacled man of forty-nine, who has a thickening middle, a thatch of gray hair, and a trim gray beard, which gives him the look of a sea captain. He is extremely private; he keeps the door of his office locked at all times, colleagues say, because of the national-security documents in his files. He has left almost no public paper trail, and he does not speak to the press or allow photographs to be taken for news stories. (He declined repeated requests to be interviewed for this article.)

In many ways, his influence in Washington defies conventional patterns. Addington doesn't serve the President directly. He has never run for elected office. Although he has been a government lawyer for his entire career, he has never worked in the Justice Department. He is a hawk on defense issues, but he has never served in the military.

There are various plausible explanations for Addington's power, including the force of his intellect and his personality, and his closeness to Cheney, whose political views he clearly shares. Addington has been an ally of Cheney's since the nineteen-eighties, and has been referred to as "Cheney's Cheney," or, less charitably, as "Cheney's hit man." Addington's talent for bureaucratic infighting is such that some of his supporters tend to invoke, with admiration, metaphors involving knives. Juleanna Glover Weiss, Cheney's former press secretary, said, "David is efficient, discreet, loyal, sublimely brilliant, and, as anyone who works with him knows, someone who, in a knife fight, you want covering your back." Bradford Berenson, a former White House lawyer, said, "He's powerful because people know he speaks for the Vice-President, and because he's an extremely smart, creative, and aggressive public official. Some engage in bureaucratic infighting using slaps. Some use knives. David falls into the latter category. You could make the argument that there are some costs. It introduces a little fear into the policymaking process. Views might be more candidly expressed without that fear. But David is like the Marines. No better friend—no worse enemy." People who have sparred with him agree. "He's utterly ruthless," Lawrence Wilkerson said. A former top national-security lawyer said, "He takes a political litmus test of everyone. If you're not sufficiently ideological, he would cut the ground out from under you."

Another reason for Addington's singular role after September 11th is that he offered legal certitude at a moment of great political and legal confusion, in an Administration in which neither the President, the Vice-President, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of State, nor the national-security adviser was a lawyer. (In the Clinton Administration, all these posts, except for the Vice-Presidency, were held by lawyers at some point.) Neither the Attorney General, John Ashcroft, nor the White House counsel, Alberto Gonzales, had anything like Addington's familiarity with national-security law. Moreover, Ashcroft's relations with the White House were strained, and he was left out of the inner circle that decided the most radical legal strategies in the war on terror. Gonzales had more influence, because of his longtime ties to the President, but, as an Administration lawyer put it, "he was an empty suit. He was weak. And he doesn't know shit about the Geneva Conventions." Participants in meetings in the White House counsel's office, in the days immediately after September 11th, have described Gonzales sitting in a wingback chair, asking questions, while Addington sat directly across from him and held forth. "Gonzales would call the meetings," the former high-ranking lawyer recalled. "But Addington was always the force in the room." Bruce Fein said that the Bush legal team was strikingly unsophisticated. "There is no one of legal stature, certainly no one like Bork, or Scalia, or Elliot Richardson, or Archibald Cox," he said. "It's frightening. No one knows the Constitution—certainly not Cheney."

Conventional wisdom holds that September 11th changed everything, including the thinking of Cheney and Addington. Brent Scowcroft, the former national-security adviser, has said of Cheney that he barely recognizes the reasonable politician he knew in the past. But a close look at the twenty-year collaboration between Cheney and Addington suggests that in fact their ideology has not changed much. It seems clear that Addington was able to promote vast executive powers after September 11th in part because he and Cheney had been laying the political groundwork for years. "This preceded 9/11," Fein, who has known both men professionally for decades, said. "I'm not saying that warrantless surveillance did. But the idea of reducing Congress to a cipher was already in play. It was Cheney and Addington's political agenda."

Addington's admirers see him as a selfless patriot, a workaholic defender of a purist interpretation of Presidential power—the necessary answer to threatening times. In 1983, Steve Berry, a Republican lawyer and lobbyist in Washington, hired Addington to work with him as the legislative counsel to the House Intelligence Committee; he has been a career patron and close friend ever since. He said, "I know him well, and I know that if there's a threat he will do everything in his power, within the law, to protect the United States." Berry added that Addington is acutely aware of the legal tensions between liberty and security. "We fought ourselves every day about it," he recalled. But, he said, they concluded that a "strong national security and defense" was the first priority, and that "without a strong defense, there's not much expectation or hope of having other freedoms." He said that there is no better defender of the country than Addington: "I've got a lot of respect for the guy. He's probably the foremost expert on intelligence and national-security law in the nation right now." Berry has a daughter who works in New York City, and he said that when he thinks of her safety he appreciates the efforts that Addington has made to strengthen the country's security. He said, "For Dave, protecting America isn't just a virtue. It's a personal mission. I feel safer just knowing he's where he is."

Berry said of his friend, "He's methodical, conscientious, analytical, and logical. And he's as straight an arrow as they come." He noted that Addington refuses to let Berry treat him to a hamburger because it might raise issues of influence-buying—instead, they split the check. Addington, he went on, has a dazzling ability to recall the past twenty-five years' worth of intelligence and national-security legislation. For many years, he kept a vast collection of legal documents in a library in his modest brick-and-clapboard home, in Alexandria, Virginia. One evening several years ago, lightning struck a nearby power line and the house caught fire; much of the archive burned. The fire started at around nine in the evening, and Addington, typically, was still in his office. His wife, Cynthia, and their three daughters were fine, but the loss of his extraordinary collection of papers and political memorabilia, Berry said, "was very hard for him to accept. All you get in this work is memorabilia. There is no cash. But he's the type of guy who gets psychic benefit from going to work every day, making a difference."

Though few people doubt Addington's knowledge of national-security law, even his admirers question his political instincts. "The only time I've seen him wrong is on his political judgment," a former colleague said. "He has a tin ear for political issues. Sometimes the law says one thing, but you have to at least listen to the other side. He will cite case history, case after case. David doesn't see why you have to compromise." Even Berry offered a gentle criticism: "His political skills can be overshadowed by his pursuit of what he feels is legally correct."

Addington has been a hawk on national defense since he was a teen-ager. Leonard Napolitano, an engineer who was one of Addington's close childhood friends, and whose political leanings are more like those of his sister, Janet Napolitano, the Democratic governor of Arizona, joked, “I don’t think that in high school David was a believer in the divine right of kings.” But, he said, Addington was “always conservative.”

The Addingtons were a traditional Catholic military family. They moved frequently; David’s father, Jerry, an electrical engineer in the Army, was assigned to a variety of posts, including Saudi Arabia and Washington, D.C., where he worked with the Joint Chiefs of Staff. As a teen-ager, Addington told a friend that he hoped to live in Washington himself when he grew up. Jerry Addington, a 1940 graduate of West Point who won a Bronze Star during the Second World War, also served in Korea and at the North American Air Defense Command, in Colorado; he reached the rank of brigadier general before he retired, in 1970, when David was thirteen. David attended public high school in Albuquerque, New Mexico, and his father began a second career, teaching middle-school math. His mother, Eleanore, was a housewife; the family lived in a ranch house in a middle-class subdivision. She still lives there; Jerry died in 1994. “We are an extremely close family,” one of Addington’s three older sisters, Linda, recalled recently. “Discipline was very important for us, and faith was very important. It was about being ethical—the right thing to do whether anyone else does it or not. I see that in Dave.” She was reluctant to say more. “Dave is most deliberate about his privacy,” she added.

Socially, Napolitano recalled, he and Addington were “the brains, or nerds.” Addington stood out for wearing black socks with shorts. He and his friends were not particularly athletic, and they liked to play poker all night on weekends, stopping early in the morning for breakfast. Their circle included some girls, until the boys found them “too distracting to our interest in cards,” Napolitano recalled.

When he and Addington were in high school, Napolitano said, the Vietnam War was in its final stages, and “there was a certain amount of ‘Challenge authority’ and alcohol and drugs, but they weren’t issues in our group.” Addington’s high-school history teacher, Irwin Hoffman, whom Napolitano recalled as wonderful, exacting, and “a flaming liberal,” said that Addington felt strongly that America “should have stayed and won the Vietnam War, despite the fact that we were losing.” Hoffman, who is retired, added, “The boy seemed terribly, terribly bright. He wrote well, and he was very verbal, not at all reluctant to express his opinions. He was pleasant and quite handsome. He also had a very strong sarcastic streak. He was scornful of anyone who said anything that was naïve, or less than bright. His sneers were almost palpable.”

Addington graduated in 1974, the year that Nixon resigned. In the aftermath of Watergate, liberal Democratic reformers imposed tighter restraints on the President and reined in the C.I.A., whose excesses were critiqued in congressional hearings, led by Senator Frank Church and Representative Otis Pike, that exposed details of assassination plots, coup attempts, mind-control experiments, and domestic spying. Congress passed a series of measures aimed at reinvigorating the system of checks and balances, including an expanded Freedom of Information Act and the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, the law requiring judicial review before foreign suspects inside the country could be wiretapped. It also created the House and Senate Intelligence Committees, which oversee all covert C.I.A. activities.

After high school, Addington pursued an ambition that he had had for years: to join the military. Rather than attending West Point, as his father had, he enrolled in the U.S. Naval Academy, in Annapolis. But he dropped out before the end of his freshman year. He went home and, according to Napolitano, worked in a Long John Silver’s restaurant. “The academy wasn’t academically challenging enough for him,” Napolitano said.

Addington went to Georgetown University, graduating summa cum laude, in 1978, from the school of foreign service; he went on to earn honors at Duke Law School. After graduating, in 1981, he married Linda Werling, a graduate student in pharmacology. The marriage ended in divorce. His current wife, Cynthia, takes care of their three girls full-time.

Soon after leaving Duke, Addington started his first job, in the general counsel’s office at the C.I.A. A former top agency lawyer who later worked with Addington said that Addington strongly opposed the reform movements that followed Vietnam and Watergate. “Addington was too young to be fully affected by the Vietnam War," the lawyer said. "He was shaped by the postwar, post-Watergate years instead. He thought the Presidency was too weakened. He's a believer that in foreign policy the executive is meant to be quite powerful."

These views were shared by Dick Cheney, who served as chief of staff in the Ford Administration. "On a range of executive-power issues, Cheney thought that Presidents from Nixon onward yielded too quickly," Michael J. Malbin, a political scientist who has advised Cheney on the issue of executive power, said. Kenneth Adelman, who was a high-ranking Pentagon official under Ford, said that the fall of Saigon, in 1975, was "very painful for Dick. He believed that Vietnam could have been saved—maybe—if Congress hadn't cut off funding. He was against that kind of interference."

Jane Harman, the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, who has spent considerable time working with Cheney and Addington in recent years, believes that they are still fighting Watergate. "They're focussed on restoring the Nixon Presidency," she said. "They've persuaded themselves that, following Nixon, things went all wrong." She said that in meetings Addington is always courtly and pleasant. But when it comes to accommodating Congress "his answer is always no."

In a revealing interview that Cheney gave last December to reporters travelling with him to Oman, he explained, "I do have the view that over the years there had been an erosion of Presidential power and authority. . . . A lot of the things around Watergate and Vietnam both, in the seventies, served to erode the authority I think the President needs." Further, Cheney explained, it was his express aim to restore the balance of power. The President needed to be able to act as Alexander Hamilton had described it in the Federalist Papers, with "secrecy" and "despatch"—especially, Cheney said, "in the day and age we live in . . . with the threats we face." He added, "I believe in a strong, robust executive authority, and I think the world we live in demands it."

At the C.I.A., where Addington spent two years, he focussed on curtailing the ability of Congress to interfere in intelligence gathering. "He was a rookie, plenty bright," Frederick Hitz, another C.I.A. lawyer, who later became Inspector General, recalled. After the Church and Pike hearings, legislators came up with hundreds of pages of oversight recommendations, he said. "Addington was very pro-agency. He was trying to figure out how to comply with government oversight without getting hog-tied." Addington viewed the public airings of the C.I.A.'s covert activities as "an absolute disaster," Berry recalled. "We both felt that Congress did great harm by flinging open the doors to operational secrets."

When Addington joined the C.I.A., it was directed by William J. Casey, who also regarded congressional constraints on the agency as impediments to be circumvented. His sentiment about congressional overseers was best captured during a hearing about covert actions in Central America, when he responded to tough questioning by muttering the word "assholes." After Reagan's election in 1980, the executive branch was dominated by conservative Republicans, while the House was governed by liberal Democrats. The two parties fought intensely over Central America; the Reagan Administration was determined to overthrow the leftist Sandinista government in Nicaragua. Using their constitutional authority over appropriations, the Democrats in Congress forbade the C.I.A. to spend federal funds to support the Contras, a rightist rebel group. But Casey's attitude, as Berry recalled it, was "We're gonna fund these freedom fighters whether Congress wants us to or not." Berry, then the staff director for the Republicans on the House Intelligence Committee, asked Casey for help in fighting the Democrats. Soon afterward, Addington joined Berry on Capitol Hill.

When the Iran-Contra scandal broke, in 1986, it exposed White House arms deals and foreign fund-raising designed to help the anti-Sandinista forces in Nicaragua. Members of Congress were furious. Summoned to Capitol Hill, Casey lied, denying that funds for the Contras had been solicited from any foreign governments, although he knew that the Saudis, among others, had agreed to give millions of dollars to the Contras, at the request of the White House. Even within the Reagan Administration, the foreign funding was controversial. Secretary of State George Shultz had warned Reagan that he might be committing an impeachable offense. But, under Casey's guidance, the White House went ahead with the plan; Shultz, having expressed misgivings, was not told. It was a bureaucratic tactic that Addington reprised after September 11th, when Powell was left out of key deliberations about the treatment of detainees. Lawrence Wilkerson, Powell's aide, said that he was aware of Addington's general strategy: "We had heard that, behind our backs, he was saying that Powell was 'soft, but easy to get around.' "

The Iran-Contra scandal substantially weakened Reagan's popularity and, eventually, seven people were convicted of seventeen felonies. Cheney, who was then a Republican congressman from Wyoming, worried that the scandal would further undercut Presidential authority. In late 1986, he became the ranking Republican on a House select committee that was investigating the scandal, and he commissioned a report on Reagan's support of the Contras. Addington, who had become an expert in intelligence law, contributed legal research. The scholarly-sounding but politically outlandish Minority Report, released in 1987, argued that Congress—not the President—had overstepped its authority, by encroaching on the President's foreign-policy powers. The President, the report said, had been driven by "a legitimate frustration with abuses of power and irresolution by the legislative branch." The Minority Report sanctioned the President's actions to a surprising degree, considering the number of criminal charges that resulted from the scandal. The report also defended the legality of ignoring congressional intelligence oversight, arguing that "the President has the Constitutional and statutory authority to withhold notifying Congress of covert actions under rare conditions." And it condemned "legislative hostage taking," noting that "Congress must realize . . . that the power of the purse does not make it supreme" in matters of war. In his December interview with reporters, Cheney proudly cited this document. "If you want reference to an obscure text, go look at the minority views that were filed in the Iran-Contra committee, the Iran-Contra report, in about 1987," he said. "Part of the argument was whether the President had the authority to do what was done in the Reagan years."

Addington and Cheney became a formidable team, but it was soon clear that Addington would not join Cheney as a politician. Adelman recalled Addington's personality as "dour," adding that, "unlike with Dick, I never saw much of a sense of humor. Cheney can be witty and funny. David is sober. I didn't see him at social events much." But, he added, "Dick wasn't looking for friends at work. He was looking for performance. And David delivers. He's efficient and dedicated. He's a doer." He went on, "Cheney's not a lawyer, so he would defer to David on the law."

In 1989, President George H. W. Bush appointed Cheney Secretary of Defense. Cheney hired Addington first as his special assistant and, later, as the Pentagon's general counsel. At the Pentagon, Addington became widely known as Cheney's gatekeeper—a stickler for process who controlled the flow of documents to his boss. Using a red felt-tipped pen, he covered his colleagues' memos with comments before returning them for rewrites. His editing invariably made arguments sharper, smarter, and more firm in their defense of Cheney's executive powers, a former military official who worked with him said.

At the Pentagon, Addington took a particular interest in the covert actions of the Special Forces. A former colleague recalled that, after attending a demonstration by Special Forces officers, he mocked the C.I.A., which was constrained by oversight laws. "This is how real covert operations are done," he said. (After September 11th, the Pentagon greatly expanded its covert intelligence operations; these programs have less congressional oversight than those of the C.I.A.) Cheney, throughout his tenure as Defense Secretary, shared with Addington a pessimistic view of the Soviet Union. Both remained skeptical of Gorbachev long after the State Department, the national-security adviser, and the C.I.A. had concluded that he was a reformer. "They were always, like, 'Whoa—beware the Bear!' " Wilkerson recalled. They immersed themselves in "continuity of government exercises"—studying with unusual intensity how the government might survive a nuclear attack. According to "Rise of the Vulcans," a history of the period by James Mann, Cheney, more than once, spent the night in an underground bunker.

A decade later, when hijacked planes slammed into the Twin Towers and the Pentagon, Addington, perhaps more than anyone else in the U.S. government, was ready to act. During the Clinton Presidency, he had worked as a lawyer for various business interests, such as the American Trucking Associations, and in 1994 he had led an exploratory Presidential campaign for Cheney, who decided against running. Once Cheney became Vice-President, Addington helped oversee the transition, setting up the most powerful Vice-Presidency in America's history. Addington's high-school friend Leonard Napolitano said Addington told him that he and Cheney were merging the Vice-President's office with the President's into a single "Executive Office," instead of having "two different camps." Napolitano added, "David said that

Cheney saw the Vice-President as the executive and implementer of the President." Addington created a system to insure that virtually all important documents relating to national-security matters were seen by the Vice-President's office. The former high-ranking Administration lawyer said that Addington regularly attended White House legal meetings with the C.I.A. and the National Security Agency. He received copies of all National Security Council documents, including internal memos from the staff. And, as a former top official in the Defense Department, he exerted influence over the legal office at the Pentagon, helping his protégé William J. Haynes secure the position of general counsel. A former national-security lawyer, speaking of the Pentagon's legal office, said, "It's obvious that Addington runs the whole operation."

In the days after September 11th, a half-dozen White House lawyers had heated discussions about how to frame the Administration's legal response to the attacks. Bradford Berenson, one of the participants, recalled how "raw" feelings were at the time: "There were thousands of bereaved American families. Everyone was expecting additional attacks. The only planes in the air were military. At a moment like that, there's an intense focus on responsibility and accountability. Preventing another attack should always be within the law. But if you have to err on the side of being too aggressive or not aggressive enough, you'd err by being too aggressive."

Berry said that Addington felt this keenly. "I've talked to David about this a little. Psychologically, it's really taxing to read every day not about one or two but about a dozen, or two dozen, legitimate reports about efforts to take out U.S. citizens. . . . There's a little bit of a bunker mentality that set in among some of the national-security-policy officials after 9/11."

Almost immediately, other Administration lawyers noticed that Addington dominated the internal debates. His assumption, shared by other hard-line lawyers in the White House counsel's office and in the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel, was that the criminal-justice system was insufficient to handle the threat from terrorism. The matter was settled without debate, Berenson recalled: "There was a consensus that we had to move from retribution and punishment to preëmption and prevention. Only a warfare model allows that approach."

Richard Shiffrin, the former Pentagon lawyer, said that during a tense White House meeting held in the Situation Room just a few days after September 11th "all of us felt under a great deal of pressure to be willing to consider even the most extraordinary proposals. The C.I.A., the N.S.C., the State Department, the Pentagon, and the Justice Department all had people there. Addington was particularly strident. He'd sit, listen, and then say, 'No, that's not right.' He was particularly doctrinaire and ideological. He didn't recognize the wisdom of the other lawyers. He was always right. He didn't listen. He knew the answers." The details of the discussion are classified, Shiffrin said, but he left with the impression that Addington "doesn't believe there should be co-equal branches." Another participant recalled, "If you favored international law, you were in danger of being called 'soft on terrorism' by Addington." He added that Addington's manner in meetings was "very insistent and very loud." Yet another participant said that, whenever he cautioned against executive-branch overreaching, Addington would respond brusquely, "There you go again, giving away the President's power."

Some of the protests from Democrats about the Administration's legal arguments and some of the declarations of high principle from Republicans are mere partisan gestures. Both sides have changed their views about the need for a strong President, depending on whether they were in power. "It's a matter of degree," the liberal Princeton historian Sean Wilentz said. "War always expands the powers of the Presidency. And Presidents always overreach." Lincoln infamously suspended habeas-corpus rights during the Civil War, locking up thousands of Confederate sympathizers without due process, and Franklin D. Roosevelt interned more than a hundred thousand innocent Japanese-Americans. "Someone said that this Administration is monarchical," Wilentz added. "That's just rhetoric. We're not a dictatorship. At the same time, this White House has assumed powers for itself that no previous Administration has done." Bush's defenders frequently cite the example of Lincoln as a justification for placing national security above the rule of law. But Schlesinger, in his book "War and the American Presidency" (2004), points out that Lincoln never "claimed an inherent and routine right to do what [he] did." The Bush White House, he told me, has seized on these historical aberrations and turned them into a doctrine of Presidential prerogative.

On September 25th, the Office of Legal Counsel issued a memo declaring that the President had inherent constitutional authority to take whatever military action he deemed necessary, not just in response to the September 11th attacks but also in the prevention of any future attacks from terrorist groups, whether they were linked to Al Qaeda or not. The memo's broad definition of the enemy went beyond that of Congress, which, on September 14th, had passed legislation authorizing the President to use military force against "nations, organizations, or persons" directly linked to the attacks. The memo was written by John Yoo, a lawyer in the Office of Legal Counsel who worked closely with Addington, and said, in part, "The power of the President is at its zenith under the Constitution when the President is directing military operations of the armed forces, because the power of the Commander-in-Chief is assigned solely to the President." The memo acknowledged that Article I of the Constitution gives Congress the power to declare war, but argued that it was a misreading to assume that the article gives Congress the lead role in making war. Instead, the memo said, "it is beyond question that the President has the plenary Constitutional power to take such military actions as he deems necessary and appropriate to respond to the terrorist attacks upon the United States on September 11, 2001." It concluded, "These decisions, under our Constitution, are for the President alone to make."

Another memo sanctioned torture when the President deems it necessary; yet another claimed that there were virtually no valid legal prohibitions against the inhumane treatment of foreign prisoners held by the C.I.A. outside the U.S. Most of these decisions, according to many Administration officials who were involved in the process, were made in secrecy, and the customary interagency debate and vetting procedures were sidestepped. Addington either drafted the memos himself or advised those who were drafting them. "Addington's fingerprints were all over these policies," said Wilkerson, who, as Powell's top aide, later assembled for the Secretary a dossier of internal memos detailing the decision-making process.

On November 13, 2001, an executive order setting up the military commissions was issued under Bush's signature. The decision stunned Powell; the national-security adviser, Condoleezza Rice; the highest-ranking lawyer at the C.I.A.; and many judge advocate generals, or JAGs, the top lawyers in the military services. None of them had been consulted. Michael Chertoff, the head of the Justice Department's criminal division, who had argued for trying terror suspects in the U.S. courts, was also bypassed. And the order surprised John Bellinger III, the National Security Council legal adviser and deputy White House counsel, who had been formally asked to help create a legal method for trying foreign terror suspects. According to multiple sources, Addington secretly usurped the process. He and a few hand-picked associates, including Bradford Berenson and Timothy Flanigan, a lawyer in the White House counsel's office, wrote the executive order creating the commissions. Moreover, Addington did not show drafts of the order to Powell or Rice, who, the senior Administration lawyer said, was incensed when she learned about her exclusion.

The order proclaimed a state of "extraordinary emergency," and announced that the rules for the military commissions would be dictated by the Secretary of Defense, without review by Congress or the courts. The commissions could try any foreign person the President or his representatives deemed to have "engaged in" or "abetted" or "conspired to commit" terrorism, without offering the right to seek an appeal from anyone but the President or the Secretary of Defense. Detainees would be treated "humanely," and would be given "full and fair trials," the order said. Yet the order continued that "it is not practicable" to apply "the principles of law and the rules of evidence generally recognized in the trial of criminal cases in the United States district courts." The death penalty, for example, could be imposed even if there was a split verdict. Moreover, in December, 2001, the Department of Defense circulated internal memos suggesting that, in the commission system, defendants would have only limited rights to confront their accusers, see all the evidence against them, or be present during their trials. There would be no right to remain silent, and hearsay evidence would be admissible, as would evidence obtained through physical coercion. Guilt did not need to be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. The order firmly established that terrorism would henceforth be approached on a war footing, endowing the President with enhanced

The precedent for the order was an arcane 1942 case, ex parte Quirin, in which Franklin Roosevelt created a military commission to try eight Nazi saboteurs who had infiltrated the United States via submarines. The Supreme Court upheld the case, 8–0, but even the conservative Justice Antonin Scalia has called it "not this Court's finest hour." Roosevelt was later criticized for creating a sham process. Moreover, while he used military commissions to try a handful of suspects who had already admitted their guilt, the Bush White House was proposing expanding the process to cover thousands of "enemy combatants." It was also ignoring the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which, having codified procedures for courts-martial in 1951, had rendered Quirin out of date.

Berenson said, "The legal foundation was very strong. F.D.R.'s order establishing military commissions had been upheld by the Supreme Court. This was almost identical. What we underestimated was the extent to which the culture had shifted beneath us since World War Two." Concerns about civil liberties and human rights, and anger over Vietnam and Watergate, he said, had turned public opinion against a strong executive branch: "But Addington thought military commissions had to be a tool at the President's disposal."

Rear Admiral Donald Guter, who was the Navy's chief JAG until June, 2002, said that he and the other JAGs, who were experts in the laws of war, tried unsuccessfully to amend parts of the military-commission plan when they learned of it, days before the order was formally signed by the President. "But we were marginalized," he said. "We were warning them that we had this long tradition of military justice, and we didn't want to tarnish it. The treatment of detainees was a huge issue. They didn't want to hear it." In a 2004 report in the Times, Guter said that when he and the other JAGs told Haynes that they needed more information, Haynes replied, "No, you don't." (Haynes's office offered no comment.)

At the Defense Department, Shiffrin, the deputy general counsel for intelligence, and a career lawyer rather than a political appointee, was taken aback when Haynes showed him the order. Earlier in Shiffrin's career, at the Justice Department, his office had been in the same room where the Nazi defendants were tried, and he had become interested in the case, which he said he regarded as "one of the worst Supreme Court cases ever." He recalled informing Haynes that he was skeptical of the Administration's invocation of Quirin. "Gee, this is problematic," Shiffrin told him.

Marine Major Dan Mori, the uniformed lawyer who has been assigned to defend David Hicks, one of the ten terror suspects in Guantánamo who have been charged, said of the commissions, "It was a political stunt. The Administration clearly didn't know anything about military law or the laws of war. I think they were clueless that there even was a U.C.M.J. and a Manual for Courts-Martial! The fundamental problem is that the rules were constructed by people with a vested interest in conviction."

Mori said that the charges against the detainees reflected a profound legal confusion. "A military commission can try only violations of the laws of war," he said. "But the Administration's lawyers didn't understand this." Under federal criminal statutes, for example, conspiring to commit terrorist acts is a crime. But, as the Nuremburg trials that followed the Second World War established, under the laws of war it is not, since all soldiers could be charged with conspiring to fight for their side. Yet, Mori said, a charge of conspiracy "is the only thing there is in many cases at Guantánamo—guilt by association. So you've got this big problem." He added, "I hope that nobody confuses military justice with these 'military commissions.' This is a political process, set up by the civilian leadership. It's inept, incompetent, and improper."

Under attack from defense lawyers like Mori, the military commissions have been tied up in the courts almost since the order was issued. Bellinger and others fought to make the commissions fairer, so that they could withstand court challenges, and the Pentagon gradually softened its rules. But Administration lawyers involved in the process said that Addington resisted at every turn. He insisted, for instance, on maintaining the admissibility of statements obtained through coercion, or even torture. In meetings, he argued that officials in charge of the military commissions should be given maximum flexibility to decide whether to include such evidence. "Torture isn't important to Addington as a scientific matter, good or bad, or whether it works or not," the Administration lawyer, who is familiar with these debates, said. "It's more about his philosophy of Presidential power. He thinks that if the President wants torture he should get torture. He always argued for 'maximum flexibility.' "

Last month, Addington lost this internal battle. The Administration rescinded the provision allowing coerced testimony, after even the military officials overseeing the commissions supported the reform. According to a senior Administration legal adviser who participated in discussions about the commissions, Addington remained opposed to the change. "He wanted no changes," the lawyer said. "He said the rules were good, right from the start." Addington accused officials who were trying to reform the rules of "giving away the President's prerogatives."

President Bush has blamed the legal challenges for the delays in prosecuting Guantánamo detainees. But many lawyers, even some inside the Administration, believe that the challenges were inevitable, considering the dubious constitutionality of the commissions. The Supreme Court's ruling in the Hamdan case is expected to establish whether the commissions meet basic standards of due process. The Administration lawyer isn't sanguine about the outcome. "It shows again that Addington overreached," he said.

Meanwhile, Addington has fought tirelessly to stem reform of other controversial aspects of the New Paradigm, such as the detention and interrogation of terror suspects. Last year, he and Cheney led an unsuccessful campaign to defeat an amendment, proposed by Senator John McCain, to ban the abusive treatment of detainees held by the military or the C.I.A. Government officials who have worked closely with Addington say he insists that legal flexibility is necessary, because of the iniquity of the enemy; moreover, he does not believe that the legal positions taken by the Bush Administration in the war on terror have damaged the country's international reputation. "He's a very smart guy, but he gives no credibility to those who say these policies are hurting us around the world," the senior Administration legal adviser said. "His feeling is that there are no costs. He'll say people are just whining. He thinks most of them would be against us no matter what." In Addington's view, critics of the Administration's aggressive legal policies are just political enemies of the President.

Yet, from the start, some of the sharpest critics of detainee-treatment policies have been military and law-enforcement officials inside the Bush Administration; people close to it, like McCain; and our foreign allies. Just a few months after the Guantánamo detention centers were established, members of the Administration began receiving reports that questioned whether all the prisoners there were really, as Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld had labelled them, "the worst of the worst." Guter said that the Pentagon had originally planned to screen the suspects individually on the battlefields in Afghanistan; such "Article 5 hearings" are a provision of the Geneva Conventions. But the White House cancelled the hearings, which had been standard protocol during the previous fifty years, including in the first Gulf War. In a January 25, 2002, legal memorandum, Administration lawyers dismissed the Geneva Conventions as "obsolete," "quaint," and irrelevant to the war on terror. The memo was signed by Gonzales, but the Administration lawyer said he believed that "Addington and Flanigan were behind it." The memo argued that all Taliban and Al Qaeda detainees were illegal enemy combatants, which eliminated "any argument regarding the need for case-by-case determination of P.O.W. status." Critics claim that the lack of a careful screening process led some innocent detainees to be imprisoned. "Article 5 hearings would have cost them nothing," the Administration lawyer, who was involved in the process, said. "They just wanted to make a point on executive power—that the President can designate them all enemy combatants if he wants to."

Guter, the Navy JAG, said that, before long, he and other military experts began to wonder whether the reason they weren't getting much useful intelligence from Guantánamo was that, as he puts it, "it wasn't there." Guter, who was in the Pentagon on September 11th, said, "I don't have a sympathetic bone in my body for the terrorists. But I just wanted to make sure we were getting the right people—the real terrorists. And I wanted to make sure we were doing it in a way consistent with our values."

While the JAGs' questions about the treatment of detainees went largely unheeded, he said, the C.I.A. was simultaneously raising similar concerns. In the summer of 2002, the agency had sent an Arabic-speaking analyst to Guantánamo to find out why more intelligence wasn't being collected, and, after interviewing several dozen prisoners, he had come back with bad news: more than half the detainees, he believed, didn't belong there. He wrote a devastating classified report, which reached General John Gordon, the deputy national-security adviser for combatting terrorism. In a series of meetings at the White House, Gordon, Bellinger, and other officials warned Addington and Gonzales that potentially innocent people had been locked up in Guantánamo and would be indefinitely. "This is a violation of basic notions of American fairness," Gordon and Bellinger argued. "Isn't that what we're about as a country?" Addington's response, sources familiar with the meetings said, was "These are 'enemy combatants.' Please use that term. They've all been through a screening process. We don't have anything to talk about."

A former Administration official said of Addington's response, "It seemed illogical. How could you deny the possibility that one or more people were locked up who shouldn't be? There were old people, sick people—why do we want to keep them?" At the meeting, Gordon and Bellinger argued, "The American public understands that wars are confusing and exceptional things happen. But the American public will expect some due process."

Addington and Gonzales dismissed this concern. The former Administration official recalled that Addington was "the dominant voice. It was a non-debate, in his view." The confrontation made clear, though, that Addington had been informed early that there were problems at Guantánamo. "There wasn't a lack of knowledge or understanding," the former official said.

Addington has proved deft at outmaneuvering his critics. Documents embarrassing to Addington's opponents have been leaked to the press, if not necessarily by him. A top-secret N.S.C. memo describing Powell's request to reconsider the suspension of the Geneva Conventions appeared in the Washington Times the day after it was circulated to the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, and the Vice-President; the article cited unnamed sources who accused Powell of "bowing to pressure from the political left." The Administration lawyer said, "The way Addington works, he controls the flow of information very tightly." Addington chastised a Justice Department official who showed a legal opinion on the treatment of detainees to the State Department. He repeatedly directed Gonzales, the White House counsel, to keep Bellinger, the N.S.C. lawyer, out of meetings about national-security issues. "Lip-lock" is the word Addington's old Pentagon colleague Sean O'Keefe, now the chancellor of Louisiana State University, used to describe his discretion. "He's like Cheney," O'Keefe said. "You can't get anything out of him with a crowbar." The Administration lawyer said, "He's a bully, pure and simple." Several talented top lawyers who challenged Addington on important legal matters concerning the war on terror, including Patrick Philbin, James Comey, and Jack Goldsmith, left the Administration under stressful circumstances. Other reform-minded government lawyers who clashed with Addington, including Bellinger and Matthew Waxman, both of whom were at the N.S.C. during Bush's first term, have moved to the State Department.

Waxman, a young lawyer who headed the Pentagon's office of detainee affairs, departed soon after he had a major confrontation with Addington over the issue of clarifying military rules for the treatment of prisoners. Waxman believed that international standards for the humane treatment of detainees should be followed, and argued for reforms in the Army Field Manual. He hoped to reinstate the basic standards that are specified in the Geneva Conventions. This meant the prohibition of torture, overt acts of violence, and "outrages on personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment." Although the Vice-President's office is not part of the military chain of command, last September Addington summoned Waxman to his office and berated him. Waxman declined to comment on the incident, but a former colleague in the Pentagon, in whom Waxman confided, said that Addington accused Waxman of wanting to fight the war on terror his own way, rather than the President's way. The Army Field Manual still hasn't been revised, and, according to those involved, Addington and his protégé Haynes remain the major obstacles.

Last fall, Richard Shiffrin, the Pentagon lawyer who was left out of the Administration's initial discussions of the military commissions, learned from the Times about the Administration's decision to sanction warrantless domestic electronic surveillance by the National Security Agency. This was remarkable, because Shiffrin was the Pentagon lawyer in charge of supervising the N.S.A.'s legal advisers. "It was exceptional that I didn't know about it—extraordinary," Shiffrin said. "In the prior Administration, on anything involving N.S.A. legal issues I'd have been made aware. And I should have been in this one."

Shortly after September 11th, Addington and Cheney, without alerting Shiffrin, held meetings with top N.S.A. lawyers in the Vice-President's office and told them that the President, as Commander-in-Chief, had the authority to override the FISA statutes and not seek warrants from the special court. According to the Times, Addington and Cheney pushed the N.S.A. to engage in practices that the agency thought were illegal, such as the warrantless wiretapping of American suspects making domestic calls. General Michael Hayden, the former head of the N.S.A., who was recently confirmed as director of the C.I.A., has denied being pressured. Shiffrin, however, doubted that the N.S.A. lawyers were expert enough in Article II of the Constitution, which defines the President's powers, to argue back. He described the Administration's legal arguments on wiretapping as "close calls."

Others are more critical. Fourteen prominent constitutional scholars, representing a range of political views, recently wrote an open letter to Congress, claiming that the N.S.A. surveillance program "appears on its face to violate existing law." The scholars noted that Bush had made no effort to amend the FISA law to suit national-security needs—he simply ignored it. The Republican legal activist Bruce Fein said, "What makes this so sinister is that the members of this Administration have unchecked power. They don't care if the wiretapping is legal or not." But the former high-ranking Administration lawyer suggested that the situation is more serious than an intentional infraction of the law. "It's not that they think they're skirting the law," he said. "They think that this is the law."

Fein suggested that the only way Congress will be able to reassert its power is by cutting off funds to the executive branch for programs that it thinks are illegal. But this approach has been tried, and here, too, Addington has had the last word. John Murtha, the ranking Democrat on the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense, put a provision in the Pentagon's appropriations bills for 2005 and 2006 forbidding the use of federal funds for any intelligence-gathering that violates the Fourth Amendment, which protects the privacy of American citizens. The White House, however, took exception to Congress's effort to cut off funds. When President Bush signed the appropriations bills into law, he appended "signing statements" asserting that the Commander-in-Chief had the right to collect intelligence in any way he deemed necessary. The signing statement for the 2005 budget, for instance, noted that the executive branch would "construe" the spending limit only "in a manner consistent with the President's constitutional authority as Commander-in-Chief, including for the conduct of intelligence operations."

According to the Boston Globe, Addington has been the "leading architect" of these signing statements, which have been added to more than seven hundred and fifty laws. He reportedly scrutinizes every bill before President Bush signs it, searching for any language that might impinge on Presidential power. These wars of words are yet another battlefront between Addington and Congress, and some constitutional scholars find them troubling. Few of the signing statements were noticed until one of them was slipped into Bush's signing of the McCain amendment. The language was legal boilerplate, reserving the right to construe the legislation only as it was consistent with the Constitution. But, considering that Cheney's office had waged, and lost, a public fight to defeat the McCain amendment democratically—the vote in the Senate was 90–9—the signing statement seemed sneaky and subversive.

Earlier this month, the American Bar Association voted to investigate whether President Bush had exceeded his constitutional authority by reserving the right to ignore portions of laws that he has signed. Richard Epstein, the University of Chicago law professor, said, "What's frightening to me is that this Administration is always willing to push the conventions to the limits—and beyond. With his signing statements, I think the President just goes too far. If you sign these things with a caveat, do the inferior officers follow the law or the caveat?"

Bruce Fein argues that Addington's signing statements are "unconstitutional as a strategy," because the Founding Fathers wanted Presidents to veto legislation openly if they thought the bills were unconstitutional. Bush has not vetoed a single bill since taking office. "It's part of the balancing process," Fein said. "It's about accountability. If you veto something, everyone knows where you stand. But this President wants to do it sotto voce. He wants to give the image that he's accommodating on torture, and then reserves the right to torture anyway."

David Addington is a satisfactory lawyer, Fein said, but a less than satisfactory student of American history, which, for a public servant of his influence, matters more. "If you read the Federalist Papers, you can see how rich in history they are," he said. "The Founders really understood the history of what people did with power, going back to Greek and Roman and Biblical times. Our political heritage is to be skeptical of executive power, because, in particular, there was skepticism of King George III. But Cheney and Addington are not students of history. If they were, they'd know that the Founding Fathers would be shocked by what they've done."

DRAFT—7/01/06

ENEMY COMBATANT MILITARY COMMISSIONS ACT

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE; AUTHORITY; FINDINGS.

(a) SHORT TITLE.—This Act may be cited as the "Enemy Combatant Military Commissions Act of 2006."

(b) AUTHORITY.—The requirements, conditions, and restrictions established by this Act are made under the authority of Congress under clauses 1, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 18 of article I, section 8 of the Constitution of the United States.

(c) FINDINGS.—Congress finds the following:

(1) For over 10 years, the al Qaeda terrorist organization has waged an unlawful campaign of violence and terror against the citizens of the United States and their allies abroad. Al Qaeda was involved in the bombing of the World Trade Center in New York City in 1993, the bombing of the Khobar Towers in Saudi Arabia in 1996, the bombing of the U.S. Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998, and the attack on the U.S.S. Cole in Yeman in 2000. On September 11, 2001, members of al Qaeda hijacked commercial airplanes and attacked the World Trade Center in New York City and the Pentagon in Washington, DC. Nearly 3,000 civilians were killed.

(2) Following September 11, Congress recognized the existing hostilities with al Qaeda and authorized the President "to use all necessary and appropriate force against those nations, organizations, or persons he determines planned, authorized, committed, or aided the terrorist attacks that occurred on September 11, 2001 … in order to prevent any future acts of international terrorism against the United States by such nations, organizations or persons." Authorization for Use of Military Force (AUMF), 115 Stat. 224, note following 50 U.S.C. § 1541.

(3) The President has inherent authority to convene military tribunals arising from his role as Commander and Chief of the Armed Forces under article II of the Constitution. As the United States Supreme Court has recognized, "[s]ince our nation's earliest days, such tribunals have been constitutionally recognized agencies for meeting many urgent governmental responsibilities related to war…. They have taken many forms and borne many names. Neither their procedure nor their jurisdiction has been prescribed by statute. It has been adapted in each instance to the need that called it forth." Madsen v. Kinsella, 343 U.S. 341 (1952).

(4) Pursuant to the President's inherent authority and to the AUMF, the President issued a comprehensive military order to govern the "Detention, Treatment, and Trial of Certain Non-Citizens in the War Against Terrorism" and authorized the Secretary of Defense to establish military commission to try detained enemy combatants for violations of the laws of war. 66 Fed. Reg. 57833 (2001).

(5) In Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, the Supreme Court held that the military commissions established under the President's authority conflicted with the Uniform Code of Military Justice, 10 U.S.C. § 801 et seq. As Justice Kennedy recognized in his concurring opinion, the Court's decision was premised upon "domestic statutes," and therefore if Congress "deems it appropriate to change the controlling statutes, in conformance with the Constitution and other laws, it has the power and prerogative to do so."

(6) Article I, section 8, of the Constitution provides that the Congress has the power to "constitute Tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court; … define and punish … Offenses against the Law of Nations; … make Rules concerning Captures on Land and Water; … make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof."

(7) This Act is in direct response to the Supreme Court's decision in Hamdan. The Act confirms the President's authority to detain and prosecute by military commissions those unlawful combatants captured by United States forces during the War on Terror. The Act ensures that courts do not construe other federal laws or treaties in a manner that would prevent the prosecution of enemy combatants by military commissions established under the procedures set out in this Act.

(8) The Act also resolves uncertainties that may have arisen under the Supreme Court's decision in Hamdan by making clear that the standards for treating detainees under the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 fully satisfy the United States' obligations under international law, including Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions.

SECTION 2. DEFINITIONS.

As used in this Act, the following definitions apply:

(1) APPROPRIATE COMMITTEES OF CONGRESS.—The term "appropriate committees of Congress" means the Committee on Armed Services of the Senate and the Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives.

DOJ_NMG_0037655

(2) CLASSIFIED INFORMATION.—The term "classified information" has the meaning given that term in section 1(a) of the Classified Information Procedures Act (18 U.S.C. App.).

(3) COMMISSION.—The term "commission" means a military commission established pursuant to section 5 of this Act.

(4) ENEMY COMBATANT.—The term "enemy combatant" means persons determined by the President or the Secretary of Defense to have engaged in or conspired to engage in armed hostilities against the United States or its allies and who pose a risk of return to such hostilities.

(5) GENEVA CONVENTIONS.—The term "Geneva Conventions" means the international conventions signed at Geneva, 12 August 1949, including common Article 3.

SECTION 3. AUTHORIZATION FOR DETENTIONS.

(a) The President is authorized to detain enemy combatants for the duration of hostilities, consistent with the requirements of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 and this Act, at such places, including within the United States, as he deems appropriate.

(b) With respect to detainees in the custody of the Department of Defense, the Secretary of Defense shall apply the procedures promulgated under the Detainee Treatment Act for Combatant Status Review Tribunals to determine each detainee's initial enemy combatant status and Administrative Review Boards to review annually whether each detainee continues to pose a risk of return to hostilities.

SECTION 4. AUTHORIZATION FOR MILITARY COMMISSIONS.

(a) The President is authorized to establish military commissions for the trial of individuals for the violations of the laws and customs of war, including conspiracy to violate the laws and customs of war.

(b) The military commission shall have the authority to impose upon any defendant found guilty after a proceeding under this Act a sentence that is appropriate to the offense or offenses for which there was a finding of guilt, which sentence may include death, imprisonment for life or term of years, payment of fine or restitution, or such other lawful punishment or condition of punishment as the Commission shall determine to be proper.

(c) The Secretary of Defense shall be authorized to carry out a sentence of punishment decreed by a military commission pursuant to such procedures.

(d) Notwithstanding any other provision of federal law or treaty, the military commissions established under this Act shall be deemed to satisfy the obligations of the United States under the Geneva Conventions or any other treaty applicable to the detention, treatment, or prosecution of enemy combatants.

(e) ANNUAL REPORT.—The Secretary of Defense shall submit to the appropriate committees of Congress an annual report on the conduct of trials by military commissions under this Act. Each such report shall be submitted in unclassified form, with classified annex, if necessary. The report shall be submitted not later than December 31 each year.

SECTION 5. MILITARY COMMISSIONS.

(a) COMMISSION PERSONNEL.

(1) MEMBERS.—The Secretary of Defense shall appoint the members of each military commission. Each member shall be a commissioned officer of the United States Armed Forces, including without limitation reserve personnel on active duty, National Guard personnel on active duty in Federal service, and retired personnel recalled to active duty.

(2) NUMBER.—Each commission shall consist of three military officers. The commission also shall include an alternate member who shall attend all sessions and take the place of a commission member in the case of incapacity, resignation, or removal of any member.

(3) PRESIDING OFFICER.—From among the members of each Commission, the Secretary of Defense shall designate a Presiding Officer to preside over the proceedings of that Commission. The Presiding Officer shall be a United States military judge.

(4) DUTIES OF THE PRESIDING OFFICER

(A) The Presiding Officer shall admit or exclude evidence in accordance with the rules of evidence established by the Secretary of Defense and by this Act.

(B) The Presiding Officer shall have the authority to close proceedings or portions of proceedings in accordance with this Act.

(C) The Presiding Officer shall ensure that the discipline, dignity, and decorum of the proceedings are maintained, shall exercise control over the proceedings to ensure proper implementation of the President's Military Order and this

Act, and shall have authority to act upon any contempt or breach of commission rules or procedures. The Presiding Officer shall have the authority to discipline attorneys authorized to appear before the commission for violations of the laws, rules, regulations, or orders governing the proceedings, including but not limited to revocation of eligibility to appear before that commission or to appear before any other commission convened under this Act.

(D) The Presiding Officer shall ensure the expeditious conduct of the trial. In no circumstances shall accommodation of counsel be allowed to delay proceedings unreasonably.

(E) The Presiding Officer may certify all interlocutory questions, the disposition of which would effect a termination of proceedings with respect to a charge, to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

(b) POWERS OF A COMMISSION.—A commission shall have the following powers:

(1) To summon witnesses to trial and to require their attendance and testimony to put questions to them;

(2) To require the production of documents and other evidentiary material;

(3) To administer oaths to witnesses;

(4) To appoint officers for the carrying out of any task designated by the commission, including the power to have evidence taken.

(c) PROCEDURES.

(1) The military commissions shall be conducted pursuant to procedures promulgated by the Secretary of Defense, consistent with the requirements of this Act. The Secretary of Defense need not rely upon the procedures for courts martial pursuant to the Uniform Code of Military Justice, where he deems alternative procedures appropriate.

(2) EVIDENCE.—Evidence is admissible if the Presiding Officer determines that it would have probative value to a reasonable person. Hearsay evidence shall be admissible in the discretion of the Presiding Officer where its probative value is not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial impact.

(3) STANDARD OF PROOF.—All 3 members of a commission shall agree that the defendant is guilty of a charge beyond a reasonable doubt for a defendant to be found guilty.

(4) OPEN PROCEEDINGS.—The military commission shall hold open proceedings except as noted in this subsection.

(A) The Presiding Officer may close all or a portion of the proceeding upon a determination that closing of the proceeding is necessary to protect classified information; the physical safety of the participants in the proceeding; intelligence and law enforcement sources, methods, or activities; or other national security interests.

(B) The Presiding Officer may close all or part of a proceeding on his own initiative or based upon a presentation, including an ex parte or in camera presentation, by either the prosecution or the defense.

(C) A decision to close a proceeding or portion thereof may include a decision to exclude the defendant, provided that one defense counsel must be present for all trial proceedings, and the exclusion shall be no broader than necessary.

(d) COUNSEL.—The Secretary of Defense shall have the authority to promulgate regulations for the appointment of the prosecution, counsel for the defense, and any other commission personnel.

(e) SUBMITTAL OF PROCEDURES.—Not later than 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense shall submit to the appropriate committees of Congress a report setting forth the procedures for military commissions promulgated under this section. Thereafter, the Secretary of Defense shall submit to the same committees a report on any modification of such procedures, no later than 60 days before the date on which such modifications shall go into effect.

SECTION 6. JURISDICTION.

(a) MILITARY COMMISSION JURISDICTION.

(1) A military commission shall have jurisdiction to hear any criminal prosecution involving international terrorism, including any offense under chapter 113B of title 18, United States Code.

(2) A military commission shall have exclusive jurisdiction over violations of the laws of war, including conspiracy to violate the laws of war, committed by enemy combatants engaged in hostilities against the United States or its allies.

(3) A military commission shall have jurisdiction over other offenses traditionally triable by military commissions or pursuant to the Department of Defense's Military Commission Instruction Number Two.

SECTION 7. EXCLUSIVITY OF JURISDICTION; RULES OF CONSTRUCTION; RETROACTIVE APPLICATION.

(a) JUDICIAL REVIEW.—Notwithstanding any other law, no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider any claim or cause of action whatsoever, including an application for a writ of habeas corpus, relating to an alien detained as an enemy combatant by the United States, other than the review procedures provided by this Act and by the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005.

(b) CONSTRUCTION.—This Act shall be construed in accordance with its plain language and without any reference to the doctrine of constitutional avoidance or to the judgments of foreign or international courts.

(c) RETROACTIVE APPLICATION.—This Act shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act and shall apply to all aliens detained as enemy combatants by the United States and to any claim or cause of action whatsoever relating to an alien detained as an enemy combatant by the United States that is pending on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.

SECTION 8. REVIEW OF FINAL DECISIONS OF MILITARY COMMISSIONS; SATISFICATION OF TREATY OBLIGATIONS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 1005 of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 (10 U.S.C. 801 note) is amended—

(1) in subsection (e)(3)(A), by striking "(B), (C), and (D)," and inserting "(B) and (C)"; and

(2) in subsection (e)(3)(A), by striking "pursuant to Military Commission Order No. 1, August 31, 2005 (or any successor military order)" and inserting "by a military commission constituted under the Enemy Combatant Detention Act of 2006, and from any interlocutory appeal certified by the Presiding Officer of a military commission".

(b) GRANT OF REVIEW.—Section 1005 of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 (10 U.S.C. 801 note) is amended by striking subsection (e)(3)(B) and renumbering subsections (e)(3)(C) and (e)(3)(D) as subsections (e)(3)(B) and (e)(3)(C), respectively.

(c) LIMITATION ON APPEALS.—Section 1005 of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 (10 U.S.C. 801 note) is amended—

(1) in subsection (e)(3)(C)(i), by striking "pursuant to the military order" and inserting "by a military commission"; and

(2) in subsection (e)(3)(C)(i), by striking "at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba"; and

(3) in subsection (e)(3)(C)(ii), by striking "pursuant to such military order" and inserting "by such a military commission".

(d) SCOPE OF REVIEW.— Section 1005 of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 (10 U.S.C. 801 note) is amended in subsection (e)(3)(D)(i) by striking "specified in the military order" and inserting "specified for a military commission".

(e) LIMITATION ON CLAIMS.—Section 1005 of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 (10 U.S.C. 801 note) is amended in subsection (e)(2)(B)(i) by replacing "the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba" with "United States"

(f) SATISFACTION OF TREATY OBLIGATIONS.

(1) Section 1003 of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 (10 U.S.C. 801 note) is amended by adding the following at the end of subsection (a):

"Satisfaction of this requirement shall fully satisfy the United States' obligations under section 1 of common Article 3 of the international conventions signed at Geneva, 12 August 1949, with the exception of the obligations imposed by subsections 1(b) and 1(d)."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Administration Waiting For Congress To Act On Detainee Policy. While the White House was characterized as waiting for Congress to respond to the recent Supreme Court ruling on Guantanamo detainees, Congress was described as preparing to take action in what is expected to be a high-profile partisan debate which could effect the mid-term elections. NBC Nightly News (6/30, story 5, 2:00, P. Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Government lawyers met in Washington trying to figure out how to come up with some way to put detainees at Guantanamo on trial." Sen. Arlen Specter has "introduced a bill to revive military commissions. It's an idea the Bush administration favors, worried military courts would give detainees too much access to classified information. Human rights lawyers say trial by court martial would be more fair and respected worldwide." Meanwhile, "the Administration wants to see what Congress comes up with, delaying any trials for months."

GOP Takes Lead In Challenging Democrats Over Detainee Policy. Most US newspapers Saturday morning described GOP lawmakers as aggressively acting in response to the detainee ruling. The Washington Post (7/1, A1, Abramowitz, Weisman, 744K) in a front page story reports, "Republicans yesterday looked to wrest a political victory from a legal defeat in the Supreme Court, serving notice to Democrats that they must back President Bush on how to try suspects at Guantanamo Bay or risk being branded as weak on terrorism." While "the White House and lawmakers weighed next steps, House GOP leaders signaled they are ready to use this week's turn of events as a political weapon." One senior administration official "seemed to hint at the potential political implications in Congress. 'Members of both parties will have to decide whether terrorists who cherish the killing of innocents deserve the same protections as our men and women who wear the uniform,' this official said."

The Wall Street Journal (7/1, McKinnon, Bravin, 2.11M) reports, "Many Republicans predict that despite the White House's legal defeat over military tribunals, President Bush will emerge as the political winner among security-conscious voters." On Friday "Republicans sought to score points for the president. Conservative legal activists charged Democrats with excessive celebration of the decision, and said they would alienate voters. House Majority Leader John Boehner accused Democrats of supporting 'special privileges for terrorists.'" But in response "a number of Democratic lawmakers suggested that voters are likely to be frustrated with how the administration has handled the Guantanamo Bay detention center." Recently "Bush appeared to gain political momentum, thanks to a series of positive developments in Iraq. But the ruling could remind voters of the mistakes and overreaching that have dogged the administration's war effort."

The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Reynolds, 958K) says "The debate is expected to dominate the congressional agenda for the coming months, and is likely to fuel a partisan confrontation over whether the United States has gone too far on some fronts in conducting its war on terrorism." The Times notes, "Simply asking Congress to OK the policy…appeared Friday to be the approach favored by the White House." While the detainee ruling "may be a blow to the president's policies, it may benefit his party politically -- permitting candidates in November elections to talk tough about fighting terrorists and portray Democrats as weak."

The Washington Times (7/1, Seper, 90K) reports, "The White House yesterday said the Guantanamo Bay prison will remain open until all the detainees are dealt with, and the administration will work with Congress to remedy problems the Supreme Court cited when it ruled special military tribunals were illegally created." And "White House spokesman Tony Snow said Congress is interested in ensuring the more than 400 detainees at the naval facility in Cuba are brought to justice or sent home." Snow said, "You close it when you finish handling all the cases of people who are at Guantanamo."

Sen. Warner Uncommitted To Legislation Creating New Military Tribunals. In contrast to other publications, the New York Times (7/1, Zernike, 1.19M) described the debate over new military tribunals as potentially splitting Republicans, reporting, "A leading Senate Republican said Friday that he was not sure that Congress should pass legislation to create new military tribunals for terror suspects, a stance that raised doubts about prospects for a White House plan to establish an alternative to the commissions struck down this week by the Supreme Court." Warner is "concerned that new tribunals, even if authorized by Congress, might not withstand judicial scrutiny." Warner's caution "suggested signs of division, even among Republicans, about how to balance concerns about the threat posed by terrorism with the court's requirements that detainees must be granted some basic rights."

Ruling On Detainees Seen As Threat To Executive Authority. Knight Ridder (7/1, Landay, Taylor, Talev) in an article titled "Supreme Court Ruling May Ripple Through Other Bush Policies" cites "widespread agreement" by experts that the recent ruling on detainees could impact the Administration's NSA terrorist surveillance program and detainee policies and says, "At its heart, legal experts said, the ruling rebuffed Bush's contention that the president has special powers during wartime to disregard acts of Congress and international treaties." In an interview Sen. Lindsay Graham agreed, saying, "One of the potential implications is that the 'inherent authority' argument pushed by the executive branch may be in retreat." Meanwhile, Sen. Arlen Specter "said he doesn't take the court's ruling to mean that those already being held would be off the hook simply because their rights were found to have been violated." Specter said, "They can argue that…but I think there's a basis for detaining them if they're dangerous." If "Congress passes legislation 'very promptly'" they will not be released. And "Graham agreed that the court's ruling 'confirms that the military can hold these people until the hostilities are over." He said "we now know how to write the statute to make it constitutional and to be able to move the cases forward."

The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Spiegel, 958K) in an analysis described the potential impact of the ruling as "unclear" writing that for Salim Ahmed Hamdan, "the future is a bit clearer: He must receive a trial with new, congressionally approved procedures." Yet, "the landmark 5-3 decision may also have a significant impact on hundreds of other detainees at Guantanamo, as well as an unknown number picked up by U.S. forces and held in undisclosed locations around the world." It "could lead to sweeping changes in the way they are treated, according to legal experts and advocates for those held. The ruling could give Guantanamo prisoners a day in a U.S. court, and senior Al Qaeda operatives being held as U.S. captives visits from the Red Cross."

And the AP (7/1, Yost) notes, "The Supreme Court setback for the White House comes amid a full frontal assault by the administration against The New York Times for revealing the existence of the NSA program as well as another secret government initiative accessing a huge databank of bank records." The AP adds, "The American Society of Newspaper Editors, responding to such criticism, said Friday that the Bush administration and some in Congress 'are threatening America's bedrock values of free speech and free press with their attempts to demonize newspapers for fulfilling their constitutional role in our democratic society.'"

Kennedy Applauded For Checking Executive Authority. The Financial Times (7/1, Waldmeir) credits Justice Anthony Kennedy with dealing the "historic blow this week to the executive powers of the Bush administration." The Times asks "Does that mean Justice Kennedy can be relied on to vote against the government in future cases inspired by this week's Hamdan case? Perhaps in a challenge to the president's warrantless wiretapping programme? Legal experts say it is too soon to tell. But one thing is clear: the new court is no lapdog of the Bush administration, and the new swing voter is no fan of unfettered executive power."

Ruling Seen As Rewarding Detainees' Efforts. Time (7/1, Zagorin) in a web exclusive reports that Guantanamo detainee "hunger strikers have already won a measure of success. In part because of their protests, and the attention focused on Guantanamo, the U.S. is facing growing criticism -- from both allies and enemies -- for the rules of detention at the camp. Now the Supreme Court's Hamdan decision effectively grants prisoners at least some of their longstanding demands, including more rights at trial. All the same, most of them are unlikely to be released soon. Indeed, authorities are currently constructing a new, state-of-the-art, $30 million prison at Guantanamo, where they plan to consolidate many of the camp's maximum-security inmates."

More Commentary. Weekly Standard senior editor Christopher Caldwell in his column titled "A Blessing In Disguise For Bush" in the Financial Times (7/1, Caldwell) writes that while the media celebrated the Supreme Court's detainee ruling, "Since Guantánamo does not agitate US public opinion in the way that overseas sceptics of the war on terror would assume, the five-to-three decision will wreak no sea change in politics, nor harm Mr Bush. As November elections heave into view, it could just as easily help him." Bush, "much like everyone else, is groping for an intellectual handhold on the problem of terrorism." But if "Hamdan is not to be tried as a war criminal, it is because of a new ambiguity that surrounds the word "war", rather than a new ambiguity that surrounds the word "criminal". What do you charge a person like Mr Hamdan with? Even if Mr Bush has come up with the wrong answer, Americans are not about to punish him for thinking that it is the right question.

Edwin S. Matthews Jr., counsel of record for 175 members of the British Parliament who filed a brief in Rasul v. George W. Bush supporting judicial review of the holding of prisoners by the United States government in Guantánamo, writes in a letter to the editor of the New York Times (7/1, 1.19M) that the Supreme Court, in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, "stood up to protect us all." The "government has denied prisoners in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba," the right to be present at our trial, the right to know what evidence the state presents against us, the right to be defended by counsel we choose and the right under the Geneva Conventions to benefit from 'all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples,'" and it "could under many other circumstances deny them to any of us. No war against anything justifies the denial of such essential rights."

Lawyers Claim NSA Sought To Create Domestic Monitoring Program Before 9/11 Attacks. Bloomberg (7/1, Harris) reports, "The U.S. National Security Agency asked AT&T Inc. to help it set up a domestic call monitoring site seven months before the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks, lawyers" suing telecommunications companies over allegations they cooperated with the NSA terrorist surveillance program "claimed June 23 in court papers filed in New York federal court." In June 2000 a "NSA initiative, code-named 'Pioneer Groundbreaker,' asked AT&T unit AT&T Solutions to build exclusively for NSA use a network operations center which duplicated AT&T's Bedminster, New Jersey facility, the court papers claimed. That plan was abandoned in favor of the NSA acquiring the monitoring technology itself, plaintiffs' lawyers Bruce Afran said."

USA Today Admits It Cannot Confirm Telecommunication Companies Cooperated With NSA. USA Today (6/30, 2a, 2.31M) reports, "Members of the House and Senate intelligence committees confirm that the National Security Agency has compiled a massive database of domestic phone call records. But some lawmakers also say that cooperation by the nation's telecommunication companies was not as extensive as first reported by USA TODAY on May 11." USA Today continues, "Several lawmakers, briefed in secret by intelligence officials about the program after the story was published, described a call records database that is enormous but incomplete. Most asked that they not be identified by name, and many offered only limited responses to questions, citing national security concerns."

USA Today (6/30, 2.31M) in a note to its readers Friday said "Based on its reporting after the May 11 article, USA TODAY has now concluded that while the NSA has built a massive domestic calls record database involving the domestic call records of telecommunications companies, the newspaper cannot confirm that BellSouth or Verizon contracted with the NSA to provide bulk calling records to that database."

The New York Times (7/1, Richtel, 1.19M) notes, "In the aftermath of the USA Today article in May, The New York Times reported that the security agency's efforts to collect phone data appeared to be focusing not on the local service phone companies, like BellSouth, Verizon and Qwest, but on the long-distance companies, including the former MCI and AT&T." In May, "Verizon issued a statement saying it had not turned over calling records to the security agency, but it left open the possibility that MCI, which it recently acquired, had done so. Verizon said yesterday that it had no further comment." And "AT&T said yesterday: 'The news media have carried reports alleging that AT&T is participating in an N.S.A. terrorist surveillance program. Unfortunately, the law does not permit AT&T to respond to those allegations.'"

The Washington Post (7/1, A2, Ahrens, Kurtz, 744K) says "The correction illustrates the difficulty of reporting sensitive and often classified government actions, as anonymous sources sometimes backtrack, pursue their own agendas by leaking selective information or say more than they know. News organizations attempt to assemble authoritative stories from multiple sources and agencies, creating plenty of room for potential error." The AP (7/1) reports similar details. The Wall Street Journal (7/1, Ellison, 2.11M) reports similar details.

NYT, LAT Editors Defend Decision To Print Classified Material. Los Angeles Times editor Dean Baquet and New York Times editor Bill Keller in an op-ed in the New York Times (7/1, 1.19M) defend their decision to publish classified information anout US efforts to fight terrorism writing, "Government officials, understandably, want it both ways. They want us to protect their secrets, and they want us to trumpet their successes. A few days ago, Treasury Secretary John Snow said he was scandalized by our decision to report on the bank-monitoring program. But in September 2003 the same Secretary Snow invited a group of reporters from our papers, The Wall Street Journal and others to travel with him and his aides on a military aircraft for a six-day tour to show off the department's efforts to track terrorist financing. The secretary's team discussed many sensitive details of their monitoring efforts, hoping they would appear in print and demonstrate the administration's relentlessness against the terrorist threat." Baquet and Keller conclude, "We understand that honorable people may disagree with any of these choices — to publish or not to publish. But making those decisions is the responsibility that falls to editors, a corollary to the great gift of our independence. It is not a responsibility we take lightly. And it is not one we can surrender to the government." The same op-ed also appears in the Los Angeles Times (7/1, 958K).

Administration Provided Material On Terrorist Financing Program To WSJ To Counteract NYT And LAT. Howard Kurtz in his "Media Notes" column in the Washington Post (7/1, C1, 744K) writes that as the debate over publishing details of the Treasury Department's terrorist finance tracking program escalates between the Wall Street Journal and the New York Times, "The Journal editorial board, which operates independently from the newsroom, said a top Treasury Department official had contacted Journal reporter Glenn Simpson and handed him the story. The editorial said Treasury officials decided to 'declassify a series of talking points' after failing to persuade the New York Times -- as well as the Los Angeles Times -- to kill the story on grounds that it would neutralize a key administration weapon in the war on terror. The same declassified information was provided to the other two papers, as well as to The Washington Post later on the evening of June 22."

U.S. Claims South Florida Lead Suspect Planned Terrorist Army. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (7/1, Blum, 249K) reports, "The alleged ringleader of a group of South Florida men accused of plotting to blow up Sears Tower in Chicago wanted the blast to divert law enforcement so he could free inmates from a prison to join his terrorist army, federal prosecutors said Friday." At a two-hour hearing in a Miami federal courtroom on whether six of the seven men arrested June 22 should remain in custody, lead U.S. prosecutor Jacqueline Arango sketched "an ambitious, but inept, military-style organization whose members had illusions of grandeur and a taste for intrigue."

Suspects Variously Seen As Die-Hards, Dupes. The New York Times (7/1, Drew, Lichtblau, 1.19M) reports, "The seven men arrested on terror charges were shown Friday on undercover videotapes solemnly reciting oaths of loyalty to Al Qaeda, repeating the words that an F.B.I. informant had given them to say." The prosecutor's presentation also revealed that ringleader Batiste had requested that an undercover informant procure rockets and semiautomatic rifles. Lawyers for some defendants claimed that their clients knew little of Batiste's plans, and some criticized the new evidence presented at the Friday hearing as showing government entrapment. Yet, "the parents of most of the defendants, including some who have been very critical of the case, appeared surprised by the evidence presented Friday, sitting quietly through the court hearing and refusing to comment afterward." Others saw the new evidence as portraying Batiste "as a bizarre and self-aggrandizing figure" and that his followers "mostly poor, young Haitian-Americans, were more involved in parts of the scheme than their families and community leaders had suspected."

California Security Agency Tracked Protestors. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Nicholas, 958K) reports, "Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's office in charge of protecting California against terrorism has tracked demonstrations staged by political and antiwar groups, a practice that senior law enforcement officials say is an abuse of civil liberties. The Times obtained reports prepared for the state Office of Homeland Security in recent months that contain details on the whereabouts and purpose of a number of political demonstrations throughout California. The source of the information is listed in some cases as federal law enforcement agencies, including the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, an investigative arm of the U.S. Homeland Security department." The two daily reports reviewed by the Times included such political activities as an animal rights rally outside Canada's San Francisco consulate protesting sea hunting, a demonstration in Walnut Creek where CA7 Rep. George Miller (D) and other officials spoke against the Iraq war, and a Women's International League for Peace and Freedom courthouse rally in Santa Barbara to support an antiwar protester facing federal trespassing charges. A spokesman for state Attorney General Bill Lockyer "condemned the actions, saying they violated the groups' constitutional right of free speech."

L.A. Police Chief, Others, Press Homeland Security For Greater Sharing Of Intelligence. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Winton, McGreevy, 958K) reports, "Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton said Friday that he and other big-city police chiefs will meet this month with top Homeland Security officials amid complaints that the federal agency isn't doing enough to share information with local law enforcement nationwide. It also notes, "Los Angeles mayor Antonio Villaraigosa publicly complained that federal officials didn't give him an in-depth briefing before President Bush detailed a terrorist threat on the U.S. Bank Tower in downtown Los Angeles." But L.A. chief Bratton and others have said the larger problem is the quality, not the sharing, of federal agency intelligence. "Bratton said is it is not so much 'they don't share intelligence as they don't have intelligence.'"

FBI Raids Pittsburgh Mosque. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/1, Ayad, 261K) reports, "FBI agents yesterday raided a North Side residence known to many in the neighborhood and the Pittsburgh Islamic community as both an Islamic school and mosque. The agency would say only that the search was in connection with a 'criminal investigation' and wouldn't elaborate. The raid of the Sankore Institute and Light of Age Mosque, a three-story house that doubles as a school for people seeking to learn the Koran and Islamic religious teachings, began around noon and lasted about four hours. Authorities did not state whether anyone was taken into custody, but residents of the neighborhood said several men in tunics and traditional Muslim dress were led out of the house, patted down and searched. The paper said that the group "moved into the neighborhood around February and posted fliers that said 'we are here to help you make the North Side a better place to live, worship, work and play'" and urged residents "to join us in clothing and feeding the poor, cleaning up our community and making the North Side a safer, more beautiful place for our children."

Former CIA Officer Gives His Advice To New Agency Head. In the Los Angeles Times (7/1, 958K), Garrett Jones, for 17 years a CIA case officer, provides his advice for Air Force Gen. Michael V. Hayden, who took charge of the agency last month. He writes, "your predecessor, Porter Goss, did not adapt well. He seemed unable to make it out of the lobby each morning without starting a fistfight. You can do better. For starters, resist any impulse to 'demonstrate who is in charge.'" The directorate of intelligence, however, "is a mess. … Start over. Anyone associated with the WMD mess… needs to be retired, kicked upstairs or otherwise moved on. It may not be fair, just or efficient, but you must do it to blow the smell of failure out of the organization. Then appoint a pit bull as the quality-control officer for analysis."

WAR NEWS:

Investigators Probe Alleged Rape And Murders By GIs. Allegations of an alleged rape and murders committed by US soldiers in Iraq generated extensive and negative coverage on the networks and in the newspapers. ABC World News Tonight (6/30, story 2, 1:00, K. Snow, 8.78M) reported, "There are explosive new allegations concerning the US military in Iraq a soldier has confessed his role in rape and murder of Iraqi civilians." ABC (Karl): "These are the most disturbing allegations yet." The CBS Evening News (6/30, story 2, 2:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "At least two U.S. soldiers are being investigated for raping a young Iraqi woman, then killing her and three relatives." CBS (Martin) added, "The allegation that two American soldiers raped an Iraqi woman and then killed her and three other members of her family, including a child, and then burned the bodies, is shocking enough. Add the fact that the troops under investigation belong to the same unit as those two kidnapped soldiers whose mutilated and booby-trapped bodies were found just last week. And it becomes a cycle of unimaginable brutality on both sides."

NBC Nightly News (6/30, lead story, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The U.S. military is investigating this case at the highest levels of the service." NBC (Miklaszewski): "At least two and as many as five American soldiers are under investigation. ... The officials say it appeared the soldiers had stalked the woman and the rape was premeditated. Following the rape, at least one of the soldiers murdered the woman and killed three other members of her family including a child and two adults. ... Experts blame the relentless and brutal nature of the insurgent war." NBC News military analyst Dan Goure: "You get stress in war but nothing like we are facing in parts of Iraq today." Miklaszewski: "Others argue no amount of combat stress justifies criminal or immoral acts." Col. Jack Jacobs, US Army (RET.): "There's no doubt in my mind that anybody can tell the difference between right and wrong, even in the heat of battle."

The AP (6/30, Lenz) reports it is the "fifth pending case involving alleged slayings of Iraqi civilians by U.S. troops" and that the suspects "were from the same platoon as two soldiers kidnapped and killed south of Baghdad this month." The New York Times (7/1, Wong, 1.19M) reports, "The victims were a woman, her child, her husband and the husband's brother." It also states, "At least 60 American soldiers died in Iraq in June, a slight decline from 69 in May and 76 in April. Yet, that was almost twice as many as in March, which, at 31, had the second-lowest monthly fatality count of the war." Other than those comments, the Times coverage is generally based on the preceding AP coverage. The Washington Post (7/1, Finer, 744K) reports, "Investigations have intensified in recent months following the high-profile Haditha allegations, pressure from the Iraqi government on military commanders to curtail excessive force by soldiers, and an initiative by Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the top U.S. ground commander in Iraq, to cut down on civilian casualties."

The Washington Times (7/1, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "A top U.S. commander [Col. Jeffrey Snow] in Baghdad said yesterday that attacks have gone up, not down, since new Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki ordered a citywide crackdown." It also quotes Col. Snow as worrying that excessive "negative press coverage" could hurt morale. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Moore and Spiegel, 958K) reports, "It was unclear whether there was a connection between the deaths of the family members in Mahmoudiya and the June 16 attack on the U.S. soldiers at an observation post near Yousifiya [that resulted in their mutilation]." Both this alleged incident and the abductions of the soldiers apparently reflect a chronic "lack of manpower" south of Baghdad. As do several other sources, the Los Angeles Times notes that one suspect has already been discharged and is being sought in the US. The Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, and AP comment that allegations of rape could be especially inflammatory in a conservative Moslem culture.

List of Criminal Cases Against US Troops Is Given. The AP (6/30), as part of the followup to the coverage of rape and murder allegations, provides a listing of criminal cases filed against US troops in the Iraq war. The list is broken down into Pending Cases, Convicted, and Cleared/Acquitted.

Deaths Of Four Service Members In Iraq Are Announced. ABC World News Tonight (6/30, story 3, 0:10, K. Snow, 8.78M) reported, "The U.S. Military today announced three more deaths in Iraq. A Marine in al Anbar province, and two soldiers killed by roadside bombs in Baghdad. At least 60 U.S. forces have been killed in Iraq in June." The Washington Post (7/1, 744K) reports, "The U.S. military has announced the deaths of a Marine and three soldiers from fighting in recent days in Iraq. The names of all four were withheld pending notification of their families." Their units and the circumstances of their deaths are given.

Troops In Ramadi Live With Dangers. The AP (6/30, Castaneda) reports, in a sympathetic article, on the hardships faced by soldiers stationed in Ramadi: "The Iraq war for most troops is fleeting; brief ambushes or sudden, powerful roadside bombings. But in this troubled city, the capital of deadly Anbar province, the conflict is nearly constant. Gunbattles in the streets are common and mortars rain down on the bases every week." The AP quotes numerous soldiers, some of whom profess to be accustomed to the dangers and others who admit to experiencing stress.

Iraqi VP Says Reconciliation Plan Should Be Seen As First Step Towards Solution. The Financial Times (7/1, Khalaf) reports, "Iraq's national reconciliation initiative has paved the way for government contacts with insurgents and should be seen as only a first step towards a political solution to the conflict, according to Iraq's vice-president" Adel Abdel-Mehdi. He added "that other measures would follow the plan," and that "the reconciliation plan had now made dialogue an official policy. He also left the door open to a broadening of an amnesty offer after Nuri al-Maliki, the prime minister, this week insisted it would exclude anyone who had killed American troops or Iraqis." He says "the reconciliation initiative was aimed at gaining a better understanding of the" insurgent "groups and identifying whether any, and how many, were ready for a political solution." As "efforts to calm the insurgency dominated by Sunni Arabs also depend on the government's ability to rein in the Shia militias," Mr Abdel-Mehdi "insisted that the government would not allow anyone to operate 'above the law.'" However, "he acknowledged that the government faced a dilemma. To dismantle the militias it must show it is capable of providing security, which requires reducing the violence waged by insurgents. But curbing the powers of the militias is also essential to persuade insurgents to lay down their arms."

Iraq's PM Leaves On Tour To Boost Support For Reconciliation Plan. The AFP (7/1, Salem) reports, "Iraq Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki will on Saturday embark on his first trip abroad to garner support for his much-touted peace plan that has been rejected by the Sunni leaders and rebels." He will "leave Saturday for Saudi Arabia, then the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait 'to meet their leaders to discuss the national reconciliation plan.'" Some feel "that Maliki's tour may help influence the former elite community of Sunni Arabs as many of its leaders have close ties with the oil-rich Arab states of the Gulf."

Car Bombing In Baghdad Kills 45. The AP (7/1) reports, "A parked car bomb exploded at a popular market in a Shiite slum of Baghdad, killing at least 45 people and wounding 41, police said. AP Television News footage showed a huge plume of gray smoke rising from the scene in the Sadr City neighborhood."

Panel Debates Whether Found WMD Shells Justify Iraq War. The Washington Post (7/1, Pincus, 744K) reports on the division between Republicans and Democrats on the House Armed Services Committee concerning whether the discovery of 20-year-old munitions "support the prewar contention that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction, and justify the invasion of Iraq." It characterizes DIA director Michael Maples as caught in crossfire but "adept at avoiding answers that aided either side."

Bin Laden Praises Zarqawi And Demands His Burial In Jordan. There was extensive coverage on TV and in the newspapers of Bin Laden's latest tape. ABC World News Tonight (6/30, story 4, 0:10, K. Snow, 8.78M) reported, "There is word of another internet audio message from Osama bin Laden tonight. His second in 24 hours, and the fifth this year." NBC Nightly News (6/30, story 4, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Osama bin Laden has been heard there again, but just not seen. He eulogizes Abu al-Zarqawi, the leader of al Qaeda in Iraq, who was killed by U.S. troops earlier this month." Myers: "Though there is ample evidence al-Zarqawi and bin Laden had their differences, here bin Laden takes credit for Zarqawi's successes and claims Zarqawi was acting on bin Laden's orders." Roger Cressey, NBC News terrorism analyst: "Al Qaeda hasn't conducted an attack in over three years. Bin Laden has to associate himself with Zarqawi and Zarqawi's successes in Iraq to maintain their credibility." Myers: "One lingering question: why no bin Laden videotapes in almost two years? It may be because audio tapes are less risky."

The CBS Evening News (6/30, story 3, :30, Schieffer, 7.66M) also reported it. The Washington Times/AP (7/1, Keath) reports, "Osama bin Laden called on President Bush in an audiotape released yesterday to release the body of Abu Musab Zarqawi and said Jordan should allow the slain terrorist to be buried in his homeland." Bin Laden "paid tribute to Zarqawi and said the former al Qaeda in Iraq leader had been under orders to kill Iraqis who supported U.S. forces in the country. He also vowed more attacks against the United States in the Middle East and Africa." The AP (6/30, Keath) notes doubts about the extent of Bin Laden's control of activities, his continued failure to show his face (which it attributes more to security concerns than to health problems), and the weariness of his voice. It counts "four audiotapes from bin Laden and seven audios and videos by his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri" this year. Bloomberg (6/30) also reports the story.

Rice Offers $5 Million Reward For Al-Masri. CNN (7/1, Labott) reports, "U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice authorized up to a $5 million reward Friday for information leading to the capture of Abu Ayyub al-Masri, believed to be the replacement for the late leader of al Qaeda in Iraq -- Abu Musab al-Zarqawi." It "is being offered under the State Department's Rewards for Justice program." The State Department's "statement urges anyone with information on al-Masri's location to contact the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad or any other U.S. embassy or consulate, or any U.S. military commander." The AP (7/1) adds that spokesman Adam Erel said "Rice's agency is offering the money to encourage people with information about al-Masri's location to come forward." The AFP (7/1) notes "The true identity of Abu Ayyub al-Masri remains an enigma in his reported homeland of Egypt," although he "is believed to have lived in the central Cairo area of Zawyia Hamra before going to Afghanistan in the late 1980s or early 1990s, and then on to Iraq via Iran."

Maliki Courts Sunni Support Outside Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, 958K) reports, "Iraq's new prime minister, Nouri Maliki, was to leave today to visit Saudi Arabia and other Persian Gulf states to solicit support for a reconciliation initiative that has drawn mixed reviews since it was announced Sunday. Maliki plans to discuss bridging the widening gap between Sunni and Shiite Muslims with leaders of the oil-rich Sunni-dominated countries." However, "even as the prime minister takes his plan abroad, it is facing attacks at home," from the Muslim Scholars Association and radical cleric Moqtada al Sadr.

Rocket Wounds 10 At Kandahar Coalition Base. The AP (6/30) reports, "A Taliban rocket exploded Friday inside the main coalition base in Kandahar, Afghanistan, wounding 10 people, including soldiers and civilians, the Canadian Press news agency reported." The article notes that two Canadian soldiers were injured but does not give the nationalities of the other victims.

Italy Extends Afghan Deployment. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, 958K), in a brief article, reports, "Prime Minister Romano Prodi's government agreed to keep Italian troops in Afghanistan, despite opposition from pacifists in his coalition. ... Defense Minister Arturo Parisi said Rome would not send additional troops or boost funding."

Port Security In Umm Qasr Is Described. The New York Times (7/1, Glanz, 1.19M) reports on Iranian navy patrols in Umm Qasr. It notes the problem-plagued relationship between the navy, which is portrayed as relatively professional, and the allegedly militia-penetrated coast guard. A US naval advisor is quoted as saying that he finds it easier "to arrange joint operations with maritime forces from Kuwait" than with the Iraqi coast guard" and that the navy could "run itself" today if the US left. In general, the assessment of Umm Qasr is that security has declined: "Now, after months of relative calm, sophisticated roadside bombs and assassinations of Iraqis who work with Westerners have increased across the entire south, while the port itself has become a place of danger, corruption, commercial bustle and intrigue."

Administration WMDs Claims And Detainee Policy Defended. In the Washington Times (7/1, 90K), media critic Brent Bozell argues that the discovery of 500 shells proves the bias of the media: "But the reception of this declassified memo shows we do not have an honest, nonpartisan news media, and political calculation is everything." He warns that the Bush administration may be intimidated "by the media, who don't want any new information to change their tilted first draft of history" and that the administration may have incurred considerable damage through its inaction. Also in the Washington Times (7/1, 90K), Victor David Hansen says Europeans attack the US on Guantanamo to escape their own problems: "By ankle-biting America on Guantanamo, the Europeans sound moral and tough while ignoring the real dangers for which they have absolutely no solutions -- unassimilated and angry Muslims, the Dutch and Danes under assault by radical Islamic censors and a defenseless Europe potentially soon in range of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's nuclear-tipped missiles."

Soros Says US Has Become Threat To World. In Newsweek (6/30), George Soros explains why he considers the US now a threat to world stability: "By declaring a 'war on terror' after September the 11th, we set the wrong agenda for the world. This is something that people in America find difficult to understand because war seems like the natural response. ... We abhor terrorists, because they kill innocent people for political goals. But by waging war on terror we are doing the same thing. And the people who are on the receiving end see us in the same light with the same negative attitude as we have towards terrorists. It's also a threat to our democracy. Because when you wage war, the president can appropriate for himself excessive powers." Soros promises to spend the legal maximum supporting Democrats in 2004 and calls the "puncturing of the housing bubble" the gravest immediate danger to the US economy.

Homecoming Parties For Troops Become Lavish. The Wall Street Journal (7/1, Gamerman, 2.11M) reports, "In the Iraq War, a new approach is starting to emerge. Military tradition and conventional wisdom dictate that families should keep homecomings low-key to avoid overwhelming the troops while they're readjusting to being back. For a variety of reasons, from the military's shifting demographics to attitudes about the current war, some families are taking a different route, opting for outsize celebrations." The article describes some parties and their expense. It also quotes some troops and experts who counsel against incurring debt and against burdening unacclimated soldiers with such celebrations.

Debate Rages Over Lowering Flags For Dead Service Members. The Wall Street Journal (7/1, Zaslow, 2.11M) reports, "In some 16 states, flags are routinely lowered for fallen home-state soldiers. But what some see as a gesture of tribute, others consider inappropriate, demoralizing and even devious. Half-staff efforts, which have spread to states Oregon, Minnesota, California, Illinois, Kentucky and Maine -- are generating controversy among politicians, veterans and citizens unsure about whether and when to lower the flag ... Some wonder whether the flag tributes are really an attempt to undermine support for the war by reminding Americans of the fatalities. And though many veterans welcome the lowered flags, others say the day for honoring war dead is Memorial Day."

War Protesters Sue To Reverse Camping Ban. The AP (7/1) reports, "Cindy Sheehan and four other war protesters sued McLennan County over roadside camping and parking bans near President Bush's ranch in Crawford, saying they want to return to what became an 'international symbol of protest against the Iraq war.'"

DOJ:

Roberts, Alito And Kennedy Seen As Having Distinguished Themselves In Court's Term. Knight Ridder (7/1, Henderson) reports during the 2005-06 term of the U.S. Supreme Court "the focus was on how Chief Justice John G. Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito were changing the court's outcomes." Both "established themselves as solid conservatives" but also were "distinguished…from the bench's more doctrinaire members, Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas." The term also featured "the emergence of Justice Anthony Kennedy at the court's center. … In cases that split the justices narrowly, Kennedy was in the majority more than anyone else." The court is said to have decided "many cases on narrow legal grounds, avoiding more controversial elements." And "the court closed the term with more unanimous opinions than it has in recent years and with fewer concurrences and dissents." Alito "established a restrained conservativism that mirrored his work as an appellate judge." Roberts is described as having a "razor-sharp intellect."

Roberts's Desire For Unanimous Opinions Seen As Unlikely To Prevail. The AP (7/1, Benac) reports, "for all the talk of consensus and harmony on the new Supreme Court, plenty of trees had to die to provide enough paper for the justices' fractured rulings on some of the most contentious cases of the court's term. And all sides are betting that this transitional year…served as a fairly mild prelude to far bigger dustups to come next term and for many years hence." Roberts "has spoken publicly of his desire to achieve unanimity through narrow rulings that would offer 'clarity and guidance.' And he had some success, evidenced by a healthy share of unanimous opinions." Still "within the reinforced conservative wing of the court, there are strong and sometimes conflicting opinions." And "it turns out that the jurist to watch is 69-year-old Anthony Kennedy." He has "provided the fifth vote on some of the court's toughest cases" and "more often than not, he has sided with the conservatives."

James Taranto writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/1, 2.11M) that Chief Justice Roberts "showed himself to be a man of intelligence, charm and political acumen. If anyone can bring consensus to the Supreme Court, surely he can. But his first term in office showed that this goal will require patience and persistence, and maybe another new justice or two."

Boeing Announces Agreement With Justice Department. The Financial Times (7/1, Cameron) reports, "Boeing on Friday said it had reached a final agreement with the US justice department following two procurement scandals which led to the ousting of one chief executive and a prison term for its former chief financial officer." The firm will "pay $615m to avoid civil and criminal charges following the three-year DoJ probe, in line with the cost of the tentative deal outlined in May."

The New York Times (6/30, Wayne, 1.19M) reports Boeing "announced yesterday that it would take second-quarter charges of up to $1.15 billion as a result of a settlement of ethics investigations with the federal government and delays in a surveillance aircraft program for Australia and Turkey." That will "more than eliminate Boeing's second-quarter profit." The $615 million payment "resolves potential civil and criminal charges against Boeing." It results from "an investigation over the improper acquisition of proprietary documents from a rival, the Lockheed Martin Corporation, that Boeing employees used to try to gain government rocket launching business." Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) "will hold hearings this summer on the settlement."

AFP (6/30) reports, "The agreement calls for a 565 million-dollar civil settlement and a 50 million-dollar monetary penalty under a separate criminal agreement, according to the US Justice Department. The amount is a record for government procurement fraud, for the Department of Defense and for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, officials said. The criminal probe stems from allegations that Boeing used improperly acquired data from rival Lockheed Martin to help win rocket launching business from NASA. The deal also would end a civil probe into conflict of interest in Boeing's recruitment of a senior Air Force procurement official while she still had authority over billions of dollars in other Boeing contracts. The former official, Darleen Druyun, went to prison in the case."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

IG Report Finds Abramoff Did Not Influence Decision To Replace U.S. Attorney For Guam. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Roche, 958K) reports, "Convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff improperly obtained a top-secret FBI document and tried to use the information to aid his clients in the Pacific Island territories" because he "feared information in the document could be damaging to his clients' interests." According to a "41-page report into allegations that he had improperly influenced President Bush's 2002 decision to oust the acting U.S. attorney for Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands" Inspector General Glenn A. Fine concluded there was no evidence for the claim. The report did find that Abramoff "had a pipeline into the White House" in that "Leonard Rodriguez, a Bush aide, told the inspector general's office that then-White House political director Ken Mehlman 'recommended or suggested that I reach out to make Jack aware' on Guam issues."

Prosecutors Seek Enron Executives' Assets. The Washington Post (7/1, D1, Johnson, 744K) reports, "Federal prosecutors asked a judge yesterday to order former Enron Corp. executives Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay to turn over $182.8 million, arguing that their homes and other assets were acquired by fraud." Court papers claim that Skilling collected $139.2 million in bonuses and stock proceeds during the fraud, and prosecutors are seeking $49 million in securities he holds in a brokerage, his $4.6 million mansion, $808,643 in cash; and a Dallas condominium worth $579,475, and the $5 million bond Skilling posted after his indictment two years ago. Skilling argues that because jurors acquitted him on nine insider trading charges, he is entitled to keep his remaining wealth. The government says Lay collected $43.5 million in bonuses and drawdowns on his Enron-sponsored credit, and are seeking repayment of $1.5 million Lay used to pay off the mortgage on his luxury penthouse apartment in Houston, plus Lay's interest in a limited partnership now valued at $6.3 million.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Former NYC Police Commissioner Pleads Guilty In Bribery Case. The New York Times (7/1, Franco, 1.19M) reports that Bernard B. Kerik, who was New York City police commissioner at the time of the Sept. 11 terror attacks and was nominated in 2004 to be homeland security director but withdrew, pled guilty to two misdemeanors in a Brooklyn courtroom, for failing to report a loan and accepting as a gift renovations to his apartment worth $165,000. Kerik acknowledged accepting the gifts in late 1999 and in 2000 from a large New Jersey contractor, Interstate Industrial Corporation, which has been accused of, but repeatedly denied, having ties to organized crime. He also said he spoke to other city officials about the company, then seeking a city license, when he was the city's correction commissioner. Kerik agreed to pay $221,000 in fines and penalties for accepting the renovations and failing to report a $28,000 loan from a friend, real estate developer Nathan Berman. Kerik's agreement ends an 18-month grand jury probe and allows him to avoid jail time and felony bribery charges.

The Washington Times (7/1, Seper, 90K) adds that Kerik's DHS nomination "dissolved amid accusations of extramarital affairs and his questionable hiring of a Mexican housekeeper," after Kerik told President Bush he could not "permit matters personal to me to distract from the focus and progress of the Department of Homeland Security and its crucial endeavors." The article also notes that questions had been raised at the time about Kerik's ties to stun gun make Taser International, which paid him $6.2 million in stock options after he promoted its products to law-enforcement agencies. It adds that New Jersey gambling authorities have sought to revoke Interstate Industrial's license to work in casinos, describing owners of Frank and Peter DiTommaso as associates of the Gambino organized crime family.

Eminent Domain Fight Ends, As New London Homeowners Settle. The New York Times (7/1, Salzman, 1.19M) reports, "With eviction looming, the two remaining homeowners fighting the city's plans to replace their homes with offices, a hotel and new housing agreed to settle on Friday, ending a six-year battle that led to a historic Supreme Court ruling on governments' power of eminent domain." The settlement ends a case that reached the U.S. Supreme Court, which issued a controversial 5-to-4 ruling last year upholding the city's power to take their homes for private development.

Plaintiff In Supreme Court Case Will Move Her House. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Mehren, 958K) reports, "Susette Kelo, who lent her name to a lawsuit that ignited a firestorm around the practice of eminent domain, will not lose her Connecticut home to a wrecking ball, as she had feared when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the city of New London could build homes, offices and hotels in her neighborhood. Under an agreement announced Friday, Kelo's quaint, peach-colored house will be moved to another location. Kelo, 49, can remain in the 19th-century cottage at its present waterfront location for as long as a year, until a new site is selected." Kelo and another homeowner, Pasquale Cristofaro, "were the last plaintiffs in the landmark case of Kelo vs. City of New London to reach an accord with the city. The Cristofaro home will be razed, but the family will be able to buy a new home in the area at an undisclosed fixed price." On the first anniversary of the Kelo ruling last week, President Bush issued an executive order barring federal agencies from seizing private property except for public projects like hospitals and roads.

LATimes Faults Labels, Studios For Not Attracting File Sharers. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, 958K), in a "One Year Later" feature, follows up a the Supreme Court's Grokster decision, and says the victorious recording labels and studios "haven't done enough to lure file sharers." The decision said companies like Grokster that let their users share files over the Internet can be held liable for enabling copyright infringement. Even though the percentage of U.S. Internet users sharing files has stayed flat in recent years, while the percentage of those buying in online stores has seen real growth, "free downloaders represent a lost opportunity for the entertainment industry." The Times calls for "much more experimentation with approaches that give users the control and freedom to consume that make file-sharing networks so attractive."

reports, "Texas and Arizona lost Supreme Court appeals yesterday in separate death penalty cases." The high court refused without comment Texas' request that a death sentence be reimposed on Gregory Russeau for murdering an elderly auto mechanic during a robbery, and also refused to upset an Arizona appeals court decision giving Robert Moormann a chance to appeal his conviction for killing his adoptive mother. The decisions came as the high court acted on over 50 cases in its final day of its 2005-06 term.

ANTITRUST:

Proposal Would Link General Motors To Nissan And Renault. The New York Times (7/1, A1, Maynard, 1.19M) reports in a front-page story, "General Motors' largest shareholder" Kirk Kerkorian "is pressing the troubled American auto giant to speed up its turnaround effort by forming an alliance with two foreign car companies, Nissan and Renault, which would pay $3 billion for a 20 percent stake in G.M." Such an alliance would enable Kerkorian "to enlist the help of Carlos Ghosn, the hard-charging executive who oversees" Nissan and Renault. Ghosn "earned his reputation from the swift turnaround he executed earlier this decade at Nissan, where he slashed debt, introduced flashy new vehicles and expanded sales in Japan and the United States." G.M. issued a statement saying that the proposal "would be taken under advisement by its board."

The Wall Street Journal (7/1, A1, Langley, Boudette, Hawkins, 2.11M) reports in a front-page story the proposal "raised pressure on General Motors Corp. and embattled Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner." It is also described as "a stunning shot at Mr. Wagoner's effort at restructuring the nation's biggest auto maker."
The Washington Post (7/1, D1, Freeman, 744K) also reported this story.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Examines Recovered Laptop For Signs Of Data Theft. The Washington Post (7/1, D1, Pegoraro, 744K) reports, "If your Social Security Number was on that wayward, now-recovered Department of Veterans Affairs laptop -- or any of the other computers recently lost with sensitive data onboard -- it's probably still safe. But not certainly so. And you're just going to have to live with whatever uncertainty that realization stirs in you." The Post writes, "When the VA or other offices try to ensure that lost records haven't landed on identity thieves' hard drives, they run into the same problem that's undermined the entertainment industry's efforts to stop people from circulating music and movies on the Internet. Namely, computer data, by its nature, wants to go places. You can duplicate it infinitely and perfectly, then distribute those copies at near-zero cost. That's neither bad nor good; it just is. So in a worst-case scenario, every personal record on that VA laptop could now be online. And you'd never know until the symptoms of identity theft showed up in your bank account."

Veterans Groups Continue To Press for Free Credit Monitoring. The AP (6/30, Yen) reports, "Veterans groups say they will keep pressing for improved data security - and free credit monitoring - after the government found the stolen Veterans Affairs laptop computer containing sensitive data on 26.5 million people. … Joe Davis, spokesman for the Veterans of Foreign Wars, said veterans were entitled to credit monitoring until the FBI can determine for certain the information wasn't compromised." Davis: "The worst-case scenario may have been averted this time, but an even greater tragedy would be if this type incident was allowed to happen again because of complacency.

VA Given Permission To Publicize Monitoring Offer. The Washington Post/AP (7/1, 6:00 PM, Lovan) reports, "The Veterans Affairs Department is free to publicize a no-cost credit monitoring offer to veterans whose personal information was stolen, a federal judge ruled Friday. U.S. District Court Judge William Bertelsman denied a motion from attorneys who filed a class-action suit on behalf of 26.5 million veterans and active-duty troops after a VA employee's laptop containing the private data went missing. Law enforcement officials recovered the laptop this week after it had been stolen from a data analyst's Maryland home on May 3. The FBI said Social Security numbers and other personal data had not been copied from the computer." Class-action plaintiffs attorneys "had argued that accepting the offer, which was advertised on the VA's Web site, could hamper the veterans' chances of winning more money in court." Bertelsman: "I don't see anything objectionable in it. … The court can't tell a government agency how it can communicate with its constituents. If they make a statement that's a false representation ... then the court might get into it."

Scott Hogenson, VA spokesman: "We're encourage by the fact that we're allowed to help our veterans."

NYT Calls For Better Data Security. The New York Times (7/1, 1.19M) editorializes, "The government's extraordinary attempt at damage control when it appeared the computer was gone for good — including a plan to offer a year's free credit monitoring to the veterans at a cost of more than $160 million — underlines a mushrooming problem. It is becoming obvious that government agencies, and businesses, need better policies and practices for handling sensitive data stored on computers. To begin with, personal information on 17 million veterans is not the sort of data that should be moving around on a laptop. Data this valuable should also have been encrypted, to make it difficult for thieves to use it."

US Gun Owners Fault International Efforts To Restrict Arms Sales. The Washington Times (7/1, Pisik, 90K) reports, "The gun industry and shooting enthusiasts fired back at the anti-gun lobby yesterday at an international conference on illicit weapons, saying any global restrictions will affect sport hunters." The United Nations Small Arms Review Conference "is meant to take stock of the global efforts to curb the trade on illegal arms and draft a plan of action for the future." It "is not looking at legal civilian ownership, but is examining ways to limit the flood of weapons into unstable regions." However, it "attracted the ire of tens of thousands of American gun owners, who were mobilized by the National Rifle Association to protest what they see as a global effort to disarm U.S. civilians," and, "in a wide-ranging but ill-attended morning session, speakers representing gun manufacturers, weapons brokers, antique-firearms enthusiasts and big-game hunters stressed that misuse is the problem, and not the gun itself."

IMMIGRATION:

Border Patrol Agents Suspected Of Smuggling Immigrants Disappear. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Marosi, 958K) reports, "Two U.S. Border Patrol agents under investigation for allegedly smuggling drugs and immigrants abruptly resigned and went into hiding this week after apparently being tipped off to the probe, according to federal law enforcement sources. The agents -- brothers Raul and Fidel Villarreal -- were veteran officers who patrolled the border near San Diego." It is suggested that "they may have left the country." The case is "the latest in a string of unrelated corruption probes" and is "being handled by Immigration and Customs Enforcement." The two "were suspected of working with Mexico-based criminal networks to smuggle Mexicans and Brazilians into the country."

California Day Labor Center Closed After Minuteman Member's Objection. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Delson, 958K) reports, "Caltrans ordered a longtime Laguna Beach day labor center to close Friday, saying it was illegally operating on state property." The order cam "after a Laguna Beach resident who is a member of the Minuteman Project border patrol group checked property records and brought the information forward as part of a protest against the center." It is "the second day labor center in Orange County to close recently." The centers "have been targeted for protests by anti-illegal immigrant groups throughout Southern California." The decision "angered a majority of the City Council."

Los Angeles Seen As Center Of Black Resentment Of Latino Immigrants Over Jobs Competition. The Washington Post (7/1, A3, Geis, 744K) reports, "Many African Americans in Los Angeles have watched resentfully as Latinos replaced them not only in low-wage jobs, but also in many traditionally black neighborhoods. Simmering tensions between the two groups occasionally boil over in school shootings, jail violence and hate crimes." The Service Employees International Union is attempting to organize security guards in Los Angeles. The union "estimates that nearly 70 percent of the officers are black." SEIU president Andrew L. Stern said that "racial politics played no role in the timing of the security guard campaign." But the union is "well aware of black workers' fears that organizing a union could be an invitation to employers to hire immigrant workers they perceive to be more docile and willing to work for less."

Medical Costs Of Immigrants Growing Dramatically. Knight Ridder (7/1, Pugh) reports among "the costs and consequences of illegal immigration" is "a fast-growing multibillion-dollar tab for medical emergencies suffered by undocumented immigrants." While they are "ineligible for full coverage under Medicaid, … a little-known federal law requires state Medicaid programs to pay for emergency medical care for all undocumented immigrants who meet the program's financial and personal resource requirements." That care is "becoming more expensive," but the states do not "closely track what they spend." So "at the request of McClatchy Newspapers, some states took a closer look at the expenditures." 2005 costs were reported as follows: Minnesota $17.4 million, California $957 million, Houston's Harris County Hospital District $97.3 million, Georgia $112 million, North Carolina $52.8 million, Kentucky $9 million.

Washington Area Hospital Sets Limits To Avoid Being Overwhelmed. The Washington Post (7/1, A1, Levine, 744K) reports in a front-page story that Silver Spring, Maryland's Holy Cross Hospital's "yearly charity care more than doubled to $9 million" from 2000 to 2005. Now the hospital has decided to set a limit on the number of uninsured obstetrics cases it will take because it's system has been "overtaxed" by the work. And "the pressures on Holy Cross mirror those at other facilities in the region." So "critics cite the burden they say newly arrived immigrants place on health care as one rationale for restricting their numbers. … The full medical bill to U.S. hospitals, clinics and taxpayers probably exceeds $6 billion annually."

DC To Delay Implementing Medicaid Rule Until July 17. The Washington Post (7/1, B3, Levine, 744K) reports Washington, D.C. "agreed yesterday to delay implementing a new federal Medicaid rule requiring documented proof of citizenship" until July 17. The announcement came "one day after a Washington firm filed suit in federal court to block the city from moving forward with enforcement." The federal rule "makes documented citizenship a requirement for eligibility." Federal officials "have warned" D.C. "and states that noncompliance would mean losing Medicaid matching funds."

Immigration Hearings Described As "Public Thrashing" Of President. The Wall Street Journal (7/1, Harwood, 2.11M) reports, "Directed by House Speaker Dennis Hastert, Republicans this coming week will undertake a remarkable exercise: the public thrashing of President Bush's principles on a major initiative. House 'field hearings' on immigration, scheduled for San Diego and Laredo, Texas, weren't designed with fact-finding in mind. Their intent is rather to batter the Senate-passed immigration bill, which embodies Mr. Bush's goal of combining border security with a guest-worker program for the 12 million illegal immigrants already here." House members are said to "display striking anger" resulting from "frustration" with Iraq and "the conviction that the speaker has been personally slighted by an arrogant administration." The immigration hearings "which today look like attempts to stoke the conservative base and sink the president's priority, might look different by October."

Advocate Hopes Hearings Build Public Interest In Pragmatic Legislation. Tamar Jacoby, a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute, writes in the Washington Post (7/1, A25, 744K) reports, "The immigration bills passed by the House and Senate in recent months could hardly be more different. The House package is harsh, punitive and focused exclusively on tougher enforcement. The Senate bill balances toughness with pragmatism" and the House's decision to hold hearings in border states means that "by the end of the summer, the public will have had a long, thorough course on immigration." And "I'm convinced that this will only deepen viewers' pragmatism." That "could in turn shift the balance among House Republicans." So "come September, the public's hunger for a solution may be impossible to ignore."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush And Koizumi Visit Graceland. President Bush and Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi's visit to Graceland was treated mainly in a light-hearted manner on the network news, each of which devoted a short segment to the visit. Newspaper coverage generally reported that Koizumi was very happy to visit Graceland while the president looked uncomfortable. ABC World News Tonight (6/30, story 7, 2:15, K. Snow, 8.78M) called Bush and Koizumi's visit to Graceland "a day to remember in foreign diplomacy." Bush was quoted saying: "This visit here shows, not only am I personally fond of the prime minister, that the ties between our peoples are very strong, as well."

NBC Nightly News (6/30, story 8, 2:00, Faw, 9.87M) noted, "This visit was more than a reward for a friend who has staunchly supported Mr. Bush." Prof. Alan Schroeder, Northeastern University: "A pilgrimage to Graceland is like paying homage to American royalty. Presidents come and go; Elvis is forever."

The CBS Evening News (6/30, story 8, 2:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) referred to "the unlikely report that President Bush was taking Japan's visiting prime minister to Graceland." CBS (Alfonsi) added, "There are 500 Elvis impersonators in Japan. And the Japanese prime minister just happens to be one of them." So "Graceland put out the peanut butter and banana sandwiches." It "makes you wonder if 50 years from now, the president will broker world peace at Britney Spears' place."

The New York Times (7/1, Stolberg, Dewan, 1.19M) reports the prime minister said, "It's like a dream." Koizumi

"crooned, as Priscilla Presley, Elvis's former wife, and Lisa Marie, his daughter, looked on." The visit "was a Bush-Koizumi lovefest…orchestrated by the White House to spotlight the close relationship between Japan and the United States." And "Elvis music played loudly over the speakers, until Mr. Bush asked that it be turned down." The president also "made an unannounced stop at the National Civil Rights Museum."

Knight Ridder (7/1, Hutcheson) reports, "Elvis left the building years ago, but Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi channeled his spirit Friday during a visit to the performer's Graceland mansion. … It was perhaps the most bizarre moment in one of the strangest road trips in diplomatic history."

The Washington Times (7/1, Curl, 90K) reports, "Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi yesterday rocked the House That Elvis Built, crooning a few bars of some classic Presley hits and leaving his tour guide, President Bush, looking a bit like a whipped Hound Dog." Mr. Bush "struck a more sober tone."

The Financial Times (7/1, Daniel, Pilling) reports the trip was "designed to celebrate" the president's "special relationship with Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi" The Washington Post (7/1, C1, Baker, 744K) reports, "If wise men say only fools rush in, then on this day, at least, President Bush heeded the wise men. It was one thing to take his friend, Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, to Memphis to visit what evidently is now the nation's most important tourist site. But the president drew a line Friday when the wavy-haired Japanese leader began crooning Elvis songs." But "nothing would spoil Koizumi's day." The president "seemed to enjoy the show."

The AP (7/1, Riechmann) reports, "It didn't take much coaxing from President Bush to get Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi to croon some Elvis tunes Friday at the king of rock 'n' roll's Graceland mansion." The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Wallsten, 958K) reports that the president and first lady, "clearly unaccustomed to such a display (or perhaps still disoriented from the mirrored ceilings in the downstairs television room) looked on with strained smiles."

The Memphis Commercial Appeal (7/1, McMillin) reports, "The Tourist in Chief made his inaugural trip to Graceland on Friday, but it was President Bush's guest from Japan who rocked Memphis with his fervent adulation for the King of Rock and Roll. Strutting and singing and doing his best Elvis lunge across the shag carpet of the Jungle Room, Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi delighted the president, first lady Laura Bush and tour guides Priscilla and Lisa Marie Presley. 'You're a pretty good Elvis singer,' Bush said, and with the pack of media in the room entreating him, Koizumi delivered a teasing cabaret of tunes that make metaphors hard to resist. … 'Wise men say, only fools rush in,' Koizumi sang, beginning another love song but summing up what many dozen protesters across the street said in a less polite way about their dissatisfaction over the war in Iraq."

The Memphis Commercial Appeal's Halimah Abdullah (7/1) writes, "beyond the pomp and pompadours, the Memphis visit was a carefully orchestrated symbol of thanks to an outgoing leader of the world's second largest economy for supporting Bush on issues like the war in Iraq and terrorism. It's also a tactical move for Bush who, while cultivating close relationships with now-departing heads of state, finds himself besieged with criticism on domestic and international fronts. Likewise, Koizumi's theatrical warbling of Elvis tunes and flirting with Lisa Marie Presley were more about maintaining his affable public persona as he hammed it up for the press pool."

The Tennessean (7/1, Alligood) reports, "It was one magic day for Memphis, one grand day for Graceland. For about an hour and a half, three world potentates — two among the living and one reputed, by some theorists, to still be in the building — were at the locus of, if not the world's attention, then the universe of all things Elvis. The trip had been in the works for about six weeks. President George W. Bush's people, the Secret Service, came to town early to check out the Jungle Room and the rest of the mansion and gave their security blessings to the visit, which Koizumi requested."

The Memphis Commercial Appeal (7/1, Boyd) reports, "It wasn't fine china for President Bush and Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi on their visit Friday to the Rendezvous. They ate their lunch from paper plates and used plastic utensils just like regular customers. Inside the homey, back-alley restaurant, Bush cleaned his plate of barbecue ribs and washed it down with a Diet Coke."

Maureen Dowd writes in her column for the New York Times (7/1, 1.19M), "Junichiro Koizumi seemed to be in an ecstatic trance." But "Mr. Bush seemed out of his element." He "tried to make a serious point." Still, the trip "was a triumph in personal diplomacy." Dowd concludes, "with his small circle of pals and Iraq war defenders…drifting off the world stage, and with allies pulling back troops in Iraq, President Bush may soon be as isolated as Elvis was at the end."

Protestors, Supporters Greet Bush In Memphis. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (7/1, Murphy) reports, "About 250-300 people waited for the 30-second spectacle of the presidential motorcade as it roared down gritty Elvis Presley Boulevard into the gates of Graceland. … Carl Rising-Moore from Crawford, Texas, who carried a flag of slain soldier Casey Sheehan, son of Cindy Sheehan, became the unofficial protest leader because he had the megaphone. Someone gave him a list of things to chant, but mostly he'd just wing it, leaving a few quiet seconds while he came up with something else to shout. A few feet away, dressed in fatigues and a black beret, former Army specialist Allison DeVante of Memphis quietly held her sign, 'Stop rape of military women in Iraq.' She said she was raped in 2002 by the officer in charge and it took two years for the military to investigate. She left the Army and they never told her what became of her rapist. Nearby, three 18-year-old girls sang 'God Bless America' quietly. They made signs supporting Bush because they didn't want him to see only protest signs."

Koizumi Shares Traits With Elvis. The Washington Post (7/1, C7, 744K) publishes several similarities between Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi and Elvis.

Time Poll Shows Bush Approval At 35 Percent. Time (7/1, Cullen) in a web exclusive titled "Good News Fails To Boost Bush's Job Approval" reports a Time poll of 1,003 adults conducted June 27-29 shows "Bush's approval rating slipped to 35%...down from 37% in March (and 53% in early 2005). Only 33% of Americans in the survey said they approved of Bush's handling of the situation in Iraq, vs. 35% in March, and 47% in March 2005. His management of the U.S. economy lost supporters, too, as 36% approved, compared with 39% three months earlier. Bush's handling of the war on terror saw a slight gain in support, from 44% to 45%." His "poll numbers remain stuck in a rut." And "Congress isn't faring much better." Time notes, "Only 31% approved, down sharply from 39% in March. Asked whether they would be more likely to vote for the Republican or Democratic candidate…if the election were held today, 47% said Democrat and 35% said Republican, a two-point improvement for Democrats."

Student Activists Campaign For Bush's Impeachment. Time.com (7/1, Locke) reports, "Many people may scoff at the decision earlier this week by the Berkeley City Council to put a resolution on the Nov. 7 ballot calling for President Bush and Vice President Cheney to be impeached. After all, 74,000 voters of what is often referred to as The People's Republic of Berkeley can't legally oust the President and Vice President. But Berkeley Mayor Tom Bates thinks his city is simply ahead of its time, as it has often proved to be in the past. … Indeed, while Berkeley may be the first city to put an impeachment resolution to its people, numerous city and town councils have already passed such resolutions, including San Francisco, Santa Cruz, and Chapel Hill, N.C. State legislatures in Vermont, California and Illinois all have impeachment resolutions pending. To help raise awareness of the issue, there will be a series of teach-ins across the country this summer and fall, and a new film, 'How to Impeach a President,' will be screened — all part of the burgeoning impeachment effort called 'Constitution Summer,' led by a non-partisan coalition of students from the country's top law schools and universities."

Bush Nominates Mishkin To Fed. The Wall Street Journal (7/1, Pulizzi, 2.11M) reports, "President Bush Friday nominated Columbia University Professor Frederic S. Mishkin" to fill out the 14-year term ending in January 2014 of Roger Ferguson. Mishkin "has a well-established relationship with Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke." The two co-wrote a book on inflation targeting and Mishkin's nomination is "likely to heighten speculation that the central bank may eventually embrace the strategy." And "the White House has another vacancy to fill on the Fed board" as Fed Governor Mark Olson resigned, effective Friday.

The Washington Post (7/1, D3, Irwin, 744K) reports Mishkin is "a leading proponent of the idea that central bankers should set explicit targets for controlling inflation." He "headed the research department at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York in the 1990s" and is "a professor at Columbia University's business school." The nomination "adds momentum to the cause of 'inflation targeting,' which would be a departure from the Fed's traditional, improvisational approach to setting monetary policy." But former White House economic adviser R. Glenn Hubbard "played down the likelihood that Mishkin's appointment will contribute to a change in how the Fed works."

Markets Gain On Fed Report. The Washington Post (7/1, D1, Masters, 744K) reports, "Volatility ruled the stock markets in the quarter that ended Friday, and analysts agreed investors should be prepared for continued turbulence."

Market declines in May and June are attributed to "concern that inflation may be picking up, 60 central banks around the world raising interest rates, and worries that the U.S. and global economies may be slowing." And "the major U.S. market indexes…each fell between 7 percent and 11 percent between May 8 and mid-June before recovering slightly at the end of the quarter." But "U.S. analysts disagree sharply about what the next six months will bring, although most expect the Federal Reserve to raise interest rates at least one more time, to 5.5 percent."

Bloomberg (7/1) reports, "U.S. stocks trimmed the biggest weekly advance since January as technology companies widened their examination of stock-option grants, hurting their shares. Apple Computer Inc. and Computer Sciences Corp. led the retreat as they started investigations." The market "rebounded this week from three weeks of losses as Federal Reserve policy makers, who raised interest rates for the 17th straight time, said in a statement that the economy is 'moderating from its quite strong pace' earlier in the year."

The Financial Times (7/1, O'Doherty) reports, "Wall Street finished the week sharply higher, gaining strongly after a Federal Reserve policy meeting this week and bringing to a close a quarter that mauled technology stocks and small-caps but left large-caps barely changed. Stocks soared immediately after the Federal Open Market Committee's decision to raise interest rates by 25 basis points on Thursday."

The New York Times (7/1, Andrews, 1.19M) reports, "The Federal Reserve raised interest rates for the 17th consecutive time on Thursday, but kicked off a powerful celebration in the stock market by lowering its alarms about inflation." The gains were described as a "relief rally." But the gains were also called "the latest example of heightened volatility in financial markets and heightened uncertainty about Fed policy under its rookie chairman, Ben S. Bernanke."

Consumer Spending Slowed In May But Confidence Is Up For June. Bloomberg (7/1) reports, "Consumer spending in the U.S. rose in May by the least in three months, and a measure of inflation watched by the Federal Reserve was unchanged, a day after policy makers hinted at a pause in their interest-rate increases. Spending increased 0.4 percent after a gain of 0.7 percent in April." The annual rate "excluding food and energy, rose 2.1 percent from a year ago." The lack of growth in inflation "pushed the dollar lower and spurred a rebound in Treasury notes." Meanwhile, the University of Michigan reported "the first increase in confidence in three months" rising to "84.9 from 79.1 in May."

The New York Times/AP (7/1) reports, "Consumer spending slowed sharply in May as rising gasoline prices left Americans with less cash for other items, the government reported Friday." That "provided further evidence that the economy slowed sharply in the spring." Meanwhile, "many analysts said the new inflation figure in Friday's spending report increased the odds that the Fed will increase rates at least one more time at the next meeting on Aug. 8."

OTHER NEWS:

NASA Engineers' Safety Concerns Draw Media Scrutiny As Shuttle Is Prepared For Launch. All three networks aired extensive segments on the preparations for Discovery's launch yesterday evening, with ABC and CBS leading their broadcasts with reports on Discovery and CBS running its story second. All three reports focused on the persistent concerns over fuel tank insulation shedding. NASA Administrator Michael Griffin's contention that risk can never be completely eliminated in the context of a shuttle launch was quoted in each of the network's segments. ABC World News Tonight (6/30, lead story, 2:50, K. Snow, 8.78M) reported, "It is the first mission in nearly a year, and only the second since the disaster in 2003. Questions about safety remain. Tonight, newly released e-mails show how high those concerns go." ABC continued, "As the launch approaches, there has been debate within NASA if the shuttle is safe enough to fly." NASA Administrator Michael Griffin was shown saying, "Is it a gamble? Are we playing the odds? Yes, of course. Every time we launch this shuttle, we take a risk." ABC went on to report, "Some have questioned if the risk is too great. NASA's top safety officials voted not to launch until there were more modifications to the foam on the fuel tanks. Today, it was learned, some in the inspector general's office have questioned the decision to go. In one e-mail, an inspector wrote 'The shuttle program and ultimately Mike Griffin (NASA Admr) are rolling the dice, but they think their odds are good.'" ABC concluded, "Now, one key reason that the NASA administrator feels comfortable launching tomorrow is that if there is a problem on liftoff with the foam, he does not feel it presents a safety issue for the crew. The shuttle would go up to the space station, dock. The crew would wait on the space station for a rescue."

The CBS Evening News (6/30, lead story, 3:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Never before has there been a launch like the one scheduled tomorrow. NASA's top administrator is saying he considers it so important to keep the space program on schedule, he is willing to override the safety concerns of his top engineer and his top safety officer." CBS added, "Discovery will be the only shuttle ever launched with a system officially classified as an unacceptable risk. The danger comes from insulating foam on the shuttle's external fuel tank and the possibility that pieces may break off from brackets during launch, puncturing the shuttle's heat shield, which has to be intact for a safe reentry at the end of the mission. NASA's chief engineer and top safety official labeled that failure as probable/catastrophic, meaning there's roughly one in 100 chance that a foam strike will cause catastrophic damage to Discovery." NBC Nightly News (6/30, story 2, 1:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, Engineers think they have minimized the risk but not eliminated it. Two senior engineers voted no when asked if the shuttle should launch. However, NASA management has overruled them, and decided to fly anyway. NASA leadership says, right now, the risks are acceptable and they must get going to finish the International Space Station. Importantly, those two engineers did not object when they were overruled."

Griffin's Role In Overruling Engineers' Objections To Launch Noted. The New York Times (7/1, Schwartz, Leary, 1.19M) reports, "Griffin…overruled the engineers. … He also said…he wanted to leave time to complete the 17 missions planned before President Bush's deadline for ending the shuttle program in 2010. On Friday, Mr. Griffin defended that decision, contrasting the open discussion with the process that led up to the Columbia disaster, in which managers were found to have squelched dissent. This month's preflight review was a healthy exchange of ideas and decision-making about difficult issues, he said, adding, 'What you're seeing is a good process.'" The Washington Post/AP (7/1, A5, Schneider) reports, "Griffin is taking a calculated gamble by going ahead with the launch of Discovery, overruling two top managers who fear that foam flying off the fuel tank might harm the space shuttle. The world will soon know if his gamble pays off." Griffin "wants to get the shuttles flying again and believes that a delay now would create schedule pressure toward the end of the decade. He has acknowledged, though, that he would probably shut down the shuttle program if another vehicle is lost."

Future Of Shuttle Program Depends On "Pedestrian" Discovery Mission. The New York Times (7/1, Schwartz, Leary, 1.19M) reports the Discovery crew will complete "what NASA managers called 'a rather pedestrian mission' that nevertheless has a great deal riding on it. … The 12-day mission is mainly dedicated mainly to carrying food, water, spare parts, oxygen and other supplies to the International Space Station, along with a new crew member. But far more important to the future of the space program is the issue of flaws that doomed two previous missions, those of the Challenger in 1986 and the Columbia in 2003."

WTimes Contends Current Mission Could Well Be The Shuttle Program's Last. The Washington Times (7/1, 90K) editorializes, "If anything goes wrong, which doesn't necessarily mean the loss of a third shuttle…Griffin will likely end the program. … Even something as small as what occurred last summer, when the same foam debris that doomed Columbia in 2003 flaked off Discovery's outer hull requiring a mid-mission repair, anti-shuttle forces both within and from outside NASA will probably prevail in their long-running effort to move forward from the 1970s-era program."

Louisiana Criticizes Federal Deadline For Clearing Hurricane Rita Debris. The Baton Rouge Advocate (7/1, Courreges) reports, "President Bush's Thursday exclusion of Hurricane Rita-hit areas from a list of parishes receiving time extensions on full federal coverage of expenses for hurricane debris clearing may largely paralyze work on clearing debris in storm-shattered Cameron Parish, starting today." LA7 Rep. Charles Boustany (R) on Friday "derided the decision as a 'bean-counter approach' and a 'slap in the face.' Beginning today, parishes not on the list as eligible for the deadline extension sent out by the Bush administration will have to pay 10 percent of the cost of debris removal--a list that includes none of the parishes directly hit by Rita."

Congress Seeks To Undo Error In Long-Term Oil Leases. The CBS Evening News (6/30, story 5, 2:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "We sort of hate to tell you about this next story for fear it will set off road rage." CBS (Attkisson) added, "The House of Representatives rushed last night to undo a colossal mistake, one that lets oil companies keep billions of dollars for themselves, money that should be going to U.S. taxpayers for the right to drill in U.S. waters." The mistake was that "somebody in the government left the royalty part out of thousands of long-term leases signed in 1998 and '99." So "Congress has been scrambling to find out who cut big oil the big break. Nobody seems to know. It happened during the Clinton years." But a bill "passed last night in the House, next goes on to the Senate. It would force oil companies to face up -- to pay up, rather, or face big penalties."

Kerr-McGee To Seek Negotiated Settlement. The New York Times (7/1, Andrews, 1.19M) reports, "The Kerr-McGee Corporation, under pressure from Congress, said on Friday that it would begin negotiations to settle a lawsuit that if it went to trial could deprive the government of as much as $60 billion in oil and gas royalties." The firm "sued the Interior Department in March to overturn a provision that requires companies to pay full royalties if oil prices climb above about $34 a barrel and natural gas prices rise above about $4 per thousand cubic feet."

House And Senate Differ On Opening Coastal Waters To Exploration. The AP (7/1, Hebert) reports, "Congress has taken a major step toward allowing oil and gas drilling in coastal waters that have been off limits for a quarter-century. Still, a battle looms in the Senate over the issue. And the Bush administration's support for the legislation…is lukewarm." The House bill would "end an Outer Continental Shelf drilling moratorium" that "covers 85 percent of the country's coastal waters." One provision "would give tens of billions of dollars to states that have drilling rigs off their coasts." It is "likely to face a filibuster from Florida senators." The Senate "is considering a limited measure that would open an area in the eastern Gulf of Mexico, known as Lease Area 181, that comes within 100 miles of Florida." The White House "strongly opposes the changes in royalty revenue sharing."

House Votes To Lift Ban On International Sales Of F-22. The Washington Post (7/1, D1, Merle, 744K) reports the U.S. House of Representatives "has recommended lifting a ban on international sales of the nation's most advanced fighter, the F-22 Raptor." The ban "was put in place to keep the Raptor's high-tech systems out of the hands of foreign governments." But lagging U.S. military orders have created fears that Lockheed Martin Corp. "may shut down the plane's production line in coming years."

Congressional Negotiators Still Unable To Resolve Pension Issues. The AP (7/1, Abrams) reports, "Congress falls short once again of achieving one of its prime goals: coming up with a bill to assure 44 million workers who depend on employer-based pension plans that they will get their promised retirement benefits." House and Senate negotiators are "still apart on two big issues: How to make companies that have fallen behind on payments to their pension plans make them up without driving them to terminate the plans or declare bankruptcy. Whether to single out financially struggling airlines for special treatment." And "the toughest issue has been working out a definition of what is an 'at risk' company that would be required by the bill to increase contributions to its pension plan."

Maryland Blue Cross Cuts Reimbursements To Doctors; Investigation Requested. The Washington Times (7/1, Rowland, 90K) reports, "A slate of reimbursement cuts going into effect today for CareFirst BlueCross BlueShield providers has some Washington-area doctors threatening to limit new patients or drop out of the network. The cuts also have prompted the Maryland State Medical Society to ask Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr. to investigate 'monopolistic pricing practices' between the state's largest health insurer and its major rival, UnitedHealth Group."

Senators Seek Reauthorization Of HOPE VI Housing Program. The Wall Street Journal (7/1, Roberts, 2.11M) reports, "The Federal Government's program to revitalize public housing is set to expire" but MD Sen. Barbara Mikulski (D) "is fighting an uphill battle to preserve it." The program, Homeownership and Opportunity for People Everywhere, "will be phased out in September." There is still "$3 billion…designated to complete projects, but hasn't yet been spent." And "the Bush administration says Hope VI hasn't been very productive." Yet Mikulski and "a bipartisan group of senators…are pushing for reauthorization."

Bush Makes Fifth Visit To Ohio This Year For DeWine Fundraiser. The AP (7/1, Smyth) reports, "The state's political hit parade continued Friday with President Bush jetting into the Columbus area for a fund-raiser for U.S. Sen. Mike DeWine. Adults and children were making signs to greet the president hours before his arrival in a suburban Columbus neighborhood Friday afternoon, and others stood in their driveways holding small American flags." The AP notes, "Friday's private fund-raiser for DeWine is Bush's fifth visit to the state this year."

Schwarzenegger Fined $202,000 Over Campaign Donation Violations. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Salladay, 958K) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's campaign "has agreed to pay a $202,200 penalty for failing to properly report more than $25 million in campaign donations during the special election last year, the state Fair Political Practices Commission said Friday. … Under California law, campaigns must publicly disclose donations they receive and money they spend — in some cases within 24 hours of the transaction. Disclosure is the bedrock of California's finance law, allowing the public to see the money behind political campaigns. In documents released Friday, the commission found that Schwarzenegger's California Recovery Team, created to advance the governor's causes, failed to report in a timely way millions of dollars in donations that were used to buy TV advertising pushing four initiatives on the November ballot. It found 143 delinquent reports on $25.6 million in expenditures. The complaint was filed by the Alliance for a Better California, a union-backed group that worked against the governor last year."

Schwarzenegger Approves California's First On-Time Budget In Six Years. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Halper, 958K) reports Schwarzenegger "signed the state's first on-time budget in six years Friday, after using his veto power to scale back the expansion of environmental enforcement and healthcare programs approved by the Legislature earlier this week. The $131-billion spending plan signed by the governor will use a surge of unanticipated revenue that filled California's coffers this year to pay back billions the state borrowed from schools in recent years as well as to accelerate repayment of other state debt.

EDITORIAL WRAP-UP:

New York Times: "Don't Know Much About History." An editorial entitled "Don't Know Much About History" in the New York Times (7/1, 1.19M) says, "Somewhere between the firing in 2002 of President Bush's first Treasury secretary, Paul O'Neill, and the Senate confirmation this week of his third Treasury chief, Henry Paulson, the administration changed its tune on budget deficits. In the early days, the line was, essentially, that deficits don't matter. … Now, officials dutifully declaim that deficits matter, but that Bush-era shortfalls are 'within historical norms.' Mr. Paulson apparently shares that view, having offered it repeatedly when asked about budget deficits during his confirmation hearing." The Times faults that claim as a "disappointment" that "takes a narrow view of history." The Times states, "In contrast, the Bush years have been marked by nonstop tax cutting, deepening debt, the abandonment of budget rules and increased spending, paid for by borrowing," which is "alarming" because they are heavily foreign-financed (over 73 percent since 2001). By implying that the Bush deficits are normal, Paulson and others in the administration ignore the need to focus on tax cuts in addressing the deficit, the Times says, adding its "hope that in discussions with his new boss, Mr. Paulson has more to say about the budget deficit than he let on during his confirmation hearing."

"Watching Out for Wandering Data." The New York Times (7/1, 1.19M) editorializes, "The government's extraordinary attempt at damage control when it appeared the computer was gone for good — including a plan to offer a year's free credit monitoring to the veterans at a cost of more than $160 million — underlines a mushrooming problem. It is becoming obvious that government agencies, and businesses, need better policies and practices for handling sensitive data stored on computers. To begin with, personal information on 17 million veterans is not the sort of data that should be moving around on a laptop. Data this valuable should also have been encrypted, to make it difficult for thieves to use it."

"The Dangers of Secondhand Smoke."

"Editorial Observer: The Highway Into and Out of a Tanzanian City, in Darkness and in Light."

Washington Post: "Passports for Health Care." The Washington Post (7/1, A24, 744K) writes in an editorial the rule "may sound like a sensible safeguard" but it is "unnecessary, expensive and mean-spirited." It may result in "millions of people entitled to receive Medicaid benefits" being "denied coverage." Many American are said to lack documentation having neither a passport nor a birth certificate. Yet "under the administration's guidance for state Medicaid agencies, states can't extend coverage to new applicants while they scramble to obtain documentation."

The post concludes, "this is an unnecessarily cruel law interpreted in an unnecessarily cruel way."

"Hamas's War." The Washington Post (7/1, A24, 744K) editorializes that if "Israel's offensive in the Gaza Strip is aimed at overturning" Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh's government, "Israel would be entirely justified." He chose not to "behave like a civilized government -- and work to free the hostage" but to "align itself with a terrorist operation." Still, "Israel's Gaza incursion has been reluctant, slow, carefully calibrated," restraint that "reflects recognition by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert that Israel stands only to lose if the Palestinian Authority is destroyed by force." Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas could broker a political solution, but he "needs more help than he is getting from Egypt, other Arab states and the United Nations. Instead of fulminating about supposed Israeli war crimes, these actors ought to be demanding that Hamas -- and its sponsors in Damascus and Tehran -- stop their own acts of terrorism and war."

"Sabotaging Open Government." The Washington Post (7/1, A24, 744K) editorializes that if "Israel's offensive in the Gaza Strip is aimed at overturning" Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh's government, "Israel would be entirely justified." He chose not to "behave like a civilized government -- and work to free the hostage" but to "align itself with a terrorist operation." Instead of fulminating about supposed Israeli war crimes, these actors ought to be demanding that Hamas -- and its sponsors in Damascus and Tehran -- stop their own acts of terrorism and war."

Wall Street Journal: "Hedge Fund Hoopla." The Wall Street Journal (7/1, A10, 2.11M) in an editorial writes, "Politicians are drawn to piles of unregulated money like, well, politicians to TV cameras. So it was only a matter of time before Congress took aim at the $2.4 trillion hedge fund industry." But, "Congress should tread carefully, if it treads at all."

"Arab Women's Suffrage."

"Jon Corzine Florio." The Wall Street Journal (7/1, 2.11M) editorializes, "Nearly every state in the nation is celebrating the new fiscal year that begins on Monday with record tax revenues. The big exception is New Jersey, which is headed instead for what could be a government shutdown. The political showdown isn't between Republicans and Democrats, but is between Governor Jon Corzine and his fellow Democrats who control the state legislature. On Wednesday, Democrats cursed each other and, according to our eyewitness sources, came close to blows inside the capitol in Trenton. Mr. Corzine is now threatening a government shutdown if his own party doesn't bend to his proposal for a $1.5 billion tax increase. Remarkably, all of this intra-party feuding isn't over whether to raise taxes, merely over how. … Meanwhile, the one promise that Democrats made to voters in last year's election campaign -- lowering what are some of the highest property taxes in the country -- remains conspicuously unfulfilled."

Los Angeles Times: "Happy anniversary, Antonio. What's next?"

"Show Africa the money." The Los Angeles Times (7/1, 958K) editorializes, "a s we near the one-year anniversary of the Group of 8 summit in Gleneagles, Scotland," where "Rich nations signed a historic pact to forgive the debts of some of the world's most impoverished countries." However, "G-8 countries are far off track on their aid commitments and even further from a comprehensive trade deal." Implementing the agreement "to eliminate all export subsidies, cut other domestic supports and improve access to their markets for poor countries" was "supposed to be accomplished by the World Trade Organization during its Doha round of talks. Doha is desperately, perhaps fatally, stalled," and the rich countries' "promises are already starting to look hollow."

"Winning over the freeloaders." The Los Angeles Times (7/1, 958K), in a "One Year Later" feature, follows up a the Supreme Court's Grokster decision, and says the victorious recording labels and studios "haven't done enough to lure file sharers." The decision said companies like Grokster that let their users share files over the Internet can be held liable for enabling copyright infringement. Even though the percentage of U.S. Internet users sharing files has stayed flat in recent years, while the percentage of those buying in online stores has seen real growth, "free downloaders represent a lost opportunity for the entertainment industry." The Times calls for "much more experimentation with approaches that give users the control and freedom to consume that make file-sharing networks so attractive."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Administration Waiting For Congress To Act On Detainee Policy. While the White House was characterized as waiting for Congress to respond to the recent Supreme Court ruling on Guantanamo detainees, Congress was described as preparing to take action in what is expected to be a high-profile partisan debate which could effect the mid-term elections. NBC Nightly News (6/30, story 5, 2:00, P. Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Government lawyers met in Washington trying to figure out how to come up with some way to put detainees at Guantanamo on trial." Sen. Arlen Specter has "introduced a bill to revive military commissions. It's an idea the Bush administration favors, worried military courts would give detainees too much access to classified information. Human rights lawyers say trial by court martial would be more fair and respected worldwide." Meanwhile, "the Administration wants to see what Congress comes up with, delaying any trials for months."

GOP Takes Lead In Challenging Democrats Over Detainee Policy. Most US newspapers Saturday morning described GOP lawmakers as aggressively acting in response to the detainee ruling. The Washington Post (7/1, A1, Abramowitz, Weisman, 744K) in a front page story reports, "Republicans yesterday looked to wrest a political victory from a legal defeat in the Supreme Court, serving notice to Democrats that they must back President Bush on how to try suspects at Guantanamo Bay or risk being branded as weak on terrorism." While "the White House and lawmakers weighed next steps, House GOP leaders signaled they are ready to use this week's turn of events as a political weapon." One senior administration official "seemed to hint at the potential political implications in Congress. 'Members of both parties will have to decide whether terrorists who cherish the killing of innocents deserve the same protections as our men and women who wear the uniform,' this official said."

The Wall Street Journal (7/1, McKinnon, Bravin, 2.11M) reports, "Many Republicans predict that despite the White House's legal defeat over military tribunals, President Bush will emerge as the political winner among security-conscious voters." On Friday "Republicans sought to score points for the president. Conservative legal activists charged Democrats with excessive celebration of the decision, and said they would alienate voters. House Majority Leader John Boehner accused Democrats of supporting 'special privileges for terrorists.'" But in response "a number of Democratic lawmakers suggested that voters are likely to be frustrated with how the administration has handled the Guantanamo Bay detention center." Recently "Bush appeared to gain political momentum, thanks to a series of positive developments in Iraq. But the ruling could remind voters of the mistakes and overreaching that have dogged the administration's war effort."

The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Reynolds, 958K) says "The debate is expected to dominate the congressional agenda for the coming months, and is likely to fuel a partisan confrontation over whether the United States has gone too far on some fronts in conducting its war on terrorism." The Times notes, "Simply asking Congress to OK the policy…appeared Friday to be the approach favored by the White House." While the detainee ruling "may be a blow to the president's policies, it may benefit his party politically -- permitting candidates in November elections to talk tough about fighting terrorists and portray Democrats as weak."

The Washington Times (7/1, Seper, 90K) reports, "The White House yesterday said the Guantanamo Bay prison will remain open until all the detainees are dealt with, and the administration will work with Congress to remedy problems the Supreme Court cited when it ruled special military tribunals were illegally created." And "White House spokesman Tony Snow said Congress is interested in ensuring the more than 400 detainees at the naval facility in Cuba are brought to justice or sent home." Snow said, "You close it when you finish handling all the cases of people who are at Guantanamo."

Sen. Warner Uncommitted To Legislation Creating New Military Tribunals. In contrast to other publications, the New York Times (7/1, Zernike, 1.19M) described the debate over new military tribunals as potentially splitting Republicans, reporting, "A leading Senate Republican said Friday that he was not sure that Congress should pass legislation to create new military tribunals for terror suspects, a stance that raised doubts about prospects for a White House plan to establish an alternative to the commissions struck down this week by the Supreme Court." Warner is "concerned that new tribunals, even if authorized by Congress, might not withstand judicial scrutiny." Warner's caution "suggested signs of division, even among Republicans, about how to balance concerns about the threat posed by terrorism with the court's requirements that detainees must be granted some basic rights."

Ruling On Detainees Seen As Threat To Executive Authority. Knight Ridder (7/1, Landay, Taylor, Talev) in an article titled "Supreme Court Ruling May Ripple Through Other Bush Policies" cites "widespread agreement" by experts that the recent ruling on detainees could impact the Administration's NSA terrorist surveillance program and detainee policies and says, "At its heart, legal experts said, the ruling rebuffed Bush's contention that the president has special powers during wartime to disregard acts of Congress and international treaties." In an interview Sen. Lindsay Graham agreed, saying, "One of the potential implications is that the 'inherent authority' argument pushed by the executive branch may be in retreat." Meanwhile, Sen. Arlen Specter "said he doesn't take the court's ruling to mean that those already being held would be off the hook simply because their rights were found to have been violated." Specter said, "They can argue that…but I think there's a basis for detaining them if they're dangerous." If "Congress passes legislation 'very promptly'" they will not be released. And "Graham agreed that the court's ruling 'confirms that the military can hold these people until the hostilities are over." He said "we now know how to write the statute to make it constitutional and to be able to move the cases forward."

The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Spiegel, 958K) in an analysis described the potential impact of the ruling as "unclear" writing that for Salim Ahmed Hamdan, "the future is a bit clearer: He must receive a trial with new, congressionally approved procedures." Yet, "the landmark 5-3 decision may also have a significant impact on hundreds of other detainees at Guantanamo, as well as an unknown number picked up by U.S. forces and held in undisclosed locations around the world." It "could lead to sweeping changes in the way they are treated, according to legal experts and advocates for those held. The ruling could give Guantanamo prisoners a day in a U.S. court, and senior Al Qaeda operatives being held as U.S. captives visits from the Red Cross."

And the AP (7/1, Yost) notes, "The Supreme Court setback for the White House comes amid a full frontal assault by the administration against The New York Times for revealing the existence of the NSA program as well as another secret government initiative accessing a huge databank of bank records." The AP adds, "The American Society of Newspaper Editors, responding to such criticism, said Friday that the Bush administration and some in Congress 'are threatening America's bedrock values of free speech and free press with their attempts to demonize newspapers for fulfilling their constitutional role in our democratic society.'"

Kennedy Applauded For Checking Executive Authority. The Financial Times (7/1, Waldmeir) credits Justice Anthony Kennedy with dealing the "historic blow this week to the executive powers of the Bush administration." The Times asks "Does that mean Justice Kennedy can be relied on to vote against the government in future cases inspired by this week's Hamdan case? Perhaps in a challenge to the president's warrantless wiretapping programme? Legal experts say it is too soon to tell. But one thing is clear: the new court is no lapdog of the Bush administration, and the new swing voter is no fan of unfettered executive power."

Ruling Seen As Rewarding Detainees' Efforts. Time (7/1, Zagorin) in a web exclusive reports that Guantanamo detainee "hunger strikers have already won a measure of success. In part because of their protests, and the attention focused on Guantanamo, the U.S. is facing growing criticism -- from both allies and enemies -- for the rules of detention at the camp. Now the Supreme Court's Hamdan decision effectively grants prisoners at least some of their longstanding demands, including more rights at trial. All the same, most of them are unlikely to be released soon. Indeed, authorities are currently constructing a new, state-of-the-art, $30 million prison at Guantanamo, where they plan to consolidate many of the camp's maximum-security inmates."

More Commentary. Weekly Standard senior editor Christopher Caldwell in his column titled "A Blessing In Disguise For Bush" in the Financial Times (7/1, Caldwell) writes that while the media celebrated the Supreme Court's detainee ruling, "Since Guantánamo does not agitate US public opinion in the way that overseas sceptics of the war on terror would assume, the five-to-three decision will wreak no sea change in politics, nor harm Mr Bush. As November elections heave into view, it could just as easily help him." Bush, "much like everyone else, is groping for an intellectual handhold on the problem of terrorism." But if "Hamdan is not to be tried as a war criminal, it is because of a new ambiguity that surrounds the word "war", rather than a new ambiguity that surrounds the word "criminal". What do you charge a person like Mr Hamdan with? Even if Mr Bush has come up with the wrong answer, Americans are not about to punish him for thinking that it is the right question.

Edwin S. Matthews Jr., counsel of record for 175 members of the British Parliament who filed a brief in Rasul v. George W. Bush supporting judicial review of the holding of prisoners by the United States government in Guantánamo, writes in a letter to the editor of the New York Times (7/1, 1.19M) that the Supreme Court, in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, "stood up to protect us all." The "government has denied prisoners in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba," the right to be present at our trial, the right to know what evidence the state presents against us, the right to be defended by counsel we choose and the right under the Geneva Conventions to benefit from 'all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples,'" and it "could under many other circumstances deny them to any of us. No war against anything justifies the denial of such essential rights."

Lawyers Claim NSA Sought To Create Domestic Monitoring Program Before 9/11 Attacks. Bloomberg (7/1, Harris) reports, "The U.S. National Security Agency asked AT&T Inc. to help it set up a domestic call monitoring site seven months before the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks, lawyers" suing telecommunications companies over allegations they cooperated with the NSA terrorist surveillance program "claimed June 23 in court papers filed in New York federal court." In June 2000 a "NSA initiative, code-named 'Pioneer Groundbreaker,' asked AT&T unit AT&T Solutions to build exclusively for NSA use a network operations center which duplicated AT&T's Bedminster, New Jersey facility, the court papers claimed. That plan was abandoned in favor of the NSA acquiring the monitoring technology itself, plaintiffs' lawyers Bruce Afran said."

USA Today Admits It Cannot Confirm Telecommunication Companies Cooperated With NSA. USA Today (6/30, 2a, 2.31M) reports, "Members of the House and Senate intelligence committees confirm that the National Security Agency has compiled a massive database of domestic phone call records. But some lawmakers also say that cooperation by the nation's telecommunication companies was not as extensive as first reported by USA TODAY on May 11." USA Today continues, "Several lawmakers, briefed in secret by intelligence officials about the program after the story was published, described a call records database that is enormous but incomplete. Most asked that they not be identified by name, and many offered only limited responses to questions, citing national security concerns."

USA Today (6/30, 2.31M) in a note to its readers Friday said "Based on its reporting after the May 11 article, USA TODAY has now concluded that while the NSA has built a massive domestic calls record database involving the domestic call records of telecommunications companies, the newspaper cannot confirm that BellSouth or Verizon contracted with the NSA to provide bulk calling records to that database."

The New York Times (7/1, Richtel, 1.19M) notes, "In the aftermath of the USA Today article in May, The New York Times reported that the security agency's efforts to collect phone data appeared to be focusing not on the local service phone companies, like BellSouth, Verizon and Qwest, but on the long-distance companies, including the former MCI and AT&T." In May, "Verizon issued a statement saying it had not turned over calling records to the security agency, but it left open the possibility that MCI, which it recently acquired, had done so. Verizon said yesterday that it had no further comment." And "AT&T said yesterday: 'The news media have carried reports alleging that AT&T is participating in an N.S.A. terrorist surveillance program. Unfortunately, the law does not permit AT&T to respond to those allegations.'"

The Washington Post (7/1, A2, Ahrens, Kurtz, 744K) says "The correction illustrates the difficulty of reporting sensitive and often classified government actions, as anonymous sources sometimes backtrack, pursue their own agendas by leaking selective information or say more than they know. News organizations attempt to assemble authoritative stories from multiple sources and agencies, creating plenty of room for potential error." The AP (7/1) reports similar details. The Wall Street Journal (7/1, Ellison, 2.11M) reports similar details.

NYT, LAT Editors Defend Decision To Print Classified Material. Los Angeles Times editor Dean Baquet and New York Times editor Bill Keller in an op-ed in the New York Times (7/1, 1.19M) defend their decision to publish classified information anout US efforts to fight terrorism writing, "Government officials, understandably, want it both ways. They want us to protect their secrets, and they want us to trumpet their successes. A few days ago, Treasury Secretary John Snow said he was scandalized by our decision to report on the bank-monitoring program. But in September 2003 the same Secretary Snow invited a group of reporters from our papers, The Wall Street Journal and others to travel with him and his aides on a military aircraft for a six-day tour to show off the department's efforts to track terrorist financing. The secretary's team discussed many sensitive details of their monitoring efforts, hoping they would appear in print and demonstrate the administration's relentlessness against the terrorist threat." Baquet and Keller conclude, "We understand that honorable people may disagree with any of these choices — to publish or not to publish. But making those decisions is the responsibility that falls to editors, a corollary to the great gift of our independence. It is not a responsibility we take lightly. And it is not one we can surrender to the government." The same op-ed also appears in the Los Angeles Times (7/1, 958K).

Administration Provided Material On Terrorist Financing Program To WSJ To Counteract NYT And LAT. Howard Kurtz in his "Media Notes" column in the Washington Post (7/1, C1, 744K) writes that as the debate over publishing details of the Treasury Department's terrorist finance tracking program escalates between the Wall Street Journal and the New York Times, "The Journal editorial board, which operates independently from the newsroom, said a top

Treasury Department official had contacted Journal reporter Glenn Simpson and handed him the story. The editorial said Treasury officials decided to 'declassify a series of talking points' after failing to persuade the New York Times -- as well as the Los Angeles Times -- to kill the story on grounds that it would neutralize a key administration weapon in the war on terror. The same declassified information was provided to the other two papers, as well as to The Washington Post later on the evening of June 22."

U.S. Claims South Florida Lead Suspect Planned Terrorist Army. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (7/1, Blum, 249K) reports, "The alleged ringleader of a group of South Florida men accused of plotting to blow up Sears Tower in Chicago wanted the blast to divert law enforcement so he could free inmates from a prison to join his terrorist army, federal prosecutors said Friday." At a two-hour hearing in a Miami federal courtroom on whether six of the seven men arrested June 22 should remain in custody, lead U.S. prosecutor Jacqueline Arango sketched "an ambitious, but inept, military-style organization whose members had illusions of grandeur and a taste for intrigue."

Suspects Variously Seen As Die-Hards, Dupes. The New York Times (7/1, Drew, Lichtblau, 1.19M) reports, "The seven men arrested on terror charges were shown Friday on undercover videotapes solemnly reciting oaths of loyalty to Al Qaeda, repeating the words that an F.B.I. informant had given them to say." The prosecutor's presentation also revealed that ringleader Batiste had requested that an undercover informant procure rockets and semiautomatic rifles. Lawyers for some defendants claimed that their clients knew little of Batiste's plans, and some criticized the new evidence presented at the Friday hearing as showing government entrapment. Yet, "the parents of most of the defendants, including some who have been very critical of the case, appeared surprised by the evidence presented Friday, sitting quietly through the court hearing and refusing to comment afterward." Others saw the new evidence as portraying Batiste "as a bizarre and self-aggrandizing figure" and that his followers "mostly poor, young Haitian-Americans, were more involved in parts of the scheme than their families and community leaders had suspected."

California Security Agency Tracked Protestors. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Nicholas, 958K) reports, "Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's office in charge of protecting California against terrorism has tracked demonstrations staged by political and antiwar groups, a practice that senior law enforcement officials say is an abuse of civil liberties. The Times obtained reports prepared for the state Office of Homeland Security in recent months that contain details on the whereabouts and purpose of a number of political demonstrations throughout California. The source of the information is listed in some cases as federal law enforcement agencies, including the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, an investigative arm of the U.S. Homeland Security department." The two daily reports reviewed by the Times included such political activities as an animal rights rally outside Canada's San Francisco consulate protesting sea hunting, a demonstration in Walnut Creek where CA7 Rep. George Miller (D) and other officials spoke against the Iraq war, and a Women's International League for Peace and Freedom courthouse rally in Santa Barbara to support an antiwar protester facing federal trespassing charges. A spokesman for state Attorney General Bill Lockyer "condemned the actions, saying they violated the groups' constitutional right of free speech."

L.A. Police Chief, Others, Press Homeland Security For Greater Sharing Of Intelligence. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Winton, McGreevy, 958K) reports, "Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton said Friday that he and other big-city police chiefs will meet this month with top Homeland Security officials amid complaints that the federal agency isn't doing enough to share information with local law enforcement nationwide. It also notes, "Los Angeles mayor Antonio Villaraigosa publicly complained that federal officials didn't give him an in-depth briefing before President Bush detailed a terrorist threat on the U.S. Bank Tower in downtown Los Angeles." But L.A. chief Bratton and others have said the larger problem is the quality, not the sharing, of federal agency intelligence. "Bratton said is it is not so much 'they don't share intelligence as they don't have intelligence.'"

FBI Raids Pittsburgh Mosque. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/1, Ayad, 261K) reports, "FBI agents yesterday raided a North Side residence known to many in the neighborhood and the Pittsburgh Islamic community as both an Islamic school and mosque. The agency would say only that the search was in connection with a 'criminal investigation' and wouldn't elaborate. The raid of the Sankore Institute and Light of Age Mosque, a three-story house that doubles as a school for people seeking to learn the Koran and Islamic religious teachings, began around noon and lasted about four hours. Authorities did not state whether anyone was taken into custody, but residents of the neighborhood said several men in tunics and traditional Muslim dress were led out of the house, patted down and searched. The paper said that the group "moved into the neighborhood around February and posted fliers that said 'we are here to help you make the North Side a better place to live, worship, work and play'" and urged residents "to join us in clothing and feeding the poor, cleaning up our community and making the North Side a safer, more beautiful place for our children."

Former CIA Officer Gives His Advice To New Agency Head. In the Los Angeles Times (7/1, 958K), Garrett Jones, for 17 years a CIA case officer, provides his advice for Air Force Gen. Michael V. Hayden, who took charge of the agency last month. He writes, "your predecessor, Porter Goss, did not adapt well. He seemed unable to make it out of the lobby each morning without starting a fistfight. You can do better. For starters, resist any impulse to 'demonstrate who is in charge.'" The directorate of intelligence, however, "is a mess. … Start over. Anyone associated with the WMD mess… needs to be retired, kicked upstairs or otherwise moved on. It may not be fair, just or efficient, but you must do it to blow the smell of failure out of the organization. Then appoint a pit bull as the quality-control officer for analysis."

WAR NEWS:

Investigators Probe Alleged Rape And Murders By GIs. Allegations of an alleged rape and murders committed by US soldiers in Iraq generated extensive and negative coverage on the networks and in the newspapers. ABC World News Tonight (6/30, story 2, 1:00, K. Snow, 8.78M) reported, "There are explosive new allegations concerning the US military in Iraq a soldier has confessed his role in rape and murder of Iraqi civilians." ABC (Karl): "These are the most disturbing allegations yet." The CBS Evening News (6/30, story 2, 2:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "At least two U.S. soldiers are being investigated for raping a young Iraqi woman, then killing her and three relatives." CBS (Martin) added, "The allegation that two American soldiers raped an Iraqi woman and then killed her and three other members of her family, including a child, and then burned the bodies, is shocking enough. Add the fact that the troops under investigation belong to the same unit as those two kidnapped soldiers whose mutilated and booby-trapped bodies were found just last week. And it becomes a cycle of unimaginable brutality on both sides."

NBC Nightly News (6/30, lead story, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The U.S. military is investigating this case at the highest levels of the service." NBC (Miklaszewski): "At least two and as many as five American soldiers are under investigation. ... The officials say it appeared the soldiers had stalked the woman and the rape was premeditated. Following the rape, at least one of the soldiers murdered the woman and killed three other members of her family including a child and two adults. ... Experts blame the relentless and brutal nature of the insurgent war." NBC News military analyst Dan Goure: "You get stress in war but nothing like we are facing in parts of Iraq today." Miklaszewski: "Others argue no amount of combat stress justifies criminal or immoral acts." Col. Jack Jacobs, US Army (RET.): "There's no doubt in my mind that anybody can tell the difference between right and wrong, even in the heat of battle."

The AP (6/30, Lenz) reports it is the "fifth pending case involving alleged slayings of Iraqi civilians by U.S. troops" and that the suspects "were from the same platoon as two soldiers kidnapped and killed south of Baghdad this month." The New York Times (7/1, Wong, 1.19M) reports, "The victims were a woman, her child, her husband and the husband's brother." It also states, "At least 60 American soldiers died in Iraq in June, a slight decline from 69 in May and 76 in April. Yet, that was almost twice as many as in March, which, at 31, had the second-lowest monthly fatality count of the war." Other than those comments, the Times coverage is generally based on the preceding AP coverage. The Washington Post (7/1, Finer, 744K) reports, "Investigations have intensified in recent months following the high-profile Haditha allegations, pressure from the Iraqi government on military commanders to curtail excessive force by soldiers, and an initiative by Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the top U.S. ground commander in Iraq, to cut down on civilian casualties."

The Washington Times (7/1, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "A top U.S. commander [Col. Jeffrey Snow] in Baghdad said yesterday that attacks have gone up, not down, since new Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki ordered a citywide crackdown." It also quotes Col. Snow as worrying that excessive "negative press coverage" could hurt morale. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Moore and Spiegel, 958K) reports, "It was unclear whether there was a connection between the deaths of the family members in Mahmoudiya and the June 16 attack on the U.S. soldiers at an observation post near Yousifiya [that resulted in their mutilation]." Both this alleged incident and the abductions of the soldiers apparently reflect a chronic "lack of manpower" south of Baghdad. As do several other sources, the Los Angeles Times notes that one suspect has already been discharged and is being sought in the US. The Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, and AP comment that allegations of rape could be especially inflammatory in a conservative Moslem culture.

List of Criminal Cases Against US Troops Is Given. The AP (6/30), as part of the followup to the coverage of rape and murder allegations, provides a listing of criminal cases filed against US troops in the Iraq war. The list is broken down into Pending Cases, Convicted, and Cleared/Acquitted.

Deaths Of Four Service Members In Iraq Are Announced. ABC World News Tonight (6/30, story 3, 0:10, K. Snow, 8.78M) reported, "The U.S. Military today announced three more deaths in Iraq. A Marine in al Anbar province, and two soldiers killed by roadside bombs in Baghdad. At least 60 U.S. forces have been killed in Iraq in June." The Washington Post (7/1, 744K) reports, "The U.S. military has announced the deaths of a Marine and three soldiers from fighting in recent days in Iraq. The names of all four were withheld pending notification of their families." Their units and the circumstances of their deaths are given.

Troops In Ramadi Live With Dangers. The AP (6/30, Castaneda) reports, in a sympathetic article, on the hardships faced by soldiers stationed in Ramadi: "The Iraq war for most troops is fleeting; brief ambushes or sudden, powerful roadside bombings. But in this troubled city, the capital of deadly Anbar province, the conflict is nearly constant. Gunbattles in the streets are common and mortars rain down on the bases every week." The AP quotes numerous soldiers, some of whom profess to be accustomed to the dangers and others who admit to experiencing stress.

Iraqi VP Says Reconciliation Plan Should Be Seen As First Step Towards Solution. The Financial Times (7/1, Khalaf) reports, "Iraq's national reconciliation initiative has paved the way for government contacts with insurgents and should be seen as only a first step towards a political solution to the conflict, according to Iraq's vice-president" Adel Abdel-Mehdi. He added "that other measures would follow the plan," and that "the reconciliation plan had now made dialogue an official policy. He also left the door open to a broadening of an amnesty offer after Nuri al-Maliki, the prime minister, this week insisted it would exclude anyone who had killed American troops or Iraqis." He says "the reconciliation initiative was aimed at gaining a better understanding of the" insurgent "groups and identifying whether any, and how many, were ready for a political solution." As "efforts to calm the insurgency dominated by Sunni Arabs also depend on the government's ability to rein in the Shia militias," Mr Abdel-Mehdi "insisted that the government would not allow anyone to operate 'above the law.'" However, "he acknowledged that the government faced a dilemma. To dismantle the militias it must show it is capable of providing security, which requires reducing the violence waged by insurgents. But curbing the powers of the militias is also essential to persuade insurgents to lay down their arms."

Iraq's PM Leaves On Tour To Boost Support For Reconciliation Plan. The AFP (7/1, Salem) reports, "Iraq Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki will on Saturday embark on his first trip abroad to garner support for his much-touted peace plan that has been rejected by the Sunni leaders and rebels." He will "leave Saturday for Saudi Arabia, then the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait 'to meet their leaders to discuss the national reconciliation plan.'" Some feel "that Maliki's tour may help influence the former elite community of Sunni Arabs as many of its leaders have close ties with the oil-rich Arab states of the Gulf."

Car Bombing In Baghdad Kills 45. The AP (7/1) reports, "A parked car bomb exploded at a popular market in a Shiite slum of Baghdad, killing at least 45 people and wounding 41, police said. AP Television News footage showed a huge plume of gray smoke rising from the scene in the Sadr City neighborhood."

Panel Debates Whether Found WMD Shells Justify Iraq War. The Washington Post (7/1, Pincus, 744K) reports on the division between Republicans and Democrats on the House Armed Services Committee concerning whether the discovery of 20-year-old munitions "support the prewar contention that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction, and justify the invasion of Iraq." It characterizes DIA director Michael Maples as caught in crossfire but "adept at avoiding answers that aided either side."

Bin Laden Praises Zarqawi And Demands His Burial In Jordan. There was extensive coverage on TV and in the newspapers of Bin Laden's latest tape. ABC World News Tonight (6/30, story 4, 0:10, K. Snow, 8.78M) reported, "There is word of another internet audio message from Osama bin Laden tonight. His second in 24 hours, and the fifth this year." NBC Nightly News (6/30, story 4, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Osama bin Laden has been heard there again, but just not seen. He eulogizes Abu al-Zarqawi, the leader of al Qaeda in Iraq, who was killed by U.S. troops earlier this month." Myers: "Though there is ample evidence al-Zarqawi and bin Laden had their differences, here bin Laden takes credit for Zarqawi's successes and claims Zarqawi was acting on bin Laden's orders." Roger Cressey, NBC News terrorism analyst: "Al Qaeda hasn't conducted an attack in over three years. Bin Laden has to associate himself with Zarqawi and Zarqawi's successes in Iraq to maintain their credibility." Myers: "One lingering question: why no bin Laden videotapes in almost two years? It may be because audio tapes are less risky."

The CBS Evening News (6/30, story 3, :30, Schieffer, 7.66M) also reported it. The Washington Times/AP (7/1, Keath) reports, "Osama bin Laden called on President Bush in an audiotape released yesterday to release the body of Abu Musab Zarqawi and said Jordan should allow the slain terrorist to be buried in his homeland." Bin Laden "paid tribute to Zarqawi and said the former al Qaeda in Iraq leader had been under orders to kill Iraqis who supported U.S. forces in the country. He also vowed more attacks against the United States in the Middle East and Africa." The AP (6/30, Keath) notes doubts about the extent of Bin Laden's control of activities, his continued failure to show his face (which it attributes more to security concerns than to health problems), and the weariness of his voice. It counts "four audiotapes from bin Laden and seven audios and videos by his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri" this year. Bloomberg (6/30) also reports the story.

Rice Offers $5 Million Reward For Al-Masri. CNN (7/1, Labott) reports, "U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice authorized up to a $5 million reward Friday for information leading to the capture of Abu Ayyub al-Masri, believed to be the replacement for the late leader of al Qaeda in Iraq -- Abu Musab al-Zarqawi." It "is being offered under the State Department's Rewards for Justice program." The State Department's "statement urges anyone with information on al-Masri's location to contact the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad or any other U.S. embassy or consulate, or any U.S. military commander." The AP (7/1) adds that spokesman Adam Erel said "Rice's agency is offering the money to encourage people with information about al-Masri's location to come forward." The AFP (7/1) notes "The true identity of Abu Ayyub al-Masri remains an enigma in his reported homeland of Egypt," although he "is believed to have lived in the central Cairo area of Zawyia Hamra before going to Afghanistan in the late 1980s or early 1990s, and then on to Iraq via Iran."

Maliki Courts Sunni Support Outside Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, 958K) reports, "Iraq's new prime minister, Nouri Maliki, was to leave today to visit Saudi Arabia and other Persian Gulf states to solicit support for a reconciliation initiative that has drawn mixed reviews since it was announced Sunday. Maliki plans to discuss bridging the widening gap between Sunni and Shiite Muslims with leaders of the oil-rich Sunni-dominated countries." However, "even as the prime minister takes his plan abroad, it is facing attacks at home," from the Muslim Scholars Association and radical cleric Moqtada al Sadr.

Rocket Wounds 10 At Kandahar Coalition Base. The AP (6/30) reports, "A Taliban rocket exploded Friday inside the main coalition base in Kandahar, Afghanistan, wounding 10 people, including soldiers and civilians, the Canadian Press news agency reported." The article notes that two Canadian soldiers were injured but does not give the nationalities of the other victims.

Italy Extends Afghan Deployment. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, 958K), in a brief article, reports, "Prime Minister Romano Prodi's government agreed to keep Italian troops in Afghanistan, despite opposition from pacifists in his coalition. ... Defense Minister Arturo Parisi said Rome would not send additional troops or boost funding."

Port Security In Umm Qasr Is Described. The New York Times (7/1, Glanz, 1.19M) reports on Iranian navy patrols in Umm Qasr. It notes the problem-plagued relationship between the navy, which is portrayed as relatively professional, and the allegedly militia-penetrated coast guard. A US naval advisor is quoted as saying that he finds it easier "to arrange joint operations with maritime forces from Kuwait" than with the Iraqi coast guard" and that the navy could "run itself" today if the US left. In general, the assessment of Umm Qasr is that security has declined: "Now, after months of relative calm, sophisticated roadside bombs and assassinations of Iraqis who work with Westerners have increased across the entire south, while the port itself has become a place of danger, corruption, commercial bustle and intrigue."

Administration WMDs Claims And Detainee Policy Defended. In the Washington Times (7/1, 90K), media critic Brent Bozell argues that the discovery of 500 shells proves the bias of the media: "But the reception of this declassified memo shows we do not have an honest, nonpartisan news media, and political calculation is everything." He warns that the Bush administration may be intimidated "by the media, who don't want any new information to change their tilted first draft of history" and that the administration may have incurred considerable damage through its inaction. Also in the Washington Times (7/1, 90K), Victor David Hansen says Europeans attack the US on Guantanamo to escape their own problems: "By ankle-biting America on Guantanamo, the Europeans sound moral and tough while ignoring the real dangers for which they have absolutely no solutions -- unassimilated and angry Muslims, the Dutch and Danes under assault by radical Islamic censors and a defenseless Europe potentially soon in range of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's nuclear-tipped missiles."

Soros Says US Has Become Threat To World. In Newsweek (6/30), George Soros explains why he considers the US now a threat to world stability: "By declaring a 'war on terror' after September the 11th, we set the wrong agenda for the world. This is something that people in America find difficult to understand because war seems like the natural response. ... We abhor terrorists, because they kill innocent people for political goals. But by waging war on terror we are doing the same thing. And the people who are on the receiving end see us in the same light with the same negative attitude as we have towards terrorists. It's also a threat to our democracy. Because when you wage war, the president can appropriate for himself excessive powers." Soros promises to spend the legal maximum supporting

Democrats in 2004 and calls the "puncturing of the housing bubble" the gravest immediate danger to the US economy.

Homecoming Parties For Troops Become Lavish. The Wall Street Journal (7/1, Gamerman, 2.11M) reports, "In the Iraq War, a new approach is starting to emerge. Military tradition and conventional wisdom dictate that families should keep homecomings low-key to avoid overwhelming the troops while they're readjusting to being back. For a variety of reasons, from the military's shifting demographics to attitudes about the current war, some families are taking a different route, opting for outsize celebrations." The article describes some parties and their expense. It also quotes some troops and experts who counsel against incurring debt and against burdening unacclimated soldiers with such celebrations.

Debate Rages Over Lowering Flags For Dead Service Members. The Wall Street Journal (7/1, Zaslow, 2.11M) reports, "In some 16 states, flags are routinely lowered for fallen home-state soldiers. But what some see as a gesture of tribute, others consider inappropriate, demoralizing and even devious. Half-staff efforts, which have spread to states Oregon, Minnesota, California, Illinois, Kentucky and Maine -- are generating controversy among politicians, veterans and citizens unsure about whether and when to lower the flag ... Some wonder whether the flag tributes are really an attempt to undermine support for the war by reminding Americans of the fatalities. And though many veterans welcome the lowered flags, others say the day for honoring war dead is Memorial Day."

War Protesters Sue To Reverse Camping Ban. The AP (7/1) reports, "Cindy Sheehan and four other war protesters sued McLennan County over roadside camping and parking bans near President Bush's ranch in Crawford, saying they want to return to what became an 'international symbol of protest against the Iraq war.'"

Roberts, Alito And Kennedy Seen As Having Distinguished Themselves In Court's Term. Knight Ridder (7/1, Henderson) reports during the 2005-06 term of the U.S. Supreme Court "the focus was on how Chief Justice John G. Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito were changing the court's outcomes." Both "established themselves as solid conservatives" but also were "distinguished…from the bench's more doctrinaire members, Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas." The term also featured "the emergence of Justice Anthony Kennedy at the court's center. … In cases that split the justices narrowly, Kennedy was in the majority more than anyone else." The court is said to have decided "many cases on narrow legal grounds, avoiding more controversial elements." And "the court closed the term with more unanimous opinions than it has in recent years and with fewer concurrences and dissents." Alito "established a restrained conservativism that mirrored his work as an appellate judge." Roberts is described as having a "razor-sharp intellect."

Roberts's Desire For Unanimous Opinions Seen As Unlikely To Prevail. The AP (7/1, Benac) reports, "for all the talk of consensus and harmony on the new Supreme Court, plenty of trees had to die to provide enough paper for the justices' fractured rulings on some of the most contentious cases of the court's term. And all sides are betting that this transitional year…served as a fairly mild prelude to far bigger dustups to come next term and for many years hence." Roberts "has spoken publicly of his desire to achieve unanimity through narrow rulings that would offer 'clarity and guidance.' And he had some success, evidenced by a healthy share of unanimous opinions." Still "within the reinforced conservative wing of the court, there are strong and sometimes conflicting opinions." And "it turns out that the jurist to watch is 69-year-old Anthony Kennedy." He has "provided the fifth vote on some of the court's toughest cases" and "more often than not, he has sided with the conservatives."

James Taranto writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/1, 2.11M) that Chief Justice Roberts "showed himself to be a man of intelligence, charm and political acumen. If anyone can bring consensus to the Supreme Court, surely he can. But his first term in office showed that this goal will require patience and persistence, and maybe another new justice or two."

Boeing Announces Agreement With Justice Department. The Financial Times (7/1, Cameron) reports, "Boeing on Friday said it had reached a final agreement with the US justice department following two procurement scandals which led to the ousting of one chief executive and a prison term for its former chief financial officer." The firm will "pay $615m to avoid civil and criminal charges following the three-year DoJ probe, in line with the cost of the tentative deal outlined in May."

The New York Times (6/30, Wayne, 1.19M) reports Boeing "announced yesterday that it would take second-quarter charges of up to $1.15 billion as a result of a settlement of ethics investigations with the federal government and delays in a surveillance aircraft program for Australia and Turkey." That will "more than eliminate Boeing's second-quarter profit." The $615 million payment "resolves potential civil and criminal charges against Boeing." It results from "an investigation over the improper acquisition of proprietary documents from a rival, the Lockheed Martin Corporation, that Boeing employees used to try to gain government rocket launching business." Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) "will hold hearings this summer on the settlement."

AFP (6/30) reports, "The agreement calls for a 565 million-dollar civil settlement and a 50 million-dollar monetary penalty under a separate criminal agreement, according to the US Justice Department. The amount is a record for government procurement fraud, for the Department of Defense and for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, officials said. The criminal probe stems from allegations that Boeing used improperly acquired data from rival Lockheed Martin to help win rocket launching business from NASA. The deal also would end a civil probe into conflict of interest in Boeing's recruitment of a senior Air Force procurement official while she still had authority over billions of dollars in other Boeing contracts. The former official, Darleen Druyun, went to prison in the case."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

IG Report Finds Abramoff Did Not Influence Decision To Replace U.S. Attorney For Guam. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Roche, 958K) reports, "Convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff improperly obtained a top-secret FBI document and tried to use the information to aid his clients in the Pacific Island territories" because he "feared information in the document could be damaging to his clients' interests." According to a "41-page report into allegations that he had improperly influenced President Bush's 2002 decision to oust the acting U.S. attorney for Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands" Inspector General Glenn A. Fine concluded there was no evidence for the claim. The report did find that Abramoff "had a pipeline into the White House" in that "Leonard Rodriguez, a Bush aide, told the inspector general's office that then-White House political director Ken Mehlman 'recommended or suggested that I reach out to make Jack aware' on Guam issues."

Prosecutors Seek Enron Executives' Assets. The Washington Post (7/1, D1, Johnson, 744K) reports, "Federal prosecutors asked a judge yesterday to order former Enron Corp. executives Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay to turn over $182.8 million, arguing that their homes and other assets were acquired by fraud." Court papers claim that Skilling collected $139.2 million in bonuses and stock proceeds during the fraud, and prosecutors are seeking $49 million in securities he holds in a brokerage, his $4.6 million mansion, $808,643 in cash; and a Dallas condominium worth $579,475, and the $5 million bond Skilling posted after his indictment two years ago. Skilling argues that because jurors acquitted him on nine insider trading charges, he is entitled to keep his remaining wealth. The government says Lay collected $43.5 million in bonuses and drawdowns on his Enron-sponsored credit, and are seeking repayment of $1.5 million Lay used to pay off the mortgage on his luxury penthouse apartment in Houston, plus Lay's interest in a limited partnership now valued at $6.3 million.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Former NYC Police Commissioner Pleads Guilty In Bribery Case. The New York Times (7/1, Franco, 1.19M) reports that Bernard B. Kerik, who was New York City police commissioner at the time of the Sept. 11 terror attacks and was nominated in 2004 to be homeland security director but withdrew, pled guilty to two misdemeanors in a Brooklyn courtroom, for failing to report a loan and accepting as a gift renovations to his apartment worth $165,000. Kerik acknowledged accepting the gifts in late 1999 and in 2000 from a large New Jersey contractor, Interstate Industrial Corporation, which has been accused of, but repeatedly denied, having ties to organized crime. He also said he spoke to other city officials about the company, then seeking a city license, when he was the city's correction commissioner. Kerik agreed to pay $221,000 in fines and penalties for accepting the renovations and failing to report a $28,000 loan from a friend, real estate developer Nathan Berman. Kerik's agreement ends an 18-month grand jury probe and allows him to avoid jail time and felony bribery charges.

The Washington Times (7/1, Seper, 90K) adds that Kerik's DHS nomination "dissolved amid accusations of extramarital affairs and his questionable hiring of a Mexican housekeeper," after Kerik told President Bush he could not "permit matters personal to me to distract from the focus and progress of the Department of Homeland Security and its crucial endeavors." The article also notes that questions had been raised at the time about Kerik's ties to stun gun make Taser International, which paid him $6.2 million in stock options after he promoted its products to law-enforcement agencies. It adds that New Jersey gambling authorities have sought to revoke Interstate Industrial's license to work in casinos, describing owners of Frank and Peter DiTommaso as associates of the Gambino organized crime family.

Eminent Domain Fight Ends, As New London Homeowners Settle. The New York Times (7/1, Salzman, 1.19M) reports, "With eviction looming, the two remaining homeowners fighting the city's plans to replace their homes with offices, a hotel and new housing agreed to settle on Friday, ending a six-year battle that led to a historic Supreme Court ruling on governments' power of eminent domain." The settlement ends a case that reached the U.S. Supreme Court, which issued a controversial 5-to-4 ruling last year upholding the city's power to take their homes for private development.

Plaintiff In Supreme Court Case Will Move Her House. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Mehren, 958K) reports, "Susette Kelo, who lent her name to a lawsuit that ignited a firestorm around the practice of eminent domain, will not lose her Connecticut home to a wrecking ball, as she had feared when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the city of New London could build homes, offices and hotels in her neighborhood. Under an agreement announced Friday, Kelo's quaint, peach-colored house will be moved to another location. Kelo, 49, can remain in the 19th-century cottage at its present waterfront location for as long as a year, until a new site is selected." Kelo and another homeowner, Pasquale Cristofaro, "were the last plaintiffs in the landmark case of Kelo vs. City of New London to reach an accord with the city. The Cristofaro home will be razed, but the family will be able to buy a new home in the area at an undisclosed fixed price." On the first anniversary of the Kelo ruling last week, President Bush issued an executive order barring federal agencies from seizing private property except for public projects like hospitals and roads.

LATimes Faults Labels, Studios For Not Attracting File Sharers. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, 958K), in a "One Year Later" feature, follows up a the Supreme Court's Grokster decision, and says the victorious recording labels and studios "haven't done enough to lure file sharers." The decision said companies like Grokster that let their users share files over the Internet can be held liable for enabling copyright infringement. Even though the percentage of U.S. Internet users sharing files has stayed flat in recent years, while the percentage of those buying in online stores has seen real growth, "free downloaders represent a lost opportunity for the entertainment industry." The Times calls for "much more experimentation with approaches that give users the control and freedom to consume that make file-sharing networks so attractive."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Supreme Court Denies Two State Death Penalty Appeals. The Washington Post/AP (7/1, A7) reports, "Texas and Arizona lost Supreme Court appeals yesterday in separate death penalty cases." The high court refused without comment Texas' request that a death sentence be reimposed on Gregory Russeau for murdering an elderly auto mechanic during a robbery, and also refused to upset an Arizona appeals court decision giving Robert Moormann a chance to appeal his conviction for killing his adoptive mother. The decisions came as the high court acted on over 50 cases in its final day of its 2005-06 term.

ANTITRUST:

Proposal Would Link General Motors To Nissan And Renault. The New York Times (7/1, A1, Maynard, 1.19M) reports in a front-page story, "General Motors' largest shareholder" Kirk Kerkorian "is pressing the troubled American auto giant to speed up its turnaround effort by forming an alliance with two foreign car companies, Nissan and Renault, which would pay $3 billion for a 20 percent stake in G.M." Such an alliance would enable Kerkorian "to enlist the help of Carlos Ghosn, the hard-charging executive who oversees" Nissan and Renault. Ghosn "earned his reputation from the swift turnaround he executed earlier this decade at Nissan, where he slashed debt, introduced flashy new vehicles and expanded sales in Japan and the United States." G.M. issued a statement saying that the proposal "would be taken under advisement by its board."

The Wall Street Journal (7/1, A1, Langley, Boudette, Hawkins, 2.11M) reports in a front-page story the proposal "raised pressure on General Motors Corp. and embattled Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner." It is also described as "a stunning shot at Mr. Wagoner's effort at restructuring the nation's biggest auto maker."
The Washington Post (7/1, D1, Freeman, 744K) also reported this story.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Examines Recovered Laptop For Signs Of Data Theft. The Washington Post (7/1, D1, Pegoraro, 744K) reports, "If your Social Security Number was on that wayward, now-recovered Department of Veterans Affairs laptop -- or any of the other computers recently lost with sensitive data onboard -- it's probably still safe. But not certainly so. And you're just going to have to live with whatever uncertainty that realization stirs in you." The Post writes, "When the VA or other offices try to ensure that lost records haven't landed on identity thieves' hard drives, they run into the same problem that's undermined the entertainment industry's efforts to stop people from circulating music and movies on the Internet. Namely, computer data, by its nature, wants to go places. You can duplicate it infinitely and perfectly, then distribute those copies at near-zero cost. That's neither bad nor good; it just is. So in a worst-case scenario, every personal record on that VA laptop could now be online. And you'd never know until the symptoms of identity theft showed up in your bank account."

Veterans Groups Continue To Press for Free Credit Monitoring. The AP (6/30, Yen) reports, "Veterans groups say they will keep pressing for improved data security - and free credit monitoring - after the government found the stolen Veterans Affairs laptop computer containing sensitive data on 26.5 million people. … Joe Davis, spokesman for the Veterans of Foreign Wars, said veterans were entitled to credit monitoring until the FBI can determine for certain the information wasn't compromised." Davis: "The worst-case scenario may have been averted this time, but an even greater tragedy would be if this type incident was allowed to happen again because of complacency.

VA Given Permission To Publicize Monitoring Offer. The Washington Post/AP (7/1, 6:00 PM, Lovan) reports, "The Veterans Affairs Department is free to publicize a no-cost credit monitoring offer to veterans whose personal information was stolen, a federal judge ruled Friday. U.S. District Court Judge William Bertelsman denied a motion from attorneys who filed a class-action suit on behalf of 26.5 million veterans and active-duty troops after a VA employee's laptop containing the private data went missing. Law enforcement officials recovered the laptop this week after it had been stolen from a data analyst's Maryland home on May 3. The FBI said Social Security numbers and other personal data had not been copied from the computer." Class-action plaintiffs attorneys "had argued that accepting the offer, which was advertised on the VA's Web site, could hamper the veterans' chances of winning more money in court." Bertelsman: "I don't see anything objectionable in it. … The court can't tell a government agency how it can communicate with its constituents. If they make a statement that's a false representation ... then the court might get into it." Scott Hogenson, VA spokesman: "We're encourage by the fact that we're allowed to help our veterans."

NYT Calls For Better Data Security. The New York Times (7/1, 1.19M) editorializes, "The government's extraordinary attempt at damage control when it appeared the computer was gone for good — including a plan to offer a year's free credit monitoring to the veterans at a cost of more than $160 million — underlines a mushrooming problem. It is becoming obvious that government agencies, and businesses, need better policies and practices for handling sensitive data stored on computers. To begin with, personal information on 17 million veterans is not the sort of data that should be moving around on a laptop. Data this valuable should also have been encrypted, to make it difficult for thieves to use it."

US Gun Owners Fault International Efforts To Restrict Arms Sales. The Washington Times (7/1, Pisik, 90K) reports, "The gun industry and shooting enthusiasts fired back at the anti-gun lobby yesterday at an international conference on illicit weapons, saying any global restrictions will affect sport hunters." The United Nations Small Arms Review Conference "is meant to take stock of the global efforts to curb the trade on illegal arms and draft a plan of action for the future." It "is not looking at legal civilian ownership, but is examining ways to limit the flood of weapons into unstable regions." However, it "attracted the ire of tens of thousands of American gun owners, who were mobilized by the National Rifle Association to protest what they see as a global effort to disarm U.S. civilians," and, "in a wide-ranging but ill-attended morning session, speakers representing gun manufacturers, weapons brokers, antique-firearms enthusiasts and big-game hunters stressed that misuse is the problem, and not the gun itself."

IMMIGRATION:

Border Patrol Agents Suspected Of Smuggling Immigrants Disappear. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Marosi, 958K) reports, "Two U.S. Border Patrol agents under investigation for allegedly smuggling drugs and immigrants abruptly resigned and went into hiding this week after apparently being tipped off to the probe, according to federal law enforcement sources. The agents -- brothers Raul and Fidel Villarreal -- were veteran officers who patrolled the border near San Diego." It is suggested that "they may have left the country." The case is "the latest in a string of unrelated corruption probes" and is "being handled by Immigration and Customs Enforcement." The two "were suspected of working with Mexico-based criminal networks to smuggle Mexicans and Brazilians into the country."

California Day Labor Center Closed After Minuteman Member's Objection. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Delson, 958K) reports, "Caltrans ordered a longtime Laguna Beach day labor center to close Friday, saying it was illegally operating on state property." The order cam "after a Laguna Beach resident who is a member of the Minuteman Project border patrol group checked property records and brought the information forward as part of a protest against the center." It is "the second day labor center in Orange County to close recently." The centers "have been targeted for protests by anti-illegal immigrant groups throughout Southern California." The decision "angered a majority of the City Council."

Los Angeles Seen As Center Of Black Resentment Of Latino Immigrants Over Jobs Competition. The Washington Post (7/1, A3, Geis, 744K) reports, "Many African Americans in Los Angeles have watched resentfully as Latinos replaced them not only in low-wage jobs, but also in many traditionally black neighborhoods. Simmering tensions between the two groups occasionally boil over in school shootings, jail violence and hate crimes." The Service Employees International Union is attempting to organize security guards in Los Angeles. The union "estimates that nearly 70 percent of the officers are black." SEIU president Andrew L. Stern said that "racial politics played no role in the timing of the security guard campaign." But the union is "well aware of black workers' fears that organizing a union could be an invitation to employers to hire immigrant workers they perceive to be more docile and willing to work for less."

Medical Costs Of Immigrants Growing Dramatically. Knight Ridder (7/1, Pugh) reports among "the costs and consequences of illegal immigration" is "a fast-growing multibillion-dollar tab for medical emergencies suffered by undocumented immigrants." While they are "ineligible for full coverage under Medicaid, … a little-known federal law requires state Medicaid programs to pay for emergency medical care for all undocumented immigrants who meet the program's financial and personal resource requirements." That care is "becoming more expensive," but the states do not "closely track what they spend." So "at the request of McClatchy Newspapers, some states took a closer look at the expenditures." 2005 costs were reported as follows: Minnesota $17.4 million, California $957 million, Houston's Harris County Hospital District $97.3 million, Georgia $112 million, North Carolina $52.8 million, Kentucky $9 million.

Washington Area Hospital Sets Limits To Avoid Being Overwhelmed. The Washington Post (7/1, A1, Levine, 744K) reports in a front-page story that Silver Spring, Maryland's Holy Cross Hospital's "yearly charity care more than doubled to $9 million" from 2000 to 2005. Now the hospital has decided to set a limit on the number of uninsured obstetrics cases it will take because it's system has been "overtaxed" by the work. And "the pressures on Holy Cross mirror those at other facilities in the region." So "critics cite the burden they say newly arrived immigrants place on health care as one rationale for restricting their numbers. … The full medical bill to U.S. hospitals, clinics and taxpayers probably exceeds $6 billion annually."

DC To Delay Implementing Medicaid Rule Until July 17. The Washington Post (7/1, B3, Levine, 744K) reports Washington, D.C. "agreed yesterday to delay implementing a new federal Medicaid rule requiring documented proof of citizenship" until July 17. The announcement came "one day after a Washington firm filed suit in federal court to block the city from moving forward with enforcement." The federal rule "makes documented citizenship a requirement for eligibility." Federal officials "have warned" D.C. "and states that noncompliance would mean losing Medicaid matching funds."

Immigration Hearings Described As "Public Thrashing" Of President. The Wall Street Journal (7/1, Harwood, 2.11M) reports, "Directed by House Speaker Dennis Hastert, Republicans this coming week will undertake a remarkable exercise: the public thrashing of President Bush's principles on a major initiative. House 'field hearings' on immigration, scheduled for San Diego and Laredo, Texas, weren't designed with fact-finding in mind. Their intent is rather to batter the Senate-passed immigration bill, which embodies Mr. Bush's goal of combining border security with a guest-worker program for the 12 million illegal immigrants already here." House members are said to "display striking anger" resulting from "frustration" with Iraq and "the conviction that the speaker has been personally slighted by an arrogant administration." The immigration hearings "which today look like attempts to stoke the conservative base and sink the president's priority, might look different by October."

Advocate Hopes Hearings Build Public Interest In Pragmatic Legislation. Tamar Jacoby, a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute, writes in the Washington Post (7/1, A25, 744K) reports, "The immigration bills passed by the House and Senate in recent months could hardly be more different. The House package is harsh, punitive and focused exclusively on tougher enforcement. The Senate bill balances toughness with pragmatism" and the House's decision to hold hearings in border states means that "by the end of the summer, the public will have had a long, thorough course on immigration." And "I'm convinced that this will only deepen viewers' pragmatism." That "could in turn shift the balance among House Republicans." So "come September, the public's hunger for a solution may be impossible to ignore."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush And Koizumi Visit Graceland. President Bush and Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi's visit to Graceland was treated mainly in a light-hearted manner on the network news, each of which devoted a short segment to the visit. Newspaper coverage generally reported that Koizumi was very happy to visit Graceland while the president looked uncomfortable. ABC World News Tonight (6/30, story 7, 2:15, K. Snow, 8.78M) called Bush and Koizumi's visit to Graceland "a day to remember in foreign diplomacy." Bush was quoted saying: "This visit here shows, not only am I personally fond of the prime minister, that the ties between our peoples are very strong, as well."

NBC Nightly News (6/30, story 8, 2:00, Faw, 9.87M) noted, "This visit was more than a reward for a friend who has staunchly supported Mr. Bush." Prof. Alan Schroeder, Northeastern University: "A pilgrimage to Graceland is like paying homage to American royalty. Presidents come and go; Elvis is forever."

The CBS Evening News (6/30, story 8, 2:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) referred to "the unlikely report that President Bush was taking Japan's visiting prime minister to Graceland." CBS (Alfonsi) added, "There are 500 Elvis impersonators in Japan. And the Japanese prime minister just happens to be one of them." So "Graceland put out the peanut butter and banana sandwiches." It "makes you wonder if 50 years from now, the president will broker world peace at Britney Spears' place."

The New York Times (7/1, Stolberg, Dewan, 1.19M) reports the prime minister said, "It's like a dream." Koizumi "crooned, as Priscilla Presley, Elvis's former wife, and Lisa Marie, his daughter, looked on." The visit "was a Bush-Koizumi lovefest…orchestrated by the White House to spotlight the close relationship between Japan and the United States." And "Elvis music played loudly over the speakers, until Mr. Bush asked that it be turned down." The president also "made an unannounced stop at the National Civil Rights Museum."

The Washington Times (7/1, Curl, 90K) reports, "Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi yesterday rocked the House That Elvis Built, crooning a few bars of some classic Presley hits and leaving his tour guide, President Bush, looking a bit like a whipped Hound Dog." Mr. Bush "struck a more sober tone."

The Financial Times (7/1, Daniel, Pilling) reports the trip was "designed to celebrate" the president's "special relationship with Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi" The Washington Post (7/1, C1, Baker, 744K) reports, "If wise men say only fools rush in, then on this day, at least, President Bush heeded the wise men. It was one thing to take his friend, Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, to Memphis to visit what evidently is now the nation's most important tourist site. But the president drew a line Friday when the wavy-haired Japanese leader began crooning Elvis songs." But "nothing would spoil Koizumi's day." The president "seemed to enjoy the show."

The AP (7/1, Riechmann) reports, "It didn't take much coaxing from President Bush to get Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi to croon some Elvis tunes Friday at the king of rock 'n' roll's Graceland mansion." The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Wallsten, 958K) reports that the president and first lady, "clearly unaccustomed to such a display (or perhaps still disoriented from the mirrored ceilings in the downstairs television room) looked on with strained smiles."

The Memphis Commercial Appeal (7/1, McMillin) reports, "The Tourist in Chief made his inaugural trip to Graceland on Friday, but it was President Bush's guest from Japan who rocked Memphis with his fervent adulation for the King of Rock and Roll. Strutting and singing and doing his best Elvis lunge across the shag carpet of the Jungle Room, Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi delighted the president, first lady Laura Bush and tour guides Priscilla and Lisa Marie Presley. 'You're a pretty good Elvis singer,' Bush said, and with the pack of media in the room entreating him, Koizumi delivered a teasing cabaret of tunes that make metaphors hard to resist. … 'Wise men say, only fools rush in,' Koizumi sang, beginning another love song but summing up what many dozen protesters across the street said in a less polite way about their dissatisfaction over the war in Iraq."

The Memphis Commercial Appeal's Halimah Abdullah (7/1) writes, "beyond the pomp and pompadours, the Memphis visit was a carefully orchestrated symbol of thanks to an outgoing leader of the world's second largest economy for supporting Bush on issues like the war in Iraq and terrorism. It's also a tactical move for Bush who, while cultivating close relationships with now-departing heads of state, finds himself besieged with criticism on domestic and international fronts. Likewise, Koizumi's theatrical warbling of Elvis tunes and flirting with Lisa Marie Presley were more about maintaining his affable public persona as he hammed it up for the press pool."

The Tennessean (7/1, Alligood) reports, "It was one magic day for Memphis, one grand day for Graceland. For about an hour and a half, three world potentates — two among the living and one reputed, by some theorists, to still be in the building — were at the locus of, if not the world's attention, then the universe of all things Elvis. The trip had been in the works for about six weeks. President George W. Bush's people, the Secret Service, came to town early to check out the Jungle Room and the rest of the mansion and gave their security blessings to the visit, which Koizumi requested."

The Memphis Commercial Appeal (7/1, Boyd) reports, "It wasn't fine china for President Bush and Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi on their visit Friday to the Rendezvous. They ate their lunch from paper plates and used plastic utensils just like regular customers. Inside the homey, back-alley restaurant, Bush cleaned his plate of barbecue ribs and washed it down with a Diet Coke."

Maureen Dowd writes in her column for the New York Times (7/1, 1.19M), "Junichiro Koizumi seemed to be in an ecstatic trance." But "Mr. Bush seemed out of his element." He "tried to make a serious point." Still, the trip "was a triumph in personal diplomacy." Dowd concludes, "with his small circle of pals and Iraq war defenders…drifting off the world stage, and with allies pulling back troops in Iraq, President Bush may soon be as isolated as Elvis was at the end."

Protestors, Supporters Greet Bush In Memphis. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (7/1, Murphy) reports, "About 250-300 people waited for the 30-second spectacle of the presidential motorcade as it roared down gritty Elvis Presley Boulevard into the gates of Graceland. … Carl Rising-Moore from Crawford, Texas, who carried a flag of slain soldier Casey Sheehan, son of Cindy Sheehan, became the unofficial protest leader because he had the megaphone. Someone gave him a list of things to chant, but mostly he'd just wing it, leaving a few quiet seconds while he came up with something else to shout. A few feet away, dressed in fatigues and a black beret, former Army specialist Allison DeVante of Memphis quietly held her sign, 'Stop rape of military women in Iraq.' She said she was raped in 2002 by the officer in charge and it took two years for the military to investigate. She left the Army and they never told her what became of her rapist. Nearby, three 18-year-old girls sang 'God Bless America' quietly. They made signs supporting Bush because they didn't want him to see only protest signs."

Time Poll Shows Bush Approval At 35 Percent.

Time (7/1, Cullen) in a web exclusive titled "Good News Fails To Boost Bush's Job Approval" reports a Time poll of 1,003 adults conducted June 27-29 shows "Bush's approval rating slipped to 35%...down from 37% in March (and 53% in early 2005). Only 33% of Americans in the survey said they approved of Bush's handling of the situation in Iraq, vs. 35% in March, and 47% in March 2005. His management of the U.S. economy lost supporters, too, as 36% approved, compared with 39% three months earlier. Bush's handling of the war on terror saw a slight gain in support, from 44% to 45%." His "poll numbers remain stuck in a rut." And "Congress isn't faring much better." Time notes, "Only 31% approved, down sharply from 39% in March. Asked whether they would be more likely to vote for the Republican or Democratic candidate…if the election were held today, 47% said Democrat and 35% said Republican, a two-point improvement for Democrats."

Student Activists Campaign For Bush's Impeachment. Time.com (7/1, Locke) reports, "Many people may scoff at the decision earlier this week by the Berkeley City Council to put a resolution on the Nov. 7 ballot calling for President Bush and Vice President Cheney to be impeached. After all, 74,000 voters of what is often referred to as The People's Republic of Berkeley can't legally oust the President and Vice President. But Berkeley Mayor Tom Bates thinks his city is simply ahead of its time, as it has often proved to be in the past. … Indeed, while Berkeley may be the first city to put an impeachment resolution to its people, numerous city and town councils have already passed such resolutions, including San Francisco, Santa Cruz, and Chapel Hill, N.C. State legislatures in Vermont, California and Illinois all have impeachment resolutions pending. To help raise awareness of the issue, there will be a series of teach-ins across the country this summer and fall, and a new film, 'How to Impeach a President,' will be screened — all part of the burgeoning impeachment effort called 'Constitution Summer,' led by a non-partisan coalition of students from the country's top law schools and universities."

Bush Nominates Mishkin To Fed.

The Wall Street Journal (7/1, Pulizzi, 2.11M) reports, "President Bush Friday nominated Columbia University Professor Frederic S. Mishkin" to fill out the 14-year term ending in January 2014 of Roger Ferguson. Mishkin "has a well-established relationship with Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke." The two co-wrote a book on inflation targeting and Mishkin's nomination is "likely to heighten speculation that the central bank may eventually embrace the strategy." And "the White House has another vacancy to fill on the Fed board" as Fed Governor Mark Olson resigned, effective Friday.

The Washington Post (7/1, D3, Irwin, 744K) reports Mishkin is "a leading proponent of the idea that central bankers should set explicit targets for controlling inflation." He "headed the research department at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York in the 1990s" and is "a professor at Columbia University's business school." The nomination "adds momentum to the cause of 'inflation targeting,' which would be a departure from the Fed's traditional, improvisational approach to setting monetary policy." But former White House economic adviser R. Glenn Hubbard "played down the likelihood that Mishkin's appointment will contribute to a change in how the Fed works."

Markets Gain On Fed Report. The Washington Post (7/1, D1, Masters, 744K) reports, "Volatility ruled the stock markets in the quarter that ended Friday, and analysts agreed investors should be prepared for continued turbulence." Market declines in May and June are attributed to "concern that inflation may be picking up, 60 central banks around the world raising interest rates, and worries that the U.S. and global economies may be slowing." And "the major U.S. market indexes…each fell between 7 percent and 11 percent between May 8 and mid-June before recovering slightly at the end of the quarter." But "U.S. analysts disagree sharply about what the next six months will bring, although most expect the Federal Reserve to raise interest rates at least one more time, to 5.5 percent."

Bloomberg (7/1) reports, "U.S. stocks trimmed the biggest weekly advance since January as technology companies widened their examination of stock-option grants, hurting their shares. Apple Computer Inc. and Computer Sciences Corp. led the retreat as they started investigations." The market "rebounded this week from three weeks of losses as Federal Reserve policy makers, who raised interest rates for the 17th straight time, said in a statement that the economy is 'moderating from its quite strong pace' earlier in the year."

The Financial Times (7/1, O'Doherty) reports, "Wall Street finished the week sharply higher, gaining strongly after a Federal Reserve policy meeting this week and bringing to a close a quarter that mauled technology stocks and small-caps but left large-caps barely changed. Stocks soared immediately after the Federal Open Market Committee's decision to raise interest rates by 25 basis points on Thursday."

The New York Times (7/1, Andrews, 1.19M) reports, "The Federal Reserve raised interest rates for the 17th consecutive time on Thursday, but kicked off a powerful celebration in the stock market by lowering its alarms about inflation." The gains were described as a "relief rally." But the gains were also called "the latest example of heightened volatility in financial markets and heightened uncertainty about Fed policy under its rookie chairman, Ben S. Bernanke."

Consumer Spending Slowed In May But Confidence Is Up For June. Bloomberg (7/1) reports, "Consumer spending in the U.S. rose in May by the least in three months, and a measure of inflation watched by the Federal Reserve was unchanged, a day after policy makers hinted at a pause in their interest-rate increases. Spending increased 0.4 percent after a gain of 0.7 percent in April." The annual rate "excluding food and energy, rose 2.1 percent from a year ago." The lack of growth in inflation "pushed the dollar lower and spurred a rebound in Treasury notes." Meanwhile, the University of Michigan reported "the first increase in confidence in three months" rising to "84.9 from 79.1 in May."

The New York Times/AP (7/1) reports, "Consumer spending slowed sharply in May as rising gasoline prices left Americans with less cash for other items, the government reported Friday." That "provided further evidence that the economy slowed sharply in the spring." Meanwhile, "many analysts said the new inflation figure in Friday's spending report increased the odds that the Fed will increase rates at least one more time at the next meeting on Aug. 8."

NASA Engineers' Safety Concerns Draw Media Scrutiny As Shuttle Is Prepared For Launch. All three networks aired extensive segments on the preparations for Discovery's launch yesterday evening, with ABC and CBS leading their broadcasts with reports on Discovery and CBS running its story second. All three reports focused on the persistent concerns over fuel tank insulation shedding. NASA Administrator Michael Griffin's contention that risk can never be completely eliminated in the context of a shuttle launch was quoted in each of the network's segments. ABC World News Tonight (6/30, lead story, 2:50, K. Snow, 8.78M) reported, "It is the first mission in nearly a year, and only the second since the disaster in 2003. Questions about safety remain. Tonight, newly released e-mails show how high those concerns go." ABC continued, "As the launch approaches, there has been debate within NASA if the shuttle is safe enough to fly." NASA Administrator Michael Griffin was shown saying, "Is it a gamble? Are we playing the odds? Yes, of course. Every time we launch this shuttle, we take a risk." ABC went on to report, "Some have questioned if the risk is too great. NASA's top safety officials voted not to launch until there were more modifications to the foam on the fuel tanks. Today, it was learned, some in the inspector general's office have questioned the decision to go. In one e-mail, an inspector wrote 'The shuttle program and ultimately Mike Griffin (NASA Admr) are rolling the dice, but they think their odds are good.'" ABC concluded, "Now, one key reason that the NASA administrator feels comfortable launching tomorrow is that if there is a problem on liftoff with the foam, he does not feel it presents a safety issue for the crew. The shuttle would go up to the space station, dock. The crew would wait on the space station for a rescue."

The CBS Evening News (6/30, lead story, 3:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Never before has there been a launch like the one scheduled tomorrow. NASA's top administrator is saying he considers it so important to keep the space program on schedule, he is willing to override the safety concerns of his top engineer and his top safety officer." CBS added, "Discovery will be the only shuttle ever launched with a system officially classified as an unacceptable risk. The danger comes from insulating foam on the shuttle's external fuel tank and the possibility that pieces may break off from brackets during launch, puncturing the shuttle's heat shield, which has to be intact for a safe reentry at the end of the mission. NASA's chief engineer and top safety official labeled that failure as probable/catastrophic, meaning there's roughly one in 100 chance that a foam strike will cause catastrophic damage to Discovery." NBC Nightly News (6/30, story 2, 1:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, Engineers think they have minimized the risk but not eliminated it. Two senior engineers voted no when asked if the shuttle should launch. However, NASA management has overruled them, and decided to fly anyway. NASA leadership says, right now, the risks are acceptable and they must get going to finish the International Space Station. Importantly, those two engineers did not object when they were overruled."

Griffin's Role In Overruling Engineers' Objections To Launch Noted. The New York Times (7/1, Schwartz, Leary, 1.19M) reports, "Griffin…overruled the engineers. … He also said…he wanted to leave time to complete the 17 missions planned before President Bush's deadline for ending the shuttle program in 2010. On Friday, Mr. Griffin defended that decision, contrasting the open discussion with the process that led up to the Columbia disaster, in which managers were found to have squelched dissent. This month's preflight review was a healthy exchange of ideas and decision-making about difficult issues, he said, adding, 'What you're seeing is a good process.'" The Washington Post/AP (7/1, A5, Schneider) reports, "Griffin is taking a calculated gamble by going ahead with the launch of Discovery, overruling two top managers who fear that foam flying off the fuel tank might harm the space shuttle. The world will soon know if his gamble pays off." Griffin "wants to get the shuttles flying again and believes that a delay now would create schedule pressure toward the end of the decade. He has acknowledged, though, that he would probably shut down the shuttle program if another vehicle is lost."

Future Of Shuttle Program Depends On "Pedestrian" Discovery Mission. The New York Times (7/1, Schwartz, Leary, 1.19M) reports the Discovery crew will complete "what NASA managers called 'a rather pedestrian mission' that nevertheless has a great deal riding on it. … The 12-day mission is mainly dedicated mainly to carrying food, water, spare parts, oxygen and other supplies to the International Space Station, along with a new crew member. But far more important to the future of the space program is the issue of flaws that doomed two previous missions, those of the Challenger in 1986 and the Columbia in 2003."

WTimes Contends Current Mission Could Well Be The Shuttle Program's Last. The Washington Times (7/1, 90K) editorializes, "If anything goes wrong, which doesn't necessarily mean the loss of a third shuttle…Griffin will likely end the program. … Even something as small as what occurred last summer, when the same foam debris that doomed Columbia in 2003 flaked off Discovery's outer hull requiring a mid-mission repair, anti-shuttle forces both within and from outside NASA will probably prevail in their long-running effort to move forward from the 1970s-era program."

Louisiana Criticizes Federal Deadline For Clearing Hurricane Rita Debris. The Baton Rouge Advocate (7/1, Courreges) reports, "President Bush's Thursday exclusion of Hurricane Rita-hit areas from a list of parishes receiving time extensions on full federal coverage of expenses for hurricane debris clearing may largely paralyze work on clearing debris in storm-shattered Cameron Parish, starting today." LA7 Rep. Charles Boustany (R) on Friday "derided the decision as a 'bean-counter approach' and a 'slap in the face.' Beginning today, parishes not on the list as eligible for the deadline extension sent out by the Bush administration will have to pay 10 percent of the cost of debris removal--a list that includes none of the parishes directly hit by Rita."

Congress Seeks To Undo Error In Long-Term Oil Leases. The CBS Evening News (6/30, story 5, 2:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "We sort of hate to tell you about this next story for fear it will set off road rage." CBS (Attkisson) added, "The House of Representatives rushed last night to undo a colossal mistake, one that lets oil companies keep billions of dollars for themselves, money that should be going to U.S. taxpayers for the right to drill in U.S. waters." The mistake was that "somebody in the government left the royalty part out of thousands of long-term leases signed in 1998 and '99." So "Congress has been scrambling to find out who cut big oil the big break. Nobody seems to know. It happened during the Clinton years." But a bill "passed last night in the House, next goes on to the Senate. It would force oil companies to face up -- to pay up, rather, or face big penalties."

Kerr-McGee To Seek Negotiated Settlement. The New York Times (7/1, Andrews, 1.19M) reports, "The Kerr-McGee Corporation, under pressure from Congress, said on Friday that it would begin negotiations to settle a lawsuit that if it went to trial could deprive the government of as much as $60 billion in oil and gas royalties." The firm "sued the Interior Department in March to overturn a provision that requires companies to pay full royalties if oil prices climb above about $34 a barrel and natural gas prices rise above about $4 per thousand cubic feet."

House And Senate Differ On Opening Coastal Waters To Exploration. The AP (7/1, Hebert) reports, "Congress has taken a major step toward allowing oil and gas drilling in coastal waters that have been off limits for a quarter-century. Still, a battle looms in the Senate over the issue. And the Bush administration's support for the legislation…is lukewarm." The House bill would "end an Outer Continental Shelf drilling moratorium" that "covers 85 percent of the country's coastal waters." One provision "would give tens of billions of dollars to states that have drilling rigs off their coasts." It is "likely to face a filibuster from Florida senators." The Senate "is considering a limited measure that would open an area in the eastern Gulf of Mexico, known as Lease Area 181, that comes within 100 miles of Florida." The White House "strongly opposes the changes in royalty revenue sharing."

House Votes To Lift Ban On International Sales Of F-22. The Washington Post (7/1, D1, Merle, 744K) reports the U.S. House of Representatives "has recommended lifting a ban on international sales of the nation's most advanced fighter, the F-22 Raptor." The ban "was put in place to keep the Raptor's high-tech systems out of the hands of foreign governments." But lagging U.S. military orders have created fears that Lockheed Martin Corp. "may shut down the plane's production line in coming years."

Congressional Negotiators Still Unable To Resolve Pension Issues. The AP (7/1, Abrams) reports, "Congress falls short once again of achieving one of its prime goals: coming up with a bill to assure 44 million workers who depend on employer-based pension plans that they will get their promised retirement benefits." House and Senate negotiators are "still apart on two big issues: How to make companies that have fallen behind on payments to their pension plans make them up without driving them to terminate the plans or declare bankruptcy. Whether to single out financially struggling airlines for special treatment." And "the toughest issue has been working out a definition of what is an 'at risk' company that would be required by the bill to increase contributions to its pension plan."

Maryland Blue Cross Cuts Reimbursements To Doctors; Investigation Requested. The Washington Times (7/1, Rowland, 90K) reports, "A slate of reimbursement cuts going into effect today for CareFirst BlueCross BlueShield providers has some Washington-area doctors threatening to limit new patients or drop out of the network. The cuts also have prompted the Maryland State Medical Society to ask Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr. to investigate 'monopolistic pricing practices' between the state's largest health insurer and its major rival, UnitedHealth Group."

Senators Seek Reauthorization Of HOPE VI Housing Program. The Wall Street Journal (7/1, Roberts, 2.11M) reports, "The Federal Government's program to revitalize public housing is set to expire" but MD Sen. Barbara Mikulski (D) "is fighting an uphill battle to preserve it." The program, Homeownership and Opportunity for People Everywhere, "will be phased out in September." There is still "$3 billion…designated to complete projects, but hasn't yet been spent." And "the Bush administration says Hope VI hasn't been very productive." Yet Mikulski and "a bipartisan group of senators…are pushing for reauthorization."

Bush Makes Fifth Visit To Ohio This Year For DeWine Fundraiser. The AP (7/1, Smyth) reports, "The state's political hit parade continued Friday with President Bush jetting into the Columbus area for a fund-raiser for U.S. Sen. Mike DeWine. Adults and children were making signs to greet the president hours before his arrival in a suburban Columbus neighborhood Friday afternoon, and others stood in their driveways holding small American flags." The AP notes, "Friday's private fund-raiser for DeWine is Bush's fifth visit to the state this year."

Schwarzenegger Fined $202,000 Over Campaign Donation Violations. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Salladay, 958K) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's campaign "has agreed to pay a $202,200 penalty for failing to properly report more than $25 million in campaign donations during the special election last year, the state Fair Political Practices Commission said Friday. … Under California law, campaigns must publicly disclose donations they receive and money they spend — in some cases within 24 hours of the transaction. Disclosure is the bedrock of California's finance law, allowing the public to see the money behind political campaigns. In documents released Friday, the commission found that Schwarzenegger's California Recovery Team, created to advance the governor's causes, failed to report in a timely way millions of dollars in donations that were used to buy TV advertising pushing four initiatives on the November ballot. It found 143 delinquent reports on $25.6 million in expenditures. The complaint was filed by the Alliance for a Better California, a union-backed group that worked against the governor last year."

Schwarzenegger Approves California's First On-Time Budget In Six Years. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Halper, 958K) reports Schwarzenegger "signed the state's first on-time budget in six years Friday, after using his veto power to scale back the expansion of environmental enforcement and healthcare programs approved by the Legislature earlier this week. The $131-billion spending plan signed by the governor will use a surge of unanticipated revenue that filled California's coffers this year to pay back billions the state borrowed from schools in recent years as well as to accelerate repayment of other state debt.

EDITORIAL WRAP-UP:

New York Times: "Don't Know Much About History." An editorial entitled "Don't Know Much About History" in the New York Times (7/1, 1.19M) says, "Somewhere between the firing in 2002 of President Bush's first Treasury secretary, Paul O'Neill, and the Senate confirmation this week of his third Treasury chief, Henry Paulson, the administration changed its tune on budget deficits. In the early days, the line was, essentially, that deficits don't matter. … Now, officials dutifully declaim that deficits matter, but that Bush-era shortfalls are 'within historical norms.' Mr. Paulson apparently shares that view, having offered it repeatedly when asked about budget deficits during his confirmation hearing." The Times faults that claim as a "disappointment" that "takes a narrow view of history." The Times states, "In contrast, the Bush years have been marked by nonstop tax cutting, deepening debt, the abandonment of budget rules and increased spending, paid for by borrowing," which is "alarming" because they are heavily foreign-financed (over 73 percent since 2001). By implying that the Bush deficits are normal, Paulson and others in the administration ignore the need to focus on tax cuts in addressing the deficit, the Times says, adding its "hope that in discussions with his new boss, Mr. Paulson has more to say about the budget deficit than he let on during his confirmation hearing."

"Watching Out for Wandering Data." The New York Times (7/1, 1.19M) editorializes, "The government's extraordinary attempt at damage control when it appeared the computer was gone for good — including a plan to offer a year's free credit monitoring to the veterans at a cost of more than $160 million — underlines a mushrooming problem. It is becoming obvious that government agencies, and businesses, need better policies and practices for handling sensitive data stored on computers. To begin with, personal information on 17 million veterans is not the sort of data that should be moving around on a laptop. Data this valuable should also have been encrypted, to make it difficult for thieves to use it."

Washington Post: "Passports for Health Care." The Washington Post (7/1, A24, 744K) writes in an editorial the rule "may sound like a sensible safeguard" but it is "unnecessary, expensive and mean-spirited." It may result in "millions of people entitled to receive Medicaid benefits" being "denied coverage." Many American are said to lack documentation having neither a passport nor a birth certificate. Yet "under the administration's guidance for state Medicaid agencies, states can't extend coverage to new applicants while they scramble to obtain documentation." The post concludes, "this is an unnecessarily cruel law interpreted in an unnecessarily cruel way."

"Hamas's War." The Washington Post (7/1, A24, 744K) editorializes that if "Israel's offensive in the Gaza Strip is aimed at overturning" Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh's government, "Israel would be entirely justified." He chose not to "behave like a civilized government -- and work to free the hostage" but to "align itself with a terrorist operation." Still, "Israel's Gaza incursion has been reluctant, slow, carefully calibrated," restraint that "reflects recognition by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert that Israel stands only to lose if the Palestinian Authority is destroyed by force." Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas could broker a political solution, but he "needs more help than he is getting from Egypt, other Arab states and the United Nations. Instead of fulminating about supposed Israeli war crimes, these actors ought to be demanding that Hamas -- and its sponsors in Damascus and Tehran -- stop their own acts of terrorism and war."

"Sabotaging Open Government." He chose not to "behave like a civilized government -- and work to free the hostage" but to "align itself with a terrorist operation." Wall Street Journal: "Hedge Fund Hoopla." The Wall Street Journal (7/1, A10, 2.11M) in an editorial writes, "Politicians are drawn to piles of unregulated money like, well, politicians to TV cameras. So it was only a matter of time before Congress took aim at the $2.4 trillion hedge fund industry." But, "Congress should tread carefully, if it treads at all."

"Arab Women's Suffrage."

"Jon Corzine Florio." The Wall Street Journal (7/1, 2.11M) editorializes, "Nearly every state in the nation is celebrating the new fiscal year that begins on Monday with record tax revenues. The big exception is New Jersey, which is headed instead for what could be a government shutdown. The political showdown isn't between Republicans and Democrats, but is between Governor Jon Corzine and his fellow Democrats who control the state legislature. On Wednesday, Democrats cursed each other and, according to our eyewitness sources, came close to blows inside the capitol in Trenton. Mr. Corzine is now threatening a government shutdown if his own party doesn't bend to his proposal for a $1.5 billion tax increase. Remarkably, all of this intra-party feuding isn't over whether to raise taxes, merely over how. … Meanwhile, the one promise that Democrats made to voters in last year's election campaign -- lowering what are some of the highest property taxes in the country -- remains conspicuously unfulfilled."

Los Angeles Times: "Happy anniversary, Antonio. What's next?"

"Show Africa the money." The Los Angeles Times (7/1, 958K) editorializes, "a s we near the one-year anniversary of the Group of 8 summit in Gleneagles, Scotland," where "Rich nations signed a historic pact to forgive the debts of some of the world's most impoverished countries." However, "G-8 countries are far off track on their aid commitments and even further from a comprehensive trade deal." Implementing the agreement "to eliminate all export subsidies, cut other domestic supports and improve access to their markets for poor countries" was "supposed to be accomplished by the World Trade Organization during its Doha round of talks. Doha is desperately, perhaps fatally, stalled," and the rich countries' "promises are already starting to look hollow."

"Winning over the freeloaders." The Los Angeles Times (7/1, 958K), in a "One Year Later" feature, follows up a the Supreme Court's Grokster decision, and says the victorious recording labels and studios "haven't done enough to lure file sharers." The decision said companies like Grokster that let their users share files over the Internet can be held liable for enabling copyright infringement. Even though the percentage of U.S. Internet users sharing files has stayed flat in recent years, while the percentage of those buying in online stores has seen real growth, "free downloaders represent a lost opportunity for the entertainment industry." The Times calls for "much more experimentation with approaches that give users the control and freedom to consume that make file-sharing networks so attractive."

TERRORISM NEWS:

GOP Seeks Advantage In Ruling On Trials (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Jonathan Weisman
The Washington Post, July 1, 2006
National Security Is Likely Rallying Cry, Leaders Indicate

Republicans yesterday looked to wrest a political victory from a legal defeat in the Supreme Court, serving notice to Democrats that they must back President Bush on how to try suspects at Guantanamo Bay or risk being branded as weak on terrorism.

In striking down the military commissions Bush sought for trials of suspected members of al-Qaeda and other terrorist groups, the high court Thursday invited Congress to establish new rules and put the issue prominently before the public four months before the midterm elections. As the White House and lawmakers weighed next steps, House GOP leaders signaled they are ready to use this week's turn of events as a political weapon.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) criticized House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's comment Thursday that the court decision "affirms the American ideal that all are entitled to the basic guarantees of our justice system." That statement, Boehner said, amounted to Pelosi's advocating "special privileges for terrorists."

Similar views ricocheted around conservative talk radio -- Rush Limbaugh called Pelosi's comments "deranged" on his show Thursday -- and Republican strategists said they believed that the decision presented Bush a chance to put Democrats on the spot while uniting a Republican coalition that lately has been splintered on immigration, spending and other issues.

"It would be good politics to have a debate about this if Democrats are going to argue for additional rights for terrorists," said Terry Nelson, a prominent GOP political strategist who was political director for Bush's reelection campaign in 2004.

Mindful of this thinking, Democrats were measured in their comments about how to respond to the ruling, which held that Bush's policy was not authorized by law and violated the Geneva Conventions.

Brendan Daly, Pelosi's spokesman, said Democrats "want to work with" the administration in fashioning new rules for terrorism suspects, and he dismissed Boehner's comments as a sign of desperation. "[Bush] is not a king -- he has to follow the law," Daly said. "That's all we're saying."

Democrats seemed to gain some support from a few Senate Republicans, who said politics should not dictate how Congress responds to the Supreme Court. "This should not be a party fight," said Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.). "I'm a proud Republican senator, but my nation needs both parties working in collaboration with the executive branch to solve the military commission problem, and both parties will be rewarded by the public if we're seen as working for the common good."

The issue is not without complexity for Republicans. A Washington Post-ABC poll this week suggested that while Americans continue to favor holding suspects at the U.S. military installation at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, they are leery of an administration policy that has resulted in almost all of the 450 detainees being held without charges. Of those polled, 71 percent said the detainees should be either given POW status or charged with a crime.

In many respects, the Guantanamo Bay facility has become an albatross for the Bush administration since its creation in the months after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks as a prison for terrorism suspects picked up in Afghanistan and elsewhere. Bush signed an executive order in November 2001 establishing military commissions to try the inmates, but the process has been in a legal limbo and no suspect has gone through a full trial.

Meanwhile, the United States has attracted intense international criticism for holding the detainees in limbo, and Bush has said repeatedly that he wants to close the prison.

Some lawmakers want Congress to endorse a plan to have the commissions operate by the rules of a regular court-martial, which would give the detainees more rights than they would have under the current commission structure. But administration lawyers have been concerned that it would be difficult to win convictions under that scenario, in large measure because the standard of proof would be higher.

White House spokeswoman Dana M. Perino said the administration is reviewing how to respond to the court.

A senior administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the issue is still being debated internally, seemed to hint at the potential political implications in Congress. "Members of both parties will have to decide whether terrorists who cherish the killing of innocents deserve the same protections as our men and women who wear the uniform," this official said.

The House and Senate Armed Services committees and the Senate Judiciary Committee have called for hearings as soon as Congress returns from the week-long Fourth of July break.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) yesterday outlined his plan to conduct military tribunals in a manner consistent with the court's decision.

Under the Specter bill, a three-judge panel of military lawyers would preside. Defendants would be present in court with their lawyers, who would be granted the right to gather evidence, cross-examine witnesses and review classified information after it had been reviewed by a judge. Defendants would be granted the right to appeal verdicts to a court of military appeals and, ultimately, the Supreme Court.

"I would suggest that the rhetoric be cooled at least long enough for people to read the opinion," Specter said of the Supreme Court decision. "We're going to have to dot all the i's and cross all the t's on this legislation to make sure it passes muster."

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), a key figure on detainee policy, noted that the court pointedly ruled that military tribunals had to comport with the Geneva Conventions, so any effort to simply grant Bush the power he wants would not pass the scrutiny of the court. If Republicans ignore the court's prescription, military lawyers would be quick to speak out, granting Democrats political cover, he predicted.

"That kind of excess, I think, backfires," Levin said of the House Republican broadsides. "The American public has too much common sense to put much stock in that kind of diatribe. Americans respect the Supreme Court."

But some GOP allies said they suspect that the decision will help energize a Republican base that has been angry at some Bush policies. Tom Liddy, a conservative talk show host in Phoenix, said that the decision has been a big topic on his show and that it could be another terrorism issue that works to the GOP's advantage.

Liddy noted that House Republicans pushed through a resolution Thursday, over Democratic objections, criticizing the news media for publishing classified information about a secret anti-terrorism program that monitors bank transactions.

"It will be worse for the Democrats to be seen as favoring the terrorists than favoring the New York Times," Liddy said.

Tribunals Ruling Could Reverberate In Fall Campaign (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon And Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Many Republicans predict that despite the White House's legal defeat over military tribunals, President Bush will emerge as the political winner among security-conscious voters.

A day after the Supreme Court's ruling that the Bush administration's special tribunals were unlawful, Republicans sought to score points for the president. Conservative legal activists charged Democrats with excessive celebration of the decision, and said they would alienate voters. House Majority Leader John Boehner accused Democrats of supporting "special privileges for terrorists."

For their part, a number of Democratic lawmakers suggested that voters are likely to be frustrated with how the administration has handled the Guantanamo Bay detention center, which has provoked resentment in Europe and elsewhere since its establishment in 2002.

The court ruling's political ripples could be significant in this fall's midterm congressional elections. In recent weeks, Mr. Bush appeared to gain political momentum, thanks to a series of positive developments in Iraq. But the ruling could remind voters of the mistakes and overreaching that have dogged the administration's war effort.

White House allies made the case that the decision would remind voters that Mr. Bush and Republicans have been tougher on terrorism than Democrats.

"Anytime the president is discussing keeping Americans safe and taking the fight to the terrorists, that's a good place for us to be politically," said Brian Jones, spokesman for the Republican National Committee. In the wake of the decision, "the judicial realities and the political realities are very different," he added.

Republicans even appeared to hold out hope that the decision would set the stage for a legislative victory for the president, as Congress moves to bless a new tribunal plan. If the effort ends in a stalemate, Democrats could be depicted as taking the side of those suspected of terrorism.

Mr. Bush and his party have reason to believe they can gain ground politically from the Guantanamo decision -- or at least not lose much. In November 2005, a Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll asked whether the Bush administration has "taken the right course" or "gone too far" in its handling of terror suspects at facilities outside the U.S. A 55% majority said the administration has taken "the right course," while 30% said the administration has "gone too far." Just three months ago, a Wall Street Journal/NBC News survey showed two-thirds of respondents support the administration's handling of the USA Patriot Act.

Critics scoff at the idea that Mr. Bush and congressional Republicans can gain mileage from a Supreme Court decision that repudiated their position.

Neal Katyal, a Georgetown University law professor who argued the case, said Friday the special tribunals appeared to be based first and foremost on political considerations -- namely, expanding presidential powers while appearing tough on terror. But the tribunal system's design so exceeded legal bounds that it undermined both aims, he said.

Lawmakers in both parties had previously submitted bills that would have authorized military commissions, but the White House repeatedly rejected calls to embrace legislation, fearing it would expose prisoner policies to congressional interference. After the high court's decision, lawmakers dusted off their bills. Both Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) and ranking Democrat, Patrick Leahy of Vermont, circulated copies of legislation to authorize military trials, using the regular court-martial code as a starting point.

Not all lawmakers saw it as a partisan issue. "I'm optimistic that Republicans and Democrats can come up with a solution to the military commission problem, in conjunction with the administration, that the nation will be proud of," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.). The current Uniform Code of Military Justice, which governs courts-martial, "will be your basic source document," he said, with "necessary changes" to protect sensitive evidence.

Rep. Adam Schiff, (D., Calif.). a member of the House Judiciary Committee, introduced Guantanamo-related legislation in 2001. On Friday, he recalled frustrating meetings with Defense, Justice and State department officials, who brushed off entreaties to develop legislation for military trials.

Like other Democrats, Mr. Schiff said Republicans faced hurdles in winning political points on the matter. The Supreme Court's opinion "continues to make the case that the administration is not competently handling the war on terror."

Mr. Specter has scheduled a July 11 hearing on the Hamdan decision.

Congress Tackles The Guantanamo Challenge (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

Lawmakers could OK Bush's setup or create a whole new system for handling detainees.

WASHINGTON — Key lawmakers moved Friday to begin creating a military justice process to determine the fate of Guantanamo detainees, a day after the Supreme Court wiped out the special tribunals established by the Bush administration.

DOJ_NMG_0037713

Under the justices' ruling, Congress — which has largely stayed on the sidelines in shaping the war on terrorism — must take the lead role in implementing the most important legal decision affecting terrorism suspects since Sept. 11.

"I think we are under duty to move very, very promptly, because these people have been detained a long time," said Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.). "The court has told us what to do."

Members of Congress, and especially its GOP leadership, will have to figure out whether they must grant detainees more rights and protections than they currently have, or whether they can legislatively duplicate the restrictive approach the Bush administration prefers.

The debate is expected to dominate the congressional agenda for the coming months, and is likely to fuel a partisan confrontation over whether the United States has gone too far on some fronts in conducting its war on terrorism.

Specter has scheduled hearings on the detainee issue for July 11, the first day Congress is back in session after the Fourth of July recess. The House Armed Services Committee also announced hearings for this month; other relevant committees are expected to follow.

Thursday's decision in Hamdan vs. Rumsfeld said the tribunals established by the Bush administration for detainees at the military's Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, facility do not comply with existing law. The high court wrote that it is up to Congress to create a judicial review process for the detainees that comports with the Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Geneva Convention.

But the decision left several questions that now fall to Congress to answer.

One is whether the administration's system of military tribunals — or commissions, as the Pentagon calls them — would be legal if formally approved by Congress.

Simply asking Congress to OK the policy — which limits detainees' access to the evidence against them, permits testimony and evidence obtained by coercion, and provides limited opportunity for review or appeal — appeared Friday to be the approach favored by the White House.

"It looks like there's considerable interest in Congress in … making sure that we can proceed with military commissions and bring to justice the people who are held at Guantanamo," White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters en route to Memphis, Tenn., with the president aboard Air Force One.

Another option open to Congress is to pass a law stating that the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which provides many more rights and legal safeguards for defendants, applies to the Guantanamo detainees.

"It's clear the court wants us to operate under the Uniform Code of Military Justice," Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said on NBC News.

"I'm confident we will do that, and quickly."

A third option would be to create an entirely new system specifically for prisoners held as part of the administration's global war on terrorism.

That is closer to the approach favored by Specter, who has been working on legislation that would create two types of special tribunals. One would determine detainees' legal status, including whether they are properly being classified as enemy combatants. The second system would establish rules and procedures for trying detainees accused of war crimes.

Specter's committee held a hearing on the issue of the Guantanamo detainees last year.

"The Department of Defense had been trying to do as little as possible. They had delayed action on detainees for a long period of time while this case has been percolating," Specter said. "We have addressed not only those who are going to be charged with criminal offenses, but also the detainees who are enemy combatants."

Another set of questions concerns whether the Supreme Court ruling has ramifications for other administration policies, such as the detention of prisoners by the U.S. elsewhere in the world, as well as the legality of the president's terrorism surveillance programs.

Specter said he thought the Hamdan decision could call into question the legality of a number of Bush administration policies.

The White House has argued that the president's inherent authority as commander in chief — along with Congress' 2001 authorization to use military force against terrorists — grant him extensive powers to decide how to conduct the war on terrorism, including how to treat detainees and what kinds of surveillance are necessary.

"The decision that the president lacked the authority to establish the military commissions makes it obvious that the conclusion of the Supreme Court is that there is no inherent authority — an inference and a proposition which may have some weight as we consider collateral matters, for example, on the electronic surveillance" conducted by the National Security Agency, Specter said Thursday.

Though the Supreme Court decision may be a blow to the president's policies, it may benefit his party politically — permitting candidates in November elections to talk tough about fighting terrorists and portray Democrats as weak.

For instance, a memo circulated Friday by the office of House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) accused Democrats of welcoming a Supreme Court decision granting "special privileges to terrorists."

"There is a clear choice between Capitol Hill Democrats who celebrate offering special privileges to violent terrorists, and Republicans who want the president to have the necessary tools to prosecute and achieve victory in the global war on terror," the memo said.

In response, Democrats have begun to develop their own line of argument, asserting that the Hamdan case raises doubts about the administration's competence on terrorism and protection of the U.S.

"The American people increasingly question this administration's credibility when it comes to national security. They have promulgated reckless policies that endangered the country and destroyed America's reputation around the world," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and director of the Senate Democrats' "war room" for responding to Republican charges.

"The chickens have finally come home to roost," he said.

Congress Implored To Resolve Tribunals (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, July 1, 2006

The White House yesterday said the Guantanamo Bay prison will remain open until all the detainees are dealt with, and the administration will work with Congress to remedy problems the Supreme Court cited when it ruled special military tribunals were illegally created.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Congress is interested in ensuring the more than 400 detainees at the naval facility in Cuba are brought to justice or sent home.

"You close it when you finish handling all the cases of people who are at Guantanamo," Mr. Snow said, responding to a question about Mr. Bush's stated goal of closing the jail that holds al Qaeda and Taliban prisoners picked up in the war on terror.

"And as we've said many times, you don't simply shut it down. There are some people who you do not want on American soil, who you want to go ahead and conclude the process of bringing them to justice, and repatriating those to whom it is appropriate to repatriate."

The Supreme Court ruled 5-3 on Thursday that a pending military tribunal for Yemeni national Salim Ahmed Hamdan, chauffeur to al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, could not proceed because its structure and procedures violated the Uniform Code of Military Justice and four Geneva Conventions signed in 1949.

The court said Mr. Bush lacked the authority to create the tribunals, which offer lesser legal protections than already established courts-martial rules, but that Congress could authorize the use of tribunals.

"There's considerable interest in Congress in going ahead and taking a good look at what the Supreme Court had to say and moving forward toward making sure we can proceed with military commissions ...," Mr. Snow said.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, introduced a bill Thursday that would authorize the tribunals, legislation that will generate heated debate between Republicans and Democrats heading into midterm elections.

Democrats and civil rights groups, who have questioned the president's power to detain and try prisoners, praised the ruling Thursday.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, called the decision "a stunning repudiation of the Bush administration's lawless behavior at Guantanamo."

A senior administration official said nothing in the ruling affected the president's authority to detain enemy combatants, and that it didn't find any constitutional impediment to the president and the Congress creating military commissions.

Saying the country has a long history and tradition of using military tribunals, the official said the court recognized that military commissions would be appropriate as long as the procedures used are consistent with its decision.

Warner Is Uncertain On Legislation For Tribunals (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 30 — A leading Senate Republican said Friday that he was not sure that Congress should pass legislation to create new military tribunals for terror suspects, a stance that raised doubts about prospects for a White House plan to establish an alternative to the commissions struck down this week by the Supreme Court.

The senator, John W. Warner of Virginia, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said he had not yet decided what course Congress should take. But Mr. Warner, who will preside over hearings on the issue in July, said he was concerned that new tribunals, even if authorized by Congress, might not withstand judicial scrutiny.

"We're going to do this extremely carefully and accurately, or we're going to end up with a solution that once again ends up being the subject of litigation, and possibly being overturned," Mr. Warner said in an interview in his office.

The scope of the court's decision stunned the White House and Congress, forcing the House and Senate to rearrange their limited summer legislative calendar to address the issue. Lawmakers from both parties said Friday that they hoped to reach agreement by the end of summer on a new plan to bring terror suspects to trial.

But the caution voiced by Mr. Warner suggested signs of division, even among Republicans, about how to balance concerns about the threat posed by terrorism with the court's requirements that detainees must be granted some basic rights.

President Bush has said only that he intends to work with Congress, but he and his allies appear to be pressing for a law that would give the president the authority to set up something similar to the tribunals the court ruled he could not set up on his own.

Still, others within the president's own party have cautioned that the court's ruling made clear that any trials had to extend more rights than those tribunals offered. Some lawmakers suggested using the military courts or something similar, an approach the White House has rejected as granting too many rights to detainees.

"Everybody says, 'Pass legislation, pass legislation,' but we've got to make certain it's needed, and then do it with careful analysis, to get it right," Mr. Warner said. "We've got to get it right."

Until now, the White House and particularly Vice President Dick Cheney had been dead set against working with Congress on issues involving the detainees, against the advice of some Republicans and some administration lawyers. By waiting until the court forced the issue, the White House may have made its task more difficult, leaving Mr. Bush with less support in Congress than he had after the attacks of Sept. 11.

Democrats and some Republicans characterize the president's refusal to work with Congress on the tribunals as another example in a long line of presidential power grabs.

"Their whole unilateral approach made it more difficult for everybody here, and we're going to have to pick up these pieces," said Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee. "It would have been a lot easier if they had not ignored the Congress and not behaved as if they are the law unto themselves."

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said: "This is the gang that couldn't shoot straight. Had they simply gone to Congress at the time, they could have gotten anything they wanted. Because they are so headstrong, they can only do it their way, they run into brick walls.'"

Even some Republicans expressed irritation that the White House had refused to work with Congress.

"They had been trying to do as little as possible," said Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania and chairman of the Judiciary Committee, which will also hold hearings on the issue in July. Mr. Specter had offered legislation to set up a process of trials as early as 2002, but was rebuffed.

"They just delayed action on detainees for a long period of time while this case was percolating," Mr. Specter said.

Mr. Warner and Mr. Levin said they wanted to broaden the discussion of how to treat detainees beyond the tight circle the White House had relied on, in particular to include the military. The hearings, Mr. Warner said, will rely on sitting and retired judge advocates general from each military branch. In the past, he said, those military lawyers "didn't get a full voice."

A senior Senate Republican aide, granted anonymity to speak freely about the internal debates, said, "It's clear that the administration was eager to push the envelope as far as it could by setting up these tribunals without legislative authority. They got a brushback from the Supreme Court, and now the Senate is struggling with whether or not to side with the administration's original approach or something else."

Members of both parties said they wanted to work with the president, and hoped that the gravity of the issue would trump politics. But the hearings come at a difficult political moment, with Democrats hoping to take back the majority in both houses of Congress in November.

The Democrats could try to make the hearings a referendum on what Senator Edward M. Kennedy characterized as the administration's "lawless" treatment of detainees. But Republicans were already seizing the opportunity to paint Democrats as weak on terror.

A news release from the office of the House majority leader, Representative John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio, seized on comments by the minority leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California, saying that the Supreme Court decision "reaffirms the American ideal that all are entitled the basic guarantees of our justice system." The headline read, "Capitol Hill Democrats Advocate Special Privileges for Terrorists."

In the range of options that lawmakers discussed, tribunals or military commissions would grant detainees the fewest rights, and civilian courts, the most. Courts-martial fall somewhere in the middle, granting a streamlined bill of rights, but allowing looser rules of evidence than civilian courts. Conviction requires agreement of three-quarters of the jury, not the entire panel, and the jury is typically made up of officers, who tend to have college degrees.

Mr. Specter filed legislation immediately after the court's decision Thursday, proposing military commissions overseen by a three-member panel, with at least one judge advocate general. The proposal would grant counsel to the accused and allow cross-examination in some cases, but it would also relax the evidence standards to include hearsay, recognizing the difficulty of collecting evidence against accused terrorists. Mr. Specter's proposal would also provide standards to protect classified evidence.

Mr. Levin said the Senate was unlikely to sign off on tribunals if they looked like what the president initially wanted because the courts ruled that they violated provisions in the Geneva Conventions and the military code of justice.

"There are certain guideposts that put limits on this," he said. "Unless we amend prior statutes, which I don't think we're inclined to do, we're governed by the law of war."

A senior administration official said the White House was "likely to seek legislation on the tribunal issue."

That approach got support from Senator Lindsey Graham, the South Carolina Republican who with Mr. Levin and Mr. Warner called for hearings on the detainee issue.

Mr. Graham picked up on the court's statement that "nothing prevents the president from returning to Congress to seek the authority he believes necessary."

"The court is telling us that we can create a court," Mr. Graham said in an interview. "The court said the defect was that Congress never blessed it. We'll correct that defect."

"It's highly inappropriate to use civilian courts to try enemy combatants," he said. "This is a war. It's dangerous, it's a joke. The military tribunal has been the convention in the time of war."

The White House has considered military courts unpalatable because of the due process they afford. Officials there said Friday that they were generally against leaving the combatants to the military justice system, not only for its degree of due process but also for strict standards of evidence to which prosecutors are required to adhere.

Supreme Court Ruling May Ripple Through Other Bush Policies (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay, Marisa Taylor And Margaret Talev

DOJ_NMG_0037717

WASHINGTON - The Supreme Court's ruling Thursday that the Bush administration can't use ad hoc military commissions to try suspected terrorists may have sweeping implications for other aspects of President Bush's war on terror.

The court's decision has ignited a fierce debate about its full impact among lawyers, legal scholars, administration officials and members of Congress.

Some believe that the opinion could challenge the administration's claim the National Security Agency is the right to eavesdrop without court approval on Americans who are suspected of having ties to al-Qaida or other terrorist groups.

The high court's embrace of a central provision of the Geneva Conventions on war could also bolster challenges to U.S. interrogation techniques and the use of secret prisons to detain suspected terrorists. It also could help detainees who are being held without charges, lawyers or trials contest their situations, experts said.

"At this point, almost everything that could be affected by the decision is going to come to a screeching halt," said Neal Sonnett, the chair of the American Bar Association's task force on enemy combatants, referring to the treatment of detainees.

"There is clearly a shot across the bow of the administration," said Scott Silliman, a professor at Duke University Law School and a former senior Air Force lawyer. "The opinion here has clear implications for the court being willing to look at how we are treating folks."

At its heart, legal experts said, the ruling rebuffed Bush's contention that the president has special powers during wartime to disregard acts of Congress and international treaties.

"I think the court's ruling is a rejection of the administration's post 9/11 legal centerpiece claim, which is the president has inherent authority in all kinds of things in the name of crisis," said Neal Katyal, the lead attorney who argued the case on behalf of detainee and plaintiff Salim Ahmed Hamdan.

"One of the potential implications is that the `inherent authority' argument pushed by the executive branch may be in retreat," agreed Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., in an interview with McClatchy Newspapers on Friday.

The administration has contended since the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks that the Constitution gives the president as commander in chief "inherent authority" to do virtually anything he wants in the name of protecting national security in time of war. The court emphatically ruled that Congress and the judiciary share authority with the executive, even in time of war.

At the same time, the court held that Congress could write a law creating new tribunals to try detainees, so long as they operate within a civil or military legal code, and leading senators intend to do so soon.

In an interview Friday with McClatchy Newspapers, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said he doesn't take the court's ruling to mean that those already being held would be off the hook simply because their rights were found to have been violated.

"They can argue that," he said, "but I think there's a basis for detaining them if they're dangerous" so long as Congress passes legislation "very promptly". "They're not going to be released," Specter said. "We'll be given time to structure a procedure that is adequate."

Specter's offering a bill that would authorize military commissions to handle detainees with two divisions - one for those charged with specific offenses and another for enemy combatants who are being held indefinitely.

Those charged would face three-officer panels with presiding judges from the Judge Advocate General's Office. They'd be entitled to cross-examination witnesses and to require unanimous verdicts. If classified information was involved, the presiding judge would decide how much information to make available to the defense, and the defendant's attorney could get a security clearance to handle that classified information.

Graham agreed that the court's ruling "confirms that the military can hold these people until the hostilities are over . . . The case was about how you bring them to trial, not how you hold them. Anybody who says detainees are going to get off the hook because of this ruling are misunderstanding the opinion, in my opinion."

"The good news," Graham said, "is we now know how to write the statute to make it constitutional and to be able to move the cases forward."

Legal experts cautioned that analysis of the complex 5-3 decision was preliminary, because they'd only had a day to distill it. But overall, there was widespread agreement that the decision could spell more legal trouble for the administration's war on terror.

The majority decision, written by Justice John Paul Stevens, concluded that the administration's Guantanamo Bay tribunals violated both U.S. law and the Geneva Conventions of 1949 because they didn't provide defendants with legal safeguards that civilian and military courts require and they weren't authorized by Congress.

The justices cited Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which calls for "regularly constituted" courts to handle cases involving detainees. Article 3 prohibits torture and other "degrading treatment."

Some legal scholars said that could encourage current and former detainees to bring cases against the government for employing harsh interrogation techniques at Guantanamo Bay and other U.S.-run prisons.

Experts said that at the very least, the Pentagon would have to ensure that interrogation techniques set out in a new Army field manual now being drafted would have to conform with the Geneva Conventions.

"Anything basically that we wouldn't want done to our own troops - it's now prohibited," said John Hutson, the dean of the Franklin Pierce Law Center and a former Navy Judge Advocate General.

Some administration supporters predicted that the ruling would undermine public support for the president's claim of special wartime powers.

"It's a major setback for the president. The advocates of diminishing his office now have a powerful public relations tool to say that the most powerful court in the land has said he is a law breaker," said Douglas Kmiec, a professor of constitutional law at Pepperdine University Law School and a legal counsel for former presidents George H.W. Bush and Ronald Reagan.

Tribunal Ruling's Wider Impact Still Unclear (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel, Times Staff Writer

Thursday's Supreme Court decision could affect the way the U.S. treats all its detainees, even senior operatives of Al Qaeda.

WASHINGTON — For Salim Ahmed Hamdan, the Yemeni who was at the center of Thursday's Supreme Court ruling on military tribunals at Guantanamo Bay, the future is a bit clearer: He must receive a trial with new, congressionally approved procedures.

But the landmark 5-3 decision may also have a significant impact on hundreds of other detainees at Guantanamo, as well as an unknown number picked up by U.S. forces and held in undisclosed locations around the world.

The high court's finding that the Geneva Convention covers terrorism detainees — from young men who claim to have been mere cooks for anti-U.S. forces to Sept. 11 plotter Khalid Shaikh Mohammed — could lead to sweeping changes in the way they are treated, according to legal experts and advocates for those held. The ruling could give Guantanamo prisoners a day in a U.S. court, and senior Al Qaeda operatives being held as U.S. captives visits from the Red Cross.

Administration lawyers argue this kind of interpretation is too broad, insisting the decision only applies to Hamdan and a limited group at Guantanamo: the nine other detainees who have been charged with war crimes and 40 to 80 more who are in the pipeline to face similar charges.

"Certainly, this court's decision is limited to the case before it," argued one senior administration official who spoke on condition of anonymity in keeping with the rules of his job.

Others within the administration, however, have been more circumspect, declining to speculate on whether the Geneva Convention now applies to all detainees being held at Guantanamo and at other prisons overseas.

"That's something we're studying, and will be studying," said another senior administration official.

President Bush decided in February 2002 that Al Qaeda was not covered by the Geneva Convention and that Taliban fighters did not qualify as prisoners of war. Bush also determined that a Geneva Convention provision known as Common Article 3 — which applies to conflicts such as civil wars where the adversaries are not recognized nations — was invalid when it came to the global war on terrorism.

In the court's majority opinion, Justice John Paul Stevens found that Bush's rationale was erroneous.

While Common Article 3 provides fewer safeguards than other portions of the Geneva Convention, it does prohibit the "passing of sentences" without a judgment from "a regularly constituted court affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples."

The article also holds that a humanitarian agency, such as the Red Cross, may be called to ensure that the Geneva protections are being obeyed, although the provision is not mandatory.

Officially, the Justice Department said Friday that it had yet to make a determination on just how broadly the decision would be applied.

"The administration is still in the process of reviewing the opinion to determine what impact it may have outside the Hamdan case," said Brian Roehrkasse, a department spokesman.

The ramifications could be significant. The nearly 400 Guantanamo detainees who are not headed toward war crimes trials like Hamdan's are subject to annual status hearings that determine whether they are still a threat or whether they are useful for intelligence purposes.

Advocates for those detainees have argued that those hearings — which are conducted by a panel of three midlevel U.S. military officers without legal representation for the detainees — are illegal because they do not conform to the rules of evidence and procedure that exist in normal military courts.

"This opinion is a green light for those held at Guantanamo who are not held on a military commission basis," said Bill Goodman, legal director for the Center for Constitutional Rights, which has filed legal claims for nearly all Guantanamo detainees. "It allows them to go to court and see the evidence."

Lawyers for these Guantanamo detainees have filed dozens of cases in federal court to force the government to defend its reasons for holding them.

These habeas corpus cases have been on hold as the Hamdan case made its way through the courts, awaiting both a determination on whether the Geneva Convention applies to them, as well as a ruling on whether habeas corpus requests from Guantanamo had been made illegal by a law passed last year.

As part of the Hamdan decision, Stevens wrote that cases filed before the 2005 law was passed were free to move forward. Goodman said he believed the ruling eventually would allow all Guantanamo detainees to have a hearing in federal courts.

Of potentially more consequence is the ruling's impact on Al Qaeda detainees who are not being held at Guantanamo, who are believed to include Mohammed and Ramzi Binalshibh, an Al Qaeda operative involved in planning the 2001 attacks.

Harold Koh, dean of Yale Law School and a former assistant secretary of State for human rights, said the Geneva Convention wording in the decision appeared to cover all Al Qaeda prisoners — including these "ghost detainees" widely believed held by the CIA. If so, they would come under Common Article 3's protections, including its suggestion of visits from the Red Cross.

"Nobody should be detained in the course of a conflict who is not vetted by the Red Cross," Koh said. "If the government is acting prudently under this ruling, they would be granting them Geneva rights."

The Red Cross is unique in that it is specifically mentioned in the Geneva Convention as the organization responsible for independent monitoring of international rules.

The International Committee of the Red Cross has been requesting access to "ghost detainees" for several years, most recently during a May trip to Washington by its president, Jakob Kellenberger, who personally made the case to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Spokesman Simon Schorno said the Red Cross would not comment on how the Hamdan case would affect its petition to the Bush administration, but added, "We certainly welcome any development that leads to a clarification of the future of the detainees held at Guantanamo Bay."

Schorno said the Pentagon had allowed the Red Cross access to all detainees at Guantanamo since January 2002, and it also had visited those held at Bagram Air Base in Afghanistan. As of May, the organization said it was in contact with 560 detainees at Bagram.

Because the war in Iraq has always been covered by the Geneva Convention, the Red Cross has been given wide latitude to visit prisoners there. Between January and March of this year, the committee visited about 14,000 detainees in Iraq. Those believed held by the CIA, however, have remained off-limits.

"We still have not obtained access to an unknown number of persons captured and held by the U.S. in undisclosed locations," Schorno said.

Experts: Ruling Weakens Bush Spying Plan (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP2, July 1, 2006

A Supreme Court ruling striking down military commissions seriously weakens the foundation of the Bush administration's domestic surveillance program, critics said Friday.

A congressional resolution President Bush relied on in creating commissions is a key rationale for the National Security Agency to listen in on phone calls without first obtaining a judge's permission.

The court "reinforces our view that the NSA operation was unlawful," said George Washington University law professor Jonathan Turley. "The Supreme Court cut away the administration's principal legal argument for the NSA operation — the congressional resolution following Sept. 11."

Enacted a week after the Sept. 11 attacks, the congressional Authorization for Use of Military Force resolution cannot be seen as authorization for military commissions, the court ruled.

In January, the Justice Department invoked the resolution 92 times in a 42-page paper designed to quell the outcry that the White House had broken the law with its program of warrantless surveillance. A centerpiece in the administration's counter-attack against its critics, the DOJ entitled the white paper "Legal Authorities Supporting the Activities of the National Security Agency Described By the President."

Asked about the NSA program, a Justice Department official said after the ruling that "I don't think the court had before it any other broader issues concerning the scope of the Authorization for Use of Military Force, except it clearly did recognize that it activated the president's war powers."

The official said the implications of the decision beyond military commissions is "something that we are studying and will be studying." The official spoke on condition of anonymity because the matter is under review.

In the aftermath of the high court's ruling, lawyers for the Bush administration asked a federal appeals court in Washington to order more briefing on the decision's effect on civil lawsuits filed on behalf of hundreds of detainees held at the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The NSA program faces a court challenge and the Supreme Court ruling "gives new vigor to arguments that the administration does not have the power it says it has," said Anthony Romero, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union.

Romero said the language in Justice Anthony Kennedy's concurring opinion against military commissions "almost could have been speaking about the NSA litigation," providing useful material for the ACLU's lawsuit against the warrantless surveillance.

In the military commission case, the Supreme Court said the congressional resolution was insufficient.

The Authorization for Use of Military Force resolution says that "the president is authorized to use all necessary and appropriate force" to prevent future acts of international terrorism against the United States.

In Thursday's ruling Justice Kennedy wrote that "trial by military commission raises separation-of-powers concerns of the highest order."

"Located within a single branch, these courts carry the risk that offenses will be defined, prosecuted, and adjudicated by executive officials without independent review," Kennedy added.

It was the absence of any review that fueled the outrage against the Bush administration's warrantless surveillance.

The White House decided not to obtain orders from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court before eavesdropping on phone calls.

DOJ_NMG_0037721

The Supreme Court setback for the White House comes amid a full frontal assault by the administration against The New York Times for revealing the existence of the NSA program as well as another secret government initiative accessing a huge databank of bank records.

The American Society of Newspaper Editors, responding to such criticism, said Friday that the Bush administration and some in Congress "are threatening America's bedrock values of free speech and free press with their attempts to demonize newspapers for fulfilling their constitutional role in our democratic society."

The ASNE said newspaper editors don't claim to be infallible. "However, the First Amendment makes it clear no person or branch of government has the prerogative to usurp any American's right to speak or print what he or she believes is important and relevant truth. We believe honorable debate would focus on the issues raised by the reporting, not on attacks on the truth-tellers," it said.

Justices Prove To Be No Lapdogs Of Bush (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir In Washington

Financial Times, July 1, 2006

The US Supreme Court that dealt a historic blow this week to the executive powers of the Bush administration was, ironically, a court dominated by Republicans, and headed by a brand new chief justice hand-picked by President George W. Bush.

Over the past nine months, Mr Bush has added two new conservatives to the nine-person court, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito. Both are viewed as friends of executive power. Ruling in a lower court on the same Guantánamo military tribunals case that was on Friday overturned in the Supreme Court, Justice Roberts voted to uphold the legality of military commissions. And Justice Alito was an outspoken proponent of executive power in wartime, before taking the bench.

So how could the government lose? The answer: Justice Anthony Kennedy, the moderate conservative who has emerged as the court's new swing justice. He holds the balance of power on the closely divided court, stepping into the shoes of Sandra Day O'Connor, who retired in January.

In the military tribunals case decided on Thursday, Justice Kennedy, appointed by President Ronald Reagan, voted with the court's liberal bloc to give Mr Bush a decisive rebuke. Chief Justice Roberts did not participate in the military tribunals case, because he ruled on it as a judge at the appeals court level. But even if he had done, it would not have made a difference thanks to Justice Kennedy.

This has not been the only case effectively decided by Justice Kennedy's vote during the current term, which ended on Thursday. In a critical case upholding the power of the federal government to regulate the environment, he joined the liberal bloc again, writing a separate opinion that denied his fellow conservatives the support they needed for a ruling that would have sharply circumscribed the scope of the federal Clean Water Act.

And in a ruling involving the powers of the police, he wrote a middle-of-the-road opinion again restraining the conservative majority, which appeared bent on challenging the "exclusionary rule" that says law enforcement officers must forfeit evidence gained by illegal searches.

"If you can't be chief justice, the next best thing to be is the swing vote," says Randy Barnett, a constitutional law expert at Boston University law school.

Steven Shapiro, legal dir-ector of the American Civil Liberties Union, says: "Thus far, Roberts and Alito have pretty much performed as expected. But in the short run, at least, their votes may be less important on a range of critical issues than Justice Kennedy's."

Does that mean Justice Kennedy can be relied on to vote against the government in future cases inspired by this week's Hamdan case? Perhaps in a challenge to the president's warrantless wiretapping programme? Legal experts say it is too soon to tell. But one thing is clear: the new court is no lapdog of the Bush administration, and the new swing voter is no fan of unfettered executive power.

At Guantanamo, Dying Is Not Permitted (TIME)

By Adam Zagorin

DOJ_NMG_0037722

Time, July 1, 2006

A TIME Investigation: The Supreme Court handed the prisoners at Gitmo a victory, but authorities there continue to use harsh methods to break one of their most common methods of protest — the hunger strike

The prisoners at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, won a major victory this week when the Supreme Court struck down the Bush administration's planned military tribunals. But for many prisoners at the detention facility, the protests haven't stopped. Hunger strikes persist, in what Guantanamo commander Rear Adm. Harry Harris, Jr. has called "asymmetric warfare" — a means to attract attention to their increasingly controversial detention. As a result, the camp's administrators have sought to keep prisoners alive at all cost — because a prisoner's death (as the U.S. found out three weeks ago, when three Gitmo inmates committed suicide) can be a major embarrassment for the U.S. and add fuel to widespread demands for the facility to be shut down.

Civil-liberties advocates point out that Guantanamo's 460 inmates have few other means to make their voices heard, given that most have been detained for more than four years without even being charged with a crime. Indeed, though the U.S. has condemned the hunger strikers at Gitmo, just last year the White House hailed a hunger-striking Iranian dissident for showing "that he is willing to die for his right to express his opinion."

At Gitmo, however, dead prisoners are something the U.S. military wishes devoutly to avoid. So force-feeding has been standard policy at the camp ever since hunger strikes began in early 2002. The facility's top physicians have also told TIME that prisoners who resist are subjected to especially harsh methods. In one case, according to medical records obtained by TIME, a 20-year old named Yusuf al-Shehri, jailed since he was 16, was regularly strapped into a specially designed feeding chair that immobilizes the body at the legs, arms, shoulders and head. Then a plastic tube that is 50% larger, and more painful to insert, than the commonly used variety was inserted up through his nose and down his throat, carrying a nutritional formula into his stomach.

Thousands of people, of course, endure some form of voluntary intra-nasal feeding every day in hospital settings. But when force-feeding is involuntary and the recipient is in a state of high anxiety, the muscles tense up and the procedure can trigger nausea, bleeding, diarrhea and vomiting. "We are humane and compassionate,"; Guantanamo commander Harris told TIME, "but if we tell a detainee to do something, we expect the detainee to do it." As a note scrawled in al-Shehri's medical records put it: "[The prisoner] was informed that dying is not permitted."

Before this year, the feeding chair — marketed as a "padded cell on wheels" by its Iowa manfacturer — was evidently used sparingly. In comments several months ago, SOUTHCOM commander Gen. Bantz Craddock, who oversees Gitmo, joked that at least hunger strikers got to choose the color of their feeding tube (yellow was a favorite), and the flavor of the lozenges used to soothe thoats irritated by the feeding tubes. "Look, they get choices," Craddock said at the time. "And that's part of the problem." At the peak of a protest last fall, 131 protesters, or more than 25%, were on hunger strikes.

But in January, say lawyers for the prisoners and other critics of conditions there, camp overseers finally got fed up with protesters undermining camp discipline and overtaxing the medical staff, who often had to spend 15 hours a day feeding obstreperous inmates. Dr. Ronald Sollock, the camp's chief physician, told TIME bluntly that gentler force-feeding techniques of the past were a"failure." He says that without being strapped down, some inmates would try to pull out their nasal tubes, and even strike medical personnel. Worse, some continued to lose weight, by forcing themselves to vomit after being force-fed."We had to take steps to prevent that, but we only do what is medically necessary in a humane and compassionate manner," says Sollock.

The tougher stance on feeding did have an effect on prisoners' willingness to go on hunger strikes."A lot of detainees said, 'I don't want to put up with this. This is too much of a hassle,'" says Craddock. Asked whether the new methods represented an"effective deterrent" to hunger striking, he answered,"Yeah."

Officially, force-feeding at Gitmo is done with a tube 3mm. (or about .1 in.) across, the same size used in American hospitals. In a sworn statement last year, Gitmo's top physician at the time, Dr. John Edmondson, noted that"smaller tubes which remained in the patient for longer periods were more comfortable [and] easier to manage for medical personnel."

Al-Shehri's medical records, however, document the use of the larger tubes, which experts say have no medical purpose in this context. Al-Shehri's lawyer has also filed court documents citing lesions and bleeding caused when guards held him by the chin and hair, strapped down, as a medical staffer"forcefully inserted the tube in his nose and down his throat" The lawyer also charges that al-Sherhri was subject to verbal and religious abuse during force-feeding, asserting that the tubes"were viewed by the detainees as objects of torture." The records also show that instead of leaving the tube in place to avoid the possible trauma of repeated insertions, al-Shehri had his introduced and withdrawn at each of his two daily feedings.

And this leads to another problem. According to al-Shehri's records and Gitmo doctors, a typical feeding lasts about two hours, with the inmate left in the restraint chair for roughly 45 minutes afterward. During the feeding period, the prisoner will receive as much as 1.5 liters of formula, which, in the case of hunger strikers, can be more than their stomachs can comfortably hold. This can produce what is euphemistically called "dumping syndrome," an uncomfortable, even painful bout of nausea, vomiting, bloating, diarrhea, and shortness of breath. And those are precisely the symptoms that al-Shehri and many other force-fed prisoners have reported to their lawyers.

In March, as a result of these allegations, more than 250 medical professionals signed an open letter to the British medical journal The Lancet, demanding an end to force-feeding. They cited the code of ethics of the American Medical Association and the World Medical Association, both of which condemn the force-feeding of prisoners as an assault on human dignity — so long as they're capable of making an informed decision not to eat. But that's the conundrum: How do you know what is an informed decision at Gitmo? Are detainees there, who are imprisoned in an isolated environment far from their families for an indefinite period, capable of making a rational and autonomous choice to starve themselves?

The code of ethics has been put to the test several times in the past, most notably during the 1980s, when several Irish Republican Army prisoners staged hunger strikes in British prisons. A handful died, and the episode was seen as evidence of Margaret Thatcher's toughness. At Gitmo, however, the death of a prisoner could ignite riots in the Muslim world. In that context, the Pentagon believes that keeping detainees alive at all costs is very much in the nation's security interest.

It's equally in the prisoners' interests to have someone die. According to Col Mike Bumgarner, who oversees the detention camps on a day-to-day basis, several prisoners have told him of a"vision, or a dream — implicitly a message from God — that if three detainees die it will attract enough attention so that they will all get out of Guantanamo." It needn't be by starvation: according to newly declassified docouments, two prisoners, one of whom was al-Shehri, tried to commit suicide on May 18 by swallowing hoarded anti-anxiety medication. Those attempts triggered a search, which in turn led to the most serious rioting in the history of Camp Delta. And on May 29, yet another round of hunger strikes began. It started with 75 prisoners, rose to 89 a few days later, and then suddenly began to fade away. Recent communications by Gitmo inmates with their lawyers, and obtained by TIME, indicate that harsh force-feeding methods were used to end the hunger strikes. The military has offered no explanation for the drop-off in hunger strikers.

Bumgarner has said the prisoners' objective is to push the number of strikers above 100, as they did last fall. But additional medical personnel are ready to be shipped in to force-feed them if they do. "We used to over-react, and the detainees saw that we got worried if they were not eating," he says."Now we have a system. I tell them, 'Have at it. If you want to have 460 hunger strikers, we'll get 460 doctors in here to take care of you.' They will not succeed."

Yet hunger strikers have already won a measure of success. In part because of their protests, and the attention focused on Guantanamo, the U.S. is facing growing criticism — from both allies and enemies — for the rules of detention at the camp. Now the Supreme Court's Hamdan decision effectively grants prisoners at least some of their longstanding demands, including more rights at trial. All the same, most of them are unlikely to be released soon. Indeed, authorities are currently constructing a new, state-of-the-art, $30 million prison at Guantanamo, where they plan to consolidate many of the camp's maximum-security inmates. Harris argues the camp will be needed for the forseeable future, and that refusing to eat is not a cry for help, but a ploy drawn from the al-Qaeda playbook calculated to attract media attention and force the U.S. government to back down."The will to resist of these detainees is high,' says Harris."They are waging their war, their jihad against America, and we just have to stop them."

A Blessing In Disguise For Bush (FT)

By Christopher Caldwell

Financial Times, July 1, 2006

When the US Supreme Court ruled on Thursday that Salim Hamdan, Osama bin Laden's former driver and an alleged terrorist, could not be tried before a special commission set up at the US military prison in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, American newspapers described the rebuke to George W. Bush as "sweeping" and "stunning". Observers abroad, particularly in Europe, giddily suggested that Guantánamo had been discredited. In the drama of the moment, it was easy to lose sight of the court's insistence that the case neither questioned nor even addressed the US government's power to detain Mr Hamdan "for the duration of active hostilities". Since Guantánamo does not agitate US public opinion in the way that overseas sceptics of the war on terror would assume, the five-to-three decision will wreak no sea change in politics, nor harm Mr Bush. As November elections heave into view, it could just as easily help him.

There were three rationales for the decision – and all were necessary in order to reach it. The first – that of John Paul Stevens, the court's most leftwing justice – is that the tribunals are unconstitutional because of the nature of Guantánamo. These passages excited human rights activists, but Mr Stevens's language was measured and left open the possibility of finding another way to prosecute those imprisoned. Then, Justice Anthony Kennedy sought more assurance that the Guantánamo commissions were militarily necessary. Finally, Justice Stephen Breyer held that the system of military commissions was indeed unconstitutional, but primarily because Mr Bush had not consulted Congress first. This is a separation-of-powers argument rather than a human rights one. Mr Breyer noted that: "Nothing prevents the president from returning to Congress to seek the authority he believes necessary."

In fact, if Congress were to pass legislation re-establishing the very same courts just struck down, it is possible they would pass constitutional muster. Not for nothing did Senator Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, call the decision a "road map" for making the tribunals legal. It is striking how small some of the necessary adjustments would be. For instance, the court held that the Bush administration violated article 36 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which has been interpreted to say the rules of a special military commission ought, as far as possible, to resemble those of an ordinary court martial. The president would have been in a stronger constitutional position if he had made an "official determination that it is impracticable to apply the rules for court martial" in Guantánamo. Well, then, he can make one.

Not much is at stake anyway in setting courtroom rules for cases such as Mr Hamdan's. He can still be tried under a court martial or he can be tried in US criminal courts. American juries can be fickle but they are less so when they are invited to try foreign enemies of the state. The former anti-American strongman of Panama, Manuel Antonio Noriega, has been serving a 40-year sentence for drug trafficking in Florida since shortly after the US invasion of Panama in 1989.

A more likely outcome is that Mr Hamdan will eventually be tried by a modified, congressionally approved military commission. If so, this week's decision is a blessing in disguise for Mr Bush. It gives him a face-saving way to release prisoners whom the US is holding in error, without appearing to bow to international pressure, and without requiring any lenience towards the prisoners the US does want to hold (decidedly including Mr Hamdan). As the court lives up to its populist caricature as meddlesome and over-punctilious, Mr Bush is strengthened politically. He said during a press conference on Thursday: "I'm not going to jeopardise the safety of the American people." Particularly in an election year, no politician is going to present himself to the public as the champion of Osama bin Laden's chauffeur.

Mr Bush, much like everyone else, is groping for an intellectual handhold on the problem of terrorism. The laws of war grow unsettled as "privatisation" spreads to warfare from other walks of life. Warren Buffett and the Gates Foundation are picking up some of the foreign aid and social service spending that used to be done by governments. In belt-tightening welfare states, credit cards make it possible to "privatise" some of the national debt. And at a time when both grievances and arms trading are globalised, outfits such as al-Qaeda have broken the nation state's monopoly on military aggression.

Terrorism has been a confusing crossroads of criminal and military law for decades – take the battle in 1981 over whether to treat IRA prisoners involved in the "H-Block" hunger strikes as delinquents or soldiers. But these questions were never big or urgent enough to upset the whole paradigm of military justice. Now, with the rise of al-Qaeda, they are. Since Mr Hamdan is a combatant, it may be a violation of common sense to try him simply as an unruly citizen. Since he is an irregular combatant, perhaps he cannot claim the same protections under the Geneva conventions that regular uniformed soldiers can. Mr Bush tried to address such issues with a hybrid civilian-military system of his own devising. The court held that that is not Mr Bush's job. But alternatives are still thin on the ground. At the heart of this week's case was the assertion of Mr Hamdan's lawyers that "conspiracy" was not a crime covered by the laws of war. Only four of the nine justices were receptive to that view.

If Mr Hamdan is not to be tried as a war criminal, it is because of a new ambiguity that surrounds the word “war”, rather than a new ambiguity that surrounds the word “criminal”. What do you charge a person like Mr Hamdan with? Even if Mr Bush has come up with the wrong answer, Americans are not about to punish him for thinking that it is the right question.

The Power Of The President, Curbed (NYT)

By Edwin S. Matthews Jr.

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

To the Editor:

Before any of us instinctively rise to criticize the Supreme Court for being soft on terrorists based upon its decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, let us not overlook that the court stood up to protect us all.

The right to be present at our trial, the right to know what evidence the state presents against us, the right to be defended by counsel we choose and the right under the Geneva Conventions to benefit from "all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples," which this decision preserves, belong to us all.

Our government has denied prisoners in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, these rights and could under many other circumstances deny them to any of us.

No war against anything justifies the denial of such essential rights.

Bloomberg, July 1, 2006

June 30 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. National Security Agency asked AT&T Inc. to help it set up a domestic call monitoring site seven months before the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks, lawyers claimed June 23 in court papers filed in New York federal court.

The allegation is part of a court filing adding AT&T, the nation's largest telephone company, as a defendant in a breach of privacy case filed earlier this month on behalf of Verizon Communications Inc. and BellSouth Corp. customers. The suit alleges that the three carriers, the NSA and President George W. Bush violated the Telecommunications Act of 1934 and the U.S. Constitution, and seeks money damages.

``The Bush Administration asserted this became necessary after 9/11," plaintiff's lawyer Carl Mayer said in a telephone interview. ``This undermines that assertion."

The lawsuit is related to an alleged NSA program to record and store data on calls placed by subscribers. More than 30 suits have been filed over claims that the carriers, the three biggest U.S. telephone companies, violated the privacy rights of their customers by cooperating with the NSA in an effort to track alleged terrorists.

``The U.S. Department of Justice has stated that AT&T may neither confirm nor deny AT&T's participation in the alleged NSA program because doing so would cause `exceptionally grave harm to national security' and would violate both civil and criminal statutes," AT&T spokesman Dave Pacholczyk said in an e-mail.

U.S. Department of Justice spokesman Charles Miller and NSA spokesman Don Weber declined to comment.

Pioneer Groundbreaker

The NSA initiative, code-named ``Pioneer Groundbreaker," asked AT&T unit AT&T Solutions to build exclusively for NSA use a network operations center which duplicated AT&T's Bedminster, New Jersey facility, the court papers claimed. That plan was abandoned in favor of the NSA acquiring the monitoring technology itself, plaintiffs' lawyers Bruce Afran said.

The NSA says on its Web site that in June 2000, the agency was seeking bids for a project to ``modernize and improve its information technology infrastructure." The plan, which included the privatization of its ``non-mission related" systems support, was said to be part of Project Groundbreaker.

Mayer said the Pioneer project is ``a different component" of that initiative.

DOJ_NMG_0037726

Mayer and Afran said an unnamed former employee of the AT&T unit provided them with evidence that the NSA approached the carrier with the proposed plan. Afran said he has seen the worker's log book and independently confirmed the source's participation in the project. He declined to identify the employee.

Stop Suit

On June 9, U.S. District Court Judge P. Kevin Castel in New York stopped the lawsuit from moving forward while the Federal Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation in Washington rules on a U.S. request to assign all related telephone records lawsuits to a single judge.

Robert Varettoni, a spokesman for Verizon, said he was unaware of the allegations against AT&T and declined to comment.

Earlier this week, he issued a statement on behalf of the company that Verizon had not been asked by the NSA to provide customer phone records from either its hard-wired or wireless networks. Verizon also said that it couldn't confirm or deny ``whether it has any relationship to the classified NSA program."

Mayer's lawsuit was filed following a May 11 USA Today report that the U.S. government was using the NSA to monitor domestic telephone calls. Earlier today, USA Today said it couldn't confirm its contention that BellSouth or Verizon had contracts with the NSA to provide a database of domestic customer phone call records.

Jeff Battcher, a spokesman for Atlanta-based BellSouth, said that vindicated the company.

``We never turned over any records to the NSA," he said in a telephone interview. ``We've been clear all along that they've never contacted us. Nobody in our company has ever had any contact with the NSA."

The case is McMurray v. Verizon Communications Inc., 06cv3650, in the Southern District of New York.

Lawmakers: NSA Database Incomplete (USAT)

USA Today, July 1, 2006

Some who were briefed about the database identify who participated and who didn't

WASHINGTON — Members of the House and Senate intelligence committees confirm that the National Security Agency has compiled a massive database of domestic phone call records. But some lawmakers also say that cooperation by the nation's telecommunication companies was not as extensive as first reported by USA TODAY on May 11.

Several lawmakers, briefed in secret by intelligence officials about the program after the story was published, described a call records database that is enormous but incomplete. Most asked that they not be identified by name, and many offered only limited responses to questions, citing national security concerns.

In the May 11 article that revealed the database, USA TODAY reported that its sources said AT&T, BellSouth and Verizon had agreed to provide the NSA with call records.

AT&T, which is the nation's largest telecommunications company, providing service to tens of millions of Americans, hasn't confirmed or denied its participation with the database. BellSouth and Verizon have denied that they contracted with the NSA to turn over phone records. On May 12, an attorney for former Qwest CEO Joseph Nacchio confirmed the USA TODAY report that Qwest had declined to participate in the NSA program.

Most members of the intelligence committees wouldn't discuss which companies cooperated with the NSA. However, several did offer more information about the program's breadth and scope, confirming some elements of USA TODAY's report and contradicting others:

•Nineteen lawmakers who had been briefed on the program verified that the NSA has built a database that includes records of Americans' domestic phone calls. The program collected records of the numbers dialed and the length of calls, sources have said, but did not involve listening to the calls or recording their content.

•Five members of the intelligence committees said they were told by senior intelligence officials that AT&T participated in the NSA domestic calls program.

AT&T, asked to comment, issued a written statement Thursday. “The U.S. Department of Justice has stated that AT&T may neither confirm nor deny AT&T's participation in the alleged NSA program because doing so would cause ‘exceptionally grave harm to national security' and would violate both civil and criminal statutes," it said. "Under these circumstances, AT&T is not able to respond to such allegations."

•Five members of the intelligence committees said they were told that BellSouth did not turn over domestic call records to the NSA.

Asked about BellSouth's denial, Sen. Saxby Chambliss, R-Ga., a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, said, "What they said appears to be accurate."

Still, BellSouth customers' call records could end up in the NSA database, he said. "Obviously, a BellSouth customer can contract with AT&T (for long-distance phone service). There is a possibility that numbers are available from other phone companies."

•Three lawmakers said that they had been told that Verizon did not turn over call records to the NSA. However, those three and another lawmaker said MCI, the long-distance carrier that Verizon acquired in January, did provide call records to the government.

While Verizon has denied providing call records to the NSA, it has declined to comment on whether MCI participated in the calls database program.

"The President has referred to an NSA program, which he authorized, directed against al-Qaeda," Verizon said in a written statement May 12. "Because that program is highly classified, Verizon cannot comment on that program, nor can we confirm or deny whether we have had any relationship to it." The statement also said the company was now "ensuring that Verizon's policies are implemented at that entity (MCI) and that all its activities fully comply with law."

In the weeks since the database was revealed, congressional and intelligence sources have offered other new details about its scope and effectiveness.

"It was not cross-city calls. It was not mom-and-pop calls," said Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, who receives briefings as chairman of the Senate Appropriations Defense subcommittee. "It was long-distance. It was targeted on (geographic) areas of interest, places to which calls were believed to have come from al-Qaeda affiliates and from which calls were made to al-Qaeda affiliates."

Other lawmakers who were briefed about the program expressed concerns that gaps in the database could undercut its usefulness in identifying terrorist cells.

"It's difficult to say you're covering all terrorist activity in the United States if you don't have all the (phone) numbers," Chambliss said. "It probably would be better to have records of every telephone company."

"The database is not complete," said another lawmaker who was briefed on the program, speaking on condition of anonymity because the information is classified. "We don't know if this works yet."

Other publications have characterized the breadth of the database and how it is used.

The New York Times reported on May 12, for instance, that a senior government official had confirmed that the NSA had access to records of most telephone calls in the USA but said the records are used in a limited way to track "known bad guys."

The Washington Post reported on May 12 that "sources with knowledge of the program" said that the Bush administration had been collecting the domestic telephone records in "gargantuan databases" and that the "companies cooperating with the NSA dominate the U.S. telecommunications market and connect hundreds of billions of telephone calls each year."

President Bush and his top aides have defended the legality of the program, although they haven't directly confirmed its existence.

Three days after the USA TODAY story was published, national security adviser Stephen Hadley said on CBS' Face the Nation that he couldn't "confirm or deny the claims that are in the USA TODAY story."

He went on: "But it's very interesting what that story does not claim. It does not claim that the government was listening on domestic phone calls. It does not claim that names were passed, that addresses were passed, that content was passed. It's really about calling records, if you read the story. … There are a variety of ways in which those records lawfully can be provided to the government."

At a news conference two weeks later, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made a similar point. "There has been no confirmation about any details relating to the USA TODAY story," he said. "I will say that what was in the USA TODAY story did relate to business records." Citing a 1979 Supreme Court decision, he said, "There is no reasonable expectation of privacy in those kinds of records."

Lawmakers who were briefed about the program disagree about whether it's legal.

"It was within the president's inherent powers," said Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee.

Rep. Anna Eshoo, D-Calif., a member of the House Intelligence Committee, said there was a "schizophrenia in the presentation" by the administration. Officials say, " 'It's legal,' " she said. "But in the same breath they say, 'Perhaps we should take another look at FISA.' " FISA refers to the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which established a secret court that can grant warrants for eavesdropping.

Rep. Rush Holt, D-N.J., another member of the House Intelligence Committee, said, "I find it interesting that it seems the government is asking telephone companies to do things that their customers and shareholders would find totally unpalatable."

Debate over the database continues in several areas:

•In federal courts, at least 20 class-action lawsuits have been filed alleging that the government and phone companies have violated the rights of people whose calls have been reviewed by the NSA. The Justice Department signaled its intention in a court filing in Chicago this month to assert the "military and state secrets privilege" in all of them. That privilege allows the government to seek the dismissal of lawsuits if pursuing them would imperil national security.

•In New Jersey, the state attorney general is investigating whether telephone companies released confidential information without the consent of their customers. The federal government asked a court this month to quash subpoenas the state had issued to phone companies seeking information.

•At the Federal Communications Commission, the American Civil Liberties Union requested this month that approval of AT&T's acquisition of BellSouth be withheld until the commission reviews the companies' dealings with the NSA. However, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin said last month that the commission couldn't investigate complaints about the phone companies and the NSA because the reported activities were classified.

•On Capitol Hill, Vice President Cheney held private talks this month with Republicans on the Senate Judiciary Committee. Cheney discouraged them from supporting Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter's vow to call telecommunications executives before the panel to answer questions about the database. Specter, R-Pa., protested to Cheney in an angry public letter.

The White House then agreed to talks with Specter on legislation he has drafted that would give the administration the option of putting the NSA's warrantless-surveillance program — which includes domestic wiretapping without a court warrant when one participant in a conversation is overseas — under the scrutiny of the FISA court.

"I'm prepared to defer, on a temporary basis, calling in the telephone companies," Specter said. If the discussions on his legislation fall through, however, he said, he will move again to demand testimony from the telephone executives about the database.

A Note To Our Readers (USAT)

On May 11, USA TODAY reported that the National Security Agency, with the cooperation of several of America's leading telecommunications companies, had compiled a database of domestic phone call records in an effort to monitor terrorist activity.

Several days later, BellSouth and Verizon specifically denied that they were among the companies that had contracted with the NSA to provide bulk calling records.

The denial was unexpected. USA TODAY had spoken with BellSouth and Verizon for several weeks about the substance of the report. The day before the article was published, the reporter read the sections of the article concerning BellSouth and Verizon to representatives of the companies and asked for a denial before publication.

At the time, BellSouth did not deny participation in the program, but it issued a statement saying the company "does not provide any confidential customer information to the NSA or any government agency without proper legal authority." Verizon said that it would not comment on national security matters and that it acts "in full compliance with the law" and with respect for customers' privacy.

On May 15, BellSouth said it could not categorically deny participation in the program until it had conducted a detailed investigation. BellSouth said that internal review concluded that the company did not contract with the NSA or turn over calling records.

USA TODAY continued to pursue details of the database, speaking with dozens of sources in the telecommunications, intelligence and legislative communities, including interviews with members of Congress who have been briefed by senior intelligence officials on the domestic calls program.

In the adjoining article, USA TODAY reports that five members of the congressional intelligence committees said they had been told in secret briefings that BellSouth did not turn over call records to the NSA, three lawmakers said they had been told that Verizon had not participated in the NSA database, and four said that Verizon's subsidiary MCI did turn over records to the NSA.

USA TODAY also spoke again with the sources who had originally provided information about the scope and contents of the domestic calls database. All said the published report accurately reflected their knowledge and understanding of the NSA program, but none could document a contractual relationship between BellSouth or Verizon and the NSA, or that the companies turned over bulk calling records to the NSA.

Based on its reporting after the May 11 article, USA TODAY has now concluded that while the NSA has built a massive domestic calls record database involving the domestic call records of telecommunications companies, the newspaper cannot confirm that BellSouth or Verizon contracted with the NSA to provide bulk calling records to that database.

USA TODAY will continue to report on the contents and scope of the database as part of its ongoing coverage of national security and domestic surveillance.

Newspaper Hedges On Report Of Phone Companies And Data (NYT)

By Matt Richtel

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

In a note to readers yesterday, USA Today backed off an assertion that BellSouth and Verizon had contracted to provide telephone calling records to the National Security Agency.

The note referred to an article published May 11 that said the two companies and AT&T had provided such records, without warrants, for a database the security agency was compiling to detect terrorist activity.

BellSouth and Verizon have since denied participation in such a program. AT&T has declined to comment on the matter.

In an article that accompanied its note to readers, USA Today said 19 members of Congress briefed on the program had affirmed that the security agency built a database of Americans' domestic calls, including length of calls and numbers dialed.

Congressional officials said yesterday that they could not confirm details of that account, but a Democratic aide said Democrats would press for more details of the security agency's domestic wiretapping and call-logging at a hearing on July 19.

The USA Today report in May intensified debate over whether the battle against terrorism was compromising individual liberties and privacy and how. Telecommunications law requires a court order to obtain calling records, but there is disagreement about whether exceptions may be made when the government cites national security considerations.

"Based on its reporting after the May 11 article, USA Today has now concluded that while the N.S.A. has built a massive domestic calls record database involving the domestic call records of telecommunications companies, the newspaper cannot confirm that BellSouth or Verizon contracted with the N.S.A. to provide bulk calling records to that database," the newspaper wrote in its note to readers.

Records turned over by carriers might be only one of several sources for such a database. The New York Times reported in December that the security agency had gained backdoor access to streams of domestic and international phone and e-mail traffic with the cooperation of telecommunications companies.

The USA Today article on May 11, written by Leslie Cauley, a longtime telecommunications reporter, was based on interviews with unidentified sources said to have had knowledge of the arrangement.

Steven Anderson, a spokesman for USA Today, said yesterday that the newspaper had one of the strictest policies in the industry regarding the use of unidentified sources, and "we have no plans to change our existing policy." Nor, Mr. Anderson said, did the paper anticipate any action regarding any staff members involved in the article.

"At the heart of our report is the fact that the N.S.A. is collecting phone call records of Americans, reaching into homes and businesses, and there have been no denials that the database exists," he said.

A BellSouth spokesman, Jeff Battcher, said yesterday: "As we have stated numerous times, the N.S.A. never contacted BellSouth, and we never supplied customer calling records to the N.S.A. In addition, we do not and have never had a contract with the N.S.A."

BellSouth had previously demanded a retraction of the May 11 article.

In the aftermath of the USA Today article in May, The New York Times reported that the security agency's efforts to collect phone data appeared to be focusing not on the local service phone companies, like BellSouth, Verizon and Qwest, but on the long-distance companies, including the former MCI and AT&T.

In mid-May, Verizon issued a statement saying it had not turned over calling records to the security agency, but it left open the possibility that MCI, which it recently acquired, had done so. Verizon said yesterday that it had no further comment.

USA Today said yesterday that the denials in the aftermath of its May 11 article were "unexpected," noting that the reporter had read sections of the article to both BellSouth and Verizon before publication, seeking comment. At that point, neither company denied cooperation, the newspaper said, but both affirmed their policies of acting in compliance with the law and with respect for their customers' privacy.

For its part, AT&T said yesterday: "The news media have carried reports alleging that AT&T is participating in an N.S.A. terrorist surveillance program. Unfortunately, the law does not permit AT&T to respond to those allegations."

AT&T is the name taken by SBC Communications, the nation's largest provider of local phone service, after it acquired the AT&T long-distance business last year.

USA Today Takes Back Some Of NSA Phone-Record Report (WP)

By Frank Ahrens And Howard Kurtz

USA Today has acknowledged that it cannot prove key elements of a blockbuster May 11 story in which it reported that several telecommunications companies were handing over customer phone records to the National Security Agency.

The May article named AT&T Inc., Verizon Communications Corp. and BellSouth Corp. as cooperating with the NSA in compiling an unprecedented database of domestic phone records. Though the NSA was not listening to calls, the spy agency was scouring the records to search for ties to terrorism, the paper said.

The report angered the White House, alarmed privacy advocates and sent other news media scurrying to match the story.

Yesterday, in a lengthy article and accompanying "note to our readers," the nation's largest-circulation newspaper said it could not confirm that BellSouth or Verizon contracted with the NSA, which is charged with intercepting and analyzing foreign communications to look for possible threats to U.S. national security.

The correction illustrates the difficulty of reporting sensitive and often classified government actions, as anonymous sources sometimes backtrack, pursue their own agendas by leaking selective information or say more than they know. News organizations attempt to assemble authoritative stories from multiple sources and agencies, creating plenty of room for potential error.

"We take every error seriously," USA Today Editor Ken Paulson said in an interview. "This was obviously a big story. . . . All we can do is set the record straight."

Reporter Leslie Cauley revealed her unidentified sources to a top editor, Paulson said, and "the sources are credible," adding, "They have a track record with Leslie and she trusts them." But several members of the congressional intelligence committees later contradicted the sources on the question of whether Verizon and BellSouth had provided information to the NSA.

USA Today stood by much of its initial report, saying it had followed up with lawmakers and intelligence and telecom sources. Yesterday's article reported: "Members of the House and Senate intelligence committees confirm that the National Security Agency has compiled a massive database of phone call records."

In the next sentence, the paper wrote: "But some lawmakers also say that cooperation by the nation's telecommunication companies was not as extensive as first reported by USA Today on May 11."

Yesterday, Verizon said it had no further comment on the matter, referring instead to its May 16 rebuttal of the USA Today story.

USA Today said the BellSouth and Verizon denials that came after the May 11 article were "unexpected." The paper said its reporters read sections of the article to sources at the companies and gave them the opportunity to deny their involvement. BellSouth did not deny its participation, and Verizon said it would not comment on national security issues.

So USA Today ran the story. Later, BellSouth said it had conducted an internal investigation into the matter and concluded that the company did not contract with the NSA or turn over phone records, the paper reported yesterday.

"As we have stated numerous times, the NSA never contacted BellSouth, and we never supplied customer calling records to the NSA," BellSouth spokesman Jeff Battcher wrote in an e-mail. "In addition we do not and have never had a contract with the NSA."

Some conservative bloggers instantly reacted to the USA Today correction by citing it as another example of what some on the right see as liberal, anti-Bush sentiment in the "mainstream media."

Some liberal bloggers noted the USA Today story accompanying the correction as further proof of domestic spying by the government but did not mention the correction.

AP, July 1, 2006

USA Today acknowledged in a "note to our readers" Friday that it could not establish that BellSouth or Verizon contracted with the National Security Agency to provide it with customer calling records, as it previously reported.

But spokesman Steve Anderson said "this is an important story that holds up well. At the heart of our report is the fact that NSA is collecting phone call records of millions of Americans."

"What we address in the editors' note," he said, "deals with the fact that we originally reported that the telephone companies were working under contract with the NSA. We've concluded that we cannot establish that BellSouth or Verizon entered into a contract with the NSA to provide the bulk calling records."

In an accompanying story, the newspaper reported Friday that lawmakers on House and Senate intelligence committees have said that while the NSA has amassed a huge database calling records, cooperation with the NSA by telephone companies was not as extensive USA Today initially reported on May 11.

USA Today at that time reported that, according to its sources, AT&T Inc., BellSouth Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc. all agreed to provide the agency with domestic call records. The newspaper said Friday that Verizon and BellSouth deny they contracted to provide the NSA with records of their customers' phone calls. AT&T has neither confirmed nor denied the newspaper's report.

Some lawmakers briefed on the program said NSA has a database of domestic calls that includes numbers called and the length of conversations, but not what was said. Five members of the intelligence committees said they'd been told by intelligence officials that AT&T, the nation's largest telecommunications company, did cooperate in providing NSA with call records.

Five lawmakers on the intelligence committees said they'd been told that BellSouth did not turn over call records, and three lawmakers said they'd been informed that Verizon did not turn over call records to the NSA.

Lawmakers who support the Bush administration's domestic spying program see the apparent gaps in the database as a problem.

"It's difficult to say you're covering all terrorist activity in the United States if you don't have all the (phone) numbers," Sen. Saxby Chambliss, R-Ga., told USA Today. "It probably would be better to have records of every telephone company."

In its note to readers, USA Today vowed to "continue to report on the contents and scope of the database as part of its ongoing coverage of national security and domestic surveillance."

Said Anderson: "There have been no denials that this database exists. Nineteen members of Congress who have been briefed following the May 11 article have confirmed the existence of the database."

USA Today Backs Off Of NSA Phone-Record Details (WSJ)

By Sarah Ellison

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

USA Today backed off key elements of its May 11 page-one article that said telephone companies were helping the National Security Agency amass a database of Americans' domestic phone records.

In a "note to our readers" that ran on page 2 of Friday's edition, USA Today acknowledged that subsequent reporting had been unable to confirm a key point in the article: that BellSouth Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc. had "contracted" with the NSA "to provide bulk calling records to that database."

An article accompanying the note cited interviews with several lawmakers briefed about the NSA's phone-surveillance programs to conclude that "cooperation by the nation's telecommunications companies was not as extensive as first reported by USA Today on May 11."

The newspaper said, however, that additional reporting confirmed the existence of the NSA database, a major point of the original article.

USA Today's May 11 article set off a firestorm on Capitol Hill and was cited by dozens of news outlets. The report fueled a debate about whether the Bush administration's fight against terrorism was impinging on privacy rights of Americans. At the same time, phone companies disputed elements of the story; BellSouth demanded a retraction.

USA Today's article said the NSA "has been secretly collecting the phone call records of tens of millions of Americans, using data provided by AT&T, Verizon and BellSouth," citing people with direct knowledge of the arrangement. The three companies "are working under contract with the NSA," the article said. In Friday's note, the paper said it now can't confirm that BellSouth and Verizon contracted with the NSA, but it didn't address AT&T Inc.'s role. The accompanying article, however, cited five lawmakers as saying AT&T "participated in the NSA domestic calls program."

"Reporting on a national-security story is particularly challenging," USA Today editor Ken Paulson said in an interview Friday.

"We know more today than we did before," he added, "and we'll keep reporting on it and we'll continue to learn more. We're trying to be as straightforward and transparent as possible with readers."

Jeff Battcher, a spokesman for BellSouth, said the editor's note and the article speak for themselves.

Verizon referred to a May 16 statement in which it denied that it was approached by the NSA and "entered into an arrangement to provide the NSA with data from its customers' domestic calls."

AT&T, similarly, referred reporters to a June 27 statement, which said AT&T will "vigorously protect our customers' privacy and only share information as specifically authorized by the law."

When Do We Publish A Secret? (NYT)

SINCE Sept. 11, 2001, newspaper editors have faced excruciating choices in covering the government's efforts to protect the country from terrorist agents. Each of us has, on a number of occasions, withheld information because we were convinced that publishing it could put lives at risk. On other occasions, each of us has decided to publish classified information over strong objections from our government.

Last week our newspapers disclosed a secret Bush administration program to monitor international banking transactions. We did so after appeals from senior administration officials to hold the story. Our reports — like earlier press disclosures of secret measures to combat terrorism — revived an emotional national debate, featuring angry calls of "treason" and proposals that journalists be jailed along with much genuine concern and confusion about the role of the press in times like these.

We are rivals. Our newspapers compete on a hundred fronts every day. We apply the principles of journalism individually as editors of independent newspapers. We agree, however, on some basics about the immense responsibility the press has been given by the inventors of the country.

Make no mistake, journalists have a large and personal stake in the country's security. We live and work in cities that have been tragically marked as terrorist targets. Reporters and photographers from both our papers braved the collapsing towers to convey the horror to the world.

We have correspondents today alongside troops on the front lines in Iraq and Afghanistan. Others risk their lives in a quest to understand the terrorist threat; Daniel Pearl of The Wall Street Journal was murdered on such a mission. We, and the people who work for us, are not neutral in the struggle against terrorism.

But the virulent hatred espoused by terrorists, judging by their literature, is directed not just against our people and our buildings. It is also aimed at our values, at our freedoms and at our faith in the self-government of an informed electorate. If the freedom of the press makes some Americans uneasy, it is anathema to the ideologists of terror.

Thirty-five years ago yesterday, in the Supreme Court ruling that stopped the government from suppressing the secret Vietnam War history called the Pentagon Papers, Justice Hugo Black wrote: "The government's power to censor the press was abolished so that the press would remain forever free to censure the government. The press was protected so that it could bare the secrets of the government and inform the people."

As that sliver of judicial history reminds us, the conflict between the government's passion for secrecy and the press's drive to reveal is not of recent origin. This did not begin with the Bush administration, although the polarization of the electorate and the daunting challenge of terrorism have made the tension between press and government as clamorous as at any time since Justice Black wrote.

Our job, especially in times like these, is to bring our readers information that will enable them to judge how well their elected leaders are fighting on their behalf, and at what price.

In recent years our papers have brought you a great deal of information the White House never intended for you to know — classified secrets about the questionable intelligence that led the country to war in Iraq, about the abuse of prisoners in Iraq and Afghanistan, about the transfer of suspects to countries that are not squeamish about using torture, about eavesdropping without warrants.

As Robert G. Kaiser, associate editor of The Washington Post, asked recently in the pages of that newspaper: "You may have been shocked by these revelations, or not at all disturbed by them, but would you have preferred not to know them at all? If a war is being waged in America's name, shouldn't Americans understand how it is being waged?"

Government officials, understandably, want it both ways. They want us to protect their secrets, and they want us to trumpet their successes. A few days ago, Treasury Secretary John Snow said he was scandalized by our decision to report on the bank-monitoring program. But in September 2003 the same Secretary Snow invited a group of reporters from our papers, The Wall Street Journal and others to travel with him and his aides on a military aircraft for a six-day tour to show off the department's efforts to track terrorist financing. The secretary's team discussed many sensitive details of their monitoring efforts, hoping they would appear in print and demonstrate the administration's relentlessness against the terrorist threat.

How do we, as editors, reconcile the obligation to inform with the instinct to protect?

Sometimes the judgments are easy. Our reporters in Iraq and Afghanistan, for example, take great care not to divulge operational intelligence in their news reports, knowing that in this wired age it could be seen and used by insurgents.

Often the judgments are painfully hard. In those cases, we cool our competitive jets and begin an intensive deliberative process.

The process begins with reporting. Sensitive stories do not fall into our hands. They may begin with a tip from a source who has a grievance or a guilty conscience, but those tips are just the beginning of long, painstaking work. Reporters operate without security clearances, without subpoena powers, without spy technology. They work, rather, with sources who may be scared, who may know only part of the story, who may have their own agendas that need to be discovered and taken into account. We double-check and triple-check. We seek out sources with different points of view. We challenge our sources when contradictory information emerges.

Then we listen. No article on a classified program gets published until the responsible officials have been given a fair opportunity to comment. And if they want to argue that publication represents a danger to national security, we put things on hold and give them a respectful hearing. Often, we agree to participate in off-the-record conversations with officials, so they can make their case without fear of spilling more secrets onto our front pages.

Finally, we weigh the merits of publishing against the risks of publishing. There is no magic formula, no neat metric for either the public's interest or the dangers of publishing sensitive information. We make our best judgment.

When we come down in favor of publishing, of course, everyone hears about it. Few people are aware when we decide to hold an article. But each of us, in the past few years, has had the experience of withholding or delaying articles when the administration convinced us that the risk of publication outweighed the benefits. Probably the most discussed instance was The New York Times's decision to hold its article on telephone eavesdropping for more than a year, until editors felt that further reporting had whittled away the administration's case for secrecy.

But there are other examples. The New York Times has held articles that, if published, might have jeopardized efforts to protect vulnerable stockpiles of nuclear material, and articles about highly sensitive counterterrorism initiatives that are still in operation. In April, The Los Angeles Times withheld information about American espionage and surveillance activities in Afghanistan discovered on computer drives purchased by reporters in an Afghan bazaar.

It is not always a matter of publishing an article or killing it. Sometimes we deal with the security concerns by editing out gratuitous detail that lends little to public understanding but might be useful to the targets of surveillance. The Washington Post, at the administration's request, agreed not to name the specific countries that had secret Central Intelligence Agency prisons, deeming that information not essential for American readers. The New York Times, in its article on National Security Agency eavesdropping, left out some technical details.

Even the banking articles, which the president and vice president have condemned, did not dwell on the operational or technical aspects of the program, but on its sweep, the questions about its legal basis and the issues of oversight.

We understand that honorable people may disagree with any of these choices — to publish or not to publish. But making those decisions is the responsibility that falls to editors, a corollary to the great gift of our independence. It is not a responsibility we take lightly. And it is not one we can surrender to the government.

War Of Words On Bank Story (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

Wall Street Journal Editorial Takes Times to Task

For the Wall Street Journal editorial page, there may be no more juicy target than the liberal press appearing to undermine the Bush administration's war on terror.

The White House and congressional Republicans, after all, have spent the past week attacking the New York Times for disclosing a secret program targeting the banking records of suspected terrorists.

The problem: The Journal itself had published a front-page story about the classified program on June 23, the same day as the Times.

The Journal's conservative editorial page weighed in yesterday by arguing that what the two newspapers had done was very different:

"More than a few commentators have tried to link the Journal and Times at the hip. On the left, the motive is to help shield the Times from political criticism. On the right, the goal is to tar everyone in the 'mainstream media.' . . . We suspect that the Times has tried to use the Journal as its political heatshield precisely because it knows our editors have more credibility on these matters."

Later in the day, the Times' publisher, Arthur Sulzberger Jr., returned fire in what has now escalated into a full-fledged battle between the two New York papers.

The Journal editorial board, which operates independently from the newsroom, said a top Treasury Department official had contacted Journal reporter Glenn Simpson and handed him the story. The editorial said Treasury officials decided to "declassify a series of talking points" after failing to persuade the New York Times -- as well as the Los Angeles Times -- to kill the story on grounds that it would neutralize a key administration weapon in the war on terror. The same declassified information was provided to the other two papers, as well as to The Washington Post later on the evening of June 22.

"Our guess," the editorial said, is that Treasury believed Simpson "would write a straighter story than the Times" -- and, it added, "he did."

The editorial makes clear that the administration handed the Journal the same information that President Bush and Vice President Cheney, among others, have been denouncing the Times for publishing.

The Republican-controlled House, in a move clearly aimed at the Times, adopted a resolution Thursday that criticizes the press for publishing details of the classified banking program.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld continued the assault yesterday in an interview with ABC News Radio, saying, "The New York Times, when asked by the United States government, 'Please do not do that, it would cause the loss of American lives,' and they'd go right ahead and print it . . . it tells you a lot about the New York Times, and it certainly tells you a lot about the individual who did that."

In a Fox News poll released yesterday, 60 percent of those surveyed said the Times did more to help terrorist groups by publishing the information, while 27 percent said the story did more to help the public. Forty-three percent called what the newspapers did treason. Just over half said government employees were more to blame for leaking the classified information, 28 percent faulted the media for reporting it, and 17 percent said they were equally to blame.

Simpson, a veteran investigative reporter, had been asking questions about the secret banking program for some time as part of a broader story, but had not nailed it down, according to Journal staffers. That, they say, is how Treasury officials knew to call him.

"Would the Journal have published the story had we discovered it as the Times did, and had the administration asked us not to?" the editorial asks. "Speaking for the editorial columns, our answer is probably not."

So unusual was yesterday's editorial that the Journal's managing editor, Paul Steiger, felt compelled to release a statement about it. "Had Treasury made such a request," he said, "we would have listened to the government's specific concerns, and weighed them seriously before reaching any final decision on publishing. But, having never heard those concerns, I can't guess how we ultimately would have responded."

Editorial Page Editor Paul Gigot will not comment on grounds that the editorial should speak for itself, a spokesman said.

Sulzberger, whom the editorial accuses of deliberately seeking to obstruct the war on terror, offered his own response.

"I know many of the reporters and editors at the Wall Street Journal and have greater faith in their journalistic excellence than does the editorial page of their own paper," Sulzberger said in a statement. "I, for one, do not believe they were unaware of the importance of what they were publishing nor oblivious to the impact such a story would have."

Suspect Plotted To Form A Terrorist Army, U.S. Claims (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, July 1, 2006

The alleged ringleader of a group of South Florida men accused of plotting to blow up Sears Tower in Chicago wanted the blast to divert law enforcement so he could free inmates from a prison to join his terrorist army, federal prosecutors said Friday.

The lead lawyer in the government's terrorism case against the seven men provided fresh details about the group's alleged plot to bomb buildings in Miami and Chicago -- and how the plan disintegrated as members fought among themselves.

The picture that emerged during Friday's hearing in Miami federal court was of an ambitious, but inept, military-style organization whose members had illusions of grandeur and a taste for intrigue.

The men staged a top-secret meeting in the Florida Keys, swore loyalty oaths to al-Qaida, and even put their own leader on trial for treason and insubordination, said prosecutor Jacqueline Arango.

According to the original indictment that led to their arrests on June 22, the group's ultimate goal was to launch an all-out ground war against the U.S. government by blowing up the Sears Tower.

In fact, the plan was even more far-fetched.

The group's alleged ringleader Narseal Batiste thought that bringing down the 110-story Sears Tower would divert law enforcement, allowing him to break into a Chicago-area prison and release the inmates who would then join his army, Arango said.

However, before obtaining any explosives or weapons, the group disbanded over rising suspicions about a government witness who had infiltrated the organization by posing as an al-Qaida member.

Batiste had a final meeting with that informant on May 24 and told him that he still wanted to fulfill his plan, Arango said.

"I want to fight some jihad. That's all I live for," Arango quoted Batiste as saying during the meeting.

At that point, the government decided to end its investigation and arrest the men, Arango said.

DOJ_NMG_0037738

The government's two-hour presentation, which included video recordings made during the investigation, came during a hearing on whether six of the seven men should remain in custody prior to their trial. Arango argued the men should not be released on bail because they pose a danger to the community and might flee.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Ted Bandstra said he would rule after defense lawyers finish presenting evidence next week.

The six men -- Batiste, 32; Patrick Abraham, 26; Stanley Grant Phanor, 31, Naudimar Herrera, 22; Burson Augustin, 21; and Rotschild Augustine, 22 -- each pleaded not guilty Friday to charges that they supported al-Qaida, plotted to destroy buildings using explosives, and conspired to levy war against the government. The seventh man, Lyglenson Lemorin, 31, is in custody in Atlanta.

During the proceeding, defense lawyers for the six sat at a table listening and taking notes. But only John Wylie, who represents Batiste, had a chance to question an FBI agent involved in the investigation.

"Do you have any evidence that Mr. Batiste has met with any terrorist organizations from the Middle East?" Wylie asked.

"No, I do not," Special Agent Tony Velasquez responded.

"Other than the person posing as al-Qaida, is there any evidence of contact with anyone from al-Qaida?" Wylie asked.

"No," Velasquez responded.

According to Arango, the undercover witness pretending to be an al-Qaida agent was introduced to Batiste by an acquaintance, who also cooperated with the FBI. Neither the witness nor the acquaintance were law enforcement agents, Velasquez said.

During several meetings, Batiste spoke to the witness about his desire to bomb the Sears Tower and gave the witness a list of the supplies he would need to carry out his plans, Arango said.

Among the items: $50,000, military uniforms, boots, guns, bulletproof vests, and sports utility vehicles.

But in January, the investigation hit a snag when Batiste went into hiding, telling a friend he was suspicious of the witness.

On Jan. 28, the witness was summoned to the warehouse with the acquaintance who had first introduced him to the group. They were examined for recording devices and driven to Islamorada in the Florida Keys. Batiste was waiting for the men under a bridge.

The incident, which Arango called a kidnapping, solidified Batiste's relationship with the undercover witness.

In March, the seven men pledged oaths of loyalty, or bayat, to al-Qaida and some group members conducted surveillance of potential targets in Miami, including the FBI building, the federal courthouse, and the federal prison, prosecutors say.

As their plans gained momentum, the undercover witness gave Batiste $3,500 to fly in a friend of Batiste from Chicago, Sultan Khanbey.

Khanbey, 51, quickly grew suspicious of the government witness and told Batiste he was being set up by the FBI, Arango said.

On April 17, Khanbey put Batiste on trial for treason and insubordination inside the group's Liberty City headquarters.

Some members of the group sided with Batiste and some sided with Khanbey, causing a rift in the organization, Arango said.

Khanbey was subsequently arrested on weapons charges and could be called as a witness against Batiste.

Two Views Of Terror Suspects: Die-Hards Or Dupes (NYT)

By Christopher Drew And Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

MIAMI, June 30 — The seven men who were arrested here last week on terror charges were shown Friday on undercover videotapes solemnly reciting oaths of loyalty to Al Qaeda, repeating the words that an F.B.I. informant had given them to say.

The tapes, played at a federal court hearing by prosecutors, did not provide any evidence that the men had the money or firepower to blow up the Sears Tower in Chicago and federal buildings in five cities, as they are accused of conspiring to do, or that they had any actual ties to Al Qaeda.

But during her presentation, the prosecutor, Jacqueline M. Arango, disclosed other new details of the case, among them that the group's leader, Narseal Batiste, had asked the undercover informant for rockets and semiautomatic rifles.

Lawyers for some of the men said in interviews this week that their clients knew little about Mr. Batiste's plans to attack the Sears Tower. Some of the lawyers criticized the new evidence presented Friday as a sign that the government had largely concocted other parts of the case and had lured the men into doing more than they would have on their own.

"It's clearly a case of entrapment," said Nathan Clark, the lawyer for one of the defendants, Rotschild Augustine. Mr. Clark said the taped oath was "induced by the government."

The tapes, in fact, made clear the large role that the government informant had played in the case. In one tape, the informant recited what F.B.I. agents said was an authentic Qaeda oath, while the seven men sat on a sofa and chairs in a warehouse that the F.B.I. had wired with eavesdropping equipment. As the informant repeated the words for a second time, each defendant stood and stated his name before they all said in unison that they were committing themselves to the "path of jihad."

But the parents of most of the defendants, including some who have been very critical of the case, appeared surprised by the evidence presented Friday, sitting quietly through the court hearing and refusing to comment afterward.

Over the last week, many critics of the Bush administration described the case as improbable and suggested that it was emblematic of other exaggerated threats that the F.B.I. had often focused on since the Sept. 11 terror attacks, especially inasmuch as federal officials said Mr. Batiste had no ability to carry out the proposed attacks.

But while the new information added to the portrait of Mr. Batiste as a bizarre and self-aggrandizing figure — he told an informant that he would like to smoke a cigarette with Osama bin Laden — it also suggested that he was determined and persistent. The new information indicated that his followers, mostly poor, young Haitian-Americans, were more involved in parts of the scheme than their families and community leaders had suspected.

The prosecutor said some of the men had strip-searched the undercover informant at a time when Mr. Batiste was worried about F.B.I. surveillance, and had also voted to take photographs of several government buildings in Miami that they thought Al Qaeda might want to attack.

Law enforcement officials said that after the men were arrested, at least two admitted some knowledge of the Sears Tower plot. The officials also said that there was ample evidence to bring all of the men into the conspiracy charges, and that after the Sept. 11 attacks, they had no choice but to be aggressive in disrupting any group that showed even the slightest interest in being involved in terrorism.

The Miami case is part of a broader strategy of pre-empting terrorist attacks in what Justice Department officials acknowledge is a significant shift in the way they go about investigating and prosecuting possible terrorism cases.

"We can't afford to wait," a senior Justice Department official said in an interview. The suspects in Miami "were of significant concern, and we're not going to allow them to run into somebody who has the means to carry out what they were talking about."

"You may never know what you prevented," the official added, "but those may be our greatest successes."

The pre-emptive strategy has led to increased use of what amount to sting operations by the F.B.I. to use informants and undercover operatives in gathering evidence against people suspected of terrorist ambitions. The strategy has led to prosecutions and convictions in terrorism cases from San Diego and Houston to Newark and Albany, often involving concocted plots to sell fictitious arms or provide other support to Al Qaeda.

Justice Department officials point to a number of high-profile successes in the campaign, including the convictions of Zacarias Moussaoui, John Walker Lindh, a Muslim-American student in Northern Virginia named Abu Ali and a Virginia cleric named Ali al-Timimi and his followers, who prosecutors said sought to wage war against Americans overseas.

But there have been a smaller number of losses as well, including the collapse of the case against an alleged terrorist cell in Detroit after accusations of prosecutorial misconduct, and the acquittal in Idaho of a graduate student in computer programming on charges of using Web sites to aid terrorists.

"While our record shows many victories in recent years, we haven't always been successful," Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty told reporters last week in assessing the overall strategy of the campaign against terrorism.

The Justice Department says it has brought 441 prosecutions in what it considers to be terrorism-related cases, with 261 convictions and 150 cases remaining.

Mr. Batiste, 32, who is married and has four children, grew up in Louisiana as the son of a Christian preacher and later worked as a FedEx driver in Chicago. He and his wife opened a stucco and masonry business here in 2004, and he rented a small salmon-colored warehouse last year in Liberty City, where he held Bible readings.

And while federal authorities described Mr. Batiste and the other defendants last week as "a radical Islamic group," neighbors say his religious teachings came from the Moorish Science Temple of America, a group founded in Illinois in the early 1900's that blends Christianity, Judaism and Islam with an emphasis on self-discipline through martial arts.

The group's headquarters was a 750-square-foot former convenience store with an old sofa in the back and no running water. People who live near the building, which had no windows or air-conditioning, say they would sometimes see Mr. Batiste and a dozen or so other men there in the evenings, either inside with the doors open or practicing martial arts in the backyard.

Others say that while the group — which called itself the Seas of David — read the Koran at times, Mr. Batiste's favorite text was Jesus' Sermon on the Mount.

At first, relatives and lawyers said, the defendants were intrigued by Mr. Batiste's religious teachings, which some of the men saw as an alternative to the drug-dealing streets in Liberty City, one of Miami's poorest neighborhoods. But by this past April, the lawyers said, some defendants had grown suspicious of Mr. Batiste and had left the group after he seemed to become more focused on raising money than on his religious teachings.

According to the indictment, the criminal investigation began last October, after Mr. Batiste began expressing ominous goals. He told someone who was traveling to Yemen that he wanted to raise an army to overthrow the United States government and needed help, one document says, "in locating foreign Islamic extremists to fund his mission."

After that person tipped the F.B.I., Ms. Arango, the prosecutor, said Friday, the bureau arranged for the undercover informant posing as a terrorist to begin a series of meetings with Mr. Batiste, which stretched from December through late May.

With the government's recording tapes whirring, the indictment says, Mr. Batiste told the informant — who at some point identified himself as being with Al Qaeda — that he wanted to kick off his war with an attack on the Sears Tower. He also asked the informant to supply him with $50,000 in cash and all the equipment, from military boots to weapons, that he and his soldiers would need to "kill all the devils we can."

And by mid-March, the informant had proposed — at a meeting with all seven defendants — bombing F.B.I. buildings in Miami and four other cities. Ms. Arango said that proposal was made just minutes after each of the men had taken the oath to Al Qaeda. Over the next three weeks, using camera equipment supplied by the government, Mr. Batiste and four of the others were involved in either taking photographs or videotapes of government buildings in Miami or delivering them to the informant.

Ms. Arango said the group split up last spring after a religious leader from Chicago had a dispute with Mr. Batiste and some of the other defendants sided with the Chicago man.

Federal officials say they also have other evidence, including statements given by some of the men shortly after they were arrested. At another hearing on Thursday, for instance, officials released a handwritten statement by one of Mr. Batiste's young followers, in which he acknowledged taking the oath to Al Qaeda and being present when Mr. Batiste received a video camera from the undercover informant "to film target locations (Federal Buildings & Tower building) in Miami, FL and Chicago, IL."

State Tracked Protesters In The Name Of Security (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

Officials say they have stopped monitoring antiwar and political rallies. The practice violates civil rights, Atty. Gen. Lockyer says.

SACRAMENTO — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's office in charge of protecting California against terrorism has tracked demonstrations staged by political and antiwar groups, a practice that senior law enforcement officials say is an abuse of civil liberties.

The Times obtained reports prepared for the state Office of Homeland Security in recent months that contain details on the whereabouts and purpose of a number of political demonstrations throughout California.

DOJ_NMG_0037741

The source of the information is listed in some cases as federal law enforcement agencies, including the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, an investigative arm of the U.S. Homeland Security department.

Political activities cited in the reports include:

• An animal rights rally outside a Canadian consulate office in San Francisco to protest the hunting of seals.

• A demonstration in Walnut Creek at which U.S. Rep. George Miller (D-Martinez) and other officials spoke against the war in Iraq.

• A Women's International League for Peace and Freedom gathering at a courthouse in Santa Barbara in support of an antiwar protester — a 56-year-old Salinas woman — facing federal trespassing charges.

California Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer's office learned of the monitoring activity more than two months ago. On Friday, a spokesman condemned the actions, saying they violated the groups' constitutional right of free speech.

"When people exercise their 1st Amendment rights to rally, march and protest, they should not have to worry that intelligence officials are watching them or their activities are in any way being painted with the terrorism brush," Lockyer spokesman Tom Dresslar said in an interview.

"That kind of conduct by anti-terrorism intelligence agencies threatens civil liberties, runs counter to our values and violates this office's policy regarding criminal intelligence gathering," Dresslar said.

The Times obtained two of the reports, which were compiled daily. The state homeland security office declined to release others.

The office is a 53-person operation that grew out of the Sept. 11 attacks and is financed primarily by federal money. Officials there said the details about the rallies were reported by SRA International, a company hired to provide counter-terrorism analysis.

The officials said such information made it into only the two reports that The Times obtained, out of 60-some daily intelligence reports produced since March.

No reports were produced before March, said Chris Bertelli, spokesman for the state office. When officials in the agency learned of the practice, he said, they ordered it stopped.

Copies of the reports were shared with the California Highway Patrol and the attorney general's office. Nothing else was done with the information about the demonstrations, Bertelli said.

The reports are on the letterhead of a California anti-terrorism partnership that includes the homeland security office, the attorney general and the Highway Patrol.

Dresslar said staffers in Lockyer's office saw the reports and raised concerns with their superiors, who complained to the Office of Homeland Security.

"When we discovered their existence, we informed OHS officials that we had absolutely no use for that kind of information," Dresslar said. "Collecting information on protests has no legitimate anti-terrorism intelligence function. None. No intelligence agency has any need to maintain this kind of information."

The reports obtained by The Times contain summaries of news articles about the war in Iraq, animal rights activists and terrorism. One has a section titled "Upcoming California Protests," followed by summaries of the demonstrations. Each includes an entry for "officer safety issues." No issues are cited.

One group whose antiwar rally was in the reports criticized the state agency's practice.

"It seems like a waste of taxpayer dollars and a creeping invasion of our 1st Amendment rights to demonstrate and speak," said Devlin Donnelly, assistant coordinator for the Chico Peace and Justice Center, which held a rally in Chico in March calling for an end to the war in Iraq.

Schwarzenegger had "no information and no knowledge that this was happening," said Adam Mendelsohn, the governor's communications director. "The governor feels that this particular information gathering is totally inappropriate and unacceptable."

Anti-terrorism ideas from the state homeland security office have stirred qualms before.

Past and present members of the attorney general's office said they were troubled by a meeting at the security office last September in which federal and state officials discussed ways to prevent Islamic militants from recruiting prison inmates. In attendance were officials from the FBI, the state Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation and various local law enforcement agencies, according to documents obtained by The Times.

One account of the meeting is provided in a whistle-blower complaint filed by a former high-ranking official in the attorney general's office, Edward Manavian.

The complaint says homeland security information analyst William Hipsley proposed monitoring private conversations in state prisons between inmates and Islamic clergymen and, citing a potential national security threat from Iran, getting a list of Iranians living in California.

State law makes it a felony to eavesdrop on conversations between a person in custody and his attorney, doctor or religious advisor.

Brian Parriott, a spokesman for the state prison system, said it is not the corrections department's practice to listen in on private conversations between inmates and visitors from the clergy.

And Mark Schlosberg, a policy director for the ACLU's San Francisco office, said it is discriminatory to compile databases on broad groups of people based on national origin without any specific link to criminal activity.

"It's contrary to our constitutional protections and our systems, and it's also ineffective in terms of law enforcement," Schlosberg said.

The state homeland security office denied Manavian's version of events and issued rebuttals from Hipsley and a staff member who also attended.

In a written statement, Hipsley said that he never suggested "Muslim clerics offices be 'bugged' " and that the subject of Iran never came up.

George Aradi, an assistant deputy director for information analysis, concurred in a separate statement.

Manavian was demoted in February. In his complaint, he said that happened in part because he refused to cooperate with "attempts to violate the civil rights of citizens in this state."

He resigned in April. His complaint is pending before the state Personnel Board, and a hearing is scheduled in late July.

Lockyer's office publicly criticized the monitoring actions after an inquiry from The Times.

But Allen Benitez, assistant chief of the attorney general's criminal intelligence bureau, had told one of his bosses in a memo April 18 that the security office was gathering information on "political groups" and protests. He voiced concerns that such tracking "may not be allowed under the law."

Lockyer's office handled the matter privately with the security office, Dresslar said.

Questions about the office come at a time when assessments by nonpartisan reviewers have concluded the state is unprepared for a terrorist attack or natural disaster.

Schwarzenegger casts himself as being immersed in efforts to prepare California for disaster, making repeated public visits to the state's emergency command center outside Sacramento, where he has watched over exercises simulating what would happen in a disaster, such as an earthquake or flood.

But a report by the legislative analyst's office last year said California lacks "a unified strategic approach to homeland security."

And more recently, the state's Little Hoover Commission watchdog agency issued a report saying it is unclear who would take charge in the event of an emergency or terrorist attack.

Mystery Surrounds FBI Raid On North Side Mosque (PPG)

By Moustafa Ayad, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, July 1, 2006

Agency calls it part of 'criminal' probe

FBI agents yesterday raided a North Side residence known to many in the neighborhood and the Pittsburgh Islamic community as both an Islamic school and mosque.

The agency would say only that the search was in connection with a "criminal investigation" and wouldn't elaborate.

DOJ_NMG_0037743

The raid began around noon when authorities shut down the intersection of Boyle and Hemlock streets, residents said. The activity centered around a three-story green house located in the 1300 block of Boyle Street. It is home to the Sankore Institute and Light of Age Mosque, which doubles as a school for people seeking to learn the Koran and Islamic religious teachings.

FBI spokesman Jeff Killeen confirmed that the FBI was at the home. Mr. Killeen referred questions to Margaret Philbin, the U.S. attorney's spokeswoman, who said that the FBI executed a search warrant at the home yesterday morning or afternoon.

Authorities did not say if anyone was taken into custody, but residents said several men in tunics and traditional Muslim garb were led out of the house, patted down and searched along Boyle Street. The agents may have executed the raid during Friday prayers known as the Jummah prayer, neighbors said.

The group moved into the neighborhood around February and posted fliers that said "we are here to help you make the North Side a better place to live, worship, work and play." The group urged people "to join us in clothing and feeding the poor, cleaning up our community and making the North Side a safer, more beautiful place for our children."

Neighbors who witnessed the raid said FBI agents surrounded the home for more than four hours yesterday. They said there was a tactical squad at the scene backing up agents.

"It's scary to see guys with guns slung over their shoulders right in front of you," said Harold King, of Avalon, who was visiting a relative.

Muslim community members familiar with the group said the institute is not a part of the seven mosques under the auspices of the Islamic Council of Greater Pittsburgh. Most members of the mosque are African-American, neighbors said.

The home has two entrances, one facing Boyle Street and a side door on Hemlock Street. The Hemlock Street entrance is used by women and the Boyle Street entrance by men, neighbors said. Some orthodox Muslims do not mix genders, unless women are related or married to the men in their company.

"They are some of the nicest people in the neighborhood," said Anthony Carboni, who lives nearby on Sandusky Street. Mr. Carboni said he would often see people at the home playing football outside or hosting cookouts in the neighborhood.

A jitney driver, Andre Hammer, of the North Side, who was driving by the intersection, said he passed by the residence several weeks ago and saw police cars parked outside. Mr. Hammer said he would often see men outside of the home talking.

Gigi Lincoln of Boyle Street said she watched the men being lined up against several houses. Mrs. Lincoln said the agents searched each of the men extensively and then had police dogs walk past them. She said agents also used a robot to enter the home.

She said they loaded some of the men into the back of a white van, but said they did not appear to be handcuffed.

Witold Walczak, legal director for the American Civil Liberties Union of Pennsylvania, said "any time law enforcement officials raid a house of worship it raises concerns," but said it would be premature to comment further.

Unclassified Advice For The New CIA Chief (LAT)

By Garrett Jones, Garrett Jones Served As A Case Officer With The Cia In Africa, Europe And The Middle East For 17 Yea

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

A former case officer outlines the care and handling of spooks.

Because this is the season for gratuitous and unsolicited advice (see any graduation ceremony near you), I thought I would offer some thoughts for former Air Force Gen. Michael V. Hayden, who took over as CIA director a month ago. I am sure many people are sharing their wisdom on the "big picture," so I will confine myself to advice on the care and feeding of the denizens of the building where I once worked.

THEY ARE AN odd bunch at the Central Intelligence Agency, and your predecessor, Porter Goss, did not adapt well. He seemed unable to make it out of the lobby each morning without starting a fistfight. You can do better.

For starters, resist any impulse to "demonstrate who is in charge." The people at the agency have never had any problem understanding who is in charge; they have on occasion had trouble believing that the person in charge knew what he was doing.

As CIA director, Goss said he did not "do" personnel, and inside the agency, it was easily the most resented remark he ever made. You have talented people working for you. Use them, and do not go to the retirees looking for the "perfect" person. They don't make them like they used to, and that's probably a good thing.

Do not try to undo all the personnel changes made by Goss. Some people needed to be pushed out. You're trying to hire back Stephen Kappes, the former field operations boss, as your deputy, and this is good and bad. Many officers respect his operational judgment, and many are angry about his alleged leaks to the media. On your team, he should keep his mouth shut.

Goss let his entourage alienate the entire building before he ever got there. Get your assistants under control. It's better to make your own enemies. You probably brought some military aides with you. Remind them that half the agency does not know the difference between a full colonel and a milkshake; those who do know don't care.

Don't ask anyone to dumb down their work for you. The CIA has a jargon that you need to learn. Before you change anything about agency culture, first you need to understand it.

The executive dining room is a bad idea. You and your staff should be down in the cafeteria meeting people, not huddled up in a bunker wondering what folks think. Listen to people. They are smart and sophisticated and will usually tell you what is wrong if you give them a chance.

The RUMINT (rumor intelligence) on you is that you like "corporate speak" and prefer large, impersonal gatherings to one-on-one encounters. Work on that. Blunt, plain speech will get you further with those in the agency than anything else. If something is going to happen to them, tell them before they see it in the Los Angeles Times. "I do not know" or "I cannot tell you" are statements that spooks accept as sometimes necessary, but they will always find out if you lie to them. You are working with a bunch of spies, so you should not be surprised that RUMINT travels quickly and is surprisingly accurate. Yes, you are busy, but your first job is to make people motivated and effective. Screw this up and you are doomed.

The directorate of operations is where all the spies live. Frankly, this is a tough room. Your best move is to pick someone whom they respect to lead them — lead them, not manage them. When they are in some sand-blown flyspeck in Iraq with their lives on the line, they want a leader who cares about them and their mission, not a nice guy who is good at managing his paperwork. Once you get them a leader, you need to expect the impossible from them. Right now, everyone is afraid to make mistakes. Make it clear that you have confidence in them and will back them even if they do not succeed. This directorate exists to run high-risk, high-payoff operations; otherwise, it could be replaced by Al Jazeera.

The directorate of intelligence is where the analysts live and where the National Intelligence Estimates are produced. This place is a mess. Since the fiasco over Iraqi weapons of mass destruction, it has been full of dead men walking, paralyzed with fear of making another mistake. Start over. Anyone associated with the WMD mess — and there are such people still there — needs to be retired, kicked upstairs or otherwise moved on. It may not be fair, just or efficient, but you must do it to blow the smell of failure out of the organization. Then appoint a pit bull as the quality-control officer for analysis.

Your job is one of the most important in Washington, and one of the toughest. You are playing "Bet your country's future" every day. History has not been kind to your immediate predecessors. They got famous in the worst ways. Good luck. You're going to need it.

WAR NEWS:

Blast Kills 66 In Baghdad Shiite District (AP-Y2)

By Robert H. Reid, Associated Press Writer

A huge car bomb exploded Saturday at a bustling outdoor market in a Shiite district of Baghdad, killing at least 66 people and injuring about 100. It was the deadliest attack since the new national unity government took office six weeks ago and one of the biggest this year.

Shortly before the midmorning blast, gunmen seized a female Sunni legislator at a checkpoint in a Shiite area of the capital. Both attacks represented a major challenge to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's vow to curb sectarian violence that threatens to plunge Iraq into civil war.

In an audio recording posted on the Internet, al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden endorsed the successor to the slain leader of his network in Iraq and warned the country's Shiites against collaborating with the Americans in the fight against Sunni insurgents.

The comments threatened to sharpen the conflict between Shiites and Sunnis even as al-Maliki and his American allies struggled to heal the breach between the country's major religious communities.

The market bombing appeared timed to cause a maximum number of casualties among civilians doing their weekend shopping. It blew some victims onto the roofs of nearby two-story buildings and sent a plume of gray smoke billowing into the sky above Sadr City, stronghold of radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Rescuers sprinted through streets littered with debris of shattered market stalls. Emergency crews bundled the wounded into ambulances and private cars and rushed them to hospitals. Late Saturday, Iraqi state television reported that 66 people died and about 100 were wounded.

The bombing was the deadliest since an April 7 suicide attack that killed 87 people at a Shiite mosque in Baghdad.

A statement posted Saturday on the Internet claimed responsibility for the Sadr City blast in the name of the "Sunna Supporters Group" in retaliation for Shiite attacks on Sunnis. The statement, whose authenticity could not be verified, accused Shiites of killing Sunnis and raping Sunni women in detention.

"Your mujahedeen brothers decided to teach the Shiites a lesson that they will not forget as long as they live," the statement said.

Even before the statement appeared, bystanders in Sadr City blamed Sunni extremists, such as al-Qaida in Iraq, whose leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed in a U.S. airstrike June 7.

"Give us the green light to attack and finish them for once and for all," a group of young men shouted, referring to Sunni militants.

A few miles from the blast, gunmen seized lawmaker Tayseer al-Mashhadani and seven of her bodyguards at a checkpoint in a Shiite area of eastern Baghdad. Officials said she was traveling to Baghdad from her home in nearly Diyala province, a hotbed of sectarian violence, to attend a parliament session Sunday. One of her bodyguards escaped, officials said.

Al-Mashhadani's colleagues in the Iraqi Islamic Party, the largest Sunni political organization, blamed the ministers of interior and defense for failing to restore security in the capital. A party statement alleged that some of the kidnappers carried government-issue weapons.

A top party official, Ayad al-Sammaraie, said such kidnappings were aimed at undermining steps toward national reconciliation by fueling animosity among Iraqis so "they cannot sit together and talk."

The U.S. Embassy condemned the kidnapping as an attempt to stoke sectarian tension and demanded her immediate release.

"We note that Ms. al-Mashhadani is an elected representative of the people of Iraq and that this act is repugnant to all who believe in the right of Iraqis to participate in their country's democracy," the embassy said.

The latest violence occurred as al-Maliki, a Shiite, left for a tour of Persian Gulf countries to brief leaders on his plans for national reconciliation, including amnesty for Sunni Arab insurgents and efforts to heal the Shiite-Sunni rift.

Al-Maliki's first stop was Saudi Arabia, whose government fears that sectarian violence in Iraq could spill over into neighboring countries that are dominated by Sunnis but with large Shiite communities. He is also to visit Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates.

As part of the reconciliation plan, Iraqi and U.S. authorities Saturday freed 495 prisoners from U.S. jails across Iraq, completing a mass release announced by al-Maliki last month. Most of the prisoners were believed to be Sunnis.

"We are prepared in consultation with the Iraqi leaders to make future prisoner releases and to take other concrete steps to facilitate reconciliation," U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said in a statement. "As the government moves forward with these steps, it can count on support from the U.S. government."

U.S. and Iraqi officials had hoped that installation of a new unity government of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds would stem the violence and encourage armed groups to join the political process. Those hopes were buoyed by the death of al-Zarqawi in an airstrike June 7.

However, more than 700 Iraqi civilians and security forces have died violently since al-Zarqawi's death, according to Associated Press figures.

In his Internet statement, bin Laden endorsed Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, named by the terror network as al-Zarqawi's successor, and urged him to step up "the struggle" in Iraq. Bin Laden also warned Iraqi Shiites they "cannot just take part with America and its allies" in the war against Sunni militants "and expect that their areas will be safe from a reaction and harm ."

Two American service members died of non-combat related injuries in two separate incidents, the U.S. military announced.

One was assigned to the Army's 43rd Military Police Brigade. The other was an Air Force member assigned to the 886th Expeditionary Security Forces Squadron at Camp Bucca in southern Iraq, the Air Force said in a separate statement.

No further details were released and names of the victims were withheld pending notification of kin.

Elsewhere, police found a grave in Baghdad containing bodies of at least six men who appeared to have been shot more than a month ago, Lt. Thaer Mahmoud said. The identities of the men were unknown, but their bodies were discovered in a Baghdad area notorious for sectarian killings.

New details emerged into allegations that U.S. soldiers raped an Iraqi woman south of Baghdad in March, then killed her and three family members.

A U.S. official familiar with the investigation told The Associated Press that the soldiers allegedly plotted the attack for about a week. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the case is under investigation, said the soldiers doused the woman's body with flammable liquid and burned it to cover up the assault.

U.S. officials said they knew of the deaths but thought the victims died due to sectarian violence. Police Capt. Ihsan Abdul-Rahman said Iraqi officials received a report March 13 alleging that U.S. soldiers had killed the family, but did not pass that report to the U.S.

G.I.'s Investigated In Slayings Of 4 And Rape In Iraq (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 30 — The American military is investigating accusations that soldiers raped an Iraqi woman in her home and killed her and three family members, including a child, American officials said Friday.

The investigation is the fourth into suspected killings of unarmed Iraqis by American soldiers announced by the military in June. In May, it was disclosed that the military was conducting an inquiry into the deaths of 24 civilians in Haditha last November.

The alleged rape and killings took place March 12 in the vicinity of the volatile market town of Mahmudiya, an insurgent stronghold about 20 miles south of Baghdad. The killing of the family was originally reported by the military as due to "insurgent activity," American officials said.

A senior police official in Mahmudiya said in a telephone interview that he received a report of the killings in March. The victims were a woman, her child, her husband and the husband's brother, he said. The official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of reprisals, said a sheik from the family's tribe immediately reported the episode to the police.

The American investigation began June 24, one day after two soldiers "reported alleged coalition force involvement" in the deaths of the Iraqi civilians, the military said in a written statement. A preliminary inquiry conducted after that report determined that there was sufficient evidence to merit a criminal investigation, the military said.

"This is going to be a by-the-numbers, by-the-book investigation," Maj. Todd Breasseale, a military spokesman, said in a telephone interview. He said Maj. Gen. J. D. Thurman, commander of the Fourth Infantry Division, which oversees the capital and areas immediately to the south, ordered an inquiry "the minute he got the news."

The American officials, who spoke anonymously because they were not authorized to speak publicly about possible criminal proceedings, said the investigation involved five soldiers from the 502nd Infantry Regiment, attached to the Fourth Infantry Division.

A senior American official confirmed several details first reported by The Associated Press on Friday, including that the soldiers were accused of raping the woman, before killing her and three other family members and possibly burning her body. An Army official in Washington also confirmed that the inquiry was focused on soldiers of the 502nd Infantry Regiment, adding, "The allegation is one of rape and murder."

Earlier this month, two soldiers from the same unit were abducted while guarding a traffic control point in the town of Yusufiya and killed by insurgents, and their mutilated bodies were later found along a road booby-trapped with hidden explosives. A third soldier was killed in Yusufiya at the time of the ambush.

The alleged rape and killings came to light after a soldier felt compelled to talk about it in a "counseling-type session," after the discovery of the bodies of his kidnapped colleagues, The Associated Press reported. The soldier who originally disclosed the alleged killings had heard about them but had not taken part in them, The A.P. said.

One soldier has admitted his role and has been arrested; others have had their weapons taken away and are confined to their base in Mahmudiya, American officials said. The soldiers under investigation are apparently from the same platoon as the three killed in Yusufiya.

Both Mahmudiya and Yusufiya are in the so-called Triangle of Death, an extremely dangerous area along the Euphrates River valley that has become a melting pot of insurgents, criminal gangs and lawless tribes. The American military considers the region a crucial strategic approach to Baghdad, with important highways running south to the holy city of Najaf and the oil center of Basra, but has never been able to establish control in the region.

This latest investigation comes at a time of increasing scrutiny over the killings of civilians by American troops in Iraq. In Haditha, marines are accused of executing as many as 24 unarmed civilians after a fellow marine was killed by a roadside bomb. On June 1, as the political furor over Haditha was building, the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, lashed out at the American military, saying that violence against Iraqi civilians by American troops was a "regular occurrence."

Major Breasseale said Friday that he did not know when results of the Haditha investigation would be made public.

In June, the Army charged four American soldiers suspected of killing three detainees in Iraq and then threatening another American soldier with death if he reported the shootings.

Two days later, the Marine Corps said it had charged seven marines and one Navy corpsman with murder and kidnapping in the April killing of an Iraqi man in a village on the western outskirts of Baghdad. In that episode, the assailants are accused of planting a Kalashnikov rifle and shovel by the body of the victim to frame him as an insurgent after shooting him in the face four times.

Last Sunday, the military said two members of the Pennsylvania National Guard had been charged with involuntary manslaughter in the fatal shooting of an unarmed Iraqi man on Feb. 15.

The announcement of the investigation in Mahmudiya came as the military said Friday that three soldiers had been killed in separate combat incidents. One died Thursday night in a bombing during a foot patrol south of Baghdad. Another was killed in an explosion while on patrol on Thursday night near Balad, north of the capital; that blast also wounded a soldier. The third death occurred Thursday in the northern city of Mosul, when a soldier was killed by small-arms fire.

At least 60 American soldiers died in Iraq in June, a slight decline from 69 in May and 76 in April. Yet, that was almost twice as many as in March, which, at 31, had the second-lowest monthly fatality count of the war. Until the sharp spike in April, American fatalities had been dropping for five straight months. American commanders at the time attributed the decline to a shift by insurgents to concentrating attacks on Iraqi civilians and local security forces, and to the fact that Americans were leaving their bases less often on operations and patrols.

Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a spokesman for the American command, said he saw no clear reason for the rise in fatalities after March or the small drop in June. "We are not inclined to attribute the rise and fall in numbers to any particular factor," he said. "Coalition forces remain a priority target for terrorists and insurgents, even though we've also seen a steady increase in attacks on civilians and Iraqi security forces as their primary targets."

Deaths of Iraqi civilians dropped in June from previous months, according to a rough estimate by the Iraq Coalition Casualty Count, an independent Web site. At least 840 Iraqi civilians died in June, compared with an all-time high of 1,100 the previous month, according to the site, which counts deaths from news reports. The June toll was about the same as that in February, the month that hundreds of civilians were killed in sectarian bloodletting after the bombing of a sacred Shiite shrine.

Three civilians were killed Friday when a bomb exploded in a minibus in Kirkuk, and an Iraqi soldier died in another bombing in the west of the city, police officials said. Gunmen killed five Iraqi soldiers at a checkpoint south of Kirkuk. At least 21 bodies were found across Iraq, many showing signs of torture. One of them was a boy in Baghdad between the ages of 4 and 6 who had been tortured and shot in the head, an Interior Ministry official said.

The Russian government offered $10 million for information leading to the killers of five Russian Embassy workers here. On Wednesday, President Vladimir V. Putin ordered Russian special services to hunt down and kill those responsible.

In an Internet audio message posted Thursday night, Osama bin Laden praised Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Jordanian militant killed in an American airstrike this month. Mr. bin Laden defended the copious bloodshed engineered by Mr. Zarqawi and his group, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, saying that Mr. Zarqawi "had clear instructions to concentrate his fighting on the occupying invaders" and "make neutral those who wished to be neutral," according to a translation by the SITE Institute, which tracks jihadist Internet postings. Mr. bin Laden vowed that the struggle would continue in Iraq and demanded that the ruler of Jordan, King Abdullah II, allow Mr. Zarqawi to be buried in his hometown of Zarqa, Jordan.

Troops Facing Murder Probe (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

Atrocities Against Iraqi Family Alleged

BAGHDAD, June 30 -- The U.S. Army is investigating allegations that American soldiers raped and killed a woman and killed three of her family members in a town south of Baghdad, then reported the incident as an insurgent attack, a military official said Friday.

The alleged crimes occurred in March in the insurgent hotbed of Mahmudiyah. The four soldiers involved, from the 502nd Infantry Regiment, attempted to burn the family's home to the ground and blamed insurgents for the carnage, according to a military official familiar with the investigation, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was providing details not released publicly.

No charges have yet been filed in the case, which the official said was "in the very early stages."

Maj. Gen James D. Thurman, commander of the Army's 4th Infantry Division, to which the 502nd is attached, ordered the investigation into the killings more than a week ago, according to a terse statement released by the military Friday. A preliminary inquiry "found sufficient information existed to recommend a criminal investigation into the incident," the statement said.

Also Friday, the military reported the deaths of three soldiers in insurgent attacks Thursday. One was killed by a roadside bomb while on foot patrol in Baghdad. Another died in a roadside bomb attack in Balad, north of Baghdad. The third was killed by small-arms fire in the northern city of Mosul. No further information was provided.

The case in Mahmudiyah, a rural town in a Sunni Arab region dubbed the Triangle of Death for the insurgent attacks and crimes that are common there, was the latest in a string of allegations of unlawful killings -- and subsequent coverups -- by U.S. forces in recent months, beginning with reports in March that Marines killed 24 unarmed civilians in the western town of Haditha. Investigations continue into that case.

In June, seven Marines and a Navy corpsman were charged with murder and other crimes related to the shooting death of a crippled man in Hamdaniya, west of Baghdad. Residents there said the soldiers planted a rifle and a shovel near the victim's body to make it look as if he had been burying roadside bombs.

Later in June, three soldiers were charged with murdering three Iraqi detainees in U.S. custody and threatening to kill another soldier who saw the incident. And last week, two Pennsylvania National Guardsmen were charged with murder in the shooting death of an unarmed man in the western city of Ramadi and with trying to cover up the crime.

At least 14 U.S. service members have been convicted of crimes related to the deaths of Iraqi civilians or detainees, according to the Associated Press. Investigations have intensified in recent months following the high-profile Haditha allegations, pressure from the Iraqi government on military commanders to curtail excessive force by soldiers, and an initiative by Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the top U.S. ground commander in Iraq, to cut down on civilian casualties.

But the prospect that soldiers may have committed rape could make the Mahmudiyah allegations particularly incendiary. Charges that U.S. forces have killed civilians come as little shock to many Iraqis, but sex crimes -- especially those perpetrated against Muslim women by someone outside the faith -- can generate greater outrage in the Islamic world. The 2004 Abu Ghraib prison abuse scandal inflamed passions in large part because of the sexual humiliations detainees suffered.

Ammar Jabouri, a spokesman for the Iraqi Islamic Party, Iraq's largest Sunni Arab political organization and a frequent critic of U.S. actions against Iraqi civilians, said he was unaware of previous charges of rape against American soldiers.

Jabouri said that when he and others have spoken to U.S. officials about abuses by troops, the officials "explain it as 'reckless behavior by soldiers under stress.' They promise to investigate, but nothing comes out of that."

The unit in Mahmudiyah had attributed the deaths of the four civilians to "insurgent activity, which is common in the area," until two soldiers from the 502nd came forward June 23 to say U.S. troops were responsible, the military official said. An investigation began the next day. Three of the soldiers are still in Iraq, and one has been discharged for reasons unrelated to the case, he said. None is under confinement.

"They cannot be held until or unless there is enough evidence," the official said.

Mahmudiyah police Capt. Maaly Hassan Felayh said the alleged killings in March took place in a rural neighborhood called Stream Three, three miles south of the town center.

It was one of three cases since February in which U.S. forces killed Iraqi troops in the area, he said, including a shooting at a checkpoint in April that left 11 Iraqis dead.

Another local resident, Sadeq Muhammed al-Janabi, a farmer, said the woman who was raped and killed was an elementary school teacher.

In mid-June, two other members of the same brigade were abducted, their bodies later found mutilated in the town of Yusufiyah, near Mahmudiyah. The soldiers under investigation for the killings in Mahmudiyah were from the same platoon as those later abducted and killed, the AP reported, citing an account provided by an unnamed official with the unit who said the incidents were unrelated. Platoons usually number about 40 soldiers.

The AP, whose reporter was embedded with the 502nd in early June, also reported Friday that at least one soldier had confessed to involvement in the alleged crimes and was motivated to come forward when his fellow soldiers were kidnapped and murdered.

Elsewhere in Iraq on Friday, Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr called on followers to prepare themselves to go to the predominantly Sunni Arab northern city of Samarra to help rebuild a Shiite shrine damaged in a February bombing that triggered months of sectarian violence. "Believers inside and outside Iraq should register their names as volunteers to build and protect the holy shrine," said Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia terrorized Sunni neighborhoods following the bombing of Samarra's Askariya Shrine.

In Baghdad, the Association of Muslim Scholars, an influential Sunni religious organization with close ties to some Iraqi insurgent groups, rejected a plan for reconciliation between Iraq's rival sects proposed by Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Maliki offered amnesty to insurgents who had not committed major crimes and said some insurgent groups had responded positively to the offer.

But in an interview with the Agence France-Presse news agency, Muthana Hareth Dhari, a Muslim Scholars official, said that "the main resistance factions have rejected" the plan and called it "nothing but a public relations campaign to brighten the image of the government."

Army Probes Iraq Family Deaths (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0037750

By Rowan Scarborough, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, July 1, 2006

The Army has opened a criminal investigation into charges that soldiers murdered an Iraqi family south of Baghdad last month, marking the fourth such ongoing probe of American personnel in the war.

At the Pentagon, a top U.S. commander in Baghdad said yesterday that attacks have gone up, not down, since new Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki ordered a citywide crackdown.

Army Col. Jeffrey J. Snow, a brigade commander in the 10th Mountain Division, also openly worried that negative press coverage of the war will sap the American public's support for the troops.

"I think sometimes we just focus a little bit too much attention to, you know, [improvised explosive devices], and kidnappings and murders," Col. Snow said.

The command in Baghdad said Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman, who heads all forces in and around Baghdad, had asked the Army Criminal Investigative Division to probe whether five soldiers were involved in killing an Iraqi family of four in the town of Mahmoudiyah, in the so-called Triangle of Death.

The probe follows the brutal killings by insurgents in the area of two Army soldiers who belonged to the same platoon as those now being investigated in connection with murder. The time of the family's killing is not clear, but it occurred during a time when Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the overall battlefield commander, ordered retraining on core values for every soldier and Marine, especially on the issue of protecting noncombatants.

Ryan Lenza, an Associated Press reporter embedded with Army troops, reported that one soldier admitted to his role in the killings and was arrested. The Army says no soldier has been formally charged.

The disclosure of yet another slaying probe promises to complicate the ongoing process of Mr. al-Maliki trying to coax Sunni Muslim opposition and tribal leaders to join his new government. Foreign terrorists use such purported incidents of U.S. abuse to inflame the Sunni community, which lost power to the Shi'ites in December elections, and to recruit terrorists to come to Iraq.

The Naval Criminal Investigative Service is now investigating the suspected killing of 24 Iraqis in Haditha by Marines, and criminal defense lawyers expect murder charges to be filed. The Marine Corps already has charged seven Marines and a sailor with murder in the death of an Iraqi man on April 26. And, the Army has filed murder charges against four soldiers in the death of male detainees.

At the Pentagon, Col. Snow said via a conference call from Iraq that he worries that a "political decision" in Washington may cut short the mission. Some Democrats have demanded a definite pullout date for U.S. troops, but the Senate and House voted down those proposals.

Col. Snow, who listed a number of achievements by his brigades in Sunni and Shi'ite neighborhoods of west Baghdad, said he also worries about bad press.

"This war is a battle of wills," he said. "The insurgents will never defeat our soldiers' will to fight -- ever. So they've taken aim at the willpower of the American people. Our soldiers may be in the cross hairs ever day, but it is the American voter who is the real target, and it is the media that carries the message back each day across the airwaves.

"So when the news is not balanced and it's always bad, that clearly leads to negative perceptions back home. Now, I'm not saying bad things don't happen. They do. But there are also good things going on, and we are making progress."

Pressed to document the progress in terms of enemy attacks, Col. Snow said, "Attacks here recently are up in our area. However, the effectiveness, the overall effectiveness of them, down." He said the increase stems from his brigade conducting more patrols and checkpoints to put pressure on insurgents.

4 Soldiers Accused Of Iraq Rape, Killings (LAT)

By Solomon Moore And Peter Spiegel, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

BAGHDAD — The U.S. military is investigating U.S. soldiers accused of raping an Iraqi woman near their guard post, killing her and three family members and burning their home with the bodies inside.

DOJ_NMG_0037751

The rape and murder case, announced Friday, was opened by the military a week ago after two U.S. soldiers came forward with information about the March 12 deaths in the town of Mahmoudiya, south of Baghdad.

A terse statement issued Friday by the Army said that on June 23, the two soldiers reported the alleged American involvement and that a preliminary investigation found sufficient evidence to continue.

Four soldiers are under investigation in the case.

"We found out when someone spilled their guts," said a U.S. military official with knowledge of the inquiry, which is being conducted by the Army Criminal Investigation Command under orders from Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman, commander of the 4th Infantry Division.

"There is a lot of heat on the leadership," the official said. "This is the last thing we need."

The rape allegations are potentially explosive in a Muslim nation where tribal customs often enforce female chastity under penalty of death.

Previous reports of American servicemen killing civilians have led Iraqis to call for Washington to withdraw its troops.

The deaths in March occurred in the same area as the kidnapping and killing last month of two Army privates, an Army official said, and involve the same unit — the 502nd Infantry Regiment, which is attached to the 4th Infantry Division — but it was unclear whether there was a connection between the deaths of the family members in Mahmoudiya and the June 16 attack on the U.S. soldiers at an observation post near Yousifiya.

One soldier was killed in the attack and two were kidnapped. Days later, their bodies were found mutilated and booby-trapped with explosives near a Yousifiya power plant complex.

Yousifiya and Mahmoudiya lie along the Euphrates River, in an area many Iraqis call the "Triangle of Death" because of the level of insurgent violence. Scores of Iraqis, especially Shiite Muslims traveling to southern Iraq, have been killed in the region, and U.S. military officials said Abu Musab Zarqawi, the recently slain leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, might have hidden out in the palm-fringed villages.

The Army official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the investigation is continuing, said the soldiers in the unit were in a "combat stress debriefing" a week after the kidnapping incident to deal with any psychological issues stemming from it. At the session, the official said, a soldier told his superiors that he had heard of other members in the unit who were involved in the rape of a woman and the killing of three others.

The investigation turned up another witness, who said he had heard the same account and added that the soldiers involved were seen with blood on their uniforms.

Military investigators now believe that two soldiers raped the woman and that one of them killed her and three other people — two adults and a child — in the house.

The incident was initially reported as "insurgent activity," the military source said.

The soldiers have been confined to their base and stripped of their weapons, said the source, who also spoke on condition of anonymity because of the investigation.

However, the Army official said one of the soldiers had been discharged and was back in the United States, where the military was working with civilian authorities to track him down.

Recent allegations of servicemen killing unarmed Iraqi civilians have led to several investigations by the U.S. military.

After a Time magazine article in March alleged that Marines had killed 24 Iraqi civilians, including 10 women and children, in the western town of Haditha on Nov. 19, the military launched an investigation of the incident and of the possibility that military officials had conspired to cover it up.

The military is also investigating seven Marines and a Navy corpsman in connection with the April 26 slaying of an Iraqi civilian in Hamandiya, west of Baghdad. That case also involves a possible cover-up.

Last week, military officials announced that two soldiers had been charged with voluntary manslaughter in the shooting death of an unarmed Ramadi resident Feb. 15. The soldiers are accused of trying to make it appear that the man was an insurgent by placing a rifle next to his body.

In the Mahmoudiya case, investigators are trying to determine whether the bodies were burned to destroy evidence of a crime.

Muayed Fadil, the mayor of Yousifiya, said that investigators called him Thursday to ask about the deaths and that he found it unusual that they were so interested in this particular family.

"They said, 'We want to know their names, where they were living, how they were killed,' " he said. "They asked me, 'Do you know their relatives or the chief of their tribe?' I told them I will work to find out who their relatives are."

He said the investigators did not divulge that U.S. soldiers had been accused in the deaths.

The military source acknowledged that it was unusual for such a small contingent of soldiers to be operating alone in Iraq. Generally, U.S. troops travel in convoys. The lack of manpower south of Baghdad is a chronic problem and may have led commanders to stretch their forces thin, the source said.

"I don't want to speculate on what the commander down there was thinking, but I don't know why he had his troops arrayed that way," the source said. "I do know there's a lack of manpower down there."

An investigation of the deaths of the three American soldiers last month seeks to determine why they were alone at their observation post outside the base. The source said lack of manpower might have been a factor in that case as well.

Violence continued to flare in the country Friday. The worst involved a battle between Shiites and Sunni Arabs in a village northeast of Baghdad stemming from a bombing this week that killed at least 25 people.

As Iraqi police officers attempted to break up the conflict, snipers killed the head of the police force and two of his bodyguards. American and Iraqi troops then entered the battle, killing three fighters and wounding three.

The Sunnis were attacked while they were moving out of the village of Daliqiya after being threatened by Shiite residents in the religiously mixed hamlet, officials said.

A U.S. Marine was killed Wednesday during combat operations in Al Anbar province, officials said. Two soldiers were killed and one was wounded while on patrol Thursday near Baghdad and Balad. The names of the casualties were not released, pending notification of relatives.

Also Friday, Russia said it would pay $10 million for information about the killers of five of its embassy workers in Iraq. The announcement came two days after President Vladimir V. Putin ordered special forces to hunt down and kill the assailants.

Four Russians seized in early June were killed and a fifth was slain during the abduction. Insurgents videotaped the execution of two of the men. The militants had demanded that Russia pull its troops out of Chechnya, a predominantly Muslim republic in southern Russia.

Criminal Cases Against U.S. Soldiers (AP-Y2)

By The Associated Press

AP2, July 1, 2006

A look at criminal cases against U.S. soldiers stemming from the deaths of Iraqis since the war began in 2003:

PENDING CASES:

_Pfc. Corey R. Clagett, Spc. Juston R. Graber, Staff Sgt. Raymond L. Girouard and Spc. William B. Hunsaker charged with premeditated murder of three male detainees in Salahuddin province in May. Clagett, Girouard and Hunsaker also charged with obstructing justice for allegedly threatening to kill another soldier who was a witness in the case.

_Hospitalman Third Class Melson J. Bacos; Sgt. Lawrence G. Hutchins III; Lance Cpl. Tyler A. Jackson; Pfc. John J. Jodka; Cpl. Marshall L. Magincalda; Lance Cpl. Robert B. Pennington; Lance Cpl. Jerry E. Shumate Jr.; and Marine Cpl. Trent D. Thomas charged with premeditated murder in April shooting death of Iraqi man in Hamdania. All eight also charged with kidnapping, larceny, conspiracy, assault and housebreaking.

_Five U.S. Army soldiers from 502nd Infantry Regiment being investigated for allegedly raping a young woman in March, then killing her and three members of her family in Mahmoudiyah, south of Baghdad, a U.S. military official tells The Associated Press.

_National Guard Sgt. Milton Ortiz Jr. and Spc. Nathan B. Lynn charged in shooting death of unarmed Iraqi man near Ramadi in February. Both also charged with obstructing justice. Lynn charged with voluntary manslaughter. Ortiz also faces charges of assault and communicating a threat in separate incident involving another Iraqi man.

_Capt. James Kimber, Capt. Lucas M. McConnell, Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich and an unidentified Marine under investigation for killings of two dozen unarmed Iraqi civilians in western town of Haditha on Nov. 19, 2005 in revenge attack after one of their own died in a roadside bombing. Probe focusing on allegations that the Marines stormed into nearby homes and shot occupants as well as others outside, according to U.S. lawmakers briefed by military officials. Separately, the military also investigating if there was a coverup. Iraqi government said it will also investigate.

_Chief Warrant Officer Jefferson L. Williams, Sgt. 1st Class William Sommer and Spc. Jerry Loper charged with murder and dereliction of duty, along with Chief Warrant Officer Lewis Welshofer, an incident in resulting in death of Iraqi Maj. Gen. Abed Hamed Mowhoush after an interrogation in 2003 at a detention camp in al Qaim. Army dropped murder charges against Williams and Loper in exchange for testimony against Welshofer. Murder charge against Sommer also dropped. Both Sommer and Williams face possible administrative discipline.

CONVICTIONS:

_Staff Sgt. Cardenas J. Alban convicted of killing severely wounded 16-year-old Iraqi during fighting in Baghdad's Sadr City neighborhood. Sentenced to one year's confinement, demoted to private and given bad-conduct discharge.

_Staff Sgt. Johnny Horne Jr. pleaded guilty to unpremeditated murder in same case as Alban. Sentenced to three years in prison, had rank reduced to private, forfeited wages and given dishonorable discharge. Horne's prison sentence later reduced to one year.

_Cpl. Dustin Berg of Indiana National Guard convicted and sentenced to 18 months in military prison for shooting death of Iraqi police officer.

_Spc. Rami Dajani convicted of making a false statement following fatal shooting of Iraqi translator. Sentenced to 18 months' confinement and given a reduction in rank and bad conduct discharge.

_Spc. Charley L. Hooser convicted of involuntary manslaughter in same case involving Dajani. Hooser sentenced to three years in prison and given a reduction in rank and bad conduct discharge. Also convicted of making a false statement to investigators.

_Capt. Rogelio "Roger" Maynulet convicted of assault with intent to commit voluntary manslaughter in shooting death of wounded Iraqi. Received no prison time but was dismissed from armed forces.

_Pvt. Federico Daniel Merida of North Carolina National Guard pleaded guilty to killing 17-year-old Iraqi soldier after the two had consensual sex. Sentenced to 25 years in prison, given a reduction in rank and was dishonorably discharged.

_Marine Maj. Clarke Paulus convicted of dereliction of duty and maltreatment in case stemming from death of Iraqi prisoner who was dragged out of holding cell by the neck, stripped naked and left outside for seven hours in June 2003. Paulus, who commanded the Marine detention facility Camp Whitehorse in southern Iraq, was dismissed from the service but received no prison time.

_Sgt. 1st Class Tracy Perkins acquitted of involuntary manslaughter in alleged drowning of Iraqi man but convicted of assault for forcing the man and his cousin into Tigris River. Sentenced to six months in prison.

_1st Lt. Jack Saville pleaded guilty to assault and other crimes in same incident as Perkins. Sentenced to 45 days in military prison.

_Pfc. Edward Richmond convicted of voluntary manslaughter for shooting Iraqi in back of head. Received three years in prison.

_Sgt. Michael P. Williams convicted in court-martial of one count of premeditated murder and one count of unpremeditated murder in deaths of unarmed civilians during operations near Sadr City. Sentenced to life in prison and given a reduction in rank. Sentence later reduced to 25 years.

_Spc. Brent May convicted in court-martial of one count of unpremeditated murder in same incident as Michael Williams. Sentenced to five years in prison.

_Welshofer, of 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, initially charged with murder, assault and willful dereliction of duty but found guilty of negligent homicide and negligent dereliction of duty in death of Mowhoush. Military jury ordered a reprimand and forfeiture of $6,000 of his salary and restricted him to his home, office and church for two months.

CLEARED/ACQUITTED:

_U.S. troops cleared of intentionally killing civilians in March 15 raid in village of Ishaqi. Military acknowledged "possibly up to nine collateral deaths" in addition to four announced at time of the raid. Iraqis said there were 11 dead.

_Marine 2nd Lt. Ilario Pantano cleared of murder charges in shooting deaths of two Iraqi civilians.

_Staff Sgt. Shane Werst acquitted by jury of premeditated murder for shooting death of unarmed Iraqi.

Four U.S. Service Members Killed In Iraq (WP)

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

The U.S. military has announced the deaths of a Marine and three soldiers from fighting in recent days in Iraq. The names of all four were withheld pending notification of their families.

The Marine was wounded Wednesday, during fighting in Anbar province. Military officials announced his death in a statement e-mailed to news outlets this morning. The statement said the Marine was assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5.

A separate statement said a soldier from the 172nd Stryker Brigade combat team died Thursday from small-arms fire in Mosul.

Another soldier was killed in a bomb explosion Thursday on a foot patrol south of Baghdad.

The fourth fatality was a soldier with the 1/34 Brigade Combat Team who died after his vehicle hit an improvised explosive device near Balad. Another soldier was injured in that attack.

More than 2,500 U.S. military personnel have been killed in Iraq since the March 2003 invasion.

Troops In Ramadi Learn To Live With Danger (AP-Y2)

By Antonio Castaneda, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 1, 2006

The hole in the ceiling is just a way to let out steam for the soldiers showering inside a damaged trailer in Ramadi, one of Iraq's most dangerous cities.

But each knows how that hole was created. A mortar round came through the trailer roof a few weeks ago and could have killed everyone inside had it detonated. Most mortars are not so benign, and there are many here.

The Iraq war for most troops is fleeting; brief ambushes or sudden, powerful roadside bombings. But in this troubled city, the capital of deadly Anbar province, the conflict is nearly constant. Gunbattles in the streets are common and mortars rain down on the bases every week.

On the eastern edge of town at Camp Corregidor, a base named after a famous World War II battle in the Philippines, U.S. soldiers regularly hunker down during "indirect fire" attacks or what they generally call "incoming" — military vernacular for inbound rockets or mortars.

The attacks happen at least three times a week, soldiers say, and usually end with explosions that miss their target. Sometimes the mortars hit nearby neighborhoods, maiming and killing civilians.

But the insurgents also have taken a toll on U.S. troops. This week a soldier at an outpost a few blocks from Camp Corregidor was killed by a mortar. Several soldiers have been wounded by shrapnel.

Many soldiers say they have adjusted to this life under regular fire. They say the attacks rarely injure soldiers or hamper operations, although they have many tales of near-misses.

"My latrines took two 60 millimeter mortars, my shower trailer has been disabled by 80 millimeter mortars, and it's not uncommon for us to pick pieces of shrapnel from the side of building," said Capt. Joe Claburn, 29, of the 1st Battalion, 506th Regiment, 101st Airborne Division. "We get mortared so much that we don't even flinch anymore."

But others privately acknowledge that the mortars, which thunder throughout the base at all hours, have caused nightmares and took awhile to get used to.

"When we first got here it bothered me. We thought every loud sound was a mortar until we got used to it," said Spc. Lemuel Ross, 24, of Richmond, Va., speaking outside a building that was hit by a rocket-propelled grenade earlier in the year.

The regular insurgent attacks have changed the face of this base, which once was an agricultural college. Troops have piled sandbags on the roofs as protection. Latrines and sidewalks are surrounded by thick concrete walls to deflect shrapnel.

In early June, the military launched an operation to establish new outposts and solidly install U.S. and Iraqi troops in the troubled city 70 miles west of Baghdad.

Some soldiers, desensitized to the attacks, speak of them with fatalistic phrases common in military ranks.

"Mortars are the least of my worries. We look at it this way: If it's going to happen, it's going to happen," said Spc. Milton O'Neal, 20, of Chicago, as he dribbled a basketball during a break between missions.

"Sometimes it's an annoyance if you're in the latrines with your pants down," said Staff Sgt. David Rogers, 26, of Cleveland.

Some attacks seem linked to outside events. For example, shortly after terror leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed on June 7, soldiers said more than 10 mortars fell on Camp Corregidor.

Other times, insurgents often fire during hours when they think soldiers are congregated for lunch or dinner.

Soldiers walking on the base are required to wear their protective vests and helmets, even for short distances to latrines and shower stalls.

After mortars strike, soldiers are required to account for all members of their units.

While soldiers say that they're so used to explosions that they hardly stir from their sleep anymore, some attacks can hardly be ignored.

"When you hear a 120 (millimeter mortar), you can feel it, not just hear it," said O'Neal. "You know you can't just lie in bed for that one."

Iraq's Plan For National Reconciliation 'Opens Door To Political Resolution' (FT)

By Roula Khalaf, Middle East Editor

Iraq's national reconciliation initiative has paved the way for government contacts with insurgents and should be seen as only a first step towards a political solution to the conflict, according to Iraq's vice-president.

Adel Abdel-Mehdi, senior Shia official and vice-president in the new government, told the Financial Times that other measures would follow the plan unveiled last Sunday and deemed by many analysts to be vague and incomplete.

In an interview during a visit to London, Mr Abdel-Mehdi said contacts with insurgents had been going on for some time but the reconciliation plan had now made dialogue an official policy.

He also left the door open to a broadening of an am-nesty offer after Nuri al-Maliki, the prime minister, this week insisted it would exclude anyone who had killed American troops or Iraqis.

"What's important is not what they [the insurgents] did but what commitment we'll have on peace," said Mr Abdel-Mehdi. "In exceptional periods we need exceptional measures. We're willing to be flexible. We might go to a general or partial amnesty but we need to know what we're facing."

The reconciliation plan was sharply criticised by Mr Maliki's own allies as well as influential clerics from both of Iraq's main sects. But it broke a taboo for the dominant Shia parties, which had until then resisted contacts with insurgents.

And it was hailed by the main Sunni alliance, the Iraqi Consensus Front, which despite being a partner in government has until now been wary of associating itself with government policies. It has therefore provided greater consensus, allowing former rivals to begin working together to try to reduce the violence.

In recent days several small insurgent groups have contacted the government through intermediaries, according to officials in Baghdad, and some have come forward with demands. But given the localised and diffuse nature of the insurgency, it is far from clear whether any of these groups have any significant influence on the ground.

Mr Abdel-Mehdi acknow-ledged that the government lacked a clear picture of the insurgency. The reconciliation initiative was aimed at gaining a better understanding of the groups and identifying whether any, and how many, were ready for a politic al solution, he said.

"We don't know whois who and what theyreally represent, and how many are linked to al-Qaeda. So we have to see. Our assumption has been that they are remnants of the old regime. Maybe we're wrong," he said. "Now [with the reconciliation plan] there will be committees, con-tacts, meetings, mediators. It starts like that."

He suggested insurgent leaders, unrelated to al-Qaeda, who might be identified could take part in an Arab League-backed nation-al reconciliation conference expected later this year.

However, efforts to calm the insurgency dominated by Sunni Arabs also depend on the government's ability to rein in the Shia militias. Well entrenched within the interior ministry, members of Shia militias are accused of waging a sectarian war against Sunni Arabs in mixed areas such as Baghdad, where dozens of Iraqis from all communities are killed every day.

Mr Abdel-Mehdi, who is a senior official from the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq (Sciri) - the Shia party that controls the Badr Organisation, one of the group accused of sectarian killings - insisted that the government would not allow anyone to operate "above the law".

But he acknowledged that the government faced a dilemma. To dismantle the militias it must show it is capable of providing security, which requires reducing the violence waged by insurgents. But curbing the powers of the militias is also essential to persuade insurgents to lay down their arms.

*In an internet audiotape posted yesterday Osama bin Laden praised Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of Iraq's al-Qaeda wing, who was killed by US forces last month.

Addressing US President George W. Bush, the head of al-Qaeda said: "Don't be too happy, for the banner [of al-Qaeda in Iraq] hasn't dropped but has passed from one lion of Islam to another lion."

Iraq PM To Tour Gulf States To Push Peace Plan (AFP-Y2)

By Mona Salem

AFP, July 1, 2006

Iraq Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki will on Saturday embark on his first trip abroad to garner support for his much-touted peace plan that has been rejected by the Sunni leaders and rebels.

The US military, meanwhile, said Friday it had ordered a probe into the alleged killing of four Iraqi civilians by US soldiers south of Baghdad last week, the latest in a string of such investigations.

And at least 14 people were killed in a string of attacks across the country, as Al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden warned that the jihad or holy war could continue despite the killing of the network's local leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi three weeks ago.

Maliki is due to leave Saturday for Saudi Arabia, then the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait "to meet their leaders to discuss the national reconciliation plan," said Minister of State for National Dialogue Akram al-Hakim.

Maliki announced a national reconciliation plan last Sunday in a bid to stem the Shiite-Sunni violence ravaging Iraq. The plan, however, has already been rejected by a number of Sunni Arab leaders and rebel groups.

It is felt that Maliki's tour may help influence the former elite community of Sunni Arabs as many of its leaders have close ties with the oil-rich Arab states of the Gulf.

Iraq's influential Sunni Muslim Scholars Association leader Muthana Hareth al-Dhari dismissed Maliki's plan as little more than "a campaign of public relations for the government", adding it was "meaningless because he has excluded everyone."

He said it also aimed to encourage die-hard Sunni Arab parties like his own which refuse to accept the rise to power of the long-oppressed Shiites, to abandon their sympathies for armed struggle and join the political process.

Maliki has said he would only pardon those detainees held in US and Iraqi prisons who have committed no violent crimes and stressed there would be no amnesty to those who killed foreign troops, journalists or innocent Iraqis.

More than 2,500 detainees have been freed this month from US and Iraqi prisons as part of the plan.

DOJ_NMG_0037757

Maliki said Wednesday he had been contacted by insurgent groups willing to lay down their weapons and that he would engage them in dialogue directly or through other officials.

The announcement was hailed by state-owned Iraqiya television and the government-owned Al-Sabah newspaper.

They even named the purported insurgent groups which approached Maliki and claimed that tribal leaders from the rebel stronghold of Ramadi in Al-Anbar province of western Iraq were acting as go-betweens.

But Dhari said: "Neither the principal armed groups of resistance nor political organisations like ours have accepted this plan which ignores a timetable for the withdrawal of (foreign) troops.

"Nobody knows the so-called organisations mentioned in the government mouthpiece Al-Sabah, and the armed groups mentioned are also unknown."

Dhari said the main Sunni groups which rejected the proposal were the Brigades of 1920 Revolution, the Rashedeen Army, Islamic Movement of Iraqi Mujahedeen, United Iraqi Jihadist People, and Jaish al-Mujahedeen.

"We are not concerned by this initiative as it does not address the main problem of occupation and also the militias," said the Brigades of 1920 Revolution in a statement.

A number of militias close to Shiite political parties have been blamed for the killings of Sunni Arabs.

Jaish al-Mujahedeen also discarded the proposal saying it will not "dirty its hands... by shaking the hands of those who are with the occupiers (US-led forces)".

On Friday, an Internet-posted voice message purported to be from bin Laden paid tribute to Zarqawi who was killed in a US air strike on June 7.

"We will keep up our fight to bleed your money dry, kill your men and so that (your forces) go home defeated, as we defeated you in Somalia," bin Laden told US President George W. Bush.

"The banner of jihad has not fallen. It will be picked up by another lion of Islam," he said in the message, which the CIA said was the voice of bin Laden.

Meanwhile the US military said it had ordered an investigation into the alleged killing by soldiers of a family of four Iraqi civilians in their home in the area of Mahmudiyah, south of Baghdad.

In violence on the ground 14 Iraqis were killed, including five Iraqi soldiers in an assault against a checkpoint near the northern oil city of Kirkuk, the army said.

Police also found 10 bodies, including that of a five-year-old boy brutally tortured and executed.

The US military also announced the death of three troops in Iraq.

The head of the Russian FSB intelligence service announced Friday a 10-million-dollar to help nab the killers of its five Baghdad embassy employees slain by their kidnappers after being seized earlier this month.

In a new blow to the coalition, Poland said it will pull its troops out of Iraq by the middle of next year.

Israel Strike Hits Palestinian PM's Office (NSDY/AP)

By Ravi Nessman, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, July 2, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- Israeli aircraft fired missiles at the Palestinian prime minister's office early Sunday, just hours after a Palestinian official said the soldier whose abduction sent Israeli troops into Gaza is alive and in stable condition.

A Hamas militant was killed in another Israeli airstrike.

Palestinians witnesses said two missiles fired by attack helicopters hit the Gaza City office of Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas early Sunday, slightly injuring a bystander and setting the empty building on fire.

Inspecting his burning office, Haniyeh called the attack senseless.

"They have targeted a symbol for the Palestinian people," he said.

The Israeli military confirmed the attack and said it would "employ all means at its disposal ... to secure the safe return" of 19-year-old soldier Cpl. Gilad Shalit who was abducted by Palestinian militants on Sunday.

The strike, at about 1:45 a.m., came shortly after moderate Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas warned Saturday that the coming hours would be "critical, sensitive and serious" for trying to calm the crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0037758

After the airstrike on his office, Haniyeh met Abbas for an hour, his office said, discussing the Israeli attacks and efforts to keep the government functioning despite the arrests. Haniyeh issued a statement calling for foreign intervention to stop the Israeli offensive.

"The international community must shoulder its responsibility," he said.

In other airstrikes after midnight, Israeli aircraft hit a school in Gaza city and Hamas facilities in northern Gaza, where a Hamas militant was killed and another wounded, Palestinian officials said. The military said they were "planning terror attacks against Israel." The 34-year-old Hamas gunman was the second militant killed in the five-day Israeli operation to force the release of Shalit.

Ziad Abu Aen, a Palestinian deputy minister and Hamas official said Saturday that Shalit was wounded but in stable condition.

Another Hamas official, however, cast doubt on the credibility of the statement. Osama Muzami said only the military wing of the Islamic militant group knows the soldier's condition.

There had been no sign of Shalit since he was abducted during a militant raid on an Israeli army post just outside the Gaza Strip that killed two soldiers and two of the attackers.

Abu Aen said "mediators" told him Shalit had received medical treatment for wounds he suffered in the raid and was in stable condition.

"He has three wounds," Abu Aen said in the West Bank city of Ramallah. "I guess shrapnel wounds."

Israeli soldiers and Palestinian militants exchanged fire for several hours Saturday when Israeli tanks and bulldozers crossed into the Gaza Strip and began razing farmland east of Khan Younis. No serious injuries were reported.

The fighting took place north of the position Israeli troops occupied when they entered Gaza on Wednesday. The army said it was carrying out a limited operation in the Khan Younis area and the soldiers were expected to leave soon.

The Hamas-affiliated militants holding Shalit initially said they would trade information about him for all Palestinian women and underage prisoners in Israeli jails. The militants raised the stakes Saturday, calling for an end to the Israeli offensive and the release of 1,000 other prisoners in Israel, including some who are not Palestinian.

The new demand appeared aimed at rallying support in the Arab world.

Israel has ruled out any compromise, saying it would only encourage more abductions.

Israel continued to hold 64 Hamas leaders rounded up in the West Bank Thursday night. They include eight Cabinet ministers.

Israel has also blamed Syria for the kidnapping, noting it gives haven to Hamas' top leaders.

Defense Minister Amir Peretz met with senior security officials Saturday night and then called Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to urge the Bush administration to step up pressure on Syria to work for Shalit's release, officials said on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to make a statement.

Egypt and other foreign mediators have been working to try to resolve the crisis, but Abbas said those efforts had yet to bear fruit mainly because it was unclear who in Hamas -- the militants or the group's leadership abroad -- was authorized to make decisions about Shalit.

"The next hours are critical, sensitive and serious. And though the efforts are still ongoing, we have not reached an acceptable solution until now," Abbas' office said in a statement Saturday.

He sounded more optimistic at a news conference Saturday night.

"Regarding the soldier, we will surely reach an agreement. It is not a dead end. People want an acceptable solution," said Abbas, who is from the moderate Fatah Party.

Hamas, which controls the Palestinian Cabinet after winning legislative elections in January, insisted Shalit should not be freed without a prisoner swap.

Israel "should understand that it is not easy for the Palestinian people to say, 'OK, we can release him,' ... without a price," said Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman for the Hamas-led Cabinet.

Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan of Turkey, a predominantly Muslim country that has close ties with Israel, called President Bush Saturday and talked for 30 minutes about the crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0037759

"The president said that the initial goal should be freeing the Israeli soldier -- that is the key to ending the crisis," said Frederick Jones, spokesman for the National Security Council at the White House.

Meanwhile, the fuel supply in Gaza dwindled after Israel cut off the flow through a pipeline. Gas stations across the territory ran dry, and human rights groups worried that if fuel shipments were not restored in the coming days, Gaza could face a humanitarian crisis as generators used to pump water and power hospitals stopped working.

Authorities have been relying on generators since an Israeli airstrike Tuesday destroyed Gaza's only power plant, knocking out 43 percent of the territory's electricity supply, the United Nations said. The remaining electricity comes from Israel.

The Israeli army said Israel had increased the supply of electricity to Gaza to make up for the power shortage and would work to allow food and fuel in over the coming days.

Munitions Found In Iraq Renew Debate (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

Panel Is Divided Over Whether Troops Uncovered Weapons of Mass Destruction

Do the 20-year-old Iraqi chemical munitions found by U.S. and coalition forces support the prewar contention that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction, and justify the invasion of Iraq?

That question divided Republicans and Democrats again this week, this time at a hearing of the House Armed Services Committee on the estimated 500 rockets and artillery shells containing degraded mustard gas or sarin nerve agent.

Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) contended that an April report by the U.S. Army's National Ground Intelligence Center (NGIC) is clear evidence of Hussein's weapons of mass destruction.

"Some may want to play down the significance of this report or even deny that WMD have been found in Iraq," Hunter said at Thursday's hearing, using the abbreviation for weapons of mass destruction.

Citing the United Nations resolutions that called for destruction of all of Hussein's banned weapons, Hunter added that "the verified existence of such chemical weapons" proves they were not destroyed and "in part because of such violations, we voted to authorize the use of force in Iraq."

But Rep. Ike Skelton (Mo.), the senior Democrat on the committee, countered that the NGIC report did not address Baghdad's prewar chemical weapons program. Rather, he said, it was "written to address the force protection concerns of our service members in Iraq."

"Yes, these certainly are munitions," Skelton added, "but they are not the evidence of prewar assertions made by the administration."

The classified overview of chemical munitions says that U.S. forces have found about 500 shells, canisters or other munitions containing the chemical weapons. Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, told the committee the shells were produced in the 1980s for the Iran-Iraq war but were not used.

Last week, Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), chairman of the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, and Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), a strong supporter of the war, touted the findings, provoking protests from some Democrats.

In his Jan. 28, 2003, State of the Union address, President Bush said that U.S. intelligence indicated "Saddam Hussein had upwards of 30,000 munitions capable of delivering chemical agents. Inspectors recently turned up 16 of them -- despite Iraq's recent declaration denying their existence. Saddam Hussein has not accounted for the remaining 29,984 of these prohibited munitions. He's given no evidence that he has destroyed them."

The NGIC study was conducted, Maples said, to allow commanders in Iraq to prepare their troops for potential hazards when they came across the old shells or rockets. Hunter recalled an incident "several years ago," when soldiers disposing of an old artillery round became ill from exposure to chemicals while transporting it.

Maples was caught in the verbal crossfire between Republicans and Democrats but proved adept at avoiding answers that aided either side.

Rep. Susan Davis (D-Calif.) asked whether the munitions could be characterized as "the Golden Oldies of weapons of mass destruction." Maples said he was "not sure what Golden Oldies are" but added that the munitions were "dangerous. . . .

even in a degraded mode, they will produce hazardous and potentially lethal effects and that we would categorize them as weapons of mass destruction."

But under questioning, Maples acknowledged that the shells were "a potential risk to our service members in Iraq" but not to 275 million Americans.

Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), who believes the shells represent weapons of mass destruction, asked: "If you took that material and got it out of the country and took it to a metropolitan area, what would be the impact?"

Maples replied, "I think conceivably it would have a very large impact."

That caused Rep. Terry Everett (R-Ala.) to ask, "If some bad guys got this stuff and sneaked it into New York City and put it [into] the subways there, would it kill people?" Taken aback slightly, Maples responded, "Potentially . . . yes, sir, it would."

Rep. Rick Larsen (D-Wash.) noted that the administration's prewar rhetoric, including a remark by then-national security adviser Condoleezza Rice that "we don't want the smoking gun to be a mushroom cloud," helped push Congress's October 2002 vote to authorize the use of force in Iraq.

That kind of language, Larsen said, "always has seemed to be much bigger than the facts that we end up reviewing in retrospect."

The smoking gun and mushroom cloud image, he said, "sounds a lot better than 500 artillery shells of various amounts of degraded material that fit the technical definition of chemical weapons . . . buried in various bunkers in various states of disrepair that we are not even sure Saddam Hussein knew about."

Bin Laden Planning Somalia, Iraq Message (AP)

By Lee Keath

AP2, July 1, 2006

A tired-sounding Osama bin Laden praised slain Iraq insurgent Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in an audiotape released Friday, and a Web site later said the terror leader would soon post a message about the fight by Islamic militants in Somalia and Iraq.

The 19-minute statement on the Web — during which bin Laden once again conspicuously avoided showing his face — was the latest in a string of audiotapes from the al-Qaida leader this year.

The Internet messages have been strong on propaganda, but have said little about how the terror network will continue its "jihad" against the United States — raising questions about bin Laden's level of control.

The pace of messages, however, has increased dramatically this year — with four audiotapes from bin Laden and seven audios and videos by his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri.

Hours after Friday's message appeared, an advertisement on the same Islamic Web site said bin Laden would issue another tape directed to "the Islamic nation in general and the mujahedeen in Iraq and Somalia in particular." A similar announcement proceeded bin Laden's message Friday by about 24 hours.

The advertisement banner was signed by As-Sahab, the production branch that releases al-Qaida videos, and had an old picture of bin Laden. The teaser was first reported by the SITE Institute and the IntelCenter, two U.S.-based independent groups that provide counter-terrorism information to the U.S. government and media. The IntelCenter said the promised message was expected within 36 hours.

Islamic militiamen who have have recently seized control over key parts of Somalia are led by Sheikh Hassan Dahir Aweys, suspected by the United States of being an al-Qaida collaborator. Washington has concerns that Somalia will become a refuge for members of bin Laden's terror network.

Bin Laden has not appeared in a video since October 2004 and did not issue any messages in 2005. This year, he has made four audiotapes, part of a stepped-up media campaign by him and his top deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, who has appeared in several videos.

Terror experts said bin Laden's reluctance to show his face probably does not indicate he is in poor health and instead is likely a security measure, to prevent hints of his location from slipping out.

Bruce Hoffman, a RAND counterterrorism expert based in Washington, said it may also be that bin Laden is trying to increase the drama of an eventual appearance.

DOJ_NMG_0037761

"You do videotape when there's something important," Hoffman said."When bin Laden appears it's something very special. He's as shrewd a showman as they come, and his sense of choreography is very high."

So far, the opportunity hasn't presented itself, a sign the al-Qaida leader — believed to be in hiding in the Afghan-Pakistan border region — is seeking for now just to show he survives and remains in control.

"What do you have to brag or crow about if you're sitting in a cave trying to avoid capture," Hoffman said. "So he's trying to leverage off of events to show his presence."

Al-Qaida advertised Friday's message prominently on Islamic Web forums more than 24 hours before it was posted — suggesting the importance of paying tribute to al-Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaida in Iraq who often appeared more of a rival than a follower.

The Jordanian-born al-Zarqawi, who was killed in a June 7 airstrike by U.S. warplanes, became a hero among extremists by positioning himself as al-Qaida's fighter on the ground, battling the Americans on the hottest front of jihad, Iraq.

In the audiotape, bin Laden poured praise on al-Zarqawi in rhymed couplets traditional to Islamic poetry, calling him a "lion of Islam" who was "not just an honor to his tribe, his country and his Islamic nation, but to all mankind."

The audiotape narration was part of a 19-minute video showing old footage of al-Zarqawi, in a split screen with an old photo of bin Laden. U.S. intelligence officials believe it is bin Laden's voice, said a counterterrorism official who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said: "It's another bin Laden audio tape. It is what it is."

The voice resembled bin Laden's from previous messages known to be from him, though the authenticity of Friday's tape was not immediately confirmed.

Bin Laden's voice — always quiet in his messages — sounded fatigued in the audio. He demanded U.S. President George W. Bush release al-Zarqawi's body to his family and that Jordan allow him to be buried in his homeland, something Amman has said will never happen.

Al-Qaida's central leadership is believed to have differed with al-Zarqawi, criticizing his strategy of targeting Shiite civilians with brutal suicide bombings in an attempt to spark a civil war in Iraq.

Bin Laden defended al-Zarqawi, saying he had "clear instructions" to focus on U.S.-led forces in Iraq but also "for those who ... stood to fight on the side of the crusaders against the Muslims, then he should kill them whoever they are, regardless of their sect or tribe."

But bin Laden did not mention Shiites in particular, underlining the divisions with al-Zarqawi, who frequently railed against Shiite Muslims in Iraq and elsewhere.

The al-Qaida leader — perhaps inadvertently — also showed his distance and lack of a direct hand in the fight in Iraq, said Diaa Rashwan, an Egyptian expert on militant groups.

In particular, bin Laden made no mention of al-Zarqawi's successor, or even mention the name of al-Zarqawi's organization, al-Qaida in Iraq, Rashwan noted.

Instead, bin Laden said, "The banner has not fallen, it has only been passed from one lion to another."

"He doesn't appear to even know al-Zarqawi's succcessor," Rashwan said. Al-Qaida in Iraq has named a little known militant as its new leader, with the pseudonym of Abu Hamza al-Muhajer.

Bin Laden also addressed Bush, saying, "We will continue to fight you and your allies everywhere, in Iraq, Afghanistan, Somalia and Sudan to run down your resources and kill your men until you return defeated to your nation."

But like other tapes this year, there was little sign of the direction of bin Laden's fight.

He issued a message in January warning that his followers were planning a new attack in the United States. But his other three since then have been more focused on commenting on current events, including U.N. plans for a peacekeeping force in Sudan. He issued a message saying Zacarias Moussawi, just convicted in the United States, had nothing to do with the Sept. 11 suicide hijackings.

The focus has been on showing that even in hiding — with few major al-Qaida attacks outside of Iraq — he is in control.

"I think he's conscious that while he's been doing all the talking, al-Zarqawi has been doing all the fighting," Hoffman said.

Bin Laden Warns Bush, Demands Return Of Zarqawi Body (BLOOM)

June 30 (Bloomberg) -- Osama Bin Laden warned U.S. President George W. Bush in an audiotape broadcast today not to rejoice over the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and demanded that the body of al-Qaeda's Iraq chief be returned to Jordan.

The leader of al-Qaeda said the terrorist group will continue its ``jihad," or holy war, in Iraq under the command of al-Zarqawi's successor. The tape also included a message for Jordan's King Abdullah II, directing him to allow al-Zarqawi to be buried in his homeland, and promising a funeral that would show depth of al-Qaeda's support. The Central Intelligence Agency released a statement saying a technical analysis of the recording determined the voice was that of bin Laden.

``I tell Bush, you have to hand over the body of the hero to his family," bin Laden said. ``And don't rejoice excessively, because the banner has not fallen, thank God. It only went from a lion to another lion among the lions of Islam, and we'll continue fighting you and your allies everywhere, in Iraq, in Afghanistan, Somalia and Sudan."

Al-Zarqawi, the most wanted man in Iraq before his death and responsible for suicide attacks on civilians and Iraqi and American forces, was killed June 7 in a U.S. air strike. The U.S. military identified his successor in heading al-Qaeda in Iraq as the group's former southern Iraq leader, Ayyub al-Masri, describing him as an explosives expert who is likely to use the same tactics as his predecessor.

Islamic Web Site

Al-Jazeera television aired the audiotape, which was posted on an Islamic Web site often used by al-Qaeda. Bin Laden, who issued three audiotapes earlier this year, hasn't appeared in a videotape since October 2004. He remains on the run almost five years after the Sept. 11, 2001, al-Qaeda attacks on New York and Washington that killed almost 3,000 people.

Ayman al-Zawahiri, al-Qaeda's second-in-command, said in a June 21 videotape that he grieved for al-Zarqawi.

Al-Qaeda will continue its attacks, ``wearing down your money, killing your men, so that you go back defeated to your country, just like we defeated you before in Somalia, God willing," according to the latest tape. ``We're sad that Abu Musab and his companions have left us, but we're delighted that they have sacrificed their souls in these great epics, while defending the law of Islam."

The tape included a demand that the Jordanian king stop his ``tyranny," with the person saying, ``You forbade Abu Musab from entering his homeland while alive, don't be an obstacle to that now."

CNN, July 1, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice authorized up to a $5 million reward Friday for information leading to the capture of Abu Ayyub al-Masri, believed to be the replacement for the late leader of al Qaeda in Iraq -- Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

"Al-Masri, an Egyptian national, is a senior al Qaeda leader in Iraq and was a direct associate of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi," said Deputy State Department spokesman Adam Ereli in a statement.

"Trained in Afghanistan and Pakistan, al-Masri is an explosives expert specializing in" constructing car bombs.

The U.S. military believes al-Masri has taken over the terror network from al-Zarqawi, who was killed in a U.S. airstrike June 7 north of Baghdad. He had masterminded hundreds of bombings, kidnappings and beheadings.

The department's statement urges anyone with information on al-Masri's location to contact the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad or any other U.S. embassy or consulate, or any U.S. military commander.

In an audio message published Thursday, al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden grieved for al-Zarqawi and called him one of al Qaeda's "greatest knights." However, bin Laden did not say that al-Masri would assume al-Zarqawi's position.

The reward for al-Masri is being offered under the State Department's Rewards for Justice program, which seeks to prevent acts of terrorism against the United States. The money is paid for information leading to the arrest and/or conviction of terrorists trying to commit or committing acts against U.S. interests.

There is a $25 million reward for information leading to the capture of bin Laden. Congress passed legislation in November that allows the department to double that amount, although that hasn't happened.

DOJ_NMG_0037763

In 2003, the Bush administration paid a $30 million reward -- $15 million each -- for the tip that led to the capture of Uday and Qusay Hussein, Saddam Hussein's sons.

An informant provided information that led U.S. troops to the home in the northern Iraqi city of Mosul where the two were hiding. They died in a firefight with American forces.

Before his death, the State Department had a $25 million bounty on Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

AP2, July 1, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Friday approved up to $5 million in exchange for information on Abu Ayyub al-Masri, the new face of al-Qaida in Iraq.

Al-Masri is presumed to be the successor of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who was killed by an American bomb in early June.

Al-Masri is an Egyptian explosives expert who trained in Osama bin Laden's camps in Afghanistan and was an associate of al-Zarqawi. Al-Masri has been fighting in Iraq since at least 2003 and was engaged in the battle of Fallujah in 2004.

Rice's agency is offering the money to encourage people with information about al-Masri's location to come forward, said spokesman Adam Ereli.

The State Department has directed people with tips to contact its Rewards for Justice program, any U.S. embassy or consulate, or any U.S. military commander in Iraq.

AFP, July 1, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has authorized a reward of up to five million dollars for information leading to wanted Al-Qaeda leader Abu Ayyub al-Masri, in Iraq.

Deputy State Department spokesman Adam Ereli said in a statement Friday that the reward was offered in the hope it would encourage persons to come forward with information on al-Masri.

The State Department said Abu Ayyub al-Masri is an Egyptian national and a senior Al-Qaeda leader in Iraq.

He is a direct associate of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the former leader of Al-Qaeda in Iraq, who was recently killed by US forces, according to the US government.

"Trained in Afghanistan and Pakistan, al-Masri is an explosives expert specializing in the construction of Vehicle-Borne Improvised Explosive Devices," the same bombs responsible for large numbers of US troop casualties, the statement said.

"We encourage anyone with information on al-Masri's location to contact the US Embassy in Baghdad, any US military commander in Iraq, any US embassy or consulate, or the Rewards for Justice staff via e-mail (RFJAstate.gov) or telephone (1-800-877-3927)," the statement said.

Zarqawi was the most-wanted man in Iraq until he was killed in a US air strike on his hideout three weeks ago.

Zarqawi, who orchestrated a bloody campaign of attacks and beheadings of hostages, had long remained elusive in Iraq, despite a 25-million-dollar US bounty, until his killing on June 7.

The true identity of Abu Ayyub al-Masri remains an enigma in his reported homeland of Egypt.

"His real name is Yussef al-Dardiri, he is around 38 years old and he comes from Upper Egypt," Montasser al-Zayat, a lawyer and former member of the Islamist group Gamaa Islamiya, told AFP earlier this month.

Egyptian security sources insist they have not heard of the name.

Diaa Rashwan, an expert on political Islam at Cairo's Al-Ahram Center for Strategic Studies, recently said he too had not come across the name. "There is no trace of such a name in the Egyptian radical Islamic files," he said.

Coalition forces spokesman Major General William Caldwell said Abu Ayyub al-Masri (meaning 'the Egyptian' in Arabic), also known as Sheikh Abu Hamza al-Muhajer (meaning 'the immigrant'), was believed to be operating out of Baghdad.

Al-Qaeda, which has not disclosed the nationality of its chief in Iraq, "on its website has named him as Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, but we believe that he is one and the same," Caldwell told reporters earlier this month.

Zarqawi's successor is believed to have lived in the central Cairo area of Zawyia Hamra before going to Afghanistan in the late 1980s or early 1990s, and then on to Iraq via Iran.

Maliki Seeks Support From Sunni States In The Gulf (LAT)

By From A Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraq's new prime minister, Nouri Maliki, was to leave today to visit Saudi Arabia and other Persian Gulf states to solicit support for a reconciliation initiative that has drawn mixed reviews since it was announced Sunday.

Maliki plans to discuss bridging the widening gap between Sunni and Shiite Muslims with leaders of the oil-rich Sunni-dominated countries.

The prime minister's visit to the Gulf countries comes after a spate of incidents that have raised tensions between Iraq's Shiites and Sunnis. Maliki's amnesty proposal is directed primarily at Sunni Arab hard-liners, and the Gulf states could use their money and influence to give his plan credence among the insurgents.

But even as the prime minister takes his plan abroad, it is facing attacks at home. The Muslim Scholars Assn., an influential group of Sunni Arab clerics, denounced the proposal because it does not extend amnesty to fighters who have taken Iraqi or American lives.

And members of Maliki's own Shiite bloc remain wary of any plan that might give the appearance of appeasing Sunni-led insurgents.

Radical cleric Muqtada Sadr recently became the most prominent Shiite leader to reject the amnesty initiative, refusing any reconciliation with the U.S. and supporters of the former Baathist regime of Saddam Hussein.

"We are demanding the exit of the occupiers or to put a timetable for the withdrawal and not to extend their stay," Sadr said in his Friday sermon at the Kufa Mosque, six miles east of Najaf.

Afghan Rocket Attack Wounds 2 Canadian GIs (AP-Y2)

By Noor Khan, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2006

Two rockets fired by insurgents slammed into a coalition base in southern Afghanistan, wounding two Canadian soldiers and several others, a coalition spokesman said Saturday.

The attack happened at the coalition base in Kandahar on Friday night, and the wounded soldiers were listed in stable condition, coalition spokesman Maj. Quentin Innis said. He said others were wounded but would not provide further details.

Maj. Mark Therianult, spokesman for the Canadian forces in the troubled south, also confirmed the attack, and said the wounded Canadian soldiers were sent to Germany for further treatment.

The Canadian Press news agency reported earlier that 10 people were wounded in the attack, including soldiers from other countries and civilian employees. Their nationalities were not immediately released.

One of the rockets blew up inside a tent complex, showering soldiers and civilian employees with shrapnel that tore ragged holes in the tents and knocked over tables and chairs, said the agency, which has a reporter embedded with Canadian troops.

It said one of the Canadian soldiers was critically injured.

Officials said more than 20 rockets have been fired at the base since February, but Friday was the first time such an attack has caused casualties.

In some cases, Taliban militants have used old Soviet-era rockets, firing them using a crude timing-delay device that allows the insurgents to be far away before the rockets are launched.

Military spokesman Maj. Quentin Innis said the base will review its security and trace the rocket's trajectory to determine from where it was fired. Soldiers at the base routinely fire illumination flares over the razor-wired perimeter at night to scare off would-be attackers.

Canada has about 2,300 soldiers in southern Afghanistan. Canadian lawmakers approved a two-year extension of Canada's military mission in Afghanistan in May.

Iraq's Big Port Has Commerce, Crime — Even Camels (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

UMM QASR, Iraq — In this Persian Gulf port, by far Iraq's largest and most important, the misshapen realities of life and commerce in Iraq mix with the refreshingly ordinary ones that govern much of the rest of the world.

Commodore Thamir Nasser and the Iraqi naval forces he leads, for instance, carry out the routine law enforcement chores of intercepting smugglers who try to make away with boatloads of diesel fuel, crude oil, televisions, sheep and even troupes of Iraqi camels, which he believes are prized because they are not only especially patient but also remarkably cheap. He chases down small-time pirates and has killed them in shootouts.

But as Commodore Thamir, as he is known, bounced across the port in one of the little aluminum boats that make up most of this man's navy, he said one of his toughest tasks was dealing with the Iraqi Coast Guard. Like the Iraqi police, the coast guard is controlled by the Interior Ministry and is widely considered to be infiltrated by local militias with little interest in halting smuggling.

"They are a separate operation," Commodore Thamir said, gesturing helplessly toward the inland waters where his authority ends and the coast guard's begins.

So separate, said Lt. Cmdr. Bryan White, an American officer who advises the Iraqi Navy, that he has found it easier to arrange joint operations with maritime forces from Kuwait, just south of here, than with the Iraqi Coast Guard. "It baffles me," Commander White said.

So it goes in the port that was supposed to fall in the first hours of the 2003 invasion, but held its own through days of gun battles before it succumbed, becoming the country's most important entry point for humanitarian supplies like rice and wheat. The port, located roughly 30 miles up a sinuous inlet from the gulf, remains crucial for supplying both Iraqi markets and the American-led reconstruction effort.

Umm Qasr's ambiguous image was cemented early in the conflict when Britain's defense secretary, Geoff Hoon, likened the city to the relatively upscale British port town of Southampton. To which an unidentified British soldier replied, "There's no beer, no prostitutes and people are shooting at us. It's more like Portsmouth."

Now, after months of relative calm, sophisticated roadside bombs and assassinations of Iraqis who work with Westerners have increased across the entire south, while the port itself has become a place of danger, corruption, commercial bustle and intrigue.

In many ways Umm Qasr looks a lot like any deepwater port in the world. A long row of giant gantry cranes unloads cargo from freighters painted with unremarkable names like Tatyana, Marblue and Explorer I.

Uneven stretches of asphalt, tall grain elevators and long rows of warehouses flank the docks, which are dotted with piles of burlap sacks filled with imported cement, boxed refrigerators, microwave ovens, DVD players and television sets. Arab truck drivers doze or squat in the shade of flatbed trucks as they wait their turn to pick up the cargo and head north.

But in Umm Qasr, much of the cargo would not move an inch without bribes to crane operators and other dockworkers, said Najm Sager, a liaison between the Iraqi Port Authority and the United States Embassy who thinks that, for now, corruption is all but guaranteed at the port.

Because of the low wages paid to a typical dockworker, Mr. Sager said, "You are telling him, 'Go steal.' "

"That is why they ask for 'tips,' " Mr. Sager said, a bit euphemistically. He added that typical salaries range from $150 to $250 a month, but that a crane operator can expect to collect a standard 'tip' of $50 per job.

Crime on the docks goes beyond graft. Iraqi police reports for 2006 show at least half a dozen murders of workers at Iraq's southern ports.

Like Commodore Thamir, Mr. Sager was on the boat trip that was arranged by the United States Army Corps of Engineers to showcase $45 million in rebuilding projects, including a new cargo berth and work on two of the big cranes.

The bustle along the waterfront is no match for the ports in New York or San Francisco in their heydays, and in spite of the commercial activity it seems a little sleepy for the lifeline of a nation at war. The Marblue, carrying cement, looks so rusted it could be derelict. Railroad tracks crisscrossing the asphalt are empty because saboteurs to the north constantly cut the rail link to Baghdad, making the trains useless for cargo.

Still, for anyone looking for signs of normalcy in Iraq, the numbers are likely to impress. Between 16 and 18 freighters enter the port each week, unloading around 45,000 metric tons of wheat, 11,000 tons of rice, 55,000 tons of cement and 30,000 tons of general cargo.

It takes 4,000 to 5,000 trucks to move all of those goods out of the port each week and spread them around Iraq. As a consequence of all that traffic, port fees collected at Umm Qasr have shot up from around $600,000 a month in late 2004 to more than $2.5 million now.

But those fees are mostly absorbed in salaries, meager as they are. In a custom that may sound familiar to Americans, the Iraqi Port Authority carries thousands of unnecessary workers, Mr. Sager said, so dredging and rebuilding the port still depends on American cash. An official at the dock who asked to remain anonymous denied there were extra workers on the payroll.

And then there are the pirates and smugglers. Commodore Thamir, 44, whose official title is Iraqi operations commander, does not have a lot to work with, considering that his entire functioning navy consists of 10 of the fast aluminum boats, each 15 feet long; five Chinese-made patrol boats, each 40 feet long; and 10 dinghy-style boats.

But Commodore Thamir, a native of the southern city of Basra who graduated from the Britannia Royal Naval College in Dartmouth, England, and served in Saddam Hussein's navy, says that with the fast boats, he has everything he needs when a tip or a distress call comes in.

"Fifty knots," he said of the speed of the fast boats, which were a present from the United Arab Emirates. "It is fast enough to catch anybody."

Catch them he has. Three times his sailors and marines have chased down and killed the pirates who board ships here and often beat crew members until they reveal where their cash and valuables are stashed. His marines have grabbed suspected terrorists off the local ferry.

He has surprised small boats at sea as they transferred smuggled diesel onto larger vessels bound for points south along the Persian Gulf coast. In a series of e-mail communications, Commander White, who is the executive officer for a British-American mentoring and rebuilding program called the Naval Transition Team, confirmed the commodore's recollections.

Commander White said that the naval security forces, which fall under the Ministry of Defense, face the same challenges of training and equipment as the Iraqi Army does. "But if we pulled out today, the Iraqi Navy could run itself," he said.

Whether or not that prediction will ever be tested, Commodore Thamir and his friend Mr. Sager appeared most interested in bantering about the load of smuggled camels the navy had intercepted.

"The Arabs like camels," the commodore said, trying to keep a straight face when asked why any smuggler would attempt such a thing.

"Iraqi camels and sheep are the most desirable," Mr. Sager said, as they both began to laugh. "And cheap."

Where Is The Weapons Story? (WT)

While the Bush administration focuses on the elimination of the terrorist threat in Iraq, the Saddam-was-no-threat left has remained obsessed with the pre-war months, not only harping on the failures of Western intelligence, but more importantly, advancing a hardened historical narrative. They would have the world believe the Bush administration was not only wrong about the existence of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, but also lied intentionally and went to war for some unstated cynical reason -- oil, enriching war profiteers, avenging Daddy Bush.

To a large degree, they are succeeding with their revisionist history lesson, and the proof is in the pudding of the polls. Not only does a majority declare that the war wasn't worth the cost to our troops and our treasury, but a majority believes George W. Bush is not honest or trustworthy. When the USA Today-Gallup poll asked if the words "honest" and "trustworthy" applied to Mr. Bush in February of 2001, 64 percent said he was honest, while 29 percent said the words did not apply. By April of 2006, the numbers were 41 percent honest, 56 percent dishonest. It's an easy guess that a lot of that turnaround is our failure to find Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction.

So it was surprising to Sen. Rick Santorum, Pennsylvania Republican, and Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican, who were investigating whispers that weapons of mass destruction have actually been found by American troops in Iraq, to learn the rumors were true. After badgering administration officials for several months, the government gave the legislators a declassified memo stating that some 500 weapons of mass destruction have been found by coalition forces in Iraq, mostly sarin and mustard-gas agents, some of which "remain hazardous and potentially lethal."

But when the legislators released this information, some Bush administration officials poor-mouthed the findings, noting that these old WMDs were hardly evidence of an ongoing post-Gulf War WMD program by Saddam, the fearful scenario that dominated the pre-war debate. Others, like Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, emphatically declared that this was hard evidence. Regardless, this memo packs an important rhetorical punch. How many hundreds of times have our major media told us there were "no weapons of mass destruction" found? And how many thousands of times have leftists jumped off that springboard to an elaborate Bush-lied-people-died jeremiad?

This discovery should be a crucial, corrective turning point to the stuck-in-2003, pre-war obsessives. The hardened historical narrative needs to be amended. There were WMDs in Iraq that could have been used against our troops or acquired by terrorists.

An honest, nonpartisan news media that cared about the facts without political calculation would have taken care to correct the record, even if the findings were comparatively underwhelming to the pre-war scenarios. A fair and balanced story could be done. But the reception of this declassified memo shows we do not have an honest, nonpartisan news media, and political calculation is everything.

Here's how the news of the WMD finds in Iraq was filtered by the so-called "mainstream media." Fox News treated it as an important story. NBC reported on it with one "Nightly News" story, with pros and cons, noting that unnamed sources at the Pentagon "poured cold water" on the scoop's importance. ABC and CBS did nothing. CNN mentioned it in passing, heavy on the skepticism. On MSNBC, Keith Olbermann howled at the moon, mocking the find as "weapons of minor discomfort" and suggesting Mr. Santorum was like Sen. Joe McCarthy, holding up a "blank page" of supposed communists in the government.

Our major newspapers were also foot-draggers. The Washington Post ran five paragraphs of dismissive tone on page A-10. The New York Times skipped it for a day, then put it on A-20 with the headline "For Diehards, Search for Iraq's WMD Isn't Over." (The liberal diehards at the Times were saving Page One for their infamous scoop disclosing to the public, including terrorists, our government's financial tracking methods for terrorist groups.) The news magazines weren't interested in the WMD scoop, either. Time and U.S. News & World Report ran nothing, and Newsweek dismissed it with another headline about "trumped-up threats" in Iraq.

The largest remaining mystery is why Team Bush seems allergic to releasing more information on the missing weapons in Iraq, and more facts out of the archives of Saddam's heinous regime. If they are acting, or better put, not acting out of intimidation by the media, who don't want any new information to change their tilted first draft of history, the polls suggest that inaction has damaged them dramatically.

Guantanamo Grumblings (WT)

By Victor Davis Hanson

The Washington Times, July 1, 2006

When President Bush arrived in Vienna last week, protesters bore "World's No. 1 Terrorist" signs while chanting "We will, we will fight Bush." A Harris Poll conducted prior to the president's visit revealed that the European public thinks America is a greater global threat than either North Korea or Iran.

Apparently, our terrorist detention center at Guantanamo Bay is the most recent open sore. When, European ministers have been persisting, will the United States close down this Neanderthal embarrassment to liberal Western values?

[In a major setback for the president, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled Thursday he overstepped his powers in setting up military war crimes tribunals for detainees at Guantanamo Bay. The ruling did not address the status of Guantanamo.]

This European anger, however, doesn't seem to be based on evidence of systematic American abuse. Despite Democratic Illinois Sen. Dick Durbin's claim that Guantanamo was akin to Nazi camps, the few reported regrettable, isolated cases of sleep deprivation and harassment seem no worse than what we read about in most prisons. The roughly 450 prisoners still there -- many of them killers -- are probably treated as well as inmates in either Europe or the U.S.

Further, Guantanamo exists to fill a vacuum in an undeclared and unprecedented postmodern war of few good choices in which the enemy does not wear uniforms, adhere to the Geneva Convention or distinguish civilians from soldiers.

If the U.S. were to close down Guantanamo and send the detainees back to their home countries, some returnees would be freed and treated as heroes -- and then rejoin the global jihad. Other released terrorists, or so the Europeans no doubt would whine, might be executed by the autocratic Middle Eastern governments in their homelands that are as afraid of Islamic terrorists as we are.

So, should we instead try all of the Guantanamo detainees inside the U.S.?

No. By doing that, we would be inviting thousands of lawyers and public defenders to argue, on behalf of their clients, that we are not in a real war but simply prosecuting common criminals. Numerous trials and appeals as costly and circus-like as the drawn-out spectacle of Zacarias Moussaoui (the so-called 20th hijacker) would likely follow. And, in the end, Europeans would still object, since the U.S. would be exposing foreign nationals to possible death-penalty sentences.

The real problem is that Guantanamo Bay, like Mr. Bush himself, has become a symbol of sorts. It is an easy scapegoat through which Europeans can vent their much larger love-hate frustrations with their protector and rival, the hyper-power America.

The pacifism of the European Union was supposed to be a post-Cold War model of liberal reason for the rest of the world. Instead, Islamic fascists have either ignored Europe's human-rights advocacy or considered it a sign of weakness to be exploited. An impotent EU is embarrassed and needs cheap targets like Guantanamo to transfer attention away from its past naivete about the dangers of Islamic fascism.

By ankle-biting America on Guantanamo, the Europeans sound moral and tough while ignoring the real dangers for which they have absolutely no solutions -- unassimilated and angry Muslims, the Dutch and Danes under assault by radical Islamic censors and a defenseless Europe potentially soon in range of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's nuclear-tipped missiles.

Note also that the U.S. has been mostly quiet about Europe's own ethical lapses in this war. Americans are in a quandary with Iran in large part because the Europeans -- for whom profits trump idealism -- sold the theocracy technology needed for the bomb. Nothing new there: Saddam once got his nuclear reactor from the French and his bombproof bunkers from the Germans.

We also hear a lot about the three suicides at Guantanamo but almost nothing about the still-unexplained death of Slobodan Milosevic while being held in Europe. When was the last time Americans chided the Germans that Mohamed Atta conspired to murder thousands of Americans while in their country?

Have we forgotten that Ahmed Omar Sheikh, the killer of Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl, and Richard Reid, the would-be shoe bomber, at one time fit in well with the radical Islamic culture that thrives in London. And how about Abu Hamza al-Masri, who plotted against the U.S. -- he's wanted by American authorities on charges of trying to establish a terrorist training camp in Oregon -- from his sanctuary in a London mosque?

Yet if the Eiffel Tower topples to a jihadist suicide bomber who assembled his team in Los Angeles or Miami, or if an Iranian missile soars over the Brandenburg Gate, expect the Europeans to drop their present high talk about the "gulag" at Guantanamo -- and start whispering about the need for more American terrorist detention centers, classical deterrence and their own missile defense.

But until the Europeans' dream world is shattered, we will hear nonstop screeching about American barbarity. Such outrage says far more about them than us.

Breaking Party Protocol (WSJ)

By Ellen Gamerman

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

In the Iraq war, a new approach to welcoming home the troops is emerging. From bonfires to black-tie galas, how some families are bucking tradition

For a lakefront party in Whispering Pines, N.C., next month, plans include a professional photographer, a live band, and 200 guests. It's not a wedding or an anniversary party -- it's a homecoming celebration for Lt. Kevin Martin, an Army reservist who has been serving in Iraq for the last year.

The $5,000 shindig sounds great to the guest of honor. "The bigger the better!" writes Lt. Martin in an email from Iraq. "It will be a great way for me to show them I am back and hopefully still injury free, share some stories and reunite with those I care about."

As the political debate over bringing the troops home intensifies, a related matter fraught with symbolism is playing out for service members and their families. The question: How to mark the soldiers' return and welcome them home. In the Iraq War, a new approach is starting to emerge. Military tradition and conventional wisdom dictate that families should keep homecomings low-key to avoid overwhelming the troops while they're readjusting to being back.

For a variety of reasons, from the military's shifting demographics to attitudes about the current war, some families are taking a different route, opting for outsize celebrations. These include black-tie galas, elaborate beach bonfires and, in the case of Sgt. Kurt Power of Abington, Mass., a 600-guest event his family has dubbed "Kurt-a-palooza III" (Kurt-a-paloozas I and II were send-off parties for the 23-year-old's two deployments).

Traditionally, family homecomings have been smaller affairs. Though the official welcome at a base might involve some ceremony, most families have opted for home-cooked dinners or a simple backyard barbecue. Finances are a factor: Basic pay, not including benefits, can range from $14,000 for a new recruit to $30,000 for a mid-level noncommissioned officer to $96,000 for a senior officer.

The military recommends a quiet approach to homecoming parties. A Web site for spouses funded by the Defense Department, for example, urges husbands and wives in the first week to "hold off on visits to relatives and limit time with friends until you've settled into a comfortable routine at home." The site also warns against lavish spending on homecomings, adding: "It can be tempting to celebrate your return with dinners out or special gifts. Be careful not to get into debt trouble."

GUESTS OF HONOR

• This year, many Fourth of July celebrations pay tribute to those serving in Iraq or those who have served.

• More soldiers and families are planning elaborate homecomings. Hear a podcast1 of reporter Ellen Gamerman discussing the new trend.

But some military families say they don't feel there's enough daily awareness of the sacrifices being made. For them, big parties are a way to express gratitude and pride -- even if it means dipping into the family savings to do so.

This war's unique aspects are also changing the homecoming equation. Iraq marks the first extended conflict for the U.S. since the draft was abandoned in 1973. About 29% of the 1.3 million troops deployed since the invasion of Afghanistan in October 2001 have done two or more tours of duty. This is a big change from Vietnam when the draft assured supplies of fresh troops, and from the 1991 Gulf War, which lasted eight months. In this conflict, homecoming is often temporary -- and when troops do come back for good, it follows an extended absence.

More troops are returning to spouses eager to celebrate the event. About 52% of the fighting force is married, according to the Defense Department. Military experts say the troops in Vietnam, with a draft that tilted heavily toward young men, were largely unmarried, though the Defense Department said it had not compiled marriage statistics for all the services in that war.

In another shift, many of the troops today are returning directly to civilian communities. National Guard and Reserve members have comprised as much as 40% of forces, compared with a high of 20% during the Gulf War.

"Homecoming is a more ceremonious event," says Brig. Gen. Terry Wiley, who commands the Delaware Army National Guard. "The reservists are coming back to their families, their churches, their fire departments, their civic organizations, their employers. It's more of a homecoming because they're established in a town."

Sgt. William Long's family was so excited about his return two weeks ago, they planned a six-day party beginning this weekend. The 24-year-old National Guard soldier served 12 months in Iraq, staying even during his two-week R&R so as not to leave his buddies. His family has invited 40 guests to join them on four houseboats on Norris Lake in Tennessee. They'll cook up chicken and barbecue ribs in between tubing, water-skiing and fishing.

Sgt. Long, who plans to resume his college course work, says he is looking forward to playing with his little sister and floating in the lake. "The only thing I care about is if my family's there," he says. "I'll be more than happy to see anybody who wants to see me."

After seven months away from home, Marine Capt. James Hoffmann arrived from Iraq last winter and walked into his in-laws' home in San Marcos, Calif., to find 60 people waiting there for a surprise bash. In Manhattan, returning Army Capt. Paul Mysliwiec was feted with 300 guests, a live band and a catered spread. In San Diego, event planner Thomas Bui says he's planned parties that vary widely in cost, but the most expensive was a $50,000 black-tie event that featured gold-embossed invitations, a lobster and steak dinner and a show by Hawaiian dancers. "They just wanted to be able to relax and not have to worry about hearing bombs blow up," he says.

But planning these oversized homecomings can be tricky. Families say they have to prepare guests to avoid questions about the battlefield or casualties so the returning soldier doesn't get uncomfortable. Event planners say they have to find disc jockeys, caterers and florists who can accommodate spur-of-the-moment plans since troops sometimes don't know their return date until a day or two before they leave the desert. At Plants Alive!, a special-events landscaper outside Washington, D.C., workers space the tables far apart so returning service members in wheelchairs can visit their guests.

Command Sgt. Maj. Gus Klein favors downplaying the festivities. The Army National Guard soldier says he was somewhat dazed when his family threw him a $2,000 DJ-led dance bash just a few days after his return from Afghanistan in 2003. Though he knows his family meant well, he says he wasn't really ready to socialize with so many people so soon.

"I really didn't need to have people there rehashing all the war stories, what happened to you, what'd you do, did you shoot anybody, did you kill anybody, those kinds of questions," says Sgt. Klein, speaking from Fort Bliss, Texas, where he is now stationed. "A soldier, man or woman, needs an opportunity to get rid of that stuff on their own." Now, he visits VA centers to help returning soldiers readjust to home life after war, and counsels against such parties.

In recent years, the military has launched a broader effort to guide troops and their families through the process of returning home -- a legacy from Vietnam and a result of new insight into posttraumatic stress disorder. A 90-page "reintegration guide" published by the Army and distributed to some troops before they depart Iraq advises on everything from small issues (which items make good souvenirs to bring home in your duffel bag; silverware from the Iraqi regime is barred) to larger ones (how to get reacquainted with a spouse and discipline the kids after a long separation).

Another resource for service members is a "family life consultant," which the Army began offering in 2004. The mental-health expert offers help with child rearing, relationships and other personal issues through workshops, group discussions and private consultations.

Indeed, the process of coming home can be a whirlwind. It starts when the commanding officer gives troops a rough idea of their redeployment date, but as for the actual departure, families often get only a day's notice (one reason: the military doesn't disclose details on troop movements for security purposes). One pattern that's unusual in this war is that sometimes scores of soldiers who were shipped out and fought together are on the same plane home 12 months later. In contrast, during the Vietnam War, troops were often sent home individually, military officials say. When the troops return together, they often pool their resources for a homecoming celebration or beef up the guest lists of each others' parties.

Sherri Hutton says she had been advised by officials at Camp Pendleton in Southern California not to go overboard, but she asked her husband if he would be up for a big welcome-home, and he agreed. Within a week of Marine Staff Sgt. Michael Hutton's return last April, Ms. Hutton organized a bonfire for 75 people -- including six Marines who returned with her husband's battalion -- on the same beach the family had camped on seven months earlier, the night before Sgt. Hutton was deployed. The party included karaoke, a keg and a "bring your own steak" barbecue.

"He was excited to go exactly back to the way things were when he left," she says. But there was a sad note to their reunion: Five people from the battalion died during the deployment.

Often, the welcome-home parties fall in between deployments, which families say can increase the pressure to go all out. A "pseudo-homecoming" is what retired Army psychologist L. Scott Fairchild calls it. With the Gulf War "there was a demarcation, a way point where they knew they had accomplished their mission," says Dr. Fairchild, who worked with military families on Gulf War homecoming issues at Fort Bragg, N.C. "One of the differences now is the ambivalence -- these soldiers are going to have the tension and stress and not know when it's going to be over."

Cindie Tinsman threw a homecoming party for her son Army Cpl. Kevin Tinsman when he returned home from a year at Camp Anaconda in Iraq, nicknamed "Mortaritaville" -- and before he shipped out for a second deployment. Ms. Tinsman, a Pennsylvania school bus driver, took the money she and her husband never spent on a wedding reception or anniversary party and put it toward the $2,000 bash. "Mama don't have lots of diamonds," she recalls telling her husband. "We're having a party." It took place at VFW Post 106 in West Chester, Pa., with a rented jukebox, a bartender and 80 pounds of roast beef and meatballs for 120 people.

Ms. Tinsman says while she might wait a bit before throwing a party next time, she has no doubt she'll plan one again when he's finally home for good. "We'll probably have it next July Fourth," she says. "It's going to be a heckuva celebration."

Tribute Or Protest? (WSJ)

By Jeffrey Zaslow

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

Lowering flags for soldiers killed in Iraq emerges as another flashpoint on the home front.

Driving on a highway in Howell, Mich., John Ellsworth noticed that a giant flag at an outlet shopping mall was at half-staff. Mr. Ellsworth was heading to a funeral home, where visitation was being held for his son, a 20-year-old Marine killed in Iraq.

Just after Mr. Ellsworth spotted the flag, a realization hit him: It was at half-staff to honor his son, Lance Cpl. Justin Ellsworth. He recalled receiving a notice from Gov. Jennifer Granholm, who since late 2003 has decreed that flags be lowered for every Michigan soldier killed in the line of duty.

"It was comforting to see that people who didn't even know my son were remembering him," says Mr. Ellsworth. Later that day in November 2004, he went to see the lowered flag at the state capitol. "I thought to myself, 'This is for you, buddy.' Justin was always my little buddy.' "

In some 16 states, flags are routinely lowered for fallen home-state soldiers. But what some see as a gesture of tribute, others consider inappropriate, demoralizing and even devious. Half-staff efforts, which have spread to states Oregon, Minnesota, California, Illinois, Kentucky and Maine -- are generating controversy among politicians, veterans and citizens unsure about whether and when to lower the flag.

The U.S. Flag Code, adopted in 1942, says governors may honor state "officials" after they die by lowering the flag. Critics say it is inappropriate for governors to label soldiers as officials. Some wonder whether the flag tributes are really an attempt to undermine support for the war by reminding Americans of the fatalities. And though many veterans welcome the lowered flags, others say the day for honoring war dead is Memorial Day.

During World War II, when Michigan soldiers were dying at the rate of 13 a day, there was no effort to lower flags for every one of them. "If there had been, the flag would never have been raised for the entire war," says Bruce Butgereit, of Kentwood, Mich., who serves as national patriotic instructor of the Sons of Union Veterans of the Civil War.

Mr. Butgereit says he opposes the Michigan governor's call for flying flags at half-staff because it disregards the Flag Code. He believes Gov. Granholm, a Democrat, feels "some sense of loss" when a Michigan soldier dies, but that "her motivation to order the flag lowered was purely political."

In an interview, Gov. Granholm denies this, saying she first thought to lower flags when a state employee lost his nephew in 2003, and asked for the tribute at his state work site. That led Gov. Granholm to decide to honor all soldiers from Michigan and to do it statewide. Since her proclamation in December 2003, Gov. Granholm has ordered the flag lowered for 72 soldiers who've died. She called all 72 families in advance to tell them about the flag tribute, she says.

Gov. Granholm says she is aware that some people think she lowers the flag to remind citizens that the war isn't going well. She says this is not the case. She hopes the half-staff flags "remind people about the costs and sacrifices of having a free nation," she says. She asks citizens who see a lowered flag to "say a prayer, because that soldier's family is here within our borders."

Last month, Gov. Granholm's opponent in the November election, Republican Dick DeVos, indicated through a spokesman that, if elected, he would lower the flag for "officials," as designated by the Flag Code, but not for soldiers. A public outcry followed, with military families calling radio talk shows and writing letters to newspapers to vent their anger.

Within days, Mr. DeVos issued a statement saying he would continue the governor's flag policy -- and that his position had been misinterpreted. Mr. DeVos, son of Amway founder Richard DeVos Sr., declined to be interviewed for this article.

The flag code is a guideline rather than a document enforceable by law. The National Flag Foundation, a nonprofit educational group in Pittsburgh, Pa., defines a state official as "someone in a state cabinet position or higher" -- not a soldier. The foundation recommends that governors lower their state flags, rather than the stars and stripes, to honor fallen soldiers. (That's the practice in Virginia.) In any case, flying the U.S. flag at full-staff "honors all those who have sacrificed in the hundreds of years of our country's history," says Joyce Doody, the foundation's executive director.

Some who have successfully lobbied for flag tributes have been open about their antiwar goals. Paul Vogel of Barrington, Ill., has a son who served in Iraq. Mr. Vogel is now a peace activist with Military Families Speak Out. In 2004, Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich, a Democrat, said it was Mr. Vogel who helped persuade him to lower flags at state buildings for fallen Illinois National Guardsman. Mr. Vogel says he sees the half-staff tribute as both "anti-war" and "pro-soldier" -- and a reminder that "for a country at war, we seem benignly unaware of the cost." He hopes the lowered flags convince Americans that "we've sacrificed enough of our 19- and 20-year-olds to this illegal war."

Mr. Vogel's personal politics had nothing to do with the governor's decision to lower flags, says Gerardo Cardenas, a spokesman for Gov. Blagojevich. The governor was concerned about the need to honor soldiers' sacrifices "especially when the federal government is leaving millions of veterans behind," says the spokesman.

Governors who've ordered flags lowered are evenly mixed between Democrats and Republicans. The extent of the flag lowering varies by state. For GOP governors who order flags to half-staff, the terrain is potentially tricky since a state filled with lowered flags could be seen as a slight to the president's policies. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's spokeswoman says, "The only thing that factors into his thinking is paying tribute to our military men and women. It's all about expressing gratitude. There's nothing political."

In South Dakota, a spokesman for Republican Gov. Mike Rounds said the governor doesn't believe lowering the flag offers fuel for the antiwar movement because people in South Dakota understand the risks of war and the reasons the fight in Iraq is necessary.

Republican Missouri Gov. Matt Blunt has refused to lower the flag for soldiers killed in Iraq because soldiers are in federal service, says a spokeswoman. Governors, therefore, don't have authority to lower flags in their honor. Other Republican governors cite the Flag Code and its definition of "officials," which they say excludes soldiers.

Rick Johnson, a Democratic state representative in Missouri, unsuccessfully tried this year to pass a bill requiring flags to be lowered when soldiers from the state are killed.

Rep. Johnson, a veteran of the first Persian Gulf War, says that in the current conflict, "we went to war under false pretenses." Unable to get his bill passed, Rep. Johnson has kept a flagpole in his backyard at half-staff for two years, as a tribute to all soldiers who've died.

In Michigan's wealthy Oakland County, in suburban Detroit, County Executive L. Brooks Patterson, a Republican, had at first refused to comply with Gov. Granholm's flag orders. He feared the lowered flags "would be a constant reminder of the high cost of war, and would undermine the war on terror," says spokesman Robert Dustman. "He also felt that he didn't want the governor using this as a political thing, holding a tearjerker news conference every time a soldier was killed."

Veterans who support the half-staff order visited with Mr. Patterson and asked him to reconsider his decision. Mr. Patterson retains all his initial feelings about the potentially troubling messages sent by the lowered flags, "but out of respect for the veterans' groups, he decided to comply with their wishes," says Mr. Dustman.

Walter McVeigh, a World War II veteran in Grand Rapids, Mich., is a vocal opponent of Gov. Granholm's policy, calling it "misguided" and "a zig-zag tribute." He says people are confused. "You see some flags up, some flags down." After he wrote a letter to his local paper saying Memorial Day is the appropriate time for lowering flags, the backlash included a letter-writer who called him "callous" and labeled his views "reprehensible." Mr. McVeigh says he shakes off such criticism. He has even gone up to strangers' homes when they display the flag incorrectly, to tell them about proper flag etiquette. He says people seem willing to hear him out.

Mr. Butgereit, of the Civil War group, heard from one angry veteran who called him "petty" for speaking out against the half-staff flags. Mr. Butgereit responded with a long letter to the vet outlining his reasoning, explaining the Flag Code, and suggesting that Gov. Granholm could better pay tribute to the military through programs to educate citizens about the flag.

Many military families say they support the flag tributes -- even if antiwar activists are behind them.

Sue Nicholas, who owns an auto-glass company in Taylor, Mich., has a son who served in the Air Force in Iraq and is now stationed in Alaska. She has lowered the flag in front of her business dozens of times; she monitors announcements from Gov. Granholm online to know when soldiers have died.

She says customers almost never ask why the flag is at half-staff. "They're oblivious to it. Or they don't want to know because it's depressing," she says. The only people who "live, eat and breathe the war" are those with loved ones who've served in Iraq, she says. For her birthday this spring, she received a flagpole for her front yard from her friends in the "Michigan Military Moms" support group. Now she lowers the flag at home, too.

Paula Zasadny says she was comforted when the state of Michigan lowered flags "to honor my brave little soldier." Her 19-year-old daughter, Army Spc. Holly McGeogh, of Taylor, Mich., was killed in Iraq in 2004. Just before her body was brought home, Ms. Zasadny had a flagpole placed in her yard, and she follows Gov. Granholm's directions on flag protocol. "Even if we have to put our flags up and down every single day, that's something we as civilians of this great country need to do," she says. "Those soldiers are fighting for us."

Last November, at Bon Homme Yankton Electric Association in Tabor, S.D., employees were dealing with a terrible ice storm; 90% of customers were without power. At the time, Richard Schild, the company's office manager, was a National Guardsman serving in Iraq. When he got an email about the storm, he actually called in from overseas to offer input and advice.

The next day, while in a convoy driving through Baghdad, Sgt. 1st Class Schild was killed by a roadside bomb.

Back in South Dakota, the governor would soon order flags to half-staff. Sgt. Schild's grieving colleagues sought to lower the flag in front of the company's headquarters, but because of the ice storm, the flag was frozen to the pole. Eventually, general manager Merlin Goehring was able to hack off the ice and bring down the flag.

"It was very emotional," says Mr. Goehring, "but we felt we needed to show Rich the respect he deserved. We wanted to get that flag flying the way it was supposed to."

Texas: War Protesters Sue Over Roadside Camping Bans (NYT)

Cindy Sheehan and four other war protesters sued McLennan County over roadside camping and parking bans near President Bush's ranch in Crawford, saying they want to return to what became an "international symbol of protest against the Iraq war." Ms. Sheehan, who lives in Berkeley, Calif., was in Waco to file the suit, which also names the sheriff, county commissioners and county judge individually. The suit filed in state district court asks that the ordinances not be enforced during protests in August and ultimately be declared void. Ms. Sheehan's oldest son, Casey, was killed in Iraq in 2004. Last summer, she reinvigorated the antiwar movement with her peace vigil that started in ditches off the winding, two-lane road leading to Mr. Bush's ranch. (AP)

New Supreme Court Begins To Show Its Stripes (KRT)

By Stephen Henderson

Knight Ridder, July 1, 2006

WASHINGTON - At the Supreme Court, they say each group of nine justices is different, that a switch in just one seat fundamentally alters the dynamic among them all. As the court closes its 2005-06 term, when two new members, including the chief justice, took their seats after a 12-year stasis, that truism is evident in the court's rulings.

From decisions on the Clean Water Act, police procedure and abortion to others on political gerrymandering and the death penalty, the focus was on how Chief Justice John G. Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito were changing the court's outcomes.

In political terms, they established themselves as solid conservatives. But as their approaches to the law became clearer, they revealed nuances in their thinking that distinguished them from the bench's more doctrinaire members, Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas.

The term's lone blockbuster opinion - rejecting the Bush administration's military tribunals at the Guantanamo Bay prison in Cuba - highlighted the term's only other significant theme: the emergence of Justice Anthony Kennedy at the court's center. He has taken over the compromising, coalition-building role that he once shared with former Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. In cases that split the justices narrowly, Kennedy was in the majority more than anyone else.

"It's now clear that two justices have replaced Sandra Day O'Connor," said Elliot Mincberg, legal director for People for the American Way. "Justice Alito took her seat on the court, while Justice Kennedy has taken her role as the key swing vote."

It will take at least a few more terms before the character of the new court becomes fully evident. Yet some court watchers say some things are becoming clear.

"This is, of course, more a Kennedy court than a Roberts court," said David Garrow, a law professor at Oxford University in England. "But already we've certainly gotten some clear indications, both stylistic and substantive, of how Roberts will develop."

The term began quietly, with Roberts installed as chief justice and O'Connor still in her seat, awaiting her successor's confirmation. The justices struck an early chord of unanimity in October in a long string of opinions that included some topics that usually bring discord. They did it by deciding many cases on narrow legal grounds, avoiding more controversial elements.

The term's lone abortion case provides an example.

The justices, in considering whether a New Hampshire abortion restriction was unconstitutional because it lacked a health exception for the woman, simply decided that a lower court should consider the question more carefully.

The justices also unanimously said that the government could withhold money from law schools that bar military recruiters and that the government couldn't bar a small Christian sect from using hallucinogenic tea for religious ceremonies.

Overall, the court closed the term with more unanimous opinions than it has in recent years and with fewer concurrences and dissents.

Alito's influence was less noticeable than Roberts', which is typical for a first-year justice who isn't chief. He also missed the term's first half while his confirmation process unfolded.

Once on the court, he established a restrained conservativism that mirrored his work as an appellate judge. His voting record resembled Scalia's and Thomas', but even more Roberts'.

The term offered more clues about Roberts' thinking; as chief justice, he had greater impact. His first dissent came in March, when the court said police could not enter a home on one occupant's say-so if another objects. He craftily took aim at the court majority's logic and turned their own concerns back on them.

The decision, Roberts said, would harm victims of domestic violence whose abusers could simply turn police away at the door.

Roberts' opinion also mocked the majority's attempt to define the scope of cohabitation arrangements and the "social expectations" that accompany them.

"The Court creates constitutional law by surmising what is typical when a social guest encounters an entirely atypical situation," Roberts wrote. "The fact is that a wide variety of differing social situations can readily be imagined, giving rise to quite different social expectations. The possible scenarios are limitless."

The tone wasn't snarky, but the opinion showed how Roberts' razor-sharp intellect could needle his opponents.

Garrow also points to a Roberts line in the Texas political gerrymandering case, where he expressed frustration over efforts to draw congressional districts to assure just the right ethnic mix.

"It is a sordid business, this divvying us up by race," Roberts wrote. That sentiment could influence him next term on a case involving school district efforts to maintain certain levels of minority enrollment.

The next term is already shaping up as a big one, with major abortion, affirmative action and environmental cases on the docket.

Roberts' most sweeping opinion came in a case where the court didn't decide a substantive issue. When the justices dismissed a suit by Ohio taxpayers claiming that a state tax incentive plan violated their constitutional rights, Roberts took the opportunity to pen a virtual treatise on the judicial doctrine of "standing," or when someone has a right to bring a claim before a federal court.

It is the first question that courts must address when considering a case, and it's a subject of sharp debate in legal circles.

Roberts outlined an approach that tacks closely to the line taken by many judicial conservatives, who believe the ability to sue is limited. Remarkably, Roberts drew no objections from other justices or even a concurring opinion suggesting there was another side to consider. That could be a sign of deference to his leadership, or it could be diplomacy among colleagues who recognized that Roberts' opinion wasn't binding at that point.

Roberts and Alito distinguished themselves from the court's most rigidly conservative members, Scalia and Thomas, in several key cases. They backed away from the duo's assertion that no amount of political gerrymandering should compel court intervention and from their proposition that any limits on political contributions are unconstitutional.

Kennedy emerged as the justice that the court's liberal and conservative blocs must woo to reach a majority. That was evident not just in how frequently he provided a crucial fifth vote, but also in how often his opinion tempered a ruling.

In a decision that said police armed with warrants can enter a house unannounced without fear that any evidence they find will be excluded from trial, Kennedy's opinion kept the decision from obliterating the so-called "exclusionary rule" altogether.

In a case that questioned the scope of the Clean Water Act, Kennedy's opinion held the court majority back from nearly eliminating government regulation of wetlands.

Kennedy also modified the court's decision on political gerrymandering, leaving open the possibility for further court refinement of the issue in the future.

Early Supreme Court Consensus Fades (AP-Y2)

By Nancy Benac, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 1, 2006

Last October, liberal standard-bearer John Paul Stevens welcomed conservative Chief Justice John Roberts to the court by wishing him "a long and happy career in our common calling." In February, it was Roberts' turn to welcome fellow conservative Samuel Alito with exactly the same collegial greeting.

Yet for all the talk of consensus and harmony on the new Supreme Court, plenty of trees had to die to provide enough paper for the justices' fractured rulings on some of the most contentious cases of the court's term.

And all sides are betting that this transitional year — in which Roberts slipped into his seat just days before the term began and Alito arrived halfway through — served as a fairly mild prelude to far bigger dustups to come next term and for many years hence.

Roberts, the smooth and savvy chief justice from central casting, promised at his confirmation hearings last September to be a "modest" justice rather than an activist. In that spirit, he opted for a basic black robe rather than the flashy gold stripes worn on the sleeves of his predecessor, the late William Rehnquist.

Roberts has spoken publicly of his desire to achieve unanimity through narrow rulings that would offer "clarity and guidance." And he had some success, evidenced by a healthy share of unanimous opinions.

Even some cases that were expected to split the court — on abortion, campaign finance and disabled inmates, for example — were resolved unanimously and without creating upheaval.

But as more difficult cases trickled out before the justices began their summer break on Friday, it became clear that "the early buzz of peace, love, harmony and Kumbaya was probably overstated," said Ohio State University law professor Douglas Berman. "This is a closely divided court on a lot of issues that can't help but express genuine disagreements on the way critical legal issues ought to be looked at."

In a 5-4 case on Monday upholding Kansas' death penalty law, the four liberal dissenters labeled the statute "obtuse by any moral or social measure." Justice Antonin Scalia, known for his fire-breathing opinions, countered that the liberals were contributing to international "sanctimonious criticism of America's death penalty."

In a 5-3 ruling on Thursday, the court's last day, moderate Justice Anthony M. Kennedy joined the court's liberal members in finding that President Bush had overstepped his authority in ordering military war crimes trials for Guantanamo Bay detainees. Justice Clarence Thomas underscored his strong opposition by reading his dissent from the bench for the only the second time in his 15-year-career.

In a major wetlands case this month, the court produced five separate opinions covering 100 pages. Roberts lamented that, because of the muddled result, interested parties "will now have to feel their way on a case-by-case basis."

The divisions aren't just along liberal-conservative lines.

Within the reinforced conservative wing of the court, there are strong and sometimes conflicting opinions.

Scalia took fellow conservative Alito to task for making "illegitimate and ill-advised" use of legislative history in one opinion. In another case, Alito faulted Scalia for making "a subtle but important mistake" in his analysis of a defendant's right to counsel.

Both men seemed to be sending the message that they're not intellectual clones: "Don't call us Scalito," as paraphrased by lawyer Kathleen Sullivan, moderator of an American Constitution Society panel reviewing the court's term.

For all of the focus on the court's new fifty-something justices and the chemistry of the so-called Roberts court, it turns out that the jurist to watch is 69-year-old Anthony Kennedy, a moderate who's been on the bench nearly two decades. His role as a swing voter was overshadowed in years past by that of centrist Sandra Day O'Connor.

But now that O'Connor is gone, "the basic principle that you need to understand is that it's Justice Kennedy's world and you just live in it," said Washington lawyer Thomas Goldstein, who regularly argues cases at the high court and tracks voting trends.

As he fancifully put it, "Justice O'Connor, having been the most powerful woman in the universe, handed the keys to him on the way out the door and said, "Have fun,' and he took up that invitation."

This term, Kennedy has provided the fifth vote on some of the court's toughest cases, including the death penalty, Guantanamo and wetlands cases.

More often than not, he has sided with the conservatives. Court watchers expect that trend to be more pronounced next term, when the docket includes contentious issues such as affirmative action and a federal ban on what opponents call partial birth abortion.

"We're almost certain to see next term an emphasis on those areas, namely abortion and race, where Kennedy is measurably more conservative than O'Connor in ways that likely will be utterly decisive," said David Garrow, a Supreme Court historian at Cambridge University.

The replacement of Rehnquist with Roberts didn't shift the court's ideological balance much, but the substitution of Alito for O'Connor clearly pushed the court to the right.

An analysis of voting trends shows Alito's affinity with the Scalia-Kennedy-Thomas-Roberts bloc to be as much as 15 percent higher than was O'Connor's.

DOJ_NMG_0037777

"I think everybody really has to be aware that the court has become considerably more conservative," said Goldstein. "The real pitch in ideological cases has to be made to Justice Kennedy, and it's very much going to have to be made on a case-by-case basis."

The court's shift to the right could well sharpen in years to come, depending on the timing of future departures from the bench and the political party of the next president. The court's four conservatives — ages 51, 56, 58 and 70 — are actuarially destined to outlast the liberals — ages 66, 67, 73, and 86.

That age split has created an unusual dynamic for Roberts, at 51 the youngest chief justice in two centuries.

"The people sitting around the conference table are his parents' generation and they call him chief," said Thomas Baker, a Florida International University law professor who served as Rehnquist's first administrative assistant. "His self-deprecating style helps here. His humor helps here. And, one thing that cannot be overlooked, is how impressive his intellect is."

The court's new lineup is likely to change the dynamic in ways that extend well beyond the differences in how Roberts and Alito might vote compared with Rehnquist and O'Connor, says John McGinnis, a Northwestern law professor who worked with Alito in the Reagan Justice Department.

For example, there are some early signs that Justice Stephen Breyer may be inclined to vote more strategically to stay within the majority on certain cases, McGinnis said. And Roberts, for his part, may be assigning Breyer to write certain opinions in an effort to keep him from reflexively siding with the other liberals.

"I think that will be a story we should be following for the next five years," McGinnis said.

Getting To Yes (WSJ)

By James Taranto

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

In a Georgetown Law School commencement address in May, Chief Justice John Roberts said that he strives for "unanimity or near unanimity" on the Supreme Court in order to "promote clarity and guidance" to lawyers and lower courts. "The broader the agreement among the justices, the more likely it is that the decision is on the narrowest possible ground. . . . If it's not necessary to decide more to dispose of a case, in my view it is necessary not to decide more."

This Wednesday the court decided Lulac v. Perry, the Texas redistricting case. The decision ran 132 pages and comprised six separate opinions. Earlier in the week the court also produced six opinions, though only 70 pages, in a Vermont campaign finance case. Achieving unanimity is easier said than done, and the doctrine of deciding narrowly turns out to be of only limited usefulness.

The court's fragmentation is largely the legacy of a half-century's liberal activist jurisprudence. Justices have both discovered individual rights in areas where the Constitution is silent (most notably sexual privacy, including abortion) and curtailed rights (free speech, equal protection) to permit their favored social policies (campaign finance restrictions, affirmative action).

This has given rise to a crude political taxonomy of the court. "Conservative" justices -- Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and possibly Samuel Alito -- disagree with many liberal precedents and wish to scale back or overturn some of them. "Liberals" -- John Paul Stevens, David Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and to a lesser extent Stephen Breyer -- are comfortable with those precedents and eager to extend them where possible. "Swing" justices like Anthony Kennedy can be either liberal or conservative, depending on the situation. This gives them outsized clout, so long as neither side has a reliable majority. Justice Kennedy's fellow swinger, Sandra Day O'Connor, was often called "the most powerful woman in America."

On such a court, every associate justice is a centrifugal force. Conservatives and liberals hew to their convictions, while swingers have the added incentive of influence. This dynamic was most strikingly on display in Rapanos v. U.S., a case involving wetlands regulation under the Clean Water Act. By 5-4 the court overturned an appellate ruling that had endorsed the Army Corps of Engineers' expansive definition of "navigable waters." The four liberal justices wanted to defer to the corps' definition, while Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Scalia, Thomas and Alito would have rejected it. Justice Kennedy split the difference, leaving it to the lower court to determine whether the property in question had "a 'significant nexus' to waters that are or were navigable in fact or that could reasonably be so made."

In a concurring opinion, the chief justice seemed to express frustration with Justice Kennedy: "It is unfortunate that no opinion commands a majority of the Court. . . . Lower courts and regulated entities will now have to feel their way on a case-by-case basis. . . . What is unusual in this instance, perhaps, is how readily the situation could have been avoided."

To some extent this belies Chief Justice Roberts's adage that "if it's not necessary to decide more . . . it is necessary not to decide more." It was Justice Kennedy's minimalist concurrence, after all, that left the law muddled; it would have been clearer had either the conservative or the liberal bloc prevailed.

Happily for those who favor an aggressive war against al Qaeda, a similar result obtained in the term's most important case, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, in which Justice Kennedy declined to join several key elements of Justice Stevens's opinion striking down the Pentagon's system for trying Guantanamo detainees. (Chief Justice Roberts did not participate because he was on the appellate panel that decided the case last year.)

The chief justice did command a unanimous court in one major case, Rumsfeld v. FAIR. By 8-0, the justices upheld the Solomon Amendment, which would have denied federal funds to universities (including Georgetown) that refused to allow military recruiters on campus. But tellingly, the case was not decided on the narrowest possible ground. The court held not only that this was a permissible condition for federal subsidies, but that Congress could have mandated the admission of military recruiters even if no federal money were involved.

Two unanimous cases decided in January, before Justice Alito joined the court, illustrate the limits of narrowness. Ayotte v. Planned Parenthood concerned abortion regulation; Wisconsin Right to Life v. Federal Election Commission, a section of the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law. In each case the court -- without a dissent or even a separate concurrence -- vacated a lower court's rulings on narrow technical grounds and sent it back for further adjudication. This approach made tactical sense. The court had been fractured over both abortion and campaign finance, and Justice Alito's arrival could change the balance. It was wise not to make new law while the court's makeup was in flux.

But on Monday, when the court decided another campaign finance case, the justices reverted to their fractured form. Randall v. Sorrell overturned Vermont's draconian contribution limits. Justice Breyer, joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito, decided the case on the "narrowest possible ground," throwing out the limits without reconsidering Buckley v. Valeo, the 1976 case that upheld limits on campaign donations. Justice Alito said he might revisit Buckley in a future case; Justice Kennedy proclaimed himself "skeptical" about it; and Justices Scalia and Thomas said they'd overturn it. Justice Stevens, in dissent, also wanted to overturn Buckley -- but to permit limits on campaign spending as well as donations. The Ayotte consensus is likely to prove fleeting too. The court almost certainly will not be unanimous when it decides Gonzales v. Carhart, a partial-birth abortion case, in its next term.

In his confirmation hearings last year, John Roberts showed himself to be a man of intelligence, charm and political acumen. If anyone can bring consensus to the Supreme Court, surely he can. But his first term in office showed that this goal will require patience and persistence, and maybe another new justice or two.

Boeing Co. finalized an agreement to pay 615 million dollars to end three years of US investigations into high-profile contracting scandals at the aerospace giant, officials said.

The agreement calls for a 565 million-dollar civil settlement and a 50 million-dollar monetary penalty under a separate criminal agreement, according to the US Justice Department.

The amount is a record for government procurement fraud, for the Department of Defense and for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, officials said.

The criminal probe stems from allegations that Boeing used improperly acquired data from rival Lockheed Martin to help win rocket launching business from NASA.

DOJ_NMG_0037779

The deal also would end a civil probe into conflict of interest in Boeing's recruitment of a senior Air Force procurement official while she still had authority over billions of dollars in other Boeing contracts. The former official, Darleen Druyun, went to prison in the case.

The uproar led to the firing of Boeing chief financial officer Michael Sears in 2003 and the resignation of chairman Phil Condit.

"The American people rightly expect government officials and contractors to act with integrity," said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty in announcing the agreement.

"The outcome of these investigations sends a clear message to those doing business with the government: harsh consequences await anyone whose conduct falls short of the highest legal and ethical standards."

US authorities agreed not to bring criminal charges against the company "in part because the company is fully cooperating with the government's investigation," the Justice Department said in a statement.

Additionally, Boeing "has agreed to accept responsibility for the conduct of its employees in these matters, continue its cooperation with federal investigators, pay a monetary penalty of 50 million dollars, and maintain an effective ethics and compliance program," the statement added.

Officials said they may seek to prosecute Boeing or to assess a further penalty of up to 10 million dollars, if over the next two years an executive management employee of Boeing commits federal crimes as outlined in the agreement, and the company fails to report the misconduct to the Department of Justice.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Report: Abramoff Had FBI Data (LAT)

By Walter F. Roche Jr., Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

The lobbyist improperly got and acted on a secret file about the Marianas, an inspector general says.

WASHINGTON — Convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff improperly obtained a top-secret FBI document and tried to use the information to aid his clients in the Pacific Island territories, according to a report released Friday by the Justice Department's inspector general.

The lobbyist feared information in the document could be damaging to his clients' interests, the inspector general said, and he used his knowledge of its contents to warn them and to devise a counterattack.

"Abramoff's e-mail records indicate that by late June 2002 he had obtained a copy of the report from an official of the Department of Interior," the report said.

The leak has been referred to the FBI and the Interior Department's inspector general for further investigation.

Abramoff earlier this year pleaded guilty to corruption charges, including conspiracy to bribe public officials and failure to pay taxes. He is cooperating in an investigation that has resulted in guilty pleas from top legislative aides and Abramoff's lobbying partners.

The revelation that Abramoff had obtained the secret document was just one finding in the 41-page report into allegations that he had improperly influenced President Bush's 2002 decision to oust the acting U.S. attorney for Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands, Frederick A. Black.

The inspector general's report concluded that Abramoff actively advocated the ouster of Black, who had launched an investigation of the lobbyist and requested the FBI report. But the inspector general said the decision to appoint a new U.S. attorney, Leonardo Rapadas, had been made before Abramoff became involved.

The allegations by Black that he was pushed out of office to end the Abramoff probe were unfounded, the report said.

"We found no evidence to support a conclusion that the selection of Rapadas was the result of any retaliation against Black for raising allegations against Abramoff," the report by Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said. Instead, Fine concluded, once Abramoff learned of the impending decision, he attempted to take credit for it.

Black declined to comment Friday.

The FBI report, which focused on security concerns in the Pacific, warned of possible terrorist threats against U.S. military assets on Guam and the Northern Marianas. It was completed in spring 2002 and recently made public.

Abramoff, according to e-mails cited by the inspector general, worried the FBI report would prompt Congress to restrict immigration in the Northern Marianas — cutting off a supply of low-wage labor for garment manufacturers who had hired Abramoff to protect their interests.

After seeing the FBI report, the lobbyist suggested an attack on Black. "We have to make sure that Black guy is smeared into the ground," Abramoff wrote in an e-mail to his clients.

The inspector general's investigation, which included an interview with Abramoff and a review of his e-mails, followed a Los Angles Times report on the circumstances surrounding Black's replacement.

According to Fine's report, Abramoff became actively involved in the efforts to oust Black at the behest of then-Guam Gov. Carl Gutierrez, a Democrat who was under investigation by Black's office. Abramoff told investigators that he met with Gutierrez in February 2002 in an effort to land a $1.3-million contract with the government of Guam.

Abramoff, the report said, told investigators that the two came up with a plan to smear Black by releasing copies of a letter Gutierrez had written in 1995 to President Clinton. The letter referred to Black as "a good Democrat" and recommended he be reappointed as U.S. attorney. Black was originally appointed as acting U.S. attorney by President George H.W. Bush in 1991.

In one e-mail to Abramoff, Gutierrez referred to Black as "a total commie…. We need to get this guy sniped out of there."

In another e-mail, Abramoff wrote: "We are opposed to Black. He has been screwing us for years…. So this is good payback. I don't care if they appoint Bozo the clown, we need to get rid of Fred Black."

Although the inspector general's report said Abramoff had nothing to do with Black's ouster, it did find that the lobbyist had a pipeline into the White House through which he learned of Rapadas' impending nomination and other matters involving Guam.

Leonard Rodriguez, a Bush aide, told the inspector general's office that then-White House political director Ken Mehlman "recommended or suggested that I reach out to make Jack aware" on Guam issues.

Once informed of Rapadas' selection, Abramoff instructed his colleagues in an e-mail to take credit for the decision even though his favored candidate had lost out.

Prosecutors Seek Assets Of Two Enron Chiefs (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

Federal prosecutors asked a judge yesterday to order former Enron Corp. executives Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay to turn over $182.8 million, arguing that their homes and other assets were acquired by fraud.

A Houston jury last month convicted Skilling of 19 criminal charges including conspiracy and securities fraud and found Lay guilty of a half-dozen other counts. The government said both men had misled investors about Enron's financial health at the same time they sold stock at inflated prices before the energy company collapsed in bankruptcy. Lay and Skilling face extensive prison terms when they are sentenced this fall.

For the government to recover the funds, prosecutors must prove that money and property held by Skilling and Lay stem from the conspiracy. Prosecutor Patrick T. Murphy argued in court papers that the government established those links by virtue of the criminal convictions and evidence presented at trial about the bonuses, trading records and stock sales of both men.

Skilling collected $139.2 million in bonuses and stock proceeds during the course of the fraud, court papers said. In return, prosecutors are seeking $49 million in securities held in a Charles Schwab account; a $4.6 million mansion in Houston; $808,643 in cash; and a Dallas condominium now valued at $579,475. Government lawyers asked that a $5 million bond that Skilling posted after his indictment two years ago be used to satisfy part of the judgment.

Skilling previously argued that, because jurors acquitted him on nine insider trading charges, he should be entitled to keep his remaining wealth -- a position that prosecutors called "legally baseless." Daniel M. Petrocelli, a defense lawyer for Skilling, yesterday said the government move would leave Skilling "without any means to meet family obligations or satisfy substantial debts for his legal defense." He called the stance "wrong and unfair."

The Washington Post reported earlier this month that Petrocelli's law firm, O'Melveny & Myers LLP, has spent some $25 million on the case, for which it has not yet been paid. Defense lawyers are likely to ask the judge to release some of the money to pay their bills.

Lay collected $43.5 million in bonuses and drawdowns on his Enron-sponsored line of credit, the government claimed. Prosecutors yesterday sought repayment of $1.5 million Lay used to pay off the mortgage on his luxury penthouse apartment in Houston. They also asked for access to Lay's interest in a limited partnership now valued at $6.3 million.

Lay has testified that he is $250,000 in debt. Michael W. Ramsey, a defense lawyer for Lay, did not return phone calls.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Holdout Ends, Letting A City Seize Property In Connecticut (NYT)

By Avi Salzman

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

NEW LONDON, Conn., June 30 — With eviction looming, the two remaining homeowners fighting the city's plans to replace their homes with offices, a hotel and new housing agreed to settle on Friday, ending a six-year battle that led to a historic Supreme Court ruling on governments' power of eminent domain.

"We're able to move on with our lives and look forward to remaining in the neighborhood," said Michael Cristofaro, whose family was one of the holdouts.

The settlements followed months of negotiations among the homeowners, the city and the New London Development Corporation that were overseen by state mediators.

The holdout homeowners were among seven in the Fort Trumbull neighborhood who sued the city, challenging its right to seize their property through eminent domain. The case eventually reached the United States Supreme Court, which issued a controversial 5-to-4 ruling last year that New London could take their homes for private development.

The five other homeowners have already settled. The dollar amounts of the settlements reached on Friday were not disclosed. Susette Kelo, a lead plaintiff in the case whose pink Victorian cottage became an icon in the battle to limit eminent domain, agreed to move her house to a new lot.

Ms. Kelo has not decided where she will move the house, but the state has agreed to pay the bill, said Scott Bullock, a lawyer from the nonprofit Institute for Justice who represented her. Mr. Bullock called the resolution "bittersweet," because Ms. Kelo had wanted to stay on her property.

No one answered the door at Ms. Kelo's house on Friday, and she did not return calls seeking comment.

Mr. Cristofaro said a few small concessions by the city made the difference.

His five-bedroom clapboard house on Goshen Street will be torn down, but the family has the option to buy property in the new development at a set price. The city also agreed to move the rhododendrons, yews and other plants his father, Pasquale, planted 30 years ago and to install a plaque in the development to honor Mr. Cristofaro's mother, Margherita, who fought the condemnation of her home until she died in 2003. "It restored a lot of respect and dignity to the family," Mr. Cristofaro said.

Ronald Angelo, a state official who helped negotiate the deals, said a key element to the settlements was getting the property owners more money.

After the Supreme Court ruling, several of the Fort Trumbull homeowners vowed to stay put, but they began to settle after the city increased legal and financial pressures. On June 5, the City Council voted to begin eviction proceedings.

William Von Winkle, who owned three rental properties in Fort Trumbull, held out until June 5. In an interview at his home on Friday, he said he settled because the state was willing to give him more money.

"When you look at my property, put these on," he said, adjusting a pair of sunglasses with dollar-sign holograms over the eyes.

Eminent Domain Plaintiff Will Keep Her House (LAT)

By Elizabeth Mehren, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

However, under a settlement between New London, Conn., and the suit's namesake, the structure will be moved.

BOSTON — Susette Kelo, who lent her name to a lawsuit that ignited a firestorm around the practice of eminent domain, will not lose her Connecticut home to a wrecking ball, as she had feared when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the city of New London could build homes, offices and hotels in her neighborhood.

Under an agreement announced Friday, Kelo's quaint, peach-colored house will be moved to another location. Kelo, 49, can remain in the 19th-century cottage at its present waterfront location for as long as a year, until a new site is selected.

No financial details were released on the transaction that was weeks in the making.

"I am not happy about giving up my property, but I am very glad that my home, which means so much to me, will not be demolished and I will remain living in it," Kelo said Friday.

In the waterfront district of Fort Trumbull, Kelo and fellow homeowner Pasquale Cristofaro were the last plaintiffs in the landmark case of Kelo vs. City of New London to reach an accord with the city. The Cristofaro home will be razed, but the family will be able to buy a new home in the area at an undisclosed fixed price.

The case pitted seven property owners in a working-class area close to where the Thames River flows into Long Island Sound against state and local officials who wanted to revitalize the area with a commercial project. The goals were to generate more tax revenue and expand employment opportunities in the tired old city.

In a 5-4 decision last June, the Supreme Court gave governments the right to seize private property and transfer it to another private owner in the interest of economic development.

Specifically, the court held that the use of eminent domain for economic development was not in conflict with the public-use clauses of the state and federal constitutions.

The expanded interpretation of the ancient practice known as eminent domain prompted legislators in nearly every state to draft measures to protect owners of private property. Eminent domain usually had been employed when governments wanted to build highways, bridges or public buildings — not office parks, restaurants, town houses, shops and hotels, as have been proposed for the site.

The court's action also produced a flood of new commercial proposals around the country, as developers sought to turn the decision to their benefit.

Last week, on the first anniversary of the Kelo ruling, President Bush issued an executive order barring federal agencies from seizing private property except for public projects such as hospitals or roads.

In New London, only Kelo and the Cristofaros refused to settle when the city put forth a May 31 eviction deadline. Finally Gov. M. Jodi Rell intervened.

"Now these families can have some closure, and the Fort Trumbull economic development project will go forward without delay," the Republican governor said Friday.

Attorney Scott Bullock of the nonprofit Institute for Justice, based in Washington, represented the plaintiffs. Bullock noted that the Kelo and Cristofaro properties were among a tiny handful of structures that remained in Fort Trumbull.

"It is a demolition zone now, not a residential area anymore," Bullock said Friday.

The small house that Kelo renovated by hand has become a symbol for the eminent domain debate, Bullock said, launching what he called "a grass-roots revolution" across the country.

"The fact that she can remain in it, and the fact that the home will remain standing, is a wonderful symbol of her struggle and the fight for homeowners' rights across the country," he said.

As part of the settlement, city officials also agreed to install a plaque in Fort Trumbull honoring family matriarch Margherita Cristofaro, who died at 73 while the case was pending.

"I am not happy. I am far from happy. What I wanted was to keep the house," said Michael Cristofaro, one of Pasquale's sons. "But we need to put a close to this, and the time was right."

Winning Over The Freeloaders (LAT)

By Edit

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

A YEAR AGO, THE ENTERTAINMENT industry hailed the Supreme Court's decision in the Grokster case as a milestone in its battle against online piracy. Maybe so — but if it was, the industry has little to show for it. If only the major labels and studios cared as much about serving customers as protecting copyrights.

The court's ruling said that companies such as Grokster, which enabled users to share files over the Internet, could be held liable for promoting copyright infringement. Many of these firms no longer exist, but the software they distributed still works. In addition, there are still plenty of noncommercial file-sharing programs, maintained and updated by a decentralized cadre of volunteers.

The Recording Industry Assn. of America argues that this picture would have been much worse without the lawsuits against file sharing. In the last few years, the percentage of U.S. Internet users who share files has remained about the same, while the percentage buying music at legitimate online stores has grown substantially.

Nevertheless, free downloaders represent a lost opportunity for the entertainment industry. The number of legitimate outlets for music, TV shows and movies online may be growing, but file-sharing networks continue to attract a much larger audience. By one estimate, almost 10 million people around the world are using file-sharing networks at any given moment. Evidently, the industry-backed services haven't come up with an offer as compelling as free files that can easily be played on any device.

The Grokster ruling wasn't simply a nudge for companies like Grokster to get out of the file-sharing business. It was an invitation for the entertainment industry to get in. By clarifying the legal obligations of file-sharing companies, the Grokster ruling created a road map for partnerships between tech and entertainment companies.

So far, however, talks between leading file-sharing firms and entertainment conglomerates have yielded few tangible results. Labels and studios have warmed a bit to popular but bootleg-heavy sites such as YouTube.com, where users post most of the videos, yet they remain extremely cautious about letting users redistribute their works.

The industry needs much more experimentation with approaches that give users the control and freedom to consume that make file-sharing networks so attractive. Instead of hoping that millions of Internet users on file-sharing networks will go somewhere else and pay for their downloads, it's past time to try to do business with them where they are.

Supreme Court Denies Texas, Arizona In Unconnected Death Penalty Cases (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

Texas and Arizona lost Supreme Court appeals yesterday in separate death penalty cases.

Justices refused without comment to consider reinstating the death sentence of Gregory Russeau in the murder of an elderly auto mechanic during a robbery in Texas.

They also refused to overturn an appeals court decision that gave Robert Moormann a chance to pursue an appeal for his conviction in the death of his adoptive mother in Arizona.

The cases were among more than 50 the court acted on yesterday, a day after justices were on the bench for the last time this term. Justices return to the bench in October.

A Texas court had said Russeau's Sixth Amendment right to confront witnesses against him had been violated during the penalty phase of his trial. He was convicted in the 2001 death of James Syvertson, 75.

Moormann was on a prison furlough in 1984 when he was accused of killing his adoptive mother, 74. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit had said a lower court should consider Moormann's claims of poor lawyering.

G.M. Is Pressed To Form Alliance With Two Rivals (NYT)

By Micheline Maynard

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

DETROIT, June 30 — General Motors' largest shareholder is pressing the troubled American auto giant to speed up its turnaround effort by forming an alliance with two foreign car companies, Nissan and Renault, which would pay $3 billion for a 20 percent stake in G.M.

The proposal by the billionaire Kirk Kerkorian, suggested in letters to the three companies, is his latest effort to put pressure on G.M.'s chief executive, Rick Wagoner, to quicken the pace of change.

The company has taken drastic measures in recent months to cut costs, partly in response to prodding from Mr. Kerkorian, who so far has lost money on his 56 million G.M. shares, which represent a 9.9 percent stake.

An alliance with Renault of France and Nissan of Japan offers Mr. Kerkorian an opportunity to enlist the help of Carlos Ghosn, the hard-charging executive who oversees both companies.

Mr. Ghosn, nicknamed "the cost killer," earned his reputation from the swift turnaround he executed earlier this decade Nissan, where he slashed debt, introduced flashy new vehicles and expanded sales in Japan and the United States.

If Nissan and Renault were to team with G.M., the companies could draw from one another's expertise in manufacturing, engineering and product development, Terry Christensen, Mr. Kerkorian's lawyer, said Friday.

"It would be an amazingly important alliance," said Mr. Christensen, who has been involved in the discussions.

G.M., in a statement, said the proposal would be taken under advisement by its board, which held a hastily arranged meeting by conference call on Friday, according to people with knowledge of the board's deliberations.

Investors cheered the prospect of the alliance, sending G.M. shares up $2.35, to $29.79.

Disclosure of Mr. Kerkorian's move came as a shock in Detroit, where auto executives were preparing to take next week off for the industry's annual summer holiday shutdown.

An agreement by the three companies would further reshape the industry, much like the 1998 merger of Daimler-Benz and the Chrysler Corporation, and the arrangement that linked Renault with Nissan in 1999.

It would also add new heft to General Motors. Together the three companies would hold about one-quarter of the global market, compared with 14 percent for Toyota, which some analysts say could pass G.M. as soon as this year to become the top seller.

And it would provide G.M., which lost more than $10 billion last year, with more cash for its turnaround plan.

But there is no certainty that the arrangement will come to pass, especially since it is the brainchild of Mr. Kerkorian, who decided to push the idea after meeting over dinner with Mr. Ghosn (his name rhymes with "phone"). G.M.'s management has also not played an active part in the talks.

Mr. Ghosn could represent possible competition for Mr. Wagoner, who has been under a cloud this year because of the company's dismal financial performance, loss of market share and the bankruptcy at its biggest parts supplier, Delphi.

G.M. directors, most of whom were chosen while Mr. Wagoner was either chief executive or president, issued a statement in support of him this past spring, when his future looked shaky, particularly in the wake of accounting errors that forced G.M. to increase its 2005 loss.

People involved in the discussions said the issue of Mr. Ghosn's role and Mr. Wagoner's future had not yet come up. Though Mr. Wagoner's position is considered solid, Mr. Ghosn's global reputation, and his ease in public, could threaten to overshadow him.

Renault and Nissan said in a statement that their partnership had never been restricted to two companies, and could be expanded further "under the right circumstances and with the appropriate partners."

But, the companies said, "it is necessary that the G.M. board and management fully support this project" before discussions begin. Support from the boards of Nissan and Renault would also be required, they added.

Officials at Mr. Kerkorian's company, Tracinda, said they would like to see a swift agreement to the deal, which could take another six months to win approvals from regulatory agencies.

People with knowledge of G.M.'s thinking, however, said Friday that the company was not likely to be in any rush to give Renault and Nissan an answer.

The company's caution is understandable. G.M. has been stung in the past by alliances, like a deal with Fiat of Italy, which G.M. had to pay Fiat $2 billion to escape, and ventures, now defunct, with Japanese companies like Suzuki and Fuji Heavy Industries, Subaru's parent.

Moreover, the strongest automotive players, like Toyota, Honda and BMW, are independent companies without the complications that such ventures can create.

People with direct knowledge of the matter say the proposal for a 20 percent stake was made by Mr. Ghosn to Mr. Kerkorian at a June 15 dinner in Nashville, where Nissan recently broke ground for a new headquarters building.

The meeting came after weeks of phone calls between Mr. Ghosn and Jerome B. York, an adviser to Mr. Kerkorian who joined the G.M. board in February.

Mr. York, long an admirer of Mr. Ghosn, had first approached him several weeks ago for a get-acquainted session, which was held in London.

In January, Mr. York laid out a plan for accelerating G.M.'s turnaround, including cutting its dividend in half, eliminating lesser-performing brands like Saab, Saturn and Hummer, and reducing salaries for G.M.'s board members, top managers and employees.

G.M. has defended its brands, but the company subsequently cut the dividend along with the pay of its five top executives and board members.

In announcing the plan, Mr. York suggested that G.M. embrace the speed and clarity displayed by Mr. Ghosn in his overhaul of Nissan, which was saddled with slow-selling vehicles and $20 billion in debt when he arrived in the fall of 1999.

Mr. Ghosn, for his part, has long wanted to push Renault and Nissan beyond a Eurasian alliance and into the global marketplace.

Although Mr. Ghosn has declined to offer opinions on how G.M. should address its problems, he has told associates that he could return the world's largest automaker to profitability, just as he did with Nissan.

Because the companies would be buying only a minority stake in G.M., they would not be saddled with all of G.M.'s problems, said John Casesa, managing partner of Casesa Strategic Advisers in New York.

Still, he said, "it'd be pretty messy on paper having these three companies in a loose alliance." Even if no deal is concluded, Mr. Casesa interpreted the proposal as a sign that Tracinda would keep the pressure on G.M. to accelerate its overhaul.

But Mr. Christensen says Mr. Kerkorian's goal is to do more to help G.M. than simply make money on his stock, for which he paid an average of $30.10 a share. At Friday's closing price, Mr. Kerkorian has lost $17.3 million on his 56 million shares.

"The value for the shareholders will be there," Mr. Christensen said. "But more importantly, the accomplishment and the strength it would give G.M., and the long-term health it would give G.M., would be a big part of this."

For his part, Mr. Ghosn relishes the opportunity to negotiate such arrangements. In 2003, he put together a Nissan deal in China himself, traveling three times from Tokyo to complete the details.

Mr. Ghosn has seemed destined for some time to emerge in Detroit. Over the years, he has been courted by Ford Motor, which is led by William Clay Ford Jr., the great-grandson of the company's founder.

Likewise, Mr. Kerkorian's advocacy at G.M. was also bound to emerge, given his past moves at Chrysler, where he was the biggest shareholder before it merged with Daimler-Benz.

He began buying Chrysler shares in 1990, becoming a close ally of its chief executive then, Lee A. Iacocca. Five years later, with Mr. Iacocca retired, and Chrysler's stock price lagging, he and Mr. Iacocca started a takeover effort.

It did not prove successful. However, Chrysler agreed to put a Kerkorian representative on the board and to double a stock buyback program.

As for the potential partners, things are particularly bumpy at Nissan, which has posted declines in sales and market share in the United States this year at a time when Asian auto companies have captured a record 40 percent of the market.

More than half the company's staff at its headquarters in California has decided not to move to Nissan's new American headquarters outside Nashville. Meanwhile, Nissan is moving some production and engineering work back to Japan, because of the heavy workload faced by its plants in the United States.

Last year, Mr. Ghosn moved to Paris from Tokyo and is overseeing an overhaul at Renault, where he was an executive before taking charge at Nissan in the fall of 1999.

G.M., for its part, is in the midst of closing all or part of a dozen plants and cutting 30,000 jobs as part of its restructuring effort. On Monday, G.M. said 35,000 of its 113,000 hourly workers had agreed to accept buyouts and retirement incentives to leave the company, more than enough to account for its job cuts.

Auto Club Kerkorian Proposes GM Join Renault, Nissan In Alliance (WSJ)

By Monica Langley, Neal E. Boudette And Lee Hawkins Jr.

Plan From Biggest Shareholder Adds to Pressure on CEO; Volley Lifts Shares by 9% Aggressive Ghosn in the Wings

In a dramatic move that raised pressure on General Motors Corp. and embattled Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner, shareholder Kirk Kerkorian proposed that the auto maker give its restructuring a huge push forward by joining the partnership between Renault SA and Nissan Motor Co.

The proposal from GM's biggest shareholder, which the company's board said it would consider, was a stunning shot at Mr. Wagoner's effort at restructuring the nation's biggest auto maker. While GM has made progress in recent weeks, Mr. Kerkorian and his team have long seen Mr. Wagoner's approach as too incremental to bring about the revolutionary change they say GM needs.

It also represented a bold move by Carlos Ghosn, the auto executive who pulled off a turnaround at Nissan and is now chief executive of both it and Renault. In a letter delivered to GM's board Friday, Mr. Kerkorian's investment company, Tracinda Corp., indicated it already had discussed with Mr. Ghosn the idea of Nissan and Renault each taking a significant stake in GM and bringing it into their alliance.

A short time later, Renault and Nissan issued a joint statement saying they were open to the idea if it has the "full support" of GM's management and board.

The news sent GM shares up 8.6%, or $2.35, to $29.79 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange. The rise increased the value of Mr. Kerkorian's 9.9% stake in GM by $140 million, to $1.67 billion from $1.53 billion at the close of trading on Thursday. Friday's closing price was not far off the $31 a share Mr. Kerkorian paid when he bought his largest chunk of GM stock a year ago.

Left unanswered were a host of questions, including how three companies from three continents, with different cultures and ownership structures, could work together, and whether such a partnership could really cut costs. An alliance would mark a big shift of power in the global auto industry, combining GM, the world's largest auto maker, with Renault and Nissan, whose partnership makes them the world's fourth-largest auto group. GM makes about nine million cars and trucks a year, but is expected to soon be surpassed by Japan's Toyota Motor Corp., the world's No. 2 auto maker. Renault and Nissan together make about six million vehicles a year.

But aligning the three could fulfill Mr. Kerkorian's hopes of seeing rapid progress at GM, perhaps under Mr. Ghosn, who in recent years has become one of the best-known executives in the global auto industry.

Born in Brazil to Lebanese parents, the 52-year-old Mr. Ghosn was dispatched to Japan to fix ailing Nissan when Renault bought a 44% stake in the company in 1999. At the time Nissan was mired in losses and carrying $20 billion in debt.

Though he was the first non-Japanese to run Nissan, Mr. Ghosn was able to slash jobs and costs, revamp the product line and pay down debt quickly. In the last few years, Nissan sales have boomed, and in 2005 it was one of the most profitable auto makers in the world.

A GM alliance with Renault and Nissan could pave the way for Mr. Ghosn to take over there as well. Mr. Ghosn is know as a results-oriented leader who probably wouldn't agree to an alliance unless he was convinced significant changes could be made at GM -- with or without Mr. Wagoner.

Through a spokesman, Mr. Wagoner declined to comment Friday.

Recent Victories

Though it is still early in GM's restructuring effort, Mr. Wagoner has scored a number of recent victories in his drive to keep his job and revive GM, which is hurting from falling sales, high health-care and labor costs and a surge in foreign competition. Last spring, he secured a vote of confidence from his board after he threatened to resign. At GM's annual meeting, shareholders rejected a proposal to separate the chairman and CEO posts, while all of his board members were re-elected by large majorities.

Additionally, after an accounting change was ruled permissible, GM was able to restate first-quarter earnings showing a profit of $445 million. This past week, Mr. Wagoner announced that an ambitious buyout program to cut labor costs had met its target, allowing the company to shed 35,000 union workers, or 30% of its hourly work force, by the end of the year -- two years ahead of schedule.

But the proposal from Mr. Kerkorian -- who is GM's largest single shareholder -- was a clear signal that he remains unhappy with Mr. Wagoner's progress. People familiar with Mr. Kerkorian's thinking said he and his representative on the GM board, Jerome B. York, believe GM needs to completely rethink all aspects of its business. They see Mr. Wagoner's plan as too slow-moving to enable the auto maker regain its standing in today's brutally competitive auto industry, these people said.

"We believe that participating in a global partnership-alliance with Renault and Nissan could enable General Motors to realize substantial synergies and cost savings and thereby greatly benefit the Company and enhance shareholder value," Tracinda said in its letter to GM. "Accordingly, we urge the Board of Directors to form a committee to immediately and fully explore this opportunity together with management."

Mr. Kerkorian and his team believe the proposed alliance has the potential to save GM, Renault and Nissan billions of dollars by sharing engineering, purchasing and production costs for engines and the basic components and vehicle platforms of automobiles, one person familiar with the matter said.

Together, the three companies have about 25% of the global market for cars and light trucks. They spend about $190 billion a year on steel, plastics and other materials, and just a 1% decrease would bring substantial savings, this person said. In a bid to tap into cheaper overseas labor, the proposal contemplates GM using operations currently overseen by Mr. Ghosn.

To be sure, the auto industry is littered with failed mergers and alliances. Renault itself tried and failed to succeed with a similar cooperating deal with American Motors Corp. in the 1980s, while GM last year gave up on a four-year-old partnership with Fiat SpA, a breakup that cost the company $2 billion. DaimlerChrysler AG is still trying to prove that its 1998 trans-Atlantic merger is producing meaningful synergies.

A former executive at Chrysler and IBM Corp., Mr. York first expressed public admiration for Mr. Ghosn in a speech in Detroit in January. In that speech, he pointedly criticized GM's restructuring efforts, saying the company should consider killing some of its eight brands, cut management pay and cut its dividend. He urged the company to use Mr. Ghosn's Nissan turnaround as a model.

York Expresses Frustration

Since he joined GM's board in February, Mr. York has told associates he is frustrated by what he sees as incremental steps taken in GM's turnaround effort. He has told fellow directors that he's very worried about GM's negative cash flow and alarming slide in U.S. market share. The company's own internal forecasts project that GM's share in the U.S. market could drop to 20%, about half what it was two decades ago.

Mr. York first met Mr. Ghosn in May in London, and the two hit it off over dinner, people familiar with the matter said. Two weeks ago, Mr. Kerkorian flew to Nashville to meet Mr. Ghosn, who was in Tennessee for the move of Nissan's North American headquarters there. The billionaire, his adviser Mr. York and Mr. Ghosn had dinner and discussed the Renault-Nissan alliance and its possible application to GM.

Mr. York met with Mr. Wagoner on June 22 to discuss Mr. Kerkorian's interest in the alliance and possible benefits for GM, according to people familiar with the matter. The CEO was surprised but calm, according to a person familiar with the situation.

Once Tracinda filed its plan Friday morning, GM called an emergency board meeting via telephone to discuss the proposal. Directors generally agreed that GM should study the proposal. Mr. Wagoner told his board that some alliances work, but some don't, according to people familiar with the matter. He also said he and GM's management and advisers would review the proposal and convene another board conference call next week after July 4, these people said.

Some investors expressed doubt that Mr. Kerkorian truly seeks an alliance of GM, Renault and Nissan. "He bought his shares in the 30s, and today is the first time [in a while] that the shares have come anywhere close to that," said David Kudla, chief investment strategist of Mainstay Capital Management, a Michigan-based money-management firm that manages accounts for many GM employees and retirees. "I think Tracinda is looking at various ways that they can secure a return on the investment, and this is another opportunity. They are looking at whatever initiative would increase the share price."

A Tracinda spokesperson said the company typically invests for the long term, not the short term.

Dan Genter, president and CEO of RNC Genter, a Los Angeles-based investment firm that owns bonds issued by GM's financing arm, said the proposal puts Mr. Wagoner "in a real squeeze." If the CEO doesn't accelerate his restructuring efforts, Messrs. Kerkorian and York "are going to have him on the ropes," he said.

Meanwhile, some auto-manufacturing experts said GM, Renault and Nissan would face "a pretty arduous task" in setting up a basis for working together. "By no means would it be an easy process," said Mike Jackson, director, North American vehicle forecasts, of CSM Worldwide, in Northville, Mich., adding that it would be "a number of years" before they could begin using common parts and components.

"That said," he went on, "Renault and Nissan have been able to work pretty expediently to combine their global processes and platforms and they've made considerable progress."

Global Partners Possible For GM (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

Kerkorian Urges Alliance With Nissan, Renault

Billionaire investor Kirk Kerkorian yesterday pushed General Motors Corp. to explore a partnership with Nissan Motor Co. and Renault SA, both of which are led by turnaround expert Carlos Ghosn.

In an extraordinary series of events set into motion by Kerkorian, whose investment company owns 9.9 percent of GM's shares, the Detroit automaker's board and management are being pressed to join a global alliance with Nissan and Renault. Under a partnership already in place, Renault holds a 44 percent stake in Nissan, while Nissan owns 15 percent of Renault's shares.

In a letter to GM chairman and chief executive Rick Wagoner, Tracinda Corp., Kerkorian's investment firm, said Nissan and Renault were open to buying significant stakes in GM. In a separate letter, Tracinda notified Ghosn and Renault Chairman Louis Schweitzer that Tracinda has asked GM to form a committee to explore a potential alliance.

Nissan also called on GM's board of directors to study the deal. "At this point, it is necessary that the GM board and top management fully support this project in order to start the study of this opportunity after agreement of Renault and Nissan boards," Nissan said in a statement.

Nissan said Ghosn was approached by Kerkorian and Jerome B. York, a GM board member and Kerkorian adviser, to assess the merits of GM joining the partnership.

GM said it had not received an offer or proposal from Renault or Nissan. But GM said its board will consider Tracinda's request to form a committee to study the proposal.

GM shares rose $2.34, or 8.6 percent, to $29.79, a level they had not reached since October. Financial analysts said Nissan's interest was an affirmation that GM shares were undervalued.

Under the partnership between Renault and Nissan, the two automakers operate as stand-alone companies, but Ghosn is president and chief executive of both. Ghosn is credited with rescuing and rebuilding Nissan after it ran into trouble in the late 1990s. As it has returned to financial health, Nissan has been particularly aggressive in the United States, where its new products have added to pressure that Detroit automakers were already getting from other Asian automakers, particularly Honda Motor Co. and Toyota Motor Corp.

GM is restructuring after years of losing U.S. market share to rivals like Nissan. The loss of market share in its home turf has led to the loss of tens of thousands of high-paying U.S. auto jobs and the closing of assembly plants around the country. GM lost $10.6 billion last year, although results have improved this year.

Analysts said they doubted that either side is planning to rush into a major collaboration. Wagoner was severely criticized for focusing GM on a global alliance strategy of partial investments in auto companies around the world. Those stakes were sold when GM's financial situation collapsed last year. Wagoner has claimed successes in his turnaround plan at GM, but he has acknowledged that the company still has a lot of work to do.

Ghosn also has a full plate. Quality has slipped as Nissan steadily expands production and brings out new models.

Tracinda owns 56 million shares of GM stock, which accounts for 9.9 percent of the company. Kerkorian is GM's largest individual shareholder. He began amassing a stake in the company last year. Since then, his adviser, York, was added to the GM board and has criticized the company for the sluggish pace of its turnaround.

David Healy, auto analyst at Burnham Securities Inc., said Kerkorian might be trying to scare off short-sellers, who are betting that GM's stock will drop, by making moves to shore up GM's share price. He said he doubted that the back and forth between GM and Kerkorian could lead to Ghosn's installation in the top job at GM.

"I think it would have absolutely no management affect," Healy said. "GM and Nissan are bitter enemies. Nissan has been eating GM alive for years. Nissan is one of three reasons that GM's market share and profitability has collapsed in the last three years, the others being Toyota and Honda."

Thieves' Indifference May Mean VA Laptop's Data Is Secure (WP)

By Rob Pegoraro

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

If your Social Security Number was on that wayward, now-recovered Department of Veterans Affairs laptop -- or any of the other computers recently lost with sensitive data onboard -- it's probably still safe. But not certainly so.

And you're just going to have to live with whatever uncertainty that realization stirs in you.

That's not the message that the government wanted to convey Thursday, when the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Baltimore field office issued a press release saying, "A preliminary review of the equipment by computer forensic teams determined that the database remains intact and has not been accessed since it was stolen."

But can you take that statement to the bank? No (well, unless the feds have some new forensic technology we don't know about.)

"The FBI can't really make the claim it's making," said Tim Leehealey, executive vice president of business and corporate development at Guidance Software, a Pasadena, Calif., developer of data-forensics software. "Nobody can make that claim for sure."

(A press representative reached yesterday afternoon at the FBI's Baltimore office could not locate officials to comment on this story.)

Just turning on the computer and opening or copying files will leave numerous traces behind. But there are too many other ways to extract data without detection. You can run specialized tools to clone the computer's entire hard drive to a different machine; you can use a CD of Linux to boot up the computer and copy files; you can physically remove the hard drive and plug it into another computer.

When the VA or other offices try to ensure that lost records haven't landed on identity thieves' hard drives, they run into the same problem that's undermined the entertainment industry's efforts to stop people from circulating music and movies on the Internet.

Namely, computer data, by its nature, wants to go places. You can duplicate it infinitely and perfectly, then distribute those copies at near-zero cost. That's neither bad nor good; it just is.

So in a worst-case scenario, every personal record on that VA laptop could now be online. And you'd never know until the symptoms of identity theft showed up in your bank account.

That said, Leehealey was careful to add that the odds of that scenario are exceedingly low -- for one thing, what kind of idiot would let a stolen laptop be found? "The people smart enough to do this are smart enough not to do it this way," he said.

This is likely true of most stolen corporate computers. They're only good for a quick profit through fraudulent resale -- in the same way most muggers won't bother creating a new ID from the Social Security card in a wallet when they can just spend the victim's cash and credit cards instead.

But that doesn't mean it's smart to carry around your Social Security card, or that a government or company should keep critical data on portable, easy-to-steal devices.

These offices need to keep that data out of circulation as much as possible to limit the damage from mistakes and accidents. Those things will inevitably happen, even to companies that deal with security for a living -- Guidance, for example, lost a few thousand of its customers' credit card numbers to an online break-in last year.

Veterans Still Want Credit Monitoring After Stolen Laptop Found (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, June 30, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Veterans groups say they will keep pressing for improved data security - and free credit monitoring - after the government found the stolen Veterans Affairs laptop computer containing sensitive data on 26.5 million people.

The government announced Thursday that a person officials would not identify had turned in the laptop and external drive, which were stolen from a VA data analyst on May 3. The FBI said an initial review determined that the contents had not been accessed or copied.

"We are pleased and relieved," said John Rowan, president of Vietnam Veterans of America, which has filed a lawsuit against the government for privacy violations. "The VA's handling of this unfortunate theft exposes the very real need for major reform in how records with personal information are handled and secured."

Joe Davis, spokesman for the Veterans of Foreign Wars, said veterans were entitled to credit monitoring until the FBI can determine for certain the information wasn't compromised.

"The worst-case scenario may have been averted this time, but an even greater tragedy would be if this type incident was allowed to happen again because of complacency," Davis said.

Burglars stole the computer equipment containing names, Social Security numbers and birth dates for veterans and active-duty troops from the data analyst's suburban Maryland home. Law enforcement officials recovered it after an informant on Wednesday notified the U.S. Park Police that he had heard about a $50,000 reward and knew where it could be found.

The equipment was then turned in to officials in Montgomery County, Md., where the data analyst lives. No suspects were in custody.

The FBI, in a statement from its Baltimore field office, said a preliminary review of the equipment by its computer forensic teams "has determined that the data base remains intact and has not been accessed since it was stolen." More tests were planned.The announcement came one day after President Bush asked

Congress for $160.5 million to pay for credit monitoring and other fraud protection for affected veterans. He proposed to tap dollars set aside but not used yet for food stamps, student loans and trade assistance for farmers.

During a House hearing Thursday, VA Secretary Jim Nicholson urged veterans and active-duty troops to keep watch over their financial records until more tests were completed in the coming days. But he declined to say whether the VA would ultimately follow through on its plans to offer at least one year of free credit monitoring.

The department was actively working to hire a data analysis company to be on the watch for identity theft, Nicholson said, but it will await further tests from the FBI to decide on the monitoring, which on average costs $50 to $150 per person each year.

"I'm going to reserve judgment on that," he said.

Veterans groups and lawmakers from both parties have criticized the VA for the theft and noted years of warnings by auditors that information security was lax. The VA has also been criticized for waiting nearly three weeks - until May 22 - to publicize the theft.

Some veterans have filed class-action lawsuits in Covington, Ky., and Washington seeking $1,000 in damages for each person - or up to $26.5 billion total - for privacy violations. They are also seeking to force the VA to improve its security practices.

A hearing was scheduled Friday in U.S. District Court in Kentucky on the government's credit monitoring offer.

Nicholson has pledged to turn his agency into a "model for information security" but said it won't happen overnight.

"This has brought to the light of day some real deficiencies in the manner we handled personal data," Nicholson said Thursday during a House hearing investigating what has become one of the nation's worst data breaches.

"If there's a redeeming part of this, I think we can turn this around," he said.

VA Can Publicize Credit Monitoring Offer (WP)

By Dylan T. Lovan

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

COVINGTON, Ky. -- The Veterans Affairs Department is free to publicize a no-cost credit monitoring offer to veterans whose personal information was stolen, a federal judge ruled Friday.

U.S. District Court Judge William Bertelsman denied a motion from attorneys who filed a class-action suit on behalf of 26.5 million veterans and active-duty troops after a VA employee's laptop containing the private data went missing.

Law enforcement officials recovered the laptop this week after it had been stolen from a data analyst's Maryland home on May 3. The FBI said Social Security numbers and other personal data had not been copied from the computer.

Attorneys in the class-action suit had argued that accepting the offer, which was advertised on the VA's Web site, could hamper the veterans' chances of winning more money in court.

"I don't see anything objectionable in it," Bertelsman said during a hearing. "The court can't tell a government agency how it can communicate with its constituents. If they make a statement that's a false representation ... then the court might get into it."

"We're encourage by the fact that we're allowed to help our veterans," Scott Hogenson, a VA spokesman, said after the ruling.

VA Secretary Jim Nicholson, during an appearance in Louisville, Ky., before he learned of the judge's ruling, said the matter "may now be academic" since the stolen laptop had been recovered.

Nicholson said there was a "strong indication" that the personal information was not accessed or compromised after the theft.

The secretary promised a major overhaul of cyber and information security at the VA to prevent such an occurrence again.

"I want to make the VA into the gold standard for information security," he said in an interview.

Bertelsman also indicated that the recovery of the stolen laptop could affect the class-action suit.

"Some of this may have been cured," he said.

The lawsuit seeks free monitoring and other credit protection for an indefinite period as well as $1,000 in damages for each person, up to a total of $26.5 billion.

Bertelsman ordered the Veterans Affairs Department to state on its Web site that accepting the credit-monitoring offer does not waive a veteran's right to participate in any future litigation against the department, a stipulation attorneys for the veterans had sought in their motion.

DOJ_NMG_0037792

Bertelsman also suggested the government mention on the site any pending litigation concerning the data theft case. Similar lawsuits are pending in the District of Columbia and New York.

Bertelsman also said that it is too early to rule on whether the suit can be certified as a class-action.

"Right now we don't have any facts. We don't know if anyone's been damaged," he said.

Marc Mezibov, one of the attorneys who brought the suit on behalf of Iraq war veteran Paul Hackett, said Bertelsman's ruling was "not terribly surprising." Hackett, who ran for Congress in Ohio in 2004, and Matthew W. Page, a Kentucky veteran, are the plaintiffs in the suit. Neither was at the hearing.

Mezibov said even if no personal data had been taken from the computer, veterans who have spent their own money to have their credit reviewed would have been affected by the theft.

"A lot of veterans have expended money with regard to credit services because they're concerned," said John Murdock, another attorney representing the veterans.

Nicholson has urged veterans to keep watch over their financial records until more tests are completed on the laptop.

Watching Out For Wandering Data (NYT)

After a tense six-week search, the government has recovered a stolen Veterans Affairs laptop computer containing vital information on more than 17 million people. The theft had officials holding their breath after an employee of the department took the information trove home from the office and found it missing after a burglary. A preliminary check found no sign that thieves had compromised the database, but more investigation will be needed to see whether names, birthdates and Social Security numbers might have been sold off to identity thieves.

The government's extraordinary attempt at damage control when it appeared the computer was gone for good — including a plan to offer a year's free credit monitoring to the veterans at a cost of more than $160 million — underlines a mushrooming problem. It is becoming obvious that government agencies, and businesses, need better policies and practices for handling sensitive data stored on computers.

To begin with, personal information on 17 million veterans is not the sort of data that should be moving around on a laptop. Data this valuable should also have been encrypted, to make it difficult for thieves to use it.

And a final, simple measure could be surprisingly effective: a policy requiring that laptops with confidential data must be chained to something that is difficult to walk off with.

Stricter policies like these will mean more work for employees who handle confidential data. But given the enormous price tag of damage control after just this single laptop was stolen — and the legitimate fears the theft has created for the veterans whose information was taken — rigorous protection of confidential data must take priority over the convenience of the data keepers.

Gun Activists Get Say At U.N. Summit (WT)

By Betsy Pisik, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, July 1, 2006

NEW YORK -- The gun industry and shooting enthusiasts fired back at the anti-gun lobby yesterday at an international conference on illicit weapons, saying any global restrictions will affect sport hunters.

"If you do something at this conference that impacts even a few hunters, sport shooters or legal firearms owners, you do it to all of us," said James Fulmer, a fan of antique muzzleloading rifles from Friendship, Ind., at the midpoint of the United Nations Small Arms Review Conference.

The two-week conference is meant to take stock of the global efforts to curb the trade on illegal arms and draft a plan of action for the future.

This year's conference, which coincides with the Fourth of July holiday, attracted the ire of tens of thousands of American gun owners, who were mobilized by the National Rifle Association to protest what they see as a global effort to disarm U.S. civilians.

The conference is not looking at legal civilian ownership, but is examining ways to limit the flood of weapons into unstable regions.

In a wide-ranging but ill-attended morning session, speakers representing gun manufacturers, weapons brokers, antique-firearms enthusiasts and big-game hunters stressed that misuse is the problem, and not the gun itself.

"A firearm is a tool, a very simple tool that dates back to the 12th century," said Thomas Mason, a frequent gun lobbyist who represented the Sporting Arms and Ammunition Manufacturers' Institute at the conference. "Like any tool, it can be used for great good or great harm," he said.

The alliance of two dozen manufacturers has embraced marking and tracing of weapons but is opposed to similar tracking for ammunition, as is commonly proposed on the sidelines of the conference. As many as 14 billion rounds of ammunition are produced each year, and manufacturers note that it would be technically and logistically impossible to mark each bullet.

Many of the morning speakers protested what they see as an unfair focus on legal or civilian arms, and rejected international efforts to mark ammunition or expand national jurisdiction over global trade.

Mark Barnes, a registered firearms broker, warned governments against enacting broad jurisdiction that would impede a dealer's ability to make international sales.

He urged countries to establish effective import and export laws before they attempt to draft international guidelines.

International arms brokers are considered by nations and gun foes to be the weak link in the chain, the place where legally manufactured or owned firearms are sold or traded to groups without proper verification of end users.

"Our membership is concerned with the enactment of overly broad international regulatory programs that unnecessarily and adversely impact the legal trade in small arms and light weapons instead of focusing on reducing the illicit trade," Mr. Barnes said on behalf of Firearms Importers Roundtable Trade Group.

Rick Parsons, representing the Washington-based Safari Club International, made one of the most ambitious speeches of the morning session, in which he linked international game hunting with the U.N. Millennium Development Goals.

"I believe that every person in this room will acknowledge that some of the world's poorest countries are also the most biodiversity rich," Mr. Parsons said. "The trade and use of biodiversity generates revenues that fund basic needs like farming equipment, education, medical clinics, roads, food-storage facilities and electricity."

Carefully administered programs allow foreign sport shooters the opportunity to hunt game, while fees and licenses generate money for local communities, he noted, citing Zimbabwe, Namibia, Zambia and Botswana as examples.

Mr. Parsons also called on authorities to allow foreign hunters to more easily travel internationally with their legally registered weapons.

"I respectfully request that legitimate firearm owners, hunters and competition shooters [are acknowledged as] equal and recognized stakeholders in efforts against illicit trafficking in small arms," he said.

IMMIGRATION:

Suspect U.S. Border Patrol Agents Resign And Vanish (LAT)

By Richard Marosi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

The two brothers, who allegedly helped Mexican criminals smuggle drugs and immigrants, were apparently tipped off.

SAN DIEGO — Two U.S. Border Patrol agents under investigation for allegedly smuggling drugs and immigrants abruptly resigned and went into hiding this week after apparently being tipped off to the probe, according to federal law enforcement sources.

The agents — brothers Raul and Fidel Villarreal — were veteran officers who patrolled the border near San Diego and had been under suspicion since last year of smuggling illegal immigrants in their government vehicles, among other allegations, sources said.

They did not show up for work Monday and later notified supervisors that they had quit because of a family illness. But investigators suspect that someone tipped off the agents and that they may have left the country.

The disappearance threatens to derail the investigation, the latest in a string of unrelated corruption probes that have led to the indictments and convictions of several federal officers along the border.

"Somehow, somebody leaked it, and both resigned," said a source close to the investigation, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the case. "They left their badges and government credentials at their father's house.... Now they're in the ... wind."

Damon Foreman, a spokesman for the Border Patrol in San Diego, confirmed that the agents had been under investigation for suspected smuggling activity and had submitted their resignations.

Raul Villarreal, 36, was the face of the Border Patrol in San Diego a few years ago when he was a spokesman and was interviewed regularly by Spanish-language media. Fidel, 32, worked in the mountains east of San Diego.

At the modest home the men shared with their parents in National City, a woman identifying herself as their mother said her sons still lived with her. She said she didn't know when they would return. They did not respond to a request for comment made through the woman.

The investigation, which sources said grew out of information gleaned from captured illegal migrants, is being handled by Immigration and Customs Enforcement, one of several agencies that make up the Border Corruption Task Force. Officials at customs enforcement declined to comment.

The agents were suspected of working with Mexico-based criminal networks to smuggle Mexicans and Brazilians into the country, sources said. The illegal immigrants would cross the border on their own and then be picked up by one of the brothers while on patrol. The migrants then would be delivered to another driver for the organization, sources said.

The status of the investigation is unclear. Such probes often require extensive and delicate evidence gathering, including wiretaps and statements from immigrants, and it is unknown whether authorities were ready to file charges.

"The case isn't dead; it just comes to a screeching halt because the two targets have disappeared. The whole case isn't gone, but you can't move forward anymore," said one source.

Authorities also are investigating the apparent leak of the information, sources said. Officials at multiple federal agencies, including the Border Patrol, had been briefed on the probe. In the past, informants have been known to tip off targets.

The investigation comes amid a recent spate of corruption cases involving Border Patrol agents and customs officers. Authorities say smuggling rings, their traditional trafficking routes blocked by increased enforcement, are enlisting corrupt agents to help them get their loads through.

Last month, two customs officers at the Otay Mesa and San Ysidro ports of entry were charged with waving through cars loaded with illegal immigrants in exchange for cash.

In a case similar to the investigation of the Villarreal brothers, two supervisory Border Patrol agents were charged earlier this year with smuggling migrants in their government vehicles for a Mexican trafficking organization based in Mexicali.

In a case last year, former Border Patrol Agent Oscar Antonio Ortiz admitted as part of a plea agreement that he had conspired to smuggle 100 illegal immigrants into the country. Ortiz himself was an illegal immigrant, having used a false birth certificate to pass himself off as a U.S. citizen, authorities said.

Tip Leads To Closing Of O.C. Laborer Pickup Spot (LAT)

By Jennifer Delson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

Caltrans, which learned from a Laguna resident that it owned the land used being by a nonprofit, cites liability issues.

Caltrans ordered a longtime Laguna Beach day labor center to close Friday, saying it was illegally operating on state property, land that the state didn't even know it owned.

The state Department of Transportation issued the order after a Laguna Beach resident who is a member of the Minuteman Project border patrol group checked property records and brought the information forward as part of a protest against the center.

"What they were doing on that property is illegal, and it wasn't done to benefit Americans," said Eileen Garcia, the Minuteman member. "If the Girl Scouts of America had set up pup tents there, they would have been run off a long time ago."

This is the second day labor center in Orange County to close recently. Costa Mesa closed its center last year as its City Council took several measures to limit services to its burgeoning immigrant population.

The centers and other areas where day laborers gather informally have been targeted for protests by anti-illegal immigrant groups throughout Southern California.

The Laguna Day Worker Center on Laguna Canyon Road opened nearly seven years ago and received about $25,000 annually from the city.

State officials said the order to close the center had nothing to do with immigration politics.

"There's a concern about public safety and liability," said James Pinheiro, Caltrans deputy director of traffic operations and maintenance. "We knew the center was there. We didn't know it was on our property."

Garcia, who has protested near the worker center with hundreds of others on several occasions in the last year, said she decided earlier this week to check maps at the Irvine Caltrans office.

Officials who helped her find the materials were surprised when they found a deed showing that the Irvine Co. had given the one-third-acre parcel to the state in 1951.

Pinheiro said state law does not allow use of the property for anything other than "to facilitate the state highway."

No permits were issued to put a mobile office or fences on the site, he said. The office is owned by the Cross Cultural Council, a nonprofit organization.

Irma Ronses, coordinator of the day laborer center, said her group received permission from the city to set up the office but at some point learned the property belonged to the state.

Laguna Beach City Manager Kenneth C. Frank did not return repeated phone calls. Assistant City Manager John Pietig declined to comment.

The Caltrans decision angered a majority of the City Council. Mayor Steve Dicterow said the state agency, as well as the Minuteman Project, took action "that will hurt the residents of Laguna Beach."

Before the workers center opened off the state highway, those looking for temporary jobs went into neighborhoods to search for them. "Now we have to deal with the fact that we don't have the resources to deal with a potentially dangerous situation that will exist whether we like it or not," Dicterow said.

The City Council will discuss the issue next week and determine if it can buy the property, said Pam Gorniak, Caltrans public information officer.

Dicterow said city officials hope to persuade Caltrans to allow the center to continue operating at its current location. If that doesn't work, the city will consider another site, he said.

Resident Dolores Kustin said day laborers who go into neighborhoods, "should be arrested. If these are people who cross the border illegally, they shouldn't be here at all."

Wayne Ybarra, a Laguna Beach resident, was disappointed with the Caltrans decision: "Things seemed to be working in the sense that there didn't seem to be any neighborhood complaints."

In the meantime, Minuteman Project supporters are enjoying their victory in the same city where another nonprofit organization denied them the chance to march in a recent parade because the group has a political message.

"The Minuteman Project stands to bring public awareness to blatant law breaking that is going on in our society, to our lawmakers and bureaucrats who should have been on this years ago," said Minuteman co-founder Jim Gilchrist. "It takes an average Jane Citizen, a Minuteman, to bring attention to this."

Security Guards Eye Organizing (WP)

By Sonya Geis

Black Workers Worry About Being Displaced

LOS ANGELES -- Eric Lee delivered a rousing speech to union organizers gathered from around the country at a black church in South Central Los Angeles. They whooped and cheered and then hit the streets, launching a campaign by the nation's largest labor union to organize Los Angeles's security guards, most of whom are African American.

Despite the upbeat words, Lee, chief operating officer for the Southern Christian Leadership Conference of Greater Los Angeles, has real concerns about the union effort. Not that it would fail, but that it would succeed. Lee and other black leaders are worried that a strong union could backfire, pushing black workers out of an employment sector they dominate.

It would not be the first time. The ranks of this city's hotel workers and janitors were once mostly African American, but their standing was undercut by waves of immigration and lower-paid workers.

As more Latinos were hired in nonunion hotel and janitorial jobs, the union all but disappeared, leaving today's labor officials with bitter memories of the 1980s. In the 1990s, the Service Employees International Union (SEIU) reorganized the city's janitors, but by then, the workforce was mostly Latino.

Many African Americans in Los Angeles have watched resentfully as Latinos replaced them not only in low-wage jobs, but also in many traditionally black neighborhoods. Simmering tensions between the two groups occasionally boil over in school shootings, jail violence and hate crimes.

Among security guards today, Lee said, "the underlying feeling is, we need [a union], we want it, and when is it going to happen." Still, he said, "Some say, 'Why should we do this?' because of what happened to the hotel workers and janitors."

This week, the SEIU launched a campaign to collect pro-union signatures from 3,500 of 6,000 private security officers who guard Los Angeles buildings. The union estimates that nearly 70 percent of the officers are black. A related effort to organize security officers in nine other cities, including Washington, D.C., is underway.

The average pay for security guards in Los Angeles is $8.50 per hour with no benefits or paid leave, according to the SEIU. Once benefits are factored in, that's $6 an hour less than the average unionized janitor. Turnover is high. Many guards receive little training and often work more than one job to make ends meet.

Barbara Harris, president of the Building Owners and Managers Association of Greater Los Angeles, said the members of her organization "have not made a decision on their position" on the SEIU organizing drive. Half a dozen security contractors and building owners contacted declined to comment or did not return phone calls.

But union officials are encouraged by the support of the largest commercial building owner in downtown Los Angeles. At a news conference on the steps of City Hall in April, Robert F. Maguire III, flanked by Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and union officials, invited the SEIU into his buildings. Maguire, chairman and CEO of Maguire Properties Inc., said it would professionalize security and enhance the offices he owns.

Union organizers said security officers they have approached so far are receptive to their message.

"I'm all in agreement," Gregory Sawyer told the SEIU's Ron Reese and Sharrion Marshall after they asked him to sign a union card at the West Los Angeles office building where he works.

Sawyer said he suspects race is a factor in the difference between security guards' wages and those of other building employees. "This industry being primarily black, it's not being addressed properly," he said. "I've seen every other service group is unionized -- car parkers, janitors. Why is it that every other industry is unionized and not security?"

Ruth Milkman, director of the Institute of Industrial Relations at UCLA, said the security guard campaign looks like a conscious effort by SEIU to alleviate racial tensions, bringing Latinos together with African Americans under one umbrella.

But Andrew L. Stern, president of SEIU, said racial politics played no role in the timing of the security guard campaign. Janitors were organized first because national labor laws make it easier for them to form unions, he said. The focus is on Los Angeles now because the recent agreement with Maguire, good relations with security-guard contractors and the support of local politicians make Los Angeles a good prospect for a new union chapter, he said.

"We're organizing the security officers for a very simple reason," he said. "They work for the same owners and contractors as the janitors. They do a job that has huge import for people's safety and security. And they make less than the people who clean the buildings."

Stern said the union is well aware of black workers' fears that organizing a union could be an invitation to employers to hire immigrant workers they perceive to be more docile and willing to work for less.

"Los Angeles is a racially charged city, because it's a city in transition politically and economically. As jobs have been devalued, it's been at the expense of the African American community. They have every right to expect building owners to not use those same tactics they did in the '80s to break the [janitors] union," he said. "All of us are going to be watching to make sure that does not happen."

The Rev. Lewis E. Logan III, senior pastor of Bethel AME church in Los Angeles, where the organizers held their rally, said he will also be watching. "Our group is planning to come together once a quarter after there is a union to make sure the same percentage of African American security officers who were part of the union at the beginning are still there later," Logan said. "We're not selling out our community."

Taxpayers Foot The Bill For Undocumented Immigrants' Medical Care (KRT)

By Tony Pugh

WASHINGTON - As America counts the costs and consequences of illegal immigration, U.S. taxpayers are quietly footing a fast-growing multibillion-dollar tab for medical emergencies suffered by undocumented immigrants.

Whether they've entered the country illegally or overstayed their visas, illegal immigrants are ineligible for full coverage under Medicaid, the state/federal health plan for low-income Americans. Enforcement of the law tightens on July 1, when Medicaid recipients will begin having to show proof of citizenship and identity.

However, a little-known federal law requires state Medicaid programs to pay for emergency medical care for all undocumented immigrants who meet the program's financial and personal resource requirements.

The provision is intended to ensure that no one in the United States is denied lifesaving medical services. But those services are becoming more expensive as medical costs outpace inflation and uninsured illegal immigrants crowd the nation's emergency rooms.

Many are women giving birth. Others are people with chronic or mental illnesses, trauma victims or sick children.

The federal government generally pays about half the costs for such care under Medicaid, and states pick up the other half. But federal officials can't determine how much actually goes for the services, and many states don't closely track what they spend, either.

At the request of McClatchy Newspapers, some states took a closer look at the expenditures, which are a small but growing share of Medicaid's escalating costs. Even states with modest illegal immigrant populations have seen their costs soar. Minnesota's spending jumped 40 percent in two years, from $12.5 million in 2003 to $17.4 million in 2005.

In California, home to possibly 40 percent of the nation's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants, taxpayers have spent an average of $957 million a year since 2001 to pay for emergency care for illegals, the state reported.

Other states with large illegal immigrant populations, such as Texas and Arizona, don't know how much they spend because their computer data is inadequate. But in Houston, the Harris County Hospital District reported spending $97.3 million on uncompensated care for illegal immigrants, or about 14 percent of its annual operating costs.

In Georgia, the state reported that the cost of emergency care for undocumented immigrants nearly doubled in three years, to $112 million in 2005 from $58 million in 2002. In North Carolina, now home to an estimated 270,000 illegal immigrants, costs more than doubled, to $52.8 million in 2005 from $25.8 million in 2000. In Kentucky, the cost jumped to $9 million in 2005 from $2.2 million in 2003.

"Illegal immigration is becoming a very big-ticket health item for a lot of states. It's going to be a huge fiscal cost," said Steve Camarota, the research director of the Center for Immigration Studies, a non-partisan Washington public policy group.

Hospitals must examine all people who come to their emergency rooms and treat any with acute medical problems, regardless of the patient's immigration status or ability to pay.

When federal Medicaid officials deny reimbursement for illegal immigrant care that isn't considered an emergency, hospitals are stuck with the bill and typically pass the charges on to other patients in the form of higher costs.

Medicaid defines an "emergency medical condition" as one with severe acute symptoms that, without immediate attention, could jeopardize a patient's health, cause impairment to bodily functions or cause a body part or organ to malfunction. Medicaid's emergency-only coverage forces taxpayers to purchase the most expensive form of health care with no way to hold down costs.

"If you have an (illegal immigrant) child with asthma, we can give that child treatment and inhalers, or we can see that child land in the emergency room every couple of months," said Cindy Mann, a research professor at Georgetown University's Health Policy Institute. "It's better both for the child and the family, and certainly for the costs, to say `Let's treat his asthma rather than wait until it becomes life-threatening and he ends up in the emergency room.'"

In 2003, Congress agreed to pay doctors and hospitals an additional $1 billion between 2005 and 2008 to help pay for uncompensated emergency care that Medicaid won't cover.

Some health care experts argue that the federal government should consider providing a modest coverage plan for low-income illegal immigrants in addition to the emergency coverage under Medicaid. They argue that if comprehensive health care coverage were available to them, undocumented aliens could get preventive care through Medicaid or community health centers, and U.S. taxpayers could avoid paying for more expensive emergency room care.

Even those who support better coverage for illegal immigrants, however, realize that it's a tough sell in an era of shrinking federal funds and rising medical costs, said Sonal Ambegaokar, a health policy attorney at the National Immigration Law Center in Los Angeles.

Immigrants' rights groups and health care advocates are pushing for incremental changes, such as providing public health coverage for all children - including undocumented aliens - as Illinois plans to do. A legislative proposal in California would do the same.

Silver Spring Hospital Struggles To Serve (WP)

By Susan Levine

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

Immigrants Swell Uninsured Ranks At Holy Cross

Some weeks it seems as if the whole world, with its many troubles, has walked through the doors of Holy Cross Hospital.

Daily, the second-floor women's clinic fills to overflowing with patients from countries in Central America, Africa and Asia. Some have never had care during previous pregnancies -- and never had a child born alive. "We ask, 'Do you know why?' " says director Nancy Nagel. "And they say, 'I just lost the baby.' "

Elsewhere, from the emergency room to the primary medicine clinic, doctors and nurses confront conditions and diseases they did not see a decade ago -- malaria, infectious diarrhea, parasites such as tapeworm. Even many common ailments can be more challenging, because they often require translation from a panoply of foreign tongues and cultures.

Serving the underserved is integral to Holy Cross's mission, and the Silver Spring hospital has long shouldered much of the care for poor, uninsured residents of Montgomery County. But as that population has expanded rapidly with the continued arrival of immigrants, legal and illegal, it has become a much more difficult and expensive proposition.

And now a generous mission is reaching its limit. After yet another sharp increase in the prenatal program it runs for the county, Holy Cross has drawn a line. Starting today, for the first time since it opened in 1963, Maryland's biggest community hospital will restrict how many uninsured obstetrics patients it will accept.

"It has taxed the system enormously," said physician Imad Mufarrij, a native of Lebanon who can converse with patients in five languages.

Barely half an hour from the congressional chambers where the nation's immigration policies have been rancorously debated, there is little dissent over what is right to do. It is why Holy Cross opened its primary health clinic two years ago, agreeing to cover what in 2005 was a $460,000 operating deficit. And why it spends almost half a million dollars annually on interpretation services and ethnic-specific programs for patients and Spanish classes for employees.

From 2000 to 2005, the cost of the institution's yearly charity care more than doubled to $9 million; the care is significantly but not entirely for immigrants. A third of the total now goes to the low-income women, a veritable United Nations, who are seen through Holy Cross's Maternity Partnership with the county.

President and chief executive Kevin Sexton has no qualms: "As much as I am interested in public policy and public issues, I basically suspend that at the door of a health care facility and believe that everyone needs care."

The pressures on Holy Cross mirror those at other facilities in the region, though they fall far short of the intense demands that providers face in towns and cities along the U.S.-Mexican border. Washington Hospital Center regularly translates documents and physician-patient communication into nearly a dozen languages, including Turkish and Tagolog. Inova Health Systems estimates that it spends at least $10 million on such services, outreach programs and charity care for uninsured immigrants in Northern Virginia. In Fairfax County, more than one in seven births are to immigrants, according to one estimate.

Critics cite the burden they say newly arrived immigrants place on health care as one rationale for restricting their numbers. Last year, the federal government set aside $1 billion to cover emergency room care for illegal immigrants through 2009. The full medical bill to U.S. hospitals, clinics and taxpayers probably exceeds $6 billion annually, calculates Steven Camarota of the Center for Immigration Studies, a research group that seeks "fewer immigrants but a warmer welcome for those admitted."

Still, Camarota thinks proposals to deny access to treatment misdirect the debate. "Either you select immigrants who are self-sufficient and don't need help from the government, or you shut up about the cost," he said. "There's no middle ground."

The head of Holy Cross's primary care clinic agrees with the latter point. At her clinic, the uninsured patients are not asked how long they have been in the United States or whether they came lawfully.

"The fact is," director Elise Riley said, "people are here. They're going to end up on our doorstep one way or another."

A morning spent in the busy maternity clinic is an experience in multiculturalism and multilingualism -- and their possible complications. Many mornings, 60 or more women are seen. The phone at the front desk rings nonstop for inquiries and appointments.

"Sir, I cannot understand you," Melina Martinez tells an Asian caller with limited English. "Did your wife have a C-section? If her C-section looks okay, she doesn't have to come back for two weeks."

There is a pause while Martinez tries to grasp the man's response. "Does she have staples in? Staples, like you use for paper." At this point, the health unit coordinator is earnestly making stapling motions in the air. "You have to check, sir. Check her incision. Check her belly."

At the front desk, a patient from Cameroon schedules her next gynecology visit. A Salvadoran woman waits. She needs to monitor her blood-sugar levels for gestational diabetes but seems confused on the instructions she has been given.

"Escribo?" a nurse asks, offering to write them down in Spanish.

Some patients have had so little education in their homelands that the staff may teach them reading along with prenatal nutrition, occasionally receiving handmade tortillas or tamales as thank-you gifts. In fact, illiteracy was a factor taken into consideration when Holy Cross redesigned the clinic as part of a facility-wide expansion and renovation. Women now have their blood drawn as they come in, rather than being sent to a lab elsewhere in the hospital. Before, bilingual signs directed them down corridors, but many Central American immigrants had gotten lost because they could read neither English nor Spanish.

The clinic's success with its patients is measurable. Despite their socioeconomics, Holy Cross's percentage of low-birth-weight infants is half the state average, contributing to healthier starts in life.

Early in the venture with the county, Holy Cross officials committed to caring annually for 1,200 uninsured obstetrical patients sent by the county health department. Within two years, that cap was reached and exceeded. By fiscal 2005, admissions were 1,802.

Then last fall, Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) barred several thousand legal immigrants from receiving state Medicaid, and the clinic's numbers surged again -- to 2,131 women by this spring. Projections only indicated further increases.

Too much, hospital officials decided. They set a future limit of 1,500. The partnership had never been intended to include only one hospital, they reminded the county, yet theirs was the sole institution that had stepped up. As a consequence, Holy Cross's share of deliveries to low-income women had soared, to 65 percent of the county Medicaid total, from less than half five years earlier.

"Holy Cross has been bearing the brunt of that," agreed Montgomery Health Officer Ulder Tillman. "They've really become overwhelmed."

The stress is felt on the hospital floors where handsome art decorates the hallways and newborns spend their first day or so. Despite the recently completed expansion, the most significant in the facility's history, the 21 new labor and delivery rooms and 68 private maternity suites are always occupied -- and intermittently overbooked, given the nearly 8,900 births a year, 24 a day.

No distinction is made when mothers are placed in those quiet, spacious suites. A young illegal immigrant, barely able to write her name, may be next door to a high-powered business executive. Neither would necessarily ever know.

"It is harder in every way, including financially, to choose this course, but it's the right way," stressed Sexton, the chief executive.

Even with the looming deadline, only late this spring did two other hospitals with major obstetrics services agree to join the partnership. Washington Adventist and Shady Grove Adventist will start accepting up to 700 uninsured women between them for care this summer.

How quickly they and Montgomery's other hospitals will act on a different pledge is uncertain. As a group, they agreed more than a year ago to open three additional primary care clinics to assist the Holy Cross primary clinic, which expects to double patient visits to 10,000 by 2010. "In terms of following through," Tillman conceded, "it is painfully slow." Little has moved forward to date.

"We need more people in the trenches," obstetrician Mufarrij said simply during a rare break in delivering babies one afternoon. He was a prime proponent of the maternity collaboration with the county and remains so despite the fiscal and physical demands it has meant for facility and staff alike. The previous night, his colleagues had done seven Caesarean sections in the midst of other arrivals. Mufarrij's own record is 14 deliveries in a 24-hour shift.

But as a doctor, he sees no other way. "Once these patients are here, you have only two options," he said. "Neglect them or give them quality care."

D.C. To Delay Enforcing Medicaid Rule (WP)

By Susan Levine

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

Decision Puts Off Until at Least July 17 Need to Prove Citizenship

The District agreed yesterday to delay implementing a new federal Medicaid rule requiring documented proof of citizenship, said attorneys representing residents who could lose their coverage.

One day after a Washington firm filed suit in federal court to block the city from moving forward with enforcement, both sides yesterday afternoon agreed to wait until at least July 17.

The District, which has more than 140,000 Medicaid recipients, will not act "any sooner than 10 business days from July 1," according to the legal stipulation signed by attorneys for the plaintiffs and the D.C. attorney general's office.

The federal rule taking effect today makes documented citizenship a requirement for eligibility in the state-federal program for the poor and the disabled. Supporters in Congress pushed it as a measure to ensure that illegal immigrants were not getting coverage, but critics fear it will harm millions of poor, elderly and disabled Americans who are entitled to medical or nursing home benefits.

The delay "allows the District to thoughtfully consider what [its] next action will be with respect to the requirement," Clifton S. Elgarten of Crowell & Moring said.

Traci Hughes, a spokeswoman for D.C. Attorney General Robert J. Spagnoletti, said the hiatus would give local officials more opportunity to discuss the issues raised by the litigation. "We're looking forward to resolving it on behalf of those who need to use these types of services," she noted.

She said she did not know what conversations the city had held with federal officials, who have warned it and states that noncompliance would mean losing Medicaid matching funds. The District receives $900 million annually for its program.

"The city definitely is reviewing the implications of this hiatus," Hughes said.

DOJ_NMG_0037801

Under the new provision, a passport, birth certificate or other specified paperwork must be supplied when a person applies for Medicaid or during annual reenrollment in the program. In the past, Medicaid recipients were able to declare their citizenship, under penalty of perjury, without having to show evidence of it.

Beating Up On Immigration

Directed by House Speaker Dennis Hastert, Republicans this coming week will undertake a remarkable exercise: the public thrashing of President Bush's principles on a major initiative.

House "field hearings" on immigration, scheduled for San Diego and Laredo, Texas, weren't designed with fact-finding in mind. Their intent is rather to batter the Senate-passed immigration bill, which embodies Mr. Bush's goal of combining border security with a guest-worker program for the 12 million illegal immigrants already here.

But will Mr. Hastert's maneuver bury chances for enacting legislation -- or provide the political cover that ultimately permits a House-Senate deal before the election? One thing already is clear: The speaker's first consideration will be protecting his members, not the White House.

Legislative leaders face a daunting equation when a president of their party occupies the Oval Office: reduced power -- since 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue sets the agenda -- plus increased expectations, since the governing party is supposed to deliver. Often that equals limited tenures, as one-time Senate Leader Bob Dole and House Speaker Tom Foley can explain after seeing their majorities crumble in the Reagan and Clinton years.

A conservative-dominated House has delivered much of what Mr. Bush has asked for throughout his presidency. That includes priorities that lawmakers shared, such as tax cuts, and those that they felt queasy about, such as Medicare prescription-drug benefits. But lately Mr. Hastert's charges have concluded that the White House asks too much, and sometimes cares as little about their views as about those of the Democratic minority.

In private, some display striking anger. That largely represents frustration with an Iraq war that has been vastly more difficult and deadly than the administration predicted. Republicans won the House in three consecutive elections before Mr. Bush came to Washington, and now fear the war could cost them their majority.

But the unhappiness also reflects the conviction that the speaker has been personally slighted by an arrogant administration -- in the firing of his friend Porter Goss from the Central Intelligence Agency, the quick veto threat after members bridled at the Dubai ports deal, and the decision to raid a lawmaker's office in a corruption probe without accommodating separation-of-powers concerns.

There are limits on the House's ability to hit back, and not only because Mr. Bush remains a potent fund-raiser. The Republicans' fate is partly tied to the president's popularity; they need to help raise his weak poll ratings.

That makes play-calling on immigration unusually tricky. The coming week's hearings, which today look like attempts to stoke the conservative base and sink the president's priority, might look different by October. White House strategists insist Mr. Hastert isn't killing immigration overhaul and may yet cut a deal.

What is clear is whom House Republicans will listen to in the huddle. "Our members would always choose the speaker over the president," explains one Republican lawmaker. "Paradoxically, that is what gives the speaker the ability to help the president. ... Too bad they don't recognize that at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue."

Let's Get A Border Deal Done (WP)

By Tamar Jacoby

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

The immigration bills passed by the House and Senate in recent months could hardly be more different. The House package is harsh, punitive and focused exclusively on tougher enforcement. The Senate bill balances toughness with pragmatism by including provisions to admit the workers we need to keep our economy growing and deal with the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already in the country.

The prospect of reconciling the two bills has always looked difficult -- the legislative equivalent of marrying a giraffe and a hippopotamus. As part of their maneuvering for position, House Republicans declared that they wouldn't even negotiate until they had held a series of special hearings on immigration. And despite signs of softening in recent days, even hints of possible agreement on a phased solution, the House is still going ahead with its hearings. Yet this, I believe, may not be such a bad thing.

Why would I say that? After all, the details on the hearings leave little doubt about the House's intentions: to look tough and -- let's put it charitably -- skeptical about immigration, both legal and illegal. Many of the sessions are scheduled for border states, where frustration about illegal immigration runs highest. And they will address such subjects as retroactive Social Security benefits for illegal immigrants, whether state and local law enforcement should be empowered to arrest illegal immigrants without other cause, whether existing border enforcement is tough enough, and English as the official language -- all subjects guaranteed to rub raw the public's irritation.

Still, as every American TV viewer knows, no one, no matter how savvy, ultimately succeeds in controlling the message in our great, garrulous media. House immigration naysayers may believe that they can use the hearings to stir voters' bile. But television, national and local, is not just going to air the sessions. On the contrary, each night's news will bring a debate about immigration, and the more one-sided the hearings, the more stubbornly the media will air the other side.

By the end of the summer, the public will have had a long, thorough course on immigration. And as someone who spends a lot of time speaking to audiences on the subject, I'm convinced that this will only deepen viewers' pragmatism. They'll start to look more closely at who these foreigners are -- and see that most are hard-working, churchgoing people with families. Voters will also start to think harder about enforcement -- about what is practical and what isn't. And by the end of the summer, they will be, if anything, hungrier for a solution -- less patient with grandstanding efforts to block a bill.

The debate won't, of course, convince the angriest voters -- the ones who want to seal the border and deport or drive out illegal immigrants. That 20 to 25 percent of the public -- and poll after poll shows that's how strong they are, no more, no less -- is probably not open to persuasion. But what the discussion could do is energize some of the other 75 percent: voters who, most surveys show, are more pragmatic -- including being willing to legalize the 12 million -- though generally less intense in their beliefs and less likely to voice or vote on them.

And new energy among moderates could in turn shift the balance among House Republicans, strengthening practical, problem-solving members as against those who think their ticket to reelection is signaling that they dislike immigrants. Of course this strategy will work only if there are indeed some pragmatists among House Republicans. But I believe they are there, including in leadership: members who see the summer's hearings less as a means to stop the Senate bill than as a way to mollify and manage the immigration naysayers in their caucus.

In the end, it will depend on what the electorate seems to want most. Do Americans want Congress to take action on this year's No. 1 domestic issue, or would they rather see candidates standing pat on a party line? A recent Manhattan Institute poll of likely Republican voters left little doubt: 72 percent thought it was very or extremely important for Congress to come to grips with immigration this year, and though 39 percent believed the Senate package was amnesty, 75 percent still favored it. They want a solution that badly.

Neither party yet seems to recognize this deepening public desire for the government to try governing. But that's exactly the point about a summer of debate about immigration. Come September, the public's hunger for a solution may be impossible to ignore.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

In Memphis, Two Heads Of Government Visit The Home Of Rock 'N' Roll Royalty (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg And Shaila Dewan

DOJ_NMG_0037803

MEMPHIS, June 30 — Plenty of awestruck Elvis impersonators have passed through the wrought-iron gates of Graceland. Until Friday, none had the president of the United States in tow.

"It's like a dream," Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi of Japan said to President Bush in the Jungle Room of the Presley home here. Amid the faux leopard print chairs and green shag carpet covering both floor and ceiling, the prime minister then serenaded the president.

"Loooovve mee tenderrrrr," Mr. Koizumi crooned, as Priscilla Presley, Elvis's former wife, and Lisa Marie, his daughter, looked on.

When Priscilla Presley pointed out the oversize gold-rimmed sunglasses once worn by the King of Rock 'n' Roll, the prime minister eagerly donned them, thrusting his hips and arms forward in imitation of a classic Elvis move.

"I knew he loved Elvis," Mr. Bush said afterward. "I didn't realize how much he loved Elvis."

If the visit, the first time a sitting president has toured Graceland, resembled an Elvis lovefest, it was a Bush-Koizumi lovefest as well, orchestrated by the White House to spotlight the close relationship between Japan and the United States. Mr. Koizumi, who will step down in September, is among Mr. Bush's closest friends on the world stage; the trip was both a farewell gift and a thank you for Japan's support on the war on terror.

In the annals of international diplomacy, it was not exactly Yalta. But it did bring a little bit of shake, rattle and roll to American foreign relations — perhaps too much for Mr. Bush, who resisted being caught in any poses even remotely Elvislike.

Not so Mr. Koizumi.

The prime minister's obsession with Elvis is well known; he shares a birthday, Jan. 8, and a hairstyle with Elvis, and worked in the 1980's to erect a bronze statue of the singer in Tokyo. At one point Friday, Mr. Koizumi happily remarked to Lisa Marie Presley that she looked like her father. He later threw his arm around her, belting out some Elvis lyrics, "Hold me close, hold me tight."

Mr. Bush, though, eventually cut off the performance, clapping the prime minister on the shoulder and firmly shaking his hand in a none-too-subtle message that the curtain was about to fall.

The sight of the ordinarily strait-laced Mr. Bush, with his vigorous exercise regimen and disdain for alcohol, wandering about the home where a bloated, drug-abusing Elvis died in the bathroom might have seemed incongruous to some. Indeed, the White House press secretary, Tony Snow, on Thursday refused to answer a delicate question: Did Mr. Bush prefer a fat Elvis or a skinny Elvis?

"Uuuuhh, yes," Mr. Snow replied diplomatically.

The prime minister was later treated to lunch at the Rendezvous, the downtown barbecue restaurant, which changed the labels on its spicy barbecue sauce to read, "One President, One Prime Minister, One King." The drummer for the Dempseys, a rockabilly band invited to perform over lunch, rescheduled the birth of his first child (the labor was induced).

With Memphis reeling from a recent spate of drive-by shootings that have killed several teenagers, the White House took pains to make sure Mr. Bush's trip was not all frivolity. The president made an unannounced stop at the National Civil Rights Museum, next door to the Lorraine Motel, where the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. was killed.

There, the civil rights leader Benjamin L. Hooks showed the prime minister, Mr. Bush and Laura Bush to Room 306, where Dr. King died. The visit was so last-minute that Mr. Hooks was at a dental appointment Friday morning when he received a phone call from the White House, asking him to serve as guide.

The trip attracted onlookers far more diverse than the already polyglot hordes that normally come to Elvis Presley Boulevard. The street was lined with people, as were barricades set up at the visitor center, across the street from Graceland. They included the curious and those just waiting for their turn to take the tour; protesters of the Iraq war and supporters of the troops; a woman dressed as Lady Liberty; and a man who said he had a letter stating that if the Boston Red Sox went to the World Series again he would throw out the first pitch, and that he would be going by Graceland later to see his old friend Lisa Marie.

But there were also those who used the surroundings for inspiration, at risk of copyright infringement and personal dignity. And not all their messages were for Mr. Bush.

Along the barricades, two Japanese doctors from the St. Jude Children's Research Hospital in Memphis stood behind a large sign. "I want you, I need you, I love you," it read. "Darling, I wish to build a children's cancer hospital in Japan together."

Gregory Wetstone, the tweed-suited director of United States operations for the International Fund for Animal Welfare, was accompanied by four Elvis impersonators in white jumpsuits. "We're delivering a message," Mr. Wetstone said. "Which is, don't be cruel — to whales."

At one end of the famous Graceland wall, inscribed by decades of tourists, stood a cluster of onlookers from the nearby predominantly black neighborhood, Whitehaven, that surrounds Graceland. One, a former state representative named Bret Thompson, said he had come because of a recent crime wave in Memphis that has caused consternation among the city's leaders.

"We had, I guess, the most violent week in Memphis history," Mr. Thompson said. "We had a killing every day." He gestured at the flashing lights and barricades closing off the street to protect the president. "This is the safest place in the world right now, isn't it?"

But mostly, Friday was a day to celebrate a peculiar slice of Americana, gold lamé suits and all.

The White House left no detail unattended for what Mr. Bush described as "this most unusual experience." The breakfast fare on Air Force One was peanut butter and banana sandwiches, a recipe straight from Elvis's kitchen. Elvis movies — "Love Me Tender" and "Viva Las Vegas"— were available for viewing.

And Elvis music played loudly over the speakers, until Mr. Bush asked that it be turned down.

The Graceland tour capped a two-day visit by Mr. Koizumi to the United States; on Thursday, the two leaders met at the White House, where the threat of a long-range-missile launching by North Korea was high on the agenda. The visit here was Mr. Bush's idea, said Michael Green, a former White House foreign policy aide.

"Frankly," Mr. Green said, "I think the bureaucrats on both sides were a little bit perplexed, if not aghast."

The house is virtually as Elvis left it, a homage to 1970's hotel décor. The white couch in the living room is 15 feet long. The kitchen is paneled in wood. The TV room has three television sets, a mirrored ceiling and a bar upholstered in yellow Naugahyde. Elvis's famed pink Cadillac was parked outside; it ordinarily sits in a car museum across the street but was moved to make way for the traveling press.

The tour was the same as ordinary tourists receive, with one big exception: there were no ropes to prevent the two leaders from sitting where Elvis sat, walking where Elvis walked or touching what Elvis touched. When Mr. Koizumi picked up the gold sunglasses, Graceland's curator, who had carefully carried the glasses into the room with gloved hands, looked as if she were about to faint.

One part of the house the Bushes and Mr. Koizumi missed was the upstairs, Elvis's living quarters. Elvis insisted they be kept private, said David Beckwith, a spokesman for Graceland.

"Nobody goes upstairs," Mr. Beckwith said.

Not even Japan's best-known Elvis impersonator and the president of the United States.

At Graceland, Japanese Prime Minister Breaks Into Song (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson

MEMPHIS, Tenn. - Elvis left the building years ago, but Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi channeled his spirit Friday during a visit to the performer's Graceland mansion.

Standing next to President Bush in the garish "jungle room," a Polynesian-inspired sanctuary filled with fake-fur chairs, ceramic monkeys and green shag carpet on the floor and ceiling, Koizumi broke into song. He crooned a few lines from "Love Me Tender" and "Fools Rush In," before slipping on a pair of Elvis Presley's signature sunglasses and attempting a few gyrations. At 64, he couldn't swivel his hips quite like the King in his prime.

Still, he ended with a classic late-Elvis flourish, crouching, waving his arm in a windmill and singing, "Glooory, glooory, haaalleluuujah!"

It was perhaps the most bizarre moment in one of the strangest road trips in diplomatic history - a U.S. president and a Japanese prime minister paying homage to The King of Rock `n' Roll.

DOJ_NMG_0037805

Bush's black presidential limo swept past Presley's pink Cadillac as he and Koizumi arrived for a tour led by Presley's former wife, Priscilla, and his daughter, Lisa Marie. The Presleys seemed to enjoy Koizumi's performance almost as much as he did.

"We need a karaoke machine," Priscilla Presley joked during Koizumi's jungle-room show.

Bush took his pal to the rock `n' roll shrine as payback for Koizumi's steadfast support and friendship. Koizumi, an avid Elvis fan who shares Presley's Jan. 8 birthday, plans to step down from his post in September.

He called his Graceland visit a dream come true.

"I knew he loved Elvis," Bush said. "I didn't realize how much he loved Elvis. He not only knows Elvis history, he can sing a pretty good Elvis song."

Bush's visit, the first by a sitting president, generated considerable interest in Memphis. Elvis fans gathered across the street from Graceland's musical-notes gate to welcome the president and his guest.

"I love the president and I love Elvis. This is the best thing that ever happened to Memphis," said Sinie Conley, 20, of nearby Lake Horn, Miss. Conley, who wore an "I Love Elvis" T-shirt, didn't know much about Koizumi but liked what she did know.

"He loves Elvis," she said. "You've got to love him for that."

The visit also attracted four protesting Elvis impersonators, who waved signs denouncing Japan's refusal to join a ban on whaling.

After leaving Graceland, Bush and Koizumi stopped at a more somber Memphis landmark - the motel where civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated in 1968. The former Lorraine Motel now houses the National Civil Rights Museum. They stood on the balcony where King was shot.

But the day was devoted to Elvis from the moment Bush and Koizumi boarded Air Force One. Presley's songs played from the aircraft's speakers. The options for in-flight entertainment included two Elvis movies, "Love Me Tender" and "Viva Las Vegas."

Even the food had an Elvis theme, although Bush and Koizumi passed on Presley's favorite sandwich - peanut butter and bananas, grilled. White House chief of staff Josh Bolten wished he had done the same.

"I'm feeling a little heavy," he acknowledged. "I so rarely fry my peanut butter sandwiches."

At Graceland, the two leaders got the standard tour, but with more knowledgeable tour guides, better access to rooms and the chance to handle some of Presley's personal items.

Still, even the president didn't get to go upstairs, where Presley died in 1977 from heart problems and drug abuse. The mansion, set on 14 acres south of downtown Memphis, draws about 600,000 visitors annually.

"This is the White House of rock `n' roll," said Graceland spokesman Kevin Kern.

Bush and Koizumi, who both love baseball, hit it off from their first meeting in 2001 when they played an impromptu game of catch. White House advisers said Bush admires Koizumi's maverick style and his willingness to take unpopular stands, particularly his decision to send Japanese troops to Iraq in noncombat roles.

More than four dozen Japanese reporters came to Graceland to chronicle Koizumi's visit. Some were a little perplexed by his enthusiasm for the rock king.

"I've never heard Elvis Presley songs," said Hitoshi Inoue, a Washington correspondent for TV Asahi.

Koizumi couldn't stop singing them. He sang as he threw his arm around Lisa Marie Presley, 38, serenading her with one of her father's classic love songs, "Hold me close, hold me tight." She giggled.

Lisa Marie, who married musician Michael Lockwood last January in Kyoto, Japan, bantered with Koizumi in Japanese when he told her she looks like her father.

The Japanese prime minister sang a few more snippets as he and Bush prepared to leave.

"It's a like a dream," Koizumi said, cueing up his version of "To Dream the Impossible Dream." "Thank you very much for treating me nice," he added, setting up a snippet from "Treat Me Nice."

At that point, Bush dropped the curtain.

"We're going to have some barbecue," the president announced, closing Koizumi's performance.

Japanese Leader Sings King's Praises (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0037806

By Joseph Curl, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, July 1, 2006

MEMPHIS, Tenn. -- Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi yesterday rocked the House That Elvis Built, crooning a few bars of some classic Presley hits and leaving his tour guide, President Bush, looking a bit like a whipped Hound Dog.

It didn't take much to get Asia's biggest Elvis fan to break into song as he made a long-sought pilgrimage to the Memphis mansion. "You're a pretty good Elvis singer," the president said to the long-haired leader, worshipped like a rock star in his home country.

"Let's hear some," yelled a reporter from the edge of the Jungle Room, a time capsule of 1974 with its avocado green shag carpet on the floor and ceiling, a feature that made for such pure acoustics that Elvis and his buddies recorded several hits there.

"Love me tender ... " Mr. Koizumi sang in a low register, breaking off as laughter from first lady Laura Bush, along with Priscilla Presley, Elvis' widow, and the couple's daughter, Lisa Marie Presley, drowned him out.

The Japanese leader took a breath and then launched into a medley. "Wise men say, only fools rush in ... " he crooned, before being interrupted by Mr. Bush, who said: "I thought you were going to sing 'Blue Suede Shoes.' "

But Mr. Koizumi, who was born on the same date as the King, followed in his idol's footsteps, making a quick costume change by donning a pair of gold-rimmed sunglasses that Elvis wore in the 1972 concert film, "Elvis on Tour."

Striking the emotive stage pose seen in the later days of Elvis' career -- stretched out in a near crouch, one arm windmilling, the prime minister let go with one last burst. "Glory, glory hallelujah," he sang, drawing a surprised smile from the president, who stepped back to take in the full performance.

Although a Graceland "archivist" wearing white cotton gloves had carefully laid out two pairs of glasses, Mr. Bush steered clear of the spectacles.

Mr. Koizumi called the day touring what many consider America's mecca of rock 'n' roll "a dream."

"I never expected president come with me to visit Graceland," he said in broken English.

Mr. Bush struck a more sober tone by stating: "The visit here is an indication of how well-known Elvis was around the world. A lot of people are still singing Elvis Presley songs here in the states, and there's a lot of people who love Elvis Presley in Japan, including the prime minister."

White House staffers leaned more toward the exuberant Koizumi: Press secretary Tony Snow briefed reporters aboard Air Force One en route to Graceland wearing a pair of the huge trademark Elvis tinted glasses; a dozen other staffers also donned them. Many became tourists themselves, taking pictures of the spangled and sparkly jumpsuits in glass cases and the 100 gold and platinum records lining the walls in what was once the King's racquetball court.

The crew of the presidential aircraft also got in on the action. They prepared a special Elvis treat, gleaned from the Graceland Web site: A fried peanut butter and banana sandwich, with a whopping 36 grams of fat. Both svelte leaders skipped the treat; Mr. Bush drank coffee, and Mr. Koizumi drank green tea.

Elvis songs, including "Don't Be Cruel," were playing over the public-address system aboard Air Force One, and Elvis movies, including "Viva Las Vegas," were available upon request.

While the president is known for his disdain of tourist stops -- he skipped India's Taj Mahal on a trip this year and last month raced through Vienna, Austria, and Budapest in 36 hours -- he offered to take the prime minister to Graceland a year ago.

The two leaders were no doubt paying homage to the young Elvis, the dirty-dancing heartthrob who changed the music world with a newfangled thing called rock 'n' roll, not the old Elvis, the drug-addled and bloated pill-popping junkie who paid young girls to wrestle for his entertainment.

While Mr. Bush and Mr. Koizumi were not allowed in private quarters upstairs where Elvis died, they toured the rest of the 14-acre estate, stopping off to see the black baby-grand piano by a 15-foot white sofa in the living room, Elvis' burial shrine -- even one of the King's prized possessions, a pink Cadillac.

As the first sitting president to visit Graceland, Mr. Bush was given an original Elvis belt buckle from the estate. Mr. Koizumi was given a vintage movie poster.

The leaders also made a stop at a different King memorial: The National Civil Rights Museum at the Lorraine Motel, where Martin Luther King was assassinated in 1968. The two leaders stood on the spot on the motel balcony where King was slain.

Mr. Bush and Mr. Koizumi then stopped for lunch at Rendezvous, a 58-year-old barbecue restaurant. Seated at red-checked tablecloths, the leaders dug into a meal of Memphis-style ribs, cole slaw, sausage, beans and sweet tea.

Japan's Premier Follows Dream To Memphis (FT)

By Caroline Daniel And David Pilling In Memphis

Financial Times, July 1, 2006

Not many presidential road-trips cum summits begin at the porticos of Graceland, Elvis's home in Memphis, with a private tour of the house from Priscilla and Lisa Marie Presley, and end being handed a genuine Elvis buckle from one of his costumes.

But Friday's special trip to the birthplace of the King, designed to celebrate his special relationship Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, was a day of firsts. It was the first time a sitting President had visited Graceland. And before Mr Koizumi, the President of Costa Rica was the only foreign leader to have made the pilgrimage to the King

Mr Koizumi's arrival on Air Force One in the morning at Andrew Air Force Base was heralded with the sounds of Elvis tunes, piped over the PA. After getting in the mood watching Elvis movies, the two leaders, who have established a wsrm personal chemistry, arrived at Graceland. They were greeted by a sign from the local mayor: "Menfisu ni youkoso" or Welcome to Memphis.

Graceland is not exactly yen understatement, with its Jungle room, replete with glowering monkey statues, a homage to a hotel room Elvis stayed in Hawaii, its billiard room draped in yards and yards of pyschedelic material, his round fur bed with inset mirrors, and a racketball court festooned with gold records.

Even in the heart of Americana, there were reminders of Japan. Mr Koizumi could view a Karate kit that Elvis, used to wear. He was a black belt, and claimed he practiced every day. As he epigrammatically observed: "There's a lot to it. It's not just breaking bricks. I mean, how many times is a brick gonna come out and attack you?"

The Graceland directors had eschewed setting up a karaoke machine, perhaps out of deference to diplomatic etiquette, and not wanting Mr Bush to appear a party pooper for not joining in a duet of Jailhouse Rock. Yet, Mr Koizumi still broke into a few bars of Love Me Tender, and then pulling Lisa Marie Presley close to him, serenaded her with the words: "hold me close, hold me tight."

Taking up the chance to wear some authentic Elvis shades (two pairs were set aside, Bush decline his, at least publically), Mr Koizumi, seemingly imbued with the spirit of the singer, later did the Elvis swoon: arms outstretched, falling to his knees, he offered a full gusto impersonation of his hero, with whom he shares a birthday, to Mr Bush's delight.

Yet not all of Mr Koizumi's efforts have been as warmly applauded. His album, released in 2002, his top 25 Elvis songs, sold 200,000 copies but was actually in breach of Elvis copyright because it used and doctored a photo of Elvis without seeking copyright from the photographer. Elvis Presley Enterprises has quietly advised the prime minister that if he wants to re-release the album – as he does – that he should ditch the photo.

Even so, the Graceland directors gave him a vintage Elvis poster, while Laura Bush, received a TLC necklace, (Tender Loving Care), something Elvis gave members of his female entourage. Jack Soden, chief executive of Elvis Presley Enterprises, says more foreign dignitaries, should be brought to the heartland. "It's no good if they stay in a presidential suite of a Manhattan hotel. They need to see Memphis Tennessee, a simpler place, where we are sure our most honoured guests get barbecue not Maine lobster."

Barbecue is exactly what Mr Kozumi received. He managed to avoid swallowing another helping of US beef at lunch, having already had to chew down two portions in a politically driven photo-op to underline the recent lifting of the Japanese ban on the export of US beef. Instead, at Rendezvous Charcoal Ribs in downtown Memphis, the menu was charcoal broiled pork ribs, pork shoulder sandwich, beans and slaw.

Yet Mr Bush's jocular mood nearly turned into annoyance as he arrived at the head table and saw six empty chairs. Lisa Marie Presley and Priscilla Presley eventually idled in. But his guest of honour was lagging. Mr Bush looking awkwardly around, scanning the front door. He picked up a spoon and scooped beans on a plate, and looked like an anxious housewife presiding over their first dinner party. Still no Mr Koizumi. He picked up the plate of ribs and offered them to one of his Japanese guests. More minutes ticked by. As he fiddled with a slotted spoon, there was palpable relief when his guest arrived.

They left after the meal, with no further serenades, “he’s all sung out,” said Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman. Mr Bush’s parting shot was: “I’ll see you at the G8.”

The idea for the Graceland trip was Mr Bush’s, inspired by a Camp David meeting with Mr Koizumi in 2002, and cemented after Mr Koizumi burst into Elvis songs at the G8 summit last year. This visit sets a new symbol for Presidential intimacy. From now on, world leaders, anxious to show their clout, may demand a visit to Camp Elvis not Camp David.

Bush Takes Koizumi For Tour Of Graceland (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

GRACELAND, America, June 30 -- If wise men say only fools rush in, then on this day, at least, President Bush heeded the wise men.

It was one thing to take his friend, Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, to Memphis to visit what evidently is now the nation's most important tourist site. But the president drew a line Friday when the wavy-haired Japanese leader began crooning Elvis songs.

" Love me tender, " Koizumi sang in a deep baritone that bore a fair approximation of the King, if the King had been from Tokyo. Standing in front of the stone waterfall in the Jungle Room here at Graceland, complete with avocado shag carpet on both floor and ceiling, Bush laughed but did not join in.

Just as well. The image of the politically struggling president lamenting his own heartbreak hotel might have left his advisers all shook up. This was a day for friendship, rock-and-roll and bad puns as Bush embarked on what even he called an "unusual experience," quite possibly the most memorable diplomatic pleasure trip of his presidency.

As a farewell gift to Koizumi, one of his best overseas friends and a longtime Elvis aficionado making his final U.S. visit before retiring in September, Bush organized a special trip to the mansion where the legendary singer lived and died. The mecca of fans everywhere closed itself to ordinary tourists for the first time since opening in 1982 as it played host to its first sitting president. Priscilla and Lisa Marie Presley flew in for the occasion.

If the president stuck to understated good humor, Koizumi plunged into the spirit of the occasion, mugging for cameras in Elvis's sunglasses, belting out some of his favorite lyrics, serenading Lisa Marie and even mimicking her father's famous stage moves. The prime minister, who once released a CD of his favorite Elvis songs, gleefully checked out the extravagant concert costumes and the pink Cadillac on the lawn and the wall after wall of gold records.

"My dream come true," Koizumi said, after singing a few words of "The Impossible Dream" to make the point.

While they were in town, the president and prime minister also visited another landmark, the National Civil Rights Museum next to the motel where Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated. It was such a last-minute addition to the trip that the White House tracked civil rights leader Benjamin Hooks down at his dentist's office Friday morning to ask him to show the visitors around.

That Bush would take the time to come to Graceland testifies to the strength of his personal bond with Koizumi, first forged on the grass at Camp David in 2001 when they played catch, traded baseball stories and talked about favorite movies such as "High Noon."

Bush is at best an accidental tourist. He once raced through the Kremlin cathedrals in Moscow in seven minutes flat, did the sprawling Hermitage Museum in St. Petersburg in a half-hour and turned to go soon after arriving at the Great Wall of China. He declined an invitation to visit the Taj Mahal altogether while in India, pleading lack of time.

Yet he managed to carve out eight hours to fly here from Washington, trailed by a media throng the likes of which rarely accompanies him to, say, a Medicare speech in Missouri. About 300 journalists showed up, in fact, and a press center was set up in the Elvis Presley Automobile Museum featuring his 1956 purple Cadillac Eldorado convertible, the 1960 MG used in "Blue Hawaii" and the rest of his fleet. Tourists circled the journalists under the giant disco ball as if they were another exhibit.

Everyone tried to get into the act. The Air Force One crew played "Love Me Tender" and "Don't Be Cruel" over the intercom system as the president, Laura Bush and Koizumi boarded. Elvis movies were made available for viewing during the flight to Memphis. For breakfast, the King's favorite fried peanut butter-and-banana sandwiches, with 36 grams of fat apiece, were served on the plane. Bush and Koizumi politely passed, although White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten gave it a try, reportedly to his regret.

When Bush and Koizumi arrived at Graceland, a small clutch of activists from the International Fund for Animal Welfare gathered nearby to protest Japan's whaling policies, featuring four Elvis impersonators holding up signs such as "Don't Be Cruel."

But nothing would spoil Koizumi's day, which came complete with the gift of a vintage Elvis poster. He checked out the triple televisions embedded in the walls of the yellow-and-blue basement entertainment room with the mirrored ceiling. He was shown the pool table in the billiard room festooned with 350 yards of multicolored fabric covering the walls and ceiling. He and Bush shared what a Graceland spokesman called "private time" in the Meditation Garden where Elvis and his parents are buried next to an eternal flame.

By the time he got to the Jungle Room, decorated after Elvis's memory of Hawaii, Koizumi was ready to perform.

He smiled at Lisa Marie, her brown hair streaked with blond.

"You look like Elvis," he told her.

" Arigato ," she answered, expressing thanks.

"My birthday is the same as Elvis," he noted.

"Even now," he added, "I often listen to Elvis CDs."

"You're a pretty good Elvis singer," Bush offered.

Koizumi demurred. "I'm not impersonator," he said.

But Washington Times reporter Joseph Curl recognized the moment of opportunity. "Let's hear some," he called out.

And Koizumi obliged. He started with a few words from "Love Me Tender," then segued into "Can't Help Falling in Love."

"I thought you were going to do 'Blue Suede Shoes,' " Bush said.

The first lady of the country and the onetime first ladies of music came over to pose for pictures. Koizumi wrapped his arm around Lisa Marie. "Hold me close, I want to hold you tight," he crooned to her.

Priscilla showed the prime minister a few of her former husband's personal items, including a pair of sunglasses that a museum employee in white gloves had gingerly placed on a table minutes before.

Koizumi eagerly grabbed them and slapped them on. Then, in the moment that thrilled television producers around the world, he crouched, seemed to play a bit of air guitar and emulated the late singer's motions while belting out, "Glory, glory, hallelujah."

The president kept his singing voice and dance moves to himself but seemed to enjoy the show. He wanted Koizumi to have a good time. On this day, Mission Accomplished. "I knew he loved Elvis," Bush said. "I didn't realize how much he loved Elvis."

Bush Leads Koizumi On Tour Of Graceland (AP-Y2)

By Deb Riechmann, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 1, 2006

It didn't take much coaxing from President Bush to get Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi to croon some Elvis tunes Friday at the king of rock 'n' roll's Graceland mansion.

"You're a pretty good Elvis singer," Bush told Koizumi, an avid Elvis Presley fan.

That was all the prodding the freewheeling prime minister needed.

"Love me tender, love me sweet," Koizumi sang.

"Wise men say, only fools rush in ..."

"We need a karaoke machine," joked Priscilla Presley, mother of Presley's only child, Lisa Marie. Koizumi donned a pair of sunglasses that Elvis wore in the 1972 concert film, "Elvis on Tour," and hugged Lisa Marie. "Hold me close. Hold me tight," he sang to her.

Then Koizumi bent down, swung his arm as if strumming a guitar and sang, "Glory, glory, hallelujah," a refrain from the "Battle Hymn of the Republic," also part of the Presley repertoire.

The visit to Graceland was the highlight of the outgoing Japanese leader's two-day visit with Bush, a kind of sayonara summit to illustrate how their personal friendship has helped bring U.S.-Japan relations closer than at any time since the end of World War II.

"This visit here shows that not only am I personally fond of the prime minister, but the ties between our peoples are very strong as well," Bush said.

It was Bush's first visit to Presley's white brick mansion.

"My first visit, too," Koizumi said, standing in a gaudy, wood-paneled den known as the Jungle Room, a place where Presley hung out with his buddies. "It's like a dream — with President Bush and Presley's daughter."

Bush, first lady Laura Bush and Koizumi drove through the gates of Graceland in a shiny, black limousine adorned with the flags of both nations. It was as if they were making a formal diplomatic visit.

After they got out, the scene turned surreal.

Here was Bush, who didn't stop off at the Taj Mahal while in India, touring the home of a music star who died in his bathroom of heart disease and drug abuse in 1977.

Instead of walking down red carpets to review troops, Bush and Koizumi strode over green shag that lined the floors and ceiling of the den. Instead of elegant furniture and chandeliers, they posed for photos in a room decorated with white ceramic monkeys and wooden chairs with armrests carved in the shape of animal heads.

Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove, snapped photos of the Japanese delegation in front of Elvis' 1955 pink Cadillac with whitewall tires. "I loved the (lamp) shade they had covered with faux fur," Rove said.

Graceland was closed to tourists when Lisa Marie and her mother escorted the dignitaries around the 14-acre estate, showing them the glossy black baby-grand piano, a 15-foot white sofa in the living room, Presley's burial site and his gold records, guitars and costumes.

Bush and Koizumi weren't allowed to peek at the private quarters upstairs.

It was all Elvis all day.

Along with anti-war protesters along the motorcade route, four Elvis impersonators in white jumpsuits sang "Don't be Cruel" in the International Fund for Animal Welfare's protest to urge a halt to illegal Japanese whaling.

Elvis tunes were playing over the public address system aboard Air Force One as Bush and Koizumi flew here. Elvis movies were available upon request.

White House press secretary Tony Snow wore Elvis novelty shades to brief reporters on the plane and fueled conspiracy theories that the singer never died. The two leaders, he said, would visit the "alleged grave site."

An option on Air Force One, as printed on a menu, was one of the singer's favorites: Elvis Presley's fried peanut butter and banana sandwich, which had 36 grams of fat. Both leaders passed on it. Bush drank coffee and Koizumi drank green tea.

"I'm feeling a little heavy," said White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten, who gobbled down the breakfast treat. "I so rarely fry my peanut butter sandwiches."

The day did have a serious moment. The two made an unscheduled stop at the National Civil Rights Museum at The Lorraine Motel, where the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated in 1968. Bush and Koizumi emerged from a tour to stand on the spot on the motel balcony where King was slain.

The Elvis mania returned, however, when the leaders were greeted at Rendezvous, Memphis' famed, 58-year-old barbecue restaurant, by a rockabilly trio called The Dempseys, which has often played at Elvis' restaurant in the city. Seated at red-checked tablecloths, Bush and Koizumi dug into a meal of Memphis-style ribs, cole slaw, sausage, beans and sweet tea.

Bush and the Japanese prime minister parted company after lunch. On his way back to Washington, Bush stopped in Ohio to attend a fundraiser at a private home in suburban Columbus for Republican Sen. Mike DeWine (news, bio, voting record).

Afterward, Bush couldn't resist the lure of a neighborhood lemonade stand across the street where several dozen cheering supporters had gathered. Bush was in such a good mood that he bought a round of lemonade for some members of the traveling press.

Japan's Koizumi Shakes Up Graceland (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

The prime minister, long a fan of the King, cuts loose as he tours with the Bushes and Presleys.

MEMPHIS, Tenn. — President Bush doesn't get a lot of tender love these days on the world stage. But Friday, taking his Japanese counterpart on a private tour of Graceland, Bush received a hunk of burning love.

Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi — calling it a "dream" to see the home of his longtime idol, Elvis Presley — was reduced to almost uncontrollably giddy giggling as he broke into a serenade for Bush and First Lady Laura Bush and for Presley's ex-wife, Priscilla, and their daughter, Lisa Marie.

"Love me tender … " Koizumi crooned through a thick accent as he stood with the others in Graceland's famously tacky Jungle Room — replete with fake-fur-covered furniture, an indoor waterfall and avocado colored shag carpet covering floor and ceiling.

"Wise men say," he sang, "only fools rush in."

Lisa Marie Presley spoke up, wondering where the group could find a karaoke machine. But President Bush had heard enough. He tapped his friend on the shoulder and shook his hand, effectively cutting off the performance.

"I thought you were going to do 'Blue Suede Shoes,' " Bush cracked.

The exchange marked one of several offbeat but affectionate scenes during Koizumi's "sayonara summit" this week in the United States.

The prime minister is soon leaving office, and ever since he first met Bush exactly five years ago — and played a game of catch at Camp David — the two leaders have maintained a close friendship.

Like Bush, Koizumi is a baseball fan and a lover of country music. In perhaps the key element to his rapport with Bush, he also has been a staunch supporter of the war in Iraq.

Friday's tour was a bit of a reward for that rare loyalty. Koizumi, who shares Elvis' Jan. 8 birthday, is obsessed with Presley's music and has even produced a CD in Japan of his 25 favorite songs by "the King."

The trip followed a gala White House dinner Thursday night at which the two leaders exchanged compliments.

Bush drew parallels between Koizumi and Presley, noting their widely known shared taste in hairstyles. "Like you, he had great hair," the president said during his dinner toast. "Like you, he was known to sing in public."

Koizumi said that, as a child, his "exposure to America was Presley," which he said was "a vivid memory" of his youth.

"The first English song I ever learned by heart was Presley's 'I Want You, I Need You, I Love You,' " he said.

That had been the first song Koizumi selected earlier Thursday on a half-century-old jukebox that the Bushes gave him as a present. And, even during a joint news conference at the White House that focused on such serious matters as North Korean missiles and military tribunals for alleged terrorists, Koizumi was inspired to make a Presley reference.

"Thank you, very much, American people, for 'Love Me Tender,' " he said, drawing laughter as Bush all but dragged him from the East Room podium.

On Friday's pilgrimage to Graceland, the delegation strolled through each room of the 1920s-era mansion. They saw display cases containing some of Presley's sequin-encrusted outfits. His signature pink Cadillac was removed from the antique car museum and placed near the home's front entrance to make room for the media to work.

Bush and Koizumi enjoyed a bit of private time in the meditation garden where Elvis and his parents are buried. The leaders did not go upstairs, the site of Presley's death at age 42 in 1977.

Back in the Jungle Room, Koizumi threw his left arm around Lisa Marie's shoulders and sang again.

"Hold me close, hold me tight."

Awkward laughter filled the room.

Moments later, Koizumi poked through Elvis' wallet, which contained original cards and IDs, and, surprising museum curators, he picked up and donned a pair of the King's sunglasses. As others watched with puzzled looks, the prime minister appeared to play an air guitar, then swivel his arms as if to mimic a famous Elvis maneuver.

DOJ_NMG_0037812

When Bush called him a "pretty good Elvis singer," Koizumi replied: "I'm not impersonator."

There were, however, some impersonators attracted to the circus: four anti-whaling protesters dressed up as Elvis stood outside Graceland holding signs telling Koizumi, "Don't be cruel."

The half-day stop at Graceland was something of a departure for Bush, who has not been known to spend much time at cultural attractions. He zipped through the vaunted Hermitage Museum in St. Petersburg, Russia; rushed past the ancient Great Wall in China; and skipped the Taj Mahal in India — raising eyebrows among many of that country's citizens.

With Koizumi in tow, Bush also visited a more somber historical site in Memphis: the motel where civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated in 1968.

The group stopped briefly at a museum on the property and, guided by longtime civil rights leader Benjamin Hooks, went to the spot on the motel's balcony where King was shot.

The Bushes and Koizumi lunched at one of the city's barbecue restaurants and then parted company, with the president heading to Ohio for a Republican fundraiser.

Bush Takes Japanese Prime Minister For Memphis Visit (MCA)

By Zack McMillin

Memphis Commercial Appeal, July 1, 2006

The Tourist in Chief made his inaugural trip to Graceland on Friday, but it was President Bush's guest from Japan who rocked Memphis with his fervent adulation for the King of Rock and Roll.

Strutting and singing and doing his best Elvis lunge across the shag carpet of the Jungle Room, Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi delighted the president, first lady Laura Bush and tour guides Priscilla and Lisa Marie Presley.

Advertisement

"You're a pretty good Elvis singer," Bush said, and with the pack of media in the room entreating him, Koizumi delivered a teasing cabaret of tunes that make metaphors hard to resist.

"Love me tender," he crooned, giving the appropriate serenade to a love-fest of a visit from the retiring Japanese leader to his pal in Washington.

"Wise men say, only fools rush in," Koizumi sang, beginning another love song but summing up what many dozen protesters across the street said in a less polite way about their dissatisfaction over the war in Iraq.

When a Graceland curator allowed Koizumi to don a pair of authentic gold sunglasses worn by the King in 1973, the prime minister dipped and thrust out his right hand while delivering a many-syllabled "Glory, glory hallelujah."

The first two heads of state to visit Graceland at the same time -- it was also a first visit for both Bush, 59, and Koizumi, 64 -- have long since moved beyond diplomatic flirtations, and the fun, lighthearted visit to Memphis (even a few local Democrats smiled and yukked with Bush, dressed sans tie with sleeves rolled up) came just a few weeks after a state visit to Europe that drew hordes of protesters.

At Thursday's White House press conference, Bush used the friendship between Japan and the U.S., 60 years after battling one another, as a reason to remain optimistic despite the difficulties in the Middle East. Koizumi and Japan were part of the coalition that supported the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003.

Bush lightened the comparison on Friday, dwelling instead on the bond Koizumi made with America because of the music of a Memphis original.

"His reputation was so strong that he attracted the attention of the now prime minister of Japan," Bush said after the tour, which lasted about 75 minutes.

"This visit here shows that not only am I personally fond of the prime minister, but the ties between our peoples are strong, as well."

Koizumi, whose English is heavily accented, gushed, "It is like a dream." Then he tried a few bars of Elvis' "Dream the Impossible Dream."

DOJ_NMG_0037813

Although the president never donned the plastic souvenir Elvis glasses nor gyrated even once, the visit had the feel of a class field trip.

The president's staff, including senior adviser Karl Rove, snapped pictures in front of the pink Cadillac parked in front of the mansion, and more than a few sported the sunglasses.

Peanut butter and banana sandwiches were eaten by staff on the Air Force One ride to Memphis.

The jet arrived in Memphis at 10 a.m. Among those greeting the arrival were new U.S. Atty. Gen. David Kustoff (Tennessee campaign manager for Bush in 2004) and Memphis Mayor Willie Herenton.

All along the 30-car motorcade's route to Graceland -- which began on Democrat Road -- gaggles of people stood and waved, took pictures and held signs. That scene repeated throughout the four-hour visit, with the largest crowds camped near Graceland and in the cordoned-off downtown blocks surrounding the Rendezvous, where Bush, Koizumi and a several dozen others ate lunch.

The motorcade surprised those in the South Main area -- and the hungry media -- by making an unexpected stop at the National Civil Rights Museum. Bush greeted several stunned children with handshakes and shoulder taps.

The president and prime minister took a quick tour and later stood on the Lorraine Motel's balcony with former NAACP president Dr. Benjamin Hooks and AutoZone founder Pitt Hyde.

Standing behind the wreath that marks the spot where Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. was killed in 1968, Hyde and Hooks pointed across the street to the former boarding house from where James Earl Ray fired the fatal shots. That building, now part of the museum, was not cleared, and people were crowded up to the windows to watch.

Secret Service personnel scrambled into position, but minutes later Bush and Koizumi headed to the Rendezvous.

A crowd that included Tennessee Sens. Lamar Alexander and Bill Frist and U.S. Rep. Harold Ford Jr. joined the party for a big lunch in the upstairs banquet room.

The Dempseys, a Memphis rockabilly trio, provided the swinging Elvis cover tunes, and even enticed Koizumi to perform with them, going back to his favorite, "I Want You, I Need You, I Love You."

"I watched him throughout most of the lunch, and he was cheering and applauding and pumping his fists," said Rollin Riggs, the band's manager.

After nearly an hour at the Rendezvous, the motorcade traveled back the the Tennessee National Air Guard hangar.

After the president honored Cordova resident Sandi Langley for her volunteer work, he boarded Air Force One and left Memphis airspace at about 2:10, bound for an event in Ohio.

Koizumi met with executives from Sharp and Brother, Japanese companies with a Memphis presence, then departed about 2:45 on his jumbo jet with the round red dot on the tail.

"It was a great visit," said Tom Schieffer, the American ambassador to Japan. "Just a terrific afternoon."

Pilgrimage Offered As Thanks; Tactical Move Lies Beneath Friday's Frivolity (MCAPPEAL)

By Halimah Abdullah

Memphis Commercial Appeal, July 1, 2006

The chemistry between President Bush and Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi has been the stuff of a warm and fuzzy, 1950s-era beach blanket flick.

Koizumi strutted and gyrated as if he had channeled Elvis while a bemused Bush looked on from Graceland's shrine-like confines on Friday.

However, beyond the pomp and pompadours, the Memphis visit was a carefully orchestrated symbol of thanks to an outgoing leader of the world's second largest economy for supporting Bush on issues like the war in Iraq and terrorism.

It's also a tactical move for Bush who, while cultivating close relationships with now-departing heads of state, finds himself besieged with criticism on domestic and international fronts.

Likewise, Koizumi's theatrical warbling of Elvis tunes and flirting with Lisa Marie Presley were more about maintaining his affable public persona as he hammed it up for the press pool.

DOJ_NMG_0037814

"I don't think he's doing this because he likes ... music and he and Bush get along," said James Auer, director of Vanderbilt University's Center for U.S.-Japan Studies and Cooperation. "He's doing this because it's in Japan's best interests."

Ironically, both nations' mutual interests were strengthened just after the Sept. 11 attacks when Japan supported the United States by backing efforts in Afghanistan and sending 600 peacekeeping troops to Iraq.

Koizumi who, like Bush, had only been in office a few months, found a kindred spirit in the man he compares to Gary Cooper in "High Noon."

During their Memphis visit, the two goofed around in the mansion's famous Jungle Room and posed for pictures near Elvis' pink Cadillac.

"Their friendship has been buttressed by their common ground," said Yinan He, a professor of security studies at Seton Hall's Whitehead School of Diplomacy and International Relations in New Jersey. "They're both young, relatively speaking. They're both more unilateral in their approach, and they're both conservative."

To be sure, both nations have benefited from Bush and Koizumi's friendship.

The United States. supported Japan's bid to become a permanent member of the U.N. Security Council. Japan headed up efforts to finance reconstruction in Iraq and dispatched ships to the Indian Ocean to refuel U.S. and other ally craft.

"Bush likes to say (Japan and the U.S.) have a very current common interest in promoting stability, freedom and democracy," Auer said.

The flip side of such a close relationship has meant a more ambivalent stance on such issues as Japan's ban on U.S. beef, a recently resolved point of contention.

"The Bush administration has not pushed them as hard as they could have on that," He said.

Bush has been largely mum on Koizumi's controversial visits to the Yasukuni Shrine, which commemorates the Japanese killed during World War II, including war criminals.

Such gestures are being scrutinized more closely as Bush enters the autumn of of his presidency and Koizumi exits stage left.

Political experts on both sides of the ocean have speculated what this parting of ways will mean in term of future relations between the two nations.

In the meantime, both leaders' stance on North Korea's nuclear weapons efforts, rather than their Memphis-bound roadtrip, provides perhaps a long-lasting symbol of commonality.

"It is a signal to North Korea," He said.

"The two leaders will stand together against any sort of threat."

Heads Of State Pay Call On Palace Of The King (TENN)

By Leon Alligood

Tennessean, July 1, 2006

MEMPHIS — Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi went to Graceland Friday and all he got was a tour of Elvis Presley's mansion with the King's ex-wife and daughter, Priscilla and Lisa Marie, serving as tour guides.

The No. 1 karaoke dude from the Land of the Rising Sun also got a look-see at some of the hip-twisting crooner's artifacts brought out from the Elvis warehouse/archives especially for him.

And he was given a movie poster, written in Japanese, from Elvis' Kissin' Cousins – from Elvis' personal collection.

Oh yeah, the president of the United States was there, too.

It was one magic day for Memphis, one grand day for Graceland.

For about an hour and a half, three world potentates — two among the living and one reputed, by some theorists, to still be in the building — were at the locus of, if not the world's attention, then the universe of all things Elvis.

The trip had been in the works for about six weeks. President George W. Bush's people, the Secret Service, came to town early to check out the Jungle Room and the rest of the mansion and gave their security blessings to the visit, which Koizumi requested.

It seems the prime minister with the poofy hairdo has been lip-synching hunka, hunka burnin' love for years.

Graceland averages 600,000 visitors per year, but on this memorable day for all VIPs involved, the parade of families from Iowa and Arkansas and Glasgow (Scotland, not Kentucky) and Paris (France, not Tennessee) were politely kept at a distance while Bush and Koizumi toured the grounds held as a shrine by Elvis aficionados.

At 7 a.m., with the Bayer aspirin-white sun already above the tail of the Lisa Marie, Elvis' private jet parked across from the mansion's entrance, an eclectic crowd began gathering.

The "God bless the USA" crowd in one section held signs that showed their love for President Bush. He could not see them because a row of Memphis buses was parked nose-to-tail in front of the crowd for security purposes.

"I love my president and I love Elvis," said Sinie Conley, 20, of Horn Lake, Miss.

"He's going to love it. The kitchen colors are a little weird, but he'll love it," Conley said of the prime minister's mansion viewing.

About 10 feet away there was uproar as a self-appointed Elvis cheerleader held up a sign: "Make noise if you love Elvis."

Down the row, Kelly Jacobs, decked out in her best imitation of Lady Liberty, made her way into the crowd, much to the chagrin of others. Her sign read: "Japan left Iraq; U.S. leave now." It referred to Koizumi's recent decision to pull his country's 500 soldiers out.

On her right shoulder she wore a pendant that featured silver numbers. The number Friday was 2,532, the number of American soldiers killed in Iraq.

"I have to change it every day," she said. "How long? How long?"

Just when it appeared there would be no Elvis sightings, four of them appeared in white jump suits that sparkled with colored stones. They sported black hair perfectly coiffed and sideburns appropriately long, and sweated like pigs headed for a Fourth of July grill pit.

In only-at-Graceland fashion, they were on a mission to save the whales, in a landlocked state, no less. The "Elvi" were hired to bring attention to Japan's whale-hunting activities. To many groans and grimaces and smiles they sang a special version of "Don't Be Cruel."

"They kill over a thousand whales a year and are beginning to accelerate that. We want to bring it to Koizumi's attention. He can do something about it," said Gregory Wetstone, U.S. director for the International Fund for Animal Welfare.

"It's a job," said Chuck Baril, 45, one of the Elvi, who is from Gallatin. When he isn't Elvis he is the doorman at the Doubletree Hotel in downtown Nashville.

Perhaps the crowd on Elvis Presley Boulevard proved this: While Japan is a nation where the people elect their leaders but still show respect to a reigning monarch, America, it turns out, is very similar — we have a president and a King, and they both draw quite a crowd.

But yesterday was the first time they drew a crowd together. While Richard Nixon was the first president to visit China, and Rutherford B. Hayes was the first president to visit the West Coast, George W. Bush will go down in history as the first sitting president to visit Graceland.

While Bush didn't get a movie poster like his Japanese counterpart, he did get a similarly cool gift from the Presleys: The eagle-design belt buckle Elvis wore on his jumpsuit in Aloha from Hawaii.

After about 90 minutes of taking over the White House of the Elvis Nation, the VIPs left as they arrived, in a hurry, running the gauntlet of those who would praise and those who would condemn— if only the power pals could hear them in their sleek, black, bulletproof, soundproof limos.

Of course, their next stop was ribs at The Rendezvous, the town's iconic eatery. What world leader wouldn't drive fast for that? •

IN LAND OF EMPEROR, THE KING RULES

So why do the Japanese adore Elvis Presley? An ABC News story last year said there were 500 Elvises for hire in Tokyo alone.

"He just has that appeal to a certain generation," said Dr. Shotaro Iwamoto of St. Jude Children's Research Hospital who, along with other Japanese friends who work at St. Jude, were outside Graceland early Friday."If you are at the age of 50 in Japan, more than likely you are an Elvis fan. But many young people like him, too."

Leslie Rubinkowski, author of the book "Impersonating Elvis," said,"The love people have for him begins in the space between the extremes that defined his life. He grew up poor and ended up living in a house with a Jungle Room. He filled another room with gold records, but he loved his mama."

Rubinkowski said the Japanese fascination could be simply that country's fixation with all things American. And Elvis is uniquely American.

Food Smokin' Inside, Gawkers Roast Outside (MEMCOMMAPPEAL)

By Whitney Boyd

Memphis Commercial Appeal, July 1, 2006

It wasn't fine china for President Bush and Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi on their visit Friday to the Rendezvous. They ate their lunch from paper plates and used plastic utensils just like regular customers.

Inside the homey, back-alley restaurant, Bush cleaned his plate of barbecue ribs and washed it down with a Diet Coke. Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, who had the barbecue nachos and water, sat alongside Bush and belted out his favorite Elvis tune, "I Want You, I Need You, I Love You" with The Dempseys.

As smoke steamed from the charcoal grill outside of the alley, patient onlookers stood in the summer heat and crowded along Union and Third. No one knew where or when the president would exit the restaurant, but they hoped for a quick glimpse.

Across the street, Memphis native Mark Logan and wife Darline peeked around a black Secret Service GMC for three hours, just to see the president.

"I've been playing detective all day trying to see this man," Darline Logan said as she wiped sweat from her forehead. "His protection is insane and really hard to get around."

Streets around the restaurant -- Third, Second, Monroe and Union -- were blocked off by more than 50 police officers while Bush and Koizumi enjoyed their meal. Laura Bush, Lisa Marie Presley and Priscilla Presley joined the president, along with 60 other guests.

Decorating the middle of each table were two small flags -- one for America and one for Japan.

Percy Norris, who has worked at the restaurant for 36 years, was the only server to assist Bush and Koizumi. Dressed in his best black bow-tie, white serving uniform, and biggest smile, Norris brought the president all of his dishes -- including the first dessert ever served in the Rendezvous: apple cobbler and ice cream.

"I took a picture with him and everything," Norris said.

After his 45-minute meal, Bush made a quick exit underneath the white tarp connected to the restaurant.

Over on Third Street, Carter Wynn eagerly waited for Bush's exit. He held up a cardboard sign reading, "Don't forget Iraq, an Inconvenient truth," hoping Bush would get his message.

"Let's talk about the real issues, like war," Wynn said. "There is more important things than Graceland and restaurants. The troops need to come home."

Standing next to Wynn, the Logans cheered as the black motorcade drove by and Laura Bush waved from inside. "I don't care about the heat or anything," said Darline Carter. "That's the President of the United States.

Velvet Elvis Diplomacy (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

Memphis

Among the newspaper headlines preserved in Elvis's trophy room in Graceland, hanging next to his size-12 white leather shoes and rhinestone-studded gold lamé suit, is this gem from Aug. 12, 1957: "Rock 'n' Roll Banned, 'Hate Elvis' Drive Launched By Iran To Save Its Youth."

Datelined Tehran, the story began: "Rock 'n' roll has been banned in Iran as a threat to civilization. 'This new canker can very easily destroy the roots of our 6,000 years' civilization,' police said, before launching a 'Hate Elvis' campaign."

Half a century ago, Elvis was considered a wiggly threat to Muslim civilization. But yesterday, the president brought the Japanese prime minister to Elvis's gloriously campy time capsule to thank the fanatical Elvis fan for helping push democracy in the Muslim world.

Junichiro Koizumi seemed to be in an ecstatic trance. Standing near the indoor waterfall in the Jungle Room with Priscilla, Lisa Marie, Laura and George looking on, basking in the avocado glow of a 70's shag rug that covered floor and ceiling, the 64-year-old Japanese leader did Thin Elvis air guitar and Fat Elvis karate chops.

He grabbed the King's outsized tinted gold-rimmed glasses and slipped them on, as the curator who had handled them with white gloves watched in alarm. And he gamely sang heavily accented bits of "Love Me Tender," "Can't Help Falling in Love With You," "Fools Rush In," "I Want You, I Need You, I Love You," and even let loose with "Glory, Glory, Hallelujah" until finally Priscilla Presley called out, "We need a karaoke machine!" He even cast Lisa Marie in the Ann-Margret role in his own fantasy "Viva Las Vegas," pulling her close to croon, "Hold me close, hold me tight."

"It's like a dream," bubbled Mr. Koizumi.

It was hard to remember anyone looking this happy in the gloomy cave of the Bush-Cheney administration, where more time is spent spanking allies than treating them.

Mr. Bush seemed out of his element. It's doubtful that W. had ever seen a round, mirrored, white fake-fur canopy bed before, much less an entire suit made of black faux fur. At one point, the president tried to cut off his overexcited guest from Tokyo, a city that loves its Elvis impersonator bars. But Mr. Koizumi would not be stopped.

Surrounded by monkey ceramics and ersatz cow skulls, W. tried to make a serious point about his road-trip summit, saying the visit was "a way of reminding us about the close friendship between our peoples."

In addition to being a respite from other bad news — getting disciplined by the Supreme Court on Gitmo and getting taunted again by Osama — the Graceland getaway was a triumph in personal diplomacy. That was the specialty of this president's father, who made a career of dragging befuddled world leaders off to baseball games, the Air and Space Museum, and sprints on his boat in Kennebunkport.

Poppy used such jaunts as a lubricant to diplomacy and an inducement to closer, chattier relationships. His less curious, less social son tends to think of personal diplomacy more in terms of rewards and punishments, just another way to give or withhold favors, depending on who is going along with his world view.

Yesterday's pilgrimage may have struck some as too kitschy, given that several youngsters in Memphis have been tragically shot by stray bullets recently. But at least goin' to Graceland was a rare display of expertise in the psychology of diplomacy, an area where this administration has been strangely tone-deaf. W. figured out what the Japanese leader was thinking, what he wanted and what mattered in his culture, and exploited it — unfortunately, waiting until Mr. Koizumi was almost out of office.

Bush officials went out of their way not to do this with Saddam when they failed to consider that he might be hyping his W.M.D. arsenal or toying with U.N. weapons inspectors as a chest-thumping exercise aimed at impressing other Arab leaders. The Bush team also repeatedly squandered chances to talk to the Iranians and the North Koreans, ignoring the ways in which the oddball leaders of those countries might be acting out of insecurity, envy, bluster, one-upsmanship and a desire to be respected — sort of how high school girls might behave if they had nukes.

With his small circle of pals and Iraq war defenders — Mr. Koizumi, Tony Blair and Silvio Berlusconi — drifting off the world stage, and with allies pulling back troops in Iraq, President Bush may soon be as isolated as Elvis was at the end. For the rest of his term and through history, W.'s Heartbreak Hotel is likely to be located in Baghdad.

Waiting For President, Prime Minister At Graceland Hot Work (COMMAPPEAL)

By Cindy Wolff

Memphis Commercial Appeal, July 1, 2006

They stood behind blue ribbon strung between metal barriers and watched their early morning vantage disappear behind six MATA buses and a firetruck.

"No, don't park there, move across the street," 62-year-old Douglas Hill said as a fire pumper rolled right in front of his sight line.

Hill and his wife, Gail, came from Cullman, Ala., about four hours away, to glimpse President Bush and his motorcade.

"We were closer to Jimmy Carter in Tuscumbia at that other thing," Hill told his wife.

The dark-suited, sunglass-wearing, never-grinning Secret Service didn't care if they were the spoilers of the early bird good spot.

They were there to protect the president, and that meant no one across the street from Graceland on Friday morning could get a clear view of the motorcade.

So the people picked up their string of dead-soldier pictures, their "We Support The President" signs, their "Bush Liar" signs, their whale costume and their Elvis outfits and shuffled down the street, actually closer than they were before.

About 250-300 people waited for the 30-second spectacle of the presidential motorcade as it roared down gritty Elvis Presley Boulevard into the gates of Graceland.

The spectators mostly wore shorts and flip-flops and poured bottled water on their heads because the Memphis morning was already hot. They fanned themselves and clustered under patches of shade.

About 10:15, motorcycles rumbled from the north down Elvis Presley like a swarm of hornets. Then came the big vehicles, the black ones zooming down the middle of the street. Even the hardcore protestors waved at the tinted windows.

Next were the dark sports utility vehicles, windows down, big guns poised.

"Whoa, did you see that?" one of the protestors said. "Was that an AK47?"

For the moment, commerce stopped at the souvenir stores. No one bought a pair of Elvis flip-flops for $14.99 or a throw blanket for $75. They ignored the oven mitt printed with the recipe for a peanut butter and banana sandwich.

Then they waited for nearly an hour for the tour of Graceland to finish.

Four protestors dressed in white, sequined, older-Elvis jumpsuits politely smiled for people who wanted to have their pictures taken with them.

They sang a version of "Don't Be Cruel" to protest Japan's whaling industry:

You know I won't be found,

Swimming in the deep blue sea,

The Japanese are coming 'round

They're going to harpoon me

Don't be cruel, to a whale that's true ...

Meanwhile, Andrea Barrach and her 11-year-old son, Daniel, slurped on cotton-candy flavored ice under a pavilion.

Carl Rising-Moore from Crawford, Texas, who carried a flag of slain soldier Casey Sheehan, son of Cindy Sheehan, became the unofficial protest leader because he had the megaphone.

Someone gave him a list of things to chant, but mostly he'd just wing it, leaving a few quiet seconds while he came up with something else to shout.

"Drop Bush, not bombs."

DOJ_NMG_0037819

"Iraq for Iraqis."

Even "Liar, liar, pants on fire."

He was especially proud of the "Hey, hey, ho, ho, shotgun Cheney's got to go" chant he created at an earlier protest.

"I don't think the city needs that type of thing, not today," said Jerry Robbins, 68, who wore a suit and tie to the event.

A few feet away, dressed in fatigues and a black beret, former Army specialist Allison DeVante of Memphis quietly held her sign, "Stop rape of military women in Iraq."

She said she was raped in 2002 by the officer in charge and it took two years for the military to investigate. She left the Army and they never told her what became of her rapist.

Nearby, three 18-year-old girls sang "God Bless America" quietly. They made signs supporting Bush because they didn't want him to see only protest signs. When he arrived, they chanted "USA! USA!"

The protesters stopped their "Hey, hey, ho, ho" and joined in.

For just a moment, their voices were united.

Koizumi Has Left The Building (WP)

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

It's well known that the current Japanese prime minister is a fan of -- and shares a birthday (Jan. 8) with -- Elvis Presley. But Junichiro Koizumi, as it turns out, has even more in common with the King. From news accounts, we learn the following eerie similarities:

? Elvis was a reclusive guy with a very public life. Koizumi is a reclusive guy with a very public life.

? Elvis wore his hair long and over his ears. Koizumi wears his hair long and over his ears.

? When Koizumi was in his thirties, he married a 21-year-old. When Elvis was in his thirties he married a 21-year-old. Both marriages ended in divorce.

? Koizumi has been known to do away with the Japanese Diet. Elvis did away with all diets.

Poll: Good News Fails To Boost Bush's Job Approval (TIME)

By Lisa Takeuchi Cullen

Time, July 1, 2006

In a new TIME survey, Americans say the President is performing poorly and that the country is increasingly on the wrong track

A spate of good news at home and abroad has so far failed to boost how Americans feel about President Bush's job performance. Bush's approval rating slipped to 35% in a TIME poll taken this week, down from 37% in March (and 53% in early 2005). Only 33% of Americans in the survey said they approved of Bush's handling of the situation in Iraq, vs. 35% in March, and 47% in March 2005. His management of the U.S. economy lost supporters, too, as 36% approved, compared with 39% three months earlier. Bush's handling of the war on terror saw a slight gain in support, from 44% to 45%.

Bush's poll numbers remain stuck in a rut despite several high-profile victories scored recently by the Bush Administration. Earlier this month, U.S. forces killed al-Qaeda leader Abu Mousab al-Zarqawi in an air raid in Iraq. Also this month, Karl Rove escaped indictment in the CIA leak investigation. And the Commerce Department reported today that the U.S. economy grew 5.6% in the first quarter of 2006, the fastest growth in more than two years.

But continued pessimism about the situation in Iraq and a broad sense of unease about America's direction may be undermining Bush's popularity. In the TIME survey, 66% said the country is on the wrong track, vs. 28% who said it's going in the right direction. Those numbers have worsened since March, when the poll recorded a 60% to 34% split. When asked whether the new Iraqi government will be able to build a stable and reasonably democratic society, 48% of those surveyed said no, while 39% remain optimistic.

Congress isn't faring much better.

Americans have grown more critical of the job Congress is doing, compared with three months ago. Only 31% approved, down sharply from 39% in March. Asked whether they would be more likely to vote for the Republican or Democratic candidate in the district where they live if the election were held today, 47% said Democrat and 35% said Republican, a two-point improvement for Democrats.

The TIME survey was conducted among 1,003 adult Americans on June 27-29.

Will The Berkeley Impeachment Resolution Catch On? (TIME)

By Laura A. Locke, Berkeley

Time, July 1, 2006

The former hotbed of campus activism wants to oust the President and Vice President. Pointless political gesture, or the sign of a trend?

Many people may scoff at the decision earlier this week by the Berkeley City Council to put a resolution on the Nov. 7 ballot calling for President Bush and Vice President Cheney to be impeached. After all, 74,000 voters of what is often referred to as The People's Republic of Berkeley can't legally oust the President and Vice President. But Berkeley Mayor Tom Bates thinks his city is simply ahead of its time, as it has often proved to be in the past.

"Things happen in Berkeley that are seen as being quirky," Bates tells TIME. "But what we know is, those ideas that percolate in Berkeley today end up being conventional wisdom in the rest of the country tomorrow." Berkeley, after all, was the first city to start curbside recycling, ban Styrofoam and desegregate its public schools without a court order. Berkeley also took the lead in calling for municipalities to divest from South Africa during the Apartheid era.

Indeed, while Berkeley may be the first city to put an impeachment resolution to its people, numerous city and town councils have already passed such resolutions, including San Francisco, Santa Cruz, and Chapel Hill, N.C. State legislatures in Vermont, California and Illinois all have impeachment resolutions pending. To help raise awareness of the issue, there will be a series of teach-ins across the country this summer and fall, and a new film, "How to Impeach a President," will be screened — all part of the burgeoning impeachment effort called "Constitution Summer," led by a non-partisan coalition of students from the country's top law schools and universities.

"The President and Vice President are trampling on the Constitution," Bates says, summing up the city's collective view of the current Administration. "They're spying on people without warrants. They're arresting people and holding them without the opportunity to a trial. They're participating in a war where they basically lied to the Congress."

Some observers, however, question whether $10,000 of taxpayer money should be spent on a purely symbolic gesture that often is nothing more than a way for local elected officials to curry favor with voters. "City officials in California have a history of taking positions on national issues that have nothing to do with the day-to-day operations of the local government," says Mark Baldassare, director of research at the Public Policy Institute, a non-partisan think tank.

Eugene Volokh, a UCLA constitutional law professor and popular legal blogger, dismisses Berkeley's move as a "man bites dog story." Berkeley's new ballot measure and the grassroots movement to impeach Bush is just a way for the far left to express its "visceral anger," he says; unlike previous calls for presidential impeachment, which involved "clear criminal violations," the call by Berkeley and other cities to impeach Bush is about opposition to "judgment calls dealing about very, very serious national security problems." But as a veteran of the sharply divided blogosphere, Volokh should know better than most that criminality is in the eye of the beholder — and Berkeley's exercise in urban overreaching could well have nationwide resonance.

Bush Appoints Bernanke Ally To Opening On The Fed's Board (WSJ)

By Henry J. Pulizzi

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush Friday nominated Columbia University Professor Frederic S. Mishkin to be a member of the Federal Reserve's Board of Governors, adding another expert on inflation targeting to the central bank's leadership.

If confirmed by the Senate, Mr. Mishkin will fill the seat vacated by Roger Ferguson, who resigned in April, and serve the remainder of a 14-year term expiring in January 2014.

Mr. Mishkin, currently the Alfred Lerner Professor of Banking and Financial Institutions at Columbia University's Graduate School of Business, has a well-established relationship with Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke. In 1999, the two men, along with two others, wrote a book on inflation targeting. That is likely to heighten speculation that the central bank may eventually embrace the strategy. Inflation targeting involves setting an explicit, numerical target for the inflation rate that the central bank tries to achieve.

"We like to joke that Ben Bernanke wrote the book on inflation targeting, but actually he co-wrote it with Frederic Mishkin," said Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. economist John Shin. Mr. Bernanke has supported an explicit inflation objective, an idea that former Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan feared would limit the central bank's flexibility.

"It seems the White House favors the strategy, because the balance of power is shifting that way on the [Federal Open Market Committee], with perhaps a majority of Fed members favoring the strategy," Tony Crescenzi, chief bond-market strategist at Miller Tabak, said in a note to clients.

The White House has another vacancy to fill on the Fed board. Fed Governor Mark Olson resigned, effective Friday, to become chairman of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board.

Bernanke Ally Named For Seat On Fed Board (WP)

By Neil Irwin

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

Frederic Mishkin Supports 'Inflation Targeting'

President Bush yesterday nominated Frederic S. Mishkin, a leading proponent of the idea that central bankers should set explicit targets for controlling inflation, to the Federal Reserve Board of Governors.

Mishkin, an economist who headed the research department at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York in the 1990s, is a professor at Columbia University's business school. The appointment is subject to Senate confirmation.

Combined with the appointment of Ben S. Bernanke to chair the Fed this year, the nomination adds momentum to the cause of "inflation targeting," which would be a departure from the Fed's traditional, improvisational approach to setting monetary policy. Bernanke and Mishkin, with two co-authors, wrote the book on the practice ("Inflation Targeting," published in 1998 by Princeton University Press.)

"It's a good appointment," said Richard Yamarone, chief economist of Argus Research Corp. "He brings more knowledge of monetary policy and monetary economics to the table than anyone at the Fed. Bernanke is getting a big ally on inflation targeting."

By tradition, leaders of the nation's central bank analyze inflation and other risks to the economy and set interest rates at levels they think would best balance economic growth and low inflation. Members of the Federal Open Market Committee, the bank's policymaking body, have ideas of what inflation level is acceptable (some have spoken recently that price increases are getting worrisome), but every decision to change interest rates is based on the subjective view of Fed governors.

In the approach Mishkin and Bernanke have supported, the central bank would set a level of inflation it deems acceptable; deviations from that level would trigger predictable changes in interest rates.

Mishkin has argued that would make policy decisions plainer to the public and financial markets. Critics of the approach say policymakers need wide flexibility in setting monetary policy given the complicated set of risks the economy faces.

R. Glenn Hubbard, Bush's former economic adviser, is a longtime friend of Mishkin's and his boss as dean of the Columbia business school. He played down the likelihood that Mishkin's appointment will contribute to a change in how the Fed works.

"I don't think this necessarily means there's a greater bias toward talking about inflation targeting," Hubbard said in a telephone interview yesterday. "I think that there will be a general discussion. There's some disagreement on the board. That's an intellectual discussion, and Rick will contribute to that discussion."

Hubbard said Mishkin's style will be good for the Fed. "He delivers both praise and criticism with a great deal of wit and will contribute mightily to the discussion," Hubbard said. "I think he will add to a climate of consensus-building and persuasion."

Mishkin, if confirmed, would fill a seat vacated by Roger W. Ferguson Jr., a Fed governor who resigned in April. The term expires in 2014. Bush has another slot on the board to fill after Mark W. Olson left the Fed yesterday.

Wall Street Shook Often In Volatile 2nd Quarter (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters

DOJ_NMG_0037822

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

No Consensus in Analyst Opinions for Coming Months

NEW YORK, June 30 -- Volatility ruled the stock markets in the quarter that ended Friday, and analysts agreed investors should be prepared for continued turbulence.

After streaking to five- and six-year highs in early May, all major U.S. stock market indexes and most foreign stocks plunged sharply in late May and June. The culprits: concern that inflation may be picking up, 60 central banks around the world raising interest rates, and worries that the U.S. and global economies may be slowing.

"It was like the tale of two markets. The beginning of the second quarter felt like the continuation of the best of times. Then suddenly the revolution broke out, and things haven't been so good since," said Jack Caffrey, equity strategist for J.P. Morgan Private Bank.

As a result, the markets experienced what analysts are terming "risk readjustment" on a global scale as many investors fled such speculative investments as commodities, emerging markets and small company stocks, and put increasing amounts of money into safer bets, including bank accounts, blue-chip stocks and U.S. Treasury bonds.

The markets "recognized that the world is a more uncertain place than they thought it was in the first quarter," said Jerry Webman, chief economist for OppenheimerFunds Inc. "That meant asset prices had to go down."

The major U.S. market indexes -- the Dow Jones industrial average, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index and the Nasdaq composite -- each fell between 7 percent and 11 percent between May 8 and mid-June before recovering slightly at the end of the quarter. Two of three -- but not the Nasdaq -- are now up for the year. The Dow is up 4.04 percent, while the S&P 500 is up 1.51 percent.

The MSCI emerging markets index, which measures stock markets in the developing world, fell even further, dropping nearly 20 percent from its May 8 peak.

The second quarter also stood out for its frequent shifts. In some weeks, U.S. markets seemed to change direction almost daily based on the latest economic data or a fresh comment from the Federal Reserve's new chairman, Ben S. Bernanke. According to one commonly used measure, volatility almost doubled in the quarter and is now at a five-year high.

The change was all the more startling because it followed a three-year bull market that was distinguished by historically low volatility, but most analysts believe that investors should expect more ups and downs.

"The mood changes very quickly and often goes to extremes on Wall Street," said Alan Skrainka, chief market strategist for the brokerage firm Edward Jones. "The stock market is always a roller coaster."

U.S. analysts disagree sharply about what the next six months will bring, although most expect the Federal Reserve to raise interest rates at least one more time, to 5.5 percent. Some predict even further tightening if the Fed continues to detect signs of inflation.

Morgan Stanley's Global Wealth Management Group is predicting that the S&P 500 will end the year at 1400, which would require nearly a 10 percent rise in the second half. This could happen if there were strong corporate earnings and labor costs and inflation remain under control, said David Darst, chief investment strategist.

Charles Schwab & Co. sees storm clouds on the horizon, and is encouraging investors to go heavy on cash and reduce investment in equities. "We are not all that optimistic. I don't think this is over yet," said Liz Ann Sonders, Schwab's chief investment strategist. "The economy is in a bit of trouble."

Jeffrey Kleintop, chief investment strategist for PNC Advisors, split the difference and predicted a lackluster summer followed by a strong fall. "We need to get used to volatility again," he said. "Look at those pullbacks as an opportunity to get fully invested, but you don't have to do it right away."

No matter where they predict the overall market is headed, the analysts agreed that a seismic shift is underway. Small-company and emerging-market stocks have had a fantastic three-year run that is probably slowing down. Most analysts now expect large companies with strong balance sheets and stable earnings to have their day.

"In my view, we had come too far too fast" in the riskier asset classes, said Dennis Shea, chief investment officer for equities at Morgan Stanley Investment Management. "We're seeing a shift back to value, big caps and pretty steady dividend payers."

According to Standard & Poor's, large companies classified as "value" stocks -- because they are relatively cheap and not expected to grow quickly -- lost about 3 percent of their value in the second quarter compared with a 4 percent loss for the S&P 500 overall and a 5.5 percent loss for growth stocks. Stocks in companies dependent on discretionary consumer spending, such as home builders and consumer electronics makers, were among the quarter's biggest losers.

Going forward, several market analysts recommended sectors that tend to do well even in times of slowing growth, such as consumer staples and health care, as well as a few sectors that look cheap because they have already taken heavy losses, such as technology.

Most agreed that small investors should stay out of commodities and emerging-markets stocks at least for a while because they will probably fall further before they recover. "We would not be shocked if there was a bit more profit-taking," Caffrey said.

Bloomberg, July 1, 2006

June 30 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. stocks trimmed the biggest weekly advance since January as technology companies widened their examination of stock-option grants, hurting their shares.

Apple Computer Inc. and Computer Sciences Corp. led the retreat as they started investigations. General Motors Corp. rose, helping limit the market's loss, after Kirk Kerkorian's Tracinda Corp. urged the automaker to partner with Nissan Motor Co. and Renault SA.

The market rebounded this week from three weeks of losses as Federal Reserve policy makers, who raised interest rates for the 17th straight time, said in a statement that the economy is ``moderating from its quite strong pace" earlier in the year.

``The market likes certainty, and that's what you're getting right now with the Fed softening their position," said Dan Whitney, a senior trader at Fifth Third Asset Management in Cincinnati, which manages $21.5 billion.

The Standard & Poor's 500 Index climbed 2.1 percent this week, the largest weekly advance since the period ended Jan. 6. Today, the index slipped 2.67, or 0.2 percent, to 1270.20.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average today fell 40.58, or 0.4 percent, to 11,150.22. It rose 1.5 percent this week.

The Nasdaq Composite Index slipped 2.29, or 0.1 percent, to 2172.09, trimming its weekly gain to 2.4 percent.

Stocks were held back today by reports that showed conflicting signals on inflation. The Fed said that it would make future decisions on rates based on economic data.

The market drifted before a four-day weekend for many investors. U.S. markets will close three hours early on July 3 and shut down the next day in observance of Independence Day.

Russell Rebalancing

Trading surged as the Russell Investment Group conducted its annual rebalancing of its benchmark U.S. indexes. Funds with $3.8 trillion in assets use the indexes to measure performance, according to Russell, based in Tacoma, Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0037824

This week's rally trimmed the S&P 500 loss for the second quarter to 1.9 percent. The decline was the index's first since the period ended in March 2005. The Dow average added 0.4 percent since March 31 for its fourth straight quarterly advance. The Nasdaq Composite slid 7.2 percent, its biggest drop since the first quarter of 2005.

The S&P 500 posted its biggest rally since October 2003 yesterday after central bank policy makers said in a statement that the economy is ``moderating from its quite strong pace earlier this year."

Technology Slide

A group of computer-related stocks slid 1 percent for the worst performance among 10 groups in the S&P 500. At least 60 companies have disclosed investigations into options grants, including Apple, which slid $1.70 to $57.27 after starting an internal investigation into stock option grants made between 1997 and 2001.

One grant being reviewed was made to Chief Executive Officer Steve Jobs. The grant to Jobs was canceled and didn't result in a financial gain, Apple said. Backdating options to coincide with a low stock price creates a built-in profit for executives who receive them.

Computer Sciences, a defense contractor that specializes in information systems, plunged $7.32, or 13 percent, to $48.56 for the biggest decline in the S&P 500. The company said it received an informal inquiry from the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission related to option grants, and also said it wouldn't put itself up for sale.

CA Inc. slipped 22 cents to $20.55. The world's No. 2 seller of mainframe computer software delayed its annual report to review stock-option grants and said it may restate results going back to 1997.

GM

GM surged $2.35, or 8.6 percent, to $29.79 for the biggest rise in the Dow average today. Kerkorian's Tracinda, which holds 56 million GM shares, said in a letter to GM Chief Executive Officer Rick Wagoner that a partnership with Nissan and Renault would ``strengthen the competitive positions of all three companies." Renault owns a 44 percent stake in Nissan.

GM said it would consider the proposal, and Nissan and Renault said they were open to expanding their alliance if GM's board approves.

Ford Motor Co., the second-largest U.S. automaker, climbed 53 cents to $6.93.

`Economic Numbers'

A report today showed that the Fed's preferred inflation measure, a price gauge tied to consumer spending, matched economists' average forecast for May. A private survey of manufacturers in the Chicago area showed prices paid for raw materials surged to the highest since 1988.

Today's consumer spending report showed prices excluding food and fuel rose 0.2 percent last month and consumer spending added 0.4 percent. Both figures matched the average estimate of economists in a Bloomberg News survey. The increase in spending was the smallest in three months.

The National Association of Purchasing Management-Chicago said its index of prices paid for raw materials rose to 89 in June from 76.9.

``We have to take the Fed at its word that it is indeed keeping its eye on new economic numbers as they come in," said Bryant Evans, who helps manage $450 million at Cozad Asset Management in Champaign, Illinois. ``We certainly don't know for sure" that the Fed is pausing.

The final reading for the University of Michigan's June index of consumer sentiment showed the first increase in three months, to 84.9 from 79.1 in May. Economists expected a reading of 82.5, according to a Bloomberg survey.

About 11 stocks advanced for every six that declined on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 2.38 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, about 38 percent more than the three-month daily average.

EMC

EMC Corp. slid 28 cents to $10.97. The company will pay $28 a share for RSA Security Inc., a maker of identity tokens and software. That's 22 percent more than yesterday's closing price and 45 percent more than the close the day before. RSA is an ``overpriced acquisition," First Albany analyst Hugh Mai wrote in note to clients. Shares of RSA climbed $4.22 to $27.10.

DOJ_NMG_0037825

Research In Motion Ltd., a Palm competitor which makes the BlackBerry e-mail device, climbed $3.79 to $69.77 after forecasting second-quarter earnings, excluding stock-options costs, will be 69 cents to 75 cents a share. The projection compares with an estimate of 69 cents from Bear Stearns Cos. analyst Andrew Neff.

Commodities Gain

A gauge of raw-material producers climbed 0.5 percent today, extending its weekly advance to 3.5 percent, the second-biggest among 10 industry groups. The Fed's comments yesterday eased concern that higher interest rates would crimp demand for commodities.

Alcoa Inc., the world's biggest aluminum maker, added 46 cents to $32.36. Newmont Mining Corp., the world's second-largest gold producer, gained 74 cents to $52.93.

Copper prices jumped 6.5 percent this week in New York, ending a one-month slide, on indications demand won't slump in the U.S. gold futures for August delivery rose 4.6 percent, the most since Sept. 14, 2001.

Fed Raises Rates, But Scales Back Talk Of Inflation (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 29 — The Federal Reserve raised interest rates for the 17th consecutive time on Thursday, but kicked off a powerful celebration in the stock market by lowering its alarms about inflation.

As expected, the central bank raised its crucial lending rate another quarter-point, to 5.25 percent, and left itself room to raise it again before stopping. But for the first time since it began lifting rates two years ago, the Fed stopped short of signaling that further interest rate increases were all but certain.

In what traders described as a huge "relief rally," the Dow Jones industrial average surged 217 points, or 2 percent, in its biggest one-day jump in three years. Other stock and bond market indicators also rose, as interest rates on long-term bonds edged down. The dollar fell against major currencies, with foreign investors reducing their calibrations for interest rates in the United States.

The turnaround on Wall Street was the latest example of heightened volatility in financial markets and heightened uncertainty about Fed policy under its rookie chairman, Ben S. Bernanke.

Investors are looking for signs that Mr. Bernanke, like the veteran Alan Greenspan who preceded him at the Fed, can manage a tricky transition, achieving a "soft landing" from a period of strong economic growth and rising inflation to an era when underlying inflation slows without throwing the economy into a tailspin.

"The central bank is caught in the middle," said Allen Sinai, chief economist at Decision Economics. The Fed is trying to maintain "a cautious tiptoeing between a moderating economy and elevated core inflation."

The Fed has stumbled along the way, said Robert J. Barbera, chief economist at Hoenig, the research unit of the investment bank ITG, but Mr. Bernanke now appears to have regained his balance.

"This gets him back to Square 1," Mr. Barbera said. "What it takes away is the notion that they're hellbent to squeeze the economy because of an obvious inflation problem. That's not a fair characterization of the economy, and it's not a sensible Fed response."

In late April, Mr. Bernanke rattled bond markets with statements that struck many as being too soft about a general rise in prices, excluding food and energy, known as "core" inflation. Over the last month, Mr. Bernanke and other Fed officials sent markets tumbling as they sought to signal tougher action.

Describing recent price trends as "unwelcome," "unacceptable" and "a warning flag," Fed officials prompted some investors to speculate that the overnight interest rates the Fed uses as its guidepost might climb as high as 6 percent.

In its statement on Thursday, the Fed adopted a more nuanced view. It said that recent price trends had been "elevated" and that "inflation pressures remain." But it also acknowledged that growth appeared to be slowing, which in turn should ease inflation.

"Recent indicators suggest that economic growth is moderating from its quite strong pace," the Fed's policy-making committee said. It said the slowing growth stemmed from a "gradual cooling" of the housing market, the lagged effects of previous interest rate increases and higher energy prices.

What galvanized investors was a change in the Fed's language suggesting that additional rate increases may no longer be needed. Instead, it spoke hypothetically about what it would do if increases were still necessary.

"The extent and timing of any additional firming that may be needed to address risks will depend on the evolution of the outlook for inflation and economic growth," the central bank said. In May, by contrast, it flatly declared that "some additional firming may be necessary."

Mr. Bernanke and his colleagues left themselves ample wiggle room to raise rates at their next policy meeting in August. But their tone was less urgent. Instead of warning that inflation posed a powerful threat, they suggested that the job of preventing inflation from accelerating may not be quite finished.

"People were expecting something very consistent with the hawkish rhetoric we had heard earlier," said Richard Berner, a senior economist at Morgan Stanley. The markets "were pricing in a more hawkish statement."

Inflation has crept up in the last six months, in part because of the spike in energy prices but also because of increases in housing prices.

The Fed's preferred measure of underlying price trends is core inflation, excluding the volatile prices for food and energy, as calculated in the government's estimates of the gross domestic product. By that measure, prices have climbed about 2.4 percent over the last 12 months.

Mr. Bernanke, an advocate of setting explicit inflation targets, has said he would like to keep inflation at 1 to 2 percent a year.

At the same time, the economy seems to have slowed significantly from the torrid growth rate during the first three months of this year.

On Thursday, the government released its final estimate of growth in the first quarter, elevating growth from an annual pace of 5.3 percent to 5.6 percent, far above the pace that most economists consider sustainable without rising inflation.

But many forecasters contend that growth has slowed to something closer to 3 percent in the second quarter and will remain near that level for the rest of the year.

Job creation has slowed sharply in the last three months, to an average of about 125,000 jobs a month from an average of over 160,000 during 2005, and sank to only 75,000 additional jobs in May.

Though housing starts have bumped up and down in recent months, inventories of unsold homes have swelled and sales prices are climbing far more slowly. Construction employment fell sharply last month, and there are signs that consumer spending has slowed as a result of high gasoline prices and fewer cash-out home refinancings.

By some measures, short-term interest rates are back in line with historical norms after being cut to extraordinary lows from 2001 to 2004. At 5.25 percent, the federal funds rate on overnight loans between banks is almost 3 percentage points above the central bank's preferred measure of core inflation. Two years ago, it was only 1 percent and below the core inflation rate.

Richard Yamarone, chief economist at Argus Research, said the fed funds rate has on average been about 2.33 percentage points higher than core inflation since 1987.

But Fed officials face multiple quandaries. On the one hand, inflation is still slightly above Mr. Bernanke's "comfort zone" and many Fed officials are convinced that it would be far more difficult to combat higher inflation expectations than it would be to correct a slowdown if they push interest rates too high.

But some analysts predict that the combination of higher energy prices and higher interest rates has already set the stage for a slowdown that could be deeper than the soft landing that policy makers are seeking.

David Rosenberg, chief economist at Merrill Lynch, recently estimated that the chances of a recession later this year were about 40 percent. Most analysts are far more sanguine, though many predict that the growth will slow and unemployment will edge up from its currently low level of 4.7 percent.

In a sign that Fed policy is beginning to pinch, the National Association of Manufacturers pleaded for the central bank to stop raising rates.

"Evidence of a slowing economy is widespread," said David Huether, the trade association's chief economist. "With manufacturing already facing higher costs at home compared to our major competitors abroad, today's news of higher interest rates will only further burden U.S. industry."

The uncertainties mean that the opportunities for a mistake on policy are higher than they have been for several years.

"Last year a monkey could have run monetary policy," said Ethan Harris, chief United States economist at Lehman Brothers. "What did you have to do? You just had to push the 25 basis points button. Now, just in time for Bernanke to take over, the serious decisions have to be made. How much do you put the brakes on?"

U.S. Economy: Spending Rises, Inflation Is Unchanged (BLOOM)

By Carlos Torres

Bloomberg, June 30, 2006

June 30 (Bloomberg) -- Consumer spending in the U.S. rose in May by the least in three months, and a measure of inflation watched by the Federal Reserve was unchanged, a day after policy makers hinted at a pause in their interest-rate increases.

Spending increased 0.4 percent after a gain of 0.7 percent in April, the Commerce Department said today in Washington. The personal consumption expenditure deflator, excluding food and energy, rose 2.1 percent from a year ago, the same pace as the previous month.

The absence of a pick-up in inflation pushed the dollar lower and spurred a rebound in Treasury notes. While the price gauge is still above Chairman Ben S. Bernanke's preferred range, the fact that it didn't accelerate reassured investors that inflation isn't spinning out of control.

``Given what the Fed said in their fairly dovish statement, they would have lost all credibility if they were wrong," said Gerald Lucas, chief Treasury strategist at Banc of America Securities LLC in New York. ``If the data was bad today, the market would have found it hard to forgive the Fed."

Banc of America still expects the Fed, which nudged its benchmark rate up a quarter-point yesterday to 5.25 percent, will lift its rate to 5.75 percent by year-end.

Today's report also showed incomes rose 0.4 percent, more than expected, after a 0.7 percent increase that was larger than the government reported last month. The May rise reflected a jump in proprietors' income, while wages were unchanged.

Americans were also more optimistic in June as gasoline prices declined, the University of Michigan reported today, the first increase in confidence in three months. The university's final index of consumer sentiment climbed to 84.9 from 79.1 in May. A separate index of inflation expectations retreated.

`Lot More Data'

The price gauge tied to spending patterns and excluding food and energy costs, the personal consumption expenditure core deflator, rose 0.2 percent in May for a second month.

``These numbers are in line with expectations, lending evidence to the argument that the Fed should pause now," said Gina Martin, an economist at Wachovia Corp. in Charlotte, North Carolina. ``That said, there are a lot more data between now and the Fed's August decision."

After today's report, traders saw a 59 percent chance of a quarter-point rate increase in August, based on the price of futures tied to the fed funds rate on the Chicago Board of Trade. That compares with 65 percent after yesterday's Fed statement and 83 percent two days ago.

Bernanke's Emphasis

Earlier this month, Bernanke highlighted the three- and six-month trends in core inflation and called them ``unwelcome developments."

DOJ_NMG_0037828

The core rate was up at an annual rate of 2.9 percent over the last three months, matching the year-over-year rise in April 2004 as the biggest in a decade, according to Bloomberg News calculations. Bernanke is among policy makers who have said a rate of 1 percent to 2 percent is acceptable.

Raw-material prices are still a concern among businesses in the Chicago region, a report today from the National Association of Purchasing Management-Chicago showed. A reading of prices paid by companies rose to 89, the highest since 1988.

The U.S. savings rate fell to minus 1.7 percent, from minus 1.6 percent in April. A negative rate suggests consumers are dipping into savings to maintain spending.

Economists forecast spending would rise 0.4 percent, after a previously reported 0.6 percent April increase, according to the median of 68 estimates in a Bloomberg News survey. Incomes were forecast to rise 0.2 percent.

Disposable Income

Disposable income, or the money left over after taxes, increased 0.3 percent following a 0.6 percent rise the previous month and were up 4.7 percent in the last 12 months.

Taking into account changes in prices, spending rose 0.1 percent last month after a 0.2 percent rise in April.

Inflation-adjusted spending on durable goods, such as autos, furniture, and other long-lasting items, fell 0.6 percent after rising 0.3 percent. Purchases of non-durable goods dropped 0.1 percent after rising 0.4 percent. Spending on services, which account for almost 60 percent of all outlays, increased 0.3 percent after rising 0.1 percent.

Near-record gasoline prices and higher interest rates have sapped Americans' buying power this quarter. A gallon of regular gasoline at the pump cost an average $2.84 this quarter, compared with $2.34 in the first three months of the year, according to figures from the American Automobile Association.

The average rate on a 30-year fixed-rate mortgage this week rose to 6.78 percent, the highest since May 2002, according to Freddie Mac, the second-biggest buyer of U.S. mortgages.

Process of Cooling

The Fed yesterday acknowledged the economy was in the process of moderating as housing cools and interest rates and energy prices rise. The slowing of growth ``should help to limit inflation pressures over time," the central bankers said in announcing the rate increase. That may give then an opportunity to stop increasing rates, said Joseph LaVorgna, chief U.S. fixed income economist at Deutsche Bank Securities in New York.

``Policy makers gave themselves some wiggle room by not committing to another move in August," when they next meet, LaVorgna said in a report to clients yesterday.

Consumer spending last quarter rose at an annual rate of 5.1 percent, the most in more than two years, according to revised Commerce Department figures issued yesterday.

The spending gain will be cut by about half this quarter, to 2.5 percent, as Americans respond to higher gasoline prices by buying fewer automobiles and by scrimping on non-essentials like vacations, meals at restaurants and the latest fashions, according to the median estimate of economists surveyed earlier this month. Spending rose at an average 3.8 percent pace a quarter in the last decade.

Energy Costs

``As fuel prices have ticked up this year, there is some sense that there is a little bit of softness in the retail category," David Brandon, chief executive officer of Domino's Pizza Inc., the second-largest U.S. pizza chain, said in a June 19 interview. ``The consumer is probably a little bit more conservative today than they were a year ago."

Part of the reason the economy will not buckle as spending slows is that consumer confidence is stabilizing as the price of gasoline plateaus, economists said. The Conference Board's confidence index rose to 105.7 in June from May's three-month low of 104.7, the New York research group said this week.

``If energy costs remain stable, the growth rate of consumer spending should pick up," said Stephen Stanley, chief economist at RBS Greenwich Capital in Greenwich, Connecticut, before the report.

Consumer Spending Slowed In May (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

Filed at 7:50 p.m. ET

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Consumer spending slowed sharply in May as rising gasoline prices left Americans with less cash for other items, the government reported Friday.

The Commerce Department said that spending rose by just 0.4 percent last month after a 0.7 percent gain in April. Income growth also slowed to an advance of just 0.4 percent last month, reflecting weaker job growth.

The report on personal incomes and consumer spending provided further evidence that the economy slowed sharply in the spring as Americans were battered by rising gasoline prices, higher interest rates and a cooling housing market.

In a second report, the University of Michigan said that its index of consumer sentiment rebounded a bit in June, rising to 84.9. While that was up from 79.1 in May, it still was well below the reading of 96.0 in June 2005.

The government reported Thursday that the overall economy raced ahead at an annual rate of 5.6 percent in the January-March quarter, the fastest pace in 2 1/2 years. Analysts believe growth has slowed to just half that amount in the current April-June quarter reflecting a sharp slowdown in consumer spending, which accounts for two-thirds of total economic activity.

Inflation, as measured by a price gauge tied to consumer spending, rose by 0.4 percent in May and was up 0.2 percent when energy and food prices are excluded. This measure of core inflation is up 2.1 percent when compared to May 2005, slightly above the Fed's upper bounds for core inflation of 2 percent.

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke sent stocks plunging in early June when he cited an increase in core inflation as an "unwelcome" development, raising worries that the Fed was going to increase interest rates several more times to fight inflation.

The Fed did boost its federal funds rate on Thursday for a 17th time to 5.25 percent. Wall Street posted the biggest one-day gain in three years on the wording of the Fed statement, which indicated that future rate increases would be dependent on incoming data.

Stocks ended a turbulent quarter with a moderate decline on Friday with the Dow Jones industrial average falling 40.58 points to close at 11,150.22, one day after posting a 215-point gain.

Many analysts said the new inflation figure in Friday's spending report increased the odds that the Fed will increase rates at least one more time at the next meeting on Aug. 8.

"We are not going back to the bad old days with regard to inflation, but it has crept up and the Fed needs to keep a lid on inflation expectations," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at Global Insight, a private forecasting firm.

The 0.4 percent increase in consumer spending in May, which was in line with Wall Street expectations, was the slowest increase in three months. Excluding price increases, spending was up an even weaker 0.1 percent in May, down from a 0.2 percent rise in inflation-adjusted spending in April.

The difference in the actual spending and inflation-adjusted spending reflected the fact that consumers were having to pay more to fill up their gas tanks. Gasoline prices hit a high for this year of $2.95 per gallon in early May, according to the Lundberg Survey.

The 0.4 percent rise in incomes was down sharply from a 0.7 percent April gain, reflecting the fact that payroll growth slowed to just 75,000 new jobs in May, another sign that the economy is shifting to a lower gear.

After paying taxes, Americans saw their incomes go up by 0.3 percent, half of the 0.6 percent April gain. After adjusting for inflation, after-tax incomes did not rise at all in May, the third month of weakness in this area.

Americans' personal savings rate, the amount of saving left from disposable income, dipped to a negative 1.7 percent in May, down from a negative 1.6 percent in April. The savings rate has been negative for 12 consecutive months, meaning that Americans are dipping into savings or borrowing more to finance a spending level that is exceeding their after-tax incomes.

Shuttle Launch Carries Calculated Risk, NASA Chief Says (WP)

By Mike Schneider

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla., June 30 -- NASA chief Michael D. Griffin is taking a calculated gamble by going ahead with the launch of Discovery, overruling two top managers who fear that foam flying off the fuel tank might harm the space shuttle.

The world will soon know if his gamble pays off.

Discovery was set to blast off from Kennedy Space Center at 3:49 p.m. Saturday, the first launch of a space shuttle in almost a year and only the second since the Columbia disaster in 2003. Storm clouds forecast for the afternoon remained the chief obstacle to launch. The shuttle faced no technical problems a day before launch.

"The vehicle is remarkably clean, certainly as clean as I've ever seen it," Griffin said Friday.

The seven astronauts said they are confident of his decision to go ahead, but hardly any astronaut ever publicly expresses fears before a launch.

"I believe we'll be as safe as we were on my other flights," said Steven W. Lindsey, Discovery's commander, who has flown on three previous shuttle missions. "I haven't really seen a decision made that I didn't agree with."

Faced with a 2010 deadline to finish building the international space station and end the shuttle program, Griffin wants to get the shuttles flying again and believes that a delay now would create schedule pressure toward the end of the decade.

He has acknowledged, though, that he would probably shut down the shuttle program if another vehicle is lost.

"We are playing the odds," Griffin said Friday. "What you pay us for as taxpayers is to understand those odds in great detail . . . . It's called risk management."

The board that investigated the Columbia accident faulted NASA three years ago for placing schedule concerns ahead of safety, squelching dissent and steamrolling over the concerns of engineers who had worried that foam from the huge external fuel tank had hit the shuttle during launch.

When Columbia was reentering Earth's atmosphere, fiery gases penetrated the wing where the foam had knocked a hole, causing the shuttle to disintegrate. All seven astronauts were killed.

Godspeed To Discovery (WT)

The Washington Times, July 1, 2006

Weather permitting, NASA plans to launch the space shuttle Discovery today from Cape Canaveral in what could be one of the shuttle program's final flights. Why? Because if anything goes wrong, which doesn't necessarily mean the loss of a third shuttle, NASA Administrator Michael Griffin will likely end the program.

Just recently, he said if "we lose another vehicle, I will tell you right now that I would be moving to figure out a way to shut the program down."

Even something as small as what occurred last summer, when the same foam debris that doomed Columbia in 2003 flaked off Discovery's outer hull requiring a mid-mission repair, anti-shuttle forces both within and from outside NASA will probably prevail in their long-running effort to move forward from the 1970s-era program.

In any case, it's doubtful that the shuttles will function well enough to complete the International Space Station, which could require as many as four flights a year, before the scheduled 2010 shutdown. Already two NASA chiefs have voiced their discomfort with today's scheduled launch, whereas NASA estimates it will take 17 more flights to finish the ISS. Should the shuttle fleet be grounded permanently, then so are the chances of ever completing the station, which might not be such a bad thing. Even Mr. Griffin has said "we don't know ... what the [station] will become." At a cost approaching $100 million -- in addition to the billions that will be spent sending further shuttle missions -- not knowing what the ISS will be used for is a pretty strong reason to just stop trying to build it.

Despite this, polls show that the public still approves of NASA's performance. A recent USA Today/Gallup poll found that 57 percent said the agency does a good or excellent job. That's a surprisingly high number, considering NASA hasn't done much to inspire the public's imagination in recent years, aside from unmanned missions to Mars and comets. What it seems to suggest, however, is that the public appreciates the risks involved with space flight and remains proud of NASA's legacy.

Unfortunately, the shuttle program has quickly become a blot on that legacy. We have always supported the continued presence of the United States in space, even if that presence was relegated to low-Earth orbit. But the years since the Apollo glory days has added a whole range of programs to NASA's limited resources; manned programs like pushing the human footprint further into space have been ignored, while those like the shuttle are underfunded. The hope is that once the shuttle is a museum piece, NASA can refocus its funding almost exclusively on fulfilling the president's Mars vision.

That said, Godspeed to the Discovery astronauts.

Deadline Change Called 'Unfair' (BRADV)

By Patrick Courreges, Acadiana Bureau

Baton Rouge Advocate, July 1, 2006

Parishes hit by Rita feel abandoned

President Bush's Thursday exclusion of Hurricane Rita-hit areas from a list of parishes receiving time extensions on full federal coverage of expenses for hurricane debris clearing may largely paralyze work on clearing debris in storm-shattered Cameron Parish, starting today.

U.S. Rep. Charles Boustany, R-Lafayette, who represents Cameron and other Rita-lashed parishes in Louisiana's 7th Congressional District, on Friday derided the decision as a "bean-counter approach" and a "slap in the face."

Beginning today, parishes not on the list as eligible for the deadline extension sent out by the Bush administration will have to pay 10 percent of the cost of debris removal — a list that includes none of the parishes directly hit by Rita.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco has written a letter to the Bush administration asking for a reconsideration of the deadline decision, noting that many parishes deeply affected by Katrina and Rita were excluded.

Boustany said the rationale he was given by federal officials was that offering the extension to the Hurricane Katrina-hit parishes of Orleans, Plaquemines, St. Bernard, St. Tammany and Washington covered 96 percent of the need in the state.

"That's a nice ivory tower economics point of view, but it's a very unjust way of looking at it, in my opinion," he said. "I just don't understand the bean-counter approach to this and it really gets me angry when I think about it. We got a major slap in the face. To put it mildly, this is unacceptable."

Boustany said the Bush administration is placing an unfair burden on the parishes of southwest Louisiana by not extending the deadline, despite repeated arguments for the need to do so.

"I'm sick and tired of being blindsided and I'm not happy with the administration on this," Boustany said. "At least they could offer some explanation, if not a solution."

Tina Horn, parish administrator for Cameron, said the parish's share of the remaining work would be about $3 million if it has to pay 10 percent.

"We don't have it," she said Friday. "If something doesn't change by the close of business today, we'll probably be stopping."

Horn said that, in a normal year, the parish's operational budget is about $8 million.

She said she believes that the Federal Emergency Management Agency's Cameron field office hurt the area's case for receiving deadline extension.

"I believe the president got the wrong information from our field office," Horn said. "I just can't believe the president would let us down like this."

She said that the FEMA area field office had recently reported that cleanup was progressing on schedule, despite parish officials saying that was not true.

"I just think the guy in charge of our AFO didn't get out of the office and see the big picture," Horn said. "I don't know if he just wanted to go home or what. He certainly did Cameron Parish an injustice."

Dave Phillips, with the FEMA field office, spoke briefly about those allegations, noting that no one thinks the Cameron cleanup is on schedule and that the field office does not generate that kind of report, then referred questions to FEMA's press office.

DOJ_NMG_0037832

A FEMA press office staffer on Friday took down questions about the matter during a telephone call and promised a response.

Horn said she had a list of public buildings in need of demolition in to FEMA three weeks after the storm hit on Sept. 24 but work has not yet begun and had only recently been contracted.

She said parish officials do not know yet what options they might have if the deadline decision is not reversed.

To the north of Cameron, Lake Charles Mayor Randy Roach said his city and Calcasieu Parish will feel the hit if the deadline is not extended.

He said Lake Charles' and Calcasieu's efforts at debris removal are far from complete, and have been bogged down by disputes with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and FEMA about what does and does not constitute storm damage.

"Debris is probably the biggest single item that affects our recovery," Roach said.

He too expressed the concern that FEMA may be underestimating the remaining problems in southwest Louisiana.

"I think that FEMA has looked at numbers that suggest we're a lot farther along than we are," Roach said.

He said the cutoff of full federal coverage, if upheld, will mean money needed to prepare for future storms will have to be used for cleaning up from Rita.

"We're disappointed because it's definitely going to be a significant cost to us," he said. "If it does this to us, from a financial standpoint, I can only imagine what it does for Cameron."

Clay Menard, secretary/treasurer of the Vermilion Parish Police Jury, said debris in Vermilion — which also took a heavy hit from Rita — has mostly been cleared, except for some debris blocking drainage canals.

He said he feels for Vermilion's neighbor to the west.

"I was completely amazed that Cameron Parish did not get an extension," Menard said. "It's no fault of their own."

Boustany said that federal government's response in helping the area has been inefficient and riddled with needless delays that have led parts of southwest Louisiana being unable to meet the deadlines.

"There's been an interminable delay. Who's fault is that? I have to say the federal government bears some of the responsibility," Boustany said. "It's a system that has failed the people of southwest Louisiana and it's unfair. There's a basic injustice to it."

He said that the federal government offered 100-percent coverage for debris cleanup with no such time limits after 1992's Hurricane Andrew — which hit Florida and Louisiana — and 2001's terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center in New York.

"My bottom line is it's unacceptable for the administration to expect the parishes of southwest Louisiana to pay that," Boustany said.

Boustany said that, even if the decision is made to extend the federal debris cleanup deadlines for Rita parishes soon, the initial decision has created a delay in the efforts.

"This is not the way to respond to a problem like this," Boustany said.

Kerr-McGee Agrees To Negotiate With U.S. On Oil Royalties In Gulf (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 30 — The Kerr-McGee Corporation, under pressure from Congress, said on Friday that it would begin negotiations to settle a lawsuit that if it went to trial could deprive the government of as much as $60 billion in oil and gas royalties.

At issue are thousands of leases the government signed with companies seeking to drill in federal waters in the Gulf of Mexico. The leases include incentives that allow companies to avoid paying royalties to the government on much of what they initially produce.

Kerr-McGee sued the Interior Department in March to overturn a provision that requires companies to pay full royalties if oil prices climb above about $34 a barrel and natural gas prices rise above about $4 per thousand cubic feet.

Kerr-McGee is also one of several dozen companies that signed leases in which the government inadvertently failed to halt the incentives during times of high energy prices.

If those leases remain unchanged, the Bush administration estimates the companies would produce about $65 billion worth of oil and gas over the next five years without paying any royalties — a loss to the government that would total more than $7 billion.

If Kerr-McGee were to win its lawsuit, it would set a precedent that would affect thousands of leases owned by companies like Exxon Mobil, BP and Shell. Congressional auditors have estimated that the government could lose an additional $60 billion over 25 years.

Kerr-McGee, which is based in Oklahoma City, did not say it would drop its claims. But in a statement issued on Friday, the company said that it had agreed to "undertake efforts to mediate the disagreement" and that it would ask a court to postpone the trial preparations.

The abrupt retreat came one week after Kerr-McGee reached an agreement to be acquired by Anadarko Petroleum for $16.4 billion — a 40 percent premium over its stock price at the time.

It also came as Congress has stepped up pressure on oil companies to renegotiate their deals. On Thursday, the Senate Appropriations Committee, over objections by Republican leaders and the Bush administration, approved a measure that would prohibit companies that refused to pay full royalties from acquiring any additional federal oil and gas leases. The House passed an almost identical measure in May as part of the Interior Department's spending bill.

At a hearing of the energy subcommittee of the House Committee on Government Reform, executives from Chevron, Shell and ConocoPhillips said they were ready to renegotiate the erroneous contracts signed in 1998 and 1999. Exxon Mobil insisted that its contracts should be respected, but Kerr-McGee took the most militant stance by arguing that it was entitled to royalty-free gas and oil on all leases signed from 1996 to 2000.

House Lifts Offshore Drilling Ban (AP-Y2)

By H. Josef Hebert, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 1, 2006

Congress has taken a major step toward allowing oil and gas drilling in coastal waters that have been off limits for a quarter-century.

Still, a battle looms in the Senate over the issue. And the Bush administration's support for the legislation, which was approved Thursday by a 232-187 vote in the House, is lukewarm.

The House bill would end an Outer Continental Shelf drilling moratorium that Congress has renewed every year since 1981. It covers 85 percent of the country's coastal waters — everywhere except the central and western Gulf of Mexico and some areas off Alaska.

Rep. Richard Pombo (news, bio, voting record), R-Calif., a leading proponent for lifting the ban, said he believes a majority of the Senate wants to open the protected waters to energy companies.

Asked about White House opposition to some parts of the bill, especially a provision that would give tens of billions of dollars to states that have drilling rigs off their coasts, Pombo said, "I dare them to veto this bill."

"They don't like us giving money back to the states. I think it's right," Pombo told reporters after the vote. Forty Democrats joined most Republicans in favor of ending the drilling moratorium.

In the Senate, the measure is likely to face a filibuster from Florida senators and possibly others from coastal states that fear offshore energy development could threaten multibillion-dollar tourist and recreation businesses if there were a spill.

The Senate is considering a limited measure that would open an area in the eastern Gulf of Mexico, known as Lease Area 181, that comes within 100 miles of Florida. It is not under the moratorium. Even that is unlikely to pass unless its sponsors get 60 votes to overcome a filibuster from the Floridians.

Sen. Pete Domenici (news, bio, voting record), R-N.M., chairman of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, said he would pursue efforts to open the Lease 181 Area. The committee's ranking Democrat, Sen. Jeff Bingaman (news, bio, voting record), also of New Mexico, criticized the House-passed bill, saying it would eventually create "a huge hole in our federal budget and undermine environmental protections on our lands and off our coasts."

DOJ_NMG_0037834

Sen. Mary Landrieu (news, bio, voting record), D-La., said Friday that Senate GOP leaders and Domenici have agreed on a new revenue-sharing plan that would funnel 37.5 percent of future royalties from Area 181 development to the four energy producing Gulf states, and also open an additional 6.3 million acres south of Area 181.

But that proposal does not address the Florida senators' concerns and may generate new opposition to Domenici's bill from senators opposed to changing the royalty distribution formulas.

Domenici later said in a statement, "I've had a number of productive meetings with Sen. Landrieu. ... We've made progress ... but we're not there yet."

Still, the House vote was a huge victory for Pombo, two Louisiana lawmakers — Republican Bobby Jindal and Democrat Charlie Melancon — and Rep. John Peterson (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., who spearheaded the drive to lift the moratorium.

Only six weeks ago, a proposal by Peterson to open coastal waters to natural gas development fell 14 votes short.

This time, they included a provision that would allow states to keep the moratorium in place if they opposed drilling and changed the revenue sharing so that states' share of royalties would soar eventually as much as 75 percent.

The Gulf states where most U.S. offshore energy resources are being tapped, now get less than 5 percent of the royalties. For example, Louisiana's royalties would go from $32 million last year to a total of $8.6 billion over the next 10 years — and even higher after that.

The Interior Department estimated that the changes could cost the federal government as much as $69 billion in lost royalties over 15 years and "several hundred billion dollars" over 60 years.

The White House issued a statement saying it favors much of the bill but strongly opposes the changes in royalty revenue sharing, which it said "would have a long-term impact on the federal deficit."

The Interior Department estimates there are about 19 billion barrels of recoverable oil and 86 trillion cubic feet of natural gas beneath waters under drilling bans from New England to southern Alaska.

Supporters of the drilling moratorium argue there's four times that amount of oil and gas available in offshore waters open to energy companies, mainly in the central and western Gulf of Mexico and off parts of Alaska.

House Votes To Let Allies Buy Top U.S. Fighter (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

Sending Such Technology Abroad Raises Concerns

The House has recommended lifting a ban on international sales of the nation's most advanced fighter, the F-22 Raptor, a potential boon to Lockheed Martin Corp. if allies such as Japan begin buying the expensive plane to upgrade their air forces.

On a voice vote after an 11-minute debate, House members on June 20 tacked onto the defense appropriations bill an amendment repealing a nine-year-old prohibition on overseas sales of the plane.

The ban was put in place to keep the Raptor's high-tech systems out of the hands of foreign governments. But with U.S. military orders for the jet lagging, members of Congress and some top staffers in the Air Force have become concerned that Bethesda-based Lockheed may shut down the plane's production line in coming years.

The $70 billion fighter program is one of Lockheed's largest, employing more than 4,500 workers in Georgia and Texas and bringing in hundreds of millions of dollars in annual revenue. The Pentagon has steadily lowered the number of F-22s it planned to purchase from the 750 it thought it needed to face off against the Soviet Union nearly 20 years ago down to 183. As with the older F-16 -- a fighter Lockheed continues to sustain through overseas sales -- foreign purchases could keep the Raptor in business.

The amendment allowing overseas sales was offered by Rep. Kay Granger (R-Tex.), whose district in Fort Worth includes a plant that makes the midsection of the aircraft, with a total of 2,640 jobs associated with the Raptor.

DOJ_NMG_0037835

"I believe this provision of this bill is no longer necessary to safeguard our technology," Granger said on the floor of the House.

Lockheed executives and Air Force officials declined to comment.

Prospects of passage in the Senate, which will not take up its appropriations bill until next month, are unclear, though that chamber traditionally has been more tolerant of allowing international involvement in military programs.

Sen. John W. Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, appeared willing to support foreign sales of a modified version of the Raptor.

"My own advice is that we should consider manufacturing a model of that aircraft that would meet our requirements with regard to technology transfer, a model that would be foreign sales only," Warner said in an interview. "That aircraft, even if modified for foreign sales, would be a magnificent aircraft, believe me."

He noted that the military has had to make similar accommodations for foreign sales of other U.S. aircraft, including the F-16 and F-15.

Even if the ban is lifted, any overseas sales of the plane would have to be vetted by the Departments of Defense and State under the Arms Export Control Act.

Lockheed and some in the Air Force began making a case for overseas sales of the fighter early this year as the Pentagon lowered the number of planes it would buy to 183 to save $10 billion over the next few years. Until that point, Lockheed had expected to sell about 381 planes to the U.S. government. The reduction prompted Lockheed to say it would have to close the F-22 production line by 2011.

Any specific sale is likely to face concerns about the export of technology that is still considered sensitive. Congress has continued funding the plane, despite its increasing cost, in part because the Raptor's technology was considered worth sustaining. While Lockheed's other fighter jet, the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter, was developed to be exported, the Raptor wasn't.

The company has delivered 74 Raptors so far at a cost of $361 million each. The cost is about three times the original estimate, according to the Government Accountability Office. The planes are scheduled to be put into combat service early next year, following years of fine-tuning and training.

During the brief floor debate, the original author of the overseas sales ban, Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), said he was "significantly uncomfortable" with lifting it.

"I am certainly not convinced that we have reached the point where we ought to remove these restrictions," he said.

Selling the aircraft overseas also undermines one of the original justifications for the aircraft, skeptics say.

"The original justification for creating the F-22 was that we had already sold our most advanced fighter technology to so many countries that we needed a more advanced fighting capability. Now we're in that trap again by selling the F-22 abroad," said Jennifer Porter-Gore, spokeswoman for the Project on Government Oversight, a watchdog group. "This is when our national security interests collide with those of the defense industry."

Given its expense, the fighter may have a limited audience.

"This is an extremely high-performance fighter. Few air forces around the world are going to need it. Fewer will be able to afford it," said Gordon M. Adams, professor of the practice of international affairs at George Washington University.

Lockheed and the Air Force see a potential market among the United States' closest allies, including Japan, Australia and Britain, according to industry insiders and analysts. For example, Japan is expected to begin replacing soon its fleet of about 100 F-4s. Excluding development costs that the Pentagon paid early in the program, the price of the plane drops to between $150 million and $183 million, or even less for a stripped-down model, they said.

Foreign sales could also help defray some of the cost of the plane to the U.S. military and keep the production line going while the Air Force and Lockheed make their argument for more purchases to the next administration, said Loren Thompson, a consultant for Lockheed who also has close ties to the Air Force.

Congress Still Grappling With Pension Bill (AP-Y2)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037836

Congress falls short once again of achieving one of its prime goals: coming up with a bill to assure 44 million workers who depend on employer-based pension plans that they will get their promised retirement benefits.

House and Senate negotiators originally set Tax Day, April 15, as their target for finding a compromise. When it eluded them, the new deadline became Memorial Day, and then Independence Day.

But they left Friday on a weeklong Fourth of July recess still apart on two big issues:

_How to make companies that have fallen behind on payments to their pension plans make them up without driving them to terminate the plans or declare bankruptcy.

_Whether to single out financially struggling airlines for special treatment. The Senate wants to give them up to 20 years to get back to full funding of their pension plans; House negotiators don't.

"There's not much left to be resolved," Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, said Thursday after a House-Senate meeting. "The staff is going to work real hard over the Fourth of July break."

The two chambers passed their respective bills in late 2005, and talks on a compromise have dragged on since March.

At the prodding of House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., negotiators have been meeting almost daily in recent weeks. But progress has been incremental.

"Days and days and days of the same ditto," House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, a chief sponsor of the House bill, said as he emerged from one recent meeting.

Lynn Dudley, vice president of the American Benefits Council, which represents companies with pension plans, said her organization is not overly concerned by the missed deadlines.

"The truth of the matter is they've got to get this thing right. It's the bedrock of retirement security for millions of people," she said.

The toughest issue has been working out a definition of what is an "at risk" company that would be required by the bill to increase contributions to its pension plan.

Currently, company pension plans are underfunded by an estimated total of $450 billion. The Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. — the federal agency that insures private pension plans much like the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. insures bank accounts — estimates that $100 billion of that is with companies with serious funding problems.

The PBGC, which is self-funded from premiums, is itself burdened by a $22.8 billion deficit because it has had to take over the benefits obligations of companies that go bankrupt and terminate their plans.

Without a fix, many fear the whole defined benefit pension system could implode in a repeat of the late 1980s savings and loan crisis that ended up requiring a $130 billion taxpayer bailout.

The original Senate bill would have linked at risk status to a company's credit rating, an idea strongly opposed by General Motors and others in the auto industry with poor credit status.

Negotiators have since backed off this approach, but industry sources have expressed concern that other proposals also are overly harsh — such as defining plans that are less than 80 percent funded as at risk for default.

One sticking point is whether credit balances, extra contributions paid into a plan to cover future years, should be counted as an asset when determining a plan's financial viability.

Former Michigan Gov. John Engler, who is now president of the National Association of Manufacturers, said excessively tough rules could be counterproductive. "The cost goes up if somebody terminates a plan and then turns it back over to the pension board," he said.

With more companies phasing out defined benefit plans and switching to defined contribution programs such as 401(K) plans, the pension legislation also tries to establish rules for conflict-free investment advice and solidify multiemployer plans mutually sponsored by companies and labor unions.

It also seeks to give legal backing to cash balance plans, a variation of defined benefit plans that have been in legal limbo because of a judge's ruling that IBM Corp.'s plan discriminated against older workers.

Reimbursement Cuts Said Threat To Doctors (WT)

By Kara Rowland, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, July 1, 2006

A slate of reimbursement cuts going into effect today for CareFirst BlueCross BlueShield providers has some Washington-area doctors threatening to limit new patients or drop out of the network.

The cuts also have prompted the Maryland State Medical Society (MedChi) to ask Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr. to investigate "monopolistic pricing practices" between the state's largest health insurer and its major rival, UnitedHealth Group, which together control 94 percent of the state health insurance market, according to R. Steven Orr, Maryland insurance commissioner.

In a letter dated May 1, CareFirst told providers it had lost several large accounts to competitors who reimbursed physicians at lower rates and therefore were able to offer lower premiums.

"We believe CareFirst or CareFirst BlueChoice members should not have to pay providers higher fees than those paid by members of other commercial health plans," wrote M. Bruce Edwards, a senior vice president for CareFirst.

The company is adjusting the fees it pays doctors for various "ancillary services" such as lab work and radiology, spokesman Jeff Valentine said. The changes range from a 12 percent increase in several areas to a 20 percent cut in others.

Dr. Stephen Rockower, a Rockville orthopedist and president of the Montgomery County Medical Society, decided on Thursday to drop out of the CareFirst network.

"I'm trying to run a business here. My rents go up, my employees demand salaries, my gas prices go up, my malpractice rates go up, but my reimbursement rates go down -- that's no way to run a business," he said. "If I'm losing money on each visit, seeing more patients doesn't help me."

Dr. Rockower, who has practiced medicine for 25 years and is in business with another doctor, said he lost two partners because of rising practice costs and flat or lower reimbursements. One relocated to another state while the other took early retirement.

"Ultimately, patients are going to be harmed when they can't find doctors or doctors leave the state or retire or go bankrupt," he said, adding that he has spoken with several colleagues who are considering leaving the network.

According to CareFirst spokesman Mike Sullivan, of 12,500 providers in the network, the number of doctors who have dropped out is in "the low single digits."

Kevin Enright, a spokesman for the attorney general's office, said the office has requested more information from both MedChi and CareFirst.

As a policy, the office does not confirm or deny whether an investigation is taking place, he said.

Both CareFirst and UnitedHealthcare have denied any collusion over physician payment rates. Mr. Valentine said CareFirst was not aware that UnitedHealthcare, which owns Rockville insurer Mid-Atlantic Medical Services Inc., had cut its rates until learning about it from MedChi.

"Any savings that are derived from these adjustments will go to benefit our members, either in the form of more moderate premiums or lower care costs and will not go to CareFirst's bottom line," he said.

But T. Michael Preston, executive director of MedChi, called the strategy of controlling health care costs by reducing physician payments a "dead end."

"There may be a certain business logic from [the insurance companies'] standpoint, but they're driving our delivery system into a ditch and the proof of that was announced last week," he said.

He referred to a National Academy of Sciences' Institute of Medicine report that said the nation's emergency departments do not have the necessary medical staff and equipment to meet demand.

Also in a report last week, the Center for Studying Health System Change, a Washington research group that studies health care trends, found that physician incomes fell an average of $13,000 -- after adjusting for inflation -- between 1995 and 2003 as a result of payment cuts by Medicare and private insurance providers. Meanwhile, overhead costs have climbed.

DOJ_NMG_0037838

"If you're not making some profit on the services, you can't stay in the business," Mr. Preston said.

Fighting For Public Housing (WSJ)

By Shearon Roberts

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

Maryland Senator Battles to Save Federal Program Set to Expire

WASHINGTON -- The Federal Government's program to revitalize public housing is set to expire, and Sen. Barbara Mikulski, the Maryland Democrat who championed the effort in the early 1990s, is fighting an uphill battle to preserve it.

After years of shrinking funding, the program, called Homeownership and Opportunity for People Everywhere, or Hope VI, will be phased out in September. Supporters fear it won't be extended. The Bush administration has said billions of dollars already are in the pipeline to complete dozens of development projects nationwide.

Sen. Mikulski sees it differently: "We need to support federal programs that help those who help themselves. The president talks about creating a better life for Americans, but his budget fails to deliver on his words."

Since 2003, the Bush administration has trimmed its budget request for Hope VI, but each year Congress has stepped in to continue funding, albeit at ever-lower levels. The $100 million allotted for the current fiscal year falls well below the $600 million annually envisioned by the program's founders when launching Hope VI.

Hope VI grew out of a congressional commission that advocated reducing poverty in inner cities by converting public-housing complexes into mixed-income communities. From 1992 to 2002, Congress allocated $5.7 billion to the program; $3 billion of that is designated to complete projects, but hasn't yet been spent.

"It's been a big shift for the administration to turn on" the Hope VI program, says Susan Popkin, leading researcher on the program at the Urban Institute, a Washington think tank. "Because it's generally regarded as a very successful program, it's really tweaks that are needed."

The Bush administration says Hope VI hasn't been very productive. From 1993-2005, 231 Hope VI grants were awarded, but only 54 development projects have been completed, says Donna White, spokeswoman for the Department of Housing and Urban Development. The administration says that record is due to local housing authorities' protracted struggles to relocate poor residents and leverage federal funds with local money.

"With the funding that's in the pipelines, the program is still going to assist families for years to come," Ms. White says. "The task at hand right now is to get the current projects completed."

Ms. Mikulski and a bipartisan group of senators -- Kit Bond (R., Mo.), Jack Reed (D., R.I.), Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) and New York Democrats Charles Schumer and Hillary Rodham Clinton -- are pushing for reauthorization. The bill, currently before the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, goes beyond the original legislation, calling for improvements in local schools and other services to attract residents. In the House, Rep. Christopher Shays (R., Conn.) has introduced a bill to extend the program without making such changes. Given White House opposition and a packed legislative calendar, extending the program this year faces long odds.

In Sen. Mikulski's hometown of Baltimore, Housing Commissioner Paul Graziano has overseen redevelopment of five sites with Hope VI funds. Mr. Graziano would like to overhaul more sites. "There is no model that I have heard from the administration or anyone that can address the comprehensive overhaul of public housing and community remodeling as the Hope VI program does," he says.

Soon after the Hope VI program began, public-housing authorities shifted how they use the federal funds, contributing to the backlog in projects. Instead of relying solely on federal dollars to raze old buildings and construct new ones, the Atlanta Housing Authority worked with the private sector, leveraging Hope VI grant money from HUD to replace a crumbling public-housing site with a mixed-income community. The project -- one-third public-housing units, one-third market-rate units and one-third single-family homes -- became the template.

The new community, Centennial Place, opened in 1996, with an elementary school, a YMCA, a bank and a child-care facility. By 2007, it will include restaurants, a grocery store and a dry cleaner. Overall, the Atlanta Housing Authority figures its Hope VI projects have parlayed $220 million in federal funds into $3 billion in new investment.

DOJ_NMG_0037839

"Hope VI is the critical seed capital that allows public-housing authorities to leverage additional public- and private-sector investment," says Sunia Zaterman, director of the Council of Large Public Housing Authorities, based in Washington. "The result of this 'first money in' approach, combined with unprecedented regulatory flexibility, has allowed public-housing authorities to build partnerships with private developers and others."

The process, however, takes time. HUD officials point out that many local agencies take an average of four years to complete grants, are slow to hire developers and lack efficient relocation plans. Over the years, HUD has set schedules, essentially doling out money only after an agency meets certain development or construction milestones.

A particular challenge is looking out for the residents of housing to be renovated. HUD now requires housing agencies to assign case workers to track residents. They must also find housing for them during reconstruction or provide federal housing vouchers to help pay rent on apartments elsewhere.

"It takes forever for these things to get constructed," Ms. Popkin of the Urban Institute said. Former residents are "often very happy where they've relocated to or they encounter strict screening criteria to return." Still, she says, a 2004 study found that about 60,000 public-housing units across the country could benefit from Hope VI.

Another Ohio Tour: Bush In Columbus (CLPD/AP)

By Julie Carr Smyth, Associated Press

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, July 1, 2006

Columbus -- The state's political hit parade continued Friday with President Bush jetting into the Columbus area for a fund-raiser for U.S. Sen. Mike DeWine.

Adults and children were making signs to greet the president hours before his arrival in a suburban Columbus neighborhood Friday afternoon, and others stood in their driveways holding small American flags.

"It's obviously very exciting," said Don Ziliak, 41. "I don't think many people have the opportunity to ever see the president, let alone right across from your house."

Ziliak's 8-year-old daughter stood nearby, hoisting a red, white and blue sign that said, "We love the president." He said he agrees in principle with most of what Bush does, but wishes the president could do it with more consensus.

Ohioans are regularly treated to drop-in visits by the nation's political heavyweights, especially in the months leading up to competitive elections such as DeWine's re-election battle against U.S. Rep. Sherrod Brown.

Also up for grabs this year are the governor's mansion and a pair of U.S. House seats, races that have both Republicans and Democrats dispatching some of their biggest names to Ohio between now and Nov. 7.

Friday's private fund-raiser for DeWine is Bush's fifth visit to the state this year.

Vice President Dick Cheney was in Columbus before the May 2 primary to raise money for Republican State Rep. Chuck Blasdel.

Blasdel is running in the November election against Democrat State Sen. Charlie Wilson for the House seat U.S. Rep. Ted Strickland vacated to run for governor.

Democrats, meanwhile, have played host to a stream of party stars, including U.S. Sens. John Kerry, Joe Biden, John Edwards and Barack Obama, retired Army Gen. Wesley Clark, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean.

Schwarzenegger Campaign To Pay $202,200 Fine (LAT)

By Robert Salladay, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

The FPPC penalty stems from late disclosure of $25 million in donations to the governor's team in last year's special election.

SACRAMENTO — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's campaign has agreed to pay a $202,200 penalty for failing to properly report more than $25 million in campaign donations during the special election last year, the state Fair Political Practices Commission said Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0037840

The penalty probably is the final chapter of Schwarzenegger's special election, in which voters rejected all of the governor's initiatives and handed him the biggest defeat of his political career.

Under California law, campaigns must publicly disclose donations they receive and money they spend — in some cases within 24 hours of the transaction. Disclosure is the bedrock of California's finance law, allowing the public to see the money behind political campaigns.

In documents released Friday, the commission found that Schwarzenegger's California Recovery Team, created to advance the governor's causes, failed to report in a timely way millions of dollars in donations that were used to buy TV advertising pushing four initiatives on the November ballot. It found 143 delinquent reports on $25.6 million in expenditures.

The complaint was filed by the Alliance for a Better California, a union-backed group that worked against the governor last year. Robin Swanson, a spokeswoman for the group, said Friday they were "happy that the FPPC is holding the governor and the California Recovery Team accountable."

The largest fine ever levied by the commission was $263,000 — against Lt. Gov. Cruz Bustamante — for violations during the gubernatorial recall election in 2003. Bustamante improperly moved $3.8 million between campaign committees.

In the Schwarzenegger case, the issue was whether the California Recovery Team was really acting as an "independent expenditure committee," which is governed by rules different from those of a "general purpose committee," which has less stringent disclosure requirements.

The governor was sued during the special election to force him to disclose the donations within 24 hours, but election day came and went before the courts decided the matter. Nevertheless, Schwarzenegger filed the proper forms as an independent expenditure committee — disclosing the donations in the weeks before the election.

The fact that voters could see the contributions before the election was a mitigating factor in reducing the fine, the political practices commission said. The state agency could have fined the California Recovery Team $715,000. Investigators also said Schwarzenegger apparently didn't know that the reports weren't filed properly.

"This settlement resolves an honest dispute over compliance with a very complicated campaign finance law," said Tom Hiltachk, the governor's attorney. "I hope the commission will work toward simplification of these rules so the public benefits from better, faster and more frequent campaign disclosure."

Ned Wigglesworth, a campaign finance expert with TheRestOfUs.org, a Sacramento nonprofit, said voters "weren't walking into the ballot box blind," but for a time "they were deprived of some of the information they should have had" about the governor's donors.

The penalty is the latest legal entanglement for Schwarzenegger, who has broken all fundraising records for a California politician. Since 2002, he has raised more than $150 million for the recall election of 2003 and other causes. He is expected to collect $75 million more for his reelection effort this year.

In 2004, a Superior Court judge ordered Schwarzenegger to repay a $4.5 million loan he illegally used to finance his recall campaign. Last year, a committee supporting Proposition 77, the governor's redistricting overhaul, was forced to return $1.75 million to Schwarzenegger because it exceeded state limits.

Schwarzenegger Signs California Budget After Cutting $175 Million (LAT)

By Evan Halper, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

The spending plan is the first completed on time in six years. Criticism of his trimming was muted as Democrats got most of what they had sought.

SACRAMENTO — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed the state's first on-time budget in six years Friday, after using his veto power to scale back the expansion of environmental enforcement and healthcare programs approved by the Legislature earlier this week.

The $131-billion spending plan signed by the governor will use a surge of unanticipated revenue that filled California's coffers this year to pay back billions the state borrowed from schools in recent years as well as to accelerate repayment of other state debt.

DOJ_NMG_0037841

The governor used his veto pencil to eliminate more than $175 million in spending that the Legislature had approved. He vetoed tens of millions of dollars from the budget that would have been used to reduce air pollution, expand hospital trauma care, provide interpreters to non-English speakers in civil court cases and make dental care available to more low-income children, among other services.

The vetoes drew a muted response, however. Most of the program expansions that Democrats had secured in the budget approved by the Legislature Tuesday night remained intact.

"This is a great budget," Schwarzenegger said just before signing the document at a ceremony under the Capitol dome. Schwarzenegger said he and legislative leaders were able to meet the deadline for passing a budget for the first time since 2000 because "we put politics aside."

"We were driven by one overwhelming desire: to do what is best for the people of California," he said.

The budget does not solve the state's financial problems. It relies on this year's $7.5-billion windfall — unanticipated tax revenue resulting from higher than expected capital gains, corporate profits and the hot housing market — to expand programs and close a shortfall that had been projected for the fiscal year that begins today.

But the state is still projected to spend more than it brings in over the coming years. Lawmakers expect a deficit of at least $3.3 billion for the fiscal year that begins in July of 2007.

On Friday, Democratic gubernatorial nominee Phil Angelides warned that Schwarzenegger would deal with that deficit as he has dealt with past deficits, "by cutting school funding, raising tuition and fees and cutting healthcare."

But Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles) had a different take.

He said the budget agreement shows "you can be fiscally conservative but at the same time be compassionate."

By the time the budget was signed, the Legislature had adjourned for a monthlong break. Some lawmakers will stick around to draft legislation in line with the four-part plan the governor presented this week to address prison overcrowding. Schwarzenegger called a special session of the Legislature to deal with that issue, which will resume when lawmakers return Aug. 7.

The Assembly has already approved at least two prison reform proposals: a bill that would authorize the state to borrow for the construction of new prisons and another that would move nonviolent women offenders into local detention centers where they could get drug treatment, education and help finding jobs. Both are pending in the Senate.

Harsher penalties for repeat drug offenders, championed by the governor, became law when he signed the budget Friday. The new law changes voter-approved Proposition 36 by taking away the option of avoiding jail from thousands of drug offenders who seek addiction treatment more than once.

Now judges will be able to incarcerate offenders up to five days if they relapse. Treatment advocates call the new penalties illegal and say they will sue to block them.

The governor scaled back the expansion of efforts to fight air pollution by $35 million. The money would have been used to update heavily polluting construction, farming and transportation equipment and to bolster enforcement of the state's clean air laws.

Regardless, environmentalists saw victory overall in the budget. They noted that it includes $50 million to replace decades-old school buses with clean-burning models, develop alternative fuels and promote zero-emissions cars and trucks.

"This budget certainly isn't bad," said Pete Price, an environmental lobbyist in Sacramento. "A lot of the environmental budget items were retained. I think generally you will find environmentalists not unhappy."

There was also little criticism from healthcare advocates. The governor eliminated $10 million that would have gone to fund trauma centers in hospitals, scaled back a proposal to fight West Nile virus by $6 million — or two-thirds of the proposed funding — and eliminated $2 million that would have been used to provide preventive dental care to low-income children.

The governor also vetoed $10 million that civil courts could have used to hire interpreters for non-English speakers.

EDITORIAL WRAP-UP:

Don't Know Much About History (NYT)

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

Somewhere between the firing in 2002 of President Bush's first Treasury secretary, Paul O'Neill, and the Senate confirmation this week of his third Treasury chief, Henry Paulson, the administration changed its tune on budget deficits. In the early days, the line was, essentially, that deficits don't matter. Mr. O'Neill's ouster was due in part to his gall in suggesting otherwise. Now, officials dutifully declaim that deficits matter, but that Bush-era shortfalls are "within historical norms."

Mr. Paulson apparently shares that view, having offered it repeatedly when asked about budget deficits during his confirmation hearing. That's a disappointment. It takes a narrow view of history to imply that the Bush-era deficits are "normal."

As a share of the economy, the Bush-era deficits have averaged 2.7 percent. That's the second worst record of any administration in the past 60 years, surpassed only by the deficits from the tenures of President Reagan and the first President Bush, which each averaged 4.3 percent. (Five years into the Clinton era, deficits averaged 1.2 percent of the economy, dropping to a mere 0.1 percent by the time Mr. Bush took over.) To imply that the current budget gap is comfortably within historical norms because it's not as bad as the worst deficits in modern memory is, to put it politely, a stretch.

Besides, size isn't everything when it comes to assessing the danger in budget deficits. Timing is also crucial.

The Reagan-era deficits occurred decades before the retirement of the baby boomers, when the post-World War II generation was in its peak earning — and taxpaying — years. The Bush deficits are uniquely alarming in that they're occurring on the eve of the baby boomers' retirement, leaving little time to recoup before the government has to meet large Medicare and Social Security obligations.

On top of that, and well outside the historical norm, is President Bush's insistence on continued tax cutting, despite the ongoing deficits and despite the fact that the economy has long since recovered from the last recession. From the end of World War II through the 1970's, various administrations hammered away at the nation's debt, reducing the burden from the wartime level of over 100 percent of the economy to about 25 percent. That effort was largely abandoned in the 1980's. But even Mr. Reagan backtracked on his budget-busting tax cuts of 1981 by raising taxes in 1982 and 1984. In 1990, a bipartisan deficit-reduction agreement raised taxes and cut spending, followed by another budget-tightening package passed by Democrats in 1993. In contrast, the Bush years have been marked by nonstop tax cutting, deepening debt, the abandonment of budget rules and increased spending, paid for by borrowing.

And not just any borrowing. The Bush-era deficits are also alarming in the extent to which they are foreign financed. Since 2001, 73 percent of new government borrowing has been from abroad. In total, 43 percent of the United States' publicly held debt of $4.8 trillion is in foreign hands, compared with only 14 percent at the peak of the Reagan deficits in 1983 and 30 percent in 2001. Debt owed to bankers in Beijing, Tokyo and elsewhere could destabilize the dollar and from there, drive up interest rates and prices.

If Mr. Paulson and other administration officials were to say that today's deficits were dangerous, it would logically follow to recommend scaling back the Bush tax cuts. By implying that the deficits are not so worrisome, they can continue to insist that spending cuts alone could fix the problem, even though that would mean deep cuts in Social Security and Medicare — something they are not willing to advocate explicitly. One can only hope that in discussions with his new boss, Mr. Paulson has more to say about the budget deficit than he let on during his confirmation hearing.

Passports For Health Care (WP)

A harmful new requirement that Medicaid recipients provide proof of citizenship

UNDER A NEW federal law that takes effect today, poor Americans will be required to produce proof of citizenship to be eligible for Medicaid. This may sound like a sensible safeguard against providing government-paid health benefits to illegal immigrants who fraudulently claim eligibility. It isn't. The new law and the unduly stringent rules that the Bush administration has produced to implement it are unnecessary, expensive and mean-spirited. They pose the threat that millions of people entitled to receive Medicaid benefits will be denied coverage.

The political benefits of this latest form of immigrant-bashing are obvious. Rep. Charles Whitlow Norwood Jr. (R-Ga.), a chief sponsor, cited "the outright theft of Medicaid benefits by illegal aliens." But there's scant evidence of widespread fraud under the current system. In all but four states, Medicaid applicants attest, under penalty of perjury, that they are citizens, and officials can ask for documentation if there is reason for suspicion. As Mark B. McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, wrote in response to an inspector general's examination of the issue last year, "The report does not find particular problems regarding false allegations of citizenship, nor are we aware of any."

If the problem is unproven, the solution will be expensive -- both for the states that are required to enforce it (or risk losing millions in federal funding) and the recipients who have to obtain documents. In fact, this new requirement runs precisely contrary to recent efforts to streamline Medicaid enrollment procedures to make certain that all eligible recipients get coverage.

But the biggest risk is that, rather than preventing fraud, the provision will result in the denial of benefits to eligible Americans who can't come up with the required proof. After all, the typical Medicaid recipient doesn't have a passport, the preferred form of proof. Also, many elderly African Americans were born at home and were never issued birth certificates.

Under the administration's guidance for state Medicaid agencies, states can't extend coverage to new applicants while they scramble to obtain documentation. Impoverished senior citizens and people with disabilities who already receive Supplemental Security Income benefits -- and have therefore already had their citizenship verified by the Social Security Administration -- aren't automatically eligible. There aren't any exceptions for those who need immediate care; who are too incapacitated to produce documents (Alzheimer's patients, for example); or who are victims of natural disasters.

It's certainly fair to ask that states have procedures in place to guard against fraud. But this is an unnecessarily cruel law interpreted in an unnecessarily cruel way. Yesterday, the District government, facing a lawsuit, agreed to hold off on enforcing it until at least July 17. If the lawsuits that have been filed to overturn the requirement don't succeed, Congress should reconsider.

Hamas's War (WP)

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

The movement defended armed attacks and hostage-taking; now it's complaining that Israel is fighting back.

PALESTINIAN Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh charged yesterday that Israel's offensive in the Gaza Strip is aimed at overturning his government. It's not clear that's the case -- the incursion seems mainly intended to recover a soldier held hostage by Palestinian militants. But if it is, Israel would be entirely justified.

When Cpl. Gilad Shalit was abducted by the military wing of Mr. Haniyeh's Hamas movement last weekend, his administration faced a choice. It could behave like a civilized government -- and work to free the hostage -- or align itself with a terrorist operation. It chose the latter. Hamas government officials endorsed the militants' demand that Israel release Palestinian prisoners it has legally arrested in exchange for a soldier who was attacked while guarding Israeli territory. Hamas justified this position by citing the terrorist movement Hezbollah, which has extracted prisoners from Israel in exchange for hostages, as well as governments that exchange POWs in wartime.

Fair enough. But if Hamas wants to be equated with Hezbollah or define itself as at war with Israel, then Israel has every right to try to destroy the Islamic movement's military capacity, to capture its leaders (it has arrested more than 60 since Wednesday, including eight cabinet ministers) and to topple its government. Isn't that what happens in war?

As it is, Israel's Gaza incursion has been reluctant, slow, carefully calibrated -- and as of yesterday, casualty-free. In addition to the arrests, Israel has disrupted power supplies for slightly more than a tenth of Gaza's population, occupied an abandoned airport, rained shells down on empty fields and bombed the Hamas-controlled interior ministry while it was empty. Yesterday it again postponed a larger operation aimed at stopping the launching of rockets at Israel from northern Gaza in order to allow more time for mediation by Egypt. Meanwhile, the rocket firings continued -- another act of war that Hamas has encouraged, if not sponsored.

The restraint reflects recognition by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert that Israel stands only to lose if the Palestinian Authority is destroyed by force. Cpl. Shalit probably can be saved only by a Palestinian political decision, and Israeli forces will have trouble retiring from Gaza and stopping further rocket launchings and abductions, unless they can reach a truce with Hamas. Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, who has been trying to draw Hamas's political wing into an alliance with his secular Fatah movement, could still play a role in brokering such an accord. But he needs more help than he is getting from Egypt, other Arab states and the United Nations. Instead of fulminating about supposed Israeli war crimes, these actors ought to be demanding that Hamas -- and its sponsors in Damascus and Tehran -- stop their own acts of terrorism and war.

Hedge Fund Hoopla (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

Politicians are drawn to piles of unregulated money like, well, politicians to TV cameras. So it was only a matter of time before Congress took aim at the $2.4 trillion hedge fund industry.

The Senate Judiciary Committee held a hedge fund hearing this week, with its star witness one Gary Aguirre, a former SEC investigator who said superiors quashed a probe into insider trading at Pequot Capital. Pequot has vigorously denied the claims, and insider trading is already illegal. But the ubiquitous Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal was nonetheless on hand, in range of TV cameras, to claim that hedge funds are a "regulatory black hole." The Senators were also very concerned, no doubt prepping for the day when a few of these pools of private investment capital go belly up.

HOT TOPIC

Volatile Markets Bring Hedge Funds Under Fire1

So maybe it's time to step back and recall that we've all been at this cab stand before. In 1999, a year after Long Term Capital Management blew up, the President's Working Group on Financial Markets released the results of its top-to-bottom probe of hedge funds. This was no lightweight body, containing as it did Alan Greenspan, Robert Rubin and former SEC Chairman Arthur Levitt. Its findings argued so strongly against meddling in this source of market liquidity and efficiency that even the Clinton Administration gave regulation a pass.

The working group focused on a concern that is often heard today, which is that too much hedge fund borrowing could lead to systemic market risk. Highly leveraged investors are always more vulnerable to market shocks. And if forced to liquidate their often-huge positions, their losses could cascade throughout the financial system.

But the working group found that Long Term Capital was unique. The best way to guard against hedge fund meltdowns is a system in which the counterparties (bankers, broker-dealers) that lend to or borrow from hedge funds impose due diligence. In Long Term Capital's case, many counterparties were so impressed by that giant fund's reputation that they "did not ask sufficiently tough questions," as Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke put it in a speech this May.

Such laxity is a problem, but the answer isn't necessarily more direct regulation. The working group recognized that, in the complicated and fast-moving world of financial derivatives, the best way to guard against future blowups is to ensure the market itself imposes more discipline. It recommended that hedge funds provide better disclosure to their counterparties, and that regulators ensure that counterparties have systems and policies that identify warning signs and restrain excessive leverage.

The regulators have since complied, issuing risk-management guidance so bank supervisors now consider it a primary duty to monitor hedge-fund dealings. The SEC also stepped up its inspection of broker-dealers. Many counterparties now require hedge funds to post more collateral to cover potential exposure. And institutions and regulators are all trying to improve weak areas -- say, understanding the risks in such new financial products as credit derivatives. For a "black hole," this sure has a lot of foot traffic.

Hedge funds offer high returns, but they also take big risks, and some failures are inevitable. That's especially true when the Fed is raising rates and credit is getting tighter. But while hedge funds have multiplied since 1999, the funds that have failed have done so with barely a market ripple. This suggests the Clinton working group's strategy is working.

The Clintonians also argued that direct hedge fund regulation would have significant costs, such as reducing the liquidity crucial to robust financial markets. And in his recent speech, Mr. Bernanke noted how difficult it would be for any regulator to monitor hedge fund trading strategies that change rapidly and are enormously complex.

A more recent complaint about hedge funds is that they are becoming ever more available to Mom and Pop investors, not merely to the superrich. But a 2003 SEC report found that funds are still dominated by big institutional investors -- pension funds, endowments, and the like. Rich individuals and families supplied 42% of hedge fund assets, although that share is declining.

Pension funds do contain Mom and Pop retirement assets. But the focus of regulators should be on the pension fund managers for taking a flyer on hedge funds, not on the funds for taking the money. As for those who claim hedge funds are run by rogues, the SEC report noted that it could find "no evidence indicating that hedge funds or their advisers engage disproportionately in fraudulent activity."

Alas, none of this common sense stopped the SEC from plunging ahead in 2004 in an attempt to begin regulating hedge funds. But that attempt was overruled this month as an illegal power grab by the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals, which throws the matter once more into the tender arms of Congress.

Hedge funds are easy political targets because they aren't sold to the general public and aren't well understood. But the regulators at the Fed and Treasury who are paid to watch the financial system understand that they provide far more benefits than risks. Congress should tread carefully, if it treads at all.

Jon Corzine Florio (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

Nearly every state in the nation is celebrating the new fiscal year that begins on Monday with record tax revenues. The big exception is New Jersey, which is headed instead for what could be a government shutdown.

The political showdown isn't between Republicans and Democrats, but is between Governor Jon Corzine and his fellow Democrats who control the state legislature. On Wednesday, Democrats cursed each other and, according to our eyewitness sources, came close to blows inside the capitol in Trenton. Mr. Corzine is now threatening a government shutdown if his own party doesn't bend to his proposal for a $1.5 billion tax increase.

Remarkably, all of this intra-party feuding isn't over whether to raise taxes, merely over how. Mr. Corzine wants to raise the state sales tax to 7% from an already high 6%. Many Democrats in the legislature believe this is political suicide, especially with the Governor low in the polls. But somehow they've convinced themselves that voters will happily swallow new levies on payroll, tobacco, computer services and car rentals instead. Meanwhile, the one promise that Democrats made to voters in last year's election campaign -- lowering what are some of the highest property taxes in the country -- remains conspicuously unfulfilled.

A new Quinnipiac poll finds that 47% of voters identify taxes as the biggest problem in the state -- the highest number for any issue the polling firm has ever found in New Jersey. The Garden State has raised taxes nearly every year since 2000 and nearly twice as much per resident as the next highest tax state. Yet, no surprise, Trenton still has the biggest budget crisis outside of the states ruined by Hurricane Katrina. This taxing binge hasn't balanced the budget because state expenditures have ballooned by $8 billion, or about 45%, in six years. Mr. Corzine is nonetheless sticking to his story that state schools and services are underfunded.

The real New Jersey story is that a rising cost of living and taxes have spurred an exodus of businesses, high net worth individuals and working families. U.S. Census Bureau data indicate that, in 2004 alone, 60,000 more people left New Jersey than moved in. This outmigration led to a loss of $1 billion per year in the state's personal income, according to IRS statistics analyzed by the Manhattan Institute. Thus New Jersey finds itself in a spiral down: Taxes are raised, more taxpayers flee so the tax base shrinks, the politicians raise taxes again, and the cycle repeats itself.

Political history is also repeating itself here. Sixteen years ago Jim Florio was elected Governor and pushed through the largest tax hike in Jersey history. The economy sputtered, and Mr. Florio was dumped by voters in favor of Republican Christine Todd Whitman and a veto-proof GOP legislature. Undeterred, Mr. Corzine is testing the same tax, spend and don't elect theory. Which is why things are getting ugly among Democrats in Trenton.

ONE YEAR LATER… Show Africa The Money (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

After pledging to double aid by 2010, rich nations' promises are looking hollow.

DOJ_NMG_0037846

IS A PROMISE WORTH ANYTHING if there are no consequences to breaking it? That's a question worth pondering as we near the one-year anniversary of the Group of 8 summit in Gleneagles, Scotland.

Gleneagles was not an ordinary powwow for the club of industrialized nations. It came amid an unprecedented international campaign under the slogan "Make Poverty History," complete with Live Aid rock concerts and a drive by leaders such as British Prime Minister Tony Blair to persuade wealthy countries to boost their aid to Africa. It all paid off, or so it seemed. Rich nations signed a historic pact to forgive the debts of some of the world's most impoverished countries, and at the summit they vowed to double aid to Africa by 2010 and work toward ending the damaging subsidies and tariffs that strangle Third World economies.

A year later, the Gleneagles promises are already starting to look hollow. The debt-relief agreement has largely been a success, but G-8 countries are far off track on their aid commitments and even further from a comprehensive trade deal.

In 2005, the same year they made their pledge, G-8 countries increased their aid to sub-Saharan Africa by $1.6 billion, according to a report by DATA, the poverty-awareness organization founded by rock star Bono. But to get on track to meet their summit pledge, a boost of more than $3 billion would have been in order. Some countries are bigger laggards than others. Italy made a whopping promise at Gleneagles, committing to increase African aid from $1.2 billion in 2004 to $5.5 billion in 2010 — yet in 2005, it gave only an additional $26 million. That's at least better than Germany, which actually reduced aid to Africa last year.

Of course, most countries had already passed their 2005 budgets before the Gleneagles summit; the numbers from 2006 will be a better indicator of their seriousness. The United States, at least, is poised for a healthy increase in aid to Africa this year, mostly via the president's bilateral AIDS initiative.

On the trade front, the G-8 countries committed to eliminate all export subsidies, cut other domestic supports and improve access to their markets for poor countries. All this was supposed to be accomplished by the World Trade Organization during its Doha round of talks. Doha is desperately, perhaps fatally, stalled. Trade ministers started a new session Thursday in Geneva with the hope of reaching a deal by July 31, but the key players are miles apart.

DATA vows annual updates on progress toward the G-8 goals, but its reach is limited. What's needed is a high-level panel to monitor G-8 members and loudly embarrass nations that don't live up to their commitments. The world has had enough empty promises; the poor need genuine action.

TERRORISM NEWS:

GOP Seeks Advantage In Ruling On Trials (WP)

National Security Is Likely Rallying Cry, Leaders Indicate

DOJ_NMG_0037849

Republicans yesterday looked to wrest a political victory from a legal defeat in the Supreme Court, serving notice to Democrats that they must back President Bush on how to try suspects at Guantanamo Bay or risk being branded as weak on terrorism.

In striking down the military commissions Bush sought for trials of suspected members of al-Qaeda and other terrorist groups, the high court Thursday invited Congress to establish new rules and put the issue prominently before the public four months before the midterm elections. As the White House and lawmakers weighed next steps, House GOP leaders signaled they are ready to use this week's turn of events as a political weapon.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) criticized House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's comment Thursday that the court decision "affirms the American ideal that all are entitled to the basic guarantees of our justice system." That statement, Boehner said, amounted to Pelosi's advocating "special privileges for terrorists."

Similar views ricocheted around conservative talk radio -- Rush Limbaugh called Pelosi's comments "deranged" on his show Thursday -- and Republican strategists said they believed that the decision presented Bush a chance to put Democrats on the spot while uniting a Republican coalition that lately has been splintered on immigration, spending and other issues.

"It would be good politics to have a debate about this if Democrats are going to argue for additional rights for terrorists," said Terry Nelson, a prominent GOP political strategist who was political director for Bush's reelection campaign in 2004.

Mindful of this thinking, Democrats were measured in their comments about how to respond to the ruling, which held that Bush's policy was not authorized by law and violated the Geneva Conventions.

Brendan Daly, Pelosi's spokesman, said Democrats "want to work with" the administration in fashioning new rules for terrorism suspects, and he dismissed Boehner's comments as a sign of desperation. "[Bush] is not a king -- he has to follow the law," Daly said. "That's all we're saying."

Democrats seemed to gain some support from a few Senate Republicans, who said politics should not dictate how Congress responds to the Supreme Court. "This should not be a party fight," said Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.). "I'm a proud Republican senator, but my nation needs both parties working in collaboration with the executive branch to solve the military commission problem, and both parties will be rewarded by the public if we're seen as working for the common good."

The issue is not without complexity for Republicans. A Washington Post-ABC poll this week suggested that while Americans continue to favor holding suspects at the U.S. military installation at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, they are leery of an administration policy that has resulted in almost all of the 450 detainees being held without charges. Of those polled, 71 percent said the detainees should be either given POW status or charged with a crime.

In many respects, the Guantanamo Bay facility has become an albatross for the Bush administration since its creation in the months after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks as a prison for terrorism suspects picked up in Afghanistan and elsewhere. Bush signed an executive order in November 2001 establishing military commissions to try the inmates, but the process has been in a legal limbo and no suspect has gone through a full trial.

Meanwhile, the United States has attracted intense international criticism for holding the detainees in limbo, and Bush has said repeatedly that he wants to close the prison.

Some lawmakers want Congress to endorse a plan to have the commissions operate by the rules of a regular court-martial, which would give the detainees more rights than they would have under the current commission structure. But administration lawyers have been concerned that it would be difficult to win convictions under that scenario, in large measure because the standard of proof would be higher.

White House spokeswoman Dana M. Perino said the administration is reviewing how to respond to the court.

A senior administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the issue is still being debated internally, seemed to hint at the potential political implications in Congress. "Members of both parties will have to decide whether terrorists who cherish the killing of innocents deserve the same protections as our men and women who wear the uniform," this official said.

The House and Senate Armed Services committees and the Senate Judiciary Committee have called for hearings as soon as Congress returns from the week-long Fourth of July break.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) yesterday outlined his plan to conduct military tribunals in a manner consistent with the court's decision.

Under the Specter bill, a three-judge panel of military lawyers would preside. Defendants would be present in court with their lawyers, who would be granted the right to gather evidence, cross-examine witnesses and review classified information after it had been reviewed by a judge. Defendants would be granted the right to appeal verdicts to a court of military appeals and, ultimately, the Supreme Court.

DOJ_NMG_0037850

"I would suggest that the rhetoric be cooled at least long enough for people to read the opinion," Specter said of the Supreme Court decision. "We're going to have to dot all the i's and cross all the t's on this legislation to make sure it passes muster."

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), a key figure on detainee policy, noted that the court pointedly ruled that military tribunals had to comport with the Geneva Conventions, so any effort to simply grant Bush the power he wants would not pass the scrutiny of the court. If Republicans ignore the court's prescription, military lawyers would be quick to speak out, granting Democrats political cover, he predicted.

"That kind of excess, I think, backfires," Levin said of the House Republican broadsides. "The American public has too much common sense to put much stock in that kind of diatribe. Americans respect the Supreme Court."

But some GOP allies said they suspect that the decision will help energize a Republican base that has been angry at some Bush policies. Tom Liddy, a conservative talk show host in Phoenix, said that the decision has been a big topic on his show and that it could be another terrorism issue that works to the GOP's advantage.

Liddy noted that House Republicans pushed through a resolution Thursday, over Democratic objections, criticizing the news media for publishing classified information about a secret anti-terrorism program that monitors bank transactions.

"It will be worse for the Democrats to be seen as favoring the terrorists than favoring the New York Times," Liddy said.

Tribunals Ruling Could Reverberate In Fall Campaign (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon And Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Many Republicans predict that despite the White House's legal defeat over military tribunals, President Bush will emerge as the political winner among security-conscious voters.

A day after the Supreme Court's ruling that the Bush administration's special tribunals were unlawful, Republicans sought to score points for the president. Conservative legal activists charged Democrats with excessive celebration of the decision, and said they would alienate voters. House Majority Leader John Boehner accused Democrats of supporting "special privileges for terrorists."

For their part, a number of Democratic lawmakers suggested that voters are likely to be frustrated with how the administration has handled the Guantanamo Bay detention center, which has provoked resentment in Europe and elsewhere since its establishment in 2002.

The court ruling's political ripples could be significant in this fall's midterm congressional elections. In recent weeks, Mr. Bush appeared to gain political momentum, thanks to a series of positive developments in Iraq. But the ruling could remind voters of the mistakes and overreaching that have dogged the administration's war effort.

White House allies made the case that the decision would remind voters that Mr. Bush and Republicans have been tougher on terrorism than Democrats.

"Anytime the president is discussing keeping Americans safe and taking the fight to the terrorists, that's a good place for us to be politically," said Brian Jones, spokesman for the Republican National Committee. In the wake of the decision, "the judicial realities and the political realities are very different," he added.

Republicans even appeared to hold out hope that the decision would set the stage for a legislative victory for the president, as Congress moves to bless a new tribunal plan. If the effort ends in a stalemate, Democrats could be depicted as taking the side of those suspected of terrorism.

Mr. Bush and his party have reason to believe they can gain ground politically from the Guantanamo decision -- or at least not lose much. In November 2005, a Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll asked whether the Bush administration has "taken the right course" or "gone too far" in its handling of terror suspects at facilities outside the U.S. A 55% majority said the administration has taken "the right course," while 30% said the administration has "gone too far." Just three months ago, a Wall Street Journal/NBC News survey showed two-thirds of respondents support the administration's handling of the USA Patriot Act.

Critics scoff at the idea that Mr. Bush and congressional Republicans can gain mileage from a Supreme Court decision that repudiated their position.

Neal Katyal, a Georgetown University law professor who argued the case, said Friday the special tribunals appeared to be based first and foremost on political considerations -- namely, expanding presidential powers while appearing tough on terror. But the tribunal system's design so exceeded legal bounds that it undermined both aims, he said.

Lawmakers in both parties had previously submitted bills that would have authorized military commissions, but the White House repeatedly rejected calls to embrace legislation, fearing it would expose prisoner policies to congressional interference. After the high court's decision, lawmakers dusted off their bills. Both Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R.,

Pa.) and ranking Democrat, Patrick Leahy of Vermont, circulated copies of legislation to authorize military trials, using the regular court-martial code as a starting point.

Not all lawmakers saw it as a partisan issue. "I'm optimistic that Republicans and Democrats can come up with a solution to the military commission problem, in conjunction with the administration, that the nation will be proud of," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.). The current Uniform Code of Military Justice, which governs courts-martial, "will be your basic source document," he said, with "necessary changes" to protect sensitive evidence.

Rep. Adam Schiff, (D., Calif.). a member of the House Judiciary Committee, introduced Guantanamo-related legislation in 2001. On Friday, he recalled frustrating meetings with Defense, Justice and State department officials, who brushed off entreaties to develop legislation for military trials.

Like other Democrats, Mr. Schiff said Republicans faced hurdles in winning political points on the matter. The Supreme Court's opinion "continues to make the case that the administration is not competently handling the war on terror."

Mr. Specter has scheduled a July 11 hearing on the Hamdan decision.

Congress Tackles The Guantanamo Challenge (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

Lawmakers could OK Bush's setup or create a whole new system for handling detainees.

WASHINGTON — Key lawmakers moved Friday to begin creating a military justice process to determine the fate of Guantanamo detainees, a day after the Supreme Court wiped out the special tribunals established by the Bush administration.

Under the justices' ruling, Congress — which has largely stayed on the sidelines in shaping the war on terrorism — must take the lead role in implementing the most important legal decision affecting terrorism suspects since Sept. 11.

"I think we are under duty to move very, very promptly, because these people have been detained a long time," said Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.). "The court has told us what to do."

Members of Congress, and especially its GOP leadership, will have to figure out whether they must grant detainees more rights and protections than they currently have, or whether they can legislatively duplicate the restrictive approach the Bush administration prefers.

The debate is expected to dominate the congressional agenda for the coming months, and is likely to fuel a partisan confrontation over whether the United States has gone too far on some fronts in conducting its war on terrorism.

Specter has scheduled hearings on the detainee issue for July 11, the first day Congress is back in session after the Fourth of July recess. The House Armed Services Committee also announced hearings for this month; other relevant committees are expected to follow.

Thursday's decision in Hamdan vs. Rumsfeld said the tribunals established by the Bush administration for detainees at the military's Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, facility do not comply with existing law. The high court wrote that it is up to Congress to create a judicial review process for the detainees that comports with the Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Geneva Convention.

But the decision left several questions that now fall to Congress to answer.

One is whether the administration's system of military tribunals — or commissions, as the Pentagon calls them — would be legal if formally approved by Congress.

Simply asking Congress to OK the policy — which limits detainees' access to the evidence against them, permits testimony and evidence obtained by coercion, and provides limited opportunity for review or appeal — appeared Friday to be the approach favored by the White House.

"It looks like there's considerable interest in Congress in … making sure that we can proceed with military commissions and bring to justice the people who are held at Guantanamo," White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters en route to Memphis, Tenn., with the president aboard Air Force One.

Another option open to Congress is to pass a law stating that the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which provides many more rights and legal safeguards for defendants, applies to the Guantanamo detainees.

"It's clear the court wants us to operate under the Uniform Code of Military Justice," Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said on NBC News.

"I'm confident we will do that, and quickly."

A third option would be to create an entirely new system specifically for prisoners held as part of the administration's global war on terrorism.

That is closer to the approach favored by Specter, who has been working on legislation that would create two types of special tribunals. One would determine detainees' legal status, including whether they are properly being classified as enemy combatants. The second system would establish rules and procedures for trying detainees accused of war crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0037852

Specter's committee held a hearing on the issue of the Guantanamo detainees last year.

"The Department of Defense had been trying to do as little as possible. They had delayed action on detainees for a long period of time while this case has been percolating," Specter said. "We have addressed not only those who are going to be charged with criminal offenses, but also the detainees who are enemy combatants."

Another set of questions concerns whether the Supreme Court ruling has ramifications for other administration policies, such as the detention of prisoners by the U.S. elsewhere in the world, as well as the legality of the president's terrorism surveillance programs.

Specter said he thought the Hamdan decision could call into question the legality of a number of Bush administration policies.

The White House has argued that the president's inherent authority as commander in chief — along with Congress' 2001 authorization to use military force against terrorists — grant him extensive powers to decide how to conduct the war on terrorism, including how to treat detainees and what kinds of surveillance are necessary.

"The decision that the president lacked the authority to establish the military commissions makes it obvious that the conclusion of the Supreme Court is that there is no inherent authority — an inference and a proposition which may have some weight as we consider collateral matters, for example, on the electronic surveillance" conducted by the National Security Agency, Specter said Thursday.

Though the Supreme Court decision may be a blow to the president's policies, it may benefit his party politically — permitting candidates in November elections to talk tough about fighting terrorists and portray Democrats as weak.

For instance, a memo circulated Friday by the office of House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) accused Democrats of welcoming a Supreme Court decision granting "special privileges to terrorists."

"There is a clear choice between Capitol Hill Democrats who celebrate offering special privileges to violent terrorists, and Republicans who want the president to have the necessary tools to prosecute and achieve victory in the global war on terror," the memo said.

In response, Democrats have begun to develop their own line of argument, asserting that the Hamdan case raises doubts about the administration's competence on terrorism and protection of the U.S.

"The American people increasingly question this administration's credibility when it comes to national security. They have promulgated reckless policies that endangered the country and destroyed America's reputation around the world," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and director of the Senate Democrats' "war room" for responding to Republican charges.

"The chickens have finally come home to roost," he said.

Congress Implored To Resolve Tribunals (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, July 1, 2006

The White House yesterday said the Guantanamo Bay prison will remain open until all the detainees are dealt with, and the administration will work with Congress to remedy problems the Supreme Court cited when it ruled special military tribunals were illegally created.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Congress is interested in ensuring the more than 400 detainees at the naval facility in Cuba are brought to justice or sent home.

"You close it when you finish handling all the cases of people who are at Guantanamo," Mr. Snow said, responding to a question about Mr. Bush's stated goal of closing the jail that holds al Qaeda and Taliban prisoners picked up in the war on terror.

"And as we've said many times, you don't simply shut it down. There are some people who you do not want on American soil, who you want to go ahead and conclude the process of bringing them to justice, and repatriating those to whom it is appropriate to repatriate."

The Supreme Court ruled 5-3 on Thursday that a pending military tribunal for Yemeni national Salim Ahmed Hamdan, chauffeur to al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, could not proceed because its structure and procedures violated the Uniform Code of Military Justice and four Geneva Conventions signed in 1949.

The court said Mr. Bush lacked the authority to create the tribunals, which offer lesser legal protections than already established courts-martial rules, but that Congress could authorize the use of tribunals.

"There's considerable interest in Congress in going ahead and taking a good look at what the Supreme Court had to say and moving forward toward making sure we can proceed with military commissions ...," Mr. Snow said.

DOJ_NMG_0037853

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, introduced a bill Thursday that would authorize the tribunals, legislation that will generate heated debate between Republicans and Democrats heading into midterm elections.

Democrats and civil rights groups, who have questioned the president's power to detain and try prisoners, praised the ruling Thursday.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, called the decision "a stunning repudiation of the Bush administration's lawless behavior at Guantanamo."

A senior administration official said nothing in the ruling affected the president's authority to detain enemy combatants, and that it didn't find any constitutional impediment to the president and the Congress creating military commissions.

Saying the country has a long history and tradition of using military tribunals, the official said the court recognized that military commissions would be appropriate as long as the procedures used are consistent with its decision.

Warner Is Uncertain On Legislation For Tribunals (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 30 — A leading Senate Republican said Friday that he was not sure that Congress should pass legislation to create new military tribunals for terror suspects, a stance that raised doubts about prospects for a White House plan to establish an alternative to the commissions struck down this week by the Supreme Court.

The senator, John W. Warner of Virginia, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said he had not yet decided what course Congress should take. But Mr. Warner, who will preside over hearings on the issue in July, said he was concerned that new tribunals, even if authorized by Congress, might not withstand judicial scrutiny.

"We're going to do this extremely carefully and accurately, or we're going to end up with a solution that once again ends up being the subject of litigation, and possibly being overturned," Mr. Warner said in an interview in his office.

The scope of the court's decision stunned the White House and Congress, forcing the House and Senate to rearrange their limited summer legislative calendar to address the issue. Lawmakers from both parties said Friday that they hoped to reach agreement by the end of summer on a new plan to bring terror suspects to trial.

But the caution voiced by Mr. Warner suggested signs of division, even among Republicans, about how to balance concerns about the threat posed by terrorism with the court's requirements that detainees must be granted some basic rights.

President Bush has said only that he intends to work with Congress, but he and his allies appear to be pressing for a law that would give the president the authority to set up something similar to the tribunals the court ruled he could not set up on his own.

Still, others within the president's own party have cautioned that the court's ruling made clear that any trials had to extend more rights than those tribunals offered. Some lawmakers suggested using the military courts or something similar, an approach the White House has rejected as granting too many rights to detainees.

"Everybody says, 'Pass legislation, pass legislation,' but we've got to make certain it's needed, and then do it with careful analysis, to get it right," Mr. Warner said. "We've got to get it right."

Until now, the White House and particularly Vice President Dick Cheney had been dead set against working with Congress on issues involving the detainees, against the advice of some Republicans and some administration lawyers. By waiting until the court forced the issue, the White House may have made its task more difficult, leaving Mr. Bush with less support in Congress than he had after the attacks of Sept. 11.

Democrats and some Republicans characterize the president's refusal to work with Congress on the tribunals as another example in a long line of presidential power grabs.

"Their whole unilateral approach made it more difficult for everybody here, and we're going to have to pick up these pieces," said Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee. "It would have been a lot easier if they had not ignored the Congress and not behaved as if they are the law unto themselves."

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said: "This is the gang that couldn't shoot straight. Had they simply gone to Congress at the time, they could have gotten anything they wanted. Because they are so headstrong, they can only do it their way, they run into brick walls.'"

Even some Republicans expressed irritation that the White House had refused to work with Congress.

"They had been trying to do as little as possible," said Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania and chairman of the Judiciary Committee, which will also hold hearings on the issue in July. Mr. Specter had offered legislation to set up a process of trials as early as 2002, but was rebuffed.

"They just delayed action on detainees for a long period of time while this case was percolating," Mr. Specter said.

Mr. Warner and Mr. Levin said they wanted to broaden the discussion of how to treat detainees beyond the tight circle the White House had relied on, in particular to include the military. The hearings, Mr. Warner said, will rely on sitting and retired judge advocates general from each military branch. In the past, he said, those military lawyers "didn't get a full voice."

A senior Senate Republican aide, granted anonymity to speak freely about the internal debates, said, "It's clear that the administration was eager to push the envelope as far as it could by setting up these tribunals without legislative authority. They got a brushback from the Supreme Court, and now the Senate is struggling with whether or not to side with the administration's original approach or something else."

Members of both parties said they wanted to work with the president, and hoped that the gravity of the issue would trump politics. But the hearings come at a difficult political moment, with Democrats hoping to take back the majority in both houses of Congress in November.

The Democrats could try to make the hearings a referendum on what Senator Edward M. Kennedy characterized as the administration's "lawless" treatment of detainees. But Republicans were already seizing the opportunity to paint Democrats as weak on terror.

A news release from the office of the House majority leader, Representative John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio, seized on comments by the minority leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California, saying that the Supreme Court decision "reaffirms the American ideal that all are entitled the basic guarantees of our justice system." The headline read, "Capitol Hill Democrats Advocate Special Privileges for Terrorists."

In the range of options that lawmakers discussed, tribunals or military commissions would grant detainees the fewest rights, and civilian courts, the most. Courts-martial fall somewhere in the middle, granting a streamlined bill of rights, but allowing looser rules of evidence than civilian courts. Conviction requires agreement of three-quarters of the jury, not the entire panel, and the jury is typically made up of officers, who tend to have college degrees.

Mr. Specter filed legislation immediately after the court's decision Thursday, proposing military commissions overseen by a three-member panel, with at least one judge advocate general. The proposal would grant counsel to the accused and allow cross-examination in some cases, but it would also relax the evidence standards to include hearsay, recognizing the difficulty of collecting evidence against accused terrorists. Mr. Specter's proposal would also provide standards to protect classified evidence.

Mr. Levin said the Senate was unlikely to sign off on tribunals if they looked like what the president initially wanted because the courts ruled that they violated provisions in the Geneva Conventions and the military code of justice.

"There are certain guideposts that put limits on this," he said. "Unless we amend prior statutes, which I don't think we're inclined to do, we're governed by the law of war."

A senior administration official said the White House was "likely to seek legislation on the tribunal issue."

That approach got support from Senator Lindsey Graham, the South Carolina Republican who with Mr. Levin and Mr. Warner called for hearings on the detainee issue.

Mr. Graham picked up on the court's statement that "nothing prevents the president from returning to Congress to seek the authority he believes necessary."

"The court is telling us that we can create a court," Mr. Graham said in an interview. "The court said the defect was that Congress never blessed it. We'll correct that defect."

"It's highly inappropriate to use civilian courts to try enemy combatants," he said. "This is a war. It's dangerous, it's a joke. The military tribunal has been the convention in the time of war."

The White House has considered military courts unpalatable because of the due process they afford. Officials there said Friday that they were generally against leaving the combatants to the military justice system, not only for its degree of due process but also for strict standards of evidence to which prosecutors are required to adhere.

Supreme Court Ruling May Ripple Through Other Bush Policies (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay, Marisa Taylor And Margaret Talev

Knight Ridder, July 1, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Supreme Court's ruling Thursday that the Bush administration can't use ad hoc military commissions to try suspected terrorists may have sweeping implications for other aspects of President Bush's war on terror.

The court's decision has ignited a fierce debate about its full impact among lawyers, legal scholars, administration officials and members of Congress.

Some believe that the opinion could challenge the administration's claim the National Security Agency is the right to eavesdrop without court approval on Americans who are suspected of having ties to al-Qaida or other terrorist groups.

DOJ_NMG_0037855

The high court's embrace of a central provision of the Geneva Conventions on war could also bolster challenges to U.S. interrogation techniques and the use of secret prisons to detain suspected terrorists. It also could help detainees who are being held without charges, lawyers or trials contest their situations, experts said.

"At this point, almost everything that could be affected by the decision is going to come to a screeching halt," said Neal Sonnett, the chair of the American Bar Association's task force on enemy combatants, referring to the treatment of detainees.

"There is clearly a shot across the bow of the administration," said Scott Silliman, a professor at Duke University Law School and a former senior Air Force lawyer. "The opinion here has clear implications for the court being willing to look at how we are treating folks."

At its heart, legal experts said, the ruling rebuffed Bush's contention that the president has special powers during wartime to disregard acts of Congress and international treaties.

"I think the court's ruling is a rejection of the administration's post 9/11 legal centerpiece claim, which is the president has inherent authority in all kinds of things in the name of crisis," said Neal Katyal, the lead attorney who argued the case on behalf of detainee and plaintiff Salim Ahmed Hamdan.

"One of the potential implications is that the `inherent authority' argument pushed by the executive branch may be in retreat," agreed Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., in an interview with McClatchy Newspapers on Friday.

The administration has contended since the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks that the Constitution gives the president as commander in chief "inherent authority" to do virtually anything he wants in the name of protecting national security in time of war. The court emphatically ruled that Congress and the judiciary share authority with the executive, even in time of war.

At the same time, the court held that Congress could write a law creating new tribunals to try detainees, so long as they operate within a civil or military legal code, and leading senators intend to do so soon.

In an interview Friday with McClatchy Newspapers, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said he doesn't take the court's ruling to mean that those already being held would be off the hook simply because their rights were found to have been violated.

"They can argue that," he said, "but I think there's a basis for detaining them if they're dangerous" so long as Congress passes legislation "very promptly". "They're not going to be released," Specter said. "We'll be given time to structure a procedure that is adequate."

Specter's offering a bill that would authorize military commissions to handle detainees with two divisions - one for those charged with specific offenses and another for enemy combatants who are being held indefinitely.

Those charged would face three-officer panels with presiding judges from the Judge Advocate General's Office. They'd be entitled to cross-examination witnesses and to require unanimous verdicts. If classified information was involved, the presiding judge would decide how much information to make available to the defense, and the defendant's attorney could get a security clearance to handle that classified information.

Graham agreed that the court's ruling "confirms that the military can hold these people until the hostilities are over . . . The case was about how you bring them to trial, not how you hold them. Anybody who says detainees are going to get off the hook because of this ruling are misunderstanding the opinion, in my opinion."

"The good news," Graham said, "is we now know how to write the statute to make it constitutional and to be able to move the cases forward."

Legal experts cautioned that analysis of the complex 5-3 decision was preliminary, because they'd only had a day to distill it. But overall, there was widespread agreement that the decision could spell more legal trouble for the administration's war on terror.

The majority decision, written by Justice John Paul Stevens, concluded that the administration's Guantanamo Bay tribunals violated both U.S. law and the Geneva Conventions of 1949 because they didn't provide defendants with legal safeguards that civilian and military courts require and they weren't authorized by Congress.

The justices cited Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which calls for "regularly constituted" courts to handle cases involving detainees. Article 3 prohibits torture and other "degrading treatment."

Some legal scholars said that could encourage current and former detainees to bring cases against the government for employing harsh interrogation techniques at Guantanamo Bay and other U.S.-run prisons.

Experts said that at the very least, the Pentagon would have to ensure that interrogation techniques set out in a new Army field manual now being drafted would have to conform with the Geneva Conventions.

"Anything basically that we wouldn't want done to our own troops - it's now prohibited," said John Hutson, the dean of the Franklin Pierce Law Center and a former Navy Judge Advocate General.

Some administration supporters predicted that the ruling would undermine public support for the president's claim of special wartime powers.

DOJ_NMG_0037856

"It's a major setback for the president. The advocates of diminishing his office now have a powerful public relations tool to say that the most powerful court in the land has said he is a law breaker," said Douglas Kmiec, a professor of constitutional law at Pepperdine University Law School and a legal counsel for former presidents George H.W. Bush and Ronald Reagan.

Tribunal Ruling's Wider Impact Still Unclear (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

Thursday's Supreme Court decision could affect the way the U.S. treats all its detainees, even senior operatives of Al Qaeda.

WASHINGTON — For Salim Ahmed Hamdan, the Yemeni who was at the center of Thursday's Supreme Court ruling on military tribunals at Guantanamo Bay, the future is a bit clearer: He must receive a trial with new, congressionally approved procedures.

But the landmark 5-3 decision may also have a significant impact on hundreds of other detainees at Guantanamo, as well as an unknown number picked up by U.S. forces and held in undisclosed locations around the world.

The high court's finding that the Geneva Convention covers terrorism detainees — from young men who claim to have been mere cooks for anti-U.S. forces to Sept. 11 plotter Khalid Shaikh Mohammed — could lead to sweeping changes in the way they are treated, according to legal experts and advocates for those held. The ruling could give Guantanamo prisoners a day in a U.S. court, and senior Al Qaeda operatives being held as U.S. captives visits from the Red Cross.

Administration lawyers argue this kind of interpretation is too broad, insisting the decision only applies to Hamdan and a limited group at Guantanamo: the nine other detainees who have been charged with war crimes and 40 to 80 more who are in the pipeline to face similar charges.

"Certainly, this court's decision is limited to the case before it," argued one senior administration official who spoke on condition of anonymity in keeping with the rules of his job.

Others within the administration, however, have been more circumspect, declining to speculate on whether the Geneva Convention now applies to all detainees being held at Guantanamo and at other prisons overseas.

"That's something we're studying, and will be studying," said another senior administration official.

President Bush decided in February 2002 that Al Qaeda was not covered by the Geneva Convention and that Taliban fighters did not qualify as prisoners of war. Bush also determined that a Geneva Convention provision known as Common Article 3 — which applies to conflicts such as civil wars where the adversaries are not recognized nations — was invalid when it came to the global war on terrorism.

In the court's majority opinion, Justice John Paul Stevens found that Bush's rationale was erroneous.

While Common Article 3 provides fewer safeguards than other portions of the Geneva Convention, it does prohibit the "passing of sentences" without a judgment from "a regularly constituted court affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples."

The article also holds that a humanitarian agency, such as the Red Cross, may be called to ensure that the Geneva protections are being obeyed, although the provision is not mandatory.

Officially, the Justice Department said Friday that it had yet to make a determination on just how broadly the decision would be applied.

"The administration is still in the process of reviewing the opinion to determine what impact it may have outside the Hamdan case," said Brian Roehrkasse, a department spokesman.

The ramifications could be significant. The nearly 400 Guantanamo detainees who are not headed toward war crimes trials like Hamdan's are subject to annual status hearings that determine whether they are still a threat or whether they are useful for intelligence purposes.

Advocates for those detainees have argued that those hearings — which are conducted by a panel of three midlevel U.S. military officers without legal representation for the detainees — are illegal because they do not conform to the rules of evidence and procedure that exist in normal military courts.

"This opinion is a green light for those held at Guantanamo who are not held on a military commission basis," said Bill Goodman, legal director for the Center for Constitutional Rights, which has filed legal claims for nearly all Guantanamo detainees. "It allows them to go to court and see the evidence."

Lawyers for these Guantanamo detainees have filed dozens of cases in federal court to force the government to defend its reasons for holding them.

DOJ_NMG_0037857

These habeas corpus cases have been on hold as the Hamdan case made its way through the courts, awaiting both a determination on whether the Geneva Convention applies to them, as well as a ruling on whether habeas corpus requests from Guantanamo had been made illegal by a law passed last year.

As part of the Hamdan decision, Stevens wrote that cases filed before the 2005 law was passed were free to move forward. Goodman said he believed the ruling eventually would allow all Guantanamo detainees to have a hearing in federal courts.

Of potentially more consequence is the ruling's impact on Al Qaeda detainees who are not being held at Guantanamo, who are believed to include Mohammed and Ramzi Binalshibh, an Al Qaeda operative involved in planning the 2001 attacks.

Harold Koh, dean of Yale Law School and a former assistant secretary of State for human rights, said the Geneva Convention wording in the decision appeared to cover all Al Qaeda prisoners — including these "ghost detainees" widely believed held by the CIA. If so, they would come under Common Article 3's protections, including its suggestion of visits from the Red Cross.

"Nobody should be detained in the course of a conflict who is not vetted by the Red Cross," Koh said. "If the government is acting prudently under this ruling, they would be granting them Geneva rights."

The Red Cross is unique in that it is specifically mentioned in the Geneva Convention as the organization responsible for independent monitoring of international rules.

The International Committee of the Red Cross has been requesting access to "ghost detainees" for several years, most recently during a May trip to Washington by its president, Jakob Kellenberger, who personally made the case to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Spokesman Simon Schorno said the Red Cross would not comment on how the Hamdan case would affect its petition to the Bush administration, but added, "We certainly welcome any development that leads to a clarification of the future of the detainees held at Guantanamo Bay."

Schorno said the Pentagon had allowed the Red Cross access to all detainees at Guantanamo since January 2002, and it also had visited those held at Bagram Air Base in Afghanistan. As of May, the organization said it was in contact with 560 detainees at Bagram.

Because the war in Iraq has always been covered by the Geneva Convention, the Red Cross has been given wide latitude to visit prisoners there. Between January and March of this year, the committee visited about 14,000 detainees in Iraq. Those believed held by the CIA, however, have remained off-limits.

"We still have not obtained access to an unknown number of persons captured and held by the U.S. in undisclosed locations," Schorno said.

Experts: Ruling Weakens Bush Spying Plan (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP2, July 1, 2006

A Supreme Court ruling striking down military commissions seriously weakens the foundation of the Bush administration's domestic surveillance program, critics said Friday.

A congressional resolution President Bush relied on in creating commissions is a key rationale for the National Security Agency to listen in on phone calls without first obtaining a judge's permission.

The court "reinforces our view that the NSA operation was unlawful," said George Washington University law professor Jonathan Turley. "The Supreme Court cut away the administration's principal legal argument for the NSA operation — the congressional resolution following Sept. 11."

Enacted a week after the Sept. 11 attacks, the congressional Authorization for Use of Military Force resolution cannot be seen as authorization for military commissions, the court ruled.

In January, the Justice Department invoked the resolution 92 times in a 42-page paper designed to quell the outcry that the White House had broken the law with its program of warrantless surveillance. A centerpiece in the administration's counter-attack against its critics, the DOJ entitled the white paper "Legal Authorities Supporting the Activities of the National Security Agency Described By the President."

Asked about the NSA program, a Justice Department official said after the ruling that "I don't think the court had before it any other broader issues concerning the scope of the Authorization for Use of Military Force, except it clearly did recognize that it activated the president's war powers."

The official said the implications of the decision beyond military commissions is "something that we are studying and will be studying." The official spoke on condition of anonymity because the matter is under review.

DOJ_NMG_0037858

In the aftermath of the high court's ruling, lawyers for the Bush administration asked a federal appeals court in Washington to order more briefing on the decision's effect on civil lawsuits filed on behalf of hundreds of detainees held at the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The NSA program faces a court challenge and the Supreme Court ruling "gives new vigor to arguments that the administration does not have the power it says it has," said Anthony Romero, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union.

Romero said the language in Justice Anthony Kennedy's concurring opinion against military commissions "almost could have been speaking about the NSA litigation," providing useful material for the ACLU's lawsuit against the warrantless surveillance.

In the military commission case, the Supreme Court said the congressional resolution was insufficient.

The Authorization for Use of Military Force resolution says that "the president is authorized to use all necessary and appropriate force" to prevent future acts of international terrorism against the United States.

In Thursday's ruling Justice Kennedy wrote that "trial by military commission raises separation-of-powers concerns of the highest order."

"Located within a single branch, these courts carry the risk that offenses will be defined, prosecuted, and adjudicated by executive officials without independent review," Kennedy added.

It was the absence of any review that fueled the outrage against the Bush administration's warrantless surveillance.

The White House decided not to obtain orders from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court before eavesdropping on phone calls.

The Supreme Court setback for the White House comes amid a full frontal assault by the administration against The New York Times for revealing the existence of the NSA program as well as another secret government initiative accessing a huge databank of bank records.

The American Society of Newspaper Editors, responding to such criticism, said Friday that the Bush administration and some in Congress "are threatening America's bedrock values of free speech and free press with their attempts to demonize newspapers for fulfilling their constitutional role in our democratic society."

The ASNE said newspaper editors don't claim to be infallible. "However, the First Amendment makes it clear no person or branch of government has the prerogative to usurp any American's right to speak or print what he or she believes is important and relevant truth. We believe honorable debate would focus on the issues raised by the reporting, not on attacks on the truth-tellers," it said.

Justices Prove To Be No Lapdogs Of Bush (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir In Washington

Financial Times, July 1, 2006

The US Supreme Court that dealt a historic blow this week to the executive powers of the Bush administration was, ironically, a court dominated by Republicans, and headed by a brand new chief justice hand-picked by President George W. Bush.

Over the past nine months, Mr Bush has added two new conservatives to the nine-person court, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito. Both are viewed as friends of executive power. Ruling in a lower court on the same Guantánamo military tribunals case that was on Friday overturned in the Supreme Court, Justice Roberts voted to uphold the legality of military commissions. And Justice Alito was an outspoken proponent of executive power in wartime, before taking the bench.

So how could the government lose? The answer: Justice Anthony Kennedy, the moderate conservative who has emerged as the court's new swing justice. He holds the balance of power on the closely divided court, stepping into the shoes of Sandra Day O'Connor, who retired in January.

In the military tribunals case decided on Thursday, Justice Kennedy, appointed by President Ronald Reagan, voted with the court's liberal bloc to give Mr Bush a decisive rebuke. Chief Justice Roberts did not participate in the military tribunals case, because he ruled on it as a judge at the appeals court level. But even if he had done, it would not have made a difference thanks to Justice Kennedy.

This has not been the only case effectively decided by Justice Kennedy's vote during the current term, which ended on Thursday. In a critical case upholding the power of the federal government to regulate the environment, he joined the liberal bloc again, writing a separate opinion that denied his fellow conservatives the support they needed for a ruling that would have sharply circumscribed the scope of the federal Clean Water Act.

DOJ_NMG_0037859

And in a ruling involving the powers of the police, he wrote a middle-of-the-road opinion again restraining the conservative majority, which appeared bent on challenging the “exclusionary rule” that says law enforcement officers must forfeit evidence gained by illegal searches.

“If you can’t be chief justice, the next best thing to be is the swing vote,” says Randy Barnett, a constitutional law expert at Boston University law school.

Steven Shapiro, legal dir-ector of the American Civil Liberties Union, says: “Thus far, Roberts and Alito have pretty much performed as expected. But in the short run, at least, their votes may be less important on a range of critical issues than Justice Kennedy’s.”

Does that mean Justice Kennedy can be relied on to vote against the government in future cases inspired by this week’s Hamdan case? Perhaps in a challenge to the president’s warrantless wiretapping programme? Legal experts say it is too soon to tell. But one thing is clear: the new court is no lapdog of the Bush administration, and the new swing voter is no fan of unfettered executive power.

At Guantanamo, Dying Is Not Permitted (TIME)

By Adam Zagorin

Time, July 1, 2006

A TIME Investigation: The Supreme Court handed the prisoners at Gitmo a victory, but authorities there continue to use harsh methods to break one of their most common methods of protest — the hunger strike

The prisoners at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, won a major victory this week when the Supreme Court struck down the Bush administration's planned military tribunals. But for many prisoners at the detention facility, the protests haven't stopped. Hunger strikes persist, in what Guantanamo commander Rear Adm. Harry Harris, Jr. has called "asymmetric warfare" — a means to attract attention to their increasingly controversial detention. As a result, the camp's administrators have sought to keep prisoners alive at all cost — because a prisoner's death (as the U.S. found out three weeks ago, when three Gitmo inmates committed suicide) can be a major embarrassment for the U.S. and add fuel to widespread demands for the facility to be shut down.

Civil-liberties advocates point out that Guantanamo's 460 inmates have few other means to make their voices heard, given that most have been detained for more than four years without even being charged with a crime. Indeed, though the U.S. has condemned the hunger strikers at Gitmo, just last year the White House hailed a hunger-striking Iranian dissident for showing "that he is willing to die for his right to express his opinion."

At Gitmo, however, dead prisoners are something the U.S. military wishes devoutly to avoid. So force-feeding has been standard policy at the camp ever since hunger strikes began in early 2002. The facility's top physicians have also told TIME that prisoners who resist are subjected to especially harsh methods. In one case, according to medical records obtained by TIME, a 20-year old named Yusuf al-Shehri, jailed since he was 16, was regularly strapped into a specially designed feeding chair that immobilizes the body at the legs, arms, shoulders and head. Then a plastic tube that is 50% larger, and more painful to insert, than the commonly used variety was inserted up through his nose and down his throat, carrying a nutritional formula into his stomach.

Thousands of people, of course, endure some form of voluntary intra-nasal feeding every day in hospital settings. But when force-feeding is involuntary and the recipient is in a state of high anxiety, the muscles tense up and the procedure can trigger nausea, bleeding, diarrhea and vomiting. "We are humane and compassionate,"; Guantanamo commander Harris told TIME, "but if we tell a detainee to do something, we expect the detainee to do it." As a note scrawled in al-Shehri's medical records put it: "[The prisoner] was informed that dying is not permitted."

Before this year, the feeding chair — marketed as a "padded cell on wheels" by its Iowa manfacturer — was evidently used sparingly. In comments several months ago, SOUTHCOM commander Gen. Bantz Craddock, who oversees Gitmo, joked that at least hunger strikers got to choose the color of their feeding tube (yellow was a favorite), and the flavor of the lozenges used to soothe thoats irritated by the feeding tubes. "Look, they get choices," Craddock said at the time. "And that's part of the problem." At the peak of a protest last fall, 131 protesters, or more than 25%, were on hunger strikes.

But in January, say lawyers for the prisoners and other critics of conditions there, camp overseers finally got fed up with protesters undermining camp discipline and overtaxing the medical staff, who often had to spend 15 hours a day feeding obstreperous inmates. Dr. Ronald Sollock, the camp's chief physician, told TIME bluntly that gentler force-feeding techniques of the past were a"failure." He says that without being strapped down, some inmates would try to pull out their nasal tubes, and even strike medical personnel. Worse, some continued to lose weight, by forcing themselves to vomit after being force-fed."We had to take steps to prevent that, but we only do what is medically necessary in a humane and compassionate manner," says Sollock.

The tougher stance on feeding did have an effect on prisoners' willingness to go on hunger strikes."A lot of detainees said, 'I don't want to put up with this. This is too much of a hassle,'" says Craddock. Asked whether the new methods represented an"effective deterrent" to hunger striking, he answered,"Yeah."

Officially, force-feeding at Gitmo is done with a tube 3mm. (or about .1 in.) across, the same size used in American hospitals. In a sworn statement last year, Gitmo's top physician at the time, Dr. John Edmondson, noted that"smaller tubes which remained in the patient for longer periods were more comfortable [and] easier to manage for medical personnel."

Al-Shehri's medical records, however, document the use of the larger tubes, which experts say have no medical purpose in this context. Al-Shehri's lawyer has also filed court documents citing lesions and bleeding caused when guards held him by the chin and hair, strapped down, as a medical staffer"forcefully inserted the tube in his nose and down his throat" The lawyer also charges that al-Sherhri was subject to verbal and religious abuse during force-feeding, asserting that the tubes"were viewed by the detainees as objects of torture." The records also show that instead of leaving the tube in place to avoid the possible trauma of repeated insertions, al-Shehri had his introduced and withdrawn at each of his two daily feedings.

And this leads to another problem. According to al-Shehri's records and Gitmo doctors, a typical feeding lasts about two hours, with the inmate left in the restraint chair for roughly 45 minutes afterward. During the feeding period, the prisoner will receive as much as 1.5 liters of formula, which, in the case of hunger strikers, can be more than their stomachs can comfortably hold. This can produce what is euphemistically called "dumping syndrome," an uncomfortable, even painful bout of nausea, vomiting, bloating, diarrhea, and shortness of breath. And those are precisely the symptoms that al-Shehri and many other force-fed prisoners have reported to their lawyers.

In March, as a result of these allegations, more than 250 medical professionals signed an open letter to the British medical journal The Lancet, demanding an end to force-feeding. They cited the code of ethics of the American Medical Association and the World Medical Association, both of which condemn the force-feeding of prisoners as an assault on human dignity — so long as they're capable of making an informed decision not to eat. But that's the conundrum: How do you know what is an informed decision at Gitmo? Are detainees there, who are imprisoned in an isolated environment far from their families for an indefinite period, capable of making a rational and autonomous choice to starve themselves?

The code of ethics has been put to the test several times in the past, most notably during the 1980s, when several Irish Republican Army prisoners staged hunger strikes in British prisons. A handful died, and the episode was seen as evidence of Margaret Thatcher's toughness. At Gitmo, however, the death of a prisoner could ignite riots in the Muslim world. In that context, the Pentagon believes that keeping detainees alive at all costs is very much in the nation's security interest.

It's equally in the prisoners' interests to have someone die. According to Col Mike Bumgarner, who oversees the detention camps on a day-to-day basis, several prisoners have told him of a"vision, or a dream — implicitly a message from God — that if three detainees die it will attract enough attention so that they will all get out of Guantanamo." It needn't be by starvation: according to newly declassified docouments, two prisoners, one of whom was al-Shehri, tried to commit suicide on May 18 by swallowing hoarded anti-anxiety medication. Those attempts triggered a search, which in turn led to the most serious rioting in the history of Camp Delta. And on May 29, yet another round of hunger strikes began. It started with 75 prisoners, rose to 89 a few days later, and then suddenly began to fade away. Recent communications by Gitmo inmates with their lawyers, and obtained by TIME, indicate that harsh force-feeding methods were used to end the hunger strikes. The military has offered no explanation for the drop-off in hunger strikers.

Bumgarner has said the prisoners' objective is to push the number of strikers above 100, as they did last fall. But additional medical personnel are ready to be shipped in to force-feed them if they do. "We used to over-react, and the detainees saw that we got worried if they were not eating," he says."Now we have a system. I tell them, 'Have at it. If you want to have 460 hunger strikers, we'll get 460 doctors in here to take care of you.' They will not succeed."

Yet hunger strikers have already won a measure of success. In part because of their protests, and the attention focused on Guantanamo, the U.S. is facing growing criticism — from both allies and enemies — for the rules of detention at the camp. Now the Supreme Court's Hamdan decision effectively grants prisoners at least some of their longstanding demands, including more rights at trial. All the same, most of them are unlikely to be released soon. Indeed, authorities are currently constructing a new, state-of-the-art, $30 million prison at Guantanamo, where they plan to consolidate many of the camp's maximum-security inmates. Harris argues the camp will be needed for the forseeable future, and that refusing to eat is not a cry for help, but a ploy drawn from the al-Qaeda playbook calculated to attract media attention and force the U.S. government to back down."The will to resist of these detainees is high,' says Harris."They are waging their war, their jihad against America, and we just have to stop them."

A Blessing In Disguise For Bush (FT)

By Christopher Caldwell

DOJ_NMG_0037861

Financial Times, July 1, 2006

When the US Supreme Court ruled on Thursday that Salim Hamdan, Osama bin Laden's former driver and an alleged terrorist, could not be tried before a special commission set up at the US military prison in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, American newspapers described the rebuke to George W. Bush as "sweeping" and "stunning". Observers abroad, particularly in Europe, giddily suggested that Guantánamo had been discredited. In the drama of the moment, it was easy to lose sight of the court's insistence that the case neither questioned nor even addressed the US government's power to detain Mr Hamdan "for the duration of active hostilities". Since Guantánamo does not agitate US public opinion in the way that overseas sceptics of the war on terror would assume, the five-to-three decision will wreak no sea change in politics, nor harm Mr Bush. As November elections heave into view, it could just as easily help him.

There were three rationales for the decision – and all were necessary in order to reach it. The first – that of John Paul Stevens, the court's most leftwing justice – is that the tribunals are unconstitutional because of the nature of Guantánamo. These passages excited human rights activists, but Mr Stevens's language was measured and left open the possibility of finding another way to prosecute those imprisoned. Then, Justice Anthony Kennedy sought more assurance that the Guantánamo commissions were militarily necessary. Finally, Justice Stephen Breyer held that the system of military commissions was indeed unconstitutional, but primarily because Mr Bush had not consulted Congress first. This is a separation-of-powers argument rather than a human rights one. Mr Breyer noted that: "Nothing prevents the president from returning to Congress to seek the authority he believes necessary."

In fact, if Congress were to pass legislation re-establishing the very same courts just struck down, it is possible they would pass constitutional muster. Not for nothing did Senator Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, call the decision a "road map" for making the tribunals legal. It is striking how small some of the necessary adjustments would be. For instance, the court held that the Bush administration violated article 36 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which has been interpreted to say the rules of a special military commission ought, as far as possible, to resemble those of an ordinary court martial. The president would have been in a stronger constitutional position if he had made an "official determination that it is impracticable to apply the rules for court martial" in Guantánamo. Well, then, he can make one.

Not much is at stake anyway in setting courtroom rules for cases such as Mr Hamdan's. He can still be tried under a court martial or he can be tried in US criminal courts. American juries can be fickle but they are less so when they are invited to try foreign enemies of the state. The former anti-American strongman of Panama, Manuel Antonio Noriega, has been serving a 40-year sentence for drug trafficking in Florida since shortly after the US invasion of Panama in 1989.

A more likely outcome is that Mr Hamdan will eventually be tried by a modified, congressionally approved military commission. If so, this week's decision is a blessing in disguise for Mr Bush. It gives him a face-saving way to release prisoners whom the US is holding in error, without appearing to bow to international pressure, and without requiring any lenience towards the prisoners the US does want to hold (decidedly including Mr Hamdan). As the court lives up to its populist caricature as meddlesome and over-punctilious, Mr Bush is strengthened politically. He said during a press conference on Thursday: "I'm not going to jeopardise the safety of the American people." Particularly in an election year, no politician is going to present himself to the public as the champion of Osama bin Laden's chauffeur.

Mr Bush, much like everyone else, is groping for an intellectual handhold on the problem of terrorism. The laws of war grow unsettled as "privatisation" spreads to warfare from other walks of life. Warren Buffett and the Gates Foundation are picking up some of the foreign aid and social service spending that used to be done by governments. In belt-tightening welfare states, credit cards make it possible to "privatise" some of the national debt. And at a time when both grievances and arms trading are globalised, outfits such as al-Qaeda have broken the nation state's monopoly on military aggression.

Terrorism has been a confusing crossroads of criminal and military law for decades – take the battle in 1981 over whether to treat IRA prisoners involved in the "H-Block" hunger strikes as delinquents or soldiers. But these questions were never big or urgent enough to upset the whole paradigm of military justice. Now, with the rise of al-Qaeda, they are. Since Mr Hamdan is a combatant, it may be a violation of common sense to try him simply as an unruly citizen. Since he is an irregular combatant, perhaps he cannot claim the same protections under the Geneva conventions that regular uniformed soldiers can. Mr Bush tried to address such issues with a hybrid civilian-military system of his own devising. The court held that that is not Mr Bush's job. But alternatives are still thin on the ground. At the heart of this week's case was the assertion of Mr Hamdan's lawyers that "conspiracy" was not a crime covered by the laws of war. Only four of the nine justices were receptive to that view.

If Mr Hamdan is not to be tried as a war criminal, it is because of a new ambiguity that surrounds the word "war", rather than a new ambiguity that surrounds the word "criminal". What do you charge a person like Mr Hamdan with? Even if Mr Bush has come up with the wrong answer, Americans are not about to punish him for thinking that it is the right question.

The Power Of The President, Curbed (NYT)

By Edwin S. Matthews Jr.

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

To the Editor:

Before any of us instinctively rise to criticize the Supreme Court for being soft on terrorists based upon its decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, let us not overlook that the court stood up to protect us all.

The right to be present at our trial, the right to know what evidence the state presents against us, the right to be defended by counsel we choose and the right under the Geneva Conventions to benefit from "all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples," which this decision preserves, belong to us all.

Our government has denied prisoners in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, these rights and could under many other circumstances deny them to any of us.

No war against anything justifies the denial of such essential rights.

Edwin S. Matthews Jr.

Spy Agency Sought U.S. Call Records Before 9/11, Lawyers Say (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, July 1, 2006

June 30 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. National Security Agency asked AT&T Inc. to help it set up a domestic call monitoring site seven months before the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks, lawyers claimed June 23 in court papers filed in New York federal court.

The allegation is part of a court filing adding AT&T, the nation's largest telephone company, as a defendant in a breach of privacy case filed earlier this month on behalf of Verizon Communications Inc. and BellSouth Corp. customers. The suit alleges that the three carriers, the NSA and President George W. Bush violated the Telecommunications Act of 1934 and the U.S. Constitution, and seeks money damages.

``The Bush Administration asserted this became necessary after 9/11," plaintiff's lawyer Carl Mayer said in a telephone interview. ``This undermines that assertion."

The lawsuit is related to an alleged NSA program to record and store data on calls placed by subscribers. More than 30 suits have been filed over claims that the carriers, the three biggest U.S. telephone companies, violated the privacy rights of their customers by cooperating with the NSA in an effort to track alleged terrorists.

``The U.S. Department of Justice has stated that AT&T may neither confirm nor deny AT&T's participation in the alleged NSA program because doing so would cause `exceptionally grave harm to national security' and would violate both civil and criminal statutes," AT&T spokesman Dave Pacholczyk said in an e-mail.

U.S. Department of Justice spokesman Charles Miller and NSA spokesman Don Weber declined to comment.

Pioneer Groundbreaker

The NSA initiative, code-named ``Pioneer Groundbreaker," asked AT&T unit AT&T Solutions to build exclusively for NSA use a network operations center which duplicated AT&T's Bedminster, New Jersey facility, the court papers claimed. That plan was abandoned in favor of the NSA acquiring the monitoring technology itself, plaintiffs' lawyers Bruce Afran said.

The NSA says on its Web site that in June 2000, the agency was seeking bids for a project to ``modernize and improve its information technology infrastructure." The plan, which included the privatization of its ``non-mission related" systems support, was said to be part of Project Groundbreaker.

Mayer said the Pioneer project is ``a different component" of that initiative.

Mayer and Afran said an unnamed former employee of the AT&T unit provided them with evidence that the NSA approached the carrier with the proposed plan. Afran said he has seen the worker's log book and independently confirmed the source's participation in the project. He declined to identify the employee.

Stop Suit

On June 9, U.S. District Court Judge P. Kevin Castel in New York stopped the lawsuit from moving forward while the Federal Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation in Washington rules on a U.S. request to assign all related telephone records lawsuits to a single judge.

Robert Varettoni, a spokesman for Verizon, said he was unaware of the allegations against AT&T and declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0037863

Earlier this week, he issued a statement on behalf of the company that Verizon had not been asked by the NSA to provide customer phone records from either its hard-wired or wireless networks. Verizon also said that it couldn't confirm or deny ``whether it has any relationship to the classified NSA program."

Mayer's lawsuit was filed following a May 11 USA Today report that the U.S. government was using the NSA to monitor domestic telephone calls. Earlier today, USA Today said it couldn't confirm its contention that BellSouth or Verizon had contracts with the NSA to provide a database of domestic customer phone call records.

Jeff Battcher, a spokesman for Atlanta-based BellSouth, said that vindicated the company.

``We never turned over any records to the NSA," he said in a telephone interview. ``We've been clear all along that they've never contacted us. Nobody in our company has ever had any contact with the NSA."

The case is McMurray v. Verizon Communications Inc., 06cv3650, in the Southern District of New York.

Lawmakers: NSA Database Incomplete (USAT)

USA Today, July 1, 2006

Some who were briefed about the database identify who participated and who didn't

WASHINGTON — Members of the House and Senate intelligence committees confirm that the National Security Agency has compiled a massive database of domestic phone call records. But some lawmakers also say that cooperation by the nation's telecommunication companies was not as extensive as first reported by USA TODAY on May 11.

Several lawmakers, briefed in secret by intelligence officials about the program after the story was published, described a call records database that is enormous but incomplete. Most asked that they not be identified by name, and many offered only limited responses to questions, citing national security concerns.

In the May 11 article that revealed the database, USA TODAY reported that its sources said AT&T, BellSouth and Verizon had agreed to provide the NSA with call records.

AT&T, which is the nation's largest telecommunications company, providing service to tens of millions of Americans, hasn't confirmed or denied its participation with the database. BellSouth and Verizon have denied that they contracted with the NSA to turn over phone records. On May 12, an attorney for former Qwest CEO Joseph Nacchio confirmed the USA TODAY report that Qwest had declined to participate in the NSA program.

Most members of the intelligence committees wouldn't discuss which companies cooperated with the NSA. However, several did offer more information about the program's breadth and scope, confirming some elements of USA TODAY's report and contradicting others:

·Nineteen lawmakers who had been briefed on the program verified that the NSA has built a database that includes records of Americans' domestic phone calls. The program collected records of the numbers dialed and the length of calls, sources have said, but did not involve listening to the calls or recording their content.

·Five members of the intelligence committees said they were told by senior intelligence officials that AT&T participated in the NSA domestic calls program.

AT&T, asked to comment, issued a written statement Thursday. “The U.S. Department of Justice has stated that AT&T may neither confirm nor deny AT&T's participation in the alleged NSA program because doing so would cause ‘exceptionally grave harm to national security' and would violate both civil and criminal statutes,” it said. “Under these circumstances, AT&T is not able to respond to such allegations.”

·Five members of the intelligence committees said they were told that BellSouth did not turn over domestic call records to the NSA.

Asked about BellSouth's denial, Sen. Saxby Chambliss, R-Ga., a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, said, “What they said appears to be accurate.”

Still, BellSouth customers' call records could end up in the NSA database, he said. “Obviously, a BellSouth customer can contract with AT&T (for long-distance phone service). There is a possibility that numbers are available from other phone companies.”

·Three lawmakers said that they had been told that Verizon did not turn over call records to the NSA. However, those three and another lawmaker said MCI, the long-distance carrier that Verizon acquired in January, did provide call records to the government.

While Verizon has denied providing call records to the NSA, it has declined to comment on whether MCI participated in the calls database program.

“The President has referred to an NSA program, which he authorized, directed against al-Qaeda,” Verizon said in a written statement May 12. “Because that program is highly classified, Verizon cannot comment on that program, nor can we confirm or deny whether we have had any relationship to it." The statement also said the company was now "ensuring that Verizon's policies are implemented at that entity (MCI) and that all its activities fully comply with law."

In the weeks since the database was revealed, congressional and intelligence sources have offered other new details about its scope and effectiveness.

"It was not cross-city calls. It was not mom-and-pop calls," said Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, who receives briefings as chairman of the Senate Appropriations Defense subcommittee. "It was long-distance. It was targeted on (geographic) areas of interest, places to which calls were believed to have come from al-Qaeda affiliates and from which calls were made to al-Qaeda affiliates."

Other lawmakers who were briefed about the program expressed concerns that gaps in the database could undercut its usefulness in identifying terrorist cells.

"It's difficult to say you're covering all terrorist activity in the United States if you don't have all the (phone) numbers," Chambliss said. "It probably would be better to have records of every telephone company."

"The database is not complete," said another lawmaker who was briefed on the program, speaking on condition of anonymity because the information is classified. "We don't know if this works yet."

Other publications have characterized the breadth of the database and how it is used.

The New York Times reported on May 12, for instance, that a senior government official had confirmed that the NSA had access to records of most telephone calls in the USA but said the records are used in a limited way to track "known bad guys."

The Washington Post reported on May 12 that "sources with knowledge of the program" said that the Bush administration had been collecting the domestic telephone records in "gargantuan databases" and that the "companies cooperating with the NSA dominate the U.S. telecommunications market and connect hundreds of billions of telephone calls each year."

President Bush and his top aides have defended the legality of the program, although they haven't directly confirmed its existence.

Three days after the USA TODAY story was published, national security adviser Stephen Hadley said on CBS' Face the Nation that he couldn't "confirm or deny the claims that are in the USA TODAY story."

He went on: "But it's very interesting what that story does not claim. It does not claim that the government was listening on domestic phone calls. It does not claim that names were passed, that addresses were passed, that content was passed. It's really about calling records, if you read the story. … There are a variety of ways in which those records lawfully can be provided to the government."

At a news conference two weeks later, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made a similar point. "There has been no confirmation about any details relating to the USA TODAY story," he said. "I will say that what was in the USA TODAY story did relate to business records." Citing a 1979 Supreme Court decision, he said, "There is no reasonable expectation of privacy in those kinds of records."

Lawmakers who were briefed about the program disagree about whether it's legal.

"It was within the president's inherent powers," said Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee.

Rep. Anna Eshoo, D-Calif., a member of the House Intelligence Committee, said there was a "schizophrenia in the presentation" by the administration. Officials say, " 'It's legal,' " she said. "But in the same breath they say, 'Perhaps we should take another look at FISA.' " FISA refers to the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which established a secret court that can grant warrants for eavesdropping.

Rep. Rush Holt, D-N.J., another member of the House Intelligence Committee, said, "I find it interesting that it seems the government is asking telephone companies to do things that their customers and shareholders would find totally unpalatable."

Debate over the database continues in several areas:

·In federal courts, at least 20 class-action lawsuits have been filed alleging that the government and phone companies have violated the rights of people whose calls have been reviewed by the NSA. The Justice Department signaled its intention in a court filing in Chicago this month to assert the "military and state secrets privilege" in all of them. That privilege allows the government to seek the dismissal of lawsuits if pursuing them would imperil national security.

·In New Jersey, the state attorney general is investigating whether telephone companies released confidential information without the consent of their customers. The federal government asked a court this month to quash subpoenas the state had issued to phone companies seeking information.

·At the Federal Communications Commission, the American Civil Liberties Union requested this month that approval of AT&T's acquisition of BellSouth be withheld until the commission reviews the companies' dealings with the NSA. However, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin said last month that the commission couldn't investigate complaints about the phone companies and the NSA because the reported activities were classified.

DOJ_NMG_0037865

·On Capitol Hill, Vice President Cheney held private talks this month with Republicans on the Senate Judiciary Committee. Cheney discouraged them from supporting Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter's vow to call telecommunications executives before the panel to answer questions about the database. Specter, R-Pa., protested to Cheney in an angry public letter.

The White House then agreed to talks with Specter on legislation he has drafted that would give the administration the option of putting the NSA's warrantless-surveillance program — which includes domestic wiretapping without a court warrant when one participant in a conversation is overseas — under the scrutiny of the FISA court.

"I'm prepared to defer, on a temporary basis, calling in the telephone companies," Specter said. If the discussions on his legislation fall through, however, he said, he will move again to demand testimony from the telephone executives about the database.

A Note To Our Readers (USAT)

USA Today, July 1, 2006

On May 11, USA TODAY reported that the National Security Agency, with the cooperation of several of America's leading telecommunications companies, had compiled a database of domestic phone call records in an effort to monitor terrorist activity.

Several days later, BellSouth and Verizon specifically denied that they were among the companies that had contracted with the NSA to provide bulk calling records.

The denial was unexpected. USA TODAY had spoken with BellSouth and Verizon for several weeks about the substance of the report. The day before the article was published, the reporter read the sections of the article concerning BellSouth and Verizon to representatives of the companies and asked for a denial before publication.

At the time, BellSouth did not deny participation in the program, but it issued a statement saying the company "does not provide any confidential customer information to the NSA or any government agency without proper legal authority." Verizon said that it would not comment on national security matters and that it acts "in full compliance with the law" and with respect for customers' privacy.

On May 15, BellSouth said it could not categorically deny participation in the program until it had conducted a detailed investigation. BellSouth said that internal review concluded that the company did not contract with the NSA or turn over calling records.

USA TODAY continued to pursue details of the database, speaking with dozens of sources in the telecommunications, intelligence and legislative communities, including interviews with members of Congress who have been briefed by senior intelligence officials on the domestic calls program.

In the adjoining article, USA TODAY reports that five members of the congressional intelligence committees said they had been told in secret briefings that BellSouth did not turn over call records to the NSA, three lawmakers said they had been told that Verizon had not participated in the NSA database, and four said that Verizon's subsidiary MCI did turn over records to the NSA.

USA TODAY also spoke again with the sources who had originally provided information about the scope and contents of the domestic calls database. All said the published report accurately reflected their knowledge and understanding of the NSA program, but none could document a contractual relationship between BellSouth or Verizon and the NSA, or that the companies turned over bulk calling records to the NSA.

Based on its reporting after the May 11 article, USA TODAY has now concluded that while the NSA has built a massive domestic calls record database involving the domestic call records of telecommunications companies, the newspaper cannot confirm that BellSouth or Verizon contracted with the NSA to provide bulk calling records to that database.

USA TODAY will continue to report on the contents and scope of the database as part of its ongoing coverage of national security and domestic surveillance.

Newspaper Hedges On Report Of Phone Companies And Data (NYT)

By Matt Richtel

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

In a note to readers yesterday, USA Today backed off an assertion that BellSouth and Verizon had contracted to provide telephone calling records to the National Security Agency.

The note referred to an article published May 11 that said the two companies and AT&T had provided such records, without warrants, for a database the security agency was compiling to detect terrorist activity.

BellSouth and Verizon have since denied participation in such a program. AT&T has declined to comment on the matter.

In an article that accompanied its note to readers, USA Today said 19 members of Congress briefed on the program had affirmed that the security agency built a database of Americans' domestic calls, including length of calls and numbers dialed.

DOJ_NMG_0037866

Congressional officials said yesterday that they could not confirm details of that account, but a Democratic aide said Democrats would press for more details of the security agency's domestic wiretapping and call-logging at a hearing on July 19.

The USA Today report in May intensified debate over whether the battle against terrorism was compromising individual liberties and privacy and how. Telecommunications law requires a court order to obtain calling records, but there is disagreement about whether exceptions may be made when the government cites national security considerations.

"Based on its reporting after the May 11 article, USA Today has now concluded that while the N.S.A. has built a massive domestic calls record database involving the domestic call records of telecommunications companies, the newspaper cannot confirm that BellSouth or Verizon contracted with the N.S.A. to provide bulk calling records to that database," the newspaper wrote in its note to readers.

Records turned over by carriers might be only one of several sources for such a database. The New York Times reported in December that the security agency had gained backdoor access to streams of domestic and international phone and e-mail traffic with the cooperation of telecommunications companies.

The USA Today article on May 11, written by Leslie Cauley, a longtime telecommunications reporter, was based on interviews with unidentified sources said to have had knowledge of the arrangement.

Steven Anderson, a spokesman for USA Today, said yesterday that the newspaper had one of the strictest policies in the industry regarding the use of unidentified sources, and "we have no plans to change our existing policy." Nor, Mr. Anderson said, did the paper anticipate any action regarding any staff members involved in the article.

"At the heart of our report is the fact that the N.S.A. is collecting phone call records of Americans, reaching into homes and businesses, and there have been no denials that the database exists," he said.

A BellSouth spokesman, Jeff Battcher, said yesterday: "As we have stated numerous times, the N.S.A. never contacted BellSouth, and we never supplied customer calling records to the N.S.A. In addition, we do not and have never had a contract with the N.S.A."

BellSouth had previously demanded a retraction of the May 11 article.

In the aftermath of the USA Today article in May, The New York Times reported that the security agency's efforts to collect phone data appeared to be focusing not on the local service phone companies, like BellSouth, Verizon and Qwest, but on the long-distance companies, including the former MCI and AT&T.

In mid-May, Verizon issued a statement saying it had not turned over calling records to the security agency, but it left open the possibility that MCI, which it recently acquired, had done so. Verizon said yesterday that it had no further comment.

USA Today said yesterday that the denials in the aftermath of its May 11 article were "unexpected," noting that the reporter had read sections of the article to both BellSouth and Verizon before publication, seeking comment. At that point, neither company denied cooperation, the newspaper said, but both affirmed their policies of acting in compliance with the law and with respect for their customers' privacy.

For its part, AT&T said yesterday: "The news media have carried reports alleging that AT&T is participating in an N.S.A. terrorist surveillance program. Unfortunately, the law does not permit AT&T to respond to those allegations."

AT&T is the name taken by SBC Communications, the nation's largest provider of local phone service, after it acquired the AT&T long-distance business last year.

USA Today Takes Back Some Of NSA Phone-Record Report (WP)

By Frank Ahrens And Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

USA Today has acknowledged that it cannot prove key elements of a blockbuster May 11 story in which it reported that several telecommunications companies were handing over customer phone records to the National Security Agency.

The May article named AT&T Inc., Verizon Communications Corp. and BellSouth Corp. as cooperating with the NSA in compiling an unprecedented database of domestic phone records. Though the NSA was not listening to calls, the spy agency was scouring the records to search for ties to terrorism, the paper said.

The report angered the White House, alarmed privacy advocates and sent other news media scurrying to match the story.

Yesterday, in a lengthy article and accompanying "note to our readers," the nation's largest-circulation newspaper said it could not confirm that BellSouth or Verizon contracted with the NSA, which is charged with intercepting and analyzing foreign communications to look for possible threats to U.S. national security.

The correction illustrates the difficulty of reporting sensitive and often classified government actions, as anonymous sources sometimes backtrack, pursue their own agendas by leaking selective information or say more than they know. News organizations attempt to assemble authoritative stories from multiple sources and agencies, creating plenty of room for potential error.

DOJ_NMG_0037867

"We take every error seriously," USA Today Editor Ken Paulson said in an interview. "This was obviously a big story. . . . All we can do is set the record straight."

Reporter Leslie Cauley revealed her unidentified sources to a top editor, Paulson said, and "the sources are credible," adding, "They have a track record with Leslie and she trusts them." But several members of the congressional intelligence committees later contradicted the sources on the question of whether Verizon and BellSouth had provided information to the NSA.

USA Today stood by much of its initial report, saying it had followed up with lawmakers and intelligence and telecom sources. Yesterday's article reported: "Members of the House and Senate intelligence committees confirm that the National Security Agency has compiled a massive database of phone call records."

In the next sentence, the paper wrote: "But some lawmakers also say that cooperation by the nation's telecommunication companies was not as extensive as first reported by USA Today on May 11."

Yesterday, Verizon said it had no further comment on the matter, referring instead to its May 16 rebuttal of the USA Today story.

USA Today said the BellSouth and Verizon denials that came after the May 11 article were "unexpected." The paper said its reporters read sections of the article to sources at the companies and gave them the opportunity to deny their involvement. BellSouth did not deny its participation, and Verizon said it would not comment on national security issues.

So USA Today ran the story. Later, BellSouth said it had conducted an internal investigation into the matter and concluded that the company did not contract with the NSA or turn over phone records, the paper reported yesterday.

"As we have stated numerous times, the NSA never contacted BellSouth, and we never supplied customer calling records to the NSA," BellSouth spokesman Jeff Battcher wrote in an e-mail. "In addition we do not and have never had a contract with the NSA."

Some conservative bloggers instantly reacted to the USA Today correction by citing it as another example of what some on the right see as liberal, anti-Bush sentiment in the "mainstream media."

Some liberal bloggers noted the USA Today story accompanying the correction as further proof of domestic spying by the government but did not mention the correction.

USA Today: Call Database Not So Broad (AP)

AP, July 1, 2006

USA Today acknowledged in a "note to our readers" Friday that it could not establish that BellSouth or Verizon contracted with the National Security Agency to provide it with customer calling records, as it previously reported.

But spokesman Steve Anderson said "this is an important story that holds up well. At the heart of our report is the fact that NSA is collecting phone call records of millions of Americans."

"What we address in the editors' note," he said, "deals with the fact that we originally reported that the telephone companies were working under contract with the NSA. We've concluded that we cannot establish that BellSouth or Verizon entered into a contract with the NSA to provide the bulk calling records."

In an accompanying story, the newspaper reported Friday that lawmakers on House and Senate intelligence committees have said that while the NSA has amassed a huge database calling records, cooperation with the NSA by telephone companies was not as extensive USA Today initially reported on May 11.

USA Today at that time reported that, according to its sources, AT&T Inc., BellSouth Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc. all agreed to provide the agency with domestic call records. The newspaper said Friday that Verizon and BellSouth deny they contracted to provide the NSA with records of their customers' phone calls. AT&T has neither confirmed nor denied the newspaper's report.

Some lawmakers briefed on the program said NSA has a database of domestic calls that includes numbers called and the length of conversations, but not what was said. Five members of the intelligence committees said they'd been told by intelligence officials that AT&T, the nation's largest telecommunications company, did cooperate in providing NSA with call records.

Five lawmakers on the intelligence committees said they'd been told that BellSouth did not turn over call records, and three lawmakers said they'd been informed that Verizon did not turn over call records to the NSA.

Lawmakers who support the Bush administration's domestic spying program see the apparent gaps in the database as a problem.

"It's difficult to say you're covering all terrorist activity in the United States if you don't have all the (phone) numbers," Sen. Saxby Chambliss, R-Ga., told USA Today. "It probably would be better to have records of every telephone company."

In its note to readers, USA Today vowed to "continue to report on the contents and scope of the database as part of its ongoing coverage of national security and domestic surveillance."

DOJ_NMG_0037868

Said Anderson: "There have been no denials that this database exists. Nineteen members of Congress who have been briefed following the May 11 article have confirmed the existence of the database."

USA Today Backs Off Of NSA Phone-Record Details (WSJ)

By Sarah Ellison

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

USA Today backed off key elements of its May 11 page-one article that said telephone companies were helping the National Security Agency amass a database of Americans' domestic phone records.

In a "note to our readers" that ran on page 2 of Friday's edition, USA Today acknowledged that subsequent reporting had been unable to confirm a key point in the article: that BellSouth Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc. had "contracted" with the NSA "to provide bulk calling records to that database."

An article accompanying the note cited interviews with several lawmakers briefed about the NSA's phone-surveillance programs to conclude that "cooperation by the nation's telecommunications companies was not as extensive as first reported by USA Today on May 11."

The newspaper said, however, that additional reporting confirmed the existence of the NSA database, a major point of the original article.

USA Today's May 11 article set off a firestorm on Capitol Hill and was cited by dozens of news outlets. The report fueled a debate about whether the Bush administration's fight against terrorism was impinging on privacy rights of Americans. At the same time, phone companies disputed elements of the story; BellSouth demanded a retraction.

USA Today's article said the NSA "has been secretly collecting the phone call records of tens of millions of Americans, using data provided by AT&T, Verizon and BellSouth," citing people with direct knowledge of the arrangement. The three companies "are working under contract with the NSA," the article said. In Friday's note, the paper said it now can't confirm that BellSouth and Verizon contracted with the NSA, but it didn't address AT&T Inc.'s role. The accompanying article, however, cited five lawmakers as saying AT&T "participated in the NSA domestic calls program."

"Reporting on a national-security story is particularly challenging," USA Today editor Ken Paulson said in an interview Friday.

"We know more today than we did before," he added, "and we'll keep reporting on it and we'll continue to learn more. We're trying to be as straightforward and transparent as possible with readers."

Jeff Battcher, a spokesman for BellSouth, said the editor's note and the article speak for themselves.

Verizon referred to a May 16 statement in which it denied that it was approached by the NSA and "entered into an arrangement to provide the NSA with data from its customers' domestic calls."

AT&T, similarly, referred reporters to a June 27 statement, which said AT&T will "vigorously protect our customers' privacy and only share information as specifically authorized by the law."

When Do We Publish A Secret? (NYT)

By Dean Baquet, Editor, The Los Angeles Times, And Bill Keller, Executive Editor, The New York Times

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

SINCE Sept. 11, 2001, newspaper editors have faced excruciating choices in covering the government's efforts to protect the country from terrorist agents. Each of us has, on a number of occasions, withheld information because we were convinced that publishing it could put lives at risk. On other occasions, each of us has decided to publish classified information over strong objections from our government.

Last week our newspapers disclosed a secret Bush administration program to monitor international banking transactions. We did so after appeals from senior administration officials to hold the story. Our reports — like earlier press disclosures of secret measures to combat terrorism — revived an emotional national debate, featuring angry calls of "treason" and proposals that journalists be jailed along with much genuine concern and confusion about the role of the press in times like these.

We are rivals. Our newspapers compete on a hundred fronts every day. We apply the principles of journalism individually as editors of independent newspapers. We agree, however, on some basics about the immense responsibility the press has been given by the inventors of the country.

Make no mistake, journalists have a large and personal stake in the country's security. We live and work in cities that have been tragically marked as terrorist targets. Reporters and photographers from both our papers braved the collapsing towers to convey the horror to the world.

DOJ_NMG_0037869

We have correspondents today alongside troops on the front lines in Iraq and Afghanistan. Others risk their lives in a quest to understand the terrorist threat; Daniel Pearl of The Wall Street Journal was murdered on such a mission. We, and the people who work for us, are not neutral in the struggle against terrorism.

But the virulent hatred espoused by terrorists, judging by their literature, is directed not just against our people and our buildings. It is also aimed at our values, at our freedoms and at our faith in the self-government of an informed electorate. If the freedom of the press makes some Americans uneasy, it is anathema to the ideologists of terror.

Thirty-five years ago yesterday, in the Supreme Court ruling that stopped the government from suppressing the secret Vietnam War history called the Pentagon Papers, Justice Hugo Black wrote: "The government's power to censor the press was abolished so that the press would remain forever free to censure the government. The press was protected so that it could bare the secrets of the government and inform the people."

As that sliver of judicial history reminds us, the conflict between the government's passion for secrecy and the press's drive to reveal is not of recent origin. This did not begin with the Bush administration, although the polarization of the electorate and the daunting challenge of terrorism have made the tension between press and government as clamorous as at any time since Justice Black wrote.

Our job, especially in times like these, is to bring our readers information that will enable them to judge how well their elected leaders are fighting on their behalf, and at what price.

In recent years our papers have brought you a great deal of information the White House never intended for you to know — classified secrets about the questionable intelligence that led the country to war in Iraq, about the abuse of prisoners in Iraq and Afghanistan, about the transfer of suspects to countries that are not squeamish about using torture, about eavesdropping without warrants.

As Robert G. Kaiser, associate editor of The Washington Post, asked recently in the pages of that newspaper: "You may have been shocked by these revelations, or not at all disturbed by them, but would you have preferred not to know them at all? If a war is being waged in America's name, shouldn't Americans understand how it is being waged?"

Government officials, understandably, want it both ways. They want us to protect their secrets, and they want us to trumpet their successes. A few days ago, Treasury Secretary John Snow said he was scandalized by our decision to report on the bank-monitoring program. But in September 2003 the same Secretary Snow invited a group of reporters from our papers, The Wall Street Journal and others to travel with him and his aides on a military aircraft for a six-day tour to show off the department's efforts to track terrorist financing. The secretary's team discussed many sensitive details of their monitoring efforts, hoping they would appear in print and demonstrate the administration's relentlessness against the terrorist threat.

How do we, as editors, reconcile the obligation to inform with the instinct to protect?

Sometimes the judgments are easy. Our reporters in Iraq and Afghanistan, for example, take great care not to divulge operational intelligence in their news reports, knowing that in this wired age it could be seen and used by insurgents.

Often the judgments are painfully hard. In those cases, we cool our competitive jets and begin an intensive deliberative process.

The process begins with reporting. Sensitive stories do not fall into our hands. They may begin with a tip from a source who has a grievance or a guilty conscience, but those tips are just the beginning of long, painstaking work. Reporters operate without security clearances, without subpoena powers, without spy technology. They work, rather, with sources who may be scared, who may know only part of the story, who may have their own agendas that need to be discovered and taken into account. We double-check and triple-check. We seek out sources with different points of view. We challenge our sources when contradictory information emerges.

Then we listen. No article on a classified program gets published until the responsible officials have been given a fair opportunity to comment. And if they want to argue that publication represents a danger to national security, we put things on hold and give them a respectful hearing. Often, we agree to participate in off-the-record conversations with officials, so they can make their case without fear of spilling more secrets onto our front pages.

Finally, we weigh the merits of publishing against the risks of publishing. There is no magic formula, no neat metric for either the public's interest or the dangers of publishing sensitive information. We make our best judgment.

When we come down in favor of publishing, of course, everyone hears about it. Few people are aware when we decide to hold an article. But each of us, in the past few years, has had the experience of withholding or delaying articles when the administration convinced us that the risk of publication outweighed the benefits. Probably the most discussed instance was The New York Times's decision to hold its article on telephone eavesdropping for more than a year, until editors felt that further reporting had whittled away the administration's case for secrecy.

But there are other examples. The New York Times has held articles that, if published, might have jeopardized efforts to protect vulnerable stockpiles of nuclear material, and articles about highly sensitive counterterrorism initiatives that are still in operation. In April, The Los Angeles Times withheld information about American espionage and surveillance activities in Afghanistan discovered on computer drives purchased by reporters in an Afghan bazaar.

It is not always a matter of publishing an article or killing it. Sometimes we deal with the security concerns by editing out gratuitous detail that lends little to public understanding but might be useful to the targets of surveillance. The Washington Post, at the administration's request, agreed not to name the specific countries that had secret Central Intelligence Agency prisons, deeming that information not essential for American readers. The New York Times, in its article on National Security Agency eavesdropping, left out some technical details.

Even the banking articles, which the president and vice president have condemned, did not dwell on the operational or technical aspects of the program, but on its sweep, the questions about its legal basis and the issues of oversight.

We understand that honorable people may disagree with any of these choices — to publish or not to publish. But making those decisions is the responsibility that falls to editors, a corollary to the great gift of our independence. It is not a responsibility we take lightly. And it is not one we can surrender to the government.

How the press balances national security with its mission to report the news.

SINCE SEPT. 11, 2001, newspaper editors have faced excruciating choices in covering the government's efforts to protect the country from terrorist agents. Each of us has, on a number of occasions, withheld information because we were convinced that publishing it could put lives at risk. If a war is being waged in America's name, shouldn't Americans understand how it is being waged?"

Government officials, understandably, want it both ways. They want us to protect their secrets, and they want us to trumpet their successes. A few days ago, Treasury Secretary John Snow said he was scandalized by our decision to report on the bank-monitoring program. But in September 2003, the same Secretary Snow invited a group of reporters — from our papers, the Wall Street Journal and others — to travel with him and his aides on a military aircraft for a six-day tour to show off the department's efforts to track terrorist financing. The secretary's team discussed many sensitive details of their monitoring efforts, hoping they would appear in print and demonstrate the administration's relentlessness against the terrorist threat.

How do we, as editors, reconcile the obligation to inform with the instinct to protect?

Sometimes the judgments are easy. Our reporters in Iraq and Afghanistan, for example, take great care not to divulge operational intelligence in their news reports, knowing that in this wired age, it could be seen and used by insurgents.

Often the judgments are painfully hard. In those cases, we cool our competitive jets and begin an intensive deliberative process.

The process begins with reporting. Sensitive stories do not fall into our hands. They may begin with a tip from a source who has a grievance or a guilty conscience, but those tips are just the beginning of long, painstaking work. Reporters operate without security clearances, without subpoena powers, without spy technology. They work, rather, with sources who may be scared, who may know only part of the story, who may have their own agendas that need to be discovered and taken into account. We double-check and triple-check. We seek out sources from different points of view. We challenge our sources when contradictory information emerges.

Then, we listen. No article on a classified program gets published until the responsible officials have been given a fair opportunity to comment. And if they want to argue that publication represents a danger to national security, we put things on hold and give them a respectful hearing. Often, we agree to participate in off-the-record conversations with officials so they can make their case without fear of spilling more secrets onto our front pages.

Finally, we weigh the merits of publishing against the risks of publishing. There is no magic formula, no neat metric for either the public's interest or the dangers of publishing sensitive information. We make our best judgment.

WHEN WE come down in favor of publishing, of course everyone hears about it. Few people are aware when we decide to hold an article. But each of us, in the last few years, has had the experience of withholding or delaying stories when the administration convinced us that the risk of publication outweighed the benefits. Probably the most discussed instance was the New York Times' decision to hold its article on telephone eavesdropping for more than a year, until editors felt that further reporting had whittled away the administration's case for secrecy.

But there are others. The New York Times has held articles that, if published, might have jeopardized efforts to protect vulnerable stockpiles of nuclear material, and articles about highly sensitive counter-terrorism initiatives that are still in operation. In April, the Los Angeles Times withheld information about American espionage and surveillance activities in Afghanistan, discovered on computer drives purchased by reporters in an Afghan bazaar.

It is not always a matter of publishing an article or killing it.

Sometimes we deal with the security concerns by editing out gratuitous detail that lends little to public understanding but might be useful to the targets of surveillance. The Washington Post, at the administration's request, agreed not to name the specific countries hosting secret Central Intelligence Agency prisons, deeming that information not essential for American readers. The New York Times, in its article on National Security Agency eavesdropping, left out some technical details.

Even the banking articles, which the president and vice president have condemned, did not dwell on the operational or technical aspects of the program but on its sweep, the questions about its legal basis and the issues of oversight.

We understand that honorable people may disagree with any of these choices — to publish or not to publish. But making those decisions is the responsibility that falls to editors, a corollary to the great gift of our independence. It is not a responsibility we take lightly. And it is not one we can surrender to the government.

War Of Words On Bank Story (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

Wall Street Journal Editorial Takes Times to Task

For the Wall Street Journal editorial page, there may be no more juicy target than the liberal press appearing to undermine the Bush administration's war on terror.

DOJ_NMG_0037872

The White House and congressional Republicans, after all, have spent the past week attacking the New York Times for disclosing a secret program targeting the banking records of suspected terrorists.

The problem: The Journal itself had published a front-page story about the classified program on June 23, the same day as the Times.

The Journal's conservative editorial page weighed in yesterday by arguing that what the two newspapers had done was very different:

"More than a few commentators have tried to link the Journal and Times at the hip. On the left, the motive is to help shield the Times from political criticism. On the right, the goal is to tar everyone in the 'mainstream media.' . . . We suspect that the Times has tried to use the Journal as its political heatshield precisely because it knows our editors have more credibility on these matters."

Later in the day, the Times' publisher, Arthur Sulzberger Jr., returned fire in what has now escalated into a full-fledged battle between the two New York papers.

The Journal editorial board, which operates independently from the newsroom, said a top Treasury Department official had contacted Journal reporter Glenn Simpson and handed him the story. The editorial said Treasury officials decided to "declassify a series of talking points" after failing to persuade the New York Times -- as well as the Los Angeles Times -- to kill the story on grounds that it would neutralize a key administration weapon in the war on terror. The same declassified information was provided to the other two papers, as well as to The Washington Post later on the evening of June 22.

"Our guess," the editorial said, is that Treasury believed Simpson "would write a straighter story than the Times" -- and, it added, "he did."

The editorial makes clear that the administration handed the Journal the same information that President Bush and Vice President Cheney, among others, have been denouncing the Times for publishing.

The Republican-controlled House, in a move clearly aimed at the Times, adopted a resolution Thursday that criticizes the press for publishing details of the classified banking program.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld continued the assault yesterday in an interview with ABC News Radio, saying, "The New York Times, when asked by the United States government, 'Please do not do that, it would cause the loss of American lives,' and they'd go right ahead and print it . . . it tells you a lot about the New York Times, and it certainly tells you a lot about the individual who did that."

In a Fox News poll released yesterday, 60 percent of those surveyed said the Times did more to help terrorist groups by publishing the information, while 27 percent said the story did more to help the public. Forty-three percent called what the newspapers did treason. Just over half said government employees were more to blame for leaking the classified information, 28 percent faulted the media for reporting it, and 17 percent said they were equally to blame.

Simpson, a veteran investigative reporter, had been asking questions about the secret banking program for some time as part of a broader story, but had not nailed it down, according to Journal staffers. That, they say, is how Treasury officials knew to call him.

"Would the Journal have published the story had we discovered it as the Times did, and had the administration asked us not to?" the editorial asks. "Speaking for the editorial columns, our answer is probably not."

So unusual was yesterday's editorial that the Journal's managing editor, Paul Steiger, felt compelled to release a statement about it. "Had Treasury made such a request," he said, "we would have listened to the government's specific concerns, and weighed them seriously before reaching any final decision on publishing. But, having never heard those concerns, I can't guess how we ultimately would have responded."

Editorial Page Editor Paul Gigot will not comment on grounds that the editorial should speak for itself, a spokesman said.

Sulzberger, whom the editorial accuses of deliberately seeking to obstruct the war on terror, offered his own response.

"I know many of the reporters and editors at the Wall Street Journal and have greater faith in their journalistic excellence than does the editorial page of their own paper," Sulzberger said in a statement. "I, for one, do not believe they were unaware of the importance of what they were publishing nor oblivious to the impact such a story would have."

Suspect Plotted To Form A Terrorist Army, U.S. Claims (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, July 1, 2006

The alleged ringleader of a group of South Florida men accused of plotting to blow up Sears Tower in Chicago wanted the blast to divert law enforcement so he could free inmates from a prison to join his terrorist army, federal prosecutors said Friday.

The lead lawyer in the government's terrorism case against the seven men provided fresh details about the group's alleged plot to bomb buildings in Miami and Chicago -- and how the plan disintegrated as members fought among themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0037873

The picture that emerged during Friday's hearing in Miami federal court was of an ambitious, but inept, military-style organization whose members had illusions of grandeur and a taste for intrigue.

The men staged a top-secret meeting in the Florida Keys, swore loyalty oaths to al-Qaida, and even put their own leader on trial for treason and insubordination, said prosecutor Jacqueline Arango.

According to the original indictment that led to their arrests on June 22, the group's ultimate goal was to launch an all-out ground war against the U.S. government by blowing up the Sears Tower.

In fact, the plan was even more far-fetched.

The group's alleged ringleader Narseal Batiste thought that bringing down the 110-story Sears Tower would divert law enforcement, allowing him to break into a Chicago-area prison and release the inmates who would then join his army, Arango said.

However, before obtaining any explosives or weapons, the group disbanded over rising suspicions about a government witness who had infiltrated the organization by posing as an al-Qaida member.

Batiste had a final meeting with that informant on May 24 and told him that he still wanted to fulfill his plan, Arango said.

"I want to fight some jihad. That's all I live for," Arango quoted Batiste as saying during the meeting.

At that point, the government decided to end its investigation and arrest the men, Arango said.

The government's two-hour presentation, which included video recordings made during the investigation, came during a hearing on whether six of the seven men should remain in custody prior to their trial. Arango argued the men should not be released on bail because they pose a danger to the community and might flee.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Ted Bandstra said he would rule after defense lawyers finish presenting evidence next week.

The six men -- Batiste, 32; Patrick Abraham, 26; Stanley Grant Phanor, 31, Naudimar Herrera, 22; Burson Augustin, 21; and Rotschild Augustine, 22 -- each pleaded not guilty Friday to charges that they supported al-Qaida, plotted to destroy buildings using explosives, and conspired to levy war against the government. The seventh man, Lyglenson Lemorin, 31, is in custody in Atlanta.

During the proceeding, defense lawyers for the six sat at a table listening and taking notes. But only John Wylie, who represents Batiste, had a chance to question an FBI agent involved in the investigation.

"Do you have any evidence that Mr. Batiste has met with any terrorist organizations from the Middle East?" Wylie asked.

"No, I do not," Special Agent Tony Velasquez responded.

"Other than the person posing as al-Qaida, is there any evidence of contact with anyone from al-Qaida?" Wylie asked.

"No," Velasquez responded.

According to Arango, the undercover witness pretending to be an al-Qaida agent was introduced to Batiste by an acquaintance, who also cooperated with the FBI. Neither the witness nor the acquaintance were law enforcement agents, Velasquez said.

During several meetings, Batiste spoke to the witness about his desire to bomb the Sears Tower and gave the witness a list of the supplies he would need to carry out his plans, Arango said.

Among the items: $50,000, military uniforms, boots, guns, bulletproof vests, and sports utility vehicles.

But in January, the investigation hit a snag when Batiste went into hiding, telling a friend he was suspicious of the witness.

On Jan. 28, the witness was summoned to the warehouse with the acquaintance who had first introduced him to the group. They were examined for recording devices and driven to Islamorada in the Florida Keys. Batiste was waiting for the men under a bridge.

The incident, which Arango called a kidnapping, solidified Batiste's relationship with the undercover witness.

In March, the seven men pledged oaths of loyalty, or bayat, to al-Qaida and some group members conducted surveillance of potential targets in Miami, including the FBI building, the federal courthouse, and the federal prison, prosecutors say.

As their plans gained momentum, the undercover witness gave Batiste $3,500 to fly in a friend of Batiste from Chicago, Sultan Khanbey.

Khanbey, 51, quickly grew suspicious of the government witness and told Batiste he was being set up by the FBI, Arango said.

On April 17, Khanbey put Batiste on trial for treason and insubordination inside the group's Liberty City headquarters.

Some members of the group sided with Batiste and some sided with Khanbey, causing a rift in the organization, Arango said.

Khanbey was subsequently arrested on weapons charges and could be called as a witness against Batiste.

Two Views Of Terror Suspects: Die-Hards Or Dupes (NYT)

By Christopher Drew And Eric Lichtblau

DOJ_NMG_0037874

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

MIAMI, June 30 — The seven men who were arrested here last week on terror charges were shown Friday on undercover videotapes solemnly reciting oaths of loyalty to Al Qaeda, repeating the words that an F.B.I. informant had given them to say.

The tapes, played at a federal court hearing by prosecutors, did not provide any evidence that the men had the money or firepower to blow up the Sears Tower in Chicago and federal buildings in five cities, as they are accused of conspiring to do, or that they had any actual ties to Al Qaeda.

But during her presentation, the prosecutor, Jacqueline M. Arango, disclosed other new details of the case, among them that the group's leader, Narseal Batiste, had asked the undercover informant for rockets and semiautomatic rifles.

Lawyers for some of the men said in interviews this week that their clients knew little about Mr. Batiste's plans to attack the Sears Tower. Some of the lawyers criticized the new evidence presented Friday as a sign that the government had largely concocted other parts of the case and had lured the men into doing more than they would have on their own.

"It's clearly a case of entrapment," said Nathan Clark, the lawyer for one of the defendants, Rotschild Augustine. Mr. Clark said the taped oath was "induced by the government."

The tapes, in fact, made clear the large role that the government informant had played in the case. In one tape, the informant recited what F.B.I. agents said was an authentic Qaeda oath, while the seven men sat on a sofa and chairs in a warehouse that the F.B.I. had wired with eavesdropping equipment. As the informant repeated the words for a second time, each defendant stood and stated his name before they all said in unison that they were committing themselves to the "path of jihad."

But the parents of most of the defendants, including some who have been very critical of the case, appeared surprised by the evidence presented Friday, sitting quietly through the court hearing and refusing to comment afterward.

Over the last week, many critics of the Bush administration described the case as improbable and suggested that it was emblematic of other exaggerated threats that the F.B.I. had often focused on since the Sept. 11 terror attacks, especially inasmuch as federal officials said Mr. Batiste had no ability to carry out the proposed attacks.

But while the new information added to the portrait of Mr. Batiste as a bizarre and self-aggrandizing figure — he told an informant that he would like to smoke a cigarette with Osama bin Laden — it also suggested that he was determined and persistent. The new information indicated that his followers, mostly poor, young Haitian-Americans, were more involved in parts of the scheme than their families and community leaders had suspected.

The prosecutor said some of the men had strip-searched the undercover informant at a time when Mr. Batiste was worried about F.B.I. surveillance, and had also voted to take photographs of several government buildings in Miami that they thought Al Qaeda might want to attack.

Law enforcement officials said that after the men were arrested, at least two admitted some knowledge of the Sears Tower plot. The officials also said that there was ample evidence to bring all of the men into the conspiracy charges, and that after the Sept. 11 attacks, they had no choice but to be aggressive in disrupting any group that showed even the slightest interest in being involved in terrorism.

The Miami case is part of a broader strategy of pre-empting terrorist attacks in what Justice Department officials acknowledge is a significant shift in the way they go about investigating and prosecuting possible terrorism cases.

"We can't afford to wait," a senior Justice Department official said in an interview. The suspects in Miami "were of significant concern, and we're not going to allow them to run into somebody who has the means to carry out what they were talking about."

"You may never know what you prevented," the official added, "but those may be our greatest successes."

The pre-emptive strategy has led to increased use of what amount to sting operations by the F.B.I. to use informants and undercover operatives in gathering evidence against people suspected of terrorist ambitions. The strategy has led to prosecutions and convictions in terrorism cases from San Diego and Houston to Newark and Albany, often involving concocted plots to sell fictitious arms or provide other support to Al Qaeda.

Justice Department officials point to a number of high-profile successes in the campaign, including the convictions of Zacarias Moussaoui, John Walker Lindh, a Muslim-American student in Northern Virginia named Abu Ali and a Virginia cleric named Ali al-Timimi and his followers, who prosecutors said sought to wage war against Americans overseas.

But there have been a smaller number of losses as well, including the collapse of the case against an alleged terrorist cell in Detroit after accusations of prosecutorial misconduct, and the acquittal in Idaho of a graduate student in computer programming on charges of using Web sites to aid terrorists.

"While our record shows many victories in recent years, we haven't always been successful," Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty told reporters last week in assessing the overall strategy of the campaign against terrorism.

The Justice Department says it has brought 441 prosecutions in what it considers to be terrorism-related cases, with 261 convictions and 150 cases remaining.

DOJ_NMG_0037875

Mr. Batiste, 32, who is married and has four children, grew up in Louisiana as the son of a Christian preacher and later worked as a FedEx driver in Chicago. He and his wife opened a stucco and masonry business here in 2004, and he rented a small salmon-colored warehouse last year in Liberty City, where he held Bible readings.

And while federal authorities described Mr. Batiste and the other defendants last week as "a radical Islamic group," neighbors say his religious teachings came from the Moorish Science Temple of America, a group founded in Illinois in the early 1900's that blends Christianity, Judaism and Islam with an emphasis on self-discipline through martial arts.

The group's headquarters was a 750-square-foot former convenience store with an old sofa in the back and no running water. People who live near the building, which had no windows or air-conditioning, say they would sometimes see Mr. Batiste and a dozen or so other men there in the evenings, either inside with the doors open or practicing martial arts in the backyard.

Others say that while the group — which called itself the Seas of David — read the Koran at times, Mr. Batiste's favorite text was Jesus' Sermon on the Mount.

At first, relatives and lawyers said, the defendants were intrigued by Mr. Batiste's religious teachings, which some of the men saw as an alternative to the drug-dealing streets in Liberty City, one of Miami's poorest neighborhoods. But by this past April, the lawyers said, some defendants had grown suspicious of Mr. Batiste and had left the group after he seemed to become more focused on raising money than on his religious teachings.

According to the indictment, the criminal investigation began last October, after Mr. Batiste began expressing ominous goals. He told someone who was traveling to Yemen that he wanted to raise an army to overthrow the United States government and needed help, one document says, "in locating foreign Islamic extremists to fund his mission."

After that person tipped the F.B.I., Ms. Arango, the prosecutor, said Friday, the bureau arranged for the undercover informant posing as a terrorist to begin a series of meetings with Mr. Batiste, which stretched from December through late May.

With the government's recording tapes whirring, the indictment says, Mr. Batiste told the informant — who at some point identified himself as being with Al Qaeda — that he wanted to kick off his war with an attack on the Sears Tower. He also asked the informant to supply him with $50,000 in cash and all the equipment, from military boots to weapons, that he and his soldiers would need to "kill all the devils we can."

And by mid-March, the informant had proposed — at a meeting with all seven defendants — bombing F.B.I. buildings in Miami and four other cities. Ms. Arango said that proposal was made just minutes after each of the men had taken the oath to Al Qaeda. Over the next three weeks, using camera equipment supplied by the government, Mr. Batiste and four of the others were involved in either taking photographs or videotapes of government buildings in Miami or delivering them to the informant.

Ms. Arango said the group split up last spring after a religious leader from Chicago had a dispute with Mr. Batiste and some of the other defendants sided with the Chicago man.

Federal officials say they also have other evidence, including statements given by some of the men shortly after they were arrested. At another hearing on Thursday, for instance, officials released a handwritten statement by one of Mr. Batiste's young followers, in which he acknowledged taking the oath to Al Qaeda and being present when Mr. Batiste received a video camera from the undercover informant "to film target locations (Federal Buildings & Tower building) in Miami, FL and Chicago, IL."

State Tracked Protesters In The Name Of Security (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

Officials say they have stopped monitoring antiwar and political rallies. The practice violates civil rights, Atty. Gen. Lockyer says.

SACRAMENTO — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's office in charge of protecting California against terrorism has tracked demonstrations staged by political and antiwar groups, a practice that senior law enforcement officials say is an abuse of civil liberties.

The Times obtained reports prepared for the state Office of Homeland Security in recent months that contain details on the whereabouts and purpose of a number of political demonstrations throughout California.

The source of the information is listed in some cases as federal law enforcement agencies, including the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, an investigative arm of the U.S. Homeland Security department.

Political activities cited in the reports include:

· An animal rights rally outside a Canadian consulate office in San Francisco to protest the hunting of seals.

· A demonstration in Walnut Creek at which U.S. Rep. George Miller (D-Martinez) and other officials spoke against the war in Iraq.

· A Women's International League for Peace and Freedom gathering at a courthouse in Santa Barbara in support of an antiwar protester — a 56-year-old Salinas woman — facing federal trespassing charges.

California Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer's office learned of the monitoring activity more than two months ago. On Friday, a spokesman condemned the actions, saying they violated the groups' constitutional right of free speech.

"When people exercise their 1st Amendment rights to rally, march and protest, they should not have to worry that intelligence officials are watching them or their activities are in any way being painted with the terrorism brush," Lockyer spokesman Tom Dresslar said in an interview.

"That kind of conduct by anti-terrorism intelligence agencies threatens civil liberties, runs counter to our values and violates this office's policy regarding criminal intelligence gathering," Dresslar said.

The Times obtained two of the reports, which were compiled daily. The state homeland security office declined to release others.

The office is a 53-person operation that grew out of the Sept. 11 attacks and is financed primarily by federal money. Officials there said the details about the rallies were reported by SRA International, a company hired to provide counter-terrorism analysis.

The officials said such information made it into only the two reports that The Times obtained, out of 60-some daily intelligence reports produced since March.

No reports were produced before March, said Chris Bertelli, spokesman for the state office. When officials in the agency learned of the practice, he said, they ordered it stopped.

Copies of the reports were shared with the California Highway Patrol and the attorney general's office. Nothing else was done with the information about the demonstrations, Bertelli said.

The reports are on the letterhead of a California anti-terrorism partnership that includes the homeland security office, the attorney general and the Highway Patrol.

Dresslar said staffers in Lockyer's office saw the reports and raised concerns with their superiors, who complained to the Office of Homeland Security.

"When we discovered their existence, we informed OHS officials that we had absolutely no use for that kind of information," Dresslar said. "Collecting information on protests has no legitimate anti-terrorism intelligence function. None. No intelligence agency has any need to maintain this kind of information."

The reports obtained by The Times contain summaries of news articles about the war in Iraq, animal rights activists and terrorism. One has a section titled "Upcoming California Protests," followed by summaries of the demonstrations. Each includes an entry for "officer safety issues." No issues are cited.

One group whose antiwar rally was in the reports criticized the state agency's practice.

"It seems like a waste of taxpayer dollars and a creeping invasion of our 1st Amendment rights to demonstrate and speak," said Devlin Donnelly, assistant coordinator for the Chico Peace and Justice Center, which held a rally in Chico in March calling for an end to the war in Iraq.

Schwarzenegger had "no information and no knowledge that this was happening," said Adam Mendelsohn, the governor's communications director. "The governor feels that this particular information gathering is totally inappropriate and unacceptable."

Anti-terrorism ideas from the state homeland security office have stirred qualms before.

Past and present members of the attorney general's office said they were troubled by a meeting at the security office last September in which federal and state officials discussed ways to prevent Islamic militants from recruiting prison inmates. In attendance were officials from the FBI, the state Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation and various local law enforcement agencies, according to documents obtained by The Times.

One account of the meeting is provided in a whistle-blower complaint filed by a former high-ranking official in the attorney general's office, Edward Manavian.

The complaint says homeland security information analyst William Hipsley proposed monitoring private conversations in state prisons between inmates and Islamic clergymen and, citing a potential national security threat from Iran, getting a list of Iranians living in California.

State law makes it a felony to eavesdrop on conversations between a person in custody and his attorney, doctor or religious advisor.

Brian Parriott, a spokesman for the state prison system, said it is not the corrections department's practice to listen in on private conversations between inmates and visitors from the clergy.

And Mark Schlosberg, a policy director for the ACLU's San Francisco office, said it is discriminatory to compile databases on broad groups of people based on national origin without any specific link to criminal activity.

"It's contrary to our constitutional protections and our systems, and it's also ineffective in terms of law enforcement," Schlosberg said.

DOJ_NMG_0037877

The state homeland security office denied Manavian's version of events and issued rebuttals from Hipsley and a staff member who also attended.

In a written statement, Hipsley said that he never suggested "Muslim clerics offices be 'bugged' " and that the subject of Iran never came up.

George Aradi, an assistant deputy director for information analysis, concurred in a separate statement.

Manavian was demoted in February. In his complaint, he said that happened in part because he refused to cooperate with "attempts to violate the civil rights of citizens in this state."

He resigned in April. His complaint is pending before the state Personnel Board, and a hearing is scheduled in late July.

Lockyer's office publicly criticized the monitoring actions after an inquiry from The Times.

But Allen Benitez, assistant chief of the attorney general's criminal intelligence bureau, had told one of his bosses in a memo April 18 that the security office was gathering information on "political groups" and protests. He voiced concerns that such tracking "may not be allowed under the law."

Lockyer's office handled the matter privately with the security office, Dresslar said.

Questions about the office come at a time when assessments by nonpartisan reviewers have concluded the state is unprepared for a terrorist attack or natural disaster.

Schwarzenegger casts himself as being immersed in efforts to prepare California for disaster, making repeated public visits to the state's emergency command center outside Sacramento, where he has watched over exercises simulating what would happen in a disaster, such as an earthquake or flood.

But a report by the legislative analyst's office last year said California lacks "a unified strategic approach to homeland security."

And more recently, the state's Little Hoover Commission watchdog agency issued a report saying it is unclear who would take charge in the event of an emergency or terrorist attack.

Mystery Surrounds FBI Raid On North Side Mosque (PPG)

By Moustafa Ayad, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, July 1, 2006

Agency calls it part of 'criminal' probe

FBI agents yesterday raided a North Side residence known to many in the neighborhood and the Pittsburgh Islamic community as both an Islamic school and mosque.

The agency would say only that the search was in connection with a "criminal investigation" and wouldn't elaborate.

The raid began around noon when authorities shut down the intersection of Boyle and Hemlock streets, residents said. The activity centered around a three-story green house located in the 1300 block of Boyle Street. It is home to the Sankore Institute and Light of Age Mosque, which doubles as a school for people seeking to learn the Koran and Islamic religious teachings.

FBI spokesman Jeff Killeen confirmed that the FBI was at the home. Mr. Killeen referred questions to Margaret Philbin, the U.S. attorney's spokeswoman, who said that the FBI executed a search warrant at the home yesterday morning or afternoon.

Authorities did not say if anyone was taken into custody, but residents said several men in tunics and traditional Muslim garb were led out of the house, patted down and searched along Boyle Street. The agents may have executed the raid during Friday prayers known as the Jummah prayer, neighbors said.

The group moved into the neighborhood around February and posted fliers that said "we are here to help you make the North Side a better place to live, worship, work and play." The group urged people "to join us in clothing and feeding the poor, cleaning up our community and making the North Side a safer, more beautiful place for our children."

Neighbors who witnessed the raid said FBI agents surrounded the home for more than four hours yesterday. They said there was a tactical squad at the scene backing up agents.

"It's scary to see guys with guns slung over their shoulders right in front of you," said Harold King, of Avalon, who was visiting a relative.

Muslim community members familiar with the group said the institute is not a part of the seven mosques under the auspices of the Islamic Council of Greater Pittsburgh. Most members of the mosque are African-American, neighbors said.

The home has two entrances, one facing Boyle Street and a side door on Hemlock Street. The Hemlock Street entrance is used by women and the Boyle Street entrance by men, neighbors said. Some orthodox Muslims do not mix genders, unless women are related or married to the men in their company.

"They are some of the nicest people in the neighborhood," said Anthony Carboni, who lives nearby on Sandusky Street. Mr. Carboni said he would often see people at the home playing football outside or hosting cookouts in the neighborhood.

DOJ_NMG_0037878

A jitney driver, Andre Hammer, of the North Side, who was driving by the intersection, said he passed by the residence several weeks ago and saw police cars parked outside. Mr. Hammer said he would often see men outside of the home talking.

Gigi Lincoln of Boyle Street said she watched the men being lined up against several houses. Mrs. Lincoln said the agents searched each of the men extensively and then had police dogs walk past them. She said agents also used a robot to enter the home.

She said they loaded some of the men into the back of a white van, but said they did not appear to be handcuffed.

Witold Walczak, legal director for the American Civil Liberties Union of Pennsylvania, said "any time law enforcement officials raid a house of worship it raises concerns," but said it would be premature to comment further.

Unclassified Advice For The New CIA Chief (LAT)

By Garrett Jones, Garrett Jones Served As A Case Officer With The Cia In Africa, Europe And The Middle East For 17 Yea
The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

A former case officer outlines the care and handling of spooks.

Because this is the season for gratuitous and unsolicited advice (see any graduation ceremony near you), I thought I would offer some thoughts for former Air Force Gen. Michael V. Hayden, who took over as CIA director a month ago. I am sure many people are sharing their wisdom on the "big picture," so I will confine myself to advice on the care and feeding of the denizens of the building where I once worked.

THEY ARE AN odd bunch at the Central Intelligence Agency, and your predecessor, Porter Goss, did not adapt well. He seemed unable to make it out of the lobby each morning without starting a fistfight. You can do better.

For starters, resist any impulse to "demonstrate who is in charge." The people at the agency have never had any problem understanding who is in charge; they have on occasion had trouble believing that the person in charge knew what he was doing.

As CIA director, Goss said he did not "do" personnel, and inside the agency, it was easily the most resented remark he ever made. You have talented people working for you. Use them, and do not go to the retirees looking for the "perfect" person. They don't make them like they used to, and that's probably a good thing.

Do not try to undo all the personnel changes made by Goss. Some people needed to be pushed out. You're trying to hire back Stephen Kappes, the former field operations boss, as your deputy, and this is good and bad. Many officers respect his operational judgment, and many are angry about his alleged leaks to the media. On your team, he should keep his mouth shut.

Goss let his entourage alienate the entire building before he ever got there. Get your assistants under control. It's better to make your own enemies. You probably brought some military aides with you. Remind them that half the agency does not know the difference between a full colonel and a milkshake; those who do know don't care.

Don't ask anyone to dumb down their work for you. The CIA has a jargon that you need to learn. Before you change anything about agency culture, first you need to understand it.

The executive dining room is a bad idea. You and your staff should be down in the cafeteria meeting people, not huddled up in a bunker wondering what folks think. Listen to people. They are smart and sophisticated and will usually tell you what is wrong if you give them a chance.

The RUMINT (rumor intelligence) on you is that you like "corporate speak" and prefer large, impersonal gatherings to one-on-one encounters. Work on that. Blunt, plain speech will get you further with those in the agency than anything else. If something is going to happen to them, tell them before they see it in the Los Angeles Times. "I do not know" or "I cannot tell you" are statements that spooks accept as sometimes necessary, but they will always find out if you lie to them. You are working with a bunch of spies, so you should not be surprised that RUMINT travels quickly and is surprisingly accurate. Yes, you are busy, but your first job is to make people motivated and effective. Screw this up and you are doomed.

The directorate of operations is where all the spies live. Frankly, this is a tough room. Your best move is to pick someone whom they respect to lead them — lead them, not manage them. When they are in some sand-blown flyspeck in Iraq with their lives on the line, they want a leader who cares about them and their mission, not a nice guy who is good at managing his paperwork. Once you get them a leader, you need to expect the impossible from them. Right now, everyone is afraid to make mistakes. Make it clear that you have confidence in them and will back them even if they do not succeed. This directorate exists to run high-risk, high-payoff operations; otherwise, it could be replaced by Al Jazeera.

The directorate of intelligence is where the analysts live and where the National Intelligence Estimates are produced. This place is a mess. Since the fiasco over Iraqi weapons of mass destruction, it has been full of dead men walking, paralyzed with fear of making another mistake. Start over. Anyone associated with the WMD mess — and there are such people still there — needs to be retired, kicked upstairs or otherwise moved on. It may not be fair, just or efficient, but you must do it to blow the smell of failure out of the organization. Then appoint a pit bull as the quality-control officer for analysis.

Your job is one of the most important in Washington, and one of the toughest. You are playing "Bet your country's future" every day. History has not been kind to your immediate predecessors. They got famous in the worst ways. Good luck. You're going to need it.

WAR NEWS:

Blast Kills 66 In Baghdad Shiite District (AP-Y2)

By Robert H. Reid, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2006

A huge car bomb exploded Saturday at a bustling outdoor market in a Shiite district of Baghdad, killing at least 66 people and injuring about 100. It was the deadliest attack since the new national unity government took office six weeks ago and one of the biggest this year.

Shortly before the midmorning blast, gunmen seized a female Sunni legislator at a checkpoint in a Shiite area of the capital. Both attacks represented a major challenge to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's vow to curb sectarian violence that threatens to plunge Iraq into civil war.

In an audio recording posted on the Internet, al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden endorsed the successor to the slain leader of his network in Iraq and warned the country's Shiites against collaborating with the Americans in the fight against Sunni insurgents.

The comments threatened to sharpen the conflict between Shiites and Sunnis even as al-Maliki and his American allies struggled to heal the breach between the country's major religious communities.

The market bombing appeared timed to cause a maximum number of casualties among civilians doing their weekend shopping. It blew some victims onto the roofs of nearby two-story buildings and sent a plume of gray smoke billowing into the sky above Sadr City, stronghold of radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Rescuers sprinted through streets littered with debris of shattered market stalls. Emergency crews bundled the wounded into ambulances and private cars and rushed them to hospitals. Late Saturday, Iraqi state television reported that 66 people died and about 100 were wounded.

The bombing was the deadliest since an April 7 suicide attack that killed 87 people at a Shiite mosque in Baghdad.

A statement posted Saturday on the Internet claimed responsibility for the Sadr City blast in the name of the "Sunna Supporters Group" in retaliation for Shiite attacks on Sunnis. The statement, whose authenticity could not be verified, accused Shiites of killing Sunnis and raping Sunni women in detention.

"Your mujahedeen brothers decided to teach the Shiites a lesson that they will not forget as long as they live," the statement said.

Even before the statement appeared, bystanders in Sadr City blamed Sunni extremists, such as al-Qaida in Iraq, whose leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed in a U.S. airstrike June 7.

"Give us the green light to attack and finish them for once and for all," a group of young men shouted, referring to Sunni militants.

A few miles from the blast, gunmen seized lawmaker Tayseer al-Mashhadani and seven of her bodyguards at a checkpoint in a Shiite area of eastern Baghdad. Officials said she was traveling to Baghdad from her home in nearly Diyala province, a hotbed of sectarian violence, to attend a parliament session Sunday. One of her bodyguards escaped, officials said.

Al-Mashhadani's colleagues in the Iraqi Islamic Party, the largest Sunni political organization, blamed the ministers of interior and defense for failing to restore security in the capital. A party statement alleged that some of the kidnappers carried government-issue weapons.

A top party official, Ayad al-Sammaraie, said such kidnappings were aimed at undermining steps toward national reconciliation by fueling animosity among Iraqis so "they cannot sit together and talk."

The U.S. Embassy condemned the kidnapping as an attempt to stoke sectarian tension and demanded her immediate release.

"We note that Ms. al-Mashhadani is an elected representative of the people of Iraq and that this act is repugnant to all who believe in the right of Iraqis to participate in their country's democracy," the embassy said.

The latest violence occurred as al-Maliki, a Shiite, left for a tour of Persian Gulf countries to brief leaders on his plans for national reconciliation, including amnesty for Sunni Arab insurgents and efforts to heal the Shiite-Sunni rift.

DOJ_NMG_0037880

Al-Maliki's first stop was Saudi Arabia, whose government fears that sectarian violence in Iraq could spill over into neighboring countries that are dominated by Sunnis but with large Shiite communities. He is also to visit Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates.

As part of the reconciliation plan, Iraqi and U.S. authorities Saturday freed 495 prisoners from U.S. jails across Iraq, completing a mass release announced by al-Maliki last month. Most of the prisoners were believed to be Sunnis.

"We are prepared in consultation with the Iraqi leaders to make future prisoner releases and to take other concrete steps to facilitate reconciliation," U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said in a statement. "As the government moves forward with these steps, it can count on support from the U.S. government."

U.S. and Iraqi officials had hoped that installation of a new unity government of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds would stem the violence and encourage armed groups to join the political process. Those hopes were buoyed by the death of al-Zarqawi in an airstrike June 7.

However, more than 700 Iraqi civilians and security forces have died violently since al-Zarqawi's death, according to Associated Press figures.

In his Internet statement, bin Laden endorsed Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, named by the terror network as al-Zarqawi's successor, and urged him to step up "the struggle" in Iraq. Bin Laden also warned Iraqi Shiites they "cannot just take part with America and its allies" in the war against Sunni militants "and expect that their areas will be safe from a reaction and harm."

Two American service members died of non-combat related injuries in two separate incidents, the U.S. military announced.

One was assigned to the Army's 43rd Military Police Brigade. The other was an Air Force member assigned to the 886th Expeditionary Security Forces Squadron at Camp Bucca in southern Iraq, the Air Force said in a separate statement.

No further details were released and names of the victims were withheld pending notification of kin.

Elsewhere, police found a grave in Baghdad containing bodies of at least six men who appeared to have been shot more than a month ago, Lt. Thaer Mahmoud said. The identities of the men were unknown, but their bodies were discovered in a Baghdad area notorious for sectarian killings.

New details emerged into allegations that U.S. soldiers raped an Iraqi woman south of Baghdad in March, then killed her and three family members.

A U.S. official familiar with the investigation told The Associated Press that the soldiers allegedly plotted the attack for about a week. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the case is under investigation, said the soldiers doused the woman's body with flammable liquid and burned it to cover up the assault.

U.S. officials said they knew of the deaths but thought the victims died due to sectarian violence. Police Capt. Ihsan Abdul-Rahman said Iraqi officials received a report March 13 alleging that U.S. soldiers had killed the family, but did not pass that report to the U.S.

G.I.'s Investigated In Slayings Of 4 And Rape In Iraq (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 30 — The American military is investigating accusations that soldiers raped an Iraqi woman in her home and killed her and three family members, including a child, American officials said Friday.

The investigation is the fourth into suspected killings of unarmed Iraqis by American soldiers announced by the military in June. In May, it was disclosed that the military was conducting an inquiry into the deaths of 24 civilians in Haditha last November.

The alleged rape and killings took place March 12 in the vicinity of the volatile market town of Mahmudiya, an insurgent stronghold about 20 miles south of Baghdad. The killing of the family was originally reported by the military as due to "insurgent activity," American officials said.

A senior police official in Mahmudiya said in a telephone interview that he received a report of the killings in March. The victims were a woman, her child, her husband and the husband's brother, he said. The official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of reprisals, said a sheik from the family's tribe immediately reported the episode to the police.

The American investigation began June 24, one day after two soldiers "reported alleged coalition force involvement" in the deaths of the Iraqi civilians, the military said in a written statement. A preliminary inquiry conducted after that report determined that there was sufficient evidence to merit a criminal investigation, the military said.

DOJ_NMG_0037881

"This is going to be a by-the-numbers, by-the-book investigation," Maj. Todd Breasseale, a military spokesman, said in a telephone interview. He said Maj. Gen. J. D. Thurman, commander of the Fourth Infantry Division, which oversees the capital and areas immediately to the south, ordered an inquiry "the minute he got the news."

The American officials, who spoke anonymously because they were not authorized to speak publicly about possible criminal proceedings, said the investigation involved five soldiers from the 502nd Infantry Regiment, attached to the Fourth Infantry Division.

A senior American official confirmed several details first reported by The Associated Press on Friday, including that the soldiers were accused of raping the woman, before killing her and three other family members and possibly burning her body. An Army official in Washington also confirmed that the inquiry was focused on soldiers of the 502nd Infantry Regiment, adding, "The allegation is one of rape and murder."

Earlier this month, two soldiers from the same unit were abducted while guarding a traffic control point in the town of Yusufiya and killed by insurgents, and their mutilated bodies were later found along a road booby-trapped with hidden explosives. A third soldier was killed in Yusufiya at the time of the ambush.

The alleged rape and killings came to light after a soldier felt compelled to talk about it in a "counseling-type session," after the discovery of the bodies of his kidnapped colleagues, The Associated Press reported. The soldier who originally disclosed the alleged killings had heard about them but had not taken part in them, The A.P. said.

One soldier has admitted his role and has been arrested; others have had their weapons taken away and are confined to their base in Mahmudiya, American officials said. The soldiers under investigation are apparently from the same platoon as the three killed in Yusufiya.

Both Mahmudiya and Yusufiya are in the so-called Triangle of Death, an extremely dangerous area along the Euphrates River valley that has become a melting pot of insurgents, criminal gangs and lawless tribes. The American military considers the region a crucial strategic approach to Baghdad, with important highways running south to the holy city of Najaf and the oil center of Basra, but has never been able to establish control in the region.

This latest investigation comes at a time of increasing scrutiny over the killings of civilians by American troops in Iraq. In Haditha, marines are accused of executing as many as 24 unarmed civilians after a fellow marine was killed by a roadside bomb. On June 1, as the political furor over Haditha was building, the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, lashed out at the American military, saying that violence against Iraqi civilians by American troops was a "regular occurrence."

Major Breasseale said Friday that he did not know when results of the Haditha investigation would be made public.

In June, the Army charged four American soldiers suspected of killing three detainees in Iraq and then threatening another American soldier with death if he reported the shootings.

Two days later, the Marine Corps said it had charged seven marines and one Navy corpsman with murder and kidnapping in the April killing of an Iraqi man in a village on the western outskirts of Baghdad. In that episode, the assailants are accused of planting a Kalashnikov rifle and shovel by the body of the victim to frame him as an insurgent after shooting him in the face four times.

Last Sunday, the military said two members of the Pennsylvania National Guard had been charged with involuntary manslaughter in the fatal shooting of an unarmed Iraqi man on Feb. 15.

The announcement of the investigation in Mahmudiya came as the military said Friday that three soldiers had been killed in separate combat incidents. One died Thursday night in a bombing during a foot patrol south of Baghdad. Another was killed in an explosion while on patrol on Thursday night near Balad, north of the capital; that blast also wounded a soldier. The third death occurred Thursday in the northern city of Mosul, when a soldier was killed by small-arms fire.

At least 60 American soldiers died in Iraq in June, a slight decline from 69 in May and 76 in April. Yet, that was almost twice as many as in March, which, at 31, had the second-lowest monthly fatality count of the war. Until the sharp spike in April, American fatalities had been dropping for five straight months. American commanders at the time attributed the decline to a shift by insurgents to concentrating attacks on Iraqi civilians and local security forces, and to the fact that Americans were leaving their bases less often on operations and patrols.

Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a spokesman for the American command, said he saw no clear reason for the rise in fatalities after March or the small drop in June. "We are not inclined to attribute the rise and fall in numbers to any particular factor," he said. "Coalition forces remain a priority target for terrorists and insurgents, even though we've also seen a steady increase in attacks on civilians and Iraqi security forces as their primary targets."

Deaths of Iraqi civilians dropped in June from previous months, according to a rough estimate by the Iraq Coalition Casualty Count, an independent Web site. At least 840 Iraqi civilians died in June, compared with an all-time high of 1,100 the previous month, according to the site, which counts deaths from news reports. The June toll was about the same as that in February, the month that hundreds of civilians were killed in sectarian bloodletting after the bombing of a sacred Shiite shrine.

DOJ_NMG_0037882

Three civilians were killed Friday when a bomb exploded in a minibus in Kirkuk, and an Iraqi soldier died in another bombing in the west of the city, police officials said. Gunmen killed five Iraqi soldiers at a checkpoint south of Kirkuk. At least 21 bodies were found across Iraq, many showing signs of torture. One of them was a boy in Baghdad between the ages of 4 and 6 who had been tortured and shot in the head, an Interior Ministry official said.

The Russian government offered $10 million for information leading to the killers of five Russian Embassy workers here. On Wednesday, President Vladimir V. Putin ordered Russian special services to hunt down and kill those responsible.

In an Internet audio message posted Thursday night, Osama bin Laden praised Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Jordanian militant killed in an American airstrike this month. Mr. bin Laden defended the copious bloodshed engineered by Mr. Zarqawi and his group, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, saying that Mr. Zarqawi "had clear instructions to concentrate his fighting on the occupying invaders" and "make neutral those who wished to be neutral," according to a translation by the SITE Institute, which tracks jihadist Internet postings. Mr. bin Laden vowed that the struggle would continue in Iraq and demanded that the ruler of Jordan, King Abdullah II, allow Mr. Zarqawi to be buried in his hometown of Zarqa, Jordan.

Atrocities Against Iraqi Family Alleged

BAGHDAD, June 30 -- The U.S. Army is investigating allegations that American soldiers raped and killed a woman and killed three of her family members in a town south of Baghdad, then reported the incident as an insurgent attack, a military official said Friday.

The alleged crimes occurred in March in the insurgent hotbed of Mahmudiyah. The four soldiers involved, from the 502nd Infantry Regiment, attempted to burn the family's home to the ground and blamed insurgents for the carnage, according to a military official familiar with the investigation, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was providing details not released publicly.

No charges have yet been filed in the case, which the official said was "in the very early stages."

Maj. Gen James D. Thurman, commander of the Army's 4th Infantry Division, to which the 502nd is attached, ordered the investigation into the killings more than a week ago, according to a terse statement released by the military Friday. A preliminary inquiry "found sufficient information existed to recommend a criminal investigation into the incident," the statement said.

Also Friday, the military reported the deaths of three soldiers in insurgent attacks Thursday. One was killed by a roadside bomb while on foot patrol in Baghdad. Another died in a roadside bomb attack in Balad, north of Baghdad. The third was killed by small-arms fire in the northern city of Mosul. No further information was provided.

The case in Mahmudiyah, a rural town in a Sunni Arab region dubbed the Triangle of Death for the insurgent attacks and crimes that are common there, was the latest in a string of allegations of unlawful killings -- and subsequent coverups -- by U.S. forces in recent months, beginning with reports in March that Marines killed 24 unarmed civilians in the western town of Haditha. Investigations continue into that case.

In June, seven Marines and a Navy corpsman were charged with murder and other crimes related to the shooting death of a crippled man in Hamdaniya, west of Baghdad. Residents there said the soldiers planted a rifle and a shovel near the victim's body to make it look as if he had been burying roadside bombs.

Later in June, three soldiers were charged with murdering three Iraqi detainees in U.S. custody and threatening to kill another soldier who saw the incident. And last week, two Pennsylvania National Guardsmen were charged with murder in the shooting death of an unarmed man in the western city of Ramadi and with trying to cover up the crime.

At least 14 U.S. service members have been convicted of crimes related to the deaths of Iraqi civilians or detainees, according to the Associated Press. Investigations have intensified in recent months following the high-profile Haditha allegations, pressure from the Iraqi government on military commanders to curtail excessive force by soldiers, and an initiative by Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the top U.S. ground commander in Iraq, to cut down on civilian casualties.

But the prospect that soldiers may have committed rape could make the Mahmudiyah allegations particularly incendiary. Charges that U.S. forces have killed civilians come as little shock to many Iraqis, but sex crimes -- especially those perpetrated against Muslim women by someone outside the faith -- can generate greater outrage in the Islamic world. The 2004 Abu Ghraib prison abuse scandal inflamed passions in large part because of the sexual humiliations detainees suffered.

Ammar Jabouri, a spokesman for the Iraqi Islamic Party, Iraq's largest Sunni Arab political organization and a frequent critic of U.S. actions against Iraqi civilians, said he was unaware of previous charges of rape against American soldiers.

Jabouri said that when he and others have spoken to U.S. officials about abuses by troops, the officials "explain it as 'reckless behavior by soldiers under stress.' They promise to investigate, but nothing comes out of that."

DOJ_NMG_0037883

The unit in Mahmudiyah had attributed the deaths of the four civilians to "insurgent activity, which is common in the area," until two soldiers from the 502nd came forward June 23 to say U.S. troops were responsible, the military official said. An investigation began the next day. Three of the soldiers are still in Iraq, and one has been discharged for reasons unrelated to the case, he said. None is under confinement.

"They cannot be held until or unless there is enough evidence," the official said.

Mahmudiyah police Capt. Maaly Hassan Felayh said the alleged killings in March took place in a rural neighborhood called Stream Three, three miles south of the town center.

It was one of three cases since February in which U.S. forces killed Iraqi troops in the area, he said, including a shooting at a checkpoint in April that left 11 Iraqis dead.

Another local resident, Sadeq Muhammed al-Janabi, a farmer, said the woman who was raped and killed was an elementary school teacher.

In mid-June, two other members of the same brigade were abducted, their bodies later found mutilated in the town of Yusufiyah, near Mahmudiyah. The soldiers under investigation for the killings in Mahmudiyah were from the same platoon as those later abducted and killed, the AP reported, citing an account provided by an unnamed official with the unit who said the incidents were unrelated. Platoons usually number about 40 soldiers.

The AP, whose reporter was embedded with the 502nd in early June, also reported Friday that at least one soldier had confessed to involvement in the alleged crimes and was motivated to come forward when his fellow soldiers were kidnapped and murdered.

Elsewhere in Iraq on Friday, Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr called on followers to prepare themselves to go to the predominantly Sunni Arab northern city of Samarra to help rebuild a Shiite shrine damaged in a February bombing that triggered months of sectarian violence. "Believers inside and outside Iraq should register their names as volunteers to build and protect the holy shrine," said Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia terrorized Sunni neighborhoods following the bombing of Samarra's Askariya Shrine.

In Baghdad, the Association of Muslim Scholars, an influential Sunni religious organization with close ties to some Iraqi insurgent groups, rejected a plan for reconciliation between Iraq's rival sects proposed by Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Maliki offered amnesty to insurgents who had not committed major crimes and said some insurgent groups had responded positively to the offer.

But in an interview with the Agence France-Presse news agency, Muthana Hareth Dhari, a Muslim Scholars official, said that "the main resistance factions have rejected" the plan and called it "nothing but a public relations campaign to brighten the image of the government."

Army Probes Iraq Family Deaths (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, July 1, 2006

The Army has opened a criminal investigation into charges that soldiers murdered an Iraqi family south of Baghdad last month, marking the fourth such ongoing probe of American personnel in the war.

At the Pentagon, a top U.S. commander in Baghdad said yesterday that attacks have gone up, not down, since new Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki ordered a citywide crackdown.

Army Col. Jeffrey J. Snow, a brigade commander in the 10th Mountain Division, also openly worried that negative press coverage of the war will sap the American public's support for the troops.

"I think sometimes we just focus a little bit too much attention to, you know, [improvised explosive devices], and kidnappings and murders," Col. Snow said.

The command in Baghdad said Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman, who heads all forces in and around Baghdad, had asked the Army Criminal Investigative Division to probe whether five soldiers were involved in killing an Iraqi family of four in the town of Mahmoudiyah, in the so-called Triangle of Death.

The probe follows the brutal killings by insurgents in the area of two Army soldiers who belonged to the same platoon as those now being investigated in connection with murder. The time of the family's killing is not clear, but it occurred during a time when Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the overall battlefield commander, ordered retraining on core values for every soldier and Marine, especially on the issue of protecting noncombatants.

Ryan Lenza, an Associated Press reporter embedded with Army troops, reported that one soldier admitted to his role in the killings and was arrested. The Army says no soldier has been formally charged.

DOJ_NMG_0037884

The disclosure of yet another slaying probe promises to complicate the ongoing process of Mr. al-Maliki trying to coax Sunni Muslim opposition and tribal leaders to join his new government. Foreign terrorists use such purported incidents of U.S. abuse to inflame the Sunni community, which lost power to the Shi'ites in December elections, and to recruit terrorists to come to Iraq.

The Naval Criminal Investigative Service is now investigating the suspected killing of 24 Iraqis in Haditha by Marines, and criminal defense lawyers expect murder charges to be filed. The Marine Corps already has charged seven Marines and a sailor with murder in the death of an Iraqi man on April 26. And, the Army has filed murder charges against four soldiers in the death of male detainees.

At the Pentagon, Col. Snow said via a conference call from Iraq that he worries that a "political decision" in Washington may cut short the mission. Some Democrats have demanded a definite pullout date for U.S. troops, but the Senate and House voted down those proposals.

Col. Snow, who listed a number of achievements by his brigades in Sunni and Shi'ite neighborhoods of west Baghdad, said he also worries about bad press.

"This war is a battle of wills," he said. "The insurgents will never defeat our soldiers' will to fight -- ever. So they've taken aim at the willpower of the American people. Our soldiers may be in the cross hairs ever day, but it is the American voter who is the real target, and it is the media that carries the message back each day across the airwaves.

"So when the news is not balanced and it's always bad, that clearly leads to negative perceptions back home. Now, I'm not saying bad things don't happen. They do. But there are also good things going on, and we are making progress."

Pressed to document the progress in terms of enemy attacks, Col. Snow said, "Attacks here recently are up in our area. However, the effectiveness, the overall effectiveness of them, down." He said the increase stems from his brigade conducting more patrols and checkpoints to put pressure on insurgents.

4 Soldiers Accused Of Iraq Rape, Killings (LAT)

By Solomon Moore And Peter Spiegel, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

BAGHDAD — The U.S. military is investigating U.S. soldiers accused of raping an Iraqi woman near their guard post, killing her and three family members and burning their home with the bodies inside.

The rape and murder case, announced Friday, was opened by the military a week ago after two U.S. soldiers came forward with information about the March 12 deaths in the town of Mahmoudiya, south of Baghdad.

A terse statement issued Friday by the Army said that on June 23, the two soldiers reported the alleged American involvement and that a preliminary investigation found sufficient evidence to continue.

Four soldiers are under investigation in the case.

"We found out when someone spilled their guts," said a U.S. military official with knowledge of the inquiry, which is being conducted by the Army Criminal Investigation Command under orders from Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman, commander of the 4th Infantry Division.

"There is a lot of heat on the leadership," the official said. "This is the last thing we need."

The rape allegations are potentially explosive in a Muslim nation where tribal customs often enforce female chastity under penalty of death.

Previous reports of American servicemen killing civilians have led Iraqis to call for Washington to withdraw its troops.

The deaths in March occurred in the same area as the kidnapping and killing last month of two Army privates, an Army official said, and involve the same unit — the 502nd Infantry Regiment, which is attached to the 4th Infantry Division — but it was unclear whether there was a connection between the deaths of the family members in Mahmoudiya and the June 16 attack on the U.S. soldiers at an observation post near Yousifiya.

One soldier was killed in the attack and two were kidnapped. Days later, their bodies were found mutilated and booby-trapped with explosives near a Yousifiya power plant complex.

Yousifiya and Mahmoudiya lie along the Euphrates River, in an area many Iraqis call the "Triangle of Death" because of the level of insurgent violence. Scores of Iraqis, especially Shiite Muslims traveling to southern Iraq, have been killed in the region, and U.S. military officials said Abu Musab Zarqawi, the recently slain leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, might have hidden out in the palm-fringed villages.

The Army official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the investigation is continuing, said the soldiers in the unit were in a "combat stress debriefing" a week after the kidnapping incident to deal with any psychological issues stemming from it. At the session, the official said, a soldier told his superiors that he had heard of other members in the unit who were involved in the rape of a woman and the killing of three others.

The investigation turned up another witness, who said he had heard the same account and added that the soldiers involved were seen with blood on their uniforms.

Military investigators now believe that two soldiers raped the woman and that one of them killed her and three other people — two adults and a child — in the house.

The incident was initially reported as "insurgent activity," the military source said.

The soldiers have been confined to their base and stripped of their weapons, said the source, who also spoke on condition of anonymity because of the investigation.

However, the Army official said one of the soldiers had been discharged and was back in the United States, where the military was working with civilian authorities to track him down.

Recent allegations of servicemen killing unarmed Iraqi civilians have led to several investigations by the U.S. military.

After a Time magazine article in March alleged that Marines had killed 24 Iraqi civilians, including 10 women and children, in the western town of Haditha on Nov. 19, the military launched an investigation of the incident and of the possibility that military officials had conspired to cover it up.

The military is also investigating seven Marines and a Navy corpsman in connection with the April 26 slaying of an Iraqi civilian in Hamandiya, west of Baghdad. That case also involves a possible cover-up.

Last week, military officials announced that two soldiers had been charged with voluntary manslaughter in the shooting death of an unarmed Ramadi resident Feb. 15. The soldiers are accused of trying to make it appear that the man was an insurgent by placing a rifle next to his body.

In the Mahmoudiya case, investigators are trying to determine whether the bodies were burned to destroy evidence of a crime.

Muayed Fadil, the mayor of Yousifiya, said that investigators called him Thursday to ask about the deaths and that he found it unusual that they were so interested in this particular family.

"They said, 'We want to know their names, where they were living, how they were killed,' " he said. "They asked me, 'Do you know their relatives or the chief of their tribe?' I told them I will work to find out who their relatives are."

He said the investigators did not divulge that U.S. soldiers had been accused in the deaths.

The military source acknowledged that it was unusual for such a small contingent of soldiers to be operating alone in Iraq. Generally, U.S. troops travel in convoys. The lack of manpower south of Baghdad is a chronic problem and may have led commanders to stretch their forces thin, the source said.

"I don't want to speculate on what the commander down there was thinking, but I don't know why he had his troops arrayed that way," the source said. "I do know there's a lack of manpower down there."

An investigation of the deaths of the three American soldiers last month seeks to determine why they were alone at their observation post outside the base. The source said lack of manpower might have been a factor in that case as well.

Violence continued to flare in the country Friday. The worst involved a battle between Shiites and Sunni Arabs in a village northeast of Baghdad stemming from a bombing this week that killed at least 25 people.

As Iraqi police officers attempted to break up the conflict, snipers killed the head of the police force and two of his bodyguards. American and Iraqi troops then entered the battle, killing three fighters and wounding three.

The Sunnis were attacked while they were moving out of the village of Daliqiya after being threatened by Shiite residents in the religiously mixed hamlet, officials said.

A U.S. Marine was killed Wednesday during combat operations in Al Anbar province, officials said. Two soldiers were killed and one was wounded while on patrol Thursday near Baghdad and Balad. The names of the casualties were not released, pending notification of relatives.

Also Friday, Russia said it would pay $10 million for information about the killers of five of its embassy workers in Iraq. The announcement came two days after President Vladimir V. Putin ordered special forces to hunt down and kill the assailants.

Four Russians seized in early June were killed and a fifth was slain during the abduction. Insurgents videotaped the execution of two of the men. The militants had demanded that Russia pull its troops out of Chechnya, a predominantly Muslim republic in southern Russia.

Criminal Cases Against U.S. Soldiers (AP-Y2)

By The Associated Press

AP2, July 1, 2006

A look at criminal cases against U.S. soldiers stemming from the deaths of Iraqis since the war began in 2003:

PENDING CASES:

_Pfc. Corey R. Clagett, Spc. Juston R. Graber, Staff Sgt. Raymond L. Girouard and Spc. William B. Hunsaker charged with premeditated murder of three male detainees in Salahuddin province in May. Clagett, Girouard and Hunsaker also charged with obstructing justice for allegedly threatening to kill another soldier who was a witness in the case.

_Hospitalman Third Class Melson J. Bacos; Sgt. Lawrence G. Hutchins III; Lance Cpl. Tyler A. Jackson; Pfc. John J. Jodka; Cpl. Marshall L. Magincalda; Lance Cpl. Robert B. Pennington; Lance Cpl. Jerry E. Shumate Jr.; and Marine Cpl. Trent D. Thomas charged with premeditated murder in April shooting death of Iraqi man in Hamdania. All eight also charged with kidnapping, larceny, conspiracy, assault and housebreaking.

_Five U.S. Army soldiers from 502nd Infantry Regiment being investigated for allegedly raping a young woman in March, then killing her and three members of her family in Mahmoudiyah, south of Baghdad, a U.S. military official tells The Associated Press.

_National Guard Sgt. Milton Ortiz Jr. and Spc. Nathan B. Lynn charged in shooting death of unarmed Iraqi man near Ramadi in February. Both also charged with obstructing justice. Lynn charged with voluntary manslaughter. Ortiz also faces charges of assault and communicating a threat in separate incident involving another Iraqi man.

_Capt. James Kimber, Capt. Lucas M. McConnell, Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich and an unidentified Marine under investigation for killings of two dozen unarmed Iraqi civilians in western town of Haditha on Nov. 19, 2005 in revenge attack after one of their own died in a roadside bombing. Probe focusing on allegations that the Marines stormed into nearby homes and shot occupants as well as others outside, according to U.S. lawmakers briefed by military officials. Separately, the military also investigating if there was a coverup. Iraqi government said it will also investigate.

_Chief Warrant Officer Jefferson L. Williams, Sgt. 1st Class William Sommer and Spc. Jerry Loper charged with murder and dereliction of duty, along with Chief Warrant Officer Lewis Welshofer, an incident in resulting in death of Iraqi Maj. Gen. Abed Hamed Mowhoush after an interrogation in 2003 at a detention camp in al Qaim. Army dropped murder charges against Williams and Loper in exchange for testimony against Welshofer. Murder charge against Sommer also dropped. Both Sommer and Williams face possible administrative discipline.

CONVICTIONS:

_Staff Sgt. Cardenas J. Alban convicted of killing severely wounded 16-year-old Iraqi during fighting in Baghdad's Sadr City neighborhood. Sentenced to one year's confinement, demoted to private and given bad-conduct discharge.

_Staff Sgt. Johnny Horne Jr. pleaded guilty to unpremeditated murder in same case as Alban. Sentenced to three years in prison, had rank reduced to private, forfeited wages and given dishonorable discharge. Horne's prison sentence later reduced to one year.

_Cpl. Dustin Berg of Indiana National Guard convicted and sentenced to 18 months in military prison for shooting death of Iraqi police officer.

_Spc. Rami Dajani convicted of making a false statement following fatal shooting of Iraqi translator. Sentenced to 18 months' confinement and given a reduction in rank and bad conduct discharge.

_Spc. Charley L. Hooser convicted of involuntary manslaughter in same case involving Dajani. Hooser sentenced to three years in prison and given a reduction in rank and bad conduct discharge. Also convicted of making a false statement to investigators.

_Capt. Rogelio "Roger" Maynulet convicted of assault with intent to commit voluntary manslaughter in shooting death of wounded Iraqi. Received no prison time but was dismissed from armed forces.

_Pvt. Federico Daniel Merida of North Carolina National Guard pleaded guilty to killing 17-year-old Iraqi soldier after the two had consensual sex. Sentenced to 25 years in prison, given a reduction in rank and was dishonorably discharged.

_Marine Maj. Clarke Paulus convicted of dereliction of duty and maltreatment in case stemming from death of Iraqi prisoner who was dragged out of holding cell by the neck, stripped naked and left outside for seven hours in June 2003. Paulus, who commanded the Marine detention facility Camp Whitehorse in southern Iraq, was dismissed from the service but received no prison time.

_Sgt. 1st Class Tracy Perkins acquitted of involuntary manslaughter in alleged drowning of Iraqi man but convicted of assault for forcing the man and his cousin into Tigris River. Sentenced to six months in prison.

_1st Lt. Jack Saville pleaded guilty to assault and other crimes in same incident as Perkins. Sentenced to 45 days in military prison.

_Pfc. Edward Richmond convicted of voluntary manslaughter for shooting Iraqi in back of head. Received three years in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0037887

_Sgt. Michael P. Williams convicted in court-martial of one count of premeditated murder and one count of unpremeditated murder in deaths of unarmed civilians during operations near Sadr City. Sentenced to life in prison and given a reduction in rank. Sentence later reduced to 25 years.

_Spc. Brent May convicted in court-martial of one count of unpremeditated murder in same incident as Michael Williams. Sentenced to five years in prison.

_Welshofer, of 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, initially charged with murder, assault and willful dereliction of duty but found guilty of negligent homicide and negligent dereliction of duty in death of Mowhoush. Military jury ordered a reprimand and forfeiture of $6,000 of his salary and restricted him to his home, office and church for two months.

CLEARED/ACQUITTED:

_U.S. troops cleared of intentionally killing civilians in March 15 raid in village of Ishaqi. Military acknowledged "possibly up to nine collateral deaths" in addition to four announced at time of the raid. Iraqis said there were 11 dead.

_Marine 2nd Lt. Ilario Pantano cleared of murder charges in shooting deaths of two Iraqi civilians.

_Staff Sgt. Shane Werst acquitted by jury of premeditated murder for shooting death of unarmed Iraqi.

Four U.S. Service Members Killed In Iraq (WP)

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

The U.S. military has announced the deaths of a Marine and three soldiers from fighting in recent days in Iraq. The names of all four were withheld pending notification of their families.

The Marine was wounded Wednesday, during fighting in Anbar province. Military officials announced his death in a statement e-mailed to news outlets this morning. The statement said the Marine was assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5.

A separate statement said a soldier from the 172nd Stryker Brigade combat team died Thursday from small-arms fire in Mosul.

Another soldier was killed in a bomb explosion Thursday on a foot patrol south of Baghdad.

The fourth fatality was a soldier with the 1/34 Brigade Combat Team who died after his vehicle hit an improvised explosive device near Balad. Another soldier was injured in that attack.

More than 2,500 U.S. military personnel have been killed in Iraq since the March 2003 invasion.

Troops In Ramadi Learn To Live With Danger (AP-Y2)

By Antonio Castaneda, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 1, 2006

The hole in the ceiling is just a way to let out steam for the soldiers showering inside a damaged trailer in Ramadi, one of Iraq's most dangerous cities.

But each knows how that hole was created. A mortar round came through the trailer roof a few weeks ago and could have killed everyone inside had it detonated. Most mortars are not so benign, and there are many here.

The Iraq war for most troops is fleeting; brief ambushes or sudden, powerful roadside bombings. But in this troubled city, the capital of deadly Anbar province, the conflict is nearly constant. Gunbattles in the streets are common and mortars rain down on the bases every week.

On the eastern edge of town at Camp Corregidor, a base named after a famous World War II battle in the Philippines, U.S. soldiers regularly hunker down during "indirect fire" attacks or what they generally call "incoming" — military vernacular for inbound rockets or mortars.

The attacks happen at least three times a week, soldiers say, and usually end with explosions that miss their target. Sometimes the mortars hit nearby neighborhoods, maiming and killing civilians.

But the insurgents also have taken a toll on U.S. troops. This week a soldier at an outpost a few blocks from Camp Corregidor was killed by a mortar. Several soldiers have been wounded by shrapnel.

Many soldiers say they have adjusted to this life under regular fire. They say the attacks rarely injure soldiers or hamper operations, although they have many tales of near-misses.

"My latrines took two 60 millimeter mortars, my shower trailer has been disabled by 80 millimeter mortars, and it's not uncommon for us to pick pieces of shrapnel from the side of building," said Capt. Joe Claburn, 29, of the 1st Battalion, 506th Regiment, 101st Airborne Division. "We get mortared so much that we don't even flinch anymore."

DOJ_NMG_0037888

But others privately acknowledge that the mortars, which thunder throughout the base at all hours, have caused nightmares and took awhile to get used to.

"When we first got here it bothered me. We thought every loud sound was a mortar until we got used to it," said Spc. Lemuel Ross, 24, of Richmond, Va., speaking outside a building that was hit by a rocket-propelled grenade earlier in the year.

The regular insurgent attacks have changed the face of this base, which once was an agricultural college. Troops have piled sandbags on the roofs as protection. Latrines and sidewalks are surrounded by thick concrete walls to deflect shrapnel.

In early June, the military launched an operation to establish new outposts and solidly install U.S. and Iraqi troops in the troubled city 70 miles west of Baghdad.

Some soldiers, desensitized to the attacks, speak of them with fatalistic phrases common in military ranks.

"Mortars are the least of my worries. We look at it this way: If it's going to happen, it's going to happen," said Spc. Milton O'Neal, 20, of Chicago, as he dribbled a basketball during a break between missions.

"Sometimes it's an annoyance if you're in the latrines with your pants down," said Staff Sgt. David Rogers, 26, of Cleveland.

Some attacks seem linked to outside events. For example, shortly after terror leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed on June 7, soldiers said more than 10 mortars fell on Camp Corregidor.

Other times, insurgents often fire during hours when they think soldiers are congregated for lunch or dinner.

Soldiers walking on the base are required to wear their protective vests and helmets, even for short distances to latrines and shower stalls.

After mortars strike, soldiers are required to account for all members of their units.

While soldiers say that they're so used to explosions that they hardly stir from their sleep anymore, some attacks can hardly be ignored.

"When you hear a 120 (millimeter mortar), you can feel it, not just hear it," said O'Neal. "You know you can't just lie in bed for that one."

Iraq's Plan For National Reconciliation 'Opens Door To Political Resolution' (FT)

By Roula Khalaf, Middle East Editor

Financial Times, July 1, 2006

Iraq's national reconciliation initiative has paved the way for government contacts with insurgents and should be seen as only a first step towards a political solution to the conflict, according to Iraq's vice-president.

Adel Abdel-Mehdi, senior Shia official and vice-president in the new government, told the Financial Times that other measures would follow the plan unveiled last Sunday and deemed by many analysts to be vague and incomplete.

In an interview during a visit to London, Mr Abdel-Mehdi said contacts with insurgents had been going on for some time but the reconciliation plan had now made dialogue an official policy.

He also left the door open to a broadening of an am-nesty offer after Nuri al-Maliki, the prime minister, this week insisted it would exclude anyone who had killed American troops or Iraqis.

"What's important is not what they [the insurgents] did but what commitment we'll have on peace," said Mr Abdel-Mehdi. "In exceptional periods we need exceptional measures. We're willing to be flexible. We might go to a general or partial amnesty but we need to know what we're facing."

The reconciliation plan was sharply criticised by Mr Maliki's own allies as well as influential clerics from both of Iraq's main sects. But it broke a taboo for the dominant Shia parties, which had until then resisted contacts with insurgents.

And it was hailed by the main Sunni alliance, the Iraqi Consensus Front, which despite being a partner in government has until now been wary of associating itself with government policies. It has therefore provided greater consensus, allowing former rivals to begin working together to try to reduce the violence.

In recent days several small insurgent groups have contacted the government through intermediaries, according to officials in Baghdad, and some have come forward with demands. But given the localised and diffuse nature of the insurgency, it is far from clear whether any of these groups have any significant influence on the ground.

Mr Abdel-Mehdi acknow-ledged that the government lacked a clear picture of the insurgency. The reconciliation initiative was aimed at gaining a better understanding of the groups and identifying whether any, and how many, were ready for a political solution, he said.

"We don't know whois who and what theyreally represent, and how many are linked to al-Qaeda. So we have to see. Our assumption has been that they are remnants of the old regime. Maybe we're wrong," he said. "Now [with the reconciliation plan] there will be committees, con-tacts, meetings, mediators. It starts like that."

He suggested insurgent leaders, unrelated to al-Qaeda, who might be identified could take part in an Arab League-backed nation-al reconciliation conference expected later this year.

However, efforts to calm the insurgency dominated by Sunni Arabs also depend on the government's ability to rein in the Shia militias. Well entrenched within the interior ministry, members of Shia militias are accused of waging a sectarian war against Sunni Arabs in mixed areas such as Baghdad, where dozens of Iraqis from all communities are killed every day.

Mr Abdel-Mehdi, who is a senior official from the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq (Sciri) - the Shia party that controls the Badr Organisation, one of the group accused of sectarian killings - insisted that the government would not allow anyone to operate "above the law".

But he acknowledged that the government faced a dilemma. To dismantle the militias it must show it is capable of providing security, which requires reducing the violence waged by insurgents. But curbing the powers of the militias is also essential to persuade insurgents to lay down their arms.

*In an internet audiotape posted yesterday Osama bin Laden praised Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of Iraq's al-Qaeda wing, who was killed by US forces last month.

Addressing US President George W. Bush, the head of al-Qaeda said: "Don't be too happy, for the banner [of al-Qaeda in Iraq] hasn't dropped but has passed from one lion of Islam to another lion."

Iraq PM To Tour Gulf States To Push Peace Plan (AFP-Y2)

By Mona Salem

AFP, July 1, 2006

Iraq Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki will on Saturday embark on his first trip abroad to garner support for his much-touted peace plan that has been rejected by the Sunni leaders and rebels.

The US military, meanwhile, said Friday it had ordered a probe into the alleged killing of four Iraqi civilians by US soldiers south of Baghdad last week, the latest in a string of such investigations.

And at least 14 people were killed in a string of attacks across the country, as Al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden warned that the jihad or holy war could continue despite the killing of the network's local leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi three weeks ago.

Maliki is due to leave Saturday for Saudi Arabia, then the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait "to meet their leaders to discuss the national reconciliation plan," said Minister of State for National Dialogue Akram al-Hakim.

Maliki announced a national reconciliation plan last Sunday in a bid to stem the Shiite-Sunni violence ravaging Iraq. The plan, however, has already been rejected by a number of Sunni Arab leaders and rebel groups.

It is felt that Maliki's tour may help influence the former elite community of Sunni Arabs as many of its leaders have close ties with the oil-rich Arab states of the Gulf.

Iraq's influential Sunni Muslim Scholars Association leader Muthana Hareth al-Dhari dismissed Maliki's plan as little more than "a campaign of public relations for the government", adding it was "meaningless because he has excluded everyone."

He said it also aimed to encourage die-hard Sunni Arab parties like his own which refuse to accept the rise to power of the long-oppressed Shiites, to abandon their sympathies for armed struggle and join the political process.

Maliki has said he would only pardon those detainees held in US and Iraqi prisons who have committed no violent crimes and stressed there would be no amnesty to those who killed foreign troops, journalists or innocent Iraqis.

More than 2,500 detainees have been freed this month from US and Iraqi prisons as part of the plan.

Maliki said Wednesday he had been contacted by insurgent groups willing to lay down their weapons and that he would engage them in dialogue directly or through other officials.

The announcement was hailed by state-owned Iraqiya television and the government-owned Al-Sabah newspaper.

They even named the purported insurgent groups which approached Maliki and claimed that tribal leaders from the rebel stronghold of Ramadi in Al-Anbar province of western Iraq were acting as go-betweens.

But Dhari said: "Neither the principal armed groups of resistance nor political organisations like ours have accepted this plan which ignores a timetable for the withdrawal of (foreign) troops.

"Nobody knows the so-called organisations mentioned in the government mouthpiece Al-Sabah, and the armed groups mentioned are also unknown."

Dhari said the main Sunni groups which rejected the proposal were the Brigades of 1920 Revolution, the Rashedeen Army, Islamic Movement of Iraqi Mujahedeen, United Iraqi Jihadist People, and Jaish al-Mujahedeen.

"We are not concerned by this initiative as it does not address the main problem of occupation and also the militias," said the Brigades of 1920 Revolution in a statement.

A number of militias close to Shiite political parties have been blamed for the killings of Sunni Arabs.

DOJ_NMG_0037890

Jaish al-Mujahedeen also discarded the proposal saying it will not "dirty its hands... by shaking the hands of those who are with the occupiers (US-led forces)".

On Friday, an Internet-posted voice message purported to be from bin Laden paid tribute to Zarqawi who was killed in a US air strike on June 7.

"We will keep up our fight to bleed your money dry, kill your men and so that (your forces) go home defeated, as we defeated you in Somalia," bin Laden told US President George W. Bush.

"The banner of jihad has not fallen. It will be picked up by another lion of Islam," he said in the message, which the CIA said was the voice of bin Laden.

Meanwhile the US military said it had ordered an investigation into the alleged killing by soldiers of a family of four Iraqi civilians in their home in the area of Mahmudiyah, south of Baghdad.

In violence on the ground 14 Iraqis were killed, including five Iraqi soldiers in an assault against a checkpoint near the northern oil city of Kirkuk, the army said.

Police also found 10 bodies, including that of a five-year-old boy brutally tortured and executed.

The US military also announced the death of three troops in Iraq.

The head of the Russian FSB intelligence service announced Friday a 10-million-dollar to help nab the killers of its five Baghdad embassy employees slain by their kidnappers after being seized earlier this month.

In a new blow to the coalition, Poland said it will pull its troops out of Iraq by the middle of next year.

Israel Strike Hits Palestinian PM's Office (NSDY/AP)

By Ravi Nessman, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, July 2, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- Israeli aircraft fired missiles at the Palestinian prime minister's office early Sunday, just hours after a Palestinian official said the soldier whose abduction sent Israeli troops into Gaza is alive and in stable condition.

A Hamas militant was killed in another Israeli airstrike.

Palestinians witnesses said two missiles fired by attack helicopters hit the Gaza City office of Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas early Sunday, slightly injuring a bystander and setting the empty building on fire.

Inspecting his burning office, Haniyeh called the attack senseless.

"They have targeted a symbol for the Palestinian people," he said.

The Israeli military confirmed the attack and said it would "employ all means at its disposal ... to secure the safe return" of 19-year-old soldier Cpl. Gilad Shalit who was abducted by Palestinian militants on Sunday.

The strike, at about 1:45 a.m., came shortly after moderate Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas warned Saturday that the coming hours would be "critical, sensitive and serious" for trying to calm the crisis.

After the airstrike on his office, Haniyeh met Abbas for an hour, his office said, discussing the Israeli attacks and efforts to keep the government functioning despite the arrests. Haniyeh issued a statement calling for foreign intervention to stop the Israeli offensive.

"The international community must shoulder its responsibility," he said.

In other airstrikes after midnight, Israeli aircraft hit a school in Gaza city and Hamas facilities in northern Gaza, where a Hamas militant was killed and another wounded, Palestinian officials said. The military said they were "planning terror attacks against Israel." The 34-year-old Hamas gunman was the second militant killed in the five-day Israeli operation to force the release of Shalit.

Ziad Abu Aen, a Palestinian deputy minister and Hamas official said Saturday that Shalit was wounded but in stable condition.

Another Hamas official, however, cast doubt on the credibility of the statement. Osama Muzami said only the military wing of the Islamic militant group knows the soldier's condition.

There had been no sign of Shalit since he was abducted during a militant raid on an Israeli army post just outside the Gaza Strip that killed two soldiers and two of the attackers.

Abu Aen said "mediators" told him Shalit had received medical treatment for wounds he suffered in the raid and was in stable condition.

"He has three wounds," Abu Aen said in the West Bank city of Ramallah. "I guess shrapnel wounds."

Israeli soldiers and Palestinian militants exchanged fire for several hours Saturday when Israeli tanks and bulldozers crossed into the Gaza Strip and began razing farmland east of Khan Younis. No serious injuries were reported.

The fighting took place north of the position Israeli troops occupied when they entered Gaza on Wednesday. The army said it was carrying out a limited operation in the Khan Younis area and the soldiers were expected to leave soon.

DOJ_NMG_0037891

The Hamas-affiliated militants holding Shalit initially said they would trade information about him for all Palestinian women and underage prisoners in Israeli jails. The militants raised the stakes Saturday, calling for an end to the Israeli offensive and the release of 1,000 other prisoners in Israel, including some who are not Palestinian.

The new demand appeared aimed at rallying support in the Arab world.

Israel has ruled out any compromise, saying it would only encourage more abductions.

Israel continued to hold 64 Hamas leaders rounded up in the West Bank Thursday night. They include eight Cabinet ministers.

Israel has also blamed Syria for the kidnapping, noting it gives haven to Hamas' top leaders.

Defense Minister Amir Peretz met with senior security officials Saturday night and then called Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to urge the Bush administration to step up pressure on Syria to work for Shalit's release, officials said on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to make a statement.

Egypt and other foreign mediators have been working to try to resolve the crisis, but Abbas said those efforts had yet to bear fruit mainly because it was unclear who in Hamas -- the militants or the group's leadership abroad -- was authorized to make decisions about Shalit.

"The next hours are critical, sensitive and serious. And though the efforts are still ongoing, we have not reached an acceptable solution until now," Abbas' office said in a statement Saturday.

He sounded more optimistic at a news conference Saturday night.

"Regarding the soldier, we will surely reach an agreement. It is not a dead end. People want an acceptable solution," said Abbas, who is from the moderate Fatah Party.

Hamas, which controls the Palestinian Cabinet after winning legislative elections in January, insisted Shalit should not be freed without a prisoner swap.

Israel "should understand that it is not easy for the Palestinian people to say, 'OK, we can release him,' ... without a price," said Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman for the Hamas-led Cabinet.

Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan of Turkey, a predominantly Muslim country that has close ties with Israel, called President Bush Saturday and talked for 30 minutes about the crisis.

"The president said that the initial goal should be freeing the Israeli soldier -- that is the key to ending the crisis," said Frederick Jones, spokesman for the National Security Council at the White House.

Meanwhile, the fuel supply in Gaza dwindled after Israel cut off the flow through a pipeline. Gas stations across the territory ran dry, and human rights groups worried that if fuel shipments were not restored in the coming days, Gaza could face a humanitarian crisis as generators used to pump water and power hospitals stopped working.

Authorities have been relying on generators since an Israeli airstrike Tuesday destroyed Gaza's only power plant, knocking out 43 percent of the territory's electricity supply, the United Nations said. The remaining electricity comes from Israel.

The Israeli army said Israel had increased the supply of electricity to Gaza to make up for the power shortage and would work to allow food and fuel in over the coming days.

Munitions Found In Iraq Renew Debate (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

Panel Is Divided Over Whether Troops Uncovered Weapons of Mass Destruction

Do the 20-year-old Iraqi chemical munitions found by U.S. and coalition forces support the prewar contention that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction, and justify the invasion of Iraq?

That question divided Republicans and Democrats again this week, this time at a hearing of the House Armed Services Committee on the estimated 500 rockets and artillery shells containing degraded mustard gas or sarin nerve agent.

Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) contended that an April report by the U.S. Army's National Ground Intelligence Center (NGIC) is clear evidence of Hussein's weapons of mass destruction.

"Some may want to play down the significance of this report or even deny that WMD have been found in Iraq," Hunter said at Thursday's hearing, using the abbreviation for weapons of mass destruction.

Citing the United Nations resolutions that called for destruction of all of Hussein's banned weapons, Hunter added that "the verified existence of such chemical weapons" proves they were not destroyed and "in part because of such violations, we voted to authorize the use of force in Iraq."

But Rep. Ike Skelton (Mo.), the senior Democrat on the committee, countered that the NGIC report did not address Baghdad's prewar chemical weapons program. Rather, he said, it was "written to address the force protection concerns of our service members in Iraq."

"Yes, these certainly are munitions," Skelton added, "but they are not the evidence of prewar assertions made by the administration."

The classified overview of chemical munitions says that U.S. forces have found about 500 shells, canisters or other munitions containing the chemical weapons. Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, told the committee the shells were produced in the 1980s for the Iran-Iraq war but were not used.

Last week, Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), chairman of the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, and Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), a strong supporter of the war, touted the findings, provoking protests from some Democrats.

In his Jan. 28, 2003, State of the Union address, President Bush said that U.S. intelligence indicated "Saddam Hussein had upwards of 30,000 munitions capable of delivering chemical agents. Inspectors recently turned up 16 of them -- despite Iraq's recent declaration denying their existence. Saddam Hussein has not accounted for the remaining 29,984 of these prohibited munitions. He's given no evidence that he has destroyed them."

The NGIC study was conducted, Maples said, to allow commanders in Iraq to prepare their troops for potential hazards when they came across the old shells or rockets. Hunter recalled an incident "several years ago," when soldiers disposing of an old artillery round became ill from exposure to chemicals while transporting it.

Maples was caught in the verbal crossfire between Republicans and Democrats but proved adept at avoiding answers that aided either side.

Rep. Susan Davis (D-Calif.) asked whether the munitions could be characterized as "the Golden Oldies of weapons of mass destruction." Maples said he was "not sure what Golden Oldies are" but added that the munitions were "dangerous. . . . even in a degraded mode, they will produce hazardous and potentially lethal effects and that we would categorize them as weapons of mass destruction."

But under questioning, Maples acknowledged that the shells were "a potential risk to our service members in Iraq" but not to 275 million Americans.

Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), who believes the shells represent weapons of mass destruction, asked: "If you took that material and got it out of the country and took it to a metropolitan area, what would be the impact?"

Maples replied, "I think conceivably it would have a very large impact."

That caused Rep. Terry Everett (R-Ala.) to ask, "If some bad guys got this stuff and sneaked it into New York City and put it [into] the subways there, would it kill people?" Taken aback slightly, Maples responded, "Potentially . . . yes, sir, it would."

Rep. Rick Larsen (D-Wash.) noted that the administration's prewar rhetoric, including a remark by then-national security adviser Condoleezza Rice that "we don't want the smoking gun to be a mushroom cloud," helped push Congress's October 2002 vote to authorize the use of force in Iraq.

That kind of language, Larsen said, "always has seemed to be much bigger than the facts that we end up reviewing in retrospect."

The smoking gun and mushroom cloud image, he said, "sounds a lot better than 500 artillery shells of various amounts of degraded material that fit the technical definition of chemical weapons . . . buried in various bunkers in various states of disrepair that we are not even sure Saddam Hussein knew about."

Bin Laden Planning Somalia, Iraq Message (AP)

By Lee Keath

AP2, July 1, 2006

A tired-sounding Osama bin Laden praised slain Iraq insurgent Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in an audiotape released Friday, and a Web site later said the terror leader would soon post a message about the fight by Islamic militants in Somalia and Iraq.

The 19-minute statement on the Web — during which bin Laden once again conspicuously avoided showing his face — was the latest in a string of audiotapes from the al-Qaida leader this year.

The Internet messages have been strong on propaganda, but have said little about how the terror network will continue its "jihad" against the United States — raising questions about bin Laden's level of control.

The pace of messages, however, has increased dramatically this year — with four audiotapes from bin Laden and seven audios and videos by his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri.

Hours after Friday's message appeared, an advertisement on the same Islamic Web site said bin Laden would issue another tape directed to "the Islamic nation in general and the mujahedeen in Iraq and Somalia in particular." A similar announcement proceeded bin Laden's message Friday by about 24 hours.

The advertisement banner was signed by As-Sahab, the production branch that releases al-Qaida videos, and had an old picture of bin Laden. The teaser was first reported by the SITE Institute and the IntelCenter, two U.S.-based independent groups that provide counter-terrorism information to the U.S. government and media. The IntelCenter said the promised message was expected within 36 hours.

Islamic militiamen who have have recently seized control over key parts of Somalia are led by Sheikh Hassan Dahir Aweys, suspected by the United States of being an al-Qaida collaborator. Washington has concerns that Somalia will become a refuge for members of bin Laden's terror network.

Bin Laden has not appeared in a video since October 2004 and did not issue any messages in 2005. This year, he has made four audiotapes, part of a stepped-up media campaign by him and his top deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, who has appeared in several videos.

Terror experts said bin Laden's reluctance to show his face probably does not indicate he is in poor health and instead is likely a security measure, to prevent hints of his location from slipping out.

Bruce Hoffman, a RAND counterterrorism expert based in Washington, said it may also be that bin Laden is trying to increase the drama of an eventual appearance.

"You do videotape when there's something important," Hoffman said."When bin Laden appears it's something very special. He's as shrewd a showman as they come, and his sense of choreography is very high."

So far, the opportunity hasn't presented itself, a sign the al-Qaida leader — believed to be in hiding in the Afghan-Pakistan border region — is seeking for now just to show he survives and remains in control.

"What do you have to brag or crow about if you're sitting in a cave trying to avoid capture," Hoffman said. "So he's trying to leverage off of events to show his presence."

Al-Qaida advertised Friday's message prominently on Islamic Web forums more than 24 hours before it was posted — suggesting the importance of paying tribute to al-Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaida in Iraq who often appeared more of a rival than a follower.

The Jordanian-born al-Zarqawi, who was killed in a June 7 airstrike by U.S. warplanes, became a hero among extremists by positioning himself as al-Qaida's fighter on the ground, battling the Americans on the hottest front of jihad, Iraq.

In the audiotape, bin Laden poured praise on al-Zarqawi in rhymed couplets traditional to Islamic poetry, calling him a "lion of Islam" who was "not just an honor to his tribe, his country and his Islamic nation, but to all mankind."

The audiotape narration was part of a 19-minute video showing old footage of al-Zarqawi, in a split screen with an old photo of bin Laden. U.S. intelligence officials believe it is bin Laden's voice, said a counterterrorism official who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said: "It's another bin Laden audio tape. It is what it is."

The voice resembled bin Laden's from previous messages known to be from him, though the authenticity of Friday's tape was not immediately confirmed.

Bin Laden's voice — always quiet in his messages — sounded fatigued in the audio. He demanded U.S. President George W. Bush release al-Zarqawi's body to his family and that Jordan allow him to be buried in his homeland, something Amman has said will never happen.

Al-Qaida's central leadership is believed to have differed with al-Zarqawi, criticizing his strategy of targeting Shiite civilians with brutal suicide bombings in an attempt to spark a civil war in Iraq.

Bin Laden defended al-Zarqawi, saying he had "clear instructions" to focus on U.S.-led forces in Iraq but also "for those who ... stood to fight on the side of the crusaders against the Muslims, then he should kill them whoever they are, regardless of their sect or tribe."

But bin Laden did not mention Shiites in particular, underlining the divisions with al-Zarqawi, who frequently railed against Shiite Muslims in Iraq and elsewhere.

The al-Qaida leader — perhaps inadvertently — also showed his distance and lack of a direct hand in the fight in Iraq, said Diaa Rashwan, an Egyptian expert on militant groups.

In particular, bin Laden made no mention of al-Zarqawi's successor, or even mention the name of al-Zarqawi's organization, al-Qaida in Iraq, Rashwan noted.

Instead, bin Laden said, "The banner has not fallen, it has only been passed from one lion to another."

"He doesn't appear to even know al-Zarqawi's succcessor," Rashwan said. Al-Qaida in Iraq has named a little known militant as its new leader, with the pseudonym of Abu Hamza al-Muhajer.

Bin Laden also addressed Bush, saying, "We will continue to fight you and your allies everywhere, in Iraq, Afghanistan, Somalia and Sudan to run down your resources and kill your men until you return defeated to your nation."

But like other tapes this year, there was little sign of the direction of bin Laden's fight.

He issued a message in January warning that his followers were planning a new attack in the United States. But his other three since then have been more focused on commenting on current events, including U.N. plans for a peacekeeping force in Sudan. He issued a message saying Zacarias Moussawi, just convicted in the United States, had nothing to do with the Sept. 11 suicide hijackings.

The focus has been on showing that even in hiding — with few major al-Qaida attacks outside of Iraq — he is in control.

"I think he's conscious that while he's been doing all the talking, al-Zarqawi has been doing all the fighting," Hoffman said.

Bin Laden Warns Bush, Demands Return Of Zarqawi Body (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, July 1, 2006

June 30 (Bloomberg) -- Osama Bin Laden warned U.S. President George W. Bush in an audiotape broadcast today not to rejoice over the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and demanded that the body of al-Qaeda's Iraq chief be returned to Jordan.

The leader of al-Qaeda said the terrorist group will continue its ``jihad," or holy war, in Iraq under the command of al-Zarqawi's successor. The tape also included a message for Jordan's King Abdullah II, directing him to allow al-Zarqawi to be buried in his homeland, and promising a funeral that would show depth of al-Qaeda's support. The Central Intelligence Agency released a statement saying a technical analysis of the recording determined the voice was that of bin Laden.

``I tell Bush, you have to hand over the body of the hero to his family," bin Laden said. ``And don't rejoice excessively, because the banner has not fallen, thank God. It only went from a lion to another lion among the lions of Islam, and we'll continue fighting you and your allies everywhere, in Iraq, in Afghanistan, Somalia and Sudan."

Al-Zarqawi, the most wanted man in Iraq before his death and responsible for suicide attacks on civilians and Iraqi and American forces, was killed June 7 in a U.S. air strike. The U.S. military identified his successor in heading al-Qaeda in Iraq as the group's former southern Iraq leader, Ayyub al-Masri, describing him as an explosives expert who is likely to use the same tactics as his predecessor.

Islamic Web Site

Al-Jazeera television aired the audiotape, which was posted on an Islamic Web site often used by al-Qaeda. Bin Laden, who issued three audiotapes earlier this year, hasn't appeared in a videotape since October 2004. He remains on the run almost five years after the Sept. 11, 2001, al-Qaeda attacks on New York and Washington that killed almost 3,000 people.

Ayman al-Zawahiri, al-Qaeda's second-in-command, said in a June 21 videotape that he grieved for al-Zarqawi.

Al-Qaeda will continue its attacks, ``wearing down your money, killing your men, so that you go back defeated to your country, just like we defeated you before in Somalia, God willing," according to the latest tape. ``We're sad that Abu Musab and his companions have left us, but we're delighted that they have sacrificed their souls in these great epics, while defending the law of Islam."

The tape included a demand that the Jordanian king stop his ``tyranny," with the person saying, ``You forbade Abu Musab from entering his homeland while alive, don't be an obstacle to that now."

U.S. Puts $5M Bounty On Al-Masri (CNN)

CNN, July 1, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice authorized up to a $5 million reward Friday for information leading to the capture of Abu Ayyub al-Masri, believed to be the replacement for the late leader of al Qaeda in Iraq -- Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

"Al-Masri, an Egyptian national, is a senior al Qaeda leader in Iraq and was a direct associate of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi," said Deputy State Department spokesman Adam Ereli in a statement.

"Trained in Afghanistan and Pakistan, al-Masri is an explosives expert specializing in" constructing car bombs.

The U.S. military believes al-Masri has taken over the terror network from al-Zarqawi, who was killed in a U.S. airstrike June 7 north of Baghdad. He had masterminded hundreds of bombings, kidnappings and beheadings.

The department's statement urges anyone with information on al-Masri's location to contact the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad or any other U.S. embassy or consulate, or any U.S. military commander.

In an audio message published Thursday, al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden grieved for al-Zarqawi and called him one of al Qaeda's "greatest knights." However, bin Laden did not say that al-Masri would assume al-Zarqawi's position.

The reward for al-Masri is being offered under the State Department's Rewards for Justice program, which seeks to prevent acts of terrorism against the United States. The money is paid for information leading to the arrest and/or conviction of terrorists trying to commit or committing acts against U.S. interests.

There is a $25 million reward for information leading to the capture of bin Laden. Congress passed legislation in November that allows the department to double that amount, although that hasn't happened.

In 2003, the Bush administration paid a $30 million reward -- $15 million each -- for the tip that led to the capture of Uday and Qusay Hussein, Saddam Hussein's sons.

Rice Puts $5 Million Bounty On Al-Masri (AP-Y2)

AP2, July 1, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Friday approved up to $5 million in exchange for information on Abu Ayyub al-Masri, the new face of al-Qaida in Iraq.

Al-Masri is presumed to be the successor of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who was killed by an American bomb in early June.

Al-Masri is an Egyptian explosives expert who trained in Osama bin Laden's camps in Afghanistan and was an associate of al-Zarqawi. Al-Masri has been fighting in Iraq since at least 2003 and was engaged in the battle of Fallujah in 2004.

Rice's agency is offering the money to encourage people with information about al-Masri's location to come forward, said spokesman Adam Ereli.

The State Department has directed people with tips to contact its Rewards for Justice program, any U.S. embassy or consulate, or any U.S. military commander in Iraq.

US Offers Five Million Dlr Reward For Info On Al-Qaeda Leader (AFP-Y2)

AFP, July 1, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has authorized a reward of up to five million dollars for information leading to wanted Al-Qaeda leader Abu Ayyub al-Masri, in Iraq.

Deputy State Department spokesman Adam Ereli said in a statement Friday that the reward was offered in the hope it would encourage persons to come forward with information on al-Masri.

The State Department said Abu Ayyub al-Masri is an Egyptian national and a senior Al-Qaeda leader in Iraq.

He is a direct associate of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the former leader of Al-Qaeda in Iraq, who was recently killed by US forces, according to the US government.

"Trained in Afghanistan and Pakistan, al-Masri is an explosives expert specializing in the construction of Vehicle-Borne Improvised Explosive Devices," the same bombs responsible for large numbers of US troop casualties, the statement said.

"We encourage anyone with information on al-Masri's location to contact the US Embassy in Baghdad, any US military commander in Iraq, any US embassy or consulate, or the Rewards for Justice staff via e-mail (RFJAstate.gov) or telephone (1-800-877-3927)," the statement said.

Zarqawi was the most-wanted man in Iraq until he was killed in a US air strike on his hideout three weeks ago.

Zarqawi, who orchestrated a bloody campaign of attacks and beheadings of hostages, had long remained elusive in Iraq, despite a 25-million-dollar US bounty, until his killing on June 7.

The true identity of Abu Ayyub al-Masri remains an enigma in his reported homeland of Egypt.

"His real name is Yussef al-Dardiri, he is around 38 years old and he comes from Upper Egypt," Montasser al-Zayat, a lawyer and former member of the Islamist group Gamaa Islamiya, told AFP earlier this month.

Egyptian security sources insist they have not heard of the name.

Diaa Rashwan, an expert on political Islam at Cairo's Al-Ahram Center for Strategic Studies, recently said he too had not come across the name. "There is no trace of such a name in the Egyptian radical Islamic files," he said.

Coalition forces spokesman Major General William Caldwell said Abu Ayyub al-Masri (meaning 'the Egyptian' in Arabic), also known as Sheikh Abu Hamza al-Muhajer (meaning 'the immigrant'), was believed to be operating out of Baghdad.

Al-Qaeda, which has not disclosed the nationality of its chief in Iraq, "on its website has named him as Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, but we believe that he is one and the same," Caldwell told reporters earlier this month.

Zarqawi's successor is believed to have lived in the central Cairo area of Zawyia Hamra before going to Afghanistan in the late 1980s or early 1990s, and then on to Iraq via Iran.

Maliki Seeks Support From Sunni States In The Gulf (LAT)

By From A Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037896

BAGHDAD — Iraq's new prime minister, Nouri Maliki, was to leave today to visit Saudi Arabia and other Persian Gulf states to solicit support for a reconciliation initiative that has drawn mixed reviews since it was announced Sunday.

Maliki plans to discuss bridging the widening gap between Sunni and Shiite Muslims with leaders of the oil-rich Sunni-dominated countries.

The prime minister's visit to the Gulf countries comes after a spate of incidents that have raised tensions between Iraq's Shiites and Sunnis. Maliki's amnesty proposal is directed primarily at Sunni Arab hard-liners, and the Gulf states could use their money and influence to give his plan credence among the insurgents.

But even as the prime minister takes his plan abroad, it is facing attacks at home. The Muslim Scholars Assn., an influential group of Sunni Arab clerics, denounced the proposal because it does not extend amnesty to fighters who have taken Iraqi or American lives.

And members of Maliki's own Shiite bloc remain wary of any plan that might give the appearance of appeasing Sunni-led insurgents.

Radical cleric Muqtada Sadr recently became the most prominent Shiite leader to reject the amnesty initiative, refusing any reconciliation with the U.S. and supporters of the former Baathist regime of Saddam Hussein.

"We are demanding the exit of the occupiers or to put a timetable for the withdrawal and not to extend their stay," Sadr said in his Friday sermon at the Kufa Mosque, six miles east of Najaf.

Afghan Rocket Attack Wounds 2 Canadian GIs (AP-Y2)

By Noor Khan, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2006

Two rockets fired by insurgents slammed into a coalition base in southern Afghanistan, wounding two Canadian soldiers and several others, a coalition spokesman said Saturday.

The attack happened at the coalition base in Kandahar on Friday night, and the wounded soldiers were listed in stable condition, coalition spokesman Maj. Quentin Innis said. He said others were wounded but would not provide further details.

Maj. Mark Therianult, spokesman for the Canadian forces in the troubled south, also confirmed the attack, and said the wounded Canadian soldiers were sent to Germany for further treatment.

The Canadian Press news agency reported earlier that 10 people were wounded in the attack, including soldiers from other countries and civilian employees. Their nationalities were not immediately released.

One of the rockets blew up inside a tent complex, showering soldiers and civilian employees with shrapnel that tore ragged holes in the tents and knocked over tables and chairs, said the agency, which has a reporter embedded with Canadian troops.

It said one of the Canadian soldiers was critically injured.

Officials said more than 20 rockets have been fired at the base since February, but Friday was the first time such an attack has caused casualties.

In some cases, Taliban militants have used old Soviet-era rockets, firing them using a crude timing-delay device that allows the insurgents to be far away before the rockets are launched.

Military spokesman Maj. Quentin Innis said the base will review its security and trace the rocket's trajectory to determine from where it was fired. Soldiers at the base routinely fire illumination flares over the razor-wired perimeter at night to scare off would-be attackers.

Canada has about 2,300 soldiers in southern Afghanistan. Canadian lawmakers approved a two-year extension of Canada's military mission in Afghanistan in May.

Iraq's Big Port Has Commerce, Crime — Even Camels (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037897

UMM QASR, Iraq — In this Persian Gulf port, by far Iraq's largest and most important, the misshapen realities of life and commerce in Iraq mix with the refreshingly ordinary ones that govern much of the rest of the world.

Commodore Thamir Nasser and the Iraqi naval forces he leads, for instance, carry out the routine law enforcement chores of intercepting smugglers who try to make away with boatloads of diesel fuel, crude oil, televisions, sheep and even troupes of Iraqi camels, which he believes are prized because they are not only especially patient but also remarkably cheap. He chases down small-time pirates and has killed them in shootouts.

But as Commodore Thamir, as he is known, bounced across the port in one of the little aluminum boats that make up most of this man's navy, he said one of his toughest tasks was dealing with the Iraqi Coast Guard. Like the Iraqi police, the coast guard is controlled by the Interior Ministry and is widely considered to be infiltrated by local militias with little interest in halting smuggling.

"They are a separate operation," Commodore Thamir said, gesturing helplessly toward the inland waters where his authority ends and the coast guard's begins.

So separate, said Lt. Cmdr. Bryan White, an American officer who advises the Iraqi Navy, that he has found it easier to arrange joint operations with maritime forces from Kuwait, just south of here, than with the Iraqi Coast Guard. "It baffles me," Commander White said.

So it goes in the port that was supposed to fall in the first hours of the 2003 invasion, but held its own through days of gun battles before it succumbed, becoming the country's most important entry point for humanitarian supplies like rice and wheat. The port, located roughly 30 miles up a sinuous inlet from the gulf, remains crucial for supplying both Iraqi markets and the American-led reconstruction effort.

Umm Qasr's ambiguous image was cemented early in the conflict when Britain's defense secretary, Geoff Hoon, likened the city to the relatively upscale British port town of Southampton. To which an unidentified British soldier replied, "There's no beer, no prostitutes and people are shooting at us. It's more like Portsmouth."

Now, after months of relative calm, sophisticated roadside bombs and assassinations of Iraqis who work with Westerners have increased across the entire south, while the port itself has become a place of danger, corruption, commercial bustle and intrigue.

In many ways Umm Qasr looks a lot like any deepwater port in the world. A long row of giant gantry cranes unloads cargo from freighters painted with unremarkable names like Tatyana, Marblue and Explorer I.

Uneven stretches of asphalt, tall grain elevators and long rows of warehouses flank the docks, which are dotted with piles of burlap sacks filled with imported cement, boxed refrigerators, microwave ovens, DVD players and television sets. Arab truck drivers doze or squat in the shade of flatbed trucks as they wait their turn to pick up the cargo and head north.

But in Umm Qasr, much of the cargo would not move an inch without bribes to crane operators and other dockworkers, said Najm Sager, a liaison between the Iraqi Port Authority and the United States Embassy who thinks that, for now, corruption is all but guaranteed at the port.

Because of the low wages paid to a typical dockworker, Mr. Sager said, "You are telling him, 'Go steal.' "

"That is why they ask for 'tips,' " Mr. Sager said, a bit euphemistically. He added that typical salaries range from $150 to $250 a month, but that a crane operator can expect to collect a standard 'tip' of $50 per job.

Crime on the docks goes beyond graft. Iraqi police reports for 2006 show at least half a dozen murders of workers at Iraq's southern ports.

Like Commodore Thamir, Mr. Sager was on the boat trip that was arranged by the United States Army Corps of Engineers to showcase $45 million in rebuilding projects, including a new cargo berth and work on two of the big cranes.

The bustle along the waterfront is no match for the ports in New York or San Francisco in their heydays, and in spite of the commercial activity it seems a little sleepy for the lifeline of a nation at war. The Marblue, carrying cement, looks so rusted it could be derelict. Railroad tracks crisscrossing the asphalt are empty because saboteurs to the north constantly cut the rail link to Baghdad, making the trains useless for cargo.

Still, for anyone looking for signs of normalcy in Iraq, the numbers are likely to impress. Between 16 and 18 freighters enter the port each week, unloading around 45,000 metric tons of wheat, 11,000 tons of rice, 55,000 tons of cement and 30,000 tons of general cargo.

It takes 4,000 to 5,000 trucks to move all of those goods out of the port each week and spread them around Iraq. As a consequence of all that traffic, port fees collected at Umm Qasr have shot up from around $600,000 a month in late 2004 to more than $2.5 million now.

But those fees are mostly absorbed in salaries, meager as they are. In a custom that may sound familiar to Americans, the Iraqi Port Authority carries thousands of unnecessary workers, Mr. Sager said, so dredging and rebuilding the port still depends on American cash. An official at the dock who asked to remain anonymous denied there were extra workers on the payroll.

And then there are the pirates and smugglers. Commodore Thamir, 44, whose official title is Iraqi operations commander, does not have a lot to work with, considering that his entire functioning navy consists of 10 of the fast aluminum boats, each 15 feet long; five Chinese-made patrol boats, each 40 feet long; and 10 dinghy-style boats.

But Commodore Thamir, a native of the southern city of Basra who graduated from the Britannia Royal Naval College in Dartmouth, England, and served in Saddam Hussein's navy, says that with the fast boats, he has everything he needs when a tip or a distress call comes in.

"Fifty knots," he said of the speed of the fast boats, which were a present from the United Arab Emirates. "It is fast enough to catch anybody."

Catch them he has. Three times his sailors and marines have chased down and killed the pirates who board ships here and often beat crew members until they reveal where their cash and valuables are stashed. His marines have grabbed suspected terrorists off the local ferry.

He has surprised small boats at sea as they transferred smuggled diesel onto larger vessels bound for points south along the Persian Gulf coast. In a series of e-mail communications, Commander White, who is the executive officer for a British-American mentoring and rebuilding program called the Naval Transition Team, confirmed the commodore's recollections.

Commander White said that the naval security forces, which fall under the Ministry of Defense, face the same challenges of training and equipment as the Iraqi Army does. "But if we pulled out today, the Iraqi Navy could run itself," he said.

Whether or not that prediction will ever be tested, Commodore Thamir and his friend Mr. Sager appeared most interested in bantering about the load of smuggled camels the navy had intercepted.

"The Arabs like camels," the commodore said, trying to keep a straight face when asked why any smuggler would attempt such a thing.

"Iraqi camels and sheep are the most desirable," Mr. Sager said, as they both began to laugh. "And cheap."

Where Is The Weapons Story? (WT)

By L. Brent Bozell Iii

The Washington Times, July 1, 2006

While the Bush administration focuses on the elimination of the terrorist threat in Iraq, the Saddam-was-no-threat left has remained obsessed with the pre-war months, not only harping on the failures of Western intelligence, but more importantly, advancing a hardened historical narrative. They would have the world believe the Bush administration was not only wrong about the existence of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, but also lied intentionally and went to war for some unstated cynical reason -- oil, enriching war profiteers, avenging Daddy Bush.

To a large degree, they are succeeding with their revisionist history lesson, and the proof is in the pudding of the polls. Not only does a majority declare that the war wasn't worth the cost to our troops and our treasury, but a majority believes George W. Bush is not honest or trustworthy. When the USA Today-Gallup poll asked if the words "honest" and "trustworthy" applied to Mr. Bush in February of 2001, 64 percent said he was honest, while 29 percent said the words did not apply. By April of 2006, the numbers were 41 percent honest, 56 percent dishonest. It's an easy guess that a lot of that turnaround is our failure to find Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction.

So it was surprising to Sen. Rick Santorum, Pennsylvania Republican, and Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican, who were investigating whispers that weapons of mass destruction have actually been found by American troops in Iraq, to learn the rumors were true. After badgering administration officials for several months, the government gave the legislators a declassified memo stating that some 500 weapons of mass destruction have been found by coalition forces in Iraq, mostly sarin and mustard-gas agents, some of which "remain hazardous and potentially lethal."

But when the legislators released this information, some Bush administration officials poor-mouthed the findings, noting that these old WMDs were hardly evidence of an ongoing post-Gulf War WMD program by Saddam, the fearful scenario that dominated the pre-war debate. Others, like Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, emphatically declared that this was hard evidence. Regardless, this memo packs an important rhetorical punch. How many hundreds of times have our major media told us there were "no weapons of mass destruction" found? And how many thousands of times have leftists jumped off that springboard to an elaborate Bush-lied-people-died jeremiad?

This discovery should be a crucial, corrective turning point to the stuck-in-2003, pre-war obsessives. The hardened historical narrative needs to be amended. There were WMDs in Iraq that could have been used against our troops or acquired by terrorists.

An honest, nonpartisan news media that cared about the facts without political calculation would have taken care to correct the record, even if the findings were comparatively underwhelming to the pre-war scenarios. A fair and balanced story could be done. But the reception of this declassified memo shows we do not have an honest, nonpartisan news media, and political calculation is everything.

Here's how the news of the WMD finds in Iraq was filtered by the so-called "mainstream media." Fox News treated it as an important story. NBC reported on it with one "Nightly News" story, with pros and cons, noting that unnamed sources at the Pentagon "poured cold water" on the scoop's importance. ABC and CBS did nothing. CNN mentioned it in passing, heavy on the skepticism. On MSNBC, Keith Olbermann howled at the moon, mocking the find as "weapons of minor discomfort" and suggesting Mr. Santorum was like Sen. Joe McCarthy, holding up a "blank page" of supposed communists in the government.

Our major newspapers were also foot-draggers. The Washington Post ran five paragraphs of dismissive tone on page A-10. The New York Times skipped it for a day, then put it on A-20 with the headline "For Diehards, Search for Iraq's WMD Isn't Over." (The liberal diehards at the Times were saving Page One for their infamous scoop disclosing to the public, including terrorists, our government's financial tracking methods for terrorist groups.) The news magazines weren't interested in the WMD scoop, either. Time and U.S. News & World Report ran nothing, and Newsweek dismissed it with another headline about "trumped-up threats" in Iraq.

The largest remaining mystery is why Team Bush seems allergic to releasing more information on the missing weapons in Iraq, and more facts out of the archives of Saddam's heinous regime. If they are acting, or better put, not acting out of intimidation by the media, who don't want any new information to change their tilted first draft of history, the polls suggest that inaction has damaged them dramatically.

Guantanamo Grumblings (WT)

By Victor Davis Hanson

The Washington Times, July 1, 2006

When President Bush arrived in Vienna last week, protesters bore "World's No. 1 Terrorist" signs while chanting "We will, we will fight Bush." A Harris Poll conducted prior to the president's visit revealed that the European public thinks America is a greater global threat than either North Korea or Iran.

Apparently, our terrorist detention center at Guantanamo Bay is the most recent open sore. When, European ministers have been persisting, will the United States close down this Neanderthal embarrassment to liberal Western values?

[In a major setback for the president, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled Thursday he overstepped his powers in setting up military war crimes tribunals for detainees at Guantanamo Bay. The ruling did not address the status of Guantanamo.]

This European anger, however, doesn't seem to be based on evidence of systematic American abuse. Despite Democratic Illinois Sen. Dick Durbin's claim that Guantanamo was akin to Nazi camps, the few reported regrettable, isolated cases of sleep deprivation and harassment seem no worse than what we read about in most prisons. The roughly 450 prisoners still there -- many of them killers -- are probably treated as well as inmates in either Europe or the U.S.

Further, Guantanamo exists to fill a vacuum in an undeclared and unprecedented postmodern war of few good choices in which the enemy does not wear uniforms, adhere to the Geneva Convention or distinguish civilians from soldiers.

If the U.S. were to close down Guantanamo and send the detainees back to their home countries, some returnees would be freed and treated as heroes -- and then rejoin the global jihad. Other released terrorists, or so the Europeans no doubt would whine, might be executed by the autocratic Middle Eastern governments in their homelands that are as afraid of Islamic terrorists as we are.

So, should we instead try all of the Guantanamo detainees inside the U.S.?

No. By doing that, we would be inviting thousands of lawyers and public defenders to argue, on behalf of their clients, that we are not in a real war but simply prosecuting common criminals. Numerous trials and appeals as costly and circus-like as the drawn-out spectacle of Zacarias Moussaoui (the so-called 20th hijacker) would likely follow. And, in the end, Europeans would still object, since the U.S. would be exposing foreign nationals to possible death-penalty sentences.

The real problem is that Guantanamo Bay, like Mr. Bush himself, has become a symbol of sorts. It is an easy scapegoat through which Europeans can vent their much larger love-hate frustrations with their protector and rival, the hyper-power America.

The pacifism of the European Union was supposed to be a post-Cold War model of liberal reason for the rest of the world. Instead, Islamic fascists have either ignored Europe's human-rights advocacy or considered it a sign of weakness to be exploited. An impotent EU is embarrassed and needs cheap targets like Guantanamo to transfer attention away from its past naivete about the dangers of Islamic fascism.

By ankle-biting America on Guantanamo, the Europeans sound moral and tough while ignoring the real dangers for which they have absolutely no solutions -- unassimilated and angry Muslims, the Dutch and Danes under assault by radical Islamic censors and a defenseless Europe potentially soon in range of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's nuclear-tipped missiles.

Note also that the U.S. has been mostly quiet about Europe's own ethical lapses in this war. Americans are in a quandary with Iran in large part because the Europeans -- for whom profits trump idealism -- sold the theocracy technology needed for the bomb. Nothing new there: Saddam once got his nuclear reactor from the French and his bombproof bunkers from the Germans.

We also hear a lot about the three suicides at Guantanamo but almost nothing about the still-unexplained death of Slobodan Milosevic while being held in Europe. When was the last time Americans chided the Germans that Mohamed Atta conspired to murder thousands of Americans while in their country?

Have we forgotten that Ahmed Omar Sheikh, the killer of Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl, and Richard Reid, the would-be shoe bomber, at one time fit in well with the radical Islamic culture that thrives in London. And how about Abu Hamza al-Masri, who plotted against the U.S. -- he's wanted by American authorities on charges of trying to establish a terrorist training camp in Oregon -- from his sanctuary in a London mosque?

Yet if the Eiffel Tower topples to a jihadist suicide bomber who assembled his team in Los Angeles or Miami, or if an Iranian missile soars over the Brandenburg Gate, expect the Europeans to drop their present high talk about the "gulag" at Guantanamo -- and start whispering about the need for more American terrorist detention centers, classical deterrence and their own missile defense.

But until the Europeans' dream world is shattered, we will hear nonstop screeching about American barbarity. Such outrage says far more about them than us.

Breaking Party Protocol (WSJ)

By Ellen Gamerman

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

In the Iraq war, a new approach to welcoming home the troops is emerging. From bonfires to black-tie galas, how some families are bucking tradition

For a lakefront party in Whispering Pines, N.C., next month, plans include a professional photographer, a live band, and 200 guests. It's not a wedding or an anniversary party -- it's a homecoming celebration for Lt. Kevin Martin, an Army reservist who has been serving in Iraq for the last year.

The $5,000 shindig sounds great to the guest of honor. "The bigger the better!" writes Lt. Martin in an email from Iraq. "It will be a great way for me to show them I am back and hopefully still injury free, share some stories and reunite with those I care about."

As the political debate over bringing the troops home intensifies, a related matter fraught with symbolism is playing out for service members and their families. The question: How to mark the soldiers' return and welcome them home. In the Iraq War, a new approach is starting to emerge. Military tradition and conventional wisdom dictate that families should keep homecomings low-key to avoid overwhelming the troops while they're readjusting to being back.

For a variety of reasons, from the military's shifting demographics to attitudes about the current war, some families are taking a different route, opting for outsize celebrations. These include black-tie galas, elaborate beach bonfires and, in the case of Sgt. Kurt Power of Abington, Mass., a 600-guest event his family has dubbed "Kurt-a-palooza III" (Kurt-a-paloozas I and II were send-off parties for the 23-year-old's two deployments).

Traditionally, family homecomings have been smaller affairs. Though the official welcome at a base might involve some ceremony, most families have opted for home-cooked dinners or a simple backyard barbecue. Finances are a factor: Basic pay, not including benefits, can range from $14,000 for a new recruit to $30,000 for a mid-level noncommissioned officer to $96,000 for a senior officer.

The military recommends a quiet approach to homecoming parties. A Web site for spouses funded by the Defense Department, for example, urges husbands and wives in the first week to "hold off on visits to relatives and limit time with friends until you've settled into a comfortable routine at home." The site also warns against lavish spending on homecomings, adding: "It can be tempting to celebrate your return with dinners out or special gifts. Be careful not to get into debt trouble."

But some military families say they don't feel there's enough daily awareness of the sacrifices being made. For them, big parties are a way to express gratitude and pride -- even if it means dipping into the family savings to do so.

This war's unique aspects are also changing the homecoming equation. Iraq marks the first extended conflict for the U.S. since the draft was abandoned in 1973. About 29% of the 1.3 million troops deployed since the invasion of Afghanistan in October 2001 have done two or more tours of duty. This is a big change from Vietnam when the draft assured supplies of fresh troops, and from the 1991 Gulf War, which lasted eight months. In this conflict, homecoming is often temporary -- and when troops do come back for good, it follows an extended absence.

More troops are returning to spouses eager to celebrate the event. About 52% of the fighting force is married, according to the Defense Department. Military experts say the troops in Vietnam, with a draft that tilted heavily toward young men, were largely unmarried, though the Defense Department said it had not compiled marriage statistics for all the services in that war.

In another shift, many of the troops today are returning directly to civilian communities. National Guard and Reserve members have comprised as much as 40% of forces, compared with a high of 20% during the Gulf War.

"Homecoming is a more ceremonious event," says Brig. Gen. Terry Wiley, who commands the Delaware Army National Guard. "The reservists are coming back to their families, their churches, their fire departments, their civic organizations, their employers. It's more of a homecoming because they're established in a town."

Sgt. William Long's family was so excited about his return two weeks ago, they planned a six-day party beginning this weekend. The 24-year-old National Guard soldier served 12 months in Iraq, staying even during his two-week R&R so as not to leave his buddies. His family has invited 40 guests to join them on four houseboats on Norris Lake in Tennessee. They'll cook up chicken and barbecue ribs in between tubing, water-skiing and fishing.

Sgt. Long, who plans to resume his college course work, says he is looking forward to playing with his little sister and floating in the lake. "The only thing I care about is if my family's there," he says. "I'll be more than happy to see anybody who wants to see me."

After seven months away from home, Marine Capt. James Hoffmann arrived from Iraq last winter and walked into his in-laws' home in San Marcos, Calif., to find 60 people waiting there for a surprise bash. In Manhattan, returning Army Capt. Paul Mysliwiec was feted with 300 guests, a live band and a catered spread. In San Diego, event planner Thomas Bui says he's planned parties that vary widely in cost, but the most expensive was a $50,000 black-tie event that featured gold-embossed invitations, a lobster and steak dinner and a show by Hawaiian dancers. "They just wanted to be able to relax and not have to worry about hearing bombs blow up," he says.

But planning these oversized homecomings can be tricky. Families say they have to prepare guests to avoid questions about the battlefield or casualties so the returning soldier doesn't get uncomfortable. Event planners say they have to find disc jockeys, caterers and florists who can accommodate spur-of-the-moment plans since troops sometimes don't know their return date until a day or two before they leave the desert. At Plants Alive!, a special-events landscaper outside Washington, D.C., workers space the tables far apart so returning service members in wheelchairs can visit their guests.

Command Sgt. Maj. Gus Klein favors downplaying the festivities. The Army National Guard soldier says he was somewhat dazed when his family threw him a $2,000 DJ-led dance bash just a few days after his return from Afghanistan in 2003. Though he knows his family meant well, he says he wasn't really ready to socialize with so many people so soon.

"I really didn't need to have people there rehashing all the war stories, what happened to you, what'd you do, did you shoot anybody, did you kill anybody, those kinds of questions," says Sgt. Klein, speaking from Fort Bliss, Texas, where he is now stationed. "A soldier, man or woman, needs an opportunity to get rid of that stuff on their own." Now, he visits VA centers to help returning soldiers readjust to home life after war, and counsels against such parties.

In recent years, the military has launched a broader effort to guide troops and their families through the process of returning home -- a legacy from Vietnam and a result of new insight into posttraumatic stress disorder. A 90-page "reintegration guide" published by the Army and distributed to some troops before they depart Iraq advises on everything from small issues (which items make good souvenirs to bring home in your duffel bag; silverware from the Iraqi regime is barred) to larger ones (how to get reacquainted with a spouse and discipline the kids after a long separation).

Another resource for service members is a "family life consultant," which the Army began offering in 2004. The mental-health expert offers help with child rearing, relationships and other personal issues through workshops, group discussions and private consultations.

Indeed, the process of coming home can be a whirlwind. It starts when the commanding officer gives troops a rough idea of their redeployment date, but as for the actual departure, families often get only a day's notice (one reason: the military doesn't disclose details on troop movements for security purposes). One pattern that's unusual in this war is that sometimes scores of soldiers who were shipped out and fought together are on the same plane home 12 months later. In contrast, during the Vietnam

War, troops were often sent home individually, military officials say. When the troops return together, they often pool their resources for a homecoming celebration or beef up the guest lists of each others' parties.

Sherri Hutton says she had been advised by officials at Camp Pendleton in Southern California not to go overboard, but she asked her husband if he would be up for a big welcome-home, and he agreed. Within a week of Marine Staff Sgt. Michael Hutton's return last April, Ms. Hutton organized a bonfire for 75 people -- including six Marines who returned with her husband's battalion -- on the same beach the family had camped on seven months earlier, the night before Sgt. Hutton was deployed. The party included karaoke, a keg and a "bring your own steak" barbecue.

"He was excited to go exactly back to the way things were when he left," she says. But there was a sad note to their reunion: Five people from the battalion died during the deployment.

Often, the welcome-home parties fall in between deployments, which families say can increase the pressure to go all out. A "pseudo-homecoming" is what retired Army psychologist L. Scott Fairchild calls it. With the Gulf War "there was a demarcation, a way point where they knew they had accomplished their mission," says Dr. Fairchild, who worked with military families on Gulf War homecoming issues at Fort Bragg, N.C. "One of the differences now is the ambivalence -- these soldiers are going to have the tension and stress and not know when it's going to be over."

Cindie Tinsman threw a homecoming party for her son Army Cpl. Kevin Tinsman when he returned home from a year at Camp Anaconda in Iraq, nicknamed "Mortaritaville" -- and before he shipped out for a second deployment. Ms. Tinsman, a Pennsylvania school bus driver, took the money she and her husband never spent on a wedding reception or anniversary party and put it toward the $2,000 bash. "Mama don't have lots of diamonds," she recalls telling her husband. "We're having a party." It took place at VFW Post 106 in West Chester, Pa., with a rented jukebox, a bartender and 80 pounds of roast beef and meatballs for 120 people.

Ms. Tinsman says while she might wait a bit before throwing a party next time, she has no doubt she'll plan one again when he's finally home for good. "We'll probably have it next July Fourth," she says. "It's going to be a heckuva celebration."

Tribute Or Protest? (WSJ)

By Jeffrey Zaslow

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

Lowering flags for soldiers killed in Iraq emerges as another flashpoint on the home front.

Driving on a highway in Howell, Mich., John Ellsworth noticed that a giant flag at an outlet shopping mall was at half-staff. Mr. Ellsworth was heading to a funeral home, where visitation was being held for his son, a 20-year-old Marine killed in Iraq.

Just after Mr. Ellsworth spotted the flag, a realization hit him: It was at half-staff to honor his son, Lance Cpl. Justin Ellsworth. He recalled receiving a notice from Gov. Jennifer Granholm, who since late 2003 has decreed that flags be lowered for every Michigan soldier killed in the line of duty.

"It was comforting to see that people who didn't even know my son were remembering him," says Mr. Ellsworth. Later that day in November 2004, he went to see the lowered flag at the state capitol. "I thought to myself, 'This is for you, buddy.' Justin was always my little buddy.' "

In some 16 states, flags are routinely lowered for fallen home-state soldiers. But what some see as a gesture of tribute, others consider inappropriate, demoralizing and even devious. Half-staff efforts, which have spread to states Oregon, Minnesota, California, Illinois, Kentucky and Maine -- are generating controversy a mong politicians, veterans and citizens unsure about whether and when to lower the flag.

The U.S. Flag Code, adopted in 1942, says governors may honor state "officials" after they die by lowering the flag. Critics say it is inappropriate for governors to label soldiers as officials. Some wonder whether the flag tributes are really an attempt to undermine support for the war by reminding Americans of the fatalities. And though many veterans welcome the lowered flags, others say the day for honoring war dead is Memorial Day.

During World War II, when Michigan soldiers were dying at the rate of 13 a day, there was no effort to lower flags for every one of them. "If there had been, the flag would never have been raised for the entire war," says Bruce Butgereit, of Kentwood, Mich., who serves as national patriotic instructor of the Sons of Union Veterans of the Civil War.

Mr. Butgereit says he opposes the Michigan governor's call for flying flags at half-staff because it disregards the Flag Code. He believes Gov. Granholm, a Democrat, feels "some sense of loss" when a Michigan soldier dies, but that "her motivation to order the flag lowered was purely political."

In an interview, Gov. Granholm denies this, saying she first thought to lower flags when a state employee lost his nephew in 2003, and asked for the tribute at his state work site. That led Gov. Granholm to decide to honor all soldiers from Michigan and to do it statewide. Since her proclamation in December 2003, Gov. Granholm has ordered the flag lowered for 72 soldiers who've died. She called all 72 families in advance to tell them about the flag tribute, she says.

Gov. Granholm says she is aware that some people think she lowers the flag to remind citizens that the war isn't going well. She says this is not the case. She hopes the half-staff flags "remind people about the costs and sacrifices of having a free nation," she says. She asks citizens who see a lowered flag to "say a prayer, because that soldier's family is here within our borders."

Last month, Gov. Granholm's opponent in the November election, Republican Dick DeVos, indicated through a spokesman that, if elected, he would lower the flag for "officials," as designated by the Flag Code, but not for soldiers. A public outcry followed, with military families calling radio talk shows and writing letters to newspapers to vent their anger.

Within days, Mr. DeVos issued a statement saying he would continue the governor's flag policy -- and that his position had been misinterpreted. Mr. DeVos, son of Amway founder Richard DeVos Sr., declined to be interviewed for this article.

The flag code is a guideline rather than a document enforceable by law. The National Flag Foundation, a nonprofit educational group in Pittsburgh, Pa., defines a state official as "someone in a state cabinet position or higher" -- not a soldier. The foundation recommends that governors lower their state flags, rather than the stars and stripes, to honor fallen soldiers. (That's the practice in Virginia.) In any case, flying the U.S. flag at full-staff "honors all those who have sacrificed in the hundreds of years of our country's history," says Joyce Doody, the foundation's executive director.

Some who have successfully lobbied for flag tributes have been open about their antiwar goals. Paul Vogel of Barrington, Ill., has a son who served in Iraq. Mr. Vogel is now a peace activist with Military Families Speak Out. In 2004, Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich, a Democrat, said it was Mr. Vogel who helped persuade him to lower flags at state buildings for fallen Illinois National Guardsman. Mr. Vogel says he sees the half-staff tribute as both "anti-war" and "pro-soldier" -- and a reminder that "for a country at war, we seem benignly unaware of the cost." He hopes the lowered flags convince Americans that "we've sacrificed enough of our 19- and 20-year-olds to this illegal war."

Mr. Vogel's personal politics had nothing to do with the governor's decision to lower flags, says Gerardo Cardenas, a spokesman for Gov. Blagojevich. The governor was concerned about the need to honor soldiers' sacrifices "especially when the federal government is leaving millions of veterans behind," says the spokesman.

Governors who've ordered flags lowered are evenly mixed between Democrats and Republicans. The extent of the flag lowering varies by state. For GOP governors who order flags to half-staff, the terrain is potentially tricky since a state filled with lowered flags could be seen as a slight to the president's policies. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's spokeswoman says, "The only thing that factors into his thinking is paying tribute to our military men and women. It's all about expressing gratitude. There's nothing political."

In South Dakota, a spokesman for Republican Gov. Mike Rounds said the governor doesn't believe lowering the flag offers fuel for the antiwar movement because people in South Dakota understand the risks of war and the reasons the fight in Iraq is necessary.

Republican Missouri Gov. Matt Blunt has refused to lower the flag for soldiers killed in Iraq because soldiers are in federal service, says a spokeswoman. Governors, therefore, don't have authority to lower flags in their honor. Other Republican governors cite the Flag Code and its definition of "officials," which they say excludes soldiers.

Rick Johnson, a Democratic state representative in Missouri, unsuccessfully tried this year to pass a bill requiring flags to be lowered when soldiers from the state are killed.

Rep. Johnson, a veteran of the first Persian Gulf War, says that in the current conflict, "we went to war under false pretenses." Unable to get his bill passed, Rep. Johnson has kept a flagpole in his backyard at half-staff for two years, as a tribute to all soldiers who've died.

In Michigan's wealthy Oakland County, in suburban Detroit, County Executive L. Brooks Patterson, a Republican, had at first refused to comply with Gov. Granholm's flag orders. He feared the lowered flags "would be a constant reminder of the high cost of war, and would undermine the war on terror," says spokesman Robert Dustman. "He also felt that he didn't want the governor using this as a political thing, holding a tearjerker news conference every time a soldier was killed."

Veterans who support the half-staff order visited with Mr. Patterson and asked him to reconsider his decision. Mr. Patterson retains all his initial feelings about the potentially troubling messages sent by the lowered flags, "but out of respect for the veterans' groups, he decided to comply with their wishes," says Mr. Dustman.

Walter McVeigh, a World War II veteran in Grand Rapids, Mich., is a vocal opponent of Gov. Granholm's policy, calling it "misguided" and "a zig-zag tribute." He says people are confused. "You see some flags up, some flags down." After he wrote a letter to his local paper saying Memorial Day is the appropriate time for lowering flags, the backlash included a letter-writer who called him "callous" and labeled his views "reprehensible." Mr. McVeigh says he shakes off such criticism. He has even gone up to strangers' homes when they display the flag incorrectly, to tell them about proper flag etiquette. He says people seem willing to hear him out.

Mr. Butgereit, of the Civil War group, heard from one angry veteran who called him "petty" for speaking out against the half-staff flags. Mr. Butgereit responded with a long letter to the vet outlining his reasoning, explaining the Flag Code, and suggesting that Gov. Granholm could better pay tribute to the military through programs to educate citizens about the flag.

Many military families say they support the flag tributes -- even if antiwar activists are behind them.

Sue Nicholas, who owns an auto-glass company in Taylor, Mich., has a son who served in the Air Force in Iraq and is now stationed in Alaska. She has lowered the flag in front of her business dozens of times; she monitors announcements from Gov. Granholm online to know when soldiers have died.

She says customers almost never ask why the flag is at half-staff. "They're oblivious to it. Or they don't want to know because it's depressing," she says. The only people who "live, eat and breathe the war" are those with loved ones who've served in Iraq, she says. For her birthday this spring, she received a flagpole for her front yard from her friends in the "Michigan Military Moms" support group. Now she lowers the flag at home, too.

Paula Zasadny says she was comforted when the state of Michigan lowered flags "to honor my brave little soldier." Her 19-year-old daughter, Army Spc. Holly McGeogh, of Taylor, Mich., was killed in Iraq in 2004. Just before her body was brought home, Ms. Zasadny had a flagpole placed in her yard, and she follows Gov. Granholm's directions on flag protocol. "Even if we have to put our flags up and down every single day, that's something we as civilians of this great country need to do," she says. "Those soldiers are fighting for us."

Last November, at Bon Homme Yankton Electric Association in Tabor, S.D., employees were dealing with a terrible ice storm; 90% of customers were without power. At the time, Richard Schild, the company's office manager, was a National Guardsman serving in Iraq. When he got an email about the storm, he actually called in from overseas to offer input and advice.

The next day, while in a convoy driving through Baghdad, Sgt. 1st Class Schild was killed by a roadside bomb.

Back in South Dakota, the governor would soon order flags to half-staff. Sgt. Schild's grieving colleagues sought to lower the flag in front of the company's headquarters, but because of the ice storm, the flag was frozen to the pole. Eventually, general manager Merlin Goehring was able to hack off the ice and bring down the flag.

"It was very emotional," says Mr. Goehring, "but we felt we needed to show Rich the respect he deserved. We wanted to get that flag flying the way it was supposed to."

Texas: War Protesters Sue Over Roadside Camping Bans (NYT)

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

Cindy Sheehan and four other war protesters sued McLennan County over roadside camping and parking bans near President Bush's ranch in Crawford, saying they want to return to what became an "international symbol of protest against the Iraq war." Ms. Sheehan, who lives in Berkeley, Calif., was in Waco to file the suit, which also names the sheriff, county commissioners and county judge individually. The suit filed in state district court asks that the ordinances not be enforced during protests in August and ultimately be declared void. Ms. Sheehan's oldest son, Casey, was killed in Iraq in 2004. Last summer, she reinvigorated the antiwar movement with her peace vigil that started in ditches off the winding, two-lane road leading to Mr. Bush's ranch. (AP)

DOJ:

New Supreme Court Begins To Show Its Stripes (KRT)

By Stephen Henderson

Knight Ridder, July 1, 2006

WASHINGTON - At the Supreme Court, they say each group of nine justices is different, that a switch in just one seat fundamentally alters the dynamic among them all. As the court closes its 2005-06 term, when two new members, including the chief justice, took their seats after a 12-year stasis, that truism is evident in the court's rulings.

From decisions on the Clean Water Act, police procedure and abortion to others on political gerrymandering and the death penalty, the focus was on how Chief Justice John G. Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito were changing the court's outcomes.

In political terms, they established themselves as solid conservatives. But as their approaches to the law became clearer, they revealed nuances in their thinking that distinguished them from the bench's more doctrinaire members, Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas.

DOJ_NMG_0037905

The term's lone blockbuster opinion - rejecting the Bush administration's military tribunals at the Guantanamo Bay prison in Cuba - highlighted the term's only other significant theme: the emergence of Justice Anthony Kennedy at the court's center. He has taken over the compromising, coalition-building role that he once shared with former Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. In cases that split the justices narrowly, Kennedy was in the majority more than anyone else.

"It's now clear that two justices have replaced Sandra Day O'Connor," said Elliot Mincberg, legal director for People for the American Way. "Justice Alito took her seat on the court, while Justice Kennedy has taken her role as the key swing vote."

It will take at least a few more terms before the character of the new court becomes fully evident. Yet some court watchers say some things are becoming clear.

"This is, of course, more a Kennedy court than a Roberts court," said David Garrow, a law professor at Oxford University in England. "But already we've certainly gotten some clear indications, both stylistic and substantive, of how Roberts will develop."

The term began quietly, with Roberts installed as chief justice and O'Connor still in her seat, awaiting her successor's confirmation. The justices struck an early chord of unanimity in October in a long string of opinions that included some topics that usually bring discord. They did it by deciding many cases on narrow legal grounds, avoiding more controversial elements.

The term's lone abortion case provides an example.

The justices, in considering whether a New Hampshire abortion restriction was unconstitutional because it lacked a health exception for the woman, simply decided that a lower court should consider the question more carefully.

The justices also unanimously said that the government could withhold money from law schools that bar military recruiters and that the government couldn't bar a small Christian sect from using hallucinogenic tea for religious ceremonies.

Overall, the court closed the term with more unanimous opinions than it has in recent years and with fewer concurrences and dissents.

Alito's influence was less noticeable than Roberts', which is typical for a first-year justice who isn't chief. He also missed the term's first half while his confirmation process unfolded.

Once on the court, he established a restrained conservativism that mirrored his work as an appellate judge. His voting record resembled Scalia's and Thomas', but even more Roberts'.

The term offered more clues about Roberts' thinking; as chief justice, he had greater impact. His first dissent came in March, when the court said police could not enter a home on one occupant's say-so if another objects. He craftily took aim at the court majority's logic and turned their own concerns back on them.

The decision, Roberts said, would harm victims of domestic violence whose abusers could simply turn police away at the door.

Roberts' opinion also mocked the majority's attempt to define the scope of cohabitation arrangements and the "social expectations" that accompany them.

"The Court creates constitutional law by surmising what is typical when a social guest encounters an entirely atypical situation," Roberts wrote. "The fact is that a wide variety of differing social situations can readily be imagined, giving rise to quite different social expectations. The possible scenarios are limitless."

The tone wasn't snarky, but the opinion showed how Roberts' razor-sharp intellect could needle his opponents.

Garrow also points to a Roberts line in the Texas political gerrymandering case, where he expressed frustration over efforts to draw congressional districts to assure just the right ethnic mix.

"It is a sordid business, this divvying us up by race," Roberts wrote. That sentiment could influence him next term on a case involving school district efforts to maintain certain levels of minority enrollment.

The next term is already shaping up as a big one, with major abortion, affirmative action and environmental cases on the docket.

Roberts' most sweeping opinion came in a case where the court didn't decide a substantive issue. When the justices dismissed a suit by Ohio taxpayers claiming that a state tax incentive plan violated their constitutional rights, Roberts took the opportunity to pen a virtual treatise on the judicial doctrine of "standing," or when someone has a right to bring a claim before a federal court.

It is the first question that courts must address when considering a case, and it's a subject of sharp debate in legal circles.

Roberts outlined an approach that tacks closely to the line taken by many judicial conservatives, who believe the ability to sue is limited. Remarkably, Roberts drew no objections from other justices or even a concurring opinion suggesting there was another side to consider. That could be a sign of deference to his leadership, or it could be diplomacy among colleagues who recognized that Roberts' opinion wasn't binding at that point.

Roberts and Alito distinguished themselves from the court's most rigidly conservative members, Scalia and Thomas, in several key cases. They backed away from the duo's assertion that no amount of political gerrymandering should compel court intervention and from their proposition that any limits on political contributions are unconstitutional.

Kennedy emerged as the justice that the court's liberal and conservative blocs must woo to reach a majority. That was evident not just in how frequently he provided a crucial fifth vote, but also in how often his opinion tempered a ruling.

In a decision that said police armed with warrants can enter a house unannounced without fear that any evidence they find will be excluded from trial, Kennedy's opinion kept the decision from obliterating the so-called "exclusionary rule" altogether.

In a case that questioned the scope of the Clean Water Act, Kennedy's opinion held the court majority back from nearly eliminating government regulation of wetlands.

Kennedy also modified the court's decision on political gerrymandering, leaving open the possibility for further court refinement of the issue in the future.

Early Supreme Court Consensus Fades (AP-Y2)

By Nancy Benac, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 1, 2006

Last October, liberal standard-bearer John Paul Stevens welcomed conservative Chief Justice John Roberts to the court by wishing him "a long and happy career in our common calling." In February, it was Roberts' turn to welcome fellow conservative Samuel Alito with exactly the same collegial greeting.

Yet for all the talk of consensus and harmony on the new Supreme Court, plenty of trees had to die to provide enough paper for the justices' fractured rulings on some of the most contentious cases of the court's term.

And all sides are betting that this transitional year — in which Roberts slipped into his seat just days before the term began and Alito arrived halfway through — served as a fairly mild prelude to far bigger dustups to come next term and for many years hence.

Roberts, the smooth and savvy chief justice from central casting, promised at his confirmation hearings last September to be a "modest" justice rather than an activist. In that spirit, he opted for a basic black robe rather than the flashy gold stripes worn on the sleeves of his predecessor, the late William Rehnquist.

Roberts has spoken publicly of his desire to achieve unanimity through narrow rulings that would offer "clarity and guidance." And he had some success, evidenced by a healthy share of unanimous opinions.

Even some cases that were expected to split the court — on abortion, campaign finance and disabled inmates, for example — were resolved unanimously and without creating upheaval.

But as more difficult cases trickled out before the justices began their summer break on Friday, it became clear that "the early buzz of peace, love, harmony and Kumbaya was probably overstated," said Ohio State University law professor Douglas Berman. "This is a closely divided court on a lot of issues that can't help but express genuine disagreements on the way critical legal issues ought to be looked at."

In a 5-4 case on Monday upholding Kansas' death penalty law, the four liberal dissenters labeled the statute "obtuse by any moral or social measure." Justice Antonin Scalia, known for his fire-breathing opinions, countered that the liberals were contributing to international "sanctimonious criticism of America's death penalty."

In a 5-3 ruling on Thursday, the court's last day, moderate Justice Anthony M. Kennedy joined the court's liberal members in finding that President Bush had overstepped his authority in ordering military war crimes trials for Guantanamo Bay detainees. Justice Clarence Thomas underscored his strong opposition by reading his dissent from the bench for the only the second time in his 15-year-career.

In a major wetlands case this month, the court produced five separate opinions covering 100 pages. Roberts lamented that, because of the muddled result, interested parties "will now have to feel their way on a case-by-case basis."

The divisions aren't just along liberal-conservative lines.

Within the reinforced conservative wing of the court, there are strong and sometimes conflicting opinions.

Scalia took fellow conservative Alito to task for making "illegitimate and ill-advised" use of legislative history in one opinion. In another case, Alito faulted Scalia for making "a subtle but important mistake" in his analysis of a defendant's right to counsel.

Both men seemed to be sending the message that they're not intellectual clones: "Don't call us Scalito," as paraphrased by lawyer Kathleen Sullivan, moderator of an American Constitution Society panel reviewing the court's term.

For all of the focus on the court's new fifty-something justices and the chemistry of the so-called Roberts court, it turns out that the jurist to watch is 69-year-old Anthony Kennedy, a moderate who's been on the bench nearly two decades. His role as a swing voter was overshadowed in years past by that of centrist Sandra Day O'Connor.

But now that O'Connor is gone, "the basic principle that you need to understand is that it's Justice Kennedy's world and you just live in it," said Washington lawyer Thomas Goldstein, who regularly argues cases at the high court and tracks voting trends.

As he fancifully put it, "Justice O'Connor, having been the most powerful woman in the universe, handed the keys to him on the way out the door and said, "Have fun,' and he took up that invitation."

This term, Kennedy has provided the fifth vote on some of the court's toughest cases, including the death penalty, Guantanamo and wetlands cases.

More often than not, he has sided with the conservatives. Court watchers expect that trend to be more pronounced next term, when the docket includes contentious issues such as affirmative action and a federal ban on what opponents call partial birth abortion.

"We're almost certain to see next term an emphasis on those areas, namely abortion and race, where Kennedy is measurably more conservative than O'Connor in ways that likely will be utterly decisive," said David Garrow, a Supreme Court historian at Cambridge University.

The replacement of Rehnquist with Roberts didn't shift the court's ideological balance much, but the substitution of Alito for O'Connor clearly pushed the court to the right.

An analysis of voting trends shows Alito's affinity with the Scalia-Kennedy-Thomas-Roberts bloc to be as much as 15 percent higher than was O'Connor's.

"I think everybody really has to be aware that the court has become considerably more conservative," said Goldstein. "The real pitch in ideological cases has to be made to Justice Kennedy, and it's very much going to have to be made on a case-by-case basis."

The court's shift to the right could well sharpen in years to come, depending on the timing of future departures from the bench and the political party of the next president. The court's four conservatives — ages 51, 56, 58 and 70 — are actuarially destined to outlast the liberals — ages 66, 67, 73, and 86.

That age split has created an unusual dynamic for Roberts, at 51 the youngest chief justice in two centuries.

"The people sitting around the conference table are his parents' generation and they call him chief," said Thomas Baker, a Florida International University law professor who served as Rehnquist's first administrative assistant. "His self-deprecating style helps here. His humor helps here. And, one thing that cannot be overlooked, is how impressive his intellect is."

The court's new lineup is likely to change the dynamic in ways that extend well beyond the differences in how Roberts and Alito might vote compared with Rehnquist and O'Connor, says John McGinnis, a Northwestern law professor who worked with Alito in the Reagan Justice Department.

For example, there are some early signs that Justice Stephen Breyer may be inclined to vote more strategically to stay within the majority on certain cases, McGinnis said. And Roberts, for his part, may be assigning Breyer to write certain opinions in an effort to keep him from reflexively siding with the other liberals.

"I think that will be a story we should be following for the next five years," McGinnis said.

Getting To Yes (WSJ)

By James Taranto

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

In a Georgetown Law School commencement address in May, Chief Justice John Roberts said that he strives for "unanimity or near unanimity" on the Supreme Court in order to "promote clarity and guidance" to lawyers and lower courts. "The broader the agreement among the justices, the more likely it is that the decision is on the narrowest possible ground. . . . If it's not necessary to decide more to dispose of a case, in my view it is necessary not to decide more."

This Wednesday the court decided Lulac v. Perry, the Texas redistricting case. The decision ran 132 pages and comprised six separate opinions. Earlier in the week the court also produced six opinions, though only 70 pages, in a Vermont campaign finance case. Achieving unanimity is easier said than done, and the doctrine of deciding narrowly turns out to be of only limited usefulness.

The court's fragmentation is largely the legacy of a half-century's liberal activist jurisprudence. Justices have both discovered individual rights in areas where the Constitution is silent (most notably sexual privacy, including abortion) and curtailed rights (free speech, equal protection) to permit their favored social policies (campaign finance restrictions, affirmative action).

This has given rise to a crude political taxonomy of the court. "Conservative" justices -- Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and possibly Samuel Alito -- disagree with many liberal precedents and wish to scale back or overturn some of them. "Liberals" -- John Paul Stevens, David Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and to a lesser extent Stephen Breyer -- are comfortable with those precedents and eager to extend them where possible. "Swing" justices like Anthony Kennedy can be either liberal or conservative, depending on the situation. This gives them outsized clout, so long as neither side has a reliable majority. Justice Kennedy's fellow swinger, Sandra Day O'Connor, was often called "the most powerful woman in America."

On such a court, every associate justice is a centrifugal force. Conservatives and liberals hew to their convictions, while swingers have the added incentive of influence. This dynamic was most strikingly on display in Rapanos v. U.S., a case involving wetlands regulation under the Clean Water Act. By 5-4 the court overturned an appellate ruling that had endorsed the Army Corps of Engineers' expansive definition of "navigable waters." The four liberal justices wanted to defer to the corps' definition, while Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Scalia, Thomas and Alito would have rejected it. Justice Kennedy split the difference, leaving it to the lower court to determine whether the property in question had "a 'significant nexus' to waters that are or were navigable in fact or that could reasonably be so made."

In a concurring opinion, the chief justice seemed to express frustration with Justice Kennedy: "It is unfortunate that no opinion commands a majority of the Court. . . . Lower courts and regulated entities will now have to feel their way on a case-by-case basis. . . . What is unusual in this instance, perhaps, is how readily the situation could have been avoided."

To some extent this belies Chief Justice Roberts's adage that "if it's not necessary to decide more . . . it is necessary not to decide more." It was Justice Kennedy's minimalist concurrence, after all, that left the law muddled; it would have been clearer had either the conservative or the liberal bloc prevailed.

Happily for those who favor an aggressive war against al Qaeda, a similar result obtained in the term's most important case, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, in which Justice Kennedy declined to join several key elements of Justice Stevens's opinion striking down the Pentagon's system for trying Guantanamo detainees. (Chief Justice Roberts did not participate because he was on the appellate panel that decided the case last year.)

The chief justice did command a unanimous court in one major case, Rumsfeld v. FAIR. By 8-0, the justices upheld the Solomon Amendment, which would have denied federal funds to universities (including Georgetown) that refused to allow military recruiters on campus. But tellingly, the case was not decided on the narrowest possible ground. The court held not only that this was a permissible condition for federal subsidies, but that Congress could have mandated the admission of military recruiters even if no federal money were involved.

Two unanimous cases decided in January, before Justice Alito joined the court, illustrate the limits of narrowness. Ayotte v. Planned Parenthood concerned abortion regulation; Wisconsin Right to Life v. Federal Election Commission, a section of the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law. In each case the court -- without a dissent or even a separate concurrence -- vacated a lower court's rulings on narrow technical grounds and sent it back for further adjudication. This approach made tactical sense. The court had been fractured over both abortion and campaign finance, and Justice Alito's arrival could change the balance. It was wise not to make new law while the court's makeup was in flux.

But on Monday, when the court decided another campaign finance case, the justices reverted to their fractured form. Randall v. Sorrell overturned Vermont's draconian contribution limits. Justice Breyer, joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito, decided the case on the "narrowest possible ground," throwing out the limits without reconsidering Buckley v. Valeo, the 1976 case that upheld limits on campaign donations. Justice Alito said he might revisit Buckley in a future case; Justice Kennedy proclaimed himself "skeptical" about it; and Justices Scalia and Thomas said they'd overturn it. Justice Stevens, in dissent, also wanted to overturn Buckley -- but to permit limits on campaign spending as well as donations. The Ayotte consensus is likely to prove fleeting too. The court almost certainly will not be unanimous when it decides Gonzales v. Carhart, a partial-birth abortion case, in its next term.

In his confirmation hearings last year, John Roberts showed himself to be a man of intelligence, charm and political acumen. If anyone can bring consensus to the Supreme Court, surely he can. But his first term in office showed that this goal will require patience and persistence, and maybe another new justice or two.

Boeing Closes Deal To Pay 615 Million Dollars To End Probes (AFP)

AFP, June 30, 2006

Boeing Co. finalized an agreement to pay 615 million dollars to end three years of US investigations into high-profile contracting scandals at the aerospace giant, officials said.

The agreement calls for a 565 million-dollar civil settlement and a 50 million-dollar monetary penalty under a separate criminal agreement, according to the US Justice Department.

The amount is a record for government procurement fraud, for the Department of Defense and for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, officials said.

The criminal probe stems from allegations that Boeing used improperly acquired data from rival Lockheed Martin to help win rocket launching business from NASA.

The deal also would end a civil probe into conflict of interest in Boeing's recruitment of a senior Air Force procurement official while she still had authority over billions of dollars in other Boeing contracts. The former official, Darleen Druyun, went to prison in the case.

DOJ_NMG_0037909

The uproar led to the firing of Boeing chief financial officer Michael Sears in 2003 and the resignation of chairman Phil Condit.

"The American people rightly expect government officials and contractors to act with integrity," said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty in announcing the agreement.

"The outcome of these investigations sends a clear message to those doing business with the government: harsh consequences await anyone whose conduct falls short of the highest legal and ethical standards."

US authorities agreed not to bring criminal charges against the company "in part because the company is fully cooperating with the government's investigation," the Justice Department said in a statement.

Additionally, Boeing "has agreed to accept responsibility for the conduct of its employees in these matters, continue its cooperation with federal investigators, pay a monetary penalty of 50 million dollars, and maintain an effective ethics and compliance program," the statement added.

Officials said they may seek to prosecute Boeing or to assess a further penalty of up to 10 million dollars, if over the next two years an executive management employee of Boeing commits federal crimes as outlined in the agreement, and the company fails to report the misconduct to the Department of Justice.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Report: Abramoff Had FBI Data (LAT)

By Walter F. Roche Jr., Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

The lobbyist improperly got and acted on a secret file about the Marianas, an inspector general says.

WASHINGTON — Convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff improperly obtained a top-secret FBI document and tried to use the information to aid his clients in the Pacific Island territories, according to a report released Friday by the Justice Department's inspector general.

The lobbyist feared information in the document could be damaging to his clients' interests, the inspector general said, and he used his knowledge of its contents to warn them and to devise a counterattack.

"Abramoff's e-mail records indicate that by late June 2002 he had obtained a copy of the report from an official of the Department of Interior," the report said.

The leak has been referred to the FBI and the Interior Department's inspector general for further investigation.

Abramoff earlier this year pleaded guilty to corruption charges, including conspiracy to bribe public officials and failure to pay taxes. He is cooperating in an investigation that has resulted in guilty pleas from top legislative aides and Abramoff's lobbying partners.

The revelation that Abramoff had obtained the secret document was just one finding in the 41-page report into allegations that he had improperly influenced President Bush's 2002 decision to oust the acting U.S. attorney for Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands, Frederick A. Black.

The inspector general's report concluded that Abramoff actively advocated the ouster of Black, who had launched an investigation of the lobbyist and requested the FBI report. But the inspector general said the decision to appoint a new U.S. attorney, Leonardo Rapadas, had been made before Abramoff became involved.

The allegations by Black that he was pushed out of office to end the Abramoff probe were unfounded, the report said.

"We found no evidence to support a conclusion that the selection of Rapadas was the result of any retaliation against Black for raising allegations against Abramoff," the report by Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said. Instead, Fine concluded, once Abramoff learned of the impending decision, he attempted to take credit for it.

Black declined to comment Friday.

The FBI report, which focused on security concerns in the Pacific, warned of possible terrorist threats against U.S. military assets on Guam and the Northern Marianas. It was completed in spring 2002 and recently made public.

Abramoff, according to e-mails cited by the inspector general, worried the FBI report would prompt Congress to restrict immigration in the Northern Marianas — cutting off a supply of low-wage labor for garment manufacturers who had hired Abramoff to protect their interests.

After seeing the FBI report, the lobbyist suggested an attack on Black. "We have to make sure that Black guy is smeared into the ground," Abramoff wrote in an e-mail to his clients.

The inspector general's investigation, which included an interview with Abramoff and a review of his e-mails, followed a Los Angles Times report on the circumstances surrounding Black's replacement.

DOJ_NMG_0037910

According to Fine's report, Abramoff became actively involved in the efforts to oust Black at the behest of then-Guam Gov. Carl Gutierrez, a Democrat who was under investigation by Black's office. Abramoff told investigators that he met with Gutierrez in February 2002 in an effort to land a $1.3-million contract with the government of Guam.

Abramoff, the report said, told investigators that the two came up with a plan to smear Black by releasing copies of a letter Gutierrez had written in 1995 to President Clinton. The letter referred to Black as "a good Democrat" and recommended he be reappointed as U.S. attorney. Black was originally appointed as acting U.S. attorney by President George H.W. Bush in 1991.

In one e-mail to Abramoff, Gutierrez referred to Black as "a total commie…. We need to get this guy sniped out of there."

In another e-mail, Abramoff wrote: "We are opposed to Black. He has been screwing us for years…. So this is good payback. I don't care if they appoint Bozo the clown, we need to get rid of Fred Black."

Although the inspector general's report said Abramoff had nothing to do with Black's ouster, it did find that the lobbyist had a pipeline into the White House through which he learned of Rapadas' impending nomination and other matters involving Guam.

Leonard Rodriguez, a Bush aide, told the inspector general's office that then-White House political director Ken Mehlman "recommended or suggested that I reach out to make Jack aware" on Guam issues.

Once informed of Rapadas' selection, Abramoff instructed his colleagues in an e-mail to take credit for the decision even though his favored candidate had lost out.

Prosecutors Seek Assets Of Two Enron Chiefs (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

Federal prosecutors asked a judge yesterday to order former Enron Corp. executives Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay to turn over $182.8 million, arguing that their homes and other assets were acquired by fraud.

A Houston jury last month convicted Skilling of 19 criminal charges including conspiracy and securities fraud and found Lay guilty of a half-dozen other counts. The government said both men had misled investors about Enron's financial health at the same time they sold stock at inflated prices before the energy company collapsed in bankruptcy. Lay and Skilling face extensive prison terms when they are sentenced this fall.

For the government to recover the funds, prosecutors must prove that money and property held by Skilling and Lay stem from the conspiracy. Prosecutor Patrick T. Murphy argued in court papers that the government established those links by virtue of the criminal convictions and evidence presented at trial about the bonuses, trading records and stock sales of both men.

Skilling collected $139.2 million in bonuses and stock proceeds during the course of the fraud, court papers said. In return, prosecutors are seeking $49 million in securities held in a Charles Schwab account; a $4.6 million mansion in Houston; $808,643 in cash; and a Dallas condominium now valued at $579,475. Government lawyers asked that a $5 million bond that Skilling posted after his indictment two years ago be used to satisfy part of the judgment.

Skilling previously argued that, because jurors acquitted him on nine insider trading charges, he should be entitled to keep his remaining wealth -- a position that prosecutors called "legally baseless." Daniel M. Petrocelli, a defense lawyer for Skilling, yesterday said the government move would leave Skilling "without any means to meet family obligations or satisfy substantial debts for his legal defense." He called the stance "wrong and unfair."

The Washington Post reported earlier this month that Petrocelli's law firm, O'Melveny & Myers LLP, has spent some $25 million on the case, for which it has not yet been paid. Defense lawyers are likely to ask the judge to release some of the money to pay their bills.

Lay collected $43.5 million in bonuses and drawdowns on his Enron-sponsored line of credit, the government claimed. Prosecutors yesterday sought repayment of $1.5 million Lay used to pay off the mortgage on his luxury penthouse apartment in Houston. They also asked for access to Lay's interest in a limited partnership now valued at $6.3 million.

Lay has testified that he is $250,000 in debt. Michael W. Ramsey, a defense lawyer for Lay, did not return phone calls.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Holdout Ends, Letting A City Seize Property In Connecticut (NYT)

By Avi Salzman

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

NEW LONDON, Conn., June 30 — With eviction looming, the two remaining homeowners fighting the city's plans to replace their homes with offices, a hotel and new housing agreed to settle on Friday, ending a six-year battle that led to a historic Supreme Court ruling on governments' power of eminent domain.

DOJ_NMG_0037911

"We're able to move on with our lives and look forward to remaining in the neighborhood," said Michael Cristofaro, whose family was one of the holdouts.

The settlements followed months of negotiations among the homeowners, the city and the New London Development Corporation that were overseen by state mediators.

The holdout homeowners were among seven in the Fort Trumbull neighborhood who sued the city, challenging its right to seize their property through eminent domain. The case eventually reached the United States Supreme Court, which issued a controversial 5-to-4 ruling last year that New London could take their homes for private development.

The five other homeowners have already settled. The dollar amounts of the settlements reached on Friday were not disclosed. Susette Kelo, a lead plaintiff in the case whose pink Victorian cottage became an icon in the battle to limit eminent domain, agreed to move her house to a new lot.

Ms. Kelo has not decided where she will move the house, but the state has agreed to pay the bill, said Scott Bullock, a lawyer from the nonprofit Institute for Justice who represented her. Mr. Bullock called the resolution "bittersweet," because Ms. Kelo had wanted to stay on her property.

No one answered the door at Ms. Kelo's house on Friday, and she did not return calls seeking comment.

Mr. Cristofaro said a few small concessions by the city made the difference.

His five-bedroom clapboard house on Goshen Street will be torn down, but the family has the option to buy property in the new development at a set price. The city also agreed to move the rhododendrons, yews and other plants his father, Pasquale, planted 30 years ago and to install a plaque in the development to honor Mr. Cristofaro's mother, Margherita, who fought the condemnation of her home until she died in 2003. "It restored a lot of respect and dignity to the family," Mr. Cristofaro said.

Ronald Angelo, a state official who helped negotiate the deals, said a key element to the settlements was getting the property owners more money.

After the Supreme Court ruling, several of the Fort Trumbull homeowners vowed to stay put, but they began to settle after the city increased legal and financial pressures. On June 5, the City Council voted to begin eviction proceedings.

William Von Winkle, who owned three rental properties in Fort Trumbull, held out until June 5. In an interview at his home on Friday, he said he settled because the state was willing to give him more money.

"When you look at my property, put these on," he said, adjusting a pair of sunglasses with dollar-sign holograms over the eyes.

CIVIL LAW:

Eminent Domain Plaintiff Will Keep Her House (LAT)

By Elizabeth Mehren, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

However, under a settlement between New London, Conn., and the suit's namesake, the structure will be moved.

BOSTON — Susette Kelo, who lent her name to a lawsuit that ignited a firestorm around the practice of eminent domain, will not lose her Connecticut home to a wrecking ball, as she had feared when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the city of New London could build homes, offices and hotels in her neighborhood.

Under an agreement announced Friday, Kelo's quaint, peach-colored house will be moved to another location. Kelo, 49, can remain in the 19th-century cottage at its present waterfront location for as long as a year, until a new site is selected.

No financial details were released on the transaction that was weeks in the making.

"I am not happy about giving up my property, but I am very glad that my home, which means so much to me, will not be demolished and I will remain living in it," Kelo said Friday.

In the waterfront district of Fort Trumbull, Kelo and fellow homeowner Pasquale Cristofaro were the last plaintiffs in the landmark case of Kelo vs. City of New London to reach an accord with the city. The Cristofaro home will be razed, but the family will be able to buy a new home in the area at an undisclosed fixed price.

The case pitted seven property owners in a working-class area close to where the Thames River flows into Long Island Sound against state and local officials who wanted to revitalize the area with a commercial project. The goals were to generate more tax revenue and expand employment opportunities in the tired old city.

In a 5-4 decision last June, the Supreme Court gave governments the right to seize private property and transfer it to another private owner in the interest of economic development.

Specifically, the court held that the use of eminent domain for economic development was not in conflict with the public-use clauses of the state and federal constitutions.

DOJ_NMG_0037912

The expanded interpretation of the ancient practice known as eminent domain prompted legislators in nearly every state to draft measures to protect owners of private property. Eminent domain usually had been employed when governments wanted to build highways, bridges or public buildings — not office parks, restaurants, town houses, shops and hotels, as have been proposed for the site.

The court's action also produced a flood of new commercial proposals around the country, as developers sought to turn the decision to their benefit.

Last week, on the first anniversary of the Kelo ruling, President Bush issued an executive order barring federal agencies from seizing private property except for public projects such as hospitals or roads.

In New London, only Kelo and the Cristofaros refused to settle when the city put forth a May 31 eviction deadline. Finally Gov. M. Jodi Rell intervened.

"Now these families can have some closure, and the Fort Trumbull economic development project will go forward without delay," the Republican governor said Friday.

Attorney Scott Bullock of the nonprofit Institute for Justice, based in Washington, represented the plaintiffs. Bullock noted that the Kelo and Cristofaro properties were among a tiny handful of structures that remained in Fort Trumbull.

"It is a demolition zone now, not a residential area anymore," Bullock said Friday.

The small house that Kelo renovated by hand has become a symbol for the eminent domain debate, Bullock said, launching what he called "a grass-roots revolution" across the country.

"The fact that she can remain in it, and the fact that the home will remain standing, is a wonderful symbol of her struggle and the fight for homeowners' rights across the country," he said.

As part of the settlement, city officials also agreed to install a plaque in Fort Trumbull honoring family matriarch Margherita Cristofaro, who died at 73 while the case was pending.

"I am not happy. I am far from happy. What I wanted was to keep the house," said Michael Cristofaro, one of Pasquale's sons. "But we need to put a close to this, and the time was right."

Winning Over The Freeloaders (LAT)

By Edit

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

A YEAR AGO, THE ENTERTAINMENT industry hailed the Supreme Court's decision in the Grokster case as a milestone in its battle against online piracy. Maybe so — but if it was, the industry has little to show for it. If only the major labels and studios cared as much about serving customers as protecting copyrights.

The court's ruling said that companies such as Grokster, which enabled users to share files over the Internet, could be held liable for promoting copyright infringement. Many of these firms no longer exist, but the software they distributed still works. In addition, there are still plenty of noncommercial file-sharing programs, maintained and updated by a decentralized cadre of volunteers.

The Recording Industry Assn. of America argues that this picture would have been much worse without the lawsuits against file sharing. In the last few years, the percentage of U.S. Internet users who share files has remained about the same, while the percentage buying music at legitimate online stores has grown substantially.

Nevertheless, free downloaders represent a lost opportunity for the entertainment industry. The number of legitimate outlets for music, TV shows and movies online may be growing, but file-sharing networks continue to attract a much larger audience. By one estimate, almost 10 million people around the world are using file-sharing networks at any given moment. Evidently, the industry-backed services haven't come up with an offer as compelling as free files that can easily be played on any device.

The Grokster ruling wasn't simply a nudge for companies like Grokster to get out of the file-sharing business. It was an invitation for the entertainment industry to get in. By clarifying the legal obligations of file-sharing companies, the Grokster ruling created a road map for partnerships between tech and entertainment companies.

So far, however, talks between leading file-sharing firms and entertainment conglomerates have yielded few tangible results. Labels and studios have warmed a bit to popular but bootleg-heavy sites such as YouTube.com, where users post most of the videos, yet they remain extremely cautious about letting users redistribute their works.

The industry needs much more experimentation with approaches that give users the control and freedom to consume that make file-sharing networks so attractive. Instead of hoping that millions of Internet users on file-sharing networks will go somewhere else and pay for their downloads, it's past time to try to do business with them where they are.

Supreme Court Denies Texas, Arizona In Unconnected Death Penalty Cases (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

Texas and Arizona lost Supreme Court appeals yesterday in separate death penalty cases.

Justices refused without comment to consider reinstating the death sentence of Gregory Russeau in the murder of an elderly auto mechanic during a robbery in Texas.

They also refused to overturn an appeals court decision that gave Robert Moormann a chance to pursue an appeal for his conviction in the death of his adoptive mother in Arizona.

The cases were among more than 50 the court acted on yesterday, a day after justices were on the bench for the last time this term. Justices return to the bench in October.

A Texas court had said Russeau's Sixth Amendment right to confront witnesses against him had been violated during the penalty phase of his trial. He was convicted in the 2001 death of James Syvertson, 75.

Moormann was on a prison furlough in 1984 when he was accused of killing his adoptive mother, 74. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit had said a lower court should consider Moormann's claims of poor lawyering.

ANTITRUST:

G.M. Is Pressed To Form Alliance With Two Rivals (NYT)

By Micheline Maynard

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

DETROIT, June 30 — General Motors' largest shareholder is pressing the troubled American auto giant to speed up its turnaround effort by forming an alliance with two foreign car companies, Nissan and Renault, which would pay $3 billion for a 20 percent stake in G.M.

The proposal by the billionaire Kirk Kerkorian, suggested in letters to the three companies, is his latest effort to put pressure on G.M.'s chief executive, Rick Wagoner, to quicken the pace of change.

The company has taken drastic measures in recent months to cut costs, partly in response to prodding from Mr. Kerkorian, who so far has lost money on his 56 million G.M. shares, which represent a 9.9 percent stake.

An alliance with Renault of France and Nissan of Japan offers Mr. Kerkorian an opportunity to enlist the help of Carlos Ghosn, the hard-charging executive who oversees both companies.

Mr. Ghosn, nicknamed "the cost killer," earned his reputation from the swift turnaround he executed earlier this decade Nissan, where he slashed debt, introduced flashy new vehicles and expanded sales in Japan and the United States.

If Nissan and Renault were to team with G.M., the companies could draw from one another's expertise in manufacturing, engineering and product development, Terry Christensen, Mr. Kerkorian's lawyer, said Friday.

"It would be an amazingly important alliance," said Mr. Christensen, who has been involved in the discussions.

G.M., in a statement, said the proposal would be taken under advisement by its board, which held a hastily arranged meeting by conference call on Friday, according to people with knowledge of the board's deliberations.

Investors cheered the prospect of the alliance, sending G.M. shares up $2.35, to $29.79.

Disclosure of Mr. Kerkorian's move came as a shock in Detroit, where auto executives were preparing to take next week off for the industry's annual summer holiday shutdown.

An agreement by the three companies would further reshape the industry, much like the 1998 merger of Daimler-Benz and the Chrysler Corporation, and the arrangement that linked Renault with Nissan in 1999.

It would also add new heft to General Motors. Together the three companies would hold about one-quarter of the global market, compared with 14 percent for Toyota, which some analysts say could pass G.M. as soon as this year to become the top seller.

And it would provide G.M., which lost more than $10 billion last year, with more cash for its turnaround plan.

But there is no certainty that the arrangement will come to pass, especially since it is the brainchild of Mr. Kerkorian, who decided to push the idea after meeting over dinner with Mr. Ghosn (his name rhymes with "phone"). G.M.'s management has also not played an active part in the talks.

DOJ_NMG_0037914

Mr. Ghosn could represent possible competition for Mr. Wagoner, who has been under a cloud this year because of the company's dismal financial performance, loss of market share and the bankruptcy at its biggest parts supplier, Delphi.

G.M. directors, most of whom were chosen while Mr. Wagoner was either chief executive or president, issued a statement in support of him this past spring, when his future looked shaky, particularly in the wake of accounting errors that forced G.M. to increase its 2005 loss.

People involved in the discussions said the issue of Mr. Ghosn's role and Mr. Wagoner's future had not yet come up. Though Mr. Wagoner's position is considered solid, Mr. Ghosn's global reputation, and his ease in public, could threaten to overshadow him.

Renault and Nissan said in a statement that their partnership had never been restricted to two companies, and could be expanded further "under the right circumstances and with the appropriate partners."

But, the companies said, "it is necessary that the G.M. board and management fully support this project" before discussions begin. Support from the boards of Nissan and Renault would also be required, they added.

Officials at Mr. Kerkorian's company, Tracinda, said they would like to see a swift agreement to the deal, which could take another six months to win approvals from regulatory agencies.

People with knowledge of G.M.'s thinking, however, said Friday that the company was not likely to be in any rush to give Renault and Nissan an answer.

The company's caution is understandable. G.M. has been stung in the past by alliances, like a deal with Fiat of Italy, which G.M. had to pay Fiat $2 billion to escape, and ventures, now defunct, with Japanese companies like Suzuki and Fuji Heavy Industries, Subaru's parent.

Moreover, the strongest automotive players, like Toyota, Honda and BMW, are independent companies without the complications that such ventures can create.

People with direct knowledge of the matter say the proposal for a 20 percent stake was made by Mr. Ghosn to Mr. Kerkorian at a June 15 dinner in Nashville, where Nissan recently broke ground for a new headquarters building.

The meeting came after weeks of phone calls between Mr. Ghosn and Jerome B. York, an adviser to Mr. Kerkorian who joined the G.M. board in February.

Mr. York, long an admirer of Mr. Ghosn, had first approached him several weeks ago for a get-acquainted session, which was held in London.

In January, Mr. York laid out a plan for accelerating G.M.'s turnaround, including cutting its dividend in half, eliminating lesser-performing brands like Saab, Saturn and Hummer, and reducing salaries for G.M.'s board members, top managers and employees.

G.M. has defended its brands, but the company subsequently cut the dividend along with the pay of its five top executives and board members.

In announcing the plan, Mr. York suggested that G.M. embrace the speed and clarity displayed by Mr. Ghosn in his overhaul of Nissan, which was saddled with slow-selling vehicles and $20 billion in debt when he arrived in the fall of 1999.

Mr. Ghosn, for his part, has long wanted to push Renault and Nissan beyond a Eurasian alliance and into the global marketplace.

Although Mr. Ghosn has declined to offer opinions on how G.M. should address its problems, he has told associates that he could return the world's largest automaker to profitability, just as he did with Nissan.

Because the companies would be buying only a minority stake in G.M., they would not be saddled with all of G.M.'s problems, said John Casesa, managing partner of Casesa Strategic Advisers in New York.

Still, he said, "it'd be pretty messy on paper having these three companies in a loose alliance." Even if no deal is concluded, Mr. Casesa interpreted the proposal as a sign that Tracinda would keep the pressure on G.M. to accelerate its overhaul.

But Mr. Christensen says Mr. Kerkorian's goal is to do more to help G.M. than simply make money on his stock, for which he paid an average of $30.10 a share. At Friday's closing price, Mr. Kerkorian has lost $17.3 million on his 56 million shares.

"The value for the shareholders will be there," Mr. Christensen said. "But more importantly, the accomplishment and the strength it would give G.M., and the long-term health it would give G.M., would be a big part of this."

For his part, Mr. Ghosn relishes the opportunity to negotiate such arrangements. In 2003, he put together a Nissan deal in China himself, traveling three times from Tokyo to complete the details.

Mr. Ghosn has seemed destined for some time to emerge in Detroit. Over the years, he has been courted by Ford Motor, which is led by William Clay Ford Jr., the great-grandson of the company's founder.

Likewise, Mr. Kerkorian's advocacy at G.M. was also bound to emerge, given his past moves at Chrysler, where he was the biggest shareholder before it merged with Daimler-Benz.

DOJ_NMG_0037915

He began buying Chrysler shares in 1990, becoming a close ally of its chief executive then, Lee A. Iacocca. Five years later, with Mr. Iacocca retired, and Chrysler's stock price lagging, he and Mr. Iacocca started a takeover effort.

It did not prove successful. However, Chrysler agreed to put a Kerkorian representative on the board and to double a stock buyback program.

As for the potential partners, things are particularly bumpy at Nissan, which has posted declines in sales and market share in the United States this year at a time when Asian auto companies have captured a record 40 percent of the market.

More than half the company's staff at its headquarters in California has decided not to move to Nissan's new American headquarters outside Nashville. Meanwhile, Nissan is moving some production and engineering work back to Japan, because of the heavy workload faced by its plants in the United States.

Last year, Mr. Ghosn moved to Paris from Tokyo and is overseeing an overhaul at Renault, where he was an executive before taking charge at Nissan in the fall of 1999.

G.M., for its part, is in the midst of closing all or part of a dozen plants and cutting 30,000 jobs as part of its restructuring effort. On Monday, G.M. said 35,000 of its 113,000 hourly workers had agreed to accept buyouts and retirement incentives to leave the company, more than enough to account for its job cuts.

Auto Club Kerkorian Proposes GM Join Renault, Nissan In Alliance (WSJ)

By Monica Langley, Neal E. Boudette And Lee Hawkins Jr.

Plan From Biggest Shareholder Adds to Pressure on CEO; Volley Lifts Shares by 9% Aggressive Ghosn in the Wings

In a dramatic move that raised pressure on General Motors Corp. and embattled Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner, shareholder Kirk Kerkorian proposed that the auto maker give its restructuring a huge push forward by joining the partnership between Renault SA and Nissan Motor Co.

The proposal from GM's biggest shareholder, which the company's board said it would consider, was a stunning shot at Mr. Wagoner's effort at restructuring the nation's biggest auto maker. While GM has made progress in recent weeks, Mr. Kerkorian and his team have long seen Mr. Wagoner's approach as too incremental to bring about the revolutionary change they say GM needs.

It also represented a bold move by Carlos Ghosn, the auto executive who pulled off a turnaround at Nissan and is now chief executive of both it and Renault. In a letter delivered to GM's board Friday, Mr. Kerkorian's investment company, Tracinda Corp., indicated it already had discussed with Mr. Ghosn the idea of Nissan and Renault each taking a significant stake in GM and bringing it into their alliance.

A short time later, Renault and Nissan issued a joint statement saying they were open to the idea if it has the "full support" of GM's management and board.

The news sent GM shares up 8.6%, or $2.35, to $29.79 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange. The rise increased the value of Mr. Kerkorian's 9.9% stake in GM by $140 million, to $1.67 billion from $1.53 billion at the close of trading on Thursday. Friday's closing price was not far off the $31 a share Mr. Kerkorian paid when he bought his largest chunk of GM stock a year ago.

Left unanswered were a host of questions, including how three companies from three continents, with different cultures and ownership structures, could work together, and whether such a partnership could really cut costs. An alliance would mark a big shift of power in the global auto industry, combining GM, the world's largest auto maker, with Renault and Nissan, whose partnership makes them the world's fourth-largest auto group. GM makes about nine million cars and trucks a year, but is expected to soon be surpassed by Japan's Toyota Motor Corp., the world's No. 2 auto maker. Renault and Nissan together make about six million vehicles a year.

But aligning the three could fulfill Mr. Kerkorian's hopes of seeing rapid progress at GM, perhaps under Mr. Ghosn, who in recent years has become one of the best-known executives in the global auto industry.

Born in Brazil to Lebanese parents, the 52-year-old Mr. Ghosn was dispatched to Japan to fix ailing Nissan when Renault bought a 44% stake in the company in 1999. At the time Nissan was mired in losses and carrying $20 billion in debt.

DOJ_NMG_0037916

Though he was the first non-Japanese to run Nissan, Mr. Ghosn was able to slash jobs and costs, revamp the product line and pay down debt quickly. In the last few years, Nissan sales have boomed, and in 2005 it was one of the most profitable auto makers in the world.

A GM alliance with Renault and Nissan could pave the way for Mr. Ghosn to take over there as well. Mr. Ghosn is know as a results-oriented leader who probably wouldn't agree to an alliance unless he was convinced significant changes could be made at GM -- with or without Mr. Wagoner.

Through a spokesman, Mr. Wagoner declined to comment Friday.

Recent Victories

Though it is still early in GM's restructuring effort, Mr. Wagoner has scored a number of recent victories in his drive to keep his job and revive GM, which is hurting from falling sales, high health-care and labor costs and a surge in foreign competition. Last spring, he secured a vote of confidence from his board after he threatened to resign. At GM's annual meeting, shareholders rejected a proposal to separate the chairman and CEO posts, while all of his board members were re-elected by large majorities.

Additionally, after an accounting change was ruled permissible, GM was able to restate first-quarter earnings showing a profit of $445 million. This past week, Mr. Wagoner announced that an ambitious buyout program to cut labor costs had met its target, allowing the company to shed 35,000 union workers, or 30% of its hourly work force, by the end of the year -- two years ahead of schedule.

But the proposal from Mr. Kerkorian -- who is GM's largest single shareholder -- was a clear signal that he remains unhappy with Mr. Wagoner's progress. People familiar with Mr. Kerkorian's thinking said he and his representative on the GM board, Jerome B. York, believe GM needs to completely rethink all aspects of its business. They see Mr. Wagoner's plan as too slow-moving to enable the auto maker regain its standing in today's brutally competitive auto industry, these people said.

"We believe that participating in a global partnership-alliance with Renault and Nissan could enable General Motors to realize substantial synergies and cost savings and thereby greatly benefit the Company and enhance shareholder value," Tracinda said in its letter to GM. "Accordingly, we urge the Board of Directors to form a committee to immediately and fully explore this opportunity together with management."

Mr. Kerkorian and his team believe the proposed alliance has the potential to save GM, Renault and Nissan billions of dollars by sharing engineering, purchasing and production costs for engines and the basic components and vehicle platforms of automobiles, one person familiar with the matter said.

Together, the three companies have about 25% of the global market for cars and light trucks. They spend about $190 billion a year on steel, plastics and other materials, and just a 1% decrease would bring substantial savings, this person said. In a bid to tap into cheaper overseas labor, the proposal contemplates GM using operations currently overseen by Mr. Ghosn.

To be sure, the auto industry is littered with failed mergers and alliances. Renault itself tried and failed to succeed with a similar cooperating deal with American Motors Corp. in the 1980s, while GM last year gave up on a four-year-old partnership with Fiat SpA, a breakup that cost the company $2 billion. DaimlerChrysler AG is still trying to prove that its 1998 trans-Atlantic merger is producing meaningful synergies.

A former executive at Chrysler and IBM Corp., Mr. York first expressed public admiration for Mr. Ghosn in a speech in Detroit in January. In that speech, he pointedly criticized GM's restructuring efforts, saying the company should consider killing some of its eight brands, cut management pay and cut its dividend. He urged the company to use Mr. Ghosn's Nissan turnaround as a model.

York Expresses Frustration

Since he joined GM's board in February, Mr. York has told associates he is frustrated by what he sees as incremental steps taken in GM's turnaround effort. He has told fellow directors that he's very worried about GM's negative cash flow and alarming slide in U.S. market share. The company's own internal forecasts project that GM's share in the U.S. market could drop to 20%, about half what it was two decades ago.

Mr. York first met Mr. Ghosn in May in London, and the two hit it off over dinner, people familiar with the matter said. Two weeks ago, Mr. Kerkorian flew to Nashville to meet Mr. Ghosn, who was in Tennessee for the move of Nissan's North American headquarters there. The billionaire, his adviser Mr. York and Mr. Ghosn had dinner and discussed the Renault-Nissan alliance and its possible application to GM.

Mr. York met with Mr. Wagoner on June 22 to discuss Mr. Kerkorian's interest in the alliance and possible benefits for GM, according to people familiar with the matter. The CEO was surprised but calm, according to a person familiar with the situation.

Once Tracinda filed its plan Friday morning, GM called an emergency board meeting via telephone to discuss the proposal. Directors generally agreed that GM should study the proposal. Mr. Wagoner told his board that some alliances work, but some don't, according to people familiar with the matter. He also said he and GM's management and advisers would review the proposal and convene another board conference call next week after July 4, these people said.

DOJ_NMG_0037917

Some investors expressed doubt that Mr. Kerkorian truly seeks an alliance of GM, Renault and Nissan. "He bought his shares in the 30s, and today is the first time [in a while] that the shares have come anywhere close to that," said David Kudla, chief investment strategist of Mainstay Capital Management, a Michigan-based money-management firm that manages accounts for many GM employees and retirees. "I think Tracinda is looking at various ways that they can secure a return on the investment, and this is another opportunity. They are looking at whatever initiative would increase the share price."

A Tracinda spokesperson said the company typically invests for the long term, not the short term.

Dan Genter, president and CEO of RNC Genter, a Los Angeles-based investment firm that owns bonds issued by GM's financing arm, said the proposal puts Mr. Wagoner "in a real squeeze." If the CEO doesn't accelerate his restructuring efforts, Messrs. Kerkorian and York "are going to have him on the ropes," he said.

Meanwhile, some auto-manufacturing experts said GM, Renault and Nissan would face "a pretty arduous task" in setting up a basis for working together. "By no means would it be an easy process," said Mike Jackson, director, North American vehicle forecasts, of CSM Worldwide, in Northville, Mich., adding that it would be "a number of years" before they could begin using common parts and components.

"That said," he went on, "Renault and Nissan have been able to work pretty expediently to combine their global processes and platforms and they've made considerable progress."

Global Partners Possible For GM (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

Kerkorian Urges Alliance With Nissan, Renault

Billionaire investor Kirk Kerkorian yesterday pushed General Motors Corp. to explore a partnership with Nissan Motor Co. and Renault SA, both of which are led by turnaround expert Carlos Ghosn.

In an extraordinary series of events set into motion by Kerkorian, whose investment company owns 9.9 percent of GM's shares, the Detroit automaker's board and management are being pressed to join a global alliance with Nissan and Renault. Under a partnership already in place, Renault holds a 44 percent stake in Nissan, while Nissan owns 15 percent of Renault's shares.

In a letter to GM chairman and chief executive Rick Wagoner, Tracinda Corp., Kerkorian's investment firm, said Nissan and Renault were open to buying significant stakes in GM. In a separate letter, Tracinda notified Ghosn and Renault Chairman Louis Schweitzer that Tracinda has asked GM to form a committee to explore a potential alliance.

Nissan also called on GM's board of directors to study the deal. "At this point, it is necessary that the GM board and top management fully support this project in order to start the study of this opportunity after agreement of Renault and Nissan boards," Nissan said in a statement.

Nissan said Ghosn was approached by Kerkorian and Jerome B. York, a GM board member and Kerkorian adviser, to assess the merits of GM joining the partnership.

GM said it had not received an offer or proposal from Renault or Nissan. But GM said its board will consider Tracinda's request to form a committee to study the proposal.

GM shares rose $2.34, or 8.6 percent, to $29.79, a level they had not reached since October. Financial analysts said Nissan's interest was an affirmation that GM shares were undervalued.

Under the partnership between Renault and Nissan, the two automakers operate as stand-alone companies, but Ghosn is president and chief executive of both. Ghosn is credited with rescuing and rebuilding Nissan after it ran into trouble in the late 1990s. As it has returned to financial health, Nissan has been particularly aggressive in the United States, where its new products have added to pressure that Detroit automakers were already getting from other Asian automakers, particularly Honda Motor Co. and Toyota Motor Corp.

GM is restructuring after years of losing U.S. market share to rivals like Nissan. The loss of market share in its home turf has led to the loss of tens of thousands of high-paying U.S. auto jobs and the closing of assembly plants around the country. GM lost $10.6 billion last year, although results have improved this year.

Analysts said they doubted that either side is planning to rush into a major collaboration. Wagoner was severely criticized for focusing GM on a global alliance strategy of partial investments in auto companies around the world. Those stakes were sold when GM's financial situation collapsed last year. Wagoner has claimed successes in his turnaround plan at GM, but he has acknowledged that the company still has a lot of work to do.

Ghosn also has a full plate. Quality has slipped as Nissan steadily expands production and brings out new models.

DOJ_NMG_0037918

Tracinda owns 56 million shares of GM stock, which accounts for 9.9 percent of the company. Kerkorian is GM's largest individual shareholder. He began amassing a stake in the company last year. Since then, his adviser, York, was added to the GM board and has criticized the company for the sluggish pace of its turnaround.

David Healy, auto analyst at Burnham Securities Inc., said Kerkorian might be trying to scare off short-sellers, who are betting that GM's stock will drop, by making moves to shore up GM's share price. He said he doubted that the back and forth between GM and Kerkorian could lead to Ghosn's installation in the top job at GM.

"I think it would have absolutely no management affect," Healy said. "GM and Nissan are bitter enemies. Nissan has been eating GM alive for years. Nissan is one of three reasons that GM's market share and profitability has collapsed in the last three years, the others being Toyota and Honda."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Thieves' Indifference May Mean VA Laptop's Data Is Secure (WP)

By Rob Pegoraro

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

If your Social Security Number was on that wayward, now-recovered Department of Veterans Affairs laptop -- or any of the other computers recently lost with sensitive data onboard -- it's probably still safe. But not certainly so.

And you're just going to have to live with whatever uncertainty that realization stirs in you.

That's not the message that the government wanted to convey Thursday, when the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Baltimore field office issued a press release saying, "A preliminary review of the equipment by computer forensic teams determined that the database remains intact and has not been accessed since it was stolen."

But can you take that statement to the bank? No (well, unless the feds have some new forensic technology we don't know about.)

"The FBI can't really make the claim it's making," said Tim Leehealey, executive vice president of business and corporate development at Guidance Software, a Pasadena, Calif., developer of data-forensics software. "Nobody can make that claim for sure."

(A press representative reached yesterday afternoon at the FBI's Baltimore office could not locate officials to comment on this story.)

Just turning on the computer and opening or copying files will leave numerous traces behind. But there are too many other ways to extract data without detection. You can run specialized tools to clone the computer's entire hard drive to a different machine; you can use a CD of Linux to boot up the computer and copy files; you can physically remove the hard drive and plug it into another computer.

When the VA or other offices try to ensure that lost records haven't landed on identity thieves' hard drives, they run into the same problem that's undermined the entertainment industry's efforts to stop people from circulating music and movies on the Internet.

Namely, computer data, by its nature, wants to go places. You can duplicate it infinitely and perfectly, then distribute those copies at near-zero cost. That's neither bad nor good; it just is.

So in a worst-case scenario, every personal record on that VA laptop could now be online. And you'd never know until the symptoms of identity theft showed up in your bank account.

That said, Leehealey was careful to add that the odds of that scenario are exceedingly low -- for one thing, what kind of idiot would let a stolen laptop be found? "The people smart enough to do this are smart enough not to do it this way," he said.

This is likely true of most stolen corporate computers. They're only good for a quick profit through fraudulent resale -- in the same way most muggers won't bother creating a new ID from the Social Security card in a wallet when they can just spend the victim's cash and credit cards instead.

But that doesn't mean it's smart to carry around your Social Security card, or that a government or company should keep critical data on portable, easy-to-steal devices.

These offices need to keep that data out of circulation as much as possible to limit the damage from mistakes and accidents. Those things will inevitably happen, even to companies that deal with security for a living -- Guidance, for example, lost a few thousand of its customers' credit card numbers to an online break-in last year.

Veterans Still Want Credit Monitoring After Stolen Laptop Found (AP)

By Hope Yen
AP, June 30, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Veterans groups say they will keep pressing for improved data security - and free credit monitoring - after the government found the stolen Veterans Affairs laptop computer containing sensitive data on 26.5 million people.

The government announced Thursday that a person officials would not identify had turned in the laptop and external drive, which were stolen from a VA data analyst on May 3. The FBI said an initial review determined that the contents had not been accessed or copied.

"We are pleased and relieved," said John Rowan, president of Vietnam Veterans of America, which has filed a lawsuit against the government for privacy violations. "The VA's handling of this unfortunate theft exposes the very real need for major reform in how records with personal information are handled and secured."

Joe Davis, spokesman for the Veterans of Foreign Wars, said veterans were entitled to credit monitoring until the FBI can determine for certain the information wasn't compromised.

"The worst-case scenario may have been averted this time, but an even greater tragedy would be if this type incident was allowed to happen again because of complacency," Davis said.

Burglars stole the computer equipment containing names, Social Security numbers and birth dates for veterans and active-duty troops from the data analyst's suburban Maryland home. Law enforcement officials recovered it after an informant on Wednesday notified the U.S. Park Police that he had heard about a $50,000 reward and knew where it could be found.

The equipment was then turned in to officials in Montgomery County, Md., where the data analyst lives. No suspects were in custody.

The FBI, in a statement from its Baltimore field office, said a preliminary review of the equipment by its computer forensic teams "has determined that the data base remains intact and has not been accessed since it was stolen." More tests were planned.The announcement came one day after President Bush asked

Congress for $160.5 million to pay for credit monitoring and other fraud protection for affected veterans. He proposed to tap dollars set aside but not used yet for food stamps, student loans and trade assistance for farmers.

During a House hearing Thursday, VA Secretary Jim Nicholson urged veterans and active-duty troops to keep watch over their financial records until more tests were completed in the coming days. But he declined to say whether the VA would ultimately follow through on its plans to offer at least one year of free credit monitoring.

The department was actively working to hire a data analysis company to be on the watch for identity theft, Nicholson said, but it will await further tests from the FBI to decide on the monitoring, which on average costs $50 to $150 per person each year.

"I'm going to reserve judgment on that," he said.

Veterans groups and lawmakers from both parties have criticized the VA for the theft and noted years of warnings by auditors that information security was lax. The VA has also been criticized for waiting nearly three weeks - until May 22 - to publicize the theft.

Some veterans have filed class-action lawsuits in Covington, Ky., and Washington seeking $1,000 in damages for each person - or up to $26.5 billion total - for privacy violations. They are also seeking to force the VA to improve its security practices.

A hearing was scheduled Friday in U.S. District Court in Kentucky on the government's credit monitoring offer.

Nicholson has pledged to turn his agency into a "model for information security" but said it won't happen overnight.

"This has brought to the light of day some real deficiencies in the manner we handled personal data," Nicholson said Thursday during a House hearing investigating what has become one of the nation's worst data breaches.

"If there's a redeeming part of this, I think we can turn this around," he said.

VA Can Publicize Credit Monitoring Offer (WP)

By Dylan T. Lovan
The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

COVINGTON, Ky. -- The Veterans Affairs Department is free to publicize a no-cost credit monitoring offer to veterans whose personal information was stolen, a federal judge ruled Friday.

U.S. District Court Judge William Bertelsman denied a motion from attorneys who filed a class-action suit on behalf of 26.5 million veterans and active-duty troops after a VA employee's laptop containing the private data went missing.

Law enforcement officials recovered the laptop this week after it had been stolen from a data analyst's Maryland home on May 3. The FBI said Social Security numbers and other personal data had not been copied from the computer.

Attorneys in the class-action suit had argued that accepting the offer, which was advertised on the VA's Web site, could hamper the veterans' chances of winning more money in court.

DOJ_NMG_0037920

"I don't see anything objectionable in it," Bertelsman said during a hearing. "The court can't tell a government agency how it can communicate with its constituents. If they make a statement that's a false representation ... then the court might get into it."

"We're encourage by the fact that we're allowed to help our veterans," Scott Hogenson, a VA spokesman, said after the ruling.

VA Secretary Jim Nicholson, during an appearance in Louisville, Ky., before he learned of the judge's ruling, said the matter "may now be academic" since the stolen laptop had been recovered.

Nicholson said there was a "strong indication" that the personal information was not accessed or compromised after the theft.

The secretary promised a major overhaul of cyber and information security at the VA to prevent such an occurrence again.

"I want to make the VA into the gold standard for information security," he said in an interview.

Bertelsman also indicated that the recovery of the stolen laptop could affect the class-action suit.

"Some of this may have been cured," he said.

The lawsuit seeks free monitoring and other credit protection for an indefinite period as well as $1,000 in damages for each person, up to a total of $26.5 billion.

Bertelsman ordered the Veterans Affairs Department to state on its Web site that accepting the credit-monitoring offer does not waive a veteran's right to participate in any future litigation against the department, a stipulation attorneys for the veterans had sought in their motion.

Bertelsman also suggested the government mention on the site any pending litigation concerning the data theft case. Similar lawsuits are pending in the District of Columbia and New York.

Bertelsman also said that it is too early to rule on whether the suit can be certified as a class-action.

"Right now we don't have any facts. We don't know if anyone's been damaged," he said.

Marc Mezibov, one of the attorneys who brought the suit on behalf of Iraq war veteran Paul Hackett, said Bertelsman's ruling was "not terribly surprising." Hackett, who ran for Congress in Ohio in 2004, and Matthew W. Page, a Kentucky veteran, are the plaintiffs in the suit. Neither was at the hearing.

Mezibov said even if no personal data had been taken from the computer, veterans who have spent their own money to have their credit reviewed would have been affected by the theft.

"A lot of veterans have expended money with regard to credit services because they're concerned," said John Murdock, another attorney representing the veterans.

Nicholson has urged veterans to keep watch over their financial records until more tests are completed on the laptop.

Watching Out For Wandering Data (NYT)

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

After a tense six-week search, the government has recovered a stolen Veterans Affairs laptop computer containing vital information on more than 17 million people. The theft had officials holding their breath after an employee of the department took the information trove home from the office and found it missing after a burglary. A preliminary check found no sign that thieves had compromised the database, but more investigation will be needed to see whether names, birthdates and Social Security numbers might have been sold off to identity thieves.

The government's extraordinary attempt at damage control when it appeared the computer was gone for good — including a plan to offer a year's free credit monitoring to the veterans at a cost of more than $160 million — underlines a mushrooming problem. It is becoming obvious that government agencies, and businesses, need better policies and practices for handling sensitive data stored on computers.

To begin with, personal information on 17 million veterans is not the sort of data that should be moving around on a laptop. Data this valuable should also have been encrypted, to make it difficult for thieves to use it.

And a final, simple measure could be surprisingly effective: a policy requiring that laptops with confidential data must be chained to something that is difficult to walk off with.

Stricter policies like these will mean more work for employees who handle confidential data. But given the enormous price tag of damage control after just this single laptop was stolen — and the legitimate fears the theft has created for the veterans whose information was taken — rigorous protection of confidential data must take priority over the convenience of the data keepers.

Gun Activists Get Say At U.N. Summit (WT)

By Betsy Pisik, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, July 1, 2006

NEW YORK -- The gun industry and shooting enthusiasts fired back at the anti-gun lobby yesterday at an international conference on illicit weapons, saying any global restrictions will affect sport hunters.

"If you do something at this conference that impacts even a few hunters, sport shooters or legal firearms owners, you do it to all of us," said James Fulmer, a fan of antique muzzleloading rifles from Friendship, Ind., at the midpoint of the United Nations Small Arms Review Conference.

The two-week conference is meant to take stock of the global efforts to curb the trade on illegal arms and draft a plan of action for the future.

This year's conference, which coincides with the Fourth of July holiday, attracted the ire of tens of thousands of American gun owners, who were mobilized by the National Rifle Association to protest what they see as a global effort to disarm U.S. civilians.

The conference is not looking at legal civilian ownership, but is examining ways to limit the flood of weapons into unstable regions.

In a wide-ranging but ill-attended morning session, speakers representing gun manufacturers, weapons brokers, antique-firearms enthusiasts and big-game hunters stressed that misuse is the problem, and not the gun itself.

"A firearm is a tool, a very simple tool that dates back to the 12th century," said Thomas Mason, a frequent gun lobbyist who represented the Sporting Arms and Ammunition Manufacturers' Institute at the conference. "Like any tool, it can be used for great good or great harm," he said.

The alliance of two dozen manufacturers has embraced marking and tracing of weapons but is opposed to similar tracking for ammunition, as is commonly proposed on the sidelines of the conference. As many as 14 billion rounds of ammunition are produced each year, and manufacturers note that it would be technically and logistically impossible to mark each bullet.

Many of the morning speakers protested what they see as an unfair focus on legal or civilian arms, and rejected international efforts to mark ammunition or expand national jurisdiction over global trade.

Mark Barnes, a registered firearms broker, warned governments against enacting broad jurisdiction that would impede a dealer's ability to make international sales.

He urged countries to establish effective import and export laws before they attempt to draft international guidelines.

International arms brokers are considered by nations and gun foes to be the weak link in the chain, the place where legally manufactured or owned firearms are sold or traded to groups without proper verification of end users.

"Our membership is concerned with the enactment of overly broad international regulatory programs that unnecessarily and adversely impact the legal trade in small arms and light weapons instead of focusing on reducing the illicit trade," Mr. Barnes said on behalf of Firearms Importers Roundtable Trade Group.

Rick Parsons, representing the Washington-based Safari Club International, made one of the most ambitious speeches of the morning session, in which he linked international game hunting with the U.N. Millennium Development Goals.

"I believe that every person in this room will acknowledge that some of the world's poorest countries are also the most biodiversity rich," Mr. Parsons said. "The trade and use of biodiversity generates revenues that fund basic needs like farming equipment, education, medical clinics, roads, food-storage facilities and electricity."

Carefully administered programs allow foreign sport shooters the opportunity to hunt game, while fees and licenses generate money for local communities, he noted, citing Zimbabwe, Namibia, Zambia and Botswana as examples.

Mr. Parsons also called on authorities to allow foreign hunters to more easily travel internationally with their legally registered weapons.

"I respectfully request that legitimate firearm owners, hunters and competition shooters [are acknowledged as] equal and recognized stakeholders in efforts against illicit trafficking in small arms," he said.

Suspect U.S. Border Patrol Agents Resign And Vanish (LAT)

By Richard Marosi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

The two brothers, who allegedly helped Mexican criminals smuggle drugs and immigrants, were apparently tipped off.

SAN DIEGO — Two U.S. Border Patrol agents under investigation for allegedly smuggling drugs and immigrants abruptly resigned and went into hiding this week after apparently being tipped off to the probe, according to federal law enforcement sources.

DOJ_NMG_0037922

The agents — brothers Raul and Fidel Villarreal — were veteran officers who patrolled the border near San Diego and had been under suspicion since last year of smuggling illegal immigrants in their government vehicles, among other allegations, sources said.

They did not show up for work Monday and later notified supervisors that they had quit because of a family illness. But investigators suspect that someone tipped off the agents and that they may have left the country.

The disappearance threatens to derail the investigation, the latest in a string of unrelated corruption probes that have led to the indictments and convictions of several federal officers along the border.

"Somehow, somebody leaked it, and both resigned," said a source close to the investigation, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the case. "They left their badges and government credentials at their father's house…. Now they're in the … wind."

Damon Foreman, a spokesman for the Border Patrol in San Diego, confirmed that the agents had been under investigation for suspected smuggling activity and had submitted their resignations.

Raul Villarreal, 36, was the face of the Border Patrol in San Diego a few years ago when he was a spokesman and was interviewed regularly by Spanish-language media. Fidel, 32, worked in the mountains east of San Diego.

At the modest home the men shared with their parents in National City, a woman identifying herself as their mother said her sons still lived with her. She said she didn't know when they would return. They did not respond to a request for comment made through the woman.

The investigation, which sources said grew out of information gleaned from captured illegal migrants, is being handled by Immigration and Customs Enforcement, one of several agencies that make up the Border Corruption Task Force. Officials at customs enforcement declined to comment.

The agents were suspected of working with Mexico-based criminal networks to smuggle Mexicans and Brazilians into the country, sources said. The illegal immigrants would cross the border on their own and then be picked up by one of the brothers while on patrol. The migrants then would be delivered to another driver for the organization, sources said.

The status of the investigation is unclear. Such probes often require extensive and delicate evidence gathering, including wiretaps and statements from immigrants, and it is unknown whether authorities were ready to file charges.

"The case isn't dead; it just comes to a screeching halt because the two targets have disappeared. The whole case isn't gone, but you can't move forward anymore," said one source.

Authorities also are investigating the apparent leak of the information, sources said. Officials at multiple federal agencies, including the Border Patrol, had been briefed on the probe. In the past, informants have been known to tip off targets.

The investigation comes amid a recent spate of corruption cases involving Border Patrol agents and customs officers. Authorities say smuggling rings, their traditional trafficking routes blocked by increased enforcement, are enlisting corrupt agents to help them get their loads through.

Last month, two customs officers at the Otay Mesa and San Ysidro ports of entry were charged with waving through cars loaded with illegal immigrants in exchange for cash.

In a case similar to the investigation of the Villarreal brothers, two supervisory Border Patrol agents were charged earlier this year with smuggling migrants in their government vehicles for a Mexican trafficking organization based in Mexicali.

In a case last year, former Border Patrol Agent Oscar Antonio Ortiz admitted as part of a plea agreement that he had conspired to smuggle 100 illegal immigrants into the country. Ortiz himself was an illegal immigrant, having used a false birth certificate to pass himself off as a U.S. citizen, authorities said.

Tip Leads To Closing Of O.C. Laborer Pickup Spot (LAT)

By Jennifer Delson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

Caltrans, which learned from a Laguna resident that it owned the land used being by a nonprofit, cites liability issues.

Caltrans ordered a longtime Laguna Beach day labor center to close Friday, saying it was illegally operating on state property, land that the state didn't even know it owned.

The state Department of Transportation issued the order after a Laguna Beach resident who is a member of the Minuteman Project border patrol group checked property records and brought the information forward as part of a protest against the center.

"What they were doing on that property is illegal, and it wasn't done to benefit Americans," said Eileen Garcia, the Minuteman member. "If the Girl Scouts of America had set up pup tents there, they would have been run off a long time ago."

This is the second day labor center in Orange County to close recently. Costa Mesa closed its center last year as its City Council took several measures to limit services to its burgeoning immigrant population.

DOJ_NMG_0037923

The centers and other areas where day laborers gather informally have been targeted for protests by anti-illegal immigrant groups throughout Southern California.

The Laguna Day Worker Center on Laguna Canyon Road opened nearly seven years ago and received about $25,000 annually from the city.

State officials said the order to close the center had nothing to do with immigration politics.

"There's a concern about public safety and liability," said James Pinheiro, Caltrans deputy director of traffic operations and maintenance. "We knew the center was there. We didn't know it was on our property."

Garcia, who has protested near the worker center with hundreds of others on several occasions in the last year, said she decided earlier this week to check maps at the Irvine Caltrans office.

Officials who helped her find the materials were surprised when they found a deed showing that the Irvine Co. had given the one-third-acre parcel to the state in 1951.

Pinheiro said state law does not allow use of the property for anything other than "to facilitate the state highway."

No permits were issued to put a mobile office or fences on the site, he said. The office is owned by the Cross Cultural Council, a nonprofit organization.

Irma Ronses, coordinator of the day laborer center, said her group received permission from the city to set up the office but at some point learned the property belonged to the state.

Laguna Beach City Manager Kenneth C. Frank did not return repeated phone calls. Assistant City Manager John Pietig declined to comment.

The Caltrans decision angered a majority of the City Council. Mayor Steve Dicterow said the state agency, as well as the Minuteman Project, took action "that will hurt the residents of Laguna Beach."

Before the workers center opened off the state highway, those looking for temporary jobs went into neighborhoods to search for them. "Now we have to deal with the fact that we don't have the resources to deal with a potentially dangerous situation that will exist whether we like it or not," Dicterow said.

The City Council will discuss the issue next week and determine if it can buy the property, said Pam Gorniak, Caltrans public information officer.

Dicterow said city officials hope to persuade Caltrans to allow the center to continue operating at its current location. If that doesn't work, the city will consider another site, he said.

Resident Dolores Kustin said day laborers who go into neighborhoods, "should be arrested. If these are people who cross the border illegally, they shouldn't be here at all."

Wayne Ybarra, a Laguna Beach resident, was disappointed with the Caltrans decision: "Things seemed to be working in the sense that there didn't seem to be any neighborhood complaints."

In the meantime, Minuteman Project supporters are enjoying their victory in the same city where another nonprofit organization denied them the chance to march in a recent parade because the group has a political message.

"The Minuteman Project stands to bring public awareness to blatant law breaking that is going on in our society, to our lawmakers and bureaucrats who should have been on this years ago," said Minuteman co-founder Jim Gilchrist. "It takes an average Jane Citizen, a Minuteman, to bring attention to this."

Security Guards Eye Organizing (WP)

Black Workers Worry About Being Displaced

LOS ANGELES -- Eric Lee delivered a rousing speech to union organizers gathered from around the country at a black church in South Central Los Angeles. They whooped and cheered and then hit the streets, launching a campaign by the nation's largest labor union to organize Los Angeles's security guards, most of whom are African American.

Despite the upbeat words, Lee, chief operating officer for the Southern Christian Leadership Conference of Greater Los Angeles, has real concerns about the union effort. Not that it would fail, but that it would succeed. Lee and other black leaders are worried that a strong union could backfire, pushing black workers out of an employment sector they dominate.

It would not be the first time. The ranks of this city's hotel workers and janitors were once mostly African American, but their standing was undercut by waves of immigration and lower-paid workers.

As more Latinos were hired in nonunion hotel and janitorial jobs, the union all but disappeared, leaving today's labor officials with bitter memories of the 1980s. In the 1990s, the Service Employees International Union (SEIU) reorganized the city's janitors, but by then, the workforce was mostly Latino.

Many African Americans in Los Angeles have watched resentfully as Latinos replaced them not only in low-wage jobs, but also in many traditionally black neighborhoods. Simmering tensions between the two groups occasionally boil over in school shootings, jail violence and hate crimes.

Among security guards today, Lee said, "the underlying feeling is, we need [a union], we want it, and when is it going to happen." Still, he said, "Some say, 'Why should we do this?' because of what happened to the hotel workers and janitors."

This week, the SEIU launched a campaign to collect pro-union signatures from 3,500 of 6,000 private security officers who guard Los Angeles buildings. The union estimates that nearly 70 percent of the officers are black. A related effort to organize security officers in nine other cities, including Washington, D.C., is underway.

The average pay for security guards in Los Angeles is $8.50 per hour with no benefits or paid leave, according to the SEIU. Once benefits are factored in, that's $6 an hour less than the average unionized janitor. Turnover is high. Many guards receive little training and often work more than one job to make ends meet.

Barbara Harris, president of the Building Owners and Managers Association of Greater Los Angeles, said the members of her organization "have not made a decision on their position" on the SEIU organizing drive. Half a dozen security contractors and building owners contacted declined to comment or did not return phone calls.

But union officials are encouraged by the support of the largest commercial building owner in downtown Los Angeles. At a news conference on the steps of City Hall in April, Robert F. Maguire III, flanked by Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and union officials, invited the SEIU into his buildings. Maguire, chairman and CEO of Maguire Properties Inc., said it would professionalize security and enhance the offices he owns.

Union organizers said security officers they have approached so far are receptive to their message.

"I'm all in agreement," Gregory Sawyer told the SEIU's Ron Reese and Sharrion Marshall after they asked him to sign a union card at the West Los Angeles office building where he works.

Sawyer said he suspects race is a factor in the difference between security guards' wages and those of other building employees. "This industry being primarily black, it's not being addressed properly," he said. "I've seen every other service group is unionized -- car parkers, janitors. Why is it that every other industry is unionized and not security?"

Ruth Milkman, director of the Institute of Industrial Relations at UCLA, said the security guard campaign looks like a conscious effort by SEIU to alleviate racial tensions, bringing Latinos together with African Americans under one umbrella.

But Andrew L. Stern, president of SEIU, said racial politics played no role in the timing of the security guard campaign. Janitors were organized first because national labor laws make it easier for them to form unions, he said. The focus is on Los Angeles now because the recent agreement with Maguire, good relations with security-guard contractors and the support of local politicians make Los Angeles a good prospect for a new union chapter, he said.

"We're organizing the security officers for a very simple reason," he said. "They work for the same owners and contractors as the janitors. They do a job that has huge import for people's safety and security. And they make less than the people who clean the buildings."

Stern said the union is well aware of black workers' fears that organizing a union could be an invitation to employers to hire immigrant workers they perceive to be more docile and willing to work for less.

"Los Angeles is a racially charged city, because it's a city in transition politically and economically. As jobs have been devalued, it's been at the expense of the African American community. They have every right to expect building owners to not use those same tactics they did in the '80s to break the [janitors] union," he said. "All of us are going to be watching to make sure that does not happen."

The Rev. Lewis E. Logan III, senior pastor of Bethel AME church in Los Angeles, where the organizers held their rally, said he will also be watching. "Our group is planning to come together once a quarter after there is a union to make sure the same percentage of African American security officers who were part of the union at the beginning are still there later," Logan said. "We're not selling out our community."

Taxpayers Foot The Bill For Undocumented Immigrants' Medical Care (KRT)

By Tony Pugh

Knight Ridder, July 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037925

WASHINGTON - As America counts the costs and consequences of illegal immigration, U.S. taxpayers are quietly footing a fast-growing multibillion-dollar tab for medical emergencies suffered by undocumented immigrants.

Whether they've entered the country illegally or overstayed their visas, illegal immigrants are ineligible for full coverage under Medicaid, the state/federal health plan for low-income Americans. Enforcement of the law tightens on July 1, when Medicaid recipients will begin having to show proof of citizenship and identity.

However, a little-known federal law requires state Medicaid programs to pay for emergency medical care for all undocumented immigrants who meet the program's financial and personal resource requirements.

The provision is intended to ensure that no one in the United States is denied lifesaving medical services. But those services are becoming more expensive as medical costs outpace inflation and uninsured illegal immigrants crowd the nation's emergency rooms.

Many are women giving birth. Others are people with chronic or mental illnesses, trauma victims or sick children.

The federal government generally pays about half the costs for such care under Medicaid, and states pick up the other half. But federal officials can't determine how much actually goes for the services, and many states don't closely track what they spend, either.

At the request of McClatchy Newspapers, some states took a closer look at the expenditures, which are a small but growing share of Medicaid's escalating costs. Even states with modest illegal immigrant populations have seen their costs soar. Minnesota's spending jumped 40 percent in two years, from $12.5 million in 2003 to $17.4 million in 2005.

In California, home to possibly 40 percent of the nation's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants, taxpayers have spent an average of $957 million a year since 2001 to pay for emergency care for illegals, the state reported.

Other states with large illegal immigrant populations, such as Texas and Arizona, don't know how much they spend because their computer data is inadequate. But in Houston, the Harris County Hospital District reported spending $97.3 million on uncompensated care for illegal immigrants, or about 14 percent of its annual operating costs.

In Georgia, the state reported that the cost of emergency care for undocumented immigrants nearly doubled in three years, to $112 million in 2005 from $58 million in 2002. In North Carolina, now home to an estimated 270,000 illegal immigrants, costs more than doubled, to $52.8 million in 2005 from $25.8 million in 2000. In Kentucky, the cost jumped to $9 million in 2005 from $2.2 million in 2003.

"Illegal immigration is becoming a very big-ticket health item for a lot of states. It's going to be a huge fiscal cost," said Steve Camarota, the research director of the Center for Immigration Studies, a non-partisan Washington public policy group.

Hospitals must examine all people who come to their emergency rooms and treat any with acute medical problems, regardless of the patient's immigration status or ability to pay.

When federal Medicaid officials deny reimbursement for illegal immigrant care that isn't considered an emergency, hospitals are stuck with the bill and typically pass the charges on to other patients in the form of higher costs.

Medicaid defines an "emergency medical condition" as one with severe acute symptoms that, without immediate attention, could jeopardize a patient's health, cause impairment to bodily functions or cause a body part or organ to malfunction. Medicaid's emergency-only coverage forces taxpayers to purchase the most expensive form of health care with no way to hold down costs.

"If you have an (illegal immigrant) child with asthma, we can give that child treatment and inhalers, or we can see that child land in the emergency room every couple of months," said Cindy Mann, a research professor at Georgetown University's Health Policy Institute. "It's better both for the child and the family, and certainly for the costs, to say `Let's treat his asthma rather than wait until it becomes life-threatening and he ends up in the emergency room.'"

In 2003, Congress agreed to pay doctors and hospitals an additional $1 billion between 2005 and 2008 to help pay for uncompensated emergency care that Medicaid won't cover.

Some health care experts argue that the federal government should consider providing a modest coverage plan for low-income illegal immigrants in addition to the emergency coverage under Medicaid. They argue that if comprehensive health care coverage were available to them, undocumented aliens could get preventive care through Medicaid or community health centers, and U.S. taxpayers could avoid paying for more expensive emergency room care.

Even those who support better coverage for illegal immigrants, however, realize that it's a tough sell in an era of shrinking federal funds and rising medical costs, said Sonal Ambegaokar, a health policy attorney at the National Immigration Law Center in Los Angeles.

Immigrants' rights groups and health care advocates are pushing for incremental changes, such as providing public health coverage for all children - including undocumented aliens - as Illinois plans to do. A legislative proposal in California would do the same.

Silver Spring Hospital Struggles To Serve (WP)

Immigrants Swell Uninsured Ranks At Holy Cross

Some weeks it seems as if the whole world, with its many troubles, has walked through the doors of Holy Cross Hospital.

Daily, the second-floor women's clinic fills to overflowing with patients from countries in Central America, Africa and Asia. Some have never had care during previous pregnancies -- and never had a child born alive. "We ask, 'Do you know why?' " says director Nancy Nagel. "And they say, 'I just lost the baby.' "

Elsewhere, from the emergency room to the primary medicine clinic, doctors and nurses confront conditions and diseases they did not see a decade ago -- malaria, infectious diarrhea, parasites such as tapeworm. Even many common ailments can be more challenging, because they often require translation from a panoply of foreign tongues and cultures.

Serving the underserved is integral to Holy Cross's mission, and the Silver Spring hospital has long shouldered much of the care for poor, uninsured residents of Montgomery County. But as that population has expanded rapidly with the continued arrival of immigrants, legal and illegal, it has become a much more difficult and expensive proposition.

And now a generous mission is reaching its limit. After yet another sharp increase in the prenatal program it runs for the county, Holy Cross has drawn a line. Starting today, for the first time since it opened in 1963, Maryland's biggest community hospital will restrict how many uninsured obstetrics patients it will accept.

"It has taxed the system enormously," said physician Imad Mufarrij, a native of Lebanon who can converse with patients in five languages.

Barely half an hour from the congressional chambers where the nation's immigration policies have been rancorously debated, there is little dissent over what is right to do. It is why Holy Cross opened its primary health clinic two years ago, agreeing to cover what in 2005 was a $460,000 operating deficit. And why it spends almost half a million dollars annually on interpretation services and ethnic-specific programs for patients and Spanish classes for employees.

From 2000 to 2005, the cost of the institution's yearly charity care more than doubled to $9 million; the care is significantly but not entirely for immigrants. A third of the total now goes to the low-income women, a veritable United Nations, who are seen through Holy Cross's Maternity Partnership with the county.

President and chief executive Kevin Sexton has no qualms: "As much as I am interested in public policy and public issues, I basically suspend that at the door of a health care facility and believe that everyone needs care."

The pressures on Holy Cross mirror those at other facilities in the region, though they fall far short of the intense demands that providers face in towns and cities along the U.S.-Mexican border. Washington Hospital Center regularly translates documents and physician-patient communication into nearly a dozen languages, including Turkish and Tagolog. Inova Health Systems estimates that it spends at least $10 million on such services, outreach programs and charity care for uninsured immigrants in Northern Virginia. In Fairfax County, more than one in seven births are to immigrants, according to one estimate.

Critics cite the burden they say newly arrived immigrants place on health care as one rationale for restricting their numbers. Last year, the federal government set aside $1 billion to cover emergency room care for illegal immigrants through 2009. The full medical bill to U.S. hospitals, clinics and taxpayers probably exceeds $6 billion annually, calculates Steven Camarota of the Center for Immigration Studies, a research group that seeks "fewer immigrants but a warmer welcome for those admitted."

Still, Camarota thinks proposals to deny access to treatment misdirect the debate. "Either you select immigrants who are self-sufficient and don't need help from the government, or you shut up about the cost," he said. "There's no middle ground."

The head of Holy Cross's primary care clinic agrees with the latter point. At her clinic, the uninsured patients are not asked how long they have been in the United States or whether they came lawfully.

"The fact is," director Elise Riley said, "people are here. They're going to end up on our doorstep one way or another."

A morning spent in the busy maternity clinic is an experience in multiculturalism and multilingualism -- and their possible complications. Many mornings, 60 or more women are seen. The phone at the front desk rings nonstop for inquiries and appointments.

"Sir, I cannot understand you," Melina Martinez tells an Asian caller with limited English. "Did your wife have a C-section? If her C-section looks okay, she doesn't have to come back for two weeks."

There is a pause while Martinez tries to grasp the man's response. "Does she have staples in? Staples, like you use for paper." At this point, the health unit coordinator is earnestly making stapling motions in the air. "You have to check, sir. Check her incision. Check her belly."

At the front desk, a patient from Cameroon schedules her next gynecology visit. A Salvadoran woman waits. She needs to monitor her blood-sugar levels for gestational diabetes but seems confused on the instructions she has been given.

"Escribo?" a nurse asks, offering to write them down in Spanish.

DOJ_NMG_0037927

Some patients have had so little education in their homelands that the staff may teach them reading along with prenatal nutrition, occasionally receiving handmade tortillas or tamales as thank-you gifts. In fact, illiteracy was a factor taken into consideration when Holy Cross redesigned the clinic as part of a facility-wide expansion and renovation. Women now have their blood drawn as they come in, rather than being sent to a lab elsewhere in the hospital. Before, bilingual signs directed them down corridors, but many Central American immigrants had gotten lost because they could read neither English nor Spanish.

The clinic's success with its patients is measurable. Despite their socioeconomics, Holy Cross's percentage of low-birth-weight infants is half the state average, contributing to healthier starts in life.

Early in the venture with the county, Holy Cross officials committed to caring annually for 1,200 uninsured obstetrical patients sent by the county health department. Within two years, that cap was reached and exceeded. By fiscal 2005, admissions were 1,802.

Then last fall, Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) barred several thousand legal immigrants from receiving state Medicaid, and the clinic's numbers surged again -- to 2,131 women by this spring. Projections only indicated further increases.

Too much, hospital officials decided. They set a future limit of 1,500. The partnership had never been intended to include only one hospital, they reminded the county, yet theirs was the sole institution that had stepped up. As a consequence, Holy Cross's share of deliveries to low-income women had soared, to 65 percent of the county Medicaid total, from less than half five years earlier.

"Holy Cross has been bearing the brunt of that," agreed Montgomery Health Officer Ulder Tillman. "They've really become overwhelmed."

The stress is felt on the hospital floors where handsome art decorates the hallways and newborns spend their first day or so. Despite the recently completed expansion, the most significant in the facility's history, the 21 new labor and delivery rooms and 68 private maternity suites are always occupied -- and intermittently overbooked, given the nearly 8,900 births a year, 24 a day.

No distinction is made when mothers are placed in those quiet, spacious suites. A young illegal immigrant, barely able to write her name, may be next door to a high-powered business executive. Neither would necessarily ever know.

"It is harder in every way, including financially, to choose this course, but it's the right way," stressed Sexton, the chief executive.

Even with the looming deadline, only late this spring did two other hospitals with major obstetrics services agree to join the partnership. Washington Adventist and Shady Grove Adventist will start accepting up to 700 uninsured women between them for care this summer.

How quickly they and Montgomery's other hospitals will act on a different pledge is uncertain. As a group, they agreed more than a year ago to open three additional primary care clinics to assist the Holy Cross primary clinic, which expects to double patient visits to 10,000 by 2010. "In terms of following through," Tillman conceded, "it is painfully slow." Little has moved forward to date.

"We need more people in the trenches," obstetrician Mufarrij said simply during a rare break in delivering babies one afternoon. He was a prime proponent of the maternity collaboration with the county and remains so despite the fiscal and physical demands it has meant for facility and staff alike. The previous night, his colleagues had done seven Caesarean sections in the midst of other arrivals. Mufarrij's own record is 14 deliveries in a 24-hour shift.

But as a doctor, he sees no other way. "Once these patients are here, you have only two options," he said. "Neglect them or give them quality care."

D.C. To Delay Enforcing Medicaid Rule (WP)

By Susan Levine

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

Decision Puts Off Until at Least July 17 Need to Prove Citizenship

The District agreed yesterday to delay implementing a new federal Medicaid rule requiring documented proof of citizenship, said attorneys representing residents who could lose their coverage.

One day after a Washington firm filed suit in federal court to block the city from moving forward with enforcement, both sides yesterday afternoon agreed to wait until at least July 17.

The District, which has more than 140,000 Medicaid recipients, will not act "any sooner than 10 business days from July 1," according to the legal stipulation signed by attorneys for the plaintiffs and the D.C. attorney general's office.

The federal rule taking effect today makes documented citizenship a requirement for eligibility in the state-federal program for the poor and the disabled. Supporters in Congress pushed it as a measure to ensure that illegal immigrants were not getting coverage, but critics fear it will harm millions of poor, elderly and disabled Americans who are entitled to medical or nursing home benefits.

The delay "allows the District to thoughtfully consider what [its] next action will be with respect to the requirement," Clifton S. Elgarten of Crowell & Moring said.

Traci Hughes, a spokeswoman for D.C. Attorney General Robert J. Spagnoletti, said the hiatus would give local officials more opportunity to discuss the issues raised by the litigation. "We're looking forward to resolving it on behalf of those who need to use these types of services," she noted.

She said she did not know what conversations the city had held with federal officials, who have warned it and states that noncompliance would mean losing Medicaid matching funds. The District receives $900 million annually for its program.

"The city definitely is reviewing the implications of this hiatus," Hughes said.

Under the new provision, a passport, birth certificate or other specified paperwork must be supplied when a person applies for Medicaid or during annual reenrollment in the program. In the past, Medicaid recipients were able to declare their citizenship, under penalty of perjury, without having to show evidence of it.

Politics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

Beating Up On Immigration

Directed by House Speaker Dennis Hastert, Republicans this coming week will undertake a remarkable exercise: the public thrashing of President Bush's principles on a major initiative.

House "field hearings" on immigration, scheduled for San Diego and Laredo, Texas, weren't designed with fact-finding in mind. Their intent is rather to batter the Senate-passed immigration bill, which embodies Mr. Bush's goal of combining border security with a guest-worker program for the 12 million illegal immigrants already here.

But will Mr. Hastert's maneuver bury chances for enacting legislation -- or provide the political cover that ultimately permits a House-Senate deal before the election? One thing already is clear: The speaker's first consideration will be protecting his members, not the White House.

Legislative leaders face a daunting equation when a president of their party occupies the Oval Office: reduced power -- since 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue sets the agenda -- plus increased expectations, since the governing party is supposed to deliver. Often that equals limited tenures, as one-time Senate Leader Bob Dole and House Speaker Tom Foley can explain after seeing their majorities crumble in the Reagan and Clinton years.

A conservative-dominated House has delivered much of what Mr. Bush has asked for throughout his presidency. That includes priorities that lawmakers shared, such as tax cuts, and those that they felt queasy about, such as Medicare prescription-drug benefits. But lately Mr. Hastert's charges have concluded that the White House asks too much, and sometimes cares as little about their views as about those of the Democratic minority.

In private, some display striking anger. That largely represents frustration with an Iraq war that has been vastly more difficult and deadly than the administration predicted. Republicans won the House in three consecutive elections before Mr. Bush came to Washington, and now fear the war could cost them their majority.

But the unhappiness also reflects the conviction that the speaker has been personally slighted by an arrogant administration -- in the firing of his friend Porter Goss from the Central Intelligence Agency, the quick veto threat after members bridled at the Dubai ports deal, and the decision to raid a lawmaker's office in a corruption probe without accommodating separation-of-powers concerns.

There are limits on the House's ability to hit back, and not only because Mr. Bush remains a potent fund-raiser. The Republicans' fate is partly tied to the president's popularity; they need to help raise his weak poll ratings.

That makes play-calling on immigration unusually tricky. The coming week's hearings, which today look like attempts to stoke the conservative base and sink the president's priority, might look different by October. White House strategists insist Mr. Hastert isn't killing immigration overhaul and may yet cut a deal.

What is clear is whom House Republicans will listen to in the huddle. "Our members would always choose the speaker over the president," explains one Republican lawmaker. "Paradoxically, that is what gives the speaker the ability to help the president. ... Too bad they don't recognize that at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue."

Let's Get A Border Deal Done (WP)

By Tamar Jacoby

DOJ_NMG_0037929

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

The immigration bills passed by the House and Senate in recent months could hardly be more different. The House package is harsh, punitive and focused exclusively on tougher enforcement. The Senate bill balances toughness with pragmatism by including provisions to admit the workers we need to keep our economy growing and deal with the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already in the country.

The prospect of reconciling the two bills has always looked difficult -- the legislative equivalent of marrying a giraffe and a hippopotamus. As part of their maneuvering for position, House Republicans declared that they wouldn't even negotiate until they had held a series of special hearings on immigration. And despite signs of softening in recent days, even hints of possible agreement on a phased solution, the House is still going ahead with its hearings. Yet this, I believe, may not be such a bad thing.

Why would I say that? After all, the details on the hearings leave little doubt about the House's intentions: to look tough and -- let's put it charitably -- skeptical about immigration, both legal and illegal. Many of the sessions are scheduled for border states, where frustration about illegal immigration runs highest. And they will address such subjects as retroactive Social Security benefits for illegal immigrants, whether state and local law enforcement should be empowered to arrest illegal immigrants without other cause, whether existing border enforcement is tough enough, and English as the official language -- all subjects guaranteed to rub raw the public's irritation.

Still, as every American TV viewer knows, no one, no matter how savvy, ultimately succeeds in controlling the message in our great, garrulous media. House immigration naysayers may believe that they can use the hearings to stir voters' bile. But television, national and local, is not just going to air the sessions. On the contrary, each night's news will bring a debate about immigration, and the more one-sided the hearings, the more stubbornly the media will air the other side.

By the end of the summer, the public will have had a long, thorough course on immigration. And as someone who spends a lot of time speaking to audiences on the subject, I'm convinced that this will only deepen viewers' pragmatism. They'll start to look more closely at who these foreigners are -- and see that most are hard-working, churchgoing people with families. Voters will also start to think harder about enforcement -- about what is practical and what isn't. And by the end of the summer, they will be, if anything, hungrier for a solution -- less patient with grandstanding efforts to block a bill.

The debate won't, of course, convince the angriest voters -- the ones who want to seal the border and deport or drive out illegal immigrants. That 20 to 25 percent of the public -- and poll after poll shows that's how strong they are, no more, no less -- is probably not open to persuasion. But what the discussion could do is energize some of the other 75 percent: voters who, most surveys show, are more pragmatic -- including being willing to legalize the 12 million -- though generally less intense in their beliefs and less likely to voice or vote on them.

And new energy among moderates could in turn shift the balance among House Republicans, strengthening practical, problem-solving members as against those who think their ticket to reelection is signaling that they dislike immigrants. Of course this strategy will work only if there are indeed some pragmatists among House Republicans. But I believe they are there, including in leadership: members who see the summer's hearings less as a means to stop the Senate bill than as a way to mollify and manage the immigration naysayers in their caucus.

In the end, it will depend on what the electorate seems to want most. Do Americans want Congress to take action on this year's No. 1 domestic issue, or would they rather see candidates standing pat on a party line? A recent Manhattan Institute poll of likely Republican voters left little doubt: 72 percent thought it was very or extremely important for Congress to come to grips with immigration this year, and though 39 percent believed the Senate package was amnesty, 75 percent still favored it. They want a solution that badly.

Neither party yet seems to recognize this deepening public desire for the government to try governing. But that's exactly the point about a summer of debate about immigration. Come September, the public's hunger for a solution may be impossible to ignore.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

In Memphis, Two Heads Of Government Visit The Home Of Rock 'N' Roll Royalty (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg And Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

MEMPHIS, June 30 — Plenty of awestruck Elvis impersonators have passed through the wrought-iron gates of Graceland. Until Friday, none had the president of the United States in tow.

DOJ_NMG_0037930

"It's like a dream," Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi of Japan said to President Bush in the Jungle Room of the Presley home here. Amid the faux leopard print chairs and green shag carpet covering both floor and ceiling, the prime minister then serenaded the president.

"Loooovve mee tenderrrrr," Mr. Koizumi crooned, as Priscilla Presley, Elvis's former wife, and Lisa Marie, his daughter, looked on.

When Priscilla Presley pointed out the oversize gold-rimmed sunglasses once worn by the King of Rock 'n' Roll, the prime minister eagerly donned them, thrusting his hips and arms forward in imitation of a classic Elvis move.

"I knew he loved Elvis," Mr. Bush said afterward. "I didn't realize how much he loved Elvis."

If the visit, the first time a sitting president has toured Graceland, resembled an Elvis lovefest, it was a Bush-Koizumi lovefest as well, orchestrated by the White House to spotlight the close relationship between Japan and the United States. Mr. Koizumi, who will step down in September, is among Mr. Bush's closest friends on the world stage; the trip was both a farewell gift and a thank you for Japan's support on the war on terror.

In the annals of international diplomacy, it was not exactly Yalta. But it did bring a little bit of shake, rattle and roll to American foreign relations — perhaps too much for Mr. Bush, who resisted being caught in any poses even remotely Elvislike.

Not so Mr. Koizumi.

The prime minister's obsession with Elvis is well known; he shares a birthday, Jan. 8, and a hairstyle with Elvis, and worked in the 1980's to erect a bronze statue of the singer in Tokyo. At one point Friday, Mr. Koizumi happily remarked to Lisa Marie Presley that she looked like her father. He later threw his arm around her, belting out some Elvis lyrics, "Hold me close, hold me tight."

Mr. Bush, though, eventually cut off the performance, clapping the prime minister on the shoulder and firmly shaking his hand in a none-too-subtle message that the curtain was about to fall.

The sight of the ordinarily strait-laced Mr. Bush, with his vigorous exercise regimen and disdain for alcohol, wandering about the home where a bloated, drug-abusing Elvis died in the bathroom might have seemed incongruous to some. Indeed, the White House press secretary, Tony Snow, on Thursday refused to answer a delicate question: Did Mr. Bush prefer a fat Elvis or a skinny Elvis?

"Uuuuhh, yes," Mr. Snow replied diplomatically.

The prime minister was later treated to lunch at the Rendezvous, the downtown barbecue restaurant, which changed the labels on its spicy barbecue sauce to read, "One President, One Prime Minister, One King." The drummer for the Dempseys, a rockabilly band invited to perform over lunch, rescheduled the birth of his first child (the labor was induced).

With Memphis reeling from a recent spate of drive-by shootings that have killed several teenagers, the White House took pains to make sure Mr. Bush's trip was not all frivolity. The president made an unannounced stop at the National Civil Rights Museum, next door to the Lorraine Motel, where the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. was killed.

There, the civil rights leader Benjamin L. Hooks showed the prime minister, Mr. Bush and Laura Bush to Room 306, where Dr. King died. The visit was so last-minute that Mr. Hooks was at a dental appointment Friday morning when he received a phone call from the White House, asking him to serve as guide.

The trip attracted onlookers far more diverse than the already polyglot hordes that normally come to Elvis Presley Boulevard. The street was lined with people, as were barricades set up at the visitor center, across the street from Graceland. They included the curious and those just waiting for their turn to take the tour; protesters of the Iraq war and supporters of the troops; a woman dressed as Lady Liberty; and a man who said he had a letter stating that if the Boston Red Sox went to the World Series again he would throw out the first pitch, and that he would be going by Graceland later to see his old friend Lisa Marie.

But there were also those who used the surroundings for inspiration, at risk of copyright infringement and personal dignity. And not all their messages were for Mr. Bush.

Along the barricades, two Japanese doctors from the St. Jude Children's Research Hospital in Memphis stood behind a large sign. "I want you, I need you, I love you," it read. "Darling, I wish to build a children's cancer hospital in Japan together."

Gregory Wetstone, the tweed-suited director of United States operations for the International Fund for Animal Welfare, was accompanied by four Elvis impersonators in white jumpsuits. "We're delivering a message," Mr. Wetstone said. "Which is, don't be cruel — to whales."

At one end of the famous Graceland wall, inscribed by decades of tourists, stood a cluster of onlookers from the nearby predominantly black neighborhood, Whitehaven, that surrounds Graceland. One, a former state representative named Bret Thompson, said he had come because of a recent crime wave in Memphis that has caused consternation among the city's leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0037931

"We had, I guess, the most violent week in Memphis history," Mr. Thompson said. "We had a killing every day." He gestured at the flashing lights and barricades closing off the street to protect the president. "This is the safest place in the world right now, isn't it?"

But mostly, Friday was a day to celebrate a peculiar slice of Americana, gold lamé suits and all.

The White House left no detail unattended for what Mr. Bush described as "this most unusual experience." The breakfast fare on Air Force One was peanut butter and banana sandwiches, a recipe straight from Elvis's kitchen. Elvis movies — "Love Me Tender" and "Viva Las Vegas"— were available for viewing.

And Elvis music played loudly over the speakers, until Mr. Bush asked that it be turned down.

The Graceland tour capped a two-day visit by Mr. Koizumi to the United States; on Thursday, the two leaders met at the White House, where the threat of a long-range-missile launching by North Korea was high on the agenda. The visit here was Mr. Bush's idea, said Michael Green, a former White House foreign policy aide.

"Frankly," Mr. Green said, "I think the bureaucrats on both sides were a little bit perplexed, if not aghast."

The house is virtually as Elvis left it, a homage to 1970's hotel décor. The white couch in the living room is 15 feet long. The kitchen is paneled in wood. The TV room has three television sets, a mirrored ceiling and a bar upholstered in yellow Naugahyde. Elvis's famed pink Cadillac was parked outside; it ordinarily sits in a car museum across the street but was moved to make way for the traveling press.

The tour was the same as ordinary tourists receive, with one big exception: there were no ropes to prevent the two leaders from sitting where Elvis sat, walking where Elvis walked or touching what Elvis touched. When Mr. Koizumi picked up the gold sunglasses, Graceland's curator, who had carefully carried the glasses into the room with gloved hands, looked as if she were about to faint.

One part of the house the Bushes and Mr. Koizumi missed was the upstairs, Elvis's living quarters. Elvis insisted they be kept private, said David Beckwith, a spokesman for Graceland.

"Nobody goes upstairs," Mr. Beckwith said.

Not even Japan's best-known Elvis impersonator and the president of the United States.

At Graceland, Japanese Prime Minister Breaks Into Song (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson

Knight Ridder, July 1, 2006

MEMPHIS, Tenn. - Elvis left the building years ago, but Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi channeled his spirit Friday during a visit to the performer's Graceland mansion.

Standing next to President Bush in the garish "jungle room," a Polynesian-inspired sanctuary filled with fake-fur chairs, ceramic monkeys and green shag carpet on the floor and ceiling, Koizumi broke into song. He crooned a few lines from "Love Me Tender" and "Fools Rush In," before slipping on a pair of Elvis Presley's signature sunglasses and attempting a few gyrations. At 64, he couldn't swivel his hips quite like the King in his prime.

Still, he ended with a classic late-Elvis flourish, crouching, waving his arm in a windmill and singing, "Glooory, glooory, haaalleluuujah!"

It was perhaps the most bizarre moment in one of the strangest road trips in diplomatic history - a U.S. president and a Japanese prime minister paying homage to The King of Rock `n' Roll.

Bush's black presidential limo swept past Presley's pink Cadillac as he and Koizumi arrived for a tour led by Presley's former wife, Priscilla, and his daughter, Lisa Marie. The Presleys seemed to enjoy Koizumi's performance almost as much as he did.

"We need a karaoke machine," Priscilla Presley joked during Koizumi's jungle-room show.

Bush took his pal to the rock `n' roll shrine as payback for Koizumi's steadfast support and friendship. Koizumi, an avid Elvis fan who shares Presley's Jan. 8 birthday, plans to step down from his post in September.

He called his Graceland visit a dream come true.

"I knew he loved Elvis," Bush said. "I didn't realize how much he loved Elvis. He not only knows Elvis history, he can sing a pretty good Elvis song."

Bush's visit, the first by a sitting president, generated considerable interest in Memphis. Elvis fans gathered across the street from Graceland's musical-notes gate to welcome the president and his guest.

"I love the president and I love Elvis. This is the best thing that ever happened to Memphis," said Sinie Conley, 20, of nearby Lake Horn, Miss. Conley, who wore an "I Love Elvis" T-shirt, didn't know much about Koizumi but liked what she did know.

"He loves Elvis," she said. "You've got to love him for that."

DOJ_NMG_0037932

The visit also attracted four protesting Elvis impersonators, who waved signs denouncing Japan's refusal to join a ban on whaling.

After leaving Graceland, Bush and Koizumi stopped at a more somber Memphis landmark - the motel where civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated in 1968. The former Lorraine Motel now houses the National Civil Rights Museum. They stood on the balcony where King was shot.

But the day was devoted to Elvis from the moment Bush and Koizumi boarded Air Force One. Presley's songs played from the aircraft's speakers. The options for in-flight entertainment included two Elvis movies, "Love Me Tender" and "Viva Las Vegas."

Even the food had an Elvis theme, although Bush and Koizumi passed on Presley's favorite sandwich - peanut butter and bananas, grilled. White House chief of staff Josh Bolten wished he had done the same.

"I'm feeling a little heavy," he acknowledged. "I so rarely fry my peanut butter sandwiches."

At Graceland, the two leaders got the standard tour, but with more knowledgeable tour guides, better access to rooms and the chance to handle some of Presley's personal items.

Still, even the president didn't get to go upstairs, where Presley died in 1977 from heart problems and drug abuse. The mansion, set on 14 acres south of downtown Memphis, draws about 600,000 visitors annually.

"This is the White House of rock `n' roll," said Graceland spokesman Kevin Kern.

Bush and Koizumi, who both love baseball, hit it off from their first meeting in 2001 when they played an impromptu game of catch. White House advisers said Bush admires Koizumi's maverick style and his willingness to take unpopular stands, particularly his decision to send Japanese troops to Iraq in noncombat roles.

More than four dozen Japanese reporters came to Graceland to chronicle Koizumi's visit. Some were a little perplexed by his enthusiasm for the rock king.

"I've never heard Elvis Presley songs," said Hitoshi Inoue, a Washington correspondent for TV Asahi.

Koizumi couldn't stop singing them. He sang as he threw his arm around Lisa Marie Presley, 38, serenading her with one of her father's classic love songs, "Hold me close, hold me tight." She giggled.

Lisa Marie, who married musician Michael Lockwood last January in Kyoto, Japan, bantered with Koizumi in Japanese when he told her she looks like her father.

The Japanese prime minister sang a few more snippets as he and Bush prepared to leave.

"It's a like a dream," Koizumi said, cueing up his version of "To Dream the Impossible Dream." "Thank you very much for treating me nice," he added, setting up a snippet from "Treat Me Nice."

At that point, Bush dropped the curtain.

"We're going to have some barbecue," the president announced, closing Koizumi's performance.

Japanese Leader Sings King's Praises (WT)

By Joseph Curl, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, July 1, 2006

MEMPHIS, Tenn. -- Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi yesterday rocked the House That Elvis Built, crooning a few bars of some classic Presley hits and leaving his tour guide, President Bush, looking a bit like a whipped Hound Dog.

It didn't take much to get Asia's biggest Elvis fan to break into song as he made a long-sought pilgrimage to the Memphis mansion. "You're a pretty good Elvis singer," the president said to the long-haired leader, worshipped like a rock star in his home country.

"Let's hear some," yelled a reporter from the edge of the Jungle Room, a time capsule of 1974 with its avocado green shag carpet on the floor and ceiling, a feature that made for such pure acoustics that Elvis and his buddies recorded several hits there.

"Love me tender ... " Mr. Koizumi sang in a low register, breaking off as laughter from first lady Laura Bush, along with Priscilla Presley, Elvis' widow, and the couple's daughter, Lisa Marie Presley, drowned him out.

The Japanese leader took a breath and then launched into a medley. "Wise men say, only fools rush in ... " he crooned, before being interrupted by Mr. Bush, who said: "I thought you were going to sing 'Blue Suede Shoes.' "

But Mr. Koizumi, who was born on the same date as the King, followed in his idol's footsteps, making a quick costume change by donning a pair of gold-rimmed sunglasses that Elvis wore in the 1972 concert film, "Elvis on Tour."

Striking the emotive stage pose seen in the later days of Elvis' career -- stretched out in a near crouch, one arm windmilling, the prime minister let go with one last burst. "Glory, glory hallelujah," he sang, drawing a surprised smile from the president, who stepped back to take in the full performance.

Although a Graceland "archivist" wearing white cotton gloves had carefully laid out two pairs of glasses, Mr. Bush steered clear of the spectacles.

DOJ_NMG_0037933

Mr. Koizumi called the day touring what many consider America's mecca of rock 'n' roll "a dream."

"I never expected president come with me to visit Graceland," he said in broken English.

Mr. Bush struck a more sober tone by stating: "The visit here is an indication of how well-known Elvis was around the world. A lot of people are still singing Elvis Presley songs here in the states, and there's a lot of people who love Elvis Presley in Japan, including the prime minister."

White House staffers leaned more toward the exuberant Koizumi: Press secretary Tony Snow briefed reporters aboard Air Force One en route to Graceland wearing a pair of the huge trademark Elvis tinted glasses; a dozen other staffers also donned them. Many became tourists themselves, taking pictures of the spangled and sparkly jumpsuits in glass cases and the 100 gold and platinum records lining the walls in what was once the King's racquetball court.

The crew of the presidential aircraft also got in on the action. They prepared a special Elvis treat, gleaned from the Graceland Web site: A fried peanut butter and banana sandwich, with a whopping 36 grams of fat. Both svelte leaders skipped the treat; Mr. Bush drank coffee, and Mr. Koizumi drank green tea.

Elvis songs, including "Don't Be Cruel," were playing over the public-address system aboard Air Force One, and Elvis movies, including "Viva Las Vegas," were available upon request.

While the president is known for his disdain of tourist stops -- he skipped India's Taj Mahal on a trip this year and last month raced through Vienna, Austria, and Budapest in 36 hours -- he offered to take the prime minister to Graceland a year ago.

The two leaders were no doubt paying homage to the young Elvis, the dirty-dancing heartthrob who changed the music world with a newfangled thing called rock 'n' roll, not the old Elvis, the drug-addled and bloated pill-popping junkie who paid young girls to wrestle for his entertainment.

While Mr. Bush and Mr. Koizumi were not allowed in private quarters upstairs where Elvis died, they toured the rest of the 14-acre estate, stopping off to see the black baby-grand piano by a 15-foot white sofa in the living room, Elvis' burial shrine -- even one of the King's prized possessions, a pink Cadillac.

As the first sitting president to visit Graceland, Mr. Bush was given an original Elvis belt buckle from the estate. Mr. Koizumi was given a vintage movie poster.

The leaders also made a stop at a different King memorial: The National Civil Rights Museum at the Lorraine Motel, where Martin Luther King was assassinated in 1968. The two leaders stood on the spot on the motel balcony where King was slain.

Mr. Bush and Mr. Koizumi then stopped for lunch at Rendezvous, a 58-year-old barbecue restaurant. Seated at red-checked tablecloths, the leaders dug into a meal of Memphis-style ribs, cole slaw, sausage, beans and sweet tea.

Japan's Premier Follows Dream To Memphis (FT)

By Caroline Daniel And David Pilling In Memphis

Financial Times, July 1, 2006

Not many presidential road-trips cum summits begin at the porticos of Graceland, Elvis's home in Memphis, with a private tour of the house from Priscilla and Lisa Marie Presley, and end being handed a genuine Elvis buckle from one of his costumes.

But Friday's special trip to the birthplace of the King, designed to celebrate his special relationship Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, was a day of firsts. It was the first time a sitting President had visited Graceland. And before Mr Koizumi, the President of Costa Rica was the only foreign leader to have made the pilgrimage to the King

Mr Koizumi's arrival on Air Force One in the morning at Andrew Air Force Base was heralded with the sounds of Elvis tunes, piped over the PA. After getting in the mood watching Elvis movies, the two leaders, who have established a wsrm personal chemistry, arrived at Graceland. They were greeted by a sign from the local mayor: "Menfisu ni youkoso" or Welcome to Memphis.

Graceland is not exactly yen understatement, with its Jungle room, replete with glowering monkey statues, a homage to a hotel room Elvis stayed in Hawaii, its billiard room draped in yards and yards of pyschedelic material, his round fur bed with inset mirrors, and a racketball court festooned with gold records.

Even in the heart of Americana, there were reminders of Japan. Mr Koizumi could view a Karate kit that Elvis, used to wear. He was a black belt, and claimed he practiced every day. As he epigrammatically observed: "There's a lot to it. It's not just breaking bricks. I mean, how many times is a brick gonna come out and attack you?"

The Graceland directors had eschewed setting up a karaoke machine, perhaps out of deference to diplomatic etiquette, and not wanting Mr Bush to appear a party pooper for not joining in a duet of Jailhouse Rock. Yet, Mr Koizumi still broke into a few bars of Love Me Tender, and then pulling Lisa Marie Presley close to him, serenaded her with the words: "hold me close, hold me tight."

DOJ_NMG_0037934

Taking up the chance to wear some authentic Elvis shades (two pairs were set aside, Bush decline his, at least publically), Mr Koizumi, seemingly imbued with the spirit of the singer, later did the Elvis swoon: arms outstretched, falling to his knees, he offered a full gusto impersonation of his hero, with whom he shares a birthday, to Mr Bush's delight.

Yet not all of Mr Koizumi's efforts have been as warmly applauded. His album, released in 2002, his top 25 Elvis songs, sold 200,000 copies but was actually in breach of Elvis copyright because it used and doctored a photo of Elvis without seeking copyright from the photographer. Elvis Presley Enterprises has quietly advised the prime minister that if he wants to re-release the album – as he does – that he should ditch the photo.

Even so, the Graceland directors gave him a vintage Elvis poster, while Laura Bush, received a TLC necklace, (Tender Loving Care), something Elvis gave members of his female entourage. Jack Soden, chief executive of Elvis Presley Enterprises, says more foreign dignitaries, should be brought to the heartland. "It's no good if they stay in a presidential suite of a Manhattan hotel. They need to see Memphis Tennessee, a simpler place, where we are sure our most honoured guests get barbecue not Maine lobster."

Barbecue is exactly what Mr Kozumi received. He managed to avoid swallowing another helping of US beef at lunch, having already had to chew down two portions in a politically driven photo-op to underline the recent lifting of the Japanese ban on the export of US beef. Instead, at Rendezvous Charcoal Ribs in downtown Memphis, the menu was charcoal broiled pork ribs, pork shoulder sandwich, beans and slaw.

Yet Mr Bush's jocular mood nearly turned into annoyance as he arrived at the head table and saw six empty chairs. Lisa Marie Presley and Priscilla Presley eventually idled in. But his guest of honour was lagging. Mr Bush looking awkwardly around, scanning the front door. He picked up a spoon and scooped beans on a plate, and looked like an anxious housewife presiding over their first dinner party. Still no Mr Koizumi. He picked up the plate of ribs and offered them to one of his Japanese guests. More minutes ticked by. As he fiddled with a slotted spoon, there was palpable relief when his guest arrived.

They left after the meal, with no further serenades, "he's all sung out," said Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman. Mr Bush's parting shot was: "I'll see you at the G8."

The idea for the Graceland trip was Mr Bush's, inspired by a Camp David meeting with Mr Koizumi in 2002, and cemented after Mr Koizumi burst into Elvis songs at the G8 summit last year. This visit sets a new symbol for Presidential intimacy. From now on, world leaders, anxious to show their clout, may demand a visit to Camp Elvis not Camp David.

Bush Takes Koizumi For Tour Of Graceland (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

GRACELAND, America, June 30 -- If wise men say only fools rush in, then on this day, at least, President Bush heeded the wise men.

It was one thing to take his friend, Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, to Memphis to visit what evidently is now the nation's most important tourist site. But the president drew a line Friday when the wavy-haired Japanese leader began crooning Elvis songs.

" Love me tender, " Koizumi sang in a deep baritone that bore a fair approximation of the King, if the King had been from Tokyo. Standing in front of the stone waterfall in the Jungle Room here at Graceland, complete with avocado shag carpet on both floor and ceiling, Bush laughed but did not join in.

Just as well. The image of the politically struggling president lamenting his own heartbreak hotel might have left his advisers all shook up. This was a day for friendship, rock-and-roll and bad puns as Bush embarked on what even he called an "unusual experience," quite possibly the most memorable diplomatic pleasure trip of his presidency.

As a farewell gift to Koizumi, one of his best overseas friends and a longtime Elvis aficionado making his final U.S. visit before retiring in September, Bush organized a special trip to the mansion where the legendary singer lived and died. The mecca of fans everywhere closed itself to ordinary tourists for the first time since opening in 1982 as it played host to its first sitting president. Priscilla and Lisa Marie Presley flew in for the occasion.

If the president stuck to understated good humor, Koizumi plunged into the spirit of the occasion, mugging for cameras in Elvis's sunglasses, belting out some of his favorite lyrics, serenading Lisa Marie and even mimicking her father's famous stage moves. The prime minister, who once released a CD of his favorite Elvis songs, gleefully checked out the extravagant concert costumes and the pink Cadillac on the lawn and the wall after wall of gold records.

"My dream come true," Koizumi said, after singing a few words of "The Impossible Dream" to make the point.

While they were in town, the president and prime minister also visited another landmark, the National Civil Rights Museum next to the motel where Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated. It was such a last-minute addition to the trip that the White House tracked civil rights leader Benjamin Hooks down at his dentist's office Friday morning to ask him to show the visitors around.

That Bush would take the time to come to Graceland testifies to the strength of his personal bond with Koizumi, first forged on the grass at Camp David in 2001 when they played catch, traded baseball stories and talked about favorite movies such as "High Noon."

Bush is at best an accidental tourist. He once raced through the Kremlin cathedrals in Moscow in seven minutes flat, did the sprawling Hermitage Museum in St. Petersburg in a half-hour and turned to go soon after arriving at the Great Wall of China. He declined an invitation to visit the Taj Mahal altogether while in India, pleading lack of time.

Yet he managed to carve out eight hours to fly here from Washington, trailed by a media throng the likes of which rarely accompanies him to, say, a Medicare speech in Missouri. About 300 journalists showed up, in fact, and a press center was set up in the Elvis Presley Automobile Museum featuring his 1956 purple Cadillac Eldorado convertible, the 1960 MG used in "Blue Hawaii" and the rest of his fleet. Tourists circled the journalists under the giant disco ball as if they were another exhibit.

Everyone tried to get into the act. The Air Force One crew played "Love Me Tender" and "Don't Be Cruel" over the intercom system as the president, Laura Bush and Koizumi boarded. Elvis movies were made available for viewing during the flight to Memphis. For breakfast, the King's favorite fried peanut butter-and-banana sandwiches, with 36 grams of fat apiece, were served on the plane. Bush and Koizumi politely passed, although White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten gave it a try, reportedly to his regret.

When Bush and Koizumi arrived at Graceland, a small clutch of activists from the International Fund for Animal Welfare gathered nearby to protest Japan's whaling policies, featuring four Elvis impersonators holding up signs such as "Don't Be Cruel."

But nothing would spoil Koizumi's day, which came complete with the gift of a vintage Elvis poster. He checked out the triple televisions embedded in the walls of the yellow-and-blue basement entertainment room with the mirrored ceiling. He was shown the pool table in the billiard room festooned with 350 yards of multicolored fabric covering the walls and ceiling. He and Bush shared what a Graceland spokesman called "private time" in the Meditation Garden where Elvis and his parents are buried next to an eternal flame.

By the time he got to the Jungle Room, decorated after Elvis's memory of Hawaii, Koizumi was ready to perform.

He smiled at Lisa Marie, her brown hair streaked with blond.

"You look like Elvis," he told her.

" Arigato ," she answered, expressing thanks.

"My birthday is the same as Elvis," he noted.

"Even now," he added, "I often listen to Elvis CDs."

"You're a pretty good Elvis singer," Bush offered.

Koizumi demurred. "I'm not impersonator," he said.

But Washington Times reporter Joseph Curl recognized the moment of opportunity. "Let's hear some," he called out.

And Koizumi obliged. He started with a few words from "Love Me Tender," then segued into "Can't Help Falling in Love."

"I thought you were going to do 'Blue Suede Shoes,' " Bush said.

The first lady of the country and the onetime first ladies of music came over to pose for pictures. Koizumi wrapped his arm around Lisa Marie. "Hold me close, I want to hold you tight," he crooned to her.

Priscilla showed the prime minister a few of her former husband's personal items, including a pair of sunglasses that a museum employee in white gloves had gingerly placed on a table minutes before.

Koizumi eagerly grabbed them and slapped them on. Then, in the moment that thrilled television producers around the world, he crouched, seemed to play a bit of air guitar and emulated the late singer's motions while belting out, "Glory, glory, hallelujah."

The president kept his singing voice and dance moves to himself but seemed to enjoy the show. He wanted Koizumi to have a good time. On this day, Mission Accomplished. "I knew he loved Elvis," Bush said. "I didn't realize how much he loved Elvis."

Bush Leads Koizumi On Tour Of Graceland (AP-Y2)

By Deb Riechmann, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 1, 2006

It didn't take much coaxing from President Bush to get Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi to croon some Elvis tunes Friday at the king of rock 'n' roll's Graceland mansion.

"You're a pretty good Elvis singer," Bush told Koizumi, an avid Elvis Presley fan.

DOJ_NMG_0037936

That was all the prodding the freewheeling prime minister needed.

"Love me tender, love me sweet," Koizumi sang.

"Wise men say, only fools rush in ..."

"We need a karaoke machine," joked Priscilla Presley, mother of Presley's only child, Lisa Marie. Koizumi donned a pair of sunglasses that Elvis wore in the 1972 concert film, "Elvis on Tour," and hugged Lisa Marie. "Hold me close. Hold me tight," he sang to her.

Then Koizumi bent down, swung his arm as if strumming a guitar and sang, "Glory, glory, hallelujah," a refrain from the "Battle Hymn of the Republic," also part of the Presley repertoire.

The visit to Graceland was the highlight of the outgoing Japanese leader's two-day visit with Bush, a kind of sayonara summit to illustrate how their personal friendship has helped bring U.S.-Japan relations closer than at any time since the end of World War II.

"This visit here shows that not only am I personally fond of the prime minister, but the ties between our peoples are very strong as well," Bush said.

It was Bush's first visit to Presley's white brick mansion.

"My first visit, too," Koizumi said, standing in a gaudy, wood-paneled den known as the Jungle Room, a place where Presley hung out with his buddies. "It's like a dream — with President Bush and Presley's daughter."

Bush, first lady Laura Bush and Koizumi drove through the gates of Graceland in a shiny, black limousine adorned with the flags of both nations. It was as if they were making a formal diplomatic visit.

After they got out, the scene turned surreal.

Here was Bush, who didn't stop off at the Taj Mahal while in India, touring the home of a music star who died in his bathroom of heart disease and drug abuse in 1977.

Instead of walking down red carpets to review troops, Bush and Koizumi strode over green shag that lined the floors and ceiling of the den. Instead of elegant furniture and chandeliers, they posed for photos in a room decorated with white ceramic monkeys and wooden chairs with armrests carved in the shape of animal heads.

Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove, snapped photos of the Japanese delegation in front of Elvis' 1955 pink Cadillac with whitewall tires. "I loved the (lamp) shade they had covered with faux fur," Rove said.

Graceland was closed to tourists when Lisa Marie and her mother escorted the dignitaries around the 14-acre estate, showing them the glossy black baby-grand piano, a 15-foot white sofa in the living room, Presley's burial site and his gold records, guitars and costumes.

Bush and Koizumi weren't allowed to peek at the private quarters upstairs.

It was all Elvis all day.

Along with anti-war protesters along the motorcade route, four Elvis impersonators in white jumpsuits sang "Don't be Cruel" in the International Fund for Animal Welfare's protest to urge a halt to illegal Japanese whaling.

Elvis tunes were playing over the public address system aboard Air Force One as Bush and Koizumi flew here. Elvis movies were available upon request.

White House press secretary Tony Snow wore Elvis novelty shades to brief reporters on the plane and fueled conspiracy theories that the singer never died. The two leaders, he said, would visit the "alleged grave site."

An option on Air Force One, as printed on a menu, was one of the singer's favorites: Elvis Presley's fried peanut butter and banana sandwich, which had 36 grams of fat. Both leaders passed on it. Bush drank coffee and Koizumi drank green tea.

"I'm feeling a little heavy," said White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten, who gobbled down the breakfast treat. "I so rarely fry my peanut butter sandwiches."

The day did have a serious moment. The two made an unscheduled stop at the National Civil Rights Museum at The Lorraine Motel, where the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated in 1968. Bush and Koizumi emerged from a tour to stand on the spot on the motel balcony where King was slain.

The Elvis mania returned, however, when the leaders were greeted at Rendezvous, Memphis' famed, 58-year-old barbecue restaurant, by a rockabilly trio called The Dempseys, which has often played at Elvis' restaurant in the city. Seated at red-checked tablecloths, Bush and Koizumi dug into a meal of Memphis-style ribs, cole slaw, sausage, beans and sweet tea.

Bush and the Japanese prime minister parted company after lunch. On his way back to Washington, Bush stopped in Ohio to attend a fundraiser at a private home in suburban Columbus for Republican Sen. Mike DeWine (news, bio, voting record).

Afterward, Bush couldn't resist the lure of a neighborhood lemonade stand across the street where several dozen cheering supporters had gathered. Bush was in such a good mood that he bought a round of lemonade for some members of the traveling press.

Japan's Koizumi Shakes Up Graceland (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

The prime minister, long a fan of the King, cuts loose as he tours with the Bushes and Presleys.

MEMPHIS, Tenn. — President Bush doesn't get a lot of tender love these days on the world stage. But Friday, taking his Japanese counterpart on a private tour of Graceland, Bush received a hunk of burning love.

Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi — calling it a "dream" to see the home of his longtime idol, Elvis Presley — was reduced to almost uncontrollably giddy giggling as he broke into a serenade for Bush and First Lady Laura Bush and for Presley's ex-wife, Priscilla, and their daughter, Lisa Marie.

"Love me tender … " Koizumi crooned through a thick accent as he stood with the others in Graceland's famously tacky Jungle Room — replete with fake-fur-covered furniture, an indoor waterfall and avocado colored shag carpet covering floor and ceiling.

The Bushes, clearly unaccustomed to such a display (or perhaps still disoriented from the mirrored ceilings in the downstairs television room) looked on with strained smiles. Koizumi persisted, belting out another one of his favorite Elvis hits.

"Wise men say," he sang, "only fools rush in."

Lisa Marie Presley spoke up, wondering where the group could find a karaoke machine. But President Bush had heard enough. He tapped his friend on the shoulder and shook his hand, effectively cutting off the performance.

"I thought you were going to do 'Blue Suede Shoes,' " Bush cracked.

The exchange marked one of several offbeat but affectionate scenes during Koizumi's "sayonara summit" this week in the United States.

The prime minister is soon leaving office, and ever since he first met Bush exactly five years ago — and played a game of catch at Camp David — the two leaders have maintained a close friendship.

Like Bush, Koizumi is a baseball fan and a lover of country music. In perhaps the key element to his rapport with Bush, he also has been a staunch supporter of the war in Iraq.

Friday's tour was a bit of a reward for that rare loyalty. Koizumi, who shares Elvis' Jan. 8 birthday, is obsessed with Presley's music and has even produced a CD in Japan of his 25 favorite songs by "the King."

The trip followed a gala White House dinner Thursday night at which the two leaders exchanged compliments.

Bush drew parallels between Koizumi and Presley, noting their widely known shared taste in hairstyles. "Like you, he had great hair," the president said during his dinner toast. "Like you, he was known to sing in public."

Koizumi said that, as a child, his "exposure to America was Presley," which he said was "a vivid memory" of his youth.

"The first English song I ever learned by heart was Presley's 'I Want You, I Need You, I Love You,' " he said.

That had been the first song Koizumi selected earlier Thursday on a half-century-old jukebox that the Bushes gave him as a present. And, even during a joint news conference at the White House that focused on such serious matters as North Korean missiles and military tribunals for alleged terrorists, Koizumi was inspired to make a Presley reference.

"Thank you, very much, American people, for 'Love Me Tender,' " he said, drawing laughter as Bush all but dragged him from the East Room podium.

On Friday's pilgrimage to Graceland, the delegation strolled through each room of the 1920s-era mansion. They saw display cases containing some of Presley's sequin-encrusted outfits. His signature pink Cadillac was removed from the antique car museum and placed near the home's front entrance to make room for the media to work.

Bush and Koizumi enjoyed a bit of private time in the meditation garden where Elvis and his parents are buried. The leaders did not go upstairs, the site of Presley's death at age 42 in 1977.

Back in the Jungle Room, Koizumi threw his left arm around Lisa Marie's shoulders and sang again.

"Hold me close, hold me tight."

Awkward laughter filled the room.

Moments later, Koizumi poked through Elvis' wallet, which contained original cards and IDs, and, surprising museum curators, he picked up and donned a pair of the King's sunglasses. As others watched with puzzled looks, the prime minister appeared to play an air guitar, then swivel his arms as if to mimic a famous Elvis maneuver.

When Bush called him a "pretty good Elvis singer," Koizumi replied: "I'm not impersonator."

There were, however, some impersonators attracted to the circus: four anti-whaling protesters dressed up as Elvis stood outside Graceland holding signs telling Koizumi, "Don't be cruel."

DOJ_NMG_0037938

The half-day stop at Graceland was something of a departure for Bush, who has not been known to spend much time at cultural attractions. He zipped through the vaunted Hermitage Museum in St. Petersburg, Russia; rushed past the ancient Great Wall in China; and skipped the Taj Mahal in India — raising eyebrows among many of that country's citizens.

With Koizumi in tow, Bush also visited a more somber historical site in Memphis: the motel where civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated in 1968.

The group stopped briefly at a museum on the property and, guided by longtime civil rights leader Benjamin Hooks, went to the spot on the motel's balcony where King was shot.

The Bushes and Koizumi lunched at one of the city's barbecue restaurants and then parted company, with the president heading to Ohio for a Republican fundraiser.

Bush Takes Japanese Prime Minister For Memphis Visit (MCA)

By Zack McMillin

Memphis Commercial Appeal, July 1, 2006

The Tourist in Chief made his inaugural trip to Graceland on Friday, but it was President Bush's guest from Japan who rocked Memphis with his fervent adulation for the King of Rock and Roll.

Strutting and singing and doing his best Elvis lunge across the shag carpet of the Jungle Room, Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi delighted the president, first lady Laura Bush and tour guides Priscilla and Lisa Marie Presley.

"You're a pretty good Elvis singer," Bush said, and with the pack of media in the room entreating him, Koizumi delivered a teasing cabaret of tunes that make metaphors hard to resist.

"Love me tender," he crooned, giving the appropriate serenade to a love-fest of a visit from the retiring Japanese leader to his pal in Washington.

"Wise men say, only fools rush in," Koizumi sang, beginning another love song but summing up what many dozen protesters across the street said in a less polite way about their dissatisfaction over the war in Iraq.

Putting his arm around Elvis' daughter, Lisa Marie Presley, the popular prime minister with the Hollywood mane tried out his signature Elvis tune, singing, "Hold me close, hold me tight."

When a Graceland curator allowed Koizumi to don a pair of authentic gold sunglasses worn by the King in 1973, the prime minister dipped and thrust out his right hand while delivering a many-syllabled "Glory, glory hallelujah."

The first two heads of state to visit Graceland at the same time -- it was also a first visit for both Bush, 59, and Koizumi, 64 -- have long since moved beyond diplomatic flirtations, and the fun, lighthearted visit to Memphis (even a few local Democrats smiled and yukked with Bush, dressed sans tie with sleeves rolled up) came just a few weeks after a state visit to Europe that drew hordes of protesters.

At Thursday's White House press conference, Bush used the friendship between Japan and the U.S., 60 years after battling one another, as a reason to remain optimistic despite the difficulties in the Middle East. Koizumi and Japan were part of the coalition that supported the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003.

Bush lightened the comparison on Friday, dwelling instead on the bond Koizumi made with America because of the music of a Memphis original.

"His reputation was so strong that he attracted the attention of the now prime minister of Japan," Bush said after the tour, which lasted about 75 minutes.

"This visit here shows that not only am I personally fond of the prime minister, but the ties between our peoples are strong, as well."

Koizumi, whose English is heavily accented, gushed, "It is like a dream." Then he tried a few bars of Elvis' "Dream the Impossible Dream."

Although the president never donned the plastic souvenir Elvis glasses nor gyrated even once, the visit had the feel of a class field trip.

The president's staff, including senior adviser Karl Rove, snapped pictures in front of the pink Cadillac parked in front of the mansion, and more than a few sported the sunglasses.

Peanut butter and banana sandwiches were eaten by staff on the Air Force One ride to Memphis.

The jet arrived in Memphis at 10 a.m. Among those greeting the arrival were new U.S. Atty. Gen. David Kustoff (Tennessee campaign manager for Bush in 2004) and Memphis Mayor Willie Herenton.

All along the 30-car motorcade's route to Graceland -- which began on Democrat Road -- gaggles of people stood and waved, took pictures and held signs. That scene repeated throughout the four-hour visit, with the largest crowds camped near

Graceland and in the cordoned-off downtown blocks surrounding the Rendezvous, where Bush, Koizumi and a several dozen others ate lunch.

The motorcade surprised those in the South Main area -- and the hungry media -- by making an unexpected stop at the National Civil Rights Museum. Bush greeted several stunned children with handshakes and shoulder taps.

The president and prime minister took a quick tour and later stood on the Lorraine Motel's balcony with former NAACP president Dr. Benjamin Hooks and AutoZone founder Pitt Hyde.

Standing behind the wreath that marks the spot where Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. was killed in 1968, Hyde and Hooks pointed across the street to the former boarding house from where James Earl Ray fired the fatal shots. That building, now part of the museum, was not cleared, and people were crowded up to the windows to watch.

Secret Service personnel scrambled into position, but minutes later Bush and Koizumi headed to the Rendezvous.

A crowd that included Tennessee Sens. Lamar Alexander and Bill Frist and U.S. Rep. Harold Ford Jr. joined the party for a big lunch in the upstairs banquet room.

The Dempseys, a Memphis rockabilly trio, provided the swinging Elvis cover tunes, and even enticed Koizumi to perform with them, going back to his favorite, "I Want You, I Need You, I Love You."

"I watched him throughout most of the lunch, and he was cheering and applauding and pumping his fists," said Rollin Riggs, the band's manager.

After nearly an hour at the Rendezvous, the motorcade traveled back the the Tennessee National Air Guard hangar.

After the president honored Cordova resident Sandi Langley for her volunteer work, he boarded Air Force One and left Memphis airspace at about 2:10, bound for an event in Ohio.

Koizumi met with executives from Sharp and Brother, Japanese companies with a Memphis presence, then departed about 2:45 on his jumbo jet with the round red dot on the tail.

"It was a great visit," said Tom Schieffer, the American ambassador to Japan. "Just a terrific afternoon."

Pilgrimage Offered As Thanks; Tactical Move Lies Beneath Friday's Frivolity (MCAPPEAL)

By Halimah Abdullah

Memphis Commercial Appeal, July 1, 2006

The chemistry between President Bush and Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi has been the stuff of a warm and fuzzy, 1950s-era beach blanket flick.

Koizumi strutted and gyrated as if he had channeled Elvis while a bemused Bush looked on from Graceland's shrine-like confines on Friday.

However, beyond the pomp and pompadours, the Memphis visit was a carefully orchestrated symbol of thanks to an outgoing leader of the world's second largest economy for supporting Bush on issues like the war in Iraq and terrorism.

It's also a tactical move for Bush who, while cultivating close relationships with now-departing heads of state, finds himself besieged with criticism on domestic and international fronts.

Likewise, Koizumi's theatrical warbling of Elvis tunes and flirting with Lisa Marie Presley were more about maintaining his affable public persona as he hammed it up for the press pool.

"I don't think he's doing this because he likes ... music and he and Bush get along," said James Auer, director of Vanderbilt University's Center for U.S.-Japan Studies and Cooperation. "He's doing this because it's in Japan's best interests."

Ironically, both nations' mutual interests were strengthened just after the Sept. 11 attacks when Japan supported the United States by backing efforts in Afghanistan and sending 600 peacekeeping troops to Iraq.

Koizumi who, like Bush, had only been in office a few months, found a kindred spirit in the man he compares to Gary Cooper in "High Noon."

During their Memphis visit, the two goofed around in the mansion's famous Jungle Room and posed for pictures near Elvis' pink Cadillac.

"Their friendship has been buttressed by their common ground," said Yinan He, a professor of security studies at Seton Hall's Whitehead School of Diplomacy and International Relations in New Jersey. "They're both young, relatively speaking. They're both more unilateral in their approach, and they're both conservative."

To be sure, both nations have benefited from Bush and Koizumi's friendship.

The United States. supported Japan's bid to become a permanent member of the U.N. Security Council. Japan headed up efforts to finance reconstruction in Iraq and dispatched ships to the Indian Ocean to refuel U.S. and other ally craft.

"Bush likes to say (Japan and the U.S.) have a very current common interest in promoting stability, freedom and democracy," Auer said.

DOJ_NMG_0037940

The flip side of such a close relationship has meant a more ambivalent stance on such issues as Japan's ban on U.S. beef, a recently resolved point of contention.

"The Bush administration has not pushed them as hard as they could have on that," He said.

Bush has been largely mum on Koizumi's controversial visits to the Yasukuni Shrine, which commemorates the Japanese killed during World War II, including war criminals.

Such gestures are being scrutinized more closely as Bush enters the autumn of of his presidency and Koizumi exits stage left.

Political experts on both sides of the ocean have speculated what this parting of ways will mean in term of future relations between the two nations.

In the meantime, both leaders' stance on North Korea's nuclear weapons efforts, rather than their Memphis-bound roadtrip, provides perhaps a long-lasting symbol of commonality.

"It is a signal to North Korea," He said.

"The two leaders will stand together against any sort of threat."

Heads Of State Pay Call On Palace Of The King (TENN)

By Leon Alligood

Tennessean, July 1, 2006

MEMPHIS — Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi went to Graceland Friday and all he got was a tour of Elvis Presley's mansion with the King's ex-wife and daughter, Priscilla and Lisa Marie, serving as tour guides.

The No. 1 karaoke dude from the Land of the Rising Sun also got a look-see at some of the hip-twisting crooner's artifacts brought out from the Elvis warehouse/archives especially for him.

And he was given a movie poster, written in Japanese, from Elvis' Kissin' Cousins – from Elvis' personal collection.

Oh yeah, the president of the United States was there, too.

It was one magic day for Memphis, one grand day for Graceland.

For about an hour and a half, three world potentates — two among the living and one reputed, by some theorists, to still be in the building — were at the locus of, if not the world's attention, then the universe of all things Elvis.

The trip had been in the works for about six weeks. President George W. Bush's people, the Secret Service, came to town early to check out the Jungle Room and the rest of the mansion and gave their security blessings to the visit, which Koizumi requested.

It seems the prime minister with the poofy hairdo has been lip-synching hunka, hunka burnin' love for years.

Graceland averages 600,000 visitors per year, but on this memorable day for all VIPs involved, the parade of families from Iowa and Arkansas and Glasgow (Scotland, not Kentucky) and Paris (France, not Tennessee) were politely kept at a distance while Bush and Koizumi toured the grounds held as a shrine by Elvis aficionados.

At 7 a.m., with the Bayer aspirin-white sun already above the tail of the Lisa Marie, Elvis' private jet parked across from the mansion's entrance, an eclectic crowd began gathering.

The "God bless the USA" crowd in one section held signs that showed their love for President Bush. He could not see them because a row of Memphis buses was parked nose-to-tail in front of the crowd for security purposes.

"I love my president and I love Elvis," said Sinie Conley, 20, of Horn Lake, Miss.

"He's going to love it. The kitchen colors are a little weird, but he'll love it," Conley said of the prime minister's mansion viewing.

About 10 feet away there was uproar as a self-appointed Elvis cheerleader held up a sign: "Make noise if you love Elvis."

Down the row, Kelly Jacobs, decked out in her best imitation of Lady Liberty, made her way into the crowd, much to the chagrin of others. Her sign read: "Japan left Iraq; U.S. leave now." It referred to Koizumi's recent decision to pull his country's 500 soldiers out.

On her right shoulder she wore a pendant that featured silver numbers. The number Friday was 2,532, the number of American soldiers killed in Iraq.

"I have to change it every day," she said. "How long? How long?"

Just when it appeared there would be no Elvis sightings, four of them appeared in white jump suits that sparkled with colored stones. They sported black hair perfectly coiffed and sideburns appropriately long, and sweated like pigs headed for a Fourth of July grill pit.

In only-at-Graceland fashion, they were on a mission to save the whales, in a landlocked state, no less. The "Elvi" were hired to bring attention to Japan's whale-hunting activities. To many groans and grimaces and smiles they sang a special version of "Don't Be Cruel."

DOJ_NMG_0037941

"They kill over a thousand whales a year and are beginning to accelerate that. We want to bring it to Koizumi's attention. He can do something about it," said Gregory Wetstone, U.S. director for the International Fund for Animal Welfare.

"It's a job," said Chuck Baril, 45, one of the Elvi, who is from Gallatin. When he isn't Elvis he is the doorman at the Doubletree Hotel in downtown Nashville.

Perhaps the crowd on Elvis Presley Boulevard proved this: While Japan is a nation where the people elect their leaders but still show respect to a reigning monarch, America, it turns out, is very similar — we have a president and a King, and they both draw quite a crowd.

But yesterday was the first time they drew a crowd together. While Richard Nixon was the first president to visit China, and Rutherford B. Hayes was the first president to visit the West Coast, George W. Bush will go down in history as the first sitting president to visit Graceland.

While Bush didn't get a movie poster like his Japanese counterpart, he did get a similarly cool gift from the Presleys: The eagle-design belt buckle Elvis wore on his jumpsuit in Aloha from Hawaii.

After about 90 minutes of taking over the White House of the Elvis Nation, the VIPs left as they arrived, in a hurry, running the gauntlet of those who would praise and those who would condemn— if only the power pals could hear them in their sleek, black, bulletproof, soundproof limos.

Of course, their next stop was ribs at The Rendezvous, the town's iconic eatery. What world leader wouldn't drive fast for that? ·

IN LAND OF EMPEROR, THE KING RULES

So why do the Japanese adore Elvis Presley? An ABC News story last year said there were 500 Elvises for hire in Tokyo alone.

"He just has that appeal to a certain generation," said Dr. Shotaro Iwamoto of St. Jude Children's Research Hospital who, along with other Japanese friends who work at St. Jude, were outside Graceland early Friday."If you are at the age of 50 in Japan, more than likely you are an Elvis fan. But many young people like him, too."

Leslie Rubinkowski, author of the book "Impersonating Elvis," said,"The love people have for him begins in the space between the extremes that defined his life. He grew up poor and ended up living in a house with a Jungle Room. He filled another room with gold records, but he loved his mama."

Rubinkowski said the Japanese fascination could be simply that country's fixation with all things American. And Elvis is uniquely American.

It wasn't fine china for President Bush and Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi on their visit Friday to the Rendezvous. They ate their lunch from paper plates and used plastic utensils just like regular customers.

Inside the homey, back-alley restaurant, Bush cleaned his plate of barbecue ribs and washed it down with a Diet Coke. Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, who had the barbecue nachos and water, sat alongside Bush and belted out his favorite Elvis tune, "I Want You, I Need You, I Love You" with The Dempseys.

As smoke steamed from the charcoal grill outside of the alley, patient onlookers stood in the summer heat and crowded along Union and Third. No one knew where or when the president would exit the restaurant, but they hoped for a quick glimpse.

DOJ_NMG_0037942

Across the street, Memphis native Mark Logan and wife Darline peeked around a black Secret Service GMC for three hours, just to see the president.

"I've been playing detective all day trying to see this man," Darline Logan said as she wiped sweat from her forehead. "His protection is insane and really hard to get around."

Streets around the restaurant -- Third, Second, Monroe and Union -- were blocked off by more than 50 police officers while Bush and Koizumi enjoyed their meal. Laura Bush, Lisa Marie Presley and Priscilla Presley joined the president, along with 60 other guests.

Decorating the middle of each table were two small flags -- one for America and one for Japan.

Percy Norris, who has worked at the restaurant for 36 years, was the only server to assist Bush and Koizumi. Dressed in his best black bow-tie, white serving uniform, and biggest smile, Norris brought the president all of his dishes -- including the first dessert ever served in the Rendezvous: apple cobbler and ice cream.

"I took a picture with him and everything," Norris said.

After his 45-minute meal, Bush made a quick exit underneath the white tarp connected to the restaurant.

Over on Third Street, Carter Wynn eagerly waited for Bush's exit. He held up a cardboard sign reading, "Don't forget Iraq, an Inconvenient truth," hoping Bush would get his message.

"Let's talk about the real issues, like war," Wynn said. "There is more important things than Graceland and restaurants. The troops need to come home."

Standing next to Wynn, the Logans cheered as the black motorcade drove by and Laura Bush waved from inside. "I don't care about the heat or anything," said Darline Carter. "That's the President of the United States.

Velvet Elvis Diplomacy (NYT)

Memphis

Among the newspaper headlines preserved in Elvis's trophy room in Graceland, hanging next to his size-12 white leather shoes and rhinestone-studded gold lamé suit, is this gem from Aug. 12, 1957: "Rock 'n' Roll Banned, 'Hate Elvis' Drive Launched By Iran To Save Its Youth."

Datelined Tehran, the story began: "Rock 'n' roll has been banned in Iran as a threat to civilization. 'This new canker can very easily destroy the roots of our 6,000 years' civilization,' police said, before launching a 'Hate Elvis' campaign."

Half a century ago, Elvis was considered a wiggly threat to Muslim civilization. But yesterday, the president brought the Japanese prime minister to Elvis's gloriously campy time capsule to thank the fanatical Elvis fan for helping push democracy in the Muslim world.

Junichiro Koizumi seemed to be in an ecstatic trance. Standing near the indoor waterfall in the Jungle Room with Priscilla, Lisa Marie, Laura and George looking on, basking in the avocado glow of a 70's shag rug that covered floor and ceiling, the 64-year-old Japanese leader did Thin Elvis air guitar and Fat Elvis karate chops.

He grabbed the King's outsized tinted gold-rimmed glasses and slipped them on, as the curator who had handled them with white gloves watched in alarm. And he gamely sang heavily accented bits of "Love Me Tender," "Can't Help Falling in Love With You," "Fools Rush In," "I Want You, I Need You, I Love You," and even let loose with "Glory, Glory, Hallelujah" until finally Priscilla Presley called out, "We need a karaoke machine!" He even cast Lisa Marie in the Ann-Margret role in his own fantasy "Viva Las Vegas," pulling her close to croon, "Hold me close, hold me tight."

"It's like a dream," bubbled Mr. Koizumi.

It was hard to remember anyone looking this happy in the gloomy cave of the Bush-Cheney administration, where more time is spent spanking allies than treating them.

Mr. Bush seemed out of his element. It's doubtful that W. had ever seen a round, mirrored, white fake-fur canopy bed before, much less an entire suit made of black faux fur. At one point, the president tried to cut off his overexcited guest from Tokyo, a city that loves its Elvis impersonator bars. But Mr. Koizumi would not be stopped.

Surrounded by monkey ceramics and ersatz cow skulls, W. tried to make a serious point about his road-trip summit, saying the visit was "a way of reminding us about the close friendship between our peoples."

In addition to being a respite from other bad news — getting disciplined by the Supreme Court on Gitmo and getting taunted again by Osama — the Graceland getaway was a triumph in personal diplomacy. That was the specialty of this president's father, who made a career of dragging befuddled world leaders off to baseball games, the Air and Space Museum, and sprints on his boat in Kennebunkport.

Poppy used such jaunts as a lubricant to diplomacy and an inducement to closer, chattier relationships. His less curious, less social son tends to think of personal diplomacy more in terms of rewards and punishments, just another way to give or withhold favors, depending on who is going along with his world view.

Yesterday's pilgrimage may have struck some as too kitschy, given that several youngsters in Memphis have been tragically shot by stray bullets recently. But at least goin' to Graceland was a rare display of expertise in the psychology of diplomacy, an area where this administration has been strangely tone-deaf. W. figured out what the Japanese leader was thinking, what he wanted and what mattered in his culture, and exploited it — unfortunately, waiting until Mr. Koizumi was almost out of office.

Bush officials went out of their way not to do this with Saddam when they failed to consider that he might be hyping his W.M.D. arsenal or toying with U.N. weapons inspectors as a chest-thumping exercise aimed at impressing other Arab leaders. The Bush team also repeatedly squandered chances to talk to the Iranians and the North Koreans, ignoring the ways in which the oddball leaders of those countries might be acting out of insecurity, envy, bluster, one-upsmanship and a desire to be respected — sort of how high school girls might behave if they had nukes.

With his small circle of pals and Iraq war defenders — Mr. Koizumi, Tony Blair and Silvio Berlusconi — drifting off the world stage, and with allies pulling back troops in Iraq, President Bush may soon be as isolated as Elvis was at the end. For the rest of his term and through history, W.'s Heartbreak Hotel is likely to be located in Baghdad.

Waiting For President, Prime Minister At Graceland Hot Work (COMMAPPEAL)

By Cindy Wolff

Memphis Commercial Appeal, July 1, 2006

They stood behind blue ribbon strung between metal barriers and watched their early morning vantage disappear behind six MATA buses and a firetruck.

"No, don't park there, move across the street," 62-year-old Douglas Hill said as a fire pumper rolled right in front of his sight line.

Hill and his wife, Gail, came from Cullman, Ala., about four hours away, to glimpse President Bush and his motorcade.

"We were closer to Jimmy Carter in Tuscumbia at that other thing," Hill told his wife.

The dark-suited, sunglass-wearing, never-grinning Secret Service didn't care if they were the spoilers of the early bird good spot.

They were there to protect the president, and that meant no one across the street from Graceland on Friday morning could get a clear view of the motorcade.

So the people picked up their string of dead-soldier pictures, their "We Support The President" signs, their "Bush Liar" signs, their whale costume and their Elvis outfits and shuffled down the street, actually closer than they were before.

About 250-300 people waited for the 30-second spectacle of the presidential motorcade as it roared down gritty Elvis Presley Boulevard into the gates of Graceland.

The spectators mostly wore shorts and flip-flops and poured bottled water on their heads because the Memphis morning was already hot. They fanned themselves and clustered under patches of shade.

About 10:15, motorcycles rumbled from the north down Elvis Presley like a swarm of hornets. Then came the big vehicles, the black ones zooming down the middle of the street. Even the hardcore protestors waved at the tinted windows.

Next were the dark sports utility vehicles, windows down, big guns poised.

"Whoa, did you see that?" one of the protestors said. "Was that an AK47?"

For the moment, commerce stopped at the souvenir stores. No one bought a pair of Elvis flip-flops for $14.99 or a throw blanket for $75. They ignored the oven mitt printed with the recipe for a peanut butter and banana sandwich.

Then they waited for nearly an hour for the tour of Graceland to finish.

Four protestors dressed in white, sequined, older-Elvis jumpsuits politely smiled for people who wanted to have their pictures taken with them.

They sang a version of "Don't Be Cruel" to protest Japan's whaling industry:

You know I won't be found,
Swimming in the deep blue sea,
The Japanese are coming 'round
They're going to harpoon me
Don't be cruel, to a whale that's true ...

Meanwhile, Andrea Barrach and her 11-year-old son, Daniel, slurped on cotton-candy flavored ice under a pavilion.

DOJ_NMG_0037944

Carl Rising-Moore from Crawford, Texas, who carried a flag of slain soldier Casey Sheehan, son of Cindy Sheehan, became the unofficial protest leader because he had the megaphone.

Someone gave him a list of things to chant, but mostly he'd just wing it, leaving a few quiet seconds while he came up with something else to shout.

"Drop Bush, not bombs."

"Iraq for Iraqis."

Even "Liar, liar, pants on fire."

He was especially proud of the "Hey, hey, ho, ho, shotgun Cheney's got to go" chant he created at an earlier protest.

"I don't think the city needs that type of thing, not today," said Jerry Robbins, 68, who wore a suit and tie to the event.

A few feet away, dressed in fatigues and a black beret, former Army specialist Allison DeVante of Memphis quietly held her sign, "Stop rape of military women in Iraq."

She said she was raped in 2002 by the officer in charge and it took two years for the military to investigate. She left the Army and they never told her what became of her rapist.

Nearby, three 18-year-old girls sang "God Bless America" quietly. They made signs supporting Bush because they didn't want him to see only protest signs. When he arrived, they chanted "USA! USA!"

The protesters stopped their "Hey, hey, ho, ho" and joined in.

For just a moment, their voices were united.

Koizumi Has Left The Building (WP)

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

It's well known that the current Japanese prime minister is a fan of -- and shares a birthday (Jan. 8) with -- Elvis Presley. But Junichiro Koizumi, as it turns out, has even more in common with the King. From news accounts, we learn the following eerie similarities:

? Elvis was a reclusive guy with a very public life. Koizumi is a reclusive guy with a very public life.

? Elvis wore his hair long and over his ears. Koizumi wears his hair long and over his ears.

? When Koizumi was in his thirties, he married a 21-year-old. When Elvis was in his thirties he married a 21-year-old. Both marriages ended in divorce.

? Koizumi has been known to do away with the Japanese Diet. Elvis did away with all diets.

Poll: Good News Fails To Boost Bush's Job Approval (TIME)

By Lisa Takeuchi Cullen

Time, July 1, 2006

In a new TIME survey, Americans say the President is performing poorly and that the country is increasingly on the wrong track

A spate of good news at home and abroad has so far failed to boost how Americans feel about President Bush's job performance. Bush's approval rating slipped to 35% in a TIME poll taken this week, down from 37% in March (and 53% in early 2005). Only 33% of Americans in the survey said they approved of Bush's handling of the situation in Iraq, vs. 35% in March, and 47% in March 2005. His management of the U.S. economy lost supporters, too, as 36% approved, compared with 39% three months earlier. Bush's handling of the war on terror saw a slight gain in support, from 44% to 45%.

Bush's poll numbers remain stuck in a rut despite several high-profile victories scored recently by the Bush Administration. Earlier this month, U.S. forces killed al-Qaeda leader Abu Mousab al-Zarqawi in an air raid in Iraq. Also this month, Karl Rove escaped indictment in the CIA leak investigation. And the Commerce Department reported today that the U.S. economy grew 5.6% in the first quarter of 2006, the fastest growth in more than two years.

But continued pessimism about the situation in Iraq and a broad sense of unease about America's direction may be undermining Bush's popularity. In the TIME survey, 66% said the country is on the wrong track, vs. 28% who said it's going in the right direction. Those numbers have worsened since March, when the poll recorded a 60% to 34% split. When asked whether the new Iraqi government will be able to build a stable and reasonably democratic society, 48% of those surveyed said no, while 39% remain optimistic.

Congress isn't faring much better.

Americans have grown more critical of the job Congress is doing, compared with three months ago. Only 31% approved, down sharply from 39% in March. Asked whether they would be more likely to vote for the Republican or Democratic candidate in the district where they live if the election were held today, 47% said Democrat and 35% said Republican, a two-point improvement for Democrats.

The TIME survey was conducted among 1,003 adult Americans on June 27-29.

Will The Berkeley Impeachment Resolution Catch On? (TIME)

By Laura A. Locke, Berkeley

Time, July 1, 2006

The former hotbed of campus activism wants to oust the President and Vice President. Pointless political gesture, or the sign of a trend?

Many people may scoff at the decision earlier this week by the Berkeley City Council to put a resolution on the Nov. 7 ballot calling for President Bush and Vice President Cheney to be impeached. After all, 74,000 voters of what is often referred to as The People's Republic of Berkeley can't legally oust the President and Vice President. But Berkeley Mayor Tom Bates thinks his city is simply ahead of its time, as it has often proved to be in the past.

"Things happen in Berkeley that are seen as being quirky," Bates tells TIME. "But what we know is, those ideas that percolate in Berkeley today end up being conventional wisdom in the rest of the country tomorrow." Berkeley, after all, was the first city to start curbside recycling, ban Styrofoam and desegregate its public schools without a court order. Berkeley also took the lead in calling for municipalities to divest from South Africa during the Apartheid era.

Indeed, while Berkeley may be the first city to put an impeachment resolution to its people, numerous city and town councils have already passed such resolutions, including San Francisco, Santa Cruz, and Chapel Hill, N.C. State legislatures in Vermont, California and Illinois all have impeachment resolutions pending. To help raise awareness of the issue, there will be a series of teach-ins across the country this summer and fall, and a new film, "How to Impeach a President," will be screened — all part of the burgeoning impeachment effort called "Constitution Summer," led by a non-partisan coalition of students from the country's top law schools and universities.

"The President and Vice President are trampling on the Constitution," Bates says, summing up the city's collective view of the current Administration. "They're spying on people without warrants. They're arresting people and holding them without the opportunity to a trial. They're participating in a war where they basically lied to the Congress."

Some observers, however, question whether $10,000 of taxpayer money should be spent on a purely symbolic gesture that often is nothing more than a way for local elected officials to curry favor with voters. "City officials in California have a history of taking positions on national issues that have nothing to do with the day-to-day operations of the local government," says Mark Baldassare, director of research at the Public Policy Institute, a non-partisan think tank.

Eugene Volokh, a UCLA constitutional law professor and popular legal blogger, dismisses Berkeley's move as a "man bites dog story." Berkeley's new ballot measure and the grassroots movement to impeach Bush is just a way for the far left to express its "visceral anger," he says; unlike previous calls for presidential impeachment, which involved "clear criminal violations," the call by Berkeley and other cities to impeach Bush is about opposition to "judgment calls dealing about very, very serious national security problems." But as a veteran of the sharply divided blogosphere, Volokh should know better than most that criminality is in the eye of the beholder — and Berkeley's exercise in urban overreaching could well have nationwide resonance.

Bush Appoints Bernanke Ally To Opening On The Fed's Board (WSJ)

By Henry J. Pulizzi

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush Friday nominated Columbia University Professor Frederic S. Mishkin to be a member of the Federal Reserve's Board of Governors, adding another expert on inflation targeting to the central bank's leadership.

If confirmed by the Senate, Mr. Mishkin will fill the seat vacated by Roger Ferguson, who resigned in April, and serve the remainder of a 14-year term expiring in January 2014.

Mr. Mishkin, currently the Alfred Lerner Professor of Banking and Financial Institutions at Columbia University's Graduate School of Business, has a well-established relationship with Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke. In 1999, the two men, along with two others, wrote a book on inflation targeting. That is likely to heighten speculation that the central bank may eventually embrace the strategy. Inflation targeting involves setting an explicit, numerical target for the inflation rate that the central bank tries to achieve.

"We like to joke that Ben Bernanke wrote the book on inflation targeting, but actually he co-wrote it with Frederic Mishkin," said Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. economist John Shin. Mr. Bernanke has supported an explicit inflation objective, an idea that former Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan feared would limit the central bank's flexibility.

DOJ_NMG_0037946

"It seems the White House favors the strategy, because the balance of power is shifting that way on the [Federal Open Market Committee], with perhaps a majority of Fed members favoring the strategy," Tony Crescenzi, chief bond-market strategist at Miller Tabak, said in a note to clients.

The White House has another vacancy to fill on the Fed board. Fed Governor Mark Olson resigned, effective Friday, to become chairman of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board.

Bernanke Ally Named For Seat On Fed Board (WP)

By Neil Irwin

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

Frederic Mishkin Supports 'Inflation Targeting'

President Bush yesterday nominated Frederic S. Mishkin, a leading proponent of the idea that central bankers should set explicit targets for controlling inflation, to the Federal Reserve Board of Governors.

Mishkin, an economist who headed the research department at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York in the 1990s, is a professor at Columbia University's business school. The appointment is subject to Senate confirmation.

Combined with the appointment of Ben S. Bernanke to chair the Fed this year, the nomination adds momentum to the cause of "inflation targeting," which would be a departure from the Fed's traditional, improvisational approach to setting monetary policy. Bernanke and Mishkin, with two co-authors, wrote the book on the practice ("Inflation Targeting," published in 1998 by Princeton University Press.)

"It's a good appointment," said Richard Yamarone, chief economist of Argus Research Corp. "He brings more knowledge of monetary policy and monetary economics to the table than anyone at the Fed. Bernanke is getting a big ally on inflation targeting."

By tradition, leaders of the nation's central bank analyze inflation and other risks to the economy and set interest rates at levels they think would best balance economic growth and low inflation. Members of the Federal Open Market Committee, the bank's policymaking body, have ideas of what inflation level is acceptable (some have spoken recently that price increases are getting worrisome), but every decision to change interest rates is based on the subjective view of Fed governors.

In the approach Mishkin and Bernanke have supported, the central bank would set a level of inflation it deems acceptable; deviations from that level would trigger predictable changes in interest rates.

Mishkin has argued that would make policy decisions plainer to the public and financial markets. Critics of the approach say policymakers need wide flexibility in setting monetary policy given the complicated set of risks the economy faces.

R. Glenn Hubbard, Bush's former economic adviser, is a longtime friend of Mishkin's and his boss as dean of the Columbia business school. He played down the likelihood that Mishkin's appointment will contribute to a change in how the Fed works.

"I don't think this necessarily means there's a greater bias toward talking about inflation targeting," Hubbard said in a telephone interview yesterday. "I think that there will be a general discussion. There's some disagreement on the board. That's an intellectual discussion, and Rick will contribute to that discussion."

Hubbard said Mishkin's style will be good for the Fed. "He delivers both praise and criticism with a great deal of wit and will contribute mightily to the discussion," Hubbard said. "I think he will add to a climate of consensus-building and persuasion."

Mishkin, if confirmed, would fill a seat vacated by Roger W. Ferguson Jr., a Fed governor who resigned in April. The term expires in 2014. Bush has another slot on the board to fill after Mark W. Olson left the Fed yesterday.

Wall Street Shook Often In Volatile 2nd Quarter (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

No Consensus in Analyst Opinions for Coming Months

NEW YORK, June 30 -- Volatility ruled the stock markets in the quarter that ended Friday, and analysts agreed investors should be prepared for continued turbulence.

After streaking to five- and six-year highs in early May, all major U.S. stock market indexes and most foreign stocks plunged sharply in late May and June. The culprits: concern that inflation may be picking up, 60 central banks around the world raising interest rates, and worries that the U.S. and global economies may be slowing.

"It was like the tale of two markets. The beginning of the second quarter felt like the continuation of the best of times. Then suddenly the revolution broke out, and things haven't been so good since," said Jack Caffrey, equity strategist for J.P. Morgan Private Bank.

As a result, the markets experienced what analysts are terming "risk readjustment" on a global scale as many investors fled such speculative investments as commodities, emerging markets and small company stocks, and put increasing amounts of money into safer bets, including bank accounts, blue-chip stocks and U.S. Treasury bonds.

The markets "recognized that the world is a more uncertain place than they thought it was in the first quarter," said Jerry Webman, chief economist for OppenheimerFunds Inc. "That meant asset prices had to go down."

The major U.S. market indexes -- the Dow Jones industrial average, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index and the Nasdaq composite -- each fell between 7 percent and 11 percent between May 8 and mid-June before recovering slightly at the end of the quarter. Two of three -- but not the Nasdaq -- are now up for the year. The Dow is up 4.04 percent, while the S&P 500 is up 1.51 percent.

The MSCI emerging markets index, which measures stock markets in the developing world, fell even further, dropping nearly 20 percent from its May 8 peak.

The second quarter also stood out for its frequent shifts. In some weeks, U.S. markets seemed to change direction almost daily based on the latest economic data or a fresh comment from the Federal Reserve's new chairman, Ben S. Bernanke. According to one commonly used measure, volatility almost doubled in the quarter and is now at a five-year high.

The change was all the more startling because it followed a three-year bull market that was distinguished by historically low volatility, but most analysts believe that investors should expect more ups and downs.

"The mood changes very quickly and often goes to extremes on Wall Street," said Alan Skrainka, chief market strategist for the brokerage firm Edward Jones. "The stock market is always a roller coaster."

U.S. analysts disagree sharply about what the next six months will bring, although most expect the Federal Reserve to raise interest rates at least one more time, to 5.5 percent. Some predict even further tightening if the Fed continues to detect signs of inflation.

Morgan Stanley's Global Wealth Management Group is predicting that the S&P 500 will end the year at 1400, which would require nearly a 10 percent rise in the second half. This could happen if there were strong corporate earnings and labor costs and inflation remain under control, said David Darst, chief investment strategist.

Charles Schwab & Co. sees storm clouds on the horizon, and is encouraging investors to go heavy on cash and reduce investment in equities. "We are not all that optimistic. I don't think this is over yet," said Liz Ann Sonders, Schwab's chief investment strategist. "The economy is in a bit of trouble."

Jeffrey Kleintop, chief investment strategist for PNC Advisors, split the difference and predicted a lackluster summer followed by a strong fall. "We need to get used to volatility again," he said. "Look at those pullbacks as an opportunity to get fully invested, but you don't have to do it right away."

No matter where they predict the overall market is headed, the analysts agreed that a seismic shift is underway. Small-company and emerging-market stocks have had a fantastic three-year run that is probably slowing down. Most analysts now expect large companies with strong balance sheets and stable earnings to have their day.

"In my view, we had come too far too fast" in the riskier asset classes, said Dennis Shea, chief investment officer for equities at Morgan Stanley Investment Management. "We're seeing a shift back to value, big caps and pretty steady dividend payers."

According to Standard & Poor's, large companies classified as "value" stocks -- because they are relatively cheap and not expected to grow quickly -- lost about 3 percent of their value in the second quarter compared with a 4 percent loss for the S&P 500 overall and a 5.5 percent loss for growth stocks. Stocks in companies dependent on discretionary consumer spending, such as home builders and consumer electronics makers, were among the quarter's biggest losers.

Going forward, several market analysts recommended sectors that tend to do well even in times of slowing growth, such as consumer staples and health care, as well as a few sectors that look cheap because they have already taken heavy losses, such as technology.

Most agreed that small investors should stay out of commodities and emerging-markets stocks at least for a while because they will probably fall further before they recover. "We would not be shocked if there was a bit more profit-taking," Caffrey said.

U.S. Stocks Fall, Trimming Biggest Weekly Gain Since January (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, July 1, 2006

June 30 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. stocks trimmed the biggest weekly advance since January as technology companies widened their examination of stock-option grants, hurting their shares.

Apple Computer Inc. and Computer Sciences Corp. led the retreat as they started investigations. General Motors Corp. rose, helping limit the market's loss, after Kirk Kerkorian's Tracinda Corp. urged the automaker to partner with Nissan Motor Co. and Renault SA.

The market rebounded this week from three weeks of losses as Federal Reserve policy makers, who raised interest rates for the 17th straight time, said in a statement that the economy is ``moderating from its quite strong pace'' earlier in the year.

``The market likes certainty, and that's what you're getting right now with the Fed softening their position,'' said Dan Whitney, a senior trader at Fifth Third Asset Management in Cincinnati, which manages $21.5 billion.

The Standard & Poor's 500 Index climbed 2.1 percent this week, the largest weekly advance since the period ended Jan. 6. Today, the index slipped 2.67, or 0.2 percent, to 1270.20.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average today fell 40.58, or 0.4 percent, to 11,150.22. It rose 1.5 percent this week.

The Nasdaq Composite Index slipped 2.29, or 0.1 percent, to 2172.09, trimming its weekly gain to 2.4 percent.

Stocks were held back today by reports that showed conflicting signals on inflation. The Fed said that it would make future decisions on rates based on economic data.

The market drifted before a four-day weekend for many investors. U.S. markets will close three hours early on July 3 and shut down the next day in observance of Independence Day.

Russell Rebalancing

Trading surged as the Russell Investment Group conducted its annual rebalancing of its benchmark U.S. indexes. Funds with $3.8 trillion in assets use the indexes to measure performance, according to Russell, based in Tacoma, Washington.

This week's rally trimmed the S&P 500 loss for the second quarter to 1.9 percent. The decline was the index's first since the period ended in March 2005. The Dow average added 0.4 percent since March 31 for its fourth straight quarterly advance. The Nasdaq Composite slid 7.2 percent, its biggest drop since the first quarter of 2005.

The S&P 500 posted its biggest rally since October 2003 yesterday after central bank policy makers said in a statement that the economy is ``moderating from its quite strong pace earlier this year.''

Technology Slide

A group of computer-related stocks slid 1 percent for the worst performance among 10 groups in the S&P 500. At least 60 companies have disclosed investigations into options grants, including Apple, which slid $1.70 to $57.27 after starting an internal investigation into stock option grants made between 1997 and 2001.

One grant being reviewed was made to Chief Executive Officer Steve Jobs. The grant to Jobs was canceled and didn't result in a financial gain, Apple said. Backdating options to coincide with a low stock price creates a built-in profit for executives who receive them.

Computer Sciences, a defense contractor that specializes in information systems, plunged $7.32, or 13 percent, to $48.56 for the biggest decline in the S&P 500. The company said it received an informal inquiry from the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission related to option grants, and also said it wouldn't put itself up for sale.

CA Inc. slipped 22 cents to $20.55. The world's No. 2 seller of mainframe computer software delayed its annual report to review stock-option grants and said it may restate results going back to 1997.

GM

GM surged $2.35, or 8.6 percent, to $29.79 for the biggest rise in the Dow average today. Kerkorian's Tracinda, which holds 56 million GM shares, said in a letter to GM Chief Executive Officer Rick Wagoner that a partnership with Nissan and Renault would ``strengthen the competitive positions of all three companies.'' Renault owns a 44 percent stake in Nissan.

GM said it would consider the proposal, and Nissan and Renault said they were open to expanding their alliance if GM's board approves.

Ford Motor Co., the second-largest U.S. automaker, climbed 53 cents to $6.93.

`Economic Numbers'

DOJ_NMG_0037949

A report today showed that the Fed's preferred inflation measure, a price gauge tied to consumer spending, matched economists' average forecast for May. A private survey of manufacturers in the Chicago area showed prices paid for raw materials surged to the highest since 1988.

Today's consumer spending report showed prices excluding food and fuel rose 0.2 percent last month and consumer spending added 0.4 percent. Both figures matched the average estimate of economists in a Bloomberg News survey. The increase in spending was the smallest in three months.

The National Association of Purchasing Management-Chicago said its index of prices paid for raw materials rose to 89 in June from 76.9.

``We have to take the Fed at its word that it is indeed keeping its eye on new economic numbers as they come in," said Bryant Evans, who helps manage $450 million at Cozad Asset Management in Champaign, Illinois. ``We certainly don't know for sure" that the Fed is pausing.

The final reading for the University of Michigan's June index of consumer sentiment showed the first increase in three months, to 84.9 from 79.1 in May. Economists expected a reading of 82.5, according to a Bloomberg survey.

About 11 stocks advanced for every six that declined on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 2.38 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, about 38 percent more than the three-month daily average.

EMC

EMC Corp. slid 28 cents to $10.97. The company will pay $28 a share for RSA Security Inc., a maker of identity tokens and software. That's 22 percent more than yesterday's closing price and 45 percent more than the close the day before. RSA is an ``overpriced acquisition," First Albany analyst Hugh Mai wrote in note to clients. Shares of RSA climbed $4.22 to $27.10.

Research In Motion Ltd., a Palm competitor which makes the BlackBerry e-mail device, climbed $3.79 to $69.77 after forecasting second-quarter earnings, excluding stock-options costs, will be 69 cents to 75 cents a share. The projection compares with an estimate of 69 cents from Bear Stearns Cos. analyst Andrew Neff.

Commodities Gain

A gauge of raw-material producers climbed 0.5 percent today, extending its weekly advance to 3.5 percent, the second-biggest among 10 industry groups. The Fed's comments yesterday eased concern that higher interest rates would crimp demand for commodities.

Alcoa Inc., the world's biggest aluminum maker, added 46 cents to $32.36. Newmont Mining Corp., the world's second-largest gold producer, gained 74 cents to $52.93.

Copper prices jumped 6.5 percent this week in New York, ending a one-month slide, on indications demand won't slump in the U.S. gold futures for August delivery rose 4.6 percent, the most since Sept. 14, 2001.

Fed Raises Rates, But Scales Back Talk Of Inflation (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 29 — The Federal Reserve raised interest rates for the 17th consecutive time on Thursday, but kicked off a powerful celebration in the stock market by lowering its alarms about inflation.

As expected, the central bank raised its crucial lending rate another quarter-point, to 5.25 percent, and left itself room to raise it again before stopping. But for the first time since it began lifting rates two years ago, the Fed stopped short of signaling that further interest rate increases were all but certain.

In what traders described as a huge "relief rally," the Dow Jones industrial average surged 217 points, or 2 percent, in its biggest one-day jump in three years. Other stock and bond market indicators also rose, as interest rates on long-term bonds edged down. The dollar fell against major currencies, with foreign investors reducing their calibrations for interest rates in the United States.

The turnaround on Wall Street was the latest example of heightened volatility in financial markets and heightened uncertainty about Fed policy under its rookie chairman, Ben S. Bernanke.

Investors are looking for signs that Mr. Bernanke, like the veteran Alan Greenspan who preceded him at the Fed, can manage a tricky transition, achieving a "soft landing" from a period of strong economic growth and rising inflation to an era when underlying inflation slows without throwing the economy into a tailspin.

DOJ_NMG_0037950

"The central bank is caught in the middle," said Allen Sinai, chief economist at Decision Economics. The Fed is trying to maintain "a cautious tiptoeing between a moderating economy and elevated core inflation."

The Fed has stumbled along the way, said Robert J. Barbera, chief economist at Hoenig, the research unit of the investment bank ITG, but Mr. Bernanke now appears to have regained his balance.

"This gets him back to Square 1," Mr. Barbera said. "What it takes away is the notion that they're hellbent to squeeze the economy because of an obvious inflation problem. That's not a fair characterization of the economy, and it's not a sensible Fed response."

In late April, Mr. Bernanke rattled bond markets with statements that struck many as being too soft about a general rise in prices, excluding food and energy, known as "core" inflation. Over the last month, Mr. Bernanke and other Fed officials sent markets tumbling as they sought to signal tougher action.

Describing recent price trends as "unwelcome," "unacceptable" and "a warning flag," Fed officials prompted some investors to speculate that the overnight interest rates the Fed uses as its guidepost might climb as high as 6 percent.

In its statement on Thursday, the Fed adopted a more nuanced view. It said that recent price trends had been "elevated" and that "inflation pressures remain." But it also acknowledged that growth appeared to be slowing, which in turn should ease inflation.

"Recent indicators suggest that economic growth is moderating from its quite strong pace," the Fed's policy-making committee said. It said the slowing growth stemmed from a "gradual cooling" of the housing market, the lagged effects of previous interest rate increases and higher energy prices.

What galvanized investors was a change in the Fed's language suggesting that additional rate increases may no longer be needed. Instead, it spoke hypothetically about what it would do if increases were still necessary.

"The extent and timing of any additional firming that may be needed to address risks will depend on the evolution of the outlook for inflation and economic growth," the central bank said. In May, by contrast, it flatly declared that "some additional firming may be necessary."

Mr. Bernanke and his colleagues left themselves ample wiggle room to raise rates at their next policy meeting in August. But their tone was less urgent. Instead of warning that inflation posed a powerful threat, they suggested that the job of preventing inflation from accelerating may not be quite finished.

"People were expecting something very consistent with the hawkish rhetoric we had heard earlier," said Richard Berner, a senior economist at Morgan Stanley. The markets "were pricing in a more hawkish statement."

Inflation has crept up in the last six months, in part because of the spike in energy prices but also because of increases in housing prices.

The Fed's preferred measure of underlying price trends is core inflation, excluding the volatile prices for food and energy, as calculated in the government's estimates of the gross domestic product. By that measure, prices have climbed about 2.4 percent over the last 12 months.

Mr. Bernanke, an advocate of setting explicit inflation targets, has said he would like to keep inflation at 1 to 2 percent a year.

At the same time, the economy seems to have slowed significantly from the torrid growth rate during the first three months of this year.

On Thursday, the government released its final estimate of growth in the first quarter, elevating growth from an annual pace of 5.3 percent to 5.6 percent, far above the pace that most economists consider sustainable without rising inflation.

But many forecasters contend that growth has slowed to something closer to 3 percent in the second quarter and will remain near that level for the rest of the year.

Job creation has slowed sharply in the last three months, to an average of about 125,000 jobs a month from an average of over 160,000 during 2005, and sank to only 75,000 additional jobs in May.

Though housing starts have bumped up and down in recent months, inventories of unsold homes have swelled and sales prices are climbing far more slowly. Construction employment fell sharply last month, and there are signs that consumer spending has slowed as a result of high gasoline prices and fewer cash-out home refinancings.

By some measures, short-term interest rates are back in line with historical norms after being cut to extraordinary lows from 2001 to 2004. At 5.25 percent, the federal funds rate on overnight loans between banks is almost 3 percentage points above the central bank's preferred measure of core inflation. Two years ago, it was only 1 percent and below the core inflation rate.

Richard Yamarone, chief economist at Argus Research, said the fed funds rate has on average been about 2.33 percentage points higher than core inflation since 1987.

DOJ_NMG_0037951

But Fed officials face multiple quandaries. On the one hand, inflation is still slightly above Mr. Bernanke's "comfort zone" and many Fed officials are convinced that it would be far more difficult to combat higher inflation expectations than it would be to correct a slowdown if they push interest rates too high.

But some analysts predict that the combination of higher energy prices and higher interest rates has already set the stage for a slowdown that could be deeper than the soft landing that policy makers are seeking.

David Rosenberg, chief economist at Merrill Lynch, recently estimated that the chances of a recession later this year were about 40 percent. Most analysts are far more sanguine, though many predict that the growth will slow and unemployment will edge up from its currently low level of 4.7 percent.

In a sign that Fed policy is beginning to pinch, the National Association of Manufacturers pleaded for the central bank to stop raising rates.

"Evidence of a slowing economy is widespread," said David Huether, the trade association's chief economist. "With manufacturing already facing higher costs at home compared to our major competitors abroad, today's news of higher interest rates will only further burden U.S. industry."

The uncertainties mean that the opportunities for a mistake on policy are higher than they have been for several years.

"Last year a monkey could have run monetary policy," said Ethan Harris, chief United States economist at Lehman Brothers. "What did you have to do? You just had to push the 25 basis points button. Now, just in time for Bernanke to take over, the serious decisions have to be made. How much do you put the brakes on?"

U.S. Economy: Spending Rises, Inflation Is Unchanged (BLOOM)

By Carlos Torres

Bloomberg, June 30, 2006

June 30 (Bloomberg) -- Consumer spending in the U.S. rose in May by the least in three months, and a measure of inflation watched by the Federal Reserve was unchanged, a day after policy makers hinted at a pause in their interest-rate increases.

Spending increased 0.4 percent after a gain of 0.7 percent in April, the Commerce Department said today in Washington. The personal consumption expenditure deflator, excluding food and energy, rose 2.1 percent from a year ago, the same pace as the previous month.

The absence of a pick-up in inflation pushed the dollar lower and spurred a rebound in Treasury notes. While the price gauge is still above Chairman Ben S. Bernanke's preferred range, the fact that it didn't accelerate reassured investors that inflation isn't spinning out of control.

``Given what the Fed said in their fairly dovish statement, they would have lost all credibility if they were wrong," said Gerald Lucas, chief Treasury strategist at Banc of America Securities LLC in New York. ``If the data was bad today, the market would have found it hard to forgive the Fed."

Banc of America still expects the Fed, which nudged its benchmark rate up a quarter-point yesterday to 5.25 percent, will lift its rate to 5.75 percent by year-end.

Today's report also showed incomes rose 0.4 percent, more than expected, after a 0.7 percent increase that was larger than the government reported last month. The May rise reflected a jump in proprietors' income, while wages were unchanged.

Americans were also more optimistic in June as gasoline prices declined, the University of Michigan reported today, the first increase in confidence in three months. The university's final index of consumer sentiment climbed to 84.9 from 79.1 in May. A separate index of inflation expectations retreated.

`Lot More Data'

The price gauge tied to spending patterns and excluding food and energy costs, the personal consumption expenditure core deflator, rose 0.2 percent in May for a second month.

``These numbers are in line with expectations, lending evidence to the argument that the Fed should pause now," said Gina Martin, an economist at Wachovia Corp. in Charlotte, North Carolina. ``That said, there are a lot more data between now and the Fed's August decision."

After today's report, traders saw a 59 percent chance of a quarter-point rate increase in August, based on the price of futures tied to the fed funds rate on the Chicago Board of Trade. That compares with 65 percent after yesterday's Fed statement and 83 percent two days ago.

Bernanke's Emphasis

Earlier this month, Bernanke highlighted the three- and six-month trends in core inflation and called them ``unwelcome developments."

DOJ_NMG_0037952

The core rate was up at an annual rate of 2.9 percent over the last three months, matching the year-over-year rise in April 2004 as the biggest in a decade, according to Bloomberg News calculations. Bernanke is among policy makers who have said a rate of 1 percent to 2 percent is acceptable.

Raw-material prices are still a concern among businesses in the Chicago region, a report today from the National Association of Purchasing Management-Chicago showed. A reading of prices paid by companies rose to 89, the highest since 1988.

The U.S. savings rate fell to minus 1.7 percent, from minus 1.6 percent in April. A negative rate suggests consumers are dipping into savings to maintain spending.

Economists forecast spending would rise 0.4 percent, after a previously reported 0.6 percent April increase, according to the median of 68 estimates in a Bloomberg News survey. Incomes were forecast to rise 0.2 percent.

Disposable Income

Disposable income, or the money left over after taxes, increased 0.3 percent following a 0.6 percent rise the previous month and were up 4.7 percent in the last 12 months.

Taking into account changes in prices, spending rose 0.1 percent last month after a 0.2 percent rise in April.

Inflation-adjusted spending on durable goods, such as autos, furniture, and other long-lasting items, fell 0.6 percent after rising 0.3 percent. Purchases of non-durable goods dropped 0.1 percent after rising 0.4 percent. Spending on services, which account for almost 60 percent of all outlays, increased 0.3 percent after rising 0.1 percent.

Near-record gasoline prices and higher interest rates have sapped Americans' buying power this quarter. A gallon of regular gasoline at the pump cost an average $2.84 this quarter, compared with $2.34 in the first three months of the year, according to figures from the American Automobile Association.

The average rate on a 30-year fixed-rate mortgage this week rose to 6.78 percent, the highest since May 2002, according to Freddie Mac, the second-biggest buyer of U.S. mortgages.

Process of Cooling

The Fed yesterday acknowledged the economy was in the process of moderating as housing cools and interest rates and energy prices rise. The slowing of growth ``should help to limit inflation pressures over time," the central bankers said in announcing the rate increase. That may give then an opportunity to stop increasing rates, said Joseph LaVorgna, chief U.S. fixed income economist at Deutsche Bank Securities in New York.

``Policy makers gave themselves some wiggle room by not committing to another move in August," when they next meet, LaVorgna said in a report to clients yesterday.

Consumer spending last quarter rose at an annual rate of 5.1 percent, the most in more than two years, according to revised Commerce Department figures issued yesterday.

The spending gain will be cut by about half this quarter, to 2.5 percent, as Americans respond to higher gasoline prices by buying fewer automobiles and by scrimping on non-essentials like vacations, meals at restaurants and the latest fashions, according to the median estimate of economists surveyed earlier this month. Spending rose at an average 3.8 percent pace a quarter in the last decade.

Energy Costs

``As fuel prices have ticked up this year, there is some sense that there is a little bit of softness in the retail category," David Brandon, chief executive officer of Domino's Pizza Inc., the second-largest U.S. pizza chain, said in a June 19 interview. ``The consumer is probably a little bit more conservative today than they were a year ago."

Part of the reason the economy will not buckle as spending slows is that consumer confidence is stabilizing as the price of gasoline plateaus, economists said. The Conference Board's confidence index rose to 105.7 in June from May's three-month low of 104.7, the New York research group said this week.

``If energy costs remain stable, the growth rate of consumer spending should pick up," said Stephen Stanley, chief economist at RBS Greenwich Capital in Greenwich, Connecticut, before the report.

Consumer Spending Slowed In May (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

Filed at 7:50 p.m. ET

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Consumer spending slowed sharply in May as rising gasoline prices left Americans with less cash for other items, the government reported Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0037953

The Commerce Department said that spending rose by just 0.4 percent last month after a 0.7 percent gain in April. Income growth also slowed to an advance of just 0.4 percent last month, reflecting weaker job growth.

The report on personal incomes and consumer spending provided further evidence that the economy slowed sharply in the spring as Americans were battered by rising gasoline prices, higher interest rates and a cooling housing market.

In a second report, the University of Michigan said that its index of consumer sentiment rebounded a bit in June, rising to 84.9. While that was up from 79.1 in May, it still was well below the reading of 96.0 in June 2005.

The government reported Thursday that the overall economy raced ahead at an annual rate of 5.6 percent in the January-March quarter, the fastest pace in 2 1/2 years. Analysts believe growth has slowed to just half that amount in the current April-June quarter reflecting a sharp slowdown in consumer spending, which accounts for two-thirds of total economic activity.

Inflation, as measured by a price gauge tied to consumer spending, rose by 0.4 percent in May and was up 0.2 percent when energy and food prices are excluded. This measure of core inflation is up 2.1 percent when compared to May 2005, slightly above the Fed's upper bounds for core inflation of 2 percent.

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke sent stocks plunging in early June when he cited an increase in core inflation as an "unwelcome" development, raising worries that the Fed was going to increase interest rates several more times to fight inflation.

The Fed did boost its federal funds rate on Thursday for a 17th time to 5.25 percent. Wall Street posted the biggest one-day gain in three years on the wording of the Fed statement, which indicated that future rate increases would be dependent on incoming data.

Stocks ended a turbulent quarter with a moderate decline on Friday with the Dow Jones industrial average falling 40.58 points to close at 11,150.22, one day after posting a 215-point gain.

Many analysts said the new inflation figure in Friday's spending report increased the odds that the Fed will increase rates at least one more time at the next meeting on Aug. 8.

"We are not going back to the bad old days with regard to inflation, but it has crept up and the Fed needs to keep a lid on inflation expectations," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at Global Insight, a private forecasting firm.

The 0.4 percent increase in consumer spending in May, which was in line with Wall Street expectations, was the slowest increase in three months. Excluding price increases, spending was up an even weaker 0.1 percent in May, down from a 0.2 percent rise in inflation-adjusted spending in April.

The difference in the actual spending and inflation-adjusted spending reflected the fact that consumers were having to pay more to fill up their gas tanks. Gasoline prices hit a high for this year of $2.95 per gallon in early May, according to the Lundberg Survey.

The 0.4 percent rise in incomes was down sharply from a 0.7 percent April gain, reflecting the fact that payroll growth slowed to just 75,000 new jobs in May, another sign that the economy is shifting to a lower gear.

After paying taxes, Americans saw their incomes go up by 0.3 percent, half of the 0.6 percent April gain. After adjusting for inflation, after-tax incomes did not rise at all in May, the third month of weakness in this area.

Americans' personal savings rate, the amount of saving left from disposable income, dipped to a negative 1.7 percent in May, down from a negative 1.6 percent in April. The savings rate has been negative for 12 consecutive months, meaning that Americans are dipping into savings or borrowing more to finance a spending level that is exceeding their after-tax incomes.

Shuttle Launch Carries Calculated Risk, NASA Chief Says (WP)

By Mike Schneider

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla., June 30 -- NASA chief Michael D. Griffin is taking a calculated gamble by going ahead with the launch of Discovery, overruling two top managers who fear that foam flying off the fuel tank might harm the space shuttle.

The world will soon know if his gamble pays off.

Discovery was set to blast off from Kennedy Space Center at 3:49 p.m. Saturday, the first launch of a space shuttle in almost a year and only the second since the Columbia disaster in 2003. Storm clouds forecast for the afternoon remained the chief obstacle to launch. The shuttle faced no technical problems a day before launch.

DOJ_NMG_0037954

"The vehicle is remarkably clean, certainly as clean as I've ever seen it," Griffin said Friday.

The seven astronauts said they are confident of his decision to go ahead, but hardly any astronaut ever publicly expresses fears before a launch.

"I believe we'll be as safe as we were on my other flights," said Steven W. Lindsey, Discovery's commander, who has flown on three previous shuttle missions. "I haven't really seen a decision made that I didn't agree with."

Faced with a 2010 deadline to finish building the international space station and end the shuttle program, Griffin wants to get the shuttles flying again and believes that a delay now would create schedule pressure toward the end of the decade.

He has acknowledged, though, that he would probably shut down the shuttle program if another vehicle is lost.

"We are playing the odds," Griffin said Friday. "What you pay us for as taxpayers is to understand those odds in great detail. . . . It's called risk management."

The board that investigated the Columbia accident faulted NASA three years ago for placing schedule concerns ahead of safety, squelching dissent and steamrolling over the concerns of engineers who had worried that foam from the huge external fuel tank had hit the shuttle during launch.

When Columbia was reentering Earth's atmosphere, fiery gases penetrated the wing where the foam had knocked a hole, causing the shuttle to disintegrate. All seven astronauts were killed.

Godspeed To Discovery (WT)

The Washington Times, July 1, 2006

Weather permitting, NASA plans to launch the space shuttle Discovery today from Cape Canaveral in what could be one of the shuttle program's final flights. Why? Because if anything goes wrong, which doesn't necessarily mean the loss of a third shuttle, NASA Administrator Michael Griffin will likely end the program.

Just recently, he said if "we lose another vehicle, I will tell you right now that I would be moving to figure out a way to shut the program down."

Even something as small as what occurred last summer, when the same foam debris that doomed Columbia in 2003 flaked off Discovery's outer hull requiring a mid-mission repair, anti-shuttle forces both within and from outside NASA will probably prevail in their long-running effort to move forward from the 1970s-era program.

In any case, it's doubtful that the shuttles will function well enough to complete the International Space Station, which could require as many as four flights a year, before the scheduled 2010 shutdown. Already two NASA chiefs have voiced their discomfort with today's scheduled launch, whereas NASA estimates it will take 17 more flights to finish the ISS. Should the shuttle fleet be grounded permanently, then so are the chances of ever completing the station, which might not be such a bad thing. Even Mr. Griffin has said "we don't know ... what the [station] will become." At a cost approaching $100 million -- in addition to the billions that will be spent sending further shuttle missions -- not knowing what the ISS will be used for is a pretty strong reason to just stop trying to build it.

Despite this, polls show that the public still approves of NASA's performance. A recent USA Today/Gallup poll found that 57 percent said the agency does a good or excellent job. That's a surprisingly high number, considering NASA hasn't done much to inspire the public's imagination in recent years, aside from unmanned missions to Mars and comets. What it seems to suggest, however, is that the public appreciates the risks involved with space flight and remains proud of NASA's legacy.

Unfortunately, the shuttle program has quickly become a blot on that legacy. We have always supported the continued presence of the United States in space, even if that presence was relegated to low-Earth orbit. But the years since the Apollo glory days has added a whole range of programs to NASA's limited resources; manned programs like pushing the human footprint further into space have been ignored, while those like the shuttle are underfunded. The hope is that once the shuttle is a museum piece, NASA can refocus its funding almost exclusively on fulfilling the president's Mars vision.

That said, Godspeed to the Discovery astronauts.

Deadline Change Called 'Unfair' (BRADV)

By Patrick Courreges, Acadiana Bureau

Baton Rouge Advocate, July 1, 2006

Parishes hit by Rita feel abandoned

President Bush's Thursday exclusion of Hurricane Rita-hit areas from a list of parishes receiving time extensions on full federal coverage of expenses for hurricane debris clearing may largely paralyze work on clearing debris in storm-shattered Cameron Parish, starting today.

U.S. Rep. Charles Boustany, R-Lafayette, who represents Cameron and other Rita-lashed parishes in Louisiana's 7th Congressional District, on Friday derided the decision as a "bean-counter approach" and a "slap in the face."

DOJ_NMG_0037955

Beginning today, parishes not on the list as eligible for the deadline extension sent out by the Bush administration will have to pay 10 percent of the cost of debris removal — a list that includes none of the parishes directly hit by Rita.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco has written a letter to the Bush administration asking for a reconsideration of the deadline decision, noting that many parishes deeply affected by Katrina and Rita were excluded.

Boustany said the rationale he was given by federal officials was that offering the extension to the Hurricane Katrina-hit parishes of Orleans, Plaquemines, St. Bernard, St. Tammany and Washington covered 96 percent of the need in the state.

"That's a nice ivory tower economics point of view, but it's a very unjust way of looking at it, in my opinion," he said. "I just don't understand the bean-counter approach to this and it really gets me angry when I think about it. We got a major slap in the face. To put it mildly, this is unacceptable."

Boustany said the Bush administration is placing an unfair burden on the parishes of southwest Louisiana by not extending the deadline, despite repeated arguments for the need to do so.

"I'm sick and tired of being blindsided and I'm not happy with the administration on this," Boustany said. "At least they could offer some explanation, if not a solution."

Tina Horn, parish administrator for Cameron, said the parish's share of the remaining work would be about $3 million if it has to pay 10 percent.

"We don't have it," she said Friday. "If something doesn't change by the close of business today, we'll probably be stopping."

Horn said that, in a normal year, the parish's operational budget is about $8 million.

She said she believes that the Federal Emergency Management Agency's Cameron field office hurt the area's case for receiving deadline extension.

"I believe the president got the wrong information from our field office," Horn said. "I just can't believe the president would let us down like this."

She said that the FEMA area field office had recently reported that cleanup was progressing on schedule, despite parish officials saying that was not true.

"I just think the guy in charge of our AFO didn't get out of the office and see the big picture," Horn said. "I don't know if he just wanted to go home or what. He certainly did Cameron Parish an injustice."

Dave Phillips, with the FEMA field office, spoke briefly about those allegations, noting that no one thinks the Cameron cleanup is on schedule and that the field office does not generate that kind of report, then referred questions to FEMA's press office.

A FEMA press office staffer on Friday took down questions about the matter during a telephone call and promised a response.

Horn said she had a list of public buildings in need of demolition in to FEMA three weeks after the storm hit on Sept. 24 but work has not yet begun and had only recently been contracted.

She said parish officials do not know yet what options they might have if the deadline decision is not reversed.

To the north of Cameron, Lake Charles Mayor Randy Roach said his city and Calcasieu Parish will feel the hit if the deadline is not extended.

He said Lake Charles' and Calcasieu's efforts at debris removal are far from complete, and have been bogged down by disputes with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and FEMA about what does and does not constitute storm damage.

"Debris is probably the biggest single item that affects our recovery," Roach said.

He too expressed the concern that FEMA may be underestimating the remaining problems in southwest Louisiana.

"I think that FEMA has looked at numbers that suggest we're a lot farther along than we are," Roach said.

He said the cutoff of full federal coverage, if upheld, will mean money needed to prepare for future storms will have to be used for cleaning up from Rita.

"We're disappointed because it's definitely going to be a significant cost to us," he said. "If it does this to us, from a financial standpoint, I can only imagine what it does for Cameron."

Clay Menard, secretary/treasurer of the Vermilion Parish Police Jury, said debris in Vermilion — which also took a heavy hit from Rita — has mostly been cleared, except for some debris blocking drainage canals.

He said he feels for Vermilion's neighbor to the west.

"I was completely amazed that Cameron Parish did not get an extension," Menard said. "It's no fault of their own."

Boustany said that federal government's response in helping the area has been inefficient and riddled with needless delays that have led parts of southwest Louisiana being unable to meet the deadlines.

DOJ_NMG_0037956

"There's been an interminable delay. Who's fault is that? I have to say the federal government bears some of the responsibility," Boustany said. "It's a system that has failed the people of southwest Louisiana and it's unfair. There's a basic injustice to it."

He said that the federal government offered 100-percent coverage for debris cleanup with no such time limits after 1992's Hurricane Andrew — which hit Florida and Louisiana — and 2001's terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center in New York.

"My bottom line is it's unacceptable for the administration to expect the parishes of southwest Louisiana to pay that," Boustany said.

Boustany said that, even if the decision is made to extend the federal debris cleanup deadlines for Rita parishes soon, the initial decision has created a delay in the efforts.

"This is not the way to respond to a problem like this," Boustany said.

Kerr-McGee Agrees To Negotiate With U.S. On Oil Royalties In Gulf (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 30 — The Kerr-McGee Corporation, under pressure from Congress, said on Friday that it would begin negotiations to settle a lawsuit that if it went to trial could deprive the government of as much as $60 billion in oil and gas royalties.

At issue are thousands of leases the government signed with companies seeking to drill in federal waters in the Gulf of Mexico. The leases include incentives that allow companies to avoid paying royalties to the government on much of what they initially produce.

Kerr-McGee sued the Interior Department in March to overturn a provision that requires companies to pay full royalties if oil prices climb above about $34 a barrel and natural gas prices rise above about $4 per thousand cubic feet.

Kerr-McGee is also one of several dozen companies that signed leases in which the government inadvertently failed to halt the incentives during times of high energy prices.

If those leases remain unchanged, the Bush administration estimates the companies would produce about $65 billion worth of oil and gas over the next five years without paying any royalties — a loss to the government that would total more than $7 billion.

If Kerr-McGee were to win its lawsuit, it would set a precedent that would affect thousands of leases owned by companies like Exxon Mobil, BP and Shell. Congressional auditors have estimated that the government could lose an additional $60 billion over 25 years.

Kerr-McGee, which is based in Oklahoma City, did not say it would drop its claims. But in a statement issued on Friday, the company said that it had agreed to "undertake efforts to mediate the disagreement" and that it would ask a court to postpone the trial preparations.

The abrupt retreat came one week after Kerr-McGee reached an agreement to be acquired by Anadarko Petroleum for $16.4 billion — a 40 percent premium over its stock price at the time.

It also came as Congress has stepped up pressure on oil companies to renegotiate their deals. On Thursday, the Senate Appropriations Committee, over objections by Republican leaders and the Bush administration, approved a measure that would prohibit companies that refused to pay full royalties from acquiring any additional federal oil and gas leases. The House passed an almost identical measure in May as part of the Interior Department's spending bill.

At a hearing of the energy subcommittee of the House Committee on Government Reform, executives from Chevron, Shell and ConocoPhillips said they were ready to renegotiate the erroneous contracts signed in 1998 and 1999. Exxon Mobil insisted that its contracts should be respected, but Kerr-McGee took the most militant stance by arguing that it was entitled to royalty-free gas and oil on all leases signed from 1996 to 2000.

House Lifts Offshore Drilling Ban (AP-Y2)

By H. Josef Hebert, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 1, 2006

Congress has taken a major step toward allowing oil and gas drilling in coastal waters that have been off limits for a quarter-century.

Still, a battle looms in the Senate over the issue. And the Bush administration's support for the legislation, which was approved Thursday by a 232-187 vote in the House, is lukewarm.

DOJ_NMG_0037957

The House bill would end an Outer Continental Shelf drilling moratorium that Congress has renewed every year since 1981. It covers 85 percent of the country's coastal waters — everywhere except the central and western Gulf of Mexico and some areas off Alaska.

Rep. Richard Pombo (news, bio, voting record), R-Calif., a leading proponent for lifting the ban, said he believes a majority of the Senate wants to open the protected waters to energy companies.

Asked about White House opposition to some parts of the bill, especially a provision that would give tens of billions of dollars to states that have drilling rigs off their coasts, Pombo said, "I dare them to veto this bill."

"They don't like us giving money back to the states. I think it's right," Pombo told reporters after the vote. Forty Democrats joined most Republicans in favor of ending the drilling moratorium.

In the Senate, the measure is likely to face a filibuster from Florida senators and possibly others from coastal states that fear offshore energy development could threaten multibillion-dollar tourist and recreation businesses if there were a spill.

The Senate is considering a limited measure that would open an area in the eastern Gulf of Mexico, known as Lease Area 181, that comes within 100 miles of Florida. It is not under the moratorium. Even that is unlikely to pass unless its sponsors get 60 votes to overcome a filibuster from the Floridians.

Sen. Pete Domenici (news, bio, voting record), R-N.M., chairman of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, said he would pursue efforts to open the Lease 181 Area. The committee's ranking Democrat, Sen. Jeff Bingaman (news, bio, voting record), also of New Mexico, criticized the House-passed bill, saying it would eventually create "a huge hole in our federal budget and undermine environmental protections on our lands and off our coasts."

Sen. Mary Landrieu (news, bio, voting record), D-La., said Friday that Senate GOP leaders and Domenici have agreed on a new revenue-sharing plan that would funnel 37.5 percent of future royalties from Area 181 development to the four energy producing Gulf states, and also open an additional 6.3 million acres south of Area 181.

But that proposal does not address the Florida senators' concerns and may generate new opposition to Domenici's bill from senators opposed to changing the royalty distribution formulas.

Domenici later said in a statement, "I've had a number of productive meetings with Sen. Landrieu. ... We've made progress ... but we're not there yet."

Still, the House vote was a huge victory for Pombo, two Louisiana lawmakers — Republican Bobby Jindal and Democrat Charlie Melancon — and Rep. John Peterson (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., who spearheaded the drive to lift the moratorium.

Only six weeks ago, a proposal by Peterson to open coastal waters to natural gas development fell 14 votes short.

This time, they included a provision that would allow states to keep the moratorium in place if they opposed drilling and changed the revenue sharing so that states' share of royalties would soar eventually as much as 75 percent.

The Gulf states where most U.S. offshore energy resources are being tapped, now get less than 5 percent of the royalties. For example, Louisiana's royalties would go from $32 million last year to a total of $8.6 billion over the next 10 years — and even higher after that.

The Interior Department estimated that the changes could cost the federal government as much as $69 billion in lost royalties over 15 years and "several hundred billion dollars" over 60 years.

The White House issued a statement saying it favors much of the bill but strongly opposes the changes in royalty revenue sharing, which it said "would have a long-term impact on the federal deficit."

The Interior Department estimates there are about 19 billion barrels of recoverable oil and 86 trillion cubic feet of natural gas beneath waters under drilling bans from New England to southern Alaska.

Supporters of the drilling moratorium argue there's four times that amount of oil and gas available in offshore waters open to energy companies, mainly in the central and western Gulf of Mexico and off parts of Alaska.

House Votes To Let Allies Buy Top U.S. Fighter (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

Sending Such Technology Abroad Raises Concerns

The House has recommended lifting a ban on international sales of the nation's most advanced fighter, the F-22 Raptor, a potential boon to Lockheed Martin Corp. if allies such as Japan begin buying the expensive plane to upgrade their air forces.

On a voice vote after an 11-minute debate, House members on June 20 tacked onto the defense appropriations bill an amendment repealing a nine-year-old prohibition on overseas sales of the plane.

DOJ_NMG_0037958

The ban was put in place to keep the Raptor's high-tech systems out of the hands of foreign governments. But with U.S. military orders for the jet lagging, members of Congress and some top staffers in the Air Force have become concerned that Bethesda-based Lockheed may shut down the plane's production line in coming years.

The $70 billion fighter program is one of Lockheed's largest, employing more than 4,500 workers in Georgia and Texas and bringing in hundreds of millions of dollars in annual revenue. The Pentagon has steadily lowered the number of F-22s it planned to purchase from the 750 it thought it needed to face off against the Soviet Union nearly 20 years ago down to 183. As with the older F-16 -- a fighter Lockheed continues to sustain through overseas sales -- foreign purchases could keep the Raptor in business.

The amendment allowing overseas sales was offered by Rep. Kay Granger (R-Tex.), whose district in Fort Worth includes a plant that makes the midsection of the aircraft, with a total of 2,640 jobs associated with the Raptor.

"I believe this provision of this bill is no longer necessary to safeguard our technology," Granger said on the floor of the House.

Lockheed executives and Air Force officials declined to comment.

Prospects of passage in the Senate, which will not take up its appropriations bill until next month, are unclear, though that chamber traditionally has been more tolerant of allowing international involvement in military programs.

Sen. John W. Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, appeared willing to support foreign sales of a modified version of the Raptor.

"My own advice is that we should consider manufacturing a model of that aircraft that would meet our requirements with regard to technology transfer, a model that would be foreign sales only," Warner said in an interview. "That aircraft, even if modified for foreign sales, would be a magnificent aircraft, believe me."

He noted that the military has had to make similar accommodations for foreign sales of other U.S. aircraft, including the F-16 and F-15.

Even if the ban is lifted, any overseas sales of the plane would have to be vetted by the Departments of Defense and State under the Arms Export Control Act.

Lockheed and some in the Air Force began making a case for overseas sales of the fighter early this year as the Pentagon lowered the number of planes it would buy to 183 to save $10 billion over the next few years. Until that point, Lockheed had expected to sell about 381 planes to the U.S. government. The reduction prompted Lockheed to say it would have to close the F-22 production line by 2011.

Any specific sale is likely to face concerns about the export of technology that is still considered sensitive. Congress has continued funding the plane, despite its increasing cost, in part because the Raptor's technology was considered worth sustaining. While Lockheed's other fighter jet, the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter, was developed to be exported, the Raptor wasn't.

The company has delivered 74 Raptors so far at a cost of $361 million each. The cost is about three times the original estimate, according to the Government Accountability Office. The planes are scheduled to be put into combat service early next year, following years of fine-tuning and training.

During the brief floor debate, the original author of the overseas sales ban, Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), said he was "significantly uncomfortable" with lifting it.

"I am certainly not convinced that we have reached the point where we ought to remove these restrictions," he said.

Selling the aircraft overseas also undermines one of the original justifications for the aircraft, skeptics say.

"The original justification for creating the F-22 was that we had already sold our most advanced fighter technology to so many countries that we needed a more advanced fighting capability. Now we're in that trap again by selling the F-22 abroad," said Jennifer Porter-Gore, spokeswoman for the Project on Government Oversight, a watchdog group. "This is when our national security interests collide with those of the defense industry."

Given its expense, the fighter may have a limited audience.

"This is an extremely high-performance fighter. Few air forces around the world are going to need it. Fewer will be able to afford it," said Gordon M. Adams, professor of the practice of international affairs at George Washington University.

Lockheed and the Air Force see a potential market among the United States' closest allies, including Japan, Australia and Britain, according to industry insiders and analysts. For example, Japan is expected to begin replacing soon its fleet of about 100 F-4s. Excluding development costs that the Pentagon paid early in the program, the price of the plane drops to between $150 million and $183 million, or even less for a stripped-down model, they said.

Foreign sales could also help defray some of the cost of the plane to the U.S. military and keep the production line going while the Air Force and Lockheed make their argument for more purchases to the next administration, said Loren Thompson, a consultant for Lockheed who also has close ties to the Air Force.

Congress Still Grappling With Pension Bill (AP-Y2)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 1, 2006

Congress falls short once again of achieving one of its prime goals: coming up with a bill to assure 44 million workers who depend on employer-based pension plans that they will get their promised retirement benefits.

House and Senate negotiators originally set Tax Day, April 15, as their target for finding a compromise. When it eluded them, the new deadline became Memorial Day, and then Independence Day.

But they left Friday on a weeklong Fourth of July recess still apart on two big issues:

_How to make companies that have fallen behind on payments to their pension plans make them up without driving them to terminate the plans or declare bankruptcy.

_Whether to single out financially struggling airlines for special treatment. The Senate wants to give them up to 20 years to get back to full funding of their pension plans; House negotiators don't.

"There's not much left to be resolved," Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, said Thursday after a House-Senate meeting. "The staff is going to work real hard over the Fourth of July break."

The two chambers passed their respective bills in late 2005, and talks on a compromise have dragged on since March.

At the prodding of House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., negotiators have been meeting almost daily in recent weeks. But progress has been incremental.

"Days and days and days of the same ditto," House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, a chief sponsor of the House bill, said as he emerged from one recent meeting.

Lynn Dudley, vice president of the American Benefits Council, which represents companies with pension plans, said her organization is not overly concerned by the missed deadlines.

"The truth of the matter is they've got to get this thing right. It's the bedrock of retirement security for millions of people," she said.

The toughest issue has been working out a definition of what is an "at risk" company that would be required by the bill to increase contributions to its pension plan.

Currently, company pension plans are underfunded by an estimated total of $450 billion. The Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. — the federal agency that insures private pension plans much like the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. insures bank accounts — estimates that $100 billion of that is with companies with serious funding problems.

The PBGC, which is self-funded from premiums, is itself burdened by a $22.8 billion deficit because it has had to take over the benefits obligations of companies that go bankrupt and terminate their plans.

Without a fix, many fear the whole defined benefit pension system could implode in a repeat of the late 1980s savings and loan crisis that ended up requiring a $130 billion taxpayer bailout.

The original Senate bill would have linked at risk status to a company's credit rating, an idea strongly opposed by General Motors and others in the auto industry with poor credit status.

Negotiators have since backed off this approach, but industry sources have expressed concern that other proposals also are overly harsh — such as defining plans that are less than 80 percent funded as at risk for default.

One sticking point is whether credit balances, extra contributions paid into a plan to cover future years, should be counted as an asset when determining a plan's financial viability.

Former Michigan Gov. John Engler, who is now president of the National Association of Manufacturers, said excessively tough rules could be counterproductive. "The cost goes up if somebody terminates a plan and then turns it back over to the pension board," he said.

With more companies phasing out defined benefit plans and switching to defined contribution programs such as 401(K) plans, the pension legislation also tries to establish rules for conflict-free investment advice and solidify multiemployer plans mutually sponsored by companies and labor unions.

It also seeks to give legal backing to cash balance plans, a variation of defined benefit plans that have been in legal limbo because of a judge's ruling that IBM Corp.'s plan discriminated against older workers.

Reimbursement Cuts Said Threat To Doctors (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0037960

By Kara Rowland, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, July 1, 2006

A slate of reimbursement cuts going into effect today for CareFirst BlueCross BlueShield providers has some Washington-area doctors threatening to limit new patients or drop out of the network.

The cuts also have prompted the Maryland State Medical Society (MedChi) to ask Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr. to investigate "monopolistic pricing practices" between the state's largest health insurer and its major rival, UnitedHealth Group, which together control 94 percent of the state health insurance market, according to R. Steven Orr, Maryland insurance commissioner.

In a letter dated May 1, CareFirst told providers it had lost several large accounts to competitors who reimbursed physicians at lower rates and therefore were able to offer lower premiums.

"We believe CareFirst or CareFirst BlueChoice members should not have to pay providers higher fees than those paid by members of other commercial health plans," wrote M. Bruce Edwards, a senior vice president for CareFirst.

The company is adjusting the fees it pays doctors for various "ancillary services" such as lab work and radiology, spokesman Jeff Valentine said. The changes range from a 12 percent increase in several areas to a 20 percent cut in others.

Dr. Stephen Rockower, a Rockville orthopedist and president of the Montgomery County Medical Society, decided on Thursday to drop out of the CareFirst network.

"I'm trying to run a business here. My rents go up, my employees demand salaries, my gas prices go up, my malpractice rates go up, but my reimbursement rates go down -- that's no way to run a business," he said. "If I'm losing money on each visit, seeing more patients doesn't help me."

Dr. Rockower, who has practiced medicine for 25 years and is in business with another doctor, said he lost two partners because of rising practice costs and flat or lower reimbursements. One relocated to another state while the other took early retirement.

"Ultimately, patients are going to be harmed when they can't find doctors or doctors leave the state or retire or go bankrupt," he said, adding that he has spoken with several colleagues who are considering leaving the network.

According to CareFirst spokesman Mike Sullivan, of 12,500 providers in the network, the number of doctors who have dropped out is in "the low single digits."

Kevin Enright, a spokesman for the attorney general's office, said the office has requested more information from both MedChi and CareFirst.

As a policy, the office does not confirm or deny whether an investigation is taking place, he said.

Both CareFirst and UnitedHealthcare have denied any collusion over physician payment rates. Mr. Valentine said CareFirst was not aware that UnitedHealthcare, which owns Rockville insurer Mid-Atlantic Medical Services Inc., had cut its rates until learning about it from MedChi.

"Any savings that are derived from these adjustments will go to benefit our members, either in the form of more moderate premiums or lower care costs and will not go to CareFirst's bottom line," he said.

But T. Michael Preston, executive director of MedChi, called the strategy of controlling health care costs by reducing physician payments a "dead end."

"There may be a certain business logic from [the insurance companies'] standpoint, but they're driving our delivery system into a ditch and the proof of that was announced last week," he said.

He referred to a National Academy of Sciences' Institute of Medicine report that said the nation's emergency departments do not have the necessary medical staff and equipment to meet demand.

Also in a report last week, the Center for Studying Health System Change, a Washington research group that studies health care trends, found that physician incomes fell an average of $13,000 -- after adjusting for inflation -- between 1995 and 2003 as a result of payment cuts by Medicare and private insurance providers. Meanwhile, overhead costs have climbed.

"If you're not making some profit on the services, you can't stay in the business," Mr. Preston said.

Fighting For Public Housing (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

Maryland Senator Battles to Save Federal Program Set to Expire

WASHINGTON -- The Federal Government's program to revitalize public housing is set to expire, and Sen. Barbara Mikulski, the Maryland Democrat who championed the effort in the early 1990s, is fighting an uphill battle to preserve it.

DOJ_NMG_0037961

After years of shrinking funding, the program, called Homeownership and Opportunity for People Everywhere, or Hope VI, will be phased out in September. Supporters fear it won't be extended. The Bush administration has said billions of dollars already are in the pipeline to complete dozens of development projects nationwide.

Sen. Mikulski sees it differently: "We need to support federal programs that help those who help themselves. The president talks about creating a better life for Americans, but his budget fails to deliver on his words."

Since 2003, the Bush administration has trimmed its budget request for Hope VI, but each year Congress has stepped in to continue funding, albeit at ever-lower levels. The $100 million allotted for the current fiscal year falls well below the $600 million annually envisioned by the program's founders when launching Hope VI.

Hope VI grew out of a congressional commission that advocated reducing poverty in inner cities by converting public-housing complexes into mixed-income communities. From 1992 to 2002, Congress allocated $5.7 billion to the program; $3 billion of that is designated to complete projects, but hasn't yet been spent.

"It's been a big shift for the administration to turn on" the Hope VI program, says Susan Popkin, leading researcher on the program at the Urban Institute, a Washington think tank. "Because it's generally regarded as a very successful program, it's really tweaks that are needed."

The Bush administration says Hope VI hasn't been very productive. From 1993-2005, 231 Hope VI grants were awarded, but only 54 development projects have been completed, says Donna White, spokeswoman for the Department of Housing and Urban Development. The administration says that record is due to local housing authorities' protracted struggles to relocate poor residents and leverage federal funds with local money.

"With the funding that's in the pipelines, the program is still going to assist families for years to come," Ms. White says. "The task at hand right now is to get the current projects completed."

Ms. Mikulski and a bipartisan group of senators -- Kit Bond (R., Mo.), Jack Reed (D., R.I.), Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) and New York Democrats Charles Schumer and Hillary Rodham Clinton -- are pushing for reauthorization. The bill, currently before the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, goes beyond the original legislation, calling for improvements in local schools and other services to attract residents. In the House, Rep. Christopher Shays (R., Conn.) has introduced a bill to extend the program without making such changes. Given White House opposition and a packed legislative calendar, extending the program this year faces long odds.

In Sen. Mikulski's hometown of Baltimore, Housing Commissioner Paul Graziano has overseen redevelopment of five sites with Hope VI funds. Mr. Graziano would like to overhaul more sites. "There is no model that I have heard from the administration or anyone that can address the comprehensive overhaul of public housing and community remodeling as the Hope VI program does," he says.

Soon after the Hope VI program began, public-housing authorities shifted how they use the federal funds, contributing to the backlog in projects. Instead of relying solely on federal dollars to raze old buildings and construct new ones, the Atlanta Housing Authority worked with the private sector, leveraging Hope VI grant money from HUD to replace a crumbling public-housing site with a mixed-income community. The project -- one-third public-housing units, one-third market-rate units and one-third single-family homes -- became the template.

The new community, Centennial Place, opened in 1996, with an elementary school, a YMCA, a bank and a child-care facility. By 2007, it will include restaurants, a grocery store and a dry cleaner. Overall, the Atlanta Housing Authority figures its Hope VI projects have parlayed $220 million in federal funds into $3 billion in new investment.

"Hope VI is the critical seed capital that allows public-housing authorities to leverage additional public- and private-sector investment," says Sunia Zaterman, director of the Council of Large Public Housing Authorities, based in Washington. "The result of this 'first money in' approach, combined with unprecedented regulatory flexibility, has allowed public-housing authorities to build partnerships with private developers and others."

The process, however, takes time. HUD officials point out that many local agencies take an average of four years to complete grants, are slow to hire developers and lack efficient relocation plans. Over the years, HUD has set schedules, essentially doling out money only after an agency meets certain development or construction milestones.

A particular challenge is looking out for the residents of housing to be renovated. HUD now requires housing agencies to assign case workers to track residents. They must also find housing for them during reconstruction or provide federal housing vouchers to help pay rent on apartments elsewhere.

"It takes forever for these things to get constructed," Ms. Popkin of the Urban Institute said. Former residents are "often very happy where they've relocated to or they encounter strict screening criteria to return." Still, she says, a 2004 study found that about 60,000 public-housing units across the country could benefit from Hope VI.

Another Ohio Tour: Bush In Columbus (CLPD/AP)

By Julie Carr Smyth, Associated Press

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, July 1, 2006

Columbus -- The state's political hit parade continued Friday with President Bush jetting into the Columbus area for a fund-raiser for U.S. Sen. Mike DeWine.

Adults and children were making signs to greet the president hours before his arrival in a suburban Columbus neighborhood Friday afternoon, and others stood in their driveways holding small American flags.

"It's obviously very exciting," said Don Ziliak, 41. "I don't think many people have the opportunity to ever see the president, let alone right across from your house."

Ziliak's 8-year-old daughter stood nearby, hoisting a red, white and blue sign that said, "We love the president." He said he agrees in principle with most of what Bush does, but wishes the president could do it with more consensus.

Ohioans are regularly treated to drop-in visits by the nation's political heavyweights, especially in the months leading up to competitive elections such as DeWine's re-election battle against U.S. Rep. Sherrod Brown.

Also up for grabs this year are the governor's mansion and a pair of U.S. House seats, races that have both Republicans and Democrats dispatching some of their biggest names to Ohio between now and Nov. 7.

Friday's private fund-raiser for DeWine is Bush's fifth visit to the state this year.

Vice President Dick Cheney was in Columbus before the May 2 primary to raise money for Republican State Rep. Chuck Blasdel.

Blasdel is running in the November election against Democrat State Sen. Charlie Wilson for the House seat U.S. Rep. Ted Strickland vacated to run for governor.

Democrats, meanwhile, have played host to a stream of party stars, including U.S. Sens. John Kerry, Joe Biden, John Edwards and Barack Obama, retired Army Gen. Wesley Clark, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean.

Schwarzenegger Campaign To Pay $202,200 Fine (LAT)

By Robert Salladay, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

The FPPC penalty stems from late disclosure of $25 million in donations to the governor's team in last year's special election.

SACRAMENTO — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's campaign has agreed to pay a $202,200 penalty for failing to properly report more than $25 million in campaign donations during the special election last year, the state Fair Political Practices Commission said Friday.

The penalty probably is the final chapter of Schwarzenegger's special election, in which voters rejected all of the governor's initiatives and handed him the biggest defeat of his political career.

Under California law, campaigns must publicly disclose donations they receive and money they spend — in some cases within 24 hours of the transaction. Disclosure is the bedrock of California's finance law, allowing the public to see the money behind political campaigns.

In documents released Friday, the commission found that Schwarzenegger's California Recovery Team, created to advance the governor's causes, failed to report in a timely way millions of dollars in donations that were used to buy TV advertising pushing four initiatives on the November ballot. It found 143 delinquent reports on $25.6 million in expenditures.

The complaint was filed by the Alliance for a Better California, a union-backed group that worked against the governor last year. Robin Swanson, a spokeswoman for the group, said Friday they were "happy that the FPPC is holding the governor and the California Recovery Team accountable."

The largest fine ever levied by the commission was $263,000 — against Lt. Gov. Cruz Bustamante — for violations during the gubernatorial recall election in 2003. Bustamante improperly moved $3.8 million between campaign committees.

In the Schwarzenegger case, the issue was whether the California Recovery Team was really acting as an "independent expenditure committee," which is governed by rules different from those of a "general purpose committee," which has less stringent disclosure requirements.

The governor was sued during the special election to force him to disclose the donations within 24 hours, but election day came and went before the courts decided the matter. Nevertheless, Schwarzenegger filed the proper forms as an independent expenditure committee — disclosing the donations in the weeks before the election.

DOJ_NMG_0037963

The fact that voters could see the contributions before the election was a mitigating factor in reducing the fine, the political practices commission said. The state agency could have fined the California Recovery Team $715,000. Investigators also said Schwarzenegger apparently didn't know that the reports weren't filed properly.

"This settlement resolves an honest dispute over compliance with a very complicated campaign finance law," said Tom Hiltachk, the governor's attorney. "I hope the commission will work toward simplification of these rules so the public benefits from better, faster and more frequent campaign disclosure."

Ned Wigglesworth, a campaign finance expert with TheRestOfUs.org, a Sacramento nonprofit, said voters "weren't walking into the ballot box blind," but for a time "they were deprived of some of the information they should have had" about the governor's donors.

The penalty is the latest legal entanglement for Schwarzenegger, who has broken all fundraising records for a California politician. Since 2002, he has raised more than $150 million for the recall election of 2003 and other causes. He is expected to collect $75 million more for his reelection effort this year.

In 2004, a Superior Court judge ordered Schwarzenegger to repay a $4.5 million loan he illegally used to finance his recall campaign. Last year, a committee supporting Proposition 77, the governor's redistricting overhaul, was forced to return $1.75 million to Schwarzenegger because it exceeded state limits.

Schwarzenegger Signs California Budget After Cutting $175 Million (LAT)

By Evan Halper, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

The spending plan is the first completed on time in six years. Criticism of his trimming was muted as Democrats got most of what they had sought.

SACRAMENTO — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed the state's first on-time budget in six years Friday, after using his veto power to scale back the expansion of environmental enforcement and healthcare programs approved by the Legislature earlier this week.

The $131-billion spending plan signed by the governor will use a surge of unanticipated revenue that filled California's coffers this year to pay back billions the state borrowed from schools in recent years as well as to accelerate repayment of other state debt.

The governor used his veto pencil to eliminate more than $175 million in spending that the Legislature had approved. He vetoed tens of millions of dollars from the budget that would have been used to reduce air pollution, expand hospital trauma care, provide interpreters to non-English speakers in civil court cases and make dental care available to more low-income children, among other services.

The vetoes drew a muted response, however. Most of the program expansions that Democrats had secured in the budget approved by the Legislature Tuesday night remained intact.

"This is a great budget," Schwarzenegger said just before signing the document at a ceremony under the Capitol dome. Schwarzenegger said he and legislative leaders were able to meet the deadline for passing a budget for the first time since 2000 because "we put politics aside."

"We were driven by one overwhelming desire: to do what is best for the people of California," he said.

The budget does not solve the state's financial problems. It relies on this year's $7.5-billion windfall — unanticipated tax revenue resulting from higher than expected capital gains, corporate profits and the hot housing market — to expand programs and close a shortfall that had been projected for the fiscal year that begins today.

But the state is still projected to spend more than it brings in over the coming years. Lawmakers expect a deficit of at least $3.3 billion for the fiscal year that begins in July of 2007.

On Friday, Democratic gubernatorial nominee Phil Angelides warned that Schwarzenegger would deal with that deficit as he has dealt with past deficits, "by cutting school funding, raising tuition and fees and cutting healthcare."

But Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles) had a different take.

He said the budget agreement shows "you can be fiscally conservative but at the same time be compassionate."

By the time the budget was signed, the Legislature had adjourned for a monthlong break. Some lawmakers will stick around to draft legislation in line with the four-part plan the governor presented this week to address prison overcrowding. Schwarzenegger called a special session of the Legislature to deal with that issue, which will resume when lawmakers return Aug. 7.

The Assembly has already approved at least two prison reform proposals: a bill that would authorize the state to borrow for the construction of new prisons and another that would move nonviolent women offenders into local detention centers where they could get drug treatment, education and help finding jobs. Both are pending in the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0037964

Harsher penalties for repeat drug offenders, championed by the governor, became law when he signed the budget Friday. The new law changes voter-approved Proposition 36 by taking away the option of avoiding jail from thousands of drug offenders who seek addiction treatment more than once.

Now judges will be able to incarcerate offenders up to five days if they relapse. Treatment advocates call the new penalties illegal and say they will sue to block them.

The governor scaled back the expansion of efforts to fight air pollution by $35 million. The money would have been used to update heavily polluting construction, farming and transportation equipment and to bolster enforcement of the state's clean air laws.

Regardless, environmentalists saw victory overall in the budget. They noted that it includes $50 million to replace decades-old school buses with clean-burning models, develop alternative fuels and promote zero-emissions cars and trucks.

"This budget certainly isn't bad," said Pete Price, an environmental lobbyist in Sacramento. "A lot of the environmental budget items were retained. I think generally you will find environmentalists not unhappy."

There was also little criticism from healthcare advocates. The governor eliminated $10 million that would have gone to fund trauma centers in hospitals, scaled back a proposal to fight West Nile virus by $6 million — or two-thirds of the proposed funding — and eliminated $2 million that would have been used to provide preventive dental care to low-income children.

The governor also vetoed $10 million that civil courts could have used to hire interpreters for non-English speakers.

EDITORIAL WRAP-UP:

Don't Know Much About History (NYT)

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

Somewhere between the firing in 2002 of President Bush's first Treasury secretary, Paul O'Neill, and the Senate confirmation this week of his third Treasury chief, Henry Paulson, the administration changed its tune on budget deficits. In the early days, the line was, essentially, that deficits don't matter. Mr. O'Neill's ouster was due in part to his gall in suggesting otherwise. Now, officials dutifully declaim that deficits matter, but that Bush-era shortfalls are "within historical norms."

Mr. Paulson apparently shares that view, having offered it repeatedly when asked about budget deficits during his confirmation hearing. That's a disappointment. It takes a narrow view of history to imply that the Bush-era deficits are "normal."

As a share of the economy, the Bush-era deficits have averaged 2.7 percent. That's the second worst record of any administration in the past 60 years, surpassed only by the deficits from the tenures of President Reagan and the first President Bush, which each averaged 4.3 percent. (Five years into the Clinton era, deficits averaged 1.2 percent of the economy, dropping to a mere 0.1 percent by the time Mr. Bush took over.) To imply that the current budget gap is comfortably within historical norms because it's not as bad as the worst deficits in modern memory is, to put it politely, a stretch.

Besides, size isn't everything when it comes to assessing the danger in budget deficits. Timing is also crucial.

The Reagan-era deficits occurred decades before the retirement of the baby boomers, when the post-World War II generation was in its peak earning — and taxpaying — years. The Bush deficits are uniquely alarming in that they're occurring on the eve of the baby boomers' retirement, leaving little time to recoup before the government has to meet large Medicare and Social Security obligations.

On top of that, and well outside the historical norm, is President Bush's insistence on continued tax cutting, despite the ongoing deficits and despite the fact that the economy has long since recovered from the last recession. From the end of World War II through the 1970's, various administrations hammered away at the nation's debt, reducing the burden from the wartime level of over 100 percent of the economy to about 25 percent. That effort was largely abandoned in the 1980's. But even Mr. Reagan backtracked on his budget-busting tax cuts of 1981 by raising taxes in 1982 and 1984. In 1990, a bipartisan deficit-reduction agreement raised taxes and cut spending, followed by another budget-tightening package passed by Democrats in 1993. In contrast, the Bush years have been marked by nonstop tax cutting, deepening debt, the abandonment of budget rules and increased spending, paid for by borrowing.

And not just any borrowing. The Bush-era deficits are also alarming in the extent to which they are foreign financed. Since 2001, 73 percent of new government borrowing has been from abroad. In total, 43 percent of the United States' publicly held debt of $4.8 trillion is in foreign hands, compared with only 14 percent at the peak of the Reagan deficits in 1983 and 30 percent in 2001. Debt owed to bankers in Beijing, Tokyo and elsewhere could destabilize the dollar and from there, drive up interest rates and prices.

If Mr. Paulson and other administration officials were to say that today's deficits were dangerous, it would logically follow to recommend scaling back the Bush tax cuts. By implying that the deficits are not so worrisome, they can continue to insist that spending cuts alone could fix the problem, even though that would mean deep cuts in Social Security and Medicare — something they are not willing to advocate explicitly. One can only hope that in discussions with his new boss, Mr. Paulson has more to say about the budget deficit than he let on during his confirmation hearing.

Passports For Health Care (WP)

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

A harmful new requirement that Medicaid recipients provide proof of citizenship

UNDER A NEW federal law that takes effect today, poor Americans will be required to produce proof of citizenship to be eligible for Medicaid. This may sound like a sensible safeguard against providing government-paid health benefits to illegal immigrants who fraudulently claim eligibility. It isn't. The new law and the unduly stringent rules that the Bush administration has produced to implement it are unnecessary, expensive and mean-spirited. They pose the threat that millions of people entitled to receive Medicaid benefits will be denied coverage.

The political benefits of this latest form of immigrant-bashing are obvious. Rep. Charles Whitlow Norwood Jr. (R-Ga.), a chief sponsor, cited "the outright theft of Medicaid benefits by illegal aliens." But there's scant evidence of widespread fraud under the current system. In all but four states, Medicaid applicants attest, under penalty of perjury, that they are citizens, and officials can ask for documentation if there is reason for suspicion. As Mark B. McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, wrote in response to an inspector general's examination of the issue last year, "The report does not find particular problems regarding false allegations of citizenship, nor are we aware of any."

If the problem is unproven, the solution will be expensive -- both for the states that are required to enforce it (or risk losing millions in federal funding) and the recipients who have to obtain documents. In fact, this new requirement runs precisely contrary to recent efforts to streamline Medicaid enrollment procedures to make certain that all eligible recipients get coverage.

But the biggest risk is that, rather than preventing fraud, the provision will result in the denial of benefits to eligible Americans who can't come up with the required proof. After all, the typical Medicaid recipient doesn't have a passport, the preferred form of proof. Also, many elderly African Americans were born at home and were never issued birth certificates.

Under the administration's guidance for state Medicaid agencies, states can't extend coverage to new applicants while they scramble to obtain documentation. Impoverished senior citizens and people with disabilities who already receive Supplemental Security Income benefits -- and have therefore already had their citizenship verified by the Social Security Administration -- aren't automatically eligible. There aren't any exceptions for those who need immediate care; who are too incapacitated to produce documents (Alzheimer's patients, for example); or who are victims of natural disasters.

It's certainly fair to ask that states have procedures in place to guard against fraud. But this is an unnecessarily cruel law interpreted in an unnecessarily cruel way. Yesterday, the District government, facing a lawsuit, agreed to hold off on enforcing it until at least July 17. If the lawsuits that have been filed to overturn the requirement don't succeed, Congress should reconsider.

Hamas's War (WP)

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

The movement defended armed attacks and hostage-taking; now it's complaining that Israel is fighting back.

PALESTINIAN Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh charged yesterday that Israel's offensive in the Gaza Strip is aimed at overturning his government. It's not clear that's the case -- the incursion seems mainly intended to recover a soldier held hostage by Palestinian militants. But if it is, Israel would be entirely justified.

When Cpl. Gilad Shalit was abducted by the military wing of Mr. Haniyeh's Hamas movement last weekend, his administration faced a choice. It could behave like a civilized government -- and work to free the hostage -- or align itself with a terrorist operation. It chose the latter. Hamas government officials endorsed the militants' demand that Israel release Palestinian prisoners it has legally arrested in exchange for a soldier who was attacked while guarding Israeli territory. Hamas justified this position by citing the terrorist movement Hezbollah, which has extracted prisoners from Israel in exchange for hostages, as well as governments that exchange POWs in wartime.

Fair enough. But if Hamas wants to be equated with Hezbollah or define itself as at war with Israel, then Israel has every right to try to destroy the Islamic movement's military capacity, to capture its leaders (it has arrested more than 60 since Wednesday, including eight cabinet ministers) and to topple its government. Isn't that what happens in war?

As it is, Israel's Gaza incursion has been reluctant, slow, carefully calibrated -- and as of yesterday, casualty-free. In addition to the arrests, Israel has disrupted power supplies for slightly more than a tenth of Gaza's population, occupied an abandoned airport, rained shells down on empty fields and bombed the Hamas-controlled interior ministry while it was empty.

Yesterday it again postponed a larger operation aimed at stopping the launching of rockets at Israel from northern Gaza in order to allow more time for mediation by Egypt. Meanwhile, the rocket firings continued -- another act of war that Hamas has encouraged, if not sponsored.

The restraint reflects recognition by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert that Israel stands only to lose if the Palestinian Authority is destroyed by force. Cpl. Shalit probably can be saved only by a Palestinian political decision, and Israeli forces will have trouble retiring from Gaza and stopping further rocket launchings and abductions, unless they can reach a truce with Hamas. Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, who has been trying to draw Hamas's political wing into an alliance with his secular Fatah movement, could still play a role in brokering such an accord. But he needs more help than he is getting from Egypt, other Arab states and the United Nations. Instead of fulminating about supposed Israeli war crimes, these actors ought to be demanding that Hamas -- and its sponsors in Damascus and Tehran -- stop their own acts of terrorism and war.

Hedge Fund Hoopla (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

Politicians are drawn to piles of unregulated money like, well, politicians to TV cameras. So it was only a matter of time before Congress took aim at the $2.4 trillion hedge fund industry.

The Senate Judiciary Committee held a hedge fund hearing this week, with its star witness one Gary Aguirre, a former SEC investigator who said superiors quashed a probe into insider trading at Pequot Capital. Pequot has vigorously denied the claims, and insider trading is already illegal. But the ubiquitous Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal was nonetheless on hand, in range of TV cameras, to claim that hedge funds are a "regulatory black hole." The Senators were also very concerned, no doubt prepping for the day when a few of these pools of private investment capital go belly up.

HOT TOPIC

Volatile Markets Bring Hedge Funds Under Fire1

So maybe it's time to step back and recall that we've all been at this cab stand before. In 1999, a year after Long Term Capital Management blew up, the President's Working Group on Financial Markets released the results of its top-to-bottom probe of hedge funds. This was no lightweight body, containing as it did Alan Greenspan, Robert Rubin and former SEC Chairman Arthur Levitt. Its findings argued so strongly against meddling in this source of market liquidity and efficiency that even the Clinton Administration gave regulation a pass.

The working group focused on a concern that is often heard today, which is that too much hedge fund borrowing could lead to systemic market risk. Highly leveraged investors are always more vulnerable to market shocks. And if forced to liquidate their often-huge positions, their losses could cascade throughout the financial system.

But the working group found that Long Term Capital was unique. The best way to guard against hedge fund meltdowns is a system in which the counterparties (bankers, broker-dealers) that lend to or borrow from hedge funds impose due diligence. In Long Term Capital's case, many counterparties were so impressed by that giant fund's reputation that they "did not ask sufficiently tough questions," as Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke put it in a speech this May.

Such laxity is a problem, but the answer isn't necessarily more direct regulation. The working group recognized that, in the complicated and fast-moving world of financial derivatives, the best way to guard against future blowups is to ensure the market itself imposes more discipline. It recommended that hedge funds provide better disclosure to their counterparties, and that regulators ensure that counterparties have systems and policies that identify warning signs and restrain excessive leverage.

The regulators have since complied, issuing risk-management guidance so bank supervisors now consider it a primary duty to monitor hedge-fund dealings. The SEC also stepped up its inspection of broker-dealers. Many counterparties now require hedge funds to post more collateral to cover potential exposure. And institutions and regulators are all trying to improve weak areas -- say, understanding the risks in such new financial products as credit derivatives. For a "black hole," this sure has a lot of foot traffic.

Hedge funds offer high returns, but they also take big risks, and some failures are inevitable. That's especially true when the Fed is raising rates and credit is getting tighter. But while hedge funds have multiplied since 1999, the funds that have failed have done so with barely a market ripple. This suggests the Clinton working group's strategy is working.

The Clintonians also argued that direct hedge fund regulation would have significant costs, such as reducing the liquidity crucial to robust financial markets. And in his recent speech, Mr. Bernanke noted how difficult it would be for any regulator to monitor hedge fund trading strategies that change rapidly and are enormously complex.

A more recent complaint about hedge funds is that they are becoming ever more available to Mom and Pop investors, not merely to the superrich. But a 2003 SEC report found that funds are still dominated by big institutional investors -- pension funds, endowments, and the like. Rich individuals and families supplied 42% of hedge fund assets, although that share is declining.

Pension funds do contain Mom and Pop retirement assets. But the focus of regulators should be on the pension fund managers for taking a flyer on hedge funds, not on the funds for taking the money. As for those who claim hedge funds are run by rogues, the SEC report noted that it could find "no evidence indicating that hedge funds or their advisers engage disproportionately in fraudulent activity."

Alas, none of this common sense stopped the SEC from plunging ahead in 2004 in an attempt to begin regulating hedge funds. But that attempt was overruled this month as an illegal power grab by the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals, which throws the matter once more into the tender arms of Congress.

Hedge funds are easy political targets because they aren't sold to the general public and aren't well understood. But the regulators at the Fed and Treasury who are paid to watch the financial system understand that they provide far more benefits than risks. Congress should tread carefully, if it treads at all.

Jon Corzine Florio (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

Nearly every state in the nation is celebrating the new fiscal year that begins on Monday with record tax revenues. The big exception is New Jersey, which is headed instead for what could be a government shutdown.

The political showdown isn't between Republicans and Democrats, but is between Governor Jon Corzine and his fellow Democrats who control the state legislature. On Wednesday, Democrats cursed each other and, according to our eyewitness sources, came close to blows inside the capitol in Trenton. Mr. Corzine is now threatening a government shutdown if his own party doesn't bend to his proposal for a $1.5 billion tax increase.

Remarkably, all of this intra-party feuding isn't over whether to raise taxes, merely over how. Mr. Corzine wants to raise the state sales tax to 7% from an already high 6%. Many Democrats in the legislature believe this is political suicide, especially with the Governor low in the polls. But somehow they've convinced themselves that voters will happily swallow new levies on payroll, tobacco, computer services and car rentals instead. Meanwhile, the one promise that Democrats made to voters in last year's election campaign -- lowering what are some of the highest property taxes in the country -- remains conspicuously unfulfilled.

A new Quinnipiac poll finds that 47% of voters identify taxes as the biggest problem in the state -- the highest number for any issue the polling firm has ever found in New Jersey. The Garden State has raised taxes nearly every year since 2000 and nearly twice as much per resident as the next highest tax state. Yet, no surprise, Trenton still has the biggest budget crisis outside of the states ruined by Hurricane Katrina. This taxing binge hasn't balanced the budget because state expenditures have ballooned by $8 billion, or about 45%, in six years. Mr. Corzine is nonetheless sticking to his story that state schools and services are underfunded.

The real New Jersey story is that a rising cost of living and taxes have spurred an exodus of businesses, high net worth individuals and working families. U.S. Census Bureau data indicate that, in 2004 alone, 60,000 more people left New Jersey than moved in. This outmigration led to a loss of $1 billion per year in the state's personal income, according to IRS statistics analyzed by the Manhattan Institute. Thus New Jersey finds itself in a spiral down: Taxes are raised, more taxpayers flee so the tax base shrinks, the politicians raise taxes again, and the cycle repeats itself.

Political history is also repeating itself here. Sixteen years ago Jim Florio was elected Governor and pushed through the largest tax hike in Jersey history. The economy sputtered, and Mr. Florio was dumped by voters in favor of Republican Christine Todd Whitman and a veto-proof GOP legislature. Undeterred, Mr. Corzine is testing the same tax, spend and don't elect theory. Which is why things are getting ugly among Democrats in Trenton.

ONE YEAR LATER… Show Africa The Money (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

After pledging to double aid by 2010, rich nations' promises are looking hollow.

IS A PROMISE WORTH ANYTHING if there are no consequences to breaking it? That's a question worth pondering as we near the one-year anniversary of the Group of 8 summit in Gleneagles, Scotland.

Gleneagles was not an ordinary powwow for the club of industrialized nations. It came amid an unprecedented international campaign under the slogan "Make Poverty History," complete with Live Aid rock concerts and a drive by leaders such as British Prime Minister Tony Blair to persuade wealthy countries to boost their aid to Africa. It all paid off, or so it seemed. Rich nations signed a historic pact to forgive the debts of some of the world's most impoverished countries, and at the summit they vowed to double aid to Africa by 2010 and work toward ending the damaging subsidies and tariffs that strangle Third World economies.

A year later, the Gleneagles promises are already starting to look hollow. The debt-relief agreement has largely been a success, but G-8 countries are far off track on their aid commitments and even further from a comprehensive trade deal.

DOJ_NMG_0037968

In 2005, the same year they made their pledge, G-8 countries increased their aid to sub-Saharan Africa by $1.6 billion, according to a report by DATA, the poverty-awareness organization founded by rock star Bono. But to get on track to meet their summit pledge, a boost of more than $3 billion would have been in order. Some countries are bigger laggards than others. Italy made a whopping promise at Gleneagles, committing to increase African aid from $1.2 billion in 2004 to $5.5 billion in 2010 — yet in 2005, it gave only an additional $26 million. That's at least better than Germany, which actually reduced aid to Africa last year.

Of course, most countries had already passed their 2005 budgets before the Gleneagles summit; the numbers from 2006 will be a better indicator of their seriousness. The United States, at least, is poised for a healthy increase in aid to Africa this year, mostly via the president's bilateral AIDS initiative.

On the trade front, the G-8 countries committed to eliminate all export subsidies, cut other domestic supports and improve access to their markets for poor countries. All this was supposed to be accomplished by the World Trade Organization during its Doha round of talks. Doha is desperately, perhaps fatally, stalled. Trade ministers started a new session Thursday in Geneva with the hope of reaching a deal by July 31, but the key players are miles apart.

DATA vows annual updates on progress toward the G-8 goals, but its reach is limited. What's needed is a high-level panel to monitor G-8 members and loudly embarrass nations that don't live up to their commitments. The world has had enough empty promises; the poor need genuine action.

Today's Events In Washington 21

TERRORISM NEWS:

Administration Faces Lack Of Options In Closing Guantanamo. The Washington Post (7/2, A8, White, 744K) reports that while the Administration would prefer to close the Guantanamo Bay detention facility, "there is no timetable and no specific plan for how to do it" because according to senior Administration officials "there are only two options for the men the United States deems too dangerous to release: transfer them to federal or military prisons in the United States -- such as the supermax facilities or Fort Leavenworth -- or arrange for another country to assume responsibility for their detention." Currently, "no third country has said it would be willing to take the men, and the Bush administration has been reluctant to consider allowing them to be transferred onto U.S. soil. Senior officials said in interviews it is possible that any suspects who are convicted of crimes could land in U.S. prisons." The Los Angeles Times (7/2, Williams, 958K) publishes a Q&A on the subject of the Guantanamo detainees.

Court Intervention Could Have Wide Impact On Administration Counter-Terrorism Policies. Continuing a theme popular in the media after the Supreme Court's ruling on US detainee policy, Adam Liptak in a "Week in Review" article in the New York Times (7/2, 1.19M) says that in an interview, professor John Yoo, "a principal architect of the Bush administration's legal response to the terrorist threat," said the court's decision "may signal the collapse of the entire" set of Administration policies. Yoo said, "t could affect detention conditions, interrogation methods, the use of force. … It could affect every aspect of the war on terror." In addition, "constitutional lawyers across the political spectrum agreed" it "could devastate the administration's main legal justifications for its campaign against the terrorist threat."

Justices Seen As Providing Hope For Those Concerned About Civil Rights. Author Jonathan Mahler, who is working on a book about Salim Hamdan and his defense lawyers, in the New York Times Magazine (7/1) writes, "Throughout our history, war has led to the abrogation of rights. … More often than not, when asked to rule on the legality of these extraordinary measures, the Supreme Court has given the commander in chief a wide berth. This is understandable: 'Judges, like other citizens, do not wish to hinder a nation's "war effort,"' Justice William Rehnquist once wrote. And yet, when the court sets aside civil liberties and defers to the president, it acts out of fear; when the court checks the president and reaffirms those liberties, it acts out of strength -- and, equally, hope."

Past Experience May Have Shaped Justice Steven's Ruling. Accentuating the difference between the court's past deference to the executive and legislative branches in times of war Mahler in his New York Times Magazine (7/1) article notes that Justice John Paul Stevens clerked for then-Justice Wiley Rutledge in 1947 when Rutledge wrote a minority opinion in defense of Japanese Gen. Tomoyuki Yamashita. Rutledge wrote that the rights in the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment "belong to every person in the world, victor or vanquished, whatever may be his race, color or beliefs." Mahler notes, "Stevens, it would seem, had absorbed his mentor's distaste for unbridled power. 'He was finally able to vindicate those values that Rutledge championed,' says Allison Danner, who clerked for Justice Stevens in the late 1990's."

WPost Challenges Congress To Craft Solution To Detainee Policy. The Washington Post (7/2, B6, 744K) in an editorial faults Congress for failing to address the issue of detainee policy and writes, "There is an opportunity to provide legislative authorization -- along with limits, safeguards and accountability -- for all of the powers and practices the U.S. government may need in a long-term confrontation with violent Islamist extremism." But there is a "danger" that "Congress will become reckless and hasty and abdicate the responsibility the court has given it. With midterm elections looming, the administration may push for quick legislative fixes." The Post concludes, "This is a moment in which this country can correct the mistake of five years ago, when the executive branch sought to fight a novel war based on a combination of outdated laws and new rules it made up on its own. The Supreme Court has created the chance to bring real law to the war on terror -- if Congress is willing to do its job."

Journalists Facing Increased Pressure Over Leaks From Governments. The AP (7/2, Hanley) reports, "Headline by headline, a trickle of news leaks on Iraq and the antiterror campaign has grown into a steady stream of revelations, and from Pennsylvania Avenue to Downing Street, Copenhagen to Canberra, governments are responding with pressure and prosecutions." The AP adds, "Media advocates are alarmed at what they see as a mounting assault on press freedom in country after country, arguing it is potentially chilling the pursuit of truth as U.S. and European leaders pursue wars on terror and in Iraq."

Administration Seen As Shifting Standards Over Leaks. Julie Mason in her "White House Watch" column in the Houston Chronicle (7/2, 581K) writes, "President Bush's sustained outrage last week about newspaper reports on a program tracking terrorists' financial records may have seemed odd considering how urgently the administration once publicized the program's broad concepts." Mason notes, "Thirteen days after Sept. 11, Bush signed an executive order expanding the Treasury Department's authority to track the bank activities of those with suspected ties to terrorism. The White House sent reporters a detailed fact sheet on the new powers." And "Bush summoned the news media to the Rose Garden to trumpet the program alongside the secretaries of state and treasury." Mason adds, "The difference between disclosures in the Rose Garden and in the newspaper is that the Times and others are reporting operational details, according to the White House."

NYT, LAT Decisions To Publish Details About National Security Programs Defended. Scott Shane in a "Week in Review" article in the New York Times (7/2, 1.19M) defends the recent disclosures by the media of US national security programs writing that "for decades, American newspapers and broadcasters have regularly censored themselves on security grounds, plucking compromising details from a story, delaying its publication or killing it entirely. The New York Times has withheld articles that might have jeopardized counterterrorism programs or efforts to protect vulnerable stockpiles of nuclear material."

In response to Administration criticism the New York Times, public editor Byron Calame writes, "Roughly 1,000 e-mails have come to me, about 85 percent of them critical of the decision to publish the story and a large fraction venomous. It was time to take a close look at the handling of the article in search of answers." In contrast to the public reaction, Calame's "close look convinced me that Bill Keller…was correct in deciding that Times readers deserved to read about the banking-data surveillance program."

And Frank Rich in his column in the New York Times (7/2, 1.19M) accuses Republicans of using the media's recent disclosures about US national security programs as a "ruse to distract Americans from the wreckage in Iraq."

Schwarzenegger Will Release Intelligence Reports. The Los Angeles Times (7/2, Nicholas, 958K) reports, "Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's office said Saturday he was ordering the release of dozens of intelligence reports prepared for the state Office of Homeland Security--a step that comes as lawmakers from both parties are denouncing a practice in which state intelligence agents compiled information about political and antiwar protests and rallies."

Officials say that only two of over sixty contractor-prepared reports for the state homeland security agency included material on political protests, but allowing the media to review all of them will reassure the public that the practice was not more widespread. The Times had reported Saturday on the suspect reports. The state agency said it would allow media to review, but not copy, the reports, from which "law-enforcement-sensitive information" dealing with such matters as "ongoing investigations" and related "safety threats" would first be removed. The article also notes that some legislators say the incidence shows the need for greater oversight of the state security organization. Spokesmen for the governor and the state security agency both declared that they disapproved of and did not request information on political protests.

US And Canadian Law Enforcement Demonstrate Increased Cooperation. The Washington Post (7/2, A3, Pomfret, 744K) reports last week U.S. and Canadian law enforcement officials "highlighted the increasingly close and institutionalized cooperation between the two nations' police agencies." Cooperative Operations, "called 'parallel investigations' because of sensitivity about sovereignty issues…reflect the fundamentally different strategies used to secure the United States' two very different borders. … Along the Canadian border, there are no plans for fences, and efforts focus on smuggling and terrorism. U.S. and Canadian authorities are patrolling together on the Great Lakes and have plans to operate a joint radio network." The Post adds, "Americans and Canadians also share law enforcement intelligence. U.S. agents aided the Canadians in their investigation into an alleged terrorist plot stymied on June 3 with the arrest of 17 men and teenagers in Ontario, law enforcement officials said. Five years ago, only Canadians worked at the Mounted Police headquarters in Ottawa, said Joe Oliver, a Canadian police superintendent. Now, Americans representing four agencies are based there, he said, adding that cooperation is 'pervasive.'"

Warning Raised About Possible Al Qaeda Resurgence. Peter Bergen, a Schwartz senior fellow at the New America Foundation, in an op-ed in the Washington Post (7/2, 744K) warns that "key members of the Bush administration have claimed that al-Qaeda is 'on the run' (Donald Rumsfeld and Condoleezza Rice), 'disrupted' (George Tenet) or 'decimated' (President Bush). At the same time, however, significant terrorist attacks around the world have dramatically increased since Sept. 11, 2001, most of them conducted by militant Islamists. How does one reconcile this apparent contradiction?" Although "the rapid spread of al-Qaeda's ideology in the past two years -- partly fueled by the Iraq war -- should be of considerable concern, it would be quite wrong to conclude that al-Qaeda the organization is down for the count. Indeed, if the bombings in London are any indication, it may be staging a comeback." Five years after the 9/11 attacks "al-Qaeda not only remains in business in its traditional stronghold on the Afghan-Pakistan border, but continues to project its ideology and terrorism abroad. So now we face a world of ideologically driven homegrown terrorists…in addition to formal networks such as al-Qaeda that have managed to survive despite the tremendous pressure brought to bear against them since 9/11. And even more grim, they now feed off and strengthen one another."

Papers Show BBC Allowed Intelligence Officials To Examine Employees. The Washington Times (7/2, Hastings, 90K) reports, "Confidential papers obtained by the Sunday Telegraph reveal that the British Broadcasting Corp. allowed intelligence agents to investigate the backgrounds and political affiliations of thousands of its employees, including newsreaders, reporters and continuity announcers. The files, which shed light on the BBC's hitherto secret links with the counter-espionage service known as MI5, show that at one stage it was responsible for vetting 6,300 BBC posts -- almost a third of the total work force. The procedure was phased out in the late 1980s. The files also show that the corporation maintained a list of 'subversive organizations' and that evidence of certain kinds of political activity could be a bar to appointment or promotion."

WAR NEWS:

Blast Kills 66 In Baghdad. The leading story on the network news and making front page headlines in the Washington Post and New York Times was the car bombing in Baghdad, with attention devoted to evolving details of the rape and murder allegations against US troops. The bombing in the Shiite stronghold Sadr City in Baghdad that killed over 60 Iraqis and injured over 100 more was seen as a threat to Iraqi political stability. The CBS Evening News (7/1, lead story, 2:40, Mitchell, 7.66M) noted that public outrage over the attack in Iraq came as the Iraqi prime minister "began his first tour of neighboring countries, hoping to build support for his government but just as he left came the news that one of his parliament's new female members had been abducted, along with her security detail." Iraqi lawmaker Mahmoud Othman: "If you can't establish security and stability, then you can't have a progress in the political process." Cowan: "It's not that the new government hasn't had its successes," yet "if today is any indication, it would seem that that wedge is being driven even deeper. Sectarian violence was already on the rise ever since this new government took over, and today's developments between the kidnapping and the bombing, most expect that will start another increased circle of violence."

NBC Nightly News (7/1, lead story, 3:00, Boettcher, 9.87M) reported, "Despite a two-week-old security clamp down in Baghdad -- Operation Together Forward -- sectarian violence continues according to the U.S. military and a prospect of all out civil conflict increases. A U.S. general says coalition forces will continue to pressure insurgents." Major General William Caldwell: "We continue to disrupt the network and we will not cease." Boettcher: "Only one week ago Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki launched his plan for national reconciliation. ... But today in Iraq, one bomb, one kidnapping and a message from Osama bin Laden moved warring factions further apart. Reconciliation remains a distant dream."

Describing the attack as part of an environment of continuing violence, ABC World News Tonight (7/1, story 3, 2:05, Brown, 8.78M) reported, "This was no routine bombing. This was the biggest since the new Iraqi government was sworn in this spring. And the most lethal so far this year." The attack "comes just three weeks after the government introduced the new security clampdown in Baghdad. Since then, the number of attacks has actually gone up. Today's explosion may well be one of the deadliest since the war. It becomes part of a catalog of carnage."

The Washington Post (7/2, Knickmeyer, 744K) reports, "Saturday's massive bomb, powerful enough to hurl bodies of shoppers onto the roofs of high-rise buildings surrounding the market in Baghdad's Sadr City district, drew angry denunciations from survivors, suggesting Iraqis could quickly sour on Maliki's initiatives if insurgent attacks once again begin claiming dozens of lives at a time. It adds, "U.S. military officers and academics alike had predicted at least a brief surge in attacks immediately after Zarqawi's killing, saying militant Sunni groups would want to show they had survived his loss."

The Washington Times/AP (7/1, Reid) reports that the Baghdad bombing "was the deadliest attack since the new national unity government took office six weeks ago and one of the biggest this year. Shortly before the midmorning blast, gunmen seized a female Sunni legislator at a checkpoint in a Shiite area of the capital. Both attacks represented a major challenge to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's vow to curb sectarian violence." An unverifiable group called the "Sunna Supporters Group" claimed responsibility on the Internet for the bombing. The AP pessimistically notes that, since the death of Zarqawi, "more than 700 Iraqi civilians and security forces have died violently." The Los Angeles Times (7/2, Roug and Salman, 958K) devotes a long article to the same bloodshed, which quotes angry witnesses to the market bombings and gives graphic details. The New York Times (7/2, Wong, 1.19M) notes, like the other sources, the attack's status as deadliest since Prime Minister Maliki's accession. It gives graphic details of the bombing scene and calls the bombing and female legislator's abduction "the most direct challenge yet to the fledgling Iraqi government."

Maliki Gains Saudi Support For Peace Plan. The AFP (7/2) reports, "Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki won Saudi Arabia's backing for his efforts to halt the bloodshed in Iraq at the start of a Gulf tour to rally support for his peace plan." Crown Prince Sultan bin Abdul Aziz told Maliki, "On behalf of ... King Abdullah, I assure you of ... (Saudi Arabia's) full support for you and your constitutional government." He added that "Saudi Arabia hoped his government would usher in 'stability and security' in Iraq and put an end to the hardships of the Iraqi people." Maliki "T apparently wants to enlist help during his tour to influence the former elite community of Sunni Arabs in Iraq as many of its leaders have close ties with the oil-rich Gulf Arab states." Iraqi Minister of State for National Dialogue Akram al-Hakim earlier said the tour will also include the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait."

The AP (7/2) adds that US ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad "noted that al-Maliki was traveling to Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait this weekend to drum up support for his reconciliation efforts," saying "The new government is reaching out not only to all Iraqis but also to its neighbors." He added, "We expect these visits to be successful, as the countries that Mr. Maliki is visiting understand what happens in Iraq will affect the stability of the area and shape the future of the region."

DOJ_NMG_0037975

Baghdad Death Toll Over 260 In Last Four Days. As part of its coverage of the most recent attack, The CBS Evening News (7/1, lead story, 2:40, Cowan, 7.66M) highlighted the impact of recent violence on Iraqis, noting the Baghdad morgue "announced [it] received in four days more than 260 bodies."

Shiite Lawmaker Survives Bombing Attack. The AP (7/2) reports, "A Shiite legislator escaped an assassination attempt Sunday when a roadside bomb missed his convoy in downtown Baghdad — a day after a female Sunni legislator was kidnapped by gunmen from her car." The intended victim was "Iyad Jamal al-Din, a cleric from the secular Allawi List bloc in parliament."

Khalilzad Says US Willing To Free More As 495 Iraqi Detainees Released. The AFP (7/2) report that "US ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad promised that more detainees would be freed from US and government-run prisons in Iraq as a seventh batch of nearly 500 was released." A justice ministry spokesman said those "security detainees held without charge were freed Saturday as part of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's national reconciliation plan." Khalilzad also said, "we are prepared in consultation with the Iraqi leaders to make future prisoner releases and to take other concrete steps to facilitate reconciliation." Khalilzad once again called "on Sunni Arab insurgents to lay down their arms" and "on the government to bring 'all militias and other illegal armed groups under control and to strengthen Iraq's security institutions," saying that "disagreements over the reconciliation plan must be 'expressed through dialogue rather than through violence.'"

New Details Released About Rape And Murder Allegations Against US Soldiers. ABC World News Tonight (7/1, story 4, 1:30, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "There are new and deeply disturbing, if true, details reported about the charge that American soldiers stalked, brutally raped an Iraqi woman and killed her and her family in an attempt to cover it all up." ABC (Yang): "The new details are chilling and suggest that this incident could be even more explosive than first thought. ABC News has been told that the soldiers spotted the woman they're suspected of raping while on patrol sometime before the incident in March. In fact, the New York Times and Associated Press quote military sources saying the soldiers may have targeted the family and planned the attack for nearly a week." ABC News consultant Gen. Jack Keane (Ret.): "I don't believe it's functioning as a military organization, more like a gang. And we don't want any part of it on the battlefield, in America's military." Yang: "This is at least the fifth ongoing investigation of alleged atrocities against Iraqi civilians ... Allegations of rape are especially serious in a conservative Islamic nation like Iraq and with widespread media coverage in Iraq, animosity toward the United States is likely to grow."

The Washington Post (7/2, Knickmeyer, 744K) reports, "The U.S. military ... disclosed new details about allegations that soldiers raped a woman and killed her, along with her mother, father and a sibling, in March in a village south of Baghdad. A U.S. military official revealed Saturday that the target of the alleged attack was a 20-year-old Iraqi woman who lived with her family near an American military checkpoint. One resident of the village of Mahmudiyah al-Kasr al-Awsat said Saturday that the young woman had complained of harassment by U.S. soldiers each time she passed through the American checkpoint." However, details from different sources in the Post story differ, such as the age of the victim. The New York Times (7/2, Wong, 1.19M) discusses the recent rape and murder allegations, saying, "Investigators are looking into whether the soldiers monitored the family for a week before carrying out the assault."

Iraqi Sunni Group Criticizes Alleged Rape. The AP (7/2) reports that the Association of Muslim Scholars "strongly condemned reports that U.S. troops raped an Iraqi women then killed her and her family, saying it shows 'the truth of the ugly American face.'" The Sunni group, called a "strong critic" of the US presence in Iraq, said that "raping this girl then mutilating her is shameful and will remain as a sign of shame to American invaders."

Camp Pendleton Trains Marines To Steer Clear Of War Crimes. NBC Nightly News (7/1, story 5, 2:30, Holt, 9.87M) reported that while a number of US service men are alleged to have engaged in misconduct, at Camp Pendleton "commanders reinforced the values that would ensure the best behavior out of the worst circumstances." Gen. Barry McCaffrey (Ret.): "Each of these deploying battalions go through a extensive work-up. I would argue we have never had a more rigorous training program in our military history." NBC (Mullen): "Instructors are quick to point out they also teach classes on cultural sensitivity and the rules of engagement so Marines know how to act appropriately under extreme pressure. Somehow with even more incidents being reported of troops crossing the line, commanders will have to find the disconnect between the practice field and battlefield."

Bin Laden Tape Endorses Sectarian Warfare, A First For Al Qaeda. The CBS Evening News (7/1, story 2, 2:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "U.S. intelligence agencies are scrambling to decipher the latest message from Osama bin Laden and to understand why it came so quickly on the heels of an earlier message posted on the internet just hours before." CBS (Chen): "Two messages in just 39 hours. Osama bin Laden quickly delivered on a promise to put out a second audio tape, this time urging Iraqi militants to keep up their fight against U.S.-led forces. 'Stay steadfast and don't leave Baghdad.' U.S. intelligence analysts will look closely at bin Laden's words, but may be more interested in his ability to put out the messages at all." Former CIA analyst Michael Scheuer: "It's meant to show that I'm still here, I'm still in charge of this organization, and in fact, our organization, our movement is winning."

CNN (7/1, Nasr) reports, "Osama bin Laden in a tape posted on the Web encourages Sunnis in Iraq to retaliate against Shiites, deviating from al Qaeda's stand of not promoting sectarian violence." He said "that Sunnis in Iraq are experiencing annihilation" and urged them to expel the "occupying power." The appeal came in his second message released this week. On the tape he "also names Abu Hamza al-Muhajer as the new leader of al Qaeda in Iraq."

The New York Times/AP (7/1) reports he "also warned nations not to send troops to Somalia, where Islamic militants have taken control of the capital and much of the south." The Washington Post (7/2, DeYoung, 744K) reports that he "warned Iraqi insurgents yesterday not to participate in negotiations with the elected government in Baghdad and urged Muslims in Somalia to violently oppose any challenge to Islamists who have seized power in that country." It calls the relatively brief 48-hour gap between Bin Laden recordings this week an indication of "an ever-faster turnaround time" and says he demonstrates "a close and current knowledge" of the Horn of Africa in his Somalia discussion. The AP (7/2, Riechmann) reports that he said to Al Qaeda members in Iraq, "Stay steadfast and don't leave Baghdad, otherwise all the capitals in the region will fall to the crusaders."

Hazardous Combat Duty In Ramadi Is Described. The New York Times (7/2, Filkins, 1.19M) quotes the statements of Marine Lance Cpl. Joseph Hamlin as he guards Post 1 in Ramadi, Iraq. The article implicitly contrasts his youth and the danger of his posting.

US Investigates Possible "Friendly Fire" Death In Afghanistan. The CBS Evening News (7/1, story 3, 0:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The U.S. military said today an American soldier who died in eastern Afghanistan's Kunar province this week may have been killed by friendly fire. Five US and two Canadian soldiers were wounded as were three civilian workers." The Washington Times/AP (7/2, Tran) reports, "The U.S. military on Saturday said it was investigating the death of a soldier in eastern Afghanistan as a possible 'friendly fire incident.' The Defense Department said Pfc. Justin R. Davis, 19, of Gaithersburg, Md., died on June 25 in eastern Kunar province when he came in contact with indirect fire — a term used for mortar shelling — while on patrol during combat operations." Other deaths from friendly fire are noted: "According to U.S. Army data earlier this year, 17 soldiers have died from friendly fire in the past four years — 10 in Iraq and seven in Afghanistan. They occurred in 11 separate incidents. The most famous case was the 2004 death of former NFL player Pat Tillman."

Two British Soldiers Are Killed In Afghanistan. The AP (7/2) reports, "Two British soldiers were killed after their base came under attack from suspected Taliban fighters in southern Afghanistan, a military official said Sunday. The incident occurred Saturday night in Sangin district in southern Helmand province."

Bush, Cheney Salute US Armed Forces. President Bush's radio address saluting US troops' sacrifices received little media attention, but Vice President Dick Cheney's appearance at the Pepsi 400 NASCAR race was highlighted by some prominent media outlets. The AP (7/2) reports, "President Bush paid tribute to America's armed forces Saturday, calling Independence Day a time to thank the men and women who defend freedom." In his radio address Bush said, "For more than two centuries, from the camps of Valley Forge to the mountains of Afghanistan, Americans have served and sacrificed for the principles of our founding. … Today, a new generation of American patriots is defending our freedom against determined and ruthless enemies." Bush "urged people to help America Supports You, a nationwide program set up by the Defense Department to communicate citizen support to military men and women at home and abroad."

Political Leaders Court Members Of Military At Patriotic Events. The Washington Times/AP (7/2, Pickler) in an article covering Vice President Cheney's appearance at the Pepsi 400 NASCAR race in Daytona notes it "has become a popular event for national leaders. President Reagan was the first commander in chief to attend a race when he went in 1984. Both President Bush and his father have attended the race, and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld attended last year." It "is a particularly patriotic event because it is scheduled for the Independence Day weekend and draws a large military crowd."

The Los Angeles Times/Orlando Sentinel (7/2, Lelis) in an article titled "Cheney Revs Up Schedule In Florida" reports, "Playing off the patriotic themes that dominated the Daytona International Speedway this weekend, Vice President Dick Cheney spent his time at the Pepsi 400 praising the military and hailing its ties to NASCAR." Some "race fans judged Cheney's appearance as a shrewd public relations move."

The Washington Times/AP (7/2) reports, "The stock cars weren't the only things buzzing the track at Daytona yesterday -- Vice President Dick Cheney made his grand entrance when Air Force II flew in low over the crowd gathering for the Pepsi 400 NASCAR race." Cheney "got a standing ovation from the drivers and their crews and his excited staff took pictures with Dale Earnhardt Jr."

In Egypt, Gonzales Defends Renditions, Says He Will Station Lawyer In Egypt. The AP (7/2, El-Magd) reports that Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, "in his first visit to Egypt…defended the transfer of terror suspects for incarceration and interrogation in other countries." While he "acknowledged the U.S. practice of sending terror suspects to prisons in their home countries," Gonzales "refused to confirm reports that Egypt, whose human rights record has been criticized by Washington, had received any of the suspects," saying, "it's intelligence activity and we just don't do that." After meeting with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Gonzales also "said the U.S. would send a Justice Department lawyer to be stationed in Cairo 'so we can further cement our relationship and we have someone on the ground representing me.'"

The AFP (7/2, Bassoul) adds, "Gonzales insisted that the US seeks assurances before returning the suspects," saying, "We do have a legal obligation not to render someone back to a country where we know they might be mistreated or tortured." However, it lead with his defense of special military tribunals for terrorist suspects. While in Egypt Gonzales also "met with justice minister Mahmud Abou Leil and interior minister Habib al-Adli."

Kennedy Emerges As Powerful SCOTUS Swing Vote. The Los Angeles Times (7/2, Savage, 958K) reports John Roberts "may be the new chief justice, but the Supreme Court is not truly the Roberts court, at least not yet. In the most divisive cases before the court in the term that just ended, it was Justice Anthony M. Kennedy who determined the outcome every time. In unpredictable fashion, he sided some of the time with the court's conservative bloc and some of the time with its liberals." The Times notes, "For the last decade, Justices Kennedy and Sandra Day O'Connor…had supplied the votes that decided the court's major cases. They usually joined with the conservatives on issues of crime, the death penalty, civil rights and states' rights, but with the liberals on abortion, gay rights and school prayer. Now, with O'Connor in retirement, Kennedy stands alone at the center."

The Washington Post (7/2, A6, Lane, 744K) reports, "by the end of the term, it was clear that the main impact of the turnover was to enhance the influence of…Kennedy. … An eclectic and sometimes inscrutable moderate conservative, Kennedy repeatedly cast the decisive vote on the most polarizing issues the court faced, from President Bush's military commissions, to the Clean Water Act, to the death penalty. He is poised to do so again next term when the court takes up the issues of abortion and school integration."

The New York Times (7/2, A1, Greenhouse, 1.19M) in a front page story adds, "Perhaps" this is "the Kennedy court, based on the frequency with which…Kennedy cast the deciding vote in important cases. Or perhaps it was more accurately seen as the Stevens court, reflecting the ability of John Paul Stevens…to deliver a majority in the case for which the term will go down in history" – the Hamdan case.

In an op-ed for the Washington Post (7/2, 744K) Slate's Dahlia Lithwick writes, "The new John G. Roberts Supreme Court is only one term old, and already we're all wrong about it. Liberals had feared, and conservatives had feted, the end of judicial review as we know it, at least until last week's blockbuster ruling in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld proved that bit of conventional wisdom wrong practically before it had become conventional. Predictions of a new era of hands-off judicial minimalism may have been premature. … More significant, the role of swing justice has itself swung from O'Connor to..Kennedy. On all the most divisive issues, today's court is now a Supreme Court of One."

The Los Angeles Times (7/2, 958K) in an editorial writes, "Less than a year ago, some liberal activists were warning that the confirmation of Roberts…would jerk the court unacceptably to the right. That critique was recycled a little more respectably when President Bush named Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. to replace perennial swing vote Sandra Day O'Connor. … Yet the seismic shift dreaded by liberals and dreamed about by conservatives hasn't occurred. … Even when Roberts and Alito would have shifted the law dramatically, as they did in supporting a much narrower definition of wetlands subject to federal regulation, their colleagues balked. In that case, as in last week's decision on the commissions…Kennedy…distanced himself from the conservative bloc . In other cases he voted with the conservatives, vindicating the observation that, just as the Rehnquist court was really the O'Connor court, the Roberts court is actually the Kennedy court."

Roberts Has Failed To Assemble Majorities In Key Cases. The New York Times (7/2, A1, Greenhouse, 1.19M) in its front page story reports, "As the dust settled on a consequential Supreme Court term, the first in 11 years with a change in membership and the first in two decades with a new chief justice, one question that lingered was whether it was now the Roberts court, in fact as well as in name. The answer: not yet. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. was clearly in charge, presiding over the court with grace, wit and meticulous preparation. But he was not in control." According to the Times, "In the court's most significant nonunanimous cases…Roberts was in dissent almost as often as he was in the majority. His goal of inspiring the court to speak softly and unanimously seemed a distant aspiration as important cases failed to produce majority opinions and members of the court, including occasionally the chief justice himself, gave voice to their frustration and pique with colleagues who did not see things their way."

The Washington Post (7/2, A6, Lane, 744K) reports, "Roberts voted in 10 five-justice majorities, the second-most on the court, but he joined the four liberals only once, in a minor procedural case."

Will Analyzes Kennedy's Opinion In Texas Redistricting Case. In his column for the Washington Post (7/2, 744K) George Will writes that Kennedy cast the swing vote in "cases concerning Texas redistricting. The cases involved several questions, the most interesting -- because it has come to the court before and we now know it will again and because it revealed a recurring and worrisome kind of judging -- was this: Was the redistricting by the Republican-controlled legislature such a partisan gerrymander as to be somehow unconstitutional? The court's dusty answer to this question is symptomatic of the difference-splitting that characterized the last years of the Rehnquist Court. In a plurality opinion, Kennedy said there may be a 'manageable, reliable measure of fairness' in redistricting, but no set of facts has sufficed for the court to discover it. … By leaving open the possibility that there is a constitutional answer to the question of what constitutes a 'too political' gerrymander -- the position seems to be: We don't know what the standard is, but we don't know that it doesn't exist -- the court has again practiced 'split-the-difference jurisprudence.' That phrase is from Judge J. Harvie Wilkinson of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, writing in the Stanford Law Review."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Scrushy Says He Will Fight Conviction With "Everything We've Got." The Wall Street Journal (7/1, Bauerlein) reports HealthSouth founder Richard M. Scrushy "vowed to fight his conviction on political-corruption charges with 'everything we've got' and he said it was a mistake to limit his defense during the two-month trial to less than two days. In an interview, Mr. Scrushy said his lawyers probably should have called 10 to 15 witnesses over about a two-week period to help undercut the federal government's allegations that he bribed former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman to get a spot on a state panel that regulates hospitals. 'We didn't put them up' because the prosecution's case seemed unconvincing, Mr. Scrushy said. 'We didn't feel we needed to.'" Scrushy "said he will appeal his conviction Thursday by a jury in Montgomery, Ala., on five or six different legal grounds. Before the trial, his lawyers contended that the jury pool included too few African-Americans and that Mr. Scrushy should be tried separately from three other defendants in the case. Mr. Scrushy said Friday that those issues could be part of his appeal."

Ralphs To Settle For $70 Million. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Zimmerman, White) reports the Ralphs grocery chain "said Friday that it had agreed to pay $70 million in fines and restitution to settle criminal charges that it illegally rehired locked-out workers during the supermarket labor dispute in Southern California more than two years ago. Under a proposed agreement filed Friday in U.S. District Court in Los Angeles, Ralphs would plead guilty to five felony charges included in the 53-count grand jury indictment returned against the company in December. Ralphs was charged with violating federal laws by secretly rehiring about 1,000 locked-out workers during the 4 1/2 -month strike and lockout from October 2003 to February 2004. The case had been scheduled to go to trial Aug. 15 before U.S. District Judge Percy Anderson, who must approve the plea agreement."

KLA-Tencor Says Some Stock Options Wrongly Dated. The Wall Street Journal (7/1, Forelle) reports, "KLA-Tencor Corp. said Friday that an internal investigation found that some stock options to executives and employees were wrongly dated, and said that the problems could lead to an accounting charge and possibly a restatement. The semiconductor-equipment maker provided little detail about the probe's findings in a press release, but the possibility of an accounting charge strongly implies that the misdating benefited executives and raises the question of whether grants were deliberately backdated or otherwise manipulated to confer that benefit. The firm said it anticipates needing to take a charge to correct its accounting, but it said that the investigation, conducted by a board committee, has not determined if the charge will be significant enough to warrant restatement of prior figures."

MZM Manager Accused Of Violating FEC Rules. The Washington Post (7/1, A10, Smith) reports, "The director of a defense contractor's office in Martinsville, Va., was accused yesterday of illegally funneling campaign donations to Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr. (R-Va.), an act that the contractor has said was meant to obtain Goode's help in arranging defense funding for his company. A federal court filing by the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia, Kenneth L. Wainstein, said that Richard A. Berglund, a facility manager for MZM Inc., had violated the Federal Election Campaign Act by 'aiding and abetting' a scheme by MZM's owner to donate the funds in the name of others. According to the filing, Berglund and his wife wrote $4,000 in checks to 'Representative A' in March 2005 after MZM's owner, Mitchell J. Wade, handed Berglund an equivalent amount of cash. It says that Berglund gave another $4,000 he received from Wade to two MZM colleagues, who in turn donated it to the congressman." FEC records show that Berglund and his wife "gave that amount to Goode that month. He made no other donations to lawmakers that year."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Overturns "Mafia Cops" Racketeering Convictions. US District Judge Jack B. Weinstein on Friday overturned the racketeering convictions of "mafia cops" Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, ruling that the five-year statute of limitations for the string of mob murders had expired. Although Weinstein had expressed skepticism about the statute of limitations issue from the trial's outset, the Friday decision stunned the prosecutors and defendants alike.

In a front-page story, the New York Times (7/1, Feuer) reported Weinstein vacated the convictions "despite citing overwhelming evidence that the men had committed 'heinous and violent crimes.'" He "left open the possibility that the prosecution could seek to retry the defendants on a drug charge, and Mr. Eppolito, alone, on a money-laundering count." The decision "shocked the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn, which said it would appeal." The Times noted, "Virtually from the outset of the case, Judge Weinstein said he was queasy about the decision to accuse the men of an overarching conspiracy that included the eight gangland murders, all in Brooklyn in the 1980's and 1990's, and a much more recent — and less serious — charge of selling an ounce of methamphetamine in Las Vegas last year." The New York Daily News (7/1, Front Page, Marzulli) added that the "conviction was stunningly overturned…all because they apparently steered clear of the mob for the last five years. … For now, they will remain behind bars at the Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn until Weinstein hears a likely bail application, sometime after he returns from vacation July 21." The Daily News noted, "The decision was vindication of sorts for the original defense attorneys, Bruce Cutler and Edward Hayes, who were blamed by their clients for the conviction."

Newsday (7/1, DeStefano) called the decision "a stunning development," and reports that "the retrial would involve charges that Eppolito and Caracappa were involved in a small methamphetamine transaction in Nevada, where they both lived after retiring from the Police Department. … Should the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reverse

Weinstein's decision, the provisional sentences of life imprisonment that he had given Eppolito and Caracappa would be reinstated." Newsday noted Weinstein "stressed that prosecutors had proved the defendants were involved in eight slayings, two kidnappings and other wrongdoing." The New York Post (7/1, Front Page, Haberman) called it "a bombshell decision" and reports that the ruling "brought Eppolito's daughter, Andrea, to tears." She told the Post, "We've always maintained his innocence. We've always believed in him."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (7/1, McShane) reported that the ruling was "a stunning blow to federal prosecutors." The AP noted, "Defense attorneys had argued that the statute of limitations had expired on the most serious allegations against the pair," but "prosecutors had countered that the murders were part of an ongoing conspiracy that lasted through a 2005 drug deal with FBI informant Steven Corso." Echoing the other stories, the Los Angeles Times (7/1, Barry) called the decision "a stinging rebuke to federal prosecutors," although "Weinstein did not mince words…in addressing the defendants," saying that "the trial 'overwhelmingly established' that the two men had 'kidnapped, murdered and assisted kidnappers and murderers, all the while sworn to protect the public against such crimes.'"

Victims' Families Express Shock, Dismay At Ruling. Under the headline "New Heartbreak For Victims' Kin," the New York Post (7/1, Haberman, Fermino) reported, "Less then three months ago, Betty Hydell was rejoicing that the dirty cops who helped kill her son got what they deserved," but on Friday, "when an FBI agent called her…and told her their conviction had been overturned, she wondered if the evil pair would have the last laugh." Hydell's "reaction -- a mixture of sadness, anger and confusion -- mirrored the other families who lost loved ones at the bloodstained hands of the Mafia cops who took orders from the wrong side of the law. 'I think this whole thing makes a mockery of our judicial system,' said Danielle Lino, whose father, Ed Lino, a Gambino soldier, was shot in the head by Caracappa." The New York Times (7/1, McFadden) noted, "While reaction was swift and predictable — an abyss between victims' families and their lawyers on one side, and defendants and their representatives on the other — there was general agreement that Judge Weinstein had made a hard decision on principle, according to law, and some called it courageous."

The other NYC newspapers also reported on the families' reactions, with Newsday (7/1, MacGowan) headlining its story, "Victims' Families Shocked At Reversal," and the New York Daily News (7/1, Smith) saying, "Victims' Kin Call Ruling 'So Absurd'." Additionally, the Daily News (7/1, Caruso) reported on the reaction by Eppolito's family under the headline "Glorious New Day For Family Of Ex-Cop," noting his daughter, Andrea, said that "she is optimistic about the retrial ahead, even though it will mean more stress, legal fees and time. But she says she thinks the ex-cop's new lawyer, Joseph Bondy, will give the case 100%."

Hacker Attacks Strike Pentagon. The Baltimore Sun (7/2, Gorman, 296K) reports, "The number of reported attempts to penetrate Pentagon computer networks rose sharply in the past decade, from fewer than 800 in 1996 to more than 160,000 last year -- thousands of them successful. At the same time, the nation's ability to safeguard sensitive data in those and other government computer systems is becoming obsolete as efforts to make improvements have faltered and stalled." The NSA's program to protect military and intelligence computers is "seven years behind schedule." Critics fault "poor management" and a "quest for security nirvana" that has kept the NSA from installing workable safeguards while waiting for something ideal. They note the ongoing threat of "monster attack" from "China, Russia, Israel, France and so on," in the words of one unnamed "former government official," as well as a general threat from "as many as 100 countries" to government computers.

Missouri Supreme Court Rules On Sex Offender Registration. The Kansas City Star (7/1, Lambe, Bauer) reports, "The Missouri Supreme Court ruled Friday that thousands of sex offenders no longer have to register, because the law requiring it does not apply retroactively. As a result, although the court unanimously upheld the state's sex offender registry law, only those convicted after the law took effect Jan. 1. 1995, now will have to register. The law previously required people to register if they were convicted after July 1, 1979. This involved more than 11,000 offenders to register, but Friday's ruling lopped off about 16 of 27 years of registration. The ruling written by Judge Laura Denvir Stith also said nothing prevented publishing the information about those who have registered. Offenders before 1995, however, can now move to new addresses that will not have to be listed."

Flag Burnings Said To Be Extremely Rare. The New York Times (7/2, Fountain, 1.19M) reports, "The Senate nearly approved a constitutional amendment last week that would allow Congress to outlaw flag-burning, falling one vote short of the two-thirds majority needed to send it to the states for approval. Opponents, mostly Democrats, warned that if it passed the amendment, the Senate would be tinkering with the Bill of Rights to ban a form of protest that is rare. Just how uncommon is it?" Robert Justin Goldstein, retired political science professor at Oakland University, and "an expert on the issue," is quoted as saying, "My impression is that probably in all of American history there's been something like a few hundred flag burnings."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Says Sarasota County, Florida, Broke Law On Housing. The Bradenton Herald (7/1) reports Sarasota County, Florida, officials "broke federal law when they denied permission for housing for disabled people, according to a lawsuit filed Friday by the U.S. Justice Department. The complaint, filed in U.S. District Court in Tampa, alleges the county refused to allow Renaissance Manor Inc. to operate six homes for individuals with mental illness and a history of substance abuse. The homes are similar to other houses in the county occupied by residents who share living space and common facilities, according to a Justice Department news release. According to the government's complaint, the homes are allowed under Sarasota County's zoning code, but the county determined that the homes broke the code because of the residents' disabilities. The complaint also alleges that the county retaliated against Renaissance Manor by refusing to release grant funds it had been previously awarded."

Maryland Group Opposing Early Voting Moves Case To Court Of Appeals. The Washington Times (7/1, Ward, 90K) reports Marylanders for Fair Elections "will now take its lawsuit to Maryland's Court of Appeals, after" Anne Arundel County Circuit Judge Paul Hackner "yesterday denied its request to keep alive a petition drive that would stop early voting and let voters decide whether they want it in the future." Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s (R) re-election campaign favors the group's suit. Ehrlich called the early voting bills "power grabs by the leadership of the Maryland General Assembly." He has also said that early voting "will make voter-fraud easier to commit." The group opposing early voting "yesterday submitted to Secretary of State Mary D. Kane about 200,000 signatures, roughly twice the number needed" to "halt early voting this fall and place it on the ballot for voters to decide whether it is implemented in the future."

"New Challenges" To Death Penalty Arise. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (7/1, Kohler) writes, "For those opposed to the death penalty, a humane execution might be a contradiction of terms. For those who don't care if a condemned man suffers in his last moments, it might be a pointless concern. The nation has walked a fine line between those views for more than a century in seeking ways the founding fathers intended to permit to snuff capital criminals. States used hangmen's nooses, gases, electricity and, finally, injections. But new challenges have raised questions about the legality of lethal injections, and about the future of capital punishment in the 38 states where it's legal."

NYTimes Questions Coast Guard Academy Handling Of Sex Harassment Cases. The New York Times (7/2, 1.19M) editorializes on a recent scandal at the Coast Guard Academy. After noting that the academy has a highest proportion of women of all the military service academies, it writes, "For the first time in its 130-year history, the academy court-martialed a cadet, convicting him on sodomy, indecent assault and extortion charges after four female cadets accused him of assaulting them. The stories that emerged from the trial are enough to make any reasonable person question how such allegations are handled at the academy." Of the academy's announcement that it will start involving women in sexual harassment investigations, the Times says, "It is frankly surprising, and somewhat appalling, that such a basic step was not taken years ago."

Microsoft Races To Meet EU Demands Before Vote. The New York Times (7/1, O'Brien) reports, "For nearly three months, Microsoft says, 300 of its engineers have been working nearly nonstop to come up with the documentation for its server software that the European Commission has sought since an antitrust ruling in 2004. After two years of dragging its heels — at least in the view of the commission's antitrust staff — Microsoft is now presenting itself as productive and cooperative. The commission's threat of another fine on the company is driving the last-minute frenzy. But the commission's vote on the fine, which if assessed in full would total about 420 million euros ($527 million), may come just before Microsoft crosses the finish line. A European Union advisory committee is scheduled to discuss the commission's draft decision to impose the fine on Monday, but no action is expected."

Michaels Stores Accepts Bain/Blackstone Bid. The Wall Street Journal (7/1, Spector, Berman) reports, "Michaels Stores Inc. Friday said it accepted a more than $6 billion takeover bid from a private-equity group comprising Bain Capital and Blackstone Group, completing a nearly three-month process of fielding offers for the arts-and-crafts retailer. The winning takeover group paid $44 a share for the Irving, Texas, retailer. Michaels shares rose 8.5%, or $3.24, to $41.24 at 4 p.m. Friday in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Michaels has 137 million shares outstanding. Michaels, the largest arts-and-crafts retailer in the U.S. and Canada by sales, has been attractive to private-equity groups because of its heavy cash flow, which could help to pay down debt incurred in the deal. The retailer generated operating cash flow of $364 million in its fiscal year ended Jan. 28."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Voting Rights Act Changes Could Impact American Indians. The AP (7/1) reports, "Landmark provisions in the federal Voting Rights Act of 1965 soon could expire, taking away powerful deterrents to discrimination against Indian voters in South Dakota and threatening to halt an upward trend in voter turnout on reservations. In the past 30 years, the provisions have forced South Dakota to submit 3,048 voting law changes in Todd and Shannon counties for approval by the Department of Justice and have required Lakota speaking interpreters at polling places in 11 counties. Provisions of the Voting Rights Act are the underpinning of a renaissance in Indian voting, resulting in a 122 percent increase in turnout in Shannon County on the Pine Ridge Reservation, and a 139 percent increase in Todd County on the Rosebud Reservation, between 2000 and 2004."

Probe Implicates Aristide In Narco-Trafficking, Money Laundering. In an article that is the first of two, the Miami Herald (7/2, Weaver, Charles, 323K) reports, "Jean-Bertrand Aristide was a modern-day Moses to Haiti's poor masses, a former Catholic priest who rose to the presidency by promising to wash away the country's bloody and corrupt past. But since his ouster as president in 2004, U.S. authorities have been investigating detailed accounts alleging that Aristide and several top aides sought and took millions of dollars in bribes from drug traffickers in Haiti, The Miami Herald has learned." The Herald adds, "The allegations against the ex-president come from numerous sources, but the evidence has not risen to a level to press a case against Aristide, say U.S. law enforcement officials, who have been hampered by a lack of financial records. Still, The Miami Herald has learned from interviews with about 20 law enforcement officials, defense lawyers and others involved in the case that Aristide has been accused of being at the center of his country's narco-trafficking and money-laundering activities from 2001 to 2004."

EU Opens Up Arms Market. The Washington Times (7/2, Harding, 90K) reports a story carried on the previous day by the Wall Street Journal, noting, "The European Union took a major step toward opening its notoriously closed armaments market yesterday with a new code of conduct aimed at boosting competition ... Under the code of conduct, which will apply in all EU states except for Spain, Denmark and Hungary, defense ministries are obliged to post new tenders on an Internet notice board and all European arms companies are free to compete for the contracts." The CEO of the European Defense Agency commented that European states "were spending too much on soldiers' wages and pensions -- personnel costs consume half of the union's $225-billion-a-year defense budget compared with one-quarter in the United States -- and too little on high-tech hardware."

IMMIGRATION:

Huntsman Claims Cannon Win Shows The Popularity Of Comprehensive Immigration Reform. The Deseret News (7/2, Roche) reports Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr. said Rep. Chris Cannon's victory in his Republican primary "shows that Utahns agree with his more comprehensive approach to immigration reform." The News notes, "The immigration issue dominated the race between Cannon and his challenger in the primary, John Jacob. Jacob accused Cannon of supporting amnesty for illegal immigrants, because the five-term congressman backs President Bush's proposed guest-worker program." Huntsman "said…that the primary results reflect what most Utahns — and most Americans — support in terms of immigration reform: increased border security and a way of dealing with the 'human component,' those workers who are already here."

NAFTA Seen As Contributing To Illegal Immigration. The CBS Evening News (7/1, story 8, 3:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported the US and Canada "have been selling tons of corn in Mexico for over a decade, thanks to NAFTA." NAFTA "eliminated tariffs on most agricultural trade and was supposed to be a win-win for the US and Mexico. For Tirso Alvares Correa, NAFTA has been a disaster. While the trade agreement opened US markets to Mexican-born farmers, they haven't been able to sell any corn in America. Meanwhile, American farmers have flooded Mexico with cheap corn, thanks to generous US government subsidies, subsidies left unchecked by NAFTA. A US corn grower receives an average annual subsidy of $20,000 a year. The government of Mexico gives their corn farmers just $100. These farmers told us entire towns are emptying because thousand of small farms having out of business. As many as two million farm workers have lost their jobs. The vast majority head north across the US border, looking for better pay. No one questions that Mexico's small corn farmers are hurting, due in large part to the impact of NAFTA. But supporters of the free trade agreement say what's happening here is just part of the story."

Military Serves As Springboard To Citizenship. The Los Angeles Times (7/2, Perry, 958K) reports, "53 active-duty U.S. military personnel were sworn in as new citizens Saturday night before the Padres-Giants game. ... Since Sept. 11, a number of measures sponsored by the Bush administration have led to an expedited process for active-duty military personnel to become U.S. citizens. ... Since the changes, more than 20,000 military personnel have become citizens, 75 of them posthumously. Officials estimate that more than 40,000 military personnel remain eligible for citizenship." The article quotes some of the new citizens.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Cheney Expresses Support For Shuttle Program. Florida Today (7/2, Waymer, 84K) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney had seen a shuttle launch once before, but hoped Saturday that his three granddaughters would get their chance. ... 'I was especially looking forward to having my grandchildren here,' Cheney told reporters from atop the Operation Support Building, shortly after the launch controllers ordered a scrub. 'But we just got a tour of the Atlantis,' he said. 'At least we got to see that.' Earlier, Cheney had walked through the Orbiter Processing Facility at Kennedy Space Center, where he, his wife, Lynne, and their three granddaughters…scoped the underbelly of shuttle Atlantis." FT adds, "Moments after the Discovery launch was called off, Cheney said he was 'very impressed' by the tour of Kennedy Space Center and said of the space program: 'It's a great program. It's important that we keep it going.' Other politicians on hand for the launch Saturday echoed similar support for the shuttle program, tempered with concerns about the consequences of another mishap."

Clouds Cause NASA To Postpone Discovery Launch. ABC World News Tonight (7/1, lead story, 1:30, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "We begin tonight with no go for 'Discovery.' NASA says it will try tomorrow after thunder clouds kept the space shuttle from launching today. Stormy weather did what safety questions could not. … The larger question -- whether dangerous pieces of foam will come off of the external fuel tank on launch -- NASA won't know the answer to that until they blast off."

The CBS Evening News (7/1, story 5, 2:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "There's a clear sense of disappointment here at the Kennedy Space Center because the flight of 'Discovery' is deemed critical to getting the whole shuttle program back on track. Now the launch will have to wait at least another day. … NASA is anxious to get 'Discovery' off the pad. With the shuttle program set to be mothballed in 2010, there are schedule pressures to complete the 17 final flights and finish construction of the international space station." NASA Administrator Michael Griffin: "We're now at a point where there are no optional flights. They're all critical. This one is critical because it's the one we're doing today."

NBC Nightly News (7/1, story 3, 2:00, Holt, 9.87M) reported NASA "thought they had a problem with the heater on a thruster rocket for much of the day. They resolved that issue and they thought the weather was cooperating. But as they got down to the wire the clouds continued to build and the launch director decided he had to scrub it. After all of the controversy and dissenting opinions about whether it is safe to fly this mission, NASA started this day determined to launch."

The Washington Post (7/2, A6, Gugliotta, 744K) reports, "The weather provided a disappointing anticlimax to a near-flawless three-day countdown, marred only by the failure of a heater used to keep fuel for one of the shuttle's thruster jets from freezing. … Mission control decided early Saturday afternoon that the glitch did not hamper shuttle operations, and decided to put the thruster on standby and use other thrusters during the mission. NASA officials said the broken heater could not be swapped out in time for Saturday's launch attempt.

KSC Weather Not Expected To Improve Before Tuesday. The New York Times (7/2, Schwartz, Leary, 1.19M) reports, "Liftoff is now scheduled for a 10-minute window starting at 3:26 p.m. on Sunday, but current weather forecasts put the likelihood of adverse conditions at 60 percent. Conditions for Monday, according to forecasters working with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, are likely to be even worse."

Griffin Once Again Defends Decision To Override NASA Engineers' Safety Concerns. The AP (7/2, Dunn), in an article on the decision to scrub yesterday's launch, reports NASA Administrator Michael Griffin "decided to proceed with the 12-day mission despite the concerns of two top agency managers who wanted additional foam repairs. 'We now have a NASA in which senior officials feel free to discuss and debate openly complex, difficult and subtle technical topics that affect the flight,' Griffin told The Associated Press on Saturday. 'No matter what decision I made, I would have been disappointing somebody.'" The AP notes, "Bryan O'Connor, the top safety officer, and chief engineer Christopher Scolese recommended at a meeting two weeks ago that the shuttle remain grounded until design changes are made to 34 areas on the fuel tank known as ice-frost ramps."

Cheney Receives Clean Bill Of Health After Check Up. Vice President Cheney passed his physical before traveling to Florida to watch the NASA shuttle launch and the NASCAR Pepsi 400 race. Cheney's health and trip were briefly noted in prominent media outlets. ABC World News Tonight (7/1, story 2, 0:15, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "Among those disappointed at Cape Canaveral, the Vice President. Dick Cheney got the okay to travel from doctors this morning during his checkup. He received a clean bill of health. His pacemaker working just fine. The 65-year-old Vice President has had four heart attacks."

And NBC Nightly News (7/1, story 6, :10, Holt, 9.87M) reported, "Vice president Dick Cheney under went his annual physical and doctors said he checked out perfectly. His pacemaker is functioning properly and there were no signs of an irregular heart beat."

The New York Times (7/2, Stolberg, 1.19M) notes, "The physical on Saturday consisted of several tests, including an electrocardiogram, follow-up imaging of the repaired aneurysms and a check of Mr. Cheney's implantable cardioverter defibrillator, also known as a pacemaker, that he has had since 2001. A stress test on a treadmill is scheduled for the fall, Ms. McBride said." The AP (7/2, Riechmann) adds, "Vice President Dick Cheney's high-tech pacemaker is working properly and has not been activated by any irregular heartbeats, according to his annual physical on Saturday that showed his overall heart condition was stable."

Bush Seen As Pensive About Approaching Birthday. The AP (7/2, Loven) reports, "The most powerful man in the world turns 60 on Thursday and he just can't seem to stop talking about it. Barely a week has gone by this year that President Bush has not brought up his advancing age at least once." He "is nearly always cracking wise when the topic of his age comes up. The humor, however, contains unmistakably wistful notes, revealing a president who is least somewhat pensive both about aging and his relevance after he leaves the White House in 31 months."

Medicare Drug Program Said To Have Driven Up The Cost Of Prescriptions. ABC World News Tonight (7/1, story 6, 3:00, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "In our 'money watch' tonight, a question being asked by seniors – 'why are prescription drug prices soaring?' Two new reports say they increased almost 4%, three times the rate of inflation in the first three months of the year. That's disappointing news to millions that hoped to get a price break from the Medicare drug plan. ABC continues, "One thing the Medicare drug plan has not done is make drugs less expensive. And one of the most controversial elements of the plan, banned Medicare from using its massive purchasing power to negotiate lower prices. Instead, letting individual plans negotiate on their own. Now, critics say there is evidence that that decision is costing seniors and taxpayers." ABC notes, ""The pharmaceutical industry says rising drug prices are in line with other medical costs -- even lower if you include generics."

Democrats Use Medicare Drug Coverage Gap As Campaign Issue. The Los Angeles Times (7/2, Alonso-Zaldivar, Lin, 958K) reports, "When Congress created the Medicare prescription drug program, it adopted an unusual idea to hold down costs: the so-called doughnut hole. The program pays most of a participant's drug bills until expenses reach $2,250 in a year. Then it stops paying until costs exceed $5,100. That leaves a hole of $2,850 that seniors with serious prescription needs are expected to manage on their own. Now, six months into the drug program…3.4 million seniors are approaching the doughnut hole. Most of them are middle-class seniors with multiple chronic illnesses. (The poor are exempt from the gap.) Some have already experienced an abrupt surge in prescription costs. … Sensing a political opportunity, some Democrats are campaigning on a promise to shrink or close the doughnut hole. As November's congressional elections draw nearer, more seniors will confront the gap."

Boehner Credited With Saving Line-Item Veto Bill. In his syndicated column Robert Novak (7/2) writes that House Majority Leader John Boehner "is credited with cooling off opposition by Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis sufficiently to save the administration-backed line-item veto in the House June 22. Lewis had been giving a run-around to Republican Rep. Paul Ryan, sponsor of the bill. … Boehner reminded Lewis that President Bush and the congressional Republican leadership supported the Ryan bill. Consequently, the majority leader urged the chairman not to mobilize the 36 Republican Appropriations Committee members against the line-item veto. As a result, Lewis e-mailed his committee members that he would vote against Ryan's bill but was not calling on his fellow appropriators to follow him."

More Than $1.3 Billion In Federal Crop Subsidies Paid To Non-Farmers. The Washington Post (7/2, A1, Morgan, Gaul, Cohen, 744K) reports the federal government "has paid at least $1.3 billion in subsidies for rice and other crops since 2000 to individuals who do no farming at all, according to an analysis of government records by The Washington Post. Some of them collect hundreds of thousands of dollars without planting a seed. … The checks…were intended 10 years ago as a first step toward eventually eliminating costly, decades-old farm subsidies. Instead, the payments have grown into an even larger subsidy that benefits millionaire landowners, foreign speculators and absentee landlords, as well as farmers. Most of the money goes to real farmers who grow crops on their land, but they are under no obligation to grow the crop being subsidized. They can switch to a different crop or raise cattle or even grow a stand of timber -- and still get the government payments. The cash comes with so few restrictions that subdivision developers who buy farmland advertise that homeowners can collect farm subsidies on their new back yards."

Local Governments Employ Lobbyists To Secure Federal Funds. The New York Times (7/2, A1, Rudoren, Pilhofer, 1.19M) reports, "Cities and towns — and school districts and transit authorities and utility agencies — across the country are increasingly…putting lobbyists on retainer to leverage their local tax dollars into federal tax dollars. Since 1998, the number of public entities hiring private firms to represent them in Washington has nearly doubled to 1,421 from 763. … Most of these new clients had never sought earmarks — some had never even heard of them — before someone knocked on their door, essentially offering big pots for a pittance. Others had read in the newspaper about neighbors with lobbyists building bridges or beach walks and felt pressure to keep up with the municipal Joneses." The Times goes on to report, "Of the 250 top-grossing firms in Washington, 48 have state, local and tribal governments as their leading source of revenue, far more than any other sector, according to the Center for Public Integrity, which monitors lobbying."

Approaching NCLB Deadlines Pose Dilemma For States. The Miami Herald (7/2, Pinzur, 323K) reports, "More than 500 high-poverty Florida schools could be forced under the federal No Child Left Behind law to privatize, become charters, replace most of their staffs or make other major changes--even though some have repeatedly received A or B grades from the state." Florida has already acted under its own education accountability laws on some low-performing schools, but "it could become far more widespread next year unless those schools make unprecedented gains on the state's high-stakes standardized test."

NYTimes Claims Many State Tests Dodge Federal Standards. A New York Times editorial (7/2) notes a "startling new study shows that many states have a longstanding tradition of setting basement-level educational standards and misleading the public about student performance. The patterns were set long before No Child Left Behind, and it will require more than just passing a law to change them." The new study by Policy Analysis for California Education (PACE), a research institute run jointly by Stanford and the University of California, finds that many states students "who performed brilliantly on state tests scored dismally on the federal National Assessment of Educational Progress," the strongest, most well-respected test. Looking at state-level testing practices from 1992 to 2005, the study found many states dumbing down their tests or shifting proficiency targets in math and reading, "creating a fraudulent appearance of progress and making it impossible to tell how well students were actually performing." Although states have always resisted national tests and clung to local autonomy, the Times says "if the United States wants to equal its competitors abroad, it must move away from a patchwork system based on weak standards and a frankly fraudulent system of student assessment." It cites with approval a proposal that the federal government provide the states with a free, rigorous, high-quality test, on the condition that they use federal scoring standards.

Net-Neutrality Issue Could Stall Entire Telecom Bill. The Washington Post (7/2, F4, Hart, Goo, 744K) reports, "From Capitol Hill to Silicon Valley, it's become one of the most controversial and confusing topics to hit the tech industry this year: network neutrality. The term is confusing, the ad campaigns have further clouded the issue, and it's no longer easy to tell who's for it and who's not." The Post concludes, "The net-neutrality issue has been included in a larger telecommunications bill being considered by Congress. The House has already approved its version, but it's unclear whether the bill has enough support in the Senate to move ahead. As of now, the bill favors telecommunications companies that want the FCC to monitor the issue of access to the Internet. Many Democrats oppose the current bill unless it includes tougher language that would make it illegal for telecom firms to impose a priority pricing structure. It's unlikely that they'll reach a compromise before September, but many lobbyists and lawmakers say the net-neutrality issue could prevent the entire telecom bill -- which includes other provisions such as new rules for cable franchises -- from moving forward until next year."

Potential 2008 Presidential Candidates Make High Profile Visits To Gulf Coast. The Washington Times (7/2, Bellantoni, 90K) reports, "Visiting Louisiana and Mississippi has become increasingly important for politicians considering a White House bid." Sen. George Allen "recently walked amid the rubble of what were once homes in New Orleans neighborhoods. Others interested in the presidency also have taken a tour." Sen. Mary Landrieu "has hosted dozens of other lawmakers here, but…is reaching out especially to potential presidential candidates, telling them: 'You've got to see what's not working, so hopefully, if you get to be president, you can help fix it.'" Former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner "was in New Orleans last week on a fact-finding mission to see how he could help with children's health care challenges. He took with him Virginia specialists." Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, "who also took the Gulf Coast tour with Mrs. Landrieu, has called for an independent investigation of the failed government response to the hurricane."

Kerry's 2004 Loss Hinders His Nascent 2008 Presidential Campaign. The AP (7/2, Glover) reports Sen. John Kerry "has left little doubt about his intentions to try again after his narrow loss to President Bush in 2004. He isn't the only also-ran considering another marathon. … Kerry faces a challenge of major proportions, convincing Democratic activists that a candidate who just lost an election can still carry his party's White House hopes." According to the AP, "Kerry's allies acknowledge the struggle but are unwilling to give up the cause. 'Historically, the Democratic Party has tended to shoot its wounded,' said former New Hampshire Democratic Chairman Joe Keefe. 'John Kerry has done everything within his power to rewrite that chapter.'

The Massachusetts senator has raised nearly $9 million for candidates and the party and has campaigned actively across the country.

Kerry Has Raised $10 Million For Democratic Candidates Since Losing To Bush. The Washington Post (7/2, A4, Goldfarb, 744K) reports Kerry "insiders" said "reports for the quarter that ended Friday show he has given or raised nearly $10 million for Democratic candidates and committees since November 2004. That's $1.5 million in the past three months. Kerry has raised a total of $13.5 million this cycle. Just last week, Kerry sent out an e-mail to raise money for the Senate candidacies of incumbent Maria Cantwell (Wash.), Claire McCaskill (Mo.), Rep. Sherrod Brown (Ohio) and incumbent Bob Menendez (N.J.). Kerry has given or raised $2.3 million for 18 Senate candidates and $6 million for 36 committees."

Carville And Penn Describe Clinton's Strengths As A Potential Presidential Candidate. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (7/2, 744K) Democratic consultants James Carville and Mark J. Penn, write, "We don't know if [Sen.] Hillary [Clinton] is going to run for president, but as advisers who have worked on the only two successful Democratic presidential campaigns in the past couple of decades, we know that if she does run, she can win. … Why? First, because strength matters. Our problems as a party are less ideological than anatomical: Our candidates have been made to look like they have no backbone. But the latest Post-ABC News poll shows that 68 percent of Americans describe Hillary Clinton as a strong leader." According to Carville and Penn, "For those who think that the politics of personal destruction might be rekindled against Hillary or her husband, we can only remind people how consistently that approach has backfired in the past. Bill Clinton would certainly be a huge asset if Hillary decided to run. … Certainly she could win the states John Kerry did. But with the pathbreaking possibility of this country's first female president, we could see an explosion of women voting -- and voting Democratic. States that were close in the past, from Arkansas to Colorado to Florida to Ohio, could well move to the Democratic column. It takes only one more state to win."

Warner Among Powerful GOP Figures Attending McCain Fundraiser. In his syndicated column Robert Novak (7/2) writes, "The Rasika restaurant in downtown Washington was jammed at 6 p.m. last Wednesday for a fund-raising reception benefiting Sen. John McCain's political action committee. Republicans were willing to pay $5,000 each to hear McCain speak. They wanted to be on record as present to help the prospective front-runner for the 2008 Republican Presidential nomination. Included among those attending were some of Washington's top GOP lobbyists: Charlie Black, Wayne Berman, Scott Reid and Rick Hohlt. Also present was Sen. John Warner, whose fellow Virginia senator -- George Allen -- is McCain's potential opponent for the Presidential nomination."

Biden Campaigning In New Hampshire As A "Muscular Democrat." The Manchester Union Leader (7/2, DiStaso, 59K) reports Sen. Joseph Biden "has no doubts about making another run for the White House. 'I'm in,' the Delaware Democrat said Friday as he began a five-day visit to the first-in-the-nation primary state." Biden "realizes that among the hard left activists in his party, his stance on the Iraq war — to stay and fight until the job is done — is unpopular. But he is asking for their trust that a 'neo-isolationist' foreign policy is the worst possible alternative for the country at this point in history. Regarding the Iraq war, terrorism, and overall foreign policy, Biden considers himself a 'muscular Democrat.'" Biden "said the Bush administration's policy has made the United States more vulnerable to terrorism, not less."

Graham Cultivates "Independent" Image, Disparages "Party-Line Politics." The State (7/2, Rosen) reports, "When Lindsey Graham first came to Congress almost a dozen years ago, he quickly became known as a Republican attack dog who helped lead the House impeachment of President Clinton. These days, conservative activists are less enchanted with" him. The State notes Graham's cooperative efforts with Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Charles Schumer, and adds that he "was an early critic of the U.S. military's excessive interrogation practices at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and elsewhere." According to The State, "Much like his friend and mentor" Sen. John McCain, Graham "disdains party-line politics and revels in his independence. … Graham's articulateness and high profile have led some political analysts to cast him as a possible 2008 presidential candidate — a job for which he adamantly denies having even the slightest interest."

GOP Seek To Benefit From Projecting Tough Image For Elections. The Los Angeles Times (7/2, McManus, Wallsten, 958K) reports that after experiencing past success in campaigning on national security and counter-terrorism issues, "in the face of increasing violence in Iraq and eroding public support for the war at home, Republicans are turning again to the theme of toughness — with gloves off." GOP "strategists hailed last week's Supreme Court ruling on detainees." GOP pollster Whit Ayres said, "The Supreme Court ruling on Guantanamo was a real blessing in disguise." Ayres said the ruling "allows us to have a debate on whether terrorists should receive the same legal protections as American military personnel. … It's hard to see Republicans losing when that's the debate." In response, "Democratic leaders say, at least in public, that they are confident they can win that debate." Yet "the Democrats' response so far has been less unified, less pointed and less memorable than the Republicans' attacks."

Democrats Hope To Make Gains Among Rural Voters. The Washington Post (7/2, A5, Cillizza, 744K) reports, "The wooing of rural voters is essential to Democrats' hopes for taking back the Senate this November, party strategists say. Rural voters wield real electoral power in Missouri, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Montana, Tennessee, Virginia and Arizona -- all of which are being targeted this fall by Democrats." Sen. Charles Schumer, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, "said the Bush administration's economic policies have created an opening for his party to argue that rural voters have a self-interest in backing Democrats." However, "The raw numbers are daunting. Exit polling in the 2004 presidential race showed Bush carrying rural areas 57 percent to 42 percent over Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.). Similar margins have fueled Republican victories on the state and local levels, where candidates have repeatedly used social issues such as abortion and same-sex marriage to advantage over Democrats."

Democrats Remain Unable To Blunt Effectiveness Of GOP's "Values Agenda." The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (7/2, Shesgreen, 310K) reports, "Last week, House Republican leaders unveiled an election-year 'values agenda' that included a gay marriage ban, abortion restrictions and legislation preserving the words 'under God' in the Pledge of Allegiance, among other items. And the Senate spent two days debating a constitutional amendment to ban flag desecration before defeating it, just a few weeks after an amendment banning gay marriage met the same fate. These hot-button cultural issues are designed to rev up the Republican base and cut into Democratic support among rural blue-collar voters; they are so-called 'wedge' issues that in the last election helped propel George W. Bush to a second term and boosted Republican majorities in Congress. That 2004 vote sent Democrats reeling, with many calling for a re-examination of the way they talked about faith and politics and a new push to win back 'values voters' who over the last few election cycles have come to see the Democratic Party as reflexively anti-religion. … It's unclear whether Democrats, despite their soul-searching, will be able to reframe the debate with their own moral tilt and cut into the established GOP advantage on these issues. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., suggested in a speech last week that Democrats had fallen into a trap of their own making on religious issues and had made little progress despite evidence of the serious electoral ramifications."

"Scandal at the Coast Guard Academy." The New York Times (7/2, 1.19M) editorializes on a recent scandal at the Coast Guard Academy. After noting that the academy has a highest proportion of women of all the military service academies, it writes, "For the first time in its 130-year history, the academy court-martialed a cadet, convicting him on sodomy, indecent assault and extortion charges after four female cadets accused him of assaulting them. The stories that emerged from the trial are enough to make any reasonable person question how such allegations are handled at the academy." Of the academy's announcement that it will start involving women in sexual harassment investigations, the Times says, "It is frankly surprising, and somewhat appalling, that such a basic step was not taken years ago."

Washington Post: "Let There Be Law." The Washington Post (7/2, B6, 744K) in an editorial faults Congress for failing to address the issue of detainee policy and writes, "There is an opportunity to provide legislative authorization -- along with limits, safeguards and accountability -- for all of the powers and practices the U.S. government may need in a long-term confrontation with violent Islamist extremism." But there is a "danger" that "Congress will become reckless and hasty and abdicate the responsibility the court has given it. With midterm elections looming, the administration may push for quick legislative fixes." The Post concludes, "This is a moment in which this country can correct the mistake of five years ago, when the executive branch sought to fight a novel war based on a combination of outdated laws and new rules it made up on its own. The Supreme Court has created the chance to bring real law to the war on terror -- if Congress is willing to do its job."

"Backtracking in Darfur." The Washington Post (7/2, Editorial, 744K) editorializes that Sudan's government reversed itself on allowing United Nations peacekeepers into the western region of Darfur. President Omar Hassan al-Bashir is "attributing U.S. pressure for intervention to 'Jewish organizations'" even as "Ayman al-Zawahiri, the deputy leader of al-Qaeda, recently accused the United Nations of preparing to occupy Sudan and divide it." The problem is that "Bashir has calculated that he can snub the international community with impunity." While "History has demonstrated that Mr. Bashir's regime is susceptible to foreign pressure," that "pressure has to be consistent to work, and recently the international community has appeared divided." Now, "Worrisomely, President Bush's point man on Sudan, Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick, is leaving for Wall Street, and his ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, recently refused to accompany his Security Council colleagues on a trip to Sudan. But if Mr. Bashir's shameless outpourings are not enough to solidify diplomatic efforts to isolate his regime, it's hard to know what would be."

Los Angeles Times: "Supreme Court freshmen." The Los Angeles Times (7/2, 958K) in an editorial writes, "Less than a year ago, some liberal activists were warning that the confirmation of Roberts...would jerk the court unacceptably to the right. That critique was recycled a little more respectably when President Bush named Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. to replace perennial swing vote Sandra Day O'Connor. ... Yet the seismic shift dreaded by liberals and dreamed about by conservatives hasn't occurred. ... Even when Roberts and Alito would have shifted the law dramatically, as they did in supporting a much narrower definition of wetlands subject to federal regulation, their colleagues balked. In that case, as in last week's decision on the commissions...Kennedy...distanced himself from the conservative bloc . In other cases he voted with the conservatives, vindicating the observation that, just as the Rehnquist court was really the O'Connor court, the Roberts court is actually the Kennedy court."

"A noncommittal Fed." The Los Angeles Times (7/2, 958K) in an editorial titled "A Noncommittal Fed" writes, "Talk about irrational exuberance. Stock markets surged Thursday because of what the Federal Reserve didn't say." While delivering as expected its 17th consecutive interest rate hike since mid-2004, the Federal Open Market Committee said that while economic growth slowed, other factors "have the potential to sustain inflation pressures," and said that future moves would depend on the outlooks for economic growth and inflation. Viewing that as the equivalent a noncommittal answer of "That depends," the Times argued, "All the recent volatility and confusion about discerning the Fed's real intentions should lead Chairman Ben S. Bernanke to forge ahead with one of his long-standing pet ideas: having the Fed publicly set a target for inflation." The editorial notes about two dozen central banks around the world take that approach, which by making expectations clear, could dampen inflationary pressures. "Having a clear target would further enhance the Fed's predictability," the Times concluded.

"So what if they're born gay?"

Washington's Schedule
Today's Events In Washington 19

TERRORISM NEWS:

Administration Faces Lack Of Options In Closing Guantanamo. The Washington Post (7/2, A8, White, 744K) reports that while the Administration would prefer to close the Guantanamo Bay detention facility, "there is no timetable and no specific plan for how to do it" because according to senior Administration officials "there are only two options for the men the United States deems too dangerous to release: transfer them to federal or military prisons in the United States -- such as the supermax facilities or Fort Leavenworth -- or arrange for another country to assume responsibility for their detention." Currently, "no third country has said it would be willing to take the men, and the Bush administration has been reluctant to consider allowing them to be transferred onto U.S. soil. Senior officials said in interviews it is possible that any suspects who are convicted of crimes could land in U.S. prisons." The Los Angeles Times (7/2, Williams, 958K) publishes a Q&A on the subject of the Guantanamo detainees.

Court Intervention Could Have Wide Impact On Administration Counter-Terrorism Policies. Continuing a theme popular in the media after the Supreme Court's ruling on US detainee policy, Adam Liptak in a "Week in Review" article in the New York Times (7/2, 1.19M) says that in an interview, professor John Yoo, "a principal architect of the Bush administration's legal response to the terrorist threat," said the court's decision "may signal the collapse of the entire" set of Administration policies. Yoo said, "t could affect detention conditions, interrogation methods, the use of force. … It could affect every aspect of the war on terror." In addition, "constitutional lawyers across the political spectrum agreed" it "could devastate the administration's main legal justifications for its campaign against the terrorist threat."

Justices Seen As Providing Hope For Those Concerned About Civil Rights. Author Jonathan Mahler, who is working on a book about Salim Hamdan and his defense lawyers, in the New York Times Magazine (7/1) writes, "Throughout our history, war has led to the abrogation of rights. … More often than not, when asked to rule on the legality of these extraordinary measures, the Supreme Court has given the commander in chief a wide berth. This is understandable: 'Judges, like other citizens, do not wish to hinder a nation's "war effort,"' Justice William Rehnquist once wrote. And yet, when the court sets aside civil liberties and defers to the president, it acts out of fear; when the court checks the president and reaffirms those liberties, it acts out of strength -- and, equally, hope."

Past Experience May Have Shaped Justice Steven's Ruling. Accentuating the difference between the court's past deference to the executive and legislative branches in times of war Mahler in his New York Times Magazine (7/1) article notes that Justice John Paul Stevens clerked for then-Justice Wiley Rutledge in 1947 when Rutledge wrote a minority opinion in defense of Japanese Gen. Tomoyuki Yamashita. Rutledge wrote that the rights in the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment "belong to every person in the world, victor or vanquished, whatever may be his race, color or beliefs." Mahler notes, "Stevens, it would seem, had absorbed his mentor's distaste for unbridled power. 'He was finally able to vindicate those values that Rutledge championed,' says Allison Danner, who clerked for Justice Stevens in the late 1990's."

WPost Challenges Congress To Craft Solution To Detainee Policy. The Washington Post (7/2, B6, 744K) in an editorial faults Congress for failing to address the issue of detainee policy and writes, "There is an opportunity to provide legislative authorization -- along with limits, safeguards and accountability -- for all of the powers and practices the U.S. government may need in a long-term confrontation with violent Islamist extremism." But there is a "danger" that "Congress will become reckless and hasty and abdicate the responsibility the court has given it. With midterm elections looming, the administration may push for quick legislative fixes." The Post concludes, "This is a moment in which this country can correct the mistake of five years ago, when the executive branch sought to fight a novel war based on a combination of outdated laws and new rules it made up on its own. The Supreme Court has created the chance to bring real law to the war on terror -- if Congress is willing to do its job."

Journalists Facing Increased Pressure Over Leaks From Governments. The AP (7/2, Hanley) reports, "Headline by headline, a trickle of news leaks on Iraq and the antiterror campaign has grown into a steady stream of revelations, and from Pennsylvania Avenue to Downing Street, Copenhagen to Canberra, governments are responding with pressure and prosecutions." The AP adds, "Media advocates are alarmed at what they see as a mounting assault on press freedom in country after country, arguing it is potentially chilling the pursuit of truth as U.S. and European leaders pursue wars on terror and in Iraq."

Administration Seen As Shifting Standards Over Leaks. Julie Mason in her "White House Watch" column in the Houston Chronicle (7/2, 581K) writes, "President Bush's sustained outrage last week about newspaper reports on a program tracking terrorists' financial records may have seemed odd considering how urgently the administration once publicized the program's broad concepts." Mason notes, "Thirteen days after Sept. 11, Bush signed an executive order expanding the Treasury Department's authority to track the bank activities of those with suspected ties to terrorism. The White House sent reporters a detailed fact sheet on the new powers." And "Bush summoned the news media to the Rose Garden to trumpet the program alongside the secretaries of state and treasury." Mason adds, "The difference between disclosures in the Rose Garden and in the newspaper is that the Times and others are reporting operational details, according to the White House."

NYT, LAT Decisions To Publish Details About National Security Programs Defended. Scott Shane in a "Week in Review" article in the New York Times (7/2, 1.19M) defends the recent disclosures by the media of US national security programs writing that "for decades, American newspapers and broadcasters have regularly censored themselves on security grounds, plucking compromising details from a story, delaying its publication or killing it entirely. The New York Times has withheld articles that might have jeopardized counterterrorism programs or efforts to protect vulnerable stockpiles of nuclear material."

In response to Administration criticism the New York Times, public editor Byron Calame writes, "Roughly 1,000 e-mails have come to me, about 85 percent of them critical of the decision to publish the story and a large fraction venomous. It was time to take a close look at the handling of the article in search of answers." In contrast to the public reaction, Calame's "close look convinced me that Bill Keller…was correct in deciding that Times readers deserved to read about the banking-data surveillance program."

And Frank Rich in his column in the New York Times (7/2, 1.19M) accuses Republicans of using the media's recent disclosures about US national security programs as a "ruse to distract Americans from the wreckage in Iraq."

Schwarzenegger Will Release Intelligence Reports. The Los Angeles Times (7/2, Nicholas, 958K) reports, "Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's office said Saturday he was ordering the release of dozens of intelligence reports prepared for the state Office of Homeland Security--a step that comes as lawmakers from both parties are denouncing a practice in which state intelligence agents compiled information about political and antiwar protests and rallies." Officials say that only two of over sixty contractor-prepared reports for the state homeland security agency included material on political protests, but allowing the media to review all of them will reassure the public that the practice was not more widespread. The Times had reported Saturday on the suspect reports. The state agency said it would allow media to review, but not copy, the reports, from which "law-enforcement-sensitive information" dealing with such matters as "ongoing investigations" and related "safety threats" would first be removed. The article also notes that some legislators say the incidence shows the need for greater oversight of the state security organization. Spokesmen for the governor and the state security agency both declared that they disapproved of and did not request information on political protests.

US And Canadian Law Enforcement Demonstrate Increased Cooperation. The Washington Post (7/2, A3, Pomfret, 744K) reports last week U.S. and Canadian law enforcement officials "highlighted the increasingly close and institutionalized cooperation between the two nations' police agencies." Cooperative Operations, "called 'parallel investigations' because of sensitivity about sovereignty issues…reflect the fundamentally different strategies used to secure the United States' two very different borders. … Along the Canadian border, there are no plans for fences, and efforts focus on smuggling and terrorism. U.S. and Canadian authorities are patrolling together on the Great Lakes and have plans to operate a joint radio network." The Post adds, "Americans and Canadians also share law enforcement intelligence. U.S. agents aided the Canadians in their investigation into an alleged terrorist plot stymied on June 3 with the arrest of 17 men and teenagers in Ontario, law enforcement officials said. Five years ago, only Canadians worked at the Mounted Police headquarters in Ottawa, said Joe Oliver, a Canadian police superintendent. Now, Americans representing four agencies are based there, he said, adding that cooperation is 'pervasive.'"

DOJ_NMG_0037995

Post (7/2, 744K) warns that "key members of the Bush administration have claimed that al-Qaeda is 'on the run' (Donald Rumsfeld and Condoleezza Rice), 'disrupted' (George Tenet) or 'decimated' (President Bush). At the same time, however, significant terrorist attacks around the world have dramatically increased since Sept. 11, 2001, most of them conducted by militant Islamists. How does one reconcile this apparent contradiction?" Although "the rapid spread of al-Qaeda's ideology in the past two years -- partly fueled by the Iraq war -- should be of considerable concern, it would be quite wrong to conclude that al-Qaeda the organization is down for the count. Indeed, if the bombings in London are any indication, it may be staging a comeback." Five years after the 9/11 attacks "al-Qaeda not only remains in business in its traditional stronghold on the Afghan-Pakistan border, but continues to project its ideology and terrorism abroad. So now we face a world of ideologically driven homegrown terrorists…in addition to formal networks such as al-Qaeda that have managed to survive despite the tremendous pressure brought to bear against them since 9/11. And even more grim, they now feed off and strengthen one another."

Papers Show BBC Allowed Intelligence Officials To Examine Employees. The Washington Times (7/2, Hastings, 90K) reports, "Confidential papers obtained by the Sunday Telegraph reveal that the British Broadcasting Corp. allowed intelligence agents to investigate the backgrounds and political affiliations of thousands of its employees, including newsreaders, reporters and continuity announcers. The files, which shed light on the BBC's hitherto secret links with the counter-espionage service known as MI5, show that at one stage it was responsible for vetting 6,300 BBC posts -- almost a third of the total work force. The procedure was phased out in the late 1980s. The files also show that the corporation maintained a list of 'subversive organizations' and that evidence of certain kinds of political activity could be a bar to appointment or promotion."

WAR NEWS:

Blast Kills 66 In Baghdad. The leading story on the network news and making front page headlines in the Washington Post and New York Times was the car bombing in Baghdad, with attention devoted to evolving details of the rape and murder allegations against US troops. The bombing in the Shiite stronghold Sadr City in Baghdad that killed over 60 Iraqis and injured over 100 more was seen as a threat to Iraqi political stability. The CBS Evening News (7/1, lead story, 2:40, Mitchell, 7.66M) noted that public outrage over the attack in Iraq came as the Iraqi prime minister "began his first tour of neighboring countries, hoping to build support for his government but just as he left came the news that one of his parliament's new female members had been abducted, along with her security detail." Iraqi lawmaker Mahmoud Othman: "If you can't establish security and stability, then you can't have a progress in the political process." Cowan: "It's not that the new government hasn't had its successes," yet "if today is any indication, it would seem that that wedge is being driven even deeper. Sectarian violence was already on the rise ever since this new government took over, and today's developments between the kidnapping and the bombing, most expect that will start another increased circle of violence."

NBC Nightly News (7/1, lead story, 3:00, Boettcher, 9.87M) reported, "Despite a two-week-old security clamp down in Baghdad -- Operation Together Forward -- sectarian violence continues according to the U.S. military and a prospect of all out civil conflict increases. A U.S. general says coalition forces will continue to pressure insurgents." Major General William Caldwell: "We continue to disrupt the network and we will not cease." Boettcher: "Only one week ago Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki launched his plan for national reconciliation. ... But today in Iraq, one bomb, one kidnapping and a message from Osama bin Laden moved warring factions further apart. Reconciliation remains a distant dream."

Describing the attack as part of an environment of continuing violence, ABC World News Tonight (7/1, story 3, 2:05, Brown, 8.78M) reported, "This was no routine bombing. This was the biggest since the new Iraqi government was sworn in this spring. And the most lethal so far this year." The attack "comes just three weeks after the government introduced the new security clampdown in Baghdad. Since then, the number of attacks has actually gone up. Today's explosion may well be one of the deadliest since the war. It becomes part of a catalog of carnage."

The Washington Post (7/2, Knickmeyer, 744K) reports, "Saturday's massive bomb, powerful enough to hurl bodies of shoppers onto the roofs of high-rise buildings surrounding the market in Baghdad's Sadr City district, drew angry denunciations from survivors, suggesting Iraqis could quickly sour on Maliki's initiatives if insurgent attacks once again begin claiming dozens of lives at a time. It adds, "U.S. military officers and academics alike had predicted at least a brief surge in attacks immediately after Zarqawi's killing, saying militant Sunni groups would want to show they had survived his loss."

The Washington Times/AP (7/1, Reid) reports that the Baghdad bombing "was the deadliest attack since the new national unity government took office six weeks ago and one of the biggest this year. Shortly before the midmorning blast, gunmen seized a female Sunni legislator at a checkpoint in a Shiite area of the capital. Both attacks represented a major challenge to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's vow to curb sectarian violence." An unverifiable group called the "Sunna Supporters Group" claimed responsibility on the Internet for the bombing. The AP pessimistically notes that, since the death of Zarqawi, "more than 700 Iraqi civilians and security forces have died violently." The Los Angeles Times (7/2, Roug and Salman, 958K) devotes a long article to the same bloodshed, which quotes angry witnesses to the market bombings and gives graphic details. The New York Times (7/2, Wong, 1.19M) notes, like the other sources, the attack's status as deadliest since Prime Minister Maliki's accession. It gives graphic details of the bombing scene and calls the bombing and female legislator's abduction "the most direct challenge yet to the fledgling Iraqi government."

Maliki Gains Saudi Support For Peace Plan. The AFP (7/2) reports, "Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki won Saudi Arabia's backing for his efforts to halt the bloodshed in Iraq at the start of a Gulf tour to rally support for his peace plan." Crown Prince Sultan bin Abdul Aziz told Maliki, "On behalf of ... King Abdullah, I assure you of ... (Saudi Arabia's) full support for you and your constitutional government." He added that "Saudi Arabia hoped his government would usher in 'stability and security' in Iraq and put an end to the hardships of the Iraqi people." Maliki "T apparently wants to enlist help during his tour to influence the former elite community of Sunni Arabs in Iraq as many of its leaders have close ties with the oil-rich Gulf Arab states." Iraqi Minister of State for National Dialogue Akram al-Hakim earlier said the tour will also include the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait."

The AP (7/2) adds that US ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad "noted that al-Maliki was traveling to Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait this weekend to drum up support for his reconciliation efforts," saying "The new government is reaching out not only to all Iraqis but also to its neighbors." He added, "We expect these visits to be successful, as the countries that Mr. Maliki is visiting understand what happens in Iraq will affect the stability of the area and shape the future of the region."

Baghdad Death Toll Over 260 In Last Four Days. As part of its coverage of the most recent attack, The CBS Evening News (7/1, lead story, 2:40, Cowan, 7.66M) highlighted the impact of recent violence on Iraqis, noting the Baghdad morgue "announced [it] received in four days more than 260 bodies."

Shiite Lawmaker Survives Bombing Attack. The AP (7/2) reports, "A Shiite legislator escaped an assassination attempt Sunday when a roadside bomb missed his convoy in downtown Baghdad — a day after a female Sunni legislator was kidnapped by gunmen from her car." The intended victim was "Iyad Jamal al-Din, a cleric from the secular Allawi List bloc in parliament."

Khalilzad Says US Willing To Free More As 495 Iraqi Detainees Released. The AFP (7/2) report that "US ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad promised that more detainees would be freed from US and government-run prisons in Iraq as a seventh batch of nearly 500 was released." A justice ministry spokesman said those "security detainees held without charge were freed Saturday as part of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's national reconciliation plan." Khalilzad also said, "we are prepared in consultation with the Iraqi leaders to make future prisoner releases and to take other concrete steps to facilitate reconciliation." Khalilzad once again called "on Sunni Arab insurgents to lay down their arms" and "on the government to bring 'all militias and other illegal armed groups under control and to strengthen Iraq's security institutions," saying that "disagreements over the reconciliation plan must be 'expressed through dialogue rather than through violence.'"

New Details Released About Rape And Murder Allegations Against US Soldiers. ABC World News Tonight (7/1, story 4, 1:30, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "There are new and deeply disturbing, if true, details reported about the charge that American soldiers stalked, brutally raped an Iraqi woman and killed her and her family in an attempt to cover it all up." ABC (Yang): "The new details are chilling and suggest that this incident could be even more explosive than first thought. ABC News has been told that the soldiers spotted the woman they're suspected of raping while on patrol sometime before the incident in March. In fact, the New York Times and Associated Press quote military sources saying the soldiers may have targeted the family and planned the attack for nearly a week." ABC News consultant Gen. Jack Keane (Ret.): "I don't believe it's functioning as a military organization, more like a gang. And we don't want any part of it on the battlefield, in America's military." Yang: "This is at least the fifth ongoing investigation of alleged atrocities against Iraqi civilians ... Allegations of rape are especially serious in a conservative Islamic nation like Iraq and with widespread media coverage in Iraq, animosity toward the United States is likely to grow."

The Washington Post (7/2, Knickmeyer, 744K) reports, "The U.S. military ... disclosed new details about allegations that soldiers raped a woman and killed her, along with her mother, father and a sibling, in March in a village south of Baghdad. A U.S. military official revealed Saturday that the target of the alleged attack was a 20-year-old Iraqi woman who lived with her family near an American military checkpoint. One resident of the village of Mahmudiyah al-Kasr al-Awsat said Saturday that the young woman had complained of harassment by U.S. soldiers each time she passed through the American checkpoint." However, details from different sources in the Post story differ, such as the age of the victim. The New York Times (7/2, Wong, 1.19M) discusses the recent rape and murder allegations, saying,

"Investigators are looking into whether the soldiers monitored the family for a week before carrying out the assault."

Iraqi Sunni Group Criticizes Alleged Rape. The AP (7/2) reports that the Association of Muslim Scholars "strongly condemned reports that U.S. troops raped an Iraqi women then killed her and her family, saying it shows 'the truth of the ugly American face.'" The Sunni group, called a "strong critic" of the US presence in Iraq, said that "raping this girl then mutilating her is shameful and will remain as a sign of shame to American invaders."

Camp Pendleton Trains Marines To Steer Clear Of War Crimes. NBC Nightly News (7/1, story 5, 2:30, Holt, 9.87M) reported that while a number of US service men are alleged to have engaged in misconduct, at Camp Pendleton "commanders reinforced the values that would ensure the best behavior out of the worst circumstances." Gen. Barry McCaffrey (Ret.): "Each of these deploying battalions go through a extensive work-up. I would argue we have never had a more rigorous training program in our military history." NBC (Mullen): "Instructors are quick to point out they also teach classes on cultural sensitivity and the rules of engagement so Marines know how to act appropriately under extreme pressure. Somehow with even more incidents being reported of troops crossing the line, commanders will have to find the disconnect between the practice field and battlefield."

Bin Laden Tape Endorses Sectarian Warfare, A First For Al Qaeda. The CBS Evening News (7/1, story 2, 2:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "U.S. intelligence agencies are scrambling to decipher the latest message from Osama bin Laden and to understand why it came so quickly on the heels of an earlier message posted on the internet just hours before." CBS (Chen): "Two messages in just 39 hours. Osama bin Laden quickly delivered on a promise to put out a second audio tape, this time urging Iraqi militants to keep up their fight against U.S.-led forces. 'Stay steadfast and don't leave Baghdad.' U.S. intelligence analysts will look closely at bin Laden's words, but may be more interested in his ability to put out the messages at all." Former CIA analyst Michael Scheuer: "It's meant to show that I'm still here, I'm still in charge of this organization, and in fact, our organization, our movement is winning."

CNN (7/1, Nasr) reports, "Osama bin Laden in a tape posted on the Web encourages Sunnis in Iraq to retaliate against Shiites, deviating from al Qaeda's stand of not promoting sectarian violence." He said "that Sunnis in Iraq are experiencing annihilation" and urged them to expel the "occupying power." The appeal came in his second message released this week. On the tape he "also names Abu Hamza al-Muhajer as the new leader of al Qaeda in Iraq."

The New York Times/AP (7/1) reports he "also warned nations not to send troops to Somalia, where Islamic militants have taken control of the capital and much of the south." The Washington Post (7/2, DeYoung, 744K) reports that he "warned Iraqi insurgents yesterday not to participate in negotiations with the elected government in Baghdad and urged Muslims in Somalia to violently oppose any challenge to Islamists who have seized power in that country." It calls the relatively brief 48-hour gap between Bin Laden recordings this week an indication of "an ever-faster turnaround time" and says he demonstrates "a close and current knowledge" of the Horn of Africa in his Somalia discussion. The AP (7/2, Riechmann) reports that he said to Al Qaeda members in Iraq, "Stay steadfast and don't leave Baghdad, otherwise all the capitals in the region will fall to the crusaders."

Hazardous Combat Duty In Ramadi Is Described. The New York Times (7/2, Filkins, 1.19M) quotes the statements of Marine Lance Cpl. Joseph Hamlin as he guards Post 1 in Ramadi, Iraq. The article implicitly contrasts his youth and the danger of his posting.

US Investigates Possible "Friendly Fire" Death In Afghanistan. The CBS Evening News (7/1, story 3, 0:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The U.S. military said today an American soldier who died in eastern Afghanistan's Kunar province this week may have been killed by friendly fire. Five US and two Canadian soldiers were wounded as were three civilian workers." The Washington Times/AP (7/2, Tran) reports, "The U.S. military on Saturday said it was investigating the death of a soldier in eastern Afghanistan as a possible 'friendly fire incident.' The Defense Department said Pfc. Justin R. Davis, 19, of Gaithersburg, Md., died on June 25 in eastern Kunar province when he came in contact with indirect fire — a term used for mortar shelling — while on patrol during combat operations." Other deaths from friendly fire are noted: "According to U.S. Army data earlier this year, 17 soldiers have died from friendly fire in the past four years — 10 in Iraq and seven in Afghanistan. They occurred in 11 separate incidents. The most famous case was the 2004 death of former NFL player Pat Tillman."

Two British Soldiers Are Killed In Afghanistan. The AP (7/2) reports, "Two British soldiers were killed after their base came under attack from suspected Taliban fighters in southern Afghanistan, a military official said Sunday. The incident occurred Saturday night in Sangin district in southern Helmand province."

Bush, Cheney Salute US Armed Forces. President Bush's radio address saluting US troops' sacrifices received little media attention, but Vice President Dick Cheney's appearance at the Pepsi 400 NASCAR race was highlighted by some prominent media outlets. The AP (7/2) reports, "President Bush paid tribute to America's armed forces Saturday, calling Independence Day a time to thank the men and women who defend freedom." In his radio address Bush said, "For more than two centuries, from the camps of Valley Forge to the mountains of Afghanistan, Americans have served and sacrificed for the principles of our founding. … Today, a new generation of American patriots is defending our freedom against determined and ruthless enemies." Bush "urged people to help America Supports You, a nationwide program set up by the Defense Department to communicate citizen support to military men and women at home and abroad."

Political Leaders Court Members Of Military At Patriotic Events. The Washington Times/AP (7/2, Pickler) in an article covering Vice President Cheney's appearance at the Pepsi 400 NASCAR race in Daytona notes it "has become a popular event for national leaders. President Reagan was the first commander in chief to attend a race when he went in 1984. Both President Bush and his father have attended the race, and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld attended last year." It "is a particularly patriotic event because it is scheduled for the Independence Day weekend and draws a large military crowd."

The Los Angeles Times/Orlando Sentinel (7/2, Lelis) in an article titled "Cheney Revs Up Schedule In Florida" reports, "Playing off the patriotic themes that dominated the Daytona International Speedway this weekend, Vice President Dick Cheney spent his time at the Pepsi 400 praising the military and hailing its ties to NASCAR." Some "race fans judged Cheney's appearance as a shrewd public relations move."

The Washington Times/AP (7/2) reports, "The stock cars weren't the only things buzzing the track at Daytona yesterday -- Vice President Dick Cheney made his grand entrance when Air Force II flew in low over the crowd gathering for the Pepsi 400 NASCAR race." Cheney "got a standing ovation from the drivers and their crews and his excited staff took pictures with Dale Earnhardt Jr."

In Egypt, Gonzales Defends Renditions, Says He Will Station Lawyer In Egypt. The AP (7/2, El-Magd) reports that Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, "in his first visit to Egypt…defended the transfer of terror suspects for incarceration and interrogation in other countries." While he "acknowledged the U.S. practice of sending terror suspects to prisons in their home countries," Gonzales "refused to confirm reports that Egypt, whose human rights record has been criticized by Washington, had received any of the suspects," saying, "it's intelligence activity and we just don't do that." After meeting with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Gonzales also "said the U.S. would send a Justice Department lawyer to be stationed in Cairo 'so we can further cement our relationship and we have someone on the ground representing me.'"

The AFP (7/2, Bassoul) adds, "Gonzales insisted that the US seeks assurances before returning the suspects," saying, "We do have a legal obligation not to render someone back to a country where we know they might be mistreated or tortured." However, it lead with his defense of special military tribunals for terrorist suspects. While in Egypt Gonzales also "met with justice minister Mahmud Abou Leil and interior minister Habib al-Adli."

Kennedy Emerges As Powerful SCOTUS Swing Vote. The Los Angeles Times (7/2, Savage, 958K) reports John Roberts "may be the new chief justice, but the Supreme Court is not truly the Roberts court, at least not yet. In the most divisive cases before the court in the term that just ended, it was Justice Anthony M. Kennedy who determined the outcome every time. In unpredictable fashion, he sided some of the time with the court's conservative bloc and some of the time with its liberals." The Times notes, "For the last decade, Justices Kennedy and Sandra Day O'Connor…had supplied the votes that decided the court's major cases. They usually joined with the conservatives on issues of crime, the death penalty, civil rights and states' rights, but with the liberals on abortion, gay rights and school prayer. Now, with O'Connor in retirement, Kennedy stands alone at the center."

The Washington Post (7/2, A6, Lane, 744K) reports, "by the end of the term, it was clear that the main impact of the turnover was to enhance the influence of…Kennedy. … An eclectic and sometimes inscrutable moderate conservative, Kennedy repeatedly cast the decisive vote on the most polarizing issues the court faced, from President Bush's military commissions, to the Clean Water Act, to the death penalty. He is poised to do so again next term when the court takes up the issues of abortion and school integration."

The New York Times (7/2, A1, Greenhouse, 1.19M) in a front page story adds, "Perhaps" this is "the Kennedy court, based on the frequency with which…Kennedy cast the deciding vote in important cases. Or perhaps it was more accurately seen as the Stevens court, reflecting the ability of John Paul Stevens…to deliver a majority in the case for which the term will go down in history" – the Hamdan case.

In an op-ed for the Washington Post (7/2, 744K) Slate's Dahlia Lithwick writes, "The new John G. Roberts Supreme Court is only one term old, and already we're all wrong about it. Liberals had feared, and conservatives had feted, the end of judicial review as we know it, at least until last week's blockbuster ruling in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld proved that bit of conventional wisdom wrong practically before it had become conventional. Predictions of a new era of hands-off judicial minimalism may have been premature. … More significant, the role of swing justice has itself swung from O'Connor to..Kennedy. On all the most divisive issues, today's court is now a Supreme Court of One."

The Los Angeles Times (7/2, 958K) in an editorial writes, "Less than a year ago, some liberal activists were warning that the confirmation of Roberts…would jerk the court unacceptably to the right. That critique was recycled a little more respectably when President Bush named Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. to replace perennial swing vote Sandra Day O'Connor. … Yet the seismic shift dreaded by liberals and dreamed about by conservatives hasn't occurred. … Even when Roberts and Alito would have shifted the law dramatically, as they did in supporting a much narrower definition of wetlands subject to federal regulation, their colleagues balked. In that case, as in last week's decision on the commissions…Kennedy…distanced himself from the conservative bloc . In other cases he voted with the conservatives, vindicating the observation that, just as the Rehnquist court was really the O'Connor court, the Roberts court is actually the Kennedy court."

Roberts Has Failed To Assemble Majorities In Key Cases. The New York Times (7/2, A1, Greenhouse, 1.19M) in its front page story reports, "As the dust settled on a consequential Supreme Court term, the first in 11 years with a change in membership and the first in two decades with a new chief justice, one question that lingered was whether it was now the Roberts court, in fact as well as in name. The answer: not yet. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. was clearly in charge, presiding over the court with grace, wit and meticulous preparation. But he was not in control." According to the Times, "In the court's most significant nonunanimous cases…Roberts was in dissent almost as often as he was in the majority. His goal of inspiring the court to speak softly and unanimously seemed a distant aspiration as important cases failed to produce majority opinions and members of the court, including occasionally the chief justice himself, gave voice to their frustration and pique with colleagues who did not see things their way."

The Washington Post (7/2, A6, Lane, 744K) reports, "Roberts voted in 10 five-justice majorities, the second-most on the court, but he joined the four liberals only once, in a minor procedural case."

Will Analyzes Kennedy's Opinion In Texas Redistricting Case. In his column for the Washington Post (7/2, 744K) George Will writes that Kennedy cast the swing vote in "cases concerning Texas redistricting. The cases involved several questions, the most interesting -- because it has come to the court before and we now know it will again and because it revealed a recurring and worrisome kind of judging -- was this: Was the redistricting by the Republican-controlled legislature such a partisan gerrymander as to be somehow unconstitutional? The court's dusty answer to this question is symptomatic of the difference-splitting that characterized the last years of the Rehnquist Court. In a plurality opinion, Kennedy said there may be a 'manageable, reliable measure of fairness' in redistricting, but no set of facts has sufficed for the court to discover it. … By leaving open the possibility that there is a constitutional answer to the question of what constitutes a 'too political' gerrymander -- the position seems to be: We don't know what the standard is, but we don't know that it doesn't exist -- the court has again practiced 'split-the-difference jurisprudence.' That phrase is from Judge J. Harvie Wilkinson of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, writing in the Stanford Law Review."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Scrushy Says He Will Fight Conviction With "Everything We've Got." The Wall Street Journal (7/1, Bauerlein) reports HealthSouth founder Richard M. Scrushy "vowed to fight his conviction on political-corruption charges with 'everything we've got' and he said it was a mistake to limit his defense during the two-month trial to less than two days. In an interview, Mr. Scrushy said his lawyers probably should have called 10 to 15 witnesses over about a two-week period to help undercut the federal government's allegations that he bribed former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman to get a spot on a state panel that regulates hospitals. 'We didn't put them up' because the prosecution's case seemed unconvincing, Mr. Scrushy said. 'We didn't feel we needed to.'" Scrushy "said he will appeal his conviction Thursday by a jury in Montgomery, Ala., on five or six different legal grounds. Before the trial, his lawyers contended that the jury pool included too few African-Americans and that Mr. Scrushy should be tried separately from three other defendants in the case. Mr. Scrushy said Friday that those issues could be part of his appeal."

Ralphs To Settle For $70 Million. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Zimmerman, White) reports the Ralphs grocery chain "said Friday that it had agreed to pay $70 million in fines and restitution to settle criminal charges that it illegally rehired locked-out workers during the supermarket labor dispute in Southern California more than two years ago. Under a proposed agreement filed Friday in U.S. District Court in Los Angeles, Ralphs would plead guilty to five felony charges included in the 53-count grand jury indictment returned against the company in December. Ralphs was charged with violating federal laws by secretly rehiring about 1,000 locked-out workers during the 4 1/2 -month strike and lockout from October 2003 to February 2004. The case had been scheduled to go to trial Aug. 15 before U.S. District Judge Percy Anderson, who must approve the plea agreement."

KLA-Tencor Says Some Stock Options Wrongly Dated. The Wall Street Journal (7/1, Forelle) reports, "KLA-Tencor Corp. said Friday that an internal investigation found that some stock options to executives and employees were wrongly dated, and said that the problems could lead to an accounting charge and possibly a restatement. The semiconductor-equipment maker provided little detail about the probe's findings in a press release, but the possibility of an accounting charge strongly implies that the misdating benefited executives and raises the question of whether grants were deliberately backdated or otherwise manipulated to confer that benefit. The firm said it anticipates needing to take a charge to correct its accounting, but it said that the investigation, conducted by a board committee, has not determined if the charge will be significant enough to warrant restatement of prior figures."

MZM Manager Accused Of Violating FEC Rules. The Washington Post (7/1, A10, Smith) reports, "The director of a defense contractor's office in Martinsville, Va., was accused yesterday of illegally funneling campaign donations to Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr. (R-Va.), an act that the contractor has said was meant to obtain Goode's help in arranging defense funding for his company. A federal court filing by the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia, Kenneth L. Wainstein, said that Richard A. Berglund, a facility manager for MZM Inc., had violated the Federal Election Campaign Act by 'aiding and abetting' a scheme by MZM's owner to donate the funds in the name of others. According to the filing, Berglund and his wife wrote $4,000 in checks to 'Representative A' in March 2005 after MZM's owner, Mitchell J. Wade, handed Berglund an equivalent amount of cash. It says that Berglund gave another $4,000 he received from Wade to two MZM colleagues, who in turn donated it to the congressman." FEC records show that Berglund and his wife "gave that amount to Goode that month. He made no other donations to lawmakers that year."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Overturns "Mafia Cops" Racketeering Convictions. US District Judge Jack B. Weinstein on Friday overturned the racketeering convictions of "mafia cops" Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, ruling that the five-year statute of limitations for the string of mob murders had expired. Although Weinstein had expressed skepticism about the statute of limitations issue from the trial's outset, the Friday decision stunned the prosecutors and defendants alike.

In a front-page story, the New York Times (7/1, Feuer) reported Weinstein vacated the convictions "despite citing overwhelming evidence that the men had committed 'heinous and violent crimes.'" He "left open the possibility that the prosecution could seek to retry the defendants on a drug charge, and Mr. Eppolito, alone, on a money-laundering count." The decision "shocked the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn, which said it would appeal." The Times noted, "Virtually from the outset of the case, Judge Weinstein said he was queasy about the decision to accuse the men of an overarching conspiracy that included the eight gangland murders, all in Brooklyn in the 1980's and 1990's, and a much more recent — and less serious — charge of selling an ounce of methamphetamine in Las Vegas last year." The New York Daily News (7/1, Front Page, Marzulli) added that the "conviction was stunningly overturned…all because they apparently steered clear of the mob for the last five years. … For now, they will remain behind bars at the Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn until Weinstein hears a likely bail application, sometime after he returns from vacation July 21." The Daily News noted, "The decision was vindication of sorts for the original defense attorneys, Bruce Cutler and Edward Hayes, who were blamed by their clients for the conviction."

Newsday (7/1, DeStefano) called the decision "a stunning development," and reports that "the retrial would involve charges that Eppolito and Caracappa were involved in a small methamphetamine transaction in Nevada, where they both lived after retiring from the Police Department. … Should the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reverse Weinstein's decision, the provisional sentences of life imprisonment that he had given Eppolito and Caracappa would be reinstated." Newsday noted Weinstein "stressed that prosecutors had proved the defendants were involved in eight slayings, two kidnappings and other wrongdoing." The New York Post (7/1, Front Page, Haberman) called it "a bombshell decision" and reports that the ruling "brought Eppolito's daughter, Andrea, to tears." She told the Post, "We've always maintained his innocence. We've always believed in him."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (7/1, McShane) reported that the ruling was "a stunning blow to federal prosecutors." The AP noted, "Defense attorneys had argued that the statute of limitations had expired on the most serious allegations against the pair," but "prosecutors had countered that the murders were part of an ongoing conspiracy that lasted through a 2005 drug deal with FBI informant Steven Corso." Echoing the other stories, the Los Angeles Times (7/1, Barry) called the decision "a stinging rebuke to federal prosecutors," although "Weinstein did not mince words…in addressing the defendants," saying that "the trial 'overwhelmingly established' that the two men had 'kidnapped, murdered and assisted kidnappers and murderers, all the while sworn to protect the public against such crimes.'"

Victims' Families Express Shock, Dismay At Ruling. Under the headline "New Heartbreak For Victims' Kin," the New York Post (7/1, Haberman, Fermino) reported, "Less then three months ago, Betty Hydell was rejoicing that the dirty cops who helped kill her son got what they deserved," but on Friday, "when an FBI agent called her…and told her their conviction had been overturned, she wondered if the evil pair would have the last laugh." Hydell's "reaction -- a mixture of sadness, anger and confusion -- mirrored the other families who lost loved ones at the bloodstained hands of the Mafia cops who took orders from the wrong side of the law. 'I think this whole thing makes a mockery of our judicial system,' said Danielle Lino, whose father, Ed Lino, a Gambino soldier, was shot in the head by Caracappa." The New York Times (7/1, McFadden) noted, "While reaction was swift and predictable — an abyss between victims' families and their lawyers on one side, and defendants and their representatives on the other — there was general agreement that Judge Weinstein had made a hard decision on principle, according to law, and some called it courageous."

The other NYC newspapers also reported on the families' reactions, with Newsday (7/1, MacGowan) headlining its story, "Victims' Families Shocked At Reversal," and the New York Daily News (7/1, Smith) saying, "Victims' Kin Call Ruling 'So Absurd'." Additionally, the Daily News (7/1, Caruso) reported on the reaction by Eppolito's family under the headline "Glorious New Day For Family Of Ex-Cop," noting his daughter, Andrea, said that "she is optimistic about the retrial ahead, even though it will mean more stress, legal fees and time. But she says she thinks the ex-cop's new lawyer, Joseph Bondy, will give the case 100%."

Hacker Attacks Strike Pentagon. The Baltimore Sun (7/2, Gorman, 296K) reports, "The number of reported attempts to penetrate Pentagon computer networks rose sharply in the past decade, from fewer than 800 in 1996 to more than 160,000 last year -- thousands of them successful. At the same time, the nation's ability to safeguard sensitive data in those and other government computer systems is becoming obsolete as efforts to make improvements have faltered and stalled." The NSA's program to protect military and intelligence computers is "seven years behind schedule." Critics fault "poor management" and a "quest for security nirvana" that has kept the NSA from installing workable safeguards while waiting for something ideal. They note the ongoing threat of "monster attack" from "China, Russia, Israel, France and so on," in the words of one unnamed "former government official," as well as a general threat from "as many as 100 countries" to government computers.

Missouri Supreme Court Rules On Sex Offender Registration. The Kansas City Star (7/1, Lambe, Bauer) reports, "The Missouri Supreme Court ruled Friday that thousands of sex offenders no longer have to register, because the law requiring it does not apply retroactively. As a result, although the court unanimously upheld the state's sex offender registry law, only those convicted after the law took effect Jan. 1. 1995, now will have to register. The law previously required people to register if they were convicted after July 1, 1979. This involved more than 11,000 offenders to register, but Friday's ruling lopped off about 16 of 27 years of registration. The ruling written by Judge Laura Denvir Stith also said nothing prevented publishing the information about those who have registered. Offenders before 1995, however, can now move to new addresses that will not have to be listed."

Flag Burnings Said To Be Extremely Rare. The New York Times (7/2, Fountain, 1.19M) reports, "The Senate nearly approved a constitutional amendment last week that would allow Congress to outlaw flag-burning, falling one vote short of the two-thirds majority needed to send it to the states for approval. Opponents, mostly Democrats, warned that if it passed the amendment, the Senate would be tinkering with the Bill of Rights to ban a form of protest that is rare. Just how uncommon is it?" Robert Justin Goldstein, retired political science professor at Oakland University, and "an expert on the issue," is quoted as saying, "My impression is that probably in all of American history there's been something like a few hundred flag burnings."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Says Sarasota County, Florida, Broke Law On Housing. The Bradenton Herald (7/1) reports Sarasota County, Florida, officials "broke federal law when they denied permission for housing for disabled people, according to a lawsuit filed Friday by the U.S. Justice Department. The complaint, filed in U.S. District Court in Tampa, alleges the county refused to allow Renaissance Manor Inc. to operate six homes for individuals with mental illness and a history of substance abuse. The homes are similar to other houses in the county occupied by residents who share living space and common facilities, according to a Justice Department news release. According to the government's complaint, the homes are allowed under Sarasota County's zoning code, but the county determined that the homes broke the code because of the residents' disabilities. The complaint also alleges that the county retaliated against Renaissance Manor by refusing to release grant funds it had been previously awarded."

Maryland Group Opposing Early Voting Moves Case To Court Of Appeals. The Washington Times (7/1, Ward, 90K) reports Marylanders for Fair Elections "will now take its lawsuit to Maryland's Court of Appeals, after" Anne Arundel County Circuit Judge Paul Hackner "yesterday denied its request to keep alive a petition drive that would stop early voting and let voters decide whether they want it in the future." Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s (R) re-election campaign favors the group's suit. Ehrlich called the early voting bills "power grabs by the leadership of the Maryland General Assembly." He has also said that early voting "will make voter-fraud easier to commit." The group opposing early voting "yesterday submitted to Secretary of State Mary D. Kane about 200,000 signatures, roughly twice the number needed" to "halt early voting this fall and place it on the ballot for voters to decide whether it is implemented in the future."

"New Challenges" To Death Penalty Arise. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (7/1, Kohler) writes, "For those opposed to the death penalty, a humane execution might be a contradiction of terms. For those who don't care if a condemned man suffers in his last moments, it might be a pointless concern. The nation has walked a fine line between those views for more than a century in seeking ways the founding fathers intended to permit to snuff capital criminals. States used hangmen's nooses, gases, electricity and, finally, injections. But new challenges have raised questions about the legality of lethal injections, and about the future of capital punishment in the 38 states where it's legal."

NYTimes Questions Coast Guard Academy Handling Of Sex Harassment Cases. The New York Times (7/2, 1.19M) editorializes on a recent scandal at the Coast Guard Academy. After noting that the academy has a highest proportion of women of all the military service academies, it writes, "For the first time in its 130-year history, the academy court-martialed a cadet, convicting him on sodomy, indecent assault and extortion charges after four female cadets accused him of assaulting them. The stories that emerged from the trial are enough to make any reasonable person question how such allegations are handled at the academy." Of the academy's announcement that it will start involving women in sexual harassment investigations, the Times says, "It is frankly surprising, and somewhat appalling, that such a basic step was not taken years ago."

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Races To Meet EU Demands Before Vote. The New York Times (7/1, O'Brien) reports, "For nearly three months, Microsoft says, 300 of its engineers have been working nearly nonstop to come up with the documentation for its server software that the European Commission has sought since an antitrust ruling in 2004. After two years of dragging its heels — at least in the view of the commission's antitrust staff — Microsoft is now presenting itself as productive and cooperative. The commission's threat of another fine on the company is driving the last-minute frenzy. But the commission's vote on the fine, which if assessed in full would total about 420 million euros ($527 million), may come just before Microsoft crosses the finish line. A European Union advisory committee is scheduled to discuss the commission's draft decision to impose the fine on Monday, but no action is expected."

Michaels Stores Accepts Bain/Blackstone Bid. The Wall Street Journal (7/1, Spector, Berman) reports, "Michaels Stores Inc. Friday said it accepted a more than $6 billion takeover bid from a private-equity group comprising Bain Capital and Blackstone Group, completing a nearly three-month process of fielding offers for the arts-and-crafts retailer. The winning takeover group paid $44 a share for the Irving, Texas, retailer. Michaels shares rose 8.5%, or $3.24, to $41.24 at 4 p.m. Friday in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Michaels has 137 million shares outstanding. Michaels, the largest arts-and-crafts retailer in the U.S. and Canada by sales, has been attractive to private-equity groups because of its heavy cash flow, which could help to pay down debt incurred in the deal. The retailer generated operating cash flow of $364 million in its fiscal year ended Jan. 28."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Voting Rights Act Changes Could Impact American Indians. The AP (7/1) reports, "Landmark provisions in the federal Voting Rights Act of 1965 soon could expire, taking away powerful deterrents to discrimination against Indian voters in South Dakota and threatening to halt an upward trend in voter turnout on reservations. In the past 30 years, the provisions have forced South Dakota to submit 3,048 voting law changes in Todd and Shannon counties for approval by the Department of Justice and have required Lakota speaking interpreters at polling places in 11 counties. Provisions of the Voting Rights Act are the underpinning of a renaissance in Indian voting, resulting in a 122 percent increase in turnout in Shannon County on the Pine Ridge Reservation, and a 139 percent increase in Todd County on the Rosebud Reservation, between 2000 and 2004."

Probe Implicates Aristide In Narco-Trafficking, Money Laundering. In an article that is the first of two, the Miami Herald (7/2, Weaver, Charles, 323K) reports, "Jean-Bertrand Aristide was a modern-day Moses to Haiti's poor masses, a former Catholic priest who rose to the presidency by promising to wash away the country's bloody and corrupt past. But since his ouster as president in 2004, U.S. authorities have been investigating detailed accounts alleging that Aristide and several top aides sought and took millions of dollars in bribes from drug traffickers in Haiti, The Miami Herald has learned." The Herald adds, "The allegations against the ex-president come from numerous sources, but the evidence has not risen to a level to press a case against Aristide, say U.S. law enforcement officials, who have been hampered by a lack of financial records. Still, The Miami Herald has learned from interviews with about 20 law enforcement officials, defense lawyers and others involved in the case that Aristide has been accused of being at the center of his country's narco-trafficking and money-laundering activities from 2001 to 2004."

EU Opens Up Arms Market. The Washington Times (7/2, Harding, 90K) reports a story carried on the previous day by the Wall Street Journal, noting, "The European Union took a major step toward opening its notoriously closed armaments market yesterday with a new code of conduct aimed at boosting competition ... Under the code of conduct, which will apply in all EU states except for Spain, Denmark and Hungary, defense ministries are obliged to post new tenders on an Internet notice board and all European arms companies are free to compete for the contracts." The CEO of the European Defense Agency commented that European states "were spending too much on soldiers' wages and pensions -- personnel costs consume half of the union's $225-billion-a-year defense budget compared with one-quarter in the United States -- and too little on high-tech hardware."

IMMIGRATION:

Huntsman Claims Cannon Win Shows The Popularity Of Comprehensive Immigration Reform. The Deseret News (7/2, Roche) reports Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr. said Rep. Chris Cannon's victory in his Republican primary "shows that Utahns agree with his more comprehensive approach to immigration reform." The News notes, "The immigration issue dominated the race between Cannon and his challenger in the primary, John Jacob. Jacob accused Cannon of supporting amnesty for illegal immigrants, because the five-term congressman backs President Bush's proposed guest-worker program." Huntsman "said…that the primary results reflect what most Utahns — and most Americans — support in terms of immigration reform: increased border security and a way of dealing with the 'human component,' those workers who are already here."

NAFTA Seen As Contributing To Illegal Immigration. The CBS Evening News (7/1, story 8, 3:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported the US and Canada "have been selling tons of corn in Mexico for over a decade, thanks to NAFTA." NAFTA "eliminated tariffs on most agricultural trade and was supposed to be a win-win for the US and Mexico. For Tirso Alvares Correa, NAFTA has been a disaster. While the trade agreement opened US markets to Mexican-born farmers, they haven't been able to sell any corn in America. Meanwhile, American farmers have flooded Mexico with cheap corn, thanks to generous US government subsidies, subsidies left unchecked by NAFTA. A US corn grower receives an average annual subsidy of $20,000 a year. The government of Mexico gives their corn farmers just $100. These farmers told us entire towns are emptying because thousand of small farms having out of business. As many as two million farm workers have lost their jobs. The vast majority head north across the US border, looking for better pay. No one questions that Mexico's small corn farmers are hurting, due in large part to the impact of NAFTA. But supporters of the free trade agreement say what's happening here is just part of the story."

Military Serves As Springboard To Citizenship. The Los Angeles Times (7/2, Perry, 958K) reports, "53 active-duty U.S. military personnel were sworn in as new citizens Saturday night before the Padres-Giants game. ... Since Sept. 11, a number of measures sponsored by the Bush administration have led to an expedited process for active-duty military personnel to become U.S. citizens. ... Since the changes, more than 20,000 military personnel have become citizens, 75 of them posthumously. Officials estimate that more than 40,000 military personnel remain eligible for citizenship." The article quotes some of the new citizens.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Cheney Expresses Support For Shuttle Program. Florida Today (7/2, Waymer, 84K) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney had seen a shuttle launch once before, but hoped Saturday that his three granddaughters would get their chance. ... 'I was especially looking forward to having my grandchildren here,' Cheney told reporters from atop the Operation Support Building, shortly after the launch controllers ordered a scrub. 'But we just got a tour of the Atlantis,' he said. 'At least we got to see that.' Earlier, Cheney had walked through the Orbiter Processing Facility at Kennedy Space Center, where he, his wife, Lynne, and their three granddaughters…scoped the underbelly of shuttle Atlantis." FT adds, "Moments after the Discovery launch was called off, Cheney said he was 'very impressed' by the tour of Kennedy Space Center and said of the space program: 'It's a great program. It's important that we keep it going.' Other politicians on hand for the launch Saturday echoed similar support for the shuttle program, tempered with concerns about the consequences of another mishap."

Clouds Cause NASA To Postpone Discovery Launch. ABC World News Tonight (7/1, lead story, 1:30, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "We begin tonight with no go for 'Discovery.' NASA says it will try tomorrow after thunder clouds kept the space shuttle from launching today. Stormy weather did what safety questions could not. … The larger question -- whether dangerous pieces of foam will come off of the external fuel tank on launch -- NASA won't know the answer to that until they blast off."

The CBS Evening News (7/1, story 5, 2:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "There's a clear sense of disappointment here at the Kennedy Space Center because the flight of 'Discovery' is deemed critical to getting the whole shuttle program back on track. Now the launch will have to wait at least another day. … NASA is anxious to get 'Discovery' off the pad. With the shuttle program set to be mothballed in 2010, there are schedule pressures to complete the 17 final flights and finish construction of the international space station." NASA Administrator Michael Griffin: "We're now at a point where there are no optional flights. They're all critical. This one is critical because it's the one we're doing today."

NBC Nightly News (7/1, story 3, 2:00, Holt, 9.87M) reported NASA "thought they had a problem with the heater on a thruster rocket for much of the day. They resolved that issue and they thought the weather was cooperating. But as they got down to the wire the clouds continued to build and the launch director decided he had to scrub it. After all of the controversy and dissenting opinions about whether it is safe to fly this mission, NASA started this day determined to launch."

The Washington Post (7/2, A6, Gugliotta, 744K) reports, "The weather provided a disappointing anticlimax to a near-flawless three-day countdown, marred only by the failure of a heater used to keep fuel for one of the shuttle's thruster jets from freezing. … Mission control decided early Saturday afternoon that the glitch did not hamper shuttle operations, and decided to put the thruster on standby and use other thrusters during the mission. NASA officials said the broken heater could not be swapped out in time for Saturday's launch attempt.

KSC Weather Not Expected To Improve Before Tuesday. The New York Times (7/2, Schwartz, Leary, 1.19M) reports, "Liftoff is now scheduled for a 10-minute window starting at 3:26 p.m. on Sunday, but current weather forecasts put the likelihood of adverse conditions at 60 percent. Conditions for Monday, according to forecasters working with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, are likely to be even worse."

Griffin Once Again Defends Decision To Override NASA Engineers' Safety Concerns. The AP (7/2, Dunn), in an article on the decision to scrub yesterday's launch, reports NASA Administrator Michael Griffin "decided to proceed with the 12-day mission despite the concerns of two top agency managers who wanted additional foam repairs. 'We now have a NASA in which senior officials feel free to discuss and debate openly complex, difficult and subtle technical topics that affect the flight,' Griffin told The Associated Press on Saturday. 'No matter what decision I made, I would have been disappointing somebody.'" The AP notes, "Bryan O'Connor, the top safety officer, and chief engineer Christopher Scolese recommended at a meeting two weeks ago that the shuttle remain grounded until design changes are made to 34 areas on the fuel tank known as ice-frost ramps."

Cheney Receives Clean Bill Of Health After Check Up. Vice President Cheney passed his physical before traveling to Florida to watch the NASA shuttle launch and the NASCAR Pepsi 400 race. Cheney's health and trip were briefly noted in prominent media outlets. ABC World News Tonight (7/1, story 2, 0:15, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "Among those disappointed at Cape Canaveral, the Vice President. Dick Cheney got the okay to travel from doctors this morning during his checkup. He received a clean bill of health. His pacemaker working just fine. The 65-year-old Vice President has had four heart attacks."

And NBC Nightly News (7/1, story 6, :10, Holt, 9.87M) reported, "Vice president Dick Cheney under went his annual physical and doctors said he checked out perfectly. His pacemaker is functioning properly and there were no signs of an irregular heart beat."

The New York Times (7/2, Stolberg, 1.19M) notes, "The physical on Saturday consisted of several tests, including an electrocardiogram, follow-up imaging of the repaired aneurysms and a check of Mr. Cheney's implantable cardioverter defibrillator, also known as a pacemaker, that he has had since 2001. A stress test on a treadmill is scheduled for the fall, Ms. McBride said." The AP (7/2, Riechmann) adds, "Vice President Dick Cheney's high-tech pacemaker is working properly and has not been activated by any irregular heartbeats, according to his annual physical on Saturday that showed his overall heart condition was stable."

Bush Seen As Pensive About Approaching Birthday. The AP (7/2, Loven) reports, "The most powerful man in the world turns 60 on Thursday and he just can't seem to stop talking about it. Barely a week has gone by this year that President Bush has not brought up his advancing age at least once." He "is nearly always cracking wise when the topic of his age comes up. The humor, however, contains unmistakably wistful notes, revealing a president who is least somewhat pensive both about aging and his relevance after he leaves the White House in 31 months."

Medicare Drug Program Said To Have Driven Up The Cost Of Prescriptions. ABC World News Tonight (7/1, story 6, 3:00, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "In our 'money watch' tonight, a question being asked by seniors – 'why are prescription drug prices soaring?' Two new reports say they increased almost 4%, three times the rate of inflation in the first three months of the year. That's disappointing news to millions that hoped to get a price break from the Medicare drug plan. ABC continues, "One thing the Medicare drug plan has not done is make drugs less expensive. And one of the most controversial elements of the plan, banned Medicare from using its massive purchasing power to negotiate lower prices. Instead, letting individual plans negotiate on their own. Now, critics say there is evidence that that decision is costing seniors and taxpayers." ABC notes, ""The pharmaceutical industry says rising drug prices are in line with other medical costs -- even lower if you include generics."

Democrats Use Medicare Drug Coverage Gap As Campaign Issue. The Los Angeles Times (7/2, Alonso-Zaldivar, Lin, 958K) reports, "When Congress created the Medicare prescription drug program, it adopted an unusual idea to hold down costs: the so-called doughnut hole. The program pays most of a participant's drug bills until expenses reach $2,250 in a year. Then it stops paying until costs exceed $5,100. That leaves a hole of $2,850 that seniors with serious prescription needs are expected to manage on their own. Now, six months into the drug program…3.4 million seniors are approaching the doughnut hole. Most of them are middle-class seniors with multiple chronic illnesses. (The poor are exempt from the gap.) Some have already experienced an abrupt surge in prescription costs. … Sensing a political opportunity, some Democrats are campaigning on a promise to shrink or close the doughnut hole. As November's congressional elections draw nearer, more seniors will confront the gap."

Boehner Credited With Saving Line-Item Veto Bill. In his syndicated column Robert Novak (7/2) writes that House Majority Leader John Boehner "is credited with cooling off opposition by Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis sufficiently to save the administration-backed line-item veto in the House June 22. Lewis had been giving a run-around to Republican Rep. Paul Ryan, sponsor of the bill. … Boehner reminded Lewis that President Bush and the congressional Republican leadership supported the Ryan bill. Consequently, the majority leader urged the chairman not to mobilize the 36 Republican Appropriations Committee members against the line-item veto. As a result, Lewis e-mailed his committee members that he would vote against Ryan's bill but was not calling on his fellow appropriators to follow him."

More Than $1.3 Billion In Federal Crop Subsidies Paid To Non-Farmers. The Washington Post (7/2, A1, Morgan, Gaul, Cohen, 744K) reports the federal government "has paid at least $1.3 billion in subsidies for rice and other crops since 2000 to individuals who do no farming at all, according to an analysis of government records by The Washington Post. Some of them collect hundreds of thousands of dollars without planting a seed. … The checks…were intended 10 years ago as a first step toward eventually eliminating costly, decades-old farm subsidies. Instead, the payments have grown into an even larger subsidy that benefits millionaire landowners, foreign speculators and absentee landlords, as well as farmers. Most of the money goes to real farmers who grow crops on their land, but they are under no obligation to grow the crop being subsidized. They can switch to a different crop or raise cattle or even grow a stand of timber -- and still get the government payments. The cash comes with so few restrictions that subdivision developers who buy farmland advertise that homeowners can collect farm subsidies on their new back yards."

Local Governments Employ Lobbyists To Secure Federal Funds. The New York Times (7/2, A1, Rudoren, Pilhofer, 1.19M) reports, "Cities and towns — and school districts and transit authorities and utility agencies — across the country are increasingly…putting lobbyists on retainer to leverage their local tax dollars into federal tax dollars. Since 1998, the number of public entities hiring private firms to represent them in Washington has nearly doubled to 1,421 from 763. … Most of these new clients had never sought earmarks — some had never even heard of them — before someone knocked on their door, essentially offering big pots for a pittance. Others had read in the newspaper about neighbors with lobbyists building bridges or beach walks and felt pressure to keep up with the municipal Joneses." The Times goes on to report, "Of the 250 top-grossing firms in Washington, 48 have state, local and tribal governments as their leading source of revenue, far more than any other sector, according to the Center for Public Integrity, which monitors lobbying."

Approaching NCLB Deadlines Pose Dilemma For States. The Miami Herald (7/2, Pinzur, 323K) reports, "More than 500 high-poverty Florida schools could be forced under the federal No Child Left Behind law to privatize, become charters, replace most of their staffs or make other major changes--even though some have repeatedly received A or B grades from the state." Florida has already acted under its own education accountability laws on some low-performing schools, but "it could become far more widespread next year unless those schools make unprecedented gains on the state's high-stakes standardized test."

NYTimes Claims Many State Tests Dodge Federal Standards. A New York Times editorial (7/2) notes a "startling new study shows that many states have a longstanding tradition of setting basement-level educational standards and misleading the public about student performance. The patterns were set long before No Child Left Behind, and it will require more than just passing a law to change them." The new study by Policy Analysis for California Education (PACE), a research institute run jointly by Stanford and the University of California, finds that many states students "who performed brilliantly on state tests scored dismally on the federal National Assessment of Educational Progress," the strongest, most well-respected test. Looking at state-level testing practices from 1992 to 2005, the study found many states dumbing down their tests or shifting proficiency targets in math and reading, "creating a fraudulent appearance of progress and making it impossible to tell how well students were actually performing." Although states have always resisted national tests and clung to local autonomy, the Times says "if the United States wants to equal its competitors abroad, it must move away from a patchwork system based on weak standards and a frankly fraudulent system of student assessment." It cites with approval a proposal that the federal government provide the states with a free, rigorous, high-quality test, on the condition that they use federal scoring standards.

Net-Neutrality Issue Could Stall Entire Telecom Bill. The Washington Post (7/2, F4, Hart, Goo, 744K) reports, "From Capitol Hill to Silicon Valley, it's become one of the most controversial and confusing topics to hit the tech industry this year: network neutrality. The term is confusing, the ad campaigns have further clouded the issue, and it's no longer easy to tell who's for it and who's not." The Post concludes, "The net-neutrality issue has been included in a larger telecommunications bill being considered by Congress. The House has already approved its version, but it's unclear whether the bill has enough support in the Senate to move ahead. As of now, the bill favors telecommunications companies that want the FCC to monitor the issue of access to the Internet. Many Democrats oppose the current bill unless it includes tougher language that would make it illegal for telecom firms to impose a priority pricing structure. It's unlikely that they'll reach a compromise before September, but many lobbyists and lawmakers say the net-neutrality issue could prevent the entire telecom bill -- which includes other provisions such as new rules for cable franchises -- from moving forward until next year."

Potential 2008 Presidential Candidates Make High Profile Visits To Gulf Coast. The Washington Times (7/2, Bellantoni, 90K) reports, "Visiting Louisiana and Mississippi has become increasingly important for politicians considering a White House bid." Sen. George Allen "recently walked amid the rubble of what were once homes in New Orleans neighborhoods. Others interested in the presidency also have taken a tour." Sen. Mary Landrieu "has hosted dozens of other lawmakers here, but…is reaching out especially to potential presidential candidates, telling them: 'You've got to see what's not working, so hopefully, if you get to be president, you can help fix it.'" Former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner "was in New Orleans last week on a fact-finding mission to see how he could help with children's health care challenges. He took with him Virginia specialists." Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, "who also took the Gulf Coast tour with Mrs. Landrieu, has called for an independent investigation of the failed government response to the hurricane."

Kerry's 2004 Loss Hinders His Nascent 2008 Presidential Campaign. The AP (7/2, Glover) reports Sen. John Kerry "has left little doubt about his intentions to try again after his narrow loss to President Bush in 2004. He isn't the only also-ran considering another marathon. … Kerry faces a challenge of major proportions, convincing Democratic activists that a candidate who just lost an election can still carry his party's White House hopes." According to the AP, "Kerry's allies acknowledge the struggle but are unwilling to give up the cause. 'Historically, the Democratic Party has tended to shoot its wounded,' said former New Hampshire Democratic Chairman Joe Keefe. 'John Kerry has done everything within his power to rewrite that chapter.' The Massachusetts senator has raised nearly $9 million for candidates and the party and has campaigned actively across the country.

Kerry Has Raised $10 Million For Democratic Candidates Since Losing To Bush. The Washington Post

(7/2, A4, Goldfarb, 744K) reports Kerry "insiders" said "reports for the quarter that ended Friday show he has given or raised nearly $10 million for Democratic candidates and committees since November 2004. That's $1.5 million in the past three months. Kerry has raised a total of $13.5 million this cycle. Just last week, Kerry sent out an e-mail to raise money for the Senate candidacies of incumbent Maria Cantwell (Wash.), Claire McCaskill (Mo.), Rep. Sherrod Brown (Ohio) and incumbent Bob Menendez (N.J.). Kerry has given or raised $2.3 million for 18 Senate candidates and $6 million for 36 committees."

Carville And Penn Describe Clinton's Strengths As A Potential Presidential Candidate. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (7/2, 744K) Democratic consultants James Carville and Mark J. Penn, write, "We don't know if [Sen.] Hillary [Clinton] is going to run for president, but as advisers who have worked on the only two successful Democratic presidential campaigns in the past couple of decades, we know that if she does run, she can win. … Why? First, because strength matters. Our problems as a party are less ideological than anatomical: Our candidates have been made to look like they have no backbone. But the latest Post-ABC News poll shows that 68 percent of Americans describe Hillary Clinton as a strong leader." According to Carville and Penn, "For those who think that the politics of personal destruction might be rekindled against Hillary or her husband, we can only remind people how consistently that approach has backfired in the past. Bill Clinton would certainly be a huge asset if Hillary decided to run. … Certainly she could win the states John Kerry did. But with the pathbreaking possibility of this country's first female president, we could see an explosion of women voting -- and voting Democratic. States that were close in the past, from Arkansas to Colorado to Florida to Ohio, could well move to the Democratic column. It takes only one more state to win."

Warner Among Powerful GOP Figures Attending McCain Fundraiser. In his syndicated column Robert Novak (7/2) writes, "The Rasika restaurant in downtown Washington was jammed at 6 p.m. last Wednesday for a fund-raising reception benefiting Sen. John McCain's political action committee. Republicans were willing to pay $5,000 each to hear McCain speak. They wanted to be on record as present to help the prospective front-runner for the 2008 Republican Presidential nomination. Included among those attending were some of Washington's top GOP lobbyists: Charlie Black, Wayne Berman, Scott Reid and Rick Hohlt. Also present was Sen. John Warner, whose fellow Virginia senator -- George Allen -- is McCain's potential opponent for the Presidential nomination."

Biden Campaigning In New Hampshire As A "Muscular Democrat." The Manchester Union Leader (7/2, DiStaso, 59K) reports Sen. Joseph Biden "has no doubts about making another run for the White House. 'I'm in,' the Delaware Democrat said Friday as he began a five-day visit to the first-in-the-nation primary state." Biden "realizes that among the hard left activists in his party, his stance on the Iraq war — to stay and fight until the job is done — is unpopular. But he is asking for their trust that a 'neo-isolationist' foreign policy is the worst possible alternative for the country at this point in history. Regarding the Iraq war, terrorism, and overall foreign policy, Biden considers himself a 'muscular Democrat.'" Biden "said the Bush administration's policy has made the United States more vulnerable to terrorism, not less."

Graham Cultivates "Independent" Image, Disparages "Party-Line Politics." The State (7/2, Rosen) reports, "When Lindsey Graham first came to Congress almost a dozen years ago, he quickly became known as a Republican attack dog who helped lead the House impeachment of President Clinton. These days, conservative activists are less enchanted with" him. The State notes Graham's cooperative efforts with Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Charles Schumer, and adds that he "was an early critic of the U.S. military's excessive interrogation practices at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and elsewhere." According to The State, "Much like his friend and mentor" Sen. John McCain, Graham "disdains party-line politics and revels in his independence. … Graham's articulateness and high profile have led some political analysts to cast him as a possible 2008 presidential candidate — a job for which he adamantly denies having even the slightest interest."

GOP Seek To Benefit From Projecting Tough Image For Elections. The Los Angeles Times (7/2, McManus, Wallsten, 958K) reports that after experiencing past success in campaigning on national security and counter-terrorism issues, "in the face of increasing violence in Iraq and eroding public support for the war at home, Republicans are turning again to the theme of toughness — with gloves off." GOP "strategists hailed last week's Supreme Court ruling on detainees." GOP pollster Whit Ayres said, "The Supreme Court ruling on Guantanamo was a real blessing in disguise." Ayres said the ruling "allows us to have a debate on whether terrorists should receive the same legal protections as American military personnel. … It's hard to see Republicans losing when that's the debate." In response, "Democratic leaders say, at least in public, that they are confident they can win that debate." Yet "the Democrats' response so far has been less unified, less pointed and less memorable than the Republicans' attacks."

Democrats Hope To Make Gains Among Rural Voters. The Washington Post (7/2, A5, Cillizza, 744K) reports, "The wooing of rural voters is essential to Democrats' hopes for taking back the Senate this November, party strategists say. Rural voters wield real electoral power in Missouri, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Montana, Tennessee, Virginia and Arizona -- all of which are being targeted this fall by Democrats." Sen. Charles Schumer, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, "said the Bush administration's economic policies have created an opening for his party to argue that rural voters have a self-interest in backing Democrats." However, "The raw numbers are daunting. Exit polling in the 2004 presidential race showed Bush carrying rural areas 57 percent to 42 percent over Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.). Similar margins have fueled Republican victories on the state and local levels, where candidates have repeatedly used social issues such as abortion and same-sex marriage to advantage over Democrats."

Democrats Remain Unable To Blunt Effectiveness Of GOP's "Values Agenda." The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (7/2, Shesgreen, 310K) reports, "Last week, House Republican leaders unveiled an election-year 'values agenda' that included a gay marriage ban, abortion restrictions and legislation preserving the words 'under God' in the Pledge of Allegiance, among other items. And the Senate spent two days debating a constitutional amendment to ban flag desecration before defeating it, just a few weeks after an amendment banning gay marriage met the same fate. These hot-button cultural issues are designed to rev up the Republican base and cut into Democratic support among rural blue-collar voters; they are so-called 'wedge' issues that in the last election helped propel George W. Bush to a second term and boosted Republican majorities in Congress. That 2004 vote sent Democrats reeling, with many calling for a re-examination of the way they talked about faith and politics and a new push to win back 'values voters' who over the last few election cycles have come to see the Democratic Party as reflexively anti-religion. … It's unclear whether Democrats, despite their soul-searching, will be able to reframe the debate with their own moral tilt and cut into the established GOP advantage on these issues. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., suggested in a speech last week that Democrats had fallen into a trap of their own making on religious issues and had made little progress despite evidence of the serious electoral ramifications."

New York Times: "The School Testing Dodge." A New York Times editorial (7/2) notes a "startling new study shows that many states have a longstanding tradition of setting basement-level educational standards and misleading the public about student performance. "About Breast-Feeding ..."

"Scandal at the Coast Guard Academy." The New York Times (7/2, 1.19M) editorializes on a recent scandal at the Coast Guard Academy. After noting that the academy has a highest proportion of women of all the military service academies, it writes, "For the first time in its 130-year history, the academy court-martialed a cadet, convicting him on sodomy, indecent assault and extortion charges after four female cadets accused him of assaulting them. The stories that emerged from the trial are enough to make any reasonable person question how such allegations are handled at the academy." Of the academy's announcement that it will start involving women in sexual harassment investigations, the Times says, "It is frankly surprising, and somewhat appalling, that such a basic step was not taken years ago."

Washington Post: "Let There Be Law." The Washington Post (7/2, B6, 744K) in an editorial faults Congress for failing to address the issue of detainee policy and writes, "There is an opportunity to provide legislative authorization -- along with limits, safeguards and accountability -- for all of the powers and practices the U.S. government may need in a long-term confrontation with violent Islamist extremism." But there is a "danger" that

"Congress will become reckless and hasty and abdicate the responsibility the court has given it. With midterm elections looming, the administration may push for quick legislative fixes." The Post concludes, "This is a moment in which this country can correct the mistake of five years ago, when the executive branch sought to fight a novel war based on a combination of outdated laws and new rules it made up on its own. The Supreme Court has created the chance to bring real law to the war on terror -- if Congress is willing to do its job."

"Backtracking in Darfur." The Washington Post (7/2, Editorial, 744K) editorializes that Sudan's government reversed itself on allowing United Nations peacekeepers into the western region of Darfur. President Omar Hassan al-Bashir is "attributing U.S. pressure for intervention to 'Jewish organizations'" even as "Ayman al-Zawahiri, the deputy leader of al-Qaeda, recently accused the United Nations of preparing to occupy Sudan and divide it." The problem is that "Bashir has calculated that he can snub the international community with impunity." While "History has demonstrated that Mr. Bashir's regime is susceptible to foreign pressure," that "pressure has to be consistent to work, and recently the international community has appeared divided." Now, "Worrisomely, President Bush's point man on Sudan, Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick, is leaving for Wall Street, and his ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, recently refused to accompany his Security Council colleagues on a trip to Sudan. But if Mr. Bashir's shameless outpourings are not enough to solidify diplomatic efforts to isolate his regime, it's hard to know what would be."

Los Angeles Times: "Supreme Court freshmen." The Los Angeles Times (7/2, 958K) in an editorial writes, "Less than a year ago, some liberal activists were warning that the confirmation of Roberts…would jerk the court unacceptably to the right. That critique was recycled a little more respectably when President Bush named Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. to replace perennial swing vote Sandra Day O'Connor. … Yet the seismic shift dreaded by liberals and dreamed about by conservatives hasn't occurred. … Even when Roberts and Alito would have shifted the law dramatically, as they did in supporting a much narrower definition of wetlands subject to federal regulation, their colleagues balked. In that case, as in last week's decision on the commissions…Kennedy…distanced himself from the conservative bloc . In other cases he voted with the conservatives, vindicating the observation that, just as the Rehnquist court was really the O'Connor court, the Roberts court is actually the Kennedy court."

"A noncommittal Fed." The Los Angeles Times (7/2, 958K) in an editorial titled "A Noncommittal Fed" writes, "Talk about irrational exuberance. Stock markets surged Thursday because of what the Federal Reserve didn't say." While delivering as expected its 17th consecutive interest rate hike since mid-2004, the Federal Open Market Committee said that while economic growth slowed, other factors "have the potential to sustain inflation pressures," and said that future moves would depend on the outlooks for economic growth and inflation. Viewing that as the equivalent a noncommittal answer of "That depends," the Times argued, "All the recent volatility and confusion about discerning the Fed's real intentions should lead Chairman Ben S. Bernanke to forge ahead with one of his long-standing pet ideas: having the Fed publicly set a target for inflation." The editorial notes about two dozen central banks around the world take that approach, which by making expectations clear, could dampen inflationary pressures. "Having a clear target would further enhance the Fed's predictability," the Times concluded.

Hurdle To Closing Guantanamo: Where To Put Inmates (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

The Supreme Court decision striking down military commissions for detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has renewed calls for the government to close the facility that has held terrorism suspects for four years. The problem facing U.S. officials is how to shut down Guantanamo and what to do with the 450 men who are still there -- in particular, about 100 they consider too dangerous to ever release.

U.S. officials acknowledge that closing Guantanamo Bay is likely, though there is no timetable and no specific plan for how to do it. While the State Department works to repatriate nearly two-thirds of the prison's population via complex negotiations with other nations, the Bush administration will have to decide what to do with the core group who officials claim would kill Americans if they were freed.

Senior administration officials, requesting anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the matter, said there are only two options for the men the United States deems too dangerous to release: transfer them to federal or military prisons in the United States -- such as the supermax facilities or Fort Leavenworth -- or arrange for another country to assume responsibility for their detention.

So far, no third country has said it would be willing to take the men, and the Bush administration has been reluctant to consider allowing them to be transferred onto U.S. soil. Senior officials said in interviews it is possible that any suspects who are convicted of crimes could land in U.S. prisons.

The United States has taken that step previously with international criminals, such as Panamanian Gen. Manuel Noriega, who was convicted in 1992 on drug trafficking and racketeering charges and is incarcerated in a federal prison near Miami. Admitted al-Qaeda operative Zacarias Moussaoui is serving a life sentence in a Colorado supermax prison along with Ramzi Yousef, convicted in the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center in New York.

White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters aboard Air Force One on Friday that closing the facility will not be easy, adding that the administration does not want some of the people there to cross the U.S. border.

"You close it when you finish handling all the cases of people who are at Guantanamo," Snow said. "And, as we've said many times, you don't simply shut it down. There are some people who you do not want on American soil, who you want to go ahead and conclude the process of bringing them to justice, and repatriating those to whom it is appropriate to repatriate."

President Bush and senior administration officials have said they want Guantanamo Bay to close, in large part because the detention center has become an enormously negative symbol.

John B. Bellinger III, legal adviser to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, said last week that there are about 300 detainees from Afghanistan, Saudi Arabia and Yemen who are likely to be returned to the custody of their home countries when agreements can be worked out.

Retired Army Gen. Barry R. McCaffrey wrote in a recent academic paper for the U.S. Military Academy that the United States should "rapidly weed out as many detainees as possible and return them to their host nation with an evidence package as complete as we can produce," urging countries to try their nationals for war crimes and terrorist actions. If detainees are released in their own countries and appear back on the battlefield fighting the United States -- as the administration has contended will happen -- "it may be cheaper and cleaner to kill them in combat than sit on them for the next 15 years," McCaffrey wrote.

McCaffrey also advocates putting the 25 most dangerous terrorism suspects on trial in U.S. courts or by courts-martial, followed by civil indefinite detention in a U.S. territory.

Human rights groups do not necessarily disagree with putting detainees who are convicted by a sound legal system in jail, and they believe the Supreme Court decision could provide an avenue toward that legal framework.

"There are probably people at Guantanamo who should be held, and they should be brought to the United States," said Elisa Massimino, Washington director of Human Rights First. "If there's anybody in there that they have evidence of a crime against, they can try them."

Rep. Adam Schiff (D-Calif.) introduced legislation last year calling for a solid legal framework at Guantanamo Bay that would require U.S. officials to either charge, release or repatriate detainees within two years, except in extraordinary circumstances.

"The problem with closing down Guantanamo is you're still going to need a place to hold the worst of the worst . . . and closing down Guantanamo means opening up something else somewhere else," Schiff said Friday, saying that he favors a location inside the United States, either in an existing facility or a new special prison. "I'm more concerned about making sure that they're tried in a way where they can be detained if necessary than what we call the facility or where we put it."

Guantanamo Detainees: Why They're Still There (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2006

There are 450 men from more than three dozen countries detained as "enemy combatants" in a seaside network of seven — soon to be eight — camps and prisons at the U.S. Naval Base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Following are some frequently asked questions.

Question: Why does the United States have a base in Cuba?

Answer: The oldest U.S. base overseas and the only one in a communist country, the naval station is positioned at a strategic point between the Atlantic Ocean and the Panama Canal. It has been expanded and modified since the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0038015

government leased 45 square miles of land and water from the newly liberated island nation in December 1903. A 1934 treaty set the annual rent at $2,000 in gold, or $4,085 today, and deemed the lease permanent unless both parties agreed to any changes. Communist revolutionary President Fidel Castro has wanted to break the lease since he took power in 1959 and has refused to cash any of the checks.

Q: What crimes are the prisoners at Guantanamo accused of?

A: Only 10 of the men have been charged with war crimes, for their alleged roles in aiding Taliban and Al Qaeda operatives responsible for the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks, and assaults on U.S. forces who invaded Afghanistan a month later. The other 440 were captured by Afghan, Pakistani, U.S. and other authorities and accused of engaging in combat or plotting to do harm to Americans and their allies.

Q: Why does the government continue to hold men who haven't been charged with a crime?

A: The Bush administration claims the right, under the laws of war, to indefinitely detain "enemy combatants" while the nation is at war — in this case, the global war on terrorism. Detention prevents prisoners from returning to the battlefield and endangering U.S. forces or U.S. national security, the administration argues. Under the Geneva Convention, captured enemy forces may be held as prisoners of war but must be provided specific rights and protections. For instance, POWs are housed in quarters equivalent to those for U.S. forces, are allowed to keep their personal effects, can work and receive compensation, and are not subject to interrogation. The Guantanamo detainees are not accorded these rights.

Q: Why was Guantanamo chosen as the site for the United States' captured enemies in the war on terrorism?

A: Initially, officials at the White House and the Pentagon believed they were under no obligation to accord U.S. constitutional rights and protections to noncitizen detainees held outside U.S. soil. However, two years ago, the Supreme Court ruled on a prisoner's challenge, Rasul et al. vs. Bush, that anyone in U.S. custody anywhere has the right to challenge his captivity in federal court. That ruling was just on the right to challenge detention, but opened the door to Hamdan vs. Rumsfeld.

Q: Why was the Supreme Court looking at the military tribunals?

A: After the Rasul ruling, attorneys for Yemeni Salim Ahmed Hamdan appealed to U.S. district court with a challenge to the legality of the military commissions set up to try those accused of war crimes. Hamdan's challenge resulted in Thursday's Supreme Court ruling that President Bush exceeded his war powers when he created the tribunal.

Q: How are the Guantanamo detainees affected by the Supreme Court ruling?

A: Only the 10 charged detainees are directly affected by the decision, and the consequences won't be immediate even for them. The president may seek congressional authorization for another kind of offshore military court, or the administration may try those charged with war crimes in U.S. federal courts.

Q: What about the other 440 men — will they also receive trials?

A: Military prosecutors have said for months that charges were pending for at least two dozen more prisoners, and the number prosecuted could reach 75. But with international pressure mounting against the Guantanamo operations and the government likely to have a tougher time securing convictions in U.S. courts, the State Department is negotiating with detainees' home countries in an effort to transfer custody and responsibility for the men.

Q: If the Bush administration is trying to downsize Guantanamo, why is it building new detention facilities?

A: The $30 million in funding for the medium-security, 100-cell Camp 6 due to open in August was budgeted more than two years ago. Military officers running the detention operations also note that the first three camps constructed at Guantanamo in early 2002 — the metal mesh cells arrayed in open-air rows in Camps 1, 2 and 3 — are rusting and nearing the end of their five-year intended life span. Camp 4, a barracks-like communal-living facility for as many as 200 detainees with the best behavior records, is mostly empty now because of repairs underway after a May 18 uprising.

Q: How can a prisoner get released from Guantanamo?

A: Of the 759 men known to have been brought to the detention network since January 2002, about 300 have left the island after being judged by panels of military officers as "no longer an enemy combatant" or when their home governments agreed to take responsibility for them. Three committed suicide. About 100 still at the prison have been judged eligible for transfer or release by annual Administrative Review Board hearings. Another round of the assessments is underway to reconsider the need to hold the 330 or so deemed last year to require continued detention because they posed a threat to U.S. security if released or because they could provide intelligence under interrogation.

The Court Enters The War, Loudly (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

JOHN C. YOO, a principal architect of the Bush administration's legal response to the terrorist threat, sounded perplexed and a little bitter on Thursday afternoon. A few hours earlier, the Supreme Court had methodically dismantled the legal framework that he and a few other administration lawyers had built after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"What the court is doing is attempting to suppress creative thinking," said Professor Yoo, who now teaches law at the University of California, Berkeley. "The court has just declared that it's going to be very intrusive in the war on terror. They're saying, 'We're going to treat this more like the way we supervise the criminal justice system.' "

While in the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel from 2001 to 2003, Mr. Yoo helped write a series of memorandums setting out a bold and novel legal strategy to find, hold, question and punish the nation's enemies. The memorandums said the Geneva Conventions do not apply to people the administration designates as enemy combatants. They contemplated the use of highly coercive interrogation techniques. They justified secret surveillance.

The court's decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, Professor Yoo said, may signal the collapse of the entire enterprise. "It could affect detention conditions, interrogation methods, the use of force," he said. "It could affect every aspect of the war on terror."

He was not overstating his case. True, the decision itself — holding that the government could not try detainees held at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, for war crimes in a particular way — was narrow, given that it directly affected only 10 men and did not address the administration's broader contention that it can hold those men and hundreds of others without charges forever. And Congress may yet put some or all of the president's programs on firmer legal footing.

But the effect of the decision, constitutional lawyers across the political spectrum agreed, could devastate the administration's main legal justifications for its campaign against the terrorist threat.

"The mood music of this opinion so lacks the traditional deference to the president," said John O. McGinnis, who served in the Justice Department from 1987 to 1991 and now teaches law at Northwestern, "that it would seem to have implications for his other programs."

The administration had built its case in part on a vote by Congress, taken a week after Sept. 11, that authorized the president to "use all necessary and appropriate force" against those who participated in and supported the attacks. The administration has relied on that authorization as legal support for several of its programs.

In 2004, the Supreme Court endorsed a part of this argument, but Justice John Paul Stevens, writing for the majority in Hamdan, was having none of it. There is, he said "nothing in the text or legislative history" of the authorization "even hinting that Congress intended to expand or alter" existing laws concerning military trials.

The opinion, Professor Yoo said, seemed to require Congress to specify a laundry list of powers before the president can act.

"I worked on the authorization," he added. "We wrote it as broadly as possible. In past wars, the court used to let the president and Congress figure out how to wage the war. That's very different from what's happening today. The court said, 'If you want to do anything, you have to be very specific and precise about it.' "

The logic of the ruling and its requirement that Congress directly authorize presidential actions even in wartime has broad implications. For one thing, said Laurence H. Tribe, a law professor at Harvard, it seems to destroy the administration's argument that Congress blessed the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program when it voted for the authorization.

"That argument is blown out of the water and is obliterated," Professor Tribe said.

Justice Stevens also took aim at the administration's chief constitutional argument, the one that critics call "Article II on steroids."

DOJ_NMG_0038017

Because Article II of the Constitution, among other things, anoints the president as commander in chief, Professor Yoo and other administration lawyers have argued the president can ignore or override laws that seem to limit his authority to conduct war. In the current struggle against terrorism, they argue, the entire world is the battlefield.

Perhaps not any more. Steven G. Calabresi, a law professor at Northwestern and a founder of the Federalist Society, the conservative legal group, said this second argument is also in trouble.

"The court is certainly not embracing the broader Article II power," he said.

Indeed, a footnote in the majority opinion, one sure to be read closely, seems tailored to address these other controversies by rejecting the argument that the president is free to ignore Congressional limitations on his power.

"Conceivably the court had in mind controversies like the N.S.A. terrorist surveillance program" in crafting the footnote, said Curtis A. Bradley, a former Bush administration lawyer who now teaches law at Duke.

There are supporters of the N.S.A. program who say that the Hamdan decision does not affect it. They note that a 2002 appeals court decision said that Congress "could not encroach on the president's constitutional power" to conduct warrantless surveillance to obtain foreign intelligence.

The wholesale rejection of the administration's positions in Hamdan may have its roots in part in judicial hostility toward the memorandums Professor Yoo helped prepare several years ago. The justices in the majority, said Professor McGinnis, "have been so skeptical of a variety of legal interpretations coming out of the executive branch, like the so-called torture memos, that they are not giving the president any deference."

But some justices seemed to leave a door open, suggesting that the decision is not so much a judicial attack on executive power as it is an insistence that Congress, rather than a small group of administration lawyers, must play a leading role in formulating the response to terror.

"Where, as here, no emergency prevents consultation with Congress," Justice Stephen G. Breyer wrote in a brief concurrence that three other justices joined, "judicial insistence upon that consultation does not weaken our nation's ability to deal with danger. To the contrary, that insistence strengthens the nation's ability to determine — through democratic means — how best to do so."

But Professor Yoo was not inclined to accept the decision as a triumph of the democratic process. Instead, he saw it as a judicial usurpation of the president's power to protect the nation. "The court is saying we're going to be a player now," he observed ruefully.

A Check Against Fear (NYT)

By Jonathan Mahler

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

(Note: This article will appear in the July 9 issue of The Times Magazine.)

The afternoon before the Supreme Court handed down its instantly historic ruling in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, Lt. Cmdr. Charles Swift, the Navy defense lawyer appointed to represent the man who has admitted to being Osama bin Laden's driver, Salim Hamdan, told me he was reading a minority opinion written 60 years earlier, in the wake of World War II, by one of the court's lesser-known justices, Wiley B. Rutledge. The case involved Tomoyuki Yamashita, a Japanese general who'd been convicted of war crimes and sentenced to death by a U.S. military tribunal, a verdict upheld by the court, 6-2, despite some glaring procedural deficiencies: among other things, the admission of hearsay evidence including propaganda films and unnamed witnesses. When Swift and I spoke, Supreme Court watchers had already deduced that Justice John Paul Stevens would be writing for the majority in Hamdan. Back in 1947, the 27-year-old Stevens was Rutledge's clerk, so Swift was consulting Rutledge's dissent in Yamashita for clues.

Swift read me stirring words from Rutledge's opinion: "The immutable rights of the individual, including those secured by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment, belong not alone to the members of those nations that excel on the battlefield or that subscribe to the democratic ideology. They belong to every person in the world, victor or vanquished, whatever may be his race, color or beliefs. They rise above any status of belligerency or outlawry." Swift paused and then added, "I think tomorrow's going to be a good day."

DOJ_NMG_0038018

And of course it was. With the assent of four of his colleagues, Stevens ruled that the military tribunals created by presidential order in November 2001 to try enemies captured in the war on terror violated the Geneva Conventions and the Uniform Code of Military Justice and were therefore illegal. Stevens, it would seem, had absorbed his mentor's distaste for unbridled power. "He was finally able to vindicate those values that Rutledge championed," says Allison Danner, who clerked for Justice Stevens in the late 1990's.

So much of the conversation concerning the war on terror has focused on fear - for some, the fear of losing our freedoms, for all, the fear of another attack. It's easy to overlook the counternarrative of hope, whether it's Iraqi citizens braving violence to vote in free democratic elections, the declining confidence in bin Laden in a number of Muslim countries (according to a recent Pew Research Center poll) or our Supreme Court reminding us of the resilience of the principles upon which this country was built. "There are not many countries where a noncitizen with a fourth-grade education can sue the president," says Neal Katyal, the Georgetown Law professor who argued Hamdan's case before the Supreme Court. "That is our great gift to the world. We're strong enough to say our system can handle it."

Throughout our history, war has led to the abrogation of rights, from the Alien and Sedition Acts through the detention and internment of Japanese-Americans in World War II to the F.B.I.'s undercover infiltration of antiwar groups during Vietnam. More often than not, when asked to rule on the legality of these extraordinary measures, the Supreme Court has given the commander in chief a wide berth. This is understandable: "Judges, like other citizens, do not wish to hinder a nation's 'war effort,' " Justice William Rehnquist once wrote. And yet, when the court sets aside civil liberties and defers to the president, it acts out of fear; when the court checks the president and reaffirms those liberties, it acts out of strength - and, equally, hope.

President Bush has said that the war on terror presents unprecedented challenges and therefore demands a novel approach, the so-called new paradigm. It is true that we are fighting a new kind of enemy, one who is transnational, can wreak havoc on an epic scale and, in the case of suicide bombers, cannot be deterred by the threat of conviction in a court of law. But if the danger posed by this enemy is of a different character than we have encountered in the past, so, too, is the danger posed by our response to him. This is, after all, a war with no foreseeable end and a limitless battlefield. Left unchecked, the president could extend the reach of his wartime powers anywhere, ad infinitum. Do we need to narrow the scope of certain liberties to defeat radical Islam? The majority opinion in Hamdan does not preclude this possibility, but it does prevent the president from acting unilaterally, while inviting - compelling, really - Congress to assume its own share of constitutional responsibility for the war on terror. Will Congress prove a more vigilant steward of our civil liberties? We cannot say. In the future, the balance of hope and fear will depend on many things, most notably whether we are attacked again. But we are at least assured of an admittedly overdue debate about the conduct of the war. Before Hamdan, that debate, such as it was, consisted of the executive branch telling us - or not telling us - how it was prosecuting the war and of the denunciations issued by the executive branch's critics. We were told that after 9/11, everything had changed - or that nothing had changed. Now that our fear will be tempered by hope, the real conversation can begin.

Let There Be Law (WP)

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

The Supreme Court has offered a chance to put the war on terror on solid legal ground. Will Congress rise to the occasion?

THE SUPREME Court's rejection of the Bush administration's plan for terrorist trials has rightly been seen as a rebuff of the president's unilateral legal approach to fighting al-Qaeda. But in a subtler way, it is also a profound rebuke to Congress. The nation's legislature has mostly sat on the sidelines for the duration of the war on terror, letting the administration make its own rules -- and ride roughshod over the law as well as fundamental American values. The court's action forces the administration to invite Congress into the process of designing trials for enemy combatants. This presents a major opportunity to bring the legal framework of this conflict -- and the country's political system -- back into balance.

This chance is far broader than the relatively narrow question of how accused terrorists should face justice. There is an opportunity to provide legislative authorization -- along with limits, safeguards and accountability -- for all of the powers and practices the U.S. government may need in a long-term confrontation with violent Islamist extremism. Congress should audit the administration's treatment of prisoners, whether in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, or in secret locations abroad. It should scrutinize its interrogation methods, including those that skirt prohibitions against torture. It should review the government's domestic surveillance and debate the proper balance between ensuring Americans' privacy and gathering intelligence effectively.

The immediate danger is that Congress will become reckless and hasty and abdicate the responsibility the court has given it. With midterm elections looming, the administration may push for quick legislative fixes. It may ask for a simple statutory authorization for the military commissions it wants to use for terrorist trials. It may also seek to counter the court's ruling that Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which requires humane treatment for all detainees, includes al-Qaeda members. Having granted the administration a blank check for so long, Congress should not offer a rubber stamp.

Instead, and as a start, Congress needs to examine comprehensively what changes, if any, the administration truly needs in the ordinary rules of military justice to bring al-Qaeda suspects to trial. Many military lawyers believe terrorist trials could proceed smoothly using the normal system of courts-martial, which the military utilizes to try its own personnel. The administration has several concerns, chiefly the need to protect classified intelligence information and its desire to use evidence collected in the rough and tumble of war that might not be admissible in a conventional court-martial. Its own rules offered maximal flexibility at considerable risk to fairness. Congress must satisfy itself both that any deviations are truly needed and that they are no broader than absolutely necessary.

Legislators also have an important role to play concerning the court's holding on Geneva's Common Article 3, which could have a major impact on treatment standards for prisoners. The import of the decision is to make it a potential crime under U.S. law to treat prisoners inhumanely, yet the Geneva article is vague in its language. As a consequence, it is essential that Americans fighting the war get clear guidance as to what conduct is prohibited. Given the administration's ugly history of construing vague language requiring humane treatment as allowing inhumane treatment, it cannot be permitted a free hand in that interpretation.

At a minimum, Congress should force the administration to publish the guidance it gives to personnel in the field concerning the article's meaning. More broadly, it should consider legislation putting meat on the treaty's rather bare bones. It should consider every exceptional practice the administration has tried to justify: from "waterboarding" and other practices of torture and near-torture to "renditions" of suspects to foreign governments to the holding of prisoners incommunicado. One obvious place to start would be to stipulate that the CIA's network of secret prisons is not consistent with Geneva's requirements: Its detainees must be transferred to U.S. facilities, registered with the International Red Cross and guaranteed humane treatment.

Other issues not directly addressed by the court warrant close examination, too. As we have argued before, Congress should put on firmer legal ground the basis on which captives in this war are detained in the first place. It needs to gets a handle on the National Security Agency's program of domestic surveillance -- authorizing whatever part of it is necessary, subject to meaningful judicial and legislative oversight.

This is a moment in which this country can correct the mistake of five years ago, when the executive branch sought to fight a novel war based on a combination of outdated laws and new rules it made up on its own. The Supreme Court has created the chance to bring real law to the war on terror -- if Congress is willing to do its job.

This is the sixth editorial in an occasional series about the Bush administration's detention and treatment of foreign prisoners. We will revisit the topic from time to time during coming months. The full series is available athttp://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions.

Bush Originally Trumpeted Anti-terror Plan's Details (HC)

By Julie Mason

Houston Chronicle, July 2, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush's sustained outrage last week about newspaper reports on a program tracking terrorists' financial records may have seemed odd considering how urgently the administration once publicized the program's broad concepts.

Thirteen days after Sept. 11, Bush signed an executive order expanding the Treasury Department's authority to track the bank activities of those with suspected ties to terrorism. The White House sent reporters a detailed fact sheet on the new powers.

For good measure, Bush summoned the news media to the Rose Garden to trumpet the program alongside the secretaries of state and treasury.

"We're putting banks and financial institutions around the world on notice, we will work with their governments, ask them to freeze or block terrorists' ability to access funds in foreign accounts," Bush said. "If they fail to help us by sharing information or freezing accounts, the Department of the Treasury now has the authority to freeze their bank's assets and transactions in the United States."

The information was still on the White House Web site as of Saturday.

One of the first organizations shut down with the new powers was in Texas. With great fanfare, the Justice Department's Terrorist Financing Task Force busted the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, an organization operating from a Richardson storefront.

Last week, the New York Times and others reported some of the details of how the Bush administration has been monitoring financial transactions since Sept. 11.

The program uses far-reaching government subpoenas to obtain financial records from a cooperative in Belgium called Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Communication, according to the articles. (The Times story was quickly matched by the Los Angeles Times and the Wall Street Journal).

Bush reacted swiftly, calling the reports disgraceful and a compromising of national security. Vice President Dick Cheney followed suit.

"The New York Times has now made it more difficult for us to prevent attacks in the future," Cheney told supporters at a fundraiser in Nebraska.

The difference between disclosures in the Rose Garden and in the newspaper is that the Times and others are reporting operational details, according to the White House.

At a fundraiser in Missouri, Bush intensified his rhetoric, earning a sustained, standing ovation when he said, "There can be no excuse for anyone entrusted with vital intelligence to leak it and no excuse for any newspaper to print it."

Last week the Times added an article saying that some officials thought disclosures about the intelligence program actually could stem terrorism financing by forcing suspects to use a more informal, less reliable way to move bank funds.

U.S. Sen. Jim Bunning, a Kentucky Republican, accused the Times of treason for reporting on the program, while other Republicans on Capitol Hill called for an investigation and urged the Justice Department to pursue charges in the matter.

The House passed a resolution Thursday supporting the financial tracking program and condemning news organizations that report on secret surveillance programs. The action came three months after Congress reauthorized the Patriot Act.

Short takes•At a campaign fundraiser in St. Louis last week, a supporter in the crowd shouted to Bush, "Four more years."

Responded the president: "No more wife."

•On Thursday, Bush turns 60. Also turning 60 this year are Donald Trump, former President Clinton and Cher.

A History Of Publishing, And Not Publishing, Secrets (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

WASHINGTON

WHEN government officials ask journalists to withhold information on national security grounds, they face a natural skepticism.

Many reporters believe that the government routinely exaggerates the need for secrecy. They suspect that security officials try to snuff reporting that is merely embarrassing or at most politically troublesome. And most journalists are deeply reluctant to pass up a scoop.

Yet for decades, American newspapers and broadcasters have regularly censored themselves on security grounds, plucking compromising details from a story, delaying its publication or killing it entirely. The New York Times has withheld articles that might have jeopardized counterterrorism programs or efforts to protect vulnerable stockpiles of nuclear material. Reporters have removed details about invasion plans, military equipment, allies' assistance and much else.

None of those precautions, intended to protect American lives and intelligence sources, is visible to the public. But on vivid display are articles published over the government's vociferous objections, some of which have deeply angered the Bush administration and its allies.

The latest tempest was set off on June 22 by the disclosure in The New York Times, closely followed by The Los Angeles Times and The Wall Street Journal, of a secret program that scrutinizes global money transfers by a Brussels banking consortium.

The article followed other exposés of counterterrorist tactics, including The Washington Post's on the Central Intelligence Agency's overseas detention centers and The New York Times's on the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping.

Critics of the Bush administration say that extraordinary secrecy has generated the rash of disclosures. "People in the government who believe something wrong or illegal is going on feel they have no recourse but to go to the press," said Jeffrey H. Smith, a former C.I.A. general counsel.

But some current and former intelligence officers express exasperation at what they see as journalists' arrogance in publishing in the face of government pleas for caution.

"I'd say views are hardening," said Bobby R. Inman, former director of the National Security Agency and deputy director of the C.I.A., who is generally viewed as friendly to the press. "If we're going to avoid an official secrets act" — a British-style law far more draconian than anything in this country — "we're going to have to have more discipline from the media."

John S. Carroll, former editor of The Los Angeles Times, recounted an exchange last year with the C.I.A. that illustrated the opposite instincts of the two sides.

Over C.I.A. objections, the newspaper published an article about the agency's cultivation of sources in the Iranian community of Los Angeles. "If we felt it would seriously compromise national security, we would not have run it," said Mr. Carroll, adding that he never heard of problems resulting from the decision to publish.

But a former C.I.A. official said intelligence officers had been "furious" about the article, fearing it would make it harder to recruit Iranian-Americans and put expatriates under potentially dangerous scrutiny if they traveled to Iran.

In what Mr. Carroll calls the "eternal argument" over the publication of secrets, history offers evidence for both sides.

KATHARINE GRAHAM, the publisher of The Washington Post who died in 2001, backed her editors through tense battles during the Watergate era. But in a 1986 speech, she warned that the media sometimes made "tragic" mistakes.

Her example was the disclosure, after the bombing of the American embassy in Beirut in 1983, that American intelligence was reading coded radio traffic between terrorist plotters in Syria and their overseers in Iran. The communications stopped, and five months later they struck again, destroying the Marine barracks in Beirut and killing 241 Americans.

"This kind of result, albeit unintentional, points up the necessity for full cooperation wherever possible between the media and the authorities," Ms. Graham said.

But such cooperation can prove problematic, as her newspaper's former editor, Benjamin C. Bradlee, has recounted.

In 1986, after holding for weeks at government request a scoop about an N.S.A. tap on a Soviet undersea communications cable, The Post learned that the Russians knew all about it already from an N.S.A. turncoat named Ronald Pelton. NBC beat The Post on its own report.

"Officials often — more often than not, in my experience — use the claim of national security as a smoke screen to cover up their own embarrassment," Mr. Bradlee wrote in his 1995 memoir, "A Good Life."

In 1985, The Times reported that aMarine colonel in the White House was overseeing the secret war against the Nicaraguan contras. The newspaper withheld the name of the colonel because the White House said printing it might endanger his life, recalled a former Times reporter, Joel Brinkley.

The Post named Oliver North the next day. "There was absolutely no reason not to print his name," he said.

In 1961, The Times's learned of the planned Bay of Pigs invasion but removed references to the C.I.A. and other details from its article at the government's request.

But after the attempted attack on Cuba proved a catastrophe, President John F. Kennedy told a Times editor that he wished the paper had ignored the government's plea — because a more pointed article might have led the C.I.A. to abort the operation.

DOJ_NMG_0038022

Some countries try to regulate such exchanges. In Britain, skirmishing over secrets is mediated by the Defense Press and Broadcasting Advisory Committee, with both press and government members. The group has no power to stop publication but advises journalists on what damage a report might cause.

No such system exists in the United States, but some years ago, a group of about 20 journalists and officials met quarterly for dinner to discuss how a free press should cover secret agencies.

Some officials refused repeated invitations, said Mr. Smith, one of the organizers.

But he said the meetings were useful while they lasted. "The idea was that each side didn't really understand the other very well," Mr. Smith said. "I'd say that's certainly still the case."

Secrecy, Security, The President And The Press (NYT)

By Byron Calame

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

THE Bush administration's unusually harsh attacks on The New York Times for exposing a secret banking-data surveillance program have turned a glaring spotlight on the paper's decision to publish the article.

President Bush, Vice President Cheney and Republican legislators have singled out The Times in recent days for disclosing the counterterrorism program, even though The Los Angeles Times and The Wall Street Journal published articles the same day. Senator Jim Bunning of Kentucky called on the attorney general to investigate The New York Times for treason.

The flood of reader e-mails reacting to the June 23 article has left hundreds of messages in various newsroom in-boxes at The Times. Roughly 1,000 e-mails have come to me, about 85 percent of them critical of the decision to publish the story and a large fraction venomous. It was time to take a close look at the handling of the article in search of answers.

My close look convinced me that Bill Keller, the executive editor, was correct in deciding that Times readers deserved to read about the banking-data surveillance program. And the growing indications that this and other financial monitoring operations were hardly a secret to the terrorist world minimizes the possibility that the article made America less safe.

The banking-data surveillance program, set up in 2001, is run out of the Central Intelligence Agency and overseen by the Treasury Department. It provided access to records of transactions routed through a Belgian consortium by banks and financial institutions around the world. More than 11 million transactions involving about $6 trillion are routed daily through the Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication, or Swift.

So what were the most solid reasons to publish the story?

There was a significant question as to how secret the program was after five years. "Hundreds, if not thousands, of people know about this," Mr. Keller said he was told by an official who talked to him on condition of anonymity. The 25 bankers from numerous nations on the Swift board of directors, and their predecessors going back to 2001, knew about the arrangement. So did some consortium executives and staff members — a group that probably expanded during this period. Starting in 2003, Swift representatives had to be stationed alongside any government intelligence official searching the data.

Further support for the conclusion that the Swift program hasn't remained totally hidden from terrorists, or anyone else, emerged last week. A former State Department official who has served on a United Nations counterterrorism group pointed to a 2002 United Nations report noting that the United States was monitoring international financial transactions. Swift and similar organizations were mentioned in the publicly available report, although there were no details. "The United States has begun to apply new monitoring techniques to spot and verify suspicious transactions," the report noted.

The Times's June 23 article "awoke the general public" to the Swift program and "in that sense, it was truly new news," Victor Comras, the former State Department official, wrote on The Counterterrorism Blog last week. "But," he added, "the information was fairly well known by terrorism financing experts back in 2002."

The administration has sometimes invited press attention to its effort to track terrorist financing. In September 2003, Treasury Secretary John W. Snow and a team of his aides took reporters from The Times and other papers on a six-day tour on a military aircraft "to show off the department's efforts," Mr. Keller and Dean Baquet, the editor of The Los Angeles Times, noted in a joint Op-Ed commentary that appeared yesterday. The aides "discussed many sensitive details of their monitoring efforts, hoping they would appear in print and demonstrate the administration's relentlessness against the terrorist threat," according to the two editors.

Another reason Times editors were right to proceed with the 3,550-word Swift story was the skimpy Congressional oversight of the program. Secrecy is vital for intelligence and national security programs, but so is oversight by the courts or elected legislators. The Swift program, however, doesn't seem to have any specific Congressional approval or formal authorization. The Treasury Department has not provided a list of who in Congress was informed, or when, The Times has reported.

Eric Lichtblau, one of the two reporters who wrote the Swift story, told me the administration briefed a limited number of Congressional leaders — apparently from both parties, but not the full intelligence or banking committees — toward the beginning of the program. It wasn't until the Treasury Department learned that The Times was working on the story, Mr. Lichtblau said, that the administration apparently briefed all members of the intelligence committees. Whether there are official standards established for the Swift program or not, the weak Congressional oversight over the past five years deserved public scrutiny.

Temporary emergency measures cloaked in government secrecy can too easily become permanent shortcuts. That's why oversight is important. It is also a reason to publish the article. The reservations expressed by some of the 20 current and former government officials and industry executives who were disturbed enough to talk to The Times were based on this concern: "What they viewed as an urgent, temporary measure had become permanent nearly five years later without specific Congressional approval or formal authorization," in the words of the article.

The most fundamental reason for publishing the article, of course, was the obligation of a free press to monitor government and other powerful institutions in our society. "Our default position — our job — is to publish information if we are convinced it is fair and accurate," Mr. Keller wrote in a letter to readers posted online last weekend, "and our biggest failures have generally been when we failed to dig deep enough or to report fully enough." He added:

"The question we start with as journalists is not 'why publish?' but 'why would we withhold information of significance?' We have sometimes done so, holding stories or editing out details that could serve those hostile to the U.S. But we need a compelling reason to do so."

What about the administration's reasons for demanding that The Times not publish?

Mr. Keller said the "central argument" senior officials gave against publishing the Swift article was that international bankers would stop cooperating. In his weekend letter, he cited two reasons that argument didn't stop him from publishing the story: First, the consortium provides data to comply with administrative subpoenas issued by the Treasury Department — a legal obligation. "Second, if, as the administration says, the program is legal, highly effective, and well protected against invasion of privacy, the bankers should have little trouble defending it." So far, Swift hasn't publicly indicated any intention to stop cooperating.

For me, the most substantial argument against running the story was the acknowledgment that the Swift program was letter-of-the-law legal, had helped catch some terrorists and had a clean record on privacy abuse. But full-bore oversight would have had to be part of that picture to make a convincing case that the program deserved to continue in secrecy, with its access to Swift's mother lode of financial data.

Often obscured in the past week's hot rhetoric over The Times's decision to publish the Swift article were the occasions when the paper's editors have chosen to hold or modify a story when warned by government officials that lives or national security might be endangered. "Few people are aware when we decide to hold an article," noted Mr. Keller and Mr. Baquet in their joint commentary. Apart from The Times's decision to hold the December story about the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping for more than a year, it turns out the paper has decided not to publish stories that "might have jeopardized efforts to protect vulnerable stockpiles of nuclear material," according to the joint commentary. The Times has also held stories about "highly sensitive counterterrorism initiatives that are still in operation," the Op-Ed piece noted.

"There is no magic formula, no neat metric for either the public's interest or the dangers of publishing sensitive information," the two editors concluded. "We make our best judgment."

The best judgment of these two editors served their readers well in the case of the Swift story. In the face of intense administration pressure in a country that's unusually polarized politically, they correctly decided to make sure their readers were informed about the banking-data surveillance.

Can't Win The War? Bomb The Press! (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

OLD GLORY lost today," Bill Frist declaimed last week when his second attempt to rewrite the Constitution in a single month went the way of his happy prognosis for Terri Schiavo. Of course it isn't Old Glory that lost when the flag-burning amendment flamed out. The flag always survives the politicians who wrap themselves in it. What really provoked Mr. Frist's crocodile tears was the foiling of yet another ruse to distract Americans from the wreckage in Iraq. He and his party, eager to change the subject in an election year, just can't let go of their scapegoat strategy. It's illegal Hispanic immigrants, gay couples seeking marital rights, cut-and-run Democrats and rampaging flag burners who have betrayed America's values, not those who bungled a war.

No sooner were the flag burners hustled offstage than a new traitor was unveiled for the Fourth: the press. Public enemy No. 1 is The New York Times, which was accused of a "disgraceful" compromise of national security (by President Bush) and treason (by Representative Peter King of New York and the Coulter amen chorus). The Times's offense was to publish a front-page article about a comprehensive American effort to track terrorists with the aid of a Belgian consortium, Swift, which serves as a clearinghouse for some 7,800 financial institutions in 200 countries.

It was a solid piece of journalism. But if you want to learn the truly dirty secrets of how our government prosecutes this war, the story of how it vilified The Times is more damning than anything in the article that caused the uproar.

The history of that scapegoating begins on the Friday morning, June 23, that The Times, The Los Angeles Times and The Wall Street Journal all published accounts of the Swift program first posted on the Web the night before. In his press briefing that morning, Tony Snow fielded many questions about the program's legality. But revealingly, for all his opportunities, he never attacked the news media.

Far from Swift-boating the Swift reportage, he offered tentative praise. "It's interesting," he said, "because I think there's a fair amount of balance in the story in that you do have concrete benefits and you do have the kind of abstract harms that were mentioned in there." He noted that there had been "no allegation of illegality" in the Times article.

This was accurate. The story was balanced, just as Mr. Snow said. And it was no cause for a national-security alarm for the simple reason that since 9/11, our government has repeatedly advertised that it is following the terrorists' money trail, a tactic enhanced by the broad new powers over financial institutions that Mr. Bush sought and received. In November 2002, he and the Treasury secretary at the time, Paul O'Neill, even held a televised event promoting their Foreign Terrorist Asset Tracking Center, established expressly, in the president's words, to "investigate the financial infrastructure of the international terrorist networks." As for Swift, Dan Froomkin of washingtonpost.com points out that it can't resist bragging on its own Web site that it "has a history of cooperating in good faith with authorities," including treasury departments and law enforcement agencies, in trying "to combat abuse of the financial system for illegal activities."

Only a terrorist who couldn't shoot straight would assume that Swift was not part of the American effort to stalk terrorist transactions; that's tantamount to assuming that cops would track down license plate numbers without enlisting the Department of Motor Vehicles. But, unfortunately for us, terrorists are not so stupid: it's been reported as far back as 2003 (in The Washington Post) and as recently as this month (in Ron Suskind's must-read best seller, "The One Percent Doctrine") that our enemies long ago took Mr. Bush at his word and abandoned banks for couriers, money brokers, front companies and suitcases stuffed with cash and gold. Tom Brokaw summarized the consensus of terrorism experts last week when he told Chris Matthews of MSNBC: "I don't know anyone who believes that the terrorist network said, 'Oh my God, they're tracing our financial transactions? What a surprise.' Of course, they knew that they were doing that."

The real news conveyed by The Times and its competitors was not the huge program to track terrorist finances, but that per usual from the administration that gave us Gitmo, the program was conducted with little oversight from the other two branches of government. Even so, the reporting on the pros and cons of that approach was, as Mr. Snow said, balanced.

Or so he said Friday morning, June 23. By Monday, the president had entered the fray and Mr. Snow was accusing The Times of putting the "public's right to know" over "somebody's right to live." What had happened over the weekend to prompt this escalation of hysteria? The same stuff that always happens when the White House scapegoats the press (or anyone else): bad and embarrassing news that the White House wants to drown out.

One such looming embarrassment was that breathless arrest in Miami of what federal authorities billed as a "homegrown terrorist cell." This amazing feat of derring-do had all the melodramatic trappings of a carefully staged administration P.R. extravaganza. On June 22, the F.B.I. director, Robert Mueller, just happened to be on "Larry King Live" speaking about his concerns about "homegrown terrorists" when, by a remarkable coincidence, Larry King announced a "report just in" from a Miami station on a federal terrorism investigation. The next day — the same day the Swift story was published — brought the full-dress dog-and-pony show by the intrepid attorney general, Alberto Gonzales.

But rain soon started to fall on this parade. The seven men accused of plotting to take down the Sears Tower in Chicago and collaborate with Al Qaeda on a "full ground war" turned out to have neither weapons nor explosives nor links to Al Qaeda; both the F.B.I. and the Chicago police said there was no operational threat. By Saturday the administration's overhyped victory against terrorists was already deflating into a national punch line, a nostalgic remembrance of John Ashcroft orange terror alerts past.

Sunday brought another unwanted revelation (from Michael R. Gordon of The Times): Gen. George Casey Jr., the commander in Iraq, was drafting a plan for sharp troop reductions there, some of them to precede this year's election. Inconveniently enough, the Casey approach was a virtual double for the phased withdrawals advocated by Senate Democrats days earlier and incessantly slurred as "cut-and-run" defeatism by Republicans.

By the time of the Bush-Snow eruption on Monday, the Democrats were holding hearings on the Hill about prewar intelligence. It was better that Americans hear tirades about traitors in the press than be tempted to listen to the testimony of Lawrence Wilkerson, Colin Powell's former chief of staff, who described Mr. Powell's February 2003 United Nations presentation on Iraq's W.M.D. as "the perpetuation of a hoax."

It's not only the White House that has a vested political interest in concocting a smoke screen by demonizing the fourth estate as a fifth column. The Democrats were holding their hearing because Pat Roberts, the chairman of the Senate intelligence committee, has for two years been stalling his panel's promised investigation into how the administration used intelligence before the war. Hoping that we'd forget about that continuing cover-up, Mr. Roberts last week made a big show of calling for an investigation into the Swift story's supposed damage to national security.

Representative King, so eager to label others treasonous, has humiliating headlines of his own to counteract: he's the chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee who has so little clout and bureaucratic aptitude that he couldn't stop the government led by his own party from stripping New York City, in his home state, of 40 percent of its counterterrorism funding. If there's another terrorist attack, he may be the last person in New York who should accuse others, as he did The Times on the House floor on Thursday, of having blood "on their hands."

Such ravings make it hard not to think of the official assault on The Times and The Washington Post over the Pentagon Papers. In 1972, on the first anniversary of the publication of that classified Pentagon history of the Vietnam War, The Times's managing editor then, A. M. Rosenthal, reminisced in print about the hyperbolic predictions that had been made by the Nixon White House and its supporters: "Codes would be broken. Military security endangered. Foreign governments would be afraid to deal with us. There would be nothing secret left." None of that happened. What did happen was that Americans learned "how secrecy had become a way of life" for a government whose clandestine policy decisions had fomented a disaster.

The assault on a free press during our own wartime should be recognized for what it is: another desperate ploy by officials trying to hide their own lethal mistakes in the shadows. It's the antithesis of everything we celebrate with the blazing lights of Independence Day.

Governor To Release Intelligence Reports (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2006

Schwarzenegger acts to ease concerns about inappropriate compilation of information on antiwar and political rallies.

DOJ_NMG_0038026

SACRAMENTO — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's office said Saturday he was ordering the release of dozens of intelligence reports prepared for the state Office of Homeland Security — a step that comes as lawmakers from both parties are denouncing a practice in which state intelligence agents compiled information about political and antiwar protests and rallies.

Schwarzenegger administration officials say there were only two cases in which state homeland security agents collected material on political protests in recent months. Releasing the full trove of intelligence reports will prove that point, assuring the public that the practice was not more widespread, according to those officials.

State lawmakers from both parties said it was inexcusable that two such intelligence reports from March and April carried details about the location and purpose of political rallies throughout California.

The two reports, obtained by The Times, were described in a news article published Saturday.

"The governor believes that any inappropriate information gathering like this is totally unacceptable," Adam Mendelsohn, Schwarzenegger's communications director, said in an interview.

The governor's homeland security director, Matthew Bettenhausen, said Saturday that the material was mistakenly included in the reports by a private contractor working for his office.

Schwarzenegger will allow the media to review the approximately 60 intelligence reports that have been prepared for the homeland security director since March, but no copies will be allowed, Mendelsohn said.

Before the reports can be reviewed in coming days, officials will remove all "law-enforcement-sensitive information" — anything covering "ongoing investigations" and related "safety threats," said Chris Bertelli, spokesman for the homeland security office.

Rep. George Miller (D-Martinez) said in an interview that there should be a "very, very high threshold" for removing anything and that the reports should not be sanitized. The congressman attended an antiwar rally in Walnut Creek in March that was listed in one of the intelligence reports, in a section called "Upcoming California Protests."

State legislators said they were pleased that the governor was releasing the material.

Yet some said they were troubled by what they viewed as a continuing pattern of aggressive intelligence gathering by his administration.

Last year, the state Senate held hearings into news accounts that a California National Guard intelligence unit had tracked a Mother's Day antiwar rally.

State Sen. Joe Dunn (D-Santa Ana), who led the hearings on the National Guard, said the homeland security episode is fresh proof of the need for greater oversight.

Dunn said he wants to create a special legislative intelligence committee that would monitor California's fast-growing homeland security apparatus. Lawmakers serving on the committee would receive a special security clearance. He said he has broached the idea with the Senate leadership.

"I am very pleased that they're willing to share all the reports," Dunn said. "However, I was assured after the one spying incident in May 2005 by the California National Guard that the practice was not more widespread at the state level.

"We now discover that those assurances were patently false. I hope the current assurances are a little more truthful than the ones of a year ago."

The homeland security office quickly arranged a news conference Saturday morning to offer some reassurances of its own.

Bettenhausen, a Schwarzenegger appointee, said there was no surveillance of any of the political demonstrations listed in the intelligence reports.

One of the rallies was staged by animal rights activists protesting the slaughter of Canadian seals. Another was a women's peace protest aimed at showing support for a Salinas woman facing charges of trespassing at Vandenberg Air Force Base. Several other protests concerned the war in Iraq.

The two reports from March and April that mentioned the political demonstrations were shared with the California Highway Patrol and the attorney general's office, but not with any other law enforcement entity, Bettenhausen said.

These two agencies are part of a state partnership set up to combat terrorism and gather intelligence.

Bettenhausen described how the material made its way into the reports.

A state contractor retained by homeland security issued a report March 7. That document included summaries of 10 rallies set for later in the month. Listed were the date of the event, the purpose, the location, the expected number of people, the source of the information, and "officer safety issues."

When they saw that, homeland security officials told the contractor not to include such information again, Bettenhausen said.

Yet similar material was part of a report dated April 10. Again, homeland security officials saw it and told the contractor to leave out such information in the future, Bettenhausen said.

Since then, none of the reports prepared for Bettenhausen have included information on political protests, homeland security officials said.

Bettenhausen said his office "does not tolerate the gathering of inappropriate information and we never will. We will not stand for it."

The contractor used by the state homeland security agency is SRA International Inc., which is being paid up to $16 million to provide counterterrorism analysis.

U.S. and Canada Collaborate to Enforce Law

BLAINE, Wash. -- Royal Canadian Mounted Police agents watched from a clifftop as a helicopter swooped down in a Canadian field, picked up more than 300 pounds of marijuana from a waiting truck and skimmed across the border into the United States.

Federal agents in Washington state's Okanogan County, in constant radio contact with the Mounties, were waiting when the helicopter dropped its illicit load in a wildlife area. The U.S. agents arrested two men who had scooped up the dope, and the Canadians were waiting when the chopper landed back in British Columbia, arresting the pilot and another man.

The closely coordinated investigation, announced by authorities last week, was about more than busting a drug-smuggling ring, however. U.S. and Canadian law enforcement officials said it highlighted the increasingly close and institutionalized cooperation between the two nations' police agencies. Such joint operations, called "parallel investigations" because of sensitivity about sovereignty issues, also reflect the fundamentally different strategies used to secure the United States' two very different borders since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Along the border in Texas, local police departments have claimed to see Mexican army troops protecting drug smugglers, a claim the Mexicans deny. Corruption has been common among some Mexican police. The United States has constructed walls and fences and stationed National Guard troops along the border to keep out illegal immigrants.

Along the Canadian border, there are no plans for fences, and efforts focus on smuggling and terrorism. U.S. and Canadian authorities are patrolling together on the Great Lakes and have plans to operate a joint radio network. In a real-life repeat of the 1990s TV show "Due South" that featured a well-mannered Mountie and a hard-bitten Chicago cop, American agents and their Canadian counterparts have begun to investigate cases on each other's soil.

Americans and Canadians also share law enforcement intelligence. U.S. agents aided the Canadians in their investigation into an alleged terrorist plot stymied on June 3 with the arrest of 17 men and teenagers in Ontario, law enforcement officials said.

Five years ago, only Canadians worked at the Mounted Police headquarters in Ottawa, said Joe Oliver, a Canadian police superintendent. Now, Americans representing four agencies are based there, he said, adding that cooperation is "pervasive."

Just a few years ago, cross-border law enforcement cooperation was difficult and ad hoc. "You could get punished for improper disclosure to a foreign country," said Roy Hoffman, who runs the Immigration and Customs Enforcement operation in Blaine. "You used to need a friend on the other side to work a case together with you. Now it's ingrained behavior."

The Washington drug-smuggling investigation, known as Operation Frozen Timber, began two years ago when law enforcement agencies learned that smuggling rings were using helicopters and small aircraft to move high-quality marijuana known as B.C. Bud from Canada and cocaine, firearms and bulk cash from the United States, said Leigh Winchell, special agent in charge of the Immigrations and Customs Enforcement office in Seattle. In July 2005, Playboy magazine interviewed pilots who bragged of making $125,000 a week running marijuana to the United States.

Winchell said U.S. and Canadian authorities identified suspects and infiltrated the organizations. They arranged wiretaps and pooled intelligence. Over time, agents arrested more than 40 people in the United States and six in Canada. Authorities also seized 8,000 pounds of marijuana, 800 pounds of cocaine, three aircraft and $1.5 million in U.S. currency. Three alleged smugglers were killed in two helicopter crashes in Canada.

"The ability of organizations to move contraband back and forth across the border is a national security issue, because these are people who figured out a mechanism to penetrate the U.S. and Canadian border," Winchell said. "Those small helicopters can move 250 pounds of marijuana at a time. But what does a suitcase carrying a dirty bomb weigh? Maybe 80."

Culture, the nature of the threat and geography have brought U.S. and Canadian law enforcement together. While there are many cities that sprawl across the Mexican border, they are usually divided by walls. But in most places, the U.S.-Canadian border is delineated by nothing more than a ditch or a clear-cut through a forest.

As of the end of April, only 950 Border Patrol agents were stationed along the 4,000-mile-long northern border while 10,200 patrolled the 1,920-mile-long boundary with Mexico. At scores of checkpoints across the northern border, when it's quitting time, an orange cone is the only thing stopping incursions -- although since the Sept. 11 attacks, the United States has invested billions to establish five air and marine stations, and to install sensors, cameras and other technology to firm up the northern frontier.

Border Patrol senior agent Bob Riffle, who worked on the Mexican border for a decade before transferring to Washington state, said the two borders have different cultures and had high praise for his Canadian counterparts. "I trust those guys implicitly," he said. "In Mexico, how can you have serious cooperation on a day-to-day level with guys who might have just robbed a group of illegals? It's a different world down there."

Law enforcement officials also say the nature of the threat demands that the two sides cooperate. As of the end of May, 829,109 illegal immigrants had been apprehended crossing from Mexico this year. Canada's numbers are a tiny fraction of that amount -- 4,066.

But a significant number concern American law enforcement. The only terrorist caught entering the United States, millennium bomber Ahmed Ressam, came from Canada. Criminal gangs also traffic in Asian sex workers from Canada to the United States.

Some law enforcement officials, such as John McKay, the U.S. attorney in Seattle who prosecuted Ressam, are not satisfied with the level of cooperation. "The good news is it's improved," he said. "The bad news is it's not nearly as good as it should be."

When an FBI analysis raised the possibility in 2004 that the massive ferry system that plies Puget Sound had been scouted by potential terrorists, McKay remembers sitting in a meeting when someone asked, "Hey, has anyone called the Canadians about this?" "And everybody in the room stopped what they were doing, and blood ran cold," McKay said. "We're equally vulnerable. Why isn't there an RCMP constable sitting in the Joint Terrorism Task Force in Seattle?"

Canadian officials said a Mountie participates in the task force by invitation only.

McKay has lobbied to open up an experimental law enforcement database, called Linx, to Canadian law enforcement. "We have people who think if we shared sensitive law enforcement records with Canada, we would be giving up sovereignty, but we can't be secure unless we share information with Canada," he said.

Some in Canada have been wary of the long arm of American justice. In 2002, a Canadian citizen, Maher Arar, was changing planes in New York when U.S. authorities detained him and spirited him to Syria, where he said he was imprisoned and tortured for nearly a year. Arar's charges that Canadian authorities assisted the United States in his detention caused an uproar in Canada.

On the American side, there are worries that Canada is not being vigilant enough. A recent State Department report called Canada's recently tightened immigration policy "liberal" and claimed Canada is a safe haven for militants.

One unintended consequence of the increase in cross-border cases is a crush of suspects being handed off to local prosecutors and warehoused in local jails. More than 85 percent of the cases made by federal agents in Whatcom County, in the northwest corner of Washington state, for example, are declined by the U.S. attorney and end up as state cases. As a result,

DOJ_NMG_0038029

Whatcom's jail, built to house 148 inmates, now has 280. People convicted of drunken driving are given tickets and are not incarcerated because the jail is packed, and people arrested for misdemeanors who do not show up for court dates "know there are no consequences," Sheriff Bill Elfo said.

Currently, 700 people in the county have been sentenced to jail but cannot serve their sentences because, he said, "there's no room at the inn."

Al-Qaeda, Still In Business (WP)

By Peter Bergen

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

Over the past four years, key members of the Bush administration have claimed that al-Qaeda is "on the run" (Donald Rumsfeld and Condoleezza Rice), "disrupted" (George Tenet) or "decimated" (President Bush). At the same time, however, significant terrorist attacks around the world have dramatically increased since Sept. 11, 2001, most of them conducted by militant Islamists. How does one reconcile this apparent contradiction?

A new narrative that purports to answer that question has emerged: Yes, al-Qaeda as an organization is severely impaired, but it has been replaced by a broader ideological movement made up of self-starting, homegrown terrorists who have few formal links to al-Qaeda but are motivated by a doctrine that can be called "Binladenism." Recent examples would include the militants in Madrid who bombed commuter trains in March 2004 and killed 191 people, or the seven terrorist wannabes recently arrested in Miami in connection with an alleged plot to blow up federal buildings. They had embraced al-Qaeda's doctrine of destruction, yet had no ties to the terrorist group.

However, according to five veteran U.S. counterterrorism officials I've spoken with recently, al-Qaeda the organization remains a real threat. One longtime government terrorism analyst points to the four suicide attacks in London last July 7 that killed 52 people as evidence of the organization's resilience. "At a minimum, this was an al-Qaeda-supported operation," the analyst told me. And al-Qaeda's leaders don't seem to be feeling the heat of the "war on terror." On Thursday, Osama bin Laden released his third audiotape in three months, while his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, has appeared on an unprecedented number of videotapes since the second week of June -- averaging one a week.

So while the rapid spread of al-Qaeda's ideology in the past two years -- partly fueled by the Iraq war -- should be of considerable concern, it would be quite wrong to conclude that al-Qaeda the organization is down for the count. Indeed, if the bombings in London are any indication, it may be staging a comeback.

The London attacks of one year ago have generally been portrayed as the work of four young British men of Pakistani and Jamaican descent from the north of England -- distinguished only by their utter ordinariness -- who embraced radical Islamist ideology and managed to carry out the deadliest terrorist attack on British soil in history without outside help. The Sunday Times of London even opined that "the new breed of unaffiliated terrorist is potentially far more dangerous than the IRA or even al Qaeda because he is almost impossible to identify."

But the more you delve into the London bombings, the more they look like a classic al-Qaeda plot. The British government's official account of the attacks -- issued by the Home Office two months ago -- provides a revealing picture. It explains that the presumed ringleader, Mohammed Sidique Khan, visited Pakistan in 2003 and 2004, spending several months there. On one of those trips, he aimed "to cross the border and fight in Afghanistan," the report stated. (Presumably, Khan did not plan to fight alongside U.S. troops in Afghanistan, but rather to join the Taliban or al-Qaeda to kill Americans.)

The report goes on to note that Khan "had some contact with al Qaida figures" in Pakistan, and is "believed to have had some relevant training in a remote part of Pakistan, close to the Afghan border" during his two-week visit in 2003. The British government did not specify what sort of training he received, but given that the London bombs were made of highly efficient explosives that can't be readily made from recipes on the Internet, it is probable that the training was in the manufacturing of bombs. According to the report, Khan was also in "suspicious" contact with individuals in Pakistan in the four months immediately before the London attacks. Taken together, Khan's travels and contacts in Pakistan strongly suggest an al-Qaeda role in the operation.

DOJ_NMG_0038030

Khan also appeared on a videotape that aired on al-Jazeera two months after the suicide attacks -- an important fact to which the British report did not give sufficient weight. "I'm going to talk to you in a language that you understand," Khan said on the tape, speaking in the broad brogue of his native Yorkshire. "Our words are dead until we give them life with our blood." He goes on to describe bin Laden and Zawahiri as "today's heroes." Appearing on the same videotape, Zawahiri trumpeted al-Qaeda's responsibility for the London bombings. As a veteran U.S. counterterrorism official told me, "Zawahiri does not take credit for things that he hasn't done."

On the videotape, Zawahiri referenced a prior al-Qaeda threat to explain the targeting of London, saying "Didn't . . . Sheik Osama bin Laden offer you a truce?" -- a reference to the al-Qaeda leader's April 2004 proposal of a peace agreement with those European countries willing to pull out of Iraq. Britain is the most prominent member of that coalition. Bin Laden offered a three-month grace period before the truce expired in July 2004. A year later, the four bombers blew themselves up in London.

But the key piece of evidence overlooked in the British government report is that both Khan and Zawahiri's statements were made on a videotape bearing the distinctive logo of al-Sahab ("the clouds"), which is al-Qaeda's television production arm. Al-Sahab's first tape, a two-hour al-Qaeda infomercial, debuted on the Internet in the summer of 2001, signaling that a major anti-American attack was in the works. Since then, al-Sahab has continued to release key statements from al-Qaeda leaders. Khan's appearance on the videotape strongly suggests that he met up with members of al-Qaeda's media team based on the Afghan-Pakistan border, probably in the tribal area of Waziristan. There is much we still don't know about Khan's activities in Pakistan, but additional information is likely to point toward further contact with members of al-Qaeda in Pakistan.

The rapidly deteriorating security situation in Afghanistan over the past year is also, in part, the responsibility of al-Qaeda. The use of suicide attacks and makeshift bombs and the beheadings of hostages -- all techniques that al-Qaeda perfected in Iraq -- are methods that the Taliban has increasingly adopted in Afghanistan, making much of the south of the country a no-go area.

Hekmat Karzai, an Afghan terrorism researcher at the Institute of Defense and Strategic Studies in Singapore, points out that suicide bombings were rare in Afghanistan until 2005, when 21 such attacks took place. This year has already seen at least 16. In addition, Karzai reports that two of al-Qaeda's "most able" commanders -- Khalid Habib, a Moroccan, and Abd al Hadi, an Iraqi -- have been appointed to run its operations in southeastern and southwestern Afghanistan. These developments suggest that al-Qaeda is regrouping and strengthening along the Afghan-Pakistan border.

And, of course, bin Laden and Zawahiri remain at large in that border region, issuing a stream of tapes aimed at inflaming their supporters around the world. Zawahiri, for example, released a video last week urging further attacks on U.S. and other coalition forces in Afghanistan. Meanwhile, bin Laden's ongoing influence over al-Qaeda's affiliates was confirmed after the death last month of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, al-Qaeda's leader in Iraq. Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, al-Qaeda's new leader in Iraq, quickly released a statement on a jihadist Web site pledging allegiance to bin Laden: "We are at your disposal, ready for your command." Muhajer has longstanding ties to Zawahiri; they have both been members of Egypt's ultra-violent Jihad Group for more than two decades. A U.S. intelligence official told me that the intelligence community's recognition of bin Laden and Zawahiri's continued importance to Islamist terrorists worldwide has led to a renewed push in the past two months to locate them.

Almost five years after the attacks on Washington and New York, al-Qaeda not only remains in business in its traditional stronghold on the Afghan-Pakistan border, but continues to project its ideology and terrorism abroad. So now we face a world of ideologically driven homegrown terrorists -- free radicals unattached to any formal organization -- in addition to formal networks such as al-Qaeda that have managed to survive despite the tremendous pressure brought to bear against them since 9/11. And even more grim, they now feed off and strengthen one another.

BBC Let Intelligence Agents Vet Staff (WT)

By Chris Hastings, London Sunday Telegraph
The Washington Times, July 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038031

LONDON -- Confidential papers obtained by the Sunday Telegraph reveal that the British Broadcasting Corp. allowed intelligence agents to investigate the backgrounds and political affiliations of thousands of its employees, including newsreaders, reporters and continuity announcers.

The files, which shed light on the BBC's hitherto secret links with the counter-espionage service known as MI5, show that at one stage it was responsible for vetting 6,300 BBC posts -- almost a third of the total work force. The procedure was phased out in the late 1980s.

The files also show that the corporation maintained a list of "subversive organizations" and that evidence of certain kinds of political activity could be a bar to appointment or promotion.

The BBC's reliance on MI5 reached a peak in the late 1970s and early 1980s, at exactly the same time as millions of viewers were tuning into the fictional adventures of George Smiley in the popular spy dramas, "Tinker, Tailor, Soldier, Spy" and "Smiley's People."

The papers show that senior BBC figures covered up the links in the face of awkward questions from trade unions and the press. The documents refer to a "defensive strategy" based on "categorical denial." One file note, dated March 1, 1985, states: "Keep head down and stonewall all questions."

The BBC has always refused to be drawn out on the extent of its collaboration with the secret services. It was only after a request by the Sunday Telegraph under the Freedom of Information Act that it has released details of the vetting operation.

The documents do not name any of the individuals subjected to vetting, but it is possible that some of the BBC's biggest names were scrutinized.

Different posts were vetted for different reasons. Senior officials, including the director-general, and their support staff were checked because they had access to confidential government information in relation to their jobs. But thousands of employees were vetted because they were involved in live broadcasts and the BBC was worried about the possibility of on-air bias or disruption.

In 1983, 5,728 BBC jobs were subjected to this second kind of scrutiny known as "counter-subversion vetting." The system applied to dozens of job categories, including television producers, directors, sound engineers, secretaries and researchers.

The details of freelance television and radio staff were also routinely passed on to the security services and even the posts of editor and deputy editor of Radio 4's Woman's Hour were subject to background checks by MI5. In many cases, the spouses of applicants were subjected to scrutiny.

The BBC tried on several occasions to be more open about the system, but was blocked by security services. A memo, dated March 7, 1985, states: "Secrecy of the complete vetting operation is imposed upon us by the Security Service -- it is not of our making."

WAR NEWS:

Baghdad Market Bombing Kills 66 (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

Attack Is Largest Under New Regime

BAGHDAD, July 1 -- A truck bomb killed at least 66 people and injured more than 100 on a market street in the Shiite Muslim heart of Baghdad on Saturday, the deadliest such attack since Iraq's national-unity government took office in May.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government, which is attempting to end sectarian bloodshed through force and conciliation, had escaped the high-fatality bombings that were a fixture under the previous government. But Saturday's massive bomb, powerful enough to hurl bodies of shoppers onto the roofs of high-rise buildings surrounding the market in Baghdad's Sadr City district, drew angry denunciations from survivors, suggesting Iraqis could quickly sour on Maliki's initiatives if insurgent attacks once again begin claiming dozens of lives at a time.

DOJ_NMG_0038032

The U.S. military, meanwhile, disclosed new details about allegations that soldiers raped a woman and killed her, along with her mother, father and a sibling, in March in a village south of Baghdad. A U.S. military official revealed Saturday that the target of the alleged attack was a 20-year-old Iraqi woman who lived with her family near an American military checkpoint.

One resident of the village of Mahmudiyah al-Kasr al-Awsat said Saturday that the young woman had complained of harassment by U.S. soldiers each time she passed through the American checkpoint. The resident, Omar Janabi, said in an interview that the woman's family had taken the precaution of sending her to spend nights with a neighboring family. But the soldiers attacked the family's house during the daytime, when everyone was at home, said Janabi and another man from the village who was interviewed separately.

The military announced Friday that authorities were investigating allegations of a rape and subsequent killings by soldiers of the 502nd Infantry Regiment, part of the 4th Infantry Division, near the city of Mahmudiyah. Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman, commander of the 4th Infantry, had ordered an investigation into the killings more than a week ago, the military said in a statement.

The U.S. military official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Saturday that an initial investigation indicated that the rape and killings had occurred March 12. Officials had said Friday that they learned of the allegations only late last month, after insurgents captured, tortured and killed two soldiers in that regiment.

The military has provided few details about the case, the latest in a series of probes that began with the U.S. disclosure in March that it was investigating alleged killings of 24 civilians by Marines in the far western town of Haditha.

On Saturday, Janabi, one of the neighbors asserting knowledge of the Mahmudiyah killings, said the victims were Kassim Hamza Rasheed Janabi, 36, a guard at a government-owned food warehouse; Fakhriya Taha Muhasen, 44, his wife; and their two daughters, 7-year-old Hadeel and 15-year-old Abeer.

Omar Janabi said that on March 11, with American and Iraqi forces in the area, U.S. troops raided Kassim Janabi's home. Although members of the same, large tribe, the two men are not directly related.

Entering the home after the raid, Omar Janabi said, he found the husband, wife and 7-year-old girl in one room. All had been shot dead, he said.

The 15-year-old girl lay in another room, with her dress pushed up around her neck, Omar Janabi said. A fire had been set in the room, burning a pillow and the girl's hair, he said.

Janabi and another neighbor, interviewed separately, said that the family lived a few hundred yards from an American checkpoint and that Kassim Janabi's two young sons had been out of the house and escaped the attack.

It was impossible to independently confirm the accounts given by the two men. Although some of the details, such as the home's location, coincided with those given by the U.S. military official, it was also impossible to immediately reconcile differences, such as whether the alleged rape victim was 15 or 20.

Omar Janabi said relatives have given permission for U.S. investigators to exhume the young woman's body.

Janabi spoke to a Washington Post special correspondent at the home of tribal leaders in Mahmudiyah. The other neighbor had left Mahmudiyah, fearing retaliation, and talked separately to another Washington Post special correspondent but refused to be identified.

U.S. soldiers initially told residents that the four dead Iraqis were victims of Sunni Arab insurgents -- which puzzled neighbors, who knew the family was Sunni, Janabi said. The other neighbor said he was first told the family had been killed by a Shiite militia.

In Sadr City, home to more than 2 million Shiites and scene of Saturday's bombing, angry survivors made clear how quickly a resurgence of bomb attacks -- typically blamed on Sunni insurgent groups -- could undermine government efforts to overcome sectarian divisions.

"They called for unity?" demanded a man who identified himself as Abu Hassan al-Thahabi, his hands and feet blackened with soot and grease from pulling the dead and injured out of the wreckage of the bombing. "This proves to the Shiites that there is no unity."

DOJ_NMG_0038033

Saturday's bombing was also the deadliest since a U.S. airstrike killed the most prominent leader of the Sunni insurgency, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, on June 7. U.S. military officers and academics alike had predicted at least a brief surge in attacks immediately after Zarqawi's killing, saying militant Sunni groups would want to show they had survived his loss.

Even before Zarqawi's killing, however, massive bombings like Saturday's had become less and less frequent. The gradual decrease was attributed to several factors, including better defenses against bombings and the intense, often deadly pressure that Shiite-led governments have placed on the Sunni minority, leaving some insurgent groups more willing to at least try political solutions.

At the same time, however, the frequency of smaller multiple-fatality bombings reached its highest point of the war, according to the Brookings Institute. And sectarian killings -- blamed largely on Shiite militias with ties to the government -- have left an average of more than 1,000 victims at Baghdad's main morgue each month since February.

The surge in sectarian killings brought greater U.S. military pressure on Shiite religious militias, notably the Mahdi Army loyal to Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. In Sadr City, fear of questioning or detention by U.S. troops has led the Mahdi Army's gunmen to switch from their trademark black uniforms to civilian clothes and to handle their AK-47 assault rifles, pistols and rocket-propelled grenades more discreetly.

Thahabi, an official in Sadr's movement, complained that the militia's usual checkpoints would have stopped Saturday's truck bomb but that militia members had abandoned them that morning when they saw U.S. troops in the area.

Sadr officials said the bomb -- a mix of explosives and artillery shells, with ball bearings nearly the size of marbles and scrap metal added for shrapnel -- was hidden in a truck under a load of fruit. The truck, with a suicide driver at the wheel, blew up on a street crowded on both sides with shops and market stalls, leaving a crater the size of a wading pool in the pavement.

Car Bomb Kills 66 At Iraqi Bazaar (WT/AP)

By Robert H. Reid, Associated Press

The Washington Times, July 2, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A huge car bomb exploded yesterday at a bustling outdoor market in a Shi'ite district of Baghdad, killing at least 66 persons and injuring about 100 in the deadliest attack since the national unity government took office six weeks ago.

Shortly before the midmorning blast, gunmen seized a female Sunni legislator at a checkpoint in a Shi'ite area of the capital. The attacks represented a major challenge to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's vow to curb sectarian violence.

In an audio recording posted on the Internet, al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden endorsed the successor to Abu Musab Zarqawi, the slain leader of his network in Iraq and warned the country's Shi'ites against collaborating with the Americans in the fight against Sunni insurgents.

The comments appeared designed to sharpen the conflict between Shi'ites and Sunnis. Bin Laden also warned other countries against intervening in Somalia, where an extreme Islamist has been named head of the most powerful political group.

The market bombing seemed timed to cause a maximum number of casualties among civilians doing their weekend shopping. It blew some victims onto the roofs of nearby two-story buildings and sent gray smoke billowing over Sadr City, stronghold of radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Emergency crews bundled the wounded into ambulances and private cars and rushed them to hospitals. Iraqi state television reported last night that 66 persons had died and about 100 were wounded, making it the deadliest bombing since an April 7 suicide attack that killed 87 persons at a Shi'ite mosque in Baghdad.

A statement posted on the Internet claimed responsibility in the name of the "Sunna Supporters Group." The statement, whose authenticity could not be verified, accused Shi'ites of killing Sunnis and raping Sunni women in detention.

"Your mujahedeen brothers decided to teach the Shi'ites a lesson that they will not forget as long as they live," the statement said.

A few miles from the blast, gunmen seized lawmaker Tayseer al-Mashhadani and seven of her bodyguards at a checkpoint in a Shi'ite area of eastern Baghdad. Officials said she was traveling to Baghdad from her home in nearby Diyala province, a hotbed of sectarian violence, to attend a parliament session today. One of her bodyguards escaped, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0038034

Mrs. al-Mashhadani's colleagues in the Iraqi Islamic Party, the largest Sunni political organization, blamed the ministers of interior and defense for failing to restore security in the capital. A party statement said some of the kidnappers carried government-issue weapons.

The U.S. Embassy condemned the kidnapping as an attempt to stoke sectarian tension and demanded her immediate release.

The violence occurred as Mr. al-Maliki, a Shi'ite, left for a tour of Persian Gulf countries to brief leaders on his plans for national reconciliation, including amnesty for Sunni Arab insurgents and efforts to heal the Shi'ite-Sunni rift.

In his Internet statement, bin Laden endorsed Abu Hamza Muhajer, identified by the terrorist network as Zarqawi's successor, and urged him to step up "the struggle" in Iraq. The U.S. military thinks Muhajer is Abu Ayyub Masri, a wanted terrorist.

Bin Laden also warned Iraqi Shi'ites that they "cannot just take part with America and its allies" in the war against Sunni militants "and expect that their areas will be safe from a reaction and harm."

Addressing Somalia, which was largely seized in June by a militia affiliated with the country's Islamic courts, he urged its people to support the militants and said they were building an Islamic state in the Horn of Africa.

Bin Laden lashed out at the president of Somalia's secular interim government, calling Abdullahi Yusuf a "traitor" and a "renegade." He also warned other Islamic countries against sending troops there, saying, "We pledge that we will fight your soldiers on the land of Somalia, and we will fight you on your own land if you dispatch troops to Somalia."

Car Bomb Kills More Than 60 In Iraq Market (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, July 1 — A powerful suicide car bomb ripped through a bustling street market in a Shiite slum here on Saturday, killing at least 62 people and wounding nearly 120 in the deadliest insurgent assault since the new Shiite-led government was installed in May, police officials and witnesses said.

The blast took place as a Sunni Arab member of the new Parliament and eight of her bodyguards were abducted by militiamen while driving into Baghdad, the police said. Together, the bomb attack and kidnapping posed the most direct challenge yet to the fledgling Iraqi government, which has deployed tens of thousands of police officers and troops into the streets in recent weeks to try to secure the capital.

New details emerged Saturday about an American military investigation into soldiers from the Fourth Infantry Division who are accused of raping an Iraqi woman in her home and killing her and three family members, including a child.

Investigators are looking into whether the soldiers monitored the family for a week before carrying out the assault, a military official in Iraq said. The soldiers are also accused of dousing the woman's body with a flammable liquid and setting it on fire to cover up evidence of their crime. A villager said the soldiers then burned down the family's home.

The explosion on Saturday morning, in the sprawling Sadr City district, ignited dozens of cars around the marketplace and sent a thick column of smoke above the skyline of eastern Baghdad, framing minarets in the foreground.

Ambulances raced through streets littered with smashed apple crates and wrecked stalls to carry wailing victims to nearby hospitals. As firefighters struggled to hose down the flames, Shiite militiamen tried to coax angry mobs of onlookers to leave, fearing that another bomb would go off. A tarpaulin covered the body of a donkey in a pool of blood. Children threw rocks at American and Iraqi soldiers who drove up in Humvees. One American soldier pointed an assault rifle with a grenade launcher at the children to scare them off. Men and boys screamed slurs about the Americans and the new Iraqi government.

"Look at this chaos, look at this mess," said a militia leader who gave his name as Yahir Abu Ali, black prayer beads in one hand and a cigarette in the other. "You see these poor people? They've lost their means of living because of this."

Karim Nasser, a fruit merchant sweating in a beige robe, waved wildly at the twisted metal debris of his stall. "A truck filled with apples was trying to cross over the median when it exploded," he said. "I lost my stall; it was the only source of income for my family."

Some police reports suggested that the bomber had been driving a minivan. The bombing was the deadliest in Iraq since early April, when three bombers blew themselves up in a prominent Shiite mosque here, killing scores of worshipers. The attack was likely to provoke more sectarian bloodshed, because Sadr City is the home base of the Mahdi Army militia, whose thousands of members rose up against the Americans twice in 2004 at the urging of the cleric Moktada al-Sadr, and often clash with Sunni Arab fighters.

Mahdi militiamen rampaged through eastern Baghdad and other areas of Iraq after the February bombing of a Shiite shrine, leaving hundreds dead.

A Sadr official, Abdul Zahira al-Suweidi, said in a telephone interview that the American occupiers were ultimately to blame for the explosion rather than militant Sunnis. "Yesterday, we asked the government for a timetable for the withdrawal of the occupation forces," he said. "As long as they stay, terrorist activities will increase."

The bombing occurred shortly after Tayseer Najah al-Mashhadani, a new member of Parliament, and eight of her guards were kidnapped while driving into Baghdad from her home north of the capital.

An official from Ms. Mashhadani's party, Hamdi Hassoun, citing a bodyguard who escaped, said militiamen operating a checkpoint in eastern Baghdad had pulled everyone from the cars at gunpoint and dragged them away. "They aimed their guns at the heads of the bodyguards and confiscated their guns and cellphones," Mr. Hassoun said.

Ms. Mashhadani belongs to the Iraqi Islamic Party, a conservative Sunni Arab group that has often criticized the Shiite-led security forces and the American presence. The party's leader, Tarik al-Hashemi, is one of Iraq's two vice presidents.

The abduction and marketplace attack occurred as the new prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, arrived in Jidda, Saudi Arabia, the first stop on a tour of three Arab countries where he planned to promote his limited "reconciliation plan."

Since taking charge in May, Mr. Maliki's government has had to grapple with rising sectarian violence, as well as electricity and water shortages during 120-degree days.

Military investigators continued to sift through evidence linked to the rape and murder accusations surrounding soldiers from the 502nd Infantry Regiment, attached to the Fourth Infantry Division.

The investigation into the possible rape of a woman and the killings of her and her family are centered on events of March 12 near the insurgent stronghold of Mahmudiya, about 20 miles south of Baghdad. A military official in Iraq said four soldiers were implicated, not five as some reports had suggested. But he acknowledged that early details were often muddled.

All four of those under scrutiny are enlisted men. A Defense Department official said one of the soldiers had been dismissed and was back in the United States.

Initial reports show the soldiers had noticed the woman on earlier patrols, the official said. Of the four victims, one was a girl, the military official added.

An Iraqi man who lived near the family said the assault took place at night in a village called Sayidat Abdullah, part of a farming region outside of Mahmudiya.

Before the soldiers came, there was a rumor in the village that the family, particularly the father, who was a farmer, was wanted by the Americans, said the villager, Muhammad Khamis, in a telephone interview. The soldiers burned down the house before leaving, he said.

"They were a very good family, a very nice family," Mr. Khamis said. "I don't know where the Americans got this idea."

In the Muslim world, sexual assault of women, especially by foreigners, is considered one of the most heinous of crimes. Sunni Arabs infuriated by the American presence have often speculated that American troops are raping Iraqi women in prisons like Abu Ghraib.

In other violence on Saturday, at least five Iraqi Army soldiers were killed in an ambush on a checkpoint south of Kirkuk, police officials said. Three soldiers were captured in the attack. Their bodies turned up later, along with a fourth body; all showed signs of torture.

A bomb exploded near a police patrol transporting prisoners in Kirkuk, killing one prisoner. In southern Baghdad, the police found six bodies dumped in a construction site.

The American military said a soldier assigned to the 43rd Military Police Brigade died Saturday of noncombat injuries.

Iraq PM Wins Saudi Backing For Peace Efforts (AFP-Y2)

AFP, July 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038036

Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki won Saudi Arabia's backing for his efforts to halt the bloodshed in Iraq at the start of a Gulf tour to rally support for his peace plan.

"On behalf of ... King Abdullah, I assure you of ... (Saudi Arabia's) full support for you and your constitutional government," Crown Prince Sultan bin Abdul Aziz told Maliki, according to the official SPA news agency.

Prince Sultan, who chaired a formal session of talks with Maliki late Saturday, said Saudi Arabia hoped his government would usher in "stability and security" in Iraq and put an end to the hardships of the Iraqi people.

At least 66 Iraqis were killed in a devastating car bombing against a market in a Shiite district of Baghdad on Saturday, the latest sectarian violence to rock the war-weary country.

Maliki, who arrived in the Red Sea city of Jeddah Saturday, had earlier met with King Abdullah, who stressed Saudi Arabia's "keenness on (the preservation of) Iraq's unity and territorial integrity," SPA said.

The news agency said the discussions during the session of talks with the Saudi crown prince focused on "efforts to restore security and stability in Iraq, chiefly the national reconciliation plan" unveiled by Maliki last Sunday. "We will revert to being sons of one country in the full sense of the word," Maliki said, referring to efforts to end violence between Sunnis and Shiites.

"We have come carrying the pains and hopes of Iraq, and to thank you for the kingdom's stands in support of the unity of Iraq's people and lands," he was quoted by SPA as saying.

Iraqi Minister of State for National Dialogue Akram al-Hakim earlier said that Maliki's tour, his first trip abroad since taking over as premier in May, would also take him to the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait to discuss with Arab leaders his national reconciliation plan.

Maliki announced the plan in a bid to stem the violence that has ravaged Iraq. But the blueprint has already been rejected by a number of Sunni Arab leaders and rebel groups.

The Shiite prime minister apparently wants to enlist help during his tour to influence the former elite community of Sunni Arabs in Iraq as many of its leaders have close ties with the oil-rich Gulf Arab states.

Maliki has said the amnesty offered in the plan would only cover detainees held in US and Iraqi prisons who have committed no violent crimes and stressed there would be no pardon for those who killed foreign troops, journalists or innocent Iraqis.

More than 2,500 detainees have been freed this month from US and Iraqi prisons as part of the plan.

Top Saudi officials were on hand for the talks with Maliki, who was accompanied by a high-level delegation. Among those attending were the oil ministers of Saudi Arabia and Iraq, which sit on the world's largest and second largest oil reserves, respectively.

US ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad visited Jeddah on Tuesday and met with King Abdullah and other Saudi leaders.

Saudi Arabia, which shares a long border with Iraq, has expressed increasing concern in recent months about the bloodshed in its northern neighbor.

The kingdom is also concerned about the threat to its security that would be posed by the return home of Saudis who had crossed the border to join the anti-US insurgency in Iraq.

Iraqi, U.S. Authorities Free 495 Prisoners (AP-Y2)

AP2, July 2, 2006

Iraqi and U.S. authorities freed 495 prisoners from U.S. facilities on Saturday, completing a mass release announced by the prime minister last month as part of his national reconciliation efforts.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad welcomed the move and said more prisoners could be freed.

"We are prepared in consultation with the Iraqi leaders to make future prisoner releases and to take other concrete steps to facilitate reconciliation," he said in a statement. "As the government moves forward with these steps, it can count on support from the U.S. government."

Al-Maliki had promised to release 2,500 inmates by the end of June.

The Justice Ministry said Saturday's releases fulfilled that promise but stressed officials would continue to study the cases of individual inmates and release them as merited.

DOJ_NMG_0038037

The U.S. military has not provided a sectarian breakdown of those being released, but most were believed to be Sunnis, the minority that was dominant under ousted leader Saddam Hussein but lost power when he was ousted. Sunnis frequently complain of random detentions and maltreatment at the hands of the Shiite-led government and the prisoner releases are seen as a key step toward soothing that anger and dampening the Sunni-led insurgency.

Khalilzad also noted that al-Maliki was traveling to Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait this weekend to drum up support for his reconciliation efforts.

"The new government is reaching out not only to all Iraqis but also to its neighbors," the ambassador said. "We expect these visits to be successful, as the countries that Mr. Maliki is visiting understand what happens in Iraq will affect the stability of the area and shape the future of the region."

Khalilzad urged insurgents to respond to al-Maliki's overture by laying down their arms and joining in the reconstruction of Iraq.

US Envoy Promises More Iraq Releases As 495 Detainees Freed (AFP-Y2)

AFP, July 2, 2006

US ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad promised that more detainees would be freed from US and government-run prisons in Iraq as a seventh batch of nearly 500 was released.

A justice ministry spokesman told AFP that 495 security detainees held without charge were freed Saturday as part of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's national reconciliation plan.

Khalilzad said the latest batch completed the "release of nearly 3,000 detainees from coalition custody over the past several weeks."

"As the reconciliation project proposed by Prime Minister Maliki moves forward, we are prepared in consultation with the Iraqi leaders to make future prisoner releases and to take other concrete steps to facilitate reconciliation."

Again calling on Sunni Arab insurgents to lay down their arms, Khalilzad also called on the government to bring "all militias and other illegal armed groups under control and to strengthen Iraq's security institutions."

Militias close to Shiite parties in the government have been accused of carrying out reprisal attacks against Sunni Arab civilians amid escalating communal unrest.

"We call on the leaders of Iraq's various communities to begin to take responsibility for bringing sectarian violence to an end. As the government moves forward with these steps, it can count on support from the US government," Khalilzad said.

He said disagreements over the reconciliation plan must be "expressed through dialogue rather than through violence."

The security detainees released over the past month had been held on suspicion of involvement in the insurgency but were not suspected of carrying out bombings, killings or abductions.

An amnesty for detainees not suspected of serious crimes was a key element of a 24-point national reconciliation programme which Maliki unveiled to parliament last week.

About 14,000 detainees continue to be held in US or Iraqi government-run prisons.

Muslim Group Condemns Reports Of U.S. Rape (AP)

Associated Press, July 2, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- An influential Sunni Muslim organization Sunday strongly condemned reports that U.S. troops raped an Iraqi women then killed her and her family, saying it shows "the truth of the ugly American face."

The Association of Muslim Scholars said that what U.S. troops have done by "raping this girl then mutilating her is shameful and will remain as a sign of shame to American invaders."

U.S. investigators believe that American soldiers spent nearly a week plotting an attack in which they raped the Sunni Muslim woman, then killed her and her family in a religiously mixed area about 20 miles south of Baghdad.

The Americans entered the home, separated three family members from the woman, then raped her and set fire to her body, a U.S. military official said Saturday on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing.

The three others, apparently including a child, were also slain, another official said.

DOJ_NMG_0038038

The association said in its statement that it "condemns this ugly crime and declares to the whole world that this mean behavior and terrible violations committed by the invaders show the truth of the ugly American face and also shows that their claims of calling for humanity and liberation are not true."

"We put the world and all humanitarian organizations as witnesses to this ugly crime and call them to face the American recklessness that went way too far," said the association, a strong critic of American presence in Iraq.

Bin Laden Tape Urges Insurgents To Forgo Talks (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

Osama bin Laden, in his second recorded message in 48 hours, warned Iraqi insurgents yesterday not to participate in negotiations with the elected government in Baghdad and urged Muslims in Somalia to violently oppose any challenge to Islamists who have seized power in that country.

"There will be no bargaining with the crusaders and the apostates" in Iraq, bin Laden said in a clear reference to efforts by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to draw insurgent groups into negotiations and amnesty agreements with his government. "There will be no half-solutions." Maliki and his appointed predecessors since the 2003 U.S. invasion of Iraq would be punished as soon as American military forces are defeated, he said.

Bin Laden's message, like one released Thursday night, was contained in an audio recording posted on a jihadist Web site. The fifth such message this year, its mention of events occurring over the past week in Iraq and Somalia indicated an ever-faster turnaround time.

The al-Qaeda leader has not appeared in publicly released photographs or videos since 2004. A U.S. counterterrorism official, who said there was "no reason to doubt" the authenticity of yesterday's recording, speculated that security concerns had prevented bin Laden from participating in the more time-consuming and labor-intensive production of a video. Bin Laden is believed to be in the mountainous, ungoverned border area between Pakistan and Afghanistan.

Al-Qaeda's media products have grown in sophistication since the poorly lighted, grainy videos that characterized its propaganda efforts several years ago. Deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri's eulogy to al-Qaeda's Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi released a week ago was a slickly produced video. Zawahiri was seated in front of a full-size, framed picture of Zarqawi taken from Zarqawi's own video released before his death in a U.S. air raid in Iraq last month.

Yesterday's bin Laden message was addressed to the "nation of Islam in general, and our people and brothers the mujaheddin in Iraq and Somalia in particular." According to a translation of the 17-minute tape provided by the Washington-based SITE Institute, which monitors jihadist Internet sites, it had three parts.

Bin Laden hailed the selection of Abu Hamza al-Muhajer as Zarqawi's successor. He advised Muhajer, which the U.S. military has said is a pseudonym for Egyptian Abu Ayyub al-Masri, to continue unifying Sunni insurgent groups and to "concentrate his fighting on the Americans, as well as their allies and supporters."

The tape opened with a warning to residents of the predominantly Shiite south, saying they could not join the Iraqi armed forces fighting insurgents in Sunni cities such as Fallujah and Ramadi in central and western Iraq, "while at the same time hoping that their areas will be safe from reaction and harm."

He called on all Muslims to help the insurgency "with money and men," and labeled efforts to stabilize Iraq through talks with the government "nothing more than deceit."

U.S. counterterrorism officials interpreted a lengthy passage on Somalia as reflecting bin Laden's concern that the dispersion of the al-Qaeda network by the U.S. terrorism fight has diminished his claimed leadership of a worldwide movement. But at the very least, bin Laden demonstrated a close and current knowledge of events in the Horn of Africa.

He called Abdullahi Yusuf, who heads the largely powerless, U.S.-backed Somali transition government in Baidoa, an "agent" of foreign apostates, and he condemned Yusuf's recent call for support from neighboring Ethiopia. About 100 Ethiopian troops in military vehicles were seen yesterday crossing the border into Somalia, the Associated Press reported.

Among several international efforts to stabilize Somalia, the African Union and the Arab League said last week that they would send a team of experts to assess the situation. Yemeni President Ali Abdullah Saleh has also called for talks among regional governments. Bin Laden yesterday warned "every Muslim in Somalia" to reject such efforts, calling Saleh in particular "an obedient American agent."

The Bush administration funded secular warlords who were defeated in early June trying to get control of the Somali capital, Mogadishu, by militias allied to the Council of Islamic Courts. Warning the council not to shelter al-Qaeda fugitives it believes are in Somalia, the administration has called on the Islamists to negotiate with the Yusuf government. Last week, Jendayi E. Frazer, U.S. assistant secretary of state for African affairs, said the administration had warned Saudi Arabia and Yemen to end financial and weapons support for council forces.

Bin Laden called on Islamic forces to attack the Yusuf government "quickly and make sure he doesn't flee." Regarding intervention by "international forces," he instructed, "prepare what is needed, especially the mines for the tanks and the [rocket-propelled grenades] for the armored vehicles."

He recalled the 1994 withdrawal of U.S. military forces from Somalia after a warlord attack killed 18 Special Forces troops. "This time," he said, "victory will be far easier."

Suddenly, Sand Bags And Potshots At Post 1 (NYT)

By Dexter Filkins

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

RAMADI, Iraq, July 1 — It is a lonely night on the rooftop of the government center in this rubble-strewn town, and Lance Cpl. Joseph Hamlin is talking about his life.

"I'm 19; I'll be 20 in September," he says, his face shrouded in the darkness. "I'm from western Georgia, on the Alabama line. LaGrange. They say it's the biggest little city in Georgia. It means 'the farm' in French. Lafayette was there."

Corporal Hamlin is at Post 1, overlooking downtown Ramadi from the northwest corner of the government center. His post is a concrete-block hut covered in sand bags. It has just enough room for two people.

"This is my first time ever," he says. "I joined in May '05. Right after I graduated high school. Graduated high school on Friday, showed up for boot camp on Monday. Didn't take any time off."

He laughs. The streets below are mostly invisible in the darkness. Even at 11 p.m., the temperature here hovers at well over 100 degrees. Every few minutes or so, Corporal Hamlin picks up his night-vision scope and peers down the alley that juts out directly north from his post.

A volley of shots ring out, but they are too far away to cause worry.

"Over yonder there," he says, pointing with a slow roll of his hand.

"Jeff Foxworthy, he bought some land in LaGrange," Corporal Hamlin says. "You know him, they call him a country comedian. 'You must be a redneck,' stuff like that. He bought some land down there to hunt on. It's good hunting."

He peers into the scope of his rifle.

"I'm a decent shot. Pretty good," he says. "Not like the snipers."

Another shot echoes in the distance. "What do I hunt? Whatever is in season: deer, squirrel, turkey, dove. I love to hunt. If could have a job where money didn't matter, I'd be a hunter."

Corporal Hamlin has laid out four weapons: an M-240 belt-fed machine gun, an M-16 rifle, an M-79 grenade launcher and a rifle called a Sam-R that he especially likes.

"It's like my .308 Remington — it's got a free-floating barrel, too," he says. "That's my favorite."

"I joined the Marines. I'm hoping to go to college. When I'm in, I'll do what I can for my country. Do something to help this country."

Cradling the Sam-R, he looks into the blackness. "Here it's more difficult," he says. "It's not like all you have to do is be quiet and still and just shoot whatever comes by. Like a duck blind. These guys will play. A turkey don't play. A turkey don't shoot back. He just turns around and runs. They shoot back."

The night wears on. Because of the lack of electricity here, most of Ramadi is dark. What light there is comes from the stars, which are arrayed in their particular way from horizon to horizon.

DOJ_NMG_0038040

"I wish they had some police out here," he says. "You know, the gangs. We have gangs in places like New York City. They wouldn't stand a chance here. They would have their heads cut off. These are the real gangs here."

"People say this is the worst place in the world. But it isn't bad. They need to fight for themselves," he says of the Iraqis. "Everybody has a civil war. We had ours. We got stronger. Maybe they need to have theirs and get it over with."

Midnight nears. Corporal Hamlin turns back to his favorite subject. "Oh yeah, they got pigs down there. They like to play. You shoot one of them with a .357 right in the head and they keep running. My dad got gored by one of them once. That's some cool hunting.

"I want to kill some bear. I want to go with a bow. A long bow. Not even a compound bow," he says. "You know the difference? A compound bow has the pulleys. Long bow is just the bow. I want to go with a long bow. Kill a big-ass bear."

"My dad lived in China," Corporal Hamlin says. "He ran the Duracell plant there. I lived there. I learned martial arts. Aikido, which is Japanese. Tae kwon do, which is Korean. I'm a second-degree black belt."

"If I had a choice between this, martial arts and hunting, I'd take hunting easy. No alcohol, womens or anything like that, I like some guys."

Three nights before, the government center came under attack by about 20 guerrillas. The firefight lasted two hours. The marines fired hundreds of rounds of ammunition, dropped bombs and artillery. Corporal Hamlin was asleep in his bunk, but he has seen his share of fighting.

"I shot a couple of guys," he says. "When you're young, seeing movies and everything, you're brought up to think killing is wrong. That's what people do in gangs. Weird. You just shoot. They attack you. Either you are going to shoot and go back to your family or they are going to kill you and keep on killing everyone else. I don't really know what to think of it."

"If I shoot, I get to go back to my family, my girl," he says.

He scans the streets through his rifle scope. "I'm a Christian. East Vernon Baptist Church."

Corporal Hamlin is silent for a time. "I asked other people before what it was like to kill somebody. I wasn't sure I could kill somebody. I didn't know what it would be like. Now, I don't know if I feel that much."

The talk turns to love.

"I did have a girlfriend until two days ago. We were together for five years." It happened in a telephone conversation, he says.

"She doesn't handle my being gone. She says it's hard. I think whatever I'm going through here is harder. Whatever problems she's having at the house, she doesn't have R.P.G.'s being shot at her."

The telephone conversation with his girlfriend, Corporal Hamlin says, has left him feeling a little down. The couple had planned to marry, he says. "Yes, I was wanting to. We were going to get an apartment."

He considers the possibility that she has another boyfriend back in LaGrange. "Absolutely. She probably does. She might be lying. She told me she did."

"She is a full-blooded Indian. Mohawk. I'm just a pale-skinned white boy."

"I'll get with her when I get back, talk to her," he says. "See if I can work things out. It'll be O.K."

Another young voice enters from outside Post 1. It is Corporal Hamlin's relief. He's been six hours on post. It's midnight, time for bed.

"Good talking to you," he says.

The corporal picks up his rifle and walks downstairs.

Army Probing Soldier's Death (WT/AP)

By Tini Tran, Associated Press

The Washington Times, July 2, 2006

The U.S. military said yesterday it was investigating whether the Gaithersburg soldier who was recently killed in eastern Afghanistan died because of "friendly fire."

The Defense Department said Army Pfc. Justin R. Davis, 19, died June 25 in eastern Kunar province when he came in contact with indirect fire -- a term used for mortar shelling -- while on patrol during combat operations.

DOJ_NMG_0038041

"The circumstances of the soldier's death are under investigation as a possible friendly-fire incident," according to a statement from the department.

In Afghanistan, the U.S.-led coalition released a statement saying an investigation into the incident is under way.

"We are looking into Pfc. Davis' death to determine what happened. No final determination has been made and we will not release any information relating to the investigation until it is complete," the statement said.

Pfc. Davis had been assigned to the 1st Battalion, 32nd Infantry Regiment, 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 10th Mountain Division based in Fort Drum, N.Y.

His mother, Paula Davis, told the Frederick News-Post that her son was "passionate about joining the service.

"He would always say, 'This is my dream. I am going to follow it,' " Mrs. Davis said. "He died doing what he loved."

Pfc. Davis had been in Afghanistan since March and had plans to come home for several weeks in August.

"It was a calling," his mother said. "It was a life that fit him."

Pfc. Davis' body arrived Tuesday at Dover Air Force Base in Delaware, Mrs. Davis said. He will be buried July 10 in Arlington National Cemetery with full military honors.

Coalition troops have been operating in eastern Afghanistan to battle insurgents active along the Pakistan border.

According to U.S. Army data earlier this year, 17 soldiers in the past four years have died from friendly fire, which means from non-enemy weapons. Ten died in Iraq and seven in Afghanistan. The deaths occurred in 11 separate incidents.

The most well-known case was the 2004 death of former NFL player Pat Tillman, an Army Ranger and corporal, who died during a gunbattle near the Pakistan-Afghanistan border. That case triggered a criminal investigation that is still pending.

2 British Soldiers Killed In Afghan Attack (NSDY/AP)

By Tini Tran, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, July 2, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- A coalition base came under attack by suspected Taliban fighters in southern Afghanistan, leaving two British soldiers and an interpreter dead, officials said Sunday.

The incident occurred Saturday night in Sangin district in southern Helmand province, said military spokesman Capt. Drew Gibson.

Four coalition soldiers were wounded in the attack, but their nationalities were not immediately known. They were listed in stable condition at a hospital, a coalition statement said.

The deaths come amid a massive anti-Taliban campaign in southern Afghanistan involving more than 10,000 Afghan and coalition soldiers. It is the largest military offensive since the former regime's ouster in late 2001.

Last week, two other British soldiers were killed in an attack in Sangin district. On Saturday night, 11 militants were killed by Afghan forces in the district after they came under attack, said Helmand provincial police chief Ghulan Nabi Malakhail. No Afghan soldiers or police were injured.

Britain currently has some 3,300 troops involved in the military operation.

Bush Address Pays Tribute To Armed Forces (AP)

AP2, July 2, 2006

President Bush paid tribute to America's armed forces Saturday, calling Independence Day a time to thank the men and women who defend freedom.

"For more than two centuries, from the camps of Valley Forge to the mountains of Afghanistan, Americans have served and sacrificed for the principles of our founding," Bush said in his weekly radio address. "Today, a new generation of American patriots is defending our freedom against determined and ruthless enemies."

Bush plans to celebrate July Fourth at Fort Bragg, N.C., where he will have lunch with military personnel. The president will return to the White House Tuesday night to watch fireworks in the nation's capital.

On the holiday, Americans should recall the ideals that the nation's founders outlined in the Declaration of Independence, Bush said. He also encouraged every American to find a way to thank those who defend freedom.

DOJ_NMG_0038042

He urged people to help America Supports You, a nationwide program set up by the Defense Department to communicate citizen support to military men and women at home and abroad.

"At this hour, the men and women of our armed forces are facing danger in distant places, carrying out their missions with all the skill and honor we expect of them," Bush said. "And their families are enduring long separations from their loved ones with great courage and dignity."

Cheney Applauds NASCAR At Florida Raceway (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, July 2, 2006

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. (AP) -- The stock cars weren't the only things buzzing the track at Daytona yesterday -- Vice President Dick Cheney made his grand entrance when Air Force II flew in low over the crowd gathering for the Pepsi 400 NASCAR race.

Upon arrival at Daytona International Speedway, Mr. Cheney's motorcade went around the track at a relative crawl of 60 mph, passing fans on the infield who waved flags for their favorite drivers. The vice president spoke at a pre-race meeting, where he got a standing ovation from the drivers and their crews and his excited staff took pictures with Dale Earnhardt Jr.

Mr. Cheney wished the drivers a safe race and thanked them for all their visits with troops.

"NASCAR has developed a hell of a reputation, not only, obviously, for the stock-car racing, but also for being tremendous members of the community," he said.

Yesterday offered Mr. Cheney a double-dip in the all-important political state of Florida: visiting the Kennedy Space Center and then catching the race.

The vice president had hoped to see Space Shuttle Discovery blast off on the first shuttle mission in nearly a year, but thunderstorm clouds forced a postponement. Mr. Cheney said he was disappointed, especially because he brought his three granddaughters along for the occasion.

"We'll have to bring them back another day," he said. "It's a great program, and it's important that we keep going and keep our space program going."

Joining Mr. Cheney and his wife, Lynne, were granddaughters: Kate, 12; Elizabeth, 8; and Grace, 6.

The vice president's aides tried to extend exposure of Mr. Cheney's trip beyond the traditional audience, inviting a team from Sports Illustrated to join the traveling White House press. He also had interviews scheduled with Fox Sports and Motor Racing Network, which handles NASCAR's radio coverage.

More than 20 years ago, when Mr. Cheney was a congressman from Wyoming, he attended a shuttle launch. But the NASCAR race was a first for him.

The Pepsi 400 has become a popular event for national leaders. President Reagan was the first commander in chief to attend a race when he went in 1984. Both President Bush and his father have attended the race, and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld attended last year.

The race is a particularly patriotic event because it is scheduled for the Independence Day weekend and draws a large military crowd.

Earlier yesterday, Mr. Cheney underwent his annual physical, which showed his overall heart condition was stable and that his high-tech pacemaker is working properly and has not been activated by any irregular heartbeats.

Mr. Cheney, 65, who has a long history of heart ailments, had an electrocardiogram and imaging to check on repaired aneurysms on the back of his knees, his spokeswoman said.

Doctors also checked the condition of an implantable cardioverter defibrillator (ICD), which was placed in his chest in June 2001.

"The vice president's cardiac status remains stable, his ICD is functioning properly and has not treated any arrhythmia," or irregular heartbeat, according to a statement from his spokeswoman, Lea Anne McBride.

Mr. Cheney is scheduled to have a stress test on a treadmill in the fall as part of a comprehensive cardiac evaluation.

Cheney Revs Up Schedule In Florida (LAT/ORL)

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2006

The vice president caps an unusually public day by hailing U.S. armed forces at the Pepsi 400.

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. — Playing off the patriotic themes that dominated the Daytona International Speedway this weekend, Vice President Dick Cheney spent his time at the Pepsi 400 praising the military and hailing its ties to NASCAR.

"On Independence Day weekend, we're reminded how fortunate we are to live in freedom and to call this place home," Cheney told the 150,000-plus fans before Saturday's race.

"We're grateful above all to the men and women who defend us," he said.

The vice president's visit to the track is the latest in a series of high-profile public appearances by Cheney, who usually stays out of the limelight.

Earlier Saturday, he was 75 miles south at Cape Canaveral, where he had hoped to see the space shuttle launch. It was postponed because of weather.

Cheney arrived in Daytona with a roar when Air Force II flew in low over the track as the crowd was gathering. When he got to the speedway, his motorcade took a turn on the track at a modest 65 mph.

A few race fans judged Cheney's appearance as a shrewd public relations move.

"I don't think they should mix politics and racing, but he just wants to be associated with the sport," said Russ Schlenker, 49, of Hernando. "Just trying to get the 'NASCAR dad' vote."

In his public statements, Cheney emphasized the heroism of the armed forces but didn't discuss the military mission in Iraq.

At the drivers' pre-race meeting, the vice president lauded ties between the auto-racing circuit and the military.

"I know you guys spend a lot of time supporting the troops and the men and women in the armed forces," he said, looking at the NASCAR drivers and their racing teams.

Cheney posed with drivers whose sponsors are branches of the military, including Greg Biffle (National Guard), Ken Schrader (Air Force) and Joe Nemechek (Army).

He declined in a TV interview later to reveal which driver was his favorite.

Gonzales Backs Handling Of Terror Suspects (AP-Y2)

By Nadia Abou El-magd, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 1, 2006

In his first visit to Egypt, the U.S. attorney general on Saturday defended the transfer of terror suspects for incarceration and interrogation in other countries.

Human rights groups have raised concerns about the so-called extraordinary rendition of terror suspects, some of whom have charged they were tortured in the countries where they were sent. The U.S. has said it does not send anyone to countries that torture.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales acknowledged the U.S. practice of sending terror suspects to prisons in their home countries. But he refused to confirm reports that Egypt, whose human rights record has been criticized by Washington, had received any of the suspects.

"I'm not going to confirm that there have been any (suspects sent to Egypt), and I'm certainly not going to talk about the numbers — it's intelligence activity and we just don't do that," Gonzales told reporters after meeting with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

"All I can say is that we do have an obligation to seek assurances from any country in which we are returning someone, that the individual is not going to be tortured," he said.

Gonzales said the U.S. would send a Justice Department lawyer to be stationed in Cairo "so we can further cement our relationship and we have someone on the ground representing me."

Egyptian Interior Minister Habib el-Adly has denied that Egypt was torturing terror suspects from abroad.

Detainees have said they were transferred from the U.S. to alleged secret facilities in countries including Poland, Romania, Jordan, Syria and Egypt.

Italy is investigating allegations that 22 CIA agents kidnapped an Egyptian Muslim preacher, Osama Moustafa Hassan Nasr, from a Milan street in February 2003 and returned him to Egypt.

An Italian newspaper quoted his lawyer as saying that Nasr was tortured after his return.

Gonzales said he saw no contradiction between the U.S. promoting democracy around the world and running a facility like the detention center at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, where activists and former detainees have alleged abuse has taken place.

The Supreme Court, in a major rebuke to President Bush, said Thursday that his plan to put some Guantanamo detainees on trial before military commissions was unconstitutional because the commissions were not authorized by Congress and violated international law.

"We have procedures in place to ensure that those at Guantanamo in fact deserve to be at Guantanamo," Gonzales said. "We're looking for ways to deal with terrorists other than at Guantanamo if we can — the U.S. has no intention and no desire to be the world's jailers," he added.

Gonzales arrived in Egypt Wednesday and has met the country's ministers of justice and interior, as well as with the prosecutor-general.

He said the political situation in Egypt had improved despite criticism that government practices were oppressive.

"The promotion of the rule of law is very, very important, and the growth of democracy," he said. "Challenges exist, and we consider President Mubarak a valuable ally to the U.S."

US Attorney General Defends Special Military Tribunals (AFP-Y2)

US Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales has defended special military tribunals for terrorist suspects, saying they serve "a viable role in the war on terror."

"We are carefully reviewing the decision by the US Supreme Court," Gonzales told reporters during a trip to Cairo after meeting with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak Saturday morning.

"We intend to work with Congress to develop procedures and practices that will meet the requirements set forth by the Supreme Court, but we continue to believe that military commissions would serve a viable role in the war on terror," he said.

The US Supreme Court on Thursday ruled that US President George W. Bush had overstepped his powers by creating military war crimes tribunals for Guantanamo Bay inmates.

In a 5-3 vote, the high court ruled that a military commission established to try Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a 36 year old Yemeni -- Osama bin Laden's former driver -- charged with conspiracy to commit war crimes and terrorism, violated US military law and the Geneva Conventions.

Following the ruling, the White House and other administration officials signalled they would try to consult with Congress to refine rules for such commissions, in line with the landmark Supreme Court judgement.

Gonzales said he hoped to try the suspects "in military commissions once we establish the procedures that will meet the requirements set forth by the Supreme Court."

Refering to the detention center in Guantanamo Bay, Gonzales said the US continued to believe it was "necessary".

"When the US captures someone on the battlefield, we have to have some way of holding them so that they do not come back and fight against us or fight against our friends and allies," he said.

Asked about the practice of renditions, the secret transfer of detainees by the CIA to their home countries, where in some cases they risk being tortured, Gonzales insisted that the US seeks assurances before returning the suspects.

"When we have in our custody an individual and their home country wants them returned, we are not going to return them without adequate assurances that they are not being mistreated," said Gonzales who refused to comment on renditions cases to Egypt specifically.
