But this much is certain: Jefferson owes the voters of his district an explanation. And he should speak up before they go to the polls in November to fill the congressional seat he holds. If he chooses to remain silent, then he should quit the race.

The people of Louisiana, especially those in his district, are still reeling from the lingering effects of Katrina. What they need now is a tireless champion. What they have instead is Jefferson, whose effectiveness has been severely damaged by bad judgment and, possibly, criminal conduct.

Senate Leaders Profess Less Outrage On FBI Raid (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, May 29, 2006

Unlike House Officials, Frist and Durbin Say They See No Breach of Constitution in Jefferson Inquiry

After a week of bipartisan outrage over an FBI raid on a congressman's office, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist weighed in yesterday, saying that he was "okay" with the search and saw no constitutional problems with it.

"No House member, no senator, nobody in government should be above the law of the land, period," Frist said of the search of the office of William J. Jefferson (D-La.), who has been accused of bribery.

Frist (R-Tenn.) said on "Fox News Sunday" that he had studied the provision in the Constitution regarding the separation of powers, and consulted with Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales. He concluded that the FBI acted appropriately when it used a warrant to search the office of a sitting lawmaker for the first time in history.

"I don't think it abused separation of powers," Frist said. "I think there's allegations of criminal activity, and the American people need to have the law enforced."

Eight days ago, FBI agents angered many members of Congress when they took from Jefferson's office records and a computer as they investigate whether Jefferson illegally took money for brokering business deals in Africa. The raid threw Washington into tumult last week, inflaming congressional leaders on both sides of the aisle, and reportedly prompting Gonzales and FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III to threaten to quit if the documents were returned.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California responded in a show of unity, jointly protesting that the search was illegal, and complaining that they were not notified before the raid. Hastert complained to President Bush, who weighed in by ordering the Justice Department to seal the materials for 45 days until congressional leaders and the department can agree on the next step.

"I think the president handled it well, because we had tempers flying," Frist said. "We don't need to be doing that. And so the president came in and put a pause . . . to let things settle down."

Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.), assistant minority leader, also took a measured view of the raid, questioning whether the "speech and debate" protections in the Constitution were violated, as critics say. "I'm not sure you can stretch it to apply to this situation," he said. He noted that the action was not without precedent. He said that the FBI has raided the office of a federal judge before, so there is a history of branches of government crossing each other with regard to a search warrant. "In the next several weeks, we ought to take a hard look at it. I'm not going to rule it in or out at this moment."

House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), who called a hearing tomorrow on the constitutionality of the search, said yesterday that the FBI overreached.

"This debate is not over whether Congressman Jefferson is guilty of a criminal offense," Sensenbrenner said on NBC's "Meet the Press." "He cannot use the constitutional immunity of Congress to shield himself from that or any evidence of that. But it is about the ability of the Congress to be able to do its job free of coercion from the executive branch."

Target Of F.B.I. Raid Had A Hard Path To Capitol Hill (NYT)

By Christopher Drew And Robert Pear

The New York Times, May 29, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, May 27 — Representative William J. Jefferson has always liked to talk about growing up in an impoverished farm community, picking cotton for $3 a day and hitting the books hard enough to win his ticket out — a scholarship to Harvard Law School.

But even as Mr. Jefferson built a reputation as one of Louisiana's brightest, most effective leaders, a less flattering view began to emerge, one signified by his nickname in political circles, "Dollar Bill."

Early in his career, as a state legislator, he was criticized for enriching his law firm with contracts from state and local agencies. He also ran stores that rented appliances by the month to poor residents, owned dilapidated apartment buildings and was sued by federal regulators over a defaulted loan.

Now, with the Federal Bureau of Investigation raid on his Capitol Hill office on May 20, Mr. Jefferson, a 59-year-old Democrat, is under investigation for possibly turning his efforts to promote trade with Africa into another sideline worth hundreds of thousands of dollars — and has become the central figure in a political drama consuming Washington.

The unprecedented raid has set off a huge institutional showdown, with Republican leaders including J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, the speaker of the House, challenging the White House and criticizing the F.B.I.'s actions. Democratic leaders have also stood by the speaker's side.

President Bush has stepped into the fray, ordering the F.B.I. to seal any records it seized and calling for a 45-day cooling-off period to allow time to resolve the crisis.

The raid on Mr. Jefferson's office took place barely a week ago. But in a sense, the questions circling him have long resonances in his career, which was shaped by a remarkable ascent from the deepest poverty and a quest for the comforts his family never had.

In a 95-page affidavit released after the raid, the F.B.I. accused Mr. Jefferson, an eight-term lawmaker, of demanding more than $400,000 in bribes to help iGate Inc., a technology company based in Kentucky, obtain lucrative contracts in Africa. The bureau said it had also videotaped him accepting a suitcase with $100,000 in cash and later found $90,000 of it in his freezer.

Though the details were blacked out, the affidavit also said the F.B.I. had "evidence linking Congressman Jefferson to at least seven other schemes" in which he "sought things of value in return for his performance of official acts."

Mr. Jefferson has vigorously denied wrongdoing and has not been charged with a crime. "I certainly did not sell my office," Mr. Jefferson said in a recent statement. "The government seems inclined to view the facts in the worst possible light, and to characterize events that could be explained, or are exculpatory, in ways that tend to incriminate."

Whether his actions were criminal or not, several people who have long known Mr. Jefferson said he had often seemed driven by a desire to escape his spartan roots.

"There was always a feeling among those who knew him as Dollar Bill that having grown up as poor as he did, his hunger for wealth always burned," said Allan Katz, a New Orleans political consultant.

Mr. Jefferson, a taciturn man who began his career as a favorite of good-government groups, has built a political empire in New Orleans, winning re-election by wide margins and helping his sister, one of his five daughters and many allies win public offices.

Standing outside a new post office that Mr. Jefferson helped bring to his district, one voter, Joyce F. Smith, said that if the accusations were true, "I'd be very disappointed because he's been a very good congressman."

But many people here have been joking about his "frozen assets" and "cold cash." And Ms. Smith added, it is "hard for me to believe" that he would have stashed legitimate earnings in frozen-food containers and aluminum foil.

Mr. Jefferson was raised, along with eight brothers and sisters, on a small farm in northeast Louisiana, where, he said earlier this year, "our whole life revolved around that cotton field." His father left school after second grade, and his mother attended only through eighth grade.

As a child, Mr. Jefferson was such a good shot, his father once said, that when it came time to bag dinner, "if I wanted one rabbit, I'd give him one shell; and if I needed two rabbits, I'd give him two."

DOJ_NMG_0030326

After he graduated from Southern University in Baton Rouge in 1969, Mr. Jefferson has said, he won his mother's blessing to go to Harvard Law School — she had never heard of it — only by explaining that it had been John F. Kennedy's college.

Mr. Jefferson has credited his parents with pressing the value of hard work. Elizabeth Brannum Trass, one of his high school teachers, said in an interview that he had always had the seriousness of purpose that helped catapult him onto a much faster track.

A clerkship with a United States district judge brought Mr. Jefferson to New Orleans in 1972. He got into politics as a campaign aide for Ernest N. Morial, who became the city's first black mayor in 1978 and gave Mr. Jefferson the Dollar Bill nickname.

Friends of both men said the mayor thought Mr. Jefferson had tried too aggressively to collect legal fees for helping Mr. Morial win the election. But after Mr. Jefferson became a state senator in 1979, his political rivals began to use "Dollar Bill" to refer to his expanding financial ventures.

His rental business — which leased television sets and other appliances to people who could not afford to buy them — appeared on the delinquent list in a city sales-tax scandal in the 1980's. And a day after he was elected to Congress in 1990, the Resolution Trust Corporation, which was trying to clean up the mess from the collapse of savings institutions, sued him for $160,000 over an apartment-building loan on which he had quit making payments. He later settled the suit, with friends saying his investments had been hurt by a faltering economy.

Still, once Mr. Jefferson became a close ally of President Bill Clinton, and then won a seat on the powerful House Ways and Means Committee, he was able to provide "absolute A+" support for city projects, said Marc H. Morial, one of Ernest Morial's sons and the mayor of New Orleans from 1994 to 2002.

Mr. Jefferson also became known as a strong advocate of freer trade and made at least nine trips to Africa to promote it, including one with President Clinton. He championed a 2000 law that extended trade benefits to sub-Saharan Africa. "Africa is a reservoir of opportunities for American businesses," he said then.

Over the years, Mr. Jefferson has received campaign contributions and free travel from individuals and companies seeking business in Africa, including iGate.

Campaign finance records show he received a $1,000 contribution as early as 2001 from Vernon L. Jackson, the chief executive of iGate, which makes technology to transmit high-speed Internet service across the wires used in some African nations. Mr. Jackson pleaded guilty this month to bribing Mr. Jefferson with more than $400,000 in cash and millions of shares of iGate stock.

Government documents show that Mr. Jackson told the F.B.I. that when he met Mr. Jefferson in late 2000, the congressman voluntarily helped promote iGate's products — a normal and legitimate action for a government official involved in trade issues. But according to the F.B.I. documents, in early 2001, the congressman's actions became improper when he said he would continue to use his influence on iGate's behalf only if Mr. Jackson made payments to a company, the ANJ Group, run by the Jefferson family. The iGate payments were disguised as consulting fees, the F.B.I. said.

Mr. Jefferson says these were private business dealings that had nothing to do with his work on the House committee.

But as part of a 2003 deal to distribute iGate's products, a Nigerian company, Netlink Digital Television, agreed to pay the congressman $5 per subscriber, the F.B.I. affidavit said, "in return for Jefferson's official assistance if the deal was successful."

House records show that in February 2004, Mr. Jefferson led a business delegation to Nigeria and Cameroon as a co-chairman of the Congressional Nigeria Caucus and the Africa Trade and Investment Caucus. The trip, which cost $16,313, according to the records, was paid for in part by iGate.

In 2005, the F.B.I. said, Mr. Jefferson wrote to the vice presidents of Nigeria and Ghana, and traveled to Ghana, seeking approval for iGate projects. Within a week after returning, the F.B.I. said, Mr. Jefferson used his influence to help a Virginia woman, Lori Modi, who had invested $3.5 million in the Nigeria project. He introduced her to officials at the Export-Import Bank of the United States and urged them to provide financing for the project.

But by then, Ms. Modi had asked the F.B.I. to investigate the deal.

Investigators said that in negotiating the deals, Mr. Jefferson had often cited his desire to provide for his five daughters, three of whom also have degrees from Harvard Law School.

From December 2004 through June 2005, the F.B.I. said in its affidavit, Mr. Jefferson increased his demands for equity in one Nigerian company, to 30 percent, to be split among his daughters. He also told an investor that one of his daughters had to be retained to do legal work, according to documents in the case.

Then, on July 30, 2005, when Mr. Jefferson met Ms. Modi at a Ritz-Carlton hotel, the F.B.I. said it supplied her with a briefcase with $100,000 in marked bills. Mr. Jefferson had told her the money would be needed to bribe Nigerian officials, the affidavit said.

As the F.B.I.'s video cameras zoomed in on him, the bureau said, Mr. Jefferson drove off with the briefcase on the seat of his Lincoln Town Car. And when agents raided his home four days later, $90,000 of the money turned up again, in the kitchen freezer.

Corruption Crackdown (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, May 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - In Lynchburg, Va., mayor Carl Hutcherson on May 2 was convicted, among other crimes, of stealing cash from Social Security disability recipients to pay for a stereo, a mattress, and cable television.

In Oklahoma City, three US Army soldiers on April 25 pleaded guilty to taking bribes to transport cocaine while in uniform - bringing to 13 the number of current or former military personnel ensnared by the FBI undercover investigation Operation Tarnish Star.

In West Palm Beach, Fla., city commissioner Raymond Liberti on May 8 was charged with fraud in federal court after allegedly harassing two local massage parlors in return for a $2,000 TAG Heuer watch and $66,000 in cash.

Jack Abramoff, you're not alone. Federal corruption cases are on the upswing all across America, as the FBI devotes more resources to pursuing those who abuse the public trust.

Over the past two years, FBI investigations have led to corruption convictions for more than 1,000 government employees, according to bureau figures. Corruption indictments are up 40 percent.

At times, critics say, this push has gone too far - witness the current legal standoff over documents seized by agents from Rep. William Jefferson's office. But other experts applaud the attempt to curb bribery and other misdeeds - especially in Washington, nexus of money, lobbyists, and power.

"I think it's great," says Melanie Sloan, former federal prosecutor who now heads Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW). "It's overdue."

The FBI's latest strategic plan lists "combat public corruption on all levels" as the bureau's highest-ranking criminal priority, ahead of such things as fighting transnational crime organizations (read "the Mafia") and white-collar crime.

Over the past 18 months, some 200 agents have been added to the 400 already working on public corruption cases, according to FBI data.

This new emphasis is due to the fact that "public corruption is different than other crimes," said FBI director Robert Mueller in a May 11 speech in San Diego. "It does not just strike at the heart of good government - it can strike at the security of our communities and our nation."

A recent Arizona-based investigation found serious corruption along the US southern border, noted Mr. Mueller. Fifty current and former soldiers and law-enforcement officers pleaded guilty to accepting cash to smuggle drugs and illegal immigrants into the US from Mexico.

"For the right price, would they ... help terrorist operatives cross the border?" said the FBI director.

Not that the stakes are always so high. A recent election fraud case in West Virginia centered around the trading of votes for gravel, which the voters in question needed for their gravel roads, said James "Chip" Burrus, assistant director of the FBI's Criminal Investigative Division, at an April press conference.

The FBI and federal prosecutors have broken some big corruption cases outside of Washington. Former Illinois Gov. George Ryan, for instance, was convicted of a pattern of fraud while in office.

Abramoff, for one, has admitted to conspiring to bribe public officials, plus mail fraud and tax evasion, as a result of one of the widest-ranging such probes in recent history. So far, the Abramoff investigation has ensnared three former congressional aides - the latest being Neil Volz, an ex-lobbyist and ex-aide to Rep. Bob Ney (R) of Ohio, who pleaded guilty to fraud May 8.

In addition, former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R) of California last year admitted taking $2.4 million in return for helping defense firms get Pentagon contracts. The Cunningham case is still threatening to engulf others, too, such as a former high CIA official named Kyle "Dusty" Foggo. Mr. Foggo was a friend of an unindicted co-conspirator who figured in Cunningham's schemes, and agents searched Foggo's Langley, Virginia office on May 12.

Then there's Rep. Jefferson (D) of Louisiana. The FBI says it has a videotape of him accepting $100,000 in bribes, and that it found $90,000 of that cash stuffed in his home freezer. Last week, a former Jefferson aide, Brett Pfeffer, was sentenced to eight years in prison for aiding and abetting the bribery of a public official.

The current spate of bribery investigations involving Congress is "extraordinary," notes John Fortier, a research fellow and governance expert at the American Enterprise Institute.

Given President Clinton's own legal problems while in office, his administration wasn't interested in allowing the FBI to go after corruption in the GOP- controlled Congress, she added. But now, "political gloves are off," says Sloan.

How To Do Nothing, Washington-Style (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

The Gulfstream II had everything a congressman getting a free golf trip to Scotland could want. "State of the art entertainment center," boasted a description of the jet's elegant appointments. "Complete bar service. . . . Rich mahogany woodwork . " For the $91,465 charter, lobbyist Jack Abramoff got his money's worth -- or, as was his style, other people's money's worth: in this case, two Indian tribes and a Russian vodka distributor.

The charter details were part of the evidence introduced last week during the trial of David Safavian at the federal courthouse in Washington. A former General Services Administration official, Safavian is accused of lying to investigators about whether Abramoff had business before the agency when he invited Safavian along for the ride. Also on board, and shown to the jury in a photograph that captured him reading the newspaper in a plush captain's chair, was Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio).

A few blocks away, the purveyors of business as usual known as the United States Congress were killing lobbying reform in the way Washington does best: with the silent stiletto of procedure.

The latest lethal jab took the form of appointing Senate members of a conference committee that is supposed to blend the inadequate Senate version of lobbying reform with the even more feeble House proposal.

And guess who's not coming to conference: The chairman, Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), and ranking Democrat Sen. Joseph Lieberman (Conn.), of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which shares jurisdiction over the subject with the Senate Rules and Administration Committee.

Collins and Lieberman had backed much tougher lobbying reform -- especially an independent ethics enforcement office -- than the Senate ultimately passed. No wonder Senate leaders didn't want them anywhere near the conference.

Yes, one member who serves on both panels is a conferee, but if you think Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) will be a champion of lobbying reform against the feckless House, I've got a bridge to nowhere to sell you. If you're counting on Rules Chairman Trent Lott (R-Miss.) to be as tough as Collins and Lieberman, I'll throw in a railroad to nowhere, too.

This is the way the push for lobbying reform ends, not with a bang but a maneuver -- indecipherable to outsiders but quietly effective. As for the House, the leadership there considers the matter so pressing that it hasn't yet gotten around to naming conferees.

Washington has many ways of avoiding action while pretending the opposite. Nearly all of them have been deployed in the cause of evading effective lobbying reform:

· Run out the clock. Remember the frantic push for lobbying reform in the weeks after Abramoff's guilty plea? The anti-reform forces were betting you wouldn't.

· Avoid the subject . One of the cushiest perks that lawmakers get is flying the corporate skies at cut-rate prices. When they borrow a corporate jet, they only have to pay the company the price of a first-class ticket.

But both houses managed to avoid the unpleasantness of having to vote on proposals to require lawmakers to pay full freight. In the Senate, a bipartisan cabal led by Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) and Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) cut off debate before such an amendment could be offered. Asked about that during a visit to The Post last month, Reid said such flights were a complicated topic that required hearings -- this after Rules and Homeland Security had just finished lobbying reform hearings.

· Rig the rules. This subset of "avoid the subject" is a specialty of the House. Under the version of democracy practiced by House Republicans, votes are permitted only when the conclusion is pre-ordained; real consideration of alternatives is forbidden; and troublesome amendments, even from party members, are disallowed.

On lobbying reform, Republicans refused to permit floor votes on establishing an independent ethics office, on corporate flights, and on increasing the waiting period for lawmakers to lobby their former colleagues. A simple up-or-down vote on the Democratic alternative was entirely off the table, of course.

· Show no shame. This is an essential element of the effort to con ordinary citizens into thinking that something has been accomplished. In January, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) demanded an end to privately subsidized congressional travel and free meals and other goodies from lobbyists. Last month, after the House passed a measure that met neither of those goals, Hastert was unabashed about patting himself and his colleagues on the back.

Congress has left town for its Memorial Day recess, but the Safavian trial continues. Today, Neil Volz, the former Ney chief of staff turned Abramoff lobbyist turned admitted felon, is to take the stand to describe, among other things, the Scotland trip.

But don't count on that -- or a lawmaker's freezer stuffed with cash, or a congressional Rolls-Royce underwritten by a defense contractor -- to produce the real change that Congress is so doggedly resisting.

Congressman Questions Cost Of Hoffa Search (AP-Y2)

By Joseph Altman, Associated Press Writer

AP2, May 30, 2006

A Michigan congressman on Monday questioned the cost of the FBI's search for the remains of former Teamsters boss Jimmy Hoffa.

"The FBI might be better off establishing a budget and some kind of timeline, because what new information do they have now, 31 years later?" said Rep. Joe Knollenberg, whose district is near the search site.

Monday marked the 13th consecutive day that agents have worked at Hidden Dreams Farm in Milford Township, 30 miles northwest of Detroit.

The Republican told The Associated Press he has not asked the FBI for an explanation but may do so this week.

"It seems to be a no-holds-barred move on the part of the FBI to do all this sifting and digging and searching," Knollenberg said. "It's purely a question of cost at this moment. ... It's the taxpayer that has the voice here, too."

Messages left for FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney were not immediately returned Monday.

The FBI has declined to release an estimate of how much the search will cost but has said it will last a couple of weeks and involve more than 40 FBI personnel, as well as demolition experts, archaeologists and anthropologists.

"The expenditure of funds has always been necessary in each and every case the FBI works, and this one is no exception," the FBI said in a statement last week. "We will not abandon our responsibility to effectively investigate a pending organized crime case simply because it might be termed 'too old.' "

The FBI has said it received a credible tip that Hoffa's body is buried at the farm, once owned by a Hoffa associate.

Hoffa was last seen when he was scheduled to have dinner at a restaurant about 20 miles from the farm. He was supposed to meet with a New Jersey Teamsters boss and a Detroit Mafia captain, who are now both dead.

Little Activity At Hoffa Search Site On Memorial Day (AP)

By Brian Charlton, The Associated Press

AP, May 29, 2006

MILFORD TOWNSHIP, Mich. (AP) — The FBI's search for Jimmy Hoffa appeared to take a back seat to Memorial Day. But area businesses trying to cash in on the Hoffa hoopla were still at work on Monday.

The FBI for nearly two weeks has been searching a Milford Township horse farm for the remains of the former Teamsters boss.

Sunday marked the 12th consecutive day of the search at Hidden Dreams Farm 30 miles northwest of Detroit. But on Monday, only a few agents were on the site, and they appeared only to be guarding it, not actively searching.

FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney said that despite appearances, agents were working at the site Monday.

"There might not have been a lot of digging that you could see visually, but they're still working out there," said Clenney, who declined to elaborate. "There's a lot of investigating still going on that might not be visible."

The search would continue Tuesday, she said.

A few miles away, ClubHouse Golf employees encouraged customers to "whack" Hoffa.

The golf shop challenged customers to hit a ball into a picture of Hoffa that was placed 8 feet away. The names of those who successfully complete the task are entered into a drawing. The winner will take home a golf bag packed with items that include a shovel and DVDs of "The Sopranos" and "The Godfather."

"I've kind of grown up with the whole Hoffa thing. I was a little paranoid at first, but we figured it's kind of an urban legend now," said ClubHouse Golf owner Corky Davis.

The streets of Milford were lined Monday for the annual Memorial Day parade.

In an effort to show respect to veterans, the Milford Baking Company removed its Hoffa cupcakes from a store display case and substituted red, white and blue cupcakes.

"We thought this day should be dedicated just to veterans, so we just have them in the back," said bakery co-owner Laura Helwig.

The bakery has sold more than 2,500 of the Hoffa cupcakes, which feature a plastic green hand emerging from chocolate-flavored sprinkles and frosting meant to resemble dirt.

Flats Mexican Bar & Grill also was getting in on the Hoffa hype, selling $1 Teamsters Tacos.

Meanwhile, U.S. Rep. Joe Knollenberg questioned how much money the FBI is spending on the search for Hoffa, who was last seen in July 1975.

"The FBI might be better off establishing a budget and some kind of timeline, because what new information do they have now, 31 years later?" the Republican from Oakland County's Bloomfield Township said Monday.

He said he has not yet asked the FBI for an explanation but is considering doing so this week.

"It seems to be a no-holds-barred move on the part of the FBI to do all this sifting and digging and searching," Knollenberg said. "It's purely a question of cost at this moment. ... It's the taxpayer that has the voice here, too."

The FBI has declined to release an estimate of how much the search at the farm will cost but has said it will last a couple of weeks and involve more than 40 FBI personnel, along with demolition experts, archaeologists and anthropologists.

"The expenditure of funds has always been necessary in each and every case the FBI works, and this one is no exception," the FBI said in a statement issued last week. "We will not abandon our responsibility to effectively investigate a pending organized crime case simply because it might be termed `too old,' nor will we compromise any other ongoing investigation in the process."

The FBI has said it received a credible tip that Hoffa's body is buried at the farm, which at one time was owned by Hoffa associate Rolland McMaster.

Hoffa was last seen when he was scheduled to have dinner at a Bloomfield Township restaurant, about 20 miles from the farm. He was supposed to meet with a New Jersey Teamsters boss and a Detroit Mafia captain, who are now both dead.

Over the years, Hoffa's disappearance spawned endless theories: that he was entombed in concrete at Giants Stadium in the New Jersey Meadowlands; that he was ground up and thrown into a Florida swamp; that he was obliterated in a mob-owned fat-rendering plant that has since burned down.

Search For Hoffa Eases For Holiday (DEN)

By Lisa Martino, The Detroit News

Detroit News, May 30, 2006

MILFORD TOWNSHIP -- Memorial Day marked a break in the digging for the remains of former Teamsters leader Jimmy Hoffa at Hidden Dreams horse farm, but the FBI remained on hand.

Aside from a typical delivery of hay and authorities guarding the dig site, not much was visible at the farm, but FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney said agents continued to work on other aspects of the investigation at the scene.

"They're there on site. You may not see what they're doing, but they're working," she said.

Work crews have demolished a horse barn and have been digging under the foundation for the remains of Hoffa based on a tip from Donovan Wells, 75, an ailing federal prisoner who lived on the Milford Township property in 1975.

Wells is serving time in a prison medical center in Lexington, Ky., for marijuana trafficking.

Hoffa disappeared on July 30, 1975, before a meeting he was to attend at the Machus Red Fox restaurant in Bloomfield Township. Numerous other searches for Hoffa have turned up no leads.

At least 40 FBI agents and other experts have been brought in to work on this search for Hoffa's remains.

Today is the 14th day of the search. It is uncertain how long the search will continue at the site, Clenney said.

Longtime Hoffa Friend Doubts Latest Tip Will Crack Case (AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press

AP, May 30, 2006

BOCA RATON, Fla. -- Longtime Jimmy Hoffa friend Charles "Chuckie" O'Brien has seen it all before -- the breathless news reports, the stern FBI agents, the digging in yards, the ripping up of floorboards, the endless speculation that maybe, this time, one of America's great mysteries will be solved.

Some think O'Brien may have been involved in the July 30, 1975, disappearance. But he said he highly doubts that a horse farm 30 miles outside Detroit will answer the question of what happened to the former Teamsters president.

"At this point, after 31 years -- I don't know how much longer God is going to keep me on this Earth, but I just don't see it," said O'Brien, now 72. He is retired from the Teamsters and battling numerous health problems. "I just don't think it will ever be solved."

O'Brien said while working as a Teamsters official he knew the tipster, Donovan Wells, who provided new information leading the FBI to Hidden Dreams Farm this month. Wells, now 75, is serving time at a federal prison in Lexington, Ky., on a drug conviction.

"If he had to get on a truth meter, he would go down the tubes," O'Brien said during an interview with The Associated Press at a swimming pool in his Boca Raton condominium complex.

O'Brien said he views Hoffa as a father figure. He was a child when Hoffa took him in, along with his mother. He has been questioned about the disappearance at least a dozen times by FBI agents. Most recently he was in the news in 2001 when the FBI matched a hair to Hoffa that was found in a car that O'Brien was driving the day Hoffa disappeared.

The car belonged to the son of reputed Mafia figure Anthony Giacalone, whom Hoffa was supposed to meet at a restaurant along with New Jersey Teamsters boss and mob associate Anthony "Tony Pro" Provenzano. Hoffa phoned his wife to say neither man showed, and that was the last anyone ever heard from him.

O'Brien adamantly denies having any role in whatever happened to Hoffa, or knowing anyone who did. He keeps a photograph on his desk of Hoffa and his wife during one of their visits to Florida in the early 1970s.

"It's very frustrating. I have so much inside, my love for him and his family," O'Brien said. "How long can you keep talking to people and being honest with people?"

Hoffa was Teamsters president from 1957 to 1971. The FBI has said his disappearance was probably connected to his attempts to regain power in the union. O'Brien said it also was known that Hoffa intended to testify before the special U.S. Senate investigative panel, known as the Church Committee, about Mafia involvement in U.S.-backed plots to assassinate Cuban President Fidel Castro.

"I think a disappearance is very hard. If somebody doesn't want you to be found, you won't be found," O'Brien said.

The Michigan farm investigation is only the latest in a series of high-profile efforts to find Hoffa. A backyard pool in Michigan was excavated in 2003, floorboards were ripped up in a Detroit house in 2004 and ground-penetrating radar was used by a television show to check for remains underneath Giants Stadium in New Jersey.

"It's gone into another circus. I wish they would find something so there could be closure for the family," O'Brien said.

The Teamsters as a union, O'Brien said, never recovered from Hoffa's disappearance. Now led by Hoffa's son James P. Hoffa, the Teamsters recently broke away from the AFL-CIO as a rift grows within labor unions about their future. About 12 percent of U.S. workers are union members, down from about 20 percent in 1983.

"This tragedy hurt everybody who grew up with the Teamsters. We lost the spirit, and they are paying a heavy price for it," O'Brien said.

O'Brien himself was banned from contact with the Teamsters for alleged links with organized crime, which he denies. But he said the ban has made it difficult for him to even attend funerals of his former union associates.

"I've been taking a beating because of people who are not legitimate people," he said, referring to prison inmates whom he contends provide authorities with false information. "My family gets the brunt. ... I'm trying to say it's not true, it never happened."

Dixon's Bribery Trial Starts Today (KNOXNS/AP)

Ex-senator's lawyer hopeful about verdict from 'Waltz' sting

NASHVILLE - The federal bribery trial of former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon begins today, and his attorney says he's optimistic about the outcome despite the charge against his client.

"It's going to be tough," Coleman W. Garrett said by phone from his Memphis office on Monday. "But you just tell yourself you're going to prevail."

Dixon was arrested along with four sitting lawmakers a year ago in the Tennessee Waltz sting, which focused on an FBI front company, called E-Cycle Management, that supposedly wanted to buy and resell used government computers.

Dixon, who represented Memphis in the Legislature for 22 years before he resigned in 2005, is the first lawmaker indicted in the case to go to trial. He is charged with accepting $9,500 in bribes as part of the public corruption case.

At least two state senators and a member of the governor's cabinet have received subpoenas to testify at Dixon's trial. Dixon was at the Capitol with a woman serving the legal summonses as last Wednesday's session began, according to Senate sergeants at arms.

Lt. Gov. John Wilder, D-Mason, and Sen. Jeff Miller, R-Cleveland, both told The Associated Press they received subpoenas.

Miller has been investigated but not charged in the public corruption case. He has acknowledged accepting $1,000 from a lobbyist who pleaded guilty as part of the undercover probe but has said the money was a campaign contribution.

On Friday, state Finance Commissioner Dave Goetz told WSMV-TV that he, too, had been subpoenaed.

He declined to comment about the case, and Wilder and Miller said they don't know why they were subpoenaed.

Garrett said five people were subpoenaed.

Prosecutors say undercover agents acting as E-Cycle representatives bribed lawmakers and local government officials while pretending to set up business in Tennessee.

Two of the indicted lawmakers, Ward Crutchfield of Chattanooga and Kathryn Bowers of Memphis, are in the Senate and have pleaded not guilty. Defendant John Ford resigned from the Senate after his arrest and has pleaded not guilty.

Chris Newton, a Republican from East Tennessee, pleaded guilty and resigned from the state House. He is now in prison serving a one-year sentence.

Former Tennessee State Senator Roscoe Dixon Prepares For Corruption Trial (WREG-TV)

WREG-TV, May 30, 2006

Memphis - It has been a year of preparation for former State Senator Roscoe Dixon and his attorneys. Tuesday they take their defense to federal court and Dixon hopes it is enough to keep him a free man.

It was a year ago that the foundation of Tennessee politics was shaken with a statewide rumble. It was then that Roscoe Dixon's name became entwined with the investigation called the Tennessee Waltz. No one knew what to make of it, and the former Senator didn't have much to offer.

"Everything is okay. I just want my constituents to know that I appreciate all the support they have given me and let's let this unfold." said Dixon, last year, when the investigation was revealed.

As details came out, it became clear that Roscoe Dixon has trouble ahead. Dixon would be charged with extortion and accepting 95-hundred dollars in bribes from representatives of the fictitious FBI created company called E-Cycle. It seems he introduced a bill on behalf of the company. It became a dark cloud over 22 years of public service, in both the House and Senate.

Dixon decided not to plea bargain, but to fight the charges against him. "In all my discussions with the senator regarding his position with respect to the trial and what you have, it's been that he is not going to consider entertaining any negotiated plea in this case." said Coleman Garrett, Dixon's attorney.

Dixon's attorneys have subpoenaed several of his state government colleagues in his trial. We may very well see more prominent people called to the stand and many will be watching on the sidelines to see the fallout from this big dance and what it may indicate for the other lawmaker who waltz in next.

Other 5 Defendants Looking For Strategy (MCA)

By Marc Perrusquia

Memphis Commercial Appeal, May 30, 2006

Like a canary in a coal mine, Roscoe Dixon is the focus of great anxiety.

When he stands trial Tuesday on federal bribery and extortion charges, the former state senator will be watched, studied and fretted over by five other Tennessee Waltz defendants who've refused to deal with prosecutors.

Advertisement

They're anxious to see if Dixon goes down with a guilty verdict or if he can flit away on acquittal, stirring hope that they, too, might survive the reams of undercover FBI tape shot in the two-year corruption sting.

It's a high-stakes challenge for Dixon, 56, a beloved 22-year veteran of the General Assembly who was both revered for his constituent service and criticized for suspected self-dealing.

"Everybody's watching just to see what will happen," said Michael Scholl, defense lawyer for former state senator John Ford, who's seen on one covert tape stuffing cash from an undercover agent into his pocket.

Scholl won't discuss his legal strategy, but it's clear Ford, Dixon and four other remaining Waltz defendants hope to poke holes in a government case built on some 3,000 hours of undercover audio and video tapes.

Unlike most criminal cases, in which the majority of defendants plead guilty, seven of the 10 Waltz defendants statewide have opted for jury trials. One of the seven -- ex-Hamilton County Commissioner William Cotton -- was convicted by an East Tennessee jury in February and sentenced to three years in prison.

Defendants found guilty at trial generally receive stiffer sentences than those who plead, yet all but one of the six Memphis defendants plan to go to trial.

All the Memphis defendants are black, and race already has begun to play a role in defense strategies.

"This is a different animal," said Steve Farese, defense lawyer for indicted County Commissioner Michael Hooks Sr., explaining why so few of the Waltz defendants have copped pleas.

"You have overtones of entrapment, overtones of a suspect group of people."

Dixon's lawyer, Coleman Garrett, unveiled the race defense this month when he unsuccessfully asked U.S. Dist. Judge Jon McCalla to toss out charges, alleging selective prosecution.

Noting eight of 10 Waltz defendants are black, Garrett argued that the FBI ignored white targets -- an allegation prosecutors deny and one McCalla found no evidence to support.

Yet in watching a star-studded trial where potential witnesses include Lt. Gov. John Wilder and other big names in Tennessee politics, defense lawyers will be on the lookout for miscues.

Scholl said he wants to see if more comes to light on the government's star witness, FBI informant Tim Willis. Farese will watch for anything he may borrow to score points with jurors.

"It's always good to see what the government's perspective will be in trial," he said. "Lawyers are basically thieves. We'll steal good ideas from others."

One potential -- yet dangerous -- defense is entrapment, in which a defendant contends he was illegally enticed by undercover agents. To do it, a defendant must admit taking a bribe, and, in turn, the government can put on evidence of any past corrupt practices.

Charged with sharing $9,500 in bribes with a bag man, Dixon hinted in a pretrial motion he might use the entrapment defense. Prosecutors say they're ready if he does.

A study of his 22 years in the House and Senate reveals two sides of Dixon, who grew up disadvantaged in South Memphis and rose to be an outspoken advocate for the poor, yet couldn't shake talk he mixed his public and private interests.

"I always liked Roscoe. He always seemed to be reasonable," said Rusty Siebert, former bureau chief for TennCare, the state's health program for the poor. TennCare met hostile resistance in 1995 when it tried to ax Access Medplus, a black-owned managed care organization, yet Siebert recalls Dixon as a voice of reason in the debate.

"Roscoe was very well-liked, period," agreed Rep. Mike Kernell, who recalls his fellow Memphis Democrat working long hours and speaking up for his constituents.

Yet whispers often surrounded Dixon. Like Ford, Dixon listed his occupation as a consultant, yet didn't disclose how much he was paid or who he worked for on conflict-of-interest forms.

Some were surprised in 2003 to see Dixon waging a lawsuit for control of publicly funded Memphis Health Center, but not Gregory Grant, his rival in the tussle. When Dixon called Grant "a shady character" who should be ousted from the multimillion-dollar clinic for the poor, Grant responded, "He's as slick as grease himself."

Dixon often helped community groups navigate state bureaucracy, and he once helped land a $75,000 state grant for another nonprofit organization he controlled. Records show lawmakers added language in a 1997 appropriations bill to give $75,000 to the Hamilton Community Initiative, a South Memphis organization set up to improve neighborhoods around Hamilton High School, where Dixon graduated.

The organization's 2001 Internal Revenue Service return lists Dixon as controlling its financial books, and he's named in another as executive director.

Dixon declined comment for this article, and two calls to his attorney went unreturned.

How much the FBI studied Dixon's past isn't known, but it's clear he was among the first approached when agents set up a fake company called E-Cycle Management that passed cash to lawmakers in exchange for their help landing state contracts.

Agents got to Dixon through his friend, now-confessed bag man Barry Myers, 39, who's expected to testify against him. It started with a 2002 probe of then-Shelby County Juvenile Court Clerk Shep Wilbun's office, where Myers worked.

First, agents got to Willis, 35, a political consultant paid more than $30,000 in still-unexplained fees from Wilbun's office. Joining the FBI in February 2003 as a $72,000-a-year informant, Willis began recording conversations the next month with Myers, and before long Willis was recording Dixon, too.

By that August, Dixon participated in eight conversations secretly recorded on video or audio, court records show. By then, the FBI set up a mini-sting that preceded the Waltz. Prosecutors say they'll present evidence that Dixon and Myers took $6,000 that July and August from agents posing to represent a dental clinic in search of TennCare funds.

By January 2004, with the Waltz in full swing, Dixon introduced Senate Bill 2500 on behalf of E-Cycle -- a firm ostensibly in the computer parts-recycling business -- to create financial incentives for reusing electronic waste. Prosecutors allege Dixon and Myers were paid for introducing the bill and again for pulling it to make way for a stronger bill -- $9,500, in all, between February and May 2005.

Trucking Firms Fund Politicians (CHIST)

Chicago Sun-Times, May 29, 2006

Immunity keeps them out of jail, not hot water

Two of the top prosecution witnesses testifying in the City Hall hiring trial admitted they broke the rules while taking part in an alleged crooked hiring scheme.

But the former city employees are not at risk of going to prison for their deeds.

That's because Mary Jo Falcon and John Kosiba testified over the last two weeks with letters of immunity, meaning they can talk about breaking the law without worrying about criminal prosecution, unless they gave false testimony.

Yet they're not completely in the clear, the Chicago Sun-Times has learned.

Falcon and Kosiba, both lawyers, are now at risk of losing their law licenses because of their testimony against Robert Sorich and three other former city employees. Sorich, Timothy McCarthy, Patrick Slattery and John Sullivan are charged with manipulating the city's hiring system to award politically connected candidates with jobs and promotions. Prosecutors argue that's a violation of a 1983 federal decree that aims to keep political influence out of hiring decisions. The trial enters its third week Tuesday.

No word on disciplinary inquiry

"The bottom line here is immunity has no meaning in our system," said James Grogan, chief counsel for the Illinois Attorney Registration and Disciplinary Commission. "The Illinois Supreme Court has long held that a grant of immunity has absolutely no impact in terms of lawyer discipline."

Grogan would not comment on whether the commission has opened an investigation on Kosiba and Falcon. But lawyers can get in trouble for fraudulent behavior even if it had nothing to do with legal work, he said.

"We do regularly monitor alleged attorney misconduct when it comes to our attention in the terms of a criminal case," Grogan said. "This agency can generate an investigation based on media reports."

Grogan said the commission has taken action against other lawyers even though they were testifying for the government with a grant of immunity. That happened quite a bit in the Operation Greylord investigation that took place in the late 1980s and early 1990s and depended to an extent on the immunized testimony of lawyers.

Notorious Greylord case

Most notorious among those witnesses was Robert J. Cooley, a mob lawyer who admitted to taking bribes and fixing a number of criminal cases before he started working for the government. His cooperation helped bring down judges and lawyers. The Illinois Supreme Court disbarred Cooley in 1994.

Falcon is a former director of personnel at the city's Sewers Department. She left in 2005 when part of the expanding Hired Truck investigation delved into political hiring at City Hall. She soon began cooperating with federal investigators.

In her testimony at trial, Falcon admitted she falsified scores on rating forms so politically connected candidates won city jobs. Falcon said she rigged it so the names provided to her by Sorich or McCarthy could win the jobs. Sorich and McCarthy worked in the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs. Falcon acknowledged changing interview rating forms without telling the men.

Meanwhile, Kosiba, a former sewers commissioner, conducted hundreds of interviews and said he evaluated candidates so IGA selections won the jobs.

"Did interviews for most positions even matter while you were there?" Assistant U.S. Attorney Barry Miller asked.

"No," Kosiba said.

Kosiba said he knew he was supposed to rank candidates based on their qualifications when he interviewed people.

"Did you do that?" Miller asked.

"No," he said flatly.

FBI Questions Another Masilotti Land Deal (PALMBEACHP)

By Dwayne Robinson, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), May 30, 2006

The FBI issued yet another subpoena late last week in its investigation of land deals by Palm Beach County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti.

The latest federal subpoena to the Village of Royal Palm Beach on Thursday relates to a $7 million sale of up to 50 acres in 2004 from the Roman Catholic Diocese of Palm Beach to prominent Broward County builders GL Homes.

PBC Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti's family made as much as $1.3 million in connection with a government land purchase in Martin County.

As early as 2001, Royal Palm Beach sought approximately 15 acres at the site for a public park before leaning on its county commissioner for assistance when a sale to another buyer seemed imminent.

"I would appreciate your support in ensuring that a significant portion of that parcel be committed to public recreational space by the potential purchaser," Village Manager David Farber wrote to Masilotti on March 6, 2003, according to village records. "Any help you can provide regarding this matter would be greatly appreciated."

Masilotti, a former Royal Palm Beach mayor, never responded to the request, Farber says.

Royal Palm Beach offered to prchase the property at $42,000 an acre in 2001. According to court records, GL Homes forked over $7 million, or roughly $140,000 an acre, in 2004.

GL Homes constructed single-family homes and townhouses, ranging from $360,000 and up, at what is now the Nautica Lakes subdivision.

Masilotti could not be reached for comment. The FBI would not comment on the subpoena. And spokespeople from the diocese and GL Homes could not be reached for comment.

On the same day the federal subpoena was issued to Royal Palm Beach, the South Florida Water Management District also was ordered to hand over documents relating to a complicated 2003 land deal that enriched Masilotti's family.

The Palm Beach Post first reported in April that Masilotti's family made as much as $1.3 million in connection with the district deal, through a secret land trust and a tangled series of real estate transactions.

Royal Palm Beach has no records relating to Thursday's subpoena, Farber said. The subpoena asks for records relating to the sale of the diocesan property between 2001 and 2006 to the village, but no such sale occurred.

"I guess the response to the subpoena is there are no documents," Farber said. "I don't know what they're searching for. Someone needs to expand to us what they want."

BE ON GUARD, JUNIOR (NYPOST)

By Steve Dunleavy

The New York Post, May 30, 2006

EXCLUSIVE

THE feds have told John "Junior" Gotti that a threat has been made on his life.

The FBI captured the threat on tape during an ongoing investigation and immediately passed the chilling information on to Gotti and his camp, sources said.

If Junior's people are scared, they certainly aren't showing it.

"I have pretty good sources, too," Gotti's lawyer, Charlie Carnesi, said yesterday. "This is just another ploy by the prosecution to muddy the waters around this case."

The death threat was made on April 5, which was before a blizzard of subpoenas were sent out to Gotti associates and family members as part a new sweeping grand jury probe of the Gambino crime family that came after the second Gotti trial ended in a mistrial.

Carnesi has complained to Judge Shira Scheindlin that some of those subpoenas came with a message from the FBI: "You can thank Gotti for this."

"How disingenuous can the government be?" Carnesi asked yesterday.

The FBI has a legal and ethical obligation to convey the threat to Gotti, but his camp believes the feds are trying to give a perception to dangerous wiseguys that Junior has sold them out.

And that makes the Gotti camp hopping mad.

"That is stark insanity," one source said. "If he had sold anyone out, John would not have been facing 30 years in jail and $25 million in fines. He would not have been facing a third trial after flatly rejecting every deal the prosecution has offered him. Gotti has turned his back on the life."

The latest twist follows Thursday's arraignment of Junior when Judge Scheindlin broadsided the prosecution for bringing a third trial after two earlier juries failed to return a verdict.

"Does the government get to have endless trials until they get it right? The fourth, fifth or sixth?" Scheindlin asked as Gotti was arraigned on new witness-tampering and money-laundering charges.

Carnesi is definitely pleased with the way his case is going, because he believes the feds' constant use of turncoat mobsters as witnesses sends out a dangerous message.

"I am absolutely thrilled at the turn of events," Carnesi said. "The government is giving out a message, from prosecution witnesses Joey D'Angelo and Mikey 'Scars' DiLeonardo that it's OK to murder and you can get away with it.

"The real message is from John Jr. He had been in the life and it was full of treachery and it sucked."

From Mob Boss To Devastating Informant – The Life Of 'Little Al' D'Arco (SDUT/AP)

By Larry Mcshane, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, May 30, 2006

NEW YORK – The killers put the dead canary in the freezer. Later, their work finished, they placed the bird inside the mouth of the equally deceased Bruno Facciola.

The August 1990 mob hit followed a tip from two corrupt NYPD detectives that the Luchese family capo had turned government informant. Facciola was stabbed, shot through both eyes and shot again in the head. Then came the bird. Message: Speak no evil.

The slaying was orchestrated by a diminutive thug known to fellow Mafiosi as “Little Al.” Few embraced the mob ethos more fervently than Alphonse D'Arco, a hard case from the cradle.

“I was a man when I was born,” Little Al once bragged. He committed every crime except pimping and pornography, which he deemed beneath his dignity. Murders? He committed eight while rising through the Luchese ranks.

He especially despised informants. “Rats,” he'd spit. He did a three-year heroin rap without opening his yap. So when word came that Facciola was singing, D'Arco arranged for his demise.

And for the canary.

Four months later, D'Arco became the Luchese boss, though not for long. His reign abruptly ended, but not in the fashion he expected: on the wrong end of a jury verdict. Or maybe a bullet.

Instead, D'Arco – disgusted by the loss of mob honor, double-crossed by men he had respected – became in 1991 what he most abhorred: a rat.

And not just any rat. Over the last 15 years, he has brought down mob bosses, underbosses, consiglieres. And he's still making inmates out of ex-accomplices today.

Little Al may be the most devastating mob informant ever.

3 Plead Guilty To FEMA Fraud; Feds Charge 4 In Separate Cases (BRADV)

Baton Rouge Advocate, May 30, 2006

Three Louisiana residents pleaded guilty and four more were indicted in Baton Rouge federal court this week on violations related to Hurricane Katrina disaster relief funds.

According to a news release from the U.S. Attorney’s Office, those who pleaded guilty are Jenny L. Lowery, 22, of Baton Rouge, Whitney Paul, 19, of Donaldsonville and Sharon D. Dalcourt, 45, of Baton Rouge.

Both Lowery and Paul were charged with making a false and fraudulent claim for disaster relief benefits. They each face a maximum sentence of five years in prison, a $250,000 fine or both.

Dalcourt pleaded guilty to making false and fraudulent statements to the Federal Emergency Management Agency regarding damages incurred as a result of Katrina. She also faces a maximum sentence of five years in prison, a $250,000 fine or both, the news release said.

Also this week, Leonard Jackson, 54, Mary Johnson, 51, Anthony Parker, 21, and Edward Parker, 20, all of Baton Rouge, were charged in two-count indictments with making a false and fraudulent claim for disaster assistance benefits and illegal conversion of government property (a check from FEMA for expedited disaster assistance), a second news release said.

The cases were investigated by the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force, which includes members of the FBI, the Federal Trade Commission, the Postal Inspector's Office, the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys and other federal agencies.

The total number of defendants charged in Baton Rouge federal court with violations related to hurricane relief stands at 58, the news release said.

Feds Charge 26 In FEMA Fraud (BRAH/AP)

By Associated Press

The Bradenton Herald, May 30, 2006

TAMPA, Fla. - A grand jury has indicted 26 Orlando area residents on charges of making fraudulent claims for federal assistance after the two hurricanes that struck the Gulf Coast last year.

Federal prosecutors said on Thursday that the defendants collected a total of $150,000 in emergency assistance from the Federal Emergency Management Agency, even though they didn't live in the areas affected by hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Because so many people were affected by the storms, FEMA provided a streamlined process to quickly get at least $2,000 to those who needed disaster assistance. People whose primary residence was damaged could apply in person or via the Internet or a toll-free telephone number.

Those indicted Wednesday made fraudulent claims for amounts ranging from $2,000 to more than $100,000, federal prosecutors said. The indictments were a result of an investigation federal officials called Operation ``Storm Chaser."

Charges include conspiracy, submission of a false claim to a governmental agency, theft of government property, mail fraud, wire fraud, and making a false statement to a government agency.

The counts carry prison sentences ranging from five to 20 years.

"In the aftermath of hurricanes Katrina and Rita, our nation came together to support the people whose lives were devastated by those disasters," U.S. Attorney Paul I. Perez said in a statement Thursday. ``As we enter a new hurricane season next week, we will aggressively pursue anyone who attempts to take advantage of a natural disaster to defraud FEMA or anyone else."

Three In Mobile County Indicted On FEMA Fraud Charges (AP)

AP, May 27, 2006

MOBILE, Ala. (AP) — Three Mobile County residents have been indicted on charges of making false FEMA disaster claims related to Hurricane Katrina.

Silas J. Jackson, 53, of Mobile, Dianna Denise McMillian, 35, of Grand Bay, and Penny Sue Byrd, 35, of Citronelle, were each charged in multiple-count indictments, the U.S. attorney's office announced Friday.

Jackson received $23,529 through a scheme to defraud the Federal Emergency Management Agency by sending an altered fire marshal report in support of his application for disaster assistance, according to the indictment.

McMillian was charged with falsely claiming to reside at a residence from which she had moved several months prior to Katrina and defrauding FEMA of $13,498.

Byrd was charged with defrauding FEMA of $2,000 by falsely claiming to have resided in a travel trailer and mobile home at the time Katrina hit Aug. 29.

The maximum penalty for making false claims to the government is 5 years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Mail fraud and wire fraud each carry maximum penalties of 20 years and a $250,000 fine.

U.S. Attorney Deborah J. Rhodes in Mobile said the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force investigations continue.

Man In The Middle (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball, Jamie Reno And Evan Thomas, Newsweek

Newsweek, May 29, 2006

As a corruption probe heats up on Capitol Hill, the spotlight falls on a California defense contractor with some powerful friends.

During World War II, the Royal Hawaiian, a grand pink palace on Waikiki Beach, was reserved mainly for officers and men in the U.S. Navy's Submarine Service. It was understood that the sailors who took the greatest risks—about a quarter of the submariners never came back—deserved to be pampered while they waited to go back out on war patrols. More recently, the most frequent guest in the Royal Hawaiian's tony King Kamehameha Suite was a man with close ties to the military who also took risks, though of a different kind.

Brent Wilkes has flown in a private Gulfstream jet, lived in a huge house (once occupied by former San Diego Chargers quarterback Stan Humphries) in a gated community, smoked expensive cigars on the best golf courses and sponsored good works and charities, like the "Tribute to Heroes Gala," which raised hundreds of thousands of dollars for a children's hospital and a military charity called the Air Warrior Courage Foundation.

What paved the road to riches and beneficence for Wilkes? Once a lowly CPA in southern California, Wilkes became a fabulously successful defense contractor. He carefully cultivated friends in high places, personally handing out some $800,000 in campaign contributions, not counting the donations of a political action committee controlled by his company. He was a Republican "Pioneer," which means he raised at least $100,000 for the GOP. And he has long been known for showering favors on congressmen and national-security officials, playing poker with them at fancy Washington hotels and flying them in a jet he partly owned.

There is nothing unusual or illegal about a defense contractor with an open checkbook for campaign fund-raisers and seats to fill on a corporate jet. But federal prosecutors want to find out more about how Wilkes tapped into what may be one of Washington's sweetest post-9/11 honey pots—secret defense and intelligence contracts that are often awarded without competitive bids or oversight but with plenty of congressional meddling. Wilkes appears to be at the center of a Washington scandal that has the potential to shake Capitol Hill and the Pentagon.

Wilkes has protested his innocence, and indeed, his friends say he appears cheerful and confident he will be vindicated. But his lawyers have confirmed that he is the man identified as "Co-conspirator No. 1" in the charges against former congressman Randy (Duke) Cunningham, the former Navy air ace who pleaded guilty to taking bribes. In one prosecution document, "Co-conspirator No. 1" agreed to give Cunningham $525,000 in return for $6 million in government contracts. Wilkes is also a close friend of one of the more colorful characters to fall from a top government job, Kyle (Dusty) Foggo, the former executive director of the CIA who resigned three weeks ago, just before his house and office were raided by federal agents. According to The San Diego Union-Tribune, high-school classmates Wilkes and Foggo served as best men at each other's weddings, named their sons after each other and shared a wine locker at Washington's Capital Grille restaurant, a favorite lobbyists' hangout.

According to Foggo's lawyer, Bill Hundley, the Feds are operating on the theory that Foggo helped Wilkes get CIA contracts in return for Wilkes's paying for vacation trips for Foggo. According to Hundley, Foggo claims that he paid for some of the trips before Wilkes became a wealthy contractor, though he concedes Wilkes may have picked up the tab later on. The details of how Wilkes procured contracts remain murky, but the Feds appear to be particularly interested in contracts that seemingly offered little or dubious value for high prices. Wilkes's lawyers have repeatedly denied that he engaged in any wrongdoing.

In one case, described in prosecution documents, a Wilkes company was awarded a $9.7 million contract to electronically scan Panama Canal Zone documents dating back a century to the administration of Theodore Roosevelt, even though the Pentagon reportedly wanted to use the money for more-urgent projects. Wilkes allegedly lobbied Cunningham to press the Pentagon to award the contract anyway.

According to published reports and congressional and law-enforcement sources who did not want to be identified discussing a sensitive investigation, the Feds are also reviewing Wilkes's ties to other powerful House leaders. Former GOP majority leader Tom DeLay, Armed Services Committee chairman Duncan Hunter and Appropriations Committee chairman Jerry Lewis all reportedly had dealings with Wilkes. None has been accused of any wrongdoing; a spokesman for Lewis said the congressman had not seen Wilkes for 10 years. Hunter's spokesman said his boss urged the Pentagon to ignore congressional pressure on contracting, and DeLay's lawyer had no immediate comment.

Wilkes himself is said to be a bluff man who likes to burst into show tunes and shout out expressions like "boom shaka-laka," "God loves a working man" and "Yeah, baby!" after the Austin Powers movies. Though he owns custom-made suits, he generally prefers khakis and golf shirts. A former linebacker, he is said to be tough and unyielding, not the sort to easily crack under the pressure of prosecutors. Raised as a Mormon, he is described by acquaintances as a loyal friend who is very close to his children.

His life is getting lonelier. He has been dropped by charities; his office building is for sale; his federal contracts are drying up. Once a ubiquitous figure in San Diego politics, Wilkes might as well have ceased to exist. Former San Diego congressman Brian Bilbray, a Republican who was in the House until 2001 before retiring to become a lobbyist, is running for Duke Cunningham's vacated seat. Bilbray told NEWSWEEK, "I may have met Brent once or twice, but I really do not remember." Bilbray did discover that Wilkes had donated $7,000 to his campaigns, but the candidate has given the money to charity. "I wouldn't know Wilkes if I saw him in the street," said Bilbray.

Sniper Jury To Sift Conspiracy Theory (WT/AP)

By Stephen Manning, Associated Press

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

Early in his more-than-three-hour closing statement, convicted sniper mastermind John Allen Muhammad laid out the heart of his defense against six murder charges stemming from the 2002 sniper shootings: He and accomplice Lee Boyd Malvo were framed.

"My case is based on one thing. It is very simple. They lied on two innocent men," Muhammad said Friday, before launching into a rambling speech in which he said government agencies, including the CIA, worked to falsely imprison him.

But as Montgomery County jurors begin deliberations today in Muhammad's second trial in the shootings, they will weigh this conspiracy theory -- for which he offered little proof and no motive -- against the four weeks of testimony and evidence presented by prosecutors.

Witnesses reported seeing Muhammad and his Chevrolet Caprice near scenes of the shootings.

Forensic analysts said his DNA was on evidence that included parts of the Bushmaster rifle found in the Caprice when he and Malvo were arrested.

Ballistics analysts matched the .223-caliber bullets used in the killings to the rifle.

Jurors also heard dramatic testimony from Malvo, whom Muhammad still referred to as "my son" even though his former protege took the stand to say Muhammad planned and carried out most of the shootings.

The jury of seven women and five men also likely will consider their personal impressions of Muhammad, who defended himself.

He came to Montgomery County from Virginia's death row, convicted by a jury that heard most of the same evidence in 2003.

Muhammad showed he has learned a lot about lawyering -- he seemed comfortable with courtroom procedure, asking the "court's indulgence" when he wanted more time to prepare his thoughts. He cross-examined government witnesses, seizing on inconsistency in reports, looking for holes to suggest he was set up.

Prosecutors urged jurors not to be fooled by Muhammad's courtroom demeanor. It was a facade, Assistant State's Attorney Vivek Chopra said in his closing.

"Scrub away that veneer that covers this man and see him for what he is," Mr. Chopra said, labeling Muhammad "a heartless, soulless, manipulating murderer."

Ten persons were killed and three were wounded during the three weeks of shootings in October 2002.

Victims were shot at gas stations, in parking lots, and a 13-year-old boy was struck by a bullet outside his Bowie middle school. The randomness sowed pervasive fear among people, who were afraid to pump gas, go out or send their children to school.

Muhammad and Malvo were arrested Oct. 24, 2002, as they slept in the Caprice at a Western Maryland rest stop. Behind the back seat was the Bushmaster. Authorities discovered a hole bored in the trunk of the Caprice, allowing a shooter to lie inside to fire.

A Virginia jury convicted Muhammad of a shooting at a Manassas gas station, and Malvo was given a life term for a shooting at the Home Depot in Falls Church. Montgomery County prosecutors say their case is insurance in case Muhammad's Virginia conviction is overturned.

The two men also are suspected in earlier shootings in Maryland, Alabama, Arizona, Georgia, Louisiana and Washington state.

The composition of Montgomery County's jury may be key to whether Muhammad is convicted.

Most candidates said during jury selection that they vividly remembered the shootings and knew that he had been convicted in Virginia.

Some of the jurors selected said they thought Muhammad was guilty, but they agreed to put that opinion aside and focus on the evidence.

Technology And Easy Credit Give Identity Thieves An Edge (NYT)

By John Leland And Tom Zeller Jr.

PHOENIX — In a Scottsdale police station last December, a 23-year-old methamphetamine user showed officers a new way to steal identities.

His arrest had been unremarkable. This metropolitan area, which includes Scottsdale and Phoenix, has the highest rate of identity theft complaints in the nation, according to the Federal Trade Commission. Even members of the Scottsdale police force have had their identities stolen.

But the suspect showed officers something they had not seen before. Browsing a government Web site, he pulled up a local divorce document listing the parties' names, addresses and bank account numbers, along with scans of their signatures. With a common software program and some check stationery, the document provided all he needed to print checks in his victims' names — and it was all made available, with some fanfare, by the county recorder's office. The site had thousands of them.

The data were not as rich as some found in stolen mail or trash bins. But for law enforcement officials here, this was another turn in a cat-and-mouse game in which criminals have outpaced most efforts to stop them.

"We're trying to keep up with the technology," said Lt. Craig Chrzanowski, who runs Scottsdale's property crimes division, including a computer crimes unit started two years ago. "But they're getting a lot better."

In an economy that runs increasingly on the instantaneous flow of information and credit — aggressively promoted by banks and credit card companies despite the risks — Phoenix and its surrounding area provide a window on one of the system's unintended consequences.

According to a Federal Trade Commission survey in 2003, about 10 million Americans — 1 in 30 — had their identities stolen in the previous year, with losses to the economy of $48 billion. Subsequent surveys, by Javelin Strategy and Research, a private research company, found that the number of victims had declined to nine million last year but that the losses had risen to $56.6 billion.

In Arizona, one in six adults had their identities stolen in the last five years, about twice the national rate, according to the Javelin survey.

Arizona officials have responded with a preventive mantra: shred all documents and avoid giving Social Security numbers or bank account numbers to strangers over the telephone or the Internet. The State Legislature has passed tougher penalties for people caught stealing or trafficking in stolen identities.

But the real problem, many officials and consumer advocates say, lies elsewhere. In recent years banks have campaigned energetically to extend more credit to more people with fewer hassles, and retailers and consumers have embraced instant, near-anonymous access to credit.

Last year a group of prosecutors, law enforcement officers and security executives from banks and credit card associations met to discuss ways of curbing identity theft. The group had plenty of ideas, including PIN numbers or fingerprint verification for all credit card purchases and a ban on mailings that include blank checks.

But all ran counter to the promotional campaigns of banks and, banks say, to the desires of consumers.

"There's a disconnect between corporate leadership at financial institutions and their security departments," said Brad H. Astrowsky, a former prosecutor who was part of the group. "Marketing people are ruling the day in banking. They can do things to fix the problem, but they have no incentive and motivation to do it. Preventing something from happening is a cost. What's the benefit? It's hard to quantify."

A Hot Spot for Thieves

Several factors converge to make Arizona a hot spot for identity theft. Maricopa County, which includes Phoenix, is one of the fastest-growing counties in the nation, according to the Census Bureau, and its growth exaggerates trends that exist in many communities: a mobile population and high numbers of immigrants and retirees. It also has a heavy traffic in methamphetamine.

Methamphetamine users, whose binges keep them up for days in a row, have the time to sort through trash or old mail for Social Security numbers, bank account numbers or other identifying information, said Andrew P. Thomas, the county attorney. Dealers trade drugs for stolen identities that they use to launder their profits. Nearly half the identity theft cases in Mr. Thomas's office have a connection to methamphetamine, he said.

At the same time, he added, "More than half of the illegal immigrants entering the U.S. come through Arizona," creating a market for fraudulent Social Security numbers and driver's licenses.

Though Arizona passed the nation's first identity theft law in 1996, law officers say they are fighting a crime that is as swift and adaptive as the economy it exploits.

The newest wave of thefts here involves copying the magnetic strip from a victim's credit card onto the back of another. When thieves use the doctored cards, the transactions are charged to their victims' accounts. "Even if the cashier asks for my driver's license, the name on the front is going to match," said Todd C. Lawson, an assistant attorney general in Phoenix who specializes in identity theft prosecutions.

The machine to copy the magnetic strip, Mr. Lawson added, is the one nearly every hotel in America uses to recode room key cards.

And the county's Web site, which earned a place in the Smithsonian's permanent research collection on information technology innovation, has made Social Security numbers and other information, once viewable only by visiting the county recorder's office, accessible to anyone with an Internet connection. Police officers and prosecutors in Phoenix knew of just two cases involving public records, but most victims do not know how their identities are stolen.

For local law enforcement, pursuing even low-tech, small-time thieves is often complicated and expensive. The victim could be in Arizona, the thief in another state and the transactions spread all over the world. "If someone goes on the Internet and buys goods from Bangladesh, do you call witnesses from Bangladesh?" asked Barnett Lotstein, a special assistant county attorney.

Mr. Lawson said, "I don't think we prosecute 5 percent of it."

On a recent afternoon, Lt. Russ Skinner, who runs the county sheriff's computer crimes division, hefted three vinyl binders onto a wooden table. For the detectives in his unit, this is what the "crime of the 21st century" looks like: photographs of litter-strewn hotel rooms, and of a 33-year-old woman in various stages of methamphetamine-fueled decline.

When detectives caught up with her last August, after nearly three months of investigation, the woman was paying other users to steal mail for her — especially preapproved credit offers — and had parlayed those into credit cards or fraudulent accounts in 46 different names. She had secured housing, utilities and a series of small online loans in her victims' names.

"She wasn't the smartest or the most creative," Lieutenant Skinner said. "She just knew how to get it done."

A Connection to Drug Use

In the past, a drug user who needed money might go into a convenience store with a gun, Lieutenant Skinner said. "They're on the surveillance camera. They might get shot. They might get stopped in the parking lot for having a broken taillight," he said. "Now they can just sit at a computer, no one sees them and they can buy whatever they want."

Officials here began to notice a sharp rise in identity theft about five years ago, said Paul K. Charlton, United States attorney for the District of Arizona.

"The first tip-off was that we started to see a lot of mailbox break-ins by tweakers," Mr. Charlton said, referring to methamphetamine users.

When police officers raided home methamphetamine laboratories that were then proliferating on the outskirts of town, they found stacks of stolen mail or notebooks filled with credit card information. They also found thieves were using acetone, an ingredient used in methamphetamine production, to "wash" the ink off checks, a simple means of identity fraud.

These small laboratories lend themselves to identity theft rings, said John C. Horton, a White House aide in the Office of National Drug Control Policy. In a laboratory, one or two people typically have some technical knowledge, and others specialize in procuring materials.

Identity theft rings follow the same pattern, with a handful of grunts stealing mail for one person who knows how to turn the information into credit cards or checks, Mr. Horton said. "It doesn't seem to happen with cocaine or heroin because we don't produce heroin and cocaine in this country," he said. "Meth production is to some degree a social activity in the same way as identity theft."

Though the Arizona police have closed many laboratories, the identity theft rings have survived or multiplied.

From its commercial downtown, Phoenix extends in a patchwork of satellite communities, some so new that the highway connecting them does not appear on the maps in the central post office. In the mid-1990's, as Phoenix's population boomed, the Postal Service created cluster mailboxes that served whole housing developments. Like other conveniences associated with the city's rapid growth, the boxes have proved a boon for identity thieves.

"You can jimmy one open and get everyone's mail at the same time," said Mr. Lawson, the prosecutor. After numerous break-ins, the Postal Service has spent $12 million on reinforced mailboxes, but many communities here still have the old ones.

Some thieves drive around neighborhoods with their laptops until they find a resident's unsecured wireless Internet connection. If the police investigate a fraudulent purchase, they will trace it to the customer with the connection, not to the thief who placed the order.

Since 1994, a Phoenix security officer named Bob Hartle, frustrated by his own experience with identity theft, has led an often lonely campaign for tighter controls on organizations that handle people's data, and curbs on the way credit card companies, banks and stores grant credit.

Data breaches in the last year have exposed the personal information of more than 80 million Americans, according to the Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, a nonprofit organization that follows identity theft. On May 3, a thief stole computer disks holding the names, Social Security numbers and other information of 26.6 million veterans from the residence of a Department of Veterans Affairs employee who had taken the data home without authorization. In most states, organizations are not required to tell consumers if their identities have been compromised.

"It's the sharing of data without necessary safeguards that enables this crime to grow as it has," said Torin Monahan, an assistant professor of justice and social inquiry at Arizona State University. "The response is always 'protect yourself, go to these workshops, get a shredder.' That diverts attention away from the extent to which these are systemic problems."

Seventeen states have passed "credit freeze" laws enabling consumers to prevent banks or credit agencies from issuing new accounts in their names.

But here, as in other states, businesses have successfully opposed such legislation.

"They're fighting us tooth and nail," said Mr. Hartle, who runs ID Theft Services Inc., a nonprofit organization that provides free help for victims.

"Banks, credit card companies, retailers want to make it easy to buy," Mr. Hartle said. "They write off identity theft as a cost of doing business. So whenever legislation comes up that's going to cost them money, they throw themselves against it."

Nessa E. Feddis, senior federal counsel for the American Bankers Association, said freezing credit could create problems for consumers, especially if they needed to get a new cellphone or change residences in a hurry.

"A credit freeze is one of those things that sounds like a good idea, but people don't realize how often they need to use their credit report," Ms. Feddis said. "There's a balance between security and convenience."

She continued, "We all want fraud to go away, but we don't want to take 20 extra minutes every time we do online banking. We like buying airline tickets online, but there's a risk."

Though consumers worry about identity theft, Ms. Feddis said, banks absorb most of the losses.

Credit card companies point to new monitoring systems that have reduced loss from fraud as a percentage of overall transaction volume. At Visa, fraud accounted for 7 cents per $100 in transactions, down from 18 cents per $100 in 1990. "We could have a system reducing fraud to zero basis points, but it wouldn't meet what consumers are demanding," said Rosetta Jones, a Visa spokeswoman. "We need to deliver what consumers want in a way that is secure."

Fritz M. Elmendorf, a spokesman for the Consumer Bankers Association, described a chess match with identity criminals. For example, banks now protect prescreened credit card offers with address-matching technologies that make it harder for thieves to have cards sent to a drop address, Mr. Elmendorf said.

"There are more tools today than ever to ascertain the identity of a credit applicant," he said. "And the industry can point to a lot of things — some of which they won't talk about in detail — to validate people."

In the community of Chandler, southeast of Phoenix, Bobby Joe Harris questioned the efforts of businesses and banks to protect his identity.

Mr. Harris, 60, is a retired police chief. His wife, Judy, is a retired bank manager. Last December, Mrs. Harris was shopping at a Sam's Club store when a cashier said their membership had been canceled. When Mr. Harris tried to reactivate their membership in January, he learned that the store had issued a new credit card on their account to a woman who had said she was the couple's daughter.

"I don't have a daughter," Mr. Harris said. "I told the lady, 'I don't think so.' "

In two phone calls, possibly working with a store employee, the thief had raised the Harrises' credit limit to $10,000 from $3,500 and then to $15,000, and had run up charges of $11,093. No one had called them.

"It was only by luck that we found out," Mr. Harris said.

Seeking Protection

Though like most consumer victims the Harrises did not have to pay the bogus charges, they now pay $220 a year to LifeLock, a protective service that started last September in Phoenix.

The company's core service is simple: Whenever a bank or other business requests to look at a LifeLock subscriber's credit history, the company gets a fraud alert asking to confirm that the customer applied for credit. Federal law empowers consumers to get these alerts on their own, but they must reapply regularly to one of the three companies that issue credit reports.

Other companies offer different protections. None has had to prove that its services are effective.

When the Maricopa County recorder's office began posting records online in 1997, it was one of the first in the country to do so. Since then, legislatures in other states, including New York and Florida, have wrestled with whether — or how — to make their information available online.

A law in Florida requires that all Social Security and financial account numbers be stripped from online records by 2007, although new legislation may delay that another year.

In Phoenix, the county recorder's office posts 8,000 to 10,000 documents a day. Most are innocuous, but some, including divorce decrees and tax lien records, have sensitive information.

"I'm not insensitive to people's fear," said Helen Purcell, the county recorder. "I have the same fear. My information is out there, too." But it is far too late to start editing Social Security numbers or other data from the county Web site, she said. "We have 100 million documents out there now."

In the absence of full security, Arizonans cling to what protections they can. On a recent morning in Ventana Lakes, a development of older residents northwest of Phoenix, Lois Owen and Joan Schanks joined a small procession of neighbors to a community "shredathon" organized by the attorney general's office and AARP. Since the first shredathon last fall, residents around the state have carted 12 tons of paper to the mobile machines, in many cases supplementing the shredding they do at home.

"It's a big relief," Ms. Schanks said as she watched 20 pounds of old bank statements disappear. Yet even with the shredding, the residents here cannot begin to estimate how many people have their personal information, or how tempted any of those individuals may be to sell that information, Mr. Lawson, the prosecutor, said.

"You can take all the precautions you want," he said. "But everyone's exposed to a certain extent."

Insanity's Legal Fall From Grace (USAT)

By Jonathan Turley

USA Today, May 30, 2006

In the National Gallery of Art in Washington hangs a cherished Rembrandt titled Abraham's Sacrifice.

It is an etching of Abraham about to slay his son, Isaac, upon the orders of God, to show his faith. The scene from Genesis 22:1-12 is repeated in stained glass windows, paintings and other displays worldwide. It is also a scene being repeated in real life by demented individuals who believe that they have been given divine instructions to slay their loved ones.

In the past few months, the nation has found itself again in the middle of one of the law's greatest quagmires: how to define insanity, and when it should be a defense.

Last month, the U.S. Supreme Court heard argument in the case of Eric Michael Clark of Flagstaff, Ariz., who at 17 was suffering from paranoid schizophrenia in June 2000 when he killed a police officer whom he thought was an alien. The case might determine whether there is a constitutional basis for the insanity defense.

While Clark allegedly believed he was fighting aliens, many murder defendants in insanity cases believe they're acting on orders from a higher authority:

· In San Francisco, Lashaun Harris is on trial in the murder of her three kids, whom she allegedly threw into the frigid waters of San Francisco Bay in October. Harris believed that God wanted her children as a sacrifice, police said.

· In Houston, a new trial has been ordered for Andrea Yates, a suburban housewife who has admitted to drowning her five children — ages 7 years to six months — to save them from Satan. Despite a long and documented history of schizophrenia and postpartum depression, Yates was found sane and guilty in the first trial.

· In McKinney, Texas, Dena Schlosser was tried for a second time and found not guilty by reason of insanity (after a first jury deadlocked) in the killing of her 10-month-old daughter, Maggie, on orders from God.

· In Lamar, Colo., Rebekah Amaya was tried after telling police she killed her two kids upon orders from a spider. She was found insane.

· In Tyler, Texas, Deanna Laney was found insane after she crushed the skulls of her three children; she believed she was given instructions, like Abraham, from God.

The Hinckley precedent

These, and other recent cases, show a disturbing lack of consistency among the states on the insanity defense.

Much of this confusion can be traced to the acquittal of John Hinckley on the grounds of insanity after he wounded President Reagan and three others in 1981. It was too much for state legislators, who proceeded to drastically narrow the insanity defense.

Four states — Idaho, Kansas, Montana and Utah — have eliminated any defense that one is insane. Many states, such as Arizona, allow insanity to be used as defense only when defendants could not understand that their conduct was wrong.

Many people might know or suspect that an act is wrong but are unable to resist the impulse or stop themselves from doing the act. Indeed, they might believe that an otherwise "wrong" act is justified by divine instruction.

As for Abraham, he would have made an even worse defendant than Yates does. Abraham recounted how he was told by God, "Take your son, your only son, Isaac, whom you love, and go to the region of Moriah. Sacrifice him there as a burnt offering on one of the mountains I will tell you about."

Abraham, if he had not been stopped at the last second by an angel, would have been toast in Arizona. Genesis 22 shows Abraham displaying complete control and even subterfuge in bringing his son to the place of slaughter. Shortly before the planned killing, Abraham told his servants to hold back and allow him and Isaac to go forward alone.

Abraham took the wood for the burnt offering and placed it on his son Isaac, and he himself carried the fire and the knife. As the two of them went on together, Isaac spoke up.

"Father?"

"Yes, my son?" Abraham replied.

"The fire and wood are here," Isaac said, "but where is the lamb for the burnt offering?"

Abraham answered, "God himself will provide the lamb for the burnt offering, my son." And the two of them went on together.

Notably, in discussing the story of Abraham and Isaac, churches uniformly emphasize that, as one Internet site called rationalchristianity.net explains, "God's command to Abraham was not wrong, for God has the right to take human life and therefore had the right to command Isaac's death."

God's intervention

For defendants such as Yates, Schlosser, Laney and others, killings were compelled by the same motivation as Abraham's, albeit because of delusions of divine direction. They didn't have an angel who "called out ... from heaven, Abraham! Abraham!' ... 'Do not lay a hand on the boy.' ... 'Do not do anything to him. Now I know that you fear God."

From a defense standpoint, the angel was truly godsend. The convergence of religion, the law and insanity makes for the most difficult cases. Even so, just as religion teaches that we must obey the command of the Almighty even in killing a child, the law must recognize that troubled persons may be acting under the delusion of such orders.

When states fail to recognize the difference between a premeditated and delusional act, they commit an act every bit as immoral as disobeying the command of God.

CIVIL LAW:

Legal Help For Veterans (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

In a political twist, two conservative Republicans are trying to drum up more business for lawyers.

Sens. Larry E. Craig (Idaho) and Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) introduced a bill this month that would allow lawyers to represent veterans applying for disability pay and other benefits from the Department of Veterans Affairs.

The bill would overturn protections for veterans that date to the Civil War, when some lawyers siphoned money away from veterans while "helping" them obtain pensions, reenlistment awards or other payments. Congress put the kibosh on that by capping lawyers' fees at $5 (later upped to $10).

In 1988, Congress got rid of the fee limit when it created the Court of Appeals for Veterans Claims. But veterans may not hire a lawyer until their cases go through a lengthy administrative process to a VA appeals board, although lawyers may offer their services free.

Craig, chairman of the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee, said in a written statement that the VA bureaucracy is so onerous that denying the nation's 24 million veterans the ability to retain legal representation hurts more than it helps.

"I suppose that some would still warn that lawyers are not to be trusted, but the reality is that the laws are complex and I want veterans to have the option of hiring an attorney," he said.

Graham said in a statement that "this overdue change will significantly improve [veterans'] access to the VA and expedite just outcomes."

The idea has support on the other side of the aisle. Rep. Lane Evans (Ill.), the top Democrat on the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, and Rep. Shelley Berkley (Nev.) are sponsoring a companion bill in the House.

Richard J. Hipolit, an assistant general counsel at the VA, said the department has not taken a position on the legislation. The claims process is not adversarial, he said. "We have a duty to assist, to help the veteran develop their claim."

Indeed, veterans have not exactly been left to decode the bureaucracy all by themselves. For years, veterans service organizations have provided free assistance in applying for benefits and rectifying problems.

The American Legion, for instance, has specially trained representatives -- most of them non-lawyers -- stationed at local VA offices to assist veterans, said Steven Smithson, the organization's deputy director for claims services.

"They have access to the VA system. They are right there with the people who make the decisions," Smithson said. "Just because a person is an attorney doesn't mean they are going to be an effective representative."

Smithson said his group opposes letting lawyers in but wants the legislation to include safeguards such as fee limits and training requirements.

"Adding attorneys to the mix isn't necessarily going to fix things like staffing problems, quality of work, consistency, training deficiencies in the VA," he said. "This isn't going to make the system perfect."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Debating The Bugs Of High-Tech Voting (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

The already-cantankerous debate over high-tech voting machines, which have been installed in great numbers in recent years, is growing more intense and convoluted as primaries get underway and the midterm election nears.

A coalition of voting rights activists and prominent computer scientists argues that some of the machines are not sufficiently secure against tampering and could result in disputed elections, while voting machine vendors and many election officials say that view is exaggerated.

The latest dispute occurred several weeks ago after it was discovered at a test in Utah that someone with a reasonable knowledge of computer code could gain access to and tamper with the system software on a popular brand of voting machine manufactured by Diebold Election Systems. The developments prompted California and Pennsylvania to send urgent warnings to counties that use Diebold's touch-screen voting systems to take additional steps to secure them.

But the vastly differing assessments of the severity of the problem offered by computer scientists, Diebold and election officials made clear that four years after Congress passed a law to improve the reliability of elections, Americans still lack definitive word on whether the nation's voting machines are secure.

In California, David Jefferson, a computer scientist at Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory who consults with the state on its elections, said he was "stunned when he found out" about the vulnerability identified in the Utah test and agreed with the "frequently expressed opinion that this is the worst vulnerability that we have ever seen."

But Diebold spokesman David Bear said it was a "functionality" that company engineers had built into the voting machines so their software could be easily updated, and it only becomes an vulnerability if an unauthorized person gains unfettered access to the machine, and there are safeguards against that happening.

State officials tried to strike a middle ground. "There certainly are potential security vulnerabilities that have arisen," said Jennifer Kerns, a spokeswoman for California's secretary of state. "But you have to be realistic about it: When you're administrating elections, there's a very low risk of any" tampering.

By passing the 2002 Help America Vote Act and spending more than $2 billion to upgrade voting machines nationwide, Congress hoped to avoid this kind of exchange. HAVA was a response to the contested 2000 presidential election in Florida, which had brought the use of old punch-card voting machines into focus.

The newer technology, such as touch-screen and optical scan systems, held the promise of making voting more secure, transparent and accessible. But as the new technology was implemented, voting rights activists raised questions about whether vendors had paid enough attention to security. Activists pushed for the use of technology that still provided a paper record.

Many of the criticisms of voting technology were originally dismissed as exaggerations promulgated by partisans displeased with election results. But the criticisms have been viewed with increasing gravity as prominent computer scientists have rallied behind them. Although it has not been shown that an election was compromised by a security flaw, several elections since 2000, including in this year's primaries, have experienced problems with the technology that have delayed results.

The federal Election Assistance Commission, which was created to help states implement HAVA's wide-ranging requirements, says it is in the midst of strengthening the process of federal certification for election systems. States and localities also have their own procedures.

But voter groups have been unimpressed. They have pursued legal action to try to stop states from using the equipment, including in Arizona, California and New Mexico. Activists are also considering suits in Colorado, Florida, Missouri and Pennsylvania.

Unlike many colleagues in his field, Michael I. Shamos, a computer science professor at Carnegie Mellon University who has worked on election issues for about 20 years, has not generally been seen as a friend of the activists.

In 2004, they assailed Maryland's decision to buy Diebold touch-screen machines and asked a court to stop the state from using them. Shamos testified that with a few additional steps, the machines could be used without problem, and the court agreed.

Now, Shamos wonders. He is confident in his testimony and believes most security holes can be plugged. But he wonders whether Diebold cares enough about security and the sanctity of elections.

"There's a broader philosophical question that's been worrying me more and more lately," Shamos said. "What are these companies really doing? They don't seem to have embraced the seriousness with which people in this country take their elections. It's been kind of an adversarial thing where companies want to make profits, and they just haven't spent enough time and energy designing secure systems."

Bear says that is not true, and he repeats a frequent refrain about why the security concerns are overblown: "It's based on the premise that you have some nefarious or evil election official that's willing to commit a felony and break the law."

To which Shamos responds: "You don't want the success or failure of an election to be based on the individual."

Block The Vote (NYT)

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

In a country that spends so much time extolling the glories of democracy, it's amazing how many elected officials go out of their way to discourage voting. States are adopting rules that make it hard, and financially perilous, for nonpartisan groups to register new voters. They have adopted new rules for maintaining voter rolls that are likely to throw off many eligible voters, and they are imposing unnecessarily tough ID requirements.

Florida recently reached a new low when it actually bullied the League of Women Voters into stopping its voter registration efforts in the state. The Legislature did this by adopting a law that seems intended to scare away anyone who wants to run a voter registration drive. Since registration drives are particularly important for bringing poor people, minority groups and less educated voters into the process, the law appears to be designed to keep such people from voting.

It imposes fines of $250 for every voter registration form that a group files more than 10 days after it is collected, and $5,000 for every form that is not submitted — even if it is because of events beyond anyone's control, like a hurricane. The Florida League of Women Voters, which is suing to block the new rules, has decided it cannot afford to keep registering new voters in the state as it has done for 67 years. If a volunteer lost just 16 forms in a flood, or handed in a stack of forms a day late, the group's entire annual budget could be put at risk.

In Washington, a new law prevents people from voting if the secretary of state fails to match the information on their registration form with government databases. There are many reasons that names, Social Security numbers and other data may not match, including typing mistakes. The state is supposed to contact people whose data does not match, but the process is too tilted against voters.

Congress is considering a terrible voter ID requirement as part of the immigration reform bill. Senator Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky, introduced an amendment to require all voters to present a federally mandated photo ID. Even people who have been voting for years would need to get a new ID to vote in 2008. Millions of people without drivers' licenses, including many elderly people and city residents, might fail to do so, and be ineligible to vote. The amendment has been blocked so far, but voting-rights advocates worry that it could reappear.

These three techniques — discouraging registration drives, purging eligible voters and imposing unreasonable ID requirements — keep showing up. Colorado recently imposed criminal penalties on volunteers who slip up in registration drives. Georgia, one of several states to adopt harsh new voter ID laws, had its law struck down by a federal court.

Protecting the integrity of voting is important, but many of these rules seem motivated by a partisan desire to suppress the vote, and particular kinds of voters, rather than to make sure that those who are entitled to vote — and only those who are entitled — do so. The right to vote is fundamental, and Congress and state legislatures should not pass laws that put an unnecessary burden on it. If they do, courts should strike them down.

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

WE SAID IT three years ago and it's still disgracefully true: Maryland's treatment of juvenile offenders is one of the longest-running emergencies in state government. The sickening conditions that existed in the detention centers long before Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) denounced them during his campaign for governor still exist. Mr. Ehrlich promised to end the scandals and has talked periodically ever since about plans in the works. Yet independent monitors continue to roll out devastating reports.

Check out these comments last week by Ralph Thomas, who was the monitor from 2000 until last June, on reading the latest report from his successor, Katherine A. Perez: "It's the same thing: overcrowding, understaffing . . . health safety issues . . . child abuse . . . and continued assaults." In appropriately stinging reports, Ms. Perez described spotting a male staff member at the Thomas J.S. Waxter Children's Center in Laurel throwing punches at a girl who was acting up. She also found overcrowding, insufficient staffing and out-of-control behavior at facilities. At the Lower Eastern Shore Children's Center in Salisbury in March,

Ms. Perez made an unannounced nighttime visit and, according to the Baltimore Sun, found 31 youths crammed into a facility designed for 24, including youths sleeping in plastic "boats" used as cots in bathrooms as well as bedrooms.

So how has the Ehrlich administration reacted? Ms. Perez, appointed by the governor this year to head the independent monitoring office, came under fire from Juvenile Services Secretary Kenneth C. Montague Jr. for issuing her reports. Mr. Thomas, too, said he had been attacked for writing reports that did not sit well with officials. Edward Hopkins, a Juvenile Services spokesman, told the Sun that the governor "has been supportive of everything that we've tried to do to rebuild this system and make it better for kids."

Whatever "everything" means, the response has been pathetic. True, the system was dysfunctional and badly run under Mr. Ehrlich's predecessor, Parris N. Glendening (D). But nearly four years have elapsed and the systemic problems persist. Mr. Ehrlich's opponents should seize on this huge failure with concrete proposals to commit the necessary funds and expertise for a respectable, effective program.

ANTITRUST:

Kinder Morgan In $13bn Management Buy-out (FT)

By James Politi

Financial Times, May 30, 2006

Kinder Morgan, the Texas-based midstream energy company, on Monday night received a takeover proposal worth $13.5bn in cash from its management and a group of private equity funds including Goldman Sachs.

If a deal is struck it will be the latest - and largest - in a recent string of proposed "management buy-outs" in the US, where executives offer to take their companies private with the help of private equity firms.

This month, Aramark, the food service and equipment rental company, received a $5.8bn takeover offer led by its management, while Kerzner International, the Bahamas-based casino and leisure group, will be taken private in a $3.5bn deal led by its founders.

The consortium bidding for Kinder Morgan is offering to pay $100 a share for the company, or an 18.5 per cent premium over the company's closing share price of $84.41 on Friday. The proposal may have been driven by a belief that the company's fortunes with public investors had passed their peak. Its shares hit a high this year of $103.45.

As well as Kinder executives Richard Kinder, Mike and Bill Morgan and Fayez Sarofim, members of the consortium include the buy-out units of Goldman Sachs, the investment bank, American International Group, the insurance giant, and US private equity firms Carlyle Group and Riverstone Holdings.

The buyers would also take on about $8bn of the company's debt, bringing the total value of the proposed deal near to $22bn - or close to the $30bn Kohlberg Kravis Roberts paid for RJR Nabisco in the largest private equity deal in the late 1980s.

Kinder Morgan is one of the largest US midstream energy companies, operating natural gas and oil pipelines and terminals across North America.

The company expanded into Canada last year with the acquisition of Terasen for $3.1bn. Kinder Morgan also owns the general partnership in Kinder Morgan Energy Partners, one of the largest publicly traded pipeline limited partnerships in the US.

In a statement on Monday night, Mr Kinder, chairman and chief executive, said the takeover offer would benefit the partnership by allowing it to implement a new hedging facility for crude oil, and to acquire at an attractive price the Trans Mountain Pipeline, which connects Edmonton with Vancouver.

A deal to take Kinder Morgan private would represent the latest chapter in one of the more remarkable stories in the US energy industry. Only 15 years ago, Kinder Morgan was a small rural utility. But its assets grew rapidly through a series of acquisitions and its pipelines now serve key regional energy markets such as Chicago and Houston.

Kinder Morgan Gets Proposal To Take It Private (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman And Henny Sender

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

Top management of Kinder Morgan Inc. proposed to take the oil-and-gas pipeline company private in a $13.5 billion deal that would be the largest management-led buyout in history and one of the largest leveraged buyouts ever.

Kinder Morgan Chief Executive Richard Kinder and other executives are offering $100 a share for the Houston-based company. That's a roughly 18% premium to Friday's New York Stock Exchange closing price of $84.41 but shy of the stock's 52-week high of $103.75.

Under the proposal, Mr. Kinder and others would contribute $2.8 billion of their existing shares to the newly private company, with another $4.5 billion coming from private-equity investors Goldman Sachs Capital Partners, American International Group Inc. and the Carlyle Group and its Riverstone Holdings affiliate.

If the deal is approved, the newly private Kinder Morgan would take on a total of $14.5 billion in debt, giving the transaction a total value of about $22 billion.

The biggest private-equity deal remains Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co.'s $25 billion acquisition of RJR Nabisco Inc., completed in 1989. KKR also assumed $5.5 billion in debt as part of the transaction, which was a high-water mark in the deal-making bravado of the 1980s. A generation later, big dollars and ambitions are again reshaping the financial landscape.

The Kinder Morgan deal underscores how powerful private-equity firms have become, snapping up properties ranging from General Motors Corp.'s auto-lending arm to the film library of the MGM film studio. With Wall Street's help, they are issuing torrents of new debt, which remains relatively cheap and easy to sell to investors. Several of the largest private-equity firms have raised war chests exceeding $10 billion.

"Clearly a lot of money has moved into private-equity funds," the 61-year-old Mr. Kinder said in an interview yesterday. "It makes a transaction like this much more doable than it was before."

Mr. Kinder formed Kinder Morgan about a decade ago with roughly $40 million in assets he bought from Enron Corp., which he left in late 1996 after Kenneth Lay, then-chairman of Enron, declined to make him chief executive.

Since 1999, a series of acquisitions in the U.S. and Canada has pushed Kinder Morgan's shares up 155%, compared with a 24% gain for similar stocks tracked by data provider Baseline. Mr. Kinder's 18% stake in Kinder Morgan is valued at about $2.4 billion based on Friday's closing share price.

Mr. Kinder's success in expanding his company, which now has 43,000 miles of pipelines, terminals for distributing oil and gas and oil-sands assets in Alberta, Canada, stands in contrast to the fate of his former Enron colleague. Mr. Lay was convicted last week on several charges of fraud and conspiracy in connection with the 2001 collapse of Enron, and faces up to 45 years in jail. He plans to appeal.

Enron and Kinder Morgan took divergent paths to build their businesses. Enron initially built up its pipeline assets, but eventually embraced a business model based on trading. Kinder Morgan, by contrast, steadily added to its pipeline portfolio. Today it transports more than two million barrels of gasoline a day, can store some 70 million barrels of oil and chemicals, and handles more than 80 million tons of coal each year.

Mr. Kinder's plans to take his company private are by no means certain. The company is convening a special board committee to review the fairness of his offer, which he called a "very nice top-end-of-the-market premium." In such situations, special committees often ask for, and receive, an improved price from potential buyers as a sign that there is no sweetheart deal in place.

There is also the chance a rival bidder could emerge with a better price and potentially wrest the company away from Mr. Kinder. He acknowledged that is "always a possibility," though it is clear his big stake in the company helps lower his own overall acquisition costs while providing a potential hurdle to interlopers.

Management buyouts can be controversial. The other shareholders sometimes grow skeptical of the motives, wondering if top executives -- with their understanding of the business -- see a long-term opportunity and are trying to grab it for themselves.

Kinder Morgan is tied into three different securities. The buyout target, Kinder Morgan Inc., is generally held by institutional investors. It is the general partner of Kinder Morgan Energy Partners LP, a tax-reducing master limited partnership that attracts primarily retail investors. Kinder Morgan Management, meanwhile, is a separate limited-liability company whose only significant assets are partnership units in Kinder Morgan Energy Partners.

The most valuable of Kinder Morgan's assets is a planned $4 billion pipeline that will extend from the Rocky Mountains to Ohio, and possibly on to Pittsburgh. The pipeline, which is under construction, would be the first major one built in the U.S. since the Alaska pipeline was completed in 1977. Customers have already committed to take up the pipeline's output, lowering the risk of the project.

The private-equity investors in the proposed buyout said they also were emboldened by Kinder Morgan's practice of publicly posting its annual budget each year. "In any deal, we always ask what can go wrong," said Henry Cornell, a managing director in charge of the Americas at Goldman Sachs, who worked on the proposal. "They have proven themselves for a decade, and you take comfort because they are betting their whole ranch," added Mr. Cornell, referring to the fact that the Kinder Morgan management team would roll over their entire holdings in the going-private transaction.

Those involved describe the buyout as a deal with moderate risks and modest potential returns, because it is so expensive and requires such a large equity investment. That's in contrast to recent deals in which buyout firms have bought companies, added substantial debt, and flipped them in a matter of months.

There are some potential pitfalls, though: The main one is whether the debt markets will remain robust enough to allow the financing to be completed.

The proposal comes at a time when private-equity firms are contemplating numerous deals in sectors from media to technology to retail. "It is a benign environment," Tony James, president of the Blackstone Group, told a recent conference. "Borrowing costs are low, the interest costs are manageable, there is a lot of leverage available. You have a rising stock market at your back and a booming economy."

As a result, adds David Rubenstein, co-founder of the Carlyle Group, speaking generally, "nothing is out of favor."

Part of the reason for the frenzy is the fear that the aversion to risk that has begun to assert itself in the stock market might spread to the debt market, damping investors' enthusiasm for financing big private-equity deals. But so far, there has been little sign that the appetite for lower-quality corporate debt has diminished.

A Kinder Morgan deal would represent a success for Goldman, a unit of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., which is both a principal and adviser in the deal, at a time when it is being criticized for potential conflicts arising from such dual roles.

Other investment banks have scaled back their commitment to the private-equity business, at least partly in response to complaints from private-equity firms. But Goldman, which closed an $8.5 billion private-equity fund in April 2005, continues to operate in the big leagues, amid concerns from its chief executive that its private-equity arm is wading into takeover situations that may conflict with clients' interests.

Goldman has worked with Kinder Morgan since the company was established, looking for strategic opportunities for Mr. Kinder. Mr. Kinder called Goldman about two months ago with the idea that led to yesterday's proposal.

The proposed buyout, which requires shareholder approval, could close within three to six months.

Gas Giant Gets Offer For Buyout (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Jad Mouawad

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

A group led by Richard D. Kinder announced a buyout offer yesterday valued at $22 billion for Kinder Morgan Inc., the parent of the pipeline giant he founded in 1997.

The deal, which includes the assumption of about $8 billion in debt, would be the largest leveraged buyout since Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company bought RJR Nabisco in 1989 for $25 billion.

The offer by Mr. Kinder, a former president of Enron who was ousted after a dispute with Enron's founder, Kenneth L. Lay, is backed by a group of investors that includes Goldman Sachs, American International Group, the Carlyle Group and Riverstone Holdings. Mr. Kinder owns about 20 percent of Kinder Morgan.

Under the buyout's proposal, shareholders of Kinder Morgan would receive $100 a share in cash, an 18.5 percent premium over the $84.41 closing price of Kinder Morgan's shares on Friday.

Mr. Kinder; William Morgan, the company's co-founder; and two current directors, Fayez S. Sarofim, the billionaire financier, and Mike Morgan, William's Morgan son, will invest $2.8 billion in the transaction. The other investors will put in $4.5 billion. The group will also raise $14.5 billion to finance the rest of the deal.

After leaving Enron at the end of 1996, Richard Kinder started a pipeline business by buying some of Enron's assets and quickly expanding through a series of mergers and acquisitions.

In an interview yesterday, Mr. Kinder said he wanted to take the company private, in part because he thought that investors had "discounted" Kinder Morgan's shares, which have traded as high as $103.75 in the last year.

He blamed the share slump on plans to build a $4 billion natural gas pipeline to link the Rocky Mountain region to the Eastern markets. While calling the offer fair, he said, "Clearly I and the rest of the management team think this has very good value or we wouldn't be doing this."

But the offer is not without risk. Mr. Kinder's bid could put Kinder Morgan in play, opening it to rival offers. Late yesterday, energy investment bankers who were not involved in the deal had started calling clients to evaluate their interest in a competing bid.

A special committee of Kinder Morgan's board has been formed to evaluate the offer. Typically in management buyouts, the buyers are eventually forced to increase their offer from their original bid to fend off counteroffers.

"If someone wants to present themselves, so be it," he said. "As someone once said, 'You're for sale every day on the New York Stock Exchange.' "

After leaving Enron, Mr. Kinder became known for his use of limited partnerships — contractual arrangements giving investors a direct ownership interest in assets and redistributing most of their income each quarter to their shareholders. These partnerships bought stable assets like pipelines that generated steady cash flows and then grew through acquisitions — increasing their payout.

In 1997, when the limited partnership Kinder Morgan Energy Partners was created from the Enron assets, the general partnership had an enterprise value of $325 million, reflecting equity minus debt, and only a handful of assets. The company is now one of the largest publicly traded limited partnerships operating pipelines. According to its Web site, it now has an enterprise value of more than $13 billion.

In 1999, Mr. Kinder engineered a merger between Kinder Morgan Energy Partners and KN Energy, a gas utility in the Midwest, which ultimately created Kinder Morgan Inc. That deal was followed by a number of smaller acquisitions that expanded its holdings in storage terminals, distribution networks and other so-called midstream assets.

Kinder Morgan now operates about 43,000 miles of pipelines of natural gas, oil, petroleum products and carbon dioxide. It also runs more than 150 terminals for gasoline and other petroleum products and provides natural gas distribution service to over 1.1 million customers. Mr. Kinder receives an annual salary of one dollar and receives no bonus, options or restricted stock.

Among its larger assets, Kinder Morgan owns Plantation Pipelines, one of the nation's main transportation networks for petroleum products, carrying gasoline from refineries on the Gulf Coast to markets on the Atlantic Coast.

Bolstered by high energy prices, Kinder Morgan's latest project is to build a $4 billion, 1,300-mile natural gas pipeline linking the Rocky Mountains to markets in the East. Nicknamed the Rockies Express, the project would be one of the biggest new pipelines constructed in the United States in more than two decades.

Mittal Aims To Thwart Arcelor Deal (WSJ)

By Paul Glader, Jason Singer And Geoffrey T. Smith

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

Mittal Steel Co.'s advisers over the weekend continued to seek support among Arcelor SA investors to thwart Arcelor's proposed deal with Russia's OAO Severstal, even as a potential pact involving another Russian steelmaker underscored the consolidation wave sweeping the industry.

In the Arcelor-Severstal white-knight arrangement, Arcelor would purchase the nearly 90% stake of Severstal owned by Chief Executive Alexei Mordashov, plus all of his other steel and mining assets. Mr. Mordashov, in return, would receive Arcelor shares and purchase more with cash, ultimately giving him a 32% stake in Luxembourg-based Arcelor and hefty managerial control. The proposed merger is valued at €13 billion ($16.54 billion).

Mr. Mordashov, 40 years old, would become president of the combined company and co-leader of the board, while Guy Dollé, Arcelor's chief executive, would be CEO.

In a separate potential deal, coal-and-steel producer Evraz Group SA is in talks to sell 40% of itself to Russian tycoon Roman Abramovich, a representative for Evraz's core shareholders said yesterday. The stake is valued at roughly $3 billion by current market values. Following on the heels of Severstal's deal, the Evraz talks show Russian investors could play a key role amid a heatedly consolidating world steel industry.

"Russian producers could now end up driving the process," said Al Breach, chief strategist at Moscow investment bank Brunswick UBS. Severstal's alliance with Arcelor "confirms to the world that Russia has re-emerged as a serious economic player," he said.

Mittal adviser Goldman Sachs Group Inc. continued over the weekend to solicit Arcelor shareholders to sign a letter that would call for an extraordinary shareholders meeting to try to make the deal subject to shareholder approval. The investment bank, along with a law firm, over the weekend had yet to tally at least 20% of Arcelor shareholders, a threshold needed to convene such a meeting, according to people familiar with the matter.

The letter, addressed to Arcelor Chairman Joseph Kinsch, said Arcelor's decision to force the deal through unless shareholders vote it down -- the opposite of how companies typically seek shareholder support by making a deal subject to shareholder approval -- was unacceptable, according to a copy of the letter reviewed by The Wall Street Journal.

"Given the significance of the transaction, we would like to have the proposed Severstal combination be proposed to and approved by shareholders in a manner consistent with widely followed procedures across Europe and in accordance with best corporate governance practice," the letter reads. "Specifically, we would propose the approval procedure to consist of a two-thirds majority vote of all shares present or represented at a properly convened extraordinary general meeting of shareholders."

The proposed deal is the latest turn in a long-running drama atop the world's steel industry. Arcelor since January has been trying to repel the advances of rival Mittal, which recently launched a formal offer for the company. Arcelor's deal with Severstal will make it much harder for Mittal to seal a deal, and at least some Arcelor shareholders are expected to object strongly to it.

Wilbur Ross, the New York billionaire investor who sold his steel assets to the Mittal family in 2005 and is now a member of the Mittal board, criticized Arcelor's choice of a partner. "There are serious questions in the minds of Western institutions as to how good it is to have a Russian oligarch in charge of this company. What if [President Vladimir] Putin decides he doesn't like [Mr. Mordashov]? What happens to the company and the steel assets?" Mr. Ross said. "Of course, the oligarchs are not well known for corporate-governance concepts."

Mr. Ross and other Mittal executives said a decline Friday in Arcelor's share price and a rise in Mittal's showed the market supports its side. Yesterday in Paris, Arcelor's shares dropped 25 European cents to €32.80. In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading Friday, Mittal's American depositary receipts stood at $33.71, up $1.40. And yesterday in Amsterdam Mittal's shares rose 5%, or €1.25, to €26.25.

Peter Marcus, a partner in World Steel Dynamics, a research firm in Englewood Cliffs, N.J., said in a recent report that the merger makes sense because "the world's other leading steel mills will be more encouraged to join the race to be No. 1" while the Mittal-Arcelor combinations "would have given Mittal Steel an insurmountable lead and, as a consequence, might have dampened the 'urge to merge' enthusiasm by other steel companies." The firm has advised Severstal on the merger and would receive a fee if the merger occurs.

Other analysts and consultants disagree, suggesting Mittal might make a better partner. "Severstal is exactly the kind of company Arcelor complained about Mittal being -- a developing company, a formerly centrally controlled economy company that needs spending," said Chuck Bradford, a New York-based steel analyst with Bradford Research/Soleil.

Separately, Evraz founder and departing Chairman Alexander Abramov and his successor, Alexander Frolov, are preparing to sell as much as half of Crosland Global Ltd., the offshore holding company through which they own more than 82% of Evraz, to Millhouse Capital, the investment company of Mr. Abramovich, the Russian tycoon. Evraz is registered in Luxembourg but has most of its operations in Russia.

Millhouse, which declined to comment, hasn't signaled any intention to be a long-term investor in the steel industry.

FCC Is Set To Take Fresh Look At Media Ownership (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With Republicans in the majority at the Federal Communications Commission for the first time in 14 months, the agency is poised to begin tackling a host of contentious issues, including changes to media ownership limits.

Senate confirmation Friday of Republican Robert McDowell to fill an empty commission seat marks the beginning of a more active phase at Chairman Kevin Martin's FCC, which has been idle on several fronts while deadlocked 2-2 between Republicans and Democrats.

Mr. McDowell's arrival is likely to have an immediate impact on one issue: consideration of Time Warner Inc.'s and Comcast Corp.'s deal to split Adelphia Communications' assets. Commission Democrats had hoped to impose several conditions, including tougher Internet protections than those required of AT&T Inc. and Verizon Communications Inc. in their respective mergers last year.

Even before Mr. McDowell was confirmed, the FCC chairman had begun circulating proposals among the other commissioners to reopen two issues: media ownership limits and a requirement that cable operators carry multiple channels from local broadcasters after the transition to digital television instead of just one.

A vote to reopen the debate of media ownership limits may occur at the FCC's regularly scheduled meeting next month, agency officials said. The FCC will take a comprehensive look at what changes should be made, but the review isn't expected to be completed this year.

Even the whiff of possible FCC action has been enough to prompt a stir. Mississippi Republican Senator Trent Lott and Democratic Senator Byron Dorgan of North Dakota last week sent a letter asking Mr. Martin to have the commission address the issue of local broadcast content before acting on new media ownership rules. An FCC task force was created in 2004 to study the issue, but no report has been issued.

Meanwhile, the cable industry is gearing up to oppose Mr. Martin's must-carry proposal, which has been on broadcasters' wish-list for several years.

"The FCC has twice rejected multicasting and Congress also rejected it during the last session, so there's no evidence that it should be approved," said Brian Dietz, a spokesman for the National Cable & Telecommunications Association.

National Parks To Stay Ad-Free (WP/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

The national parks will not become a new frontier for American advertisers anytime soon.

Park Service Director Fran P. Mainella upheld tight restrictions on advertising and marketing in the parks this month when she issued new guidelines that did not include changes that would have permitted some employees to solicit donations and give donors the right to slap their names on rooms, benches and bricks.

Another change proposed last year, and recently rejected by Mainella, would have allowed the Park Service to accept alcohol and tobacco company donations for the first time.

"Some level of donor recognition, if tastefully done, is a good idea," Deputy Park Service Director Stephen P. Martin said. "Too much of it, and it can go downhill really fast."

About $100 million in donations and $150 million in entrance fees augment the taxpayer funds that support the national park system, which has an annual budget of about $2.2 billion.

Park rangers and other employees, advocacy groups and environmentalists complained that the proposals would have opened the door to an unseemly amount of commercialization. The guidelines were last set in 1998 and are supposed to be reviewed every five years.

Much of the private support for national parks is contributed through the National Park Foundation, chartered by Congress in 1967. Companies such as American Airlines Inc., Discovery Communications Inc., Eastman Kodak Co. and Ford Motor Co. have each donated $5 million or more.

Alaska The 'poster State' For Climate Concerns (USAT)

By Elizabeth Weise

USA Today, May 30, 2006

FAIRBANKS, Alaska — To the untrained eye, Bonanza Creek forest is breathtaking, a vibrant place alive with butterflies and birds, with evidence of moose and bear at every turn.

But look through forest ecologist Glenn Juday's eyes, and you see a dying landscape.

Since the 1970s, climate change has doubled the growing season in some places and raised state temperatures 6 degrees in the winter and 3.5 on average annually since 1950, says Juday, a professor at the University of Alaska-Fairbanks. Drought is stressing and killing spruce, aspen and birch trees.

Alaska has emerged as the poster state for global warming, the worldwide climate effect that many scientists attribute to higher concentrations of "greenhouse" gases — mostly carbon dioxide created by burning fossil fuels — that capture the sun's heat in the atmosphere.

Global warming is a hot topic, especially now. Former vice president Al Gore is back in the news with the release of his acclaimed documentary on warming, An Inconvenient Truth. And President Bush — who has been criticized by environmental groups that say he has been slow to acknowledge the dangers posed by warming — said last week that "people in our country are rightly concerned about greenhouse gases and the environment."

Alaska is important in measuring the effect of global warming on the USA because what happens here soon will be felt in the Lower 48 states, say experts such as Robert Corell, a senior fellow at the American Meteorological Society.

The spruce budworm, aspen leaf miner and the spruce bark beetle, pests once kept in check by winter cold, are flourishing here. Statewide, insect outbreaks have killed more than 4 million acres of forest in a decade and a half, says John Morton, a biologist at the Kenai National Wildlife Refuge in Soldotna.

Fires, long an integral part of the forest ecology here, are burning millions of acres as summers get longer and hotter, says Scott Rupp, a University of Alaska-Fairbanks professor of forestry. And with each wave of fires, trees have a harder time coming back in the increasingly warm and dry landscape.

This great northern forest may end up a grassland. "Soon, people will be coming to the great plains of Alaska," Juday says.

Alaska is ahead of the climate-change curve because polar regions warm the fastest. They had long been kept frigid by vast regions of snow and ice that reflect 70% of the sun's energy back out to space.

But higher temperatures are shrinking that snow and ice cover. In the Arctic, summer sea ice has shrunk 15% to 20% in the past 30 years, according to 2005's Arctic Climate Impact Assessment report.

And as the snow and ice recede, the sun's rays are hitting more dark ground and water, which absorb most of the heat, reflecting just 20% of the energy away, says Matthew Sturm, a research scientist with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers' Cold Regions Research and Engineering Laboratory in Fairbanks.

Lakes and ponds are disappearing as the permafrost, permanently frozen ground that underlies much of Alaska north of Fairbanks, melts.

"It's like pulling the plug in a bathtub," says Peter Schweitzer, an anthropologist who works with the Arctic peoples in Alaska and Russia.

DOJ_NMG_0030353

In some areas, as much as 40% of surface water has disappeared, taking with it vital habitat for ducks and other waterfowl, says Juday.

The permafrost that underlies much of the central and north of the state is a relic from the last Ice Age. Some of the frozen ground under Fairbanks is 100,000 years old, says Vladimir Romanovsky, a permafrost expert at Fairbanks. And now, he says, it's starting to get "slushy."

For Ruth Macchione, that meant a more expensive design to her new home after the cabin her husband built in the 1950s sank into the ground. The permafrost under the cabin thawed because the structure wasn't built to keep the ground cold — a key trick in building in frigid regions.

Her new home incorporates piers to allow cold air to circulate underneath it.

"Local engineers are getting worried about higher ground temperatures, so they're specifying more pilings to combat that," says Billy Connor, director of the Alaska University Transportation Center. That will mean higher construction costs across the state, Sturm says.

More heat means longer summers. The growing season in Fairbanks has gone from 80 to 120 days since records were first kept in the 1900s, says John Walsh, director of the Center for Global Change and Arctic System Research at the University of Alaska-Fairbanks.

But those summer days haven't come with any more rain, so plants and trees adapted to short, cool summers grow quickly but then dry out while it's still warm. That's one reason forest fires have become such a problem, he says.

Hotter summers aren't just a problem here. In the Midwest and East, a few extra degrees can bring on higher milk prices. That's because cows don't like it hot. When the mercury gets over 80 degrees, milk production drops.

"Last year, we had herds that were down 5 to 15 pounds of milk per cow, and they'll usually be making 65 to 75 pounds" a day, says Larry Chase, a professor of animal science at Cornell University in Ithaca, N.Y.

In the Midwest, the corn belt is shrinking, says S. Elwynn Taylor, a professor of agricultural meteorology at Iowa State University in Ames. Especially at the western edges in Nebraska and the Dakotas, areas that were marginal for corn and soybeans are now unable to economically grow them.

David Lobell, an environmental scientist at Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory in Livermore, Calif., says that for every 2-degree increase in growing-season temperature, farmers can expect a 17% decline in yield for both corn and soybeans.

Taylor isn't convinced that the warming isn't simply part of a larger climate pattern that has been seen in the Midwest since about 1850.

He is not alone. Other scientists see warming as part of a cyclical climate change, but they are outnumbered by colleagues who say the planet is warming steadily because human activity is adding to the greenhouse gases.

A landmark 2001 report by the United Nations' Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change forecast that the average global surface temperature will increase 2.5 to 10 degrees above 1990 levels by 2100.

In White Mountain, a village of 200 on the western coast of Alaska near Nome, stocking up the larder is harder now for Rita Buck, a native Alaska Inupiaq and health practitioner at the town clinic.

Buck's year used to be a steady flow of work. First came salmon fishing, then harvesting berries. Salmonberries, a type of raspberry, would arrive first, then blueberries, blackberries and finally cranberries. Berries make up an important part of the subsistence diet.

But now, she says, the berries are blooming too early, when frost is still a danger. "It freezes all the berry blossoms and stops them growing," she says.

Cherry growers in Michigan, the nation's primary grower of tart cherries for pies, are having much the same problem. Spring now arrives seven to 10 days earlier there than in the 1970s, but cold snaps still come when they always have.

The commonly grown cherry variety isn't cold-hardy, so once it comes out of dormancy, it has no resistance to freezing, says Jeffrey Andresen, an agricultural meteorologist with Michigan State University in East Lansing.

"In 2002, early warming brought the tart cherry crop out of dormancy, and then a two-day freeze in April resulted in an almost complete loss for the year," he says.

Growers may have to plant new, more cold-hardy varieties, which won't be cheap, Andresen says. "You can't just pick up the trees and move them somewhere else."

In Alaska, the sea ice that armors the coastline against winter storms is forming a week later than it used to, says David Atkinson, a Fairbanks professor of atmospheric science.

The state accounting office, worried about the cost of moving at-risk communities, estimates that more than 100 coastal villages potentially face danger as winter storms erode their once-protected shorelines. The open water makes for stronger storms. Some areas have lost 30 to 40 feet of beach in a single storm, Atkinson says.

Warmer winters also are creating problems for California farmers of high-value crops such as peaches, plums, nectarines, almonds, pistachios and walnuts, which need a period of cold in the winter to bloom properly.

A series of warm winters has played havoc with fruit production, says Theodore DeJong, a professor of plant science at the University of California-Davis. Farmers may have to switch out their current trees with low-chill varieties, expensive but at least a solution.

But for the trees that grow plums for prunes, that's simply not an option. It would take 10 to 20 years to develop low-chill varieties of these trees, DeJong says.

Packers already are moving some production to Chile. There could soon come a day when California, which grows 95% to 98% of all plums in the USA, is out of the business entirely.

The huge fires that have hit Alaska in the past few summers filled the air with so much smoke and ash that people in Fairbanks at times wore dust masks and doctors told asthmatic patients to leave town until the fires were out.

But it doesn't take a fire to make air unhealthy, says Paul Epstein, associate director of the Center for Health and the Global Environment at Harvard Medical School.

U.S. asthma and allergy rates are increasing in part because more carbon dioxide in the atmosphere is supercharging the production of pollen that can trigger them, he says. When carbon dioxide is doubled, ragweed stems grow 10% more but pollen increases by 60%.

“Pollen counts of 120 used to be cause for alert. We're seeing counts like 6,000 now,” Epstein says.

Warmer winters also mean insects can survive and thrive in places where the cold used to keep them in check. Lyme disease is spreading beyond the former winter confines of the tick that carries it. And West Nile virus is spreading farther because spring drought amplifies the cycle of the bird-biting mosquito, Epstein says.

Ten years of change in the Arctic region is a preview of 25 years of change in the rest of the world, says Corell of the American Meteorological Society.

But that's not to say that path is cast in stone. Even researchers such as University of New Hampshire earth science professor Cameron Wake, who tracks phenomena such as the earlier arrival of spring, see a silver lining in this cloud.

“This country is at its best when it has a grand challenge, whether it's World War II or going to the moon,” Wake says. “This is the next grand challenge.”

Songs From The Wood (NYT)

By Scott Weidensaul

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

Schuylkill Haven, Pa.

I SAT on my farmhouse's back step in the low light of dawn, watching two blackpoll warblers — slim, streaky and hyperkinetic — flit through the new leaves of the maples, which the sun turned into tiny lenses of green.

My trees were a way station for these birds, moving between their winter home in South America and their destination to the north — the boreal forest, the vast shield of spruce and aspen, of muskeg and marsh, that stretches from Newfoundland to western Alaska. Larger than even the Amazon, North America's boreal zone is one of the biggest intact ecosystems left on the planet, with 1.4 billion acres in Canada alone, most of it still in immense, interlocking tracts that make up a quarter of the earth's remaining original forest.

With its southern fringe running just across the border from northern New England and the upper Great Lakes, the boreal forest is largely unknown to most people in the United States. Its most visible product, however, is now flooding our backyards with welcome color and song. The boreal forest is the continent's matchless bird nursery: some three billion individuals of nearly 300 species breed there, from trumpeter swans to delicate warblers, migrating across the entirety of the United States to return there. In autumn, they scatter to the farthest corners of the hemisphere, leading some scientists to suggest that the boreal has a greater global impact than perhaps any other single ecosystem.

Despite centuries of logging and development, most of the boreal is still intact. But over the next decade, timber, energy and mineral development will accelerate across the region, including a natural-gas pipeline through the heart of the Mackenzie Valley in the Northwest Territories that will speed the extraction of oil from the vast tar-sand deposits beneath Alberta's boreal forests.

Because this region is so huge, though, we have a chance to get it right this time — to upend the typical approach to conservation. Instead of protecting a few patches of natural habitat, we have the opportunity to save immense, functioning ecosystems as the matrix, with islands of carefully managed development in between.

This isn't just a pipe dream. The Boreal Forest Conservation Framework, which calls for protecting fully half of Canada's forest while promoting sustainable development on the remainder, has attracted support from a remarkable array of traditional adversaries. These include territorial and provincial governments, Canadian Indian tribes, environmental groups like the World Wildlife Fund and the Nature Conservancy, and (most important) industrial giants like Suncor Energy and large paper companies like Domtar and Alberta-Pacific Forest Industries.

One reason for this unusual degree of cooperation and farsightedness is simple self-interest. In the case of the Mackenzie pipeline, cooperation may finally lay to rest legal challenges by tribes that have stalled development for more than 30 years. In other cases, American consumers are helping to drive change. Most of the wood pulp from boreal forests, for example, goes into products like tissue paper, catalogs and half the newsprint sold in the United States; Canadian logging companies are signing on to the conservation framework to avoid growing pressure from environmental groups in this country. Tembec, a $4 billion forest products enterprise that was an original signatory for the framework, has pledged to bring all 40 million acres of its timberland into compliance with the development standards set by the international Forest Stewardship Council.

Governments have also begun to recognize the economic importance of a vibrant, healthy boreal forest. A recent study found that the ecological benefits of Canada's boreal forest — including clean water, carbon sequestration and pest control by migratory birds — are worth more than $80 billion annually, two and a half times the extractive value of its resources.

But there is much the Canadian government can still do to protect this incomparable region, in addition to supporting the goals of the boreal framework. It has yet to address the heavy environmental impacts of tar-sand extraction, which range from the strip-mining of immense areas to the use of staggering quantities of fresh water. In the Northwest Territories, one of the most pressing needs is to identify (with the help of the aboriginal groups there) and preserve significant swaths of the most critical natural areas in the Mackenzie Valley before the pipeline is routed and built. The time to draw up a workable — and visionary — plan to safeguard the boreal is now.

Most Americans will never visit the boreal forest, never watch woodland caribou flow over the crest of a hill by the hundreds, never hear the howl of gray wolves echo through the conifers. But the boreal touches us every spring, as the birds it scatters to the world come back again. And if we're wise, we can ensure that it will always be so. Sitting on the porch, I realized the warblers had moved on. They were already feeling the boreal's timeless pull, tugging them north again.

Your Congress At Work (WSJ)

Not a day goes by that our elected representatives don't moan about high energy prices. But faced with an opportunity earlier this month to do something about it, they drilled another dry political hole.

A bipartisan coalition voted to maintain a ban on offshore oil and natural-gas exploration in the 85% of the Outer Continental Shelf that has been off limits since 1981. The ban extends from three miles offshore, where federal jurisdiction begins, to 200 miles, where U.S. territorial waters end. "Our coasts are too valuable to risk this," said New Jersey Democrat Frank Pallone, invoking the usual aesthetic and environmental concerns. The vote on allowing oil and gas exploration was 279 to 141, with 94 Republicans joining nearly every Democrat.

Where to begin? Katrina was the most destructive hurricane in decades, yet it caused not a spill of oil in coastal waters. As for natural gas, it doesn't spill; it's a gas. Yet a separate measure in the Interior Department appropriations bill to allow drilling only for gas was stripped out by a vote of 217 to 203, with 59 Republicans voting to maintain the ban.

As the nearby chart shows, this kind of restriction on U.S. gas exploration has a real impact on prices, and thus on American economic growth. Unlike oil, natural gas is a not a global commodity with a single world price. Unless gas can be transported by pipelines, it must be chilled into liquified form and shipped. Yet only 3% of the world's gas is currently shipped -- which means that gas prices vary based on local supply and demand. So limits on U.S. exploration directly affect U.S. natural gas prices.

Overall natural gas demand has been surging, in part because environmentalists gave it their blessing as a "clean" fuel 20 years ago. American electric utilities use 41% more natural gas than they did a decade ago, and that trend is set to continue. Former Interior Secretary Gale Norton said recently that 90% of the power plants due to come online in the next five years will be gas-fired. This is due largely to a big push to reduce carbon emissions from electricity generation. All of this will put further pressure on prices.

Natural gas is also an important feedstock in cosmetics, plastics, fertilizers and the rest of the chemical industry. That fertilizer is, in turn, used to grow the crops that the bio-mass movement wants to turn into "renewable" fuels. But 90% of the cost of fertilizer is tied to the cost of natural gas, so the U.S. fertilizer industry is moving overseas in search of cheaper raw materials; capacity is down 36% from its highs.

Meanwhile, those exploitative capitalists in Cuba are now exploring for gas in its territorial waters, some of which lie just 45 miles off American shores. But American companies cannot drill on the U.S. side of that line. Canadian companies drill for natural gas in the Canadian waters of the Great Lakes, but once again the American side is off-limits. The absurdities of our current policy go on and on.

Congressman John Peterson (R., Pa.) is sponsoring another bill to lift the moratorium on natural-gas exploration (but not oil) for waters 20 miles or more from shore. That would put any rigs safely out of sight of land. His bill already has more than 160 co-sponsors, and he hopes that removing the aesthetic objection that gas rigs ruin the ocean view will attract more votes. We wish him luck, but on the evidence so far Congress simply isn't serious about expanding American energy supplies.

Sherwood Boehlert, the moderate Republican who will retire this fall, observed on the floor of the House last week that despite polls showing conservation as the "preferred option" among Americans worried about high gas prices and oil dependency, "this Congress has not voted on a single conservation measure since gasoline hit $3 a gallon." At which point his colleagues voted (yet again) to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling in the misguided but apparently unshakable belief that a nation that uses one-quarter of the world's oil while possessing 3 percent of its reserves can drill its way to lower prices.

The legislative outlook is brighter in the Senate, which has before it the Enhanced Energy Security Act of 2006. The bill has impressive bipartisan sponsorship and incorporates the best features of an earlier (and more cumbersomely named) vehicle called the Vehicle and Fuel Choices for American Security Act. Its stated purpose is to reduce oil dependency, but the strategies and technologies it encourages would also do much to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

The bill would require the president to figure out ways to cut oil consumption by 2.5 million barrels — 12.5 percent of current use — by 2016, and cut it in half by 2031. It offers a menu of loans, direct subsidies, tax breaks and other incentives that would encourage the production of fuel-efficient cars as well as gasoline alternatives like cellulosic ethanol. It does not mandate specific improvements in fuel economy standards — a Congressional red flag — yet the goal it sets would get us to the same place.

There is also real money here — $1.8 billion for hybrid "plug-in" vehicles, for instance, $1 billion for cellulosic fuels. And while anything is possible in a Congress habituated to pork, the bill is not yet encumbered with the special favors and tax breaks for the oil and gas industry that have disfigured recent energy bills. It would, in fact, repeal some of those breaks in an effort to lessen its cost.

This is a relatively straightforward bill with big ambitions — to reduce the demand for oil, thus reducing America's contribution to global warming while enhancing its national security. President Bush, who has made so much of the dependency issue without offering legislation of his own, would do the country a great favor by getting behind it.

Drug Kingpin's Help Reduces His Sentence (DDN)

By Rob Modic

Dayton Daily News, May 27, 2006

DAYTON — Federal prosecutors were so pleased with the cooperation of a local drug kingpin that they sought a vast reduction in his sentence from the advisory guidelines for federal judges.

As a result, John Raymond "Ray-Ray" Senter was sentenced Friday to six years in prison. He's served a third of it already.

U.S. District Judge Thomas M. Rose said the federal sentencing guidelines recommended 21 years and 10 months to 26 years, 10 months.

Rose, who sealed a transcript of a closed hearing about Senter, said he "has made significant assistance."

Senter's twin, John Benjamin "Benji" Senter, will be sentenced at a later date.

The brothers were at the top of a drug conspiracy that shipped hundreds of pounds of cocaine and marijuana into the Dayton area in the 1990s, according to court documents and an investigation by the Internal Revenue Service and Drug Enforcement Administration.

Senter, 32, told Rose, "Since I was locked up, there has been a change in me. I found the Lord, and I found drugs was a big part of what I have done. Using drugs. It's been a burden to my mother and my kids and loved ones."

The sentence paled in comparison to another "top tier" defendant in the same case, Darnell "No Limit" Collier, 36, who also pleaded guilty and was sentenced to 15 years and six months in prison, the longest imposed on 10 other co-defendants. Only John Benjamin Senter awaits sentencing.

The group was indicted in March 2004 following a July 24, 2003, seizure by IRS and DEA agents of 600 pounds of marijuana at the Wilberforce residence of co-defendant Clifton "Tip Ingles" Ingles. At the time, Russ Neville, agent in charge of the DEA, said the seizure was the largest for marijuana in either Montgomery or Greene counties.

Drug Trafficking Worth 35 Years (SANEWS)

By DARRYL Q. TUCKER, THE SAGINAW NEWS

The Saginaw News (MI), May 26, 2006

BAY CITY -- A Saginaw man is headed to prison for his role in transporting cocaine to Saginaw in a drug operation that sparked a shootout and left two police officers injured and two men dead.

James R. Sylvester, 49, who has no known address, will spend the next 35 years behind federal bars for conspiring to deliver cocaine and trafficking in crack cocaine, cocaine, oxycontin, valium, vicodin and marijuana Feb. 25, 2003.

A jury convicted Sylvester of the drug charges. Jurors also found him guilty of possessing a firearm as a felon and possessing a firearm while using an illegal controlled substance.

U.S. District Judge David M. Lawson sentenced him.

"Armed drug trafficking is a path with no way out other than violence or prison," said U.S. Attorney Stephen J. Murphy.

In 2004, Saginaw County Circuit Judge Fred L. Borchard sentenced Shay S. Irwin, 32, and Anthony J. Watson, 36, to 25 to 50 years in prison for their roles in the shootout at 2207 Jerome. A jury convicted the pair of assault with intent to rob while armed, conspiring to commit that crime, conspiring to possess more than 650 grams of cocaine and possessing a firearm as a felon, plus four counts of possessing a firearm while committing a felony.

Jurors also found Watson guilty of carrying a concealed weapon and carrying a dangerous weapon with unlawful intent.

This year, a state appellate court upheld the convictions and sentences.

Saginaw Township Police Officer Michael Cohee, who was serving as a member of the Bay Area Narcotics Enforcement Team, or BAYANET, suffered a gunshot wound to the abdomen. U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Tyler Kruse suffered a bullet wound to the face. Both officers recovered.

Charles R. Aldridge and Erin D. Murrell died in the shootout.

Investigators said Watson and Irwin were involved in a plan to ambush Vicky L. Loos and her boyfriend, Jose Escobar, when the couple returned to their home with 5 kilograms of cocaine they had picked up in Los Angeles. v

Jury Finds Drug-ring Suspects Guilty (DNT)

By John Pirro

Danbury (CT) News Times, May 29, 2006

Three men, one a Danbury resident, face lengthy prison terms after being convicted of participating in what federal prosecutors called a "large scale" powdered and crack cocaine trafficking ring.

A U.S. District Court jury in Bridgeport deliberated for one day before returning guilty verdicts on Thursday against Warren Hawkins of Danbury and Jose Luis Rodriguez and Arcadio Ramirez of Brooklyn, N.Y.

Hawkins, 35, faces up to 30 years in prison, Rodriguez could be sentenced to between 10 years and life behind bars and Ramirez could draw a term of between 5 and 40 years when they are sentenced on Aug. 11.

The three men are the last of 24 people arrested by local police and federal investigators last year when they broke up an drug-selling operation that had been active in the city for several years.

The ring was headed by former Danbury resident Alex Luna, who pleaded guilty to narcotics and firearms charges in March. Luna is scheduled to be sentenced June 13.

Prosecutors said Hawkins was a street-level dealer who was overheard on a court-authorized wiretap ordering cocaine from Luna.

Rodriguez and Ramirez were among several individuals who regularly made trips between New York City and Danbury, smuggling in kilogam-sized shipments of cocaine. The drugs were usually carried in cars equipped with hidden compartments to avoid detection, authorities said.

Rodriguez was the only defendant to testify during the trial, which began on May 10. He denied any knowledge or involvement with the ring.

U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor praised the efforts of Danbury police and federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents in breaking up the ring.

"The federal penalties for cocaine and crack distribution are severe, and it is our hope that this successful operation will deter others in Danbury from attempting to follow in Mr. Luna's and his associates' footsteps."

Suspect Ordered To Substance Program (SEQCT)

By Monica Keen, Staff Writer

Sequoyah County Times, May 26, 2006

A federal judge ordered a man, who is accused along with eight others of operating a drug trafficking ring, to participate in a substance abuse program after he failed a drug test, violating a condition of his pre-trial release.

According to court minutes filed Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Muskogee, the court allowed David Nelson, 44, to remain free on bond, under the same conditions previously ordered by the court. The judge also ordered Nelson to participate in a program of inpatient or outpatient substance abuse therapy or counseling if deemed advisable by the pretrial services officer, according to court minutes.

Nelson is one of eight people named in a criminal drug conspiracy complaint, filed by an agent with the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA). Nelson was arrested May 2, along with his wife, Twila Nelson, 33, and others, including Sallisaw residents Travis E. Philpot, 28, Paul Philpot, 61, Rhonda Valdivia, 38, Samuel L. Valdivia, 43, Hoyet W. Philpot, 57, and Pamela S. Pearson, 44.

The suspects are accused of conspiring to possess a controlled substance with intent to distribute and distribution of a controlled substance. The criminal complaint alleges that the suspects were involved in a multiple-state drug ring.

The Nelsons, Pearson, and Hoyet Philpot were each released on $5,000 bonds on the day of their arrest. But according to a petition filed Monday in U.S. District Court, David Nelson violated a condition of his pre-trial release by testing positive for the presence of marijuana.

A hearing set Thursday for another suspect in the case, Pearson, was reset for 10 a.m. June 5.

Paul and Travis Philpot and Rhonda Valdivia, all of Sallisaw, were released from the Muskogee City/County Jail on bonds May 5 and were ordered to abide by a variety of stipulations, including that they have no contact with any other defendants or witnesses in the case, with the exception of each other. Travis Philpot was ordered back in jail May 8 after contacting a witness named in the case the night of his release from jail. Samuel Valdivia remains in jail without bond.

Timmy Smith Gets 30-month Sentence (DENP)

By Alicia Caldwell

Denver Post, May 27, 2006

Timmy Smith, a former Washington Redskins running back who helped beat the Broncos in Super Bowl XXII in 1988, was sentenced Friday to 30 months in federal prison for dealing cocaine.

Smith, 42, also was ordered to pay $88,000 in unpaid child support.

Chief U.S. District Judge Lewis Babcock ordered Smith, who is out on bail, to report to prison July 10.

Federal agents arrested Smith and his brother, Christopher Smith, last year after 20 ounces of cocaine worth $13,600 was handed off to an undercover agent in Greenwood Village.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents had recorded several drug deals involving the Smith brothers, according to court documents.

Smith was accused of working with his brother in selling cocaine to an informant eight times in 2005, according to a federal arrest affidavit.

In all, the Smith brothers were accused of selling nearly 1,318 grams of cocaine for a total of $31,150.

Both were charged with possession and distribution of cocaine.

But according to negotiated plea agreements, each pleaded guilty to a single drug charge and the other charges were dropped.

Earlier this month, Christopher Smith was sentenced to five years' probation for aiding and abetting in distributing cocaine.

Smith, who was working at a Denver juvenile detention facility at the time of his arrest, set an NFL record in 1988 for the most rushing yards in a Super Bowl - 204 - in Washington's 42-10 victory over the Broncos.

Timmy Smith Scolded For 'Jekyl And Hyde Lifestyle.' (RMN)

By Sue Lindsay

Rocky Mountain News, May 27, 2006

Former football star Timmy Smith heaved a huge sigh as he was sentenced to 30 months in prison Friday in a federal drug case.

The sentence came over the objections of defense attorney Harvey Steinberg who argued that Smith should be sentenced to probation as his brother, Chris Smith, was earlier this month.

Sending Timmy Smith to prison while his brother got probation is "unfair," Steinberg said.

But the government argued that Timmy Smith played a much larger role in drug deals.

Timmy Smith pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute 750 grams of cocaine in eight sales. His brother pleaded guilty to distributing an ounce of cocaine and helping Timmy Smith.

The former Washington Redskins running back, 42, was arrested Sept. 30 near the Denver Tech Center after he sold an undercover officer about 20 ounces of cocaine for $13,500.

Chris Smith, 35, was arrested after delivering cocaine to his brother.

Timmy Smith apologized, saying he had made a bad choice.

"I have made a mistake," he said. "It will never happen again. I have learned my lesson, sir. I wasn't raised that way."

He told U.S. District Judge Lewis T. Babcock he was trying to get money to help a friend hurt by Hurricane Katrina.

But Babcock rebuked Smith for selling drugs by night, making deliveries to people at health clubs, after working all day as a youth counselor at Gilliam Youth Services Center.

"You were putting that stuff out on the streets," Babcock said, shaking his head. "It's a Jekyl and Hyde lifestyle."

The judge also ordered Smith to pay $88,000 in unpaid child support. He is married and has five children.

Smith had worked for more than five years for the Colorado Department of Human Services as a correctional safety officer at Gilliam, a lockup for troubled youth in Denver. He resigned Oct. 26.

The judge ordered Smith to begin serving his prison sentence July 10.

SPORTS SHORTS (NYPOST)

By GRID: Ex-Skin Sentenced

The New York Post, May 27, 2006

Former NFL running back Timmy Smith was sentenced in federal court to 21/2 years in prison for conspiring to distribute cocaine. Smith, 42, apologized to the state of Colorado during a hearing, saying, "I have made a mistake and I wasn't raised this way."

The former Redskin was arrested last fall along with his younger brother, Christopher, after the pair sold about $20,000 worth of cocaine to undercover agents with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. Timmy Smith pleaded guilty in March to the conspiracy charge after federal prosecutors agreed to drop eight additional cocaine-trafficking counts in exchange for the guilty plea.

DENVER (AP) - Former Texas Tech football player Tim Smith, a Hobbs, N.M., product who set a Super Bowl rushing record with the Washington Redskins in 1988, was sentenced Friday to 21/2 years in federal prison for cocaine distribution.

The 42-year-old former running back also was ordered to pay $88,000 in back child support and must report to prison by July 10.

His brother, Christopher Smith, 35, was sentenced May 12 to five years of probation.

The two were indicted by a federal grand jury in October. Tim Smith pleaded guilty to cocaine distribution and Christopher Smith pleaded guilty to aiding and abetting cocaine distribution.

They were arrested Sept. 30 and charged with possession of 500 grams or more of cocaine with intent to distribute. Police said Tim Smith sold about 20 ounces of the drug to an undercover officer for $13,600.

Smith rushed for 204 yards and two touchdowns in the Redskins' 42-10 victory over the Denver Broncos in the title game. He last played in the NFL in 1990 with the Dallas Cowboys.

He lives in Denver and had worked as a detention officer at the Gilliam Youth Services Center.

Doubts Raised On Colombian Killings (BOS)

By Indira A.r. Lakshmanan, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, May 28, 2006

Police antidrug team was slain by soldiers

BOGOTÁ -- The suspicious killings last week of all 10 members of Colombia's most elite antinarcotics police team by soldiers have raised questions about the possible infiltration of the military by drug lords.

The police unit, trained by the US Drug Enforcement Administration, had smashed 15 drug rings; captured 205 traffickers, including 23 wanted for extradition to the United States; and seized nearly 4.4 tons of cocaine in the past two years, Brigadier General Oscar Naranjo, director of the judicial police, said in an interview.

The police and an informant were in the outskirts of Jamundí, a town near Cali 195 miles southwest of the capital, on Monday afternoon to investigate an alleged stash of 200 kilograms of cocaine. Witnesses interviewed by telephone said the anti narcotics team, wearing police caps and jackets, had gotten out of their vehicles when they and the informant were fatally shot at close range by a platoon of 28 soldiers.

``We're judicial police, don't shoot!'' the men yelled repeatedly, according to the witnesses. No soldiers were injured.

Army commander General Mario Montoya described the killings as a tragic case of ``friendly fire,'' saying the platoon had no advance knowledge of a police operation and was on alert for sabotage in the days before a presidential election. But investigators are heaping doubt on that explanation, and President Álvaro Uribe yesterday described the shooting as a ``massacre.''

The killings have dealt a blow to the war on drugs and further tarnished the reputation of the military. The government is already investigating the armed forces for alleged extrajudicial killings of dozens of civilians whom the military identified as rebels.

The police slayings have revived memories of a 2004 case in which soldiers killed seven police officers and four civilians on a supposed undercover drug operation. In that case, evidence including police uniforms was destroyed, the killers were absolved by military courts, and the facts were never aired, an outcome that Uribe vowed would not be repeated this time.

Military failures are understandable, the president told reporters yesterday, ``but military crimes are not.''

Uribe said he has information that he conveyed to the attorney general suggesting that the shooting was more than an error.

The president ordered that the attorney general, not military judges, handle the investigation, and offered a reward of $400,000 for information that solves the killings. The influence of narco-traffickers in the area where the officers were killed made it a particularly worrisome case, he said.

Last month, the slain police unit had busted a ring involving five retired police officers, a retired military official, and an employee of the national airline. ``They were my most effective, trustworthy, elite group, so it's a terrible loss,'' Naranjo said.

``If this was a mistake, the level of incompetence is staggering,'' Andrés Villamizar, former adviser to the minister of defense, said in an interview. ``The excessive force used is inconsistent with friendly fire.''

Villamizar said the fact that no one was held responsible for the deaths of seven officers two years ago set a terrible example. ``When you have people literally getting away with murder, events can repeat themselves.''

The killings took place in an area with properties under the control of drug kingpins. A few months ago in the same zone, five members of a ring led by Wilber Valera were killed in a confrontation with the private army of rival drug lord Diego Montoya, authorities said. Both are wanted for extradition to the United States.

Sources told El Tiempo newspaper that drug traffickers may have given false information to the military to provoke a confrontation with the anti drug police. Soldiers reportedly told investigators that they had received information that armed men in the area were planning to kidnap four Spaniards.

Initial forensics reports indicate that 145 bullets and three hand grenades were fired at the police from 50 yards away and that their three vehicles were attacked on all sides. Preliminary reports indicate the bodies of at least seven of the police may have been moved. Investigators found them face down in a ditch. The civilian informant appears to have been hit at closer range by small-arms fire.

Colonel Bayron Carvajal, commander of the military battalion whose headquarters is two hours away, was seen by witnesses in civilian clothes at the site of the shooting and was heard shouting over a walkie-talkie, ``Not one more shot!'' witnesses told El Tiempo.

His battalion has been involved in several controversial shootings since last year, including the killing of two police officers.

Vice President Francisco Santos has said he was troubled by several facts: that the shooting took place in broad daylight in an area with clear visibility; that it occurred after the police had identified themselves; and that not a single policeman survived.

Hypotheses about the killings are circulating among analysts, politicians, and the general public. One theory is that the military platoon or its bosses were in the pay of drug lords .

Sergio Berrio, administrator at a psychiatric clinic near the site of the shooting, said patients were traumatized. ``One keeps saying, `Boom boom, Police!' and covering his ears,'' Berrio said in a telephone interview.

William Darío Sicachá, mayor of Jamundí, said he could imagine that jumpy soldiers in the days before an election might have mistaken police for armed delinquents or rebels. But, he said, ``there are many questions that all of us Colombians have, right up to the president.''

IMMIGRATION:

Nation Splits 4 Ways On Illegals (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, May 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — Americans hold strong and conflicting views about immigration that underscore the difficulties Congress will face in reaching a final legislative deal on the issue, an analysis of USA TODAY polling data shows.

The public splits into separate camps over whether illegal immigrants should be able to work toward citizenship, whether they help or hurt the economy — even whether immigration is an urgent problem that must be addressed.

Those disagreements are reflected in the Senate immigration bill that passed Thursday and the House bill, passed in December, which takes a tougher approach. A conference committee will try to resolve conflicts between the two measures on the issue, President Bush's top domestic priority before Congress.

A USA TODAY breakdown of public opinion, based on Gallup polls taken in April and May, finds Americans falling into four clusters that are roughly equal in size but vary dramatically in point of view. The groups can be characterized as "hard-liners," "unconcerned," "ambivalent" and "welcoming."

"You're talking about irreconcilable groups that represent substantial parts of the population," says Roberto Suro, director of the non-partisan Pew Hispanic Center. "A compromise that 50% of the population can go for leaves half the public feeling unhappy, and very unhappy."

Among the findings in the USA TODAY analysis:

·Traditional partisanship doesn't drive views on immigration. Gender, education and family history seem to do as much to shape attitudes as political party or ideology. Significant numbers of liberals and conservatives are divided among three of the four groups. Moderates spread across all four.

In Congress, too, partisanship doesn't rule on this issue. Republicans are particularly divided: 23 Senate Republicans voted for the immigration bill, 32 voted against it.

·Those who want to take the toughest steps against illegal immigration also feel the most urgency about the subject. Two-thirds of the "hard-liners" call the issue "extremely important." No one in the most lenient group, the "unconcerned," feels that way.

The intensity of their views magnifies the clout of those most opposed to citizenship programs. "They project a loud voice," says Frank Sharry of the pro-immigrant National Immigration Forum.

"The people whose political decisions are based on a candidate's immigration stance are mainly pro-control, pro-enforcement people," says Mark Kirkorian of the Center for Immigration Studies, which supports tougher enforcement.

The "hard-liners" are also the most Republican group — one reason many House Republicans, especially those considered at risk in November's elections, may be reluctant to compromise.

·The four groups are starkly at odds on basic issues, making it difficult to see common ground. No one in the "hard-liner" group supports a proposal to allow illegal immigrants to work toward citizenship, but more than three-fourths of those in the other three groups do. The Senate bill includes such a provision; the House bill doesn't.

In two of the four groups, overwhelming majorities say removing illegal immigrants would hurt the economy. In the other two groups, solid majorities say it would help.

Jobs Could Solve Some Mexico Woes (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, May 30, 2006

Of all the ways to curb unauthorized human traffic across the USA's southern border, there's one remedy that few people are even discussing: creating more jobs in Mexico.

The Mexican economy in 2006 is expected to post its third-consecutive year of better than 3% growth, but the jobs picture isn't as bright. Each year, about 1 million Mexicans enter the labor pool. But the economy creates only a sliver of the new jobs needed for them.

It doesn't require a degree in economics to understand that if there were more well-paid jobs in Mexico, fewer Mexicans would enter the USA in search of work. Today, more than half of the roughly 500,000 unauthorized immigrants entering the USA each year are from Mexico, according to the Pew Hispanic Center.

So why doesn't the Mexican economy — more than a decade after a landmark free trade deal with the United States — produce more jobs? “Although Mexico has done all the right things at the macroeconomic level … and has integrated with the U.S., it has not done the last fundamental reforms,” says Claudio Loser, a former International Monetary Fund (IMF) official.

Despite dropping trade barriers and liberalizing its financial markets, Mexico remains economically stuck. The consensus view is that to produce an adequate number of jobs, the USA's southern neighbor requires far-reaching reforms of labor markets, investment policy, the tax code, competitiveness — almost every critical component of a world-class economy.

Mexico faces a daunting “to-do” list, but it's hardly mission impossible. Over the past generation, other countries in Latin America and elsewhere have pulled themselves from poverty to prosperity. From 1980 to 2004, both South Korea and Ireland roughly tripled per-capita incomes while Mexico saw little more than a 10% jump.

Today, just 12.8 million of the country's 43 million working-age population have jobs in the formal sector, according to the IMF. (Millions more work in off-the-books jobs with low or uncertain wages and no benefits.)

Despite widespread acknowledgment of the need for an overhaul, Mexican politics are producing gridlock not change. In 2000, when Vicente Fox was elected president, ending the ruling Institutional Revolutionary Party's 71-year lock on power, there were hopes for ambitious reforms.

But political squabbling, as Mexico adjusted to the new multiparty reality, has stalled them. So cozy state monopolies retain control of vital sectors such as electricity and telecommunications. That keeps prices sky high, which saddles the entire economy with uncompetitive costs.

Ultimately, unless job-creating reforms are implemented, the enormous disparity in living standards on opposite sides of the border will continue to draw Mexican labor into the USA.

Today, the ratio between American and Mexican incomes is roughly 6-to-1. To curb illegal immigration, Mexico doesn't have to become as rich as the USA. It just needs to close the gap and give its citizens hope of further progress. After all, Connecticut's per-capita income is almost twice that of Mississippi's. Yet plenty of people live in the Magnolia State.

Mexico's predicament, however, is growing more urgent because of the rise of China. Since joining the World Trade Organization in 2001, the Asian power has emerged as the low-cost supplier in a host of industries from furniture to toys. Mexico, after years of operating as the low bidder, suddenly finds itself priced out of many markets.

The two developing nations compete head-on in about one-half of the goods — equal to three-quarters of their total export value — that each ships to the USA, the IMF says. Manufacturing costs are almost twice as high in Mexican clothing plants as in their Chinese rivals, according to the Inter-American Development Bank. In the three years ended in 2003, Mexican textile job losses totaled 187,000.

During the NAFTA debate, Mexico's then-president Carlos Salinas said the trade deal would allow Mexico to export “tomatoes, not tomato pickers.” Yet, more than a decade later, the tomato pickers keep coming.

By the end of this decade, demographics should cool the immigration controversy. Mexico had the world's highest fertility rate in the 1960s, when the typical woman had seven children. Now, the average is down to 2.6 children.

So the annual number of people turning 15 years old will drop from a peak of about 1 million in 2003 to about 600,000 by 2010, according to Philip Martin, a professor at the University of California, Davis.

“Demography is real. There will be less migration pressure from a rapidly growing Mexican labor force in the future,” Martin says.

But unless Mexico musters the political will for comprehensive economic reforms, cross-border flows won't dry up entirely. What would be needed to really make a dent in illegal immigration?

“The economy would have to grow at double the rate it is today,” Loser says.

“It may take a generation.”

The Manicure Menace (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

LOS ANGELES

If you're fretting about immigrants stealing American jobs, I recommend going to Traci Harris for a manicure, complete with the soothing aromatic compresses. Her business is a case study of what happens to native workers when immigrants arrive.

In theory, hordes of immigrants are a problem because they can take lots of jobs and drive down wages, especially for the less-educated natives in direct competition with them.

In practice, though, that's not what economists find when they look at wages and unemployment rates in cities that attract large numbers of immigrants. Less-educated American workers in places like Los Angeles, Miami and New York don't seem to be substantially worse off than they are in cities with few immigrants.

Why not? One of the cleverest answers comes from an analysis of the nail-salon business in California. It makes an especially tidy case study because the state keeps track of all licensed manicurists, enabling economists to see what happened to American workers like Harris when tens of thousands of Vietnamese entered the business during the past two decades.

Harris owns the Salon Legohn in Leimert Park, a working-class, predominantly black neighborhood in Los Angeles. As Vietnamese salons proliferated nearby, she couldn't compete with their low prices. But she has kept her salon in business — and kept hiring Americans — by concentrating on hairstyling.

"Women want a hairdresser who speaks English," Harris says. "You don't face the same kind of competition from the Vietnamese."

Harris herself remained a manicurist, but not at her own salon. She has found more lucrative full-time jobs at beachfront hotel spas and as a freelancer on movie sets and at magazine photo shoots. Instead of competing with the Vietnamese in the neighborhood, she visits clients in Beverly Hills who pay $150 for a house call.

"If you can speak English, it's easy to find a job at an elite shop," she says. "American manicurists are a hot commodity. My clients want to have a conversation."

Harris's experience doesn't surprise Kathy Krynski of Kenyon College, one of the economists who analyzed the California manicure business. She, Maya Federman and David Harrington found that the surge in Vietnamese manicurists didn't suddenly put Americans out of work.

Some Americans gave up their licenses, but the turnover wasn't much higher than it had been before the Vietnamese arrived. The chief effect of the competition was to discourage young Americans from entering the business, so over time the number of American manicurists dwindled.

"The Vietnamese didn't so much displace Americans as gradually replace them," Krynski says. "Some Americans stayed in the business in upscale salons, and others probably went into other occupations offering higher wages, like being a hairdresser."

Some young Americans did lose the chance to become manicurists, but it's not as if every immigrant took an American's job. The study found that for every two fewer Americans in the business, there were five new Vietnamese manicurists.

Like other immigrants, Vietnamese nail-salon owners didn't simply fill existing jobs. They created more jobs that benefited American consumers. These entrepreneurs transformed the business not only with their workers but also with time-saving innovations like electric tools for shaping nails.

As a result, shop clerks in Harris's neighborhood who used to go a couple of months between manicures can now afford weekly visits to Van's Salon. I got a manicure there from Nancy Nguyen for $8, a quarter of what I paid for the cheapest manicure available from Harris at the spa at Shutters on the Beach hotel.

Nguyen couldn't compete with Harris in ambience or conversation — I barely got her to utter her name. Harris spent half an hour working on my right hand, gently using compresses infused with tangerine and peppermint as well as a hazelnut and menthol scrub. Nguyen did my left hand in 10 minutes without explaining what she was doing.

To my inexpert eye — this was my first manicure — Harris did the better job, but the nails buffed by Nguyen certainly looked better than usual. If I wanted a weekly manicure, I'd be glad to have the cheaper Vietnamese option available.

And I wouldn't worry about the economic menace of foreign manicurists. American workers have survived this immigrant invasion with their paychecks intact, and their fingernails in better shape than ever.

My History Of English-Only (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

To understand something of the current immigration debate, it might help to look at New York's Lower East Side in the early 1900s through the eyes of Henry Adams, the great-grandson of one president, grandson of another, ambassador to Britain and, toward the end of his life, winner of the Pulitzer Prize for his autobiography. All those Jews sickened him.

"God tried drowning out the world once," he wrote in a 1906 letter, "but it did no kind of good, and there are said to be 450,000 Jews now doing Kosher in New York alone. God himself owned failure."

One of those "doing Kosher" at that time was my grandfather, Rueben, a part-time garment worker and full-time no-goodnik who placed his two boys in an orphanage when his wife, Judith, died. When he came to visit, the older boy had to translate for the younger. My grandfather never spoke English, and my father never spoke anything but.

You can understand Adams's distress. The Lower East Side of Manhattan was an alien place. Its denizens spoke Yiddish. They were not Christians. They had their own newspapers and theaters and political organizations, and when they rallied for one cause or another -- and boy did they ever rally -- the calls for reform or revolution were uttered in a foreign tongue. This pot was not melting.

Now, of course, the Lower East Side is the East Village and it is cool and hip and young and expensive. The grandchildren of those who did Kosher there have scattered throughout the country, and the English their grandparents did not speak has been mastered and enriched by Bellow and Roth and Chabon and Ephron, not to mention Irving Berlin, if you are that old, or Jon Stewart, if you can stay up that late.

The current immigration fuss has engendered more sloppy thinking and rhetoric than any issue in recent times. The descendants of immigrants wax romantic, confusing legal and illegal immigration -- it's all the same. But it is not. My grandparents were legal immigrants. They came through Ellis Island, papers in hand. It was easier to do so then, but that is not the point. The point is that they broke no law and, as a consequence, sought no amnesty.

But this anxiety about the fate of English and its importance to the culture does have its antecedents, although they are not, of course, exact. The non-English-speaking immigrants of the 19th and earlier centuries could not simply get on an airplane and return to the mother country for a visit. Once they came to America, they usually stayed in America. This is not necessarily true of Spanish-speakers, who can more easily visit Mexico or another Latin American country. Still, the larger culture remains English-speaking and its pull is like an ocean tide. It may take a while, but it will get its way.

In Los Angeles, for instance, radio station KDL shifted in 2003 from Spanish to English because the Latino audience it wanted -- the young -- was increasingly bilingual and what's called "English dominant." English was cooler, hipper and younger, younger, younger. Spanish was the language of mom and dad, and nothing could be fustier -- or, in some cases, more embarrassing. The latter is why, to my regret, I peevishly ignored my Yiddish-speaking grandmother, adamantly insisting she speak English. I thought I was being very patriotic.

In New York City, the library system of a single borough, Queens, typically has the highest circulation of any in the country. That's not because the culturally ravenous Jews of myth and fact are continuing their reading habits but because of a much newer influx of Asians. Many of them read exclusively in their native language, some in two and some, sooner or later, in English only. The richness of Shakespeare's tongue, its universality in commerce and business and above all in entertainment, make it unavoidable. Few things in life are certain, but death, taxes and English certainly are.

It's reasonable, I suppose, to insist on English-sufficiency for citizenship or even for a driver's license. But the nation's so-called political conversation can be conducted in any language -- just as long as it's conducted. The Jews, the Italians, the Chinese, the Russians, the Germans and all the other ethnic groups who once lived cheek by jowl in Manhattan had a vibrant press and raised the roof with their political conversation. Now their descendants rue, as I do, the virtual loss of a tongue. Henry Adams need not have feared. I can read him but not the contemporaries he so reviled.

TAX:

Adios To A Phone Tax (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

The Spanish-American War was fought in 1898 and lasted less than eight months, but Americans still pay an excise tax on phone service that was imposed to finance it. Last week, a mere 108 years after the end of that conflict, the Bush Administration moved to terminate the levy. Its duration is something to keep in mind the next time you hear a politician call for a "temporary" tax.

Treasury Secretary John Snow said the Internal Revenue Service will no longer collect the 3% federal excise tax on long-distance phone calls and will offer refunds for the past three years. We'd like to think the Administration was acting out of principle. But the reality is that the courts -- most recently the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in a decision last month -- have forced its hand with repeated rulings that the tax on long-distance is illegal in a telecom world in which calls are no longer priced based on distance. The IRS will continue to collect the tax on local calls, but Mr. Snow to his credit did express support for the idea of Congress passing legislation to repeal the tax entirely.

That would be the best outcome, and not just because a future administration might opt to begin collecting the tax again and restart the court battles. Another argument for full repeal is that so long as the tax exists, so will the political temptation to expand its scope and turn it into yet another revenue stream for the federal till. A Joint Tax Committee report issued last year suggested extending the excise tax to "all data communication services," including cable modems, cellular and DSL Internet connections.

Like the alternative minimum tax, the federal excise tax was intended to target "the rich," who at the time were the only ones who could afford a telephone. Yet our tax code still considers phones "luxury" items today. The last time Congress came close to ending this charade was 2000, when majorities in both the House and the Senate voted for repeal, which President Clinton vetoed. The Republican Congress, which may not be Republican much longer, might consider giving it another shot before November.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

New Policy Adviser Admits Altering Text (WP)

By Zachary Goldfarb

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

Karl Zinsmeister, President Bush's new domestic policy adviser, acknowledged he did something wrong when he took a newspaper profile of himself, altered quotes and text, and then posted it on a Web site without noting the changes.

"Looking back, this is foolish," he said in a telephone interview Friday evening. Zinsmeister said he did it to correct the record while protecting a young journalist who had made mistakes.

This admission came about because on Friday morning the New York Sun's Josh Gerstein disclosed that shortly after the weekly Syracuse New Times published a profile of Zinsmeister in August 2004, Zinsmeister posted an altered copy of the profile on the Web site of the American Enterprise Institute's magazine, which he edits.

The Syracuse paper had requested to interview Zinsmeister, who lives near Syracuse, because of his writings about the Iraq war. The article quoted him saying critical things about ordinary Iraqis, Washington elites and upper-class parents. It also contained a quote questioning the Bush administration's execution of the war.

In one example, the original article attributed to Zinsmeister this quote: "People in Washington are morally repugnant, cheating, shifty human beings."

But, on the institute site, it appeared as: "I learned in Washington that there is an 'overclass' in this country stocked with cheating, shifty human beings that's just as morally repugnant as our 'underclass.' "

Zinsmeister explained the change to The Washington Post by saying he has long studied issues of class and morality and he was confident he would have used the kind of specific language in the quote on the institute site rather than the more broad description in the original article.

In other examples, he said he made changes to fix errors he believed the New Times reporter had made because of misunderstandings or truncated notes -- taken in an interview in a noisy restaurant.

Even so, Zinsmeister acknowledged, "I should have contacted the New Times to say that there were four errors in the story and they should be retracted and corrected. . . . At the time it seemed innocent."

White House press secretary Tony Snow said Friday that Zinsmeister erred in making the changes, but he was well-intentioned: "This was done not out of animosity; it was an attempt to set the record straight and he did it in an unartful way."

All of this was a surprise to the New Times reporter, Justin Park, especially because, as he told the Sun, he had received a laudatory e-mail from Zinsmeister after the profile was published.

But Zinsmeister said he avoided asking for corrections at the time because "I think I would have gotten Justin in worse trouble if I moaned about it."

He said he expects people to dig through his vast writings as he prepares to start his White House job in mid-June. "There's so much insincerity in the political discourse. I write very bluntly and I know that, and the president knew that when he picked me. That's somewhat of the bond between us," he said. "I don't have trepidation or worry that there's a huge skeleton in my closet."

Poised To Come Back To The C.I.A., A Former Official Who Has Become A Symbol (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 29 — In his old office at the Central Intelligence Agency, Stephen R. Kappes once hung a World War II-era British poster that announced, "Keep Calm and Carry On." He ignored this admonition 18 months ago, when he resigned in anger after bitter clashes with senior aides to Porter J. Goss.

But now Mr. Goss has been forced out as the agency's director, and Mr. Kappes is poised to return, with a promotion. He would become deputy director, under Gen. Michael V. Hayden, who won Senate confirmation on Friday.

A man of military bearing and a storied past, Mr. Kappes would become the first person since William E. Colby in 1973 to ascend to one of agency's top two positions from a career spent in the clandestine service. General Hayden has said that his return would be a signal that "amateur hour" is over at the C.I.A., which has seen little calm since Mr. Kappes's departure.

A no-nonsense former Marine officer who insists on addressing his elders as "sir," Mr. Kappes speaks Russian and Persian; served as the agency's station chief in Moscow and Kuwait during a quarter-century at the C.I.A.; and played a pivotal role in the secret talks with Libya that culminated in December 2003 in the agreement in which Col. Muammar el-Qadaffi agreed to give up his chemical and biological weapons program.

His appointment has not been formally announced, but intelligence officials as well as Mr. Kappes's friends say he will probably take the deputy director position.

Mr. Kappes, 54, declined to be interviewed for this article, having spent most of his professional career trying hard not to be noticed.

Veteran intelligence officials say his expected return is being celebrated within the agency, and some Democratic lawmakers have even characterized Mr. Kappes as a savior who will rescue a moribund agency.

Some critics, including Representative Peter Hoekstra, the Michigan Republican who is chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, have portrayed his return as a victory for a hidebound C.I.A. bureaucracy that resists all change. There has even been grumbling among White House officials that Mr. Kappes, the former head of the clandestine service, criticized the Bush administration and its policies after he left the agency in 2004.

People who know Mr. Kappes well reject these descriptions as simplistic.

"I would suggest that we dismiss all of the breathless characterizations of Steve Kappes either from his critics or the people trying to counter his critics," said Milton A. Bearden, who served for three decades in the C.I.A.'s clandestine service. "The simple fact is that he is a very solid choice to come to the agency at a time when it is extremely wobbly."

John E. McLaughlin, deputy director of the C.I.A. from 2000 to 2004, said Mr. Kappes would "bring a sense of leadership and professionalism to the agency's operations division."

Mr. Kappes, a Cincinnati native, joined the C.I.A. in 1981 after five years in the Marine Corps, where he once commanded a platoon of the Marines' legendary "silent drill team" in Washington that performs a tightly scripted rifle ceremony before thousands of spectators each year.

In 1988 he became the deputy chief of a secret C.I.A. station in Frankfurt, the agency's hub for collecting information about Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's government in Iran. From Frankfurt, case officers debriefed Iranian exiles and built up a network of agents inside Iran.

Mr. Kappes later transferred to the Middle East, where he served on the agency's task force before the Persian Gulf war of 1991 and re-opened the C.I.A. station in Kuwait after the war's end.

After running the C.I.A. station in Moscow in the late 1990's, Mr. Kappes returned to C.I.A. headquarters, where he ascended to the top echelon of the directorate of operations, now known as the national clandestine service.

His time at C.I.A. headquarters was marked by an occasionally stormy relationship with the lawmakers who oversee the intelligence community.

One of the biggest successes of Mr. Kappes's career came after he became the clandestine service's second-ranking official and was put in charge of coordinating the C.I.A's effort to penetrate the secret network of a Pakistani nuclear scientist, A. Q. Khan.

Dr. Khan had for years been using the black market to sell nuclear blueprints and centrifuge parts, and in October 2003, American and European authorities intercepted a freighter bound for Libya loaded with nuclear bomb-making material.

Soon afterward, Colonel Qaddafi agreed to allow American and British inspectors to tour suspected nuclear sites, and Mr. Kappes was put in charge of a team that began negotiating directly with the colonel over ending Libya's programs for unconventional weapons.

Former intelligence officials said Mr. Kappes was given the assignment because he had both the background and the temperament for the delicate negotiations with a longtime American adversary.

"You don't send just anyone to do this," Mr. McLaughlin said. "It was an enormously difficult, complicated and high-stakes mission."

After several rounds of talks led by Mr. Kappes, the Bush administration was able to announce in December 2003 that Libya had agreed to abandon the programs.

Yet Mr. Kappes's career track veered off course in late 2004, when Mr. Goss and many of his top aides came to the C.I.A.

The incident that directly led to his resignation occurred in November 2004, shortly after Mr. Goss took over at the agency. Patrick Murray, who was Mr. Goss's chief of staff, ordered Mr. Kappes to fire his deputy, Michael Sulick, after Mr. Sulick had a testy exchange with Mr. Murray.

Mr. Kappes, who at the time was in charge of the C.I.A.'s clandestine service, refused and chose to resign instead.

After leaving the agency, he became an executive vice president at ArmorGroup, a private security firm based in London.

DOJ_NMG_0030367

Those who know Mr. Kappes say he bears no grudges for the circumstances of his departure. But while many inside the agency are eagerly awaiting Mr. Kappes's return, his reputation as a taskmaster who does not suffer fools gladly has some bracing for what could lie ahead.

"The really good people are happy he's coming back," said a former top C.I.A. official, speaking on condition of anonymity because Mr. Kappes's return has not yet been made official. "The ones who are scared of him should be scared of him."

Justices' Heaviest Lifting Is Ahead (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, May 30, 2006

As the Supreme Court term ends, weighty issues will test Roberts' consensus-finding skills.

WASHINGTON — As the Supreme Court heads into the final month of its term, the new chief justice has shown a knack for finding ways to decide cases on narrow issues that have led to unanimous rulings.

But June is rarely the time for harmony and unanimity at the high court.

The justices tend to put off the most difficult cases to the end of the term, and this one is no different. The court faces major decisions on terrorism tribunals, wetlands protection, lethal injection, domestic violence prosecutions and campaign finance limits.

The final cases could test whether Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. can extend his record through his first term on the court, which he acknowledged could be a challenge in a recent talk to Maryland judges.

"I do feel at this point a bit like the fellow who jumped off the Empire State Building, passed the 50th floor and said, 'So far, so good,' " he joked. "The hard part's coming up."

In all, 37 cases remain to be decided by the end of June. Unlike in years past, however, the justices will not face end-of-term decisions on issues that typically divide the court along ideological lines, such as religion, affirmative action, abortion and gay rights.

In one highly anticipated case, the court could deal a rebuke to President Bush and the Defense Department for their plans to put some prisoners at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba on trial for war crimes in special military courts.

Defense lawyers and civil libertarians say the military courts have not set fair rules and do not adhere to international standards for war crimes trials.

That decision, however, will not bear the imprint of the new chief justice. He is sitting out the case because he heard it when he was on the U.S. Court of Appeals and ruled in favor of the administration's position.

Meanwhile, property rights advocates hope Roberts and the court will sharply cut back on the reach of the federal law that protects wetlands and streams by deciding that it applies only to "navigable" waters.

The Clean Water Act seeks to protect the nation's rivers, bays and lakes from pollution. Since the 1970s, environmental regulators have cited it to stop the dredging of wetlands and the flow of tainted drainage into small streams because the pollution will end up in lakes and bays.

The Bush administration has linked up with environmentalists to protect the broad reach of federal anti-pollution law.

And the court could make it far harder to prosecute domestic violence. Because victims are often afraid to testify in court, prosecutors commonly use their tape-recorded calls to 911.

Justice Antonin Scalia, however, has said defendants have a right to confront their accusers face-to-face in court, and he may persuade a majority to halt prosecutions based on out-of-court statements.

Most of the remaining cases will not change the law in a significant way, and many may be resolved on narrow issues.

For example, the justices in January stopped Florida's planned execution of Clarence Hill, the murderer of a police officer whose many appeals were rejected. His defense lawyer said he was not challenging Hill's conviction or death sentence, but the method of execution.

Challenges to lethal injection have been filed in many states, including California. U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel in San Jose has scheduled a hearing in September on whether the state must change its lethal injection procedures.

Some doctors say the drugs commonly used in lethal injections may, if wrongly administered, cause excruciating pain.

But the Supreme Court justices might decide only a procedural question: Can a state inmate win a new hearing in federal court after his final appeals have been rejected? If the justices do so, the court will put off for another day the ultimate question of whether such injections amount to cruel and unusual punishment.

Roberts has established that he intends to steer his court toward such narrow rulings.

This month, the court decided eight cases, and all were unanimous. Sometimes, however, the ruling skirted the most difficult issue.

For example, an Ohio case tested whether states could give special tax breaks to lure big corporations to build new factories there. A lower court, siding with some disgruntled taxpayers, said the tax breaks were unconstitutional.

Roberts, writing for the court in DaimlerChrysler Corp. vs. Cuno, threw out the lawsuit on the grounds that the taxpayers did not have standing in federal court to challenge the state's policy. The decision sent the case back to a state court to start again.

In January, the court even managed to resolve an abortion case with a narrow, unanimous ruling. The justices revived a New Hampshire law that required doctors to notify the parents of girls under age 18 two days before they performed an abortion, but the justices also said there must be an exception for medical emergencies.

The chief justice recently explained to Georgetown law school graduates his desire to press for narrow rulings over broad pronouncements. "If it is not necessary to decide more to a case," he said, "then in my view it is necessary not to decide more to a case."

Here are 10 of the most important questions the Supreme Court will confront in June, the last month of its term.

War on terrorism

Can the Bush administration try detainees at Guantanamo Bay in special military courts? This is a clash between Bush's claim of war powers and Geneva Convention rules. (Hamdan vs. Rumsfeld)

Texas redistricting

Can Texas redraw its electoral districts in mid-decade to give the Republican Party more seats in Congress? At issue is a redistricting plan engineered by former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. Such plans are usually drawn only once a decade based on the census. (League of United Latin American Citizens vs. Perry)

Campaign spending

Can Vermont strictly limit how much state candidates spend on campaigns? The state is challenging the 1976 Supreme Court ruling Buckley vs. Valeo, which said federal candidates had a free-speech right to spend as much as they wanted. (Randall vs. Sorrell)

Whistle-blowers

Does the 1st Amendment protect government whistle-blowers from being punished for reporting wrongdoing? This case arose when a Los Angeles deputy sheriff alleged he was moved to a less desirable job for reporting misconduct by the police. The outcome could affect the rights of 21 million public employees. (Garcetti vs. Ceballos)

Domestic violence

Can the government prosecute domestic assaults based not on courtroom testimony of the alleged victim but on taped 911 calls? A ban on such evidence would make it much harder for prosecutors to pursue cases when the victim can't or won't testify. (Davis vs. Washington and Hammon vs. Indiana)

Wetlands

Does the Clean Water Act protect inland streams and wetlands, or is this federal anti-pollution measure limited to navigable rivers, lakes and bays? If a Michigan developer prevails, it would greatly limit the reach of a key environmental law. (Rapanos vs. United States)

Lethal injections

Can death row inmates file a last-minute appeal after losing all previous appeals to challenge the method of execution as cruel? Lawyers for a Florida murderer won a stay on the day their client faced execution, citing studies that suggested a drug used in executions may mask an inmate's pain. (Hill vs. McDonough)

DNA

Can a death row inmate win a new trial after showing that new DNA analysis refutes some of the evidence against him? Paul House was sentenced to death for the rape and murder of a neighbor, but DNA tests showed he did not have sex with her. (House vs. Bell)

Foreign felons

Do foreign prisoners in the United States have a right to reopen their cases if they and their consulates were not informed of their rights at the time of their arrest? The World Court ruled that the Vienna Convention gives legal rights to Mexican natives imprisoned in the United States. (Sanchez-Llamas vs. Oregon)

Retaliation

Can an employer be forced to pay damages for transferring a worker to a lesser job after she has filed a complaint of sexual harassment? Employers say retaliation claims, such as this one involving a woman who was removed from her job as a forklift operator, are the fastest-growing kind of discrimination cases. (Burlington Northern vs. White)

Senate Leader Took Free Boxing Tickets (AP-Y2)

By John Solomon
AP2, May 29, 2006

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid accepted free ringside tickets from the Nevada Athletic Commission to three professional boxing matches while that state agency was trying to influence him on federal regulation of boxing.

Reid, D-Nev., took the free seats for Las Vegas fights between 2003 and 2005 as he was pressing legislation to increase government oversight of the sport, including the creation of a federal boxing commission that Nevada's agency feared might usurp its authority.

He defended the gifts, saying they would never influence his position on the bill and was simply trying to learn how his legislation might affect an important home state industry. "Anyone from Nevada would say I'm glad he is there taking care of the state's No. 1 businesses," he told The Associated Press.

"I love the fights anyways, so it wasn't like being punished," added the senator, a former boxer and boxing judge.

Senate ethics rules generally allow lawmakers to accept gifts from federal, state or local governments, but specifically warn against taking such gifts — particularly on multiple occasions — when they might be connected to efforts to influence official actions.

"Senators and Senate staff should be wary of accepting any gift where it appears that the gift is motivated by a desire to reward, influence, or elicit favorable official action," the Senate ethics manual states. It cites the 1990s example of an Oregon lawmaker who took gifts for personal use from a South Carolina state university and its president while that school was trying to influence his official actions.

"Repeatedly taking gifts which the Gifts Rule otherwise permits to be accepted may, nonetheless, reflect discredit upon the institution, and should be avoided," the manual states.

Several ethics experts said Reid should have paid for the tickets, which were close to the ring and worth between several hundred and several thousand dollars each, to avoid the appearance he was being influenced by gifts.

Two senators who joined Reid for fights with the complimentary tickets took markedly differently steps.

Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., insisted on paying $1,400 for the tickets he shared with Reid for a 2004 championship fight. Sen. John Ensign (news, bio, voting record), R-Nev., accepted free tickets to another fight with Reid but already had recused himself from Reid's federal boxing legislation because his father was an executive for a Las Vegas hotel that hosts fights.

In an interview Thursday in his Capitol office, Reid broadly defended his decisions to accept the tickets and to take several actions benefiting disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff's clients and partners as they donated to him.

"I'm not Goodie two shoes. I just feel these events are nothing I did wrong," Reid said.

Reid had separate meetings in June 2003 in his Senate offices with two Abramoff tribal clients and Edward Ayoob, a former staffer who went to work lobbying with Abramoff.

The meetings occurred over a five-day span in which Ayoob also threw a fundraiser for Reid at the firm where Ayoob and Abramoff worked that netted numerous donations from Abramoff's partners, firm and clients.

Reid said he viewed the two official meetings and the fundraiser as a single event. "I think it all was one, the way I look at it," he said.

One of the tribes, the Saginaw Chippewa of Michigan, donated $9,000 to Reid at the fundraiser and the next morning met briefly with Reid and Ayoob at Reid's office to discuss federal programs. Reid and the tribal chairman posed for a picture.

Five days earlier, Reid met with Ayoob and the Sac & Fox tribe of Iowa for about 15 minutes to discuss at least two legislative requests. Reid's office said the senator never acted on those requests.

A few months after the fundraiser, Reid did sponsor a spending bill that targeted $100,000 to another Abramoff tribe, the Chitimacha of Louisiana, to pay for a soil erosion study Ayoob was lobbying for. Reid said he sponsored the provision because Louisiana lawmakers sent him a letter requesting it.

Abramoff, a Republican lobbyist, has pleaded guilty in a widespread corruption probe of Capitol Hill. Reid used that conviction earlier this year to accuse Republicans of fostering a culture of corruption inside Congress.

AP recently reported that Reid also wrote at least four letters favorable to Abramoff's tribal clients around the time Reid collected donations from those clients and Abramoff's partners. Reid has declined to return the donations, unlike other lawmakers, saying his letters were consistent with his beliefs.

Senate ethics rules require senators to avoid even the appearance that any official meetings or actions they took were in any way connected with political donations.

Reid broadly defended his actions, stating he would never change his position because of donations, free tickets or a request from a former-staffer-turned-lobbyist.

"People who deal with me and have over the years know that I am an advocate for what I believe in. I always try to do it fair, never take advantage of people on purpose," he said.

Asked if he would have done anything differently, the Senate Democratic leader said his only concern was "the willingness of the press ... to take these instances and try to make a big deal out of them."

Several ethics experts said they believed Reid should have paid for the boxing tickets to avoid violating Senate ethics rules.

Bernadette Sargeant, a former House ethics lawyer, said the Senate would have to examine the specific facts to determine whether Reid violated the gift ban. She said the clearer ethics issue involved Reid's obligation to avoid the appearance that the free tickets and his official duties were connected.

"From what you are describing, it is such a huge risk that a reasonable person with all the relevant facts would say this creates the appearance of impropriety," she said. "The more cautious thing, the more prudent thing would be to either pay the tickets or fair market value or not accept the tickets in the first place."

Andrew Herman, a Washington lawyer who frequently works with Congress, agreed. "I think it is pretty clear what Sen. McCain did in the current atmosphere in Washington was certainly the more prudent thing."

"I think if you are receiving anything of value from anyone that has matters before the federal government and matters under your purview that you have to be very careful with your conduct," Herman said.

Attorney Marc Elias, who has represented Democrats in ethics cases and was asked by Reid's office to call AP, said he believed Reid should not be penalized for trying to help his state. "There are varying degrees of gift givers," Elias said. "There is a difference between a gift from a state entity and a gift from a savings & loan."

Marc Ratner, executive director of the Nevada Athletic Commission when Reid took the free tickets, said one of his desires was to convince Reid and McCain that there was no need for the federal government to usurp the state commission's authority. At the time, McCain and Reid were pushing legislation to create a federal boxing commission.

"I invited him because I was talking with his staff" about the legislation, Ratner said. "This was a chance for all of my commissioners, who are politically appointed, to interact with them. It was important for them to see how we in Nevada did things.

"I am a states rights activist and I didn't want any federal bill that would take away our state rights to regulate fights," he said, adding that he hoped McCain and Reid, at the very least, would be persuaded to model any federal commission after Nevada's body.

Reid said he remembered talking to Ratner briefly at the fights and knew Ratner was working with his Senate staff on the federal legislation.

McCain's office said the Arizona senator felt an obligation to pay for the ringside tickets he got from the Nevada commission to attend the Oscar De La Hoya-Bernard Hopkins championship match in September 2004.

"Sen. McCain has always paid for his own tickets to boxing matches and sees no reason to change that," aide Mark Salter said.

Ensign's office said he attended one fight in the last couple of years with Reid and accepted the free tickets from the commission. But his office said Ensign already had removed himself from the boxing legislation that would have affected the Nevada commission.

"He did not have anything to do with it because at the time he recused himself," Ensign spokesman Jack Finn said of the legislation.

Kathleen Clark, a Washington University of St. Louis congressional ethics expert, said Congress should re-examine the exemption allowing gifts by state and federal and local governments because they too can have interest in influencing federal lawmakers like Reid.

"I think he would want to be above approach even when it's from a state commission and not a private lobbyist," Clark said. "I don't think we should make any assumption about a government. The fact is government agencies can act as proxies for different interests. Here it happens to be the Nevada boxing commission, and I would guess it is aligned with certain industry groups."

Reid Accepted Free Boxing Tickets While A Related Bill Was Pending (WP)

Reid Sat Ringside In Vegas For Free (WT/AP)

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid accepted free ringside tickets from the Nevada Athletic Commission to three professional boxing matches while that state agency was trying to influence him on federal regulation of boxing.

Mr. Reid, Nevada Democrat, took the free seats for Las Vegas fights from 2003 to 2005 as he was pressing legislation to increase government oversight of the sport, including the creation of a federal boxing commission that Nevada's agency feared might usurp its authority.

Dem Leader Reid Took Free Boxing Tickets (USAT)

USA Today, May 30, 2006

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., accepted free ringside tickets from the Nevada Athletic Commission to three professional boxing matches while that agency was trying to influence him on federal regulation of boxing, the Associated Press reported. The tickets were worth several hundred to several thousand dollars each.

Finding himself under attack from both the right and left, Sen. Lincoln Chafee, R-R.I., is putting $280,000 into television ads to defend his seat. Conservative Republicans, citing Chafee's votes against the war in Iraq, President Bush's tax cuts and Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito have been gravitating to his primary challenger, Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey.

The Club for Growth, which has raised thousands of dollars for Laffey's campaign, is running ads on cable TV that criticize Chafee for voting against the president's tax cuts and supporting unspecified increases in government spending.

Chafee's ads present him as a financial conservative and attack Laffey for raising taxes and increasing government spending.

On the Democratic side, former state attorney general Sheldon Whitehouse is spending more than $180,000 on ads, promising to bring home the troops, lower drug costs and protect Social Security. Whitehouse leads in the polls against his Democratic primary rival, businessman Carl Sheeler.

Spending Bill Includes Pay Increases For Civil Service, Military (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Federal employees would receive a 2.7 percent pay raise next year under a provision included in a fiscal 2007 spending bill.

The provision reaffirms a tradition of providing "pay parity" increases to the civil service and the military, and the policy decision is rarely changed by the House or Senate after being accepted by leaders of the House Appropriations Committee.

The 2007 raise was wrapped into a $67.8 billion appropriations bill for the departments of Transportation, Treasury, and Housing and Urban Development by Rep. Joe Knollenberg (R-Mich.), chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee overseeing the departments. The bill, approved by the subcommittee on a voice vote Thursday night, typically includes a series of government-wide provisions, including the pay raise.

President Bush had recommended a 2.2 percent pay raise for the civil service and the military in his fiscal 2007 budget. But the House, on May 11, approved a 2.7 percent raise for the military as part of next year's defense authorization bill, and congressional aides said the transportation-treasury subcommittee decided to provide an equal increase for the civil service.

Reps. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) and James P. Moran (D-Va.), members of the Appropriations Committee, had planned to offer a pay parity amendment. Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, also had urged Knollenberg and Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, to support a higher federal raise.

But the amendment became unnecessary when Knollenberg presented his draft of the bill. There was no discussion on the pay proposal before the voice vote, an aide said.

The Bush administration has opposed across-the-board raises for government personnel, contending that the president's recommendation is adequate and will support hiring objectives for the military and the civil service.

Advocates for parity in pay adjustments have said that civil service and military personnel serve side by side in the Defense Department and point to civilians in the Homeland Security, State and Justice departments and the CIA as essential to the support of the armed forces in the fight against terrorism.

The House Appropriations Committee will take up the spending bill on June 6, aides said.

Colleen M. Kelley , president of the National Treasury Employees Union, called the subcommittee's decision "a giant step. This is very good news." She praised the panel for showing "bipartisan support and recognition that a 2.2 percent raise is inadequate."Retirement Upgrade

The Office of Personnel Management has awarded a contract to Accenture to develop business and technology models for the agency's transition to an electronic retirement system.

The contract, announced Friday, is part of a larger effort by OPM to more quickly calculate pension payments for federal employees who are retiring. The current process requires a search to find personnel files and other paperwork, often creating delays. Most retirees, as a result, are put on interim, partial retirement pay while a final annuity is calculated.

Accenture, a consulting and technology services company, will help OPM reorganize its staffing, training and processes for handling retirement claims under a contract that carries a maximum value of $40 million and that will run no longer than four years, an OPM official said. Accenture will be paid as task orders are issued, the official said.

The contract is the second awarded by OPM to upgrade retirement claims processing. On May 3, the agency announced a 10-year, $290 million contract with Hewitt Associates, an outsourcing and consulting firm, to build the new, electronic benefits-delivery and tracking system.

Funding for the retirement project, however, may be in jeopardy. The House Appropriations transportation-treasury subcommittee that oversees OPM has removed funding for the project in fiscal 2007. The administration had asked for $26.7 million next year.

In a letter to Congress, OPM Director Linda M. Springer warned that the retirement project "will be halted without adequate funding" next year. An OPM official said the agency hopes to win support for the project when Congress returns after the holiday recess.

U.S. Foreign-Investment Debate Goes Global (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

As Congress debates legislation to tighten rules on foreign investment in the U.S., the most important audience may be abroad.

Any restrictions lawmakers impose on such deals could boomerang against the U.S., spurring action by nations anxious to impose their own limits. To date, the debate in Congress has focused on whether the proposed changes would impede the flow of capital into the country, endangering U.S. jobs and curbing economic expansion. A deeper danger is the legislation might feed retaliation abroad, tightening cross-border investment flows and damping the business climate for U.S. companies operating internationally.

"Anything we do, it reverberates," says Dave McCurdy, president of the Electronics Industries Alliance, a high-tech trade group in Arlington, Va., whose members include Motorola Inc., International Business Machines Corp. and BAE Systems PLC. A former Oklahoma congressman active in trade issues, Mr. McCurdy warns that China -- where the U.S. is pushing to loosen domestic restrictions on foreign investment -- is particularly watchful of what is happening on Capitol Hill.

Other nations are paying attention, too. In Russia, aides to President Vladimir Putin are working on legislation that would impose controls on foreign investors in "strategic industries," joining France and other nations in Europe that have embraced "economic patriotism." In Mexico, opening the oil sector further to foreign investors is a presidential campaign issue. And echoing the fight here over a Dubai company's bid to operate several U.S. ports, members of the Canadian Parliament are considering proposals to widen the government's authority to block investments on national-security grounds.

On Capitol Hill, senior members of the House and Senate are pushing rival bills that would make substantial changes in the Committee for Foreign Investment in the United States, of CFIUS, the panel that reviews the security implications of foreign-led transactions. The bills would subject deals involving government-controlled entities to an extended 45-day investigation -- beyond the 30-day review that applies to all deals. The measures would raise accountability within the government for final decisions, requiring cabinet-rank sign-off on scores of deals handled at lower levels.

The CFIUS panel is led by Treasury, but the departments of State, Homeland Security and Defense all have a seat at the table, as do several offices from within the White House.

Both chambers of Congress, moreover, share the goal of enhancing disclosure to lawmakers of CFIUS actions. The Senate, by far, draws a tougher line, requiring notification to Congress once reviews are initiated -- a mandate that would expose CFIUS deliberations to political influence. The House simply requires notification once reviews are completed. Further sharpening differences, the Senate bill would require the administration to create a ranking of countries based on compliance with weapons-control deals. Those rankings would guide CFIUS decisions. Also, a measure pushed by House Armed Services Chairman Duncan Hunter (R., Calif.), would bar foreigners from holding critical infrastructure, including roads and bridges and ports.

The legislation began amid concerns raised over Dubai Ports World, a firm controlled by the Persian Gulf emirate. The furor over DP World, which tried to gain control of commercial operations at five U.S. ports, highlighted public unease with the nation's security after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, and underscored an increasing economic nationalism among the public and many U.S. lawmakers.

"We live in an age of nascent protectionism," says Ohio Republican Mike Oxley, chairman of the House Financial Services Committee.

The Trans-Atlantic Business Dialogue, a group of business executives from Europe and the U.S., warns lawmakers to proceed cautiously. The group says legislation on Capitol Hill "greatly complicates" efforts by global-minded companies to resist calls abroad for new limits on foreign competition and investment.

The Bush administration, after losing control of the Dubai debate, is trying to referee an end to the sparring. Aides to President Bush stress the need to embrace policies that meet national-security demands post-Sept. 11, while ensuring the U.S. supports investment -- at home and abroad. From 1985-2004, foreign investment in U.S. hard assets, such as buildings and factories, as opposed to stocks and bonds, soared to $1.47 trillion from $184.6 billion. U.S. foreign direct investment abroad ballooned during the same period, reaching more than $2 trillion.

The flow of capital dramatizes the integration of the world economy that took place in the 1990s, and preserving the capital flow is a Bush priority. But the administration worries that even the House bill -- the more moderate of the measures moving through Congress -- may go too far.

"There's no question that countries around the world are watching this very carefully," says Clay Lowery, Treasury's assistant secretary of international affairs. "It is a concern to us."

Andrew Somers, president of the American Chamber of Commerce in Russia, is working to make sure U.S. lawmakers know their actions are being monitored abroad. Analysis: Democrats Wary Of November Vote (AP-Y2)

By Ron Fournier

AP2, May 29, 2006

Republicans are three steps from a November shellacking — each a grim possibility if habitually divided Democrats get their acts together.

First step: Voters must focus on the national landscape on Nov. 7 rather than local issues and personalities that usually dominate midterm elections.

That would sting Republicans, who trail badly in national polls.

Second step: Voters must be so angry at Washington and politics in general that an anti-incumbent, throw-the-bums-out mentality sweeps the nation.

That would wound Republicans, the majority party.

Third step: Americans must view the elections as a referendum on President Bush and the GOP-led Congress, siding with Democrats in a symbolic vote against the Iraq war, rising gas prices, economic insecurity and the nagging sense that the nation is on the wrong track.

That would destroy Republicans, sweeping them from power in one or both chambers and making Bush a lame duck.

Less than six months out, most Democratic and Republican strategists say the first two elements are in place for now — a national, anti-incumbent mind-set — and all signs point to the third.

Still, many Democrats worry that their party has not closed the deal.

"The fear I have as a Democrat is that if we are making this solely a referendum on the Republicans, we are not giving people a reason to turn out," said Democratic strategist Chris Lehane of California.

"Having said that, I think all these other elements are so bad for the Republicans that 'Had enough?' should be enough."

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean and the party's congressional leaders have clashed over money and the DNC's push for a unified message that draws a stark contrast with the GOP.

Inside the DNC, some officials point to internal polls that show voters holding both the Democratic and Republican parties in equally low esteem.

The fact that most voters, when forced to choose, tell pollsters they want Democrats rather than Republicans to control Congress is not a sign of strength, these officials say. Rather, it's evidence that voters are simply giving Democrats a chance to win them over — a chance that can be blown unless Democrats stand for something other than attacking Bush, these officials said.

Sen. Chuck Schumer of New York, the head of the Democratic Senate Campaign Committee, agreed that Democrats have not sealed the deal.

"I think if the election were held today, there is a 50-50 chance of taking the House and the Senate and a very high percentage of gaining a significant number of seats," Schumer said.

"But things change."

Democrats outside Congress will be disappointed with anything less than major triumphs.

"Shame on us if we don't have a good election cycle," said Jill Alper, a Democratic strategist from Michigan.

Back to those three steps.

NATIONAL ELECTION: Among the two dozen Republican and Democratic strategists interviewed in the last two weeks, there was unanimity that the fall campaigns will be national in scope. Voters will give local issues less attention than normal, a bad sign for the GOP.

"If we keep it local we win; if they nationalize issues, they win," said Michigan Republican Party Chairman Saul Anuzis.

Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, head of the GOP Senate committee, seemed resigned to a national campaign. "Obviously, we're going to do everything we can here at the Senate committee to minimize any aspect of that," she said.

THROW THE BUMS OUT: More than 70 percent of Americans tell pollsters that the nation is on the wrong track. Larger percentages think corruption is a major problem in Washington. Incumbents have been roughed up already this year in Pennsylvania and Indiana, and in both cases Republicans suffered the worst.

If this shapes up to be an anti-incumbent midterm, "we'll lose some members" in Congress, said Democratic strategist Steve Elmendorf, "but they have more incumbents."

ANTI-REPUBLICAN TIDE: Whether 2006 turns out to be an anti-incumbent or anti-GOP election "is the 15-seat question," said Democratic strategist Dane Strother, referring to the number of seats the Democrats need to win to seize control of the House.

Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., says GOP majorities are "clearly in jeopardy" because the political landscape is both anti-incumbent and anti-Republican.

"They know that Republicans are in charge," the grim-faced presidential hopeful said of voters. "But I just want to emphasize that we have six months, and we can turn this around."

And Democrats could fumble the opportunity.

Takeover Of House, Senate Not Likely (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

The only thing that can be said with any certainty about the 2006 midterm elections is that none of the top campaign forecasters is flatly predicting Republicans will lose the House or Senate -- yet.

President Bush's job approval polls are the lowest in his presidency; the Democrats are leading Republicans in the generic congressional election polls by an average of 13 percent; and voter surveys suggest a strong anti-incumbent tide is building. But leading analysts still think at this point that Republicans will hold on to majority control of both chambers, though with reduced numbers.

"The 2006 midterm elections are a political analyst's nightmare. The national climate seems to portend big changes, yet race-by-race analyses reveal formidable odds against a Democratic takeover of either the House or the Senate," veteran elections tracker Charlie Cook says in his latest National Journal election preview.

Several structural problems confront the Democrats in the House elections. Just three- to four-dozen House races out of 435 at stake are truly competitive. And among the 18 Republican seats that are open, only half are in districts where "Democrats have a remote chance of winning," Mr. Cook says. Making matters worse, the Democrats were able to recruit only second- or third-tier challengers in many key districts where the Republicans looked vulnerable.

Stuart Rothenberg, Mr. Cook's chief rival in the political predictions business, believes "the House definitely is in play" and has increased his estimate of likely Democratic gains "from 5-8 seats to 7-10 seats," short of the 15 seats needed to topple Republicans from power, though he thinks there could be "greater Democratic gains."

As for the six to eight Senate seats that are in play this year, there appear to be nearly as many races where Democrats are leading, as in Pennsylvania and Maryland, as races where Republicans are competitive, like Washington, Minnesota and New Jersey. Neither Mr. Cook nor Mr. Rothenberg see the Democrats taking control of the Senate, but they could make some gains in the GOP's 55-45 seat majority, they say.

But to win, Democrats would need a strong national anti-Republican wave behind them, Mr. Rothenberg writes in his latest House forecast. Many Democrats think that opposition to the war in Iraq, $3 a gallon gas prices, unhappiness with the economy and the GOP's handling of illegal immigration is creating that wave.

"I think we are in one of those cycles in politics where the Republicans in Congress are getting hit on every front and obviously the president's polls don't help, and that, combined with a series of unprecedented crises, from the war to gas prices, concerns over the handling of Hurricane Katrina, and with conservative Republicans expressing great concern [about their party's political direction], it's almost as if they can't catch a break," said Democratic adviser Leon Panetta, who was President Clinton's White House chief of staff.

"The anxiety of the country is there and people are angry and frustrated and wondering where the country is going. In light of that, there isn't any question in my view that Democrats would be able to win control of the House and probably capture additional seats in the Senate, though it's going to be much harder to get control of the Senate," Mr. Panetta said.

But independent pollsters like John Zogby say the Democrats could "blow this opportunity" if they do not come up with an agenda that appeals to swing voters, and Mr. Panetta, among other Democrats, is urging his party to come up with "an agenda and a message for voters, sooner rather than later."

"They ought to present a very clear vision to the country in four or five areas. People want to know they stand for something. The public is hungry to know what solutions this party is going to present," he said. "If they wait too long, they won't have enough time to say what they stand for."

He is also worried about the political fallout from a growing anti-incumbent mood that he says could hit both parties in November. "This could be one of those years that could produce a lot of surprises where we could see some Democratic incumbents not winning easy seats and that could be true for Republicans as well," he said.

Both parties enter the last five months of the 2006 election with political advantages that they hope to exploit in the final weeks of the campaigns, but with problems and divisions, too.

The Republicans' biggest political advantage lies in its congressional district boundaries, which have been redrawn over the past decade in GOP-friendly ways. A number of district lines were strengthened after the 2000 census in both Republican and Democratic districts. As a result, Republican redistricting strategists say, the GOP now has many more districts that can withstand a stiffer Democratic challenge.

In the past decade or more the re-election rate for House members has been running from 97 percent to 99.5 percent. And despite the Republican Congress' low approval polls, surveys show that an average of 59 percent of the voters like the job their representative or senator is doing.

But Republican campaign advisers acknowledge that the bitter battles over immigration, spending and other issues have divided and alienated parts of the party conservative base amid fears that many will not turn out to vote.

"I worry about that. There's disagreement in the party and dissatisfaction on the issues. [Republican leaders] are going to have to convince conservative voters that Congress is holding true to conservative principles," said Frank Donatelli, the former Reagan White House political director.

"There's just tremendous division. The issues that brought the party to power are not around anymore. New issues have come to the fore, so it's going to be a challenge to reconstitute your governing coalition. It's not going to happen in '06. The 2008 presidential election is the next big challenge to fashion a governing agenda," Mr. Donatelli said.

But other Republicans say they do not see any evidence that the party's disputes are having any effect in their state elections.

"The president's popularity is eroding in this state as it is everywhere else, but there's no evidence I've seen that there is any kind of down-ballot effect because of what's going on in Washington. I don't have a sense that the wheels are wobbling on the Republican Party here," said Florida Republican campaign consultant Mac Stipanovich.

Still, Ken Mehlman, the Republican National Committee chairman, isn't taking any chances. He has reactivated the massive get-out-the-vote volunteer army that was pivotal to the success of the party's 2004 election victories. A Republican ground force that will eventually number in the hundreds of thousands is identifying, contacting and registering voters in a vast computerized network that for months has been sending in weekly quota reports to the RNC in preparation for its get-out-the-vote drive on Election Day.

But if the Republicans are having problems with their base, Democrats say their supporters are more activated and united than ever.

"We are seeing an uptick in party participation. We've had a 25-year high this year in precinct caucus participation," said Brian Melendez, the Minnesota Democratic state chairman. "That suggests that party activists are energized."

Like other Democrats interviewed, Mr. Melendez is unhappy with his party's failure to produce a national campaign agenda and is critical of Democratic leaders who say they will subpoena and investigate Mr. Bush's administration if they win control of the House in November.

"I hope that's not where we go. I hope we fight on the issues that affect people's lives and not engage in political infighting. I would rather end the war than try to impeach George Bush," he said.

"What Democrats need to do is to articulate a clear message that is more than we-are-not-the-Republicans," he said.

Many Democrats say their local organizations have been strengthened by the party organizers sent into their state by party Chairman Howard Dean. The Democratic National Committee has put at least four party strategists into each state, as part of a long-term, 50-state party-building plan to prepare for the '06 and '08 elections.

"It's working miracles and is exactly the right strategy for Minnesota," Mr. Melendez said. "They are doing the grass-roots organizing that is going to turn out our voters in November, channeling all that voter anger into votes."

Bush Rating At All-time Low In W.Va. (CWVG)

By Scott Finn

Charleston (WV) Gazette, May 29, 2006

A record number of West Virginians don't like the way President Bush is doing his job, according to a new poll from the nonpartisan group SurveyUSA and WUSA-TV in Washington.

Fifty-nine percent of state residents disapproved in the survey of 600 adults taken May 12 to 14. Thirty-seven percent approve. The poll has a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

Bush's approval rating in West Virginia is 2 points below his previous low of 39 percent reached in December, May and April.

The president is still more popular in West Virginia than most states. Nationwide, only 33 percent of American adults approved of his job performance, according to SurveyUSA.

The approval rating among state Republicans has taken the biggest dive, from 87 percent in January to 67 percent this month, while 18 percent of Democrats and 38 percent of independents approve of the president's job performance.

Bush's troubles are no surprise to Marybeth Beller, assistant professor of political science at Marshall University. She blamed dissatisfaction about the war in Iraq.

"You're seeing Republican leaders in the House of Representatives opening up a debate about the Iraq war," she said. "That's a sign of growing frustration about the war and Republicans' willingness to distance themselves from the president to save their own seats."

The only Republican representing West Virginia in Congress, Rep. Shelley Moore Capito, also is distancing herself from the Bush administration by talking about high gas prices, mine safety and problems with the Medicare drug benefit plan, Beller said.

Her Democratic challenger, former federal prosecutor Mike Callaghan, will have to do a better job getting out the vote and introducing himself to voters if he wants to beat Capito this fall, she said.

About two-thirds of West Virginians approved of the job being done by West Virginia's two Democratic senators.

Clinton Is A Politician Not Easily Defined (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

Hillary Rodham Clinton has fashioned a political persona that generates intense passions but defies easy characterization. She is viewed as a hawk on Iraq and national security, stamped as a big-government Democrat for her work on health care in the 1990s, and depicted as seeking the middle ground on abortion.

After three decades in public life, New York's junior senator is one of the most recognized women in the world, her every move and utterance interpreted amid the assumption in Democratic circles and her own circle that her reelection campaign this fall will pivot into a run for president in 2008. Yet for all her fame, there are missing pieces to the Clinton puzzle: What does she stand for? And where would she try to take the country if elected?

Clinton's roles as senator, first lady, governor's wife, lawyer and children's advocate have given her a depth of experience that few national politicians can match, but she is still trying to demonstrate whether these yielded a coherent governing philosophy. For now, she is defined by a combination of celebrity and caution that strategists say leaves her more vulnerable than most politicians to charges that she is motivated more by personal ambition and tactical maneuver than by a clear philosophy.

In recent weeks, Clinton has moved to clarify her agenda with major speeches on the economy and energy. Later this summer she will help present a new strategy for the Democrats. She has also given speeches setting out her foreign policy views. But she has yet to wrap up her ideas in a kind of package like the "New Democrat" philosophy her husband, former president Bill Clinton, used in his 1992 campaign or the "compassionate conservative" label George W. Bush adopted in 2000.

To the contrary, she made clear in a telephone interview on Friday that her governing philosophy may never be easily reduced to a slogan. "I don't think like that," she said. "I approach each issue and problem from a perspective of combining my beliefs and ideals with a search for practical solutions. It doesn't perhaps fit in a preexisting box, but many of the problems we face as a nation don't either."

As a result, everyone seems to have a label for her. Roger Altman, a former Treasury Department official and one of her outside advisers, calls Clinton "a modern centrist." William Galston of the Brookings Institution, who was domestic policy adviser in the Clinton White House, describes her as "a progressive without illusions" and a politician who has been "consistent but complicated."

Her detractors find much -- and much different -- to criticize. Liberal columnist Molly Ivins dismisses Clinton as the embodiment of "triangulation, calculation and equivocation." Markos Moulitsas, whose Daily Kos Web site often attacks the Democratic establishment, ridicules her as a leader who is "afraid to offend." The Rev. Jerry Falwell, echoing a view shared by many Republicans, calls her a liberal "ideologue" who is far more doctrinaire than her husband.

A selective reading of Clinton's record can produce evidence to prove she is a centrist, a liberal and much in between. But there are clear patterns. On defense, she has consistently supported the use of force abroad, having advocated military intervention in the Balkans during her husband's administration. She differs with Bush administration officials on many aspects of how they have conducted foreign policy, but not on combating terrorism or the imperative of winning in Iraq.

Domestically, she has a more complex profile, a product of life experiences that have shaped and refined her approach to issues. She is an activist who believes in the power of government to solve problems, but those pro-government instincts have been tempered by the health-care debacle of 1993-94 and the nation's budgetary squeeze. On family policy, she has some traditional, even moralistic, instincts that those who know her best say are genuine and deeply felt.

Asked whether there is anything that connects her different interests and positions, she answered in spacious language: "What's framed all the work I've done in the Senate and all the years before that is my belief that our most important obligation is to take care of our children . . . and that as a nation, America should remain as a symbol of freedom and hope around the world."

She believes government is an essential partner in a three-sided relationship that also includes the free market, and a "civil society" of churches and nonprofit groups. "I am a big believer in self-help and personal responsibility and a work ethic that holds people responsible," she said. "But I know one of the reasons our country has been one of the most successful organizations in the world is because we got the balance right."A Polarizing Force

The debate about Clinton's beliefs is linked to one about her electability. Many Democrats fear she carries so much baggage that, if she becomes the party's standard-bearer in 2008, she would prove too polarizing and lead it to a third straight defeat. Many Republicans see a shrewd politician who they fear would be a formidable opponent in a general election and who, if elected, would move the country leftward.

That she polarizes the electorate is clear from a new Washington Post-ABC News poll. The survey found that 84 percent of Democrats have a favorable impression of Clinton, while 73 percent of Republicans have an unfavorable view. As a point of contrast, Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), a leading potential candidate for the Republican nomination, is viewed favorably by 65 percent of Republicans and 50 percent of Democrats.

Although she has drawn criticism from the left for supporting the Iraq war, Clinton remains more popular among liberal Democrats than among moderate Democrats. Overall, 37 percent of Americans said she is too liberal, which is less than the 45 percent recorded for Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) during the 2004 campaign and almost identical to perceptions of then-Vice President Al Gore in 2000.

Clinton's advisers argue that most Americans have formed opinions about her based not just on Iraq or health care but also on how she has conducted herself through personal circumstances. In the Post-ABC News poll, for example, 68 percent said they see Clinton as a strong leader, 16 percentage points more than Bush received a few months ago.

On balance, most of those around Clinton say her hard-to-pigeonhole profile is a political asset -- the product, they say, of a curious intellect, the absence of rigid ideology, an instinct for problem solving and a willingness to seek consensus even across party lines. Her detractors see her career as the work of an opportunistic politician who has sanded the sharp edges off her views, so much so that there is little sense of authenticity when she speaks.

On Iraq, she has tried to be a critic of Bush without renouncing her support for the resolution that authorized him to go to war, as other Democrats have done. She opposes both a timetable for withdrawing troops and an open-ended commitment.

In the interview, Clinton defended herself. "I've said many times I regret how the president has used his authority," she said. "But I think I have a responsibility to look at this as carefully as I can and say what I believe, and what I believe is we're in a very dangerous situation and it doesn't lend itself to sound bites, and therefore I have resisted going along with either my colleagues who feel passionately they need to call for a date certain or colleagues who are 100 percent behind the policy and with the president and [British] Prime Minister [Tony] Blair. . . . I know I take criticism from all sides on this, but I've tried to work my way through it as clearly and responsibly as I can."

Bill Clinton is also a defender. At a meeting of a group of well-heeled liberal donors called the Democracy Alliance this month in Austin, he lost his temper when an audience member suggested that Hillary Clinton should follow the lead of 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee John Edwards and renounce her 2002 vote authorizing military force in Iraq, audience members said. He glowered and lectured the donor that it was more important to look to the future than to debate the past in Iraq.

In the Senate, Hillary Clinton has introduced about 190 bills. Of those not strictly involving parochial New York matters, about half include at least one Republican co-sponsor, her advisers say.

But a Congressional Quarterly analysis found that she has voted with a majority of Democrats 95 percent of the time and has consistently recorded one of the highest percentages for opposing Bush on legislation of any of her potential 2008 Democratic rivals.No One Label

Those who have dealt with Clinton say she is not easily caricatured. "Reviewing her writings, which I've done, having chatted with her and knowing personally something about how the Clintons raised Chelsea, I believe she holds what we sometimes call traditional values about personal responsibility and family," said Douglas Besharov of the American Enterprise Institute.

Peter Edelman, who resigned in protest from the Clinton administration after the president signed, with his wife's support, the welfare reform bill in 1996, said no label fits her. "Anybody who thinks she's some sort of down-the-line liberal who has tailored her thinking for electoral reasons, I think that's just not true," he said.

The defeat of her health-care proposal in 1994, advisers say, taught her to respect the limits of the political system to absorb major policy changes.

She said the biggest lesson learned is that there can be no progress on health care without the business community. "There has to be a consensus in the public and private sector before we can ever get the political system to respond," she said.

Hillary Clinton has a populist streak that sometimes takes on an angry edge, in contrast to her husband. But one policy aide in the Clinton White House who has worked closely with both Clintons suggested their differences are stylistic. "She's just blunter in the way she talks about things than he is," the adviser said. "If you hear the same policy from both of them, because he sugarcoated it and she didn't, it might sound more centrist coming from him than from her."

No Clinton speech has drawn more attention than her January 2005 address in which she described abortion as a "sad, even tragic choice" for many women. The speech was widely interpreted as her effort to move toward the center. Her advisers, worried that she would be attacked for inconsistency, insisted that it represented no change from her past position.

The speech, read in its entirety, was a ringing endorsement of a woman's right to choose, and its political purpose, advisers say, was to put abortion foes on the defensive about contraception, not to make news by softening Clinton's tone on abortion.

This summer, Clinton will participate in the rollout of a Democratic agenda, a project initiated by the centrist Democratic Leadership Council. At her urging, the project includes participation of the liberal Center for American Progress, as well as two other centrist groups, the New Democrat Network and Third Way.

When he sought the presidency, Bill Clinton used the DLC to signal a break from the old Democratic Party when the DLC officials were at war with the liberal wing. Hillary Clinton appears to have the opposite goal, which is to use the DLC as a base from which to unite the party to rebut criticism that Democrats have no common message.

Galston suggested that people are asking the wrong questions about her. "I think the real issue that people ought to be talking about is not whether she's consistent or sincere," he said. "If I'm reading her correctly, she is. The real question that people ought to be asking is, given what she's stood for unflinchingly, is that the direction they want the standard-bearer to take the party?"

Waiting At The Docks (WT)

By Antonio Villaraigosa And Rusty Hammer

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

This past week, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed legislation recently passed by the state legislature to place the largest infrastructure bond measure in state history -- $37 billion for transportation, housing, education and levees -- before the voters in November. This historic agreement has the strong support of the City of Los Angeles and its business leaders. Meanwhile, throughout the United States, other states are struggling with how to fund the transportation infrastructure that is so necessary to the future of the country.

One of the biggest effects of that gap is the economic cost of delays and logistical uncertainties in transporting goods, as congestion threatens to overwhelm the system. Our economic reality is changing to meet the distribution needs of imported goods, and our environmental reality is telling us to be mindful of the inherent relationship between environmental pollution and the movement of goods. There will be no greater pressure placed on our transportation system and environment than this massive inflow. As we survey the global context and local landscape, it is clear that our gateway cities, with Los Angeles a top example, face major challenges -- from homeland security to the movement of goods to public health to the environment.

The movement of goods has far-reaching effects on the lives of all Americans. Not only does it shape our markets, it also impacts the air we breathe, the jobs we create and the economic climate we foster.

American retailers and manufacturers depend on the Ports of Los Angeles and Long Beach for 43 percent of all imported goods to the United States Think of it as a river carrying more than $230 billion in products to every corner of every state, where retail jobs and markups and sales taxes add value to local economies.

To carry this load, there are ships of increasing size and number, needing more trains and trucks, arriving at our docks every day. The biggest container vessels can now carry up to 1.2 million 29-inch color televisions or 50 million mobile phones and are larger than an aircraft carrier.

The issue we face is daunting: We have no coherent national policy to deal with goods and freight movement. Nor do we have the available resources upfront to infuse our seaports, airports, highways and rail lines with enough capital to be efficient and cost-effective for users in years ahead.

We must be creative and responsible in how we green, grow and compete in our increasingly global market place. And our success will be measured not only by our economic prosperity, but also in how our decisions and investments maintain the environmental integrity and public health of our communities.

This is not an exclusively urban or rural problem; this is a global issue affecting every sector of our market and every consumer in every community. Meanwhile, issues surrounding port and cargo security have, until now, been going unaddressed and adding to the uncertainty within the supply chain.

The Los Angeles gateway is a national asset, providing consumer goods to the entire country. Californians are stepping up to the plate to ensure the critical infrastructure necessary for competitive access to world markets, but we can't do it alone.

A stronger partnership with the federal government is essential. What's needed? From Congress: Pass the port security bill. From the Department of Transportation: Provide a national freight policy and partner with the states and cities on massive gateway and corridor construction projects. From the states: Share the financial burden of these projects of national significance, whose return on investment is spread throughout the country.

The challenges we face are immense. And they will not be remedied with simple solutions or quick fixes. Nor can they be addressed by one community alone.

A unified country needs a unified, flowing transportation system. Los Angeles and California are ready to put our future on the line to raise our share of the cost, but this is a future that belongs to the whole country, and we can only achieve it together.

Manufacturers' Profits Outpace Broader Economy (WSJ)

By Timothy Aeppel

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

Profits are increasing far faster for U.S. manufacturers than for U.S. companies as a whole, aided by a wave of consolidation that has wiped out weaker players, unrelenting cost cutting and a revival of pricing power in some sectors.

Companies still find it tough to raise prices to consumers, helping curb overall inflation.

But within manufacturing, those that make important materials and intermediate products are raising prices to other producers, often in an effort to offset their own soaring costs. Many have moved some operations overseas, trimming costs.

A surge in U.S. exports, dominated by manufactured goods, also is helping. The Commerce Department reported this month that exports jumped 13.8% to $76.5 billion in March, compared with a year ago.

"There's clearly been an upturn in profits and profitability for manufacturers," says David Huether, director of economic analysis at the National Association of Manufacturers.

To be sure, some manufacturers continue to struggle. Foreign competition remains fierce. Manufacturers could also face challenges keeping up profit growth amid rising interest rates, predictions of a global economic slowdown and the continued climb in prices for raw materials, particularly energy.

Manufacturing profits almost quadrupled since 2001 on a pretax basis to $208 billion last year, according to the Bureau of Economic Analysis, while profits for all types of companies doubled to $1.2 trillion. Manufacturing profits now exceed the level they reached at the height of the late 1990s economic boom.

Economists say that manufacturing's relative strength is partly attributable to the severity of the recent downturn, which was far deeper than it was for the larger economy. Profits in the factory sector plunged almost 64% in 2001 to $52.6 billion from $144.3 billion in 2000 as manufacturers shed millions of workers and slashed output to survive the slump. Manufacturers had more ground to cover just to catch up, says Richard DeKaser, chief economist at bank National City Corp. in Cleveland.

"I expect manufacturing profit gains to continue throughout 2006, though rising interest and labor costs will slow the momentum somewhat," Mr. DeKaser says.

The global boom has helped. Caterpillar Inc. recently reported first-quarter net income rose 45% to $840 million from a year earlier amid strong world-wide demand for construction and mining equipment.

Some U.S. companies also are benefiting from increased manufacturing on U.S. soil by foreign companies, even as some traditional customers such as General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. struggle to run their factories profitably. "Go up the road to Toyota -- their parking lot is full, they're expanding," says Michael Mittler, president of Mittler Bros. Machine & Tool in Wright City, Missouri, referring to Japanese auto maker Toyota Motor Corp. Toyota's plant in nearby Troy, Missouri, makes aluminum castings for cylinder heads and engine manifolds.

Striding through the middle of his bustling shop one recent morning, he pointed to large machines that shape cylinder heads for Toyota's new V-8 engines, part of a subcontract he landed last fall.

Mr. Huether, the NAM economist, says, "One of the things driving profits for manufacturers is that they have more pricing power," although in some cases that mainly means no longer facing as much pressure to cut prices. He attributes this both to rising domestic demand as well as to higher prices for imports, which creates less deflationary pressure in the U.S.

Robert Murdock, president of Murdock-SuperSecur LLC, has raised prices, just not fast enough. His Cincinnati-based company, a maker of brass drinking fountains and fire hydrants, is caught in a bind because of the lag between when his customers order products and when he delivers. With raw materials such as brass surging over the past year, he often has found himself paying more for metal than he had expected, after quoting a lower price as part of a bid.

For many manufacturers, the trick has been to keep squeezing their own costs and pushing into new businesses in order to boost profits.

Hoveround Corp. in Sarasota, Florida, isn't allowed to raise prices for its motorized wheelchairs and scooters, because prices are set by fee structures for Medicaid and by contracts with large insurers. Yet the company has managed to consistently widen profit margins "slightly" each year, says company President Tom Kruse.

One strategy has been to move more production of subassemblies and parts to cheaper off-shore factories. And the company has grown every year since 2000, so it has also benefited in some cases by increasing the volume of outside parts it buys, making it eligible for bigger volume discounts.

Meanwhile, business is the best it has ever been at Allfast Fastening Systems Inc. in City of Industry, California. Chief Executive Jim Randall says demand has soared for the company's rivets, used in commercial and military aircraft. Indeed, Mr. Randall's biggest problem is meeting demand, given tight supplies of key materials such as titanium. Some wags in the industry have taken to calling such hard-to-get metals "unobtainium."

Talk Of Pelosi As Speaker Delights Both Parties (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 29 — Hoping to win a Congressional majority in November, some optimistic Democratic lawmakers have taken to referring to Representative Nancy Pelosi as "speaker," as in speaker of the House. So have some optimistic Republicans.

"She ought to be a big component of the fall campaign," said Ed Rogers, a Republican strategist and lobbyist. "There are some Democrats who make really good bad guys."

Ms. Pelosi, the California Democrat and House minority leader, lends herself to easy caricature by Republicans. She is an unapologetic liberal, with a voting record to match (the Republican National Committee chairman, Ken Mehlman, said she was neither a "New Democrat" nor an "Old Democrat" but a "prehistoric Democrat"). She is wealthy (married to an investment banker, she has assets listed at more than $16 million). She represents San Francisco, which Republicans love to invoke as a hotbed of counterculture decadence and extremism.

"Is America ready for Nancy Pelosi's Contract With San Francisco?" asked Representative Ric Keller, Republican of Florida, posing a question that, one imagines, could form the basis of many Republican advertisements this fall.

Democrats may have some reservations about Ms. Pelosi, but they are largely loyal, seeing her as an earnest champion of the party's beliefs and as an effective leader.

"She has brought everyone together, she has kept everyone together, and I think she deserves a great deal of credit," said Martin Frost, a former Texas congressman and rival of Ms. Pelosi for minority leader.

Republicans have made a target of Ms. Pelosi — who has become ubiquitous on campaign podiums, in interviews and in Republican talking points — because the notion of Democrats' winning a Congressional majority is hardly the pipe dream it was 18 months ago.

As President Bush's approval ratings languish with those of Republican lawmakers, polls suggest that Democrats could be on course to lead the House for the first time in 12 years.

As a result, Ms. Pelosi teeters on a fine line: between the need to say what Democrats plan to do if they win control of the House and the danger of speaking too soon. She begins some sentences with "when we win" and others with "if we win." Sometimes she will tack on a qualifier ("no matter who wins this election") or caveat ("that's if the election were held today").

"I don't want to appear overconfident," she said.

She is sitting in an office that, she often notes, belonged to Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. when he was speaker. After November, she hopes — or expects — to assume that mantle, depending on what conjunction she happens to be using.

Republicans hope to block her ascent by preventing Democrats from picking up the 15 seats they need to take control of the House. Republican strategists say they are eager to conduct a direct assault on Ms. Pelosi, focusing on what they believe are her vulnerabilities.

Ms. Pelosi can struggle at times to give the air of the gravitas that powerful women like Hillary Rodham Clinton and Condoleezza Rice do, both friends and adversaries say. She can appear tentative and overscripted in interviews, with a tight smile and large, expressive eyes than can leave an impression of nervousness.

"Her public speaking style is not good," said Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts.

She is more animated and assured in private meetings, said Mr. Frank, who counts himself a big admirer.

The view of Ms. Pelosi as a deficient spokeswoman for her party was buttressed during an appearance on "Meet the Press" on NBC earlier this month, which centered largely on what Democrats would do if they won the House. Political insiders of both parties judged her performance as shaky, uncommanding and defensive.

"A lot of Republicans were saying, 'We need her on TV more,' " said Ed Kutler, a Republican lobbyist. "Maybe we should buy ad time for her."

Asked why she makes such a popular Democratic bogyman, or bogywoman, Ms. Pelosi shrugged, smirked and, finally, smiled.

"I am an Italian-American Catholic grandmother," she said, "very traditional in terms of values."

She repeated this three times, as if to emphasize that her self-image was at odds with more common descriptors, like "San Francisco liberal."

Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the House Democratic whip, said, "They will try to demonize our members in leadership because it's all they have left."

Mr. Hoyer, who is seen as more moderate than Ms. Pelosi, has made no secret over the years of his interest in moving up the leadership ranks. But he said he would not run against Ms. Pelosi for speaker, and he dismissed speculation on Capitol Hill that he might do so as "the right trying to create a fight."

Ms. Pelosi has said that she intends to become speaker if her party wins control of the House and that she would expect to run unopposed.

As the prospect of a Democratic majority gains credibility and Ms. Pelosi is more visible, she is also subjected to the speculation and analysis about her hair, makeup and clothes that any woman positioned for such a big job often must endure.

"I hear them say on TV that I've had face-lifts," said Ms. Pelosi, 66, who added that she had never had one. "I heard one woman say I've had a face-lift, but it looks terrible."

She shook her head and said, "Did you ever think that those two things cancel themselves out?"

Ms. Pelosi said she slept little, stole exercise by dashing through airports and subsisted many days on Ghirardelli chocolates ("less than 10" a day) and pistachio nuts (which she shells with her teeth).

"I had a hamburger last night and it was my breakfast, lunch and dinner," she said last week. "And I had these strange things. I realized they were French fries." She made quick spiraling gestures with her fingers to show what they looked like.

It was apparent that she was not familiar with curly fries.

In the course of two interviews, Ms. Pelosi repeated herself frequently, even by the hyper-repetitious standards of politicians:

¶About how the Republican House leadership was presiding over a "culture of corruption."

¶About how Democrats were committed to fiscal responsibility.

¶About how Democrats would restore civility to the House.

¶About how "when Democrats win," President Bush will be a "lame duck," upon which she switches poultry metaphors and drops in the cautionary cliché about not counting chickens before they are hatched.

She repeated Jesse Jackson-like alliterative sound bites in halting un-Jackson-like cadences. Republicans, she said, "are engaging in deluge and desperation," while her Democratic caucus "is a great collection of idealism, intellect and" — she paused while trying to summon the third "i" — "integrity."

Whatever Ms. Pelosi lacks as a communicator, her political gifts are abundant, colleagues say. She is known as a shrewd inside player with instincts honed in the political hothouse of her youth. She grew up in the Little Italy section of Baltimore, one of six children and the only daughter of a legendary Democratic machine boss, congressman and mayor, Tommy D'Alesandro.

She attended Trinity College in Washington, where she met her future husband, Paul Pelosi, who was attending Georgetown. They eventually moved to his hometown, San Francisco, where she remained active in Democratic politics and was first elected to Congress in 1987. The heavily Democratic district has easily re-elected her ever since.

In Congress, Ms. Pelosi has been particularly interested in intelligence issues and has strongly supported abortion rights. She has also shown sharp-elbowed partisanship and old-school pragmatism and collegiality.

Ms. Pelosi nodded vigorously when asked if she was friends with Representative Tom DeLay, whom she had just seconds earlier described as "corrupt." She went on to catalog the work the two had done together in Congress. And then Ms. Pelosi affirmed, once again, how "corrupt" her friend Mr. DeLay was.

Ms. Pelosi, who succeeded Representative Richard A. Gephardt as minority leader in 2002, has been credited in that role with keeping her racially, ideologically and stylistically diverse caucus unified. Congressional Quarterly magazine examined 669 roll-call votes in 2005 and found that Democrats voted with the majority of their party 88 percent of the time, the highest total since it started doing such analyses in 1956.

"She understands her members, where they are on issues and what they need," said the Democratic lobbyist Steve Elmendorf, a former aide to Mr. Gephardt.

Mr. Elmendorf described Ms. Pelosi as "an extremely attentive leader" who would deservedly receive much credit if Democrats won in November.

Democratic solidarity is also forged of the party's fierce opposition to President Bush's policies. As Mr. Frank said, "The Republicans' extremism is the sine qua non of our unity."

Indeed, throughout the Bush presidency, Democrats have been criticized as being only against Mr. Bush and not standing for any ideals or agenda of their own. This creates something of a dilemma for them.

In recent years, Republicans have charged that Democrats had no ideas, Ms. Pelosi said. Now, whenever Democrats talk about their ideas, she said, "they say we're measuring the curtains on the speaker's office."

Ms. Pelosi disagrees with the notion — proffered by some Democrats — that party leaders should say nothing and let the Republicans founder on their own.

"We've done our job for 18 months saying why they shouldn't vote for Republicans," she said. "Enough of the Republicans. Now it's about us."

Inside Politics (WT)

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

Jeb's future

Don't underestimate Florida Gov. Jeb Bush's prospects as a future presidential contender, says former House Speaker Newt Gingrich.

Probably 2008 is a little bit tricky, but " '12 or '16 isn't. And he's a young enough guy that he has a great future," Mr. Gingrich said on a Florida television station.

"I just think his natural, personal ability is so great that people are going to realize he is not his father, and he's not his brother. He's a very unique, charismatic leader with extraordinary capabilities. ... Jeb Bush may well be the most innovative [governor] in the entire country."

Which potential Democratic presidential candidate most worries Mr. Gingrich?

"Either [former Virginia] Gov. Mark Warner or [Indiana] Sen. Evan Bayh have a lot to offer the Democratic Party because they're more moderate," he said, although he predicted that either would have a very tough time beating New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton for the nomination.

Mr. Gingrich said Mrs. Clinton will have a tough time winning over voters in much of the country, including Florida, but Republicans are foolish to underestimate her.

"She's very smart; she works very hard. Anyone who thinks we're going to beat her easily is just wrong. We can beat her if we have better ideas and better solutions, and people have a choice between a left-wing view of the world and a solution-oriented view of the world. We're not going to beat her just with an anti-Hillary campaign," he said.

Mr. Gingrich likewise fretted that the Republican loyalists might stay away from the polls in November out of disenchantment with Republican leaders in Washington, the St. Petersburg [Fla.] Times reports.

Dayton's jibes

When asked to describe his attitude in his last few months in office, Sen. Mark Dayton cited a line from the 1971 song "Me and Bobby McGee."

"Freedom's just another word for nothing left to lose," he said.

The first-term Minnesota Democrat is not seeking re-election and, these days, sounds very much like a politician with nothing left to lose, the Associated Press reports.

In February, upset about a plan by a South Dakota railroad to run coal trains close to the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., Mr. Dayton said the clinic "is worth a hell of a lot more than the whole state of South Dakota."

He later apologized for the remark.

The next month, he called fellow Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold's proposal to censure President Bush over a warrantless surveillance program "an overreaching step by someone who is grandstanding and running for president at the expense of his own party and his own country."

DOJ_NMG_0030386

Mr. Dayton did not apologize for that.

He even told a Minnesota high-school group that he'd give himself an "F" if he had to grade his accomplishments in the Senate.

"And I would give the entire Congress, of which I'm a member, an 'F' for results," Mr. Dayton said. He pointed out that he also told the students that he'd give himself an "A-minus" for effort.

Lack of enthusiasm

The race for the Democratic nomination for California governor enters its final stretch this week in a virtual tie, with a large chunk of voters still undecided -- and unimpressed by their two choices in the June 6 primary, the Los Angeles Daily News reports.

In part, analysts said, the two Democratic candidates -- state Treasurer Phil Angelides and state Controller Steve Westly -- have to overcome voter fatigue. With the recall in 2003 and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's special election last year, the state's voters have not had a year off from the barrage of TV ads and campaign rallies since 2001.

"I think there is a lack of enthusiasm for the two candidates," said political analyst Sherry Bebitch Jeffe of the University of Southern California. "I think the whole country is in a very sour mood. People are not happy about the way government is performing at all."

A poll released last week by the Public Policy Institute of California found Mr. Angelides with a slight edge, 35 percent to 32 percent, within the poll's margin of error. That was a big improvement for the treasurer, who was 13 points behind in a Los Angeles Times poll last month.

Not going away

"June 6, 2006, is an important date, not only because it's the 62nd anniversary of D-Day. It's also the day the Senate will vote on the so-called marriage amendment, which would amend the Constitution to restrict marriage in America to a man and a woman," Fred Barnes writes in the Weekly Standard.

"It won't pass. A constitutional amendment requires a two-thirds majority in the Senate and the House. When the Senate voted in 2004, the amendment got only 48 votes. This time, it's likely to get more -- probably between 52 and 58 -- in part because a powerful and unusually ecumenical religious coalition is now backing the amendment. And President Bush, despite his wife Laura's admonition that the marriage issue ought to be kept out of politics, plans to host a pro-amendment event at the White House and speak out in favor of the amendment," Mr. Barnes said.

"Once dismissed as a sop to social conservatives, the proposed amendment has become a serious rallying point for opponents of same-sex marriage. The June 6 vote will put senators on the record and make their position on the amendment a potential campaign issue. And the formation of the religious coalition means the issue won't go away soon."

On the lookout

The group Public Advocate of the United States said yesterday that it had set up sobriety checkpoints on Capitol Hill over the holiday weekend to protect the public against Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, and his son, Rep. Patrick J. Kennedy, Rhode Island Democrat.

"Citizen volunteers have responded to the call, and we have erected checkpoints at several intersections to prevent any Kennedy from driving in an impaired manner on Capitol Hill. We selected the long Memorial Day weekend due to the increased potential for a repeat of earlier car accidents," said Eugene Delgaudio, president of the group.

Volunteers patrolling in front of the U.S. Capitol and in front of the Supreme Court are attempting to prevent a repeat of Kennedy-related car accidents, the group said. The elder Mr. Kennedy walked away from a 1969 Chappaquiddick Island auto accident after a day of drinking, leaving campaign aide Mary Jo Kopechne to drown in the car. His son earlier this month crashed his car into a concrete barrier on Capitol Hill while, he said, disoriented from prescription drugs.

The checkpoints were mobile units comprising two dozen persons alternating positions around the Capitol. Volunteers wore bright orange or yellow vests and yellow construction hats and carried traffic cones and traffic directional signs (stop, slow down, go) and posters that identified them as the "Kennedy Sobriety Checkpoint" and with a message that states, "If your name is Kennedy, Get Out of the Car."

Roy Moore 'So Help Me God' (WSJ)

By Kyle Wingfield

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

MONTGOMERY, Ala. -- Most politicians would kill for -- or spend millions of dollars to acquire -- the name recognition Roy Moore has in Alabama. Not necessarily the kind of name recognition, mind you. Just the level.

That's because here, and across the country, he's known not just as Roy Moore, but as "Roy Moore, Ten Commandments Judge" -- the Southern Baptist-cum-chief justice of Alabama who defied a federal court order to remove his 2.5-ton monument to the Commandments from the state courthouse, and lost his job as a result. It's a moniker that wins him automatic support in some quarters, and deafens ears before he even opens his mouth in others. And as he runs for the Republican nomination for governor in his native state, that notoriety is both a blessing and a curse. * * *

Roy Moore makes no apologies. "I'm not trying to dodge or get away from my past," he tells me over lunch at a Montgomery seafood restaurant. "I think what we stand for in this state is exactly what our motto is: 'We dare defend our rights.' And Alabamians have always dared defend our rights, whether it be Martin Luther King, or what I did, or the beginning of the Civil War. We dare defend our rights."

At the same time as he makes this boast, there's no doubting that much of his campaign is devoted to explaining his past and persuading voters to look beyond it. "You've got to understand what the issue was with the Ten Commandments monument," he says. "And that is the message that must be gotten out first, to open the eyes and the ears of the people to understand that I do have more than that. It was more about principle than politics. . . .

"When they don't understand that it wasn't about a monument, or the Ten Commandments, or disobedience of a federal court order, but about obedience to the U.S. Constitution and the acknowledgment of God which cannot be prohibited by any authority, then when you get that message out, you can go to the platform, [and] they start to see that."

Mr. Moore referred to the "acknowledgment of God" so many times during his 2003 battle to keep the monument (and himself) in the courthouse that reporters covering the months-long saga wished they had a keystroke for the phrase. As he tells it, it's his way of describing the many nods to the Almighty made by public officials: the invocation, "God save the United States of America and this honorable court," that opens sessions of the Supreme Court; the phrase, "so help me God," that concludes many an oath of office, from the president on down; the references in the Declaration of Independence to "Nature's God," the "Creator"; the fact that religious freedom is the first right mentioned in the Bill of Rights. And, he argues, it includes postings of the Ten Commandments in courthouses -- from small plaques like the wooden one he carved and hung in his Etowah County courtroom a decade ago, to the washing-machine-sized granite marker he installed in the state courthouse.

"Every function of government is related" to the acknowledgment of God, he says. "For example, an understanding of God leads to an understanding of the fallen nature of man, which leads to the separation of powers, checks and balances. . . . Then you understand why judges can't make law, and legislators can't enforce law, and the executives can't put themselves above the law." * * *

But putting himself above the law is exactly what Mr. Moore was accused of doing. His refusal to remove the tablet from the state courthouse -- a U.S. district judge had ruled that it was an unconstitutional endorsement of religion by government -- drew hundreds of supporters from across the country to camp out on the building's steps for over a week in the dog days of August. They organized food deliveries and threatened to form a blockade if anyone tried to remove the stone. Critics, from the ACLU to atheist groups, also gathered to voice their opposition.

Even for Alabama, which has seen its share of political stagecraft over the years, it was a surreal sight. After all, George C. Wallace's "stand in the schoolhouse door" to protest the integration of the University of Alabama ended with his stepping aside to allow two black students to enroll. Eventually, the state Supreme Court's eight associate justices had "Roy's Rock" rolled away with little incident. Three months later, a special panel of retired judges voted to expel Mr. Moore from office.

So it's no wonder that this yarn is what people remember about Roy Moore, and not his platform, which lists four topics -- Legislative Reform, Education, Taxation and Wasteful Spending, and Illegal Aliens -- ahead of Morality. Money has been a critical issue for Mr. Moore, who has been out-fundraised by his opponent in the June 6 GOP primary, the incumbent Bob Riley, by more than 4-to-1. The Moore campaign ran its first TV commercial in mid-May; Gov. Riley has been ruling the airwaves since January.

"Our problem has been reaching great multitudes of people with the message because of funding," Mr. Moore says. "And the funding has been hampered by the fact that we take no political action committee money, and the reason is because it's the very problem here in Montgomery. . . . In my opinion, [the state government] is controlled by special interests. And when it's controlled by special interests . . . you can't address the problem by taking their money."

It's to address this crucial problem, he says, that he's proposing term limits for legislators and amending the state constitution so that the legislature meets every other year instead of annually -- "Because, by fewer legislative sessions, you don't have as much time for the special interests to control."

In some ways, his platform could belong to just about any small-government conservative. But if you're starting to wonder what all this has to do with God, and whether Mr. Moore has lost support because he's strayed from his religious message, consider how he addresses these topics.

His arguments for limited government portray this political philosophy as the only one for those who believe in God. He quotes Jefferson: "'Resistance to tyrants is obedience to God.' Now that had a meaning back in 1700 which is true today. Tyrants are those who put [themselves] above the law of God and become all-powerful. They control everything -- your life, your liberty, your pursuit of happiness. In this country, those things are given by God and government is there to secure them."

The Constitution, Mr. Moore says, was framed largely to prevent the emergence of such a godless, all-powerful tyrant. "Jefferson said, 'In questions of power let no more be heard of confidence in man, but bind him down from mischief by the chains of the Constitution.' Which is exactly what the Constitution's about." And as for the budget deficit, Mr. Moore believes that God is on the side of lower taxes and spending: "If you know that government isn't God, then government doesn't need all the money in the world to do everything for everybody, because that's not the role" of government. * * *

Can more than one deity, I ask, be held in official esteem in America? Not if religious tolerance is to be maintained, Mr. Moore argues: "The Judeo-Christian God is the one that gives religious liberty. The Muslim God, Allah, does not give religious liberty. If you want to prove that, go to Saudi Arabia and lift up your Bible on a street corner, and you'll find out what the Muslim God -- they say -- dictates.

"They dictate a form of worship through the government, and that's what their God mandates -- they say. Our God does not mandate that at all. . . . Our God says that that freedom is between you and me, not you and government. That's the big difference. . . . And that's exactly why Muslims and Buddhists and others are free to worship [here] the way they want, not dictated by government."

For a man who might fairly be described as a provincial populist, Mr. Moore has a somewhat unconfined (and, in parts, exotic) past. After graduating from West Point in 1969, then-Lt. Moore served in Kansas, Germany and Vietnam. In the 1980s, he worked for a time as a cowboy on a ranch in the Australian outback. But now, he expresses disdain for much of the world beyond his own -- in particular, for Europe, with its widespread secularism. "When they don't acknowledge there's a God, government is the god and controls everything.

"You don't have to know anything about history," he continues, "to go over to Europe and look at the churches. I mean, they're cold, vacant, locked museums of what used to be." The U.S. had been moving in that direction for some 60 years, he says, but in recent years has started to reverse the slide. "America's churches are alive and growing. But more than the churches, the people are coming back to a knowledge of God -- and a knowledge of what the Constitution is."

Europeans likely wouldn't vote for someone as overtly religious as Mr. Moore to be dog-catcher, much less elect him to a position comparable to a U.S. governor. Yet it's beginning to look like Alabamians' sentiments toward his candidacy aren't much warmer. A May 21 poll by the Mobile Press-Register and the University of South Alabama shows Mr. Moore trailing Gov. Riley by 69% to 20% after leading the incumbent by eight points a year-and-a-half ago. The passage of time hasn't helped. Many an observer reckons that Mr. Moore might have beaten the governor handily had the race been held in 2004, when the erstwhile judge was perhaps at his most popular and Mr. Riley was being browbeaten for a poor economy and his failed proposal to raise taxes by $1.2 billion.

Regardless of how the election turns out, Mr. Moore says he asks supporters to pray only that God's will be done. And he indicates that failing to elect faith-oriented politicians like himself won't be the end of the world for Americans: "It's good to have people in office that do understand these things, no doubt. But I think, whether they're elected or not, it's the people that are going to change it. It's from the bottom-up, not the top-down. If you go from the top-down, you're liable to put your faith in somebody that doesn't deserve it."

Blowing Smoke About Tobacco (WP)

By Philip Alcabes

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

"Tobacco: deadly in any form or disguise" is the slogan of the World Health Organization's World No Tobacco Day tomorrow. The claim is false: Tobacco is not deadly; the harm is in the smoke. A policy that confuses innocuous tobacco with harmful smoke is responsible for millions of avoidable deaths each year worldwide.

Cigarette smoke is a deadly delivery device for a benign but habit-forming product: nicotine. Nicotine isn't especially dangerous -- about like caffeine. Good policy toward tobacco use would reduce the grave harm of smoking by replacing cigarettes with non-smoked forms of nicotine for the addicts. They might use nicotine safely forever, if harmless delivery systems were widely available.

Instead, nicotine abstinence is the policymakers' only approach to tobacco. Like other abstinence campaigns (alcohol prohibition, sexual abstinence before marriage, just saying "no" to drugs), this one is both moralistic and ineffective.

The human cost of the nicotine-abstinence policy is doleful. More than 430,000 U.S. deaths each year -- one out of every five -- can be attributed to smoking. This is 10 times our death rate from car crashes, 30 times the rate from AIDS -- an unprecedented toll that is a testament to the inadequacy of 40 years of quit-smoking policy.

The surgeon general reported smoking to be a health hazard back in 1964, but the net effect of smoking-cessation messages since then is that between 4 and 5 percent of smokers quit each year. Of the approximately 14 million Americans who try to quit smoking every year, only 2 million succeed. That failure leaves 45 million to 60 million American smokers, more than one-fifth of American adults. Most of them smoke regularly. Another million or so start smoking each year. In fact, of all the Americans alive today who ever smoked regularly, half are smoking now.

Obviously, nicotine use is a popular and tenacious habit. Equally obviously, tobacco policy is a failure. Surveys show that a majority of current smokers would like good alternatives to smoking as ways of getting nicotine. But we will not tell nicotine users that there are safe ways to continue to use the legal drug they crave. Apparently, our policymakers would rather see those people get sick and die.

Alternative nicotine delivery could be easy. Nicotine replacement therapy could work long-term. Gum and the patch are already available, but not to everyone. Also, they are still approved only for short-term use and can deliver only small doses -- inadequate for heavy users.

Smokeless tobacco would work. It comes in several forms. One is chewing tobacco, made famous by cowboys and ballplayers. But other forms are handier, less messy and far less dangerous than smoking. Yet health officials label smokeless tobacco as "not a safe alternative to smoking," despite much evidence that it is quite safe. Indeed, current policy is so wedded to nicotine abstinence that officials will lie to discourage widespread use of smokeless tobacco as a way of delivering the drug.

As Carl V. Phillips, an epidemiologist at the University of Alberta, has shown, evidence points to a low risk of health hazards stemming from smokeless-tobacco use. That includes virtually no evidence of risk of oral cancer. Phillips's calculations show that total mortality from "smokeless" is about a hundreth of that from smoking.

And then there's what many smokers nowadays really do: Mix periods of abstinence (encouraged by smoke-free workplaces and restaurants) with periods of light smoking. Mixing light or occasional smoking with other nicotine-delivery products might be even safer -- but it can't be studied as a possible alternative because current funding goes only to research on how to quit smoking, not on finding a safe level of smoking.

How shameful that the United States is willing to allow almost a half-million Americans to die each year, and that the World Health Organization is prepared to allow up to 5 million annual deaths worldwide -- all because of a delivery device -- cigarette smoke -- whose hazards are well known and largely avoidable.

Where's the usually progressive public-health establishment on this? We are generally not given to telling people, "Stop doing what you are doing." We prefer health promotion in the form of seat belts, motorcycle helmets, condoms, syringe exchange, ingredient labels, and warning labels, rather than forcing people to quit their habits. But with tobacco we have jettisoned our tolerance and thrown all our support to nicotine abstinence.

We cannot ignore tobacco in its one deadly "disguise": cigarette smoke. Neither should we ignore a deadly nicotine-abstinence crusade disguised as tobacco control.

6 Nations Plan To Sign Off On Iran Package (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, May 30, 2006

Top U.S., Russian, Chinese and European officials plan to sign off this week on a package of incentives and penalties meant to reward Iran if it gives up uranium enrichment — and punish it if it doesn't, diplomats said Monday.

Agreement by the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council plus Germany could open the way for sanctions if Tehran remains defiant and refuses to abandon technology that can be used to make the fissile core of nuclear warheads.

The meeting of foreign ministers including Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice was set for Thursday in Vienna, said the diplomats, who demanded anonymity for divulging the confidential information.

Tehran appeared unimpressed: One official repeated that Iran is permitted to enrich uranium for peaceful purposes under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. Another announced that his country had experimented in technology that can be used to make the hydrogen bomb.

Tehran's main goal was recognition of "the essential right of Iran to have nuclear technology," Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said during a visit to Malaysia.

State television quoted nuclear official Sadat Hosseini as saying his country "is competing with the advanced world in the field of producing nuclear energy through fusion."

Fusion is the main principle behind the hydrogen bomb, which can be hundreds of times more powerful than atomic weapons that use fission. In a hydrogen bomb, radiation from a nuclear fission explosion sets off a fusion reaction responsible for a powerful blast and radioactivity.

Peaceful uses of fusion are still at the experimental stage.

The European Union, the United States, Japan, China, Russia and others hope to set up a demonstration power plant in the southern French town of Cadarache around 2040. Officials project that 10 percent to 20 percent of the world's energy could come from fusion by the end of the century.

International concern about Iran's nuclear aims has been focused on fears it could be trying to make a fission-type nuclear weapon by enriching uranium to weapons-grade level. Hosseini's comments were likely add to concern about Tehran's interest in fusion.

But former U.N. nuclear inspector David Albright said the announcement was probably "not very worrisome."

"They like to pretend they are competing but their program is (probably) pretty rudimentary," said Albright, who runs the Washington-based Institute for Science and International Security.

"One part of their (nuclear) strategy is to say, 'We have it all, so you can't stop us,'" he said.

Any package foreign ministers approve on Thursday would then be presented to Tehran by France, Britain and Germany — the trio of nations that broke off talks with Iran in August after it resumed activities linked to uranium enrichment.

The Security Council gave Iran until the end of April to suspend all such activities. Instead of complying, Iran announced last month that it had for the first time successfully enriched uranium and was doing research on advanced centrifuges to produce more of the material in less time.

Indirectly linked to any possible deal for Iran would be agreement on a resolution tough enough for Washington but acceptable to Tehran ally Moscow, a dispute that has hobbled action by the Security Council's permanent members for months.

If Iran remains defiant, the proposal — as outlined to AP by diplomats familiar with the text — calls for a resolution imposing sanctions under Chapter VII, Article 41 of the U.N. Charter. But it avoids any reference to Article 42, which is the trigger for possible military action to enforce any such resolution.

The proposal also calls for new consultations among the five permanent Security Council members on any further steps against Iran — a move meant to dispel complaints by the Russians and Chinese that once the screws on Iran are tightened, the council would automatically move toward military involvement.

Among the possible sanctions are a visa ban on government officials, the freezing of assets, blocking financial transactions by government figures and those involved in the country's nuclear program, an arms embargo and a blockade on the shipping of refined oil products to Iran.

If Tehran agrees to suspend enrichment, enter new negotiations on its nuclear program and lift a ban on intrusive inspections by the International Atomic Energy Agency, rewards would include agreement to "suspend discussion of Iran's file at the Security Council," as well as help in building a peaceful domestic nuclear program that uses an outside supply of enriched uranium.

Iran Set Up For Big Gains In Iraq (AP)

By Robert H. Reid, Associated Press Writer

AP, May 30, 2006

With a new Iraqi government in place, Iran is positioning itself to play a major role here at a time when American influence is showing signs of faltering.

That is worrisome to Iraq's Arab neighbors, especially Sunni-dominated countries such as Saudi Arabia and Egypt. But it also raises serious questions for Washington, including the wisdom of withdrawing entirely from Iraq when it has long been considered the eastern defense against Iranian expansion.

Concerns about Iran have simmered since the March 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq removed a Sunni-dominated dictatorship and set the stage for democracy — or, inevitably, Shiite rule in a country where Shiites hold an overwhelming majority.

Those issues have now come to the fore because of Iran's confrontational stance over its nuclear program. In effect, Iran's recent robust behavior in Iraq serves to remind Washington that it has its own cards to play — including influence among Iraqi Shiites — if the Americans threaten Tehran militarily over its plans to enrich uranium.

Iran has wasted little time in moving to shore up ties with the new government that took power last month in Baghdad. Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki flew to Baghdad on Friday, where he was warmly welcomed by Iraq's new leadership, including not only Shiites but also Sunni and Kurdish politicians.

In addition, work has already started on a multimillion-dollar international airport near the Shiite holy city of Najaf, financed mostly by a low-interest loan from Iran. The airport is designed to serve Shiite religious pilgrims visiting Najaf's shrines and provide a major boost to the economy of Iraqi's impoverished Shiite south.

All that is alarming to the Middle East's majority Sunni Arab governments — including Jordan, Egypt and Saudi Arabia — which have long feared Iranian influence among Shiites throughout the Persian Gulf because it could undermine pro-American regimes in the oil-rich region.

Last year, Jordan's King Abdullah II warned that Iran wants to create "a Shiite crescent" that would disrupt the balance of power in the region. The Saudi foreign minister gave similar warnings.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak then outraged Shiites across the region this year when he said that Iraqi Shiites were more loyal to Iran than to their own country.

Arab governments fear a bleak future in which Iraq either descends into civil war or ends up closely allied with Iran.

As long as substantial U.S. forces remain in Iraq, those dark scenarios seem unlikely. But prospects for a long-term U.S. presence here look shaky as American public opposition to the war grows.

If the Americans leave, the Iranians are waiting in the wings.

It is unlikely, however, that Iran would take a high-profile role, given the ambivalent feelings that most Iraqis, even Shiites, hold toward their eastern neighbor after a bitter 1980s war that killed an estimated 2 million people.

Sunni Arabs deeply distrust Iranians and consider Shiite politicians little more than Iranian agents. Rumors circulate widely that Iranian intelligence agents direct death squads in Baghdad.

"Iran wants to shape the situation in its favor, but does not want to be, or be perceived as, heavy-handed about it," said Juan Cole, an expert on Shiite Islam at the University of Michigan.

Instead, the Iranians prefer to work behind the scenes, doling out cash to key Shiite political players — chief among them the biggest Shiite political party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic evolution in Iraq.

Iran's hand also is rumored to be behind Shiite militias in Basra, although little evidence of a direct link has been made public.

Nevertheless, U.S. officials have long accused the Iranians — though not necessarily the Tehran government_ of smuggling weapons to Shiite militias in Basra and perhaps also selling roadside bomb technology to Sunni militants — charges Iran denies.

If the charges are valid, it may be that Iran wants to keep Iraq bubbling just enough to tie down the Americans and keep them from any military moves against Tehran.

Ironically, both the United States and Iran share an interest in preventing Iraq from disintegrating into full-scale civil war, something that would threaten Shiite political power in Iraq and risk angering Iran's Arab minority.

But the nuclear standoff, as well as a generation of bitterness, has prevented the two countries from working together. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad has offered to talk to the Iranians but only about the situation in Iraq.

Mottaki, the Iranian foreign minister, ruled out talks with the Americans, citing unspecified conditions. That suggested the Iranians want to hold out until Washington is ready to put everything — including the nuclear issue — on the table.

Echoes Of Barbary (WSJ)

By Richard Brookhiser

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

One way or another we have been dealing with a hostile Iran for 27 years. In 1979, Iranian mobs, including one Mahmoud Ahmadinejad (now the president), overran our embassy in Tehran and seized our diplomats. In 1980 President Carter sent a military mission to rescue them that crashed and failed at Desert One. The hostages were released on Jan. 20, 1981, the day of Ronald Reagan's first inauguration, which seemed to symbolize a clean slate, but Reagan became involved in secret arms sales to Iran via his National Security Council staffer Col. Oliver North. In the late 1990s, we began to view Iran's nuclear program with alarm. President George W. Bush placed Iran in the Axis of Evil in his 2002 State of the Union address. Now we hope some combination of U.N. and European diplomacy will forestall Iran going nuclear, or at least buy time, while President Ahmadinejad, the former goon now guiding his nation of 68 million, corresponds with the 12th imam, hidden in his well near the city of Qom.

We might take counsel ourselves with our first, second, third and fourth presidents and their own dealings with Islamic rogue nations -- the warlords of 18th- and early 19th-century North Africa: Morocco, Algiers, Tunis and Tripoli, better known as the Barbary States. George Washington, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson and James Madison were men of this world. Unlike the 12th imam, they cannot tell us what God thinks. But their actions offer a primer in dealing with intractable enemies.

The Barbary States were originally parts of the Turkish empire, struggling for control of the Mediterranean with Spain (Cervantes spent five years as a prisoner of war in Algiers). In the late 1600s, however, they became effectively independent and turned to extortion. Barbary ships preyed on merchantmen and defenseless coastal towns. If your country paid the Barbary States a periodic fee, you would be safe from attack. But if no one had paid up front, you might be captured and held for ransom. If no one then paid under compulsion, you spent your life in slavery. A prisoner could free himself by embracing Islam, especially if he were a capable seaman who could join in the raids of his new co-religionists. The Barbary States ran a pious protection racket, a fusion of jihad and the mob.

The infant U.S. had many merchants but no navy to speak of, so found itself obliged to pay. Thomas Jefferson spent considerable time as minister to France in fruitless dickering. "An angel sent on this business," he wrote, ". . . could have done nothing." In 1795, President Washington commissioned Joel Barlow, a poet and diplomat whose efforts in both fields were characterized by high ambition and modest achievement, to negotiate a treaty with Tripoli. Seeking to avoid any pretext for trouble, Barlow's treaty declared that the U.S. bore "no . . . enmity against the laws, religion or tranquility of Musselmens" because it was "not, in any sense, founded on the Christian religion." (Secularists today point to the treaty as proof that America is not a Christian nation. They would do better to cite the First Amendment, rather than a payoff to thugs.) Barlow's treaty was ratified unanimously by the Senate and signed by Washington's successor, President Adams, in 1797.

Jefferson followed Adams in the White House in 1801, determined to shrink government spending, including on the Navy, which Adams had increased during a maritime showdown with France. Jefferson's first inaugural promised "peace, commerce and honest friendship with all nations," but Tripoli had other ideas. In May 1801 the Bashaw (or pasha) cut down the flag in front of the American consulate, declaring war and demanding a higher tribute. Jefferson sent the excellent little navy which Adams had built to cruise the Barbary coast. The most pacific of the founders resented buying protection. "Nothing will stop the eternal increase from these pirates," he wrote his secretary of state, James Madison, "but the presence of an armed force."

Jefferson's show of force encountered setbacks. The Philadelphia, a 36-gun frigate, ran aground in Tripoli harbor in 1803. Its crew was enslaved, and Lt. Stephen Decatur made a daring raid to burn it. Jefferson's greatest success was a combined land-sea attack on the Bashaw's territory in 1805. The land assault was led by William Eaton, a quarrelsome ex-Army captain, who assembled a force of marines, mercenaries and Muslim allies in Alexandria, Egypt, and marched 500 miles across the desert. Eaton stormed Derna, Tripoli's second largest town, a feat remembered in the Marine Corps Hymn ("to the shores of Tripoli"). The Bashaw, alarmed, negotiated in earnest, agreeing to release his captives for $60,000; we took the deal. Eaton spent an angry, alcoholic old age denouncing what he considered a shameful compromise.

The compromise was ineffective as well as shameful, for in 1812 the Barbary States resumed their predatory ways. This time Algiers was the principle aggressor. James Madison, who was then president, found himself embroiled in war with Great Britain; any thought of dealing with the Barbary States had to be postponed. But in March 1815, four months after peace with Britain was declared, Madison sent a fleet, led by Decatur, now a commodore, to the Mediterranean. Decatur smashed the Algerians and wrung payment from them. Madison hailed "this demonstration of American skill and prowess." Britain, acting on behalf of the European powers, led a punitive expedition of its own in 1816. Barbary piracy was finally stamped out when France conquered Algiers in the 1830s, and a revived Turkish empire reasserted control over Tripoli.

What are the similarities in our situations? Then, as now, too many cooks spoiled the broth. The Barbary States flourished because the major naval powers thought taking action would be too expensive, or were even pleased to see their competitors molested. Today, Iran's nuclear aspirations are suspended in a cat's cradle of diplomacy, Muslim solidarity masking fear, and lucrative arms traffic. We generated our own cross-purposes in our dealings with the Barbary States, even as we do with Iran today: Our founders tried diplomacy, warfare plus diplomacy, and finally warfare, just as we have alternated menaces and blandishments.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad seems more devout than his North African soul mates, who warred against infidels when it would raise money, but who made peace when they were paid. Yet the piety differential is perhaps an illusion: The mullahocracy for whom Mr. Ahmadinejad fronts has grown well used to ease and power.

The big difference, of course, is that Iran hopes for something the Barbary States had no concept of: the ultimate weapon, deliverable by missile, or by terrorist. Perhaps Alexander Hamilton, who took no direct role in the Barbary saga, gives the most useful advice: We should "awake from the deceitful dream of a golden age," he wrote in Federalist No. 6, and realize that we "are yet remote from the happy empire of perfect wisdom and perfect reason." It's a tough world, and our problems won't go away by wishing.

Coalition Of The Erring (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

Imagine where British Prime Minister Tony Blair would be if he hadn't joined with President Bush in prosecuting the Iraq war.

It's hard to resist imagining an alternative universe after hearing Bush and Blair offer their apologies last Thursday for difficulties in Iraq that they did not foresee. It was even more heartbreaking to study Blair's Georgetown University speech the next day, which -- in perfect Third Way fashion -- amended Bush's approach to the world with a vigorous internationalism that would appeal to many of the president's critics.

At their joint news conference, Bush shocked most of his listeners by actually apologizing for something. Except for speaking of his regrets over Abu Ghraib, Bush concentrated on mistakes in the way he said things.

"Saying 'Bring it on,' kind of tough talk, you know, that sent the wrong signal to people," Bush said. "I learned some lessons about expressing myself maybe in a little more sophisticated manner -- you know, 'wanted, dead or alive,' that kind of talk. I think in certain parts of the world it was misinterpreted."

It was striking that Bush focused on the sound of his words and the fact that they had not seemed "sophisticated." But as George Orwell argued in "Politics and the English Language," published in 1946, "the slovenliness of our language makes it easier for us to have foolish thoughts."

What was foolish were the thoughts Bush conveyed: that foreign policy was about his toughness and swagger, that the United States could transform the world and count on potential allies to follow along or acquiesce. The melodrama of the great American Western -- "Wanted, Dead or Alive" -- would be a sufficient story line for one of the most complicated foreign enterprises ever pursued by an American government.

It remains maddening to many who admire Blair that he went along with all this. You wish, at least, that the prime minister could have edited Bush's rhetoric. More important, you wish Blair would have pushed Bush much harder to approach the rest of the world in a way that would have left us with a few more friends and allies.

Blair speaks as if he has no doubts. His defense of the policies he and the president pursued in Iraq was so forceful and articulate that Bush, at the end of one of Blair's eloquent mini-speeches at their news conference, commented: "I'm going to say, that was a great answer."

But Blair's Georgetown speech the next day, while defending the Iraq war, was also an implicit critique of Bush's foreign policy. That's true, even taking into account the Sunday Telegraph's report that Blair softened his remarks on climate change, Iran and other issues at the Bush administration's request.

"Interdependence -- the fact of a crisis somewhere becoming a crisis everywhere -- makes a mockery of traditional views of national interest," Blair declared. "You can't have a coherent view of national interest today without a coherent view of the international community. Nations, even ones as large and powerful as the U.S.A., are affected profoundly by world events; and not affected in time or at the margins, but at breakneck speed and fundamentally."

Calling for "a new concord to displace the old contention," Blair urged the world to help Iraq in its struggle for democracy, but also insisted on joint action to reduce global poverty, deal with climate change and respond to the catastrophe in Sudan.

Blair laid out a broad agenda for reforming international institutions, including the United Nations, and creating new ones. In the process, he suggested that Bush had missed a great opportunity to be the Harry Truman whom he praised lavishly in his address to West Point cadets on Saturday. Just as Truman, George Marshall and Dean Acheson built effective organizations that served the world well for decades after World War II, so did the world need to be reorganized in the wake of the Cold War and in the face of globalization. Too bad Blair couldn't get Bush moving on this four years ago.

Invoking a commitment to the common good that many see as naive in the international sphere, Blair insisted that the "national self-interest" could be best achieved through "effective communal action."

Paradoxically, Bush's best ally may have delivered to the president's political opponents the outlines of a coherent approach to the world. To believe in internationalism, international cooperation and global justice is not soft, but essential and practical. Some who would never accept such thoughts from the likes of John Kerry or Al Gore might give them a second look after hearing them from Blair.

Jordan's King Meets With President Bush (AP)

AP, May 30, 2006

Jordan's King Abdullah II met with President Bush on Monday and urged him to pursue Israeli-Palestinian peace efforts, repeating a plea the king made in a recent letter to the White House.

"King Abdullah underlined the importance of moving forward in the pursuit of a two-state solution as outlined in President Bush's vision for peace," the Jordanian Embassy said in a statement Monday night.

The king told Bush the Palestinian people need aid to avert a humanitarian crisis in the Palestinian territories, the embassy statement said.

Abdullah told Bush that Jordan plans to play a key role in the peace process, the embassy said. Abdullah meets regularly with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and plans to hold a separate meeting in the next few weeks with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Abdullah wrote to Bush earlier this month urging him to help restart the Mideast peace process.

The king met with Bush for a private dinner Monday during a brief visit to the United States. In addition to the Mideast peace process, the possibility of additional U.S. aid for Jordan came up during their conversation, the embassy said.

Abdullah "thanked the president for considering additional assistance to Jordan this year, at a time when Jordan's economy is facing many challenges associated with high oil prices," the statement said.

Earlier Monday, Abdullah met with Vice President Dick Cheney in Jackson Hole, Wyo. The king has been on a private visit to the United States since Friday.

Palestinians Report 3 Dead In Gaza Attack (AP-Y2)

AP2, May 29, 2006

An Israeli helicopter fired a missile in northern Gaza early Tuesday, killing three militants and wounding four, Palestinian security and hospital officials said.

The officials said the incident began with a gun battle across the border, and then the helicopter fired the missile.

The Israeli military had no immediate comment.

The area where the clash took place is a frequent flashpoint. Palestinian militants fire rockets and Israel from there, and there are frequent infiltration attempts by unarmed Palestinians seeking work in Israel and armed militants trying to carry out attacks.

In The Village Of Nowhere, A Fate Soon Sealed (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

NUAMAN, West Bank -- For generations, first in caves hollowed from hillsides, then shepherds' tents and simple stone houses, the Shawarwa and Darawi families thrived here amid pine windbreaks, olive orchards and flocks of sheep. On a hill of their own, they worked, married and raised children.

Jamal Darawi was born here in a weathered house in June 1967, the same month Israel triumphed in the Middle East war. In the conflict, Israel's army seized East Jerusalem and the West Bank from Jordan. Soon, the Israeli government drew a larger municipal boundary around Jerusalem, annexing the lands to the Jewish state, including Darawi's home.

But Israel did not take the people of Nuaman. An Israeli military census right after the war registered families here as West Bank residents, even though their village fell inside Jerusalem's new borders. As a result, the Israeli government has never offered them the right to live in the city, apply for Israeli citizenship or vote in Jerusalem, rights given to Palestinians in other annexed neighborhoods.

For many, it was a distant problem, and as the years passed on Nuaman's single street, the residents did little about it. But now their lives in the village are threatened. Israel's separation barrier is rising along the eastern edge of the village, sealing them inside the Jewish state.

In the valley below Darawi's home, backhoes are preparing the way for the tall fence, which traces a chalky stripe across the far hillside. Soon, the 200 people will be cut off from the Palestinian territories where Israel says they live, enclosed within a state where they have no right to be. This is the village of nowhere.

"All of our life has been changed," said Darawi, 38, a farmer, father and political activist. "The purpose of what is being done here now is to empty this place of its people."

This solitary village on a windswept plateau between Bethlehem and Jerusalem captures in microcosm the accelerating dislocation of Palestinian communities along the Israeli separation barrier now dividing the land with chain link and concrete. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert says the 456-mile barrier will roughly define the final eastern border of Israel.

The 1993 Oslo accords began a process of separation between Israel and the Palestinians and established a semiautonomous Palestinian government in the occupied territories. But the Palestinian uprising that began in 2000, including suicide bomb attacks on Israeli civilians, led Israel to build a towering barrier to keep Palestinians out. The course of the wall, drawn by Israel, is now also separating thousands of Palestinians from their property and from each other.

The Israeli government says the barrier -- in some places a 26-foot-high concrete wall -- runs along a course designed to protect Israel from Palestinian attacks, which have dropped dramatically since construction began. Only a quarter of the barrier follows the pre-1967 borders. Along the rest, it cuts into land Palestinians envision as part of their future state, according to the United Nations.

Approximately one-third of the barrier's route has been challenged in court by Palestinians and Israeli civil rights groups on the grounds that it is based more on annexing Palestinian land than safeguarding Israeli citizens.

As it skirts the edge of this village, the nearly complete barrier is a 10-foot-high chain-link fence with electronic sensors and an 82-foot-wide military buffer running along each side. Construction of the fence, along with a new road for Jewish settlers commuting to Jerusalem and a crossing terminal, has consumed acres of valley and hillside once used by families here for agriculture.

In Jerusalem, the barrier has cast a shadow across the daily lives of thousands of Palestinians. Once complete, it will leave roughly 140,000 Palestinians with Jerusalem residency rights on the West Bank side, forcing them to pass through Israeli-controlled checkpoints along the wall to reach jobs, families and classrooms in the city. Another 110,000 will remain on Israel's side of the barrier with equally uncertain access to the West Bank.

Idyllic and isolated by layers of hills, Nuaman is a mix of two dozen aging stone houses and grander homes of a younger generation, clustered along the one-lane road that dips toward the valley below. Tilled plots of vegetables, olive trees and lemon groves line the back yards, and on weekends they fill with parents and children helping with harvests. Stands of cypress surround small graveyards on the hillside above and in the valley below.

This village lies close enough to Jerusalem's Old City that some of its men travel by foot to the al-Aqsa mosque each Friday to pray. On nearby hillsides, topped with minarets and watchtowers, camels graze in the twilight shadows cast by apartment towers in the Jewish settlement of Har Homa. The fence draws tighter each day.

"This village," said Labib Habib, a lawyer representing the residents, "will not survive."'The Original Owners'

In sandals, Darawi negotiated the rocky hillside beneath his house one recent afternoon holding the hand of his 5-year-old daughter, Yara. The slope bloomed with wildflowers and spring wheat under his feet.

The landmarks on the hillside, he said during the walking tour, tell the story of his family's claim to the land.

Darawi is tall and broad, round around the middle with thick hands and a smile that rarely appears unless his three children are nearby. His hair recedes in a black widow's peak, and his bristly mustache is streaked with gray.

In silence, he made his way to an opening in the hillside, ducking into a cavern with rough walls blackened by a thousand cooking fires. The outlines of an animal pen appeared in one corner. Across its length sat the stone oven where his grandmother baked bread as recently as three decades ago.

"We are the original owners of this land," Darawi said, emerging from the cavern and ascending toward a stone house with shuttered windows and grassy tufts sprouting from the roof. A stone above the door, etched with a crescent moon and Arabic script, says the house belongs to Suleiman Darawi, Jamal's grandfather. It was built, according to a date on the stone, in 1963.

Darawi grew up walking to schools in East Jerusalem. He participated in demonstrations protesting Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon and marking the anniversary of the 1967 war. He attended university in the territories and in Jordan, receiving his undergraduate degree in 1987. That December, a Palestinian uprising against the Israeli occupation broke out and his plans to work in a medical laboratory suddenly changed. He joined the ranks of the Popular Front for Liberation of Palestine, a radical nationalist movement with a Marxist orientation. At 21, Darawi began his first of four stints in Israeli prisons, held without charge, he said, for participating in the uprising.

After the 1993 accords, he joined the newly established Palestinian Authority, where he now works as a political organizer in Bethlehem, a city that will soon lie on the West Bank side of the fence. Even now, his work is reachable only by passing through an Israeli military checkpoint.

As he returned home from Bethlehem with his toddler son, Suleiman, and some Palestinian laborers last month, Darawi said, soldiers at the checkpoint ordered them out of his Isuzu Trooper. The soldiers began a search and then told the men to lift their T-shirts, though Darawi refused as his son looked on. The others obeyed.

"I have my dignity," he said. "I have my self-respect and I won't take my clothes off for them."Erased From the Map

Darawi was an infant when Israeli soldiers arrived in the weeks after the war with pens and notepads to carry out a census. The troubles of the village can be traced to that day.

At the time the war broke out, the village was located in Jordan. Some of the village men were working construction in Amman, the capital, and were unable to return for years after Israel occupied the land. According to aerial photographs taken in August 1967 by Israel's mapping agency, 13 houses ran along the ridge. While showing that the houses existed, the photos have not resolved the question of who lived in them at the time.

The soldiers registered the people they found there as residents of Um A-Talla, a West Bank village where the head of their clan lived. Israel then renamed the village Mazmuriya for a Roman archaeological site nearby, erasing Nuaman from the map.

Whether a clerical error or deliberate, the West Bank residency classification deprived the families of the right to live, vote in municipal elections and work in Jerusalem that thousands of other Palestinians in the city's annexed neighborhoods received.

Sabin Hadad, a spokeswoman for Israel's Interior Ministry, said that "either they were not there when the census took place or they did not live there continuously, and therefore did not enjoy the right to obtain an Israeli ID."

"The fact that they now live in Israel does not make them automatic Israeli residents, just as living in the United States does not grant you automatic rights of citizenship or residency," Hadad said.A Settlement Rises

Yusef Darawi's mobile phone rang.

The voice on the other end came in angry shouts -- his boss. Yusef's almond eyes looked into his lap.

"We're under pressure," he said, snapping his phone shut with calloused hands. "We're behind schedule because they won't let us in." He had been denied passage through a checkpoint to work on a construction site.

Yusef was born in the house behind his own 41 years ago, one of 15 children of a father with two wives. Now he was helping build a Jewish settlement planned in the years after Oslo that, according to its development plan, would likely displace his own village one day.

Throughout Israel and the territories, peace seemed a possibility after the Oslo accords. The village of Nuaman had grown to 25 homes by then. Young men like Yusef were starting their own families and building multistory houses next to the squat one-room cottages they were born in.

Then one day, within a year of the Oslo accords, a pair of Israeli building inspectors arrived at the unfinished home of Mahmoud Atiyeh Shawarwa, one of Yusef's many distant cousins. The inspectors ordered the construction, which Shawarwa was doing himself, to stop for lack of building permits granted by the city of Jerusalem.

"We never knew this was part of Jerusalem until they told us that," Yusef recalled. "The inspector who told us was surprised to see we had West Bank identification. We told him everyone here did."

Some residents began appealing to the Interior Ministry for residency rights, though none were successful. All building in the village was frozen. On a hilltop, construction for the Jewish settlement expansion began rising. It is now visible from the window of Yusef's comfortable living room.

Israeli planning maps show that Har Homa's "D" neighborhood is to be built in the years ahead on the hilltop where his home is now. Yusef runs a 30-person construction crew at the site of the settlement, but on this day Israel had closed the territories and kept his men from reaching the job, despite their permits.

"No one wants to work on land that belongs to Arabs," Yusef, a father of six, said with a thin smile. "But you have to feed your family."The Daily Crossing

By 6:30 a.m., clusters of children began gathering outside homes and filing onto the road in the village. Samar and Yara Darawi, Jamal's daughters, were among the bundled crowd.

Students from the village went to school in Jerusalem for years. In 1995, two years after the Oslo accords, the Israelis began turning them away. The students lived inside the city limits, but the Israelis said their parents held West Bank residency documents, based on the census decades earlier, and the children were no longer allowed in Jerusalem schools.

After Oslo, as the two societies began a complicated separation, Nuaman found itself in a crack between them. Although the village was part of Jerusalem, the Palestinian Authority assumed responsibility for its water, electricity and telephone services. Village residents turned to Bethlehem for medical care, but were forced to navigate new Israeli checkpoints along the one road to the outside world.

In her blue-and-white striped school smock, Samar, along with her sister and cousins, walked pensively across the valley -- out of Jerusalem and into the West Bank. The children cast shifting shadows against the exposed hillside, carved out for the new road. Once the fence is complete, the children of Nuaman will have to pass through a chain-link barrier, manned by Israeli soldiers, to reach their school.

On this day, however, the soldiers were huddled against the chill, inside an armored personnel carrier that sat near the site where the terminal will be built. Coils of concertina wire marked the location.

Only the patter of light footsteps sounded as the children wound their way down the road to the valley floor, Samar's long single braid bouncing against her pink backpack. Two days earlier, the Darawi girls had not gone to school because they were frightened to cross the Israeli checkpoint. Samar, flushed cheeks beneath brown eyes, said Israeli soldiers had searched her backpack and torn up a map of historic Palestine she had inside.

This day the soldiers waved and smiled at the children. As they climbed past a small graveyard, the mood lightened. Samar and her friends began jostling each other along the footpath, laughing and shouting. Yara turned toward kindergarten, housed in the town council building. Samar and the others stopped at a corner grocery to buy grape drinks and lollipops.

"Now there is no fear," Samar said. "We have passed."A Narrowing Existence

The authorities came to Raed Shawarwa's house, a smooth concrete cube behind his father's, while he was on a job hours away. His wife received them nervously on a March day in 2004. The house, they said, would have to be torn down.

"The Jews told us we had no building permits," said Shawarwa, a cousin of Mahmoud and a distant cousin of the Darawis. "But no one here does."

For years, the village had been growing slowly, clandestinely, despite the 1993 Israeli orders to cease construction. Village sons like Yusef Darawi married and brought their brides from surrounding towns, some with Jerusalem residency. Families grew larger. Today, children's tiny purple pants and school smocks dry on lines strung beneath vine-laced trellises outside many of the homes in the warm evening.

The construction to enlarge homes and accommodate the population growth was done without permits, which Arab residents receive from the Jerusalem municipality only with great difficulty. City officials say the decisions are based on planning criteria. But human rights groups counter that denying permits is a way to limit Arab population growth and increase the proportion of the city's Jewish residents.

An Israeli organization that tracks home demolitions reports that the Jerusalem municipality has destroyed 467 homes that it says were built without permits since 2000 -- the year the second Palestinian uprising began.

As the intifada intensified around him, Shawarwa had more immediate concerns -- saving his house, which with his slight savings, he had built himself. He commuted several hours each day to Ramallah, where, as a heavy-machinery operator on a construction crew, he made far more than in Bethlehem. In a good month, he says, he brings home $225.

Shawarwa appeared in court in 2004 in a bid to make his house legal. He was fined the equivalent of $6,000, more than two years' salary, and the house was ordered sealed until permits could be arranged. Raed bricked up his own windows.

"I felt like I was killing myself," Shawarwa said over warm flat bread and tea under an olive tree on his doorstep.

The house is still sealed two years later. When he went to the Jerusalem municipality to arrange for permits, he discovered he lived nowhere.

"The people there told us we didn't belong to Jerusalem but to Bethlehem," said Shawarwa, who is still paying off his fine in monthly increments. "When we went to Bethlehem, they told us we belong to Jerusalem. So we learned that we don't belong to either side."

Last year, a lawyer for Nuaman and the Israeli government reached an agreement that would allow the families to apply for Jerusalem residency without a guarantee of success, a risky proposition given that failure would likely cost them their homes. The status of the agreement appears uncertain now, and the villagers have appealed to the Jerusalem municipality for the fence to be rerouted in a way that leaves them in the West Bank.

Life in the village, meanwhile, is narrowing.

At the end of April, Israeli work crews installed a steel gate at one end of the road into the village. A lock and chain appeared on it a week later, the only keys in the hands of border police and the work crews in the valley below. No taxis, buses or private vehicles that do not belong to village residents are allowed in.

The village has been without running water for much of this month, shut off by the construction crews working below. Lowering buckets into makeshift backyard wells, men and women fetch their own water just as their parents and grandparents did on the same hilltop decades ago.Lives Dismantled

Nidal Darawi, a schoolteacher, married in late 2005. The newlyweds added a kitchen to the small house he had built eight years earlier without permits. But the construction job drew the notice of passing border police patrols. The demolition team arrived soon after, on the last day of January.

Using a backhoe, the crew dismantled the house as the family and soldiers looked on. The carefully tended rosebushes rimming the property remain intact, surrounding a heap of rubble and twisted rebar.

"This is a threat to Israel?" asked Yusef Darawi, a brother, looking over the wreckage of the house in the lot behind his own. "This was his blood and the blood of his children -- all of his savings."

British Teachers' Union Votes On Boycott (AP)

By Paisley Dodds

AP, May 29, 2006

Britain's largest college teachers' union voted Monday to consider boycotting Israeli academics over what members termed "apartheid" policies and discrimination against Palestinians.

DOJ_NMG_0030398

The 69,000-member National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education, or NATFHE, passed the motion at its annual conference in the northern English city of Blackpool.

NATFHE is merging with another teachers' union this week. Trevor Phillips, a spokesman for NATFHE, said Monday's vote would be purely advisory and not set policy for the new, larger union, which will have more than 100,000 members.

Ronnie Fraser, director of the Academic Friends of Israel, said his group would continue fighting the boycott proposal, which he called "racist."

"If the sponsors of this boycotting campaign succeeded in something, it is only to undermine further progress, collaboration and peace in the Middle East and to marginalize the standing of NATFHE," Fraser said.

One part of the motion called on union members to consider whether they should refuse to cooperate with Israeli academics or Israeli research journals that do not "disassociate themselves" from the policies described in the motion.

It said members had a responsibility to ensure "equity and nondiscrimination" in Israeli education institutions and passed with 106 regional delegates in favor, 71 against and 21 abstaining, Phillips said.

Other parts of the boycott motion that passed with a show of hands noted Israel's "apartheid practices" toward Palestinians, including the construction of a wall between Israel and the West Bank, and called for more meetings in secondary schools and universities on the subject.

"This resolution's intent is an aggressive assault on the universal concept of academic freedom," said Prof. Yosi Yeshurun, rector of Israel's Bar-Ilan University and chairman of the country's International Advisory Board for Academic Freedom. "It reflects a lack of knowledge of the structure of the Israeli academia, which consists of all the spectrum of Israeli political views."

The proposal reopened debate sparked last year when Britain's 40,000-member Association of University Teachers voted to boycott Bar-Ilan and Haifa universities for actions that it said undermined Palestinian rights and academic freedom.

That union said it targeted Bar-Ilan for its links to the College of Judea and Samaria in the West Bank settlement of Ariel. It accused Haifa University of threatening to fire an Israeli political science lecturer for supporting a student's research into allegations of killings by Israeli troops.

The universities said many elements of the allegations were false. The boycott was condemned by the Israeli and British governments and overturned after a month.

Some British academics continue to push for ties to be cut. Professor Richard Seaford, a classicist at Exeter University, told the British Broadcasting Corp. that he and other academics were already engaged in an informal boycott, refusing to submit work to Israeli journals or collaborate with Israeli academics.

The American Association for the Advancement of Science had urged NATFHE to withdraw the boycott motion, calling it "antithetical to the positive role of free scientific inquiry in improving the lives of all citizens of the world, and in promoting cooperation among nations, despite political differences."

British Teachers Favor Call To Boycott Israelis (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

LONDON, May 29 — Britain's biggest association of higher education instructors voted Monday to urge its 67,000 members to consider boycotting Israeli academics who had failed to renounce what it called Israel's "apartheid policies."

The resolution by the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education deepened the contest among academics in Britain, the United States and the Middle East that has evoked questions of academic freedom. The debate threatened to further divide British academics into camps — for or against the imposition of penalties on Israeli university teachers cast as complicit in Israeli government actions in the West Bank and Gaza.

At its annual conference in Blackpool, in northern England, the association voted 106 to 71 in favor of the resolution, which called for the organization's members "to consider their own responsibility for ensuring equity and nondiscrimination in contacts with Israeli educational institutions or individuals." There were 21 abstentions, said Trevor Phillips, an association spokesman.

The text of the resolution noted "continuing Israeli apartheid policies, including construction of the exclusion wall and discriminatory educational practices," and it urged the association's members to "consider the appropriateness of a boycott of those that do not publicly dissociate themselves from such policies."

The resolution's thrust is to encourage individual academics in Britain to sever professional contact with their counterparts in Israel.

The resolution was "advisory" rather than mandatory, Mr. Phillips said in a telephone interview. It echoed a call last year by the smaller Association of University Teachers, which first demanded a boycott of two Israeli universities and then withdrew the call under pressure from some of its members.

The unions are set to merge into a single body, the University and College Union, on Thursday, and there has been some discussion of the resolution's status after that date. Some academics said the struggle over the principle of boycotting would carry over to the new organization.

Sue Blackwell, a lecturer in English at Birmingham University and a supporter of last year's boycott move, said: "This is a contentious issue of policy. The new union will have to adopt its own policy."

Emanuele Ottolenghi, who teaches Israeli politics at St. Antony's College at Oxford and opposes the boycott, said, "The view is that this is purely symbolic and will have no consequences" after the creation of the new union.

"But I think it will have consequences, not so much because it will be binding, but because it creates a precedent," he said. "This will bolster the pro-boycott lobby" within the new organization. He said he would ask to be boycotted by other academics who supported the resolution.

"I don't think anyone should be asked to come clean about political views as a precondition" for academic cooperation, he said in a telephone interview.Palestinian supporters of the boycott argue that it should be imposed as part of a broader effort to isolate Israel, modeled on the sanctions used against white-ruled South Africa in the apartheid era.

In a statement after the resolution was approved Monday, the Palestinian Campaign for the Academic and Cultural Boycott of Israel said, "Just as in the South African case, a comprehensive regime of sanctions and boycotts remains not only the most politically effective but also the most morally sound strategy in bringing about Israel's compliance with international law and universal principles of human rights."

Ms. Blackwell is a member of a commission from the smaller Association of University Teachers studying the Israel-Palestine academic issue. It has drawn up proposals for penalties, from "graylisting" of academic institutions — publishing their names as not adhering to adequate standards — to a full boycott.

Such proposals seem likely to recur within the British debate, deepening the divide.

In a separate statement on Monday, the pro-boycott British Committee for the Universities of Palestine called the association's vote "a historic step forward both in expressing our solidarity with our Palestinian academic colleagues, and also in helping persuade our Israeli academic colleagues that it is time to cease silent complicity with the illegal acts of the Israeli state."

But opponents of the boycott insisted such views would be challenged. "I don't think this is going to lead to a split down the middle," said Mr. Ottolenghi at Oxford University. "It's going to be a small minority pursuing the boycott and a large majority finding it distasteful."

Bolton Changes Tune Over UN Relationship (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, May 30, 2006

After a recent Security Council resolution on Lebanon, John Bolton, the iconoclastic US ambassador to the United Nations, invoked the wisdom of the Rolling Stones to assembled reporters.

“You can’t always get what you want,” he intoned, “but if you try sometimes, you just might find you get what you need.”

It was an interesting statement from the ambassador of a country more often characterised in UN circles as coming late to negotiations and rejecting them if it does not get exactly what it wants.

Senator Paul Sarbanes upbraided this tendency in the Senate foreign relations committee last week. “I’d hate for you to be the coach of an athletic team,” he told Mr Bolton. “This role of the constant scold, I’m not sure it’s the best way to induce change.”

Yet the recent US record at the UN is more complex than that put-down would suggest. For a start, in spite of personal rivalries, significant progress has been made in relations between the transatlantic powers, which appear once more broadly in harmony during UN debates.

But that may no longer be enough for the US to get what it wants. China is exerting growing influence over a range of Security Council debates and tensions with Russia are rising. Both regularly find common cause against Washington, undermining attempts at action by the council.

Meanwhile, in the General Assembly, a bloc of developing countries is growing increasingly vocal about the US vision, with India, Egypt and South Africa, all US allies, among those to the fore of the dissenting chorus.

In the Security Council, the US did manage, after much wrangling, to win a unanimous statement urging Tehran to cease nuclear enrichment. But its subsequent efforts to threaten sanctions quickly ran into Sino-Russian opposition.

US policy at the UN, with French backing, also did much to achieve a withdrawal of Syrian troops from Lebanon. But recent efforts to clamp down on the Lebanese Islamic party Hizbollah and its Iranian backers have been considerably less successful.

And on Sudan, a recent US-European push to punish alleged war criminals overcame Chinese objections but fell short of securing backing to target key regime figures. While a new US-backed resolution should speed up efforts to deploy UN peacekeepers, it is still unclear which countries will offer troops and success is far from assured.

The picture gets worse in the General Assembly, where the US has suffered outright defeats. It was isolated in its opposition to a new Human Rights Council and a coalition of developing countries recently forced through a rejection of American-backed management reforms.

"These countries that are coming into their own are not going to put up with the 1945 order any more," said Mark Malloch Brown, UN deputy secretary-general. "Ultimately, if the US price of paying 22 per cent of the budget is to keep the UN ever more imprisoned in that 1945 arrangement, they are reaching the point where they are as likely as the US to say 'enough's enough'."

This has prompted some searching questions. Is the US failing diplomatically or has its ability to wield influence at the UN been fundamentally diminished? On the other hand, could its recent compromises in the council mark not a decline in influence but emergence of a more mature foreign policy?

The problem, say analysts, is that it is not always clear what the US objectives actually are. Mr Bolton is often suspected of pursuing a different set of policies to Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, leading to significant confusion among diplomats. Mr Bolton, for his part, claims there is little evidence of a new Russia-China axis and suggests the developing-world attack is part of a cyclical pattern.

By contrast, he says the permanent members of the Security Council are actually working more closely than before and that he has recently taken a more conciliatory approach to the assembly's reform debate, alongside Japanese, Canadian and Australian allies.

Mr Bolton also warns against drawing too many conclusions from events at the UN. "By and large, what happens in the Security Council reflects larger geopolitical realities," he told the Financial Times, "but what happens here in New York doesn't necessarily affect what goes on in the bigger world."

"I don't think that much of what happens here reflects the status of bilateral relationships. Sometimes it's like being in the twilight zone – it's a different environment that operates under practices that are decades old."

Drive To Aid Indonesia (CSM)

By Michael J. Coren And Tom McCawley

The Christian Science Monitor, May 30, 2006

BANTUL AND YOGYAKARTA, INDONESIA - The rumble of C-130 cargo planes over the ancient Indonesian city of Yogyakarta Monday marked the slow but increasing flow of emergency aid to survivors of Saturday's quake.

The scale of the relief effort needed is still coming into focus. The magnitude 6.3 temblor that rocked the island of Java has left more than 5,000 dead and at least 150,000 people homeless, according to UN and Indonesian official estimates.

Food, medicine, and tents began arriving after the quake-damaged airport reopened to aid flights on Sunday. The International Red Cross, for example, says it has already sent a field hospital and 2,000 tents, with 8,000 more on the way. But as of Monday, most of the aid had yet to be distributed beyond the capital here.

Indonesia's President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono, who spent Saturday night sleeping in a tent with quake surivivors, said relief efforts reflected a "lack of coordination."

"There is a lack of clothes, food, of everything. We need help," says Sugiharto, who lives in Bantul, the worst-hit area south of Yogyakarta. Sugiharto's two sons were trapped in the rubble for 30 minutes before he was able to pull them out. Like many of the thousands injured in the quake, one of Sugiharto's sons had two broken legs.

Some 80 percent of the homes in Bantul were destroyed. The Indonesian government estimates as many as 35,000 homes and buildings on the island of Java were reduced to rubble.

In Sugiharto's tiny village, some 25 survivors - ranging in age from 1 to 80 - sat under blue tarps staring out at a relentless rain that has fallen each night since the quake.

The aid that did arrive on Monday inched along rubble-choked roads. Residents, some who said they lost their entire families, gathered into isolated encampments following the temblor. But most stayed put, saying they prefer the familiarity of their devastated villages to low-lying camps scattered nearby.

As with the December 2004 tsunami that devastated villages in Banda Aceh, Indonesia, many of the first groups to provide help to the Java quake survivors were nongovernmental organizations.

Food distribution has fallen to private citizens who have been driving their SUVs into the rice paddy fields handing out eggs, cookies, cooking oil, and rice. One government truck drove by announcing the location of a food pickup point, say residents, but no food was found at the site.

Islamic political groups are stepping in to help, already establishing camps housing as many as 600 people.

Monday, rescue workers and some distraught relatives continued to search collapsed buildings, even as aftershocks continued through the weekend.

DOJ_NMG_0030401

In Yogyakarta, boxes stenciled with "Japanese Disaster Response Team" arrived in hotel lobbies and the distinctive white UN vehicles began to ply the roads. Although inadequate for the scale of this disaster, some international and Indonesia aid was already here prior to Saturday's quake to support villagers evacuating from the sides of Mt. Merapi, a nearby volcano threatening to erupt.

For example, Oxfam, with a branch in Yogyakarta, has already distributed 600 tents, 1,600 tarpaulins, and 6,000 hygiene kits. The World Food Program is sending 200 tons of food.

Since Saturday, more than a dozen national governments have pledged assistance. The US has committed $2.5 million in aid and is sending 100 doctors, nurses, and medical technicians from a base in Okinawa, Japan. Britain has pledged $5.6 million to be channeled through UN relief efforts. The European Union pledged $3.8 million, China is sending $2 million, and Japan almost $1 million plus medical teams.

International aid agencies met in Geneva Monday to coordinate relief and brief donor nations on the specific kinds of help needed.

Yet residents in the ruins of some isolated villages said they had not yet seen a government or aid worker.

The Indonesian military sent teams to the province to rescue survivors, residents said, along with about 600 military cadets here clearing debris and starting reconstruction.

The government's attention appears to be focused on overwhelmed hospitals where doctors have been triaging patients crammed into hallways and courtyards. Hundreds of victims are lying on newspapers, plastic tarpaulins, and even banana and palm leaves. Nurses were forced to set up intravenous drips using trees in car parks as props.

Budi Mulyono, a spokesman for the Sardjito Hospital, says they needed more of everything, including doctors, medical supplies, and tents.

At Yogyakarta's Muhammadiyah Hospital, which is filled to seven times its normal capacity, paramedic Gunawan says, "Our doctors and nurses were included among the victims. So you can imagine our situation. This is the best I can do at the moment."

Many had feared devastation and death on the scale that followed the tsunami in in 2004. The quake death toll by Monday night reached 5,140, according to Biwara Yuswantana, a government spokesperson, although it was expected to keep climbing.

The two disasters differed in another way as well, says Gunawan, who worked as a medic in Aceh for five months.

"The difference is the [nature of the injuries suffered by] victims and the lack of dead bodies, says Gunawan. 'In this earthquake, there were bodies, but there were also true emergency patients."

In the coming days, aid workers cite several local conditions that will help their relief effort. Yogyakarta airport is functioning. And unlike Aceh, most roads were undamaged. In fact, much of the area's infrastructure, including communications towers, sewage facilities, and government offices were left largely intact.

By nightfall Monday, thick rains fell on thousands of the displaced, sheltering in tent settlements, parking lots, and rice fields.

"My house was flattened, everything was flattened," says Wati, a grandmother, who, like many Indonesians, only uses one name. She crouched with her two grandchildren in a deserted shop opposite the main buildings of an Islamic university in Yogyakarta that had been tipped sideways by the quake. Then, there's Mt. Merapi

Residents of the rice-growing towns of Bantul and Klaten, the worst hit areas, had been watching the grumbling volcano Mt. Merapi, that has been spewing clouds of ash and gas in recent weeks.

Activity in the volcano has tripled since Saturday's earthquake, with hot clouds spewed out an average of 150 times a day, compared with 50 times before, said Subandriyo, chief of the Merapi volcanology and monitoring office.

"The earthquake has caused instability in the lava dome," Subandriyo told the Associated Press. "There is still a chance that a big eruption might occur."

Chew Soon Hoe, an associate professor of engineering geology at the National University of Singapore, says Merapi's renewed activity and the earthquake are related. Both are in the same subduction zone - the area where one tectonic plate slides under another plate - along a boundary between the Euro-Asia plate and the India-Australia plate, he says.

"This ocean plate ... is the cause of the recent earthquake and volcanic activity in Indonesia," Mr. Chew says. "Because it is very near, the energy released by the quake will accelerate or perturb the activity of the volcano."

David Booth, a seismologist with the British Geological Survey, disagrees, saying the quake would not necessarily cause the volcano to erupt. He says the plates that shifted to cause the earthquake did not necessarily open cracks in the surface that would be needed to cause a volcanic eruption.

Indonesia, the world's largest archipelago sits atop the Ring of Fire, an arc of volcanoes and fault lines around the Pacific basin. Indonesia has some 129 active volcanoes.

Indonesian Quake Toll Climbs; Aid Arrives (AP)

By Irwan Firdaus

AP, May 29, 2006

Homeless earthquake survivors living in rice fields and makeshift shacks begged for food and water under a blazing sun Monday as Indonesia's death toll rose to over 5,000.

Soldiers began delivering bags of rice to village chiefs in the mountainous quake zone on the island of Java, but survivors called the aid meager and slow. The United Nations planned a global appeal, saying relief money was running low.

"We have 300 families in this village and have only gotten two sacks of rice," said Lastri, 27, holding a 5-month-old. "It's not enough."

Indonesia's Social Affairs Ministry raised the death toll to 5,137, saying some 800 bodies that were buried in mass graves immediately after the quake had just been counted.

Thousands of people including children and the elderly lined main roads in the area of Saturday's 6.3-magnitude quake, holding out whatever containers they could find to hold donations to buy rice, oil and candles.

"Please give me something, I'm hungry," 7-year-old Sari told passing drivers, standing beside a group of children carrying banners that read "We have not gotten any aid" and "Help us."

A plane chartered by the U.N. children's agency touched down near the disaster area, and the United States, which pledged $2.5 million, said 100 military doctors and nurses were en route with surgical, dental and other equipment.

But rough roads in mountainous central Java and new cracks in the runway at the region's main airport hampered delivery efforts.

In Jamprip, a village of 300 families, Edi Sutrisno, 37, helped unload aid from a military truck — two bags of rice, nine boxes of dried noodles and two boxes of bottled water.

"It's the first we've gotten since the quake," he said. "Of course it's not enough for all of us, not even for a day."

A group of teenagers raced up to a slowing truck and managed to steal supplies off the back, but their excitement was short-lived.

"I thought it was food, but it was just soap and toothbrushes," said Andi Marwanto, 16.

The government said an estimated 200,000 people were homeless, most living in improvised shacks close to their former homes or in shelters erected in rice fields. Hospitals overflowed with bloodied survivors. Power was still out in much of the quake region, which covers hundreds of square miles.

Compounding the devastation were fears of an eruption of nearby Mount Merapi, which has been belching gas and lava for weeks, and a scientist said its volcanic activity had increased threefold since the quake.

Lava and hot clouds of gas were avalanching 2 1/2 miles down the volcano's slopes Monday, said volcanologist Subandriyo, who like many Indonesians uses only one name.

President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono visited refugees Monday and acknowledged a "lack of coordination" in aid distribution. He urged government officials to be "more agile."

"I saw in many areas that there are many things that need to be speeded up," said Yudhoyono, who moved his office to the ancient city of Yogyakarta to supervise relief operations.

A UNICEF plane loaded with water, tents, stoves and cooking sets arrived Monday in Solo, a city about three hours' drive from the hardest-hit district of Bantul.

On Sunday, three U.N. trucks brought high-energy biscuits to survivors and two Singapore military cargo planes arrived with doctors and medical supplies.

Some 22 countries have contributed or pledged assistance, the U.N. Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs said in Geneva. The agency said it has released $100,000 in emergency funds to jump start the relief effort, but said it will need much more.

Indonesia said it hoped foreign aid would account for 50 percent of the $108 million to $161 million in estimated rehabilitation costs.

The quake was the fourth destructive temblor to hit Indonesia in the past 17 months, including the one that spawned the Dec. 26, 2004, Indian Ocean tsunami that left at least 216,000 dead or missing.

The country also is battling a bird flu crisis and a spate of terror attacks by al-Qaida-linked Islamic militants.

Indonesia, the world's largest archipelago, is prone to seismic upheaval due to its location on the so-called Pacific "Ring of Fire," an arc of volcanos and fault lines encircling the Pacific Basin. It has 76 volcanos, the largest number of any nation.

Indonesian Hospital Overflows With Victims (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0030403

By Richard C. Paddock

The Los Angeles Times, May 30, 2006

BANTUL, Indonesia — Panembahan Senopati Hospital was designed for 140 patients. On Monday, it had 1,200.

Even so, the wards were nearly empty. No one wanted to stay inside. Instead, the patients lay in rows in the open-air reception area and in the sprawling hospital's exterior corridors.

These were survivors of Saturday's central Java earthquake, which measured magnitude 6.3 and killed more than 5,100 people as of Monday. Many at the hospital had casts on broken limbs and bandages on cuts, but the psychic wounds they suffered from the quake were far greater.

"The main problem is the patients don't want to go home," said the hospital's director, Dr. Endang Purwati. "They are afraid to go and they don't have houses."

Most of the patients narrowly escaped from their collapsing homes and live in fear of a major aftershock. Refusing to stay in the wards, they were poised to make a break for the parking lot at the first sign of shaking.

They lay on mattresses, thin woven mats or pieces of cardboard. Some were connected to intravenous drips that hung from window frames and exterior air conditioning units.

Even those who were sedated or wearing casts were resting in prime spots only a few steps from the safety of the open air. Never mind that the sturdily built hospital suffered no damage on Saturday.

"If there is another earthquake, we can run faster," said Nada Refty Nurhidayah, 15, who was taking care of her grandmother, Ngatrihardi Suwarno.

Suwarno suffered a compressed vertebra when two banana trees fell on her. Sedated, she lay on a mat on the floor two feet from the main reception counter, surround by hundreds of other patients. Soldiers carried injured people past on cots, and the reception area was filled with the constant buzz of activity.

People came every few minutes to stand only inches from Suwarno's head and use a phone on the counter. Some narrowly missed stepping on her. She was oblivious to it all.

Authorities estimate that the quake left between 100,000 and 200,000 Indonesians homeless. Many are sleeping in rice paddies and soccer fields in shelters made of plastic sheeting that do little to protect them from frequent downpours.

Throughout the quake zone Monday, hundreds of young men and boys stood in the middle of busy streets with cardboard boxes begging for assistance from cars that zipped past. "We need to eat," read the sign on a box held by one boy. "Please help," said another.

In the stricken village of Manding Gandekan, about 50 villagers were taking part in the fund- raising drive. Some had placed chairs and benches in the middle of the street to slow traffic. Sometimes, one of the boys would step in front of a line of cars to stop them in the hope of snagging a donation.

"Nobody's scared because this is what we do to get some food," said Rustam Nurkholis, 18. In three days of begging, he said the group had raised about $18.

President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono acknowledged Monday that assistance had been slow in arriving to the quake zone. "I saw in many areas that there are things that need to be speeded up," he said.

Ibham Samawi, the regent of Bantul, the hardest hit area, said he was sorry the government had not done more to help victims.

"We apologize to Bantul residents for not being able to help optimally for the past two days," he said. "But now we have enough people to work."

Nearly 100 troops from Malaysia joined Indonesian soldiers and volunteers in digging through the rubble for bodies. Authorities said it would be unlikely to find any survivors at this stage, three days after the quake.

Archeologists were still coming to grips with the damage caused to Prambanan, a 9th century Hindu temple complex that is one of Indonesia's most significant historic monuments. The tallest temple is more than 150 feet tall.

Hundreds of chunks of stone were shaken loose from the complex's 16 main temples. Many of them weigh hundreds of pounds each and crashed to the ground around the temples. Some of the intricate stone reliefs were damaged, and one of the temples has begun leaning to one side.

To help treat survivors of the quake, meanwhile, the United States was sending 100 doctors and other medical personnel to Indonesia from facilities in Okinawa, Guam and the Philippines.

Purwati, the director at Panembahan Senopati hospital, welcomed the possibility of assistance. She said the hospital was in need of doctors and nurses, surgical equipment, and needles and thread for sewing up victims' wounds.

She said most of the patients admitted to the hospital were suffering from broken bones and lacerations. She estimated that a third of those were physically healthy enough to leave.

Suprapdi Harjono, 54, was in the hospital for kidney failure when the earthquake struck. Like other patients, he hurried out of the building onto the lawn. The shock of the quake gave him a mild heart attack. On Monday, he sat quietly on a mattress in the outer corridor with other patients.

"We ran when the earthquake happened," he said. "Now I am scared to go back to my room."

Indonesia Pleads For Relief As Quake Aid Slowly Arrives (WT/AP)

By Chris Brummitt, Associated Press

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

BANTUL, Indonesia -- Emergency aid began arriving yesterday in areas devastated by a magnitude 6.3 earthquake in Indonesia, but officials said supplies were not being delivered fast enough to victims who begged for help on roads lined with crumpled buildings.

The government's Social Affairs Ministry raised the official death toll to 5,427. The new number includes bodies buried in mass graves immediately after the quake.

The International Committee of the Red Cross said it had sent a field hospital and distributed about 2,000 tents, with up to 8,000 more on the way.

The United Nations sent three trucks carrying high-energy biscuits and a plane loaded with water, tents, stoves and cooking gear.

Two Singapore military cargo planes arrived at Yogyakarta airport with doctors and medical supplies.

Japan said it would dispatch land, sea and air forces to help with relief efforts.

But officials said supplies remain inadequate.

"We have received food and medicine from the government, but it's not enough," said Suparno, a neighborhood official in the hardest-hit district of Bantul on Java island who goes by one name, like many Indonesians. "How can I distribute [90 pounds] of rice to 1,200 people?"

Indonesia said late Sunday that it would allocate $107 million to help rebuild over the next year.

The United States has allocated $2.5 million in aid, and the U.S. military plans to send 100 doctors, nurses and medical technicians from a base in Okinawa to Indonesia, U.S. Pacific Command spokesman Lt. Col. Bill Bigelow said Sunday.

The U.N. Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs has released $100,000 in emergency aid but said it will need to give much more.

U.N. humanitarian chief Jan Egeland has proposed boosting relief efforts with money from the United Nations' $178 million central emergency relief fund.

U.N. officials in Indonesia said the most urgent needs were for generators, tents, three 100-bed field hospitals and medical supplies, mostly for treating broken limbs. Officials said they hoped to meet these requirements within three days.

France said yesterday that it would send medical equipment and personnel. Spain was to send 12 tons of tents, blankets and medicines and other aid, and Germany said aid groups were moving water-purification equipment and a mobile medical clinic to Java.

Britain, the European Union, China and the Japanese Red Cross Society together have given, or pledged to give, more than $14 million.

Indonesian President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono -- criticized by some as being hesitant to act in the past -- spent the first night after Saturday's quake sleeping in a tent along with survivors and moved his office to the nearby city of Yogyakarta to supervise relief operations.

Quake Survivors Desperate For Aid (WP)

By Irwan Firdaus

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

JAMPRIP, Indonesia, May 30 -- Homeless earthquake survivors living in rice fields and makeshift shacks begged for food and water under a blazing sun Monday as the death toll from Saturday's quake continued to rise.

Indonesia's Social Affairs Ministry on Tuesday raised the official death toll to 5,427.

Soldiers began delivering bags of rice Monday to village chiefs in the mountainous quake zone on the island of Java, but survivors called the aid meager and slow. The United Nations planned a global appeal, saying relief money was running low.

"We have 300 families in this village and have only gotten two sacks of rice," said Lastri, 27, holding a 5-month-old child. "It's not enough."

Thousands of people including children and the elderly lined main roads in the area of the 6.3-magnitude quake, holding out whatever containers they could find for donations to buy rice, oil and candles.

"Please give me something, I'm hungry," 7-year-old Sari told passing drivers, standing beside a group of children carrying banners that read "We have not gotten any aid" and "Help us."

Explaining the continuing rise in the official toll, Indonesia's Social Affairs Ministry said Monday that about 800 bodies that were buried in mass graves immediately after the quake had just been counted.

A plane chartered by UNICEF, the U.N. children's agency, touched down near the disaster area, and the United States, which pledged $2.5 million, said 100 military doctors and nurses were en route with surgical, dental and other equipment. But rough roads in mountainous central Java and new cracks in the runway at the region's main airport hampered delivery efforts.

In Jamprip, a village of 300 families, Edi Sutrisno, 37, helped unload aid from a military truck -- two bags of rice, nine boxes of dried noodles and two boxes of bottled water. "It's the first we've gotten since the quake," he said. "Of course it's not enough for all of us, not even for a day."

A group of teenagers raced up to a slowing truck and managed to steal supplies off the back, but their excitement was short-lived. "I thought it was food, but it was just soap and toothbrushes," said Andi Marwanto, 16.

The government said an estimated 200,000 people were homeless, most living in improvised shacks close to their former homes or in shelters erected in rice fields. Hospitals overflowed with bloodied survivors. Power was still out in much of the quake region, which covers hundreds of square miles.

Compounding the devastation were fears of an eruption of nearby Mount Merapi, which has been belching gas and lava for weeks, and a scientist said its volcanic activity had increased threefold since the quake.

Lava and hot clouds of gas were avalanching 2 1/2 miles down the volcano's slopes Monday, said volcanologist Subandriyo, who like many Indonesians uses only one name.

President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono visited refugees Monday and acknowledged a "lack of coordination" in aid distribution. He urged government officials to be "more agile."

More than 20 countries have contributed or pledged assistance, the U.N. Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs said in Geneva. The agency said it had released $100,000 in emergency funds to jump-start the relief effort but that it would need much more.

Indonesia said it hoped foreign aid would account for 50 percent of the $108 million to $161 million in estimated rehabilitation costs.

The quake was the fourth destructive temblor to hit Indonesia in the past 17 months, including the one that led to the Dec. 26, 2004, Indian Ocean tsunami that left at least 216,000 dead or missing.

Aid Reaches Indonesian Quake Area, But Volcano's Activity Increases (NYT)

By Peter Gelling

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

YOGYAKARTA, Indonesia, May 29 — Significant amounts of aid began arriving Monday in Bantul, the town south of this city that was hit the hardest by Saturday's earthquake, but a nearby volcano substantially increased its threatening activity.

For the third night in a row, residents in Bantul and in Klaten, another badly ravaged town, slept outside their houses, grouped around campfires and used debris for cover from the sporadic rain. Some softly strummed guitars, while others, kneeling on mats, prayed for help.

Mount Merapi, a towering 9,800-foot volcano north of Yogyakarta, has been close to an eruption for nearly a month, but activity weakened in recent weeks. Volcanologists said Monday that the powerful quake destabilized a fragile dome at the mountain's peak. Collapse of the dome would set off a large eruption of lava, rocks and hot gas, they said.

Large, billowing clouds of gas were vented from the mountain's crater on Monday, drifting more than two miles down its western slope toward the village of Magelang.

Subandriyo, director of the Merapi division of the Volcanology Center here, said the volcano released 150 gaseous clouds on Monday, compared with an average of 50 the week before.

"Residents living in the danger areas on the slopes of the volcano have again begun to evacuate," he said. "The danger is growing as activity increases."

South of Yogyakarta, the death toll from the earthquake on Saturday rose to about 5,000, with more than 15,000 injured and 100,000 displaced, according to government figures released Monday.

Puji Pujiono, the lead officer of the United Nations team in Bantul, said it was receiving no new reports of missing persons, a sign that the number of deaths might not increase much in the coming days.

Emergency teams previously deployed in Yogyakarta for the expected eruption of Mount Merapi have shifted their resources to Bantul, where a command center for the rescue effort has been established. A communications post there is monitoring the volcano's activity and keeping emergency workers informed of developments.

Activity at the command center in Bantul was high Monday afternoon as government, military and international aid workers, forming human chains, unloaded rice, water and other supplies.

The Indonesian Finance Ministry told United Nations officials on Monday evening that it would provide subsistence grants to survivors of the quake. The ministry also said it would provide grants to families, administered by local government, to help rebuild houses. It intends to complete a full action plan for rehabilitation in two weeks.

Despite heavy rain during the last three nights, officials said they did not expect large numbers of deaths from disease or hunger. Many residents are staying near their homes and in their villages, where they have been able to share salvaged food, clothing and shelter.

But villagers who were ill or injured continued arriving at seriously overburdened hospitals on Monday afternoon. Officials said medical workers and hospital supplies were now the most urgent need.

To partly relieve overcrowding, the Indonesian Red Cross began transferring patients with minor injuries to hospitals in Yogyakarta and to emergency tents in the quake area. The United States military said it would provide 100 doctors, nurses and medical technicians.

A United Nations team from the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs began organizing the arrival of aid groups on Sunday. Daily meetings have been held to share information and coordinate the use of resources.

Electricity in Yogyakarta, a city of half a million, has been fully restored, and the airport, which was damaged during the quake, reopened Monday to emergency and commercial traffic. Aid shipments had been diverted to nearby airports in Solo and Semarang, where the relief groups loaded supplies and personnel onto trucks and vans bound for Bantul.

The convoy of trucks caused heavy traffic along the road to Bantul, further delaying aid. "There is a huge need here," said Mr. Pujiono, the United Nations official. "We are not lacking supplies, but they are being held up by a jammed distribution system."

On Monday, trucks, cars and motorbikes continued to wait in dense traffic on the one-lane road to Bantul, while villagers lined the street holding plastic cups and cardboard boxes begging for food and money.

Emergency shelters were only beginning to go up on Monday. Andi Hanindito, chief of disaster response for the Indonesian Social Welfare Ministry, said the delay was partly because local government workers, who were caught in the quake, were only now returning to work.

Relief groups, many of which were coming from Aceh Province in western Sumatra, where there was widespread destruction from the tsunami at the end of 2004, said their experience there helped them carry out the relief effort in Yogyakarta. Many aid group leaders are already acquainted with the United Nations staff members and government officials responding to the emergency here.

"Everyone is switched on here, and a lot of us know each other," said Rae McGrath, country director for International Medical Corps. "Authorities here have so far been sensible and supportive."

Local government officials have not been attending the daily coordination meetings, and the national government has yet to make a formal request for assistance from the United Nations. But Mr. Pujiono said he had been meeting regularly with local officials and communicating their concerns to other groups.

The Indonesian president, Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono, temporarily moved his offices to Yogyakarta on Sunday, bringing greater pressure on the provincial government to respond efficiently.

WHO Will Clarify Stages Of Pandemic-Alert System (WSJ)

By Nicholas Zamiska

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

The World Health Organization plans to clarify its influenza-pandemic alert system after a cluster of human bird-flu cases in Indonesia, and the WHO's response to it, sent ripples through markets and media around the world last week.

The move highlights the challenges the United Nations health agency faces in keeping the public alert to the possibility of a human pandemic without panicking, or wearying, people.

"What we're going to fundamentally try to do is just to write out the phases and explain things so it's simpler for people to understand," Keiji Fukuda, coordinator of the WHO's global influenza program, said in an interview yesterday. "What's become clear to me over the past several weeks is that there's a lot of confusion."

The WHO has spent more than a year working to raise global awareness about bird flu, in hopes of preventing or limiting any world-wide human outbreak, while stressing that the virus hasn't yet acquired the ability to pass easily among people. But last week, the group found itself striving to tamp down concerns and explain why the Indonesian case cluster didn't necessarily mean the virus was now capable of sparking a human pandemic.

In that unusually large cluster, seven of eight relatives who fell ill died, and at least six of those seven fatalities were bird-flu cases. The Indonesian cluster briefly raised the possibility that the health agency might consider raising the alert level, which can trigger certain public-health responses and to which some companies have keyed employee-evacuation plans. At present, the alert level is at stage three of six, six being the full pandemic alert.

So far, the deadly virus has passed from birds to people in a relatively small number of cases and, even more rarely, may have passed among people. In the Indonesian case cluster, the virus may for the first time have set off a three-person chain of human transmission, from a woman to her nephew and then from the nephew to his father. Such an event might signal an incremental advance in the virus's ability to pass from human to human.

The WHO is still investigating the case. But last week the group decided against convening a global task force of experts to consider raising the alert level, even though the current guidelines outlining a change in the alert stages could, on their face, have fit the Indonesian cluster.

Dr. Fukuda said he doesn't expect any fundamental or wholesale changes to the alert system, which was introduced last year, after being revised from its 1999 form. He said he expects just further explanation and clarification.

The move to revise the system includes the distinction it makes between the virus's ability to pass between humans who have been in very close contact with one another -- caring for a dying family member, for example -- and its ability to pass easily between people who may have only sat next to one another at a restaurant and been exposed to a cough.

Stage three indicates that there have been human infections, "but no human-to-human spread, or at most rare instances of spread to a close contact," according to the WHO's guidelines. Stage four describes a small cluster or clusters "with limited human-to-human transmission, but spread is highly localized, suggesting that the virus is not well adapted to humans."

The difference between stages three and four hinges on how easily the virus can be passed between humans. But that has proved a subjective and difficult call to make.

Venezuela Fetes Bolivia, Cuba Trade (WSJ)

By José De Córdoba

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

LA PAZ, Bolivia -- While Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez was pledging to invest $1.5 billion in Bolivia's newly renationalized gas industry last week, participants at a Venezuelan-financed trade fair here were plugging microcommerce among Venezuela, Bolivia and Cuba as a way of defying the U.S. and promoting regional integration.

The energy investment includes deals to build two gas-processing plants and to explore for natural gas together with Bolivia's resurrected national energy company, Yacimientos Petroliferos Fiscales Bolivianos, or YPFB. The announcement marks Mr. Chavez's most ambitious and expensive attempt to increase his political clout in Latin America.

Mr. Chavez is keeping his eye on Bolivia's gas reserves -- the largest in South America after Venezuela's. The Venezuelan-backed trade fair shows Mr. Chavez is also fighting an ideological war in favor of his Bolivarian Alternative for the Americas, or ALBA, in every arena large or small.

The ALBA, signed by Mr. Chavez, Cuba's Fidel Castro and Bolivia's new president, Evo Morales, is a kind of socialist alternative to a U.S. proposal for hemisphere-wide free-trade zone. The trade fair late last week showed what the ALBA has become so far -- a heavy dose of ideology mixed in with a little business.

"We've come here, in cooperation and solidarity to get close to our brother people the Bolivians, from whom we have been distant," said Ramon Aguirre, a representative of Invepal, a Venezuelan maker of school notebooks, one of some 60 or so Bolivian and Venezuelan companies that set up booths at the fair. Once a private company, Invepal was expropriated by the Venezuelan government after the company went broke in 2004, Mr. Aguirre says. Now the Venezuelan government owns 51% of the company, while the workers who run it own the remaining 49%. Invepal bills itself as the first endogenous Venezuelan paper company -- endogenous being the term Mr. Chavez uses for domestic economic development that largely eschews traditional global trade and business practices.

Essentially, he would have the ALBA countries trade mainly among themselves -- except when it comes to oil and gas, which Venezuela sells on the world market.

Some of the basics of ALBA trade have yet to be worked out. When Bolivian entrepreneurs asked Mr. Aguirre the prices for his Venezuelan-made paper, he said he didn't know yet. "We have nothing concrete on that," he said. In the background of his booth was a poster of Mr. Chavez, his arm draped around Mr. Morales, while in the background a smiling Mr. Castro looked approvingly on both men.

Elsewhere, Bolivian Indian women in traditional bowler hats met with Cuban trade officials and Venezuelan entrepreneurs, who encouraged them to sell alpaca sweaters and embroidered shawls in Cuba and Venezuela, although neither country is known for cold weather. Other booths offered Bolivian wine, vitamins made from soya, coffee, and quinua, a cereal that has been grown since Incan times in the Bolivian altiplano, but which is practically unknown outside of the country.

It was tough going, acknowledged Rina Zeballos, president of the 1,200-strong Movement of Indian Women of the Kollasuyo, a weavers' cooperative. "We are producing these shawls, but we don't have a market," Ms. Zeballos said. Nevertheless, she was hopeful. She had talked to her Cuban and Venezuelan counterparts who had told her to send a catalog. "Maybe this will be the start of our exporting to other countries," she said. South American nations should pull together with Central American nations and with the 500 Indian tribes in North America to "develop our economies," she said.

In the end, Bolivia's deputy minister of industry and exports, Gustavo Barbery, declared the fair to have been a success, with some $12 million of potential business deals discussed.

Letter On Korean War Massacre Reveals Plan To Shoot Refugees (WP)

By Charles J. Hanley And Martha Mendoza

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

Historian Discovers U.S. Envoy's Writings Relating to No Gun Ri

More than a half-century after hostilities ended in Korea, a document from the war's chaotic early days has come to light -- a letter from the U.S. ambassador to Seoul, informing the State Department that U.S. soldiers would shoot refugees approaching their lines.

The letter -- dated the day of the Army's mass killing of South Korean refugees at No Gun Ri in 1950 -- is the strongest indication yet that such a policy existed for all U.S. forces in Korea, and the first evidence that that policy was known to upper ranks of the U.S. government.

"If refugees do appear from north of US lines they will receive warning shots, and if they then persist in advancing they will be shot," wrote Ambassador John J. Muccio, in his message to Assistant Secretary of State Dean Rusk.

The letter reported on decisions made at a high-level meeting in South Korea on July 25, 1950, the night before the 7th U.S. Cavalry Regiment shot the refugees at No Gun Ri.

Estimates vary on the number of dead at No Gun Ri. U.S. soldiers' estimates ranged from fewer than 100 to "hundreds" dead; Korean survivors say about 400, mostly women and children, were killed at the village 100 miles southeast of Seoul, the South Korean capital. Hundreds more refugees were killed in later, similar episodes, survivors say.

The No Gun Ri killings were documented in a Pulitzer Prize-winning story by the Associated Press in 1999, which prompted a 16-month Pentagon inquiry.

The Pentagon concluded that the No Gun Ri shootings, which lasted three days, were "an unfortunate tragedy" -- "not a deliberate killing." It suggested panicky soldiers, acting without orders, opened fire because they feared that an approaching line of families, baggage and farm animals concealed enemy troops.

But Muccio's letter indicates the actions of the 7th Cavalry were consistent with policy, adopted because of concern that North Koreans would infiltrate via refugee columns. And in subsequent months, U.S. commanders repeatedly ordered refugees shot, documents show.

The Muccio letter, declassified in 1982, is discussed in a new book by American historian Sahr Conway-Lanz, who discovered the document at the National Archives, where the AP also has obtained a copy.

Conway-Lanz, a former Harvard historian and now an archivist of the National Archives' Nixon collection, was awarded the Stuart L. Bernath Award of the Society for Historians of American Foreign Relations for the article on which the book is based.

"With this additional piece of evidence, the Pentagon report's interpretation [of No Gun Ri] becomes difficult to sustain," Conway-Lanz argues in his book, "Collateral Damage," published this spring by Routledge.

The Army report's own list of sources for the 1999-2001 investigation shows its researchers reviewed the microfilm containing the Muccio letter. But the 300-page report did not mention it.

Asked about this, Pentagon spokeswoman Betsy Weiner would say only that the Army inspector general's report was "an accurate and objective portrayal of the available facts based on 13 months of work."

Said Louis Caldera, who was Army secretary in 2001 and is now University of New Mexico president, "Millions of pages of files were reviewed, and it is certainly possible they may have simply missed it."

Former Washington Post diplomatic correspondent Don Oberdorfer, a historian of Korea who served on a team of outside experts who reviewed the investigation, said he did not recall seeing the Muccio message. "I don't know why, since the military claimed to have combed all records from any source."

Muccio noted in his 1950 letter that U.S. commanders feared disguised North Korean soldiers were infiltrating American lines via refugee columns.

DOJ_NMG_0030409

As a result, those meeting on the night of July 25, 1950 -- top staff officers of the U.S. 8th Army, Muccio's representative Harold J. Noble and South Korean officials -- decided on a policy of air-dropping leaflets telling South Korean civilians not to head south toward U.S. defense lines and of shooting them if they did approach U.S. lines despite warning shots, the ambassador wrote to Rusk.

Rusk, Muccio and Noble, who was embassy first secretary, are all dead. It is not known what action, if any, Rusk and others in Washington may have taken as a result of the letter.

Muccio told Rusk, who was secretary of state during the Vietnam War, that he was writing him "in view of the possibility of repercussions in the United States" from such deadly U.S. tactics.

But the No Gun Ri killings -- as well as others in the ensuing months -- remained hidden from history until the AP report of 1999, in which soldiers who were at No Gun Ri corroborated the Korean survivors' accounts.

Survivors said U.S. soldiers first forced them from nearby villages on July 25, 1950, and then stopped them in front of U.S. lines the next day, when they were attacked without warning by aircraft as hundreds sat atop a railroad embankment. Troops of the 7th Cavalry followed with ground fire as survivors took shelter under a railroad bridge.

The late Army Col. Robert M. Carroll, a lieutenant at No Gun Ri, said in a 1998 interview that he remembered the order radioed across the warfront on the morning of July 26 to stop refugees from crossing battle lines. "What do you do when you're told nobody comes through? . . . We had to shoot them to hold them back."

Other soldier witnesses attested to radioed orders to open fire at No Gun Ri.

Since that episode was confirmed in 1999, South Koreans have lodged complaints with the Seoul government about more than 60 other alleged large-scale killings of refugees by the U.S. military in the 1950-53 war.

The Army report of 2001 acknowledged that investigators learned of other, unspecified civilian killings, but said these would not be investigated.

AP research uncovered at least 19 declassified U.S. military documents showing commanders ordered or authorized such killings in 1950-51.

In a statement issued Monday in Seoul, a No Gun Ri survivors group called that episode "a clear war crime," demanded an apology and compensation from the U.S. government, and said Congress and the United Nations should conduct investigations. The survivors also said they would file a lawsuit against the Pentagon for alleged manipulation of the earlier probe.

Gary Solis, a West Point expert on war crimes, said the policy described by Muccio clearly "deviates from typical wartime procedures. It's an obvious violation of the bedrock core principle of the law of armed conflict -- distinction."

Solis said soldiers always have the right to defend themselves. But "noncombatants are not to be purposely targeted."

But William Eckhardt, lead Army prosecutor in the My Lai atrocities case in Vietnam, sensed "angst, great angst" in the letter because officials worried about what might happen. "If a mob doesn't stop when they're coming at you, you fire over their heads. And if they still don't stop, you fire at them. Standard procedure," he said.

Speak Out? Are You Crazy? (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, May 30, 2006

CHEBOKSARY, Russia — Albert Imendayev collected the signatures he needed to run for the legislature last fall in this city on the banks of the Volga River. He met with supporters, prepared his campaign material. He would have made the ballot had it not been for one thing: He was hauled off to a mental asylum.

Only days before he was required to appear at the local election commission to finalize his candidacy, an investigator from the prosecutor's office met Imendayev at the courthouse with three police officers. They kept him locked up until a judge could be found to sign the order committing him for a psychiatric evaluation.

"The hearing took place, and I was taken straight off to the asylum," said the businessman and human rights activist. By the time he was released nine days later, the election filing deadline had passed and he was out of the race.

Imendayev's act of insanity was filing a series of legal complaints against local officials, police, prosecutors and judges, alleging corruption, violation of court procedures and cronyism — charges that are far from rare in today's Russia. The prosecutor, a frequent target of Imendayev's darts, called his behavior "paranoia."

Through much of the Cold War, the Soviet Union waged a chilling psychiatric war against political dissidents. Critics of the communist authorities found themselves locked for months or years behind the barred windows of state asylums, drugged into tranquillity and prevented from talking to lawyers or family.

The end of the Soviet Union saw the adoption of laws that raised legal protections for psychiatric patients to international standards, granting potential mental patients guarantees of legal representation and commitment only on the orders of a court.

But Imendayev's trip behind hospital walls last September was, human rights activists say, one of many signs that punitive psychiatry has not disappeared.

"This has only just resurfaced in recent years, and for a time we couldn't even believe it was happening. But now it seems quite clear that such abuses are on the rise, and that this is a trend," said Yury Savenko, president of the Independent Psychiatric Assn., an advocacy group of professional psychiatrists that has pushed for mental health reforms in Russia.

The ranks of the "insane" over the last three years have included women divorcing powerful husbands, people locked in business disputes and citizens, like Imendayev, who have become a nuisance by filing numerous legal challenges against local politicians and judges or lodging appeals against government agencies to uphold their rights.

Unlike during the Soviet era, when an all-powerful KGB locked up those who challenged the foundations of the regime, there appears to be no systematic federal repression of dissidents through the mental health system. Instead, citizens today fall victim to regional authorities in localized disputes, or to private antagonists who have the means, as so many in Russia do, to bribe their way through the courts.

"People are being institutionalized in psychiatric hospitals unlawfully, and on the most diverse grounds," the International Helsinki Federation for Human Rights concluded in a 2004 study. "Not only did punitive psychiatry exist during the Soviet period, and not only does it exist today, unfortunately there are no grounds to hope that it will disappear in the foreseeable future."

In another case here in Cheboksary, a four-term opposition deputy in the regional parliament, Igor Molyakov, spent six months in jail on libel charges in 2004. While incarcerated, he was ordered committed for psychiatric hospitalization after a judge agreed with government lawyers that Molyakov's repeated writings about corruption among local authorities reflected an outlook so "somber" that it might constitute a "mental disorder."

In St. Petersburg, Ivan Ivannikov, who lectured for 38 years at the State University of Economics and Finance, found himself wrestled to the ground, handcuffed and dragged to the city psychiatric hospital in December 2003 after a protracted dispute with a well-connected contractor over repairs to his apartment. An influential state psychiatrist signed the recommendation for commitment without ever having met Ivannikov, deciding that his multiple legal complaints against the contractor constituted an "obsession" with "revenge." He was released after 60 days.

In Moscow, Natalya Kuznetsova was fired from her job at the federal audit chamber not long after charging that $140 million had been siphoned out of the federal budget in 2001 and 2002. A subsequent set of quarrels with her supervisors led to her firing, and when she filed suit seeking disability compensation, a state psychologist reported she had a mental disability.

"When they finally fired me on the 25th of January, 2005, they threatened to call a psychiatric ambulance for me," said Kuznetsova, who successfully fought against commitment. "This is all because of flourishing corruption. These corrupt people are using psychiatric persecution to destroy people."

In some cases, people who families and friends insist had no overt signs of mental illness have been committed for more than a year, sometimes drugged with sedatives and tied to their beds when they resisted, and prevented from attending the often-perfunctory court hearings that extended their hospitalization.

In many of these cases, patients were talked into signing consent forms. The rate of involuntary hospitalizations is so suspiciously low in at least 51 facilities across Russia that the Helsinki commission concluded that coerced consent through "persuading" and "falsification of signatures" was widespread.

State and regional mental health officials say improper hospitalizations are rare, and most psychiatrists say they follow the orders of the courts in conducting their reviews.

"Of course I have heard of such cases. The world over, there are dishonest people with bad consciences. But there are also people who are mentally ill but who do not appear so to non-specialists," said Vladimir Rothstein, a professor at a research center affiliated with the Russian Academy of Medical Sciences and head of the advocacy group Public Initiative on Psychiatry.

In 2004, doctors connected to the very institute that perfected the tools under which Soviet-era dissidents were hospitalized from the 1960s through the 1980s sought to roll back some reforms in Russia's landmark 1992 law on mental health. Proponents of mental health reform only narrowly beat back the effort by the doctors from the Serbsky Institute for Social and Forensic Psychiatry.

The proposed amendments included allowing doctors to keep patients under involuntary hospitalization longer without a court order and restricting the ability of patient-rights groups and nongovernment psychiatrists to advocate for clients in court or provide independent expert testimony.

Directors of the Serbsky Institute declined to be interviewed. The head of the state-run Republican Psychiatric Hospital in Cheboksary, however, said patients who accused officials of psychiatric abuse often painted a remarkably different picture than those who dealt with the cases.

"I've been the head doctor here for eight years, and I have not heard of a single case of pressure being put on doctors by law enforcement officials for a diagnosis," Alexander Kozlov said. "I can also assure you with 100% confidence that in this hospital, not a single dissident ever received treatment, and not a single dissident was ever given a diagnosis of schizophrenia or sent for compulsory treatment."

Human rights leaders say the government psychiatric apparatus has updated legal protections for patients but has changed relatively little in its mind-set since the Soviet era.

"It's important to note that the Serbsky Institute, like the majority of penal institutions in our country, was not obliterated after the collapse of the Soviet Union. The sign outside the door was modified. They even expressed some regrets that there had been 'isolated cases' when psychiatry had made some 'wrong decisions.' But ultimately, very little was changed," said Alexander Podrabinek, who wrote a book on psychiatric abuses in the Soviet era.

"Persecution that has to do with the intellect or the mind or one's psychological health is perceived as perhaps worse than physical punishment, or even torture, because it's more frightening to lose your mind than to lose your freedom," he said.

Cheboksary, a city of 420,000 people about 400 miles east of Moscow, is known as Russia's hops-growing center with a long tradition of beer-making. It is the capital of the republic of Chuvashia, governed since 1994 by former Russian Justice Minister Nikolai Fyodorov, who controls all levers of power in the republic, from the press to the police to the courts.

Members of Imendayev's organization, For Human Rights, and other opposition activists have long accused Fyodorov's allies of consolidating money and power through manipulation of elections and the court system. The case that landed Imendayev in the hospital began last year, while he was running for office and also acting as an advocate for a teacher who felt she had been improperly fired.

The case had gone to court, and he thought it was almost won. Then a police officer familiar with the case "came up to us ... and I recorded it on tape," Imendayev said. "The words were very crude. He literally said to her: 'You idiot, what are you trying to do battle with? The system? Everything here is under control. Everything has been bought.' What he meant was that people on the other side had given money to the judge."

Imendayev wrote a complaint to the prosecutor-general of Russia, mentioning the tape. At the end of the next court hearing, he was removed to the Chuvashia Republican Psychiatric Hospital.

At least three other members of the local branch of For Human Rights have been hospitalized in the last few years, accused of having various forms of schizophrenia, paranoia and other mental disabilities requiring urgent diagnosis or treatment.

Fyodorov's administration dismisses the idea that anyone has been recommended for psychiatric treatment based on politics. "Our judicial branch of power is independent," said Boris Kuzmin, the president's spokesman. "Moreover, our president has a background in law. I think he would not tolerate any sort of violations or pressure on the courts."

Still, Fyodorov's own lawyers moved against Molyakov, the opposition lawmaker arrested on suspicion of libeling the president during his election campaign. In November 2004, they sought to have him hospitalized for psychiatric evaluation.

When federal Judge Oleg Zhukov overturned a lower court's psychiatric referral order, the president's lawyers appealed, arguing that Molyakov's accomplishments as an author and philosophy professor didn't mean he wasn't crazy.

"The court ought to know that even being a personal genius doesn't rule out a mental disorder ... (Van Gogh, F.M. Dostoyevsky, N.V. Gogol, etc.)," the lawyers asserted. "As has been established by scientists, the risk of a mental disease in gifted people ... is seven to eight times higher."

But of all the cases, the story of Sergei Zotov, a convicted extortionist and businessman-turned-political-gadfly, is unparalleled in its alternate melodrama and hilarity, reading more like "One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest," Russian-style, than the sorry episode in regional politics that it is.

Zotov, 47, got in trouble with the law in the early 1990s, when he flirted with the kind of speculation schemes that widely accompanied the collapse of communism. In 1991, he was brought up on organized-crime charges that originated with an alleged attempt to sell a car at black-market prices (and also involved Zotov's generous use of his skills as a boxer).

He was convicted and sentenced to 6 1/2 years in prison, where he spent much of the time reading the law and filing appeals. Once he was released, Zotov turned his newfound legal expertise against the system, filing complaint after complaint demanding criminal prosecution of various alleged incidences of corruption and election fraud within the political establishment in Cheboksary.

Zotov would file challenges to the slightest infraction of court rules — judges who didn't wear their robes on hot days, or a state flag hung in the wrong direction. But he also filed complaints challenging purported misdeeds on the part of local authorities, including the alleged awarding of state property to ministers and judges and evidence that voters were paid and escorted to the polls by pro-government candidates.

"I'm like a bone stuck in their throats," Zotov, a pudgy, balding man who wears rose-colored sunglasses to cover up a bad eye, said cheerfully in a recent interview.

The war was already well underway in November 2002 when he entered a Supreme Court hearing room presided over by then-Chief Justice Pyotr Yurkin. Zotov, who was running for the regional legislature, had accused the judge of improperly taking title to a state-owned apartment, among other malfeasance.

As soon as Zotov stood to raise his endless procedural motions, Yurkin ordered him ejected. What happened next is like a Russian "Rashomon": It depends on who saw it.

What is clear is that a bailiff ended up on the floor and a large table was broken as Zotov was hauled from the courtroom. Zotov insists that the bailiff fell and that the table broke when he tried to hang on to it as he was being dragged away.

Some of the judges present testified that Zotov threw the bailiff over his shoulder, karate-style, and either kicked the table or landed on it hard with his hindquarters.

Yurkin sent Zotov to the Chuvashia Republican Psychiatric Hospital. He remained there and at other facilities for seven months and repeatedly was given psychiatric drugs, despite pleas by his family and colleagues that he was sane and should be released. Hearings to continue his hospitalization were held but neither Zotov nor his lawyers appeared. Doctors said he showed signs of hyperactivity, inflated self-importance and "nonsensical ideas of reform."

"It was awful there," said his wife, Natalya Semyonova. "I would go to the window, and Sergei was gathering information and trying to communicate it to us through the window about people who were being kept there illegally, about people who'd had their apartments taken away. There was one man who'd been there 25 years."

After his release in April 2004, Zotov tried to run for the local legislature again. When he appeared on television, slamming local authorities, the court ordered him to undergo outpatient psychiatric treatment, a prospect he feared so much he went into hiding.

In February of last year, two dozen police officers and firefighters arrived at Zotov's apartment to take him back to the mental hospital. The order they were executing referred to him as "a person who had committed a socially dangerous act," according to the prosecutor's office. When Semyonova refused to answer the door, two officers scaled a ladder to the family's ninth-floor balcony, all to no avail — Zotov was not at home.

Dmitry Ivanov, deputy spokesman for the police, said law enforcement officers are no longer actively looking for Zotov, but "if he does show up, we will have to react." He denied any campaign against the human rights activist, and hinted that Zotov might have tried to have himself hospitalized to seek shelter from dangerous associates in the criminal underworld.

Prosecutors, in a written response, said Zotov's case "was handled in accordance with all legal procedures." They said psychiatrists at the Serbsky Institute had examined Zotov and his courtroom outburst and concluded that "when he committed his crime, he was unable to acknowledge its actual nature and social danger, he wasn't able to control his actions, and he requires mandatory treatment in an inpatient facility."

The doctors at Chuvashia hospital declined to discuss Zotov's case in detail. But they implied that Zotov's version of events was distorted.

"I think if the opponents of your main character were to turn to you and told you about the ways in which he'd offended or harmed them, you'd feel a sense of sympathy for them as well," said Lyudmila Karnilova, deputy chief psychiatrist.

"As for the idea of a psychiatric hospital hunting someone down and dragging them back here, this is certainly not the case. Our main responsibility is to treat patients who need our help," added Kozlov, the chief doctor.

Zotov, who rarely visits his own apartment, says he fears for his sanity if he has to go back to the hospital.

"People who fight for justice in our republic, it's already a trend that they become subjected to isolation in a psychiatric hospital," said Semyonova, his wife. "This entire case, from the beginning, was based on nothing more than personal antipathy toward my husband."

Bush Betrays Egypt's Democrats. For What? (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

CAIRO -- In Washington this month, George Bush met with Gamal Mubarak, heir apparent to the Egyptian throne, and sent regards to Mr. Mubarak's father, President Hosni Mubarak. The House Appropriations Committee turned back an effort by Wisconsin Democrat David Obey to withhold a fraction of Egypt's $1.7 billion annual aid allocation. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned that any cuts would damage a "strategic partnership" that is "a cornerstone of U.S. policy in the Middle East."

Also this month, in Cairo, pro-democracy activists such as 39-year-old Ahmed Salah of the Egyptian Movement for Change and dozens of his colleagues were beaten, arrested and detained -- ostensibly for congregating publicly in groups larger than five. The emergency law through which Mr. Mubarak has ruled for 25 years was extended again. The judiciary -- the only semi-uncorrupted branch of government -- is under political assault. And Ayman Nour, the imprisoned liberal politician who ran second to Mr. Mubarak in last September's rigged presidential election, lost his final appeal against a five-year prison sentence on forgery charges.

Maybe there is no connection between the first and second set of events. Maybe Mr. Mubarak did not need tacit American acquiescence to embark on his latest campaign of repression. Maybe there are plausible reasons for the administration to go soft on the regime for now. But speak to opposition figures here and the sense of American betrayal is palpable.

Few Egyptians have felt this betrayal more keenly than Gameela Ismail, a prominent journalist and Mr. Nour's wife of 17 years. President Bush, she says, "made a very encouraging statement," referring to the line in his 2005 State of the Union address where he called on Egypt, "which showed the way toward peace in the Middle East, [to] show the way toward democracy." Mr. Nour, an independent member of parliament, heard from then-U.S. Ambassador David Welch that the administration was, in Ms. Ismail's words, "very interested in political reform in the Middle East and would support calls for democracy."

Mr. Nour was then launching a new political party as well as a newspaper, both called "Ghad" (Tomorrow), which he hoped would appeal to younger voters, political liberals, the middle class, Coptic Christians and moderate Muslims. "It was such a bright, clear, sunny prospect," Ms. Ismail says. "We had all sorts of confidence in the future."

That confidence ended abruptly on Jan. 28, 2005, when Mr. Nour was stripped of his parliamentary immunity and detained for 43 days on forgery charges. The story of his release (under heavy U.S. pressure), his bid for the presidency and his subsequent conviction are matters of public record. Less well known is the ferocity and manic persistence of the regime's effort to discredit Mr. Nour and Ms. Ismail.

"Fourteen security people arrived in our house that morning," Ms. Ismail recalls. "They went through every paper, every book, CDs, videos, our children's belongings. They opened the safe box, went through our checkbooks, sniffed his cigars. . . . I asked them, 'What does this have to do with the charges?' It was clear they were looking for anything at all that might be incriminating."

The harassment, both petty and serious, has never let up. Ms. Ismail says security officers have infiltrated the Ghad, forming a breakaway faction and an alternative newspaper. Ask for a copy at a Cairene newsstand, and you'll be asked whether you want "Security Ghad or Nour's Ghad." Ms. Ismail's TV shows have been canceled, and she is being charged, preposterously, with assaulting a state security officer.

The culprit here, Ms. Ismail insists, isn't simply the regime but Gamal Mubarak, who despite avowals to the contrary is setting himself up as his father's successor. "What provoked Gamal," she explains, "is that he and Nour are the same age, but Nour's been elected to parliament twice, he takes buses, he takes the metro, he knows what's happening with the people. He did not just say, 'Down with Mubarak.' He did more: He offered himself as an alternative."

It's partly for this reason that Ms. Ismail can hardly account for why Mr. Bush would receive Gamal so cordially, even as she says she never once has been personally contacted by Francis Ricciardone, the current U.S. ambassador. "Everyone is asking what Gamal did in Washington: Were we sold out in exchange for something?" She also notes that despite the billions the U.S. provides Egypt, the Mubarak regime continues to stoke anti-American sentiment in its press campaigns against Mr. Nour. "They call my husband, 'Nour, the spy of the U.S.' 'Nour, the friend of Rice.' 'Nour, the child of Madeleine Albright.'"

As for the regime, its game plan is clear: It needs to destroy liberal opponents such as Mr. Nour so that Hosni Mubarak, and eventually his son, can present themselves to the U.S. as the only viable bulwark against the Muslim Brotherhood. Little wonder that, despite being officially banned, a visitor has no trouble finding the Brotherhood's headquarters and interviewing its leadership at locations that are anything but secret. Beneath the surface tension, the regime and the Brotherhood depend on one another to exclude any decent middle way.

Meanwhile, Mr. Nour sits in the hospital ward of Cairo's Tora prison, recovering from a 25-day hunger strike. Ms. Ismail says he's in somewhat better spirits, and there are rumors of a presidential pardon on July 23, a national holiday. Ultimately, however, it's not her husband Ms. Ismail worries most about. "Nour is getting plenty of attention; he knows the law; he has experience; he's paying the price for the course he has chosen. It's the young [activists] I'm worried about. They don't have experience; they don't know the law; nobody knows them. What's happening to them is . . ." She trails off.

Maybe next time, President Bush can give Gamal Mubarak a miss and acquaint himself a little better with "them." As with Republican voters in the U.S., Egypt's democrats are part of his base -- and he's fast losing them, too.

A Plague Of Orphans And Lonely Grandmothers (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof
The New York Times, May 30, 2006
MANZINI, Swaziland

DOJ_NMG_0030414

In the early years of AIDS, the virus didn't get attention because the victims were marginalized people: gays, Haitians and hemophiliacs.

Then when AIDS did threaten mainstream America, it finally evoked empathy and research dollars. But now it has slipped back in our consciousness because once more the primary victims are marginalized people — this time, Africans.

Nearly three million people die from AIDS each year. Among them are half a million children under the age of 15, mostly Africans infected during childbirth.

The numbers are numbing, even paralyzing. So for a window into southern African village life today, meet two of those African kids whose lives are being destroyed by the world's inattention to AIDS: Wandile Shongwe and his sister, Temdoline.

Wandile, an 11-year-old boy speaking shyly in front of his hut in central Swaziland, told me his story. First his mother died, and then last year his father followed, along with his older brother.

So Wandile and Temdoline, who is 9, moved in with their grandmother, but a month ago she died of AIDS. They were shuffled off to their last surviving relative, an aunt, and now she is dying as well, and is too ill to care for them.

"Nobody will take care of them after my death," said the aunt, Buduzile Ngcamphalala.

But in fact, no one is really caring for them now. The aunt was too sick to plant corn in the family plot, so there is no food. She cannot buy clothes, so Temdoline's only dress is a school uniform so tattered that it has no seat and completely shows her underwear.

To preserve even that remnant of a dress, she takes it off when she gets home from school and puts on her only other bit of clothing: a pair of shorts, with no shirt. That would be too scandalous to wear to church, so she does not go.

To live such a childhood means not only unending trauma, but also unrelenting hunger. I asked the children whether they had had breakfast that morning. No. Dinner the night before? No. The only meal they regularly get is lunch at school, provided by the World Food Program's outstanding school-feeding program (www.wfp.org).

"Every day I go to school without breakfast," Temdoline said, "and every day I go to bed without dinner."

The children gather the firewood and water, and they wash their own clothes — as well as caring for their aunt. And soon the two orphans will be left to bury their aunt and then try to survive all alone.

"I feel very painful when she is sick," Wandile said of his aunt. "Because after she dies, no one is going to take care of us." (See video of Wandile, if you dare, in my multimedia report on AIDS at www.nytimes.com/kristof.)

After traveling in southern Africa to report on AIDS, on the 25th anniversary of the detection of the virus, I feel a compulsion to share stories of people like Wandile and Temdoline. They spill out of me.

The life expectancy in Swaziland, which has the highest infection rate in the world, with nearly 40 percent of adults infected, has fallen from 55 to 34. This is a land where parents routinely bury their children, and where mothers constantly learn that they have given their babies a death sentence — the AIDS virus — during childbirth or breastfeeding.

In rural Swaziland, a 74-year-old woman named Maria Shongwe told me that 9 of her 11 children have died, along with many of her grandchildren. (It's not certain that all died of AIDS, because so few people are tested that the cause of death is not always known.) I met her as she returned from preparing the body of a 24-year-old granddaughter for a funeral.

The only comparable apocalypse in historical times was the Black Death 650 years ago. But there is a difference.

In the 14th century, we didn't know how to fight the Plague. Today we know what to do, and we have the tools to overcome AIDS — and yet we still don't use them. A $4 dose of a medicine called nevirapine mostly blocks mother-to-child transmission of H.I.V. during childbirth, and yet because of poverty and governmental incompetence, at last count only 10 percent of pregnant African women with the virus got such a drug.

Maybe that's the saddest thing of all. Twenty-five years after we allowed AIDS to spin out of control because its victims were marginalized people, we're doing the same thing all over again. And so today, as every day, another 7,900 people will die of AIDS.

Still A Genocide (WP)

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

IT'S BEEN MORE than three weeks since a Darfur peace accord was signed, bringing hope for an end to the genocide in Sudan's western territory. Since then the news has been terrible. The two rebel factions that refused to sign the peace deal have continued to snub it. Violence between rebel factions has generated blood-curdling attacks on civilians. Human Rights Watch has reported fresh evidence of atrocities committed by government-backed Janjaweed death squads across the border in Chad. The cash-strapped U.N. World Food Program has been forced to reduce the already meager rations it distributes to 6 million Sudanese, including 3 million in Darfur. And Sudan's government has waffled on the crucial question of whether it will allow in an expanded peacekeeping force, without which violence, hunger and mass death are likely to continue.

DOJ_NMG_0030415

The only external force at present is a 7,000-strong African Union contingent. It is too small and ill-equipped to cover a territory the size of France, and its mandate allows it to monitor violence but not actually stop it. Gunmen in Darfur have learned that it is toothless. Even the displaced civilians whom the African Union is trying to help have staged violent demonstrations against the force out of frustration with its shortcomings. There is no way that this contingent can oversee the implementation of Darfur's peace treaty, which envisages the complex demobilization of combatants and the eventual repatriation of some 2 million displaced people. Recognizing this, the African Union has agreed to fold its soldiers into a larger U.N. peacekeeping force.

After much prevarication, Sudan's government appeared to agree last Thursday to allow in a team of U.N. military planners. But that concession came just a day after the speaker of Sudan's parliament ruled out a foreign deployment in Darfur, and it was undermined by the foreign minister's simultaneous statement that "any forces, if that is agreed upon, would be a force for supervision and not a force for peace implementation." In a repeat of its tactics toward humanitarian workers, Sudan's regime plainly means to stall peacekeepers for as long as possible -- and never mind that the aid workers and peacekeepers are trying to save the lives of Sudanese civilians.

The U.S. government has described the killing in Darfur as genocide, a term that Sudan's government rejects and that the United Nations and Europeans have also shrunk from using. The more that the conflict in Darfur features infighting between rebel factions rather than just atrocities by the government's militia, the more observers may resist pointing the finger at the government and accusing it of genocide. But the reason that Sudan's government is culpable, today as in the past, is that it is deliberately creating the conditions in which thousands of civilians from rebel-aligned tribes are likely to die. First the government and its militia drove these people from their villages. Then it impeded humanitarian workers so that thousands of them fell prey to disease or starved. Now it is obstructing a serious peacekeeping deployment, with the result that its victims will continue to face shortages of medicines and food.

This may not be genocide by gas chamber or machete. But it is still a calculated policy of targeting ethnic groups and planning, meticulously, to eliminate them.

A Violent Detour In Turkey (NYT)

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

Turkey's foreign minister, Abdullah Gul, said last week that recent violence in Turkey did not presage a return to the "old days" of coups and military rule. We hope he's right.

In recent years, there has been much debate in Turkey over the conflicts between its secular constitution and many Turks' conservative Muslim impulses. Lately those confrontations have taken some troubling turns.

This month, a gunman shot five judges in a courthouse, killing one and wounding the others. Initial reports indicated that the assailant was enraged about a decision by the judges that strictly upheld Turkey's ban on wearing head scarves in public buildings. The news further polarized the debate over the role of religion in public life, and the judge's funeral turned into a mass demonstration in support of staunch secularism.

The outcry was seen as a setback for Turkey's ruling party, in power since 2002, which supports a greater public role for religious expression.

Since the funeral, however, the motive behind the attack has become increasingly unclear, and sorting out the facts will take time. But the overriding question is: Are the bad old days coming back?

Turkey's prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, is a conservative Muslim, but he also has overseen the pro-Western reforms that qualified Turkey to open membership talks with the European Union. During the reform process, he stressed that more democracy was the best way to resolve Turkey's polarizing issues. He was right, and now is the time for him to forcefully reassert that view. Washington can help promote Turkish democracy by using its longstanding ties with Turkey's generals to communicate zero tolerance for military meddling.

Turkey borders Iran, Iraq and Syria, and is an ally of Israel, a member of NATO and a candidate for the European Union. The world can ill afford for it to become less democratic.

Bush Administration Wants Spy Lawsuits Dismissed; Defending the NSA's warrantless domestic eavesdropping program in court would harm national security, it says.

The Bush administration has asked federal judges in New York and Michigan to dismiss a pair of lawsuits filed over the National Security Agency's domestic eavesdropping program, saying litigating them would jeopardize state secrets.

In papers filed late Friday, Justice Department lawyers said it would be impossible to defend the legality of the spying program without disclosing classified information that could be of value to suspected terrorists.

National Intelligence Director John D. Negroponte invoked the state-secrets privilege on behalf of the administration, writing that disclosure of such information would cause "exceptionally grave damage" to national security.

The administration laid out some of its supporting arguments in classified memos filed under seal.

The government's motion, widely anticipated, involves two cases challenging an NSA program that allows investigators to eavesdrop, without court warrants, on phone calls and e-mails into and out of the U.S. involving people who authorities say are suspected of having terrorist ties.

In New York, the Center for Constitutional Rights has asked a judge to stop the program, saying it is an abuse of presidential power. The American Civil Liberties Union and other groups filed a similar lawsuit\l "l" in Detroit.

For decades, U.S. law enforcement and intelligence agencies have been required to seek court approval before using electronic surveillance in the United States. President Bush has said the warrantless eavesdropping is legal under a congressional resolution passed after the Sept\l "l". 11\l "l" terrorist attacks.

Center for Constitutional Rights attorney Shayana Kadidal called the administration's motion "undemocratic." Safeguards could be established that would prevent the disclosure of classified information, he said.

The center has also argued that the court already has enough information to decide whether the program was legal.

"The Bush administration is trying to crush a very strong case against domestic spying without any evidence or argument," Kadidal said in a written statement.

"Can the president tell the courts which cases they can rule on? If so, the courts will never be able to hold the president accountable for breaking the law."

Justice Department attorneys said in their legal brief that the legality of the president's actions could only be properly judged by understanding "the specific threat facing the nation and the particular actions taken by the president to meet that threat."

"That understanding is not possible without revealing to the very adversaries we are trying to defeat what we know about them and how we are proceeding to stop them," they wrote.

NSA Cases May Hinge on Issue of Standing

Justin Scheck

\Carolyn Jewel says the federal government's warrantless wiretapping program is giving her writer's block.

"I have recently begun to write in a new genre (action and futuristic romance)," the Petaluma, Calif., database-administrator-cum-novelist -- and named plaintiff in a class action against AT&T for cooperating with secret government eavesdropping -- wrote in court papers earlier this year.

"I feel that certain plots or subplots that would otherwise be of significant interest to me may be unwise since they would require research into weapons, arms and military and paramilitary operations. As a result, I do not plan to use my Worldnet service to do this research," continued Jewel, the only AT&T named plaintiff to specifically state how she was affected by the wiretaps.

"I suppose that's a claim," said Rory Little, a professor at Hastings College of the Law. "It's not as strong as saying they were definitely wiretapped."

A lawyer for the plaintiffs said Jewel and other AT&T customers suffered real harm.

"She actually chose not to pursue certain areas of writing," said Lee Tien, a lawyer with the Electronic Frontier Foundation.

Lawyers for AT&T and the government are trying to convince U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker that chilling effects on customers -- such as Jewel's reticence to research upcoming books (one of which, "Rake," promises: "Romantic sensualist meets widowed novelist. Hot. Hot. Hot. Proposal is done and with my agent," according to her Web site, carolynjewel.com) -- don't amount to enough harm to give them standing.

While Walker mulls over the standing question, a similar case in Oregon federal court probably won't have that problem.

The suit, which has received less recent publicity than the AT&T class action, has a more direct complaint -- and fewer standing issues.

In late February, the Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation says it was directly harmed through illegal wiretaps -- and it has proof, according to court filings.

"This case is unique among the various pending lawsuits challenging the president's warrantless electronic surveillance program in that only these plaintiffs possess incontrovertible proof -- the document filed under seal -- that they were victims of the president's program, and thus have standing to sue," wrote Thomas Nelson, a lawyer for Al-Haramain, in papers filed Monday.

Jon Eisenberg, an Oakland, Calif., lawyer and Nelson's co-counsel, said he was "immediately excited to see this case because there's standing." Eisenberg said he expects core issues in the case to be litigated faster than in the AT&T suit.

"They have a standing issue to overcome that we don't have," he said. "They're seeking to say the administration violated the law without having a specific instance of violation, which spills over into policy. That's problematic."

Tien said he expects Walker to rule that the class plaintiff have standing nonetheless. But in the meantime, he and the Oregon lawyers are facing a similar set of problems posed by government lawyers.

In both cases, the government has insisted that documents at the core of the case, as well as government pleadings, should remain confidential. Anthony Coppolino, the lead Department of Justice attorney in both cases, could not be reached by press time.

In the AT&T suit, the key evidence is documents provided by a former AT&T engineer that, plaintiffs lawyers say, show communications were routed through government computers. The documents are filed under seal, and Walker has agreed to keep them in a secure case as the litigation continues.

The most important piece of evidence in the Oregon suit is a secret document accidentally disclosed by the FBI in 2004 through discovery in another lawsuit. It's currently being held in a secure location in Seattle, despite efforts by the federal government to take it back.

The judges in both suits are now trying to decide whether that information should remain secret -- and whether to consider government motions kept concealed from plaintiffs lawyers. The secret papers, government lawyers said, argue that the suits should be thrown out because they jeopardize state secrets.

In a hearing in the AT&T suit last week, Walker seemed disturbed by the notion that plaintiffs would be unable to see their opponents' arguments, and asked for briefing on the issue. Similar briefs have been submitted in the Oregon case, too.

In both suits, defense lawyers say the Justice Department has a longstanding right to submit ex parte, in camera documents in sensitive cases.

"Contrary to plaintiffs' arguments, AT&T does not believe that an assertion of state secrets may blithely be dismissed without even considering the basis for it," wrote lawyers for AT&T.

Such arguments don't sit well for the plaintiffs in either case. As lawyers for the Oregon plaintiffs wrote, "Secret court filings are repugnant to a free society."

As the issues continue to be litigated, the judges in both suits will have to decide whether to open the heretofore secret documents, whether plaintiffs have standing, and if the suits would indeed unearth secrets vital to national security.

In the AT&T case, plaintiffs are hoping that Walker's decision on these issues will ultimately lead him to consider their motion for an injunction that would keep the government out of AT&T's network.

Until that decision is made this summer, Jewel -- judging by her Web site -- seems to have plenty to work on that won't bring government suspicion upon her.

One title in development is called "The Barbarian."

In that book, her Web site says, "a Highlander ends up married to the daughter of an English lord. He speaks only Gaelic and she doesn't. She thinks he's the muscle, not the bridegroom." That book, she wrote, will only require her to study Gaelic.

FEMA defends evacuee benefits / Agency scoffs at the claims of inefficiency in class-action suit

MIKE SNYDER

Responding to a lawsuit alleging that it has bungled housing programs for Hurricane Katrina evacuees, a federal\l "l" agency told a judge it has provided record levels of assistance.

"FEMA has adjusted its programs, waived certain rules, and created an unprecedented, nearly nationwide program of emergency shelter to address the unique circumstances of this disaster," the Federal Emergency Management Agency said in a federal court filing this week.

Meanwhile, 62 U.S. House members, including seven from Texas, have filed a brief supporting the lawsuit. It says that despite pleas from Congress for reforms, FEMA "continues to engage in a process that is marked by inefficiency, a lack of discernible standards, and seeming disregard" for the plight of evacuees from Hurricane Katrina.

U.S. District Judge David Hittner is expected to rule Tuesday on the lawsuit's short-term goals: To compel the agency to continue its emergency housing assistance nationwide through at least June 30, and to pay utility bills for evacuees already moved into a new, less generous assistance program.

If the class-action suit goes to trial, it will provide a public airing of the many complaints saying that FEMA's administration of housing assistance has been badly mishandled. The lawsuit calls FEMA's housing work "wholly inept."

"The main goal is to find that FEMA is employing policies that are inconsistent with its mandate - with the law," said Mike Caddell, the lead attorney for the 12 evacuees who filed the suit on behalf of Katrina victims nationwide.

FEMA's arbitrary and unfair decisions about how to move evacuees from one program to another and its determinations of who is eligible for help have put 50,000 people around the country at risk of becoming homeless, Caddell said.

In its response, which only addresses the plaintiffs' request for a temporary order extending the emergency program, FEMA does not respond in detail to specific allegations in the suit. It focuses chiefly on issues of jurisdiction and procedure.

Sovereign immunity

The response says the agency is protected from such suits by the principle of sovereign immunity, which generally precludes lawsuits against government agencies. FEMA also claims that the U.S. District Court in Houston lacks jurisdiction to hear the case, and that the named plaintiffs lack standing to file it.

A key point of contention in the case is FEMA's "shared household rule," which prohibits providing assistance to more than one member of a household. In the case of Katrina, however, many households were divided after the disaster and ended up being resettled in different cities.

FEMA says it has suspended the rule for this disaster, but Caddell said some evacuees still are being denied assistance because someone who had lived with them before the storm is receiving assistance elsewhere.

Texas supporters

The U.S. representatives from Texas supporting the brief, all Democrats, are Al Green and Sheila Jackson Lee of Houston; Ruben Hinojosa of Mercedes; Silvestre Reyes of El Paso; Eddie Bernice Johnson of Dallas; Charles Gonzalez of San Antonio; and Henry Cuellar of Laredo.

Ex-braceros leery of guest worker plan : They say Senate bill needs assurances on living conditions, pay

Tyche Hendricks

Picking beets, cherries and cotton and shoveling manure on farms across the United States as a Mexican guest worker in the 1940s and 1950s, Cecilio Santillana was glad to earn a few dollars a day.

He didn't complain about living in horse stalls without bathrooms or doing stoop work for 12 hours a day without breaks for fear he would be sent back to Chihuahua and lose the steady work that allowed him to support his family in Mexico.

But the 78-year-old San Jose man opposes a temporary worker proposal in the immigration bill the Senate passed last week.

"I'm against it, because they may do to the new workers what they did to us," he said. "We suffered a lot."

Some immigrant advocates say the new plan remedies shortcomings of the old Bracero Program, through which the United States recruited Mexican workers to toil at 4.5 million mostly agricultural jobs from 1942 to 1964. And they say it's a crucial alternative to the current state of affairs where migrant workers risk their lives crossing the border illegally.

But others say the new arrangement probably will replicate the pitfalls of the Bracero Program and two present-day guest worker programs. They also fear new worker protections in the Senate bill will vanish when lawmakers seek to reconcile the legislation with the enforcement-only bill the House passed in December.

Immigration foes, meanwhile, criticize the guest worker plan more broadly. They say the United States already has enough people to fill its low-skilled jobs and warn that a guest worker program will only draw new waves of immigration.

The Bracero Program -- named for men who work with their arms, brazos in Spanish -- was this country's first large-scale guest worker arrangement and is the prototype to which others are compared.

In spite of the low pay, poor living conditions and often bullying crew bosses, Santillana said the Bracero Program was good for him. He's proud, too, that after 15 years he became a permanent U.S. resident with the help of an employer who agreed to fill out the papers. He has since become a citizen.

But he shakes his head in consternation when he talks about the long struggle waged by aging braceros like him to recoup wages the government withheld more than half a century ago. In the early years of the Bracero Program, 10 percent of workers' wages was withheld to be deposited in savings accounts they could claim when they returned to Mexico.

Somewhere between the payroll deductions and bank transfers, the money vanished. In the United States, a class\l "l"-action\l "l" lawsuit filed four years ago on behalf of defrauded braceros is inching through the federal\l "l" courts; last year, the Mexican government announced it would pay roughly $3,800 to former braceros who could prove their claim to the deducted pay. Former braceros dismiss the one-time payments as inadequate.

From the standpoint of growers and consumers, the program was a success, said Philip Martin, an agricultural economist at UC Davis.

"It's how California got to replace New Jersey as the 'Garden State,' " said Martin. "Crops got picked. Wages didn't rise and choke off expansion. It helped parts of the California economy to expand without costs and prices rising rapidly."

But Martin and others said a surplus of braceros depressed wages for everyone, and braceros were sometimes used to break strikes by U.S. laborers. On paper, the program protected both Mexican and U.S. workers, requiring employers to certify that domestic labor could not be found and assuring that guest workers be paid the prevailing wage. In reality, immigration and labor analysts said, enforcement was minimal and the guest workers became dependent on sometimes abusive employers.

"It's important to have protections written into the law, but ... having them in law is not a guarantee that they will be implemented and enforced," said Deborah Meyers, a senior policy analyst at the Migration Policy Institute who has studied temporary worker programs. "Historically, enforcement has been very weak."

The temporary worker program the Senate approved Thursday would admit up to 200,000 foreign workers a year to take low-skilled jobs for up to six years that U.S. employers attest they cannot fill. Unlike the existing "H2A" and "H2B" programs for low-skilled workers, the new bill would allow temporary workers to change jobs and apply to become legal permanent U.S. residents, two provisions labor advocates said were key.

Eliseo Medina, international executive vice president of the Service Employees International Union, listened as a child to his father describe his sense of powerlessness in the face of hard-driving bracero bosses. And as a young labor organizer in the 1970s, Medina saw similar treatment of Jamaican sugar cane cutters in Florida; men who spoke up for themselves were summarily shipped home.

But Medina supports the guest worker program in the Senate bill -- dubbed H2C. He's convinced that the new provisions and an expanded right to organize will protect workers in a way the old system did not. He said reform that allows foreign workers to come to the United States legally and legalizes workers already here will improve conditions for all workers.

"What undermines worker standards is having different sets of workers, one with rights and one without," he said. "That's the current situation with undocumented workers now."

Other labor advocates are not sure. Bruce Goldstein, director of Farmworker Justice, said the United States should allow more immigrants to work here permanently.

"We do need a legal avenue for people to enter the country to work, to reduce the illegal flow and people dying in the desert," he said. "The question is, what kind of legal status?"

As an example of present day abuses, Goldstein cited the case of Los Angeles-based Global Horizons, which was recently fined $230,000 by the state of Washington for mistreating temporary laborers brought in on H2A visas from Thailand. Subcontractors, said Goldstein, often charge high fees to match workers with jobs so that, by the time they reach the United States, the guest workers are deeply in debt and desperate.

Goldstein worries that members of Congress negotiating a compromise between the two pending bills will eliminate measures such as the option of applying for a green card and eventual citizenship. Even in the Senate, some members preferred a program that would bar guest workers from getting on a path to U.S. citizenship.

"Temporary must mean temporary," Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., emphasized in an unsuccessful push earlier this month for an amendment to prevent guest workers from applying for legal permanent residence. "We must think ahead to a day when the economy might not be as strong and robust as it is today, and we're left with millions of what will be unemployed foreign workers. Our first responsibility is to the American people and the American economy."

Others oppose all guest worker plans on the theory that any version will attract too many more immigrants.

"A guest implies someone who's here temporarily, and they never are," said John Keeley, a spokesman for the Center for Immigration Studies in Washington, D.C., a think tank that favors restricting both legal and illegal immigration.

The vast majority of braceros actually did return to Mexico when their jobs here ended, said Meyers, of the Migration Policy Institute, though a handful, like Santillana and his friend Ernesto Aguilar, 71, put down roots.

Aguilar said he never would have been able to educate all of his seven children in Mexico if he hadn't worked as a bracero. But he thinks any new program needs to ensure that workers receive decent food and housing and are paid fairly.

Although he grew up a peasant in Oaxaca, he was taken aback by the living conditions he encountered picking cotton in Texas in the 1950s, where workers were crammed into claustrophobic bunkrooms and had to cook their tortillas over outdoor fire pits.

"I was used to living in poverty, but it was worse than I thought," he said. "We were afraid to speak up. They threatened us that if we complained, they would take our working papers and send us home."

Harvesting melons in Arizona a couple of years later, Aguilar noticed that his weekly earnings never added up given the number of hours he worked. The problem was remedied when a federal inspector made a rare visit.

Years later, as a construction laborer in San Jose with a green card, he learned from his union that workers are entitled to a 15-minute break each morning and afternoon, and to overtime pay when they put in long hours.

Juan Valentin, a bracero who returned and settled in Richmond, said he didn't know money was deducted from his paycheck during the years he picked cotton and oranges in California's Imperial Valley and in Arizona.

"I never received any money when I went back to Mexico," he told The Chronicle in 2003. "No one did."

Valentin died last year at age 81, without collecting any of the wages he realized must have been withheld from his pay, said his daughter-in-law, Yolanda Valentin.

Goldstein said the mistakes of half a century ago should serve as a lesson.

"The U.S. government needs to start enforcing the labor rights of guest workers," he said. "It didn't under the Bracero Program, and it doesn't today. As long as these people hold this nonimmigrant temporary status, the government doesn't have the political will to enforce the law vigorously."

Experts wary of personal data use

By Allen Pusey

WASHINGTON - The government knows how old you are, the market value of your home, whether you've been arrested, what car you drive and what you earn. You know that.

But do they know what books you buy? What Web sites you visit? Whether you've bounced a check? Whom you call? Perhaps.

Privacy advocates and some constitutional scholars say recent revelations - the gathering of domestic phone records to find terrorists and the loss of data on 26 million veterans - raise new questions about the potential for abuse and misuse when the government archives personal information about ordinary Americans.

The debate isn't new, and neither is the trend. In 1974, the Senate Judiciary Committee identified 843 government databases that contained personal data on Americans. Of those, at least 457 had no specific legal authorization, and 100 of those had no authorization at all.

The computer age has multiplied those numbers, however, with no accurate accounting of how much the government compiles.

Despite concerns about identity theft and domestic spying, polls show that most people accept the gathering of personal data - whether for programs like social security or for the war on terrorism.

Judith Womack, 47, counts herself as a "left-leaning" Democrat who cherishes personal freedom. Still, the Dallas legal assistant said she is comforted by the fact that the government is actively searching for the next wave of al-Qaida operatives.

"I think 9/11 could have been prevented if we'd done more about finding out who was here," Womack said. "And I don't think I mind giving up a little freedom if it means making us more secure. I don't think that you should have so much freedom that you put people at risk."

Brandon Mayfield, a lawyer from Portland, Ore., has a different perspective.

Two years ago, he was arrested in the 2004 terrorist bombings of rush-hour trains in Madrid after the FBI used a computer database that matched a 22-year-old fingerprint from him with one found by Spanish authorities on a satchel of detonating devices. He was held for 21 days - much of the time without access to a lawyer - before the print was found to be that of an Algerian terrorist. An FBI inspector general determined later that investigators ignored evidence of his innocence in favor of the data-based fingerprint match.

Mayfield declined to speak in detail about his experience because of pending lawsuits, but he said Americans may be taking government snooping too lightly.

"Most of us are willing to trade our privacy for security, as long as it doesn't involve us," he said. Concerns about intrusion and accuracy are compounded, say privacy advocates, by increased government use of commercially gathered data from private sources.

New technologies have created a massive market for what was once regarded as intimate knowledge of individuals. Marketing programs and devices - ranging from grocery discount cards to Internet identifiers on your computer - allow passive disclosure of consumer transactions. And for the right price, that information is available to the government or anyone else. Law enforcement agencies, tax collectors, utility firms, collection companies and others purchase data from companies such as ChoicePoint and BTI to create profiles for everything from screening job applicants to solving crimes.

"It's the biggest privacy problem in the 21st century," said Jim Harper of the Cato Institute, a Libertarian think tank. "The crossover of privately created data into the hands of the government is a potentially dangerous thing."

Still, the development of new government data and database projects is rarely debated in Washington, and not always disclosed.

And that may be the biggest concern: What is the government compiling in secret?

"That's why you need the institutional bulwark of constitutional checks. It's all about accountability. You need the collective wisdom of the people to regulate this," said Bruce Fein, a high-ranking Justice Department official during the Reagan administration.

Critics like Fein say that technology and expedience have helped to erode the 1974 Privacy Act, in which Congress tried to control wholesale government information gathering by allowing average Americans to see and challenge their personal records. That access, once a hallmark of government accountability, has been chipped away by concerns for secrecy, Fein said.

"You can't challenge something if it's kept secret," he said. "You have no way of knowing what you don't know."

Since the Sept. 11 terror attacks, government databases have, by federal law, become more prolific and more proficient.

Since March 2003, for instance, all international airlines are required to provide the government with full electronic access to passenger data - from names and flights to credit card numbers and specially requested meals.

By 2004, Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., was being turned away from flights because his last name and first initial matched a person on the government's no-fly list as a terrorist threat.

Just last month, the New York Civil Liberties Union sued Pentagon officials on behalf of six teenagers who objected to a little-known recruiting database maintained by the Defense Department. The six claim the Joint Advertising and Market Research and Recruiting Database used e-mails, test scores and other private information without legal authorization to keep tabs on school-aged youths.

Perhaps no government data effort received a more hostile reception than Total Information Awareness - a Defense Department program revealed in news reports in 2002. The program involved tracking large commercial databases such as travel records, credit card receipts, bank accounts, medical files and telephone logs to try to detect the movement of terrorists across the globe.

Though Congress subsequently scrapped the program, its essential analysis technique - data mining - survived. Data mining is a computerized mathematical tool that analyzes large bodies of information to identify patterns.

In a 2004 study by the Government Accountability Office, federal agencies reported at least 199 data mining projects planned or in operation. Neither the National Security Agency nor the CIA, the nation's largest spy operations, participated in the survey.

At a recent conference on security, Sen. John Sununu, R-N.H., argued that most questions about government information gathering need to be considered in context before Congress steps in to regulate them. He said commercial data can be controlled by disclosure and private contracts rather than new laws.
But, he said, even Congress is nervous about wholesale data mining. "You have to weigh whether the benefit is really worth the privacy intrusions involved."

Aside from misusing government databases, there's the potential for government workers to just mishandle the information.

The recent theft of 26.5 million Veterans Administration records during a residential burglary illustrates how vulnerable digital government records are. VA officials have said the records were apparently stolen after a VA data analyst took them home on his laptop.

Though there has been no evidence that the records have been used, VFW Commander in Chief Jim Mueller called the incident "deeply disturbing."

"What happened is absolutely unacceptable, but the task at hand is to inform every veteran family so that they can begin taking steps to safeguard their personal information," Mueller said.

The incident shows how many people can be affected by just one database, whether the information is gathered from tax rolls, drug stores, long distance providers, utility companies, credit card vendors and Internet questionnaires, said Lillie Coney of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a group that advocates stricter controls on commercial and government data.

"The more this information is sold and spread around, the less accountability there is for the accuracy of the information, much less the privacy concerns," said Coney. "If everyone has the information, where do you go to correct it if it is wrong?"

BROWNING — Call her a Native American Erin Brockovich.

Elouise Cobell's fight to get the government to pay tribal members for mismanaging Indian trust money is the subject of a documentary.

Cobell vs. Norton is the largest class action suit ever filed against the U.S. government. She's seeking between $40 and $176 billion to be paid to Native Americans, one-third of whom live in poverty. Unemployment is as high as 80 percent on some reservations.

Melinda Janko, of Fire in the Belly Productions, is working on the documentary titled "Broken Promises: Indian Trust." The film includes interviews with senators, congressmen and other government officials, along with documenting the last 25 years of Cobell's battle.

With production still under way, the film makers don't have plans of how to show the documentary, but are hoping for national distribution.

MEMORANDUM

TO: Paul D. Clement Solicitor General

FROM: Douglas N. Letter
Appellate Litigation Counsel
Civil Division, Appellate Staff

SUBJECT: Report on the Spring 2006 Meeting of the FRAP Committee

I am providing a report on the Spring 2006 meeting in San Francisco of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure Committee; there are a few items that are likely of interest to appellate offices throughout DOJ. At this meeting, Judge Stewart of the Fifth Circuit replaced Judge (now Chief Justice) Roberts as chair of the Committee (Chief Justice Roberts had served on the Committee for several years and was slated to replace Judge (now Justice) Alito as Committee chair, but never actually did so in light of other developments in his career).

1. As you know, we had proposed a new rule to prohibit the filing of pro se appellate briefs by represented persons whose attorneys had already filed briefs on their behalf in the appeal. The Committee was interested in our proposal, and had various questions, and asked that we consider some alternatives.

Judge Sutton asked what the Supreme Court practice is with regard to pro se briefs by represented persons. I have consulted with Emily Spadoni in your office about this, and she has already put me in touch with the right person in the Supreme Court clerk's office.

One Committee member questioned whether a FRAP provision on this subject is appropriate, or whether it should simply be left to the local option of the Circuits. I indicated that we are having an actual problem in a few Circuits, and that we think a uniform rule barring this type of pro se brief is in order.

Committee members proposed two alternatives that DOJ has been asked to consider. The first would treat such pro se briefs similarly to a rehearing petition in a key way – a new rule would prohibit the courts from accepting arguments raised in the pro se brief alone unless the other side (generally the United States) has been given an opportunity by the court to respond to the arguments in that pro se supplemental brief. Thus, we would not be expected to respond to points raised only in a pro se brief from a represented party unless the court ordered a response.

The second alternative would create a rule that pro se parties could file their supplemental briefs only if they first received permission from the appellate court in response to a motion filed before the party's brief is due. Thus, we would not have to respond to such pro se briefs unless they had been filed with permission of the court after grant of a motion.

My initial reaction is that either of these alternatives would largely solve our concerns about having to respond to a pro se brief as well as an attorney-filed brief. The second alternative would seem preferable from our perspective, and I think it would be a perfectly adequate substitute for our proposal. By this memorandum, I am soliciting the thoughts of the various interested DOJ components.

2. The Committee Reporter told us that he has been serving as the Reporter for a special Judicial Conference committee looking into the question of whether to make the counting of time in all of the procedural rules simpler and uniform. The current basic proposal of this special committee is to convert all time limits to "calendar" days, as opposed to the current practice in FRCP and FRAP, under which certain time limits are computed in "business" days. The special committee fully intends that, if this change is made, each of the rules committees will recommend amendments to their respective rules in order to adjust current time limits.

Judge Stewart appointed a subcommittee to study this matter for the FRAP, and I will serve on it. Thus, DOJ needs to consider three issues.

First, do we see any serious problem with switching to a uniform system for counting time in all of the rules? Second, what changes in the FRAP are needed if all days in the rules mean calendar days, rather than business days? In other words, we need to identify the various time limits in FRAP, and determine what we think they should be if they are all going to be stated in calendar days.

Third, we must also identify other timing provisions not appearing in FRAP, but nevertheless applicable to the courts of appeals (for example, 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) (a party has ten days to petition the court of appeals after a district court certifies an issue for interlocutory appeal)). Committee members raised the question whether the Supreme Court can through FRAP amendments change deadlines set by statute. I pointed out that 28 U.S.C. § 2072(b) appears to provide that the Court can indeed do so.

One other issue relevant to this discussion arose: should the Committee at the same time address the three -extra-days-for-mail-service rule. See FRAP 26(c). Should this provision be abolished? Should it continue to apply to all service (including electronic service) other than actual hand-delivery of a hard copy? Should it be clarified?

By this memorandum, I am soliciting comments from the various interested DOJ components on these points, and asking that they let me know as soon as possible about pertinent statutory deadlines that should be examined as part of this process. (The Committee members noted the concern that the Circuits also will have to take account of a new calendar -day timing provision as they issue orders containing deadlines.)

3. Public Citizen Litigation Group had in the past raised with the Committee a question about the timing of reply briefs in the courts of appeals in light of the fact that amicus briefs supporting appellees are currently not due until seven business days after appellee briefs are filed. This scheduling means that, in some instances, a reply brief might be filed before the amicus brief supporting the appellee is actually filed. Thus, Public Citizen has suggested that the due date for all reply briefs be lengthened to avoid this potential problem.

This Public Citizen suggestion has been discussed by the Committee before, and it has been rejected because we did not think there is truly a problem, and it can be dealt with by motions if it ever actually occurs. However, at this meeting, the Public Citizen suggestion caused some members of the Committee to question the FRAP system under which amicus briefs are due seven business days after the brief they are supporting. Some members wondered if amicus briefs in the courts of appeals should be due on the same day as the brief they are supporting, as is the practice in the Supreme Court. I pointed out that the reason for the FRAP practice was the assumption by the Committee in the past that, by having amicus briefs due seven days after the brief they are supporting, those amicus briefs would include less duplication of the party briefs. Committee members questioned if that is actually true.

I was thus asked by the Committee to analyze this question and report on whether a change is appropriate. I am, by this memorandum, asking the relevant components to let me know their thoughts on whether the FRAP should be changed to meet Supreme Court practice – i.e., amicus briefs would be due the same day as the briefs they support. Such a change would, I think, have a significant impact on our practice in the Civil Division – we file many amicus briefs, and are often dependent on that seven-day extra period.

4. I had provided a report to the Committee regarding whether it should recommend FRAP changes in light of the Victims ' Rights Act, which contains some provisions difficult to square with existing rules. I reported to the Committee that there has thus far been very little experience with the new statute 's provision for mandamus review, and that DOJ thus recommended that no FRAP changes be proposed now. Instead, I recommended that DOJ continue to monitor this matter; otherwise, we might make rules changes, only to find, as experience develops, that the actual problems lie elsewhere. The Circuit Clerk representative on the Committee strongly agreed, as did the full Committee. Pursuant to my offer, the Committee has asked that DOJ continue to watch the situation and report if problems are developing. I will thus keep in touch with the Criminal Division and U.S. Attorneys ' offices, as well as Deputy SG Dreeben, on this matter.

5. Finally, one Committee member stated that he had been requested by several judges to raise the question about whether FRAP should include a provision like Supreme Court Rule 37.6, which requires non-governmental amici to include a statement in their briefs addressing "whether counsel for a party authored the brief in whole or in part," and identifying all persons and entities other than the amicus who made a monetary contribution to the preparation or submission of the brief.

Again, I am hereby asking interested DOJ components if they have views on this proposal. Further, I wonder if your office has any views on whether the existing provision in the Supreme Court rules has proven to be of value to us.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Rules US Must Reveal Monitoring In Detainee Suit. The New York Times (5/31, Bernstein) reports, "A federal magistrate in Brooklyn yesterday insisted that government lawyers defending former Attorney General John Ashcroft and other top officials in a lawsuit brought by former immigrant detainees cannot dodge the plaintiffs' persistent and unwelcome question: Are members of the United States trial team and likely witnesses — including Mr. Ashcroft and Robert S. Mueller III, the F.B.I. director — aware of any secret government monitoring of communications between the plaintiffs and their lawyers? … 'Plaintiffs' effort to learn whether their conversations with their attorneys were monitored by the government is not a mere fishing expedition based on unfounded speculation,' the magistrate, Judge Steven M. Gold, wrote in an 11-page decision. The order rejected the government's request that he reconsider a similar order that he made orally on March 7." Judge Gold "noted that 'the government's electronic surveillance of individuals suspected of links to terrorism has received widespread publicity and has even been acknowledged by the president of the United States.' And he cited findings by the inspector general that on more than 40 occasions, staff members of the Metropolitan Detention Center secretly video-recorded visits between lawyers and Muslim immigrants swept up and detained there after the Sept. 11 attacks, and later deported after being cleared of links to terrorism." The Times notes, "Stephen E. Handler, a Justice Department lawyer, had argued that confirming or denying such monitoring in one case and not another could 'tend to reveal classified information.' … But Judge Gold rejected the government's main argument for silence. 'Any claim that sensitive secrets would be revealed by the government's disclosure of whether conversations between plaintiffs and their counsel in this case were monitored is hard to fathom,' he wrote."

Gonzales' Threat To Prosecute Reporters Meets With Continuing Criticism. In an op-ed in the Washington Times (5/31), syndicated columnist Jacob Sullum writes, "The Justice Department, which was complicit in the National Security Agency's circumvention of the statutory limits on surveillance of e-mail and phone calls, has not shown much interest in getting to the bottom of that apparent crime. It recently abandoned an internal probe of the legal advice Justice lawyers gave the NSA, ostensibly because its investigators could not get requisite security clearances. … But that does not mean the Justice Department is ignoring the revelations concerning the NSA's warrantless surveillance. Last week Attorney General Alberto Gonzales suggested the government might prosecute New York Times reporters and editors for informing the public about the program." Sullum continues, "Mr. Gonzales probably had in mind a 1950 amendment to the Espionage Act of 1917 that says 'whoever knowingly and willfully... publishes... any classified information... concerning the communication intelligence activities of the United States... shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.' On its face, this section covers what the New York Times did. … But it also covers what I'm doing right now: discussing, online and in print, a communication intelligence activity that remains classified. The law seemingly applies to everyone who has publicly acknowledged existence of the NSA's warrantless surveillance program, including the Bush administration's defenders." Sullum concludes, "When the executive branch decides what information is secret and whether any given person should be prosecuted for discussing it, the potential chilling effect on reporting and public debate is enormous. So is the potential for unconstitutional favoritism, since classified material is routinely used by journalists both sympathetic and hostile to the current administration. … Largely for such reasons, the Justice Department has never prosecuted a journalist for using classified information in a story. It should not start now."

The Kansas City Star (5/31) editorializes, "President Bush, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and many of their congressional supporters speak of the importance of respecting the exact words of the U.S. Constitution. Yet some words get more respect than others." The Star continues, "The Fourth Amendment, for example, protects people against unreasonable searches and lays out requirements for search warrants. But Bush and some of his top aides need a refresher course on this part of the Constitution, judging from reports about their controversial surveillance programs. … Now the administration seems intent on downplaying the First Amendment as well. That part of the Constitution protects freedom of the press and freedom of speech, among other things. … Let's get real. U.S. forces have been hunting down and killing the group's operatives for years. The wary survivors hardly need a newspaper story to tell them American intelligence might be eavesdropping on them. … The Founding Fathers were all too familiar with efforts by surly government officials to hobble the press, suppress criticism and restrict the flow of information to the public. … That's why the First Amendment prohibits any law 'abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press.' … Bush and Gonzales shouldn't forget those words. Neither should the American public."

In a column in the Atlantic Monthly (5/30), Stuart Taylor Jr. writes, "Comes now Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a man not known for legal acuity, with a threat to prosecute The New York Times and other news media for publishing leaks of classified information. … Gonzales, who launched a major investigation late last year into such leaks, claimed in a May 21 ABC News interview that Congress has made a 'policy judgment' that in some circumstances journalists should be prosecuted for publishing classified information. … This assertion is misleading at best. The 89-year-old espionage law to which Gonzales was mainly referring was not intended to prosecute anybody for publishing anything and has never been so used. This is an administration that has not hesitated to leak classified information that makes it look good—but calls it criminal for others to publish leaks that make it look bad." Taylor adds, "When it comes to leaking classified information, this administration has no standing to preach, let alone prosecute. … We have seen strong evidence that I. Lewis (Scooter) Libby and Karl Rove leaked Plame's classified CIA role to reporters, in pursuit of Dick Cheney's interest in discrediting criticisms by Plame's husband, Joseph C. Wilson. The idea was to show Wilson to be a lightweight trading on his wife's CIA connections. (He was. But that's another story.) … Under the Gonzo doctrine, as I will call it, such leaks are felonies if the leakers and any co-conspirators knew that the information was classified. Libby knew, according to Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald. (Nobody has claimed—yet—that Cheney knew, or that he approved the Plame leak.)" Taylor continues, "What would the courts do with such a prosecution? The legal precedents are sparse. The Supreme Court spurned Nixon's 1971 effort to enjoin publication of the Pentagon Papers in advance. But the nine separate opinions in the case are less than reassuring. … Still, I'd be surprised if even Bush and Gonzales are foolish enough to prosecute journalists. Notwithstanding the unpopularity of the media, that might drive Bush's approval ratings below 30 percent for the rest of his already blighted term. … There is not much chance that a New York or Washington jury would vote unanimously to convict in such a case. And if there were a conviction, the case would end up in a Supreme Court that seems sick and tired of this administration's contempt for law."

Top EU Court Tosses Bilateral Passenger Agreement. The New York Times (5/31, Clark, Wald, 1.19M) reports, "The European Union's highest court ruled Tuesday that the Union had overstepped its authority by agreeing to give the United States personal details about airline passengers on flights to America in an effort to fight terrorism," a decision that will "force the two sides to renegotiate the deal at a time of heightened concerns about possible infringements of civil liberties by the Bush administration in its campaign against terrorism, and the extent to which European governments have cooperated." The two sides now have "four months to approve a new agreement, and American officials expressed optimism that one could be reached."

The Washington Post (5/31, A11, Anderson, Alexander, 744K) quotes Jarrod Agen, a spokesman for the US Department of Homeland Security, as saying, "The content of the agreement was not what the court found issue with." Separately, an unnamed US official in Brussels is quoted as saying, "We've been in touch with European institutions to talk about how to deal with what came down. ... No one knew what it would say until today, but there were contacts between European institutions and US authorities to agree to handle this in a smooth way, whatever happened."

The Financial Times (5/31, Laitner, Cameron, Peel) notes "the controversial 2004 agreement required carriers to send up to 34 pieces of passenger information to the Department of Homeland Security, which used the data to compile 'no-fly' lists of suspected terrorists and criminals." The deal "had been attacked by civil liberties' groups on both sides of the Atlantic, but was struck down by the European Court of Justice on a legal technicality following a challenge from the European Parliament." Airlines "expressed confidence that a new deal could be reached by the September 30 deadline imposed by the court, though said the move highlighted continuing confusion over aviation security regulations."

The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Echikson, 2.11M) reports EU Justice Commissioner Franco Frattini "said he would try to rework the agreement 'under a different legal basis, but with similar content.' He, too, said he is confident a deal can be struck before most EU officials go on holiday for August. But without one, he added, 'we could face really huge problems.'" However, "in private, an EU official cautioned that it will be hard to renegotiate a deal that will satisfy both the European Parliament and the U.S. government. Some members of the Parliament vowed to take a tough line on any new agreement."

The AP (5/31, White) reports, "The European Court of Justice said EU nations acted without the correct legal basis. It did not, however, take issue with specific measures of the law. … Lawyers have until Sept. 30 to address the concerns raised by the court. If they fail to fix legal technicalities by that date, airlines may have to change the way they collect and transfer data."

Bloomberg (5/31, Lumley) reports, "The European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based executive agency, said it's analyzing the 'full implications' of the court ruling and will work with the other institutions to find a solution by the September deadline. The regulator will consult with the U.S. on any changes that may be required. … 'The commission remains committed to the fight against terrorism while respecting fundamental human rights such as the right to privacy,' commission spokesman Johannes Laitenberger said at a daily news briefing in Brussels today." Bloomberg adds, "The current regulations, imposed after the Sept. 11 attacks to allow security agencies to scan airline records for terrorists and criminals, are a compromise with U.S. authorities. The commission had found the original rules violated the EU's privacy laws. The U.S. agreed not to record passengers' meal and seating preferences, which could reveal a traveler's religion or health, as well as limit the amount of time the data is stored to 3 1/2 years from 50 years."

PATRIOT ACT:

Connecticut Librarians Denounce NSL Gag Order, Patriot Act. The New York Times (5/31, Cowan, 1.19M) reports, "Four Connecticut librarians who had been barred from revealing that they had received a request for patrons' records from the federal government spoke out yesterday, expressing frustration about the sweeping powers given to law enforcement authorities by the USA Patriot Act. The librarians took turns at the microphone at their lawyers' office and publicly identified themselves as the collective John Doe who had sued the United States attorney general after their organization received a confidential demand for patron records in a secret counterterrorism case. … 'I'm John Doe, and if I had told you before today that the F.B.I. was requesting library records, I could have gone to jail, said…Peter Chase, a librarian from Plainville who is on the executive committee of Library Connection's board." Library Connection executive director George Christian added that "being free to speak now, weeks after the Patriot Act was reauthorized for several more years, was 'like being allowed to call the Fire Department after the building has burned down.'"

The Hartford Courant (5/31, Tuohy, 206K) adds that board president Barbara Bailey said, "It all reminded me of George Orwell's '1984.' You knew it was fiction. You knew it was preposterous. But you know, I've been living it." ACLU associate legal director Ann Beeson "said the Library Connection has not turned over any of the records sought in the national security letter, and the legal battle continues over other portions of the demand. The librarians still are prohibited from discussing the targets of the demand letter and the scope of the records sought." The AP (5/31, Eltman) notes that the librarians "spoke out bitterly for the first time," and they "did little to hide their displeasure at being told by the government to keep quiet." NPR's All Things Considered (5/30, Abramson) reported that "before the lawsuit was fully litigated, prosecutors dropped their appeal, leading a judge to rescind the gag order on the librarians. Nonetheless, analysts say the gag-order option remains available for the government in future cases."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

ELF Bomb Plot Suspect Pleads Guilty, Agrees To Cooperate With Investigators. The AP (5/31) reports, "A Westchester County woman, one of three people accused of plotting to blow up a U.S. Forest Service genetics lab and other targets" in California, "pleaded guilty to conspiracy, federal prosecutors said Tuesday." Lauren Weiner "agreed to cooperate with investigators as part of her plea bargain. That includes testifying against" her two codefendants. The AP notes, "The three planned to act in the name of the Earth Liberation Front, a shadowy group of environmental activists, investigators said. However, the FBI infiltrated the group with an undercover informant."

Bush Views "United 93" With Families Of Flight's Passengers, Crew. The Washington Post (5/31, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column that President Bush and the First Lady viewed the movie United 93 in the White House family theater last night. They were joined by "relatives of many of the 40 passengers and crew who died on the hijacked flight nearly five years ago. This is the first time the president has seen the harrowing film, which dramatizes the struggle to retake the plane from terrorists aimed at the Capitol or White House."

Chertoff Assesses Hurricane Preparedness In New Orleans. CNN's Situation Room (5/30, Meserve) reported that DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff visited New Orleans "to satisfy himself that everything that can be done has been done to protect this city if another big hurricane hits." Secretary Chertoff was shown giving his name for a mock evacuation and riding on a bus as he "played evacuee, getting a firsthand taste of what will happen if there is another evacuation of New Orleans." CNN added, "New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin is among those meeting and briefing Chertoff. Nagin brings to the secretary a concern of his own. The regional transit authority will run out of money the very month hurricane season starts. … Chertoff says the federal government will come up with the money to keep drivers on the job if it has to. Chertoff gives a good grade to the city's evacuation plan, but he says all of the efforts of local, state and federal governments could be undercut if citizens refuse to leave when they are told to."

The AP (5/30, McConnaughey) reported Secretary Chertoff, who visited Touro Infirmary along with FEMA Director R. David Paulison, said his visit gave him "a tangible feel for what not only what the challenges are but also what steps the city has taken to prepare itself for a hurricane this time." Though he "said the federal government has made arrangements for about 3,000 buses to help with evacuations if needed," Chertoff said "there seemed to be more shelter spaces available" last year. "However, the state actually has identified more shelter space than it used last year — excluding the Superdome, which will not be available, said Cleo Allen, spokeswoman for the state Department of Social Services."

Allen Calls Coast Guard, FEMA Under DHS "Perfect Marriage." In an interview on the Situation Room (5/30, Blitzer), Coast Guard Commandant Thad Allen was asked whether it was "smart" to bring FEMA and the Coast Guard into the Department of Homeland Security. Allen said, "I think this is a perfect marriage of Coast Guard and FEMA in the same department. We prescript mission assignments now, so we're ready to act further in advance than we ever have before. But the joint training between Coast Guard and FEMA people has been extraordinarily useful."

Shuster, Boustany Tour Cameron, Calcasieu Parishes. The Daily Advertiser (5/31, Taylor) reports Reps. Bill Shuster and Charles Boustany "toured Cameron and Calcasieu parishes Tuesday" to view hurricane damage in the area. Shuster, who is sponsoring legislation to remove FEMA from DHS, "said he was surprised to learn that it would cost only $2-4 million to repair a large piece of levee in southwest Louisiana and the federal money has not been sent. 'In Washington numbers, that's peanuts,' Shuster said. The money, he said, is probably tied up in federal bureaucracy."

Hurricane-Prone States Hope Efforts To Scare Residents Will Prompt Preparedness. Under the headline "As Hurricane Season Looms, States Aim To Scare," the New York Times (5/31, Goodnough, 1.19M) reports many "officials in hurricane-prone states are trumpeting dire warnings" in advance of this year's hurricane season, aiming, "it seems, …to scare the multitudes of people who emergency officials say remain blasé even after last year's record-breaking storm season." The Florida Division of Emergency Management, for example, "is broadcasting public service announcements with recordings of 911 calls placed during Hurricane Ivan in 2004." The Times continues with quotes from "unfazed" residents, including Jimmy Austin, of Nags Head, North Carolina, who said he "sees no need for special precautions."

Federal Judge In Houston Won't Issue Restraining Order To Continue FEMA Housing. The New York Times (5/31, Goodman, 1.19M) reports a federal judge in Houston, David Hittner, has "declined to issue a temporary restraining order that would force the Federal Emergency Management Agency to continue financing its rental-assistance housing program for Hurricane Katrina evacuees." Hittner found that "lawyers representing evacuees against the agency had failed to meet all four conditions required by law to compel a restraining order." The Times adds, "Many evacuees were told that their assistance would end today, while some in cities like Houston and Dallas had been granted extensions until June 30."

Long Island Insurance Market Shows Signs Of Hurricane Fears. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, B1, Pleven, 2.11M) reports that "with the ever-present threat that a mammoth storm could deviate from recent patterns" and strike Long Island, "the insurance market here is showing glimmers of the kind of fragility that has plagued places like Florida." The situation in Long Beach, where "finding any hurricane coverage at all is getting harder and more expensive," is an example of "how the insurance industry has intensified efforts to limit its exposure in the Northeast." Meanwhile, "In Long Beach, only about 40% of households are covered by the federally backed flood-insurance program," which is "a much lower percentage than in much of New Orleans at the time of Hurricane Katrina."

Insurance Executive Says Residents In Catastrophe-Prone Areas Should Assume Risk. Edmund F. Kelly, chairman, president and CEO of Liberty Mutual, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (5/31, A12, 2.11M) writes that while "calls for the federal government to expand its role in providing insurance for those who build or live in catastrophe-prone areas" will "likely…grow louder" with the start of hurricane season, "reasons this is a bad idea should be obvious. People who willingly and knowingly live in catastrophe-prone areas should assume the risk, and pay the cost, of doing so; government-subsidized insurance just loads this risk, and cost, on average taxpayers. And what proponents of a greater role for the government don't like to discuss is that the Federal Flood Program has a $20 billion deficit -- and has notably failed to meet its original purpose of encouraging people to rebuild away from areas vulnerable to devastating coastal storms." Kelly suggests "stronger building codes to make homes and other structures less susceptible to severe storms" and regulatory processes that would "allow insurance pricing to better reflect risks."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Learned From Press About Haditha Incident. The AP (5/30) reports, "President Bush learned of reports that U.S. Marines killed two dozen unarmed Iraqi civilians only after reporters began asking questions, the White House said Tuesday." Press secretary Tony Snow said Bush learned from a Time reporter. The article quotes the version alleged by war critic Rep. John Murtha (D-PA), namely that "Marines then shot and killed unarmed civilians in a taxi at the scene and went into homes and shot other people."

ABC News Nightline (5/30, Karl) reported, Bush "was briefed by his national security adviser on what happened, shortly after 'Time' started asking questions. Press secretary, Tony Snow, says the President has taken a personal interest in the story." Snow: "I think anybody who has heard the story has a personal interest in it. It's impossible not to. But the president is also allowing the chain of command to do what it's supposed to do, through the department of defense, which is to complete an investigation." And House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter said, "Justice will occur here. And it's important when the marines brief me, we agreed that we should let the chips fall where they may. This should be a tough, effective, aggressive investigation."

Meanwhile, the CBS Evening News (5/30, story 4, 0:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The White House pledged today that the public will be told everything Pentagon investigators learn about reports that US Marines in Iraq killed two dozen unarmed civilians last November."

Probe May "Already Be Compromised." ABC News Nightline (5/30, Moran) called the investigation into allegations that Marines killed 24 civilians in Haditha perhaps "the most important criminal investigation in the US military since the My Lai massacre in Vietnam. And it may already be compromised." The probe "is running into serious trouble. Too much time has passed since the killings. And not enough evidence remains." The investigation is characterized as being taken seriously at the "highest level."

Iraqi Prime Minister Wants Investigation Expedited. NBC Nightly News (5/30, story 3, 4:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki yesterday addressed the deaths of 24 civilians in Haditha, reportedly at the hands of US Marines, saying "his patience here is wearing thin. Military forces, he said, must respect human rights and innocent Iraqis cannot be killed by mistake."

Military Inquiry Refuted Haditha Marines' Claims. The New York Times (5/31, Schmitt and Cloud, 1.19M) reports, "A military investigator uncovered evidence in February and March that contradicted repeated claims by marines that Iraqi civilians killed in Haditha last November were victims of a roadside bomb, according to a senior military official in Iraq." Such evidence included gunshot wounds to the heads and chests of the victims. That investigator also reviewed compensation paid shortly afterward to the victims.

Officers Not Target Of Haditha Investigation. The AP (5/30, Watkins) reports, "Three officers relieved of command from a Marine battalion are not targets of investigations into whether their troops killed as many as two dozen Iraqi civilians and tried to cover it up, the attorney for one of the officers said Tuesday." The article names the three officers as Capt. James Kimber, Lt. Col. Jeffrey Chessani, and Capt. Lucas McConnell. It extensively quotes attorney Paul Hackett, Kimber's counsel, in defense of his client. CNN's The Situation Room (5/30, McIntyre) reported, "In anticipation of the idea that charges will be filed against Marines in the weeks or perhaps even months ahead, some of those Marines are talking to defense attorneys. And we're talking to those attorneys. They're painting a slightly different picture of what may have happened in Haditha that day, including accounts of a firefight that was nearby, even if it wasn't at the scene where the killings took place."

Murtha Urges More Openness. Rep. John Murtha was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (5/30) was asked about his suggestion that there was a cover-up of the Haditha incident. Murtha said, "What I worry about is that this happened six months ago. And nothing -- you heard nothing about it. As a matter of fact, the original story was that an IED killed these 15 people. It became very confusing to the public. TIME magazine came out with an article, and they still tried to cover it up. Now, there were payments made to victims, which aren't made unless we kill them, one way or the other. And, secondly, they knew about it the day afterwards. So, there's no excuse for not having this be more open and know exactly what -- and the longer it goes, the worse it is for us, because it looks like it's the policy of our troops to do something like this."

Haditha Allegations Said To Undercut US Efforts In Iraq. USA Today (5/31, Johnson, 2.31M) writes, "Allegations that Marines killed civilians in the western Iraqi town of Haditha last year could undo efforts to win the cooperation of locals in the volatile Anbar province, some Marines say." The article notes, "The allegations also highlight the rapid life-and-death decisions that soldiers and Marines make in the shadowy world of guerrilla warfare," often very young ones. CNN's The Situation Room (5/30, Malveaux) reported that "officials worry the scandal of Abu Ghraib may pale in comparison to what military investigators uncover out of the western Iraqi city of Haditha. Pentagon sources say they suspect a small group of Marines massacred several dozen Iraqi citizens last November in retaliation for a killing of one of their own. The administration is now bracing itself for another potential crisis. … White House officials are urging everyone not to jump to conclusions or rush to judgment when it comes to the investigation." NPR's All Things Considered (5/30, Bowman) reported the USMC paid at least $38,000 to the families of those killed in Haditha.

WPost Says US Must Be "Accountable." The Washington Post (5/31, 744K) editorializes on the alleged Haditha massacre, "There is no way to mitigate or excuse such despicable acts if they occurred, and hardly any way to alleviate the tremendous damage that will be done to U.S. honor in Iraq and around the world. The only remediation can come through a thorough investigation, the full disclosure of all misconduct and accountability for all those responsible." The Los Angeles Times (5/31, 958K) editorializes, "First things first. If Marines 'avenged' the killing of a comrade by terrorizing and killing innocent Iraqis, they disgraced their uniform and must be punished. The same is true of anyone higher in the chain of command who helped conceal what happened on Nov. 19, 2005, in Haditha in western Iraq." It concludes, "No amount of fog, and no level of confusion, can obscure the fact that this is a nation of laws, and when the U.S. condones the deliberate murder of civilians it becomes, as Murtha said, no better than its enemy."

Batiste Blames Rumsfeld For Haditha, Abu Ghraib. Retired Army Maj. Gen. John Batiste appeared on MSNBC's Hardball (5/30, 7:16 p.m.) and repeated his call for Secretary Rumsfeld's resignation, saying, "There's one man in charge of an organization, in this case, the Department of Defense, and he is responsible for what happens or what fails to happen under his watch." Batiste went on to say that the "alleged atrocity in Haditha…the whole national disgrace of Abu Ghraib and I think the chaos over the last three years can be traced directly back to our Secretary of Defense."

New Iraqi Envoy Presents Credentials To Bush. The Washington Times (5/31, Dinan, 90K) reports, "Iraq's ambassador to the United States presented his credentials to President Bush yesterday and said the president was right in saying terrorists cannot stop Iraq from forming a free and democratic country." Although the appointment of a new envoy by Iraq's government was "good news" for President Bush, "Mr. Sumaidaie's personal story could be bad news for the White House. Last year, he accused Marines of killing his 21-year-old cousin, a civilian who was home from school visiting his family in Haditha. Although not directly related, the incident raises the same issues being investigated by Marines and the Defense Department after reports of dozens of Iraqis killed on Nov. 19 in Haditha, a city in western Iraq." CNN's The Situation Room (5/30, Blitzer) reported, "At the White House today President Bush told Iraq's new ambassador to the US that he's impressed by the new leaders in Baghdad. But he also acknowledged difficult times including the mounting death toll for US troops in Iraq." CNN (Malveaux) added, "The Bush Administration is certainly hoping that this new permanent Iraqi government can turn things around. They are counting on it essentially to take on the terrorists and the insurgents. It's been some ten days since the installation of that new government and already bloody battles. Already a renewed sense here at the White House the need to be upbeat."

White House Officials Say Bush's Candor On Iraq Mistakes Surprised Them. The White House Bulletin/US News (5/30) reported, "New details are emerging about President Bush's admission of mistakes in handling the Iraq war last week. White House officials say they were as surprised as everyone else when Bush expressed regrets for his tough-guy rhetoric leading up to the Iraq war." They "note that Bush has been asked essentially the same question -- what were his biggest mistakes regarding the Iraq conflict -- many times over the years and has always declined to answer in a full and comprehensive way. This time, at a joint news conference with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Bush was asked the same question by a British journalist. The President suddenly turned introspective and expressed misgivings about some of his macho rhetoric, such as his challenging Iraqi insurgents to 'bring it on.'" A senior Bush adviser tells US News and the Bulletin: "It was an extraordinary moment for us. Ironically, even though it was asked before, it was the least expected question" because Bush had brushed it off so often in the past. The Bulletin adds, "Why the surge of candor at that moment? Bush advisers say that Laura and Rove had been urging him for a while to soften his image and be more accommodating to his critics. But they also say the President has felt this way for a long time and simply felt it was time to reveal himself publicly."

Car Bombs Ravage Iraq As Violence Hits New High. The AP (5/31) writes, "Two car bombs killed dozens of people in Shiite Muslim areas of Iraq on Tuesday, part of a wave of attacks that left at least 54 people dead and 120 wounded on one of the bloodiest days in recent weeks. Iraqi officials told the Associated Press that a suspected terrorist who had confessed to taking part in hundreds of beheadings was captured in a raid that also netted documents, cellphones and computers with information on other wanted men."

The Washington Post (5/31, Hernandez and al-Izzi, 744K) reports, "In an indicator of rising violence, more 'multiple-fatality' bombings -- involving at least three deaths -- occurred this month than in any other since the war began in 2003, according to the Brookings Institution, which issues a twice-weekly report of security and reconstruction statistics. The report this week noted 44 such bombings as of May 25; since then, that number has risen above 50. The next-worst month was September 2005, with 46." According to the Post, "U.S. commanders have warned for weeks that the country's Sunni Arab insurgent movement, which they say is led by the group al-Qaeda in Iraq, would unleash an all-out offensive to weaken the new government's authority and stoke hatred between Sunni and Shiite Muslims." The Post notes a peculiar twist in the Saddam Hussein trial: "Two of the three defense witnesses who testified on Hussein's role in the alleged execution of 148 Iraqi Shiites in retaliation for an attempt on his life in the town of Dujail in 1982 testified that at least 23 of the people sentenced to death were still alive." The violence-filled day was the lead on each of the networks last night.

ABC World News Tonight (5/30, lead story, 2:40, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "The attacks came exactly one year after Vice President Cheney had this to say about the insurgency in Iraq." Vice President Cheney: "The level of activity that we see today from a military standpoint, I think, will clearly decline. I think they're in the last throes, if you will, of the insurgency." Karl: "But a new Pentagon assessment today says the insurgency has gotten deadlier." Military officials "blame the long delay on forming a new Iraqi government for the violence."

The CBS Evening News (5/30, lead story, 2:35, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Today was one of the worst in a long time. An American soldier was killed as a string of bombings left 54 people dead and more than 120 wounded." CBS (Martin) added, "Average weekly attacks on Americans and Iraqis, more than 600 a week, the highest level ever. Average daily casualties, that's killed and wounded, American troops down from 25 two years ago to about 15. But Iraqis, both civilian and military, way up, from 30 to nearly 80. The report also shows signs of progress, such as areas where Iraqi security forces are take the lead in the fighting: None at the start of last year, 30,000 square miles today."

NBC Nightly News (5/30, lead story, 3:15, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported the Pentagon's "own report released today which shows that violence in Iraq is on the rise and that more than half of Iraqis believe the security situation there has only gotten worse. Violence raged seemingly unabated throughout Iraq today."

1,500 US Troops To Reinforce Anbar. The New York Times (5/31, Oppel, 1.19M) writes pointedly, "One year after Vice President Dick Cheney predicted that the Iraqi insurgency was in its 'last throes,' the United States military said it had had to reassign 1,500 troops from Kuwait to Anbar Province. The move comes amid growing signs that much of the region is under the control of insurgent groups, including the terrorist organization of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. He and other jihadists have spoken of creating a caliphate that would be a shelter for radical Sunni groups." The Times added, "The inability to find nominees acceptable to the Shiite, Kurdish, Sunni Arab and secular members of Mr. Maliki's coalition continues to underscore how fragile the new government is in the face of a resilient insurgency."

Fox News (5/30, 7:05 p.m.) reported, "About 1,500 US soldiers have moved from Kuwait to Iraq. This is the second time since March that soldiers on stand-by in Kuwait have been sent into Iraq. Their assignment: a terrorist hotbed stretching from west of Baghdad to the Syrian border." CNN Headline News (5/30, 11:43 a.m.) reported the Second Brigade First Armored Division troops "follow some 750 troops who were already sent again from that brigade held in reserve in Kuwait, who were sent to Baghdad in March. They are still there. The Pentagon is not saying how long these 1,500 troops will remain in al Anbar province."

The CBS Evening News (5/30, lead story, 2:35, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "1500 more combat troops have been ordered into western Iraq in an attempt to establish some semblance of government control. It is the second time this year the American commander, General George Casey, has called in reinforcements. In March, 700 troops were sent into Baghdad to help hold down sectarian violence. They were supposed to remain 30 days, but they are still there."

NBC Nightly News (5/30, lead story, 3:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Fifteen hundred US troops are being flown from Kuwait to the Al Anbar province of Iraq, where a lot of this violence has been centered." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "This latest increase in violence could delay the withdrawal of any significant numbers of American forces from Iraq."

Violence Escalation Likely Has Derailed Pullout Plans. The Los Angeles Times (5/31, Roug and Spiegel, 958K) writes, "The Pentagon's hopes to make substantial reductions in U.S. troop levels in Iraq this year appear to be fading as a result of resurgent violence in the nation, particularly in the Sunni Arab stronghold of Anbar province, military officials acknowledge." The violence appears to have dashed hopes of "substantial U.S. troop reductions, from more than 130,000 now to 100,000 or less." However, "military officials say the deployment of new troops to Al Anbar is not a prelude to an offensive like the one launched in 2004 on Fallouja, which had become a haven for rebels."

Zakaria Says Iraq Needs Political Solution. In the Washington Post (5/31, 744K), Fareed Zakaria writes that standing up an Iraqi military is not the answer to the country's problems; rather, "the reality is that only an effective political bargain will bring about order. There needs to be a deal that gives all three communities strong incentives to cooperate rather than be spoilers." He says the new prime minister has two major challenges: "weakening the insurgency and disbanding sectarian militias. Neither can be done purely militarily."

Pentagon Says Insurgency Likely Will Be Strong Until 2007. The Copley News Service (5/30, Kreisher) reports, "Iraq in the last three months had the highest level of attacks of any similar previous period, while casualties among Iraqis soared, the Pentagon reported Tuesday." It contrasts that grim statistic with Asst. Secretary Rodman's emphasis on "political progress" in the form of a "permanent government." Copley adds, "With its comparatively thin population, Anbar had the highest rate of violent attacks per capita during the reporting period …The report said 63 Iraqi army battalions 'have the lead for security responsibility' in their assigned areas." However, Copley mentions that the report does not say how many Iraqi battalions can operate independently, a change of practice from its predecessor, which stated that none could.

The AP (5/31, Burns) writes, "The report to Congress offered a relatively dim picture of economic progress, with few gains in improving basic services like electricity, and it provided no promise of U.S. troop reductions anytime soon. On the other hand, it said the Iraqi Army was gaining strength and taking lead responsibility for security in more areas." It says, "The U.S. government has struggled for three years to understand the insurgency in Iraq, which began in the Sunni Triangle west and north of Baghdad." It states of likely insurgent strength, "The Sunni Arab heart of the Iraqi insurgency seems likely to hold its strength for the rest of this year, and some of its leaders are now collaborating with Al Qaeda terrorists, the Pentagon said Tuesday."

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (5/31, Scarborough, 90K) states more optimistically the Pentagon's view "that a key element of the Iraq insurgency will maintain its level of violence this year, but then begin to weaken in 2007." It notes the Pentagon Iraq report's contention that "U.S. commanders are methodically turning over more territory to the ISF and putting them in the lead in counterinsurgency operations. More than half of all operations in Baghdad, one of the country's most violence-prone provinces, are being led by Iraqis."

Pentagon Classifies Number Of Independent Iraqi Battalions. UPI (5/30) reports, "The Pentagon has newly classified the number of Iraqi army battalions that are fully independent in its latest public report on conditions in Iraq." The classification comes after the Pentagon said in its last previous report that "zero" Iraqi battalions were "capable of full independence." UPI writes, "The fact that there have been zero fully independent Iraqi battalions in Iraq after three years of occupation, nearly $300 billion and the training of a new army, has been cited by critics of the war as evidence that progress has not been made." However, Lt. Gen. Gene Renuart "said there has been a significant increase in fully independent units. [Assistant Secretary] Rodman said the number 'fluctuates for different kinds of reasons' but called it a 'good increase.'" The Financial Times (5/31, Sevastopoulo) does not report this new classification but quotes the Pentagon as asserting that "the number of Iraqi soldiers and police who had completed their training had risen to 263,400, an increase of 36,100 from three months ago. It said the Iraqi ministries of defence and interior were on track to complete initial training targets by the end of this year." The FT notes of the Pentagon public report that "it said Anbar had the highest number of daily attacks per capita over the past three months."

Media Reassess Iraq TV Assignments After CBS Deaths. The New York Times (5/31, Carter, 1.19M) reports, "The roadside blast in Baghdad on Monday that killed two CBS News crew members and seriously wounded a third has deepened concerns among television network executives about the risks their crews face trying to cover the Iraq war, some arguing that television reporters may be even more exposed than those in print journalism." Executives fear that "the risks are even greater for television personnel because of the equipment they must carry — including cameras that are sometimes mistaken for weapons — and how visible they must be to convey the story."

Dowd Points Out Risks Taken By Journalists. In the New York Times (5/31, 1.19M), Maureen Dowd argues that journalists in Iraq face risks that conservative pundits understate. She writes that, despite conservative scorn about alleged timidity by journalists, "Now two network personalities — Ms. Dozier and Bob Woodruff — have been severely injured by roadside bombs while embedded with the military, trying to do the sort of stories the administration wants." She also denounces the anonymity of military and Iraqi casualties, unlike the publicity that journalists receive when they are attacked: "The administration tries to play down any sense of individual loss; the president has not attended a single funeral, and the government banned pictures of [troops'] returning coffins. The Iraqi civilians who die don't even get their names in the small print."

Wounded CBS Correspondent Transported To US Military Hospital In Germany. Injured CBS reporter Kimberly Dozier was transported to Landstuhl military hospital in Germany, where she was reported to be in critical but stable condition with injuries to her head and legs. The story was reported in full segments on both CBS and NBC, while ABC ran a brief. The CBS Evening News (5/30, story 2, 3:05, MacVicar, 7.66M) reported, "Kimberly is in intensive care. She had surgery twice yesterday on injuries to her legs and on her head to remove shrapnel from her skull. She was able to wiggle her toes as she was admitted. Tonight, she remains sedated and faces more surgery."

NBC Nightly News (5/30, story 2, 2:40, Maceda, 9.87M) reported, "Dozier's camera crew, Britons Paul Douglas and Jim Brolan, were killed by the same roadside bomb while embedded with the US Army in Baghdad. In underscores yet again the danger journalists face here on a daily basis, even the most seasoned and cautious, like Dozier." According to "the Committee to Protect Journalists, 71 journalists have died covering the war in Iraq, surpassing the number killed in World War II, Korea, and Vietnam, 3/4 of them Iraqis, who often can't afford expensive, around-the-clock protection."

ABC World News Tonight (5/30, story 2, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The commander of the Landstuhl military hospital in Germany says Dozier is in critical but stable condition, with serious injuries to her head and legs."

"CASH" Military Trauma Hospital Profiled. The CBS Evening News (5/30, story 3, 2:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "To understand why Kimberly Dozier is alive tonight, we want to show you now how the team works that springs into action every time an American is seriously wounded in Iraq." CBS (Palmer) added, "Thanks to the trauma team at Baghdad's Ibn Sina military hospital, Kimberly Dozier is alive." Capt. David Steinbruner, trauma specialist, Ibn Sina Hospital: "She had a very powerful will to live." Palmer: "But Dr. David Steinbruner, who treated her, admits the outcome could have been very different." Dr. Steinbruner: "She was tough. She was near death when she first came in." Palmer: "It's at centers like this where life is often restored. Doctors here say once upon a time they were called MASH units. Now, they're called a 'CASH' -- short for 'combat support hospitals', saving lives with a mixture of sophisticated emergency room technology and old-fashioned heart."

Romney Expresses Optimism About Iraq. Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who has just returned from a trip to Iraq and Afghanistan, was asked on Fox News' Your World with Neil Cavuto (5/30) claims from President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair that the Iraqis are ready to stand up for themselves. Romney said, "It is very difficult to assess what the level of readiness is, but clearly they are more ready every day by virtue of the training that they are undergoing. And the assessment on the part of their new prime minister with the new unity government he's formed that he believes they will be ready within 18 months to take the primary responsibility for security, that is very encouraging. I think that is possible, if he says it is." Romney added, "I actually think that at this stage the prospects for a positive outcome are more real than they have been in sometime."

Brake Failure Caused Crash That Sparked Kabul Riots. The AP (5/31) reports a US military spokesman said Tuesday that this week's crash of a US military truck that sparked Monday's riots in Kabul occurred because the truck's brakes "'apparently overheated and failed' as it came down the long hill." He said that "[t]he truck hit several unoccupied parked cars in an effort to slow down, but the truck hit occupied vehicles at an intersection anyway." Kabul's police chief said that the "toll from Monday's rioting in Kabul rose to 12 dead and 138 injured."

The New York Times (5/31, Gall, 1.19M) reports that although "Kabul residents placed blame for Monday's rioting on young hoodlums and criminal gangs," "they also criticized the American military for its arrogance, saying military vehicles frequently crush civilian cars, and they doubted that the government or the military would conduct an honest investigation of the incident." The Times also reports many in Kabul, "including Western diplomats and aid workers, said the protests appeared spontaneous and were aggravated by frustration with joblessness and the slow pace of reconstruction." US Ambassador Ronald E. Neumann "promised compensation for the victims and a full investigation."

The Washington Post (5/31, A10, Constable, 744K) reports "Afghan army troops blanketed the capital Tuesday," but foreign peacekeepers "kept off the streets, out of concern their presence would ignite new violence." Many in Kabul "remained angry both at the rioters and U.S. troops, and worried about permanent damage to the country's faltering democracy, economy and relations with the outside world." A spokesman for the International Security Assistance Force "said it had been ready to help restore order Monday but that the Afghan authorities had asked the force not to do so." The Post reports, "Numerous witnesses said some rioters were older men who gave orders, carried AK-47 assault rifles and wore the dress of former anti-Soviet militia fighters whose political leaders oppose Karzai."

Reporter Who Witnessed Riots Says Mobs Were Incited By Agitators. In a web-exclusive commentary, Newsweek (5/30) reporter Joe Cochrane, who was caught amid Monday's riots, said the "roaming gangs of rioters" were clearly "incited by agitators." Cochrane writes, "While television images of the riots looked shocking, they should be kept in perspective. Less than 1,000 of Kabul's 4 million residents joined in the madness, many of them street thugs or unemployed youths with nothing better to do. While Afghans get understandably angry when local residents are killed during U.S. military operations or during car accidents involving troops, the majority still seems to want them protecting the capital and forcing the Taliban to hide in the mountains."

Growing Rich-Poor Gap Said To Be At Root Of Riots. Time (5/30, Morarjee) reports the "growing gap between Afghanistan's haves and have-nots helps explain why a U.S. military convoy accident triggered" Monday's riots. Time reports, "Even before the convoy accident, Western diplomats say many frustrated young men were already looking for a provocation." Aid workers in Kabul "blame the U.S. and other Western military for enflaming anti-Western sentiment, which invariably ends up being vented at the softest targets: the charities." The major agitators of the riots were "young men allied to" the Northern Alliance.

Violence Flares In Northern Afghanistan. The New York Times (5/31, Gall, 1.19M) reports as "calm returned" to Kabul, "violence was reported in northern Afghanistan as three women social workers and their driver, working for the aid agency, ActionAid, on a government program, were shot dead on a village road in the province of Jowzjan." In another northern province, Badakhshan, "two Afghans working for a development organization were killed…and two American citizens traveling in convoy with them were slightly injured" in a roadside explosion. The two attacks "raised concerns that security in the previously peaceful north is also deteriorating."

USA Today Says Afghanistan Beginning To Resemble Iraq. An editorial in the USA Today (5/31, 2.31M) says the riots reveal the "disturbing truth" that "Afghanistan is increasingly beginning to resemble" the war in Iraq. The paper says that while international help to Afghanistan is encouraging, "far more is needed — from putting greater pressure on Pakistan to close down Taliban refuges, to winning popular support along with military victories. That might require more troops. It certainly requires sustained attention and aid. It is dismaying to consider how much better the situation in Afghanistan might be, and whether bin Laden would still be at large, had the Bush administration not diverted resources to its misbegotten adventure in Iraq."

DOJ:

California Child Porn Investigators Honored. The Contra Costa Times (5/31, Doyle) reports, "Even monsters get scared and lonely. Sometimes, they just need someone to talk to. … Mike Prado will listen, sympathetically. And then, when he has asked his questions, the Fresno-based federal investigator seizes the confessions and sends admitted child molesters off to federal prison for a very long time." The Times continues, "Now, the achievements of this 30-year-old Immigration and Customs Enforcement special agent have secured national recognition. Prado and his partner, Fresno County sheriff's detective Kevin Wiens, joined other top investigators recently in being honored by the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. … In a Capitol Hill ceremony, the organization presented Prado and Wiens with a National Exploited Children's Award. The Justice Department will follow suit later this month, further putting a spotlight on an investigation that is still unfolding." The Times adds, "Starting with one Fresno computer that was crawling with sexual images, Prado and Wiens expanded an investigation that has yielded 30 arrests and 100 suspects. A Pennsylvania man has recently been sentenced to prison in the case, and former Clovis girls softball coach Mark McGarry is awaiting resolution of charges of possessing and distributing child pornography."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

McAfee Fires General Counsel Amid Widening Stock-Option Probe. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Hechinger) reports, "The board of McAfee Inc. fired its general counsel after an internal review of stock-options granting practices, marking another casualty amid a widening government probe that now involves at least 20 companies." The Journal continues, "The termination at McAfee brings to nearly a dozen the number of executives and directors, at five different companies, who have lost their jobs in recent weeks amid government and company investigations of the timing of option grants to senior corporate officials. … The Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission are both examining McAfee, a Santa Clara, Calif., maker of computer security software, for possible options irregularities. At least 20 companies are facing similar scrutiny from one or both of the two authorities."

The AP (5/31, Liedtke) reports, "The Santa Clara, Calif.-based maker of antivirus software linked Kent Roberts' ouster to a stock option incident that occurred six years ago. McAfee described the episode as improper without providing specifics. … McAfee is among a widening group of publicly held companies examining whether insiders manipulated the timing of stock option grants to increase the likelihood that management would reap huge windfalls. On Tuesday, Rambus Inc., a developer of high-speed computer chip interfaces, joined that group of companies, launching an internal investigation into how officials doled out stock options in 2003 and before. … Under the practice, the options are backdated to an ebb in a company's stock price instead of pegging the exercise price to the prevailing market value at the time of the award."

The California Recorder (5/31, Pasternak, Scheck) reports, "Nationwide, about two dozen companies so far have been approached by the government in connection with backdated options grants. The scandal is fueling anxiety among audit committee members and in-house lawyers, with companies launching internal investigations into their options programs or preparing responses to government inquiries. … Brewing in the background is a possible tussle between federal prosecutors in the Manhattan, Brooklyn and San Francisco U.S. Attorney's Offices, all of which have been involved in probing companies thus far."

USAToday Decries Practice Of Backdating Stock Options. An editorial in USA Today (5/31) says, "The Securities and Exchange Commission, Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service are investigating the practice of backdating stock-option grants to senior corporate executives. … If these inquiries confirm that backdating is widespread, it would serve as yet another troubling example of how shareholders are being fleeced. It would also show how a benefit designed to attract, reward and retain talented employees is being perverted. Given the creative ways corporate executives have enriched themselves in recent years, perhaps this practice should come as no surprise. Even so, its blatant nature is mind-boggling."

Firms Changing Rules On Company Stock In 401(k) Plans. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Opdyke) reports, "Facing a slew of worker lawsuits, companies increasingly are limiting how much of their stock can be held in employee 401(k) retirement plans." The Journal continues, "Company stock in 401(k)s is still widespread, despite the lessons of Enron Corp., whose 2001 collapse depleted the retirement savings of thousands of employees. Many companies use stock to match employee contributions to retirement plans, and workers often are barred from selling the stock for many years. Some workers also buy the stock to participate in their company's growth, or because they aren't sure where else to invest. … But dozens of lawsuits since Enron have highlighted companies' legal liability when their stock declines in value, a development that also has helped to drive up insurance costs." The Journal adds, "Last month, Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. notified employees that the drug maker will no longer contribute company stock to its 401(k) plan, starting July 1. Instead, company contributions will go into a money-market fund run by Fidelity Investments. Health insurer Cigna Corp. last fall began allowing workers to immediately roll out of company stock and into one of 22 other options in the 401(k) plan, including mutual funds. Previously, Cigna employees had to keep their shares until they either left the company or reached age 55. … Some companies are banishing their stock from retirement plans altogether. Too Inc., parent of nationwide specialty retailer Limited Too, required its employees to sell any company stock they held in their 401(k) plan by last fall."

DOJ's Use Of Deferred-Prosecution Deals Sparks Debate. USA Today (5/31, Iwata) reports, "The legal debate over the Justice Department's aggressive prosecution of businesses has been reignited after the recent indictment of securities class-action law firm Milberg Weiss, plus an ongoing court battle between prosecutors and former KPMG executives indicted on fraud charges." USA continues, "Milberg Weiss is the first business to be prosecuted by the federal government since Arthur Andersen, the former accounting firm and Enron auditor that died even though its obstruction-of-justice conviction was overturned last year by the Supreme Court." USA adds, "In the KPMG case, 16 former executives believe their constitutional rights to legal counsel and fair trial were violated when prosecutors forced KPMG to stop paying their legal fees as part of the firm's agreement with the government to escape prosecution, according to court filings. … As the Justice Department intensified its crackdown on corporate crime in the post-Enron era, a growing number of defense lawyers and business groups have accused it of prosecutorial overkill. … Prosecutors, encouraged by the so-called Holder and Thompson memorandums in 1999 and 2003, respectively, that set Justice Department criteria for going after 'business organizations,' are compelling more businesses to cooperate with investigations and sign 'deferred-prosecution agreements' and "no prosecution" deals — or risk being indicted. … Since the Justice Department's corporate fraud task force was formed four years ago, prosecutors have signed 'a couple dozen' deferred-prosecution agreements with business entities, says department spokesman Bryan Sierra. … That's twice as many as in the 10 years before the corporate fraud task force was created, says Andrew Weissmann, who prosecuted Arthur Andersen as a member of the Enron Task Force. … Weissmann, who also prosecuted drug gangs and Mafia defendants in New York, says the Justice Department is addicted to using deferred-prosecution deals 'like crack cocaine.' … 'As the department gets more experienced at deferred-prosecution agreements and realize they have more leverage,' Weissmann predicts, 'you're going to see more and more draconian agreements.'"

Former US Attorney Helps Corporations About Fraud. The San Diego Business Journal (5/29, Broderick) reports, "The post-Enron scrutiny on businesses might not be making them more honest, but many of them are taking great pains to police themselves, sniffing out trouble before it morphs into a major scandal. … Giving them a seasoned hand is former U.S. Attorney Chuck La Bella, now in private practice in Downtown San Diego and specializing in white-collar crime, and other high-stakes litigation involving the likes of the Securities and Exchange Commission." The Journal continues, "Most recently, La Bella has been representing Barry Weinbaum, a former chief executive officer of Alvarado Hospital Medical Center, in the lengthy kickback scandal that recently reached a settlement with current U.S. Attorney Carol Lam. … His firm also represented Peregrine Systems Inc. before the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department over charges involving accounting irregularities and securities fraud. In 2003, Peregrine, without admitting or denying the charges, agreed to a wide-ranging settlement. … 'Post-Enron, the country has become more sensitive to corporate actions and actions of the corporate executives,' said La Bella, 55, a partner in La Bella & McNamara, LLP in Downtown San Diego. 'We are now looking more closely at each and every action and transaction and mistake. Companies make mistakes all the time. … People make mistakes, and not every mistake should be elevated to the level of an SEC, U.S. attorney or district attorney investigation. There are mistakes that bear scrutiny by them, but the pendulum is starting to swing back a little bit.'"

Corporate Spycatchers Frustrated By Government Treatment Of Trade Secrets. The National Law Journal (5/31, Maclean) reports, "In 1997, the FBI videotaped the chairman of a Taiwanese company, Four Pillars Enterprise Co., in an Ohio hotel accepting secret documents about Avery Dennison Corp.'s formulas for its adhesive products. Agents watched as he cut the company's confidential markings off the papers and then discussed what an Avery scientist should steal next, according to court records." The Journal continues, "Four years later, FBI agents at San Francisco International Airport surrounded two Chinese engineers bound for China carrying satchels allegedly packed with trade secrets from four Silicon Valley firms detailing the manufacture of microprocessors. … And in 2003, the U.S. Department of Justice indicted two managers for the Boeing Co.'s rocket launch vehicle system used to carry commercial and military satellites into space. The government alleges that one Boeing manager recruited a Lockheed Martin Corp. engineer to bring secret Lockheed documents to Boeing in exchange for a better job at higher pay." The Journal adds, "The criminal trial is set for June, but disclosure cost Boeing a $1 billion Air Force contract. U.S. v. Branch, No. CR03-715RSWL (C.D. Calif.). … 'Economic espionage is huge and it is not going away,' said Steven Fink, observing the trend as president of the crisis management firm Lexicon Communications Corp. in Pasadena, Calif. … Yet victimized companies remain reticent to come forward, fearing prosecution would expose their trade secrets and damage their corporate image. … The companies 'have been appalled at the cavalier way [the FBI and federal prosecutors] handled their trade secrets,' Fink said. 'They feel they are more at risk for getting trade secrets exposed by coming forward than just sweeping it under the rug.'"

USA Today Says Accusations Against Fannie Mae Executives Are Damning. An editorial in USA Today (5/31, 2.31M) says a report from government officials says Fannie Mae "engaged in 'extensive financial fraud' by doctoring earnings so…executives could earn 'unjustified levels of compensation.'" USA adds, "These are extraordinarily damning assertions. They show a company whose top executives were contemptuous of criticism and imbued with a sense of entitlement to enrich." USA adds, "The report on Fannie Mae was accompanied by a $400 million settlement with the government. Federal agencies are still evaluating whether to bring civil or criminal charges against individuals. These are not pleasant things to contemplate. But they are the facts."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Defends Jefferson Office Search As House Seeks Answers. The Washington Post (5/31, A4, Lengel, Babington) reports, "The Justice Department yesterday vigorously defended the recent weekend raid of Rep. William J. Jefferson's Capitol Hill office as part of a bribery investigation, asserting that the Democratic lawmaker attempted to hide documents from FBI agents while they were searching his New Orleans home last August." The Post continues, "The government questioned in a 34-page motion filed in U.S. District Court here whether it could have obtained all the materials it had sought in a subpoena if it had not launched the surprise raid on Jefferson's congressional office May 20. According to the government filing, an FBI agent caught Jefferson slipping documents into a blue bag in the living room of his New Orleans home during a search. … 'It is my belief that when Congressman Jefferson placed documents into the blue bag, he was attempting to conceal documents that were relevant to the investigation,' FBI agent Stacey E. Kent of New Orleans stated in an affidavit that was part of the government's court submission. The document was filed in response to Jefferson's lawsuit demanding that the government return to him documents seized during the raid on his Capitol Hill office 11 days ago. … Robert P. Trout, Jefferson's attorney, said he would refrain from commenting pending further review of the government's documents. Meanwhile, the recent FBI raid spurred new tensions between Congress and the administration, as a House committee chairman vowed to interrogate top Justice Department officials."

CNN's The Situation Room (5/30, Blitzer) reported, "Justice Department officials rejected Democrat William Jefferson's demand to have all the seized documents returned." CNN (Bash) added that DOJ said "they would allow Jefferson to have copies of everything they took to make sure that nothing that they took was privileged." The Los Angeles Times (5/31, Schmitt, 958K) notes DOJ "proposed a 'procedural accommodation' that would give Jefferson a new chance to challenge whether prosecutors should have the documents. Although it was unclear whether the proposal would be accepted, it was the first significant public concession by the department since the 18-hour search…ignited a political firestorm."

MSNBC (5/31) reports, "Justice Department lawyers said (Tuesday) it will make another concession to Congressman William Jefferson, D-LA, in the fight over the search of Jefferson's Capitol Hill office. … In the latest court filing involving the search, prosecutors say they'll provide Jefferson with copies of everything taken from his office in the weekend raid. Before the FBI agents investigating the corruption case are allowed to see the documents, Jefferson's lawyers will have a chance to urge a judge to exclude any items they consider protected by the Constitution's Speech and Debate clause privilege." MSNBC continues, "'As for the search itself, government lawyers today argued it did not violate the Constitution. They say that Rep. Jefferson's position would extend the Speech and Debate clause's immunity so far that it would make it impossible to search any place that might contain even one privileged document. That should be rejected, they say, because the courts have held that 'the laws of this country allow no place or employment as a sanctuary for crime.'"

Sensenbrenner Vows To Call Gonzales, Mueller As House Panel Criticizes FBI Raid. The House Judiciary Committee yesterday held a hearing about the FBI search of Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office. Chairman James Sensenbrenner – who called the hearing, titled "Reckless Justice: Did the Saturday Night Raid of Congress Trample the Constitution?" – vowed to hold two more sessions and said he will call Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller to testify. ABC World News Tonight (5/30, story 6, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Some in Congress charge the Justice Department had no right -- that congressmen should be immune. Justice Department officials said they had every right, if a congressman might be breaking the law." ABC (Tapper) added, "Some say this battle could go to the Supreme Court, which has already ruled that the separation of power protects only legislative activities, such as a congressman researching or writing a bill." Yale Law Prof. Akhil Amar: "Last time I checked, taking bribes isn't part of ordinary legislative work."

CNN's The Situation Room (5/30, Bash) reported, "We're told that House Speaker Dennis Hastert is preparing to send a letter to the Attorney General this afternoon that says that Justice officials should come up to the Hill next week to meet with the general counsel of the House, to start talks about what kind of procedure they can put in place in case the FBI wants to search a lawmaker's office in the future." At the hearing yesterday, Sensenbrenner said he will call

Gonzales and Mueller "to explain why they okayed a raid on a lawmaker's office for the first time in history." The Hill (5/31, O'Connor) notes that "spokesmen for the Judiciary Committee and the Justice Department were unable to conclude by press time whether or not Sensenbrenner had issued formal requests to Gonzales or Mueller to appear."

The New York Times (5/31, Hulse) reports, "The House intends to summon Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Robert S. Mueller III, before the Judiciary Committee to justify its search of a Congressional office, the panel chairman said Tuesday. … The chairman, Representative F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Republican of Wisconsin, called the search 'profoundly disturbing.' … Mr. Sensenbrenner also said he planned a legislative response to the search on May 20 of the office of Representative William J. Jefferson, Democrat of Louisiana. The bill would be patterned on a law limiting searches of news media offices. … 'I think this law will help the Justice Department get it right next time because they didn't get it right this time,' Mr. Sensenbrenner said as his committee heard from legal experts and a former lawmaker." The Times adds, "All four witnesses, appearing Tuesday at an unusual hearing held in a Congressional recess, described the search as a damaging breach of the constitutional separation of powers. They said it warranted an aggressive reaction from Congress, including subpoenaing material from Mr. Gonzales if necessary. … 'This latest use of a search warrant by the executive branch to rummage through the files of a member's office is simply an additional instrument of the Bush administration to cow Congress,' Bruce Fein, a constitutional lawyer, said at the hearing."

USA Today (5/31, 4A, Johnson, 2.31M) adds that DOJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said, "We have a great deal of respect for Congress as a co-equal branch of government. We will continue to meet with members of Congress…about the search and what can be done to alleviate their concerns." At the hearing, former Reagan Associate Deputy Attorney General Bruce Fein "suggested that President Bush should have allowed Gonzales and Mueller to resign or fired them after the pair signaled last week that they would have stepped down if forced to return material seized in…raid."

The Washington Times (5/31, Fagan) reports, "Rep. John Conyers Jr. of Michigan, the panel's top Democrat, called the raid 'sloppy at best but reckless at worse' and joined other Democrats and the American Civil Liberties Union, in saying it's just one of many examples of the Bush administration overreaching. … Hearing witnesses, including law professors and a former House member, said the Justice Department overstepped its bounds. They specifically criticized the department for failing to give House leaders adequate notice or consultation, barring House personnel from being present and searching through congressional files, some of which inevitably contained legislative-related material that, witnesses argued, are protected from use in a prosecution under the constitution's 'speech or debate' clause. … 'The raid on this office represents a profound and almost gratuitous insult to a coequal branch of government,' said George Washington University Law School Professor Jonathan Turley." The Times notes, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse was open to a hearing, but added, 'We also hope that Congress recognizes it would be inappropriate for a federal official to discuss the specific details of an ongoing criminal investigation in a public hearing.'"

The AP (5/31, Kellman) reports, "Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., a loyal White House ally, made his position clear with the title of Tuesday's hearing: 'Reckless Justice: Did the Saturday Night Raid of Congress Trample the Constitution?' … 'The issues involved in this unprecedented action by the executive branch transcend any particular member,' Sensenbrenner said Tuesday." The AP adds, "Democrats said a member of the Bush administration, and not just legal experts, should have been called before the panel to answer for the raid. … 'We've never been told why the search had to be done in the middle of the night,' noted ranking Democrat John Conyers of Michigan. 'We've never learned why the member in question was not permitted to have his attorneys present while his offices were searched for some 18 hours.'" The AP notes, "One witness at the hearing, former Rep. Bob Walker, R-Pa., said Congress should play hardball in seeking answers to its questions by subpoenaing administration documents authorizing the raid. … 'The American people should be deeply concerned that a decision to conduct a raid on Congress was made consciously and evidently at high levels inside the Justice Department and the FBI,' Walker told the panel. … 'If the Rayburn raid was a precedent for coming attractions and intimidating tactics, the way Congress responds initially must be improved.'"

The Minneapolis Star Tribune/AP (5/31, Kellman) reports, "Sensenbrenner said Tuesday he will summon Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller before his House panel to testify about their decision to search a lawmaker's office. … 'I want to have Attorney General Gonzales and FBI Director Mueller up here to tell us how they reached the conclusion they did,'' said Sensenbrenner, a Wisconsin Republican and one of President Bush's most loyal House allies." The AP adds, 'Gonzales has said that the search of Rep. William Jefferson's offices was legal and necessary because the Louisiana Democrat had not cooperated with investigators' efforts to gain access to evidence in a bribery probe. An affidavit on which the search warrant was based said investigators had found $90,000 stashed in the freezer of Jefferson's house. … 'We would certainly consider a request for a hearing if one were to be made,'' said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse, 'We also hope that Congress recognizes it would inappropriate for a federal official to discuss the specific details of an ongoing criminal investigation in a public hearing.'"

Milbank Notes Sensenbrenner's Prior Reluctance To Challenge Administration. In his Washington Post (5/31, A2, 744K) "Washington Sketch" column, Dana Milbank writes, "When asked to hold hearings on the rendition and torture of terrorism suspects," Sensenbrenner "respectfully declined. Invited repeatedly to probe the Bush administration's leaking of a CIA operative's identity, the chairman sent his regrets. Urged to have hearings dedicated to the administration's warrantless eavesdropping, Sensenbrenner demurred once more. But when FBI agents searched a congressional office…Sensenbrenner went up to the attic and found his gavel."

Mueller Shows Up For Jury Duty In DC. Newsweek (5/31, Isikoff) reports, "Don't ever accuse Robert Mueller of shirking his civic duty. Smack in the middle of last week's constitutional crisis over the FBI raid of Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office, the conscientous FBI director didn't show up at the office one morning. The reason: he was down at a Washington, D.C., courtroom patiently waiting with other citizens who had been called for jury duty." Newsweek continues, "Much to the surprise of top bureau officials, Mueller didn't immediately get struck for pro-government bias either. Even though he showed up late for his jury duty call on May 25 (he had a valid excuse: he needed to give President Bush his regular morning terrorism briefing), Mueller was processed into the jury pool and made it through the first round of dismissals, according to FBI spokesman John Miller. He was then assigned to a murder case. He even took his seat in the jury box to be questioned in the voir doir process by lawyers in the case. Mueller said he could be 'fair and impartial as to the evidence,' Miller said. 'There were other people eliminated before him.' … But in the end, Mueller—who was accompanied the whole time by his usual security detail—did have a bias problem: in his prior life, after serving as chief of the Justice Department's criminal division during the administration of President George H.W. Bush, Mueller had forsworn a career with a fancy white-collar law firm, in order to join the U.S. attorney's office in Washington, D.C., and prosecute homicide cases. It turned out Mueller had tried cases in front of the judge handling last week's murder case. He also had worked with the prosecutor and police detective involved with the case and knew the defense lawyer, having tried cases against him. 'So, finally at some point, they cut him,' said Miller."

US Pressures Internet Firms Over Data Retention. CNN.com (5/31) reports, "During a meeting last week with some of the nation's leading Internet service companies, the attorney general and the FBI director asked a variety of customer information and other data be kept for two years, much longer than the companies do now, the Justice Department confirmed Tuesday." CNN continues, "Companies have varying policies regarding what information is kept and for how long. … One thing the Justice Department wants is some type of subscriber information, such as the Internet address assigned to a person when logging on to a service provider, two sources familiar with the meeting told CNN." CNN adds, "The online industry is expected to strongly oppose any request to retain these types of records because of privacy concerns for their customers. … 'It is a slippery slope,' one of the sources said of the government's interest in the information. 'It becomes a fishing expedition.' … The Internet companies have said there are other ways to get the information without them having to hand it over and believe requests like this are burden to the industry, the sources said." CNN notes, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said government and private industry officials are continuing to discuss the privacy issues involved and some of the concerns raised by the companies at the meeting Friday at the Justice Department. … The meeting, first reported by CNET News.com, included representatives from Verizon, Comcast, AOL (which is owned by Time Warner, as is CNN.com), Microsoft, Google and the U.S. Internet Service Provider Association, the sources told

CNN. Companies involved refused to comment on the meeting."

Jury Finds Muhammad Guilty Of Six Sniper Murders. ABC World News Tonight (5/30, story 7, :20, Gibson) reported, "In the state of Maryland, today, another guilty verdict for the murderous sniper John Allen Muhammad. A jury found Muhammad guilty of six killings during the shooting spree that terrorized the Washington area in 2002. His protégé and colleague, Lee Malvo testified against Muhammad. He now faces a life sentence in Maryland. He has already received a death sentence from a jury in Virginia."

The CBS Evening News (5/30, story 6, 0:25, Schieffer) reported, "Muhammad could get life without parole, but he's already been sentenced to death for a sniper murder in Virginia."

The Washington Post (5/31, A1, Rich, Londoño) reports, "A jury deliberated less than five hours yesterday before finding John Allen Muhammad guilty in each of the six sniper slayings in Montgomery County, marking the second time he has been held responsible in the 2002 rampage that terrorized the Washington area." The Post continues, "The verdict, returned in the county where the snipers did most of their killing,ended a four-week trial that brimmed with new claims about the mechanics of the slayings and the motives behind them. The source of those claims was Muhammad's younger accomplice, Lee Boyd Malvo, who agreed to plead guilty and testify for the first time against the man he once regarded as a father. … As the jury was led into the courtroom yesterday, Muhammad stood at the defense table with his arms folded, appearing to smile confidently. The slight smile vanished, and he blinked repeatedly as the forewoman pronounced him guilty of murder six times. … State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler said later that prosecutors will ask that Muhammad, who was convicted in Virginia in 2003 and is on that state's death row, be sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole. Sentencing is scheduled for tomorrow."

The Washington Times (5/31, Ward) reports, "In 2003, a Virginia Beach jury sentenced Muhammad to death for capital murder in the shooting of Dean Harold Meyers and other charges. He could be executed as soon as three years from now, the Virginia Attorney General's Office said yesterday. … Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler said Muhammad will be shipped back to Virginia 'within a week' of his sentencing hearing. … Authorities said they brought Muhammad to Maryland to give victims' families their day in court, and for insurance in case Muhammad's Virginia conviction is overturned on appeal."

The AP (5/31, Manning) reports, "The announcement Tuesday afternoon followed four weeks of prosecutors, experts and witnesses presenting evidence against Muhammad and Muhammad defending himself with the argument that he had been framed. … Acting as his own attorney, Muhammad told the jury in his closing argument Friday that he was only in the Washington area during those three terrifying weeks to search for his ex-wife and children. He said government agencies planted evidence and collaborated to pin the crime on him and teenager Lee Boyd Malvo. … Maryland prosecutors said Malvo had agreed to a plea deal, and last week, the young man gave a chilling account of Muhammad's planning for the October 2002 shooting spree."

Former Ney Aide Testifies He Falsified Travel Disclosure For Scotland Trip. The New York Times (5/31, Shenon, 1.19M) reports Neil Volz, a former aide to Rep. Bob Ney who later became a lobbyist, "testified on Tuesday that he had prepared a travel disclosure statement for" Rep. Ney "that intentionally understated the cost of the lawmaker's lavish 2002 golfing trip to Scotland with the now-disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff." Volz "said in testimony before a federal jury in Washington that he had talked with the lawmaker, Representative Bob Ney of Ohio, before providing Mr. Ney's office with a copy of the statement, which he said falsely listed the cost of Mr. Ney's trip that summer as $3,200. Before joining Mr. Abramoff's lobbying firm, Mr. Volz had been Mr. Ney's chief of staff." Volz appeared as a "government witness at the trial of David H. Safavian, a former White House aide accused of lying about his ties to Mr. Abramoff." Volz said "he knew the $3,200 figure was too low, especially given the use of a chartered Gulfstream jet and $500-a-night hotel rooms. But he said he provided the number to Mr. Ney because it was modest enough not to attract the attention of reporters and others who might see the disclosure form."

The Washington Post (5/31, A7, Schmidt, 744K) adds that Volz testified how Abramoff "identified his 'champions' in government and then showered them with favors to get inside information and help for his clients." Volz said "that among those he and his colleagues considered allies were Ney and former General Services Administration official David H. Safavian, the first person brought to trial in connection with the Abramoff scandal. Central to Team Abramoff's lobbying operation, Volz said, was developing contacts in government 'who operate at a higher level' and who 'for whatever reason want to help you out.'" The Post adds that Volz "testified that Safavian and Ney guided the lobbyists as they looked for ways to gain access to government-owned land in Maryland, which Abramoff wanted for a religious school, in the weeks before the lobbyists took the two officials on a luxury golf trip to Scotland."

US To Seek Death Penalty In Virginia Murders. The Washington Post (5/31, Jackman) reports, "Federal prosecutors in Alexandria said yesterday that they will seek the death penalty for Thomas M. Hager for his alleged role in the stabbing death of a Fairfax County woman, saying that since 1992, Hager has killed five other people and ordered the slaying of a seventh person." The Post continues, "Two men have pleaded guilty to the murder of Barbara E. White, a 19-year-old single mother who lived in the Mount Vernon area. Those men admitted that on Nov. 29, 1993, they stabbed White repeatedly in her bathtub while White's 13-month-old daughter was elsewhere in the apartment with a fourth suspect. White's body and her toddler weren't found for 18 hours. White had been stabbed 82 times. … The two men, Lonnie T. Barnett Jr. and Arlington Johnson Jr., received life sentences. They said they were working for Hager, a crack cocaine dealer, who also stabbed White repeatedly, according to prosecutors. Hager was indicted in January on a charge of murder while engaged in drug trafficking." The Post adds, "Hager, now 33, is serving a minimum 87-year sentence for killing a man in the District in March 1995. In filing notice of their intent to seek the death penalty for Hager, prosecutors outlined a career of crime dating to a conviction for dealing cocaine as a 16-year-old. … Assistant U.S. Attorneys James L. Trump and Steven D. Mellin wrote that Hager was a regular crack dealer in the District who robbed people, including rival drug dealers, of drugs, money and other valuables."

Prosecution Witness Cross-Examined At Chicago Patronage Trial. The Chicago Tribune (5/31, Mihalopoulos, Bush, 643K) reports, "City hiring officials made sure Chicago Skyway tollbooths were staffed so Mayor Richard Daley would not get stuck in traffic as he traveled to and from his summer home in Michigan, according to a former Streets and Sanitation personnel director. Jack Drumgould testified Tuesday in the City Hall corruption trial that he received the advice in 1998 from his predecessor soon after taking over as director of personnel in Streets and Sanitation. … That anecdote came as defense attorneys for four former Daley administration officials charged with rigging the city's hiring and promotions process tried to attack Drumgould's credibility." Drumgould testified last week that he made political hires at the direction of Daley patronage officials. During his cross-examination yesterday, defense attorney Thomas Anthony Durkin "returned again and again to a theme from his opening statement in the trial — that politics has long played a role in city hiring and is only now being treated as a crime."

The Chicago Sun-Times (5/31, Warmbir, Korecki) also opens its story with Drumgould's revelation "that he was told by his supervisor to make sure there were always enough toll collectors on the Chicago Skyway to avoid any backups that could ensnare the mayor." The Sun-Times adds, "Defense attorneys for Sorich and his former colleagues drilled Drumgould throughout the day. They pointed out possible inconsistencies in his testimony on the stand and what he said before. They suggested that city workers were promoted not because of politics, but because they were qualified. And one defense attorney pointed out that Drumgould passed his daughter's application along when she applied for and received a job at the Chicago Park District."

Jury Seated In First Tennessee Waltz Trial. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (5/31, Buser) reports, "Testimony is scheduled to begin this morning in the bribery trial of former state senator Roscoe Dixon, the first local trial in the FBI's undercover sting operation dubbed Tennessee Waltz. … On Tuesday, a jury of seven women, five men and two female alternates was seated after day-long jury selection." The jurors "were identified in court by their jury number or by seat number in the jury box. U.S. Dist. Court Judge Jon McCalla said the secret procedure would be used since more than half of the potential jurors chose on a questionnaire to be addressed in court by number rather than by name." The AP (5/31, Baird) adds that "Dixon said he felt 'at peace' as his trial on federal bribery charges got under way Tuesday. … Federal prosecutors have estimated the trial will last two weeks. But Dixon's lawyer, Coleman W. Garrett, said that estimate may be conservative." The New York Times (5/31, Emery, 1.19M) notes Dixon "was indicted with four sitting state lawmakers in May 2005. He is…accused of taking $9,500 from a bogus company created by the F.B.I. John N. Ford, a Memphis Democrat and uncle of Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., resigned his State Senate seat and will go on trial in the fall."

Closing Arguments Made At Gambino Capo Trial. The AP (5/31) reports, "A prosecutor told a jury in closing arguments Tuesday that an ailing Gambino captain all but convicted himself of racketeering by bragging about the family and its crimes as he cozied up to an undercover FBI agent. Gregory DePalma, breathing through a tube connected to an oxygen tank, sat with his eyes closed as Assistant U.S. Attorney Christopher Conniff berated him as a 'violent and cunning criminal.'" The AP adds, "Defense lawyer, Martin Geduldig, attacked the government's evidence, saying prosecutors tried to trick the jury when it 'brought out all the old ghosts,' including pictures of the late mob boss John Gotti and mob figures from the 1980s. He said the cooperating witnesses in the trial were essentially bought by the government with money or promises of leniency for mob murders." The New York Daily News (5/31, Zambito, 729K) adds Conniff said that "DePalma's foul-mouthed rants, captured by an FBI bug secreted in his own cell phone, are all jurors need to convict the elderly capo of being a scheming shakedown artist." However, "Geduldig said DePalma's only crime was being a 'blowhard' who exaggerated his Mafia muscle."

Casinos Enticed By Revenue Prospects Of Online Gaming. The Las Vegas Sun (5/31, Benston) reports, "What a difference $15 billion makes. … After watching the fortunes of online casinos soar fivefold in as many years - an extraordinary winning streak with no apparent end in sight - Las Vegas casino giants want Congress to study letting them in on the action." The Sun continues, "Casino executives are licking their chops for good reason. … A gambling industry survey indicates that U.S. gamblers who bet online - which is illegal in this country - are young, savvy, college-educated men with money to burn. … But even as the industry wants to create dot-com casinos, conservative members of Congress were pushing last week to strengthen the ban on Internet betting - and were buoyed by a public opinion poll that showed growing concern about gambling." The Sun adds, "The Pew Research Center released poll results last week showing that 70 percent of Americans think legalized gambling encourages people to gamble more than they can afford, up from 62 percent in 1989. … Online gaming catapulted onto the scene this decade, skyrocketing from a $3 billion industry in 2001 to a $15 billion jackpot last year. … As much as 60 percent of the revenue is estimated to have come from U.S. citizens, many of whom reported in the survey commissioned by the American Gaming Association that they didn't realize they were breaking the law. … Online gambling revenue is projected to balloon to $24 billion by the end of the decade. … The Justice Department's inflexible position that Internet gambling is illegal has left American casino giants standing on the sidelines of one of the most lucrative business opportunities in the past decade."

The CBS Evening News (5/30, story 8, 1:55, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The FBI does not know where he is, but it does know tonight where he is not. And that would be a horse farm in Michigan. It cost taxpayers about a quarter of a million dollars to find that out. … The FBI estimates it will cost taxpayers $160,000 to replace the barn they tore down, and another $100,000 to staff the search." ABC World News Tonight (5/30, story 8, Gibson, 8.78M) noted, "This search ended the way so many previous ones have, with no trace of Hoffa." NBC Nightly News (5/30, story 8, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) added, "And so, as someone said today, while there's no proof that Hoffa bought the farm, the government now has to buy a barn for the folks who own the farm."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (5/31, Krisher) reports, "The two-week search involved dozens of FBI agents, along with anthropologists, archaeologists, cadaver-sniffing dogs and a demolition crew that took apart a barn." Detroit FBI Supervisory Special Agent Louis Fischetti "said the tip that led agents to the farm was the best federal authorities had received," and "the agency planned to continue the investigation." Assistant Special Agent in Charge Judy Chilen noted, "There are still prosecutable defendants who are living, and they know who they are." Chilen "said that she believes Hoffa had been buried on the farm and that she had no evidence his body had been moved. Fischetti added: 'We really don't have any indication that it was or wasn't moved.'"

The Detroit News (5/31, Wisely) notes, "Investigators said the tip that led them to the farm once owned by Hoffa associate Rolland McMaster was scrutinized and carried credibility because it included details they hadn't seen before. … But when asked what the search produced, Chilen answered with a single word: 'Nothing.'"

In a story distributed by Knight Ridder, The Detroit Free Press (5/31, Ashenfelter, Witsil, Swickard) adds that "the FBI came up empty-handed," but "people familiar with the case said federal prosecutors likely would propose a sentence reduction" for tipster Donovan Wells. At yesterday's press conference, Chilen and Fischetti "said Hoffa's body still might be on the farm. FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney said the search focused on 'the most likely areas' and 'if further information comes forward, we'd go back and get another warrant.' Clenney said news of the search prompted additional tips phoned into the FBI." The Free Press notes, "Although critics have said that the FBI wasted the public's time and money…Milford Township Police Chief Wayne Walli said authorities had no choice but to dig," and "Hoffa's daughter, Barbara Crancer…said the family is grateful that the FBI searched."

The Chicago Tribune (5/31, Jones, 643K) reports that "with no hints that the search was going anywhere, the effort started to draw fire this week from those, including a Detroit-area congressman, who questioned the cost." Fischetti "said the search is expected to cost less than $250,000. In response to criticism, Chilen said the FBI does 'not put a price tag on murder and kidnapping. ... We go where the evidence leads us,' she said. … 'We hope this sends a message to those involved…that the FBI does not give up,' Chilen said, 'no matter how much time has passed.'" The New York Times (5/31, Maynard, 1.19M) also notes Rep. Joe Knollenberg's criticism of the search and adds that FBI Detroit SAC Daniel D. Roberts responded in a statement Friday, "The expenditure of funds has always been necessary in each and every case the F.B.I. works, and this one is no exception. We will not abandon our responsibility to investigate a pending organized crime case because it might be termed "too old."" CNN.com (5/30), NPR's All Things Considered (5/30, Klinefelter) and BBC News (5/30) also reported on the end of the search.

Elderly Women Charged With Insurance Fraud In Deaths Of Two Men. The Los Angeles Times (5/31, Pringle, So) reports, "In early April, the two women dropped by a Sunday lunch for the homeless at Hollywood Presbyterian Church. … They fit the picture of do-gooders, a pair of kind souls happy to spend the afternoon helping the less fortunate. … The women, Olga Rutterschmidt and Helen Golay, are the septuagenarian odd couple charged in an alleged life insurance scam involving the hit-and-run deaths of two homeless men." The Times continues, "Rutterschmidt is a feisty music lover from Hungary. She has an expired electrolysis license and little visible means of support, but hinted to her Hollywood neighbors that she knew of ways to make easy money. … Golay is an outwardly prosperous Santa Monica landlord. Her penchants are for pantsuits and the big bouffants of her native Texas, as well as for siccing lawyers on those who crossed her, including her own daughter. … And while their backgrounds and lifestyles could scarcely be more different, they have shared a tendency over the years for alienating, suing and ultimately baffling the people around them, according to court records and interviews." The Times adds, "The women filed nearly 40 lawsuits between them over the last two decades, usually demanding money for alleged wrongs. … Golay sought damages from a woman she claimed stole leather skirts from her. She also sued a health club, saying she was hurt on an exercise machine. … A federal grand jury Tuesday indicted Golay, 75, and Rutterschmidt, 72, on nine counts of fraud in connection with more than $2 million in life insurance policies that they took out for Paul Vados and Kenneth McDavid, who were struck and killed by cars in 1999 and 2005. … Authorities say the women, who were arrested May 18, are also under investigation in the deaths."

VA Official Resigns For Failing To Notify Department Of Data Theft. ABC World News Tonight (5/30, story 10, 2:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Veterans Affairs official who failed to notify superiors about the theft of millions of veterans' personal information resigned today. Michael McLendon supervised the employee who lost the data." The Washington Post (5/31, A17, Lee, 744K) adds, "Dennis M. Duffy, who has been acting assistant secretary for policy and planning, was placed on administrative leave yesterday." He "learned of the theft May 5," but "Deputy Secretary Gordon H. Mansfield was not told of the data loss until May 10, and" Veterans Affairs Secretary Nicholson was not informed until May 16. Paul Hutter, assistant general counsel for management and operations, will "temporarily lead the Office of Policy and Planning until Patrick W. Dunne, nominated last week to be assistant secretary for policy and planning, is considered by the Senate." The New York Times (5/31, 1.19M) and USA Today (5/31, 4A, 2.31M) also report on the resignation.

Identity Thieves Trolling State, Local Government Web Sites. ABC World News Tonight (5/30, story 10, 2:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Last year, 9 million Americans had their identities stolen at a cost of more than $56 billion." ABC (Reynolds) added, "Personal identity thieves are graduating, from the dumpster to the desktop. And as sunshine laws meet cyberspace, government has become an involuntary accomplice." In Maricopa County, Arizona, "which has the highest percentage of ID theft in the country, Social Security numbers can be found online in court documents and real estate deals. And the county recorder says with 60 million to 70 million documents online, it would be impossible to remove all the information." In Ohio, "hundreds of people were victimized to the tune of $500,000 by thieves who used a Hamilton County Website." Greg Hartmann, clerk of courts: "They were mining our site, perusing the public documents and finding traffic tickets and other records that had Social Security numbers attached to somebody's name and address."

Capitol Mall's Safe Image Shattered By Night Crimes. The Washington Post (5/31, A1, Dvorak, Ruane) reports, "The green expanse of the Mall evokes many emotions, but wariness has never been one of them. Over the years, the lack of crime has created an aura of safety that allows joggers and tourists, children and couples to drop their guard and stroll in the day and even at night. … That changed in recent days, when a band of robbers used the elm tree shadows to surprise and attack six tourists walking along Washington's grassy sanctuary under the spell of the stars. It was as if an unspoken agreement had been broken between the underworld and the nation's icons. … 'There's no question that the Mall has been off-limits to thugs, and it's no surprise that they found it,' said Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.). 'But it should only be for a split second.'" The Post continues, "Norton, a race walker who strides across the Mall when the sun goes down, was angry that the U.S. Park Police did not double up patrols on the Mall after what happened Thursday. Twice that night, bandits brandishing a semiautomatic handgun robbed a man and a woman, assaulted the woman and fled. A similar attack happened early Sunday. … The Thursday night assaults happened only 15 minutes apart." The Post adds, "After the Thursday night incidents, police added a scooter and a patrol car to the stretch of Mall between Ninth and 12th streets, near where the attacks happened, Norton said. … Park Police Chief Dwight E. Pettiford acknowledged that the response should have been stronger. … Since the sexual assault Sunday, a low-key police force, ordinarily dispatched to guard the steps of the Lincoln Memorial and patrol the Baltimore-Washington Parkway, has been reassembled along the Mall."

7th Circuit Upholds White Supremacist's Murder Solicitation Conviction. The AP (5/31, Robinson) reports, "A federal appeals court in Chicago on Tuesday upheld white supremacist Matthew Hale's conviction and 40-year sentence for soliciting the murder of a federal judge, brushing aside his claim that he had repeatedly said he wanted nothing to do with the crime. … 'As the government has maintained, Hale tried to "create plausible deniability in the event his conversation was being monitored,"' a three-judge panel of the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said." The AP continues, "The judges refused to overturn Hale's April 2004 conviction on charges that he solicited an FBI informant to murder U.S. District Judge Joan Humphrey Lefkow. They also turned down his request for a reduced sentence. Lefkow's husband and mother were killed in her home the following year by a man who had no relation to the Hale case." The AP adds, "According to evidence at his trial, Hale, 35, had become enraged at Lefkow after she ordered his white supremacist group to stop using the name World Church of the Creator. Another group had sued saying it had a copyright on the name. … The appellate panel cited a number of Hale conversations and behavior patterns to bolster the government's theory that he wanted to have Lefkow killed because of the case. Among them, it described as 'flimsy' Hale's claim that pressure from FBI agents who had been investigating him for more than a year made him violate the law."

Oklahoma Man Indicted For Threatening Federal Judge. KOKO-TV Oklahoma City (5/27) reported on its Web site, "A man indicted for threatening to assault and kill a federal judge appeared before a federal magistrate Friday, authorities said." Rhett Ellis Arterburn "is accused of threatening U.S. District Judge Ralph G. Thompson, U.S. Attorney John Richter said. Arterburn allegedly threatened to assault and murder Thompson in retaliation for the judge sentencing him to federal prison. … He appeared Friday before U.S. Magistrate Bana Roberts on a one-count indictment returned by a federal grand jury in Oklahoma City." The AP (5/27) also reported on Aterburn's indictment.

CIVIL LAW:

Supreme Court Limits Protections For Whistleblowers. Knight Ridder (5/31, Henderson) reports, "The Supreme Court made life a bit tougher for government whistleblowers Tuesday, saying the First Amendment doesn't protect public employees who disclose waste and fraud as part of their jobs." By a 5-4 margin, the justices "said that the government's interest in effectively managing operations outweighs the interests that protect employee speech, even in cases where employees may be reporting inefficiencies or wrongdoing." The ruling "leaves public employees…significantly more prone to retaliation from their employers if they speak out in ways that displease their bosses."

The Washington Post (5/31, A1, Lane, 744K) reports Justice Anthony M. Kennedy wrote the majority opinion, and was joined by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr. But "Kennedy's opinion drew a sharp dissent from Justice David H. Souter, who argued that statutory and other protections for whistle-blowers are weak. Justices John Paul Stevens and Ruth Bader Ginsburg joined Souter. Justice Stephen G. Breyer dissented in a solo opinion."

USA Today (5/31, Biskupic, 2.31M) notes the dispute "involved Richard Ceballos, a Los Angeles County prosecutor who said he was transferred and denied a promotion for writing a memo to his bosses alleging misrepresentations in an affidavit used by a sheriff's deputy to obtain a search warrant. Officials in the Los Angeles County district attorney's office said their actions arose from legitimate staff changes and contended Ceballos' report was not protected under the First Amendment." The US Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit ruled, however, that "Ceballos' statements about a potential lie in a search-warrant affidavit were 'inherently a matter of public concern' protected by the Constitution." USA Today adds, "Rejecting that view, Justice Anthony Kennedy wrote that applying constitutional free-speech protections to workers engaged in their regular duties would intrude on managers' discretion." The Bush Administration sided with the District Attorney's office. The Washington Times (5/31, Price, 90K), Wall Street Journal/AP (5/31), Christian Science Monitor (5/31, Richey, 61K), Los Angeles Times (5/31, Savage, 958K) and New York Times (5/31, Greenhouse, 1.19M), among other newspapers, also reports on the ruling.

NYTimes Criticizes Ruling. The New York Times (5/31, 1.19M) editorializes, "The Supreme Court whittled away at the First Amendment yesterday, ruling against a prosecutor who raised concerns about the validity of a search warrant." The court "made the law in this area messy, and even illogical. It suggested the attorney would have had more protection if he had embarrassed his office publicly than by working quietly through the system. But the bigger problem is that the ruling rolls back government workers' rights to speak out against possibly illegal actions." The First Amendment "should not protect employees from discipline for every statement they make at work, clearly. But as the dissenters point out, it should protect them in a case like this one, where an employee was bringing to light information that advances the public interest in honest government and the rule of law."

Justices To Review Award To Smoker's Widow. USA Today (5/31, Biskupic, 2.31M) reports, "The Supreme Court agreed Tuesday to review a jury award of $79.5 million in punitive damages to the widow of an Oregon smoker. It was nearly 100 times the damages set for her actual loss. A key question in the appeal by Philip Morris, to be heard this fall, is whether 'highly reprehensible' conduct as determined by a lower court can override a rule that punitive damages must be related to the actual injury sustained." The justices also "will review whether the jury wrongly punished the company for the injuries of other Oregon smokers."

The New York Times (5/31, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports, "The Supreme Court's precedents have referred to 'reprehensibility' as a factor to consider in evaluating a punitive damages award." In this case, Philip Morris "argues in its appeal, the Oregon court improperly permitted its conclusion on reprehensibility to 'override the constitutional requirement that punitive damages be reasonably related to the plaintiff's harm.'" The company's appeal "was supported by briefs filed by the United States Chamber of Commerce and the Product Liability Advisory Council, a coalition of 133 manufacturers."

The Washington Post (5/31, D1, Lane, 744K) reports this is "a subject on which the court has been closely divided.

DOJ_NMG_0030463

The impact of President Bush's appointees, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., whose views on tort-related issues were not closely examined during their confirmation hearings, could be crucial."

The AP (5/31) reports, "The case gives justices a chance to clarify a 2003 ruling in an insurance case that said punitive damages should generally be in line with actual damages. Arguments will be this fall. … Philip Morris lawyers said that the punitive damages in the Williams case were nearly 100 times the compensatory damages and that the Oregon Supreme Court decision is 'dangerous.'"

Specter, Leahy Renew Effort To Pass Asbestos Bill. The Hill (5/31, Young) reports that Sens. Arlen Specter and Patrick Leahy face "considerable obstacles" in their renewed effort to pass a measure to replace the asbestos-litigation system with a $140 billion trust fund. On Friday, "Specter introduced a new version of the bill and again warned that the Senate faces a do-or-die moment. This bill represents his last stab at the issue, he vowed." The Hill adds, "Brinksmanship may be the only available strategy. Those opposed to the Specter-Leahy bill are entrenched and formidable and have a successful track record."

DOJ Cites Abuse, Deaths In DC Group Homes. The Washington Post (5/31, A1, Dvorak) reports, "Newly filed court papers give vivid and startling details about the extent of abuse -- from severe scaldings to fatal starvation -- that mentally and physically disabled residents have endured in some of the District's group homes." The Post continues, "Each of these people was a mentally disabled ward of the District who died in the past two years after inexcusable lapses in care, the Justice Department said, urging a judge to hold the District in contempt of court for not meeting repeated promises of reform. Other mentally and physically disabled residents of group homes were beaten, berated, sexually accosted, neglected or targeted for theft, Justice lawyers said. … To protect the victims' privacy, the Justice Department used pseudonyms for the people who died or were harmed. But the circumstances were real, the government said, and represented a pattern dating back decades." The Post adds, "The papers, filed in U.S. District Court, cited 14 'preventable and questionable' deaths since January 2003. They included a 54-year-old woman who was never screened for colon cancer and died from the disease, a 58-year-old woman who was untreated for illness for so long that she went into septic shock and a 45-year-old man who did not get proper help for a swallowing disorder."

Dean Suggests Gay Marriage Ban Supporters Are Bigots. The Washington Times (5/31, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean claims to be reaching out to red-state voters, but yesterday, he suggested that opponents of homosexual 'marriage' are bigots. Mr. Dean was responding to news that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, plans to bring to a vote a proposed constitutional amendment that would ban homosexual 'marriage.' 'At a time when the Republican Party is in trouble with their conservative base, Bill Frist is taking a page straight out of the Karl Rove playbook to distract from the Republican Party's failed leadership and misplaced priorities by scapegoating LGBT families for political gain, using marriage as a wedge issue,' said Mr. Dean, using the abbreviation for lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender. 'It is not only morally wrong, it is shameful and reprehensible,' Mr. Dean said."

Georgia Supreme Court To Review Ruling On Same-Sex Marriage Ban. The New York Times/AP (5/31) reports that Georgia's Supreme Court "said it would speed its review of a ruling that struck down the state's voter-approved ban on same-sex marriage. A Superior Court judge had ruled that the ban violated the Georgia Constitution because the ballot question addressed more than one issue, including civil unions."

Abortion Advocates File Petitions To Challenge South Dakota Abortion Ban. The New York Times (5/31, Ruethling, 1.19M) reports that abortion advocates filed petitions with more than 38,000 signatures with South Dakota's secretary of state's office "to challenge the state's ban on almost all abortions. The campaign needs at least 16,728 signatures to put the ban, which became law in March, to a statewide vote in November."

DC-Based Blackboard Becomes A Software Powerhouse. In a column for the Washington Post

(5/31, D1), Steven Pearlstein writes, "Remember the economic theory behind the dot-com mania? … The notion was that, unlike the market for widgets, the Internet economy was prone to winner-take-all competition, in which the first company to gain a significant lead would wind up with a near monopoly, at least till the next breakthrough technology came along. … Big economies of scale were a part of it, allowing the market leader to wage a debilitating price war against smaller competitors. There was also something called 'network effect,' which had to do with the natural preference of customers to use compatible software." Pearlstein continues, "As it turned out, most of the companies bankrolled on the basis of this theory never made it. But for the few that survived, the theory may actually be panning out. There are eBay and Google, of course. And here in Washington, there's Blackboard Inc. … Blackboard has quietly become the world's leader in the software used to connect students to their teachers, their textbooks, their course materials and one another. By some estimates, Blackboard now has as much as 80 percent of the U.S. market, with sales growing at 20 percent annually, 20 percent operating margins and a stock price that has doubled since its first stock offering two years ago." Pearlstein adds, "All of which makes it particularly curious that the Justice Department earlier this year allowed Blackboard, with 45 to 50 percent of the market, to buy its main rival, WebCT, which had 35 to 40 percent. To be sure, there are still thousands of universities and school systems that have no e-learning software, and those that do can switch vendors when contracts come up for renewal. But the quiet approval of the merger of the top two companies in a market with strong winner-take-all characteristics is the best evidence yet that the Bush administration has abandoned antitrust enforcement."

Suit Seeks To Block Time Warner, Comcast Acquisition Of Adelphia. The AP (5/31, Karnowski) reports, "A startup cable television channel sued cable giants Time Warner Inc. and Philadelphia-based Comcast Corp. on Tuesday in an attempt block their planned acquisition of bankrupt Adelphia Communications Corp." The AP continues, "The America Channel, which has yet to go on the air, claims in its lawsuit that the deal violates federal antitrust laws and will reduce competition in the cable TV industry. … The lawsuit accuses Time Warner and Comcast of conspiring to monopolize local cable systems across the country and of using their alleged monopoly power to refuse to deal with independent networks such as The America Channel, denying them the access to local cable systems they need to succeed." The AP adds, "Comcast and Time Warner, the nation's two biggest cable TV companies, agreed jointly last year to acquire Adelphia, the nation's fifth-largest cable operator, for $17.6 billion, and divide up its systems among the two of them. … TAC's lawsuit accuses Comcast and Time Warner of price-fixing and bid-rigging in their submission of a joint bid instead of competing against each other to acquire Adelphia's assets."

Colgate CEO's Legacy Could Hinge On One Last Deal. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Deogun) reports, "Chances are you have a Colgate-Palmolive Co. product in your house. Colgate Chief Executive Officer Reuben Mark, though, is no household name. … Yet Mr. Mark has delivered gleaming returns for shareholders -- a fact in which he takes great pride. At Colgate's Web site, the default setting for Colgate's stock-price performance is 22 years, which not coincidentally is how long Mr. Mark has been CEO. As of May 17, the stock was up 3,867% in that period, compared with 1,269% for the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index and 2,439% for its peer group, the company says." The Journal continues, "Now in the twilight of his career -- he is 67 and due to step down as CEO next year -- Mr. Mark must make a decision: Does he preserve his sterling stock-price legacy or make a high-stakes gamble with a big acquisition that potentially ensures Colgate a future in a rapidly consolidating marketplace? … During the next few days, final bids are due in the sale of Pfizer Inc.'s consumer-health business, which is expected to fetch $12 billion, or more than a third of Colgate's market value. The business includes over-the-counter drugs such as heartburn remedy Zantac and -- most important for an 'oral care'-obsessed Colgate -- Listerine mouthwash. Many CEOs near retirement would snap up such a deal, viewing it as a crowning achievement." The Journal notes, "Mr. Mark, though, has made his career largely by shunning big acquisitions -- and the limelight. He takes commercial flights and rarely gives interviews. Mr. Mark's deals -- Mennen deodorant and Murphy Oil Soap -- would be rounding errors for the likes of Sandy Weill or Jack Welch. … Like many chiefs, Mr. Mark has fantasized about big deals. A few years ago, he entertained a dream merger with Gillette, owner of razors, Duracell batteries and Oral-B dental-care products. From his seat on the board of Time Warner Inc., though, Mr.

Mark had watched its heralded merger with America Online nearly wreck the combined company, and he balked. Last year, Procter & Gamble Co., Colgate's biggest rival and maker of Crest toothpaste, swooped in and bought Gillette, cementing its position as king of household products. … Colgate, meanwhile, was losing some of its shine. Some analysts said Mr. Mark had stayed too long, and Colgate was getting marginalized by the likes of P&G. As if on cue, Colgate missed its earnings forecast, and its stock got whacked."

NRG Rejects Mirant's Unsolicited $7.85 Billion Bid. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Smith, Berman) reports, "Mirant Corp. said it made an unsolicited offer earlier this month to acquire fellow power generator NRG Energy Inc. for $7.85 billion, but in a rejection letter sent May 23, NRG called the cash-and-stock offer 'the wrong deal at the wrong time.'" The Journal continues, "Mirant disclosed its offer late yesterday and said it was renewing its proposal. Both of the so-called merchant power generators fell under bankruptcy-court protection when deregulated power markets contracted following Enron Corp.'s collapse in late 2001." The Journal adds, "Mirant, of Atlanta, emerged from bankruptcy-court proceedings in January. NRG, of Princeton, N.J., emerged in December 2003, having shed $6 billion in debt. … Under the proposal, Mirant offered $57.16 a share in cash and Mirant stock for each share of NRG stock, a 33% premium to NRG's stock price yesterday. In 4 p.m. … Mirant Chief Executive Edward Muller, formerly an executive at utility company Edison International, said he believes a combination would be immediately accretive to Mirant shareholders and would create a company able to cut overhead expenses by at least $150 million a year. He said the combined firms would have 40,000 megawatts of generating capacity in the nation's biggest wholesale-power markets."

Disney Fires Broadside At Marketing Pirates In China. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Fowler) reports, "Walt Disney Co.'s latest marketing campaign in China features a nervy gambit: getting consumers to help it weed out counterfeit products." The Journal continues, "The company's 'Disney Magical Journey' promotion, its biggest Chinese marketing campaign of the year for consumer products, is a twist on the traditional customer-loyalty program. To enter a contest for free Disney DVDs, television sets and trips to Hong Kong Disneyland, customers peel a sticker off a Disney product, attach it to a form, fill in a few personal details and mail it in." The Journal adds, "The catch: Only legitimate Disney products carry the specific red hologram-covered stickers, in a market rife with pirated Disney products that often are of similar quality to the real thing. … Fighting these counterfeits is crucial for Disney. Sales of consumer products -- such as stuffed toys and books -- make up the bulk of the company's business in mainland China. Piracy has wiped out most legitimate sales of DVDs, while government regulations bar much of the company's imported programming from being shown in theaters and on TV."

EU Regulators Step Up Investigations Of Monopoly Abuses By Energy Companies. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, A6) reports, "European regulators said they raided energy companies to search for evidence of possible monopoly abuses, in an escalation against dominant energy companies." It was "a follow-up to a series of raids the European Commission and national regulators carried out earlier this month in Germany, Italy, France, Belgium and Austria, the commission said. Following the raids earlier this month, Germany's RWE AG confirmed regulators had carried out unannounced inspections of its offices, and German energy giant E.On AG said regulators conducted 'examinations' as part of a 'normal inspection operation' at its headquarters in Essen." The Journal notes, "The commission didn't name the companies inspected. It noted that inspections are just a preliminary step in assessing possible antitrust violations."

The AP (5/31) reports, "The unannounced inspections on Monday and Tuesday were a follow up to earlier visits in May, the commission said. … 'The commission has reason to believe that the companies concerned may have violated ... antitrust rules that prohibit restrictive business practices and/or abuse of a dominant market position,' it said in a statement."

Bloomberg (5/31, Newman) reports, "EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes in February threatened legal action against utilities that bar rivals from using power grids and pipelines. As part of a bid to lower energy costs, Kroes said she will fine or impose restraints on utilities that abuse their dominance in the power and natural-gas markets."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

NOAA Alleged To Have Gagged Salmon Researchers. The Washington Post (5/31, Harden, 744K) reports the administration, "having made it hard for federal scientists to talk publicly about global warming -- appears to have decided that loose lips are also bad when they talk about salmon." The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration "has instructed its representatives and scientists in the West to route media questions about salmon back to headquarters. Only three people in the entire agency, all of them political appointees, are now authorized to speak of salmon, according to a NOAA employee who has been silenced on the fish." The post notes that the order "was issued the day after an article appeared last month in The Washington Post quoting federal technocrats making positive statements about two recent decisions…that challenged previous Bush administration policy about protecting salmon."

Industry Groups Challenge Endangered Species Listings. USA Today (5/31, Parker) reports, "Ever since a 3-inch fish protected by the Endangered Species Act stopped construction of a dam in Tennessee in 1978, the law has been known as one of the toughest environmental laws on the books." USA continues, "Environmental groups have used it to halt development in pristine lands across the nation. Today, the law designed to protect animals such as the manatee from extinction also has become a legal tool of property rights groups and developers." USA adds, "In a counterpunch to environmentalists who have filed lawsuits aimed at protecting hundreds of plant and animal species by listing them as endangered or threatened, property rights groups such as the Pacific Legal Foundation are filing lawsuits to have animals and plants removed from the list so that development can proceed. … Meanwhile, industry groups have filed dozens of legal challenges aimed at allowing development on lands set aside by the U.S. government to help protect endangered species. … In a study he published last August on active litigation involving the Endangered Species Act, Parenteau counted 45 lawsuits filed by industry groups and five filed by environmental groups." USA notes, "At the forefront of the movement is the National Association of Home Builders, which recently prevailed in a legal battle over Arizona land that had been designated as a habitat for the cactus ferruginous pygmy owl. Two environmental groups have sued to restore the designation, and a court hearing on the issue is scheduled for Friday. … Likewise, the conservative Pacific Legal Foundation, based in Sacramento, is pressing the federal government to re-examine several animals and plants on the endangered list. … Both groups have found a relatively friendly audience in the Bush administration, which in recent years has loosened many of the restrictions in the Endangered Species Act. Among other things, the administration has focused on giving private property owners incentives to protect vulnerable species, rather than banning activity on their land."

Global Warming Expected To Have Profound Consequences This Century. USA Today (5/31, 6A, Wiseman, Soriano, 2.31M) reports that "there's no question that rising temperatures are poised to change life as we know it." According to the United Nations Environment Program, "In less than 100 years, the Arctic could be ice-free in the summer, which would allow ships to take the polar route from Europe to Asia, say the Canadian Ice Service and the U.S. Navy. At current rates, 75% of glaciers in the Swiss Alps and two-thirds of those in China will melt by 2050, according to separate studies by the European Environment Agency and the Chinese Academy of Sciences."

Americans Seen As Unlikely To Abandon Fossil Fuels, Despite Evidence Of Climate Change. USA Today (5/31, Vergano, 2.31M) reports that "despite increased interest in recent years in hydrogen-fueled cars, windmills and biofuels made from plants, it's very unlikely people won't be burning coal, oil and natural gas in coming decades, says Jae Edmonds of the Joint Global Change Research Institute. There's just too much of the stuff, especially coal, too easily extracted from the ground to expect humanity to stop burning fossil fuels, he says."

Global Warming Threatens Species. USA Today (5/31, O'driscoll) reports, "Alarming anecdotes — such as polar bears drowning as they swim farther in search of scarce Arctic sea ice — dramatize climate change. But a flurry of scientific reports, field observations and official actions suggests nature's struggle with rising temperatures is well underway:" USA continues, "As Earth and its atmosphere grow warmer, the planet's wild inhabitants take cover where they can: cooler waters, deeper forests and canyons, higher slopes or nearer the poles, north and south. … But climate scientists say that if global warming continues unabated, the scramble for habitat will grow much harder for millions of species of mammals, birds, amphibians, fish, insects and more. Recent studies say that as many as one-quarter of them could begin to disappear this century and that warming has wiped out some already." USA adds, "For as long as humans have tried to protect wild species, a key strategy has been to preserve habitat and bar encroachment by development, excessive hunting or fishing, and other threats. The USA has a 150,000-square-mile system of federal sanctuaries, with 535 refuges in all 50 states, plus 3,000 other resource sites. … But rising temperatures put animals in motion, seeking new homes when they can't tolerate the old. For waterfowl, that could mean more birds in smaller spaces with less food. That can spark disease outbreaks, greater loss to predators, and cause birds to skip nesting altogether."

Friedman Says GM Undermining US Security. The New York Times' Thomas Friedman (5/31) writes, "Is there a company more dangerous to America's future than General Motors? Surely, the sooner this company gets taken over by Toyota, the better off our country will be. … Our military is in a war on terrorism in Iraq and Afghanistan with an enemy who is fueled by our gasoline purchases. So we are financing both sides in the war on terror. And what are we doing about that? Not only is GM subsidizing its gas-guzzlers, but not a single member of Congress, liberal or conservative, will stand up and demand what most of them know: that we must have some kind of gasoline tax to compel Americans to buy more fuel-efficient vehicles and to compel Detroit to make them."

Gore's Global Warming Views Said To Be Politically Motivated. In his column for the Wall Street Journal (5/31, 2.11M) Holman Jenkins Jr. writes, "A remarkable and improbable thing is that, despite presumably devoting decades of study to the subject of global warming, nothing Al Gore has learned leads him to say anything that would strike the least informed, most dogmatic 'green' as politically incorrect. He doesn't discover virtues in nuclear power. He doesn't note the cost-benefit advantages of strategies that would remove CO2 from the atmosphere, rather than those that would stop its creation. … Mr. Gore's narrative isn't science, but science fiction. It also contains a large element of political fiction, relying on the hack theme of good guys versus bad guys."

Administration Plans Funding Cuts For Energy Department Conservation Programs. The Christian Science Monitor (5/31, Clayton, 61K) reports a "few years ago a little-known US Energy Department program helped produce a design technology for lightweight cars and trucks that in 2004 alone saved the nation 122 million barrels of oil, or about $9 billion. Even without that breakthrough, the tiny Industrial Technologies Program routinely saves the United States $7 worth of energy for each dollar it spends, proponents say." With energy prices "spiking and President Bush pushing for more energy research, the ITP would seem a natural candidate for more funding. In fact, its budget is set to get chopped by a third from its 2005 level. It's one of more than a dozen energy-efficiency efforts that the Energy Department plans to trim or eliminate in a $115 million cost-saving move." The "push to solve the nation's energy woes are bumping up against the federal government's budget problems. To be sure, the Bush administration is anxious to fund its new Advanced Energy Initiative - long-term research into nuclear, coal, wind, solar, and hydrogen power. But to accomplish that, it is cutting lesser-known programs like ITP whose payoffs are far more near-term."

Indian Tribes Establish Their Own Court System. The San Diego Union-Tribune (5/31, Jiménez) reports, "In a modest office above a downtown Escondido storefront, an American Indian law school graduate and a retired Superior Court commissioner are working on a project that could significantly alter the region's justice system for American Indians." The Union-Tribune continues, "The Intertribal Court of Southern California is the latest in various attempts to establish an independent court to handle legal matters generated on the reservations of San Diego County's Indian tribes. … It began in summer 2005 and is open to any tribe." The Union-Tribune adds, "The cases so far have centered on mediating civil disputes and child-custody issues. Several tribes have started using the court as the venue to hear civil infractions, ranging from being drunk in public to illegally discharging a firearm. … It also will serve as the venue to resolve disputes for non-Indians visiting casinos or doing business on reservations that use the intertribal court. … The tribes most active in the intertribal court are clustered in North County, such as Pala and Pauma. The wealthier, more well-known tribes such as Sycuan and Viejas in East County say they either have not heard of the court or have little or no interest in joining." The Union-Tribune notes, "Funding is a primary challenge because the court must find a revenue stream to continue growing. Because California law applies on tribal lands, the Bureau of Indian Affairs does little to help fund local tribes in establishing their own courts, legal experts said."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI To Use DNA Database For Missing Persons, Unidentified Victims. In a front-page story, USA Today (5/31, Willing, 2.31M) reports, "The FBI plans to use its national DNA database system to help identify not only criminals, but also missing persons and tens of thousands of unidentified bodies held by local coroners and medical examiners. A new computer program planned for this fall will compare genetic profiles taken from unidentified bodies or body parts with DNA submitted by family members of missing persons." CODIS Director Thomas Callaghan "said the FBI is in 'a very good position' to identify remains through family members because of the agency's small but growing database of missing persons and unidentified remains, plus its experience in using computers to match DNA."

Over 100 Detroit Deaths Linked To Deadly Drug Mix. KTBS-TV Shreveport, LA (5/31) reported on its website, "More than 100 deaths in Detroit area traced back to drugs mixed with fentanyl." There were "33 such deaths in the past week and many are suspected of being the result of the same deadly combination of drugs." Reports "surfaced before the weekend that area drug counselors were trying to get the word out on the street about the deadlier drug combination being sold, while at the same time" the DEA "was working to track down the source of the mixture."

Pennsylvania Readies For Arrival Of Deadly Compound. The Pittsburgh (PA) Tribune-Review (5/31) adds that while the deadly mix "has killed more than 100 people in Illinois, Michigan and eastern Pennsylvania and parts of four other northeastern states," it "hasn't been found in the Alle-Kiski Valley." But now "and police and drug agents are watching for it." DEA Agent Rick McGoldrick "said Friday the government is investigating more than 20 deaths in Harrisburg and Philadelphia and 30 or more in Michigan. The DEA in Pittsburgh is watching for it to pop up elsewhere."

Texas Man Dies Making Pipe Bomb To Target DEA Agents. The AP (5/31) reports James Charles Torrence, 38, was "indicted on federal drug and firearms charges died in an explosion as he was making a pipe bomb that fire officials say he planned to use against agents." Torrence "was building the bomb Monday in his home when it exploded, officials said." Brian Howell, assistant fire marshal of the Longview Fire Department, "said documents were found in the residence listing names of agents with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the Drug Enforcement Administration."

Police Said To Be Encountering More Drivers Impaired By Drugs. The Los Angeles Times (5/31, Wright) reports, "While incidences of drunk driving have declined over the years, thanks in part to organizations such as Mothers Against Drunk Driving, driving under the influence of drugs has increased, reports Marilyn Huestis at the National Institute on Drug Abuse in Rockville, Md. To battle the problem, researchers are scrambling to develop uniform procedures that would allow police to easily screen motorists suspected of being under the influence of drugs. One procedure involves a saliva test that could be done quickly in the field with a swab. It would not require police to take a suspect to a hospital or to jail for blood or urine samples, Huestis says."

Wisconsin Gun Shop Tops National List For Selling Weapons Later Tied To Crimes. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (5/31John Diedrich Jdiedrich@, journalsentinel.com) reports, "West Milwaukee's Badger Outdoors last year again was tops among all gun shops in the nation for selling guns that later were recovered by police during criminal investigations, according to new data from the federal government." The Sentinel continues, "In 2005, there were 537 crime guns - an average of more than 10 a week - recovered and traced to Badger, the Milwaukee area's largest gun dealer. None of the others in the top five had more than 500 crime guns traced to them, according to the document from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives." The Sentinel adds, "The ranking was released during a federal trial in which another store with a high number of crime gun traces - Trader Sports Inc. of San Leandro, Calif. - sued to try to keep its dealer's license. … In 1998, Badger had the most crime guns traced to it among all gun dealers in the United States and then fell from the top spot, only to regain the spot last year. Badger has been criticized for selling cheap handguns, which were bought by "straw buyers" with clean records and then passed on to gang members. In a 1999 sweep, the majority of straw buyers bought the guns legally at Badger. Owner cites scarcity of shops … Co-owner Mick Beatovic said Tuesday he wasn't aware that many crime guns had been traced to Badger. ATF classifies crime guns as any firearm used or suspected of being used in a crime."

Man Arrested In California Dynamite Theft. The AP (5/31) reports, "A man wanted in the theft of 686 sticks of dynamite from a gold mine has been arrested after a short car chase in a stolen car, officials said." The AP continues, "Sheriff's deputies arrested Joshua Lee Gawn, 33, for investigation of auto theft Friday night, Deputy Chris Durham said. Gawn didn't give his name and authorities didn't realize he was wanted in the dynamite case until fingerprint information came back Saturday night, Durham said." The AP adds, 'Investigators earlier this month had focused on Gawn based on information from witnesses and tipsters. After his apartment was searched, he was arrested for investigation of a probation violation but was released the next day on $25,000 bail. … While in custody, Gawn admitted he stole explosives, according to an affidavit from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. The ATF obtained an arrest warrant for Gawn on May 18 after he did not turn himself in for arraignment in federal court."

The Riverside (CA) Press-Enterprise (5/31, Burge) reports, "Special Agent John D'Angelo, of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, said he couldn't comment on the details about Gawn's arrest. 'I'm just glad they arrested him,' he said. 'From what I can tell this was a case of good police work.' … The ATF obtained an arrest warrant for Gawn on May 18 after he failed to turn himself in for arraignment in federal court. The warrant accuses him of being a felon in possession of explosives."

FBI Agent Says Tips Prompting Expansion Of Jeffs Investigation. MSNBC's Rita Cosby Live & Direct (5/30) interviewed Salt Lake City FBI Special Agent Timothy Furhman, reporting, "Tonight, new development in the hunt for polygamist cult leader Warren Jeffs. … The FBI is now beefing up its search for the fugitive who just weeks ago made the list of the country's Top 10 most dangerous criminals. … Agent, why are we beefing up the law enforcement? Is there some tip?" Fuhrman: "We have had a number of call-ins and a number of tips that have come in. I wouldn't necessarily say we're beefing up. We're just expanding the area where we are investigating, involving a number of law enforcement offices and different FBI offices and different techniques that we're employing."

Meanwhile, The Salt Lake City Deseret Morning News (5/30, Winslow) reported, "FBI agents in Salt Lake City declined to comment on the specific number of agents assigned to the Jeffs case but said additional resources are being freed up to deal with the high-profile fugitive. 'You couldn't expect one person to handle all this work,' FBI Special Agent Patrick Kiernan said. 'The leads have continued to come in, and we continue to keep personnel and the FBI very busy.' … 'We have had 482 people on the list, and 452 have been apprehended or located,' Kiernan said. … Close to 150 of those were apprehended because of citizen tips, he added." KSL-TV Salt Lake City (5/30) also notes on its Web site that "officials say a substantial amount of agents and resources have been freed up since to deal with tips and leads on the high-profile fugitive." Jeffs' placement on the Top Ten list "enables any FBI agent in the world to drop everything to assist in the manhunt. … In the 56 year history, 94 percent of the fugitives on the list have been captured."

IMMIGRATION:

Advocates Of Tough Border Security Deliver 10,000 Bricks To Lawmakers. The New York Times (5/31, Hulse, 1.19M) reports that advocates of tough border security have sent an estimated 10,000 bricks to House and Senate lawmakers' offices to "make a none-too-subtle point with lawmakers about where many of their constituents come down on emerging immigration bills." Leaders of the send-a-brick campaign "said they had hit on the idea as a way to emphasize the benefits of a fence along the border with Mexico." The Times adds, "Besides the border fence, the group supports technology improvements for border security, added money and personnel for the Border Patrol and an enhanced security presence in general on the southern border. The brick effort was scheduled to wind down this week, though the organization encouraged people to continue if they desired."

Police Officer Featured In Story About Border Violence Shot Five Times In Nuevo Laredo. USA Today (5/31, Johnson, 2.31M) reports that a police officer in the Mexican border city of Nuevo Laredo was in hospitalized in critical condition after being shot five times outside his home.

USA adds that Juan Pablo Elizondo "appeared in a USA TODAY and USATODAY.com report May 18 about the surging violence against police" in the Mexican border city. The attack "highlights the unrelenting threat against Mexican police in a city where two major drug cartels are battling for control of routes into the USA for shipments of drugs and illegal immigrants."

Churches Help Chinese Immigrants Adjust To Life In US. The New York Times (5/31, Chang, 1.19M) reports on efforts of local Chinese churches in Los Angeles to help Chinese immigrants assimilate to life in the US. The Times notes that "the typical newcomer arrives from an obscure corner of mainland China, well educated but with no English skills and just a few hundred dollars. Like Ms. Du, many do not even have a car. But they do have local Chinese churches. If a newcomer needs a ride to the hospital and an English speaker to help translate, someone from Mandarin Baptist's congregation steps forward. Newcomers are eligible for emergency grants, known as 'love gifts,' and the church's 1,600 members are a ready source for job referrals."

Samuelson Says Journalists Didn't Do Their Job On Immigration Bill. Robert Samuelson writes in the Washington Post (5/31, A19, 744K) that the Senate-approved immigration bill "would double the legal immigration that would occur during the next two decades from about 20 million (under present law) to about 40 million. One job of journalism is to inform the public about what our political leaders are doing. In this case, we failed. The Senate bill's sponsors didn't publicize its full impact on legal immigration, and we didn't fill the void."

Immigration Courts Overwhelmed By Case Backlog. The St Petersburg Times (5/31, Adams) reports, "In a small, downtown courtroom overlooking the Miami River, Kenny Rivera, 20, nervously awaits a long-delayed immigration hearing. Three years have passed since he applied for asylum, fearing he would be killed by a notorious street gang if he were forced to return to his native Honduras. … This kind of delay is not unusual at Miami's immigration court, which is one of the nation's busiest - and most backlogged." The Times continues, "As the United States tries to secure the border with Mexico, the nation's overburdened immigration courts are bursting at the seams. … The nation's 225 immigration judges, who are employees of the Justice Department, handled more than 352,000 matters last year up 23 percent from 2004, according to the department's Executive Office for Immigration Review, or EOIR, which runs 53 courts nationally." The Times adds, "Efforts to speed up the process have created unexpected problems. … The backlog has spilled over into the federal courts. Complaints of judicial misconduct and anti-immigrant bias have resulted in a rash of appeals to the nation's 11 circuit courts, prompting some federal appellate judges to rebuke lower-ranking colleagues on the immigration bench. … 'Time and again, we have cautioned immigration judges against making intemperate or humiliating remarks during immigration proceedings,' railed Philadelphia Circuit Judge Julio M. Fuentes in a ruling last September. … 'The tone, the tenor, the disparagement and the sarcasm' of the immigration judge 'seem more appropriate to a court television show than a federal court proceeding,' he wrote. … After complaints by federal judges began piling up last year, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales ordered a comprehensive review of U.S. immigration courts. In a sharply worded memo in January, Gonzales, whose grandparents were Mexican immigrants, chastised immigration judges for 'intemperate or even abusive' conduct toward asylum-seekers."

TAX:

Senate May Vote On Estate Tax Repeal In June. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Herman, 2.11M) reports in its "Tax Report" column, "Estate-tax repeal may soon come up for a vote in the Senate." The federal estate tax "is scheduled to disappear in 2010 but return in 2011. The House has voted for permanent repeal. A Senate vote could come early in June. Many wealthy Americans favor retaining the tax but easing its bite."

Democrats Working To Dissuade Baucus From Cooperating On Estate Tax Repeal. The Washington Post's Harold Meyerson (5/31, A19) writes that the Senate will consider legislation sponsored by Sen. Jon Kyl that "would permanently repeal the estate tax on the wealthiest Americans. If enacted, Kyl's bill would plunge the government another trillion dollars into the red during the first decade (2011-2021) that it would be in effect. Behind the scenes, the action has been on the Democratic side in the Senate, as the party's leadership has sought to dissuade Montana's Max Baucus, ranking Democrat on the Finance Committee, from forging a halfway-house compromise with Kyl that would deplete revenue by only $500 billion to $600 billion during that decade." Meyerson adds, "Why any Democrat would back such a measure…is a deep mystery. … Democrats are running this year as the party of comparative fiscal sanity and greater economic equity and security. Baucus's compromise would undermine all those premises."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Nominates Paulson To Replace Snow As Treasury Secretary. President Bush yesterday nominated Goldman Sachs CEO Henry Paulson to be Treasury Secretary. Paulson's nomination is getting favorable reviews, with most analysts predicting he will be confirmed by the Senate. NBC Nightly News (5/30, story 4, 1:25, Gregory, 9.87M) reported Paulson "is getting rave reviews so far. On Capitol Hill and on Wall Street it appears that his nomination is assured." Fox News' Special Report (5/30, Cameron) also said Paulson's nomination "was warmly received both on Wall Street and particularly on Capitol Hill. Republicans predicted swift hearings and confirmation." CNN's The Situation Room (5/30, Henry) noted "Democrats like Chick Schumer already saying they will support the nomination. Could be a relatively quick confirmation." On ABC World News Tonight (5/30, story 4, 1:20, Gibson, 8.78M), chief Washington correspondent George Stephanopoulos said Paulson "is very well-respected on Capitol Hill. And all the sounding that I got today is that he should sail through to confirmation."

Typical of the favorable coverage of Paulson's selection is Knight Ridder (5/31, Hutcheson, Hall), which reports Paulson "is arguably the most influential executive on Wall Street, the market's equivalent of a rock star." Also, in its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (5/30, 2.11M) reported, "A speedy, lopsided confirmation is expected for…Paulson." Confirmation "could come by 4th of July break, according to Republican leadership aide."

Even editorial pages that are often critical of Bush are sounding a positive note about Paulson. For example, in its editorial, the New York Times (5/31, 1.19M) calls the appointment "a master stroke," adding Paulson "will bring much-needed clout, pragmatism and credibility to the job. So, for a change, the question raised by a major presidential appointment is not one of competence." The Washington Post (5/31, A18, 744K), in an editorial titled "A Good Nomination," calls Paulson "a welcome addition to a faltering administration," though it also expresses "hope that someone of Mr. Paulson's stature will not merely act as a mouthpiece for dead-end budget policies." Taking a more skeptical view, the Los Angeles Times (5/31, 958K) editorializes that Bush "will be fortunate to have in place a highly credible firefighter if and when another crisis arrives. Unless, that is, financial markets soon determine that [Karl] Rove is still running the show."

ABC World News Tonight (5/30, story 3, 2:15, Stark, 8.78M) reported, "On Wall Street, where Paulson made a fortune now worth more than $600 million, the 60-year-old financier, educated at Dartmouth and Harvard business school, has superstar status. He's an international dealmaker who's been to China more than 70 times and a devout environmentalist who unwinds as a birdwatcher, and has given $100 million of his own money to conservation causes. But his status on Main Street is another story. As famous as Paulson is in the financial markets, most of the public has never heard of him." The New York Times (5/31, Dash, 1.19M) reports Paulson "has accumulated a $700 million equity stake in the Wall Street firm."

The Hill (5/31, Schor) reports that Paulson's selection gave "a welcome boost to congressional Republicans hoping for a more potent White House economic message to parlay into election-year gains." Paulson "is likely to earn quick approval" from the Senate.

The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Solomon, 2.11M) reports "the successful wooing of a prominent executive who -- unlike several recent Bush appointees -- hasn't previously held a post in this administration could bring Mr. Bush some sorely needed credibility, both with financial markets and with the public." And the New York Times (5/31, Andrews, Rutenberg, 1.19M) says the move was "intended to add economic star power to his administration as it tries to fight its way through a thicket of political difficulties." Bush was "eager to bring aboard someone who could potentially do for this administration what another former Goldman chief, Robert E. Rubin, did for President Bill Clinton as a senior economic adviser and as Treasury chief."

The AP (5/31, Aversa) reports the appointment "marked the latest in a string of major changes in the president's personnel lineup that started two months ago with the replacement of Bush's chief of staff and has grown to include his CIA director, budget chief and top trade representative." USA Today (5/31, Jackson, 2.31M) also says "it's the latest move in a personnel shakeup led by new chief of staff -- and Goldman Sachs alumnus -- Joshua Bolten. He is trying to fashion a new team and reinvigorate the White House agenda just months before November elections in which Republicans try to hold their majorities in Congress. … Bolten and others have said Bush is not getting credit for the strong economy. A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll in late April showed approval of Bush's handling of the economy was 34%, amid worry about high gas prices." The President "made it clear that one of Paulson's new duties is communication. He praised the nominee's "ability to explain economic issues in clear terms." The Christian Science Monitor (5/31, Scherer, Feldmann, 61K) reports, "One of the toughest challenges of Mr. Bush's second term has been to eliminate the public's perception gap on the economy -- the seeming disconnect between strong economic numbers and low public opinion of the state of the economy. … 'This is all tied to gas prices,' says Dennis Jacobe, chief economist at the Gallup Organization, based in Princeton, N.J."

The Washington Post (5/31, D1, Masters, 744K) says Paulson "has not shied away from controversy, but he has also been criticized for not paying enough attention until a crisis occurs. He owes his position as the sole head of Goldman to a 1999 coup in which he and several allies forced out Jon S. Corzine -- now the governor of New Jersey and a former US senator -- and Paulson steered Goldman through the stock-analyst scandal relatively unscathed." Paulson "spent part of his early career in Washington, working first in the Pentagon and then as a staff assistant in the White House under President Richard M. Nixon."

The Chicago Tribune (5/31, Neikirk, 643K) says that "even if there is not a huge expectation of a change in economic policy under Paulson, a lot may be different. One can expect a shift in tone, some say, a better understanding of financial markets, and a closer relationship with the Chinese." Paulson's "strength may be in working around the edges of current policy, particularly in expanding free trade and pressing China and other Asian nations to strengthen their currencies against the dollar in order to help American companies compete on a fairer basis. He also could be instrumental in breaking the impasse over a new world trade agreement."

The Washington Times (5/31, Curl, 90K) notes Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "was less supportive" than Schumer, saying, "Mr. Paulson will face many challenges if he is confirmed in steering our economy towards greater prosperity for all Americans. Working families are struggling under high gas prices, rising health care costs, and skyrocketing college tuition. ... I hope Mr. Paulson will share that goal." The Washington Times (5/31, Hill, 90K) also reports National Association of Manufacturers President John Engler "said he expects Mr. Paulson will be able to orchestrate continued growth in the United States as well as a lower value of the dollar that will help to trim the bloated trade balance."

Paulson Wins Assurances On Status Within Bush Team. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Solomon, 2.11M) reports Paulson "has been assured that he will rank with the secretaries of defense and state in the Bush inner circle and that the White House National Economic Council, headed by Mr. Bush's business-school classmate Allan Hubbard, will hold some of its meetings in the Treasury building and that Vice President Dick Cheney will attend some of them." The Journal adds, "If they materialize, those would be significant changes for a White House that has tightly held the power to make economic policy, essentially turning the Treasury secretary into a salesman for tax cuts, the centerpiece of its economic strategy."

Meanwhile, the Los Angeles Times (5/31, Havemann, 958K) says "it was unclear how much Paulson would shape administration policy. Bush's first Treasury secretary, Paul H. O'Neill, was frustrated that he did not have much influence." Snow "found himself cast as a cheerleader for economic policies that were largely forged in the White House rather than at the Treasury Department."

The Financial Times (5/31, Daniel, Ben White) notes Paulson "had previously turned down an offer for the position. Many on Wall St had suggested no such senior banker would not want the job because driving forward far reaching economic policy, such as tax or entitlement reform, would prove difficult during the latter stages of a second term presidency." However, "insiders said on Tuesday that Mr Paulson was unlikely to have accepted the job without some assurances that he could affect change."

The Washington Post (5/31, A1, Fletcher, Blustein, 744K) also says the move "culminated a months-long recruitment during which Paulson rebuffed several White House overtures, according to administration officials and people familiar with Paulson's decision making." White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten "renewed the effort in recent weeks and persuaded his former Goldman Sachs colleague to meet with Bush at the White House earlier this month. It was then, after a long Saturday meeting 11 days ago, that Bush persuaded Paulson to take the job."

Bush Personally Took Part In Persuading Paulson To Take Post. Time.com (5/31, Allen) reports in a Web exclusive that Bush's aides "had been trying to find a successor to John Snow on Wall Street for months, but the most promising candidates had turned them down — including Paulson, just a few months ago. One of the reasons Bush had such a hard time landing a master of the universe like Paulson is that the Treasury job had shrunk during his presidency — at least in the estimation of Wall Street — from a premier policymaking platform to a cheerleading outpost subservient to the West Wing." But an official "involved in the selection process said Bush 'took it up himself, and wouldn't take 'no' for an answer.' Aides said Bush convinced his quarry that he would have a seat and voice at the table, and the President seemed to underscore that during his Rose Garden announcement by saying that 'Paulson will be my principal advisor on the broad range of domestic and international economic issues that affect the well-being of all Americans.'"

Paulson Described As "Huge" Environmentalist. The CBS Evening News (5/30, story 5, 2:35, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported Paulson is "a huge supporter of environmental causes," and "he also believes global warming is a threat, and that could put him at odds with some members of the Bush Administration."

USA Today (5/31, Jones, 2.31M) reports Paulson, "a Republican, is atypical in his passion about the environment, a passion critics say has interfered with his responsibility to shareholders. He's an avid bird watcher and chairman of the Nature Conservancy. He has raised animals from alligators to flying squirrels, and the Goldman Sachs website cites a corporate environmental policy of protecting wildlife and timber." The Los Angeles Times (5/31, Puzzanghera, 958K) runs a similar story under the headline "The Bird-Watching Businessman," in which it describes Paulson as an "ardent environmentalist."

The Washington Times (5/31, Hill, 90K), in a report titled "Some On Right Wary Of Nominee's Green Links," says "conservative groups that defend individual liberties expressed adamant opposition to it yesterday because of the Goldman Sachs chairman's ties to the Nature Conservancy." Myron Ebell, analyst at the Competitive Enterprise Institute in Washington, "said Mr. Paulson has the potential to wreak far more havoc in economic policy than his predecessor, Paul O'Neill, who was fired in 2002 for questioning President Bush's tax-cut plans." He "said Mr. Paulson could become an outspoken advocate for curbs on global warming and other environmental causes within the administration." The New York Times (5/31, Thomas, 1.19M) also describes Paulson as "in some ways an executive in the mold of Paul H. O'Neill, the former Treasury secretary who was forced out by a White House that could not abide his contrarian tendencies."

Traders Upbeat On Paulson Nomination. The Financial Times (5/31, Hughes, Johnson) reports, "Rumours that the nomination might go to Don Evans, the former commerce secretary, had weighed on the dollar as traders assumed he would focus more on trade than on markets." But "many analysts were buoyed on Tuesday by Mr Paulson's knowledge of the markets and his close links with China. … The appointment brought comparisons with Robert Rubin, the Clinton-era Treasury secretary who also had a Goldman Sachs background and is still revered by the markets."

The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Hudson, Karmin, 2.11M), under the headline "Traders Cheer Bush's Treasury Pick," reports, "Currency and bond traders applauded the appointment of…Paulson as the new Treasury secretary, though many said his selection by President Bush would do little to alter the course of a recently weakening dollar or rising interest rates."

Deficit, Competitiveness Agenda Seen As Early Challenges. Time.com (5/30, Kadlec) reports in a Web Exclusive that, "Across Wall Street, they are hoping that Paulson can bring a gravitas to the job that has been missing since the tenures of Larry Summers and another former Goldman executive, Robert Rubin, both of whom served under President Clinton." For "the most part, though, economists agree that Paulson likely will be asked to shape policy, which should give him a stronger voice on all economic issues." Paulson will "need some kind of win to cement his authority. That likely will come in the area of spending cuts." If Paulson "can rein in spending enough to turn the deficit around it will be clear that there was no pre-nup, and his words will carry the full weight of the U.S. government the first time he confronts an international or domestic crisis."

The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Hitt, 2.11M), meanwhile, reports Paulson "accepted his nomination as Treasury secretary by highlighting the need for the nation to stay competitive." But "one of his first challenges will be guiding…Bush's ballyhooed competitiveness agenda out of choppy waters on Capitol Hill." The initiative "started out with wide support among senior Democrats and Republicans in Congress. As the election year progresses, key planks face an uncertain future." As Treasury secretary, Paulson "would oversee matters from tax and currency policy to regulation of capital markets. In brief remarks yesterday, Mr. Paulson stressed the importance of bolstering the competitiveness of the US economy. … Even before Mr. Paulson's nomination, the White House remained upbeat about the outlook for the competitiveness initiative, and Mr. Bush trumpeted it several times."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, 2.11M) editorializes that Paulson is "a financial heavyweight, and our hope is that his selection means that Mr. Bush has learned his lesson about the need for a strong voice at Treasury. His first choice, Paul O'Neill, marginalized himself with daft priorities. Current Secretary John Snow, who resigned yesterday, is capable but was too often marginalized by the White House." Paulson "will be most useful to the President if he is allowed to be both a policy maker and a vocal public advocate."

N. Gregory Mankiw, former chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, writes in today's Wall Street Journal (5/31, 2.11M) that "while Mr. Snow helped steer the economy through a recessionary storm, he leaves for Mr. Paulson a more daunting task -- getting the long-term fiscal numbers to add up. To understand the challenge that Mr. Paulson faces, let's start with a fact about which every serious policy analyst agrees: The government budget is on an unsustainable path. … If Hank Paulson wants to leave the nation's finances in better shape than he found them, his main job will be to focus attention on the problem."

Hayden Sworn In As CIA Director. The New York Times/AP (5/31) reports, "Gen. Michael V. Hayden was sworn in as director of the C.I.A. and told agents that they must be competent and cooperative to keep the 'central' in Central Intelligence Agency." He added "that only the C.I.A. had the 'connective tissue' to bring the intelligence community together." An agency spokeswoman said he received "a standing ovation." President Bush plans attend a "a second swearing-in" at the C.I.A. campus in Langley, Va. USA Today (5/31, 4A, 2.31M) also covers this story.

WSJournal Criticizes Hayden For Not Pushing Reform. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, A12, 2.11M) editorializes that Hayden "has sent more signals that would soothe the souls of Langley's uncounted career bureaucrats than push the cause of reform." He solicitously told Michigan Democrat Carl Levin he wasn't 'comfortable' with work done by former Undersecretary of Defense Douglas Feith," whose office checked the CIA's analyses. Hayden "should have been asked to elaborate on why he is uncomfortable that analysts might have to explain how they arrive at certain conclusions." Hayden didn't "have to validate a good deal of the political left's current, if amusingly ironic, defense of the CIA's career spooks: the idea that policy makers should only rarely question the careerists' judgment, and that the careerists' assumptions shouldn't be challenged by new blood from the outside." So far, "his performance at his hearing makes us think his critics," who considered his nomination "a surrender to an agency that has often performed badly but then tried to undermine the government's policy through leaks and insubordination," may have "had a point."

Senate Confirms Capka As Federal Highway Administration Director. The AP (5/31) reports the Senate "approved President Bush's nominee to head the Federal Highway Administration after four Democratic senators dropped their opposition to him. J. Richard Capka was approved by voice vote Friday, just before the Senate left for its Memorial Day recess." Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., "held up consideration of Capka's appointment because he said the Bush administration wouldn't release money for a transportation project in his state. But Baucus let Capka's appointment go forward after Transportation Secretary Norman Mineta assured him the situation would be worked out, said Baucus spokeswoman Sara Kuban."

Reid Says Attending Boxing Matches Is "Official Duty." The Associated Press (5/30, Hennessey) reports Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "said it's his official duty to attend boxing matches in Nevada and that he did nothing wrong when he accepted complimentary ringside seats from a state agency that was lobbying him." Reid said, "I would be criticized if I didn't go. It's just like going to an Ohio State football game, an Arizona State football game - in Nevada, boxing is it. I have an obligation to make sure boxing is conducted properly not only in Nevada but around the country." The AP adds Reid was "responding to an Associated Press story that detailed how the senator had accepted free tickets possibly valued at several thousand dollars from the Nevada Athletic Commission, the agency that regulates boxing in the state." Reid "made his comments after addressing a group of veterans gathered at town hall meeting also attended by Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, who was in town fundraising. Dean called criticism of Reid's ethics 'ridiculous' and repeated his attacks on Republicans."

NYTimes Says Reid's Acceptance Of Boxing Tickets Reinforces Need For Ethics Reform. The New York Times (5/31, 1.19M) says in an editorial that Reid "said his conscience was clear because he had not violated Senate rules by taking the free tickets. Indeed, the rules do allow gifts from state agencies (although they caution against attempts to influence official decisions). Each lawmaker must make his own call in countless such situations, and Senator John McCain, a fight-night companion of Mr. Reid in 2004, chose to pay for his $1,400 championship tickets." Senator Reid "is hardly in the dock. But his discomfort — and that of House Speaker Dennis Hastert in being mentioned last week in the endless Abramoff speculations — certainly should reinforce the need for Congress to emphasize vigilance over regret by upgrading the enforcement of ethics rules."

Study Finds Some Government Appointees Improperly Obtained Career Jobs. Government Executive (5/31, Mandel) reports, "Most political appointees who have switched to career positions since 2001 did so using the correct process, but 18 such conversions were improperly made and many more were not sufficiently documented, according to a new report." GE continues, "In a survey of 41 agencies, Government Accountability Office reviewers found 144 people converted from noncareer to career positions from May 1, 2001, through April 30, 2005 -- a move known as 'burrowing in.' Most of those conversions took place at the departments of Health and Human Services, Justice, Defense and Treasury. … 'The ability to convert noncareer employees to career positions is an appropriate and valuable process available to agencies,' reviewers stated in the report (GAO-06-381). But they found that of the 130 appointees at the GS-12 level or higher who were converted, 18 may not have followed procedures designed to ensure proper application of merit system principles." GE adds, "The reviewers found that agencies circumvented proper procedures in a variety of ways. In some cases, agencies did more than one of the following: created new career positions specifically for particular individuals, tailored job descriptions to match the resumes of the appointee in question, prevented other potential candidates from applying, selected appointee candidates who were less qualified than other applicants, or failed to honor veterans' preference rules in cases where a veteran would have scored higher than the appointee. … In seven of the 18 cases, the Office of Personnel Management had reviewed the conversion, either because of the position's senior level or its proximity to a presidential election, and allowed it to go forward. … In another 19 cases, reviewers lacked sufficient documentation to verify the hiring procedures used. … Of the 19 conversions for which reviewers found inconclusive documentation, 16 were excepted service positions at the Justice Department which reviewers were unable to trace back through the hiring process. In some cases, the department was unable to produce a copy of the individual's job application, the report noted."

Hastert Seen As Becoming More Assertive. The Christian Science Monitor (5/31, Chaddock, 61K) reports Speaker Dennis Hastert, "who surpasses" former Speaker Joe Cannon's "record in office on June 1, is the un-Cannon. For more than five years, Mr. Hastert has backed President Bush's assertion of presidential authority on issues ranging from war powers to domestic surveillance. Colleagues dub him 'the coach.'" Last week, "the coach turned tough. Angered by the FBI's unannounced raid of the Capitol Hill office of a Democratic colleague, Hastert forced a showdown with the Justice Department over the seized documents, and accused the FBI of trying to 'intimidate' him by spreading rumors that he was part of a corruption probe. It was a rare moment of public assertiveness for a speaker who has preferred to operate behind the scenes. And for the moment, it worked." The controversy "may be just the beginning of Hastert's assertiveness as key House players depart the scene. For most of his 10 terms in the House, Hastert has worked in the shadow of outsized personalities, such as former majority leader Tom DeLay (R) of Texas, who will step down from the House to cope with legal battles on June 9." Brookings Institution senior fellow Stephen Hess said, "It's remarkable that this 'accidental speaker' is about to become the longest-serving [Republican] speaker of the House, especially when you think of all the forceful, powerful speakers we have had in American history."

House GOP Continues To Be Dogged By Divisions. The Hill (5/31, O'Connor) reports as the midterm elections "loom and concern about maintaining their majority hold on the House increases, rank-and-file Republicans have grown more and more combative with their leaders and themselves." In the "past two weeks, Republican House members have sparred openly on the House floor and have criticized their Speaker behind closed doors." And with "immigration reform, an update of the Voting Rights Act and a series of appropriations bills among the few big-ticket items remaining on this year's legislative calendar, it is unlikely these intraparty squabbles will die down any time soon, particularly as vulnerable Republicans seek to distance themselves from their party and their president."

Democrats Debate Offering Specific Proposals On Hot-Button Issues. The Los Angeles Times (5/31, Brownstein, 958K) reports with President Bush "and the Republican-controlled Congress facing bleak approval ratings, many Democrats are increasingly confident that the public is ready to hear the party's alternative policy ideas as the 2006 campaign heats up. The question is whether the Democrats have an alternative ready to present." Party leaders "have provided some specifics about how they would deal with national security, energy issues and ethics reform if they recapture one or both chambers of Congress in November. But on many topics, they have provided only broad hints about their direction. This cautious strategy is generating intensifying debate within the party." On one side "are those who believe the Democrats must present a sharp alternative to Bush's direction — as Republicans did with their 'Contract with America' before sweeping into control of Congress in 1994." On the "other side are strategists who fear that offering too many specifics could allow Republicans to shift focus away from public discontent with how they have governed. Those sentiments appear especially strong among Senate Democrats." But "attempts to minimize the target for Republicans could leave Democrats vulnerable in a different respect. A continued reluctance to detail an agenda, some party strategists say, could allow the Republicans room to define for voters what the priorities of the Democrats are."

First Lady Taking More Active Role In GOP Fundraising. The Hill (5/31, Schor) reports, "House Republicans walking an electoral tightrope as the midterms approach must accept the president's shaky public standing to benefit from the White House's still-muscular fundraising power." The avoidance "by vulnerable incumbents, whether calculated or coincidental, of a public appearance suggesting White House ties is a phenomenon difficult to ascribe to congressional-district or political relationships." A senior GOP strategist said, "There is a pecking order to this, with the president at the top, the VP right near that. The first lady has taken a more active role, and she's able to make things more successful." Just below Mrs. Bush "in the pecking order, the strategist added, is former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, now a political consultant and partner at law and lobbying firm Bracewell & Giuliani."

Morris Claims Bush Oil Ties Will Cost GOP Votes. In his column for The Hill (5/31) Dick Morris writes that while President Bush "has dithered" and the Republicans in Congress "have failed to look beyond Alaska drilling as the solution to our dependence on foreign oil, first Gore and now Hillary have passed them by and staked out their claims to the issue. Bush cannot afford to yield this ground because it is no longer the esoteric preserve of the environmental-policy wonks. Rising gas prices have generated a populist anger at the bottom of the social ladder." Morris adds, "what makes the broader green movement particularly dangerous for the quiescent Republican Party is the oil man in the White House. If this new coalition of greens, pump-enraged dads and enlightened patriots has any single enemy, it is the oil companies and their Middle Eastern allies. But the Bush family's history of involvement with big oil makes this a uniquely dangerous issue for the president."

Majority Of Democratic Candidates Would Back Pelosi For Speaker. The Hill (5/31, Kaplan, Blake) reports, "An overwhelming number of Democratic incumbents running in congressional districts that President Bush won in 2004 would support the ascension of Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) to Speaker should Democrats capture a majority of seats in November. But a handful of Democratic challengers running in Republican-leaning congressional districts are much more cautious than their party's incumbents. … These challengers' cautious responses, however, stand out as the exception to the rule. In an informal survey of Democratic candidates conducted by The Hill, the vast majority of incumbents and challengers asked said they would vote for Pelosi as Speaker if Democrats take the majority."

Congress Has Until June 5 To Act On FAA-Union Dispute. The Washington Post (5/31, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The clock is ticking in the dispute between the Federal Aviation Administration and its largest union, the National Air Traffic Controllers Association. The FAA declared an impasse in contract negotiations April 5 and sent the dispute to Congress, which has until June 5 to act. If Congress takes no action, the FAA can impose its contract proposal on the union. A spokeswoman for Rep. Steven C. LaTourette (R-Ohio) said yesterday that the congressman had introduced a bill to take Congress off the clock and that House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) has promised that the measure will be brought up for a vote next week."

Democratic Strategist Calls Rove "Serial Obstructionist." In a column for USA Today (5/31, 2.31M) Democratic strategist Bob Beckelis writes that White House advisor Karl Rove "is a serial obstructionist. Rove's 2004 campaign strategy was to win by increasing the base of conservative voters with no serious attempt to reach out to independents or Democrats. No wonder important legislation is decided on virtually straight party-line voting. Congress is beginning to look like the British Parliament, where lawmakers vote the party line."

WPost Notes Zinmeister's Alteration Of Profile. In an editorial, the Washington Post (5/31, A18, 744K) notes that Karl Zinsmeister, President Bush's new domestic policy adviser, has admitted altering portions of a profile in order to eliminate criticism of "people in Washington" and the war in Iraq. The Post writes, "Almost anyone who's been the subject of a profile has wished he or she could take back some words, maybe tweak them a bit. No one else that we know of -- certainly no one who's about to become the president's chief adviser on domestic policy -- has had the gall to simply make those changes unilaterally."

OTHER NEWS:

Stock Markets Fall Precipitously On Inflation Fears, Consumer Confidence. ABC World News Tonight (5/30, story 5, :15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Inflation fears and a drop in consumer confidence helped send stock prices tumbling today, with the Dow Jones Industrials down 184 points. For the first time in more than a year and a half, all 30 stocks in the Dow Jones Industrial Average fell." The CBS Evening News (5/30, story 5, 2:35, Schieffer, 7.66M) also reported "there was another big sell-off on Wall Street today. The Dow fell 184 points [to close at 11,094.43], the NASDAQ lost 45 [to close at 2,164.72]." NBC Nightly News (5/30, story 5, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) also noted stocks took "a tumble today."

USA Today (5/31, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M), however, headlines its story on the economy "Consumer Confidence Stays High," and says consumer confidence "dipped in May but remained strong despite apprehension about jobs and incomes, according to a report out Tuesday. The consumer confidence index was 103.2 in May, down from 109.8 in April, when it was the highest in nearly four years, the Conference Board said." The decline "comes after two months of gains, and confidence was still high. The index was as low as 61.4 in March 2003." USA Today adds, "The fact that confidence has remained high despite a slowing housing market and elevated gas prices bodes well for the economy, says Sean Snaith, director of the Business Forecasting Center at the University of the Pacific."

The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Derby, 2.11M), in a report titled "Consumer Confidence Is Slipping On Concerns Over Economy, Jobs," and says consumer confidence "is losing ground on concerns about the economic outlook and the labor market." The New York Times/AP (5/31), meanwhile, reports consumer confidence "soured in May, as Americans worried about the future of the economy and the outlook for jobs."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (5/31, D1, Irwin, 744K) reports stocks "fell sharply yesterday as skittish investors reacted negatively to news about oil prices, consumer confidence levels and comments by a Federal Reserve official." Michael H. Moskow, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago, "suggested in an interview on CNBC that inflation is running at the high end of what is acceptable. 'Inflation is at the upper end of a level that I think is consistent with price stability and is a situation we have to monitor very carefully,' Moskow said. H is remarks were a major reason that the odds of the Fed raising short-term interest rates next month rose from 35 percent to about 50 percent, as measured by pricing in futures markets, Pado said." And the Wall Street Journal (5/31, Browning, 2.11M) says "the plunge reflected resurgent fears that slowing economic growth caused by high oil prices and rising interest rates could put a lid on corporate profits." The New York Times (5/31, Peters, 1.19M) also attributes the sell-off to "worries about inflation and another rise in interest rates."

USA Today (5/31, Shell, 2.31M) reports, "No matter if you blame it on a seasonal quirk, profit taking or an old-fashioned Wall Street price correction, the stock market's steep slide this month has distressed investors muttering, 'Mayday!' May, which started off strong, is living up to its reputation as a not particularly profitable month for stocks, as well as the starting point for what historically has been a weak six-month period for stocks. … As the damage and concern mount, money managers are trying to decipher whether this month's pullback is normal and temporary or whether it signals the beginning of a steeper decline."

World Bank Raises Forecast For Global Growth. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, White, 2.11M) reports, "The World Bank raised its forecast for global economic growth this year, arguing that sound policy frameworks have made many countries -- especially developing nations -- more resilient to high oil prices." The body "expects the global economy to expand 3.7% this year, up from its November forecast of 3.2% growth. The bank believes the global economy expanded 3.6% in 2005."

Freddie Mac's Income Dropped 27% In 2005.

The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Hagerty, 2.11M) reports, "Freddie Mac reported a 27% drop in net income for 2005 to $2.13 billion from $2.94 billion a year earlier, reflecting the costs of settling shareholder suits, losses on Hurricane Katrina and accounting changes. Earnings per share declined to $2.75 from $3.94 in 2004 at the McLean, Va., mortgage-finance company."

The Washington Post (5/31, Shin, 744K) reports, "Though delayed by two months, the release of the 2005 results was another step in the company's efforts to put its accounting problems behind it. Last month, it agreed to pay $220 million to settle shareholder lawsuits and a $3.8 million fine to settle charges that it violated campaign finance laws. The company hopes to resume timely financial reporting with its full-year 2006 results."

Ford Race Could Determine Democrats' Chances Of Taking Senate Majority. The New York Times (5/31, Toner, 1.19M) reports that Rep. Harold Ford's bid for US Senate in Tennessee may determine the Democratic Party's chances of retaking the Senate majority. The South "has become a Republican stronghold in recent years, the castle keep for the party's Senate majority. Democrats lost five seats in the region in 2004. Of the 22 Senate seats in the South, only 4 are now held by Democrats. Party leaders are keenly aware that until they make inroads in the South, any stable majority in the Senate will be hard to achieve. But they have hopes that Mr. Ford can begin to turn the tide."

Ford's Uncle To Go On Trial This Fall. Meanwhile, the New York Times (5/31, Emery, 1.19M) reports that jury selection has begun in the trial of Roscoe Dixon, a former state lawmaker charged in a federal corruption sting. Dixon "was indicted with four sitting state lawmakers in May 2005. He is on trial in Federal District Court in Memphis on charges of extortion and accepting bribes, accused of taking $9,500 from a bogus company created by the F.B.I. John N. Ford, a Memphis Democrat" and uncle of Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. John Ford "will go on trial in the fall."

Clinton To Launch Reelection Effort Today.

Knight Ridder (5/31, Thomma) reports that as Sen. Hillary Clinton kicks off her reelection campaign today, she does with the image of "a leader of her party and the expectation she'll be the front-runner for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination. Yet many Democrats and analysts think she's failed to lead at a pivotal time for her party and the nation, complaining that she's been overly cautious and timid in her first term. They contend that she's remained a backbencher on major issues such as the Iraq war and immigration. And they say she's squandered the unique platform her celebrity gives her to put other issues in play, such as expanding health care."

The New York Times (5/31, Kornblut, 1.19M) says that Clinton's reelection effort "is, in essence, the campaign that isn't. Even as Mrs. Clinton insists she is focused squarely on her re-election this year — not, as so many speculate, on the presidential campaign of 2008 — the junior senator from New York is not running anything like a recognizable race (apart from her huge fund-raising apparatus, which itself makes it stand out, and which her own advisers admit has more to do with preparing for 2008 than 2006). … Mrs. Clinton's strategists say she is doing more or less what any other unopposed incumbent would do — and if anything is spending more time and money than the other senator from New York, Charles E. Schumer, did in his last race."

New York Democrats Endorse Spitzer For Governor. The New York Times (5/31, Cooper, Hakim, 1.19M) reports that New York state's Democratic Party has endorsed Eliot Spitzer's campaign for governor. The Times notes that Spitzer's "easy victory at the convention was a foregone conclusion, and the unity it demonstrated contrasts with the disagreements among the Republicans, who begin meeting on Wednesday bitterly divided not only over their candidate for governor, but also whom to support to challenge Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton."

California Democratic Gubernatorial Hopefuls Tied Going Into Primary. The Washington Times (5/31, Pfeiffer, 90K) reports that with under a week remaining until California's gubernatorial primary, state Treasurer Phil Angelides and state Controller Steve Westly, who are battling for the Democratic nomination to challenge Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger are in a statistical dead heat. A poll "released by the Los Angeles Times last week shows Mr. Angelides leading Mr. Westly by 3 percentage points, 37 percent to 34 percent. However, the lead is within the poll's statistical margin of error, and a full 28 percent of Democratic primary voters say they are still undecided heading into the final week of campaigning."

Cannon Decries Angelides' "Negative Campaigning." Lou Cannon writes in the Washington Post (5/31, A19, 744K), "In an oft-shown 30-second commercial, California state Controller Steve Westly calls his opponent in the Democratic primary race, Phil Angelides, a 'champion smear artist.' The quotation is attributed prominently to The Post, with the date given in smaller letters: May 31, 1994. At that time I was writing a syndicated column, but I had no memory of writing those words 12 years ago. Perhaps I'd quoted someone? No such luck. My wife looked it up and found that the someone was me." Cannon adds that "whether he wins or loses, Angelides will not easily erase the stain of the campaign he waged to win state office 12 years ago. Negative campaigning has consequences -- and not only for its victims."

Group Pushing Bipartisan Presidential Ticket For 2008. The AP (5/31, Lester) reports, "A handful of political veterans envision a new look to presidential politics in 2008 -- a bipartisan ticket. … Called Unity08, the group is trying to come up with an alternative presidential ticket headed by either a Democrat, Republican or independent. The ticket would be chosen online at a Unity08 convention in the first half of 2008. Joining [former Maine Gov. Angus] King are Hamilton Jordan and Gerald Rafshoon, former aides to President Carter, and Doug Bailey, a former staffer on President Ford's 1976 campaign. The group plans to build an online community of millions of registered voters who would participate in the online convention. Recruitment has begun on college campuses."

The Washington Post (5/31, A4, VandeHei, 744K) reports, "Their goal is to offer an alternative to the two major party choices -- a unity ticket that will emerge after secure, online balloting that they hope will include millions of Americans. In an announcement statement, Unity08 said its efforts are a reaction to a system that has 'polarized and alienated the American people' through partisanship and interest-group politics." The Post adds, "Unity08's organizers estimate that if 20 percent of the voting public signs on -- hardly a modest goal but only slightly more than what independent H. Ross Perot won in his dramatic 1992 presidential campaign -- then 'our voters will decide the 2008 elections.'"

WSJournal Praises Defeat Of Virginia Gasoline Tax Proposal. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, 2.11M) editorializes, "Last week a gang of conservative GOP members in the general assembly foiled Democratic Governor Tim Kaine's plan to raise $1.4 billion in car, gasoline and diesel taxes to pay for more roads and mass transit. This was a victory against long odds, because the renegade house members were lined up against the Governor, powerful Republicans in the state senate, elements of the business community and the state's largely pro-tax media. … Voters began to wonder why a state with a $2.5 billion budget surplus would need higher taxes only three years after imposing the largest tax increase in state history. It didn't help that Mr. Kaine was trying to raise gasoline taxes (currently 18 cents a gallon) amid soaring gasoline prices."

Iran Making Plans For Invasion By US. The Washington Times (5/31, Athanasiadis, 90K) reports, "Iran, apparently anticipating an American invasion, has quietly been restructuring its military and testing a new military doctrine that calls for a decentralized, Iraqi-style guerrilla campaign against an invading force." Iran has carried out "a series of war games…since late last year to test the army's readiness." Moreover, a "European military attache in Tehran told The Washington Times that the Revolutionary Guard is moving away from a joint command with the ordinary army and taking a more prominent role in controlling Iran's often porous borders, even as it makes each of Iran's border provinces autonomous in the event of war."

Saudi Ambassador Warns Of "Catastrophic" Consequences Of Strike On Iran. The Washington Times (5/31, Sands, 90K) reports Saudi Ambassador Prince Turki al-Faisal warned yesterday that a "military strike against Iran's suspected nuclear sites would have 'catastrophic' effects on other Persian Gulf states and on U.S. interests in the region and beyond." Prince Turki "said his country supports the U.S.-backed diplomatic campaign at the United Nations" but is "against any military conflict." He "said any conflict would be felt immediately in world oil markets and predicted that Iran would retaliate against U.S. allies and interests."

US Agrees To Draft Iran Resolution Without Threat Of Force. The New York Times (5/31, Weisman, 1.19M) reports that the "Bush administration, seeking to enlist Russian support for a United Nations Security Council resolution on Iran, has agreed to language ruling out the immediate threat of military force." The resolution would "call on Iran to suspend various nuclear activities." The Times reports, "Also being negotiated are a package of benefits in nuclear energy, economic activities and security to be offered Iran if it cooperates in ending its nuclear activities." The Bush administration has "quietly expressed misgivings about some" possible elements of the package.

Iran Says It Is Ready To Restart Negotiations With EU. The AP (5/31, Yoong) reports Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said Tuesday "that Tehran is ready to restart negotiations with the European Union on its nuclear program, but he ruled out direct talks with the United States." His "announcement raised hopes that Iran would react positively to a planned package of incentives meant to convince it to abandon uranium enrichment," which was "put together by the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council plus Germany." However, "Mottaki said there was no question of direct talks with the United States."

The Washington Times characterized Mottaki's comments differently, reporting that he "repeated Iranian calls for direct talks with Washington."

NYTimes Calls For Direct Talks With Iran. In an editorial, the New York Times (5/31, 1.19M) argues for "direct talks between Washington and Tehran in which Iran would be offered a wide-ranging package of economic inducements and security assurances in exchange for completely and verifiably abandoning all programs capable of producing nuclear bomb fuel." The Times writes, "Some Iranian officials are now seeking such talks, yet Washington, perversely, seems uninterested." The Times writes, "It could be a lot easier to persuade Russia and China to enforce" a ban on buying Iranian oil "if Washington agreed to hold direct talks with Iran and it was Iranian intransigence that made them break down. Even better, the talks just might succeed."

US Lawmaker Demands Said To Be Straining US-Pakistan Relationship. The Christian Science Monitor (5/31, Montero, 61K) reports the US-Pakistan relationship "has hit a rough patch" as US lawmakers last week "urged Pakistan to wring more information from disgraced nuclear scientist Abdul Qadeer Khan, alleging that he may yet hold the blueprint to some of Iran's nuclear secrets." The Monitor notes, "So far, the tough talk is coming only from Congress, suggesting that the White House may be more keenly aware of the many demands already placed on Pakistan's President Pervez Musharraf."

Israeli Incursion Into Gaza Leaves Four Palestinians Dead. The New York Times (5/31, Myre, 1.19M) reports the Israeli military "staged their first major operation inside the Gaza Strip since pulling out of the coastal territory last year, ambushing Palestinians late Monday evening as they prepared to fire a rocket, the Israeli military said Tuesday." According to the Times, three members of Islamic Jihad, "who were handling the rocket," were killed, "as well as a Palestinian security officer." The Times notes that Israel's "incursion into Gaza on Tuesday was a new tactic in its attempts to halt Palestinian rocket fire that has been directed at Israeli border towns from northern Gaza." Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniya "condemned 'the Israeli policy of aggression against our people.'" Islamic Jihad "said it tried to fire the rocket in retaliation for a car bombing last week in Lebanon, which killed one of the group's senior members, Mahmoud Majzoub, and his brother." Israel "has denied involvement."

US Official's Reassignment Seen As Evidence Of Dissent Over Somalia Policy. The Washington Post (5/31, A13, Graham, Deyoung, 744K) reports Michael Zorick, an American political officer "previously responsible for monitoring" Somalia, "received an early transfer to another diplomatic post after expressing concerns about U.S. payments to Somali warlords who are battling Islamic groups, according to several administration officials and outside experts on Africa. … One U.S. official said yesterday that earlier this year, Zorick used the State Department's 'dissent channel' to file a memo critical of U.S. policy in Somalia. But the official disputed suggestions that Zorick's transfer was a punishment." The Post adds that the case "provided fresh evidence of a sharp dispute within the U.S. government over how to deal with Somalia."

Militia Seizes Hospital In Mogadishu. The New York Times (5/31, Lacey, 1.19M) reports, "Hospitals have generally been considered neutral territory during the long years of civil conflict in Somalia, but that changed this week when gunmen seized control of an important medical facility in northern Mogadishu, causing many wounded patients to flee. … The International Committee of the Red Cross and the Somali Red Crescent Society issued a statement on Monday condemning the takeover and calling for the immediate withdrawal of the militiamen."

Death Toll From Indonesian Earthquake Reaches 5,700. The CBS Evening News (5/30, story 7, 2:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The death toll from the Indonesian earthquake reached almost 5,700 today, but substantial help is now arriving for the more than 200,000 homeless survivors. That help includes US Marines who flew into the hardest hit town, which is also near a volcano that could erupt at any time." CBS (Petersen) added, "The medical and rescue teams are arriving from around the world just as experts say the time has probably passed for finding any more survivors. It has been too many days. Most structures were small homes where family or neighbors have already found the living and the dead, so it is no longer a race to find survivors but a second race to help the homeless."

US Military Sending Additional Aid To Indonesia. NBC Nightly News (5/30, story 7, 1:55, Hattori, 9.87M) reported, "The Pentagon announced tonight that the USS Essex, an amphibious assault ship with extensive medical facilities, is en route to the quake zone tonight. That's in addition to a contingent of US Marines which arrived with heavy machinery earlier today. They are among the latest in the quake relief effort here."

Agencies Report Fundraising Has Been Slow. The New York Times (5/31, Strom, 1.19M) reports, "The international relief effort to help the victims of Saturday's earth quake in Indonesia got off to an unusually fast start, although fundraising for the venture is progressing slowly so far. Nonprofit groups already had staff and supplies in Indonesia because of the effort to rebuild Aceh Province after the tsunami struck there in the final days of 2004. They shifted those resources to Yogyakarta, the site of the earthquake. … Several groups that have begun fund-raising said their efforts were off to a slow start, in part because public awareness of the disaster was low."

Aid Workers Have Not Yet Visited Some Portions Of Java. The New York Times (5/31, Gelling, 1.19M) reports, "Three days after a powerful earthquake rocked central Java, many devastated villages within the two worst-hit districts have yet to receive any help, residents said Tuesday. … A steady flow of aid, however, continued to arrive Tuesday, as relief agencies and other groups surveyed the area and started distributing supplies. Helicopters buzzed above ruined towns for the first time since the quake. United States marines helped in the distribution effort."

Bolivian Opposition Claims Venezuela Aiding Rebel Militias. The Washington Times (5/31, Arostegui, 90K) reports Bolivian opposition leaders are demanding that President Evo Morales "investigate charges that Venezuela is sending arms and military personnel to organize a special militia for the ruling Movement to Socialism (MAS). Lawmakers of the conservative Podemos party cite immigration records that show nearly 100 Venezuelan military officers have entered Bolivia since Mr. Morales took power in January. … Members of the opposition and sources inside Bolivia's military say that Venezuelan military activities go beyond the technical assistance, involving espionage and clandestine weapons shipments."

oil and gas industries and nationalizing them — keeping more of the petrodollars at home but alienating longtime foreign investors. … The moves played well at home." However, "while popular, and clearly profitable initially, such nationalizations — and more particularly the way in which they are carried out — are unwise, say critics, and are likely, in the long term, to hurt those who are applauding now."

Canadian Oil Sands Production Reportedly Devastates Environment. The Washington Post (5/31, Struck, 744K), in a front-page story titled, "Canada Pays Environmentally For U.S. Oil Thirst: Huge Mines Rapidly Draining Rivers, Cutting Into Forests, Boosting Emissions," reports, "Huge mines [in Alberta] turning tarry sand into cash for Canada and oil for the United States are taking an unexpectedly high environmental toll, sucking water from rivers and natural gas from wells and producing large amounts of gases linked to global warming. The digging…has proliferated at gold-rush speed, spurred by high oil prices, new technology and an unquenched U.S. thirst for the fuel. The expansion has presented ecological problems that experts thought they would have decades to resolve." The Post notes that when oil sands "became recognized as economically viable in 2003, Canada suddenly emerged as holder of the world's second-largest oil reserves, behind Saudi Arabia. By 2015, according to industry forecasts, the oil sands will account for at least one-fourth of North America's oil production. The United States already is counting on Canada to help wean it from oil from the Middle East."

UN Finds Pace Of AIDS Epidemic Has Slowed. The New York Times (5/31, Altman, 1.19M) reports, "New surveys suggest that the global AIDS epidemic has begun to slow, with a decline in new H.I.V. infections in about 10 countries, the leader of the United Nations AIDS program said Tuesday. Outside of those countries — which include Haiti, Cambodia, Kenya and Zimbabwe — the number of new AIDS infections continues to rise or hover at its current pace."

UN Says India Now Has Most AIDS Cases. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Chase, 2.11M) reports India has surpassed South Africa "as the country with the largest number of people infected with HIV/AIDS, underscoring the growing impact the disease is having on the South Asian subcontinent. India's estimated total of 5.7 million infected people narrowly exceeds South Africa's estimated 5.5 million, a United Nations group reported. The estimates, released yesterday in the 2006 Report on the Global AIDS Epidemic, emphasize that the center of the disease remains in sub-Saharan Africa."

UN Hosting AIDS Conference. The Christian Science Monitor (5/31, LaFranchi, 61K) reports, "High-level delegations from around the world gather at the UN in New York this week for a five-year review of global efforts against AIDS that will highlight both progress and worrying trends. An encouraging note will be sounded by reports that infection rates are falling in some heavily affected African countries, at least in part as a result of modified behavior among African youths. But with the overall number of HIV cases still increasing - 5 million new ones last year - alarms will be sounded. Chief among them is concern over the growing concentration of the disease among women - with some experts demanding that global prevention and treatment efforts be more seriously focused on them."

The Washington Post (5/31, A10, Brown, 744K) reports, "The number of people getting AIDS drug treatment in needy countries has risen more than fivefold in five years, and the number of sites providing it has jumped tenfold in just the past year. At least a quarter-million people are alive today who would not be without the money, effort and expertise expended just since 2003, according to U.N. estimates released Tuesday."

LATimes Says UN Has Failed To Meet 2001 Goals. In an editorial today, the Los Angeles Times (5/31, 958K) writes that the UN "will revisit commitments and goals the world made five years ago to fight the disease. Needless to say, those commitments have been a bust. … Most of the goals set in 2001 not only haven't been met, they aren't even close to being met. The highest-profile goal was the so-called 3 by 5 initiative — getting 3 million people on antiretroviral drugs by 2005. The actual number was fewer than 1.5 million."

East Timor President Attempts To Quash Violent Protests. The Washington Post (5/31, A11, Deutsch, 744K) reports East Timor's President Xanana Gusmao "assumed emergency national security powers Tuesday after machete-wielding mobs torched homes and ransacked buildings in the capital and desperate residents scuffled over scarce food. Youths fired slingshots in running street battles as Australian troops tried without apparent success to quell the violence by halting and disarming gangs hiding their faces with T-shirts. What started as sporadic clashes between former soldiers and government troops has spiraled into open gang warfare. Violence has engulfed the capital, with at least 27 people killed and 100 wounded in the past week."

The New York Times (5/31, Perlez, 1.19M) reports, "Law and order broke down in recent months as the United Nations prepared to end its mission here after five years. An insurrection in East Timor's security forces turned into gang warfare in the streets of Dili, the capital, over the last 10 days, and sent terrified families to makeshift shelters around the city. … In a televised appearance, Mr. Gusmão also appealed to the gangs on the streets to hand their weapons to Australian and other foreign soldiers patrolling the capital."

Australian Troops Said To Face "Mission Impossible" In East Timor. The Washington Times (5/31, Keats, 90K) reports, "Analysts warn Australia may have stumbled into a 'mission impossible' in nearby East Timor, where its troops dominate an international force of more than 2,000 soldiers and police seeking to end a lawless rampage that threatens to devolve into civil war."

Hunger, Disease Now Leading Killers In Darfur. The New York Times (5/31, Polgreen, 1.19M) reports, "Dr. Sayid Obeid Bakhiet's clinic, one of just two left in this vast, squalid camp of 35,000 people [in Zam Zam, Sudan] displaced by the conflict in the huge Darfur region of western Sudan, is out of money. It will be forced to close at the end of June unless the organization that runs it, the Sudanese Red Crescent, finds more cash, Dr. Bakhiet said." The Times goes on to report that "at least 200,000 and perhaps as many as 450,000 have died as a direct result of the conflict in Darfur…though no one is sure how many of the deaths have come from combat and how many from the hunger and disease that have been caused or worsened by the war. But these days, people mostly die because they cannot get health care, clean water or enough food."

Americans Said To Be Unaware Of Darfur Situation's Complexity. In an op-ed for the New York Times (5/31, 1.19M) Alan J. Kuperman, assistant professor of public affairs at the University of Texas, writes, "Thousands of Americans who wear green wristbands and demand military intervention to stop Sudan's Arab government from perpetrating genocide against black tribes in Darfur must be perplexed by recent developments. Without such intervention, Sudan's government last month agreed to a peace accord pledging to disarm Arab janjaweed militias and resettle displaced civilians. By contrast, Darfur's black rebels, who are touted by the wristband crowd as freedom fighters, rejected the deal because it did not give them full regional control. Put simply, the rebels were willing to let genocide continue against their own people rather than compromise their demand for power." Kuperman adds, "Darfur was never the simplistic morality tale purveyed by the news media and humanitarian organizations."

Egyptian Government Detaining Bloggers Indefinitely. The Washington Post (5/31, A10, Williams, 744K) reports, "At least six bloggers are among about 300 protesters jailed during the past month's suppression of demonstrations. The bloggers, supporters say, were singled out by police, who pointed them out before agents rushed in to hustle them away. In the view of some human rights observers, the Egyptian government has begun to note political activity online and is taking steps to rein it in." The Post adds, "The legal status of the jailed bloggers and other detainees distresses their relatives and friends: Under Egypt's emergency laws, which have been in place for 25 years, the bloggers can be jailed indefinitely."

Dutch Ambassador Says Hirsi Ali Is Not Being Extradited. Boudewijn J. van Eenennaam, the Netherlands' Ambassador to the US, writes in the Wall Street Journal (5/31, 2.11M), "In regard to the May 20 editorial commentary 'Dutch Courage' by Daniel Schwammenthal: Ayaan Hirsi Ali is not being extradited from the Netherlands, nor is she being asked to leave. Her citizenship was recently called into question. During a debate on May 16, the Dutch parliament asked the Minister for Immigration and Integration, Rita Verdonk, to investigate and, if necessary, expedite the procedures to grant Ms. Hirsi Ali citizenship. The prime minister, Jan Peter Balkenende, has stated that this parliamentary request will prevail. Ms. Verdonk asserted that she will promptly carry out the parliament's request."

UN Security Council Urged To Take Action Against Myanmar. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (5/31, 2.11M) Jared Genser, an attorney in Washington, D.C., with DLA Piper Rudnick Gray Cary LLP, writes, "How much worse does the situation in Burma need to get before the U.N. Security Council decides to act? On Saturday, the military junta again extended the house arrest of opposition leader Aung San Suu Kyi for a year. The decree came only a day after U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan made a rare appeal for her release. … The junta's unequivocal rejection of the U.N.'s outstretched hand should come as no surprise. The generals in Rangoon have a long history of hinting at democratic reforms at critical moments so as to avert further action against them. That's why it's now time for the Security Council to demand actions rather than words from the junta."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Rules US Must Reveal Monitoring In Detainee Suit. The New York Times (5/31, Bernstein) reports, "A federal magistrate in Brooklyn yesterday insisted that government lawyers defending former Attorney General John Ashcroft and other top officials in a lawsuit brought by former immigrant detainees cannot dodge the plaintiffs' persistent and unwelcome question: Are members of the United States trial team and likely witnesses — including Mr. Ashcroft and Robert S. Mueller III, the F.B.I. director — aware of any secret government monitoring of communications between the plaintiffs and their lawyers? … 'Plaintiffs' effort to learn whether their conversations with their attorneys were monitored by the government is not a mere fishing expedition based on unfounded speculation,' the magistrate, Judge Steven M. Gold, wrote in an 11-page decision. The order rejected the government's request that he reconsider a similar order that he made orally on March 7." Judge Gold "noted that 'the government's electronic surveillance of individuals suspected of links to terrorism has received widespread publicity and has even been acknowledged by the president of the United States.' And he cited findings by the inspector general that on more than 40 occasions, staff members of the Metropolitan Detention Center secretly video-recorded visits between lawyers and Muslim immigrants swept up and detained there after the Sept. 11 attacks, and later deported after being cleared of links to terrorism." The Times notes, "Stephen E. Handler, a Justice Department lawyer, had argued that confirming or denying such monitoring in one case and not another could 'tend to reveal classified information.' … But Judge Gold rejected the government's main argument for silence. 'Any claim that sensitive secrets would be revealed by the government's disclosure of whether conversations between plaintiffs and their counsel in this case were monitored is hard to fathom,' he wrote."

Gonzales' Threat To Prosecute Reporters Meets With Continuing Criticism. In an op-ed in the Washington Times (5/31), syndicated columnist Jacob Sullum writes, "The Justice Department, which was complicit in the National Security Agency's circumvention of the statutory limits on surveillance of e-mail and phone calls, has not shown much interest in getting to the bottom of that apparent crime. It recently abandoned an internal probe of the legal advice Justice lawyers gave the NSA, ostensibly because its investigators could not get requisite security clearances. … But that does not mean the Justice Department is ignoring the revelations concerning the NSA's warrantless surveillance. Last week Attorney General Alberto Gonzales suggested the government might prosecute New York Times reporters and editors for informing the public about the program." Sullum continues, "Mr. Gonzales probably had in mind a 1950 amendment to the Espionage Act of 1917 that says 'whoever knowingly and willfully... publishes... any classified information... concerning the communication intelligence activities of the United States... shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.' On its face, this section covers what the New York Times did. … But it also covers what I'm doing right now: discussing, online and in print, a communication intelligence activity that remains classified. The law seemingly applies to everyone who has publicly acknowledged existence of the NSA's warrantless surveillance program, including the Bush administration's defenders." Sullum concludes, "When the executive branch decides what information is secret and whether any given person should be prosecuted for discussing it, the potential chilling effect on reporting and public debate is enormous. So is the potential for unconstitutional favoritism, since classified material is routinely used by journalists both sympathetic and hostile to the current administration. … Largely for such reasons, the Justice Department has never prosecuted a journalist for using classified information in a story. It should not start now."

The Kansas City Star (5/31) editorializes, "President Bush, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and many of their congressional supporters speak of the importance of respecting the exact words of the U.S. Constitution. Yet some words get more respect than others." The Star continues, "The Fourth Amendment, for example, protects people against unreasonable searches and lays out requirements for search warrants. But Bush and some of his top aides need a refresher course on this part of the Constitution, judging from reports about their controversial surveillance programs. … Now the administration seems intent on downplaying the First Amendment as well. That part of the Constitution protects freedom of the press and freedom of speech, among other things. … Let's get real. U.S. forces have been hunting down and killing the group's operatives for years. The wary survivors hardly need a newspaper story to tell them American intelligence might be eavesdropping on them. … The Founding Fathers were all too familiar with efforts by surly government officials to hobble the press, suppress criticism and restrict the flow of information to the public. … That's why the First Amendment prohibits any law 'abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press.' … Bush and Gonzales shouldn't forget those words. Neither should the American public."

In a column in the Atlantic Monthly (5/30), Stuart Taylor Jr. writes, "Comes now Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a

man not known for legal acuity, with a threat to prosecute The New York Times and other news media for publishing leaks of classified information. … Gonzales, who launched a major investigation late last year into such leaks, claimed in a May 21 ABC News interview that Congress has made a 'policy judgment' that in some circumstances journalists should be prosecuted for publishing classified information. … This assertion is misleading at best. The 89-year-old espionage law to which Gonzales was mainly referring was not intended to prosecute anybody for publishing anything and has never been so used. This is an administration that has not hesitated to leak classified information that makes it look good—but calls it criminal for others to publish leaks that make it look bad." Taylor adds, "When it comes to leaking classified information, this administration has no standing to preach, let alone prosecute. … We have seen strong evidence that I. Lewis (Scooter) Libby and Karl Rove leaked Plame's classified CIA role to reporters, in pursuit of Dick Cheney's interest in discrediting criticisms by Plame's husband, Joseph C. Wilson. The idea was to show Wilson to be a lightweight trading on his wife's CIA connections. (He was. But that's another story.) … Under the Gonzo doctrine, as I will call it, such leaks are felonies if the leakers and any co-conspirators knew that the information was classified. Libby knew, according to Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald. (Nobody has claimed—yet—that Cheney knew, or that he approved the Plame leak.)" Taylor continues, "What would the courts do with such a prosecution? The legal precedents are sparse. The Supreme Court spurned Nixon's 1971 effort to enjoin publication of the Pentagon Papers in advance. But the nine separate opinions in the case are less than reassuring. … Still, I'd be surprised if even Bush and Gonzales are foolish enough to prosecute journalists. Notwithstanding the unpopularity of the media, that might drive Bush's approval ratings below 30 percent for the rest of his already blighted term. … There is not much chance that a New York or Washington jury would vote unanimously to convict in such a case. And if there were a conviction, the case would end up in a Supreme Court that seems sick and tired of this administration's contempt for law."

Top EU Court Tosses Bilateral Passenger Agreement. The New York Times (5/31, Clark, Wald, 1.19M) reports, "The European Union's highest court ruled Tuesday that the Union had overstepped its authority by agreeing to give the United States personal details about airline passengers on flights to America in an effort to fight terrorism," a decision that will "force the two sides to renegotiate the deal at a time of heightened concerns about possible infringements of civil liberties by the Bush administration in its campaign against terrorism, and the extent to which European governments have cooperated." The two sides now have "four months to approve a new agreement, and American officials expressed optimism that one could be reached."

The Washington Post (5/31, A11, Anderson, Alexander, 744K) quotes Jarrod Agen, a spokesman for the US Department of Homeland Security, as saying, "The content of the agreement was not what the court found issue with." Separately, an unnamed US official in Brussels is quoted as saying, "We've been in touch with European institutions to talk about how to deal with what came down. ... No one knew what it would say until today, but there were contacts between European institutions and US authorities to agree to handle this in a smooth way, whatever happened."

The Financial Times (5/31, Laitner, Cameron, Peel) notes "the controversial 2004 agreement required carriers to send up to 34 pieces of passenger information to the Department of Homeland Security, which used the data to compile 'no-fly' lists of suspected terrorists and criminals." The deal "had been attacked by civil liberties' groups on both sides of the Atlantic, but was struck down by the European Court of Justice on a legal technicality following a challenge from the European Parliament." Airlines "expressed confidence that a new deal could be reached by the September 30 deadline imposed by the court, though said the move highlighted continuing confusion over aviation security regulations."

The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Echikson, 2.11M) reports EU Justice Commissioner Franco Frattini "said he would try to rework the agreement 'under a different legal basis, but with similar content.' He, too, said he is confident a deal can be struck before most EU officials go on holiday for August. But without one, he added, 'we could face really huge problems.'" However, "in private, an EU official cautioned that it will be hard to renegotiate a deal that will satisfy both the European Parliament and the U.S. government. Some members of the Parliament vowed to take a tough line on any new agreement."

The AP (5/31, White) reports, "The European Court of Justice said EU nations acted without the correct legal basis. It did not, however, take issue with specific measures of the law. … Lawyers have until Sept. 30 to address the concerns raised by the court. If they fail to fix legal technicalities by that date, airlines may have to change the way they collect and transfer data."

Bloomberg (5/31, Lumley) reports, "The European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based executive agency, said it's analyzing the 'full implications' of the court ruling and will work with the other institutions to find a solution by the September deadline. The regulator will consult with the U.S. on any changes that may be required. … 'The commission remains committed to the fight against terrorism while respecting fundamental human rights such as the right to privacy,' commission spokesman Johannes Laitenberger said at a daily news briefing in Brussels today." Bloomberg adds, "The current regulations, imposed after the Sept. 11 attacks to allow security agencies to scan airline records for terrorists and criminals, are a compromise with U.S. authorities. The commission had found the original rules violated the EU's privacy laws. The U.S. agreed not to record passengers' meal and seating preferences, which could reveal a traveler's religion or health, as well as limit the amount of time the data is stored to 3 1/2 years from 50 years."

PATRIOT ACT:

Connecticut Librarians Denounce NSL Gag Order, Patriot Act. The New York Times (5/31, Cowan, 1.19M) reports, "Four Connecticut librarians who had been barred from revealing that they had received a request for patrons' records from the federal government spoke out yesterday, expressing frustration about the sweeping powers given to law enforcement authorities by the USA Patriot Act. The librarians took turns at the microphone at their lawyers' office and publicly identified themselves as the collective John Doe who had sued the United States attorney general after their organization received a confidential demand for patron records in a secret counterterrorism case. … 'I'm John Doe, and if I had told you before today that the F.B.I. was requesting library records, I could have gone to jail, said…Peter Chase, a librarian from Plainville who is on the executive committee of Library Connection's board." Library Connection executive director George Christian added that "being free to speak now, weeks after the Patriot Act was reauthorized for several more years, was 'like being allowed to call the Fire Department after the building has burned down.'"

The Hartford Courant (5/31, Tuohy, 206K) adds that board president Barbara Bailey said, "It all reminded me of George Orwell's '1984.' You knew it was fiction. You knew it was preposterous. But you know, I've been living it." ACLU associate legal director Ann Beeson "said the Library Connection has not turned over any of the records sought in the national security letter, and the legal battle continues over other portions of the demand. The librarians still are prohibited from discussing the targets of the demand letter and the scope of the records sought." The AP (5/31, Eltman) notes that the librarians "spoke out bitterly for the first time," and they "did little to hide their displeasure at being told by the government to keep quiet." NPR's All Things Considered (5/30, Abramson) reported that "before the lawsuit was fully litigated, prosecutors dropped their appeal, leading a judge to rescind the gag order on the librarians. Nonetheless, analysts say the gag-order option remains available for the government in future cases."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

ELF Bomb Plot Suspect Pleads Guilty, Agrees To Cooperate With Investigators. The AP (5/31) reports, "A Westchester County woman, one of three people accused of plotting to blow up a U.S. Forest Service genetics lab and other targets" in California, "pleaded guilty to conspiracy, federal prosecutors said Tuesday." Lauren Weiner "agreed to cooperate with investigators as part of her plea bargain. That includes testifying against" her two codefendants. The AP notes, "The three planned to act in the name of the Earth Liberation Front, a shadowy group of environmental activists, investigators said. However, the FBI infiltrated the group with an undercover informant."

Bush Views "United 93" With Families Of Flight's Passengers, Crew. The Washington Post (5/31, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column that President Bush and the First Lady viewed the movie United 93 in the White House family theater last night. They were joined by "relatives of many of the 40 passengers and crew who died on the hijacked flight nearly five years ago. This is the first time the president has seen the harrowing film, which dramatizes the struggle to retake the plane from terrorists aimed at the Capitol or White House."

Chertoff Assesses Hurricane Preparedness In New Orleans. CNN's Situation Room (5/30, Meserve) reported that DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff visited New Orleans "to satisfy himself that everything that can be done has been done to protect this city if another big hurricane hits." Secretary Chertoff was shown giving his name for a mock evacuation and riding on a bus as he "played evacuee, getting a firsthand taste of what will happen if there is another evacuation of New Orleans." CNN added, "New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin is among those meeting and briefing Chertoff. Nagin brings to the secretary a concern of his own. The regional transit authority will run out of money the very month hurricane season starts. … Chertoff says the federal government will come up with the money to keep drivers on the job if it has to. Chertoff gives a good grade to the city's evacuation plan, but he says all of the efforts of local, state and federal governments could be undercut if citizens refuse to leave when they are told to."

The AP (5/30, McConnaughey) reported Secretary Chertoff, who visited Touro Infirmary along with FEMA Director R. David Paulison, said his visit gave him "a tangible feel for what not only what the challenges are but also what steps the city has taken to prepare itself for a hurricane this time." Though he "said the federal government has made arrangements for about 3,000 buses to help with evacuations if needed," Chertoff said "there seemed to be more shelter spaces available" last year. "However, the state actually has identified more shelter space than it used last year — excluding the Superdome, which will not be available, said Cleo Allen, spokeswoman for the state Department of Social Services."

Allen Calls Coast Guard, FEMA Under DHS "Perfect Marriage." In an interview on the Situation Room (5/30, Blitzer), Coast Guard Commandant Thad Allen was asked whether it was "smart" to bring FEMA and the Coast Guard into the Department of Homeland Security. Allen said, "I think this is a perfect marriage of Coast Guard and FEMA in the same department. We prescript mission assignments now, so we're ready to act further in advance than we ever have before. But the joint training between Coast Guard and FEMA people has been extraordinarily useful."

Shuster, Boustany Tour Cameron, Calcasieu Parishes. The Daily Advertiser (5/31, Taylor) reports Reps. Bill Shuster and Charles Boustany "toured Cameron and Calcasieu parishes Tuesday" to view hurricane damage in the area. Shuster, who is sponsoring legislation to remove FEMA from DHS, "said he was surprised to learn that it would cost only $2-4 million to repair a large piece of levee in southwest Louisiana and the federal money has not been sent. 'In Washington numbers, that's peanuts,' Shuster said. The money, he said, is probably tied up in federal bureaucracy."

Hurricane-Prone States Hope Efforts To Scare Residents Will Prompt Preparedness. Under the headline "As Hurricane Season Looms, States Aim To Scare," the New York Times (5/31, Goodnough, 1.19M) reports many "officials in hurricane-prone states are trumpeting dire warnings" in advance of this year's hurricane season, aiming, "it seems, …to scare the multitudes of people who emergency officials say remain blasé even after last year's record-breaking storm season." The Florida Division of Emergency Management, for example, "is broadcasting public service announcements with recordings of 911 calls placed during Hurricane Ivan in 2004." The Times continues with quotes from "unfazed" residents, including Jimmy Austin, of Nags Head, North Carolina, who said he "sees no need for special precautions."

Federal Judge In Houston Won't Issue Restraining Order To Continue FEMA Housing. The New York Times (5/31, Goodman, 1.19M) reports a federal judge in Houston, David Hittner, has "declined to issue a temporary restraining order that would force the Federal Emergency Management Agency to continue financing its rental-assistance housing program for Hurricane Katrina evacuees." Hittner found that "lawyers representing evacuees against the agency had failed to meet all four conditions required by law to compel a restraining order." The Times adds, "Many evacuees were told that their assistance would end today, while some in cities like Houston and Dallas had been granted extensions until June 30."

Long Island Insurance Market Shows Signs Of Hurricane Fears. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, B1, Pleven, 2.11M) reports that "with the ever-present threat that a mammoth storm could deviate from recent patterns" and strike Long Island, "the insurance market here is showing glimmers of the kind of fragility that has plagued places like Florida." The situation in Long Beach, where "finding any hurricane coverage at all is getting harder and more expensive," is an example of "how the insurance industry has intensified efforts to limit its exposure in the Northeast." Meanwhile, "In Long Beach, only about 40% of households are covered by the federally backed flood-insurance program," which is "a much lower percentage than in much of New Orleans at the time of Hurricane Katrina."

Insurance Executive Says Residents In Catastrophe-Prone Areas Should Assume Risk. Edmund F. Kelly, chairman, president and CEO of Liberty Mutual, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (5/31, A12, 2.11M) writes that while "calls for the federal government to expand its role in providing insurance for those who build or live in catastrophe-prone areas" will "likely…grow louder" with the start of hurricane season, "reasons this is a bad idea should be obvious. People who willingly and knowingly live in catastrophe-prone areas should assume the risk, and pay the cost, of doing so; government-subsidized insurance just loads this risk, and cost, on average taxpayers. And what proponents of a greater role for the government don't like to discuss is that the Federal Flood Program has a $20 billion deficit -- and has notably failed to meet its original purpose of encouraging people to rebuild away from areas vulnerable to devastating coastal storms." Kelly suggests "stronger building codes to make homes and other structures less susceptible to severe storms" and regulatory processes that would "allow insurance pricing to better reflect risks."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Learned From Press About Haditha Incident. The AP (5/30) reports, "President Bush learned of reports that U.S. Marines killed two dozen unarmed Iraqi civilians only after reporters began asking questions, the White House said Tuesday." Press secretary Tony Snow said Bush learned from a Time reporter. The article quotes the version alleged by war critic Rep. John Murtha (D-PA), namely that "Marines then shot and killed unarmed civilians in a taxi at the scene and went into homes and shot other people."

ABC News Nightline (5/30, Karl) reported, Bush "was briefed by his national security adviser on what happened, shortly after 'Time' started asking questions. Press secretary, Tony Snow, says the President has taken a personal interest in the story." Snow: "I think anybody who has heard the story has a personal interest in it. It's impossible not to. But the president is also allowing the chain of command to do what it's supposed to do, through the department of defense, which is to complete an investigation." And House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter said, "Justice will occur here. And it's important when the marines brief me, we agreed that we should let the chips fall where they may. This should be a tough, effective, aggressive investigation."

Meanwhile, the CBS Evening News (5/30, story 4, 0:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The White House pledged today that the public will be told everything Pentagon investigators learn about reports that US Marines in Iraq killed two dozen unarmed civilians last November."

Probe May "Already Be Compromised." ABC News Nightline (5/30, Moran) called the investigation into allegations that Marines killed 24 civilians in Haditha perhaps "the most important criminal investigation in the US military since the My Lai massacre in Vietnam. And it may already be compromised." The probe "is running into serious trouble. Too much time has passed since the killings. And not enough evidence remains." The investigation is characterized as being taken seriously at the "highest level."

Iraqi Prime Minister Wants Investigation Expedited. NBC Nightly News (5/30, story 3, 4:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki yesterday addressed the deaths of 24 civilians in Haditha, reportedly at the hands of US Marines, saying "his patience here is wearing thin. Military forces, he said, must respect human rights and innocent Iraqis cannot be killed by mistake."

Military Inquiry Refuted Haditha Marines' Claims. The New York Times (5/31, Schmitt and Cloud, 1.19M) reports, "A military investigator uncovered evidence in February and March that contradicted repeated claims by marines that Iraqi civilians killed in Haditha last November were victims of a roadside bomb, according to a senior military official in Iraq." Such evidence included gunshot wounds to the heads and chests of the victims. That investigator also reviewed compensation paid shortly afterward to the victims.

Officers Not Target Of Haditha Investigation. The AP (5/30, Watkins) reports, "Three officers relieved of command from a Marine battalion are not targets of investigations into whether their troops killed as many as two dozen Iraqi civilians and tried to cover it up, the attorney for one of the officers said Tuesday." The article names the three officers as Capt. James Kimber, Lt. Col. Jeffrey Chessani, and Capt. Lucas McConnell. It extensively quotes attorney Paul Hackett, Kimber's counsel, in defense of his client. CNN's The Situation Room (5/30, McIntyre) reported, "In anticipation of the idea that charges will be filed against Marines in the weeks or perhaps even months ahead, some of those Marines are talking to defense attorneys. And we're talking to those attorneys. They're painting a slightly different picture of what may have happened in Haditha that day, including accounts of a firefight that was nearby, even if it wasn't at the scene where the killings took place."

Murtha Urges More Openness. Rep. John Murtha was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (5/30) was asked about his suggestion that there was a cover-up of the Haditha incident. Murtha said, "What I worry about is that this happened six months ago. And nothing -- you heard nothing about it. As a matter of fact, the original story was that an IED killed these 15 people. It became very confusing to the public. TIME magazine came out with an article, and they still tried to cover it up. Now, there were payments made to victims, which aren't made unless we kill them, one way or the other. And, secondly, they knew about it the day afterwards. So, there's no excuse for not having this be more open and know exactly what -- and the longer it goes, the worse it is for us, because it looks like it's the policy of our troops to do something like this."

Haditha Allegations Said To Undercut US Efforts In Iraq. USA Today (5/31, Johnson, 2.31M) writes, "Allegations that Marines killed civilians in the western Iraqi town of Haditha last year could undo efforts to win the cooperation of locals in the volatile Anbar province, some Marines say." The article notes, "The allegations also highlight the rapid life-and-death decisions that soldiers and Marines make in the shadowy world of guerrilla warfare," often very young ones. CNN's The Situation Room (5/30, Malveaux) reported that "officials worry the scandal of Abu Ghraib may pale in comparison to what military investigators uncover out of the western Iraqi city of Haditha. Pentagon sources say they suspect a small group of Marines massacred several dozen Iraqi citizens last November in retaliation for a killing of one of their own. The administration is now bracing itself for another potential crisis. … White House officials are urging everyone not to jump to conclusions or rush to judgment when it comes to the investigation." NPR's All Things Considered (5/30, Bowman) reported the USMC paid at least $38,000 to the families of those killed in Haditha.

WPost Says US Must Be "Accountable." The Washington Post (5/31, 744K) editorializes on the alleged Haditha massacre, "There is no way to mitigate or excuse such despicable acts if they occurred, and hardly any way to alleviate the tremendous damage that will be done to U.S. honor in Iraq and around the world. The only remediation can come through a thorough investigation, the full disclosure of all misconduct and accountability for all those responsible." The Los Angeles Times (5/31, 958K) editorializes, "First things first. If Marines 'avenged' the killing of a comrade by terrorizing and killing innocent Iraqis, they disgraced their uniform and must be punished. The same is true of anyone higher in the chain of command who helped conceal what happened on Nov. 19, 2005, in Haditha in western Iraq." It concludes, "No amount of fog, and no level of confusion, can obscure the fact that this is a nation of laws, and when the U.S. condones the deliberate murder of civilians it becomes, as Murtha said, no better than its enemy."

Batiste Blames Rumsfeld For Haditha, Abu Ghraib. Retired Army Maj. Gen. John Batiste appeared on MSNBC's Hardball (5/30, 7:16 p.m.) and repeated his call for Secretary Rumsfeld's resignation, saying, "There's one man in charge of an organization, in this case, the Department of Defense, and he is responsible for what happens or what fails to happen under his watch." Batiste went on to say that the "alleged atrocity in Haditha…the whole national disgrace of Abu Ghraib and I think the chaos over the last three years can be traced directly back to our Secretary of Defense."

New Iraqi Envoy Presents Credentials To Bush. The Washington Times (5/31, Dinan, 90K) reports, "Iraq's ambassador to the United States presented his credentials to President Bush yesterday and said the president was right in saying terrorists cannot stop Iraq from forming a free and democratic country." Although the appointment of a new envoy by Iraq's government was "good news" for President Bush, "Mr. Sumaidaie's personal story could be bad news for the White House. Last year, he accused Marines of killing his 21-year-old cousin, a civilian who was home from school visiting his family in Haditha. Although not directly related, the incident raises the same issues being investigated by Marines and the Defense Department after reports of dozens of Iraqis killed on Nov. 19 in Haditha, a city in western Iraq." CNN's The Situation Room (5/30, Blitzer) reported, "At the White House today President Bush told Iraq's new ambassador to the US that he's impressed by the new leaders in Baghdad. But he also acknowledged difficult times including the mounting death toll for US troops in Iraq." CNN (Malveaux) added, "The Bush Administration is certainly hoping that this new permanent Iraqi government can turn things around. They are counting on it essentially to take on the terrorists and the insurgents. It's been some ten days since the installation of that new government and already bloody battles. Already a renewed sense here at the White House the need to be upbeat."

White House Officials Say Bush's Candor On Iraq Mistakes Surprised Them. The White House Bulletin/US News (5/30) reported, "New details are emerging about President Bush's admission of mistakes in handling the Iraq war last week. White House officials say they were as surprised as everyone else when Bush expressed regrets for his tough-guy rhetoric leading up to the Iraq war." They "note that Bush has been asked essentially the same question -- what were his biggest mistakes regarding the Iraq conflict -- many times over the years and has always declined to answer in a full and comprehensive way. This time, at a joint news conference with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Bush was asked the same question by a British journalist. The President suddenly turned introspective and expressed misgivings about some of his macho rhetoric, such as his challenging Iraqi insurgents to 'bring it on.'" A senior Bush adviser tells US News and the Bulletin: "It was an extraordinary moment for us. Ironically, even though it was asked before, it was the least expected question" because Bush had brushed it off so often in the past. The Bulletin adds, "Why the surge of candor at that moment? Bush advisers say that Laura and Rove had been urging him for a while to soften his image and be more accommodating to his critics. But they also say the President has felt this way for a long time and simply felt it was time to reveal himself publicly."

Car Bombs Ravage Iraq As Violence Hits New High. The AP (5/31) writes, "Two car bombs killed dozens of people in Shiite Muslim areas of Iraq on Tuesday, part of a wave of attacks that left at least 54 people dead and 120 wounded on one of the bloodiest days in recent weeks. Iraqi officials told the Associated Press that a suspected terrorist who had confessed to taking part in hundreds of beheadings was captured in a raid that also netted documents, cellphones and computers with information on other wanted men."

The Washington Post (5/31, Hernandez and al-Izzi, 744K) reports, "In an indicator of rising violence, more 'multiple-fatality' bombings -- involving at least three deaths -- occurred this month than in any other since the war began in 2003, according to the Brookings Institution, which issues a twice-weekly report of security and reconstruction statistics. The report this week noted 44 such bombings as of May 25; since then, that number has risen above 50. The next-worst month was September 2005, with 46." According to the Post, "U.S. commanders have warned for weeks that the country's Sunni Arab insurgent movement, which they say is led by the group al-Qaeda in Iraq, would unleash an all-out offensive to weaken the new government's authority and stoke hatred between Sunni and Shiite Muslims." The Post notes a peculiar twist in the Saddam Hussein trial: "Two of the three defense witnesses who testified on Hussein's role in the alleged execution of 148 Iraqi Shiites in retaliation for an attempt on his life in the town of Dujail in 1982 testified that at least 23 of the people sentenced to death were still alive." The violence-filled day was the lead on each of the networks last night.

ABC World News Tonight (5/30, lead story, 2:40, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "The attacks came exactly one year after Vice President Cheney had this to say about the insurgency in Iraq." Vice President Cheney: "The level of activity that we see today from a military standpoint, I think, will clearly decline. I think they're in the last throes, if you will, of the insurgency." Karl: "But a new Pentagon assessment today says the insurgency has gotten deadlier." Military officials "blame the long delay on forming a new Iraqi government for the violence."

The CBS Evening News (5/30, lead story, 2:35, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Today was one of the worst in a long time. An American soldier was killed as a string of bombings left 54 people dead and more than 120 wounded." CBS (Martin) added, "Average weekly attacks on Americans and Iraqis, more than 600 a week, the highest level ever. Average daily casualties, that's killed and wounded, American troops down from 25 two years ago to about 15. But Iraqis, both civilian and military, way up, from 30 to nearly 80. The report also shows signs of progress, such as areas where Iraqi security forces are take the lead in the fighting: None at the start of last year, 30,000 square miles today."

NBC Nightly News (5/30, lead story, 3:15, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported the Pentagon's "own report released today which shows that violence in Iraq is on the rise and that more than half of Iraqis believe the security situation there has only gotten worse. Violence raged seemingly unabated throughout Iraq today."

1,500 US Troops To Reinforce Anbar. The New York Times (5/31, Oppel, 1.19M) writes pointedly, "One year after Vice President Dick Cheney predicted that the Iraqi insurgency was in its 'last throes,' the United States military said it had had to reassign 1,500 troops from Kuwait to Anbar Province. The move comes amid growing signs that much of the region is under the control of insurgent groups, including the terrorist organization of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. He and other jihadists have spoken of creating a caliphate that would be a shelter for radical Sunni groups." The Times added, "The inability to find nominees acceptable to the Shiite, Kurdish, Sunni Arab and secular members of Mr. Maliki's coalition continues to underscore how fragile the new government is in the face of a resilient insurgency."

Fox News (5/30, 7:05 p.m.) reported, "About 1,500 US soldiers have moved from Kuwait to Iraq. This is the second time since March that soldiers on stand-by in Kuwait have been sent into Iraq. Their assignment: a terrorist hotbed stretching from west of Baghdad to the Syrian border." CNN Headline News (5/30, 11:43 a.m.) reported the Second Brigade First Armored Division troops "follow some 750 troops who were already sent again from that brigade held in reserve in Kuwait, who were sent to Baghdad in March. They are still there. The Pentagon is not saying how long these 1,500 troops will remain in al Anbar province."

The CBS Evening News (5/30, lead story, 2:35, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "1500 more combat troops have been ordered into western Iraq in an attempt to establish some semblance of government control. It is the second time this year the American commander, General George Casey, has called in reinforcements. In March, 700 troops were sent into Baghdad to help hold down sectarian violence. They were supposed to remain 30 days, but they are still there."

NBC Nightly News (5/30, lead story, 3:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Fifteen hundred US troops are being flown from Kuwait to the Al Anbar province of Iraq, where a lot of this violence has been centered." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "This latest increase in violence could delay the withdrawal of any significant numbers of American forces from Iraq."

Violence Escalation Likely Has Derailed Pullout Plans. The Los Angeles Times (5/31, Roug and Spiegel, 958K) writes, "The Pentagon's hopes to make substantial reductions in U.S. troop levels in Iraq this year appear to be fading as a result of resurgent violence in the nation, particularly in the Sunni Arab stronghold of Anbar province, military officials acknowledge." The violence appears to have dashed hopes of "substantial U.S. troop reductions, from more than 130,000 now to 100,000 or less." However, "military officials say the deployment of new troops to Al Anbar is not a prelude to an offensive like the one launched in 2004 on Fallouja, which had become a haven for rebels."

Zakaria Says Iraq Needs Political Solution. In the Washington Post (5/31, 744K), Fareed Zakaria writes that standing up an Iraqi military is not the answer to the country's problems; rather, "the reality is that only an effective political bargain will bring about order. There needs to be a deal that gives all three communities strong incentives to cooperate rather than be spoilers." He says the new prime minister has two major challenges: "weakening the insurgency and disbanding sectarian militias. Neither can be done purely militarily."

Pentagon Says Insurgency Likely Will Be Strong Until 2007. The Copley News Service (5/30, Kreisher) reports, "Iraq in the last three months had the highest level of attacks of any similar previous period, while casualties among Iraqis soared, the Pentagon reported Tuesday." It contrasts that grim statistic with Asst. Secretary Rodman's emphasis on "political progress" in the form of a "permanent government." Copley adds, "With its comparatively thin population, Anbar had the highest rate of violent attacks per capita during the reporting period …The report said 63 Iraqi army battalions 'have the lead for security responsibility' in their assigned areas." However, Copley mentions that the report does not say how many Iraqi battalions can operate independently, a change of practice from its predecessor, which stated that none could.

The AP (5/31, Burns) writes, "The report to Congress offered a relatively dim picture of economic progress, with few gains in improving basic services like electricity, and it provided no promise of U.S. troop reductions anytime soon. On the other hand, it said the Iraqi Army was gaining strength and taking lead responsibility for security in more areas." It says, "The U.S. government has struggled for three years to understand the insurgency in Iraq, which began in the Sunni Triangle west and north of Baghdad." It states of likely insurgent strength, "The Sunni Arab heart of the Iraqi insurgency seems likely to hold its strength for the rest of this year, and some of its leaders are now collaborating with Al Qaeda terrorists, the Pentagon said Tuesday."

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (5/31, Scarborough, 90K) states more optimistically the Pentagon's view "that a key element of the Iraq insurgency will maintain its level of violence this year, but then begin to weaken in 2007." It notes the Pentagon Iraq report's contention that "U.S. commanders are methodically turning over more territory to the ISF and putting them in the lead in counterinsurgency operations. More than half of all operations in Baghdad, one of the country's most violence-prone provinces, are being led by Iraqis."

Pentagon Classifies Number Of Independent Iraqi Battalions. UPI (5/30) reports, "The Pentagon has newly classified the number of Iraqi army battalions that are fully independent in its latest public report on conditions in Iraq." The classification comes after the Pentagon said in its last previous report that "zero" Iraqi battalions were "capable of full independence." UPI writes, "The fact that there have been zero fully independent Iraqi battalions in Iraq after three years of occupation, nearly $300 billion and the training of a new army, has been cited by critics of the war as evidence that progress has not been made." However, Lt. Gen. Gene Renuart "said there has been a significant increase in fully independent units. [Assistant Secretary] Rodman said the number 'fluctuates for different kinds of reasons' but called it a 'good increase.'" The Financial Times (5/31, Sevastopoulo) does not report this new classification but quotes the Pentagon as asserting that "the number of Iraqi soldiers and police who had completed their training had risen to 263,400, an increase of 36,100 from three months ago. It said the Iraqi ministries of defence and interior were on track to complete initial training targets by the end of this year." The FT notes of the Pentagon public report that "it said Anbar had the highest number of daily attacks per capita over the past three months."

Media Reassess Iraq TV Assignments After CBS Deaths. The New York Times (5/31, Carter, 1.19M) reports, "The roadside blast in Baghdad on Monday that killed two CBS News crew members and seriously wounded a third has deepened concerns among television network executives about the risks their crews face trying to cover the Iraq war, some arguing that television reporters may be even more exposed than those in print journalism." Executives fear that "the risks are even greater for television personnel because of the equipment they must carry — including cameras that are sometimes mistaken for weapons — and how visible they must be to convey the story."

Dowd Points Out Risks Taken By Journalists. In the New York Times (5/31, 1.19M), Maureen Dowd argues that journalists in Iraq face risks that conservative pundits understate. She writes that, despite conservative scorn about alleged timidity by journalists, "Now two network personalities — Ms. Dozier and Bob Woodruff — have been severely injured by roadside bombs while embedded with the military, trying to do the sort of stories the administration wants." She also denounces the anonymity of military and Iraqi casualties, unlike the publicity that journalists receive when they are attacked: "The administration tries to play down any sense of individual loss; the president has not attended a single funeral, and the government banned pictures of [troops'] returning coffins. The Iraqi civilians who die don't even get their names in the small print."

Wounded CBS Correspondent Transported To US Military Hospital In Germany. Injured CBS reporter Kimberly Dozier was transported to Landstuhl military hospital in Germany, where she was reported to be in critical but stable condition with injuries to her head and legs. The story was reported in full segments on both CBS and NBC, while ABC ran a brief. The CBS Evening News (5/30, story 2, 3:05, MacVicar, 7.66M) reported, "Kimberly is in intensive care. She had surgery twice yesterday on injuries to her legs and on her head to remove shrapnel from her skull. She was able to wiggle her toes as she was admitted. Tonight, she remains sedated and faces more surgery."

NBC Nightly News (5/30, story 2, 2:40, Maceda, 9.87M) reported, "Dozier's camera crew, Britons Paul Douglas and Jim Brolan, were killed by the same roadside bomb while embedded with the US Army in Baghdad. In underscores yet again the danger journalists face here on a daily basis, even the most seasoned and cautious, like Dozier." According to "the Committee to Protect Journalists, 71 journalists have died covering the war in Iraq, surpassing the number killed in World War II, Korea, and Vietnam, 3/4 of them Iraqis, who often can't afford expensive, around-the-clock protection."

ABC World News Tonight (5/30, story 2, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The commander of the Landstuhl military hospital in Germany says Dozier is in critical but stable condition, with serious injuries to her head and legs."

"CASH" Military Trauma Hospital Profiled. The CBS Evening News (5/30, story 3, 2:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "To understand why Kimberly Dozier is alive tonight, we want to show you now how the team works that springs into action every time an American is seriously wounded in Iraq." CBS (Palmer) added, "Thanks to the trauma team at Baghdad's Ibn Sina military hospital, Kimberly Dozier is alive." Capt. David Steinbruner, trauma specialist, Ibn Sina Hospital: "She had a very powerful will to live." Palmer: "But Dr. David Steinbruner, who treated her, admits the outcome could have been very different." Dr. Steinbruner: "She was tough. She was near death when she first came in." Palmer: "It's at centers like this where life is often restored. Doctors here say once upon a time they were called MASH units. Now, they're called a 'CASH' -- short for 'combat support hospitals', saving lives with a mixture of sophisticated emergency room technology and old-fashioned heart."

Romney Expresses Optimism About Iraq. Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who has just returned from a trip to Iraq and Afghanistan, was asked on Fox News' Your World with Neil Cavuto (5/30) claims from President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair that the Iraqis are ready to stand up for themselves. Romney said, "It is very difficult to assess what the level of readiness is, but clearly they are more ready every day by virtue of the training that they are undergoing. And the assessment on the part of their new prime minister with the new unity government he's formed that he believes they will be ready within 18 months to take the primary responsibility for security, that is very encouraging. I think that is possible, if he says it is." Romney added, "I actually think that at this stage the prospects for a positive outcome are more real than they have been in sometime."

Brake Failure Caused Crash That Sparked Kabul Riots. The AP (5/31) reports a US military spokesman said Tuesday that this week's crash of a US military truck that sparked Monday's riots in Kabul occurred because the truck's brakes "'apparently overheated and failed' as it came down the long hill." He said that "[t]he truck hit several unoccupied parked cars in an effort to slow down, but the truck hit occupied vehicles at an intersection anyway." Kabul's police chief said that the "toll from Monday's rioting in Kabul rose to 12 dead and 138 injured."

The New York Times (5/31, Gall, 1.19M) reports that although "Kabul residents placed blame for Monday's rioting on young hoodlums and criminal gangs," "they also criticized the American military for its arrogance, saying military vehicles frequently crush civilian cars, and they doubted that the government or the military would conduct an honest investigation of the incident." The Times also reports many in Kabul, "including Western diplomats and aid workers, said the protests appeared spontaneous and were aggravated by frustration with joblessness and the slow pace of reconstruction." US Ambassador Ronald E. Neumann "promised compensation for the victims and a full investigation."

The Washington Post (5/31, A10, Constable, 744K) reports "Afghan army troops blanketed the capital Tuesday," but foreign peacekeepers "kept off the streets, out of concern their presence would ignite new violence." Many in Kabul "remained angry both at the rioters and U.S. troops, and worried about permanent damage to the country's faltering democracy, economy and relations with the outside world." A spokesman for the International Security Assistance Force "said it had been ready to help restore order Monday but that the Afghan authorities had asked the force not to do so." The Post reports, "Numerous witnesses said some rioters were older men who gave orders, carried AK-47 assault rifles and wore the dress of former anti-Soviet militia fighters whose political leaders oppose Karzai."

Reporter Who Witnessed Riots Says Mobs Were Incited By Agitators. In a web-exclusive commentary, Newsweek (5/30) reporter Joe Cochrane, who was caught amid Monday's riots, said the "roaming gangs of rioters" were clearly "incited by agitators." Cochrane writes, "While television images of the riots looked shocking, they should be kept in perspective. Less than 1,000 of Kabul's 4 million residents joined in the madness, many of them street thugs or unemployed youths with nothing better to do. While Afghans get understandably angry when local residents are killed during U.S. military operations or during car accidents involving troops, the majority still seems to want them protecting the capital and forcing the Taliban to hide in the mountains."

Growing Rich-Poor Gap Said To Be At Root Of Riots. Time (5/30, Morarjee) reports the "growing gap between Afghanistan's haves and have-nots helps explain why a U.S. military convoy accident triggered" Monday's riots. Time reports, "Even before the convoy accident, Western diplomats say many frustrated young men were already looking for a provocation." Aid workers in Kabul "blame the U.S. and other Western military for enflaming anti-Western sentiment, which invariably ends up being vented at the softest targets: the charities." The major agitators of the riots were "young men allied to" the Northern Alliance.

Violence Flares In Northern Afghanistan. The New York Times (5/31, Gall, 1.19M) reports as "calm returned" to Kabul, "violence was reported in northern Afghanistan as three women social workers and their driver, working for the aid agency, ActionAid, on a government program, were shot dead on a village road in the province of Jowzjan." In another northern province, Badakhshan, "two Afghans working for a development organization were killed…and two American citizens traveling in convoy with them were slightly injured" in a roadside explosion. The two attacks "raised concerns that security in the previously peaceful north is also deteriorating."

USA Today Says Afghanistan Beginning To Resemble Iraq. An editorial in the USA Today (5/31, 2.31M) says the riots reveal the "disturbing truth" that "Afghanistan is increasingly beginning to resemble" the war in Iraq. The paper says that while international help to Afghanistan is encouraging, "far more is needed — from putting greater pressure on Pakistan to close down Taliban refuges, to winning popular support along with military victories. That might require more troops. It certainly requires sustained attention and aid. It is dismaying to consider how much better the situation in Afghanistan might be, and whether bin Laden would still be at large, had the Bush administration not diverted resources to its misbegotten adventure in Iraq."

DOJ:

California Child Porn Investigators Honored. The Contra Costa Times (5/31, Doyle) reports, "Even monsters get scared and lonely. Sometimes, they just need someone to talk to. … Mike Prado will listen, sympathetically. And then, when he has asked his questions, the Fresno-based federal investigator seizes the confessions and sends admitted child molesters off to federal prison for a very long time." The Times continues, "Now, the achievements of this 30-year-old Immigration and Customs Enforcement special agent have secured national recognition. Prado and his partner, Fresno County sheriff's detective Kevin Wiens, joined other top investigators recently in being honored by the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. … In a Capitol Hill ceremony, the organization presented Prado and Wiens with a National Exploited Children's Award. The Justice Department will follow suit later this month, further putting a spotlight on an investigation that is still unfolding." The Times adds, "Starting with one Fresno computer that was crawling with sexual images, Prado and Wiens expanded an investigation that has yielded 30 arrests and 100 suspects. A Pennsylvania man has recently been sentenced to prison in the case, and former Clovis girls softball coach Mark McGarry is awaiting resolution of charges of possessing and distributing child pornography."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

McAfee Fires General Counsel Amid Widening Stock-Option Probe. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Hechinger) reports, "The board of McAfee Inc. fired its general counsel after an internal review of stock-options granting practices, marking another casualty amid a widening government probe that now involves at least 20 companies." The Journal continues, "The termination at McAfee brings to nearly a dozen the number of executives and directors, at five different companies, who have lost their jobs in recent weeks amid government and company investigations of the timing of option grants to senior corporate officials. … The Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission are both examining McAfee, a Santa Clara, Calif., maker of computer security software, for possible options irregularities. At least 20 companies are facing similar scrutiny from one or both of the two authorities."

The AP (5/31, Liedtke) reports, "The Santa Clara, Calif.-based maker of antivirus software linked Kent Roberts' ouster to a stock option incident that occurred six years ago. McAfee described the episode as improper without providing specifics. … McAfee is among a widening group of publicly held companies examining whether insiders manipulated the timing of stock option grants to increase the likelihood that management would reap huge windfalls. On Tuesday, Rambus Inc., a developer of high-speed computer chip interfaces, joined that group of companies, launching an internal investigation into how officials doled out stock options in 2003 and before. … Under the practice, the options are backdated to an ebb in a company's stock price instead of pegging the exercise price to the prevailing market value at the time of the award."

The California Recorder (5/31, Pasternak, Scheck) reports, "Nationwide, about two dozen companies so far have been approached by the government in connection with backdated options grants. The scandal is fueling anxiety among audit committee members and in-house lawyers, with companies launching internal investigations into their options programs or preparing responses to government inquiries. … Brewing in the background is a possible tussle between federal prosecutors in the Manhattan, Brooklyn and San Francisco U.S. Attorney's Offices, all of which have been involved in probing companies thus far."

USAToday Decries Practice Of Backdating Stock Options. An editorial in USA Today (5/31) says, "The Securities and Exchange Commission, Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service are investigating the practice of backdating stock-option grants to senior corporate executives. … If these inquiries confirm that backdating is widespread, it would serve as yet another troubling example of how shareholders are being fleeced. It would also show how a benefit designed to attract, reward and retain talented employees is being perverted. Given the creative ways corporate executives have enriched themselves in recent years, perhaps this practice should come as no surprise. Even so, its blatant nature is mind-boggling."

Firms Changing Rules On Company Stock In 401(k) Plans. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Opdyke) reports, "Facing a slew of worker lawsuits, companies increasingly are limiting how much of their stock can be held in employee 401(k) retirement plans." The Journal continues, "Company stock in 401(k)s is still widespread, despite the lessons of Enron Corp., whose 2001 collapse depleted the retirement savings of thousands of employees. Many companies use stock to match employee contributions to retirement plans, and workers often are barred from selling the stock for many years. Some workers also buy the stock to participate in their company's growth, or because they aren't sure where else to invest. … But dozens of lawsuits since Enron have highlighted companies' legal liability when their stock declines in value, a development that also has helped to drive up insurance costs." The Journal adds, "Last month, Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. notified employees that the drug maker will no longer contribute company stock to its 401(k) plan, starting July 1. Instead, company contributions will go into a money-market fund run by Fidelity Investments. Health insurer Cigna Corp. last fall began allowing workers to immediately roll out of company stock and into one of 22 other options in the 401(k) plan, including mutual funds. Previously, Cigna employees had to keep their shares until they either left the company or reached age 55. … Some companies are banishing their stock from retirement plans altogether. Too Inc., parent of nationwide specialty retailer Limited Too, required its employees to sell any company stock they held in their 401(k) plan by last fall."

DOJ's Use Of Deferred-Prosecution Deals Sparks Debate. USA Today (5/31, Iwata) reports, "The legal debate over the Justice Department's aggressive prosecution of businesses has been reignited after the recent indictment of securities class-action law firm Milberg Weiss, plus an ongoing court battle between prosecutors and former KPMG executives indicted on fraud charges." USA continues, "Milberg Weiss is the first business to be prosecuted by the federal government since Arthur Andersen, the former accounting firm and Enron auditor that died even though its obstruction-of-justice conviction was overturned last year by the Supreme Court." USA adds, "In the KPMG case, 16 former executives believe their constitutional rights to legal counsel and fair trial were violated when prosecutors forced KPMG to stop paying their legal fees as part of the firm's agreement with the government to escape prosecution, according to court filings. … As the Justice Department intensified its crackdown on corporate crime in the post-Enron era, a growing number of defense lawyers and business groups have accused it of prosecutorial overkill. … Prosecutors, encouraged by the so-called Holder and Thompson memorandums in 1999 and 2003, respectively, that set Justice Department criteria for going after 'business organizations,' are compelling more businesses to cooperate with investigations and sign 'deferred-prosecution agreements' and "no prosecution" deals — or risk being indicted. … Since the Justice Department's corporate fraud task force was formed four years ago, prosecutors have signed 'a couple dozen' deferred-prosecution agreements with business entities, says department spokesman Bryan Sierra. … That's twice as many as in the 10 years before the corporate fraud task force was created, says Andrew Weissmann, who prosecuted Arthur Andersen as a member of the Enron Task Force. … Weissmann, who also prosecuted drug gangs and Mafia defendants in New York, says the Justice Department is addicted to using deferred-prosecution deals 'like crack cocaine.' … 'As the department gets more experienced at deferred-prosecution agreements and realize they have more leverage,' Weissmann predicts, 'you're going to see more and more draconian agreements.'"

Former US Attorney Helps Corporations About Fraud. The San Diego Business Journal (5/29, Broderick) reports, "The post-Enron scrutiny on businesses might not be making them more honest, but many of them are taking great pains to police themselves, sniffing out trouble before it morphs into a major scandal. … Giving them a seasoned hand is former U.S. Attorney Chuck La Bella, now in private practice in Downtown San Diego and specializing in white-collar crime, and other high-stakes litigation involving the likes of the Securities and Exchange Commission." The Journal continues, "Most recently, La Bella has been representing Barry Weinbaum, a former chief executive officer of Alvarado Hospital Medical Center, in the lengthy kickback scandal that recently reached a settlement with current U.S. Attorney Carol Lam. … His firm also represented Peregrine Systems Inc. before the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department over charges involving accounting irregularities and securities fraud. In 2003, Peregrine, without admitting or denying the charges, agreed to a wide-ranging settlement. … 'Post-Enron, the country has become more sensitive to corporate actions and actions of the corporate executives,' said La Bella, 55, a partner in La Bella & McNamara, LLP in Downtown San Diego. 'We are now looking more closely at each and every action and transaction and mistake. Companies make mistakes all the time. … People make mistakes, and not every mistake should be elevated to the level of an SEC, U.S. attorney or district attorney investigation. There are mistakes that bear scrutiny by them, but the pendulum is starting to swing back a little bit.'"

Corporate Spycatchers Frustrated By Government Treatment Of Trade Secrets. The National Law Journal (5/31, Maclean) reports, "In 1997, the FBI videotaped the chairman of a Taiwanese company, Four Pillars Enterprise Co., in an Ohio hotel accepting secret documents about Avery Dennison Corp.'s formulas for its adhesive products. Agents watched as he cut the company's confidential markings off the papers and then discussed what an Avery scientist should steal next, according to court records." The Journal continues, "Four years later, FBI agents at San Francisco International Airport surrounded two Chinese engineers bound for China carrying satchels allegedly packed with trade secrets from four Silicon Valley firms detailing the manufacture of microprocessors. … And in 2003, the U.S. Department of Justice indicted two managers for the Boeing Co.'s rocket launch vehicle system used to carry commercial and military satellites into space. The government alleges that one Boeing manager recruited a Lockheed Martin Corp. engineer to bring secret Lockheed documents to Boeing in exchange for a better job at higher pay." The Journal adds, "The criminal trial is set for June, but disclosure cost Boeing a $1 billion Air Force contract. U.S. v. Branch, No. CR03-715RSWL (C.D. Calif.). … 'Economic espionage is huge and it is not going away,' said Steven Fink, observing the trend as president of the crisis management firm Lexicon Communications Corp. in Pasadena, Calif. … Yet victimized companies remain reticent to come forward, fearing prosecution would expose their trade secrets and damage their corporate image. … The companies 'have been appalled at the cavalier way [the FBI and federal prosecutors] handled their trade secrets,' Fink said. 'They feel they are more at risk for getting trade secrets exposed by coming forward than just sweeping it under the rug.'"

USA Today Says Accusations Against Fannie Mae Executives Are Damning. An editorial in USA Today (5/31, 2.31M) says a report from government officials says Fannie Mae "engaged in 'extensive financial fraud' by doctoring earnings so…executives could earn 'unjustified levels of compensation.'" USA adds, "These are extraordinarily damning assertions. They show a company whose top executives were contemptuous of criticism and imbued with a sense of entitlement to enrich." USA adds, "The report on Fannie Mae was accompanied by a $400 million settlement with the government. Federal agencies are still evaluating whether to bring civil or criminal charges against individuals. These are not pleasant things to contemplate. But they are the facts."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Defends Jefferson Office Search As House Seeks Answers. The Washington Post (5/31, A4, Lengel, Babington) reports, "The Justice Department yesterday vigorously defended the recent weekend raid of Rep. William J. Jefferson's Capitol Hill office as part of a bribery investigation, asserting that the Democratic lawmaker attempted to hide documents from FBI agents while they were searching his New Orleans home last August." The Post continues, "The government questioned in a 34-page motion filed in U.S. District Court here whether it could have obtained all the materials it had sought in a subpoena if it had not launched the surprise raid on Jefferson's congressional office May 20. According to the government filing, an FBI agent caught Jefferson slipping documents into a blue bag in the living room of his New Orleans home during a search. … 'It is my belief that when Congressman Jefferson placed documents into the blue bag, he was attempting to conceal documents that were relevant to the investigation,' FBI agent Stacey E. Kent of New Orleans stated in an affidavit that was part of the government's court submission. The document was filed in response to Jefferson's lawsuit demanding that the government return to him documents seized during the raid on his Capitol Hill office 11 days ago. … Robert P. Trout, Jefferson's attorney, said he would refrain from commenting pending further review of the government's documents. Meanwhile, the recent FBI raid spurred new tensions between Congress and the administration, as a House committee chairman vowed to interrogate top Justice Department officials."

CNN's The Situation Room (5/30, Blitzer) reported, "Justice Department officials rejected Democrat William Jefferson's demand to have all the seized documents returned." CNN (Bash) added that DOJ said "they would allow Jefferson to have copies of everything they took to make sure that nothing that they took was privileged." The Los Angeles Times (5/31, Schmitt, 958K) notes DOJ "proposed a 'procedural accommodation' that would give Jefferson a new chance to challenge whether prosecutors should have the documents. Although it was unclear whether the proposal would be accepted, it was the first significant public concession by the department since the 18-hour search…ignited a political firestorm."

MSNBC (5/31) reports, "Justice Department lawyers said (Tuesday) it will make another concession to Congressman William Jefferson, D-LA, in the fight over the search of Jefferson's Capitol Hill office. … In the latest court filing involving the search, prosecutors say they'll provide Jefferson with copies of everything taken from his office in the weekend raid. Before the FBI agents investigating the corruption case are allowed to see the documents, Jefferson's lawyers will have a chance to urge a judge to exclude any items they consider protected by the Constitution's Speech and Debate clause privilege." MSNBC continues, "'As for the search itself, government lawyers today argued it did not violate the Constitution. They say that Rep. Jefferson's position would extend the Speech and Debate clause's immunity so far that it would make it impossible to search any place that might contain even one privileged document. That should be rejected, they say, because the courts have held that 'the laws of this country allow no place or employment as a sanctuary for crime.'"

Sensenbrenner Vows To Call Gonzales, Mueller As House Panel Criticizes FBI Raid. The House Judiciary Committee yesterday held a hearing about the FBI search of Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office. Chairman James Sensenbrenner – who called the hearing, titled "Reckless Justice: Did the Saturday Night Raid of Congress Trample the Constitution?" – vowed to hold two more sessions and said he will call Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller to testify. ABC World News Tonight (5/30, story 6, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Some in Congress charge the Justice Department had no right -- that congressmen should be immune. Justice Department officials said they had every right, if a congressman might be breaking the law." ABC (Tapper) added, "Some say this battle could go to the Supreme Court, which has already ruled that the separation of power protects only legislative activities, such as a congressman researching or writing a bill." Yale Law Prof. Akhil Amar: "Last time I checked, taking bribes isn't part of ordinary legislative work."

CNN's The Situation Room (5/30, Bash) reported, "We're told that House Speaker Dennis Hastert is preparing to send a letter to the Attorney General this afternoon that says that Justice officials should come up to the Hill next week to meet with the general counsel of the House, to start talks about what kind of procedure they can put in place in case the FBI wants to search a lawmaker's office in the future." At the hearing yesterday, Sensenbrenner said he will call Gonzales and Mueller "to explain why they okayed a raid on a lawmaker's office for the first time in history." The Hill (5/31, O'Connor) notes that "spokesmen for the Judiciary Committee and the Justice Department were unable to conclude by press time whether or not Sensenbrenner had issued formal requests to Gonzales or Mueller to appear."

The New York Times (5/31, Hulse) reports, "The House intends to summon Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Robert S. Mueller III, before the Judiciary Committee to justify its search of a Congressional office, the panel chairman said Tuesday. … The chairman, Representative F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Republican of Wisconsin, called the search 'profoundly disturbing.' … Mr. Sensenbrenner also said he planned a legislative response to the search on May 20 of the office of Representative William J. Jefferson, Democrat of Louisiana. The bill would be patterned on a law limiting searches of news media offices. … 'I think this law will help the Justice Department get it right next time because they didn't get it right this time,' Mr. Sensenbrenner said as his committee heard from legal experts and a former lawmaker." The Times adds, "All four witnesses, appearing Tuesday at an unusual hearing held in a Congressional recess, described the search as a damaging breach of the constitutional separation of powers. They said it warranted an aggressive reaction from Congress, including subpoenaing material from Mr. Gonzales if necessary. … 'This latest use of a search warrant by the executive branch to rummage through the files of a member's office is simply an additional instrument of the Bush administration to cow Congress,' Bruce Fein, a constitutional lawyer, said at the hearing."

USA Today (5/31, 4A, Johnson, 2.31M) adds that DOJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said, "We have a great deal of respect for Congress as a co-equal branch of government. We will continue to meet with members of Congress…about the search and what can be done to alleviate their concerns." At the hearing, former Reagan Associate Deputy Attorney General Bruce Fein "suggested that President Bush should have allowed Gonzales and Mueller to resign or fired them after the pair signaled last week that they would have stepped down if forced to return material seized in…raid."

The Washington Times (5/31, Fagan) reports, "Rep. John Conyers Jr. of Michigan, the panel's top Democrat, called the raid 'sloppy at best but reckless at worse' and joined other Democrats and the American Civil Liberties Union, in saying it's just one of many examples of the Bush administration overreaching. … Hearing witnesses, including law professors and a former House member, said the Justice Department overstepped its bounds. They specifically criticized the department for failing to give House leaders adequate notice or consultation, barring House personnel from being present and searching through congressional files, some of which inevitably contained legislative-related material that, witnesses argued, are protected from use in a prosecution under the constitution's 'speech or debate' clause. … 'The raid on this office represents a profound and almost gratuitous insult to a coequal branch of government,' said George Washington University Law School Professor Jonathan Turley." The Times notes, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse was open to a hearing, but added, 'We also hope that Congress recognizes it would be inappropriate for a federal official to discuss the specific details of an ongoing criminal investigation in a public hearing.'"

The AP (5/31, Kellman) reports, "Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., a loyal White House ally, made his position clear with the title of Tuesday's hearing: 'Reckless Justice: Did the Saturday Night Raid of Congress Trample the Constitution?' … 'The issues involved in this unprecedented action by the executive branch transcend any particular member,' Sensenbrenner said Tuesday." The AP adds, "Democrats said a member of the Bush administration, and not just legal experts, should have been called before the panel to answer for the raid. … 'We've never been told why the search had to be done in the middle of the night,' noted ranking Democrat John Conyers of Michigan. 'We've never learned why the member in question was not permitted to have his attorneys present while his offices were searched for some 18 hours.'" The AP notes, "One witness at the hearing, former Rep. Bob Walker, R-Pa., said Congress should play hardball in seeking answers to its questions by subpoenaing administration documents authorizing the raid. … 'The American people should be deeply concerned that a decision to conduct a raid on Congress was made consciously and evidently at high levels inside the Justice Department and the FBI,' Walker told the panel. … 'If the Rayburn raid was a precedent for coming attractions and intimidating tactics, the way Congress responds initially must be improved.'"

The Minneapolis Star Tribune/AP (5/31, Kellman) reports, "Sensenbrenner said Tuesday he will summon Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller before his House panel to testify about their decision to search a lawmaker's office. … 'I want to have Attorney General Gonzales and FBI Director Mueller up here to tell us how they reached the conclusion they did," said Sensenbrenner, a Wisconsin Republican and one of President Bush's most loyal House allies." The AP adds, 'Gonzales has said that the search of Rep. William Jefferson's offices was legal and necessary because the Louisiana Democrat had not cooperated with investigators' efforts to gain access to evidence in a bribery probe. An affidavit on which the search warrant was based said investigators had found $90,000 stashed in the freezer of Jefferson's house. … 'We would certainly consider a request for a hearing if one were to be made," said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse, 'We also hope that Congress recognizes it would inappropriate for a federal official to discuss the specific details of an ongoing criminal investigation in a public hearing.'"

Milbank Notes Sensenbrenner's Prior Reluctance To Challenge Administration. In his Washington Post (5/31, A2, 744K) "Washington Sketch" column, Dana Milbank writes, "When asked to hold hearings on the rendition and torture of terrorism suspects," Sensenbrenner "respectfully declined. Invited repeatedly to probe the Bush administration's leaking of a CIA operative's identity, the chairman sent his regrets. Urged to have hearings dedicated to the administration's warrantless eavesdropping, Sensenbrenner demurred once more. But when FBI agents searched a congressional office…Sensenbrenner went up to the attic and found his gavel."

Mueller Shows Up For Jury Duty In DC. Newsweek (5/31, Isikoff) reports, "Don't ever accuse Robert Mueller of shirking his civic duty. Smack in the middle of last week's constitutional crisis over the FBI raid of Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office, the conscientous FBI director didn't show up at the office one morning. The reason: he was down at a Washington, D.C., courtroom patiently waiting with other citizens who had been called for jury duty." Newsweek continues, "Much to the surprise of top bureau officials, Mueller didn't immediately get struck for pro-government bias either. Even though he showed up late for his jury duty call on May 25 (he had a valid excuse: he needed to give President Bush his regular morning terrorism briefing), Mueller was processed into the jury pool and made it through the first round of dismissals, according to FBI spokesman John Miller. He was then assigned to a murder case. He even took his seat in the jury box to be questioned in the voir doir process by lawyers in the case. Mueller said he could be 'fair and impartial as to the evidence,' Miller said. 'There were other people eliminated before him.' … But in the end, Mueller—who was accompanied the whole time by his usual security detail—did have a bias problem: in his prior life, after serving as chief of the Justice Department's criminal division during the administration of President George H.W. Bush, Mueller had forsworn a career with a fancy white-collar law firm, in order to join the U.S. attorney's office in Washington, D.C., and prosecute homicide cases. It turned out Mueller had tried cases in front of the judge handling last week's murder case. He also had worked with the prosecutor and police detective involved with the case and knew the defense lawyer, having tried cases against him. 'So, finally at some point, they cut him,' said Miller."

US Pressures Internet Firms Over Data Retention. CNN.com (5/31) reports, "During a meeting last week with some of the nation's leading Internet service companies, the attorney general and the FBI director asked a variety of customer information and other data be kept for two years, much longer than the companies do now, the Justice Department confirmed Tuesday." CNN continues, "Companies have varying policies regarding what information is kept and for how long. … One thing the Justice Department wants is some type of subscriber information, such as the Internet address assigned to a person when logging on to a service provider, two sources familiar with the meeting told CNN." CNN adds, "The online industry is expected to strongly oppose any request to retain these types of records because of privacy concerns for their customers. … 'It is a slippery slope,' one of the sources said of the government's interest in the information. 'It becomes a fishing expedition.' … The Internet companies have said there are other ways to get the information without them having to hand it over and believe requests like this are burden to the industry, the sources said." CNN notes, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said government and private industry officials are continuing to discuss the privacy issues involved and some of the concerns raised by the companies at the meeting Friday at the Justice Department. … The meeting, first reported by CNET News.com, included representatives from Verizon, Comcast, AOL (which is owned by Time Warner, as is CNN.com), Microsoft, Google and the U.S. Internet Service Provider Association, the sources told CNN. Companies involved refused to comment on the meeting."

Jury Finds Muhammad Guilty Of Six Sniper Murders. ABC World News Tonight (5/30, story 7, :20, Gibson) reported, "In the state of Maryland, today, another guilty verdict for the murderous sniper John Allen Muhammad. A jury found Muhammad guilty of six killings during the shooting spree that terrorized the Washington area in 2002. His protégé and colleague, Lee Malvo testified against Muhammad. He now faces a life sentence in Maryland. He has already received a death sentence from a jury in Virginia."

The CBS Evening News (5/30, story 6, 0:25, Schieffer) reported, "Muhammad could get life without parole, but he's already been sentenced to death for a sniper murder in Virginia."

The Washington Post (5/31, A1, Rich, Londoño) reports, "A jury deliberated less than five hours yesterday before finding John Allen Muhammad guilty in each of the six sniper slayings in Montgomery County, marking the second time he has been held responsible in the 2002 rampage that terrorized the Washington area." The Post continues, "The verdict, returned in the county where the snipers did most of their killing,ended a four-week trial that brimmed with new claims about the mechanics of the slayings and the motives behind them. The source of those claims was Muhammad's younger accomplice, Lee Boyd Malvo, who agreed to plead guilty and testify for the first time against the man he once regarded as a father. … As the jury was led into the courtroom yesterday, Muhammad stood at the defense table with his arms folded, appearing to smile confidently. The slight smile vanished, and he blinked repeatedly as the forewoman pronounced him guilty of murder six times. … State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler said later that prosecutors will ask that Muhammad, who was convicted in Virginia in 2003 and is on that state's death row, be sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole. Sentencing is scheduled for tomorrow."

The Washington Times (5/31, Ward) reports, "In 2003, a Virginia Beach jury sentenced Muhammad to death for capital murder in the shooting of Dean Harold Meyers and other charges. He could be executed as soon as three years from now, the Virginia Attorney General's Office said yesterday. … Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler said Muhammad will be shipped back to Virginia 'within a week' of his sentencing hearing. … Authorities said they brought Muhammad to Maryland to give victims' families their day in court, and for insurance in case Muhammad's Virginia conviction is overturned on appeal."

The AP (5/31, Manning) reports, "The announcement Tuesday afternoon followed four weeks of prosecutors, experts and witnesses presenting evidence against Muhammad and Muhammad defending himself with the argument that he had been framed. … Acting as his own attorney, Muhammad told the jury in his closing argument Friday that he was only in the Washington area during those three terrifying weeks to search for his ex-wife and children. He said government agencies planted evidence and collaborated to pin the crime on him and teenager Lee Boyd Malvo. … Maryland prosecutors said Malvo had agreed to a plea deal, and last week, the young man gave a chilling account of Muhammad's planning for the October 2002 shooting spree."

Former Ney Aide Testifies He Falsified Travel Disclosure For Scotland Trip. The New York Times (5/31, Shenon, 1.19M) reports Neil Volz, a former aide to Rep. Bob Ney who later became a lobbyist, "testified on Tuesday that he had prepared a travel disclosure statement for" Rep. Ney "that intentionally understated the cost of the lawmaker's lavish 2002 golfing trip to Scotland with the now-disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff." Volz "said in testimony before a federal jury in Washington that he had talked with the lawmaker, Representative Bob Ney of Ohio, before providing Mr. Ney's office with a copy of the statement, which he said falsely listed the cost of Mr. Ney's trip that summer as $3,200. Before joining Mr. Abramoff's lobbying firm, Mr. Volz had been Mr. Ney's chief of staff." Volz appeared as a "government witness at the trial of David H. Safavian, a former White House aide accused of lying about his ties to Mr. Abramoff." Volz said "he knew the $3,200 figure was too low, especially given the use of a chartered Gulfstream jet and $500-a-night hotel rooms. But he said he provided the number to Mr. Ney because it was modest enough not to attract the attention of reporters and others who might see the disclosure form."

The Washington Post (5/31, A7, Schmidt, 744K) adds that Volz testified how Abramoff "identified his 'champions' in government and then showered them with favors to get inside information and help for his clients." Volz said "that among those he and his colleagues considered allies were Ney and former General Services Administration official David H. Safavian, the first person brought to trial in connection with the Abramoff scandal. Central to Team Abramoff's lobbying operation, Volz said, was developing contacts in government 'who operate at a higher level' and who 'for whatever reason want to help you out.'" The Post adds that Volz "testified that Safavian and Ney guided the lobbyists as they looked for ways to gain access to government-owned land in Maryland, which Abramoff wanted for a religious school, in the weeks before the lobbyists took the two officials on a luxury golf trip to Scotland."

US To Seek Death Penalty In Virginia Murders. The Washington Post (5/31, Jackman) reports, "Federal prosecutors in Alexandria said yesterday that they will seek the death penalty for Thomas M. Hager for his alleged role in the stabbing death of a Fairfax County woman, saying that since 1992, Hager has killed five other people and ordered the slaying of a seventh person." The Post continues, "Two men have pleaded guilty to the murder of Barbara E. White, a 19-year-old single mother who lived in the Mount Vernon area. Those men admitted that on Nov. 29, 1993, they stabbed White repeatedly in her bathtub while White's 13-month-old daughter was elsewhere in the apartment with a fourth suspect. White's body and her toddler weren't found for 18 hours. White had been stabbed 82 times. … The two men, Lonnie T. Barnett Jr. and Arlington Johnson Jr., received life sentences. They said they were working for Hager, a crack cocaine dealer, who also stabbed White repeatedly, according to prosecutors. Hager was indicted in January on a charge of murder while engaged in drug trafficking." The Post adds, "Hager, now 33, is serving a minimum 87-year sentence for killing a man in the District in March 1995. In filing notice of their intent to seek the death penalty for Hager, prosecutors outlined a career of crime dating to a conviction for dealing cocaine as a 16-year-old. … Assistant U.S. Attorneys James L. Trump and Steven D. Mellin wrote that Hager was a regular crack dealer in the District who robbed people, including rival drug dealers, of drugs, money and other valuables."

Prosecution Witness Cross-Examined At Chicago Patronage Trial. The Chicago Tribune (5/31, Mihalopoulos, Bush, 643K) reports, "City hiring officials made sure Chicago Skyway tollbooths were staffed so Mayor Richard Daley would not get stuck in traffic as he traveled to and from his summer home in Michigan, according to a former Streets and Sanitation personnel director. Jack Drumgould testified Tuesday in the City Hall corruption trial that he received the advice in 1998 from his predecessor soon after taking over as director of personnel in Streets and Sanitation. … That anecdote came as defense attorneys for four former Daley administration officials charged with rigging the city's hiring and promotions process tried to attack Drumgould's credibility." Drumgould testified last week that he made political hires at the direction of Daley patronage officials. During his cross-examination yesterday, defense attorney Thomas Anthony Durkin "returned again and again to a theme from his opening statement in the trial — that politics has long played a role in city hiring and is only now being treated as a crime."

The Chicago Sun-Times (5/31, Warmbir, Korecki) also opens its story with Drumgould's revelation "that he was told by his supervisor to make sure there were always enough toll collectors on the Chicago Skyway to avoid any backups that could ensnare the mayor." The Sun-Times adds, "Defense attorneys for Sorich and his former colleagues drilled Drumgould throughout the day. They pointed out possible inconsistencies in his testimony on the stand and what he said before. They suggested that city workers were promoted not because of politics, but because they were qualified. And one defense attorney pointed out that Drumgould passed his daughter's application along when she applied for and received a job at the Chicago Park District."

Jury Seated In First Tennessee Waltz Trial. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (5/31, Buser) reports, "Testimony is scheduled to begin this morning in the bribery trial of former state senator Roscoe Dixon, the first local trial in the FBI's undercover sting operation dubbed Tennessee Waltz. … On Tuesday, a jury of seven women, five men and two female alternates was seated after day-long jury selection." The jurors "were identified in court by their jury number or by seat number in the jury box. U.S. Dist. Court Judge Jon McCalla said the secret procedure would be used since more than half of the potential jurors chose on a questionnaire to be addressed in court by number rather than by name." The AP (5/31, Baird) adds that "Dixon said he felt 'at peace' as his trial on federal bribery charges got under way Tuesday. … Federal prosecutors have estimated the trial will last two weeks. But Dixon's lawyer, Coleman W. Garrett, said that estimate may be conservative." The New York Times (5/31, Emery, 1.19M) notes Dixon "was indicted with four sitting state lawmakers in May 2005. He is…accused of taking $9,500 from a bogus company created by the F.B.I. John N. Ford, a Memphis Democrat and uncle of Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., resigned his State Senate seat and will go on trial in the fall."

Closing Arguments Made At Gambino Capo Trial. The AP (5/31) reports, "A prosecutor told a jury in closing arguments Tuesday that an ailing Gambino captain all but convicted himself of racketeering by bragging about the family and its crimes as he cozied up to an undercover FBI agent. Gregory DePalma, breathing through a tube connected to an oxygen tank, sat with his eyes closed as Assistant U.S. Attorney Christopher Conniff berated him as a 'violent and cunning criminal.'" The AP adds, "Defense lawyer, Martin Geduldig, attacked the government's evidence, saying prosecutors tried to trick the jury when it 'brought out all the old ghosts,' including pictures of the late mob boss John Gotti and mob figures from the 1980s. He said the cooperating witnesses in the trial were essentially bought by the government with money or promises of leniency for mob murders." The New York Daily News (5/31, Zambito, 729K) adds Conniff said that "DePalma's foul-mouthed rants, captured by an FBI bug secreted in his own cell phone, are all jurors need to convict the elderly capo of being a scheming shakedown artist." However, "Geduldig said DePalma's only crime was being a 'blowhard' who exaggerated his Mafia muscle."

Casinos Enticed By Revenue Prospects Of Online Gaming. The Las Vegas Sun (5/31, Benston) reports, "What a difference $15 billion makes. … After watching the fortunes of online casinos soar fivefold in as many years - an extraordinary winning streak with no apparent end in sight - Las Vegas casino giants want Congress to study letting them in on the action." The Sun continues, "Casino executives are licking their chops for good reason. … A gambling industry survey indicates that U.S. gamblers who bet online - which is illegal in this country - are young, savvy, college-educated men with money to burn. … But even as the industry wants to create dot-com casinos, conservative members of Congress were pushing last week to strengthen the ban on Internet betting - and were buoyed by a public opinion poll that showed growing concern about gambling." The Sun adds, "The Pew Research Center released poll results last week showing that 70 percent of Americans think legalized gambling encourages people to gamble more than they can afford, up from 62 percent in 1989. … Online gaming catapulted onto the scene this decade, skyrocketing from a $3 billion industry in 2001 to a $15 billion jackpot last year. … As much as 60 percent of the revenue is estimated to have come from U.S. citizens, many of whom reported in the survey commissioned by the American Gaming Association that they didn't realize they were breaking the law. … Online gambling revenue is projected to balloon to $24 billion by the end of the decade. … The Justice Department's inflexible position that Internet gambling is illegal has left American casino giants standing on the sidelines of one of the most lucrative business opportunities in the past decade."

FBI Completes Search Of Michigan Farm For Hoffa Remains. The FBI yesterday completed its search of a Milford Township, Mich., farm for evidence in the disappearance of Jimmy Hoffa. Investigators found no remains, but Detroit FBI agents vowed to continue the probe.

The CBS Evening News (5/30, story 8, 1:55, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The FBI does not know where he is, but it does know tonight where he is not. And that would be a horse farm in Michigan. It cost taxpayers about a quarter of a million dollars to find that out. … The FBI estimates it will cost taxpayers $160,000 to replace the barn they tore down, and another $100,000 to staff the search." ABC World News Tonight (5/30, story 8, Gibson, 8.78M) noted, "This search ended the way so many previous ones have, with no trace of Hoffa." NBC Nightly News (5/30, story 8, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) added, "And so, as someone said today, while there's no proof that Hoffa bought the farm, the government now has to buy a barn for the folks who own the farm."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (5/31, Krisher) reports, "The two-week search involved dozens of FBI agents, along with anthropologists, archaeologists, cadaver-sniffing dogs and a demolition crew that took apart a barn." Detroit FBI Supervisory Special Agent Louis Fischetti "said the tip that led agents to the farm was the best federal authorities had received," and "the agency planned to continue the investigation." Assistant Special Agent in Charge Judy Chilen noted, "There are still prosecutable defendants who are living, and they know who they are." Chilen "said that she believes Hoffa had been buried on the farm and that she had no evidence his body had been moved. Fischetti added: 'We really don't have any indication that it was or wasn't moved.'" The Detroit News (5/31, Wisely) notes, "Investigators said the tip that led them to the farm once owned by Hoffa associate Rolland McMaster was scrutinized and carried credibility because it included details they hadn't seen before. … But when asked what the search produced, Chilen answered with a single word: 'Nothing.'"

In a story distributed by Knight Ridder, The Detroit Free Press (5/31, Ashenfelter, Witsil, Swickard) adds that "the FBI came up empty-handed," but "people familiar with the case said federal prosecutors likely would propose a sentence reduction" for tipster Donovan Wells. At yesterday's press conference, Chilen and Fischetti "said Hoffa's body still might be on the farm. FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney said the search focused on 'the most likely areas' and 'if further information comes forward, we'd go back and get another warrant.' Clenney said news of the search prompted additional tips phoned into the FBI." The Free Press notes, "Although critics have said that the FBI wasted the public's time and money…Milford Township Police Chief Wayne Walli said authorities had no choice but to dig," and "Hoffa's daughter, Barbara Crancer…said the family is grateful that the FBI searched."

The Chicago Tribune (5/31, Jones, 643K) reports that "with no hints that the search was going anywhere, the effort started to draw fire this week from those, including a Detroit-area congressman, who questioned the cost." Fischetti "said the search is expected to cost less than $250,000. In response to criticism, Chilen said the FBI does 'not put a price tag on murder and kidnapping. ... We go where the evidence leads us,' she said. … 'We hope this sends a message to those involved…that the FBI does not give up,' Chilen said, 'no matter how much time has passed.'" The New York Times (5/31, Maynard, 1.19M) also notes Rep. Joe Knollenberg's criticism of the search and adds that FBI

Detroit SAC Daniel D. Roberts responded in a statement Friday, "The expenditure of funds has always been necessary in each and every case the F.B.I. works, and this one is no exception. We will not abandon our responsibility to investigate a pending organized crime case because it might be termed "too old."" CNN.com (5/30), NPR's All Things Considered (5/30, Klinefelter) and BBC News (5/30) also reported on the end of the search.

Elderly Women Charged With Insurance Fraud In Deaths Of Two Men. The Los Angeles Times (5/31, Pringle, So) reports, "In early April, the two women dropped by a Sunday lunch for the homeless at Hollywood Presbyterian Church. … They fit the picture of do-gooders, a pair of kind souls happy to spend the afternoon helping the less fortunate. … The women, Olga Rutterschmidt and Helen Golay, are the septuagenarian odd couple charged in an alleged life insurance scam involving the hit-and-run deaths of two homeless men." The Times continues, "Rutterschmidt is a feisty music lover from Hungary. She has an expired electrolysis license and little visible means of support, but hinted to her Hollywood neighbors that she knew of ways to make easy money. … Golay is an outwardly prosperous Santa Monica landlord. Her penchants are for pantsuits and the big bouffants of her native Texas, as well as for siccing lawyers on those who crossed her, including her own daughter. … And while their backgrounds and lifestyles could scarcely be more different, they have shared a tendency over the years for alienating, suing and ultimately baffling the people around them, according to court records and interviews." The Times adds, "The women filed nearly 40 lawsuits between them over the last two decades, usually demanding money for alleged wrongs. … Golay sought damages from a woman she claimed stole leather skirts from her. She also sued a health club, saying she was hurt on an exercise machine. … A federal grand jury Tuesday indicted Golay, 75, and Rutterschmidt, 72, on nine counts of fraud in connection with more than $2 million in life insurance policies that they took out for Paul Vados and Kenneth McDavid, who were struck and killed by cars in 1999 and 2005. … Authorities say the women, who were arrested May 18, are also under investigation in the deaths."

VA Official Resigns For Failing To Notify Department Of Data Theft. ABC World News Tonight (5/30, story 10, 2:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Veterans Affairs official who failed to notify superiors about the theft of millions of veterans' personal information resigned today. Michael McLendon supervised the employee who lost the data." The Washington Post (5/31, A17, Lee, 744K) adds, "Dennis M. Duffy, who has been acting assistant secretary for policy and planning, was placed on administrative leave yesterday." He "learned of the theft May 5," but "Deputy Secretary Gordon H. Mansfield was not told of the data loss until May 10, and" Veterans Affairs Secretary Nicholson was not informed until May 16. Paul Hutter, assistant general counsel for management and operations, will "temporarily lead the Office of Policy and Planning until Patrick W. Dunne, nominated last week to be assistant secretary for policy and planning, is considered by the Senate." The New York Times (5/31, 1.19M) and USA Today (5/31, 4A, 2.31M) also report on the resignation.

Identity Thieves Trolling State, Local Government Web Sites. ABC World News Tonight (5/30, story 10, 2:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Last year, 9 million Americans had their identities stolen at a cost of more than $56 billion." ABC (Reynolds) added, "Personal identity thieves are graduating, from the dumpster to the desktop. And as sunshine laws meet cyberspace, government has become an involuntary accomplice." In Maricopa County, Arizona, "which has the highest percentage of ID theft in the country, Social Security numbers can be found online in court documents and real estate deals. And the county recorder says with 60 million to 70 million documents online, it would be impossible to remove all the information." In Ohio, "hundreds of people were victimized to the tune of $500,000 by thieves who used a Hamilton County Website." Greg Hartmann, clerk of courts: "They were mining our site, perusing the public documents and finding traffic tickets and other records that had Social Security numbers attached to somebody's name and address."

Capitol Mall's Safe Image Shattered By Night Crimes. The Washington Post (5/31, A1, Dvorak, Ruane) reports, "The green expanse of the Mall evokes many emotions, but wariness has never been one of them. Over the years, the lack of crime has created an aura of safety that allows joggers and tourists, children and couples to drop their guard and stroll in the day and even at night. … That changed in recent days, when a band of robbers used the elm tree shadows to surprise and attack six tourists walking along Washington's grassy sanctuary under the spell of the stars. It was as if an unspoken agreement had been broken between the underworld and the nation's icons. … 'There's no question that the Mall has been off-limits to thugs, and it's no surprise that they found it,' said Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.). 'But it should only be for a split second.'" The Post continues, "Norton, a race walker who strides across the Mall when the sun goes down, was angry that the U.S. Park Police did not double up patrols on the Mall after what happened Thursday. Twice that night, bandits brandishing a semiautomatic handgun robbed a man and a woman, assaulted the woman and fled. A similar attack happened early Sunday. … The Thursday night assaults happened only 15 minutes apart." The Post adds, "After the Thursday night incidents, police added a scooter and a patrol car to the stretch of Mall between Ninth and 12th streets, near where the attacks happened, Norton said. … Park Police Chief Dwight E. Pettiford acknowledged that the response should have been stronger. … Since the sexual assault Sunday, a low-key police force, ordinarily dispatched to guard the steps of the Lincoln Memorial and patrol the Baltimore-Washington Parkway, has been reassembled along the Mall."

7th Circuit Upholds White Supremacist's Murder Solicitation Conviction. The AP (5/31, Robinson) reports, "A federal appeals court in Chicago on Tuesday upheld white supremacist Matthew Hale's conviction and 40-year sentence for soliciting the murder of a federal judge, brushing aside his claim that he had repeatedly said he wanted nothing to do with the crime. … 'As the government has maintained, Hale tried to "create plausible deniability in the event his conversation was being monitored,"' a three-judge panel of the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said." The AP continues, "The judges refused to overturn Hale's April 2004 conviction on charges that he solicited an FBI informant to murder U.S. District Judge Joan Humphrey Lefkow. They also turned down his request for a reduced sentence. Lefkow's husband and mother were killed in her home the following year by a man who had no relation to the Hale case." The AP adds, "According to evidence at his trial, Hale, 35, had become enraged at Lefkow after she ordered his white supremacist group to stop using the name World Church of the Creator. Another group had sued saying it had a copyright on the name. … The appellate panel cited a number of Hale conversations and behavior patterns to bolster the government's theory that he wanted to have Lefkow killed because of the case. Among them, it described as 'flimsy' Hale's claim that pressure from FBI agents who had been investigating him for more than a year made him violate the law."

Oklahoma Man Indicted For Threatening Federal Judge. KOKO-TV Oklahoma City (5/27) reported on its Web site, "A man indicted for threatening to assault and kill a federal judge appeared before a federal magistrate Friday, authorities said." Rhett Ellis Arterburn "is accused of threatening U.S. District Judge Ralph G. Thompson, U.S. Attorney John Richter said. Arterburn allegedly threatened to assault and murder Thompson in retaliation for the judge sentencing him to federal prison. … He appeared Friday before U.S. Magistrate Bana Roberts on a one-count indictment returned by a federal grand jury in Oklahoma City." The AP (5/27) also reported on Aterburn's indictment.

CIVIL LAW:

Supreme Court Limits Protections For Whistleblowers. Knight Ridder (5/31, Henderson) reports, "The Supreme Court made life a bit tougher for government whistleblowers Tuesday, saying the First Amendment doesn't protect public employees who disclose waste and fraud as part of their jobs." By a 5-4 margin, the justices "said that the government's interest in effectively managing operations outweighs the interests that protect employee speech, even in cases where employees may be reporting inefficiencies or wrongdoing." The ruling "leaves public employees…significantly more prone to retaliation from their employers if they speak out in ways that displease their bosses."

The Washington Post (5/31, A1, Lane, 744K) reports Justice Anthony M. Kennedy wrote the majority opinion, and was joined by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr. But "Kennedy's opinion drew a sharp dissent from Justice David H. Souter, who argued that statutory and other protections for whistle-blowers are weak. Justices John Paul Stevens and Ruth Bader Ginsburg joined Souter. Justice Stephen G. Breyer dissented in a solo opinion."

USA Today (5/31, Biskupic, 2.31M) notes the dispute "involved Richard Ceballos, a Los Angeles County prosecutor who said he was transferred and denied a promotion for writing a memo to his bosses alleging misrepresentations in an affidavit used by a sheriff's deputy to obtain a search warrant. Officials in the Los Angeles County district attorney's office said their actions arose from legitimate staff changes and contended Ceballos' report was not protected under the First Amendment." The US Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit ruled, however, that "Ceballos' statements about a potential lie in a search-warrant affidavit were 'inherently a matter of public concern' protected by the Constitution." USA Today adds, "Rejecting that view, Justice Anthony Kennedy wrote that applying constitutional free-speech protections to workers engaged in their regular duties would intrude on managers' discretion." The Bush Administration sided with the District Attorney's office. The Washington Times (5/31, Price, 90K), Wall Street Journal/AP (5/31), Christian Science Monitor (5/31, Richey, 61K), Los Angeles Times (5/31, Savage, 958K) and New York Times (5/31, Greenhouse, 1.19M), among other newspapers, also reports on the ruling.

NYTimes Criticizes Ruling. The New York Times (5/31, 1.19M) editorializes, "The Supreme Court whittled away at the First Amendment yesterday, ruling against a prosecutor who raised concerns about the validity of a search warrant." The court "made the law in this area messy, and even illogical. It suggested the attorney would have had more protection if he had embarrassed his office publicly than by working quietly through the system. But the bigger problem is that the ruling rolls back government workers' rights to speak out against possibly illegal actions." The First Amendment "should not protect employees from discipline for every statement they make at work, clearly. But as the dissenters point out, it should protect them in a case like this one, where an employee was bringing to light information that advances the public interest in honest government and the rule of law."

Justices To Review Award To Smoker's Widow. USA Today (5/31, Biskupic, 2.31M) reports, "The Supreme Court agreed Tuesday to review a jury award of $79.5 million in punitive damages to the widow of an Oregon smoker. It was nearly 100 times the damages set for her actual loss. A key question in the appeal by Philip Morris, to be heard this fall, is whether 'highly reprehensible' conduct as determined by a lower court can override a rule that punitive damages must be related to the actual injury sustained." The justices also "will review whether the jury wrongly punished the company for the injuries of other Oregon smokers."

The New York Times (5/31, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports, "The Supreme Court's precedents have referred to 'reprehensibility' as a factor to consider in evaluating a punitive damages award." In this case, Philip Morris "argues in its appeal, the Oregon court improperly permitted its conclusion on reprehensibility to 'override the constitutional requirement that punitive damages be reasonably related to the plaintiff's harm.'" The company's appeal "was supported by briefs filed by the United States Chamber of Commerce and the Product Liability Advisory Council, a coalition of 133 manufacturers."

The Washington Post (5/31, D1, Lane, 744K) reports this is "a subject on which the court has been closely divided. The impact of President Bush's appointees, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., whose views on tort-related issues were not closely examined during their confirmation hearings, could be crucial."

The AP (5/31) reports, "The case gives justices a chance to clarify a 2003 ruling in an insurance case that said punitive damages should generally be in line with actual damages. Arguments will be this fall. … Philip Morris lawyers said that the punitive damages in the Williams case were nearly 100 times the compensatory damages and that the Oregon Supreme Court decision is 'dangerous.'"

Specter, Leahy Renew Effort To Pass Asbestos Bill. The Hill (5/31, Young) reports that Sens. Arlen Specter and Patrick Leahy face "considerable obstacles" in their renewed effort to pass a measure to replace the asbestos-litigation system with a $140 billion trust fund. On Friday, "Specter introduced a new version of the bill and again warned that the Senate faces a do-or-die moment. This bill represents his last stab at the issue, he vowed." The Hill adds, "Brinksmanship may be the only available strategy. Those opposed to the Specter-Leahy bill are entrenched and formidable and have a successful track record."

DOJ Cites Abuse, Deaths In DC Group Homes. The Washington Post (5/31, A1, Dvorak) reports, "Newly filed court papers give vivid and startling details about the extent of abuse -- from severe scaldings to fatal starvation -- that mentally and physically disabled residents have endured in some of the District's group homes." The Post continues, "Each of these people was a mentally disabled ward of the District who died in the past two years after inexcusable lapses in care, the Justice Department said, urging a judge to hold the District in contempt of court for not meeting repeated promises of reform. Other mentally and physically disabled residents of group homes were beaten, berated, sexually accosted, neglected or targeted for theft, Justice lawyers said. … To protect the victims' privacy, the Justice Department used pseudonyms for the people who died or were harmed. But the circumstances were real, the government said, and represented a pattern dating back decades." The Post adds, "The papers, filed in U.S. District Court, cited 14 'preventable and questionable' deaths since January 2003. They included a 54-year-old woman who was never screened for colon cancer and died from the disease, a 58-year-old woman who was untreated for illness for so long that she went into septic shock and a 45-year-old man who did not get proper help for a swallowing disorder."

Dean Suggests Gay Marriage Ban Supporters Are Bigots. The Washington Times (5/31, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean claims to be reaching out to red-state voters, but yesterday, he suggested that opponents of homosexual 'marriage' are bigots. Mr. Dean was responding to news that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, plans to bring to a vote a proposed constitutional amendment that would ban homosexual 'marriage.' 'At a time when the Republican Party is in trouble with their conservative base, Bill Frist is taking a page straight out of the Karl Rove playbook to distract from the Republican Party's failed leadership and misplaced priorities by scapegoating LGBT families for political gain, using marriage as a wedge issue,' said Mr. Dean, using the abbreviation for lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender. 'It is not only morally wrong, it is shameful and reprehensible,' Mr. Dean said."

Georgia Supreme Court To Review Ruling On Same-Sex Marriage Ban. The New York Times/AP (5/31) reports that Georgia's Supreme Court "said it would speed its review of a ruling that struck down the state's voter-approved ban on same-sex marriage. A Superior Court judge had ruled that the ban violated the Georgia Constitution because the ballot question addressed more than one issue, including civil unions."

Abortion Advocates File Petitions To Challenge South Dakota Abortion Ban. The New York Times (5/31, Ruethling, 1.19M) reports that abortion advocates filed petitions with more than 38,000 signatures with South Dakota's secretary of state's office "to challenge the state's ban on almost all abortions. The campaign needs at least 16,728 signatures to put the ban, which became law in March, to a statewide vote in November."

DC-Based Blackboard Becomes A Software Powerhouse. In a column for the Washington Post (5/31, D1), Steven Pearlstein writes, "Remember the economic theory behind the dot-com mania? … The notion was that, unlike the market for widgets, the Internet economy was prone to winner-take-all competition, in which the first company to gain a significant lead would wind up with a near monopoly, at least till the next breakthrough technology came along. … Big economies of scale were a part of it, allowing the market leader to wage a debilitating price war against smaller competitors. There was also something called 'network effect,' which had to do with the natural preference of customers to use compatible software." Pearlstein continues, "As it turned out, most of the companies bankrolled on the basis of this theory never made it. But for the few that survived, the theory may actually be panning out. There are eBay and Google, of course. And here in Washington, there's Blackboard Inc. … Blackboard has quietly become the world's leader in the software used to connect students to their teachers, their textbooks, their course materials and one another. By some estimates, Blackboard now has as much as 80 percent of the U.S. market, with sales growing at 20 percent annually, 20 percent operating margins and a stock price that has doubled since its first stock offering two years ago." Pearlstein adds, "All of which makes it particularly curious that the Justice Department earlier this year allowed Blackboard, with 45 to 50 percent of the market, to buy its main rival, WebCT, which had 35 to 40 percent. To be sure, there are still thousands of universities and school systems that have no e-learning software, and those that do can switch vendors when contracts come up for renewal. But the quiet approval of the merger of the top two companies in a market with strong winner-take-all characteristics is the best evidence yet that the Bush administration has abandoned antitrust enforcement."

Suit Seeks To Block Time Warner, Comcast Acquisition Of Adelphia. The AP (5/31, Karnowski) reports, "A startup cable television channel sued cable giants Time Warner Inc. and Philadelphia-based Comcast Corp. on Tuesday in an attempt block their planned acquisition of bankrupt Adelphia Communications Corp." The AP continues, "The America Channel, which has yet to go on the air, claims in its lawsuit that the deal violates federal antitrust laws and will reduce competition in the cable TV industry. … The lawsuit accuses Time Warner and Comcast of conspiring to monopolize local cable systems across the country and of using their alleged monopoly power to refuse to deal with independent networks such as The America Channel, denying them the access to local cable systems they need to succeed." The AP adds, "Comcast and Time Warner, the nation's two biggest cable TV companies, agreed jointly last year to acquire Adelphia, the nation's fifth-largest cable operator, for $17.6 billion, and divide up its systems among the two of them. … TAC's lawsuit accuses Comcast and Time Warner of price-fixing and bid-rigging in their submission of a joint bid instead of competing against each other to acquire Adelphia's assets."

Colgate CEO's Legacy Could Hinge On One Last Deal. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Deogun) reports, "Chances are you have a Colgate-Palmolive Co. product in your house. Colgate Chief Executive Officer Reuben Mark, though, is no household name. … Yet Mr. Mark has delivered gleaming returns for shareholders -- a fact in which he takes great pride. At Colgate's Web site, the default setting for Colgate's stock-price performance is 22 years, which not coincidentally is how long Mr. Mark has been CEO. As of May 17, the stock was up 3,867% in that period, compared with 1,269% for the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index and 2,439% for its peer group, the company says." The Journal continues, "Now in the twilight of his career -- he is 67 and due to step down as CEO next year -- Mr. Mark must make a decision: Does he preserve his sterling stock-price legacy or make a high-stakes gamble with a big acquisition that potentially ensures Colgate a future in a rapidly consolidating marketplace? … During the next few days, final bids are due in the sale of Pfizer Inc.'s consumer-health business, which is expected to fetch $12 billion, or more than a third of Colgate's market value. The business includes over-the-counter drugs such as heartburn remedy Zantac and -- most important for an 'oral care'-obsessed Colgate -- Listerine mouthwash. Many CEOs near retirement would snap up such a deal, viewing it as a crowning achievement." The Journal notes, "Mr. Mark, though, has made his career largely by shunning big acquisitions -- and the limelight. He takes commercial flights and rarely gives interviews. Mr. Mark's deals -- Mennen deodorant and Murphy Oil Soap -- would be rounding errors for the likes of Sandy Weill or Jack Welch. … Like many chiefs, Mr. Mark has fantasized about big deals. A few years ago, he entertained a dream merger with Gillette, owner of razors, Duracell batteries and Oral-B dental-care products. From his seat on the board of Time Warner Inc., though, Mr. Mark had watched its heralded merger with America Online nearly wreck the combined company, and he balked. Last year, Procter & Gamble Co., Colgate's biggest rival and maker of Crest toothpaste, swooped in and bought Gillette, cementing its position as king of household products. … Colgate, meanwhile, was losing some of its shine. Some analysts said Mr. Mark had stayed too long, and Colgate was getting marginalized by the likes of P&G. As if on cue, Colgate missed its earnings forecast, and its stock got whacked."

NRG Rejects Mirant's Unsolicited $7.85 Billion Bid. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Smith, Berman) reports, "Mirant Corp. said it made an unsolicited offer earlier this month to acquire fellow power generator NRG Energy Inc. for $7.85 billion, but in a rejection letter sent May 23, NRG called the cash-and-stock offer 'the wrong deal at the wrong time.'" The Journal continues, "Mirant disclosed its offer late yesterday and said it was renewing its proposal. Both of the so-called merchant power generators fell under bankruptcy-court protection when deregulated power markets contracted following Enron Corp.'s collapse in late 2001." The Journal adds, "Mirant, of Atlanta, emerged from bankruptcy-court proceedings in January. NRG, of Princeton, N.J., emerged in December 2003, having shed $6 billion in debt. … Under the proposal, Mirant offered $57.16 a share in cash and Mirant stock for each share of NRG stock, a 33% premium to NRG's stock price yesterday. In 4 p.m. … Mirant Chief Executive Edward Muller, formerly an executive at utility company Edison International, said he believes a combination would be immediately accretive to Mirant shareholders and would create a company able to cut overhead expenses by at least $150 million a year. He said the combined firms would have 40,000 megawatts of generating capacity in the nation's biggest wholesale-power markets."

Disney Fires Broadside At Marketing Pirates In China. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Fowler) reports, "Walt Disney Co.'s latest marketing campaign in China features a nervy gambit: getting consumers to help it weed out counterfeit products." The Journal continues, "The company's 'Disney Magical Journey' promotion, its biggest Chinese marketing campaign of the year for consumer products, is a twist on the traditional customer-loyalty program. To enter a contest for free Disney DVDs, television sets and trips to Hong Kong Disneyland, customers peel a sticker off a Disney product, attach it to a form, fill in a few personal details and mail it in." The Journal adds, "The catch: Only legitimate Disney products carry the specific red hologram-covered stickers, in a market rife with pirated Disney products that often are of similar quality to the real thing. … Fighting these counterfeits is crucial for Disney. Sales of consumer products -- such as stuffed toys and books -- make up the bulk of the company's business in mainland China. Piracy has wiped out most legitimate sales of DVDs, while government regulations bar much of the company's imported programming from being shown in theaters and on TV."

EU Regulators Step Up Investigations Of Monopoly Abuses By Energy Companies. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, A6) reports, "European regulators said they raided energy companies to search for evidence of possible monopoly abuses, in an escalation against dominant energy companies." It was "a follow-up to a series of raids the European Commission and national regulators carried out earlier this month in Germany, Italy, France, Belgium and Austria, the commission said. Following the raids earlier this month, Germany's RWE AG confirmed regulators had carried out unannounced inspections of its offices, and German energy giant E.On AG said regulators conducted 'examinations' as part of a 'normal inspection operation' at its headquarters in Essen." The Journal notes, "The commission didn't name the companies inspected. It noted that inspections are just a preliminary step in assessing possible antitrust violations."

The AP (5/31) reports, "The unannounced inspections on Monday and Tuesday were a follow up to earlier visits in May, the commission said. … 'The commission has reason to believe that the companies concerned may have violated ... antitrust rules that prohibit restrictive business practices and/or abuse of a dominant market position,' it said in a statement."

Bloomberg (5/31, Newman) reports, "EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes in February threatened legal action against utilities that bar rivals from using power grids and pipelines. As part of a bid to lower energy costs, Kroes said she will fine or impose restraints on utilities that abuse their dominance in the power and natural-gas markets."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

NOAA Alleged To Have Gagged Salmon Researchers. The Washington Post (5/31, Harden, 744K) reports the administration, "having made it hard for federal scientists to talk publicly about global warming -- appears to have decided that loose lips are also bad when they talk about salmon." The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration "has instructed its representatives and scientists in the West to route media questions about salmon back to headquarters. Only three people in the entire agency, all of them political appointees, are now authorized to speak of salmon, according to a NOAA employee who has been silenced on the fish." The post notes that the order "was issued the day after an article appeared last month in The Washington Post quoting federal technocrats making positive statements about two recent decisions…that challenged previous Bush administration policy about protecting salmon."

Industry Groups Challenge Endangered Species Listings. USA Today (5/31, Parker) reports, "Ever since a 3-inch fish protected by the Endangered Species Act stopped construction of a dam in Tennessee in 1978, the law has been known as one of the toughest environmental laws on the books." USA continues, "Environmental groups have used it to halt development in pristine lands across the nation. Today, the law designed to protect animals such as the manatee from extinction also has become a legal tool of property rights groups and developers." USA adds, "In a counterpunch to environmentalists who have filed lawsuits aimed at protecting hundreds of plant and animal species by listing them as endangered or threatened, property rights groups such as the Pacific Legal Foundation are filing lawsuits to have animals and plants removed from the list so that development can proceed. … Meanwhile, industry groups have filed dozens of legal challenges aimed at allowing development on lands set aside by the U.S. government to help protect endangered species. … In a study he published last August on active litigation involving the Endangered Species Act, Parenteau counted 45 lawsuits filed by industry groups and five filed by environmental groups." USA notes, "At the forefront of the movement is the National Association of Home Builders, which recently prevailed in a legal battle over Arizona land that had been designated as a habitat for the cactus ferruginous pygmy owl. Two environmental groups have sued to restore the designation, and a court hearing on the issue is scheduled for Friday. … Likewise, the conservative Pacific Legal Foundation, based in Sacramento, is pressing the federal government to re-examine several animals and plants on the endangered list. … Both groups have found a relatively friendly audience in the Bush administration, which in recent years has loosened many of the restrictions in the Endangered Species Act. Among other things, the administration has focused on giving private property owners incentives to protect vulnerable species, rather than banning activity on their land."

Global Warming Expected To Have Profound Consequences This Century. USA Today (5/31, 6A, Wiseman, Soriano, 2.31M) reports that "there's no question that rising temperatures are poised to change life as we know it." According to the United Nations Environment Program, "In less than 100 years, the Arctic could be ice-free in the summer, which would allow ships to take the polar route from Europe to Asia, say the Canadian Ice Service and the U.S. Navy. At current rates, 75% of glaciers in the Swiss Alps and two-thirds of those in China will melt by 2050, according to separate studies by the European Environment Agency and the Chinese Academy of Sciences."

Americans Seen As Unlikely To Abandon Fossil Fuels, Despite Evidence Of Climate Change. USA Today (5/31, Vergano, 2.31M) reports that "despite increased interest in recent years in hydrogen-fueled cars, windmills and biofuels made from plants, it's very unlikely people won't be burning coal, oil and natural gas in coming decades, says Jae Edmonds of the Joint Global Change Research Institute. There's just too much of the stuff, especially coal, too easily extracted from the ground to expect humanity to stop burning fossil fuels, he says."

Global Warming Threatens Species. USA Today (5/31, O'driscoll) reports, "Alarming anecdotes — such as polar bears drowning as they swim farther in search of scarce Arctic sea ice — dramatize climate change. But a flurry of scientific reports, field observations and official actions suggests nature's struggle with rising temperatures is well underway:" USA continues, "As Earth and its atmosphere grow warmer, the planet's wild inhabitants take cover where they can: cooler waters, deeper forests and canyons, higher slopes or nearer the poles, north and south. … But climate scientists say that if global warming continues unabated, the scramble for habitat will grow much harder for millions of species of mammals, birds, amphibians, fish, insects and more. Recent studies say that as many as one-quarter of them could begin to disappear this century and that warming has wiped out some already." USA adds, "For as long as humans have tried to protect wild species, a key strategy has been to preserve habitat and bar encroachment by development, excessive hunting or fishing, and other threats. The USA has a 150,000-square-mile system of federal sanctuaries, with 535 refuges in all 50 states, plus 3,000 other resource sites. … But rising temperatures put animals in motion, seeking new homes when they can't tolerate the old. For waterfowl, that could mean more birds in smaller spaces with less food. That can spark disease outbreaks, greater loss to predators, and cause birds to skip nesting altogether."

Friedman Says GM Undermining US Security. The New York Times' Thomas Friedman (5/31) writes, "Is there a company more dangerous to America's future than General Motors? Surely, the sooner this company gets taken over by Toyota, the better off our country will be. … Our military is in a war on terrorism in Iraq and Afghanistan with an enemy who is fueled by our gasoline purchases. So we are financing both sides in the war on terror. And what are we doing about that? Not only is GM subsidizing its gas-guzzlers, but not a single member of Congress, liberal or conservative, will stand up and demand what most of them know: that we must have some kind of gasoline tax to compel Americans to buy more fuel-efficient vehicles and to compel Detroit to make them."

Gore's Global Warming Views Said To Be Politically Motivated. In his column for the Wall Street Journal (5/31, 2.11M) Holman Jenkins Jr. writes, "A remarkable and improbable thing is that, despite presumably devoting decades of study to the subject of global warming, nothing Al Gore has learned leads him to say anything that would strike the least informed, most dogmatic 'green' as politically incorrect. He doesn't discover virtues in nuclear power. He doesn't note the cost-benefit advantages of strategies that would remove CO2 from the atmosphere, rather than those that would stop its creation. … Mr. Gore's narrative isn't science, but science fiction. It also contains a large element of political fiction, relying on the hack theme of good guys versus bad guys."

Administration Plans Funding Cuts For Energy Department Conservation Programs. The Christian Science Monitor (5/31, Clayton, 61K) reports a "few years ago a little-known US Energy Department program helped produce a design technology for lightweight cars and trucks that in 2004 alone saved the nation 122 million barrels of oil, or about $9 billion. Even without that breakthrough, the tiny Industrial Technologies Program routinely saves the United States $7 worth of energy for each dollar it spends, proponents say." With energy prices "spiking and President Bush pushing for more energy research, the ITP would seem a natural candidate for more funding. In fact, its budget is set to get chopped by a third from its 2005 level. It's one of more than a dozen energy-efficiency efforts that the Energy Department plans to trim or eliminate in a $115 million cost-saving move." The "push to solve the nation's energy woes are bumping up against the federal government's budget problems. To be sure, the Bush administration is anxious to fund its new Advanced Energy Initiative - long-term research into nuclear, coal, wind, solar, and hydrogen power. But to accomplish that, it is cutting lesser-known programs like ITP whose payoffs are far more near-term."

Indian Tribes Establish Their Own Court System. The San Diego Union-Tribune (5/31, Jiménez) reports, "In a modest office above a downtown Escondido storefront, an American Indian law school graduate and a retired Superior Court commissioner are working on a project that could significantly alter the region's justice system for American Indians." The Union-Tribune continues, "The Intertribal Court of Southern California is the latest in various attempts to establish an independent court to handle legal matters generated on the reservations of San Diego County's Indian tribes. … It began in summer 2005 and is open to any tribe." The Union-Tribune adds, "The cases so far have centered on mediating civil disputes and child-custody issues. Several tribes have started using the court as the venue to hear civil infractions, ranging from being drunk in public to illegally discharging a firearm. … It also will serve as the venue to resolve disputes for non-Indians visiting casinos or doing business on reservations that use the intertribal court. … The tribes most active in the intertribal court are clustered in North County, such as Pala and Pauma. The wealthier, more well-known tribes such as Sycuan and Viejas in East County say they either have not heard of the court or have little or no interest in joining." The Union-Tribune notes, "Funding is a primary challenge because the court must find a revenue stream to continue growing. Because California law applies on tribal lands, the Bureau of Indian Affairs does little to help fund local tribes in establishing their own courts, legal experts said."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI To Use DNA Database For Missing Persons, Unidentified Victims. In a front-page story, USA Today (5/31, Willing, 2.31M) reports, "The FBI plans to use its national DNA database system to help identify not only criminals, but also missing persons and tens of thousands of unidentified bodies held by local coroners and medical examiners. A new computer program planned for this fall will compare genetic profiles taken from unidentified bodies or body parts with DNA submitted by family members of missing persons." CODIS Director Thomas Callaghan "said the FBI is in 'a very good position' to identify remains through family members because of the agency's small but growing database of missing persons and unidentified remains, plus its experience in using computers to match DNA."

Over 100 Detroit Deaths Linked To Deadly Drug Mix. KTBS-TV Shreveport, LA (5/31) reported on its website, "More than 100 deaths in Detroit area traced back to drugs mixed with fentanyl." There were "33 such deaths in the past week and many are suspected of being the result of the same deadly combination of drugs." Reports "surfaced before the weekend that area drug counselors were trying to get the word out on the street about the deadlier drug combination being sold, while at the same time" the DEA "was working to track down the source of the mixture."

Pennsylvania Readies For Arrival Of Deadly Compound. The Pittsburgh (PA) Tribune-Review (5/31) adds that while the deadly mix "has killed more than 100 people in Illinois, Michigan and eastern Pennsylvania and parts of four other northeastern states," it "hasn't been found in the Alle-Kiski Valley." But now "and police and drug agents are watching for it." DEA Agent Rick McGoldrick "said Friday the government is investigating more than 20 deaths in Harrisburg and Philadelphia and 30 or more in Michigan. The DEA in Pittsburgh is watching for it to pop up elsewhere."

Texas Man Dies Making Pipe Bomb To Target DEA Agents. The AP (5/31) reports James Charles Torrence, 38, was "indicted on federal drug and firearms charges died in an explosion as he was making a pipe bomb that fire officials say he planned to use against agents." Torrence "was building the bomb Monday in his home when it exploded, officials said." Brian Howell, assistant fire marshal of the Longview Fire Department, "said documents were found in the residence listing names of agents with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the Drug Enforcement Administration."

Police Said To Be Encountering More Drivers Impaired By Drugs. The Los Angeles Times (5/31, Wright) reports, "While incidences of drunk driving have declined over the years, thanks in part to organizations such as Mothers Against Drunk Driving, driving under the influence of drugs has increased, reports Marilyn Huestis at the National Institute on Drug Abuse in Rockville, Md. To battle the problem, researchers are scrambling to develop uniform procedures that would allow police to easily screen motorists suspected of being under the influence of drugs. One procedure involves a saliva test that could be done quickly in the field with a swab. It would not require police to take a suspect to a hospital or to jail for blood or urine samples, Huestis says."

Wisconsin Gun Shop Tops National List For Selling Weapons Later Tied To Crimes. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (5/31John Diedrich Jdiedrich@, journalsentinel.com) reports, "West Milwaukee's Badger Outdoors last year again was tops among all gun shops in the nation for selling guns that later were recovered by police during criminal investigations, according to new data from the federal government." The Sentinel continues, "In 2005, there were 537 crime guns - an average of more than 10 a week - recovered and traced to Badger, the Milwaukee area's largest gun dealer. None of the others in the top five had more than 500 crime guns traced to them, according to the document from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives." The Sentinel adds, "The ranking was released during a federal trial in which another store with a high number of crime gun traces - Trader Sports Inc. of San Leandro, Calif. - sued to try to keep its dealer's license. … In 1998, Badger had the most crime guns traced to it among all gun dealers in the United States and then fell from the top spot, only to regain the spot last year. Badger has been criticized for selling cheap handguns, which were bought by "straw buyers" with clean records and then passed on to gang members. In a 1999 sweep, the majority of straw buyers bought the guns legally at Badger. Owner cites scarcity of shops … Co-owner Mick Beatovic said Tuesday he wasn't aware that many crime guns had been traced to Badger. ATF classifies crime guns as any firearm used or suspected of being used in a crime."

Man Arrested In California Dynamite Theft. The AP (5/31) reports, "A man wanted in the theft of 686 sticks of dynamite from a gold mine has been arrested after a short car chase in a stolen car, officials said." The AP continues, "Sheriff's deputies arrested Joshua Lee Gawn, 33, for investigation of auto theft Friday night, Deputy Chris Durham said. Gawn didn't give his name and authorities didn't realize he was wanted in the dynamite case until fingerprint information came back Saturday night, Durham said." The AP adds, 'Investigators earlier this month had focused on Gawn based on information from witnesses and tipsters. After his apartment was searched, he was arrested for investigation of a probation violation but was released the next day on $25,000 bail. … While in custody, Gawn admitted he stole explosives, according to an affidavit from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. The ATF obtained an arrest warrant for Gawn on May 18 after he did not turn himself in for arraignment in federal court."

The Riverside (CA) Press-Enterprise (5/31, Burge) reports, "Special Agent John D'Angelo, of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, said he couldn't comment on the details about Gawn's arrest. 'I'm just glad they arrested him,' he said. 'From what I can tell this was a case of good police work.' … The ATF obtained an arrest warrant for Gawn on May 18 after he failed to turn himself in for arraignment in federal court. The warrant accuses him of being a felon in possession of explosives."

FBI Agent Says Tips Prompting Expansion Of Jeffs Investigation. MSNBC's Rita Cosby Live & Direct (5/30) interviewed Salt Lake City FBI Special Agent Timothy Furhman, reporting, "Tonight, new development in the hunt for polygamist cult leader Warren Jeffs. … The FBI is now beefing up its search for the fugitive who just weeks ago made the list of the country's Top 10 most dangerous criminals. … Agent, why are we beefing up the law enforcement? Is there some tip?" Fuhrman: "We have had a number of call-ins and a number of tips that have come in. I wouldn't necessarily say we're beefing up. We're just expanding the area where we are investigating, involving a number of law enforcement offices and different FBI offices and different techniques that we're employing."

Meanwhile, The Salt Lake City Deseret Morning News (5/30, Winslow) reported, "FBI agents in Salt Lake City declined to comment on the specific number of agents assigned to the Jeffs case but said additional resources are being freed up to deal with the high-profile fugitive. 'You couldn't expect one person to handle all this work,' FBI Special Agent Patrick Kiernan said. 'The leads have continued to come in, and we continue to keep personnel and the FBI very busy.' … 'We have had 482 people on the list, and 452 have been apprehended or located,' Kiernan said. … Close to 150 of those were apprehended because of citizen tips, he added." KSL-TV Salt Lake City (5/30) also notes on its Web site that "officials say a substantial amount of agents and resources have been freed up since to deal with tips and leads on the high-profile fugitive." Jeffs' placement on the Top Ten list "enables any FBI agent in the world to drop everything to assist in the manhunt. … In the 56 year history, 94 percent of the fugitives on the list have been captured."

IMMIGRATION:

Advocates Of Tough Border Security Deliver 10,000 Bricks To Lawmakers. The New York Times (5/31, Hulse, 1.19M) reports that advocates of tough border security have sent an estimated 10,000 bricks to House and Senate lawmakers' offices to "make a none-too-subtle point with lawmakers about where many of their constituents come down on emerging immigration bills." Leaders of the send-a-brick campaign "said they had hit on the idea as a way to emphasize the benefits of a fence along the border with Mexico." The Times adds, "Besides the border fence, the group supports technology improvements for border security, added money and personnel for the Border Patrol and an enhanced security presence in general on the southern border. The brick effort was scheduled to wind down this week, though the organization encouraged people to continue if they desired."

Police Officer Featured In Story About Border Violence Shot Five Times In Nuevo Laredo. USA Today (5/31, Johnson, 2.31M) reports that a police officer in the Mexican border city of Nuevo Laredo was in hospitalized in critical condition after being shot five times outside his home. USA adds that Juan Pablo Elizondo "appeared in a USA TODAY and USATODAY.com report May 18 about the surging violence against police" in the Mexican border city. The attack "highlights the unrelenting threat against Mexican police in a city where two major drug cartels are battling for control of routes into the USA for shipments of drugs and illegal immigrants."

Churches Help Chinese Immigrants Adjust To Life In US. The New York Times (5/31, Chang, 1.19M) reports on efforts of local Chinese churches in Los Angeles to help Chinese immigrants assimilate to life in the US. The Times notes that "the typical newcomer arrives from an obscure corner of mainland China, well educated but with no English skills and just a few hundred dollars. Like Ms. Du, many do not even have a car. But they do have local Chinese churches. If a newcomer needs a ride to the hospital and an English speaker to help translate, someone from Mandarin Baptist's congregation steps forward. Newcomers are eligible for emergency grants, known as 'love gifts,' and the church's 1,600 members are a ready source for job referrals."

Samuelson Says Journalists Didn't Do Their Job On Immigration Bill. Robert Samuelson writes in the Washington Post (5/31, A19, 744K) that the Senate-approved immigration bill "would double the legal immigration that would occur during the next two decades from about 20 million (under present law) to about 40 million. One job of journalism is to inform the public about what our political leaders are doing. In this case, we failed. The Senate bill's sponsors didn't publicize its full impact on legal immigration, and we didn't fill the void."

Immigration Courts Overwhelmed By Case Backlog. The St Petersburg Times (5/31, Adams) reports, "In a small, downtown courtroom overlooking the Miami River, Kenny Rivera, 20, nervously awaits a long-delayed immigration hearing. Three years have passed since he applied for asylum, fearing he would be killed by a notorious street gang if he were forced to return to his native Honduras. … This kind of delay is not unusual at Miami's immigration court, which is one of the nation's busiest - and most backlogged." The Times continues, "As the United States tries to secure the border with Mexico, the nation's overburdened immigration courts are bursting at the seams. … The nation's 225 immigration judges, who are employees of the Justice Department, handled more than 352,000 matters last year up 23 percent from 2004, according to the department's Executive Office for Immigration Review, or EOIR, which runs 53 courts nationally." The Times adds, "Efforts to speed up the process have created unexpected problems. … The backlog has spilled over into the federal courts. Complaints of judicial misconduct and anti-immigrant bias have resulted in a rash of appeals to the nation's 11 circuit courts, prompting some federal appellate judges to rebuke lower-ranking colleagues on the immigration bench. … 'Time and again, we have cautioned immigration judges against making intemperate or humiliating remarks during immigration proceedings,' railed Philadelphia Circuit Judge Julio M. Fuentes in a ruling last September. … 'The tone, the tenor, the disparagement and the sarcasm' of the immigration judge 'seem more appropriate to a court television show than a federal court proceeding,' he wrote. … After complaints by federal judges began piling up last year, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales ordered a comprehensive review of U.S. immigration courts. In a sharply worded memo in January, Gonzales, whose grandparents were Mexican immigrants, chastised immigration judges for 'intemperate or even abusive' conduct toward asylum-seekers."

TAX:

Senate May Vote On Estate Tax Repeal In June. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Herman, 2.11M) reports in its "Tax Report" column, "Estate-tax repeal may soon come up for a vote in the Senate." The federal estate tax "is scheduled to disappear in 2010 but return in 2011. The House has voted for permanent repeal. A Senate vote could come early in June. Many wealthy Americans favor retaining the tax but easing its bite."

Democrats Working To Dissuade Baucus From Cooperating On Estate Tax Repeal. The Washington Post's Harold Meyerson (5/31, A19) writes that the Senate will consider legislation sponsored by Sen. Jon Kyl that "would permanently repeal the estate tax on the wealthiest Americans. If enacted, Kyl's bill would plunge the government another trillion dollars into the red during the first decade (2011-2021) that it would be in effect. Behind the scenes, the action has been on the Democratic side in the Senate, as the party's leadership has sought to dissuade Montana's Max Baucus, ranking Democrat on the Finance Committee, from forging a halfway-house compromise with Kyl that would deplete revenue by only $500 billion to $600 billion during that decade." Meyerson adds, "Why any Democrat would back such a measure…is a deep mystery. … Democrats are running this year as the party of comparative fiscal sanity and greater economic equity and security. Baucus's compromise would undermine all those premises."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Nominates Paulson To Replace Snow As Treasury Secretary. President Bush yesterday nominated Goldman Sachs CEO Henry Paulson to be Treasury Secretary. Paulson's nomination is getting favorable reviews, with most analysts predicting he will be confirmed by the Senate. NBC Nightly News (5/30, story 4, 1:25, Gregory, 9.87M) reported Paulson "is getting rave reviews so far. On Capitol Hill and on Wall Street it appears that his nomination is assured." Fox News' Special Report (5/30, Cameron) also said Paulson's nomination "was warmly received both on Wall Street and particularly on Capitol Hill. Republicans predicted swift hearings and confirmation." CNN's The Situation Room (5/30, Henry) noted "Democrats like Chick Schumer already saying they will support the nomination. Could be a relatively quick confirmation." On ABC World News Tonight (5/30, story 4, 1:20, Gibson, 8.78M), chief Washington correspondent George Stephanopoulos said Paulson "is very well-respected on Capitol Hill. And all the sounding that I got today is that he should sail through to confirmation."

Typical of the favorable coverage of Paulson's selection is Knight Ridder (5/31, Hutcheson, Hall), which reports Paulson "is arguably the most influential executive on Wall Street, the market's equivalent of a rock star." Also, in its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (5/30, 2.11M) reported, "A speedy, lopsided confirmation is expected for…Paulson." Confirmation "could come by 4th of July break, according to Republican leadership aide."

Even editorial pages that are often critical of Bush are sounding a positive note about Paulson. For example, in its editorial, the New York Times (5/31, 1.19M) calls the appointment "a master stroke," adding Paulson "will bring much-needed clout, pragmatism and credibility to the job. So, for a change, the question raised by a major presidential appointment is not one of competence." The Washington Post (5/31, A18, 744K), in an editorial titled "A Good Nomination," calls Paulson "a welcome addition to a faltering administration," though it also expresses "hope that someone of Mr. Paulson's stature will not merely act as a mouthpiece for dead-end budget policies." Taking a more skeptical view, the Los Angeles Times (5/31, 958K) editorializes that Bush "will be fortunate to have in place a highly credible firefighter if and when another crisis arrives. Unless, that is, financial markets soon determine that [Karl] Rove is still running the show."

ABC World News Tonight (5/30, story 3, 2:15, Stark, 8.78M) reported, "On Wall Street, where Paulson made a fortune now worth more than $600 million, the 60-year-old financier, educated at Dartmouth and Harvard business school, has superstar status. He's an international dealmaker who's been to China more than 70 times and a devout environmentalist who unwinds as a birdwatcher, and has given $100 million of his own money to conservation causes. But his status on Main Street is another story. As famous as Paulson is in the financial markets, most of the public has never heard of him." The New York Times (5/31, Dash,

1.19M) reports Paulson "has accumulated a $700 million equity stake in the Wall Street firm."

The Hill (5/31, Schor) reports that Paulson's selection gave "a welcome boost to congressional Republicans hoping for a more potent White House economic message to parlay into election-year gains." Paulson "is likely to earn quick approval" from the Senate.

The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Solomon, 2.11M) reports "the successful wooing of a prominent executive who -- unlike several recent Bush appointees -- hasn't previously held a post in this administration could bring Mr. Bush some sorely needed credibility, both with financial markets and with the public." And the New York Times (5/31, Andrews, Rutenberg, 1.19M) says the move was "intended to add economic star power to his administration as it tries to fight its way through a thicket of political difficulties." Bush was "eager to bring aboard someone who could potentially do for this administration what another former Goldman chief, Robert E. Rubin, did for President Bill Clinton as a senior economic adviser and as Treasury chief."

The AP (5/31, Aversa) reports the appointment "marked the latest in a string of major changes in the president's personnel lineup that started two months ago with the replacement of Bush's chief of staff and has grown to include his CIA director, budget chief and top trade representative." USA Today (5/31, Jackson, 2.31M) also says "it's the latest move in a personnel shakeup led by new chief of staff -- and Goldman Sachs alumnus -- Joshua Bolten. He is trying to fashion a new team and reinvigorate the White House agenda just months before November elections in which Republicans try to hold their majorities in Congress. … Bolten and others have said Bush is not getting credit for the strong economy. A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll in late April showed approval of Bush's handling of the economy was 34%, amid worry about high gas prices." The President "made it clear that one of Paulson's new duties is communication. He praised the nominee's "ability to explain economic issues in clear terms." The Christian Science Monitor (5/31, Scherer, Feldmann, 61K) reports, "One of the toughest challenges of Mr. Bush's second term has been to eliminate the public's perception gap on the economy -- the seeming disconnect between strong economic numbers and low public opinion of the state of the economy. … 'This is all tied to gas prices,' says Dennis Jacobe, chief economist at the Gallup Organization, based in Princeton, N.J."

The Washington Post (5/31, D1, Masters, 744K) says Paulson "has not shied away from controversy, but he has also been criticized for not paying enough attention until a crisis occurs. He owes his position as the sole head of Goldman to a 1999 coup in which he and several allies forced out Jon S. Corzine -- now the governor of New Jersey and a former US senator -- and Paulson steered Goldman through the stock-analyst scandal relatively unscathed." Paulson "spent part of his early career in Washington, working first in the Pentagon and then as a staff assistant in the White House under President Richard M. Nixon."

The Chicago Tribune (5/31, Neikirk, 643K) says that "even if there is not a huge expectation of a change in economic policy under Paulson, a lot may be different. One can expect a shift in tone, some say, a better understanding of financial markets, and a closer relationship with the Chinese." Paulson's "strength may be in working around the edges of current policy, particularly in expanding free trade and pressing China and other Asian nations to strengthen their currencies against the dollar in order to help American companies compete on a fairer basis. He also could be instrumental in breaking the impasse over a new world trade agreement."

The Washington Times (5/31, Curl, 90K) notes Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "was less supportive" than Schumer, saying, "Mr. Paulson will face many challenges if he is confirmed in steering our economy towards greater prosperity for all Americans. Working families are struggling under high gas prices, rising health care costs, and skyrocketing college tuition. ... I hope Mr. Paulson will share that goal." The Washington Times (5/31, Hill, 90K) also reports National Association of Manufacturers President John Engler "said he expects Mr. Paulson will be able to orchestrate continued growth in the United States as well as a lower value of the dollar that will help to trim the bloated trade balance."

Paulson Wins Assurances On Status Within Bush Team. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Solomon, 2.11M) reports Paulson "has been assured that he will rank with the secretaries of defense and state in the Bush inner circle and that the White House National Economic Council, headed by Mr. Bush's business-school classmate Allan Hubbard, will hold some of its meetings in the Treasury building and that Vice President Dick Cheney will attend some of them." The Journal adds, "If they materialize, those would be significant changes for a White House that has tightly held the power to make economic policy, essentially turning the Treasury secretary into a salesman for tax cuts, the centerpiece of its economic strategy."

Meanwhile, the Los Angeles Times (5/31, Havemann, 958K) says "it was unclear how much Paulson would shape administration policy. Bush's first Treasury secretary, Paul H. O'Neill, was frustrated that he did not have much influence." Snow "found himself cast as a cheerleader for economic policies that were largely forged in the White House rather than at the Treasury Department."

The Financial Times (5/31, Daniel, Ben White) notes Paulson "had previously turned down an offer for the position. Many on Wall St had suggested no such senior banker would not want the job because driving forward far reaching economic policy, such as tax or entitlement reform, would prove difficult during the latter stages of a second term presidency." However, "insiders said on Tuesday that Mr Paulson was unlikely to have accepted the job without some assurances that he could affect change."

The Washington Post (5/31, A1, Fletcher, Blustein, 744K) also says the move "culminated a months-long recruitment during which Paulson rebuffed several White House overtures, according to administration officials and people familiar with Paulson's decision making." White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten "renewed the effort in recent weeks and persuaded his former Goldman Sachs colleague to meet with Bush at the White House earlier this month. It was then, after a long Saturday meeting 11 days ago, that Bush persuaded Paulson to take the job."

Bush Personally Took Part In Persuading Paulson To Take Post. Time.com (5/31, Allen) reports in a Web exclusive that Bush's aides "had been trying to find a successor to John Snow on Wall Street for months, but the most promising candidates had turned them down — including Paulson, just a few months ago. One of the reasons Bush had such a hard time landing a master of the universe like Paulson is that the Treasury job had shrunk during his presidency — at least in the estimation of Wall Street — from a premier policymaking platform to a cheerleading outpost subservient to the West Wing." But an official "involved in the selection process said Bush 'took it up himself, and wouldn't take 'no' for an answer.' Aides said Bush convinced his quarry that he would have a seat and voice at the table, and the President seemed to underscore that during his Rose Garden announcement by saying that 'Paulson will be my principal advisor on the broad range of domestic and international economic issues that affect the well-being of all Americans.'"

Paulson Described As "Huge" Environmentalist. The CBS Evening News (5/30, story 5, 2:35, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported Paulson is "a huge supporter of environmental causes," and "he also believes global warming is a threat, and that could put him at odds with some members of the Bush Administration."

USA Today (5/31, Jones, 2.31M) reports Paulson, "a Republican, is atypical in his passion about the environment, a passion critics say has interfered with his responsibility to shareholders. He's an avid bird watcher and chairman of the Nature Conservancy. He has raised animals from alligators to flying squirrels, and the Goldman Sachs website cites a corporate environmental policy of protecting wildlife and timber." The Los Angeles Times (5/31, Puzzanghera, 958K) runs a similar story under the headline "The Bird-Watching Businessman," in which it describes Paulson as an "ardent environmentalist."

The Washington Times (5/31, Hill, 90K), in a report titled "Some On Right Wary Of Nominee's Green Links," says "conservative groups that defend individual liberties expressed adamant opposition to it yesterday because of the Goldman Sachs chairman's ties to the Nature Conservancy." Myron Ebell, analyst at the Competitive Enterprise Institute in Washington, "said Mr. Paulson has the potential to wreak far more havoc in economic policy than his predecessor, Paul O'Neill, who was fired in 2002 for questioning President Bush's tax-cut plans." He "said Mr. Paulson could become an outspoken advocate for curbs on global warming and other environmental causes within the administration." The New York Times (5/31, Thomas, 1.19M) also describes Paulson as "in some ways an executive in the mold of Paul H. O'Neill, the former Treasury secretary who was forced out by a White House that could not abide his contrarian tendencies."

Traders Upbeat On Paulson Nomination. The Financial Times (5/31, Hughes, Johnson) reports, "Rumours that the nomination might go to Don Evans, the former commerce secretary, had weighed on the dollar as traders assumed he would focus more on trade than on markets." But "many analysts were buoyed on Tuesday by Mr Paulson's knowledge of the markets and his close links with China. … The appointment brought comparisons with Robert Rubin, the Clinton-era Treasury secretary who also had a Goldman Sachs background and is still revered by the markets."

The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Hudson, Karmin, 2.11M), under the headline "Traders Cheer Bush's Treasury Pick," reports, "Currency and bond traders applauded the appointment of…Paulson as the new Treasury secretary, though many said his selection by President Bush would do little to alter the course of a recently weakening dollar or rising interest rates."

Deficit, Competitiveness Agenda Seen As Early Challenges. Time.com (5/30, Kadlec) reports in a Web Exclusive that, "Across Wall Street, they are hoping that Paulson can bring a gravitas to the job that has been missing since the tenures of Larry Summers and another former Goldman executive, Robert Rubin, both of whom served under President Clinton." For "the most part, though, economists agree that Paulson likely will be asked to shape policy, which should give him a stronger voice on all economic issues." Paulson will "need some kind of win to cement his authority. That likely will come in the area of spending cuts." If Paulson "can rein in spending enough to turn the deficit around it will be clear that there was no pre-nup, and his words will carry the full weight of the U.S. government the first time he confronts an international or domestic crisis."

The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Hitt, 2.11M), meanwhile, reports Paulson "accepted his nomination as Treasury secretary by highlighting the need for the nation to stay competitive." But "one of his first challenges will be guiding…Bush's ballyhooed competitiveness agenda out of choppy waters on Capitol Hill." The initiative "started out with wide support among senior Democrats and Republicans in Congress. As the election year progresses, key planks face an uncertain future." As Treasury secretary, Paulson "would oversee matters from tax and currency policy to regulation of capital markets. In brief remarks yesterday, Mr. Paulson stressed the importance of bolstering the competitiveness of the US economy. … Even before Mr. Paulson's nomination, the White House remained upbeat about the outlook for the competitiveness initiative, and Mr. Bush trumpeted it several times."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, 2.11M) editorializes that Paulson is "a financial heavyweight, and our hope is that his selection means that Mr. Bush has learned his lesson about the need for a strong voice at Treasury. His first choice, Paul O'Neill, marginalized himself with daft priorities. Current Secretary John Snow, who resigned yesterday, is capable but was too often marginalized by the White House." Paulson "will be most useful to the President if he is allowed to be both a policy maker and a vocal public advocate."

N. Gregory Mankiw, former chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, writes in today's Wall Street Journal (5/31, 2.11M) that "while Mr. Snow helped steer the economy through a recessionary storm, he leaves for Mr. Paulson a more daunting task -- getting the long-term fiscal numbers to add up. To understand the challenge that Mr. Paulson faces, let's start with a fact about which every serious policy analyst agrees: The government budget is on an unsustainable path. … If Hank Paulson wants to leave the nation's finances in better shape than he found them, his main job will be to focus attention on the problem."

Hayden Sworn In As CIA Director. The New York Times/AP (5/31) reports, "Gen. Michael V. Hayden was sworn in as director of the C.I.A. and told agents that they must be competent and cooperative to keep the 'central' in Central Intelligence Agency." He added "that only the C.I.A. had the 'connective tissue' to bring the intelligence community together." An agency spokeswoman said he received "a standing ovation." President Bush plans attend a "a second swearing-in" at the C.I.A. campus in Langley, Va. USA Today (5/31, 4A, 2.31M) also covers this story.

WSJournal Criticizes Hayden For Not Pushing Reform. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, A12, 2.11M) editorializes that Hayden "has sent more signals that would soothe the souls of Langley's uncounted career bureaucrats than push the cause of reform." He solicitously told Michigan Democrat Carl Levin he wasn't 'comfortable' with work done by former Undersecretary of Defense Douglas Feith," whose office checked the CIA's analyses. Hayden "should have been asked to elaborate on why he is uncomfortable that analysts might have to explain how they arrive at certain conclusions." Hayden didn't "have to validate a good deal of the political left's current, if amusingly ironic, defense of the CIA's career spooks: the idea that policy makers should only rarely question the careerists' judgment, and that the careerists' assumptions shouldn't be challenged by new blood from the outside." So far, "his performance at his hearing makes us think his critics," who considered his nomination "a surrender to an agency that has often performed badly but then tried to undermine the government's policy through leaks and insubordination," may have "had a point."

Senate Confirms Capka As Federal Highway Administration Director. The AP (5/31) reports the Senate "approved President Bush's nominee to head the Federal Highway Administration after four Democratic senators dropped their opposition to him. J. Richard Capka was approved by voice vote Friday, just before the Senate left for its Memorial Day recess." Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., "held up consideration of Capka's appointment because he said the Bush administration wouldn't release money for a transportation project in his state. But Baucus let Capka's appointment go forward after Transportation Secretary Norman Mineta assured him the situation would be worked out, said Baucus spokeswoman Sara Kuban."

Reid Says Attending Boxing Matches Is "Official Duty." The Associated Press (5/30, Hennessey) reports Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "said it's his official duty to attend boxing matches in Nevada and that he did nothing wrong when he accepted complimentary ringside seats from a state agency that was lobbying him." Reid said, "I would be criticized if I didn't go. It's just like going to an Ohio State football game, an Arizona State football game - in Nevada, boxing is it. I have an obligation to make sure boxing is conducted properly not only in Nevada but around the country." The AP adds Reid was "responding to an Associated Press story that detailed how the senator had accepted free tickets possibly valued at several thousand dollars from the Nevada Athletic Commission, the agency that regulates boxing in the state." Reid "made his comments after addressing a group of veterans gathered at town hall meeting also attended by Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, who was in town fundraising. Dean called criticism of Reid's ethics 'ridiculous' and repeated his attacks on Republicans."

NYTimes Says Reid's Acceptance Of Boxing Tickets Reinforces Need For Ethics Reform. The New York Times (5/31, 1.19M) says in an editorial that Reid "said his conscience was clear because he had not violated Senate rules by taking the free tickets. Indeed, the rules do allow gifts from state agencies (although they caution against attempts to influence official decisions). Each lawmaker must make his own call in countless such situations, and Senator John McCain, a fight-night companion of Mr. Reid in 2004, chose to pay for his $1,400 championship tickets." Senator Reid "is hardly in the dock. But his discomfort — and that of House Speaker Dennis Hastert in being mentioned last week in the endless Abramoff speculations — certainly should reinforce the need for Congress to emphasize vigilance over regret by upgrading the enforcement of ethics rules."

Study Finds Some Government Appointees Improperly Obtained Career Jobs. Government Executive (5/31, Mandel) reports, "Most political appointees who have switched to career positions since 2001 did so using the correct process, but 18 such conversions were improperly made and many more were not sufficiently documented, according to a new report." GE continues, "In a survey of 41 agencies, Government Accountability Office reviewers found 144 people converted from noncareer to career positions from May 1, 2001, through April 30, 2005 -- a move known as 'burrowing in.' Most of those conversions took place at the departments of Health and Human Services, Justice, Defense and Treasury. … 'The ability to convert noncareer employees to career positions is an appropriate and valuable process available to agencies,' reviewers stated in the report (GAO-06-381). But they found that of the 130 appointees at the GS-12 level or higher who were converted, 18 may not have followed procedures designed to ensure proper application of merit system principles." GE adds, "The reviewers found that agencies circumvented proper procedures in a variety of ways. In some cases, agencies did more than one of the following: created new career positions specifically for particular individuals, tailored job descriptions to match the resumes of the appointee in question, prevented other potential candidates from applying, selected appointee candidates who were less qualified than other applicants, or failed to honor veterans' preference rules in cases where a veteran would have scored higher than the appointee. … In seven of the 18 cases, the Office of Personnel Management had reviewed the conversion, either because of the position's senior level or its proximity to a presidential election, and allowed it to go forward. … In another 19 cases, reviewers lacked sufficient documentation to verify the hiring procedures used. … Of the 19 conversions for which reviewers found inconclusive documentation, 16 were excepted service positions at the Justice Department which reviewers were unable to trace back through the hiring process. In some cases, the department was unable to produce a copy of the individual's job application, the report noted."

Hastert Seen As Becoming More Assertive. The Christian Science Monitor (5/31, Chaddock, 61K) reports Speaker Dennis Hastert, "who surpasses" former Speaker Joe Cannon's "record in office on June 1, is the un-Cannon. For more than five years, Mr. Hastert has backed President Bush's assertion of presidential authority on issues ranging from war powers to domestic surveillance. Colleagues dub him 'the coach.'" Last week, "the coach turned tough. Angered by the FBI's unannounced raid of the Capitol Hill office of a Democratic colleague, Hastert forced a showdown with the Justice Department over the seized documents, and accused the FBI of trying to 'intimidate' him by spreading rumors that he was part of a corruption probe. It was a rare moment of public assertiveness for a speaker who has preferred to operate behind the scenes. And for the moment, it worked." The controversy "may be just the beginning of Hastert's assertiveness as key House players depart the scene. For most of his 10 terms in the House, Hastert has worked in the shadow of outsized personalities, such as former majority leader Tom DeLay (R) of Texas, who will step down from the House to cope with legal battles on June 9." Brookings Institution senior fellow Stephen Hess said, "It's remarkable that this 'accidental speaker' is about to become the longest-serving [Republican] speaker of the House, especially when you think of all the forceful, powerful speakers we have had in American history."

House GOP Continues To Be Dogged By Divisions. The Hill (5/31, O'Connor) reports as the midterm elections "loom and concern about maintaining their majority hold on the House increases, rank-and-file Republicans have grown more and more combative with their leaders and themselves." In the "past two weeks, Republican House members have sparred openly on the House floor and have criticized their Speaker behind closed doors." And with "immigration reform, an update of the Voting Rights Act and a series of appropriations bills among the few big-ticket items remaining on this year's legislative calendar, it is unlikely these intraparty squabbles will die down any time soon, particularly as vulnerable Republicans seek to distance themselves from their party and their president."

Democrats Debate Offering Specific Proposals On Hot-Button Issues. The Los Angeles Times (5/31, Brownstein, 958K) reports with President Bush "and the Republican-controlled Congress facing bleak approval ratings, many Democrats are increasingly confident that the public is ready to hear the party's alternative policy ideas as the 2006 campaign heats up. The question is whether the Democrats have an alternative ready to present." Party leaders "have provided some specifics about how they would deal with national security, energy issues and ethics reform if they recapture one or both chambers of Congress in November. But on many topics, they have provided only broad hints about their direction. This cautious strategy is generating intensifying debate within the party." On one side "are those who believe the Democrats must present a sharp alternative to Bush's direction — as Republicans did with their 'Contract with America' before sweeping into control of Congress in 1994." On the "other side are strategists who fear that offering too many specifics could allow Republicans to shift focus away from public discontent with how they have governed. Those sentiments appear especially strong among Senate Democrats." But "attempts to minimize the target for Republicans could leave Democrats vulnerable in a different respect. A continued reluctance to detail an agenda, some party strategists say, could allow the Republicans room to define for voters what the priorities of the Democrats are."

First Lady Taking More Active Role In GOP Fundraising. The Hill (5/31, Schor) reports, "House Republicans walking an electoral tightrope as the midterms approach must accept the president's shaky public standing to benefit from the White House's still-muscular fundraising power." The avoidance "by vulnerable incumbents, whether calculated or coincidental, of a public appearance suggesting White House ties is a phenomenon difficult to ascribe to congressional-district or political relationships." A senior GOP strategist said, "There is a pecking order to this, with the president at the top, the VP right near that. The first lady has taken a more active role, and she's able to make things more successful." Just below Mrs. Bush "in the pecking order, the strategist added, is former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, now a political consultant and partner at law and lobbying firm Bracewell & Giuliani."

Morris Claims Bush Oil Ties Will Cost GOP Votes. In his column for The Hill (5/31) Dick Morris writes that while President Bush "has dithered" and the Republicans in Congress "have failed to look beyond Alaska drilling as the solution to our dependence on foreign oil, first Gore and now Hillary have passed them by and staked out their claims to the issue. Bush cannot afford to yield this ground because it is no longer the esoteric preserve of the environmental-policy wonks. Rising gas prices have generated a populist anger at the bottom of the social ladder." Morris adds, "what makes the broader green movement particularly dangerous for the quiescent Republican Party is the oil man in the White House. If this new coalition of greens, pump-enraged dads and enlightened patriots has any single enemy, it is the oil companies and their Middle Eastern allies. But the Bush family's history of involvement with big oil makes this a uniquely dangerous issue for the president."

Majority Of Democratic Candidates Would Back Pelosi For Speaker. The Hill (5/31, Kaplan, Blake) reports, "An overwhelming number of Democratic incumbents running in congressional districts that President Bush won in 2004 would support the ascension of Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) to Speaker should Democrats capture a majority of seats in November. But a handful of Democratic challengers running in Republican-leaning congressional districts are much more cautious than their party's incumbents. … These challengers' cautious responses, however, stand out as the exception to the rule. In an informal survey of Democratic candidates conducted by The Hill, the vast majority of incumbents and challengers asked said they would vote for Pelosi as Speaker if Democrats take the majority."

Congress Has Until June 5 To Act On FAA-Union Dispute. The Washington Post (5/31, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The clock is ticking in the dispute between the Federal Aviation Administration and its largest union, the National Air Traffic Controllers Association. The FAA declared an impasse in contract negotiations April 5 and sent the dispute to Congress, which has until June 5 to act. If Congress takes no action, the FAA can impose its contract proposal on the union. A spokeswoman for Rep. Steven C. LaTourette (R-Ohio) said yesterday that the congressman had introduced a bill to take Congress off the clock and that House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) has promised that the measure will be brought up for a vote next week."

Democratic Strategist Calls Rove "Serial Obstructionist." In a column for USA Today (5/31, 2.31M) Democratic strategist Bob Beckelis writes that White House advisor Karl Rove "is a serial obstructionist. Rove's 2004 campaign strategy was to win by increasing the base of conservative voters with no serious attempt to reach out to independents or Democrats. No wonder important legislation is decided on virtually straight party-line voting. Congress is beginning to look like the British Parliament, where lawmakers vote the party line."

WPost Notes Zinmeister's Alteration Of Profile. In an editorial, the Washington Post (5/31, A18, 744K) notes that Karl Zinsmeister, President Bush's new domestic policy adviser, has admitted altering portions of a profile in order to eliminate criticism of "people in Washington" and the war in Iraq. The Post writes, "Almost anyone who's been the subject of a profile has wished he or she could take back some words, maybe tweak them a bit. No one else that we know of -- certainly no one who's about to become the president's chief adviser on domestic policy -- has had the gall to simply make those changes unilaterally."

OTHER NEWS:

Stock Markets Fall Precipitously On Inflation Fears, Consumer Confidence. ABC World News Tonight (5/30, story 5, :15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Inflation fears and a drop in consumer confidence helped send stock prices tumbling today, with the Dow Jones Industrials down 184 points. For the first time in more than a year and a half, all 30 stocks in the Dow Jones Industrial Average fell." The CBS Evening News (5/30, story 5, 2:35, Schieffer, 7.66M) also reported "there was another big sell-off on Wall Street today. The Dow fell 184 points [to close at 11,094.43], the NASDAQ lost 45 [to close at 2,164.72]." NBC Nightly News (5/30, story 5, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) also noted stocks took "a tumble today."

USA Today (5/31, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M), however, headlines its story on the economy "Consumer Confidence Stays High," and says consumer confidence "dipped in May but remained strong despite apprehension about jobs and incomes, according to a report out Tuesday. The consumer confidence index was 103.2 in May, down from 109.8 in April, when it was the highest in nearly four years, the Conference Board said." The decline "comes after two months of gains, and confidence was still high. The index was as low as 61.4 in March 2003." USA Today adds, "The fact that confidence has remained high despite a slowing housing market and elevated gas prices bodes well for the economy, says Sean Snaith, director of the Business Forecasting Center at the University of the Pacific."

The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Derby, 2.11M), in a report titled "Consumer Confidence Is Slipping On Concerns Over Economy, Jobs," and says consumer confidence "is losing ground on concerns about the economic outlook and the labor market." The New York Times/AP (5/31), meanwhile, reports consumer confidence "soured in May, as Americans worried about the future of the economy and the outlook for jobs."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (5/31, D1, Irwin, 744K) reports stocks "fell sharply yesterday as skittish investors reacted negatively to news about oil prices, consumer confidence levels and comments by a Federal Reserve official." Michael H. Moskow, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago, "suggested in an interview on CNBC that inflation is running at the high end of what is acceptable. 'Inflation is at the upper end of a level that I think is consistent with price stability and is a situation we have to monitor very carefully,' Moskow said. H is remarks were a major reason that the odds of the Fed raising short-term interest rates next month rose from 35 percent to about 50 percent, as measured by pricing in futures markets, Pado said." And the Wall Street Journal (5/31, Browning, 2.11M) says "the plunge reflected resurgent fears that slowing economic growth caused by high oil prices and rising interest rates could put a lid on corporate profits." The New York Times (5/31, Peters, 1.19M) also attributes the sell-off to "worries about inflation and another rise in interest rates."

USA Today (5/31, Shell, 2.31M) reports, "No matter if you blame it on a seasonal quirk, profit taking or an old-fashioned Wall Street price correction, the stock market's steep slide this month has distressed investors muttering, 'Mayday!' May, which started off strong, is living up to its reputation as a not particularly profitable month for stocks, as well as the starting point for what historically has been a weak six-month period for stocks. … As the damage and concern mount, money managers are trying to decipher whether this month's pullback is normal and temporary or whether it signals the beginning of a steeper decline."

World Bank Raises Forecast For Global Growth. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, White, 2.11M) reports, "The World Bank raised its forecast for global economic growth this year, arguing that sound policy frameworks have made many countries -- especially developing nations -- more resilient to high oil prices." The body "expects the global economy to expand 3.7% this year, up from its November forecast of 3.2% growth. The bank believes the global economy expanded 3.6% in 2005."

Freddie Mac's Income Dropped 27% In 2005. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Hagerty, 2.11M) reports, "Freddie Mac reported a 27% drop in net income for 2005 to $2.13 billion from $2.94 billion a year earlier, reflecting the costs of settling shareholder suits, losses on Hurricane Katrina and accounting changes. Earnings per share declined to $2.75 from $3.94 in 2004 at the McLean, Va., mortgage-finance company."

The Washington Post (5/31, Shin, 744K) reports, "Though delayed by two months, the release of the 2005 results was another step in the company's efforts to put its accounting problems behind it. Last month, it agreed to pay $220 million to settle shareholder lawsuits and a $3.8 million fine to settle charges that it violated campaign finance laws. The company hopes to resume timely financial reporting with its full-year 2006 results."

Ford Race Could Determine Democrats' Chances Of Taking Senate Majority. The New York Times (5/31, Toner, 1.19M) reports that Rep. Harold Ford's bid for US Senate in Tennessee may determine the Democratic Party's chances of retaking the Senate majority. The South "has become a Republican stronghold in recent years, the castle keep for the party's Senate majority. Democrats lost five seats in the region in 2004. Of the 22 Senate seats in the South, only 4 are now held by Democrats. Party leaders are keenly aware that until they make inroads in the South, any stable majority in the Senate will be hard to achieve. But they have hopes that Mr. Ford can begin to turn the tide."

Ford's Uncle To Go On Trial This Fall. Meanwhile, the New York Times (5/31, Emery, 1.19M) reports that jury selection has begun in the trial of Roscoe Dixon, a former state lawmaker charged in a federal corruption sting. Dixon "was indicted with four sitting state lawmakers in May 2005. He is on trial in Federal District Court in Memphis on charges of extortion and accepting bribes, accused of taking $9,500 from a bogus company created by the F.B.I. John N. Ford, a Memphis Democrat" and uncle of Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. John Ford "will go on trial in the fall."

Clinton To Launch Reelection Effort Today. Knight Ridder (5/31, Thomma) reports that as Sen. Hillary Clinton kicks off her reelection campaign today, she does with the image of "a leader of her party and the expectation she'll be the front-runner for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination. Yet many Democrats and analysts think she's failed to lead at a pivotal time for her party and the nation, complaining that she's been overly cautious and timid in her first term. They contend that she's remained a backbencher on major issues such as the Iraq war and immigration. And they say she's squandered the unique platform her celebrity gives her to put other issues in play, such as expanding health care."

The New York Times (5/31, Kornblut, 1.19M) says that Clinton's reelection effort "is, in essence, the campaign that isn't. Even as Mrs. Clinton insists she is focused squarely on her re-election this year — not, as so many speculate, on the presidential campaign of 2008 — the junior senator from New York is not running anything like a recognizable race (apart from her huge fund-raising apparatus, which itself makes it stand out, and which her own advisers admit has more to do with preparing for 2008 than 2006). … Mrs. Clinton's strategists say she is doing more or less what any other unopposed incumbent would do — and if anything is spending more time and money than the other senator from New York, Charles E. Schumer, did in his last race."

New York Democrats Endorse Spitzer For Governor. The New York Times (5/31, Cooper, Hakim, 1.19M) reports that New York state's Democratic Party has endorsed Eliot Spitzer's campaign for governor. The Times notes that Spitzer's "easy victory at the convention was a foregone conclusion, and the unity it demonstrated contrasts with the disagreements among the Republicans, who begin meeting on Wednesday bitterly divided not only over their candidate for governor, but also whom to support to challenge Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton."

California Democratic Gubernatorial Hopefuls Tied Going Into Primary. The Washington Times (5/31, Pfeiffer, 90K) reports that with under a week remaining until California's gubernatorial primary, state Treasurer Phil Angelides and state Controller Steve Westly, who are battling for the Democratic nomination to challenge Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger are in a statistical dead heat. A poll "released by the Los Angeles Times last week shows Mr. Angelides leading Mr. Westly by 3 percentage points, 37 percent to 34 percent. However, the lead is within the poll's statistical margin of error, and a full 28 percent of Democratic primary voters say they are still undecided heading into the final week of campaigning."

Cannon Decries Angelides' "Negative Campaigning." Lou Cannon writes in the Washington Post (5/31, A19, 744K), "In an oft-shown 30-second commercial, California state Controller Steve Westly calls his opponent in the Democratic primary race, Phil Angelides, a 'champion smear artist.' The quotation is attributed prominently to The Post, with the date given in smaller letters: May 31, 1994. At that time I was writing a syndicated column, but I had no memory of writing those words 12 years ago. Perhaps I'd quoted someone? No such luck. My wife looked it up and found that the someone was me." Cannon adds that "whether he wins or loses, Angelides will not easily erase the stain of the campaign he waged to win state office 12 years ago. Negative campaigning has consequences -- and not only for its victims."

Group Pushing Bipartisan Presidential Ticket For 2008. The AP (5/31, Lester) reports, "A handful of political veterans envision a new look to presidential politics in 2008 -- a bipartisan ticket. … Called Unity08, the group is trying to come up with an alternative presidential ticket headed by either a Democrat, Republican or independent. The ticket would be chosen online at a Unity08 convention in the first half of 2008. Joining [former Maine Gov. Angus] King are Hamilton Jordan and Gerald Rafshoon, former aides to President Carter, and Doug Bailey, a former staffer on President Ford's 1976 campaign. The group plans to build an online community of millions of registered voters who would participate in the online convention. Recruitment has begun on college campuses."

The Washington Post (5/31, A4, VandeHei, 744K) reports, "Their goal is to offer an alternative to the two major party choices -- a unity ticket that will emerge after secure, online balloting that they hope will include millions of Americans. In an announcement statement, Unity08 said its efforts are a reaction to a system that has 'polarized and alienated the American people' through partisanship and interest-group politics." The Post adds, "Unity08's organizers estimate that if 20 percent of the voting public signs on -- hardly a modest goal but only slightly more than what independent H. Ross Perot won in his dramatic 1992 presidential campaign -- then 'our voters will decide the 2008 elections.'"

WSJournal Praises Defeat Of Virginia Gasoline Tax Proposal. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, 2.11M) editorializes, "Last week a gang of conservative GOP members in the general assembly foiled Democratic Governor Tim Kaine's plan to raise $1.4 billion in car, gasoline and diesel taxes to pay for more roads and mass transit. This was a victory against long odds, because the renegade house members were lined up against the Governor, powerful Republicans in the state senate, elements of the business community and the state's largely pro-tax media. … Voters began to wonder why a state with a $2.5 billion budget surplus would need higher taxes only three years after imposing the largest tax increase in state history. It didn't help that Mr. Kaine was trying to raise gasoline taxes (currently 18 cents a gallon) amid soaring gasoline prices."

Iran Making Plans For Invasion By US. The Washington Times (5/31, Athanasiadis, 90K) reports, "Iran, apparently anticipating an American invasion, has quietly been restructuring its military and testing a new military doctrine that calls for a decentralized, Iraqi-style guerrilla campaign against an invading force." Iran has carried out "a series of war games…since late last year to test the army's readiness." Moreover, a "European military attache in Tehran told The Washington Times that the Revolutionary Guard is moving away from a joint command with the ordinary army and taking a more prominent role in controlling Iran's often porous borders, even as it makes each of Iran's border provinces autonomous in the event of war."

Saudi Ambassador Warns Of "Catastrophic" Consequences Of Strike On Iran. The Washington Times (5/31, Sands, 90K) reports Saudi Ambassador Prince Turki al-Faisal warned yesterday that a "military strike against Iran's suspected nuclear sites would have 'catastrophic' effects on other Persian Gulf states and on U.S. interests in the region and beyond." Prince Turki "said his country supports the U.S.-backed diplomatic campaign at the United Nations" but is "against any military conflict." He "said any conflict would be felt immediately in world oil markets and predicted that Iran would retaliate against U.S. allies and interests."

US Agrees To Draft Iran Resolution Without Threat Of Force. The New York Times (5/31, Weisman, 1.19M) reports that the "Bush administration, seeking to enlist Russian support for a United Nations Security Council resolution on Iran, has agreed to language ruling out the immediate threat of military force." The resolution would "call on Iran to suspend various nuclear activities." The Times reports, "Also being negotiated are a package of benefits in nuclear energy, economic activities and security to be offered Iran if it cooperates in ending its nuclear activities." The Bush administration has "quietly expressed misgivings about some" possible elements of the package.

Iran Says It Is Ready To Restart Negotiations With EU. The AP (5/31, Yoong) reports Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said Tuesday "that Tehran is ready to restart negotiations with the European Union on its nuclear program, but he ruled out direct talks with the United States." His "announcement raised hopes that Iran would react positively to a planned package of incentives meant to convince it to abandon uranium enrichment," which was "put together by the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council plus Germany." However, "Mottaki said there was no question of direct talks with the United States."

The Washington Times characterized Mottaki's comments differently, reporting that he "repeated Iranian calls for direct talks with Washington."

NYTimes Calls For Direct Talks With Iran. In an editorial, the New York Times (5/31, 1.19M) argues for "direct talks between Washington and Tehran in which Iran would be offered a wide-ranging package of economic inducements and security assurances in exchange for completely and verifiably abandoning all programs capable of producing nuclear bomb fuel." The Times writes, "Some Iranian officials are now seeking such talks, yet Washington, perversely, seems uninterested." The Times writes, "It could be a lot easier to persuade Russia and China to enforce" a ban on buying Iranian oil "if Washington agreed to hold direct talks with Iran and it was Iranian intransigence that made them break down. Even better, the talks just might succeed."

US Lawmaker Demands Said To Be Straining US-Pakistan Relationship. The Christian Science Monitor (5/31, Montero, 61K) reports the US-Pakistan relationship "has hit a rough patch" as US lawmakers last week "urged Pakistan to wring more information from disgraced nuclear scientist Abdul Qadeer Khan, alleging that he may yet hold the blueprint to some of Iran's nuclear secrets." The Monitor notes, "So far, the tough talk is coming only from Congress, suggesting that the White House may be more keenly aware of the many demands already placed on Pakistan's President Pervez Musharraf."

Israeli Incursion Into Gaza Leaves Four Palestinians Dead. The New York Times (5/31, Myre, 1.19M) reports the Israeli military "staged their first major operation inside the Gaza Strip since pulling out of the coastal territory last year, ambushing Palestinians late Monday evening as they prepared to fire a rocket, the Israeli military said Tuesday." According to the Times, three members of Islamic Jihad, "who were handling the rocket," were killed, "as well as a Palestinian security officer." The Times notes that Israel's "incursion into Gaza on Tuesday was a new tactic in its attempts to halt Palestinian rocket fire that has been directed at Israeli border towns from northern Gaza." Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniya "condemned 'the Israeli policy of aggression against our people.'" Islamic Jihad "said it tried to fire the rocket in retaliation for a car bombing last week in Lebanon, which killed one of the group's senior members, Mahmoud Majzoub, and his brother." Israel "has denied involvement."

US Official's Reassignment Seen As Evidence Of Dissent Over Somalia Policy. The Washington Post (5/31, A13, Graham, Deyoung, 744K) reports Michael Zorick, an American political officer "previously responsible for monitoring" Somalia, "received an early transfer to another diplomatic post after expressing concerns about U.S. payments to Somali warlords who are battling Islamic groups, according to several administration officials and outside experts on Africa. … One U.S. official said yesterday that earlier this year, Zorick used the State Department's 'dissent channel' to file a memo critical of U.S. policy in Somalia. But the official disputed suggestions that Zorick's transfer was a punishment." The Post adds that the case "provided fresh evidence of a sharp dispute within the U.S. government over how to deal with Somalia."

Militia Seizes Hospital In Mogadishu. The New York Times (5/31, Lacey, 1.19M) reports, "Hospitals have generally been considered neutral territory during the long years of civil conflict in Somalia, but that changed this week when gunmen seized control of an important medical facility in northern Mogadishu, causing many wounded patients to flee. … The International Committee of the Red Cross and the Somali Red Crescent Society issued a statement on Monday condemning the takeover and calling for the immediate withdrawal of the militiamen."

Death Toll From Indonesian Earthquake Reaches 5,700. The CBS Evening News (5/30, story 7, 2:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The death toll from the Indonesian earthquake reached almost 5,700 today, but substantial help is now arriving for the more than 200,000 homeless survivors. That help includes US Marines who flew into the hardest hit town, which is also near a volcano that could erupt at any time." CBS (Petersen) added, "The medical and rescue teams are arriving from around the world just as experts say the time has probably passed for finding any more survivors. It has been too many days. Most structures were small homes where family or neighbors have already found the living and the dead, so it is no longer a race to find survivors but a second race to help the homeless."

US Military Sending Additional Aid To Indonesia. NBC Nightly News (5/30, story 7, 1:55, Hattori, 9.87M) reported, "The Pentagon announced tonight that the USS Essex, an amphibious assault ship with extensive medical facilities, is en route to the quake zone tonight. That's in addition to a contingent of US Marines which arrived with heavy machinery earlier today. They are among the latest in the quake relief effort here."

Agencies Report Fundraising Has Been Slow. The New York Times (5/31, Strom, 1.19M) reports, "The international relief effort to help the victims of Saturday's earth quake in Indonesia got off to an unusually fast start, although fundraising for the venture is progressing slowly so far. Nonprofit groups already had staff and supplies in Indonesia because of the effort to rebuild Aceh Province after the tsunami struck there in the final days of 2004. They shifted those resources to Yogyakarta, the site of the earthquake. … Several groups that have begun fund-raising said their efforts were off to a slow start, in part because public awareness of the disaster was low."

Aid Workers Have Not Yet Visited Some Portions Of Java. The New York Times (5/31, Gelling, 1.19M) reports, "Three days after a powerful earthquake rocked central Java, many devastated villages within the two worst-hit districts have yet to receive any help, residents said Tuesday. … A steady flow of aid, however, continued to arrive Tuesday, as relief agencies and other groups surveyed the area and started distributing supplies. Helicopters buzzed above ruined towns for the first time since the quake. United States marines helped in the distribution effort."

Bolivian Opposition Claims Venezuela Aiding Rebel Militias. The Washington Times (5/31, Arostegui, 90K) reports Bolivian opposition leaders are demanding that President Evo Morales "investigate charges that Venezuela is sending arms and military personnel to organize a special militia for the ruling Movement to Socialism (MAS). Lawmakers of the conservative Podemos party cite immigration records that show nearly 100 Venezuelan military officers have entered Bolivia since Mr. Morales took power in January. … Members of the opposition and sources inside Bolivia's military say that Venezuelan military activities go beyond the technical assistance, involving espionage and clandestine weapons shipments."

Bolivian, Ecuadorian Embrace Of Chavez Energy Policies Seen As Unwise. In a piece appearing in USA Today, the Christian Science Monitor's Danna Harman (5/31) writes that in "recent weeks," Bolivian President Evo Morales and Ecuadorian President Alfredo Palacio "have taken a page out of Venezuelan populist President Hugo Chavez's natural resources manual. It's the page that features politicizing the oil and gas industries and nationalizing them — keeping more of the petrodollars at home but alienating

longtime foreign investors. … The moves played well at home." However, "while popular, and clearly profitable initially, such nationalizations — and more particularly the way in which they are carried out — are unwise, say critics, and are likely, in the long term, to hurt those who are applauding now."

Canadian Oil Sands Production Reportedly Devastates Environment. The Washington Post (5/31, Struck, 744K), in a front-page story titled, "Canada Pays Environmentally For U.S. Oil Thirst: Huge Mines Rapidly Draining Rivers, Cutting Into Forests, Boosting Emissions," reports, "Huge mines [in Alberta] turning tarry sand into cash for Canada and oil for the United States are taking an unexpectedly high environmental toll, sucking water from rivers and natural gas from wells and producing large amounts of gases linked to global warming. The digging…has proliferated at gold-rush speed, spurred by high oil prices, new technology and an unquenched U.S. thirst for the fuel. The expansion has presented ecological problems that experts thought they would have decades to resolve." The Post notes that when oil sands "became recognized as economically viable in 2003, Canada suddenly emerged as holder of the world's second-largest oil reserves, behind Saudi Arabia. By 2015, according to industry forecasts, the oil sands will account for at least one-fourth of North America's oil production. The United States already is counting on Canada to help wean it from oil from the Middle East."

UN Finds Pace Of AIDS Epidemic Has Slowed. The New York Times (5/31, Altman, 1.19M) reports, "New surveys suggest that the global AIDS epidemic has begun to slow, with a decline in new H.I.V. infections in about 10 countries, the leader of the United Nations AIDS program said Tuesday. Outside of those countries — which include Haiti, Cambodia, Kenya and Zimbabwe — the number of new AIDS infections continues to rise or hover at its current pace."

UN Says India Now Has Most AIDS Cases. The Wall Street Journal (5/31, Chase, 2.11M) reports India has surpassed South Africa "as the country with the largest number of people infected with HIV/AIDS, underscoring the growing impact the disease is having on the South Asian subcontinent. India's estimated total of 5.7 million infected people narrowly exceeds South Africa's estimated 5.5 million, a United Nations group reported. The estimates, released yesterday in the 2006 Report on the Global AIDS Epidemic, emphasize that the center of the disease remains in sub-Saharan Africa."

UN Hosting AIDS Conference. The Christian Science Monitor (5/31, LaFranchi, 61K) reports, "High-level delegations from around the world gather at the UN in New York this week for a five-year review of global efforts against AIDS that will highlight both progress and worrying trends. An encouraging note will be sounded by reports that infection rates are falling in some heavily affected African countries, at least in part as a result of modified behavior among African youths. But with the overall number of HIV cases still increasing - 5 million new ones last year - alarms will be sounded. Chief among them is concern over the growing concentration of the disease among women - with some experts demanding that global prevention and treatment efforts be more seriously focused on them."

The Washington Post (5/31, A10, Brown, 744K) reports, "The number of people getting AIDS drug treatment in needy countries has risen more than fivefold in five years, and the number of sites providing it has jumped tenfold in just the past year. At least a quarter-million people are alive today who would not be without the money, effort and expertise expended just since 2003, according to U.N. estimates released Tuesday."

LATimes Says UN Has Failed To Meet 2001 Goals. In an editorial today, the Los Angeles Times (5/31, 958K) writes that the UN "will revisit commitments and goals the world made five years ago to fight the disease. Needless to say, those commitments have been a bust. … Most of the goals set in 2001 not only haven't been met, they aren't even close to being met. The highest-profile goal was the so-called 3 by 5 initiative — getting 3 million people on antiretroviral drugs by 2005. The actual number was fewer than 1.5 million."

East Timor President Attempts To Quash Violent Protests. The Washington Post (5/31, A11, Deutsch, 744K) reports East Timor's President Xanana Gusmao "assumed emergency national security powers Tuesday after machete-wielding mobs torched homes and ransacked buildings in the capital and desperate residents scuffled over scarce food. Youths fired slingshots in running street battles as Australian troops tried without apparent success to quell the violence by halting and disarming gangs hiding their faces with T-shirts. What started as sporadic clashes between former soldiers and government troops has spiraled into open gang warfare. Violence has engulfed the capital, with at least 27 people killed and 100 wounded in the past week."

The New York Times (5/31, Perlez, 1.19M) reports, "Law and order broke down in recent months as the United Nations prepared to end its mission here after five years. An insurrection in East Timor's security forces turned into gang warfare in the streets of Dili, the capital, over the last 10 days, and sent terrified families to makeshift shelters around the city. … In a televised appearance, Mr. Gusmão also appealed to the gangs on the streets to hand their weapons to Australian and other foreign soldiers patrolling the capital."

Australian Troops Said To Face "Mission Impossible" In East Timor. The Washington Times (5/31, Keats, 90K) reports, "Analysts warn Australia may have stumbled into a 'mission impossible' in nearby East Timor, where its troops dominate an international force of more than 2,000 soldiers and police seeking to end a lawless rampage that threatens to devolve into civil war."

Hunger, Disease Now Leading Killers In Darfur. The New York Times (5/31, Polgreen, 1.19M) reports, "Dr. Sayid Obeid Bakhiet's clinic, one of just two left in this vast, squalid camp of 35,000 people [in Zam Zam, Sudan] displaced by the conflict in the huge Darfur region of western Sudan, is out of money. It will be forced to close at the end of June unless the organization that runs it, the Sudanese Red Crescent, finds more cash, Dr. Bakhiet said." The Times goes on to report that "at least 200,000 and perhaps as many as 450,000 have died as a direct result of the conflict in Darfur…though no one is sure how many of the deaths have come from combat and how many from the hunger and disease that have been caused or worsened by the war. But these days, people mostly die because they cannot get health care, clean water or enough food."

Americans Said To Be Unaware Of Darfur Situation's Complexity. In an op-ed for the New York Times (5/31, 1.19M) Alan J. Kuperman, assistant professor of public affairs at the University of Texas, writes, "Thousands of Americans who wear green wristbands and demand military intervention to stop Sudan's Arab government from perpetrating genocide against black tribes in Darfur must be perplexed by recent developments. Without such intervention, Sudan's government last month agreed to a peace accord pledging to disarm Arab janjaweed militias and resettle displaced civilians. By contrast, Darfur's black rebels, who are touted by the wristband crowd as freedom fighters, rejected the deal because it did not give them full regional control. Put simply, the rebels were willing to let genocide continue against their own people rather than compromise their demand for power." Kuperman adds, "Darfur was never the simplistic morality tale purveyed by the news media and humanitarian organizations."

Egyptian Government Detaining Bloggers Indefinitely. The Washington Post (5/31, A10, Williams, 744K) reports, "At least six bloggers are among about 300 protesters jailed during the past month's suppression of demonstrations. The bloggers, supporters say, were singled out by police, who pointed them out before agents rushed in to hustle them away. In the view of some human rights observers, the Egyptian government has begun to note political activity online and is taking steps to rein it in." The Post adds, "The legal status of the jailed bloggers and other detainees distresses their relatives and friends: Under Egypt's emergency laws, which have been in place for 25 years, the bloggers can be jailed indefinitely."

Dutch Ambassador Says Hirsi Ali Is Not Being Extradited. Boudewijn J. van Eenennaam, the Netherlands' Ambassador to the US, writes in the Wall Street Journal (5/31, 2.11M), "In regard to the May 20 editorial commentary 'Dutch Courage' by Daniel Schwammenthal: Ayaan Hirsi Ali is not being extradited from the Netherlands, nor is she being asked to leave. Her citizenship was recently called into question. During a debate on May 16, the Dutch parliament asked the Minister for Immigration and Integration, Rita Verdonk, to investigate and, if necessary, expedite the procedures to grant Ms. Hirsi Ali citizenship. The prime minister, Jan Peter Balkenende, has stated that this parliamentary request will prevail. Ms. Verdonk asserted that she will promptly carry out the parliament's request."

UN Security Council Urged To Take Action Against Myanmar. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (5/31, 2.11M) Jared Genser, an attorney in Washington, D.C., with DLA Piper Rudnick Gray Cary LLP, writes, "How much worse does the situation in Burma need to get before the U.N. Security Council decides to act? On Saturday, the military junta again extended the house arrest of opposition leader Aung San Suu Kyi for a year. The decree came only a day after U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan made a rare appeal for her release. … The junta's unequivocal rejection of the U.N.'s outstretched hand should come as no surprise. The generals in Rangoon have a long history of hinting at democratic reforms at critical moments so as to avert further action against them. That's why it's now time for the Security Council to demand actions rather than words from the junta."

Collectively, the coalition members reflect the voice of more than 44.4 million Hispanics living in the United States and Puerto Rico, serving those diverse communities through advocacy, education, representation, assistance, capacity building, public policy support, resource development, and the exertion of political influence.

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 45

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 46

TERRORISM NEWS:

Umer Hayat Pleads Guilty To Lying To Customs Agents. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/1, Thompson) Umer Hayat "pleaded guilty Wednesday to a lesser charge rather than be retried on allegations that he lied to the FBI about his son's attendance at a terrorist training camp, according to court papers." Hayat, "an ice cream vendor, pleaded guilty to lying to customs agents about more than $28,000 he and family members were carrying on a trip to Pakistan three years ago," and prosecutors will recommend he be sentenced to time served and three years supervised release. US Attorney McGregor Scott said, "This outcome was not, of course, the one most desired by the government. However...our region is safer today than it was one year ago." The Lodi News-Sentinel (6/1, Bohm) adds that Hayat "remains on home detention and is scheduled to be sentenced Aug. 18. The actual sentence will be up to U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr., who could sentence Hayat to as much as five years in prison and a $250,000 fine." The "plea deal came five days shy of June 5, the one-year mark since the Hayats were arrested during a high-profile investigation involving dozens of FBI agents swarming through Lodi."

The New York Times (6/1, McKinley, 1.19M) reports that the plea "brings to a close a federal prosecution that raised questions about government interrogation techniques. Both Hayats had submitted confessions to investigators despite limited English, an element that some legal experts say could open their convictions to appeal. In a statement on Wednesday…seemed to strike a victorious note. 'After 9/11, the U.S. Justice Department's top priority is to detect, disrupt, and deter future acts of terrorism,' he said. 'This mission was accomplished.'" Under the headline "Terrorism-Related Charges Are Dropped," The Los Angeles Times (6/1, Tempest, Bailey, 958K) notes, "Six weeks ago, a hopelessly split jury failed to reach a verdict in his case," and Scott "said retrying a case that had resulted in a mistrial was too daunting." Defense lawyer Johnny Griffin "described the plea bargain as a victory for Umer Hayat, who he said had been unfairly branded as a terrorist." The Sacramento Bee (6/1, Walsh, 301K) also reports on Hayat's plea agreement.

Impact Of EU Court's Decision On Terrorist Watch Lists Examined. In a Financial Times op-ed (6/1), Brookings Institution fellow Richard Falkenrath says if a Dutch national "terrorist…arrives at Amsterdam's Schiphol Airport and buys a one-way ticket on the daily KLM flight to New York" traveling "under his real name" like "the September 11 2001 hijackers," and if "he travels under his real name. US authorities have uncovered his identity and placed him on the terrorist watch list. The question is: will he be caught and, if so, when? Currently, even if the US authorities had provided this terrorist's name to Dutch or European authorities, there is no watch-listing system in either jurisdiction that would have identified him as he purchased his international ticket or transited through Dutch immigration control. Moreover, because he is a Dutch national he would not have been required to apply for a visa to enter the US. So he would pass out of Europe undetected." The terrorist likely would "be identified once his flight had left European soil. Under a May 2004 agreement between the US and the European Commission, European airlines were allowed to transmit their passenger manifests to US authorities 15 minutes after take-off. Two days ago, the European Court of Justice annulled this agreement." US and European officials "are trying to figure out what to do now that the ECJ has scuttled their passenger-data agreement. The first thing they should do is study the ways in which new technologies and procedures can be used to achieve their basic security aims while minimising the impact on personal privacy."

WSJ Says EJC Ruling Unlikely To Jeopardize Overseas Air Travel. The Wall Street Journal (6/1, 2.11M) say in an editorial, "Despite some media hyperventilating, there's next-to-no chance Europe's airlines will stop transferring important passenger information to the U.S." In its ruling, the EJC "did not address the issue of privacy rights. Rather, it said the European Commission was wrong to have based the passenger-data deal on EU law regulating commercial activities. This was not a trade matter but one of public security, it said. The court gave the EU 90 days to find a solution, and until then the agreement with the U.S. remains in place."

Legal Challenges In Terrorism Prosecutions Examined. Voice of America (6/1, Malone) reports, "Al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui remains the only person convicted in connection with the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks. Others who allegedly planned the 9/11 attacks are being held by the U.S. abroad. But as of now, there are no plans to put them on trial." VOA continues, "Moussaoui was sentenced to life in prison after he pled guilty to conspiring with al-Qaida to fly planes into buildings. … But what about some of the alleged planners of the 9/11 attacks now in custody, like Khalid Sheikh Mohammed or Ramzi Binalshibh, who allegedly financed the 19 hijackers on September 11." VOA adds, "U.S. officials say that despite the lengthy and challenging prosecution of Zacarias Moussaoui, criminal prosecution remains an option. … 'The Moussaoui case, I think, demonstrates that we can be successful,' said Paul McNulty, the deputy U.S. attorney general. 'In our investigations, we will continue to use every tool and authority available to us to identify risks at the earliest stage possible. And in deciding whether to prosecute, we will not wait to see what becomes of risks.' … Legal experts and others wonder if the difficulties on display in the Moussaoui case are making it less likely that the government will want to try the alleged masterminds of the 9/11 attacks in open court. … Trying terrorist suspects in open court could be risky because the government might be forced to reveal some of its intelligence sources as it presents evidence. Prosecutors would also have to address whether torture was used to obtain confessions. … While it remains unclear what the United States will do with the alleged high profile al-Qaida members in custody, prosecutions of lower-level suspects continue. … Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty says since the 9/11 attacks, the Justice Department has secured 253 convictions against 435 defendants in terrorism-related cases. Many of those convictions, however, involved minor crimes and immigration violations not directly related to terrorist acts or plots."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

NYC, DC Officials Decry Cuts In DHS Anti-Terrorism Funding. DHS announced its Urban Areas Security Initiative grants for 2006 yesterday, cutting money for New York City and Washington DC while boosting funding for some Southern and Midwestern cities, including Omaha and Louisville, Kentucky. The Washington Post (6/1, A1, Eggen, Sheridan, 744K) in a front page article reports the agency "slashed anti-terrorism money" from "the two cities targeted on Sept. 11, 2001," prompting "outrage from lawmakers and local officials in both areas, who questioned the wisdom of cutting funds so deeply for cities widely recognized as prime terrorist targets. The decision came less than five months after Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff unveiled changes in the grants plan intended to focus funding on areas facing the gravest risk of attack." The Post adds that "department officials struggled yesterday to defend" the grants.

The New York Times (6/1, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "Homeland security officials said the grants were a result of a more sophisticated evaluation process, combined with a smaller overall allocation of money from Congress." Meanwhile, Rep. Peter T. King, who called the distribution of grants "a knife in the back to New York," said officials at DHS "who had briefed him about the grants made clear that they were unimpressed with the city's plan." The City's "emphasis on spending on recurring costs — like overtime — was cited as a factor in the relatively low rating the city's application received, one federal official said."

The Washington Times (6/1, Hudson, Doolittle, 90K) reports DC Mayor Anthony A. Williams called the allocation "very shortsighted," adding that he believed the National Capitol Region "could be attacked again at any time, and now is not the time to back off on our efforts." DHS spokeswoman Tracy Henke, asked by reporters "whether the risk is still higher in the Washington and New York areas," said, "There is risk throughout the nation."

King Calls DHS Spending Plan "Indefensible And Disgraceful." CNN's The Situation Room (5/31, Blitzer) reported, "Some political figures from New York and Washington right now are livid about the Homeland Security Department's new spending priorities. Officials say the two cities targeted in the 9/11 attacks are getting less money this year than in 2005. … New York Republican Congressman Peter King, the chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, is calling the new spending plan -- and I'm quoting now – 'absolutely indefensible and disgraceful.' He goes on to say, 'as far as I'm concerned, the Department of Homeland Security and the administration have declared war on New York.'"

Muslim-Americans Complain Of Increased Scrutiny While Traveling. The New York Times (6/1, MacFarquhar, 1.19M) reports, "Getting through United States airports and border crossings has grown more difficult for everyone since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11. But Muslim Americans say they are having a harder time than most, sometimes facing an intimidating maze of barriers, if not outright discrimination. Advocacy groups have taken to labeling their predicament 'traveling while Muslim,' and accuse the government of ignoring a serious erosion of civil rights." The American Civil Liberties Union plans to "go back to court to broaden a suit on behalf of Muslims and Arab-Americans who are demanding the United States government come up with a better system for screening travelers."

Air Marshal Who Intentionally Blew Cover Still Flying. USA Today (6/1, Frank, 2.31M) reports Spencer Pickard, the federal air marshal who "intentionally blew his cover to try to show that agency rules make the undercover officers easy to spot," said yesterday "that he flew, armed, three times last week. … Marshal service spokesman Dave Adams said Pickard 'is still an active air marshal, he's still on our books, and he's going to still be flying missions.'" USA Today adds that 'he and another spokesman for the service, Conan Bruce, declined to address why Pickard could still fly." Bruce, meanwhile said that policies cited in a 20/20 report featuring Pickard "'have either been changed or are going through changes'" under FAMS chief Dana Brown.

WPost Calls Democratic Proposal Requiring Cargo Container Inspections "A Terrible Idea." The Washington Post (6/1, A18, 744K) says in an editorial, "When a House committee voted this spring against an amendment that would have required all cargo containers bound for this country to be individually inspected in their ports of origin, Congress temporarily put to rest what could have been yet another hyped-up wave of politically motivated anxiety about American port security. Although the House later passed a bill that provides extra funding for nuclear screening and other measures, Democrats vowed to bring up the inspection issue again -- and ran advertisements around the country attacking Republicans who oppose it. Before the 'inspect every container' mantra becomes a national war cry, it's important to point out that this is a terrible idea."

NYTimes Says WTC Development Agency Should Take Control Of Memorial Foundation. The New York Times (6/1, 1.19M) says in an editorial, "Gretchen Dykstra's resignation last Friday as head of the World Trade Center Memorial Foundation took almost no one by surprise. Some of the blame for the foundation's problems will surely fall to Ms. Dykstra's account. But the real difficulty is structural. The foundation, which is private, was given a job it should never have had: To build the memorial. That made its real job — raising money for the memorial — harder than it should have been." The Times says the "vague relation between the Lower Manhattan Development Corporation and the Memorial Foundation should be clarified. The development agency, in partnership with the Port Authority, should take over the task of building the memorial."

Mayfield Fears Coastal Residents Not Prepared For Hurricane Season. In a report marking the start of hurricane season, USA Today (6/1, O'Driscoll, 2.31M) reports, "Max Mayfield, director of the National Hurricane Center in Miami, says people have to wake up. … State and local governments along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts are heeding the alarm of last year's record onslaught and forecasts of another worse-than-normal hurricane season this year," but "Mayfield says many people along the USA's hurricane coasts are not poised for the next tropical storm, let alone for a monster like 2005's Katrina." Mayfield cites a poll by the National Hurricane Survival Initiative found half of the 1,100 respondents "don't feel vulnerable to hurricanes, and three in five have no family disaster plan."

The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 13, 2:30, Cowan, 7.66M) profiled Mayfield, who is "to coastal residents, what Alan Greenspan was to Wall Street: When he talks, people listen." It "falls to him to warn the nation of potential natural disasters. Preparedness has become his passion. He travels the nation during the off season doing interviews, showing off the latest technology to kids, and hoping his newfound but unwanted celebrity status will help get the importance of planning for storms through people's heads." But his "message is falling on deaf ears. Thirteen percent of coastal residents say they still won't evacuate this year in the face of a hurricane and 60% admit they have no disaster plan."

National Hurricane Forecasters Predict Nine Hurricanes. The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 12, 0:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Tomorrow is June 1st, the official start of the hurricane season. And in their latest forecast, scientists at Colorado State University predict almost twice as many major storms as normal. Nine hurricanes are expected, five of those could be major, meaning a Category 3 or stronger. Forecasters say there's a strong chance the US East Coast or the Florida Peninsula will be hit."

Insurance Companies Cutting Back Coverage In Coastal Areas. ABC World News Tonight (5/31, story 10, 2:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that as the hurricane season begins, "it's likely to be an active one. The National Hurricane Center predicts there will be eight to ten full hurricanes. That's potential trouble for coastal residents in hurricane zones. But they already have insurance troubles long before the storms arrive." ABC (Kofman) added, "Two years, eight hurricanes, $72 billion in insurance claims. Now, as another hurricane season begins, the insurance industry is running for cover. In Florida, All-State is refusing to renew the policies of more than 200,000 customers. And the company is refusing to write new policies for homeowners in 14 Texas counties. Insurance anxiety has spread to the Northeast, where Metlife and All-State say they will not write new policies on Long Island, where there hasn't been a hurricane since Bob hit in 1991." Tom Gallagher, CFO, State of Florida: "When you have no insurance available, you can't get a mortgage, you have no real estate market. And we have tremendous economic problems in our state." Kofman: "Problems even for those who can still get insurance. Here in Florida, State Farm is asking regulators to approve premium increases of 59% for almost a million customers."

Advocate Says Policymakers Ignoring Loss Of Wetlands, Coastal Sprawl. Meanwhile, David Helvarg, president of the Blue Frontier Campaign, and author of "50 Ways to Save the Ocean," in an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (6/1, 958K) writes that despite predictions that this year's hurricane season "will be 'above normal,'" America's hurricane territory is still "stuck in the 1970s and 1980s, when a lull in storm activity aided and abetted unprecedented development along the Atlantic seaboard." Helvarg says "federal policymakers continue to ignore the causal factors that transform major storms into human catastrophes, such as the loss of protective wetlands and coastal sprawl. … Those who think they can rebuild in harm's way using the same assumptions that worked in the last century, or who believe they can manage nature by stockpiling generators and water bottles, are living a dangerous fantasy."

New Orleans Residents Doubt City Ready For Hurricane Season. NBC Nightly News (5/31, story 4, 3:20, Savidge, 9.87M) reported, "It doesn't matter who you talk to, whether it be Federal or local officials, they tell you the same story," that New Orleans "is ready" for the onset of hurricane season. But "talk to the people of New Orleans and many have serious doubts." There was a "partial collapse just this week of a 400-foot section of a hurricane protection levee. It was being repaired when the ground beneath simply gave way." Despite the "setback, the Army Corps of Engineers is confident New Orleans will have the same level of protection it had before Katrina. But for residents like David Lomax of Lakeview, the incident only adds new concerns over how well the Corps fixed 169 miles of failed levees, not to mention the 181 additional miles of potentially weakened levees the Corps didn't touch." Emergency responders "have their own worries. New Orleans has fewer police officers, hospital beds, and even weaker water pressure than a year ago. It's no wonder officials are adamant."

Isaacson Says Levees Will Be Sufficient To Protect City. NBC Nightly News (5/31, story 5, 2:40, Williams, 9.87M) interviewed former Time editor Walter Isaacson, who now serves as vice chairman of the Louisiana Recovery Authority. Asked if he was "convinced that what the Army Corps of Engineers has done" to repair the levee system "will be enough, sufficient to protect this place?" Isaacson said, "Absolutely. I think that the good, armored Category 3 levees means that people will be safe. There may be some damage and flooding in really big storms where some water gets in, but you're never going to see this type of devastation again."

Professor Says Rebuilding Near Beach After Katrina "Makes No Sense." Orrin H. Pilkey, the James B. Duke Professor of Earth Science emeritus at Duke University and a co-author of "The Corps and the Shore," in an op-ed in USA Today (6/1, 2.31M) writes that during a recent trip to the former site of his parents' house in Waveland, Mississippi, which had been flooded during Hurricane Camille in 1969, he "was impressed by the large number of volunteers still helping in the recovery effort" from Hurricane Katrina. Pilkey adds that he also noticed a "proliferation of 'For Sale' signs posted along the beach road" and "a new billboard…advertising a soon-to-be-built four-tower, 36-story beachfront condominium. … The incongruity between volunteers helping the people of Waveland and developers seeking to profit from reconstruction in an obviously dangerous zone couldn't be greater." Pilkey states, "It makes no sense to simply rebuild and even increase building density after Katrina" and, though it may be "difficult to accept, …reconstruction near the beach should be prohibited."

LATimes Says Fears Of Levee Failure Should Be Considered When Approving Development. The Los Angeles Times (6/1, 958K) editorializes that though some of the levees in California's Central Valley "are at risk almost every day," officials in the area "are doling out permits to develop what were once farms and open spaces. The urge to convert is driven not just by profit-seeking landowners but by cities and counties eager for property tax receipts. And it's abetted by flood-insurance rules that assume the levees offer more protection than they really do." Though the state Assembly rejected a bill by Dave Jones that "would hold cities and counties jointly liable with the state to the extent that, by approving a project on undeveloped land, they increase the property damage caused by a flood," the Times says "it should reverse course and approve the bill when it comes up for reconsideration today."

Passing Of Civic-Minded Bankers Said To Make Gulf Coast Rebuilding More Difficult. Otis White, a public policy consultant and columnist for Governing magazine, in the New York Times (6/1, White, 1.19M) writes that bankers like Donald E. Powell, who, before becoming President Bush's coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding, "wore every civic badge worth wearing" in Amarillo, Texas, "rarely lead cities…anymore, and their exit from the stage speaks to how communities have changed — and why it may be harder to mend them when disasters strike." White continues that "there are not many bankers left with the knowledge or authority to invest their banks' resources in bold rebuilding efforts. As the main federal contact for congressional, state, local and private leaders in supporting the recovery of the Gulf Coast, Mr. Powell must already be painfully aware of their passing."

Education Said To Have "Fallen By The Wayside" Among Some Hurricane Evacuees. The New York Times (6/1, Dewan, 1.19M) reports that for children at Renaissance Village, a FEMA trailer park in Baker, Louisiana, "this is their lost year." Children there "are not in school," and "health experts and advocates for evacuees say that Baker…is not unique. Throughout the areas where hurricane evacuees ended up, they say, are pockets where education has fallen by the wayside, raising the possibility that thousands of children could become permanent dropouts." Meanwhile, though "some children seem to have simply lost interest, others have found their enthusiasm thwarted. Chris Waller, a junior, said he was turned away by several area high schools that told him they were full."

Katrina Evacuee Makes National Spelling Bee Finals. ABC World News Tonight (5/31, story 11, Gibson, 8.78M) reported profiled National Spelling Bee finalist Hung Tran, who was "was just starting eighth grade in east New Orleans, when Hurricane Katrina hit." His home was destroyed. His family moved in with relatives in Greenbelt, Maryland." It "came as a big surprise when Hung spelled up a storm in the school bee -- and went on to beat everyone. … They didn't even have spelling bees at his old New Orleans school. In Maryland, he went on to conquer the county bee."

WAR NEWS:

Bush "Troubled" By Reports Of Haditha Killings, Promises Justice. President Bush yesterday spoke for the first time on the allegations that US Marines killed 24 Iraqi civilians in Haditha. The story was covered by all three networks, each of which ran the President's remarks. Likewise, virtually all print stories on the matter are also built around Bush's statement that he is "troubled" by the allegations.

NBC Nightly News (5/31, story 2, 2:15, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "The gravity of the allegations that a handful of Marines may have deliberately killed two dozen innocent Iraqi civilians, including women and children, weighs heavily now on the White House. President Bush said today he's troubled by the reports and promised justice." President Bush: "If in fact the, you know, laws were broken there will be, there will be punishment." The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 6, 2:15, Martin, 7.66M) said "the President made his first public comment on the case" and showed the same comments by the President. ABC World News Tonight (5/31, story 3, :30, Gibson, 8.78M) showed Bush sating, "I am troubled by the initial news stories. I'm mindful that there is a thorough investigation going on."

The New York Times (6/1, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports Bush also "said he had spoken with Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, about the killings last November in the Iraqi town of Haditha, 150 miles northwest of Baghdad. … 'I've talked to General Pete Pace about the subject, who is a proud marine, and nobody is more concerned about these allegations than the Marine Corps.'" USA Today/AP (6/1), in a brief report, also runs Bush's statement that he's "troubled" by the stories.

The AP (6/1, Pickler) reports White House spokesman Tony Snow "urged patience as the Marines conduct what he called a vigorous investigation. He said a report will come out in 'a matter of weeks, not a matter of months' and include public release of photographic evidence. 'We're going to see everything,' Snow said." The AP adds, "Once that investigation is completed, a senior Marine commander in Iraq will decide whether to press charges of murder or other violations of the Uniform Code of Military Justice."

Rice Says Allegations, If True, Are "Terrible Stain" For US. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (5/31) how the Haditha incident will impact the US' image in the Arab world. Rice said, "First, we're all just worried because it's a deeply troubling report. Whatever the impact, it's a deeply troubling report that something like this might have happened. There is going to be a full investigation of it. If the charges are proved, people will be punished. That's the way democracies react to circumstances like this. But clearly, no one would want to countenance anything of the kind that is being said to have happened at Haditha. That's our first concern. And of course, it would be a terrible stain for the United States, were something like that to have been demonstrated. But our principle concern right now is to get to the truth."

Military Probe To Conclude Officers Lied To Superiors. The Washington Post (6/1, A1, Ricks, 744K) reports, "The US military investigation of how Marine commanders handled the reporting of events last November in the Iraqi town of Haditha, where troops allegedly killed 24 Iraqi civilians, will conclude that some officers gave false information to their superiors, who then failed to adequately scrutinize reports that should have caught their attention, an Army official said yesterday." The probe is being led by Army Maj. Gen. Eldon Bargewell. The Bargewell investigation "is likely to be explosive on Capitol Hill, because it focuses on questions that have haunted the Bush administration and the US military since the scandal over abuse at Abu Ghraib prison emerged two years ago: How do US military leaders in Iraq react to allegations of wrongdoing by their troops? And is the military prepared to carry out the long and arduous process of putting down an insurgency as part of the first U.S. occupation of an Arab nation? One of Bargewell's conclusions is that the training of troops for Iraq has been flawed, the official said,."

The Washington Times (6/1, Curl, 90K) notes "a preliminary military inquiry found evidence that Marines killed two dozen Iraqi civilians in an unprovoked attack in November, contradicting the troops' account." In addition, "forensic evidence from those killed showed the victims had bullet wounds, despite the initial statements by Marines that the civilians were killed by a roadside bomb that also took the life of a soldier, a defense official said. 'The forensics painted a different story than what the Marines had said,' the official told the Associated Press."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/1, Sappenfield, 61K) reports that "experts dismiss the notion that the military system is any more corrupt or ineffective than its civilian counterpart." But "they acknowledge that it faces its own unique challenges -- from the culture of silence that can pervade the most tight-knit military units to the lack of any department 'district attorney' to follow up on leads. The concerns are longstanding, but with citizens getting a fuller picture of the mechanics of warfare -- both on the battlefield and off -- there is pressure to ensure that Americans have confidence in their military's means of justice." The Monitor adds, "To some, the whole process has been an example of the system working correctly. … Others, however, see the need for reform. There is no position in the Department of Defense akin to an attorney general -- someone whose job it is solely to follow up on credible allegations. Under the current system, investigations are convened by local commanders, who have many other duties -- and perhaps conflicts of interest."

Pentagon To Require All US Soldiers In Iraq To Undergo "Values Training." ABC World News Tonight (5/31, story 4, :30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "ABC's chief White House correspondent, Martha Raddatz, reports that as a result of the Haditha deaths, the commander of US forces in Iraq will issue an order tomorrow, requiring that all 130,000 US troops in Iraq, to receive core values training. Training that will highlight the importance of adhering to legal, moral and ethical standards on the battle battlefield. It will also include instructions on the cultural expectations of Iraqis, and on the consequences of improper military conduct."

Haditha Survivors "Sinking Into Depression." The Los Angeles Times (6/1, Stack, Salman, 958K) says that in Iraq, "word of the deaths has spread slowly out of Haditha these last months, blurring into the steady background noise of daily horrors. To a public that's endured more than three years of combat, rampant bombings and executions, news of two dozen more lost lives grabbed few headlines." The Times adds, "Since that November day, the people of Haditha have been haunted. The survivors described sinking into depression. Much of the talk in town has centered on the US offer of $2,500 in compensation for each death. Some of the families say they turned down the money. In March, the townspeople said, American investigators arrived. They brought cameras to record the witnesses, and toys for the surviving children."

US Soldiers Apparently Kill Pregnant Woman. NBC Nightly News (5/31, story 3, 2:10, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "In Samarra yesterday, US soldiers apparently shot and killed a pregnant woman and her cousin. They were in a car speeding to a maternity hospital on a road closed by the military. A military spokesman said the car failed to stop despite warnings." The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 7, 0:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) said "doctors tried to save the baby but failed. The US military calls the deaths regrettable."

ABC World News Tonight (5/31, story 5, 2:10, Brown, 8.78M) reported, "Their car entered what the US military called a clearly marked, prohibited area near a checkpoint and observation post manned by coalition forces. According to the military, the driver of the car ignored signals and commands to stop, so troops fired shots to disable the vehicle. One of the survivors of this incident says they were rushing the pregnant woman to the hospital because she was about to give birth. They didn't know the road was blocked, she said." The New York Times (6/1, Burns, 1.19M) noted the women "were among 54 new victims of the war reported by the Iraqi police and the American military command on Wednesday."

Iraqi Prime Minister Seeks To Assert Control Over Basra. NBC Nightly News (5/31, story 3, 2:10, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "Iraq's new prime minister was trying to unite this country so fractured by violence under a single command, his own. Iraq's Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki today tried to assert his new government's authority in Basra in the south. It's Iraq's second-largest city, rich in oil, but is largely controlled by Shiite militias. Police say 140 people have been killed here this month, most of them Sunnis. Maliki declared a 30-day state of emergency in Basra. It gives his security forces the power to impose curfews and make arrests without warrants. 'I will use an iron fist to strike the heads of the gangs that threaten security.' Talking tough as at least 80 Iraqis were killed over the past 48 hours, including 9 at a bakery bombed in Baghdad today."

The Washington Times/AP (6/1, Abdul-Zahra) reports the Prime Minister "declared a state of emergency yesterday in once peaceful and oil-rich Basra." It was "the only state of emergency in effect across Iraq, officials said. Other cities where violence is rampant, such as Baghdad and Ramadi, only have curfews."

The New York Times (6/1, Tavernise, Mizher, 1.19M) calls Basra "increasingly lawless," adding the city "has sunk into chaos. Shiite political parties and their militias are fighting to control the provincial government and the region's oil wealth, contributing to some of the worst rates of killing since the invasion, with 174 killings in the past two months -- double the amount from the previous two months, according to the Basra police."

The Washington Post (6/1, Hernandez, 744K) reports Reidar Visser, "an Iraq analyst with the Norwegian Institute of International Affairs who edits historiae.org, a Web site that focuses on Basra and southern Iraq, said he believed the recent surge in violence was partly the result of an intensifying battle between two Shiite parties: the Fadhila Party, a powerful local group that dominates the provincial council, and the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI, which controls the Interior Ministry in Baghdad and thus influences the local police force."

The New York Times (6/1, Burns, 1.19M) reports "American and Iraqi officials had hoped that the accession of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki...might be a watershed that would bring a cresting of the violence. If anything, the opposite appears to have occurred, with the new government facing intensified challenges on a broad front." Knight Ridder (6/1, Youssef) also says "Iraq's violence has intensified in recent weeks, despite the country's swelling security forces."

Khalilzad Says Next Three To Six Months Critical For Iraqi Government. USA Today (6/1, Slavin, 2.31M) reports US Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad said Wednesday that "Iraq's new government has three to six months to bring more stability to the country, or it could collapse." Khalilzad said, "Unless there is increased security … a lessening of and containing of sectarian violence, this government will face huge challenges that might pose a problem for the viability and success of the political process." He said Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "will name Interior and Defense ministers in 'the next three to four days.'"

Pentagon Report Paints "Bleak" Picture Of Situation In Iraq. CNN's The Situation Room (5/31, Roberts) reported, "This is the quarterly report that the Department of Defense provides to Congress. And three years after President Bush declared 'mission accomplished,' it contains some troubling revelations about what the future holds. The Pentagon report paints a bleak picture for the prospect of good news anytime soon in Iraq, stating in frank times that the strength of the insurgency will likely remain steady throughout 2006. Compare that with this rosy assessment exactly one year ago. … The contrast couldn't be sharper, but it's no surprise to military experts, who saw no reason for such sunny optimism."

Retired Marine Colonel Raps President For "Laundry List of Inaction" On Iraq. In a New York Times (6/1, 1.19M) op-ed, retired Marine colonel Thomas X. Hammes asks, "why is the administration taking so many actions that make holding the country together virtually impossible?" Hammes faults President Bush for diverting "nearly half the money allocated to reconstruction in Iraq to other needs, including security," deeply cutting "financing for democratization efforts, many of them undertaken by nongovernmental groups," and proposing cuts in "overall Army and Marine troop strength." Hammes writes that "the White House must commit to long timelines and to providing the money necessary for both the military and reconstruction efforts."

Casey Says Iran Increasing Support For Shiite Groups In Iraq. NBC Nightly News (5/31, story 3, 2:10, Engel, 9.87M) reported General George Casey offered "sharp criticism of Iran. In particular, he said that Iran since January stepped up its support for Shiite insurgent groups attacking coalition forces in Baghdad, Hilla, and Basra. He said not only does Iran supply these groups with the materials to make shaped charges that can tear through American armor but also experts on how to use them from their Iran's own secretive Al Quds Brigade and Hezbollah."

Battle Shakes Baghdad Neighborhood. The Washington Post (6/1, Knickmeyer, Al-Izzi, 744K) reports on civilians' fright during a battle in Baghdad's Adhamiyah neighborhood. The Post reports, "Insurgents, Shiite militias, Iraq's overwhelmingly Shiite police, the slightly more trusted army forces – all were said to be in the fight. Residents could not be sure, or tell how it started. In the fights that roil many of Baghdad's neighborhoods, with automatic-weapons fire heavy and explosions sounding, no one without a gun sticks his neck out to investigate." The Interior Ministry's official account said that "insurgents had attacked an army checkpoint" and soldiers then "chased them through the area." The Post reports that Iraqi soldiers and police burst into a school amid the fighting, yelled for the children to get down, and then rushed them out of the school in groups.

Injured CBS Correspondent Remains In Critical But Stable Condition. The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 8, 1:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "CBS News correspondent Kimberly Dozier, wounded in Iraq by a car bomb on Monday remains in critical but stable condition in the US military hospital in Landstuhl, Germany." CBS (MacVicar) added, "Well, doctors say she had a pretty good night last night. She remains in critical condition but she is stable. Her injuries are classified as very serious." She has "responded to her parents, she knows that her family, her boyfriend are here with her in Germany and, Russ, doctors say that is so important in helping her heal."

Bodies Of Slain CBS Employees En Route To London. The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 9, 0:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The same car bomb that wounded Kimberly killed CBS News cameraman Paul Douglas and sound man James Brolan, both British citizens. Today, their bodies were flown from Baghdad to Kuwait, where they were met by members of their families. They, along with friends from CBS, will accompany the caskets, draped in the Union Jack, home to London tomorrow."

US Acknowledges Soldiers Fired At Kabul Mob. The Washington Post (6/1, A12, Constable, 744K) reports, "US military officials acknowledged Wednesday that American troops had fired at an angry mob that surrounded the scene of a traffic accident in the Afghan capital Monday morning. Officials previously had said the troops fired only into the air." A US military spokesman, Col. Tom Collins, said, "Initial indications from our investigation are that coalition soldiers did in fact use their weapons in self-defense." Collins "said it appeared that gunfire had come from the crowd and that the troops had 'used their weapons to defend themselves.'"

The New York Times (6/1, Gall, Wafa, 1.19M) reports that Gen. Amanullah Gozar, the chief of the highway police in Kabul, who witnessed the vehicle crash that set off Monday's riots, said that "four people died of gunfire from the last vehicle in the convoy as the American forces extricated themselves from an increasingly hostile crowd." Gozar "dismissed rumors that had spread through the city that the American soldiers deliberately rammed vehicles, even including his own car. 'I can say clearly it was an accident,' he said." The Los Angeles Times (6/1, Watson, 958K) also reports the story.

Afghan Boy Recovering From Heart Surgery In US. The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 11, 0:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "A follow-up now on a story we reported two weeks ago about a young boy from Afghanistan brought to this country for life-saving heart surgery. He got out of the hospital today. Seven-year-old Mohammed Umer had a condition that restricted his blood circulation, turning his skin blue. Now he's looking and feeling a lot better. Mohammed should be able to return home in about a month."

NYTimes Says Afghanistan "Unraveling." In an editorial titled "Afghanistan, Unraveling," the New York Times (6/1, 1.19M) writes, "Something has gone alarmingly wrong in Afghanistan" and "[u]nless Washington starts correcting its mistakes, parts of Afghanistan could start tumbling back toward the kind of anarchic chaos that once made such areas an attractive sanctuary for international terrorists like Osama bin Laden." The Times writes that Washington needs to "fight a lot smarter. It should begin talks at once with Afghanistan's government to arrive at a mutually satisfactory agreement on basic ground rules governing American military personnel in their interactions with Afghan civilians. It should reinforce its anti-narcotics drive with development programs that allow farmers to find adequate replacement livelihoods in more constructive lines of work." The Times says Washington needs to re-enlist Afghans' "support by demonstrating that it cares not just about Afghanistan's strategic geography, but also about a decent future for its people."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Jury Convicts One, Acquits One In Enron Broadband Trial. The New York Times (6/1, Murphy) reports, "In the sixth day of deliberation, a federal jury convicted one of two former executives of Enron's Broadband unit yesterday in connection with a $111 million accounting fraud." The Times continues, "The executive, Kevin A. Howard, 43, the former chief financial officer, was found guilty of five counts of fraud, conspiracy and falsifying records. … A second executive, Michael W. Krautz, 37, a former accountant at Enron Broadband Services, was acquitted of the same charges." The Times adds, "The verdict brought to an end a trial that had been going on next door to that of the two former Enron chief executives, Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, who were found guilty last week of fraud and conspiracy. … Prosecutors accused Mr. Howard and Mr. Krautz of setting up sham deals to manufacture millions in earnings from a failed video-on-demand deal. The broadband unit dissolved when Enron declared bankruptcy in 2001. … A spokesman for the Department of Justice, Bryan Sierra, said, 'Juries obviously sometimes make the decision to acquit but we're obviously very pleased that they agreed with us on the guilt of Mr. Howard.'"

The Washington Post (6/1, D3, Hays) reports, "Howard and Krautz were accused of participating in a small piece of that fraud in a scheme to manufacture earnings for Enron's struggling broadband unit in late 2000. The deal involved selling an interest in future revenue of a video-on-demand venture that disintegrated a few months later. … Howard and Krautz were the first of five broadband executives to be retried in separate cases after the original trial of the entire group ended in a hung jury. Although Enron was primarily an energy trader, the broadband unit was created in 1998 during the dot-com boom."

The AP (6/1, Hays) reports, "The verdict came six days after another jury convicted Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former Enron Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling of fraud, conspiracy and other charges in one of the biggest business scandals in U.S. history. … Lay and Skilling were convicted of conspiring to run a massive fraud through repeated lies to investors and employees about Enron's financial strength. The company careened into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001." The AP adds, "The government contended that Howard and Krautz conspired to manufacture earnings for the failing broadband unit in late 2000 by selling an interest in future revenue of a video-on-demand venture that disintegrated a few months later. … The two men each testified - as they did in their first trial - that the deal was legitimate. The investors were not bought out and lost their money along with other creditors when Enron collapsed in late 2001. … The first broadband trial began in April 2005 and focused mostly on three other executives accused of overhyping capabilities of Enron's broadband network and operating software. After that case ended with a hung jury, the five defendants were split into three separate cases and re-indicted on fewer counts."

Federal Judge Dismisses Charges Against Former Gateway CEO. The Wall Street Journal (6/1, Scannell) reports, "A federal judge threw out civil-fraud charges against the former chief executive officer of Gateway Inc., dealing federal regulators an unusual loss." The Journal continues, "In a decision dated May 23 but made public Tuesday, Judge Roger Benitez of the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of California ruled that the Securities and Exchange Commission didn't offer sufficient evidence to support charges that former Gateway CEO Jeffrey Weitzen made material misstatements in a regulatory filing and subsequent news release for third-quarter 2000 earnings." The Journal adds, "In granting Mr. Weitzen's motion for summary judgment, the judge rejected the SEC's theory that Mr. Weitzen's 'substantial participation' and 'intricate involvement' in the formulation of the regulatory filing was enough to hold him liable for false statements even though Mr. Weitzen didn't sign the quarterly filing." The Journal notes, "In the opinion, the judge said the SEC relied solely upon Mr. Weitzen's signature on the management representation letter submitted to the company's auditor to prove his knowledge of a material false filing. 'A reasonable fact-finder could not find this to be substantial in relation to the preparation of the entire quarterly filing. The SEC therefore may not impute any alleged misstatements in the Q3 2000 10-Q to Weitzen,' the judge said."

SEC Settles Auction-Rate Bond Claims With 15 Banks. The Washington Post (6/1, D2, Bilodeau) reports, "Citigroup Inc., Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and 13 other banks agreed to pay a total of $13 million to settle claims that they favored some customers in the $200 billion market for auction-rate bonds." The Post continues, "The firms violated securities laws from January 2003 to June 2004 by allowing customers to change their orders in the supposedly blind auctions and by giving select clients an advantage when deciding how much to bid, the Securities and Exchange Commission said yesterday." The Post adds, "A two-year investigation of the securities, whose rates are reset periodically by auctions, found industry-wide violations, Linda Chatman Thomsen, the SEC's enforcement chief, said in a written statement. … The SEC asked the brokerages two years ago to provide reports 'detailing any potentially deceptive, dishonest or unfair practices,' according to a memo sent to members in May by the Bond Market Association, the Securities Industry Association and the American Bar Association. … Firms in the settlement today also include Bear Stearns Cos., Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., Merrill Lynch & Co., J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. and Morgan Stanley & Co."

Waiver Controversy Highlighted By Milberg Weiss Prosecution. The National Law Journal (6/1, Jones) reports, "As the government's demands for waiver of privilege in white-collar prosecutions have sparked the ire of attorneys worried about the sanctity of client communications, the waiver issue in the Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman case is presenting an especially prickly problem." The Journal continues, "The recent announcement that a grand jury had indicted the securities class action giant and two of its partners was a triumph for prosecutors in the ongoing investigation. The government alleges that the firm paid clients more than $11 million in kickbacks to serve as plaintiffs in as many as 150 class action and derivative lawsuits. … But Milberg Weiss' case, while in some ways typical of recent corporate corruption prosecutions, also involves a key distinction -- because it is a law firm -- which some experts say makes the potential infringement on attorney-client communications all the more grave. … 'The privilege issues are much more complicated, much more expansive,' said Jonathan Polkes, a former federal prosecutor who practices white-collar defense at New York's Weil, Gotshal & Manges. 'You're talking about a defendant that lives and dies by privilege.'" The Journal notes, "The issue of waiver in what have become run-of-the-mill prosecutions against corporations has raised the hackles of both defense and plaintiffs attorneys. In April, American Bar Association President Michael Greco issued a statement saying that the attorney-client privilege was 'under attack' by prosecutors coercing corporations to waive their protections to qualify for leniency by the government. … In addition, a bipartisan group of lawmakers is considering asking the U.S. Department of Justice to change its policy of demanding waivers as evidence of defendants' cooperation. … After U.S. Attorney Debra Wong Yang in the Central District of California announced an indictment on May 18 against Milberg Weiss, the law firm in its own statement asserted that prosecutors had demanded access to communications with its counsel, Zuckerman Spaeder of Washington, in exchange for deferred prosecution. Milberg Weiss' refusal to grant access to that communication led to its indictment, the firm said."

Fannie Mae Executives To Testify Before Senate Panel. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (5/31, 2.11M) reported that the Senate Banking Committee has called Fannie Mae CEO Daniel Mudd, and former chief Franklin Raines "to testify as early as next week on federal regulators' allegations that the giant mortgage company engaged in fraudulent accounting. Also being asked to discuss their investigations are James Lockhart, acting director of Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, Fannie's main regulator, and Christopher Cox, chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission. After Ofheo's report was released last week, Lockhart said he has directed Fannie's board to grab back any unjustified compensation paid to senior executives as a result of accounting misdeeds." Committee Chairman Richard Shelby "is planning a wide-ranging hearing, including probing whether Mudd is the right person to lead the mortgage giant."

Executive Pay Often Exceeds Amounts Allowed Under Performance Targets. The New York Times (6/1, Morgenson, 1.19M) reports that as "executive pay packages have rocketed in recent years," investors "who plow through company filings often find that executive compensation exceeds the amounts allowed under the performance targets set by the directors. Executives of companies as varied as Halliburton, the military contractor and oil services concern; Assurant, an insurance company; and Big Lots, a discount retailer, all received bonuses and other pay outside the performance parameters set by the boards of those companies. It is the equivalent of moving the goalposts to shorten the field, compensation experts say."

CRIMINAL LAW:

CBC Backs Jefferson Bid To Retain Ways And Means Seat. The Washington Times (6/1, DeBose, 90K) reports Rep. William J. Jefferson "has been asked by the House Democratic leader to step down from the Ways and Means Committee owing to the lingering FBI bribery investigation, but the Louisiana Democrat has refused and won the support of the Congressional Black Caucus (CBC)." In a statement, the CBC said, "Mr. Jefferson has not been charged with anything, so to forcibly remove him from a seat on the Ways and Means Committee would be unprecedented."

More Commentary. In an op-ed in the Baltimore Sun (6/1), Steven P. Grossman, a former New York City prosecutor who is now the Dean Julius Isaacson professor at the University of Baltimore School of Law, writes, "In a rare demonstration of bipartisan cooperation, House Speaker Dennis Hastert and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi together criticized the FBI's search of the office of Rep. William J. Jefferson, the Louisiana Democrat who is under investigation in connection with the alleged acceptance of bribes. … How heartwarming it is that two people who seem to agree on little that can benefit the country have come together to defend the right of their colleagues to have some sort of special immunity from search warrants issued to uncover crimes committed by legislators. They said the investigators, like the investigated, are not above the law. A noble thought, but one that needs to be examined." Grossman continues, "The Justice Department did obtain a search warrant to authorize the search of Mr. Jefferson's office. In other words, investigators prepared a sworn statement that demonstrated to a judge that there was probable cause, meaning it was more likely than not that there was evidence of a crime to be found in the congressman's office. … The role of the courts in the warrant process cannot be overstated. The framers of our Constitution wrote the Fourth Amendment to protect us from illegal searches and seizures." Grossman adds, "Some critics of the search have legitimate concerns about the separation of powers between government branches and particularly express concern that such searches can be too political and too broad and can uncover documents not connected with the investigation and which the proper workings of government require to be kept private. … That is why we have courts and why the framers imposed requirements not just to authorize a search but also to ensure that the search is limited in scope and duration. The courts for years have limited searches in this way. … Despite Fourth Amendment protections, abuses can occur in obtaining and executing a search warrant for a legislator's office. But such abuses can and do occur every day when search warrants are used in criminal investigations. Such abuses tell us that we must be more vigilant than we have been in avoiding these abuses. They do not, however, tell us we should stop searching."

New Orleans Reporter Calls FBI Search "Overkill." Under the headline "Office Raid Looking A Lot Like Overkill," staff writer James Gill says in The New Orleans Times-Picayune (6/1, 257K), "The question is on everyone's lips, but New Orleans criminal defense lawyer Pat Fanning asks it with rare eloquence. … Quoting from his e-mail here, 'If they really do have video and audio tapes of the cash transaction, 90 large in the freezer, two rat flips dying to throw up all over poor Billy Boy, a good-looking, kajillionaire do-gooder for a victim, numerous other tapes and documents etc., etc. then what in the hell could be so damned important in Dollar Bill's office that they couldn't live without it?' The feds aren't saying. Although they released the affidavit that secured the warrant to search the Capitol Hill office of Rep. William Jefferson…the section listing the evidence they sought was blacked out. Putting the affidavit in the public record before Jefferson has even been charged with a crime was an unusual move, but then this was a historic moment, the first time the G-men ever barged into the Rayburn Building."

Ohio Coin Dealer Pleads Guilty To Federal Campaign Law Violations. The Columbus Dispatch (6/1, Niquette) reports, "Indicted coin dealer Thomas W. Noe pleaded guilty today to illegally using friends and associates to funnel $45,400 to President Bush's re-election campaign." The Dispatch continues, "Noe changed his previous not-guilty pleas to three federal charges to 'guilty' during a hearing before U.S. District Judge David A. Katz. … Katz delayed sentencing Noe until after a presentence report is completed, but authorities said that advisory guideline call for two to two-and-a-half years in prison plus possible fines." The Dispatch adds, "Noe had faced up to 15 years in prison and fines up to $950,000 if convicted on all counts but can receive a reduced sentence for admitting responsibility. Federal prosecutors said they also plan to seek additional penalties for the loss of public confidence in the presidential election process."

The Toledo Blade (OH) (6/1, Wilkinson, Eder) reports that "in a brief, 10-second statement, Noe said he voluntarily agreed to change his plea 'to accept responsibility to spare my family and friends the further embarassment of any additional court proceeding. Therefore, I plead guilty.' … No date was set for sentencing pending a pre-sentencing report to the judge. Noe, who lives in Florida, remains free on $350,000 bond." The Blade adds, "With the admission, Noe faces a maximum of five years in prison on each count, but likely faces 24-30 months in prison. He also faces a potential fine of nearly $1 million, and possibly probation. … John Pearson, an assistant U.S. Attorney in the public integrity section of the Justice Department, said he would seek an even harsher penalty for Noe because of the 'potential loss of public faith in the presidential race.'"

The AP (6/1, Welsh-Huggins) reports, "The investment scandal has been a major embarrassment for Ohio's ruling Republicans and has given Democrats a better shot this year at winning state offices, including the governor's office that the GOP has held since 1991. … Once a powerful political figure who raised hefty sums for a slew of Republicans, Noe admitted arranging a contribution scheme to fulfill his promise to generate $50,000 for a Bush fundraiser." The AP adds, "Noe's attorney argued his client's access to lawyers before that trial is crucial. Prosecutors told U.S. District Judge David Katz the upcoming trial was no reason to delay Noe's sentencing on the federal conviction. … 'The fact he has other state charges does not mean he should receive special treatment for better or for worse,' said John Pearson, an attorney with the U.S. Justice Department's public integrity unit. … Katz said he'll decide after reviewing court officials' sentencing report."

FBI Arrests Pennsylvania Computer Workers For Erasing Fumo Emails. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/1, Dale) reports, "The FBI arrested two men who did computer work for a powerful state senator Wednesday on charges that they permanently deleted e-mails to thwart a federal investigation. Leonard P. Luchko and Mark Eister performed electronic 'wipes' of computers at Sen. Vincent J. Fumo's Senate offices, his home at the New Jersey shore and at a nonprofit with deep ties to Fumo, the FBI alleged in an affidavit. … The document does not name Fumo and he has not been charged," but US Attorney Patrick Meehan "said the probe is not over. The affidavit refers to an unidentified senator who clearly is Fumo." The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/1, McCoy, Lounsberry, Cattabiani, 423K) notes, "The arrests, the first in the three-year investigation, were seen as a hardball move by federal prosecutors: an attempt to squeeze the computer technicians into striking deals and testifying against Fumo. … Fumo's attorney said the two technicians were 'unfortunate victims' of a campaign to bring down the powerful Philadelphia Democrat." The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/1, Cattabiani, 423K) adds, "As FBI agents dug deeper into Vince Fumo's world, the powerful state senator appeared to be feeling the pressure. … Chock full of anxious e-mails and gritty politics, the FBI affidavit detailing the federal investigation into Fumo gives a previously unseen glimpse into the inner workings of the senator's office, staffed by a loyal and tight-lipped community that lived in fear of the lawmaker, as he lived in fear of prosecutors."

The Philadelphia Daily News (6/1, Hinkelman) reports, "James Schwartzman, an attorney for Luchko, said Luchko intends to fight the charges. Asked if he thought the feds were trying to get his client to cooperate with their investigation of Fumo, Schwartzman said: 'I would say that's probably a good guess.' Eister's attorney, Brian McMonagle, said his client would be 'going to trial and hopes he can meet a fair-minded jury that can tell the difference between a guy doing his job and a criminal conspirator.'" The Philadelphia Daily News (6/1, Davies) notes, "There are numerous references to Fumo in the charges" against Luchko and Eister. "'The FBI probe into the Senator has really set him off, he wants us to do a number of security checks...' Luchko wrote in a January 2004 e-mail. 'Boss is driving us ALL nuts with this FBI madness,' he wrote at another point." The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (6/1, Gazarik) adds, "An unidentified grand jury witness, testifying under grant of immunity, said Fumo's aides discussed destroying communications in case the FBI seized computer hard drives. According to the indictment, Fumo feared 'the FBI was going to show up' one day. Agents seized computers from Fumo's Philadelphia and Harrisburg offices in 2004."

GSA Officials Say Safavian Omitted Details Of Relationship With Abramoff. The AP (6/1) reports that at the trial of David Safavian yesterday, three GSA officials testified he "left out important details about his relationship with the lobbyist Jack Abramoff, including information about a weeklong golf excursion to Scotland and England." Each of "the three prosecution witnesses said they would have wanted to know from Safavian that at the time of the trip Mr. Abramoff was interested in two pieces of property controlled by the services administration."

Government Executive (6/1, Mandel) reports, "A General Services Administration ethics official and the agency's former general counsel testified Wednesday in the trial of David Safavian, former Office of Management and Budget procurement policy chief, as the government neared the end of presenting its case on his involvement with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff." GE continues, "Eugenia

Ellison, a lawyer who administers GSA's ethics program, testified that she handled then-chief of staff Safavian's request for an ethics opinion in order to join Abramoff and others on a golfing trip to Scotland in 2002. Safavian is charged with lying in the information submitted for that clearance, and with obstructing two later investigations into the matter." GE adds, "Ellison described how she had reached the decision to clear Safavian's participation based on his description of the outing hosted by Abramoff, a friend and former colleague, as a four-day golfing expedition in which Safavian would pay all costs associated with meals, hotels and greens fees. Airfare, Safavian indicated, was being provided by Abramoff on a private jet, and none of the eight people on the trip would be contributing to cover that cost. … Safavian also indicated that Abramoff had no business before GSA. … Ellison said she approved the gift of airfare for the trip because Abramoff was an old friend of Safavian's and because of Safavian's attestation that the lobbyist worked only on Capitol Hill, which together meant that Abramoff was not a 'prohibited source' according to federal regulations. … In a barrage of questions from Justice Department lawyer Nathaniel Edmonds, Ellison indicated she had been unaware that Abramoff was at the time seeking to lease GSA-controlled land in White Oak, Md., for a school he had founded, that he had expressed interest in the GSA-controlled Old Post Office Pavilion in downtown Washington, D.C., and that he had sought to influence GSA policy regarding the consideration of Indian tribes under a classification of disadvantaged businesses."

Emphasis On Golf Outing Details Seen As Stalling Prosecution Case. The Washington Post (6/1, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports the "way things are going at the David Safavian trial this week, don't be surprised if, in the coming days, a golf cart bursts into Courtroom 29A of the federal courthouse and a pair of Scotsmen ask if they can play through." Safavian "is on trial for accepting favors from Abramoff while helping the lobbyist penetrate the General Services Administration -- and then lying about it to investigators. But the case is as much about well-tended greens as ill-gotten green: the twosome's obsessive golfing friendship, particularly a lavish golfing trip to Scotland's St. Andrews in 2002 on Abramoff's tab." The "endless talk about faraway fairways seems to have teed off the jurors. Yesterday, the judge dismissed juror No. 13, who was a no-show. Juror No. 3 was losing a battle with sleep. But the lawyers pressed on, quizzing GSA official Eugenia Ellison for hours about the ethics of the Scotland golf trip."

Opening Arguments Made At First Tennessee Waltz Trial. The Tennessean (6/1, de la Cruz) reports the trial of Tennessee Waltz defendant Roscoe Dixon began yesterday. "In his opening statement, Dixon's attorney Coleman Garrett said the proof will show Dixon was entrapped by the government. … In creating the fake company E-Cycle, which was run by undercover FBI agents, the government in turn created the conspiracy, Garrett said." But prosecutors said that "Dixon and alleged 'bagman' Barry Myers…figured they could pull off extorting money from E-Cycle in part because of its wealth, 'but they were really certain they could pull it off because they had done it before,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Tim DiScenza said. The two men had previously demanded and received payment from government informant Tim Willis for a legitimate company he worked for, called Children's Dental Clinic, to be credentialed into TennCare, DiScenza said." The Memphis Commercial Appeal (6/1, Buser) adds, "Garrett called the FBI informants, including…Willis, 'a pack of con men.'" But "prosecutors played audio and video recordings made in 2003 involving Dixon, Myers and Willis discussing payments Dixon would need to help get a children's dental clinic into the TennCare program. … FBI agent Brian Burns said he had given Willis $4,000 before the meeting to be used in gaining Dixon's support as chairman of the TennCare Oversight Committee."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/1) reports, "Barry Myers, whom prosecutors called a 'bag man' for Dixon, testified Wednesday that Dixon took bribes for legislative favors but insisted on someone else handling the money. 'Sen. Dixon has always been cautious,' Myers said. Myers is awaiting sentencing on a guilty plea to passing along bribes from undercover FBI agents to Dixon and state Sen. Kathryn Bowers, who is also charged." The Chattanooga Times Free Press (6/1, Sher), WMC-TV Memphis (5/31), WPTY-TV Memphis (5/31) and WTVF-TV Nashville (5/31) also report on the opening arguments.

Chicago Hired Truck Probe Defendant Sentenced To 18 Months In Prison. The Chicago Tribune (6/1, Coen, 643K) reports, "A brother-in-law of Cook County Commissioner John Daley who has admitted to taking bribes to steer city business to a politically connected trucking firm was sentenced to 18 months in prison Wednesday." John Briatta "was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Charles Norgle, who said he wanted the punishment to send a message to others in government that such corruption will not be tolerated. Norgle rejected a bid by Briatta's attorneys to have him sentenced to 5 months in prison and 5 months of home confinement, saying he only breached the public trust after suffering gambling and other financial losses. … Any city official involved in taking bribes 'must understand that he is going to prison,' the judge said." The AP (6/1, Robinson) notes, "It was the latest development in a three-year scandal that has rocked City Hall and brought allegations of corruption to the mayor's doorstep. … Briatta, a former water department truck dispatcher, acknowledged that he accepted the money from another city employee, Randy Aderman, who has pleaded guilty and is awaiting sentencing."

WLS-TV Chicago (5/31, Shaw) reports on its Web site that Briatta "is the only member of the Daley family implicated in the hired truck scandal. He apparently resisted the temptation of the hired truck scandal for years, but under the pressure of skyrocketing gambling debts, he finally gave in and took payoffs." Asked about the sentencing yesterday, Mayor Richard Daley said, "Very sad. You take money you are going to get caught. It's not my family circle." The Chicago Sun-Times (6/1, Warmbir) also reports on Briatta's guilty plea.

Key Prosecution Witness Testifies About Chicago Political Hires. The Chicago Sun-Times (6/1, Korecki, Warmbir) reports, "A key witness in the City Hall hiring trial testified Wednesday he used a political army largely made up of city workers to volunteer in various Democratic campaigns, then asked Mayor Daley's patronage chief to reward them with city jobs and promotions. Daniel Katalinic, the highest-profile witness to testify yet in the trial that's in its third week, said Robert Sorich…told him to which political races he should deploy his volunteers. He also said Daley's former campaign manager, Greg Goldner, doled out similar orders. In return, Katalinic would hand Sorich a list of people he'd want hired or promoted in city positions, he testified. … Sorich told him: 'He'd do what he could,' Katalinic said."

Daley Calls Trial Testimony About Clearing Skyway Traffic "Silly." The Chicago Tribune (6/1, Washburn, 643K) reports Mayor Richard Daley yesterday said testimony at the trial of former patronage chief Robert Sorich "that Chicago Skyway tollbooths were fully staffed to help ensure an unimpeded ride to his Michigan summer home was, well, 'silly,'" and "then he said it again. About 20 times. 'Silliest thing I ever heard in my life,' the mayor declared. … When asked whether he was referring to the allegation or to a fact that underlings would seek to smooth the way for him, Daley provided more of the same. … 'It is just silly. Silliness. That is all it is ... completely silly, completely silly.'"

Documents Contradict Blagojevich Denial Of Political Hires. The AP (6/1, O'Connor) reports, "Gov. Rod Blagojevich's office reviewed and approved the hiring of state employees for hundreds of routine jobs such as highway workers and plumbers, according to documents. The hiring lists, obtained by The Associated Press, contradict the governor's statements that his office did not decide who would be hired for civil service jobs. Such hirings are to be based solely on merit." The AP notes, "His hiring practices are under investigation by federal, state and local prosecutors. … The hiring lists obtained by the AP suggest nearly 1,800 hires, promotions, transfers and salary increases were OK'd by aides to the governor in the months following Blagojevich's 2003 inauguration. They include positions such as highway maintainer and prison guard, which are classified as civil service jobs."

ISP Industry, Other Groups Raise Objections To US Request For Data Retention. CNET News (6/1, McCullagh) reports, "Internet providers and telecommunications companies expressed concern on Wednesday about the feasibility of recording Americans' online activities, a proposal that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has recently endorsed." CNET continues, "In a meeting Friday first reported by CNET News.com, Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller said the war on terror would be aided by two years' worth of data retention, a requirement industry representatives say would be accompanied by technical, security and privacy challenges. … 'We have real reservations about data retention requirements because of the security and privacy risks attached to it,' said Mark Uncapher, senior vice president of the Information Technology Association of America. ITAA's board members include representatives of AT&T, Sybase, Fujitsu and Unisys." CNET adds, "In events that were first reported by CNET News.com, Bush administration officials have said Internet providers must keep track of what Americans are doing online. … A Justice Department representative said this week that the government is not seeking to require the retention of the content of communications, but did not elaborate. If the European Union's approach were adopted, Internet companies would be required to save logs showing the identities of e-mail and perhaps instant messaging correspondents in addition to data about which customer was assigned which Internet address. … That suggestion alarms many Internet providers, which worry about the cost and complexity of recording what their customers are doing online. In some cases, especially among libraries, coffee shops and universities, no records may be stored at all."

USA Today (6/1, Swartz, Johnson) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller outlined their request to executives from Google, Microsoft, AOL, Comcast, Verizon and others Friday in a private meeting at the Justice Department. The department has scheduled more discussions as early as Friday. Last week's meeting was first reported by CNET, an online news service. … The meetings reflect a new approach by law enforcement in anti-terrorism efforts. Previously, the Justice Department had invoked the need for data retention only to battle child pornography. Since the Sept. 11 attacks, Internet traffic has become increasingly critical to terrorism investigations, too." USA adds, "Justice is not asking the companies to keep the content of e-mails, spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said. It wants records such as lists of e-mail traffic and Web searches, he said. … Roehrkasse said the government is required to seek proper legal authority, such as a subpoena, before obtaining the records. He said any change in the retention period would not alter that requirement. Law enforcement officials have seen investigations derailed "time and time again" because of a lack of data, Roehrkasse said. … The government's request forces the companies to strike a balance between satisfying law enforcement demands and honoring the privacy of millions of customers. … 'The issue for us is not whether we retain data, but we want to see it done right,' says Dave McClure, president of the U.S. Internet Industry Association, which represents 150 companies, primarily Internet service providers. 'Our concerns are who pays for it, what data is retained, and if it is retained legally without violating federal laws and subscriber agreements.'"

Former New Jersey Mayor Pleads Guilty To Accepting Bribe From FBI Informant. The Newark Star-Ledger Staff (5/31, Martin) reported former Hazlet Mayor Paul Coughlin on Tuesday "admitted…accepting a $3,000 payoff from an FBI informant posing as a crooked contractor, joining a growing list of Monmouth County officials convicted of corruption." Coughlin "pleaded guilty…to a single count of accepting corrupt payments. Under federal guidelines, the former mayor and councilman faces between 21 months and 27 months in prison," and "his attorney said he will argue for a lighter term, calling the crime 'aberrant behavior' and citing what he said was Coughlin's serious alcohol problem." But "prosecutors scoffed at such an argument. 'The defendant knew full well what he was doing,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Judith Germano said." The Asbury Park Press (5/31, Sudol) noted, "Coughlin is the latest public official to plead guilty in a FBI bribery and money-laundering sting dubbed 'Operation Bid Rig,' in which 13 former and current county and local public officials and three businessmen in Monmouth County were charged last year."

Judge Partially Denies Wecht Motion To Suppress Evidence Seized By FBI. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/1, Ward, 261K) reports, "A federal judge yesterday denied a motion by Dr. Cyril H. Wecht's attorneys to suppress all of the evidence gathered against him. In the same order, though, U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab said he would hold a hearing on one issue raised by the defense -- whether 29 boxes of autopsy reports seized by the FBI from the former Allegheny County coroner's private office should have been taken. The hearing will be at 8:15 a.m. next Thursday. … Dr. Wecht claimed that the files seized were not found in the area the warrant claimed they would be and were not labeled as the FBI said they'd be." The AP (6/1, Cowden) notes that the defense motion "attacked the credibility of the FBI agent who got search warrants for Wecht's records and also blamed Wecht's indictment on a political feud with Allegheny County District Attorney Stephen Zappala Jr. … The attorneys also allege the FBI agent had previously 'urged witnesses to perjure themselves in a case involving his own misconduct.'" The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (6/1) and WPXI-TV Pittsburgh (5/31) also report briefly on the ruling.

California State Senator Subpoenaed To Testify In FBI Perata Probe. The Los Angeles Times (6/1, Morain and Evan Halper, 958K) reports, "State Sen. Gloria Romero of Los Angeles was summoned Wednesday to appear before a grand jury in the FBI probe of Senate chief Don Perata's business dealings. Romero, a member of Perata's Democratic leadership team and one of his closest allies, said an FBI agent delivered a subpoena to her Capitol office requiring her to appear in July in Oakland."

Romero told the Times, "All along, I've thought this has been a fishing expedition. … I look forward to answering whatever questions they may have." The Times notes, "The subpoena is believed to be the first issued to a sitting legislator in the Capitol since the 1980s, when the FBI launched an undercover anti-corruption operation that put a dozen lawmakers, lobbyists and others in jail."

FBI Investigating Sports Marketing Firm That Tried To Recruit Reggie Bush. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/1, Wilson) reports, "The FBI has opened an investigation into a fledgling San Diego sports marketing firm that tried to recruit Heisman Trophy winner Reggie Bush, the attorney for the football star's family told The Associated Press Wednesday. Attorney David Cornwell of Atlanta said FBI agents interviewed him about 'potential federal crimes' last week by phone," and "he intends to make Bush and his parents available to the FBI. … April Langwell, an FBI spokeswoman in San Diego, said she could neither confirm nor deny any investigations." The AP notes, "The NCAA and Pac-10 are investigating whether any rules were broken when Bush's family lived in a suburban San Diego home owned by Michael Michaels, a principal in New Era Sports & Entertainment, while Bush was still playing for Southern California last season." The Los Angeles Times (6/1, Farmer, Krikorian, 958K) adds, "A federal law enforcement source said Wednesday that the inquiry was 'in its infancy' and that it was 'way too early to say where this [case] is headed.'" But Michaels lawyer Brian Watkins "called the suggestion of an FBI investigation 'ludicrous' and 'a media ploy.' Watkins said neither he nor his clients had been contacted by the FBI and he suggested that Cornwell was using his own personal contacts to stir up an inquiry."

Peltier Supporter Pleads Guilty To Throwing Rocks At Federal Building. The AP (6/1) reports, "A man accused of throwing rocks in the federal building" in Fargo "has pleaded guilty to charges of damaging government property and threatening a federal officer, the U.S. attorney's office says. U.S. District Judge Ralph Erickson ordered a psychological evaluation for Daniel Cvijanovich," but Erickson "did not immediately set a sentencing date after Cvijanovich pleaded guilty Wednesday, U.S. Attorney Drew Wrigley said." The AP notes, "The rocks struck a pane of glass that separates the lobby from the secure area of the building, and each rock had a note addressed to the FBI attached, authorities said. … Agents thought the threat was in retaliation for the investigation of American Indian activist Leonard Peltier, Wrigley's statement said."

Judge Accepts Guilty Pleas From 16 Charged In FBI Probe Of Nevada Strip Club. The AP (6/1, Ritter) reports, "A federal judge accepted plea deals Wednesday from 16 people to end a decade-long investigation of criminal activity at a Las Vegas strip club, whose owner has agreed to sell the business and plead guilty to tax evasion." Crazy Horse Too owner Rick Rizzolo, "who has faced allegations of mob ties for more than a decade, was expected Thursday to become the 17th and final person to accept plea deals in the case." He is "scheduled to plead guilty to a single tax charge…and agree not to contest some $17 million in fines, forfeitures and restitution." The AP notes, "Wednesday's pleas stemmed from a January 2005 indictment that charged club manager Robert D'Apice with racketeering and tax evasion."

California Woman Makes Public Appeal In Homeless Insurance Fraud Probe. The AP (6/1, Glazer) reports, "The daughter of a man killed in a hit-and-run crash asked the public on Wednesday to help police in their probe that has resulted in the arrests of two elderly women accused of illegally collecting money from his life insurance policies. Standing at the alley where the body of 73-year-old Paul Vados was found in 1999, Stella Vados and her lawyer Gloria Allred asked anyone who knew her father or the women held on charges of mail fraud -- Olga Rutterschmidt, 73, and Helen Golay, 75 -- to call the FBI or police." The AP notes, "Police are investigating whether Rutterschmidt and Golay were directly involved in the death of Vados and Kenneth McDavid, killed in a similar hit-and-run last year. Authorities said Golay and Rutterschmidt befriended the two transients, duped the men into signing them as beneficiaries on their life insurance policies and collected more than $2.3 million after they were killed."

Mississippi Lawyer Pleads Not Guilty To Fen-Phen Settlement Fraud Charges. The Jackson Clarion-Ledger (5/31, Gates) reported, "A lawyer formerly associated with a Jackson law firm pleaded not guilty Tuesday to a 36-count federal indictment accusing him of helping clients submit false settlement claims involving the diet drug Fen-Phen." Robert Arledge of Vicksburg "made his initial court appearance in U.S. District Court on Tuesday after being indicted on Friday. He is the first lawyer charged in the ongoing FBI/IRS federal investigation of fraudulent Fen-Phen claims. Arledge made no comments after his court appearance, but his attorney proclaimed Arledge's innocence." The Vicksburg Post (5/31, Barrett) added, "The 35-count indictment charges that among legitimate plaintiffs, there were false claimants who shared in more than $8 million resulting from claims based on false information about having taking the prescription drug or its effect on their health." The AP (5/31) noted, "More than a dozen federal agents last week swarmed his Vicksburg mansion. Witnesses said the officers seized property including a motorcycle and an oil painting."

Texas Medical Equipment Executive Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud. The Houston Chronicle (5/31, 581K) reported, "A medical equipment company owner pleaded guilty Tuesday to paying $200 kickbacks to Houston doctors for writing prescriptions for unneeded motorized wheelchairs in a scam that cost federal health agencies millions." Harold "Prince Yellowe" Iyalla "also told U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore that Medicare paid his company, 1st Choice Medical Supplies and Equipment, $5.6 million under the scam." The Chronicle noted, "Iyalla pleaded guilty to conspiracy, health care fraud and money laundering with maximum sentences ranging from five to 10 years and fines of $250,000."

Judge Sentences California Money Manager To 30 Years In Prison For Ponzi Scheme. The Los Angeles Times (5/27, Reckard, 958K) reported, "Orange County money manager James P. Lewis Jr. was sentenced Friday to 30 years in prison for swindling 1,600 investors of $156 million in a Ponzi scheme so calculated and long-running that the judge called it a 'crime against humanity.'" US District Judge Cormac Carney "pronounced the maximum sentence, rejecting pleas by Lewis' lawyer that it would be 'a death sentence for a 60-year-old.' … For nearly 20 years, the judge noted, Lewis solicited retirement funds from investors who now face the prospect of humiliation and poverty in their senior years."

Former Texas Police Officer Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Possession. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (6/1, 247K) reports former Mansfield police officer David Neal Looney on Wednesday "pled guilty in federal court in Fort Worth…to one count of possession of child pornography, according to a press release from the U.S. Department of Justice. … Looney confessed to FBI agents that he had images of child pornography on his home computer and gave written consent for agents to seize and search his computer. A forensic examination of the computer's hard drive revealed approximately 110 images of child pornography."

Scam Victims Pay For Bogus Checks Honored By Banks. The Washington Post (6/1, A1, Mayer) reports on "an increasingly common check scam that relies on the vagaries of the banking system to take advantage of unsuspecting consumers." The hPost continues, "Federal rules require banks to release funds from a consumer's deposit quickly, usually within one to five business days, depending on the kind of check. However, it can take weeks before a bank discovers a check is fraudulent. … So when a teller says 'the check has cleared,' the teller is 'usually thinking in terms of bank rules, that the hold time is over, and the consumer now has access to the funds,' said Susan Grant, director of the National Fraud Information Center. … But the average consumer thinks that phrase means 'the check is not fraudulent,' Grant added. … When that happens, it is depositors who are responsible for the money, she said. As the American Bankers Association explains in a 'Fraud Alert!' statement insert it distributes to banks to send to customers: The consumer is the one dealing directly with the person who sent the money and therefore is 'in the best position to determine how risky the transaction is.'" The Post notes, "To facilitate the flow of funds behind the 40 billion checks processed each year, banks are required to release funds within a few days, said Nessa Feddis, senior federal counsel for American Bankers Association. … If tellers start asking a lot of questions or start holding checks until they are determined to be good, banks 'might be perceived as trying to circumvent the rules entitling people to withdraw funds,' Feddis added. And if the banks are wrong, it will only be a matter of time before they are hauled before Congress and 'accused of trying to hold on to people's funds,' she said."

Texas Businessman Sentenced To 14 Years In Drugs-For-Missiles Plot. The Houston Chronicle (6/1, Rice, 581K) reports Houston businessman and former Danish Parliament member Uwe Jensen on Wednesday "was sentenced to 14 years in federal prison…for his role in a plot to trade cocaine for weapons to arm a right-wing militia listed as a terrorist group." Jensen "pleaded guilty more than three years ago to conspiring with his boss, Carlos Ali Romero Varela…to sell shoulder-launched anti-aircraft missiles and small arms to the United Self-Defense Forces of Colombia." The Chronicle notes, "They were arrested in an FBI sting operation code-named 'White Terror,' which began after an East German informant who claimed to have ties with the KGB told the FBI that Jensen and Romero wanted to buy Russian weapons." The AP (6/1) adds that co-defendants Elkin Alberto Arroyave Ruiz and Edgar Fernando Blanco Puerta, both Colombian nationals, also were sentenced yesterday for their roles in the plot. "Blanco was given sentences of life in prison and 15 years for the two counts he faced. Both sentences will be served concurrently. Arroyave was sentenced to 15 years and faces deportation to Colombia after serving his term."

Judge Harshly Questions Charges Against Wife Of Alleged Cuban Agent. The AP (6/1, Anderson) reports US District Judge K. Michael Moore "raised questions Wednesday about the role of a Florida International University employee accused along with her professor husband of working as agents of the Cuban government, suggesting that the charges amounted to 'character assassination' against her." Moore "said it was unfair to Elsa Alvarez to assume that she was involved in all of the activities of her husband, Carlos Alvarez, particularly since there is substantial evidence indicating she was reluctant from the beginning and later opposed continuing their alleged surveillance on behalf of Cuba." The AP notes, "Testimony revealed Wednesday that during three days of interviews with the FBI last summer, Carlos Alvarez repeatedly told agents that his wife was not directly involved in communications…with their Cuban intelligence service handlers. In fact, according to transcripts of those interviews, Elsa Alvarez grew increasingly worried about the contacts and hoped to end them."

Missing Data On Veterans Goes Beyond Initial Reports. The AP (6/1, Yen) reports, "Personal information on 26.5 million veterans that was stolen from a Veterans Affairs employee this month not only included Social Security numbers and birthdates but in many cases phone numbers and addresses, internal documents show." The AP continues, "Meanwhile, VA Secretary Jim Nicholson said Wednesday that he had named a former Arizona prosecutor as a special adviser for information security, a new three-month post that will pinpoint security problems at the VA and develop recommendations for improvements." The AP adds 'The three pages of memos by the VA, written by privacy officer Mark Whitney and distributed to high-level officials shortly after the May 3 burglary, offer new details on the scope of one of the nation's largest security breaches. The memos were obtained Wednesday by The Associated Press. … They show that a file containing 6,744 records pertaining to 'mustard gas veterans' - or those who participated in chemical testing programs during World War II - was breached, and that a 'short file' with as many as 10 diagnostic codes indicating a veteran's disability also was stolen. … At the same time, however, the memos suggest that the data might be difficult to retrieve by thieves. … On Wednesday, the VA did not say why it didn't immediately reveal that personal information such as addresses and phone numbers had been disclosed. But the agency said it aggressively sought to protect veterans once Nicholson was informed. … Some lawmakers said Wednesday they were troubled by the new revelations, which go further than what the VA initially reported after publicizing the theft on May 22. At the time, Nicholson said the data was limited to names, Social Security numbers and birthdates; he later indicated that diagnostic codes in some cases also may have been breached."

Deal Reached In Houston Crime Lab Probe. The Houston Chronicle (6/1, McVicker) reports, "Three recalcitrant witnesses believed to hold key information concerning the root of problems at the Houston Police Department crime lab could soon be forced to tell what they know." The Chronicle continues, "Michael Bromwich, the city's independent investigator, and Rep. Kevin Bailey, D-Houston, chairman of the House Committee on General Investigating and Ethics, confirmed Tuesday that an unorthodox agreement has been reached that would let Bromwich use the committee's subpoena power to compel the uncooperative former lab employees to testify under oath. … 'We're pleased we've been able to reach an agreement with Chairman Bailey and the members of his committee that will advance our investigation,' Bromwich said." The Chronicle adds, "In his latest report on the crime lab released earlier this month, Bromwich, a former U.S. Justice Department inspector general, said DNA and serology analysts may have tailored their findings to support predetermined crime theories. … Bromwich also complained that the probe by his team of forensic investigators has been hindered by an absence of cooperation from three ex-crime lab employees: former lab supervisor Don Krueger, former DNA lab chief James Bolding and former analyst Christy Kim. … Krueger retired in February 2003 after the DNA section's widespread problems were exposed. Former Police Chief C.O. Bradford later recommended that Krueger be fired for his role in the lab's problems. Bolding resigned in 2003 to avoid being fired. Kim was fired, but the Civil Service Commission re-instated her and she later retired."

Ohio High Court Reverses Death Penalty. The AP (6/1) reports, "The Ohio Supreme Court on Wednesday threw out the death sentence of a man who strangled and stomped a 76-year-old man during a robbery, saying the killer's chaotic childhood with abusive parents, along with other factors, outweighed the crime's brutality." The AP continues, "The 4-3 opinion also noted that Troy Tenace, 44, expressed remorse when he confessed to police in 1994, and that if he receives the maximum sentence, he won't be eligible for parole until age 96." The AP adds, "Any one factor alone would not have resulted in reversing the death sentence, but the combination of the three is enough to argue for prison over execution, the majority said. … The three dissenting justices said the brutality of the crime was inexcusable. … The justices were unanimous, however, in upholding Tenace's conviction for robbing and killing Chester Kozlowski on Jan. 28, 1994, in his Toledo home. Tenace robbed Kozlowski because the older man paid him in cash earlier for chimney repairs. The man had been gagged and strangled, and had extensive facial injuries from being stomped with heavy boots. … The ruling sends the case back to Lucas County for resentencing."

South Carolina Lawmakers Approve Death Penalty For Some Child Molesters. South Carolina's House of Representatives has passed pair of bills that would allow prosecutors to seek the death penalty for some repeat child molesters. The AP (6/1) reports, "One bill was approved earlier by the Senate and now goes to the governor's office, but the second must go back to the Senate for reconsideration."

FEC Keeps 527 Funding Loophole In Place. The Washington Post (6/1, A4, Edsall, 744K) reports the Federal Election Commission yesterday announced the "same rules that allowed independent '527' groups such as America Coming Together and Swift Boat Veterans for Truth to pump more than $400 million into the 2004 election campaigns will remain in place for now." The decision "invites even larger sums to be spent influencing races this year and in 2008." The FEC ruling, "made on a vote of 4 to 2 in closed session was a response to an order by U.S. District Judge Emmett G. Sullivan. Noting the apparent 'complete failure' of the FEC's regulatory efforts in 2004, Sullivan required the agency either to start crafting new rules or to issue a better explanation of how it will be able to regulate the groups effectively under existing rules."

The New York Times (6/1, Phillips, 1.19M) reports a federal judge "had told the commission that it had two choices: issue uniform rules or issue a fuller explanation of why it was dealing with 527-related cases one by one even as the 2006 elections near. The commission voted 4 to 2 not to appeal the judge's ruling, and chose the second option." The vote "by the panel set the stage for another round of court battles that could affect the 2006 Congressional elections, as well as the 2008 presidential race. Advocates of changing campaign financing — and some Republicans — have been prodding the commission and Congress to regulate the 527 groups, named after a section of the tax code. Critics term the groups' operations an end run around the McCain-Feingold ban on the largely unregulated contributions to federal candidates that is known as soft money."

Report Urges Streamlining Of Classified Records Management. Government Computer News (6/1, Lipowicz) reports, "The federal government needs to apply a more integrated approach to declassifying records, a new report from the National Archives and Records Administration recommends. … 'We need to streamline the multiple, inefficient and, at times, ineffective independent agency reviews of the same material,' according to the report, which was published by NARA's Information Security Oversight Office." GCN continues, "The office found that the level of reported classifications in fiscal 2005 decreased by 1.4 million in comparison to fiscal 2004 and is the first decrease observed since fiscal 2001. Even so, there are still increasing numbers of documents being classified, primarily for counterterrorism activities and critical infrastructure protection, at the Homeland Security and Justice departments." GCN adds, "The total number of classifications dropped to 14.2 million in fiscal 2005, a decrease from 15.6 million the year before. That reversed an upward trend that had been occurring since 2001, with 8.7 million classifications that year. In 2002 there were 11.3 million, in 2003 14.2 million, and in 2004 15.6 million."

Bankruptcy Judge, Pilots Approve Delta Concessions Deal. The AP (6/1, Weber, Tong) reports, "A bankruptcy judge Wednesday approved the $280-million-a-year concessions agreement between Delta Air Lines Inc. and its pilots, rejecting claims by the government's pension insurer that it should receive the compensation the pilots were promised if their pension is terminated." The AP continues, "The decision came hours after rank-and-file pilots gave their nod to the deal. The agreement, which runs through 2009, will take effect Thursday." The AP adds, "The deal, which replaces an interim pact agreed to in December, includes an initial 14 percent pay cut for pilots and assurances the pilots union won't fight any company effort to terminate the pilots' pension. … Judge Adlai Hardin signed the agreement during a hearing in White Plains, New York. Earlier in the day, pilots of the Atlanta-based airline, the No. 3 U.S. carrier, approved the deal with a vote of 61 percent in favor. … The judge's approval, the last hurdle in the process, came despite an objection filed by the government's pension insurer, which insisted that a $650 million note and $2.1 billion unsecured claim that Delta has promised the pilots should belong to the agency if the pilots' pension is terminated as expected. … Hardin heard arguments from lawyers for both sides, but determined in the end that the agreement was in the best interest of the airline."

Supreme Court Ruling May Slow Momentum To Redefine Whistleblower Protections. The Washington Post (6/1, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The Supreme Court's ruling on freedom-of-speech rights of public employees has created a stir across the government, in part because of the way Justice Anthony M. Kennedy , writing for the 5-to-4 majority, framed the issue: 'When public employees make statements pursuant to their official duties, the employees are not speaking as citizens for First Amendment purposes, and the Constitution does not insulate their communications from employer discipline.'" The Supreme Court ruling "may slow momentum in Congress for redefining whistle-blower protections. Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii), with bipartisan support, is pushing for legislation that would permit a federal whistle-blower to be protected for disclosing information learned on the job or in the course of job duties. The Justice Department has opposed taking that step, and at least one senator has placed a hold on Akaka's bill, according to congressional aides."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

NYCLU Tells Judge NYC Blocking Transfer Of Arrest Evidence To FBI. The AP (6/1, Neumeister) reports that in a letter to US Magistrate Judge James C. Francis, the New York Civil Liberties Union said "on Wednesday that the city has refused to let it give evidence to the FBI as the bureau explores whether police officers violated the rights of protesters at the 2004 Republican National Convention." NYCLU associate legal director Chris Dunn "said he planned to ask the judge at a conference next week to clear the way for the NYCLU to cooperate with the FBI. In a Tuesday letter to Dunn, city senior legal counsel Peter G. Ferrell wrote that the NYCLU may make its own materials available to the FBI but not materials the city gave it and marked confidential."

Florida Governor Signs Bill Eliminating Juvenile Boot Camps. The AP (6/1, Fanta) reports, "The military-style boot camp system that Florida has used to discipline juveniles was formally dismantled under a bill that Gov. Jeb Bush signed Wednesday, nearly five months after the death of a boy who was punched and kicked by guards at a state-run camp." The AP continues, "Instead of sending juvenile detainees to boot camps where guards can push and threaten them, children will go to residential programs that bar physical discipline. They'll go through a full medical exam when they enter and leave their programs and have a hot line they can call in case of trouble. … The $11 million program, which counties can voluntarily join, will also offer detainees job skills training, community service and counseling."

The Bradenton Herald (6/1) reports, "The legislation is named for Martin Lee Anderson, who was sent to the Bay County boot camp Jan. 5 for trespassing, a violation of his parole set for helping steal his grandmother's Jeep Cherokee from a church parking lot. … Security videotape taken at the camp shows a half-hour encounter between Anderson and up to nine guards, who kicked and kneed him. Anderson died the next day at a Pensacola hospital. … While a first autopsy report stated that Anderson died of sickle cell trait, a second autopsy report released in May showed Anderson died of suffocation by guards who covered his mouth while forcing ammonia capsules up his nose. … Guards have stated in reports they tried to revive Anderson with the ammonia. No arrests have been made so far and the investigation into the death is continuing, said Pam Bondi, spokeswoman for special attorney Mark Ober. Ober is handling the investigation into Anderson's death."

NYTimes Columnist Decries Sex Trafficking.

In a column for the New York Times (6/1), Bob Herbert writes, "The demand for prostitutes (here in New York and elsewhere) is much greater than the supply of women who want to be prostitutes. So trafficking, the coercion of women and young girls into the sex trade, is a flourishing industry." Herbert continues, "The toll that trafficking takes is often horrific. In addition to the forced prostitution, the women and children who are the victims of trafficking become part of a landscape in which drug addiction, disease, mental health problems, beatings and violent death are commonplace." Herbert adds, "It may seem peculiar, but there is no law against sex trafficking in the state of New York — or most other states, for that matter. Many thousands of women and children are coerced into the sex trade each year, and the pimps, madams and other lowlifes who trap them are seldom subject to legal sanctions commensurate with the severity of their crimes. … A bill has been introduced in the State Assembly that would create two new crimes in New York: trafficking a person for sexual servitude and trafficking a person for labor servitude. But that bill, which has overwhelming support in the Assembly (including more than 100 co-sponsors), has been stuck for some time in the Codes Committee. … Trafficking is much more widespread than most people realize. As the advocacy group Sanctuary for Families has pointed out, 'In our backyards and communities, a slave trade is flourishing that makes a mockery of our belief in civil and human rights.'"

Gay Marriage Debate Seen As "Battle Of Our Times." Under the headline "Gay Marriage Looms As 'Battle Of Our Times,'" the Christian Science Monitor (6/1, Lampman, 61K) reports, "As Senate prepares to argue a marriage amendment, room for compromise between religious freedom and equal rights seems thin. The battle over same-sex marriage is shaping into something more than deep societal tradition vs. civil rights. It is becoming a conflict of equality vs. religious liberty." Both sides "are pursuing their agendas in state legislatures, courts, and public schools. Both sides tend to view the struggle as a zero-sum, society-defining conflict."

New York High Court Hears Arguments On Gay Marriage. The New York Times (6/1, Hartocollis, 1.19M) reports, "As the issue of gay marriage finally reached New York State's highest court on Wednesday, the six judges who heard the passionate arguments from both sides put forth a fundamental question: Has marriage been defined by history, culture and tradition since the dawn of Western civilization, or is it an evolving social institution that should change with the times?" The Times adds, "During the two and a half hours of oral argument, the judges on the Court of Appeals grappled with essential questions of social values, asking tough questions without tipping their hands as to their ultimate decision." The case before the court was "a challenge to New York State's marriage laws, filed by 44 same-sex couples."

More Commentary On Gay Marriage Debate. GOP Sen. Wayne Allard, author of the Marriage Protection Amendment, writes in USA Today (6/1, 2.31M), "Recent decisions by activist judges not only fail to respect the traditional definition of marriage, they also highlight a lack of respect for the democratic process. The courts are driving a redefinition of marriage contrary to democratic principles. The process to amend the US Constitution is one the American people can trust. … If we in Congress fail to define marriage, the courts ultimately will not hesitate to define it for us."

USA Today (6/1, 2.31M) editorializes, "Even supporters of the Marriage Protection Amendment readily concede that the measure to ban same-sex marriage nationwide has virtually no chance of becoming part of the Constitution. … So why bother? Well, Election Day is a few months off. Supporters hope the controversy will energize their base of social and religious conservatives opposed to same-sex marriage."

The New York Times (6/1, 1.19M), in an editorial titled "On The Low Road To November," also says Republicans are "trying to rally their far-right base for the fall elections with a mean-spirited sideshow threatening to the Constitution: a ban on same-sex marriage. … Plainly, the real purpose of this rerun is to provide red meat to social conservatives, and fodder for commercials aimed at senators who vote to block the atrocious amendment."

Study Says Minorities Pay Higher Rates For Subprime Mortgages. A study by the advocacy group, the Center for Responsible Lending has found that black and Hispanic home buyers tend to pay higher interest rates on subprime mortgages than whites with similar credit ratings. The New York Times (6/1, Eckholm, 1.19M) reports, "The subprime industry makes loans at higher interest rates to people who cannot qualify for regular mortgages. 'When we compared borrowers with the same risk characteristics, African-Americans and Latinos were still more likely to get the higher-rate loans,' said Debbie Gruenstein Bocian, a researcher at the group, the Center for Responsible Lending. A spokesman for the mortgage banking industry challenged the conclusion, saying the report did not take into account all the legitimate questions about family wealth and debt, house appraisal and other factors that underwriters must consider when making a loan."

Horowtiz Says Liberal Professors Exclude Conservative Students. USA Today (6/1, Marklein, 2.31M) reports that "60s radical turned conservative activist" David Horowitz "has spent the past few years crisscrossing the country to warn students: 'You can't get a good education if they're only telling you half the story.' To Horowitz, an overwhelming majority of hard-line liberal professors on campuses have left conservative students complaining that their views aren't welcome. His job, he says, is to see that those students aren't treated as second-class citizens." Horowitz wants "a return to the kind of liberal arts education he got at Columbia University in the 1950s, when he still embraced communism, where professors 'taught me what the intellectual life should be like, where you focus on the ideas. It's not a political food fight like so much of our culture has become.' Trouble is, his critics, including a recently created coalition of student, faculty and civil liberties groups, say he doesn't know what he's talking about."

Group Plans To Put 10 Commandments Monument Across From Supreme Court. The Washington Post (6/1, Boorstein, 744K) reports that a DC-based evangelical Christian group plans to put a monument to the Ten Commandments across the street from the US Supreme Court. The group Faith and Action "says on its Web site that it plans to unveil the waist-high, 850-pound granite sculpture Saturday on the front lawn of the rowhouse on Second Street NE where the national group's offices are. But the group apparently doesn't have the approval it needs from at least two agencies, city officials and neighborhood activists said. … The sculpture 'will be visible to the nine justices as they arrive and leave each day,' the site said in explaining why the group undertook the project."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Watching Napster Suit. The Los Angeles Times (5/31, Menn) reports that federal antitrust investigators "are reexamining" online music pioneer Napster's "long-standing claims that the major record labels improperly conspired to keep authorized downloads off the Internet, said people familiar with the matter." The Times continues, " Justice Department officials are closely tracking a court fight in federal court in San Francisco between the labels and the financial backers of the original Napster, the file-sharing network that debuted in 2001 and became emblematic of online piracy." The Times adds, "Napster filed for bankruptcy protection, and the name was bought and assumed by Roxio Inc. in 2002. … The labels are suing venture capital firm Hummer Winblad Venture Partners and German conglomerate Bertelsmann, which owns label BMG, accusing them of contributing to the piracy by the first Napster users. … As part of its defense, Hummer Winblad has alleged that the labels violated antitrust laws by colluding to refuse to license their music to Napster for legitimate distribution." The Times notes, "Antitrust investigators have asked both sides to keep them apprised by passing along filings in the case, said music industry sources who asked not to be identified because of the sensitive nature of the government's inquiries. … It is unclear whether the review has led to a full reopening of an inquiry that ended in 2003, when the department announced it hadn't found evidence that the major labels manipulated the digital music market." UPI (6/1) also reports this story.

Google CEO Calls Creation Of Web Browser Unlikely. The AP (6/1, Liedtke) reports, "Google Inc. CEO

Eric Schmidt on Wednesday told industry analysts the online search engine leader is unlikely to create its own Web browser, even though the company remains worried about being slighted by the next version of Microsoft Corp.'s Internet Explorer." The AP continues, "Responding to a question during a conference call, Schmidt said Google sees little need to develop its own browser because most people seem satisfied with Explorer and rivals such as Firefox, Apple Computer Inc.'s Safari and Opera." The AP adds, 'Mountain View, Calif.-based Google already has a search toolbar installed in Firefox as part of its partnership with the Mozilla open source software project that introduced the browser in 2004. … 'We would not build a browser just for the fun of building a browser,' Schmidt said." The AP notes, "Later in the call, Schmidt reiterated Google's concerns about Microsoft programming the next version of its Internet Explorer to steer more traffic to its own Internet search engine. … Google informally complained to the U.S. Justice Department about Microsoft's plans, but regulators decided they didn't need to intervene. Schmidt said Google still hopes Microsoft will make it easier for Explorer users to set up other search engines in the browser."

Six Newspapers Await Word On McClatchy Auction. The AP (6/1, Sheeran) reports, "Six former Knight Ridder Inc. newspapers awaited word Wednesday on possible suitors as the deadline passed for bidding on the mid- and small-sized papers." The AP continues, "There was no immediate word on how many bids were submitted, when new owner McClatchy Co. might decide on possible buyers or whether the papers would be sold as a group or one by one." The AP adds, "McClatchy, based in Sacramento, Calif., bought Knight's Ridder 32 newspapers in March and decided to sell 12 largely because they were in slower-growing markets. … With buyers found for six larger newspapers - including The Philadelphia Inquirer - McClatchy turned its attention to the six smallest. Among those, most attention has focused on the Akron Beacon Journal, the largest of the six remaining papers and once the flagship of Knight Ridder. … Advance Publications in New York, parent company of the Beacon Journal's biggest competitor and Ohio's largest newspaper, The (Cleveland) Plain Dealer, was believed to be among the possible bidders for the Akron newspaper. The papers are 40 miles apart and compete in some of the faster growing Cleveland and Akron suburbs, including Medina County and northern Summit County."

EU Fines Chemical Groups In Price-Fixing Cartel. The Financial Times (6/1, Buck) reports, "The European Union's top antitrust regulator yesterday imposed fines totalling €344.6m ($441.9m) on four chemical groups for operating a cartel in the market for plexiglas and similar acrylic glass products." The Times continues, "French oil group Total's Arkema unit was worst-affected, with a fine of €219.1m. Britain's ICI was ordered to pay €91.4m. Lucite, another UK group, was fined €25m and Quinn Barlo of Ireland €9m. Both Arkema and ICI saw fines increased by 50 per cent because of convictions in other cartel cases." The Times adds, "Degussa, a German chemical group and another member of the cartel, escaped punishment because it blew the whistle on its co-conspirators. The Commission said Degussa would otherwise have been made to pay €264.5m - the highest single fine of all the members. … Neelie Kroes, EU competition commissioner, said: 'Cartels are a scourge. I am shocked that companies like ICI and Arkema have been fined once again. These fines will serve as a cold shower for the management and shareholders of all these companies, who have to realise that cartels cannot and will not be tolerated.' … The Commission said it had obtained handwritten notes of a meeting in a Dublin hotel room in October 1999, at which the companies agreed to raise their prices as of January 2000."

The AP (6/1, White) reports, "Cartels 'allow the participants to shield themselves from competition, to charge higher prices and to be protected from the need to innovate,' said EU spokesman Jonathan Todd. 'Their customers -- both companies and final consumers -- pay the price in terms of higher prices and a narrower choice of products.'"

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Federal, State Officials Seek More Funds From Exxon Mobil For 1989 Spill. The AP (6/1, Lee) reports, "Federal and state authorities will seek more money from Exxon Mobil Corp. on Thursday to rehabilitate wildlife populations and clean up remaining oil from a devastating spill nearly 20 years ago, Alaska officials said." The AP continues, "Exxon has paid $900 million in restitution for the spill - the nation's largest - which emptied 11 million gallons of crude oil into Prince William Sound in 1989. … A 'reopener' provision in the settlement created a window from 2002 to 2006 in which the state and federal governments could claim up to an additional $100 million. … That reopener provision expires Sept. 1. State and federal officials must file a claim 90 days before that date, by the end of this week." The AP adds, 'The specifics of the claim, including how much will be requested from Exxon, have not been released. … 'We are going to make a claim, but all the details are still being worked out between the Department of Law and the Department of Justice,' John Manly, spokesman for Gov. Frank Murkowski, said Wednesday. … Exxon Mobil spokesman Mark Boudreaux said Wednesday that the company hadn't been notified that the Justice Department would seek a reopener. … Hundreds of studies by Exxon have shown the environmental impact to be less serious than claimed by other researchers. Boudreaux said Exxon didn't know of any new scientific studies that would merit reopening the settlement."

Federal Judge Rules Sea Lion Research Violates Animal Protection Laws. The AP (6/1, Lee) reports, "A judge ruled the federal government must halt studies of threatened and endangered Steller sea lions because it did not properly asses how certain research techniques might harm the animals." The AP continues, "The National Marine Fisheries Service approved permits for research activities that include hot branding and tissue sampling of thousands of sea lions each year, said the suit filed last year by the Humane Society of the United States. … 'We have concerns about the lack of environmental review, the structure of the research and how it's being done,' Jonathan Lovvorn, an attorney for the Humane Society, said Tuesday. 'Our main goal is and has always been to have them evaluate the research before authorization. We want to see that happen.'" The AP adds, "Lovern said they agency needs to better evaluate different research techniques, which range from minimally invasive to lethal. … 'We don't oppose research in order to benefit the Steller sea lion,' Lovvorn said. 'The question is are we doing that here in accordance with the law.' … The federal agency failed to comply with the National Environmental Protection Act by not preparing an environmental impact statement, and must give up its research permits, according to the decision on Friday by U.S. District Court Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle in Washington, D.C."

Death Rates Rising At Small Mines. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (6/1, Maher, 2.11M) notes that since May 20, "seven miners have died, bringing the number of workers killed in coal-mine accidents in the U.S. this year to 33 -- compared with 22 for all of last year. Part of the problem, some say, is a rise in the number of small, undercapitalized mines that have become economical since coal prices have surged. Miners refer to them as 'dogholes.'" Higher fatality rates at small mines "have plagued the industry even in years when the overall number was falling. A report by the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health, which examined data from 1988 to 1997, found the fatality rate at coal mines with fewer than 50 employees was 4.24 times the rate at mines with 250 or more workers."

Scientists Believe Vast Oil Deposits Lie Under Arctic Ocean. The New York Times (6/1, Revkin, 1.19M) reports, "The studies on Arctic sediment that appear today in the journal Nature tell a dramatic story of polar warming and cooling over millions of years. But what they tell petroleum geologists may be just as striking." Some scientists involved in the work "said the huge amounts of organic material from dead algae and plants embedded in the ancient sedimentary layers suggested that the center of the Arctic Ocean could hold vast oil deposits. Several of the researchers said they were reluctant to focus on that aspect of the work, saying it would be unfortunate if their climate studies prompted new oil exploration that could liberate more greenhouse gases and further warm the climate."

Research Suggests Arctic Ocean Was Tropical 55 Million Years Ago. In a separate story, the New York Times (6/1, Revkin, 1.19M) reports that a detailed analysis of the climatic and biological record from the seabed near the North Pole "shows that 55 million years ago the Arctic Ocean was much warmer than scientists imagined — a Floridian year-round average of 74 degrees. The findings, published today in three papers in the journal Nature, fill in a blank spot in scientists' understanding of climate history. And while they show that much remains to be learned about climate change, they suggest that scientists have greatly underestimated the power of heat-trapping gases to warm the Arctic."

Corporate America Increasingly Embracing Need To Address Climate Change. USA Today (6/1, Lynch, 2.31M) reports that Paul Anderson, chairman of Charlotte-based Duke Energy, a registered Republican and backer of President Bush, "wants the federal government to fight global warming by taxing companies based on the 'greenhouse gases' they pump into the atmosphere." The Times notes, "That such a Big Business stalwart is demanding federal action on climate change illustrates an unmistakable evolution in corporate thinking, motivated both by evidence that global warming already is affecting the economy and by the prospect of fat profits from new environment-friendly products." Corporate America "increasingly is embracing the need for reducing human contributions to the planet's rising temperatures. Forty companies — including Boeing, IBM, John Hancock and Whirlpool — have publicly endorsed the notion that climate change is real by joining a business council organized by the Pew Center on Global Climate Change."

Kempthorne Spends First Day As Interior Secretary. The Washington Post (6/1, A17, Eilperin, 744K) reports that resolving a long list of lawsuits is one of many tasks Dirk Kempthorne "faces as the nation's 49th interior secretary. With 30 months before the administration ends, he must confront everything from a huge maintenance backlog at the national parks to a contentious debate over how to best protect endangered species." Yesterday, Kempthorne "spent his first day doing what he does best: stroking the egos of interest-group leaders, chatting up tourists standing by historic memorials he now oversees, and bonding with politicians."

Reservation In Minnesota To Banish Drug Offenders. From Granite Falls, Minnesota, the AP (6/1) reports a small American Indian reservation "plans to banish drug offenders. The plan targets anyone who commits a drug crime on the Upper Sioux's reservation land. The individual is automatically prohibited from setting foot on the reservation. Tribal courts will decide how long the banishment lasts. The banned individual will retain tribal membership."

SF Chronicle Reporters Challenge Bonds Leak Subpoena. The AP (6/1, Kravets) reports, "Two San Francisco Chronicle reporters subpoenaed to testify before a federal grand jury about how they got Barry Bonds' leaked testimony urged a judge on Wednesday to let them off the hook." The AP continues, "The Chronicle's Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, the latest reporters to become entangled in the federal government's ramped-up efforts to investigate leaks, argued that the First Amendment protects reporters and their sources. … In an affidavit accompanying their filing, Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist Carl Bernstein wrote to U.S. District Judge Martin Jenkins of San Francisco that anonymous sources were instrumental in breaking the Watergate scandal." The AP adds, "Fainaru-Wada and Williams have been have been subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury investigating who leaked them the secret testimony of San Francisco giants slugger Bonds, the New York Yankees' Jason Giambi and other professional athletes. … About two dozen athletes were called before an earlier San Francisco grand jury in 2004 as part of the government's investigation into the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative - the California nutritional supplement lab that was exposed as a steroid ring."

Former DOJ Communications Director Criticizes Reporters' Subpoenas. The New York Times (6/1, Liptak) reports, "Subpoenas issued last month to reporters for The San Francisco Chronicle were criticized yesterday by a former chief spokesman for Attorney General John Ashcroft as a 'reckless abuse of power.'" The Times continues, "The former spokesman, Mark Corallo, made similar statements in an affidavit filed in federal court yesterday. He said Mr. Ashcroft's successor, Alberto R. Gonzales, had acted improperly in issuing the subpoenas. … 'This is the most reckless abuse of power I have seen in years,' Mr. Corallo said in an interview. 'They really should be ashamed of themselves.'" The Times adds, "The subpoenas, part of an effort to identify The Chronicle's sources for its coverage of steroid use in baseball, would not have been authorized by Mr. Ashcroft, Mr. Corallo said. 'You just don't ride roughshod over the rights of reporters to gather information from confidential sources,' he added. … Mr. Corallo left the Justice Department in 2005. His public relations firm represents, among others, Karl Rove, President Bush's top political adviser. A spokeswoman for Mr. Ashcroft, who also stepped down in 2005, declined to comment on Mr. Corallo's sworn statement, which was submitted with the reporters' motion to quash the subpoena." The Times notes, "Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said he could not address the subpoena to the Chronicle reporters. Subpoenas, he said, are 'handled consistent with Justice Department guidelines and on a case-by-case basis on facts specific to the case that only those in the Justice Department would be aware of.' … Mr. Gonzales has in recent weeks hinted that the Justice Department may move beyond subpoenas for journalists' sources, and pursue the criminal prosecution of reporters under espionage laws for publishing classified information. … Mr. Corallo said that in three years as the department's press secretary and public affairs director, he approved a single subpoena to the press, involving what he called a serious national security matter, and turned down many more. One of those he refused, he said in the court filing, concerned 'a public corruption case involving leaks of grand jury information.'"

Man Cited Among Major Foreign Heroin Dealers Gets 40-Year Prison Sentence. The AP (5/31, Neumeister) reports from New York City that a man "described as one of the biggest foreign heroin dealers ever extradited to the United States was sentenced Wednesday to 40 years in prison, dodging a life term in a U.S. deal with Colombia that was hotly debated in court. Ramiro Lopez-Imitola, who prosecutors said headed a heroin trafficking organization in Colombia and Venezuela, was sentenced in U.S. District Court and ordered to forfeit $200 million in assets, though he claimed to be broke." Lopez-Imitola is said to have "ordered the body of [a] courier cut open to extract drugs after the man died of an overdose in Miami. … Drug Enforcement Administration special agent John P. Gilbride called the desecration of the drug courier 'the extent to which a monster would go in order to make millions from the drug trade.'"

"Key" Figure In Tennessee Drug Conspiracy Case Pleads Guilty. The Greeneville (TN) Sun (5/31) reports a Telford man federal authorities "alleged was a key local figure in a decade-long conspiracy to import drugs into Northeast Tennessee pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court…Monday to two conspiracy charges. Mark Allen Saults…pleaded guilty…to two counts of a federal indictment," which included conspiring with others to distribute 15,000 pounds of marijuana. The Sun says Saults and another person were arrested on Dec. 1, 2005, by DEA agents when the two came to meet with an informant from whom they reportedly had agreed to purchase 50 pounds of marijuana and two pounds of meth.

Oregon Man Indicted In Marijuana-Related Case. The Lincoln City (OR) News Guard (5/31) reports that on May 24, a federal grand jury "indicted a Salem and Otis resident on multiple charges, including the charge of 'human trafficking.' Ramon Lopez-Montanez, 39, was indicted on charges of forced labor, marijuana manufacturing and use of a false government document. … According to the indictment, Lopez-Montanez is charged with growing marijuana in Salem and Otis and using a false Oregon driver's license to open an account at Wells Fargo Bank in Lincoln City." The News Guard notes the DEA's and FBI's involvement in the investigation, along with other agencies.

Illinois Man Convicted Of Dealing Crack Cocaine Gets 25-Year Prison Sentence. The Belleville News Democrat (5/31) reports, "A 39-year-old Alton man was sentenced in federal court in East St. Louis Tuesday to 25 years in prison on crack cocaine charges. Christopher B. Taylor was convicted of distributing and possessing with intent to distribute crack cocaine. … The case was prosecuted as part of a continuing DEA investigation targeting crack cocaine trafficking in Alton."

Woman Sentenced In Michigan For Delivering Cocaine. The Flint (MI)Journal(5/31) reports, "A woman who delivered an ounce of crack cocaine to undercover investigators last year was sentenced Tuesday to nearly 4 years in prison, even though her attorney argued for probation, saying her involvement in the drug trade was her boyfriend's fault. U.S. District Judge Paul Gadola sentenced Renee Holmes, 31, to 3 years and 10 months in prison. … Holmes and her boyfriend, Damon D. Cooper, were among nine people indicted by a grand jury on federal drug charges last September after an investigation by federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents and Flint police."

Former New York Prosecutor's Husband Challenges Cash Seizure By Federal Authorities. According to the Albany (NY) Times Union (5/31, Lyons), federal authorities "are moving to seize $352,680 in cash that Illinois state troopers confiscated from a car being driven across the country by the husband of a former Albany County prosecutor. The Justice Department contends the money…is the proceeds of drug dealing and therefore subject to seizure. But Robert L. Schultz, 45, who is married to former Assistant District Attorney Kimberly A. Mariani, is challenging the government's assertion."

Defendant's Attorney Seeks Informant's Name In Mississippi Drug Case. The Greenwood (MS) Commonwealth (5/31) reports, "Kevin Matthews wants to know the identity of the federal informant who turned on him, but the U.S. attorney's office said the law doesn't require them to identify that person until trial time. The pleading filed by Matthews' attorney…is the latest in a flurry of paper thrown back and forth in the Greenwood man's federal case. During raids conducted by agents of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the Mississippi Bureau of Narcotics in October, Matthews and three other Greenwood men were among the 36 total suspects arrested in a Delta drug sweep."

Report Said To Clear Lance Armstrong Of Doping Allegations, WADA Not Convinced. There is widespread coverage today of a report that is said to clear cyclist Lance Armstrong of using banned substances. News outlets have made more than 500 references to the report. For example, the AP (6/1) writes that a Dutch investigator's report "cleared Lance Armstrong of doping in the 1999 Tour de France on Wednesday, calling the accusations against him 'completely irresponsible' and raising the possibility of misconduct by anti-doping authorities. The 132-page report recommended convening a tribunal to discuss possible legal and ethical violations by the World Anti-Doping Agency and to consider 'appropriate sanctions to remedy the violations.'" The AP report was published by news outlets such as ABC News, the Wall Street Journal, Washington Times, San Diego Union Tribune, Chicago Sun-Times, Pittsburgh Post Gazette, and Boston Herald.

Knight Ridder (5/31, Almond) reports, "The investigator, Emile Vrijman, examined test results taken from the year Armstrong won his first of seven consecutive Tour de France titles. … The investigation was initiated after the French sports newspaper L'Equipe reported last August that six of Armstrong's urine samples from 1999 were positive for the blood-boosting drug EPO when retested in 2004. … Officials from the World Anti-Doping Agency said in a statement they were concerned that the investigation had focused on how the retired cyclist's urine tests were leaked to a newspaper and not whether the results were valid."

The Los Angeles Times (6/1, Abrahamson) reports, "WADA Chairman Dick Pound, who has long asserted the cycling federation, which goes by the acronym UCI, leaked the 1999 doping forms to the French newspaper L'Equipe, questioned how Vrijman had reached the conclusion that one of the top anti-doping labs in the world -- the French national lab, near Paris -- had so thoroughly botched tests. The lab is known by its French acronym, LNDD."

The New York Times (6/1, Macur) writes, "In the 130-page report, Vrijman stated that there was no proof that Armstrong had used EPO, a synthetic version of a naturally occurring hormone that increases oxygen-rich red blood cells, because there was no way to prove that Armstrong's urine samples had not been tampered with or tainted. In turn, Vrijman wrote that the cycling union should 'refrain from initiating any disciplinary action whatsoever.'"

According to Bloomberg (5/31, Sheringham), "Lance Armstrong was cleared of taking banned drugs at the 1999 Tour de France by independent investigators who said the World Anti-Doping Agency may be guilty of misconduct in its handling of the case."

In Forbes (5/31), Parmy Olson writes, "WADA loada baloney. … The finger of blame is now being pointed squarely at anti-doping authorities including France's LNDD and the World Anti-Doping Agency, otherwise known as WADA."

On its Web site, CNN (5/31) reports Vrijman, "assigned by the International Cycling Union (UCI) to investigate newspaper allegations, said on Wednesday testing procedures were insufficient to label Armstrong's sample positive." However, "In a strongly-worded press release on Wednesday, the UCI said that they 'deplored' the behavior of Vrijman, claiming that he had released the report without their permission to the Dutch press and before all 'interested parties' could comment."

The UK's Guardian (6/1) says Lance Armstrong yesterday "repeated his accusation that he was the victim of a 'witch-hunt' after the appearance of a report into allegations made last August in the French newspaper L'Equipe that the blood-booster erythropoietin was found in urine samples provided by the seven-times Tour de France winner during his first win in the race in 1999."

Voice of America (5/31) reports on its Web site, "Vrijman said his report 'exonerates Armstrong completely.' The cyclist has never tested positive for drugs and has vehemently denied using performance-enhancing substances."

The BBC (5/31) writes, "Cycling's governing body, the UCI, said it would make a full statement after studying the report."

Fentanyl Linked To Detroit Overdoses Possibly Made In Illegal Labs. The Detroit News

Operation Rolling Thunder Nets Arrests Of 152 Fugitives In New York. The Buffalo News (6/1, Thomas) reports, "A 26-year-old man wanted in a Rochester slaying was one of 152 dangerous fugitives and sexual predators arrested in Erie and Niagara counties during a five-day blitz that ended Saturday." The News continues, "Mario Collier, arrested in Buffalo, is accused of shooting an accused drug dealer to death in January after luring him to the meeting place by dousing his friend with gasoline. He had been a fugitive for the last four months. A team of officers searched for him for three straight days, at the homes of relatives and friends, from Buffalo to Cheektowaga." The News adds, "Teams of local, state and federal officers from 20 law enforcement agencies fanned out across the two counties to apprehend fugitives wanted on felony warrants for assault, rape, burglary, narcotics, parole and probation violations and failure to register as a sex offender. During the operation, 213 outstanding warrants were executed. … The sweep was part of Operation Rolling Thunder, a statewide initiative that began in November to capture the state's worst fugitives. … Across the state, 619 fugitives have been arrested so far during Operation Rolling Thunder stings in Rochester, Syracuse and Albany, according to Chauncey G. Parker, director of criminal justice for the state Division of Criminal Justice Services. … 'Collier, without a doubt, was our No. 1 priority,' said Daniel Larish, supervisory deputy for the U.S. marshals. 'Any time you take a suspected murderer off the street, you help to make the streets safer.' Collier, aka Marlo Allen Jr., was the last of four men arrested in the slaying of Josue Marrero, 23, in Rochester on Jan. 18."

Man Who Posed As US Marshal Arrested. The New York Times (6/1, Toy, Mead) reports, "Richard S. Kudlik enjoyed regaling his girlfriend with tales of his life as a United States marshal: of his dangerous assignments hunting fugitive criminals and of being so close to Hillary Rodham Clinton that she would request that he and his team provide for her security on certain occasions.. … He would show up at her Long Island home with his gun and badge, Pam Brown recalled yesterday, wearing his blue raid jacket with 'U.S. Marshal' emblazoned across the back. The license plate on his pickup truck read, 'OFF2HUNT,' and there was a United States marshal sticker on the windshield. … But after they had been dating for eight months, Ms. Brown said, Mr. Kudlik told one story too many, and what turned out to be his fictional life as a federal law enforcement officer quickly unraveled." The Times adds, "Ms. Brown set up a Web site last month to expose Mr. Kudlik as a 43-year-old heating and ventilation worker from Port Jefferson who is married and has two teenage children. She then reported him to the Marshals Service — as did several others, according to the agency — and he was arrested on Tuesday on charges of having a counterfeit marshal badge, a misdemeanor punishable by up to six months in prison. … The site is among the latest in a series of Web sites with the goal of exposing cheating paramours. … The Web site includes what it says are e-mailed testimonials from other women who say that Mr. Kudlik duped them with the same story: that he was a divorced father of two and that his work as a marshal meant irregular hours and an inability to meet on weekends and holidays. … Ralph Rosado, a spokesman for the United States Marshals Service, said the service first learned of Mr. Kudlik more than a year ago, when marshals confiscated a badge and other marshal paraphernalia from Mr. Kudlik in April 2005 after a tip from the Nassau County police." … Mr. Kudlik told marshals that he had purchased the counterfeit items on the Internet and promised to stop masquerading as a marshal, so the marshals did not press charges."

The Long Island Newsday (6/1, Armario) reports, "The 34-year-old Port Jefferson man was arrested Tuesday by the real U.S. marshals, for allegedly possessing counterfeit marshal gear, after several women, including Brown, discovered they'd been duped and reported him. … 'He was using the marshals service as a way to get girls,' Deputy U.S. Marshal Ralph Rosado said. 'He's really married with kids.'" Newsday adds, "Officials recovered an assortment of fake marshal paraphernalia in Kudlik's car when they arrested him as he embarked on an Orient Point ferry: patches, duffel bags, memo pads and three laminated 'Fraternal Order of the U.S. Marshals' cards listing him as president. … Rosado said they were uncertain how Kudlik obtained the goods, but that he had a receipt from a German company that made him replica badges."

IMMIGRATION:

USCIS Director Criticizes Senate Immigration Bill. The Washington Times (6/1, Dinan, 90K) reports, "The Senate immigration bill makes the same mistake as the 1986 amnesty by restricting the ability of US Citizenship and Immigration Services to share information on illegal alien guest-worker applicants who are criminals and terrorists, the agency's director said yesterday." Emilio T. Gonzalez, "whose agency would have to administer a guest-worker program, said not allowing the US Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) to share information on someone who applies means they cannot begin the process of removing criminals and national security threats, even after they are rejected from the guest-worker program." In "a briefing with reporters in which he weighed in on the Senate immigration bill, which would offer a chance for citizenship to millions of illegal aliens, expand legal immigration and start a new foreign-worker program," Gonzalez said, "It is important for us to be able to act on what we get when we run a background check on somebody." Gonzalez, "a naturalized citizen himself, has established a new tone that national security should be foremost in employees' minds at the agency. He said his agency will need at least six months and maybe as much as a year to register current illegal aliens for a foreign-worker program -- far longer than the Senate bill envisions."

House, Senate Bills Reduce Court's Ability To Review USCIS Decisions. USA Today (6/1, Kiely, 2.31M) reports, "Immigration legislation now before Congress is threatening a long-standing safeguard to keep politics out of final decisions about who becomes an American, legal experts and immigrant rights advocates say." The House and Senate "have passed immigration bills that would reduce or eliminate federal courts' ability to intervene when immigration officials decide that applicants for citizenship lack 'good moral character,' a legal requirement. Critics of the proposed change contend the final say of a subjective standard should not be left to U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, whose director is a presidential appointee."

Tens Of Thousands Of Hondurans, Nicaraguans Could Lose Legal Status Today. The Washington Post (6/1, A3, Raghavan, 744K) reports, "Tens of thousands of Honduran and Nicaraguan immigrants nationwide risk losing their legal status in the United States today because they have not renewed their temporary work permits under a program to help victims of natural disasters, some in the mistaken belief that they will soon be on the path to becoming US citizens." The Post adds, "With the deadline approaching by the end of today, about half the eligible applicants have yet to apply for renewal. They could lose their jobs and face deportation, jeopardizing the livelihoods of thousands of relatives here and in their homelands who depend on their salaries."

More Commentary On Immigration Reform Debate. George Will writes in the Washington Post (6/1, A19, 744K), "As members of the House and Senate head for a conference to try to reconcile the stark and probably irreconcilable differences incorporated in their two immigration bills, Republicans are between a rock and a hard place. And another rock. And another." But "if Congress fails to pass immigration reform, that will not really deserve to be called a failure, for two reasons. First, the moment may not be ripe for reform, because the country is of two minds -- actually, more than two -- about the issue. Second, the system the Framers created, with two legislative bodies having different dynamics because their constituencies have different characteristics, is in this instance performing approximately as the Framers intended." The House "is supposed to be the barometer that measures the political weather of the moment. It is not failing to do that."

Gary Bauer writes in the Washington Times (6/1, 90K) that "as lawmakers consider various immigration reform measures, they should take a hard look at the reams of polling data that show that standing strong on conservative values, not giving in on amnesty, is the key to winning the hearts, minds and votes of Hispanic Americans. First off, Hispanics are much more conservative on immigration than is commonly believed." If, Republicans "capitulate on amnesty, not only will they give their conservative base reason to stay home on Election Day, but they may alienate a growing constituency that shares those core conservative values of family, hard work, respect for the rule of law and patriotism."

Ruben Navarrette, a member of the editorial board of The San Diego Union-Tribune, writes in USA Today (6/1, 2.31M), "As a Mexican-American, I'm hearing from a lot of US-born Hispanics who are convinced that the immigration debate is a proxy for an assault on them, their language and their culture." Moreover, "as the national mood on immigration reform turns vile and even in some cases violent, there is the very real possibility of a backlash by assimilated, US-born Hispanics."

TAX:

Fed Adviser Calls For Elimination Of Estate Tax. Edward Prescott, senior monetary adviser to the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/1, 2.11M) that "people cannot take their IRAs with them, and the fundamental question is this: Who gets it? It's a simple question that deserves a simple answer, but when a certain little word -- tax -- gets involved, things are never very easy. … The old maxim says that there are only two things in life that we can't avoid, death and taxes, but why pile on by combining the two? The Senate should join the House in permanently repealing the estate tax."

Economist Makes Case For AMT. Robert Nelson, an economist and professor in the School of Public Policy of the University of Maryland, writes in the Washington Post (6/1, A19, 744K), "The AMT is viewed by many as a bad thing. Yet, consider this: There is wide agreement among economists on the benefits of a federal 'flat tax' on income that would apply a uniform rate to every taxpayer and eliminate most current deductions and tax credits. … What does this have to do with the AMT? Just this: As Post business reporter Albert B. Crenshaw has noted, the AMT 'approaches a modern-day flat tax.' It imposes a uniform rate of 26 percent up to $175,000 in income, and above that 28 percent." Nelson adds, "The AMT is a tax policy windfall that ought to be protected and preserved."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Expresses Confidence In CIA, Hayden. The AP (6/1, Riechmann) reports, "President Bush gave the embattled Central Intelligence Agency his vote of confidence on Wednesday, saying the spy outfit will succeed at its mission and make Americans safer with new director Gen. Michael Hayden at its helm." Bush "made the quick trip from the White House to CIA headquarters in suburban Virginia for a ceremonial swearing-in of Hayden. The former head of the National Security Agency who served as the United States' No. 2 intelligence official for the last year was officially sworn in Tuesday and had already had his first day on the job when Bush arrived." Said Bush, "He's such a good man we're going to swear him in twice." Bush "appeared warmly welcomed by the several hundred employees gathered in the CIA's main lobby despite his White House's tussles with the CIA and the agency's tradition of remaining distant from politics. He said he is confident a Hayden-led CIA can deliver."

The Washington Times (6/1, Curl, 90K) says the President "lavished praise on the general, who wore his blue Air Force uniform, four stars on each shoulder, for the ceremony." Said Bush, "Mike is a patriot; he's a reformer. He's one of our nation's finest intelligence professionals. I know firsthand how good this guy is. He brings more than two decades of experience in the intelligence field. He is going to be a superb leader for the dedicated men and women of the CIA." The Times adds, "For his part, Gen. Hayden told the president and the employees now working under him: 'I could not be more grateful.'" The New York Times (6/1, Mazzetti, 1.19M) calls Bush's remarks a "pep talk," noting he said, "I cannot do my job without the Central Intelligence Agency."

The Washington Post (6/1, A3, Pincus, 744K) reports on signs that "the CIA is not doing enough to keep its covert officers' identities secret, especially in the Internet age when so much personal information can be easily searched, said one congressional aide familiar with the Senate report." But "even more important than such security is recruiting the right person, said a former CIA station chief with experience in the Middle East." One official, "still working for the agency, recalled that Cuban intelligence quickly identified Spanish-speaking CIA officers who infiltrated that country because of their manner of speaking. … Even easier to identify were African Americans sent to African countries who could not hide their lack of knowledge of tribal dialects or history."

VA Data Loss Included Some Veterans' Phone Numbers, Addresses. The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 5, 0:25, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "That security breach in the Veterans Administration was even bigger than VA first let on. Computer files stolen from the home of a VA employee contained personal information on more than 26 million vets. Now, a VA memo obtained today by CBS News shows that in addition to social security numbers and birthdates, the files also contained some veterans' telephone numbers and addresses."

USA Today (6/1, Brook, 2.31M) says "one file containing more than 6,700 records pertaining to veterans exposed to mustard gas was lost, said the memo, which was written by a VA privacy officer." The VA "gave the memo to the House Veterans' Affairs Committee at the request of Rep. Bob Filner of California, the panel's acting ranking Democrat. USA TODAY obtained the memo from the committee. Privacy experts say the Social Security numbers could be used to open fraudulent credit cards or bank accounts."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (6/1, A7, Lee, 744K) reports the "sensitive personal information...that was stolen from…was stored in a format that could make it difficult for thieves to use, according to an internal VA memo." The format "'requires specialized application software and training' to write computer code 'to access and manipulate the data for use,' Whitney wrote in the memo, obtained yesterday by The Washington Post."

Paulson Nomination Wins Praise. The AP (6/1, Crutsinger) reports, "President Bush's selection of a savvy Wall Street veteran to be his third treasury secretary is winning widespread praise, but Democrats say it will take a change in policies -- not just personnel -- to deal with budget and trade deficits and other economic problems." Bush announced Tuesday that "he was turning to Henry Paulson, chairman and chief executive of Goldman Sachs, to become the administration's chief economic spokesman. By choosing a 32-year veteran of one of Wall Street's premier investment houses, Bush is hoping for the same economic credibility that Bill Clinton gained when he picked Robert Rubin, one of Paulson's predecessors at Goldman Sachs, as his treasury secretary."

Under the headline "2 New Captains Of The Economy Face Volatile Global Markets," the New York Times (6/1, Andrews, 1.19M) reports, "One reached the pinnacle of wealth and prestige as a dealmaker on Wall Street. The other was an academic superstar, brilliant but somewhat shy and more at ease in Bermuda shorts than suits." But "now they find themselves side by side in confronting a stiff new test: helping to guide the economy from a period of fast growth and cheap money through one of higher interest rates, jittery markets and a falling dollar." Paulson "is expected to arrive at his post at a time when global financial markets are suddenly more volatile and investors are more risk-averse than they have been in years." Ben S. Bernanke "has already endured a baptism of fire as the Fed has struggled over when to stop raising interest rates."

More Commentary On Paulson. Stephen Cecchetti, the Rosenberg professor of global finance at the International Business School, Brandeis University, writes in the Financial Times (6/1), "The announcement of Hank Paulson's nomination as US Treasury secretary is good news for everyone. In many ways he is the perfect complement to Ben Bernanke, the new Federal Reserve chairman. A giant among monetary policy thinkers is being joined by one of the most important financiers in the world. We now have the essential combination of a theorist working with a practitioner."

Lawrence Kudlow, host of CNBC's "Kudlow & Company," writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/1, 2.11M) that Paulson's appointment is "a bullish sign for the fate of the president's supply-side agenda as well as the U.S. dollar. … There's a change going on here, probably a big one. Under the new Josh Bolten-run White House, Mr. Paulson is essentially being appointed deputy president for economic policy -- a mandate not given to his two predecessors. This is a bigger shakeup than meets the eye."

David Wessel writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/1, Wessel, 2.11M) that Paulson is "expected to be the greenest Treasury secretary ever." He is "an environmentalist, not only in his private and charitable life, but as chief executive. Goldman Sachs Group has an eight-page 'environmental policy framework' that declares 'a healthy environment is necessary for the well being of society, our people and our business, and is the foundation for a sustainable and strong economy,' and the firm walks the talk. So will that make a difference at Treasury?"

Reid's Office Acknowledges He Misstated Ethics Rules. The Los Angeles Times/AP (6/1) reports Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's spokesman "acknowledged Wednesday night that Reid misstated the ethics rules governing his acceptance of free boxing tickets and has decided to refrain from taking such gifts." Spokesman Jim Manley said Sen. Reid "still believes it was "entirely permissible" for him to accept ringside seats for three professional boxing matches in 2004 and 2005 from the Nevada Athletic Commission but has decided to avoid doing so in the future, spokesman Jim Manley said." The announcement "came after the Associated Press presented Reid's office Wednesday with conclusions from ethics experts that the Senate leader misstated congressional ethics rules in trying to defend his actions."

House Republicans See Signs Of Political Revival While On Recess. The White House Bulletin/US News (5/31) reports House Republican members "campaigning back home during the Memorial Day recess are sensing a comeback for the GOP built on support for recent moves to extend tax cuts, the approval of a leaner than expected budget, tough immigration reforms, and the popularity of the Medicare drug benefit." A senior GOP leadership aide said, "We're feeling better. We got a couple of things under our belt, like the tax extension and the Medicare benefit, and it's starting to take hold." The Bulletin adds that while "no Republican official is willing to guarantee that the GOP will keep control of the House in the fall elections, leadership and House GOP conference officials say that there has been a recent up-tick in polling for the members, and the reaction back home to the talking points provided by the leaders is winning applause -- despite national media stories suggesting that the Democrats have the advantage going into the summer." Meanwhile, Republican political consultants "believe that the overwhelming voter sentiment is anti-incumbent more than anti-Republican, meaning that both parties will get hit in local races and provide a balance that would keep Republicans in charge of the House."

Democrats Said To Have Fear Of Winning Power. In a Newsweek Web-exclusive commentary (5/31), Michael Hirsh says, "At least the GOP is engaged in a war over real policy choices. It is an emotional debate, often a hysterical and ill-informed one, but it is a fight among adults who know what they believe in and who have the guts to battle for it. By contrast the Democrats, ostensibly the party poised to exploit this GOP civil war, don't seem to remember what it is like to behave as adults. They resemble nothing so much as ill-adjusted adolescents, afraid of their own shadows, much less the presidency. What are they afraid of? Themselves, essentially: their past, their own left, the populist rhetoric of their leaders (Nancy Pelosi, Harry Reid, Howard Dean, Al Gore), the left-wing loony stigma represented by 'Fahrenheit 9/11' filmmaker Michael Moore (every Dem's favorite bugaboo). Above all they fear seeming and looking soft. They are all afflicted with varying degrees of megalophobia, a fear of assuming power."

Broder Says Bush, GOP Scandal Woes Were Predicted. In his Washington Post column (6/1, A19), David Broder says that in its September 2004 issue, Washington Monthly "magazine invited 16 smart political observers -- a mix of Republicans, Democrats and independents -- to write short essays predicting what would happen if George Bush won a second term. The answers, understandably enough, were all over the lot. But no one suggested that one-third of the way through his second term Bush would have suffered the political and policy reverses that he has actually experienced." The one commentator "who got it exactly right was Kevin Drum, who runs the magazine's blog. 'What do we have to look forward to if George W. Bush is elected to a second term?' he asked. 'One word: scandal.'" While "history backed that forecast," Drum "found additional reasons that led him to conclude that Bush and the Republicans might be particularly susceptible," such as the GOP leadership's "ruthlessness and disregard for traditional political norms," a "culture of lax supervision of executive agencies by the Republican Congress encouraged misbehavior on Capitol Hill," and "the lack of major policy initiatives would leave a vacuum in the news that would make scandal look like the most prominent feature of the political landscape."

Snow-Thomas Face-Off On Zinsmeister Noted. The Washington Post (6/1, A17, 744K) runs a "Verbatim" column on White House spokesman Tony Snow's response to a question from Hearst Newspapers columnist Helen Thomas about Bush domestic policy aide Karl Zinsmeister. Asked why Bush picked "man who is so contemptible of the public servants in Washington to be his domestic adviser -- saying, 'People in Washington are morally repugnant, cheating, shifty human beings?' Why would he pick such a man to be a domestic adviser?" Snow largely avoided answering the question, responding with answers such as, "You meant contemptuous, as opposed to contemptible, I think."

Beinart Says Bush "Takes Truman's Name In Vain." Peter Beinart, editor at large of the New Republic, writes in the Washington Post (6/1, A19, 744K) that President Harry Truman is the "one Democrat Republicans love. … Last weekend President Bush devoted his West Point commencement address to an extended analogy between himself and the 33rd president, invoking Truman no fewer than 17 times." Truman "believed in fighting totalitarianism fiercely, but with more than just guns, and through international institutions that made U.S. power legitimate in the world. George W. Bush should remember that the next time he takes Truman's name in vain."

WSJournal Favors Sunsetting Some Programs. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/1, 2.11M) notes that a group of House Republicans led by Reps. Jeb Henserling and Mike Pence are pushing "new rules to sunset out-of-date federal programs. Under their proposal that has been promised a vote this summer, Congress would have to reauthorize agency budgets every five years, or they would die. The legislation would also create a sunset commission to recommend program terminations, and Congress would vote up or down on the package. … It will be instructive to see how many Democrats and Northeastern Republicans -- who like to pose as deficit hawks -- favor deficit reduction if that means sunsetting programs that have outlived their usefulness. Our guess is the number will be very close to zero -- which is the main reason Congress will spend $300 billion more than it raises in taxes this year."

Fed Considered Larger Rate Increase Last Month. USA Today (6/1, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) reports, "Facing both higher-than-expected inflation and the possibility of slower growth, Federal Reserve officials at a May 10 meeting were unsure how many more interest-rate increases, if any, will be needed, according to minutes released Wednesday. Underscoring the uncertainty, the central bank's Federal Open Market Committee debated a series of options at the meeting, from standing pat to raising the target for short-term rates by half a percentage point. The Fed ultimately voted unanimously to boost its target by a quarter-point to 5%." The Washington Post (6/1, D1, Henderson, 744K) notes "Fed officials also considered whether to bump the rate up by a half percentage point, to 5.25 percent." The Wall Street Journal (6/1, Ip, 2.11M) reports the story under the headline "Fed Grows Uncertain Over Rates As Inflation Concerns Multiply."

Engler Predicts Modest Manufacturing Growth This Year. The Christian Science Monitor (6/1, Cook, 61K) reports on a recent "Monitor Breakfast" with National Association of Manufacturers President John Engler. On the outlook for the US manufacturing sector, Engler said, "We are still the possessors of a substantial manufacturing sector. The demise of the manufacturing economy, the obituaries for that are a bit premature. 2005 was a record [year for] output in US manufacturing history, accomplished with fewer people, reflecting the incredible productivity that has been driving manufacturing. … It is a growth rate that makes us the envy of virtually all of old Europe. [The outlook is for] more modest growth this year than last, but still positive, with threats as a result of external factors [that are] hard for individual manufacturers to control."

Stocks Rise. The Wall Street Journal (6/1, Talley, 2.11M) reports the Dow Jones Industrial Average "rose 73.88 points, or 0.67%, to 11168.31, after losing 184.18 on Tuesday. For May, the Dow industrials lost 1.7%, the biggest monthly decline since June 2005 and first monthly drop so far this year." The Nasdaq Composite Index "gained 14.14, or 0.65%, to 2178.88. For the month, the Nasdaq fell 6.2%. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index added 10.25, or 0.81%, to 1270.09. For the month, the S&P 500 declined 3.1%."

Savings From Medicare Drug Cap Offset By Hospital Visits. Researchers say caps on Medicare drug benefits result in more patient visits to emergency rooms and hospitals thereby offsetting savings from lower spending on prescription drugs. The Wall Street Journal (6/1, Hechinger, 2.11M) reports, "The study, published Thursday in the New England Journal of Medicine, gives ammunition to critics of the new Medicare Part D prescription-drug benefit, which includes payment restrictions. Researchers at health-maintenance organization Kaiser Permanente in Oakland, Calif.; the University of California, San Francisco; and Harvard University examined the cost and clinical outcomes of 199,179 Kaiser beneficiaries in Northern California who were enrolled in a program called Medicare+ Choice in 2003. … The study compared 157,275 Kaiser beneficiaries with caps to 41,904 who had unlimited benefits because of supplemental coverage from their employers. The study, which received funding from federal agencies and the Alfred P. Sloan Foundation, found that a cap on drug benefits lowered pharmacy costs by 31%. But total medical costs, including drugs, were roughly the same."

Consumers Said To Be Paying Billions More To Compensate For Medicare, Medicaid Imbalances. Blue Cross officials and independent actuaries say Imbalances in the nation's health care system as a result of tight Medicare and Medicaid budgets are causing employers and consumers to billions of dollars more per year for medical care. The New York Times (6/1, Freudenheim, 1.19M), "A new study commissioned by Premera Blue Cross, based in Seattle, has found a rapid acceleration in higher costs to private payers in Washington State, for example, as hospitals and doctors grapple with constraints in the federal health insurance programs. The study found that in 2004, the most recent year for which full data are available, hospitals in Washington State charged an additional $738 million — or 14.3 percent of their revenue — to private payers to make up for Medicare and Medicaid underpayments. … Other research has come to similar conclusions across the country. Unpaid hospital bills, largely for the uninsured, are costing about $45 billion nationally a year and adding about 8.5 percent to the cost of health insurance for those who do pay, said Kenneth E. Thorpe, a health care economist at Emory University."

Glass Artists Face Off In Rare Courtroom Battle. The New York Times (6/1, Egan) reports, "As an ever-moving maestro in the world where fine art and commerce converge, Dale Chihuly is perhaps the world's most successful glass artist. … His clients include Bill Gates and Bill Clinton, and his elaborate installations of sea gardens and flower clusters show that mere sand transformed by fire can elevate a casino ceiling to the level of gallery spectacle. … But now Mr. Chihuly is in the midst of a hard-edged legal fight in federal court here over the distinctiveness of his creations and, more fundamentally, who owns artistic expression in the glass art world." The Times continues, "Mr. Chihuly has sued two glass blowers, including a longtime collaborator, for copyright infringement, accusing them of imitating his signature lopsided creations, and other designs inspired by the sea. … The glass blowers say that Mr. Chihuly is trying to control entire forms, shapes and colors and that his brand does not extend to ancient and evolving techniques derived from the natural world." The Times notes, "The suit, rare in art circles, offers a sometimes unflattering glimpse at how high-powered commercial artists like Mr. Chihuly work. The two glass blowers say that he has very little to do with much of the art, and that he sometimes buys objects and puts the Chihuly name on them, a contention that Mr. Chihuly strongly denies. … He acknowledges that he has not blown glass for 27 years, dating from a surfing accident that cost him the full range of shoulder motion, an injury that struck three years after he had lost sight in his left eye in a traffic accident. … Still, Mr. Chihuly said, he works with sketches, faxes and through exhortation. Nothing with his name on it ever came from anyone but himself, he said."

Bush Raises Funds For Ehrlich, Steele. The Washington Times (6/1, Dinan, 90K) reports President Bush "hopped over to Baltimore yesterday to raise money for the Maryland Republican Party, telling a high-paying crowd of several hundred to help re-elect Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. and also send Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele to the U.S. Senate, although the latter was conspicuously absent." Bush "stood on a stage in a ballroom at the BWI Marriott just feet away from Mr. Ehrlich, but the president also had brief kind words for Mr. Steele, the other major Republican statewide candidate on the ballot in November, even though Mr. Steele was not there." Some of the Republicans "in attendance last night said they were surprised by Mr. Steele's absence, but said there was no rift and he would benefit anyway from the event, which raised funds for Maryland Victory 2006, a get-out-the-vote operation that specifically targets state legislative races and Mr. Ehrlich's campaign, but which will benefit Mr. Steele as well." Early reports "had the event netting around $1 million."

The Washington Post (6/1, B5, Mosk, 744K) focuses on Steele's absence, reporting "only one of the state's two marquee Republican candidates joined him." Gov. Ehrlich "stood on a riser shoulder to shoulder with the president, but the party's leading candidate for an open U.S. Senate seat in Maryland, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, was absent." Democrats were "eager to promote Bush's appearance, figuring it wouldn't help Ehrlich politically," and "were quick to spotlight Steele's decision to miss the event." The AP (6/1) reports Steele was "notably absent."

New York Democrats Formally Tap Hillary Clinton For Senate Race. Sen. Hillary Clinton formally opened her race for reelection at a New York Democratic Party meeting amid widespread anticipation that her '06 campaign will be but a prelude to a presidential run in '08. But her early prominence in the upcoming Democratic primary contest has some worried that she would not be able to rally enough support among moderates and independents to win a general election.

ABC World News Tonight (5/31, story 6, 2:15, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, Sen. Clinton "seemed to be looking beyond."

Sen. Clinton: "We need a fundamentally new direction. Solutions that help us meet our 21st-century challenges of expanding our economy, defending our security and preserving our values." Tapper: "The presidential election is more than two years away. But Democrats are already buzzing about her prospects." While many Democrats "believe that Clinton will get her party's nomination, some are fearful that she cannot win the presidency. A new ABC News poll shows a daunting 42% of all Americans that say they will never vote for her. Some think she's too liberal. Others think she's untrustworthy. And that's a big concern for Democrats who want a candidate that can appeal to moderates and independents, in important states such as Ohio and Florida."

Fox News' Special Report (5/31, Hume) reported, "Delegates at New York state's Democratic convention today named Senator Hillary Clinton as their candidate for re-election. But the Senate race is overshadowed to some extent about speculation about whether and how she will seek her party's nomination for the White House in '08." Fox (Miller) added, "Although delegates and supporters cheered her nomination as a second term, some observers say she acted more like she was making a run for the White House. With her husband, the former President, in attendance, Mrs. Clinton brought the crowd to its feet. Not once did she mention potential Republican challengers." But she did take "a number of stabs at the Bush Administration."

The New York Times (6/1, Kornblut, 1.19M) reports Sen. Clinton "formally opened her Senate re-election campaign on Wednesday with a call to 'take our country back' from the current Republican leadership, cataloging what she called the Bush administration's failures in a marquee appearance at the state Democratic convention that signaled how she might approach a presidential campaign."

The AP (6/1, Humbert) reports Sen. Clinton "repeatedly bashed the Bush administration Wednesday as she told cheering Democrats that the country needs 'a fundamentally new direction.'" Former President Clinton "was in the audience but didn't speak. He got a standing ovation when the former first lady singled him out as 'an inspiration, a mentor, a partner.'"

The AFP (6/1) reports Clinton, "viewed by many as the Democrats' best prospect for reclaiming the White House in 2008, kicked off her campaign for a second term in the US Senate."

The Washington Times (6/1, Bellantoni, 90K) reports Clinton "officially started her re-election campaign yesterday, accepting the Democratic nomination for her New York seat with a promise of fighting for energy independence and fair wages while avoiding questions on her front-runner status if she chooses to seek the presidency in 2008." Clinton's "acceptance speech included hints of her higher ambitions, however, as the senator asked New Yorkers to 'stand with me' as she works to create well-paying jobs and to fund research for alternative energy."

The AP (6/1, Glover) reports New York Gov. George Pataki "strolled through a teeming farmers market in Iowa, chewing on a giant radish and pressing the flesh with a few thousand people he'd like to be his closest friends." Within the hour, Pataki had "donned dark robes and was delivering the commencement speech to medical graduates at Des Moines University, the multitasking required for a White House hopeful 19 months before Iowa caucus-goers vote." Pataki seems "like an unlikely sell in Iowa — a Northeast moderate who backs abortion and gay rights and gun control — but the three-term governor has focused on the handshaking-backslapping-local fundraising required to win over voters in a less populated, rural state."

Pataki Focuses On Retail Politics In Iowa Trip. The AP (6/1, Glover) reports New York Gov. Within the hour, Pataki had "donned dark robes and was delivering the commencement speech to medical graduates at Des Moines University, the multitasking required for a White House hopeful 19 months before Iowa caucus-goers vote." Dodd Sees Ability To Reach Across Aisle As Key Selling Point. In a Newsweek Web-exclusive commentary (5/31), Howard Fineman says, "Maybe Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut has no chance to win the presidency. Or maybe he does. In any case, the mere fact that he called me the other day to remind me that he is running tells me something: that most of the Democratic Party's savviest veterans -- elected officials in their Capitol Hill suites, Hollywood machers tooling along the Santa Monica Freeway in their Priuses, the New York soft-money crowd eating their egg-white omelets at the Regency in Manhattan -- are convinced that Hillary Can't Win." No one "doubts Hillary Clinton can win the nomination; not many think she can beat the GOP's candidate, especially if it is McCain." Dodd's "argument is that, in an uncertain world, and one divided by Red and Blue, voters are ready for someone who can make politics work by bridging gaps, talking turkey and doing deals."

Pennsylvania State Senate Candidate Says GOP Must Adhere To Its Principles. Mike Folmer, a Republican candidate for the Pennsylvania state Senate, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/1, 2.11M) that Pennsylvania's May 16 legislative primaries have been called "a 'political massacre,' an 'earthquake' and 'payback.'" Pundits, editorial writers and political analysts "are still trying to figure out what led to the defeat of 16 incumbent state legislators -- including Pennsylvania's top two state Senate Republicans -- at the hands of underfunded, and in several cases -- including mine -- unknown challengers." Folmer adds, "It was as if the Republican Party leadership in the state capitol had forgotten everything they'd been taught by Ronald Reagan -- that the core values of the Republican Party were lower taxes, less spending and limited government. Then came the notorious pay raise, and the camel's back was broken." Folmer concludes, "I have confidence that the Pennsylvania Republican Party can move forward victoriously not only this coming fall but in future elections. Yet in order to do so, it is imperative that we do not forget the principles that made the Republican Party great. In many ways, then, the Pennsylvania situation mirrors that of the country as a whole."

Perry Signs Texas Property Tax Cut. Texas Gov, Rick Perry has signed legislation to cut property taxes by nearly $16 billion over the next two years. The New York Times (6/1, Barnes, 1.19M) reports that the legislation also provides a $2,000 raise to public school teachers. The measure "was passed in a special session to bring the Texas public school system into compliance with a State Supreme Court order. The one-third reduction in property tax revenue would be offset by a new, higher levy on business, a $1 per-pack increase in cigarette taxes and a portion of the state's $8 billion treasury surplus."

In Reversal, US Offers To Participate In Direct Talks With Iran. In what's being depicted as a surprising policy-shift, the United States yesterday offered to join direct negotiations with Iran over its nuclear program -- under the conditions that Iran cease enriching uranium and permit greater access to United Nations nuclear inspectors. Iran's official news agency called the offer "propaganda." The story is generating extensive media coverage, leading all three networks last night. Reports generally describe the US "reversal" as the right move, and a very momentous one at that.

However, many are also portraying the Administration as acting under strong pressure. The Financial Times (6/1, Dinmore, Khalaf), for example, headlines its story "Bush Bows To Pressure And Offers Iran Talks," and the New York Times (6/1, Sanger, 1.19M), in an analysis piece titled "Bush's Realization On Iran: No Good Choice Left Except Talks," says Bush "reversed course on Wednesday because it was made clear to him -- by his allies, by the Russians, by the Chinese, and eventually by some of his advisers -- that he no longer had a choice." The Washington Post (6/1, Kessler, 744K), meanwhile, reports the move "underscores a central truth of diplomacy today: Nuclear weapons buy leverage." The story also calls the decision "the biggest foreign policy shift" of Bush's presidency.

ABC World News Tonight (5/31, lead story, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "It is a seismic change in US policy. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the US is now willing to join direct talks with Iran about its nuclear program, if Iran would suspend that program. It is a big if." ABC (Karl) added, "The Bush Administration is offering to talk to the Iranians, for the first time since Iranian radicals took Americans hostage more than a quarter century ago." President Bush: "I thought it was important for the United States to take the lead, along with our partners. And that's what you're seeing. You're seeing robust diplomacy." Karl: "It's a major policy shift," noting that Secretary of State Rice had previously said "we don't need to talk about it." The offer, said ABC, "won praise from Bush Administration critics who called it long overdue."

Knight Ridder (6/1, Strobel, Landay) reports the offer "is part of a package of proposals to Iran that Rice and her European, Russian and Chinese counterparts hope to finalize Thursday in Vienna, Austria." The Washington Times (6/1, Kralev, 90K) notes "the Bush administration ruled out establishing diplomatic relations with Iran at any time soon, saying the proposal was meant only to 'enhance' the prospect of peacefully resolving the nuclear dispute."

The AP (6/1, Gearan) reports "the overture to join stalled European talks came after mounting pressure on the US from European allies." The Los Angeles Times (61, Richter, Rubin, 958K) says "the White House has heard calls to negotiate from a wide variety of sources, including European officials. But some administration members, including Vice President Dick Cheney, have resisted, fearing that talks could only give the Iranian leadership more stature and more time to advance a weapons program."

The New York Times (6/1, Weisman, 1.19M) also reports, "Skepticism from Vice President Dick Cheney and others who have opposed concessions to Iran was overcome, the officials said, when it was realized that refusal to move toward the European view would mean that the administration would be blamed for failing to do its utmost to defuse the crisis, making it harder to rally world opinion against Iran."

The Chicago Tribune (6/1, Silva, 643K) refers to "a sharp change of course that reflects a more pragmatic approach," and the Wall Street Journal (6/1, Solomon, King, 2.11M) describes the move as an "abrupt shift" and "a nod to European allies' desire to offer carrots as well as sticks to steer Iran away from its efforts to produce weapons-grade uranium."

"Senior Administration Official" Calls Move Tactical, Not Strategic Change. CNN's The Situation Room (5/31, Quijano) reported a "senior administration official" said "a short time ago that in fact this does not represent in their view a strategic shift by the United States but rather a change in tactics. He says that President Bush did not in fact give the final go ahead for this decision until this morning. This is, though, something that the President and others have been working on for quite some time."

Rice Defends US Decision In TV Interviews. Rice granted a number of TV interviews yesterday to explain and defend the US policy change. On NBC Nightly News (5/31, lead story, 3:50, Gregory, 9.87M) Rice said, "What the Iranians are being offered is not concessions. They're being offered a set of incentives if they are prepared to do what the world needs them to do." Gregory: "Rice insisted Iran's intransigence is not paying off." Secretary Rice: "Iran is continuing its behavior at its own peril, because this process of moving Iran toward isolation has also been continuing." Gregory: "US officials and outside experts also see today's overture toward Iran as the best way to toughen the resolve of US allies and move them toward the Bush Administration position." On the CBS Evening News (5/31, lead story, 2:55, Axelrod, 7.66M) Rice was shown saying, "The reason that we're doing it is we want to know if negotiations are a real option; if Iran accepts the offer and suspends its enrichment activities, all the better. Now, if they don't then we have to be on another course."

Rice said on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (5/31) that it is "important that we know whether or not there is truly a negotiating option or not. It's time to give the Iranians a clear choice: If they're prepared to negotiate, then the world should be prepared to negotiate. We should be prepared to negotiate. But if they're not, then we need to get on with the kinds of penalties that can be brought through the Security Council so that we can bring enough pressure on the Iranian regime to make it make a different choice." Rice later noted, "The Iranians now have a choice. They can say that, yes, they're prepared to suspend and thereby get into negotiations, or they can say that they're not prepared to suspend" enrichment and related activities.

Rice said on MSNBC's Hardball (5/31) that the announcement "puts a kind of moment of truth if you will, a moment for decision for Iran before us. The Iranians have been -- want to say, 'Oh, we might be interested in negotiations on the Russian package. Oh, we might be interested in the European negotiations again.' But this is a clear choice for Iran."

Rice was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (5/31) if this announcement looks "like the United States is making concessions to what you would regard as a terrorist regime." Rice said, "The United States is supporting an international consensus that's been developing for the last year-and-a-half that Iran must not be allowed to get a nuclear weapon, that Iran has but one choice and that is to abandon its nuclear weapons ambitions, or it can face the path of isolation. That's what the United States is supporting here." Rice added, "The United States is holding to conditions that have been set for some time with Iran, conditions that we have been supporting in the negotiations with the European three, that Iran must first suspend verifiably and fully its enrichment activities."

Rice said on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (5/31), "The important thing to note this not just about the United States and Iran. This is about Iran and the entire international community. We have been successful in building a consensus around the view that Iran can't have a nuclear weapon, that they have to suspend the program and go back to negotiates and that if it is going to have a nuclear program has to have one without the proliferation risk of having the fuel cycle on Iranian territory. That is what is at stake for Iran is isolation."

Bolton Says US Will Not Compromise On Precondition That Iran Suspend Nuclear Program. US Ambassador to the UN John Bolton was asked on Fox News' Your World with Neil Cavuto (5/31) about Iran's claim that the US' demand that it agree to multilateral talks soon is nothing but a propaganda move. Bolton said, "I hope this is not a real reaction from Iran. I think it's important that they take a very careful look at what Secretary Rice laid out today, because it really is their last chance, in many respects. She is saying that we're prepared to sit down at the table with Iran if they fully suspend their uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities. So, that's a -- that's a major effort on our part to avoid this being a discussion about what's the United States doing wrong and get it back to the real point, which is what Iran is doing wrong." Asked how the US would react if Iran says it will not give up enrichment activity until talks start, Bolton said, "No, this is -- I think Secretary Rice was very clear on this today, that this is a precondition, on which we're not going to compromise. … If they're not willing to do that, the other alternative is clear, too, is that we will move for economic and political sanctions to make it clear to them what their choice is."

Allies Praise US Overture. CNN's The Situation Room (5/31, Blitzer) reported, "European allies are applauding President Bush's new overture toward Iran, and perhaps none more so than Britain's Tony Blair. A European diplomat tells our John King that getting the US. involved with talks with Iran was a top priority for Tony Blair during his meetings with the president last week. A US official says the administration had been moving toward that position for some time, but he doesn't dispute that Blair's influence helped sway the way with President Bush." USA Today (6/1, Slavin, 2.31M) reports France, Germany and Britain "welcomed the US offer."

On its front page, the Washington Post (6/1, A1, Fletcher, Kessler, 744K) reports, "Senior Chinese and Russian officials welcomed the U.S. offer of direct talks, saying it showed an increased willingness to pursue diplomatic means to resolve the budding nuclear crisis."

Oil Prices Decline On Report Of Diplomatic Outreach To Iran. The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 2, 0:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "News that the US is offering conditionally to talk with Iran sent oil prices lower today. They fell 74 cents to close at $71.29 a barrel." The Wall Street Journal (6/1, Farivar, 2.11M) says that "in the past, Iran has offered to suspend its controversial nuclear-enrichment program to find a way out of the crisis, and the surprise US diplomatic overture triggered a knee-jerk selloff in oil futures." USA Today (6/1, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) runs a similar report.

Hardliners In Iran Said To Face Dilemma. The Washington Times (6/1, Sands, 90K) reports, "Iranian hard-liners, led by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, faced a dilemma of their own after yesterday's announcement by the Bush administration that it was ready to join talks over Iran's suspected nuclear programs." The US policy shift "will be seen as a victory for the tough line of the government," said A. William Samii, an Iranian political analyst for Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, "but it's a tricky question of how best to respond."

Blackwill Says Military Option Should Not Be Discarded. Robert D. Blackwill, deputy national security adviser for strategic planning and presidential envoy to Iraq in 2003-2004, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/1, 2.11M), "The use of American military force against Iran's nuclear infrastructure would obviously carry great risk. But acquiescing in an Iranian nuclear weapons capability would be deeply dangerous for the US and likeminded democracies for decades to come. It would be regarded by the entire world, friend and foe alike, as a strategic defeat for the US, and produce a major shift toward Iran in the balance of power in the Greater Middle East. … Given the extraordinary stakes involved, ignoring the military option and hoping that we will somehow be rescued by sanctions, new negotiating mechanisms, or the Iranian mullahs is a serious mistake."

Opinion Pages Generally Supportive Of US Move. Under the headline "Rice Makes The Right Move On Iran," the Los Angeles Times (6/1, 958K) editorializes Bush "has made a u-turn -- and not a moment too soon." The Times goes on to call Rice's announcement "a courageous and historic about-face that offers hope of ending the hostility that has marked US relations with Iran since 1979. "

The Washington Post (6/1, 744K), under the headline "A Smart Approach To Iran," says in an editorial that the offer "was well tailored. By stating its readiness to join the European governments that have been negotiating with Tehran for several years, the administration may have defused an issue that was impeding its effort to win support for UN sanctions against Iran. … For now, the administration has rightly put the focus on forcing Tehran -- not Washington -- to make a choice."

The Wall Street Journal (6/1, 2.11M) editorializes that the US move is "a surprising policy reversal" adding that "in theory, Condi's gambit could help to expose Iran's real intentions should it refuse to negotiate seriously. In theory, too, a determined US could use the direct talks to insist that Tehran undertake a Libyan-like dismantling of its nuclear facilities, complete with random and intrusive inspections." But "yesterday's proposal demands nothing so comprehensive, and the potential sanctions supposedly on the table are still opposed by Russia and China. The ultimate sanction of military force isn't even hinted at, much less on the table. … If this gambit fails, she'll have succeeded mainly in giving the mullahs more time to become a terrorist nuclear power."

USA Today (6/1, 2.31M) editorializes, "The administration's policy turnaround is welcome and badly needed. The question is why it took so long."

David Brooks writes in the New York Times (6/1, 1.19M), "What Rice did was set off a chain of events that could lead to a UN resolution on Iranian sanctions as early as July. Diplomats, book your New York hotel rooms today." Brooks adds, "It's still hard to believe the international community can really get its act together. (Have the U.S. and the Russians and the Chinese really forged an agreement on sanctions, or just fudged their differences?) But this display of competence causes me to remember that over the past several weeks this administration has done a number of things well (the nominations of Michael Hayden and Henry Paulson, to name just two). Maybe there's life in this presidency yet."

Palestinian Rocket Hits Home In Israel. The New York Times (6/1, 1.19M) reports that a Palestinian rocket was fired into Sederot, a residential area in southern Israel that is often the target of Palestinian fire from the Gaza Strip, early Wednesday. According to the Times, "No one was hurt, but the rocket damaged the house." The Times adds, "Later Wednesday, the Israeli military fired artillery rounds into northern Gaza. No casualties were immediately reported."

Ricciardone Delivers Nuanced Message On Egyptian Democratization. The AFP (6/1) reports US Ambassador to Egypt Frank Ricciardone, in a speech to Cairo's AmCham, "urged Egypt to pursue 'bold' reforms, but insisted that Washington has no interest in drastic changes that could spark chaos. 'Contrary to folklore, we do not, we do not confuse change with chaos. We do support bold but well-managed, wisely-led, purposeful change.'" AFP continues, "The US ambassador described as 'very harsh' the five-year jail sentence of opposition leader Ayman Nur for fraud in what Egypt insists is a criminal not a political case. … 'I would have wished that it turned out differently.'"

Bush Offers To Help Catch Perpetrators Of Rwandan Genocide. During an Oval Office meting with Rwandan President Paul Kagame, President Bush called the 1994 genocide of a half-million people in Rwanda "one of the most significant tragedies in modern history." The AP (6/1) reports that Bush "said the United States would give any help the country wanted to track down those responsible who are still at large." In addition, Bush "pledged to help repay the country for troops that it has sent to deal with another genocide." He said "the money will come from a supplemental spending bill that is being considered by Congress that also includes funding for U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan and to aid Hurricane Katrina victims."

Darfur Rebel Group Refuses To Sign Peace Deal. The AP (6/1, Zerdin) reports that a Darfur rebel group yesterday rejected a peace deal aimed at ending the fighting in Sudan's western region. The African Union-drafted accord "was signed May 5 by the government and main Sudan Liberation Movement, but both a splinter group of the Liberation Movement and the Justice and Equality Movement have resisted international calls to accept the deal."

AFP (6/1, Westerhoff) reports that the deadline for holdout Darfur rebels to the peace deal "passed with no new signatories, AU officials said. … The holdout groups have refused to sign the accord aimed at ending three years of conflict in Darfur, which has left some 300,000 people dead and 2.4 million homeless."

Violence Erupts Again In East Timor. The AP (6/1, Deutsch) reports that youths wielding machetes battled in East Timor's capital yesterday. The AP adds, "After a lull in violence Tuesday, street fights broke out in several parts of the smoldering city Wednesday. Roaming bands of youths fired sling shots, threw rocks and hacked rivals with machetes."

AFP (6/1, Sands) reports, "East Timor's rebel leader rejected an agreement designed to end days of violence in the tiny nation that has forced tens of thousands to flee and demanded the sacking of the embattled prime minister. As gang violence and arson attacks again broke out across the capital Dili, Major Alfredo Reinado said Wednesday President Xanana Gusmao made a 'mistake' by assuming emergency powers but not sacking Prime Minister Mari Alkatiri."

US Signs Off On WTO Membership For Vietnam. The Washington Times (6/1, Sparshott, 90K) reports that the US has signed off on an agreement that will allow Vietnam to join the WTO. The pact "removes one of the last hurdles barring the communist nation from joining the world's capitalist club. … Congress still must vote on WTO membership for Vietnam. The Bush administration hopes that will happen this summer."

Morales Says US Trying To Kill Him. Bloomberg (6/1, Blount) reports, "Bolivian President Evo Morales said the U.S. organized teams to track down and kill him, according to a note published on the Bolivian presidential Web site." Morales "said he recently found out about the plots against him, the state newswire ABI said in the report on the presidential Web site. The allegations are unfounded, U.S. Embassy in La Paz said in a statement sent to journalists by E-mail. Calls to the Bolivian presidential palace requesting comment were not returned."

Chavez Expected To Ask OPEC To Cut Oil Production. The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 3, 2:50, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Iran and other OPEC members are gathering now in Venezuela, where President Hugo Chavez will try to persuade them to cut oil production to keep prices high." CBS (Regan) added Chavez "gets his best opportunity yet to challenge the US when he hosts the world's oil producers at an OPEC conference." John Kilduff, oil analyst, Fimat USA: "The rhetoric, I expect, to be flying out of President Chavez. He'll make the argument that the Western economies have grown to the place they are on the back of cheap oil and it's time for the oil-producing countries to get their just desserts." Regan: "And Venezuela could be in for a second helping. It's already home to the largest proven oil reserves in the Western Hemisphere, with nearly 80 billion barrels, and there's potential to pump even more, much more." Elio Ohep, "editor of the Petroleum World Website, says the recent run-up in oil prices makes the oil's in Venezuela's Orinoco region, once considered too expensive to extract because it's so heavy, so thick and so costly to refine, suddenly worthwhile." Tomorrow, Chavez "will push OPEC to set $50 a barrel as the new rock-bottom price and as Venezuela's energy minister told CBS News, it's not just OPEC that sets the price of oil, but world politics too."

Chavez Says Orinoco Belt Contains 235 Billion Barrels Of Recoverable Oil. The New York Times (6/1, Forero, 1.19M) reports that the Chevron Corporation "has spent about $1 billion" turning oil sludge, which was "once called liquid coal into oil, helping transform a swath of scrub grass into a great frontier for oil production. The region, the Orinoco Belt, is in fact so promising that President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela says it contains up to 235 billion barrels of recoverable oil; if true, the reserves would rival those of Saudi Arabia. … This great, largely untapped treasure is pitting a leftist government aiming to use oil revenue for social programs against multinational corporations like Chevron, which were invited here a decade ago to develop the Orinoco Belt, a 54-square-mile area some 120 miles south of here."

OPEC Considering Membership For Sudan, Angola. The Financial Times (6/1, Hoyos) reports that OPEC is considering expanding its membership for the first time in more than 30 years. Oil ministers "were awaiting the report of Nigeria, the group's current president, on invitations of membership to Sudan and Angola. The pair, who are observer members, are two of the world's fastest-growing oil producers. … Their membership would boost OPEC's share of world oil supply from 41 per cent to 43 per cent. But the move would be likely to anger the US and China as well as almost every big international oil company."

Lebanese Politicians Vow To Disarm Palestinian Militias. The New York Times (6/1, Fattah, 1.19M) reports, "Lebanese politicians have begun focusing attention on the Palestinian militias as a critical security issue and have vowed to disarm them. … The Palestinian militias that persist in Lebanon -- and run checkpoints like the one in Naameh -- are mostly rogue groups like Fatah Intifada and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command." Lebanese officials "note that in recent confrontations with the Lebanese Army, their ranks have swelled. The officials accuse Syria of resupplying them with weaponry."

Downfall Of South Korea's Liberal Leadership Seen As Likely In 2007. The Christian Science Monitor (6/1, Kirk, 61K) reports, "The perception of a central government unable to deal with economic problems and weak in the face of North Korean demands lies at the crux of a reaction that guaranteed conservative victories in two-thirds of the races for provincial governorships and mayors of major cities. For Korea, the reversion to conservatism portends the downfall of a decade of liberal leadership in the next presidential election in December 2007."

Indian Economy Grew 9.3% In First Quarter. The Wall Street Journal (6/1, Wonacott, Venkat, 2.11M) reports, India's economy grew 9.3% in the quarter ended March 31 from a year earlier, marking a broad display of momentum on par with China's red-hot growth. … India's solid recent economic performance has raised the prospect of two Asian giants expanding at double-digit rates, spinning off new jobs and buying more of what the world grows and produces."

Investigation Finds Abuse Of AIDS Funds In Uganda. The Christian Science Monitor (6/1, Scheier, 61K) reports on the investigation into the misuse of funds from the Global fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria in Uganda. According to the Monitor, "A government inquiry recently revealed that tens of millions of dollars of the country's Global Fund grants have gone missing, much of it plundered by high-ranking public officials. Through months of hearings, which began in September and concluded just a few weeks ago, a disgusted Ugandan public heard how monies meant for lifesaving AIDS drugs were spent on personal phone bills, lavish 'Christmas packages,' and fancy four-wheel drive vehicles." The scandal "highlights the corrosive nature of corruption in Africa and demonstrates the difficulties donors face in giving recipient governments the autonomy needed to spend aid money efficiently while also making sure the funds are used appropriately."

Death Toll In Indonesian Earthquake Rises To Over 6,200. ABC World News Tonight (5/31, story 8, :25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The numbers keep getting worse in Indonesia after Saturday's devastating earthquake. The latest, more than 6,200 people dead, 30,000 injured and nearly 650,000 homeless. That last number three times what was originally estimated. The United Nations says the crisis may be easing a bit now that aid workers from more than 20 countries have arrived."

Earthquake Devastated Cradle Of Javanese Art And Culture. The New York Times (6/1, Gelling, 1.19M) reports that the region affected by the Indonesian earthquake "is part of the ancient kingdom of Yogyakarta, the cradle of Javanese art and culture, making it one of the most popular tourist destinations in Indonesia. … In this region, thousands of shops make and sell handicrafts, traditional batik clothing, musical instruments and ceramic sculptures, many of them exported to the United States and Europe. … In the aftermath of the earthquake, many of these contemporary artists are mobilizing relief and offering their studios as temporary shelters. Others are trying to salvage mangled paintings from ruined workshops."

EU Warns Of Higher Risks Posed By Bird Flu. The Financial Times (6/1, Jack) reports, "Europe's disease control agency will on Thursday warn governments to accelerate their preparations for a flu pandemic in the face of an increased risk the bird flu virus could mutate into a form more dangerous to humans in the near future." In its latest public health risk report, the European Centre for Disease Prevention and Control (ECDC) will say there are "many good reasons...to continue and intensify" preparations, including "boosting cooperation among countries and between health, agriculture and other government departments within each nation." Chief of these reasons, the report says, "is the spread of the virus since January into a broad range of birds, including migratory species that travel widely."

Outbreaks May Be Unreported In China, Indonesia. The Wall Street Journal Online (6/1) reports in its daily bird flu column that "outbreaks of H5N1 may be underreported in Indonesia and China, and the virus could be more widespread in Africa than authorities know," said experts gathered at a UN-sponsored conference in Rome on the disease. "Poor monitoring and lack of compensation mechanisms that encourage farmers to report animal deaths" were cited as possible causes.

Iran's Bahai Minority Says Government Trying To Eradicate Them. The New York Times (6/1, Goodstein, 1.19M) reports, "Members of the Bahai religious minority in Iran said this week that the government had recently intensified a campaign of arrests, raids and propaganda that was aimed at eradicating their religion in Iran, the country of its birth." These developments "have alarmed human rights monitors at the United Nations, who say that since December, the government newspaper in Tehran has published more than 30 articles denigrating the

Bahai faith -- even accusing Bahais of sacrificing Muslim children on holy days."

Conservative Saudi Women Defend Traditional Islamic Values. The Washington Post (6/1, A12, Ambah, 744K) reports that a group of conservative Saudi women are "trying to redress what they view as an erosion of traditional values in the kingdom and a dangerous shift in the status of women." The changes that have riled these women "followed the intense scrutiny that Saudi Arabia received after the discovery that 15 of the 19 hijackers who carried out the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States were Saudis. The lack of personal liberties in the kingdom…was widely held to be an underlying part of the extremist ideology the attackers shared." The new atmosphere "has alarmed conservative women who are suspicious of US. interference and warn that changes in their status could destroy the country's Islamic framework."

Unrest In Paris Suburbs Sparks Fear Of Fall Riots' Return. The Washington Post (6/1, A12, Moore, 744K) reports that a second night of unrest in the Paris suburbs has sparked fears "of a return of the disturbances that inflamed 300 French towns and suburbs last fall. The violence of the last two nights…was sparked in part by mounting resentment toward the mayor of the northeastern Paris suburb of Montfermeil, who in recent weeks imposed a law prohibiting 15- to 18-year-olds from gathering in groups of more than three and requiring anyone under 16 to be accompanied by an adult on city streets after 8 p.m."

NYTimes Says Nations Watering Down AIDS Plan. An editorial in the New York Times (6/1, 1.19M) says that worldwide, the AIDS epidemic "seems to have more energy than efforts to fight it. This week, "United Nations members are meeting in a follow-up to the successful U.N. special session in 2001, which pushed the world to take AIDS more seriously. … The nations now are supposed to be reporting on whether their targets are being met, and devising a plan of action for the next few years. Instead, they are watering down the original plan. Ideologues, led by Washington, are taking out commitments to key programs, and wealthy nations worried about cost are replacing concrete goals with vague statements. AIDS groups fear the world is moving backward. … Apparently the Bush administration feels the need to make room for strategies that are not proven to work."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Umer Hayat Pleads Guilty To Lying To Customs Agents. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/1, Thompson) Umer Hayat "pleaded guilty Wednesday to a lesser charge rather than be retried on allegations that he lied to the FBI about his son's attendance at a terrorist training camp, according to court papers." Hayat, "an ice cream vendor, pleaded guilty to lying to customs agents about more than $28,000 he and family members were carrying on a trip to Pakistan three years ago," and prosecutors will recommend he be sentenced to time served and three years supervised release. US Attorney McGregor Scott said, "This outcome was not, of course, the one most desired by the government. However...our region is safer today than it was one year ago." The Lodi News-Sentinel (6/1, Bohm) adds that Hayat "remains on home detention and is scheduled to be sentenced Aug. 18. The actual sentence will be up to U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr., who could sentence Hayat to as much as five years in prison and a $250,000 fine." The "plea deal came five days shy of June 5, the one-year mark since the Hayats were arrested during a high-profile investigation involving dozens of FBI agents swarming through Lodi."

The New York Times (6/1, McKinley, 1.19M) reports that the plea "brings to a close a federal prosecution that raised questions about government interrogation techniques. Both Hayats had submitted confessions to investigators despite limited English, an element that some legal experts say could open their convictions to appeal. In a statement on Wednesday…seemed to strike a victorious note. 'After 9/11, the U.S. Justice Department's top priority is to detect, disrupt, and deter future acts of terrorism,' he said. 'This mission was accomplished.'" Under the headline "Terrorism-Related Charges Are Dropped," The Los Angeles Times (6/1, Tempest, Bailey, 958K) notes, "Six weeks ago, a hopelessly split jury failed to reach a verdict in his case," and Scott "said retrying a case that had resulted in a mistrial was too daunting." Defense lawyer Johnny Griffin "described the plea bargain as a victory for Umer Hayat, who he said had been unfairly branded as a terrorist." The Sacramento Bee (6/1, Walsh, 301K) also reports on Hayat's plea agreement.

Impact Of EU Court's Decision On Terrorist Watch Lists Examined. In a Financial Times op-ed (6/1), Brookings Institution fellow Richard Falkenrath says if a Dutch national "terrorist…arrives at Amsterdam's Schiphol Airport and buys a one-way ticket on the daily KLM flight to New York" traveling "under his real name" like "the September 11 2001 hijackers," and if "he travels under his real name. US authorities have uncovered his identity and placed him on the terrorist watch list. The question is: will he be caught and, if so, when? Currently, even if the US authorities had provided this terrorist's name to Dutch or European authorities, there is no watch-listing system in either jurisdiction that would have identified him as he purchased his international ticket or transited through Dutch immigration control. Moreover, because he is a Dutch national he would not have been required to apply for a visa to enter the US. So he would pass out of Europe undetected." The terrorist likely would "be identified once his flight had left European soil. Under a May 2004 agreement between the US and the European Commission, European airlines were allowed to transmit their passenger manifests to US authorities 15 minutes after take-off. Two days ago, the European Court of Justice annulled this agreement." US and European officials "are trying to figure out what to do now that the ECJ has scuttled their passenger-data agreement. The first thing they should do is study the ways in which new technologies and procedures can be used to achieve their basic security aims while minimising the impact on personal privacy."

WSJ Says EJC Ruling Unlikely To Jeopardize Overseas Air Travel. The Wall Street Journal (6/1, 2.11M) say in an editorial, "Despite some media hyperventilating, there's next-to-no chance Europe's airlines will stop transferring important passenger information to the U.S." In its ruling, the EJC "did not address the issue of privacy rights. Rather, it said the European Commission was wrong to have based the passenger-data deal on EU law regulating commercial activities. This was not a trade matter but one of public security, it said. The court gave the EU 90 days to find a solution, and until then the agreement with the U.S. remains in place."

Legal Challenges In Terrorism Prosecutions Examined. Voice of America (6/1, Malone) reports, "Al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui remains the only person convicted in connection with the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks. Others who allegedly planned the 9/11 attacks are being held by the U.S. abroad. But as of now, there are no plans to put them on trial." VOA continues, "Moussaoui was sentenced to life in prison after he pled guilty to conspiring with al-Qaida to fly planes into buildings. … But what about some of the alleged planners of the 9/11 attacks now in custody, like Khalid Sheikh Mohammed or Ramzi Binalshibh, who allegedly financed the 19 hijackers on September 11." VOA adds, "U.S. officials say that despite the lengthy and challenging prosecution of Zacarias Moussaoui, criminal prosecution remains an option. … 'The Moussaoui case, I think, demonstrates that we can be successful,' said Paul McNulty, the deputy U.S. attorney general. 'In our investigations, we will continue to use every tool and authority available to us to identify risks at the earliest stage possible. And in deciding whether to prosecute, we will not wait to see what becomes of risks.' … Legal experts and others wonder if the difficulties on display in the Moussaoui case are making it less likely that the government will want to try the alleged masterminds of the 9/11 attacks in open court. … Trying terrorist suspects in open court could be risky because the government might be forced to reveal some of its intelligence sources as it presents evidence. Prosecutors would also have to address whether torture was used to obtain confessions. … While it remains unclear what the United States will do with the alleged high profile al-Qaida members in custody, prosecutions of lower-level suspects continue. … Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty says since the 9/11 attacks, the Justice Department has secured 253 convictions against 435 defendants in terrorism-related cases. Many of those convictions, however, involved minor crimes and immigration violations not directly related to terrorist acts or plots."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

NYC, DC Officials Decry Cuts In DHS Anti-Terrorism Funding. DHS announced its Urban Areas Security Initiative grants for 2006 yesterday, cutting money for New York City and Washington DC while boosting funding for some Southern and Midwestern cities, including Omaha and Louisville, Kentucky. The Washington Post (6/1, A1, Eggen, Sheridan, 744K) in a front page article reports the agency "slashed anti-terrorism money" from "the two cities targeted on Sept. 11, 2001," prompting "outrage from lawmakers and local officials in both areas, who questioned the wisdom of cutting funds so deeply for cities widely recognized as prime terrorist targets. The decision came less than five months after Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff unveiled changes in the grants plan intended to focus funding on areas facing the gravest risk of attack." The Post adds that "department officials struggled yesterday to defend" the grants.

The New York Times (6/1, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "Homeland security officials said the grants were a result of a more sophisticated evaluation process, combined with a smaller overall allocation of money from Congress." Meanwhile, Rep. Peter T. King, who called the distribution of grants "a knife in the back to New York," said officials at DHS "who had briefed him about the grants made clear that they were unimpressed with the city's plan." The City's "emphasis on spending on recurring costs — like overtime — was cited as a factor in the relatively low rating the city's application received, one federal official said."

The Washington Times (6/1, Hudson, Doolittle, 90K) reports DC Mayor Anthony A. Williams called the allocation "very shortsighted," adding that he believed the National Capitol Region "could be attacked again at any time, and now is not the time to back off on our efforts." DHS spokeswoman Tracy Henke, asked by reporters "whether the risk is still higher in the Washington and New York areas," said, "There is risk throughout the nation."

King Calls DHS Spending Plan "Indefensible And Disgraceful." CNN's The Situation Room (5/31, Blitzer) reported, "Some political figures from New York and Washington right now are livid about the Homeland Security Department's new spending priorities. Officials say the two cities targeted in the 9/11 attacks are getting less money this year than in 2005. … New York Republican Congressman Peter King, the chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, is calling the new spending plan -- and I'm quoting now – 'absolutely indefensible and disgraceful.' He goes on to say, 'as far as I'm concerned, the Department of Homeland Security and the administration have declared war on New York.'"

Muslim-Americans Complain Of Increased Scrutiny While Traveling. The New York Times (6/1, MacFarquhar, 1.19M) reports, "Getting through United States airports and border crossings has grown more difficult for everyone since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11. But Muslim Americans say they are having a harder time than most, sometimes facing an intimidating maze of barriers, if not outright discrimination. Advocacy groups have taken to labeling their predicament 'traveling while Muslim,' and accuse the government of ignoring a serious erosion of civil rights." The American Civil Liberties Union plans to "go back to court to broaden a suit on behalf of Muslims and Arab-Americans who are demanding the United States government come up with a better system for screening travelers."

Air Marshal Who Intentionally Blew Cover Still Flying. USA Today (6/1, Frank, 2.31M) reports Spencer Pickard, the federal air marshal who "intentionally blew his cover to try to show that agency rules make the undercover officers easy to spot," said yesterday "that he flew, armed, three times last week. … Marshal service spokesman Dave Adams said Pickard 'is still an active air marshal, he's still on our books, and he's going to still be flying missions.'" USA Today adds that 'he and another spokesman for the service, Conan Bruce, declined to address why Pickard could still fly." Bruce, meanwhile said that policies cited in a 20/20 report featuring Pickard "'have either been changed or are going through changes'" under FAMS chief Dana Brown.

WPost Calls Democratic Proposal Requiring Cargo Container Inspections "A Terrible Idea." The Washington Post (6/1, A18, 744K) says in an editorial, "When a House committee voted this spring against an amendment that would have required all cargo containers bound for this country to be individually inspected in their ports of origin, Congress temporarily put to rest what could have been yet another hyped-up wave of politically motivated anxiety about American port security. Although the House later passed a bill that provides extra funding for nuclear screening and other measures, Democrats vowed to bring up the inspection issue again -- and ran advertisements around the country attacking Republicans who oppose it. Before the 'inspect every container' mantra becomes a national war cry, it's important to point out that this is a terrible idea."

NYTimes Says WTC Development Agency Should Take Control Of Memorial Foundation. The New York Times (6/1, 1.19M) says in an editorial, "Gretchen Dykstra's resignation last Friday as head of the World Trade Center Memorial Foundation took almost no one by surprise. Some of the blame for the foundation's problems will surely fall to Ms. Dykstra's account. But the real difficulty is structural. The foundation, which is private, was given a job it should never have had: To build the memorial. That made its real job — raising money for the memorial — harder than it should have been." The Times says the "vague relation between the Lower Manhattan Development Corporation and the Memorial Foundation should be clarified. The development agency, in partnership with the Port Authority, should take over the task of building the memorial."

Mayfield Fears Coastal Residents Not Prepared For Hurricane Season. In a report marking the start of hurricane season, USA Today (6/1, O'Driscoll, 2.31M) reports, "Max Mayfield, director of the National Hurricane Center in Miami, says people have to wake up. … State and local governments along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts are heeding the alarm of last year's record onslaught and forecasts of another worse-than-normal hurricane season this year," but "Mayfield says many people along the USA's hurricane coasts are not poised for the next tropical storm, let alone for a monster like 2005's Katrina." Mayfield cites a poll by the National Hurricane Survival Initiative found half of the 1,100 respondents "don't feel vulnerable to hurricanes, and three in five have no family disaster plan."

The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 13, 2:30, Cowan, 7.66M) profiled Mayfield, who is "to coastal residents, what Alan Greenspan was to Wall Street: When he talks, people listen." It "falls to him to warn the nation of potential natural disasters. Preparedness has become his passion. He travels the nation during the off season doing interviews, showing off the latest technology to kids, and hoping his newfound but unwanted celebrity status will help get the importance of planning for storms through people's heads." But his "message is falling on deaf ears. Thirteen percent of coastal residents say they still won't evacuate this year in the face of a hurricane and 60% admit they have no disaster plan."

National Hurricane Forecasters Predict Nine Hurricanes. The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 12, 0:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Tomorrow is June 1st, the official start of the hurricane season. And in their latest forecast, scientists at Colorado State University predict almost twice as many major storms as normal. Nine hurricanes are expected, five of those could be major, meaning a Category 3 or stronger. Forecasters say there's a strong chance the US East Coast or the Florida Peninsula will be hit."

Insurance Companies Cutting Back Coverage In Coastal Areas. ABC World News Tonight (5/31, story 10, 2:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that as the hurricane season begins, "it's likely to be an active one. The National Hurricane Center predicts there will be eight to ten full hurricanes. That's potential trouble for coastal residents in hurricane zones. But they already have insurance troubles long before the storms arrive." ABC (Kofman) added, "Two years, eight hurricanes, $72 billion in insurance claims. Now, as another hurricane season begins, the insurance industry is running for cover. In Florida, All-State is refusing to renew the policies of more than 200,000 customers. And the company is refusing to write new policies for homeowners in 14 Texas counties. Insurance anxiety has spread to the Northeast, where Metlife and All-State say they will not write new policies on Long Island, where there hasn't been a hurricane since Bob hit in 1991." Tom Gallagher, CFO, State of Florida: "When you have no insurance available, you can't get a mortgage, you have no real estate market. And we have tremendous economic problems in our state." Kofman: "Problems even for those who can still get insurance. Here in Florida, State Farm is asking regulators to approve premium increases of 59% for almost a million customers."

Advocate Says Policymakers Ignoring Loss Of Wetlands, Coastal Sprawl. Meanwhile, David Helvarg, president of the Blue Frontier Campaign, and author of "50 Ways to Save the Ocean," in an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (6/1, 958K) writes that despite predictions that this year's hurricane season "will be 'above normal,'" America's hurricane territory is still "stuck in the 1970s and 1980s, when a lull in storm activity aided and abetted unprecedented development along the Atlantic seaboard." Helvarg says "federal policymakers continue to ignore the causal factors that transform major storms into human catastrophes, such as the loss of protective wetlands and coastal sprawl. … Those who think they can rebuild in harm's way using the same assumptions that worked in the last century, or who believe they can manage nature by stockpiling generators and water bottles, are living a dangerous fantasy."

New Orleans Residents Doubt City Ready For Hurricane Season. NBC Nightly News (5/31, story 4, 3:20, Savidge, 9.87M) reported, "It doesn't matter who you talk to, whether it be Federal or local officials, they tell you the same story," that New Orleans "is ready" for the onset of hurricane season. But "talk to the people of New Orleans and many have serious doubts." There was a "partial collapse just this week of a 400-foot section of a hurricane protection levee. It was being repaired when the ground beneath simply gave way." Despite the "setback, the Army Corps of Engineers is confident New Orleans will have the same level of protection it had before Katrina. But for residents like David Lomax of Lakeview, the incident only adds new concerns over how well the Corps fixed 169 miles of failed levees, not to mention the 181 additional miles of potentially weakened levees the Corps didn't touch." Emergency responders "have their own worries. New Orleans has fewer police officers, hospital beds, and even weaker water pressure than a year ago. It's no wonder officials are adamant."

Isaacson Says Levees Will Be Sufficient To Protect City. NBC Nightly News (5/31, story 5, 2:40, Williams, 9.87M) interviewed former Time editor Walter Isaacson, who now serves as vice chairman of the Louisiana Recovery Authority. Asked if he was "convinced that what the Army Corps of Engineers has done" to repair the levee system "will be enough, sufficient to protect this place?" Isaacson said, "Absolutely. I think that the good, armored Category 3 levees means that people will be safe. There may be some damage and flooding in really big storms where some water gets in, but you're never going to see this type of devastation again."

Professor Says Rebuilding Near Beach After Katrina "Makes No Sense." Orrin H. Pilkey, the James B. Duke Professor of Earth Science emeritus at Duke University and a co-author of "The Corps and the Shore," in an op-ed in USA Today (6/1, 2.31M) writes that during a recent trip to the former site of his parents' house in Waveland, Mississippi, which had been flooded during Hurricane Camille in 1969, he "was impressed by the large number of volunteers still helping in the recovery effort" from Hurricane Katrina. Pilkey adds that he also noticed a "proliferation of 'For Sale' signs posted along the beach road" and "a new billboard…advertising a soon-to-be-built four-tower, 36-story beachfront condominium. … The incongruity between volunteers helping the people of Waveland and developers seeking to profit from reconstruction in an obviously dangerous zone couldn't be greater." Pilkey states, "It makes no sense to simply rebuild and even increase building density after Katrina" and, though it may be "difficult to accept, …reconstruction near the beach should be prohibited."

LATimes Says Fears Of Levee Failure Should Be Considered When Approving Development. The Los Angeles Times (6/1, 958K) editorializes that though some of the levees in California's Central Valley "are at risk almost every day," officials in the area "are doling out permits to develop what were once farms and open spaces. The urge to convert is driven not just by profit-seeking landowners but by cities and counties eager for property tax receipts. And it's abetted by flood-insurance rules that assume the levees offer more protection than they really do." Though the state Assembly rejected a bill by Dave Jones that "would hold cities and counties jointly liable with the state to the extent that, by approving a project on undeveloped land, they increase the property damage caused by a flood," the Times says "it should reverse course and approve the bill when it comes up for reconsideration today."

Passing Of Civic-Minded Bankers Said To Make Gulf Coast Rebuilding More Difficult. Otis White, a public policy consultant and columnist for Governing magazine, in the New York Times (6/1, White, 1.19M) writes that bankers like Donald E. Powell, who, before becoming President Bush's coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding, "wore every civic badge worth wearing" in Amarillo, Texas, "rarely lead cities…anymore, and their exit from the stage speaks to how communities have changed — and why it may be harder to mend them when disasters strike." White continues that "there are not many bankers left with the knowledge or authority to invest their banks' resources in bold rebuilding efforts. As the main federal contact for congressional, state, local and private leaders in supporting the recovery of the Gulf Coast, Mr. Powell must already be painfully aware of their passing."

Education Said To Have "Fallen By The Wayside" Among Some Hurricane Evacuees. The New York Times (6/1, Dewan, 1.19M) reports that for children at Renaissance Village, a FEMA trailer park in Baker, Louisiana, "this is their lost year." Children there "are not in school," and "health experts and advocates for evacuees say that Baker…is not unique. Throughout the areas where hurricane evacuees ended up, they say, are pockets where education has fallen by the wayside, raising the possibility that thousands of children could become permanent dropouts." Meanwhile, though "some children seem to have simply lost interest, others have found their enthusiasm thwarted. Chris Waller, a junior, said he was turned away by several area high schools that told him they were full."

Katrina Evacuee Makes National Spelling Bee Finals. ABC World News Tonight (5/31, story 11, Gibson, 8.78M) reported profiled National Spelling Bee finalist Hung Tran, who was "was just starting eighth grade in east New Orleans, when Hurricane Katrina hit." His home was destroyed. His family moved in with relatives in Greenbelt, Maryland." It "came as a big surprise when Hung spelled up a storm in the school bee -- and went on to beat everyone. … They didn't even have spelling bees at his old New Orleans school. In Maryland, he went on to conquer the county bee."

WAR NEWS:

Bush "Troubled" By Reports Of Haditha Killings, Promises Justice. President Bush yesterday spoke for the first time on the allegations that US Marines killed 24 Iraqi civilians in Haditha. The story was covered by all three networks, each of which ran the President's remarks. Likewise, virtually all print stories on the matter are also built around Bush's statement that he is "troubled" by the allegations.

NBC Nightly News (5/31, story 2, 2:15, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "The gravity of the allegations that a handful of Marines may have deliberately killed two dozen innocent Iraqi civilians, including women and children, weighs heavily now on the White House. President Bush said today he's troubled by the reports and promised justice." President Bush: "If in fact the, you know, laws were broken there will be, there will be punishment." The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 6, 2:15, Martin, 7.66M) said "the President made his first public comment on the case" and showed the same comments by the President. ABC World News Tonight (5/31, story 3, :30, Gibson, 8.78M) showed Bush sating, "I am troubled by the initial news stories. I'm mindful that there is a thorough investigation going on."

The New York Times (6/1, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports Bush also "said he had spoken with Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, about the killings last November in the Iraqi town of Haditha, 150 miles northwest of Baghdad. … 'I've talked to General Pete Pace about the subject, who is a proud marine, and nobody is more concerned about these allegations than the Marine Corps.'" USA Today/AP (6/1), in a brief report, also runs Bush's statement that he's "troubled" by the stories.

The AP (6/1, Pickler) reports White House spokesman Tony Snow "urged patience as the Marines conduct what he called a vigorous investigation. He said a report will come out in 'a matter of weeks, not a matter of months' and include public release of photographic evidence. 'We're going to see everything,' Snow said." The AP adds, "Once that investigation is completed, a senior Marine commander in Iraq will decide whether to press charges of murder or other violations of the Uniform Code of Military Justice."

Rice Says Allegations, If True, Are "Terrible Stain" For US. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (5/31) how the Haditha incident will impact the US' image in the Arab world. Rice said, "First, we're all just worried because it's a deeply troubling report. Whatever the impact, it's a deeply troubling report that something like this might have happened. There is going to be a full investigation of it. If the charges are proved, people will be punished. That's the way democracies react to circumstances like this. But clearly, no one would want to countenance anything of the kind that is being said to have happened at Haditha. That's our first concern. And of course, it would be a terrible stain for the United States, were something like that to have been demonstrated. But our principle concern right now is to get to the truth."

Military Probe To Conclude Officers Lied To Superiors. The Washington Post (6/1, A1, Ricks, 744K) reports, "The US military investigation of how Marine commanders handled the reporting of events last November in the Iraqi town of Haditha, where troops allegedly killed 24 Iraqi civilians, will conclude that some officers gave false information to their superiors, who then failed to adequately scrutinize reports that should have caught their attention, an Army official said yesterday." The probe is being led by Army Maj. Gen. Eldon Bargewell. The Bargewell investigation "is likely to be explosive on Capitol Hill, because it focuses on questions that have haunted the Bush administration and the US military since the scandal over abuse at Abu Ghraib prison emerged two years ago: How do US military leaders in Iraq react to allegations of wrongdoing by their troops? And is the military prepared to carry out the long and arduous process of putting down an insurgency as part of the first U.S. occupation of an Arab nation? One of Bargewell's conclusions is that the training of troops for Iraq has been flawed, the official said,."

The Washington Times (6/1, Curl, 90K) notes "a preliminary military inquiry found evidence that Marines killed two dozen Iraqi civilians in an unprovoked attack in November, contradicting the troops' account." In addition, "forensic evidence from those killed showed the victims had bullet wounds, despite the initial statements by Marines that the civilians were killed by a roadside bomb that also took the life of a soldier, a defense official said. 'The forensics painted a different story than what the Marines had said,' the official told the Associated Press."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/1, Sappenfield, 61K) reports that "experts dismiss the notion that the military system is any more corrupt or ineffective than its civilian counterpart." But "they acknowledge that it faces its own unique challenges -- from the culture of silence that can pervade the most tight-knit military units to the lack of any department 'district attorney' to follow up on leads. The concerns are longstanding, but with citizens getting a fuller picture of the mechanics of warfare -- both on the battlefield and off -- there is pressure to ensure that Americans have confidence in their military's means of justice." The Monitor adds, "To some, the whole process has been an example of the system working correctly. … Others, however, see the need for reform. There is no position in the Department of Defense akin to an attorney general -- someone whose job it is solely to follow up on credible allegations. Under the current system, investigations are convened by local commanders, who have many other duties -- and perhaps conflicts of interest."

Pentagon To Require All US Soldiers In Iraq To Undergo "Values Training." ABC World News Tonight (5/31, story 4, :30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "ABC's chief White House correspondent, Martha Raddatz, reports that as a result of the Haditha deaths, the commander of US forces in Iraq will issue an order tomorrow, requiring that all 130,000 US troops in Iraq, to receive core values training. Training that will highlight the importance of adhering to legal, moral and ethical standards on the battle battlefield. It will also include instructions on the cultural expectations of Iraqis, and on the consequences of improper military conduct."

Haditha Survivors "Sinking Into Depression." The Los Angeles Times (6/1, Stack, Salman, 958K) says that in Iraq, "word of the deaths has spread slowly out of Haditha these last months, blurring into the steady background noise of daily horrors. To a public that's endured more than three years of combat, rampant bombings and executions, news of two dozen more lost lives grabbed few headlines." The Times adds, "Since that November day, the people of Haditha have been haunted. The survivors described sinking into depression. Much of the talk in town has centered on the US offer of $2,500 in compensation for each death. Some of the families say they turned down the money. In March, the townspeople said, American investigators arrived. They brought cameras to record the witnesses, and toys for the surviving children."

US Soldiers Apparently Kill Pregnant Woman. NBC Nightly News (5/31, story 3, 2:10, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "In Samarra yesterday, US soldiers apparently shot and killed a pregnant woman and her cousin. They were in a car speeding to a maternity hospital on a road closed by the military. A military spokesman said the car failed to stop despite warnings." The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 7, 0:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) said "doctors tried to save the baby but failed. The US military calls the deaths regrettable."

ABC World News Tonight (5/31, story 5, 2:10, Brown, 8.78M) reported, "Their car entered what the US military called a clearly marked, prohibited area near a checkpoint and observation post manned by coalition forces. According to the military, the driver of the car ignored signals and commands to stop, so troops fired shots to disable the vehicle. One of the survivors of this incident says they were rushing the pregnant woman to the hospital because she was about to give birth. They didn't know the road was blocked, she said." The New York Times (6/1, Burns, 1.19M) noted the women "were among 54 new victims of the war reported by the Iraqi police and the American military command on Wednesday."

Iraqi Prime Minister Seeks To Assert Control Over Basra. NBC Nightly News (5/31, story 3, 2:10, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "Iraq's new prime minister was trying to unite this country so fractured by violence under a single command, his own. Iraq's Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki today tried to assert his new government's authority in Basra in the south. It's Iraq's second-largest city, rich in oil, but is largely controlled by Shiite militias. Police say 140 people have been killed here this month, most of them Sunnis. Maliki declared a 30-day state of emergency in Basra. It gives his security forces the power to impose curfews and make arrests without warrants. 'I will use an iron fist to strike the heads of the gangs that threaten security.' Talking tough as at least 80 Iraqis were killed over the past 48 hours, including 9 at a bakery bombed in Baghdad today."

The Washington Times/AP (6/1, Abdul-Zahra) reports the Prime Minister "declared a state of emergency yesterday in once peaceful and oil-rich Basra." It was "the only state of emergency in effect across Iraq, officials said. Other cities where violence is rampant, such as Baghdad and Ramadi, only have curfews."

The New York Times (6/1, Tavernise, Mizher, 1.19M) calls Basra "increasingly lawless," adding the city "has sunk into chaos. Shiite political parties and their militias are fighting to control the provincial government and the region's oil wealth, contributing to some of the worst rates of killing since the invasion, with 174 killings in the past two months -- double the amount from the previous two months, according to the Basra police."

The Washington Post (6/1, Hernandez, 744K) reports Reidar Visser, "an Iraq analyst with the Norwegian Institute of International Affairs who edits historiae.org, a Web site that focuses on Basra and southern Iraq, said he believed the recent surge in violence was partly the result of an intensifying battle between two Shiite parties: the Fadhila Party, a powerful local group that dominates the provincial council, and the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI, which controls the Interior Ministry in Baghdad and thus influences the local police force."

The New York Times (6/1, Burns, 1.19M) reports "American and Iraqi officials had hoped that the accession of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki...might be a watershed that would bring a cresting of the violence. If anything, the opposite appears to have occurred, with the new government facing intensified challenges on a broad front." Knight Ridder (6/1, Youssef) also says "Iraq's violence has intensified in recent weeks, despite the country's swelling security forces."

Khalilzad Says Next Three To Six Months Critical For Iraqi Government. USA Today (6/1, Slavin, 2.31M) reports US Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad said Wednesday that "Iraq's new government has three to six months to bring more stability to the country, or it could collapse." Khalilzad said, "Unless there is increased security … a lessening of and containing of sectarian violence, this government will face huge challenges that might pose a problem for the viability and success of the political process." He said Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "will name Interior and Defense ministers in 'the next three to four days.'"

Pentagon Report Paints "Bleak" Picture Of Situation In Iraq. CNN's The Situation Room (5/31, Roberts) reported, "This is the quarterly report that the Department of Defense provides to Congress. And three years after President Bush declared 'mission accomplished,' it contains some troubling revelations about what the future holds. The Pentagon report paints a bleak picture for the prospect of good news anytime soon in Iraq, stating in frank times that the strength of the insurgency will likely remain steady throughout 2006. Compare that with this rosy assessment exactly one year ago. … The contrast couldn't be sharper, but it's no surprise to military experts, who saw no reason for such sunny optimism."

Retired Marine Colonel Raps President For "Laundry List of Inaction" On Iraq. In a New York Times (6/1, 1.19M) op-ed, retired Marine colonel Thomas X. Hammes asks, "why is the administration taking so many actions that make holding the country together virtually impossible?" Hammes faults President Bush for diverting "nearly half the money allocated to reconstruction in Iraq to other needs, including security," deeply cutting "financing for democratization efforts, many of them undertaken by nongovernmental groups," and proposing cuts in "overall Army and Marine troop strength." Hammes writes that "the White House must commit to long timelines and to providing the money necessary for both the military and reconstruction efforts."

Casey Says Iran Increasing Support For Shiite Groups In Iraq. NBC Nightly News (5/31, story 3, 2:10, Engel, 9.87M) reported General George Casey offered "sharp criticism of Iran. In particular, he said that Iran since January stepped up its support for Shiite insurgent groups attacking coalition forces in Baghdad, Hilla, and Basra. He said not only does Iran supply these groups with the materials to make shaped charges that can tear through American armor but also experts on how to use them from their Iran's own secretive Al Quds Brigade and Hezbollah."

Battle Shakes Baghdad Neighborhood. The Washington Post (6/1, Knickmeyer, Al-Izzi, 744K) reports on civilians' fright during a battle in Baghdad's Adhamiyah neighborhood. The Post reports, "Insurgents, Shiite militias, Iraq's overwhelmingly Shiite police, the slightly more trusted army forces – all were said to be in the fight. Residents could not be sure, or tell how it started. In the fights that roil many of Baghdad's neighborhoods, with automatic-weapons fire heavy and explosions sounding, no one without a gun sticks his neck out to investigate." The Interior Ministry's official account said that "insurgents had attacked an army checkpoint" and soldiers then "chased them through the area." The Post reports that Iraqi soldiers and police burst into a school amid the fighting, yelled for the children to get down, and then rushed them out of the school in groups.

Injured CBS Correspondent Remains In Critical But Stable Condition. The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 8, 1:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "CBS News correspondent Kimberly Dozier, wounded in Iraq by a car bomb on Monday remains in critical but stable condition in the US military hospital in Landstuhl, Germany." CBS (MacVicar) added, "Well, doctors say she had a pretty good night last night. She remains in critical condition but she is stable. Her injuries are classified as very serious." She has "responded to her parents, she knows that her family, her boyfriend are here with her in Germany and, Russ, doctors say that is so important in helping her heal."

Bodies Of Slain CBS Employees En Route To London. The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 9, 0:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The same car bomb that wounded Kimberly killed CBS News cameraman Paul Douglas and sound man James Brolan, both British citizens. Today, their bodies were flown from Baghdad to Kuwait, where they were met by members of their families. They, along with friends from CBS, will accompany the caskets, draped in the Union Jack, home to London tomorrow."

US Acknowledges Soldiers Fired At Kabul Mob. The Washington Post (6/1, A12, Constable, 744K) reports, "US military officials acknowledged Wednesday that American troops had fired at an angry mob that surrounded the scene of a traffic accident in the Afghan capital Monday morning. Officials previously had said the troops fired only into the air." A US military spokesman, Col. Tom Collins, said, "Initial indications from our investigation are that coalition soldiers did in fact use their weapons in self-defense." Collins "said it appeared that gunfire had come from the crowd and that the troops had 'used their weapons to defend themselves.'"

The New York Times (6/1, Gall, Wafa, 1.19M) reports that Gen. Amanullah Gozar, the chief of the highway police in Kabul, who witnessed the vehicle crash that set off Monday's riots, said that "four people died of gunfire from the last vehicle in the convoy as the American forces extricated themselves from an increasingly hostile crowd." Gozar "dismissed rumors that had spread through the city that the American soldiers deliberately rammed vehicles, even including his own car. 'I can say clearly it was an accident,' he said." The Los Angeles Times (6/1, Watson, 958K) also reports the story.

Afghan Boy Recovering From Heart Surgery In US. The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 11, 0:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "A follow-up now on a story we reported two weeks ago about a young boy from Afghanistan brought to this country for life-saving heart surgery. He got out of the hospital today. Seven-year-old Mohammed Umer had a condition that restricted his blood circulation, turning his skin blue. Now he's looking and feeling a lot better. Mohammed should be able to return home in about a month."

NYTimes Says Afghanistan "Unraveling." In an editorial titled "Afghanistan, Unraveling," the New York Times (6/1, 1.19M) writes, "Something has gone alarmingly wrong in Afghanistan" and "[u]nless Washington starts correcting its mistakes, parts of Afghanistan could start tumbling back toward the kind of anarchic chaos that once made such areas an attractive sanctuary for international terrorists like Osama bin Laden." The Times writes that Washington needs to "fight a lot smarter. It should begin talks at once with Afghanistan's government to arrive at a mutually satisfactory agreement on basic ground rules governing American military personnel in their interactions with Afghan civilians. It should reinforce its anti-narcotics drive with development programs that allow farmers to find adequate replacement livelihoods in more constructive lines of work." The Times says Washington needs to re-enlist Afghans' "support by demonstrating that it cares not just about Afghanistan's strategic geography, but also about a decent future for its people."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Jury Convicts One, Acquits One In Enron Broadband Trial. The New York Times (6/1, Murphy) reports, "In the sixth day of deliberation, a federal jury convicted one of two former executives of Enron's Broadband unit yesterday in connection with a $111 million accounting fraud." The Times continues, "The executive, Kevin A. Howard, 43, the former chief financial officer, was found guilty of five counts of fraud, conspiracy and falsifying records. … A second executive, Michael W. Krautz, 37, a former accountant at Enron Broadband Services, was acquitted of the same charges." The Times adds, "The verdict brought to an end a trial that had been going on next door to that of the two former Enron chief executives, Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, who were found guilty last week of fraud and conspiracy. … Prosecutors accused Mr. Howard and Mr. Krautz of setting up sham deals to manufacture millions in earnings from a failed video-on-demand deal. The broadband unit dissolved when Enron declared bankruptcy in 2001. … A spokesman for the Department of Justice, Bryan Sierra, said, 'Juries obviously sometimes make the decision to acquit but we're obviously very pleased that they agreed with us on the guilt of Mr. Howard.'"

The Washington Post (6/1, D3, Hays) reports, "Howard and Krautz were accused of participating in a small piece of that fraud in a scheme to manufacture earnings for Enron's struggling broadband unit in late 2000. The deal involved selling an interest in future revenue of a video-on-demand venture that disintegrated a few months later. … Howard and Krautz were the first of five broadband executives to be retried in separate cases after the original trial of the entire group ended in a hung jury. Although Enron was primarily an energy trader, the broadband unit was created in 1998 during the dot-com boom."

The AP (6/1, Hays) reports, "The verdict came six days after another jury convicted Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former Enron Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling of fraud, conspiracy and other charges in one of the biggest business scandals in U.S. history. … Lay and Skilling were convicted of conspiring to run a massive fraud through repeated lies to investors and employees about Enron's financial strength. The company careened into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001." The AP adds, "The government contended that Howard and Krautz conspired to manufacture earnings for the failing broadband unit in late 2000 by selling an interest in future revenue of a video-on-demand venture that disintegrated a few months later. … The two men each testified - as they did in their first trial - that the deal was legitimate. The investors were not bought out and lost their money along with other creditors when Enron collapsed in late 2001. … The first broadband trial began in April 2005 and focused mostly on three other executives accused of overhyping capabilities of Enron's broadband network and operating software. After that case ended with a hung jury, the five defendants were split into three separate cases and re-indicted on fewer counts."

Federal Judge Dismisses Charges Against Former Gateway CEO. The Wall Street Journal (6/1, Scannell) reports, "A federal judge threw out civil-fraud charges against the former chief executive officer of Gateway Inc., dealing federal regulators an unusual loss." The Journal continues, "In a decision dated May 23 but made public Tuesday, Judge Roger Benitez of the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of California ruled that the Securities and Exchange Commission didn't offer sufficient evidence to support charges that former Gateway CEO Jeffrey Weitzen made material misstatements in a regulatory filing and subsequent news release for third-quarter 2000 earnings." The Journal adds, "In granting Mr. Weitzen's motion for summary judgment, the judge rejected the SEC's theory that Mr. Weitzen's 'substantial participation' and 'intricate involvement' in the formulation of the regulatory filing was enough to hold him liable for false statements even though Mr. Weitzen didn't sign the quarterly filing." The Journal notes, "In the opinion, the judge said the SEC relied solely upon Mr. Weitzen's signature on the management representation letter submitted to the company's auditor to prove his knowledge of a material false filing. 'A reasonable fact-finder could not find this to be substantial in relation to the preparation of the entire quarterly filing. The SEC therefore may not impute any alleged misstatements in the Q3 2000 10-Q to Weitzen,' the judge said."

SEC Settles Auction-Rate Bond Claims With 15 Banks. The Washington Post (6/1, D2, Bilodeau) reports, "Citigroup Inc., Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and 13 other banks agreed to pay a total of $13 million to settle claims that they favored some customers in the $200 billion market for auction-rate bonds." The Post continues, "The firms violated securities laws from January 2003 to June 2004 by allowing customers to change their orders in the supposedly blind auctions and by giving select clients an advantage when deciding how much to bid, the Securities and Exchange Commission said yesterday." The Post adds, "A two-year investigation of the securities, whose rates are reset periodically by auctions, found industry-wide violations, Linda Chatman Thomsen, the SEC's enforcement chief, said in a written statement. … The SEC asked the brokerages two years ago to provide reports 'detailing any potentially deceptive, dishonest or unfair practices,' according to a memo sent to members in May by the Bond Market Association, the Securities Industry Association and the American Bar Association. … Firms in the settlement today also include Bear Stearns Cos., Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., Merrill Lynch & Co., J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. and Morgan Stanley & Co."

Waiver Controversy Highlighted By Milberg Weiss Prosecution. The National Law Journal (6/1, Jones) reports, "As the government's demands for waiver of privilege in white-collar prosecutions have sparked the ire of attorneys worried about the sanctity of client communications, the waiver issue in the Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman case is presenting an especially prickly problem." The Journal continues, "The recent announcement that a grand jury had indicted the securities class action giant and two of its partners was a triumph for prosecutors in the ongoing investigation. The government alleges that the firm paid clients more than $11 million in kickbacks to serve as plaintiffs in as many as 150 class action and derivative lawsuits. … But Milberg Weiss' case, while in some ways typical of recent corporate corruption prosecutions, also involves a key distinction -- because it is a law firm -- which some experts say makes the potential infringement on attorney-client communications all the more grave. … 'The privilege issues are much more complicated, much more expansive,' said Jonathan Polkes, a former federal prosecutor who practices white-collar defense at New York's Weil, Gotshal & Manges. 'You're talking about a defendant that lives and dies by privilege.'" The Journal notes, "The issue of waiver in what have become run-of-the-mill prosecutions against corporations has raised the hackles of both defense and plaintiffs attorneys. In April, American Bar Association President Michael Greco issued a statement saying that the attorney-client privilege was 'under attack' by prosecutors coercing corporations to waive their protections to qualify for leniency by the government. … In addition, a bipartisan group of lawmakers is considering asking the U.S. Department of Justice to change its policy of demanding waivers as evidence of defendants' cooperation. … After U.S. Attorney Debra Wong Yang in the Central District of California announced an indictment on May 18 against Milberg Weiss, the law firm in its own statement asserted that prosecutors had demanded access to communications with its counsel, Zuckerman Spaeder of Washington, in exchange for deferred prosecution. Milberg Weiss' refusal to grant access to that communication led to its indictment, the firm said."

Fannie Mae Executives To Testify Before Senate Panel. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (5/31, 2.11M) reported that the Senate Banking Committee has called Fannie Mae CEO

Daniel Mudd, and former chief Franklin Raines "to testify as early as next week on federal regulators' allegations that the giant mortgage company engaged in fraudulent accounting. Also being asked to discuss their investigations are James Lockhart, acting director of Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, Fannie's main regulator, and Christopher Cox, chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission. After Ofheo's report was released last week, Lockhart said he has directed Fannie's board to grab back any unjustified compensation paid to senior executives as a result of accounting misdeeds." Committee Chairman Richard Shelby "is planning a wide-ranging hearing, including probing whether Mudd is the right person to lead the mortgage giant."

Executive Pay Often Exceeds Amounts Allowed Under Performance Targets. The New York Times (6/1, Morgenson, 1.19M) reports that as "executive pay packages have rocketed in recent years," investors "who plow through company filings often find that executive compensation exceeds the amounts allowed under the performance targets set by the directors. Executives of companies as varied as Halliburton, the military contractor and oil services concern; Assurant, an insurance company; and Big Lots, a discount retailer, all received bonuses and other pay outside the performance parameters set by the boards of those companies. It is the equivalent of moving the goalposts to shorten the field, compensation experts say."

CBC Backs Jefferson Bid To Retain Ways And Means Seat. The Washington Times (6/1, DeBose, 90K) reports Rep. William J. Jefferson "has been asked by the House Democratic leader to step down from the Ways and Means Committee owing to the lingering FBI bribery investigation, but the Louisiana Democrat has refused and won the support of the Congressional Black Caucus (CBC)." In a statement, the CBC said, "Mr. Jefferson has not been charged with anything, so to forcibly remove him from a seat on the Ways and Means Committee would be unprecedented."

More Commentary. In an op-ed in the Baltimore Sun (6/1), Steven P. Grossman, a former New York City prosecutor who is now the Dean Julius Isaacson professor at the University of Baltimore School of Law, writes, "In a rare demonstration of bipartisan cooperation, House Speaker Dennis Hastert and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi together criticized the FBI's search of the office of Rep. William J. Jefferson, the Louisiana Democrat who is under investigation in connection with the alleged acceptance of bribes. … How heartwarming it is that two people who seem to agree on little that can benefit the country have come together to defend the right of their colleagues to have some sort of special immunity from search warrants issued to uncover crimes committed by legislators. They said the investigators, like the investigated, are not above the law. A noble thought, but one that needs to be examined." Grossman continues, "The Justice Department did obtain a search warrant to authorize the search of Mr. Jefferson's office. In other words, investigators prepared a sworn statement that demonstrated to a judge that there was probable cause, meaning it was more likely than not that there was evidence of a crime to be found in the congressman's office. … The role of the courts in the warrant process cannot be overstated. The framers of our Constitution wrote the Fourth Amendment to protect us from illegal searches and seizures." Grossman adds, "Some critics of the search have legitimate concerns about the separation of powers between government branches and particularly express concern that such searches can be too political and too broad and can uncover documents not connected with the investigation and which the proper workings of government require to be kept private. … That is why we have courts and why the framers imposed requirements not just to authorize a search but also to ensure that the search is limited in scope and duration. The courts for years have limited searches in this way. … Despite Fourth Amendment protections, abuses can occur in obtaining and executing a search warrant for a legislator's office. But such abuses can and do occur every day when search warrants are used in criminal investigations. Such abuses tell us that we must be more vigilant than we have been in avoiding these abuses. They do not, however, tell us we should stop searching."

New Orleans Reporter Calls FBI Search "Overkill." Under the headline "Office Raid Looking A Lot Like Overkill," staff writer James Gill says in The New Orleans Times-Picayune (6/1, 257K), "The question is on everyone's lips, but New Orleans criminal defense lawyer Pat Fanning asks it with rare eloquence. … Quoting from his e-mail here, 'If they really do have video and audio tapes of the cash transaction, 90 large in the freezer, two rat flips dying to throw up all over poor Billy Boy, a good-looking, kajillionaire do-gooder for a victim, numerous other tapes and documents etc., etc. then what in the hell could be so damned important in Dollar Bill's office that they couldn't live without it?' The feds aren't saying. Although they released the affidavit that secured the warrant to search the Capitol Hill office of Rep. William Jefferson…the section listing the evidence they sought was blacked out. Putting the affidavit in the public record before Jefferson has even been charged with a crime was an unusual move, but then this was a historic moment, the first time the G-men ever barged into the Rayburn Building."

Ohio Coin Dealer Pleads Guilty To Federal Campaign Law Violations. The Columbus Dispatch (6/1, Niquette) reports, "Indicted coin dealer Thomas W. Noe pleaded guilty today to illegally using friends and associates to funnel $45,400 to President Bush's re-election campaign." The Dispatch continues, "Noe changed his previous not-guilty pleas to three federal charges to 'guilty' during a hearing before U.S. District Judge David A. Katz. … Katz delayed sentencing Noe until after a presentence report is completed, but authorities said that advisory guideline call for two to two-and-a-half years in prison plus possible fines." The Dispatch adds, "Noe had faced up to 15 years in prison and fines up to $950,000 if convicted on all counts but can receive a reduced sentence for admitting responsibility. Federal prosecutors said they also plan to seek additional penalties for the loss of public confidence in the presidential election process."

The Toledo Blade (OH) (6/1, Wilkinson, Eder) reports that "in a brief, 10-second statement, Noe said he voluntarily agreed to change his plea 'to accept responsibility to spare my family and friends the further embarassment of any additional court proceeding. Therefore, I plead guilty.' … No date was set for sentencing pending a pre-sentencing report to the judge. Noe, who lives in Florida, remains free on $350,000 bond." The Blade adds, "With the admission, Noe faces a maximum of five years in prison on each count, but likely faces 24-30 months in prison. He also faces a potential fine of nearly $1 million, and possibly probation. … John Pearson, an assistant U.S. Attorney in the public integrity section of the Justice Department, said he would seek an even harsher penalty for Noe because of the 'potential loss of public faith in the presidential race.'"

The AP (6/1, Welsh-Huggins) reports, "The investment scandal has been a major embarrassment for Ohio's ruling Republicans and has given Democrats a better shot this year at winning state offices, including the governor's office that the GOP has held since 1991. … Once a powerful political figure who raised hefty sums for a slew of Republicans, Noe admitted arranging a contribution scheme to fulfill his promise to generate $50,000 for a Bush fundraiser." The AP adds, "Noe's attorney argued his client's access to lawyers before that trial is crucial. Prosecutors told U.S. District Judge David Katz the upcoming trial was no reason to delay Noe's sentencing on the federal conviction. … 'The fact he has other state charges does not mean he should receive special treatment for better or for worse,' said John Pearson, an attorney with the U.S. Justice Department's public integrity unit. … Katz said he'll decide after reviewing court officials' sentencing report."

FBI Arrests Pennsylvania Computer Workers For Erasing Fumo Emails. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/1, Dale) reports, "The FBI arrested two men who did computer work for a powerful state senator Wednesday on charges that they permanently deleted e-mails to thwart a federal investigation. Leonard P. Luchko and Mark Eister performed electronic 'wipes' of computers at Sen. Vincent J. Fumo's Senate offices, his home at the New Jersey shore and at a nonprofit with deep ties to Fumo, the FBI alleged in an affidavit. … The document does not name Fumo and he has not been charged," but US Attorney Patrick Meehan "said the probe is not over. The affidavit refers to an unidentified senator who clearly is Fumo." The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/1, McCoy, Lounsberry, Cattabiani, 423K) notes, "The arrests, the first in the three-year investigation, were seen as a hardball move by federal prosecutors: an attempt to squeeze the computer technicians into striking deals and testifying against Fumo. … Fumo's attorney said the two technicians were 'unfortunate victims' of a campaign to bring down the powerful Philadelphia Democrat." The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/1, Cattabiani, 423K) adds, "As FBI agents dug deeper into Vince Fumo's world, the powerful state senator appeared to be feeling the pressure. … Chock full of anxious e-mails and gritty politics, the FBI affidavit detailing the federal investigation into Fumo gives a previously unseen glimpse into the inner workings of the senator's office, staffed by a loyal and tight-lipped community that lived in fear of the lawmaker, as he lived in fear of prosecutors."

The Philadelphia Daily News (6/1, Hinkelman) reports, "James Schwartzman, an attorney for Luchko, said Luchko intends to fight the charges. Asked if he thought the feds were trying to get his client to cooperate with their investigation of Fumo, Schwartzman said: 'I would say that's probably a good guess.' Eister's attorney, Brian McMonagle, said his client would be 'going to trial and hopes he can meet a fair-minded jury that can tell the difference between a guy doing his job and a criminal conspirator.'" The Philadelphia Daily News (6/1, Davies) notes, "There are numerous references to Fumo in the charges" against Luchko and Eister. "'The FBI probe into the Senator has really set him off, he wants us to do a number of security checks...' Luchko wrote in a January 2004 e-mail. 'Boss is driving us ALL nuts with this FBI madness,' he wrote at another point." The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (6/1, Gazarik) adds, "An unidentified grand jury witness, testifying under grant of immunity, said Fumo's aides discussed destroying communications in case the FBI seized computer hard drives. According to the indictment, Fumo feared 'the FBI was going to show up' one day. Agents seized computers from Fumo's Philadelphia and Harrisburg offices in 2004."

relationship with the lobbyist Jack Abramoff, including information about a weeklong golf excursion to Scotland and England." Each of "the three prosecution witnesses said they would have wanted to know from Safavian that at the time of the trip Mr. Abramoff was interested in two pieces of property controlled by the services administration."

Government Executive (6/1, Mandel) reports, "A General Services Administration ethics official and the agency's former general counsel testified Wednesday in the trial of David Safavian, former Office of Management and Budget procurement policy chief, as the government neared the end of presenting its case on his involvement with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff." GE continues, "Eugenia Ellison, a lawyer who administers GSA's ethics program, testified that she handled then-chief of staff Safavian's request for an ethics opinion in order to join Abramoff and others on a golfing trip to Scotland in 2002. Safavian is charged with lying in the information submitted for that clearance, and with obstructing two later investigations into the matter." GE adds, "Ellison described how she had reached the decision to clear Safavian's participation based on his description of the outing hosted by Abramoff, a friend and former colleague, as a four-day golfing expedition in which Safavian would pay all costs associated with meals, hotels and greens fees. Airfare, Safavian indicated, was being provided by Abramoff on a private jet, and none of the eight people on the trip would be contributing to cover that cost. … Safavian also indicated that Abramoff had no business before GSA. … Ellison said she approved the gift of airfare for the trip because Abramoff was an old friend of Safavian's and because of Safavian's attestation that the lobbyist worked only on Capitol Hill, which together meant that Abramoff was not a 'prohibited source' according to federal regulations. … In a barrage of questions from Justice Department lawyer Nathaniel Edmonds, Ellison indicated she had been unaware that Abramoff was at the time seeking to lease GSA-controlled land in White Oak, Md., for a school he had founded, that he had expressed interest in the GSA-controlled Old Post Office Pavilion in downtown Washington, D.C., and that he had sought to influence GSA policy regarding the consideration of Indian tribes under a classification of disadvantaged businesses."

Emphasis On Golf Outing Details Seen As Stalling Prosecution Case. The Washington Post (6/1, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports the "way things are going at the David Safavian trial this week, don't be surprised if, in the coming days, a golf cart bursts into Courtroom 29A of the federal courthouse and a pair of Scotsmen ask if they can play through." Safavian "is on trial for accepting favors from Abramoff while helping the lobbyist penetrate the General Services Administration -- and then lying about it to investigators. But the case is as much about well-tended greens as ill-gotten green: the twosome's obsessive golfing friendship, particularly a lavish golfing trip to Scotland's St. Andrews in 2002 on Abramoff's tab." The "endless talk about faraway fairways seems to have teed off the jurors. Yesterday, the judge dismissed juror No. 13, who was a no-show. Juror No. 3 was losing a battle with sleep. But the lawyers pressed on, quizzing GSA official Eugenia Ellison for hours about the ethics of the Scotland golf trip."

Opening Arguments Made At First Tennessee Waltz Trial. The Tennessean (6/1, de la Cruz) reports the trial of Tennessee Waltz defendant Roscoe Dixon began yesterday. "In his opening statement, Dixon's attorney Coleman Garrett said the proof will show Dixon was entrapped by the government. … In creating the fake company E-Cycle, which was run by undercover FBI agents, the government in turn created the conspiracy, Garrett said." But prosecutors said that "Dixon and alleged 'bagman' Barry Myers…figured they could pull off extorting money from E-Cycle in part because of its wealth, 'but they were really certain they could pull it off because they had done it before,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Tim DiScenza said. The two men had previously demanded and received payment from government informant Tim Willis for a legitimate company he worked for, called Children's Dental Clinic, to be credentialed into TennCare, DiScenza said." The Memphis Commercial Appeal (6/1, Buser) adds, "Garrett called the FBI informants, including…Willis, 'a pack of con men.'" But "prosecutors played audio and video recordings made in 2003 involving Dixon, Myers and Willis discussing payments Dixon would need to help get a children's dental clinic into the TennCare program. … FBI agent Brian Burns said he had given Willis $4,000 before the meeting to be used in gaining Dixon's support as chairman of the TennCare Oversight Committee."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/1) reports, "Barry Myers, whom prosecutors called a 'bag man' for Dixon, testified Wednesday that Dixon took bribes for legislative favors but insisted on someone else handling the money. 'Sen. Dixon has always been cautious,' Myers said. Myers is awaiting sentencing on a guilty plea to passing along bribes from undercover FBI agents to Dixon and state Sen. Kathryn Bowers, who is also charged." The Chattanooga Times Free Press (6/1, Sher), WMC-TV Memphis (5/31), WPTY-TV Memphis (5/31) and WTVF-TV Nashville (5/31) also report on the opening arguments.

Chicago Hired Truck Probe Defendant Sentenced To 18 Months In Prison. The Chicago Tribune (6/1, Coen, 643K) reports, "A brother-in-law of Cook County Commissioner John Daley who has admitted to taking bribes to steer city business to a politically connected trucking firm was sentenced to 18 months in prison Wednesday." John Briatta "was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Charles Norgle, who said he wanted the punishment to send a message to others in government that such corruption will not be tolerated. Norgle rejected a bid by Briatta's attorneys to have him sentenced to 5 months in prison and 5 months of home confinement, saying he only breached the public trust after suffering gambling and other financial losses. … Any city official involved in taking bribes 'must understand that he is going to prison,' the judge said." The AP (6/1, Robinson) notes, "It was the latest development in a three-year scandal that has rocked City Hall and brought allegations of corruption to the mayor's doorstep. … Briatta, a former water department truck dispatcher, acknowledged that he accepted the money from another city employee, Randy Aderman, who has pleaded guilty and is awaiting sentencing."

WLS-TV Chicago (5/31, Shaw) reports on its Web site that Briatta "is the only member of the Daley family implicated in the hired truck scandal. He apparently resisted the temptation of the hired truck scandal for years, but under the pressure of skyrocketing gambling debts, he finally gave in and took payoffs." Asked about the sentencing yesterday, Mayor Richard Daley said, "Very sad. You take money you are going to get caught. It's not my family circle." The Chicago Sun-Times (6/1, Warmbir) also reports on Briatta's guilty plea.

Key Prosecution Witness Testifies About Chicago Political Hires. The Chicago Sun-Times (6/1, Korecki, Warmbir) reports, "A key witness in the City Hall hiring trial testified Wednesday he used a political army largely made up of city workers to volunteer in various Democratic campaigns, then asked Mayor Daley's patronage chief to reward them with city jobs and promotions. Daniel Katalinic, the highest-profile witness to testify yet in the trial that's in its third week, said Robert Sorich…told him to which political races he should deploy his volunteers. He also said Daley's former campaign manager, Greg Goldner, doled out similar orders. In return, Katalinic would hand Sorich a list of people he'd want hired or promoted in city positions, he testified. … Sorich told him: 'He'd do what he could,' Katalinic said."

Daley Calls Trial Testimony About Clearing Skyway Traffic "Silly." The Chicago Tribune (6/1, Washburn, 643K) reports Mayor Richard Daley yesterday said testimony at the trial of former patronage chief Robert Sorich "that Chicago Skyway tollbooths were fully staffed to help ensure an unimpeded ride to his Michigan summer home was, well, 'silly,'" and "then he said it again. About 20 times. 'Silliest thing I ever heard in my life,' the mayor declared. … When asked whether he was referring to the allegation or to a fact that underlings would seek to smooth the way for him, Daley provided more of the same. … 'It is just silly. Silliness. That is all it is ... completely silly, completely silly.'"

Documents Contradict Blagojevich Denial Of Political Hires. The AP (6/1, O'Connor) reports, "Gov. Rod Blagojevich's office reviewed and approved the hiring of state employees for hundreds of routine jobs such as highway workers and plumbers, according to documents. The hiring lists, obtained by The Associated Press, contradict the governor's statements that his office did not decide who would be hired for civil service jobs. Such hirings are to be based solely on merit." The AP notes, "His hiring practices are under investigation by federal, state and local prosecutors. … The hiring lists obtained by the AP suggest nearly 1,800 hires, promotions, transfers and salary increases were OK'd by aides to the governor in the months following Blagojevich's 2003 inauguration. They include positions such as highway maintainer and prison guard, which are classified as civil service jobs."

ISP Industry, Other Groups Raise Objections To US Request For Data Retention. CNET News (6/1, McCullagh) reports, "Internet providers and telecommunications companies expressed concern on Wednesday about the feasibility of recording Americans' online activities, a proposal that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has recently endorsed." CNET continues, "In a meeting Friday first reported by CNET News.com, Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller said the war on terror would be aided by two years' worth of data retention, a requirement industry representatives say would be accompanied by technical, security and privacy challenges. … 'We have real reservations about data retention requirements because of the security and privacy risks attached to it,' said Mark Uncapher, senior vice president of the Information Technology Association of America. ITAA's board members include representatives of AT&T, Sybase, Fujitsu and Unisys." CNET adds, "In events that were first reported by CNET News.com, Bush administration officials have said Internet providers must keep track of what Americans are doing online. … A Justice Department representative said this week that the government is not seeking to require the retention of the content of communications, but did not elaborate. If the European Union's approach were adopted, Internet companies would be required to save logs showing the identities of e-mail and perhaps instant messaging correspondents in addition to data about which customer was assigned which Internet address. … That suggestion alarms many Internet providers, which worry about the cost and complexity of recording what their customers are doing online. In some cases, especially among libraries, coffee shops and universities, no records may be stored at all."

USA Today (6/1, Swartz, Johnson) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller outlined their request to executives from Google, Microsoft, AOL, Comcast, Verizon and others Friday in a private meeting at the Justice Department. The department has scheduled more discussions as early as Friday. Last week's meeting was first reported by CNET, an online news service. … The meetings reflect a new approach by law enforcement in anti-terrorism efforts. Previously, the Justice Department had invoked the need for data retention only to battle child pornography. Since the Sept. 11 attacks, Internet traffic has become increasingly critical to terrorism investigations, too." USA adds, "Justice is not asking the companies to keep the content of e-mails, spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said. It wants records such as lists of e-mail traffic and Web searches, he said. … Roehrkasse said the government is required to seek proper legal authority, such as a subpoena, before obtaining the records. He said any change in the retention period would not alter that requirement. Law enforcement officials have seen investigations derailed "time and time again" because of a lack of data, Roehrkasse said. … The government's request forces the companies to strike a balance between satisfying law enforcement demands and honoring the privacy of millions of customers. … 'The issue for us is not whether we retain data, but we want to see it done right,' says Dave McClure, president of the U.S. Internet Industry Association, which represents 150 companies, primarily Internet service providers. 'Our concerns are who pays for it, what data is retained, and if it is retained legally without violating federal laws and subscriber agreements.'"

Former New Jersey Mayor Pleads Guilty To Accepting Bribe From FBI Informant. The Newark Star-Ledger Staff (5/31, Martin) reported former Hazlet Mayor Paul Coughlin on Tuesday "admitted…accepting a $3,000 payoff from an FBI informant posing as a crooked contractor, joining a growing list of Monmouth County officials convicted of corruption." Coughlin "pleaded guilty…to a single count of accepting corrupt payments. Under federal guidelines, the former mayor and councilman faces between 21 months and 27 months in prison," and "his attorney said he will argue for a lighter term, calling the crime 'aberrant behavior' and citing what he said was Coughlin's serious alcohol problem." But "prosecutors scoffed at such an argument. 'The defendant knew full well what he was doing,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Judith Germano said." The Asbury Park Press (5/31, Sudol) noted, "Coughlin is the latest public official to plead guilty in a FBI bribery and money-laundering sting dubbed 'Operation Bid Rig,' in which 13 former and current county and local public officials and three businessmen in Monmouth County were charged last year."

Judge Partially Denies Wecht Motion To Suppress Evidence Seized By FBI. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/1, Ward, 261K) reports, "A federal judge yesterday denied a motion by Dr. Cyril H. Wecht's attorneys to suppress all of the evidence gathered against him. In the same order, though, U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab said he would hold a hearing on one issue raised by the defense -- whether 29 boxes of autopsy reports seized by the FBI from the former Allegheny County coroner's private office should have been taken. The hearing will be at 8:15 a.m. next Thursday. … Dr. Wecht claimed that the files seized were not found in the area the warrant claimed they would be and were not labeled as the FBI said they'd be." The AP (6/1, Cowden) notes that the defense motion "attacked the credibility of the FBI agent who got search warrants for Wecht's records and also blamed Wecht's indictment on a political feud with Allegheny County District Attorney Stephen Zappala Jr. … The attorneys also allege the FBI agent had previously 'urged witnesses to perjure themselves in a case involving his own misconduct.'" The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (6/1) and WPXI-TV Pittsburgh (5/31) also report briefly on the ruling.

California State Senator Subpoenaed To Testify In FBI Perata Probe. The Los Angeles Times (6/1, Morain and Evan Halper, 958K) reports, "State Sen. Gloria Romero of Los Angeles was summoned Wednesday to appear before a grand jury in the FBI probe of Senate chief Don Perata's business dealings. Romero, a member of Perata's Democratic leadership team and one of his closest allies, said an FBI agent delivered a subpoena to her Capitol office requiring her to appear in July in Oakland." Romero told the Times, "All along, I've thought this has been a fishing expedition. … I look forward to answering whatever questions they may have." The Times notes, "The subpoena is believed to be the first issued to a sitting legislator in the Capitol since the 1980s, when the FBI launched an undercover anti-corruption operation that put a dozen lawmakers, lobbyists and others in jail."

FBI Investigating Sports Marketing Firm That Tried To Recruit Reggie Bush. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/1, Wilson) reports, "The FBI has opened an investigation into a fledgling San Diego sports marketing firm that tried to recruit Heisman Trophy winner Reggie Bush, the attorney for the football star's family told The Associated Press Wednesday. Attorney David Cornwell of Atlanta said FBI agents interviewed him about 'potential federal crimes' last week by phone," and "he intends to make Bush and his parents available to the FBI. … April Langwell, an FBI spokeswoman in San Diego, said she could neither confirm nor deny any investigations." The AP notes, "The NCAA and Pac-10 are investigating whether any rules were broken when Bush's family lived in a suburban San Diego home owned by Michael Michaels, a principal in New Era Sports & Entertainment, while Bush was still playing for Southern California last season." The Los Angeles Times

(6/1, Farmer, Krikorian, 958K) adds, "A federal law enforcement source said Wednesday that the inquiry was 'in its infancy' and that it was 'way too early to say where this [case] is headed.'" But Michaels lawyer Brian Watkins "called the suggestion of an FBI investigation 'ludicrous' and 'a media ploy.' Watkins said neither he nor his clients had been contacted by the FBI and he suggested that Cornwell was using his own personal contacts to stir up an inquiry."

Peltier Supporter Pleads Guilty To Throwing Rocks At Federal Building. The AP (6/1) reports, "A man accused of throwing rocks in the federal building" in Fargo "has pleaded guilty to charges of damaging government property and threatening a federal officer, the U.S. attorney's office says. U.S. District Judge Ralph Erickson ordered a psychological evaluation for Daniel Cvijanovich," but Erickson "did not immediately set a sentencing date after Cvijanovich pleaded guilty Wednesday, U.S. Attorney Drew Wrigley said." The AP notes, "The rocks struck a pane of glass that separates the lobby from the secure area of the building, and each rock had a note addressed to the FBI attached, authorities said. … Agents thought the threat was in retaliation for the investigation of American Indian activist Leonard Peltier, Wrigley's statement said."

Judge Accepts Guilty Pleas From 16 Charged In FBI Probe Of Nevada Strip Club. The AP (6/1, Ritter) reports, "A federal judge accepted plea deals Wednesday from 16 people to end a decade-long investigation of criminal activity at a Las Vegas strip club, whose owner has agreed to sell the business and plead guilty to tax evasion." Crazy Horse Too owner Rick Rizzolo, "who has faced allegations of mob ties for more than a decade, was expected Thursday to become the 17th and final person to accept plea deals in the case." He is "scheduled to plead guilty to a single tax charge…and agree not to contest some $17 million in fines, forfeitures and restitution." The AP notes, "Wednesday's pleas stemmed from a January 2005 indictment that charged club manager Robert D'Apice with racketeering and tax evasion."

California Woman Makes Public Appeal In Homeless Insurance Fraud Probe. The AP (6/1, Glazer) reports, "The daughter of a man killed in a hit-and-run crash asked the public on Wednesday to help police in their probe that has resulted in the arrests of two elderly women accused of illegally collecting money from his life insurance policies. Standing at the alley where the body of 73-year-old Paul Vados was found in 1999, Stella Vados and her lawyer Gloria Allred asked anyone who knew her father or the women held on charges of mail fraud -- Olga Rutterschmidt, 73, and Helen Golay, 75 -- to call the FBI or police." The AP notes, "Police are investigating whether Rutterschmidt and Golay were directly involved in the death of Vados and Kenneth McDavid, killed in a similar hit-and-run last year. Authorities said Golay and Rutterschmidt befriended the two transients, duped the men into signing them as beneficiaries on their life insurance policies and collected more than $2.3 million after they were killed."

Mississippi Lawyer Pleads Not Guilty To Fen-Phen Settlement Fraud Charges. The Jackson Clarion-Ledger (5/31, Gates) reported, "A lawyer formerly associated with a Jackson law firm pleaded not guilty Tuesday to a 36-count federal indictment accusing him of helping clients submit false settlement claims involving the diet drug Fen-Phen." Robert Arledge of Vicksburg "made his initial court appearance in U.S. District Court on Tuesday after being indicted on Friday. He is the first lawyer charged in the ongoing FBI/IRS federal investigation of fraudulent Fen-Phen claims. Arledge made no comments after his court appearance, but his attorney proclaimed Arledge's innocence." The Vicksburg Post (5/31, Barrett) added, "The 35-count indictment charges that among legitimate plaintiffs, there were false claimants who shared in more than $8 million resulting from claims based on false information about having taking the prescription drug or its effect on their health." The AP (5/31) noted, "More than a dozen federal agents last week swarmed his Vicksburg mansion. Witnesses said the officers seized property including a motorcycle and an oil painting."

Texas Medical Equipment Executive Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud. The Houston Chronicle (5/31, 581K) reported, "A medical equipment company owner pleaded guilty Tuesday to paying $200 kickbacks to Houston doctors for writing prescriptions for unneeded motorized wheelchairs in a scam that cost federal health agencies millions." Harold "Prince Yellowe" Iyalla "also told U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore that Medicare paid his company, 1st Choice Medical Supplies and Equipment, $5.6 million under the scam." The Chronicle noted, "Iyalla pleaded guilty to conspiracy, health care fraud and money laundering with maximum sentences ranging from five to 10 years and fines of $250,000."

Judge Sentences California Money Manager To 30 Years In Prison For Ponzi Scheme. The Los Angeles Times (5/27, Reckard, 958K) reported, "Orange County money manager James P. Lewis Jr. was sentenced Friday to 30 years in prison for swindling 1,600 investors of $156 million in a Ponzi scheme so calculated and long-running that the judge called it a 'crime against humanity.'"

US District Judge Cormac Carney "pronounced the maximum sentence, rejecting pleas by Lewis' lawyer that it would be 'a death sentence for a 60-year-old.' … For nearly 20 years, the judge noted, Lewis solicited retirement funds from investors who now face the prospect of humiliation and poverty in their senior years."

Former Texas Police Officer Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Possession. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (6/1, 247K) reports former Mansfield police officer David Neal Looney on Wednesday "pled guilty in federal court in Fort Worth…to one count of possession of child pornography, according to a press release from the U.S. Department of Justice. … Looney confessed to FBI agents that he had images of child pornography on his home computer and gave written consent for agents to seize and search his computer. A forensic examination of the computer's hard drive revealed approximately 110 images of child pornography."

Scam Victims Pay For Bogus Checks Honored By Banks. The Washington Post (6/1, A1, Mayer) reports on "an increasingly common check scam that relies on the vagaries of the banking system to take advantage of unsuspecting consumers." The hPost continues, "Federal rules require banks to release funds from a consumer's deposit quickly, usually within one to five business days, depending on the kind of check. However, it can take weeks before a bank discovers a check is fraudulent. … So when a teller says 'the check has cleared,' the teller is 'usually thinking in terms of bank rules, that the hold time is over, and the consumer now has access to the funds,' said Susan Grant, director of the National Fraud Information Center. … But the average consumer thinks that phrase means 'the check is not fraudulent,' Grant added. … When that happens, it is depositors who are responsible for the money, she said. As the American Bankers Association explains in a 'Fraud Alert!' statement insert it distributes to banks to send to customers: The consumer is the one dealing directly with the person who sent the money and therefore is 'in the best position to determine how risky the transaction is.'" The Post notes, "To facilitate the flow of funds behind the 40 billion checks processed each year, banks are required to release funds within a few days, said Nessa Feddis, senior federal counsel for American Bankers Association. … If tellers start asking a lot of questions or start holding checks until they are determined to be good, banks 'might be perceived as trying to circumvent the rules entitling people to withdraw funds,' Feddis added. And if the banks are wrong, it will only be a matter of time before they are hauled before Congress and 'accused of trying to hold on to people's funds,' she said."

Texas Businessman Sentenced To 14 Years In Drugs-For-Missiles Plot. The Houston Chronicle (6/1, Rice, 581K) reports Houston businessman and former Danish Parliament member Uwe Jensen on Wednesday "was sentenced to 14 years in federal prison…for his role in a plot to trade cocaine for weapons to arm a right-wing militia listed as a terrorist group." Jensen "pleaded guilty more than three years ago to conspiring with his boss, Carlos Ali Romero Varela…to sell shoulder-launched anti-aircraft missiles and small arms to the United Self-Defense Forces of Colombia." The Chronicle notes, "They were arrested in an FBI sting operation code-named 'White Terror,' which began after an East German informant who claimed to have ties with the KGB told the FBI that Jensen and Romero wanted to buy Russian weapons." The AP (6/1) adds that co-defendants Elkin Alberto Arroyave Ruiz and Edgar Fernando Blanco Puerta, both Colombian nationals, also were sentenced yesterday for their roles in the plot. "Blanco was given sentences of life in prison and 15 years for the two counts he faced. Both sentences will be served concurrently. Arroyave was sentenced to 15 years and faces deportation to Colombia after serving his term."

Judge Harshly Questions Charges Against Wife Of Alleged Cuban Agent. The AP (6/1, Anderson) reports US District Judge K. Michael Moore "raised questions Wednesday about the role of a Florida International University employee accused along with her professor husband of working as agents of the Cuban government, suggesting that the charges amounted to 'character assassination' against her." Moore "said it was unfair to Elsa Alvarez to assume that she was involved in all of the activities of her husband, Carlos Alvarez, particularly since there is substantial evidence indicating she was reluctant from the beginning and later opposed continuing their alleged surveillance on behalf of Cuba." The AP notes, "Testimony revealed Wednesday that during three days of interviews with the FBI last summer, Carlos Alvarez repeatedly told agents that his wife was not directly involved in communications…with their Cuban intelligence service handlers. In fact, according to transcripts of those interviews, Elsa Alvarez grew increasingly worried about the contacts and hoped to end them."

Missing Data On Veterans Goes Beyond Initial Reports. The AP (6/1, Yen) reports, "Personal information on 26.5 million veterans that was stolen from a Veterans Affairs employee this month not only included Social Security numbers and birthdates but in many cases phone numbers and addresses, internal documents show." The AP continues, "Meanwhile, VA Secretary Jim Nicholson said Wednesday that he had named a former Arizona prosecutor as a special adviser for information security, a new three-month post that will pinpoint security problems at the VA and develop recommendations for improvements." The AP adds 'The three pages of memos by the VA, written by privacy officer Mark Whitney and distributed to high-level officials shortly after the May 3 burglary, offer new details on the scope of one of the nation's largest security breaches. The memos were obtained Wednesday by The Associated Press. … They show that a file containing 6,744 records pertaining to 'mustard gas veterans' - or those who participated in chemical testing programs during World War II - was breached, and that a 'short file' with as many as 10 diagnostic codes indicating a veteran's disability also was stolen. … At the same time, however, the memos suggest that the data might be difficult to retrieve by thieves. … On Wednesday, the VA did not say why it didn't immediately reveal that personal information such as addresses and phone numbers had been disclosed. But the agency said it aggressively sought to protect veterans once Nicholson was informed. … Some lawmakers said Wednesday they were troubled by the new revelations, which go further than what the VA initially reported after publicizing the theft on May 22. At the time, Nicholson said the data was limited to names, Social Security numbers and birthdates; he later indicated that diagnostic codes in some cases also may have been breached."

Deal Reached In Houston Crime Lab Probe. The Houston Chronicle (6/1, McVicker) reports, "Three recalcitrant witnesses believed to hold key information concerning the root of problems at the Houston Police Department crime lab could soon be forced to tell what they know." The Chronicle continues, "Michael Bromwich, the city's independent investigator, and Rep. Kevin Bailey, D-Houston, chairman of the House Committee on General Investigating and Ethics, confirmed Tuesday that an unorthodox agreement has been reached that would let Bromwich use the committee's subpoena power to compel the uncooperative former lab employees to testify under oath. … 'We're pleased we've been able to reach an agreement with Chairman Bailey and the members of his committee that will advance our investigation,' Bromwich said." The Chronicle adds, "In his latest report on the crime lab released earlier this month, Bromwich, a former U.S. Justice Department inspector general, said DNA and serology analysts may have tailored their findings to support predetermined crime theories. … Bromwich also complained that the probe by his team of forensic investigators has been hindered by an absence of cooperation from three ex-crime lab employees: former lab supervisor Don Krueger, former DNA lab chief James Bolding and former analyst Christy Kim. … Krueger retired in February 2003 after the DNA section's widespread problems were exposed. Former Police Chief C.O. Bradford later recommended that Krueger be fired for his role in the lab's problems. Bolding resigned in 2003 to avoid being fired. Kim was fired, but the Civil Service Commission re-instated her and she later retired."

Ohio High Court Reverses Death Penalty. The AP (6/1) reports, "The Ohio Supreme Court on Wednesday threw out the death sentence of a man who strangled and stomped a 76-year-old man during a robbery, saying the killer's chaotic childhood with abusive parents, along with other factors, outweighed the crime's brutality." The AP continues, "The 4-3 opinion also noted that Troy Tenace, 44, expressed remorse when he confessed to police in 1994, and that if he receives the maximum sentence, he won't be eligible for parole until age 96." The AP adds, "Any one factor alone would not have resulted in reversing the death sentence, but the combination of the three is enough to argue for prison over execution, the majority said. … The three dissenting justices said the brutality of the crime was inexcusable. … The justices were unanimous, however, in upholding Tenace's conviction for robbing and killing Chester Kozlowski on Jan. 28, 1994, in his Toledo home. Tenace robbed Kozlowski because the older man paid him in cash earlier for chimney repairs. The man had been gagged and strangled, and had extensive facial injuries from being stomped with heavy boots. … The ruling sends the case back to Lucas County for resentencing."

South Carolina Lawmakers Approve Death Penalty For Some Child Molesters. South Carolina's House of Representatives has passed pair of bills that would allow prosecutors to seek the death penalty for some repeat child molesters. The AP (6/1) reports, "One bill was approved earlier by the Senate and now goes to the governor's office, but the second must go back to the Senate for reconsideration."

FEC Keeps 527 Funding Loophole In Place. The Washington Post (6/1, A4, Edsall, 744K) reports the Federal Election Commission yesterday announced the "same rules that allowed independent '527' groups such as America Coming Together and Swift Boat Veterans for Truth to pump more than $400 million into the 2004 election campaigns will remain in place for now." The decision "invites even larger sums to be spent influencing races this year and in 2008." The FEC ruling, "made on a vote of 4 to 2 in closed session was a response to an order by U.S. District Judge Emmett G. Sullivan. Noting the apparent 'complete failure' of the FEC's regulatory efforts in 2004, Sullivan required the agency either to start crafting new rules or to issue a better explanation of how it will be able to regulate the groups effectively under existing rules."

The New York Times (6/1, Phillips, 1.19M) reports a federal judge "had told the commission that it had two choices: issue uniform rules or issue a fuller explanation of why it was dealing with 527-related cases one by one even as the 2006 elections near. The commission voted 4 to 2 not to appeal the judge's ruling, and chose the second option." The vote "by the panel set the stage for another round of court battles that could affect the 2006 Congressional elections, as well as the 2008 presidential race. Advocates of changing campaign financing — and some Republicans — have been prodding the commission and Congress to regulate the 527 groups, named after a section of the tax code. Critics term the groups' operations an end run around the McCain-Feingold ban on the largely unregulated contributions to federal candidates that is known as soft money."

Report Urges Streamlining Of Classified Records Management. Government Computer News (6/1, Lipowicz) reports, "The federal government needs to apply a more integrated approach to declassifying records, a new report from the National Archives and Records Administration recommends. … 'We need to streamline the multiple, inefficient and, at times, ineffective independent agency reviews of the same material,' according to the report, which was published by NARA's Information Security Oversight Office." GCN continues, "The office found that the level of reported classifications in fiscal 2005 decreased by 1.4 million in comparison to fiscal 2004 and is the first decrease observed since fiscal 2001. Even so, there are still increasing numbers of documents being classified, primarily for counterterrorism activities and critical infrastructure protection, at the Homeland Security and Justice departments." GCN adds, "The total number of classifications dropped to 14.2 million in fiscal 2005, a decrease from 15.6 million the year before. That reversed an upward trend that had been occurring since 2001, with 8.7 million classifications that year. In 2002 there were 11.3 million, in 2003 14.2 million, and in 2004 15.6 million."

Bankruptcy Judge, Pilots Approve Delta Concessions Deal. The AP (6/1, Weber, Tong) reports, "A bankruptcy judge Wednesday approved the $280-million-a-year concessions agreement between Delta Air Lines Inc. and its pilots, rejecting claims by the government's pension insurer that it should receive the compensation the pilots were promised if their pension is terminated." The AP continues, "The decision came hours after rank-and-file pilots gave their nod to the deal. The agreement, which runs through 2009, will take effect Thursday." The AP adds, "The deal, which replaces an interim pact agreed to in December, includes an initial 14 percent pay cut for pilots and assurances the pilots union won't fight any company effort to terminate the pilots' pension. … Judge Adlai Hardin signed the agreement during a hearing in White Plains, New York. Earlier in the day, pilots of the Atlanta-based airline, the No. 3 U.S. carrier, approved the deal with a vote of 61 percent in favor. … The judge's approval, the last hurdle in the process, came despite an objection filed by the government's pension insurer, which insisted that a $650 million note and $2.1 billion unsecured claim that Delta has promised the pilots should belong to the agency if the pilots' pension is terminated as expected. … Hardin heard arguments from lawyers for both sides, but determined in the end that the agreement was in the best interest of the airline."

Supreme Court Ruling May Slow Momentum To Redefine Whistleblower Protections. The Washington Post (6/1, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The Supreme Court's ruling on freedom-of-speech rights of public employees has created a stir across the government, in part because of the way Justice Anthony M. Kennedy , writing for the 5-to-4 majority, framed the issue: 'When public employees make statements pursuant to their official duties, the employees are not speaking as citizens for First Amendment purposes, and the Constitution does not insulate their communications from employer discipline.'" The Supreme Court ruling "may slow momentum in Congress for redefining whistle-blower protections. Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii), with bipartisan support, is pushing for legislation that would permit a federal whistle-blower to be protected for disclosing information learned on the job or in the course of job duties. The Justice Department has opposed taking that step, and at least one senator has placed a hold on Akaka's bill, according to congressional aides."

NYCLU Tells Judge NYC Blocking Transfer Of Arrest Evidence To FBI. The AP (6/1, Neumeister) reports that in a letter to US Magistrate Judge James C. Francis, the New York Civil Liberties Union said "on Wednesday that the city has refused to let it give evidence to the FBI as the bureau explores whether police officers violated the rights of protesters at the 2004 Republican National Convention." NYCLU associate legal director Chris Dunn "said he planned to ask the judge at a conference next week to clear the way for the NYCLU to cooperate with the FBI. In a Tuesday letter to Dunn, city senior legal counsel Peter G. Ferrell wrote that the NYCLU may make its own materials available to the FBI but not materials the city gave it and marked confidential."

Florida Governor Signs Bill Eliminating Juvenile Boot Camps. The AP (6/1, Fanta) reports, "The military-style boot camp system that Florida has used to discipline juveniles was formally dismantled under a bill that Gov. Jeb Bush signed Wednesday, nearly five months after the death of a boy who was punched and kicked by guards at a state-run camp." The AP continues, "Instead of sending juvenile detainees to boot camps where guards can push and threaten them, children will go to residential programs that bar physical discipline. They'll go through a full medical exam when they enter and leave their programs and have a hot line they can call in case of trouble. … The $11 million program, which counties can voluntarily join, will also offer detainees job skills training, community service and counseling."

The Bradenton Herald (6/1) reports, "The legislation is named for Martin Lee Anderson, who was sent to the Bay County boot camp Jan. 5 for trespassing, a violation of his parole set for helping steal his grandmother's Jeep Cherokee from a church parking lot. … Security videotape taken at the camp shows a half-hour encounter between Anderson and up to nine guards, who kicked and kneed him. Anderson died the next day at a Pensacola hospital. … While a first autopsy report stated that Anderson died of sickle cell trait, a second autopsy report released in May showed Anderson died of suffocation by guards who covered his mouth while forcing ammonia capsules up his nose. … Guards have stated in reports they tried to revive Anderson with the ammonia. No arrests have been made so far and the investigation into the death is continuing, said Pam Bondi, spokeswoman for special attorney Mark Ober. Ober is handling the investigation into Anderson's death."

NYTimes Columnist Decries Sex Trafficking. In a column for the New York Times (6/1), Bob Herbert writes, "The demand for prostitutes (here in New York and elsewhere) is much greater than the supply of women who want to be prostitutes. So trafficking, the coercion of women and young girls into the sex trade, is a flourishing industry." Herbert continues, "The toll that trafficking takes is often horrific. In addition to the forced prostitution, the women and children who are the victims of trafficking become part of a landscape in which drug addiction, disease, mental health problems, beatings and violent death are commonplace." Herbert adds, "It may seem peculiar, but there is no law against sex trafficking in the state of New York — or most other states, for that matter. Many thousands of women and children are coerced into the sex trade each year, and the pimps, madams and other lowlifes who trap them are seldom subject to legal sanctions commensurate with the severity of their crimes. … A bill has been introduced in the State Assembly that would create two new crimes in New York: trafficking a person for sexual servitude and trafficking a person for labor servitude. But that bill, which has overwhelming support in the Assembly (including more than 100 co-sponsors), has been stuck for some time in the Codes Committee. … Trafficking is much more widespread than most people realize. As the advocacy group Sanctuary for Families has pointed out, 'In our backyards and communities, a slave trade is flourishing that makes a mockery of our belief in civil and human rights.'"

Gay Marriage Debate Seen As "Battle Of Our Times." Under the headline "Gay Marriage Looms As 'Battle Of Our Times,'" the Christian Science Monitor (6/1, Lampman, 61K) reports, "As Senate prepares to argue a marriage amendment, room for compromise between religious freedom and equal rights seems thin. The battle over same-sex marriage is shaping into something more than deep societal tradition vs. civil rights. It is becoming a conflict of equality vs. religious liberty." Both sides "are pursuing their agendas in state legislatures, courts, and public schools. Both sides tend to view the struggle as a zero-sum, society-defining conflict."

New York High Court Hears Arguments On Gay Marriage. The New York Times (6/1, Hartocollis, 1.19M) reports, "As the issue of gay marriage finally reached New York State's highest court on Wednesday, the six judges who heard the passionate arguments from both sides put forth a fundamental question: Has marriage been defined by history, culture and tradition since the dawn of Western civilization, or is it an evolving social institution that should change with the times?" The Times adds, "During the two and a half hours of oral argument, the judges on the Court of Appeals grappled with essential questions of social values, asking tough questions without tipping their hands as to their ultimate decision." The case before the court was "a challenge to New York State's marriage laws, filed by 44 same-sex couples."

More Commentary On Gay Marriage Debate. GOP Sen. Wayne Allard, author of the Marriage Protection Amendment, writes in USA Today (6/1, 2.31M), "Recent decisions by activist judges not only fail to respect the traditional definition of marriage, they also highlight a lack of respect for the democratic process. The courts are driving a redefinition of marriage contrary to democratic principles. The process to amend the US Constitution is one the American people can trust. … If we in Congress fail to define marriage, the courts ultimately will not hesitate to define it for us."

USA Today (6/1, 2.31M) editorializes, "Even supporters of the Marriage Protection Amendment readily concede that the measure to ban same-sex marriage nationwide has virtually no chance of becoming part of the Constitution. … So why bother? Well, Election Day is a few months off.

Supporters hope the controversy will energize their base of social and religious conservatives opposed to same-sex marriage."

The New York Times (6/1, 1.19M), in an editorial titled "On The Low Road To November," also says Republicans are "trying to rally their far-right base for the fall elections with a mean-spirited sideshow threatening to the Constitution: a ban on same-sex marriage. … Plainly, the real purpose of this rerun is to provide red meat to social conservatives, and fodder for commercials aimed at senators who vote to block the atrocious amendment."

Study Says Minorities Pay Higher Rates For Subprime Mortgages. A study by the advocacy group, the Center for Responsible Lending has found that black and Hispanic home buyers tend to pay higher interest rates on subprime mortgages than whites with similar credit ratings. The New York Times (6/1, Eckholm, 1.19M) reports, "The subprime industry makes loans at higher interest rates to people who cannot qualify for regular mortgages. 'When we compared borrowers with the same risk characteristics, African-Americans and Latinos were still more likely to get the higher-rate loans,' said Debbie Gruenstein Bocian, a researcher at the group, the Center for Responsible Lending. A spokesman for the mortgage banking industry challenged the conclusion, saying the report did not take into account all the legitimate questions about family wealth and debt, house appraisal and other factors that underwriters must consider when making a loan."

Horowtiz Says Liberal Professors Exclude Conservative Students. USA Today (6/1, Marklein, 2.31M) reports that "60s radical turned conservative activist" David Horowitz "has spent the past few years crisscrossing the country to warn students: 'You can't get a good education if they're only telling you half the story.' To Horowitz, an overwhelming majority of hard-line liberal professors on campuses have left conservative students complaining that their views aren't welcome. His job, he says, is to see that those students aren't treated as second-class citizens." Horowitz wants "a return to the kind of liberal arts education he got at Columbia University in the 1950s, when he still embraced communism, where professors 'taught me what the intellectual life should be like, where you focus on the ideas. It's not a political food fight like so much of our culture has become.' Trouble is, his critics, including a recently created coalition of student, faculty and civil liberties groups, say he doesn't know what he's talking about."

Group Plans To Put 10 Commandments Monument Across From Supreme Court. The Washington Post (6/1, Boorstein, 744K) reports that a DC-based evangelical Christian group plans to put a monument to the Ten Commandments across the street from the US Supreme Court. The group Faith and Action "says on its Web site that it plans to unveil the waist-high, 850-pound granite sculpture Saturday on the front lawn of the rowhouse on Second Street NE where the national group's offices are. But the group apparently doesn't have the approval it needs from at least two agencies, city officials and neighborhood activists said. … The sculpture 'will be visible to the nine justices as they arrive and leave each day,' the site said in explaining why the group undertook the project."

DOJ Watching Napster Suit. The Los Angeles Times (5/31, Menn) reports that federal antitrust investigators "are reexamining" online music pioneer Napster's "long-standing claims that the major record labels improperly conspired to keep authorized downloads off the Internet, said people familiar with the matter." The Times continues, " Justice Department officials are closely tracking a court fight in federal court in San Francisco between the labels and the financial backers of the original Napster, the file-sharing network that debuted in 2001 and became emblematic of online piracy." The Times adds, "Napster filed for bankruptcy protection, and the name was bought and assumed by Roxio Inc. in 2002. … The labels are suing venture capital firm Hummer Winblad Venture Partners and German conglomerate Bertelsmann, which owns label BMG, accusing them of contributing to the piracy by the first Napster users. … As part of its defense, Hummer Winblad has alleged that the labels violated antitrust laws by colluding to refuse to license their music to Napster for legitimate distribution." The Times notes, "Antitrust investigators have asked both sides to keep them apprised by passing along filings in the case, said music industry sources who asked not to be identified because of the sensitive nature of the government's inquiries. … It is unclear whether the review has led to a full reopening of an inquiry that ended in 2003, when the department announced it hadn't found evidence that the major labels manipulated the digital music market." UPI (6/1) also reports this story.

Google CEO Calls Creation Of Web Browser Unlikely. The AP (6/1, Liedtke) reports, "Google Inc. CEO Eric Schmidt on Wednesday told industry analysts the online search engine leader is unlikely to create its own Web browser, even though the company remains worried about being slighted by the next version of Microsoft Corp.'s Internet Explorer." The AP continues, "Responding to a question during a conference call, Schmidt said Google sees little need to develop its own browser because most people seem satisfied with Explorer and rivals such as Firefox, Apple Computer Inc.'s Safari and Opera." The AP adds, 'Mountain View, Calif.-based Google already has a search toolbar installed in Firefox as part of its partnership with the Mozilla open source software project that introduced the browser in 2004. … 'We would not build a browser just for the fun of building a browser,' Schmidt said." The AP notes, "Later in the call, Schmidt reiterated Google's concerns about Microsoft programming the next version of its Internet Explorer to steer more traffic to its own Internet search engine. … Google informally complained to the U.S. Justice Department about Microsoft's plans, but regulators decided they didn't need to intervene. Schmidt said Google still hopes Microsoft will make it easier for Explorer users to set up other search engines in the browser."

Six Newspapers Await Word On McClatchy Auction. The AP (6/1, Sheeran) reports, "Six former Knight Ridder Inc. newspapers awaited word Wednesday on possible suitors as the deadline passed for bidding on the mid- and small-sized papers." The AP continues, "There was no immediate word on how many bids were submitted, when new owner McClatchy Co. might decide on possible buyers or whether the papers would be sold as a group or one by one." The AP adds, "McClatchy, based in Sacramento, Calif., bought Knight's Ridder 32 newspapers in March and decided to sell 12 largely because they were in slower-growing markets. … With buyers found for six larger newspapers - including The Philadelphia Inquirer - McClatchy turned its attention to the six smallest. Among those, most attention has focused on the Akron Beacon Journal, the largest of the six remaining papers and once the flagship of Knight Ridder. … Advance Publications in New York, parent company of the Beacon Journal's biggest competitor and Ohio's largest newspaper, The (Cleveland) Plain Dealer, was believed to be among the possible bidders for the Akron newspaper. The papers are 40 miles apart and compete in some of the faster growing Cleveland and Akron suburbs, including Medina County and northern Summit County."

EU Fines Chemical Groups In Price-Fixing Cartel. The Financial Times (6/1, Buck) reports, "The European Union's top antitrust regulator yesterday imposed fines totalling €344.6m ($441.9m) on four chemical groups for operating a cartel in the market for plexiglas and similar acrylic glass products." The Times continues, "French oil group Total's Arkema unit was worst-affected, with a fine of €219.1m. Britain's ICI was ordered to pay €91.4m. Lucite, another UK group, was fined €25m and Quinn Barlo of Ireland €9m. Both Arkema and ICI saw fines increased by 50 per cent because of convictions in other cartel cases." The Times adds, "Degussa, a German chemical group and another member of the cartel, escaped punishment because it blew the whistle on its co-conspirators. The Commission said Degussa would otherwise have been made to pay €264.5m - the highest single fine of all the members. … Neelie Kroes, EU competition commissioner, said: 'Cartels are a scourge. I am shocked that companies like ICI and Arkema have been fined once again. These fines will serve as a cold shower for the management and shareholders of all these companies, who have to realise that cartels cannot and will not be tolerated.' … The Commission said it had obtained handwritten notes of a meeting in a Dublin hotel room in October 1999, at which the companies agreed to raise their prices as of January 2000."

The AP (6/1, White) reports, "Cartels 'allow the participants to shield themselves from competition, to charge higher prices and to be protected from the need to innovate,' said EU spokesman Jonathan Todd. 'Their customers -- both companies and final consumers -- pay the price in terms of higher prices and a narrower choice of products.'"

Federal, State Officials Seek More Funds From Exxon Mobil For 1989 Spill. The AP (6/1, Lee) reports, "Federal and state authorities will seek more money from Exxon Mobil Corp. on Thursday to rehabilitate wildlife populations and clean up remaining oil from a devastating spill nearly 20 years ago, Alaska officials said." The AP continues, "Exxon has paid $900 million in restitution for the spill - the nation's largest - which emptied 11 million gallons of crude oil into Prince William Sound in 1989. … A 'reopener' provision in the settlement created a window from 2002 to 2006 in which the state and federal governments could claim up to an additional $100 million. … That reopener provision expires Sept. 1. State and federal officials must file a claim 90 days before that date, by the end of this week." The AP adds, 'The specifics of the claim, including how much will be requested from Exxon, have not been released. … 'We are going to make a claim, but all the details are still being worked out between the Department of Law and the Department of Justice,' John Manly, spokesman for Gov. Frank Murkowski, said Wednesday. … Exxon Mobil spokesman Mark Boudreaux said Wednesday that the company hadn't been notified that the Justice Department would seek a reopener. … Hundreds of studies by Exxon have shown the environmental impact to be less serious than claimed by other researchers. Boudreaux said Exxon didn't know of any new scientific studies that would merit reopening the settlement."

Federal Judge Rules Sea Lion Research Violates Animal Protection Laws. The AP (6/1, Lee) reports, "A judge ruled the federal government must halt studies of threatened and endangered Steller sea lions because it did not properly asses how certain research techniques might harm the animals." The AP continues, "The National Marine Fisheries Service approved permits for research activities that include hot branding and tissue sampling of thousands of sea lions each year, said the suit filed last year by the Humane Society of the United States. … 'We have concerns about the lack of environmental review, the structure of the research and how it's being done,' Jonathan Lovvorn, an attorney for the Humane Society, said Tuesday. 'Our main goal is and has always been to have them evaluate the research before authorization. We want to see that happen.'" The AP adds, "Lovern said they agency needs to better evaluate different research techniques, which range from minimally invasive to lethal. … 'We don't oppose research in order to benefit the Steller sea lion,' Lovvorn said. 'The question is are we doing that here in accordance with the law.' … The federal agency failed to comply with the National Environmental Protection Act by not preparing an environmental impact statement, and must give up its research permits, according to the decision on Friday by U.S. District Court Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle in Washington, D.C."

Death Rates Rising At Small Mines. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (6/1, Maher, 2.11M) notes that since May 20, "seven miners have died, bringing the number of workers killed in coal-mine accidents in the U.S. this year to 33 -- compared with 22 for all of last year. Part of the problem, some say, is a rise in the number of small, undercapitalized mines that have become economical since coal prices have surged. Miners refer to them as 'dogholes.'" Higher fatality rates at small mines "have plagued the industry even in years when the overall number was falling. A report by the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health, which examined data from 1988 to 1997, found the fatality rate at coal mines with fewer than 50 employees was 4.24 times the rate at mines with 250 or more workers."

Scientists Believe Vast Oil Deposits Lie Under Arctic Ocean. The New York Times (6/1, Revkin, 1.19M) reports, "The studies on Arctic sediment that appear today in the journal Nature tell a dramatic story of polar warming and cooling over millions of years. But what they tell petroleum geologists may be just as striking." Some scientists involved in the work "said the huge amounts of organic material from dead algae and plants embedded in the ancient sedimentary layers suggested that the center of the Arctic Ocean could hold vast oil deposits. Several of the researchers said they were reluctant to focus on that aspect of the work, saying it would be unfortunate if their climate studies prompted new oil exploration that could liberate more greenhouse gases and further warm the climate."

Research Suggests Arctic Ocean Was Tropical 55 Million Years Ago. In a separate story, the New York Times (6/1, Revkin, 1.19M) reports that a detailed analysis of the climatic and biological record from the seabed near the North Pole "shows that 55 million years ago the Arctic Ocean was much warmer than scientists imagined — a Floridian year-round average of 74 degrees. The findings, published today in three papers in the journal Nature, fill in a blank spot in scientists' understanding of climate history. And while they show that much remains to be learned about climate change, they suggest that scientists have greatly underestimated the power of heat-trapping gases to warm the Arctic."

Corporate America Increasingly Embracing Need To Address Climate Change. USA Today (6/1, Lynch, 2.31M) reports that Paul Anderson, chairman of Charlotte-based Duke Energy, a registered Republican and backer of President Bush, "wants the federal government to fight global warming by taxing companies based on the 'greenhouse gases' they pump into the atmosphere." The Times notes, "That such a Big Business stalwart is demanding federal action on climate change illustrates an unmistakable evolution in corporate thinking, motivated both by evidence that global warming already is affecting the economy and by the prospect of fat profits from new environment-friendly products." Corporate America "increasingly is embracing the need for reducing human contributions to the planet's rising temperatures. Forty companies — including Boeing, IBM, John Hancock and Whirlpool — have publicly endorsed the notion that climate change is real by joining a business council organized by the Pew Center on Global Climate Change."

Kempthorne Spends First Day As Interior Secretary. The Washington Post (6/1, A17, Eilperin, 744K) reports that resolving a long list of lawsuits is one of many tasks Dirk Kempthorne "faces as the nation's 49th interior secretary. With 30 months before the administration ends, he must confront everything from a huge maintenance backlog at the national parks to a contentious debate over how to best protect endangered species." Yesterday, Kempthorne "spent his first day doing what he does best: stroking the egos of interest-group leaders, chatting up tourists standing by historic memorials he now oversees, and bonding with politicians."

Reservation In Minnesota To Banish Drug Offenders. From Granite Falls, Minnesota, the AP (6/1) reports a small American Indian reservation "plans to banish drug offenders. The plan targets anyone who commits a drug crime on the Upper Sioux's reservation land. The individual is automatically prohibited from setting foot on the reservation.

SF Chronicle Reporters Challenge Bonds Leak Subpoena. The AP (6/1, Kravets) reports, "Two San Francisco Chronicle reporters subpoenaed to testify before a federal grand jury about how they got Barry Bonds' leaked testimony urged a judge on Wednesday to let them off the hook." The AP continues, "The Chronicle's Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, the latest reporters to become entangled in the federal government's ramped-up efforts to investigate leaks, argued that the First Amendment protects reporters and their sources. … In an affidavit accompanying their filing, Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist Carl Bernstein wrote to U.S. District Judge Martin Jenkins of San Francisco that anonymous sources were instrumental in breaking the Watergate scandal." The AP adds, "Fainaru-Wada and Williams have been have been subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury investigating who leaked them the secret testimony of San Francisco giants slugger Bonds, the New York Yankees' Jason Giambi and other professional athletes. … About two dozen athletes were called before an earlier San Francisco grand jury in 2004 as part of the government's investigation into the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative - the California nutritional supplement lab that was exposed as a steroid ring."

Former DOJ Communications Director Criticizes Reporters' Subpoenas. The New York Times (6/1, Liptak) reports, "Subpoenas issued last month to reporters for The San Francisco Chronicle were criticized yesterday by a former chief spokesman for Attorney General John Ashcroft as a 'reckless abuse of power.'" The Times continues, "The former spokesman, Mark Corallo, made similar statements in an affidavit filed in federal court yesterday. He said Mr. Ashcroft's successor, Alberto R. Gonzales, had acted improperly in issuing the subpoenas. … 'This is the most reckless abuse of power I have seen in years,' Mr. Corallo said in an interview. 'They really should be ashamed of themselves.'" The Times adds, "The subpoenas, part of an effort to identify The Chronicle's sources for its coverage of steroid use in baseball, would not have been authorized by Mr. Ashcroft, Mr. Corallo said. 'You just don't ride roughshod over the rights of reporters to gather information from confidential sources,' he added. … Mr. Corallo left the Justice Department in 2005. His public relations firm represents, among others, Karl Rove, President Bush's top political adviser. A spokeswoman for Mr. Ashcroft, who also stepped down in 2005, declined to comment on Mr. Corallo's sworn statement, which was submitted with the reporters' motion to quash the subpoena." The Times notes, "Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said he could not address the subpoena to the Chronicle reporters. Subpoenas, he said, are 'handled consistent with Justice Department guidelines and on a case-by-case basis on facts specific to the case that only those in the Justice Department would be aware of.' … Mr. Gonzales has in recent weeks hinted that the Justice Department may move beyond subpoenas for journalists' sources, and pursue the criminal prosecution of reporters under espionage laws for publishing classified information. … Mr. Corallo said that in three years as the department's press secretary and public affairs director, he approved a single subpoena to the press, involving what he called a serious national security matter, and turned down many more. One of those he refused, he said in the court filing, concerned 'a public corruption case involving leaks of grand jury information.'"

Man Cited Among Major Foreign Heroin Dealers Gets 40-Year Prison Sentence. The AP (5/31, Neumeister) reports from New York City that a man "described as one of the biggest foreign heroin dealers ever extradited to the United States was sentenced Wednesday to 40 years in prison, dodging a life term in a U.S. deal with Colombia that was hotly debated in court. Ramiro Lopez-Imitola, who prosecutors said headed a heroin trafficking organization in Colombia and Venezuela, was sentenced in U.S. District Court and ordered to forfeit $200 million in assets, though he claimed to be broke." Lopez-Imitola is said to have "ordered the body of [a] courier cut open to extract drugs after the man died of an overdose in Miami. … Drug Enforcement Administration special agent John P. Gilbride called the desecration of the drug courier 'the extent to which a monster would go in order to make millions from the drug trade.'"

"Key" Figure In Tennessee Drug Conspiracy Case Pleads Guilty. The Greeneville (TN) Sun (5/31) reports a Telford man federal authorities "alleged was a key local figure in a decade-long conspiracy to import drugs into Northeast Tennessee pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court…Monday to two conspiracy charges. Mark Allen Saults…pleaded guilty…to two counts of a federal indictment," which included conspiring with others to distribute 15,000 pounds of marijuana. The Sun says Saults and another person were arrested on Dec. 1, 2005, by DEA agents when the two came to meet with an informant from whom they reportedly had agreed to purchase 50 pounds of marijuana and two pounds of meth.

Otis resident on multiple charges, including the charge of 'human trafficking.' Ramon Lopez-Montanez, 39, was indicted on charges of forced labor, marijuana manufacturing and use of a false government document. … According to the indictment, Lopez-Montanez is charged with growing marijuana in Salem and Otis and using a false Oregon driver's license to open an account at Wells Fargo Bank in Lincoln City." The News Guard notes the DEA's and FBI's involvement in the investigation, along with other agencies.

Illinois Man Convicted Of Dealing Crack Cocaine Gets 25-Year Prison Sentence. The Belleville News Democrat (5/31) reports, "A 39-year-old Alton man was sentenced in federal court in East St. Louis Tuesday to 25 years in prison on crack cocaine charges. Christopher B. Taylor was convicted of distributing and possessing with intent to distribute crack cocaine. … The case was prosecuted as part of a continuing DEA investigation targeting crack cocaine trafficking in Alton."

Woman Sentenced In Michigan For Delivering Cocaine. The Flint (MI)Journal(5/31) reports, "A woman who delivered an ounce of crack cocaine to undercover investigators last year was sentenced Tuesday to nearly 4 years in prison, even though her attorney argued for probation, saying her involvement in the drug trade was her boyfriend's fault. U.S. District Judge Paul Gadola sentenced Renee Holmes, 31, to 3 years and 10 months in prison. … Holmes and her boyfriend, Damon D. Cooper, were among nine people indicted by a grand jury on federal drug charges last September after an investigation by federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents and Flint police."

Former New York Prosecutor's Husband Challenges Cash Seizure By Federal Authorities. According to the Albany (NY) Times Union (5/31, Lyons), federal authorities "are moving to seize $352,680 in cash that Illinois state troopers confiscated from a car being driven across the country by the husband of a former Albany County prosecutor. The Justice Department contends the money…is the proceeds of drug dealing and therefore subject to seizure. But Robert L. Schultz, 45, who is married to former Assistant District Attorney Kimberly A. Mariani, is challenging the government's assertion."

Defendant's Attorney Seeks Informant's Name In Mississippi Drug Case. The Greenwood (MS) Commonwealth (5/31) reports, "Kevin Matthews wants to know the identity of the federal informant who turned on him, but the U.S. attorney's office said the law doesn't require them to identify that person until trial time. The pleading filed by Matthews' attorney…is the latest in a flurry of paper thrown back and forth in the Greenwood man's federal case. During raids conducted by agents of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the Mississippi Bureau of Narcotics in October, Matthews and three other Greenwood men were among the 36 total suspects arrested in a Delta drug sweep."

Report Said To Clear Lance Armstrong Of Doping Allegations, WADA Not Convinced. There is widespread coverage today of a report that is said to clear cyclist Lance Armstrong of using banned substances. News outlets have made more than 500 references to the report. For example, the AP (6/1) writes that a Dutch investigator's report "cleared Lance Armstrong of doping in the 1999 Tour de France on Wednesday, calling the accusations against him 'completely irresponsible' and raising the possibility of misconduct by anti-doping authorities. The 132-page report recommended convening a tribunal to discuss possible legal and ethical violations by the World Anti-Doping Agency and to consider 'appropriate sanctions to remedy the violations.'" The AP report was published by news outlets such as ABC News, the Wall Street Journal, Washington Times, San Diego Union Tribune, Chicago Sun-Times, Pittsburgh Post Gazette, and Boston Herald.

Knight Ridder (5/31, Almond) reports, "The investigator, Emile Vrijman, examined test results taken from the year Armstrong won his first of seven consecutive Tour de France titles. … The investigation was initiated after the French sports newspaper L'Equipe reported last August that six of Armstrong's urine samples from 1999 were positive for the blood-boosting drug EPO when retested in 2004. … Officials from the World Anti-Doping Agency said in a statement they were concerned that the investigation had focused on how the retired cyclist's urine tests were leaked to a newspaper and not whether the results were valid."

The Los Angeles Times (6/1, Abrahamson) reports, "WADA Chairman Dick Pound, who has long asserted the cycling federation, which goes by the acronym UCI, leaked the 1999 doping forms to the French newspaper L'Equipe, questioned how Vrijman had reached the conclusion that one of the top anti-doping labs in the world -- the French national lab, near Paris -- had so thoroughly botched tests. The lab is known by its French acronym, LNDD."

The New York Times (6/1, Macur) writes, "In the 130-page report, Vrijman stated that there was no proof that Armstrong had used EPO, a synthetic version of a naturally occurring hormone that increases oxygen-rich red blood cells, because there was no way to prove that Armstrong's urine samples had not been tampered with or tainted. In turn, Vrijman wrote that the cycling union should 'refrain from initiating any disciplinary action whatsoever.'"

According to Bloomberg (5/31, Sheringham), "Lance Armstrong was cleared of taking banned drugs at the 1999

DOJ_NMG_0030641

Tour de France by independent investigators who said the World Anti-Doping Agency may be guilty of misconduct in its handling of the case."

In Forbes (5/31), Parmy Olson writes, "WADA loada baloney. … The finger of blame is now being pointed squarely at anti-doping authorities including France's LNDD and the World Anti-Doping Agency, otherwise known as WADA."

On its Web site, CNN (5/31) reports Vrijman, "assigned by the International Cycling Union (UCI) to investigate newspaper allegations, said on Wednesday testing procedures were insufficient to label Armstrong's sample positive." However, "In a strongly-worded press release on Wednesday, the UCI said that they 'deplored' the behavior of Vrijman, claiming that he had released the report without their permission to the Dutch press and before all 'interested parties' could comment."

The UK's Guardian (6/1) says Lance Armstrong yesterday "repeated his accusation that he was the victim of a 'witch-hunt' after the appearance of a report into allegations made last August in the French newspaper L'Equipe that the blood-booster erythropoietin was found in urine samples provided by the seven-times Tour de France winner during his first win in the race in 1999."

Voice of America (5/31) reports on its Web site, "Vrijman said his report 'exonerates Armstrong completely.' The cyclist has never tested positive for drugs and has vehemently denied using performance-enhancing substances."

The BBC (5/31) writes, "Cycling's governing body, the UCI, said it would make a full statement after studying the report."

Fentanyl Linked To Detroit Overdoses Possibly Made In Illegal Labs. The Detroit News (6/1) reports, "Doses of the painkiller fentanyl, thought to be the cause of dozens of drug overdose deaths in Metro Detroit in the past two weeks, appear to have been made illegally in underground laboratories, people familiar with an expanding police investigation said Wednesday. The findings are based on chemical tests that indicate the fentanyl…was not made the same way as the prescription forms of the drug, said Calvin Trent, director of the Detroit Bureau of Substance Abuse. … Carolyn Gibson, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said investigators won't say conclusively the drugs were illegally manufactured until all their tests are complete. 'We'd be premature in saying it's 100 percent definite, but that's what it's looking like,' she said."

Operation Rolling Thunder Nets Arrests Of 152 Fugitives In New York. The Buffalo News (6/1, Thomas) reports, "A 26-year-old man wanted in a Rochester slaying was one of 152 dangerous fugitives and sexual predators arrested in Erie and Niagara counties during a five-day blitz that ended Saturday." The News continues, "Mario Collier, arrested in Buffalo, is accused of shooting an accused drug dealer to death in January after luring him to the meeting place by dousing his friend with gasoline. He had been a fugitive for the last four months. A team of officers searched for him for three straight days, at the homes of relatives and friends, from Buffalo to Cheektowaga." The News adds, "Teams of local, state and federal officers from 20 law enforcement agencies fanned out across the two counties to apprehend fugitives wanted on felony warrants for assault, rape, burglary, narcotics, parole and probation violations and failure to register as a sex offender. During the operation, 213 outstanding warrants were executed. … The sweep was part of Operation Rolling Thunder, a statewide initiative that began in November to capture the state's worst fugitives. … Across the state, 619 fugitives have been arrested so far during Operation Rolling Thunder stings in Rochester, Syracuse and Albany, according to Chauncey G. Parker, director of criminal justice for the state Division of Criminal Justice Services. … 'Collier, without a doubt, was our No. 1 priority,' said Daniel Larish, supervisory deputy for the U.S. marshals. 'Any time you take a suspected murderer off the street, you help to make the streets safer.' Collier, aka Marlo Allen Jr., was the last of four men arrested in the slaying of Josue Marrero, 23, in Rochester on Jan. 18."

Man Who Posed As US Marshal Arrested. The New York Times (6/1, Toy, Mead) reports, "Richard S. Kudlik enjoyed regaling his girlfriend with tales of his life as a United States marshal: of his dangerous assignments hunting fugitive criminals and of being so close to Hillary Rodham Clinton that she would request that he and his team provide for her security on certain occasions.. … He would show up at her Long Island home with his gun and badge, Pam Brown recalled yesterday, wearing his blue raid jacket with 'U.S. Marshal' emblazoned across the back. The license plate on his pickup truck read, 'OFF2HUNT,' and there was a United States marshal sticker on the windshield. … But after they had been dating for eight months, Ms. Brown said, Mr. Kudlik told one story too many, and what turned out to be his fictional life as a federal law enforcement officer quickly unraveled." The Times adds, "Ms. Brown set up a Web site last month to expose Mr. Kudlik as a 43-year-old heating and ventilation worker from Port Jefferson who is married and has two teenage children. She then reported him to the Marshals Service — as did several others, according to the agency — and he was arrested on Tuesday on charges of having a counterfeit marshal badge, a misdemeanor punishable by up to six months in prison. … The site is among the latest in a series of Web sites with the goal of exposing cheating paramours. … The Web site includes what it says are e-mailed testimonials from other women who say that Mr. Kudlik duped them with the same story: that he was a divorced father of two and that his work as a marshal meant irregular hours and an inability to meet on weekends and holidays. … Ralph Rosado, a spokesman for the United States Marshals Service, said the service first learned of Mr. Kudlik more than a year ago, when marshals confiscated a badge and other marshal paraphernalia from Mr. Kudlik in April 2005 after a tip from the Nassau County police." … Mr. Kudlik told marshals that he had purchased the counterfeit items on the Internet and promised to stop masquerading as a marshal, so the marshals did not press charges."

The Long Island Newsday (6/1, Armario) reports, "The 34-year-old Port Jefferson man was arrested Tuesday by the real U.S. marshals, for allegedly possessing counterfeit marshal gear, after several women, including Brown, discovered they'd been duped and reported him. … 'He was using the marshals service as a way to get girls,' Deputy U.S. Marshal Ralph Rosado said. 'He's really married with kids.'" Newsday adds, "Officials recovered an assortment of fake marshal paraphernalia in Kudlik's car when they arrested him as he embarked on an Orient Point ferry: patches, duffel bags, memo pads and three laminated 'Fraternal Order of the U.S. Marshals' cards listing him as president. … Rosado said they were uncertain how Kudlik obtained the goods, but that he had a receipt from a German company that made him replica badges."

IMMIGRATION:

USCIS Director Criticizes Senate Immigration Bill. The Washington Times (6/1, Dinan, 90K) reports, "The Senate immigration bill makes the same mistake as the 1986 amnesty by restricting the ability of US Citizenship and Immigration Services to share information on illegal alien guest-worker applicants who are criminals and terrorists, the agency's director said yesterday." Emilio T. Gonzalez, "whose agency would have to administer a guest-worker program, said not allowing the US Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) to share information on someone who applies means they cannot begin the process of removing criminals and national security threats, even after they are rejected from the guest-worker program." In "a briefing with reporters in which he weighed in on the Senate immigration bill, which would offer a chance for citizenship to millions of illegal aliens, expand legal immigration and start a new foreign-worker program," Gonzalez said, "It is important for us to be able to act on what we get when we run a background check on somebody." Gonzalez, "a naturalized citizen himself, has established a new tone that national security should be foremost in employees' minds at the agency. He said his agency will need at least six months and maybe as much as a year to register current illegal aliens for a foreign-worker program -- far longer than the Senate bill envisions."

House, Senate Bills Reduce Court's Ability To Review USCIS Decisions. USA Today (6/1, Kiely, 2.31M) reports, "Immigration legislation now before Congress is threatening a long-standing safeguard to keep politics out of final decisions about who becomes an American, legal experts and immigrant rights advocates say." The House and Senate "have passed immigration bills that would reduce or eliminate federal courts' ability to intervene when immigration officials decide that applicants for citizenship lack 'good moral character,' a legal requirement. Critics of the proposed change contend the final say of a subjective standard should not be left to U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, whose director is a presidential appointee."

Tens Of Thousands Of Hondurans, Nicaraguans Could Lose Legal Status Today. The Washington Post (6/1, A3, Raghavan, 744K) reports, "Tens of thousands of Honduran and Nicaraguan immigrants nationwide risk losing their legal status in the United States today because they have not renewed their temporary work permits under a program to help victims of natural disasters, some in the mistaken belief that they will soon be on the path to becoming US citizens." The Post adds, "With the deadline approaching by the end of today, about half the eligible applicants have yet to apply for renewal. They could lose their jobs and face deportation, jeopardizing the livelihoods of thousands of relatives here and in their homelands who depend on their salaries."

More Commentary On Immigration Reform Debate. George Will writes in the Washington Post (6/1, A19, 744K), "As members of the House and Senate head for a conference to try to reconcile the stark and probably irreconcilable differences incorporated in their two immigration bills, Republicans are between a rock and a hard place. And another rock. And another." But "if Congress fails to pass immigration reform, that will not really deserve to be called a failure, for two reasons. First, the moment may not be ripe for reform, because the country is of two minds -- actually, more than two -- about the issue. Second, the system the Framers created, with two legislative bodies having different dynamics because their constituencies have different characteristics, is in this instance performing approximately as the Framers intended." The House "is supposed to be the barometer that measures the political weather of the moment. It is not failing to do that."

Gary Bauer writes in the Washington Times (6/1, 90K) that "as lawmakers consider various immigration reform measures, they should take a hard look at the reams of polling data that show that standing strong on conservative values, not giving in on amnesty, is the key to winning the hearts, minds and votes of Hispanic Americans. First off, Hispanics are much more conservative on immigration than is commonly believed." If, Republicans "capitulate on amnesty, not only will they give their conservative base reason to stay home on Election Day, but they may alienate a growing constituency that shares those core conservative values of family, hard work, respect for the rule of law and patriotism."

Ruben Navarrette, a member of the editorial board of The San Diego Union-Tribune, writes in USA Today (6/1, 2.31M), "As a Mexican-American, I'm hearing from a lot of US-born Hispanics who are convinced that the immigration debate is a proxy for an assault on them, their language and their culture." Moreover, "as the national mood on immigration reform turns vile and even in some cases violent, there is the very real possibility of a backlash by assimilated, US-born Hispanics."

TAX:

Fed Adviser Calls For Elimination Of Estate Tax. Edward Prescott, senior monetary adviser to the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/1, 2.11M) that "people cannot take their IRAs with them, and the fundamental question is this: Who gets it? It's a simple question that deserves a simple answer, but when a certain little word -- tax -- gets involved, things are never very easy. … The old maxim says that there are only two things in life that we can't avoid, death and taxes, but why pile on by combining the two? The Senate should join the House in permanently repealing the estate tax."

Economist Makes Case For AMT. Robert Nelson, an economist and professor in the School of Public Policy of the University of Maryland, writes in the Washington Post (6/1, A19, 744K), "The AMT is viewed by many as a bad thing. Yet, consider this: There is wide agreement among economists on the benefits of a federal 'flat tax' on income that would apply a uniform rate to every taxpayer and eliminate most current deductions and tax credits. … What does this have to do with the AMT? Just this: As Post business reporter Albert B. Crenshaw has noted, the AMT 'approaches a modern-day flat tax.' It imposes a uniform rate of 26 percent up to $175,000 in income, and above that 28 percent." Nelson adds, "The AMT is a tax policy windfall that ought to be protected and preserved."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Expresses Confidence In CIA, Hayden. The AP (6/1, Riechmann) reports, "President Bush gave the embattled Central Intelligence Agency his vote of confidence on Wednesday, saying the spy outfit will succeed at its mission and make Americans safer with new director Gen. Michael Hayden at its helm." Bush "made the quick trip from the White House to CIA headquarters in suburban Virginia for a ceremonial swearing-in of Hayden. The former head of the National Security Agency who served as the United States' No. 2 intelligence official for the last year was officially sworn in Tuesday and had already had his first day on the job when Bush arrived." Said Bush, "He's such a good man we're going to swear him in twice." Bush "appeared warmly welcomed by the several hundred employees gathered in the CIA's main lobby despite his White House's tussles with the CIA and the agency's tradition of remaining distant from politics. He said he is confident a Hayden-led CIA can deliver."

The Washington Times (6/1, Curl, 90K) says the President "lavished praise on the general, who wore his blue Air Force uniform, four stars on each shoulder, for the ceremony." Said Bush, "Mike is a patriot; he's a reformer. He's one of our nation's finest intelligence professionals. I know firsthand how good this guy is. He brings more than two decades of experience in the intelligence field. He is going to be a superb leader for the dedicated men and women of the CIA." The Times adds, "For his part, Gen. Hayden told the president and the employees now working under him: 'I could not be more grateful.'" The New York Times (6/1, Mazzetti, 1.19M) calls Bush's remarks a "pep talk," noting he said, "I cannot do my job without the Central Intelligence Agency."

The Washington Post (6/1, A3, Pincus, 744K) reports on signs that "the CIA is not doing enough to keep its covert officers' identities secret, especially in the Internet age when so much personal information can be easily searched, said one congressional aide familiar with the Senate report." But "even more important than such security is recruiting the right person, said a former CIA station chief with experience in the Middle East." One official, "still working for the agency, recalled that Cuban intelligence quickly identified Spanish-speaking CIA officers who infiltrated that country because of their manner of speaking. … Even easier to identify were African Americans sent to African countries who could not hide their lack of knowledge of tribal dialects or history."

VA Data Loss Included Some Veterans' Phone Numbers, Addresses. The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 5, 0:25, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "That security breach in the Veterans Administration was even bigger than VA first let on. Computer files stolen from the home of a VA employee contained personal information on more than 26 million vets. Now, a VA memo obtained today by CBS News shows that in addition to social security numbers and birthdates, the files also contained some veterans' telephone numbers and addresses."

USA Today (6/1, Brook, 2.31M) says "one file containing more than 6,700 records pertaining to veterans exposed to mustard gas was lost, said the memo, which was written by a VA privacy officer." The VA "gave the memo to the House Veterans' Affairs Committee at the request of Rep. Bob Filner of California, the panel's acting ranking Democrat. USA TODAY obtained the memo from the committee. Privacy experts say the Social Security numbers could be used to open fraudulent credit cards or bank accounts."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (6/1, A7, Lee, 744K) reports the "sensitive personal information...that was stolen from…was stored in a format that could make it difficult for thieves to use, according to an internal VA memo." The format "'requires specialized application software and training' to write computer code 'to access and manipulate the data for use,' Whitney wrote in the memo, obtained yesterday by The Washington Post."

Paulson Nomination Wins Praise. The AP (6/1, Crutsinger) reports, "President Bush's selection of a savvy Wall Street veteran to be his third treasury secretary is winning widespread praise, but Democrats say it will take a change in policies -- not just personnel -- to deal with budget and trade deficits and other economic problems." Bush announced Tuesday that "he was turning to Henry Paulson, chairman and chief executive of Goldman Sachs, to become the administration's chief economic spokesman. By choosing a 32-year veteran of one of Wall Street's premier investment houses, Bush is hoping for the same economic credibility that Bill Clinton gained when he picked Robert Rubin, one of Paulson's predecessors at Goldman Sachs, as his treasury secretary."

Under the headline "2 New Captains Of The Economy Face Volatile Global Markets," the New York Times (6/1, Andrews, 1.19M) reports, "One reached the pinnacle of wealth and prestige as a dealmaker on Wall Street. The other was an academic superstar, brilliant but somewhat shy and more at ease in Bermuda shorts than suits." But "now they find themselves side by side in confronting a stiff new test: helping to guide the economy from a period of fast growth and cheap money through one of higher interest rates, jittery markets and a falling dollar." Paulson "is expected to arrive at his post at a time when global financial markets are suddenly more volatile and investors are more risk-averse than they have been in years." Ben S. Bernanke "has already endured a baptism of fire as the Fed has struggled over when to stop raising interest rates."

More Commentary On Paulson. Stephen Cecchetti, the Rosenberg professor of global finance at the International Business School, Brandeis University, writes in the Financial Times (6/1), "The announcement of Hank Paulson's nomination as US Treasury secretary is good news for everyone. In many ways he is the perfect complement to Ben Bernanke, the new Federal Reserve chairman. A giant among monetary policy thinkers is being joined by one of the most important financiers in the world. We now have the essential combination of a theorist working with a practitioner."

Lawrence Kudlow, host of CNBC's "Kudlow & Company," writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/1, 2.11M) that Paulson's appointment is "a bullish sign for the fate of the president's supply-side agenda as well as the U.S. dollar. … There's a change going on here, probably a big one. Under the new Josh Bolten-run White House, Mr. Paulson is essentially being appointed deputy president for economic policy -- a mandate not given to his two predecessors. This is a bigger shakeup than meets the eye."

David Wessel writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/1, Wessel, 2.11M) that Paulson is "expected to be the greenest Treasury secretary ever." He is "an environmentalist, not only in his private and charitable life, but as chief executive. Goldman Sachs Group has an eight-page 'environmental policy framework' that declares 'a healthy environment is necessary for the well being of society, our people and our business, and is the foundation for a sustainable and strong economy,' and the firm walks the talk. So will that make a difference at Treasury?"

Reid's Office Acknowledges He Misstated Ethics Rules. The Los Angeles Times/AP (6/1) reports Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's spokesman "acknowledged Wednesday night that Reid misstated the ethics rules governing his acceptance of free boxing tickets and has decided to refrain from taking such gifts." Spokesman Jim Manley said Sen. Reid "still believes it was "entirely permissible" for him to accept ringside seats for three professional boxing matches in 2004 and 2005 from the Nevada Athletic Commission but has decided to avoid doing so in the future, spokesman Jim Manley said." The announcement "came after the Associated Press presented Reid's office Wednesday with conclusions from ethics experts that the Senate leader misstated congressional ethics rules in trying to defend his actions."

House Republicans See Signs Of Political Revival While On Recess. The White House Bulletin/US News (5/31) reports House Republican members "campaigning back home during the Memorial Day recess are sensing a comeback for the GOP built on support for recent moves to extend tax cuts, the approval of a leaner than expected budget, tough immigration reforms, and the popularity of the Medicare drug benefit." A senior GOP leadership aide said, "We're feeling better. We got a couple of things under our belt, like the tax extension and the Medicare benefit, and it's starting to take hold." The Bulletin adds that while "no Republican official is willing to guarantee that the GOP will keep control of the House in the fall elections, leadership and House GOP conference officials say that there has been a recent up-tick in polling for the members, and the reaction back home to the talking points provided by the leaders is winning applause -- despite national media stories suggesting that the Democrats have the advantage going into the summer." Meanwhile, Republican political consultants "believe that the overwhelming voter sentiment is anti-incumbent more than anti-Republican, meaning that both parties will get hit in local races and provide a balance that would keep Republicans in charge of the House."

Democrats Said To Have Fear Of Winning Power. In a Newsweek Web-exclusive commentary (5/31), Michael Hirsh says, "At least the GOP is engaged in a war over real policy choices. It is an emotional debate, often a hysterical and ill-informed one, but it is a fight among adults who know what they believe in and who have the guts to battle for it. By contrast the Democrats, ostensibly the party poised to exploit this GOP civil war, don't seem to remember what it is like to behave as adults. They resemble nothing so much as ill-adjusted adolescents, afraid of their own shadows, much less the presidency. What are they afraid of? Themselves, essentially: their past, their own left, the populist rhetoric of their leaders (Nancy Pelosi, Harry Reid, Howard Dean, Al Gore), the left-wing loony stigma represented by 'Fahrenheit 9/11' filmmaker Michael Moore (every Dem's favorite bugaboo). Above all they fear seeming and looking soft. They are all afflicted with varying degrees of megalophobia, a fear of assuming power."

Broder Says Bush, GOP Scandal Woes Were Predicted. In his Washington Post column (6/1, A19), David Broder says that in its September 2004 issue, Washington Monthly "magazine invited 16 smart political observers -- a mix of Republicans, Democrats and independents -- to write short essays predicting what would happen if George Bush won a second term. The answers, understandably enough, were all over the lot. But no one suggested that one-third of the way through his second term Bush would have suffered the political and policy reverses that he has actually experienced." The one commentator "who got it exactly right was Kevin Drum, who runs the magazine's blog. 'What do we have to look forward to if George W. Bush is elected to a second term?' he asked. 'One word: scandal.'" While "history backed that forecast," Drum "found additional reasons that led him to conclude that Bush and the Republicans might be particularly susceptible," such as the GOP leadership's "ruthlessness and disregard for traditional political norms," a "culture of lax supervision of executive agencies by the Republican Congress encouraged misbehavior on Capitol Hill," and "the lack of major policy initiatives would leave a vacuum in the news that would make scandal look like the most prominent feature of the political landscape."

Snow-Thomas Face-Off On Zinsmeister Noted. The Washington Post (6/1, A17, 744K) runs a "Verbatim" column on White House spokesman Tony Snow's response to a question from Hearst Newspapers columnist Helen Thomas about Bush domestic policy aide Karl Zinsmeister. Asked why Bush picked "man who is so contemptible of the public servants in Washington to be his domestic adviser -- saying, 'People in Washington are morally repugnant, cheating, shifty human beings?' Why would he pick such a man to be a domestic adviser?" Snow largely avoided answering the question, responding with answers such as, "You meant contemptuous, as opposed to contemptible, I think."

Beinart Says Bush "Takes Truman's Name In Vain." Peter Beinart, editor at large of the New Republic, writes in the Washington Post (6/1, A19, 744K) that President Harry Truman is the "one Democrat Republicans love. … Last weekend President Bush devoted his West Point commencement address to an extended analogy between himself and the 33rd president, invoking Truman no fewer than 17 times." Truman "believed in fighting totalitarianism fiercely, but with more than just guns, and through international institutions that made U.S. power legitimate in the world. George W. Bush should remember that the next time he takes Truman's name in vain."

WSJournal Favors Sunsetting Some Programs. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/1, 2.11M) notes that a group of House Republicans led by Reps. Jeb Henserling and Mike Pence are pushing "new rules to sunset out-of-date federal programs. Under their proposal that has been promised a vote this summer, Congress would have to reauthorize agency budgets every five years, or they would die. The legislation would also create a sunset commission to recommend program terminations, and Congress would vote up or down on the package. … It will be instructive to see how many Democrats and Northeastern Republicans -- who like to pose as deficit hawks -- favor deficit reduction if that means sunsetting programs that have outlived their usefulness. Our guess is the number will be very close to zero -- which is the main reason Congress will spend $300 billion more than it raises in taxes this year."

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Considered Larger Rate Increase Last Month. USA Today (6/1, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) reports, "Facing both higher-than-expected inflation and the possibility of slower growth, Federal Reserve officials at a May 10 meeting were unsure how many more interest-rate increases, if any, will be needed, according to minutes released Wednesday. Underscoring the uncertainty, the central bank's Federal Open Market Committee debated a series of options at the meeting, from standing pat to raising the target for short-term rates by half a percentage point. The Fed ultimately voted unanimously to boost its target by a quarter-point to 5%." The Washington Post (6/1, D1, Henderson, 744K) notes "Fed officials also considered whether to bump the rate up by a half percentage point, to 5.25 percent." The Wall Street Journal (6/1, Ip, 2.11M) reports the story under the headline "Fed Grows Uncertain Over Rates As Inflation Concerns Multiply."

Engler Predicts Modest Manufacturing Growth This Year. The Christian Science Monitor (6/1, Cook, 61K) reports on a recent "Monitor Breakfast" with National Association of Manufacturers President John Engler. On the outlook for the US manufacturing sector, Engler said, "We are still the possessors of a substantial manufacturing sector. The demise of the manufacturing economy, the obituaries for that are a bit premature. 2005 was a record [year for] output in US manufacturing history, accomplished with fewer people, reflecting the incredible productivity that has been driving manufacturing. … It is a growth rate that makes us the envy of virtually all of old Europe. [The outlook is for] more modest growth this year than last, but still positive, with threats as a result of external factors [that are] hard for individual manufacturers to control."

Stocks Rise. The Wall Street Journal (6/1, Talley, 2.11M) reports the Dow Jones Industrial Average "rose 73.88 points, or 0.67%, to 11168.31, after losing 184.18 on Tuesday. For May, the Dow industrials lost 1.7%, the biggest monthly decline since June 2005 and first monthly drop so far this year." The Nasdaq Composite Index "gained 14.14, or 0.65%, to 2178.88. For the month, the Nasdaq fell 6.2%. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index added 10.25, or 0.81%, to 1270.09. For the month, the S&P 500 declined 3.1%."

Savings From Medicare Drug Cap Offset By Hospital Visits. Researchers say caps on Medicare drug benefits result in more patient visits to emergency rooms and hospitals thereby offsetting savings from lower spending on prescription drugs. The Wall Street Journal (6/1, Hechinger, 2.11M) reports, "The study, published Thursday in the New England Journal of Medicine, gives ammunition to critics of the new Medicare Part D prescription-drug benefit, which includes payment restrictions. Researchers at health-maintenance organization Kaiser Permanente in Oakland, Calif.; the University of California, San Francisco; and Harvard University examined the cost and clinical outcomes of 199,179 Kaiser beneficiaries in Northern California who were enrolled in a program called Medicare+ Choice in 2003. … The study compared 157,275 Kaiser beneficiaries with caps to 41,904 who had unlimited benefits because of supplemental coverage from their employers. The study, which received funding from federal agencies and the Alfred P. Sloan Foundation, found that a cap on drug benefits lowered pharmacy costs by 31%. But total medical costs, including drugs, were roughly the same."

Consumers Said To Be Paying Billions More To Compensate For Medicare, Medicaid Imbalances. Blue Cross officials and independent actuaries say Imbalances in the nation's health care system as a result of tight Medicare and Medicaid budgets are causing employers and consumers to billions of dollars more per year for medical care. The New York Times (6/1, Freudenheim, 1.19M), "A new study commissioned by Premera Blue Cross, based in Seattle, has found a rapid acceleration in higher costs to private payers in Washington State, for example, as hospitals and doctors grapple with constraints in the federal health insurance programs. The study found that in 2004, the most recent year for which full data are available, hospitals in Washington State charged an additional $738 million — or 14.3 percent of their revenue — to private payers to make up for Medicare and Medicaid underpayments. … Other research has come to similar conclusions across the country. Unpaid hospital bills, largely for the uninsured, are costing about $45 billion nationally a year and adding about 8.5 percent to the cost of health insurance for those who do pay, said Kenneth E. Thorpe, a health care economist at Emory University."

Glass Artists Face Off In Rare Courtroom Battle. The New York Times (6/1, Egan) reports, "As an ever-moving maestro in the world where fine art and commerce converge, Dale Chihuly is perhaps the world's most successful glass artist. … His clients include Bill Gates and Bill Clinton, and his elaborate installations of sea gardens and flower clusters show that mere sand transformed by fire can elevate a casino ceiling to the level of gallery spectacle. … But now Mr. Chihuly is in the midst of a hard-edged legal fight in federal court here over the distinctiveness of his creations and, more fundamentally, who owns artistic expression in the glass art world." The Times continues, "Mr. Chihuly has sued two glass blowers, including a longtime collaborator, for copyright infringement, accusing them of imitating his signature lopsided creations, and other designs inspired by the sea. … The glass blowers say that Mr.

Chihuly is trying to control entire forms, shapes and colors and that his brand does not extend to ancient and evolving techniques derived from the natural world." The Times notes, "The suit, rare in art circles, offers a sometimes unflattering glimpse at how high-powered commercial artists like Mr. Chihuly work. The two glass blowers say that he has very little to do with much of the art, and that he sometimes buys objects and puts the Chihuly name on them, a contention that Mr. Chihuly strongly denies. … He acknowledges that he has not blown glass for 27 years, dating from a surfing accident that cost him the full range of shoulder motion, an injury that struck three years after he had lost sight in his left eye in a traffic accident. … Still, Mr. Chihuly said, he works with sketches, faxes and through exhortation. Nothing with his name on it ever came from anyone but himself, he said."

Bush Raises Funds For Ehrlich, Steele. The Washington Times (6/1, Dinan, 90K) reports President Bush "hopped over to Baltimore yesterday to raise money for the Maryland Republican Party, telling a high-paying crowd of several hundred to help re-elect Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. and also send Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele to the U.S. Senate, although the latter was conspicuously absent." Bush "stood on a stage in a ballroom at the BWI Marriott just feet away from Mr. Ehrlich, but the president also had brief kind words for Mr. Steele, the other major Republican statewide candidate on the ballot in November, even though Mr. Steele was not there." Some of the Republicans "in attendance last night said they were surprised by Mr. Steele's absence, but said there was no rift and he would benefit anyway from the event, which raised funds for Maryland Victory 2006, a get-out-the-vote operation that specifically targets state legislative races and Mr. Ehrlich's campaign, but which will benefit Mr. Steele as well." Early reports "had the event netting around $1 million."

The Washington Post (6/1, B5, Mosk, 744K) focuses on Steele's absence, reporting "only one of the state's two marquee Republican candidates joined him." Gov. Ehrlich "stood on a riser shoulder to shoulder with the president, but the party's leading candidate for an open U.S. Senate seat in Maryland, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, was absent." Democrats were "eager to promote Bush's appearance, figuring it wouldn't help Ehrlich politically," and "were quick to spotlight Steele's decision to miss the event." The AP (6/1) reports Steele was "notably absent."

New York Democrats Formally Tap Hillary Clinton For Senate Race. Sen. Hillary Clinton formally opened her race for reelection at a New York Democratic Party meeting amid widespread anticipation that her '06 campaign will be but a prelude to a presidential run in '08. But her early prominence in the upcoming Democratic primary contest has some worried that she would not be able to rally enough support among moderates and independents to win a general election.

ABC World News Tonight (5/31, story 6, 2:15, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, Sen. Clinton "seemed to be looking beyond." Sen. Clinton: "We need a fundamentally new direction. Solutions that help us meet our 21st-century challenges of expanding our economy, defending our security and preserving our values." Tapper: "The presidential election is more than two years away. But Democrats are already buzzing about her prospects." While many Democrats "believe that Clinton will get her party's nomination, some are fearful that she cannot win the presidency. A new ABC News poll shows a daunting 42% of all Americans that say they will never vote for her. Some think she's too liberal. Others think she's untrustworthy. And that's a big concern for Democrats who want a candidate that can appeal to moderates and independents, in important states such as Ohio and Florida."

Fox News' Special Report (5/31, Hume) reported, "Delegates at New York state's Democratic convention today named Senator Hillary Clinton as their candidate for re-election. But the Senate race is overshadowed to some extent about speculation about whether and how she will seek her party's nomination for the White House in '08." Fox (Miller) added, "Although delegates and supporters cheered her nomination as a second term, some observers say she acted more like she was making a run for the White House. With her husband, the former President, in attendance, Mrs. Clinton brought the crowd to its feet. Not once did she mention potential Republican challengers." But she did take "a number of stabs at the Bush Administration."

The New York Times (6/1, Kornblut, 1.19M) reports Sen. Clinton "formally opened her Senate re-election campaign on Wednesday with a call to 'take our country back' from the current Republican leadership, cataloging what she called the Bush administration's failures in a marquee appearance at the state Democratic convention that signaled how she might approach a presidential campaign."

The AP (6/1, Humbert) reports Sen. Clinton "repeatedly bashed the Bush administration Wednesday as she told cheering Democrats that the country needs 'a fundamentally new direction.'" Former President Clinton "was in the audience but didn't speak. He got a standing ovation when the former first lady singled him out as 'an inspiration, a mentor, a partner.'"

The AFP (6/1) reports Clinton, "viewed by many as the Democrats' best prospect for reclaiming the White House in 2008, kicked off her campaign for a second term in the US Senate."

The Washington Times (6/1, Bellantoni, 90K) reports Clinton "officially started her re-election campaign yesterday, accepting the Democratic nomination for her New York seat with a promise of fighting for energy independence and fair wages while avoiding questions on her front-runner status if she chooses to seek the presidency in 2008." Clinton's "acceptance speech included hints of her higher ambitions, however, as the senator asked New Yorkers to 'stand with me' as she works to create well-paying jobs and to fund research for alternative energy."

The AP (6/1, Glover) reports New York Gov. George Pataki "strolled through a teeming farmers market in Iowa, chewing on a giant radish and pressing the flesh with a few thousand people he'd like to be his closest friends." Within the hour, Pataki had "donned dark robes and was delivering the commencement speech to medical graduates at Des Moines University, the multitasking required for a White House hopeful 19 months before Iowa caucus-goers vote." Pataki seems "like an unlikely sell in Iowa — a Northeast moderate who backs abortion and gay rights and gun control — but the three-term governor has focused on the handshaking-backslapping-local fundraising required to win over voters in a less populated, rural state."

Pataki Focuses On Retail Politics In Iowa Trip. The AP (6/1, Glover) reports New York Gov. George Pataki "strolled through a teeming farmers market in Iowa, chewing on a giant radish and pressing the flesh with a few thousand people he'd like to be his closest friends." Within the hour, Pataki had "donned dark robes and was delivering the commencement speech to medical graduates at Des Moines University, the multitasking required for a White House hopeful 19 months before Iowa caucus-goers vote." Pataki seems "like an unlikely sell in Iowa — a Northeast moderate who backs abortion and gay rights and gun control — but the three-term governor has focused on the handshaking-backslapping-local fundraising required to win over voters in a less populated, rural state."

Dodd Sees Ability To Reach Across Aisle As Key Selling Point. In a Newsweek Web-exclusive commentary (5/31), Howard Fineman says, "Maybe Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut has no chance to win the presidency. Or maybe he does. In any case, the mere fact that he called me the other day to remind me that he is running tells me something: that most of the Democratic Party's savviest veterans -- elected officials in their Capitol Hill suites, Hollywood machers tooling along the Santa Monica Freeway in their Priuses, the New York soft-money crowd eating their egg-white omelets at the Regency in Manhattan -- are convinced that Hillary Can't Win." No one "doubts Hillary Clinton can win the nomination; not many think she can beat the GOP's candidate, especially if it is McCain." Dodd's "argument is that, in an uncertain world, and one divided by Red and Blue, voters are ready for someone who can make politics work by bridging gaps, talking turkey and doing deals."

Pennsylvania State Senate Candidate Says GOP Must Adhere To Its Principles. Mike Folmer, a Republican candidate for the Pennsylvania state Senate, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/1, 2.11M) that Pennsylvania's May 16 legislative primaries have been called "a 'political massacre,' an 'earthquake' and 'payback.'" Pundits, editorial writers and political analysts "are still trying to figure out what led to the defeat of 16 incumbent state legislators -- including Pennsylvania's top two state Senate Republicans -- at the hands of underfunded, and in several cases -- including mine -- unknown challengers." Folmer adds, "It was as if the Republican Party leadership in the state capitol had forgotten everything they'd been taught by Ronald Reagan -- that the core values of the Republican Party were lower taxes, less spending and limited government. Then came the notorious pay raise, and the camel's back was broken." Folmer concludes, "I have confidence that the Pennsylvania Republican Party can move forward victoriously not only this coming fall but in future elections. Yet in order to do so, it is imperative that we do not forget the principles that made the Republican Party great. In many ways, then, the Pennsylvania situation mirrors that of the country as a whole."

Perry Signs Texas Property Tax Cut. Texas Gov, Rick Perry has signed legislation to cut property taxes by nearly $16 billion over the next two years. The New York Times (6/1, Barnes, 1.19M) reports that the legislation also provides a $2,000 raise to public school teachers. The measure "was passed in a special session to bring the Texas public school system into compliance with a State Supreme Court order. The one-third reduction in property tax revenue would be offset by a new, higher levy on business, a $1 per-pack increase in cigarette taxes and a portion of the state's $8 billion treasury surplus."

In Reversal, US Offers To Participate In Direct Talks With Iran. In what's being depicted as a surprising policy-shift, the United States yesterday offered to join direct negotiations with Iran over its nuclear program -- under the conditions that Iran cease enriching uranium and permit greater access to United Nations nuclear inspectors. Iran's official news agency called the offer "propaganda." The story is generating extensive media coverage, leading all three networks last night. Reports generally describe the US "reversal" as the right move, and a very momentous one at that.

However, many are also portraying the Administration as acting under strong pressure. The Financial Times (6/1, Dinmore, Khalaf), for example, headlines its story "Bush Bows To Pressure And Offers Iran Talks," and the New York Times (6/1, Sanger, 1.19M), in an analysis piece titled

"Bush's Realization On Iran: No Good Choice Left Except Talks," says Bush "reversed course on Wednesday because it was made clear to him -- by his allies, by the Russians, by the Chinese, and eventually by some of his advisers -- that he no longer had a choice." The Washington Post (6/1, Kessler, 744K), meanwhile, reports the move "underscores a central truth of diplomacy today: Nuclear weapons buy leverage." The story also calls the decision "the biggest foreign policy shift" of Bush's presidency.

ABC World News Tonight (5/31, lead story, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "It is a seismic change in US policy. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the US is now willing to join direct talks with Iran about its nuclear program, if Iran would suspend that program. It is a big if." ABC (Karl) added, "The Bush Administration is offering to talk to the Iranians, for the first time since Iranian radicals took Americans hostage more than a quarter century ago." President Bush: "I thought it was important for the United States to take the lead, along with our partners. And that's what you're seeing. You're seeing robust diplomacy." Karl: "It's a major policy shift," noting that Secretary of State Rice had previously said "we don't need to talk about it." The offer, said ABC, "won praise from Bush Administration critics who called it long overdue."

Knight Ridder (6/1, Strobel, Landay) reports the offer "is part of a package of proposals to Iran that Rice and her European, Russian and Chinese counterparts hope to finalize Thursday in Vienna, Austria." The Washington Times (6/1, Kralev, 90K) notes "the Bush administration ruled out establishing diplomatic relations with Iran at any time soon, saying the proposal was meant only to 'enhance' the prospect of peacefully resolving the nuclear dispute."

The AP (6/1, Gearan) reports "the overture to join stalled European talks came after mounting pressure on the US from European allies." The Los Angeles Times (61, Richter, Rubin, 958K) says "the White House has heard calls to negotiate from a wide variety of sources, including European officials. But some administration members, including Vice President Dick Cheney, have resisted, fearing that talks could only give the Iranian leadership more stature and more time to advance a weapons program."

The New York Times (6/1, Weisman, 1.19M) also reports, "Skepticism from Vice President Dick Cheney and others who have opposed concessions to Iran was overcome, the officials said, when it was realized that refusal to move toward the European view would mean that the administration would be blamed for failing to do its utmost to defuse the crisis, making it harder to rally world opinion against Iran."

The Chicago Tribune (6/1, Silva, 643K) refers to "a sharp change of course that reflects a more pragmatic approach," and the Wall Street Journal (6/1, Solomon, King, 2.11M) describes the move as an "abrupt shift" and "a nod to European allies' desire to offer carrots as well as sticks to steer Iran away from its efforts to produce weapons-grade uranium."

"Senior Administration Official" Calls Move Tactical, Not Strategic Change. CNN's The Situation Room (5/31, Quijano) reported a "senior administration official" said "a short time ago that in fact this does not represent in their view a strategic shift by the United States but rather a change in tactics. He says that President Bush did not in fact give the final go ahead for this decision until this morning. This is, though, something that the President and others have been working on for quite some time."

Rice Defends US Decision In TV Interviews. Rice granted a number of TV interviews yesterday to explain and defend the US policy change. On NBC Nightly News (5/31, lead story, 3:50, Gregory, 9.87M) Rice said, "What the Iranians are being offered is not concessions. They're being offered a set of incentives if they are prepared to do what the world needs them to do." Gregory: "Rice insisted Iran's intransigence is not paying off." Secretary Rice: "Iran is continuing its behavior at its own peril, because this process of moving Iran toward isolation has also been continuing." Gregory: "US officials and outside experts also see today's overture toward Iran as the best way to toughen the resolve of US allies and move them toward the Bush Administration position." On the CBS Evening News (5/31, lead story, 2:55, Axelrod, 7.66M) Rice was shown saying, "The reason that we're doing it is we want to know if negotiations are a real option; if Iran accepts the offer and suspends its enrichment activities, all the better. Now, if they don't then we have to be on another course."

Rice said on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (5/31) that it is "important that we know whether or not there is truly a negotiating option or not. It's time to give the Iranians a clear choice: If they're prepared to negotiate, then the world should be prepared to negotiate. We should be prepared to negotiate. But if they're not, then we need to get on with the kinds of penalties that can be brought through the Security Council so that we can bring enough pressure on the Iranian regime to make it make a different choice." Rice later noted, "The Iranians now have a choice. They can say that, yes, they're prepared to suspend and thereby get into negotiations, or they can say that they're not prepared to suspend" enrichment and related activities.

Rice said on MSNBC's Hardball (5/31) that the announcement "puts a kind of moment of truth if you will, a moment for decision for Iran before us. The Iranians have been -- want to say, 'Oh, we might be interested in negotiations on the Russian package. Oh, we might be interested in the European negotiations again.' But this is a clear choice for Iran."

Rice was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (5/31) if this announcement looks "like the United States is making concessions to what you would regard as a terrorist regime." Rice said, "The United States is supporting an international consensus that's been developing for the last year-and-a-half that Iran must not be allowed to get a nuclear weapon, that Iran has but one choice and that is to abandon its nuclear weapons ambitions, or it can face the path of isolation. That's what the United States is supporting here." Rice added, "The United States is holding to conditions that have been set for some time with Iran, conditions that we have been supporting in the negotiations with the European three, that Iran must first suspend verifiably and fully its enrichment activities."

Rice said on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (5/31), "The important thing to note this not just about the United States and Iran. This is about Iran and the entire international community. We have been successful in building a consensus around the view that Iran can't have a nuclear weapon, that they have to suspend the program and go back to negotiates and that if it is going to have a nuclear program has to have one without the proliferation risk of having the fuel cycle on Iranian territory. That is what is at stake for Iran is isolation."

Bolton Says US Will Not Compromise On Precondition That Iran Suspend Nuclear Program. US Ambassador to the UN John Bolton was asked on Fox News' Your World with Neil Cavuto (5/31) about Iran's claim that the US' demand that it agree to multilateral talks soon is nothing but a propaganda move. Bolton said, "I hope this is not a real reaction from Iran. I think it's important that they take a very careful look at what Secretary Rice laid out today, because it really is their last chance, in many respects. She is saying that we're prepared to sit down at the table with Iran if they fully suspend their uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities. So, that's a -- that's a major effort on our part to avoid this being a discussion about what's the United States doing wrong and get it back to the real point, which is what Iran is doing wrong." Asked how the US would react if Iran says it will not give up enrichment activity until talks start, Bolton said, "No, this is -- I think Secretary Rice was very clear on this today, that this is a precondition, on which we're not going to compromise. … If they're not willing to do that, the other alternative is clear, too, is that we will move for economic and political sanctions to make it clear to them what their choice is."

Allies Praise US Overture. CNN's The Situation Room (5/31, Blitzer) reported, "European allies are applauding President Bush's new overture toward Iran, and perhaps none more so than Britain's Tony Blair. A European diplomat tells our John King that getting the US. involved with talks with Iran was a top priority for Tony Blair during his meetings with the president last week. A US official says the administration had been moving toward that position for some time, but he doesn't dispute that Blair's influence helped sway the way with President Bush." USA Today (6/1, Slavin, 2.31M) reports France, Germany and Britain "welcomed the US offer."

On its front page, the Washington Post (6/1, A1, Fletcher, Kessler, 744K) reports, "Senior Chinese and Russian officials welcomed the U.S. offer of direct talks, saying it showed an increased willingness to pursue diplomatic means to resolve the budding nuclear crisis."

Oil Prices Decline On Report Of Diplomatic Outreach To Iran. The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 2, 0:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "News that the US is offering conditionally to talk with Iran sent oil prices lower today. They fell 74 cents to close at $71.29 a barrel." The Wall Street Journal (6/1, Farivar, 2.11M) says that "in the past, Iran has offered to suspend its controversial nuclear-enrichment program to find a way out of the crisis, and the surprise US diplomatic overture triggered a knee-jerk selloff in oil futures." USA Today (6/1, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) runs a similar report.

Hardliners In Iran Said To Face Dilemma. The Washington Times (6/1, Sands, 90K) reports, "Iranian hard-liners, led by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, faced a dilemma of their own after yesterday's announcement by the Bush administration that it was ready to join talks over Iran's suspected nuclear programs." The US policy shift "will be seen as a victory for the tough line of the government," said A. William Samii, an Iranian political analyst for Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, "but it's a tricky question of how best to respond."

Blackwill Says Military Option Should Not Be Discarded. Robert D. Blackwill, deputy national security adviser for strategic planning and presidential envoy to Iraq in 2003-2004, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/1, 2.11M), "The use of American military force against Iran's nuclear infrastructure would obviously carry great risk. But acquiescing in an Iranian nuclear weapons capability would be deeply dangerous for the US and likeminded democracies for decades to come. It would be regarded by the entire world, friend and foe alike, as a strategic defeat for the US, and produce a major shift toward Iran in the balance of power in the Greater Middle East. … Given the extraordinary stakes involved, ignoring the military option and hoping that we will somehow be rescued by sanctions, new negotiating mechanisms, or the Iranian mullahs is a serious mistake."

Opinion Pages Generally Supportive Of US Move. Under the headline "Rice Makes The Right Move On Iran," the Los Angeles Times (6/1, 958K) editorializes Bush "has made a u-turn -- and not a moment too soon." The Times goes on to call Rice's announcement "a courageous and historic about-face that offers hope of ending the hostility that has marked US relations with Iran since 1979. "

The Washington Post (6/1, 744K), under the headline "A Smart Approach To Iran," says in an editorial that the offer "was well tailored. By stating its readiness to join the European governments that have been negotiating with

Tehran for several years, the administration may have defused an issue that was impeding its effort to win support for UN sanctions against Iran. … For now, the administration has rightly put the focus on forcing Tehran -- not Washington -- to make a choice."

The Wall Street Journal (6/1, 2.11M) editorializes that the US move is "a surprising policy reversal" adding that "in theory, Condi's gambit could help to expose Iran's real intentions should it refuse to negotiate seriously. In theory, too, a determined US could use the direct talks to insist that Tehran undertake a Libyan-like dismantling of its nuclear facilities, complete with random and intrusive inspections." But "yesterday's proposal demands nothing so comprehensive, and the potential sanctions supposedly on the table are still opposed by Russia and China. The ultimate sanction of military force isn't even hinted at, much less on the table. … If this gambit fails, she'll have succeeded mainly in giving the mullahs more time to become a terrorist nuclear power."

USA Today (6/1, 2.31M) editorializes, "The administration's policy turnaround is welcome and badly needed. The question is why it took so long."

David Brooks writes in the New York Times (6/1, 1.19M), "What Rice did was set off a chain of events that could lead to a UN resolution on Iranian sanctions as early as July. Diplomats, book your New York hotel rooms today." Brooks adds, "It's still hard to believe the international community can really get its act together. (Have the U.S. and the Russians and the Chinese really forged an agreement on sanctions, or just fudged their differences?) But this display of competence causes me to remember that over the past several weeks this administration has done a number of things well (the nominations of Michael Hayden and Henry Paulson, to name just two). Maybe there's life in this presidency yet."

Palestinian Rocket Hits Home In Israel. The New York Times (6/1, 1.19M) reports that a Palestinian rocket was fired into Sederot, a residential area in southern Israel that is often the target of Palestinian fire from the Gaza Strip, early Wednesday. According to the Times, "No one was hurt, but the rocket damaged the house." The Times adds, "Later Wednesday, the Israeli military fired artillery rounds into northern Gaza. No casualties were immediately reported."

Ricciardone Delivers Nuanced Message On Egyptian Democratization. The AFP (6/1) reports US Ambassador to Egypt Frank Ricciardone, in a speech to Cairo's AmCham, "urged Egypt to pursue 'bold' reforms, but insisted that Washington has no interest in drastic changes that could spark chaos. 'Contrary to folklore, we do not, we do not confuse change with chaos. We do support bold but well-managed, wisely-led, purposeful change.'" AFP continues, "The US ambassador described as 'very harsh' the five-year jail sentence of opposition leader Ayman Nur for fraud in what Egypt insists is a criminal not a political case. … 'I would have wished that it turned out differently.'"

Bush Offers To Help Catch Perpetrators Of Rwandan Genocide. During an Oval Office meting with Rwandan President Paul Kagame, President Bush called the 1994 genocide of a half-million people in Rwanda "one of the most significant tragedies in modern history." The AP (6/1) reports that Bush "said the United States would give any help the country wanted to track down those responsible who are still at large." In addition, Bush "pledged to help repay the country for troops that it has sent to deal with another genocide." He said "the money will come from a supplemental spending bill that is being considered by Congress that also includes funding for U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan and to aid Hurricane Katrina victims."

Darfur Rebel Group Refuses To Sign Peace Deal. The AP (6/1, Zerdin) reports that a Darfur rebel group yesterday rejected a peace deal aimed at ending the fighting in Sudan's western region. The African Union-drafted accord "was signed May 5 by the government and main Sudan Liberation Movement, but both a splinter group of the Liberation Movement and the Justice and Equality Movement have resisted international calls to accept the deal."

AFP (6/1, Westerhoff) reports that the deadline for holdout Darfur rebels to the peace deal "passed with no new signatories, AU officials said. … The holdout groups have refused to sign the accord aimed at ending three years of conflict in Darfur, which has left some 300,000 people dead and 2.4 million homeless."

Violence Erupts Again In East Timor. The AP (6/1, Deutsch) reports that youths wielding machetes battled in East Timor's capital yesterday. The AP adds, "After a lull in violence Tuesday, street fights broke out in several parts of the smoldering city Wednesday. Roaming bands of youths fired sling shots, threw rocks and hacked rivals with machetes."

AFP (6/1, Sands) reports, "East Timor's rebel leader rejected an agreement designed to end days of violence in the tiny nation that has forced tens of thousands to flee and demanded the sacking of the embattled prime minister. As gang violence and arson attacks again broke out across the capital Dili, Major Alfredo Reinado said Wednesday President Xanana Gusmao made a 'mistake' by assuming emergency powers but not sacking Prime Minister Mari Alkatiri."

US Signs Off On WTO Membership For Vietnam. The Washington Times (6/1, Sparshott, 90K) reports that the US has signed off on an agreement that will allow Vietnam to join the WTO. The pact "removes one of the last hurdles barring the communist nation from joining the world's capitalist club. … Congress still must vote on WTO membership for Vietnam. The Bush administration hopes that will happen this summer."

Morales Says US Trying To Kill Him. Bloomberg (6/1, Blount) reports, "Bolivian President Evo Morales said the U.S. organized teams to track down and kill him, according to a note published on the Bolivian presidential Web site." Morales "said he recently found out about the plots against him, the state newswire ABI said in the report on the presidential Web site. The allegations are unfounded, U.S. Embassy in La Paz said in a statement sent to journalists by E-mail. Calls to the Bolivian presidential palace requesting comment were not returned."

Chavez Expected To Ask OPEC To Cut Oil Production. The CBS Evening News (5/31, story 3, 2:50, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Iran and other OPEC members are gathering now in Venezuela, where President Hugo Chavez will try to persuade them to cut oil production to keep prices high." CBS (Regan) added Chavez "gets his best opportunity yet to challenge the US when he hosts the world's oil producers at an OPEC conference." John Kilduff, oil analyst, Fimat USA: "The rhetoric, I expect, to be flying out of President Chavez. He'll make the argument that the Western economies have grown to the place they are on the back of cheap oil and it's time for the oil-producing countries to get their just desserts." Regan: "And Venezuela could be in for a second helping. It's already home to the largest proven oil reserves in the Western Hemisphere, with nearly 80 billion barrels, and there's potential to pump even more, much more." Elio Ohep, "editor of the Petroleum World Website, says the recent run-up in oil prices makes the oil's in Venezuela's Orinoco region, once considered too expensive to extract because it's so heavy, so thick and so costly to refine, suddenly worthwhile." Tomorrow, Chavez "will push OPEC to set $50 a barrel as the new rock-bottom price and as Venezuela's energy minister told CBS News, it's not just OPEC that sets the price of oil, but world politics too."

Chavez Says Orinoco Belt Contains 235 Billion Barrels Of Recoverable Oil. The New York Times (6/1, Forero, 1.19M) reports that the Chevron Corporation "has spent about $1 billion" turning oil sludge, which was "once called liquid coal into oil, helping transform a swath of scrub grass into a great frontier for oil production. The region, the Orinoco Belt, is in fact so promising that President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela says it contains up to 235 billion barrels of recoverable oil; if true, the reserves would rival those of Saudi Arabia. … This great, largely untapped treasure is pitting a leftist government aiming to use oil revenue for social programs against multinational corporations like Chevron, which were invited here a decade ago to develop the Orinoco Belt, a 54-square-mile area some 120 miles south of here."

OPEC Considering Membership For Sudan, Angola. The Financial Times (6/1, Hoyos) reports that OPEC is considering expanding its membership for the first time in more than 30 years. Oil ministers "were awaiting the report of Nigeria, the group's current president, on invitations of membership to Sudan and Angola. The pair, who are observer members, are two of the world's fastest-growing oil producers. … Their membership would boost OPEC's share of world oil supply from 41 per cent to 43 per cent. But the move would be likely to anger the US and China as well as almost every big international oil company."

Lebanese Politicians Vow To Disarm Palestinian Militias. The New York Times (6/1, Fattah, 1.19M) reports, "Lebanese politicians have begun focusing attention on the Palestinian militias as a critical security issue and have vowed to disarm them. … The Palestinian militias that persist in Lebanon -- and run checkpoints like the one in Naameh -- are mostly rogue groups like Fatah Intifada and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command." Lebanese officials "note that in recent confrontations with the Lebanese Army, their ranks have swelled. The officials accuse Syria of resupplying them with weaponry."

Downfall Of South Korea's Liberal Leadership Seen As Likely In 2007. The Christian Science Monitor (6/1, Kirk, 61K) reports, "The perception of a central government unable to deal with economic problems and weak in the face of North Korean demands lies at the crux of a reaction that guaranteed conservative victories in two-thirds of the races for provincial governorships and mayors of major cities. For Korea, the reversion to conservatism portends the downfall of a decade of liberal leadership in the next presidential election in December 2007."

Indian Economy Grew 9.3% In First Quarter. The Wall Street Journal (6/1, Wonacott, Venkat, 2.11M) reports, India's economy grew 9.3% in the quarter ended March 31 from a year earlier, marking a broad display of momentum on par with China's red-hot growth. … India's solid recent economic performance has raised the prospect of two Asian giants expanding at double-digit rates, spinning off new jobs and buying more of what the world grows and produces."

Investigation Finds Abuse Of AIDS Funds In Uganda. The Christian Science Monitor (6/1, Scheier, 61K) reports on the investigation into the misuse of funds from the Global fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria in Uganda. According to the Monitor, "A government inquiry recently revealed that tens of millions of dollars of the country's Global Fund grants have gone missing, much of it plundered by high-ranking public officials. Through months of hearings, which began in September and concluded just a few weeks ago, a disgusted Ugandan public heard how monies meant for lifesaving AIDS drugs were spent on personal phone bills, lavish 'Christmas packages,' and fancy four-wheel drive vehicles." The scandal "highlights the corrosive nature of corruption in Africa and demonstrates the difficulties donors face in giving recipient governments the autonomy needed to spend aid money efficiently while also making sure the funds are used appropriately."

Death Toll In Indonesian Earthquake Rises To Over 6,200. ABC World News Tonight (5/31, story 8, :25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The numbers keep getting worse in Indonesia after Saturday's devastating earthquake. The latest, more than 6,200 people dead, 30,000 injured and nearly 650,000 homeless. That last number three times what was originally estimated. The United Nations says the crisis may be easing a bit now that aid workers from more than 20 countries have arrived."

Earthquake Devastated Cradle Of Javanese Art And Culture. The New York Times (6/1, Gelling, 1.19M) reports that the region affected by the Indonesian earthquake "is part of the ancient kingdom of Yogyakarta, the cradle of Javanese art and culture, making it one of the most popular tourist destinations in Indonesia. … In this region, thousands of shops make and sell handicrafts, traditional batik clothing, musical instruments and ceramic sculptures, many of them exported to the United States and Europe. … In the aftermath of the earthquake, many of these contemporary artists are mobilizing relief and offering their studios as temporary shelters. Others are trying to salvage mangled paintings from ruined workshops."

EU Warns Of Higher Risks Posed By Bird Flu. The Financial Times (6/1, Jack) reports, "Europe's disease control agency will on Thursday warn governments to accelerate their preparations for a flu pandemic in the face of an increased risk the bird flu virus could mutate into a form more dangerous to humans in the near future." In its latest public health risk report, the European Centre for Disease Prevention and Control (ECDC) will say there are "many good reasons...to continue and intensify" preparations, including "boosting cooperation among countries and between health, agriculture and other government departments within each nation." Chief of these reasons, the report says, "is the spread of the virus since January into a broad range of birds, including migratory species that travel widely."

Outbreaks May Be Unreported In China, Indonesia. The Wall Street Journal Online (6/1) reports in its daily bird flu column that "outbreaks of H5N1 may be underreported in Indonesia and China, and the virus could be more widespread in Africa than authorities know," said experts gathered at a UN-sponsored conference in Rome on the disease. "Poor monitoring and lack of compensation mechanisms that encourage farmers to report animal deaths" were cited as possible causes.

Iran's Bahai Minority Says Government Trying To Eradicate Them. The New York Times (6/1, Goodstein, 1.19M) reports, "Members of the Bahai religious minority in Iran said this week that the government had recently intensified a campaign of arrests, raids and propaganda that was aimed at eradicating their religion in Iran, the country of its birth." These developments "have alarmed human rights monitors at the United Nations, who say that since December, the government newspaper in Tehran has published more than 30 articles denigrating the Bahai faith -- even accusing Bahais of sacrificing Muslim children on holy days."

Conservative Saudi Women Defend Traditional Islamic Values. The Washington Post (6/1, A12, Ambah, 744K) reports that a group of conservative Saudi women are "trying to redress what they view as an erosion of traditional values in the kingdom and a dangerous shift in the status of women." The changes that have riled these women "followed the intense scrutiny that Saudi Arabia received after the discovery that 15 of the 19 hijackers who carried out the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States were Saudis. The lack of personal liberties in the kingdom…was widely held to be an underlying part of the extremist ideology the attackers shared." The new atmosphere "has alarmed conservative women who are suspicious of US. interference and warn that changes in their status could destroy the country's Islamic framework."

Unrest In Paris Suburbs Sparks Fear Of Fall Riots' Return. The Washington Post (6/1, A12, Moore, 744K) reports that a second night of unrest in the Paris suburbs has sparked fears "of a return of the disturbances that inflamed 300 French towns and suburbs last fall. The violence of the last two nights…was sparked in part by mounting resentment toward the mayor of the northeastern Paris suburb of Montfermeil, who in recent weeks imposed a law prohibiting 15- to 18-year-olds from gathering in groups of more than three and requiring anyone under 16 to be accompanied by an adult on city streets after 8 p.m."

NYTimes Says Nations Watering Down AIDS Plan. An editorial in the New York Times (6/1, 1.19M) says that worldwide, the AIDS epidemic "seems to have more energy than efforts to fight it. This week, "United Nations members are meeting in a follow-up to the successful U.N. special session in 2001, which pushed the world to take AIDS more seriously. … The nations now are supposed to be reporting on whether their targets are being met, and devising a plan of action for the next few years. Instead, they are watering down the original plan. Ideologues, led by Washington, are taking out commitments to key programs, and wealthy nations worried about cost are replacing concrete goals with vague statements. AIDS groups fear the world is moving backward. … Apparently the Bush administration feels the need to make room for strategies that are not proven to work."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Calif. Man Pleads Guilty In Terror Case (AP-Y2)

By Don Thompson, Associated Press Writer

AP2, June 1, 2006

A man pleaded guilty Wednesday to a lesser charge rather than be retried on allegations that he lied to the FBI about his son's attendance at a terrorist training camp, according to court papers.

Under a deal, Umer Hayat, 48, an ice cream vendor, pleaded guilty to lying to customs agents about more than $28,000 he and family members were carrying on a trip to Pakistan three years ago. In exchange, prosecutors agreed to drop charges that he lied to the FBI and to recommend he serve no more jail time after spending nearly a year behind bars.

"This outcome was not, of course, the one most desired by the government," said U.S. Attorney McGregor Scott. "However ... our region is safer today than it was one year ago."

Hayat smiled as he left the federal courthouse, but he would not comment. He will be under house arrest until his Aug. 18 sentencing.

"He's happy. It's over. Obviously he wants to move on with his life at this point," said defense lawyer Johnny Griffin III. "From Day One we've maintained that Umer Hayat is not a terrorist; he had no involvement with terrorist-related conduct or activities."

His first trial ended last month in a mistrial after the jury deadlocked on two counts alleging that he lied to the FBI. The retrial had been scheduled to begin Monday.

He admitted in court Wednesday that he lied in April 2003 when he denied his family was carrying more than $10,000 in cash when he was detained on a jetway at Washington-Dulles International Airport.

Federal agents found two envelopes containing $5,000 each in his pants, two similar envelopes in his son's pockets and $8,053 being carried by his wife. He gave several explanations, including the cash was from several relatives to be used as wedding gifts for his son and daughter.

It was on that trip that his son, Hamid Hayat, attended a terrorist training camp, prosecutors said. But Scott said there is no indication the money was to be used for any terrorist activity.

Hamid Hayat, 23, was convicted of supporting terrorism by attending an al-Qaida training camp in Pakistan in 2003 and lying to the FBI. He faces at least 30 years in prison.

Umer Hayat's plea closes another chapter in the case of terrorist-related activities in the small city of Lodi — about 35 miles south of the state capital — which is better known for growing wine grapes.

The government's investigation into Lodi's 2,500-member Pakistani community began after agents received a tip in 2001 that local businesses were sending money to terrorist groups abroad.

That probe produced no results, but it led agents to an informant, Naseem Khan, 32, a Pakistani native who moved to the U.S. as a teenager. He targeted a pair of local imams and then befriended Hamid Hayat.

Khan recorded phone calls from the younger Hayat after he left for Pakistan. Some of the calls showed Khan urging Hayat to attend a jihadi camp, but defense lawyers claimed there was no evidence Hamid Hayat went to such a camp.

While the government presented no evidence of a terrorism network during the nine-week trial, the case centered on videotaped confessions the two Hayats gave to FBI agents.

Their lawyers claimed that the confessions came after hours of leading questioning, and that their clients merely told the FBI what they thought the agents wanted to hear.

The investigation became public a year ago when authorities arrested the Hayats and detained two local imams. The clerics and one of their sons were later deported for immigration violations. The Hayats were the only people criminally charged in the probe.

Lodian pleads guilty to lying to customs agents about money, charges unrelated to terrorism

DOJ_NMG_0030662

Umer Hayat, who had been charged with two counts of lying about terrorism, pleaded guilty Wednesday — but not to terror-related charges. Instead, the Lodi man acknowledged lying to customs agents by denying he was carrying $28,000 when he took a trip to Pakistan several years ago.

And, instead of facing up to 16 years in prison on the previous charges, the U.S. Attorney's Office is recommending a sentence of 11 months, the time Hayat already served in jail, and be placed on three years of felony supervised release.

Hayat, 48, remains on home detention and is scheduled to be sentenced Aug. 18. The actual sentence will be up to U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr., who could sentence Hayat to as much as five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Federal sentencing guidelines, however, call for a sentence of zero to six months behind bars.

Defense attorney Johnny L. Griffin III was happy with the deal, saying his client had always been willing to admit that he lied to customs agents. The government dismissed the terror-related charges with prejudice, meaning they can never again bring those charges against Hayat.

"I consider this a victory because I said from day one that Umer Hayat was not a terrorist, nor was he ever involved in terrorism," Griffin said.

U.S. Attorney McGregor Scott disagreed that the deal was a victory for the defense.

"(Hayat) is now a convicted felon, and he wasn't yesterday," Scott told the News-Sentinel. "(He) will remain on very strict supervised release by the probation department for the next three years and if he violates any of the terms, he's going back into custody."

Hayat and his 23-year-old son, Hamid Hayat, went on trial in mid-February with separate juries. Umer Hayat's jurors spent nine days deliberating before they told Burrell that they were "decisively deadlocked" on April 25. They split 7-5 and 6-6 on the two counts. Prosecutors had said they would retry the Lodi man, but have since decided to settle the case.

"This outcome was not, of course, the one most desired by the government," Scott said earlier Wednesday in a written statement, adding that prosecutors still believe Umer Hayat lied about terrorism, but had to consider the evenly divided jury.

"I have been a prosecutor for many years and am well acquainted with the challenges of retrying a case with those sorts of juror splits, given our duty to prove a case beyond a reasonable doubt to all 12 members of the jury," Scott said.

The plea deal came just days before Umer Hayat was scheduled to face his second trial on two counts of lying to the FBI. He was accused of denying that he had personal knowledge of terror training camps in Pakistan, and of knowing that his son attended the camps.

Umer Hayat

Because prosecutors dismissed those charges Wednesday, the ice cream vendor only stands convicted of declaring the wrong amount of money when he and his family went to Pakistan on April 19, 2003.

When customs officers stopped the Hayat family at Washington-Dulles International Airport, Umer Hayat said he was not carrying any money. Inspector David Martinez told him amounts totaling more than $10,000 must be declared, and Umer Hayat then showed two envelopes containing $5,000 each.

Twice more, he said the family was not carrying any other money, but agents then found $10,000 on Hamid Hayat and $8,053 on Umer Hayat's wife.

After assessing a fine of about $2,000, agents ultimately returned the rest of the money. During pre-trial proceedings, community members signed affidavits declaring they had sent the money with the Hayats to deliver to family members in Pakistan.

News of the plea was welcome for Woodbridge resident Debra Kiriu, who served as forewoman of Umer Hayat's jury. The jury was never told of the $28,000, though the customs agent traveled from Washington, D.C., for the trial. He testified for eight minutes.

"I'm glad to see that he came forward and said, 'Yes, I did lie,'" Kiriu said Wednesday evening. "I don't know if he just didn't know the laws at the time. It's hard to say. That's what's hard about the case: He's been here for 30 years and by then he should know the laws."

DOJ_NMG_0030663

Umer Hayat is a naturalized U.S. citizen, and his son was born in California, meaning that neither is eligible for deportation to another country.

The deal will not likely affect the case against his son, said Hamid Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, because Umer Hayat did not plead guilty to anything related to terrorism.

A second jury spent eight days in deliberations before convicting Hamid Hayat of all four charges against him, which include three counts of lying to the FBI and one count of providing material support, in the form of himself, to terrorists.

Hamid Hayat's sentencing has been postponed until at least November because his attorney has asked for a new trial amidst allegations of jury misconduct.

Wednesday's plea deal came five days shy of June 5, the one-year mark since the Hayats were arrested during a high-profile investigation involving dozens of FBI agents swarming through Lodi.

Trial testimony ultimately revealed that the case had been underway for years and that a paid FBI informant, Naseem Khan, had infiltrated Lodi's Pakistani community and secretly recorded conversations. He was initially assigned in late 2001 to get close to two imams, or Muslim religious leaders, but the following summer he met Hamid Hayat, who was 10 years his junior.

The two became friends, and recordings played in court revealed an informant who repeatedly mentioned getting "training" in Pakistan and talked about violent jihad, or war against enemies of Islam.

What secured prosecutors a conviction was Hamid Hayat's videotaped interview with FBI agents. They questioned him for hours and then, when he began to change his story, turned on the video recorder. Hamid Hayat described various camps and often repeated what agents told him, but jurors decided he gave enough information to convict him.

Despite the fact that Umer Hayat has not been convicted of any terror charges, Scott, the U.S. Attorney, said the community is safer now that the Hayats have felony convictions and the two imams have been deported.

Kiriu said she thinks Lodi residents will probably be glad to hear that the case is resolved, rather than having the national media continue focusing on Lodi as a possible terrorist center.

Whether the investigation is truly over, though, remains undisclosed.

"There continue to be people of interest to us and I really can't say anything beyond that," Scott said.

Deal And Guilty Plea In Terrorism (NYT)

By Jesse McKinley

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, May 31 — Federal prosecutors in Sacramento announced Wednesday that they had obtained a guilty plea from a Pakistani-American ice cream truck driver who was accused of lying to the authorities during a terrorism investigation.

The driver, Umer Hayat, agreed to plead guilty to lying to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and customs officials about how much money he was carrying on a trip from California to Pakistan in 2003, said McGregor W. Scott, a United States attorney for the Eastern District of California. Mr. Hayat had told officials during a stopover in Washington that he and his family were carrying less than $10,000, while prosecutors said the amount was more than $28,000.

Mr. Hayat, 48, had been expected to face trial next week on more serious charges of lying to federal investigators in relation to his son, Hamid, who was convicted on April 25 of lying to federal agents and providing material support to terrorists by attending a training camp of Al Qaeda in 2003. A separate jury had deadlocked on charges against the elder Mr. Hayat on the same day, but prosecutors had sought to retry him.

The plea puts at least a temporary end to an inquiry that disrupted the rural town of Lodi, where the Hayats live in a close-knit Muslim community. It also brings to a close a federal prosecution that raised questions about government interrogation techniques. Both Hayats had submitted confessions to investigators despite limited English, an element that some legal experts say could open their convictions to appeal.

In a statement on Wednesday, Mr. Scott, the prosecutor, seemed to strike a victorious note. "After 9/11, the U.S. Justice Department's top priority is to detect, disrupt, and deter future acts of terrorism," he said. "This mission was accomplished."

DOJ_NMG_0030664

In exchange for his plea, federal officials said they would dismiss all previous charges and recommend that Umer Hayat receive a sentence of three years supervised release. Since his arrest in 2005, Mr. Hayat has served 330 days in jail and 30 days of home confinement, prosecutors said. Sentencing is Aug. 18.

Lodi Man Is Released In Plea Bargain (LAT)

By Rone Tempest And Eric Bailey

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

SACRAMENTO — Federal prosecutors Wednesday agreed to drop terrorism-related charges against Lodi ice cream truck driver Umer Hayat in exchange for a guilty plea in a 2003 customs case.

Hayat, 48, who spent nearly a year in jail and under house arrest on the charges, was released for time served. Six weeks ago, a hopelessly split jury failed to reach a verdict in his case.

"This outcome, of course, was not the one most desired by the government," said U.S. Atty. McGregor Scott. The government still believes the original charges that Umer Hayat lied to FBI agents about his 23-year-old son, Hamid Hayat's, 2003-04 attendance at a terrorist training camp in Pakistan, he added.

But Scott said retrying a case that had resulted in a mistrial was too daunting. "It was my decision that the felony plea we announce here today was the best resolution of this matter for the government," he said.

In April, another jury found the younger Hayat guilty of all four counts against him. Hamid Hayat, scheduled for sentencing in July, faces up to 39 years in federal prison.

But the jury in the father's case deadlocked 7 to 5 and 6 to 6 on the two charges against him. As a result, the government Wednesday allowed Umer Hayat to plead guilty to charges that he lied to customs agents at Dulles International Airport in Virginia on April 19, 2003, about the amount of money he and his family were carrying on their way to Pakistan.

Federal law requires individuals to declare amounts exceeding $10,000. Customs officials found that the Hayat family had more than $28,000 they said they were planning to use for Hamid Hayat's upcoming wedding.

Defense attorney Johnny L. Griffin described the plea bargain as a victory for Umer Hayat, who he said had been unfairly branded as a terrorist.

"There is no way we were ever going to agree to any plea involving terrorism," Griffin said outside the Sacramento Federal Courthouse, "because it was not true."

Umer Hayat, smiling broadly at Griffin's side, declined to comment.

Although Scott said the plea deal was a setback for the government, he added that the customs conviction of Umer Hayat, terrorism conviction of his son and deportation of Lodi's two Muslim religious leaders on visa violations amounted to success for the government.

"Our region is much safer today than it was one year ago," Scott said.

The four-year investigation of Lodi's large Muslim community began in late 2001 after a Bend, Ore., convenience store clerk and former Lodi resident told FBI agents that he had seen known Al Qaeda terrorists worshiping in the Lodi mosque in 1999 and 2000.

The FBI quickly determined that the sightings were false but hired the store clerk, Pakistani Naseem Khan, as an undercover paid informant and sent him into the Lodi community, where he secretly recorded hundreds of hours of conversations with fellow Muslims. No evidence surfaced of any Al Qaeda connections.

Hayat Pleads Guilty To Lesser Charge In Lodi Terror Case (SACBEE)

A Lodi man charged with lying to the FBI about terrorist ties pleaded guilty Wednesday in Sacramento federal court to making a false statement to customs officials in 2003 about how much money he and his family were carrying on their way out of the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0030665

Prosecutors agreed that, at the time of Umer Hayat's sentencing on Aug. 18, they will seek dismissal of charges that Hayat lied about his son's terrorist training in Pakistan and his own firsthand knowledge of such training when he was initially questioned by FBI agents in June.

The prosecutors also agreed to recommend that the nearly 11 months Hayat served in jail awaiting trial be his sentence for lying at Dulles International Airport about the amount of money he and his family were carrying to Pakistan.

The plea deal came four days before a second trial of Hayat on the terrorist-related charges was scheduled to start. The first trial ended April 25 with a deadlocked jury and a mistrial.

Privacy Fiasco That Needlessly Undermines Security (FT)

By Richard Falkenrath

Financial Times, June 1, 2006

Suppose a terrorist, a Dutch national, arrives at Amsterdam's Schiphol Airport and buys a one-way ticket on the daily KLM flight to New York. Like the September 11 2001 hijackers, he travels under his real name. US authorities have uncovered his identity and placed him on the terrorist watch list. The question is: will he be caught and, if so, when?

Currently, even if the US authorities had provided this terrorist's name to Dutch or European authorities, there is no watch-listing system in either jurisdiction that would have identified him as he purchased his international ticket or transited through Dutch immigration control. Moreover, because he is a Dutch national he would not have been required to apply for a visa to enter the US. So he would pass out of Europe undetected.

In all likelihood, however, he would be identified once his flight had left European soil. Under a May 2004 agreement between the US and the European Commission, European airlines were allowed to transmit their passenger manifests to US authorities 15 minutes after take-off. Two days ago, the European Court of Justice annulled this agreement.

The ECJ based its decision on technical legal grounds. It said that the Commission officials with whom the US had been negotiating lacked the legal authority to conclude the agreement. This is a significant, though perhaps temporary, setback for the European Union officials who have been trying to impose some coherence and rigour on Europe's various post-9/11 counter-terrorism and law-enforcement activities. It is also, in Washington, an unpleasant reminder of Henry Kissinger's famous line from three decades ago: "You say Europe, but can you tell me which number I should call?"

But the court avoided the real issue raised by the accord – the proper balance between the individual's right to privacy and the collective's interest in security in the era of infiltrative, transnational terrorist threats and unbounded computer power.

Huge private-sector databases, such as the airlines' passenger records, can be extremely useful to a government's effort to locate and eliminate terrorist threats. National governments have a responsibility to protect their people and therefore must take seriously new counterterrorism techniques presented by the advance of technology.

Yet a government's access to these private-sector databases raises troubling issues of personal privacy. Privacy advocates, pundits and politicians have raised alarm about a wide variety of such activities initiated in the aftermath of 9/11 – and not without reason. Potentially valuable counterterrorist initiatives such as the US-EU passenger data accord are at risk of foundering for loss of public trust and political support. In the US, the long-standing plan of the Transportation Security Ad-ministration to check the passenger manifests of domestic flights against the terrorist watch list is essentially dead in the water for this reason.

Both the US and Europe need to update their laws governing official access to private-sector databases for security purposes. The European privacy directive dates from 1995 and the US Privacy Act from 1974, so the legal framework on both sides of the Atlantic lags at least a decade behind the technological art of the possible.

But, more important than legal reform, government security services need to update their practices to incorporate that art of the possible. It is no longer necessary for government agencies to acquire and retain an entire private-sector database in order to accomplish a legitimate public purpose. It is now possible for a government to check a watch list anonymously – that is, to check one list of names in a private-sector database against another list of names in a government database in a manner that reveals to the government only those names that match. This is but one of several important new privacy-enhancing technologies that could, if adopted by governments, improve security as well as liberty.

US and European officials are trying to figure out what to do now that the ECJ has scuttled their passenger-data agreement. The first thing they should do is study the ways in which new technologies and procedures can be used to achieve their basic security aims while minimising the impact on personal privacy. In so doing, they may earn back some of the public trust they have lost and become more effective in the long run.

Flying Across The Pond (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

In case you were wondering, it's still safe to board a plane in Europe and fly to the U.S. That's so despite a ruling from the European Court of Justice this week striking down a post-9/11 accord on sharing air-passenger data. Despite some media hyperventilating, there's next-to-no chance Europe's airlines will stop transferring important passenger information to the U.S.

Europe's highest court ruled Tuesday against the 2004 deal between the U.S. and the European Commission on data sharing. The European Parliament had sued, taking umbrage at giving U.S. officials the same information routinely handled by travel agents. Passengers' names, addresses and the number of bags they checked were all deemed more sacrosanct than preventing another terrorist attack.

However, in its ruling the court did not address the issue of privacy rights. Rather, it said the European Commission was wrong to have based the passenger-data deal on EU law regulating commercial activities. This was not a trade matter but one of public security, it said. The court gave the EU 90 days to find a solution, and until then the agreement with the U.S. remains in place.

Since security issues remain in the national domain, the 25 member states will each have to ratify the revised accord. Given that those governments unanimously approved the current deal, this should be no problem. The September 11 attacks were planned and carried out by al Qaeda members based in Germany who freely flew into the U.S., so it is surely reasonable for Washington to seek passenger data prior to arrival across the pond. Europe remains a major recruiting ground for terrorists, and it's good to know most European governments recognize the problem.

War On Terror Breeds Legal Challenges (VOA)

By Jim Malone

Voice of America, June 1, 2006

Al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui remains the only person convicted in connection with the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks. Others who allegedly planned the 9/11 attacks are being held by the U.S. abroad. But as of now, there are no plans to put them on trial.

Moussaoui was sentenced to life in prison after he pled guilty to conspiring with al-Qaida to fly planes into buildings.

But what about some of the alleged planners of the 9/11 attacks now in custody, like Khalid Sheikh Mohammed or Ramzi Binalshibh, who allegedly financed the 19 hijackers on September 11.

U.S. officials say that despite the lengthy and challenging prosecution of Zacarias Moussaoui, criminal prosecution remains an option.

Paul McNulty "The Moussaoui case, I think, demonstrates that we can be successful," said Paul McNulty, the deputy U.S. attorney general. "In our investigations, we will continue to use every tool and authority available to us to identify risks at the earliest stage possible. And in deciding whether to prosecute, we will not wait to see what becomes of risks."

During the court proceedings Moussaoui was known for his disruptive outbursts in court and taunting relatives of victims who had testified.

Legal experts and others wonder if the difficulties on display in the Moussaoui case are making it less likely that the government will want to try the alleged masterminds of the 9/11 attacks in open court.

DOJ_NMG_0030667

Benjamin Wittes has written editorials about the issue in the Washington Post newspaper. He spoke at a forum on the issue sponsored by the American Enterprise Institute in Washington.

"I mean, these are the people we have identified and are in our custody and there seems to be no plans whatsoever to bring them to trial," said Wittes.

Trying terrorist suspects in open court could be risky because the government might be forced to reveal some of its intelligence sources as it presents evidence. Prosecutors would also have to address whether torture was used to obtain confessions.

Neal Katyal, a law professor at Georgetown University Law Center in Washington, believes the Bush administration would prefer to simply detain some of the terror suspects indefinitely.

"I think the federal courts have given the president a fairly robust power to detain enemy combatants and I think they are likely to continue to do that," said Neal Katyal. "And so, folks like Khalid Sheik Mohammed, I think, are going to be detained indefinitely. And given that backdrop, it seems unwise to bring a prosecution in which the results may be acquittal," he said.

The Bush administration could also decide to try some of the al-Qaida suspects in military commissions, also known as military tribunals.

Professor Katyal represents Salim Ahmed Hamdan, now awaiting trial as an enemy combatant at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Hamdan is challenging the Bush administration's right to try terror suspects through military tribunals before the U.S. Supreme Court.

"And he can sue the President of the United States, the most powerful man on earth, in the highest court of the land," Katyal said. "That is something that in any other country, I think I would have to fear for my life and I think Hamdan would have to fear for his. It is something remarkably American about our system."

The Supreme Court is expected to issue a decision before the end of June on the legality of the military commissions.

While it remains unclear what the United States will do with the alleged high profile al-Qaida members in custody, prosecutions of lower-level suspects continue.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty says since the 9/11 attacks, the Justice Department has secured 253 convictions against 435 defendants in terrorism-related cases. Many of those convictions, however, involved minor crimes and immigration violations not directly related to terrorist acts or plots. E-mail This Article

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Anti-Terror Funding Cut In D.C. And New York (WP)

By Dan Eggen And Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

The Department of Homeland Security yesterday slashed anti-terrorism money for Washington and New York, part of an immediately controversial decision to reduce grant funds for major urban areas in the Northeast while providing more to mid-size cities from Jacksonville to Sacramento.

The announcement that the two cities targeted on Sept. 11, 2001, would suffer 40 percent reductions in urban security funds prompted outrage from lawmakers and local officials in both areas, who questioned the wisdom of cutting funds so deeply for cities widely recognized as prime terrorist targets. The decision came less than five months after Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff unveiled changes in the grants plan intended to focus funding on areas facing the gravest risk of attack.

Potential targets outside the Northeast also took painful hits, including New Orleans, San Diego and Phoenix. New Orleans's grants for security and disaster preparedness were cut in half even as it struggles to rebuild after Hurricane Katrina.

In Washington, where the funding dropped from about $77 million to about $46 million, Mayor Anthony A. Williams called the decision "shortsighted."

DOJ_NMG_0030668

New York's grant plummeted from about $207 million to $124 million. A DHS risk scorecard for the city asserted that the home of the Empire State Building and the Brooklyn Bridge has "zero" national monuments or icons.

"As far as I'm concerned, the Department of Homeland Security and the administration have declared war on New York," Rep. Peter T. King (R-N.Y.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, told the Associated Press. "It's a knife in the back to New York, and I'm going to do everything I can to make them very sorry they made this decision."

Homeland Security's grant programs have drawn criticism from cities both large and small; many have felt slighted by what they maintained was a haphazard and unfair distribution plan. This year's round of grants was supposed to ensure that enough money goes to areas at highest risk of terrorist attack by employing risk scores, effectiveness tests and 17 "peer review" panels consisting of homeland security professionals from 47 states.

But department officials struggled yesterday to defend the latest outcome even as lawmakers in both parties denounced them. Most experts and many government officials had expected that the new review process would lead to more money, rather than less, for major terrorist targets such as Washington and New York.

Tracy A. Henke, assistant secretary for grants and training, told reporters that the new funding distribution was the result of a better review process and does not indicate lesser risk for cities such as Washington or New York. Officials noted that Congress had cut the program by about $125 million in 2006, to $711 million, and that New York, Washington and other major cities still would receive the largest shares.

"We have to understand that there is risk throughout the nation," Henke said. "We worked very hard to make sure that there was fairness in the process."

The department refused to release the names of panel members or other details about the review boards.

I. Michael Greenberger, director of the Center for Homeland Safety and Security at the University of Maryland, said the plan doesn't pass the common-sense test.

"It's completely inconsistent," Greenberger said. "Where are our priorities? . . . There can be no doubt that Washington and New York are the biggest potential ground zeroes for any future attack."

The Urban Areas Security Initiative provides money to 46 metropolitan areas. It is part of a broader $1.7 billion grant program at DHS, most of which attracted little controversy because it is divided evenly among states and territories.

In addition to Washington and New York, the grant decisions included a 46 percent drop for San Diego, where several of the Sept. 11 hijackers lived; a 61 percent decrease for Phoenix, where an FBI agent suspected that terrorists were taking flight training; and a 30 percent reduction for Boston, the point of origin of the two jetliners that crashed into the World Trade Center.

Phoenix Mayor Phillip Gordon called the grant reduction from $10 million to $3.9 million "outrageous." He said that Phoenix, the nation's fifth-largest city, includes a network of dams, a nuclear power plant and numerous other potential targets.

"Shame on them," Gordon said. "They are literally stripping the ability to protect this area by actions that are incomprehensible."

Winners included Atlanta, Chicago and Los Angeles, as well as smaller cities such as Louisville (up 70 percent), Charlotte (64 percent) and St. Louis (31 percent). The only notable gain in the Northeast was in the Jersey City-Newark area, where the grant rose from $19 million to $34 million.

Louisville's funding increased from $5 million to $8.5 million, and Mayor Jerry Abramson said the money will be used primarily on a project to improve communications between emergency responders. "A lot of this is about logistical issues that are very important if something were to happen," he said.

Undersecretary for Preparedness George Foresman told reporters that although the program was formed with anti-terrorism objectives in mind, the money is meant to improve readiness for "an act of terrorism or an act of Mother Nature."

Yet one of the big losers was hurricane-ravaged New Orleans, whose grant award dropped from $9.3 million to $4.6 million.

The national capital region, which includes Washington and its suburbs in Maryland and Northern Virginia, had requested $190 million in urban security funds for 2006 -- an optimistic figure that would have represented an enormous increase over the $77 million the region received last year.

DOJ_NMG_0030669

Washington's deputy mayor for public safety, Edward D. Reiskin, said possible cutbacks will include $25 million planned for communications infrastructure and $10 million for "mass care shelters" to house people displaced from their homes.

"I think it's shortsighted for the federal government to cut funds this way," Williams said at his weekly news briefing. "We remain a target area."

Montgomery County's homeland security director, Gordon Aoyagi, said he was stunned by the news, and predicted "a substantive reduction in a number of regional efforts." Robert Crouch, homeland security adviser to Virginia Gov. Tim Kaine (D), said that "there will be some shakeout" because of the cuts.

New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R) scoffed at the grant decision. "When you stop a terrorist, they have a map of New York City in their pocket," he said. "They don't have a map of any of the other 45 places."

Security Cuts For New York And Washington (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 31 — After vowing to steer a greater share of antiterrorism money to the highest-risk communities, Department of Homeland Security officials on Wednesday announced 2006 grants that slashed money for New York and Washington 40 percent, while other cities including Omaha and Louisville, Ky., got a surge of new dollars.

The release of the 2006 urban area grants, which total $711 million, was immediately condemned by leaders in Washington and New York.

"When you stop a terrorist, they have a map of New York City in their pocket," Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg of New York said. "They don't have a map of any of the other 46 or 45 places."

In Washington, Mayor Anthony Williams said: "It was very shortsighted for the federal government to gut our homeland security funding program, even more so because so many dollars continue to be spent in rural areas that are far less likely to emerge as targets."

Homeland security officials said the grants were a result of a more sophisticated evaluation process, combined with a smaller overall allocation of money from Congress.

For the first time, they said, teams of law enforcement officials from around the nation evaluated the effectiveness of the spending proposals submitted by the 46 eligible urban areas, cutting grants for cities that had shoddy or poorly articulated plans.

"We want to make sure we are not simply pushing dollars out of Washington," said Tracy Henke, assistant secretary for grants and training. "The reality is you have to understand that there is risk throughout the nation."

The net effect was that the grant to New York City, which was $207.6 million last year, will drop to $124.5 million this year. Washington will see its grant dollars drop to $46.5 million this year from $77.5 million.

While some cities lost money, other gained. Money for Louisville, Omaha and Charlotte, N.C., jumped by about 40 percent, with grants to each of about $8.5 million. Money for Newark and Jersey City, which received a combined grant, rose 44 percent, to $34 million. Chicago, Atlanta and the Los Angeles area each received smaller, but still sizable increases, an action that drew praise.

"Finally, risk-based funding is kicking in," Representative Jane Harman, Democrat of California, said in a statement. "Los Angeles, the top terrorist target on the West Coast, is beginning to get the necessary funding to protect its people and critical infrastructure."

Gail Braun, grant administrator in Omaha, said she was pleased that the department also recognized the needs of smaller cities. In Omaha, Ms. Braun said, the $8.3 million will be invested primarily in emergency communications equipment and training.

"Any kind of an attack can happen here in the Midwest as well," she said. "We want to make sure we can respond or prevent it in the first place."

Representative Peter T. King, Republican of New York, who is chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security, said the allocation formula was flawed.

DOJ_NMG_0030670

"This is indefensible," Mr. King said. "It's a knife in the back to New York, and I'm going to do everything I can to make them very sorry they made this decision."

He said senior department officials who had briefed him about the grants made clear that they were unimpressed with the city's plan.

For example, New York spends a large share of its grant money to cover overtime costs for police officers who are guarding high-risk targets, like bridges or the subways, a recurring expense.

New York, in the coming year, also intended to spend about $80 million in grants to install a security camera system in the Wall Street area, allowing the police to monitor details as small as license plates, an approach similar to the so-called Ring of Steel in London, said Paul J. Browne, the deputy police commissioner.

But the emphasis on spending on recurring costs — like overtime — was cited as a factor in the relatively low rating the city's application received, one federal official said.

New York officials were given a one-page tally that explained, in part, how the region's risk-based standing was calculated. The document said the region had no "national monuments or icons," four banking or financial firms with assets of over $8 billion, 28 chemical or hazardous material sites, as well as nearly 7,000 other possible important, high-risk targets, like hospitals or major office buildings, a tally that some city officials said had major omissions or errors.

"It's outrageous that these bean counters don't think the Statue of Liberty, Empire State Building and Brooklyn Bridge are national monuments or icons," said Jordon Barowitz, a spokesman for Mayor Bloomberg.

The $711 million in so-called Urban Area Security Initiative grants was one piece of a larger $1.7 billion pool awarded to states on Wednesday, which is hundreds of millions less than was available last year.

Over all, New York State will get $183.7 million, a 20 percent drop from last year. That means that the state's per capita share of grant money, which totals $2.78 a person, will drop to an even lower level compared with some rural states, like Wyoming, which will get $14.83 a person this year, according to a calculation by Representative Carolyn B. Maloney, Democrat of New York.

In the first three years that grants were made, New York and Washington received more than any other urban areas. To date, New York has collected $404 million, while Washington has $167 million, compared with $71 million for Houston, $120 million for Chicago, $12.8 million for Charlotte, which all received increases this year.

Ms. Henke, while not explicitly making this point on Wednesday, did say that the department had taken into account regions that had the most work to do to raise their level of preparedness to a national standard.

"It does not mean in any way that the risk in New York is any different or changed or any lower," she said.

Security Funds Shifted From New York, D.C. Area (WT)

By Audrey Hudson And Amy Doolittle

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

The two cities targeted in the 2001 terrorist attacks -- Washington and New York -- will receive dramatically less money in homeland security grants this year, while some Southern and Midwestern states will get more, officials said yesterday.

All but 12 states will receive grants from a $757 million Urban Areas Security Initiative budget to help local officials prepare for terrorist attacks or natural disasters. The allocation is a $500 million cut over last year.

The National Capital Region, which encompasses the District and parts of Maryland and Virginia, will receive $46.4 million, which is $32 million less than last year. New York City is still the top municipal grant recipient with $124 million, down from $207 million last year.

"I think it was very shortsighted for the federal government to gut our homeland security funding program," said D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams. "We learned the hard way on September 11 that terrorists want to kill innocent Americans and that Washington, D.C., and New York City are among their top targets. I firmly believe that this area could be attacked again at any time, and now is not the time to back off on our efforts."

DOJ_NMG_0030671

Funding was increased to California, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Michigan, Missouri, North Carolina, Nebraska and Wisconsin. Cities added to the list include Fort Lauderdale, Fla., $9.9 million; Orlando, Fla., $9.4 million; Memphis, Tenn., $4.3 million; and Milwaukee, $8.5 million.

In a conference call with reporters, Tracy Henke, spokeswoman for the Homeland Security Department's grants and training office, said a panel of 100 homeland security "peers" in 47 states decided how to allocate the money, but she declined to say what cities the "peers" represented.

Funding was based on risk to geographic areas and "anticipated effectiveness of state proposals" on how the money will be spent, she said.

"Risk is ever-changing," Ms. Henke said. "Understand, the department is much better today than last year or the year before, or three years before, on its risk analysis capabilities. We have a much broader insight into information pertaining to those threats than ever before."

Asked whether the risk is still higher in the Washington and New York areas she replied, "There is risk throughout the nation."

Funding was cut from $9.3 million to $4.6 million for New Orleans, which is recovering from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita while preparing for this year's Atlantic hurricane season, which begins today.

Kansas City and St. Louis received more than $9 million, Louisville, Ky., was given nearly $9 million, and Detroit got $18.6 million.

Rep. Peter T. King, New York Republican and chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, called the allocation "disgraceful" and "indefensible."

"New York City has been attacked twice and is doing more than any other city in the country to defend itself and our nation," Mr. King said. "As far as I'm concerned, [the Department of Homeland Security] and the administration have declared war on New York City, and I am going to fight this as hard as I possibly can. This raises very serious questions about the quality and sincerity of management at every level of the department."

Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney, New York Democrat, agreed. "This administration's approach to homeland security can be summed up in one word: incompetence," said the chairman of the House Democrats' homeland security task force. "What competent person would possibly think that slashing security funding for the nation's top terrorist target is a smart idea?"

Ed Reiskin, D.C. deputy mayor for public safety and justice, said the city requested $190 million and officials were surprised to receive a funding cut.

Terror Fears Hamper U.S. Muslims' Travel (NYT)

By Neil MacFarquhar

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, May 31 — Azhar Usman, a burly American-born Muslim with a heavy black beard, says he elicits an almost universal reaction when he boards an airplane at any United States airport: conversations stop in midsentence and the look in the eyes of his fellow passengers says, "We're all going to die!"

For Ahmed Ahmed, a comedian, it is even worse. His double-barreled name matches an occasional alias used by a henchman of Osama bin Laden. "It's a bad time to be named Ahmed right now," he riffs in his stand-up routine, before describing being hauled through the Las Vegas airport in handcuffs.

Taleb Salhab and his wife say they too were dragged away in handcuffs at the border crossing in Port Huron, Mich., as their two preschool daughters wailed in the back seat of their car. The Salhabs were discharged after four hours of questioning, with no explanation from customs officers.

Getting through United States airports and border crossings has grown more difficult for everyone since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11. But Muslim Americans say they are having a harder time than most, sometimes facing an intimidating maze of barriers, if not outright discrimination. Advocacy groups have taken to labeling their predicament "traveling while Muslim," and accuse the government of ignoring a serious erosion of civil rights. Next month, the American Civil Liberties Union will go back to court to broaden a suit on behalf of Muslims and Arab-Americans who are demanding the United States government come up with a better system for screening travelers.

The delays, humiliation and periodic roughing up have prompted some American Muslims to avoid traveling as much as possible. Some even skip meeting anyone at the airport for fear of a nasty encounter with a law-enforcement officer. Those who do venture forth say they are always nervous.

"I find myself enunciating English like never before, totally over-enunciating just because I want the guy to know that I am an American," says Maz Jobrani, an Iranian-born, Berkeley-educated actor. "Middle Easterners are just as scared of Al Qaeda as everybody else, but we also have to be worried about being profiled as Al Qaeda. It's a double whammy."

Many Muslim Americans fault the Department of Homeland Security and its various agencies, chiefly the Transportation Security Administration, as failing to develop an efficient system to screen travelers. In particular, they deplore the lack of a workable means for those on the federal watch list by mistake — or those whose names match that of someone on the list — to get themselves off.

Mr. Salhab, 36, says his family remains shaken by their treatment at the border. Officers, their hands on their guns, swarmed around his vehicle, barking at him to get out as alarm bells clanged, he said.

"If I had sneezed or looked the wrong way, who knows what would have happened," Mr. Salhab said in a telephone interview. "I feared for my life."

Now, he said, every time his daughter, 4, sees uniformed officers, she asks if they are going to take him away.

"What happened to me at the border is inexcusable," Mr. Salhab said.

A complaint filed with the Department of Homeland Security in January got Mr. Salhab a form letter saying the government was looking into the situation. There has been no further response.

A number of American Muslims similarly upset by how federal agents treated them and their families are seeking relief through the courts. About eight men with Muslim or Arab roots are joining a suit already filed last year by the American Civil Liberties Union branch in Illinois demanding that the government improve its treatment of returning American citizens.

But similar suits have made little headway. In general, the Constitution protects all Americans against unreasonable search and seizure. But much more aggressive searches have been deemed reasonable at airports and at the border than elsewhere. Just how elastic that standard can be is what the lawsuits are addressing.

The Department of Homeland Security denies engaging in racial profiling. Agents should not base their decisions on a face or a name, said Dan Sutherland, head of the Office for Civil Rights and Civil Liberties. "They should look at behavior, concrete action, observable activities," he said.

Mr. Sutherland said the department was aware of some problems with the watch list, but he argued that many Muslim Americans traveled without encountering difficulties.

Still, traveling makes many Muslim Americans feel like second-class citizens. Mr. Ahmed, the comedian, often travels wearing a T-shirt that says "Got rights?"

"That's the whole question of my existence right now," he said. "Do we have rights? I'm a taxpayer and I'm an American, and I want to be treated like one."

The problem has become such a part of being a Muslim American that some comedians have built routines around it. Mr. Ahmed and Mr. Jobrani both perform on The Axis of Evil Comedy Tour. Mr. Jobrani jokes about his heightened state of anxiety as he passes through security.

He says, "If anything beeps in the metal detector, I think, 'Dammit, I'm a terrorist! I knew it!"

But underneath the one-liners, the treatment grates. Mr. Ahmed, 35, now avoids flying on the day of a show lest he be barred from his flight. The stress reached a level that the whiskers in his beard started to fall out, he says. ("Your body is trying to de-Muslimize," Mr. Jobrani said jokingly, sitting next to him in a Los Angeles coffee shop. "Next, your skin will get lighter.")

Mr. Ahmed was handcuffed in the Las Vegas airport in November 2004, and, he said, a young black police officer leaned over and said, "Yo man, now you know what it was like to be a black man in the 60's."

It is an apt comparison, Mr. Ahmed feels, noting that after the 1995 Oklahoma City terrorist bombing by a white former soldier, Timothy J. McVeigh, not every blond with a buzz cut was pulled over.

"I know I have to be demure and humble when I approach a ticket agent," Mr. Ahmed said. "If you show any ounce of negativity or righteousness, they'll deny you, they'll say, 'You're not getting on this flight, I don't like your attitude.'"

When he called a phone line for those with travel problems like his, he said, he got no response. "I understand the need for security, but they go overboard, they always have to put on this public display," he said. Mr. Usman, 30, and part of a different comedy act called Allah Made Me Funny, draws big laughs when joking about his obviously Muslim appearance. "If I was a crazy Muslim fundamentalist, this is not the disguise I would go with," he cracks.

He refuses to shave his beard. "I have a problem that people associate a certain look with Muslim terrorists," he said by telephone from his native Chicago. "The look of someone trying to live a religious life, having a long beard, has been around a lot longer than Osama bin Laden and will be around a lot longer than Osama bin Laden."

Most of those wrongly placed on the watch list seethe with frustration and anger, finding it unbelievable that a technologically advanced country like the United States has been unable to develop a list that can distinguish between a lurking terrorist and a harmless citizen with a Muslim name.

Khurrum Wahid, a lawyer, said that the Transportation Security Administration had made empty promises for years about making improvements. "If the name John Smith was on the designated list," Mr. Wahid said, "I guarantee they would have come up with some way to check that list."

Dr. Sam Hamade, 33, was born in Lebanon and carries a Canadian passport but is a permanent United States resident and is seeking citizenship. A senior resident at Upstate Medical University in Syracuse, Dr. Hamade legally changed his name from Osama to Sam to make his patients more comfortable.

In the last two years, driving back from Canada after visiting relatives or his fiancée, Dr. Hamade said, he has been detained at least six times. He has found himself weeping with frustration, he said, because the same thing happens every time — he is photographed, fingerprinted and his body groped — and every time the border police say that they are just following procedures.

Dr. Hamade was handed a "Fact Sheet" instructing him to write to the Border Patrol's "Customer Satisfaction Unit" in Washington. He wrote, but has received no answer. A complaint filed with the Department of Homeland Security in April has also elicited no response.

"It's a nightmare," Dr. Hamade said.

Cover Blown, But Air Marshal Still Flies (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON—The Federal Air Marshal Service continued to put a marshal on commercial flights after he intentionally blew his cover to try to show that agency rules make the undercover officers easy to spot.

Spencer Pickard, who was featured on ABC's 20/20 program May 19, said Wednesday that he flew, armed, three times last week.

Marshals are supposed to fly incognito so terrorists can't overpower them and seize their pistols to hijack a plane.

Marshal service spokesman Dave Adams said Pickard “is still an active air marshal, he's still on our books, and he's going to still be flying missions.”

Adams said air marshals “are supposed to blend in with the passengers.” But he and another spokesman for the service, Conan Bruce, declined to address why Pickard could still fly.

Pickard was featured for about 2½ minutes on an eight- minute, 40-second segment. The May 19 edition of 20/20 was watched by 8.2 million viewers, according to the Nielsen ratings service. The video was still available on ABC's website Wednesday.

Billie Vincent, who oversaw air marshals from 1982 to 1986 as Federal Aviation Administration security chief, said Pickard should no longer work as an air marshal. “After you go public, how can you blend in?” Vincent asked. “If a terrorist can identify a marshal and they have a knife, they can walk by, slit their throat and take their gun.”

Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., chairman of the House aviation subcommittee, said it would be “very hard for anyone to pick him out” and noted that “there's quite a bit of information out about marshals.”

DOJ_NMG_0030674

Air marshals fly undercover on planes in teams of at least two. The service, started in 1961, expanded dramatically after the 9/11 attacks.

Pickard, 34, said he expected to be fired or grounded after the TV show, which charged that the Air Marshal Service's rules and procedures make marshals conspicuous in airports and aboard planes.

"I was willing to take this risk to get these issues out there," Pickard said. He has been an air marshal for four years. In 2004-05, he was a vice president of the Federal Law Enforcement Officers Association, a group that has clashed with air marshal management.

Pickard said he was "ordered to fly" on May 22, 23 and 24 but did not fly on May 26 or on Wednesday. Marshals assigned to fly with him on those two days sought different partners because they felt their security was jeopardized by Pickard's exposure, he said.

Pickard's TV appearance coincided with a congressional report criticizing the service for failing to protect marshals' anonymity. The House Judiciary Committee report cites the boarding procedures for marshals and says the service has "shared tactics, methods and procedures, many of which should be considered sensitive, with local and national media."

Bruce, the spokesman, said policies cited in the report "have either been changed or are going through changes" under Dana Brown, who took over the service in March.

The Right Kind Of Security (WP)

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

IT WAS THE Dubai port uproar that didn't roar: When a House committee voted this spring against an amendment that would have required all cargo containers bound for this country to be individually inspected in their ports of origin, Congress temporarily put to rest what could have been yet another hyped-up wave of politically motivated anxiety about American port security. Although the House later passed a bill that provides extra funding for nuclear screening and other measures, Democrats vowed to bring up the inspection issue again -- and ran advertisements around the country attacking Republicans who oppose it. Before the "inspect every container" mantra becomes a national war cry, it's important to point out that this is a terrible idea.

Someday, perhaps, advanced X-ray technology may be developed to the point where it's possible to beam a scanner at each one of the 11 million U.S.-bound containers at every port in the world and obtain an instant assessment of what's inside. But while some promising technologies are available, none is perfect, and all of them require a human being to analyze the scans. This not only takes time but also presumes the existence of thousands of trained scan readers around the world. In the absence of such workers, U.S. port and customs authorities examine information about each container -- where it's coming from, which shipping company is carrying it -- and determine whether it is risky enough to merit inspection, either here or abroad. In practice, this results in inspections of about 5 percent of all containers. Even now, U.S. customs officers must rely on the cooperation of foreign authorities to carry out this many inspections.

Homeland security officials could do more. Only about half of incoming containers are subjected to a radiation scan, a number that should rapidly be brought up to 100 percent, as the new House bill requires. Ports are also vulnerable because drivers and dockworkers are not thoroughly screened. Raising the number of U.S. inspectors in foreign ports could also make the inspection system safer. But "inspect 100 percent of containers" is a slogan, not a solution, and we hope lawmakers resist the temptation to use it in the election season to come.

Remaking The Memorial Foundation (NYT)

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Gretchen Dykstra's resignation last Friday as head of the World Trade Center Memorial Foundation took almost no one by surprise. Some of the blame for the foundation's problems will surely fall to Ms. Dykstra's account. But the real difficulty is structural. The foundation, which is private, was given a job it should never have had: to build the memorial. That made its real job — raising money for the memorial — harder than it should have been.

Now is the time to fix this mess. The vague relation between the Lower Manhattan Development Corporation and the Memorial Foundation should be clarified. The development agency, in partnership with the Port Authority, should take over the task of building the memorial.

That will put the emphasis back where it belongs. All along, the Memorial Foundation has seemed far more interested in building a 9/11 museum than the memorial itself. In part, this was simply the attraction of creating something the foundation could take credit for, as opposed to a memorial whose design was stipulated in advance. But the foundation's emphasis on the museum also stems from its belief that without a museum the memorial is incomplete. That may be. But there will be time to design and build a museum after the memorial has been set back on the right track.

The foundation lost sight of a simple fact: the memorial designed by Michael Arad was the result of a careful public process. The museum is an afterthought that has never been vetted publicly. But while there were many advocates for the museum at the foundation, it was hard to find any for the memorial, thanks in part to some very confused allegiances on the board of directors.

The time to end that confusion is now. If the Memorial Foundation can raise money for the memorial — and, down the road, a museum — then it should do so. If it can't, then it's hard to say why it should exist at all.

Is Everyone Ready? (USAT)

By Patrick O'Driscoll

USA Today, June 1, 2006

Hurricane season begins today.

Max Mayfield, director of the National Hurricane Center in Miami, says people have to wake up.

"People who get hit by a couple of hurricanes still tend to chalk it up to bad luck or a fluke and don't think it can happen again," he says.

State and local governments along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts are heeding the alarm of last year's record onslaught and forecasts of another worse-than-normal hurricane season this year. Mock disaster drills from the Northeast to Texas have tested local and regional response. States and cities have revamped evacuation plans and set up websites to encourage residents to prepare and store extra provisions. The Federal Emergency Management Agency, roundly criticized for its slow response to Katrina, has tripled its stock of relief supplies.

Flood barriers in New Orleans are mostly back to pre-Katrina strength after more than $700 million in repairs. But that doesn't mean they could withstand another big hurricane. Other major metro areas along the coasts — Houston, Miami, Tampa-St. Petersburg, even New York City — are taking fresh steps to try to avoid having a hurricane nail them the way Katrina crippled New Orleans.

Despite gales of pre-season publicity, Mayfield says many people along the USA's hurricane coasts are not poised for the next tropical storm, let alone for a monster like 2005's Katrina. The Census Bureau says more than 34.6 million people live in the most at-risk coastal zones, from the Carolinas to Texas. That's more than triple the population there in 1950.

Mayfield, who has barnstormed hurricane country for weeks to preach the gospel of readiness, sees trouble in a recent poll of coastal residents in 12 Atlantic and Gulf states. The survey of 1,100 people by Mason-Dixon Polling & Research found that more than half don't feel vulnerable to hurricanes, and three in five have no family disaster plan.

The poll, released in mid-May by the National Hurricane Survival Initiative, a public-private partnership that includes the hurricane center, also found that more than two-thirds of the respondents have no hurricane survival kit. And half erroneously believe that masking tape makes windows shatterproof in a storm. Thirteen percent say they wouldn't evacuate, even if ordered to leave.

"The folks there in Mississippi and Louisiana who made a conscious decision not to evacuate (in Katrina) were not just tempting fate, they were playing Russian roulette," Mayfield says.

He says he was heartened by the unprecedented turnout of media for the center's five-stop "hurricane awareness" tour this spring along the Gulf Coast. But news coverage "is all for nothing if we can't translate that into individuals taking personal responsibility and developing their own hurricane plan."

One reason for apathy may be timing. Although hurricane season starts today, June and July rarely record a tropical storm more than once every other year, according to records dating to 1886. The heart of hurricane season normally is mid-August through October. The official end is Nov. 30. Last year's record assault brought two named storms in June and five in July. There also have been tropical storms in the last two Decembers.

This year's forecast is for up to 16 tropical storms, eight to 10 of them hurricanes and as many as six of them major, meaning a Category 3 or higher with winds of at least 111 mph. But when and where will the storms occur, and will any of them strike the USA?

"Right now no one knows exactly what areas of the coast, or which states or locations," Mayfield told a Senate panel last week. "Could it be Florida again? Maybe. How about New England or New York City? That's possible. … The bottom line is that all coastal states from Texas to Maine are vulnerable."

Most vulnerable this year is the battered Gulf Coast. An estimated 110,000 people who lost their homes to Katrina, Rita and Wilma now live in 39,000 government trailers. The temporary quarters are no match for a strong storm, let alone any hurricane, Mayfield says. These people must be ready to leave — quickly.

"I can identify very well with those folks," Mayfield says. His home in a Miami suburb was damaged by Hurricane Andrew in 1992, forcing him to live in a trailer for more than six months.

Whenever the first storm of 2006 arrives, it will be named Alberto, from one of several alphabetical lists that rotate each year. Last year's list of names ran out, so the hurricane center had to use Greek letters to complete the record tally of 28 named storms, 15 of which were hurricanes.

Preparedness exercises this spring added more names of fake hurricanes: "Alicia" in New Orleans' evacuation test; "Zoey" in Florida's statewide drill; "Eunice" in Texas; and "Xena" in a two-week exercise at the U.S. Northern Command, the military branch of the nation's homeland defense. Even the White House joined in last week with "Boudreaux," an imaginary Category 5 storm blasting New Orleans again in a tabletop test for the president's Cabinet.

Besides holding disaster drills, states and agencies such as the Red Cross continue to stress self-preparedness. They say residents should be ready to subsist on their own for 72 hours after a storm.

Florida, the most hurricane-prone state, last week unveiled its "Get a Plan!" campaign of broadcast ads and billboards and a new website to help families and businesses prepare for storms. One broadcast spot plays 911 calls from people who didn't evacuate before Hurricane Ivan in 2004. They were unreachable by rescuers because the danger was too great.

Florida also is holding a 12-day holiday from paying state sales tax on purchases of hurricane supplies, ending today.

North Carolina, second to Florida in hurricane strikes, also launched a website in May to help residents prepare for natural disasters. "Our main concern is that there are so many people moving into North Carolina from other places that maybe have not been through a hurricane," says Renee Hoffman of the Department of Crime Control and Public Safety.

Texas has overhauled evacuation plans after dozens of people died in the gridlocked exodus of more than 2 million people from Houston and Galveston last September as Hurricane Rita approached.

The plans include quicker re-supplying of gas stations along evacuation routes. Rest stops will have more water, ice and medical stations, says Rachael Novier of the governor's office. A contractor has guaranteed to provide 1,100 buses for evacuation. A pre-storm registry using the state's "211" phone information line aims to identify ahead of time any elderly, sick or other people who need a ride out.

Another key change in Texas: It will be OK to evacuate with pets. Past bans on animals in shelters deterred some residents from fleeing dangerous storms. "One way that we are sure people move to safety is to say, come on and bring your dog," Novier says.

Emergency managers in New York City, which would have to evacuate up to 2.5 million people in a major hurricane, say Katrina caught people's attention. "New Yorkers who normally are complacent are starting to take hurricanes seriously," says Jarrod Bernstein of the Office of Emergency Management. It now features hurricane advice prominently on its website.

"Take Rockaway peninsula," Bernstein says, referring to the city neighborhood most exposed to an Atlantic hurricane. "We go out there every year to talk about hurricanes, and they're like, 'No way we're leaving.' This year it's, 'You know what? If the man says it's time to go, we're going to go.' "

He says emergency planners debriefed 1,000 New York fire, rescue and police employees who went to the Gulf Coast in Katrina's aftermath to revise the city's hurricane plan. Next week, they'll stage a tabletop exercise, then a live field drill in mid-July with buses and several hundred people at one of the city's 65 evacuation centers.

"Katrina only brought it into sharper focus," Bernstein says. "We need to make that decision to evacuate early. We know that is going to be an unpopular decision if it's 70 degrees and balmy. … While the probability of a Category 4 storm for New York City is low, it only has to happen once."

Forecasters are beefing up with more staff and better tools. The hurricane center has hired four more tropical storm specialists — to predict storm movement and behavior — for a total of 10.

Among the data they draw on are a dozen computer forecast models. An upgrade this year to one of them will zero in on the "loop current," an extra-warm ribbon of water in the Gulf of Mexico. That current was responsible in part for the rapid strengthening of both Katrina and Rita as they approached the coast.

The hurricane center also will post new color-coded contour maps on its website that predict the range of wind speeds at landfall for a tropical storm days before it hits. The maps can help coastal communities in the wide zone of a possible strike to better gauge how strong the storm will be.

In the Florida Keys, the National Weather Service has completed a $5.1 million office built to withstand a Category 5 storm.

"I feel so strongly that the battle against the hurricane is won now, outside the hurricane season," says Mayfield, 57, who has traveled so much this spring to conferences, interviews, hearings and meetings that he caught bronchitis. "You just can't afford to wait for the hurricane to come knocking on your door before you get prepared."

Last week was a typical blur. On May 22 in Miami, Mayfield announced the hurricane season forecast. Then he flew to Texas to meet with emergency managers prepping for the season. The next day, he did news interviews, spoke at a Texas hurricane conference and then flew to Washington to testify on Capitol Hill. Last Thursday brought more meetings, a lunch speech, a huddle with Florida's congressional delegation and a briefing on new weather satellites. He flew home to Miami that night.

He's at it again this week. Wednesday, he went to the Florida Keys for two hurricane workshops and a TV show. Today, Mayfield is scheduled for TV interviews.

"I've worked my whole career to prevent a large loss of life like what happened in Katrina. If there's anything good that can come out of the last hurricane season, I hope it's the motivation to create that culture of preparedness."

Category 5 Foolishness (LAT)

By David Helvarg

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

TODAY MARKS the beginning of the 2006 hurricane season, one that the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration predicts will be "above normal," with four to six major hurricanes expected to form in the Atlantic — storms that could make landfall anywhere from Boston to Galveston.

Everyone agrees that we're into a decades-long cycle of intensified Atlantic hurricanes linked to a periodic 1-degree warming in the North Atlantic. Add an additional degree of ocean warming since 1970 from anthropogenic — human-caused — carbon-dioxide emissions, and you have the makings of a hurricane cycle that may never return to a more tranquil phase. Yet when it comes to the way we live in hurricane territory, we're stuck in the 1970s and 1980s, when a lull in storm activity aided and abetted unprecedented development along the Atlantic seaboard, helping assure that 17 of the 20 fastest-growing counties in the U.S. were coastal.

Florida, which was lucky last year in comparison with Louisiana and Mississippi, is still a poster child for hurricane devastation. Flying into Fort Lauderdale, it looks like someone scattered blue Chiclets across the landscape. That's how many blue tarps cover roofs blown away by Hurricane Wilma. At the Broward County courthouse, windows are still covered in plywood eight months after the storm.

What might be called "early greenhouse century" hubris abounds. A woman I met in Key West told me about her retired parents who had to flee their home four times in the last two years. Instead of moving, they're investing in an "evacuation RV" so they can flee the next storm in comfort. And in Miami, the skyline is swarming with construction cranes as developers build high-rise condos as close to the ocean as possible.

Congress has approved funding that will allow the Federal Emergency Management Agency to pay off $23 billion in property claims from last year's storms without making any commitment to reforming the flood insurance program. The levees in New Orleans are being rebuilt to something like pre-Katrina levels of safety, again paid for with federal money. The Bush administration and the Department of Homeland Security have been bragging about the pre-positioning of emergency relief supplies. Yet federal policymakers continue to ignore the causal factors that transform major storms into human catastrophes, such as the loss of protective wetlands and coastal sprawl.

So far, none of the tens of billions of dollars of hurricane relief funding that have gone into the Gulf region has been earmarked for wetlands restoration. Wetlands in Mississippi and Louisiana have historically acted as effective hurricane buffers. One often-cited Army Corps of Engineers study found that every 2 1/2 miles of marshes and trees reduce storm surge by a foot. But in the 1990s, Biloxi wetlands were replaced by floating casinos and waterfront development. And in Louisiana, Hurricane Katrina destroyed 118 square miles of wetlands and barrier islands on top of the average 30 square miles of wetlands lost every year in recent decades because of dredging and subsidence from Army Corps of Engineers and oil industry operations. "Even though I'm fairly jaded, I thought we'd have found the courage and the vision to at least begin the process of restoration, but so far nothing has changed," said Mark Davis, executive director of the Coalition to Restore Coastal Louisiana, a private group that has spent a decade pushing a $14-billion plan to bring back the wetlands.

Congress also has failed to show the courage to stand up to the coastal real estate developers lobby, and some coastal homeowners, and implement needed change. Proposals have included limiting federal flood insurance to owner-occupants rather than second-home owners and owners of rental properties, moving to a real market insurance rate (rather than a subsidized one) for high-risk properties and extending areas that require flood insurance to cover a wider zone of potential destruction. With a FEMA study suggesting one in four homes built within 500 feet of the ocean will be destroyed in the next 45 years, a new approach is needed to discourage shoreline and barrier island construction and encourage a planned retreat from along our coasts.

The facts are simple. The best available science tells us that we're faced with a projected sea-level rise and an increase in Category 4 and 5 hurricanes. We need a pragmatic approach to a changed reality. Those who think they can rebuild in harm's way using the same assumptions that worked in the last century, or who believe they can manage nature by stockpiling generators and water bottles, are living a dangerous fantasy. Unfortunately, theirs is a fantasy we're all having to pay for.

Hurricane History Isn't Worth Repeating (USAT)

By Orrin H. Pilkey

USA Today (editorial), June 1, 2006

In the mid-1960s, my engineer father was assigned to the Saturn space rocket test site near Waveland, Miss. My parents loved the weather, the beaches and the people.

But the tranquility of small town life came to a crashing end in 1969 when Hurricane Camille paid a visit. My parents' house was flooded, and falling trees punctured the roof. Their plight, however, was nothing compared with those in the first two blocks next to the beach, where essentially every building was destroyed.

Waveland was eventually rebuilt, my parents have both since passed on and the impact of Camille has become a faded memory — until the morning of Aug. 29, 2005, when Hurricane Katrina's eye passed right over Waveland. This time, the total destruction extended five or six blocks back from the beach.

I recently visited a cousin whose house is not far from the concrete pad that marks the former site of my parents' house. I was impressed by the large number of volunteers still helping in the recovery effort — eight months later. Many were from church groups, as evidenced by buses emblazoned with various Baptist or Catholic church names.

Also in the mix were Mennonites — a row of ladies with long dresses and bonnets raking up debris — and college students who bypassed Cancun or Panama City to spend spring break in Waveland.

Still, I couldn't help but notice a number of distressing scenes, such as the proliferation of "For Sale" signs posted along the beach road. Some listed the price — one lot was selling for $685,000 and another for $700,000. Each lot featured nothing but a stark, white concrete pad, surrounded by nothing but empty concrete pads for as far as the eye could see.

At the west end of Waveland was a new billboard, nestled among twisted I-beams and fragments of a destroyed pier, advertising a soon-to-be-built four-tower, 36-story beachfront condominium. It will be the first high-rise in Waveland and will dramatically increase the town's population.

One problem with the condo is that everyone must escape the next hurricane down a two-lane beachfront road. The incongruity between volunteers helping the people of Waveland and developers seeking to profit from reconstruction in an obviously dangerous zone couldn't be greater.

An illustration of the town's vulnerability came about a month ago, when a small storm from the south flooded parts of Waveland and portions of the beachfront road.

There's no question that whatever gets rebuilt will again be destroyed. The only question is when. Waveland is adjacent to a broad flat continental shelf responsible for past storm surges in excess of 20 feet. The sorrowful end point is that Katrin a likely will become nothing more than an urban renewal project, just as Camille was 36 years earlier.

If the complete destruction of six blocks next to the shore doesn't precipitate changes in coastal development, I'm afraid nothing will. Improving building codes or nourishing the beach won't work because rebuilding a community to withstand a future Category 4 or 5 hurricane with a 20-plus foot surge is an economic impossibility.

Today, the new hurricane season begins, in a time of rising sea levels and increasing intensity of storms. It makes no sense to simply rebuild and even increase building density after Katrina. It might be difficult to accept, but reconstruction near the beach should be prohibited. Strong consideration should also be given to halting future federal storm bailouts, including taxpayer-supported flood insurance and the handout of post-storm cleanup and reconstruction funds — all of which only encourages rebuilding in the most dangerous locations. Government purchase of vulnerable beach properties, as costly as it might be, would pay off in the long term.

Will we ever learn? Near the remains of City Hall is a still-standing historic sign thanking the volunteers who helped Waveland recover from Camille in 1969.

Perhaps Waveland should construct a new sign thanking the volunteer workers who came down after Camille and Katrina, but leave additional space to thank those who come after the next "big one."

Once More Into The Breach (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT has spent more than $700 million in recent months to shore up Louisiana's levees in time for the 2006 hurricane season, which begins today. In California's Central Valley, however, some levees are at risk almost every day; much of the Sacramento-San Joaquin Delta lies below sea level and, as in New Orleans, the ground is slowly sinking.

Nevertheless, local officials in parts of the Central Valley are doling out permits to develop what were once farms and open spaces. The urge to convert is driven not just by profit-seeking landowners but by cities and counties eager for property tax receipts. And it's abetted by flood-insurance rules that assume the levees offer more protection than they really do.

Researchers have found numerous problems in the levee system, prompting California lawmakers to provide $500 million this year for levee improvements and to propose a $4-billion bond issue for additional upgrades. Assuming the federal government covers its share of costs, that money will improve the situation facing cities, suburbs and other developed areas.

But those upgrades aren't likely to reach the segments of the 1,600-mile levee system that stand between the floodwaters and farms, wetlands and other undeveloped land. Flooding farms is bad enough, but as homes, industrial parks and Costcos sprout on those lands, the risks from a catastrophic breach grow. And under a 2004 ruling by a state appeals court, state taxpayers can be held liable for the damage caused when a levee breaks.

That's why Assemblyman Dave Jones (D-Sacramento) wants to make local officials pause before letting developers turn an orchard into an Orchard Supply Hardware. His bill, AB 3050, would hold cities and counties jointly liable with the state to the extent that, by approving a project on undeveloped land, they increase the property damage caused by a flood.

Naturally, developers and local governments are opposed to the measure. The latter argue it's not fair to hold them liable when it's not their job to maintain levees. True enough. But they shouldn't be allowed to remain willfully blind to the risks. And that is exactly what is happening in parts of the Central Valley, where land that was flooded a decade ago is being readied for development.

Ever since Hurricane Katrina hammered New Orleans, no one in local government should be relying on levees to safeguard property — particularly not when the state's taxpayers are on the hook to cover the losses. The Assembly rejected Jones' bill last month, but it should reverse course and approve the bill when it comes up for reconsideration today.

Support Your Local Banker (NYT)

By Otis White

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Atlanta

AFTER winning re-election as New Orleans's mayor, C. Ray Nagin promised a new beginning and an economic boom for his city fueled by federal financing for reconstruction. But in fulfilling that pledge, Mr. Nagin and his fellow Gulf Coast political leaders lack a vital resource that their predecessors of even a decade ago had: strong and engaged local bankers.

One example, from Amarillo, Tex., would be Donald E. Powell, President Bush's coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding. Mr. Powell built a career the old-fashioned way: starting out as loan officer at a savings and loan in his hometown, jumping to the biggest bank in town and working his way to the top. By 1987, he was the chief executive of First National Bank of Amarillo and, in time, he wore every civic badge worth wearing: chairman of the chamber of commerce, member of the city housing authority, patron of the local boys' ranch, trustee of High Plains Baptist Hospital. Had disaster struck Amarillo in the mid-1990's, Mr. Powell could have stood at the front of the room and told federal officials every project worth supporting and every politician to avoid.

Bankers rarely lead cities that way anymore, and their exit from the stage speaks to how communities have changed — and why it may be harder to mend them when disasters strike.

From the 1950's to the 1980's, bank chiefs were the capi di tutti capi of civic leaders in most cities, the bosses of all bosses. They ran important companies, but that wasn't why they were powerful. Their power came from continual involvement in civic work, an intimate knowledge of their communities and their occasional boldness.

Ivan Allen Jr., the former mayor of Atlanta, provided a snapshot of one banker as leader when he wrote about a meeting with the president of Citizens and Southern National Bank, Mills B. Lane Jr., in the mid-1960's. Mr. Allen wanted to bring a Major League Baseball franchise to Atlanta but lacked a credible plan for building a stadium.

"How bad do you want this stadium, Ivan?" Mr. Lane asked.

"Bad."

"You've got it," said Mr. Lane, who added that he would pledge the full credit of his bank to build the stadium and that he and other local executives would oversee construction. "And if that's not enough to get it done, you and I can't get it done."

Mr. Allen was stunned that Mr. Lane was willing to venture the bank's money on such a speculative civic project (as it turned out, the stadium was built and the investment returned), but such things were possible in the 1960's because banks were joined at the hip to their communities. The law prohibited bank companies from owning banks outside their home states and sometimes even outside their home counties. So Citizens and Southern could grow only if Atlanta grew too.

And today? In most cities, the chief executives of the largest banks are no more involved in civic work than the branch managers of I.B.M. That's because, since the 1980's, bank-holding restrictions have eased, local banks have been bought by out-of-state companies and the people who run the banks have become branch managers.

The numbers tell part of the story: there are now about 7,600 commercial banks in the United States, down from 13,000 in 1980. But this decline, as big as it is, underestimates the impact on civic leadership, since the consolidations have been greatest among the larger banks that once led their communities. Today, the top three banks in Chicago, Dallas, Denver, Houston, Los Angeles, Washington and scores of other cities are owned by companies headquartered elsewhere. (In New Orleans, only one of the top three is owned locally.) Even Mr. Powell's old bank, First National of Amarillo, was bought in the 1990's, first by Boatsmen's Bancshares, then by NationsBank (now Bank of America).

Bank presidents have become corporate nomads. A few years ago, I calculated how long bank executives from First Union Bank (now part of Wachovia Bank) stayed in Atlanta. From June 1994 to September 2000, there were three regional chief executives. With gaps, as one left and the next arrived, the average tenure was 20 months, barely time to attend a few chamber of commerce meetings, much less to lead the organization.

The decline of bankers as leaders has made cities more dependent on political leadership. Thankfully, there have been some gifted mayors in recent years, but where there haven't been, cities have suffered. There are few Mills Lanes around to instruct mayors on how to get things done.

Nor are there many bankers left with the knowledge or authority to invest their banks' resources in bold rebuilding efforts. As the main federal contact for congressional, state, local and private leaders in supporting the recovery of the Gulf Coast, Mr. Powell must already be painfully aware of their passing.

For Many, Education Is Another Storm Victim (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

BAKER, La. — For hundreds of children at Renaissance Village, this is their lost year. After fleeing Hurricane Katrina, they have landed in a vast gravel moonscape of government trailers, lacking even a playground.

All day they play video games, ride bikes or sit at a picnic table, watching men play horseshoes. They are not in school.

Of the 560 children who are evacuees and were enrolled in the Baker school district in mid-September, only 190 were still attending when the school year ended on May 19.

Part of the decline occurred because some families moved, but as of April there were still more than 800 children under 18 at Renaissance Village and the other trailer parks run by the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Child health experts and advocates for evacuees say that Baker, on the outskirts of Baton Rouge, is not unique. Throughout the areas where hurricane evacuees ended up, they say, are pockets where education has fallen by the wayside, raising the possibility that thousands of children could become permanent dropouts.

More alarming, said Sister Judith Brun, who works with children at Renaissance Village through the Baton Rouge Area Foundation, is that the problem is not limited to high school students. "I think the big reason is that school has not engaged them, not comforted and motivated them," she said. "They all had terrible stories racing around in their heads."

Since many of the parents did not graduate from high school, the children's relationship to school was already tenuous, Sister Judith said. "Any breeze is adequate to keep them out of school, any vicissitude."

On a recent Thursday at the park, children were plentiful. "I don't go to Baker Middle no more," said David Williams, an eighth grader who was hanging out under one of the two white tents that provide virtually the park's only shade. "I stopped going."

Lisa Casborn, 15, agreed. "Everybody stopped going to school," she said.

"Sometimes I get up and I look out the window for the bus," Lisa said, "and if the bus ain't out there, I go back to bed."

Parents, children and educators give a variety of reasons for the children's truancy. Most families have moved several times since the hurricane, and children grew frustrated when they could not catch up.

Some parents never enrolled their children because they thought they would be able to return home much sooner. Parents and children also cited separation anxiety and the perception that they were not welcome by their host students or teachers.

Linda W. Lewis, the principal of the Capitol Pre-College Academy for Girls, where many evacuees enrolled while they were living at the large shelter at the Baton Rouge River Center, had another explanation. "I think it's just apathy," she said.

Ms. Lewis said that some of the students from New Orleans, whose school system was notoriously poor, had trouble with the strict routine at Capitol.

DOJ_NMG_0030682

In Baton Rouge and Houston, fights have occurred between New Orleans teenagers and their hosts. Dozens of New Orleans children were expelled or suspended and never went back. In Baker, children who were expelled had no alternative but private school, which their families could not afford.

"They were thrown into a big classroom without close monitoring, without the necessary mental health help that they needed, and the only thing they had left that they owned was their ego," said Tommy Cowsar, a volunteer who has been teaching children on site at Renaissance Village. "When they were pushed slightly, they pushed back."

Michael Lewis, an eighth grader who was expelled from Baker Middle School for fighting, said he had not gotten into similar trouble back in New Orleans. "You can't really hardly communicate with other people" in Baton Rouge, he said. "I don't know why they have such a grudge on us. They just do."

If it were not for the hurricane, Michael said, he would be enrolled. "I love school," he said. "There's no place I would rather be, during school hours, than school."

Mr. Cowsar said Michael had asked to join his group, whose efforts to become an official charter school have faltered. The group lost financing for the two teachers it had in the fall, and it had only a couple of volunteers to handle about 15 children ages 4 to 14. There was no room for Michael.

Michael said he had wanted to go to summer school, for which parents must pay in some districts. At any rate, he said, his mother did not have time to sign him up. "I want to stay in a child place," he said, "but life keep putting me in a man's place."

One parent, Trinest Sylve, said that two of her children liked their East Baton Rouge school but that one, her son Holden, stopped going after repeatedly getting into trouble. The school called frequently while she was at work, asking her to pick him up, she said.

Like many children, Holden did not view his absence from school as permanent. Some thought, however optimistically, that in the coming fall they would be back at the schools they left last August. Others, like Lisa and Michael, said they wanted to take summer school to make up for what they missed.

But Dr. Irwin Redlener, a professor at the Mailman School of Public Health at Columbia University and the president of the Children's Health Fund, said children who disconnected from school would suffer more than just an academic setback, especially if they had untreated mental health issues. "It's almost like we're creating conditions for them that are virtually impossible to overcome," he said.

One problem, Dr. Redlener said, was that so many major questions about the future of New Orleans remained unanswered. "The kids really cannot afford to wait until all those big things are resolved before they stabilize the basics," he said.

While some children seem to have simply lost interest, others have found their enthusiasm thwarted. Chris Waller, a junior, said he was turned away by several area high schools that told him they were full. "I said, 'How can you deny a kid an education?' " he recalled. "And they said, 'Sorry.' I was stunned."

Chris's father, James Waller, a manager at a fast food restaurant and a leader of the Renaissance Village residents' council, said he waited until his son turned 17 in December and then enrolled him in GED classes for adults. He spoke from the front steps of his trailer, painted in the purple and gold of Louisiana State University, where Chris had planned to attend.

"Now my chances of going," Chris said, "are slim to none."

WAR NEWS:

In First Comments On Case, Bush Promises Justice In Military Investigation Of Civilian Deaths (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 31 — President Bush said Wednesday that he was troubled by the allegations that American marines killed 24 Iraqi civilians in an unprovoked attack, and he vowed that "those who violated the law, if they did, will be punished."

"I am troubled by the initial news stories," Mr. Bush said in his first public comments about the accusations. "I am mindful that there is a thorough investigation going on. If, in fact, the laws were broken, there will be punishment."

DOJ_NMG_0030683

Mr. Bush also said he had spoken with Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, about the killings last November in the Iraqi town of Haditha, 150 miles northwest of Baghdad. As many as 24 civilians there died in gunfire after a Marine patrol was attacked, and survivors say many of the victims were offering no resistance. "I know this," Mr. Bush said. "I've talked to General Pete Pace about the subject, who is a proud marine, and nobody is more concerned about these allegations than the Marine Corps." Mr. Bush spoke in response to a question from a reporter during an appearance with President Paul Kagame of Rwanda.

The killings, first reported in March by Time magazine, represent the most serious allegations of military misconduct in Iraq since reports in 2004 that soldiers had abused prisoners at the American-run military prison at Abu Ghraib. Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld was taken to task by the president at that time for failing to inform him promptly.

On Wednesday, mindful of that history, White House officials were trying to put together a timeline of who knew what and when.

Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said officials had put together "a tick-tock on Haditha," beginning about Nov. 19, 2005, the day the 24 Iraqis were killed in the aftermath of a roadside bombing that killed one of the marines assigned to the Third Battalion, First Marine Regiment. But Mr. Snow said the "concern about subsequent reports of people being massacred or people being killed was really stimulated" in January, after Time reporters made inquiries.

The military began an investigation on Feb. 14, and Mr. Bush was informed of it sometime after that by his national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, according to Frederick Jones, the National Security Council spokesman. Mr. Jones said Mr. Hadley could not recall a precise date.

At the Pentagon, the press secretary, Eric Ruff, said Mr. Rumsfeld was first told about the Haditha accusations in mid-March. He said senior military officers described to Mr. Rumsfeld what had been learned in an initial investigation and plans for opening a criminal inquiry. At that time, Mr. Ruff said, the secretary "was trying to determine how comprehensive the investigation was and whether it was being handled at a senior enough level."

But it is not clear whether Mr. Rumsfeld personally briefed the president on the episode.

With polls showing the American public deeply uneasy over the course of the war, and the Congressional midterm elections just months away, the Haditha investigation could quickly turn into a political problem for the White House and Republicans. On Capitol Hill, Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, the Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, has said he will hold hearings after Congress returns from recess.

The Pentagon has said military investigators are wrapping up work on two separate inquiries, including a criminal investigation that American officials say they expect to result in murder charges. One senior Republican Congressional aide said the members of his party on Capitol Hill were nervous about the political impact of the episode and wanted to get information out quickly to avoid a "drip, drip" of news stories leading up to November.

"You've got an election that the White House is doing everything possible to prevent from being a forum on the president and Iraq," said the aide, speaking on condition of anonymity to avoid appearing to criticize Republicans. "And here you have the biggest P.R. problem since Abu Ghraib running right smack into the summertime before a major campaign."

Bush 'troubled' By Haditha Allegations (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, June 1, 2006

President Bush promised on Wednesday that if any Marines are found to have been involved in murders of Iraqi civilians, they will be punished.

"I am troubled by the initial news stories," Bush said in his first public comments about the deaths of about two dozen civilians at Haditha in November. "I'm mindful that there's a thorough investigation going on. If in fact, laws were broken, there will be punishment."

The shootings came after a bomb rocked a military convoy on Nov. 19, killing a Marine. Residents of Haditha said Marines then went into nearby houses and shot members of two families, including a 3-year-old girl.

DOJ_NMG_0030684

In Iraq, meanwhile, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki declared a state of emergency Wednesday in oil-rich Basra — a response to violence spreading from Baghdad to the country's southern economic heartland.

In an address to about 700 tribal sheiks, religious leaders, officials, army officers and residents, al-Maliki vowed to restore security. It was his first major policy speech since his government was sworn in May 20.

"We shall use an iron fist against the leaders of the gangs or those who threaten security," he said. "And we shall ask all security departments to draw up an effective and quick plan to achieve security."

Al-Maliki declared a month-long state of emergency, which broadens arrest powers for Iraqi security services and establishes a curfew. It was the only state of emergency in effect in Iraq, Maj. Gen. Ahmed al-Khafaji, Interior Ministry undersecretary, said from Basra, 340 miles southeast of Baghdad.

Other cities where violence is rampant, such as Baghdad and Ramadi, just have curfews.

Tensions have been worsening in the Shiite-dominated Basra area. Mostly Shiite militias have been attacking Sunni Arabs and battling each other and Iraqi and British members of the U.S.-led coalition.

The Shiite prime minister traveled to Basra with the Sunni Arab vice president, Tariq al-Hashimi. Both leaders said security must be restored before prosperity can return to the port city.

"Basra is no exception from what is taking place in Baghdad, Anbar, Nineveh and Diyala," al-Hashimi said, referring to other volatile provinces. "There are malignant agendas to deepen divisions among Iraqis."

Police Capt. Mushtaq Kadhim said nearly 140 people — mostly Sunnis, but also Shiites and policemen — were killed this month in Basra, which until the past few months had been a fairly calm area.

In the latest violence:

•U.S. forces killed two Iraqi women — one of them about to give birth — Tuesday when the troops shot at a car that failed to stop at a prohibited area in Samarra, north of Baghdad, police Capt. Laith Mohammed and the U.S. military said Wednesday.

•Ali Jaafar, 25, a sportscaster for state-run al-Iraqiya TV, was gunned down in a drive-by shooting near his home in southwestern Baghdad, police Lt. Col. Falah al-Mohammedawi said. His death came two days after CBS News correspondent Kimberly Dozier was seriously wounded and two of her crewmembers were killed by a car bomb in Baghdad.

•A mortar attack killed nine people and wounded 20 on Wednesday in Baghdad's southern Dora district, Police 1st Lt. Mohammed Kheyoun said.

•A car packed with explosives hit a police patrol in Mosul, 225 miles northwest of Baghdad. At least five policemen died and 14 were injured, police Col. Abdulkarim Ahmed said.

Bush Upset With Iraq Killings Reports (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, May 31, 2006

President Bush promised on Wednesday that any Marines involved in the alleged murders of Iraqi civilians will be punished. A senior officer said the case could undermine Iraqis' support for the presence of American troops.

"I am troubled by the initial news stories," Bush said in his first public comments about the deaths of about two dozen civilians at Haditha last January. "I'm mindful that there's a thorough investigation going on. If in fact, laws were broken, there will be punishment."

Military investigators have evidence that points toward unprovoked murders by Marines, a senior defense official said last week.

The shootings came after a bomb rocked a military convoy on Nov. 19, killing a Marine. Residents of Haditha said Marines then went into nearby houses and shot members of two families, including a 3-year-old girl.

At first, the American military described what happened as an ambush on a joint U.S.-Iraqi patrol, with a roadside bombing and subsequent firefight killing 15 civilians, eight insurgents and a Marine. The statement said the 15 civilians were killed by the blast, a claim the residents strongly denied.

With some in Congress alleging a cover-up, the Bush administration offered assurances the facts will be made public.

DOJ_NMG_0030685

Bush's spokesman, Tony Snow, urged patience as the Marines conduct what he called a vigorous investigation. He said a report will come out in "a matter of weeks, not a matter of months" and include public release of photographic evidence. "We're going to see everything," Snow said.

Once that investigation is completed, a senior Marine commander in Iraq will decide whether to press charges of murder or other violations of the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

At the Pentagon, Army Brig. Gen. Carter Ham would not discuss any aspect of the probe, but he stressed the potential harm caused by allegations alone.

"Allegations such as this, regardless of how they are borne out by the facts, can have an effect on the ability of U.S. forces to continue to operate," said Ham, a deputy operations director for the Joint Staff and a former commander of U.S. forces in northern Iraq.

"We do rely very heavily — and more importantly, the Iraqi security forces rely heavily — on the support from the Iraqi people," Ham said. "And anything that tends to diminish that, obviously, is not helpful to what we're trying to do."

The toll of Iraqi civilians climbed on Wednesday when two women, including one being taken to a maternity hospital, died when coalition troops shot at a car that failed to stop at an observation post in a city north of Baghdad. The U.S. military said the vehicle entered a clearly marked prohibited area but failed to obey repeated warnings.

The president was asked about the Haditha allegations during a photo opportunity with the president of Rwanda, Paul Kagame.

Bush said he had discussed Haditha with Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "He's a proud Marine. And nobody is more concerned about these allegations than the Marine Corps. The Marine Corps is full of honorable people who understand the rules of war."

"If in fact these allegations are true," Bush said, "the Marine Corps will work hard to make sure that that culture — that proud culture — will be reinforced. And that those who violated the law, if they did, will be punished."

Until now the most infamous violation of military law in Iraq was the Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse involving Army soldiers, which came to light in April 2004. Bush said last week he considered Abu Ghraib to be the most costly U.S. mistake of the war.

Probe Into Iraq Deaths Finds False Reports (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

The U.S. military investigation of how Marine commanders handled the reporting of events last November in the Iraqi town of Haditha, where troops allegedly killed 24 Iraqi civilians, will conclude that some officers gave false information to their superiors, who then failed to adequately scrutinize reports that should have caught their attention, an Army official said yesterday.

The three-month probe, led by Army Maj. Gen. Eldon Bargewell, is also expected to call for changes in how U.S. troops are trained for duty in Iraq, the official said.

Even before the final report is delivered, Army Gen. George W. Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, is expected to order today that all U.S. and allied troops in Iraq undergo new "core values" training in how to operate professionally and humanely. Not only will leaders discuss how to treat civilians under the rules of engagement, but small units also will be ordered to go through training scenarios to gauge their understanding of those rules. "It's going to include everyone in the coalition," the official said.

The promotion of a top Marine general also has been put on hold.

Bargewell has pursued two lines of investigation: not only whether falsehoods were passed up the chain of command, but also whether senior Marine commanders were derelict in their duty to monitor the actions of subordinates. The inquiry is expected to conclude by the end of this week, the official added. He said there were multiple failures but declined to say whether he would characterize it as a "coverup," as alleged recently by Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a former Marine.

The Bargewell report, which is expected to be delivered to top commanders by the end of the week, is one of two major military investigations into what happened at Haditha on Nov. 19, 2005, and how commanders reacted to the incident. The other is a criminal inquiry by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service. That sprawling investigation involves more than 45 agents and is expected to conclude this summer, Pentagon officials and defense lawyers said yesterday. No charges have been filed, but people familiar with the case say they expect charges of homicide, making a false statement and dereliction of duty, among others.

President Bush, in his first public comment on the Haditha incident, said yesterday that if an investigation finds evidence of wrongdoing, those involved will be punished. "I am troubled by the initial news stories," Bush said after a meeting with Rwandan President Paul Kagame. "I am mindful there is a thorough investigation going on. If in fact laws were broken, there will be punishment."

The Bargewell investigation is likely to be explosive on Capitol Hill, because it focuses on questions that have haunted the Bush administration and the U.S. military since the scandal over abuse at Abu Ghraib prison emerged two years ago: How do U.S. military leaders in Iraq react to allegations of wrongdoing by their troops? And is the military prepared to carry out the long and arduous process of putting down an insurgency as part of the first U.S. occupation of an Arab nation?

One of Bargewell's conclusions is that the training of troops for Iraq has been flawed, the official said, with too much emphasis on traditional war-fighting skills and insufficient focus on how to wage a counterinsurgency campaign. Currently the director of operations for a top headquarters in Iraq, Bargewell is a career Special Operations officer and therefore more familiar than most regular Army officers with the precepts of counterinsurgency, such as using the minimum amount of force necessary to succeed. Also, as an Army staff sergeant in Vietnam in 1971, Bargewell received the Distinguished Service Cross, the Army's second-highest honor, for actions in combat while a member of long-range reconnaissance team operating deep behind enemy lines.

In anticipation of the Bargewell report, the Marine Corps has placed on hold its plan to nominate Maj. Gen. Stephen T. Johnson, who was the top Marine in Iraq when the Haditha incident occurred, for promotion to lieutenant general, a senior Pentagon official said. That decision reflects concern that the report may conclude that leadership failures occurred at senior levels in Iraq. It also stands in sharp contrast to the Army's handling of the Abu Ghraib scandal, when the Pentagon forged ahead with plans to nominate Army Lt. Gen. Ricardo S. Sanchez, who had been the top commander on the ground in Iraq, for a fourth star. Sanchez's promotion has been in limbo for more than a year.

"I don't think the decision's been made" to scuttle the nomination, a Marine officer said. "I think we're going to wait and see."

In another reflection of top-level concern, Gen. Michael W. Hagee, the Marine commandant, has been traveling around Iraq this week and has visited nearly every Marine post in the country, an officer in Iraq said. Also, the Marine Corps issued a directive to its generals telling them not to discuss details of the Haditha case because such comments could compromise "the integrity of the investigative and legal processes" and because "it is not in the interests of the Marine Corps to 'further this story' by providing details or confirming information gathered from other -- mostly unnamed -- sources."

One of Bargewell's findings is that two failures occurred in reporting the Haditha incident up the Marine chain of command. The first is that Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, a squad leader alleged to have been centrally involved in the shootings, made a false statement to his superiors when he reported that 15 Iraqi civilians had been killed in the roadside bombing that killed a Marine and touched off the incident. (The other nine dead initially were reported by the Marines to have been insurgent fighters but are now believed to have been civilians.) That report was entered into an official database of "significant acts" maintained by the U.S. military in Iraq, the Pentagon official said.

A civilian attorney for Wuterich said he only recently had been retained by the Marine and has yet to interview his client, so could not comment on the case.

A second and more troubling failure occurred later in the day, this official said, when a Marine human exploitation team, which helped collect the dead, should have observed that the Iraqis were killed by gunshot, not by a bomb. The team's reporting chain lay outside that of the other Marines -- who were members of the 3rd Battalion of the 1st Marines -- and went up through military intelligence channels directly to the 1st Marine Division's intelligence director, he said. Had this second unit reported accurately what it witnessed, he indicated, that would have set off alarms and prodded commanders to investigate, he explained.

Bargewell's report also is expected to address why the Marine Corps let stand statements issued by official spokesmen that were known to be false at least two months ago. On Nov. 20, the day after the shootings, Marine Capt. Jeffrey S. Pool told reporters that the Iraqis died in a crossfire, stating that, "Iraqi army soldiers and Marines returned fire, killing eight insurgents." Time magazine, which first began making inquiries about the incident in January, reported that when one of its staff members asked Pool about the allegations, he accused the journalist of being duped by terrorists. "I cannot believe you're buying any of this," the magazine said the officer wrote in an e-mail. "This falls into the same category of any aqi [al-Qaeda in Iraq] propaganda." Another military representative, Lt. Col. Michelle Martin-Hing, told the magazine that insurgents caused the civilian deaths by placing the Iraqis in the line of Marine fire.

In March the magazine broke the news that Marines had killed Iraqi civilians at Haditha.

The Bargewell investigation evolved from a preliminary inquiry conducted in January by Army Col. Gregory Watt, the New York Times reported yesterday. Watt was asked by senior commanders to look into why there had been no formal Marine Corps review of the Haditha incident. After reviewing death certificates that showed the 24 Iraqis had been killed by gunshot rather than a bomb, as the Marine report had stated, Watt recommended a broader inquiry.

When the Marine leadership in Washington reviewed his report, a senior Marine said yesterday, it asked that an Army general step in to conduct the investigation, another indication that the actions of Johnson and other top officers have been a subject of Bargewell's review.

Bargewell did not respond to e-mails seeking comment.

Bush Seeks Truth In Iraq Probe (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

President Bush yesterday said if an investigation into charges that U.S. Marines killed unarmed civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha turns up evidence of wrongdoing, those involved will punished.

"I am troubled by the initial news stories. I am mindful that there is a thorough investigation going on. If, in fact, the laws were broken, there will be punishment," the president said in his first public comments about the accusations.

A preliminary military inquiry found evidence that Marines killed two dozen Iraqi civilians in an unprovoked attack in November, contradicting the troops' account.

In addition, forensic evidence from those killed showed the victims had bullet wounds, despite the initial statements by Marines that the civilians were killed by a roadside bomb that also took the life of a soldier, a defense official said.

"The forensics painted a different story than what the Marines had said," the official told the Associated Press.

"I know this: I've talked to Gen. Pete Pace about the subject, who is a proud Marine, and nobody is more concerned about these allegations than the Marine Corps," Mr. Bush said. "The Marine Corps is full of men and women who are honorable people who understand rules of war."

The killings in Haditha, 125 miles northwest of Baghdad in an area that has seen terrorist activity by Sunni insurgents, came after an improvised explosive device blew up a military convoy Nov. 19, killing a Marine. Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, who has advocated withdrawal of all U.S. troops from Iraq, charged that Marines killed unarmed civilians in a taxi at the scene and went into two homes and shot others.

Two investigations continue in the matter: A criminal probe that might result in murder charges against Marines; and another investigation into whether Marines tried to cover up the true nature of the incident, officials said.

When the military investigation is complete, which is expected this month, a senior Marine commander in Iraq will decide whether to press charges of murder or other violations of the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said yesterday there is no firm date for release of the investigative report.

The new Iraqi ambassador to the United States, Samir al-Sumaidaie, who was received by Mr. Bush at the White House Tuesday, said there appeared to have been other killings of civilians by Marines in Haditha, where some of his family lives.

The ambassador told CNN that Marines fatally shot his cousin during a house-to-house search several months before the November incident.

"I believe he was killed intentionally," said Mr. al-Sumaidaie, adding that three other unarmed youths were fatally shot by Marines in a later incident in the area.

Can The Military Effectively Investigate Itself? (CSM)

By Mark Sappenfield

The Christian Science Monitor, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON - For the second time since the war in Iraq began, the United States is awaiting a military investigation into sensational allegations of its troops' misconduct.

Two years ago it was Abu Ghraib. American alarm at the pictures of depravity was accompanied by questions about whether the military would be able to honestly investigate itself. Now, as the military looks into allegations that marines murdered as many as two dozen innocent civilians in Haditha last year, its justice system is again under the public microscope.

For Americans weaned on the openness of the O.J. Simpson trial, military justice can seem remote and impenetrable. For their part, experts dismiss the notion that the military system is any more corrupt or ineffective than its civilian counterpart.

But they acknowledge that it faces its own unique challenges - from the culture of silence that can pervade the most tight-knit military units to the lack of any department "district attorney" to follow up on leads. The concerns are longstanding, but with citizens getting a fuller picture of the mechanics of warfare - both on the battlefield and off - there is pressure to ensure that Americans have confidence in their military's means of justice.

"The system is a very good one once it is up and running," says William Banks, director of the Institute for National Security and Counterterrorism at Syracuse University College of Law in New York. "It is getting things launched that is the issue."

In the Haditha case, it has been a primary issue. Though the military is currently conducting two investigations into the incident, both followed independent investigations by an Iraqi journalism student and Time magazine. Conflicting accounts

Initially, the marines insisted that 15 civilians and eight insurgents had been killed by a bomb blast and subsequent firefight. But video footage of the bodies taken by the journalism student showed that the Iraqis had been killed by shots to the head and chest - wounds inconsistent with a bomb blast or crossfire. A Time investigation suggested that the civilians - including women and children - might have been killed as a reprisal for the original bomb attack, which killed a marine.

It was only after these accounts that the military took public action, fostering a perception of a military loath to police itself. But experts draw a different conclusion.

"Once [allegations are] revealed, American citizens should have absolute confidence in the military-justice system to investigate and prosecute," says Walter Huffman, judge advocate general of the Army from 1997 to 2001. "But there is a camaraderie among small military units that conceivably can lead to atrocities being committed by that unit and never revealed."

"Do we know every one of the incidents that ever occurred?" he asks. "Probably not, and we don't know what we don't know."

He says this not to suggest that the Haditha allegations point to rampant lawlessness. To the contrary, he and others believe that instances of murder are rare. But just as American police forces have their so-called "wall of silence," military units can be insular and fiercely loyal.

Moreover, with America engaged in a war that has no fixed battle lines, civilians are at greater risk. "To go and kill civilians is damnably unusual," says William Eckhardt, a prosecutor in the My Lai case, where a soldier was convicted of murdering civilians during the Vietnam War. "But this is in a changing environment.... You can almost expect this to happen periodically."

As of yet, they are rare enough that the only obvious parallel to the current allegations in the history of military law is My Lai itself. There, Mr. Eckhardt says the military-justice system proved its worth - pressing forward against the wishes of Congress, the president, and some elements of the military. In others, however, experts see the pressures of the day impacting the proceedings. Prosecuting soldiers

After the Korean War, an American soldier freed from a Korean prisoner of war camp was prosecuted for being a communist sympathizer. "During the cold war, we didn't want soldiers to look like communists," says Elizabeth Hillman, a military-justice expert at Rutgers School of Law in Camden, N.J. "Today, we don't want our soldiers to look like terrorists."

The danger, she says, is in proceedings that become less about justice and more about the broader culture wars: "It's very hard for a justice system - civilian or military - to work when it is under so much pressure."

Though neither military investigation has been released yet, there are indications that they will take a hard line. Two weeks ago, Rep. John Murtha (D) of Pennsylvania, a critic of the war in Iraq, said one report would claim that marines had killed the civilians "in cold blood." Since then, several media reports have indicated that the probe will include at least one murder charge.

DOJ_NMG_0030689

To some, the whole process has been an example of the system working correctly. Though the media accounts provided a catalyst for the investigations, "these things are helpful," says former judge advocate general Mr. Huffman. "We can't be everywhere."

"The onus is on the military to act quickly" once the allegations surface, he says.

Others, however, see the need for reform. There is no position in the Department of Defense akin to an attorney general - someone whose job it is solely to follow up on credible allegations. Under the current system, investigations are convened by local commanders, who have many other duties - and perhaps conflicts of interest.

Says Eugene Fidell, president of the National Institute for Military Justice: "The bar has been raised for the public's expectation of transparency."

Haditha Recounts A Deadly Day (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack And Raheem Salman

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — The killing began shortly after sunrise on a November day in Haditha. As a U.S. patrol rolled through the sleepy riverside city, a homemade bomb exploded beneath the belly of a Humvee, rocking the town.

"The Americans who were in the first vehicle came back to the damaged car. They started to scream and shout," said a graying shopkeeper who would only give his name as Abu Mukarram. He said he watched the scene unfold from his bedroom window. "After some minutes, everything was quiet. During this quiet, no bullets were shot. They were moments of expectation."

Ten minutes passed in silence. Then Abu Mukarram heard the crack of the first bullets.

Planted by insurgents at the edge of the road, the bomb had killed Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas, a 20-year-old Marine from El Paso, Texas. According to survivors and witnesses, Terrazas' death drove some of the soldiers into a murderous rage.

Survivors say that furious Marines rampaged through a quiet street, bursting into homes and gunning down Iraqi civilians -- including children, women and an old man in a wheelchair. Their account appears to match details emerging from a military investigation into the deaths of 24 Iraqi civilians on the morning of Nov 19.

In the United States, the killings are joining the Abu Ghraib torture case as an emblem of how American soldiers in Iraq can come unhinged amid mistrust, fear and bloody violence. President Bush said Wednesday he was "troubled" by news reports of the killings.

"I am mindful that there is a thorough investigation going on. If, in fact, the laws were broken, there will be punishment," Bush said in his first public comments on the incident, remarks during a photo session with President Paul Kagame of Rwanda.

In Iraq, by contrast, word of the deaths has spread slowly out of Haditha these last months, blurring into the steady background noise of daily horrors. To a public that's endured more than three years of combat, rampant bombings and executions, news of two dozen more lost lives grabbed few headlines.

Sliced in half by the waters of the Tigris and nestled in fruit groves, Haditha is a quiet farming community of 90,000 people in the midst of barren western desert. Farmers tend date orchards, and raise oranges and apples in the shadow of the palms.

This account of the Nov. 19 killings comes from witness and survivor interviews conducted by Iraqi reporters for the Los Angeles Times in Baghdad and Haditha. The Iraqi reporter who traveled to Haditha cannot be named for security reasons.

After the roadside bombing, the U.S. soldiers arrived first at the door of Abdul Hamid Hassan Ali, an 89-year-old retiree who had been using a wheelchair after his left leg was amputated. They shot him dead, then turned their guns on his three sons and their families, survivors said.

Waleed Abdul Hameed, a 48-year-old worker in Al Anbar religious affairs office, was among the first of the family members to be gunned down. His 9-year-old daughter, Eman, who survived, said she was still wearing her pajamas when the soldiers arrived. Her brother, Abdul Rahman, 7, also survived, and said he hid his face with a blanket when his father was shot.

A few minutes later, the boy saw his mother fall to the ground, dying.

"I saw her while she was crying," he said. "She fell down on the floor bleeding." Speaking days ago in Haditha, months after the attacks, the boy broke down crying, covered his eyes with his hands, and began to mutter to himself. At his side, his older sister began to speak again. She described how the two siblings waited for help, the bodies of their dead family members sprawled on the floor.

"We were scared," she said. "I tried to hide under the bed." With shrapnel injuries to her legs, she lay still for two hours. Around her, seven family members died in the shootout: Ali and his wife; their three sons and one daughter-in-law; and their 5-year-old grandson. Only one of the household's adults lived through that morning.

In the first moments of shooting, Hibba Abdullah snatched her 5-month-old niece off the floor. The baby's mother had dropped her in shock after seeing her husband gunned down. Clutching the child, Abdullah scampered out of the house. She and the baby girl, Asia, both survived.

The baby's mother "completely collapsed when they killed her husband in front of her," she said. "I ran away carrying Asia (the baby) outside the house, but when the Americans returned they killed Asma, the mother of the child." Abdullah's 39-year-old husband also slipped out of the house and ran to warn his nearby cousins about the killings. But he crossed paths with the American soldiers on his way back home; he died of gunshot wounds to the shoulder and head, his wife said.

The soldiers stopped next at the home of 45-year-old customs official Younis Salim Nusaif and his wife, Aida Yassin. The mother of six children, 42-year-old Yassin was lying in bed that morning, recovering from a recent operation. While she recuperated, her sister had come to stay with the family and help with the housework.

Everybody was at home when the gunmen arrived. And except for one 12-year-old daughter, the entire family was wiped out. Four girls and one boy, their ages ranging from 4 to 15, were shot dead by the Marines, neighbors and the surviving child said.

Safa Younis Salim, a schoolgirl, said she lay on the ground, covered with her sister's blood, and pretended to be dead while her family died around her. Her sister's blood spurted fast; it was like a water tap, she said.

During a meeting with a reporter, Salim was withdrawn and reluctant to talk about the attack. Only after her relatives coaxed her to speak did she describe how she played dead to stay alive that morning. The American soldiers yelled in the faces of her family members before they shot them, she said. After they were shot, they kicked them and hit the bodies with their guns.

"I feel sorry. I was wishing to be alive," said Salim. "Now I wish I had died with them."

The soldiers moved along the street. Next, they shotdead four brothers, whose ages ranged from 20 to 38 years old, their mother said. At that home, the soldiers herded the women outside, pointed guns at their heads and ordered them to stay still, according to the woman, who did not want her own name published.

The men were grouped inside. Then gunfire rang out.

"After some minutes the soldiers ran out and left the house," she said. The women went inside, and found the men dead.

"They were shot in different parts of their bodies," she said. "Spots of blood covered the place. Blood was coming out."

The last five men to die came upon the scene by chance. Four university students, two of them brothers, and their taxi driver drove too close to the spot where the families had been killed. Witnesses said U.S. soldiers stopped their car, ordered them to get out and shot them dead.

When the killing was over, the Americans continued to guard the street, keeping relatives away, townspeople said. Eventually, the soldiers took the bodies to the hospital, a medical source in Haditha said.

Since that November day, the people of Haditha have been haunted. The survivors described sinking into depression.

Much of the talk in town has centered on the U.S. offer of $2,500 in compensation for each death. Some of the families say they turned down the money. In March, the townspeople said, American investigators arrived. They brought cameras to record the witnesses, and toys for the surviving children.

U.S. Troops Kill 2 Women, And Iraqi Death Toll Grows (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, May 31 — The American military command said Wednesday that United States troops had fatally shot two Iraqi women whose vehicle failed to stop after entering a "prohibited area" near the restive city of Samarra, about 65 miles north of Baghdad. The Iraqi police said one of the women may have been pregnant and on her way to a hospital.

DOJ_NMG_0030691

After the police in Samarra reported the deaths of the two women in the morning, the United States command in Baghdad issued a statement to The Associated Press. It said the vehicle carrying the women entered "a clearly marked prohibited area" near an American observation post outside Samarra, a major center for insurgent activity, and failed to stop despite "repeated visual and auditory warnings."

"Shots were fired to disable the vehicle," it said. "Coalition forces later received reports from Iraqi police that two women had died from gunshot wounds." It added, "One of the females may have been pregnant."

The women were among 54 new victims of the war reported by the Iraqi police and the American military command on Wednesday. They came on top of a toll in the previous 48 hours — at least 58 people reported killed across the country on Monday, and more than 40 on Tuesday, for a three-day total of more than 150 — that pointed to the relentless violence across Iraq that has followed the swearing-in of the new government 12 days ago.

American and Iraqi officials had hoped that the accession of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki at the head of the cabinet of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds, five months after 12.1 million Iraqis went to the polls to elect the first full-term government since the toppling of Saddam Hussein, might be a watershed that would bring a cresting of the violence.

If anything, the opposite appears to have occurred, with the new government facing intensified challenges on a broad front. They have included a new surge in sectarian and insurgent violence in Baghdad, deadly feuds between rival Shiite militias in Basra and elsewhere in the south and a newly aggressive thrust by Sunni insurgents in the western province of Anbar, especially in the provincial capital of Ramadi.

Sunni insurgents in Ramadi have posed such serious challenges in recent weeks that the top American military commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., has ordered the deployment to Anbar of additional troops from a 3,500-member brigade of the First Armored Division that had been held in reserve in Kuwait. At least some of those troops will reinforce Marine units at Ramadi, military spokesmen say.

Only six months ago, top United States commanders had said they hoped to begin the process of ordering staged troop reductions by mid-2006, with a target of reducing American troop levels to about 100,000 by the end of the year, down more than 30,000 from current levels. Some senior officers now say significant reductions may have to wait until mid-2007, at the earliest.

The violence reported Wednesday also included the discovery of 42 bodies dumped around Baghdad, most of them shot in the head and showing signs of torture. The police said many of the bodies were found blindfolded and handcuffed, in the pattern of hundreds of others who have died in recent months in a wave of strife between Sunni and Shiite groups.

In the latest in a series of killings of people involved with sports, Ali Jaafar, a sports broadcaster for the state-owned television channel, Al Iraqiya, was slain by machine-gun fire as he left his home for work. Last week, three members of the national tennis team were gunned down on a Baghdad street.

The mayor of Miqdadiyah, a mixed Sunni-Shiite city about 70 miles northeast of the capital, was killed when a bomb hidden in an air-conditioner exploded, causing the governor of Diyala Province to declare the city under curfew.

In Mosul, the northern oil center that is Iraq's second-largest city, at least five police officers were killed by a bomb left in a parked car that exploded as their patrol passed by.

There were two new deaths among American troops, one of them a soldier killed by a roadside bomb in Baghdad on Tuesday night, another of a soldier who was said by the American command to have died Wednesday morning of a "non-combat-related cause."

In Baghdad, a former governor of Diwaniya Province in southern Iraq was assassinated by gunmen as he left a restaurant on Tuesday evening, and a Shiite muezzin, the prayer-caller at a neighborhood mosque, was killed as left his home in a southern district of the city on Wednesday.

A member of the local council in Adhamiya, a predominantly Sunni neighborhood in central Baghdad, said in a telephone interview that 18 Sunni men from the area had disappeared Monday after leaving in two vehicles to give blood at the capital's largest medical complex in response to a bomb attack outside a local Sunni mosque that killed 12 people and wounded at least 25.

The American command reported Wednesday what it described as a major breakthrough in its hunt for insurgent leaders, the arrest Monday in Baghdad of a man it described as a principal organizer of the March 2004 attacks on Shiite pilgrims visiting mosques in Baghdad and Karbala that killed more than 180 people.

The command's statement said the suspect, identified as Sheik Ahmed Hussein Dabash, was "a major financier and facilitator of terrorism in Iraq," and said he had been captured Monday in a raid by American and Iraqi forces in the Amiriya district of western Baghdad. "Coalition forces consider his capture significant as they believe he will provide critical information on other terrorist groups," it said.

At the trial of Saddam Hussein and seven others for their suspected role in the persecution of the townspeople of Dujail, north of Baghdad, after an assassination attempt against Mr. Hussein in 1982, days of angry confrontations with defense lawyers led the chief judge, Raouf Abdel-Rahman, to order four defense witnesses detained Wednesday.

Court officials said the four were being held under a law that provides for "investigative detention" while the judge looked into suspicions that the witnesses had been coached by defense lawyers and had given false testimony intended to exonerate Mr. Hussein and his associates.

Monthlong State Of Emergency Declared In Basra (WT/AP)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra, Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

BASRA, Iraq -- Iraq's prime minister declared a state of emergency yesterday in once peaceful and oil-rich Basra, as the sectarian and militia violence engulfing the country's capital spread to its southern economic heartland.

In his first major policy speech since his government was sworn in May 20, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki vowed to restore security in Iraq as attacks across the country took more than 20 lives and wounded dozens.

"We shall use an iron fist against the leaders of the gangs or those who threaten security," he said, apparently referring to the militias as well as rival tribal groups. "And we shall ask all security departments to draw up an effective and quick plan to achieve security."

Meanwhile, with investigations pending into charges that U.S. Marines killed unarmed civilians, then covered up the incident, President Bush yesterday said that if the probe turns up evidence of wrongdoing, those involved will be punished.

"I am troubled by the initial news stories. I am mindful that there is a thorough investigation going on. If, in fact, the laws were broken, there will be punishment," the president said in his first public comments about the accusations.

In an unrelated incident the fatal shooting Tuesday of a pregnant Iraqi, apparently by U.S. troops, as she was rushing to a hospital, threw an additional spotlight on the issue of Iraqi civilian deaths.

Iraqi police and witnesses said the troops gunned down the woman and her cousin in their car. The U.S. military said the car entered a clearly marked prohibited area but failed to stop despite repeated signals; shots were fired to disable the vehicle, the military said.

Nabiha Nisaif Jassim, a 35-year-old who was pregnant, and her cousin Saliha Mohammed Hassan, 57, became the latest victims of what many Iraqis think is the American troops' disregard for life.

Mr. Al-Maliki promised to crack down on sectarian gangs in Basra and declared a monthlong state of emergency, which broadens arrest powers for Iraqi security services and establishes an evening curfew.

It was the only state of emergency in effect across Iraq, officials said. Other cities where violence is rampant, such as Baghdad and Ramadi, only have curfews.

"The state of emergency imposed in Basra for one month is made up of a group of exceptional measures imposed for a specific time by the prime minister for dealing with some events," Interior Ministry Undersecretary Maj. Gen. Ahmed Al-Khafaji said from Basra.

Mr. Al-Maliki, who traveled with his Sunni Arab vice president, Tariq al-Hashimi, addressed about 700 tribal sheiks, religious leaders, officials, army officers and other residents in Basra, Iraq's second-largest city, 340 miles southeast of Baghdad.

Tensions have been worsening in the Shi'ite-dominated area, where Britain has about 8,000 soldiers, and mostly Shi'ite militias have been attacking Sunni Arabs and battling each other.

Iran's hand also is rumored to be behind Shi'ite militias in Basra, although little evidence of a direct link has been made public.

Iraq's Premier Seeks To Control A City In Chaos (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise And Qais Mizher

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

BASRA, Iraq, May 31 — Iraq's new prime minister made an urgent visit to this increasingly lawless city on Wednesday, imposing a state of emergency and ordering leaders to cease their violent struggle for power and allow order to return to this oil-rich region.

Once seemingly immune to the violence that has plagued the rest of the country, Basra Province, the heart of Iraq's Shiite south, has sunk into chaos. Shiite political parties and their militias are fighting to control the provincial government and the region's oil wealth, contributing to some of the worst rates of killing since the invasion, with 174 killings in the past two months — double the amount from the previous two months, according to the Basra police.

Trying to stamp his authority on the region, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki arrived here in an American helicopter with Iraq's Sunni Arab vice president and three other senior Iraqi officials, and he berated local leaders for the chaos. He ordered the Iraqi Army to take over Basra's streets — a demand that apparently came as a surprise to the British Army, which patrols the region, and that could prove difficult, as units would have to be brought from outside the city.

"I declare strongly and frankly that we will strike with an iron fist on all gangs that are manipulating security," Mr. Maliki said, addressing an auditorium crowded with political and tribal leaders and other Basra locals. "Security comes first, second and third."

It is the first serious test of Mr. Maliki's authority since he became prime minister last month and pledged to deal decisively with political militias and criminal gangs whose growing power is now threatening the existence of the Iraqi state.

The surge in violence has posed new difficulties for the British military, which has adopted more strenuous policing measures to contain it. In two operations on Sunday, the British detained a total of 10 people and reported a large find of bomb materials.

"In our view, we need to do more, and that's what we're doing," Brig. James Everard, the commander of forces in Iraq's four southeastern provinces, said in an interview.

In May, nine British soldiers were killed, the second-deadliest month for the British since the invasion, exceeded only in January 2005 when the crash of a British military plane killed 10 soldiers.

Mr. Maliki spoke directly to the increased violence, using blunt language and a firm and measured tone.

"What are these assassinations?" he asked. "What is this killing? What are the gangs that kill and kidnap? What is going on in this city, which sacrificed so much through history?"

To a large degree, the violence has resulted from a power grab by Shiite factions left practically on their own to run the region and impose their own version of democracy while American and Iraqi officials in Baghdad have fought insurgents elsewhere.

"Freedom of speech, freedom of expression: it just hasn't quite worked out the way it was planned," Brigadier Everard said. "They're not prepared to debate. They tend to do things at the end of a gun."

In a city that welcomed the American invasion, threats against Iraqis working for the American Embassy are now so widespread that they have not picked up its trash or pumped its sewers for three weeks.

One large prize is control of Basra's oil exports. The city is near the country's only seaport, and nearly all of Iraq's current exports flow through it. Political parties accuse one another of skimming from the flow and trying to control it.

"As long as we have parties, it's impossible to ensure security," said one of Basra's senior security officials. "If you print this," the official added nervously, explaining why he wanted his name withheld, "I'll be killed."

One of the ways the parties have wielded influence is through control of portions of this city's 15,000-man police force, which is about double it's the authorized size. Rival parties and gangs fight one another through their own police units. The police chief, Maj. Gen. Hassan Swadi al-Saad, has said he trusts only a small fraction of his forces.

DOJ_NMG_0030694

Mr. Maliki used the trip, his first as prime minister, as a warning to local leaders who have used the months that Baghdad was busy assembling a government to build their own fiefs and profit from their positions. He specifically referred to the impotence of the police force, and directly rebuked political leaders for manipulating it.

"What worries us and hurts the heart of Iraq is that these apparatuses are practically helpless," he said. "It is impermissible to have a scared or disturbed military or police officer because of political interferences."

A plain model of Toyota, known by the people of Basra as Batta, Arabic for duck, has been used in so many assassinations that it has become synonymous with killing.

"Why can't we control this Batta?" said Wathib al-Amood, a member of the provincial council. "We are walking in the dark on a spiked floor."

At the heart of the struggle in Basra are political parties and a web of allegiances that is baffling to outsiders. The governor, Muhammad al-Waeli, belongs to the Fadhila Party, a religious Shiite party, which controls the most seats in the provincial council. A bloc led by the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or Sciri, detests Mr. Waeli and wants to remove him, but has failed to garner the two-thirds majority needed to do so.

The struggle has raised questions about the balance of power between Baghdad and the provinces. A law drawn up under the former American administrator, L. Paul Bremer III, and that is still in effect gives the provinces full control over their police forces and their local governments, virtually cutting Baghdad out of the process — a fact that Mr. Waeli's supporters are quick to point out.

Aqil Taleb, a council member from the Fadhila Party, said that because of the law, removing Mr. Waeli would be difficult. "They can't get the votes they need," he said, adding, "Even Maliki can't change the governor without them."

The meeting with Mr. Maliki on Wednesday was attended by about 400 Basra citizens, including the governor, who arrived late, and the police chief, whom he has tried to fire.

The officials from Baghdad included Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi, a Sunni Arab; Khalid al-Atiya, the deputy speaker of Parliament; Bahaa al-Aaraji, a Parliament member close to the anti-American cleric Moktada al-Sadr, whose influence and militia in Basra are strong; and Safa al-Safi, the minister of state for Parliament affairs.

Mr. Maliki's political acumen was tested immediately. An hour after the meeting began, the discussion descended into a shouting match, with tribal sheiks hurling insults at the chairman of the provincial council, Muhammed Sadoon al-Abadi.

Mr. Abadi, of Fadhila, said local leaders had done the best they could with few resources and blamed the news media for painting too ghoulish a security picture. "Don't put all the blame or all the mistakes or all the collapse on the local government here," he said.

Shortly after that, tribal sheiks began to shout from a few rows back.

"Liar!" one yelled. "None of this is true. You are a liar."

When organizers proposed that participants break for lunch, there was more shouting. "We don't want to eat, we want to talk!" someone said. "All the tribes are here and if we don't have a solution we will make a revolution."

Then, Mr. Maliki, dressed in a dark suit and tie, silenced them.

"My brothers, peace," he said, and led them in a quick prayer.

"The loudest voice is not usually the winner," he added.

While Mr. Maliki focused on security, Mr. Hashemi, the Sunni Arab vice president, took leaders to task on the oil industry and sectarian cleansing.

"I hoped to receive news from Basra that the Southern Oil Company exceeded its planned output," he said in a speech to the gathering. "I hoped that Basra ports would have attracted ships from the gulf."

"But unfortunately we have come to deal with a serious problem that has exhausted the poor people of Basra."

Iraq's Prime Minister Orders Army To Take Control Of Basra (KRT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

Knight Ridder, May 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0030695

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki on Wednesday ordered thousands of Iraqi troops to Basra, Iraq's second-largest city, to disarm the Shiite Muslim militias that have taken control there, a move that underscores how little of the country the central government in Baghdad has secured.

Al-Maliki said Iraq's 10th Army Division would set up checkpoints and round up illegal weapons from the assortment of militias, gangs and tribes that had seized control in Basra. He said the state of emergency would last a month.

His declaration, issued in a nationally televised speech from Basra, came the same week that U.S. officials announced that they'd send another 1,500 troops from Kuwait to Anbar province in western Iraq in a renewed effort to wrest much of the province from the control of Sunni Muslim insurgents.

"This month is the month of security in Basra," al-Maliki said in his address, flanked by a high-ranking government delegation. "We will beat with an iron fist on the heads of gangs who are manipulating security."

Iraq's violence has intensified in recent weeks, despite the country's swelling security forces. A new Pentagon report released this week said 263,400 security force members had been trained so far.

But that's done little to cut violence or hasten the withdrawal of U.S. troops, whose number will grow to more than 135,000 with the arrival of the reinforcements from Kuwait. The report noted that the average number of weekly enemy attacks rose 13 percent from February to April, compared with the previous few months.

The Pentagon report, titled "Measuring Stability and Security in Iraq," called Iraq's enemy elements resilient and complex and suggested little likelihood that they'll be quelled soon. The report noted that the enemy includes the Sunni insurgency and Shiite militias.

"To categorize the violence in Iraq as a single insurgency or a unified `opposition' is both inaccurate and misleading," the report said. "It is unlikely that the Coaltion and Iraq Security Forces will make progress against each of these violent factions at the same pace."

Al-Maliki's announcement was official recognition that violence in the Shiite south is far worse than previously acknowledged. At least 200 people have died in shootouts, kidnappings and executions in Basra in the last month, and British and local Iraqi officials told Knight Ridder recently that militias had largely taken control of police forces and other government institutions.

On Tuesday, the chairman of Basra's provincial council, Nussaif Jassim al-Abaidi, said the mostly Shiite police forces themselves were undisciplined and corrupt.

Many officers "are more loyal to their parties than their jobs," al-Abaidi said.

Whether sending in the army will help is unclear. The same Shiite militias that are competing for influence in Basra have infiltrated the security forces.

Basra's most active militias, the Mahdi Army, loyal to fiery cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, and the Badr Organization, the armed wing of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, are closely allied with key members of the political coalition that put al-maliki in office.

Al-Maliki didn't mention what steps would be taken to reduce Iranian assistance to the militias. While it's not clear how involved Iran's government is in aiding the groups, British and Iraqi officials in the south told Knight Ridder that money and weapons were reaching the militias from Iran and some militia members were training in Iran.

British officials said they thought that the Iranian assistance was an attempt to drive coalition forces from the area and pave the way for Iran-friendly clerical rule in southern Iraq.

Iran has close ties to many in al-Maliki's Shiite-dominated government. Al-Maliki lived in Iran for several years after he went into exile in 1980 during the rule of Saddam Hussein. He also lived in Syria and Lebanon.

While some Sunni politicians expressed skepticism that al-Maliki is politically able to challenge the militias, initial Sunni response was muted.

Tareq al-Hashemi, a Sunni and one of Iraq's two vice presidents, said al-Maliki's initiative didn't go far enough, and that more action was needed.

"There is a host of reforms that should go side by side," al-Hashemi said. "If we all - the governor, the governorate's council, political forces, tribes and religious figures - cooperate together, we will find, within a month's time, that things are much better."

During Saddam's reign, Basra was one of Iraq's most dynamic cities, known for its nightlife and bustling economy. After the U.S.-led invasion, when much of the country fell to violence, Basra was considered relatively stable, and U.S. officials often suggested that it would be one of the first areas to return to Iraqi control.

But militias were seeping into the populace, driving out minority Sunnis and calling for a more conservative province. The change became most notable when attacks on British forces spiked. In the last month, nine British service members have been killed, including five in a helicopter crash. British officials told Knight Ridder they suspect that an Iranian-supplied missile shot down the chopper.

Al-Maliki announced his plan as leaders were still debating who will lead the Defense and Interior ministries, which oversee the army and police, respectively.

He said a special committee would be appointed to oversee the Basra operation.

Time Is Short For Iraq To Stabilize, U.S. Envoy Warns (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, June 1, 2006

Iraq's new government has three to six months to bring more stability to the country, or it could collapse, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq said Wednesday.

"Unless there is increased security … a lessening of and containing of sectarian violence, this government will face huge challenges that might pose a problem for the viability and success of the political process," Zalmay Khalilzad said from Baghdad.

Khalilzad said the new, U.S.-backed government led by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki understands the challenge presented by increased fighting among Iraq's factions and militias.

The ambassador spoke in a telephone interview shortly after al-Maliki declared a state of emergency in the southern city of Basra, where Shiite militias and tribal gangs have been battling in the streets.

"The next three to six months will be critical in terms of this government's image and impact on the Iraqi people," he said.

Under a compromise reached last year to try to win Sunni Arab support for Iraq's new constitution, the government now has four months to consider changes to the constitution and two more months to hold a referendum on any amendments.

Khalilzad said that Iraq's long-term "strategic problem" is getting Sunnis to participate and remain in the government, and that its more immediate "tactical problems" involve controlling Shiite militias.

On other issues, the U.S. ambassador said:

•Al-Maliki will name Interior and Defense ministers in "the next three to four days." The government took office May 20, but disagreement over who to place in charge of the security ministries delayed those appointments. Sunnis, including the Muslim Scholars Association, had accused the previous Interior minister, Bayan Jabr, of allowing Shiite death squads to operate under cover of police and other forces.

•The United States remains ready to talk to Iranian diplomats about Iraq, but "the Iranians have been sending conflicting messages on that. In the morning, they say 'no.' In the afternoon, they say 'maybe.' "

Khalilzad said that the Iranians were providing money and training to militias and extremist groups in Iraq but that an investigation was not complete into whether Iran provided missiles used to shoot down a British helicopter in Basra on May 6.

•U.S. officials "have not seen any political or military" fallout from allegations that U.S. Marines intentionally killed civilians in the western Iraqi town of Haditha last November. An investigation into the allegations is not complete.

The military initially attributed 15 civilian deaths to a car bomb and firefight with insurgents in the town.

Tearing Iraq Apart (NYT)

By Thomas X. Hammes

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Oxford, England

THE White House is right to insist that our postwar goal is a unified Iraq, as opposed to one divided along ethno-religious lines. So why is the administration taking so many actions that make holding the country together virtually impossible?

DOJ_NMG_0030697

In January, President Bush diverted nearly half the money allocated to reconstruction in Iraq to other needs, including security. Given that our current strategy is nicknamed "Clear-Hold-Build," where does that leave us? Clear-Hold-Hope? Mr. Bush's decision sent a terrible signal to the Iraqis about our resolve. It is even less understandable since the expense of the critical reconstruction program is a small fraction of our annual cost in Iraq.

Next, the administration deeply cut financing for democratization efforts, many of them undertaken by nongovernmental groups. The proposed budget for fiscal 2007 asks for a paltry $63 million. This token sum — in a war that costs some $200 million a day — may simply reflect a belief that the security situation prevents such efforts from being effective. But democratization has always been one of the administration's cherished goals, and cutting spending there sends the wrong message.

The latest administration budget also recommends cutting overall Army and Marine troop strength. If Mr. Bush and his advisers are really committed to sustained support for the "long war" in Iraq, how do they reconcile that with cutting the budgets for the most engaged forces?

President Bush and his aides have also repeatedly hinted at significant troop reductions in Iraq this year — perhaps to as low as 100,000 from the current 130,000. This is despite the growing violence in Baghdad and the fact that our military leaders in Iraq have consistently said that we can withdraw troops safely only if conditions improve. The administration may simply be talking fewer troops to reassure the electorate before midterms. Unfortunately, American voters are not the only audience. What do the Iraqis think?

The administration has long stated that the so-called Provincial Reconstruction Teams — groups of 100 or so political, economic, legal and civil-military relations specialists who help distribute aid and advise regional Iraqi officials, which have had success in Afghanistan — are critical to our strategy in Iraq. Yet The Washington Post reported in mid-April that only 4 of the proposed 16 teams had even been inaugurated.

In addition, the Army staffs and units in Iraq, even those training Iraqi security forces, continue to be undermanned. Meanwhile, former colleagues outside the war zone — in the Joint Forces Command, the European Command and the Pacific Command — tell me their commands remain at full strength. It seems the Pentagon does not consider the Iraq war important enough to shift from its peacetime manning models.

Last, the administration has repeatedly said efficient and law-abiding Iraqi security forces are central to our strategy, yet has failed to provide them with more than minimal equipment. Three years after the fall of Saddam Hussein, most Iraq troops are still using open-backed trucks and unarmored S.U.V.'s.

Let's face it: this laundry list of inaction on the part of the Bush administration leaves a prudent Iraqi with no practical choice but to prepare for a United States withdrawal long before the Iraqi central government and security forces are capable of running the nation. For most Iraqis — Arab or Kurd, Sunni or Shiite — this will mean looking to religious and ethnic militias, criminal gangs and Islamist insurgents for protection. This, in turn, greatly increases the chance of civil war.

The militias are already looking ahead: some are carving out safe areas they will use as bases in the coming war by driving Iraqis of other ethnic and religious groups out of mixed neighborhoods and villages. Iraqi government officials estimated that more than 100,000 families have already fled their homes. This falling back on militias and preparing for internecine conflict is not a new phenomenon. It is exactly what we saw in Afghanistan nearly two decades ago. Once the Afghans believed the Soviet troops were finally pulling out, the various insurgent groups stopped fighting the invaders and began positioning for a multisided civil war. That conflict, of course, lasted until the United States invaded Afghanistan in 2001.

The Bush administration, despite all its missteps since the fall of the Baathists, has clung to one correct idea: that an intact Iraq is a better outcome than a splintered one. To keep it unified, however, the White House must commit to long timelines and to providing the money necessary for both the military and reconstruction efforts. The alternative is for Mr. Bush to change his mind and tell the American and Iraqi people that we must start planning for a peaceful division.

In any case, the uncertainty resulting from trying to have it both ways will result in the worst possible outcome: open civil war.

Iraqi Students Are Tested By Battle Outside (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Saad Al-izzi

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

BAGHDAD, May 31 -- For many of the 12-year-olds bent over their final exams in classrooms where the stifling heat already edged toward 100 degrees by 9 a.m., Wednesday's tests would signal the end of their families' days in Iraq.

With the school year reaching its close, and life in Baghdad unbearable for many, some of the mothers at al-Mahaj school in north Baghdad's Adhamiyah neighborhood began collecting the school records that their sons and daughters would need in new homes in other countries. They would soon join a three-year exodus of the middle class from Iraq, where outbound flights are booked near-solid through June, travel agents say.

School guards with AK-47 assault rifles stood watch around al-Mahaj. Fathers chatted outside, their own pistols discreetly hidden under shirts or tucked away close by in their cars: Kidnapping is rampant in wartime Baghdad.

Sometime after 9 a.m., bullets started flying. The 12-year-olds, well into their math tests, "were terrified," screaming and sobbing, said Um Bakir, a mother who recounted the battle. The parent of a sixth-grader, she would identify herself over the telephone only by her family name, which means mother of Bakir. She refused to identify her son, citing fears for the family's safety.

The shooting sprawled over three neighborhoods -- one Sunni Arab, one mostly Sunni, one Shiite -- where busy streets form the otherwise unremarkable dividing lines. Insurgents, Shiite militias, Iraq's overwhelmingly Shiite police, the slightly more trusted army forces -- all were said to be in the fight. Residents could not be sure, or tell how it started. In the fights that roil many of Baghdad's neighborhoods, with automatic-weapons fire heavy and explosions sounding, no one without a gun sticks his neck out to investigate.

Motorists on one main street turned around and sped back out, flashing their headlights to signal oncoming drivers to do likewise. Iraqi forces blocked another street as a vehicle carrying Iraqi soldiers rushed through.

In the official account, provided by Col. Sami Hassan at the Interior Ministry's operations center, insurgents had attacked an army checkpoint. The insurgents then withdrew, seeking cover "inside residential structures," Hassan said. Soldiers chased them through the area, past shops and schools.

Hassan said three policemen and eight insurgents were killed in the fighting.

Rumors flew among residents. Noor Taha, a newlywed awakened on her first morning in her husband's home by explosions and gunfire in her new neighborhood, said she was told that the clashes began after militiamen loyal to radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr held a funeral for three of their fighters.

Ahmed al-Omari, a worker at an Education Ministry office, heard heavy shooting near a Sunni mosque at an intersection bordering the three neighborhoods. He had been told that police were firing on insurgents inside the mosque. He stood in the courtyard of the education office trying to discreetly scope out the firing.

As he spoke on his cellphone to a friend, Omari suddenly interrupted himself. "A bullet just hit near my foot," he said, gunfire rattling clearly in the background.

"Get inside," his friend said.

"That's what I'm trying to do," Omari said, and ran.

Back at the school, the barrage caught some of the parents outside, away from their children.

"Bullets were falling on us like rain," Um Bakir said. Events went by in a blur, with parents and teachers rushing toward screaming children.

Iraqi soldiers and police burst in. "Get away from the windows!" they screamed at the children. "Get down!"

The soldiers and police made the children curl up on their sides on the floor, as if asleep, Um Bakir said. Some of the 12-year-olds already had fainted, she said.

As gunfire continued, the police and soldiers started rushing the children out of the school in groups.

Um Bakir hurried home with her boy and three other children, hustling them inside for safety.

Once home, she washed their faces, cleaning away the dirty tear marks. She made them something to eat. She called the other children's parents. "Your kids are okay," she told each. "But don't come yet. It's not safe."

DOJ_NMG_0030699

To the south, Omari left work at noon, stepping over spent bullet cartridges as he walked to a main street for a taxi.

A bullet-riddled car sped by.

There were no bodies in sight. Shops were starting to reopen. For this part of Baghdad, street battles were nothing new.

Parents collected their children from Um Bakir's house. She sat through the heat of the afternoon, as generators that serve in lieu of city electricity in wartime Baghdad kicked on and off.

She said that for her, there would be no flight to safety overseas at the end of the school year. Her husband no longer had a job; they had no money to start a new life.

There was the summer to get through, and then the next school year. But first, there were the next three days.

"My son has at least three more exams," Um Bakir said.

"We are going to go tomorrow, and see how things turn out," she said. "We are terrified."

U.S., In Reversal, Says Troops Fired At Crowd In Kabul (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, May 31 -- U.S. military officials acknowledged Wednesday that American troops had fired at an angry mob that surrounded the scene of a traffic accident in the Afghan capital Monday morning. Officials previously had said the troops fired only into the air.

In the fatal accident, the driver of a U.S. military cargo truck lost control and struck 12 vehicles in rush-hour traffic, killing one person and injuring six, the military said. The incident sparked violent, day-long riots that ended with 20 dead, 160 injured and dozens of buildings badly damaged.

The incident has exposed deep public resentment against the presence of foreign troops here and shaken investor confidence in the fledgling postwar economy at a time when Afghanistan faces a mounting threat from armed Taliban fighters and other insurgents in the countryside.

"Initial indications from our investigation are that coalition soldiers did in fact use their weapons in self-defense," Col. Thomas Collins, a U.S. military spokesman, said at a news conference here. He said it appeared that gunfire had come from the crowd and that the troops had "used their weapons to defend themselves."

Collins said he had no further details but that an investigation was underway.

Several people taken to hospitals in Kabul on Monday were suffering from gunshot wounds, but it was not clear who had shot them. During the day, rioters clashed repeatedly with Afghan police and burned down their checkpoints. Some rioters were armed with AK-47 assault rifles, witnesses said.

Collins repeatedly expressed regret for the accident and the deaths. But he also said the truck driver had done everything possible to avoid hitting pedestrians and occupied vehicles after his brakes failed on a steep hill leading down to a busy intersection.

After the accident, he said, U.S. troops in the convoy began to aid injured civilians but were quickly surrounded by an angry crowd of 300 to 500 men who started to throw stones at them. He said that city police soon arrived and formed a barricade around the halted convoy, but that the crowd became increasingly hostile. The U.S. troops decided to leave, firing some shots in the process, he said.

Collins said no U.S. soldier had been injured, but he added, "That doesn't mean they were not in serious, immediate danger of injury or death." He said victims of the accident and their families would be compensated.

News videos of the scene showed a large group of men shouting and throwing stones, then ducking and running as Humvees and other military vehicles sped past, amid sounds of gunfire.

As word of the accident and possible civilian shootings spread through the city, enraged mobs swarmed into downtown Kabul, attacking banks, hotels and foreign aid offices and burning dozens of cars. Many shouted anti-American slogans. It was the worst violence in the Afghan capital since the overthrow of the Taliban in 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0030700

A curfew was announced Monday night and calm had returned to the city Tuesday, but Afghan army troops have been heavily patrolling the area since. Many Afghans have condemned the street violence, but they have also blamed U.S. troops for causing the accident and expressed broader anger at their aggressive driving and treatment of civilians.

Collins said that he was aware of such criticisms and that coalition officials "take that feedback very, very seriously." He said the U.S.-led forces were here "at the request of the Afghan people and we must always act responsibly." Afghans "have a right to know" exactly what happened Monday, he said, "and we want to know, too."

Americans Fired Into Crowd, Afghan Says (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall And Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, May 31 — American soldiers involved in a vehicle crash here on Monday that set off rioting then fired into the crowd of protesters and killed four people, according to the chief of the highway police in Kabul, Gen. Amanullah Gozar, who saw the accident.

Three people died in the crash caused by a runaway United States Army truck, and four people died of gunfire from the last vehicle in the convoy as the American forces extricated themselves from an increasingly hostile crowd, General Gozar said in an interview on Wednesday.

He dismissed rumors that had spread through the city that the American soldiers deliberately rammed vehicles, even including his own car. "I can say clearly it was an accident," he said.

The United States military initially said in a statement that the truck had a mechanical failure and called the incident "a tragic accident." It said there were "indications" that "warning shots over the crowd" had been fired from at least one military vehicle. General Gozar's account is the first declaration from a senior Afghan official that American soldiers directed lethal fire on the crowd.

An American military spokesman, Col. Tom Collins, said he had not heard that the last vehicle had fired into the crowd or that four people had been killed by Americans. "Our soldiers believed fire was coming from the crowd, and they fired their weapons in self-defense," he said.

He said soldiers in one vehicle had fired their weapons over the heads of the crowd, adding that a thorough investigation was under way and that all the soldiers would make statements to the investigators. "We are examining all information; it will all be part of the investigation," he said.

The deaths of civilians, in the initial car crash and in the protests that followed, prompted the worst anti-American riots in Kabul since the fall of the Taliban four years ago. Protesters fought the police and ransacked the offices of foreign organizations across the city. Twelve people were killed, including one policeman, and 138 were wounded as the police and Afghan Army soldiers struggled to contain the violence, police officials said.

General Gozar, who is a powerful commander of the Northern Alliance, which fought the Taliban, dismissed suggestions that politics, or factions opposed to President Hamid Karzai, had driven the protests, and blamed the violence on criminal elements who took advantage of the situation. He also criticized the Kabul police for not being prepared to contain the violence and said the president had asked him at midafternoon on Monday to move to the center of the city with his highway police officers to help put down the riots.

Colonel Collins said the soldiers stayed at the crash scene for 45 minutes until a relief vehicle arrived to tow the broken truck away, and reported that one civilian man had been killed in the car crash and six had been injured, two of them seriously. The soldiers provided first aid to the injured until ambulances arrived to take them away, he said.

General Gozar, whose house overlooks the main road into Kabul from the north, said he heard a truck horn on Monday morning and looked out his window to see the driver of a heavy military truck waving frantically to people to get out of the way. The truck hit a station wagon, then two military vehicles in the convoy, and then was swallowed by a dust cloud at the foot of the hill, he said.

When he arrived at the crash scene a few minutes later, the American soldiers had stopped their convoy and were treating the civilians injured in the other cars, while others stood guard, he said. A crowd of shopkeepers and pushcart operators gathered and began pelting the soldiers with stones. The police could not contain the crowd, and finally the American soldiers escaped, he said.

"The first American vehicles were firing in the air, but the last one fired at the people," he said. As the American soldiers escaped, leaving four people dead, the crowd turned on the Afghan police, burning one of their cars and stabbing a policeman, he said. The riot quickly spread. "People were really angry," he said.

General Gozar briefed President Karzai on the episode, and said he told the president that while it was clearly an accident, the behavior of the Americans had contributed to the people's anger. Arrogant driving — driving fast or not allowing cars to overtake their convoy — irritated people, he said. People were also angered when the soldiers prevented them from approaching the crashed cars to help the injured, he said.

In more violence in southern Afghanistan, Taliban insurgents overran and burned down the administration and police offices of a district in Oruzgan Province on Tuesday night, in one of the most blatant challenges to the government and foreign forces stationed in the province.

About 40 police and administration officials fled the district center to another location under siege by Taliban militants, said Ruzi Khan, the former police chief of the province. A Taliban spokesman, Qari Muhammad Yousuf, confirmed that the attack had occurred.

In a separate insurgent attack, the deputy police chief of neighboring Zabul Province was killed Wednesday in an ambush.

U.S. Troops May Have Fired At Kabul Crowd (LAT)

By Paul Watson

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan — The U.S. military is investigating the possibility that soldiers fired into a crowd of Afghans at the scene of a fatal traffic accident that sparked a day of rioting here this week.

"There are indications, as part of our initial investigation, that coalition soldiers did in fact use their weapons in self-defense," Col. Tom Collins, a spokesman for U.S. forces here, said Wednesday at a news conference.

In a statement released Monday, Collins had said there were "indications that at least one coalition military vehicle fired warning shots over the crowd." On Wednesday, he said that the initial assessment had been based on news footage, and added that the investigation was continuing.

The U.S. military reported that one person was killed in the road accident, whereas President Hamid Karzai's office said five people died. Afghan health authorities have informed the U.S. military that about 20 people died and more than 160 were injured in the accident and the unrest that followed, Collins said.

No U.S. soldiers were injured.

"Just because coalition soldiers weren't hurt or injured doesn't mean that there wasn't an imminent danger of serious bodily injury or death to them," Collins said. "Our people are very well trained. They know how to react to situations."

About half an hour after a heavy U.S. military cargo truck rammed into Afghan vehicles at an intersection Monday morning, a crowd of 300 to 500 angry people began throwing rocks and firing small arms at U.S. soldiers and Afghan police officers, Collins said.

Witnesses say the crowd was trying to prevent the troops from leaving the scene to ensure that victims were compensated and that police had time to investigate the accident and arrest anyone responsible. They also say some military vehicles drove over people and crashed into shops in their hurry to leave.

Emphasizing that the investigation was in its early stages, Collins said U.S. troops had stayed at the scene to help the injured and recover the damaged truck, whose brakes had apparently failed.

"From our post-event analysis, it is strongly believed that there were agitators in the crowd who wanted to use these events for their own criminal purposes, totally counter-productive to the police and government's efforts to provide aid and assistance to the accident victims," Collins said.

A special session Tuesday of Afghanistan's parliament called on the government to prosecute U.S. soldiers responsible for the accident. The truck's driver is at the Bagram air base but is not under arrest, Collins said.

"We have no indications at this time that he acted inappropriately," he said.

A preliminary investigation has determined that the accident, which caused the worst unrest since the Taliban regime's fall in 2001, occurred when a 12-vehicle U.S. military convoy heading from the Bagram base entered Kabul at 8:12 a.m. Monday.

Two minutes later, the driver of a large cargo truck carrying bridging equipment, weighing more than 60,000 pounds, lost control of the vehicle as it came down a long hill, Collins said.

The truck was inspected before it left Bagram, but its brakes apparently overheated and failed as the driver tapped them to slow the vehicle, preliminary results of the investigation showed.

"The driver, very experienced in the operation of this type of vehicle, applied the primary emergency brake," Collins said. "He took evasive action to avoid hitting pedestrians, to avoid hitting several unoccupied vehicles that were parked along the side of the road, in an effort to slow, or stop, the vehicle's movement."

But he couldn't avoid hitting as many as a dozen vehicles with people in them as the truck passed through an intersection, Collins said. "Coalition soldiers in the convoy immediately stopped to provide medical assistance to those who were injured."

About six minutes after the accident, Kabul city police officers arrived to form a barrier to control the growing crowd, Collins said. A second U.S. convoy arrived shortly after and provided additional security while removing the damaged truck.

In southern Afghanistan, Taliban fighters Wednesday killed at least 12 Afghan policemen in two separate attacks and kidnapped several, Afghan officials said.

Afghanistan, Unraveling (NYT)

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Something has gone alarmingly wrong in Afghanistan, previously touted as the Bush administration's one quasi-successful venture in nation-building. Afghanistan's rising carnage still has not reached Iraq-like levels. But the trend is running in decidedly the wrong direction. Poorly thought-out American policies are at least partly to blame.

Unless Washington starts correcting its mistakes, parts of Afghanistan could start tumbling back toward the kind of anarchic chaos that once made such areas an attractive sanctuary for international terrorists like Osama bin Laden.

The warning signs go well beyond this week's deadly outbreak of anti-American rioting in Kabul — the worst violence there since the Taliban were evicted from Afghanistan's capital in 2001. And Kabul is widely acknowledged to be the most secure place in Afghanistan.

The past few months have also seen a stronger than expected Taliban military revival (with open help from supporters in Pakistan), a lengthening list of Afghan civilians accidentally killed in American military operations, a badly flawed United States-backed opium eradication program, and rising public disenchantment with Washington and its leading Afghan ally, President Hamid Karzai.

Afghans have long been renowned for their hostility toward foreign troops on their territory, as the 20th-century Russians and the 19th-century British learned the hard way. Until now they have made a conspicuous exception for the 21st-century Americans, who helped them shake off Taliban misrule and then promised their poor and war-shattered country an international rebuilding effort on the model of the post-World War II Marshall Plan.

More than four years later, Afghanistan's patience is running out. America's military presence is seen as narrowly focused on Washington's own agenda of hunting down Al Qaeda fighters and indifferent to Afghan civilian casualties and Afghanistan's own security needs.

Armed militia commanders still rule many areas. Some provincial cities and villages are back under the control of the same corrupt officials the Taliban won cheers for chasing out a decade ago. Farmers have fallen victim to a poppy eradication program unaccompanied by realistic plans for alternative economic development.

The answer is not for Washington to scale back legitimate American objectives. Pressing the fight against Al Qaeda is essential to America's own national security. Combating Afghan's growing narcotics trade is a vital precondition for any healthy economic development there.

What Washington needs to do is fight a lot smarter. It should begin talks at once with Afghanistan's government to arrive at a mutually satisfactory agreement on basic ground rules governing American military personnel in their interactions with Afghan civilians. It should reinforce its anti-narcotics drive with development programs that allow farmers to find adequate replacement livelihoods in more constructive lines of work.

Most Afghans do not want to go back to the horrors of the recent past. Washington needs to re-enlist their support by demonstrating that it cares not just about Afghanistan's strategic geography, but also about a decent future for its people.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

One Guilty And One Acquitted In Enron Broadband Trial (NYT)

By Kate Murphy

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

HOUSTON, May 31 — In the sixth day of deliberation, a federal jury convicted one of two former executives of Enron's Broadband unit yesterday in connection with a $111 million accounting fraud.

The executive, Kevin A. Howard, 43, the former chief financial officer, was found guilty of five counts of fraud, conspiracy and falsifying records.

A second executive, Michael W. Krautz, 37, a former accountant at Enron Broadband Services, was acquitted of the same charges.

The verdict brought to an end a trial that had been going on next door to that of the two former Enron chief executives, Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, who were found guilty last week of fraud and conspiracy.

Prosecutors accused Mr. Howard and Mr. Krautz of setting up sham deals to manufacture millions in earnings from a failed video-on-demand deal. The broadband unit dissolved when Enron declared bankruptcy in 2001.

"We're very surprised at the result," said Jack B. Zimmerman, one of Mr. Howard's lawyers. Although he has not talked with jurors, Mr. Zimmerman said, "It may be that they made a distinction between the relative positions these men held at the company."

A spokesman for the Department of Justice, Bryan Sierra, said, "Juries obviously sometimes make the decision to acquit but we're obviously very pleased that they agreed with us on the guilt of Mr. Howard."

Mr. Howard's sentencing is scheduled for Sept 11. He faces up to 30 years in prison, prosecutors said.

The trial was the second for the two executives. A three-month trial of the two men and other former Enron Broadband executives ended in July with no convictions and 24 acquittals on 202 charges.

The government reindicted all five defendants but on fewer counts, and Judge Vanessa Gilmore of Federal District Court separated them into three different trials.

Mr. Howard held a more senior position at the broadband unit, and prosecutors argued that he organized the team that put together a questionable finance vehicle in which an outside investor was given a no-risk guarantee.

The prosecution contended that executives set up a bogus sale of an interest in a failing joint venture with Blockbuster to provide video-on-demand. That deal, known as Braveheart, resulted in $111 million in revenue being generated in 2001, allowing the division to meet its projected earnings.

The defense's argument was similar to those used by lawyers for Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay: that no crimes were committed and all deals were vetted by outside lawyers and accountants. Another similarity in the trials was the argument by defense lawyers that prosecution witnesses were lying to get favorable plea agreements.

Mr. Zimmerman said, "We are absolutely reviewing our options for an appeal."

After the convictions of Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling last week, lawyers for the two men in the broadband trial asked Judge Gilmore to halt proceedings to ask jurors if they were influenced by the verdicts. She refused since she had already instructed jurors to ignore media reports.

The other three Enron Broadband executives facing trials are Joseph Hirko, 49, the former chief executive; Rex Shelby, 54, former senior vice president for engineering and operations; and Scott Yeager, 54, former senior vice president for business development.

Mr. Yeager's trial has been postponed while he appeals the government's effort to retry him. The others are scheduled to be tried in September.

Jury Splits In Enron Case Retrial (WP)

By Kristen Hays

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

HOUSTON, May 31 -- Jurors on Wednesday rendered a split verdict in the retrial of two former executives from Enron Corp.'s defunct broadband unit, convicting one while acquitting the other of all charges.

Former broadband unit finance chief Kevin Howard was found guilty on five counts of fraud, conspiracy and falsifying records. Former in-house accountant Michael Krautz was acquitted of the same charges, concluding a month-long retrial after their original case ended with a hung jury last year.

The verdict came six days after another local jury convicted Enron founder Kenneth L. Lay and former Enron chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling of fraud, conspiracy and other charges.

Lay and Skilling were convicted of conspiring in a fraud by repeatedly lying to investors and employees about Enron's financial condition. The company entered bankruptcy protection in December 2001.

Howard and Krautz were accused of participating in a small piece of that fraud in a scheme to manufacture earnings for Enron's struggling broadband unit in late 2000. The deal involved selling an interest in future revenue of a video-on-demand venture that disintegrated a few months later.

Howard, 43, closed his eyes as U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore announced the jury's decision.

Krautz, 37, said: "I feel very sorry for Kevin and his family. I do not feel like they got the justice they deserved."

Howard declined to comment. Jim Lavine, one of Howard's lawyers, said he would appeal.

Gilmore scheduled Howard's sentencing for Sept. 11, the same day Lay and Skilling are to be sentenced.

Howard and Krautz were the first of five broadband executives to be retried in separate cases after the original trial of the entire group ended in a hung jury. Although Enron was primarily an energy trader, the broadband unit was created in 1998 during the dot-com boom.

The first trial began in April 2005 and focused mostly on three other executives accused of overhyping the capabilities of Enron's broadband network and operating software. After that case ended with a hung jury, the five defendants were split into three separate cases and re-indicted on fewer counts.

Howard and Krautz were charged with one count each of conspiracy, another of falsifying records and three counts of wire fraud. Howard faces a maximum of 25 years in prison -- five years for each count.

Of the other three defendants, former vice president Scott Yeager's retrial on charges of insider trading and money laundering has been postponed indefinitely pending an appeal. Joseph Hirko, former broadband unit chief executive, and Rex T. Shelby, former senior vice president, are scheduled to be retried Sept. 5 on conspiracy, fraud and insider-trading charges.

Enron Broadband Jury Convicts Former Executive Of Fraud, Conspiracy; Other Acquitted (FINDLAW/AP)

By Kristen Hays, Ap Business Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-Jurors on Wednesday convicted one of the former executives from Enron Corp.'s defunct broadband unit to be retried after his original case ended in a hung jury last year.

Former broadband unit finance chief Kevin Howard was convicted of five counts of fraud, conspiracy and falsifying records while former in-house accountant Michael Krautz was acquitted of the same charges after a monthlong trial.

The verdict came six days after another jury convicted Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former Enron Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling of fraud, conspiracy and other charges in one of the biggest business scandals in U.S. history.

Lay and Skilling were convicted of conspiring to run a massive fraud through repeated lies to investors and employees about Enron's financial strength. The company careened into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001.

Howard and Krautz were the first of five broadband executives to be retried in separate cases after the original trial of the entire group ended in a hung jury last year. Although Enron was primarily an energy trader, the broadband unit was created to sell movies over the Internet in a diversification move.

The government contended that Howard and Krautz conspired to manufacture earnings for the failing broadband unit in late 2000 by selling an interest in future revenue of a video-on-demand venture that disintegrated a few months later.

The two men each testified - as they did in their first trial - that the deal was legitimate. The investors were not bought out and lost their money along with other creditors when Enron collapsed in late 2001.

The first broadband trial began in April 2005 and focused mostly on three other executives accused of overhyping capabilities of Enron's broadband network and operating software. After that case ended with a hung jury, the five defendants were split into three separate cases and re-indicted on fewer counts.

Howard and Krautz were charged with one count each of conspiracy, another of falsifying records and three counts of wire fraud.

Howard faces a maximum of 25 years in prison; five years for each count.

Unlike most of their former Enron colleagues, Howard and Krautz remained on the energy company's payroll after it crashed. They were fired in March 2003, the day their indictment became public.

Of the other three defendants, two are slated to be retried in September and the second trial of the third is postponed indefinitely pending an appeal to drop the case.

Jurors in the original trial gave up efforts to reach verdicts on all counts after four days of deliberations. The panel acquitted the technology defendants on a handful of charges, but were hung on the rest. Jurors were hung on all 15 counts of fraud and conspiracy that were pending against Howard and Krautz.

Of the other three defendants, former vice president Scott Yeager's May 30 retrial on charges of insider trading and money laundering has been postponed indefinitely pending an appeal. Joseph Hirko, former broadband unit CEO, and Rex Shelby, former senior vice president, face retrial Sept. 5 for conspiracy, fraud and insider trading.

Lay and Skilling are to be sentenced Sept. 11.

Judge Throws Out Charges Against Ex-Gateway CEO (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

A federal judge threw out civil-fraud charges against the former chief executive officer of Gateway Inc., dealing federal regulators an unusual loss.

In a decision dated May 23 but made public Tuesday, Judge Roger Benitez of the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of California ruled that the Securities and Exchange Commission didn't offer sufficient evidence to support charges that former Gateway CEO Jeffrey Weitzen made material misstatements in a regulatory filing and subsequent news release for third-quarter 2000 earnings.

In granting Mr. Weitzen's motion for summary judgment, the judge rejected the SEC's theory that Mr. Weitzen's "substantial participation" and "intricate involvement" in the formulation of the regulatory filing was enough to hold him liable for false statements even though Mr. Weitzen didn't sign the quarterly filing.

"The court's decision was clear and unequivocal: There was no evidence to connect Jeff Weitzen to any of the alleged accounting or disclosure improprieties at Gateway. Mr. Weitzen should not have been charged in the first place," said his lawyer, Richard Marmaro of Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom LLP. An SEC spokesman declined to comment pending review of the decision.

In the opinion, the judge said the SEC relied solely upon Mr. Weitzen's signature on the management representation letter submitted to the company's auditor to prove his knowledge of a material false filing. "A reasonable fact-finder could not find this to be substantial in relation to the preparation of the entire quarterly filing. The SEC therefore may not impute any alleged misstatements in the Q3 2000 10-Q to Weitzen," the judge said.

DOJ_NMG_0030706

The SEC in November 2003 sued Mr. Weitzen, former Chief Financial Officer John Todd and former Controller Robert Manza, charging them with fraud, lying to auditors and other securities-law violations in connection with a series of transactions that took place in the third quarter of 2000. According to the SEC complaint, the executives were involved in a series of revenue-recognition and accounting gimmicks to "close the gap" between analysts' expectations and the actual earnings, which were reported in the public filings. All three defendants left the company in 2001.

Gateway was also sued in 2003 and settled the allegations without a fine by agreeing to not violate securities laws in the future. The case against the two other defendants is pending.

It is a rare loss for the SEC, which has lately won a string of complex financial fraud cases against individuals and corporations. While the case raises questions about the theory pursued by the SEC, the decision may not be far-reaching on CEO accountability. CEOs and chief financial officers weren't required to certify quarterly and annual reports until the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law, which in addition to increasing the accountability of senior executives also made filing false certifications a criminal offense with sentences of as much as 20 years. Mr. Weitzen didn't sign the company's quarterly report and his case preceded the change in law.

A spokesman for the Irvine, Calif., personal-computer maker said: "Gateway wasn't a party to this case. While we're pleased with the recent developments, we put this matter behind us years ago and are focused on continuing to grow our business world-wide."

SEC, 15 Banks Settle Auction-Rate Bond Claims (WP)

By Otis Bilodeau

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

Citigroup Inc., Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and 13 other banks agreed to pay a total of $13 million to settle claims that they favored some customers in the $200 billion market for auction-rate bonds.

The firms violated securities laws from January 2003 to June 2004 by allowing customers to change their orders in the supposedly blind auctions and by giving select clients an advantage when deciding how much to bid, the Securities and Exchange Commission said yesterday.

A two-year investigation of the securities, whose rates are reset periodically by auctions, found industry-wide violations, Linda Chatman Thomsen, the SEC's enforcement chief, said in a written statement.

The SEC asked the brokerages two years ago to provide reports "detailing any potentially deceptive, dishonest or unfair practices," according to a memo sent to members in May by the Bond Market Association, the Securities Industry Association and the American Bar Association.

Firms in the settlement today also include Bear Stearns Cos., Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., Merrill Lynch & Co., J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. and Morgan Stanley & Co.

The settlement also requires the firms to more fully disclose how they conduct the auctions and gives each firm's chief executive or general counsel six months to certify that they have implemented procedures to "prevent and detect" abuses, the SEC said. None of the firms admitted or denied wrongdoing.

Also yesterday, the Bond Market Association, the New York-based industry trade group, issued a draft of "best practices" for broker-dealers of auction-rate securities.

The draft sets the firms' obligations to issuers and investors, bidding by broker-dealers, and resales of auction securities by broker-dealers, Marjorie Gross, senior vice president and regulatory counsel at the Bond Market Association, said in a written statement.

"We're pleased to resolve the matter and are committed to ensuring our auction practices meet the highest industry standards," Citigroup spokesman Joseph Christinat said.

J.P. Morgan spokeswoman Kristin Lemkau could not be reached for comment. Morgan Stanley spokesman Mark Lake declined to comment.

Milberg Weiss Case Highlights Waiver Controversy (LAW)

By Leigh Jones, The National Law Journal

DOJ_NMG_0030707

National Law Journal, June 1, 2006

As the government's demands for waiver of privilege in white-collar prosecutions have sparked the ire of attorneys worried about the sanctity of client communications, the waiver issue in the Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman case is presenting an especially prickly problem.

The recent announcement that a grand jury had indicted the securities class action giant and two of its partners was a triumph for prosecutors in the ongoing investigation. The government alleges that the firm paid clients more than $11 million in kickbacks to serve as plaintiffs in as many as 150 class action and derivative lawsuits.

But Milberg Weiss' case, while in some ways typical of recent corporate corruption prosecutions, also involves a key distinction -- because it is a law firm -- which some experts say makes the potential infringement on attorney-client communications all the more grave.

"The privilege issues are much more complicated, much more expansive," said Jonathan Polkes, a former federal prosecutor who practices white-collar defense at New York's Weil, Gotshal & Manges. "You're talking about a defendant that lives and dies by privilege."

The issue of waiver in what have become run-of-the-mill prosecutions against corporations has raised the hackles of both defense and plaintiffs attorneys. In April, American Bar Association President Michael Greco issued a statement saying that the attorney-client privilege was "under attack" by prosecutors coercing corporations to waive their protections to qualify for leniency by the government.

In addition, a bipartisan group of lawmakers is considering asking the U.S. Department of Justice to change its policy of demanding waivers as evidence of defendants' cooperation.

After U.S. Attorney Debra Wong Yang in the Central District of California announced an indictment on May 18 against Milberg Weiss, the law firm in its own statement asserted that prosecutors had demanded access to communications with its counsel, Zuckerman Spaeder of Washington, in exchange for deferred prosecution. Milberg Weiss' refusal to grant access to that communication led to its indictment, the firm said.

Also indicted were name partners David Bershad and Steven Schulman. In addition, some clients serving as plaintiffs in class actions have pleaded guilty to receiving kickbacks.

Last week, sources involved in the case said that a reason Milberg Weiss did not waive its privilege was because its communication with Zuckerman Spaeder involved communication and work product related to Milberg Weiss' own clients and other attorneys. Milberg Weiss was not entitled to waive privilege with Zuckerman Spaeder because of its duty of confidentiality to Milberg's clients, the sources said.

In a written statement last week, a spokesman for Yang's office said that the U.S. Attorney would not comment on settlement discussions. The statement also said that "waivers of attorney-client privilege are requested in rare circumstances and only when justified by a need to obtain factual information that is not readily available through other means."

DIFFICULT ENTANGLEMENT

While it remains unclear exactly what caused deferred prosecution negotiations to collapse in the case, any request by prosecutors for Milberg Weiss' waiver of privilege likely was plagued by problems.

Professor Stephen Gillers of New York University School of Law said that two sets of communications -- those between Milberg Weiss and Zuckerman Spaeder and those between Milberg Weiss and its class action clients -- likely are entangled, which would make it difficult for Milberg Weiss to fulfill its duty of confidentiality to a client and simultaneously waive privileged communications with Zuckerman Spaeder. "It's asking Milberg to do what it cannot do," he said.

While Milberg Weiss is free to waive its own privileged and confidential protections, Gillers said, it is not free to waive the privileged and confidential protections of its clients.

Ironically, Milberg Weiss' situation regarding deferred prosecution, as it describes it, is one that some of the companies targeted by securities class actions have confronted. Like those corporations, it is facing the powerful leverage that the government has gained in white-collar corruption cases by dangling the threat of indicting the corporation, as opposed to the individuals working for it.

Practitioners and scholars point to the demise of one-time accounting giant Arthur Andersen as a seminal case. Charged, among other things, with shredding documents related to the Enron accounting fraud scandal, a criminal prosecution eventually felled the accounting firm, putting thousands of employees out of work. Since then, dozens of companies, including KPMG LLP, Computer Associates and Monsanto Co., have yielded to waiver requests and paid hefty settlements ostensibly to avoid the same fate as Arthur Andersen.

But the action against Milberg Weiss in some ways is "worse" than the Arthur Andersen case, said Greenberg Traurig attorney Leslie Corwin, whose practice focuses on ethical issues and business law. In Milberg Weiss' case, a waiver could give prosecutors access to the law firm's strategy in pursuing its class action litigation and other details about clients' representation, a situation that would violate "the most sacred right we have in the legal profession," he said.

"It involves the mental impressions, conclusions and legal theories of an attorney," Corwin said. He added that the federal rules preclude prosecutors from going after such information.

"Shame on them," he said.

But the option to defer prosecution is a choice, Polkes said. He acknowledged, however, the argument made by defendants that their choices are limited to waiving attorney-client privilege or risking the company's destruction if the government pursues criminal charges.

Particularly troublesome in the Milberg Weiss case, noted Polkes and others, is the difficulty the government has in parsing out a waiver request narrow enough to block out protected client communication, which theoretically could involve "every communication" between a firm's lawyers and its hired counsel, he said.

"The privilege waiver is potentially far less circumscribed," he said, comparing Milberg Weiss' situation to a typical white-collar investigation.

DO EXCEPTIONS APPLY?

Exceptions to an attorney's duty of confidentiality to its clients do exist, noted Gillers, with New York University. But he questions whether they would apply in Milberg Weiss' case.

A 1975 decision from the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York, In re Friend, 411 F. Supp. 776, held that an attorney who faced an indictment and sought a court order enabling him to reveal to a grand jury confidential documents related to the representation of a client could do so to avoid the stigma of an indictment. But that case involved disclosure of limited information about a single client, not the wholesale waiver apparently sought here, Gillers said.

In addition, the government could assert the so-called crime-fraud exception to the privilege, which would enable it to defeat a privilege claim on a case-by-case basis, if it could show probable cause to conclude that a client used the firm to commit a crime or fraud, he said.

The legal troubles that Jenkens & Gilchrist of Dallas and Sidley Austin have experienced with their involvement in the sale of allegedly illegal tax shelters may shed some light on Milberg Weiss' situation.

In those cases, clients of the firms sought to block their law firms from turning over to prosecutors what they argued was privileged information. But decisions in those cases have been mixed.

A Fight Over Homeland Security Funds

The Department of Homeland Security said intelligence about terrorism threats and risks was a key component to its decision-making process that awarded $1.7 billion of grants to states and cities to prevent and respond to attacks, and, to a lesser extent, disasters like hurricanes.

But many politicians and officials, especially from cities and states that saw cuts in funding this year, say they saw little intelligence in the department's grant program. "The Department of Homeland Security's decision to cut funding to New York by more than 40% is absolutely indefensible and disgraceful," said an outraged House Homeland Security Committee Chairman

Peter King (R., N.Y.). "As far as I'm concerned, DHS and the administration have declared war on New York City, and I am going to fight this as hard as I possibly can."

King said the move raised "serious" questions about "the quality and sincerity of management at every level of the department."

Preparing to Process Illegal Immigrants

The immigration service says it's up to the job of processing the residency applications of millions of illegal immigrants who might be allowed to stay as part of the Senate immigration bill. But it worries that Congress will repeat a "confidentiality" provision that was in the last big immigration bill, 20 years ago, and preclude it from turning over to the police any criminal evidence it uncovers while processing illegal immigrants.

Emilio Gonzalez, director of the Citizenship and Immigration Services office, says Congress hasn't asked him how much money he'll need or what kind of documentation he'll ask of immigrants if a Senate bill that aims to grant permanent residency to perhaps eight million illegal immigrants also passes in the House. He said he would expect those issues, and other major details, to arise when Senate and House negotiators meet to reconcile differences in their immigration bills.

The office already is notorious for its huge paperwork backlogs and the long waits legal immigrants face for permanent residency. Gonzalez says the agency is studying "models" for the additional job of processing millions of illegal immigrants, including outsourcing some of the work.

He also defends the idea of charging immigrants hefty processing fees, contending that "American citizenship is worth the cost."

He frets, though, about congressional moves that would prevent his agency from turning over evidence of lawbreaking that it might uncover during processing of that huge group of illegal immigrants. That confidentiality provision was in a 1986 amnesty law for illegal immigrants, but doesn't apply to legal immigrants in their dealings with the agency.

Immigrant groups say people with criminal backgrounds aren't eligible for the program anyway — and certainly wouldn't come forward to face certain deportation. But neither may otherwise law-abiding immigrants, who could fear that the new law is a trap, says Cecilia Munoz of the National Council of La Raza, an advocacy group. But because some of the 9/11 hijackers were in the U.S. legally, the agency is wary of sitting on criminal evidence. "That's clearly inappropriate," says Gonzalez. –June Kronholz

Minding the Map and Money

"Managing Expectations." That's the subject line for a private memo House Democrats' campaign committee chairman, Chicago's Rep. Rahm Emanuel, circulated to his colleagues as they headed home for the Memorial Day recess week. With President Bush and the Republican-led Congress dragging in the polls, and Democrats growing cautiously optimistic about their chances of recapturing the House majority after 12 years, Emanuel noted that the Democrats "are headed into structural impediments (e.g. map and money)."

On the national map, he noted that Republicans' gerrymandering of House districts after the 2000 census has so limited the number of competitive seats that the nonpartisan Cook Political Report lists 35 such seats this year compared to 100 in 1994 — the year Republicans ousted the Democrats' majority. Democrats need a net gain of 15 to have a majority of the 435-member House. As for money, Emanuel said the Republican National Committee has a 4-to-1 cash advantage over the Democratic National Committee; Emanuel and his Senate campaigns counterpart, New York Sen. Charles Schumer, have sparred with DNC Chairman Howard Dean for funds since the RNC has promised millions for Republican House candidates.

But Emanuel had good news on the money front, as well. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee "has the resources necessary to compete and Democratic candidates are in a better position financially than ever before," he wrote. The DCCC was nearly equal to House Republicans' committee in the most recent campaign-finance reports, with about $23 million. Candidates' most recent reports show that 40 Democrats challenging Republican incumbents have at least $250,000 on hand — 10 times the number of two years ago.

Citing several of the Democratic challengers by name, he claimed, "Democrats are succeeding in framing and nationalizing the debate this election cycle as a campaign for change." And citing last week's primary results in Indiana and Pennsylvania, Emanuel concluded, "it is clear that Democrats are energized and Republicans are demoralized." –Jackie Calmes

Higher Phone Bills?

Monthly bills of Internet and wireless-phone customers could be going up soon, under a plan proposed by Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin.

The plan would require Internet phone companies to pay into a $7.3 billion federal fund that subsidizes phone services for low-income and rural consumers. Internet phone companies have never been required to directly pay into the fund before, which is one reason why they've been able to charge slightly less than some competitors.

The FCC is trying to shore up the federal Universal Service Fund, which subsidizes phone services. In August, the USF fee charged on high-speed Internet customers expires because of a decision last summer by the FCC to deregulate Internet lines. To make up for the expected revenue shortfall, which could run into hundreds of millions of dollars, Martin has proposed increasing the amount of revenue wireless and Internet phone companies would contribute into the fund, FCC officials say. Contributions by wireless companies would increase 9% under the proposal. Internet phone companies would also be required to directly fund the program for the first time, and at a much higher rate than wireless companies.

Phone companies pay into the fund but usually pass along those charges to consumers. The charge is usually listed as the Universal Service Fund line item on their bills. It's not clear how much more consumers would have to pay under the new plan. The increase could actually slightly lower bills for consumers who use traditional long-distance phone services, since it would increase the number of consumers actually paying into the fund.

Phone companies aren't happy about the change. They prefer a proposal floated by Martin to charge a per-phone number fee on all customers instead of tweaking the current system. That plan has stalled, however, under criticism by several special interest groups, including the NAACP and American Association of People with Disabilities, which say it would unfairly place more of a burden on low or fixed-income consumers.

The proposal to increase fees on wireless and Internet phones has begun circulating at the FCC, but it's not clear if work on it will be done in time for the agency's regularly scheduled meeting in two weeks. One reason for a potential delay: newly confirmed Republican Commissioner Robert McDowell, who would vote on the item, hasn't been sworn in yet. –Amy Schatz

Senate Panel to Grill Fannie Executives

The Senate Banking Committee is calling Fannie Mae's current chief executive officer, Daniel Mudd, and former chief Franklin Raines to testify as early as next week on federal regulators' allegations that the giant mortgage company engaged in fraudulent accounting.

Also being asked to discuss their investigations are James Lockhart, acting director of Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, Fannie's main regulator, and Christopher Cox, chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission. After Ofheo's report was released last week, Lockhart said he has directed Fannie's board to grab back any unjustified compensation paid to senior executives as a result of accounting misdeeds.

Committee Chairman Richard Shelby (R., Ala.) is planning a wide-ranging hearing, including probing whether Mudd is the right person to lead the mortgage giant. While not accused of wrongdoing, he was a senior Fannie executive for a few years during which the books were cooked. –Michael Schroeder

Big Bonuses Still Flow, Even If Bosses Miss Goals (NYT)

By Gretchen Morgenson

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

It was the kind of mistake that wage slaves can only dream of. Because of what the company called an "improper interpretation" of his employment contract, Sheldon G. Adelson, chairman, chief executive and treasurer of the Las Vegas Sands

DOJ_NMG_0030711

Corporation, received $3.6 million in salary and bonus last year, almost $1 million more than prescribed under the company's performance plan.

Four more top executives of the Las Vegas Sands, which owns the Venetian Resort Hotel and Casino, received more than they should have. The total in excess bonus payments for the five men was $2.8 million.

The compensation committee of the board conceded that it had made an error. But it said that "the outstanding performance of the company in 2005" justified the extra money, and it allowed the executives to keep it.

Shareholders of Las Vegas Sands did not fare as well. The value of their holdings fell 18 percent last year.

As executive pay packages have rocketed in recent years, their defenders have contended that because most are tied to company performance, they are both earned and deserved. But as the Las Vegas Sands example shows, investors who plow through company filings often find that executive compensation exceeds the amounts allowed under the performance targets set by the directors.

Executives of companies as varied as Halliburton, the military contractor and oil services concern; Assurant, an insurance company; and Big Lots, a discount retailer, all received bonuses and other pay outside the performance parameters set by the boards of those companies.

It is the equivalent of moving the goalposts to shorten the field, compensation experts say.

"Lowering the hurdles is especially disconcerting because very often the goals are not set all that high to begin with," said Lucian Bebchuk, professor at Harvard Law School and author with Jesse Fried of "Pay Without Performance." Mr. Bebchuk said shareholders should be especially alert to increases in bonuses because more companies were shifting away from stock options and into cash incentives.

Some employment agreements actually stipulate that they will provide bonuses even if company performance declines. The agreement struck in 2004 by Peter Chernin, president and chief operating officer of the News Corporation, entitles him to a bonus even if earnings per share fall at the company. If earnings rise by 15 percent in any given year, Mr. Chernin's bonus is $12.5 million. But if they fall 6.25 percent, Mr. Chernin's bonus is $4.5 million, and an earnings decline of 14 percent translates to a $3.52 million bonus.

Last year, Mr. Chernin received $8.3 million in salary and $18.9 million in bonus pay. A company spokesman declined to comment on the bonus structure. He confirmed that the company's chief executive, Rupert Murdoch, has a similar bonus arrangement. Company filings show that Mr. Murdoch received a bonus of $18.9 million last year.

While bonus and other incentive pay figures are included in company filings, shareholders hoping to calculate precisely what performance objectives executives must meet to receive such pay can be confounded.

Descriptions of bonus targets are typically vague and often include a laundry list of measures that the board may or may not consider. The board may factor in sales, earnings, stock price, capital expenditures, cash flow, even inventory levels. Company officials often explain the practice by saying that too-specific information on performance hurdles can give away corporate secrets or invite rival organizations to lure executives away by offering them contract terms that are easier to achieve.

Compensation experts counter that lists of vague hurdles may allow carefully chosen measurements to be met in both fair weather and foul.

Indeed, shareholders often find that the performance measures used by the company to determine pay can be very flexible. For example, Assurant, which is based in New York, says its compensation committee can adjust incentive payments for extraordinary events, "including, but not limited to, acquisitions or dispositions of businesses, litigation costs, tax or insurance recoveries or settlements, changes to accounting principles, asset impairment and restructuring."

For bonuses paid in 2004, Assurant adjusted the earnings performance measure to exclude losses related to hurricanes along the Atlantic coastline. This adjustment helped to increase the company's net operating income and therefore raised bonuses to the company's executives in 2004.

It is impossible to pinpoint precisely how much the hurricane exclusion bolstered the Assurant executives' bonuses in 2004. Company filings stated that without two exclusions, one of which was the hurricane impact, bonuses would have been equal to half of their target. Thanks to the adjustments, bonuses were paid at 1.72 times their target.

DOJ_NMG_0030712

As James F. Reda, an independent compensation consultant in New York, pointed out, shareholders cannot adjust their results for things like hurricane losses, or losses on divestitures or discontinued operations, all of which deplete shareholder equity.

"What a lot of these plans are trying to look at is core business, and it is a decent argument," Mr. Reda said. "But sometimes people get lazy and put all sorts of stuff in the restructuring bucket that don't belong there — like operating expenses. Once you give management a little wiggle room, being smart people, they can figure out ways to take advantage of it."

Often, company officials include everyday expenses — like those relating to sales and administration — in restructuring costs, making the company appear to be far more profitable.

In some cases, performance measures appear to reflect basic operational tasks expected of an executive, not something worthy of extra pay. Last year, Assurant's compensation committee chose four elements to determine whether its executives deserved a bonus. Three were fairly typical financial measures: net operating income, revenue growth and return on equity at the company.

The fourth measure, though, was how well Assurant's executives complied with Sarbanes-Oxley, the law enacted in 2002 after Enron and WorldCom collapsed. According to company filings, one-quarter of an executive's bonus calculation related to his or her "compliance with Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act," a part of the law that relates to a company's internal financial controls.

Last year, J. Kerry Clayton, Assurant's chief executive; Robert B. Pollock, its president, and Lesley Silvester, an executive vice president, all received bonuses that were 1.62 times their targets.

The compensation committee of Assurant's board is headed by Beth L. Bronner, chief marketing officer of Jim Beam Brands, a division of Fortune Brands. She is joined on the committee by Charles John Koch, vice chairman of the board of the Citizens Financial Group; Michele Coleman Mayes, general counsel for Pitney Bowes, and John M. Palms, president emeritus of the University of South Carolina.

Melissa Kivett, head of investor relations at Assurant, said that the hurricane exclusions in 2004 were appropriate. Because of a substantial increase in Assurant's stock price, she said, "the compensation committee of our board felt that on this one occasion they needed to make an adjustment to net operating income to recognize and compensate management for this record performance."

As for the bonuses relating to Sarbanes-Oxley, Ms. Kivett said they were designed "to ensure that we had all the processes in place to meet compliance goals. The result was we did have a clean SOX opinion." She added that this year, the portion of the bonus related to Sarbanes-Oxley was smaller than it was in 2005.

But Paul Hodgson, senior research associate at the Corporate Library, an institutional research firm in Portland, Me., said paying a bonus for compliance with a law was unusual. "I can see making compliance a requirement," he said. "Because they were not a public company until 2004 they didn't have to comply with Sarbanes-Oxley before. But actually giving them a bonus for it is taking it a step further than my logic can let me go. Compliance with the law is part of your day-to-day work, not something you have to be incentivized for."

Another company that gave extra pay to executives for regular business activities was Halliburton. Its top executives received special bonuses last year for settling asbestos litigation in which the company was a defendant.

Halliburton's filings described the asbestos settlement as a "historical achievement" requiring a "tremendous amount of effort and sacrifices on the part of the employees who worked diligently over the last three years orchestrating and implementing this uniquely creative and complicated strategy."

In recognition of their performance, the company paid cash bonuses totaling $5.5 million to 36 employees. Among them were C. Christopher Gaut, Halliburton's chief financial officer; Albert O. Cornelison Jr., the company's general counsel, and Mark A. McCollum, the chief accounting officer. Mr. Gaut received $750,000, Mr. Cornelison received $1 million and Mr. McCollum received $50,000.

David J. Lesar, the company's chief executive, did not receive cash for his contribution to the asbestos settlement. He decided to take an option grant of 100,000 shares, worth $2.04 million at the time, as his extra pay for his settlement work.

Halliburton's compensation committee is made up of Robert L. Crandall, former chief executive of AMR, the parent of American Airlines; Kenneth T. Derr, the committee's chairman and a former chief executive of Chevron; W. R. Howell, a former chief executive of J. C. Penney; and Debra L. Reed, president of the San Diego Gas and Electric Company.

None of the directors returned phone calls seeking comment about the asbestos awards. Cathy Mann, a Halliburton spokeswoman, said: "This additional compensation was for the extraordinary amount of time and effort these individuals exerted, which was above and beyond what is normally expected of them in relation to their job responsibilities."

At least Halliburton and Assurant produced strong returns to shareholders last year before handing over more to executives.

Perhaps most exasperating to shareholders are bonuses to executives who fail to meet their basic performance targets. Consider what was paid to Dan W. Matthias, chief executive of Mothers Work, a maternity retailer, and his wife, Rebecca C. Matthias, the company's president.

According to the company's filings, Mr. and Mrs. Matthias were not entitled to either a cash bonus or an option grant during the year because the company failed to achieve the expected growth in earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation and amortization.

Each of the Matthiases, though, received a grant of 40,000 stock options in fiscal 2005, on top of half-million-dollar salaries. The company's compensation committee wanted to "recognize the progress made in the past year in both the development and launch of the company's strategic business initiatives, which included its Destination Maternity superstores and expansion of the company's relationship with Sears and a new tie with Kohl's, another retailer," its filing said.

"The compensation committee believes that the stock options grant is consistent with aligning the interests of these senior executives with the stockholders and will serve to reinforce the importance of improving stockholder value over the long term," the filing said.

Those stock options, if they have not been cashed in, are now worth $2.8 million.

The compensation committee of Mothers Work is overseen by Joseph A. Goldblum, a private investor; David Schlessinger, founder of Five Below, a discount retailer; and William A. Schwartz Jr., chief executive of U.S. Vision, an optical products retailer.

A spokeswoman for Mothers Work said neither the company nor its directors would comment on the option grant.

"What is often missing in these after-the-fact changings of the bonus rules of engagement is a sufficient — or any — quid pro quo," said Brian Foley, an independent compensation consultant in White Plains. Mr. Foley suggests that companies instead delay paying part of the bonus or stretch out the performance period to link the payout to an improvement in performance.

Like Mothers Work, Big Lots paid bonuses to executives last year even though performance was lagging. Big Lots, a discount retailer based in Columbus, Ohio, is going through a restructuring and last year hired a new chief executive, Steven S. Fishman. Performance criteria set by the compensation committee were not met, its proxy filing pointed out.

Still, four executives received one-time bonuses in 2005, on top of other pay. Brad A. Waite, executive vice president of Big Lots, received a bonus of $375,000; John C. Martin, also executive vice president, received $279,000; Lisa M. Bachmann, senior vice president, received $187,500, and Joe R. Cooper, chief financial officer, received $175,000.

As the Big Lots filing explained, without those one-time bonuses, the executives' cash compensation would have been below the market average. The committee determined that the pay additions would not be excessive.

Big Lots' shares started 2005 at $12.13 and ended the year at $12.01. Charles W. Haubiel, general counsel at Big Lots, said the bonuses were given to keep the company's talent intact during a time of uncertainty. "The compensation committee identified a core group of executives," he said, "and devised a retention program that said if you stay on during the year during the C.E.O. search process, you will receive a retention bonus equal to the target bonus you are typically eligible for."

The compensation committee of Big Lots is headed by David T. Kollat, president of 22 Inc., a research consulting firm, who is also on the board of Wolverine World Wide, a shoe manufacturer, and Select Comfort, a maker of air-bed mattresses. The committee's other members are Brenda J. Lauderback, a former president of the wholesale division of the Nine West Group, a shoe maker, who is also on the board of Wolverine Worldwide and Select Comfort; and Dennis P. Tishkoff, chief executive of the Drew Shoe Corporation.

These examples indicate that companies do not always practice what they preach about pay for performance. As a result, investors must read company proxies closely.

DOJ_NMG_0030714

Back at the Las Vegas Sands, for example, the company's regulatory filings say that executive bonuses will be paid only when they are earned. Bonuses are generated, the company said, "only upon the attainment of the applicable performance goals during the applicable performance period." The compensation committee of the Las Vegas Sands' board establishes both the goals and the period during which they are measured, the filings state.

Last year's $2.8 million mistake proves otherwise, however. The mistaken payout was equal to almost 1 percent of the company's earnings.

The unearned bonuses are notable not only because they followed $62 million in bonuses paid to the five men in 2004 (to reflect the "significant value" they created for shareholders when they helped secure financing for a mall at the Palazzo Hotel and Casino, adjacent to the Venetian). They are also striking because they cannot be justified as performance-based under the tax code. The extra bonuses therefore were not deductible as a business expense, making them more costly for shareholders.

The error did prompt a meeting on March 1 of the four-man compensation committee of Las Vegas Sands' board, its filings stated. The committee considered what to do about the overpayments, and a majority concluded that the company's performance supported them. One member of the committee dissented, the filing said: James L. Purcell, who retired as a partner at Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison in 1999.

The members who voted to allow the executives to keep the unearned bonuses were Irwin Chafetz, a former executive at the Interface Group, a vacation tour operator that is owned by Mr. Adelson, Las Vegas Sands' chief executive; Charles Forman, a former executive at the Interface Group who is chief executive officer of the Centric Events Group, a trade show and conference business; and Michael A. Leven, founder of U.S. Franchise Systems, franchisor of Microtel Inns and Suites. Even though Mr. Chafetz and Mr. Forman have extensive affiliations, either present or past, with Mr. Adelson's Interface Group, they are considered independent directors according to New York Stock Exchange standards.

A company spokesman said that neither Mr. Purcell nor the other members of the compensation committee of Las Vegas Sands' board would comment on the bonus overpayments. Las Vegas Sands officials who might be able to discuss the bonuses were traveling and unreachable, he said.

Mr. Foley, the independent compensation consultant, said he had never seen anything like the multimillion-dollar mistakes last year at Las Vegas Sands. "There's nothing like playing by the house rules," he said, "when you own the house, the chips, the rules and the croupiers."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Black Caucus Backs Jefferson's Staying Put (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

Rep. William J. Jefferson has been asked by the House Democratic leader to step down from the Ways and Means Committee owing to the lingering FBI bribery investigation, but the Louisiana Democrat has refused and won the support of the Congressional Black Caucus (CBC).

"Mr. Jefferson has not been charged with anything, so to forcibly remove him from a seat on the Ways and Means Committee would be unprecedented," the CBC said in a statement.

The 42 House members and one senator in the black caucus have not publicly discussed the scandal surrounding one of their own, but several staffers of CBC members have told The Washington Times that some lawmakers see a double standard in the resignation demand by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat.

The staffers said that she has made no similar demand for Rep. Allan B. Mollohan, West Virginia Democrat, who also is involved in an ethics scandal, to step aside from the House Appropriations Committee.

Mr. Jefferson has been upset with Mrs. Pelosi since she rejected his 2002 request to become chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in favor of her fellow California Democrat, the now-deceased Rep. Robert T. Matsui, who seconded her candidacy to become the party leader.

DOJ_NMG_0030715

Mr. Jefferson has proclaimed that he is not guilty in the bribery case and has not been charged, but a former staffer and two associates have pleaded guilty to bribing him and helping his family members' business interests in Africa in exchange for favors. The FBI raided his office last month, touching off a tense battle between Congress and the Justice Department.

Mrs. Pelosi said she asked Mr. Jefferson to step down "in the interest of upholding the high ethical standard of the House Democratic Caucus." But she has not moved to remove him forcibly and likely will not, said a Democrat staffer, because that would take a full vote of the House.

"She could also ask for a vote of no confidence by the entire Democratic Caucus," the staffer said, but added that this also is unlikely.

The Jefferson bribery investigation comes while Democrats have tried to tag the Republican majority as one engaged in a "culture of corruption" and "unethical behavior." But the issue has also caused problems internally because of the perceived disparity in the way Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Mollohan are being disciplined, said some staffers of CBC members.

A conservative group in West Virginia called for an investigation into Mr. Mollohan's dealings with a distant cousin, who used his connection to the congressman to win work with a nonprofit that Mr. Mollohan established and a federal contract in his district that was pulled for noncompliance in the late 1990s.

The cousin, Joseph L. Jarvis Jr., owes the nonprofit $67,681 in unpaid rent, but he jointly owns 27 condominiums in the Remington, a building in Washington, worth $8 million. In addition, the inquiries delve into other foundations that Mr. Mollohan has established that collectively have received millions in federal tax dollars through the appropriations process.

Despite the apparent smell of pork-spending for personal gain, Mr. Mollohan has not been asked to step down from his seat on the House Appropriations Committee.

A Democratic House staffer said the cases are different, noting that Mr. Mollohan "cooperated" with the House leadership and voluntarily gave up his spot as ranking Democrat on the House Standards of Official Conduct Committee. The staffer also noted that the FBI has refused to confirm that Mr. Mollohan is being investigated, that no associates or staffers have pleaded guilty to anything and that there are no reports that he had been caught on tape taking bribes or making deals.

The black caucus, however, is not so sure that that removes the perception of a double standard, because Mr. Mollohan's position as an appropriator is a key part of the investigation.

"They basically asked him to step down from ethics, and he said, 'Thank you,' " one staffer said.

Op-Ed: Lawmakers' Offices Not Immune From Searches (BSUN)

By Steven P. Grossman

The Baltimore Sun, June 1, 2006

In a rare demonstration of bipartisan cooperation, House Speaker Dennis Hastert and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi together criticized the FBI's search of the office of Rep. William J. Jefferson, the Louisiana Democrat who is under investigation in connection with the alleged acceptance of bribes.

How heartwarming it is that two people who seem to agree on little that can benefit the country have come together to defend the right of their colleagues to have some sort of special immunity from search warrants issued to uncover crimes committed by legislators. They said the investigators, like the investigated, are not above the law. A noble thought, but one that needs to be examined.

The Justice Department did obtain a search warrant to authorize the search of Mr. Jefferson's office. In other words, investigators prepared a sworn statement that demonstrated to a judge that there was probable cause, meaning it was more likely than not that there was evidence of a crime to be found in the congressman's office.

According to an FBI affidavit, agents videotaped Mr. Jefferson meeting about receiving money in exchange for favorable treatment of a business venture in Nigeria. It said he was shown being handed a briefcase containing $100,000 in cash and later was found to have secreted $90,000 in his refrigerator. The New Orleans congressman has not been charged with a crime.

The role of the courts in the warrant process cannot be overstated. The framers of our Constitution wrote the Fourth Amendment to protect us from illegal searches and seizures.

There are two separate and independent requirements the government must meet before it searches a private home or business. The first is that there must be probable cause for the search. The second is that the government must obtain a warrant from a magistrate authorizing and properly limiting the search.

The reason the framers included the warrant requirement was that they saw the courts as the intermediary between the forces of law and order and the citizenry.

They did not want the government intruding on people's privacy rights and freedoms based on a law enforcement officer's determination of whether probable cause existed. It is for this reason that President Bush's arguments in favor of wiretapping and telephone interceptions (considered to be searches under the Fourth Amendment) without seeking proper authorization from a judge have been so widely and correctly criticized.

Despite laws specifically designed to facilitate and speed up the process by which the government can obtain warrants from magistrates always at their disposal for these purposes, the Bush administration has invaded people's privacy rights without obtaining judicial permission. If you want to worry about government overreaching, worry about this.

Some critics of the search have legitimate concerns about the separation of powers between government branches and particularly express concern that such searches can be too political and too broad and can uncover documents not connected with the investigation and which the proper workings of government require to be kept private.

That is why we have courts and why the framers imposed requirements not just to authorize a search but also to ensure that the search is limited in scope and duration. The courts for years have limited searches in this way.

For example, in authorizing searches of newspaper offices for evidence that could assist a criminal investigation, the Supreme Court has made it clear that such searches must be limited in ways designed to minimize the likelihood that material protected by the First Amendment's freedom of the press requirement will be disturbed.

The same type of minimization requirements should be imposed when the courts authorize the search of a legislative office. There is nothing in the Fourth Amendment or case law, however, that immunizes congressional offices from legitimate government searches.

Despite Fourth Amendment protections, abuses can occur in obtaining and executing a search warrant for a legislator's office. But such abuses can and do occur every day when search warrants are used in criminal investigations. Such abuses tell us that we must be more vigilant than we have been in avoiding these abuses. They do not, however, tell us we should stop searching.

Office Raid Looking A Lot Like Overkill (NOTP)

By James Gill

New Orleans Times-Picayune, June 1, 2006

The question is on everyone's lips, but New Orleans criminal defense lawyer Pat Fanning asks it with rare eloquence.

Quoting from his e-mail here, "If they really do have video and audio tapes of the cash transaction, 90 large in the freezer, two rat flips dying to throw up all over poor Billy Boy, a good-looking, kajillionaire do-gooder for a victim, numerous other tapes and documents etc., etc. then what in the hell could be so damned important in Dollar Bill's office that they couldn't live without it?"

The feds aren't saying. Although they released the affidavit that secured the warrant to search the Capitol Hill office of Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, the section listing the evidence they sought was blacked out. Putting the affidavit in the public record before Jefferson has even been charged with a crime was an unusual move, but then this was a historic moment, the first time the G-men ever barged into the Rayburn Building.

It's not every day that Republicans take up the cause of an allegedly crooked Democrat either, but that is what the federal raid wrought. Such was the bipartisan squawk in Congress that President Bush, though brushing aside demands that the seized evidence be returned, did order the Justice Department not to take another gander at it for 45 days.

DOJ_NMG_0030717

In what was decidedly not a first, the protesting members of Congress spouted a great deal of pishtosh, denouncing the raid as contrary to the separation of powers principle and a violation of the Constitution's speech and debate clause.

That clause stipulates that "for any Speech or Debate in either House, they (members of Congress) shall not be questioned in any other Place." Neither that, nor any other provision of the Constitution, seems to have been written in order to thwart the investigation of public bribery.

It is unlikely in any case that many voters bought the line that the brouhaha was over constitutional principle. This Congress has meekly acquiesced in too many executive power grabs to be taken seriously on that issue. Many citizens will assume the worm turned because dark secrets lurk in the recesses of other congressional offices.

If the raid generated sympathy for Jefferson in Congress, it does not seem to have had the same effect anywhere else. Still, the Justice Department will need to have uncovered some pretty juicy evidence if the raid is to be worth the resentment it stirred up in Congress and the consequent distraction and delay.

The affidavit filed with the warrant application gives the strong impression that the feds have enough on Jefferson to send him away for many years -- maybe, he being 59 years old, the rest of his life. Whatever else they found in their latest raid could hardly have made his plight any worse. So far as Jefferson is concerned the feds are just running up the score, although it may be that his files contained evidence against accomplices unknown to the public.

Legal experts speculated that the raid may have been staged to pressure Jefferson into a deal. But it is hard to imagine that, even with a guilty plea, Jefferson would be offered a sentence to jump at. Two accomplices have reached plea deals of their own and agreed to testify against Jefferson . The first of them to be sentenced, his former congressional aide Brett Pfeffer, just got eight years.

Although Pfeffer's sentence will probably be reduced if his testimony pleases prosecutors at trial, it does provide a benchmark that Jefferson might contemplate with a shudder. As the alleged criminal mastermind, Jefferson would have to get significantly more for his guilty plea than Pfeffer got for his, especially as judges like to tack on extra time for betrayal of the public trust. Jefferson is in such deep trouble that he might have little to lose by rolling the dice at trial.

Federal investigations are always reminiscent of molasses in February, but we are all wondering now what else is required for an indictment. The feds got Pfeffer, they got Vernon Jackson, who has confessed to paying serious sweeteners and they got Lori Mody a "good-looking kajillionaire" to Fanning but a "cooperating witness" in official parlance. Mody wore a wire when handing over $100,000 in cash that investigators say had been requested to bribe a Nigerian official but most of which was later discovered in a freezer when the FBI raided Jefferson's Washington residence.

Noe Pleads Guilty To Federal Campaign Fund-raising Charges (COLDIS)

By Mark Niquette, The Columbus Dispatch

Columbus Dispatch, June 1, 2006

Coin dealer faces likely 2-year prison sentence

TOLEDO -- Indicted coin dealer Thomas W. Noe pleaded guilty today to illegally using friends and associates to funnel $45,400 to President Bush's re-election campaign.

Noe changed his previous not-guilty pleas to three federal charges to "guilty" during a hearing before U.S. District Judge David A. Katz.

Katz delayed sentencing Noe until after a presentence report is completed, but authorities said that advisory guideline call for two to two-and-a-half years in prison plus possible fines.

Noe had faced up to 15 years in prison and fines up to $950,000 if convicted on all counts but can receive a reduced sentence for admitting responsibility. Federal prosecutors said they also plan to seek additional penalties for the loss of public confidence in the presidential election process.

Noe, 51, read a brief statement before pleading guilty, saying he came to court to voluntarily accept responsibility and to spare his family and friends the embarrassment of further court proceedings.

The former Maumee coin dealer pleaded not guilty after being indicted last October and was set to stand trial July 24. But he notified the court last month he wanted to change that plea.

Prosecutors said Noe circumvented the $2,000 federal limit on individual contributions by giving his own money to 24 people as "conduits" to donate illegally to Bush in their names.

Noe carried out the scheme to fulfill a pledge to raise $50,000 for the Bush-Cheney campaign at a 2003 fundraiser in Columbus, according to the indictment.

The former Maumee coin dealer was listed by the Bush-Cheney campaign as one of 19 Ohio "Pioneers" -- someone who raised at least $100,000 for the campaign.

Noe faced one count of conspiracy to violate the Federal Election Campaign Act, one count of violating the act and one count of causing the Bush-Cheney campaign to file a false campaign finance report.

Federal officials have said it is the largest conduit scheme ever prosecuted under new campaign-finance restrictions passed in 2002 and "one of the first and most important examples" of federal efforts to crack down on such activity.

"(It is) one of the most blatant and excessive campaign-finance criminal schemes we have encountered," Noel Hillman, head of the Justice Department's public-integrity section, said last fall after Noe's indictment.

Federal authorities have said that conduits -- or the "super conduits," who recruited other conduits in the scheme -- typically aren't prosecuted in such cases if they cooperate against the main target.

Even so, four current or former Toledo-area public officials who have been identified as conduits could face state ethics charges related to not reporting the money received from Noe. A special prosecutor has been appointed in that matter.

Separate from the federal case, Noe also faces 53 state felony counts related to his handling of an ill-fated $50 million investment in rare coins and other items for the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation.

The charges against Noe include theft, forgery and engaging in a pattern of corrupt activity. Auditors determined more than $13.5 million was misspent.

Noe has pleaded not guilty to those charges and is free on bond. His trial is scheduled for Aug. 29 in Lucas County Common Pleas Court in Toledo, although Noe has asked to have the trial moved to another county because of pre-trial publicity.

Noe Pleads Guilty To Illegally Funneling Donations To Bush (TOLB)

By MIKE WILKINSON And STEVE EDER, BLADE STAFF WRITERS

Toledo Blade (OH), June 1, 2006

Former GOP fund-raiser Tom Noe admitted today that he used politicians, former aides to Gov. Bob Taft, coworkers, and friends to illegally pour thousands of dollars into the effort to reelect President Bush.

Noe entered a guilty plea before U.S. District Court Judge David Katz in Toledo to all three felony charges he faced for violating federal campaign finance law. Appearing with his sister and brother-in-law and three attorneys, Noe was calm and responsive to Judge Katz' questions during the 47-minute hearing.

Then, in a brief, 10-second statement, Noe said he voluntarily agreed to change his plea "to accept responsibility to spare my family and friends the further embarassment of any additional court proceeding. Therefore, I plead guilty."

No date was set for sentencing pending a pre-sentencing report to the judge. Noe, who lives in Florida, remains free on $350,000 bond.

With the admission, Noe faces a maximum of five years in prison on each count, but likely faces 24-30 months in prison. He also faces a potential fine of nearly $1 million, and possibly probation.

John Pearson, an assistant U.S. Attorney in the public integrity section of the Justice Department, said he would seek an even harsher penalty for Noe because of the "potential loss of public faith in the presidential race."

Noe, 51, was indicted in October on three charges related to the funneling of more then $45,000 into the Bush campaign at a $2,000-a-seat fund-raiser in Columbus in October, 2003. The Bush campaign later named Noe a “Pioneer” for raising at least $100,000 overall.

At the time of his indictment, a senior Justice Department official said the Noe case represented the largest campaign money-laundering scheme prosecuted by the U.S. Justice Department since new campaign finance laws were enacted by Congress in 2002.

The Noe probe identified several current and former politicians as “conduits,” including Toledo City Councilman Betty Shultz, Lucas County Commissioner Maggie Thurber, former Toledo mayor Donna Owens, and former state representative Sally Perz.

All face potential state ethics charges for failing to disclose the money from Noe. He still faces more than four dozen other charges in Lucas County Common Pleas Court on allegations that he stole millions of dollars from two rare-coin funds he managed for the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation.

Coin Dealer Awaits Federal Sentence With State Case Pending (AP)

By ANDREW WELSH-HUGGINS, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

TOLEDO, Ohio — A prominent GOP fundraiser no sooner pleaded guilty to breaking federal campaign finance law than he began fighting to stay out of prison with his trial over the state's ill-fated $50 million coin investment looming.

Tom Noe, also at the center of a state political scandal, pleaded guilty Wednesday to charges that he illegally funneled about $45,000 to President Bush's re-election campaign.

The investment scandal has been a major embarrassment for Ohio's ruling Republicans and has given Democrats a better shot this year at winning state offices, including the governor's office that the GOP has held since 1991.

Once a powerful political figure who raised hefty sums for a slew of Republicans, Noe admitted arranging a contribution scheme to fulfill his promise to generate $50,000 for a Bush fundraiser.

Noe said Wednesday that he decided to plead guilty to "spare my family and many dear friends" the ordeal of a trial. The former Toledo-area coin dealer who now lives in the Florida Keys remained free on bond.

Noe, 51, is charged in state court with stealing up to $1 million of the coin investment he managed for the state insurance fund for injured workers. He has pleaded not guilty and is scheduled for trial Aug. 29.

Noe's attorney argued his client's access to lawyers before that trial is crucial. Prosecutors told U.S. District Judge David Katz the upcoming trial was no reason to delay Noe's sentencing on the federal conviction.

"The fact he has other state charges does not mean he should receive special treatment for better or for worse," said John Pearson, an attorney with the U.S. Justice Department's public integrity unit.

Katz said he'll decide after reviewing court officials' sentencing report.

Prosecutors told Katz they would recommend a total sentence of two years to 2 1/2 years for all three convictions. The maximum sentence is five years in prison on each of the three counts and a combined $950,000 in fines.

Noe took the conviction in stride, chatting with family members on a bench outside the courtroom before the hearing began and making occasional calls on his cell phone.

Investigators have not said whether Noe used money from the state coin fund for campaign contributions. Pearson said Wednesday that wouldn't be a factor in determining Noe's federal sentence, but he added prosecutors would ask for a lengthier sentence because the case may have caused a loss of confidence in the presidential election.

Noe was charged with exceeding federal campaign contribution limits, using others to make the contributions and causing the Bush campaign to submit a false campaign-finance statement. Prosecutors said Noe gave $45,400 to 24 friends and associates who made the campaign donations in their own names, allowing him to skirt the $2,000 limit on individual contributions.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Seth Uram said Noe told his friends to tell investigators that the money was a loan. At least four told investigators they knew what they were doing was illegal, he said.

Noe wrote several checks just under the cap to avoid suspicion because he knew the scheme violated campaign finance laws since he had received literature from the Bush campaign outlining the federal rules, Uram said. Noe wrote the checks in the eight days leading up to a fundraiser in October 2003 at a downtown Columbus hotel.

DOJ_NMG_0030720

Among those who donated money that came from Noe were several Toledo area officeholders and a former mayor. A lawyer for three said they were not in danger of being charged because they cooperated with investigators.

Investigations into Noe's coin investment, first reported in April 2005 by The Blade newspaper, led to Gov. Bob Taft's no contest plea and conviction in August to charges he accepted golf outings and other gifts that he didn't report.

Noe personally contributed more than $105,000 to Republicans including Bush and Taft during the 2004 campaign. The Bush-Cheney campaign donated $6,000 it received from Noe and his wife, Bernadette, to charity. The rest of the money donated at the Bush fundraiser in October 2003 remains with the Republican Party.

Democrats criticized Bush for keeping the contributions, with Ohio Democratic chairman Chris Redfern calling for the money to be donated to the state workers' comp bureau.

Aaron McLear, spokesman for the Republican National Committee, which represents the inactive Bush campaign, said the group is waiting for a directive it expects from the court about what to do with the money.

FBI Arrests 2 Pa. Legislative Aides (WP)

By Maryclaire Dale

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

PHILADELPHIA -- The FBI arrested two men who did computer work for a powerful state senator Wednesday on charges that they permanently deleted e-mails to thwart a federal investigation.

Leonard P. Luchko and Mark Eister performed electronic "wipes" of computers at Sen. Vincent J. Fumo's Senate offices, his home at the New Jersey shore and at a nonprofit with deep ties to Fumo, the FBI alleged in an affidavit.

"This was a deliberate, systematic and ultimately successful effort to interfere with a federal investigation," U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said. "We have to assume that valuable information is lost forever."

The document does not name Fumo and he has not been charged, but Meehan said the probe is not over. The affidavit refers to an unidentified senator who clearly is Fumo.

Luchko and Eister, employees of a state Senate entity that provides computer services to its Democratic members, are charged with obstruction of justice.

The aides' lawyers say they were just doing their jobs, securing the privacy of communications. Prosecutors, however, say e-mails were deleted as the FBI demanded files as part of their grand jury investigation into Fumo's links to the nonprofit.

"Boss is driving us ALL nuts with this FBI madness," Luchko wrote in a June 2004 e-mail, according to court documents. Prosecutors allege that Luchko wrote to Eister to same day, saying Fumo wanted all e-mail between him and his Harrisburg staff deleted weekly.

The investigation centers on whether Fumo used his office to extort corporate donations for the Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, which benefits Fumo's South Philadelphia district. Investigators are trying to find out if the senator "benefited both politically and personally from expenditures made" by the nonprofit, according to court documents.

The nonprofit, which has helped finance charter schools and refurbished run-down properties in South Philadelphia, has obtained millions of dollars in donations from powerful entities that lobby the Legislature.

Prosecutors say they have numerous e-mails from third-party sources that show Fumo used the nonprofit to funnel money to projects and causes important to him.

Fumo, the ranking Democrat on the Senate appropriations committee, is one of the most influential politicians in Harrisburg. He has said requests for donations to Citizens Alliance were efforts to help his district and did not influence his policy positions.

"The government has made it clear that it will go to any length to get Senator Fumo," Fumo's lawyer, Richard Sprague, said in a statement. "These two individuals arrested today are unfortunately victims of the process of attempting to get the senator. Their trials will prove that."

Luchko, 49, of Collingdale, and Eister, 36, of Camp Hill, were arrested at their homes before daybreak, the FBI said. They were released on bail, ordered not to talk to Fumo staff members and told to return to court next week.

DOJ_NMG_0030721

Luchko's lawyer, James C. Schwartzman, said he was surprised to learn of the arrests because he had repeatedly offered to have his client surrender. He promised to fight the charges and said Luchko was not under any pressure to please Fumo.

Eister's lawyer, Brian McMonagle, said his client routinely deleted e-mails for security reasons long before the FBI probe.

2 Fumo Aides Charged With Cover-up (PHI)

By Craig R. Mccoy, Emilie Lounsberry And Mario F. Cattabiani

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 1, 2006

Stepping up the pressure in their investigation of State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo, federal agents yesterday arrested two low-level aides and charged them with a scheme to obstruct justice by hiding the senator's e-mails from the FBI.

The arrests, the first in the three-year investigation, were seen as a hardball move by federal prosecutors: an attempt to squeeze the computer technicians into striking deals and testifying against Fumo.

At 6 a.m., FBI and IRS agents rousted Leonard Luchko, 49, and Mark Eister, 36, taking them in handcuffs to the federal courthouse in Center City.

The two men were accused of wiping e-mail and other evidence from computers used by Fumo, his staff, and a wealthy nonprofit with ties to Fumo, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods.

There was more: Prosecutors released a richly detailed, 65-page FBI affidavit that quoted e-mails from the two technicians, saying they were following Fumo's orders.

"The FBI probe into the Senator has really set him off," Luchko wrote in one message found by the FBI. "... He wants all the Blackberries wiped."

U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said that the deletions amounted to a "pervasive, deliberate and continual effort to stifle the investigation."

Meehan would not discuss Fumo's future, but he did say the inquiry was still under way. "I would suggest we're not finished with this yet," he said.

The affidavit also provides the government's first public disclosure of the scope of its investigation: whether Fumo was "engaged in extortion" in trying to get corporate contributions for Citizens' Alliance, and whether any of those contributions were used to benefit Fumo politically or personally.

Possible crimes in the case could include extortion, conspiracy, mail and wire fraud, honest-services fraud and tax crimes, the affidavit said.

Fumo's attorney said the two technicians were "unfortunate victims" of a campaign to bring down the powerful Philadelphia Democrat. "The government has made it clear that it will go to any length to get Senator Fumo," attorney Richard A. Sprague said.

Sprague said prosecutors stitched together "inaccurate and disputed facts" to draw a falsely sinister conclusion. He suggested the two men were merely following routine data-destruction procedures put in place years earlier.

Fumo, 63, who has served in the state Senate for 27 years, was not available for comment yesterday. Fumo "stands by his employees," Sprague said.

Fumo, who has not been charged with wrongdoing, is not named in the affidavit; he is referred to only as "the Senator." Details in the document make it clear that the senator is Fumo.

Defense lawyers for the two men said their clients have nothing to say to prosecutors. "They better come up with a better plan, if that's the plan," said Brian McMonagle, Eister's attorney.

Luchko, of Collingdale, and Eister, of Camp Hill, near Harrisburg, each face a maximum sentence of five years in prison if convicted. Luchko showed little emotion during a brief hearing yesterday. Eister appeared stunned. They were released on their own recognizance.

Luchko is paid $64,438 by the state. Eister makes $62,125. Both joined Fumo's large technical staff in the late 1990s.

DOJ_NMG_0030722

As The Inquirer has reported, prosecutors in the investigation have sent a target letter to Ruth Arnao, a former top aide to Fumo who is executive director of Citizens' Alliance. In the parlance of federal prosecutors, a "target" refers to someone who is likely to be indicted.

In previous court hearings, prosecutors have alleged she, too, participated in the destruction of documents.

Assistant U.S. Attorneys Robert A. Zauzmer and John Pease are leading the prosecution. Zauzmer said yesterday that the lost documents had taken a toll on the inquiry. "They haven't destroyed it, but we have to assume that valuable information was lost forever," he said.

The investigation began focusing on the corporate donations after The Inquirer reported in 2003 that Peco Energy Co. - engaged in negotiations with Fumo about deregulating electricity rates - had secretly given $17 million to Citizens' Alliance.

Fumo sought money from Verizon Communications at a time when he was backing away from a plan to break up the company. Verizon refused to contribute.

While federal authorities said they ultimately seized 84,000 e-mails during the probe, they said fewer than 125 pertained to Citizens' Alliance.

They said that this showed how pervasive were the deletions and computer wipes, using products with names like SecureClean and PGP Free Space.

How, then, did the prosecutors learn about the deletions?

According to prosecutors, the software experts failed to follow their own instructions and delete their own e-mails.

Prosecutors said they also recovered e-mails from "third-party" recipients, such as outside political consultants.

The affidavit was written by FBI agent Vicki Humphreys; she and agent Kathleen McAfee are the lead agents in the probe.

In the document, Humphreys repeatedly cites the publication dates of Inquirer articles - and then tracks deletions and system wipes that followed.

In November 2003, The Inquirer published its first investigative articles on the nonprofit.

The following month, the affidavit said, Luchko wrote in an e-mail that Fumo had "called me into his office today and told me to start going around and checking everyone's computer and make sure they were not saving his mail."

On Jan. 25, 2004, after The Inquirer reported the federal probe was under way, Luchko sent a mass e-mail to Fumo and staff saying Fumo had ordered tighter computer security.

"The FBI probe into the senator has really set him off," he wrote in another e-mail that night. "He wants us to start doing a number of security checks starting tomorrow... . He wants all of the Blackberries wiped... . S- has [definitely] hit the fan."

At one point, Luchko wrote: "He REALLY wants that mail gone." He added that if Fumo "goes [down], we all go down."

He also justified the deletions, saying the FBI was out to get Fumo. "I don't blame the senator. The FBI is really coming at him hard and he is innocent. I truly believe that or I wouldn't do this."

In 2004, the nonprofit turned over 10 boxes of records to the FBI in response to a subpoena - but "conspicuously" few e-mails, the affidavit says.

While arresting the two technicians, federal authorities have granted immunity to a third technician, Don Wilson, who is cooperating with the probe.

Wilson, identified in the affidavit only as Person No. 1, has told a grand jury that Fumo "knew that we were deleting" and was aware that evidence was being wiped from hard drives, the document says.

He said he would not have engaged in deletions without Fumo's "knowledge and blessing," the document says, though it provides no details.

White-collar defense lawyers called the arrests a textbook effort to pressure Eister and Luchko to cooperate in the probe.

Dan Richman, a former prosecutor who teaches at Fordham University Law School, called the level of detail in the affidavit "extraordinary."

"This seems to be a clear and very public demand for cooperation from the defendants, sooner rather than later," he said.

James C. Schwartzman, who represents Luchko, said his client did nothing wrong and would fight the charges. He questioned why prosecutors had opted to arrest Luchko at a home he shares with his elderly mother at 6 a.m. - when Schwartzman had offered to have him surrender if charges were filed.

Fumo has praised Citizens' Alliance for its work improving a business district in South Philadelphia and supporting a charter school. But Fumo allies have in the past sought to distance him from the nonprofit, pointing out that he holds no official position with it.

In fact, the affidavit states, Fumo was "directly involved in managing and controlling" the affairs of Citizens' Alliance. The document says authorities are investigating whether the charity illegally spent money on politics.

Among other actions, the affidavit said, Fumo directed that $25,000 of the charity's money be used for a Pittsburgh program that would "help garner political support for a politician there whom the senator supported."

The nonprofit also paid $250,000 for political polling, and, sources said, it spent $17,000 to secretly finance a lawsuit against a Fumo foe in the legislature.

Fumo has long been a dominant force in Harrisburg, renowned for his ability to build alliances - and his just-as-legendary feuds. During his years in politics, Fumo has been criminally charged twice. In 1973, he was charged with voter fraud, but the charges were later withdrawn.

In 1980, he was convicted on charges of placing "ghost employees" on the state legislative payroll, but a judge later tossed out the verdict.

As Pressure Mounted, A Scramble To 'Wipe' (PHI)

By Mario F. Cattabiani

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 1, 2006

As FBI agents dug deeper into Vince Fumo's world, the powerful state senator appeared to be feeling the pressure.

In June 2004, according to an FBI affidavit, Fumo e-mailed a top political consultant with a task: Find out what an attorney representing a utility was telling federal authorities.

The lawyer probably wouldn't talk because of attorney-client privilege, the consultant said. Fumo - long known for tight alliances and his tough temper - didn't like the answer.

"FRIENDS are supposed to help FRIENDS!!! Not give them that kind of bulls-!!!" Fumo e-mailed the consultant. "... Ask anyway, so that we will know if we have a future friend or an enemy in your current friend!!! There is no middle ground on this one!! You know how serious and almost life threatening this is... . We will never forget. One way or the other. And right now they owe us big time!!!"

Chock full of anxious e-mails and gritty politics, the FBI affidavit detailing the federal investigation into Fumo gives a previously unseen glimpse into the inner workings of the senator's office, staffed by a loyal and tight-lipped community that lived in fear of the lawmaker, as he lived in fear of prosecutors.

The document portrays Fumo as a politician who tracked the ongoing news coverage of the probe "minute by minute," and implemented changing security measures over two years.

BlackBerrys and servers were wiped clean with the latest software. So, too, were Fumo's computers, even those he kept at his two Shore homes, prosecutors said.

In March 2004, Leonard Luchko - one of the aides charged yesterday - corresponded with an executive at the company that makes Pretty Good Privacy software. He wanted to know if someone could detect that the software had been used to delete files.

"[If] I wiped a computer and the next day someone confiscated would they be able to tell it was wiped at all?" he asked. Given the lack of data, it probably would be detected, the executive said.

"I can't help you... Lets hope they are not sophisticated enough to notice," the executive wrote back.

FBI forensic analysis showed, the affidavit said, that the program was run on the senator's office computer in Philadelphia two months later.

Don Wilson, one computer aide who was granted immunity, has told the grand jury that Fumo was concerned that the FBI might utilize "Carnivore," a surveillance program that could track all computer keystrokes.

He had his aides install software to neutralize that threat, the affidavit said.

The demands took their toll on his top computer aides, whom the affidavit depicts as feverishly trying to meet Fumo's increasing demands for security.

On Jan. 25, 2004, the day The Inquirer ran a front-page story on the federal probe, Luchko sent an e-mail to other Fumo staffers. It read "The FBI probe in the Senator has really set him off..."

Fumo had just requested all staff BlackBerrys be wiped clean. What's more, aides were to do a deep cleaning of all laptop computers, known as a "DOD" wipe, so-called because it uses the standards of the Department of Defense to ensure destruction of all files.

By June of that year, Luchko wrote his supervisor complaining "Boss is driving us ALL nuts with this FBI madness."

Earlier, Luchko complained to another Fumo staffer who had not been deleting e-mails: "You really have to clean your mailbox up this is the kind of s- that can get us in trouble."

In an e-mail headed "venting," Luchko wrote to an unnamed staffer that Fumo "has us doing stuff that I know is going to come back and bite us in the a-... . I don't blame the Senator the FBI is really coming at him hard and he is innocent I truly believe that or I wouldn't do this..."

By February 2005, Luchko and Mark Eister - the other aide charged - had gotten cocky about their efforts. Luchko e-mailed Eister, saying he believed the FBI would try to lift e-mails from the computer of Ruth Arnao, a former Fumo aide and the director of the nonprofit Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods.

"Good Luck to them because they are going to need it," he wrote, adding in a subsequent e-mail: "They aren't getting s- off that PC..."

Feds: E-mail Deletions Were Obstruction (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 1, 2006

As the FBI ratcheted up the pressure on state Sen. Vince Fumo, his aides destroyed years worth of e-mails from his office computers, federal prosecutors charged yesterday.

Two state Senate computer-service employees were arrested at their homes early yesterday and charged with obstruction of justice in the ongoing federal probe of Fumo and a Fumo-backed community organization.

Leonard Luchko, 49, of Collingdale, who was assigned to Fumo's Tasker Street district office, and Mark Eister, 36, of Camp Hill, who worked in Harrisburg, allegedly destroyed e-mails and other electronic evidence in an attempt to thwart federal investigators.

Luchko and Eister deleted e-mails from computers in Fumo's Senate offices, from his Jersey shore house and from the Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, the FBI alleged in a 65-page affidavit.

Attorneys for Luchko and Eister said their clients had not committed any crimes and were simply doing their jobs.

The two men, wearing T-shirts and jeans, appeared before U.S. Magistrate Judge Charles P. Smith yesterday and were later released on bail and ordered not to talk with Fumo staffers or witnesses in the probe. Both men are due back in court next week.

James Schwartzman, an attorney for Luchko, said Luchko intends to fight the charges. Asked if he thought the feds were trying to get his client to cooperate with their investigation of Fumo, Schwartzman said: "I would say that's probably a good guess."

Eister's attorney, Brian McMonagle, said his client would be "going to trial and hopes he can meet a fair-minded jury that can tell the difference between a guy doing his job and a criminal conspirator."

Senate rules require staffers charged with crimes related to their jobs to be suspended without pay. It wasn't clear last night if either Luchko or Eister had been suspended. The charging papers for Luchko and Eister detail the lengths to which the two allegedly conspired to thwart the federal probe.

Luchko wrote an e-mail on Dec. 1, 2003, to 24 members of Fumo's staff, including Ruth Arnao, the executive director of Citizens Alliance, and sent a copy to Fumo. The e-mail told staffers they were not to save any e-mails to and from the senator under "ANY circumstance."

Arnao has received a letter from prosecutors identifying her as a target of the investigation.

Luchko also instructed staffers using BlackBerry devices to set up a time with him or a staffer identified as "Person No. 1" in the affidavit "so we can wipe them."

"Person No. 1" is Donald J. Wilson, a computer technician who works in Fumo's Tasker Street office, sources familiar with the probe said.

Wilson has been granted immunity from prosecution. He testified before the grand jury that Fumo "knew that we were deleting the mail out of people's accounts" and that the senator approved it.

Federal authorities declined to comment on Wilson.

Luchko also suggested that Fumo was preoccupied with keeping the FBI away from his e-mails, according to the charges.

In an e-mail to his supervisor in June 2004, Luchko wrote: "Boss is driving us ALL nuts with this FBI madness. My life just got so complicated it isn't even funny and the killer is I can't tell anyone about it."

Fumo clearly felt the heat from FBI investigators.

In a June 8, 2004, e-mail, the affidavit states, Fumo asked a politcal consultant to try to find out from a utility-company attorney what the FBI was investigating. The consultant told him the lawyer probably would decline on attorney-client privilege grounds.

"Ask anyway so that we will know if we have a future friend or an enemy," Fumo wrote in one note. "There is no middle ground on this one!! You know how serious and almost life threatening this is."

Meanwhile, in Harrisburg, Eister allegedly was taking steps similar to Luchko's in Philadelphia.

In June 2004, he instructed all Fumo staff members in Harrisburg to delete e-mail to and from the senator.

U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said the campaign to erase the e-mails had created a "roadblock" for federal investigators.

Federal prosecutors, the FBI and the IRS have been investigating Fumo for more than three years to determine if he extorted payments from corporations on behalf of Citizens Alliance, and whether he benefited politically and personally from Citizens Alliance's spending practices.

Fumo has said that he did nothing wrong and that the donations were simply to help his district.

FUMO UNDER FIRE (PHI)

By Dave Davies

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 1, 2006

RICHARD NIXON was forced to resign the presidency in 1974 not because of the Watergate burglary, but because he participated in its coverup.

Martha Stewart went to jail in 2004 not for insider trading, but for misleading the FBI.

Could state Sen. Vince Fumo face a similar fate?

For three years, a sprawling grand jury investigation of Fumo has delved into yacht trips, property transactions and secret payments to a nonprofit community organization.

But the first charges in the case - against two Fumo aides yesterday - presented information that Fumo participated in a yearlong effort to hide and destroy information sought by the FBI.

Fumo was not charged, and his attorney, Richard Sprague, said in a prepared statement that the feds had presented "inaccurate and disputed facts" in their obstruction-of-justice case against the two low-level employees.

But the 65-page affidavit prosecutors made public yesterday could not have been comforting to Fumo, who predicted at a Harrisburg press lunch in March that the probe would "go nowhere."

There are numerous references to Fumo in the charges against Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister, accused of waging a campaign to destroy e-mails and other electronic evidence after the FBI began looking at Fumo and Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, a non-profit organization associated with Fumo.

"The FBI probe into the Senator has really set him off, he wants us to do a number of security checks..." Luchko wrote in a January 2004 e-mail.

"Boss is driving us ALL nuts with this FBI madness," he wrote at another point.

DOJ_NMG_0030726

If authorities hope to build an obstruction-of-justice case against Fumo, it would be far stronger if they had the testimony of Eister and Luchko, whose e-mails suggest they received instructions directly from Fumo.

The procedure used to charge the two may be specifically designed to put pressure on them and other Fumo associates to cooperate with investigators.

Eister and Luchko were charged not in an indictment, but in a criminal complaint, with an accompanying affidavit.

Two former prosecutors said that typically provides more information about an investigation than an indictment, since the affidavit must convince a magistrate to issue an arrest warrant.

"To a certain extent, that's a press release," said former federal prosecutor Dan Lyons.

"It may be a way of sending a message to other low-level people out there that it's time to start cooperating. It could put out the word that 'We're not going away, and we may be coming after you next,' " he said.

The affidavit mentions more than a dozen other people, without identifying them by name, who had contact with Fumo or the two aides on issues related to the charges.

In addition to presenting the obstruction-of-justice case, the affidavit makes it clear authorities have substantive information about Fumo and his relationship with Citizens Alliance.

Fumo secured a $17 million payment to Citizens Alliance from Peco Energy in connection with the settlement of a rate case.

The federal affidavit says the investigation focuses in part on "whether the Senator engaged in extortion" in extracting the contribution, and whether Citizens Alliance "spent money for the Senator's personal benefit and for political activities," violating its tax-exempt status.

Fumo has always denied any wrongdoing, and Sprague's statement yesterday said, "The government has made it clear it will go to any length to get Senator Fumo."

Citizens Alliance has long argued that it is not controlled by Fumo, but the affidavit cites 10 e-mails that "demonstrate that the Senator controls and directs" Citizens Alliance's "payments to persons and entities that are important to the Senator."

The affidavit says that in a series of e-mails in 2000 and 2001, Fumo directs Citizens Alliance to purchase properties in South Philadelphia and that "he instructs an aide that he alone would decide which properties are to be purchased..."

U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan yesterday said, "We are going to diligently pursue this from this point forward, and I would suggest that we're not finished yet."

Among other areas of the FBI investigation:

• Why Citizens Alliance paid $17,000 to finance a lawsuit against state Sen. Robert Jubelirer, a Fumo foe, challenging Jubelirer's acting as lieutenant governor while holding his Senate seat. The suit was unsuccessful.

• Fumo's negotiations in 2002 with the Swedish furniture retailer Ikea over its effort to open in South Philadelphia.

• Why a subsidiary of Citizens Alliance paid $215,000 for political polling, then got reimbursement from a political-action committee after feds began looking into the organization's activities.

• Fumo's securing of state grants for the Independence Seaport Museum and his use of a luxury yacht owned by the musuem. Fumo eventually repaid the museum for use of the vessel.

FBI Arrests Fumo Aides (PTR)

By Richard Gazarik, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, June 1, 2006

A federal investigation appears to be targeting Democratic state Sen. Vincent Fumo, after a grand jury indicted two legislative aides for allegedly destroying evidence in an investigation of the 63-year-old politician.

A powerful Senate leader, Fumo has been a major political player in Harrisburg and Philadelphia for 28 years. He is the ranking Democrat on the Senate Appropriations Committee.

FBI agents on Wednesday arrested Mark Eister, 36, of Camp Hill, Dauphin County, and Leonard P. Luchko, 49, of Collingdale, Delaware County, charging them with obstructing justice in the systematic destruction of e-mails sent to and by Fumo.

DOJ_NMG_0030727

They also are accused of electronically cleansing the hard drives of 17 computers and hand-held communication devices used by Fumo, his staff and employees of Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, a Philadelphia nonprofit linked to Fumo that is at the center of the investigation.

Fumo's attorney, Richard A. Sprague, released a statement saying that an affidavit released by federal authorities took statements out of context and included inaccurate and disputed facts.

"The fat lady has not yet sung, and the arrests are not the end of the ball game," Sprague said. "These two individuals arrested today are unfortunately victims of the process of attempting to get the senator. Their trials will prove that."

The arrests follow the notification of former Fumo aide Ruth Arnao that she is a grand jury target for allegedly destroying e-mails. The FBI seized financial records of Citizens Alliance, where Arnao serves as executive director.

The government is investigating whether Fumo used Citizens Alliance for political and personal gain.

An unidentified grand jury witness, testifying under grant of immunity, said Fumo's aides discussed destroying communications in case the FBI seized computer hard drives. According to the indictment, Fumo feared "the FBI was going to show up" one day. Agents seized computers from Fumo's Philadelphia and Harrisburg offices in 2004.

Testimony indicated Fumo ordered Eister and Luchko to increase computer security, and personally ordered a computer system cleansing to erase incriminating e-mails. One e-mail shed light on Fumo's frame of mind.

"BOSS is driving us ALL nuts with this FBI madness," Luchko wrote.

In another e-mail, Luchko admitted deleting the e-mail to protect Fumo.

"I don't blame the Senator the FBI is really coming at him hard and he is innocent I truly believe that or I wouldn't do this...."

Luchko also accused the FBI of trying "to manufacture stuff so they can justify the many hours and money spent on a fruitless investigation."

Luchko then added: "Delete it after you read it."

The destruction of the e-mails spanned a 23-month period from 2003-05 and was undertaken, according to the indictment, to prevent incriminating material from falling into FBI hands.

Investigators also are looking into whether Fumo used his position as senator to extort payments from Philadelphia-area corporations on behalf of Citizens Alliance, long a recipient of Fumo's financial largesse.

The nonprofit received $17 million from Peco Energy Co. and $10 million from the Delaware River Authority in 2004 after Fumo brokered secret deals with the two organizations. Investigators are trying to determine whether the money was linked to Fumo's decision to drop a challenge to Peco's deregulation plan and merger with a Chicago-based utility. Fumo is a board member of the Delaware River Authority.

Citizens Alliance also received millions of taxpayers' dollars through Fumo's intercession from a legislative slush fund. Using public money, Citizens Alliance purchased a street sweeper to clean the streets in Fumo's neighborhood. The group also started a charter school and formed a corporation that has bought property worth millions in a section of South Philadelphia.

The FBI grew suspicious that someone in Fumo's employ was destroying evidence because agents examined 84,000 e-mails and recovered an "extremely limited amount" pertaining to the investigation of Fumo and Citizens Alliance.

"That confirms that the effort to destroy such communications was successful," said an FBI affidavit.

But by obtaining e-mails from third parties, the FBI recovered the deleted messages, "which demonstrates that the senator was directly involved in managing and controlling the affairs of (Citizens Alliance)."

Investigators believe Fumo also used the organization's money to help other politicians.

Citizens Alliance gave $25,000 to a "program in Pittsburgh that will help garner political support for a politician there, whom the senator has supported," the affidavit states. It does not name the politician.

Ex-Aide Left Out Details Of Ties To Lobbyist (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0030728

Three officials of the General Services Administration testified that a Bush administration executive left out important details about his relationship with the lobbyist Jack Abramoff, including information about a weeklong golf excursion to Scotland and England. Based on representations by the executive, David Safavian, the officials told a jury in Federal District Court in Washington that they approved the proposed trip for him and closed an investigation of the trip the year after it took place. Mr. Safavian, who was the chief of staff to the administrator of the G.S.A. at the time of the trip, is facing five counts of lying to investigators. Each of the three prosecution witnesses said they would have wanted to know from Mr. Safavian that at the time of the trip Mr. Abramoff was interested in two pieces of property controlled by the services administration.

Prosecution Nears End Of Case Against Safavian (GOVEXEC)

By Jenny Mandel

Government Executive, June 1, 2006

A General Services Administration ethics official and the agency's former general counsel testified Wednesday in the trial of David Safavian, former Office of Management and Budget procurement policy chief, as the government neared the end of presenting its case on his involvement with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Eugenia Ellison, a lawyer who administers GSA's ethics program, testified that she handled then-chief of staff Safavian's request for an ethics opinion in order to join Abramoff and others on a golfing trip to Scotland in 2002. Safavian is charged with lying in the information submitted for that clearance, and with obstructing two later investigations into the matter.

Ellison described how she had reached the decision to clear Safavian's participation based on his description of the outing hosted by Abramoff, a friend and former colleague, as a four-day golfing expedition in which Safavian would pay all costs associated with meals, hotels and greens fees. Airfare, Safavian indicated, was being provided by Abramoff on a private jet, and none of the eight people on the trip would be contributing to cover that cost.

Safavian also indicated that Abramoff had no business before GSA.

Ellison said she approved the gift of airfare for the trip because Abramoff was an old friend of Safavian's and because of Safavian's attestation that the lobbyist worked only on Capitol Hill, which together meant that Abramoff was not a "prohibited source" according to federal regulations.

In a barrage of questions from Justice Department lawyer Nathaniel Edmonds, Ellison indicated she had been unaware that Abramoff was at the time seeking to lease GSA-controlled land in White Oak, Md., for a school he had founded, that he had expressed interest in the GSA-controlled Old Post Office Pavilion in downtown Washington, D.C., and that he had sought to influence GSA policy regarding the consideration of Indian tribes under a classification of disadvantaged businesses.

Ellison said had she known those things at the time, they could have influenced the outcome of the ethics decision.

An official ethics decision, if based on a full and accurate disclosure of relevant facts by the requesting individual, provides a "safe harbor" protection for that person if a subsequent investigation shows that government regulations were not properly followed. Ellison indicated that agency ethics opinions cannot grant such immunity if a criminal infraction is found, but the Justice Department can take into consideration that professional ethical advice had been sought.

Raymond McKenna, GSA's general counsel and the person who formally issued the opinion researched and drafted by Ellison, testified that after the opinion had been issued, Safavian indicated in private conversation that he had decided to pay the cost of the airfare. Safavian eventually paid $3,100 for the trip, far short of his share of a trip estimated to total $140,000.

Questioned as to whether Abramoff's activities with respect to the Old Post Office would have been relevant to whether he was a "prohibited source" for gifts, McKenna said, "The legal advice would have been incomplete, at the very least," without that information.

Neither McKenna nor Ellison recalled a conversation with Safavian to probe for further details on the trip beyond what Safavian had initially provided in his written request for an opinion, but both said such a conversation would have been required based on questions that arose from his initial communication, and it was clear from the opinion ultimately issued that some such communication had taken place.

In questioning, Safavian's lawyer suggested that Ellison may have inadvertently added a short clause -- that Abramoff was not "seeking to do business" with GSA -- to Safavian's statements in the course of writing the ethics opinion. Some have interpreted this more expansive language as lending support to the prosecution's argument that Safavian misled federal and Senate investigators.

Wednesday's witnesses came on the heels of a Tuesday appearance by Neil Volz, former chief of staff to Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio. Volz is a key Justice Department witness, having pleaded guilty to charges that he deprived the public of his honest services. He is cooperating in government investigations in hopes of reducing a possible five-year jail term.

Prosecutors intended to call two additional witnesses, investigators with the Senate and the GSA inspector general's office, to round out their case before Safavian's lawyer, Barbara Van Gelder, begins her defense.

At Safavian Trial, You Can't Tell The Players Without A Scorecard (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

Fore!

The way things are going at the David Safavian trial this week, don't be surprised if, in the coming days, a golf cart bursts into Courtroom 29A of the federal courthouse and a pair of Scotsmen ask if they can play through.

"A lot of discussion in this case is about golf," defense lawyer Barbara Van Gelder observed as she cross-examined an FBI agent in the case, the first trial in the sprawling Jack Abramoff bribery scandal.

"That is correct," replied the agent, Jeffrey Reising.

That is also a whopping understatement. Officially, Safavian, a former senior Bush administration official, is on trial for accepting favors from Abramoff while helping the lobbyist penetrate the General Services Administration -- and then lying about it to investigators. But the case is as much about well-tended greens as ill-gotten green: the twosome's obsessive golfing friendship, particularly a lavish golfing trip to Scotland's St. Andrews in 2002 on Abramoff's tab.

Stephen Perry, a former GSA administrator, was called to the stand. "Do you play golf?" queried prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg.

"I don't know if you could really call it golfing," Perry replied, admitting that he played with Safavian at Andrews Air Force Base.

"You played golf with Mr. Abramoff?" the prosecutor wanted to know.

"Yes," the witness admitted, though he said he thought they were only put in the same foursome by "coincidence."

"Nine holes or 18?" Zeidenberg pressed.

"Eighteen," Perry confessed.

The FBI's Reising had to answer a similar line of questioning. "Do you recall what Mr. Safavian's handicap was?" Zeidenberg queried.

"Twenty-three."

Zeidenberg mentioned that Abramoff listed Safavian's handicap and that of fellow golfer Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) as only 18.

"I don't recall what Jack Abramoff reported to the Old Course about what Congressman Ney's handicap was," the earnest agent replied.

When Neil Volz, the felonious former Ney chief of staff, took the stand, the trial turned into a slide show from the Scotland trip. Ney narrated: "That's myself and David. . . . This is on kind of a famous bridge before the 18th hole. . . . We are in front of the clubhouse. People watch you play golf and it ruins your game."

Prosecutor Nathaniel Edmonds flashed a picture of the legendary St. Andrews rough. "This is more a picture of the grass," Volz testified.

"Why did you take that photo?" Edmonds inquired.

"Because I probably lost 17 or 18 balls in the grass."

Edmonds established that each round of golf was about $400 per person. "Did you ever see [Safavian] pay greens fees or tip the caddy?"

"I did not," the witness said.

DOJ_NMG_0030730

A thick stack of e-mails between Abramoff and Safavian -- which prosecutors have used to demonstrate Safavian's aid to Abramoff as he tried to acquire GSA properties -- also describes a golfing partnership in which regular rounds during the workday were par for the course.

"Can't pull weekday golf until I'm a bit more ensconced as chief of staff," Safavian writes.

"Loser!" Abramoff replies. "I told you to come with me and not the gov!! You'd be playing golf non-stop."

"I can't seem to find the golf cart I lent you," Abramoff says in one e-mail.

"Jack," writes Safavian. "My handicap is a 23. My home course is Springfield Golf and Country Club in Springfield, Virginia. Do you want to try to play Sunday morning or late afternoon?"

"Want to see the new clubhouse at Woodmore?" Abramoff offers.

"Do you want me to see if Steve Perry wants to join you?" Safavian wants to know.

In July, 2002, Abramoff sends Safavian a blank e-mail with the subject line "Golf Friday? Golf Monday? Golf Sunday? Golf golf golf!!!"

"CAN YOU THINK OF A FOURTH?" Safavian asks Abramoff hours before a round in August.

Finally, the men were ready for a change. "Want to go to the Redskins game on Sunday?" Abramoff offered. Safavian countered with a racquetball- and-lunch proposal.

The winter came and Abramoff made Safavian another offer. "I'll be in Florida for the Nickles tournament. (Join me?)"

"I am a hard working civil servant," Safavian replied, "and I have the people's business to do."

Fortunately, the people did not ask him to play golf. For all his practice, his 23 handicap ranks him as a confirmed duffer. This complicated the case for defense lawyer Van Gelder, who is trying to argue that "David was just a golfing guy," not a crooked official.

The endless talk about faraway fairways seems to have teed off the jurors. Yesterday, the judge dismissed juror No. 13, who was a no-show. Juror No. 3 was losing a battle with sleep. But the lawyers pressed on, quizzing GSA official Eugenia Ellison for hours about the ethics of the Scotland golf trip.

She read from Safavian's e-mails seeking permission to take the trip. "I . . . have been invited by a friend and former colleague on a trip to Scotland to play golf for four days," Ellison read. "I will be paying for all my hotels, meals and greens fees."

But Safavian didn't, and now he's in big trouble. Or, as they might say on the Old Course, he's lying triple bogey in the bunker with a large water hazard before the green.

Prosecutors: Dixon Had Extorted Before Waltz (TENN)

By BONNA De La CRUZ, Staff Writer

The Tennessean, June 1, 2006

His defense attorneys say he was entrapped, but prosecutors said Tennessee Waltz defendant Roscoe Dixon had previously extorted money from a business wanting to take part in TennCare.

A Memphis Democrat, the former state senator is the first of the original defendants from the Operation Tennessee Waltz bribery sting to go to trial. His case is being heard in federal court in Memphis.

In his opening statement, Dixon's attorney Coleman Garrett said the proof will show Dixon was entrapped by the government.

"At the end of this case, the question will be whether the government induced the defendant to commit criminal acts he was not predisposed to commit," Garrett said.

In creating the fake company E-Cycle, which was run by undercover FBI agents, the government in turn created the conspiracy, Garrett said.

Conversely, prosecutors outlined their case that Dixon willingly took bribes.

Dixon and alleged "bagman" Barry Myers, who has already pleaded guilty, figured they could pull off extorting money from E-Cycle in part because of its wealth, "but they were really certain they could pull it off because they had done it before," Assistant U.S. Attorney Tim DiScenza said.

The two men had previously demanded and received payment from government informant Tim Willis for a legitimate company he worked for, called Children's Dental Clinic, to be credentialed into TennCare, DiScenza said.

Willis had been motivated to help the FBI in part because he had been found to have fabricated invoices while working for the Shelby County Juvenile Court clerk's office, the prosecutor said.

Prosecution: Dixon Feared Getting Caught; Defense: E-Cycle Is True Criminal (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, June 1, 2006

Federal prosecutors today told a federal court jury that former state senator Roscoe Dixon is "a pretty wily character" who used a middle man to help distance himself from illegal payoffs to avoid getting caught.

Dixon, 56, is charged with conspiracy, extortion and bribery in an undercover FBI operation known as the Tennessee Waltz. His defense attorney told jurors the case was built on entrapment and that Dixon had served his constituuents honorably for 22 years.

The two-year investigation resulted in the indictments of 10 people, including five present or former state lawmakers.

Federal prosecutor Tim DiScenza told jurors Dixon and his associate, Barry Myers, thought a fictitious company named E-Cycle Management Inc. was a well-heeled business that needed "political juice" to be successful in Tennessee. He said Dixon and Myers made up a criminal partnership intent on using Dixon's position to make money without getting caught.

"What they didn't know was that E-Cycle management was an FBI operation," the prosecutor said. "Mr. Dixon was a pretty wily character. As Barry Myers described him, he was paranoid about getting caught."

Dixon is accused of accepting $9,500 in payoffs in exchange for promoting legislation favorable to the bogus computer recycling company.

Myers has pleaded guilty and is expected to testify in the trial.

Defense attorney Coleman Garrett said it was E-Cycle that was a "criminal element." He said the government set up a business to entrap certain people, including Dixon, and that the proof will be that E-Cycle ought to be the defendant in the case.

Garrett called the FBI informants, including political broker Tim Willis, "a pack of con men."

He said the government didn't investigate corruption, they created it, and at the end of the trial, the jury will be thinking that Dixon should be suing the government for malicious prosecution.

Prosecutors played audio and video recordings made in 2003 involving Dixon, Myers and Willis discussing payments Dixon would need to help get a children's dental clinic into the TennCare program. Willis was hired as a lobbyist for the clinic.

In one secretly made videotape on July 8, 2003, in Dixon's Memphis office on Pillow Street, Willis hands Myers a stack of cash with Dixon behind his desk in the near background. FBI agent Brian Burns said he had given Willis $4,000 before the meeting to be used in gaining Dixon's support as chairman of the TennCare Oversight Committee.

In an effort to deflate the defense claims of entrapment, prosecutors said the tapes show Dixon was predisposed to criminal behavior before he was investigated and charged in the Tennessee Waltz public corruption investigation.

Trial Begins For Tenn. Lawmaker (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Filed at 12:33 a.m. ET

MEMPHIS, Tenn. (AP) -- A former state senator thought he could get away with taking bribes because he had done it before, a prosecutor told jurors Wednesday.

The defense countered during opening statements that former Roscoe Dixon was snagged by overzealous government agents and set up by "a pack of con men ... trying to save their own hides from going to jail."

Dixon is one of five current or former state lawmakers charged in a bribery and extortion sting called Tennessee Waltz. He is the first of the five to go to trial, although a former House member pleaded guilty and is in prison.

Barry Myers, whom prosecutors called a "bag man" for Dixon, testified Wednesday that Dixon took bribes for legislative favors but insisted on someone else handling the money.

"Sen. Dixon has always been cautious," Myers said.

Myers is awaiting sentencing on a guilty plea to passing along bribes from undercover FBI agents to Dixon and state Sen. Kathryn Bowers, who is also charged.

Also Wednesday, a secretly recorded video showing a meeting between Dixon and Myers and government informant Tim Willis was played for the jury. In the video, Willis hands $4,000 in cash to Myers and then talks to Dixon about needing help winning state certification for dental clinics for children on TennCare, the state's medical program for the poor and uninsured.

Dixon promises to help but does not touch the money.

"After the meeting was over, we split it," Myers testified.

The meeting in Dixon's office in Memphis in 2003 was part of an investigation into TennCare contracts. Parts of that investigation were rolled into Tennessee Waltz, a probe that began in 2004 and focused on a bogus company, E-Cycle Management, that was set up by the FBI.

Dixon is charged with pressing E-Cycle representatives for $9,500 in bribes handled for him by Myers. Dixon was not charged in the dental clinic investigation.

Breaking News: Defense Attorneys Say Dixon Entrapped In Bribery Sting (CHATTFP)

By Andy Sher, Nashville Bureau

Chattanooga Times Free Press, June 1, 2006

MEMPHIS — Attorneys for former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon portrayed the Tennessee Waltz defendant today as a victim of politically motivated entrapment, but prosecutors said Mr. Dixon previously took bribes to help a company seeking TennCare business.

Opening statements and initial testimony painted two very different pictures of Mr. Dixon, 56, who is one of nine persons charged in the FBI's bribery sting unveiled a year ago.

Defense attorney Coleman Garrett told jurors in his opening statement that FBI agents and the FBI-created company E-Cycle Management Inc., which agents used in the cash-for-favors sting, really were the "main conspirator" and not his client.

"E-Cycle was a criminal enterprise created, concocted and conceived by the federal government .. for the specific purpose of entrapping certain political figures," Mr. Garrett said.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Tim DiScenza told jurors the government entrapped no one. He said then-Sen. Dixon and his "protege," alleged "bagman" Barry Myers, were "pretty sure they would be able to pull this off. They were really certain they could pull it off because they had done it before."

He said then-Sen. Dixon took bribes from FBI informant Timothy Willis to help Forba LLC, which was doing business in Tennessee as Children's Dental Inc. Forba was a real company and Mr. Willis their duly registered lobbyist.

But Forba officials knew nothing about the bribes, Mr. DiScenza said. Uncomfortable with the setup, the FBI then went and created E-Cycle Management, through which undercover agents allegedly offered Mr. Dixon $9,500 in bribes to help with an electronic equipment recycling bill, he said.

Secretly Taped Video Used In Dixon Trial (WMC-TV)

WMC-TV, June 1, 2006

The secretly taped video dates back to July 2003, way before Operation Tennessee Waltz rocked Tennessee politics. Prosecutors say it shows another corruption scheme playing out with Roscoe Dixon front and center.

"This is a fight over money and who gets it," Dixon is heard saying on the tape.

At the time, Dixon was a state senator and chairman of the TennCare Oversight Committee. The tape allegedly shows him accepting cash from FBI informant Tim Willis through confessed bagman Barry Myers. Willis was a lobbyist for a children's dental clinic operated out of this Memphis building. Prosecutors say he paid off Dixon in order to get the clinic into the TennCare program.

"I don't want to take the lead, but I will vote for it," Dixon says on the tape.

"The prosecutor will do his job and I'll do mine to the best of my ability," Dixon's attorney, Coleman Garrett, said during a break on Wednesday.

Garrett was counting on an entrapment defense for Dixon, arguing in opening statements that the government didn't investigate corruption, they created it.

But the government believes the videotape, along with audio recordings, prove Roscoe Dixon's predisposition to criminal behavior.

Operation TN Waltz: Former State Senator's Trial Starts (WPTY-TV)

WPTY-TV, June 1, 2006

Eyewitness News is in the federal courtroom Wednesday as opening statement begin in the trial of former state Senator Roscoe Dixon.

The jury was seated yesterday.

The trial is the first as part of the Operation Tennessee Waltz sting by the FBI last year.

Dixon is accused of taking $9500 in bribes from FBI agents. The agents were working undercover posing as lobbyistis for E-Cycle, a computer recycling company.

Dixon was a senator for a Memphis district for 22 years before he resigned in 2005. Five current or former lawmakers were charged in the case. Ward Crutchfield of Chattanooga and Kathryn Bowers of Memphis are still in the Senate and have pleaded not guilty. Memphis' John Ford resigned from the Senate after he was arrested and has also pleaded not guilty. Chris Newton from East Tennessee pleaded guilty and resigned from the TN House. He is now in prison serving a one-year sentence.

In court today, the prosecution played audio and video tapes. The tapes were recorded by FBI informant Tim Willis. Many of the recordings, had to do with Willis and Barry Myers talking about how much money it would cost, and what lawmakers they needed to support a proposal to a company called Childrens Dental Clinic approved by the state. On one of the tapes, Dixon was in the room when the money changed hands.The Childrens Dental Clinic sitution was the precurser to the Tennessee Waltz Investigation

State Senator Claims FBI Entrapped Him (WTVF-TV)

WTVF-TV, June 1, 2006

A state senator accused of accepting a bribe said Wednesday he was the victim of entrapment.

Wednesday was the first day in the trail against Roscoe Dixon. He claimed the FBI entrapped him into taking $9,500, but prosecutors unveiled a big surprise when they claimed Dixon had taken bribes before.

“I don’t have any comment,” Dixon said after court.

Federal prosecutors said in court that the whole investigation known as Operation Tennessee Waltz started by accident with an investigation into bribes at the criminal court clerk’s office in Memphis.

Prosecutors played a tape Wednesday in which a friend and employee of Roscoe Dixon spoke with lobbyist Tim Willis. Willis was working for the FBI to pay thousands of dollars to Dixon and other lawmakers so a Memphis dental clinic could get credentials through TennCare.

Prosecutors played tapes of Willis giving $4,000 to Barry Myers who gave the money to Dixon and Sen. Kathryn Bowers, who was also charged. Bowers and Dixon were on the TennCare oversight committee at the time.

Dixon’s defense attorney said the FBI entrapped him by getting him to do something he would not normally do. He acknowledged there will be many hours of videotapes for jurors to watch.

“I expect to see all the tapes,” Dixon defense attorney Coleman Garrett said.

Prison For John Daley Kin In Bribe Scandal (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, June 1, 2006

A brother-in-law of Cook County Commissioner John Daley who has admitted to taking bribes to steer city business to a politically connected trucking firm was sentenced to 18 months in prison Wednesday.

John Briatta, 46, was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Charles Norgle, who said he wanted the punishment to send a message to others in government that such corruption will not be tolerated.

Norgle rejected a bid by Briatta's attorneys to have him sentenced to 5 months in prison and 5 months of home confinement, saying he only breached the public trust after suffering gambling and other financial losses

"To have Mr. Briatta hanging around and watching the Cubs or Sox from his home" is not what the sentence should be about, Norgle said.

Any city official involved in taking bribes "must understand that he is going to prison," the judge said. Norgle could have sentenced Briatta to more than 2 years in prison under federal guidelines, but said he thought 18 months was fair.

Briatta, a former dispatcher in the city's Water Management Department, had pleaded guilty in February to taking at least $5,400 in bribes in 2003. He was the first defendant to plead guilty to a January corruption indictment that also charged Chicago City Clerk James Laski, who has since pleaded guilty.

Briatta accepted the bribes from Michael "Mick" Jones, the owner of the Get Plowed Inc. trucking company and a friend of Laski's. In exchange, Briatta helped the company get city work through Donald Tomczak, then second in command in the Water Management Department. Tomczak and Jones have also pleaded guilty in connection with the federal probe.

The sentence came after Briatta apologized to the court for his actions. He said he never thought his conduct would affect the number of people that it has.

"I'd like to apologize to all the citizens of Chicago and the mayor," Briatta said. Briatta's brother-in-law, John Daley, is the brother of Mayor Richard Daley.

Asked about the sentence Wednesday, Mayor Daley replied, "It's very sad. You take money, you are going to get caught. Simple as that."

A reporter told Daley of Briatta's apology and suggested it came from a member of the mayor's "family circle."

"It's not my family circle," Daley said, but "you accept anybody's apology."

Briatta's lawyer, Theodore Poulos, had painted Briatta as a "kind and decent man" and a devout Catholic whose first priority is his children, a 14-year-old girl and an 11-year-old boy. Briatta often travels with his daughter to volleyball tournaments, Poulos said.

Briatta told the court the hardest part about prison would be his inability to see his children.

"I just pray that my sentence is not that long where I can get back to them and start a future," he said.

Poulos said Briatta slipped into taking the bribes because of mounting gambling losses, and he also began getting loans from family and friends. Prosecutors said one of those loans came from George Prado, another former water department worker who is facing federal charges for allegedly heading a local heroin-trafficking ring.

The judge noted Briatta's gambling woes as he handed down the sentence.

"He had the need for money to spend on gambling," the judge said. "And as all gamblers seem to find out, in the long run, you lose. And certainly Mr. Briatta is the loser here."

Assistant U.S. Atty. Manish Shah acknowledged the defendant's gambling habit and said that Briatta may have agreed to accept bribes in a moment of weakness.

"But that's how corruption succeeds, and that is why it needs to be punished severely," Shah said.

City Worker With Ties To Mayor Gets 18 Months In Trucking Scandal (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, June 1, 2006

CHICAGO - A former city worker with ties to Mayor Richard M. Daley's brother was sentenced Wednesday to 18 months in federal prison for taking $5,000 in payoffs to get a private company hauling jobs in Chicago's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program.

John Briatta, 46, was more than $87,000 in debt due to out-of-control gambling and one of his creditors was a fellow former city employee now charged with masterminding a heroin ring, defense attorneys said at the sentencing before U.S. District Judge Charles R. Norgle Sr.

"I take responsibility for my actions, I knew better than to take bribes," Briatta said in a letter to Norgle that the judge read in court. "I was weak. Not a day goes by that I don't think back to my terrible decisions and wish that I could turn back the hands of time to undo them."

It was the latest development in a three-year scandal that has rocked City Hall and brought allegations of corruption to the mayor's doorstep. His former patronage director and three other men are on trial, charged with mail fraud involving the city's hiring practices.

Norgle could have sentenced Briatta to as much as 30 months but said 18 was fair.

Briatta, a former water department truck dispatcher, acknowledged that he accepted the money from another city employee, Randy Aderman, who has pleaded guilty and is awaiting sentencing.

Aderman was delivering the cash on behalf of Get Plowed Inc., a company that averaged $100,000 a year in payments from the trucking program before the federal government cracked down on it three years ago at the start of the City Hall corruption investigation.

Get Plowed was owned by a former city official who also has pleaded guilty in the case.

Briatta said he accepted payoffs from Aderman knowing that his boss, the first deputy water commissioner at the time, Donald Tomczak, would put trucks in the program on his say-so.

Tomczak has pleaded guilty to racketeering and other charges for taking Hired Truck Program payoffs. But there is no allegation that Tomczak got any of the money Aderman paid to Briatta.

Tomczak is a former precinct captain in the 11th Ward where the mayor's brother, Cook County Commissioner John Daley, heads the Democratic Party. Briatta's sister is married to John Daley.

"Mr. Briatta is incredibly embarrassed and ashamed that he engaged in conduct that gave the press a chance to mention his brother-in-law's name every time it came up," Briatta defense attorney Theodore T. Poulos told reporters after the sentencing.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Manish Shah told Norgle that among those who had loaned money to Briatta was George Prado, 47, one of Briatta's fellow former water department employees. Prado is now charged with heading a Colombian heroin ring operating in Chicago.

Prado has pleaded not guilty to the charges, which include money laundering.

Poulos said Prado apparently believed that if he loaned money to Briatta he might receive a promotion or a better assignment with the city but that Briatta never saw the loan that way.

City Worker With Ties To Mayor Gets 18 Months In Trucking Scandal (WLS-TV)

By Andy Shaw

WLS-TV, June 1, 2006

A member of the Daley family was sentenced Wednesday for his role in the city's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program. John Briatta, the brother-in-law of Cook County Commissioner John Daley, is going to prison for 18 months for taking $5,000 in bribes.

John Briatta, 46, is the only member of the Daley family implicated in the hired truck scandal. He apparently resisted the temptation of the hired truck scandal for years, but under the pressure of skyrocketing gambling debts, he finally gave in and took payoffs to help a company get hauling business. As a result, he is going to prison for 18 months.

Briatta's sentence could have been a lot longer if he hadn't apologized profusely to everyone -- including the city, the taxpayers and the Daleys.

"I take responsibility for my actions, I knew better than to take bribes," Briatta said in a letter to Norgle that the judge read in court. "I was weak. Not a day goes by that I don't think back to my terrible decisions and wish that I could turn back the hands of time to undo them."

"His brother had nothing to do with this. Mr. Briatta is really ashamed and embarrassed and quite devastated about the fact that he did anything that tarnished it," said Ted Poulos, John Briatta's Attorney.

"Very sad. You take money you are going to get caught," said Mayor Richard Daley. "It's not my family circle."

Briatta took the payoffs three years ago to help a friend of former City Clerk Jim Laski get business for his trucking company. Briatta needed the money to pay off mounting gambling debts. But, according to his attorney, he resisted offers by his boss in the water department -- Donald Tomczak -- to play a much bigger role in the hired truck payoffs. That, along with a guilty plea, heartfelt apologies and letters of support from friends and associates, persuaded Judge Charles Norgle to impose a sentence of 18 months when it could have been a year longer.

Norgle says a shorter sentence would deprecate the seriousness of the offense and not serve as a deterrent to others. The judge says that despite the relative leniency, "Mr. Briatta is certainly a big loser here."

Briatta still has nearly a $100,000 in gambling debts, so the judge didn't impose a heavy fine or restitution order beyond having to return the $5,000 in payoff money and to stop smoking marijuana, which turned up in a post-indictment drug test.

John Daley had no comment on Wednesday, except to say that Briatta's apology speaks for itself.

John Daley's Brother-in-law Heading To Prison (CHIST)

By Steve Warmbir, Staff Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, June 1, 2006

The brother-in-law of Cook County Commissioner John Daley was sentenced to 18 months in prison Wednesday for taking about $5,400 in bribes to steer city business to a Hired Truck company.

The brother-in-law, John Briatta, 46, also took loans totaling $20,000 from a man accused of running a heroin ring. George Prado worked in the city's Water Management Department with Briatta and has been accused of threatening to kill a drug courier, according to a federal prosecutor and court records.

Prado told investigators he would have forgiven the loans if Briatta had helped him get a promotion. But there was no indication Prado ever told that to Briatta. Prado is expected to plead guilty in his case, which is separate from Briatta's. Briatta did not know Prado allegedly ran a heroin ring, said Briatta's attorney, Ted Poulos.

Briatta, who pleaded guilty to bribery, had to borrow the money from Prado and others because a gambling addiction plunged him into financial chaos, Poulos said.

"As all gamblers seem to find out, eventually, you lose," U.S. District Judge Charles Norgle said before sentencing Briatta. "And certainly Mr. Briatta is a big loser here."

Norgle, though, gave Briatta a break. Federal guidelines suggest Briatta be sentenced to at least two years in prison.

Briatta was "incredibly embarrassed and ashamed" for his actions, Poulos said.

Mayor: Apology accepted

"I'd like to apologize to all the citizens of Chicago and the mayor," said Briatta, a devout Catholic, who also thanked his family and friends for their support. Among the family members sitting in the courtroom was John Daley's wife, Mary Lou, who is Briatta's sister.

In a letter to the judge, Briatta was particularly sorry for the shame his actions caused John Daley, whom he has been close to since they were teens.

Daley "did nothing to deserve this negative attention, and I have apologized many times to him and my sister," Briatta wrote.

Briatta asked the judge for a shorter prison sentence so he could return to his children.

Briatta took the bribes while he worked for the Water Department from June to December 2003, at the urging of Donald Tomczak, who ran the department day to day. Tomczak decided which trucking companies got Hired Truck work. Tomczak pleaded guilty and admitted taking bribes himself.

Briatta took money from a trucking company tied to friends of former city Clerk James Laski. Briatta then used his influence to get that trucking company city work.

John Daley had no comment Wednesday other than to say Briatta's "statement speaks for itself."

Mayor Daley, John Daley's brother, said: "It's very sad. If you take money, you're gonna get caught. Simple as that."

But the mayor said, "You accept anybody's apology."

Witness Describes City Jobs Scheme (CHIST)

By Natasha Korecki And Steve Warmbir, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, June 1, 2006

A key witness in the City Hall hiring trial testified Wednesday he used a political army largely made up of city workers to volunteer in various Democratic campaigns, then asked Mayor Daley's patronage chief to reward them with city jobs and promotions.

Daniel Katalinic, the highest-profile witness to testify yet in the trial that's in its third week, said Robert Sorich, a former top official in the Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, told him to which political races he should deploy his volunteers. He also said Daley's former campaign manager, Greg Goldner, doled out similar orders.

In return, Katalinic would hand Sorich a list of people he'd want hired or promoted in city positions, he testified.

"I just made it clear . . . with the people helping and volunteering, I would need help with hiring and promotions," Katalinic said he told Sorich.

Sorich told him: "He'd do what he could," Katalinic said.

Organization grew to nearly 300

If Katalinic had a tough time getting hold of Sorich, he'd hand lists to Sorich's assistant, Timothy McCarthy.

While in Sorich's office in 2000, Sorich allegedly told Katalinic to rank his troops "in the order of importance as far as political importance in the organization."

Sorich and McCarthy, who used to work in IGA, are on trial with two others -- Patrick Slattery and John Sullivan -- accused of rigging the city's hiring system to reward politically backed candidates with jobs and promotions. Katalinic worked with the city for 33 years, most recently as deputy commissioner of street operations, before retiring in 2003.

Katalinic said his campaign organization started small but eventually grew to nearly 300 people who worked on many campaigns, from that of U.S. Rep. Rahm Emanuel to state Sen. Susan Garrett. Nearly all of the group were Streets and Sanitation workers or people trying to land city jobs, Katalinic said.

$15,000 from 'Quarters' Boyle

Katalinic was charged along with the four men now on trial but pleaded guilty to one count of mail fraud and agreed to cooperate. As part of his deal, he could get a year and a day in prison rather than about 30 months. Katalinic admitted taking $15,000 in bribes from another former city worker, John "Quarters" Boyle, in the Hired Truck Program.

Katalinic's group merged in 2001 with the Coalition for Better Government. Katalinic said Sorich was well-aware of the groups and sought to keep discussions under the radar screen.

Sorich specifically told Katalinic to keep other political coordinators, including operative Dominic Longo of the coalition, out of the discussions, saying Longo brought "too much heat" with him.

Longo, speaking for the coalition, said Wednesday: "We were in existence before all these people were around, and God willing, we'll be here after this is all over."

Earlier Wednesday, Steve Bylina, the former deputy commissioner for the city's Bureau of Forestry, testified that he regularly rigged tests so pre-selected candidates won city jobs. Bylina said he got the lists of names from Streets and Sanitation's director of personnel, Jack Drumgould, and Sullivan. He said Sullivan once handed him a list and told him: "These are my guys."

Bylina told Assistant U.S. Attorney Patrick Collins that the interviews didn't matter for those on the lists; they always got the jobs.

Daley: Skyway Allegations 'Silly, Silly, Silly, Silly' (CHIT)

By Gary Washburn, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, June 1, 2006

Mayor Richard Daley seemed intent on personally opening up the summer "silly season" of frivolous news stories Wednesday.

Court testimony this week that Chicago Skyway tollbooths were fully staffed to help ensure an unimpeded ride to his Michigan summer home was, well, "silly," the mayor said.

Then he said it again. About 20 times.

"Silliest thing I ever heard in my life," the mayor declared. "It really is silly.... It's silly, silly, silly, silly."

When asked whether he was referring to the allegation or to a fact that underlings would seek to smooth the way for him, Daley provided more of the same.

"It is silly," he said. "It is just silly. Silliness. That is all it is ... completely silly, completely silly."

Asked the same question by another reporter, this one bereft of cranial hair, Daley declared, "It's silly, Baldheaded. He's baldheaded. Is that silly? No. Come on. I mean it's the silliest thing I ever heard. Next question."

Jacquelyn Heard, Daley's press secretary, later said that Daley was referring to the suggestion that a way through congestion could be cleared for him.

"He is caught in traffic more times than I can count," she said. "I have been on the phone with him, going through memos and press interview requests and what have you, while he bides his time in traffic."

Wednesday's comments were just the latest illustration of the mayor's ability, on any given day, to take his listeners on a verbal fun house ride.

After Neil Hartigan was defeated in the race for governor in 1990, Daley was asked if the mayor had done enough to support the candidate.

"What else do you want me to do ... unless I take my pants off?" was the retort.

Daley's remarks on Aug. 28, 2001, may never be carved in granite, but they long will be remembered by those who were present. William Daley had announced that he would not run for governor, and the mayor told reporters that his younger brother "definitely" would have been victorious in a Democratic primary that ultimately was won by Rod Blagojevich.

So far, so good.

But when a reporter suggested that his brother's decision would spare the Daley family an extended period of intense scrutiny, the mayor exploded.

"Scrutiny? What else do you want? Do you want to take my shorts? Give me a break."

Duly warmed up, the mayor continued, "How much scrutiny do you want to have? Go scrutinize yourself. I get scrootened every day, don't worry, from each and every one of you. It doesn't bother me."

Commenting on a national day of prayer a few years back, Daley said, "I pray every day. People pray every day. That is personal. You can pray every day. A moment of silence is prayer. Just thinking about your family. Thinking about making a better world, making a better environment.

"There is nothing wrong with that," Daley continued. "There is nothing wrong with prayer in different ways. It doesn't have [to be] religious."

Then there is the occasional—all right, maybe a little more than occasional—mispronunciation.

Not long after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Daley appeared amused when he was asked about the report of a suspicious substance on a Northwest Side street that turned out to be guacamole.

"Glacamole!" he declared. "No, I like glacamole. Glacamole is not dangerous. It's very good for you."

Documents Contradict Ill. Gov. Statements (WP)

By John O'connor

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. -- Gov. Rod Blagojevich's office reviewed and approved the hiring of state employees for hundreds of routine jobs such as highway workers and plumbers, according to documents.

The hiring lists, obtained by The Associated Press, contradict the governor's statements that his office did not decide who would be hired for civil service jobs. Such hirings are to be based solely on merit.

DOJ_NMG_0030739

For years, the Democratic governor has been dogged by allegations _ which he adamantly denies _ that he hands out state jobs to campaign donors and political allies.

His hiring practices are under investigation by federal, state and local prosecutors. Though Blagojevich has not been charged with any crime, he has acknowledged that federal scrutiny includes the work of his personnel director, Joe Cini.

A governor is allowed to fill some high-level state jobs with anyone he wants, but most jobs are covered by civil service or other rules that require hiring decisions to be based on merit.

The hiring lists obtained by the AP suggest nearly 1,800 hires, promotions, transfers and salary increases were OK'd by aides to the governor in the months following Blagojevich's 2003 inauguration. They include positions such as highway maintainer and prison guard, which are classified as civil service jobs.

The jobseeker's name was included in nearly 1,200 cases. Blagojevich and his aides repeatedly have said the administration's hiring practices were "blind" _ meaning his office made the final decision on whether to fill jobs but never knew the names of individuals being hired.

Blagojevich spokeswoman Abby Ottenhoff said the lists were in the format used by the previous governor and were used until the new administration could set up a system that didn't include names. Hiring decisions made from the lists were not made based on names, she said.

Ottenhoff acknowledged that early in the administration, aides to the governor, his budget office, and other agencies met regularly to determine which jobs would be filled. She said the meetings focused on whether a position was absolutely necessary during a budget crisis, not on which individuals were in line for jobs.

But people familiar with the process, who spoke only on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the documents, said personnel director Cini and a representative from the budget office discussed jobseekers' names during the meetings.

Cini referred questions to Ottenhoff.

About 700 of the 1,800 employment actions on the list were begun under Blagojevich's predecessor, Republican Gov. George Ryan, but the Blagojevich administration still provided a final stamp of approval.

Recently, another hiring list surfaced that showed nearly 300 jobseekers and the politically influential people who recommended them for the positions.

Industry, Others Object To Data Retention (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, June 1, 2006

Internet providers and telecommunications companies expressed concern on Wednesday about the feasibility of recording Americans' online activities, a proposal that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has recently endorsed.

In a meeting Friday first reported by CNET News.com, Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller said the war on terror would be aided by two years' worth of data retention, a requirement industry representatives say would be accompanied by technical, security and privacy challenges.

"We have real reservations about data retention requirements because of the security and privacy risks attached to it," said Mark Uncapher, senior vice president of the Information Technology Association of America. ITAA's board members include representatives of AT&T, Sybase, Fujitsu and Unisys.

ISP snooping timeline

In events that were first reported by CNET News.com, Bush administration officials have said Internet providers must keep track of what Americans are doing online. Here's the timeline:

A Justice Department representative said this week that the government is not seeking to require the retention of the content of communications, but did not elaborate. If the European Union's approach were adopted, Internet companies would be required to save logs showing the identities of e-mail and perhaps instant messaging correspondents in addition to data about which customer was assigned which Internet address.

DOJ_NMG_0030740

That suggestion alarms many Internet providers, which worry about the cost and complexity of recording what their customers are doing online. In some cases, especially among libraries, coffee shops and universities, no records may be stored at all.

"In general, libraries only keep records on users to the extent required to provide their services," said Rick Weingarten, director of the American Library Association's Office for Information Technology Policy.

Based on the limited information that has been made public so far--including in a speech by Gonzales last month--Weingarten said the library association would not favor such a requirement. "Absolutely we have concerns about users' privacy," he said.

A second meeting at the Justice Department has been scheduled for Friday.

Snooping on Web-based e-mail

The Justice Department also proposed that Web sites such as e-mail providers be required to store data about their users' activities for future law enforcement and national security investigations, according to one industry representative familiar with last week's meeting.

That could create privacy and security complications for Microsoft's Hotmail, Google's Gmail, Yahoo Mail and numerous other e-mail services, industry representatives said privately.

In response to a query from CNET News.com, Microsoft provided a statement that said it supported working with law enforcement to ensure Internet safety and protect children from online predators.

"But data retention is a complicated issue with implications not only for efforts to combat child pornography but also for security, privacy, safety and availability of low-cost or free Internet services," the statement said. (Click here to read the complete statement.)

Google said it would continue in discussions with Justice Department officials about how to prevent child pornography and related crimes--and, like Microsoft, sounded a note of caution about sweeping data retention rules.

"We are aware of a number of proposals in the U.S. and Europe regarding data retention and data preservation requirements for Internet companies," Google said in a statement. "We believe these proposals deserve careful review and must consider the legitimate interests of individual users, law enforcement agencies and Internet companies."

A Yahoo representative said on Wednesday that the company was going to decline to comment until it had details about what the Justice Department wanted. AT&T spokesman Dave Pacholczyk said, "We will follow the law," and declined further comment.

"Cox remains committed to the privacy of our customers, maintains secured records for an appropriate amount of time--according to the applicable laws--and only provides access to customer information to law enforcement, to the courts or to other authorities when legally required to do so," said David Grabert, Cox Communications' director of media relations.

For his part, Gonzales said in a speech last month at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children that Internet providers must retain records to aid investigations of criminals "abusing kids and sending images of the abuse around the world through the Internet." More recently, the Justice Department has invoked terrorism as the justification for data retention.

Two proposals to mandate data retention have surfaced in the U.S. Congress. One, backed by Rep. Diana DeGette, a Colorado Democrat, says that any Internet service that "enables users to access content" must permanently retain records that would permit police to identify each user. The records could only be discarded at least one year after the user's account was closed.

The other was drafted by aides to Wisconsin Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner, the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, a close ally of President Bush. Sensenbrenner said through a representative earlier this month, though, that his proposal is on hold because "our committee's agenda is tremendously overcrowded already."

"Preservation" versus "retention"

At the moment, Internet service providers typically discard any log file that's no longer required for business reasons such as network monitoring, fraud prevention or billing disputes. Companies do, however, alter that general rule when contacted by police performing an investigation--a practice called data preservation.

DOJ_NMG_0030741

A 1996 federal law called the Electronic Communication Transactional Records Act regulates data preservation. It requires Internet providers to retain any "record" in their possession for 90 days "upon the request of a governmental entity."

Because Internet addresses remain a relatively scarce commodity, ISPs tend to allocate them to customers from a pool, based on if a computer is in use at the time. (Two standard techniques used are the Dynamic Host Configuration Protocol and Point-to-Point Protocol over Ethernet.)

In addition, Internet providers are required by another federal law to report child pornography sightings to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, which is in turn charged with forwarding such reports to the appropriate police agency.

When adopting its data retention rules, the European Parliament approved U.K.-backed requirements saying that communications providers in its 25 member countries--several of which had enacted their own data retention laws already--must retain customer data for a minimum of six months and a maximum of two years.

The Europe-wide requirement applies to a wide variety of "traffic" and "location" data, including the identities of the customers' correspondents; the date, time and duration of phone calls, voice over Internet Protocol calls or e-mail messages; and the location of the device used for the communications. But the "content" of the communications is not supposed to be retained. The rules are expected to take effect in 2008.

U.S. Asks Internet Firms To Save Data (USAT)

By Jon Swartz And Kevin Johnson, Usa Today

USA Today, June 1, 2006

Top law enforcement officials have asked leading Internet companies to keep histories of the activities of Web users for up to two years to assist in criminal investigations of child pornography and terrorism, the Justice Department said Wednesday.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller outlined their request to executives from Google, Microsoft, AOL, Comcast, Verizon and others Friday in a private meeting at the Justice Department. The department has scheduled more discussions as early as Friday. Last week's meeting was first reported by CNET, an online news service.

The meetings reflect a new approach by law enforcement in anti-terrorism efforts. Previously, the Justice Department had invoked the need for data retention only to battle child pornography. Since the Sept. 11 attacks, Internet traffic has become increasingly critical to terrorism investigations, too.

Justice is not asking the companies to keep the content of e-mails, spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said. It wants records such as lists of e-mail traffic and Web searches, he said.

Roehrkasse said the government is required to seek proper legal authority, such as a subpoena, before obtaining the records. He said any change in the retention period would not alter that requirement. Law enforcement officials have seen investigations derailed "time and time again" because of a lack of data, Roehrkasse said.

The government's request forces the companies to strike a balance between satisfying law enforcement demands and honoring the privacy of millions of customers.

"The issue for us is not whether we retain data, but we want to see it done right," says Dave McClure, president of the U.S. Internet Industry Association, which represents 150 companies, primarily Internet service providers. "Our concerns are who pays for it, what data is retained, and if it is retained legally without violating federal laws and subscriber agreements."

Lee Tien, a lawyer for the privacy advocacy group Electronic Frontier Foundation, said he was concerned.

"I think that the request raises some really, really major privacy problems," he said. The Justice Department is "asking ISPs (Internet service providers) to really become an arm of the government."

The request creates a logistical challenge: Most Internet providers store data such as Web searches for 30 to 90 days. Storing such information significantly longer is more expensive, McClure and others say.

"We strongly support Gonzales' interest in assuring that the Internet is safe for everyone," Phil Reitinger, Microsoft's senior security strategist, said in a statement Wednesday that acknowledged the company's participation in the meeting at Justice. "But data retention is a complicated issue."

DOJ_NMG_0030742

"We believe (data retention and preservation) proposals deserve careful review and must consider the legitimate interests of individual users, law enforcement agencies, and Internet companies," Google spokesman Steve Langdon said Wednesday.

Gonzales broached the issue of record retention in April during a speech at the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children in Alexandria, Va.

Gonzales, who has made fighting child exploitation a prominent part of the national law enforcement agenda, said the pursuit of child predators depends on the availability of evidence often in the hands of ISPs.

This isn't the first time Gonzales has gone to Internet companies with a request related to their records. In March, a federal judge ordered Google to hand over Web search records requested by Justice as part of its efforts to shield children from sexually explicit material online. Google balked at an earlier request, saying it would expose trade secrets. AOL, Yahoo and Microsoft cooperated with the government, but they said their assistance was limited and users' privacy was not violated.

Hazlet Ex-mayor Admits To Taking Informant's Bribe (NSL)

By John P. Martin, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), June 1, 2006

Coughlin snared in an FBI web

Former Hazlet Mayor Paul Coughlin admitted yesterday accepting a $3,000 payoff from an FBI informant posing as a crooked contractor, joining a growing list of Monmouth County officials convicted of corruption.

On the day his trial was to begin in federal court in Newark, Coughlin, 42, pleaded guilty before U.S. District Judge Joel Pisano to a single count of accepting corrupt payments.

Under federal guidelines, the former mayor and councilman faces between 21 months and 27 months in prison. His attorney said he will argue for a lighter term, calling the crime "aberrant behavior" and citing what he said was Coughlin's serious alcohol problem.

Coughlin, a Republican, had previously served two years as a township councilman when he was elected again in January 2004. As a member of the majority, he was named mayor.

Just four months later, he met with Robert Steffer, who was posing as a demolition contractor willing to pay bribes for emergency, no-bid municipal work.

"We're going to get you in the game," Coughlin told Steffer, according to recordings the informant made for the FBI.

Six days later, at another restaurant, Coughlin took an envelope containing $3,000 in cash from Steffer and promised to consider him for a contract to demolish the township hall.

"It's definitely in a situation that we're very, very close to having an emergency," Coughlin said.

Steffer never got the contract. Another firm was hired to raze the hall.

Coughlin was among 11 former and current public officials in Monmouth County arrested in February 2005, several of whom allegedly took bribes from Steffer. He is the fourth to plead guilty.

Coughlin resigned his seat and was indicted late last year. Prosecutors agreed to drop other charges, including conspiracy, in return for his plea.

"We thought it was important that he acknowledged that he actually took the bribe," Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Hammer said yesterday.

Coughlin could not be reached for comment. His attorney, Jerome Ballaroto, called the crime "clearly aberrant behavior" and said he will make a case for leniency when Pisano sentences Coughlin on Sept. 7.

Ballaroto said Coughlin had refused a second bribe from Steffer. He also said Coughlin has "a real alcohol problem" and that agents or the informant plied him with beer.

"Did the government try to take advantage of a problem he had? Sure they did," Ballaroto said. "The alcohol very well may have contributed to this."

Prosecutors scoffed at such an argument.

"The defendant knew full well what he was doing," Assistant U.S. Attorney Judith Germano said.

Hammer said Coughlin only refused the second bribe -- at the 2004 League of Municipalities convention in Atlantic City -- because he was worried others might see him take the money.

"He understood that there are other people from Hazlet right outside the room," the prosecutor said. "He said: 'Another time, another place.'"

Coughlin never returned the bribe money. Prosecutors will seek $3,000 in restitution, Hammer said.

Coughlin lost his job in the computer industry after his arrest and has struggled to support his wife and children, according to his attorney.

"Every politician in America takes money," Ballaroto said, explaining but not excusing the crime. "If they're not taking an illegal bribe, they're taking it legally. It's a fine line between taking it legally and getting a quid pro quo."

Ex-mayor Admits Taking Bribe (APP)

By Karen Sudol, STAFF WRITER

Asbury Park Press, June 1, 2006

NEWARK — Former Hazlet Mayor Paul A. Coughlin told a judge Tuesday he had accepted a $3,000 bribe from a confidential informant who he believed was a corrupt contractor in exchange for securing work for him, specifically the demolition of the old town hall.

Coughlin, 43, said he also promised to use his influence to steer future work to the company supposedly run by Robert "Duke" Steffer, who was really working for the FBI.

In pleading guilty to a count of accepting a corrupt payment, Coughlin kept repeating "Yes, your honor" in response to questions posed by U.S. District Judge Joel A. Pisano. On the day a jury was to be selected for his trial, he told the judge that after reviewing the evidence and papers, he instead wanted to plead guilty. His wife and family attended the hearing.

Pisano told Coughlin he faces up to 10 years in prison and up to $250,000 in fines. But both sides have agreed to recommend Coughlin serve between 21 and 27 months in prison. He also will likely reimburse the government the $3,000.

The other two counts of the indictment will be dismissed at his Sept. 7 sentencing. Coughlin does not have to testify against anyone else as part of the agreement, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Hammer.

Coughlin is the latest public official to plead guilty in a FBI bribery and money-laundering sting dubbed "Operation Bid Rig," in which 13 former and current county and local public officials and three businessmen in Monmouth County were charged last year.

Jerome A. Ballarotto, Coughlin's lawyer, said his client's act was "something that's inconsistent with his life's behavior. This was truly an anomaly. Why he did it, we can't really explain," he said. Coughlin could not be reached for comment after the proceeding.

Regardless of whether Coughlin took the money as a campaign contribution or for personal reasons, Ballarotto said his client was accepting responsibility.

"Now he knows what he did was wrong and he should never have done it," said Ballarotto.

Hammer said, "Had we gone to trial, we would have proven he is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, and we would have shown that it was never a campaign contribution," adding that Coughlin intended to use the money for himself.

Pisano asked:

"When you received and accepted the money from the CW (cooperating witness) in exchange for using your influence . . . to assist the CW in obtaining emergency work, specifically the demolition of Hazlet Township Hall, and future work, did you know it was wrong and illegal to do so?"

"Yes, your honor," replied Coughlin, who resigned as mayor in March 2005.

Steffer has been at the center of many of the Operation Bid Rig complaints, working with the FBI and posing as a contractor willing to pay off public officials who would award him municipal and county contracts. Undercover agents posed as Steffer's employees.

Details of plot

Authorities had maintained in complaints and the indictment that Coughlin, who is now unemployed, was introduced to the cooperating witness by "Councilman-1," an unnamed official. Other government documents indicate this was Robert L. Hyer, a former Keyport councilman. Hyer, who died in October, also was charged in the corruption sting.

The three met on May 19, 2004, at a Union Beach restaurant where Coughlin received $3,000 from Steffer in exchange for the demolition job. One of the ways to do that would be to declare an emergency, which would relieve Hazlet of the requirement to advertise for bids, according to the court papers.

Coughlin was ultimately unsuccessful in gaining support from other officials to declare the demolition an emergency.

Other tactics discussed included damaging the building, rigging the bid specifications and giving inside information about the competing bids to the contractor, according to the indictment.

The township broke ground on a new town hall in September at the site of the former Office of Emergency Management building in Veterans Park. The exterior is nearing completion, and municipal employees are expected to move into the building by September.

The former town hall, on Middle Road, was torn down in September 2004 after Hazlet solicited competitive bids.

Judge Dismisses Wecht Motion To Toss Evidence (PPG)

By Paula Reed Ward, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, June 1, 2006

Ex-coroner's lawyers fault search

A federal judge yesterday denied a motion by Dr. Cyril H. Wecht's attorneys to suppress all of the evidence gathered against him.

In the same order, though, U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab said he would hold a hearing on one issue raised by the defense -- whether 29 boxes of autopsy reports seized by the FBI from the former Allegheny County coroner's private office should have been taken.

The hearing will be at 8:15 a.m. next Thursday.

Dr. Wecht is named in an 84-count indictment charging him with misusing his public office for private gain.

In April, Dr. Wecht's defense attorneys filed a 26-page motion asking the judge to throw out all of the evidence against their client. Specifically, they claimed that the boxes of private autopsy records seized in his offices were not enumerated in the search warrant.

Dr. Wecht claimed that the files seized were not found in the area the warrant claimed they would be and were not labeled as the FBI said they'd be.

"Nowhere in [lead FBI Agent Bradley] Orsini's affidavit does he establish, or attempt to establish, probable cause to rummage through the office generally to look for boxes," the defense wrote in the suppression motion. "Nowhere does he identify any specific file he is searching for. Nowhere does he identify any specific files he intended to search or the probable cause for doing so."

The boxes included reports on the deaths of several famous people, including Marilyn Monroe, Mary Jo Kopechne and rock artist Kurt Cobain.

According to the defense, when agents served the search warrant on Dr. Wecht's private office, they discovered 60 boxes of records -- not the "approximately 20" outlined in the warrant -- scattered throughout the office.

Dr. Wecht's wife, Sigrid, who is an attorney and shares the office with her husband, was there at the time. She said in an affidavit accompanying the motion to suppress that the agents were not able to find the 20 boxes, and that they asked her to direct them to the boxes. She told them she didn't know which boxes the warrant specified.

After that conversation, the agents called Mr. Orsini. "Agents thereafter split into teams and went throughout the premises, opened up boxes at will to see what was in them, and decided which ones they would take from different locations on the premises," the defense contends.

DOJ_NMG_0030745

In his 17-page opinion, Judge Schwab said he believed an evidentiary hearing is necessary "to evaluate the validity of the execution of this part of the search warrant."

In its motion to suppress, the defense also claimed the FBI did not establish probable cause for the search warrants to be issued.

Judge Schwab dismissed that claim, despite what he said were "interesting but ultimately irrelevant" arguments raised by Dr. Wecht's attorneys.

Judge Denies Motion To Suppress Evidence Against Former Coroner (AP)

By Michael Cowden, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

FBI agents had grounds to seize computers from the office of former Allegheny County coroner Cyril Wecht, who is facing trial on theft and fraud charges, a federal judge ruled Wednesday.

U.S District Judge Arthur Schwab ruled that there had been probable cause for search warrants to be issued and that investigators had not violated protocol in taking the computers.

The judge said a separate hearing would be held on June 8 to determine whether seized document boxes were handled appropriately.

Attorneys for Wecht, 75, in April asked that evidence seized by the FBI be kept out of his trial. Wecht resigned from county office in January after a federal grand jury returned the 84-count indictment charging him with theft of honest services, mail fraud and wire fraud.

In a suppression motion, the attorneys attacked the credibility of the FBI agent who got search warrants for Wecht's records and also blamed Wecht's indictment on a political feud with Allegheny County District Attorney Stephen Zappala Jr.

Defense attorneys said they hoped the motion eventually leads to the charges being dismissed.

The defense argues that the federal probe of Wecht grew out of feud between the former coroner and Zappala about a man who died after being subdued by police, among other incidents.

The attorneys also allege the FBI agent had previously "urged witnesses to perjure themselves in a case involving his own misconduct."

The district attorney's office declined to comment Wednesday afternoon. The defense said it was reviewing the opinion and preparing for the June hearing.

Wecht is charged with using his county staff to do work for his multimillion-dollar pathology practice. He is also accused of trading unclaimed morgue cadavers for private lab space at a local university. In addition, he faces charges for allegedly overbilling private clients by using faked limousine bills for trips made using county drivers and cars.

Wecht has consulted on numerous high-profile cases, from the death of Elvis Presley to the murder of JonBenet Ramsey.

Briefs: Police Dispatcher Arrested On Multiple Child Porn Charges (PTR)

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, June 1, 2006

An Edgeworth police dispatcher and former borough councilman in Ambridge, Beaver County, was arrested Wednesday on multiple child pornography and stalking charges, police said.

Robert Panek, 40, was arrested by state troopers at his parents' Ambridge home and faces 50 counts of possessing child porn and two counts of stalking and harassment, Trooper Frank Murphy said. Panek was in the Beaver County Jail yesterday in lieu of $50,000 cash bond.

Police said that a former Edgeworth officer who now is a trooper had accused Panek of sending her unwanted letters and gifts. Police investigating that case said they found child pornography on his computer.

Edgeworth police Chief John English said Panek has been a dispatcher there for seven years. "My first reaction was disappointment. My second reaction is that we're mad," English said.

Allegheny County

Judge to decide whether Wecht search was proper

Evidence contained in dozens of boxes confiscated last year when federal agents raided Dr. Cyril H. Wecht's offices could be dismissed June 8 if a federal judge determines the search warrant was not properly executed.

At issue is whether FBI agents acted improperly when they took 29 unlabeled boxes from Wecht's private pathology office. Attorneys for Wecht argue the warrant was for "approximately 20 boxes and contents containing private autopsy files" in one file room.

U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab denied a request by defense attorneys to suppress evidence collected via two other search warrants that yielded computers used by two Wecht employees. Wecht, the former Allegheny County coroner, was indicted in January on charges stemming from accusations that he used his public office for private gain.

Judge will sentence Skosnik today

Allegheny County Sheriff Pete DeFazio's former No. 2 man will be sentenced today by a federal judge.

Dennis Skosnik, 54, of North Fayette, pleaded guilty in March to five charges of bribery, theft of honest services, money laundering and obstruction of justice while he was the county's chief deputy sheriff.

When he was indicted in November, prosecutors accused Skosnik of fixing criminal cases and parking tickets; accepting bribes; coaching a witness how to lie to a grand jury; sharing improperly obtained motor vehicle registration information; and using county vehicles and employees to ferry his son to law school in Philadelphia.

Skosnik could receive a maximum of 90 years in prison but likely will receive substantially less.

Asset district grant forms available Monday

The Allegheny County Regional Asset District Board will make 2007 funding applications available starting Monday.

This year, the board again will be accepting applications for the discretionary capital grant program. The program was suspended last year because of a lack of funding.

Applications may be obtained by contacting the RAD office at 412-227-1900 or info@radworkshere.org. A technical assistance session for prospective applicants will take place at 3 p.m June 20 at 1 Smithfield Street, Downtown. The application deadline is July 18.

The board makes grants to regional assets, defined as libraries, regional parks, professional sports and cultural facilities and programs. Funding comes from half the proceeds of the county's 1 percent sales tax.

No serious injuries were reported in a fire Wednesday in a building that houses businesses and several apartments in Sharpsburg, county emergency personnel said.

The fire erupted at 6:42 p.m. in the building in the 800 block of Main Street, emergency dispatchers said. One firefighter was being treated for smoke inhalation or heat exhaustion, dispatchers said.

The Allegheny County fire marshal will try to determine what caused the fire.

2 students report injuries in bus crash

Two teenagers were taken to Allegheny General Hospital, North Side, as a precautionary measure after their school bus was involved in a crash in Dormont on Wednesday morning.

Dormont police said the crash occurred at 7:55 a.m. along West Liberty Avenue when the mini school bus, which was transporting the 17- and 18-year-old students to an alternative school in Emsworth, collided with a car while making a left turn. Police said no traffic citations were issued as a result of the crash, and the students said they had back injuries, which appeared to be minor. Neither the driver of the car nor the passenger in it were injured, police said.

Police seek more charges against theft suspects

State police are attempting to find out if three Washington County purse-snatching suspects arrested after a robbery at the Interstate 79 northbound rest stop in South Fayette are connected to additional crimes.

Kayla M. Rush, 19, of Bulger; Heather L. Cain, 22, of Canonsburg; and Joseph J. Markovich, 21, of McDonald, were charged in connection with a robbery Saturday. Their charges include robbery, recklessly endangering another person and aggravated assault.

The victim reported two women grabbed her purse while she was standing inside the rest area. The suspects then fled in a blue sedan. Police arrested the suspects after pulling them over a short time later. State police ask anyone who might be the victim of similar crime to call 412-787-2000.

Ex-coach sentenced to probation

A former Moon Area High School girls' basketball coach and physical education teacher was convicted of corrupting a minor for a physical relationship he had with a player when she was 17.

Thomas Szczepankowski, 36, of Moon, was sentenced to three years' probation after entering a plea last week, said his attorney, Jason Nard. Szczepankowski resigned from the school district last June.

The girl, now 18, testified at a preliminary hearing last year that she had a relationship with Szczepankowski from September 2004 through May 2005 and that they kissed and fondled one another but never had sex. Allegheny County prosecutors dropped a charge of endangering the welfare of a child. Szczepankowski repeatedly has declined comment.

Bush views 'United 93'

Tears flowed in the White House theater Tuesday night at the conclusion of "United 93," a movie about the plane that crashed near Shanksville on Sept. 11, 2001, after passengers fought back against their hijackers.

"It was a very emotional night," said White House press secretary Tony Snow, who watched the movie with President Bush and relatives of some of the 40 passengers and crew members portrayed in the film. The relatives were invited to watch the movie with the president in Washington, D.C.

"It has a very powerful ending," Snow said Wednesday. "It's dead silence as the credits roll, and you had sounds of quiet sobbing in the room."

Former Boy Scout leader sentenced

DOJ_NMG_0030748

A former Boy Scout leader was sentenced this week to five to 15 years in prison for showing a 12-year-old boy pornography and then molesting him.

Alan J. Korzi, 52, of Windber, pleaded guilty in March to involuntary deviate sexual intercourse and showing pornography to a minor for an April 2005 incident at a Boy Scout building in Windber.

At a hearing last year, the boy said Korzi showed him a magazine with pictures of nude women and then would not let him leave until Korzi performed a sex act on him. Prosecutors dropped charges of rape, corruption and indecent assault in return for the guilty plea.

The Penns Woods Council of the Boy Scouts of America revoked Korzi's membership last year, after criminal charges were filed.

Landfill expansion gets preliminary approval

A plan to add more than 42 acres to an Indiana County landfill received initial approval from the state Department of Environmental Protection.

Evergreen Landfill Inc. officials want to expand their 64-acre landfill in Center and Brush Valley townships so the facility can receive trash for an additional 14 years, regulators said.

This week, the DEP approved the company's environmental assessment, during which the environmental impact of the landfill is considered alongside the potential social and economic benefits -- such as employment.

The plan still requires a technical and engineering review to ensure the application meets regulations for landfill design and construction.

Man sentenced for murder

An Erie man was sentenced to 16 and a half to 33 years and four months in prison for fatally shooting another man during an argument. Matthew Perez-Jefferson, 20, of Erie, pleaded guilty in April to third-degree murder for shooting Paul Martinson, 21, outside the Antigua Blue Bar in Erie on Nov. 3.

"There is not a day goes by that you and your family don't cross my mind," Perez-Jefferson said Tuesday to Martinson's mother, Rose Royer. "I offer my deepest remorse and apologies. I am so sorry. I don't know what happened."

His lawyer, James Pitonyak, said Perez-Jefferson was using cocaine, Ecstasy and alcohol before the shooting.

Widow wins $2.1M for matchmaking flop

An Erie widow won $2.1 million from a high-priced matchmaker whom she said failed to deliver on promises of introductions to cultured, wealthy men.

Anne Majerik, 60, said in a lawsuit that she paid Beverly Hills, Calif., matchmaker Orly Hadida $125,000 to be introduced to men who wanted monogamous relationships, earned more than $1 million and had estates of up to $20 million.

Instead, she said, she only got a few introductions to inappropriate men, such as an "international banker" who turned out to be "an interpreter that worked in a bank."

The matchmaker countersued and said Majerik is a "serial matchmaker suer" who enjoyed herself with the men she met.

A Los Angeles Superior Court jury ruled in Majerik's favor this week. The matchmaker's attorney said she plans to appeal.

Romero Called To Testify (LAT)

By Dan Morain And Evan Halper, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

State senator is to appear before a grand jury looking into the business dealings of her colleague Don Perata.

SACRAMENTO—State Sen. Gloria Romero of Los Angeles was summoned Wednesday to appear before a grand jury in the FBI probe of Senate chief Don Perata's business dealings.

Romero, a member of Perata's Democratic leadership team and one of his closest allies, said an FBI agent delivered a subpoena to her Capitol office requiring her to appear in July in Oakland, Perata's hometown.

Romero said in an interview that she is being called to testify as a witness. She said she declined to be interviewed by FBI agents and asked that they issue the subpoena.

"All along, I've thought this has been a fishing expedition," Romero said of the investigation, which became public in 2004. "I asked them to be specific about their questions and to give me a subpoena…. I look forward to answering whatever questions they may have."

Agents have shown interest in legislation that Romero carried three years ago to raise taxes on alcohol by a nickel per drink — a direction that has puzzled Capitol denizens. Romero's bill stalled early in the process.

The subpoena is believed to be the first issued to a sitting legislator in the Capitol since the 1980s, when the FBI launched an undercover anti-corruption operation that put a dozen lawmakers, lobbyists and others in jail. The bribery and extortion case became known as "Shrimpgate" because undercover agents posing as businessmen paid campaign donations in exchange for legislation to permit a new shrimp-processing plant.

The FBI's inquiry into Perata's business affairs became known when agents issued subpoenas to individuals and entities in Perata's East Bay district. That was three months after senators had narrowly elected Perata as president pro tem, the most powerful post in the upper house.

The Romero subpoena is "neither unexpected nor interesting," said Jason Kinney, a consultant serving as Perata's spokesman on the investigation. "This is the legal equivalent of hitting the snooze button."

Kinney said Perata "has acted ethically and appropriately" in public office. The investigation is "having no impact on … the conduct of the business of the state Senate," he said.

Whether Perata took a role in the alcohol tax bill is not apparent from the public record.

The current investigation involves no known undercover operation, and no one has been charged in the Perata case. FBI and Internal Revenue Service agents are looking into the senator's official, private and campaign-related dealings in Oakland and Sacramento.

Agents have interviewed members of the Oakland City Council, and have subpoenaed documents from local agencies, including the Port of Oakland.

Law enforcement authorities have examined payments and communications involving Perata and his political advisors, friends, and son and daughter, and have questioned current and former Perata aides. They also have interviewed some lobbyists involved in legislation that Perata carried.

Last year, they subpoenaed state Senate e-mails. Agents have looked at his involvement in legislation related to billboards, finance, gambling and insurance.

Romero, one of Perata's top lieutenants, is Senate majority leader, a post that requires her to help raise money for Democratic candidates statewide. First elected to the Assembly in 1998 and to the Senate in 2001, Romero has made her name as a lawmaker by focusing on problems at the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation.

In late 2002, with the state facing a budget deficit in the tens of billions of dollars, Romero introduced legislation to raise a projected $500 million for emergency rooms and trauma centers with a new 5-cents-per-drink tax on alcoholic beverages. The fee would have been paid by liquor vendors when their products were sold wholesale.

"California taxpayers cannot continue to bear the financial burden for an industry's product that is responsible for substantial healthcare costs to the public and the state," Romero said when she unveiled the proposal at White Memorial Medical Center in Los Angeles.

"The alcohol industry must assume greater responsibility for a product that, by its design, debilitates an individual's physical and mental capacities," she said.

The effort had considerable backing from unions, healthcare organizations and police and firefighter groups. But the opposition was also formidable. Among the many groups working to kill the bill was the Wine Institute, a trade and lobby association that includes major California vintners and long has opposed new alcohol-related taxes.

On Wednesday, Mike Falasco, lobbyist for the institute, said the FBI interviewed him and others at the Wine Institute roughly a year ago.

Falasco said FBI officials asked general questions about issues of concern to his group. He said he told them that fighting the alcohol tax proposal was a priority for his organization.

Falasco said he does not believe Perata was instrumental in killing the bill, which died in the Senate in 2003. Another Romero proposal, to allow counties to place on the ballot a local tax on drinks consumed at bars and restaurants, also failed that year.

"I don't believe there is any connection between the legislation and Sen. Perata," Falasco said.

AP NewsBreak: FBI Investigating Firm That Tried To Recruit Reggie Bush, Lawyer Says (AP)

By Bernie Wilson

AP, June 1, 2006

SAN DIEGO - The FBI has opened an investigation into a fledgling San Diego sports marketing firm that tried to recruit Heisman Trophy winner Reggie Bush, the attorney for the football star's family told The Associated Press Wednesday.

Attorney David Cornwell of Atlanta said FBI agents interviewed him about "potential federal crimes" last week by phone. Cornwell said he intends to make Bush and his parents available to the FBI.

"They've asked now to interview Reggie and his parents," Cornwell said. "I intend to cooperate, yes."

April Langwell, an FBI spokeswoman in San Diego, said she could neither confirm nor deny any investigations.

The NCAA and Pac-10 are investigating whether any rules were broken when Bush's family lived in a suburban San Diego home owned by Michael Michaels, a principal in New Era Sports & Entertainment, while Bush was still playing for Southern California last season. The NCAA prohibits student-athletes and their families from receiving extra benefits from agents or their representatives.

Michaels and his partner, Lloyd Lake, a documented gang member serving time in prison, formed New Era late last year in the hopes of signing Bush to handle his marketing, and bring aboard a San Diego agent to handle contract negotiations. Their hopes were dashed when Bush signed with another agent and marketing representative.

San Diego attorney Brian Watkins, who represents New Era, said in April he plans to sue Bush's parents for $3.2 million. Watkins said Bush's parents owed $54,000 in rent for the year they lived in Michaels' house.

"We have been contacted by the FBI to discuss the conduct of the individuals represented by Watkins," Cornwell said.

Reached by phone Wednesday, Watkins said he was unaware of the FBI investigation.

Bush and his family so far have declined to be interviewed by NCAA and Pac-10 investigators. Cornwell said they were unwilling to provide information that could be used by Watkins, but indicated he was willing to cooperate.

"The issue with the FBI is similar to the NCAA. I want to balance the cooperation with the FBI against my needs to protect my client's interest with regard to threatened litigation," Cornwell said.

Bush was expected to be the No. 1 overall pick in the NFL draft, but the Houston Texans bypassed him and took North Carolina State defensive end Mario Williams. Bush went to New Orleans with the second pick.

Before the NFL draft in late April, the league alerted some teams about a potential attempted extortion of Bush's family.

FBI Looks At Firm That Courted Bush (LAT)

By Sam Farmer And Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

The FBI has opened an investigation into a fledgling sports marketing firm that tried to recruit New Orleans Saints rookie Reggie Bush as a client.

A federal law enforcement source said Wednesday that the inquiry was "in its infancy" and that it was "way too early to say where this [case] is headed."

The attorney for Bush's family said that he had a "lengthy" phone call with an FBI agent last week, but he would not identify who he spoke with or which FBI field office was involved.

"They're definitely investigating federal crimes, but they didn't identify which crimes or which federal statutes are involved," attorney David Cornwell said, adding that he planned to help the FBI arrange interviews with Bush and his parents, LaMar and Denise Griffin.

Jan Caldwell, an FBI spokeswoman in San Diego, said she could not comment "on a pending investigation."

Cornwell has claimed representatives of San Diego-based New Era Sports & Entertainment tried to extort money from Bush's family.

Brian Watkins, an attorney representing the sports agency's founders, Michael Michaels and Lloyd Lake, has said his clients plan to sue the Heisman Trophy winner's family for $3.2 million — $300,000 in business-related expenses, plus punitive damages.

While Bush was starring at running back for USC last season, the Griffins lived in a suburban San Diego home owned by Michaels. Watkins said the couple owed $54,000 in back rent that has not been paid. New Era never got off the ground as a sports agency once Bush chose other representation.

On Wednesday, Watkins called the suggestion of an FBI investigation "ludicrous" and "a media ploy."

Watkins said neither he nor his clients had been contacted by the FBI and he suggested that Cornwell was using his own personal contacts to stir up an inquiry.

Watkins previously said that when the sides met for settlement talks earlier this year — at the Santa Monica office of Bush's marketing agent Mike Ornstein — two men asked permission to search him for a recording device. On Wednesday, Watkins said the men had identified themselves as working for a security consulting firm called Long & Danilevicius Associates.

The firm's website lists president Linas Danilevicius as a former FBI agent. A phone message left at the security firm's Laguna Hills-based office was returned by Cornwell, who said Watkins' characterization of the FBI's involvement was "all part of the fallacy and fantasy that Watkins is living."

Cornwell added: "When he does the perp walk, he'll know he was wrong."

The Pacific 10 Conference and NCAA are investigating the case. If it is found that Bush or his family received what the NCAA calls "extra benefits" USC could be sanctioned and, if Bush is found retroactively to have been ineligible, his Heisman Trophy could be taken away.

Fargo Man Pleads Guilty To Damaging Government Property (GFH)

The Grand Forks Herald, June 1, 2006

FARGO, N.D. - A man accused of throwing rocks in the federal building here has pleaded guilty to charges of damaging government property and threatening a federal officer, the U.S. attorney's office says.

U.S. District Judge Ralph Erickson ordered a psychological evaluation for Daniel Cvijanovich, 25, of Fargo. The judge did not immediately set a sentencing date after Cvijanovich pleaded guilty Wednesday, U.S. Attorney Drew Wrigley said.

Authorities said Cvijanovich threw rocks three times in the federal building in Fargo during the summer of 2001. The rocks struck a pane of glass that separates the lobby from the secure area of the building, and each rock had a note addressed to the FBI attached, authorities said. The contents of the notes were not disclosed.

One note, attached to a rock thrown on July 11, 2001 was "intended to be perceived as threats against FBI agents in the building," U.S. Attorney Drew Wrigley said in a statement.

Agents thought the threat was in retaliation for the investigation of American Indian activist Leonard Peltier, Wrigley's statement said. Peltier is serving life in prison for the deaths of two FBI agents in South Dakota in 1975.

Cvijanovich faces up to 13 years in prison on the charges.

Former Strip Club Employees Plead Guilty In Vegas Federal Case (AP)

By Ken Ritter, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, June 1, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - A federal judge accepted plea deals Wednesday from 16 people to end a decade-long investigation of criminal activity at a Las Vegas strip club, whose owner has agreed to sell the business and plead guilty to tax evasion.

The probe at the Crazy Horse Too club dates at least to 1995 and includes allegations that a tourist from Kansas was left paralyzed when he was beaten by employees in 2001. It ended with admissions of failure to report income from tips given to dancers that are shared among club employees.

Club owner Rick Rizzolo, who has faced allegations of mob ties for more than a decade, was expected Thursday to become the 17th and final person to accept plea deals in the case.

Rizzolo, 47, was scheduled to plead guilty to a single tax charge - conspiracy to defraud the government - and agree not to contest some $17 million in fines, forfeitures and restitution. He would serve no more than 16 months in federal prison, prosecutors said.

Wednesday's pleas stemmed from a January 2005 indictment that charged club manager Robert D'Apice with racketeering and tax evasion. Prosecutors accused D'Apice and current and former club employees with using force to compel customers to pay disputed charges.

D'Apice, 51, pleaded guilty before U.S. District Judge Kent Dawson to a felony racketeering charge that carries a possible sentence of probation to 20 years in federal prison and a $250,000 fine. The plea deal is expected to get him no more than 16 months in prison at his sentencing Oct. 17.

"Overall, we're happy with the resolution," D'Apice's lawyer, Michael Cristalli, said outside court. "The important thing is this case gets resolved."

Fourteen men ranging in age from 37 to 68 each pleaded guilty to a single felony tax charge of conspiracy to defraud the government. One woman, Paula McBride, 28, pleaded guilty to perjury. All live in the Las Vegas area except Ralph Pope, 63, of Chicago.

Six of the defendants, identified as current and former club managers, were expected to face 10 to 16 months in prison at sentencings scheduled in August and September. Nine other defendants face no more than six months in prison.

Rizzolo's lawyer, Tony Sgro, has characterized the club owner's decision to plead guilty as a calculated move to emerge from the shadow of investigations and the suggestion of mob ties. Efforts to reach Sgro on Wednesday were unsuccessful.

The lawyer has noted that Rizzolo's plea agreement does not mention organized crime, although prosecutors expect the corporate owner of Crazy Horse Too, the Power Company Inc., to enter a guilty plea Thursday to a racketeering charge.

The plea deal with Rizzolo depended on guilty pleas from each of the 16 other defendants.

The FBI had been investigating the club and Rizzolo since at least 1995, and used telephone wiretaps to collect information. The FBI and local police raided Crazy Horse Too in February 2003 in what Sgro called a "fishing expedition" for ties to organized crime. The lawyer said authorities also searched the club in late 2001.

The indictment cites injuries to Olathe, Kan., tourist Kirk Henry, who alleges in a civil lawsuit that he was left paralyzed from the neck down in September 2001 when he was beaten and left with a broken neck outside the club.

None of the defendants in the case admits direct responsibility for those injuries.

However, D'Apice agreed not to contest that the government could prove at least one of two acts of extortion to which he pleaded guilty also left at least one patron injured.

Sgro has said Rizzolo would sell the club within a year and not contest the payment of $10 million to Henry, some $4.25 million in forfeitures to the government and $1.7 million to settle a tax liability. The corporation and Rizzolo are expected to face some $750,000 in fines.

Daughter Of Victim In Homeless Hit-and-run Case Asks For Clues (MERCN)

By Andrew Glazer

The San Jose Mercury News, June 1, 2006

LOS ANGELES - The daughter of a man killed in a hit-and-run crash asked the public on Wednesday to help police in their probe that has resulted in the arrests of two elderly women accused of illegally collecting money from his life insurance policies.

DOJ_NMG_0030753

Standing at the alley where the body of 73-year-old Paul Vados was found in 1999, Stella Vados and her lawyer Gloria Allred asked anyone who knew her father or the women held on charges of mail fraud - Olga Rutterschmidt, 73, and Helen Golay, 75 - to call the FBI or police.

"Please help me in my quest for justice," said Stella Vados, an artist who lives in Northern California.

Police are investigating whether Rutterschmidt and Golay were directly involved in the death of Vados and Kenneth McDavid, killed in a similar hit-and-run last year.

Authorities said Golay and Rutterschmidt befriended the two transients, duped the men into signing them as beneficiaries on their life insurance policies and collected more than $2.3 million after they were killed. They are investigating whether as many as six other men, including a blind man, fell prey to the alleged scheme.

Allred said Vados never met Golay and Rutterschmidt until they reached a court settlement on her father's life insurance policy. Vados' longtime boyfriend Randy Hansen said police told him in 2000 that the women claimed Paul Vados' body by telling the coroner they were his only living relatives.

Hansen said he and Stella Vados battled with the women to move Vados from the unmarked grave where they buried him to a family plot. He remains in the unmarked grave.

Investigators recently seized the station wagon they believe struck McDavid. Federal authorities said the 1999 Mercury Sable had been involved in a collision with a pedestrian or bicyclist, and that Golay had called for it to be towed near the alley where McDavid was killed.

The call was made from a gas station about an hour before McDavid's body was found, according to court filings. Over the next month, the car received three tickets and was towed while parked six blocks away from Golay's Hollywood home.

The car was nearly identical to a vehicle described in notes found in Helen Golay's home after her arrest, federal investigators said. It was not registered to either Golay or Rutterschmidt.

Deputy Federal Public Defender Kim Savo, who is representing Rutterschmidt, said her office is conducting an independent investigation and would not comment. Golay's lawyer, Philip Samovar, has not returned messages left at his office.

Lawyer Offers Plea In Drug Case (JCL)

By Jimmie E. Gates

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, June 1, 2006

A lawyer formerly associated with a Jackson law firm pleaded not guilty Tuesday to a 36-count federal indictment accusing him of helping clients submit false settlement claims involving the diet drug Fen-Phen.

Vicksburg lawyer Robert Arledge, 49, made his initial court appearance in U.S. District Court on Tuesday after being indicted on Friday. He is the first lawyer charged in the ongoing FBI/IRS federal investigation of fraudulent Fen-Phen claims.

Arledge made no comments after his court appearance, but his attorney proclaimed Arledge's innocence.

CHARGES AGAINST ARLEDGE

Lawyer Robert Arledge faces 36 counts in U.S. District Court. The charges are:

One count of conspiracy to defraud, four counts of fraud and three counts of wire fraud. Each of the fraud charges carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison.

Twenty-six counts of money laundering. Each of the money laundering charges carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison.

Two counts to forfeit property derived through the alleged scheme.

"All the charges are unfounded," defense attorney Bill Kirksey said. "Mr. Arledge has done nothing wrong."

Kirksey said Arledge was one of numerous lawyers who worked on Fen-Phen settlement claims.

"I'm wondering why he is standing here and not others," Kirksey said.

The U.S. attorney's office says Arledge was employed with Richard Schwartz & Associates at the time of the alleged fraud.

The indictment alleges Arledge and several plaintiffs received more than $8 million in settlements and attorney fees to which they were not entitled.

DOJ_NMG_0030754

"You had individuals who never took the drug and received substantial amounts of money," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Don Burkhalter outside the federal courthouse in Jackson.

Kirksey said Arledge depended on what clients told him in submitting the claims.

Arledge was out of the country Friday on a hunting trip when the indictment was announced.

The government confiscated items from Arledge's office last week, including safes that have yet to be opened. Prosecutors agreed Tuesday to open the safes at a mutually agreed upon time with Arledge and his attorneys.

Fen-Phen, which was sold under brand names including Redux and Pondimin, was pulled from the market in 1997 after being linked to a series of heart problems. Its maker, American Products, established a $400 million pool in 1999 to settle legal claims.

The indictment covers from January 1999 to July 2002. Arledge is the third person associated with Schwartz & Associates indicted in the Fen-Phen investigation.

Federal prosecutor Cindy Aldridge said Arledge is the 27th person indicted in the federal investigation. All of the others have pleaded guilty but have not been sentenced.

U.S. Magistrate Judge James Sumner released Arledge on a $50,000 bond. His trial is set for Aug. 8.

Sumner said Arledge will have to surrender his passport, but is allowed to travel within the continental United States.

Arledge Says Innocent; Trial Starts Aug. 8 (VICKPOST)

By Danny Barrett Jr.

Vicksburg Post, June 1, 2006

JACKSON - Attorney Robert Arledge was released from federal custody on $50,000 bond Tuesday following an initial appearance in federal court.

He pleaded innocent to an indictment charging conspiracy, mail and wire fraud and money laundering, which carry maximum sentences of five and 10 years respectively, plus fines of up to $250,000 on each of the three charges.

A trial was set for Aug. 8 before U.S. District Judge David Bramlette.

The arraignment came after a weekend-long search for Arledge, who surrendered to federal authorities Monday. Officials with the U.S. Attorney's Office said the Vicksburg native and resident was on an overseas hunting trip when the indictment was announced Friday. Arledge may travel while on bond, but his passport was revoked.

Exiting the courthouse, Arledge, 49, had no comment on the details of the case, referring questions to his attorneys, William Kirksey and Karl Koch.

“These (charges) are all unfounded. He has done nothing wrong,” Kirksey said, walking beside Arledge.

“A lawyer has to depend on the facts the client tells them,” Kirksey said. “No lawyer has got the time to go behind every client.”

Arledge, a onetime judicial candidate in Warren County, is accused of knowingly filing false claims for payment from a settlement pool set up by American Home Products, now Wyeth Pharmaceutical. The company made and distributed the Fen-Phen diet drugs Pondimin and Redux, which were removed from the market in 1997 by the Food and Drug Administration on suspicion of being harmful to people who took them.

The 35-count indictment charges that among legitimate plaintiffs, there were false claimants who shared in more than $8 million resulting from claims based on false information about having taking the prescription drug or its effect on their health. Attorneys in such cases are normally paid their expenses and a contingency fee of at least a third of a client's share.

Creation of the pool, about $2 billion, followed jury verdicts of $23 million in Texas and a $150 million jury verdict in Jefferson County.

Federal agents seized numerous items Friday from Arledge's home in Turning Leaf subdivision, off Lee Road, including a motorcycle and more than one oil painting. The indictment lists several items obtained with the hundreds of thousands Arledge secured in fees, including home expenses, charter plane expenses, cars, drapes and football tickets.

Arledge, licensed in 1995, was working for Schwartz and Associates in Jackson, the indictment says, when the false claims were filed and paid. He ran for Warren County judge in 2002, losing to Vicksburg attorney John S. "Johnny" Price Jr., who has since been re-elected to the post.

In addition to running against Price for county judge, Arledge asked then-Gov. Ronnie Musgrove to be appointed Warren County prosecuting attorney to replace Price. He had also qualified to run for county prosecutor but withdrew.

Federal authorities now say 27 people have faced indictment for lying to claim shares of the settlement pool. Almost all have pleaded guilty and been ordered to pay restitution of about $250,000 each.

Lawyer Pleads Not Guilty In Diet Drug Case (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, June 1, 2006

JACKSON, Miss. - A Vicksburg attorney pleaded not guilty Tuesday to helping clients submit false settlement claims in a multimillion dollar lawsuit against a pharmaceutical company.

U.S. Magistrate Judge James Sumner released Robert Arledge on a $50,000 bond. Arledge turned himself in to federal authorities Monday after returning from an overseas hunting trip, ending a weekend-long search for the one-time judicial candidate.

More than a dozen federal agents last week swarmed his Vicksburg mansion. Witnesses said the officers seized property including a motorcycle and an oil painting.

The 36-count federal indictment lists several items obtained with the hundreds of thousands of dollars Arledge secured in fees, including drapes, cars, homes and football tickets.

The charges stem from the 48-year-old's involvement in claims from a settlement pool created by American Home Products, a pharmaceutical company that produced and distributed Pondimin and Redux.

The indictment charges that numerous plaintiffs shared in more than $8 million in payments as a result of submitting the false information and that Arledge, as an attorney, knew the claims were false.

Creation of the pool - nearly $2 billion - followed a $23 million jury verdict in 1999 in Texas and a $150 million jury verdict in Jefferson County, claiming the diet drugs endangered the health of those who took it.

In addition to the conspiracy charge, which in this case carries a maximum sentence of five years, Arledge faces additional charges of mail and wire fraud and money laundering in the indictment that carry five- and 10-year sentences, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Cynthia Eldridge. Those terms result from the activity taking place before the maximums sentences were raised in 2002, and thus are lower than current maximums, Eldridge said.

Arledge, a Vicksburg native, ran for Warren County Court judge in 2002. He received his license to practice law in 1995 and formerly worked with the Swartz & Associates law firm in Jackson.

Besides running for county judge, Arledge asked then Gov. Ronnie Musgrove to be appointed Warren County prosecuting attorney. He had also qualified to run for county prosecutor but withdrew from the race.

Medical Supply Company Owner Pleads Guilty In Wheelchair Scam (HC)

Houston Chronicle, June 1, 2006

A medical equipment company owner pleaded guilty Tuesday to paying $200 kickbacks to Houston doctors for writing prescriptions for unneeded motorized wheelchairs in a scam that cost federal health agencies millions.

Harold "Prince Yellowe" Iyalla, 48, also told U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore that Medicare paid his company, 1st Choice Medical Supplies and Equipment, $5.6 million under the scam.

During his plea, Iyalla said he paid recruiters $200 to $300 for each patient they could send to one of the doctors willing to write a phony prescription. Under the scheme, equipment companies would bill the government for wheelchairs that typically cost about $4,200, then give the patients motorized scooters worth about $1,700, according to the indictment.

Iyalla pleaded guilty to conspiracy, health care fraud and money laundering with maximum sentences ranging from five to 10 years and fines of $250,000.

Ex-Money Manager Gets 30 Years (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

James Lewis expresses regret at his sentencing for swindling investors of $156 million.

Orange County money manager James P. Lewis Jr. was sentenced Friday to 30 years in prison for swindling 1,600 investors of $156 million in a Ponzi scheme so calculated and long-running that the judge called it a "crime against humanity."

Lewis slumped back in his seat as U.S. District Judge Cormac Carney pronounced the maximum sentence, rejecting pleas by Lewis' lawyer that it would be "a death sentence for a 60-year-old." Lewis turns 60 next month.

Carney calculated that 19 1/2 years in prison would be the most under nonbinding federal sentencing guidelines. But he said those rules "never contemplated this kind of case."

For nearly 20 years, the judge noted, Lewis solicited retirement funds from investors who now face the prospect of humiliation and poverty in their senior years.

"Obviously, Mr. Lewis has robbed you of security, peace of mind and the pursuit of happiness," Carney said. He added that when Congress set 30 years as the maximum sentence for mail fraud, "I just can't believe they could have conceived of a worse case than this."

The judge's decision was handed down after a four-hour, 20-minute hearing in a packed Santa Ana courtroom filled with weeping testimony from victims and Lewis' family, as well as angry outbursts from some investors.

Asked by the judge to address the court, Lewis delivered a rambling speech that began with apologies to his victims, saying he was "full of sorrow, shame and deep remorse." In a high-pitched voice, he then described at length the hard-core criminals he had come to know in jail — men with names such as Trigger, Hit Man and Cutthroat — and said he hoped to someday reform them through Bible study.

As the sentence was read, one of Lewis' daughters screamed and burst into tears while many of the 60 other spectators applauded. Several victims said they had thought the sentence would be light because Carney had seemed sympathetic to the argument about Lewis' age during the hearing.

"He was sounding like he'd be lenient on him," said Janet Goldblatt, an investor who told the judge she had lost a nest egg from working 25 years as a designer for Mattel Inc.

"To say I'm happy doesn't begin to describe it — it's satisfaction that the justice system works," Goldblatt said. "At least we know where he's going to spend his retirement."

Defense attorney Scott M. Schlegel said he would appeal the sentence, saying it was cruel and unusual punishment for a man of Lewis' age.

The judge praised Lewis for giving up his right to a trial, which he said could have overwhelmed the already devastated investors. Lewis pleaded guilty in October to one count of mail fraud and one count of money laundering.

Among his clients were many fellow Mormons who had learned of Lewis' Financial Advisory Consultants in Lake Forest through church connections, and talked friends and family members into investing as well.

Lewis has been held without bail since January 2004, when he was arrested at a budget motel in Texas after a nationwide manhunt. He had a disguise and a guidebook to Mexico at the time.

Over two decades, he raised $311 million from investors who had heard glowing accounts of people earning returns of as much as 40% a year. Billing his operation as perfect for individual retirement accounts, Lewis lulled investors by paying them dividends and other returns, leaving investors with a net loss of about $156 million.

But as he admitted in October, the payments were made using funds from other investors in a classic Ponzi scheme.

Lewis' fraud succeeded for so long in part because he was taking in money that investors had earmarked for retirement and weren't seeking returns on for years, said Barry Minkow, who spent seven years in prison for defrauding investors when he operated ZZZZ Best carpet-cleaning company in Reseda.

Minkow, now an anti-fraud consultant, tipped authorities to Lewis' scam after worried investors asked his firm to look into what they suspected was a scam.

Lewis told his victims he was turning big profits by buying and selling distressed businesses, leasing equipment to medical offices and financing medical insurance premiums.

In fact, Assistant U.S. Atty. Gregory W. Staples reminded the judge, Lewis made only a few small investments and squandered millions on cars and expensive homes for his ex-wife in Laguna Niguel, a girlfriend in Villa Park and another girlfriend in Greenwich, Conn.

Receiver Robb Evans & Associates of Sun Valley has been liquidating Lewis' assets and suing hundreds of clients who were paid more than the money they invested, hoping to reclaim some for the losing investors.

Evans has recovered nearly $11 million, of which investors will get $9.5 million after expenses, said Evans' chief operating officer, Brick Kane.

Ex-Mansfield Cop Pleads Guilty In Child Porn Case (FWST)

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, June 1, 2006

David Neal Looney, 41, a former Mansfield police officer, pled guilty in federal court in Fort Worth today to one count of possession of child pornography, according to a press release from the U.S. Department of Justice.

Looney, of Mansfield, admitted in court documents that he paid for access to a Web site that allowed its paying members to view and download images of child pornography.

Looney confessed to FBI agents that he had images of child pornography on his home computer and gave written consent for agents to seize and search his computer. A forensic examination of the computer's hard drive revealed approximately 110 images of child pornography.

He faces a maximum statutory sentence of 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine. He is scheduled to be sentenced Sept. 11, 2006, officials said.

Banks Honor Bogus Checks And Scam Victims Pay (WP)

By Caroline E. Mayer

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

Trying to sell his 1968 Mustang online, John Schaefer received what appeared to be a firm offer from an overseas classic-car dealer. The buyer sent Schaefer a check for $14,000 even though Schaefer was asking only $8,000. The buyer said the extra money was to cover shipping and directed Schaefer to wire him the difference.

"It seemed kind of funny, and I had some hesitation," said Schaefer, who deposited the check in his bank's ATM over the weekend. On Monday, he asked a teller to see if the check was good. She left her perch, went to the backroom and returned assuring him "there was no problem," Schaefer recalled.

On Wednesday, "still not feeling quite right," Schaefer asked the same teller to make sure the check was good. That time, the teller told him the check had been cleared and he was "all set." Schaefer withdrew $5,000 and wired the money to the buyer.

Four days later, as he reviewed his account online, he discovered the check was not good. Even worse, the bank was demanding that he repay the $5,000.

"Had I made the deposit and not tried to make sure it was legitimate, I should have full obligation to make good on it," said Schaefer, 34, a facilities manager in Brattleboro, Vt. "But I checked with the bank twice, and now I find out they have no accountability."

Schaefer is one of thousands of consumers who have been victimized by an increasingly common check scam that relies on the vagaries of the banking system to take advantage of unsuspecting consumers.

Federal rules require banks to release funds from a consumer's deposit quickly, usually within one to five business days, depending on the kind of check. However, it can take weeks before a bank discovers a check is fraudulent.

So when a teller says "the check has cleared," the teller is "usually thinking in terms of bank rules, that the hold time is over, and the consumer now has access to the funds," said Susan Grant, director of the National Fraud Information Center.

But the average consumer thinks that phrase means "the check is not fraudulent," Grant added.

When that happens, it is depositors who are responsible for the money, she said. As the American Bankers Association explains in a "Fraud Alert!" statement insert it distributes to banks to send to customers: The consumer is the one dealing directly with the person who sent the money and therefore is "in the best position to determine how risky the transaction is."

To facilitate the flow of funds behind the 40 billion checks processed each year, banks are required to release funds within a few days, said Nessa Feddis, senior federal counsel for American Bankers Association.

If tellers start asking a lot of questions or start holding checks until they are determined to be good, banks "might be perceived as trying to circumvent the rules entitling people to withdraw funds," Feddis added. And if the banks are wrong, it will only be a matter of time before they are hauled before Congress and "accused of trying to hold on to people's funds," she said.

That provides no comfort to those who have gotten caught in scams. "I want security more than fast check-cashing and money flying all over the place," said Toni Gaston, a New Jersey administrative assistant who was the victim of an Internet work-at-home scam earlier this year.

In February, about a year after Gaston had posted her résumé on a job-search Web site, she received an e-mail about a part-time opportunity: to work as a courier for money for an international charity that builds homes for people in disaster areas. Her assignment was to deposit local donations into her own bank account, wait for the checks to clear and then wire the money to another address. She was told she would be paid 7 percent of every donation check, with a guarantee of $500 the first week on the job.

Gaston received a $4,500 cashier's check on Saturday, Feb. 26, and immediately deposited it in her Bank of America account. The teller told her it would take three days for the check to clear. On Wednesday, Gaston reviewed her account online and saw the funds were in her account. "I assumed, since it was a cashier's check, that Bank of America had actually gotten money from the other bank and put it into my account," she said.

On Thursday, Gaston withdrew $2,000 and wired it to a Ukrainian address. That's not unusual since most of these scams direct money outside the United States, often to Canada or Nigeria. The next day, Gaston followed instructions from another e-mail directing her to wire $1,900 to a different Ukrainian address.

"I couldn't believe I could make this much from this little bit of work," Gaston said. It was only a few days later that Gatson's euphoria wore off, when she caught a snippet of a TV news story about a person who had been scammed by an identical work-at-home scheme.

"My face turned completely green," said Gaston, who called the bank immediately. Bank officials told her there was nothing the bank could do and warned her that she would have to repay the $3,900 when the counterfeit cashier's check was finally returned to the bank.

It took another month before that happened. By that time, Gaston had surfed the Internet and learned there were hundreds of other victims around the country. She was furious. "The banks know this is going on. They know people are compromising the bank system, so why don't they upgrade their security, train their tellers to spot the counterfeit checks?"

According to Gaston: "A bank vice president told me that the bank cashes so many checks a day it doesn't have time to do that. I thought my money was safe. . . . I should have stashed it in a mattress."

Bank of America spokeswoman Diane Wagner said privacy rules prohibit talking about Gaston's case. However, in general terms, she said, "We advise customers to know with whom they're doing business. We also tell them they should never agree to wire back funds to a person they're not familiar with."

Wagner and other bank officials around the country all note that both the deposit receipt and the initial agreement customers sign when setting up an account make it clear that if any deposit item is returned, for any reason, the customer is responsible.

Bank of America's deposit receipt, for example, says: "All items are credited subject to verification, collection, and conditions of the Rules and Regulations of this Bank and as otherwise provided by law."

For most consumers, that language is clearly not enough, said Shawn Mosch, who launched a "Scam Victims United" Web site after she and her husband fell victim to a counterfeit check scam when they tried to sell a 1961 Buick online. Begun in 2003, Scam Victims United now has 2,616 members registered to its message board of 4,000 postings.

"There ought to be a law that says banks can't release the money until the check is guaranteed to have cleared -- or the customer is willing to sign a release realizing it is his/her responsibility if the check turns out bad," Mosch said. "Had there been something like that for me when I was a victim, I would have said, 'Oh wait, you mean we're not guaranteed here?' . . . We didn't trust the guy we were selling the car to, but we trusted our bank to tell us the truth. . . . I specifically asked the teller, 'I want to make sure if I do anything with this check it won't come back and bite me,' and the same teller assured me three times there was no problem."

Bank officials say it is not possible to warn each and every consumer about potential scams. "Everybody is in a hurry, so if we made such a disclosure with each transaction about every responsibility the depositor has, we'd be there all day," the ABA's Feddis said.

Besides, Feddis added, the proportion of fraudulent checks is very small, fewer than 100,000 out of the 40 billion checks processed annually. But the numbers are growing. According to the suspicious-activity reports banks file with the federal government, the number of fraudulent and counterfeit checks totaled 88,986 in 2005. That's more than triple the 28,670 reported in 2000. Between 2004 and 2005 alone, the number of reports of fraudulent and counterfeit checks grew by 45 percent.

Driving this increase is the Internet, which has made it easy for scammers to reach an ever-widening circle of susceptible consumers. "Because you're on the Internet in the comfort of your home, you may not realize the dark alleys you're dealing with," said John Hambrick, the FBI's unit chief at the Internet Crime Complaint Center.

Banks say they are trying to be more proactive, alerting their customers to those dark fraud-filled alleys through statement inserts and posters.

"Banks could do a better job," added Grant of the National Fraud Information Center. Among other things, she said, they could improve technology to catch fraudulent checks faster and be more upfront with customers about the risks.

"For example, when a customer says, 'Has this check cleared?' it's an opportunity to say the hold period is over and now you can have access to the money, but that doesn't mean the check or money order is good. If it bounces, you will still be responsible."

Even so, Grant added, consumers need to be vigilant, too. "And there's one sure way consumers can avoid a scam: Anytime anyone asks you to wire them money, that's all you need to know."

Schaefer learned that lesson the expensive way with his Mustang. He eventually sold it "to a gentlemen in Massachusetts," he said, adding, "He paid cash."

Plot To Arm Militia Group Nets Prison For Houstonian (HC)

By Harvey Rice

Houston Chronicle, June 1, 2006

A Houston businessman and former member of the Danish Parliament was sentenced to 14 years in federal prison today for his role in a plot to trade cocaine for weapons to arm a right-wing militia listed as a terrorist group.

Uwe Jensen, 70, pleaded guilty more than three years ago to conspiring with his boss, Carlos Ali Romero Varela, 47, to sell shoulder-launched anti-aircraft missiles and small arms to the United Self-Defense Forces of Colombia, or AUC.

"Nothing was intended to hurt the United States," Jensen said today as he apologized in court for his crime.

His attorney, Erik Sunde, said Jensen got involved because he had gone through a divorce was earning a little more than $1,000 per month from Romero.

He entered into "what seemed to be an adventure, what seemed to be exciting and offered financial security for his future," Sunde said.

U.S. District Judge David Hittner said Jensen's age kept him from issuing a sentence of 15 years to life in prison, as permitted under federal sentencing guidelines.

Hittner sentenced Edgar Fernando Blanco Puerta, an AUC commandante known as "Emilio," to life in prison. He sentenced Elkin Alberto Arroyave Ruiz, a Colombian known as "Napo," to 15 years in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0030760

Arroyave Ruiz's attorney, Richard Diaz, said his client was a contractor hired by the AUC to inspect the weapons they planned to purchase for $25 million in cash and cocaine. Prosecutors initially claimed he was an AUC commandante, but acknowledged later that he was not an AUC member.

The AUC, an umbrella group for right-wing militias formed to fight Marxist guerrillas, is on the U.S. State Department's list of terrorist groups and has been accused of widespread human rights abuses.

Romero, Jensen's employer and co-conspirator, also haspleaded guilty and is awaiting sentencing.

They were arrested in an FBI sting operation code-named "White Terror," which began after an East German informant who claimed to have ties with the KGB told the FBI that Jensen and Romero wanted to buy Russian weapons.

The FBI arranged an elaborate sting operation in which Warsaw Pact arms for sale were depicted on a CD-ROM.

Jensen and Romero planned to ship the AUC 53 million rounds of ammunition, 9,000 AK-47 assault rifles, grenade launchers with 300,000 grenades, two SA-7 shoulder-fired anti-aircraft missiles, 300 pistols and two SVD sniper rifles, investigators said.

Romero, who prosecutors said had been involved in drug trafficking, was president of Poseidon Inc., which he formed to make international chemical shipments in special tanks designed for easy transport.

Romero and Blanco agreed to trade weapons for cocaine after a series of meetings in Latin America and Houston, authorities said.

Jensen had a short political career in Denmark before moving to Texas. He was a city councilman in his hometown of Esbjerg in 1975, a member of the Danish Parliament in 1977-79 and a member of the European Parliament in 1977-78 and spent three months in 1978 as a Danish delegate to the United Nations.

3 Men Sentenced In Drugs-For-Weapons Case (AP)

AP, June 1, 2006

HOUSTON -- Three men, including a former Danish parliament member, were sentenced Wednesday to prison terms ranging from 14 years to life in prison for their roles in a $25 million weapons-for-cocaine plot involving Colombian terrorists, prosecutors said.

Elkin Alberto Arroyave Ruiz, 37, and Edgar Fernando Blanco Puerta, 59, both Colombian nationals, and Uwe Jensen, 70, a naturalized U.S. citizen from Denmark, had pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy to provide material support and resources to the Autodefensas Unidos de Colombia.

The group was designated a foreign terrorist organization by the U.S. government on Sept. 10, 2001.

Jensen and Blanco also pleaded guilty to conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine, said U.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle.

U.S. District Judge David Hittner sentenced Jensen to 14 years in prison for each of the two counts he faced. His sentences will be served concurrently. Jensen sat on Denmark's parliament from 1975 to 1979.

Blanco was given sentences of life in prison and 15 years for the two counts he faced. Both sentences will be served concurrently.

Arroyave was sentenced to 15 years and faces deportation to Colombia after serving his term.

All federal prison terms are without parole.

All three were arrested in 2002 -- Jensen in Houston, Arroyave and Blanco in San Jose, Costa Rica.

Carlos Ali Romero Varela, 46, another participant in the scheme, is awaiting sentencing.

Prosecutors said Jensen and Romero, who both lived in the Houston area, tried to broker a deal with an undercover FBI operative to provide $25 million worth of Russian-made weapons in exchange for cocaine and cash.

A CD-ROM with samples of the weapons was presented to members of the Colombian terrorist group, including Arroyave and Blanco. No weapons reached the group, authorities said.

Judge Questions Role Of Wife In Alleged Cuba Spy Tandem (AP)

By Curt Anderson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

A federal judge raised questions Wednesday about the role of a Florida International University employee accused along with her professor husband of working as agents of the Cuban government, suggesting that the charges amounted to "character assassination" against her.

U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore said it was unfair to Elsa Alvarez to assume that she was involved in all of the activities of her husband, Carlos Alvarez, particularly since there is substantial evidence indicating she was reluctant from the beginning and later opposed continuing their alleged surveillance on behalf of Cuba.

"There's a lot of character assassination as to the wife because of what you have on the husband," Moore said at a hearing. "It strengthens your case if you can just lump her in there."

Moore's comments came during a three-hour hearing on a request by Elsa Alvarez's lawyers that she be released on bail before trial scheduled in early 2007. Moore did not issue an immediate ruling, but did direct attorneys to draw up a tentative order providing for bail of at least $250,000.

The couple is charged with failing to register as agents of a foreign government. Prosecutors contend they spied for Cuban President Fidel Castro's government for decades, mainly reporting on activities of Miami's large Cuban-American exile community and U.S. political developments.

Both have pleaded not guilty and have been held without bail since their arrests in early January. Prosecutors have alleged they used their positions at FIU - she as social program coordinator, he as a psychology professor - as cover.

Testimony revealed Wednesday that during three days of interviews with the FBI last summer, Carlos Alvarez repeatedly told agents that his wife was not directly involved in communications - using coded messages on a short-wave radio - with their Cuban intelligence service handlers.

In fact, according to transcripts of those interviews, Elsa Alvarez grew increasingly worried about the contacts and hoped to end them.

"Elsa has been the person who wanted me to break with all of this for many years," Carlos Alvarez told FBI agents. "I'm not saying it as a husband defending a wife. But there's nothing there."

Brian Frazier, the assistant U.S. attorney handling the case, acknowledged that the evidence is "mixed" about Elsa Alvarez's activities on behalf of Cuba. But he said she did attend a training session with Cuban handlers with her husband in Mexico in the mid-1980s and received a medal for her work while on a trip to Cuba in 1991.

The evidence, Frazier said, "is greater as to Mr. Alvarez than to his wife. But it's important to understand how these husband-and-wife teams work and how they aided and abetted each other."

A key question for Moore is whether Elsa Alvarez is a risk to flee the country if released on bail. FBI agent Albert Alonso, the chief investigator on the case, testified that a Cuban passport in Carlos Alvarez's name was found at their Miami home, but nothing in Elsa Alvarez's name.

There was also no evidence of false travel documents or identities, which are common in espionage and similar cases, Alonso said. But he added that Cuba has frequently recruited married couples as spies because of their loyalty to each other.

"It's a family unit. They trust each other. Nobody else knows about them but themselves," Alonso said.

Testimony also disclosed Wednesday that the FBI planted a listening device in the couple's bedroom in at least 2001 and possibly earlier. But in all of those taped conversations, Alonso said there was no discussion of fleeing to Cuba if the couple was caught, or of such things as foreign bank accounts or fake travel documents.

Stolen VA Data Goes Beyond Initial Reports (AP)

By HOPE YEN, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Personal information on 26.5 million veterans that was stolen from a Veterans Affairs employee this month not only included Social Security numbers and birthdates but in many cases phone numbers and addresses, internal documents show.

DOJ_NMG_0030762

Meanwhile, VA Secretary Jim Nicholson said Wednesday that he had named a former Arizona prosecutor as a special adviser for information security, a new three-month post that will pinpoint security problems at the VA and develop recommendations for improvements.

The three pages of memos by the VA, written by privacy officer Mark Whitney and distributed to high-level officials shortly after the May 3 burglary, offer new details on the scope of one of the nation's largest security breaches. The memos were obtained Wednesday by The Associated Press.

They show that a file containing 6,744 records pertaining to "mustard gas veterans" - or those who participated in chemical testing programs during World War II - was breached, and that a "short file" with as many as 10 diagnostic codes indicating a veteran's disability also was stolen.

At the same time, however, the memos suggest that the data might be difficult to retrieve by thieves.

"Given the file format used to store the data, the data may not be easily accessible," stated one memo dated May 5 and distributed internally May 8.

On Wednesday, the VA did not say why it didn't immediately reveal that personal information such as addresses and phone numbers had been disclosed. But the agency said it aggressively sought to protect veterans once Nicholson was informed.

"VA's initial and primary efforts have focused on notifying the millions of veterans and some spouses whose most sensitive and identifiable information - their names, Social Security numbers, dates of birth, and some disability ratings - may have been compromised," spokesman Matt Burns said.

Some lawmakers said Wednesday they were troubled by the new revelations, which go further than what the VA initially reported after publicizing the theft on May 22. At the time, Nicholson said the data was limited to names, Social Security numbers and birthdates; he later indicated that diagnostic codes in some cases also may have been breached.

"It is not appropriate for this information to ever enter the public domain," said Rep. Bob Filner, D-Calif., the top Democrat on the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, which is planning to hold several additional hearings on data security and veterans' benefits later this summer.

Veterans groups have criticized the VA for a three-week delay in publicizing the burglary after the theft at a VA data analyst's Maryland home. During hearings last week, Nicholson said he was "mad as hell" that employees did not notify him of the May 3 burglary until May 16.

Joe Davis, a spokesman for Veterans of Foreign Wars, said the VA needs to come clean about who exactly is at risk.

"What's so upsetting and frustrating is the lack of specific details coming from the VA," he said. "We have millions of veterans looking to the VA for answers, including older veterans who may not have Internet access or fully comprehend what this means to them, and younger veterans who will now have to carry this dark cloud with them for the rest of their lives."

Separately, Nicholson said in a statement that he had appointed former Maricopa County Attorney Richard Romley as his new adviser for information security. Nicholson cited a need for dramatic security changes in the wake of the burglary.

"Rick Romley is a well-respected attorney and veteran who will provide a critical outsider's perspective to VA," Nicholson said. "Rick shares my commitment to cutting through bureaucracy to provide results for our nation's veterans."

Romley, a Vietnam War veteran, prosecuted one of the largest public corruption cases in Arizona in the early 1990s and was seen as a potential GOP contender in that state's 2006 governor's race.

On Tuesday, VA deputy assistant secretary Michael McLendon said he was stepping down because of the theft, and the VA announced it would dismiss the data analyst, who had reported to McLendon. The department also placed Dennis Duffy, the acting head of the division in which the data analyst worked, on administrative leave.

Deal Lets City Subpoena 3 Lab Workers (HC)

By Steve Mcvicker

Houston Chronicle, June 1, 2006

Legislator and investigator agree on a plan to force them to testify

Three recalcitrant witnesses believed to hold key information concerning the root of problems at the Houston Police Department crime lab could soon be forced to tell what they know.

Michael Bromwich, the city's independent investigator, and Rep. Kevin Bailey, D-Houston, chairman of the House Committee on General Investigating and Ethics, confirmed Tuesday that an unorthodox agreement has been reached that would let Bromwich use the committee's subpoena power to compel the uncooperative former lab employees to testify under oath.

"We're pleased we've been able to reach an agreement with Chairman Bailey and the members of his committee that will advance our investigation," Bromwich said.

In his latest report on the crime lab released earlier this month, Bromwich, a former U.S. Justice Department inspector general, said DNA and serology analysts may have tailored their findings to support predetermined crime theories.

Bromwich also complained that the probe by his team of forensic investigators has been hindered by an absence of cooperation from three ex-crime lab employees: former lab supervisor Don Krueger, former DNA lab chief James Bolding and former analyst Christy Kim.

Krueger retired in February 2003 after the DNA section's widespread problems were exposed. Former Police Chief C.O. Bradford later recommended that Krueger be fired for his role in the lab's problems. Bolding resigned in 2003 to avoid being fired. Kim was fired, but the Civil Service Commission re-instated her and she later retired.

Work by Bolding and Kim has been repeatedly mentioned in cases found to be suspect by Bromwich's team.

"Was it just incompetence and sloppiness by the analysts, or was there some outside pressure getting them to come up with certain results?" Bailey asked. "They've not been willing to answer questions, and so this appears to be the only way to get them (to)."

Attempts to contact the three former lab employees for comment were unsuccessful Tuesday.

According to Bailey's reading of the Texas Government Code, no one who testifies before his committee can be prosecuted based on that testimony. Therefore, in his opinion, none of the witnesses should fear cooperating.

"But if they still fail to testify, we'll find them in contempt and attempt to have them prosecuted," the committee chairman said.

Subpoena powersThe subpoenas for Krueger, Bolding and Kim will order them to appear before the committee in closed hearings scheduled June 12-14 at Houston City Hall. Bailey said one day has been set aside for the questioning of each witness. The witnesses are expected to appear before the committee, but Bailey said Bromwich would lead the questioning.

The idea of the committee basically lending its subpoena power to Bromwich was first floated by Bailey earlier this year. But the chairman's suggestion ran into opposition from Rep. Harold Dutton D-Houston, who is also on the committee. However, when contacted Tuesday, Dutton said he no longer has reservations about the rarely used committee tactic.

"There is some precedent for, in a closed hearing, allowing questions to come from parties that have been dictated by the committee and committee chair," Dutton said.

Team's qualificationsDutton also said that Bromwich's forensic team is obviously better qualified to question the former lab workers than members of the committee.

Bromwich was hired by the city to investigate the crime lab in 2005. The lab's DNA division was closed in December 2002 because of problems with practices and personnel. Since then, errors also have been exposed in the lab divisions that test firearms, body fluids and controlled substances.

Two men have been released from prison because of faulty lab work.

Thus far, Bromwich's investigators have identified 93 cases involving DNA or serology analysis with "major issues" that raise doubts about the reliability of work and the accuracy of analysts' conclusions.

"(The Legislature) has got to figure out if these labs should be independent and separate from police departments, or can they operate fairly when they are under police department control," Bailey said.

Ohio Justices Reverse Death Penalty Over Killer's Abusive Childhood (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, June 1, 2006

(AP) - COLUMBUS, Ohio-The Ohio Supreme Court on Wednesday threw out the death sentence of a man who strangled and stomped a 76-year-old man during a robbery, saying the killer's chaotic childhood with abusive parents, along with other factors, outweighed the crime's brutality.

DOJ_NMG_0030764

The 4-3 opinion also noted that Troy Tenace, 44, expressed remorse when he confessed to police in 1994, and that if he receives the maximum sentence, he won't be eligible for parole until age 96.

Any one factor alone would not have resulted in reversing the death sentence, but the combination of the three is enough to argue for prison over execution, the majority said.

The three dissenting justices said the brutality of the crime was inexcusable.

The justices were unanimous, however, in upholding Tenace's conviction for robbing and killing Chester Kozlowski on Jan. 28, 1994, in his Toledo home. Tenace robbed Kozlowski because the older man paid him in cash earlier for chimney repairs. The man had been gagged and strangled, and had extensive facial injuries from being stomped with heavy boots.

The ruling sends the case back to Lucas County for resentencing.

Tenace's mother and siblings had testified he was forced to watch the sexual abuse of his sister by his stepfather and was sexually abused himself by baby sitters, and that all three children were taught to steal and use drugs by age 10.

"Tenace was doomed from the start," Justice Judith Lanzinger said in the majority opinion. "Both appellant's mother and father were abusive, neglectful, and pernicious influences on their three children, who were schooled in crime from an early age."

South Carolina Bills Would Allow Death Penalty For Sex Offenders (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

The House passed a pair of bills that would allow prosecutors to seek the death penalty for some repeat child molesters. One bill was approved earlier by the Senate and now goes to the governor's office, but the second must go back to the Senate for reconsideration.

CIVIL LAW:

FEC Adopts Hands-Off Stance On '527' Spending (WP)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

The same rules that allowed independent "527" groups such as America Coming Together and Swift Boat Veterans for Truth to pump more than $400 million into the 2004 election campaigns will remain in place for now, the Federal Election Commission announced yesterday, a decision that invites even larger sums to be spent influencing races this year and in 2008.

The FEC ruling, made on a vote of 4 to 2 in closed session was a response to an order by U.S. District Judge Emmett G. Sullivan. Noting the apparent "complete failure" of the FEC's regulatory efforts in 2004, Sullivan required the agency either to start crafting new rules or to issue a better explanation of how it will be able to regulate the groups effectively under existing rules.

Commission Chairman Michael E. Toner was one of the two dissenting votes. "The stage is set for 527s to once again spend hundreds of millions of dollars in soft money to influence the 2006 midterms and the 2008 presidential election," he said.

Money donated to 527 groups -- the name comes from the section of the federal tax code under which the organizations operate -- must be disclosed under election law. Unlike contributions to candidates or major parties, there are no limits on what an individual can give.

In the 2004 presidential campaign, this allowed donors such as financier George Soros and insurance magnate Peter Lewis to be the major supporters of the liberal groups America Coming Together (ACT) and the Media Fund, which organized field operations and bought television ads against President Bush in swing states such as Ohio. On the other side, Texas developer Bob J. Perry helped fund the Swift Boat Veterans, which attacked Democratic nominee John F. Kerry's Vietnam War record.

Committees aligned with the Democratic Party outspent their GOP competitors $320 million to $109 million, according to the Campaign Finance Institute.

DOJ_NMG_0030765

House Republicans have passed legislation to limit the money individuals donate to 527 groups to $25,000 for voter registration and turnout activities and to $5,000 for TV commercials. Senate Democrats, however, appear determined to block the measure.

Toner said he sought to write a rule severely restricting contributions to 527 groups, but lost the vote yesterday. He was joined by fellow Republican Hans A. von Spakovsky. All three Democrats on the commission -- Robert D. Lenhard, Ellen L. Weintraub and Steven T. Walther -- joined Republican David M. Mason in the majority vote.

The pro-Democratic tilt of 527 spending in 2003-2004 prompted opposition at the Republican National Committee, the Bush-Cheney campaign and among Republican members of the House and Senate. Republicans did not become actively involved in 527 fundraising until May 13, 2004, when the FEC rejected proposals to issue strong regulations governing contributions to the groups.

The 527 activity in 2004 may not recur. Since the 2004 contest, ACT and the Media Fund effectively folded when Soros and some other Democratic heavy hitters withdrew support.

Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) and Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.), co-sponsors of the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign finance law, had sued the FEC demanding tougher regulations and enforcement.

Election Panel Won't Issue Donation Rules (NYT)

By Kate Phillips

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 31 — The Federal Election Commission has decided not to issue rules to regulate so-called 527 organizations that used millions of dollars in private donations to become powerful voices in the 2004 presidential election.

A federal judge had told the commission that it had two choices: issue uniform rules or issue a fuller explanation of why it was dealing with 527-related cases one by one even as the 2006 elections near. The commission voted 4 to 2 not to appeal the judge's ruling, and chose the second option.

Its chairman, Michael E. Toner, a Republican, dissented, saying, "The failure to issue rules has fostered uncertainty about what is legally permissible and has undermined the McCain-Feingold law" that governs campaign financing.

The vote by the panel set the stage for another round of court battles that could affect the 2006 Congressional elections, as well as the 2008 presidential race.

Advocates of changing campaign financing — and some Republicans — have been prodding the commission and Congress to regulate the 527 groups, named after a section of the tax code. Critics term the groups' operations an end run around the McCain-Feingold ban on the largely unregulated contributions to federal candidates that is known as soft money.

In the 2004 election, the groups spent money in a way that parties were no longer permitted to do, prompting watchdog groups to call them "shadow parties."

The 527 groups largely aided Democratic candidates through benefactors like the billionaire George Soros. But at the end of the campaign, the best-known group was probably the Swift Boat Vets for Truth organization that attacked Senator John Kerry.

Some advocates of changing campaign finance had pinned their hopes on the commission, recognizing that stiff Democratic opposition in the Senate had made the passage of measures to regulate 527 organizations difficult.

The decision this week grew out of a case brought by Representatives Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, and Martin T. Meehan, Democrat of Massachusetts, and the Bush-Cheney '04 campaign.

In March, Judge Emmet G. Sullivan of Federal District Court gave the commission his two options to address the question.

"Case-by-case adjudication appears to be a total failure," Judge Sullivan wrote in March.

He later elaborated, saying, "Cases arising from the 2004 campaign have languished on the commission's enforcement docket for as long as 23 months, with no end in sight, even as the 2006 election campaign has begun."

Although it has acted on some questions related to 527 groups, the commission has not resolved several complaints by Democracy 21 and other campaign finance groups against some of the biggest organizations.

Fred Wertheimer, president and chief executive officer of Democracy 21 and a lawyer involved in the 527 suit, said the decision was not satisfactory.

DOJ_NMG_0030766

"We expect the F.E.C. to act quickly," Mr. Wertheimer said, "and we also expect to be back in federal court to get this matter resolved and to stop the 527's from spending unlimited amounts of money."

Laurence E. Gold, associate general counsel for the A.F.L.-C.I.O., said it would be disastrous for unions and nonprofit organizations if the commission decided to redefine the 527 groups as federal political action committees, because those fall under the umbrella of McCain-Feingold limits.

Mr. Toner said his agency's action raised the stakes on bills in Congress. A lobbying bill approved by the House includes restrictions on 527 groups, but it is unclear whether it will emerge from the conference committee. The Senate's lobbying package has no such component, and many Senate Democrats oppose such a measure.

"Absent Congressional action," Mr. Toner said, "no one should be surprised if 527 soft-money spending in '06 and '08 becomes one of the driving forces in determining which candidates are elected."

NARA Report Calls For Streamlining Of Classified Records Management (GCN)

By Alice Lipowicz, Contributing Writer

Government Computer News, June 1, 2006

The federal government needs to apply a more integrated approach to declassifying records, a new report from the National Archives and Records Administration recommends.

"We need to streamline the multiple, inefficient and, at times, ineffective independent agency reviews of the same material," according to the report, which was published by NARA's Information Security Oversight Office.

The office found that the level of reported classifications in fiscal 2005 decreased by 1.4 million in comparison to fiscal 2004 and is the first decrease observed since fiscal 2001. Even so, there are still increasing numbers of documents being classified, primarily for counterterrorism activities and critical infrastructure protection, at the Homeland Security and Justice departments.

The total number of classifications dropped to 14.2 million in fiscal 2005, a decrease from 15.6 million the year before. That reversed an upward trend that had been occurring since 2001, with 8.7 million classifications that year. In 2002 there were 11.3 million, in 2003 14.2 million, and in 2004 15.6 million.

Declassifications rose slightly to 29.5 million in fiscal 2005, up from 28 million in fiscal 2004. The general recent trend has been downward, however, with 100 million declassifications reported in 2001; 44 million in 2002; and 43 million in 2003.

Bankruptcy Judge, Pilots Approve Concessions Deal (FINDLAW/AP)

By Harry R. Weber And Vinnee Tong, Ap Business Writers

AP, June 1, 2006

(AP) - ATLANTA-A bankruptcy judge Wednesday approved the $280-million-a-year concessions agreement between Delta Air Lines Inc. and its pilots, rejecting claims by the government's pension insurer that it should receive the compensation the pilots were promised if their pension is terminated.

The decision came hours after rank-and-file pilots gave their nod to the deal. The agreement, which runs through 2009, will take effect Thursday.

The deal, which replaces an interim pact agreed to in December, includes an initial 14 percent pay cut for pilots and assurances the pilots union won't fight any company effort to terminate the pilots' pension.

Judge Adlai Hardin signed the agreement during a hearing in White Plains, New York. Earlier in the day, pilots of the Atlanta-based airline, the No. 3 U.S. carrier, approved the deal with a vote of 61 percent in favor.

The judge's approval, the last hurdle in the process, came despite an objection filed by the government's pension insurer, which insisted that a $650 million (â,¬505 million) note and $2.1 billion (â,¬1.6 billion) unsecured claim that Delta has promised the pilots should belong to the agency if the pilots' pension is terminated as expected.

Hardin heard arguments from lawyers for both sides, but determined in the end that the agreement was in the best interest of the airline.

The Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. said afterward that it was reviewing its options, including the possibility of an appeal.

DOJ_NMG_0030767

"It was probably the most significant negotiation transaction we'll face as part of this bankruptcy process," Chief Financial Officer Edward Bastian said of the concessions deal. "It gives us the ability to put the past behind us and make Delta a success again."

The chairman of the pilots union's executive committee, Lee Moak, said in a telephone interview that he was encouraged by the agreement getting final approval.

"The sacrifices we have made were difficult," Moak said. "It has been difficult and I am confident in the process going forward."

Also Wednesday, Delta said in a filing with the bankruptcy court that it lost $27 million in April. Excluding reorganization items, it would have posted a profit of $22 million in the 30-day period. As of April 30, Delta had $2.5 billion (â,¬1.9 billion) of unrestricted cash. It has posted losses of more than $14.4 billion (â,¬11.2 billion) since January 2001.

In a letter to pilots after the pilot vote was made public, Delta's top three executives said the ratification by the rank-and-file marks a new beginning for the airline.

"If we seize this opportunity rather than squander it, Delta Air Lines once again can proudly become the gold standard of the industry," the executives said.

The chairman of the pilot union's executive committee, Lee Moak, said in a statement that the agreement the pilots ratified "provides a framework for Delta to successfully reorganize and emerge from bankruptcy ready to win in today's competitive marketplace."

The cuts are in addition to $1 billion in annual concessions the pilots agreed to in a five-year deal in 2004.

Hardin rejected the PBGC's main argument, that a deal between Delta and the pilots union was illegal.

He said that although, in some people's minds, there was a link between the $650 million promise and the potential loss of the defined pension plan, that "did not render a private agreement between an employer and union illegal."

"That is not a legal proposition I can endorse," he said. "So I must reject that."

Separately, a retired pilots group had objected to the new deal out of concern the Delta deal would ultimately reduce their benefits based on the pension being terminated. But their objection was resolved at Wednesday's hearing.

As part of the settlement, Delta has agreed to provide retired pilots an administrative claim of $9 million (â,¬7 million) to cover a portion of certain pension benefits that the retired pilots would have gotten since the bankruptcy filing in September had the benefits not been frozen. An administrative claim is a debt incurred by a company that has filed for bankruptcy, with court approval.

First Amendment Sometimes Left At Workplace Door (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

The Supreme Court's ruling on freedom-of-speech rights of public employees has created a stir across the government, in part because of the way Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, writing for the 5-to-4 majority, framed the issue:

"When public employees make statements pursuant to their official duties, the employees are not speaking as citizens for First Amendment purposes, and the Constitution does not insulate their communications from employer discipline."

Although the wording seemed stark, the court did not redefine federal whistle-blower protections. The majority, in some respects, seemed interested in ensuring that governments can oversee workplaces and that disputes between employees and supervisors do not automatically fall into the realm of a constitutional right.

The case involved a local-government employee, Los Angeles County prosecutor Richard Ceballos, and for the most part addressed only one aspect of his actions -- claims made in a memo written as part of his job duties.

In Tuesday's ruling, the court found that a district attorney's office did not violate Ceballos's freedom of speech by allegedly demoting him after he wrote supervisors about his concerns that a sheriff's deputy had lied to get a search warrant.

Ceballos contended that supervisors later retaliated against him with a demotion, denial of a promotion and a transfer to an office requiring longer commutes. The district attorney's office has denied taking retribution.

DOJ_NMG_0030768

The Supreme Court majority said Ceballos could not seek First Amendment protection because the memo laying out his allegations was written as part of his job duties and because supervisors have authority "to take proper corrective action" if they think such a memo is "inflammatory or misguided."

Kennedy, however, noted that public employees who make statements outside the course of performing their official duties "retain some possibility of First Amendment protection" because they are acting in the same manner as citizens who do not work for the government.

Government agencies troubled by the notion that employees might make whistle-blowing claims as citizens outside the workplace can take steps to address the issue, Kennedy suggested.

"A public employer that wishes to encourage its employees to voice concerns privately retains the option of instituting internal policies and procedures that are receptive to employee criticism," he wrote. "Giving employees an internal forum for their speech will discourage them from concluding that the safest avenue of expression is to state their views in public."

While that may be sound advice, numerous federal whistle-blowers have complained over the years that agencies fail to handle their complaints in a confidential manner and to protect them from reprisals by their superiors.

The four justices in dissent suggested that public employees should be eligible to claim First Amendment protection in the course of their duties. Justice David H. Souter pointed out that public workers have been given a "patchwork" of protections and noted that federal employees have no protection for disclosures made to immediate supervisors, for statements of publicly known facts or for statements made in connection with normal employment duties.

In a newsletter last year, the Merit Systems Protection Board said employees need to be careful in how they blow the whistle on violations of law and rules, gross mismanagement, gross waste of funds, abuse of authority and specific dangers to public health and safety.

An employee can blow the whistle by calling an inspector general hotline, going outside the chain of command or by talking to the news media, the newsletter suggested. Employees faced with reprisals can appeal to the board or ask for investigations by an independent agency, the Office of Special Counsel.

The Supreme Court ruling may slow momentum in Congress for redefining whistle-blower protections. Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii), with bipartisan support, is pushing for legislation that would permit a federal whistle-blower to be protected for disclosing information learned on the job or in the course of job duties.

The Justice Department has opposed taking that step, and at least one senator has placed a hold on Akaka's bill, according to congressional aides.

NYCLU: City Blocks FBI From Obtaining Evidence In Police Arrests (NSDY/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, June 1, 2006

NEW YORK -- A civil rights group told a judge on Wednesday that the city has refused to let it give evidence to the FBI as the bureau explores whether police officers violated the rights of protesters at the 2004 Republican National Convention.

The New York Civil Liberties Union notified U.S. Magistrate Judge James C. Francis in a letter that the city has refused to let it give the FBI videotapes and documents the bureau requested as part of its investigation.

"We find the city's effort to keep the materials from the FBI to be as troubling as it is without justification," NYCLU associate legal director Chris Dunn wrote in the letter.

He said he planned to ask the judge at a conference next week to clear the way for the NYCLU to cooperate with the FBI.

In a Tuesday letter to Dunn, city senior legal counsel Peter G. Ferrell wrote that the NYCLU may make its own materials available to the FBI but not materials the city gave it and marked confidential.

City law office spokeswoman Kimberly Miu said Wednesday the city's only comment was, "Since the case involves pending legal issues, it is difficult to comment."

DOJ_NMG_0030769

More than 1,800 people were arrested at the four-day convention at Madison Square Garden, where President Bush accepted his party's nomination for a second term in office.

As many as 10,000 police officers from the 36,500-member department, the nation's largest, were deployed to protect the city from terrorism threats and to cope with tens of thousands of demonstrators at the convention.

In a May 11 letter, the FBI asked the NYCLU for assistance, saying it was trying to identify and locate people who faced charges that were dismissed based on contradictory videotape evidence.

Dunn said in an interview Wednesday that he was shocked that the city blocked the NYCLU from turning over the materials.

"They've said from the outset they did nothing wrong with the convention, and two weeks ago they said they're cooperating," Dunn said. "It's now clear they have no intention of cooperating, and indeed they're trying to block us from cooperating.

"I can only assume they're worried what some of these videotapes and documents will show."

Florida Eliminates Boot Camps For Kids (AP)

By Andrea Fanta, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. — The military-style boot camp system that Florida has used to discipline juveniles was formally dismantled under a bill that Gov. Jeb Bush signed Wednesday, nearly five months after the death of a boy who was punched and kicked by guards at a state-run camp.

Instead of sending juvenile detainees to boot camps where guards can push and threaten them, children will go to residential programs that bar physical discipline. They'll go through a full medical exam when they enter and leave their programs and have a hot line they can call in case of trouble.

The $11 million program, which counties can voluntarily join, will also offer detainees job skills training, community service and counseling.

"No child will have to go through what my child went through," said Robert Anderson, who's 14-year-old son, Martin Lee Anderson, died after spending time at the Bay County boot camp.

Anderson — after whom the bill is named — was sent there on Jan. 5 for trespassing, a violation of his parole set for helping steal his grandmother's Jeep Cherokee from a church parking lot.

Security videotape taken at the camp shows a half-hour encounter between Anderson at up to nine guards, who kicked and kneed him. Anderson died the next day at a Pensacola hospital.

"This won't bring your son back, but I hope you know your involvement in this process has helped make a difference," Bush told Robert Anderson and Gina Jones, Martin's mother.

Anderson's parents expressed their gratitude for Wednesday's change, but said they're still far from seeing justice done for their son.

"I would still like the guards to be arrested for killing my baby," Jones said. "He was only fourteen years old."

While a first autopsy report stated that Anderson died of sickle cell trait, a second autopsy report released in May showed Anderson died of suffocation by guards who covered his mouth while forcing ammonia capsules up his nose.

Guards have stated in reports they tried to revive Anderson with the ammonia. No arrests have been made so far and the investigation into the death is continuing, said Pam Bondi, spokeswoman for special attorney Mark Ober. Ober is handling the investigation into Anderson's death.

"There's just no time line because it's an ongoing investigation," she said.

Anderson's parents have also called for the firing of Dr. Charles Siebert, the Bay County medical examiner who first ruled Anderson died from sickle cell trait, a benign blood condition, and not from physical trauma.

Siebert has consistently stood by his findings, saying they're based on science and not emotion. The state's medical examiners' commission is investigating complaints filed against Siebert, but no action has been taken against him, said commission chair Dr. Stephen Nelson.

DOJ_NMG_0030770

Furor over how the state has handled the investigation into Anderson's death grew to a national climax in April when students from three colleges in Tallahassee staged a two-day protest in Bush's office. The Revs. Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton joined the students and Anderson's parents for a march on the state's Capitol.

As he did during the protests, Bush urged patience. Ober must have all the time he needs to complete a thorough investigation, Bush said Wednesday.

Jones said she'll wait, but she won't give up.

"It's a long road ahead," Jones said. "I'm aware of that, so I'm just going to sit back and wait."

Meanwhile, the new program starts in July, when the 82 youths already at boot camps will also participate in the system, said Tara Collins, a spokeswoman with the state's juvenile justice department.

Bush Signs Boot Camp Changes (BRAH)

The Bradenton Herald, June 1, 2006

TALLAHASSEE - The military-style boot camp system that Florida has used to discipline juveniles was formally dismantled under a bill that Gov. Jeb Bush signed Wednesday, nearly five months after the death of a boy who was punched and kicked by guards at a state-run camp.

Instead of sending juvenile detainees to boot camps where guards can push and threaten them, children will go to residential programs that bar physical discipline. They'll go through a full medical exam when they enter and leave their programs and have a hot line they can call in case of trouble. In addition to the residency program, the new $11 million plan will offer detainees job skills training, community service and counseling.

"It was expected and anticipated," Manatee County Sheriff Charlie Wells said of the bill signing. Last month Wells recognized 12 recruits graduating from the Manatee County boot camp, likely the last graduates of a military-style camp in Manatee.

Wells said he and his staff must review the new law, and new rules, before deciding how to proceed.

"There's a lot of steps for us to take before we decide what our future is," the sheriff said. "We have to renegotiate our contract with the Department of Juvenile Justice before we move any further."

State Rep. Bill Galvano, R-Bradenton, said the situation is "unfortunate...given the history of our community and the leadership of Charlie Wells. A program that is really, in many respects, a positive program, had to be ultimately ended. But the catalyst was such a tragedy and we can't have that happening."

The legislation is named for Martin Lee Anderson, who was sent to the Bay County boot camp Jan. 5 for trespassing, a violation of his parole set for helping steal his grandmother's Jeep Cherokee from a church parking lot.

Hidden In Brothels, Slavery By Another Name (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

The word spread that there was a new girl at the brothel in Queens, and the johns began lining up.

"I was crying all night," said Kika Cerpa in an interview last week. "One by one they came in."

That first night, she said, "I had sex with 19 men."

Afterward, she took a shower, and then the man who had forced her into the sex trade demanded his turn with her. When she refused (saying, "I can't have sex with nobody — I feel like I'm dead"), he beat her up.

Ms. Cerpa came to the U.S. from Venezuela in 1992. A man she thought of as a boyfriend convinced her to follow him to New York. Ms. Cerpa reluctantly agreed, believing that she could get work as a nanny.

When she got here, her "boyfriend" and another woman took her passport and demanded that Ms. Cerpa become a prostitute to work off debts that they said the boyfriend had incurred. Threatened with bodily harm, and completely intimidated, she complied.

"They took me to a house, and I sat in a room with other girls," she said. "Men would come in, and I kept my head down the entire time."

There was nothing unusual about the predicament that confronted Ms. Cerpa — not then, when she was 20, and not now. The demand for prostitutes (here in New York and elsewhere) is much greater than the supply of women who want to be prostitutes. So trafficking, the coercion of women and young girls into the sex trade, is a flourishing industry.

The toll that trafficking takes is often horrific. In addition to the forced prostitution, the women and children who are the victims of trafficking become part of a landscape in which drug addiction, disease, mental health problems, beatings and violent death are commonplace.

The worst moment in Ms. Cerpa's three-year entrapment in the hell of prostitution occurred when a prostitute she had befriended declined to go with a customer. The john became enraged and shot the woman. Ms. Cerpa ran to her friend. "She was dead, lying there with her eyes open," she said.

It may seem peculiar, but there is no law against sex trafficking in the state of New York — or most other states, for that matter. Many thousands of women and children are coerced into the sex trade each year, and the pimps, madams and other lowlifes who trap them are seldom subject to legal sanctions commensurate with the severity of their crimes.

A bill has been introduced in the State Assembly that would create two new crimes in New York: trafficking a person for sexual servitude and trafficking a person for labor servitude. But that bill, which has overwhelming support in the Assembly (including more than 100 co-sponsors), has been stuck for some time in the Codes Committee.

This seems inexplicable, because you will find very few legislators lining up (publicly, at least) with the soft-on-sex-traffickers crowd. I talked yesterday to the Democratic speaker of the Assembly, Sheldon Silver, and asked what was up.

He said that some of the language in the bill needed to be refined, and that his staffers would be working on it later in the day. He said he thought the Assembly would be able to pass the bill "within the next two weeks." It would then go on to the Senate.

I hope so. The bill is a good one. It emphasizes the coercive aspect of trafficking, which is really about human beings being bought and sold as commodities — not just in the commercial sex trade, but also in exploitive labor situations on farms and in factories and sweatshops.

Trafficking is much more widespread than most people realize. As the advocacy group Sanctuary for Families has pointed out, "In our backyards and communities, a slave trade is flourishing that makes a mockery of our belief in civil and human rights."

The Assembly bill, whose primary sponsor is Jeffrey Dinowitz, a Bronx Democrat, would make trafficking a felony, with penalties ranging from probation for a first-time offender to a maximum of 15 years in prison. It would modestly raise the penalties for patronizing a prostitute, making it easier to jail chronic offenders. And it would provide a defense against arrest for women who were coerced into prostitution.

Jane Manning, an attorney with the international women's rights organization Equality Now, said of the trafficked women, "More often than not they are the ones who are arrested and end up with criminal convictions that follow them for the rest of their lives."

After seeing her friend murdered, Kika Cerpa cooperated with the police and helped put the killer behind bars. After a long struggle, and with help from Sanctuary for Families, she has managed to free herself from the pimps and madams who had controlled her life, and still control so many others.

Gay Marriage Looms As 'Battle Of Our Times' (CSM)

By Jane Lampman

The Christian Science Monitor, June 1, 2006

The battle over same-sex marriage is shaping into something more than deep societal tradition vs. civil rights. It is becoming a conflict of equality vs. religious liberty.

As gays make gains, some religious institutions are coming under pressure. For instance:

• A Christian high school in Wildomar, Calif., is being sued for expelling two students on suspicion of being lesbian. The parents' suit claims that the school is a business under state civil rights law, which prohibits discrimination based on sexual orientation.

• Catholic Charities in Boston, where same-sex marriage is legal, recently shuttered its adoption agency rather than serve gay and lesbian couples in conflict with church teaching. The church's request for a religious waiver from state antidiscrimination rules has made no headway.

• Christian clubs at several universities are fighting to maintain school recognition while restricting their leadership to those who conform to their beliefs on homosexuality.

Meanwhile, the Christian Legal Society and similar groups are mounting a national effort to challenge antidiscrimination policies in court, claiming they end up discriminating against conservative Christians.

"The fight over same-sex marriage - and two very different conceptions of the ordering of society - will be a knock-down, drag-out battle," predicts Marc Stern, a religious liberty attorney at the American Jewish Congress.

Both sides are pursuing their agendas in state legislatures, courts, and public schools. Both sides tend to view the struggle as a zero-sum, society-defining conflict. For supporters of gay marriage, it represents the last stage in America's long road to equality, from racial to gender to sexual equality. For opponents, traditional marriage stands as the God-ordained bedrock of society, essential to the well-being of children and the healthy functioning of the community.

While no one expects the courts to force unwilling clergy to perform weddings for same-sex couples, some see a possibility that religious groups (other than houses of worship) could lose their tax-exempt status for not conforming to public policy, as did fundamentalist Bob Jones University, over racial issues in 1983.

Legal experts of various views met last December, hosted by the Becket Fund, a nonpartisan institute promoting religious free expression, to consider the implications of same-sex marriage for religious liberty. Writing about the conference in The Weekly Standard, Maggie Gallagher quoted participants as seeing the coming litigation as "a train wreck," "a collision course," and "the battle of our times."

DOJ_NMG_0030773

To ameliorate such conflict, some insist that, given the nation's commitment to both equal rights and religious liberty, accommodations must be found.

"This set of issues tests us in new ways, and I don't think either side is going to win the day," says Charles Haynes, of the First Amendment Center in Washington, in an interview. "For the foreseeable future, we are going to be living with two important claims, and we have to find ways to protect the rights of people on all sides."

Douglas Laycock, of the University of Texas Law School, suggests a modification to the current joint administration of marriage by the state and religious groups.

"We can never resolve the debate over same-sex marriage until we separate legal marriage from religious marriage," he says in a conference paper. "The state should administer legal marriage, and its rules ... should be made through the political process. Religious organizations should administer religious marriages," making their own rules. The legal relationship "could be called 'civil union' for gays and straights alike."

Ms. Gallagher, head of the Institute for Marriage and Public Policy, worries about any delegalizing of marriage. "That would be a good solution if there weren't a great public purpose to marriage that needs legal support to sustain.... If you chop it into pieces, that's a powerful statement by the law that there's no important purpose to marriage as a public institution."

The most immediate skirmish in the battle takes place next week, when the US Senate will debate and possibly vote on a federal constitutional amendment defining marriage as only between a man and a woman. While the amendment may not gain the needed two-thirds majority, the debate positions the issue as a hot-button topic for the coming political campaign.

Religious leaders on both sides of the Marriage Protection Amendment have formed coalitions, demonstrating that religious perceptions vary considerably.

Some 50 leaders from Roman Catholic, Mormon, Southern Baptist, Orthodox, Evangelical, and Orthodox Jewish traditions formed the Religious Coalition for Marriage, focused on strengthening its traditional role in society. They see the amendment as essential to protect "marriage from ... activist courts determined to reinterpret this fundamental institution ... against the will of the American people," says Richard Land, a leader of the Southern Baptist Convention.

(A recent Gallup poll found 58 percent of Americans opposing same-sex marriage and 39 percent favoring it. The country is split on a constitutional amendment: 50 percent in favor, 47 percent opposed.)

On the other side, Clergy for Fairness - including leaders from mainline Protestant and Reform Jewish denominations - says that people of faith disagree on same-sex marriage and that religious denominations, not the federal government, should decide whether they'll sanctify marriages. The group also says it opposes the amendment because it would mark the first time the Constitution would be used "to restrict the rights of an entire group of Americans."

Chai Feldblum, a Georgetown University law professor active on gay rights issues, argues that the government should view both heterosexuality and homosexuality as morally neutral - "though how you 'deploy' your sexual activity can be very morally laden," she says.

"It's an incredible stain on the government that it is denying governmental structures for loving relationships and families," she adds. Yet she acknowledges the genuine difficulty that same-sex marriage presents for some religious people.

"I'd like gay people to understand that when religious people have to do something against their belief," Professor Feldblum says, "that impinges on their deep sense of self, just as I would like religious people to understand that when gay people are told they ... can't marry their loved one, that impinges on that person's deep sense of self." She's wary of granting religious waivers on these issues, however.

In Gallagher's view, "We are in a situation where courts are declaring our great historic, cross-cultural understanding of marriage to be a form of bigotry. That's a very destructive message," when research shows that children do much better in households with a mother and a father.

Others worry about the harm litigation battles could do. "People on both sides see this as good vs. evil," says the First Amendment Center's Dr. Haynes, "and those positions are going to tear us apart, deeply hurt the nation and our commitment to civil rights and religious freedom."

Haynes has just worked with groups on both sides to develop sexual-orientation guidelines for public schools.

DOJ_NMG_0030774

"I've been involved in brokering nine different guidelines on issues like the Bible and religious holidays, and this has been the hardest," Haynes says. After eight months, Christian educators and a gay group involved in school issues did agree on a process for local districts to use that each side thought was fair. Whether local districts pick up on the guidelines remains to be seen.

Clamor over textbooks, for example, has erupted in Massachusetts and in Canada, where kindergartners are being introduced to stories about families with same-sex parents. Although schools must reflect the legal status of such relationships in the curriculum, some parents are demanding notice and protections.

"Some will ask why those parents should be given consideration," Haynes says. "The answer is that this is America, and we try to do the best we can to protect the religious liberty of even the smallest minority.... This takes more work than simply saying 'winner takes all.' "

Yet who is going to broker common ground is the question as advocates on both sides seek complete victory. Legal experts expect a patchwork of legislation and court decisions to emerge.

"Then we will have to worry about how to deal with the fact we have different rules in different states," Mr. Stern says. "If two or three big states move to same-sex marriage, however, it's not going to work to have different definitions across the US."

Highest Court In New York Confronts Gay Marriage (NYT)

By Anemona Hartocollis

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

ALBANY, May 31 — As the issue of gay marriage finally reached New York State's highest court on Wednesday, the six judges who heard the passionate arguments from both sides put forth a fundamental question: Has marriage been defined by history, culture and tradition since the dawn of Western civilization, or is it an evolving social institution that should change with the times?

During the two and a half hours of oral argument, the judges on the Court of Appeals grappled with essential questions of social values, asking tough questions without tipping their hands as to their ultimate decision.

They wanted to know whether there were studies showing that children raised by mothers and fathers turned out better than those raised by same-sex couples, and they wanted to know whether opening the door to gay marriage would also open the door to bigamy or polygamy.

They wanted to know whether asking the courts to rewrite New York State's marriage laws was a way of letting the State Legislature escape responsibility for taking a position on a social controversy.

The case before the court was a challenge to New York State's marriage laws, filed by 44 same-sex couples. Their lawyers argued that marriage was a fundamental right, and compared laws assuming marriage to be a union of a man and a woman to the laws prohibiting interracial marriage, which the Supreme Court struck down in 1967.

Lawyers defending the marriage laws argued that even if the institution had evolved, it was the job of the Legislature — not the courts — to change them.

The plaintiffs' lawyers argued that the court merely had to change the gender-based language of the current law, which refers to "husband" and "wife," to something neutral, like "spouse." If the court agreed to legalize same-sex marriages, New York would become only the second state, after Massachusetts, to do so.

The judges' questions pointed to the precedent-setting nature of the debate. "Isn't this the only one where you have literally the whole history of Western civilization against you?" asked Judge Robert S. Smith of the state's domestic relations law. "That does go back right to the dawn of civilization."

After first citing traditional views of marriage, Judge Smith then asked whether the time was ripe for the courts to approve same-sex marriage. Judge Smith also wondered whether the issue of same-sex marriage deserved special attention because of the history of discrimination against gay people.

"Aren't homosexuals about the classic example of people who have been abused and discriminated against," and who therefore need the protection of the courts? he asked.

DOJ_NMG_0030775

Peter H. Schiff, senior counsel to the state attorney general, said there was no urgent need to change the law, and pointed out that same-sex couples accounted for only 1.3 percent of all households in New York State, a "very small" number.

"I don't think anybody 100 years ago was thinking about this issue," Mr. Schiff said. "It wasn't on the radar screen."

The main lawsuit in this case was filed by a gay and lesbian rights group, Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund, on behalf of five same-sex New York City couples against the city clerk, Victor L. Robles, who issues marriage licenses.

In New York, the legal dispute over same-sex marriage goes back two years. In February 2005, a State Supreme Court judge in Manhattan found that state marriage law violated the State Constitution. That decision was overturned last December by the Appellate Division of State Supreme Court, which said it was up to the Legislature to change the law.

In yesterday's hearing, the New York City plaintiffs were joined by three other groups of plaintiffs from across the state. New York City's lawyer, Leonard Koerner, said yesterday that even in its own case law, the Court of Appeals had affirmed the reason for marriage as "the begetting of offspring," not, as the plaintiffs argued, as the sanctioning of a loving and committed union between two people.

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg has said that New York City is appealing the case to clarify the issue, and that he supports legislative change.

Roberta A. Kaplan, arguing for same-sex marriage on behalf of 12 of the couples across the state, said there were 46,000 families with children headed by same-sex couples in New York State, and that they could not wait until their children were grown for the law to change.

The seventh judge on the Court of Appeals, Albert M. Rosenblatt, removed himself from the case. His daughter, a lawyer, has argued on behalf of advocates for same-sex marriage in California. Judge Rosenblatt has been perceived as a swing vote in many cases. A spokesman for the court said that in the event of a 3-3 tie, another judge could be brought in. He said a tie had occurred only once in the last 20 years or so.

Judge Victoria A. Graffeo asked whether, under the plaintiffs' argument, the Legislature should afford more rights and benefits to other types of family arrangements, such as two sisters raising children. "Was the Legislature denying them due process or equal protection?" she asked.

Judge George Bundy Smith asked what the consequences of legalizing gay marriage had been in Massachusetts.

"Basically nothing," Ms. Kaplan replied. "There is not a breakdown of civil society in Massachusetts and there certainly isn't a breakdown of marriage."

Judge Bundy Smith also asked why gay couples were not satisfied with civil unions — a remedy that the plaintiffs argued would make them second-class citizens.

Chief Judge Judith S. Kaye said the court would have to decide the constitutional questions, "whether we do it frontally or whether we do it in some more subversive way," like changing language about gender.

To which Terence Kindlon, a lawyer for same-sex couples in Albany, replied, "Subversive is one of the words I've liked all my life, your honor."

Protect Traditional Marriage (USAT)

By Sen. Wayne Allard

USA Today, June 1, 2006

Respect for the democratic process compels this Congress to protect traditional marriage in the face of a coordinated effort to redefine marriage through the courts.

Marriage, the union between a man and a woman, has been the foundation of every civilization in human history. It is incorporated into the fabric of our culture and civic life. It is the platform on which children, families and communities are nurtured.

OUR VIEW: Just say 'I don't'

Unfortunately, the U.S. Constitution is being amended to reflect a new definition of marriage — not by democratically elected members of Congress, but by unaccountable and unelected judges.

DOJ_NMG_0030776

As a result, I introduced an amendment to the Constitution that simply defines marriage as the "union of a man and a woman," while leaving to state legislatures the freedom to address the question of civil unions and domestic partnerships. The amendment would not overturn current state and local laws dealing with these arrangements.

Democracy and representative government are at the core of this debate. In 2004 and 2005, voters in 14 states overwhelmingly passed constitutional amendments protecting marriage. Today, 19 states have constitutional amendments protecting marriage, and 26 have statutes designed to protect traditional marriage. The will of the people is clear on this issue.

Unfortunately, dissatisfied with the outcome of these votes, activists have intensified their campaign to circumvent the democratic process and redefine marriage through the courts. Currently, nine states face lawsuits challenging traditional marriage laws. Among these lawsuits are challenges to state constitutional amendments passed by an overwhelming majority of voters.

Recent decisions by activist judges not only fail to respect the traditional definition of marriage, they also highlight a lack of respect for the democratic process. The courts are driving a redefinition of marriage contrary to democratic principles.

The process to amend the U.S. Constitution is one the American people can trust.

My amendment reflects a belief that the institution of marriage is too precious to surrender to the whims of a handful of unelected, activist judges. The American people should have a say in the matter. If we in Congress fail to define marriage, the courts ultimately will not hesitate to define it for us.

Sen. Wayne Allard, R-Colo., is the author of the Marriage Protection Amendment.

Just Say 'I Don't' (USAT)

USA Today, June 1, 2006

Apparently, issues such as immigration, corruption, gas prices, the budget deficit, the war in Iraq and the prospect of Iran acquiring nuclear weapons aren't substantial enough to occupy members of Congress.

When senators return from their Memorial Day recess next week, their thoughts will turn to June weddings. They plan to spend their time on a bitter, divisive and unnecessary debate over a proposed constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage.

Even supporters of the Marriage Protection Amendment readily concede that the measure to ban same-sex marriage nationwide has virtually no chance of becoming part of the Constitution. (It would need approval from two-thirds of both chambers of Congress, plus ratification by three-fourths of the states.)

So why bother?

Well, Election Day is a few months off. Supporters hope the controversy will energize their base of social and religious conservatives opposed to same-sex marriage.

Their plan could well backfire. Polls show that Americans are evenly divided about the amendment. Religious activist groups are annoyed that President Bush, who supports the amendment, isn't lobbying hard enough for it.

At the same time, the 31 Republican sponsors risk alienating moderate and independent voters who are turned off by the pandering for a futile effort that will further divide the nation.

The gay-marriage issue exploded when Massachusetts' highest court ruled in November 2003 that same-sex couples have a right to marry. Since then, more than 7,300 gay couples there have done so. The commonwealth has survived.

But the public backlash elsewhere has been strong. Nineteen states have amended their constitutions to ban gay marriage. Most other states prohibit it as well.

The state activity makes the proposed constitutional amendment all the more unnecessary. It would take away the traditional authority of states to regulate marriage and impose a one-size-fits-all edict on a nation still grappling with the issue.

Most partisan drives to write social policy into our enduring Constitution have, fortunately, failed. The prohibition of alcohol was such a disaster that it was repealed 14 years later. The Framers purposely made it difficult to amend the Constitution so that intense passions of the day wouldn't lead to laws that might last forever.

Supporters of the amendment trumpet the need to protect the "sanctity" of marriage. But preserving the authority of states to decide how to handle same-sex unions — whether through marriage or some domestic partnership or civil union law that protects the basic financial, health and legal rights that heterosexual couples take for granted — doesn't affect anyone else's marriage. And the 1996 federal Defense of Marriage Act already says states may refuse to recognize same-sex marriages performed in other states.

The proposed amendment would squelch the important debate going on at the state level and poison political dialogue. It should be jilted and left at the altar.

On The Low Road To November (NYT)

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Republicans are trying to rally their far-right base for the fall elections with a mean-spirited sideshow threatening to the Constitution: a ban on same-sex marriage.

The Senate Judiciary Committee has endorsed the amendment, which would write bigotry into the nation's charter, by a 10-to-8 vote along party lines, and the full Senate is expected to take it up soon. Since the measure's language covers not only marriage but the "legal incidents" of marriage, its approval could jeopardize civil unions, domestic partnerships and other legal protections that many state and local governments now provide for same-sex couples and their children.

No one, including the G.O.P. strategists urging its fast-tracking, expects the amendment to get the two-thirds Congressional approval needed to send it to the states for consideration. Two years ago, when Republicans staged a Senate vote on the same dismal amendment just before the Democratic convention, it ran into unexpectedly broad opposition. Some conservatives correctly opposed grabbing power from the states by suddenly federalizing marriage law. Supporters of the amendment could muster only 48 votes, well shy of the 60 required to cut off debate and avoid a filibuster.

Plainly, the real purpose of this rerun is to provide red meat to social conservatives, and fodder for commericals aimed at senators who vote to block the atrocious amendment.

It is sad that Senator Arlen Specter, the Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee, who personally opposes the measure, chose to lend his gavel and vote to speed it to the floor. He got angry when Senator Russell Feingold, the Wisconsin Democrat, objected in forceful terms to both the amendment and the politically motivated scheduling. Mr. Specter and the other members of his committee who approved the amendment have no reason to be angry — just ashamed.

Black And Hispanic Home Buyers Pay Higher Interest On Mortgages, Study Finds (NYT)

By Erik Eckholm

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Black and Hispanic home buyers entering the fast-growing market for subprime mortgages tend to pay higher interest rates than whites with similar credit ratings, a statistical study by an advocacy group says.

The subprime industry makes loans at higher interest rates to people who cannot qualify for regular mortgages.

"When we compared borrowers with the same risk characteristics, African-Americans and Latinos were still more likely to get the higher-rate loans," said Debbie Gruenstein Bocian, a researcher at the group, the Center for Responsible Lending.

A spokesman for the mortgage banking industry challenged the conclusion, saying the report did not take into account all the legitimate questions about family wealth and debt, house appraisal and other factors that underwriters must consider when making a loan.

Racial disparities in mortgage lending have been studied and debated for decades, with the focus shifting in recent years from the practice of denying mortgages in certain minority neighborhoods, or redlining, and a lack of loans for minorities to the pitfalls of the subprime industry.

As many as one in five home loans are now subprime, totaling more than $500 billion a year, said Keith S. Ernst, an author of the report who is an analyst at the lending center, in Washington.

Borrowers typically pay two percentage points higher than they would for conventional loans. Some, judged the riskiest cases, are charged higher rates, forcing them to pay hundreds of dollars extra a month.

The study, using federal and industry figures from 2004 to analyze a sample of 50,000 loans, found that among subprime borrowers with similar credit ratings, blacks and Hispanics were 30 percent more likely than whites to be charged the highest interest.

DOJ_NMG_0030778

In response to earlier studies of racial disparities, the mortgage industry has argued that the varied financial backgrounds of borrowers and a tendency for minority buyers to offer lower down payments were mainly responsible.

The authors of the new report said they had, for the first time, taken credit scores and down payments into account, leaving an unexplained racial difference.

Doug Douglas, chief economist of the Mortgage Bankers Association of America, said in a telephone interview that although "the issue of disparities is very important," the new study still failed to capture the complexity of mortgage underwriting, especially in the subprime market, where borrowers do not have top credit ratings under traditional criteria.

The findings were endorsed by representatives of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the National Council for La Raza. The authors said high-cost lenders appeared to focus on minority neighborhoods. They expressed concern about incentives that lending agencies give to mortgage brokers, saying the incentives reward brokers for steering customers to the most expensive loans.

Joe Falk, a board member of the National Association of Mortgage Brokers, said brokers fully disclosed all fees and were unfairly castigated for offering consumers alternatives that fit their needs and preferences.

"We've expanded home ownership by going into neighborhoods not served by others," Mr. Falk said by telephone from Miami.

An Ex-liberal Navigates Right (USAT)

By Mary Beth Marklein

USA Today, June 1, 2006

UNIVERSITY PARK, Pa. — David Horowitz pays no heed to the hecklers. He responds politely to challenges during the question-and-answer period. Only when his talk devolves into a sort of free-for-all does he lose his temper.

“This is a demonstration of what brainwashing will do,” he bellows into the crowd of about 300, most of them students, gathered on a recent spring evening in a cavernous hall at Pennsylvania State University. “You have sat through (the entire) talk and can't even engage the argument.”

Horowitz later says he felt bad about yelling at students. He usually reserves his vitriol for faculty and administrators. But to some, it was quintessential Horowitz.

“Sometimes he gets a little over the top,” says just-graduated Vicky Cangelosi, 20, who sat up front in a section reserved for Penn State's College Republicans, the group that sponsored Horowitz's appearance. “I think that indicates that he's very passionate.”

Other critics of higher education may argue that today's college campuses are being overrun by leftist professors bent on indoctrinating their students. But nobody is quite as in-your-face about it as Horowitz, 67, a '60s-radical-turned-conservative-activist who has spent the past few years crisscrossing the country to warn students: “You can't get a good education if they're only telling you half the story.”

To Horowitz, an overwhelming majority of hard-line liberal professors on campuses have left conservative students complaining that their views aren't welcome. His job, he says, is to see that those students aren't treated as second-class citizens.

He is not a professor; he is a writer, co-founder of the Los Angeles-based Center for the Study of Popular Culture and founder of the 2½-year-old Washington-based Students for Academic Freedom, a national organization that allows conservative students to vent.

All Horowitz wants, he says, is a return to the kind of liberal arts education he got at Columbia University in the 1950s, when he still embraced communism, where professors “taught me what the intellectual life should be like, where you focus on the ideas. It's not a political food fight like so much of our culture has become.”

Trouble is, his critics, including a recently created coalition of student, faculty and civil liberties groups, say he doesn't know what he's talking about. In May, the coalition called Free Exchange on Campus released a report aimed at discrediting claims made in Horowitz's new book, The Professors: The 101 Most Dangerous Academics in America (Regnery).

DOJ_NMG_0030779

The book profiles faculty who Horowitz says represent the kind of disorder going on in college classrooms today. But professor by professor, the report cites errors, fab- rications and misleading statements, and concludes that Horowitz's research is "manipulated to fit his arguments."

Two examples at Penn State:

•Sociology senior lecturer Sam Richards reinforces class lessons "with 'out-of-class' assignments that include the viewing of left-wing propaganda films, such as The Oil Factor, from which students learn that the 'war in Afghanistan has turned into a bloody quagmire,' … and Occupation 101, about the horrors of Israel's 'occupation' of Palestinian territories,' " Horowitz writes. In the report, Richards responds: Horowitz "disingenuously fails to note that students also receive credit for attending 'conser va- tive' events, including a talk by none other than David Horowitz!"

•Literature professor Michael Berube acknowledges "his classes often have little to do with literature," and he believes "religious people were to be regarded as simply irrational," Horowitz says. In addition to noting that Horowitz "knows nothin g about my classroom demeanor or my record as a faculty member," Berube says: "If he were a college student and tried to get away with this garbage, he would indeed be flunked — not for his conservatism, but for his mendacity."

His critics have said the book is akin to a McCarthy-like smear campaign. But Horowitz calls it "a difference of interpretation of what my book is about.

"Long ago, when I came out of the left, I said, 'I need to talk to the left the way the left talks to other people,' " he says during an interview on campus tucked between a book-signing and radio show. "So I have been a very aggressive conservative, and I pull no punches."

Horowitz is having an effect. He has had success in Congress pushing his Academic Bill of Rights, a statement of principles that he says reflects his goal to both remove political agendas from campus life and ensure that no students are discriminated against because of political or ideological leanings.

It basically says professors should stick to their area of scholarly expertise in the classroom and welcome a diversity of approaches "to unsettled questions," and students should be graded on academic merit, not on the basis of their political or religious beliefs. The bill borrows heavily from standards followed by the American Association of University Professo rs, an organization that Horowitz sees as part of the problem. Horowitz says his goal is to force universities, through legislation or voluntarily, to extend the same rights to students that faculty have.

Some of Horowitz's language is included in a House-passed bill to renew the federal Higher Education Act. And a similar proposal is pending in the Senate, which makes it likely some form of the provision will be included in any bill sent to Pres ident Bush.

Meanwhile, the concept also has captured the attention of lawmakers in about 20 states (depends who's counting), including Pennsylvania, where a House committee today wraps up a series of hearings on the topic.

Horowitz insists that what he's asking for is fairly tame. But in Pennsylvania, faculty, who traditionally have been free from government interference, fear a slippery slope. Once a bill becomes a law, "you have no idea where it's going to go," Berube says during a walk across campus. And adopting such a code raises new problems, he and others sugge st. If a biology professor discusses global warming, for example, is that science or political science? Who would decide?

State lawmakers have been slow to jump aboard. But even in those states where legislation has failed or stalled, the question hasn't gone away.

Public university systems in Colorado, Ohio and Tennessee, for example, have said they'll adopt some form of protection for students in lieu of legislation, and Horowitz says that's good enough for him.

At Penn State, situated in the geographic and conservative center of the state, university officials insist Horowitz is attacking a problem that doesn't exist.

"The kinds of broad strokes he's using don't characterize Penn State, and I don't think most of higher education," says spokesman Bill Mahon. In the past five years, he says, Penn State has received just 13 complaints regarding classroom bias. (Many are not from conservatives.)

Among students who see no problem is engineering major Kyle Metzgar, 19. He says he is no liberal and has "not had a real stalwart conservative professor." But "I have also never felt discriminated against or that I was in an atmosphere that was not conducive to getting the most out of my education. … My biology teacher made fun of the fact that President Bush says 'nu-cu-lar' instead of 'nu-cle-ar.' Who cares?"

College Republicans, though, say many conservative students won't complain for fear of repercussions. That's where Horowitz comes in.

"He's the voice of a movement that needs to be heard," says political science and business major Seth Bender, 20, who escorted Horowitz during his visit here. "I have to sit through lectures every single week listening to someone bash different ideologies and that sort of thing, and (being) called an idiot for what I believed."

Other incidents last semester suggest he has plenty of company. In February, then-sophomore Alfred "A.J." Fleuhr sued the university, saying he feared he would be punished if he expressed his conservative beliefs because the university might view them as intolerant under campus policies. On May 19, the university updated those policies to the satisfaction of Fleuhr's attorneys at the Alliance Defense Fund, a conservative Christian legal advocacy non-profit in Arizona. And the day before Horowitz arrived on campus, administrators in a statement urged the College Republicans to rethink their approach to an event they planned about illegal immigration, saying many would find it offensive. (At one point, they were going to call it "Catch an Illegal Immigrant Day.")

"So my case is made before I even get here," Horowitz told his audience.

Horowitz says he became involved in the issue after hearing similar stories from students on campuses nationwide. But even before Free Exchange on Campus came along, his foes have delighted in debunking his claims.

In one example, Horowitz claimed a Penn State biology professor had shown the Michael Moore movie Fahrenheit 9/11 before the 2004 presidential elections. When Pennsylvania House committee co-chair Lawrence Curry pressed him during hearings at Temple University in Philadelphia in January, Horowitz acknowledged that his staff could not confirm it had happened, and that he no longer uses that example.

Months later, he's still furious about it. "These underhanded, devious, malicious, dishonest tactics," he says. "I gave 45 minutes of testimony, a half-hour of questions, and I never once mentioned the incident they're referring to. … Curry saved it to the very end of the hearings and rammed it to me."

Horowitz similarly has been accused of making up a story about a University of Northern Colorado student who was asked to write an essay on her criminology exam explaining "why President Bush is a war criminal." When the student wrote instead about why Saddam Hussein is a war criminal, Horowitz says, she got a failing grade. Horowitz insists the incident happened: "I located the student and the exam," he says, but "it's a complicated story. … The student was terrified."

Even so, Horowitz acknowledges his small staff can't confirm every incident it receives, and his fact-checkers can be "very loose with the truth." But he mostly dismisses the criticisms as inconsequential.

"I will stake my life that there are professors all over this country in classrooms who are … venting their prejudices in classes where it has no place."

Group Aims To Unveil Ten Commandments (WP)

By Michelle Boorstein

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

A D.C.-based evangelical Christian group has a new idea for promoting the Ten Commandments: putting a monument to the stone tablets across the street from the U.S. Supreme Court.

Faith and Action says on its Web site that it plans to unveil the waist-high, 850-pound granite sculpture Saturday on the front lawn of the rowhouse on Second Street NE where the national group's offices are. But the group apparently doesn't have the approval it needs from at least two agencies, city officials and neighborhood activists said.

Faith and Action's president, the Rev. Robert Schenck, declined to return phone calls yesterday, as did his spokesman. On its Web site, the group said it tried unsuccessfully for five years to get the proper permits and decided to go ahead with the unveiling based on "common law that governs garden displays."

The sculpture "will be visible to the nine justices as they arrive and leave each day," the site said in explaining why the group undertook the project.

DOJ_NMG_0030781

The house sits directly across a narrow street from the Supreme Court, and the Web site encourages people coming to Saturday's event to use the free parking in the court's employee parking lot. Yesterday, the sculpture was wrapped in dark plastic and red tape, its two-tablet shape clearly visible.

Schenck, a well-known evangelical activist, also heads the National Clergy Council and last year said he blessed every piece of furniture in the Senate hearing rooms where the Judiciary Committee considered the nomination of now-Chief Justice John Roberts.

Promoting the public display of the Ten Commandments is a central part of Faith and Action's mission. It presents stone tablets of the commandments to elected and appointed officials and asks them to "display and obey" the gift.

"At the heart of the Ten Commandments Project is an effort to restore the moral foundations of American culture," the group says in a brochure at its offices, where two reproductions of the commandments are on display on the first floor.

It wasn't clear yesterday how long Faith and Action has been at the Second Street location, although District property records show that a group called P&R Schenck Associates in Evangelism purchased the rowhouse in March.

Erik Linden, a spokesman for the city's Department of Transportation, said he believes the group needs a public space permit from the department before displaying the monument. And Linden and Bill Sisolak, a local advisory neighborhood commissioner and chairman of the commission's zoning committee, said Faith and Action also would need the approval of the Historic Preservation Review Board because its house sits in a historic district.

"We are notifying [Schenck] that he needs a permit to occupy what is deemed a public space, and we will work with him to ensure that he understands what he needs to complete the process," Linden said. He did not offer details about what a property owner in that area would need for a permit to be approved.

Linden said Faith and Action applied to the city in 2001 for a permit. However, he could not confirm last night which agency received the application or why it wasn't granted. He said no applications had been filed since that initial one.

The group said on its Web site that it tried to get permits from various agencies, including the city's Department of Consumer and Regulatory Affairs. However, the DCRA does not govern public space displays and would not have been the right agency to apply to, said Karyn-Siobhan Robinson, a DCRA spokeswoman. She could not immediately confirm whether the group had applied to the agency.

Sisolak said yesterday that he had not heard about the monument proposal until contacted by the news media. Local Advisory Neighborhood Commission secretary Karen Wirt said she had not either but also said she hadn't had a chance to review all her records back to 2001.

The religious nature of the display should not be the main factor in the decision about the permits, Sisolak said.

"It's a large object not in keeping with the historic nature of the neighborhood," Sisolak said. "This guy may be within his rights. I don't know. But in my opinion it doesn't appear to be in compliance."

Antitrust Officials Said To Be Watching Napster Suit (LAT)

By Joseph Menn, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

The U.S. is examining claims of collusion by labels to limit legitimate downloads, sources say.

Maybe Napster had it right.

Federal antitrust investigators are reexamining the online music pioneer's long-standing claims that the major record labels improperly conspired to keep authorized downloads off the Internet, said people familiar with the matter.

Justice Department officials are closely tracking a court fight in federal court in San Francisco between the labels and the financial backers of the original Napster, the file-sharing network that debuted in 2001 and became emblematic of online piracy.

Napster filed for bankruptcy protection, and the name was bought and assumed by Roxio Inc. in 2002.

The labels are suing venture capital firm Hummer Winblad Venture Partners and German conglomerate Bertelsmann, which owns label BMG, accusing them of contributing to the piracy by the first Napster users.

DOJ_NMG_0030782

As part of its defense, Hummer Winblad has alleged that the labels violated antitrust laws by colluding to refuse to license their music to Napster for legitimate distribution.

Antitrust investigators have asked both sides to keep them apprised by passing along filings in the case, said music industry sources who asked not to be identified because of the sensitive nature of the government's inquiries.

It is unclear whether the review has led to a full reopening of an inquiry that ended in 2003, when the department announced it hadn't found evidence that the major labels manipulated the digital music market.

Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona declined to comment, but investigators there were previously reported to be examining how present-day prices are set on Apple Computer Inc.'s iTunes Music Store and other authorized services.

The San Francisco suit by Universal Music Group and EMI Group accuses Hummer Winblad and Bertelsmann of having controlled Napster and therefore sharing liability for the massive copyright infringement previously committed by Napster's tens of millions of users.

Hummer Winblad's lawyers countered that the labels broke antitrust and copyright laws by refusing to license music to Napster on reasonable terms while sending heavily restricted tracks to two industry-sponsored joint ventures, MusicNet and Pressplay. Those two services had been investigated by the Justice Department from 2001 to 2003.

The Hummer Winblad lawyers turned up discrepancies between what the labels had told the Justice Department about their practices then and what they told others. And the documents that the labels submitted to the Justice Department had some serious omissions, including a full discussion of clauses that guaranteed some labels the same licensing terms that their rivals received.

Those clauses, known as "most-favored-nation" provisions, suggested collusion, said the judge in the Napster case, Marilyn Hall Patel.

The documents were so suspicious that Patel said last month that they were "deliberately misleading." She ordered additional material turned over under what is known as the "crime-fraud exception" to the privilege that protects communications between lawyers and their clients from disclosure.

Universal and EMI appealed that ruling and this month won a stay until their arguments could be heard by a higher court.

Even before Patel's ruling, the Justice Department was intrigued. Once it got the Hummer Winblad team's legal brief, it asked the Universal and EMI attorneys to send along whatever they filed in their defense, a music industry source said.

New York Atty. Gen. Eliot Spitzer also is investigating the most-favored-nation clauses and has issued subpoenas to the major record labels.

Most of the labels declined to comment on the renewed Justice Department interest.

But Jeanne Meyer, EMI North America's senior vice president, said the company believed that Patel had "misconstrued" the relevant documents.

"EMI was forthright with the Department of Justice in its 2001-03 investigation and cooperated with that inquiry, and we are confident that Judge Patel's ruling will be reversed," Meyer said.

Napster Suit Sparks Controversy (UPI/UPI)

United Press International, June 1, 2006

LOS ANGELES, May 31 (UPI) -- A federal court case in San Francisco over internet music piracy has gained the attention of federal antitrust officials.

Major record labels are suing the original Napster's financial backers for supporting the piracy-linked network.

One of the defendants, Hummer Winbald, has responded by accusing the labels of not allowing license of their music to Napster while providing such to other ventures.

Winbald's lawyers provided evidence of the labels' collusion which prompted the case's judge and the Justice Department to request additional materials from the labels and their attorneys.

The Los Angeles Times reports previous documents given to the Justice Department from the labels had major omissions, specifically regarding licensure.

In 2003, a federal inquiry into possible antitrust allegations against major music labels was dismissed due to lack of evidence.

Many of the major labels declined to comment on these newest allegations.

Google Unlikely To Make Own Web Browser (AP)

By Michael Liedtke, AP Business Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) - Google Inc. CEO Eric Schmidt on Wednesday told industry analysts the online search engine leader is unlikely to create its own Web browser, even though the company remains worried about being slighted by the next version of Microsoft Corp.'s Internet Explorer.

Responding to a question during a conference call, Schmidt said Google sees little need to develop its own browser because most people seem satisfied with Explorer and rivals such as Firefox, Apple Computer Inc.'s Safari and Opera.

Mountain View, Calif.-based Google already has a search toolbar installed in Firefox as part of its partnership with the Mozilla open source software project that introduced the browser in 2004.

"We would not build a browser just for the fun of building a browser," Schmidt said.

Later in the call, Schmidt reiterated Google's concerns about Microsoft programming the next version of its Internet Explorer to steer more traffic to its own Internet search engine.

Google informally complained to the U.S. Justice Department about Microsoft's plans, but regulators decided they didn't need to intervene. Schmidt said Google still hopes Microsoft will make it easier for Explorer users to set up other search engines in the browser.

The next version of Explorer will be included in Microsoft's Vista, a long-awaited upgrade of the Windows operating system due out next year.

"We want to make sure the use of the power of Windows is done in a correct and legally appropriate way," Schmidt said.

Google reigns as the dominant Internet search engine with a 43 percent share of the U.S. market through April, well ahead of Yahoo Inc. at 28 percent and Microsoft's MSN at 13 percent, according to comScore Media Metrix.

Schmidt's comments occurred during a question-and-answer session that Google organized in an effort to improve its communication with Wall Street. Analysts and investors have complained about Google's cryptic ways since the company's initial public offering in August 2004 and now management is trying to change that perception without backing down from its policy against sharing its financial projections.

The presentation didn't seem to make much of an impression. Google's shares were up slightly when the conference call began, but then backtracked to close with a 12 cent decrease at $371.82 on the Nasdaq Stock Market. The stock lost another 82 cents in late-session trade.

Google covered familiar territory Wednesday, telling analysts to expect major investments heavily in new computer equipment and offices to accommodate the company's growing audience and work force.

The company spent $345 million on capital expenditures during the first quarter, including $112 million on information technology assets and $41 million on land and buildings.

Chief Financial Officer George Reyes said Google's hiring spree will continue at its recent pace, which has been increasing the company's work force by 14 percent to 20 percent every three months. In the past year, Google nearly doubled its payroll to just under 6,800 employees through March.

Akron Paper, 5 Others Await Word On Auction By McClatchy (AP)

By Thomas J. Sheeran

AP, June 1, 2006

CLEVELAND - Six former Knight Ridder Inc. newspapers awaited word Wednesday on possible suitors as the deadline passed for bidding on the mid- and small-sized papers.

There was no immediate word on how many bids were submitted, when new owner McClatchy Co. might decide on possible buyers or whether the papers would be sold as a group or one by one.

DOJ_NMG_0030784

McClatchy, based in Sacramento, Calif., bought Knight's Ridder 32 newspapers in March and decided to sell 12 largely because they were in slower-growing markets.

With buyers found for six larger newspapers - including The Philadelphia Inquirer - McClatchy turned its attention to the six smallest. Among those, most attention has focused on the Akron Beacon Journal, the largest of the six remaining papers and once the flagship of Knight Ridder.

Advance Publications in New York, parent company of the Beacon Journal's biggest competitor and Ohio's largest newspaper, The (Cleveland) Plain Dealer, was believed to be among the possible bidders for the Akron newspaper. The papers are 40 miles apart and compete in some of the faster growing Cleveland and Akron suburbs, including Medina County and northern Summit County.

Copley Newspapers, the parent of Akron competitor The (Canton) Repository, also reportedly was interested in the Beacon Journal, but Hal Fuson, chief legal officer for San Diego-based Copley, said Wednesday that the chain did not make a bid.

Merging nearby papers might offer advantages through joint advertising sales and combined business side, printing and reporting work. Savings through merged operations would make sense for Advance, according to Larry Grimes, president of the W.B. Grimes newspaper brokerage in Gaithersburg, Md. He said he has heard of strong interest in all six papers but had no direct knowledge.

The remaining five papers to be sold were the American News in Aberdeen, S.D.; the Duluth News Tribune in Minnesota; the Grand Forks Herald in North Dakota; The News-Sentinel in Fort Wayne, Ind.; and the Times Leader in Wilkes-Barre, Pa.

Other possible bidders that have been mentioned include Yucaipa Cos. of Los Angeles, a financial backer for newspaper unions; Black Press Ltd. of Vancouver, British Columbia; and HM Capital Partners of Dallas.

McClatchy and HM Capital had no comment Wednesday. Advance, Black and Yucaipa didn't immediately return messages seeking comment.

McClatchy previously agreed to sell The Philadelphia Inquirer and the Philadelphia Daily News to a Philadelphia investment group and to sell four other newspapers to MediaNews Group Inc., a privately held company based in Denver.

The Beacon Journal has won four Pulitzer Prizes, journalism's highest honors. The newspaper has average weekday circulation of about 128,000 daily, down 7.4 percent over the same period last year. The population of Akron, once the nation's tire-making capital, has been stable in recent years, down about 2 percent since 2000 to about 220,000.

An industry report in early May showed daily circulation fell 2.5 percent at U.S. newspapers in the six-month period ending in March. Newspaper circulation has been in general decline for years as many people, particularly young adults, turn to other media outlets including cable TV and the Internet for news and information.

Charles Knight bought the newspaper in 1903 and became publisher four years later.

His son, John S. Knight, became editor and publisher in 1933. He began a series of buys that made the Beacon the flagship of one of the nation's largest newspaper groups, Knight Newspapers. In 1974, the group merged with Ridder Publications to become Knight Ridder Inc.

EU Fines For Four Chemical Groups In Cartel (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, June 1, 2006

The European Union's top antitrust regulator yesterday imposed fines totalling €344.6m ($441.9m) on four chemical groups for operating a cartel in the market for plexiglas and similar acrylic glass products.

French oil group Total's Arkema unit was worst-affected, with a fine of €219.1m. Britain's ICI was ordered to pay €91.4m. Lucite, another UK group, was fined €25m and Quinn Barlo of Ireland €9m. Both Arkema and ICI saw fines increased by 50 per cent because of convictions in other cartel cases.

DOJ_NMG_0030785

Degussa, a German chemical group and another member of the cartel, escaped punishment because it blew the whistle on its co-conspirators. The Commission said Degussa would otherwise have been made to pay €264.5m - the highest single fine of all the members.

Neelie Kroes, EU competition commissioner, said: "Cartels are a scourge. I am shocked that companies like ICI and Arkema have been fined once again. These fines will serve as a cold shower for the management and shareholders of all these companies, who have to realise that cartels cannot and will not be tolerated."

The Commission said it had obtained handwritten notes of a meeting in a Dublin hotel room in October 1999, at which the companies agreed to raise their prices as of January 2000.

"Records of a meeting at a hotel in Germany in August 2000 reveal that the meeting focused on a co-ordinated price increase for November 2000," it added.

Acrylic glass is used for a wide range of products, including headlamps and tail-lights, for optical media such as DVDs and lenses and household products such as baths and showers. The EU market for acrylic glass products is worth about €665m a year, a Commission spokesman said.

Yesterday's total fine was the fourth-highest imposed by the Commission in a cartel case, and comes less than a month after the regulator slapped fines totalling €388m on another chemicals cartel. Again, Degussa had blown the whistle on the illegal arrangement and so escaped a fine of €130m - meaning the company saved itself nearly €400m in cartel fines in the space of four weeks.

EU Punishes Acrylic Glass Cartel With $442 Million in Fines

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- The European Commission on Wednesday imposed fines of about $442 million on four companies for fixing prices over a six-year period on acrylic glass which is widely used in cars, household appliances and DVDs.

European Union regulators said they had uncovered business behavior that was a "very serious infringement" of EU antitrust rules.

Cartels "allow the participants to shield themselves from competition, to charge higher prices and to be protected from the need to innovate," said EU spokesman Jonathan Todd. "Their customers -- both companies and final consumers -- pay the price in terms of higher prices and a narrower choice of products."

French oil company Total SA's chemical unit Arkema was fined 219 million euros ($281 million) -- the fourth largest fine levied by the EU in such a case.

Britain's Imperial Chemical Industries PLC was ordered to pay 91 million euros ($117 million), British chemical company Lucite International was fined 25 million euros ($32 million) and Ireland's Quinn Group Ltd. has to pay 9 million euros ($11.5 million).

The EU said the fines took account of the size of the European market, worth around 665 million euros ($854 million) annually.

A fifth company, Germany's Degussa SA, escaped a 264 million euro ($339 million) fine because it was the first to blow the whistle on the cartel.

The EU said the five companies agreed, fixed and monitored target prices for acrylic glass, and exchanged commercially important and confidential information in Europe between 1997 and 2002.

Acrylic glass -- sold under trade names such as perspex, Plexiglas and Lucite -- is also used in lenses, electronics, baths and showers.

The companies have two months to appeal the fine to an EU court. If the fines are upheld, the money goes into the EU budget, usually funded by EU governments. The Commission said the fines ultimately reduce the burden on individual taxpayers.

Quinn Group bought the offending Barlo business after the cartel ended. ICI said the fine targeted its ICI Acrylics unit which was sold in 1999.

DOJ_NMG_0030786

EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes said she was shocked that ICI and Arkema -- now owned by Total -- had to be fined again. As repeat offenders, both companies saw their fines increased by 50 percent.

"Cartels are a scourge," Kroes said. "These fines will serve as a cold shower for the management and shareholders of all these companies, who have to realize that cartels cannot and will not be tolerated."

Degussa went to EU regulators in December 2002, confessing its role in this cartel and another cartel to fix the price of bleach. The Commission said the rivals met to coordinate price increases in a Dublin hotel room in October 1999 and a German hotel in August 2000.

Both Lucite and Total's group of companies -- Elf Aquitaine, Arkema, Altuglas and Altumax -- had their fines reduced for providing information to regulators.

ICI said it will make a provision for the fine in its second quarter income statement as a special item and will think about filing an appeal.

Todd said two other firms -- BASF AG and Repsol YPF -- had escaped fines even though both received preliminary charge sheets because they had been able to convince regulators that they were not involved to the same extent as the others.

"In the end we could not find them guilty of breaking the competition rules," he said.

Officials Seek More Funds From Exxon Mobil (AP)

By JEANNETTE J. LEE, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

ANCHORAGE, Alaska (AP) - Federal and state authorities will seek more money from Exxon Mobil Corp. on Thursday to rehabilitate wildlife populations and clean up remaining oil from a devastating spill nearly 20 years ago, Alaska officials said.

Exxon has paid $900 million in restitution for the spill - the nation's largest - which emptied 11 million gallons of crude oil into Prince William Sound in 1989.

A "reopener" provision in the settlement created a window from 2002 to 2006 in which the state and federal governments could claim up to an additional $100 million.

That reopener provision expires Sept. 1. State and federal officials must file a claim 90 days before that date, by the end of this week.

The specifics of the claim, including how much will be requested from Exxon, have not been released.

"We are going to make a claim, but all the details are still being worked out between the Department of Law and the Department of Justice," John Manly, spokesman for Gov. Frank Murkowski, said Wednesday.

Exxon Mobil spokesman Mark Boudreaux said Wednesday that the company hadn't been notified that the Justice Department would seek a reopener.

Hundreds of studies by Exxon have shown the environmental impact to be less serious than claimed by other researchers. Boudreaux said Exxon didn't know of any new scientific studies that would merit reopening the settlement.

"We believe Prince William Sound is healthy, it's robust, it's thriving," Boudreaux said.

To claim the money, state and federal officials must prove that a population, habitat or species had suffered loss or decline in the area of the spill, and that loss can be linked to the spill. They also must prove the loss was not known or anticipated when the settlement was signed.

"The claim will include what we believe, based on good science, is attributable to the spill and lay out a plan on how to deal with the existing problems," said Mark Morones, spokesman for the state Department of Law.

A study published in May in the American Chemical Society journal and Environmental Science & Technology found that oil spilled from the Exxon Valdez extends farther into Alaska tidal waters than previously thought and could be causing long-term harm to wildlife.

Alaska Sens. Ted Stevens and Lisa Murkowski sought to cut the process short by asking Irving, Texas-based Exxon Mobil to voluntarily commit $100 million more to restoring the Sound.

DOJ_NMG_0030787

The company, whose $36.1 billion in earnings last year were the highest ever by any U.S. corporation, rejected that proposal.

More than $100 million of the $900 million Exxon has paid has not yet been spent. Officials said they expect that to become an issue in negotiations.

US Judge Says Sea Lion Research Violates Animal Protection Laws (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jeannette J. Lee, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

(AP) - ANCHORAGE, Alaska-A judge ruled the federal government must halt studies of threatened and endangered Steller sea lions because it did not properly asses how certain research techniques might harm the animals.

The National Marine Fisheries Service approved permits for research activities that include hot branding and tissue sampling of thousands of sea lions each year, said the suit filed last year by the Humane Society of the United States.

"We have concerns about the lack of environmental review, the structure of the research and how it's being done," Jonathan Lovvorn, an attorney for the Humane Society, said Tuesday. "Our main goal is and has always been to have them evaluate the research before authorization. We want to see that happen."

Lovern said they agency needs to better evaluate different research techniques, which range from minimally invasive to lethal.

"We don't oppose research in order to benefit the Steller sea lion," Lovvorn said. "The question is are we doing that here in accordance with the law."

The federal agency failed to comply with the National Environmental Protection Act by not preparing an environmental impact statement, and must give up its research permits, according to the decision on Friday by U.S. District Court Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle in Washington, D.C.

The federal agency had issued permits that allowed researchers to attach tracking devices to more than 700 Steller sea lions, brand more than 2,900 and allowed for the incidental deaths of up to 60 of the animals a year, according to court documents.

The permits do not authorize the intentional killing of any Steller sea lions for scientific study, the documents said.

Fisheries service scientists said their research techniques are not harming the overall Steller sea lion population and are necessary to understanding the animals' unexplained decline and how to help them recover.

The research includes population monitoring and foraging and behavior patterns, said Kaja Brix, protected resources division director at the National Marine Fisheries Service's Alaska region office.

"The lack of ability to do the research certainly will have an impact as far as maintaining continuity in our research program and other entities in the state," she said. "They may have to abandon those studies for the time being and resume them once permits are reinstated."

The agency will have to revoke research permits from federal, state and non-goverment agencies studying Steller sea lions, including the Alaska SeaLife Center, North Pacific Universities Consortium, state Department of Fish and Game and the Aleutians East Borough.

Brix said the agency is already conducting an environmental impact statement, but it could be a year before it's completed.

The Steller sea lion habitat roughly follows the rim of the North Pacific Ocean from northern Japan to the south coast of Alaska. The animals also live on California's Channel Islands.

The number of Steller sea lions in the western stock dropped from about 200,000 originally to 35,000 animals in 2002, federal fisheries scientists estimate. Scientists do not know the original population level of the genetically distinct eastern group, but as of 2002 there were 31,000 animals, with numbers on the rise.
